Foreword

THE YEAR 1997, my first as Secretary-General of the United Nations, was marked by global transition and institutional change. As the United Nations continued to meet the challenges of poverty, war and human rights abuses around the world, we knew that our Organization needed to adapt to a new era of globalization and international organization. We knew that if the United Nations was to retain the support of the world's peoples, it needed to reflect their desires for a more effective, more dynamic and more responsive Organization.

To that end, I presented the most sweeping reform agenda in the Organization's history, seeking to enhance coherence and consistency in every aspect of our mission, and to bring us closer to the peoples we serve. The reaction of Member States was characterized by a genuine desire to renew the United Nations for a new era.

While peace and security matters continued to receive great attention, new impetus was given to our development efforts, both in my reform plan and by the General Assembly, which adopted the Agenda for Development and the Programme for the Further Implementation of Agenda 21—both documents aimed at invigorating a partnership for sustainable development based on interdependence and mutual benefit. Finally, the year 1997 witnessed a revitalization of our activities in the area of human rights. Mary Robinson took up her position as High Commissioner for Human Rights, and I was privileged to address audiences in Harare and Tehran about the universality of human rights in a diverse world.

This volume of the Yearbook of the United Nations records the Organization's efforts to adapt to far-reaching changes in its external environment and its first steps to reshape itself as a truly effective Organization for the betterment of humankind in the twenty-first century.

About the 1997 edition of the Yearbook

This volume of the YEARBOOK OF THE UNITED NATIONS continues the tradition of providing the most comprehensive and up-to-date coverage of the activities of the United Nations. It is an indispensable reference tool for the research community, diplomats, government officials and the general public seeking readily available information on the UN system and its related organizations.

Efforts by the Department of Public Information to achieve a more timely publication have resulted in having to rely on provisional documentation and other materials to prepare the relevant articles. Largely, Security Council resolutions and presidential statements, Economic and Social Council resolutions, and some other texts in the present volume are provisional.

Structure and scope of articles

The Yearbook is subject-oriented and divided into six parts covering political and security questions; human rights issues; economic and social questions; legal questions; institutional, administrative and budgetary questions; and intergovernmental organizations related to the United Nations. Chapters and topical headings present summaries of pertinent UN activities, including those of intergovernmental and expert bodies, major reports, Secretariat activities and, in selected cases, the views of States in written communications.

Activities of United Nations bodies. All resolutions, decisions and other major activities of the principal organs and, on a selective basis, those of subsidiary bodies are either reproduced or summarized in the respective articles. The texts of all resolutions and decisions of substantive nature adopted in 1997 by the General Assembly, the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council are reproduced or summarized under the relevant topic. These texts are preceded by procedural details giving date of adoption, meeting number and vote totals (in favour-against-abstaining); and information on their approval by a sessional or subsidiary body prior to final adoption. The texts are followed by details of any recorded or roll-call vote on the resolution/decision as a whole.

Major reports. Most reports of the Secretary-General, in 1997, along with selected reports from other UN sources, such as seminars and working groups, are summarized briefly.

Secretariat activities. The operational activities of the United Nations for development and humanitarian assistance are described under the relevant topics. For major activities financed outside the UN regular budget, selected information is given on contributions and expenditures.

Views of States. Written communications sent to the United Nations by Member States and circulated as documents of the principal organs have been summarized in selected cases, under the relevant topics. Substantive actions by the Security Council have been analysed and brief reviews of the Council's deliberations given, particularly in cases where an issue was taken up but no resolution was adopted.

Related organizations. The Yearbook also briefly describes the 1997 activities of the specialized agencies and other related organizations of the UN system.

Multilateral treaties. Information on signatories and parties to multilateral treaties and conventions is taken from Multilateral Treaties Deposited with the Secretary-General: Status as at 31 December 1997 (ST/LEG/SER.E/16), Sales No. E.98.V.2.

Terminology

Formal titles of bodies, organizational units, conventions, declarations and officials are given in full on first mention in an article or sequence of articles. They are also used in resolution/decision texts, and in the SUBJECT INDEX under the key word of the title. Short titles may be used in subsequent references.

How to find information in the Yearbook

The user may locate information on the United Nations activities contained in this volume by the use of the Table of Contents, the Subject Index, the Index of Resolutions and Decisions and the Index of Security Council Presidential Statements. The volume also has five appendices: Appendix I comprises a roster of Member States; Appendix II reproduces the Charter of the United Nations, including the Statute of the International Court of Justice; Appendix III gives the structure of the principal organs of the United Nations; Appendix IV provides the agenda for each session of the principal organs in 1997; and Appendix V gives the addresses of the United Nations information centres and services worldwide.

EXPLANATORY NOTE ON DOCUMENTS

References in square brackets in each chapter of Parts One to Five of this volume give the symbols of the main documents issued in 1997 on the topic. The following is a guide to the principal document symbols:

A/- refers to documents of the General Assembly, numbered in separate series by session. Thus, A/52/- refers to documents issued for consideration at the fifty-second session, beginning with A/52/1. Documents of special and emergency special sessions are identified as A/S- and A/ES-, followed by the session number.

A/C.- refers to documents of the Assembly's Main Committees, e.g. A/C.1/- is a document of the First Committee, A/C.6/-, a document of the Sixth Committee. A/BUR/- refers to documents of the General Committee. A/AC.- documents are those of the Assembly's ad hoc bodies and A/CN.-, of its commissions; e.g. A/AC.105/- identifies documents of the Assembly's Committee on the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space, A/CN.4.-, of its International Law Commission. Assembly resolutions and decisions since the thirty-first (1976) session have been identified by two arabic numerals; the first indicates the session of adoption; the second, the sequential number in the series. Resolutions are numbered consecutively from 1 at each session. Decisions of regular sessions are numbered consecutively, from 301 for those concerned with elections and appointments, and from 401 for all other decisions. Decisions of special and emergency special sessions are numbered consecutively, from 11 for those concerned with elections and appointments, and from 21 for all other decisions.

E/- refers to documents of the Economic and Social Council, numbered in separate series by year. Thus, E/1997/- refers to documents issued for consideration by the Council at its 1997 sessions, beginning with E/1997/1.E/AC.-, E/C.- and E/CN.-, followed by identifying numbers, refer to documents of the Council's subsidiary ad hoc bodies, committees and commissions. For example, E/CN.5/- refers to documents of the Council's Commission for Social Development, E/C.7/-, to documents of its Committee on Natural Resources. E/ICEF/- documents are those of the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF). Symbols for the Council's resolutions and decisions, since 1978, consist of two arabic numerals: the first indicates the year of adoption and the second, the sequential number in the series. There are two series: one for resolutions, beginning with 1 (resolution 1997/1); and one for decisions, beginning with 201 (decision 1997/201).

S/- refers to documents of the Security Council. Its resolutions are identified by consecutive numbers followed by the year of adoption in parentheses, beginning with resolution 1(1946).

ST/-, followed by symbols representing the issuing department or office, refers to documents of the United Nations Secretariat.

Documents of certain bodies bear special symbols, including the following:

ACC/-	Administrative Committee on Coordination
CD/-	Conference on Disarmament
CERD/-	Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination
DC/-	Disarmament Commission
DP/-	United Nations Development Programme
HS/-	Commission on Human Settlements
ITC/-	International Trade Centre
TD/-	United Nations Conference on Trade and Development
UNEP/-	United Nations Environment Programme

Many documents of the regional commissions bear special symbols. These are sometimes preceded by the following:

E/ECA/-	Economic Commission for Africa
E/ECE/-	Economic Commission for Europe
E/ECLAC/-	Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean
E/ESCAP/-	Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific
E/ESCWA/-	Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia

"L" in a symbol refers to documents of limited distribution, such as draft resolutions; "CONF." to documents of a conference; "INF." to those of general information. Summary records are designated by "SR.", verbatim records by "PV.", each followed by the meeting number.

United Nations sales publications each carry a sales number with the following components separated by periods: a capital letter indicating the language(s) of the publication; two arabic numerals indicating the year; a Roman numeral indicating the subject category; a capital letter indicating a subdivision of the category, if any; and an arabic numeral indicating the number of the publication within the category. Examples: E.97.II.A.2; E/F/R.97.II.E.7; E.97.X.1.

Report of the Secretary-General

Report of the Secretary-General on the work of the Organization

Following is the Secretary-General's report on the work of the Organization, submitted to the General Assembly and dated 3 September 1997. The Assembly took note of it on 10 November (decision 52/410).

Contours of the new era

1. We live in an era of realignment. At the international and national levels alike, fundamental forces are at work reshaping patterns of social organization, structures of opportunities and constraints, the objects of aspiration and the sources of fear. As is true of all transitional periods, very different expressions of the human predicament coexist in uneasy tension today: globalization envelops the world even as fragmentation and the assertion of differences are on the rise; zones of peace expand while outbursts of horrific violence intensify; unprecedented wealth is being created but large pockets of poverty remain endemic; the will of the people and their integral rights are both celebrated and violated; science and technology enhance human life at the same time as their by-products threaten planetary life-support systems.

2. It is not beyond the powers of political volition to tip the scale in this transition, towards a more secure and predictable peace, greater economic well-being, social justice and environmental sustainability. No country can achieve these global public goods on its own, however, just as none is exempt from the risks and costs of doing without them. Multilateral diplomacy was invented and has been sustained because political leaders as well as the people they represent have recognized this simple fact. Indeed, the twentieth-century project of international organization is all about how to stretch national interests and preferences, temporally as well as spatially, so as to produce in greater quantities the public goods that the political market place of inter-State behaviour would otherwise underpro-

duce. The United Nations, with its near-universal membership, its comprehensive mandate, a span of activities that ranges from the normative to the operational, and an institutional presence that is at once global, regional and country-based, can and should be at the very centre of this endeavour.

3. On 17 December 1996, Member States did me great honour in electing me the Organization's seventh Secretary-General. Since taking office, I have had one overriding objective: to induce greater unity of purpose, coherence of efforts and responsiveness throughout the Organization so that it can more effectively help meet the challenges of our times. Each of the component entities that constitute the United Nations has made adjustments to the epochal changes of the past decade, and their progress during this past year is summarized in these pages. As we go forward, however, the Organization must learn to make far better use of its major potential source of institutional strength: the many complementarities and synergies that exist within it. The comprehensive package of reforms that I presented to the General Assembly on 16 July 1997, and which the Assembly will consider at its current session, was designed with that aim in mind.

4. This—my first—annual report on the work of the Organization proceeds as follows. The remainder of this introduction briefly highlights some of the key forces that are transforming the world around the United Nations and, therefore, its agenda. Chapter II presents an overview of the Organization's activities of the past year, with a thematic emphasis on how the different programme areas have sought to adapt to and guide those forces in keeping with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and the programme priorities set by Member States. In chapter III, I offer some overall reflections on the work of the Organization, and I indicate how and why my proposals for institutional reform constitute a necessary next step in ensuring that the Organization remains a vital and effective instrument of international collaboration as the world heads into a new century—and a new millennium.

5. The diverse ramifications of the end of the cold war remain a palpable factor in the world even today, nearly a decade later. The cessation of super-Power rivalry and military confrontation set in train a whole host of progressive changes within and among countries. At the same time, the international community is still struggling with the adverse consequences of bipolarity's collapse. The inter-ethnic conflicts that followed the break-up of several multi-ethnic States, whether in Central Asia or the former Yugoslavia, are tragic cases in point. Some of the former proxy battlegrounds of the cold war in Asia and Africa continue to reel from instability. States that were held together by their perceived strategic utility to one side or the other in some instances have suffered grievously as a result; this was true, for example, in the Horn of Africa earlier in the decade, and most recently in the former Zaire. The help of all States, especially those that played leading roles in the cold war, is necessary to undo its remaining social, economic and political distortions.

6. A second fundamental force reshaping the world today is globalization; it is perhaps the most profound source of international transformation since the industrial revolution began to turn external trade into a routine feature of international life. Beginning in the 1960s, with the limited lifting of capital controls and the gradual emergence of multinational manufacturing firms, financial markets have become increasingly integrated and the production of goods and services transnationalized. Numbers tell part of the story: international financial flows tower over world trade by a ratio of 60:1, while the growth in world trade itself typically exceeds the increase in world gross domestic product by more than 5 per cent each year. The other part of the story is in the organization of these flows: they take place within markets which, for most purposes, have become single markets, and within firms or among related parties that treat the world, synoptically, as a single market place.

7. Globalization and the liberalization that produced it have generated a sustained period of economic expansion, together with the most rapid reconfiguration of international economic geography ever. Unprecedented wealth and standards of living exist in the industrialized world. Elsewhere, some countries that struggled with poverty a mere generation ago are now economic growth poles in their own right. Over the course of the next generation, a majority of the world's most rapidly growing economies will be located in what is now the developing world.

8. Globalization also poses numerous policy challenges, however. Among them are the inherent risks of markets lacking critical regulatory safeguards, as is true in some respects of international financial markets. Globalization is also eroding the efficacy of some policy instruments by which the industrialized countries had pursued full employment and social stability throughout the era that followed the Second World War. No consensus exists yet about how to replace the neo-Keynesian compromise that governed the political economy of advanced capitalism, but it would be folly to believe that the public in the industrialized countries is prepared simply to return to an era of unfettered market forces.

9. Additional policy challenges face the developing countries. To begin with, the benefits of globalization still affect relatively few among them. Some 40 per cent of the direct foreign investment flows to developing countries is accounted for by China alone; East Asia as a whole absorbs nearly two thirds. In contrast, Africa is the recipient of a meagre 4 per cent, while official development assistance has fallen. Among the countries bypassed by global capital flows are those that are experiencing the most enduring poverty. As indicated in the 1997 Human Development Report, published by the United Nations Development Programme, lack of global financial resources is no impediment to eradicating extreme poverty. Pro-growth policies at the national level coupled with targeted external assistance can enable currently marginalized countries to become active participants in the global economy. I consider it to be a core mission of the United Nations to help facilitate their successful transitions.

10. Furthermore, developing countries are in the difficult position of having to realign the character of their state apparatus in several directions simultaneously. The growing recognition that the State is not itself a creator of wealth has led to widespread privatization and deregulation, but even in market-oriented developing countries the State has critical roles to play in providing an enabling environment for sustainable development. The World Bank's 1997 World Development Report shows systematically how crucial an effective State is in this regard, as evidence from the so-called newly industrializing countries had suggested for some time. Finding the appropriate balance, however, especially in contexts where civil society is weak and transnational forces overpowering, is an exceedingly complex task. Various United Nations "good governance" programmes are designed to assist individual Governments in defining the balance that best meets their needs.

11. Third, globalization rests on and is sustained by a remarkable revolution in its own right in information technology, particularly the integration of increasingly powerful computers with telecommunication systems that permit high-volume and high-quality real-time voice and data transmissions. Indeed, the adjective "global" refers less to a place than to a space defined by electronic flows and a state of mind. World currency markets are the most global of all in this sense, and what has come to be known as the global factory relies similarly on such electronic infrastructure.

12. The information revolution has unfolded most extensively in the industrialized world, but it also holds enormous potential for the developing countries. It diminishes the constraints of distance in manufacturing industry and many services, and offers new tools in the form of administrative capacities, long-distance learning, telemedicine, the more effective management of micro-credit systems, and agricultural production, and for a variety of other applications. Major efforts should be undertaken to support greater acquisition and utilization of information technologies by the developing countries.

13. The intensification of global environmental interdependencies constitutes yet a fourth transformative force. At the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, held at Rio de Janeiro in 1992, the international community endorsed the concept of sustainable development as the key to reconciling economic and social progress, which all desire, with safeguarding the planet's ecosystems, on which all depend. Many of these systems are under increasing stress, however, with adverse consequences that range from the local destructiveness of flash floods resulting from deforestation, to the slower but globally indivisible atmospheric warming that results from increased emissions of greenhouse gases. As witnessed by the "Rio +5" summit, however, held at United Nations Headquarters in June 1997, progress since Rio has been disappointing, whether in meeting targets for controlling environmental degradation or in providing technological and financial assistance to developing countries. We hope for a more favourable outcome at the Kyoto session, later this year, of the Conference of the Parties to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change.

14. A fifth fundamental shift in the world today is the pronounced transnational expansion of civil society, itself made possible by a combination of political and technological changes. This is of great significance for the United Nations. Private investment capital exceeds by a factor of six the available official development assistance and must be further mobilized for development purposes. In recent years, the United Nations has found that much of its work at the country level, be it in humanitarian affairs, economic and social development, public health or the promotion of human rights, intimately involves the diverse and dedicated contributions of non-governmental organizations and groups. In response to these growing manifestations of an ever more robust global civil society, the United Nations is equipping itself to engage civil society and make it a true partner in its work. As part of my reform proposals, I have urged all United Nations entities to be open to and work closely with civil society organizations that are active in their respective sectors, and to facilitate increased consultation and cooperation between the United Nations and such organizations.

15. Sixth, and closely related, there is a growing trend towards democratization and respect for human rights. Countries in all parts of the world are voluntarily limiting the arbitrary powers of state agencies together with the abuses and the social and economic costs they engender. Some 120 countries now hold generally free and fair elections, the highest total in history. The social, economic and political benefits of basing systems of rule on the principles of human dignity and the will of the people are felt in domestic as well as regional peace and prosperity, though the transition to democracy itself is often slow and at times fraught with difficulty.

16. The same technological means that foster globalization and the transnational expansion of civil society also provide the infrastructure for expanding global networks of "uncivil society"—organized crime, drug traffickers, money launderers and terrorists. These parasitic elements constitute a seventh factor shaping the international agenda today. They corrupt local and in some instances national politics, undermine judiciaries and pose security threats even to the most powerful States. I have moved rapidly to consolidate in a high-profile office at Vienna all

United Nations efforts to combat these elements, but a redoubling of resolve is still necessary for them to be controlled, involving new partnerships among national and international agencies.

17. Finally, and somewhat paradoxically, these integrative trends are accompanied by tendencies towards fragmentation. In some instances, what appears to be fragmentation is in fact a move towards decentralization in policy-making and administration due to the desire for greater efficiency, effectiveness and accountability, thus posing no grounds for concern. In other cases, as noted above, fragmentation has been a by-product of the collapse of bipolarity and has led to intra-communal strife and conflict. Economic globalization, too, has brought about instances of fragmentation because market forces can and often do undermine indigenous cultural values. Indeed, the broad uncertainties and insecurities engendered by fundamental change frequently result in a heightened quest to redefine and reassert collective identities.

18. At their best, identity politics provide a robust sense of social coherence and civic pride, which have salutary effects for economic development and the peaceful resolution of disputes at home and abroad. At their worst, however, identity politics result in the vilification of "the other", whether that other is a different ethnic or tribal group, a different religion or a different nationality.

19. This particularistic and exclusionary form of identity politics has intensified in recent years within and among countries. It is responsible for some of the most egregious violations of international humanitarian law and, in several instances, of elementary standards of humanity: genocidal violence; the conscious targeting of civilian populations, often women and children, by factional combatants; rape as a deliberate instrument of organized terror; and attacks on emergency relief workers and missions. Negative forms of identity politics are a potent and potentially explosive force. Great care must be taken to recognize, confront and restrain them lest they destroy the potential for peace and progress that the new era holds in store.

20. Times of transformation can be times of confusion. The policy-making process can easily get caught in transition traps, moments of discontinuity when taking the wrong step can have severe long-term consequences. The international community has an obligation to itself and to succeeding generations to strengthen the available multilateral mechanisms, among which the United Nations is a unique instrument of concerted action, so as to successfully harness the mutual benefits of change while managing its adverse effects. By adopting the proposals for reform I submitted to the General Assembly in July, Member States will equip the United Nations to better play its part in meeting this challenge.

Managing change

21. Throughout the 1990s, all parts of the United Nations have continuously adapted their strategies and programmes to the new and fluid international context, with the aim of supporting and anticipating the needs of Member States. A thematic overview of achievements in the main areas of activity during the past year follows.

A. Good governance, human rights and democratization

22. It is increasingly recognized that good governance is an essential building block for meeting the objectives of sustainable development, prosperity and peace. The situation of no two countries is precisely alike in this respect but, broadly speaking, and making due allowance for cultural differences, good governance comprises the rule of law, effective state institutions, transparency and accountability in the management of public affairs, respect for human rights, and the meaningful participation of all citizens in the political processes of their countries and in decisions affecting their lives.

and United Nations programmes and funds have moved to provide extensive governance-related support to large numbers of developing countries and to countries in Eastern Europe and the Commonwealth of Independent States. This takes the form of analytical work, diagnostic research, needs assessment, policy advice, technical assistance and advisory services. Support is provided to strengthen the functioning of specific institutions, such as judiciaries, parliaments and electoral bodies, as well as Sectorally, including public sector financial management, privatization efforts, information technology, civil service reforms and the empowerment of civil society organizations.

24. For example, believing that sustainable prosperity and stability cannot be achieved without good governance, the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) has been increasing the funds dedicated to this priority area: it now accounts for more than one third of all UNDP allocations. In July 1997, UNDP convened the first ever International Conference on Governance for Sustainable Growth and Equity, bringing to United Nations Headquarters elected officials, judges and community leaders from more than 100 countries. The United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), reflecting the growing reliance of national Governments on local authorities, has focused increasingly on strengthening local capacity and promoting community participation. The United Nations Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM) also operates a governance programme, promoting strategies for women's empowerment and gender mainstreaming. Through UNIFEM support for women's political participation in Africa, for example, women candidates for public office have learned how to design effective campaign and media strategies. Similarly, the Electoral Assistance Division of the Department of Political Affairs has supported training programmes for women both as voters and as electoral officials and candidates.

25. Post-conflict situations entail particular needs. It is our view that measures to strengthen capacity for governance must permeate national and international responses to emergency situations, and should begin as early as possible. Successful recovery from the dislocations produced by conflict is aided by moving rapidly towards meeting broad development challenges as well as creating adequate legal frameworks, judiciaries, law enforcement systems, stable social and political environments and economic opportunities.

26. Expanding and enhancing the exchange of knowledge and experiences among developing countries is of growing importance. The United Nations Secretariat will facilitate this process through its capacity as a clearing house for information and research on public administration. As resources like the Internet and the World Wide Web become increasingly available globally, various sources of information and expertise can be more readily accessed, while new and productive linkages and networks with the regional commissions, professional organizations and non-governmental organizations are more easily established.

27. Article 1 of the Charter of the United Nations places the promotion of respect for human rights among the central purposes of the Organization. Increasingly in recent years, human rights have also come to be seen as an integral element of good governance.

28. The core human rights activities of the Organization took on renewed strength after the adoption of the Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action at the 1993 World Conference on Human Rights. Prior activities had focused largely on standard setting and the formal adoption of standards at the national level. The Vienna Declaration placed human rights in the context of development and democracy while reaffirming their universality. Together with the establishment of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, this has made it possible to approach human rights activities in practical as well as principled terms from a truly global perspective.

29. The United Nations instituted a major restructuring this year in the organization of the human rights secretariat at Geneva. In my July reform plans I went further, consolidating the Office of the High Commissioner and the Centre for Human Rights, thereby ensuring cohesion and consistency in priorities and activities. I am immensely pleased that the President of Ireland, Mary Robinson, is joining us as the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, and I know that she will work tirelessly and with sensitivity in the cause of universal human rights.

30. This past year has seen a dramatic increase in activities relating to the establishment of national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights. Their aim is to strengthen the protection of the individual by providing access to remedies for human rights violations, including in circumstances where the more traditional institutions of protection, such as the judiciary, are not available, do not function effectively or are otherwise inaccessible. Some 15 projects currently assist Member States in this area. Additional projects are aimed at supporting regional arrangements, such as the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights. These activities are typically undertaken in tandem with other United Nations entities, such as UNDP, and coincide with their efforts to promote good governance and sustainable development.

31. There has also been a pronounced increase in the involvement of human rights activities in field operations, directly reflecting decisions to that effect taken by the Security Council. Depending on the needs of the situation, these activities combine monitoring of human rights violations, education, training and other advisory services, and confidence-building measures. Currently, such operations exist in Abkhazia/Georgia, Burundi, Cambodia, Colombia, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Gaza, Guatemala, Haiti, Malawi, Mongolia, Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia.

32. The human rights programme continues to address violations of human rights. Threats to the right to life and physical integrity, including extrajudicial executions and enforced disappearances, threats to freedom of expression and movement and to freedom from arbitrary arrest, and threats to the independence of the judiciary continue to be the focus of United Nations action. The persistence of such violations has led us to target our activities more directly at specific areas where the violations are committed. Accordingly, advisory services and technical assistance have been made available to Governments to strengthen their judiciary, train law enforcement officials and assist with law reform. Training programmes for the administration of the justice sector, and advisory services for law reform, coupled with support for establishing national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights, now make up over 80 per cent of the activities of advisory services in the human rights area.

33. As at July 1997, there were 191 States parties to the Convention on the Rights of the Child, ensuring that the vast majority of children are now citizens of countries that have made legally binding commitments to promote and protect their human rights. Nevertheless, such practices as the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography remain critical problem areas and are addressed by a Special Rapporteur. The implementation of the Plan of Action on the rights of the child, recently developed by the High Commissioner, is an essential next step.

34. According to the 1997 report of UNICEF, The Progress of Nations, violence against women and girls is the most pervasive violation of human rights in the world today. It transcends the usual distinctions among countries based on such factors as national income. UNIFEM has developed a global women's human rights programme, focused on mainstreaming the rights of women, combating and eliminating violence against them, and strengthening women's knowledge and use of their human rights. Particular attention is devoted to securing universal ratification of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, the women's "bill of rights".

35. In a related area, the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA) advocates and supports through its country programmes internationally agreed goals concerning reproductive rights, sexual relations and childbearing. The Fund has sponsored a variety of media and other public education campaigns during the past year. It also prepared a programming framework for eradicating female genital mutilation, which has already met with success in a community-based advocacy programme in Uganda.

36. The year 1998 will mark the fiftieth anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and the General Assembly will review progress in the implementation of the Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action. The appointment in 1997 of a new High Commissioner, and the drawing up of the medium-term plan for 1998-2001, provide additional impetus to making this the era in which human rights are universally accepted as inherent to the promotion of peace, security, economic prosperity and social equity.

37. The trend towards democratization has been accelerating for some time. Democratic processes continue to be strengthened in Latin America and the Caribbean. Progress has also been marked in Africa. As I noted in my address to the annual Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity in June, the view that military coups against democratically elected Governments by self-appointed juntas are not acceptable has become an established norm. Africa is also experimenting with new constitutional formulas and forms of governing in multi-ethnic States, as illustrated by Eritrea, Ethiopia, Ghana, Mali and South Africa.

38. The value that Member States attach to democratization is reflected in the large number of requests the United Nations receives for electoral assistance—no fewer than 80 in the past five years. United Nations electoral assistance seeks in the first instance to enhance the effectiveness of international observers in making assessments regarding the legitimacy of an electoral process and its outcome, and to recommend election-related policy changes through dialogue with the Government, political parties and civil society. The international observation of recent elections in Algeria, Ghana, Madagascar, Mali and Yemen has been supported in this manner. Recognizing the need to foster the sustainability of local democratic institutions, the United Nations also emphasizes the importance of building the domestic institutional capacity of Member States in constitutional and electoral law reforms and strengthening Governments' own institutional capacities to organize elections. During the last year, such assistance has been provided to Bangladesh, the Comoros, the Gambia, Guyana, Haiti, Liberia, Mali and Mexico.

39. In the long run, the transition to sustained democratic consolidation requires promotion of the rule of law and respect for human rights, creation of free media, tolerance of opposition and an independent civil society. The experience of El Salvador and Nicaragua shows that the United Nations can help such democratic processes to take root even in difficult conditions. In Haiti, the United Nations activities have assisted in maintaining an environment in which security and basic freedoms may be established.

40. With a view to strengthening cooperation on issues of democratization and good governance, the Secretariat in the coming year will undertake a series of consultations on lessons learned in constitutionalism, governance in multi-ethnic States and related topics, aimed at distilling insights for future activities.

41. In sum, despite setbacks and difficulties, progress is being made in transitions towards good governance, human rights and democratization. This augurs well for the achievement of critical national and international policy objectives, as well as for the aims and aspirations enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations.

B. International economic cooperation and sustainable development

42. Competent, accountable and responsive state institutions are one building block for the achievement of significant progress towards prosperity and stability. A conducive and supportive international economic environment is equally important, however, and fostering such an environment is a core element of the Organization's mission.

43. Two major events of the past year, both in June 1997, concern the work of the Organization in international economic and social cooperation. The first was the adoption by the General Assembly of its Agenda for Development. The second was the nineteenth special session of the General Assembly, convened to review the implementation of Agenda 21, the global plan of action for sustainable development adopted at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, held at Rio de Janeiro in 1992. Both have implications for the substance as well as the organization of United Nations activities in this domain.

44. The Agenda for Development not only addresses conventional development issues but also stresses the mutually supportive though complex relationships among development, peace, democracy, good governance and human rights. It affirms the United Nations role in the field of development, and identifies ways of reinforcing the capacities and effectiveness of the United Nations system in that field.

45. The special session of the Assembly occasioned a sober reflection on the limited progress that has been achieved in implementing the agreements reached at the Rio Conference. In addition, the special session marked the first such review of global conferences convened by the United Nations in recent years. It is envisaged that similar reviews will take place of the other conferences. Taken together, the lessons gained from these reviews will inform and help shape national and international policy into the next century.

46. As noted in the introduction, the economic context for development has undergone substantial change in recent years. At the national level, liberalization and economic reform have been the predominant trends in the 1990s, while internationally globalization has been the driving force. Both dimensions have been the subject of sustained attention by the Secretariat and the respective intergovernmental bodies. For example, in the 1997 World Economic and Social Survey it is suggested that all developing countries and countries with economies in transition need to raise per capita income by at least 3 per cent annually in order to make progress in reducing unemployment and alleviating poverty. To achieve those levels of growth, the report contends, the less affluent countries in particular require a more conducive external economic environment than now exists for them, an issue discussed in depth by the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session of 1997.

47. Unfavourable trends in official development assistance cast a serious shadow over the development prospects of lower-income countries. Most African and a number of other vulnerable countries are unlikely to reap the benefits of their recent economic reforms without the sustained support of the international community. The past year has nevertheless seen some encouraging initiatives, many resulting from the new global partnership proposed by the major industrialized countries at their summit meeting at Lyon, in June 1996. They include the second Tokyo International Conference on African Development, the "African Growth and Opportunity Act" proposed by the United States of America, the Swedish "Partnership Africa", and the planned successor to the fourth Lome Convention concluded between the European Community and African, Caribbean and Pacific States. An important task for the United Nations in the years ahead will be to develop new forms of partnership between developed and developing countries—partnerships that meet the needs and aspirations of developing countries and are also consistent with global economic conditions and attitudes.

48. In the area of international trade, the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) has repositioned itself for this challenge. In the past year, it has re-focused its policy analysis work, intergovernmental deliberations and operational activities. UNCTAD is examining the relationship between globalization and development, together with ways of promoting the effective integration of all developing countries into the international trading system. It is supporting efforts by developing countries to improve their investment climate, increase their technological capacities, and identify and exploit opportunities for enterprise development. At the same time, UNCTAD remains deeply involved with capacity-building in the least developed countries. Paralleling these programmatic changes, the UNCTAD intergovernmental and secretariat structures have been substantially streamlined, the number of meetings cut, staff size reduced and considerable savings achieved.

49. The regional commissions also have been re-examining their work programmes. For example, the Economic Commission for Europe is addressing the consequences of the accession of central European countries to the European Union, the transition processes of countries in south-eastern Europe and the Commonwealth of Independent States, and several transboundary issues, including border-crossing, energy and transport infrastructures, and the environment. The Economic Commission for Africa has focused on regional trade and investment concerns, particularly on post-Uruguay Round challenges and opportunities for Africa. The Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia has curtailed some of its activities, notably in agriculture and industry, while expanding its endeavours in such other areas as water resources development, energy and transport. The Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean pursued a variety of analytic and policy issues in the past year, including the compatibility between preferential trade agreements and a more open international trading system. It also instituted several reform measures, among which is a pilot scheme to establish a clearer and enhanced accountability on the part of its secretariat vis-a-vis the Commission in exchange for greater delegation of authority and flexibility. The Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific, at its April session, committed itself to streamlining the Commission, and pledged to make it a vital centre of research and other development activities for the region, especially for those countries in which widespread poverty lingers.

50. Much of the recent work of the Economic and Social Council and its subsidiary bodies has focused on translating into action the plans and programmes agreed upon at the global conferences held earlier in the decade. In addition to the special session of the General Assembly on "Rio +5", the 1997 meetings of the Commission on Population and Development, the Commission for Social Development and the Commission on the Status of Women concerned follow-up issues to the conferences held at Cairo, Copenhagen and Beijing.

51. Similarly, the Secretariat's work programme in each of these areas was oriented towards the priorities identified at the conferences and the subsequent sessions of the Commissions. To cite but one illustration, the Inter-Agency Committee on Women and Gender Equality met for the first time in October 1996, chaired by the Secretary-General's Special Adviser on Gender Issues and the Advancement of Women. The Committee is charged with promoting gender mainstreaming and coordinating the response of the United Nations system to the Beijing Conference and other United Nations conferences and summits.

52. Improvements in data collection and dissemination have been an important dimension of the United Nations system's conference follow-up. In the past year the Statistics Division has produced, in cooperation with the Population Division and the European Union, revised recommendations on statistics of international migration and, in cooperation with the regional commissions and the European Union, the principles and recommendations for population and housing censuses. The collection, updating and improved dissemination of more traditional data remain important aspects of the Organization's work. Thus, the 1996 revision of the official United Nations population estimates and projections showed slower world population growth, lower levels of fertility, more diverse trends in mortality and increased migration flows during the first half of the 1990s than in prior decades. The revision also documented the devastating mortality effects of the AIDS pandemic, particularly for Africa.

53. The Organization continues to take advantage of improvements in technology to enhance the dissemination of information. For example, the Monthly Bulletin of Statistics is now available on the World Wide Web. The Population Information Network serves as a repository of population data and information, and has also assisted developing countries in creating population information sites on the Internet. Similarly, the Division for the Advancement of Women, together with the United Nations Development Fund for Women and the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women, initiated an Internet space, Women-watch, on global women's issues. Linkages and partnerships with a network of non-governmental organizations promote accelerated action by civil society to advance the status of women and their human rights.

54. Sustainable development is a fundamental challenge facing humanity as it enters the twenty-first century: how to provide for the needs of a growing world population without destroying the natural resource base on which it depends. The 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development mapped out a detailed plan for achieving sustainable, long-term development. The work of the United Nations on sustainable development during the past year was focused, in large part, on preparations for the special session of the General Assembly.

55. At that session, the General Assembly made it clear that developed countries must significantly strengthen their financial and technological support to developing countries if the latter are to mobilize national resources in pursuit of global environmental goals. The Assembly agreed to continue a political process under the Commission on Sustainable Development on the subject of forests, including consideration of an instrument, possibly legally binding, intended to ensure sustainability. It also decided to initiate intergovernmental discussions on the problems of freshwater scarcity and the energy sector.

56. No agreement was expected, nor was any reached, on the issue of climate change, but the special session did raise public and political awareness of the need to address this issue through a cooperative strategy, and to bridge the key gaps in the political consensus needed to strengthen the principal instrument of that strategy, the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change. The next step is for the developed countries to adopt legally binding commitments to limit and reduce their emissions of gases that contribute to global warming. This is the main objective of the next session of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention, to be held at Kyoto, Japan, in December 1997. Ultimately, the Convention's objective of stabilizing global greenhouse gases at "safe" levels cannot be achieved by the developed countries alone, but will also require the cooperation of developing countries.

57. The first edition of the Global Environment Outlook was published by the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) early in 1997. It notes that over the last decade the state of the global environment has continued to deteriorate and that significant environmental problems remain deeply embedded in the socio-economic fabric of countries in all regions. While some progress is reported in curbing pollution and resource degradation, worsening trends are found in areas ranging from emissions of toxic substances and greenhouse gases to natural resource degradation and desertification.

58. Mindful of these trends, the Governing Council of UNEP, at its nineteenth session, adopted measures to strengthen the Programme's work in environmental monitoring, assessment and early warning. Agreements were also reached on the implementation of the Global Programme of Action for the Protection of the Marine Environment from Land-based Activities; on measures to reduce the risks to human health from hazardous chemicals; and on action to reduce persistent organic pollutants. Progress has been made on these issues in 1997.

59. The accelerating process of urbanization affects all dimensions of sustainable development. The seriousness of this issue animated the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II), held at Istanbul in 1996. Over the past year, the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements increased its support to developing countries for shelter and services, urban management and policy reforms, and devising guidelines and indicators by which to measure progress towards achieving adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements development. As requested by the General Assembly, the Commission on Human Settlements at its session in May 1997 reviewed and adapted its working methods so as to involve organizations of local authorities and other relevant groups in civil society, especially the private sector.

60. The Agenda for Development and the special session of the General Assembly, as well as related activities at the intergovernmental level, have all stressed—and the Organization's work programme in these areas has experienced—the multifaceted and intersectoral nature of the concerns at hand. This poses a major institutional challenge: how most effectively to service them at the level of the Secretariat. What is required is not merely more efficient administrative support. Of even greater importance is better integrating the Organization's analytical, normative and operational functions, and enhancing the relevance of its analytical and normative work for policy formulation and action.

61. It was with these aims in mind that I decided to merge the three Secretariat departments in the economic and social spheres into one Department of Economic and Social Affairs. The new consolidated Department will be far better equipped to perform its complex functions in an integrated manner. The merger will also yield efficiency savings, which I am proposing to dedicate to the development account that I recommended to Member States as part of my July reform plans.

C. Development operations

62. Gross disparities continue to characterize the world today—in income, access to services, and opportunities to lead a life worthy of human dignity. The challenge of development remains profound, and the condition of poverty profoundly disturbing. Meeting the challenge requires enhanced support to developing countries, quite apart from creating conducive domestic and international contexts.

63. The United Nations has forged a global agenda specifying the many dimensions of development, and has devised plans to implement agreed objectives. The tasks are immense, however, and the available resources have become stagnant. United Nations development programmes and funds have, therefore, sought ways to stretch available resources by coordinating their strategic resource allocation, beginning with the harmonization of programme cycles in 1996, and by collaborating more extensively at the country level.

64. To accelerate this process, and building on its success, one of the most consequential of my July reform proposals is the creation of a United Nations Development Group. Chaired by the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme, the Group also comprises UNICEF and UNFPA, with other entities participating as warranted by their interests and mandates. The United Nations Development Group is structured so as to maintain and reinforce the distinctive nature of its constituent units, while facilitating their functioning in a more unified, cooperative and coherent framework at the headquarters level and in the field. It holds great promise of amplifying the impact of United Nations development activities.

65. From 132 field offices serving more than 170 countries, the United Nations Development Programme fosters policies and capacities for poverty eradication and sustainable human development. During 1996, UNDP implemented a new resource allocation formula whereby nearly 90 per cent of its core funds of some $850 million are assigned to low-income countries. Its core resources are augmented by some $1.2 million in restricted funds and cost-sharing arrangements. The Programme's primary focus continues to be on building national capacity for poverty eradication and the creation of employment and sustainable livelihoods. Projects in the past year involved more than 80 countries, and included support for economic management (36 countries in Africa), the design and implementation of national poverty reduction programmes (China, India, Mongolia and 23 African countries), restructuring public expenditures (Burkina Faso) and monitoring the impact of economic reform on vulnerable groups (Mongolia). In 1997-1998, the resources devoted to gender mainstreaming activities are being increased to one fifth of core funds.

66. In the area of environment and development, UNDP in 1996 supported the efforts of developing countries to implement the United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification as well as the Montreal Protocol on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer, and it secured $47 million from the Global Environmental Facility for new activities related to the environmental needs of developing countries.

67. In 1996, UNDP began a Poverty Strategies Initiative. Many of the projects assist national partners to assess the magnitude and distribution of poverty nationwide, through household surveys and similar means. UNDP country offices are supporting the preparation of national human development reports, complementing the global Human Development Report. As of 1996, more than 50 countries had produced such reports; by the end of 1997 approximately 100 countries will have done so. These reports help to frame national anti-poverty campaigns and serve as a basis for monitoring their progress.

68. The United Nations Children's Fund is another core member of the newly constituted United Nations Development Group. In 1996, total UNICEF expenditures were $921 million, fully one third of which originated from non-governmental or private sources. Approximately 70 per cent of programme expenditures went to the care and protection of children in low-income countries, which in turn account for 70 per cent of the world's child population. Africa and Asia combined received some two thirds of total expenditures. Health was by far the leading sector of programme activity, followed by roughly equal emphases on education, nutrition and providing clean water supplies and sanitation services.

69. The Fund is an active and often leading participant in cooperative ventures within the wider United Nations context. Among the many notable examples is its work to prevent and treat the main causes of childhood illness and death, such as acute respiratory infections, diarrhoea, malaria, measles and malnutrition. UNICEF and the World Health Organization have promoted an integrated approach to the prevention and management of such childhood illnesses. UNICEF also cooperates with several international and national agencies in working towards the reduction of maternal mortality. A number of countries, notably Bangladesh, Indonesia, Mali, Romania and Viet Nam, have, as a result of these efforts, initiated programmes that combine improved training of midwives, better access to family planning and women's health services, and improved emergency obstetric care.

70. The third core member of the United Nations Development Group is the United Nations Population Fund. Pledged contributions remained just above $300 million in 1996. Some 47 new country programmes were formulated in that year. UNFPA focuses on three main programme areas: reproductive health, including family planning and sexual health; population and development strategies; and advocacy. The Fund is especially concerned with helping countries to institutionalize the concept of reproductive health in national population programmes, and to integrate such programmes into primary health care systems. It has also stepped up its efforts in the area of adolescent reproductive health.

71. The World Food Programme (WFP) is a dual mandate agency, working in both emergency humanitarian relief and development operations. Roughly one third of its total resources of $ 1.4 billion is devoted to development. In 1996, new commitments available for development purposes were significantly lower than in previous years. Nevertheless, WFP development assistance reached more than 20 million people, in the form of human resource development projects as well as infrastructure and agricultural or rural development projects. Some 40 per cent of the beneficiaries were in sub-Saharan Africa, with another third in the Asia and Pacific region.

72. Africa receives the major share of assistance because WFP concentrates resources on the poorest people in the neediest countries; in all, some 30 sub-Saharan countries received assistance. At the same time, there has been progress in that region. Ethiopia, a recent recipient of both emergency relief and development assistance, produced a grain surplus last year that it exported to neighbouring Kenya and Somalia. Agricultural production in Cote d'Ivoire, Ghana and Mauritius has increased an average of 4 per cent annually in recent years, compared to the overall sub-Saharan average of 2 per cent.

73. The development activities of WFP in the Asia and Pacific region centre largely on enabling poor rural people to improve their food security. This includes supporting self-help training and credit schemes for poor women (Bangladesh); strengthening the capacity of rural communities in selecting and implementing local infrastructure and income-generating projects (China, India and Nepal); rehabilitation programmes for war-affected people (Cambodia); and nutrition and health support for vulnerable groups (India and Viet Nam).

74. In Latin America and the Caribbean, WFP has assisted efforts by Governments and local communities to provide the poorest households with improved access to productive resources, and to give direct dietary support through targeted interventions in primary health care, and also in pre-school and primary education.

75. Several other organizations contribute significantly to the United Nations development efforts. Among them is the United Nations Development Fund for Women. Its development-related work supports programmes to strengthen women's economic capacity as entrepreneurs and producers. Key aspects of this work include supporting the inception and growth of international networks—such as the International Coalition on Women and Credit, which advocates gender-sensitive approaches to the extension of micro-credit. Regional initiatives also receive support. One case in point is the Self-Employed Women's Association, which was enabled by UNIFEM support to strengthen its ultimately successful campaign for an International Labour Organization convention on home-based workers. UNIFEM also supports women's efforts to organize the production and marketing of goods and services.

76. The devastating impact of HIV/AIDS is a serious impediment to the development prospects of a number of low-income countries. The mission of the Joint United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS (UNAIDS) is to lead, strengthen and support an expanded United Nations response to the epidemic, aimed at preventing transmission, providing care and support, reducing individual and community vulnerability, and alleviating its impact. At the country level, UNAIDS has supported the establishment of United Nations theme groups on HIV/AIDS, designed to coordinate United Nations efforts in support of national responses to HIV/AIDS. The sharing of experiences and expertise between countries is critical, as is the need for increased inter-country collaboration on the many HIV/AIDS issues that cut across borders. Accordingly, UNAIDS has set up small inter-country teams at Abidjan, Bangkok and Pretoria that are working closely with the co-sponsoring agencies to develop and consolidate technical resource networks and enhance national capacity for HIV/AIDS prevention and care.

77. In sum, the various development organizations of the United Nations pursue ambitious agendas because they face enormous challenges, but they are obliged to pursue those agendas with quite limited resources. My aim in establishing the United Nations Development Group is to augment the impact of those resources through forging closer collaboration among the constituent units at the strategic level and in field operations, enhancing the overall effort by focusing on core competencies and by sharing common premises and services.

D. Preventive diplomacy, peaceful settlement of disputes and disarmament

78. The assurance that members will not resort to violence but will settle their disputes in some other way is the cornerstone of all well-ordered societies. Zones characterized by such dependable expectations of peaceful change exist in all parts of the world today—though they coexist with instances of violent conflict among and within States. It is a primary aim of the United Nations to expand the domain of peaceful change, by providing means through which conflicts may be contained and resolved and by dealing with their root causes.

79. The prevention of conflict both within and between States requires, first of all, ongoing attention to possible sources of tension and prompt action to ensure that tension does not evolve into conflict. During the past year, the Secretariat, in cooperation with other branches of the United Nations system, has worked to strengthen its global watch, which is designed to detect threats to international peace and security, enabling the Security Council to carry out or to foster preventive action.

80. Cooperation with regional organizations offers great potential. Close contacts with the Organization of African Unity (OAU) are a case in point. The two secretariats engage in almost daily consultations. The appointment of a joint United Nations/OAU Special Representative for the Great Lakes region, Mr. Mohamed Sahnoun, whose mandate and activities have been extended to other countries in central Africa, is a further manifestation of that cooperation. There is also increased cooperation between the United Nations and subregional organizations such as the Economic Community of West African States and the Southern African Development Community.

81. Elsewhere, the United Nations continues to work closely with the Organization of American States, particularly in Haiti where the jointly fielded International Civilian Mission continues to do its work. The same is true of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and the Council of Europe in the areas of human rights, electoral assistance, peacemaking and economic development. We will continue to build upon these positive experiences to promote a more rational and cost-effective division of labour between the world organization and regional entities, thereby bringing life to the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter of the United Nations.

82. The contrasting experience during the past year of two neighbouring countries in Central Asia underlines the fact that progress in resolving disputes hinges on certain conditions. The signing of the General Agreement on the Establishment of Peace and National Accord in Tajikistan, though it has not fully prevented fighting, demonstrated the desire of the Tajik disputants to settle their differences peacefully. It also reflected the readiness of some key countries, such as the Islamic Republic of Iran and the Russian Federation, to use their influence on the disputants to bring this about. In Afghanistan, on the other hand, despite the efforts of the United Nations Special Mission, backed by appeals from the Security Council, the warring parties have shown little interest in a peaceful solution. They have continued to wage a brutal and futile civil war. What is more, they have been encouraged by some Member States which continue to provide them with political and military assistance. All the while, the unrelenting suffering of the people of Afghanistan worsens. I decided in July of this year to intensify United Nations efforts to help bring an end to the strife in Afghanistan by dispatching Mr. Lakhdar Brahimi to make a fresh assessment and to recommend possible roles for the Organization.

83. I deeply regret that the absence of will to coexist peacefully and the readiness, on the part of some elements, to change a negotiated political order through violence have led to serious regression in two countries where the United Nations had played a major role in restoring stability after years of civil war. The coup d'etat in Sierra Leone in May was a reprehensible action that rightly received vigorous condemnation throughout the continent and the international community. It greatly set back the chances of stability and development in a country that is in desperate need of both. In Cambodia, the fragile coalition that was the result of painstaking and costly international efforts was rocked by the violent events of July.

84. The interlocking problems and crises that engulfed the Great Lakes region of central Africa following the devastating human tragedy in Rwanda required a correspondingly integrated approach on the part of the United Nations. While a measure of stability was re-established in Rwanda itself, my Special Envoy, Mr. Sahnoun, became deeply involved in international efforts to cope with the unfolding crisis in eastern Zaire. The rebellion that began there culminated in the capture of Kinshasa and the establishment of a new Government, which renamed the country Democratic Republic of the Congo. Mr. Sahnoun has collaborated with President Omar Bongo of Gabon in the search for a peaceful solution to the conflict in the Republic of the Congo, and he continues to lend his support to the efforts of former President Julius Nyerere of the United Republic of Tanzania to bring the political parties of Burundi to the negotiating table.

85. In response to the urgent need to address seriously charges that acts of genocide and violations of international humanitarian law had been committed in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, I dispatched an investigative team to establish the facts. Ultimately, solutions to the deep-rooted and widespread problems of the region can be devised only by its own people. At the same time, the international community must respond fully to the requirements and aspirations of the region through a long-term commitment to assist and sustain peace efforts.

86. In recent months, I have also taken initiatives to revitalize flagging processes towards the settlement of three long-standing disputes: Western Sahara, Cyprus and East Timor. In each case, I appointed a high-level emissary to try to move the process out of its rut. In the case of Western Sahara, I requested Mr. James Baker III to assess, together with the parties, prospects for the implementation of the settlement plan and to provide me with his recommendations. He has carried out several rounds of consultations with the parties. The United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara remains in place to facilitate the implementation of a settlement.

87. To give new impetus to my mission of good offices in East Timor, I appointed Mr. Jamsheed Marker as my Personal Representative. He embarked on an intensive series of consultations with the Governments of Indonesia and Portugal on how best to reinvigorate the tripartite talks that had been held under the auspices of my predecessors since 1983. He also visited East Timor. On the basis of those discussions, I invited the Foreign Ministers of Indonesia and Portugal to a meeting in New York. I was encouraged by the assurances from the two Governments that the negotiations would be fruitful. I also believe it useful to continue the all-inclusive East Timorese dialogue, to enable the people of East Timor to contribute practical ideas in the search for a lasting solution.

88. The third area where I have tried to reactivate a previously moribund peace process is Cyprus, in which a long-standing United Nations peacekeeping presence has played an essential role in preventing the resumption of hostilities. I invited the leaders of the two communities to a series of face-to-face talks, their first in three years, under the chairmanship of my Special Adviser on Cyprus, Mr. Diego Cordovez. The first round was held outside New York in July, a second in Switzerland in August. Although it has not yet been possible to reach agreement on substantive matters, the two leaders remain committed to achieving an overall settlement under my good offices, and I intend to proceed with the mission.

89. Finally, the use of mandatory sanctions is a valuable tool available to the Security Council, permitting the United Nations to bring pressure to bear without recourse to force. However, concern has been expressed about the negative effects of such measures on the most vulnerable groups among the civilian population, as well as their collateral effects on other States. The oil-for-food programme in Iraq, which came into effect in December 1996 and was extended in June 1997, represents the first systematic attempt by the Council to address the humanitarian needs of a civilian population in a country remaining subject to sanctions. I shall encourage consideration by the General Assembly and the Security Council of possible ways to render sanctions a less blunt and more effective instrument.

90. In the past 12 months, significant progress in arms regulation and disarmament has been achieved through multilateral treaty-making, in several cases through the Conference on Disarmament. Treaties covering a wide range of weapons of mass destruction have been negotiated, extended or bolstered, or have entered into force. The new, institutionalized review process of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons commenced, the historic Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban Treaty was concluded, the Chemical Weapons Convention came into force, and agreement was reached by the parties to the Biological Weapons Convention to intensify their efforts to negotiate verification provisions. There has been further consolidation of the various nuclear-weapon-free-zone arrangements, most of which now enjoy the full support of the nuclear-weapon States. The momentum that has been generated by these achievements should be maintained, in particular with a view to substantially reducing and ultimately eliminating the remaining nuclear stockpiles.

91. Notwithstanding these accomplishments, the absence of norms governing conventional weapons, especially light weapons and small arms, is of mounting concern. Little has been done to curb their rapidly escalating proliferation. This situation creates perverse chains of events. Member States ask the United Nations to deal with certain armed conflicts. In at least 15 such conflicts today the primary or sole tools of violence are small arms and light weapons. They are readily available on world markets. Indeed, there is intense competition to export these weapons, including to the conflict areas in which the United Nations is struggling to promote peace, thereby exacerbating the intensity and duration of those conflicts. The consequent losses of life and the displacement of people within countries and to neighbouring areas add, in turn, to the humanitarian crises that the United Nations is called upon to alleviate.

92. The challenge for the international community is to devise means to contain the spread of such weapons, especially to areas in conflict. One is through promoting the principle of openness and transparency in military matters. In this regard, the United Nations Register of Conventional Arms enjoys the wide support of Member States and should be strengthened. The commendable initiative recently taken in West Africa to declare a moratorium on the export, import and production of light weapons is another constructive measure.

93. Finally, the efforts under way to ban anti-personnel landmines should be universally encouraged, and effective means to eliminate these vile weapons should be adopted at the earliest opportunity. Landmines have been described as weapons that do not get put away after a war; they remain in place to maim and kill—some 2,000 people every month, mostly civilians. Significant progress at last may be at hand. In the autumn of 1996 a group of countries, together with the International Campaign to Ban Landmines, galvanized the pro-ban movement in what has become known as the Ottawa process. To date, as many as 117 States have stated publicly that they will sign an international treaty at Ottawa in December 1997 in support of a global ban on the manufacture, production, use and export of anti-personnel landmines. I strongly support this effort.

94. These and other new challenges of weapons proliferation make it necessary for the United Nations to revitalize its efforts in this domain. The fact that the world is no longer riven by super-Power rivalry makes it possible. Seizing the moment, I proposed in my July reform report the creation of a new Department for Disarmament and Arms Regulation, which will return the United Nations to centre stage in limiting the destructiveness of conflicts by limiting the spread of the weapons that fuel them.

E. Humanitarian action

95. When the peaceful settlement of disputes fails—or is deliberately rejected as a policy option—and armed conflict ensues, the impact on other States is often felt first through a surge of refugees, or by concern with the plight of internally displaced and other war-affected persons. The total number of victims of man-made humanitarian disasters today is unquantifiable. Those who are physically displaced by conflicts are estimated at 40 million; they exceed the victims of natural disasters by perhaps as much as a factor of 10. It is the aim of United Nations humanitarian agencies to provide timely and effective assistance as well as protection to those in need, and to advocate adherence to humanitarian norms.

96. Humanitarian aid to persons affected by conflict is undertaken in contexts that are becoming increasingly complex, volatile and dangerous. Missions are carried out amid contested or collapsed state structures, the breakdown of law and order and of the support mechanisms of civil society, and outright civil war. This state of affairs makes it necessary to couple relief efforts with more comprehensive approaches that include promoting political settlement, rebuilding capacity and restoring economic opportunities. Ominously, in a growing number of instances civilian populations have become the explicit target of combatants, whether to achieve their forcible displacement, use them as shields, terrorize or annihilate them. Humanitarian missions similarly have been impeded or denied access for reasons of political expediency, manipulated as part of the strategic calculus of warring factions, or subjected to attacks. These distressing practices pose very serious policy and moral dilemmas that the international community must address and resolve.

97. The refugee population assisted by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) declined during 1996, from 15.5 million to 13.2 million, owing in part to UNHCR efforts to secure voluntary repatriation but also, regrettably, to episodes of large-scale involuntary repatriation and evacuation, particularly in the Great Lakes region of central Africa. Internally displaced people now significantly outnumber refugees, with estimates ranging from 20 million to 25 million. UNHCR directly or indirectly assists nearly 5 million internally displaced persons and an equal number of former refugees and others who are in various stages of resettlement. The Emergency Relief Coordinator also serves victims of natural disasters.

98. The World Food Programme conducted a total of 57 relief operations in 1996, six of which (the Great Lakes region, Angola, Afghanistan, Iraq, Liberia and the former Yugoslavia) accounted for more than two thirds of all relief aid provided. More than 15 million of the assisted victims were women and children, who are usually the first to experience the effects of hunger in the midst of political violence, drought or other disasters. UNICEF continued to focus its extensive humanitarian efforts on issues related to nutrition, health, sanitation and education for children in emergency situations. The United Nations Centre for Human Rights and UNICEF provided support for an important expert report to the Third Committee of the General Assembly on the impact of armed conflict on children, the most comprehensive analysis of the subject ever undertaken. The United Nations Population Fund concluded an agreement with UNHCR in the past year to provide emergency reproductive health care to displaced persons and refugees. In addition, UNAIDS produced guidelines for Governments and cooperating agencies, enabling them to adopt necessary measures to prevent the rapid epidemic spread of HIV in emergency settings and to care for those already affected.

99. The longest-standing United Nations humanitarian mission is the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA). In addition to providing essential education, health, relief and social services to 3.4 million refugees, UNRWA has undertaken a range of projects aimed at developing infrastructure, improving living conditions and creating employment opportunities. The relocation of its headquarters from Vienna to Gaza in July 1996 helped strengthen the Agency's relationship with the Palestinian Authority. Yet the stagnation in donor contributions combined with the steady growth in the beneficiary population have led to a quantitative and qualitative decline in services.

100. Well after many conflict situations have passed, anti-personnel landmines remain a continuing humanitarian scourge. The Ottawa process, referred to in the previous section, aims to ban the manufacture, production and use of such mines, but the painstaking humanitarian work of reducing the dangers of existing mines must continue. Mine-awareness training and mine clearance, comprising technical surveys and verification, as well as minefield marking and eradication, require far greater resources. Training and skills transference are essential, in technical and management capacities alike.

101. The success of United Nations responses to complex emergencies and natural disasters depends critically on the availability of human, material and financial resources. Between September 1996 and August 1997, the Department of Humanitarian Affairs orchestrated 13 consolidated appeals on behalf of the United Nations system, intended to serve the needs of approximately 17 million people in Afghanistan, Albania, Angola, the Chechnya region, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, the Great Lakes region, Liberia, Sierra Leone, Somalia, the Sudan, Tajikistan and the former Yugoslavia. The combined funding requirements for two appeals—for the former Yugoslavia and the Great Lakes region—amounted to nearly half of the $1.8 billion requested. A total of $727 million has been pledged or carried over.

102. During the past year the United Nations system continued to improve its capacity to deliver humanitarian assistance. The Inter-Agency Standing Committee has played a key role in this process. Progress was made in strengthening capabilities in early warning, contingency planning and information systems. For example, the main humanitarian agencies developed joint contingency planning methodologies, and undertook joint planning exercises in the Great Lakes region, West Africa and Central Asia.

103. To ensure predictability in collaboration, the main agencies have developed memoranda of understanding that delineate roles, maintain accountability and establish standby arrangements. Similarly, liaison between them and non-governmental organizations has become a more routine feature, both in the field and by means of monthly "interaction" meetings in New York and corresponding meetings at Geneva. In the case of the rapid deterioration of the situation in the Great Lakes region, a Regional Humanitarian Coordinator was appointed to take immediate responsibility for the strategic coordination of United Nations efforts in the entire area, including Burundi, the eastern part of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Rwanda and the refugees in the United Republic of Tanzania.

104. With regard to resource mobilization, as part of a review by the Economic and Social Council, an extensive assessment of the consolidated appeals process was undertaken in 1996. That process seeks not only to coordinate but also to prioritize funding needs, and the review led to its being expanded so as to include longer-term rehabilitation objectives—for instance, reintegrating demobilized soldiers and refugees, strengthening the administrative capacity of the States involved, and fostering transition to development. Likewise, where appropriate the consolidated appeals process will include funding requirements for human rights field operations.

105. The growing interest and involvement of the Security Council in humanitarian questions is another welcome and timely development. It holds promise for a more fully integrated approach to conflict resolution in which all dimensions—political, humanitarian, development and human rights—are addressed in a mutually reinforcing manner.

106. Nevertheless, recent experience has shown that still more effective institutional arrangements are necessary. In particular, I considered the operational role of the Department of Humanitarian Affairs to be problematic. The Department took on operational tasks in a limited and ad hoc manner without being adequately equipped for them, and that detracted from the Emergency Relief Coordinator's core functions of policy development, advocacy and coordinating humanitarian emergency responses. Accordingly, in my July reform proposals I announced that the Department would be replaced by a smaller Office of the Emergency Relief Coordinator, concerned exclusively with those core functions, and the Department's operational responsibilities transferred elsewhere. The reorganization is now under way.

107. As noted at the outset of this section, a distressing characteristic of certain recent conflict situations is that the pursuit of strategic advantage by combatants has begun to include, and thus manipulate, the humanitarian presence. Worse still, civilian populations have become direct targets, and humanitarian workers subjected to harassment, hostage-taking, rape, and even murder. The help of Member States is required to cope with this mounting assault on innocent lives and international norms. As a first step, the Security Council recently issued a firm condemnation of attacks against refugees and other civilians, and called upon parties to conflicts to comply strictly with the rules of humanitarian law. What is needed is a comprehensive assessment of the moral, strategic and physical security dimensions of those threats to the very core of the United Nations humanitarian mission.

F Peacekeeping and post-conflict peace-building

108. Maintaining and restoring international peace and security is a fundamental purpose of the United Nations. Although the vision embodied in the Charter of a collective security system has not yet been realized in practice, the Organization has evolved significant innovations over the years, such as the instrument of peacekeeping. Early post-cold-war euphoria exaggerated the range of possibilities for expanding the scope of United Nations peace operations, but the more recent sense of limits may err in the opposite direction.

109. An already difficult task has been rendered more difficult, it is true, by the fact that so many post-cold-war conflicts have taken the form of internal factional violence and civil strife that have significant external repercussions. Important lessons have been learned from recent experience, however, as a result of which peacekeeping and its institutional support structures continue to be refined and adapted, while post-conflict peace-building has assumed an increasingly prominent role in the United Nations repertoire of means to achieve more lasting peace.

110. The international community has developed a clearer understanding both of the limits of peacekeeping and also of its continuing usefulness. As a result of past setbacks, Member States are more aware of the risks associated with dispatching operations with resources which do not match their mandates. We have also learned that inaction in the face of massive violence and threats to international peace and security is not an acceptable—or viable—option. Though peace is far less costly than war, there should be no illusion that it can be achieved on the cheap.

111. Currently, approximately 22,500 soldiers and civilian police serve in 16 missions in countries around the world. Those missions are managed by the Department of Peacekeeping Operations, of which Mr. Bernard Miyet became the Under-Secretary-General in February 1997. All help stabilize potentially volatile situations, and many involve extensive cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations. Only brief mention is made here or elsewhere in this report of major developments since the last reporting period.

112. In the Balkans, the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina and its International Police Task Force work closely with the NATO Stabilization Force to convert into reality the undertakings made at Dayton, Ohio. The United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium achieved significant aims with the demilitarization of the local Serb forces, and in facilitating the elections held in April 1997. The United Nations Preventive Deployment Force is achieving its mandate in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia; and the United Nations Mission of Observers in Prevlaka continues to monitor the situation in that area.

113. In Georgia, the United Nations Observer Mission cooperated with Commonwealth of Independent States peacekeeping forces to enable the parties to seek a political solution. The United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan supported the negotiation process that resulted in the general peace agreement signed in Moscow in June 1997. In Haiti, the United Nations is assisting in the rebuilding of that country's police force, and works with the Organization of American States in the field of human rights. The United Nations Military Observer Group in India and Pakistan continues to perform its functions. I am encouraged by recent moves towards a dialogue between the parties.

114. The United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia is nearing the completion of its mandate, which it has pursued in conjunction with the Economic Community of West African States, to monitor a ceasefire and verify disarmament and demobilization. Those steps paved the way for the elections and installation of a new Government in the summer of 1997. Elsewhere in Africa, it has been possible to replace the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III with a smaller follow-on operation but, because the peace process in Angola appears to have reached an impasse, renewed efforts are necessary to consolidate national reconciliation and monitor human rights.

115. The Middle East remains one of the most critical points of tension in the world today. It is my hope that the Israeli-Palestinian peace process will be revived and its forward momentum fully restored. The United Nations contributions to stability in the region include the humanitarian activities of UNRWA, discussed in the previous section; the development-related work of the Special Coordinator, dealt with below; and three peacekeeping missions: the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization, the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force (UNDOF) and the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon. With the cooperation of Israel and the Syrian Arab Republic, the efforts of UNDOF have been successful on the Golan Heights. In southern Lebanon, on the other hand, hostilities have continued between Israeli forces, with auxiliaries, and Lebanese groups. Elsewhere in the Middle East, the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission helps to ensure stability in the area of its deployment.

116. During the last year the Organization also planned and prepared for, but did not deploy, a mission to Sierra Leone; carried out significant contingency planning for possible missions in Burundi, the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the Republic of the Congo; and began, and successfully concluded, an observer mission in Guatemala.

117. In the context of the current effort by the international community to strengthen the United Nations, it is crucial to maintain and improve the Organization's ability to plan, manage and conduct peacekeeping missions. The Secretariat is reviewing cumbersome or inappropriate rules and procedures that govern support for field operations, such as rules for recruitment, procurement and settlement of third-party liability claims. We are also exploring ways to ensure a unified effort in the entire United Nations system in all peacekeeping and peace-building activities, both in the field and at Headquarters.

The creation within the Secretariat of an Executive Committee on Peace and Security is an important step towards that goal.

118. Other measures fall within the jurisdiction of Member States. Many of the structures and functions that are essential for peacekeeping activities lack stable funding, and many essential tasks are discharged by personnel made available temporarily to the United Nations by Member States. Indeed, half of all Professionals in the Department of Peacekeeping Operations fall into this category. The Organization needs a stable base of budget resources in the area of peacekeeping that reflects its real personnel requirements. Similarly, action on the proposal to create a rapidly deployable mission headquarters, around which the components of peacekeeping operations could be assembled, depends on the willingness of Member States to allocate the necessary financial resources.

119. Additional elements of a rapid deployment capacity are being explored. A number of States are developing military units that could deploy without undue delay upon a decision of the Security Council. A group of States consisting of Austria, Canada, Denmark, the Netherlands, Norway, Poland and Sweden signed a letter of intent in December 1996 to form a standby high readiness brigade within the framework of United Nations standby agreements. Some of those States have since moved further towards that objective. While we very much welcome these developments, the availability of troops will continue to depend on the willingness of their respective Governments to commit them in any given instance.

120. One key priority for the coming year is to draw on the experience gained in co-deployment in such cases as Georgia, Liberia and the former Yugoslavia to develop doctrine and guidelines so that the United Nations will be better prepared for such partnerships with regional organizations in the future. Ensuring that humanitarian strategies as well as longer-term development aims are fully integrated into the overall peacekeeping effort is another main priority in the year ahead. These are the challenges we must overcome as we seek to adapt the essential implementation of United Nations peacekeeping to the crises we face today and will face tomorrow, and as we work to create a system of collective security for the twenty-first century.

121. The United Nations system as a whole is focusing as never before on peace-building—action to identify and support structures that will strengthen and solidify peace. Experience has shown that keeping peace in the sense of avoiding a relapse into armed conflict is a necessary but not sufficient condition for establishing the foundations of an enduring and just peace. Areas of additional activity may include military security, civil law and order, human rights, refugees and displaced persons, elections, local administration, involvement in public utilities, health, education, finance, customs and excise, reconstruction, and general attempts to return society to some sense of normality. No other institution in the world has the experience, competence, capacity for logistic support, coordinating ability and universality that the United Nations brings to these tasks.

122. A good example of peace-building at work is the case of Guatemala, where the United Nations contributed to bringing about the conclusion of the last remaining conflict in Central America with the signing, on 29 December 1996, of the final peace agreement. The United Nations, which had been verifying human rights in Guatemala since 1994, was entrusted by the General Assembly with the verification of the final agreements also. The ceasefire and demobilization of combatants was achieved within its 60-day deadline. In addition to promoting human rights, the accords seek to strengthen democratic institutions and the administration of justice, to improve the electoral system, to address social and economic inequities with a view to permitting wider participation of citizens at all levels, and to define the army's new role in society. The implementation of the accords calls for United Nations verification until the year 2000. This is a major challenge that will require full cooperation from the people of Guatemala, as well as the sustained support of the United Nations system and the international community.

123. Short of such comprehensive objectives, the United Nations has been involved, in Angola, Mali and Nicaragua, with demobilization and rehabilitation of former combatants. This task includes quartering ex-combatants, disarming, demobilizing and transporting them home, and facilitating their socio-economic reintegration. Elsewhere, including Rwanda, the United Nations has sought to provide technical assistance and training to strengthen the judiciary and support the communal police.

124. There is a growing appreciation of the fact that efforts in support of development cannot cease during emergencies, but must continue to be vigorously supported. The appropriate United Nations entities have therefore devised development-oriented interventions to prevent relapses into crisis. Numerous projects were fielded during 1996-1997, involving UNDP, UNHCR, UNICEF, WFP and UNIFEM. I have taken steps to ensure that the United Nations system as a whole is able to meet the challenges of post-conflict peace-building in a unified and coherent manner, and to that end have designated the Department of Political Affairs as the United Nations focal point for post-conflict peace-building. Sir Kieran Prendergast joined us in March 1997 to head the Department.

125. The United Nations Special Commission (UNSCOM) has a unique and strictly military peace-building mandate in verifying Iraq's full, final and complete disclosures on its prohibited weapons programmes. In the past year, the Security Council twice felt it necessary to condemn Iraq—once because the Commission's attempt to verify the destruction of missile engines was frustrated, and once because its movements were impeded and it was denied access to relevant sites. UNSCOM has identified significant continuing problems that will need to be addressed in the months ahead.

126. Also unique, but very different, is the Office of the Special Coordinator. It provides overall guidance to United Nations programmes and agencies in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and works closely with the World Bank, in assisting the Palestinian Authority to achieve an integrated approach to development and a self-sustaining economy and to establish effective administrative institutions.

127. The cause of constructing a just peace also requires effective mechanisms of accountability for past wrongs. In many instances, national means are in place and suffice, though they may require international assistance, but some violations of fundamental human rights are so massive and some acts of violence so egregious that humanity as a whole is offended, and humanity as a whole must act. Significant steps have been taken along this road in recent years.

128. The International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia marked a major milestone in 1997 by delivering its first judgement and sentence. Moreover, its relationships with international forces and national authorities reached a turning point with the arrest and transfer to The Hague of three indicted persons. The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda recovered lost ground that resulted from management and administrative deficiencies, and currently has three trials under way and 21 accused persons awaiting trial.

129. Lastly, the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court has almost completed its work on a consolidated text of a draft statute. I am firmly of the belief that the establishment of such a court would contribute profoundly to post-conflict peace-building, serve as a deterrent against future genocidal violence and mark a major step in the evolution of the rule of law at the international level. I endorse and support the creation of the court by an international conference that is scheduled to convene in 1998. Its birth at the end of a century that has been one of the bloodiest in history would bequeath a more robust realm of reason to the new.

G. The new transnational threats

130. The same means of communication and personal mobility that make it possible for civil society actors to function globally also enable "uncivil society" actors to do so. In this world of increasingly porous borders new threats have emerged to national security, economic development, democracy and sovereignty in the form of transnational networks of crime, drug trafficking, money-laundering and terrorism. By consolidating the several relevant functions into one single Office for Drug Control and Crime Prevention, based in Vienna, and by appointing Mr. Pino Arlacchi, an expert on organized crime, to lead it, I have sought to reposition the United Nations to help contain this growing threat.

* * *

131. The United Nations and the specialized agencies have long played a central role in the struggle to suppress international terrorism. Twelve multilateral treaties, as well as the declarations concerning measures to eliminate international terrorism, have been adopted for dealing with specific acts of terrorism. The General Assembly reviewed the legal instruments to identify gaps in the existing regime, and in 1996 established an Ad Hoc Committee to elaborate new international conventions for the suppression of terrorist bombings and the suppression of acts of nuclear terrorism. The Committee also plans to develop a comprehensive legal framework for dealing with international terrorism.

132. Organized criminal groups are spreading their operations around the globe. Developing countries and emerging democracies are prime targets owing to the vulnerabilities of their weak institutions. To help redress this problem, Member States adopted the Naples Political Declaration and Global Action Plan against Organized Transnational Crime in 1994, asking Governments to harmonize legislation and ensure that their justice systems were provided with the means to prevent and control organized transnational crime.

133. Under the auspices of the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice, a variety of practical actions and legal protocols followed from the Naples document in support of its objectives, including the establishment of databases, together with agreements on monitoring and information exchange. At its sixth session, in the spring of 1997, the Commission reviewed a draft convention to combat organized transnational crime, and took action on several specific manifestations of it, such as bribery and corruption, the smuggling of illegal migrants and the illicit traffic in children.

134. During the past year, the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Division of the Secretariat provided assistance to the Economic Community of West African States in developing and implementing a regional convention on mutual assistance in criminal matters, and initiated a regional framework for cooperation in the area of extradition. The Division also helped the Government of South Africa to devise a witness protection programme; the Government of Kyrgyzstan to establish a specialized department within the Ministry of the Interior to fight organized crime; and the Government of Romania to strengthen the capacity of the criminal justice system to prevent and fight corruption and organized crime. Needs assessment exercises were undertaken in Angola, Argentina, Armenia, Bolivia, Georgia, Guinea, Pakistan, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and Togo.

135. To counter drug trafficking and abuse, the United Nations International Drug Control Programme (UNDCP) promotes adherence to and implementation of international drug control treaties, particularly the 1988 United Nations Convention against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances, which is the main framework for international cooperation. In 1996, the Programme assisted 15 Governments in drafting and implementing national drug control laws and regulations, including training for law enforcement personnel, national administrators, judges, magistrates and prosecutors.

136. In cooperation with the International Narcotics Control Board, the Programme also assisted Governments in efforts to prevent the diversion of drugs and their precursors into the illicit market. Regional assistance programmes to that end were undertaken in central, south and south-west Asia. The Programme also published a comprehensive global study and examined countermeasures intended to address the new threat posed by the illicit manufacturing, trafficking and abuse of a variety of stimulants, particularly amphetamines.

137. To assist Governments in combating illicit drug trafficking, UNDCP regional law enforcement advisers in eastern and southern Africa, Latin America and south-east Asia provided advisory services and technical assistance. In all, 16 law enforcement programmes were begun in the past year, with support emphasizing training for police and customs officials so as to augment their capacity to interdict and seize narcotic drugs. UNDCP also sponsored cross-border co-operation among drug law enforcement agencies, including in the border zones between the Islamic Republic of Iran and Pakistan and between India and Pakistan. Frameworks for cooperation and mutual assistance are also provided by regional plans of action, such as those in Africa and the Caribbean.

138. Cooperation with other organizations has a multiplier effect in the fight against drugs. UNDCP signed a memorandum of understanding with the World Customs Organization, establishing the basic principles of co-operation between the two organizations. They worked together in the implementation of a network of regional intelligence liaison offices, and 15 eastern and southern African States received support enabling them to detect new drug trafficking trends. Closer co-operation has also been established between UNDCP and the International Criminal Police Organization (Interpol).

139. During the 1990s traffickers increasingly used commercial vessels as a major means of transporting illicit drugs in bulk quantity from source countries to markets. Consequently, UNDCP has initiated programmes to strengthen the capacities of Governments to counter illicit trafficking by sea and through seaports.

140. Efforts to reduce the demand for illicit drugs are an indispensable component of strategies to combat drug trafficking. However, many Governments lack the resources, knowledge and skills to develop and implement sustainable programmes of drug abuse prevention, treatment and rehabilitation. The support provided by UNDCP focuses on mobilizing civil society, particularly non-governmental organizations and the business community, the latter through workplace drug prevention programmes.

141. UNDCP also supports alternative development programmes aimed at breaking the hold that drug traffickers establish on regions affected by the illicit cultivation of narcotic plants, particularly the coca bush and the opium poppy. In 1996, the Programme initiated a four-year, $15.9 million, technical cooperation programme in Afghanistan and a five-year alternative development programme in the Wa region of Myanmar.

142. To deprive drug traffickers of the economic power and influence derived from the proceeds of their illicit activities, UNDCP assists Governments in efforts to counter money-laundering and confiscate assets gained from drug trafficking. The Programme is financing and supporting a $4.3 million global programme aimed at improving the capacity of the relevant legal and related law enforcement systems, which includes the creation of financial intelligence units to reduce the vulnerability of financial systems. Implementation of the programme will be undertaken in close cooperation with other organizations and entities affected by the money-laundering phenomenon. The fight remains a daunting challenge, however, as free trade and high-speed telecommunications, together with substantial resources, provide opportunities for criminals to diversify their operations, reduce risks and maximize profitability.

H. Legal affairs, management and communications

143. Without legal norms and instruments that are universally relevant and respected, without a clear sense of mission and high standards of performance, and without effective communications about United Nations aims and activities, the Organization's efforts would stand little chance of satisfying the needs and aspirations of countries and peoples alike. In each of these areas, the past year has seen significant gains: advancing the cause of international law in several important respects, elevating the quality of our management systems and sharpening our message about the Organization's activities. These steps are putting in place the enabling and supportive infrastructure that will help United Nations operational activities achieve their desired results.

144. The Office of Legal Affairs contributes substantively in its own right to the aims of the United Nations, and it also serves, in a supportive capacity, all other parts of the Organization.

145. Substantively, through its Codification Division the Office is deeply involved in the effort to establish an international criminal court and in the elaboration of new legal instruments to combat terrorism, referred to in the preceding sections. The International Trade Law Branch of the Office continued to assist the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law in removing obstacles to international trade through the progressive harmonization and unification of international trade laws. At its 1997 session, for example, the Commission adopted a model law on cross-border insolvency to promote legislation in cases where the insolvent debtor has assets in more than one State. Efforts are also under way in such novel areas as digital signatures. On the basis of a draft produced by the International Law Commission, the General Assembly adopted the Convention on the Law of the Non-navigational Uses of International Watercourses in May 1997.

146. The entry into force of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea and the Agreement relating to the implementation of Part XI of the Convention has led the United Nations to redesign its programme of information, advice and assistance in this field. The Office of Legal Affairs assists the various institutions created by the Convention, including the Commission on the Limits of the Continental Shelf, which was established and held its first meeting in June 1997; the International Seabed Authority, which completed its initial organizational work and has begun to function; and the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea, which is expected to do likewise in 1998.

147. In its supportive capacity, the work of the Office of Legal Affairs encompassed research and opinions on private and public international law; advice and services related to peacekeeping operations; and guidance to numerous subsidiary organs. The Office also helped to coordinate the legal services of the specialized agencies and other United Nations entities.

148. The Office participated in one of the main aspects of the reform process, the drafting and elaboration of a new Code of Conduct for United Nations staff, which is to be submitted to the General Assembly for its consideration. The Code sets out the core values inherent in the concept of the international civil servant, as well as the basic rights and obligations pertaining thereto. The new provisions are also intended to ensure that officials are accountable for their performance.

149. One of the Office's primary obligations under the Charter is to register and publish international treaties concluded by Member States. The Office continued its drive to eliminate the backlog in the Treaty Section, a task it expects to complete in the next few years. At the same time, important steps have been taken to make the United Nations treaty collection available via electronic media, so that a wider audience—not only diplomats and international lawyers but also non-governmental organizations, private sector enterprises, members of the academic community and others around the world—can gain access to this valuable resource.

150. The Department of Administration and Management has accelerated the implementation of the Organization's management plan, which seeks improvements in five key, interrelated areas: human resources, the overall work programme, information, technology and cost structure. The Organization's financial situation was also a major preoccupation, and the various reform and restructuring initiatives announced throughout the year brought added impetus to these efforts.

151. To improve the management of human resources, the Department continued to build up in-house capacity for organizational development, staff development and planning. Action-oriented seminars were held. Staff development initiatives focused on upgrading skills, enhancing accountability and delegating authority. The Secretariat's efforts have been impaired, however, by the exceedingly complex rules and regulations governing human resources and financial operations. Increasingly intrusive scrutiny by intergovernmental bodies, coupled with additional layers of oversight mechanisms, exacerbated this situation still further.

152. The management of the United Nations work programme benefited from good progress in revising the format of the medium-term plan, which is the Organization's principal policy directive and provides the framework for the preparation of its biennial budgets. Still, as in the past, Member States encountered great difficulties in agreeing on strategic imperatives.

153. Effective management is heavily dependent on the availability of information. The Integrated Management Information System (IMIS) has now been deployed to five duty stations. As the "home" for all of the Organization's administrative processes—personnel, finance, procurement—IMIS is fast becoming the administrative backbone of our worldwide operations. Several other entities and specialized agencies have adopted, or are considering adopting, IMIS, suggesting that the time is not far off when managers throughout the United Nations system will adhere to a common, unifying and efficient standard.

ture. Such applications, in addition to IMIS, include the Internet and Intranet and emerging technologies such as video-conferencing and remote translation. A strategic plan for technology has been devised and put in place, and great strides have been made in updating existing infrastructure. Future funding levels must, however, ensure that the Organization is capable not only of avoiding technical malfunctions and obsolescence but also of investing in its technological development.

155. With respect to the cost structure, the Organization has managed to stay within increasingly tight budgets while delivering the outputs mandated by Member States. Even after cuts of $250 million—nearly 10 per cent of the previous budgetary base—it was possible to propose a negative growth budget for the biennium 1998-1999. The efficiency programme has been instrumental in identifying cost savings and in mitigating the impact of mandated reductions. The first round focused on projects proposed by staff and managers. Phase two, which is well under way, is addressing more fundamental issues: simplifying processes, delegating authority, and giving more responsibilities and flexibility to programme managers.

156. The Department of Management, as its new name indicates, is now poised to shift to a more proactive management culture, moving away from purely administrative control systems, and from piecemeal management improvements, to fundamental reform of the management practices of the Organization. Under this new approach, substantive units will have greater administrative flexibility, leaving the central management to concentrate on policy development, support services and compliance monitoring. Perhaps most significantly, less of the Organization's resources will be used for non-programme purposes, freeing resources for substantive efforts. At a time of constraints on resources for development, this is good news for our clients—the countries and peoples of the world that need United Nations economic and social programmes.

157. I wish to draw to the attention of Member States a different and very serious matter regarding United Nations personnel: the growing threats to their security. Events over the past year have exposed United Nations staff members to an exponential increase in risks and deliberate violence. Since September 1996, 21 civilian staff members have lost their lives in the performance of their duties.

158. Hostage-taking constitutes a new threat to United Nations personnel. Since 1 September 1996, 47 staff members have been held hostage for varying periods of time. Of equal concern is the fact that staff members continue to be detained or are missing. These statistics do not include staff members who were attacked, harassed, injured, beaten or raped. Nor do the numbers measure the loss, trauma and emotional stress suffered by the families. Adequate funds must be found for the necessary measures to ensure the security and safety of United Nations personnel.

159. The power of information, clearly recognized by the founders of the United Nations, has been elevated to a higher plane in recent years with rapid advances in information and communications technology. High-tech or not, information is a dynamic force for education and cross-cultural understanding and for promoting freedom, democratization and broader participation by people in the decisions affecting their lives. Its great potential must be harnessed by, and for, the United Nations.

160. Early on, I identified the reorientation of the United Nations public information activities as one of the more urgent requirements of the reform process. A task force of prominent communications experts was convened to examine all aspects of the mandates, arrangements and operations of the Department of Public Information. In its report, "Global vision, local voice", the task force made far-reaching proposals and recommendations to fundamentally revamp the Organization's communications strategy and practices. I have acted on those recommendations, and implementation measures are under way.

161. In the meantime, the Department continued to adapt itself to the new communications environment. Considerable emphasis has been placed on the Internet. The United Nations Web site now registers 700,000 to 800,000 "hits" per week, and the range of available material is being expanded. In October 1996, the Department launched the CyberSchoolBus, an interactive on-line educational programme that is averaging more than 250,000 hits per week and exemplifies our efforts to focus on youth and to collaborate with teachers, educational institutions and teachers' associations. The Dag Hammarskjöld Library home page has been expanded also, another step in our efforts to turn it into a "library without walls"—and similar steps have been taken at Geneva.

162. The Department's embrace of the Internet has resulted in a variety of quantifiable dividends. Posting the catalogue of United Nations publications has led to an increase in sales. Print runs have been reduced, saving paper and cutting down on physical distribution requirements. Press releases issued by the Department, the only immediately written accounts of the proceedings of intergovernmental meetings held at Headquarters and at the United Nations Offices at Geneva and Vienna, are posted instantly on the Internet, reaching a vast new audience and allowing for a 25 per cent decrease in print runs. Permanent Missions to the United Nations in New York and Geneva, all of which are now on-line, have also realized savings in terms of telecommunications costs since many no longer have to send important documents by mail or fax to their Foreign Offices.

163. At the same time, the Department recognizes that information technology is not yet universally available, and has therefore continued to use traditional media—press, radio and television. United Nations radio, for example, is moving towards an international broadcasting capacity, as provided for in the medium-term plan. The Department has also strengthened its partnerships with key television executives through the United Nations World Television Forum.

164. United Nations peacekeeping, peace-making, and humanitarian actions present special communications challenges. Several "concentric" audiences must be reached if United Nations efforts are to be sustained: the population in areas immediately affected; the international media; and a broad, global audience whose support is essential. The past year has seen intensified consultation with the Departments of Humanitarian Affairs, Political Affairs and Peacekeeping Operations, and standard guidelines and a manual for information components in the field are being finalized. Since timely information is particularly important with respect to field operations, the Department of Public Information has shifted its emphasis from print to electronic dissemination.

165. Substantive priorities during the past year included the General Assembly's mid-term review of the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s, the special session of the General Assembly to review the implementation of Agenda 21—"Rio +5"—and planning for the upcoming fiftieth anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the special session of the General Assembly on drugs.

166. The network of United Nations information centres and services plays a pivotal role in all of these activities, galvanizing local non-governmental organizations and other United Nations partners in support of United Nations themes and issues. The integration of United Nations information centres with field offices will continue, as approved by the General Assembly, on a case-by-case basis and in consultation with the host country. In industrialized countries, the information centres will continue to strengthen their collaboration with other members of the United Nations system and with national groups, with a thrust towards mobilizing national resources in support of the United Nations.

The steps ahead

167. This is my first opportunity to report to Member States on the work of the Organization. Although I have served the United Nations for more than 30 years, never before has it been my responsibility to form a considered judgement about its overall functioning and efficacy. Having done so now I find that, all in all, I am prudently optimistic.

168. As documented in the preceding pages, the United Nations has taken considerable strides in recent years to adapt to the far-reaching changes in its external environment. No sector of its activities has remained unaffected. Indeed, within the framework of principles and missions enunciated by the Charter, entirely new programme areas and work modalities have been initiated and others redefined as the needs of the international community have evolved. Moreover, despite the numerous constraints under which they operate, and notwithstanding occasional exceptions, the inventiveness of the Organization's senior managers is commendable and the dedication of its staff a source of pride.

169. Much yet needs to be done, however. In chapter II of this report, I indicated some of the desirable and necessary steps ahead in the various substantive programme areas and support structures. Here I wish to draw attention to critical overarching issues that affect the future performance of the Organization.

170. The fiscal precariousness of the United Nations is unprecedented and debilitating. For too many years we have been forced to "borrow" from the peacekeeping account to cover regular budget shortfalls caused by non-payment of dues by some Members. That is to say, we have not reimbursed Member States for the cost of troops they provided and materiel they supplied in good faith and pursuant to Security Council resolutions. Now that source, too, is nearing depletion.

I hope and trust that we shall soon be able to put this problem behind us, and that in the future all Member States will fulfil their legal obligations to the Organization—and one another—by paying their dues in full and on time.

171. Apart from the fiscal problems caused by arrears, as I noted in the opening section of this report, long-term shifts at the national and international levels alike imply that fundamental change is in store for the workings of intergovernmental organizations. The resources available to such organizations, including the United Nations, are declining relative to the magnitude of the tasks they face and to the capacities of other actors, especially the private sector. What is more, the very concept of intergovernmentalism as we know it is being altered as a result of the redefinition of the role of government and the means of governance now under way throughout the world.

172. In this transformed context, the Organization's past pattern of incremental adaptations will not suffice. To succeed in the new century, the United Nations must unleash its own major resource: the complementarities and synergies that exist within it. In other words, the United Nations must undergo fundamental, not piecemeal, reform. Three related steps are imperative. Each requires the support of Member States.

173. The first is to create the appropriate Secretariat structures that will permit the Organization to act as one within and across its diverse areas of activities. Acting as one does not mean moving in lock step. Nor does it imply denying the specific attributes of any component part. It does require that the Organization be capable of deploying its constituent units strategically while avoiding overlap and duplication, let alone competition, among them. Many of my proposals for reform are designed to achieve this aim: the position of Deputy Secretary-General, the Senior Management Group, the Strategic Planning Unit, four sectoral Executive Committees, and the United Nations Development Group, to cite the most important of them.

174. The second essential step is to reconfigure the balance of functions between the Organization's legislative bodies and the Secretary-General. Largely for reasons relating to the cold-war practice of bloc politics, a large number of the rigidities with which the Organization is afflicted are, in fact, mandated. Member States demand and deserve accountability, but the Secretariat also needs flexibility to get its job done in the most cost-effective manner. The current situation serves neither party well. Several of my reform proposals seek to redress this problem, including recommendations on streamlining the agenda and the deliberations of the General Assembly, instituting sunset provisions for new mandates, and, most importantly, moving towards a results-based system of budgeting.

175. Finally, even where the best of systems are in place, people matter. The United Nations staff is a precious resource, which in some measure has been squandered by rules and regulations that impede rather than serve the effective performance of its work. The Organization needs a functioning career development programme, meaningful criteria and evaluations of performance coupled with real incentive and disincentive systems, as well as a corporate culture that animates and unifies those who serve it. I look forward to joining Member States in devising personnel policies that will help bring these conditions about.

176. As we approach the new century, the international community has some way to go to realize the hopes and commitments of the Charter of the United Nations but, when we measure our progress against the state of the world a century ago, we can only be impressed by how far we have come. Indeed, one of the most significant differences between that fin de siècle and this is precisely the fact that international organizations now exist to remind, and enable, the world to do better. That is why it is our solemn and historic obligation to make the United Nations the most effective instrument possible for the achievement of peace and progress—for our children, and for theirs.

Political and security questions

Chapter I

International peace and security

The United Nations continued in 1997 to pursue the Charter objective of maintaining international peace and security, principally through its peacekeeping operations. The year was marked by a noticeable decrease in the establishment of totally new missions, in the number of personnel involved and in their average size, either through streamlining or as a response to changes in the political environment. Accompanying the Organization's peacekeeping activities were efforts for the prevention and early resolution of conflicts, as a means of reducing the need for new and costly peacekeeping operations, and for post-conflict peace-building to prevent the recurrence of conflicts. In September, the General Assembly adopted texts on the questions of coordination and sanctions imposed by the United Nations as proposed by the Informal Open-ended Working Group on An Agenda for Peace.

The Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations in 1997 made recommendations on: enhancing UN peacekeeping capacity; the organization, planning and coordination of peacekeeping operations; safety and security; training; rapid deployment and standby arrangements; and cooperation with regional arrangements. The Assembly endorsed those recommendations in June, September, October and December.

Over the course of the year, 20 UN peacekeeping operations were deployed, with some 22,500 soldiers and civilian police serving under UN command around the world by mid-year. By year's end, that number was reduced to 15, two of them new follow-on missions—one in Haiti and the other in Angola. Another five UN missions—one each in Angola, Guatemala and Liberia and two in Haiti—completed their mandates during the year. The Security Council also authorized the establishment by Member States of two missions—a multinational protection force for Albania and an inter-African monitoring mission for the Central African Republic.

In addition to its peacekeeping operations, the United Nations employed a variety of other means to address conflict situations, including the deployment of special representatives, special envoys and other emissaries in Afghanistan, the Central African Republic and Somalia. It also provided assistance for mine clearing, the conduct of elections, and monitoring and protecting human rights.

The cost of UN peacekeeping operations during the year was estimated at $875.6 million, compared with $1.4 billion in 1996, while unpaid assessed contributions from Member States to peacekeeping budgets amounted to $2.1 billion as at 30 June 1997.

The General Assembly in 1997 considered various aspects of peacekeeping financing, including reimbursement for contingent-owned equipment, the peacekeeping reserve fund, voluntary contributions, and the financing of the United Nations Logistics Base in Brindisi, Italy. It adopted a system of self-insurance and established standardized rates for the payment of death and disability benefits. The Assembly also endorsed a proposal to establish a field assets control system.

In July, the Security Council encouraged States to make available to the United Nations at short notice trained civilian police, through UN standby arrangements.

Agenda for Peace

In his September 1997 report on the work of the Organization [A/52/1], the Secretary-General stated that although the vision embodied in the Charter of a collective security system had not been realized in practice, the United Nations had produced significant innovations over the years, such as the instrument of peacekeeping. An already difficult task had been rendered more difficult by the many post-cold-war conflicts that had taken the form of factional violence and civil strife, he said. However, important lessons had been learned from recent experiences, as a result of which peacekeeping and its institutional support structures continued to be refined and adapted. At the same time, post-conflict peace-building had assumed an increasingly prominent role in the UN repertoire of means to achieve more lasting peace.

In a statement [S/1997/743] issued on 25 September following their meeting with the Secretary-General, the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of China, France, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States, the five permanent members of the Security Council, reaffirmed that the United Nations had to improve further its ability to act quickly and effectively to address threats to international peace and security. They indicated their determination to continue to develop the capacities of the Organization to prevent and resolve conflicts, including through peacekeeping operations. The Ministers also recognized the need for effective and properly coordinated measures of post-conflict peace-building to complement efforts in the areas of peacemaking and peacekeeping.

Special Committee. In its June report [A/52/209] to the General Assembly, the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations stated that although peacekeeping was used to prevent conflict situations from escalating while ways to resolve the conflict peacefully were being pursued, it was not a preferred method of containing conflicts. The Special Committee emphasized the importance of prevention and early conflict resolution to reduce the need for new and costly peacekeeping operations, and urged the United Nations and parties concerned to do more in that regard. It noted that the use of preventive deployment, in one particular case, was contributing to the maintenance of peace and security.

The Special Committee took note of the ongoing work of the Informal Open-ended Working Group on An Agenda for Peace on the issues of preventive diplomacy, peacemaking, sanctions, coordination and post-conflict peace-building. The Committee emphasized the need to continue to consider the principles for establishing and conducting peacekeeping operations, as well as peacekeeping definitions, in a systematic fashion and in the light of the lessons learned from peacekeeping operations.

Working Group. On 15 September, Cape Verde introduced to the General Assembly a draft resolution [A/51/L.78] entitled "Supplement to an Agenda for Peace", which, it reported, represented the consensus reached in the Assembly's Informal Working Group on An Agenda for Peace. Cape Verde said that the text recommended for adoption by the Assembly final documents on coordination and on the question of sanctions imposed by the United Nations. The representative asked the Assembly to note that the annex to the draft resolution on UN sanctions included a number of guidelines that would significantly enhance the Organization's use of that delicate instrument in response to threats to international peace and security. Also, once fully implemented, the proposals on coordination would enhance the collective efficiency of the UN system and the Member States in their concerted efforts to achieve peace.

The Working Group also recommended further consultations on continuing the activities of the Informal Working Group in the areas of post-conflict peace-building and preventive diplomacy and peacemaking.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 15 September [meeting 107], the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/242 without vote [draft: A/51/L.78] [agenda item 10].

Supplement to an Agenda for Peace

The General Assembly,

Taking note of the reports of the Secretary-General entitled "An Agenda for Peace" and "Supplement to an Agenda for Peace",

Reaffirming its resolutions 47/120 A of 18 December 1992 and 47/120 B of 20 September 1993,

Reaffirming also other resolutions adopted by the General Assembly concerning various aspects of "An Agenda for Peace" and of the "Supplement to an Agenda for Peace",

Taking note of the statement on the "Supplement to an Agenda for Peace" made by the President of the Security Council on 22 February 1995, as well as the other statements by the President of the Security Council on "An Agenda for Peace",

Recalling the views expressed by Member States on "An Agenda for Peace" and the "Supplement to an Agenda for Peace" since the forty-eighth session of the General Assembly,

1. Adopts the texts on coordination and the question of sanctions imposed by the United Nations annexed to the present resolution;

2. Notes the progress made in the areas of post-conflict peace-building and preventive diplomacy and peacemaking;

3. Requests the President of the General Assembly to consult on the possibility of continuing the activities of the Informal Open-ended Working Group on An Agenda for Peace in the areas of post-conflict peace-building and preventive diplomacy and peacemaking on the basis of the work already accomplished in these areas and with a view to concluding its work.

ANNEX I Coordination

I. Coordination between the United Nations and Member States

1. The States that constitute the United Nations membership have a central role to play in the prevention and resolution of conflicts, including through their participation in and support for United Nations efforts to those ends, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations. The General Assembly underlines the need to strengthen the role of the Assembly in improving coordination, in accordance with its role and responsibilities under the Charter. Governments are responsible for the financing and provision of personnel, equipment and other support to mandated United Nations efforts to maintain international peace and security, whether through preventive diplomacy, peacemaking, peacekeeping or peace-building. Coordination tion of efforts and sharing of information between the United Nations and Member States is therefore of fundamental importance.

2. Transparency, communication and consultation between the United Nations and Member States is vital in the coordination of decisions and activities under the Charter aimed at maintaining and enhancing international peace and security. Governments should ensure that their policies in relation to the various parts and agencies of the United Nations system are consistent and in accordance with those aims, while the United Nations must ensure that its activities are in conformity with the purposes and principles of the Charter, and that States are kept fully informed, and are supportive, of the United Nations efforts.

3. Suitable arrangements for regular and timely consultations between members of the Security Council, assisted by the Secretariat, and States contributing troops to peacekeeping operations, as well as prospective troop contributors, are essential in enhancing transparency and coordination between the United Nations and Member States. Such consultations provide troop-contributing States with a channel for communication and for ensuring that their views are taken into consideration before decisions are made by the Council. The General Assembly welcomes the establishment of this consultation mechanism, which should remain under review with the aim of improving it further so as to strengthen the support for and the effectiveness of peacekeeping operations. In this connection, the Assembly stresses the importance of respecting the principles agreed upon in the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations and endorsed unanimously by the Assembly.

4. Among other possible forms of coordination between the United Nations and Member States is the support and assistance given to the Secretary-General by individual States or informal groups of Member States, created on an ad hoc basis, with respect to his efforts in the area of the maintenance of international peace and security. Operating within the framework of the Charter, groups such as the "Friends of the Secretary-General" can be resorted to whenever feasible, and can be considered as a valuable tool for the Secretary-General in his efforts, supporting the mandate entrusted to him by relevant United Nations bodies. There should be contact with the concerned State or States, and care should be taken to ensure the necessary information and transparency in relation to other Member States and to avoid duplication or overlapping of efforts.

II. Coordination within the United Nations system

5. In order to improve the capacity of the United Nations in the maintenance of international peace and security, particularly in conflict prevention and resolution, the General Assembly stresses the need to ensure an integrated approach to considering, planning and conducting activities in the sphere of peace in all their aspects, through all phases of a potential or actual conflict to post-conflict peace-building, at the various levels within the United Nations system. In coordinating such activities, the distinct mandates, functions and impartiality of the various United Nations entities involved should be respected. On the understanding that action to secure global peace, security and stability will be futile unless the economic and social needs of people are addressed, the Assembly also stresses the need to strengthen coordination with those departments, agencies and bodies responsible for development activities, in order to improve the effectiveness and efficiency of the United Nations system for development.

A. Coordination within the United Nations Secretariat

6. Within the Secretariat in New York, coordination is required between and among all the various departments involved in peacemaking, as well as in peace-building activities and peacekeeping operations which can be multifunctional, so that they function as an integrated whole under the authority of the Secretary-General. The General Assembly notes that the Secretary-General has entrusted the main responsibility in this regard to the Task Force on United Nations Operations and interdepartmental groups at the working level on each major conflict where the United Nations is playing a peacemaking or peacekeeping role. The Assembly welcomes these moves to strengthen coordination, and emphasizes the requirement for transparency. Efforts should be made, inter alia, to further harmonize the interaction between operational units within the Secretariat so as to avoid duplication in similar fields of action.

7. The General Assembly notes the work being done within the Framework for Coordination mechanism to ensure that the pertinent departments of the Secretariat coordinate their respective activities in the planning and implementing of such operations, through sharing of information, consultations and joint action. The Assembly furthermore notes that an important element of the Framework for Coordination is the provision for staff-level consultations by the relevant departments and other parts of the Organization to undertake joint analyses and to formulate joint recommendations. The Assembly welcomes the establishment of a standing interdepartmental framework oversight group to support and ensure the initiation of such consultations and encourages the implementation, further development and improvement of the Framework for Coordination mechanism.

B. Coordination within the United Nations system as a whole

8. The responsibilities involved in peacemaking, as well as in peace-building activities and peacekeeping operations which can be multifunctional, transcend the competence and expertise of any one department, programme, fund, office or agency of the United Nations. Short-term and long-term programmes need to be planned and implemented in a coordinated way in order to consolidate peace and development. Coordination is therefore required within the United Nations system as a whole and between United Nations Headquarters and the head offices of United Nations funds, programmes, offices and agencies. In this regard, the General Assembly would encourage improved coordination of efforts, for example the establishment of coordination procedures between the United Nations and other agencies involved, to facilitate and coordinate measures to contribute to the prevention of conflicts as well as the transition from peacekeeping to peace-building. The Assembly would encourage representatives of the United Nations Secretariat and other relevant United Nations agencies and programmes, as well as the Bretton Woods institutions, to meet and work together to develop arrangements that would ensure coordination and increased cooperation with respect to the provision of assistance to institution-building and social and economic development. The aim should be to develop a network for programme coordination, involving the United Nations system, bilateral donors and, whenever appropriate, non-governmental organizations, both at the headquarters and in the regional and field offices.

9. The General Assembly welcomes the efforts of the Secretary-General to make more effective the Administrative Committee on Coordination, which periodically brings together the heads of the specialized agencies, to achieve better coordination of the activities of the various United Nations bodies, including towards the consolidation of peace and security. The Assembly also supports the role of the Inter-Agency Standing Committee in ensuring a coordinated and timely response to the humanitarian needs arising in complex emergencies.

C. Coordination in the field

10. The General Assembly notes that the composition and administration of United Nations operations in the field vary considerably from one country situation to another, depending upon the political security and humanitarian dimensions of a particular crisis. In certain cases, including where the Security Council has authorized a peacekeeping operation, the Secretary-General may appoint a special representative. The special representative, working under the operational control of the Secretary-General, exercises on his behalf clearly defined authority over all the mission components. To strengthen cohesion and effective control of the military component of multifunctional peacekeeping operations, which is the central and fundamental part of such operations, the Assembly would stress the necessity of establishing and respecting clear lines of military command, as well as open channels of communication and sharing of information between the field and United Nations Headquarters, and coordinated guidance from United Nations Headquarters to the field. The Assembly underlines the need to adhere to United Nations mandates and to respect United Nations operational control and the unity of command in United Nations peacekeeping operations. In peacekeeping operations that include humanitarian elements, a field-based humanitarian coordinator who works under the overall authority of the special representative of the Secretary-General may be appointed. The Assembly considers it essential that all agencies and programmes active in the field extend their full cooperation to the special representative and encourages the efforts of the Secretary-General to ensure this. The Assembly notes the important role that the United Nations resident coordinator can play in coordinating United Nations activities in post-conflict peacebuilding. Furthermore, the Assembly would refer to the possibility of nominating a United Nations special coordinator while numerous agencies and programmes are working in the field during the period of transition to peace, even when there is no peacekeeping operation.

III. Cooperation with regional arrangements or agencies

11. The General Assembly stresses that, on the subject of cooperation between the United Nations and regional arrangements or agencies, the relevant tasks and responsibilities should be carried out with full respect for the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter, relevant decisions of the Security Council and of the General Assembly, as well as the respective mandates of regional arrangements or agencies and the Declaration on the Enhancement of Cooperation between the United Nations and Regional Arrangements or Agencies in the Maintenance of International Peace and Security, approved by the General Assembly in its resolution 49/57 of 9 December 1994.

12. The General Assembly considers that practical cooperation between the United Nations and regional arrangements and agencies, including the recognition of the variety of mandates, scope and composition of regional arrangements or agencies, has been and can be developed further through a number of means, including consultation by working-level contacts and high-level meetings, diplomatic and operational support, staff exchanges, and joint and cooperative operations. The Assembly notes the proposals that the Secretary-General has made in respect of Africa in his report on improving preparedness for conflict prevention and peacekeeping in Africa, and encourages him to pursue consultations with the Organization of African Unity on the matter.

13. While recalling its resolution 49/57, the General Assembly also notes the principles identified by the Secretary-General upon which cooperation between the United Nations and regional arrangements or agencies should be based, in particular the primacy of the United Nations as set out in the Charter, the defined and agreed division of labour and consistency by members of regional arrangements or agencies. The Assembly considers it important to develop further such principles, in cooperation with regional arrangements or agencies. The Assembly also agrees with the Secretary-General that, given the varied nature of regional arrangements or agencies, establishment of a universal model for their relationship with the United Nations would not be appropriate.

14. The General Assembly notes the meetings organized and arranged by the Secretary-General with regional arrangements or agencies, most recently in February 1996, and would encourage the continuation and further development of this practice on a regular basis. The Assembly underlines the importance of informing it about such meetings.

IV. Cooperation and dialogue between the United Nations and non-governmental organizations

15. Non-governmental organizations can play an important role in support of United Nations activities. Appropriate cooperation and dialogue between the United Nations system and non-governmental organizations can contribute to ensuring that the efforts of those organizations are consistent with, and properly coordinated with, the activities and objectives of the United Nations. Such coordination should not compromise the impartiality of the United Nations or the non-governmental nature of the organizations.

ANNEX II

Question of sanctions imposed by the United Nations

1. An effectively implemented regime of collective Security Council sanctions can operate as a useful international policy tool in the graduated response to threats to international peace and security. As Security Council action under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, sanctions are a matter of the utmost seriousness and concern. Sanctions should be resorted to only with the utmost caution, when other peaceful options provided by the Charter are inadequate. The Council should give as thorough consideration as possible to the short-term and long-term effects of sanctions, having due regard to the need for the Council to act speedily in certain cases.

2. Sanctions should be established in strict conformity with the Charter, with clear objectives, provision for regular review and precise conditions for their lifting. The implementation of sanctions must adhere to the terms of the applicable Security Council resolutions. In this context, the Council must act in accordance with Article 24, paragraph 2, of the Charter. At the same time, the Council's ability to act speedily, in the objective interest of maintaining international peace and security, must be recognized.

3. The Security Council has the ability to determine the time-frame of sanctions. This question is of the greatest importance and should be seriously considered in connection with the objective of changing the behaviour of the target party while not causing unnecessary suffering to the civilian population. The Council should define the time-frame for sanctions regimes taking these considerations into account.

4. While there is a need to maintain the effectiveness of sanctions imposed in accordance with the Charter, unintended adverse side effects on the civilian population should be minimized by making the appropriate humanitarian exceptions in the Security Council resolutions. Sanctions regimes must also ensure that appropriate conditions are created for allowing an adequate supply of humanitarian material to reach the civilian population.

5. The purpose of sanctions is to modify the behaviour of a party that is threatening international peace and security and not to punish or otherwise exact retribution. Sanctions regimes should be commensurate with these objectives.

6. Clarity should be a goal in the formulation of Security Council resolutions imposing sanctions. The steps required from the target country for the sanctions to be lifted should be precisely defined.

7. Before sanctions are applied, a clear warning could be expressed in unequivocal language to the target country or party.

8. The Security Council could also provide for imposing sanctions that may be partially lifted, in the event the target country or party complies with previously defined requirements imposed by specific resolutions. It could also consider the possibility of introducing a range of sanctions and lifting them progressively as each target is achieved.

9. Sanctions shall be implemented in good faith and uniformly by all States. Violations must be brought to the attention of the general membership of the United Nations through the appropriate channels.

10. Just as the Security Council periodically reviews sanctions, it should also consider whether they are being fully implemented by all States.

11. It bears recalling that monitoring and compliance is first and foremost the responsibility of individual Member States. Member States should endeavour to prevent or correct activities in violation of the sanctions measures within their jurisdiction.

12. International monitoring by the Security Council or by one of its subsidiary organs of compliance with sanctions measures, in accordance with relevant Security Council resolutions, can contribute to the effectiveness of United Nations sanctions. States that may require assistance in the implementation and monitoring of sanctions may seek the assistance of the United Nations or relevant regional organizations.

13. States should be encouraged to cooperate in exchanging information about the legislative, administrative and practical implementation of sanctions.

14. Sanctions often have a serious negative impact on the development capacity and activity of target countries. Efforts should continue to be made to minimize unintended side effects of sanctions, especially with regard to the humanitarian situation and the development capacity that has a bearing on the humanitarian situation. In some instances the application of sanctions may not be compatible, however, with bilateral and multilateral development programmes.

15. Humanitarian assistance should be provided in an impartial and expeditious manner. Means should be envisaged to minimize the particular suffering of the most vulnerable groups, keeping in mind emergency situations, such as mass refugee flows.

16. With a view to addressing the humanitarian impact of sanctions, the assistance of concerned international financial and other intergovernmental and regional organizations should be sought for providing an assessment of the humanitarian needs and the vulnerabilities of target countries at the time of the imposition of sanctions and regularly thereafter while they are being implemented. The appropriate department of the Secretariat could play a coordinating role in this context.

17. Guidelines for the formulation of the humanitarian exceptions mentioned in paragraph 4 above should be developed, bearing in mind that the humanitarian requirements may differ according to the stage of development, geography, natural resources and other features of the target country.

18. Foodstuffs, medicines and medical supplies should be exempted from United Nations sanctions regimes. Basic or standard medical and agricultural equipment and basic or standard educational items should also be exempted; a list should be drawn up for that purpose. Other essential humanitarian goods should be considered for exemption by the relevant United Nations bodies, including the sanctions committees. In this regard it is recognized that efforts should be made to allow target countries to have access to appropriate resources and procedures for financing humanitarian imports.

19. The work of United Nations humanitarian agencies should be facilitated in accordance with applicable Security Council resolutions and sanctions committee guidelines.

20. The concept of "humanitarian limits of sanctions" deserves further attention and standard approaches should be elaborated by the relevant United Nations bodies.

21. The target country should exert all possible efforts to facilitate equitable distribution and sharing of humanitarian assistance.

22. Having assumed great importance for a large number of countries, specific sanctions regimes would necessitate the submission of special reports by the Security Council to the General Assembly for its consideration.

23. The Secretary-General in his "Supplement to an Agenda for Peace" noted that there was an urgent need for action to respond to the expectations raised by Article 50 of the Charter. He also noted that sanctions were measures taken collectively and that the costs involved in their application should be borne equitably by all Member States.

24. More frequently resorted to in the recent past, sanctions have been causing problems of an economic nature in third countries. The importance of the subject has been reflected in intensive consideration of the question in its conceptual and specific forms by the General Assembly in the last few years.

25. Taking into account the importance of the resolutions adopted by consensus, the Security Council, the General Assembly and other relevant organs should intensify their efforts to address the special economic problems of third countries affected by sanctions regimes. They should also take into consideration the proposals presented on the subject during the debate in the Informal Open-Ended Working Group of the General Assembly on an Agenda for Peace and other relevant bodies.

26. Bearing in mind that this question has been under intensive discussion in the Sixth Committee and that those discussions are to continue during the fifty-second session of the General Assembly, it is agreed that this aspect should be addressed in an appropriate manner by the Sixth Committee during that session.

27. Security Council resolutions should include more precise mandates for sanctions committees, including a standard approach to be followed by the committees.

28. The mandates of sanctions committees should be such that they can be fulfilled in practical terms.

29. While noting the improvements in the functioning of the sanctions committees following upon the notes by the President of the Security Council of 29 March 1995, 31 May 1995 and 24 January 1996 and that all committees are already working on the basis of those notes, it is recognized that the process needs to be encouraged and further developed.

30. The sanctions committees should give priority to handling applications for the supply of humanitarian goods meant for the civilian population. Those applications should be dealt with expeditiously.

31. The sanctions committees should give priority to the humanitarian problems that could arise from the application of sanctions. Whenever they consider that a humanitarian problem is about to arise in a target country, such a situation should immediately be brought to the attention of the Security Council. The committees may suggest changes in specific sanctions regimes to address particular humanitarian issues with a view to taking urgent corrective steps.

32. Likewise, when a committee considers that a sanctions enforcement problem has arisen, it should bring the situation to the attention of the Security Council. The committees may suggest changes in specific sanctions regimes to address particular enforcement issues with a view to taking urgent corrective steps.

33. Further improvements in the working methods of sanctions committees that promote transparency, fairness and effectiveness and help the committees to speed up their deliberations are necessary.

34. Measures additional to those contemplated in the aforementioned notes by the President of the Security Council might include, among others, improvements in the decision-making procedures of the sanctions committees and the possibility for affected States to implement more effectively their right to make representation to the committees against their decisions.

35. Improvements in the "authorized signatory system" should be sought so that delays in clearing proposals may be avoided. The reasons for putting applications on hold or blocking them should be immediately communicated to the applicant.

36. The practice of hearing technical presentations of information by organizations assisting in the enforcement of Security Council sanctions during closed meetings of the sanctions committees should be continued, while respecting the existing procedures followed by such committees. The target or affected countries, as well as concerned organizations, should be better able to exercise the right of explaining or presenting their points of view to the sanctions committees. The presentations should be expert and comprehensive.

37. Sanctions committee secretariats should be adequately staffed, from within existing resources. This is necessary to expedite the processing of applications and the giving of clearances.

38. Sanctions committees could analyse available information so as to determine whether regimes are being effectively implemented. They could bring their conclusions and, if appropriate, recommendations in this respect to the attention of the Security Council.

39. Clarifying statements and decisions by the sanctions committees are an important contribution to the uniform application of a given sanctions regime. Such statements and decisions must be consistent with Security Council resolutions and with one another.

Preventive diplomacy and peacemaking

In his report on the work of the Organization [A/52/1], the Secretary-General noted that a primary aim of the United Nations was to expand the domain of peaceful change by providing means through which conflicts might be contained and resolved and by dealing with their root causes. The prevention of conflict within and between States required ongoing attention to possible sources of tension and prompt action to ensure they did not evolve into conflict. During 1997, he said, the Secretariat, in cooperation with other elements of the UN system, had worked to strengthen its global watch, designed to detect threats to international peace and security, enabling the Security Council to carry out or to foster preventive action. Cooperation with regional organizations had offered great potential in that regard (see below).

In terms of the peaceful settlement of disputes, a contrasting experience during the year in Central Asia had underlined the fact that progress in resolving disputes hinged on certain conditions. The signing of the General Agreement on the Establishment of Peace and National Accords in Tajikistan, though it had not fully prevented fighting, demonstrated the desire of the Tajik disputants to settle their differences peacefully. It also reflected the readiness of some key countries to use their influence to bring that about. On the other hand, in Afghanistan, despite the efforts of the United Nations Special Mission, the warring parties had shown little interest in a peaceful solution. Nevertheless, the Secretary-General said that he had decided to intensify UN efforts to help end the strife. He regretted that the absence of the will to coexist peacefully and the readiness, on the part of some elements, to change a negotiated political order through violence had led to serious regression of the situations in Cambodia and Sierra Leone, where the United Nations had played major roles to secure stability after years of civil war. The interlocking problems and crises in the Great Lakes region of Central Africa required a correspondingly integrated approach on the part of the United Nations, he added.

The Secretary-General had also taken initiatives to revitalize flagging processes to settle long-standing disputes in Cyprus, East Timor and Western Sahara. In each case, he had appointed a high-level emissary to try to move the process forward.

Recognizing that the use of mandatory sanctions was a valuable tool available to the Security Council, permitting the United Nations to bring pressure to bear without recourse to force, the Secretary-General said that he would encourage consideration by the General Assembly and the Council of possible ways to render sanctions less blunt and more effective, in the light of concerns about their negative effects on the most vulnerable groups among civilian populations.

The Secretary-General noted that little had been done to curb the rapidly escalating proliferation of conventional weapons. There was intense competition to export those weapons, including to conflict areas where the United Nations was struggling to promote peace, thereby exacerbating the intensity and duration of those conflicts. The challenge for the international community was to devise means to contain the spread of such weapons. In that regard, he suggested the strengthening of the United Nations Register of Conventional Arms, and commended the initiative taken in West Africa to declare a moratorium on the export, import and production of light weapons.

In September, the Security Council [S/PRST/1997/46] discussed the need for a concerted international effort to promote peace and security in Africa. It considered that the challenges in Africa demanded a more comprehensive response, and requested the Secretary-General to submit recommendations regarding the sources of conflict in Africa, ways to prevent and address those conflicts, and how to lay the foundation for durable peace and economic growth following their resolution.

JIU report. In a June note [A/52/184], the Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly his comments and those of the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC) on a 1995 Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) report [YUN 1995, p. 177] on strengthening the UN system's capacity for conflict prevention.

The Secretary-General and ACC noted that the inspectors had advocated a comprehensive, system-wide conflict prevention strategy combining preventive diplomacy and "pre-conflict peace-building". While sharing JIU's assessment of the need for an integrated approach to conflict prevention, they were less optimistic on the prospects for that approach to become the norm in efforts to prevent internal and international conflicts. It was believed that JIU underestimated the legislative and political obstacles to conflict prevention, including the ambivalence of some Member States towards UN involvement in the early resolution of disputes to which they might be a party. While Member States expressed support in principle for conflict prevention, in practice such support was often qualified by restrictions which related either to the respect for sovereignty or to financial considerations. The real question was not how to strengthen the already strong capacity of the UN system for conflict prevention, but how to put that capacity into actual and effective use. That depended on a recognition by Member States that, far from infringing upon their sovereignty, activities such as early warning, preventive diplomacy and peace-building sought to restore the authority and legitimacy of States confronted with threats to their security and stability, and on a willingness by the membership as a whole to make adequate resources available for those activities.

The Secretary-General in 1997 [A/52/1] reported that the UN system as a whole was focusing as never before on peace-building. Experience had shown that keeping peace, in the sense of avoiding a relapse into armed conflict, was a necessary but not sufficient condition for establishing the foundation of an enduring peace. Areas of additional activity included military security, civil law and order, human rights, refugees and displaced persons, elections, local administration, involvement in public utilities, health, education, finance, customs and excise, reconstruction, and general attempts to return society to some sense of normalcy. There was also a growing appreciation of the fact that efforts to support development could not cease during emergencies, but had to continue to be vigorously supported. UN entities had therefore devised development-oriented interventions to prevent relapses into crisis. The Secretary-General had taken steps to ensure that the UN system was able to meet the challenges of post-conflict peace-building in a unified and coherent manner, and to that end had designated the Department of Political Affairs as the UN focal point for post-conflict peace-building.

The cause of constructing a just peace also required effective mechanisms of accountability for past wrongs. In many instances, national teams were in place, though they might require international assistance. The International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia had marked a major milestone in 1997 by delivering its first judgement and sentence. The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda had three trials under way with 21 accused persons awaiting trial. The Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court had almost completed its work on the consolidated text of a draft statute. The Secretary-General believed that the establishment of the court would contribute profoundly to post-conflict peace-building.

ACC report. At its first regular session of 1997 (Geneva, 10-11 April) [ACC/1997/4], ACC considered the issue of peace-building. In that context, it discussed resource mobilization, early warning and preventive action, peace-building in countries where the United Nations operated specific political programmes, peace-building for the prevention and resolution of crisis situations, partnerships and alliances in crisis situations, lessons learned and follow-up action.

ACC agreed that peace-building, as a broad-based approach to crisis prevention and resolution, should comprise integrated and coordinated actions to address any combination of political, military, humanitarian, human rights, environmental, economic, social, cultural and demographic factors to ensure that conflict was prevented or resolved on a lasting basis, and that the process of long-term and sustainable development was in place and was not interrupted, or was resumed as expeditiously as possible. The aim should be to mobilize a timely and well-coordinated system-wide response to potential and actual crisis situations, tailored to the requirements of each case. ACC expressed support for World Bank efforts to establish a post-conflict financing facility and called for a stronger commitment by bilateral and other donors. It stressed the need for the harmonization of resource mobilization efforts to ensure adequate funding for immediate rehabilitation and recovery efforts, and called for renewed attention to be given to closing the gaps that limited economic and social rehabilitation in affected countries. ACC members also stressed the need to reinforce the UN system's overall capacity for early warning. Arrangements also needed to be strengthened to cope with large and complex emergencies that could have repercussions for a whole region and beyond. In countries where the United Nations operated specific political programmes, ACC agreed that there should be accepted arrangements, at Headquarters and field levels, for the Secretary-General to provide guidance to the system as a whole and to ensure that UN programmes, funds and agencies active in the countries concerned worked in concert. The arrangements should aim to: ensure that the relevant programmes, funds and agencies were informed about the Secretary-General's action to fulfil his political mandates and were invited to provide him with information and assessments relevant to his efforts; inform them if their activities needed to be harmonized with the overall political strategy; identify specific peace-building activities to strengthen the Secretary-General's political effort; and monitor the political efforts of the agreed activities and review any adjustments that might be necessary.

Concerning the prevention and resolution of crisis situations, ACC agreed that relief and development programmes had to overcome existing divisions that were reflected and reinforced by separation of approaches, budgets and functions. Towards that end, it endorsed the recommendation of the Consultative Committee on Programme and Operational Questions (CCPOQ) of ACC on the need for a common strategic framework for response to and recovery from crisis, developed in consultation with the countries concerned and UN system organizations. ACC also endorsed the elements of such a strategic framework concentrating on three components—analysis of in-country environment, setting of policy parameters, and establishment of priorities for the response programme. Implementation should be pursued through existing mechanisms, such as the resident and humanitarian coordinator systems, the common country assessment and the country strategy note, as well as other instruments, including the Bretton Woods institutions.

ACC reaffirmed the importance of partnerships and alliances in crisis situations. It agreed that consideration of ways for UN system agencies and organizations, including the Bretton Woods institutions (the World Bank Group and the International Monetary Fund), to work together to enhance the effectiveness of the international community's response to crisis situations should encompass the effective participation of multilateral and bilateral donors and concerned international non-governmental organizations in the strategic framework for relief, rehabilitation and recovery. New and more participatory approaches needed to be developed at the national and local levels, and international partners had to be sensitive to and respectful of the concerns of affected people at village and community levels. ACC directed its Organizational Committee to pursue inter-agency consultations, including through the Inter-Agency Committee on Sustainable Development, to achieve a comprehensive assessment of the experience gained and lessons learned in peace-building in crisis situations, including identification of best practices and the further elaboration of guiding principles that could be applied by the UN system in future crises. Special attention should be given to strengthening the overall capacity of the system for early warning and for assessing and exchanging information when a complex emergency situation appeared to be imminent.

In terms of follow-up, ACC endorsed the recommendations of CCPOQ that the proposed strategic framework for response to and recovery from crisis be tested in Afghanistan and Mozambique, and that a working group be established for each selected country, inter alia, to develop arrangements for guiding and backstopping in-country application of the strategic framework. ACC decided to revert to the issue at a future session in the light of the results of the working groups and the review of lessons learned.

JIU report. In an October note [A/52/430], the Secretary-General transmitted to the General Assembly a JIU report entitled "Coordination at Headquarters and field level between United Nations agencies involved in peace-building: an assessment of possibilities". The report examined the current state and concepts of post-conflict peace-building and the role of the Bretton Woods institutions in that process, and proposed a new approach to the issue.

The inspectors concluded that the UN system risked failing to ensure that increasingly limited resources available for post-conflict reconstruction were used effectively, and ultimately expending even greater resources in humanitarian assistance, as well as future peacekeeping operations, if conflicts recurred. Without a more serious effort to coordinate peace-building activities between the UN system organizations and the Bretton Woods institutions. Member States would continue to marginalize the initial financial investment made during the peacekeeping phase. In practice, there were no effective coordination mechanisms for post-conflict peace-building at the policy, headquarters and system-wide levels. In addition, there were several barriers to achieving coordination, including the viewpoint of organizations that their independence had a higher priority than coordination with other organizations. Organizations also lacked a generally accepted understanding of coordination and a well-defined working relationship with each other.

The inspectors recommended that the coordination framework for post-conflict peace-building should be, inter alia, overarching and coherent, yet sufficiently flexible to adjust to each situation. The framework must be established during the initial reconstruction planning phases. The agreement ending the conflict could be considered a suitable platform for outlining and reinforcing measures and actions to consolidate peace, establishing linkages between peace-making and peace-building operations and outlining the framework for coordination. ACC should prepare a declaration on the coordination of peace-building activities for acceptance by the Assembly and legislative bodies of specialized agencies, which, while recognizing the need for maintaining the independence of UN organizations, would reinforce the need for coordination to ensure maximum utilization of resources and the achievement of objectives. The declaration should also establish clear mandates and guidelines for UN organizations involved in post-conflict peace-building, identify leadership roles at Headquarters and in the field, establish more formal and consistent coordination between UN system organizations and the Bretton Woods institutions, strengthen existing coordinating bodies, and build and expand on coordination efforts under way among thematic lines. As a follow-on to the peacekeeping phase, consideration should be given to carrying out peace-building activities as a separate and distinct operation. Since peace-building was essentially a component of development activities, the coordination role of the Economic and Social Council in development policies and activities should be enhanced. UN system organizations should formally establish coordination linkages between themselves and the Bretton Woods financial institutions to ensure participation in the planning phases of post-conflict recovery and a sustainable, coordinated relationship throughout reconstruction.

Peacekeeping operations

In his September report on the work of the Organization [A/52/1], the Secretary-General said that the international community had developed a clearer understanding of both the limits of peacekeeping and its usefulness. As a result of past setbacks, Member States were more aware of the risks associated with dispatching operations with resources which did not match their mandates. While inaction in the face of massive violence and threats to international peace and security was not an acceptable or viable option, there should be no illusion that peace could be achieved cheaply. Some 22,500 soldiers and civilian police were currently serving in 16 missions in countries around the world, he said, which helped to stabilize potentially volatile situations, and often involved extensive cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations.

In the context of the current effort to strengthen the United Nations, it was crucial to maintain and improve the Organization's ability to plan, manage and conduct peacekeeping missions. The Secretariat was reviewing cumbersome or inappropriate rules and procedures of field operations, such as rules for recruitment, procurement, and settlement of third-party liability claims. Ways to ensure a unified effort in the entire UN system in all peacekeeping and peace-building activities in the field and at Headquarters were being explored. The creation within the Secretariat of an Executive Committee on Peace and Security was an important step towards that goal. Many other structures and functions that were essential for peacekeeping activities lacked stable funding, and many essential tasks were discharged by personnel made available temporarily by Member States. Half of all Professionals in the Department of Peacekeeping Operations fell within that category. The Organization needed a stable base of budget resources in peacekeeping that reflected its real personnel requirements. Similarly, action on a proposal to create a rapidly deployable mission headquarters depended on the willingness of Member States to allocate the necessary financial resources.

Additional elements of a rapid deployment capacity were being explored. Those States that had signed a letter of intent in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 18] to form a standby high-readiness brigade within the UN standby arrangements had since moved further towards that objective.

A key priority was to draw on the experience gained in co-deployment in such cases as Georgia, Liberia and the former Yugoslavia to develop doctrine and guidelines, so that the United Nations would be better prepared for such partnerships with regional organizations in the future. Another main priority was ensuring that humanitarian strategies as well as longer-term development aims were fully integrated into the overall peacekeeping effort.

The Secretary-General stated that those were the challenges that had to be overcome in efforts to adapt UN peacekeeping to the crises being faced today and in the future, and as work continued towards the creation of a system of collective security for the twenty-first century.

Rapid deployment and standby arrangements

In 1997, the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations expressed its belief that standby arrangements constituted a key to the increased effectiveness and rapid deployment capacity of peacekeeping operations, and welcomed efforts to improve those arrangements. The Committee took note of the lack of certain specialized units in standby arrangements and invited Member States to participate in such areas as headquarters support, sea/air lift provision, communications personnel, engineers, and logistics and medical staff. The Committee also noted the need to broaden the geographical base of Member States making resources available under standby arrangements. The Special Committee welcomed the Secretariat's effort to provide information on the establishment of a rapidly deployable mission headquarters unit, and requested that it be kept informed regularly on all aspects of the plan for its implementation. It stressed that the trust fund for the mission headquarters be managed in a transparent manner with sufficient funds to fulfil mandated tasks and staffing.

Report of Secretary-General. The Secretary-General, on 24 December [S/1997/1009], reported on the current status of standby arrangements for peacekeeping operations. As at 1 December, 67 Member States had confirmed their willingness to provide standby resources totalling some 88,000 personnel. Some 50 States had provided information on the specific capabilities of their standby resources. Thirteen others (Argentina, Austria, Bangladesh, Bolivia, Denmark, Ghana, Italy, Jordan, Malaysia, Nepal, Singapore, Ukraine and Uruguay) had formalized their standby contributions through a Memorandum of Understanding.

The Secretary-General noted that the standby resources included elements of different sizes, varying from infantry battalions to individual military observers, and covered a whole range of components envisaged for peacekeeping operations. However, additional resources were needed to complement the infantry, the bulk of the resources, with logistic support, especially in the areas of sealift/airlift, communications, multi-role logistics, transport, health services, engineering, mine clearing and transport utility aircraft. The Secretariat had been encouraging Member States having such assets to include them in their pledges to obtain a more balanced ratio between operational and support units. More civilian police personnel were also needed. Much remained to be done to widen involvement in the standby arrangements and to improve the availability of resources, said the Secretary-General.

He noted that the new procedure for determining reimbursement to Member States for contingent-owned equipment—the signing of a Memorandum of Understanding before actual deployment to the mission area—might delay the process of rapid deployment. In the light of that requirement, Member States that had already pledged to the standby arrangements might wish to exchange, in advance, data on contingent-owned equipment which would be adjusted during the finalization of the Memorandum of Understanding. To meet that need, the Secretariat had reviewed the questionnaire for contributing resources to the standby arrangements and had implemented a new form known as the "planning data sheet" for contributing those resources, which consolidated information in terms of a generic description of unit capabilities, movement data, details of logistic sustainment and self-sufficiency, and a list of major equipment. That had simplified the Memorandum of Understanding on standby arrangements and facilitated the signing process between the United Nations and the Governments concerned, resulting in a speeding up of the planning and deployment of units. The information provided might help to address the problem of units that lacked the proper equipment, and had proved helpful in the planning and deployment of peacekeeping operations in Angola, Guatemala, Haiti and the former Yugoslavia.

Other efforts to reduce response time to a crisis included the development, by a group of States led by Denmark, of the Multinational United Nations Standby Forces High-Readiness Brigade (SHIRBRIG). Once it became fully operational in 1999, that formation of up to 5,000 troops, which might be deployed for up to six months, would be capable of deploying in under 30 days.

Communication. On 14 August, Canada and the Netherlands, on behalf of the co-chairmen of the Friends of Rapid Deployment, submitted to the Secretary-General a discussion paper [A/52/287] outlining a logistics strategy that would integrate and strengthen current and future logistics initiatives for the rapid deployment of a peacekeeping operation. The Friends believed that the proposed strategy, if implemented, would significantly enhance the Organization's capability to deploy, sustain and terminate a peacekeeping mission and, as a consequence, deal more effectively with crisis situations. Appended to the paper was a summary of logistics requirements.

At its 1997 session, the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations underlined the importance of Security Council members and troop-contributing countries making full use of the consultation arrangements as set out in the 1996 statement of the Security Council President [YUN 1996, p. 18]. The Special Committee encouraged the Council to ensure the rigorous, timely and systematic implementation of those arrangements and to continue to ensure that consultations on mandates and on operational questions were chaired by the Council President and the Secretariat, respectively.

The Committee noted that the arrangements on consultations would be kept under review and that they did not preclude consultations in a variety of forms, including with other countries especially affected, for example countries from the region concerned. It recommended that in exceptional circumstances meetings be held at the request of troop-contributing countries.

Civilian police

The Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations, in view of the role and increasing number of civilian police in UN peacekeeping operations, urged the Secretary-General to continue to strengthen the Civilian Police Unit within the UN Department of Peacekeeping Operations. It urged Member States to include police elements among those units they identified in standby arrangements with the United Nations, including such information as type of police corps, rank and training. It welcomed the Secretariat's intention to include a civilian police staff element in its development of a rapidly deployable headquarters capacity.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 14 July [meeting 3801], the Security Council President made the following statement [S/PRST/1997/38] on the Council's behalf:

The Security Council has established or authorized a growing number of peacekeeping operations which contain both civilian and military components. It takes particular note of the increasing role and special functions of civilian police in such operations.

The Security Council notes the efforts by the General Assembly and its Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations in carrying out their task to review all aspects of peacekeeping operations, including, inter alia, enhancing the capacity of the United Nations system to accommodate the growing demand for civilian police in peacekeeping operations. It furthermore commends the efforts of the Secretary-General in this regard. The Council encourages States to look for further means to enhance the ways in which civilian police components of peacekeeping operations are set up and supported.

The Security Council considers that in operations mandated by the Security Council or the General Assembly the civilian police perform indispensable functions in monitoring and training national police forces and can play a major role, through assistance to local police forces, in restoring civil order, supporting the rule of law and fostering civil reconciliation. It sees an increasingly important role for civilian police, among others, in contributing to the building of confidence and security between parties and among local populations, in order to prevent conflict, to contain conflict or to build peace in the aftermath of conflict.

The Security Council encourages States to make available to the United Nations at short notice appropriately trained civilian police, if possible through the United Nations standby arrangements. It welcomes the role of United Nations selection assistance teams in this regard.

The Security Council underlines the importance of the recruitment of qualified civilian police from the widest possible geographic range to serve in United Nations operations. It also expresses the importance of the recruitment of female police officers to United Nations operations.

The Security Council encourages States individually or collectively to provide appropriate training of civilian police for international service. It encourages the Secretary-General to provide assistance and guidance to Member States in order to promote a standardized approach to the training and recruitment of civilian police.

The Security Council underlines the necessity for United Nations civilian police, in accordance with their mandates, to be trained as required, inter alia, to render assistance and support in the reorganization, training and monitoring of national police and to help defuse tension on the ground through negotiations. The Council furthermore considers it essential that United Nations civilian police contingents contain adequate legal expertise.

The Security Council underlines the need for close coordination between civilian police and the military, humanitarian and other civilian components of United Nations operations. It encourages efforts by Member States to organize joint training between civilian and military components designated for United Nations operations in order to improve coordination and security for personnel in the field.

The Security Council expresses its gratitude to those countries which have contributed civilian police to the peacekeeping operations of the United Nations.

Safety and security

The Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations expressed concern at the continuing attacks and acts of violence against United Nations and associated personnel. It urged Member States that had not done so to consider becoming parties to the Convention on the Safety of United Nations and Associated Personnel, adopted in General Assembly resolution 49/59 [YUN 1994, p. 1289], to bring its entry into force at the earliest possible date.

The Special Committee welcomed the statement by the President of the Security Council [S/PRST/1997/13] (see PART FIVE, Chapter III), which emphasized that the host country and others concerned had to take steps to ensure the safety and security of UN and associated personnel. The Special Committee reaffirmed that safety and security constituted integral elements of the planning of peacekeeping operations and recognized that elaboration of a comprehensive security plan upon the start-up of a peacekeeping operation was essential. It stressed the need for adequate budgetary provisions to ensure the security of peacekeeping personnel.

Comprehensive review of peacekeeping

Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations

As requested by the General Assembly in resolution 51/136 [YUN 1996, p. 22], the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations continued a comprehensive review of the whole question of peacekeeping operations in all their aspects. In 1997, the Committee held four meetings on 10 and 11 April, the deliberations of which were summarized in its report to the Assembly [A/52/209].

The Special Committee, while noting recent trends, including the decrease in the establishment of new peacekeeping operations, the total number of personnel involved in and the average size of operations, considered it essential that the United Nations be able to continue to maintain international peace and security, in accordance with the Charter, by effectively planning, deploying and managing current and future peacekeeping operations. The Committee believed that peacekeeping operations should not be used as a substitute for addressing the root causes of the conflict, which should be addressed in a coherent, well-planned, coordinated and comprehensive manner with political, social, economic and developmental instruments. Consideration should be given to ways in which those efforts could continue without interruption after the departure of a peacekeeping operation to ensure lasting peace and security. The Committee stressed the importance of providing peacekeeping operations with clearly defined mandates, objectives, command structures and secure financing. Changes in mandates during a mission should be based on a thorough and timely reassessment, including military advice, as to the implications on the ground for both military and civilian components and after a full discussion between troop-contributing countries and the Security Council.

The Special Committee requested that the Secretary-General improve the method of selecting and preparing senior military commanders in the light of the increasingly difficult and dangerous conditions in which peacekeeping operations were conducted, and strengthen the selection and preparation procedures for chief administrative officers. There should also be enunciated and uniformly applied policies, including on tenure and remuneration of staff through trust funds, for personnel in the UN Secretariat who were not part of the international civil service or general service staff but who were involved in the management and conduct of peacekeeping operations. While noting the application of standard rates of mission subsistence allowance and standardized troop costs, the Committee recommended extension of the principle of standard rates to death and disability compensation for all observers and troops, and urged competent UN bodies to accord the highest priority to finding a solution.

The Secretary-General was encouraged to continue to improve the structure and organization of the Department of Peacekeeping Operations, including the development of structures, at UN

Headquarters and in the field, for periods of low- and high-intensity activity in UN peacekeeping, and the identification of functions and positions for the efficient management of peacekeeping operations during those periods. The Committee welcomed the intention of the Secretariat to review the structure and reform outdated policies and procedures in the Department. It encouraged the Secretariat to continue to enhance the transparency, efficiency and responsiveness of its procurement procedures (see below, under "Management of peacekeeping assets"). The Department of Peacekeeping Operations was urged to develop a coherent strategy for logistic support of peacekeeping operations, as well as a comprehensive and clearly stated materiel management policy to guide the development of a workable inventory and materiel control system.

The Committee considered that rules of engagement should be consistent with the specific mandate and political purposes of each peacekeeping operation and that clearly defined rules should address all possible contingencies. It encouraged the Secretariat to discuss the rules of engagement for a specific peacekeeping operation with prospective troop contributors prior to their finalization. It reiterated the need to implement in full the Assembly's recommendations regarding contingent-owned equipment procedures and to submit a detailed report on the experience of implementing those procedures.

The Special Committee emphasized the need to differentiate between peacekeeping operations and humanitarian assistance. It considered that peacekeeping operations could contribute to the creation of a secure environment for the effective delivery of humanitarian assistance. The Committee believed there would be value in achieving improved coordination between peacekeeping operations and the United Nations and other agencies or organizations.

The Special Committee also considered issues related to demining, cooperation with regional organizations, and the observance in 1998 of the fiftieth anniversary of peacekeeping operations (see below).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 10 December [meeting 69], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fourth (Special Political and Decolonization) Committee [A/52/618], adopted resolution 52/69 without vote [agenda item 88].

Comprehensive review of the whole question of peacekeeping operations in all their aspects

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 2006(XIX) of 18 February 1965 and all other relevant resolutions,

Recalling in particular its resolution 51/136 of 13 December 1996,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on the work of the Organization,

Affirming that the efforts of the United Nations in the peaceful settlement of disputes, including through its peacekeeping operations, are indispensable,

Welcoming the expansion of the membership of the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations,

Convinced of the need for the United Nations to continue to improve its capabilities in the field of peacekeeping and to enhance the effective and efficient deployment of its peacekeeping operations,

Considering the contribution that all States Members of the Organization make to peacekeeping,

Taking note of the widespread interest in contributing to the work of the Special Committee expressed by many Member States, in particular troop-contributing countries,

Bearing in mind the continuous necessity of preserving the efficiency and strengthening the effectiveness of the work of the Special Committee,

1. Welcomes the report of the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations;

2. Endorses the proposals, recommendations and conclusions of the Special Committee contained in paragraphs 34 to 91 of its report;

3. Urges Member States, the Secretariat and relevant organs of the United Nations to take all necessary steps to implement the proposals, recommendations and conclusions of the Special Committee;

4. Reiterates that those Member States that become personnel contributors to United Nations peacekeeping operations in years to come or participate in the future in the Special Committee for three consecutive years as observers shall, upon request in writing to the Chairman of the Committee, become members at the following session of the Committee;

5. Decides that the Special Committee, in accordance with its mandate, shall continue its efforts for a comprehensive review of the whole question of peacekeeping operations in all their aspects and shall review the implementation of its previous proposals and consider any new proposals so as to enhance the capacity of the United Nations to fulfil its responsibilities in this field;

6. Requests the Special Committee to submit a report on its work to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session;

7. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third session the item entitled "Comprehensive review of the whole question of peacekeeping operations in all their aspects".

Also on 10 December, the Assembly, in resolution 52/12 B, invited Member States to improve the supply of information to the Secretary-General that could assist the Organization in preventing conflict and maintaining international peace and security. It requested appropriate organs to consider, as a matter of priority, enhancing the rapid deployment capacity of the United Nations in peacekeeping operations.

The Assembly endorsed the recommendation that the Security Council, in establishing a peacekeeping operation in the future, should prescribe a time-frame for the conclusion of the status-of-forces agreement between the United Nations and the host Government for the operation in question, and that, pending the conclusion of such an agreement, a model agreement would apply provisionally unless otherwise agreed by the parties concerned. It invited the Council to consider the matter.

Operations in 1997

As of 1 January 1997, there were 16 United Nations peacekeeping operations in place—3 in Africa, 1 in the Americas, 3 in the Middle East, 3 in other parts of Asia and 6 in Europe. During the year, with the termination of five operations (two in Africa and three in the Americas) and the launching of four more (three in the Americas and one in Africa), a total of 20 UN peacekeeping operations had been deployed; by the end of the year, the total was 15.

Europe

In Europe, the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium (UNTAES) continued to assist the Croatian Government and local Serb representatives in Croatia in implementing the Basic Agreement for the region signed in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 587]. On 19 December, the Security Council, noting the termination of UNTAES in January 1998, decided to establish, from 16 January 1998, a support group of 180 civilian police monitors. A separate mission, the United Nations Mission of Observers in Prevlaka (UNMOP), continued monitoring demilitarization activities on the peninsula.

The strength of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina (UNMIBH), which included the International Police Task Force (IPTF), was increased by 120 police personnel. In the light of positive developments in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, the Council extended the mandate of the 1,000-member United Nations Preventive Deployment Force (UNPREDEP) for a final period until 31 August 1998. Elsewhere in Europe, the 124-member United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia (UNOMIG) continued to monitor the implementation of the 1994 Agreement on a Ceasefire and Separation of Forces between the Government of Georgia and authorities of the Georgian region of Abkhazia [YUN 1994, p. 583]. The 33-year-old United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus (UNFICYP) continued its tasks of keeping the

Africa

In Africa, three operations continued during 1997: the United Nations Angola Verification Mission (UNAVEM III), terminated in June; the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO); and the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia (UNOMIL), terminated in September following the successful holding of elections in that country. In July, the Security Council established a new follow-on mission for Angola, the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola (MONUA). In October, the Council extended the mission until 30 January 1998. (See PART ONE, Chapter II.)

Americas

As for peacekeeping activities in the Americas, the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti (UNSMIH), created in 1996 to assist in the professionalization of the police and in maintaining a secure and stable environment conducive to the success of those efforts, was terminated in July 1997. In its place, the Security Council in July created the United Nations Transition Mission in Haiti (UNTMIH), with a mandate until 30 November. On 28 November, the Council created the United Nations Civilian Police Mission in Haiti (MIPONUH), with a mandate until 30 November 1998 to continue the task of professionalizing the Haitian National Police. In Guatemala, the Security Council authorized in January the attachment for a three-month period of a group of 155 military observers and medical personnel to the United Nations Mission for the Verification of Human Rights and of Compliance with the Commitments of the Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights in Guatemala (MINUGUA). Its purpose was to verify the December 1996 Oslo agreement [YUN 1996, p. 168] on a definitive ceasefire between the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca. The mission of military observers was terminated in May. (See PART ONE, Chapter III.)

Asia

In Asia, the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission (UNIKOM) pursued its task of monitoring the demilitarized zone along the border between the two countries. The Security Council on 14 November expanded the size and extended the mandate of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan (UNMOT), to promote peace and national reconciliation and to assist in the implementation of the General Agreement on the Establishment of Peace and National Accord in Tajikistan. The United Nations Military Observer Group in India and Pakistan (UNMOGIP), established in 1949, remained in place to monitor the ceasefire in Jammu and Kashmir. (See PART ONE, Chapter IV.) Three long-standing operations continued in the Middle East—the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization (UNTSO), the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) and the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force (UNDOF) (see PART ONE, Chapter VI).

Other matters

During the year, the Organization also planned and prepared for, but did not deploy, a mission to Sierra Leone and carried out significant contingency planning for missions in Burundi, the Congo, and the Democratic Republic of the Congo. However, the Security Council did authorize the establishment of two new missions by Member States: a multinational protection force for Albania for three months to facilitate the safe and prompt delivery of humanitarian assistance and to help create a stable environment for the mission of international organizations in Albania (see PART ONE, Chapter V); and the Inter-African Mission to Monitor the Implementation of the Bangui Agreements (MISAB) in the Central African Republic (see PART ONE, Chapter II).

The United Nations also supported human rights missions, including the International Civilian Mission in Haiti (MICIVIH), conducted jointly with the Organization of American States, and extended the United Nations Mission for the Verification of Human Rights and of Compliance with the Commitments of the Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights in Guatemala, which was renamed the United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala (retaining the original acronym, MINUGUA), to 31 March 1998 to include international verification of the peace agreements as well as human rights monitoring.

Also in 1997, the United Nations continued to maintain the Special Mission to Afghanistan (UN-SMA), the United Nations Special Commission (UNSCOM) monitoring Iraq's compliance with relevant Security Council resolutions, and the United Nations Political Office for Somalia (UNPOS). It created the United Nations Peacebuilding Support Office in Liberia (UNOL) to support reconciliation and national reconstruction. The Organization also followed developments in Cambodia, through the Secretary-General's Special Representative, and events in the Korean peninsula (see PART ONE, Chapter IV). The Security Council closed the support unit for the Secretary-General's special envoy in El Salvador as a separate entity and subsumed its function under the administrative structure of the United Nations Development Programme.

Financial and administrative aspects of peacekeeping operations

In 1997, the cost of peacekeeping operations totalled an estimated $875.6 million, compared with $1.4 billion in 1996, while requirements for activities funded from the support account for peacekeeping operations were estimated at $35.1 million. At the same time, unpaid assessed contributions from Member States to the peacekeeping budget amounted to $2.1 billion as at 30 June, causing certain peacekeeping operations to be in cash deficits. The Organization was compelled to borrow from other peacekeeping operations and to allow higher amounts of obligations to go unpaid for longer periods of time in order to cover the funding gap. As at 30 June, available cash for all operations totalled $787.3 million, while total obligations payable were three times as high, at $2.1 billion.

During the year, the General Assembly considered various aspects of peacekeeping financing. In June, it adopted a system of self-insurance and established uniform and standardized rates for the payment of awards in cases of death and disability sustained by troops. It also decided to apply to all Member States its 1992 procedures for assessing new Member States in respect of the Peacekeeping Reserve Fund. In October, the Assembly requested the Secretary-General to make proposals for different sources of financing for the United Nations Logistics Base in Brindisi, Italy, and to consider expanding the use of the base to other UN agencies and programmes. It also endorsed proposals for the development and implementation of a field assets control system and noted the intention of the Secretary-General to continue to develop a field mission logistics system.

Note of Secretary-General. In accordance with General Assembly resolution 49/233 A [YUN 1994, p. 1338], the Secretary-General, in May 1997, submitted to the Assembly's Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee a note [A/C.5/51/48] containing estimated budgetary requirements of all peacekeeping operations for the period 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998. The estimates totalled $875,567,400, including $299,740,700 for military personnel costs and $315,579,600 for civilian personnel costs.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 22 December, the General Assembly, by decision 52/456, decided to continue consideration of administrative and budgetary aspects of peacekeeping operations at its resumed fifty-second (1998) session.

Review exercise

In a June report [A/52/209] to the General Assembly, the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations stressed that adequate financial resources and support were crucial to the effectiveness of UN peacekeeping operations, and reaffirmed the obligation of Member States to bear peacekeeping expenses as apportioned by the Assembly. Also, contributions should be paid in full, on time and without conditions so as not to undermine the effectiveness of peacekeeping operations. The Committee urged Member States to take advantage of the reduced level of peacekeeping assessments to address the issue of arrears to existing and completed missions.

The Special Committee urged the Secretary-General to accord high priority to processing pending claims by providing an adequate level of personnel to Secretariat units concerned. It expressed concern about the continuing protracted delays in the reimbursement of troop contributors, which were currently owed an estimated $1.2 billion, and reiterated the need for timely reimbursements. It requested the Secretary-General to address, as a matter of priority, the operational and financial liquidation of completed operations, with a view to finding mutually agreed arrangements with the troop- and equipment-contributing Member States concerned. The Committee expressed concern at reports by the Board of Auditors and the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) that not all the financial and other terms of status-of-forces agreements were being complied with, and requested the Secretary-General to withhold claims by Member States until the matter of expenditures was resolved. The Committee endorsed the request of ACABQ for a compendium of all instances in which the Organization was due restitution as a result of non-compliance with the status-of-forces or other agreements.

Report of ACABQ. At its spring session [A/51/892], ACABQ, in accordance with the budget cycle established in General Assembly resolution 49/233 A (YUN 1994, p. 1338], considered the reports of the Secretary-General on the financing of the following UN peacekeeping operations: UNOMIL, MINUGUA, UNMOT, UNFICYP, UNDOF, UNIFIL, MINURSO, UNIKOM, UNOMIG, United Nations Mission in Haiti (UNMIH)/UNSMIH, United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR), United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia (UNCRO), UNPREDEP, United Nations Peace Forces (UNPF), UNMIBH and UNTAES.

The Advisory Committee made a number of general observations and recommendations pertaining to most peacekeeping operations. It noted that while it was increasingly possible to foresee more accurately the resource requirements for a given budget period, more remained to be done concerning the explanation of mission-specific ratios and other variants of the Standard Cost and Ratio Manual. The Committee pointed out that all significant variations (10 per cent or more) from standard costs, from assumptions used in previous cost estimates and from approved resources under each budget line should be clearly explained. In terms of the new format for budget documents, the quality of information needed to be further improved; the data supplied should be clearly related to the requests for resources, which should be explained and justified in a consistent and transparent manner; budget documents should have a consistent and standardized structure; and offices at Headquarters should be able to rely on complete and accurate information from the field. More should be done to increase the reliability of financial performance data, and performance reports and budget estimates should also contain information on the implementation of previous recommendations of the Board of Auditors. Where applicable, information should be provided on steps taken to respond to concerns of the Office of Internal Oversight Services. Performance reports should also include an inventory of mission assets. With respect to the value of assets being transferred to the United Nations Logistics Base in Brindisi and/or other missions, the reports should indicate the value of assets in inventory; related expenses for transportation, storage and processing; and the technical conditions of the assets being transferred. Performance reports should also include large amounts of unliquidated obligations, a significant portion of which might well be subsequently cancelled.

Concerning the pattern of significant "roll-overs" in a number of budgets, ACABQ recommended that the Secretary-General pay greater attention to the procedures for raising obligations so as to ensure timely review for verification of their continuing validity. There was a need to improve accounting of proceeds resulting from the sale of property, and more should be done to improve consistent treatment and reporting of voluntary contributions. There also was a need to reflect in a consistent manner under miscellaneous income all revenue accrued on voluntary contributions.

The Advisory Committee recommended that the Secretariat prepare a roster of candidates for administrative positions in the field who should undertake specific training relevant to all aspects of tasks assigned to administration in peacekeeping operations. It was essential that qualified and experienced personnel provided to field missions stay long enough to be able to apply the institutional knowledge acquired. Steps should be taken to enhance cooperation and coordination between the UN administration in the field and the military, particularly on issues with legal and/or financial implications. Additional measures needed to be taken to effect control over payments of and accounting for a variety of allowances. The Committee invited the Secretary-General to propose for consideration by the General Assembly measures to ensure full compliance with the status-of-forces agreements.

Peacekeeping support account

Report of Secretary-General. The Secretary-General, in response to General Assembly resolution 50/221 B [YUN 1996, p. 31], submitted on 7 May a report [A/51/890] on the support account for peacekeeping operations, providing a comprehensive review of the account and its requirements for the period 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998, estimated at $35.1 million. Those requirements reflected an increase of $4.6 million over the approved level of $30.5 million for the current period, and provided for a staffing establishment of 364 temporary posts, a net increase of 19 posts.

Concerning the funding mechanism for the support account, the Secretary-General said that theoretical application of the old formula, by which an amount of 8.5 per cent of the total cost of the civilian staff component of a mission was included in the budget of each active peacekeeping operation, would generate, for the period 1 July 1996 to 30 June 1997, only some $26.2 million in income, which was insufficient compared with the approved level of expenditure of $30.5 million. For the period 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998, $18.6 million would be generated, far short of the proposed budget for the period of $35.1 million. He therefore proposed that the Assembly confirm the new funding arrangement for the support account that it had provisionally approved in resolution 50/221 B, which required that a quantum of resources should be established on an annual basis for the requirements of the support account, based on an analysis of overall backstopping requirements.

ACABQ report. In a May report [A/51/906 & Corr.1], ACABQ did not approve 17 of the 19 additional posts requested by the Secretary-General for 1997/98 under the support account, thereby reducing the estimates by $2,052,900.

It recommended that measures be taken to overcome the surge in the workload related to the implementation at Headquarters of the finance module of the Integrated Management Information System (IMIS), and that administrative actions required in the backstopping of peacekeeping operations be significantly streamlined and made much more efficient. The Secretary-General should analyse the backlog of administrative tasks that had accrued over the years and relate it to staff needs, on the basis of a schedule for its elimination. The operation of the Situation Centre of the Department of Peacekeeping Operations should be evaluated to determine its cost-effectiveness and the results should be reflected in the next budget submission on the support account.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 17 June [meeting 102], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/51/753/Add.2], adopted resolution 51/239 A without vote [agenda item 140 (a)].

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 45/258 of 3 May 1991, 47/218 A of 23 December 1992, 48/226 A of 23 December 1993, 48/226 B of 5 April 1994, 48/226 C of 29 July 1994, 49/250 of 20 July 1995, 50/221 A of 11 April 1996, 50/221 B of 7 June 1996 and 51/226 of 3 April 1997 and its decisions 48/489 of 8 July 1994, 49/469 of 23 December 1994 and 50/473 of 23 December 1995,

Lessons Learned Unit

The Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations in April noted the work being done by the Lessons Learned Unit of the Department of Peacekeeping Operations, established in 1995 to extract lessons from past and ongoing operations and recommend their application to improve the planning, management, conduct and support of ongoing and future operations, as well as to develop an institutional memory on peacekeeping operations. The Special Committee recommended that the Secretary-General seek stable and predictable financing for the Unit, and encouraged the Unit to continue to benefit from the experience of troop-contributing countries, and to use in its work conclusions resulting from their national experience acquired in the field. The work of the Unit should be distributed to Member States and to the Special Committee for consideration, which could contribute to its increasing effectiveness. In that regard, the Special Committee urged the Secretariat to provide completed studies in all official languages.

In his May report [A/51/890] on the support account, the Secretary-General recommended three new posts (one at the P-4, one at the P-2/1 and one at the General Service level) for the Lessons Learned Unit, to be funded from extra-budgetary resources.

ACABQ in May [A/51/906] did not recommend the establishment of the three new posts. The Advisory Committee stated that while recognizing the value to UN operations of conducting lessons learned reviews, it believed that all organizational units involved in backstopping peacekeeping operations should have a lessons learned function as their permanent responsibility.

The General Assembly, in resolution 51/239 A of 17 June, took note of the usefulness of the lessons learned capacity and requested the Secretary-General to submit, no later than 31 August 1997, for consideration during its resumed fifty-first session, proposals on resources and structure to strengthen its functions.

In response to that request, the Secretary-General submitted on 25 August a report [A/51/965] on the support account for peacekeeping operations: Lessons Learned Unit. He stated that the proposed structure of the Unit covered three functional areas: research and analysis and monitoring progress of the implementation of lessons learned; coordination and sharing of experiences with Member States and organizations concerned; and maintaining and strengthening institutional memory on peacekeeping. The Unit would be headed by the Chief of Unit, who would be assisted by a coordination officer and a research analyst. There would also be a Resource Centre which would be maintained by a research assistant. The Secretary-General said that the Unit was provided with two posts (one D-1 and one General Service post funded from the regular budget). A trust fund, established in 1995, provided funding for four additional posts (two at the P-4, one at the P-2/1 and one at the General Service level). It was expected that funding for those four posts would cease on 31 December. Following a comprehensive review of the Unit and a reassessment of its resource needs, he was convinced that the functions of the Unit could not be met from the two dedicated posts financed from the regular budget after the anticipated cessation on 31 December of voluntary funding, nor could the function be performed on an ad hoc basis by existing staff of other units in the Department of Peacekeeping Operations. He therefore was resubmitting his original request for the establishment of three new posts for the Unit to be funded from the support account for the period from 1 January to 30 June 1998, at an estimated cost of $132,250.

Speaking before the Fifth Committee [A/C.5/51/SR.73] on 10 September, the Chairman of ACABQ stated that the Advisory Committee still held the view that lessons learned functions were an integral part of the Organization's operations and should be an ongoing Secretariat-wide function. The proposed programme of work and organizational structure of the Unit were too ambitious and elaborate. The Unit should be a coordinating body, using in-house expertise and seeking additional expertise as required, as was already being done to a certain extent. Given the high vacancy rate in the Department of Peacekeeping Operations (12.8 per cent for Professional and 5.4 per cent for General Service posts), the largely coordinating nature of the Unit's functions, and the pool of experience and expertise available from returning mission personnel, ACABQ recommended that the requests for the Unit should be met through redeployment from within the complement of posts funded through the support account, rather than through the establishment of new posts.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 15 September [meeting 107], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/51/753/Add.3], adopted resolution 51/239 B without vote [agenda item 140 (a)].

The General Assembly,

Recalling paragraph 18 of its resolution 51/239 A of 17 June 1997,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the Lessons Learned Unit, the related statement by the Chairman of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions and the views expressed by Member States in the Fifth Committee,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the Lessons Learned Unit;
2. Also takes note of the observations and recommendations of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions and the vacancy rates of posts funded from the support account for peacekeeping operations, which, as at 31 August 1997, were 14.2 per cent for posts in the Professional category and above and 5.1 per cent for posts in the General Service category;
3. Notes the usefulness of the lessons learned capacity;
4. Decides to redeploy, on a temporary basis, for the period from 1 January to 30 June 1998, three posts, namely, two Professional posts (1 P-4, 1 P-2/1) and one General Service post, funded from the support account, to carry out the functions described in the report of the Secretary-General, and decides also to revert to this issue for consideration in future budget proposals.

Peacekeeping Reserve Fund

The Secretary-General, in a January report [A/51/778], provided information on the status of the Peacekeeping Reserve Fund, established by the General Assembly in resolution 47/217 [YUN 1992, p. 1022] as a cash-flow mechanism to ensure the Organization's rapid response to the needs of peacekeeping operations; its level was set at $150 million. As at 31 March 1996, the balance of the Fund was $94.7 million. Total receipts amounted to $94.7 million, including transfers ($89.3 million), interest income ($5.1 million) and voluntary contributions ($351,989). An amount of $60.7 million was still due to the Fund, to be transferred from the United Nations General Fund ($57.6 million), the United Nations Transition Assistance Group (UNTAG) in Namibia ($2.2 million) and the United Nations Iran-Iraq Military Observer Group (UNIIMOG) ($903,071). Loans to six peacekeeping operations had been repaid in full, and no additional loans had been made to any existing operations.

Concerning the assessment of new Member States for the Fund, the Secretary-General said that there was a serious question of interpretation of paragraphs (e) and (g) of Assembly resolution 47/217. Paragraph (g) of the resolution provided that States joining the United Nations after 23 December 1992, the date of the adoption of resolution 47/217, and without a claim to a share in the Fund should be assessed. Paragraph (e) assigned shares to Member States based on an ad hoc apportionment set out in resolution 45/247 [YUN 1990, p. 175]. A strictly literal interpretation of resolution 47/217 would exclude from participation in the Fund those Member States that had joined the Organization between 21 December 1990 and 23 December 1992. Of the 20 Member States in that category, 15 could be said to have a claim to a share in the Fund. As regards the five remaining nations (Democratic People's Republic of Korea, Marshall Islands, Micronesia, Republic of Korea and San Marino), the Secretary-General believed that the Assembly intended that the resolution should be applied to all States Members and, in that case, paragraph (g) would have to be applied to States that became Members prior to the adoption of resolution 47/217 but after the adoption of resolution 45/247.

Of the 27 Member States that had joined the Organization since 21 December 1990, 18 could be said to have a claim to a share in the Fund in respect of the amounts listed to the credit of Czechoslovakia, the USSR and Yugoslavia.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 17 June [meeting 102], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/51/753/Add.1], adopted resolution 51/218 E, section VI, without vote [agenda item 140 (a)].

Peacekeeping Reserve Fund

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Noting that its resolution 47/217 of 23 December 1992 does not include the twenty States which became Members of the United Nations after the adoption of resolution 45/247 of 21 December 1990 and before the adoption of resolution 47/217,

1. Decides to extend the application of resolution 47/217, by which it established the Peacekeeping Reserve Fund, to all States currently Members of the United Nations;

2. Notes that Armenia, Azerbaijan, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, the Czech Republic, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, the Republic of Moldova, Slovakia, Slovenia, Tajikistan, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan can be said to have a claim to a share in the Fund, as explained in the report of the Secretary-General;

3. Decides that, beginning on 1 January 1998 and no later than 30 June 1998, the shares in the Peacekeeping Reserve Fund of the following Member States shall be determined as follows:

(a) The Democratic People's Republic of Korea, the Marshall Islands, the Federated States of Micronesia, the Republic of Korea and San Marino shall contribute their shares to the Fund in accordance with the scale of apportionment for peacekeeping operations in effect on the date of their first assessment for United Nations peacekeeping operations;

(b) Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania shall contribute their shares to the Fund in accordance with the scale of apportionment for peacekeeping operations in effect on the date of their first assessment after 1 January 1998 for United Nations peacekeeping operations;

4. Also decides that interests accrued in the Fund shall not be credited to Member States holding shares in the Fund prior to the full capitalization of the Fund;

Voluntary contributions

In an April report [A/51/850] on considering the financing of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan (UNMOT), ACABQ noted that voluntary contributions were not clearly presented in the performance reports of that mission. It believed that voluntary contributions could be better articulated within proposed budgets and performance reports. The Advisory Committee recalled that the principle of full budgeting, approved by the General Assembly in resolution 43/230 [YUN 1988, p. 197] and resolution 44/192B [YUN 1989, p. 882], was not consistently applied. ACABQ indicated its intention to address the issue in a later report.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 17 June [meeting 102], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/51/753/Add.1], adopted resolution 51/218 E, section VII, without vote [agenda item 140 (a)].

Voluntary contributions

Recalling its resolutions on the financing of peacekeeping operations, in which it invites voluntary contributions to those operations in cash and in the form of services and supplies acceptable to the Secretary-General, to be administered, as appropriate, in accordance with the established procedure and practices,

Taking note of the intention of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions to address in a report the question of the articulation of voluntary contributions within proposed budgets and performance reports of peacekeeping operations,

1. Welcomes the intention of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions to address issues related to the administration of voluntary contributions to peacekeeping operations in a later report;

2. Requests the Advisory Committee to prepare its report on the administration of voluntary contributions to peacekeeping operations before 31 December 1997;

3. Decides to consider the report of the Advisory Committee during the first week of the first part of its resumed fifty-second session;

Unforeseen and extraordinary expenses

The General Assembly, by resolution 52/223 of 22 December, authorized the Secretary-General, without the prior concurrence of ACABQ, to enter into commitments not exceeding $5 million in any one year of the 1998-1999 biennium relating to the maintenance of international peace and security. If a decision of the Security Council resulted in the need for him to enter into commitments exceeding $10 million, that matter should be brought to the Assembly for consideration.

Reimbursement issues

Troop reimbursement

At its 1997 session [A/52/209], the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations expressed concern about continuing protracted delays in the reimbursement of troop contributors which were owed an estimated $1.2 billion. It requested the Secretary-General to accord high priority to the processing of pending claims.

In June, the General Assembly, in accordance with its decision 50/502, considered the 1996 report of ACABQ [YUN 1996, p. 34] on the subject. ACABQ had pointed out that information from the most recent survey of troop costs was outdated, and stated it was of the opinion that the Secretary-General should carry out a new survey before the Assembly took any action on reimbursement rates.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 17 June [meeting 102], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/51/753/Add.1], adopted resolution 51/218 E, section V, without vote [agenda item 140 (a)].

Rates of reimbursement

Recalling section III, paragraph 2, of its resolution 47/218 A of 23 December 1992,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

1. Endorses paragraph 12 of the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to carry out a new survey of troop-contributing States as suggested in paragraph 12 of the report of the Advisory Committee and to include in his report a complete analysis of all services being provided to troops, together with an indication of the rationale for the provision of each service and how those services are administered and accounted for;

3. Encourages all troop-contributing States to respond to the questionnaire sent out by the Secretary-General requesting information on military costs in effect as at 31 December 1996;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to keep this matter under review and to report thereon to the General Assembly;

Equipment

In 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 35], the Secretary-General had submitted to the General Assembly a draft contribution agreement between the Organization and States contributing resources to UN peacekeeping operations. ACABQ had noted the potential legal difficulties with the term "contribution agreement" and had recommended exploration of alternative terms and their legal implications for the United Nations.

Special Committee consideration. In April 1997 [A/52/209], the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations noted the introduction of the new contingent-owned equipment procedures, endorsed by the General Assembly in resolution 50/222 [YUN 1996, p. 35]. The Special Committee reiterated the need to implement in full the recommendations approved by the Assembly in that regard and to report to the competent bodies in detail on the experience of implementing the new procedures for further consideration of the issue.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 17 June [meeting 102], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/51/753/Add.1], adopted resolution 51/218 E, section I, without vote [agenda item 140 (a)].

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming Article 17 of the Charter of the United Nations in respect of the role of the General Assembly in the consideration and approval of budgets of the Organization,

Reaffirming also the requirement of all Member States to fulfil promptly and in full their obligations as set out in the Charter,

Recognizing the detrimental effect of the withholding of assessed contributions on the administrative and financial functioning of the United Nations,

Recognizing also that late payment of assessed contributions adversely affects the short-term financial situation of the Organization,

Recognizing further the need to improve the management of peacekeeping operations,

Desiring to streamline the administrative and budgetary aspects of the financing of peacekeeping operations,

Reiterating the importance of continuous dialogue and transparency between the Organization and Member States aimed at improving current administrative and budgetary practices and procedures,

I

Contingent-owned equipment

Recalling its resolution 50/222 of 11 April 1996 on the reform of the procedures for determining reimbursement to Member States for contingent-owned equipment, and the transitional arrangement,

Reaffirming the importance of proceeding with the implementation of the reformed procedures as called for in its resolution 49/233 A of 23 December 1994,

Taking note of the reports of the Phase II and Phase III Working Groups on Reimbursement of Contingent-owned Equipment and the related reports of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Also taking note of the clarification given by the Secretary-General on some aspects of the implementation of the new procedures as from 1 July 1996 and the transitional arrangement,

Further taking note of the Contribution Agreement between the United Nations and participating States contributing resources to United Nations peacekeeping operations,

Noting that there are inconsistencies between the reports of the Working Groups and the Contribution Agreement,

1. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure that the Contribution Agreement fully reflects the reports of the Phase II and III Working Groups on Reimbursement of Contingent-owned Equipment and to issue an appropriate corrigendum to the Agreement, and to implement, in full, all the decisions of the General Assembly;

2. Also requests the Secretary-General to convene the Phase IV Working Group prior to submitting his report on the first full year of implementation of the reformed procedures;

3. Further requests the Secretary-General to include in future cost estimates and performance reports of peacekeeping operations information on the factors mentioned in paragraph 49 of the report of the Phase III Working Group;

4. Reiterates that, for missions activated prior to 1 July 1996, countries have the option to accept reimbursement under either the new or the old reimbursement methodology;

Note of Secretary-General. In response to the Assembly's request, the Secretary-General submitted a 27 August note [A/51/967 & Corr.1,2] on the reform of procedures for determining reimbursement to Member States for contingent-owned equipment. He proposed that the term "contribution agreement" be replaced by the term "memorandum of understanding". Annexed to the note was a model memorandum of understanding between the United Nations and the participating State contributing resources to UN peacekeeping operations.

The observations of ACABQ on the Secretary-General's note were contained in its October report to the Assembly [A/52/4101].

Third-party claims

In 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 36], the Secretary-General had elaborated principles governing the scope of UN liability for activities of its forces, procedures for handling third-party claims and limitations of liability. The General Assembly had then requested [GA res. 51/13] him to develop specific measures, including criteria and guidelines for implementing those principles.

In response to that request, the Secretary-General, in May 1997, submitted a report [A/51/903] analysing the provisions of article 51 of the model status-of-forces agreement and the reasons for maintaining the procedure for settlement of disputes. He also elaborated criteria and guidelines for implementing the principles of financial and temporal limitations on the liability of the United Nations, and proposed modalities for establishing those limitations in a legally binding instrument. Annexed to the report was a standard form for the preparation and presentation of claims.

In his conclusion, the Secretary-General stated that the analysis of article 51 of the status-of-forces agreement had revealed that the advantages and disadvantages of a mechanism which had never been activated could not be effectively evaluated. In principle, however, the standing claims commission reflected the practice of the Organization under article 29 of the 1946 Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations [GA res. 22 A (I)], and until it was proved in practice to be ineffective it should be retained in the status-of-forces agreement as an option for potential claimants. The scope of application of temporal and financial limitations had been delineated. A time limit of six months for the submission of claims was proposed, from the time the damage was caused or was discovered by the claimant, and not later than one year after the termination of the mandate of the operation. In devising means of financial limitations, a distinction was drawn between personal injury, death or illness and property loss or damage, including non-consensual use of property. With regard to personal injury, it was suggested that compensable types of injury or loss should be limited to economic loss, such as medical and rehabilitation expenses, loss of earnings, loss of financial support, transportation expenses associated with injury, illness or medical care, and burial expenses; the compensation payable would not exceed a maximum ceiling of $50,000. With regard to property loss and damage, compensation for non-consensual use of premises should be calculated on the basis of a fair rental value in the local market prior to UN deployment, or a maximum ceiling amount payable per square metre or per hectare; compensation for loss or damage to premises should be calculated on the basis of the equivalent of a number of months of the rental value, or a fixed percentage of the rental amount. Compensation for personal property should cover the reasonable costs of repair or replacement. The proposed modalities for establishing those limitations in a legally binding manner were a General Assembly resolution, a liability clause in the status-of-forces agreement, and the terms of reference of the claims review boards. They would, respectively, provide for a legislative authority for limiting the liability of the Organization, a consensual basis for applying limited liability in the relationship between the Organization and host States, and a basis for the jurisdiction of the claims review boards in claims submitted by individuals against the Organization.

ACABQ, in its October report [A/52/410], recommended that the Assembly endorse the modalities for establishing the financial and temporal limitations in the legal binding instruments proposed by the Secretary-General and consider the adoption of a resolution stipulating those limitations. The Advisory Committee also recommended that should such a resolution be adopted, its implementation should be systematically monitored.

Financial management and management review

The General Assembly in June, at its resumed fifty-first session, considered a 1996 report of the Secretary-General [YUN 1996, p. 41] clarifying the concepts of a management review officer and a roving finance officer, and the observations of ACABQ thereon. The Secretary-General had proposed that trained personnel from Headquarters and other missions be temporarily assigned to new operations as roving finance officers, in view of the shortage of experienced civilian administrative staff.

On 17 June [meeting 102], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/51/753/Add.1], adopted resolution 51/218 E, section III, without vote [agenda item 140 (a)].

Management review officers and roving finance officers

Recalling section X, paragraph 3, of its resolution 49/233A,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Bearing in mind that accountability for peacekeeping programmes rests with authorities at Headquarters and in the field,

1. Calls upon the Secretary-General to establish procedures whereby the position descriptions of Secretariat personnel responsible for such financial operations in field missions as financial planning, financial management, operational support and review and control will include oversight for those specific missions, so that those personnel may perform the functions outlined in paragraph 7 of his report;

2. Also calls upon the Secretary-General to include the function of "troubleshooter", as outlined in paragraph 10 of his report, in the position description of staff members at Headquarters overseeing the functional area, so as to provide this service as needed by the various field missions;

3. Endorses the comments and recommendations of the Advisory Committee with respect to the concepts of roving finance officer and management review officer;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to include in the budgets of specific peacekeeping operations information on these functions, to be examined by the Advisory Committee and the General Assembly on a case-by-case basis;

Management of peacekeeping assets

Special Committee consideration. The Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations in April [A/52/209] urged the Department of Peacekeeping Operations to develop a coherent strategy for logistic support of peacekeeping operations. It expressed its concern that little progress had been made in implementing an inventory and materiel control system, in view of the cost to Member States of poorly managed peacekeeping assets. A comprehensive and clearly stated materiel management policy should be derived from the logistic support strategy, to guide the development of a workable system.

Assets management control system

In 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 38], the Secretary-General proposed an overall assets management strategy to overcome the difficulties associated with non-expendable property management, including the non-standard and uncoordinated implementation of asset control systems in each of the field missions. Accordingly, in a July 1997 report [A/51/957], the Secretary-General, responding to General Assembly decision 50/500 [YUN 1996, p. 41], outlined a proposed field assets control system and introduced plans for the development of a comprehensive field mission logistics system (FMLS).

The field assets control system would provide records and controls for non-expendable property, for the efficient management of expendable property and for special items of an attractive nature and property issued against property receipts. The system would use the Organization's global mission communications, data storage and transmission infrastructure, and take advantage of modern commercial groupware and bar coding technology for the integration and transfer of asset data between field missions and the Field Administration and Logistics Division. The system would interface with the Reality procurement system and IMIS. It would also assist in the preparation of reports on the disposition of assets of liquidated missions, in resolving discrepancies and in ensuring prompt issuances of receipt and inspection reports by recipient missions.

The Field Administration and Logistics Division was using the existing facilities in the Department of Peacekeeping Operations to implement the system, and had also deployed the system to the United Nations Logistics Base in June/July, where field testing and performance verification had been conducted. The system was expected to be installed and operational in all missions by June 1998. The report outlined the resource requirements for implementing the system.

The Secretary-General said that the Secretariat also intended to develop and progressively deploy additional logistics support systems to create an integrated, on-line FMLS to provide better accountability for contingent- and UN-owned equipment and UN-owned expendable supplies and to improve logistics responsiveness by automating administrative procedures. FMLS would be developed in-house by building on the groupware, data transmission network and electronic data-processing equipment already in place for the field assets control system.

ACABQ, in its September report [A/52/407], recommended that other UN departments be encouraged to utilize the field assets control system, thus ensuring an integrated approach for the entire Secretariat. Other UN funds and programmes should also have access to the system. The Advisory Committee also recommended that the Secretary-General be requested to indicate, in his submission on the support account for peacekeeping operations, the impact of the development of the system on the efficiency and productivity of the various peacekeeping missions.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 15 October [meeting 31], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/52/453], adopted resolution 52/1 A, section II, without vote [agenda item 142 (a)].

Management of peacekeeping assets: field assets control system

Recalling section VIII, paragraph 4, of its resolution 51/218 E of 17 June 1997,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the field assets control system and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, as well as the views expressed by Member States in the Fifth Committee,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the field assets control system;
2. Takes note also of the observations and recommendations contained in the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions;
3. Endorses the proposal for the development and implementation of the field assets control system described in paragraphs 4 to 22 of the report of the Secretary-General;
4. Notes the intention of the Secretary-General to continue to develop the field mission logistics system described in paragraphs 25 and 26 of his report, and decides to consider this question during the second part of its resumed fifty-second session.

UN Logistics Base

In accordance with General Assembly resolution 48/218 B [YUN 1994, p. 1362], the Secretary-General, by a February note [A/51/803], transmitted a report of the Office of Internal Oversight Services (OIOS) on the audit of the United Nations Logistics Base at Brindisi, Italy. The OIOS assessment showed that the Base had not fully met expectations in performing its functions of receiving, inspecting, repairing and sorting surplus assets from the closing or downsizing of missions, and maintaining a reserve of equipment in the form of mission-ready start-up kits. It had been unable to perform a technical evaluation of equipment stock, had not established proper inventory recording procedures and was able to provide only limited services to new and expanding missions. Much of the reserve stock of equipment and supplies was in poor condition and would have to be written off. Special administrative procedures needed to be established for reporting non-expendable equipment to Headquarters and for writing off unusable equipment and supplies. Mission-ready start-up kits remained incomplete, owing to the unavailability of material from reserve stock and the lack of funding to purchase new materials. In addition, the classification portion of the Materiel Management Project to address peacekeeping asset management problems was inadequately planned. It appeared that those problems resulted from an inadequate organizational structure and insufficient financial and human resources. To address them, OIOS recommended that: closing missions should provide accurate inventory data when shipping materials to the Base; the Base should determine the serviceability of materials and supplies by conducting technical reviews; the Base should give priority to high-value equipment when performing receipt and inspection functions; procedures for record-keeping and for write-off and disposal of used peacekeeping equipment should be simplified; only equipment expected to be used in future peacekeeping missions should be shipped to the Base; efforts to complete the start-up kits should be intensified; codification of assets should focus initially on non-expendable equipment in usable condition; and specific legislative approval should be obtained for any additional functions of the Base.

In his note, the Secretary-General stated that measures had been taken or initiated to correct many of the issues addressed in the review and concurred with the recommendations contained in the report.

The Secretary-General transmitted in September the comments [A/52/380] of the Joint Inspection Unit on the OIOS report.

Financing

The Secretary-General, on 19 May, reported [A/51/905] that budget estimates for the UN Logistics Base for the period 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998 totalled $ 14,503,900 gross ($13,952,000 net), which consisted of $10,220,700 gross ($9,744,500 net) for maintenance, and $4,283,200 gross ($4,207,500 net) for a one-time backlog clearance cost. That represented a net increase of $2,345,700 compared to cost estimates for the previous year. The budget provided for 23 international and 21 locally recruited staff and also covered alteration and maintenance of premises, spare parts, communications and other equipment, contractual services and freight. The report included a revised mission statement and organizational structure, clarification of the functions of the Base and a cost-avoidance analysis.

In terms of the continued economic operation of the Base, the Secretary-General proposed to adopt the principle of self-funding replenishment by charging field missions for services performed by the Base on their behalf. When a start-up kit was deployed in support of a new mission, the full cost of replacing all materiel would be charged to the new mission's budget. For non-start-up kit materiel, the cost of refurbishment and preservation would be charged to the liquidation budget, which would in future include provision equal to 30 per cent of the total depreciated value of the equipment to be transferred to the Base.

Because the workload of the Base would vary with the level of peacekeeping activity, the Secretariat intended to use general temporary assistance and contractual services to carry out repair, refurbishment and preservation work.

The Secretary-General also proposed a policy for the transfer of used assets to the Base, in accordance with the recommendations of OIOS. Transfers would be based on the principle of whether it was cost-effective to retain individual items, taking into account their condition, the cost of any repair or refurbishment and shipping cost, as well as their remaining useful life. Items shipped to the Base should in future have at least two years' useful life remaining and be either serviceable or repairable at not more than 30 per cent of their depreciated value. The Secretariat intended to include clauses in loan or donation agreements with the original contributor either to accept the return of equipment at the end of its use by the United Nations, or to agree to its transfer to whatever third party had actually operated it during its use by the United Nations. All assets transferred from missions and held by the Base were now recorded as assets of the Base, which would be responsible for their disposal. Any receipts from such disposal should be credited as miscellaneous income.

The Secretary-General proposed further, under the asset retention policy, to limit the Base's maximum holding of any given item to the quantity required for the mission start-up kits, plus two years' worth of projected use for that item. He recommended that the Assembly approve the cost estimates for the period from 1 July 1996 to 30 June 1997 [YUN 1996, p. 41], the estimates for the period from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998, and the policies on resourcing and on items transferred to the Base.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION (June)

On 17 June [meeting 102], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/51/753/Add.1], adopted resolution 51/218 E, section VIII, without vote [agenda item 140 (a)].

United Nations Logistics Base at Brindisi, Italy

[The General Assembly, . . .]

Recalling its decision 50/500 of 17 September 1996 and pending consideration of the reports of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Logistics Base at Brindisi, Italy,

1. Regrets the late submission by the Secretary-General of his report on the financing of the United Nations Logistics Base at Brindisi, Italy;

2. Decides to undertake a detailed review of the reports of the Secretary-General and the related reports of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and

Budgetary Questions on the Logistics Base at its fifty-second session, no later than 15 October 1997;

3. Authorizes the Secretary-General, in the interim period, from 1 July to 15 October 1997, to commit funds not exceeding the current level of expenditures for the last three months for the maintenance of the Logistics Base;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to finalize, in this context, the proposals on the management of United Nations peacekeeping assets and on the role of the Logistics Base.

ACABQ report. ACABQ, in its September report [A/52/407], recommended that the Assembly take the action recommended by the Secretary-General, including approval of the budget for the period from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998. It also recommended that the Secretary-General submit a more precise cost-benefit analysis of the value of the Base, with adequate statistics based on minimum running costs for the Base. He should propose different sources or modes of financing and look into other self-financing mechanisms besides those already proposed with regard to start-up kits and refurbishment. He should explore expanding the use of the Base by other UN agencies and programmes such as the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the World Food Programme.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION (October)

On 15 October [meeting 31], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/52/453], adopted resolution 52/1 A, section I, without vote [agenda item 142 (a)].

Procurement

Special Committee consideration. The Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations [A/52/209] encouraged the Secretariat to continue to enhance the transparency, efficiency and responsiveness of its procurement procedures and supported its intention to double the procurement vendor register, urging its publication and the dissemination of information on procurement procedures, including through UN information centres and offices. The principle of public bidding should be strictly observed, and reasons for exceptions to open, international, competitive bidding should be documented. The Committee emphasized the importance of the timely awarding of transport contracts and enforcement of penalty provisions for non-performance. It recommended that the delegation of procurement authority to field missions include civilian contracts, as well as the provision of military supplies up to an appropriate level.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

In resolution 51/231 of 13 June, the General Assembly, having considered the Secretary-General's 1996 reports [YUN 1996, pp. 38 & 39] on procurement reforms, expressed concern about the insufficient use of expertise in procurement planning in eight peacekeeping missions, including UNPROFOR and the United Nations Operation in Somalia, which had led to payment for aircraft services not utilized, assessed at $2.4 million in UNAVEM and $400,000 in UNOMIL.

The Assembly requested the Secretary-General to develop an intensified training programme for all procurement personnel of the Secretariat and all its offices, including field offices of peacekeeping operations, to develop the capacity to dispatch in a timely manner qualified and trained procurement personnel to new or expanded missions. It requested the Board of Auditors to report in the next audit report on peacekeeping operations, in January 1998, on the status of the implementation by the Secretary-General of its recommendations concerning the administration of letters of assist.

Personnel matters

Death and disability benefits

In 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 37], the Secretary-General had proposed an accidental death and disability insurance scheme for peacekeeping troops based on a schedule of awards and costed on a per troop/per month basis.

The General Assembly, at its resumed fifty-first session, in June 1997, considered the Secretary-General's proposals and the observations of ACABQ thereon.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION (June)

On 17 June [meeting 102], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/51/753/Add.1], adopted resolution 51/218 E, section II, without vote [agenda item 140 (a)].

Death and disability benefits

Reaffirming the principles enunciated in section III, paragraph 1, of its resolution 49/233 A and in paragraph 1 of its resolution 50/223 of 11 April 1996,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General and the related reports of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

1. Decides to adopt a system of self-insurance and to establish uniform and standardized rates for the payment of awards in cases of death or disability sustained by troops in the service of the United Nations peacekeeping operations, as follows:

(a) A one-time lump-sum award of 50,000 United States dollars for service-incurred death;

(b) A one-time lump-sum award for service-incurred disability, calculated as a percentage of the award for death according to the degree of loss of function, based on the schedule contained in annex I to the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Also decides that the uniform and standardized rates shall apply to cases of death and disability sustained by troops after 30 June 1997;

3. Further decides to continue the present system of budgeting and financing for death and disability compensation and to keep its functioning and use under review, taking into account actual experience in the implementation of the new uniform and standardized rates;

4. Reaffirms that the purpose of uniform and standardized rates for the payment of awards in cases of death and disability is to ensure equal treatment of all contingent troops;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to seek assurances from Member States that amounts payable to beneficiaries for incidents referred to in the present resolution shall be not less than the amounts paid or reimbursed to Member States for this purpose under paragraphs 1 (a) and (b) of the present section, so as to avoid unequal treatment of contingent troops by Member States;

6. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit a report to the General Assembly no later than 31 October 1997 containing detailed implementation proposals, including administrative and payment arrangements and procedures, as well as proposals for administrative resource reductions resulting from this new, simplified system;

7. Further requests the Secretary-General to continue processing all claims for death and disability compensation as expeditiously as possible for their speedy settlement;

The Assembly, in resolution 51/239 A of the same date, noted the information provided by the Secretariat that the current backlog of death and disability claims was 564, and requested the Secretary-General to report quarterly on progress in clearing the backlog.

The Secretary-General, in a September report [A/52/369], provided information on the proposed administrative arrangements for processing of death and disability claims for incidents occurring from 1 July 1997 onwards, and on resource requirements relating to the administration of those claims. With regard to staff resources, the Secretary-General stated that in addition to the P-2 post and a gratis military officer allocated for processing death and disability claims, the Assembly in resolution 51/239 A had approved his request for a P-4 and General Service post to strengthen the claims function, and an additional $158,500 under general temporary assistance, equivalent to 12 months for one P-3 and one General Service post, for processing the backlog of claims. As at 31 August 1997, 23 incidents of death and disability occurring after 30 June 1997 had been recorded. Since no action had been taken to process those claims, no experience had been gained to date on implementing the new procedures. It was recognized that the simplified procedures should result in a reduction in the number of staff at Headquarters assigned to deal with claims once the backlog under the old procedure had been eliminated. However, since that process was projected to take at least two years and in the absence of experience with regard to the new procedures, no immediate reduction or savings could be identified. The Secretary-General intended to implement the new procedures after the views of the Assembly had been received. Annexed to the report were copies of the notification-of-casualty form, the facsimile confirmation-of-death certificate, claim for death or disability of members of national military contingents, a note verbale submitted by a Government for death or disability of contingent troop members, a schedule of awards, confirmation of illness or injury and a UN letter of payment or reimbursement.

In October, the Secretary-General submitted the first progress report [A/52/538] on the processing of the backlog of death and disability claims up to and including 30 June 1997.

ACABQ, in its October report [A/52/410], recommended that the proposed administrative arrangements for processing death and disability claims, once approved by the General Assembly, should be reflected in a manual, and that their implementation should be systematically monitored. In that connection, there was a need for guidelines for determining what were not mission-incurred events and for a clear definition of what was considered an "accident" and an "incident". Concerning staff resources, the Advisory Committee recommended that, in order to ensure expeditious processing of backlog claims, adequate staff resources should be maintained, especially in view of Assembly resolution 51/243 on gratis personnel (see below). There was also a need for adequate publicity on claims procedures, including specific information on the filing period and on the UN office to be notified.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION (December)

On 18 December [meeting 76], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/52/453/Add.1], adopted resolution 52/177 without vote [agenda item 142 (a)].

Death and disability benefits

Recalling paragraph 6 of section II of its resolution 51/218 E of 17 June 1997,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on death and disability benefits and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, as well as the views expressed by Member States in the Fifth Committee,

Emphasizing the need for early settlement of death and disability claims,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on death and disability benefits;

2. Takes note also of the observations and recommendations of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions;

3. Authorizes the Secretary-General to implement without delay the administrative and payment arrangements and procedures contained in section II of his report for the payment of awards in cases of death and disability sustained by troops for incidents occurring after 30 June 1997;

4. Reiterates its request to the Secretary-General, in accordance with its resolution 51/218 E, to present, as soon as possible and not later than April 1998, proposals for administrative resource reductions resulting from this new simplified system;

5. Also reiterates its request to the Secretary-General to present, in his next report, information on the cost of the new self-insurance system;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to settle the death and disability claims as soon as possible but not later than three months from the date of submission of a claim;

7. Also requests the Secretary-General to continue, in the new system, to take into account, when considering all mission-related death and disability claims, that such injury or death should be compensable, unless such injury or death was caused by the gross negligence or wilful misconduct of the injured or deceased member of the contingent, and further requests the Secretary-General to include this notion in the aide-memoire for troop-contributing countries.

Subsistence allowance

The General Assembly, at its resumed fifty-first session in June, considered a 1995 report of the Secretary-General [YUN 1995, p. 313] on entitlements of staff assigned to peacekeeping missions, including mission subsistence allowance.

On 17 June [meeting 102], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/51/753/Add.1], adopted resolution 51/218 E, section IV, without vote [agenda item 140 (a)].

Mission subsistence allowance

Recalling section VIII of its resolution 49/233 A,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on entitlements of staff assigned to peacekeeping missions, including mission subsistence allowance, and the oral report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

1. Requests the Secretary-General to phase out over a period of six months the supplement to the mission subsistence allowance paid to senior officials;

2. Requests the International Civil Service Commission to develop, for submission to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session, a proposal to provide a post allowance and separate maintenance allowance for those personnel who leave their families at their home duty station while they are on mission assignment;

3. Requests the Secretary-General, as an interim measure pending a review of mission allowance criteria, to administer mission subsistence allowance on the basis of a seven-day, rather than a five-day, week;

Gratis personnel

The General Assembly, at its resumed fifty-first session in April, reviewed the Secretary-General's 1996 report [YUN 1996, p. 37] on gratis personnel provided by Governments and other entities. In its decision 51/466 of 3 April 1997, the Assembly requested the Secretary-General to: review the guidelines for accepting gratis personnel; update the information provided, including data on nationality, description of functions and change in their use after 31 October 1996; and submit a comprehensive report on the methodology and level for the application of administrative support costs. In May, the Secretary-General responded to those requests in three addenda [A/51/688/Add.1-3] to his 1996 report.

The General Assembly, in resolution 51/243 of 15 September, requested the Secretary-General to report on a quarterly basis on the acceptance of type II gratis personnel and annually on the use of gratis personnel, including their nationality, the duration of their service and functions performed.

In December [A/52/709 & Corr.1], the Secretary-General submitted his first quarterly report covering the period from 16 to 30 September 1997 and his annual report (see PART FIVE, Chapter III, for details).

Special Committee consideration. The Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations [A/52/209], noting the continuing and growing imbalance within the Department of Peacekeeping Operations between posts financed from the regular budget and the support account for peacekeeping and officers on loan, urged the Secretary-General to address the issue of the reliance on loaned and seconded personnel within the Department. It noted that relevant bodies of the Assembly remained seized of the issue and welcomed the request made to the Secretary-General, on an interim basis and pending further consideration and final decision on the issue, not to expand the number of loaned personnel currently implementing mandated activities. The Special Committee requested that it be kept informed on a regular basis on the issue of loaned personnel and the measures to correct the imbalance.

Other peacekeeping matters

Demining

Special Committee consideration. At its 1997 session [A/52/209], the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations welcomed the interest of the Security Council in the question of demining [YUN 1996, p. 42] in the context of peacekeeping operations. The Special Committee stated that operational mine clearance by peacekeeping operations was the responsibility of the Department of Peacekeeping Operations, particularly for the safety of peacekeeping personnel and the effectiveness of their tasks. It stressed that humanitarian mine-clearance activities should be conducted by the Department of Humanitarian Affairs, and reiterated the need for a more coordinated approach between the two Departments to avoid duplication and to ensure a coherent and integrated approach to short- and long-term demining needs. The Special Committee requested the Secretary-General to keep it informed of UN experience in demining in peacekeeping operations, taking into account inputs from those involved.

Cooperation with regional organizations

In his report on the work of the Organization [A/52/1], the Secretary-General noted that, in terms of preventive diplomacy, cooperation with regional organizations offered great potential. Close contacts with the Organization of African Unity (OAU) were a case in point, as were contacts with subregional organizations such as the Economic Community of West African States and the Southern African Development Community. The appointment of a joint UN/OAU Special Representative for the Great Lakes Region, Mohammed Sahnoun, whose mandate extended to other countries in Central Africa, was a further manifestation of that cooperation. Elsewhere, the United Nations continued to work closely with the Organization of American States, particularly in Haiti where the jointly fielded International Civilian Mission in Haiti (MICIVIH) continued to work. The same was true of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and the Council of Europe in the areas of human rights, electoral assistance, peacemaking and economic development. The Secretary-General said that the United Nations would continue to build upon those positive experiences to promote a more rational and cost-effective division of labour between the world Organization and regional entities.

Special Committee consideration. The Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations in 1997 [A/52/209] reaffirmed the important contribution regional arrangements and agencies could make to the maintenance of international peace and security. It emphasized that no enforcement arrangement should be taken under regional arrangements or agencies without the authorization of the Security Council, which should be kept fully informed of activities undertaken or contemplated for the maintenance of international peace and security. The Special Committee encouraged the strengthening of cooperation between the United Nations and regional arrangements and agencies to enhance the capabilities of the international community in the maintenance of international peace and security, and urged the Secretary-General to take concrete steps towards that end.

The Special Committee noted the successful experience of cooperation between the United Nations and a number of regional and subregional arrangements, and underlined the important role of OAU and its mechanism for conflict prevention, management and resolution and the need for enhancing consultation and cooperation with the United Nations to improve preparedness for conflict prevention and peacekeeping in Africa. The Special Committee recommended that the United Nations, in consultation with OAU and with the cooperation of Member States, give particular attention to strengthening OAU's institutional capacity, organizing training programmes for military personnel of African countries and mobilizing assistance, in particular logistical and financial support to African peacekeeping capacity and to OAU activities in conflict prevention, management and resolution. The Secretary-General was requested to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-second (1997) session on measures taken in that regard. He was also encouraged to continue to discuss cooperation in peacekeeping in his meetings on cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations and to develop working-level contacts with such organizations. He deferred his report to 1998.

Dag Hammarskjöld Medal

On 22 July [meeting 3802], the Security Council considered a draft resolution [S/1997/569], prepared in consultations among Council members, on the establishment of the Dag Hammarskjöld Medal.

Speaking before the Council, the Secretary-General said that the medal would provide a clear, focused and sympathetic way of honouring fully the memory of those women and men, military and civilian, including United Nations Volunteers, who had lost their lives in the service of peace in UN peacekeeping operations. The recognition of their valour and sacrifice was overdue. Since the Blue Helmets had been awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1988, there had been qualitative and quantitative changes in UN peacekeeping operations. Peacekeepers had been called upon to perform new tasks and were currently confronted by a broader and greater range of risks. More than 750,000 women and men from 110 countries had participated in UN peacekeeping over the years. The medal would honour both the lives of the more than 1,500 who had paid the ultimate price while serving under the UN flag, and the memory of a Secretary-General who himself had lost his life in the cause of peace.

The Council President, in a statement on behalf of the Council, said that, as members of the Council honoured those who had died in UN operations, they should never forget their own responsibility as Council members towards those participating in the operations whose mandates they established. The Security Council should continue to ensure the proper discharge of its mandates and take every possible measure to enhance the safety and security of all those serving the United Nations in conflict situations.

On 22 July, the Council adopted resolution 1121(1997) without vote.

Establishment of Dag Hammarskjöld Medal

The Security Council,

Recalling that maintenance of international peace and security is one of the purposes of the United Nations as set forth in the Charter,

Noting the essential role of United Nations peacekeeping operations in the maintenance of international peace and security,

Recalling also the presentation in 1988 of the Nobel Peace Prize to the United Nations peacekeeping forces,

Recognizing the sacrifice of those who have lost their life in the service of United Nations peacekeeping operations,

Remembering the more than 1,500 individuals from 85 countries who have died in United Nations peacekeeping operations,

1. Decides to establish the Dag Hammarskjöld Medal as a tribute to the sacrifice of those who have lost their life as a result of service in peacekeeping operations under the operational control and authority of the United Nations;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to establish, in consultation with the Security Council, criteria and procedures for bestowing and administering this Medal;

3. Requests Member States to cooperate, as appropriate, with the presentation of this Medal.

Fiftieth anniversary of peacekeeping

The Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations, recognizing that 1998 would mark the fiftieth anniversary of peacekeeping, recommended that the first day of the fifty-third (1998) session of the General Assembly be dedicated to a commemorative meeting to remember those who had served in peacekeeping operations, especially those who had lost their lives. It requested Member States and the Secretariat to arrange activities to commemorate the event and to honour those who had served in peacekeeping operations over the past 50 years.

Chapter II

Africa

During 1997, the continent of Africa continued to experience political instability and human suffering, despite some encouraging developments. Ethnic conflict affected many African nations, particularly those in the Great Lakes region. Throughout the year, the United Nations, mainly through the Security Council, attempted to address comprehensively the challenges facing all the nations of Africa by seeking peaceful solutions to conflicts within and between African States. The Organization collaborated frequently with regional and subregional bodies in efforts to resolve situations in such countries as Liberia, Sierra Leone and the former Zaire (the Democratic Republic of the Congo) and continued to assist the Angolan parties in consolidating peace and national reconciliation. On 25 September, the Council held its first ministerial meeting on Africa to assess the situation on the continent and to re-evaluate the role of the international community in support of Africa's goals. It requested the Secretary-General to submit in 1998 a report on the sources of conflict in Africa and ways to prevent and address those conflicts.

The overthrow of the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo in May and the massive exodus of refugees from that country, as well as from the United Republic of Tanzania, to Burundi and Rwanda created an unstable social, humanitarian and economic environment throughout the Great Lakes region. Rwanda witnessed an escalation of violence and fighting in certain parts of the country while Burundi's security situation remained unstable. The Council welcomed the decision by regional leaders to ease some of the sanctions imposed against Burundi since the July 1996 coup d'etat there. It also approved the appointments of a joint United Nations/Organization of African Unity Special Representative for the Great Lakes Region and of the Secretary-General's Representative and Regional Humanitarian Adviser for the region.

In the Central African Republic, concerted regional initiatives, supported by the United Nations, led to the signing of a peace agreement in January and to the deployment of an African peace-monitoring force—the Inter-African Mission to Monitor the Implementation of the Bangui Agreements (MISAB). The Security Council approved the MISAB mandate and authorized the intervention. Those peace efforts brought about a gradual improvement in the military and security situation in the country.

In Angola, despite the formation of a Government of national unity, military and political tensions continued to undermine the implementation of the 1994 Lusaka Protocol signed between the Government of Angola and the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA). The Council imposed sanctions against UNITA, and a gradual withdrawal of UN peacekeeping troops commenced.

Although the Republic of the Congo experienced factional conflict in 1997, causing UN agencies to evacuate their staff from Brazzaville, the capital, the situation had improved sufficiently by October for humanitarian staff to return to work.

In Liberia, the United Nations contributed to the fulfilment of the 1995 Abuja Agreement by bringing to completion, in cooperation with the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), the disarmament and demobilization of the Liberian factions. National elections and the establishment of a new Government followed.

The democratically elected Government of Sierra Leone was overthrown by a coup d'etat in May, and thousands of Sierra Leoneans fled to neighbouring countries, especially Guinea and Liberia. The Council, concerned with the security situation in the region, imposed sanctions against the military regime, which signed a peace agreement. However, little progress was made in its implementation by the end of the year.

Ethnic conflict continued to undermine political and security stability in Somalia, despite renewed efforts at the regional and international levels to bring about an end to years of fighting. In December, all major Somali leaders signed a declaration calling for, among other things, the establishment of a constitutional federal Government with regional autonomy and the holding of a national reconciliation conference in 1998.

In Western Sahara, the United Nations renewed its efforts towards the holding of a referendum on the self-determination of the Territory. Some progress was achieved in November when Morocco and the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguia el-Hamra y de Río de Oro (POLISARIO) held direct talks and agreed on a number of issues pertaining to the modalities of the referendum. The ceasefire continued to hold throughout the year.

The United Nations continued its efforts towards achieving sustainable peace and growth in a number of countries through the work of Special Envoys and Special Representatives of the Secretary-General and peacekeeping and observer missions. The United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO) continued throughout 1997. The mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III (UNAVEM III) expired in June and a new operation—the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola/Missão de Observação das Nações Unidas em Angola (MONUA)—was established in July. The mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia (UNOMIL), established in 1993, came to an end in September, and was replaced in November by the United Nations Peacebuilding Support Office in Liberia (UNOL). The United Nations was represented in Rwanda by the Human Rights Field Operation in Rwanda (HRFOR) and the Joint Reintegration Programming Unit, established in March by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) and the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP). The United Nations Political Office for Somalia (UNPOS) continued to operate in Nairobi, Kenya.

The International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighbouring States between 1 January and 31 December 1994 continued its work (see PART FOUR, Chapter II). A United Nations investigation was launched in July to examine alleged human rights violations in the Democratic Republic of the Congo since 1 March 1993.

The sanctions imposed against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya in 1992 in order to obtain Libya's cooperation in the release of two individuals suspected of involvement in a 1988 aircraft bombing over Lockerbie, Scotland, were upheld by the Council in 1997. The Council also expressed concern over repeated violations of the air flight restriction terms on the part of Libyan authorities. A French investigative team was allowed to visit Libya and to conduct an inquiry pertaining to a 1989 aircraft crash in the Niger.

Conflict prevention

On 25 September, the Security Council convened a meeting at the level of Foreign Ministers to consider the need for a concerted international effort to promote peace and security in Africa. The President of Zimbabwe and Chairman of the Organization of African Unity (OAU), Robert Mugabe, and the OAU Secretary-General, Salim Ahmed Salim, were invited to attend this first ministerial-level Council meeting on the situation in Africa.

In a Presidential statement following the meeting (see below), the Council expressed its grave concern at the number and intensity of armed conflicts on the African continent and requested the UN Secretary-General to submit, by February 1998, a report containing concrete recommendations regarding the sources of conflict in Africa, ways to prevent and address those conflicts and how to lay the foundation for durable peace and economic growth.

The Council had before it a 22 September letter [S/1997/730] from Argentina's Minister for Foreign Affairs, International Trade and Worship, in which he stated that the initiative to convene a ministerial-level meeting on Africa could not have been more timely: over 60 per cent of the Council's agenda was devoted to situations in Africa. In his view, the international community's response to Africa should consist of two dimensions: conflict prevention and settlement; and laying the groundwork for the elimination of the causes of such conflicts. In both cases, the cooperation of the parties involved was essential.

Addressing the Council, President Mugabe stated that in the area of peace and security, Africa's decision and determination to take greater responsibility for leadership in resolving African crises, including armed conflicts, were being pursued in full cognizance of the symbiotic relationship existing between African countries, OAU and the United Nations. The OAU members placed a premium on the establishment and maintenance of peace and security at the national, regional and continental levels for the achievement of sustainable economic growth and development. Conversely, they believed that the peace and security they ardently sought to achieve could not be attained in the conditions of abject poverty prevailing in Africa and were convinced that a politically stable, prosperous and vibrant Africa was the best place to contribute to great global peace and security. President Mugabe noted that since 1990 more than 20 African countries had held free and fair elections but they had not proved to be the panacea that some had hoped for. OAU had begun to take an unequivocal stand against military Governments or those that assumed power through undemocratic and unconstitutional regimes and it called on the international community to stand behind it in denying legitimacy to such regimes. The United Nations and the international community at large should assist African countries in ensuring that democracy became an irreversible process. The trends towards democratic governance and the rule of law needed to be buttressed economically if African countries were to enjoy the peace dividend following the end of the cold war. President Mugabe concluded by stating that Africa was not asking for charity but for a new partnership that was mutually beneficial. There was a growing interest in investing in and trading with Africa, which was welcomed and encouraged. As the frontiers of peace, democracy and stability broadened in Africa, a favourable environment for security and lucrative investments would undoubtedly grow.

The UN Secretary-General told the Foreign Ministers of the 15 Council members that many developments in Africa were positive, and it was timely and appropriate for the international community to examine how best to support and assist Africa at a time of change and hope. There was a new consensus that the primary responsibility for the solution of Africa's problems rested with Africans themselves, and that realization also called for a re-evaluation of the role of the international community in support of Africa's goals. In place of interventionism, it promised a mature relationship based on mutual support and trust and, in place of papers, studies and documents, offered the prospects of targeted assistance and support based on common goals and shared analysis. However, despite all the advances that had been made, armed conflict, political instability and retreats from democracy were still preventing some African countries from moving forward. In some African countries, nationalism was on the rise, with cleavages between ethnic groups as they battled as much for economic as for political power. Internal conflicts were threatening the cohesion, and even the survival, of those countries, said the Secretary-General. Security, he said, was no longer confined to preventing invasions but was built on a firm foundation of sustainable development. He therefore urged the developed countries to do all in their power to increase official development assistance to African countries. Although Africans had the primary responsibility to mobilize and maximize their internal resources, external financing, from both public and private sources, would continue to be of vital importance for years to come. The Secretary-General also cited the need for poverty alleviation strategies, an enabling environment for the private sector, diversification of economies and external debt relief. Development was a necessity in itself, he said, but it was also the only effective, long-term guarantee of lasting peace and security on the African continent.

Mr. Salim emphasized that the issues of peace, security and stability and the problems of economic development needed to be addressed simultaneously. The conflicts continuing to rage in some parts of Africa had caused irreparable loss, damage and destruction to the continent and its peoples. The members of the international community should recommit themselves to pooling resources and energy and working closely together in order to address the scourge of those conflicts and to promote a climate of peace, security, stability and understanding, he said.

On 25 September [meeting 3819], the President of the Security Council made the following statement [S/PRST/1997/46] on behalf of the members:

The Security Council met on 25 September 1997, at the level of Foreign Ministers, to consider the need for a concerted international effort to promote peace and security in Africa.

The Council reaffirms its commitment to Africa in keeping with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations. The Council also reaffirms the principles of political independence, sovereignty, and territorial integrity of all Member States.

The Council notes that African States have made significant strides towards democratization, economic reform, and respect for and protection of human rights in order to achieve political stability, peace, and sustainable economic and social development.

Despite these positive developments, the Council remains gravely concerned by the number and intensity of armed conflicts on the continent. Such conflicts threaten regional peace, cause massive human dislocation and suffering, perpetuate instability and divert resources from long-term development.

The Council reaffirms the responsibility of all Member States to settle their international disputes by peaceful means and its own primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations.

The Council welcomes the important contributions of the Organization of African Unity, including through its Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution, as well as those of sub-regional arrangements, in preventing and resolving conflicts in Africa, and looks forward to a stronger partnership between the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity, as well as subregional arrangements, in conformity with Chapter VIII of the Charter of the United Nations. The Council supports enhancement of the capacity of African States to contribute to peacekeeping operations, including in Africa, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations. The Council highlights the important contribution of the African Nuclear-Weapon-Free Zone Treaty to international peace and security.

The Council fully supports the engagement of the United Nations in Africa through its diplomatic, peacekeeping, humanitarian, economic development and other activities, which are often undertaken in cooperation with regional and subregional organizations. The United Nations makes an important contribution to the efforts of Africa to construct a future of peace, democracy, justice and prosperity. The Council underlines the importance of the commitment of the United Nations through the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and other humanitarian organizations to assist the efforts of African States to address humanitarian and refugee crises in accordance with international humanitarian law.

The Council considers that the challenges in Africa demand a more comprehensive response. To this end, the Council requests the Secretary-General to submit a report containing concrete recommendations to the Council by February 1998 regarding the sources of conflict in Africa, ways to prevent and address these conflicts, and how to lay the foundation for durable peace and economic growth following their resolution. Because the scope of this report may extend beyond the purview of the Security Council, the Council invites the Secretary-General to submit his report to the General Assembly and other relevant bodies of the United Nations for action as they deem appropriate, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations.

The Council affirms its intention to review promptly the recommendations of the Secretary-General with a view to taking steps consistent with its responsibilities under the Charter of the United Nations.

Great Lakes region

The situation in the Great Lakes region of Africa remained turbulent in 1997. A contributing factor to the instability in the eastern part of the former Zaire, which became the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC) on 17 May, was the presence of large numbers of Rwandan refugees who had fled their country following the 1994 genocide. At the end of 1996 and in early 1997, due to the armed conflict in the region, some 800,000 refugees returned to Burundi and Rwanda from what was then Zaire and from the United Republic of Tanzania. That mass repatriation caused severe reintegration problems in the home countries.

Before the fall of Mobutu Sese Seko in May, Zaire accused the neighbouring countries of Burundi, Rwanda and Uganda of assisting and harbouring the forces of the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo-Zaire, which was then carrying out an armed rebellion against the Government. Rwanda, on the other hand, accused Zaire of assisting armed militiamen and ex-soldiers who had been involved in the 1994 genocide and of enlisting them to fight alongside the regular army.

In January, Mohammed Sahnoun was appointed as the Joint United Nations/Organization of African Unity (OAU) Special Representative for the Great Lakes Region. In December, Mr. Sahnoun was named the Secretary-General's Special Envoy in Africa, to follow developments in Central Africa, including the Great Lakes region. Berhanu Dinka was appointed the Secretary-General's Representative and Regional Humanitarian Adviser for the Great Lakes Region.

Political situation

Special Representative

By a 22 January letter [S/1997/73], the Secretary-General informed the Security Council that he and the OAU Secretary-General had agreed that Mohammed Sahnoun (Algeria) would be an excellent candidate for the post of Joint United Nations/OAU Special Representative for the Great Lakes Region and sought the Council's agreement to the proposal.

The Special Representative's tasks would be: to use his good offices to promote peaceful settlements of the various conflicts in the region, with special reference initially to the situations in eastern Zaire and Burundi; to prepare an international conference on peace, security and development in the region, as endorsed by the Council in resolution 1078(1996) [YUN 1996, p. 47]; and to use his good offices to help preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Zaire and to help restore that country's national institutions, including through support for the electoral process. In carrying out those tasks, the Special Representative would work closely with the Governments in the region and other parties concerned and would cooperate with special envoys and other mediators appointed by international organizations and Member States in an endeavour to provide guidance and leadership to a coordinated international effort to address the region's problems.

By a 24 January letter [S/1997/74], the Security Council President informed the Secretary-General that the Council agreed with the proposal to appoint Mr. Sahnoun.

On 12 December [S/1997/994], the Secretary-General sought the Council's concurrence for a new mandate for Mr. Sahnoun, as well as for a new political and humanitarian presence for the United Nations in the Great Lakes region. He proposed that Mr. Sahnoun be his Special Envoy in Africa, in which capacity he would continue to follow closely developments in Central Africa, including the Great Lakes region. He would also lend his support to existing peacemaking and peace-building initiatives there and give special attention to Burundi.

The Secretary-General further proposed the appointment of Berhanu Dinka as his Representative and Regional Humanitarian Adviser for the Great Lakes Region. He would monitor developments in the region and their implications for peace and security, and seek to contribute to regional efforts in the prevention or peaceful settlement of conflicts. With specific regard to Burundi, he would oversee the political activities of the United Nations and support ongoing political initiatives both inside and outside the country. As Regional Humanitarian Adviser, Mr. Dinka would represent the Emergency Relief Coordinator in the Great Lakes region, facilitate the coordination of humanitarian assistance, support the resident coordinators, humanitarian coordinators and agency heads, and coordinate resource mobilization efforts at the regional level. Mr. Dinka would establish an office in Nairobi, Kenya.

The Security Council President, by a 19 December letter [S/1997/995], informed the Secretary-General that the Council supported his proposals with regard to the new mandates for Mr. Sahnoun and Mr. Dinka.

Peace negotiations

By an 18 February letter [S/1997/136] to the Security Council President, the Secretary-General referred to the mission of Special Representative Sahnoun, who was in Kinshasa, Zaire, at that time. He noted that the Special Representative was working on a five-point peace plan, which was based on the Council President's statement of 7 February (see below, under "Democratic Republic of the Congo"), which he hoped would be accepted by all parties. The points were: immediate cessation of hostilities; withdrawal of all external forces, including mercenaries; reaffirmation of respect for the national sovereignty and the territorial integrity of Zaire and other States of the Great Lakes region; protection and security for all refugees and displaced persons and facilitation of access to humanitarian assistance; and rapid and peaceful settlement of the crisis through dialogue, the electoral process and the convening of an international conference on peace, security and development in the Great Lakes region.

Numerous initiatives were reported under way to restore peace in eastern Zaire; the Foreign Ministers of Kenya, South Africa and the United Republic of Tanzania were already in Kinshasa and those of Cameroon, the Congo and Zimbabwe were to arrive there on 18 February, as was the OAU Secretary-General, the Secretary-General said. It would greatly assist the Special Representative's efforts if the Security Council were to give urgent consideration to acknowledging and supporting his initiative.

By resolution 1097(1997) of 18 February (see below, under "Democratic Republic of the Congo"), the Council reiterated its support for the joint UN/OAU Special Representative in the fulfilment of his mandate and endorsed the five-point peace plan. The Council called on all Governments and parties concerned to cooperate with the Special Representative to achieve lasting peace in the region.

On 5 March [S/1997/197], the Secretary-General notified the Security Council President that Special Representative Sahnoun had been informed that the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs of Zaire, Gerard Kamanda wa Kamanda, had issued a statement in Paris formally declaring his Government's acceptance of the five-point peace plan. In that statement, a copy of which the Secretary-General attached to his letter, the Deputy Prime Minister requested the immediate deployment of an international monitoring mechanism to implement the peace plan and to conduct on-site verification of the withdrawal of all foreign troops, including mercenaries and militias. The Secretary-General expressed the hope that all the other parties would declare their adherence to the plan so that attention could be turned to the task of devising its implementation.

On 10 March [S/1997/207], Zaire transmitted to the Security Council President a memorandum given to Mr. Sahnoun during his visit to Kinshasa in February. It stated that the solution of the crisis in eastern Zaire and the restoration of Zaire's authority over the provinces that had been subject to aggression was an indispensable condition for any solution to the crisis in the Great Lakes region. With regard to the Special Representative's mission, Zaire noted that it was out of the question to recognize the persons whom neighbouring aggressor countries had armed against it. The conflicts in the Great Lakes region were not limited to Zaire and Burundi alone. The serious Tutsi-Hutu crisis in Rwanda was at the root of all the upheaval in the region and there was a serious conflict between the Ugandan Government and its internal armed opposition, a conflict that had been used as a pretext for attacking Zaire. The Tutsi-Hutu conflict in Rwanda and Burundi and the Hima-Baganda conflict in Uganda had been exported to Zairian territory, even though Zaire had not experienced that problem. Until a just and lasting solution to those conflicts was found, it would be difficult to restore peace and stability in the Great Lakes region. Zaire had always advocated the idea of an international conference on the crisis in the Great Lakes region, which should take an integrated approach to the protection of refugees and the provision of assistance for their reintegration into society. It was gratified that the Security Council was reconsidering the idea.

Regional meetings

By a 29 January letter [S/1997/94], Kenya transmitted to the Security Council President the text of a communique issued following the meeting of the Foreign Ministers of Cameroon, the Congo, Kenya, South Africa, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zimbabwe on the situation in the Great Lakes region. The meeting, held in Pretoria, South Africa, on 27 and 28 January, was a follow-up to two regional summits on the crisis that had been held in November and December 1996 [YUN 1996, pp. 52-53]. Kenya's Minister for Foreign Affairs, Stephen K. Musyoka, briefed participants on discussions held on 6 January between President Daniel Arap Moi of Kenya and President Mobutu Sese Seko of Zaire.

The meeting reaffirmed its complete support for the national sovereignty and territorial integrity of Zaire and called on all countries and organizations to refrain from military involvement in the conflict. The Foreign Ministers agreed to visit Zaire, at the earliest opportunity; that visit would be followed by similar visits to Burundi, Rwanda and Uganda in search of a lasting solution to the crisis in the Great Lakes region.

On 19 March, Kenya brought to the attention of the Security Council President the communique [S/1997/238] of the Summit of the Nairobi II Committee on the Crisis in the Great Lakes Region. The Summit of the Committee, as mandated by the Nairobi II Summit of 16 December 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 53], met in Nairobi on 19 March to pursue the peace initiative on eastern Zaire. It expressed grave concern at the rapidly deteriorating situation in eastern Zaire, urged all parties to facilitate access for humanitarian assistance, and invited all UN agencies and other humanitarian organizations to provide that assistance. The Summit reaffirmed the urgent need to implement the OAU/UN peace plan provided for in Security Council resolution 1097(1997), welcomed the acceptance of the plan by Zaire, and took note of the acceptance in principle by the other party (the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo-Zaire). The Summit urged all parties to the conflict to accept and implement the peace plan unconditionally. It underscored the importance of establishing a mechanism for monitoring the implementation of the peace plan, and stressed the importance of Africa making its own significant contribution to that mechanism. The Summit invited the Central Organ of the OAU Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution to address the issue at its March meeting.

Togo transmitted to the Secretary-General on 2 April a letter [S/1997/269] from its Minister for Foreign Affairs and Cooperation, annexed to which was the statement adopted at the first special session of the Conference of Heads of State and Government of the Central Organ of the OAU Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution (Lomé, 26-27 March). The Central Organ reiterated its grave concern about the continuing deteriorating security, political, socio-economic and humanitarian situation in the Great Lakes region, especially the armed conflict in eastern Zaire. It recommended to the Security Council the setting up, in co-operation with OAU, of a mechanism for monitoring the implementation of the peace plan on Zaire, as endorsed in Security Council resolution 1097(1997), and requested the Secretaries-General of both organizations to undertake consultations to that end. The Central Organ underscored the importance of convening an international conference on peace, security, stability and development in the Great Lakes region under the auspices of OAU and the United Nations.

Gabon, on 7 August [A/52/283-S/1997/644], transmitted the report of the ninth ministerial meeting of the United Nations Standing Advisory Committee on Security Questions in Central Africa (Libreville, 7-11 July) (see PARTONE, Chapter VII). The Committee welcomed the calming of the situation in the DRC and welcomed the improvement in the overall situation in Burundi. With regard to the great efforts made by States of the region to receive refugees, the Committee urged the countries of origin to establish conditions to facilitate the return of the refugees to their own countries in dignity and security.

The crisis in the Great Lakes region was also discussed at regional meetings on the Burundi conflict (see below).

Refugee situation

The United Nations continued to be confronted by the challenges of reintegrating refugee returnees throughout the Great Lakes region, especially in Burundi and Rwanda, following the mass repatriation that took place at the end of 1996 and early in 1997 from the former Zaire and the United Republic of Tanzania. In addition, the Organization was attempting to ensure protection and find solutions for the remaining tens of thousands who had chosen not to be repatriated.

In September [A/52/360], the Secretary-General reported that some 726,000 Rwandan refugees had returned to their country from eastern Zaire in November and December 1996. Since that exodus and another in the first part of 1997 had been precipitated by another outbreak of conflict in the region, it was more of a life-saving exercise than a traditional repatriation operation. As the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo-Zaire advanced, the refugees dispersed further west. Between January and June 1997, almost 170,000 refugees were repatriated to Rwanda, mainly from Zaire.

In the United Republic of Tanzania, the repatriation movement of more than 500,000 Rwandan refugees in December 1996 and January 1997 followed a sudden departure of refugees from the camps towards the interior of the country, a movement that was redirected to Rwanda by the security forces. At the beginning of July, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees was taking care of 408,000 refugees in the United Republic of Tanzania, some 309,000 of whom were from Burundi and some 95,000 from the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC).

In a later report [A/53/328], the Secretary-General stated that the flight of Rwandan refugees from their country in 1994 in the aftermath of genocide had given rise to protection and security problems of exceptional gravity. The camps in the DRC and the United Republic of Tanzania harboured not only genuine refugees but also many of the perpetrators of the 1994 Rwandan genocide (including the remnants of the former Rwandan Government and armed forces), all close to the border of their country of origin. The inability or failure of the international community and of host Governments to effect the separation of criminals and armed elements from refugees had contributed to regional instability and to the outbreak of the civil war in the DRC.

The reintegration of returnees presented a special challenge in the Great Lakes region, given the legacy of genocide in Rwanda and the persistence of conflict in Rwanda, Burundi and the eastern part of the DRC, the Secretary-General stated. Successful reintegration required not only material assistance but also measures to promote justice and, eventually, the reconciliation of former refugees with the other members of their home communities.

Democratic Republic of the Congo (Zaire)

In May 1997, after years of inter-ethnic violence in Zaire, troops loyal to Laurent-Désiré Kabila, leader of the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo/Zaire (AFDL), occupied the capital city of Kinshasa, ending President Mobutu Sese Seko's regime. Soon afterwards, Mr. Kabila proclaimed himself President and the name of the country was changed from the Republic of Zaire to the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC).

In August, a United Nations investigative team was deployed in the DRC with the objective of investigating violations of human rights and international humanitarian law committed in the DRC (formerly Zaire) territory since 1 March 1993.

Prior to the fall of the Mobutu regime, the Security Council had repeatedly expressed concern over reports of serious violations of human rights in the region, including massacres. It convened a number of times and called for parties to the conflict to ensure the safety of all refugees and displaced persons, underlining the obligation of those concerned to respect relevant aspects of international humanitarian law.

After President Kabila assumed power, the Security Council welcomed the end of the fighting in the DRC and continued to call for the protection and security of all refugees and displaced persons and for access and safety for humanitarian relief workers.

In July 1997, the Secretary-General appointed Robin Kinloch (United Kingdom) as his Special Representative for the DRC.

Background

The Secretary-General provided [S/1998/581] a comprehensive background to the events affecting the situation in eastern Zaire (see YUN 1996, pp. 55-59), particularly with regard to the provinces of North Kivu and South Kivu.

North Kivu province

Before the arrival of Rwandan refugees in 1994, the ongoing ethnic conflict in North Kivu pitted the Banyarwanda, both Hutus and Tutsis, against those calling themselves "autochtones" (indigenous inhabitants), mainly the Hunde, Nyanga and Tembo. The Banyarwanda—who in 1997 constituted about 75 per cent of the province's population—speak Kinyarwanda, which is also the national language of Rwanda.

Among the Banyarwanda, Hutus outnumbered Tutsis by a large margin. Resentment over land issues and the predominant role of the Banyarwanda in the economic life of the region made the autochtones increasingly hostile towards the Banyarwanda. Some feared that recognition of the Banyarwanda's right to Zairian nationality would further undermine the position of the original inhabitants of the area.

A law adopted in 1972 had granted Zairian nationality to all persons of Rwandan origin who had established residence in Zaire prior to 1 January 1950. However, in 1981, new legislation rescinded that recognition of nationality and, in effect, made most Banyarwanda stateless. As from 1982, Banyarwanda were no longer allowed to vote or to stand as candidates in elections.

In March 1993, Nyanga and Nande militia groups launched attacks against the Banyarwanda population in North Kivu. The Banyarwanda created their own militias and counter-attacked the autochtones. Negotiations, with the participation of church groups and civil leaders as well as representatives of the ethnic communities, brought about a tenuous peace in July 1993.

In July 1994, more than 700,000 Rwandan Hutus fled to North Kivu, after the Tutsi-led Rwandese Patriotic Front (RPF) captured Rwanda's capital, Kigali. Between April and July 1994, a massive genocide took place against Tutsis, and moderate Hutus were also killed, by the predominantly Hutu Habyarimana regime.

Political divisions began to emerge among the Banyarwanda following the 1994 genocide and coup in Rwanda, with Zairian Hutus allying themselves with the Hutu refugees, isolating the Tutsi population even more and making it vulnerable to attacks by the new Hutu alliance, as well as by the autochtones. The Tutsis were then labelled as foreigners, and some were expelled to Rwanda.

The arrival of thousands of former Rwandan soldiers and militia members led to an escalation in clashes between ethnic groups. Whereas the weapons used previously had been mainly machetes and other farming implements, some Rwandan Hutus now possessed automatic firearms.

Zairian troops, who were deployed in 1995 and 1996 to put an end to the carnage, took sides with the various protagonists instead and, in effect, operated as mercenaries, fighting for the faction that made the highest offer, it was reported.

Beginning in mid-1994, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) established five large camps in North Kivu to deal with the mass exodus of Rwandan Hutus. Some were soldiers tied to the former Rwandan Government; others were members of the Interahamwe militia that had allegedly participated in the 1994 Rwandan genocide.

Zaire provided refuge to the supporters of the fallen Government of Rwanda. The Zairian army disarmed soldiers and militia members when they crossed the border, but arms quickly reappeared in camps dominated, in many cases, by the same leaders responsible for the genocide. In violation of international standards, Zaire allowed the camps to be established close to the border, where they posed a continuing threat to Rwandan security, and made no effort to comply with its obligation to separate those guilty of genocide and crimes against humanity from genuine refugees, it was reported.

The Interahamwe and officials and soldiers of the former Rwandan Government maintained strict control over the camp population and access to food and other essentials, refusing to allow repatriation to Rwanda. Humanitarian workers were threatened and subjected to physical violence. By late 1996, AFDL rebels, with support from the Rwandese Patriotic Army, attacked and disbanded all the camps in North Kivu, with the aim of forcing the refugees to return to Rwanda, thus eliminating the risk of cross-border raids on Rwandan territory by the military and paramilitary forces based in the camps.

An estimated 500,000 to 600,000 Rwandans had returned to Rwanda by 20 November 1996. Many others who fled the fighting in a westward direction, away from Rwanda, were killed in the surrounding hills. It was estimated that hundreds, if not thousands, of displaced camp residents were killed by AFDL during the remaining months of 1996 and in early 1997.

After the break-up of the camps in North Kivu in late 1996, AFDL and its allies, including the Rwandan army, pursued a policy of forcible return of Rwandan Hutus to Rwanda well into 1997.

South Kivu province

The provinces of South Kivu and North Kivu are bordered by the nations of Rwanda and Burundi, to the east. Bukavu is South Kivu's capital.

As in North Kivu, tensions between the Banyamulenge—Rwandan Tutsis who migrated to Zaire between the sixteenth and eighteenth centuries—and other ethnic groups deteriorated during the 1980s as a result of the measures taken to deprive them of Zairian nationality and their property. Inter-ethnic tensions in South Kivu were further exacerbated by the refugee crises of 1993 and 1994. The first wave of refugees came from Burundi in October 1993, following the assassination of Burundi President Melchior Ndadaye, a Hutu. The assassination provoked widespread massacres as the Hutus fought the Tutsis, who were blamed for the death of the President. Tens of thousands of Burundi Hutus crossed into South Kivu, most settling in refugee camps.

In mid-1994, Burundi refugees were joined in those camps by thousands of Rwandan Hutus. By September 1996, refugees in South Kivu totalled an estimated 300,000, most in some 20 camps supported by UNHCR.

After the enactment in April 1995 of a law preventing Rwandan and Burundi refugees from acquiring Zairian nationality, the situation of the Banyamulenge became increasingly insecure. By October 1996, hundreds of Banyamulenge had been forcibly expelled to Burundi and Rwanda.

A United Nations Investigative Team (see below) declared that those developments had reinforced the determination of the Banyamulenge to resist attempts to expel or persecute them and nourished the perceived need for a strong militia [S/1998/581]. Killings were attributed to Banyamulenge militia.

Reports of massive killings of non-combatants began to emerge as a result of the military offensive mounted by AFDL troops in mid-October 1996, and persisted as the war between AFDL and the government forces intensified. Following attacks on refugee camps during the AFDL offensive, many camp inhabitants fled westward. In December 1996 and January 1997, AFDL attacked new camps that had been set up, killing thousands.

Developments in 1997

Between February and May 1997, attacks took place against a number of refugee camps set up in the interior of the DRC to receive those who had fled the attacks on camps in North and South Kivu. It was reported that tens of thousands of Rwandan Hutus had disappeared as a result.

Communications (January/February). Zaire, in a 6 January letter [S/1997/13] to the Security Council President, declared that the problems of displaced persons, populations affected by the war and refugees were still afflicting the country, and that the number of refugees in Zaire now exceeded 800,000.

Zaire stated that its borders had been violated by Rwanda, Burundi and Uganda, and that it would consider discussing security, the circulation of persons and goods, and good-neighbourliness and stability in the region only after the withdrawal of all foreign occupation forces from its territory.

Zaire called on the Security Council to take the necessary steps to deal with the situation, and declared that the decision by the Council to halt the deployment of a multinational force in Zaire in December 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 51] had resulted in the establishment of new refugee camps.

Uganda, in a 30 January communique [S/1997/97], called statements about its alleged involvement in eastern Zaire false and baseless. Developments in eastern Zaire were internal problems, it said, and Zaire had to address them by identifying the root causes of the armed conflict rather than using Uganda as a scapegoat. President Museveni of Uganda had been in regular contact with President Mobutu Sese Seko of Zaire, exploring ways in which Uganda could contribute to efforts that would bring about stability. Uganda said it did not support the break-up of Zaire and wanted to reassure the international community that it had no soldiers involved in eastern Zaire.

In a 1 February letter [S/1997/98], Zaire reported attacks in its eastern provinces by Ugandan and Rwandan troops. It declared that it had the right to recover its territories, while stressing that it had neither hegemonic intentions nor territorial designs on neighbouring countries. Zaire requested the Security Council to recognize the aggression and to adopt measures to compel Uganda, Rwanda and Burundi to withdraw their troops unconditionally from Zairian territory.

Rwanda, on 4 February [S/1997/109], categorically denied any involvement in the Zairian internal crisis. It asked if it was not Zaire itself that had triggered the national crisis when it passed legislation that denationalized its own citizens and subsequently threatened them with expulsion from their own country during 1995 and 1996. Rwanda cited UNHCR estimates that 1.3 million refugees from the United Republic of Tanzania and Zaire had returned to Rwanda since the outbreak of fighting in October 1996. Rwanda stated there were no more Rwandan refugees in eastern Zaire, as the doors had been opened for all Rwandans to return home.

On 7 February [S/1997/116], Burundi denied that its soldiers were present on Zairian territory. It stated that its army had more than enough to do within its national territory, and that it had no interest in interfering in the internal problems of any of its neighbouring countries.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (7 February)

The Security Council on 7 February [meeting 3738], after consultations among its members, authorized the President to make the following statement [S/PRST/1997/5] on its behalf:

The Security Council expresses its grave concern at the deteriorating situation in the Great Lakes region, in particular eastern Zaire, and at its humanitarian consequences on the refugees and inhabitants of the region. It calls for an end to the hostilities and the withdrawal of all external forces, including mercenaries.

The Council also expresses its deep concern over the humanitarian crisis in the region and urges all parties to allow humanitarian agencies and organizations access to deliver humanitarian assistance to those in need. It also demands that the parties ensure the safety of all refugees and displaced persons, as well as the security and freedom of movement of all United Nations and humanitarian personnel. It underlines the obligation of all concerned to respect the relevant provisions of international humanitarian law.

The Council reaffirms its commitment to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Zaire and other States in the Great Lakes region; and to the principle of the inviolability of borders. In this connection, the Council calls upon all the States in the region to refrain, in accordance with their obligations under the Charters of the United Nations and the Organization of the African Unity, from any act, including cross-border incursions, which would threaten the sovereignty and territorial integrity of any State and exacerbate the situation in the region, including endangering refugees and displaced persons. It also calls upon those States to create the conditions necessary for the speedy and peaceful resolution of the crisis.

The Council expresses its full support for the joint United Nations/Organization of African Unity Special Representative for the Great Lakes region, Mr. Mohammed Sahnoun, in the fulfilment of his mandate as set out in the letter of the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council dated 22 January 1997. It urges all parties in the region to cooperate fully with the mission of the Special Representative in the search for a peaceful settlement to the crisis and calls upon Member States to provide the Special Representative with all necessary support including logistical support. It also encourages other facilitators and representatives of the regional organizations, including the European Union and the States concerned, to coordinate closely their efforts with those of the Special Representative.

The Council reaffirms the importance of holding an international conference on peace, security and development in the Great Lakes region under the auspices of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity.

The Council welcomes all efforts, including those of the organizations and States of the region, aimed at resolving the crisis, in particular the initiative of President Daniel Arap Moi of Kenya and other heads of State, and encourages them to continue their efforts.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Communication (16 February). In a 16 February communiqué [S/1997/138], Zaire stated that the strategy of those committing aggression against its territory, namely Rwanda, Uganda and Burundi, consisted in exporting the Tutsi-Hutu inter-ethnic conflict into Zaire and exterminating the Hutu refugees on Zairian soil on the grounds that they had committed genocide. That was the explanation not only for the attacks by the regular armies of those countries against the refugee camps, but also for the mass graves discovered in a number of locations.

Zaire requested the Security Council to meet urgently in order to examine its complaint against Uganda and Rwanda; to issue a strong condemnation of the aggression to which Zaire was being subjected; to order the withdrawal of the foreign troops from Zairian territory; to establish the monitoring mechanisms required for that purpose; to take appropriate measures to put an end to the extermination of the Hutu refugees in Zaire; and to remove all the Rwandan refugees from its territory.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (18 February)

On 18 February [meeting 3741], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1097(1997). The draft [S/1997/137] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Gravely concerned at the deteriorating situation in the Great Lakes region, in particular eastern Zaire, and expressing serious concern over the safety of refugees and displaced persons whose lives are in danger,

Welcoming the letter dated 18 February 1997 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Council regarding progress in the efforts to resolve the crisis in the Great Lakes region,

Reaffirming the statement of 7 February 1997 by the President of the Council, Reaffirming also the obligation to respect national sovereignty and territorial integrity of the States of the Great Lakes region and the need for the States of the region to refrain from any interference in each other's internal affairs,

Underlining the obligation of all concerned to respect strictly the relevant provisions of international humanitarian law,

Reiterating its support for the joint United Nations/Organization of African Unity Special Representative for the Great Lakes region in the fulfilment of his mandate, and underlining the need for all Governments in the region and the parties concerned to cooperate fully with the mission of the Special Representative,

1. Endorses the following five-point peace plan for eastern Zaire, as set out in the letter from the Secretary-General of 18 February 1997:

(a) Immediate cessation of hostilities;

(b) Withdrawal of all external forces, including mercenaries;

(c) Reaffirmation of respect for the national sovereignty and the territorial integrity of Zaire and other States of the Great Lakes region;

(d) Protection and security for all refugees and displaced persons and facilitation of access to humanitarian assistance;

(e) Rapid and peaceful settlement of the crisis through dialogue, the electoral process and the convening of an international conference on peace, security and development in the Great Lakes region;

2. Calls upon all Governments and parties concerned to cooperate with the joint United Nations/Organization of African Unity Special Representative for the Great Lakes region to achieve lasting peace in the region;

3. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Other communications (February/March).

Uganda, in an 18 February letter [S/1997/146] to the Security Council President, stated that there were no Ugandan soldiers in Zaire and that it had no intention of sending troops into Zairian territory. Uganda was ready to discuss with Zaire agreements of non-aggression or any other mutually acceptable mechanism. Furthermore, Uganda was prepared for and welcomed international monitors at the border and any other confidence-building measures that would contribute to the search for peace in the region.

On 27 February [S/1997/171], Zaire transmitted its reply to Uganda's 30 January communique (see above), stating that Uganda was developing a policy that seriously threatened peace and security in the region. It also noted that it had not invited either the refugees or former members of the Rwandan Armed Forces into its territory. Zaire called on the Security Council to ensure the repatriation of Rwandan and Burundi refugees and to impose an embargo on the supplying of arms to Uganda, Rwanda and Burundi.

In a 19 February memorandum [S/1997/178] to the UN/OAU Special Representative for the Great Lakes Region, Mohammed Sahnoun, Rwanda stated that since September 1996 Zaire had been the scene of a civil war between AFDL and the Mobutu regime. The motives that had given rise to the conflict included the extension of the Rwandan genocide into eastern Zaire, the arbitrary withdrawal from some inhabitants of Zaire of the right to nationality, and the attempt to drive those inhabitants from their land. Rwanda noted that refugee status had been improperly accorded to the perpetrators of genocide. In early 1996, militiamen and ex-soldiers of the regime in power in Rwanda before July 1994 were abusing and even massacring some Zairian citizens, such as the Kinyarwanda-speaking Banyamulenge group, while Kinshasa authorities stood idly by, Rwanda stated. Those militiamen, when they fled Rwanda, forced hundreds of thousands of refugees into exile by force of arms.

As early as March 1996, Rwanda had started to receive waves of Zairian refugees fleeing the massacres in North Kivu province. Embarrassed by the turn of events since February 1996, some Zairian authorities had tried to trump up charges of involvement on the part of neighbouring countries in a conflict which was strictly between Zairians, Rwanda declared.

With the revolt of the Banyamulenge, it appeared that the Zairian authorities were engaging in massacres of their own population. It was at that time, Rwanda stated, that Zaire had to justify its official involvement by means of an imaginary external threat. Since then, Rwandan ex-soldiers had become fully involved in the Zairian civil war and had continued to fight alongside the Zairian army. It was in those circumstances that hundreds of thousands of refugees held hostage by the same Rwandan militiamen were able to return en masse to their country of origin. Those in charge of the camps, said Rwanda, were occupied elsewhere, or even rendered helpless by the consequences of the civil war.

On 5 March, the Secretary-General, by a letter [S/1997/197] to the Security Council President, provided a statement by the Government of Zaire by which it formally accepted the five-point peace plan set out in Security Council resolution 1097(1997) on 18 February (see above). In the statement, Zaire requested the immediate deployment of an international monitoring mechanism in order to implement the peace plan and to conduct on-site verification of the withdrawal of all foreign troops, including mercenaries and militias.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (7 March)

On 7 March [meeting 3748], the President of the Security Council made the following statement on behalf of the Council [S/PRST/1997/11]:

The Security Council expresses its grave concern at the deteriorating situation in the Great Lakes region, in particular in eastern Zaire. It underlines the urgent need for a comprehensive and coordinated response by the international community in support of the efforts of the joint United Nations/Organization of African Unity Special Representative for the Great Lakes region to prevent any further escalation of the crisis there.

The Council reiterates, in that respect, its full support for the five-point peace plan for eastern Zaire contained in its resolution 1097(1997) of 18 February 1997, and welcomes the endorsement of that plan by the Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity at its sixty-fifth ordinary session, held at Tripoli from 24 to 28 February 1997.

The Council welcomes the declaration of the Government of Zaire of 5 March 1997 regarding its acceptance of the United Nations peace plan endorsed by the Security Council in its resolution 1097(1997).

The Council calls upon the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo/Zaire to declare publicly their acceptance of resolution 1097(1997) in all its provisions, in particular an immediate cessation of hostilities, and calls on all parties to implement its provisions without delay.

The Council is concerned about the effect that the continued fighting is having on the refugees and inhabitants of the region, and calls upon all parties to allow access by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and humanitarian agencies to refugees and displaced persons and to guarantee the safety of refugees and displaced persons as well as United Nations and humanitarian aid workers. It also takes note with concern of allegations of violations of international humanitarian law in the conflict zone, and welcomes the sending of a United Nations fact-finding mission to the area.

The Council reiterates its full support for the joint United Nations/Organization of African Unity Special Representative for the Great Lakes region, and urges all Governments in the region and all the parties concerned to cooperate with him fully. It also urges the parties to the conflict to begin, under his auspices, a dialogue in order to achieve a lasting political settlement.

The Council welcomes all efforts, including those of the organizations and States of the region, aimed at resolving the crisis, including the initiative of President Daniel Arap Moi of Kenya to convene another regional meeting in Nairobi on 19 March 1997 and the initiative of the Organization of African Unity to organize a summit of the members of the Central Organ of the Organization of African Unity Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution on the Great Lakes region in Lome before the end of March 1997. The Council encourages other facilitators and representatives of the regional organizations, including the European Union and the States concerned, to coordinate closely their efforts with those of the Special Representative.

The Council reaffirms the importance of holding an international conference on peace, security and development in the Great Lakes region under the auspices of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity.

The Council expresses its gratitude to the Secretary-General for keeping it informed of developments in the Great Lakes region, and requests him to continue to do so on a regular basis.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter.

Additional communications (March/April).

In a 10 March letter [S/1997/207] to the Security Council President, Zaire submitted a memorandum that it had presented to UN/OAU Special Representative Sahnoun during his first visit to Kinshasa in February 1997 (see above, under "Great Lakes region"). Zaire said it was in a state of transition towards the establishment of a democratic State governed by the rule of law. That transition period was expected to climax in the holding of general elections, preceded by the adoption by referendum of a new Constitution. Zaire added that there was a serious Tutsi-Hutu crisis in Rwanda, which was at the root of all the upheaval taking place in the region, and there was another serious conflict between the Ugandan Government and its internal armed opposition, a conflict used as a pretext for attacking Zaire.

Kenya, on 19 March [S/1997/238], forwarded a communique issued that day by the Summit of the Nairobi II Committee on the Crisis in the Great Lakes Region, expressing grave concern over the deteriorating situation in eastern Zaire (see "Great Lakes region").

In a 2 April letter [S/1997/269] to the Secretary-General, Togo transmitted the text of a statement adopted at the conclusion of the first special session of the Conference of Heads of State and Government of the Central Organ of the OAU Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution, held in Lome on 26 and 27 March, devoted to the situation in eastern Zaire (see "Great Lakes region"). Togo also submitted the text of a communique issued at the conclusion of a meeting between the representatives of the Government of Zaire and of AFDL, in which the parties reiterated their commitment to accept the principles of a ceasefire and negotiations.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (4 April)

The Security Council on 4 April [meeting 3762], after consultations among its members, authorized the President to make the following statement [S/PRST/1997/19] on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council reiterates its deep concern about the alarming situation of refugees and displaced persons in eastern Zaire.

The Council underlines the obligation of all concerned to respect the relevant provisions of international humanitarian law.

The Council, while noting that some cooperation has recently been extended to humanitarian relief agencies by the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo/Zaire, strongly urges the parties, and in particular the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo/Zaire, to ensure unrestricted and safe access by United Nations agencies and other humanitarian organizations to guarantee the provision of humanitarian assistance to, and the safety of, all refugees, displaced persons and other affected civilian inhabitants.

The Council also urges the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo/Zaire to cooperate fully with the United Nations in the implementation of the repatriation plan for eastern Zaire of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. In this context, it calls on the Government of Rwanda to facilitate the implementation of this plan.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter.

Communications (9-18 April). In a 9 April letter [S/1997/293] to the Security Council President, Zaire transmitted a communique on the discussions in Pretoria, South Africa, from 5 to 8 April between representatives of the Government of Zaire and of AFDL. Though the parties had different views on the nature and origin of the crisis in Zaire, it was stated that they agreed to bring about a peaceful, political solution to the conflict through a complete cessation of hostilities and other measures consistent with the implementation of the UN/OAU peace plan. Both parties expressed their commitment to the principles of territorial integrity, inviolability of borders and the unity and sovereignty of Zaire within recognized international borders. They also underlined the need for fundamental and democratic change in Zaire. In that regard, they concurred on the need for a process of transition leading to fair and inclusive elections which would be organized and supervised by an independent body and monitored by the international community.

On 18 April [A/52/118-S/1997/325], the Netherlands transmitted to the Secretary-General a statement made on 10 April by the Presidency of the European Union, expressing concern over the latest political developments in Zaire and hope that order in its capital would be maintained in a peaceful manner. As fighting proceeded in different parts of the country, the Union appealed to all parties to respect the rights of the civilian population, to ensure the safety of foreign citizens and, if necessary, to facilitate their evacuation.

On 24 April [meeting 3771], the President of the Security Council issued the following statement [S/PRST/1997/22] on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council is increasingly alarmed at the deterioration of the situation in Zaire and at the humanitarian consequences this is having on the refugees, displaced persons and other affected civilian inhabitants. It expresses its deep concern at the lack of progress in efforts to bring about a peaceful and negotiated settlement of the conflict in Zaire.

The Council once again underlines the obligation of all concerned to respect the relevant rules of international law, including those of international humanitarian law.

The Council is dismayed by the continued lack of access being afforded by the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo/Zaire to United Nations and other humanitarian relief agencies, and by the recent acts of violence which have hampered the delivery of humanitarian assistance. It reiterates the statement of its President of 4 April 1997 and in particular calls in the strongest terms upon the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo/Zaire to ensure unrestricted and safe access by all humanitarian relief agencies so as to allow the immediate provision of humanitarian aid to those affected, and to guarantee the safety of humanitarian relief workers, refugees, displaced persons and other affected civilian inhabitants in the areas which the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo/Zaire controls.

The Council also expresses its concern at the obstruction of the repatriation plan of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees for eastern Zaire. It calls upon the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo/Zaire and the Government of Rwanda to cooperate fully and without delay with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to enable the early implementation of the plan.

The Council is particularly alarmed by reports of massacres and other serious violations of human rights in eastern Zaire. In this context, it calls upon the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo/Zaire and others concerned in the region to cooperate fully with the recently established United Nations investigative mission by ensuring unimpeded access to all areas and sites under investigation, as well as the security of the members of the mission.

The Council reiterates its full support for the United Nations five-point peace plan, which it endorsed in its resolution 1097(1997) of 18 February 1997. It calls for an immediate cessation of hostilities and calls upon the Government of Zaire and the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo/Zaire to engage seriously and fully in the search for a speedy political solution to the problems in Zaire, including transitional arrangements leading to the holding of democratic and free elections with the participation of all parties. In this context, it calls upon the President of Zaire and the leader of the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo/Zaire to meet as soon as possible.

The Council warmly commends the efforts of the joint United Nations/Organization of African Unity Special Representative for the Great Lakes region. It calls upon all States, in particular those in the region, to support these efforts and to refrain from any action that would further exacerbate the situation in Zaire.

The Council reaffirms once again the importance of holding an international conference on peace, security and development in the Great Lakes region under the auspices of the United Nations and Organization of African Unity.

The Council expresses its gratitude to the Secretary-General for keeping it informed of developments in the Great Lakes region, and requests him to continue to do so on a regular basis.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Communication (27 April). In a 27 April letter [S/1997/337] to the Security Council President, Zaire said that 1,500 troops of the Angolan Armed Forces had grouped in a border location with the clear intention of invading Zairian territory in support of AFDL. Zaire requested the Council to take urgent measures to ensure the implementation of the five-point peace plan contained in resolution 1097(1997) of 18 February, and welcomed the decision taken by the Commission on Human Rights to send an international commission of inquiry to eastern Zaire.

Reports of involvement by the Angolan parties in the Zairian conflict had been discussed by the Secretary-General, during his visit to Angola in March 1997, with Angolan President Jose Eduardo dos Santos and with Jonas Savimbi, leader of the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA). Both had denied that they were supporting the warring parties in Zaire, as noted in a 14 April report of the Secretary-General [S/1997/304].

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (30 April)

At a meeting of the Security Council on 30 April to discuss the situation in Zaire [meeting 3773], the President made the following statement [S/PRST/1997/24] on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council reaffirms the statement of its President of 24 April 1997 and welcomes the recent agreement by the President of Zaire and the leader of the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo/Zaire on a time and venue for a meeting to discuss a peaceful and negotiated settlement of the conflict in Zaire. It reiterates its full support for the United Nations five-point peace plan, endorsed by its resolution 1097(1997) of 18 February 1997, calls for an immediate cessation of hostilities, and especially calls for both parties to reach a rapid agreement on peaceful transitional arrangements leading to the holding of democratic and free elections with the participation of all parties.

The Council notes the commitment by the leader of the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo/Zaire to allow United Nations and other humanitarian agencies access to refugees in eastern Zaire in order to provide humanitarian assistance and to implement the repatriation plan of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, including the use of both airports in Kisangani. It also notes his commitment to be flexible regarding the duration of the repatriation operation, which should move ahead as quickly as possible. It expresses concern at reports of obstruction of humanitarian assistance efforts, but notes that humanitarian access has improved recently. It calls on the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo/Zaire to abide by these commitments and to enable the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees repatriation plan to be implemented without conditions or delay.

The Council also expresses its deep concern regarding the continuing reports of massacres, other atrocities and violations of international humanitarian law in eastern Zaire. In this context, it reiterates its call upon the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo/Zaire and others concerned in the region to cooperate fully with the recently established United Nations investigative mission by ensuring unimpeded access to all areas and sites under investigation, as well as the security of the members of the mission. It attaches great importance to the commitment of the leader of the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo/Zaire to take appropriate action against members of the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo/Zaire who violate the rules of international humanitarian law concerning the treatment of refugees and civilians.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Change of government

In a 9 May letter [A/51/894-S/1997/363] to the Security Council President, Gabon presented the Libreville Declaration on the situation in Zaire, issued at a summit meeting of the Central African heads of State held on 8 May in Libreville, Gabon. Among other things, the heads of State noted that Zaire President Mobutu Sese Seko, for health reasons, would not stand for re-election, thus opening up new prospects for a negotiated political settlement in that country. They called on Zairian political forces to proceed to the election of their President so as to allow for the normal functioning of institutions and to promote an orderly and democratic transition (see also "Great Lakes region").

On 17 May, there was a change of regime in Zaire, following the occupation by AFDL troops of the capital city of Kinshasa. The name of the country was changed from the Republic of Zaire to the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), and Laurent-Désiré Kabila, AFDL leader, assumed the office of President.

Communications (May). In a statement of 22 May [A/52/164-S/1997/422], the Presidency of the European Union (EU) said that the Union was encouraged by the fact that the change in government in Kinshasa had taken place without widespread fighting. The EU looked forward to the implementation of President Kabila's commitments to convene a constituent assembly within 60 days and to hold elections within two years, but it regretted that the investigative mission of the UN Commission on Human Rights had been prevented from visiting the country (see below).

In a 21 May statement [A/52/176-S/1997/442], the Congo took note of the accession to power of the new political authorities of the DRC, and expressed its readiness to support their efforts at reconstruction within a democratic context. The Congo also welcomed efforts made by the new authorities of the DRC to avoid a social and political climate of revenge. The Congo appealed to the international community to enable it to cope with the massive influx of refugees into its territory and thus create conditions for their return to their countries of origin.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (29 May)

The Security Council President, on 29 May [meeting 3784], made the following statement [S/PRST/1997/31] on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council expresses its support for the people of the Democratic Republic of the Congo as they begin a new period in their history. The Council respects the legitimate national aspirations of the people of the Democratic Republic of the Congo to achieve peace, national reconciliation and progress in the political, economic and social fields to the benefit of all, and opposes any interference in its internal affairs.

The Council recalls its resolution 1097(1997) of 18 February 1997, which endorses the United Nations five-point peace plan.

The Council welcomes the end of the fighting, and expresses its satisfaction that stability has begun to return to the country.

The Council reaffirms the national sovereignty and the territorial integrity of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and calls for the withdrawal of all external forces, including mercenaries.

The Council, in accordance with the United Nations five-point peace plan, calls for the rapid and peaceful settlement of the crisis through dialogue and the convening of an international conference on peace, security and development in the Great Lakes region. The Council also reaffirms the statement of its President of 30 April 1997 calling for rapid agreement on peaceful transitional arrangements leading to the holding of democratic and free elections with the participation of all parties.

The Council believes that the convening of an international conference on peace, security and development in the Great Lakes region under the auspices of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity will be essential in promoting regional peace and stability.

The Council, in accordance with the United Nations five-point peace plan, calls for protection and security for all refugees and displaced persons and facilitation of access to humanitarian assistance. It reiterates its call for full respect for the rights of refugees and displaced persons, and for access and safety for humanitarian relief workers. It also reiterates in the strongest terms its call for complete co-operation with the United Nations mission investigating reports of massacres, other atrocities and violations of international humanitarian law in the country, including to provide it full and immediate access and to ensure its security. It is particularly concerned by reports that refugees in the east of the country are being systematically killed. It calls for an immediate end to the violence against refugees in the country.

The Council expresses its deep appreciation to the Secretaries-General of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity and their Special Representative, to the Government of South Africa, and to all those inside and outside the region for their efforts to facilitate a peaceful solution to the crisis in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

Joint investigative mission

On 15 April, the Commission on Human Rights decided to establish a joint investigative mission to investigate allegations of massacres and other issues affecting human rights which had arisen from the situation prevailing in eastern Zaire since September 1996.

On 3 May, the mission was sent to Kigali, Rwanda, with the expectation that it would be able to enter Zaire. However, AFDL raised a number of objections to the team's membership and the time period proposed for the investigation. Consequently, the mission was prevented from entering Zairian territory.

In a 2 July report [A/51/942], the mission, based on oral and written testimony obtained while waiting in Kigali for authorization to visit Zaire, observed that massacres and other serious human rights violations had taken place in eastern Zaire. In particular, the report noted indiscriminate attacks on refugee camps, the systematic blockade of humanitarian assistance intended for refugees camps, measures of intimidation against the refugees, and a policy of war without quarter. (For further information on the report, see PART TWO, Chapter III.)

UN Investigative Team

Following the collapse of the Mobutu regime on 17 May 1997, the Secretary-General and President Kabila met on 3 June at the OAU summit in Harare, Zimbabwe, and agreed on the importance and urgency of an investigation into reports of grave violations of human rights and international humanitarian law. An advance UN team arrived in Kinshasa on 20 June for talks on the practical modalities necessary for the investigation to be carried out.

The Secretary-General established the UN Investigative Team in July to help break the deadlock between the Government of the DRC and the joint investigative mission mandated by the Commission on Human Rights. The Team's mandate, as stated by the Secretary-General in a 15 July letter to President Kabila, was to investigate gross violations of human rights and international humanitarian law committed in the DRC from 1 March 1993, and to collect and analyse information, testimony and other evidence to establish facts and responsibilities in gross violations.

On 1 August [S/1997/617], the Secretary-General informed the Security Council President that he had decided to appoint Atsu-Koffi Amega (Togo) and Andrew R. Chigovera (Zimbabwe) to be, respectively, the Chairman and a member of the Team. On 8 August, Reed Brody (United States) was named as the third member of the Team [S/1997/633]. The Council President, in letters of 6 August [S/1997/618] and 12 August [S/1997/634], took note of the appointments.

In a statement issued on 13 October [S/1997/799], the DRC stated that the fall of the Mobutu regime represented a milestone in the stabilization of the Great Lakes region. That stability would remain fragile, however, unless and until all violations of human rights perpetrated on the Congolese people and on the people of the region were accounted for in a comprehensive manner. As such, all episodes of human rights abuses had to be investigated through a comprehensive inquiry. The DRC called on all concerned regional forces to participate actively in that endeavour and to create the necessary mechanism for the inquiry to take place.

Special Representative

On 17 July [S/1997/571], the Secretary-General informed the Security Council that he would appoint Robin Kinloch (United Kingdom) as his Special Representative for the DRC. The President of the Council, on 22 July [S/1997/572], stated that the Council welcomed that decision.

Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination

On 20 August, the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination adopted a decision [A/52/18 (dec. 3(51))] on the DRC, in which it expressed alarm about reports of the disappearance of large numbers of refugees and of massacres and other human rights violations. The Committee decided to remain seized of the situation.

End-of-year developments

Communications (October-December). In a 13 October letter [S/1997/790] to the Security Council President, the DRC stated that the city of Kinshasa had been subjected to sporadic mortar fire from the city of Brazzaville, capital of the Congo. In order to prevent any escalation of the situation, the DRC called on the Security Council to help in halting the crisis and to restore harmony in the region.

In a 16 December letter [S/1997/985], the DRC stated that the situation in its territory was becoming rather tense; a refugee camp had been attacked by elements of the former Rwandan Armed Forces and the Interahamwe armed militias, causing over 1,600 deaths, the wounding of some 200 persons and the disappearance of over 1,150 more. According to accounts provided by witnesses, most victims were Congolese. The DRC called on the Security Council to convene in order to discuss the massacre and to establish a favourable atmosphere for restoring security and tolerance in the region.

Rwanda

During 1997, Rwanda was faced with serious difficulties caused by the massive voluntary repatriation of its refugee citizens, mainly from the eastern region of the Democratic Republic of the Congo (the former Zaire). The outflow of refugees from Rwanda followed civil unrest and the large-scale massacre of between 500,000 and 1 million persons between April and July 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 282], while their sudden voluntary return, which began in November 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 66], was caused by fighting between rebel and government forces in the eastern part of the former Zaire. The economic and social problems associated with the return and reintegration of 1.35 million refugees, compounded by persistent and deteriorating security conditions, challenged the Government of Rwanda and humanitarian organizations alike.

The human rights situation in Rwanda (see PART TWO, Chapter III) was closely linked to the deteriorating security situation, particularly in the north-western region of the country. Attacks against both civilian and military targets carried out by armed groups—made up of elements of the former Rwandese Armed Forces (ex-FAR) and former Interahamwe militia who participated in the genocide—escalated during the year, following the mass return of refugees from the former Zaire and the United Republic of Tanzania. Attacks by armed groups further intensified as of October 1997; victims included genocide survivors, returnees who had taken refuge in neighbouring countries and Congolese Tutsi refugees. The Rwandese Patriotic Army (RPA) responded with large-scale counter-insurgency operations, during which significant numbers of persons, including unarmed civilians, were killed.

Although the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda (UNAMIR) was phased out in 1996, the United Nations maintained a presence in the country through the Human Rights Field Operation in Rwanda (HRFOR) and the Joint Reintegration Programming Unit, established in March 1997 by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) and the United Nations Development Programme. In addition, the International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighbouring States between 1 January and 31 December 1994 continued its work (see PART FOUR, Chapter II).

Humanitarian situation

Significant progress was made in providing humanitarian assistance in Rwanda in 1996 and 1997 despite the enormous needs confronting the Government and the international community, said the Secretary-General in a November report to the General Assembly [A/52/568]. The massive return of refugees between November 1996 and September 1997 represented one of the largest single voluntary repatriation movements in African history (see PART THREE, Chapters III and XII, for details on humanitarian assistance and assistance to refugees, respectively).

The Government of Rwanda was embarking upon an extensive rehabilitation agenda and believed that reintegration and reconstruction programmes were more relevant to the needs of the country than relief assistance programmes. The principal constraint on the delivery of humanitarian assistance was the insecurity that continued in the north and north-west in particular, and especially in the Gisenyi and Ruhengeri prefectures. Travel by humanitarian workers was frequently prohibited, resulting in reduced access and a less than regular delivery of much-needed aid to the vulnerable groups in those areas. The murder of eight UN staff members clearly impeded the delivery of humanitarian assistance, and without the presence of aid workers it was difficult to ascertain the exact humanitarian needs of the population and to deliver essential relief items. The Government endeavoured to help through the provision of military escorts, which were obligatory for missions sent by humanitarian organizations to the more insecure prefectures in the country.

It was clear, said the Secretary-General, that Rwanda's greatest challenge was coping with the legacy of the 1994 genocide. A promising start was made on reintegration programmes but substantial additional resources and a cessation of violence and sustained reconciliation initiatives were required for reintegration to succeed.

Repatriation and refugees

Between November 1996 and September 1997, over 1.3 million Rwandan refugees returned to their home country, due largely to the increased political turmoil in the eastern region of the former Zaire. Over 850,000 refugees returned from the former Zaire and approximately 500,000 from the United Republic of Tanzania. Despite efforts to locate and repatriate the remaining Rwandan refugees, UNHCR estimated that over 200,000 refugees remained unaccounted for in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (see PART THREE, Chapter XII, for further details).

Human rights situation

In response to General Assembly resolution 51/114 [YUN 1996, p. 688], the Secretary-General submitted an October note [A/52/486], with a later addendum [A/52/486/Add.1/Rev.1], transmitting the report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights on HRFOR. The High Commissioner provided an update of the human rights situation in Rwanda since November 1996, noting the massive return of Rwandans to their communes of origin, the serious deterioration in security and the human rights situation in a number of prefectures, an increase in the number of detainees held in Rwandan prisons and other detention centres, and the start of trials of persons accused of having participated in the genocide.

Not only was HRFOR the High Commissioner's largest field presence, but it operated in particularly difficult and dangerous circumstances in a relationship of sensitivity with a post-genocide Government.

In a later report to the Commission on Human Rights [E/CN.4/1998/61], the High Commissioner stated that, particularly since May 1997, the human rights situation had been closely linked to the deteriorating security situation in the north-west of the country, especially in Gisenyi and Ruhengeri prefectures, areas populated mainly by Hutus and perceived by the ruling Rwandan Government as a bastion of genocidal forces. Those two prefectures had seen escalating attacks perpetrated by armed groups comprising elements of ex-FAR and Interahamwe militia, which had acquired weapons with ease despite the imposition by Security Council resolution 918(1994) [YUN 1994, p. 285] of an embargo on the supply of arms in the region. RPA had responded to such attacks with large-scale counter-insurgency operations and the local civilian population had often been caught between the armed groups and RPA.

In 1997, HRFOR documented the killings of at least 5,952 persons, compared with 1,575 reported killings in 1996. Of the 1997 killings, 3,140 were attributed to State agents, 1,536 to members of armed groups and 87 to members of the population carrying out "private justice". The perpetrators of the remaining killings documented remained unknown. Armed groups carried out numerous attacks targeting genocide survivors and those associated with them, and persons who returned to Rwanda from exile in 1959 ("old-caseload returnees"). In addition, at least 457 Congolese refugees of Tutsi origin were killed by armed groups in attacks on a UNHCR-administered camp located in the Mudende sector, northern Gisenyi prefecture. The first attack took place on 22 August, claiming the lives of 131 Congolese Tutsi refugees and resulting in the wounding of 102 others. At least 326 Congolese Tutsi refugees were killed and a further 186 wounded in the second attack, which took place during the night of 10/11 December.

Attacks by RPA during military operations caused the deaths of 137 civilians in Ruhengeri prefecture in March and at least 2,022 persons were killed in May and June during RPA operations in several communes of that prefecture.

Communication. By a 27 August letter [S/1997/671], Rwanda transmitted to the Security Council President a statement from its Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Cooperation concerning the August massacre of Congolese refugees at the Mudende refugee camp (see above). Rwanda appealed urgently to the international community to provide generous assistance to the people of Rwanda in their efforts to achieve national reconciliation. (See PART TWO, Chapter III, for further information on the human rights situation in Rwanda.)

Arms embargo

By a 6 January letter [S/1997/15], the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 918(1994) concerning Rwanda [YUN 1994, p. 285] submitted to the Council President a report covering the Committee's activities during 1996. By the 1994 resolution, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, had imposed an arms embargo against Rwanda and established the Committee to seek information regarding the implementation of the embargo, consider information concerning violations of it, and make recommendations on ways to increase the embargo's effectiveness and on measures to respond to violations.

The Committee stated that it had received notifications of imports from Rwanda and of exports from Singapore in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 68]. On 1 September 1996, in accordance with resolution 1011(1995) [YUN 1995, p. 380], the Council terminated the restrictions on the sale and supply of arms and related materiel to Rwanda and that Government was no longer required to notify the Committee of its imports of arms. However, with a view to preventing the sale and supply of arms and related materiel to non-governmental forces for use in Rwanda, all States were required to continue to restrict sale or supply to such non-governmental forces in Rwanda or to persons in the States neighbouring Rwanda if such sale or supply was for use within Rwanda.

The Committee observed that it relied solely on the cooperation of States and organizations in a position to provide it with pertinent information concerning possible violations of the arms embargo. It therefore reiterated its appeal to all States to observe strictly the mandatory measures specified in Council resolutions.

By a 31 December letter [S/1997/1028], the Committee Chairman transmitted to the Council a report covering Committee activities during 1997. The Committee repeated that all States were required to implement restrictions with regard to supplying arms to non-governmental forces for use in Rwanda and reiterated its appeal for strict observance of the Council's mandatory measures.

UNAMIR financing

During 1997, the General Assembly considered the financial performance of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda (UNAMIR), the mandate of which expired on 8 March 1996. The Security Council, which had established UNAMIR by resolution 872(1993) [YUN 1993, p. 285], called, in resolution 1029(1995) [YUN 1995, p. 392], for the phasing out of the operation within six weeks of the expiry of the mandate.

In a 14 March 1997 report [A/51/830], the Secretary-General presented the financial performance report of UNAMIR for the period 1 January to 30 June 1996, covering the Mission's final mandate period from 1 January to 8 March of that year, its repatriation during the period from 9 March to 19 April and the administrative closing thereafter for the period up to 30 June 1996.

Total resources provided to UNAMIR for 1 January to 30 June 1996 amounted to $54,573,600 gross ($53,566,800 net). However, difficulties in arranging for the removal of UN-owned assets, the settlement of disputes involving UNAMIR and its contractors, the transfer of equipment and other delays resulted in additional requirements of $5,046,900 gross ($5,011,600 net); since a preliminary review of UNAMIR's unliquidated obligations was being conducted, assessment of the additional appropriation was not being requested.

The Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, having considered the Secretary-General's report, recommended in an 8 May report [A/51/891] that no action be taken on appropriations pending the receipt of a further report on the ongoing review of unliquidated obligations recorded in UNAMIR accounts that would determine if the required additional resources could be offset by any obligations pertaining to prior mandate periods that were no longer required.

By decision 51/472 of 13 June, the General Assembly took note of the additional requirements in the amount of $5,046,900 gross ($5,011,600 net) for the operation of UNAMIR from 1 January to 30 June 1996 and authorized the Secretary-General to utilize credits arising from the liquidation of obligations pertaining to prior periods in an equal amount to meet the additional requirements. It reduced the appropriation for the period from 10 June to 31 December 1995, authorized its resolution 49/20B [YUN 1995, p. 394], from $109,951,900 gross ($107,584,300 net) to $99,628,200 gross ($97,508,000 net) to reflect the amount apportioned under the terms of that resolution. It also decided to include the item on financing of UNAMIR in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second session.

At that session, by decision 52/456 of 22 December, the Assembly decided that the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee would continue consideration of the item on financing of UNAMIR at its resumed fifty-second session in 1998.

On 24 December, the Secretary-General submitted to the Assembly a financial performance report on UNAMIR [A/52/752] for the period from 1 July 1996 to 30 June 1997 and covering UNAMIR's administrative closing in situ for the period from 1 July to 31 December 1996 and at UN Headquarters in New York thereafter, up to 30 June 1997. It was noted that an additional appropriation and assessment by the Assembly of $456,900 gross ($283,100 net) would be required to provide funding for the total expenditures recorded from 1 July 1996 to 30 June 1997. However, the additional resources could be offset by obligations pertaining to prior mandate periods that were no longer required.

During 1997, the situation in Burundi remained unstable despite mediation efforts at the national, regional and international levels. Violent clashes between the armed opposition and the army continued, as did hostility between political parties.

Tensions also arose between Burundi and the United Republic of Tanzania when Burundi claimed that Burundi refugees concentrated in Tanzania along the frontier were carrying out deadly incursions into Burundi territory and that Tanzanian forces had attacked villages in Burundi, a charge that Tanzania refuted. Burundi refugees in the United Republic of Tanzania in 1997 were the single largest group of refugees in the Great Lakes region. Although during the year, the spontaneous repatriation occurred of some 100,000 of those refugees to provinces where peace had been restored, a similar number arrived in Tanzania from provinces where new outbreaks of fighting had taken place (see PART THREE, Chapter XII).

At the Fourth Arusha Regional Summit on the Burundi conflict, held in the United Republic of Tanzania on 16 April, regional leaders decided to ease some of the sanctions against Burundi, in place since the July 1996 coup d'etat, in order to alleviate the suffering of the people of that country. They declared their readiness to suspend all sanctions, apart from the arms embargo, once there was movement in the negotiations. That decision was welcomed by the Security Council in a 30 May statement. However, Burundi did not attend the fifth regional summit in September, citing, among other reasons, the deteriorating situation between it and the United Republic of Tanzania. The regional leaders therefore decided to maintain the sanctions.

In December, the Security Council approved the Secretary-General's proposal for a new mandate for Mohammed Sahnoun, who, as the Secretary-General's Special Envoy in Africa, would continue to follow closely developments in Central Africa, lend his support to peacemaking and peace-building initiatives in the Great Lakes region and give special attention to Burundi.

Political situation

The political situation in Burundi continued to reflect the deep divisions within and between the country's leading political movements, the polarizing influence of militant extremist groups at both ends of the political spectrum, the adverse effects on the security situation of events in former Zaire (Democratic Republic of the Congo), and the lack of an agreed mechanism for negotiations acceptable to all the principal actors.

Despite continuing national and international political mediation efforts, no significant breakthrough was achieved. Mediation efforts during the year followed three linked but distinct tracks: the ongoing regional mediation effort led by the former President of the United Republic of Tanzania, Julius K. Nyerere; the talks between the Government and the Conseil national de defense de la démocratie (CNDD) under the auspices of the San'Egidio Community in Rome; and the United Nations and Organization of African Unity (OAU) decision to appoint a Joint Special Representative for the Great Lakes Region (see above, under "Great Lakes region").

Communication (January). Burundi, in a 15 January letter to the President of the Security Council [S/1997/36], described recent positive developments that had taken place. It reported that there had been a noticeable improvement in security, mainly in the capital and urban centres. In the interior of the country, the population was collaborating more effectively with the local government and with the forces of order to combat terrorists and their armed bands. There was also a massive return of population groups that had been deceived or taken hostage by armed rebels. With respect to refugees returning from neighbouring countries, particularly the former Zaire, Burundi had made arrangements to receive them and resettle them in their regions of origin.

Burundi refuted allegations by some human rights organizations, particularly Amnesty International, that repatriated persons had been executed by Burundi's security forces. It asserted that some of those repatriated persons were returning with arms along the border with Zaire under the cover of the repatriation movement and were encountering its forces, whose main mission was to protect the population. Other refugees had travelled with arms and baggage to the United Republic of Tanzania, from where, it was asserted, they were attempting to destabilize Burundi through murderous incursions against the innocent civilian population. Burundi nevertheless acknowledged that unfortunate mistakes had been committed in the towns of Kizuka, Kobero and Murambi. The Government deplored those cases and had ordered investigations to establish responsibility. Some members of its forces had been arrested and were awaiting trial.

ganzwa, the Government stated that those forces had launched an operation to free citizens of Burundi taken hostage by rebels and the latter—not innocent civilians—had been annihilated. The Government urgently reiterated its request that international observers be sent to Burundi to establish the facts of all alleged killings.

The Government again reaffirmed its determination to conduct frank negotiations with all parties involved in the conflict in Burundi, including armed factions. It had recently replied to the invitation of Mr. Nyerere, Facilitator of the Peace Process, to whom it reiterated its commitment to carry out fully the negotiation process. However, the Government had also indicated the obstacles and constraints linked to the embargo imposed by regional leaders (from Ethiopia, Kenya, Rwanda, Uganda, the United Republic of Tanzania and the former Zaire) at a summit meeting [YUN 1996, p. 84] following the July 1996 coup d'état. That embargo was unjustly and harshly affecting the people of Burundi and impeding chances for a return to peace through calm negotiation, it was stated.

The other stage in the search for peace through dialogue was the organization of a national debate, which was scheduled to begin at the end of January 1997.

Thus, the three stages in the dialogue pledged at the summit of the heads of State of the region in October 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 86] had been initiated. In view of the improvement in security and the determination of the Government to carry out its peace programme, Burundi again requested the Security Council to lift the embargo immediately in order to promote the negotiation process and a return to peace.

Fourth Regional Summit

By an 18 April letter [S/1997/319], the United Republic of Tanzania transmitted to the Security Council President the official communique of the Fourth Arusha Regional Summit on the Burundi conflict, which took place on 16 April. The Summit, attended by Burundi, Ethiopia, Kenya, Rwanda, Uganda, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zambia, with the participation of the OAU Secretary-General and the Facilitator of the Peace Process, reviewed the situation and developments in Burundi since its last meeting on 12 October 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 86]. In that regard, the Summit heard a report by President Pierre Buyoya of Burundi on action he had taken in response to the demands of the regional leaders for the restoration of normalcy and a negotiated end to the conflict in Burundi.

The Summit underscored the fact that, as far as Burundi was concerned, its objectives and those of the African continent and the wider international community converged on the need to end the cycle of violence and on a negotiated settlement. To facilitate the early attainment of those objectives, the Summit appealed to the rest of the continent, and especially to the international community, to exert full political, economic and diplomatic pressure on all the parties in Burundi to pursue a negotiated settlement. Such pressure should include an arms embargo, as well as the denial of visas to those deemed to be obstructing the peace process. The Summit stressed that no one should arm any of the protagonists and called for the immediate cessation of hostilities. It called on the Government of Burundi and all parties to the conflict to take steps urgently to create the necessary environment for negotiations and national reconciliation to take place. In particular, the Government was called on to disband the regroupement camps and allow the normal resumption of activities without hindrance. The Summit urged the Government to restore the freedom of the Speaker of the National Assembly; it considered him an important interlocutor in the process of negotiations.

In order to alleviate the suffering of the people of Burundi, the Summit decided to expand, with immediate effect, the easing of sanctions to include all food and food products, all items relating to education and construction materials, all types of medicines, and agricultural items and inputs. It further decided to designate immediately focal points in every country to facilitate the smooth and efficient implementation of its decision. In the meantime, the Summit called for the speedy implementation of exemptions already agreed upon so as to ensure an uninterrupted flow of humanitarian assistance.

The Summit declared its readiness to suspend all sanctions, with the exception of the arms embargo, once there was movement in the negotiations.

On 30 May [meeting 3785], the President of the Security Council made the following statement [S/PRST/1997/32] on the Council's behalf:

The Security Council is concerned that, despite recent positive developments, there is continuing instability in Burundi. It recalls its resolution 1072(1996) of 30 August 1996, in which, inter alia, it demanded that all sides in Burundi declare a unilateral cessation of hostilities and initiate unconditional negotiations with a view to reaching a comprehensive political settlement.

The Council reiterates its support for the efforts of the regional leaders and takes note of the joint communique of 16 April 1997 issued following the Fourth Arusha Regional Summit on the Burundi conflict, held at Arusha, United Republic of Tanzania. In particular, the Council welcomes the decision of the regional leaders to ease sanctions in order to alleviate the suffering of the people of Burundi.

The Council welcomes the fact that talks are being held in Rome which are complementary to the Arusha process. It also welcomes the commitment of the Government of Burundi to the comprehensive political dialogue among all the parties within the framework of the Arusha process. It urges all the parties in Burundi to continue to pursue a negotiated settlement and to refrain from actions which are detrimental to such dialogue.

The Council expresses its deep concern at the involuntary resettlement of rural populations and calls upon the Government of Burundi to allow the people to return to their homes without any hindrance.

The Council expresses its support and appreciation to former President Nyerere as well as to the Special Representative of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity in their efforts to find a peaceful solution to the crisis in Burundi.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep the Council informed on the situation in Burundi, especially with regard to the progress of a negotiated and peaceful settlement in the country.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Further developments

In response to the Security Council's request to be kept informed of the situation in Burundi, the Secretary-General on 15 July reported [S/1997/547] on the main developments that had occurred since November 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 87]. National and international mediation efforts had continued. For its part, the Government of President Buyoya attempted to consolidate power, secure the lifting of economic sanctions and encourage political dialogue, while stepping up efforts to combat the growing Hutu insurgency and the mounting death toll. However, the hostility between political parties continued to prevent progress in the national debate advocated by the Government and to hamper international efforts to bring the parties to the negotiating table. Divisions within the two main political parties, the rivalry between them and the constraints imposed on their work by the Government continued to feed animosities. These parties included the Front pour la démocratie au Burundi (FRODEBU), CNDD, the Union pour le progrès national (UPRONA), and the Parti pour le redressement national (PARENA), led by former President Jean-Baptiste Bagaza, who continued to enjoy strong support among Tutsi youth and students.

Extremists on both sides continued to disrupt reconciliation efforts by threatening and undermining the President. Anti-Buyoya sentiments culminated in mid-March with the discovery of an assassination plot against the President, resulting in a large number of arrests. As of mid-July, former President Bagaza was still under house arrest and members of his PARENA party were still detained.

On a more positive note, the restoration of the National Assembly in September 1996 provided a forum for more regular political activity and dialogue among politicians of the different factions.

A further positive development was the re-emergence on the political scene of former President Sylvestre Ntibantunganya, who had left his refuge at the residence of the United States Ambassador in Bujumbura in June. He had pledged himself to civilizing the political debate in Burundi and to contributing to the normalization of political life. He had also declared his readiness to join peace talks with a view to ending the civil war between the armed opposition and the army.

Describing the security situation in Burundi, the Secretary-General stated that rebel attacks and army counter-operations had led to a series of violent clashes throughout the country at the end of 1996. Those clashes had been particularly concentrated in northern provinces, but the situation around Bujumbura remained tense and volatile.

The situation improved during the first months of 1997 with the advance of the Allied Democratic Forces for the Liberation of the Congo in the eastern part of the former Zaire (see above, under "Democratic Republic of the Congo"). However, strong pockets of rebels remained in the former Zaire, enabling them to launch operations against targets in Burundi. Overall, the massive movement of Hutu rebels along the western shores of Lake Tanganyika and across the Lake into the United Republic of Tanzania ultimately caused rebel operations to shift to the south. The resulting rebel infiltration from the United Republic of Tanzania into the southern provinces of Burundi caused a rift between the two Governments (see below).

In March, the areas in and around Bujumbura increasingly became targets of rebel attacks. Mine explosions and counter-insurgency operations by the military claimed dozens of victims. With an enormous increase in rebel activity in the south, the Government established a special crisis committee to deal with security issues. Fierce clashes between rebels and army units continued in April. In May, heavy fighting continued in the southern provinces, causing international aid agencies to evacuate their staff. Violence also flared again in the north-west where rebels attacked regroupement camps. Throughout May and June, fierce fighting was reported close to Bujumbura; on 3 June, the army used mortars and aircraft to attack rebel positions near Bujumbura after violent encounters with rebels on the outskirts of the capital.

As this violence continued unabated throughout June, rumours that neighbouring countries were preparing to invade Burundi in support of the Government were rampant, as were claims that the rebels wanted to establish a bridgehead on Burundi territory with the support of the international community. In addition, reports were received of increased factional fighting among Hutu rebels and of the involvement of former Rwandan and Zairian soldiers. In response, officials from northern Burundi and southern Rwanda agreed in principle to cooperate on security matters and to extradite each other's rebels.

Still, the Secretary-General reported, despite continuing political mediation efforts, no significant breakthrough had taken place. Former President Nyerere continued as the principal international mediator for the conflict in Burundi.

During the course of the Summit Meeting of the Central Organ of the OAU Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution (Lome, Togo, 26-27 March), Burundi President Buyoya made the case for lifting the sanctions against his country. As a follow-up to the Fourth Arusha Regional Summit, at a meeting on 20 May in Kampala, Uganda, no agreement was reached on the list of products to be exempted from the regional sanctions regime. Burundi, at the end of June, expressed its disappointment that sanctions had still not been eased. On 27 June, Kenya lifted the fuel and travel embargo against Burundi.

While discussions on sanctions and their possible relaxation were going on, representatives of the Government and CNDD were engaged in direct secret talks under the auspices of the San'Egidio Community in Rome, the Secretary-General reported. The talks concentrated on the need to secure a permanent ceasefire. The public confirmation on 13 May of the secret talks drew harsh criticism from many sectors of Burundi society, across the political spectrum. In a 21 May letter to former President Nyerere, President Buyoya outlined the various steps the peace process in Burundi should follow and asked him to organize all-party negotiations. President Nyerere dispatched a mission to Burundi on 5 July to take stock of the political situation and to encourage all parties to participate in the negotiations.

In order to consolidate the ranks of those who were for peace, the Secretary-General said it was imperative that opportunities for dialogue and debate be created and promoted. In that connec-don, he had instructed the United Nations Office in Burundi to support all initiatives aimed at promoting peace and reconciliation, including the national debate and the activities of the Speaker of the Assembly.

The Secretary-General noted that, in support of the efforts of the Mediator and of the process begun in Rome, the Security Council had, on 24 January, approved a joint proposal from himself and the OAU Secretary-General to appoint Mohammed Sahnoun as their Joint Special Representative for the Great Lakes Region, with priority attention to be given to the former Zaire and Burundi. Mr. Sahnoun had visited Burundi several times and was following events there very closely, it was stated.

The Secretary-General observed that President Buyoya's determination to pursue all-inclusive negotiations had resulted in improved relations between the Government and those who were interested in advancing a negotiated and peaceful settlement of Burundi's conflict. He was particularly encouraged by President Buyoya's new willingness to cooperate with a variety of international actors in order to find solutions to Burundi's persistent problems and by the gradual rapprochement between the President, the Government and the National Assembly. Should those positive trends continue, Burundi would be able to establish the conditions necessary for the further easing of sanctions.

Fifth Regional Summit

By a 4 September letter [S/1997/687], the United Republic of Tanzania submitted to the Security Council President the communique of the Fifth Regional Summit on the Burundi conflict, which met in Dar es Salaam on 3 and 4 September. The Summit was attended by the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Ethiopia, Rwanda, Uganda, the United Republic of Tanzania, Zambia and Zimbabwe; Kenya, the OAU Secretary-General and former President Nyerere also participated. Mr. Nyerere reported on his efforts to facilitate a negotiated settlement, including his endeavours to convene a meeting of all parties to the conflict in Arusha on 25 August. The Summit regretted that, despite all those efforts, there had been no progress in the negotiation process. It expressed particular disappointment over the refusal of the Government of Burundi to take part in the first session of all-party negotiations in Arusha.

The Summit decided to maintain the existing sanctions and to ensure their scrupulous application. In that regard, it created a special secretariat comprising representatives of all the participating countries to monitor compliance.

As to the issue of the venue of the all-party talks, the Summit noted the position of the President of the United Republic of Tanzania that he not host the talks. The leaders, however, insisted that the next round of talks be held in Arusha, and urged all the parties, including the Government of Burundi, to take part. The talks would be convened by the Facilitator, Mr. Nyerere. In order to create a propitious climate for the talks, the Summit called on the Government of Burundi to halt ongoing trials until a negotiated solution was in place to deal with them; to release unconditionally the Speaker of the National Assembly, Léonce Ngendakumana, former President Sylvestre Ntibantunganya and former President Jean-Baptiste Bagaza to travel freely and participate in the talks; and to disband immediately the regroupement camps.

In an 8 September letter to the Security Council President [S/1997/697], Burundi stated that it had not been invited to attend the Fifth Regional Summit and that the United Republic of Tanzania had submitted the final communique of the Summit to the Council before Burundi had even been informed of it. A response to the Dar es Salaam communique reflecting Burundi's commitment to a peace process in which negotiations were open to all the parties to the conflict would be transmitted to the Council as soon as the Government had been formally notified of the letter and the spirit of the Summit. Burundi transmitted to the Council a 2 September statement by the Government on the peace process and a memorandum by the Government concerning the postponement of the political dialogue open to all parties to the conflict.

By the 2 September statement, the Government warned the general public about a disinformation campaign aimed at creating the impression that it had withdrawn from negotiations, and indicating that it had asked for a postponement of the 25 August all-party negotiations only in order to allow for better consultations. The Government reaffirmed its availability for the opening of negotiations on 29 September and proposed that they take place in a neutral city in the region, such as Addis Ababa (Ethiopia), Harare (Zimbabwe), Lusaka (Zambia) or Pretoria (South Africa). It pointed out that the United Republic of Tanzania would be playing the role of judge at the Summit while taking sides, noting that the relations between Burundi and Tanzania did not create an environment conducive to peace (see below, under "Burundi-United Republic of Tanzania"). The countries of the subregion were therefore requested to initiate a process of mediation between the two countries with a view to re-establishing normal relations more conducive to peace.

In its memorandum concerning the postponement of the all-party dialogue, Burundi said that it had sought the delay after assessing preparations for the dialogue and in the light of developments in its relations with the United Republic of Tanzania. The Government had conveyed its concerns to a delegation from the Mediator when it had visited Burundi in July. For the dialogue to take place in an atmosphere of calm, the Government had suggested the following: the easing of sanctions, which had been agreed at the April Arusha Summit; a political dialogue free from the pressure of economic sanctions; preventing terrorist organizations from attacking Burundians; normal diplomatic relations between Burundi and the United Republic of Tanzania; and pressure on terrorist organizations so that hostilities would cease.

It was also stated that the Government of Burundi had not been consulted with regard to negotiations and participants; that the Tanzanian delegation responsible for preparing for the negotiations had arrived only three days before the dialogue was due to begin; and that the Tanzanian side had not replied to Burundi's request to postpone the meeting by one month in order to clarify questions and concerns.

As to the creation of an atmosphere conducive to the holding of a dialogue, Burundi noted with regret that the Tanzanian authorities and the Mediator himself had increasingly made statements and gestures that had only created tension between the two countries and discouraged the participation of certain internal partners in the meeting. In addition, the United Republic of Tanzania had made an issue of the question of economic sanctions and border security. The fact that the Tanzanian authorities had set up refugee camps a few kilometres from the common border, from where armed Burundi refugees regularly attacked Burundi, cast some doubt on the neutrality of the United Republic of Tanzania and made it hard to accept mediation conducted by a noted citizen of that country.

Burundi requested its partners in the sub-region to: ensure that the mediation effort was more neutral; identify a neutral venue outside the United Republic of Tanzania for the peace talks, preferably within the subregion; and hold the first session of the intra-Burundi dialogue before the end of September 1997.

In a 17 September letter to the Security Council President [S/1997/723], Burundi transmitted the text of a message from its Government to the heads of State of the region following the Fifth Regional Summit. Burundi noted that it had requested postponement of the intra-Burundi negotiations, scheduled for 25 August in Arusha, to allow time for consultations with all its partners and to find another location, outside the United Republic of Tanzania, more suitable for hosting the dialogue. At the September Summit, President Yoweri Museveni of Uganda was mandated to transmit the content and spirit of the Summit conclusions to Burundi, which he did by inviting Burundi's President to Mbarara in Uganda on 12 September.

Burundi again expressed its concern regarding the mediation and which country was to host it. No process could bring about peace in Burundi unless it fully involved the people of the country and was conducted with their full approval. It was therefore essential that there be greater cooperation between the Mediator and the people of Burundi, particularly the Government.

With regard to its objection to the peace talks being held in the United Republic of Tanzania, Burundi described the ongoing tension between the two countries resulting from the refugee camps set up by Tanzania all along the shared border, which it believed were regularly used as bases for incursions into Burundi territory (see below). A mediation endeavour therefore had to be undertaken to settle the conflict between the two countries so as to give the Burundi peace process a chance to succeed and to preserve peace in the region. Burundi called again for a complete end to the sanctions that were injuring its people, particularly the most vulnerable segments of its population.

Burundi saw no justification for the Summit's appeal to halt ongoing trials, stating that such action would throw the country into disorder and jeopardize public security. No Burundian would understand why perpetrators of minor offences should be punished while murderers could not be tried for crimes such as the 1993 assassination of President Ndadaye and the subsequent genocidal massacres. The proper approach was to ensure that every defendant was given a just and fair trial, which the Government had undertaken to do.

As to participation in the peace talks, Burundi reaffirmed its commitment to all-inclusive negotiations in which State bodies and any political or civil organizations might participate. However, the law could not be circumvented. Moreover, only representatives of public institutions and political or civil organizations could participate. In that regard, Burundi appealed to the heads of State of the region for understanding.

In keeping with its desire to lead the country towards peace through dialogue and negotiation, the Government of Burundi would respond to the next invitation to the peace talks but would continue to raise its concerns if they had not been met in the meantime.

Parliamentary days

By a 5 November letter [S/1997/863], Burundi transmitted to the Security Council President the conclusions and recommendations that emerged from parliamentary days held in Bujumbura from 14 to 17 October at the seat of the National Assembly. The theme of the days was: "Contribution of the National Assembly to the process of peace and national reconciliation and to respect for human rights in Burundi".

The participants made a number of recommendations for action by the Government, the National Assembly, the courts, the people of Burundi and the international community.

The representatives of the people and the other participants considered that the parliamentary days had created a new climate of dialogue and confidence between the executive and legislative branches, which would promote the positive evolution of the process of peace and national reconciliation in Burundi.

Special Envoy

By a 12 December letter [S/1997/994], the Secretary-General sought the concurrence of the Security Council for a new mandate for Mohamed Sahnoun, the Joint United Nations/Organization of African Unity Special Representative for the Great Lakes Region of Africa (see above, under "Great Lakes region"). As the Secretary-General's Special Envoy in Africa, Mr. Sahnoun would continue to follow closely developments in Central Africa, including the Great Lakes region. He would also lend his support to existing peacemaking and peace-building initiatives there, and give special attention to Burundi. In addition, he would be available for preventive and other missions that he might be asked to undertake in other regions of Africa as needed.

The Council's agreement was also sought for the appointment of Berhanu Dinka, former Special Envoy for Sierra Leone, as Representative of the Secretary-General for the Great Lakes Region and Regional Humanitarian Adviser for the Great Lakes Region.

By a 19 December letter [S/1997/995], the Security Council President informed the Secretary-General that the Council supported his proposals for new mandates for Mr. Sahnoun and Mr. Dinka.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

By decision 51/477 of 15 September, the General Assembly included in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second session the item entitled "The situation in Burundi". However, the Assembly took no action on the item during that session.

Burundi-United Republic of Tanzania

On 2 October [S/1997/764], Burundi transmitted to the Security Council President the text of a letter to the Secretary-General, annexed to which was a 30 September note verbale requesting UN assistance in solving the problem of Burundi refugees, in general, and the problem of Burundi refugees in the United Republic of Tanzania, in particular.

The note verbale stated that Burundi refugees concentrated along the frontier in the United Republic of Tanzania were carrying out deadly incursions into the territory of Burundi and that the United Nations should take steps to induce the Tanzanian authorities to: accept the reactivation of the technical working group established under the 1991 tripartite agreement between Burundi, the United Republic of Tanzania and the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR); move those refugees who did not wish to return to a reasonable distance; and disarm Burundi refugees and prohibit them from engaging in political activity. In addition, the deployment of a group of neutral observers to verify incursions originating in the United Republic of Tanzania would be of great benefit.

Burundi also provided information, dating back to 1972, describing the refugee situation and what it believed were threats to the peace and security of Burundi and of the subregion.

In a 27 October note verbale [S/1997/822], Burundi, citing attacks on its south-eastern frontier by the Tanzanian army, requested the Secretary-General to: help restore communications between the Governments of the two countries; organize mediation between them with a view to normalizing the situation; and establish a neutral observer commission along the common frontier.

By a 3 November letter [A/52/566-S/1997/850], the United Republic of Tanzania categorically refuted the allegations made, asserting that the Burundi army had attacked a detachment of the Tanzanian People's Defence Forces. The United Republic of Tanzania had an obligation to protect its territorial integrity and the security of its citizens.

By a 4 December letter [S/1997/956], Burundi, having examined an aide-memoire prepared by Tanzania in response to a decision by the Secretary-General to send a fact-finding mission to the shared border between the two countries, deplored the fact that Tanzania continually presented the situation within Burundi from the perspective of members of the armed groups and rebels situated in its territory. Burundi again denounced the setting up of refugee camps that had been transformed into training camps for armed groups less than 20 kilometres from the border, in violation of international conventions.

Burundi reported that tensions between it and the United Republic of Tanzania were far from easing; a representative of Burundi to Dar es Salaam had been expelled on 20 November and the Embassy was in the hands of rebel groups, thanks to the Tanzanian authorities. The aide-memoire contained a number of untruths, Burundi stated, including that the President of the National Assembly had been arrested. In addition, the execution of the sentences handed down on 31 July in the case of genocide followed all Burundi legal procedures and could not be tied to the peace process that the Burundi Government had vigorously embarked upon, and was not contrary to any so-called accord to which Burundi was not a party.

Burundi-Zaire

In response to a 1 February complaint by Zaire [S/1997/98] (see above, under "Democratic Republic of the Congo") alleging aggression against it by the armed forces of Burundi, Rwanda and Uganda, Burundi, in a 7 February letter [S/1997/116], informed the Security Council President that it formally rejected Zaire's false accusation regarding the involvement of Burundi soldiers. Burundi had no interest in interfering in the internal problems of any of its neighbouring countries, it said.

Human rights situation

In December 1997, Special Rapporteur Paulo Sergio Pinheiro carried out his fourth mission to Burundi to assess the human rights situation there (see PART TWO, Chapter III). In a report to the Commission on Human Rights [E/CN.4/1998/72], he noted that security conditions had improved over a large part of the country but continued to be highly unstable. Some provinces were still subject to rebel incursions. The populations of urban centres, such as Bujumbura and Gitega, were better protected than those of the collines, the dispersed settlement of which made it difficult for authorities to protect inhabitants in the event of disturbances or attacks.

In the Special Rapporteur's opinion, rebel activities had increased because of dissension within the various rebel groups; account-settling among rebels in the field was still causing casualties among the civilian population.

Concerning political developments, the Special Rapporteur noted some positive aspects, which, he felt, should be publicly recognized by the international community. Continuing criticism of the Government and isolation of it internationally were not conducive to peace and national reconciliation, he said. Despite contradictory measures, such as the ministerial order of early December 1997 suspending FRODEBU, the dialogue between the Government and National Assembly had made progress.

Included in the Special Rapporteur's recommendations were: that UNHCR should take steps in conjunction with the Tanzanian authorities to move the refugee camps near the frontier with Burundi further into Tanzania; that an evaluation should be made both of the utility of maintaining the economic sanctions against Burundi and of government efforts to initiate an internal dialogue and a nationwide peace process; that until a ceasefire had been established and a process of transition towards democracy initiated, an international embargo should be decreed on sales of arms and services to all parties in the Burundi conflict; and that the question of an international criminal tribunal should again be considered by the United Nations, once the conditions for establishing such a body had been met.

Communications. By a 27 May letter [S/1997/414], Burundi transmitted to the Secretary-General a reminder of its 1996 request [YUN 1996, p. 89] for the creation of an international criminal tribunal for Burundi, as recommended in the report of the International Commission of Inquiry in Burundi [YUN 1996, p. 88] and by the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Burundi.

Burundi stated that it had just instituted proceedings against the alleged perpetrators of the October 1993 assassination of the President of Burundi [YUN 1993, p. 262] and of the acts of genocide and other massacres committed since then. Burundi welcomed the assistance provided by the UN Centre for Human Rights in defending the accused and assisting victims who were claiming compensation, but wished to strengthen the Centre's cooperation with all judicial bodies and with the Bujumbura Bar Association. It therefore reiterated its request for material and financial assistance to better equip the judicial system to reassure all citizens of their rights.

By an 11 August letter [S/1997/639], Burundi transmitted to the Security Council President a statement concerning allegations made by Amnesty International, published on 15 July, regarding what it described as the Government of Burundi's policy of forcibly rounding up the Hutu population. Burundi denied that there had ever been such a policy; people had always come together spontaneously in efforts to flee from the violent armed bands that Amnesty International had been careful not to condemn. Burundi denounced Amnesty International's tendency to try to divide the war victims, even in their misfortune. The Government felt there were no lucky ones among the displaced, nor were any of those who had come together better off than the others; there were simply Burundi victims of war who all needed assistance, which the Government was doing everything within its power to provide without distinction. Burundi appealed for objectivity in Amnesty International's reports, adding that it supported the noble cause of safeguarding human rights, in general, and in Burundi, in particular.

Central African Republic

The gradual return to peace and security experienced by the Central African Republic during 1997 was aided by the presence of an inter-African monitoring force provided by Burkina Faso, Chad, Gabon, Mali, Senegal and Togo. The politico-military crisis, which began in 1996 with three successive mutinies within the Central African Armed Forces, stemmed largely from widespread public discontent over social and economic problems exacerbated by prolonged non-payment of salary arrears.

The signing of the Bangui Agreements in January 1997, which included elements for a comprehensive settlement of the crisis and the establishment of the Inter-African Mission to Monitor the Implementation of the Bangui Agreements (MISAB), played a major role in stabilizing the situation in the country. In particular, MISAB contributed to the peace process by supervising the disarmament of former rebels who had taken weapons from government stores.

The Security Council, in a 6 August resolution, concerned about the situation in the Central African Republic and acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, authorized the States participating in MISAB, as well as those that were providing logistical support, to ensure the security and freedom of movement of their personnel. On 6 November, the Council renewed that authorization for a further three months.

The Bangui Agreements, and the implementation of several of their main provisions, were the result of the active mediating role played by a number of African countries, together with the Government of the Central African Republic and with the logistical and technical support of France and the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP).

The efforts of the parties to the Agreements achieved encouraging results in the political, military and security areas, including the re-establishment in August of a government of national union—the Government of Action in Defence of Democracy—and the scheduling of legislative elections for 1998. However, the situation in the social and economic spheres remained problematic, due mainly to the problem of arrears of wages and salaries, pensions and scholarships that had led to a number of national strikes.

In the meantime, the regional security situation also remained precarious, as many countries bordering the Central African Republic were suffering from serious social and political instability. As a result, the Central African Republic was host to some 45,000 refugees from those countries and from the Great Lakes region. Therefore, the Secretary-General warned, any sudden deterioration of the situation in the Central African Republic could have serious regional consequences.

Bangui Agreements

On 18 July [S/1997/561], the Central African Republic transmitted to the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council a 4 July letter from President Ange-Félix Patassé in which he stated that the Central African Republic was facing a grave crisis and requested the international community's support for peace efforts that were under way.

President Patassé stated that the crisis stemmed from army rebellions that had broken out in 1996, as a result of which a large supply of weapons was still in the hands of the ex-rebels and the militia. He attached to his letter the texts of the Bangui Agreements signed in January 1997. The Agreements comprised a declaration signed by President Patassé, President El Hadj Omar Bongo of Gabon, who represented the delegation of heads of African States, and Ambassador Jean-Marc Simon of France on 25 January; a declaration on the end of the rebellious action, signed on the same date by Amadou Toumani Touré, Chairman of the International Monitoring Committee, and by Captain Anicet

Saulet, on behalf of the military officers; the text of the Preliminary Agreement on a National Reconciliation Pact, signed on 18 January by representatives of political parties, trade unions and civil society (religious denominations, human rights, justice and democracy societies, and national and occupational organizations); and the general report of the Committee on Consensus-building and Dialogue—a body set up by the International Monitoring Committee to find solutions to the crisis, with the logistical and technical support of the Resident Representative of UNDP in Bangui—which met from 11 to 16 January.

Inter-African Mission to Monitor Implementation of Bangui Agreements (MISAB)

In his 4 July letter [S/1997/561], President Patassé noted that, at his request, the Inter-African Mission to Monitor the Implementation of the Bangui Agreements (MISAB) had been established in January, under the authority of President Bongo, to help to restore peace and security and in particular to disarm the ex-rebels, the militia and all other unlawfully armed individuals. The States participating in MISAB were Burkina Faso, Chad, Gabon, Mali, Senegal and Togo. Appended to President Patassé's letter was the mandate of MISAB, signed on 6 March by President Bongo, and the text of the agreement on the status of the forces.

In the hope of placing the actions of MISAB within an appropriate political and legal framework, the Central African Republic requested the Security Council to authorize the States members of the Mission to carry out the necessary operations neutrally and impartially, to attain the objectives defined by the MISAB mandate and to authorize, under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, the participating States and the States supporting them to ensure the security and freedom of movement of MISAB personnel.

In a 7 July letter [S/1997/543], President Bongo of Gabon, on behalf of the members of the International Committee for the follow-up of the Bangui Agreements, informed the Secretary-General that MISAB had been deployed in Bangui since 8 February and consisted of approximately 800 men.

In view of the continuing tension and the threat that prolongation of the crisis was likely to constitute for the maintenance of international peace and security, the Governments members of the International Committee and the countries participating in MISAB expressed their wish to have at their disposal, as a legal framework for their intervention, a resolution under Chapter VII of the Charter approving the MISAB mandate and authorizing the intervention.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (August)

On 6 August [meeting 3808], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1125(1997). The draft [S/1997/613] was sponsored by the Central African Republic, Egypt, Guinea-Bissau and Kenya.

The Security Council,

Concerned by the grave crisis facing the Central African Republic,

Taking note with appreciation of the signing of the Bangui Agreements of 25 January 1997 and the creation of the Inter-African Mission to Monitor the Implementation of the Bangui Agreements,

Concerned by the fact that, in the Central African Republic, former mutineers, members of militias and other persons continue to bear arms in contravention of the Bangui Agreements,

Taking note of the letter dated 4 July 1997 from the President of the Central African Republic to the Secretary-General,

Taking note also of the letter dated 7 July 1997 to the Secretary-General from the President of Gabon, on behalf of the members of the International Committee for the follow-up of the Bangui Agreements,

Determining that the situation in the Central African Republic continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security in the region,

1. Welcomes the efforts of the Member States which participate in the Inter-African Mission to Monitor the Implementation of the Bangui Agreements and of those Member States which support them;

2. Approves the continued conduct by Member States participating in the Inter-African Mission of the operation in a neutral and impartial way to achieve its objective to facilitate the return to peace and security by monitoring the implementation of the Bangui Agreements in the Central African Republic, as stipulated in the mandate of the Inter-African Mission, including through the supervision of the surrendering of arms of former mutineers, militias and all other persons unlawfully bearing arms;

3. Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, authorizes the Member States participating in the Inter-African Mission and those States providing logistical support to ensure the security and freedom of movement of their personnel;

4. Decides that the authorization referred to in paragraph 3 above will be limited to an initial period of three months from the adoption of this resolution, at which time the Council will assess the situation on the basis of the reports referred to in paragraph 6 below;

5. Stresses that the expenses and logistical support for the force will be borne on a voluntary basis in accordance with article II of the mandate of the Inter-African Mission;

6. Requests the Member States participating in the Inter-African Mission to provide periodic reports at least every two weeks through the Secretary-General, the first report to be made within fourteen days after the adoption of this resolution;

7. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

First periodic report (August). By a 20 August letter [S/1997/652], the Secretary-General transmitted to the Security Council the first periodic report of the Member States participating in MISAB.

The report, which covered the period from 6 to 18 August, stated that both the International Monitoring Committee to supervise the implementation of the Bangui Agreements and MISAB were under the political authority of General Amadou Toumani Toure, former President of Mali; MISAB was under the patronage of President Bongo of Gabon, senior head of State of the International Mediation Committee. Thus, the International Monitoring Committee was the body that directed the actions of MISAB, since it received political guidance directly from the heads of State concerned.

The International Monitoring Committee's plan of action incorporated the following components: formation of a government of national union; adoption of an amnesty law covering those who committed offences in the context of the third rebellion; disarmament of former rebels, militias and civilians; implementation of the recommendations of an August 1996 General Meeting on National Defence; situation of former heads of State; suspension of the parliamentary audit; and the final phase of national reconciliation through actions aimed at consolidating peace and security (organization of regional and sectoral awareness-raising seminars, organization of a National Reconciliation Conference, elaboration of an electoral code, access by political parties to the State media and other measures).

The report stated that, since its arrival in Bangui in February 1997, MISAB had been of considerable help in creating a climate of security. It comprised almost 800 soldiers and received logistical support from the participating States, France, the Organization of African Unity (OAU) and the Government of the Central African Republic. Although MISAB's activities were many and complex, said the report, its major objective could be summed up as preventing confrontation between the two main forces in the conflict: the loyalists of the Central African Armed Forces and the former rebels.

Owing to the development of organized crime, with the passive or active complicity of the former rebels, MISAB's activities had been extended to operations to maintain security in Bangui. In a city divided into zones controlled by either loyalists or former rebels, MISAB had emerged, after the withdrawal of French operational assistance units, as the only force that could circulate everywhere; thus, it was called upon to perform social and humanitarian functions. In the course of various operations, the force suffered a number of losses, including six dead soldiers.

The report provided a list of the weapons that had been deposited at the residence of the Ambassador of France for surrender to the International Monitoring Committee and MISAB since the signing of the Truce Agreement of 28 June 1997 and the Ceasefire Agreement of 2 July. It noted that an organized campaign to recover the rest of the missing weapons was under way.

The report further stated that the adoption of resolution 1125(1997) on 6 August had had a catalytic effect on the political situation in the Central African Republic. The group of 11 opposition political parties, which had decided to suspend, as from 6 May, participation in the Government of the ministers belonging to its ranks, confirmed the end of the suspension on 9 August.

The report noted that the African mediation in Bangui demonstrated what Africans could do to settle internal conflicts on their continent. However, given the insufficiency of the African countries' own resources, logistical support from the international community, along the lines of the support provided by France to MISAB, remained a necessity.

Second periodic report (September). By a 4 September letter [S/1997/684], the Secretary-General transmitted to the Security Council the second periodic report of the Member States participating in MISAB.

The report, which covered the period from 20 August to 3 September, stated that during the reporting period the International Monitoring Committee had conducted intensive activities designed to secure progress in its plan of action to implement the Bangui Agreements. On 1 September, after the return to the Government of nine opposition ministers, it was officially announced that the Government of Action in Defence of Democracy had been re-established. There was, therefore, guarded optimism that the mediation machinery in the country would be more dynamic so that positive steps could be taken towards peace and national reconciliation.

The amnesty law, promulgated on 15 March, was being implemented with a great deal of pragmatism and understanding, an approach that had enabled the International Monitoring Committee to negotiate with the former rebels and to persuade them to hand over their weapons.

The plan for disarmament, the most delicate step in the national reconciliation process, entailed two phases: an awareness-raising and voluntary participation period, which started on 12 August and was expected to last between one and two months; and an investigation, intervention and implementation-of-the-law phase. The report provided an updated list of all the weapons, taken by the former rebels from government stores, that had been handed over to MISAB. In the context of restructuring the Central African Armed Forces, the International Monitoring Committee had requested UNDP to set up a fund to assist military personnel wishing to leave active service and return to civilian life. As a result, UNDP had launched a project, to become operational in September 1997, on demobilization, re-training and reintegration for the Central African Armed Forces, which would make it possible to reduce the cost of operating the armed forces and facilitate their restructuring.

The report stated that a few of the claims made by the former rebels could be answered by implementation of the 282 recommendations made at the 1996 General Meeting on National Defence. The International Monitoring Committee, in April 1997, had established an ad hoc committee to examine those recommendations and to set up a schedule for their implementation, breaking them down into categories according to what could be applicable in the short, medium and long term. The results of the ad hoc committee's work had already been transmitted to the Ministry of Defence for implementation.

With regard to the final phase of national reconciliation—the last provision of the plan of action to implement the Bangui Agreements—the International Monitoring Committee, supported by UNDP, was engaged in making preparations for awareness-raising seminars, symposia and meetings. The restructuring of the Central African Armed Forces was also part of the reconciliation effort.

Describing cooperation with the Central African authorities and international organizations, the report stated that the International Monitoring Committee maintained constant contact with the President of the Republic and the Prime Minister, as well as with the National Assembly. It was also in contact with UNDP and with foreign diplomatic missions based in Bangui, with a view to requesting their diplomatic, financial and material support for mediation initiatives.

Third periodic report (September). By a 16 September letter [S/1997/716], the Secretary-General transmitted to the Security Council the third periodic report of the Member States participating in MISAB, covering the period from 3 to 17 September. During that period, the International Monitoring Committee had taken various steps towards progress in each of the elements of the timetable to implement the Bangui Agreements. The Government of Action in Defence of Democracy had resumed its normal activities on

2 September with a meeting of the Council of Ministers, and the amnesty act covering offences relating to the third rebellion and the misappropriation of public funds under investigation continued to be implemented with a great deal of pragmatism and understanding.

A major coordination meeting was held on 9 September, attended by the heads of all defence and security services in the country, members of the International Monitoring Committee and a delegation from the MISAB Command, to evaluate the activities of the security patrols that had been operating since June and the efforts to recover weapons. The meeting was followed by an announcement that the awareness-raising and voluntary participation phase for disarmament would end on 30 September and the second phase, during which legislation with regard to the illegal possession of weapons would be enforced, would commence on 1 October.

The report gave an updated list of weapons that had been handed over to MISAB and described activities carried out by MISAB in addition to security patrols; they included humanitarian assistance and responses to reports of assaults and other criminal actions.

The Central African police force had resumed operations in Bangui, freeing the Presidential Guard to focus on the strategic points that fell under their control by law. That had brought about considerable relaxation of tension among the population of Bangui, leading to the resumption of economic and cultural life. In addition, virtually all government offices had resumed operations; public transport was working; airlines had resumed regular service; and the free movement of persons and goods from place to place within the capital had become a reality.

However, the report noted that progress in the peace process could be jeopardized if UNDP's logistical and technical support to the International Monitoring Committee was terminated at the end of September and if MISAB's mandate was not extended in order to ensure security and peace-building until the next round of elections, scheduled for 1998.

Fourth periodic report (September). In a 30 September letter [S/1997/759], the Secretary-General transmitted to the Security Council the fourth report of MISAB, covering the last two weeks of September.

On 26 September, said the report, a meeting attended by leaders of all political parties and by members of the International Monitoring Committee assessed progress made in the area of disarmament and, thus, of national reconciliation. While all the participants welcomed the progress achieved in recovering weapons taken from the State arsenal during the 1996 rebellion, some concern was expressed at the proliferation of military weapons that appeared to have been brought in illegally by certain political groups. The Technical Commission on Disarmament decided to take steps to locate and recover those weapons, if any had indeed been brought into the country and were still in circulation after 30 September.

After the meeting, it was decided to observe a national day of disarmament and peace on 30 September. All political parties agreed to sign and issue a joint appeal to the people of the Central African Republic on that day, calling on them to commit themselves to national reconciliation and to turn in any weapons held illegally.

The report also noted that religious groups had started to promote awareness of national reconciliation in general and of disarmament in particular. That was deemed extremely valuable in a country where religions exerted a major influence on the people and where no tensions existed between the various faiths practised.

The ways in which life in Bangui and the rest of the Central African Republic had returned to normal (or nearly so) were outlined. It was noted that the resumption of activities in numerous spheres was a sign of restored peace, which had to be consolidated.

The report hailed UNDP's decision to maintain its logistical and technical support for the International Monitoring Committee and strongly recommended that MISAB's mandate be extended in order to continue to ensure security and consolidate peace until the 1998 elections.

An updated list of seized weapons was again provided in the report, together with information on the sources of logistical support for MISAB.

Fifth periodic report (October). On 14 October, the Secretary-General submitted the fifth periodic report [S/1997/795] of the Member States participating in MISAB.

The report, which covered the period from 1 to 15 October, described progress towards national reconciliation in the Central African Republic. In the context of the restructuring of the Central African Armed Forces, UNDP had established a fund to assist military personnel wishing to leave active service in returning to civilian life. The project, which would assist the reintegration of 1,000 soldiers and reduce the cost of operating the armed forces and facilitate their restructuring, was expected to get under way towards the end of October, with the arrival of international experts.

With regard to cooperation with the Central African Republic authorities, two meetings were held, on 30 September and 9 October, between the International Monitoring Committee and the group of 11 opposition political parties. Matters discussed related mainly to those aspects of the Bangui Agreements that had not been implemented or were still pending, such as the situation of the former heads of State, the surrender of weapons by the ex-rebels, militias and all other unlawfully armed individuals, and the drawing up of an electoral code. The opposition parties reaffirmed their commitment to the Bangui Agreements.

At the 9 October meeting, issues discussed included the new electoral code, the future of MISAB in the event of a possible withdrawal by the French Operational Assistance Personnel (EFAO), and the problem of back wages owed to workers in the public sector, which had caused strikes in the public schools.

The report concluded that the Government's failure to pay back wages, pensions and study grants had created an ugly social mood in the country and demonstrated how difficult it was for the Central African Republic to honour both those domestic commitments and its external obligations, in particular the arrears owed to the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. Those arrears could reach more than $120 million by 31 December 1997.

The report recommended that MISAB's mandate be extended for a two- or three-month period, beginning on 6 November 1997, the date on which the first mandate, which was approved by the Security Council in resolution 1125(1997), would expire.

Sixth periodic report (October). By a 28 October letter [S/1997/828], the Secretary-General transmitted to the Security Council President the sixth periodic report of MISAB, covering the period from 16 to 30 October. Undeniable progress had been made in implementing the Bangui Agreements, but there was still a long way to go in carrying out all their main provisions, the report stated.

With regard to disarmament, the report provided an updated list of weapons that had been turned over to MISAB. There had been a relatively low rate of recovery of light weapons and some former rebels (approximately 132 men) had not returned to their barracks. It had been reported that many of them might have left the Central African Republic taking their weapons with them. There were also suspicions that weapons illegally imported by the political parties were in the country.

In the context of cooperation with the Central African authorities and international organizations, Qin Huasun, Permanent Representative of China to the United Nations and President of the Security Council for the month of November, had made an information visit to Bangui from 21 to 23 October. He had met with senior officials of the Government and the International Monitoring Committee, the MISAB Command and individuals from diplomatic and political circles. The Military Adviser to the Secretary-General, Major-General Franklin van Kappen, and his Chief of Staff had made a working visit to Bangui from 26 to 28 October and had had numerous contacts with civilian and military authorities and with the International Monitoring Committee and MISAB.

The new electoral code, produced by a national commission that included representatives of all political viewpoints, had given rise to a disagreement over the presidency of the National Electoral Commission. The group of 11 opposition political parties had requested the International Monitoring Committee to arbitrate in the matter and a solution acceptable to all concerned was being sought.

While the mediation efforts had achieved encouraging results in the political, military and security areas, the social situation remained tense. Some trade unions were threatening to strike and others had gone on strike over unpaid wages, in spite of the Government's efforts to engage in a dialogue. Students at the University of Bangui had gone on strike from time to time because the Government was six months behind in paying study grants, and the academic year did not begin on 6 October, as scheduled, because teachers were demanding the payment of back wages before returning to work.

The report noted the need and unanimous support for maintaining the International Monitoring Committee and MISAB for a further three-month period.

Communications (October/November). Gabon transmitted to the President of the Security Council a 23 October letter from President Bongo [S/1997/821], who stated that the adoption of resolution 1125(1997), by which the Council approved the mandate of MISAB, had served as a catalyst and had facilitated the monitoring of the surrender of weapons by the former rebels, the militias and all other illegal holders of weapons. The involvement of the Council in the search for peace in the Central African Republic was well received by the people of the country, he said.

The presence of MISAB contingents in Bangui continued to be useful and necessary, especially because of the continuing tensions in the Central African subregion. President Bongo therefore requested the Council to take the necessary steps to extend MISAB for three months as from 6 November.

On 4 November [S/1997/840], the Central African Republic transmitted to the Secretary-General a 17 October letter from President Patassé, who expressed his gratitude for the effective and prompt way in which the Security Council and the Secretary-General had responded to the crisis in the Central African Republic. The newly restored climate of de-escalation and detente had to be consolidated, he said, especially in view of the legislative elections to be held in 1998 and the presidential elections scheduled for 1999. Therefore, President Patassé requested the extension of the mandate of MISAB for an additional three-month period after its expiration on 6 November.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 6 November [meeting 3829], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1136(1997). The draft [S/1997/849] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,
Reaffirming its resolution 1125(1997) of 6 August 1997,

Taking note of the sixth report to the Council by the International Committee for the follow-up of the Bangui Agreements,

Taking note also of the letter dated 17 October 1997 from the President of the Central African Republic to the Secretary-General,

Taking note further of the letter dated 23 October 1997 to the President of the Security Council from the President of Gabon, on behalf of the members of the International Committee for the follow-up of the Bangui Agreements,

Expressing appreciation for the neutral and impartial way in which the Inter-African Mission to Monitor the Implementation of the Bangui Agreements has carried out its mandate, in close cooperation with the Central African authorities, and noting with satisfaction that the Inter-African Mission has contributed to stabilizing the situation in the Central African Republic, in particular through the supervision of the surrendering of arms,

Noting that the States participating in the Inter-African Mission and the Central African Republic have decided to extend its mandate in order to complete its mission,

Stressing the importance of regional stability, and, in this context, fully supporting the efforts made by the Member States participating in the International Mediation Committee established by the Nineteenth Summit Meeting of Heads of State and Government of France and Africa, and by the members of the International Committee for the follow-up of the Bangui Agreements,

Stressing also the need for all signatories of the Bangui Agreements to continue to cooperate fully in respecting and implementing these Agreements,

Determining that the situation in the Central African Republic continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security in the region,

1. Welcomes the efforts made by the Member States which participate in the Inter-African Mission to Monitor the Implementation of the Bangui Agreements and of those Member States which provide support to them, and their readiness to maintain these efforts;

2. Welcomes also the support provided by the United Nations Development Programme to the International Committee for the follow-up of the Bangui Agreements, and encourages it to continue this support;

3. Approves the continued conduct by Member States participating in the Inter-African Mission of the operation in a neutral and impartial way to achieve its objective as set out in paragraph 2 of resolution 1125(1997);

4. Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, authorizes the Member States participating in the Inter-African Mission and those States providing logistical support to ensure the security and freedom of movement of their personnel;

5. Decides that the authorization referred to in paragraph 4 above will be limited to a period of three months from the adoption of this resolution;

6. Recalls that the expenses and logistical support for the Inter-African Mission will be borne on a voluntary basis in accordance with article 11 of the mandate of the Mission, requests the Secretary-General to take the necessary steps to establish a Trust Fund for the Central African Republic which would assist in supporting the troops of States participating in the Mission and in providing logistical support to them, and encourages Member States to contribute to the Trust Fund;

7. Requests the Member States participating in the Inter-African Mission to provide periodic reports to the Council at least every month through the Secretary-General, the next report to be made within one month of the adoption of the present resolution;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to provide a report before the end of the three-month period referred to in paragraph 5 above, on the implementation of the present resolution, including recommendations on further international support for the Central African Republic;

9. Urges all States, international organizations and financial institutions to assist in post-conflict development in the Central African Republic;

10. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Periodic reports (December). On 4 December, the Secretary-General transmitted to the Security Council President the first periodic report [S/1997/954] of the Member States participating in MISAB following the Council's extension of MISAB's mandate until 6 February 1998.

The report, which described developments in the Central African Republic from 31 October to 4 December, noted that the provisions of the Bangui Agreements on the formation of a Government of national union, the adoption of an amnesty law covering offences in the context of the third rebellion in 1996, and the situation of former heads of State had already been implemented. The text of a law on the material benefits to be provided to former Presidents of the Republic was adopted on 30 October and it remained for the current head of State to enact the law.

The bill on the abandonment of the judicial enforcement of the parliamentary audit had been rejected by the National Assembly but would be redrafted and resubmitted.

As to the disarmament question, a coordination and security meeting had taken place on 5 November under the chairmanship of the Coordinator of the International Monitoring Committee, with the participation of the Minister of State for Territorial Administration, the Command of MISAB and the principal officials responsible for various national defence and security services. The meeting had defined a strategy to guide activities to recover the remaining missing arms in good condition, implementation of which began on 10 November. The report again provided an updated list of weapons that had been turned over to MISAB.

The issue of the implementation of the recommendations of the 1996 General Meeting on National Defence remained a problematic one between those in power and the opposition. Of the 282 recommendations, those holding the attention of all political circles involved the dissolution of the National Research and Investigation Centre and of the Survey, Research and Documentation Section, and the reduction of the Presidential Guard.

With regard to the objective of national reconciliation envisaged in the Bangui Agreements, awareness-raising seminars were being organized in various regions of the country between 18 November and 10 December, with the logistical, financial and technical support of UNDP. Conclusions from those seminars would be made available to the National Reconciliation Conference, planned for January 1998. A preparatory committee for the Conference was established on 17 October.

General Toure, Chairman of the International Monitoring Committee, returned to Bangui on 21 November 1997 after a consultative mission with the various heads of State of the countries participating in MISAB. Those meetings were of assistance in: evaluating progress made in implementing the Bangui Agreements; searching for solutions to those provisions that had not been implemented; studying the various hypotheses for the post-MISAB period; searching for solutions to the problem of arrears of wages; and studying the strategy to be adopted to convince the international community of the need to provide effective assistance to the Central African Republic.

The International Monitoring Committee and MISAB welcomed the adoption of resolution 1136(1997) and expressed the hope that the international community would respond within a reasonable time to the Council's invitation to contribute to the Trust Fund for the Central African Republic, which the Secretary-General had been requested to establish. They also hoped that all States, international organizations and financial institutions would assist in post-conflict development in the Central African Republic, as lasting peace could not be achieved without a minimum of economic and social development.

The Central African Republic was still experiencing difficulties in meeting its internal obligations (wages and salaries, pensions, scholarships, the functioning of the State apparatus) and its external commitments, in particular the repayment of arrears due to the Bretton Woods institutions. The greatest concern of the Central African authorities was therefore to find the necessary resources to resolve those problems.

The second periodic report [S/1998/3] of MISAB, which covered developments since 5 December 1997, stated that the process of restructuring the Central African Armed Forces, the National Gendarmerie and the Central African Police Force was inaugurated on 8 December. The general guidelines of the restructuring process envisaged a national, republican and multi-ethnic army, capable of supporting itself with a minimum of external support and able to participate in national development efforts, such as in the opening up of the interior of the country for engineering projects. A national commission, which was established to develop a restructuring plan based on those guidelines, began meeting on 15 December.

The report stressed that the Special Trust Fund established by the Secretary-General needed to be provisioned within a reasonable period of time. Pending the adequate provisioning of the Fund, an interim solution would be desirable, namely extension of the mandate of MISAB for a two-month period. The need for the presence of a military and security force after 6 February 1998 to stimulate the process of national reconciliation and create a peaceful environment for national elections to take place was a widely shared opinion among many officials in Bangui, the report noted.

The National Reconciliation Conference was scheduled to be held from 10 to 14 February 1998 and the preparatory committee was working on its objectives. It was widely agreed in various political circles that in order to create a favourable climate for reconciliation there was a need, among other things, to find a solution to the financial situation and to the problem of the victims of the rebellions, and to achieve full application of the provisions of the Bangui Agreements.

Pursuant to the Council's request to the Secretary-General to provide a report within three months on the implementation of resolution 1136(1997), a multidisciplinary mission from the UN Secretariat visited Bangui from 6 to 13 December to collect the elements necessary for the preparation of the report. The mission held extensive consultations with a number of international and national officials. The observations of the mission were to be presented to the Secretary-General in early 1998.

Angola

During 1997, a new Government of Unity and National Reconciliation (GURN) was formed in Angola, the culmination of a peace process launched by the United Nations to end almost two decades of civil war. On 1 July, the third United Nations Angola Verification Mission (UNAVEM III) was succeeded by the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola (MONUA).

United Nations peacekeepers were gradually withdrawn over the course of the year, from almost 6,000 troops in early 1997 to some 1,600 by the end of the year.

Military and political tensions continued in 1997 to threaten the security and operational capabilities of UN personnel, as well as the successful completion of the peace process. The Security Council in October imposed sanctions against the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA), and called on all Angolan parties to complete without further delay the remaining aspects of the peace process and to refrain from any action that might lead to renewed hostilities.

In its continuing task of implementing the 1994 Lusaka Protocol, a Joint Commission met a number of times during the year. Chaired by the Secretary-General's Special Representative, Alioune Blondin Beye (Mali), the body comprised representatives of three observer nations (Portugal, Russian Federation, United States), the Government of Angola and UNITA.

Implementation of Lusaka Protocol

During 1997, efforts were undertaken to implement the Lusaka Protocol [S/1994/1441], signed in November 1994 by the President of Angola, Jose Eduardo dos Santos, and the leader of UNITA, Jonas Savimbi. It consisted of eight annexes covering legal, military and political issues aimed at achieving lasting peace, stability and reconciliation in Angola. The Protocol dealt with, among other things, the disarming of civilians; integration and creation of a national military and a national police force; the electoral process; the quartering and demilitarization of UNITA troops; and norms of participation by UNITA members in a new government of national unity.

The peace process began in May 1991 when the two Angolan parties signed the "Acordos de Paz" [S/22609], a plan which brought about a ceasefire and eventually led to the first-ever multi-party elections in September 1992.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (January)

The Security Council on 30 January [meeting 3736], after consultations among its members, authorized the President to make the following statement [S/PRST/1997/3] on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council expresses its deep concern at the delay in the formation of a Government of Unity and National Reconciliation as a result of the failure of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to meet the timetable established by the Joint Commission in the context of the Lusaka Protocol.

The Council also notes with concern the slow pace of implementation of the remaining military aspects of the peace process, in particular the demobilization and integration of soldiers of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola into the Angolan Armed Forces.

The Council takes note of the conclusions of the meeting of the Joint Commission on 23 January 1997, according to which the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola agreed to implement the Lusaka Protocol.

the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation beyond 25 January 1997, the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola agreed to ensure that all of its National Assembly deputies and the members of the future Government of Unity and National Reconciliation designated by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola would be in Luanda on 12 February 1997 and the Government of Angola agreed to set a date for the inauguration of the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation immediately following the arrival of the deputies of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola.

The Council calls upon the parties to implement this agreement strictly and to form the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation without any linkages and without further delay. Failure to implement this agreement could jeopardize the peace process and lead the Security Council to consider appropriate measures, as indicated in relevant Security Council resolutions, against those responsible for the delays.

The Council emphasizes that the ultimate responsibility for restoring peace rests with the Angolans themselves. The Council reminds the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola and the Government of Angola that the international community can only provide assistance if progress is achieved in the peace process and that it will consider a United Nations presence in Angola after the expiration of the mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III in this context.

The Council expresses its appreciation to the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and the three observer countries for their efforts to assist the parties in Angola in advancing the peace process.

The Council will continue to monitor closely the implementation of the Joint Commission agreement.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Report of Secretary-General (February). On 7

February [S/1997/115], the Secretary-General reported on developments in Angola since December 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 103]. He observed that, despite some encouraging signs, the Angolan peace process was witnessing new delays and difficulties, and the pace of implementation of the remaining military and political tasks was painfully slow and disappointing.

The formation of a new Government, which was to include UNITA representatives, was postponed for a number of reasons, including the unresolved issue of the special status for Mr. Savimbi, leader of UNITA. The Secretary-General's Special Representative, Mr. Beye, together with the three observer States (Portugal, Russian Federation, United States), as well as the Government of Angola and UNITA, decided to launch the new Government following the arrival of UNITA deputies in Luanda.

The Secretary-General noted that the planning for a follow-on UN observer mission in Angola was continuing, as requested by the Security Council in resolution 1087(1996) [YUN 1996, p. 104]. That new mission would focus on political, police and human rights aspects of the situation, as well as humanitarian activities and public information in support of the national reconciliation process.

Although much progress had been made in the military area, the Secretary-General said, the incorporation of selected UNITA soldiers and officers into the Angolan Armed Forces (FAA) and the Angolan National Police (ANP) was proceeding at a very slow pace, while the process of demobilization had yet to commence in earnest. In addition, the overall security environment remained fragile, though the ceasefire continued to hold throughout Angola. Preparations were under way to undertake a gradual and progressive downsizing of the military units of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission (UNAVEM III).

UN troops were deployed at almost 80 sites throughout the country to verify various military and police aspects of the Lusaka Protocol, including the quartering of UNITA troops and the rapid reaction police, demobilization and formation of the joint Angolan Armed Forces, conducting patrols and performing other essential tasks.

UNAVEM engineer units had undertaken bridge reconstruction, demining and road rehabilitation, with a significant impact on fostering a climate of security and building confidence in Angola. Three demining brigades were operational, and another three were partially functional owing to a lack of supervisors. The mine-awareness programme, conducted by the Angolan National Institute for the Removal of Unexploded Ordnance (INAROE) and the United Nations Children's Fund, in collaboration with several international non-governmental organizations, had been instrumental in sensitizing more than half a million Angolans to the danger of mines, the Secretary-General reported.

UN programmes and agencies in Angola were involved in relief activities to meet the needs of approximately 100,000 ex-combatants and 340,000 dependants, as well as 1 million internally displaced persons and 30,000 returning refugees. The Secretary-General believed that focusing attention on the completion of the demobilization of ex-combatants would serve as an impetus to the return of displaced persons and refugees to their places of origin. The free movement of people and goods throughout the country had improved, although some restrictions remained in several provinces. Acts of banditry in some provinces continued to impede the delivery of humanitarian assistance. (See PART THREE, Chapter III.)

The Secretary-General concluded that the United Nations had done much over the past two years to stabilize the security situation in Angola. It remained of crucial importance that the peace programmes continued to receive the requisite financial support, for the Angolan peace process should be viewed as a long-term endeavour requiring vital rehabilitation and post-conflict reconstruction elements. The Secretary-General recommended that the Security Council extend the UNAVEM III mandate for one month, until 31 March 1997.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (February)

On 27 February [meeting 3743], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1098(1997). The draft [S/1997/162] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696(1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Recalling the statement of its President of 30 January 1997,

Reaffirming its commitment to preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Angola,

Reiterating the importance it attaches to full implementation by the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola of the Acordos de Paz, the Lusaka Protocol and the relevant Security Council resolutions,

Deeply concerned at the second delay in the formation of the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation, as a result of the failure of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to meet the timetable established by the Joint Commission, in the context of the Lusaka Protocol,

Also concerned at the continued delay in the implementation of the remaining political and military aspects of the peace process, including the selection and incorporation of soldiers of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola into the Angolan Armed Forces, and demobilization,

Stressing that it is imperative for the parties, in particular the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, to take urgent and decisive steps to fulfil their commitments in order to ensure the continued involvement of the international community in the peace process in Angola,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General dated 7 February 1997,

1. Welcomes the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General dated 7 February 1997;

2. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III until 31 March 1997;

3. Urges the Government of Angola and, in particular, the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to solve the remaining military and other issues and to establish, without further delay, the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation, and requests the Secretary-General to report by 20 March 1997 on the status of the formation of this Government;

4. Expresses its readiness, in the light of the report referred to in paragraph 3 above, to consider the imposition of measures, including, inter alia, those specifically mentioned in paragraph 26 of resolution 864(1993) of 15 September 1993;

5. Stresses that the good offices, mediation, and verification functions of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, in close collaboration with the Joint Commission, remain essential for the successful completion of the Angolan peace process;

6. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Report of Secretary-General (19 March). In a 19 March report [S/1997/239], submitted pursuant to resolution 1098(1997), the Secretary-General observed that despite determined and intensive efforts, especially on the part of his Special Representative, the new Government had yet to be established. That was due primarily to the failure of UNITA to send all of its officials to Luanda as previously agreed. Repeated delays in fulfilling that obligation were having a negative impact on the implementation of major aspects of the peace process, including the normalization of State administration throughout Angola and the demobilization of excess UNITA personnel, who continued to be cantoned in selection and demobilization centres. The situation was undermining the credibility of the peace process and could not be allowed to continue, he declared.

Aware that the patience of the international community was wearing thin, the Secretary-General said he had decided to visit Angola from 22 to 25 March to assess the situation and impress upon the parties the need to establish the new Government without any further delay.

On 21 March [meeting 3755], the President of the Security Council made the following statement [S/PRST/1997/17] on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council takes note of the report of the Secretary-General of 19 March 1997 and once again expresses its deep concern that the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation has not yet been established, owing primarily to the failure of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola to send all of its officials to Luanda as previously agreed. The Council reminds the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola of its obligations in accordance with the provisions of the Lusaka Protocol and subsequent agreements between the two parties.

The Council expresses its full support for the Secretary-General in his mission to Angola to assess the situation and impress upon the parties the need to establish the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation without any further delay. It calls upon the parties, in particular the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola, to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General, his Special Representative, and the observer States and to use the occasion of the Secretary-General's visit to install the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation.

The Council remains actively seized of the matter and recalls that, in accordance with resolution 1098(1997) of 27 February 1997, it will consider the imposition of measures, including, inter alia, those specifically mentioned in paragraph 26 of resolution 864(1993) of 15 September 1993, against the party responsible for the failure to form the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation. The Council, following the next report of the Secretary-General, will also consider the role of the United Nations in Angola after the expiration of the current mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III on 31 March 1997 on the basis of the progress made by the parties to full implementation of their commitments under the Acordos de Paz and the Lusaka Protocol as well as their obligations under the relevant Security Council resolutions.

Report of Secretary-General (25 March). In a 25 March report following his visit to Angola [S/1997/248], the Secretary-General said that his meetings in Angola had injected new vigour into the implementation of the Lusaka Protocol. A Joint Commission pronouncement on the future status of the UNITA leader and the promise by Mr. Savimbi to send to Luanda the rest of the UNITA National Assembly deputies with a view to establishing the new Government were encouraging signs.

As far as military matters were concerned, the Secretary-General observed that the ceasefire continued to hold throughout Angola, though small-scale incidents, perpetrated by FAA and UNITA forces alike, persisted. A rapid demobilization plan, endorsed by the Joint Commission, was delayed due to political and financial complications, including non-disbursement of the Government's special subsidy for the demobilization of ex-UNITA under-age personnel. On 12 March, both parties agreed to terminate the integration of UNITA troops into FAA. No progress had been made in dismantling the four remaining UNITA command posts. UNITA had not provided a list of its communications equipment despite numerous promises to do so, nor had it surrendered any further military or communications material. As at 20 March, only a small number of UNITA personnel had been selected by ANP, as many of those screened had not met the educational requirements set by the Government. ANP, in the meantime, continued attempts to disarm the civilian population, while the storage and custody of all weapons collected were monitored and verified by the civilian police of UNAVEM III.

The withdrawal of UNAVEM III troops proceeded as scheduled, the Secretary-General added. Despite administrative and logistic constraints, training and deployment of demining brigades continued. In addition, UNAVEM had diversified and stepped up its human rights promotion activities with the cooperation of the respective provincial committees.

The Secretary-General expressed his confidence in the possibility of establishing a new Government in the near future, pending the fulfilment of the commitments made by the Government of Angola and UNITA. Given the uncertainty as to the exact date for the new Government's inauguration, he recommended that the UNAVEM mandate be extended for two weeks only.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (31 March)

On 31 March [meeting 3759], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1102(1997). The draft [S/1997/262] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696(1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Recalling the statements of its President of 30 January 1997 and of 21 March 1997,

Reaffirming its commitment to preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Angola,

Reiterating the importance it attaches to full implementation by the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola of the Acordos de Paz, the Lusaka Protocol and the relevant Security Council resolutions,

Stressing that it is imperative for the parties to take urgent and decisive steps to fulfil their commitments in order to ensure the continued involvement of the international community in the peace process in Angola,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 25 March 1997,

1. Commends the efforts of the Secretary-General during his recent visit to Angola to move the peace process forward;

2. Welcomes the arrival in Luanda, although after considerable delay in the implementation of the provisions of the Lusaka Protocol, of the deputies of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola and future officials of the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation, in accordance with subsequent agreements between the two parties;

3. Also welcomes the decision by the Government of Angola, as announced by the Joint Commission, to install the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation on 11 April 1997;

4. Calls upon both parties to form the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation on that date;

5. Also calls upon both parties to remove all remaining obstacles to the peace process and to implement without further delay the remaining military and political aspects of the peace process, in particular the incorporation of soldiers of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola into the Angolan Armed Forces, demobilization, and normalization of State administration throughout the national territory;

6. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III until 16 April 1997, and requests the Secretary-General to report by 14 April 1997 on the status of the installation of the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation;

7. Decides also that, in accordance with resolution 1098(1997) of 27 February 1997, it remains ready to consider the imposition of measures, including, inter alia, those specifically mentioned in paragraph 26 of resolution 864(1993) of 15 September 1993, if the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation is not installed by 11 April 1997;

8. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Report of Secretary-General (April). In a 14 April report [S/1997/304], the Secretary-General reported that, on 11 April, a new Government of Unity and National Reconciliation (GURN) was inaugurated, marking a milestone in the Angolan peace process. He observed that never before had the country been so close to the final resolution of its devastating conflict and to the attainment of lasting peace. On 8 April, the National Assembly, acting on the special status of Mr. Savimbi, defined his rights, duties and immunities. On the following day, UNITA deputies were sworn in as members of the National Assembly.

The Secretary-General, stating that he was convinced that the international community should remain engaged in Angola until the full implementation of the Lusaka Protocol had been achieved, recommended the extension of the mandate of UNAVEM III until 30 June, on the understanding that the operation would gradually proceed with the transition to an observer mission, scheduled to begin on 1 July.

Much remained to be done in Angola, he continued, including the formation of the unified armed forces and the national police, demobilization of excess UNITA soldiers, disarmament of the civilian population, dismantling of illegal command posts and checkpoints, and handover by UNITA of its communications equipment. In addition, the Secretary-General expressed concern at reports of involvement by the Angolan parties in the Zairian conflict. Angolan President dos Santos and the UNITA leader, Mr. Savimbi, in discussions with the Secretary-General during his visit to Angola, denied that they were providing support to the warring parties in Zaire.

The slow pace of the incorporation of selected UNITA soldiers into FAA and ANP continued. The launching of a rapid demobilization programme had been postponed several times, creating additional hardships for UNITA soldiers and their families, and imposing further financial difficulties on the United Nations.

The report noted that the large numbers of deserters and absentees from the selection and demobilization centres remained a source of serious concern. Efforts were under way to make ex-combatants aware of the benefits of demobilization, in order to encourage those who had left the quartering areas to return as soon as possible.

To consolidate progress achieved towards the attainment of national reconciliation, the Secretary-General reaffirmed his hope for a meeting between President dos Santos and Mr. Savimbi.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (April)

On 16 April [meetings 3767 & 3769], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1106(1997). The draft [S/1997/316] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696(1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent resolutions,

Reaffirming its commitment to preserve the unity and territorial integrity of Angola,

Reiterating the importance it attaches to full implementation by the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola of the Acordos de Paz, the Lusaka Protocol and the relevant Security Council resolutions,

Expressing its satisfaction with the recent progress in the peace process, including the approval by the Angolan National Assembly of the special status for the leader of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola as the leader of the largest opposition party and the seating of the deputies of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola in the National Assembly on 9 April 1997,

Reiterating that the ultimate responsibility for the completion of the peace process rests with the Angolans themselves,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General of 7 February 1997 and 14 April 1997,

1. Warmly welcomes the inauguration on 11 April 1997 of the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation;

2. Strongly urges the parties, acting through the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation and with the continued support of the Joint Commission, to complete without delay the remaining military aspects of the peace process, including the incorporation of the soldiers of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola into the Angolan Armed Forces and demobilization, and the selection and incorporation of personnel of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola into the Angolan National Police, as well as to move ahead with the political tasks, in particular the normalization of State administration throughout the national territory; in this context, considers that a meeting between the President of Angola and the leader of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola within the territory of Angola would contribute to this process of national reconciliation, and expresses its hope that such a meeting will take place;

3. Welcomes the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General of 14 April 1997;

4. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III until 30 June 1997 to assist in the implementation of these remaining tasks, with the understanding that the Mission will begin, as appropriate, to proceed with the transition towards an observer mission as described in section VII of the report of the Secretary-General of 7 February 1997 using resources already provided or allocated to the Mission for the period ending 30 June 1997;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to complete the withdrawal of military units of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III as scheduled, taking into account progress in the remaining relevant aspects of the peace process;

6. Expresses its intention to consider the establishment of a follow-on United Nations presence, bearing in mind the reports of the Secretary-General of 7 February 1997 and 14 April 1997, which would succeed the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III, and requests the Secretary-General to submit for its consideration, no later than 6 June 1997, a report containing his recommendations regarding the structure, specific goals, and cost implications of such a mission;

7. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Report of Secretary-General (June). The Secretary-General, in a 5 June report [S/1997/438], called for a continued but scaled-down presence of the United Nations in Angola following the expiration of the mandate of UNAVEM III on 30 June. He recommended the establishment, for a period of seven months, starting on 1 July 1997, of a new operation to be known as the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola/Missão de Observação das Nações Unidas em Angola (MONUA). In addition to those responsibilities noted in his 7 February report (see above), the overall mandate of the follow-on mission would be to assist the Angolan parties in consolidating peace and national reconciliation, enhancing confidence-building and creating an environment conducive to long-term stability, democratic development and rehabilitation of the country. The Secretary-General detailed the structure and main objectives of MONUA, including political and military aspects, police matters, human rights issues, humanitarian assistance, and administrative matters.

The Secretary-General reported that despite persistent difficulties and delays, events in Angola were generally moving in a positive direction, especially with the formation of GURN, the return of UNITA deputies to the National Assembly, the beginning of the normalization of State administration, and the demobilization of ex-combatants.

Tensions in the northern part of Angola had underscored the unsettled situation prevailing in some areas; also, the psychological and political barriers between the parties were still wide. In that connection, the Secretary-General once again called for a meeting between President dos Santos and Mr. Savimbi to facilitate and accelerate the process of national reconciliation, as well as to resolve the precarious situation in the border area between Angola and the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

The process of extension of State administration to areas formerly under UNITA control was proceeding at a slow pace and, in some instances, had given rise to organized protest. Consultations were also proceeding on the transformation of UNITA into a national political party.

The freedom of movement of UNAVEM military and police observers had been temporarily restricted and some UNAVEM personnel had been attacked.

More than 23,000 demobilized soldiers and their dependants had been transported to areas of origin or choice and provided with basic medical care and multi-purpose reintegration kits. The rapid demobilization programme began on 14 April in the central and southern regions and would eventually be extended to other areas of Angola. The report also noted that the government programme for the disarmament of the civilian population had entered into the second phase of implementation, but showed little tangible progress.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (June)

On 30 June [meeting 3795], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1118(1997) establishing MONUA. The draft [S/1997/498] had been prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696(1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent resolutions,

Reaffirming also its commitment to the unity and territorial integrity of Angola,

Recognizing the successful contribution of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III to the restoration of peace and the process of national reconciliation on the basis of the Acordos de Paz, the Lusaka Protocol and relevant Security Council resolutions,

Recognizing also that the formation of the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation provides a strong basis for the process of national reconciliation,

Emphasizing the need for the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola (UNITA) to implement without further delay the remaining political and military tasks of the peace process,

Expressing its concern about the recent increase in tensions, especially in the north-eastern provinces, and the attacks by UNITA on posts and personnel of the Verification Mission,

Reiterating that the ultimate responsibility for the completion of the peace process rests with the Angolan people themselves,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 5 June 1997,

1. Welcomes the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General of 5 June 1997;

2. Decides to establish, as of 1 July, the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola with the objectives, mandate and organizational structure recommended by the Secretary-General in section VII of his report of 5 June 1997;

3. Also decides, with the expectation of full completion of the Mission by 1 February 1998, that the initial mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola will extend until 31 October 1997, and requests the Secretary-General to report on the situation by 15 August 1997;

4. Further decides that the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola will assume responsibility for all components and assets of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III remaining in Angola, including formed military units, to deploy as appropriate until they are withdrawn;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to take into account the situation on the ground and progress in completing the remaining relevant aspects of the peace process in implementing the scheduled withdrawal of United Nations military units, and to report thereon in the context of the review requested in paragraph 3 above;

6. Calls upon the Government of Angola to apply mutatis mutandis to the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola and its members the Agreement concluded on 3 May 1995 between the United Nations and the Government of Angola on the Status of the United Nations Peacekeeping Operation in Angola (the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III) and requests the Secretary-General to confirm urgently that this has been done;

7. Endorses the recommendation of the Secretary-General that the Special Representative continue to chair the Joint Commission, as established under the Lusaka Protocol, which has proved to be a vital conflict resolution and implementation mechanism;

8. Calls upon the Government of Angola and in particular UNITA to cooperate fully with the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola and to ensure the freedom of movement and the safety of its personnel;

9. Strongly urges the Government of Angola and in particular UNITA to complete the remaining political aspects of the peace process, including the normalization of State administration throughout the national territory according to a timetable and procedures agreed upon by both parties within the context of the Joint Commission, the transformation of the UNITA radio station into a non-partisan broadcasting facility, and the transformation of UNITA into a political party;

10. Also strongly urges the Government of Angola and in particular UNITA to complete without delay the remaining military aspects of the peace process, including the registration and demobilization of all remaining military elements, the elimination of all obstacles to the free circulation of people and goods, and the disarmament of the civilian population;

11. Appeals in the strongest terms to both parties to refrain from any use of force which could obstruct the full implementation of the peace process;

12. Calls upon the Government of Angola to notify the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola of any troop movements, in accordance with the provisions of the Lusaka Protocol;

13. Demands that UNITA provide to the Joint Commission, without delay, complete information regarding all armed personnel under its control, including the security detachment of the Leader of the Largest Opposition Party, the so-called "mining police", armed UNITA personnel returning from outside the national boundaries, and any other armed UNITA personnel not previously reported to the United Nations, in order for them to be verified, disarmed and demobilized in accordance with the Lusaka Protocol and agreements between the parties in the context of the Joint Commission;

14. Expresses its hope that the issues now delaying the full implementation of the Lusaka Protocol may be resolved through a meeting, within the national territory, between the President of Angola and the Leader of the Largest Opposition Party;

15. Urges the international community to provide assistance to facilitate the demobilization and social reintegration of ex-combatants, the resettlement of displaced persons, and the rehabilitation and reconstruction of the Angolan national economy in order to consolidate the gains in the peace process;

16. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and the personnel of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III for assisting the parties in Angola to implement the peace process;

17. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Further developments

Following the termination of UNAVEM III, there were increased tensions in Angola during the month of July.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (July)

The Security Council met on 23 July [meeting 3803], and its President issued a statement [S/PRST/1997/39] on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council expresses its deep concern at recent destabilizing actions in Angola, in particular the failure of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola (UNITA) to comply with resolution 1118(1997) of 30 June 1997 and its continued efforts to restore its military capabilities. The Council considers the information submitted by UNITA to the Joint Commission on 21 July 1997 with regard to the strength of its armed forces, the extension of State administration and the activities of Vorgan radio station to be neither complete nor credible.

The Council condemns the mistreatment of the personnel of the United Nations and international humanitarian organizations in areas under UNITA control, as well as the harassment of United Nations Observer Mission in Angola personnel in the exercise of their functions. Those actions by UNITA are unacceptable and contrary to its commitments under the Lusaka Protocol and to Security Council resolutions. In this regard, the Council fully supports the joint statement by the Observer Mission and the representatives of the three observer States issued on 14 July 1997.

The Council notes with concern that the increasing tension in the northern part of the country is rapidly spreading to the central and southern provinces, with very dangerous implications for the implementation of the remaining tasks of the peace process, including those referred to in its resolution 1118(1997). The Council calls upon both parties to refrain from any use of force, in accordance with their commitments under the Lusaka Protocol.

The Council also calls upon both parties to continue to work closely with the Joint Commission, and in particular UNITA, to cooperate fully with the Observer Mission and to ensure the freedom of movement and the safety of its personnel, as well as of international humanitarian organizations.

The Council reiterates its belief that the long-awaited meeting within the territory of Angola between the President of Angola and the leader of UNITA could greatly contribute to the reduction of tension and to the process of national reconciliation.

The Council notes with concern reports from the Observer Mission that unauthorized aircraft have landed in territory under UNITA control. In this context, the Council calls upon all States to comply fully with paragraph 19 of resolution 864(1993) of 15 September 1993.

The Council reaffirms its readiness to consider the imposition of measures, inter alia, those specifically mentioned in paragraph 26 of its resolution 864(1993), unless UNITA takes irreversible and concrete steps immediately to fulfil its obligations under the Lusaka Protocol. These steps should include demilitarization of all its forces, transformation of its radio station Vorgan into a non-partisan broadcasting facility and full cooperation in the process of the normalization of State administration throughout Angola. The Council requests the Secretary-General to keep it fully informed on the implementation of those tasks and to assess their fulfilment by UNITA in his report which is to be submitted by 15 August 1997 in accordance with Council resolution 1118(1997).

The Council will continue to monitor the situation in Angola closely and will remain seized of the matter.

Report of Secretary-General (August). In a 13 August report [S/1997/640], the Secretary-General stated his intention to further postpone the withdrawal of the UN military units from Angola. That was due to the precarious situation in the country, the need to give the parties an additional chance to complete the peace process and taking into account the wish of the Government of Angola to maintain a sizeable UN presence until the demobilization process was over. He hoped that the Government and UNITA realized the dangers involved in any further deterioration of the military situation.

The Secretary-General noted that the peace process in Angola was experiencing some of the most serious difficulties since the signing of the Lusaka Protocol in 1994, due mainly to UNITA's delays in implementing its obligations under that Protocol. Those obligations included the complete demilitarization of UNITA, the restoration of State administration throughout the country, the transformation of the radio station Vorgan into a non-partisan station, and the true transformation of UNITA into a political party. The Secretary-General emphasized that the immediate normalization of State administration was of crucial importance, not only for the unity and territorial integrity of the country but also for the economic and social reconstruction of Angola. Last-minute half-hearted concessions by UNITA, under pressure and on the eve of Security Council deliberations, were no longer acceptable, the Secretary-General said.

The mobilization of troops and military equipment, conscription and an increase in hostile propaganda continued to be registered. Reports were received of several attacks by UNITA on government positions, as well as attacks on villages by some elements of FAA. There were also clear indications of extensive military preparations and planting of new mines on the part of UNITA. In the meantime, the selection and incorporation of UNITA personnel into FAA and ANP had been concluded. The hostile attitude of local UNITA commanders and some officers of ANP had slowed down the demobilization process, to the point that that activity had yet to commence in parts of the country.

There were worrisome reports, the Secretary-General went on, of the resumption of mine laying in some parts of the country, compounded by the imposition by UNITA of additional restrictions on survey and other demining activities. The United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), responsible for the UN mine-action programme in Angola, signed a document with the Government for the continuation of support to the programme for another two years.

The Secretary-General urged the parties, but in particular UNITA, to respect the safety and security of personnel of the United Nations, its programmes and agencies, as well as the staff of other international organizations who had helped the Angolan people in their struggle for a lasting peace.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (August)

The Security Council, on 28 August [meeting 3814], adopted unanimously resolution 1127 (1997). The draft [S/1997/669] was sponsored by Portugal, the Russian Federation and the United States.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696(1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent resolutions,

Recalling the statement of its President of 23 July 1997, which expressed its readiness to consider the imposition of measures on the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola (UNITA), inter alia, those specifically mentioned in paragraph 26 of resolution 864(1993),

Emphasizing the urgent need for the Government of Angola and in particular UNITA to complete without further delay the implementation of their obligations under the Acordos de Paz, the Lusaka Protocol and the relevant Security Council resolutions,

Expressing its grave concern at the serious difficulties in the peace process, which are mainly the result of delays by UNITA in the implementation of its obligations under the Lusaka Protocol,

Expressing its firm commitment to preserve the unity, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Angola,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 13 August 1997, Strongly deploring the failure by UNITA to comply with its obligations under the Acordos de Paz, the Lusaka Protocol and with relevant Security Council resolutions, in particular resolution 1118(1997),

A

1. Demands that the Government of Angola and in particular UNITA complete fully and without further delay the remaining aspects of the peace process and refrain from any action which might lead to renewed hostilities;

11. Requests the Committee created pursuant to resolution 864(1993):

(a) To draw up guidelines expeditiously for the implementation of paragraph 4 of the present resolution, including the designation of officials and of adult members of their immediate families whose entry or transit is to be prevented and whose travel documents, visas or residence permits are to be suspended or cancelled in accordance with paragraphs 4 (a) and 4 (b) above;

18. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and the personnel of the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola for assisting the parties in Angola to implement the peace process;

19. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Report of Secretary-General (September).

The Secretary-General on 24 September [S/1997/741] reported that he was not yet in a position to advise the Security Council that UNITA had taken the necessary steps to comply with resolution 1127(1997), especially as it pertained to the demilitarization of UNITA forces. That resolution had called for the imposition of sanctions against UNITA, starting on 30 September 1997, unless the Council decided that UNITA had taken concrete and irreversible steps to comply with all the obligations set out in the resolution. Such steps included the provision by UNITA to the United Nations of credible and verifiable information about the strength of its residual armed elements and weapons, and the extension of State administration to UNITA-controlled areas.

The overall slow pace of the process continued to raise doubts about the intentions of UNITA, the Secretary-General observed. The general population had welcomed the normalization of the State administration, hoping that it would lead to the improvement of their daily lives and to the free circulation of people and goods. While a significant number of localities had been handed over to the Government, no progress had been registered in the extension of government authority in a number of strategically important UNITA-controlled areas, especially in the diamond-rich province of Lunda Norte. Public awareness campaigns in support of that exercise had helped to allay some of the initial concerns of the population. MONUA had provided its good offices and logistical and security support to facilitate the implementation of that crucial aspect of the Lusaka Protocol.

At the same time, some advances had been made by UNITA towards the establishment of a non-partisan broadcasting facility to replace radio Vorgan, which had made tangible efforts to reduce the level of hostile propaganda.

The Secretary-General urged the two Angolan parties to comply with and to implement all the remaining tasks under the Lusaka Protocol, for it was only on that basis that eventually the peace process would bring about genuine stability and national reconciliation in Angola.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (September)

On 29 September [meeting 3820], the Security Council, in adopting unanimously resolution 1130(1997), decided that the imposition of sanctions, as called for in resolution 1127(1997), was to be postponed until 30 October. The draft [S/1997/750] had been prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 696(1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent resolutions, and in particular resolution 1127(1997) of 28 August 1997,

Noting the report of the Secretary-General of 24 September 1997 and subsequent information on steps taken by the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola (UNITA),

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Stresses the need for UNITA to comply fully with all the obligations set out in resolution 1127(1997);

2. Decides that the coming into force of the measures specified in paragraph 4 of resolution 1127(1997) shall be postponed until 0001 hours Eastern Standard Time on 30 October 1997;

3. Affirms its readiness to review the imposition of the measures referred to in paragraph 2 above, and to consider the imposition of additional measures in accordance with paragraphs 8 and 9 of resolution 1127(1997);

4. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Report of Secretary-General (October). In a

17 October report [S/1997/807], the Secretary-General stated that unless additional concrete steps were taken to accelerate the implementation of the remaining tasks, it would be difficult to consider that UNITA had taken all steps necessary to comply with the provisions of resolution 1127(1997).

The Secretary-General affirmed that the presence of the UN military was still required to complete the demobilization of UNITA forces, and that the presence of MONUA in the country remained essential for a successful conclusion to the peace process. Consequently, he advised postponing the withdrawal of UN troops and recommended that the mandate of MONUA be extended for three months, until 31 January 1998. Adequate financial and material assistance from the international donor community, the Secretary-General added, was still needed to support the peace process, especially for the reintegration of demobilized soldiers, demining activities and other pressing humanitarian projects, such as the resettlement of internally displaced persons.

The Secretary-General noted that there had been no significant progress in the demilitarization of UNITA and in the extension of State administration into the areas controlled by Mr. Savimbi's troops, due to political and logistical problems connected mainly to a lack of cooperation on the part of UNITA. At the same time, he urged the Government of Angola to notify MONUA of any movements of its armed forces.

Tensions persisted in a number of provinces, even though the military situation in the country remained generally calm. Despite some restrictions imposed on their verification activities, MONUA military observers were able to monitor all significant developments and had investigated allegations about cease-fire violations. MONUA also had verified the total strength and location of residual UNITA forces.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (October)

On 29 October [meeting 3827], the Security Council adopted unanimously resolution 1135 (1997). The draft [S/1997/823] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 696(1991) of 30 May 1991 and all subsequent resolutions,

Expressing its firm commitment to preserve the unity, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Angola,

Stressing the urgent need for the Government of Angola and in particular the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola (UNITA) to complete without further delay the implementation of their obligations under the Acordos de Paz, the Lusaka Protocol and relevant Security Council resolutions,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 17 October 1997,

Expressing its deep concern at the lack of significant progress in the peace process in Angola since the report of the Secretary-General of 24 September 1997,

Strongly deploring the failure by UNITA to comply fully with its obligations under the Acordos de Paz, the Lusaka Protocol and relevant Security Council resolutions, in particular resolution 1127(1997) of 28 August 1997, Recognizing the important role of the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola at this critical stage of the peace process,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola until 30 January 1998, and requests the Secretary-General to submit a report and recommendations no later than 13 January 1998 on the United Nations presence in Angola after 30 January 1998;

2. Endorses the recommendation of the Secretary-General in his report of 17 October 1997 to postpone the withdrawal of United Nations military formed units until the end of November 1997 according to the plan outlined in paragraph 15 of the above-mentioned report, and requests the Secretary-General to report no later than 8 December 1997 on the schedule for the resumed withdrawal of military personnel, taking into account the situation on the ground;

3. Demands that the Government of Angola and in particular UNITA complete fully and without further delay the remaining aspects of the peace process and refrain from any action which might lead to renewed hostilities;

4. Demands also that the Government of Angola and in particular UNITA cooperate fully with the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola, including by providing full access for its verification activities, and reiterates its call on the Government of Angola to notify the Observer Mission in a timely manner of its troop movements, in accordance with the provisions of the Lusaka Protocol and established procedures;

Determining that the present situation constitutes a threat to international peace and security in the region,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

5. Demands that UNITA comply immediately and without any conditions with the obligations set out in resolution 1127(1997), including full cooperation in the normalization of State administration throughout Angola, including in Andulo and Bailundo;

6. Takes note that the measures specified in paragraph 4 of resolution 1127(1997) come into force at 0001 hours Eastern Standard Time on 30 October 1997 in accordance with paragraph 2 of resolution 1130(1997) of 29 September 1997, and reaffirms its readiness to review these measures or to consider the imposition of additional measures in accordance with paragraphs 8 and 9 of resolution 1127(1997);

7. Requests the Secretary-General, in lieu of the reports referred to in paragraph 8 of resolution 1127(1997), to report by 8 December 1997, and every ninety days thereafter, on the compliance of UNITA with all the obligations set out in paragraph 5 above;

8. Requests Member States to provide to the Committee created pursuant to resolution 864(1993) information on the measures they have adopted to implement the measures specified in paragraph 4 of resolution 1127(1997) no later than 1 December 1997;

9. Requests the Committee created pursuant to resolution 864(1993) to report to the Council by 15 December 1997 regarding the actions taken by Member States to implement the measures specified in paragraph 4 of resolution 1127(1997);

10. Reiterates its belief that a meeting in Angola between the President of the Republic of Angola and the leader of UNITA could facilitate the process of peace and national reconciliation;

11. Urges the international community to provide assistance to facilitate the demobilization and social reintegration of ex-combatants, demining, the resettlement of displaced persons and the rehabilitation and reconstruction of the Angolan economy in order to consolidate the gains in the peace process;

12. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and the personnel of the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola for assisting the parties in Angola to implement the peace process;

13. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Report of Secretary-General (December). The Secretary-General, reporting on 4 December [S/1997/959], said that the peace process continued to proceed slowly, with intermittent surges of UNITA cooperation and long periods of stagnation. Both parties, but in particular UNITA, were responsible for that unsatisfactory state of affairs, the Secretary-General observed. UNITA, in fact, had severed almost all contacts with the Government and MONUA three weeks after the imposition of sanctions against it on 30 October, under Security Council resolution 1135(1997).

The resumption by UNITA on 21 November of the implementation of its remaining tasks had slightly improved the security situation in the country. However, UNITA had still delayed the demilitarization of its troops and the extension of State administration throughout Angola, which had been concluded in only 4 of 18 provinces. As of 4 December, 40,059 of 78,887 UNITA personnel had been demobilized; of the 6,889 UNITA registered "residual" personnel, 424 had been demobilized. At the same time, UNITA troops had restricted the freedom of movement of MONUA and had attacked UN staff members. The Secretary-General called on the Government to conduct the extension of State administration in such a way that it would not aggravate the already tense situation in some areas of the country, and to cooperate fully with the United Nations in the investigation of the alleged disappearances and detentions of UNITA supporters.

As many tasks which had to be performed by UN troops had come to an end, especially the completion of the quartering of UNITA troops, the Secretary-General noted that he intended to proceed with the drawdown of MONUA's military personnel. He welcomed the fact that President dos Santos and Mr. Savimbi had agreed on the need to meet in the near future, for such a meeting had the potential to enhance mutual trust and to improve prospects for national reconciliation.

Other matters

Sanctions Committee

In a 31 December letter [S/1997/1027], the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 864(1993) [YUN 1993, p. 256] to monitor sanctions against UNITA reported on its activities in 1997.

The Committee had held two meetings during the year. The Chairman described Committee actions pursuant to its new tasks as set out in Council resolution 1127(1997). Among other things, the Committee was to draw up guidelines for the implementation of sanctions against UNITA and to report to the Council regarding the actions taken by States to implement those measures. After an initial postponement in September by resolution 1130(1997), the letter noted, sanctions had been imposed by the Council on 30 October following the approval of resolution 1135(1997).

On 19 December, the Committee transmitted to all States, international organizations and specialized agencies a list of senior UNITA officials whose entry or transit was to be prevented by all States, and whose travel documents, visas or residence permits were to be suspended or cancelled, in accordance with resolution 1127(1997). The Committee was also compiling a list of aircraft registered in Angola.

In accordance with resolution 1135(1997), Member States were required to provide the Committee with information on measures adopted to implement sanctions against UNITA. As at 31 December, replies had been received by 29 States, as listed in the report [S/1997/977 & Add.1] of the Committee to the Council.

MONUA financing and composition

In September 1997 [A/52/385 & Corr.1], the Secretary-General presented a report to the General Assembly containing a proposed budget for the operation of MONUA for the period from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998, including requirements for the phased drawdown of UNAVEM III. The budget provided for the deployment for MONUA of 86 military observers, 170 contingent personnel and 345 civilian police observers, supported by a civilian establishment of 242 international and 163 local staff and 65 United Nations Volunteers.

That report, together with the Secretary-General's report [A/51/494/Add.3] on the financial performance of UNAVEM III for the period from 1 January to 30 June 1996, were considered by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ), which issued its own report in October [A/52/478 & Corr.1]. ACABQ recommended that the Assembly appropriate the amount of $ 155 million gross for the operation of MONUA from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 31 October [meeting 42], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee [A/52/547], approved financing for MONUA by adopting resolution 52/8 A without vote [agenda items 123 & 159].

Financing of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission and financing of the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola

The General Assembly,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, Bearing in mind Security Council resolutions 626(1988) of 20 December 1988, by which the Council established the United Nations Angola Verification Mission, 696(1991) of 30 May 1991, by which the Council decided to entrust a new mandate to the United Nations Angola Verification Mission (thenceforth called the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II), 976(1995) of 8 February 1995, by which the Council authorized the establishment of a peacekeeping operation (thenceforth called the United Nations Angola Verification Mission III) and 1118(1997) of 30 June 1997, by which the Council decided to establish, as from 1 July 1997, the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola for an initial period of four months until 31 October 1997,

Recalling its resolution 43/231 of 16 February 1989 on the financing of the Verification Mission and its subsequent resolutions and decisions thereon, the latest of which was resolution 51/213 of 18 December 1996,

Reaffirming that the costs of the Observer Mission are expenses of the Organization to be borne by Member States in accordance with Article 17, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations,

Recalling its previous decisions regarding the fact that, in order to meet the expenditures caused by the Mission, a different procedure is required from that applied to meet expenditures of the regular budget of the United Nations,

Taking into account the fact that the economically more developed countries are in a position to make relatively larger contributions and that the economically less developed countries have a relatively limited capacity to contribute towards such an operation,

Bearing in mind the special responsibilities of the States permanent members of the Security Council, as indicated in General Assembly resolution 1874(S-IV) of 27 June 1963, in the financing of such operations,

Mindful of the fact that it is essential to provide the Observer Mission with the necessary financial resources to enable it to fulfil its responsibilities under the relevant resolutions of the Security Council,

Concerned that the Secretary-General continues to face difficulties in meeting the obligations of the Mission on a current basis, including reimbursement to current and former troop-contributing States,

1. Takes note of the status of contributions to the United Nations Angola Verification Mission as at 15 October 1997, including the contributions outstanding in the amount of 89,144,761 United States dollars, representing 10 per cent of the total assessed contributions from the inception of the Verification Mission to the period ending 30 June 1997, notes that some 26 per cent of the Member States have paid their assessed contributions in full, and urges all other Member States concerned, in particular those in arrears, to ensure the payment of their outstanding assessed contributions;

2. Expresses concern about the financial situation with regard to peacekeeping activities, in particular as regards the reimbursement of troop contributors, which bear an additional burden owing to overdue payments by Member States of their assessments;

3. Expresses its appreciation to those Member States which have paid their assessed contributions in full;

4. Urges all Member States to make every possible effort to ensure the payment of their assessed contributions to the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola in full and on time;

5. Takes note of the observations and recommendations contained in the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions;

6. Decides to maintain the posts of Deputy Special Representative of the Secretary-General and Chief Administrative Officer at their originally authorized levels, and approves the reclassification of the post of Chief of the Human Rights Division at the D-1 level;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to take all necessary action to ensure that the Observer Mission is administered with a maximum of efficiency and economy;

8. Republic of the Congo

The Republic of the Congo experienced renewed political and security unrest during 1997. In October, after almost five months of factional fighting, soldiers loyal to former President Denis Sassou-Nguesso defeated President Pascal Lissouba's troops and gained control of the country.

Fighting had erupted in the capital city, Brazzaville, on 5 June when the armed forces of President Lissouba clashed with the militia of Mr. Sassou-Nguesso. The conflict abated for some weeks following the signing of a ceasefire agreement in mid-July, but resumed in August.

Owing to the security situation, there was virtually no access to most parts of the Congo. All UN agencies had been evacuated from the capital, resulting in, except in the city of Pointe-Noire, no permanent international presence in the country.

Efforts to end the crisis were led by the International Mediation Committee chaired by President El Hadj Omar Bongo of Gabon. The joint UN/Organization of African Unity (OAU) Special Representative, Mohammed Sahnoun, was also actively involved, in close collaboration with the Governments of States within and outside the region.

The Security Council endorsed the request made by the International Mediation Committee for the deployment to Brazzaville of an appropriate international force. It approved the three conditions set by the Secretary-General for the establishment of such a force: adherence to an agreed ceasefire; agreement to international control of Brazzaville airport; and a commitment by the parties to a negotiated settlement covering all political and military aspects of the crisis. The Secretary-General devised plans for the deployment of such a force and sent a technical survey team to Libreville, Gabon, and Brazzaville in July to assess the situation on the ground.

In a 13 August statement, the Council determined that the conditions for the operation had not been met. Furthermore, the rapid evolution of events in October, which resulted in a change in regime and in a relative improvement in the security situation in Brazzaville, led the United Nations to shift its focus from military planning towards greater humanitarian assistance. The United Nations Security Coordinator downgraded the security level to Phase Four for the entire country, which meant that security and essential humanitarian staff could go back to work in the Congo.

Political and security developments

Communications (June/July). The Republic of the Congo on 13 June [S/1997/459] transmitted to the President of the Security Council a press release issued in New York on 10 June, stating that Brazzaville had become the theatre of bloody clashes between government forces and former President Sassou-Nguesso's militiamen.

It was recalled that since August 1992, when he was defeated in the first democratic presidential election, Mr. Sassou had been seeking to destabilize the country by fomenting an armed insurrection. The current violence, which was triggered by the killing of a law enforcement officer by one of Mr. Sassou's militiamen, was taking place despite the fact that Mr. Sassou and the other main political leaders had signed an agreement on 31 May 1997 undertaking to disarm the militias and to hold presidential elections on 27 July. That agreement was based on an initiative of the head of State and under the auspices of the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization.

The press release also accused Mr. Sassou of smuggling large quantities of weapons into the country from the former Zaire and of bringing large numbers of militiamen to Brazzaville in an attempt to regain power through a coup d'etat. The Government of the Congo called on the world community for support in preserving its democratic institutions.

On 20 June [S/1997/483], the Secretary-General transmitted to the Security Council President a letter from President Bongo of Gabon dated 16 June. President Bongo said that the International Mediation Committee, under his chairmanship and consisting of heads of State and Government of the subregion, had met in Libreville on 16 June. Since the ceasefire, which went into force on 15 June, was particularly fragile, the Committee requested that the Council authorize the deployment of an inter-African force to Brazzaville. The purpose of the force would be to ensure respect for the ceasefire and to establish an environment favourable to the holding of presidential elections. The Committee had obtained the agreement of all the Congolese parties concerned and the assurance that they would cooperate with such a force.

In a 20 June letter [S/1997/484], the Secretary-General reported to the Security Council President on the fighting that had erupted in Brazzaville, which had claimed the lives of hundreds of civilians. The humanitarian situation in the city and in some other areas of the country had worsened significantly and the expatriate community, including UN staff, had been evacuated from the city with the help of international forces.

The efforts of the International Mediation Committee, which was assisted by the Special Representative of the United Nations and OAU in the region, Mr. Sahnoun, had resulted in a temporary ceasefire. The Secretary-General said that one option for the formation and deployment of an inter-African force, as requested by the Committee, was the establishment of a multinational force by a group of Member States with the authorization of the Security Council. The second option would be to deploy a UN peacekeeping force, composed mainly of African contingents provided with adequate military capability and with sufficient financial and logistical support to fulfil the tasks entrusted to it. Given the gravity of the crisis and the experience of the international community in dealing with similar situations, it was estimated that the initial size of the force would have to be no less than battalion group strength (approximately 1,600 to 1,800 troops) with the necessary support units (400 to 800 people), plus UN military observers.

The Secretary-General noted that although a force of that size and configuration could be deployed only with adequate preparation, delays in deployment could adversely affect the ceasefire arrangements mediated by the International Mediation Committee. He therefore stressed that it was important for the international community to take urgent steps in support of the regional initiative.

In order to avoid the creation of a vacuum, the Secretary-General intended to request countries with proven military capability to dispatch to Brazzaville an advance military detachment to be entrusted with establishing a secure environment for the deployment of the eventual force. Such an advance detachment would operate under the command and control arrangements agreed between potential contributors and would also include a limited number of UN military observers to provide liaison with the warring parties and to verify the ceasefire. The advance military detachment could consist of troops fielded by regional States as well as by other Member States, especially those which could ensure rapid deployment and logistical support. The support of French troops would be desirable, the Secretary-General said, in the light of the positive role played by them in Brazzaville during the preceding weeks. The United Nations would be ready to provide, on a temporary basis, 40 to 50 military observers who could be drawn from existing UN peacekeeping operations to be deployed to Brazzaville on short notice.

In a 21 June letter [S/1997/486] to the Security Council President, the Congo endorsed the idea of sending a peacekeeping force to Brazzaville to restore peace and provide reassurance for the electoral process. The elections were to be carried out consensually by the Government, the political parties and civil society under the supervision of international observers with UN guarantees.

At an informal meeting on 21 June, the Security Council authorized the Secretary-General to consult with potential troop contributors to a force in the Congo.

On 30 June [S/1997/502], the Congo informed the Secretary-General that it proposed making available to the United Nations the sum of $ 1 million as a contribution to the financial effort required for the rapid deployment of the peacekeeping force.

On 26 June [S/1997/495], the Secretary-General transmitted to the Council President letters from the Secretary-General of OAU, Salim Ahmed Salim, and from President Pascal Lissouba of the Congo.

In his 23 June letter, Mr. Salim said that the Central Organ of the OAU Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution had met that day in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, and had fully supported the request of President Bongo for an inter-African force in Brazzaville. In a communique issued at the end of its deliberations, the Central Organ appealed to all African States, especially those with relevant capability, to make available contingents that could serve as part of the force and called on all parties to the conflict to cooperate fully with the International Mediation Committee by committing themselves to a ceasefire and to a political solution to the dispute.

President Lissouba, in his letter of 24 June, affirmed that he supported the request for the deployment of an inter-African peacekeeping force, and, in particular, for the securing of polling stations during the presidential elections and for the decommissioning of weapons, especially the neutralization of heavy weapons.

By a 2 July letter [S/1997/512], Togo transmitted to the Secretary-General the text of a declaration adopted by the Conference of Chiefs of State and Heads of Government of the West African Economic and Monetary Union (WAEMU) on security and peace in Africa, held in Lome on 23 June. In that declaration, the WAEMU member States affirmed their willingness to participate in the deployment in the Congo of a multinational peace force under the authority of the United Nations and OAU.

Mali, in a 27 June communique [S/1997/511], stated that it supported the decisions that had resulted from the joint efforts of the International Mediation Committee and the summit meeting of WAEMU. Mali expressed its willingness to participate in the concerted African effort to restore peace in the Congo and to ensure that the democratic process there was given every chance to succeed.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (August)

On 13 August [meeting 3810], the President of the Security Council, on behalf of the members of the Council, made the following statement [S/PRST/1997/43]:

The Security Council is deeply concerned about the situation in the Republic of the Congo following the outbreak of factional fighting in Brazzaville on 5 June 1997. The Council is particularly concerned at the plight of civilians caught up in the fighting, which has resulted in widespread loss of life, displacement of the population and severe humanitarian conditions in Brazzaville. The Council considers that the situation in the Republic of the Congo is likely to endanger peace, stability and security in the region.

The Council expresses its full support for the efforts of the International Mediation Committee under the Chairmanship of the President of Gabon and the National Mediation Committee under the Chairmanship of the Mayor of Brazzaville to persuade the parties involved to reach agreement on a ceasefire and a peaceful settlement of the current crisis. It also affirms its support for the important and constructive role of the Joint United Nations/Organization of African Unity Special Representative for the Great Lakes Region in these negotiations.

The Council expresses its grave concern at the recent recurrence of fighting in Brazzaville, calls upon the two parties to the conflict to halt all acts of violence immediately and underlines the need to respect the ceasefire agreement signed on 14 July 1997. It also calls upon the two parties to resolve the crisis on the basis of the proposals submitted by the President of Gabon currently under discussion in Libreville, including agreement on an interim government of national unity and a timetable for the holding of Presidential elections.

The Council recalls the letter of 20 June 1997 to its President from the Secretary-General drawing attention to the request of the President of Gabon for deployment of an appropriate force to Brazzaville, and the relevant letters to the Secretary-General from the President of the Republic of the Congo and the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity. The Council endorses the three conditions for the establishment of such a force set by the Secretary-General, namely complete adherence to an agreed and viable ceasefire, agreement to the international control of Brazzaville airport and a clear commitment to a negotiated settlement covering all political and military aspects of the crisis.

The Council is of the view that, despite some positive political developments, these conditions have not yet been fulfilled and calls upon the parties to fulfil them without delay. The Council intends to take a decision on this matter once the Secretary-General has submitted a report to it on the question of the fulfilment of these conditions and containing recommendations on further United Nations involvement in the Republic of the Congo.

The Council also calls upon both parties to respect relevant provisions of international humanitarian law and to ensure safe and unimpeded access by international humanitarian organizations to persons in need of assistance as a result of the conflict, and in any other way to facilitate the effective implementation of humanitarian programmes.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Communications (August/September). On 29 August [S/1997/675], the Congo transmitted to the Secretary-General a decision of its Constitutional Council, dated 19 July. The Council, noting that it was impossible for the Government to organize the presidential elections scheduled for 27 July in the light of the ongoing armed conflict, decided to postpone such elections and, accordingly, to extend the mandate of the current President until the proclamation of a successor elected by universal suffrage. The new date for the elections would be determined by the Government in agreement with the Congolese political community as a whole.

On 3 September [S/1997/682], the Congo transmitted to the Secretary-General the text of a 27 August statement by the Government, in which it alleged that Mr. Sassou-Nguesso's militias, made up mainly of mercenaries recruited from former members of the Rwandese and Zairian armed forces, were holding the inhabitants of the northern districts of Brazzaville hostage, and were using certain public buildings as bases from which to shell positions of the Congolese armed forces. The armed rebellion had claimed over 7,000 lives in Brazzaville, had displaced a number of people and had destroyed public buildings. The Government affirmed that it was using all necessary means to stop the threat to the State.

At the same time, the Government remained committed to the mediation efforts of President Bongo and was also open to any other initiative aimed at a peaceful settlement. In that spirit, President Lissouba supported the 18 August proposal by President Laurent-Désiré Kabila of the Democratic Republic of the Congo (the former Zaïre) to mediate in the conflict and his intention to send an inter-African peacekeeping force with the cooperation of the other countries of central and eastern Africa.

The Government alleged that lobbyists close to Mr. Sassou were trying to force the French oil company ELF to put a financial squeeze on the Congo and hamper petroleum production. It further alleged that the same lobbyists, in complicity with individuals from the Congolese Labour Party of Mr. Sassou, were trying to bring mercenaries into Pointe-Noire, the economic capital of the Congo, with the aim of sabotaging foreign petroleum interests. Such terrorist actions, said the Government, were designed to provoke reactions against it in the countries where those companies were based.

On 5 September [S/1997/688], the Congo transmitted to the Secretary-General a statement by the National Assembly concerning the ongoing legal and military crisis. The National Assembly, which met in an extraordinary session on 4 September, condemned the failed coup d'état of 5 June fomented by the Forces démocratiques unies of Mr. Sassou, which had been transformed into a civil war. According to the statement, the crisis had caused the indiscriminate killing of many people, most of them civilians, an unprecedented exodus of people fleeing Brazzaville and its environs, destruction of public and private buildings, and looting on an unprecedented scale, leading to the destruction of the socio-economic fabric.

The Assembly congratulated the Congolese armed forces for their defence of the governing institutions and the nation's territorial integrity. It condemned any interference in Congolese affairs on the part of the oil company ELF Congo, certain neighbouring countries and certain major Powers.

The Assembly welcomed the establishment of the Espace républicain pour la défense de la démocratie et de l'unité nationale (ERDDUN), a union of all major political groups, parties and associations, which had set as its main objectives the restoration of peace and the continuation of the electoral process. The Assembly noted the efforts being made by international and national mediators to find solutions to the crisis and congratulated President Bongo, Chairman of the International Mediation Committee, and Bernard Kolelas, Mayor of Brazzaville and Chairman of the National Mediation Committee, on the work they had done.

On 16 September [S/1997/734], the Congo transmitted to the Secretary-General the Solemn Declaration issued by ERDDUN in Brazzaville on 28 August, the Protocol of Agreement concluded by ERDDUN on 29 August and a letter of transmittal dated 8 September from ERDDUN to the President of the Congo.

In the letter of transmittal, ERDDUN noted with regret that the Libreville negotiations had reached a standstill, most recently over the appointment of the Prime Minister, his functions and his political affiliation. Having agreed that the person who assumed the post, in addition to having attained a political and electoral majority, should be capable of promoting peace and national unity and safeguarding democracy, ERD-DUN proposed that Mr. Kolelas should assume that office.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (October)

On 16 October [meeting 3823], the President of the Security Council made the following statement on behalf of the members of the Council [S/PRST/1997/47]:

The Security Council is deeply concerned about the grave situation in the Republic of the Congo and calls for an immediate end to all hostilities. It deplores the loss of life and the deteriorating humanitarian situation and calls upon all parties to ensure the safety of the civilian population and the safe and unrestricted delivery of humanitarian assistance.

The Council calls upon all States in the region to support a peaceful resolution of the conflict and to avoid any actions which could exacerbate the situation. It condemns all external interference in the Republic of the Congo, including the intervention of foreign forces, in violation of the Charter of the United Nations, and calls for the immediate withdrawal of all foreign forces including mercenaries.

The Council reiterates the importance of a political settlement and national reconciliation and calls upon the parties to cooperate with the International Mediation Committee chaired by the President of Gabon and with the Joint United Nations/Organization of African Unity Special Envoy in reaching rapid agreement on peaceful transitional arrangements leading to the holding of democratic and free and fair elections with the participation of all parties.

The Council remains ready to consider how the United Nations can further contribute to a political settlement, including the possibility of a United Nations presence, on the basis of recommendations to be provided by the Secretary-General as soon as possible.

Report of Secretary-General (October). The Secretary-General, in a 21 October report [S/1997/814], stated that, since the issuance of the Security Council statement of 13 August, in which the Council had endorsed the deployment of a force to Brazzaville (see above), the situation in the Congo had undergone both a sharp deterioration and a radical transformation. Those developments had forced a complete change in the assumptions on which the UN military planning had been based.

The Secretary-General said that, following a recent sharp intensification of the fighting, the forces of Mr. Sassou-Nguesso appeared to have broken the deadlock that had persisted since the onset of the crisis and had seized effective control of the capital. In the preceding few days, the conflict had spread to part of the city previously controlled by Mr. Kolelas, the former Mayor, who had been named Prime Minister by President Lissouba in September. The sudden upsurge in fighting had forced thousands of Brazzaville residents to abandon the city. Much of the capital had already been deserted by its inhabitants since June, when rival forces formed confrontation lines that split the main business and residential district in two. The number of fatalities, estimated at 4,000 well before the latest and most violent phase of the fighting, remained unknown.

The fighting had not been confined to Brazzaville, stated the Secretary-General, and it was reported to have involved the use of foreign forces, including mercenaries. Information from a number of sources indicated that Angolan troops equipped with tanks had entered the Congo and had seized two southern cities near the Cabinda enclave of Angola. The city of Pointe-Noire, the heart of the Congolese oil trade, had since surrendered to the Sassou-Nguesso forces.

The Secretary-General noted that elements of the former Zairian and Rwandan armed forces, as well as elements of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola (UNITA), were alleged to be operating on one side or the other of the conflict, as were foreign mercenaries. There had also been a number of exchanges of shellfire between Brazzaville and Kinshasa across the Congo River. In response to those attacks, military observers of the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC) had reportedly been sent from Kinshasa into Brazzaville. (See below for communications on the above allegations.)

On 12 and 13 July, in Brazzaville, after extensive mediation involving President Bongo, Mr. Kolelas and the joint UN/OAU Special Representative, Mr. Sahnoun, President Lissouba and Mr. Sassou-Nguesso signed, with certain reservations, a ceasefire agreement, which went into effect at midnight on 14 July. Talks then continued in Libreville under the aegis of the International Mediation Committee, which, on the basis of a draft accord submitted by President Bongo, included the following elements: priority measures to consolidate the ceasefire, including the dissolution of all militias and the creation of a mixed military commission; agreement by both parties to the deployment of an international peacekeeping force under the aegis of the United Nations and OAU; the establishment of a Government of national union responsible for organizing free, transparent and democratic presidential elections under the supervision of the United Nations and OAU; and specific measures to consolidate peace, reconciliation and national unity.

Despite reaching agreement on many aspects of the accord, the parties remained divided over the selection of a Prime Minister to lead the Government of national union, as well as the distribution of powers between the Prime Minister and the President and the modalities of eventual elections. In addition, an offer to mediate in the conflict and to deploy an inter-African buffer force in the Congo by President Kabila of the DRC was rejected by the Sassou-Nguesso side.

Pursuant to the Security Council's decision of 21 June authorizing the Secretary-General to consult with potential troop contributors to a force in the Congo, the UN Department of Peacekeeping Operations carried out a series of meetings with 45 countries from all regional groups. A number of Governments expressed willingness to contribute ground troops or logistical and air transport support, and some offered specific units. Of the two options proposed by the Secretary-General on 20 June (see above), most Governments expressed their preference for a UN peacekeeping operation rather than a multinational force.

After consultations with members of the Security Council, the Secretary-General dispatched a technical survey team to Libreville and Brazzaville on 25 July to assess conditions on the ground and to assemble information concerning the availability and capacity of transport, servicing and supply facilities. The team also held meetings with President Lissouba, Mr. Sassou-Nguesso and Mr. Kolelas, as well as with the military staffs and political representatives of the two Congolese parties. The Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations, Bernard Miyet, briefed the Security Council on the findings of the team on 8 August.

The team found the humanitarian situation in Brazzaville to be cataclysmic, with at least 500,000 of the original 900,000 inhabitants displaced and with the consequent risks of malnutrition and the spread of disease. As a result of the fighting in Brazzaville, there had been significant loss of life, heavy material damage and large-scale population displacements. Casualties were feared to be in the tens of thousands and at least 500,000 people were thought to be internally displaced. Since there was no international presence in the country, except in Pointe-Noire, information on the humanitarian situation was sketchy. The World Food Programme had begun a large-scale food distribution exercise in Pointe-Noire, and the United Nations Children's Fund, together with the International Committee of the Red Cross and Médecins sans frontières, was providing emergency health assistance to the displaced population in that city.

At an informal meeting on 14 October, the Secretary-General had briefed members of the Security Council on the latest proposed military plan, which was developed immediately prior to the reports of major advances by the Sassou-Nguesso forces. The plan called for the initial deployment of an advance mission headquarters in Libreville, followed by the deployment of peacekeeping forces in Brazzaville and Pointe-Noire and three other strategic locations in the north of the country.

The rapid evolution of the situation in the Congo since then, with reports of Mr. Sassou-Nguesso's troops being in control of the entire country, had prompted the Secretary-General to call for a review of the efforts and options of the United Nations. It was anticipated that the military situation in the Congo would continue to be precarious owing to the existence of heavily armed militias and the uncontrolled flow of arms into the country. Therefore, said the Secretary-General, planning would need to focus on facilitating the provision of humanitarian assistance. The Organization would also, upon request, draw up plans for assisting with the disarming and demobilization of the militias.

The Secretary-General noted with satisfaction that Mr. Sassou-Nguesso had expressed to Mr. Sahnoun his willingness to allow the humanitarian agencies access to the country and to facilitate their access to Brazzaville. He had also affirmed his intention to engage in a dialogue with all political leaders in order to work out transitional arrangements for governing the country, stating that the transitional period would be of a reasonable duration and would lead to the conduct of free and fair elections. Mr. Sassou was reported to have acknowledged that he would need the assistance of the international community to organize those elections and to rehabilitate the country. The Secretary-General was concerned, however, at reports that some members of Mr. Sassou's forces had made vengeful and belligerent statements; he appealed to all concerned to recognize that the time for violence had passed and to act in a spirit of national reconciliation.

The damage inflicted by the armed forces of the Congolese parties on their capital had created a need for a considerable reconstruction and rehabilitation programme. The Secretary-General intended to seek the views of potential donors on the role the UN system and bilateral donors could play in mobilizing resources for such a programme and in assisting in its implementation. In the event that the United Nations was requested to help to ensure the safety and security of humanitarian operations, the Secretary-General was prepared to draw up plans for a suitable UN presence. He would also initiate preparations for assisting in a programme of national reconciliation leading to the conduct of free elections.

Congo-Angola

In a 13 October letter [S/1997/791] to the Security Council President, the Congo alleged that Angolan troops had entered Congolese territory and that Angolan military aircraft had dropped bombs on Brazzaville. The Council was asked to take action.

Angola, in a 16 October letter [S/1997/802] to the Secretary-General and the Council President, denied the allegations, stating that a unit of the Angolan armed forces, exercising their right to self-defence, had pursued UNITA armed groups that were operating from the Congo. Following that action, the Angolan forces had immediately returned to their base in Cabinda.

Congo-Democratic Republic of the Congo

In a 15 October communique [S/1997/803], the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC) noted that, according to information published in the press, the Security Council President had specifically asked the DRC to withdraw its troops from the Congo. The DRC affirmed that it had had no troops in the territory of the Congo since the return of a number of observers who had been sent, by joint agreement, to the two warring factions. However, the DRC did not rule out any future intervention in response to further shelling from the Congo on the population of Kinshasa, and, should that occur, it reserved the right to defend its territory and people.

Liberia

In 1997, after four years of operation, the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia (UNOMIL) came to an end, as the terms of the 1995 Abuja Agreement [YUN 1995, p. 358] for settling the conflict were fulfilled, with the completion of the disarmament and demobilization of the factions, the holding of presidential and legislative elections on 19 July and the installation of a new Government on 2 August. Established in 1993 [YUN 1993, p. 269, SC res. 866(1993)] to monitor the 1993 Cotonou Agreement [ibid., p. 268], and, later, the 1994 Akosombo Agreement [YUN 1994, p. 380] and the 1995 Abuja Agreement, UNOMIL was the first UN peacekeeping operation undertaken in cooperation with an operation already established by another organization, the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) Monitoring Group (ECOMOG).

During the year, UNOMIL cooperated with ECOMOG in the disarmament and demobilization process, and provided technical assistance to the Liberian Electoral Commission to prepare for the holding of elections, as well as electoral observers. It also monitored the human rights situation.

In 1997, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council five progress reports on UNOMIL and the situation in Liberia. Twice during the year, the Council extended UNOMIL's mandate, with the last extension terminating the Mission on 30 September. The Mission was replaced by the United Nations Peace-building Support Office in Liberia, established on 1 November for a period of one year.

Anthony B. Nyakyi (United Republic of Tanzania) was succeeded as the Secretary-General's Special Representative for Liberia on 15 April by Tuliameni Kalomoh (Namibia).

UN operation in Liberia

Political aspects

Report of Secretary-General (January). The Secretary-General, in a 29 January report [S/1997/90], stated that the disarmament and demobilization exercise in Liberia had been hindered by continuing difficulties. Its slow pace had been attributed to lingering suspicions among faction leaders and insufficient incentives for the fighters. On 14 January, the Secretary-General wrote to the Chairman of the Liberian Council of State expressing concern at the continuing difficulties in the disarmament process and asking her to urge the faction leaders to accelerate it. The Council of State met on 16 January, in the presence of an ECOWAS delegation, the ECOMOG Force Commander, the Secretary-General's Special Representative and others. At that meeting, the ECOWAS Special Envoy, Chief Tom Ikimi of Nigeria, appealed to all Council members to cooperate fully to ensure a successful conclusion of the Liberian peace process. On the same date, the second ECOWAS verification and assessment meeting was convened in accordance with the revised timetable for the implementation of the Abuja Agreement. In an 18 January statement, Chief Ikimi called on faction leaders to ensure a substantial handover of weapons and the demobilization of fighters by the 31 January deadline. The assessment team recommended that the Ministerial Meeting of the ECOWAS Committee of Nine on Liberia (Benin, Burkina Faso, Cote d'Ivoire, Gambia, Ghana, Guinea, Nigeria, Senegal, Togo) be convened in early February to assess the outcome of the disarmament exercise and endorse the mode of implementation of the rest of the programme. By 26 January, only 12,510 fighters had been disarmed. ECOMOG and UNOMIL revised an earlier estimate of the number of fighters in the country to be disarmed from 60,000 to 33,000 and requested all factions to meet that number by 31 January.

Report of Secretary-General (March). Updating developments in Liberia in a 19 March report on UNOMIL [S/1997/2371, the Secretary-General stated that there had been further progress towards implementation of the Abuja Agreement, including achievement of a significant level of disarmament of fighters, making it possible to begin preparations for the holding of elections and extension of ECOMOG's presence into the interior of the country, thereby facilitating greater access by humanitarian agencies and freer movement of the civilian population. The ECOWAS Committee of Nine held its second Ministerial Meeting in Monrovia on 13 and 14 February. The Ministers held extensive consultations with the Council of State, which resulted in important decisions concerning the implementation of the final phase of the peace process, particularly the conduct of the elections. Their recommendations were endorsed by the Chairman of ECOWAS and supported by the Secretary-General (see below).

The period following the dissolution of the armed factions on 31 January witnessed a revitalization of civil society and reactivation of political parties in preparation for the elections. As at 18 March, eight political parties had officially registered and another 12 were proposed for registration. The parties were engaged in selecting their candidates for the presidential elections.

The Secretary-General noted the proposal of the ECOWAS Chairman for the restructuring of the Liberian armed forces, the police and other security agencies, with UN and international assistance, following the withdrawal of ECOMOG from Liberia, due to begin six months after the elections. He considered the proposal an essential peace-building step which would help the incoming Government build on the progress made.

In a related development, the second Ministerial Meeting of the ad hoc Special Conference to Support the Peace Process in Liberia was held in New York on 20 February [S/1997/167]. Organized at the request of the United States on behalf of the International Contact Group on Liberia, of Nigeria on behalf of ECOWAS and of the Netherlands, it also brought together the Bretton Woods institutions and relevant UN bodies. The meeting addressed the immediate needs of the peace process and requirements for the medium term, and demonstrated strong support for the role played by ECOWAS. Donor countries and the European Commission made firm pledges of financial and other support. The Resident Representative of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) was named Director of the Office of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General to coordinate post-election and development efforts. According to the Secretary-General, the meeting demonstrated that there was the necessary political will both inside and outside Liberia for the peace process to succeed.

Electoral process

Following the visit of the UN technical survey team to Monrovia in December 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 119], the United Nations prepared a set of draft recommendations dealing primarily with the requirements for establishing a credible political framework for elections to take place and the need for the elections to be inclusive, operationally simple and cost-effective. On 14 January 1997, the Secretary-General dispatched Lansana Kouyate, Assistant Secretary-General for Political Affairs, as his Special Envoy to the region, for consultations on those recommendations with the Chairman of ECOWAS, the head of State of Nigeria, and the Liberian parties and civil society. It was proposed that a provisional electoral package should be enacted at a special summit-level meeting in mid-February of the ECOWAS Committee of Nine with the Liberian political parties and become an integral part of the Abuja Agreement. At that meeting, held in Monrovia on 13 and 14 February, agreement was reached on a basic framework for the holding of the elections. The recommendations of the meeting, which were endorsed by the Chairman of ECOWAS, provided for: elections to be held on 30 May 1997, organized by an independent Elections Commission, assisted by technical advisers from ECOWAS, the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity (OAU); disputes to be adjudicated by the Liberian Supreme Court; a parliament to be elected comprising a 64-member House of Assembly and a 26-member Senate; parliamentary elections to be conducted on the basis of proportional representation; and refugees to be required to return to Liberia to vote.

On 26 February, the Secretary-General sent an assessment mission to Liberia to assess electoral requirements and to make recommendations on the role UNOMIL would play in the electoral process. The mission concluded that conditions in Liberia provided a reasonable basis for the organization and conduct of elections on 30 May.

The timetable for doing so would entail the enactment of electoral law and regulations by the end of March, the registration of voters in April and the conduct of the election campaign in May. The mission also concluded that refugee participation in the elections could best be enhanced through a proactive approach to repatriation and additional efforts to facilitate their registration and voting.

The United Nations was expected to play an essential role in the elections, providing, in conjunction with ECOWAS and other international organizations, technical assistance to the electoral authorities. UNOMIL, in addition to observing all stages of the electoral process, would support the transportation and information infrastructure during the registration and polling process and assist voter education, particularly through a public information programme. To carry out those functions, the Secretary-General recommended that UNOMIL's electoral unit comprise four electoral officers and 36 civilian electoral observers, and that a consultant be recruited to serve as the UN technical adviser and non-voting member of the Elections Commission; that 200 additional personnel be recruited to observe the polling and counting of votes; that provision be made for undertaking a "quick count"; that the international community provide additional resources for repatriation of refugees; that an understanding be reached with ECOMOG regarding its responsibilities for security of international personnel during the electoral process; and that UNOMIL and UN information personnel produce and broadcast daily radio programmes for voter education purposes. The Secretary-General also outlined logistical arrangements for the electoral observation.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (March)

On 27 March [meeting 3751], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1100(1997), by which it welcomed the Secretary-General's recommendations and decided to extend the UNOMIL mandate until 30 June. The draft [S/1997/254] was prepared in consultations among the members.

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous resolutions concerning the situation in Liberia, in particular resolution 1083(1996) of 27 November 1996,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General dated 19 March 1997, especially his conclusion that the period under review has witnessed an improvement in the security situation, revitalization of civil society, and reactivation of political parties to prepare for elections,

Noting the agreement between the Council of State and the Economic Community of West African States on a basic framework for the holding of elections in Liberia scheduled for 30 May 1997,

Emphasizing that the holding of free and fair elections as scheduled is an essential phase of the peace process in Liberia,

Reiterating that the people of Liberia and their leaders bear the ultimate responsibility for achieving peace and national reconciliation,

Noting with appreciation the active efforts of the Economic Community of West African States to restore peace, security and stability to Liberia, and commending the States which have contributed to the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group,

Expressing its appreciation to those States which have supported the United Nations Military Observer Mission in Liberia and those which have contributed to the Trust Fund for Liberia,

Emphasizing that the continued presence of the Mission is predicated on the presence of the Monitoring Group and its commitment to ensure the safety of the Mission,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Military Observer Mission in Liberia until 30 June 1997;

2. Welcomes the Secretary-General's recommendations contained in paragraphs 29 and 30 of his report dated 19 March 1997 concerning the role of the Mission in the electoral process;

3. Expresses its concern at the delay in the installation of the new independent Elections Commission and the reconstituted Supreme Court, and the implications of this delay for the electoral process, and urges that they be installed immediately;

4. Urges the international community to provide financial, logistical and other assistance to the electoral process in Liberia, including through the Trust Fund for Liberia, and to provide additional support for the Monitoring Group to enable it to sustain a secure environment for the elections;

5. Stresses the importance of close contacts and enhanced coordination between the Mission and the Monitoring Group at all levels and, in particular, the importance of the Monitoring Group to continue to provide effective security for international personnel during the election process;

6. Urges all Liberian parties to cooperate with the peace process, including by respecting human rights and facilitating humanitarian activities and disarmament;

7. Stresses the importance of respect for human rights in Liberia, not least in the period leading up to elections, and emphasizes the human rights aspect of the mandate of the Mission;

8. Also stresses the importance of assisting with the prompt repatriation of refugees who are willing to return to Liberia in time to participate in the registration and voting process;

9. Further stresses the obligation of all States to comply strictly with the embargo on the deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia imposed by resolution 788(1992) of 19 November 1992, to take all actions necessary to ensure strict implementation of the embargo, and to bring all instances of violations of the embargo before the Committee established pursuant to resolution 985(1995) of 13 April 1995;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council informed on a regular basis of the situation in Liberia and, in particular, significant developments in the electoral process, and to submit a report by 20 June 1997;

11. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Report of Secretary General (June). The Secretary-General, reporting on 19 June [S/1997/478], stated that the Liberian Independent Elections Commission, which was responsible for organizing and conducting the elections, was installed on 2 April, and the reconstituted Supreme Court, which was to adjudicate electoral disputes, was installed five days later, although in each case about a month later than anticipated by the schedule set by the ECOWAS Committee of Nine. The delays in preparations had raised doubt about prospects for holding elections on 30 May. Nevertheless, UNOMIL and ECOMOG continued their election planning by deploying civilian electoral observers all over the country. The Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) had begun repatriating those Liberians in the subregion who wished to return to participate in the elections.

Between 24 and 27 April, an ECOWAS assessment team visited Liberia to evaluate the status of electoral preparations. The Elections Commission and the registered Liberian political parties unanimously requested the ECOWAS team to extend the electoral schedule. UNOMIL also took the view that it would not be possible to hold credible elections on 30 May. Consequently, the ECOWAS assessment team recommended a 30-day extension of the electoral calendar. An Extraordinary Summit Meeting of the ECOWAS Committee of Nine (Abuja, Nigeria, 21 May) approved the electoral law as amended by the political parties, and decided to extend the electoral schedule by 60 days and to postpone the elections for the legislative assembly and presidency until 19 July. It also approved the extension of the tenure of the Liberian Council of State until the inauguration of the new Government, and a reduced electoral budget of $5.4 million. At the Special Conference to Support the Peace Process in Liberia, reconvened in Geneva on 12 June at the ministerial level, participants pledged in excess of $15 million for the Liberian peace process.

UNOMIL preparations for elections were carried out on schedule. Electoral observer teams with a total of 34 civilian electoral observers and 78 military observers were set up to operate from 16 observation bases in the field and in Monrovia. The observer teams reported on the activities of political parties prior to elections and shared UNOMIL's communications network and transportation means with other electoral observers. UNOMIL's Public Information Unit assisted in providing civic information on registration and voting to the electorate. It produced radio programming four times weekly on each of eight functioning radio stations, and produced leaflets explaining proportional representation and voter registration.

Communication. The heads of State of the West African Economic and Monetary Union, at a conference on security and peace in Africa (Lome, Togo, 23 June), welcomed the decision of the Summit Meeting of the ECOWAS Committee of Nine to postpone the presidential and legislative assembly elections in Liberia to 19 July. In a declaration [S/1997/512] adopted at the conference, they noted with satisfaction the encouraging progress made in the implementation of the Abuja Agreement and appealed to the international community to provide the assistance promised so that the elections might take place in favourable conditions on the scheduled date.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 27 June [meeting 3793], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1116(1997), by which it decided to extend UNOMIL's mandate until 30 September 1997, in the expectation that it would terminate on that date. The draft [S/1997/493] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions concerning the situation in Liberia, in particular resolution 1100(1997) of 27 March 1997,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General dated 20 June 1997,

Noting the decision of the Economic Community of West African States to postpone the election date to 19 July 1997,

Emphasizing that the holding of free and fair elections is an essential stage of Liberia's peace process and that the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia is mandated to observe and verify the election process, including the legislative and presidential elections, as stated in resolution 866(1993) of 23 September 1993,

Reiterating that the people of Liberia and their leaders bear the ultimate responsibility for achieving peace and national reconciliation,

Emphasizing that the presence of the United Nations Military Observer Mission in Liberia is predicated on the presence of the Monitoring Group of the Economic Community of West African States and its commitment to ensure the safety of UNOMIL military observers and civilian staff,

Noting with appreciation the active efforts of the Economic Community of West African States to restore peace, security and stability to Liberia, and commending those African States that have and continue to contribute to the Monitoring Group of the Economic Community of West African States,

Expressing its appreciation to those States which have supported the United Nations Military Observer Mission in Liberia and those which have contributed to the United Nations Trust Fund for Liberia,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Military Observer Mission in Liberia until 30 September 1997, in the expectation that it will terminate on that date;

2. Calls upon the Liberian parties to implement fully all the agreements and commitments they have entered into, and urges all Liberians to participate peacefully in the electoral process;

3. Expresses its gratitude to the international community for providing financial, logistical and other forms of assistance for the electoral process in Liberia, including through the Trust Fund for Liberia, and for providing support to the Monitoring Group of the Economic Community of West African States to enable it to carry out its peacekeeping responsibilities and to sustain a secure environment for the elections;

4. Emphasizes the need for constructive collaboration between the United Nations, the Economic Community of West African States, the Liberian Independent Elections Commission and the international community in coordinating assistance for the elections;

5. Stresses the importance of close coordination between the United Nations Military Observer Mission in Liberia, the Monitoring Group, and the joint electoral coordination mechanism at all levels and, in particular, the importance that the Monitoring Group of the Economic Community of West African States continue to provide effective security for international personnel during the election process and provide the necessary logistical support to the Independent Elections Commission;

6. Stresses also the importance of respect for human rights in Liberia, and emphasizes the human rights aspect of the mandate of the United Nations Military Observer Mission in Liberia;

7. Further stresses the obligation of all States to comply strictly with the embargo on the deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia imposed by resolution 788(1992) of 19 November 1992, to take all actions necessary to ensure strict implementation of the embargo and to bring all instances of the violations of the embargo before the Committee established pursuant to resolution 985(1995) of 13 April 1995;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council informed on a regular basis of the situation in Liberia and, in particular, of developments in the electoral process, and to submit a report by 29 August 1997;

9. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Elections. A total of 13 political parties fielded candidates for the presidential and legislative elections. Electoral campaigning started on 16 June as scheduled and was conducted without major incidents of violence or intimidation. The Independent Elections Commission had registered more than 750,000 voters and the elections were observed by some 317 electoral observers deployed throughout the 13 counties of Liberia.

The final results of the election were announced on 24 July, giving the National Patriotic Party (NPP) 75.3 per cent, the Unity Party (UP) 9.5 per cent and the All Liberia Coalition Party (ALCOP) 4 per cent of the national vote. The Alliance and the United People's Party (UPP) each received 2.5 per cent, while the remaining eight parties received less than 2 per cent each. Voter turnout for the election was 85 per cent of registered voters.

Charles Ghankay Taylor was elected President, and his party, NPP, won 21 of the 26 Senate seats, and 49 of the 64 seats in the House of Representatives. The opposition was led by UP, with three and seven seats in each chamber, respectively. Mr. Taylor was inaugurated as President, and Enoch Dogolea as Vice-President, on 2 August.

In a 24 July letter [S/1997/581] the Secretary-General informed the Security Council President that the Liberian electoral process had been successfully completed and the results officially announced, thus concluding the final element of the revised schedule of implementation of the Abuja Agreement. Annexed to the letter was a Joint Certification Statement by the Secretary-General and the ECOWAS Chairman declaring that the entire electoral process was conducted in an impartial and transparent manner, with no reports of irregularities. The electoral process was declared free, fair and credible.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (July)

On 30 July [meeting 3805], the President of the Security Council issued the following statement [S/PRST/1997/41] on behalf of the members:

The Security Council welcomes the successful holding of presidential and legislative elections in Liberia on 19 July 1997. The Council notes with satisfaction the letter from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council and the declaration in the Joint Certification Statement by the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Chairman of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) that the electoral process was free, fair and credible, and that the outcome of the elections reflects the will of the Liberian voters.

The Council calls upon all parties to abide by the results of the elections and to cooperate in the formation of a new Government. The Council also calls upon the new Government to protect the democratic system and to promote human rights and fundamental freedoms under the rule of law.

The Council congratulates the people of Liberia on the courage and determination they have shown in proceeding with the elections under difficult circumstances. The Council commends all international personnel, especially those of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia and the Military Observer Group of ECOWAS, who contributed to the successful holding of elections.

The Council welcomes the goodwill and cooperation demonstrated by the parties in the electoral process, which provides a strong foundation for the people of Liberia to achieve a durable peace, the re-establishment of constitutional government, and a return to the rule of law. The Council expresses the hope that the successful holding of elections will encourage refugees to exercise their right of return and calls upon the new Government to fulfil its obligations under international law regarding returning refugees.

The Council notes that the successful holding of elections represents a critical step towards economic development. The Council urges the international community to continue to provide support and assistance to Liberia through this period of reconstruction.

The Council further notes that the successful conclusion of the electoral process marks the fulfilment of a key element of the mandate of the Observer Mission.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Post-election period

Reports of Secretary-General (August and September). On 13 August [S/1997/643], the Secretary-General, in his progress report on UNOMIL issued after the Liberian elections, stated that the holding of presidential and legislative elections on 19 July and the installation of the new Government on 2 August marked the completion of the terms of the Abuja Agreement. On 3 August, the Secretary-General's Special Envoy and his Special Representative for Liberia were received by President Taylor, who requested UN assistance in mobilizing international support for the reconstruction of Liberia and expressed his desire for a continued UN presence following the termination of the UNOMIL mandate on 30 September.

UNOMIL had begun transferring its personnel from Liberia, and withdrawal was expected to be substantially completed by the expiration of its mandate. The bridging activities designed as an interim measure to absorb demobilized combatants were transferred from the UN Humanitarian Assistance Coordination Office to the relevant UN agencies and were dovetailed into the reintegration programme. Pending further consultations with the new Government, the Secretary-General intended to recommend the establishment of a peace-building support office to succeed UNOMIL.

On 12 September, the Secretary-General issued his final report on UNOMIL [S/1997/712]. He stated that President Taylor had formed a new Government, which had begun to establish and consolidate its authority throughout the country, and a reconstituted Supreme Court had been sworn in. Superintendents had been appointed for all 13 counties and the Liberian National Police was preparing to re-open police stations across the country.

At a meeting in late August in Abuja, the ECOWAS heads of State and Government agreed to extend the stay of ECOMOG in Liberia to help consolidate and strengthen security in the country, and to assist with the restructuring and training of the armed forces as well as police and security services. They decided to lift all sanctions and embargoes on Liberia (see below) and called on the international community to do the same. They also appealed for international support for the reconstruction of the country.

The Secretary-General's Special Envoy and his Special Representative for Liberia held discussions with President Taylor on 2 September regarding arrangements for a continued UN presence following UNOMIL's withdrawal. Mr. Taylor welcomed the Secretary-General's proposal to establish a small UN office in Liberia. Priority was being given to reconstruction of the economy, infrastructure and institutions, and efforts were soon to be launched to revive the productive sectors of the economy. The Government had indicated that it had inherited an empty treasury, a domestic debt of some $200 million and an external debt of more than $2 billion. The Special Envoy and Special Representative also held discussions with the Liberian Minister of Finance and of Economic Planning to discuss the mobilization of resources for rehabilitation and economic recovery. To capitalize on the successful completion of the peace process and to strengthen peace-building efforts, the Secretary-General had decided to convene a Special Conference on Liberia on 3 October in New York (see below).

Reviewing the Mission's history, the Secretary-General stated that the completion of disarmament and demobilization in February, and the restoration of a climate of security, ensured by the presence of ECOMOG troops, had been crucial to holding the elections. Credit was also due to the successful organization and conduct of the elections, and the financial support made available both by bilateral contributions from interested States and through the UN Trust Fund for Liberia. UNOMIL played a much more significant role than that strictly defined by its mandate, which was to observe and verify the elections, providing technical expertise and placing logistical, transportation and communications assets at the disposal of the Liberian Independent Elections Commission. UNOMIL had also trained and deployed 200 electoral observers sent by the United Nations, and coordinated their and other international observers' activities during the polling period. Human rights activities of UNOMIL also contributed to the peace process by investigating reported violations and providing assistance to Liberian human rights organizations in an effort to build local capacity.

The Secretary-General warned that the situation in Sierra Leone in 1997 remained a potential threat to the security and stability of Liberia. In a 21 October statement [S/1997/835], the Foreign Ministry of Liberia expressed similar concerns, and announced the closure of its border with Sierra Leone and its refusal to permit any military engagement involving the use of force from its territory by any group against Sierra Leone, except where sanctioned by ECOWAS and approved by the Security Council and the Liberian Government.

Special Conference on Liberia

The fourth Ministerial Meeting of the ad hoc Special Conference on Liberia (previously known as the ad hoc Special Conference to Support the Peace Process in Liberia) was convened in New York on 3 October [S/1997/817]. The meeting brought together the members of the International Contact Group on Liberia, the European Union and ECOWAS, as well as the Netherlands, the Bretton Woods institutions, the African Development Bank, and relevant UN departments, programmes and specialized agencies. The OAU Secretary-General and the Executive Secretary of ECOWAS also participated in the meeting.

The purpose of the meeting was to build upon the momentum generated by the successful completion of the Liberian peace process, and to support efforts to consolidate the peace in Liberia, including the establishment of a viable framework for the mobilization of resources for reconstruction and development. In that regard, Liberia presented a paper outlining its vision for a new Liberia, entitled "An Agenda for Rebuilding Liberia".

The meeting focused attention on the need to provide continued support to Liberia following the successful completion of the peace process. It expressed strong support for the establishment of a United Nations Peace-building Support Office in Liberia, President Taylor's efforts to establish an inclusive administration, and actions by the new Government to promote reconciliation and national unity. The meeting reacted positively to the Government's plans for rebuilding Liberia, as set out in the "Agenda for Rebuilding Liberia", and the Bretton Woods institutions supported the Government's economic and political initiatives, the economic and customs reforms instituted thus far and the presentation to the Legislature of a balanced cash-based budget. Support was also expressed for a donors' conference for Liberia in 1998.

The Secretary-General concluded that, in view of the difficult peace consolidation and reconstruction challenges confronting Liberia, he intended to continue to move as expeditiously as possible with the establishment of a United Nations Peace-building Support Office in Liberia (see below), as requested by the Government. The Secretariat would be consulting with Liberia and the principal bilateral and multilateral donors on the most effective means of following up on the positive outcome of the meeting, including the timing of the anticipated donors' conference on reconstruction and development.

Establishment of UN Support Office

The United Nations Peace-building Support Office in Liberia (UNOL) was established on 1 November. On 12 December, the Secretary-General appointed Felix Downes-Thomas (Gambia) to head the Office, which was expected to mobilize international assistance for Liberia, work with the Government, bilateral donors and multinational institutions and act as a focal point for post-conflict peace-building; provide technical assistance and support for reconciliation efforts and the establishment of democratic institutions; and facilitate communications between the Government and the United Nations on peace-building matters.

In November, the Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly's Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee revised estimated budgets for 1998-1999 [A/C.5/52/24] for five good offices, peacemaking and preventive diplomacy missions, including UNOL. For that Office, an estimated $2,304,900 would be needed for one year. The Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) recommended in December [A/52/7/Add.6] that the Assembly appropriate $9.3 million for the five missions for the 1998-1999 biennium.

UNOMIL financing

Revised 1996/97 budget

In February, the Secretary-General issued the second revised budget of UNOMIL for the period from 1 July 1996 to 30 June 1997 [A/51/756/Add.1] totalling $36,941,700 gross, an increase of $22,925,700. It incorporated additional requirements for the implementation of the disarmament and demobilization programme as authorized by the Security Council in November 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 118, SC res. 1083(1996)].

In March [A/51/423/Add.1], ACABQ noted that those estimates were revised downwards to an amount of $17,899,000 gross, due to a reduction in the expected number of fighters to be demobilized from 60,000 to 33,000 (see above) and to a delay in deployment of military and civilian personnel.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 27 March [meeting 94], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/51/504/Add.1], adopted resolution 51/3 B without vote [agenda item 135].

The General Assembly,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Recalling Security Council resolution 866(1993) of 22 September 1993, by which the Council established the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia, and subsequent resolutions in which the Council extended the mandate of the Observer Mission, the latest of which was resolution 1083(1996) of 27 November 1996,

Recalling also its decision 48/478 of 23 December 1993 on the financing of the Observer Mission and its subsequent resolutions and decisions thereon, the latest of which was resolution 51/3 A of 17 October 1996,

Reaffirming that the costs of the Observer Mission are expenses of the Organization to be borne by Member States in accordance with Article 17, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations,

Recalling its previous decision regarding the fact that, in order to meet the expenditures caused by the Observer Mission, a different procedure is required from that applied to meet expenditures of the regular budget of the United Nations,

Taking into account the fact that the economically more developed countries are in a position to make relatively larger contributions and that the economically less developed countries have a relatively limited capacity to contribute towards such an operation,

Bearing in mind the special responsibilities of the States permanent members of the Security Council, as indicated in General Assembly resolution 1874(S-IV) of 27 June 1963, in the financing of such operations,

Mindful of the fact that it is essential to provide the Observer Mission with the necessary financial resources to enable it to fulfil its responsibilities under the relevant resolutions of the Security Council,

1. Takes note of the status of contributions to the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia as at 12 March 1997, including the contributions outstanding in the amount of 4,610,679 United States dollars, representing 6 per cent of the total assessed contributions from the inception of the Observer Mission to the period ending 31 March 1996, notes that some 39 per cent of the Member States have paid their assessed contributions in full, and urges all other Member States concerned, in particular those in arrears, to ensure the payment of their outstanding assessed contributions;

2. Expresses concern about the financial situation with regard to peacekeeping activities, in particular as regards the reimbursement of troop contributors, which bear burdens owing to overdue payments by Member States of their assessments;

1997/98 budget

In a later report [A/51/756/Add.2], the Secretary-General submitted the proposed budget of UNOMIL for the period from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998, amounting to $19,688,400 gross, 38 per cent less than for the previous period, due primarily to the elimination of requirements for the completed disarmament and demobilization programme.

During ACABQ consideration of the report [A/51/423/Add.2], it was informed that should there be a postponement or delay in the holding of elections, potential costs not exceeding $500,000 would arise, but those would be met from the previous budget.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION (June)

On 13 June [meeting 101], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/51/504/Add.2], adopted resolution 51/3 C without vote [agenda item 135].

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia, the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions and the relevant report of the Board of Auditors,

Recalling Security Council resolution 866(1993) of 22 September 1993, by which the Council established the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia, and subsequent resolutions by which the Council extended the mandate of the Observer Mission, the latest of which was resolution 1100(1997) of 27 March 1997,

Recalling also its decision 48/478 of 23 December 1993 on the financing of the Observer Mission and its subsequent resolutions and decisions thereon, the latest of which was resolution 51/3 B of 27 March 1997,

Reaffirming that the costs of the Observer Mission are expenses of the Organization to be borne by Member States in accordance with Article 17, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations,

Recalling its previous decisions regarding the fact that, in order to meet the expenditures caused by the Observer Mission, a different procedure is required from that applied to meet expenditures of the regular budget of the United Nations,

Taking into account the fact that the economically more developed countries are in a position to make relatively larger contributions and that the economically less developed countries have a relatively limited capacity to contribute towards such an operation,

Bearing in mind the special responsibilities of the States permanent members of the Security Council, as indicated in General Assembly resolution 1874(S-IV) of 27 June 1963, in the financing of such operations,

Mindful of the fact that it is essential to provide the Observer Mission with the necessary financial resources to enable it to fulfil its responsibilities under the relevant resolutions of the Security Council,

1. Takes note of the status of contributions to the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia as at 15 May 1997, including the contributions outstanding in the amount of 17,879,409 United States dollars, representing 16 per cent of the total assessed contributions from the inception of the Observer Mission to the period ending 30 June 1997, notes that some 16 per cent of the Member States have paid their assessed contributions in full, and urges all other Member States concerned, in particular those in arrears, to ensure the payment of their outstanding assessed contributions;

2. Expresses concern about the financial situation with regard to peacekeeping activities, in particular as regards the reimbursement of troop contributors, which bear burdens owing to overdue payments by Member States of their assessments;

3. Expresses its appreciation to those Member States which have paid their assessed contributions in full;

4. Urges all other Member States to make every possible effort to ensure payment of their assessed contributions to the Observer Mission in full and on time;

5. Endorses the observations and recommendations contained in the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions and the report of the Board of Auditors;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to take all necessary action to ensure that the Observer Mission is administered with a maximum of efficiency and economy;

7. Decides to appropriate to the Special Account for the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia the amount of 20,447,100 dollars gross (18,918,300 dollars net) for the maintenance of the Observer Mission for the period from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998, inclusive of the amount of 758,700 dollars for the support account for peacekeeping operations, to be assessed on Member States at a monthly rate of 1,703,925 dollars gross (1,576,525 dollars net) in accordance with the composition of groups set out in paragraphs 3 and 4 of General Assembly resolution 43/232 of 1 March 1989, as adjusted by the Assembly in its resolutions 44/192 B of 21 December 1989, 45/269 of 27 August 1991, 46/198 A of 20 December 1991, 47/218 A of 23 December 1992, 49/249 A of 20 July 1995, 49/249 B of 14 September 1995, 50/224 of 11 April 1996 and 51/218 A and B of 18 December 1996 and its decisions 48/472 A of 23 December 1993 and 50/451 B of 23 December 1995, and taking into account the scale of assessments for the year 1997, as set out in its resolution 49/19 B of 23 December 1994 and its decision 50/471 A of 23 December 1995, and for the year 1998, subject to the decision of the Security Council to extend the mandate of the Observer Mission beyond 30 June 1997;

8. Decides also that, in accordance with the provisions of its resolution 973(X) of 15 December 1955, there shall be set off against the apportionment among Member States, as provided for in paragraph 7 above, their respective share in the Tax Equalization Fund of the estimated staff assessment income of 1,528,800 dollars approved for the Observer Mission for the period from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998;

9. Invites voluntary contributions to the Observer Mission in cash and in the form of services and supplies acceptable to the Secretary-General, to be administered, as appropriate, in accordance with the procedure and practices established by the General Assembly.

In September, the Secretary-General submitted a revised budget of $8,952,900 gross for the period from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998 [A/52/401], providing for the repatriation of 92 military observers, 80 international civilian personnel, 7 UN Volunteers and UNOMIL assets comprising transport, communication and other equipment.

The comments of ACABQ on the revised budget were contained in its October report [A/52/451].

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION (October)

On 31 October [meeting 42], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/52/543], adopted decision 52/407 without vote [agenda item 133].

Financing of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia

At its 42nd plenary meeting, on 31 October 1997, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee and having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions:

(a) Endorsed the observations and recommendations contained in the report of the Advisory Committee;

(b) Decided to reduce the appropriation authorized under the terms of General Assembly resolution 51/3 C of 13 June 1997 for the Observer Mission for the period from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998 from 20,447,100 United States dollars gross (18,918,300 dollars net) to 8,952,900 dollars gross (8,434,900 dollars net), inclusive of the amount of 758,700 dollars for the support account for peacekeeping operations;

(c) Decided also, taking into account the amount of 5,111,775 dollars gross (4,729,575 dollars net) already assessed under the terms of General Assembly resolution 51/3 C for the period from 1 July to 30 September 1997 and pending the review and consideration of the performance report of the Observer Mission for the period from 1 July 1996 to 30 June 1997, to defer the apportionment of the additional amount of 3,841,125 dollars gross (3,705,325 dollars net);

(d) Decided further to keep under review at its fifty-second session agenda item 133, entitled "Financing of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia".

By decision 52/456 of 22 December, the Assembly decided to continue consideration of the item on UNOMIL financing at its resumed fifty-second (1998) session.

Military aspects

At the beginning of January, violations of the ceasefire continued to be reported in Liberia, particularly by the two wings (ULIMO-J and ULIMO-K) of the United Liberation Movement of Liberia for Democracy (ULIMO), the former organized by General Roosevelt Johnson and the latter by Alhaji Kromah. However, the situation improved considerably and the Secretary-General reported that relative peace had prevailed in Liberia since mid-January. In June, he said that the country was considered secure enough for elections to take place. Those conditions continued to prevail for the remainder of UNOMIL's presence there.

ECOMOG troops, at a total strength of 7,500 at the beginning of the year, were deployed in Monrovia and 12 disarmament sites throughout the country. ECOMOG had established buffer zones between ULIMO-J and ULIMO-K as well as between the National Patriotic Front of Liberia and the Liberian Peace Council. UNOMIL's strength was 78 military observers deployed at disarmament sites. By mid-March, ECOMOG's strength had increased to 10,000 and UNOMIL to 92 military observers.

The disarmament and demobilization process, provided for under the terms of the Abuja Agreement, began on 22 November 1996 and continued through early 1997. ECOMOG and UNOMIL revised an earlier estimate of the overall number of fighters in the country from 60,000 to 33,000, and requested the factions to meet that goal for demobilization and disarmament by the deadline of 31 January 1997.

Following the expiry of the 31 January deadline, ECOMOG announced a one-week grace period to allow all fighters to disarm. By 9 February, a total of 20,332 fighters (61.6 per cent of the estimated total) had been disarmed under UNOMIL supervision, while 21,315, including 4,306 child fighters under the age of 18, had been demobilized by the UN Humanitarian Assistance Coordination Office. More than 9,570 weapons were also surrendered. To uncover remaining pockets of armed fighters in areas inaccessible during the disarmament period, ECOMOG and UNOMIL mounted joint disarmament operations in cooperation with former local commanders of the disbanded factions. Also, 10 of the 15 disarmament and demobilization centres remained opened to encourage voluntary disarmament. Those operations resulted in the recovery of approximately 3,750 additional assorted weapons. To ensure security for the holding of elections, ECOMOG strength, by mid-June, had been increased to approximately 11,000 troops deployed at 48 locations. UNOMIL completed its deployment at 16 sites and converted its disarmament processing sites to electoral observation bases.

A new threat to the stability of Liberia was posed by outbreaks of fighting on 6 and 10 July in south-eastern Sierra Leone, just across the Liberian border, causing an influx of refugees into Liberia, including about 200 Sierra Leonean Kamajor militiamen, who were disarmed by ECOMOG. The fighting also resulted in casualties among Liberian civilians. There was also concern among Liberians about the increase in armed robberies in Monrovia and its environs.

By September, following the successful holding of elections, UNOMIL had closed all its field offices and withdrawn all personnel and assets to Monrovia in preparation for its complete departure from Liberia. Nearly all military observers had been repatriated, except for nine, who would remain until the end of September in connection with the joint ECOMOG/UNOMIL custody of approximately 10,000 weapons surrendered by factional fighters. A decision on the final disposal of those weapons had not been made by the new Government by the time of the Secretary-General's September report.

Other matters

Sanctions against Liberia

Liberia, on 21 November [S/1997/919], requested the Security Council to lift the arms embargo imposed on it in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 192, SC res. 788(1992)]. In that connection, Liberia noted the confirmation by the Secretary-General that free and fair elections had been held on 19 July, and a new Government installed, thus bringing the civil conflict to a peaceful resolution. Furthermore, the heads of State and Government of the ECOWAS countries, at their summit meeting (Abuja, Nigeria, 28-29 August), had decided to lift all sanctions and embargoes against Liberia and had requested the international community to do the same, since the conditions that prevailed at the time of their imposition no longer existed.

The Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 985(1995) [YUN 1995, p. 355] to monitor sanctions against Liberia issued a report on 31 December 1997 [S/1997/1026], covering its activities for the year. The Committee noted that in resolutions 1100(1997) and 1116(1997) (see above), the Council had stressed the obligation of all States to comply strictly with the 1992 embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia, to take action to ensure its implementation, and to bring all instances of violations to the Committee's attention.

Human rights

UNOMIL human rights officers conducted investigations in 1997 into several reported incidents of human rights abuses. UNOMIL received reports of incidents that took place in 1996, including the massacre at Sinje on 28 September 1996, which was reported by the Ceasefire Violations Committee. In January 1997, six persons were killed by armed fighters, five of whom were ULIMO-J fighters; accusations were made against the Congo Defence Force. Other complaints of alleged human rights violations received by UNOMIL included reports of the harassment and detention of members of the international humanitarian community by ULIMO-J fighters, as well as the discovery of more than 100 skeletons.

As the peace process advanced, the Liberian human rights community was strengthened and at least four new human rights organizations were created, all of which collaborated with UNOMIL and functioned as members of the Liberia Human Rights Centre. UNOMIL assisted in the establishment of the Centre in Monrovia to serve as a focal point for addressing human rights issues. It also housed the National Library of Human Rights Issues. UNOMIL hosted a seminar on 1 and 2 May for 55 representatives of Liberian human rights and related organizations. In pursuance of its capacity-building mandate and prior to the elections, UNOMIL collaborated with the Carter Center in Atlanta, Georgia, United States, to provide a one-week training programme (18-25 June) for the Liberia Human Rights Centre and representatives of other Liberian human rights organizations. The programme was attended by representatives of 12 organizations. The Centre and other human rights organizations participated in observing and monitoring the elections.

In the month before and two weeks after the elections, UNOMIL conducted a series of assessment missions to monitor the human rights situation in the countryside. No major human rights violations by Liberians were confirmed during those missions. The Secretary-General reported in August [S/1997/643] that he would consult with the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights on the recommendation that the UN Centre for Human Rights provide advisory services and technical assistance to the new Liberian Government to assist it in reviving the country's human rights structures. He was encouraged by President Charles Taylor's commitment to the establishment of a national human rights commission and said he would discuss with Liberia how best the United Nations could assist it in fulfilling those goals.

Humanitarian aid

The UN Humanitarian Assistance Coordination Office (HACO) was responsible for the operational aspects of demobilization of fighters and for coordinating bridging and reintegration activities in Liberia. Its activities were hampered at the beginning of the year by the lack of secure access to many areas of the country. The Department of Humanitarian Affairs of the Secretariat coordinated humanitarian assistance activities, while UNDP coordinated long-term reintegration/rehabilitation activities. Among agencies providing assistance to Liberia were the International Labour Organization (ILO), which began a vocational training programme, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), which distributed food to displaced persons, the World Health Organization (WHO), which strengthened a rapid epidemic response task force and trained health workers in disease control, and the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), which contributed to primary schools and basic health services such as water and sanitation services.

Reconstruction and reintegration remained the focus of many humanitarian assistance programmes. Following the disarmament period, a number of disarmament and demobilization sites functioned as centres for early phase reintegration and served as bases for providing health and humanitarian services in the countryside. Encouraged by the presence and activity of humanitarian assistance workers, refugees and displaced persons began returning to their homes. A reconstruction plan was undertaken by UNDP and the World Bank, while FAO assisted in the development of a national plan for reintegration in agriculture by providing jobs for war-affected farmers and ex-combatants.

The Secretary-General reported in August that emergency needs in Liberia were likely to continue to be great for the remainder of the year and that donor organizations were reorienting their activities to address longer-term rehabilitation requirements in agriculture, education, health and infrastructure. UNHCR had also updated its operational plan for the repatriation and reintegration of Liberian refugees. The expected increase in stability was likely to prompt more refugees to return, and UNHCR would continue to facilitate voluntary repatriation. The responsibility of administering and monitoring HACO projects was transferred to UNDP/United Nations Office for Project Services in July. The bridging programme had employed approximately 15,000 ex-fighters who assisted in the restoration of essential services. The World Food Programme had begun an assessment of internally displaced persons in preparation for its resettlement programme. WHO carried out a vaccination campaign against yellow fever, while UNICEF continued its water and sanitation activities and provided assistance to children and war-affected women. Its educational activities also intensified.

The Secretary-General, in a November report [A/52/678], described emergency assistance provided by the UN system to Liberia.

In December, the General Assembly, in resolution 52/169 E, called for continued efforts to mobilize relief and rehabilitation assistance for the country (see PART THREE, Chapter III).

Sierra Leone

During 1997, Sierra Leone experienced renewed political and security instability when, on 25 May, the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC), under the leadership of Major Johnny Paul Koroma, carried out a coup d'état and overthrew the democratically elected Government of President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah. After seizing power, AFRC formed an alliance with another military rebel group, the Revolutionary United Front (RUF).

The Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), as the regional organization directly concerned, took the lead in trying to bring about the restoration of President Kabbah's Government, calling for sanctions against the military regime of Sierra Leone and a blockade against all petroleum products as well as military equipment.

By an 8 October resolution, the Security Council, concerned with the security and humanitarian situation in the subregion, imposed sanctions against the illegitimate regime of Sierra Leone and called for the restoration of constitutional order.

A Committee of Four, made up of Cote d'Ivoire, Ghana, Guinea and Nigeria, later expanded to a Committee of Five with the addition of Liberia, was established by ECOWAS to monitor developments in Sierra Leone. On 23 October, the Committee and the military junta adopted an ECOWAS peace agreement for Sierra Leone—the Conakry Agreement—which called for the immediate cessation of hostilities throughout the country. In November, the Secretary-General dispatched an exploratory team to the region to assess what kind of assistance the United Nations might provide to support the peace agreement.

Following the May coup d'état, hundreds of thousands of Sierra Leoneans fled to neighbouring countries, posing a threat to the peace, stability and security of the entire subregion. Guinea received the largest number of refugees, including the deposed President Kabbah, most of his cabinet members and Sierra Leonean members of Parliament. Liberia also received a large number of refugees, at a time when it was on the verge of ending its own seven-year-old civil war.

The Sierra Leone crisis began in 1991 when RUF, under the leadership of Corporal Foday Sankoh, launched guerrilla warfare against the Government. After five years of civil war, Sierra Leone embarked on a successful transition to multi-party democracy, culminating in parliamentary and presidential elections in February and March 1996. In addition, a peace accord was concluded between the newly elected civilian Government of Sierra Leone and RUF in Abidjan, Cote d'Ivoire, on 30 November 1996. The Abidjan Accord [YUN 1996, p. 123] addressed the roots of the conflict by providing a framework to further the process of democratization and declared an immediate end to the armed conflict. However, its implementation was interrupted by the May 1997 coup d'état.

Assessment Team mission

In accordance with a December 1996 letter from the Security Council President [YUN 1996, p. 123], by which the Council supported the Secretary-General's proposal to send an assessment team to Sierra Leone, the Secretary-General submitted a 26 January report [S/1997/80] containing the findings of that team. The Assessment Team's mandate was to develop recommendations on ways that the United Nations could assist in the implementation of the Abidjan Accord.

The Assessment Team, working under the guidance and overall authority of the Special Envoy for Sierra Leone, Berhanu Dinka, and led by Brigadier-General Yogesh K. Saksena, Deputy Force Commander of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission (UNAVEM III), arrived in Sierra Leone on 22 December 1996 and returned to New York on 6 January 1997 after meeting with government and RUF officials.

During meetings with the interlocutors, the Assessment Team emphasized that it was imperative for the parties to abide by a strict timetable in implementing the Abidjan Accord, noting that its political and military provisions had to be carried out simultaneously, in order to create the confidence necessary to proceed with the peace process. In that connection, the Team provided to the Commission for the Consolidation of Peace (CCP), for its consideration, a draft timetable for the implementation of the Accord. The draft was annexed to the Secretary-General's report.

CCP, which was established in accordance with the Abidjan Accord, held its first session on 19 December 1996. It comprised four representatives of the Government and four representatives of RUF, and was to act as a verification mechanism responsible for supervising and monitoring the implementation of the Accord. CCP was to establish a Joint Monitoring Group to monitor the withdrawal of forces and disarmament of combatants and a Demobilization and Resettlement Committee to coordinate the encampment, disarmament, demobilization and resettlement of the RUF combatants.

In January, the Secretary-General met with the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity (OAU), Salim Ahmed Salim, and wrote to the Secretary-General of the Commonwealth, Chief Emeka Anyaoku, in order to develop a concerted programme of action. The Accord stipulated that the Government of the Cote d'Ivoire, the United Nations, OAU and the Commonwealth were to act as moral guarantors to the peace process. Mr. Salim expressed the view that the United Nations should take the lead role in assisting the parties to fulfil their obligations under the Accord and that assistance from OAU should be coordinated by the United Nations. Chief Anyaoku informed the Secretary-General that a number of Commonwealth countries had indicated that any decision on their providing assistance in the implementation of the Accord would be taken in the light of the type of assistance to be provided by the United Nations.

The report noted that over the preceding five years the strength of the Republic of Sierra Leone Military Forces (RSLMF) had grown from about 3,000 to approximately 13,000. Many of the recent recruits did not have the advantage of formal training and, as a result, some elements in the army had not always shown the necessary discipline. During the last period of the conflict, the former Government engaged a private security firm, Executive Outcomes, to train its security forces and assist its efforts against RUF; the firm was maintained by the new Government. In addition, in the months before the signing of the Abidjan Accord, village-based hunters, known as Kamajors, were organized by paramount chiefs to protect their villages, mostly against looting from both RUF and undisciplined RSLMF elements. The Government estimated the number of Kamajors, who were armed mainly with light weapons, to be approximately 2,500. Reports had been received, however, that Kamajors were still being recruited and their number could be much higher.

While precise figures on the size of RUF were not available, its strength was estimated at approximately 5,000 armed and 5,000 non-armed combatants. The RUF forces were concentrated mainly in the eastern and central parts of the country.

With the signing of the November 1996 Abidjan Accord, both RSLMF and RUF had been ordered to refrain from hostile action, to remain confined to their current locations and to dismantle roadblocks. The Kamajors were also requested to refrain from military attacks against RUF. While the ceasefire had generally held, the overall security situation in Sierra Leone remained tenuous. Since 30 November, there had been some clashes between the various forces as armed elements had left their bases in search of food and medicine.

The Abidjan Accord foresaw not only the disarmament and demobilization of RUF, but also the downsizing of RSLMF and the withdrawal of foreign forces from the country. Prior to the signing of the Accord, the Government had established a Disarmament, Demobilization and Reintegration Programme Unit within the Ministry of National Reconstruction, Resettlement and Rehabilitation. That Unit was responsible for preparing and implementing a demobilization and resettlement plan for RUF combatants. The plan, which envisioned the disarmament and encampment of RUF combatants by a local security force and which had been agreed with the concerned UN agencies and non-governmental organizations (NGOs), had not yet been discussed with RUF, stated the report.

In that connection, the Government had informed the Assessment Team that, in its view, the handing over of weapons to either RSLMF or the Kamajors would not be acceptable to RUF, nor would it be acceptable to RUF if either of those forces were charged with providing security for assembly sites. The Government had therefore considered the possibility of using the Special Security Division (SSD) of the national police to carry out those responsibilities. The Government informed the Team, however, that it did not have the logistic or financial resources necessary for SSD to carry out the task.

The report said that the timely implementation of the disarmament and demobilization plan was dependent not only on the decisions taken by the Demobilization and Resettlement Committee of CCP, but also on the provision of voluntary funding by donor Governments for the establishment and management of assembly sites and on finding a satisfactory solution with regard to the provision of security at the sites. As at January 1997, only the United Kingdom had provided funds, totalling $1.5 million, for disarmament and demobilization, which was expected to cover the establishment and operation of three sites for three months.

As part of its resettlement efforts, the Government had screened 1,500 RUF elements who had spontaneously demobilized. However, only 200 of them were classified as ex-combatants in accordance with government criteria. The vast majority of those former RUF members had since returned to their areas of origin. Since demobilization had been undertaken only on an ad hoc basis, there were no active official programmes for the resettlement of ex-combatants.

The achievement of a durable peace rested on the successful demobilization and resettlement of RUF combatants as well as on the establishment of a professional national army, noted the report. In that connection, the Government had committed itself, under the Abidjan Accord, to downsizing and restructuring RSLMF and to strengthening the civilian police. The Government had requested UN assistance in developing a plan for demobilizing and restructuring RSLMF and monitoring the withdrawal to barracks of those units not required for normal security duties.

Although the Government of Sierra Leone and RUF had requested observers to monitor the peace process, the Assessment Team determined that a capable security presence would also be required to deter undisciplined elements from impeding the process. Such a presence would help to provide the confidence necessary for RUF to leave its bases, turn over its arms and demobilize; for RSLMF to withdraw to barracks; and for the Kamajors to return to their villages and traditional roles.

Since the Government had indicated that it did not have the means to ensure an adequate security presence for encampment and disarmament, the Team concluded that the required tasks could not be carried out by a mission composed only of unarmed military observers. It felt that a peacekeeping operation, combining military observers with a limited number of formed troops, would be able to assist the parties to implement the Accord effectively. The role of such a mission and its concept of operations were set out in an annex to the report.

The report stated that the Government of Sierra Leone had confirmed to the Assessment Team its readiness to ensure the timely implementation of the Abidjan Accord and to extend its full cooperation to a UN peacekeeping operation. While it was not possible for the Team to get the same assurances from the RUF before it left Abidjan, the Secretary-General said that he had received from Corporal Foday Sankoh, the leader of RUF, two letters, dated 13 and 17 January. In his second letter, Corporal Sankoh confirmed his willingness to receive the peace monitors foreseen under the Accord and to cooperate fully with them. The Secretary-General had therefore decided to submit to the Security Council, at the earliest opportunity, the appropriate recommendations regarding the establishment of a peacekeeping operation in Sierra Leone.

In a 31 January addendum to his report [S/1997/80/Add.1], the Secretary-General informed the Council that the establishment and maintenance of a peacekeeping operation in Sierra Leone for an eight-month period was projected at some $47 million. The recurrent maintenance costs of the operation were expected to amount to approximately $30 million, which would provide for the support of up to 720 formed troops, 60 military observers and 276 civilian staff. A breakdown of the estimated costs was provided.

Coup d'etat (May)

On 25 May, a coup d'etat was carried out by the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC), led by Major Johnny Paul Koroma, overthrowing the democratically elected Government of President Alhaji Ahmad Tejan Kabbah.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 27 May [meeting 3781], the President of the Security Council made the following statement on behalf of the Council [S/PRST/1997/29]:

The Security Council is deeply concerned about the military coup d'etat in Sierra Leone, especially when the United Nations is assisting the process of reconciliation in that country. It strongly deplores this attempt to overthrow the democratically elected Government and calls for an immediate restoration of constitutional order. The Council takes note of the communique of the Central Organ of the Organization of African Unity Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution of 26 May 1997, and underlines the imperative necessity of implementing the Abidjan Agreement, which continues to serve as a viable framework for peace, stability and reconciliation in Sierra Leone.

The Council strongly condemns the violence which has been inflicted on both local and expatriate communities, in particular United Nations and other international personnel serving in the country. It recalls the obligations of all concerned to ensure the protection of United Nations and other international personnel in the country, and calls for an end to the looting of premises and equipment belonging to the United Nations and international aid agencies.

Communications. On 28 May [S/1997/407], Mali transmitted to the Secretary-General a 26 May statement expressing dismay over the news of the coup d'etat that had taken place on 25 May against President Kabbah, who had been elected on 13 March 1996. Mali reaffirmed its support for the legal Government of Sierra Leone and called on OAU and the international community to bring about the immediate restoration of legality in the country.

By a decision adopted at its sixty-sixth ordinary session (Harare, Zimbabwe, 28-31 May) [A/52/465 (CM/Dec.356(LXVI))], the Council of Ministers of OAU condemned the coup d'etat and called for the immediate restoration of constitutional order, appealing to the leaders of ECOWAS to assist the people of Sierra Leone in that regard.

In a 28 May statement [A/52/165-S/1997/423], the European Union (EU) deplored the attempt to overthrow the Government of Sierra Leone and urged the restoration of democratic civilian government. The EU was deeply concerned at the level of violence against both local and foreign communities and expressed the hope that the peace process would be continued when constitutional order was restored.

ECOWAS ministerial meeting (June)

On 27 June [S/1997/499], Nigeria transmitted to the Security Council President the text of the final communique of the meeting of the Foreign Ministers of ECOWAS on the situation in Sierra Leone (Conakry, Guinea, 26 June).

The Ministers agreed that the following objectives should be pursued by ECOWAS: early reinstatement of the legitimate Government of President Kabbah; the return of peace and security; and the resolution of the issues of refugees and displaced persons. They recommended a combination of three measures to be applied in the pursuit of those objectives: dialogue; the imposition of sanctions and enforcement of an embargo; and the use of force. The communique stressed that no country should grant recognition to the regime that emerged following the coup d'etat.

The Ministers established a Committee of Four made up of Cote d'Ivoire, Ghana, Guinea and Nigeria, to be joined by the representatives of the OAU and ECOWAS secretariats. The Committee was entrusted with the task of monitoring developments in Sierra Leone and the implementation of the measures adopted at the meeting. It was asked to report to the Chairman of ECOWAS and brief him on the outcome of its efforts within two weeks.

In a 9 July letter [S/1997/531] to the Security Council President, Nigeria, whose head of State was the ECOWAS Chairman, requested an open meeting of the Council, preferably on 11 July, to consider the situation in Sierra Leone. The meeting would afford the ECOWAS Committee of Four the opportunity to express the views of the countries of the subregion on the situation and to appeal to the international community for support.

On 11 July [S/1997/536], Kenya requested permission for the Permanent Observer of OAU to attend the 11 July Council meeting.

By a 2 July letter [S/1997/512] to the Secretary-General, Togo transmitted the text of a declaration by the Conference of Chiefs of State and Heads of Government of the West African Economic and Monetary Union (WAEMU) on security and peace in Africa (Lome, 23 June). The Conference condemned the coup d'etat and emphasized the need for the parties concerned to make use of the follow-up machinery under the Abidjan Agreement to search for a just and equitable solution to the crisis.

On 11 July [meeting 3798], the President of the Security Council issued the following statement

[S/PRST/1997/36] on behalf of the members of the Council:

The Security Council recalls the statement of its President of 27 May 1997 following the military coup d'etat in Sierra Leone on 25 May 1997. It remains deeply concerned about the continuing crisis in Sierra Leone and its negative humanitarian consequences on the civilian population including refugees and internally displaced persons and, in particular, the atrocities committed against Sierra Leone's citizens, foreign nationals and personnel of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) monitoring group. It reiterates its view that the attempt to overthrow the democratically elected Government of President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah is unacceptable and calls again for the immediate and unconditional restoration of constitutional order in the country.

The Council is concerned about the grave crisis in Sierra Leone which endangers the peace, security and stability of the whole region and, in particular, about its possible negative impact on the ongoing peace process in neighbouring Liberia.

The Council strongly supports the decision adopted by the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity at its thirty-third ordinary session held in Harare, Zimbabwe, from 2 to 4 June 1997, in which it appealed to the ECOWAS leaders and the international community to help the people of Sierra Leone to restore constitutional order in that country and in which it underlined the imperative need to implement the Abidjan Agreement, which continues to serve as a viable framework for peace, stability and reconciliation in Sierra Leone.

The Council welcomes the participation of the ECOWAS Committee of Four Foreign Ministers in its 3797th meeting, held on 11 July 1997.

The Council welcomes the mediation efforts initiated by ECOWAS and expresses its full support for the objectives of these efforts as set out in the final communique, issued at the meeting of the Foreign Ministers of ECOWAS, held in Conakry, Guinea, on 26 June 1997.

The Council calls upon those who have seized power to cooperate fully with these efforts so that constitutional order in Sierra Leone will be restored immediately.

The Council will continue to follow closely the progress of efforts aimed at the peaceful resolution of the crisis and stands ready to consider appropriate measures if constitutional order in Sierra Leone is not restored without delay.

The Council will remain actively seized of this matter.

ECOWAS meeting (July)

By a 15 August letter [S/1997/646] to the Security Council President, Nigeria forwarded the text of the Declaration of the ECOWAS Committee of Four on Sierra Leone issued following the second meeting with representatives of the leader of the coup d'etat, Major Koroma (Abidjan, Cote d'Ivoire, 29-30 July).

Following the decisions reached between the Committee and the Sierra Leone delegation at their first meeting on 17 and 18 July, which endorsed the Committee's mandate, the Committee requested the delegation to present its proposals on the detailed modalities for the restoration of constitutional order to their country, including the early reinstatement of the legitimate Government of President Kabbah. In presenting their proposals, the delegation reneged on the agreements reached during the first meeting, particularly on the question of the reinstatement of the legitimate Government.

The Committee expressed disappointment at the sudden change of position by the Sierra Leone delegation and therefore decided that it would serve no useful purpose to hold further discussions. The Committee also expressed dismay at the announcement by the illegal regime in Freetown, while the meeting was still in session, of its decision to suspend the Constitution of Sierra Leone and to remain in office until the year 2001.

In view of those circumstances, the Committee decided to submit its recommendations to the Chairman of ECOWAS on 31 July. The recommendations would emphasize the need to strengthen the sanctions and embargo regimes against Sierra Leone.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 6 August [meeting 3809], the President of the Security Council, on behalf of its members, issued the following statement [S/PRST/1997/42]:

The Security Council recalls the statements of its President of 27 May 1997 and 11 July 1997 following the military coup d'état in Sierra Leone on 25 May 1997. It condemns the overthrow of the democratically elected Government of President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah and calls upon the military junta to take immediate steps to bring about the unconditional restoration of that Government. The Council remains deeply concerned about the situation in Sierra Leone, which endangers peace, security and stability in the whole region.

The Council underlines the need to implement the Abidjan Agreement which continues to serve as a viable framework for peace, stability, and reconciliation in Sierra Leone.

The Council expresses its appreciation to the Committee of Four Foreign Ministers of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) for their efforts to negotiate with representatives of the military junta on 17 and 18 July and 29 and 30 July 1997 in Abidjan on a peaceful resolution of the crisis, and reiterates its full support for the objectives of this mediation. It deeply regrets the breakdown of these talks, and considers that the responsibility for this failure rests entirely with the military junta, which refused to negotiate in good faith.

The Council considers that the military junta's attempt to set conditions for the restoration of the democratically elected Government is unacceptable, and calls upon the junta to renounce its declared intention to remain in power and to resume negotiations with the ECOWAS Committee of Four Foreign Ministers without delay.

The Council will, in the absence of a satisfactory response from the military junta, be ready to take appropriate measures with the objective of restoring the democratically elected Government of President Kabbah.

The Council remains deeply concerned about the deteriorating humanitarian situation in Sierra Leone, and at the continued looting and commandeering of relief supplies of international agencies. It calls upon the military junta to cease all interference with the delivery of humanitarian assistance to the people of Sierra Leone. The Council condemns the continuing violence and threats of violence by the junta towards the civilian population, foreign nationals and personnel of the ECOWAS monitoring group, and calls for an end to such acts of violence. The Council also expresses its concern at the effects of the continuing influx of refugees into neighbouring countries, in particular Guinea, due to the crisis in Sierra Leone. It calls upon all States and relevant international organizations to provide help to these countries in dealing with this problem.

The Council will remain actively seized of this matter.

Communication. In a 20 August letter [S/1997/650] to the Secretary-General, the exiled Government of Sierra Leone affirmed that, as a result of the coup d'état of 25 May, a very large proportion of the citizenry of Freetown as well as other areas of the country had left Sierra Leone and were seeking refuge in various countries of the subregion and other parts of the world. It stated that the majority of the people of Sierra Leone had made clear their total opposition to the military junta by organizing pro-democracy demonstrations, while the regime had reacted by using force against the demonstrators.

New Special Envoy

On 28 August [S/1997/680], the Secretary-General informed the Security Council President that he had decided to appoint as his new Special Envoy for Sierra Leone, Francis G. Okelo (Uganda), who was currently serving as Deputy Head of the UN Special Mission to Afghanistan. Mr. Okelo would take up his assignment in the second half of September, replacing Berhanu Dinka (Ethiopia), who had been Special Envoy since February 1995.

On 3 September [S/1997/681], the Council President informed the Secretary-General that the Council welcomed Mr. Okelo's appointment.

Sanctions

In an 8 September letter [S/1997/695] to the Security Council President, Nigeria transmitted the final communique of the ECOWAS summit (Abuja, 28-29 August), which included a decision on sanctions against the junta in Sierra Leone.

Expressing its deep concern about the breakdown of the 30 July negotiations between the Committee of Four and the illegal regime in Sierra Leone, ECOWAS approved a package of sanctions and blockade on all supplies of petroleum products, arms and military equipment as a further measure to ensure the restoration of the legitimate Government of President Kabbah. The heads of State and Government mandated the ECOWAS monitoring group (ECOMOG) to monitor the ceasefire, enforce the sanctions and embargo and secure the peace in Sierra Leone.

ECOWAS decided to enlarge the membership of the Committee responsible for monitoring the situation in Sierra Leone to five countries by including Liberia, and to raise the status of the Committee to the level of heads of State and Government.

Secretary-General's recommendations. In a 7 October letter [S/1997/776] to the Security Council President, the Secretary-General stated that repeated efforts by ECOWAS and other organizations since May 1997 to get the Sierra Leone junta to stand down had been met with a series of stalling and diversionary actions. Not only had the military regime shown no signs of wanting to relinquish power, there was evidence that it was planning for a prolonged stay in power.

Efforts for the peaceful resolution of the situation and for the junta to stand down deserved the support of the Security Council and the international community. In that connection, the ECOWAS sanctions and the corresponding support requested of the Council could be seen as measures intended to promote a peaceful resolution of the situation. The Secretary-General expressed confidence that the Council would wish to lend its support to measures that it considered conducive to a peaceful outcome.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (October)

On 8 October [meeting 3822], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1132(1997). The draft [S/1997/777] was prepared during consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling the statements of its President of 27 May 1997, 11 July 1997 and 6 August 1997 condemning the military coup in Sierra Leone,

19. Expresses its intention to terminate the measures set out in paragraphs 5 and 6 above when the demand in paragraph 1 above has been complied with;

20. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Communication (October). In a 15 October letter [S/1997/800] to the Secretary-General, the exiled Government of Sierra Leone reported on alleged acts of aggression and intimidation committed by the military junta against civilians and ECOMOG since the adoption of resolution 1132(1997), as well as on statements allegedly made by officials of the junta.

Report of Secretary-General (October). In a 21 October report [S/1997/811], the Secretary-General informed the Security Council that the situation in Sierra Leone remained serious, and that the attitude of the military junta towards the efforts of the ECOWAS Committee of Five continued to be marked by prevarication and a seeming insistence on holding on to power. The breakdown of organized governance was taking a heavy toll on the civilian population.

Clashes between AFRC troops and ECOMOG forces were reported to have taken place in Freetown and other locations. Fighting between AFRC and Kamajors was also reported in the Tongo Fields (diamond) area.

The ECOWAS Committee met in Abuja on 10 and 11 October to assess the situation in Sierra Leone. AFRC was not invited to the meeting. The Committee called on the Secretary-General to establish a contact group on Sierra Leone to facilitate the provision of technical and logistical support by the international community for ECOWAS. Consultations were under way to respond to the request.

The Committee reaffirmed its willingness to resume negotiations with the junta, despite what it called the junta's continued attacks on and harassment of ECOMOG troops, and agreed to hold its next meeting in Conakry on 22 October. AFRC had accepted the Committee's invitation to attend the talks.

The serious humanitarian situation in the country posed a dilemma for the international community because the security and safety of both personnel and humanitarian supplies could not be assured under prevailing conditions. The number of displaced persons registered with humanitarian organizations during July and August stood at around 100,000. However, the actual number was thought to be much higher. The number of Sierra Leoneans who had registered as refugees in neighbouring countries had risen to over 60,000. A much larger number of people had moved temporarily to neighbouring countries, but they had not yet sought refugee status.

Peace plan

By a 28 October letter [S/1997/824] to the Security Council President, Nigeria transmitted the communique and the ECOWAS six-month peace plan for Sierra Leone issued following the meeting between the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the ECOWAS Committee of Five and a 13-member delegation representing the AFRC regime, which was held in Conakry on 22 and 23 October.

The Committee of Five and the junta's delegation agreed to accelerate efforts towards the peaceful resolution of the Sierra Leonean crisis. To that end, they adopted an ECOWAS peace plan and a timetable for its implementation over a six-month period with effect from 23 October.

The peace plan provided for, among other things: the immediate cessation of hostilities and establishment of a monitoring and verification mechanism to be staffed by ECOMOG and, subject to Security Council approval, UN military observers; the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of combatants (1-31 December); the resumption of humanitarian assistance, to be monitored by ECOMOG (14 November); the return of refugees and displaced persons, with the assistance of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (1 December); the restoration of the constitutional Government of President Kabbah and the broadening of the power base (22 April 1998); and the provision of immunities and guarantees for the coup leaders (22 April). Under the plan, Corporal Foday Sankoh, leader of the Revolutionary United Front (RUF), was expected to return to Sierra Leone to make his contribution to the peace process. He had been arrested and detained in Nigeria since March 1997.

The Committee and the junta delegation agreed to continue negotiations towards effective and prompt implementation of the peace plan. The meeting reiterated the appeal to the international community to provide adequate assistance to the neighbouring countries of Sierra Leone, which had recorded an increased influx of refugees to their territories. It also expressed its appreciation to the United Nations and OAU for their cooperation with ECOWAS and appealed to them for material, logistic and financial support.

Communication (November). On 13 November [S/1997/886], the democratically elected Government of Sierra Leone forwarded to the Security Council President a press release issued on 5 November by President Kabbah, in which he announced his acceptance of the ECOWAS six-month plan by for Sierra Leone (the Conakry Agreement). He urged all Sierra Leoneans to embrace the plan, which took into account a good part of the Abidjan Accord [YUN 1996, p. 123], and to regard it as an instrument of rehabilitation and reconciliation for the entire country.

ECOWAS report (November)

On 14 November [S/1997/895], the Secretary-General transmitted to the Security Council the first report of the ECOWAS Committee of Five on Sierra Leone, covering the period from 8 October to 5 November 1997, as requested in resolution 1132(1997).

The Committee stated that during the period 8 to 22 October, the situation in Sierra Leone, which was bad enough at the inception of the coup d'etat, worsened significantly. The junta had carried out attacks against ECOMOG troops; continued to recruit and train citizens for its army; mistreated, detained and even killed opponents of the regime; appointed its own cabinet; and established AFRC as its highest ruling body.

From the signing of the peace plan on 23 October until 5 November, all hostilities had ceased and the combatants were holding on to their positions. The junta had agreed to meet with the ECOMOG High Command on modalities for implementing the peace plan during the week beginning 3 November.

In the meantime, in violation of the sanctions, merchant ships continued to enter Sierra Leone ports to discharge their cargoes. However, the country was experiencing an acute scarcity of petroleum, petroleum products and food. The AFRC/RUF spokesman was reported to have said that the junta had taken delivery of modern weapons from some developed countries and was ready to engage ECOMOG in warfare. During the reporting period, human rights violations continued unabated.

ECOMOG's enforcement of the blockade of delivery of petroleum products and military supplies by sea had been largely handicapped by lack of serviceable ships to effect the blockade by sea. However, ECOMOG was able to prevent the entry of ships to the ports, block off land supply routes and deny the junta use of airspace. It was also inspecting all incoming cargo to ensure that it consisted only of humanitarian supplies. ECOMOG's fleet of aircraft were employed in deterring defiant ships and supporting its troops. ECOMOG locations had become safe havens for the internally displaced persons and refugees, the numbers of which had increased greatly. The situation in those areas had worsened due to the absence of relief materials. The number of Sierra Leone refugees in the neighboring countries of Guinea and Liberia was increasing.

At its fifth meeting (Abuja, 10-11 October), the ECOWAS Committee of Five had directed the ECOWAS Executive Secretary to establish a technical committee to work out modalities for the creation of safe havens, the establishment of humanitarian corridors for delivery of relief materials and the registration of NGOs. That committee was also given the task of providing advice on all issues relating to the delivery of humanitarian assistance.

In compliance with that mandate, the Executive Secretary had established a Technical Committee composed of the Ambassadors of the Committee of Five accredited to Nigeria, namely, the Ambassadors of Cote d'Ivoire, Ghana, Guinea and Liberia. Nigeria was to be represented by an official of its Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Also on the Technical Committee were three staff members of the ECOWAS secretariat and the ECOMOG Liaison Officer in the secretariat. The Technical Committee met on 28 October to establish its working modalities.

ECOWAS renewed its appeal to the international community to provide assistance for the realization of its objectives in Sierra Leone, including humanitarian assistance to refugees and displaced persons. ECOWAS member States were urged to strengthen the operational capacities of ECOMOG, and ECOWAS appealed to the international community to provide material and logistic support. The Security Council was asked to send a team of UN military observers to participate in the monitoring and verification of complete cessation of hostilities, and ECOWAS appealed to the Secretary-General to use his good offices to establish a contact group on Sierra Leone.

On 14 November [meeting 3834], the Security Council President, on behalf of the members, made the following statement [S/PRST/1997/52]:

The Security Council recalls its resolution 1132(1997) of 8 October 1997 and the statements of its President of 27 May 1997, 11 July 1997 and 6 August 1997 in response to the military coup in Sierra Leone on 25 May 1997. It reiterates its condemnation of the overthrow of the democratically elected Government of President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah, and its concern about the threat to peace, security and stability in the region which the situation in Sierra Leone continues to present.

The Council expresses its full support and appreciation for the continued efforts of the Committee of Five on Sierra Leone of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) to seek a peaceful settlement of the crisis and the restoration of the democratically elected Government and constitutional order. In this regard, it welcomes the peace plan agreed in Conakry on 23 October 1997 between the ECOWAS Committee and representatives of the junta as set out in the documents issued after the meeting. It also notes with satisfaction President Kabbah's acceptance of the peace plan in his statement of 5 November 1997.

The Council calls upon the junta to fulfil its obligations under the peace plan, and in particular the ongoing maintenance of the ceasefire. It calls upon all parties concerned to work for the early and effective implementation of the peace plan, and encourages the ECOWAS Committee to cooperate closely with the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General on Sierra Leone.

The Council takes note with appreciation of the briefing on the outcome of the meeting in Conakry on 23 October 1997 provided to its members in New York by representatives of the ECOWAS Committee on 11 November 1997. It expresses its readiness to consider how it can support the implementation of the peace plan, and looks forward to early recommendations from the Secretary-General on the role the United Nations could play to that end.

The Council reiterates the need for the provision and distribution of humanitarian assistance in response to local needs, and calls upon the junta to ensure its safe delivery to its intended recipients. It urges all States and relevant international organizations to continue to assist those countries dealing with the influx of refugees caused by the crisis in Sierra Leone.

The Council reminds all States of their obligation to comply strictly with the embargo on the sale or supply of petroleum and petroleum products and arms and related matériel of all types to Sierra Leone, and with the other measures imposed by its resolution 1132(1997).

Further developments

In a 5 December report [S/1997/958], the Secretary-General, in response to resolution 1132(1997), described developments in Sierra Leone since his first report of 21 October. He welcomed the signing of the Conakry Agreement on 23 October. However, despite some encouraging indications, little concrete progress had been made in its implementation.

Although the ceasefire between ECOMOG and the junta's troops in the Freetown area appeared to be holding, heavy fighting had been reported between the Kamajors and AFRC/RUF in the south-east and in the diamond-producing areas in the east, and there were numerous reports that all armed elements in Sierra Leone were recruiting, training and acquiring weapons. There had also been reports of difficulties in the relationship between AFRC and RUF, the Secretary-General noted, and while the junta appeared to be in control of Freetown, the extent to which it was willing, or able, to negotiate the implementation of the Conakry Agreement was not clear.

ECOMOG was continuing its preparations to implement the military provisions of the Conakry Agreement, including the identification of possible sites for the disarmament and demobilization of all Sierra Leonean armed elements.

The military, political and humanitarian aspects of the Conakry Agreement required further clarification and negotiation, as well as the early formulation of the practical modalities for its implementation, said the Secretary-General. Those aspects should include the development of a concept of operations for the deployment of ECOMOG throughout the country, the conduct of disarmament, and the timing and modalities of implementation of an effective national reconciliation process. Disarmament should be followed by the demobilization and reintegration of ex-combatants, which would require assistance from the international community.

The Secretary-General noted that, although the junta had publicly committed itself to the implementation of the Agreement and held discussions with ECOMOG on the modalities for the disarmament process, it had issued several statements criticizing key provisions of the Agreement and raised several issues that could undermine the accord. In particular, during two meetings in November with the ECOMOG Force Commander, Major-General Victor Malu, the junta insisted that no military progress could be made on the deployment of ECOMOG troops throughout Sierra Leone until the release of Corporal Sankoh; the removal of Nigerian troops from ECOMOG; and the exclusion of Armed Forces of Sierra Leone troops from the disarmament exercise. However, the junta had agreed to the formation of three committees to deal with disarmament, ceasefire violations and humanitarian assistance. The committees were to have become operational on 1 December but no progress had been made in that regard.

In order to assess conditions on the ground and formulate recommendations as to the form that UN assistance in the implementation of the Conakry Agreement might take in terms of humanitarian aid, the deployment of military observers and support for ECOWAS and ECOMOG, the Secretary-General dispatched an exploratory team to the subregion during the second half of November, led by his Special Envoy for Sierra Leone, Mr. Okelo.

The team met with the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Liberia, Monie Captan, and with senior ECOMOG officers in Monrovia, as well as with President Kabbah and the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Guinea in Conakry. Mr. Captan stated his Government's support for the restoration of constitutional rule in Sierra Leone but expressed concern at the danger of the conflict there spilling over into Liberia. Those concerns had been expressed in a 31 October letter [S/1997/835] from Liberia to the Security Council President. At a meeting with Major Koroma, Chairman of AFRC, in Freetown on 27 November, the Special Envoy and the Executive Secretary of ECOWAS stressed the commitment of the international community to the restoration of constitutional order in Sierra Leone and the need for the junta to cooperate fully in the implementation of the Conakry Agreement. Major Koroma did not express any objections. However, at a meeting in Jui on the same day between General Malu and junta military representatives, including the AFRC Secretary-General and its Chiefs of Staff, very little progress was made in discussing the practical modalities for implementing the Agreement's military provisions.

In concluding observations, the Secretary-General stated that implementation of the Conakry Agreement should be pursued with a sense of urgency, with pressure being exerted on the Freetown junta, which should not be allowed to manipulate the talks and procrastinate in carrying out its commitments under the Agreement. In the meantime, the military, political and humanitarian aspects required further clarification and negotiation, the Secretary-General said.

If the steps he had outlined were carried out and should security conditions on the ground permit, the Secretary-General would dispatch a technical survey team to Sierra Leone. Its findings would enable him to present to the Council recommendations concerning the role that the United Nations could play in assisting in the implementation of the Conakry Agreement. He had also requested his Special Envoy to reopen a small liaison office in Sierra Leone, the functions of which would include liaison with ECOMOG and with the various political forces in the country.

By a 16 December letter [S/1997/980], the Security Council President expressed the Council's support for the Secretary-General's proposal to reopen his liaison office in Freetown, subject to security and budgetary conditions. The Council also supported his proposal to send a technical team to examine the situation on the ground and to offer recommendations on the role to be played by the United Nations in implementing the Conakry Agreement.

ECOWAS meeting (December)

The seventh meeting of the ECOWAS Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the Committee of Five on Sierra Leone met in Abuja on 19 December [S/1998/103]. The Ministers noted that there had been some violations of the ECOWAS and UN sanctions imposed on the junta in Sierra Leone, relating specifically to the arms embargo and travel restrictions imposed on members of the illegal regime and their families. The Ministers therefore called on all countries to adhere strictly to those sanctions. They also requested countries harbouring members of the military junta, their families and all others on the restricted list to repatriate such persons to Sierra Leone.

Somalia

Efforts continued throughout 1997 at both the international and regional levels to reconcile the warring factions in Somalia, which had been without a central Government since 1991. In two presidential statements on Somalia issued during the year, following reviews of the situation in the country, the Security Council expressed its full support for the efforts of organizations and States of the region to promote a direct political dialogue and facilitate a broad-based political settlement. The Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD), the Organization of African Unity (OAU), the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC) and the League of Arab States (LAS) all took an active role in fostering an environment conducive to peace by convening a number of meetings among the various Somali factions.

The Security Council welcomed the signing on 22 December by the Somali leaders of the Cairo Declaration, in particular the decision to adopt a federal system of government with regional autonomy, as well as their agreement to form a transitional government of national unity and to hold a conference of national reconciliation in early 1998. It also expressed its support for the Secretary-General's efforts to explore means for the United Nations to assist in restoring peace and stability, and noted with appreciation his decision to strengthen the United Nations Political Office for Somalia (UNPOS) in Nairobi, Kenya.

In both its February and December statements, the Council called on all States to implement the arms embargo imposed against Somalia in 1992. The Council's Committee on Somalia, which monitored the implementation of the embargo, continued its work in 1997.

Regional peace initiatives

On 8 January [S/1997/17], Ethiopia transmitted to the Security Council President a 6 January letter and appendices from its Minister for Foreign Affairs concerning the High-level Consultative Meeting of the Somali political movements, held in Sodere, Ethiopia.

The Government of Ethiopia, which had a mandate from both OAU and IGAD to assist in the search for peace in Somalia, had succeeded in October 1996 in bringing together 27 Somali leaders, representing 26 political factions, in Addis Ababa and later in Sodere. On 3 January 1997, after more than eight weeks of negotiations, the High-level Consultative Meeting adopted a declaration of national pledges and commitments and a solemn declaration. The two declarations were signed by all 27 Somali leaders present but neither Hussein Aidid nor Mohamed Ibrahim Egal, the leaders of two major factions, participated in the meeting.

The Sodere declarations set up a National Salvation Council of 41 members selected from the 26 factions represented at the meeting. They also included an agreement to convene a National Reconciliation Conference at a later time. The Council was to prepare the setting up of a Transitional Central Authority or a Provisional Central Government. A Transitional National Charter, also to be prepared by the Council, was to be approved by the National Reconciliation Conference, which was to be followed by a Concluding National Conference at which the international community would be represented. In the declarations, the Somali leaders stated that they were ready to give priority to the national interest as opposed to the realization of individual ambitions. They also called on the international community to assist Somalia.

However, Mr. Aidid rejected the outcome of the Sodere meeting, claiming that Ethiopia was not fit to make peace among Somalis because of alleged arms supply to some of the factions. Ethiopia denied those charges.

On 13 January [A/51/773-S/1997/43], Indonesia transmitted to the Secretary-General the text of the final communique of the OIC Annual Coordination Meeting of the Ministers for Foreign Affairs (New York, 2 October 1996). The Meeting urged all Somali political factions and movements to cease armed hostilities and abide by the 1993 Addis Ababa Peace Accords [YUN 1993, p. 292], and reaffirmed its commitment to the restoration of the unity, sovereignty, territorial integrity and independence of Somalia.

Also on 13 January [A/51/774-S/1997/45], Indonesia transmitted the final communique and resolutions adopted at the twenty-fourth session of the OIC Conference of Foreign Ministers (Jakarta, 9-13 December 1996). In a resolution on the situation in Somalia, OIC invited all Somali factions to work for the simultaneous disarmament of militias and other groups and called on all States, particularly neighbouring States, to cooperate in implementing Security Council resolution 733(1992) [YUN 1992, p. 199], which had established an arms embargo against Somalia.

Report of Secretary-General (February). In a 17 February report [S/1997/135], the Secretary-General noted that the Security Council, at informal consultations on 15 January, had reviewed the situation in Somalia following a briefing by the Secretariat and in the light of the declarations adopted on 3 January by the High-level Consultative Meeting (see above). The Council had welcomed the Sodere declarations as a positive step and expressed the hope that those Somali factions that had not attended the meeting would soon join in the peace process. In the hope of assisting regional peacemaking efforts, the Council requested the Secretary-General to consult countries in the region and to submit recommendations on the supporting role that the United Nations, including the Council, could play. The Secretary-General's report responded to that request and also covered developments in Somalia since the last report in January 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 124].

Describing the security and political situation in the various regions of Somalia, the Secretary-General said that most of the fighting among the various clans was taking place in Mogadishu, in the Juba valley area and in the Bay and Bakool areas. The Gedo area, the Hiran and Middle Shabelle regions, and the north-east and the north-west of the country were enjoying relative peace.

On 1 August 1996, General Mohamed Farah Aidid, a major faction leader, died from injuries sustained during fighting in Medina. The leaders of other major factions then called for an immediate ceasefire but the leaders of the Aidid group rejected those appeals and declared that they would continue with the policies of the late General's "government". Subsequently, Hussein Aidid, General Aidid's son, was selected to succeed his father, whose policies he promised to pursue as "President" of Somalia.

At a meeting on 9 August 1996 in Nairobi, UNPOS and representatives of diplomatic missions and organizations, after reviewing the situation in Somalia, considered that conditions were still not favourable for a major initiative or a formal mission to Somalia by the international community. They agreed that neighbouring States and regional organizations, such as OAU, IGAD, LAS and OIC, as well as the United Nations, should first assess the evolving situation.

The Secretary-General stated that peacemaking efforts by some Somali political leaders, Ethiopia, Kenya, as Chairman of IGAD, regional organizations and the United Nations continued throughout the year. President Daniel Arap Moi of Kenya succeeded in bringing together Hussein Aidid, Osman Atto and Ali Mahdi Mohamed in Nairobi in October 1996. The seven-day meeting marked the first participation of the Aidid faction in a meeting with the Mohamed faction since the UN-brokered Nairobi declaration of March 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 320]. It was also the first reunion between the Aidid faction and that of Mr. Atto since the latter broke away from General Aidid early in 1995.

In a statement issued at the end of the Nairobi meeting, and annexed to the Secretary-General's report, the Somali faction leaders asked President Moi to continue his mediation efforts and agreed to a cessation of hostilities throughout the country. However, implementation of the agreements reached in Nairobi had been adversely affected by the reluctance of Mr. Aidid to settle his differences with Mr. Atto, whom he was said to hold responsible for the death of General Aidid and from whom he had sought to regain an enclave in south Mogadishu.

The report noted that conflicts within the sub-clans (especially Modulod, Habr Gedir, Hawadle and Murosade) of the Hawiye clan, to which Mr. Mohamed, Mr. Aidid and Mr. Atto all belonged, constituted a major obstacle to national reconciliation and settlement of the civil war in Mogadishu. Reconciliation between the Hawiye leaders would facilitate the reopening of the Mogadishu seaport and airport and improve prospects for national reconciliation and the establishment of a broad-based government.

The mediation efforts of Ethiopia culminated in the signing of the Sodere declarations on 3 January 1997 (see above). However, Mr. Aidid had rejected the outcome of the meeting. Since the Sodere meeting, Member States and international organizations accredited to Somalia had held three meetings, facilitated by UNPOS, to assess the declarations. They expressed the hope that Mr. Aidid and Mr. Egal would eventually join in the process. At one of the meetings, the participants were briefed on the efforts of Italy's Special Envoy for Somalia, Giuseppe Cassini, who on 20 January had successfully arranged a meeting between Mr. Aidid and Mr. Mohamed, the first meeting between the leaders of the two Hawiye groups inside Somalia since 1992. Though the parties agreed to form a joint committee to deal with a number of issues, the committee had yet to meet.

In a 31 January letter to the UN Secretariat, which was annexed to the report, Ethiopia and Kenya, representing the regional States and organizations involved in the search for peace in Somalia, called on the United Nations, among other things, to exert the necessary pressure on all Somali factions and groups to show greater commitment to national reconciliation. They also affirmed that the Sodere declarations were sufficiently inclusive to merit the full support of the United Nations.

The Secretary-General stated that, during the period under review, UN efforts in Somalia had continued in the form of the good offices of the Secretary-General; UNPOS facilitation of mediation efforts; cooperation with regional organizations and neighbouring States; periodic reviews by the Security Council; humanitarian assistance (see PART THREE, Chapter III); and efforts to improve respect for human rights. Those efforts would continue. However, since the regional actors had clearly indicated the assistance they would like to receive from the Organization, the Secretary-General recommended that the Security Council take into consideration the following options: enhancing relief and rehabilitation assistance; securing the cooperation of all Somali factions; designating a Special Envoy for Somalia, if considered desirable by the regional actors; urging all States to observe fully their obligations to the arms embargo; requesting financial assistance for regional peacemaking efforts through the establishment of a trust fund for the implementation of the Nairobi and Sodere declarations, should the regional Governments so wish; and reactivating the idea of sending a joint UN-OAU fact-finding mission to Somalia to examine what more could be done to help the Somali people to restore peace, should the regional actors indicate that such a mission would be useful.

The Secretary-General emphasized that the best hope for restoring peace in Somalia lay in the negotiation of a political settlement entrusting power to a broad-based Government in which all the principal factions would be represented. The onus, he stated, was on the factions that did not join in the negotiation of the Nairobi and Sodere declarations. They were to be held accountable for any further suffering on the part of the Somali people.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (February)

On 27 February [meeting 3742], the President of the Security Council made the following statement on behalf of the Council [S/PRST/1997/8]:

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General on the situation in Somalia dated 17 February 1997.

The Council reaffirms its commitment to a comprehensive and lasting settlement of the situation in Somalia, bearing in mind respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Somalia, in accordance with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations. It reiterates that full responsibility for achieving national reconciliation and for restoring peace rests with the Somali people.

The Council expresses its full support for the efforts of regional and other interested States, as well as those of international and regional organizations, particularly the Organization of African Unity, the Intergovernmental Authority on Development and the League of Arab States, to promote a direct political dialogue and facilitate a broad-based political settlement in Somalia.

The Council calls upon all Somali factions to cease immediately all hostilities and to cooperate with the regional and other efforts for peace and national reconciliation in Somalia, including the Sodere and Nairobi initiatives.

The Council encourages all States to contribute generously to the appeals of the United Nations to ensure continued relief and rehabilitation efforts in Somalia, including those aimed at the strengthening of civil society. It also encourages States to contribute to regional mediation efforts for Somalia.

The Council reiterates its call upon all States to fulfil their obligations to implement the embargo imposed by resolution 733(1992) on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Somalia. In this context, it calls upon all States to refrain from any actions which might exacerbate the situation in Somalia.

The Council expresses again its appreciation for all United Nations agencies and other organizations and individuals carrying out humanitarian activities in Somalia. It calls upon the Somali factions to ensure the safety and freedom of movement of all humanitarian personnel and to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian relief to the Somali people, including through the opening of the airport and harbour of Mogadishu.

The Council encourages the Secretary-General to continue his consultations with the Somali parties, regional States and organizations on the role the United Nations can play in supporting the peace efforts, including on specific options contained in his report. It requests the Secretary-General to continue monitoring the situation in Somalia and to report to it in an appropriate manner on those consultations and developments in the situation generally.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Further peace initiatives

On 16 April [S/1997/324], Kuwait transmitted to the Security Council the text of a 31 March resolution on the situation on Somalia adopted at the one hundred and seventh regular session of the LAS Council, which welcomed the creation of the Council of National Salvation of Somalia and called for the holding of a national reconciliation conference and the establishment of a broadly representative national authority reflecting the wishes of the different segments of the Somali population.

On 2 June [S/1997/418], Egypt transmitted a copy of the Cairo Joint Agreement signed by Mr. Aidid and Mr. Mohamed at a meeting held in Cairo on 27 and 28 May. The two Somali leaders agreed to cease all hostilities as from 28 May and to exert the necessary efforts for holding a conference of national reconciliation as soon as possible. With regard to the capital city of Mogadishu, the two leaders agreed to work together to cease all hostilities; to abolish the so-called green line in the city and to unite the community; to make joint efforts to establish an efficient administration; and to form a technical committee to implement the steps agreed upon. All parties were invited to join in the agreement.

On 10 July [S/1997/535], Kenya forwarded the final text of the communique issued at the Extraordinary Summit of the Heads of State and Government of IGAD, held in Nairobi on 8 and 9 July. The Summit noted with grave concern that peace in Somalia remained elusive, despite efforts to find a lasting solution. It welcomed the efforts being made with regard to the IGAD/OAU peace initiative on Somalia and noted that the agreements reached by Somali factions at meetings organized in Nairobi, Sodere, Sana'a (Yemen) and Cairo had contributed to advancing the process. The Summit noted with satisfaction that the situation in northern Somalia was relatively stable and encouraged all the factions in the south to attend the national reconciliation conference in Bossaso in November 1997.

Report of Secretary-General (September). On 16 September, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report [S/1997/715] on the situation in Somalia, based on the findings of his Special Envoy's visit to the region from 6 to 20 August.

The Special Envoy, Ismat Kittani, held consultations with all the major Somali groups and with the leaders of regional and international organizations, as well as with government officials in countries involved in the peace process (Djibouti, Egypt, Ethiopia, Italy, Kenya and Yemen).

Mr. Kittani's mission had shown that the political process in Somalia was at another critical juncture. Having set 1 November as the opening date for the national reconciliation conference in Bossaso, the Sodere group, led by the five Co-Chairmen of the National Salvation Council (NSC), had made clear its intention to proceed with that conference, even if efforts failed to persuade Mr. Aidid to partake in a serious dialogue on issues concerning peace. There appeared to be a substantial amount of sympathy for that position in the region. The Aidid and the Egal groups, in separate meetings with Mr. Kittani, had expressed various objections to the Bossaso conference.

The Secretary-General had directed that certain steps be taken as a matter of priority in line with the findings of and recommendations made by the Special Envoy. First, a meeting at the ambassadorial level would be convened in New York in September 1997, with the participation of representatives of all the countries Mr. Kittani had visited, together with those of IGAD, OAU, LAS and OIC. Interested members of the Security Council would be invited to participate. The purpose of the meeting would be to harmonize views on mechanisms and measures to maximize the international community's efforts to help Somalia achieve national reconciliation.

Secondly, the Secretary-General had reviewed the role of UNPOS and concluded that its continuation and strengthening were essential for the United Nations to continue to assist those engaged in peacemaking efforts for Somalia. He had accepted his Special Envoy's conclusion that UNPOS personnel should undertake more visits to Somalia on a regular basis, security conditions permitting. Consequently, the Secretary-General had decided to increase the UNPOS staff. Unfortunately, it was not possible to move UNPOS to Mogadishu from Nairobi due to security concerns. For planning and budgetary purposes, it was envisaged that UNPOS would continue to exist during the biennium 1998-1999. The necessary financial resources would need to be authorized and allocated.

The Secretary-General affirmed that every effort would continue to be made to help the Somali people in the relief, rehabilitation, reconstruction and development fields and that a general review of the UN role in Somalia would be conducted in November/December 1997 in the light of the results of the national reconciliation conference, if held, or of the prevailing situation if it was not.

Referring to the September report, the Security Council President, by a 30 September letter [S/1997/756] to the Secretary-General, said the Council members supported a more active UN role in coordinating international mediation efforts in Somalia and they agreed with the decision to strengthen the staff of UNPOS.

Cairo Declaration

On 22 December [S/1997/1000], Egypt transmitted to the Security Council the Cairo Declaration on Somalia. The Declaration was signed on 22 December by Mr. Aidid and Mr. Mohamed, as Co-Chairmen of the meeting held in Cairo, mediated by the Government of Egypt and encouraged by LAS. A number of other Somali political leaders were also signatories to the Declaration, including Mr. Atto.

Recognizing the need for a transitional mechanism of national authority until the establishment of a constitutional federal Government with regional autonomy, the Somali leaders resolved to hold a National Reconciliation Conference on 15 February 1998 in the capital of the Somali Bay region, Baidoa. The purpose of the Conference was to elect a presidential council and a Prime Minister and to adopt a transitional charter. The charter would serve as the supreme law of the land and as a framework for the protection of individual rights and liberties. The agenda for the Conference was outlined in the Declaration. Pursuant to the provisions of the Conference, a Government in transition would be established. The transitional Government would conduct a national census from which an electoral system, including electoral registration, elections and other related functions could be implemented. The transitional Government would limit its existence to three years, with a possible extension of two additional years. The popular approval of a permanent Constitution and first election of a succeeding constitutional Government would be held before the completion of the transitional period and by the transitional Government.

In addition, a Constituent Assembly, composed of various Somali social groups, would be formed to act as the legislative authority, and an independent judiciary system would be established.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (December)

On 23 December [meeting 3845], the President of the Security Council made the following statement on behalf of the Council [S/PRST/1997/57]:

The Security Council has considered the situation in Somalia, including the recent developments in the political, military and humanitarian fields.

The Council reaffirms its commitment to a comprehensive and lasting settlement of the crisis in Somalia, bearing in mind respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Somalia, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations. In this context, it stresses that the responsibility for achieving genuine national reconciliation and peace rests with the Somali people themselves.

The Council expresses its full support for the efforts of regional and other interested States as well as those of international and regional organizations, particularly the Organization of African Unity, the Intergovernmental Authority on Development, the League of Arab States, the European Union and the Organization of the Islamic Conference, to promote a direct political dialogue and facilitate the emergence of a broad-based central Government in Somalia.

The Council welcomes the outcome of the meetings between the Somali leaders held in Cairo and concluded on 22 December 1997, in particular their decision to adopt a federal system with regional autonomy and their agreement to form a transitional government of national unity and to hold an inclusive conference of national reconciliation in Baidoa through which a presidential council and a Prime Minister will be elected. It also welcomes the signing of the Cairo Declaration on Somalia and other important agreements attached thereto, particularly on the creation of an elected Constituent Assembly, the establishment of an independent judicial system and the preparation of a transitional charter. The Security Council calls upon all Somali leaders to contribute positively to the current momentum for peace and reconciliation created by the significant progress achieved in Cairo, and by the other previous initiatives of Sodere, Nairobi and Sana'a, through the widest possible participation in the planned conference and to cease immediately all acts of violence and to observe the ceasefire.

The Council urges all States to contribute generously to the appeals of the United Nations to ensure continued relief and rehabilitation efforts in all regions of Somalia, including those aimed at the strengthening of civil society. It also stresses the urgent need to address the humanitarian situation in those areas affected by the recent floods.

The Council reiterates its call upon all States to fulfil their obligations to implement the embargo imposed by resolution 733(1992) of 23 January 1992 on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Somalia. In this context, it calls upon all States to refrain from any actions which might exacerbate the situation in Somalia.

The Council expresses also its support for the efforts exerted by the Secretary-General aimed at exploring means for the United Nations to assist in restoring peace and stability in Somalia. It notes with appreciation the decision of the Secretary-General to strengthen the United Nations Political Office for Somalia in Nairobi. In this regard, it stresses the need for closer coordination of all efforts for peace in Somalia.

The Council expresses again its appreciation to all United Nations agencies, other organizations and individuals carrying out humanitarian activities in all regions of Somalia. It calls upon the Somali factions to ensure the safety and freedom of movement of all humanitarian personnel and to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian relief, including through the immediate reopening of the airport and seaport of Mogadishu.

The Council encourages the Secretary-General to continue his consultations with the Somali parties, interested and regional States and organizations concerned on means for the United Nations to support peace and reconciliation efforts, including through specific options contained in his report of 17 February 1997. It requests the Secretary-General to keep it regularly informed and submit a report about these consultations and developments in the situation in due course.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Arms embargo

By a 6 January letter [S/1997/16] to the President of the Security Council, the Chairman of the Council Committee on Somalia transmitted a report covering the Committee's work from 1 January to 31 December 1996. The Council had established the Committee in resolution 751(1992) [YUN 1992, p. 202] in order to monitor the implementation of the military and weapons embargo against Somalia imposed by resolution 733(1992) [YUN 1992, p. 199].

The Committee held its 11th and 12th meetings in 1996. On 3 January 1996, the Committee took action on a case of suspected violation of the embargo concerning the purchase and shipment of a consignment of military hardware and ammunition to one of the Somali factions. The Governments cited in the information provided to the Committee subsequently refuted the allegations. At its 11 September meeting, the Committee appealed to Governments, national and international organizations and individuals for information on violations of the arms embargo, and a note verbale was sent to all States reminding them of the obligation to ensure its implementation.

By a 31 December letter [S/1997/1029] to the Council, the Committee submitted a report on its work for the period from 1 January to 31 December 1997. At its 13th meeting on 6 January, the Committee reminded all States of their obligation to comply with Council resolutions relating to the arms embargo.

UNOSOM II financing

On 15 September, by decision 51/484, the General Assembly decided to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second session an item on financing the United Nations Operation in Somalia (UNOSOM II). UNOSOM II had been withdrawn from Somalia in March 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 400].

By decision 52/456 of 22 December, the Assembly decided that the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee should continue to consider the financing of UNOSOM II at its resumed fifty-second session in 1998.

Western Sahara

The United Nations in 1997 continued its efforts to organize a referendum for the people of Western Sahara, as outlined in the 1990 settlement plan approved by the Security Council in resolution 658(1990) [YUN 1990, p. 920]. The plan, agreed to by both Morocco and the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguia el-Hamra y de Río de Oro (POLISARIO), set out conditions for a referendum by which the people of the Territory could exercise their right to self-determination by choosing, in a free, fair and transparent manner, between independence or integration with Morocco.

To implement the plan, the Security Council, in 1991 authorized the establishment of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO) [YUN 1991, p. 794, SC res. 690(1991)], which was composed of civilian, military and civilian police units. The ceasefire reached in 1991 continued to be monitored in 1997 by MINURSO, with only minor technical violations taking place, reported by the Secretary-General [S/1997/166]. MINURSO had helped the parties maintain their commitment to the ceasefire through its presence and patrolling activities, he added.

In early 1997, implementation of the 1990 settlement plan remained at an impasse, but momentum increased after the Secretary-General appointed James Baker III, former Secretary of State of the United States, as his Personal Envoy, who was to assess the situation and try to reactivate the plan. Subsequently, the parties consented to direct talks, during the course of which they agreed on issues related to identification of prospective voters, repatriation of Saharan refugees, and a code of conduct for the referendum campaign. A detailed referendum plan, based on the original 1990 settlement plan, was put forward by the Secretary-General on 13 November.

The General Assembly in December welcomed the agreements reached by the two parties at the direct talks under the auspices of the Personal Envoy, and urged them to implement those agreements fully. The Assembly also reaffirmed the responsibility of the United Nations towards the people of Western Sahara, as provided for in the settlement plan.

The Security Council extended the mandate of MINURSO three times in 1997: on 22 May, 29 September and 20 October. The last extension was until 20 April 1998. The date of 31 May 1998 was set for completing the process.

Implementation of settlement plan

Report of Secretary-General (February). The Secretary-General, in a 27 February report [S/1997/166], described efforts to break the impasse regarding the implementation of the settlement plan, with particular respect to the voter identification process. The Security Council, in resolution 1084(1996)[YUN 1996, p. 139], had asked the Secretary-General to propose alternative steps, in the framework of the plan, should there be no meaningful progress towards removing the obstacles to its implementation.

The Secretary-General stated that his Acting Special Representative, Erik Jensen, had maintained contact with the parties, visiting Rabat, Morocco, and Tindouf, Algeria, in December 1996 and January 1997. Both Morocco and POLISARIO had reiterated their commitment to the settlement plan; however, there had been no change in their respective attitudes to continuing the identification process. By late 1995, 77,058 persons had been convoked and 60,112 identified, the Secretary-General said. Those figures corresponded to the number of persons estimated to have survived since 1974, when a Spanish census indicated that 73,497 Saharans resided in the Territory.

The conditions set out by the two sides for further identification were incompatible, the report said. Morocco maintained that all persons for whom applications had been presented had the right to come forward for identification. All the groups treated as tribes and subfractions in the 1974 Spanish census should be considered as such, it stated, adding that tribal leaders (sheikhs) had been elected in 1973. POLISARIO insisted that, in accordance with the compromise proposal, in addition to individuals whose names appeared in the census, only members of a Saharan subfraction included in the 1974 census had the right to be identified, and that certain groups in the census were not recognized Saharan tribes composed of authentic subfractions.

From a technical point of view, the Secretary-General said, it was possible to resume and finish the identification process. The full programme drawn up in 1996 would have taken 32 weeks to complete, presupposing a commitment by both sides to participate as scheduled. If agreement were reached to resume the process, a certain amount of time would be required to recruit personnel and reopen identification centres.

Another aspect of the settlement plan concerned the release of political prisoners. On 14 January 1997, POLISARIO provided a revised list of persons detained for political reasons in Morocco. Two days later, the Acting Special Representative transmitted the list to Morocco, in accordance with the July 1996 agreement secured by Independent Jurist Emmanuel Roucounas during his visit to the region.

Planning for the voluntary repatriation of refugees had been undertaken by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), which continued to update the arrangement drawn up in 1991. UNHCR, which planned a pre-registration of potential returnees, continued assistance to the most vulnerable refugees. Its field office in Tindouf had been operational since July 1996.

Throughout 1997, the military component of MINURSO numbered about 230 personnel, who continued to monitor and verify the ceasefire through ground and air patrols; it reported that collaboration with both sides was good. The civilian police component, numbering 91 police officers in January 1996, was reduced to nine by the end of February 1997, and completely phased out by June. Its principal functions were to ensure security for the computerized data and computer equipment of the former identification centres, and to maintain a security presence in Tindouf, as well as to carry out occasional escort duties. Following staff reductions, all computerized data and computer equipment were assembled within the MINURSO compound at Laayoune.

The Secretary-General reported that further progress was possible only if both sides committed themselves to implementing the settlement plan. Unless that happened the continued presence of MINURSO would be increasingly questioned. He said that the international community could not continue to spend resources on Western Sahara in the absence of any progress in the implementation of the plan.

Communication. Morocco, on 10 March [S/1997/208], reaffirmed its commitment to the settlement plan and expressed regret that the February report had not mentioned the main reasons why the identification process had been halted in late 1995. That delay was due to the POLISARIO position that the right to participate in the referendum should be limited to persons whose names appeared in the 1974 Spanish census. POLISARIO also wanted the lists of persons eligible to vote made available when prepared; Morocco felt that was contrary to the provisions of the settlement plan, which stipulated that those lists should be made available only at the end of the process.

Morocco also noted the Secretary-General's statement that the number of persons identified by the time the identification process had stalled corresponded to the number of persons estimated to have survived since the 1974 census; linking those figures could create misunderstandings, it added. The Identification Commission had received a certain number of applications for persons both inside the Territory and in surrounding border areas, 233,487 of which had been processed by late 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 257].

Personal Envoy. Referring to the Security Council request [YUN 1996, p. 139, SC res. 1084(1996)] that he continue efforts to break the impasse regarding the Western Sahara plan, the Secretary-General on 17 March [S/1997/236] informed the Council of his appointment of James Baker III, former Secretary of State of the United States, as his Personal Envoy to help him assess the situation and make recommendations.

On 19 March, Morocco transmitted to the Council a letter of 11 March [S/1997/234] from its Prime Minister to the Secretary-General, commending the appointment of Mr. Baker.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (March)

On 19 March [meeting 3754], the Security Council President, speaking on behalf of the Council after consultations, made the following statement [S/PRST/1997/16]:

The Security Council welcomes the interim report of the Secretary-General of 27 February 1997 on the situation concerning Western Sahara. It is disappointed at the lack of progress on the implementation of the plan for the settlement of the question of Western Sahara noted in the report. It concurs with the Secretary-General's assessment that it is essential to maintain the ceasefire, a breach of which could seriously threaten regional stability, and that it is also essential to move the process forward. It believes that the presence of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara has been essential in helping the parties to maintain their commitment to the ceasefire. It looks forward to receiving the Secretary-General's assessment of the future tasks and configuration of the Mission.

The Council expresses its strong support for the Secretary-General's efforts to overcome the current stalemate in implementing the settlement plan. In this context, it welcomes the appointment by the Secretary-General of a Personal Envoy to the region and urges the parties to cooperate fully with him.

Communication. POLISARIO provided its views on the impasse in the implementation of the settlement plan in a letter dated 7 April to the Chairman of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. That letter was included in a working paper [A/AC.109/2087] on Western Sahara.

POLISARIO said that a ceasefire with no prospect for the application of the peace plan was perhaps the optimum scenario for Morocco, as the occupying colonial Power, but that was not acceptable either to the Sahrawi people or to the United Nations, in that it would mean the perpetuation of a fait colonial and would eventually lead to an outbreak of armed conflict. In those circumstances, POLISARIO saw no other means of overcoming the impasse than direct negotiations between the two parties, under UN auspices. It stated its desire to continue and step up the direct dialogue initiated with the Moroccan Government in September 1996. For that to be the case, POLISARIO said, the two parties needed the active involvement and resolve of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity (OAU).

Report of Secretary-General (May). The Secretary-General in May reported on further developments concerning Western Sahara [S/1997/358].

To examine the possibility of overcoming the persisting stalemate, his Personal Envoy, Mr. Baker, had visited the region from 23 to 28 April, meeting with the Secretary-General of POLISARIO and heads of State and other senior officials of Morocco and the neighbouring countries of Algeria and Mauritania. Mr. Baker, together with the Secretary-General's Acting Special Representative, Mr. Jensen, met in Tindouf with OAU observers to MINURSO.

Pointing out that six years had elapsed since the establishment of MINURSO with the aim of holding a referendum on self-determination, the Secretary-General said that the international community could not support the extension of MINURSO's mandate indefinitely and that the parties must demonstrate the political will to bring about a fair and lasting solution to the problem. He recommended that the MINURSO mandate be extended for four months, until 30 September 1997.

Although no ceasefire violations were reported during the period under review, there had been instances where the Royal Moroccan Army (RMA) failed to comply with certain technical requirements of the ceasefire rules. The MINURSO Force Commander requested RMA and POLISARIO to refrain from live-fire exercises with heavy weapons during May and June, in order to avoid any potential rise in tension towards the end of the Mission's current mandate.

POLISARIO provided the Special Envoy with a list of 85 prisoners of war whom it proposed to release; the list was transmitted also to Morocco and the International Committee of the Red Cross.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (May)

On 22 May [meeting 3779], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1108(1997), extending MINURSO's mandate as the Secretary-General recommended. The draft [S/1997/381] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its previous resolutions on the question of Western Sahara,

Recalling the statement of the President of the Security Council of 19 March 1997 on the situation concerning Western Sahara and the designation of a Personal Envoy of the Secretary-General to the region,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 5 May 1997, and welcoming in particular the intention of the Secretary-General to evaluate the situation in the light of the findings and recommendations to be provided by his Personal Envoy,

1. Reiterates its commitment to the holding, without further delay, of a free, fair and impartial referendum for the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in accordance with the settlement plan, which has been accepted by the parties;

2. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara until 30 September 1997;

3. Urges the parties to continue to cooperate with the Personal Envoy of the Secretary-General in his mission as outlined by the Secretary-General and to demonstrate the political will to overcome the persisting stalemate and find an acceptable solution;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council informed of progress in the situation and to submit to the Council, by 15 September 1997, a comprehensive report on the results of his evaluation of all aspects of the Western Sahara issue;

5. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Direct talks

Special Committee consideration. The Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples considered the question of Western Sahara on 6 June [A/52/23]. The Committee granted a request for hearing to Boukhari Ahmed of POLISARIO and reviewed a working paper on developments concerning the Territory over the previous year [A/AC.109/2087].

According to the paper, the period under review witnessed an intensive effort to break the deadlock in the implementation of the settlement plan. There had been some positive developments, including the release of prisoners and detainees and contacts between Morocco and POLISARIO. Governments in the region and POLISARIO had welcomed the appointment of the Secretary-General's Personal Envoy.

On 12 September [S/1997/721], the Secretary-General described recent developments concerning Western Sahara, stating that his Personal Envoy had held separate meetings in London on 10 and 11 June with the two parties as well as with Algeria and Mauritania. It was agreed that the only way to assess the "implementability" of the settlement plan would be through direct talks between the two parties, under UN auspices. Algeria and Mauritania would be invited as observers, but would attend discussions only on issues directly affecting them. The talks were to be private and no issue would be considered as finally agreed until all outstanding issues were agreed.

Under those conditions, the first round of direct talks under the auspices of the Personal Envoy was held in Lisbon, Portugal, on 23 June, after which the Personal Envoy submitted bridging proposals on the identification of prospective Saharan voters. A second round was held in London on 19 and 20 July, at which the parties agreed on issues related to the identification process and to preparatory work of UNHCR for the return of refugees. The third round, in Lisbon on 29 August, resulted in agreement on issues related to the confinement of troops from the two sides and to the release of prisoners of war and Saharan political detainees. A fourth round was to be held in Houston, Texas, United States, from 14 to 16 September, to discuss a proposed code of conduct for the referendum campaign. In order to take the results of those talks into account, the Secretary-General proposed deferring the submission of his report to the Security Council until late September.

The Council President, in a letter of 18 September [S/1997/722], said that the members looked forward to receiving the report in time to take action on MINURSO, the current mandate of which would expire on 30 September.

On 24 September [S/1997/742], the Secretary-General reported on the activities of his Personal Envoy and progress made at the direct talks. An agreement on the code of conduct for the referendum campaign—ensuring freedom of speech and assembly, freedom of the press, and freedom of movement out of and within the Territory—was reached in Houston on 16 September. A declaration relating to the authority of the United Nations during the transitional period was formulated, as was a set of practical measures for the resumption of the identification process.

The Secretary-General reported that the Independent Jurist had met with Moroccan officials to seek specific information on a list of 167 alleged political prisoners and detainees, submitted by POLISARIO. Moroccan officials said virtually all those listed were either dead, unknown, had joined POLISARIO or had been released. UNHCR continued preparations for the repatriation of Saharan refugees, in investigating facilities and conditions in the Territory, in refugee camps in the Tindouf area, and in Mauritania. A pilot registration project was carried out in three refugee camps, where residents were interviewed to determine whether they wished to be repatriated.

The Secretary-General noted the progress made and the spirit of cooperation at the talks, stating that the main contentious issues had been satisfactorily addressed, creating the conditions needed to proceed towards full implementation of the settlement plan.

Identification would begin at four centres, and would be expanded to a maximum of nine centres operating concurrently, with a total of 72 identification staff and 81 civilian police officers. The list of eligible voters would be published, and the referendum could be held within a year. Identification records, stored in Geneva since July 1996, were to be transferred back to MINURSO in Laayoune and Tindouf. The list of Saharan sheikhs called upon to testify would be revised, and identification personnel and civilian police officers would be recruited. The Secretary-General then recommended that the MINURSO mandate be extended for three weeks, until 20 October 1997, and thereafter for a period of six months. A full plan for the referendum would be provided in November, he added.

The Secretary-General also reported to the General Assembly on 26 September, in line with its resolution 51/143 [YUN 1996, p. 140]. That report [A/52/364] covered the period from 28 September 1996 to 11 September 1997, and was updated in an addendum issued on 2 October [A/52/364/Add.1]. The Secretary-General summarized his efforts to exercise his good offices with the parties concerned in order to implement the settlement plan.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (September/October)

On 29 September [meeting 3821], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1131(1997), thereby extending the MINURSO mandate until 20 October 1997. The action was made on the basis of a draft [S/1997/751] prepared by the members in informal consultations.

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions on the question of Western Sahara,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 24 September 1997 and the agreements reached between the parties recorded in that report,

Expressing its satisfaction at the extent to which the parties cooperated with the Personal Envoy of the Secretary-General, and urging the parties to continue this cooperation by fully implementing the said agreements and the settlement plan,

Reiterating its commitment to the holding, without further delay, of a free, fair and impartial referendum for the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in accordance with the settlement plan,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara until 20 October 1997, in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary-General contained in his report;

2. Welcomes the other recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General of 24 September 1997, and expresses its readiness to consider further action in accordance with these recommendations;

3. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

The Security Council acted again on 20 October [meeting 3825] to renew the MINURSO mandate, extending it until 20 April 1998. It took that action in resolution 1133(1997), adopting it unanimously on the basis of a draft [S/1997/806] prepared in the course of the Council's consultations.

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions on the question of Western Sahara, and in particular its resolution 1131(1997) of 29 September 1997,

Reaffirming its welcome for the report of the Secretary-General of 24 September 1997 and the agreements for the implementation of the settlement plan reached between the parties recorded in that report,

Reaffirming its commitment to assist the parties to achieve a just and lasting solution to the question of Western Sahara,

Reiterating its commitment to the holding without further delay of a free, fair and impartial referendum for the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in accordance with the settlement plan, which has been accepted by the two parties,

Reiterating its satisfaction at the extent to which the parties cooperated with the Personal Envoy of the Secretary-General,

1. Calls upon the parties to continue their constructive cooperation with the United Nations by fully implementing the settlement plan and the agreements which they have reached for its implementation;

2. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara until 20 April 1998, in order that the Mission may proceed with its identification tasks, and to increase its size in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary-General contained in his report;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to begin the identification of eligible voters in accordance with the settlement plan and the agreements reached between the parties with the aim of finishing the process by 31 May 1998;

4. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council, no later than 15 November 1997, a comprehensive report, including a detailed plan, a timetable and financial implications, for the holding of the referendum for the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara, in accordance with the settlement plan and the agreements reached between the parties for its implementation;

5. Further requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council every 60 days from the date of extension of the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara on the progress of the implementation of the settlement plan and the agreements reached between the parties and to keep the Council regularly informed of all significant developments in the interim period;

6. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Referendum plan

On 13 November [S/1997/882], the Secretary-General provided a detailed plan, timetable and financial implications for the holding of a referendum in Western Sahara, as well as a description of developments since his September report. A technical team visited the Mission area from 7 to 15 October to reassess resources needed to fulfil the settlement plan, including logistic, personnel and other requirements.

He said preparatory work had begun to ensure the resumption of the identification operation by 1 December. Identification files stored in Geneva had been returned to Laayoune and Tindouf by early November, and four identification centres were being restored to full working order. MINURSO planned to open 12 centres eventually.

Morocco promised to provide practical support for the resumption of identification, and POLISARIO agreed to make available premises previously organized as identification centres. The list of sheikhs eligible to testify was to be updated, and arrangements made for selecting alternates. Both parties had one week to check current addresses and three weeks to ensure that people were notified. Applicants would be convoked only once, and no further applications would be accepted, except for those from Saharan political detainees and prisoners of war. As agreed, the Acting Special Representative notified the parties of the results, by number, of the identification process so far.

Regarding political prisoners, the Independent Jurist had stated that he would visit the region if any new information on the names submitted by POLISARIO surfaced. UNHCR continued preparations for the repatriation of Saharan refugees.

It was also reported that MINURSO's military component remained at approximately 230 throughout 1997, and its civilian police component had been phased out. Subsequently, 11 Member States had agreed to contribute to a renewed civilian police component to assist the Identification Commission. The new civilian police contingents were scheduled to begin arriving at MINURSO headquarters in late November.

The Secretary-General stressed that the proposed plan and timetable were based on a best-case scenario—on the assumption that MINURSO and UNHCR would be provided with adequate and timely resources, that full authority for implementation was vested in the Special Representative, that the two parties and the two observer countries would cooperate fully with MINURSO, and that the Security Council would continue to extend full support for fulfilment of the UN mandate in Western Sahara. Unless all those conditions were met, it would not be possible to hold the referendum before the end of 1998, if at all, the Secretary-General emphasized.

The parties had to abide fully by the letter and spirit of the plan and agreements reached during their direct talks, he said, including respect for the sole and exclusive responsibility of the United Nations for all matters relating to the organization and conduct of the referendum. In view of a few undetermined variables, the time allotted for implementation could change, in particular concerning the period required for repatriation, which would depend on the final number of potential voters and their immediate families who wished to return to the Territory. The timely and successful completion of the identification process would be a determining factor for the start of the transitional period and full implementation of the settlement plan.

On the basis of his proposed timetable, the Secretary-General recommended that the Security Council authorize the expansion of MINURSO for the full implementation of the settlement plan, in order to enable contributing Member States and the Mission to proceed on time with preparations for full deployment. Under his plan, the identification operation would be resumed on 1 December 1997, and the transitional period would begin on 7 June 1998.

Details of plan

The referendum plan put forward in the Secretary-General's November report [S/1997/882] incorporated the basic elements of the earlier settlement plan: identification of prospective voters; a transitional period during which a referendum would be conducted; the ceasefire followed by an exchange of prisoners of war, a reduction of Moroccan troops in the Territory and confinement of the combatants of both sides to specific locations; and a proclamation of amnesty, followed by the release of Saharan political prisoners. The transitional period, starting on 7 June 1998 (D-Day), could end on 7 December 1998 with the announcement of the results of the referendum. If prisoners of war, political prisoners and detainees were released by 14 June, they could be interviewed by the Identification Commission so they could participate in the referendum. POLISARIO armed forces would be confined, in locations and numbers to be designated by the Special Representative, in Western Sahara, Mauritania and Algeria. Each party would inform the Secretary-General of the strength and location of its military forces one week before D-Day, by 1 June. As agreed in earlier plans, Morocco was prepared to reduce its troops in the Territory to a level not exceeding 65,000, within 11 weeks following D-Day, or by 22 August.

To proceed with voluntary repatriation, MINURSO would ensure that all conditions conducive to safe return were met, including the neutralization of paramilitary units in existing police forces and arrangements for the maintenance of law and order during the transitional period. A number of points at which returnees would be able to cross into the Territory would be designated. MINURSO would provide security at both crossing points and reception centres, and would also ensure that repatriation took place in areas where Moroccan Army troops had been withdrawn. Mine clearing of designated repatriation routes and sites would be required.

The estimated number of potential returnees, comprising voters and members of their immediate families, was 120,000. UNHCR believed that 15 weeks would be required for repatriation, and would cost $50 million, mostly for logistics and transport.

As for completion of the identification process, the Secretary-General noted that since all persons who had not yet been identified would be convoked only once, including those who were convoked previously but not yet identified, some 117,000 persons remained to be convoked. The identification of potential voters was an intricate and time-consuming operation, the Secretary-General went on. The 1974 Spanish census of the Territory had divided the Saharan population into 88 tribes and sub-groups. Members of those groups were dispersed throughout Western Sahara and also in parts of Algeria, Mauritania and Morocco. As previously, identification sessions would have to be organized for almost every tribal sub-group at each centre, with two sheikhs present, one from each side, in addition to observers from Morocco, POLISARIO and OAU. To complete identification of all remaining applicants, some 500 sessions would be required.

A detailed programme had been drawn up which, with total cooperation of both parties and no significant disruption due to other causes, would allow completion of identification within 26 weeks, by 31 May 1998, and issuance of a list of eligible voters by 7 June. Following a period of six weeks for any appeals, the final list would be issued by the Special Representative on 26 July, upon authorization by the Secretary-General in consultation with the OAU Chairman.

The Special Representative, assisted by a Referendum Commission, would establish conditions and modalities for the conduct of the referendum campaign to ensure that it was free and fair, without military or administrative constraints, and that there was no intimidation or interference in the process. That Commission would become operational when the Identification Commission completed its work. As agreed by the two parties in Houston, the Special Representative would set the date for the commencement of the referendum campaign once he was satisfied that those conditions had been met, three weeks prior to the referendum. The Referendum Commission would also advise the Special Representative on the actual conduct of the referendum.

Voting, scheduled for 7 December 1998, would take place only in the Territory. The location of voting centres and number of polling stations would be determined on the basis of data collected during the registration of voters, as well as existing population centres and areas where returning Western Saharans had been located. It was estimated that up to 250 polling stations would be established at voting centres in seven localities. Results should be proclaimed within 72 hours, and, depending on the results, Moroccan military troops would be withdrawn within six weeks or POLISARIO troops demobilized within four weeks.

Further developments

In a 12 December letter to the Security Council President [S/1997/974], the Secretary-General stated that, at separate meetings with his Acting Special Representative, the two sides had nearly resolved all remaining differences on the updated list of the tribal leaders. In a later report [S/1998/35], he said that the comprehensive list of tribal leaders required to provide oral testimony during identification had been agreed by the parties and published on 20 December.

In November, Identification Commission staff arrived in the mission area and a training programme was launched. The process resumed on 3 December as planned, at Laayoune and Camp Smara in the Tindouf region. Preparations for identification work in Mauritania were somewhat behind schedule, and were expected to resume in late January 1998.

From 3 to 12 December, more than 3,000 persons were convoked and 2,386 identified. Both parties had supported Commission efforts in that process. The difficulties encountered were mostly of a technical nature and had arisen in part because of the late return of updated data by the parties and in part because of the sequence of convocation.

By year's end, the civilian police component of MINURSO was re-established, totalling 48 officers.

The Secretary-General reported that so far the effort made to ensure the successful resumption of the identification process and the renewed expression by both parties of their commitment to implement the settlement plan encouraged him to believe that MINURSO would be able to complete its tasks in accordance with the timetable. He cautioned, however, that for that to happen all elements of the timetable had to be strictly adhered to, including the provision of the necessary resources in full and on time, in particular the deployment of engineering and other resources to undertake operational demining and to prepare for the deployment of the Mission's military component.

By a 26 December letter [S/1997/1023], the Secretary-General reported his intention to appoint Charles F. Dunbar (United States) as his Special Representative for Western Sahara.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 10 December [meeting 69], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/75 without vote [agenda item 18]. The Assembly acted on the recommendation of its Fourth (Special Political and Decolonization) Committee [A/52/613].

Taking note with satisfaction of the agreements reached by the two parties during their private direct talks aimed at the implementation of the settlement plan, and stressing the importance it attaches to a full, fair and faithful implementation of the settlement plan and the agreements aimed at its implementation,

Taking note of Security Council resolution 1131(1997) of 29 September 1997,

Having examined the relevant chapter of the report of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

Having also examined the report of the Secretary-General,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General;
2. Takes note with satisfaction of the agreements reached between the Kingdom of Morocco and the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguia el-Hamra y de Río de Oro for the implementation of the settlement plan during their private direct talks under the auspices of Mr. James Baker III, the Personal Envoy of the Secretary-General, and urges the parties to implement those agreements fully and faithfully;

3. Urges the two parties to continue their cooperation with the Secretary-General and his Personal Envoy and to refrain from undertaking anything that would undermine the implementation of the settlement plan and the agreements reached for its implementation;

4. Commends the Secretary-General and his Personal Envoy for their efforts in reaching these agreements as well as the two parties for the cooperation they have shown, and urges them to continue this cooperation in order to facilitate the speedy implementation of the settlement plan;

5. Reaffirms the responsibility of the United Nations towards the people of Western Sahara, as provided for in the settlement plan;

6. Reiterates its support for further efforts of the Secretary-General for the organization and the supervision by the United Nations, in cooperation with the Organization of African Unity, of a referendum for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara, in conformity with Security Council resolutions 658(1990) and 690(1991), by which the Council approved the settlement plan for Western Sahara;

7. Takes note of Security Council resolution 1131(1997);

8. Requests the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples to continue to consider the situation in Western Sahara, bearing in mind the positive ongoing implementation of the settlement plan, and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session;

9. Invites the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session a report on the implementation of the present resolution.

UN Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara

The United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO) reported that the situation in Western Sahara remained stable in 1997 despite some minor incidents. The strength of its military component, reduced by 20 per cent in 1996, was 230 personnel for most of the year. Despite its reduced strength, the Mission increased slightly the number of its ground and air patrols. The civilian police component was reduced to nine in early 1997, and was phased out completely by mid-1997. However, in anticipation of renewed efforts to implement the settlement plan, it was re-established in December with 48 members.

Major-General Jorge Barroso de Moura (Portugal) completed his tour of duty as the Force Commander of MINURSO on 18 July. He was succeeded on 28 August by Brigadier-General Bernd S. Lubenik (Austria).

Financing of MINURSO

In February [A/51/763/Add.1] the Secretary-General reported on a proposed budget to maintain MINURSO from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998, in the amount of $29,107,800 gross ($27,308,400 net), a 9 per cent decrease from the previous year's budget. It would support MINURSO's current strength of 203 military observers, 27 military support personnel and 9 civilian police observers, and a civilian establishment of 167 personnel and 2 observers from OAU.

The Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions considered the report, issued its comments [A/51/847], and recommended that the Assembly appropriate $29,107,800 to maintain the Mission until 30 June 1998.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 13 June [meeting 101], the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/2 B without vote, on the recommendation of the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee [A/51/502/Add.1] [agenda item 126].

The General Assembly,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Recalling Security Council resolution 690(1991) of 29 April 1991, by which the Council established the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara, and the subsequent resolutions by which the Council extended the mandate of the Mission, the latest of which was resolution 1108(1997) of 22 May 1997,

Recalling also its resolution 45/266 of 17 May 1991 on the financing of the Mission, and its subsequent resolutions and decisions thereon, the latest of which was resolution 51/2 A of 17 October 1996,

Reaffirming that the costs of the Mission are expenses of the Organization to be borne by Member States in accordance with Article 17, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations,

Recalling its previous decisions regarding the fact that, in order to meet the expenditures caused by the Mission, a different procedure is required from that applied to meet expenditures of the regular budget of the United Nations,

Taking into account the fact that the economically more developed countries are in a position to make relatively larger contributions and that the economically less developed countries have a relatively limited capacity to contribute towards such an operation,

Bearing in mind the special responsibilities of the States permanent members of the Security Council, as indicated in General Assembly resolution 1874(S-IV) of 27 June 1963, in the financing of such operations,

Noting with appreciation that voluntary contributions have been made to the Mission,

Mindful of the fact that it is essential to provide the Mission with the necessary financial resources to enable it to fulfil its responsibilities under the relevant resolutions of the Security Council,

Concerned that the Secretary-General continues to face difficulties in meeting the obligations of the Mission on a current basis, including reimbursement to current and former troop-contributing States,

1. Takes note of the status of contributions to the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara as at 13 May 1997, including the contributions outstanding in the amount of 40,805,574 United States dollars, representing 16 per cent of the total assessed contributions from the inception of the Mission to the period ending 30 November 1996, notes that some 30 per cent of the Member States have paid their assessed contributions in full, and urges all other Member States concerned, in particular those in arrears, to ensure the payment of their outstanding assessed contributions;

2. Expresses concern about the financial situation with regard to peacekeeping activities, in particular as regards the reimbursement of troop contributors, which bear burdens owing to overdue payments by Member States of their assessments;

3. Expresses its appreciation to those Member States which have paid their assessed contributions in full;

4. Urges all other Member States to make every possible effort to ensure payment of their assessed contributions to the Mission in full and on time;

5. Endorses the observations and recommendations contained in the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to take all necessary action to ensure that the Mission is administered with a maximum of efficiency and economy;

7. Decides to appropriate to the Special Account for the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara the amount of 7,557,450 dollars gross (7,107,600 dollars net) for the maintenance of the Mission for the period from 1 July to 30 September 1997, inclusive of the amount of 280,500 dollars for the support account for peacekeeping operations, to be apportioned among Member States in accordance with the composition of groups set out in paragraphs 3 and 4 of General Assembly resolution 43/232 of 1 March 1989, as adjusted by the Assembly in its resolutions 44/192 B of 21 December 1989, 45/269 of 27 August 1991, 46/198 A of 20 December 1991, 47/218 A of 23 December 1992, 49/249 A of 20 July 1995, 49/249 B of 14 September 1995, 50/224 of 11 April 1996 and 51/218 A and B of 18 December 1996 and its decisions 48/472 A of 23 December 1993 and 50/451 B of 23 December 1995, and taking into account the scale of assessments for the year 1997, as set out in its resolution 49/19 B of 23 December 1994 and its decision 50/471 A of 23 December 1995, and for the year 1998;

8. Decides also that, in accordance with the provisions of its resolution 973(X) of 15 December 1955, there shall be set off against the apportionment among Member States, as provided for in paragraph 7 above, their respective share in the Tax Equalization Fund of the estimated staff assessment income of 449,850 dollars approved for the period from 1 July to 30 September 1997;

9. Decides further to appropriate the amount of 22,672,350 dollars gross (21,322,800 dollars net) for the maintenance of the Mission for the period from 1 October 1997 to 30 June 1998, inclusive of the amount of 841,500 dollars for the support account for peacekeeping operations, to be assessed on Member States at a monthly rate of 2,519,150 dollars gross (2,369,200 dollars net) in accordance with the scheme set out in the present resolution, subject to the decision of the Security Council to extend the mandate of the Mission beyond 30 September 1997;

10. Decides that, in accordance with the provisions of its resolution 973(X), there shall be set off against the apportionment among Member States, as provided for in paragraph 9 above, their respective share in the Tax Equalization Fund of the estimated staff assessment income of 1,349,550 dollars approved for the Mission for the period from 1 October 1997 to 30 June 1998;

11. Decides also that, for Member States that have fulfilled their financial obligations to the Mission for the period ending 30 November 1996, there shall be set off against the assessment for the period beyond 30 November 1996 their respective share in the unencumbered balance of 19,392,900 dollars gross (16,687,100 dollars net) in respect of the period ending 30 June 1996;

12. Decides further that, for Member States that have not fulfilled their financial obligations to the Mission, their share of the unencumbered balance of 19,392,900 dollars gross (16,687,100 dollars net) for the period ending 30 June 1996 shall be set off against their outstanding obligations;

13. Invites voluntary contributions to the Mission in cash and in the form of services and supplies acceptable to the Secretary-General, to be administered, as appropriate, in accordance with the procedure and practices established by the General Assembly;

14. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second session the item entitled "Financing of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara".

Revised budget

In September, the Secretary-General, in recommending the expansion of MINURSO, estimated the full cost of completing the identification process at $20.8 million [S/1997/742/Add.1].

In December, a revised budget for financing the Mission from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998 [A/52/730] was presented, amounting to $48,078,900 gross ($44,572,500 net).

On 22 December [meeting 79], the Assembly, on the recommendation of its Fifth Committee [A/52/746], decided that the Fifth Committee should continue its consideration of the financing of MINURSO at its resumed fifty-second session in 1998. The Assembly took that action in decision 52/456.

Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

In 1997, the Security Council upheld sanctions imposed on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya under resolution 748(1992) [YUN 1992, p. 55] and strengthened under resolution 883(1993) [YUN 1993, p. 101], despite the renewed efforts by a number of regional organizations, including the Organization of African Unity (OAU) and the League of Arab States (LAS), to have them lifted. The Security Council measures were intended to obtain, in particular, Libya's surrender for trial in the United Kingdom or the United States of two Libyan nationals suspected of involvement in the 1988 bombing of Pan Am flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland.

The sanctions covered air links with, provision of military supplies to, restrictions on diplomatic and consular personnel of, and restrictions on suspected terrorist nationals of Libya. The Security Council issued three statements during the year condemning Libya for repeated violations of the air flight restriction terms of resolution 748(1992).

The Secretary-General, at the invitation of the United Kingdom, dispatched two representatives to Scotland to study the Scottish judicial system in connection with the possibility of a trial of the two Lockerbie suspects. The representatives reported that the suspects would receive a fair trial under the Scottish judicial system.

With regard to the 1989 crash of Union de transports aériens (UTA) flight 772 in the Niger, Libya allowed an investigative visit by a French judicial team. The French judge in charge of the investigation reported that Libyan judicial cooperation satisfied most of the French demands.

The Sanctions Committee issued a report covering its activities during 1997.

Sanctions regime

Communications (January). By a 15 January letter [S/1997/35], the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya transmitted to the Security Council President the text of a resolution adopted at the twenty-fourth session of the Islamic Conference of Foreign Ministers (Jakarta, Indonesia, 9-13 December 1996). Concerned over the humanitarian and material damage inflicted on the Libyan people, the Conference, among other things, appealed to the Council to lift the sanctions and declared its support for the holding of a trial of the two Libyan suspects in the bombing of Pan Am flight 103 by Scottish judges in accordance with Scottish law at the seat of the International Court of Justice (ICJ) in The Hague, Netherlands, as proposed by LAS in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 129]. The Conference also supported Libya's right to reparations for material and human losses and damages sustained as a result of the sanctions.

By a 13 January letter [A/51/773-S/1997/43], Indonesia forwarded to the Secretary-General the text of the final communique of the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC) annual coordination meeting of the Ministers for Foreign Affairs (New York, 2 October 1996). The meeting expressed its appreciation for the readiness demonstrated by Libya to cooperate in efforts to combat terrorism and to settle the dispute with France, the United Kingdom and the United States peacefully through dialogue. It condemned the continuation of sanctions against Libya and called on the Security Council to lift them.

In a 17 January letter [S/1997/52] to the Security Council President, the Secretary of Libya's General People's Committee for Foreign Liaison and International Cooperation referred to a United States censure of Libya's refusal to allow the balloonist, Steve Fossett, to pass through Libyan airspace. Libya stated that, in view of the United States censure, it would allow Mr. Fossett's passage through its airspace and would also approve passage for all aircraft through its airspace and the landing of all aircraft at its airports. Libyan Arab Airways would also immediately resume its flights to all the world's countries.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (January)

On 29 January [meeting 3734], the Security Council President made the following statement on behalf of the Council [S/PRST/1997/2]:

The Security Council notes with concern the letter of 17 January 1997 from the Secretary of the General People's Committee for Foreign Liaison and International Cooperation of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya addressed to the President of the Security Council, announcing that Libyan Arab Airways would resume international flights out of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya immediately. The Council considers the position expressed in the letter of 17 January 1997 to be incompatible with Security Council resolution 748(1992). Resolution 748(1992) does not prohibit overflights of Libyan territory. Paragraph 4 (a) of the resolution does, however, prohibit all international flights to and from the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. The Security Council would consider any such flights to be a violation of the terms of resolution 748(1992).

The Council takes note of the reports that a Libyan-registered aircraft, in apparent violation of resolution 748(1992), flew from Tripoli, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, to Accra, Ghana, on 21 January 1997, where it landed and from where it later departed. The Council has requested the Committee established pursuant to resolution 748(1992) to follow up this matter. The Council draws the attention of Member States to their obligations under resolution 748(1992) in the event that Libyan-registered aircraft seek to land in their territory.

Communications (March/April). On 3 March [S/1997/176], Libya forwarded to the Security Council President the declaration of the sixty-fifth ordinary session of the OAU Council of Ministers (Tripoli, 24-28 February), concerning the dispute between Libya and France, the United Kingdom and the United States. The Ministers noted that Libya had met the requirements demanded in Council resolution 731(1992) [YUN 1992, p. 53] but had found it impossible to extradite its two nationals allegedly implicated in the 1988 bombing over Lockerbie. They expressed deep concern at the human and material deprivations to which the Libyan people had been subjected and emphasized that the sanctions were also having detrimental effects on Libya's neighbouring countries and African workers from other countries of the continent.

The Ministers called on the Security Council to accept one of three recommendations that had been adopted jointly by OAU and LAS: the holding of the trial of the two Libyan suspects in a third and neutral country to be determined by the Council; having the two suspects tried by Scottish judges at ICJ headquarters in The Hague, in accordance with Scottish law; or establishing a special criminal tribunal at ICJ headquarters to try the two suspects. The Ministers reiterated that the continued imposition of sanctions might lead African countries to devise other means of sparing the Libyan people further suffering. In that regard, they mandated the OAU Secretary-General to prepare a practical plan of action to be considered for implementation at the thirty-third ordinary session of the OAU Assembly of Heads of State and Government, to be held in June.

On 3 April [S/1997/273], Libya transmitted to the Security Council President a copy of a resolution, adopted by the LAS Council at its one hundred and seventh regular session on 31 March, entitled "Coercive measures and threats by the United States of America, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and France against the Great Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya". The Council urged those three countries to respond positively to regional and international efforts to devise a settlement to the crisis. It decided to coordinate action with OAU with a view to urging the Security Council to convene a special meeting to consider adopting one of the options listed by OAU in the declaration adopted in February (see above).

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (April)

On 4 April [meeting 3761], the Security Council President made the following statement on behalf of the Council [S/PRST/1997/18]:

On 29 March 1997, a Libyan-registered aircraft flew from Tripoli, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, to Jeddah, Saudi Arabia. The Security Council considers this clear violation of Council resolution 748(1992) of 31 March 1992 as totally unacceptable and calls on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to refrain from any further such violations. It recalls that arrangements have been made consistent with resolution 748(1992) in order to fly Libyan pilgrims to perform the Hajj. The Council will review the matter should further violations occur.

The Council has requested the Committee established pursuant to resolution 748(1992) to draw to the attention of Member States their obligations under resolution 748(1992) in the event that Libyan-registered aircraft land in their territory.

Communications (April/May). By a 7 April letter [S/1997/284] to the Council President, Libya expressed its concern and regret with regard to the Council's statement and noted that the flight to Saudi Arabia that took Libyan pilgrims to the Islamic Holy Places was purely a religious matter. The Council should not have given it a political dimension as it was not a tourist or commercial flight. In addition, due to the economic restrictions, Libya was unable to lease aircraft from other companies for the carriage of pilgrims, and was thus forced to use whatever means of aerial transport that were available to it.

On 16 May [S/1997/373], the Permanent Representative of Libya to the United Nations informed the Council President that an 8 to 10 May visit by Libyan head of State Colonel Muammar Qaddafi to the Niger and Nigeria had been undertaken for purely religious reasons. On 19 May [S/1997/378], the Permanent Representative stated that he had not received any official notification from his country as to the means of transport used by Colonel Qaddafi on that visit. The visit was undertaken in response to the invitation of the African Islamic leaders, who were part of the world peoples' Islamic leadership led by Colonel Qaddafi. Libya reaffirmed its readiness to solve the Lockerbie issue in accordance with the proposals made by it and by OAU, LAS or the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries. It also expressed the hope that the Council would send a commission of inquiry to Libya in order to establish the lack of any connection with terrorism.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (May)

On 20 May [meeting 3777], the Security Council President made a statement [S/PRST/1997/27] on behalf of the members. The Council's Sanctions Committee, established pursuant to resolution 748(1992) (see below), took due note of the contents of communications concerning Colonel Qaddafi's flight to the Niger and Nigeria addressed to its Chairman by Libya, the Niger and Nigeria.

The Security Council takes note with concern of reports that Libyan-registered aircraft flew from the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to the Niger on 8 May 1997 and returned to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya from Nigeria on 10 May in violation of resolution 748(1992). The Council has requested the Committee established pursuant to resolution 748(1992) to follow up this matter directly with the representatives of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the Niger and Nigeria. The Council calls upon all States to fulfil their obligations under resolution 748(1992) in the event that aircraft flights originating in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya seek to land in their territory.

The Council takes note of the letters from the Permanent Representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya dated 16 May 1997, and from the Permanent Representative of the Niger, dated 13 May 1997, and the note verbale from the Permanent Representative of Nigeria, dated 15 May 1997. The Security Council recalls that, in paragraph 4 of its resolution 748(1992), it decided that all States should deny permission to any aircraft to take off from, land in or overfly their territory if it was destined to land in or had taken off from the territory of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, unless the particular flight had been approved on grounds of significant humanitarian need by the Committee established pursuant to paragraph 9 of that resolution.

Further communications (May-December).

By a 27 May letter [S/1997/404] to the Secretary-General, Libya transmitted the seventh comprehensive report, covering the period from 15 April 1992 to 31 December 1996, on the damage caused by the implementation of Council resolutions 748(1992) [YUN 1992, p. 55] and 883(1993) [YUN 1993, p. 101]. The report described the adverse humanitarian and economic consequences of the sanctions, noting that they had caused all development programmes and plans for the expansion of infrastructure to be blocked and had thus thwarted the aspirations of the Libyan people to achieve further progress. The maintenance of the sanctions had caused some $23,590,379,992 in financial losses over the six years since they were first imposed, the report stated.

On 26 June [S/1997/497], OAU and LAS forwarded to the Security Council President a joint letter of 19 June from their Secretaries-General concerning their efforts to find a solution to the dispute between Libya and the United States and the United Kingdom. The two organizations had agreed to call on the Security Council to convene a special meeting in order to consider the proposals set forth in the February declaration of the OAU Council of Ministers (see above). Pending the adoption of one of the proposals, OAU and LAS urged the Council to exempt the following Libyan flights from the air embargo: flights for humanitarian purposes of medical treatment and the importation of medicines; special flights to send material assistance from Libya to African countries; flights for religious purposes; and flights related to participation in official missions.

In a 7 July letter [S/1997/518] to the Council President, Libya noted that, in accordance with paragraph 13 of its resolution 748(1992), the Council was reviewing the measures imposed against Libya under that resolution and under resolution 883(1993). That review, according to Libya, had become nothing more than an automatic extension of the sanctions without any reference being made to the specific measures taken by Libya to implement resolution 731(1992) [YUN 1992, p. 53].

Libya stated that it had proposed direct negotiations or negotiations through the United Nations; it had agreed to a fair and impartial trial of the two Libyan suspects at a location where they could be guaranteed a minimum standard of neutrality; it had cooperated with the United Kingdom in providing all the information it had about the Irish Republican Army; and it had cooperated fully with the French examining judge who had visited Tripoli in July 1996 to inquire about the attack on UTA flight 772 on 19 September 1989.

Libya noted that during all its contacts with the States members of the Council, it had been invited to solve the problem with the other parties, namely the United States and the United Kingdom. Those two countries, nevertheless, had repeatedly stated that the problem concerned only Libya and the Council, and they rejected the initiatives made by the Libyan side as well as the efforts of regional organizations to settle the outstanding issues. Libya stated that it had appointed two judges to investigate the two Libyan nationals who were considered suspects in the case of the Pan Am aircraft that crashed over Lockerbie in December 1988. However, the parties concerned refused to cooperate with those two judges. After a further refusal on the part of the United States and the United Kingdom to cooperate with Libya, the case was referred to ICJ, where it was still pending.

Libya requested that the Council name a place other than the United States and the United Kingdom where the two suspects might be tried; suspend the sanctions against Libya; and send a committee to Libya to discuss the text and implications of paragraph 2 of resolution 748(1992) and report thereon to the Council.

In an 8 July letter [S/1997/524] to the Council President, France, the United Kingdom and the United States stated that the 19 June letter from the Secretaries-General of OAU and LAS (see above) tried to misrepresent the question of Libya as a dispute between Libya and two countries, which was not the case. The sanctions imposed on Libya in Council resolutions 748(1992) and 883(1993) were a result of Libya's refusal to comply with obligations which had been required of it by the unanimous decision of the Council in resolution 731(1992). Therefore, the question that the Council continued to address was not a dispute between a few States, but the matter of Libya's continued defiance of a unanimous and binding decision of the Council.

The three States regretted that the Secretaries-General of OAU and LAS did not mention Libya's failure to comply with the Council resolutions relating to Libya nor did their repetitions of the proposals for the trial of the Lockerbie accused conform to the requirements of the relevant resolutions. The first objective of all Member States and regional organizations interested in seeing an end to the matter, the letter stated, should be to persuade the Government of Libya to fulfil its obligations so that sanctions could be lifted and the Council's authority upheld.

With regard to the proposals relating to humanitarian flights, resolution 748(1992) already contained provisions for the Libyans to apply to the Committee established pursuant to that resolution for special dispensation for such flights; that resolution did not limit humanitarian needs to medical evacuations. In addition, for the past three years the Committee had permitted flights for the Hajj, thus facilitating travel by Libyan citizens to undertake that act of religious devotion. The three States saw no reason why that practice should not continue.

On 9 July [S/1997/529], Zimbabwe submitted to the Security Council President a declaration on the dispute between Libya and the United States and the United Kingdom, adopted by the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of OAU at its thirty-third ordinary session (Harare, 2-4 June). The declaration stated that Libya had fully met the requirements demanded by the Council in resolution 731(1992). Libya had condemned terrorism in all its forms as well as those perpetrating or encouraging it. However, Libya had found it impossible to extradite its two nationals allegedly implicated in the bombing over Lockerbie in 1988.

OAU expressed concern over the human and material deprivations to which the Libyan people had been subjected and emphasized that the sanctions were also affecting neighbouring countries as well as African workers from other countries of the continent. It noted that Libya had accepted the LAS initiative supported by OAU, the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries and OIC, to the effect that the two Libyan suspects should be tried by Scottish judges and according to Scottish law at ICJ headquarters.

The declaration expressed the hope that the Council would consider and adopt one of the proposals set forth in the February declaration of the OAU Council of Ministers (see above). In addition, it endorsed the position expressed by the Council of Ministers to the effect that continued imposition of sanctions might lead African countries to devise other means of sparing the Libyan people further suffering.

In a 15 July letter [S/1997/549/Rev.1] to the Security Council President, Libya referred to a Council meeting of 10 July, which was devoted to the review of the sanctions imposed against it. Libya reiterated that it had responded fully to the demands made in the relevant Council resolutions and that it was the United States and the United Kingdom that were preventing a court from trying the two Libyans suspected in the Lockerbie case. Libya affirmed that it reserved the right to take the necessary steps to safeguard its political and legal rights, as well as to seek compensation for the damage suffered from the imposition of sanctions.

On 22 August [S/1997/665], Libya transmitted to the Security Council President the text of a press communique on the Lockerbie case, issued by the heads of State of Burkina Faso, Chad, Mali and the Niger following a five-Power summit Conference held in Libya from 15 to 17 August. The heads of State expressed their concern over the maintenance of the sanctions against Libya, which had adverse consequences for the economies of their countries. They called on the Secretary-General to send a special fact-finding mission to Libya to acquaint itself with the effects that the Council's embargo was having on the Libyan people.

In a 6 November letter [S/1997/856] to the Council President, the OAU Committee of Five established to mediate the dispute between Libya and the United Kingdom and the United States, composed of Cameroon, Ghana, Tunisia, Uganda and Zimbabwe, requested an open Council debate when the sanctions against Libya next came up for review and discussion.

Also on 6 November [S/1997/857], Libya stated that the sanctions against it had been imposed in violation of the UN Charter and in disregard of the 1971 Montreal Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation [YUN 1976, p. 739]. Libya noted that it had agreed that the two Libyan suspects should appear before a just and impartial court. It had also accepted the resolutions adopted in that connection by LAS, OAU, OIC and the Non-Aligned Movement. Recalling that it had dealt with the Council's resolutions in a constructive spirit by agreeing to various suggestions aimed at reaching a fair settlement of the dispute, Libya requested, among other things, that the sanctions be lifted, that the two suspects be tried in a neutral country and that a formal meeting of the Council be held under Article 31 of the Charter.

In a 12 November letter [S/1997/880] to the Council President, Libya expressed appreciation to those members of the Council who, during the 7 November review of the sanctions against Libya, had placed on record the positions adopted by their countries in support of rectitude and of the demands set forth in Libya's 6 November letter (see above). Libya stated that the sanctions should be lifted as they represented the "collective punishment" of an entire people on grounds of mere suspicion of two Libyan citizens, who had not been questioned, not brought to trial and not condemned in accordance with any judicial verdict.

Sanctions Committee

The Committee established pursuant to Security Council resolution 748(1992) concerning the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya (Sanctions Committee) issued a report on 31 December [S/1997/1030] covering its activities since the beginning of 1997. During the year, the Committee held seven meetings and handled over 100 incoming communications relating to the implementation of the sanctions, as well as a comparable number of replies.

The Committee approved 70 medical emergency evacuation flights in 1997, compared to 63 in 1996. On 19 March, it approved a request from Egypt for 45 flights on Egypt Air from Cairo to Tripoli and Benghazi and on to Jeddah, as well as return flights, for transporting Libyan pilgrims to perform the Hajj. As in previous years, the Committee approved the Egyptian request with certain conditions, including that none of the aircraft could be owned by, leased from or controlled by Libya or any Libyan entity.

On 3 February, the Committee considered action pursuant to the Security Council's 29 January statement [S/PRST/1997/2] in which the Council responded to Libya's announcement that Libyan Arab Airways would resume international flights out of Libya in violation of resolution 748(1992). The Council had also taken note of reports that a Libyan-registered aircraft had flown from Tripoli to Accra on 21 January. The Committee decided to address letters to the Permanent Representatives of Ghana and Libya to the United Nations, seeking further information on the incident.

At a meeting on 11 April, the Committee considered action pursuant to the Council's statement of 4 April [S/PRST/1997/18] in which a 29 March flight of a Libyan-registered aircraft from Tripoli to Jeddah was cited as a violation of resolution 748(1992). The Committee approved the text of a note verbale to be addressed to all Member States, drawing their attention to their obligations under resolution 748(1992) in the event of a Libyan-registered aircraft landing in their territory.

As a result of the informal consultations conducted on 13 May by the Security Council on the visit by the head of State of Libya to the Niger and Nigeria (see above), the Council requested the Committee to gather the facts and to report on the visit. The Committee met on 15 and 19 May and decided that the flights by the Libyan head of State were unauthorized and that they constituted a breach of the sanctions regime. The Committee also took note of communications addressed to its Chairman by Libya, Nigeria and the Niger. The Chairman briefed the Security Council on the Committee's decision on 20 May, whereupon the Council President made a statement concerning the incident [S/PRST/1997/27].

During the year, in accordance with resolution 748(1992), in which the Council decided to review Libya's compliance with the resolution, the Council undertook three reviews, on 14 March, 10 July and 7 November. On those three occasions, the members found that conditions did not exist for modifying the sanctions regime.

Compliance with sanctions

In a 17 January note verbale [S/1997/82] to the Secretary-General, the Netherlands said that it had implemented measures to give effect to the financial sanctions against Libya, as well as measures in the field of trade, non-financial services and air traffic.

By a 16 June note verbale [S/AC.28/1997/1] to the Chairman of the Sanctions Committee, Guinea said that it had fulfilled its obligations and commitments with regard to resolution 748(1992).

Latvia, in a note verbale of 11 August [S/1997/713], informed the Secretary-General that it had no diplomatic consular representation in Libya and vice versa. Latvia stated that it would deny permission to any aircraft to take off from, land in or overfly its territory if it was destined to land in or had taken off from Libya, unless the particular flight had been approved on grounds of humanitarian need.

Report on Scottish judicial system

By a 31 October letter [S/1997/845], the United Kingdom transmitted to the Security Council President the text of a message that it had delivered to the Secretary-General on 28 October inviting UN representatives to visit Scotland to discuss the arrangements for a trial of the two Lockerbie suspects. Similar messages had been passed to the Secretaries-General of OAU and LAS.

The United Kingdom said that there existed comprehensive safeguards under Scottish law to meet the concern that the trial of the two suspects should be demonstrably fair and free from prejudice. In order to brief the UN Secretariat on those safeguards and discuss how international observers might best be accommodated in the court proceedings, the United Kingdom invited the Secretary-General to send two representatives to Scotland. They would be able to visit Scottish prison and court facilities, have full access to the suspects before and during the trial, and witness all the court proceedings.

On 3 November [S/1997/844], Libya submitted to the Council President the text of a 31 October statement issued by the General People's Committee for External Communication and International Cooperation, which addressed the 28 October message from the United Kingdom. Libya did not doubt the honesty or fairness of the Scottish judicial system but it pointed out that there were practical difficulties involved in holding the trial in that country, such as the fact that the Libyan Criminal Code prohibited the extradition of Libyan citizens. In addition, Libya noted that biased publicity campaigns had given rise to a social and psychological climate detrimental to the holding of a fair trial in the United Kingdom or in the United States.

Libya said that the United Kingdom's offer to invite two UN representatives to Scotland to observe the Scottish judicial system was an attempt to dilute the serious initiatives that had been made by regional organizations and to destroy, trivialize or cripple all attempts to resolve the long-standing crisis. If the United Kingdom wished to dispel any doubts about the impartiality of a trial in Scotland, it needed only to accede to the suggestions of regional and international organizations concerning the holding of the trial in a neutral country.

On 18 December [S/1997/991], the Secretary-General transmitted to the Security Council President a report by Enoch Dumbutshena, former Chief Justice of Zimbabwe, and Henry G. Schermers of Leiden University in the Netherlands, whom he had requested to visit Scotland and study its judicial system. The two representatives, having reviewed the pre-trial procedure, detention, the trial proceedings, post-trial procedures, the United Kingdom's international obligations and other factors, concluded that the accused would receive a fair trial under the Scottish judicial system. Their rights during the pre-trial, trial and post-trial proceedings would be protected in accordance with international standards. The presence of UN and other international observers could be easily accommodated. A trial by jury would not prejudice the accused's right to a free trial. If, however, the accused could reasonably establish that their right to a free trial would be prejudiced by a jury trial, the representatives suggested that the idea of dispensing with the jury be pursued with the Government of the United Kingdom.

On 29 December [S/1997/1015], Libya transmitted to the Secretary-General a 25 December statement by the Lockerbie Suspects Defence Group, which comprised lawyers from countries such as Germany, Malta, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States, in response to the report of Dr. Dumbutshena and Professor Schermers. The statement averred that the issue was not the study of any judicial system, but rather to find a solution that would guarantee a fair trial. Towards that end, the Defence Group proposed that the trial should not take place in Libya, the United Kingdom or the United States, and that the jurors should be replaced by a group of judges, to be agreed upon, presided over by a Scottish judge. The Group welcomed the position taken by the families of the victims in Scotland and the United States, and their support for a suggestion that the trial should be held in The Hague by a group of judges, to be agreed upon, presided over by a Scottish judge. The judges would act as unbiased jurors.

French investigation of UTA DC-10 attack

By a 6 November letter [S/1997/858], France transmitted to the Secretary-General the text of a letter addressed to its Minister for Foreign Affairs by Judge Jean-Louis Bruguière concerning the judicial inquiry conducted on the attack on the Union de transports aériens DC-10 flight 772 in the Niger on 19 September 1989.

The judge said that he had ordered the transmittal of the file on the inquiry with a view to the committal for trial of six Libyan nationals indieted in the course of the procedure, who would have to be tried in absentia. The attack resulted in the death of 170 people. In the course of the judicial inquiry opened six days after the attack by the public prosecutor in Paris, lengthy investigations, conducted in particular in Africa, showed that Libyan nationals might have been involved in that terrorist act. Four international arrest warrants were subsequently issued for Libyan nationals.

In July 1996, after years of non-cooperation on the part of Libya, Libya allowed the French judge to travel to Tripoli and meet with competent judicial authorities. The Libyan judicial cooperation satisfied most of the French demands, although some of them had still not been met. The judge had issued two additional arrest warrants for Libyan nationals. He stated that the Libyan authorities would have to assume all the consequences that would result from a coercive judgement against their nationals.

1986 attack against Libya

The General Assembly on 18 December 1997 adopted decision 52/430, by which it deferred consideration of the agenda item "Declaration of the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity on the aerial and naval military attack against the Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya by the present United States Administration in April 1986" and included it in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third (1998) session.

Sudan

In 1997, the Sudan was involved in disputes with neighbouring countries, reporting to the Security Council alleged acts of aggression against its territory by Eritrea, Ethiopia and Uganda, and claiming those nations supported Sudanese opposition groups. Those three States denied involvement in any aggression against the Sudan, stressing their view that problems in southern Sudan stemmed from internal political issues.

On 21 April [A/52/510], the Sudanese Government and six rebel groups signed a document entitled "The Sudan Peace Agreement", which aimed to bring an end to the civil war that had killed an estimated 1.3 million persons since 1983 and had resulted in the displacement of approximately three times that number. However, the largest rebel faction was not a party to the negotiations on the Peace Agreement. That document, enacted into law via a constitutional decree in July [A/52/525], created a coordinating council to administer southern Sudan during a four-year interim period, after which there would be a referendum on self-determination.

The Extraordinary Summit of the Heads of State and Government of the Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD) (Nairobi, 8-9 July) reviewed developments in southern Sudan. In its 9 July communique [S/1997/535], participants (Djibouti, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Kenya, the Sudan, Uganda) expressed concern over the conflict in southern Sudan, and welcomed the acceptance by the Sudan of the Declaration of Principles as the basis for discussions and negotiations. They requested the Chairman of the IGAD peace initiative [YUN 1994, p. 837] to take the necessary measures for a speedy resumption of negotiations, and called on the parties to the conflict to create a conducive environment necessary for resumption of negotiations.

Despite the efforts to find peaceful solutions to the ongoing civil conflict in the Sudan, fighting among the warring parties intensified during the year, further destabilizing the lives of millions of Sudanese civilians (see PART TWO, Chapter III) and exacerbating the humanitarian crisis (see PART THREE, Chapters III and XII).

Sudan-Eritrea

The Sudan, in letters [S/1997/2, 11, 271, 342, 395] to the Security Council in 1997, alleged various military and terrorist actions against it by Eritrea, which it said wanted the destruction of the Government of the Sudan. Eritrea denied those allegations [S/1997/12, 31, 44, 309, 446].

On 4 July [S/1997/517], Eritrea reported to the Council an alleged plot by the Sudan to assassinate the President of Eritrea, Isaias Afwerki. The Sudan responded [S/1997/674] that those allegations had been fabricated in collaboration with Sudanese terrorist elements.

Eritrea, in August and October [S/1997/635, 781], alleged further aggression by the Sudan against Eritrea. On 8 September [S/1997/701], the Sudan responded that Eritrean troops had violated Sudanese territory in April, and denied attacks against Eritrea.

Sudan-Ethiopia

In January 1997, the Sudan alleged Ethiopian aggression against Sudanese territory [S/1997/32], and asked the Security Council to take action. Ethiopia denied the allegations [S/1997/37, 39], stating that the Sudan had acted to destabilize its neighbours, in the form of a call for a jihad against those States. Ethiopia noted that the Security Council had sought the Sudan's assistance in extraditing to Ethiopia three suspects wanted in connection with the assassination attempt against President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt in Adis Ababa on 26 June 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 412].

On 28 January [S/1997/83], the Sudan claimed that Ethiopian forces had taken hostage 3,000 to 4,000 civilians, mostly women and children. It called for international action, including an official investigation [A/52/73-S/1997/113].

Ethiopia, on 11 February [S/1997/120], charged that the Sudan was deporting Ethiopian refugees and it asked the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to resume the repatriation process of the remaining Ethiopian refugees in the Sudan.

Sudan-Uganda

On 13 March [S/1997/223], the Sudan told the Security Council that Uganda had violated the 1996 agreement on the normalization of relations between the two countries [YUN 1996, p. 133] by carrying out an armed attack against the Sudan on 9 March.

On 7 April [S/1997/287], Uganda forwarded a statement issued at the end of quadrilateral talks between Iran, Malawi, the Sudan and Uganda (Entebbe, Uganda, 13-15 March), at which the situation regarding the normalization of relations between the Sudan and Uganda had been reviewed and establishment of a verification team discussed. Uganda alleged that the Sudan had bombed Ugandan territory.

Other questions

Mozambique

In a report dated 25 February 1997 [A/51/807], it was proposed that special arrangements be made to deal with financial obligations to Governments that had provided contingents and/or logistic support for the United Nations Operation in Mozambique (ONUMOZ). ONUMOZ had been launched on 15 October 1992. Following the October 1994 elections and the establishment of a new Government on 16 December 1994 [YUN 1994, pp. 362 & 364], ONUMOZ was terminated on 31 January 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 367].

In a report of 14 November [A/52/680], the Secretary-General provided updated information on the disposition of assets of ONUMOZ. The Operation's inventory as at 30 April 1995 had been valued at $38.5 million.

On 15 September 1997, the General Assembly, by decision 51/485, decided to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second (1997) session the item on ONUMOZ.

In decision 52/456 of 22 December, the Assembly decided that the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee should continue to consider that agenda item during the resumed fifty-second session in 1998.

Mayotte

The question of the Comorian island of Mayotte—one of four islands in the Indian Ocean Comoro Archipelago—remained on the General Assembly's agenda in 1997. Although the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros acceded to independence from France in 1975, France continued to administer the island of Mayotte.

By decision 52/435 of 18 December 1997, the Assembly decided to defer consideration of the item on the question of the Comorian island of Mayotte and to include it in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third (1998) session.

Cooperation between OAU and the UN system

In response to General Assembly resolution 51/151 [YUN 1995, p. 416], the Secretary-General submitted a report [A/52/374] on cooperation between the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity (OAU).

The Secretary-General noted that since January 1997 he and the Secretary-General of OAU had discussed the need to build closer ties with a view to enhancing their mutual capacity for preventing and resolving conflicts. An important step in that connection was the appointment of Mohammed Sahnoun as joint United Nations/OAU Special Representative for the Great Lakes Region and the Congo (see above). In January 1997, they agreed to meet twice a year to discuss priority areas of cooperation and to coordinate their efforts.

The first such meeting between the two Secretaries-General and their advisers was held in Harare, Zimbabwe, on 3 June during the annual Assembly of Heads of State and Government of OAU. They met again in New York in October during the General Assembly.

The Secretary-General reviewed cooperation and the exchange of information between the two organizations in the field of peace and security, which involved cooperation by the Department of Political Affairs, the Department of Peacekeeping Operations and the Centre for Human Rights. He also reviewed cooperation in the area of economic and social development, which involved the Economic Commission for Africa, the United Nations Children's Fund, the United Nations Development Programme, the United Nations Environment Programme, the United Nations Population Fund, the United Nations International Drug Control Programme, the World Food Programme, the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, the World Health Organization, the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, the International Fund for Agricultural Development and the United Nations Industrial Development Organization. Cooperation in other areas involved the International Civil Aviation Organization, the Universal Postal Union, the World Meteorological Organization, the International Maritime Organization and the United Nations Office for Outer Space Affairs.

In a 25 September statement [S/PRST/1997/46] (see above, under "Conflict Prevention"), the Security Council welcomed the important contributions of OAU, including through its Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution, as well as those of subregional arrangements, in preventing and resolving conflicts in Africa. It looked forward to a stronger partnership.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 24 November [meeting 52], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/20 without vote [draft: A/52/L.8] [agenda item 42].

Cooperation between the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on cooperation between the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity,

Recalling the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter of the United Nations on regional arrangements or agencies, which set forth the basic principles governing their activities and establishing the legal framework for cooperation with the United Nations in the area of the maintenance of international peace and security, as well as resolution 49/57 of 9 December 1994, the annex to which contains the Declaration on the Enhancement of Cooperation between the United Nations and Regional Arrangements or Agencies in the Maintenance of International Peace and Security,

Recalling also the agreement of 15 November 1965 on cooperation between the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity as updated and signed on 9 October 1990 by the Secretaries-General of the two organizations,

Recalling further its resolutions on the enhancement of cooperation between the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity, in particular resolutions 43/12 of 25 October 1988, 43/27 of 18 November 1988, 44/17 of 1 November 1989, 45/13 of 7 November 1990, 46/20 of 26 November 1991, 47/148 of 18 December 1992, 48/25 of 29 November 1993, 49/64 of 15 December 1994, 50/158 of 21 December 1995 and 51/151 of 13 December 1996,

Recalling that, in its resolutions 46/20, 47/148 and 48/25, it, inter alia, urged the Secretary-General and the relevant agencies of the United Nations system to extend their support for the establishment of the African Economic Community,

Recalling also its resolution 48/214 of 23 December 1993 on the implementation of the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s,

Taking note of the resolutions, decisions and declarations adopted by the Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity at its sixty-sixth ordinary session, held at Harare from 28 to 31 May 1997, and by the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity at its thirty-third ordinary session, held at Harare from 2 to 4 June 1997,

Noting also the efforts of the Organization of African Unity, and the assistance of the United Nations, to promote the peaceful settlement of disputes and conflicts in Africa and the harmonious continuation of the process of democratization,

Deeply concerned that, despite the policies of reform being implemented by most African countries, their economic situation remains critical and African recovery and development continue to be severely hindered by the persistence of lower-level commodity prices, the heavy debt burden and the paucity of funding possibilities,

Aware of the efforts being made by the Organization of African Unity and its member States in the area of economic integration and of the need to accelerate the process of implementation of the African Economic Community,

Deeply concerned about the gravity of the situation of refugees and displaced persons in Africa and the urgent need for increased international assistance to help refugees and, subsequently, African countries of asylum.

Chapter III

Americas

In 1997, the United Nations continued to address situations of political, social and economic crisis in Latin America, Central America and the Caribbean.

Throughout Central America, there were efforts to enhance the goals of peace, democratization, reconciliation, development and justice; stability in democratically elected Governments, even in the face of internal difficulties; and the strengthening of democratic institutions and continued efforts to bring military and public security bodies under the control of civilian authorities.

In Guatemala, the United Nations undertook the new verification tasks entrusted to it in the peace accords signed in 1996 between the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca (URNG). The United Nations Mission for the Verification of Human Rights and of Compliance with the Commitments of the Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights in Guatemala (MINUGUA) had been mandated to verify human rights in accordance with a number of previously adopted human rights agreements.

In Haiti, the United Nations continued its cooperation with the Organization of American States (OAS) through the jointly fielded International Civilian Mission to Haiti (MICIVIH), established in 1993 to verify the observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms, provide institution-building, and support the development of a programme for the promotion and protection of human rights. In July, the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti (UNSMIH) was succeeded by the United Nations Transition Mission in Haiti (UNTMIH)—with a mandate limited to a single four-month period ending on 30 November 1997—to continue to provide assistance to Haiti in the professionalization of the Haitian National Police (HNP). Subsequently, UNTMIH was replaced by the United Nations Civilian Police Mission in Haiti (MIPONUH), with a one-year mandate ending on 30 November 1998 to continue to assist HNP.

In 1997, the General Assembly continued consideration of the United States economic embargo against Cuba. It concluded consideration of the Universal Congress on the Panama Canal, held in September in Panama City. In October, the Assembly approved observer status for the Andean Community.

Central America

As requested by the General Assembly in resolution 51/197 [YUN 1996, p. 155], the Secretary General in September updated [A/52/344] progress achieved in Central America in the areas of peace, freedom, democracy and development. The report concentrated on the five signatories to the Esquipulas II process [YUN 1987, p. 188] (Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua) and, in accordance with the new Central American agenda and the composition of Central American summit meetings, reference was also made to the situation in Panama and in Belize.

The Secretary-General noted the observance, on 7 August 1997 in Guatemala City, of the tenth anniversary of the signing of the Esquipulas II commitments, establishing the "Procedure for a Firm and Lasting Peace in Central America". The civil wars of the 1980s had become a thing of the past, following the signing of the 1996 Agreement on a Firm and Lasting Peace [YUN 1996, p. 168] by the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca (URNG), he stated.

Throughout the region, the Secretary-General said he had observed: efforts to enhance the goals of peace, democratization, reconciliation, development and justice; stability in democratically elected Governments, even in the face of internal difficulties; and the strengthening of democratic institutions and continued efforts to bring military and public security bodies under the control of civilian authorities. However, institutions in the region responsible for public security continued to be confronted by alarming levels of common criminality due to economic and social conditions, combined with difficulties in reintegrating former combatants and those displaced by conflict.

increase in coffee prices and new commitments from the international community in support of the peace processes. Although a 2 per cent rise in regional growth was expected during the year, it would still not allow for a sustained improvement in living standards. The consistently weak growth of non-traditional exports was an important indicator of the need to continue structural change efforts that would permit the diversification of production and markets for Central American products. The Secretary-General stated that the pursuit of policies necessary for macroeconomic stabilization, liberalization of the economy and modernization of the State had done little to alleviate widespread poverty or create employment.

In his review of regional cooperation and integration, the Secretary-General pointed out that further consolidation had taken place in the Alliance for the Sustainable Development of Central America (ALIDES), as called for in the 1994 Declaration of Guacimo, the documents of the 1994 Managua Environment Summit and the 1994 International Conference on Peace and Development [YUN 1994, p. 389]. At their nineteenth summit (Panama City, 10-13 July 1997), the Central American Presidents approved a reform of the System of Regional Integration, aimed at deepening Central American integration in any way that would facilitate the transition from an inter-governmental system to a community system. Other reform proposals called for streamlining the Central American Parliament, the Central American Court of Justice and the Secretariat of Central American Integration. At the twentieth regional summit (Managua, Nicaragua, 2 September), high-level representatives of the Governments of Belize, Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras and Panama signed the Nicaragua Declaration, initiating the process of building a Central American Union to further regional integration and better harness their common efforts to attain sustainable development and to meet the challenges of globalization. Positive developments were reported on the issue of territorial disputes. In April, Honduras and El Salvador signed a protocol which guaranteed the rights of property, nationality and land ownership to the inhabitants of the land pockets (bolsones) along their common border. Honduras and Nicaragua in July signed an agreement establishing a binational commission responsible for the creation of a "common interoceanic corridor", and were expected to proceed, according to Honduras, with the demarcation of their frontier in the Gulf of Fonseca.

In terms of extraregional cooperation, the Second United States-Central America Trade and Investment Forum (Guatemala City, 13 March) welcomed an initiative by the Central American Presidents known as the Regional Project of Competitiveness for Sustainable Development in which Central America could become the hemisphere's commercial axis, assuming the continuation of current regional coordination in the areas of telecommunications, energy, financial services, tourism and agro-industries. The Forum also supported the participation of the private sector in public sector decision-making and the strengthening of relations between private sectors in the United States and Central America.

A meeting of the Permanent Secretariat of the General Treaty on Central American Economic Integration and the Association of Caribbean States in February resulted in a cooperation agreement to identify and promote programmes to seize the commercial and investment potential of the region, as well as an agreement to integrate working groups to support commercial and investment initiatives. The Summit of Presidents of the United States, Central America and the Dominican Republic in May issued the San Jose Declaration, which dealt with corruption, drug trafficking, crime, migration, trade and negotiations on the establishment of a Free Trade Area of the Americas.

The Organization of American States (OAS) continued to contribute to the Central American process, having assumed a leading role on trade issues throughout the Americas. Political dialogue and economic cooperation with the European Union (EU) was enhanced at the San Jose XIII Ministerial Conference (The Hague, Netherlands, 25-26 February), at which EU affirmed its willingness to continue and increase its cooperation with Central America on strengthening the rule of law, and support social policies and the Central American integration process.

As for the United Nations, the Secretary-General reported that the Organization continued to support the countries of Central America in their efforts to consolidate peace, democracy and development. He discussed the UN presence in El Salvador and the peace process in Guatemala (for details, see below). UN assistance through operational activities covered peace and democratic governance, economic and social development and sustainable development of the environment.

The Secretary-General pointed out that Central America was finally without armed conflict for the first time in more than three decades, and noted that the region was in a favourable position to pursue economic growth, social justice and further democratization.

Communications. Guatemala transmitted to the Secretary-General an 8 September letter from its Minister for Foreign Affairs [A/52/394] informing of the creation of the Central American Union, which aimed to enable all Central American social sectors to take full advantage of the region's strategic geographical location, economic potential, ecological wealth and human resources within the new international order, and to confront the challenges of the next millennium.

In a 10 November letter [A/52/677] addressed to the Secretary-General, the Nicaraguan Minister for Foreign Affairs presented what he said were clarifications of some of the issues in the Secretary-General's report regarding the Gulf of Fonseca, namely, the delimitation of the frontier between Nicaragua and Honduras, Nicaragua's rights in the Gulf outside the zone delimited with Honduras, and shared fishing rights in the Gulf.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 76], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/176 without vote [draft: A/52/L.31 & Add.1] [agenda item 45].

The situation in Central America: procedures for the establishment of a firm and lasting peace and progress in fashioning a region of peace, freedom, democracy and development

The General Assembly,

Considering the relevant resolutions of the Security Council, particularly resolution 637(1989) of 27 July 1989, and its own resolutions, particularly resolution 43/24 of 15 November 1988, in which it requests the Secretary-General to continue his good offices and to afford the fullest possible support to the Central American Governments in their efforts to achieve the objectives of peace, reconciliation, democracy, development and justice established in the agreement on "Procedures for the establishment of a firm and lasting peace in Central America" of 7 August 1987,

Reaffirming its resolutions in which it recognizes and stresses the importance of international economic, financial and technical cooperation and assistance, both bilateral and multilateral, aimed at promoting economic and social development in the region with a view to furthering and supplementing the efforts of the Central American peoples and Governments to achieve peace and democratization, particularly resolution 50/58 B of 12 December 1995, concerning international assistance to and cooperation with the Alliance for the Sustainable Development of Central America,

Emphasizing the importance of the establishment of the Central American Integration System as the institutional framework having as its main objective to promote a comprehensive integration process, the adoption of the Alliance for the Sustainable Development of Central America, which constitutes the new integrated programme for national and regional development containing the commitments and priorities of the countries of the area for the promotion of political, economic, social, cultural and environmental progress, the establishment of the subsystem and of the regional social policy, the new model of democratic Central American security and the implementation of other agreements adopted at the presidential summit meetings, which taken together constitute the global frame of reference for maintaining and consolidating the peace process and the basis for a mutually advantageous redefinition of relations between Central America and the international community,

Welcoming the Agreement on a Firm and Lasting Peace signed by the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca on 29 December 1996, whereby all the agreements signed within the context of the peace process and under the auspices of the United Nations came into force, thereby putting an end to the last and most longstanding armed confrontation in the region,

Recognizing the progress made in the fulfilment of the commitments contained in the Guatemala Peace Agreements, implementation of which is being verified by the United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala, including those relating to the demobilization and reintegration of former combatants into civilian life, the treatment of returnees, the establishment of special commissions, the promotion and protection of human rights and progress with respect to constitutional reforms,

Recognizing with satisfaction the role played by the peacekeeping operations and observer and monitoring missions of the United Nations, which carried out successfully their mandate in Central America pursuant to the relevant resolutions of the Security Council and the General Assembly, respectively,

Welcoming the changes and progress made by the peoples of Central America, whose efforts have brought about, inter alia, constitutional reforms, the strengthening and demilitarization of civil society, the creation of new political forms, the holding of free and pluralistic elections, the creation of mechanisms for the protection and promotion of human rights, freedom of expression, the strengthening of democratic institutions and of the rule of law, the execution of judicial reform processes and the adoption of a fairer development model providing greater opportunities for the Central American peoples,

Emphasizing the importance of the end of a critical period in Central American history and the start of a new phase free from armed conflict, with freely elected Governments in each country and with profound political, economic, social and other changes which have created a climate conducive to the promotion of economic growth and further progress towards the consolidation and further development of democratic, just and equitable societies,

Reaffirming that the re-establishment of firm and lasting peace and democracy in Central America is a dynamic and ongoing process that faces serious structural challenges and whose continuation and consolidation are closely related to progress in human development, including the alleviation of extreme poverty, the promotion of economic and social justice, judicial reform, the safeguarding of human rights and fundamental freedoms, respect for minorities and the satisfaction of the basic needs of the most vulnerable groups among the people of the region, issues which have been a primary source of tension and conflict and which deserve to be discussed with the same urgency and dedication as was the case in the settlement of the armed conflicts,

Emphasizing the joint participation of the presidents of the Central American countries in the general debate at its fifty-second session, during which, in accordance with the commitments undertaken, they reaffirmed their decision and political will to continue doing their utmost to expedite, gradually and progressively, the Central American Union referred to in the Declaration of Nicaragua of 2 September 1997, as a higher expression of the common association called for in the Tegucigalpa Protocol of 12 December 1991,

1. Takes note with appreciation of the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Commends the efforts of the peoples and Governments of the Central American countries to re-establish peace and democracy throughout the region and promote sustainable development by implementing the commitments adopted at the summit meetings, and supports the decision of the presidents that Central America should become a region of peace, freedom, democracy and development;

3. Emphasizes the importance of the global frame of reference and the establishment of national and regional development priorities as the basis for promoting the effective, consistent and sustainable progress of the Central American peoples, and for providing international cooperation in accordance with the new circumstances in and outside the region;

4. Recognizes the need to continue to follow closely the situation in Central America in order to support national and regional efforts to overcome the underlying causes that have led to armed conflicts, avoid setbacks and consolidate peace and democratization in the area, and promote the objectives of the Alliance for the Sustainable Development of Central America;

5. Welcomes the signing of the Agreement on a Firm and Lasting Peace and the entry into force of the other agreements concluded during the peace process between the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca, as well as the progress achieved in implementing those agreements, and urges all sectors of Guatemalan society to combine efforts and work with courage and determination to consolidate peace in keeping with the spirit and letter of the Peace Agreements;

6. Requests the Secretary-General, the bodies and programmes of the United Nations system, and the international community to continue to support and verify in Guatemala the implementation of all the peace agreements signed under United Nations auspices, compliance with which is an essential condition for a firm and lasting peace in that country, and to provide their resolute support for the United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala in the fulfilment of its mandate;

7. Recognizes the importance of the Central American Integration System as the necessary legal and institutional body for coordinating and harmonizing efforts to achieve economic, social, cultural, environmental and political integration of the Central American countries in accordance with the goals and priorities established by the Governments of the isthmus in order to consolidate peace and democratization, and calls upon the international community, the United Nations system and other international governmental and non-governmental organizations to provide generous and effective cooperation with a view to improving the competence and efficiency of the Central American Integration System in the fulfilment of its mandate;

8. Encourages the Central American Governments to continue to carry out their historic responsibilities by fully implementing the commitments they have assumed under regional or national agreements, especially the commitments to implement the social programme to overcome poverty and unemployment, establish a more just and equitable society, improve public safety, consolidate a modern and transparent public administration and to eliminate corruption, impunity, acts of terrorism and drug and arms trafficking, all of which are necessary and urgent measures for establishing a firm and lasting peace in the region;

9. Reiterates its deep appreciation to the Secretary-General, his special representatives, the groups of friends for the peace processes in El Salvador (Colombia, Mexico, Spain, United States of America and Venezuela) and Guatemala (Colombia, Mexico, Norway, Spain, United States of America and Venezuela), the support group for Nicaragua (Canada, Mexico, Netherlands, Spain and Sweden), the political dialogue and cooperation with the European Union, and also to other cooperating countries and the international community in general for its support and solidarity in the building of peace, democracy and development in Central America;

10. Reaffirms the importance of international cooperation, in particular cooperation with the bodies, funds and programmes of the United Nations system, and the donor community in the new stage of consolidating peace and democracy in Central America, and urges them to continue to support Central American efforts to achieve those goals, bearing in mind the global framework of the new regional development strategy, which is in keeping with the collective aspirations and needs of the Central American peoples;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to lend his full support to the initiatives and activities of the Central American Governments, particularly their efforts to consolidate peace and democracy through the implementation of a new, comprehensive sustainable development programme and the initiative to establish the Central American Union, and to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session on the implementation of the present resolution;

12. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third session the item entitled "The situation in Central America: procedures for the establishment of a firm and lasting peace and progress in fashioning a region of peace, freedom, democracy and development".

Guatemala

In 1997, the Guatemalan peace process entered a new phase, centred on the implementation of the Agreement on a Firm and Lasting Peace [YUN 1996, p. 168] signed on 29 December 1996 in Guatemala City by the Government of Guatemala and URNG, ending 36 years of war. The Security Council in January welcomed the Agreement which, it said, put a definitive end to the internal Guatemalan conflict and would foster national reconciliation and economic development.

In a 5 February letter[A/51/796-S/1997/114], the Secretary-General transmitted to the General Assembly and the Security Council the texts of the 1996 Agreement on a Firm and Lasting Peace and the 1996 Agreement on the Implementation, Compliance and Verification Timetable for the Peace Agreements (the Timetable Agreement). Implementation of commitments entered into by the Government and URNG was to take place over a four-year period, from 1997 to 2000, and was divided into three phases.

MINUGUA

The United Nations undertook the new verification tasks entrusted to it under the peace agreements, following the extension, until 31 March 1997, of the United Nations Mission for the Verification of Human Rights and of Compliance with the Commitments of the Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights in Guatemala (MINUGUA). The General Assembly, by resolution 51/198 A [YUN 1996, p. 168], changed the mandate of the operation, which previously had verified only human rights in accordance with the 1994 Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights [YUN 1994, p. 407] and the human rights aspects of the 1995 Agreement on Identity and Rights of Indigenous Peoples [YUN 1995, p. 431]. The verification requirements arising from the Agreement on the Definitive Ceasefire of 4 December 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 168] included verification of the parties' compliance with the ceasefire, separation and concentration of the respective forces, and disarmament and demobilization of former URNG combatants. To assist in monitoring the Definitive Ceasefire Agreement, the Secretary-General had requested the deployment of 155 military observers and requisite medical personnel, to be attached to MINUGUA.

In order to reflect its new mandate, the Mission, which was to subsume the functions performed by the existing United Nations Mission for the Verification of Human Rights and of Compliance with the Commitments of the Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights in Guatemala, was to be called, as from 1 April 1997, the United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala, while retaining the acronym MINUGUA.

Report of Secretary-General. In response to General Assembly resolution 51/198 A [YUN 1996, p. 168], the Secretary-General in March submitted recommendations [A/51/828] on redesigning the structure and staffing of MINUGUA to fulfil its new responsibilities following the December 1996 signing of the Agreement on a Firm and Lasting Peace.

He outlined the steps taken to implement the peace accords and noted the setting up of a military observer group attached to MINUGUA (see below), the establishment on 5 February of the Commission to Follow up the Implementation of the Peace Agreements and steps to establish the Commission for Historical Clarification (see below, under "Human rights aspects"), which was inaugurated on 31 July 1997.

Regarding the restructuring, the Secretary-General noted that MINUGUA's mandate had been limited to verifying the 1994 Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights [YUN 1994, p. 407] and the human rights aspects of the 1995 Agreement on Identity and Rights of Indigenous Peoples [YUN 1995, p. 431]. In addition, the Mission carried out relevant institution-building activities.

The restructuring of MINUGUA to carry out broader verification tasks included identifying current Mission members with expertise in the new areas covered by the agreements; training staff to fulfil the new mandate; cooperation with UN agencies with relevant experience; working with United Nations Volunteers; and recruiting local staff. Staff were to operate in five separate verification areas: human rights, indigenous affairs, social, economic and agrarian matters, the strengthening of civilian power and role of the army in a democratic society, and resettlement and integration.

The Secretary-General added that MINUGUA's mandate should be renewed for a further period of one year, until 31 March 1998.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 27 March [meeting 94], the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/198 B without vote [draft: A/51/L.69 & Add.1] [agenda item 40].

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 45/15 of 20 November 1990, 46/109 A of 17 December 1991, 47/118 of 18 December 1992, 48/161 of 20 December 1993 and 48/267 of 19 September 1994, in which it decided to establish the Mission for the Verification of Human Rights and of Compliance with the Commitments of the Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights in Guatemala, and its resolutions 49/137 of 19 December 1994, 49/236 A of 31 March 1995, 49/236 B of 14 September 1995, 50/220 of 3 April 1996 and, in particular, 51/198 of 17 December 1996, in which it decided to authorize the renewal of the mandate of the Mission for a further period of three months, that is, until 31 March 1997, and requested the Secretary-General to submit recommendations on how the structure and staffing of the Mission should be redesigned to enable it to fulfil its new responsibilities after the signing at Guatemala City on 29 December 1996 by the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca of the Agreement on a Firm and Lasting Peace,

Recalling also the Framework Agreement for the Resumption of the Negotiating Process between the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca of 10 January 1994 and all subsequent agreements, in which the parties agreed to request the United Nations to carry out international verification of the peace accords,

Welcoming the agreements between the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca signed at Guatemala City on 29 December 1996, which, together with the overall package of peace accords signed previously at Madrid, Mexico City, Oslo and Stockholm, put a definitive end to the internal Guatemalan conflict and will foster national reconciliation and economic development,

Encouraged by progress made in the verification of the ceasefire, the separation of forces and the disarmament and demobilization of combatants of the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca by the group of military observers whose attachment to the Mission was authorized by the Security Council in its resolution 1094(1997) of 20 January 1997,

Encouraged also by the establishment of the Follow-up Commission, which will oversee implementation of the agreements, and by the preparatory work carried out with a view to the establishment of the historical clarification commission,

Taking into account the note by the Secretary-General transmitting the sixth report of the Director of the Mission,

Acknowledging the support given to the Mission by the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca,

Acknowledging also the efforts of the Secretary-General, the Group of Friends of the Guatemala peace process, the United Nations system and other international agencies throughout the process that culminated in the signing of the peace agreements,

Recalling the request of the parties that the United Nations verify all the agreements signed by them as reflected in the Framework Agreement and stressed in the Agreement on the Implementation, Compliance and Verification Timetable for the Peace Agreements,

Recalling also the letter of the Secretary-General to the President of the General Assembly and the President of the Security Council proposing that a new mission, to be called the United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala, subsume the functions currently performed by the United Nations Mission for the Verification of Human Rights and of Compliance with the Commitments of the Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights in Guatemala,

Having considered the recommendations of the Secretary-General regarding the restructuring of the Mission to enable it to fulfil its new responsibilities and the renewal of its mandate, as contained in his report on the Mission,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Mission for the Verification of Human Rights and of Compliance with the Commitments of the Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights in Guatemala;

2. Takes note with satisfaction of the sixth report of the Director of the Mission;

3. Commends the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca for their sustained efforts in search of peace, which culminated with the signing of the historic agreement of 29 December 1996;

4. Calls upon both parties to continue to implement fully the commitments they entered into in the Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights and those in the other agreements that have come into effect with the signing of the Agreement on a Firm and Lasting Peace;

5. Decides to authorize the renewal of the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Verification of Human Rights and of Compliance with the Commitments of the Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights in Guatemala, to be known henceforth as the United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala, for a further period of one year, that is, until 31 March 1998, to carry out international verification of the peace accords in accordance with the recommendations of the Secretary-General;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to develop appropriate means to identify resources for the Mission within the limits of the approved budget for the current biennium;

7. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit a report to the General Assembly with his recommendations on the structure and staffing of the Mission after 31 March 1998;

8. Invites the international community to intensify its support for peace-related activities in Guatemala, through voluntary contributions to the Trust Fund for the Guatemala peace process established by the Secretary-General and through other mechanisms provided for by the international donor community;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the General Assembly fully informed on the implementation of the present resolution.

Reports of Secretary-General and ACABQ. In response to the General Assembly's March request (resolution 51/198 B), the Secretary-General on 31 October presented recommendations [A/52/554] on the structure and staffing of MINUGUA at the termination of its mandate in March 1998. He stated that an assessment mission had visited Guatemala in September to ensure that the Mission could respond adequately to the demands of the verification process until the end of the year 2000.

Following the recommendations of the assessment mission, it was determined that minor adjustments would need to be made to the Mission's staffing and regional deployment during the 1998-1999 biennium to strengthen its capacity to coordinate its work, attract and retain highly qualified staff, ensure an adequate geographical coverage of the country, address the substantive areas of verification in compliance with its mandate, and ensure adequate liaison with other international institutions and bodies. The Secretary-General estimated the financial requirements, inclusive of support staff and operational costs for 21 months from 1 April 1998 to 31 December 1999, at $61 million. He recommended the renewal of MINUGUA's mandate beyond 31 March 1998 until 31 December 1999.

On 2 December [A/52/707], the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) made proposals to achieve significant economies and requested that a performance report be presented, by the end of 1998, to allow better monitoring of MINUGUA resources.

Military Observer Group

A Military Observer Group was deployed for a three-month period—from 3 March to 27 May 1997—to verify the Agreement on the Definitive Ceasefire.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (January)

On 20 January [meeting 3732], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1094(1997). The draft [S/1997/49] was prepared in consultations among Council members. Prior to adopting the text, the Council considered a 1996 report of the Secretary-General [YUN 1996, p. 168] and a January position paper [S/1997/53] submitted by China on the authorization of the deployment of UN military observers in Guatemala by the Council.

The Security Council,

Expressing its full support for the peace process in Guatemala,

Noting the fact that the peace process in Guatemala has been monitored by and under the auspices of the United Nations since 1994,

Noting the letter to the President of the Security Council dated 20 January 1997 from the Permanent Representative of China to the United Nations,

Recalling the Framework Agreement for the Resumption of the Negotiating Process between the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca of 10 January 1994 and all subsequent agreements, in which the parties agreed to request the United Nations to carry out international verification of the peace accords,

Acknowledging the efforts of the Secretary-General, the Group of Friends of the Guatemala Peace Process, the international community, the United Nations system and other international agencies in support of the peace process,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 26 November 1996 on the United Nations Mission for the Verification of Human Rights and of Compliance with the Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights in Guatemala, which states that verification measures related to the agreement on the definitive ceasefire signed at Oslo on 4 December 1996 would involve inter alia the deployment of United Nations military personnel,

Taking note also of the report of the Secretary-General of 17 December 1996 outlining the measures necessary for the verification of the agreement on the definitive ceasefire and the addenda to this report of 23 and 30 December 1996, and noting that the ceasefire will enter into force on the date the United Nations mechanism is in place with full operational capacity,

Welcoming the agreements between the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca which were signed at Guatemala City on 29 December 1996 and which, with the overall package of peace accords signed in Madrid, Mexico City, Oslo and Stockholm, put a definitive end to the Guatemalan internal conflict and will foster national reconciliation and economic development,

1. Decides, in accordance with the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General of 17 December 1996, to authorize for a three-month period the attachment to the United Nations Mission for the Verification of Human Rights and Compliance with the Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights in Guatemala of a group of 155 military observers and requisite medical personnel for the purposes of verification of the agreement on the definitive ceasefire, and requests the Secretary-General to notify the Council no later than two weeks before the operation is to begin;

2. Calls upon both parties to implement fully their commitments under the agreements signed in Guatemala City and to cooperate fully with the verification of the ceasefire, separation of forces, disarmament and demobilization of combatants of the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca, as well as commitments under the other agreements in the overall package of Peace Accords;

3. Invites the international community to continue its support for the peace process in Guatemala and, in particular, for the implementation of the agreements referred to in paragraph 2 above;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council fully informed on the implementation of the present resolution and to report on the conclusion of the military observer mission.

Brigadier-General José B. Rodríguez Rodríguez was named as Chief Military Observer of the Military Observer Group [S/1997/91]. Jean Arnault was appointed as Special Representative of the Secretary-General and Head of MINUGUA [A/51/794-S/1997/106].

On 11 February [S/1997/127], the Secretary-General proposed that military observers and medical personnel be provided by Argentina, Australia, Austria, Brazil, Canada, Ecuador, Germany, India, Norway, the Russian Federation, Singapore, Spain, Sweden, Ukraine, the United States, Uruguay and Venezuela. On 14 February, the Council agreed with his proposal [S/1997/128].

On 13 February, the Secretary-General informed the Council that the verification mission would begin on 3 March [S/1997/123].

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (March)

On 5 March, at a meeting of the Security Council [meeting 3744], its President made a statement [S/PRST/1997/9] on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council recalls its resolution 1094(1997) of 20 January 1997 and takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on its implementation.

The Council welcomes the deployment on 3 March 1997 of the group of United Nations military observers attached to the United Nations Mission for the Verification of Human Rights and of Compliance with the Commitments of the Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights in Guatemala for the purposes of verification of the agreement on the definitive ceasefire between the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca signed at Oslo on 4 December 1996.

The Council recalls its constant support for the peace process in Central America, which it has expressed since the adoption of its resolution 530(1983) of 19 May 1983. It reaffirms its full support for the peace process in Guatemala.

The Council reiterates its call in resolution 1094(1997) that both parties implement fully their commitments under the agreements signed in Guatemala City on 29 December 1996 and cooperate fully with the verification of the ceasefire, separation of forces, disarmament and demobilization of combatants of the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca, as well as the commitments under the other agreements in the overall package of Peace Accords.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter.

Mission conclusion

Report of Secretary-General. As requested by the Security Council in resolution 1094(1997), the Secretary-General in June reported [S/1997/432] on the conclusion of the military observer mission.

Of the 155 authorized personnel, 132 military observers were deployed to the mission area from Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Canada, Ecuador, Norway, the Russian Federation, Spain, Sweden, Ukraine, the United States, Uruguay and Venezuela. In addition, 13 medical personnel from Austria, Germany and Singapore had served in the Mission. The Secretary-General reported that on 21 February the Military Observer Group had been deployed to six verification centres (Finca Sacol, Finca Claudia, Finca Las Abejas, Tululché, Tzalbal, Mayalán) responsible for monitoring the eight URNG assembly points. Two sector headquarters and a main headquarters were set up to provide command and control.

The formal ceasefire entered into force on 3 March 1997, the date on which the Secretary-General had informed the Security Council that the operation could begin. Until then, the parties maintained the informal ceasefire that had been observed since 19 March 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 167]. The Secretary-General noted that the success achieved in the ceasefire process was due to the international community, which had provided its resources and experience to demobilize URNG combatants.

The Secretary-General described the separation of forces between the Guatemalan Army and URNG, which was carried out through the establishment of two concentric areas around each URNG assembly point. Regarding disarmament, he stated that, as former combatants concentrated at the assembly points, their weapons, munitions, explosives, mines and related military equipment had been registered and handed over to the UN military observers for storage in special containers and explosive dumps. In accordance with the 1996 Agreement on the Definitive Ceasefire, URNG members were allowed to retain their personal weapons until their final mobilization. Although demining was not foreseen in the Agreement, URNG helped to identify and clear all its minefields. However, the presence of unexploded ordnance, including grenades, bombs and mortar rounds, still posed a risk to the population in some areas.

The demobilization of URNG was carried out according to the phased approach established in the Agreement, with demobilization certificates issued to each former combatant upon leaving the assembly point. On 14 May, URNG weapons, munitions and equipment, as well as the lists of destroyed explosive devices, were delivered to the Ministry of the Interior of Guatemala; that act signalled the completion of the Military Observer Group's mandate. The Group's repatriation began on 17 May. A rear party remained until 27 May, when the last observers left Guatemala.

The Secretary-General commented that the exemplary manner in which the Agreement had been implemented was a testimony to the determination of the Government and URNG to end the bitter armed conflict.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

At a Security Council meeting on 22 May [meeting 3780], the President made a statement [S/PRST/1997/28] on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council welcomes the successful conclusion of the military observer mission attached to the United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala, in accordance with resolution 1094(1997) of 20 January 1997, to verify the agreement on the definitive ceasefire between the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca signed at Oslo on 4 December 1996. The Council commends the Secretary-General, his Special Representative, the Chief Military Observer and other dedicated personnel of the United Nations who have contributed to this undertaking. The Council further welcomes the full compliance of the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca with the terms of the definitive ceasefire.

The Council commends both parties for the progress made in the implementation of the Peace Accords to date, in particular for the establishment of the Follow-Up Commission, which will oversee the implementation of the agreements, and for steps taken towards the establishment of the Historical Clarification Commission. The Council reiterates its call for both parties to continue to implement fully their commitments under the agreements signed in Guatemala City on 29 December 1996 as well as the commitments under the other agreements in the overall package of Peace Accords signed in Madrid, Mexico City, Oslo and Stockholm.

The Council reaffirms its full support for the peace process in Guatemala. The Council expresses its confidence that the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, the United Nations Mission for the Verification of Human Rights and of Compliance with the Commitments of the Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights in Guatemala, and the international community will continue their support for the peace process in Guatemala and, in particular, for the implementation of the peace accords.

Financing of Military Observer Group

Reports of Secretary-General and ACABQ. In a 3 March report [A/51/815], the Secretary-General presented a proposed budget for the deployment and operation of the Military Observer Group of MINUGUA for the period from 15 February to 31 May 1997.

Revised estimates were later presented to ACABQ, which on 11 March reported [A/51/826] that for 142 military observers, 13 military medical personnel and 30 supporting civilian staff at six verification team sites, the General Assembly should approve $4 million gross ($3,956,300 net) for the period, inclusive of $3 million already authorized under the terms of Assembly resolution 49/233 A [YUN 1994, p. 1338]. ACABQ also accepted the Secretary-General's recommendation to establish a special account for the Military Observer Group.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 3 April [meeting 95], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee [A/51/844], adopted resolution 51/228 without vote [agenda item 165].

Financing of the Military Observer Group of the United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the financing of the Military Observer Group of the United Nations Mission for the Verification of Human Rights and of Compliance with the Commitments of the Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights in Guatemala and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Recalling Security Council resolution 1094(1997) of 20 January 1997, in which the Council authorized the attachment to the United Nations Mission for the Verification of Human Rights and of Compliance with the Commitments of the Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights in Guatemala of a group of one hundred and fifty-five military observers and requisite medical personnel for a period of three months,

Recognizing that the costs of the Observer Group are expenses of the Organization to be borne by Member States in accordance with Article 17, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations,

Recognizing also that, in order to meet the expenditures caused by the Observer Group, a different procedure is required from that applied to meet expenditures of the regular budget of the United Nations,

Taking into account the fact that the economically more developed countries are in a position to make relatively larger contributions and that the economically less developed countries have a relatively limited capacity to contribute towards such an operation,

Bearing in mind the special responsibilities of the States permanent members of the Security Council, as indicated in General Assembly resolution 1874(S-IV) of 27 June 1963, in the financing of such operations,

Mindful of the fact that it is essential to provide the Observer Group with the necessary financial resources to enable it to fulfil its responsibilities under the relevant resolutions of the Security Council,

1. Expresses concern about the financial situation with regard to peacekeeping activities, in particular as regards the reimbursement of troop contributors, which bear burdens owing to overdue payments by Member States of their assessments;

2. Urges all Member States to make every possible effort to ensure payment of their assessed contributions to the Military Observer Group of the United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala in full and on time;

3. Endorses the observations and recommendations contained in the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to take all necessary action to ensure that the Observer Group is administered with a maximum of efficiency and economy;

5. Also requests the Secretary-General to establish a special account for the Observer Group in accordance with paragraph 15 of his report;

6. Decides to appropriate the amount of 4 million United States dollars gross (3,956,300 dollars net) for the operation of the Observer Group for the period from 15 February to 31 May 1997, inclusive of the amount of 3 million dollars gross (2,949,300 dollars net) already authorized by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions under the terms of section IV of General Assembly resolution 49/233 A of 23 December 1994;

7. Decides also, as an ad hoc arrangement, to apportion the amount of 4 million dollars gross (3,956,300 dollars net) for the period from 15 February to 31 May 1997 among Member States in accordance with the composition of groups set out in paragraphs 3 and 4 of General Assembly resolution 43/232 of 1 March 1989, as adjusted by the Assembly in its resolutions 44/192 B of 21 December 1989, 45/269 of 27 August 1991, 46/198 A of 20 December 1991, 47/218 A of 23 December 1992, 49/249 A of 20 July 1995, 49/249 B of 14 September 1995, 50/224 of 11 April 1996 and 51/218 A and B of 18 December 1996 and its decisions 48/472 A of 23 December 1993 and 50/451 B of 23 December 1995, and taking into account the scale of assessments for the year 1997, as set out in its resolution 49/19 B of 23 December 1994 and its decision 50/471 A of 23 December 1995;

8. Decides further that, in accordance with the provisions of its resolution 973(X) of 15 December 1955, there shall be set off against the apportionment among Member States, as provided for in paragraph 7 above, their respective share in the Tax Equalization Fund of the estimated staff assessment income of 43,700 dollars approved for the Observer Group for the period from 15 February to 31 May 1997;

9. Invites voluntary contributions to the Observer Group in cash and in the form of services and supplies acceptable to the Secretary-General, to be administered, as appropriate, in accordance with the procedure established by the General Assembly in its resolutions 43/230 of 21 December 1988, 44/192 A of 21 December 1989 and 45/258 of 3 May 1991;

10. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second session the item entitled "Financing of the Military Observer Group of the United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala".

On 15 September [meeting 107], the Assembly, by decision 51/486, decided to conclude consideration of the item entitled "Financing of the Military Observer Group of the United Nations Mission for the Verification of Human Rights and of Compliance with the Commitments of the Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights in Guatemala", after being informed that an item entitled "Financing of the Military Observer Group of the United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala" had been included in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second (1997) session.

On 22 December [meeting 79], the Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/52/46], adopted decision 52/456, by which it decided that the Committee should continue to consider the item on the financing of the Military Observer Group at the resumed fifty-second session in 1998.

Verification of compliance

The Secretary-General in June [A/51/936] reported on the results of the Mission's verification of fulfilment of the commitments covered under the first phase (15 January-15 April 1997) of the Agreement on the Implementation, Compliance and Verification Timetable for the Peace Agreements (the Timetable Agreement). That Agreement did not include general and ongoing commitments, such as the general commitment to human rights and other commitments set forth in the 1994 Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights. The Secretary-General's report covered only verification aspects of the Comprehensive Agreement included in the Timetable Agreement.

The Secretary-General stated that in the Peace Agreements the parties had established a comprehensive, long-term agenda for Guatemala, which, as indicated in the preamble to the Timetable Agreement, was intended to overcome the causes of social, political, economic, ethnic and cultural conflict, as well as the consequences of the armed conflict. The Timetable Agreement identified basic criteria governing implementation of the agenda, including the need to: rationalize the human and material resources available in each phase; stagger implementation of fundamental components of the Agreements to avoid dissipating governmental and non-governmental efforts; emphasize the establishment of the consultation machinery provided for; establish the necessary institutional, legal or financial basis; and promote the participation of social sectors in meeting their needs and in establishing public policies concerning them.

To facilitate implementation of the Peace Agreements, the Timetable Agreement provided for the establishment of a Follow-up Commission, set up by Governmental Agreement 83-97 of 3 February. Both parties were equally represented in the body, which also included four citizens from different sectors of society, a Congressional representative and the Head of MINUGUA. It was reported that the Commission reviewed bills drafted by the Government to ensure their consistency with the Peace Agreements; used its good offices to overcome difficulties in the work of commissions established under the Agreements; rescheduled commitments when necessary; and, on 3 June 1997, submitted a progress report on the peace process.

The Secretary-General also described the work of subsidiary commissions and compliance with the commitments under the first phase of the timetable. Regarding the 1994 Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights, the Government complied with the commitment that compensation for and/or assistance to victims of human rights violations should be coordinated by the Peace Secretariat (SEPAZ), which had been designated as the State agency responsible for government policy for those matters. SEPAZ had proposed a compensation programme which the Mission felt was generally consistent with the Comprehensive Agreement. The Presidential Human Rights Commission (COPREDEH), charged with bringing together relevant non-governmental organizations (NGOs) to discuss the proposal, was to start work in June. The Mission believed that the consultation process under COPREDEH, combined with recommendations expected from the Clarification Commission, was the best way to respond to the needs of victims within the country's financial possibilities.

In reviewing compliance under the 1994 Agreement on Resettlement of the Population Groups Uprooted by the Armed Conflict (the Resettlement Agreement) [YUN 1994, p. 407], the Secretary-General noted: the Technical Commission for the Resettlement Agreement had drafted amendments to the Act on the Personal Documentation of the Population Uprooted by the Internal Armed Conflict to solve documentation problems of uprooted population groups and demobilized URNG members; government submission of a report on the availability of land for resettlement; the inception, on 26 March, of the mine-clearance programme; support to the fund to finance projects and programmes for the resettlement of uprooted population groups, established by the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP); revision of an education plan for the uprooted population; and expedition of operational aspects of the return process, including the beginning of operations in June of a government office in Comitán, Chiapas, Mexico.

Under the 1994 Agreement on the Establishment of the Commission to Clarify Past Human Rights Violations and Acts of Violence That Have Caused the Guatemalan Population to Suffer [YUN 1994, p. 407], the constitution of the Clarification Commission was completed on 22 February. The Mission stated that it intended to continue to support the Commissioners (see below, under "Human rights aspects").

As to the 1995 Agreement on Identity and Rights of Indigenous Peoples, compliance was evident in government agreements establishing the Commission for the Official Recognition of Indigenous Languages, the Commission on Holy Places and the Joint Commission on Education Reform. In addition, legislative proposals relating to indigenous peoples had been submitted to the Congress of Guatemala, including a bill on the treatment of ethnic discrimination as a crime, a definition of sexual harassment, and amendments to the Code of Penal Procedure concerning certain aspects of customary law.

Measures to comply with the 1996 Agreement on Social and Economic Aspects and the Agrarian Situation (the Agreement on Social and Economic Aspects) [YUN 1996, p. 165] were reflected in a government report on legislative reforms carried out in 1996 to enforce labour laws, which included ratification of International Labour Organization Convention No. 169 [YUN 1989, p. 917], dealing with indigenous and tribal peoples; approval of trade union statutes and membership; and the creation of eight labour and social welfare courts of first instance. The report stated that, in order to fulfil the commitment to penalize severely violations of labour laws, the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare's enforcement capacity, through its labour inspection services, must be strengthened, and the legislative agenda of the second phase of the timetable should include the legal or regulatory reforms required for that purpose. The Government submitted the National Civic Education Programme for Democracy and Peace, intended for schoolchildren.

A Ministry of Finance report on fiscal policy commitments contained in the Agreements emphasized that government fiscal policy was geared to meeting the target of increasing the tax burden by 50 per cent so that it reached 12 per cent of gross domestic product by 2000, as stipulated in the Peace Agreements. In March, the Government submitted a bill on the establishment of a Tax Administration Superintendency, fulfilling the commitment to strengthen institutional mechanisms for tax collection and auditing. Concerning the commitment to promote the convening of a women's forum, the Timetable Agreement's failure to stipulate convening procedures caused controversies that delayed its implementation. Through the good offices of the Follow-up Commission, a Coordinating Commission for the Women's Forum was established in May to decide on its agenda and organization.

The commitment to expand participation in the National Agricultural Development Council was reflected in the inclusion of a number of different sectors. The verification process showed that the functions and terms of reference of the Council were not adequately well known, the Secretary-General reported. Hence, there was a need for more publicity and for prompt issuance of the regulations governing admission. Although the Government reported on steps taken to establish and adapt political and institutional coordination mechanisms and to modernize the land registry system, land surveying in pilot areas had not yet started. The Government had worked towards the establishment of a Presidential Office for Legal Assistance and Dispute Settlement in Land Matters, including a survey of the types of disputes that existed and the appointment of members of the Board of Directors. In addition, a body had been created to coordinate government policies for compliance with the commitments relating to land. In April, the Government submitted a rural development public investment programme totalling 737.9 million quetzales for the year, exceeding the amount provided for in the Agreement on Social and Economic Aspects.

Concerning socio-economic aspects, URNG expressed concern at economic and social measures, the sale of State assets and the approval of legal provisions which might contradict the provisions of the Agreements. Several commitments corresponding to the Agreement on Social and Economic Aspects, scheduled for the second phase of the timetable, were already being implemented, among them, those relating to the establishment of the Land Trust Fund, the broad-based banking institution for rural credit and its land trust, the implementation of measures to reduce the cost of medicines and the incorporation of the priorities of the Peace Agreements into the guidelines for the preparation of the preliminary draft national budget.

In compliance with the 1996 Agreement on the Strengthening of Civilian Power and on the Role of the Armed Forces in a Democratic Society (the Agreement on the Strengthening of Civilian Power) [YUN 1996, p. 167], the Government established the Commission on the Strengthening of the Justice System. Although the Commission's composition was consistent with the provisions of the Agreement, it was considered that there was an imbalance in the representation of State institutions of the justice sector, as the Public Prosecutor's Office had only one representative, the judiciary was represented by four judges, and the Public Defender's Office was not represented. The Guatemalan Congress adopted the National Civil Police (PNC) Act, which was sent to the Follow-up Commission so that it could examine the draft regulations for consistency with the Peace Agreements. The PNC Act and regulations concerning the disciplinary regime were considered by a technical body set up by the Follow-up Commission and comprising government, URNG and MINUGUA representatives. Regarding proposed regulations governing training at the Policy Academy, it was necessary to clarify the Academy's role in selecting, training and evaluating future police personnel to guarantee the objectivity and impartiality of admission procedures. The Government took corrective measures related to concerns that police personnel involved in human rights violations were being admitted to retraining courses; the Secretary-General stressed the importance of the commitment to purify and professionalize the security forces. With regard to the commitment to demobilize the Voluntary Civil Defence Committees (CVDCs), the Congress repealed the decree creating them in late 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 167], and former CVDC members no longer had any organic relationship with the armed forces. As to the commitments included in the second phase of the timetable, the Working Group on the Civic Service Act decided to present its preliminary bill in August 1997.

The 1996 Agreement on Constitutional Reforms and the Electoral Regime [A/51/776-S/1997/51] contained a series of proposals for constitutional reform focusing on the recognition of the identity and rights of indigenous peoples, the Congress of Guatemala, the judiciary, PNC, the armed forces and the functions of the President of the country. The Follow-up Commission gave its opinion on the text of the Government's reform proposal and made recommendations aimed at ensuring its compatibility with the Agreement. The executive branch presented draft constitutional amendments to the Congress in May and commitments in that regard had been fulfilled. The Supreme Electoral Tribunal established the Electoral Reform Commission, which adopted an open-ended agenda of 15 items related to matters dealt with in the Agreement and invited interested organizations and individuals to submit proposals or request hearings by 15 May. As of that date, the Commission had received 22 proposals. In addition, it began consideration of the agenda items that had constitutional implications.

To comply with the 1996 Agreement on the Basis for the Legal Integration of the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca [A/51/776-S/1997/51], which outlined a comprehensive programme for the integration of URNG members into society, the Government set up the Special Integration Commission. The Commission was overseeing the implementation of an emergency plan which covered the period up to 3 August and met the needs of demobilized combatants in the areas of education, vocational guidance and training and other areas provided for in the Integration Agreement. URNG complied with the commitment to transmit to the verification authority lists of members subject to the demobilization process and not subject to one, whether resident in Guatemala or elsewhere. As required by the Agreement, the Mission continued to pay attention to the issue of government security for URNG members. In other action, URNG carried out an assessment of vocational guidance and training needs in camps for demobilized combatants; a plan was drawn up which included epidemiological monitoring, basic sanitation and medical care; information-gathering was carried out to locate the families of former combatants; and legal procedures were expedited to establish the Guillermo Toriello URNG Integration Foundation. The Mission and the Follow-up Commission shared the view that a solution needed to be found to the objection, by authorities of a cooperative, that the return of demobilized combatants to it was unfair to cooperative members.

Other commitments were noted in the government distribution of 20,000 copies of the Peace Agreements and the Mission's efforts to publicize and explain them.

The Secretary-General noted that there was a perception in some sectors that the Peace Agreements and their implementation involved a process whose benefits, particularly political benefits, would be felt only by the Government and URNG. Another concern was that unless the implementation of the Agreements had a tangible impact on the daily lives of the most needy sectors, it could cause disillusionment and arouse scepticism. To confront those difficulties, the Secretary-General stressed: promoting a better understanding of the prospects offered by the Agreements and fuller information about the implementation process; paying attention to the impact of compliance in rural areas and among traditionally neglected rural communities; and ensuring that implementation continued to create opportunities for broad sectors of the population to take on definite responsibilities to manage their own affairs and for the peace process as a whole.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 31 July [meeting 105], the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/198 C [draft: A/51/L.75 & Add.1] without vote [agenda item 40].

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 51/198 B of 27 March 1997, in which it extended the mandate of the United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala until 31 March 1998,

Welcoming the timely implementation of the Agreement on the Definitive Ceasefire,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General relating to verification of the peace accords,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala;
2. Takes note with satisfaction of the progress made so far in the implementation of the peace accords;
3. Commends the Government of Guatemala, the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca and the Guatemalan people, institutions and organizations for their participation in the implementation process;
4. Encourages the two parties and all sectors of Guatemalan society to join efforts for the implementation of all steps provided for in the second phase of the Agreement on the Implementation, Compliance and Verification Timetable for the Peace Agreements, until 31 December 1997;
5. Reiterates its full support for the comprehensive agenda of democratic, equitable and multicultural development included in the accords, and invites the international community to continue cooperating in the establishment of the most favourable conditions for its realization;
6. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the General Assembly fully informed about the implementation process in the light of the present resolution.

Report of Secretary-General. As requested by the Assembly, the Secretary-General issued a report [A/52/757] on the monitoring of commitments under the first phase (15 January-15 April 1997) of the timetable outlined by him in February [A/51/796-S/1997/114], and of commitments whose implementation was scheduled for the second phase, ending in December 1997. It also provided information on whether measures taken by the Government were consistent with general commitments in the Agreements for which there was no timetable.

The 1994 Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights contained two commitments subject to the implementation timetable, the first of which called for a programme of compensation for and/or assistance to victims of human rights violations. SEPAZ approached the relevant organizations for their input but received only two proposals. The second commitment was to improve the technical and material conditions of the Office of the Counsel for Human Rights. The Secretary-General said it was doubtful that the budget approved for 1998 was sufficient, despite being 10 per cent over that for 1997. Since MINUGUA's objectives included strengthening human rights institutions, it had started talks with the Counsel to identify areas where it might increase its cooperation with the Office.

In connection with the 1994 Resettlement Agreement, some 3,500 people had returned to Guatemala in 1997, fewer than in previous years, which was an indication that the return process, begun in 1992, was nearing completion. In addition, some 6,000 Guatemalan refugees in Mexico desired to return. In order to speed up that process, government and refugee representatives signed an agreement in September to complete the registration of applicants for an organized return by 29 December 1997. As to internally displaced persons, land was being purchased for their resettlement. However, while the funds available for land purchase were considered adequate, difficulties remained due to the absence of a reliable registry, the market's lack of transparency and, in some cases, a lack of flexibility in intersectoral negotiations. It was suggested that the commitment to conduct further studies on the availability of land be rescheduled or amended. Progress was made regarding commitments on personal documentation for the uprooted population. The new Act on the Personal Documentation of the Population Uprooted by the Internal Armed Conflict included facilities for the replacement of local identity cards, reversal of the burden of proof, the use of ordinary books for registration records and simplification of application procedures. The Technical Commission for the Implementation of the Resettlement Agreement (CTEAR), assisted by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, was implementing a documentation programme in 21 municipalities in return areas. CTEAR submitted to the Ministry of Education studies on the recognition of the educational qualifications of the uprooted population and educational outreach workers. Government and international cooperation agencies were carrying out projects on the productive integration of the uprooted population, which was closely linked to the implementation of a comprehensive rural development strategy.

Under the 1994 Agreement on the Establishment of a Commission to Clarify Past Human Rights Violations and Acts of Violence That Have Caused the Guatemalan Population to Suffer, the Clarification Commission on 1 September launched its maximum deployment phase, gathering testimony throughout the country through four regional and 10 local offices backed by mobile teams. It was cause for concern, the Secretary-General said, that while URNG had gradually cooperated in the investigations, replies had been slow and incomplete, access had been restricted and the documents provided were not key elements of military operations.

Implementation of the 1995 Agreement on Identity and Rights of Indigenous Peoples had had a very positive catalytic effect on indigenous participation and on Guatemalan society's willingness to reflect on its multicultural dimension.

There was a steadily growing indigenous presence in areas and forums of national life. State institutions showed a growing interest in meeting the real need for a multicultural, multilingual justice system by recruiting bilingual officials to the Public Defender's Office, the Public Prosecutor's Office and the judiciary. Court interpreters of indigenous languages were being trained for the Public Prosecutor's Office; existing research in the field of customary law was being evaluated; courses on the multi-ethnic, multicultural and multilingual character of Guatemala were included in the Police Academy curriculum; and the Office of the Counsel for Human Rights had initiated a process of consultations with indigenous organizations aimed at strengthening the Office in that area. The Joint Commission on Educational Reform had defined the key elements for designing the reform. The Commission for the Official Recognition of Indigenous Languages was evaluating proposals for the regional recognition of indigenous languages and the official recognition of a Maya national language. The Commission on Holy Places developed the categories for defining holy places and drafted a proposal on institutional methods of preserving and protecting them. The Joint Commission on Land Rights, installed on 10 July, was analysing agrarian legislation. The Joint Commission on Reform and Participation, established on 8 September, was discussing its rules of procedure. Steps had been taken to establish of the Office for the Defence of Indigenous Women's Rights, and efforts made to reserve radio frequencies for indigenous cultural projects.

Regarding the 1996 Agreement on Social and Economic Aspects, improvements were recorded in 1997 in Guatemala's economic and financial situation: domestic production of goods and services rose, inflation fell to single-digit levels and there was relative financial and exchange-rate stability. However, factors which reinforced a belief among vast segments of the population that the country's economic and social situation had deteriorated included: the precarious situation of thousands of families engaged in subsistence farming; the high rates of unemployment and under-employment; the erosion of the purchasing power of wages in 1997 as a result of overall price increases; the lag in adjusting nominal wages to past inflation; the adoption of measures that would affect consumption in 1998, such as fuel price increases; and the fact that there was no widespread improvement in basic public services, despite increases in public spending. There was an urgent need to implement a strategy aimed specifically at improving the distribution of the benefits of growth while preserving macroeconomic stability, as a prerequisite for ensuring the sustainability of the peace process.

Efforts towards State reform had yielded some positive results, including: the adoption of a new Budget Act which conformed to the general thrust of the Peace Agreements; adoption of a new act governing the executive branch; and the amendment of the Purchasing and Procurement Act. As to the commitment to provide adequate funding for the council system, the Mission welcomed the 22 per cent increase for the 1998 budget of the Solidarity Fund for Community Development which was implementing the council system. However, it viewed with concern the continuing low level of activity of the development council system, which was an essential instrument for ensuring truly participatory development.

There had been delays in establishing and implementing the national municipal training programme, which was crucial for the implementation of decentralization policies and for social participation, because of coordination problems between the Institute of Municipal Development and the National Association of Municipalities and because of a lack of domestic funding. Concerning the professionalization of public servants, a proposal for a new civil service act was considered at open forums, but had not been submitted to the Follow-up Commission. The Women's Forum, established in November, provided a national mechanism designed specifically for women, in which all linguistic and multi-sectoral departmental communities were represented.

With regard to fiscal policy, the Government made efforts to implement the commitments to increase social spending and taxation and had begun to implement fiscal reform aimed at increasing tax revenues and enhancing the efficiency of public spending. Efforts were made to expand the tax base and strengthen tax administration, and measures were taken to stiffen the penalties for tax evasion, avoidance and fraud. In the area of tax revision, the commercial and agricultural enterprise tax was introduced, taxes on fuel and non-domestic air travel were increased, and the Act on a Single Property Tax and the Act on the Alcoholic and Other Beverages Sales Tax were amended. Although the taxation target for 1997 was met, it was a matter for concern that the 1998 target was 9.7 per cent, lower than the 10 per cent provided for in the Peace Agreements; and fulfilment of spending commitments included in the Agreements was overly dependent on the revenues anticipated from new fiscal measures, meaning that failure to meet taxation targets would jeopardize fulfilment of those commitments. The approved fiscal package also did not promote restructuring of the tax burden towards a universally progressive tax system, as envisaged in the Agreements.

In the spending area, the Mission noted government allocation for social services representing some 50 per cent of the total budget for 1998. Agricultural and rural development activities were consistent with the goals laid down in the timetable. The rural development investment programme emphasized water and environmental sanitation, major and minor roads, electrification and production projects. Progress was reported on the establishment of the Land Trust Fund to provide funding for land and projects; the bill setting it up was scheduled to be presented to Congress in early 1998. The Presidential Office for Legal Assistance and Dispute Settlement in Land Matters had begun work in June and had received requests to deal with 134 land disputes. The Mission noted that the procedures needed to define compensation formulas in land disputes and claims had not been established, and it suggested that the Follow-up Commission reschedule that commitment. With regard to the land registry and land surveying, the proposal for the necessary legislative changes was under consideration. The Government had initiated coordination and negotiation with sources of bilateral and multilateral cooperation for the financing of the national land survey and for launching it in pilot areas during the first half of 1998.

During 1997, the Government carried out a major reorganization of the social ministries, adopting new work methods or ministerial structures in such areas as health and housing. The budget approved for the education sector and the support provided met the financial targets of the Agreements. It was recommended that programmes relating to out-of-school training in communities and enterprises in rural areas should be stepped up during the third phase of the timetable (in 1998). The situation with regard to worker organization in general remained precarious and might be considered a reason for the drop in the number of applications for recognition of trade union organizations.

The Government continued to implement the commitments in the 1996 Agreement on the Strengthening of Civilian Power relating to the judiciary, public security, and troop reduction and demobilization, but had not taken action on the Advisory Council on Security, State intelligence bodies, a new Arms and Munitions Act and a Civil Service Act, as well as the new territorial deployment of the armed forces. With regard to legal reforms, the process of drafting a law on a career judiciary was well advanced. The Commission on the Strengthening of the Justice System was working on its opinions on a career judiciary; the use of oral proceedings in all trials; the separation of administrative and jurisdictional functions in the system of justice; the distribution of financial resources; the content of a law on a judicial civil service; and corruption and intimidation in the justice system. The Act establishing the Public Defender's Office in Criminal Matters was adopted in December and was in line with the requirements of the Agreement. Efforts were under way to strengthen the Judicial Training School, but a lack of coordination and uniform criteria between the Training Unit of the Public Prosecutor's Office and the bodies responsible for supervision were undermining the objective of enhancing the professional qualifications of prosecutors.

Fulfilment of the commitments regarding public security was facing special difficulties. The Government had opted for a strategy combining rapid retraining of members of existing security forces with the training of new police. The Mission had submitted to the Government its evaluation of the retraining courses, in which it reiterated the need to improve selection procedures and the retraining courses. The fulfilment of the commitment to provide adequate wages to police was contributing to the improvements in PNC activity. A project to remedy the lack of physical facilities and weapons and adequate communication systems, funded by the EU in the amount of some $34 million, was to begin in early March 1998. Government deployment of graduates from the first basic course for newly recruited PNC personnel was to begin in early 1998. As for establishing and installing an Advisory Council on Security to help the Government implement an integral concept of security, the Follow-up Commission agreed to the Government's request that that take place during the first quarter of 1998. The package of measures relating to the State's intelligence capacities included the establishment of a Strategic Analysis Secretariat attached to the Office of the President and of a Civil Intelligence Department in the Ministry of the Interior, and the ratification of laws providing for parliamentary oversight of intelligence bodies, regulating the classification or declassification of information relating to national security and characterizing the crime of maintaining illegal files and records. Commitments relating to the armed forces that were fulfilled in 1997 included: a 33 per cent troop reduction; disbanding of the CVDCs and the Mobile Military Police; the redeployment of military units on the basis of external security needs; a reduction in the military budget; and the conversion of military facilities and units to civilian use.

With regard to the commitments relating to the performance of the legislative branch, the Technical and Legislative Support Committee of the Congress, set up as a multi-party forum for enhancing, modernizing and strengthening the legislative branch, drafted a comprehensive amendment to the Act on the Rules of Procedure of the Congress.

Regarding the 1996 Agreement on Constitutional Reforms and the Electoral Regime, the draft constitutional amendments put forward by the executive branch were being analysed in the Congressional Committee on Legislative Issues and Constitutional Reform. Institutions such as the Commission on the Strengthening of the Justice System, the Supreme Court of Justice, the Public Prosecutor's Office, the Bar Association, universities, political parties, indigenous organizations and various NGOs made proposals to the Commission.

As to the 1996 Agreement on the Basis for the Legal Integration of the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca, in the integration phase, scheduled to last until 3 May 1998, the Special Integration Commission approved programmes of training, incorporation into the labour force and into production, and health. Funding was also approved for education, vocational training, return of URNG members living abroad, health emergencies, visits to family members, a gender perspective and ways of publicizing the Agreement. In addition, the Commission approved and funded the stay in four temporary hostels of some 450 demobilized combatants who had nowhere to go. Some 87 per cent of demobilized combatants obtained their primary documentation. Elements fundamental to integration, such as land, housing and production projects, had recently begun to materialize for the hostel population. However, delays in the implementation of the integration programme had caused some difficult situations and discouragement among demobilized URNG members. That situation, coupled with the continuing uncertainty about the future financing of the integration programme, was cause for concern. On 30 August, URNG was transformed into a political party, and the process of registering the number of members required by the Electoral Act was under way.

In his observations on the overall fulfilment of the commitments, the Secretary-General noted that, despite the efforts made in 1997, important commitments would have to be rescheduled to the third phase of the timetable, in 1998, including the compensation programme for victims of human rights violations; the reform and strengthening of the system of development councils; the creation of an agrarian and environmental jurisdiction; the reform of intelligence bodies; the establishment of a career civil service; and the redeployment of the armed forces to meet the needs of national defence. The issue of taxation was particularly crucial for the third phase, as there were concerns that the measures envisaged for adoption would not make it possible to meet the target set in the Agreements. The lack of public safety and the persistence of economic and social difficulties continued to undermine popular support for the peace process, with no immediate solution to either problem. Efforts to meet the public's expectations should be redoubled, with attention focused on areas where the social debt was most pressing, promoting a better understanding of the prospects offered by the Agreements, and increasing the opportunities for participation at various levels, so that the public would identify more closely with the content of the Agreements.

Consolidating the peace process in 1998 would mean building on the changes already made and intensifying action by the public administration in support of the peace agenda. It would also mean drawing more fully on the State and social actors involved, the Secretary-General concluded.

Human rights aspects

By a 13 June letter [A/51/927], the Secretary-General informed the President of the General Assembly that the Commission to Clarify Past Human Rights Violations and Acts of Violence That Have Caused the Guatemalan Population to Suffer, known as the Commission for Historical Clarification, was preparing for its official inauguration. The Commission had been established in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 407] after an agreement between Guatemala and URNG.

The Secretary-General also transmitted a letter of 20 May from Commission members addressed to the international community in Guatemala, the Government and NGOs appealing for funds, together with a brief summary of the body's structure, budget and operating procedures. The Secretary-General called on Member States to respond generously to the appeal. They did so and the Commission was formally inaugurated on 31 July 1997.

By a 10 September note [A/52/330], the Secretary-General transmitted the seventh report on human rights, covering Mission activities from 1 January to 30 June 1997.

He said that MINUGUA had begun to verify compliance with all agreements included in the Agreement on a Firm and Lasting Peace, and had continued verification of the 1994 Comprehensive Agreement on Human Rights and of the human rights aspects of the 1995 Agreement on Indigenous Rights.

Concerning verification of the rights accorded priority under the Comprehensive Agreement, a steady drop had been recorded in the number of violations by public officials of the human rights that the Agreement considered of prime importance. The Mission's admission for verification of a total of 182 complaints concerning 1,503 alleged violations reflected a decline in the number of complaints admitted, as did the number of allegations to which they referred. The sharpest decline was found in violations of the right to life, to integrity and security of person and to individual liberty, which indicated, in the Mission's view, a decrease in the number of violations committed by State agents. Most of the complaints admitted concerned alleged violations of the right to due process, with 73 concerning 447 allegations and accounting for 40.1 per cent of the total. The Mission admitted 44 complaints (24.18 per cent) relating to the right to life, of which the largest number (23) referred to extrajudicial executions or deaths in violation of legal guarantees. The 508 alleged violations involving an excessive use of force were verified, with most taking place on 5 June in San Pedro Saquetepéquez, San Marcos, in an incident involving a large-scale police search of business premises for contraband, which had been marked by an excessive number of police officers involved, an abuse of authority and a lack of proportion between the aim of the operation and the degree of force used. An overall declining trend was evident in allegations of torture and violations of the right to individual liberty and of political rights. However, there continued to be violations of certain procedural guarantees when individuals were brought to trial, particularly of the right to be tried within a reasonable period of time. There were also numerous cases where the right to have a suitable interpreter had been affected because of the shortage of translators. The Mission continued the verification of due process in the proceedings of investigations of illegal burials. Although it had not received complaints about the violation of the right to freedom of movement and residence, it found that the exercise of those freedoms had been jeopardized in some cases relating to freedom of association or assembly. With regard to the right to freedom of expression, the Mission received complaints of acts of intimidation directed at reporters, which remained in the pre-verification stage.

Under the commitment to strengthen institutions for the protection of human rights, the verification process revealed the development of a stronger judiciary and Public Prosecutor's Office. A preliminary bill on a career judicial service was completed, the number of courts within and outside the capital had increased, and the Supreme Court had raised the salaries of judges and magistrates. The Public Defender's Office also grew stronger by instituting a competitive exam for the hiring of staff and establishing a pilot Unit for Minors. The Public Prosecutor's Office aimed to increase its efficiency in investigating crime and to enhance its presence in and proximity to the rural population and marginal areas. It approved the holding of a competitive exam for all currently employed prosecutors, but amended its regulations to enable any persons who had not taken the exam, or who had not passed it, to continue carrying out their functions, but without being part of the career service. In addition, the Office had not adopted a final decision regarding a system for monitoring the activities of prosecuting agents and assistants.

With regard to the Office of the Counsel for Human Rights, the Comprehensive Agreement committed the Government to continue supporting its strengthening. However, the Counsel's 1997 budget request was reduced and approved in an amount equal to its 1996 budget, a sum which the Mission believed was insufficient for the Counsel to carry out his mandate efficiently. MINUGUA continued to provide technical assistance to the Office of the Counsel.

Regarding the commitment against impunity, most unlawful acts committed still went unpunished by the law. Most violations were not the acts of URNG members or of the Army or people linked with the Army, but of officials of the National Police, the Public Prosecutor's Office and the judiciary. The Mission had carefully studied the National Reconciliation Act, which had been introduced by the Government and approved by the Congress, and was of the view that the Act was sufficiently restrictive to make it compatible with action to combat impunity and respect for the right of victims to the truth and compensation.

As to the commitment that there were no illegal security forces or clandestine structures, and the commitment to continue with the purification and professionalization of the security forces and regulation of the bearing of arms, the Mission had found cases where, as part of the campaign against organized crime, forces made up of members of the President's General Staff participated in anti-kidnapping operations which, apart from violating due process, might have been counter-productive in relation to the Government's fight against impunity. In addition, the illegal proliferation of firearms among private individuals continued to be a problem that affected the crime rate and weakened control over the possession and bearing of arms called for in the legislation in force.

Regarding the commitment to safeguard and protect individuals and entities working for the protection of human rights, the Mission admitted a small number of complaints about alleged violations committed against human rights activists.

The Mission noted that discriminatory situations persisted concerning the rights of indigenous peoples, particularly in connection with effective access to the justice system and the safeguarding of due process, as was manifest in violations concerning the right to have translators in court and respect for the world-view of the Maya culture as a guarantee of due process, taking into account ethnic, cultural and multilingual diversity.

The seventh report also contained statistical data describing the categories of human rights violations and the number of complaints admitted, as well as the number of violations alleged, verified and confirmed.

El Salvador

In a July report [A/51/917] on the current status of the implementation of the 1992 Peace Agreement [YUN 1992, p. 222] between the Government of El Salvador and the Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional (FMLN), the Secretary-General stated that the peace process had generated conditions that provided the basis for the gradual consolidation of democracy within the country.

By 1997, El Salvador had been largely demilitarized, the armed FMLN structure had disappeared and its combatants had been reintegrated into civilian life; the armed forces were reduced and respected the changes in their role as called for under the peace accords. The peace process had also allowed for democratic participation, with no national sector taking refuge in or supporting violence as a form of political action, the Secretary-General said.

Reconciliation, evident in the climate of healthy political rivalry among political leaders, would be on shaky ground if social policies to reduce poverty gradually were not implemented, the Secretary-General declared. The development of the National Counsel for the Defence of Human Rights, the consolidation of the National Civil Police (PNC) and the presence of an independent Supreme Court of Justice were major achievements.

The Secretary-General recommended constituting the democratic public security model established in the peace accords as El Salvador's national policy. In other recommendations, he urged that the National Public Security Council welcome initiatives, criticisms and proposals from civilians and their organizations; that the faithful application of the legal framework of PNC be encouraged; that closer coordination between the National Public Security Academy and PNC be promoted; that measures be adopted to allow PNC agents and officials to live among civilians; that recruitment policies provide the police with professional personnel; and that efforts continue to strengthen the capacity of PNC for investigation, especially of organized crime.

He further proposed that the National Counsel for the Defence of Human Rights continue to consolidate itself as a nationwide institution. As to the administration of justice, he advocated the vetting of corrupt or ineffective judges and officials, the expedition of processing criminal cases, and the introduction of special procedures against organized crime; approval of reforms for the decentralization of the functions of the Supreme Court of Justice; and ensuring that police actions were coordinated with those of others engaged in implementing criminal justice.

All involved in the implementation of the land transfer programme (PTT) should bring it to a close as swiftly as possible to provide security of tenure to all beneficiaries. The approval and implementation of electoral reforms was a fundamental requirement for the 1999 presidential elections, and legislation to provide compensation to victims of human rights violations and their families should be approved.

The Secretary-General concluded that the assessment of the peace process, as set out in his report, indicated that the implementation of the accords was at a sufficiently advanced stage for him to recommend the closure of the support unit for his envoy in El Salvador at the conclusion of its mandate on 30 June 1997. He proposed the appointment of two international Professionals and two local consultants as a unit under the administrative umbrella of UNDP for a six-month period to follow up on outstanding elements of the peace accords.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 31 July [meeting 105], the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/199 B [draft: A/51/L.76 & Add.1] without vote [agenda item 40].

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions on the situation in Central America and, in particular, resolution 51/199 A of 17 December 1996, by which it, inter alia, decided that the responsibilities of verification and good offices entrusted to the United Nations should be executed through periodic visits to El Salvador by a high-level envoy from Headquarters, who would keep the Secretary-General informed on a regular basis, and that the envoy would be assisted for a period of six months in the discharge of those responsibilities by a small support unit in El Salvador, working with the administrative support of the United Nations Development Programme,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General containing an assessment of the peace process in El Salvador,

Paying tribute to the efforts that have been made by the people of El Salvador to achieve the general objectives of the peace process established by the Government of El Salvador and the Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional as contained in the Geneva Agreement of 4 April 1990,

Paying tribute also to the contribution made by the various United Nations missions in El Salvador; the United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador, the Mission of the United Nations in El Salvador and the United Nations Office of Verification in El Salvador, as well as the support unit and the envoy of the Secretary-General to the implementation of the peace accords in El Salvador,

Welcoming the progress made in the past five years towards a society characterized by democracy, the rule of law and respect for human rights,

Acknowledging with gratitude the contributions of Member States that have made available personnel and voluntary funding to the support unit for the envoy of the Secretary-General in El Salvador and to technical assistance projects in support of the peace process,

1. Welcomes the continuing commitment of the Government and people of El Salvador to the consolidation of the peace process;

2. Urges all concerned to continue working together to complete the implementation of the peace process in El Salvador without delay;

3. Decides that, taking into account the recommendation contained in the report of the Secretary-General, the support unit for his envoy in El Salvador should be closed down as a separate entity, as it has concluded its mandate;

4. Welcomes the proposal of the Secretary-General to assign two international Professionals and two local consultants as a unit under the administrative structure of the United Nations Development Programme, for a period of six months, funded by the available balance under the Trust Fund for the Mission of the United Nations in El Salvador, to follow up on the outstanding elements of the peace accords, while the verification and good offices responsibilities of the Organization would continue to be carried out from Headquarters;

5. Emphasizes the importance of the continued co-operation of the various agencies, offices and programmes of the United Nations system active in El Salvador in the consolidation of the peace process;

6. Calls upon Member States and international institutions to maintain their political, technical and financial support to the efforts of the Government and people of El Salvador to promote peace, freedom, democracy and development in that country;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to keep it informed of further developments in the implementation of the peace process in El Salvador, as he deems appropriate.

In accordance with the Assembly's request in resolution 51/199 B, the Secretary-General, by a letter of 15 December [A/52/731], informed the Assembly of developments in implementing the peace accords during the period from 1 July to 10 December 1997.

The Secretary-General focused on the implementation of the outstanding elements of the peace accords in the socio-economic area, including PTT, the programme to transfer rural human settlements to their current occupants, the Fund for the Protection of the Wounded and War-Disabled, and the transfer of lands in excess of the constitutional limits of 245 hectares.

In PTT, a solution was found for one third of the 900 beneficiaries whose cases were outstanding on 1 July 1997. The Secretary-General urged that efforts be made to ensure that similar solutions were found for the remaining beneficiaries. Of greater concern was the rural human settlements programme, in which substantial advances had been made only in negotiations with the properties' owners. Implementation of other stages of the programme had been slow. The Secretary-General proposed that agreement be reached between the Lands Bank and the National Registry Centre to establish mechanisms aimed at facilitating the inscription of titles and purchase of properties. Concerning the Fund for the Protection of the Wounded and War-Disabled, the possibility of extending Fund benefits to all potential beneficiaries included in the 1993 census as family members of dead combatants remained obstructed by the shortcomings of legislative decree 1040. The Secretary-General noted the reluctance of the Salvadorian Institute for Agrarian Transformation to accept the findings of UN-sponsored investigations into properties alleged to exceed the 245 hectares limit and hoped that the political will necessary to address the issue would be forthcoming.

In consideration of the remaining aspects of the accords, the Secretary-General recommended maintaining the support unit (see above) for an additional six months in the reduced form of one international staff member and one local consultant and the continuation from Headquarters of the UN verification and good offices functions.

On 18 December [meeting 76], the General Assembly, by decision 52/436, took note of the Secretary-General's letter.

Financing of UN Observer Mission

On 15 September [meeting 107], the General Assembly adopted decision 51/482, which concluded its consideration of the financing of the United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador. The Mission, established by Security Council resolution 693(1991) [YUN 1991, p. 149] to monitor all agreements concluded between the Government of El Salvador and FMLN, was liquidated in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 427].

Haiti

In 1997, the United Nations continued to assist Haiti in establishing an environment in which security and basic freedom could prevail, building on the support it had provided since 1993 to restore democracy and accelerate economic recovery. United Nations assistance had facilitated presidential, legislative and local elections, the observance of human rights, and the training and monitoring of a national police force.

In 1997, the development of the Haitian National Police (HNP) into a professional force continued to be slow and uneven. The economy remained in the doldrums, a situation worsened by the resignation in June of Prime Minister Rosny Smarth, following considerable political turmoil and social unrest.

The three-year-old United Nations Mission in Haiti (UNMIH) had been succeeded in mid-1996 by the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti (UNSMIH), which had a mandate to advance the professionalization of HNP, national security, institution-building and economic reforms. UNSMIH was replaced by the UN Transition Mission in Haiti (UNTMIH) in August 1997, which was to continue to assist in raising standards for the national police.

On 28 November, the Security Council established the UN Civilian Police Mission in Haiti (MIPONUH), which was to cooperate closely with the joint UN/OAS International Civilian Mission in Haiti (MICIVIH), which had been established in 1993 largely to promote respect for human rights.

UN Mission in Haiti

Final disposition of assets

In March 1997, the Secretary-General reported [A/51/764/Add.1] on the final disposition of assets of the United Nations Mission in Haiti (UNMIH). Established in 1993 [YUN 1993, p. 349], that Mission was succeeded on 1 July 1996 by the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti (UNSMIH) [YUN 1996, p. 177]. The inventory value of UNMIH assets on 30 June 1996 was $32.3 million, 78 per cent of which was transferred to UNSMIH.

ACABQ in April [A/51/861], reported that it considered the Secretary-General's report inadequate and incomplete and that its objective should have been to indicate the final disposition of mission assets, classifying all assets approved for the Mission since its inception in the same categories and in the same detail as when they were budgeted and approved. It also believed that there had been a lack of expertise during the liquidation phase of the Mission and lack of clear and comprehensive instructions on the disposition of assets for mission personnel.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 13 June [meeting 101], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee [A/51/637/Add.1], adopted resolution 51/14 B without vote [agenda item 134].

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Mission in Haiti, the relevant reports of the Board of Auditors and the Office of Internal Oversight Services and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Recalling Security Council resolution 1048(1996) of 29 February 1996, in which the Council extended the mandate of the Mission for a final period of four months, to 30 June 1996, as well as all previous resolutions of the Council on the Mission,

Recalling also its decision 48/477 of 23 December 1993 on the financing of the Mission and its subsequent resolutions and decisions thereon, the latest of which was resolution 51/14 A of 4 November 1996,

Reaffirming that all necessary action should be taken to ensure that the Mission is administered with a maximum of efficiency and economy,

Reaffirming also that the costs of the Mission are expenses of the Organization to be borne by Member States in accordance with Article 17, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations,

Recalling its previous decisions regarding the fact that, in order to meet the expenditures caused by the Mission, a different procedure is required from that applied to meet expenditures of the regular budget of the United Nations,

Taking into account the fact that the economically more developed countries are in a position to make relatively larger contributions and that the economically less developed countries have a relatively limited capacity to contribute towards such an operation,

Bearing in mind the special responsibilities of the States permanent members of the Security Council, as indicated in General Assembly resolution 1874(S-IV) of 27 June 1963, in the financing of such operations,

Noting with appreciation that voluntary contributions have been made to the Mission by certain Governments,

Mindful of the fact that it is essential to provide the Mission with the necessary financial resources to enable it to meet its outstanding liabilities,

1. Takes note of the status of contributions to the United Nations Mission in Haiti as at 15 May 1997, including the contributions outstanding in the amount of 11 million United States dollars, representing 3 per cent of the total assessed contributions from the inception of the Mission to the period ending 31 July 1996, notes that some 73 per cent of the Member States have paid their assessed contributions in full, and urges all other Member States concerned, in particular those in arrears, to ensure the payment of their outstanding assessed contributions;

2. Expresses concern about the financial situation with regard to peacekeeping activities, in particular as regards the reimbursement of troop contributors, which bear burdens owing to overdue payments by Member States of their assessments;

3. Expresses its appreciation to those Member States which have paid their assessed contributions in full;

4. Urges all other Member States to make every possible effort to ensure payment of their assessed contributions to the Mission in full and on time;

5. Endorses the observations and recommendations contained in the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions;

6. Expresses its concern about problems with procurement practices and assets management in the Mission as pointed out in the reports of the Board of Auditors and the Office of Internal Oversight Services and in the report of the Advisory Committee, and requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session on the measures taken to address the problems raised in those reports;

7. Decides that, for Member States that have fulfilled their financial obligations to the Mission, their share of the unencumbered balance of 7,022,800 dollars gross (6,840,300 dollars net) for the period from 1 March to 30 June 1996 shall be credited to those Member States;

8. Decides also that, for Member States that have not fulfilled their financial obligations to the Mission, their share of the unencumbered balance of 7,022,800 dollars gross (6,840,300 dollars net) for the period from 1 March to 30 June 1996 shall be set off against their outstanding obligations;

9. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the final disposition of the assets of the Mission;

10. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second session the item entitled "Financing of the United Nations Mission in Haiti".

On 22 December [meeting 79], the Assembly, by decision 52/456, decided that the Fifth Committee should continue consideration of item 132 on the financing of UNMIH at the resumed fifty-second session in 1998.

UN Support Mission in Haiti

Report of Secretary-General (March). In accordance with Security Council resolution

1086(1996) [YUN 1996, p. 183], the Secretary-General in March [S/1997/244] reported on developments in Haiti, as well as on the activities of UNSMIH, including recommendations on reductions in the Mission and on the nature of a subsequent international presence.

UNSMIH, in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 177], had succeeded UNMIH [YUN 1993, p. 349]. The mandate of UNSMIH, extended by the Security Council in resolution 1086(1996) until 31 May 1997, was to assist in the professionalization of HNP; help maintain a secure and stable environment; and support the coordination of UN system activities to promote institution-building, national reconciliation and economic rehabilitation

The Secretary-General reported that since November 1996 violence and unrest had continued, fuelled by persistent high levels of unemployment, a rising cost of living, impatience at the slow pace of change, and attempts by certain sectors of society to profit politically from the growing frustration and discontent of the populace. Despite steady progress by HNP, common crime was on the rise, with increased levels of gang warfare and drug trafficking. In other areas, the reintegration of demobilized soldiers into civilian life remained difficult; the forced repatriation of undocumented Haitians from the Dominican Republic and the ongoing electoral process were also sources of tension. Preparations for legislative elections, scheduled for 6 April and 25 May, continued to lag, due to divisions within the ruling Lavalas movement (comprising the Lavalas Political Organization (OPL) headed by Prime Minister Rosny Smarth) and the Fanmi Lavalas, founded by former President Jean-Bertrand Aristide. Technical problems also threatened to mar the polling itself. A number of electoral councils had been questioned as to their composition and impartiality. Disaffection vis-a-vis the elections, compounded by inadequate public education, had led to fears that violence could increase before and after the polling days, as had happened in similar circumstances before, the Secretary-General stated.

In accordance with its mandate, UNSMIH had an authorized strength of 300 civilian police and 500 troops. In addition, the military element included another 800 personnel financed by voluntary contributions from the United States and Canada; that force was deployed only in the Haitian capital of Port-au-Prince, which it patrolled on a 24-hour basis. In addition, air and land patrols were conducted regularly throughout the country in support of the civilian police element and HNP and to deter acts of destabilization.

UNSMIH engineers had renovated five police stations, improved the Port-au-Prince airport and resurfaced roads. Civilian police continued to provide HNP with training in its day-to-day work, including community policing, and with technical advisory assistance at the central and departmental levels. The Secretary-General noted that, regrettably, many HNP agents had not taken full advantage of the instruction offered.

In January, UNSMIH civilian police and MICIVIH completed a second comprehensive study of Haiti's criminal justice system, which revealed that HNP had made significant progress over the past six months. Although problems continued to exist, advances were recorded in establishing a chain of command; there were departmental directors and every major police station was headed by a Commissaire. Salaries were being paid more regularly; basic equipment had been provided; radio links were in place between departmental headquarters and HNP headquarters in Port-au-Prince; and better cooperation had been established with the judiciary. Compliance with basic professional and ethical standards was monitored, with investigations into wrongdoing by HNP agents. Some municipal security forces had engaged in thuggery and disintegrated into warring factions; others continued to function. Elsewhere, private groups had assumed police functions outside the HNP chain of command.

Progress towards crafting a comprehensive plan to overhaul the justice system was slow; alleged crimes were not being investigated, nor were wrongdoers prosecuted in a professional manner.

On the positive side, the EU had provided funding for three years for a commission to lead the judicial reform process and a National Penal Unit had been created to deal with major human rights abuses. While prison guards had been trained, they were in short supply. Most prisons in the provinces remained inadequate. Access to medical care, water and sanitary facilities had improved.

Acceleration in Haiti's economic sector, expected in the first quarter of 1997, had not materialized, owing to the failure to launch infrastructural projects and the continuing reluctance of private investors. High unemployment, coupled with stagnant income and an inflation rate of 17 per cent, promoted disillusionment and discontent. Efforts continued towards the privatization or modernization of State-owned enterprises.

The Secretary-General recommended a long-term programme of support for Haiti by the international community; long-term technical support to reform the justice system; and extension of the UNSMIH mandate for a final time until 31 July 1997 to ensure the continued institutional development of HNP. Member States should contribute to the voluntary fund, established by the Secretary-General in accordance with Council resolution 975(1995) [YUN 1995, p. 442] to assist in the creation of an adequate police force. The fund—which financed a technical assistance programme to promote institution—building and to ensure continuity for UN efforts following the Mission's departure—was being transferred to the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP). The Secretary-General stated that, in view of current uncertainties in the country and in the light of consultations, it would be premature to present specific recommendations on the nature of a subsequent international presence in Haiti.

Financing of UNSMIH

In a March report [A/51/825], the Secretary-General estimated the UNSMIH budget until the end of its mandate and for its liquidation, from 1 July 1997 to 15 March 1998, at $14,530,000 gross ($13,917,400 net). ACABQ recommended that the General Assembly approve that amount [A/51/861].

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 13 June [meeting 101], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/51/638/Add.2], adopted resolution 51/15 B without vote [agenda item 157].

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti, the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions and the reports of the Board of Auditors and the Office of Internal Oversight Services,

Recalling Security Council resolution 1063(1996) of 28 June 1996, by which the Council established the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti, and the subsequent resolutions by which the Council extended the mandate of the Support Mission, the latest of which was resolution 1086(1996) of 5 December 1996,

Recalling also its resolution 51/15 A of 4 November 1996 and its decision 51/459 of 18 December 1996 on the financing of the Support Mission,

Reaffirming that the costs of the Support Mission are expenses of the Organization to be borne by Member States in accordance with Article 17, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations,

Recalling its previous decision regarding the fact that, in order to meet the expenditures caused by the Support Mission, a different procedure is required from that applied to meet expenditures of the regular budget of the United Nations,

Taking into account the fact that the economically more developed countries are in a position to make relatively larger contributions and that the economically less developed countries have a relatively limited capacity to contribute towards such an operation,

Bearing in mind the special responsibilities of the States permanent members of the Security Council, as indicated in General Assembly resolution 1874(S-IV) of 27 June 1963, in the financing of such operations,

Noting with appreciation that voluntary contributions have been made to the Support Mission by certain Governments,

Noting that the assessed contributions to the Special Account for the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti will cover only direct and indirect costs associated with the five hundred contingent personnel and the three hundred civilian police authorized by the Security Council in its resolution 1086(1996),

Mindful of the fact that it is essential to provide the Support Mission with the necessary financial resources to enable it to fulfil its responsibilities under the relevant resolutions of the Security Council,

1. Takes note of the status of contributions to the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti as at 15 May 1997, including the contributions outstanding in the amount of 19 million United States dollars, representing 39 per cent of the total assessed contributions from the inception of the Support Mission to the period ending 31 May 1997, notes that some 36 per cent of the Member States have paid their assessed contributions in full, and urges all other Member States concerned, in particular those in arrears, to ensure the payment of their outstanding assessed contributions;

2. Expresses concern about the financial situation with regard to peacekeeping activities, in particular as regards the reimbursement of troop contributors, which bear burdens owing to overdue payments by Member States of their assessments;

3. Expresses its appreciation to those Member States which have paid their assessed contributions in full;

4. Urges all other Member States to make every possible effort to ensure the payment of their assessed contributions to the Support Mission in full and on time;

5. Endorses the observations and recommendations contained in the reports of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, the Board of Auditors and the Office of Internal Oversight Services;

6. Approves, on an exceptional basis, the special arrangements for the Support Mission with regard to the application of article IV of the financial regulations of the United Nations, whereby appropriations required in respect of obligations owed to Governments providing contingents and/or logistic support to the Support Mission shall be retained beyond the period stipulated under financial regulations 4.3 and 4.4, as set out in the annex to the present resolution;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to take all necessary action to ensure that the Support Mission is administered with a maximum of efficiency and economy;

8. Decides to appropriate the amount of 15,091,000 dollars gross (14,478,400 dollars net) for the maintenance of the Support Mission for the period from 1 July 1997 to 15 March 1998, inclusive of the amount of 561,000 dollars for the support account for peacekeeping operations, to be apportioned among Member States in accordance with the composition of groups set out in paragraphs 3 and 4 of General Assembly resolution 43/232 of 1 March 1989, as adjusted by the Assembly in its resolutions 44/192 B of 21 December 1989, 45/269 of 27 August 1991, 46/198 A of 20 December 1991, 47/218 A of 23 December 1992, 49/249 A of 20

July 1995, 49/249 B of 14 September 1995, 50/224 of 11 April 1996 and 51/218 A and B of 18 December 1996 and its decisions 48/472 A of 23 December 1993 and 50/451 B of 23 December 1995, and taking into account the scale of assessments for the year 1997, as set out in its resolution 49/19 B of 23 December 1994 and its decision 50/471 A of 23 December 1995, and for the year 1998, subject to the decision of the Security Council to extend the mandate of the Support Mission beyond 31 May 1997;

9. Decides also that, in accordance with the provisions of its resolution 973(X) of 15 December 1955, there shall be set off against the apportionment among Member States, as provided for in paragraph 8 above, their respective share in the Tax Equalization Fund of the estimated staff assessment income of 612,600 dollars approved for the Support Mission for the period from 1 July 1997 to 15 March 1998;

10. Invites voluntary contributions to the Support Mission in cash and in the form of services and supplies acceptable to the Secretary-General, to be administered, as appropriate, in accordance with the procedure and practices established by the General Assembly;

ANNEX

Special arrangements with regard to the application of article IV of the financial regulations of the United Nations

1. At the end of the twelve-month period provided for in financial regulation 4.3, any unliquidated obligations of the financial period in question relating to goods supplied and services rendered by Governments for which claims have been received or which are covered by established reimbursement rates shall be transferred to accounts payable; such accounts payable shall remain recorded in the Special Account for the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti until payment is effected.

2. (a) Any other unliquidated obligations of the financial period in question owed to Governments for goods supplied and services rendered, as well as other obligations owed to Governments, for which required claims have not yet been received shall remain valid for an additional period of four years following the end of the twelve-month period provided for in regulation 4.3;

(b) Claims received during this four-year period shall be treated as provided for under paragraph 1 of the present annex, if appropriate;

(c) At the end of the additional four-year period, any unliquidated obligations shall be cancelled and the then remaining balance of any appropriations retained therefor shall be surrendered.

In October [A/52/512], the Secretary-General presented a revised budget for the maintenance of UNSMTH amounting to $4,653,400 gross ($4,433,800 net).

UN Transition Mission in Haiti

On 31 July, the Security Council decided to establish the United Nations Transition Mission in Haiti, to continue support for the professionalization of the Haitian National Police.

Report of Secretary-General (July). The Secretary-General on 19 July [S/1997/ 564] reported on the situation in Haiti, taking into account a visit, from 10 to 13 July, to the country by Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations Bernard Miyet; earlier discussions by the Secretary-General's Special Representative with the Government; and the views of the group of Friends of the Secretary-General for Haiti.

The Secretary-General stated that since March a number of developments had created additional uncertainties in Haiti. Fewer than 10 per cent of the electorate were believed to have cast ballots in the first round of legislative elections in April for seats in the Senate, the Chamber of Deputies and local assemblies. Furthermore, the Electoral Observer Mission of OAS, which monitored the process at the Government's request, had stated that the integrity of the elections had been tarnished due to irregularities, procedural shortcomings and controversies.

Of particular concern was the decision by the Provisional Electoral Council (CEP) not to include blank ballots in the counting of the absolute majority, as mandated by Haitian electoral law. That had resulted in outright victories for two Senate candidates from the Fanmi Lavalas, the political party of former President Jean-Bertrand Aristide. One, a former police adviser to President Aristide who had failed to be ratified in late 1995 by the Senate as Chief of Police, was declared elected in the south-east, with 50.13 per cent of the vote. That had caused a stand-off between the two main Lavalas political parties, and one subsequently refused to participate in the second round unless the results of the first round were re-examined and corrective measures taken. A third party had withdrawn just days prior to the second round. Despite unsuccessful attempts by the international community to help the parties find common ground, the balloting was postponed and not rescheduled. On 9 June, Prime Minister Rosny Smarth of OPL announced the resignation of his Government, stating that he had been hamstrung by tensions within the ruling coalition and lamenting certain developments surrounding the elections.

The Secretary-General said that in-fighting within the Lavalas movement had slowed government operations and hindered progress in the country's transition to democracy, as well as in economic reforms on which the release of foreign assistance was largely conditioned. The 1996-1997 budget was adopted on 6 May, more than seven months into the fiscal year, resulting in the loss of significant foreign aid.

The recent security situation had been characterized by continuing unrest, largely as a result of the country's economic situation and lack of improvement in living conditions, as well as factionalism within the ruling Lavalas movement. Frustrations over deteriorating living conditions posed greater demands on the police, which had nevertheless performed well. Wide access to weapons and new and more sophisticated forms of organized crime were also a challenge for HNP. Increasing illegal traffic, particularly in drugs and vehicles, was a growing concern, as was gang warfare.

Despite an agreement between Haiti and the Dominican Republic, forced repatriation of undocumented Haitians from the Dominican Republic continued, although at a slower pace than before.

The Secretary-General stated that the military element of UNSMIH continued to be deployed in Port-au-Prince, providing logistical and operational support for the first round of elections, and protection for the National Palace and the residence of former President Aristide.

UNSMIH civilian police were deployed in 10 detachments in the provinces, and five more in Port-au-Prince, and continued to accompany HNP officers in their day-to-day activities. Training continued in the areas of civic education, community policing, conflict resolution, marksmanship, human rights and police work, driving, immigration and narcotics.

A study by UNSMIH in May concluded that HNP had made significant advances, despite some serious shortcomings. Numerous vacancies remained at senior levels, and HNP's capacity to manage human and material resources was the weakest link in its institutional development, a situation worsened by scarcity of funds. Progress had been made in installing a telecommunications system, but little improvement took place in the areas of maintaining records or establishing a database of staff and equipment. There were a large number of allegations of breaches of proper police procedures, abuse of authority and human rights violations. There were some allegations of extrajudicial executions by HNP and 18 officers had been dismissed.

As Haiti's justice sector had not kept pace with developments in public security, both the police and the population at large were occasionally taking matters into their own hands, the Secretary-General reported. Support was provided by Canada, France and the United States to promote judicial reform.

Private investors remained cautious—increasing only in the service and residential construction sectors—even though the inflation rate had declined to 10 per cent and the exchange rate was stable. Unemployment and underemployment were estimated at some 70 per cent. Development cooperation efforts remained strong and, despite a slowdown in disbursements, there were substantial additional commitments by international financial institutions and by multilateral and bilateral donors.

The Secretary-General hoped for the success of the "Haiti 2012" initiative, sponsored by UNDP, by which some 30 development objectives to be attained in 15 years in the economic, social and institutional sectors were to be identified by 250 Haitian participants.

The Secretary-General recommended that the Security Council examine the issue of maintaining UN support of HNP for a four-month period after UNSMIH's departure. A new mission could be established, to be known as the United Nations Transition Mission in Haiti (UNTMH), to support the Haitian authorities in the further professionalization of HNP. Civilian police would number 250 and military staff 50. If UNTMIH were deployed, the termination of the peacekeeping mandate on 30 November 1997 would not mean the termination of UN involvement in Haiti. A follow-on presence to provide advice and active support in public security and judicial reform, as well as human rights monitoring, would still be required.

Haiti, in a 20 July letter [S/1997/568] to the Secretary-General, asked that the UNSMIH mandate be extended until the end of November.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 30 July [meeting 3806], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1123(1997). The draft [S/1997/589] was sponsored by Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, the Bahamas, Barbados, Canada, Chile, Costa Rica, Ecuador, France, Guatemala, Guyana, Jamaica, Nicaragua, Suriname, Trinidad and Tobago, the United States and Venezuela.

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions and those adopted by the General Assembly,

Taking note of the request of 13 November 1996 from the President of the Republic of Haiti to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, and the letter of 20 July 1997 from the Permanent Representative of Haiti to the United Nations to the Secretary-General,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 19 July 1997, and the recommendations contained therein,

Commending the role of the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti in assisting the Government of Haiti in the professionalization of the police and in the maintenance of a secure and stable environment conducive to the success of the current efforts to establish and train an effective national police force, and expressing its appreciation to all Member States which have contributed to the Mission,

Noting the termination, in accordance with resolution 1086(1996) of 5 December 1996, of the mandate of the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti as of 31 July 1997,

Supporting the role of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General in the coordination of activities by the United Nations system to promote institution-building, national reconciliation and economic rehabilitation in Haiti,

Noting the key role played to date by the United Nations civilian police, supported by United Nations military personnel, in helping to establish a fully functioning Haitian National Police Force of adequate size and structure as an integral element of the consolidation of democracy and the revitalization of Haiti's system of justice and, in this context, welcoming continued progress towards professionalizing the Haitian National Police,

Affirming the link between peace and development, noting that significant international assistance is indispensable for sustainable development in Haiti, and stressing that a sustained commitment by the international community and the international financial institutions to assist and support the economic, social and institutional development in Haiti is indispensable for long-term peace and security in the country,

Recognizing that the people of Haiti bear the ultimate responsibility for national reconciliation, the maintenance of a secure and stable environment, the administration of justice, and the reconstruction of their country,

1. Affirms the importance of a professional, self-sustaining, fully functioning national police force of adequate size and structure, able to conduct the full spectrum of police functions, to the consolidation of democracy and the revitalization of Haiti's system of justice;

2. Decides, further to paragraph 1 above, and at the request of the President of the Republic of Haiti, to establish the United Nations Transition Mission in Haiti, with a mandate limited to a single four-month period ending on 30 November 1997, in order to assist the Government of Haiti by supporting and contributing to the professionalization of the Haitian National Police, as set out in paragraphs 32 to 39 of the Secretary-General's report of 19 July 1997;

3. Also decides that the United Nations Transition Mission in Haiti will be composed of up to 250 civilian police and 50 military personnel to form the headquarters of a security element;

4. Further decides that the security element of the Transition Mission, under the authority of the Force Commander, will ensure the safety and freedom of movement of those United Nations personnel implementing the mandate set out in paragraph 2 above;

5. Further decides that the United Nations Transition Mission in Haiti will assume responsibility for all elements and assets of the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti remaining in Haiti to deploy as appropriate until they are withdrawn;

6. Requests all States to provide appropriate support for the actions undertaken by the United Nations and by Member States pursuant to this and other relevant resolutions in order to carry out the provisions of the mandate as set out in paragraph 2 above;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council on the implementation of this resolution no later than 30 September 1997;

8. Recognizes that economic rehabilitation and reconstruction constitute the major tasks facing the Haitian Government and people and that significant international assistance is indispensable for sustainable development in Haiti, and stresses the commitment of the international community to a long-term programme of support for Haiti;

9. Requests all States to make voluntary contributions to the trust fund established in resolution 975(1995) for the Haitian National Police, in particular for the recruitment and deployment of police advisers to assist the Inspector General, Directorate General and department headquarters of the Haitian National Police;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to include in his report, to be submitted no later than 30 September 1997, recommendations on the modalities of subsequent peace-building international assistance to Haiti;

11. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

On 1 August, the Security Council was informed [S/1997/619] that Brigadier-General J. J. Gagnon (Canada) was to be appointed Commander of the military element of UNTMIH, a move welcomed by the Council on 6 August [S/1997/620].

The Secretary-General also proposed on 1 August [S/1997/621] that the military component consist of personnel from Canada and Pakistan, and that Benin, Canada, France, India, Mali, Togo and the United States contribute to the police component. On 19 September [S/1997/735], the Secretary-General proposed that Argentina, the Niger, Senegal and Tunisia be added to the list of States contributing police personnel. The Council welcomed both proposals on 6 August [S/1997/622] and on 24 September [S/1997/736], respectively.

On 29 September, the Secretary-General's Special Representative, Enrique ter Horst (Venezuela), informed the Council that the Secretary-General would be unable to present by the next day recommendations on a peace-building presence following the end of the UNTMIH mandate on 30 November, as requested by the Council in resolution 1123(1997). On 30 September [S/1997/755], the Council President stated that the members agreed with the Secretary-General's intention to submit the report in late October.

Report of Secretary-General. On 31 October [S/1997/832], the Secretary-General reported on the political situation in Haiti since the 9 June resignation of Prime Minister Rosny Smarth. On 25 July, President René Préval nominated Eric Pierre, Haiti's representative at the Inter-American Development Bank, as Prime Minister. As no agreement could be reached on electoral and economic issues, Mr. Pierre's candidacy was rejected on procedural grounds on 26 August by the Chamber of Deputies. On 20 October, Mr. Smarth announced his decision to cease acting in a caretaker capacity and called on his Cabinet members to do the same. Thus, Haiti had not had a fully functioning Government for over four months, creating a fragile situation in the country, the Secretary-General stated.

The Secretary-General recalled allegations of fraud and other wrongdoing by electoral authorities and some political activists, which had marred the first part of the electoral process, including the exclusion of blank ballots in calculating the absolute majority of votes. As a result, three candidates for Parliament running under the banner of Lafanmi (La Famille) Lavalas, led by former President Jean-Bertrand Aristide, had won. On 5 August, the Chamber of Deputies ruled that blank ballots should be included. The OAS Electoral Observation Mission expressed the view that the counting procedures had violated the Electoral Law. Efforts by President Préval to promote dialogue among the political parties had not yielded concrete results.

Local government elections in July and August had been marred by voter indifference; poorly trained poll-watchers and poll-workers; and irregularities including ballot-stuffing. Elections for local assemblies and municipal and departmental assemblies would be a decisive element in the selection of both judges and a permanent electoral council. Concern was expressed regarding the validity of the whole process and the legitimacy of the institutions that would result from it. UN technical assistance to CEP was suspended until the credibility and transparency of the electoral process were restored.

As at 15 October, UNTMIH's civilian police numbered 242, and its security element comprised 50 headquarters staff and 1,125 soldiers, who were to ensure the safety and freedom of movement of UN personnel.

Haitian police in outlying areas lacked resources; rural station houses often lacked water, electricity and other basic amenities. The lack of an adequate police presence in some remote areas prompted the formation by citizens of vigilante brigades. Another concern was the development of private security agencies. Little progress was made to establish a database on equipment and personnel.

The Secretary-General called for efforts to strengthen HNP and the justice system, restore trust in future electoral processes, support economic and social development, and achieve a long-term strategy for sustainable development.

Financing of UNTMIH

In October [A/52/512], the Secretary-General estimated that UNTMIH would require from 1 August to 30 November 1997 $8,831,100 gross ($8,462,300 net), and $7,103,000 gross ($6,861,400 net) for its liquidation.

Civilian Police Mission

In November [S/1997/832/Add.1], the Secretary-General presented the mandate and concept of operations of a follow-on police mission, to be known as MIPONU. It would be composed of up to 290 police officers, including a 90-strong special police unit. Headquarters would be located in Port-au-Prince. The mission would oversee UNDP support for HNP and would cooperate closely with MICIVIH. Some 150 officers would be deployed in the nine départements; they would assist in training specialized units of the national police force. The mission would also continue to monitor HNP performance, guide agents in their day-to-day duties, and closely coordinate with technical advisers. Contributing countries were likely to be Argentina, Benin, Canada, France, India, Mali, the Niger, Senegal, Togo, Tunisia and the United States. The estimated cost for six months was some $14 million.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 28 November [meeting 3837], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1141(1997). The draft [S/1997/931] was sponsored by Argentina, Canada, Chile, Costa Rica, France, Portugal, the United States and Venezuela.

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions and those adopted by the General Assembly,

Taking note of the request of 29 October 1997 from the President of the Republic of Haiti to the Secretary-General of the United Nations,

Taking note also of the report of the Secretary-General of 31 October 1997 and the addendum to this report, and the recommendations contained therein,

Commending the role of the United Nations Transition Mission in Haiti in assisting the Government of Haiti by supporting and contributing to the professionalization of the Haitian national police, and expressing its appreciation to all Member States which have contributed to the Transition Mission,

Noting the termination in accordance with resolution 1123(1997) (of 30 July 1997) of the mandate of the Transition Mission as of 30 November 1997,

Commending further the role of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General in the coordination of activities by the United Nations system to promote institution-building, national reconciliation and economic rehabilitation in Haiti,

Noting the key role played to date by the United Nations Civilian Police, the International Civilian Mission in Haiti and United Nations Development Programme technical assistance in helping to establish a fully functioning Haitian national police force of adequate size and structure as an integral element of the consolidation of democracy and the revitalization of Haiti's system of justice and, in this context, welcoming continued progress towards professionalization of the Haitian national police and towards fulfilment of the May 1997 "Haitian national police development plan for 1997-2001",

Stressing the link between peace and development, noting that significant international assistance is indispensable for sustainable development in Haiti, and stressing that a sustained commitment by the international community and the international financial institutions to assist and support the economic, social and institutional development in Haiti is indispensable for long-term peace and security in the country,

Recognizing that the people and the Government of Haiti bear the ultimate responsibility for national reconciliation, the maintenance of a secure and stable environment, the administration of justice, and the reconstruction of their country,

1. Affirms the importance of a professional, self-sustaining, fully functioning national police of adequate size and structure, able to conduct the full spectrum of police functions, to the consolidation of democracy and the revitalization of Haiti's system of justice, and encourages Haiti to pursue its plans in these respects;

2. Decides further to paragraph 1 above, and at the request of the President of the Republic of Haiti, to establish, until 30 November 1998, a United Nations Civilian Police Mission in Haiti, composed of up to 300 civilian police, with a mandate limited to a single one-year period ending on 30 November 1998, in order to continue to assist the Government of Haiti by supporting and contributing to the professionalization of the Haitian national police in accordance with the arrangements, including mentoring Haitian national police field performance, set out in paragraphs 39 and 40 of the report of the Secretary-General of 31 October 1997 and paragraphs 2 to 12 of the addendum to that report;

3. Affirms that further international assistance to the Haitian national police, should it be needed, should be provided through United Nations specialized agencies and programmes, in particular the United Nations Development Programme, and through international and regional organizations and by interested Member States;

4. Affirms also that all special arrangements accorded to the United Nations Civilian Police Mission in Haiti will not constitute precedents for other operations of the same nature that include civilian police personnel;

5. Decides that the United Nations Civilian Police Mission in Haiti will assume responsibility for those personnel of the United Nations Transition Mission in Haiti and United Nations-owned assets required for its use in fulfilment of its mandate;

6. Requests all States to provide appropriate support for the actions undertaken by the United Nations and by Member States pursuant to this and other relevant resolutions in order to carry out the provisions of the mandate as set out in paragraph 2 above;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council on the implementation of this resolution every three months from the date of its adoption until the mandate of the United Nations Civilian Police Mission in Haiti expires on 30 November 1998;

8. Recognizes that economic rehabilitation and reconstruction constitute the major tasks facing the Haitian Government and people and that significant international assistance is indispensable for sustainable development in Haiti, and stresses the commitment of the international community to a long-term programme of support for Haiti;

9. Requests all States to make voluntary contributions to the trust fund established in resolution 975(1995) for the Haitian national police, in particular for the recruitment and deployment by the United Nations Development Programme of police advisers to assist the inspector general, directorate general and department headquarters of the Haitian national police;

10. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

On 16 December, the Secretary-General informed the Council that he had decided to appoint Julian Harston (United Kingdom) as his Special Representative to replace Enrique ter Horst, who had relinquished his functions on 30 November; his Representative was also Head of MIPONUH [S/1997/1006]. The Council agreed on 23 December [S/1997/1007].

Following customary consultations, the Secretary-General, on 24 December, proposed to the Council that MIPONUH be composed of police personnel from Argentina, Benin, Canada, France, India, Mali, the Niger, Senegal, Togo, Tunisia and the United States [S/1997/1021]. The Council, on 30 December, agreed to the proposed composition [S/1997/1022].

International Civilian Mission to Haiti

The joint UN/OAS International Civilian Mission in Haiti (MICIVIH) was established in 1993 [YUN 1993, p. 338] to verify full observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms, provide institution-building, and support the development of a programme for the promotion and protection of human rights.

Report of Secretary-General (June). The Secretary-General in June presented an overview of the human rights situation in Haiti, assessed the functioning of the police, the judiciary and prisons, and outlined the activities of MICIVIH [A/51/935].

Despite a deterioration in the political situation and demonstrations against the economic policies of the Government, individual rights and fundamental freedoms continued to be widely enjoyed. Investigations of allegations of human rights violations by State agents allowed the Mission to assess the human rights situation and intervene on behalf of victims. Information collected was used to formulate recommendations on institution-building and improve human rights programmes.

The Mission reported more than 20 fatal shootings by the police between January and May 1997, about half of which were human rights violations involving an excessive use of force. MICIVIH conveyed to the Haitian Senate its concerns over proposed legislation for issuing automatic/heavy weapons to special police units, with only limited control over their use. Local authorities increasingly bore arms or hired groups of armed security guards, and there were reports of beatings and other forms of ill-treatment by police. In April, the Mission proposed to the Minister of Justice improvements for the judicial processing of abuses involving police. Allegations of arbitrary arrest and detention were monitored. In collaboration with UNSMIH civilian police, the HNP Directorate and the Ministry of Justice, MICIVIH drafted a detention register for police stations to facilitate the uniform and systematic recording of information on arrests. In response to increased reports of ill-treatment by the police, seminars organized by UNSMIH and MICIVIH focused on the rights of detainees, the use of force and legal interrogation techniques. MICIVIH observers regularly visited prisons throughout the country to assess conditions and the treatment and legal situation of detainees. In June, by presidential decree, the national penitentiary administration was incorporated into HNP, as had been stipulated in the Constitution. A mechanism for complaints and disciplinary procedures to sanction abuses was to be established.

The Mission focused on structures to design and guide the judicial reform process, a reform strategy, confidence-building measures and harmonization of the pace of development of the police, judiciary and prisons. Public debate on judicial reform was sought through public presentations on different strategies. A major concern of the Government was prolonged pre-trial detention. MICIVIH observers sometimes acted as intermediaries when differences arose within the judiciary, or between judicial and other officials. The Ministry of Justice was developing a legal aid programme to assist ordinary citizens.

Impunity, compensation and rehabilitation of victims of past human rights abuses remained major issues. Little progress was made by the special unit formed within HNP to carry out inquiries into past and current high-profile cases. MICIVIH provided extensive support to organizations working for the rehabilitation of victims.

During the year, MICIVIH was involved in more than 150 civic education and human rights seminars which reached some 6,000 Haitians. A civic education programme for elected officials and local leaders was to be launched in July, to help them develop a sense of responsibility towards the citizenry, as a foundation of a state of law. An urban violence reduction project was planned. Women's rights were emphasized through community seminars held with grass-roots organizations. A collection of published reports, civic education fliers, posters and videos produced by MICIVIH, as well as reports of the Secretary-General on the situation of democracy and human rights in Haiti, were presented to the Bibliothèque Nationale d'Haïti.

MICIVIH observers were seconded to the OAS Election Observation Mission to monitor senatorial and local elections on 6 April. Observers also investigated or monitored protests and other incidents, some of them violent, which were related to disputes regarding the composition of electoral offices and first-round election results.

The Mission maintained regular contacts with the Special Expert on Human Rights for Haiti and collaborated with the representative of the UN Centre for Human Rights.

The Secretary-General recommended that the General Assembly authorize a five-month extension of the mandate of the UN component of the Mission at the expiration of its current mandate on 31 July 1997, to support judicial reform efforts, as well as to contribute to institution-building and the strengthening of democracy, through technical assistance and through its monitoring and human rights and civic education activities.

7. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second session the item entitled "The situation of democracy and human rights in Haiti".

Report of Secretary-General (November).

Pursuant to the above resolution, the Secretary-General reported in November [A/52/687] on ways in which the international community could continue to assist Haiti in institution-building and protecting human rights.

The institutional crisis had deepened in October, the Secretary-General declared, with the Prime Minister stating that he would no longer carry out his caretaker responsibilities. Controversies surrounding the April elections remained unresolved and, despite calls for its modification, CEP continued, through indirect elections, to establish territorial assemblies. Those assemblies, which underpinned decentralized government, were considered to be instrumental in establishing the Permanent Electoral Council and in designating judicial officials. On 3 November, President Préval announced measures to resolve the electoral stalemate, including the establishment of a Presidential Committee to report on the current electoral process, as well as the replacement of six CEP members. He stated that he would hold further consultations on his choice of Herve Denis as the new Prime Minister.

HNP continued to make progress in the areas of institution-building and human rights monitoring, particularly through ongoing training programmes. Police were developing an investigative capacity and had dismantled armed gangs and car theft and drug trafficking rings. Institution-building, however, was limited by operational, managerial, logistical and other constraints. Problems of leadership and supervision hampered the effectiveness and professionalism of HNP, as did persistent allegations of police involvement in crime and other forms of corruption. A new recruitment programme and a nationwide police redeployment programme were intended to address that situation.

MICIVIH worked closely with HNP to reinforce human rights training through seminars. The Mission regularly monitored conditions in police stations and the treatment and legal situation of detainees and made recommendations for improvements. There were constraints on the Office of the Inspector General of HNP, including threats against its investigators.

Improvements in conditions of detention were maintained with the support of the international community. Nevertheless, the National Penal Administration still suffered from staffing shortages, restricted food budgets, intermittent sanitary problems in certain prisons and deficiencies in security. It was noted that the prison population had doubled over the last two years. Among problems identified in the judiciary were: poorly conducted trials; a lack of police and judicial investigations; a lack of material or other evidence brought to court; an absence of witness testimony; and difficulties in constituting juries. In October, the President of the Supreme Court called for the reintroduction of the death penalty to combat armed crime, a proposal which met with little institutional or popular support. Local human rights organizations were vociferous in criticizing the continuing impunity and the dysfunctional judiciary.

MICIVIH human rights activities focused on four main areas: strengthening and support of Haitian human rights NGOs; human rights education; human rights promotion through the media; and training in conflict resolution. The technical capacity of human rights organizations was improving gradually, but monitoring and reporting efforts needed further development. A project was initiated by a United States agency to develop a textbook on civic education for secondary schools and to train teachers in its use. Seminars were held on women's rights, the role of the justice system and the police, decentralization, the Constitution and the rights and responsibilities of citizens. A three-week training programme was organized for selected journalists on human and social rights, with a view to strengthening human rights reporting. The Mission began expanding its conflict resolution programme to increase its outreach and impact.

The Secretary-General recommended the extension of the UN component of MICIVIH for one year. He noted that the technical capacity of the Mission, in particular for judicial reform, would need to be substantially strengthened.

Other questions

Andean Community

In 1997, the General Assembly granted observer status to the Andean Community, which aimed to enable its member countries—Bolivia, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru, Venezuela—to promote equitable development through economic and social integration, and improve the standard of living of the subregion's inhabitants.

On 22 October, the Assembly, by resolution 52/6, invited the Community to participate in its sessions and work in the capacity of observer.

Cuba-United States

Embargo against Cuba

By a letter of 31 January [A/52/68], Cuba transmitted to the Secretary-General the text of the Reaffirmation of Cuban Dignity and Sovereignty Act, adopted on 24 December 1996 by the National Assembly of People's Power of Cuba. By the Act, Cuba declared the Helms-Burton Act illegal, inapplicable and without value or legal effect. (The "Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity Act", known as the Helms-Burton Act, was signed into law by the United States President on 12 March 1996 in response to what the United States claimed was an unlawful attack in February 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 196] on two unarmed United States civilian aircraft, resulting in the deaths of three United States citizens and one United States resident. The Helms-Burton Act imposed additional sanctions on Cuba, mandated the preparation of a plan for United States assistance to transitional and democratically elected Cuban Governments, created a cause of action enabling United States nationals to sue those who expropriated or trafficked in expropriated properties in Cuba, and denied the traffickers entry into the United States.) The Reaffirmation of Cuban Dignity and Sovereignty Act allowed Cubans to sue the United States if they were victims of physical harm or property damage caused by actions supported by the United States, including death, injury or economic losses caused by those who were part of the previous regime under Fulgencio Batista. It declared unlawful any form of collaboration in implementing the Helms-Burton Act, such as distributing information about it. The law also charged Cuba with protecting foreign investors from United States action by transferring their interests to fiduciary companies, financial institutions or investment funds.

Cuba on 29 May transmitted to the Secretary-General the text [A/52/162] of its denunciation of new actions which it said the United States Congress was preparing to take against Cuba to strengthen the economic, trade and financial embargo. Cuba further claimed that the measures were aimed at enlarging the extraterritorial scope of the Helms-Burton Act. In a 4 June statement [A/52/221], the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries stated that it rejected the new measures.

Cuba on 10 October transmitted to the Secretary-General a report [A/52/452] it had prepared for an information meeting convened by the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development for non-member States on the development of the Multilateral Investment Agreement. Cuba pointed out that its request to attend the meeting had been denied.

On 17 October, Cuba transmitted Decision No. 390, adopted by the Twenty-third Council of the Latin American Economic System (SELA) (Trinidad and Tobago, 6-9 October) [A/52/501]. The Council rejected the Helms-Burton Act and further attempts by the United States to reinforce the Act and urged the United States to repeal it. It asked the Permanent Secretariat of SELA to continue consideration of the matter.

Report of Secretary-General. In a September report with later addendum [A/52/342 & Corr.1 & Add.1], the Secretary-General, in response to General Assembly resolution 51/17 [YUN 1996, p. 194], submitted a report containing information from 49 States, one observer mission, five UN specialized agencies and two UN organs on their implementation of the resolution, which had called on States to refrain from promulgating and applying laws and measures similar to the Helms-Burton Act.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

The General Assembly, on 5 November [meeting 45], adopted resolution 52/10 [draft: A/52/L.11] by recorded vote (143-3-17) [agenda item 30].

Necessity of ending the economic, commercial and financial embargo imposed by the United States of America against Cuba

The General Assembly,

Determined to encourage strict compliance with the purposes and principles enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations,

Reaffirming, among other principles, the sovereign equality of States, non-intervention and non-interference in their internal affairs and freedom of international trade and navigation, which are also enshrined in many international legal instruments,

Recalling the statements of the heads of State or Government at the Ibero-American Summits concerning the need to eliminate the unilateral application of economic and trade measures by one State against another that affect the free flow of international trade,

Concerned about the continued promulgation and application by Member States of laws and regulations, such as that promulgated on 12 March 1996 known as the "Helms-Burton Act", the extraterritorial effects of which affect the sovereignty of other States, the legitimate interests of entities or persons under their jurisdiction and the freedom of trade and navigation,

Taking note of declarations and resolutions of different intergovernmental forums, bodies and Governments that express the rejection by the international community and public opinion of the promulgation and application of regulations of the kind referred to above,

Recalling its resolutions 47/19 of 24 November 1992, 48/16 of 3 November 1993, 49/9 of 26 October 1994, 50/10 of 2 November 1995 and 51/17 of 12 November 1996,

Concerned that, since the adoption of its resolutions 47/19, 48/16, 49/9, 50/10 and 51/17, further measures of that nature aimed at strengthening and extending the economic, commercial and financial embargo against Cuba continue to be promulgated and applied, and concerned also about the adverse effects of such measures on the Cuban people and on Cuban nationals living in other countries,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of resolution 51/17;

2. Reiterates its call on all States to refrain from promulgating and applying laws and measures of the kind referred to in the preamble to the present resolution in conformity with their obligations under the Charter of the United Nations and international law, which, inter alia, reaffirm the freedom of trade and navigation;

3. Once again urges States that have and continue to apply such laws and measures to take the necessary steps to repeal or invalidate them as soon as possible in accordance with their legal regime;

4. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the appropriate organs and agencies of the United Nations system, to prepare a report on the implementation of the present resolution in the light of the purposes and principles of the Charter and international law and to submit it to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session;

5. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third session the item entitled "Necessity of ending the economic, commercial and financial embargo imposed by the United States of America against Cuba".

Panama Canal

On 7 September 1977, the Panama Canal Treaty and the Treaty concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, known as the Torrijos-Carter treaties, were signed in Washington, D.C., stipulating that, at noon on 31 December 1999, the Canal, including all improvements, was to come under the control of the Republic of Panama.

In November 1995 (resolution 50/12) [YUN 1995, p. 461], the General Assembly supported the convening of the Universal Congress on the Panama Canal, from 7 to 10 December 1997, in Panama City.

In its resolution 51/5, adopted on 24 October 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 199], the Assembly reiterated its firm support for the holding of the Congress, and urged UN Member States, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, as well as UN programmes and specialized agencies, particularly UNDP, United Nations Environment Programme and International Maritime Organization, to provide appropriate assistance for it.

Report of Secretary-General. The Secretary-General submitted in October a report covering information available prior to the holding of the Universal Congress on the Panama Canal [A/52/435 & Corr.1].

The Secretary-General stated that the Congress was seen as an opportunity for user countries and the private sector to meet with administrators of the Panama Canal and to ensure confidence in the change in stewardship and in the legal and administrative regime of the future. One issue to be taken up was the construction of a third set of locks, which, because of the magnitude of the project, would require a multinational effort by all countries that included the Panama Canal in their transportation and external commerce infrastructure.

The Secretary-General presented the status of funds for a study relating to the short-, medium- and long-term (to the year 2060) traffic forecasts and described promotional activities.

The agenda of the Congress included panels on the transition and beyond, the Canal in the twenty-first century, investment opportunities and Panamanian maritime sector policies.

Asuncion Declaration. By a letter of 28 August [A/52/347], Paraguay, as Coordinator of the States members of the Permanent Mechanism for Consultation and Concerted Political Action (Rio Group), submitted the Asuncion Declaration, adopted at the Eleventh Summit of Heads of State and Government of the Rio Group (Asuncion, 23-24 August).

The Declaration reaffirmed the importance of the Universal Congress on the Panama Canal as a forum open to the entire international community. It stated that the meeting should serve as a consultation mechanism for examining the role which the Canal should play in the twenty-first century, as well as the plans to expand the services which the Government of Panama was promoting through the Board of Directors of the Panama Canal Authority.

On 20 November [meeting 50], the General Assembly, by decision 52/411, decided to conclude consideration of the Universal Congress on the Panama Canal.

Peru-Ecuador

By a letter of 18 April, the Netherlands drew the attention of the Secretary-General to the text of a 14 April statement by the Presidency of the EU [A/52/121], in which he welcomed a meeting on 15 April in Brasilia, Brazil, between the Governments of Peru and Ecuador to begin substantive talks on their differences regarding the border dispute between them.

In a later communication [A/53/73-S/1998/163 & Corr.1], Ecuador transmitted the Brasilia Declaration of 26 November, signed by Ecuador and Peru, and a timetable of activities for implementing the proposals contained therein. It also transmitted a document which was the basis for an understanding between them.

In the Declaration, the two parties agreed to consider a trade and navigation treaty; a comprehensive agreement on border integration; delimitation of a common land boundary; and the establishment of a binational commission on mutual confidence- and security-building measures. It was also agreed that the parties and the Follow-up Commission, designated by Peru to assist in the talks, would establish a timetable to promote the implementation of the proposals.

The exchange between the parties of a draft agreement on trade and navigation was due to take place on 2 February 1998, with work commencing by a commission on 17 February. A commission to draw up a draft comprehensive agreement on border integration was to be appointed no later than 2 February 1998, with work beginning no later than 17 February. Similarly, the commission responsible for completing the preparations for the delimitation of a common land boundary in the Lagartococha and Zamora-Santiago and/or Cordillera del Condor sectors was to be appointed no later than 2 February 1998, with work beginning no later than 17 February.

As to mutual confidence- and security-building measures, a commission responsible for studying the establishment and functioning of a binational commission on the subject was to be appointed no later than 2 February, with work commencing on 17 February. Work on each of the themes was to be carried out simultaneously, with agreements entering into force jointly on completion of the demarcation process. The parties were to work together with a view to completing the process no later than 30 May 1998.

Chapter IV

Asia and the Pacific

In 1997, the United Nations remained engaged in meeting the challenges to regional security and peace in Asia and the Pacific, mainly in Iraq, Afghanistan, Tajikistan, the Korean peninsula and Cambodia.

The United Nations Special Commission for the disarmament of Iraq and the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) continued to conduct the weapons inspections mandated by Security Council resolution 687(1991) embodying the terms of a formal ceasefire of the 1991 Gulf War, which Iraq accepted. As efforts to bring their mandate to a final conclusion had been confronted by Iraq's increasingly toughening stance towards those inspections, which included the expulsion of United States inspectors from the country, the two bodies were unable to report to the Council that Iraq was finally in full compliance with its long-standing obligations under the weapons-related provisions of the resolution. Hence, the sanctions regime against Iraq remained in place. The United Nations continued to alleviate the unintended consequences of the sanctions on the Iraqi population through the humanitarian programme based on an oil-for-food formula authorized by the Council in 1995, which the Council extended to the end of May 1998.

A peaceful resolution of the armed conflict in Afghanistan continued to elude the unremitting efforts of the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan to bring to the negotiating table the country's two main rivals for political legitimacy: the Taliban and the opposition coalition commonly referred to as the Northern Alliance. The Security Council and the General Assembly called on all Afghan parties to put an immediate end to the fighting and for a cessation of all external interference in Afghan affairs. In addition, the Assembly encouraged the Secretary-General to pursue the study of a fair and verifiable arms embargo on Afghanistan and supported his call for an international framework to address the external aspects of the Afghan question.

The mediating efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Tajikistan bore fruit with the conclusion in June of a General Agreement on the Establishment of Peace and National Accord between the Government of Tajikistan and the United Tajik Opposition, breaking the long impasse that had existed between them on political issues. If implemented, the General Agreement would lead to elections and the formation of a new Government. In support of that implementation, the Council expanded the mandate of the United Nations Mission of Observers to include additional functions during the transition period and extended it to May 1998.

In Cambodia, where the United Nations had invested considerable resources to help bring about a democratically elected Government in 1993, the United Nations once more was requested, and it indicated its readiness, to play a monitoring role that should contribute towards restoring the functioning of the country's civil institutions by their duly elected officials following its disruption in July by armed violence between the two parties that had formed the coalition Government.

On the Korean peninsula, the United Nations Command continued to monitor the 1953 Armistice Agreement, while IAEA continued to seek full compliance by the Democratic People's Republic of Korea with its obligations under its nuclear safeguards agreement with the Agency.

Other political matters within the region continued to be drawn to the attention of the United Nations. They concerned Iran, with respect to its relations with Iraq and the United States; the United Arab Emirates and Iran, regarding the disputed islands of the Greater Tunb, the Lesser Tunb and Abu Musa; and India and Pakistan, on the disputed territory of Jammu and Kashmir.

Iraq

The United Nations Special Commission on Iraqi disarmament (UNSCOM) and the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) continued in 1997 to implement the ongoing monitoring and verification of Iraq's non-proscribed activities in the nuclear, missile, chemical and biological weapons areas. In parallel, they continued efforts to bring to a conclusion the process of verifying Iraq's full, final and complete disclosures of its proscribed weapons programmes in those areas, particularly regarding biological weapons.

As UNSCOM pressed forward with its verification inspections and technical interviews with Iraqi counterparts, Iraq persisted in its claim that, following more than six years of such investigations with which it had cooperated, it no longer held any weapons of mass destruction. Claiming further that insistent monitoring of sites associated with Iraq's presidency and national security and the use of the high-altitude surveillance aircraft were for purposes other than to discharge UNSCOM's mandate, Iraq began repeatedly to deny site access, to obstruct and interfere with inspections, restrict the freedom of movement of personnel, and generally to impose unacceptable limits on UNSCOM operations in contravention of relevant Security Council resolutions.

Despite Council demands for Iraq's full and unconditional cooperation with UNSCOM, Iraq, on 29 October, decided, with effect from 30 October, to allow UNSCOM inspections to proceed provided that teams did not include inspectors of United States nationality and demanded that all such inspectors leave Iraq within seven days. Following that decision, the Council on 12 November imposed travel restrictions on all officials and members of the armed forces of Iraq responsible for its failure to cooperate with UNSCOM. Iraq nonetheless expelled the United States inspectors from the country on 13 November. In view of that action, UNSCOM and IAEA withdrew their inspectors on 14 November. The Council condemned that action and demanded its immediate rescission. Following intensive diplomatic efforts led by the Russian Federation, Iraq announced on 20 November that its Revolutionary Command Council had decided to invite all inspectors back to Iraq.

UNSCOM and IAEA resumed operations in Iraq on 22 November. Their inspection activities continued to be punctuated, however, by incidents of Iraqi non-cooperation until the end of the year, despite a Council presidential statement that Iraq reverse its position.

Meanwhile, the humanitarian programme for Iraq based on an oil-for-food formula, authorized by the Security Council in 1995 to mitigate the adverse effects on the Iraqi population of the sanctions regime against Iraq, continued to be implemented. The Council extended the programme twice during the year, on 4 June and on 4 December, each for a further period of 180 days.

The General Assembly, by decision 52/432 of 18 December, decided to defer consideration of the item entitled "Consequences of the Iraqi occupation of and aggression against Kuwait" and to include it in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third (1998) session.

UN Special Commission

The United Nations Special Commission, established by the Secretary-General pursuant to Security Council resolution 687(1991) [YUN 1991, p. 172], continued to carry out its operations on Iraqi disarmament from its headquarters in New York, the Baghdad Monitoring and Verification Centre (BMVC) in Iraq and its field office in Muharraq, Bahrain. Until 30 June 1997, UNSCOM was headed by Rolf Ekéus (Sweden), Executive Chairman. Mr. Ekéus, who submitted his resignation on 1 May, was succeeded by Richard Butler (Australia), appointed to the post by the Secretary-General with effect from 1 July. BMVC continued to operate under the directorship of Sweden's retired Admiral Göran Wallen until 2 May and General Nils Carlström from 10 May.

UNSCOM, which had been financed from funds released from the escrow account established under Security Council resolution 778(1992) [YUN 1992, p. 320] for the receipt of Iraqi frozen assets and from voluntary contributions from a number of States, currently received funds from the implementation of Council resolution 986(1995) [YUN 1995, p. 475]. Such funds were expected to cover operational costs until mid-1997. As a result of the Executive Chairman's visit to member States of the Gulf Cooperation Council in 1996, two of those States provided voluntary contributions to UNSCOM in January 1997 totalling $5 million, from which UNSCOM would draw should funding as provided for by resolution 986(1995) cease.

During the year, BMVC operations continued to be supported by a detachment of five Bell UH-1H helicopters and 41 personnel contributed by the Government of Chile. The Baghdad-based aerial inspection team continued to provide support to monitoring teams and non-resident inspection teams.

Reports of Executive Chairman (April and October). During the year, the Executive Chairman submitted to the Security Council, through the Secretary-General, two consolidated six-monthly progress reports, in accordance with Council resolution 1051(1996) [YUN 1996, p. 218]. The first report [S/1997/301] covered the period from 11 October 1996 to 11 April 1997. The second [S/1997/774] covered the period from 11 April to 11 October 1997.

The reports gave an overview of the bimonthly political-level meetings held between UNSCOM and Iraq in Baghdad. They updated the status of UNSCOM's efforts to expedite verification of Iraq's full, final and complete disclosures (FFCDs) of its missile, chemical and biological weapons programmes proscribed by Council resolution 687(1991). They summarized the ongoing monitoring and verification (OMV) activities aimed at ensuring Iraq's compliance with its obligations under the same resolution not to engage in the renewed acquisition and production of such weapons, including the related joint UNSCOM and IAEA operations under the currently fully operational export/import monitoring mechanism. Further summarized were UNSCOM inspections directed specifically at Iraq's concealment activities.

Appendix I to the April report presented a detailed account of the inspections related to the activities above, including UNSCOM support for IAEA operations in Iraq, and of operational and administrative matters pertaining to UNSCOM headquarters and BMVC; appendix II listed the inspection schedule in the reporting period. Annex I to the October report described Iraq's compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of Council resolution 1115(1997); annex II presented the findings of the international panel of experts on the FFCD of Iraq's proscribed biological weapons programme; and an appendix listed the inspection schedule for the period.

Communication. On 22 April [S/1997/361], Iraq commented on the April report point by point in order to give what it termed a more precise picture of the status of implementation of section C of Security Council resolution 687(1991) and Iraq's expectations under that resolution.

High-level meetings

In keeping with the provisions of their joint statement and joint programme of action of 22 June 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 208], UNSCOM and Iraq continued in 1997 to hold bimonthly high-level meetings in Baghdad to review progress, direct further efforts, develop innovative procedures and methods to move forward, and implement arrangements agreed upon. The first meeting took place from 20 to 23 February, during which they discussed outstanding chemical weapons issues, with the Executive Chairman addressing UNSCOM concerns regarding the production of the chemical nerve agent VX, the lack of corroborating documents, unaccounted-for warheads, bombs and munitions and undeclared chemical weapons production equipment. It was agreed that those issues would be followed up at an expert-level meeting in March.

Also addressed were outstanding missile issues, regarding which Iraq provided further clarifications that made for some progress on the basic accounting, but not on important problems such as Iraq's concealment and unilateral destruction of missiles after the 1991 Gulf War [YUN 1991, p. 167]. On the further issue of Iraq's continuing refusal to let UNSCOM remove the remnants of destroyed missiles, as called for by the Security Council in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 210], Iraq ultimately agreed to permit their removal for out-of-country analysis. Both sides then issued a joint statement on 23 February [S/1997/152] reflecting that agreement, as well as the meeting's main results and plans for the immediate future.

At their meeting in New York on 2 March, the Executive Chairman and Iraq's Minister for Foreign Affairs agreed that a relationship based on cooperation was the best way to resolve outstanding issues. In that connection, the Chairman detailed some problems recently encountered by UNSCOM that constrained its OMV operations in Iraq (see below, under "Ongoing monitoring and verification").

At the 3 April meeting, the Executive Chairman outlined actions to be taken by UNSCOM to expedite verification of outstanding issues for which explanations and supporting documentation were required. He made a formal request for such documentation and restated UNSCOM's contention that more documents concerning Iraq's proscribed weapons programmes still existed in Iraq and should be made available by such central government organs as the Military Industrialization Corporation, the Ministry of Defence and the Office of the Presidency. Reiterating that Iraq's June 1996 FFCD of its proscribed biological weapons programme [YUN 1996, p. 215] did not provide a basis for proper verification owing to its many gaps and inconsistencies, the Chairman asked Iraq to reconsider its position and provide a new disclosure. Although Iraq asserted that it could only reiterate the data in its June 1996 disclosure, it communicated its agreement on 5 April 1997 to provide a new biological FFCD.

Again discussed were problems that had arisen in the course of OMV inspections, including Iraqi efforts to undercut the effectiveness of monitoring through a variety of tactics and threats to the safety of UNSCOM helicopter operations. Iraq formally stated its commitment to maintaining the OMV system to the satisfaction of UNSCOM, given that the cornerstone of its policy was to seek the Council's implementation of paragraph 22 (on the lifting of sanctions against Iraq) of resolution 687(1991).

As a result of the new Executive Chairman's meeting with Iraq (21 to 25 July), a specific additional programme of work was agreed upon, including: in the missile area, the re-excavation of remnants of missile warheads, launchers and other items for the purpose of verifying Iraq's claim of their unilateral destruction, and provision by Iraq of various declarations concerning the disposition of elements of its proscribed missile force, including warheads and missile support elements; in the chemical area, further Iraqi efforts to clarify particular issues of concern and the destruction of certain chemical weapons equipment and key precursors; and, in the biological area, Iraq's submission of a new FFCD.

Work accomplished under that programme, reviewed at the next meeting (5 to 9 September), indicated that several issues had been settled in the missile area and a programme of destruction of certain chemical weapons equipment and materials had begun. Iraq was asked to provide further information required for the verification of special warheads planned to be used for the delivery of chemical and biological weapons, including production and filling records. Regarding Iraq's promise shortly to submit its biological weapons FFCD—subsequently delivered on 11 September—the Executive Chairman proposed that that FFCD and all others currently in UNSCOM's possession be regarded as final and that UNSCOM would proceed to seek to verify them. The FFCDs were Iraq's responsibility and UNSCOM would not further assist Iraq in formulating its account of its proscribed biological weapons programme or any other of its proscribed programmes.

Verification of declarations of proscribed programmes

Missiles

The main tasks of UNSCOM regarding missiles centred on the accounting and disposal of proscribed missiles and related operational missile assets (launchers, warheads, propellants, combat support infrastructure) and on other proscribed Iraqi activities and capabilities, including indigenous missile production programmes.

Significant progress had been achieved as UNSCOM was able to account for all but two imported combat missiles that were once the core of Iraq's proscribed missile force. It had also accounted for all declared operational missile launchers, both imported and indigenously produced. Achievement of the ultimate objective of full disposal of Iraq's proscribed operational missile assets was particularly important as the issue overlapped the chemical and biological weapons areas.

Communication. In a 5 June letter [S/1997/462] transmitted to the Security Council, the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq conveyed to the UNSCOM Executive Chairman Iraq's concern that the analysis of missile remnants had been unconsciously protracted and that the transmission of the results had been delayed without regard for the consequences, namely, the continuation of the sanctions regime and the concomitant suffering of the Iraqi people.

Chemical weapons

UNSCOM's work in chemical weapons remained focused on production capabilities; stocks of chemical weapons, including chemical warfare agents, munitions and their components; and other issues related to proscribed chemical weapons activities such as the lethal nerve agent VX.

UNSCOM recorded significant progress during the reporting period (11 April-11 October): additional chemical weapons equipment and analytical instruments had been discovered and destroyed and new elements of Iraq's VX activities and programme had been identified. However, UNSCOM's ability to report positively on disarmament of that category of weapons of mass destruction would require more accurate information from Iraq and related access by UNSCOM relevant to the warheads and VX questions.

Biological weapons

The April report [S/1997/301] stated that monthly inspections were conducted in Iraq from October 1996 to March 1997 to verify the June 1996 FFCD of Iraq's biological weapons programme [YUN 1996, p. 215]. Those inspections continued to uncover flaws in the accounting for that programme and evidence that Iraq was concealing significant aspects of it.

In March, UNSCOM convened an international panel of experts to review and assess the status of the 1996 FFCD. The experts concluded, inter alia, that Iraq had failed to report all imports of equipment and materials, in particular microbial growth media. It had under-reported the production of bulk biological warfare agents. The stated production of aflatoxin could not have happened as declared. The declarations on destruction were not supported by sufficient evidence, and the FFCD failed to give a full accounting of procurement activities for the biological weapons programme. In short, it did not provide a basis for credible verification.

The October report [S/1997/774] recorded that, as agreed at the April meeting in Baghdad, Iraq had prepared a new biological FFCD, which UNSCOM received on 11 September. The report gave a detailed analysis of the new document, noting its more coherent presentation with fewer errata. However, with respect to the important issues of warfare agent production, munitions manufacturing and destruction of biological weapons and capabilities, the FFCD contained no significant changes from the 1996 version; changes that were included were not supported by documentation or appropriate information.

The report stated that the September 1997 FFCD failed to give a remotely credible account of Iraq's biological warfare programme—an opinion endorsed by an international panel of experts to which UNSCOM had submitted the document for evaluation; the panel's evaluation was included as annex II to the October report. The biological weapons area was one unredeemed by progress or any approximation of the known facts of Iraq's programme, the report observed.

Concealment inspections

As in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 209], the question of concealment of proscribed items remained a major issue for UNSCOM in 1997. Concern about the continued existence of concealment systems was reinforced by Iraq's unwillingness to provide full details of its past efforts to obscure retained proscribed material and equipment from UNSCOM, as well as to expose fully the scope and organizational involvement of its covert procurement efforts in support of proscribed programmes.

In pursuit of the concealment issue, UNSCOM conducted a number of inspections during the year whose fundamental objectives were: to determine whether all proscribed weapons and capabilities retained by Iraq following the adoption of Security Council resolution 687(1991) were subsequently revealed and destroyed; and to ascertain whether the concealment mechanism used then was still functioning. As recorded in the UNSCOM April report [S/1997/301], an inspection team (UNSCOM 179) continued in March the series of underwater surveys begun in 1996. Thereafter, UNSCOM launched a major inspection (UNSCOM 182) of Iraq's concealment mechanism. In its search for possible connections between concealment activities and the Special Republican Guard, as well as other sites belonging to Iraq's Intelligence Service (Mukhabarat), Special Security Organization, General Security Service and Military Intelligence, the inspection covered 17 sites but discovered neither proscribed material nor activity. In addition, in March, IAEA excavated three declared equipment burial sites south of Lake Tharthar and unearthed hundreds of items relating to Engineering Design Centre operations. Although many of those items were consistent with Iraq's declaration, a previously undeclared cache of unused specialized corrosion-resistant valves was found.

The October report [S/1997/774] stated that an inspection (UNSCOM 194) was undertaken from 3 to 12 June of a number of sites related to organizations such as the Special Security Organization, Intelligence Service and Special Republican Guard, which, as UNSCOM established and Iraq later acknowledged, had been directly linked to concealment actions and/or covert procurement activities. A further inspection was carried out in September to determine the interactions and roles of individuals and the decision chain for early concealment decisions taken in 1991. Iraq allowed senior members of the Special Republican Guard, the Intelligence Service and the Surface-to-Surface Missile Force to be interviewed, but not one individual (a minister) who had been requested. The data obtained was fragmentary and often contradictory. Iraq admitted for the first time the participation of elements of the Special Republican Guard and the Intelligence Service in safeguarding retained proscribed material and covert procurement of such material. Nonetheless, the information provided was still far from complete.

From 10 to 20 September, a joint chemical and biological team (UNSCOM 199/203) inspected a number of military sites suspected of being involved in proscribed activities. On three occasions at three so-called sensitive sites, the inspectors, while waiting to be allowed entry, recorded evidence of the removal or movement, as well as destruction, of documents and records within the sites.

During the last week of September, a further inspection (UNSCOM 207) focused on sites linked to a concealment system designed to continue denying to UNSCOM access to past proscribed material and equipment and to information and documentation pertaining to them. When access was obtained, the inspection produced limited information.

The report observed that UNSCOM was compelled to continue the concealment investigations because of the gaps in accounting for Iraq's proscribed programmes and its history of active deception with respect to those programmes. UNSCOM believed that relevant materials and documents remained in Iraq and that there had been highly coordinated actions designed to mislead UNSCOM. It made the point that, on the basis of evidence available to it and were it to have full access to all relevant sites and persons in Iraq, it was highly likely to discover proscribed items; Iraq's actions to impede or block UNSCOM investigations tended to affirm that view.

Ongoing monitoring and verification

The system of ongoing monitoring and verification of Iraq's compliance with its obligations under Security Council resolution 687(1991) was necessary if UNSCOM was to be able to report to the Council under paragraph 22 of that resolution. The task required UNSCOM to monitor Iraqi sites and facilities with equipment capable of producing proscribed weapons, as well as to watch for clandestine sites that might be created for proscribed activities. Those sites included major facilities, such as petrochemical and biopesticide plants where chemical or biological warfare agents could be produced, and other facilities such as breweries, brake fluid factories and even university microbiology laboratories containing permitted dual-use equipment. Currently, UNSCOM was regularly monitoring over 300 sites.

UNSCOM's system of ongoing monitoring, in place in Iraq since April 1995, involved a variety of processes, including on-site inspection by resident teams and by visiting specialized inspection teams when required; a variety of remote-sensing capabilities, including cameras and chemical detectors, providing electronic on-site monitoring; and aerial inspections. The remote monitoring system had been enhanced by the installation of three multi-system optical review equipment work stations at BMVC.

The monitoring system's effectiveness was primarily dependent on the completeness and accuracy of the declarations required from Iraq under the monitoring plans; Iraq's behaviour and uneven compliance had had a negative effect on monitoring confidence. As recorded in the UNSCOM April report [S/1997/301], the six months from October 1996 had seen a pattern of Iraqi effort to restrict UNSCOM's monitoring activities. Problems in compiling Iraq's monitoring declarations appeared to lie, not with the facilities providing the raw data, but with Iraq's National Monitoring Directorate, established in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 475] as the interface for UNSCOM's monitoring work: accurate information provided by the facilities was often manipulated by the Directorate, rendering its declarations to UNSCOM misleading and inaccurate. Iraq had further failed to provide information about all sites and facilities where UNSCOM inspection teams later discovered several hundred pieces of declarable dual-use equipment. The minders provided by the Directorate to escort UNSCOM inspection teams so as to ensure immediate and unconditional access to sites had often interrupted interviews, instructing site personnel to provide wrong information or to refuse to answer questions. The Directorate also restricted the times and days during which it would respond to UNSCOM requests for minders. Iraq further sought to constrain monitoring by a new policy whereby instructions had been issued that access be refused to the inspectors unless Directorate representatives were present. In another disturbing trend, Iraq had tried to enforce new procedures requiring prior Directorate approval for the provision of documents found by the inspectors at sites. UNSCOM hoped that the Deputy Prime Minister's commitment to maintain the OMV system to UNSCOM's satisfaction, which he made at the April 1997 high-level meeting, would be translated into action.

In its coverage of monitoring activities in the missile area, the April report noted that UNSCOM continued to send specialized teams to perform technical analysis of Iraq's current programmes to develop and manufacture non-proscribed missile systems. In January, one such team (UNSCOM 166) reviewed activities related to the Samoud missile, which had a declared range of less than 150 kilometres and was therefore not prohibited under resolution 687(1991). Through that review and the regular monitoring by the resident missile team, Iraqi declarations on that project were corroborated. The team discovered evidence of Iraq's effort related to a space launch vehicle after the adoption of resolution 687(1991), which prohibited such vehicles to Iraq; it obtained conclusive proof of an attempt in 1992 to simulate a space launch vehicle based on a proscribed missile system, as well as evidence of a study in 1994 and 1995 of a space launch vehicle based on a non-proscribed missile system. Iraq's refusal during the inspection to provide computer software and documents significantly hindered the team's ability to accomplish its tasks fully. Most of the documents sought were later provided, however.

A March inspection (UNSCOM 181) of a selected group of military units, to verify that those sites were not involved in training, maintenance or operation of prohibited missile systems, found no evidence of proscribed activities.

Since UNSCOM's missile monitoring system became operational in August 1994, Iraq's non-proscribed activities in the missile area had moved closer to a production phase, thus requiring modifications to current monitoring practices. As the export-import mechanism had become fully operational, closer coordination with the export/import monitoring activities was also required.

In the period covered by the October report [S/1997/774], the missile monitoring group conducted over 160 inspections, covering 63 sites subject to regular monitoring with 143 items of equipment and more than 2,000 missile systems, all tagged for periodic verification that they had not been modified to proscribed ranges. In order to track Iraq's production of non-proscribed missiles more effectively, UNSCOM in May began requiring Iraq to provide monthly declarations on missile component production.

Concerning chemical weapons, the April report stated that an air monitoring system had recently been deployed to collect infrared spectral signatures at a number of industrial facilities and chemical storage sites, adding to UNSCOM's baseline monitoring information and to its historical database of emission activities.

The report also stated that Iraq's semi-annual chemical declaration, required under the OMV plan and submitted on 16 January, was found short of established requirement. Specifically, discoveries pointed to the fact that Iraq was not fully meeting the required reporting of its dual-use equipment holdings. Those discoveries included some 200 key pieces of undeclared dual-use equipment—heat exchangers, glass reactor vessels and distillation columns capable of use in proscribed chemical weapons activities—and about 800 pieces of related equipment.

Since chemical monitoring began in October 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 475], over 720 inspections had been conducted. The October report noted that currently under monitoring were some 160 facilities, 323 tagged pieces of equipment, several thousand additional items of equipment and thousands of tons of chemicals. The chemical monitoring group, besides performing regular monitoring activities, also supported 12 visiting inspection teams and oversaw the destruction of precursor chemicals and the return of analytical equipment to Kuwait.

By the beginning of April, 86 sites were under regular monitoring by resident biological teams. In addition, UNSCOM sent specialized expert teams to Iraq to conduct multidisciplinary inspections, including inspections focusing on documents and equipment, that yielded several pieces of significant undeclared equipment, spare parts and supplies. The resident teams continued to identify sites holding undeclared dual-use biological equipment and to uncover changes, also undeclared, to ongoing activities at several key biological sites.

During the period covered by the October report, the resident monitoring group undertook some 240 inspections, during which it encountered a number of problems, among them concealment of items. Some 90 sites were subject to regular monitoring and 893 items of equipment were tagged. The semi-annual declaration submitted by Iraq on 15 July was still in the previous formats rather than in the "revised formats" provided in 1995 at its request. The content had not improved, uncorrected problems repeated in the past remained extant and declarable equipment remained undeclared.

Export/import monitoring mechanism

The export/import monitoring mechanism for Iraq, which became fully operational in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 218], was jointly administered by UNSCOM and IAEA. The export/import monitoring group resident in Baghdad continued to undertake inspections, frequently in conjunction with experts from other monitoring teams, including non-resident ones. By the end of the period covered by the October report [S/1997/774], the joint unit had been notified of some 75 transactions involving the intended export to Iraq of items subject to monitoring. During the same period, the resident export/import monitoring group conducted some 130 inspections at sites within Iraq, including points of entry.

In view of the increase in the volume of potential and actual transactions of notifiable items being exported to Iraq resulting from the implementation of Security Council resolution 986(1995) (see "Oil-for-food programme" below), the export/import monitoring mechanism was under constant review to determine what steps, if any, might be necessary to enhance its effectiveness.

National implementation measures

The OMV plans of UNSCOM and IAEA required Iraq to adopt administrative and legislative measures to implement its obligations under Security Council resolutions 687(1991), section C [YUN 1991, p. 174], and 707(1991) [YUN 1991, p. 188] and the plans. They also required Iraq to inform the two bodies of action taken in that regard.

The UNSCOM October report recorded that Iraq had so far failed to introduce the required measures, despite UNSCOM's frequent raising of the issue with Iraqi authorities. That meant that Iraq was failing to carry out one of the actions necessary if the Council was to act under paragraph 22 of resolution 687(1991).

Aerial inspections

As indicated in its April report [S/1997/301], UNSCOM continued in 1997 to conduct both fixed-wing and helicopter flights throughout Iraq for purposes that included inspection, surveillance, aerial surveys, transportation and logistics. It did so by rights granted to it by Security Council resolutions 687(1991), 707(1991) and 715(1991) [YUN 1991, p. 194], which also obliged Iraq to permit those operations; those rights could be changed only by the Council.

Five new Bell UH-1H helicopters and personnel provided by Chile added greater flexibility to monitoring operations, made possible multiple missions each day and conducted over 1,000 hours of accident-free aerial support in Iraq. By the end of the second reporting period [S/1997/774], some 950 missions had been conducted by the Baghdad-based aerial inspection team and some 380 missions by the high-altitude surveillance aircraft (U-2), which continued to be an important element in UNSCOM's inspection activities.

Communications. In a series of letters addressed to the Security Council and/or the Secretary-General between March and November [S/1997/253, 431, 573, 747, 867, 905, 924], Iraq protested violations of its airspace by the U-2 aircraft, which, it claimed, was being used by the United States to spy on Iraq under the pretext of conducting UNSCOM aerial surveys. Iraq urged, as it had done in some 120 previous letters, that one of its own aircraft be used by UNSCOM to do away with aerial activity prejudicial to Iraq's sovereignty and security. Iraq notified the Secretary-General on 10 November [S/1997/867] that, on the basis of the violation of its airspace and sovereignty on that date by the "U-2 spy plane" and several formations of United States warplanes, the U-2 was no longer to be considered, nominally or formally, as a means for inspection or monitoring.

Limitations on UNSCOM activities

Right of access

Under the terms of Security Council resolution 687(1991), UNSCOM was mandated to carry out immediate on-site inspection of Iraq's biological, chemical and missile capabilities, based on Iraq's declarations and the designation of any additional locations by UNSCOM itself. On its part, Iraq was to agree unconditionally, inter alia, to accept urgent on-site inspection and the destruction, removal or rendering harmless as appropriate of all items of mass destruction specified by that resolution. Subsequently, UNSCOM and Iraq issued in 1996 a joint programme of action and joint statement of modalities [YUN 1996, p. 208] for on-site inspections, including access to Iraqi individuals sought for interview, to ensure that UNSCOM would conduct its inspections of sensitive sites with full respect for Iraq's legitimate national security concerns. The statement included a provision for the review of the practical application and effectiveness of those modalities.

Ground operations

As noted in the UNSCOM October report [S/1997/774], of most serious concern to UNSCOM was Iraq's increasing failure to apply or behave in conformity with the modalities for on-site inspections; more recently, Iraq had sought to exclude them altogether with respect to certain sites and to define new categories of often very large sites from which UNSCOM inspectors would be forbidden, effectively reducing UNSCOM's right of access.

On 12 June [S/1997/474], the UNSCOM Executive Chairman, Rolf Ekéus, advised the Council that the Government of Iraq had denied an UNSCOM inspection team (UNSCOM 194) access to a designated inspection site on 10 June and to two others on 12 June. UNSCOM staff informed Iraqi representatives that those denials were in violation of the relevant Council resolutions and the 1996 joint programme of action and statement of modalities for the inspection of sensitive sites. Iraqi officials responded that Iraq's actions were being carried out on instructions from the highest authority. Mr. Ekéus expressed his concern that the Government had taken a decision to prevent full implementation of the UNSCOM mandate.

On 15 June [S/1997/465], Iraq's Deputy Prime Minister, Tariq Aziz, set out what he said were the circumstances surrounding the three incidents. He pointed out that, contrary to the 1996 joint statement and programme of action, UNSCOM in March had begun inspections on a scale previously unseen of sites related to national security, on the pretext of verifying alleged concealment of proscribed items and activities. He provided two lists of the sites covered by those inspections. The first inspection (UNSCOM 182), from 8 to 16 March, covered 22 sites. Mr. Aziz noted that its findings validated Iraq's often restated position that it concealed no proscribed items and that UNSCOM's information to the contrary was inaccurate. Notified on 29 May of the imminent dispatch of an inspection team to investigate alleged mechanisms for the concealment of proscribed activities and items, Iraq's Minister of Oil pointed to UNSCOM's unsubstantiated allegation of concealment and requested postponement of the inspection pending discussion of the matter at the upcoming high-level meeting in Baghdad or until the new Executive Chairman, Richard Butler, assumed his duties.

Mr. Ekéus nevertheless dispatched the inspection team, which, from 3 to 12 June, inspected 40 sites, including sites directly related to the security of the presidency of the State and sites belonging to the Ministry of Defence, the Ba'ath Arab Socialist Party and the Security and Intelligence Services. The Chief Inspector, Colonel Scott Ritter, requested interviews with officers of the armed forces who, Mr. Aziz claimed, had no connection with the weapons programmes specified in Council resolution 687(1991). It was pointed out that Colonel Ritter's request on 10 June for access to the political section of the Intelligence Service was denied because it contained highly confidential material. His request on 12 June for access to a site related to the security of the presidency was further denied as he had already inspected that site in July and August 1996. Prior to that request, Colonel Ritter asked for permission on the same day to use a road related to a presidential site, without specifying what was designated for inspection; he objected to the suggestion that he use another road and cancelled the mission.

Mr. Aziz asserted that the reason for denying access to the sites was Iraq's serious concern that access was for the purpose, not of implementing UNSCOM's mandate, but of detecting, under cover of UNSCOM inspection, the security arrangements for Iraq and its leadership and the security personnel involved. He made that assertion in the context of what he referred to as the United States position towards Iraq and its political system, of the fact that many of the inspectors were United States nationals on government secondment, and that Colonel Ritter, who had insisted without any justification on gaining access to the sites, was an officer of the United States army.

Mr. Aziz stressed that allegations of Iraq's concealment of proscribed items and of the existence of concealment mechanisms were false; that allowing the inspection of 40 sites out of 43 could not be described as uncooperative; that gaining access to sites related to the security of the presidency was clearly aimed at achieving purposes other than implementing the UNSCOM mandate; and that, since it was in Iraq's interests to cooperate with UNSCOM in order ultimately to enable the Council to lift the sanctions against Iraq, the allegation that Iraq was not cooperating was completely illogical. Mr. Aziz expressed the hope that the Council would direct UNSCOM to act within the limits of its mandate.

On 18 June [S/1997/473], Iraq's Foreign Minister informed the Council that five carloads of nuclear and import/export monitoring inspectors conducted a surprise inspection that day in the Za'faraniyah district of Baghdad. Using radiation and chemical detectors, the inspectors searched a telephone exchange, a cinema and theatre, a monastery and church, a convent, a student dormitory, and a cinematographic store and laboratory under the Ministry of Culture and Information. The Minister described the inspections, authorized in writing by Mr. Ekéus, as shocking and an affront to the places of worship of Iraqi Christians. He called on the Council to do justice by Iraq by putting an end to the deliberate pattern of unprofessional conduct by UNSCOM.

The Executive Chairman on 19 June [S/1997/475] rejected what he called the unwarranted allegations made by the Foreign Minister regarding the authorized site designation and the conduct of UNSCOM personnel. Describing UNSCOM's participation in the inspection, he said the Chief Inspector was provided by IAEA, while the UNSCOM inspectors came from the export/import and chemical groups. He recalled that the right to make designations was vested solely in UNSCOM, on its own behalf and on behalf of IAEA when requested. Those designations (notice of inspection sites), which were provided to Iraqi counterparts, did not identify specific structures, but rather the geographic coordinates of the area to be inspected, and were made only in respect of areas not previously inspected. The area in question was part of a neighbourhood comprising buildings and facilities of a very diverse nature previously designated and currently under monitoring. The team inspected certain structures within the geographic coordinates provided in the designation but did not participate in the inspection of the religious buildings named by the Foreign Minister.

On 20 June [S/1997/481], Iraq, referring to its continuing cooperation with UNSCOM, pointed out that, since the signing of the 22 June 1996 joint statement, many sensitive sites had been inspected without friction. The incidents that had occurred under special circumstances during the UNSCOM 194 inspection could not be interpreted as representing a pattern of obstruction on the part of Iraq. Iraq reaffirmed its commitment to full cooperation with UNSCOM.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 21 June [meeting 3792], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1115(1997), based on a draft [S/1997/479] sponsored by Chile, Costa Rica, Japan, Poland, Portugal, the Republic of Korea, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States.

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 687(1991) of 3 April 1991, 707(1991) of 15 August 1991, 715(1991) of 11 October 1991 and 1060(1996) of 12 June 1996,

Taking note of the letter dated 12 June 1997 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission to the President of the Security Council, in which the Executive Chairman reported to the Council the incidents on 10 and 12 June 1997 when access by a Special Commission inspection team to sites in Iraq designated for inspection by the Commission was excluded by the Iraqi authorities,

Determined to ensure full compliance by Iraq with its obligations under all previous resolutions, in particular resolutions 687(1991), 707(1991), 715(1991) and 1060(1996), to permit immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to the Special Commission to any site which the Commission wishes to inspect,

Stressing the unacceptability of any attempts by Iraq to deny access to any such site,

Reiterating the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Kuwait and Iraq,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Condemns the repeated refusal of the Iraqi authorities to allow access to sites designated by the Special Commission, which constitutes a clear and flagrant violation of the provisions of Security Council resolutions 687(1991), 707(1991), 715(1991) and 1060(1996);

2. Demands that Iraq cooperate fully with the Special Commission in accordance with the relevant resolutions, and that the Government of Iraq allow the Special Commission inspection teams immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to any and all areas, facilities, equipment, records and means of transportation which they wish to inspect in accordance with the mandate of the Special Commission;

3. Demands also that the Government of Iraq give immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to officials and other persons under the authority of the Iraqi Government whom the Special Commission wishes to interview, so that the Special Commission may fully discharge its mandate;

4. Requests the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission to include in his consolidated progress reports under resolution 1051(1996) an annex evaluating Iraq's compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 above;

5. Decides not to conduct the reviews provided for in paragraphs 21 and 28 of resolution 687(1991) until after the next consolidated progress report of the Special Commission, due on 11 October 1997, after which time those reviews will resume in accordance with resolution 687(1991);

6. Expresses its firm intention, unless the Special Commission advises the Council in the report referred to in paragraphs 4 and 5 above that Iraq is in substantial compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 above, to impose additional measures on those categories of Iraqi officials responsible for the non-compliance;

7. Reaffirms its full support to the Special Commission in its efforts to ensure the implementation of its mandate under the relevant resolutions of the Council;

8. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Following the adoption of the resolution, UNSCOM recorded other occasions when site access was either delayed or denied. On 13 and 15

September, during the conduct of an inspection of Iraq's chemical and biological weapons programmes, Iraq violated the modalities for the declared sensitive sites by not freezing movement within the sites after the arrival of the limited-entry team of four inspectors; it also delayed the team's entry, on 17 September, into a sensitive site in central Baghdad for 50 minutes while awaiting the arrival of a high-level Iraqi representative. During that delay, the inspectors witnessed and videotaped the movement of files, burning of documents and dumping of ash-filled waste cans into a nearby river, thus invalidating the inspection.

In his protest letter of 16 September to Iraq, the Executive Chairman noted that UNSCOM had been working scrupulously within the terms of the inspection modalities at sites declared by Iraq to be sensitive, adding that, as on a number of previous occasions, the 13 and 15 September events indicated that Iraq had not. Responding, the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq stressed that the incidents were minor, were not intentional, and that Iraq was keen to adhere to the modalities for inspections. The Executive Chairman briefed the Council on the incidents during informal Council consultations on 17 September. Before the consultations, Iraq's Permanent Representative to the United Nations characterized the incidents as regrettable but occasioned by logistical problems.

On 27 and 29 September and 1 October, inspection teams (UNSCOM 207) were prevented from inspecting three designated sites. In all cases, the teams were blocked en route to the sites, which Iraqi authorities claimed were "presidential/residential" sites and therefore out of bounds to UNSCOM. Despite the Chief Inspector's offer to apply the inspection modalities for sensitive sites and attempts made in telephone calls between the Executive Chairman and the Deputy Prime Minister to resolve the issue, the teams were not permitted to proceed. The three inspections were terminated as the prolonged delay had seriously compromised the credibility of any inspection that might have taken place. To the Executive Chairman's 1 October letter of protest against the abridgement of rights vested in UNSCOM under Council decisions, Iraq's Deputy Prime Minister replied that he was prepared to study the situation with the Executive Chairman to arrive at solutions that achieved a balance between UNSCOM's requirements and the need to respect Iraq's sovereignty, security and dignity.

Aerial operations

The April report of UNSCOM [S/1997/301] stated that various serious incidents had occurred in connection with its aerial operations: Iraq had attempted to exclude areas from overflight, had refused to provide landing rights and refuelling, and, on a number of occasions, had threatened the safety and integrity of the aircraft and their crews. Iraqi actions had included threats to shoot down the UNSCOM aircraft if it did not follow the route Iraq wished it to fly. Also, the accompanying Iraqi helicopter had flown dangerously close to the UNSCOM aircraft to force it to deviate from its planned route and Iraqi personnel on board had attempted to wrest control of the aircraft. Despite arrangements arrived at with Iraq's Deputy Prime Minister to rectify the situation, those actions continued to be repeated, as recorded in the UNSCOM October report [S/1997/774], which further noted that there had also been persistent attempts to prevent the aerial inspection team from conducting no-notice inspections.

Concurrently with the obstructions encountered by the inspection team on the ground in June, a series of four incidents occurred in which Iraqi personnel on board UNSCOM helicopters engaged in actions that obstructed UNSCOM inspections and endangered the security of the helicopters and the safety of the persons on board.

In a letter raising those incidents directly with the Council on 9 June [S/1997/455], the Executive Chairman reported that on 4 June, as the UNSCOM aircraft sought to orbit an inspection site, the Iraqi air personnel threatened to shut off the fuel pump and manhandled the Chief Air Inspector and UNSCOM photographer to prevent them from photographing the site, including the departure from it of two Iraqi helicopters. On 5 June, one of the Iraqi personnel, among other actions, grabbed the co-pilot's control, violently shaking it, leading the pilot immediately to abort the mission and return to base. On 7 June, an accompanying Iraqi helicopter placed itself in the path of the UNSCOM aircraft, causing the pilot to make a radical manoeuvre to avoid a dangerous situation. Subsequently, one of the Iraqi personnel on board, who stated that he was under orders to do whatever he could to stop the flight, interfered with the flight controls by placing his foot on the pilot's collective lever, resulting in a temporary deviation from controlled flight. The UNSCOM pilot thus aborted the mission and returned to base. Also on 7 June, the Iraqi escort helicopter flew alongside the UNSCOM helicopter in such a way that its main rotor overlapped that of the UNSCOM aircraft by some eight feet. When told by the UNSCOM crew to order the escort aircraft to move away, the Iraqi individual on board refused to do so, saying he had orders from Baghdad and was not prepared to guarantee the safety of the UNSCOM aircraft.

Those incidents, the Executive Chairman continued, appeared to have been motivated by a determination not to permit UNSCOM to operate its aircraft in the neighbourhood of areas considered by Iraq to be "sensitive" or "diplomatic" sites, despite the fact that those sites were under ground inspection where access was permitted. In response to the letter protesting the 4 June incident [S/1997/458, annex I] and demanding that no Iraqi personnel who had interfered with and threatened the safety of the UNSCOM flights should be permitted aboard any UNSCOM aircraft, Iraq's Deputy Prime Minister regretted the accusations based on a single incident among hundreds of flight operations, but nonetheless directed the Iraqi personnel concerned to be relieved of duties associated with the work of UNSCOM [S/1997/456]. To UNSCOM's protest against the second incident [S/1997/458, annex II], Iraq sought to justify the actions of the Iraqis involved [S/1997/457]. In both instances, the assurances and effective measures sought to prevent the recurrence of those incidents had not been forthcoming.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

The Security Council, having been briefed by the Executive Chairman on the situation with respect to the denials of access to sites and to persons for interviews, met on 13 June [meeting 3789]. Before it were the related letters (above) from the Executive Chairman to the Council and between him and Iraq. Following consultations among its members, the Council authorized its President to make the statement below [S/PRST/1997/33] on its behalf:

The Security Council takes note of the letters dated 9 and 11 June 1997 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission, the letter dated 5 June 1997 from the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq and the letter dated 6 June 1997 from the Under-Secretary of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Iraq. The Council expresses serious concern at the four incidents on 4, 5 and 7 June 1997 in which Iraqi personnel unacceptably interfered with helicopter flights operating in support of inspection of sites designated by the Special Commission under Council resolutions 687(1991), 707(1991) and 715(1991), endangering the helicopters and their crews, as well as persons on the ground.

The Council deplores these incidents and underlines the fact that Iraq must immediately take effective steps to put an end to all such actions. The Council reminds Iraq of its obligations under the relevant resolutions of the Council, in particular resolution 1060(1996). The Council affirms that Iraq is obliged to ensure the security of the personnel of the Special Commission and to permit the Commission to carry out its air operations anywhere in Iraq without interference of any kind in accordance with pertinent provisions of resolution 707(1991). The Council recalls the commitments contained in the joint statement of the Special Commission and Iraq of 22 June 1996.

The Council reiterates its continuing support to the Special Commission in its efforts to ensure the implementation of its mandate under the relevant resolutions of the Council.

On 13 September, during the combined chemical and biological inspection (UNSCOM 199/203), one of the UNSCOM helicopter personnel was again manhandled while attempting to photograph the unauthorized movement of Iraqi vehicles at a site designated for inspection. In accordance with UNSCOM's rights, the Executive Chairman instructed that the two Iraqi personnel who had been aboard the helicopter be forbidden from flying again on UNSCOM aircraft.

On 29 September, UNSCOM's Chief Aerial Inspector and a helicopter crew were not allowed to leave the Rasheed airbase, to which they had returned following their day's mission in support of a ground inspection. The detention was said to have been ordered on the grounds that they had taken photographs of sensitive sites. While the problem was ultimately resolved by telephone between the Executive Chairman and the Deputy Prime Minister, Iraq's actions clearly violated the right of UNSCOM personnel to move freely within Iraq.

During his visits to Baghdad, the Executive Chairman raised with the Deputy Prime Minister the right of UNSCOM to operate its aircraft throughout Iraq and to land at airfields of its choice. He proposed that, to obviate the long journey from Habbaniyah airfield to Baghdad, both upon the arrival and departure of inspection teams, UNSCOM should land its fixed-wing aircraft at Rasheed, which was much closer to BMVC and was where the helicopters were based. The Deputy Prime Minister rejected the proposal, saying that once he was enabled to fly from Rasheed to Amman, Jordan, UNSCOM would be permitted to use Rasheed for its fixed-wing aircraft. During his September visit to Baghdad, the Executive Chairman also conveyed IAEA's wish to fly the UNSCOM fixed-wing aircraft to Basrah International Airport to enable it to conduct an inspection in that area. Rejecting the proposal, the Deputy Prime Minister stated that that airport was closed because of the imposition of the "illegal no-fly zone". The Executive Chairman said those two unilaterally imposed limitations on UNSCOM and IAEA air operations were in direct violation of Council resolutions and decisions.

Compliance with Council resolution 1115(1997)

In accordance with paragraph 4 of Security Council resolution 1115(1997), the UNSCOM October report [S/1997/774] annexed a record of Iraq's compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of that resolution (see above).

Apart from the main instances of difficulties recorded above, the annex stated that Iraq had on occasion delayed granting access to designated inspection sites, concealed and destroyed documents, failed to abide by the modalities of sensitive-site inspection, attempted to conceal ongoing activities at sites under UNSCOM monitoring and delayed providing Iraqi counterparts. Those actions had not been specific to a single inspection team, site, type of site, investigation or time-frame; they had occurred in a wide range of contexts and each had either invalidated the site inspection or had cast serious doubt on the veracity of Iraqi declarations about the issues and sites under inspection. In addition, attempts to verify Iraqi declarations had been hampered by its failure to provide corroborative documentation and data. Also noted was Iraq's failure to introduce national legislative and administrative measures to implement section C of Council resolution 687(1991), resolution 707(1991) and the OMV plan.

The Executive Chairman stated that the failure needed to be evaluated in the context of the reporting period from 11 April to 11 October 1997, during which UNSCOM had conducted over 170 site inspections by visiting teams and over 700 site inspections by resident monitoring teams. He further stated that, to be fair, it was necessary to record that the majority of those inspections were conducted in Iraq without let or hindrance; progress had been achieved in the substantive areas, in particular in accounting for Iraq's proscribed long-range missiles and the destruction of chemical weapons-related equipment and materials; and the atmosphere in which consultations with Iraq had been conducted had improved and it had been possible to resolve a number of problems through direct contacts with the Deputy Prime Minister.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 23 October [meeting 3826], the Security Council, having considered the Executive Chairman's October report and its annexes, adopted resolution 1134(1997) by vote (10-0-5), based on a draft [S/1997/816] sponsored by Chile, Costa Rica, Japan, Poland, Portugal, the Republic of Korea, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States.

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions, in particular its resolutions 687(1991) of 3 April 1991, 707(1991) of 15 August 1991, 715(1991) of 11 October 1991, 1060(1996) of 12 June 1996 and 1115(1997) of 21 June 1997,

Having considered the report of the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission of 6 October 1997,

Expressing grave concern at the report of additional incidents since the adoption of resolution 1115(1997), in which access by the Special Commission inspection teams to sites in Iraq designated for inspection by the Commission was again denied by the Iraqi authorities,

Stressing the unacceptability of any attempts by Iraq to deny access to such sites,

Taking note of the progress nevertheless achieved by the Special Commission, as set out in the report of the Executive Chairman, towards the elimination of Iraq's programme of weapons of mass destruction,

Reaffirming its determination to ensure full compliance by Iraq with all its obligations under all previous relevant resolutions, and reiterating its demand that Iraq allow immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to the Special Commission to any site which the Commission wishes to inspect and, in particular, allow the Special Commission and its inspection teams to conduct both fixed-wing and helicopter flights throughout Iraq for all relevant purposes, including inspection, surveillance, aerial surveys, transportation and logistics without interferences of any kind and upon such terms and conditions as may be determined by the Special Commission, and to make use of their own aircraft and such airfields in Iraq as they may determine are most appropriate for the work of the Commission,

Recalling that in its resolution 1115(1997) the Council expressed its firm intention, unless the Special Commission has advised the Council that Iraq is in substantial compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of that resolution, to impose additional measures on those categories of Iraqi officials responsible for the non-compliance,

Reiterating the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Kuwait and Iraq,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Condemns the repeated refusal of the Iraqi authorities, as detailed in the report of the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission, to allow access to sites designated by the Special Commission, and especially Iraqi actions endangering the safety of Special Commission personnel, the removal and destruction of documents of interest to the Special Commission and interference with the freedom of movement of Special Commission personnel;

2. Decides that such refusals to cooperate constitute a flagrant violation of Security Council resolutions 687(1991), 707(1991), 715(1991) and 1060(1996), and notes that the Special Commission, in the report of the Executive Chairman, was unable to advise that Iraq was in substantial compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of resolution 1115(1997);

3. Demands that Iraq cooperate fully with the Special Commission in accordance with the relevant resolutions, which constitute the governing standard of Iraqi compliance;

4. Demands in particular that Iraq without delay allow the Special Commission inspection teams immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to any and all areas, facilities, equipment, records and means of transportation which they wish to inspect in accordance with the mandate of the Special Commission, as well as to officials and other persons under the authority of the Iraqi Government whom the Special Commission wishes to interview so that the Special Commission may fully discharge its mandate;

5. Requests the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission to include in all future consolidated progress reports prepared under resolution 1051(1996) an annex evaluating Iraq's compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of resolution 1115(1997);

6. Expresses the firm intention—if the Special Commission reports that Iraq is not in compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of resolution 1115(1997) or if the Special Commission does not advise the Council in the report of the Executive Chairman due on 11 April 1998 that Iraq is in compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of resolution 1115(1997)—to adopt measures which would oblige all States to prevent without delay the entry into or transit through their territories of all Iraqi officials and members of the Iraqi armed forces who are responsible for or participate in instances of non-compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of resolution 1115(1997), provided that the entry of a person into a particular State on a specified date may be authorized by the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661(1990), and provided that nothing in this paragraph shall oblige a State to refuse entry into its own territory to its own nationals or persons carrying out bona fide diplomatic assignments or missions;

7. Decides, on the basis of all incidents related to the implementation of paragraphs 2 and 3 of resolution 1115(1997), to begin to designate, in consultation with the Special Commission, individuals whose entry or transit would be prevented upon implementation of the measures set out in paragraph 6 above;

8. Decides also not to conduct the reviews provided for in paragraphs 21 and 28 of resolution 687(1991) until after the next consolidated progress report of the Special Commission, due on 11 April 1998, after which those reviews will resume in accordance with resolution 687(1991), beginning on 26 April 1998;

9. Reaffirms its full support for the authority of the Special Commission under its Executive Chairman to ensure the implementation of its mandate under the relevant resolutions of the Council;

10. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

VOTE ON RESOLUTION 1134(1997):

In favour: Chile, Costa Rica, Guinea-Bissau, Japan, Poland, Portugal, Republic of Korea, Sweden, United Kingdom, United States.

Against: None.

Abstain: China, Egypt, France, Kenya, Russian Federation.

Exclusion of US nationals and high-altitude aircraft from UNSCOM operations

Following adoption of the above resolution, Iraq, on 29 October [S/1997/829], wrote that the resolution reflected the imposition on the Council of United States policy against Iraq. It claimed that UNSCOM, with its large number of United States officials, inspectors and experts, was an instrument of that policy and the reason why UNSCOM had not submitted an objective report that would lead the Council to implement paragraph 22 of resolution 687(1991). Iraq further claimed that it had endured acts of injustice and abuse by such inspectors and experts, whose behaviour had become a threat to Iraq's national security. For those reasons, Iraq had decided to continue cooperating with UNSCOM provided that no United States nationals would be allowed to participate in any UNSCOM activities in Iraq, particularly inspections, interviews, and aerial and ground surveillance. Iraq moreover demanded that all United States nationals leave Iraq within seven days beginning at 1700 hours on 29 October (New York time). It also requested that UNSCOM withdraw the high-altitude aircraft from its aerial operations, reiterating its proposal for a replacement aircraft from a neutral State. Iraq declared its readiness to receive a specialized committee or committees from permanent Council members excepting the United States, to ascertain that Iraq was fully divested of its proscribed weapons, and, for that purpose and within the framework of respect for Iraq's sovereignty, security and dignity, its readiness to ensure access to all sites they wished to visit and to answer all relevant questions.

Appended to the letter were tables enumerating all items related to Iraq's missile, chemical, biological and nuclear weapons programmes that had been destroyed and lists of United States nationals associated with UNSCOM: 12 holding important positions at its headquarters in New York, 176 experts who worked at BMVC from August 1994 to 25 October 1997, and 555 experts who had participated in UNSCOM operations in Iraq from 15 May 1991 to 25 October 1997.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 29 October [meeting 3828], the Security Council, following consultations among its members on Iraq's letter, authorized its President to make the following statement [S/PRST/1997/49] on its behalf:

The Security Council has considered the letter dated 29 October 1997 from the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq to the President of the Security Council conveying the unacceptable decision of the Government of Iraq to seek to impose conditions on its co-operation with the Special Commission, thereby preventing the Special Commission from discharging its responsibilities under resolutions 687(1991), 699(1991), 707(1991), 715(1991), 1051(1996), 1060(1996), 1115(1997) and 1134(1997).

The Council recalls its demands in resolution 1134(1997) that Iraq cooperate fully with the Special Commission in accordance with the relevant resolutions, which constitute the governing standard of Iraqi compliance.

The Council condemns the decision of the Government of Iraq to try to dictate the terms of its compliance with its obligation to cooperate with the Special Commission. It demands that Iraq cooperate fully, in accordance with the relevant resolutions, without conditions or restrictions, with the Special Commission in the implementation of its mandate. The Council furthermore reminds the Government of Iraq of its responsibility for the safety and security of the Special Commission personnel and inspection teams.

The Council warns of the serious consequences of Iraq's failure to comply immediately and fully with its obligations under the relevant resolutions. The Council is determined to ensure rapid and full Iraqi compliance with the relevant resolutions and for that purpose will remain actively seized of the matter.

The Council's condemnation and warning notwithstanding, the Executive Chairman reported to the Council on 30 October [S/1997/830] that on that date two officers of UNSCOM and one of IAEA of United States nationality had been refused entry to Iraq. The three officials were thus instructed to return with the UN aircraft to Bahrain. The Executive Chairman observed that Iraq's action was taken some eight hours after the adoption of the Council's presidential statement and that Iraq's 29 October letter [S/1997/829] made no mention of action to prevent the entry into Iraq of UN officials of United States nationality prior to the expiration of the period specified.

A joint statement on Iraq [S/1997/846] issued following a meeting in Moscow on 1 November of the Foreign Ministers of France and the Russian Federation urgently called on Iraq to reverse its decision and expressed support for the Secretary-General's intention to send a special UN mission to Baghdad to urge that country to cooperate unconditionally with UNSCOM.

On 2 November [S/1997/836], the Executive Chairman informed the Council that Iraq again violated its obligations by refusing entry into the country of the same two UNSCOM personnel, who along with other non-United States UNSCOM personnel were seeking to return to their normal place of work at BMVC, in Baghdad. Both returned to the UNSCOM field office, together with an IAEA officer of United States nationality who was not blocked from entry but nevertheless returned to Bahrain, in conformity with IAEA's position that the two bodies charged with ensuring the elimination of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction be afforded the same treatment.

Iraq, also on 2 November [S/1997/837, annex], informed the Executive Chairman that the presence in Iraqi airspace of the UNSCOM high-altitude surveillance aircraft (described as an "American spying plane") could not be accepted. Iraq urged him to cancel that plane's overflights scheduled for 5 and 7 November, making clear that he would bear responsibility for the consequences that would ensue from a decision to send the aircraft into the country.

The Executive Chairman notified the Council on 3 November [S/1997/837], the first day on which inspections were attempted following the Council's receipt of Iraq's 29 October letter, that a missile inspection team was told on arrival at its designated inspection site that it could proceed but without its personnel of United States nationality. On his instructions, therefore, that team and two others (chemical and biological) still en route to their inspection sites terminated their missions. Characterizing as without foundation Iraq's suggestion that the U-2 high-altitude reconnaissance flights in support of UNSCOM inspections were flown on behalf of a Government, the Executive Chairman further advised the Council that he had authorized the next U-2 surveillance mission, scheduled between 5 and 7 November, and sent the standard notification to the Iraqi authorities on 31 October. He attached Iraq's 2 November letter implicitly threatening the safety of the aircraft. The Executive Chairman, on 4 November [S/1997/843], provided additional details of those aborted missions.

On 5 November [S/1997/848], the Executive Chairman informed the Council that he had postponed the U-2 mission, in compliance with a request from the Secretary-General, whose three personal envoys—Lakhdar Brahimi (Algeria), Emilio Cardenas (Argentina) and Gin Eliasson (Sweden)—would be delivering his message to the Iraqi authorities that UNSCOM's operations should be fully and unconditionally reinstated at the time the U-2 mission would be in progress. The Executive Chairman felt that, as the U-2 flights were an important and integral part of the process of inspection, monitoring and verification, which assumed even greater importance during the continued blockage of the ground inspections, he had decided to authorize resumption of the flights the following week and would so notify the Iraqi authorities.

Iraq's reply of 6 November [S/1997/864, annex] regretted the Executive Chairman's insistence in resuming the "spy plane" flights at a time when a dialogue was under way between Iraq and the Secretary-General and when Iraq had decided to postpone giving effect to its decision to deport the United States nationals working with UNSCOM. Iraq restated that the Executive Chairman would bear the consequences that would ensue from his decision to send the aircraft to Iraq.

On 5 November [S/1997/851], the Executive Chairman reported that the UNSCOM inspection teams had again been blocked and OMV inspections had not taken place for a week. The potential gravity of the situation was further underlined by the fact that significant pieces of dual-capable equipment subject to remote-camera monitoring had recently been moved out of the cameras' view without prior notification. He also reported that camera monitoring equipment had been tampered with, lenses covered and lighting turned off in the facilities under monitoring. UNSCOM was currently reviewing the images from all the cameras and would inspect two of the relevant facilities on 6 November to try to establish the whereabouts of the displaced dual-capable equipment.

Iraq admitted on 6 November [S/1997/855, annex] to removing to distant sites items of equipment that might be subjected to United States military attack. It gave assurances that they would be returned to their original locations, that their return would be authenticated by monitoring teams and that, in the meantime, they would not be used for any proscribed activity. Iraq also explained that the monitoring cameras had been damaged—not tampered with as claimed—by an explosion during a static testing of two rocket engines for a non-proscribed missile, of which Iraq had officially notified the BMVC missile monitoring group on the same date.

On 7 November [S/1997/864], the Executive Chairman reported that, on that day as well as the day before, BMVC inspection teams attempting to conduct inspections in the Baghdad area had again been blocked. The teams included one charged with changing cassettes in chemical air samplers at a site subject to monitoring. Were the blocking actions to continue, UNSCOM would be denied that additional means of detecting that Iraq was not engaged in prohibited activities, the Executive Chairman said, pointing out that some of Iraq's chemical sites had the capability of carrying out chemical warfare-related activities within a matter of days.

Following a flight over Iraq by the UNSCOM U-2 aircraft on 10 November, Iraq on that date [S/1997/867] stated that, on the basis of the violation of Iraq's airspace and sovereignty by the "U-2 spy plane" and several formations of United States warplanes, the U-2 was no longer to be considered, nominally or formally, as a means of inspection or monitoring. Iraq would act in regard to aircraft violating its airspace in such a way as to safeguard its sovereignty and security.

On 11 November [S/1997/873], Iraq drew to the Council's attention that, between 3 and 9 November, some 34 BMVC inspection teams had separately notified it of their intention to conduct inspections. While Iraq had indicated its readiness to lend full cooperation to ensure the success of their mission provided no United States nationals were among them, the teams had, on the instructions of the UNSCOM Executive Chairman, cancelled their intended inspections. Iraq wrote on 16 November [S/1997/8991] that subsequent inspection teams, between 9 and 12 November, had similarly cancelled their missions.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 12 November [meeting 3831], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1137(1997), based on a draft [S/1997/872] sponsored by Chile, Costa Rica, Japan, Poland, Portugal, the Republic of Korea, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States.

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 687(1991) of 3 April 1991, 707(1991) of 15 August 1991, 715(1991) of 11 October 1991, 1060(1996) of 12 June 1996, 1115(1997) of 21 June 1997 and 1134(1997) of 23 October 1997,

Taking note with grave concern of the letter dated 29 October 1997 from the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq to the President of the Security Council conveying the unacceptable decision of the Government of Iraq to seek to impose conditions on its cooperation with the Special Commission, of the letter dated 2 November 1997 from the Permanent Representative of Iraq to the United Nations to the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission which reiterated the unacceptable demand that the reconnaissance aircraft operating on behalf of the Special Commission be withdrawn from use and which implicitly threatened the safety of such aircraft, and of the letter dated 6 November 1997 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq to the President of the Security Council admitting that Iraq has moved dual-capable equipment which is subject to monitoring by the Special Commission,

Also taking note with grave concern of the letters dated 30 October and 2 November 1997 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission to the President of the Security Council advising that the Government of Iraq had denied entry to Iraq to two Special Commission officials on 30 October and 2 November 1997 on the grounds of their nationality, and of the letters dated 3, 4, 5 and 7 November 1997 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission to the President of the Security Council advising that the Government of Iraq had denied entry to sites designated for inspection by the Special Commission on 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7 November 1997 to Special Commission inspectors on the grounds of their nationality, as well as of the additional information in the letter dated 5 November 1997 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission addressed to the President of the Security Council that the Government of Iraq has moved significant pieces of dual-capable equipment subject to monitoring by the Special Commission and that monitoring cameras appear to have been tampered with or covered,

Welcoming the diplomatic initiatives, including that of the high-level mission of the Secretary-General, which have taken place in an effort to ensure that Iraq complies unconditionally with its obligations under the relevant resolutions,

Deeply concerned at the report of the high-level mission of the Secretary-General on the results of its meetings with the highest levels of the Government of Iraq,

Recalling that in its resolution 1115(1997) the Council expressed its firm intention, unless the Special Commission advised it that Iraq is in substantial compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of that resolution, to impose additional measures on those categories of Iraqi officials responsible for the non-compliance,

Recalling also that in its resolution 1134(1997) the Council reaffirmed its firm intention, if, inter alia, the Special Commission reports that Iraq is not in compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of resolution 1115(1997), to adopt measures which would oblige States to refuse the entry into or transit through their territories of all Iraqi officials and members of the Iraqi armed forces who are responsible for or participate in instances of non-compliance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of resolution 1115(1997),

Recalling further the statement of its President of 29 October 1997, in which the Council condemned the decision of the Government of Iraq to try to dictate the terms of its compliance with its obligation to cooperate with the Special Commission and warned of the serious consequences of Iraq's failure to comply immediately and fully and without conditions or restrictions with its obligations under the relevant resolutions,

Reiterating the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Kuwait and Iraq,

Determined to ensure immediate and full compliance without conditions or restrictions by Iraq with its obligations under the relevant resolutions,

Determining that this situation continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security,

Acting under Chapter VU of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Condemns the continued violations by Iraq of its obligations under the relevant resolutions to cooperate fully and unconditionally with the Special Commission in the fulfilment of its mandate, including its unacceptable decision of 29 October 1997 to seek to impose conditions on cooperation with the Special Commission, its refusal on 30 October and 2 November 1997 to allow entry to Iraq to two Special Commission officials on the grounds of their nationality, its denial of entry on 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7 November 1997 to sites designated by the Special Commission for inspection to Special Commission inspectors on the grounds of their nationality, its implicit threat to the safety of the reconnaissance aircraft operating on behalf of the Special Commission, its removal of significant pieces of dual-use equipment from their previous sites, and its tampering with monitoring cameras of the Special Commission;

2. Demands that the Government of Iraq rescind immediately its decision of 29 October 1997;

3. Demands also that Iraq cooperate fully and immediately and without conditions or restrictions with the Special Commission in accordance with the relevant resolutions, which constitute the governing standard of Iraqi compliance;

4. Decides, in accordance with paragraph 6 of resolution 1134(1997), that States shall without delay prevent the entry into or transit through their territories of all Iraqi officials and members of the Iraqi armed forces who were responsible for or participated in the instances of non-compliance detailed in paragraph 1 above, provided that the entry of a person into a particular State on a specified date may be authorized by the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661(1990) of 6 August 1990, and provided that nothing in this paragraph shall oblige a State to refuse entry into its own territory to its own nationals, or to persons carrying out bona fide diplomatic assignments, or missions approved by the Committee;

5. Decides also, in accordance with paragraph 7 of resolution 1134(1997), to designate in consultation with the Special Commission a list of individuals whose entry or transit will be prevented under the provisions of paragraph 4 above, and requests the Committee established by resolution 661(1990) to develop guidelines and procedures as appropriate for the implementation of the measures set out in paragraph 4 above and to transmit copies of those guidelines and procedures, as well as a list of the individuals designated, to all Member States;

6. Decides further that the provisions of paragraphs 4 and 5 above shall terminate one day after the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission reports to the Council that Iraq is allowing the Special Commission inspection teams immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to any and all areas, facilities, equipment, records and means of transportation which they wish to inspect in accordance with the mandate of the Special Commission, as well as to officials and other persons under the authority of the Iraqi Government whom the Special Commission wishes to interview so that the Special Commission may fully discharge its mandate;

7. Decides that the reviews provided for in paragraphs 21 and 28 of resolution 687(1991) shall resume in April 1998 in accordance with paragraph 8 of resolution 1134(1997), provided that the Government of Iraq shall have complied with paragraph 2 above;

8. Expresses its firm intention to take further measures as may be required for the implementation of the present resolution;

9. Reaffirms the responsibility of the Government of Iraq under the relevant resolutions to ensure the safety and security of the personnel and equipment of the Special Commission and its inspection teams;

10. Reaffirms also its full support for the authority of the Special Commission under its Executive Chairman to ensure the implementation of its mandate under the relevant resolutions of the Council;

11. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Expulsion of US nationals and withdrawal of UNSCOM and IAEA from Iraq

On 13 November [S/1997/883], the Executive Chairman transmitted to the Security Council Iraq's letter of the same date to the BMVC Director, stating that United States BMVC personnel should leave Iraq immediately via the Baghdad-Amman highway. The Chairman also transmitted his reply, advising of: the decision to remove from Iraq all UNSCOM inspection and monitoring staff, including those of United States nationality, with the exception of a small office staff under the Director; and of arrangements made for the UNSCOM aircraft to depart for Bahrain at 0800 hours on 14 November, with all UNSCOM personnel designated to leave Baghdad on board. The Chairman requested Iraq not to insist that UNSCOM personnel of United States nationality depart by road to Amman on 13 November and to accept his assurances that they would leave on the UNSCOM aircraft on 14 November. Since Iraq denied the request, eight United States inspectors drove from Iraq overnight to Jordan; as arranged, the remainder of the UNSCOM and IAEA inspectors were withdrawn on 14 November.

On 13 November, the Secretary-General conveyed to the Council Iraq's position [S/1997/888], as told to him by the Deputy Prime Minister before his departure from New York: Iraq's decision was that UNSCOM could continue its normal work with personnel other than United States nationals; if all the monitors were withdrawn, the Executive Chairman of UNSCOM would bear the responsibility. The Deputy Prime Minister gave his assurance that he did not want a confrontation with either the Council or UNSCOM. He said that if UNSCOM did not want to escalate the situation, he hoped it would conduct its work until a solution could be found through diplomatic means and reiterated that Iraq wished to continue contacts and a dialogue to that end. Iraq hoped to avoid a military confrontation and demanded that the U-2 flights cease.

The Security Council, on 14 November [S/1997/889], acknowledged the Executive Chairman's letter and welcomed his intention to present an assessment of the ability of UNSCOM, under the current circumstances, to perform its mandate, including his views on the need for an emergency meeting of UNSCOM.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On receipt of the foregoing letters, the Security Council met on 13 November [meeting 3832] and, following consultations among its members, authorized its President to make the statement below [S/PRST/1997/51] on the Council's behalf:

The Security Council condemns in the strongest terms the unacceptable decision of the Government of Iraq in expelling personnel of the Special Commission of a specified nationality and thereby imposing conditions on the Special Commission in contravention of relevant Security Council resolutions which constitute the governing standard of Iraqi compliance.

The Council demands the immediate and unequivocal revocation of this action, which has prevented the Special Commission from discharging its responsibilities under the relevant resolutions. The Council recalls the statement by its President of 29 October 1997, in which the Council warned of the serious consequences of Iraq's failure to comply immediately and fully and without conditions or restrictions with its obligations under the relevant resolutions. The Council further demands, in accordance with its resolution 1137(1997), that Iraq comply immediately and fully with its obligations under the relevant resolutions.

The Council expresses its support for the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency and stresses the importance of their ensuring the implementation of all aspects of their mandates, including their vital work in monitoring and verification in Iraq, in accordance with the relevant resolutions of the Council.

The Council stresses that the Government of Iraq has full responsibility for ensuring the safety and security of the personnel and equipment of the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency and their inspection teams.

Resumption of UNSCOM operations in Iraq

A joint declaration [S/1997/907] resulting from talks between the Russian Federation and Iraq (Moscow, 18-19 November) aimed at finding a diplomatic solution to the crisis stated that an agreement had been reached whereby Iraq would accept the return of UNSCOM, with its full complement of members, to resume work in Iraq as from 20 November. The Russian Federation would work, subject to Iraq's implementation of the relevant Security Council resolutions, for a speedy lifting of the sanctions against Iraq. To that end, it would take measures to enhance the effectiveness of UNSCOM while respecting Iraq's sovereignty and security.

A joint statement of 20 November [S/1997/909], issued by China, France, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States, underscored the importance of the efforts in solidarity of the five permanent Council members aimed at the unconditional and complete fulfilment by Iraq of all relevant Council resolutions, expressed appreciation for the Russian Federation's diplomatic initiative and hoped it would lead to the unconditional decision by the Iraqi leadership to accept the return of UNSCOM with its previous composition. The statement supported UNSCOM's intention to meet on 21 November in New York to discuss and advise on, among other important issues, ways to make its work more effective on the basis of the Council resolutions.

On 20 November, Iraq transmitted a statement of the same date [S/1997/908] by its Revolutionary Command Council containing a decision to issue an invitation to UNSCOM, with its full complement of members, to return to Iraq.

Emergency session of UNSCOM

In keeping with the Security Council's request, UNSCOM convened an emergency session on 21 November, at which its members considered each of the proscribed weapons areas (nuclear, missile, chemical, biological) described in section C of Council resolution 687(1991) and arrived at recommendations regarding each, as well as measures of a general nature designed to enhance the fulfilment of the mandates of UNSCOM and IAEA. The session's report [S/1997/922] was submitted to the Council on 22 November.

UNSCOM members recalled that the effectiveness and speed with which UNSCOM could accomplish its responsibilities were determined by the degree to which Iraq cooperated in disclosing the full extent and disposition of its proscribed programmes and in granting unimpeded access to sites, documents and records and to individuals required for interview. In that context, they took note of the return of UNSCOM and IAEA to Iraq on 21 November in their full composition. Noting further the importance of the contributions that Governments could make to the work of UNSCOM by providing not only experts, equipment and services but also information, the members suggested that the Council might wish to encourage Governments that were not already doing so to provide supplier information relevant to Iraq's proscribed programmes.

The members took note of the IAEA October report [S/1997/779] stating that, inter alia, there were no indications that any weapon-usable nuclear material remained in Iraq and that IAEA's OMV activities revealed no evidence of prohibited materials, equipment or activities. There remained five issues (see below, under "IAEA activities"), however, to which the Council might call on Iraq to respond promptly and fully. Were Iraq to comply and also cooperate in the use of fixed-wing aircraft within the country for monitoring purposes, IAEA would have a basis for an early favourable report to the Council. To enable IAEA fully to implement new technologies in its OMV activities, the Council might also recommend that Governments make available to IAEA the requisite technologies.

With respect to priority requirements in the area of proscribed missiles, the Council was urged to call on Iraq also to respond promptly and fully to UNSCOM's requests for an accounting of its indigenous production of proscribed missiles, including seven missiles claimed to have been for training, conventional warheads and warheads for biological and chemical agents, and major missile parts. UNSCOM noted that the accounting of warheads was significant, not only in the missile area but also in the chemical and biological weapons areas as warheads had been filled with chemical and biological agents.

Issues remaining to be solved in the chemical weapons area included, as indicated above, the accounting for special warheads (chemical and biological); the extent of efforts to produce and weaponize the VX chemical warfare agent; and the material balance of chemical munitions declared by Iraq as having been destroyed during the Gulf War, as well as of production equipment it had procured for chemical weapons purposes. To resolve those issues, UNSCOM would continue to utilize scientific seminars with Iraqi participation.

UNSCOM noted that the biological weapons area was where Iraq had most seriously and persistently disregarded its obligations to the United Nations. The paucity of progress was largely attributable to Iraq's denial, until June 1995, of the existence of a biological weapons programme. Iraq's biological FFCD submitted in September was not substantively different from previous versions found unacceptable and unsupported by verifiable evidence and documentation—findings that had been endorsed by an international panel of experts.

Further noted were the systematic concealment activities conducted by Iraq in proscribed weapons areas, which had a direct effect on UNSCOM's ability to fulfil its mandate. It was emphasized that immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access was absolutely fundamental to UNSCOM's ability to accomplish any of its tasks; that the provision of access was Iraq's responsibility, as called for by the Council; and that UNSCOM respected Iraq's legitimate national security, sovereignty and dignity concerns. Greater clarity in reconciling those rights and full practical application of the UNSCOM mandate should be sought by the Executive Chairman in early discussions with Iraqi authorities. In that connection, it was suggested that UNSCOM staff continue to document all instances of Iraqi efforts to frustrate their work by concealment, obstruction, restriction of access or other means, so that the Council could be kept informed.

A series of operational recommendations was put forward calling for: a review of additional equipment, including sensors, sensor-support and other items, which could facilitate inspection and could be requested from Governments; additional aircraft, to allow for more aerial surveillance including at night; and Governments to be encouraged to respond favourably to the Executive Chairman's requests for technically qualified inspectors. To enhance air operations, it was recommended that the Council should insist on the full implementation of UNSCOM's right to operate both fixed- and rotary-wing aircraft throughout Iraq and to land at airfields of its choice; that UNSCOM be allowed to have its fixed-wing operations based at Rasheed airbase, where its helicopters were already stationed, and to use its fixed-wing aircraft to transport inspection teams to Basrah International Airport and to other locations remote from Baghdad, to shorten the time for the conduct of inspections; and that the Executive Chairman and Iraq review further the modalities for the notification and conduct of air operations so as to simplify those modalities, for example, by using standard International Civil Aviation Organization flight plans, instead of the current system of "boxes" filed the night before a planned air operation.

Other recommendations, aimed at improving the effectiveness of the OMV regime, included: provision of monitoring experts by Governments; development of a uniform training programme at BMVC for all monitoring staff, supplemented with area-specific technical briefings, guidelines and procedures as appropriate; simplification of OMV formats and declarations; and improvement of the export/import monitoring mechanism through a training programme to be instituted at UNSCOM headquarters, with the participation of representatives of Governments likely to be engaged in extensive trade with Iraq, as well as through a modification of the OMV plan annexes to ensure that they required key technical information. Also recommended was a review of additional equipment requirements, such as laboratory equipment for BMVC and a video-editing and communications system for UNSCOM headquarters.

The members suggested that the Executive Chairman make clear in his next report to the Council the extent to which the temporary cessation of UNSCOM operations had set back its ability to complete its mandate.

Communication. Iraq wrote to the Council on 24 November [S/1997/925] that, since the summary presented by the United States-led expert group at the UNSCOM meeting of 21 November contained incorrect information on the progress made towards closing Iraq's missile, chemical and biological weapons files, it submitted detailed and extensive comments to set the record straight. In addition, it listed the 192 documents relating to those files which it had presented to UNSCOM.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

The Security Council met on 3 December [meeting 3838] to consider the report of UNSCOM on its emergency session. Following consultations among its members, the Council authorized the President to issue the following statement [S/PRST/1997/54] on its behalf:

The Security Council endorses the conclusions and recommendations of the report of the emergency session of the Special Commission aimed at full and expeditious implementation of the relevant resolutions and at increasing the efficiency and effectiveness of the work of the Commission to this end.

The Council reiterates its demand that Iraq fulfil all its obligations as set out in all the relevant resolutions, including resolution 1137(1997), and cooperate fully with the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency in the implementation of their respective mandates. The Council stresses that the effectiveness and speed with which the Special Commission may accomplish its responsibilities is, above all, determined by the degree to which the Government of Iraq cooperates in disclosing the full extent and disposition of its proscribed programmes and in granting the Commission unimpeded access to all sites, documents, records and individuals. The Council acknowledges the conclusion of the report of the emergency session of the Special Commission that the Commission respects the legitimate national security, sovereignty and dignity concerns of Iraq in the context of the need for full application of the mandate given to it by the Council.

The Council welcomes the progress achieved by the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency in various disarmament areas. The Council encourages intensified efforts, in line with the conclusions and recommendations of the emergency session of the Special Commission, in order to implement fully the mandates of the Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency in each of their respective disarmament areas. The Council acknowledges that, as Iraq complies with its obligations under the relevant resolutions, and the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency so report and the Council agrees, the Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency would make the transition from investigation to monitoring in their respective areas, expanding the use of the ongoing monitoring system functioning in Iraq.

The Council urges Member States to respond positively to the requests contained in the report of the emergency session of the Special Commission, in particular related to the provision of additional personnel, equipment and information required by the Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency for more efficient and effective implementation of their respective mandates.

The Council will remain seized of the matter and will consider whether additional action may be necessary.

Post-emergency session activities

Report of Executive Chairman (17 December).

In accordance with the wishes of the Security Council, the Executive Chairman of UNSCOM visited Baghdad from 12 to 16 December. He was accompanied by his Deputy, Charles Duelfer; three Commissioners, from France, the Russian Federation and the United Kingdom; and senior officers of UNSCOM's permanent staff. The Iraqi side, composed of Ministers and senior military and civilian officials responsible for Iraq's proscribed weapons programmes, was led by the Deputy Prime Minister, Tariq Aziz. The policy discussions focused on access to sites, documents and persons relevant to Iraq's programmes on weapons of mass destruction and related disarmament and OMV issues; and the technical discussions focused on subjects nominated by the Executive Chairman: missile warheads, the chemical agent VX, mustard-filled munitions and the overall area of biological weapons. The Chairman's report on his visit was transmitted to the Council on 17 December [S/1997/987].

At the policy meeting, the Executive Chairman stressed the great importance that the Council placed on Iraq's compliance with its requirement that UNSCOM should have unconditional access to all relevant sites, documents and persons in Iraq. He then made two points: the inspection modalities for sensitive sites had not worked and thus needed to be reviewed, as provided for in the modalities document; and Iraq had put some sites beyond the scope of those modalities—a serious matter that needed to be addressed. Reference was made to the Council's decision that Iraq had to allow unconditional access to any site UNSCOM wished to inspect and to the acknowledgement by the UNSCOM emergency session and the Council that UNSCOM respected Iraq's legitimate national security, sovereignty and dignity concerns.

Iraq replied that there were five categories of sites: normal sites—factories, sites belonging to the Military Industrialization Corporation, sites at which prohibited activities had or might have taken place, and military warehouses and camps—which could be inspected without restriction; national security sites—sites of the Republican Guard and the Special Republican Guard, sites of the military and civilian intelligence agencies, and security apparatus sites—all of which were of significance in terms of the security of the State and to which the modalities for the inspection of sensitive sites would apply, except for the most secret rooms therein, to which no access would be granted; presidential and sovereign sites—sites, offices and resorts at which the head of State resided and/or worked—which could not be inspected or overflowed under any circumstances; civilian sites and/or private residences, which could be inspected only if the owners granted permission, something Iraq would be reluctant to ask on UNSCOM's behalf as it had no legal authority to do so; and foreign sites—foreign properties or companies, diplomatic offices and residences, including Arab international organizations—with which UNSCOM would have to deal directly.

Asked whether Iraq might be prepared to accept special arrangements for inspection of presidential and sovereign sites, or to provide a list or map of such sites so that the magnitude of the exclusion could be seen, Mr. Aziz said no arrangements could cover Iraqi concerns with respect to that category of site. Iraq's position was absolute—a position twice affirmed at the meeting and justified by and in accordance with the 3 December presidential statement, which, he said, referred to respect for Iraq's national security, sovereignty and dignity. For the inspection of national security sites, Iraq accepted the following arrangements, which the Executive Chairman said should be tested shortly and reviewed in a month or so: UNSCOM would increase the size of entry teams (currently limited to four persons) in proportion to the site's complexity and size; Iraq would significantly reduce checkpoint and entry delays; and, immediately upon a site being declared sensitive, the Chief Inspector and the accompanying Iraqi minder could enter the site to make sure movement within it was frozen, for example, that documents were not burnt or destroyed.

Iraq made proposals with respect to the conduct of UNSCOM helicopter flights and again raised its proposal to replace the U-2 reconnaissance aircraft by Iraqi or other States' assets due to its perception of United States hostility towards Iraq. Iraq would discuss the issue of UNSCOM flying rights at the Chairman's next visit to Baghdad, in January 1998.

At the first technical meeting, Iraq read four statements, whose common element was that Iraq had destroyed and/or no longer had any weapons of mass destruction; disagreements on issues of substance should be settled at technical "seminars" with the participation of international and Iraqi experts. UNSCOM could then continue its normal work, with which Iraq would cooperate fully and in due course answer any questions put to it, but would not itself volunteer any new information, preferring a situation where it would verify information held by UNSCOM. In particular, Mr. Aziz said that, "for the public record", Iraq had made the decision in 1991 to deny and obliterate traces of its biological weapons programme, a decision he deemed justified on the grounds of national security and survival. He also said not one gram of either biological agents or biological weapons was in government hands or in Iraqi territory.

Having made clear that no arrangement that called into question the responsibility of UNSCOM to the Council, its professionalism or objectivity would be acceptable, the Executive Chairman proposed, and Iraq agreed, that, as part of the verification of specific issues, UNSCOM would conduct evaluation meetings on the following basis: the Executive Chairman would invite qualified and objective international experts chosen from countries with the necessary expertise to participate as part of the UNSCOM team; UNSCOM would prepare for the team a dossier containing all relevant information, which would also be made available to the Iraqi side to enable it to respond to questions; discussions would be conducted in an open and continuous manner to enable joint evaluation; and the UNSCOM team would advise the Executive Chairman on its findings for their incorporation in reports to the Council. It was then agreed that technical evaluation meetings would be scheduled for January 1998 on the priority issues of missile warheads and the chemical agent VX, and, as soon as practicable, the entire biological weapons programme.

At the second technical meeting, the Executive Chairman read a statement indicating that UNSCOM's preliminary findings confirmed that the items of dual-use equipment removed by Iraq without prior authorization had been returned to their original locations, and that UNSCOM had so far found no evidence either of proscribed activities at the locations or of any misuse of those items, except for one possible case, currently under investigation, within a chemical facility; UNSCOM would continue to determine if any misuse of equipment and materials under monitoring had occurred. The Executive Chairman requested that Iraq present a full, written clarification of the case within the chemical facility.

Iraq, commenting on 21 December [S/1997/996] on what it called the shortcomings and inaccuracies of the report above, stated that the presidential and sovereign sites, described as "not clearly defined", were in fact of clearly defined locations and boundaries; Iraq had not referred to "the most secret rooms" of the national security sites, but rather to one instance in June 1997 when Inspector Scott Ritter was denied access to a room at the Iraqi Intelligence Service headquarters containing the records of intelligence officers; Iraq's reservation about civilian sites concerned the citizen's right to allow entry or not into his private residence or premises. Iraq expressed its wish to present its own dossier for the technical seminars—which it would do through UNSCOM—but currently had no new information to offer; it had never remarked that it preferred a situation where it would verify information held by UNSCOM. That Iraq would not itself take part in the articulation of a specific programme of intensive work was a misrepresentation, since Iraq very much wanted to do the opposite.

Iraq further commented on some points made by the Executive Chairman to the Council on 18 December, among them that Iraqi television did not broadcast videotapes of the December meetings, showing only a few seconds of authorized segments without sound; and that his reference to "five" presidential and sovereign sites was inaccurate. What Iraq said was that such sites were located in governorates, but not in every part of the country as had been suggested.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

The Security Council met on 22 December [meeting 3844] with the Executive Chairman's report before it. Following consultations among its members, the Council authorized the President to make the statement below [S/PRST/1997/56] on its behalf:

The Security Council has considered the report of 17 December 1997 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission on his discussions with officials of the Government of Iraq, which took place in Baghdad from 12 to 16 December 1997.

The Council recalls all its relevant resolutions, including resolution 1137(1997) of 12 November 1997, and the statement by its President of 3 December 1997. The Council reiterates its demand that the Government of Iraq cooperate fully with the Special Commission in accordance with all relevant resolutions and that the Government of Iraq allow the Special Commission inspection teams immediate, unconditional access to any and all areas, facilities, equipment, records and means of transportation which they wish to inspect in accordance with the mandate of the Special Commission.

The Council stresses that failure by the Government of Iraq to provide the Special Commission with immediate, unconditional access to any site or category of sites is unacceptable and a clear violation of the relevant resolutions.

The Council expresses its full support for the Special Commission and its Executive Chairman, including in his ongoing discussions with officials of the Government of Iraq. The Council acknowledges that discussions are continuing on practical arrangements for implementation of all its relevant resolutions. The Council reiterates that the effectiveness and speed with which the Special Commission may accomplish its responsibilities is, above all, determined by the degree to which the Government of Iraq cooperates in disclosing the full extent and disposition of its proscribed programmes and in granting the Special Commission unimpeded access to all sites, documents, records and individuals. The Council calls upon the Government of Iraq to cooperate fully with the Special Commission in the implementation of its mandate.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter.

Further report of Executive Chairman. In a report [S/1998/332] that included an account of events following UNSCOM's resumption, on 21 November, of its operations in Iraq, the Executive Chairman recorded that, owing to Iraq's lack of cooperation, UNSCOM had had to undertake several inspections to try to establish the whereabouts of the items of dual-use equipment removed from their locations during the period when UNSCOM was unable to conduct monitoring. A 26 November inspection found that cables supplying power to the camera-monitoring system at an inspection site had been severed—the work, Iraq's National Monitoring Directorate said, of a psychopath. In addition, during a 22 December inspection (UNSCOM 218), Iraqi authorities violated arrangements for the conduct of sensitive site inspections by failing to provide immediate access, to prevent movement into and out of the site and to freeze the movement of personnel within once the team had begun its inspection.

Communication. In identical letters of 26 November to the Secretary-General and the Security Council [S/1997/933], Iraq transmitted a statement by the Revolutionary Command Council announcing Iraq's willingness to receive two diplomats or experts from each State represented in UNSCOM and five representatives from each Council member at presidential palaces and locations claimed by the United States as concealing chemical and biological weapons and materials. If they so wished, the visitors could stay a week or a month, at Iraq's expense, so that they might discover the true facts and expose the lies and fabrications that had been disseminated by United States officials.

IAEA activities

The International Atomic Energy Agency continued in 1997, through its Action Team, based at its headquarters in Vienna and aided by experts from Member States, to verify the accuracy and completeness of the current (third draft) FFCD of Iraq's clandestine nuclear weapons programme. Through its BMVC-based Nuclear Monitoring Group, with the assistance of and in full coordination with UNSCOM, IAEA continued the rigorous implementation of its plan for OMV of Iraq's compliance with Security Council resolutions. Monitoring activities were suspended between 30 October and 22 November, however, as a consequence of Iraq's action of 29 October (see above).

To improve the efficiency of its operations, the Action Team's computerized databases had been updated to include information obtained from inspections and from Iraq's declarations concerning materials and equipment used in its past nuclear weapons programme. The optical image databases were being expanded to include information on site plans, buildings and equipment routinely monitored. Progress had been made in the design and development of the prototype of a computerized export/import information system for use by the Action Team in the context of Council resolution 1051(1996) [YUN 1996, p. 218]. In addition, databases containing the text of Iraq's nuclear FFCDD and its annexes had been created to facilitate analysis of its completeness.

IAEA reports (April and October). Details of IAEA activities in Iraq were recorded in two reports: the first [S/1997/297] covered the period 1 October 1996 to 31 March 1997; the second [S/1997/779] covered the period 1 April to 30 September 1997. The second report contained an overview of IAEA activities regarding the identification and destruction, removal and rendering harmless of Iraq's capabilities related to nuclear weapons. It attached a description of the components of Iraq's clandestine nuclear programme; lists of the chronology of major events, of the main equipment, materials and buildings directly involved in that programme that had been destroyed and rendered harmless, and of the uranium and plutonium removed from Iraq under IAEA supervision; and a summary of IAEA inspection campaigns,

High-level talks

The Foreign Minister of Iraq met with the IAEA Director General, Hans Blix, in Vienna on 7 March principally to determine what matters remained to be cleared before IAEA would be in a position to report favourably to the Security Council regarding Iraq's fulfilment of its obligations under Council resolution 687(1991) [YUN 1991, p. 172]. The Foreign Minister emphasized Iraq's commitment to cooperating fully with IAEA so that all outstanding matters—which the Director General considered inappropriate to specify in detail—might be resolved as soon as possible.

The Director General discussed Iraq's commitments under resolutions 687(1991) and 707(1991) [YUN 1991, p. 188] to reaffirm unconditionally its obligations under the 1968 Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons (NPT) [YUN 1968, p. 17] and to comply fully with its safeguards agreement with IAEA. In that regard, he drew attention to the safeguards technical workshop to be held at IAEA headquarters from 12 to 15 May.

The Director General expressed grave concern about Iraq's obstruction of the right of IAEA and UNSCOM to operate fixed-wing aircraft in Iraq and encouraged the Foreign Minister to bring his influence to bear to resolve that issue without delay.

The Director General also made clear that IAEA's focus on OMV implementation did not foreclose its right to further investigate any aspects of Iraq's former nuclear weapons programme, based on information deriving from Iraq's declarations, IAEA inspection activities or other sources. The Foreign Minister pledged Iraq's cooperation in the resolution of any such matters.

Verification of nuclear weapons programme disclosure

As indicated in the IAEA reports, the 7 September 1996 (third) FFCDD of Iraq's clandestine nuclear weapons programme [YUN 1996, p. 222] underwent detailed examination in 1997 by IAEA with the aid of experts from Member States and was the subject of a series of technical meetings in Iraq between IAEA teams and their Iraqi counterparts in February, from 16 to 22 May, from 19 to 24 July and from 19 to 22 December. The February meetings discussed matters arising from IAEA's examination of the FFCDD; IAEA requested Iraq to provide a consolidated list of additions and revisions for further review and incorporation into the FFCDD text.

In addition, IAEA endeavoured to verify the declared burial of materials and equipment that had been destroyed, either as a direct result of the Gulf War or through Iraq's unilateral post-war action. It searched three principal burial sites to the south of Lake Tharthar where it recovered material and equipment originating from Iraq's past gaseous diffusion and gas centrifuge uranium-enrichment programmes. Initial assessment indicated that the number and nature of the items found were not inconsistent with the FFCDD statements, and, as also declared, the bulk of the recovered equipment had been destroyed. However, there was a large number of specialized corrosion-resistant valves that were in "as-new" condition; the Iraqi counterpart was asked about their origin and intended purpose. Similar excavation and recovery work was under way at the Tuwaitha site. Also in February, IAEA was successful in obtaining copies of official documentation recording the dissolution of Iraq's covert nuclear programme, code-named Petrochemical Project 3 (PC-3), and the redefinition of the missions of several establishments formerly associated with that project.

At the May meetings, Iraq was asked to include a description of the programme's practical and theoretical achievements, in particular the capabilities developed by the end of the programme. Discussions focused primarily on: the evolution of Iraq's strategy for the protection, concealment, salvaging and unilateral destruction of materials, equipment, documents and buildings related to the programme; the progress in the design and development of the Iraqi nuclear weapon subsequent to the version reported in PC-3 Report 821, Revision 5, dated 14 July 1990, as well as the post-Gulf War plan to misrepresent the mission of the Al Atheer nuclear weapons development and production facility; and the evolution of the abandonment of the programme.

The Iraqi counterpart undertook to use the input from the discussions to expand and correct the FFCD addenda describing the movement, concealment and unilateral destruction of materials, equipment, buildings and documentation. It agreed to provide further modifications to the text and to make a serious attempt to locate and make available: the equipment formerly assigned to departments 40B and 40G of PC-3 Group 4 (weaponization); PC-3 reports relating to indigenously produced uranium-melting furnaces and the study on the feasibility of falsely representing the Al Atheer weapons plant as a materials characterization centre; facility-specific inventories of materials and equipment handed over to and recovered from military authorities in connection with concealment and unilateral destruction activities; and data indicating the stage of development of weapons components at the time the programme was abandoned. The Iraqi counterpart was also asked to provide information regarding the Governmental Committee, which the counterpart earlier referred to in the discussions as having been established, inter alia, to "reduce the effect of NPT violation to the minimum".

At the July meetings, IAEA sought clarification of Iraq's written responses in partial fulfilment of the foregoing agreed actions and to ascertain that Iraq had abandoned, rather than merely interrupted, its clandestine nuclear programme; had provided full information on its gas centrifuge uranium-enrichment programme, nuclear weapon design and achievements in associated technologies; had explained the full extent of foreign assistance to its clandestine nuclear programme, including the role of intelligence services in procuring assistance, information, materials and equipment; had provided a comprehensive explanation of the extent and objectives of its concealment practices; and was no longer concealing equipment, materials and documentation from IAEA.

The Iraqi counterpart made available for IAEA inspection the items of equipment formerly assigned to PC-3 Group 4, which it had successfully located. While it reported no success in locating the requested PC-3 reports, it provided a verbal explanation of a report relating to the planned indigenous production of a uranium-melting furnace and expanded on its earlier explanation of a pamphlet that supported the misrepresentation of the Al Atheer facility. The counterpart further produced a 62-page computer printout detailing the items of material and equipment that had been handed over to the Special Guard in early 1991 and those subsequently recovered from the destruction, evacuation and storage sites (about 70 per cent of the total).

At the conclusion of the July meetings, IAEA identified some 15 technical matters of varying significance requiring action by the Iraqi counterpart.

By a letter of 1 August, IAEA notified the Iraqi counterpart that further information should be made available on five areas of concern: the development of Iraq's strategy for concealment and unilateral destruction of materials, equipment and documentation, including the role of the Governmental Committee; the extent of external assistance to the clandestine nuclear programme; the final achievements in the design of the nuclear weapon and associated technologies; the chronology of the abandonment of the programme; and post-ceasefire covert procurement activities. The letter included a reminder concerning the inclusion in the nuclear FFCD of a section describing the practical and theoretical achievements of the programme, with particular respect to the capabilities developed by the time of its reported abandonment.

The technical meetings yielded clarification of matters raised with the Iraqi counterpart. While containing little new information, Iraq's written statements—a series of 24 between 4 August and 16 September—provided a helpful collation of previously reviewed information. In one critical area, Iraq was able to give copies of correspondence which, if genuine, would provide strong corroboration of Iraq's description of the status, as at the end of 1990, of its work to develop explosive lenses. However, the Iraqi counterpart had not provided a comprehensive written statement on the membership, terms of reference and duration of authority of the Governmental Committee charged with, among other tasks, reducing the effect of NPT violation to the minimum; had stated that it had no further information regarding external assistance to its clandestine nuclear programme; had declared itself unable to describe the motives behind the actions ascribed to the late Lieutenant-General Hussein Kamel, former Minister of Industry and Military Industrialization [YUN 1995, p. 483], that resulted in the concealment of the cache of documentation, material and equipment "discovered" in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 222]; had declined to include in its FFCD a summary of the practical and theoretical achievements of Iraq's clandestine nuclear programme; and had yet to provide the promised written description of its post-Gulf War procurement system.

On 26 November, Iraq provided the Security Council with detailed written comments [S/1997/930] on those five items, concluding that they had been fully addressed by the Iraqi counterpart and that nothing of substance remained to delay the closure of the disarmament phase of the nuclear file. The IAEA Director General, on 3 December, presented to the Council, through the Secretary-General, a detailed explanation [S/1997/950] as to why IAEA considered that resolution of the five matters in question would provide further assurance that the technically coherent picture of Iraq's clandestine nuclear programme was comprehensive and that there were no activities outside that picture.

A further IAEA report [S/1998/312] indicated that those five outstanding matters were followed up at the December meetings. In addition, further discussions were held regarding the status of the design options for Iraq's planned nuclear weapons, access to Iraqi nuclear team reports to the head of PC-3, and the use by IAEA and UNSCOM of fixed-wing aircraft within Iraq for logistical and technical purposes.

As a result of those discussions, Iraq provided information regarding its post-Gulf War procurement procedures and the foreign principals involved in assisting its clandestine nuclear programme, as well as a statement that it had no objection to IAEA's use of fixed-wing aircraft for the purposes stated. Iraq agreed to produce a summary of the technical achievements of its clandestine nuclear programme and to issue a consolidated version of its nuclear FFCD. At the same time, Iraq reaffirmed that, following the Gulf War, the late Lieutenant-General Kamel had taken actions related to Iraq's clandestine nuclear programme that were independent, unauthorized and without the Government's knowledge; that Iraq had not followed any offers of foreign assistance to that programme other than the declared one to its centrifuge programme; and that the so-called Governmental Committee, initially described by the Iraqi counterpart as having been established in June 1991 and headed by Deputy Prime Minister Aziz, had not in fact been an established entity.

The IAEA report [S/1997/779] recorded that, although certain documentary evidence was missing and some gaps in knowledge remained, the following could be stated: there were no indications to suggest that Iraq was successful in its attempt to produce nuclear weapons; Iraq was at, or close to, the threshold of success in such areas as HEU (highly enriched uranium) production through the EMIS (electromagnetic isotope separation) process, the production and pilot cascading of single-cylinder sub-critical gas centrifuge machines, and the fabrication of the explosive package for a nuclear weapon; there were no indications to suggest that Iraq had produced more than a few grams of weapon-usable nuclear material (HEU or separated plutonium) through its indigenous processes, all of which had been removed from Iraq, or that it had otherwise acquired weapon-usable nuclear material; all of the safeguarded research reactor fuel, including the HEU fuel that Iraq had planned to divert to its "crash programme" [YUN 1995, p. 483], was verified and fully accounted for by IAEA and removed from Iraq; and there were no indications that there remained in Iraq any physical capability to produce amounts of weapon-usable nuclear material of any practical significance.

Iraq's description of its development of the single-cylinder sub-critical gas centrifuge was considered to be consistent with the resources and timescale indicated by available documentation and status of the related facilities. Although little documentation was available, it was clear that Iraq had intentions to exploit the information in its possession regarding multi-cylinder, super-critical centrifuge machines. It would be necessary to gain access to Iraq's foreign source of information in order to verify its explanation that only limited exploratory design-work had been undertaken.

No indications of significant discrepancies existed between the technically coherent picture of Iraq's past programme that had evolved and the information contained in Iraq's 7 September 1996 FFCD, as supplemented by the written revisions and additions provided by Iraq since then. However, taking into account the possibility, albeit remote, of undetected duplicate facilities or the existence of anomalous activities or facilities outside that technically coherent picture, no absolute assurances could be given with regard to the completeness of the document.

The report concluded that IAEA's investigation of Iraq's clandestine nuclear programme had reached a point of diminishing returns and IAEA was focusing most of its resources on implementing and strengthening its OMV plan for Iraq's compliance with its obligations under the relevant Council resolutions. IAEA was not "closing the books" on its investigation of that programme and would continue to exercise its right to investigate any aspect of it.

Ongoing monitoring and verification

During the period covered by the two IAEA reports, the Nuclear Monitoring Group conducted more than 450 monitoring inspections at some 181 sites, 39 of which had not been previously inspected. The majority of those inspections were carried out with no prior announcement and a number of them were conducted in cooperation with UNSCOM monitoring groups. No indication of prohibited equipment, materials or activities was detected during those inspections. Nonetheless, Iraq was still able to import technological equipment, recent examples of which included a plasma spray machine, a general purpose CNC milling machine and personal computer components having 1996-generation microprocessors. Importation was through trans-shipment via neighbouring countries, thus avoiding the identification of Iraq as the end-user. There was no indication of Iraqi attempts to disguise those imports. The plasma spray machine, which unambiguously conformed to the specification in annex 3 to the OMV plan and was imported prior to the 27 May 1996 entry into force of the import-export mechanism, was correctly included in Iraq's biannual declaration for the receiving facility.

The Monitoring Group continued to interview key personnel formerly employed in Iraq's clandestine nuclear weapons programme to clarify points regarding that programme and to verify the current assignments of such personnel.

IAEA and UNSCOM continued their joint programme of multidisciplinary inspections of "capable" sites—sites judged to have capabilities suitable for conducting work on some aspect of weapons of mass destruction—notwithstanding the lack of evidence or indication of such work. More than 40 such inspections, mostly IAEA-coordinated, were undertaken during the two reporting periods, all of which yielded no indication of prohibited equipment, materials or activities. Joint IAEA/UNSCOM investigations of procurement-related matters and document examination also continued.

Further progress was made regarding the content of Iraq's biannual declarations, submitted in January and July, on the current use of facilities, installations and sites, including those formerly involved in Iraq's covert nuclear programme, and on changes during the previous six months to the inventory and in the location of materials, equipment and radioisotopes identified in annexes 3 and 4 of the OMV plan. An evaluation of the year's declarations indicated that there was need for further improvements to their accuracy and completeness.

During the two reporting periods, the Iraqi National Monitoring Directorate submitted 43 requests for the release and relocation of equipment and materials or for a change in the use of monitored buildings, of which IAEA, in consultation with UNSCOM, approved 35. The items approved were to remain subject to monitoring at a frequency commensurate with their significance.

The ninth and tenth radiometric surveys of Iraq's main water bodies, conducted from 11 to 21 April and from 20 to 30 October, showed no indication of Iraq having carried out any proscribed nuclear activities.

The OMV plan, phased in during the period from November 1992 to August 1994, was predicated on the assumption that Iraq retained the capability to exploit, for nuclear weapons purposes, any materials or technology to which it might gain access. While the plan's implementation had not resulted in the detection of any indications of ongoing proscribed activities or the presence in Iraq of proscribed equipment or materials, apart from a relatively small number of items that had been identified and disposed of, it should be recognized that OMV measures could not guarantee detection of readily concealable or disguisable proscribed activities, such as computer-based weaponization studies or small-scale centrifuge cascade development. Iraq's direct acquisition of weapon-usable nuclear material would also present a severe technical challenge to the OMV measures; thus great reliance must be placed on international controls.

Export/import monitoring mechanism

The export/import monitoring mechanism, jointly administered by UNSCOM and IAEA, had, since October 1996, received notifications of some 50 transactions involving the intended export to Iraq of items identified in the annexes to the OMV plans of the two bodies. None involved items identified (as proscribed) in annex 3 of the IAEA plan.

National implementation measures

IAEA observed that Iraq had not by October advised of its enactment of penal laws to enforce the prohibition on all natural and legal persons under its jurisdiction or control from undertaking any activity prohibited for Iraq by relevant Security Council resolutions or by the IAEA OMV plan, as required pursuant to paragraph 34 of that plan.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

By resolution 52/11 of 12 November, the General Assembly commended the Director General of IAEA and his staff for their strenuous efforts to implement relevant Security Council resolutions and noted that progress continued to be made in the review of Iraq's FICD and that further progress had been made regarding the content and accuracy of Iraq's six-monthly declarations under the IAEA OMV plan. The Assembly noted with concern, however, that Iraq had still not provided the IAEA Action Team with all the information it had requested, deplored Iraq's obstruction of aircraft used by IAEA in February 1997 and called on Iraq to cooperate fully with the Team in meeting its requests for information and in achieving the complete implementation of the relevant Council resolutions and the OMV plan.

Suspension and resumption of activities

The Director General of IAEA informed the Security Council through the Secretary-General on 31 October [S/1997/833] that IAEA had suspended its monitoring activities in Iraq as of 29 October in immediate response to Iraq's letter to the Council on that date [S/1997/829] announcing, inter alia, that Iraq would not "deal with Americans working with the Special Commission".

The Director General continued that on 30 October, Garry Dillon, head of the IAEA Action Team for Iraq, sent notification to Iraq that he considered it inappropriate, under the circumstances, to proceed with his visit to Iraq, planned for 4 to 7 November. Iraq immediately responded that it found the decision not to proceed with the visit surprising and that the Government wished IAEA to continue its work normally and to perform all its planned functions; it further stated that all IAEA staff, inspectors and experts would be welcomed as usual and that there was no reason whatsoever to suspend any IAEA activities in Iraq.

It remained the Director General's view, however, that, in the specific context of the resolutions on Iraq, IAEA and UNSCOM acted as organs of the Council and contributed to a common objective. It was thus essential that IAEA and UNSCOM should have a common approach and for the time being IAEA would continue to suspend the practical implementation of its OMV plan. Mr. Dillon's visit to Iraq was thus deferred.

The Director General wrote on 14 November [S/1997/902] that notification was sent to the Iraqi authorities on the previous evening advising them that, under the prevailing circumstances, it had been decided to withdraw IAEA's Nuclear Monitoring Group from Iraq until further notice. Accordingly, the IAEA personnel departed on 14 November for Bahrain, where they would remain while steps were taken to resolve the immediate situation.

Following Iraq's decision of 20 November to invite all inspectors back to Iraq, the IAEA Acting Director General wrote on 21 November [S/1997/920] that he had instructed the Nuclear Monitoring Group, on standby in Bahrain, to return to Iraq and resume monitoring activities on 22 November.

The new Director General, Mohamed Elbaradei, reported on 3 December [S/1997/960] that, to restore the technical basis of those activities as quickly as possible, the Monitoring Group had been temporarily increased to 12 persons on 25 November and that, since then, more than 42 inspections at 40 locations had been carried out. All critical dual-use equipment known to have been serviceable prior to 29 October had been verified and accounted for. There were no indications that any such equipment was used for proscribed nuclear activities in the 23-day period during which monitoring activities were suspended.

IAEA inspectors witnessed the return to their original location of some 50 tons of high explosives removed by Iraq from bunkers at the Al Qa Qa'a facility and took measures to account for the original inventory of 228 tons stored in the bunkers. There were no indications that any of the material had been diverted. In addition, other IAEA personnel and Member State experts implemented previously planned tasks to service and upgrade the video surveillance systems at two facilities and carried out an extensive campaign for the collection of environmental samples.

Arms and related sanctions

Pursuant to paragraph 21 of its resolution 687(1991) [YUN 1991, p. 172], the Security Council, in informal consultations of the whole, conducted two reviews in 1997 of the sanctions provisions of paragraph 20 of that resolution on 3 March and 1 May. On 3 March, the Council concurrently conducted reviews of the sanctions regimes established in paragraphs 22 to 25 of resolution 687(1991), pursuant to paragraph 28 of the same resolution and to paragraph 6 of resolution 700(1991) [YUN 1991, p. 198]. No modification of the sanctions regime resulted from those reviews.

By resolution 1115(1997), the Council decided not to conduct the required 60-day reviews until after the second consolidated report of UNSCOM, due on 11 October. Thereafter, the Council, by resolutions 1134(1997) and 1137(1997), decided to resume the reviews in April 1998, conditional upon Iraq's compliance with the Council's demand that it immediately rescind its decision of 29 October 1997 (regarding the exclusion from UNSCOM and subsequent expulsion from Iraq of inspectors of United States nationality).

Communications. Between March and the end of the year, Iraq addressed a number of letters [S/1997/250, 261, 642, 898, 900, 934, 1025] to the Security Council and the Secretary-General on the question of sanctions and their adverse impact on the Iraqi population. The letters quoted excerpts from the testimony of UN officials, including excerpts from the Secretary-General's report on sanctions, which raised the ethical question of whether suffering inflicted on vulnerable groups in the target country was a legitimate means of exerting pressure on political leaders. Cited were statistics and attestations by UN bodies, humanitarian organizations and research centres regarding the deaths and suffering of the Iraqis, especially children, caused by the more than six years of sanctions. Iraq also referred to the inimical attitude of the United States and its efforts to maintain the sanctions.

Sanctions Committee activities

In its annual report adopted on 27 August 1997 [S/1997/672], the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661(1990) [YUN 1990, p. 192] (Sanctions Committee for Iraq) gave an account of its activities since its August 1996 report [YUN 1996, p. 224]. The current report provided details of all aspects of its work relating to: the implementation of Council resolution 986(1995) [YUN 1995, p. 475], which authorized the humanitarian programme for the Iraqi people; humanitarian exemptions to the sanctions regime established under resolution 661(1990) with respect to requests from humanitarian agencies, petroleum imports from Iraq, humanitarian flights to and from that country and aerial pest-control operations within it; Iraqi frozen assets and financial claims against Iraq; salvaging of sunken Iraqi vessels; and reported violations of the sanctions regime. Also summarized were the related monitoring and enforcement operations of the multinational interception force.

The report stated that the Committee had been confronted with a wide range of issues arising from the implementation of the mandatory measures imposed by the Council, particularly in relation to the complex arrangements under resolution 986(1995). While monitoring the implementation of the sanctions regime in all its aspects, the Committee continued to give high priority to the supply of essential humanitarian necessities for the civilian population of Iraq as provided for in resolutions 661(1990), 687(1991) and 986(1995). (For a detailed account of the Committee's implementation of resolution 986(1995) for the initial 180-day period, see below, under "Oil-for-food programme".)

With respect to humanitarian exemptions under resolution 661(1990), the Committee processed between 1 August 1996 and 31 July 1997 11,328 official communications, mostly concerning the supply of humanitarian goods to Iraq pursuant to paragraph 20 of resolution 687(1991). The Committee acknowledged receipt of 96 foodstuff notifications and took note of 178 voluntary notifications for medical supplies to Iraq. Under its no-objection procedure, the Committee processed 10,861 applications for the supply of other categories of goods to Iraq. Of that number, 5,203 requests for goods with an estimated value of $8.5 billion were approved, 424 were placed on hold pending further information and/or clarification and 5,234 were blocked.

The Committee approved a project sponsored by the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) for the rehabilitation of primary health-care services in the Baghdad and Qadissia governorates, advised the World Health Organization (WHO) that it would give priority treatment to any specific request relating to malaria control, considered a request from Turkey for petroleum imports from Iraq, and took note of a report it had requested from Jordan regarding that country's petroleum imports from Iraq during the past three years. It could not approve a Jordanian request for the authorization of one or more regular weekly flights between Amman and Baghdad to transport UN personnel and for humanitarian reasons, including pilgrimages, but would consider specific requests on a case-by-case basis. (See below for details concerning a 9 April pilgrimage flight from Iraq to Saudi Arabia.)

In July, following the fulfilment of certain conditions by UNDP, the Committee, in accordance with paragraph 20 of resolution 687(1991), authorized for the first time since the adoption of resolution 778(1992) [YUN 1992, p. 320] the use of some of Iraq's frozen assets held by the Bank of International Settlement for a UNDP project to rehabilitate water-supply facilities in the Basrah governorate. The Committee was unable to accede to a number of requests from Member States for compensation or settlement of outstanding commercial debts incurred by Iraq through the importation of goods originating from that country.

The Committee continued to defer consideration of a proposal from Turkey to salvage two Iraqi oil tankers and two Iraqi ships detained, respectively, in the ports of Noudahibou, Mauritania, and Misurata, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, as those vessels were regarded as environmental hazards. It informed the United Arab Emirates of its readiness to consider that country's request to salvage sunken ships and war debris from the Persian Gulf, provided that it furnished proof of agreement from the countries involved. As to Kuwait's concern about the resultant dangerous state of shipping in the Gulf, the Committee informed the Council that it had already approved several requests for salvage projects in the Gulf and stood ready to give sympathetic consideration to any new requests, but suggested that the International Maritime Organization be asked to look into the matter.

As a result of the Committee Chairman's representations to Iran regarding information provided by the multinational interception force alleging that country's complicity in the smuggling of Iraqi petroleum products through Iranian territorial waters in violation of the sanctions regime established by resolution 661(1990), Iran explained that some vessels carrying illegal goods and oil to and from Iraq had been using the Iranian flag and territorial waters without authorization, that some vessels with forged documents and manifests had been detained by Iran and that the results of its investigations would be made available to the Committee. The Committee took note of a communication from Jordan that the Jordanian company ALBA had been investigated on the basis of information received by the United Nations that it dealt with missile components, but no connection had been found between that company and Iraqi missiles or weapons of mass destruction.

During the reporting period, the Committee met 17 times in formal sessions, bringing the total number of meetings to 159 since its inception in 1990. It also held informal meetings at the expert level and continued to give oral briefings to interested delegations and the press on various aspects of its work.

In addition to its annual report, the Committee issued four other reports during 1997—one every 90 days—on the implementation of the arms and related sanctions against Iraq, in accordance with the guidelines [YUN 1991, p. 198] approved by Council resolution 700(1991) for facilitating full international implementation of resolution 687(1991). The reports were transmitted to the Council on 14 February [S/1997/141], 16 May [S/1997/374], 12 August [S/1997/637] and 3 December [S/1997/949].

In connection with those paragraphs of the guidelines relating to dual-use or multiple-use items, meant for civilian use but with potential for diversion or conversion to military use, the first report stated that the Committee's secretariat had consulted UNSCOM on arrangements relating to the implementation of Council resolution 1051(1996) [YUN 1996, p. 218] approving the export/import monitoring mechanism (see above, under UNSCOM and IAEA activities).

Each report indicated that, during the period under review, no State had brought to the Committee's attention any information relating to possible violations of the arms and related sanctions against Iraq committed by other States or foreign nationals; that no State or international organization had consulted the Committee on the question of whether certain items fell within the provisions of paragraph 24 of resolution 687(1991) or with respect to cases relating to dual-use or multiple-use items; and that no international organization had reported any relevant information requested under the guidelines.

Humanitarian (pilgrimage) flight

The Sanctions Committee [S/1997/672] reported that, as in previous years, Iraq on 3 February requested release of $50 million from its frozen assets in Bahrain, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates for pilgrimage purposes. On 21 February, the Committee decided to send a letter to Iraq along the established format, linking approval of the request to the readiness of the three Governments to make such a release, and transmitted to those Governments its response and Iraq's request.

At the request of the Security Council, the Committee met on 10 April to discuss whether an Iraqi flight of 9 April transporting pilgrims from Baghdad to Jeddah, Saudi Arabia, was in violation of Council resolutions 661(1990) and 670(1990). The UN Legal Counsel was invited to present comments on the issue. Since Committee members were unable to reach consensus on their understanding of the incident, the Committee authorized its Chairman to convey to the Council the views expressed at the meeting.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

The Security Council met on 16 April [meeting 3768] regarding the case and, after consultations among its members, authorized its President to make the statement below [S/PRST/1997/21] on its behalf:

The Security Council has considered the case of an Iraqi aircraft which flew from Baghdad, Iraq, to Jeddah, Saudi Arabia, on 9 April 1997 and then departed.

The Government of Iraq, in a letter dated 3 February 1997, had requested clearance from the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661(1990) for the release of 50 million dollars from the frozen Iraqi assets being held in Saudi Arabia, Bahrain and the United Arab Emirates to cover pilgrimage costs and requested the agreement of the Committee for flights by Iraqi Airways to transport those pilgrims to Jeddah, during the holy pilgrimage season.

The Committee answered in a letter dated 3 March 1997 that it would be in a better position to consider the release of the frozen Iraqi funds if a request was submitted by a country which was willing to release such funds to meet the pilgrimage costs.

The Government of Iraq proceeded with this particular flight without specific consultation with the Committee. Such consultation would have allowed the Committee to consider the matter and to determine whether the flight required Committee approval under the relevant resolutions.

The Council draws to the attention of Member States their obligations under resolutions 661 (1990), 670(1990) and other relevant resolutions.

The Council underlines its respect for the obligation of Muslims to perform the Hajj.

On 16 December, the Government of Saudi Arabia issued a statement [S/1997/981] indicating that, to facilitate the transport of pilgrims from Iraq, as well as from the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the schedule of pilgrimage flights would thenceforth be arranged by a third party, within the quotas set for those countries. Saudi Arabia pointed out that it could not prevent anyone wishing to make the Hajj or the Umra from visiting the holy places; it was, furthermore, incumbent upon it to facilitate the pilgrimages in conditions of safety and security. Saudi Arabia hoped that the authorities implementing Council resolutions 661(1990) and 670(1990) would not take any action to impede such pilgrimages.

Oil-for-food programme

In accordance with Security Council resolution 986(1995) [YUN 1995, p. 475], which authorized States to permit the import of up to $1 billion in Iraqi petroleum and petroleum products every 90 days, over an initial period of 180 days, as a temporary measure to finance, inter alia, a humanitarian programme for the Iraqi people (also known as the oil-for-food programme) [YUN 1996, p. 225], the Secretary-General and the Sanctions Committee for Iraq each submitted a report 90 days after entry into force of the resolution at 0001 hours eastern standard time on 10 December 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 231], and again before the end of the 180-day period on 7 June 1997. The reports described progress in implementing the arrangements specified by the resolution, taking account of the provisions of the 1996 Memorandum of Understanding between the UN Secretariat and the Government of Iraq [YUN 1996, p. 226] and of the 1996 procedures established by the Sanctions Committee [YUN 1996, p. 228] for the resolution's implementation. Also described was the distribution of humanitarian relief, on behalf of the Government of Iraq, in the three northern governorates of Arbil, Dihouk and Suleimaniyeh under the United Nations Inter-Agency Humanitarian Programme, to complement government distribution in central and southern Iraq and ensure equitable distribution to all segments of the Iraqi population.

Phase I

Reports of Secretary-General (March and June). The Secretary-General submitted his 90-day report [S/1997/206] on 10 March. Since by that date no consignment of humanitarian goods authorized under the resolution had reached Iraq, the report focused on the status, as at 3 March, of: preparations for the observation process, pre-implementation measures in the three northern governorates, the sale of Iraqi petroleum and petroleum products, the purchase of essential civilian supplies, and the funds received and disbursed from the escrow account established by the resolution.

Within the UN Secretariat, there had been extensive interdepartmental coordination to ensure that the exceptionally complex requirements of the resolution were met as effectively as possible. To strengthen coordination, the Secretary-General re-established the Steering Committee for the resolution's implementation, under the chairmanship of the Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs. On 28 February, he appointed Staffan de Mistura as United Nations Humanitarian Coordinator in Iraq to succeed Gualtiero Fulcheri, who concluded his assignment on 24 February. Under implementation were the recommendations of a December 1996 Secretariat mission to strengthen the United Nations Office of the Humanitarian Coordinator in Iraq (UNOHC). The Humanitarian Coordinator created an Inter-Agency Technical Working Group chaired by the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), which prepared six studies on: the implementation plan in northern Iraq; logistical arrangements; observation, reporting and assessment for central and southern Iraq; personnel, administrative and financial set-up; communications systems; and information dissemination.

The report detailed the responsibilities of the three tiers of separate but complementary observers from the UN agencies and from the Department of Humanitarian Affairs (DHA) that made up the UN observation mechanism in Iraq. The sectoral observers from the UN agencies would observe, at the national level, the distribution of the imported commodities in regard to their sectors and assess the effectiveness of the related distribution systems and the adequacy of supplies. The geographical observation unit in UNOHCI would collect and consolidate information concerning the delivery, storage and distribution of commodities at governorate and district levels. The multidisciplinary observation unit, composed of international experts in food logistics, public health, pharmaceuticals, hospital equipment, water and sanitation, agricultural inputs and machinery, animal health, plant protection, education and electricity, would increase the range of expertise available to the observation mechanism, maintain a tracking system for all imported supplies and report its analyses and recommendations directly to DHA. Overall responsibility for the observation process rested with DHA, which would review all reports received from UNOHCI and from the multidisciplinary observation unit. Only 84 UN observers of the 151 planned had been deployed.

In addition to tracking systems developed by the individual UN agencies, a unified tracking system, to function under the multidisciplinary observation unit, had been designed to identify the status and location of any given shipment.

The report outlined the responsibilities of and preparatory measures undertaken by the various UN bodies and agencies involved in observing the distribution of supplies for central and southern Iraq, including UNICEF, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), the World Food Programme (WFP) and WHO. UNDP, responsible for observing electricity distribution and the use of electricity generation and transmission equipment, was in discussions with government authorities regarding the baseline data required to support the observation process. Together with the Department for Development Support and Management Services, UNDP had completed work on initial observation criteria. Further outlined were measures undertaken by those same UN entities with respect to the three northern governorates. Included were a shelter and resettlement programme for those areas designed by the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat) (UNCHS) and a mine-clearing action plan finalized by DHA.

Also covered was the work of the four independent experts in international oil trade (oil overseers) appointed in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 228] to advise the Sanctions Committee on pricing mechanisms for petroleum sales and contract modifications submitted by Iraq and on other questions related to petroleum imports originating in that country. The overseers worked closely with the 14 independent oil monitors under contract with Saybolt Nederland BV [YUN 1996, p. 229] to observe oil loadings and transfers.

The report indicated the extent to which the Sanctions Committee had processed applications for humanitarian goods to Iraq and the steps it had taken to streamline its internal procedures. In accordance with the export/import monitoring mechanism, the Committee and UNSCOM coordinated procedures to scrutinize applications for items with potential dual-use capability. It also noted that the full complement of 32 independent inspection agents from Lloyd's Register Inspection Limited [YUN 1996, p. 229] to confirm the arrival of authorized goods at the agreed entry points had been deployed.

The report stated that loading of oil had started at Mina al-Bakr on 15 December 1996, with the first proceeds from the oil sales being deposited in escrow on 15 January 1997. Some 52.3 million barrels of oil, worth an estimated $1.07 billion, had been approved for sale. The first letters of credit for the supply of humanitarian goods were issued on 14 February. By 3 March, the United Nations Treasury had processed letters of credit for approximately $1 billion worth of petroleum and petroleum products. A total of $625,596,347.69 had been paid into the UN Iraq (escrow) Account and distributed in specific amounts for the purchase of humanitarian supplies for Iraq and for other purposes specified in paragraph 8 of resolution 986(1995).

In accordance with its obligations under resolution 986(1995) and the Memorandum of Understanding on the implementation of that resolution [YUN 1996, p. 226], Iraq had reaffirmed its commitment to guarantee to UN international staff unrestricted freedom of movement in connection with the performance of their functions, and had authorized their use of Habbaniyah airfield. Iraq had also agreed to the establishment by the United Nations of appropriate communications systems.

The Secretary-General drew to the Council's attention that the full ramifications of the highly complex arrangements set out in resolution 986(1995), specifically the time lag between the initial flow of oil and the actual delivery of food-stuffs, were only just becoming clear. He said the timing of the receipt of funds and the staggered payment schedule had a direct impact on the pace of implementation. He had thus directed the Secretariat and the Sanctions Committee to look for innovative and flexible approaches to overcome the constraints encountered. He was also taking steps to ensure adequate funding for DHA and the UN agencies, which were experiencing delays in procuring equipment and deploying personnel. He pointed out that the amount available for operational and administrative expenses was very limited due to the staggered receipt of funds and the procedures established for their simultaneous distribution to the subsidiary accounts of the UN Iraq Account.

The Secretary-General stated that, despite additional measures to expedite approval of the related contracts, delivery and distribution of all the humanitarian goods in Iraq's distribution plan within the initial 180 days appeared unlikely. Iraq's Foreign Minister, who met with the Secretary-General on 5 March, reaffirmed his Government's commitment to cooperate with the United Nations in implementing all provisions of resolution 986(1995) and the Memorandum of Understanding, but also conveyed his Government's serious concern that it would not be in a position to arrange for the simultaneous distribution of all food items as envisaged in the distribution plan.

On 2 June, the Secretary-General submitted his second report [S/1997/419] for the initial 180 days, according to which there had been notable progress in implementing resolution 986(1995). The report brought up to date information on the sale of petroleum and petroleum products, on the processing of applications by the Sanctions Committee, and on the status of the UN Iraq Account, together with the distribution of revenues as at 28 May. It described the Government's distribution system in central and southern Iraq and the implementation by the United Nations Inter-Agency Humanitarian Programme in the three northern governorates, together with the corresponding activities of the UN observation mechanism, and noted the considerable progress achieved in setting up the administrative and logistical support for the humanitarian operation. The report also set forth observations on the efficiency, equitability and adequacy of the operation in all its aspects.

Annexed to the report were: a summary of food commodity arrivals in Iraq as at 28 May; food commodity arrivals, distribution and stock levels expressed in tons in each of the 18 governorates; and the number of observations undertaken by the geographical and sectoral observers from 20 March to 30 May.

The report stated that the Steering Committee, chaired by the Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs, met periodically to ensure proper coordination and efficient use of staff and resources. At the Sanctions Committee's request and in consultation with Iraqi authorities, DHA drew up lists indicating the relative priority of different applications for humanitarian supplies and facilitated the approval of UN agency applications. Senior Secretariat officials regularly briefed the Sanctions Committee on the progress of implementation. Responsibility for administrative and logistical support to UNOCHI was entrusted to the Field Administration and Logistics Division.

On 22 May, the Under-Secretary-General briefed the Security Council on his visit to Iraq (3-9 May) to assess implementation progress throughout the country. Responding to concerns raised by Iraq and the UN agencies about delays in the arrival of humanitarian goods and potential disruptions in food distribution, he referred to the Secretariat's constant efforts to improve the handling of applications, regarding which Iraq advanced a number of proposals.

The report stated that, based on the overseers' and inspection agents' assessment, Iraq had the capacity to export sufficient quantities of petroleum and petroleum products to meet the revenue target of $1 billion every 90 days and noted the steps taken by the Sanctions Committee for the expeditious processing of contracts. As at 28 May, the United Nations Treasury had processed letters of credit for approximately $2.11 billion worth of petroleum. Proceeds amounting to $1,747,405,752.62 had been deposited into the UN Iraq Account and letters of credit amounting to $465.9 million had been issued on behalf of the United Nations for the payment of humanitarian supplies destined for the whole of Iraq.

The distribution of the funds received and related expenditures were as follows: $878.4 million for the purchase of humanitarian supplies by Iraq, against recorded contract expenditures of $572 million; $215.4 million for similar purchases for distribution in the three northern governorates by the United Nations Inter-Agency Humanitarian Programme on behalf of Iraq, against recorded contract expenditures of $49.4 million; $497.2 million transferred directly to the United Nations Compensation Fund, of which $151.3 million was for the payment of the first instalment of "A" and "C" claims ($144 million) and for the operating expenses of the United Nations Compensation Commission ($7.3 million); $36.5 million for all related UN operational and administrative expenses, against expenses of $20.3 million; $13.3 million for the operating requirements of UNSCOM; $90 million to cover transportation costs for petroleum and petroleum products originating in Iraq and exported via Turkey; $16.6 million transferred directly to the escrow account established under Security Council resolutions 706(1991) [YUN 1991, p. 207] and 712(1991) [YUN 1991, p. 209] for the payments envisaged under resolution 778(1992) [YUN 1992, p. 320].

Describing Iraq's implementation of its distribution plan, submitted and approved in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 229], the report noted that, by April, wheat, supplemented by 40,000 tons of wheat from government stocks, had been milled and made available in sufficient quantities for nationwide distribution of the flour ration. The arrival by the end of May of 691,648 tons of food, soap and detergent enabled the distribution of pulses, rice, cooking oil, detergent powder, soap and infant formula for children under one year. The first delivery of medical supplies consisting of a small quantity of intravenous solution arrived on 9 May and was distributed to hospitals in all governorates. Limited amounts of medical equipment also had arrived by 27 May.

In the three northern governorates, ration cards were distributed to families through food agents in April. Preliminary estimates put the total population in the area as at 20 May at 3,081,833.

Under the observation mechanism, 132 UN international observers had been deployed in central and southern Iraq: 61 geographical, 14 multidisciplinary and 57 sectoral observers. Some 41 geographical observers were fielded daily in pairs to work on a tour of five days in Baghdad and surrounding governorates, followed by a longer tour of 12 days in the more distant governorates. Rotating teams of geographical observers operated from Basrah, Mawsil and Kirkuk. WFP daily fielded 22 international observers assisted by 150 local staff in each of the 15 central and southern governorates, in teams of one or two international observers and 10 local assistants. From 20 March, when food commodities began to arrive in Iraq, until 30 May, geographical observers had conducted a total of 5,280 visits in the central and southern governorates.

In the three northern governorates, 15 UN observers had been deployed: 3 geographical and 12 sectoral observers. Three WFP international observers and 80 national staff were fielded daily. DHA had entered into an arrangement with the United Nations Office for Project Services for the implementation of the action plan for a mine-clearing programme, for which $2.5 million had been allocated, and five international staff were under recruitment. UNICEF would implement the programme's mine-awareness component.

Shelter and resettlement activities had started with the planning of infrastructure and rehabilitation projects, particularly in support of internally displaced persons. Of $12 million allocated for the purpose, UNCHS had received $3,140,000 for the procurement of materials and services.

Over the past three months, UN personnel had enjoyed the requisite freedom of movement. All staff were granted visas, and identity cards permitting unrestricted travel throughout the country had been issued to all observers and other staff involved in implementing resolution 986 (1995). The overall security situation for UN personnel and their operations in the 15 central and southern governorates was described as stable.

Through sustained liaison, UN observers had been granted satisfactory access to relevant information and to Iraqi officials. As to relations with government facilitators, a number of complaints had been resolved to the satisfaction of the United Nations and the Government. Progress had also been achieved in the logistics for the humanitarian operation.

The report observed that the only sector represented in sufficient quantities to assess whether equitable distribution had taken place had been food and related items. With minor exceptions resulting from normal handling losses and packaging damages, the commodities had been transported efficiently throughout the country. Since 20 March, UN observers had detected no significant or unacceptable losses during the handling and processing of resolution 986(1995) commodities.

Sufficient observations at the governorate level were carried out during April and May to indicate that the distribution system was bringing available commodities equitably to all governorates. According to WFP, virtually no governorate appeared to have received significantly less of any single commodity. Registered beneficiaries had received their rations. While no major discrepancies had been reported in the central and southern governorates, a few cases of irregularities had been reported in the three northern governorates, including double registration, inaccurate scales and extra fees charged by some food agents.

UN nutritionists concluded that the current food ration provided food and nutrient supply at basic survival level: 2,030 calories, compared with a desirable minimum of not less than 2,500 calories per capita per day. Since iron deficiency was a public health concern, there was scope further to improve the nutritional status of expectant women and children through iron-fortified flour. But even if the ration were upgraded to provide 2,500 calories a day, there might be little real impact on nutritional status until health services, sanitation and access to clean water were significantly improved.

Assessment of the adequacy of medicines and other medical supplies was hampered by their slow and partial arrival. According to the Ministry of Health, no more than 4 per cent of the medicines needed had been available in the past five months. Although the non-arrival to date of supplies for the water, sanitation, agriculture, education and electricity sectors made it impossible to comment from observation on their adequacy, UN agencies stressed that the distribution plan's allocations were not sufficient to meet the basic needs of their relevant sectors. The agencies highlighted urgent needs not covered in the current distribution plan.

The Secretary-General observed that the humanitarian programme authorized by Council resolution 986(1995) was unique among all UN humanitarian operations in that its aim was to mitigate the negative effects of sanctions imposed on the recipient country.

While every effort was made to anticipate potential problems in the process leading to the conclusion of the Memorandum of Understanding under which the programme was being executed, the complicated nature of the programme, including its managerial, administrative and financial aspects, led to a number of difficulties and delays in the initial stages of its implementation. Although the Secretary-General was pleased that the Secretariat and the participating UN agencies had been able to overcome most of those difficulties, he was troubled by persistent lags encountered in processing applications that had resulted in major delays in providing several items, in particular medicine and pharmaceutical supplies.

In the light of experience gained so far and bearing in mind the continuing humanitarian crisis in Iraq, the Secretary-General recommended renewal of the programme for a further period of six months.

Sanctions Committee reports (March and May). The 90-day report of the Sanctions Committee, submitted on 11 March [S/1997/213], stated that the export of petroleum from Iraq had proceeded satisfactorily in accordance with resolution 986(1995), the Memorandum of Understanding and the procedures of the Committee, due in large measure to the consultations with and cooperation of all parties concerned, including the Iraqi State Oil Marketing Organization (SOMO), the national oil purchasers and the Saybolt oil monitors.

In close coordination with the Secretary-General, the Committee developed expedited procedures as necessary to implement the arrangements specified by resolution 986(1995). Since their appointment in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 228], the four oil overseers had worked closely with SOMO on pricing mechanisms and on addressing unanticipated changes in prices and destinations. Based on their recommendations, the Committee approved the pricing mechanisms for loadings of crude oil in December 1996 under its no-objection procedure. The Committee had since also approved updated pricing mechanisms for loadings in January, February and March 1997, as well as further adjustments to two of those pricing mechanisms.

As of 10 March, a total of 38 term contracts had been submitted to the overseers for their review, of which 37 were approved. The quantity of oil for export under those contracts amounted to approximately 51.6 million barrels. Forty-six loadings, totalling 48.2 million barrels, with an estimated value of $976.9 million, had been completed. Owing to a sharp decline in prices in February, spot contracts using the approved pricing mechanisms, as well as advances of customer liftings from the second to the first quarter, were concluded by SOMO and approved by the overseers so as to achieve the 90-day revenue objective of $1.07 billion. To maximize the revenue for oil delivered through 9 March without exceeding the limit of $1.07 billion, the Committee approved the overseers' proposal to carry over small revenue shortfalls or surpluses from the first 90-day period to the second. The overseers reported to the Committee weekly on the contracts scrutinized and on the cumulative quantity and approximate value of petroleum authorized for export.

While the Committee had at the outset attached priority to processing applications for supplying humanitarian goods to Iraq, it had been constrained by a number of factors, including the availability of funds in the UN Iraq Account. Thus, it had been able to review only a limited number of applications. By 10 March, 308 applications had been received. Of 37 applications processed under the Committee's no-objection procedure, 15 were authorized, with a total value of $ 153 million; the remaining 22 were placed on hold.

Also before the Committee was a request from Iraq for priority treatment of certain applications for shipments of cooking oil, sugar, plastic bags and toilet soap. While DHA viewed the request to be in keeping with the distribution plan and would expedite distribution of a complete food basket to the entire Iraqi population, the matter remained to be resolved pending further discussion among the parties concerned.

To expedite the processing of contract applications for humanitarian supplies, the Committee on 5 March adopted a set of points of understanding. Applications would continue to be processed on a first-come-first-served basis, unless processing on a case-by-case basis was decided upon. Funds allocated to applications blocked under the no-objection procedure would be freed immediately, while funds allocated to those placed on hold would be freed five working days after the no-objection deadline, so that those funds might be used for applications that followed in sequence; upon removal of such blocks and holds, the applications concerned would have immediate allocation priority. A separate status list on processed applications would be prepared weekly by the Secretariat for circulation to the Committee, which would deal with it in the same way as the lists prepared under resolution 661(1990) [YUN 1990, p. 192], i.e., blocks recorded on the list would become official upon adoption of the list by the Committee. Applications pre-examined by Secretariat experts but not processed for lack of funds would be made available with the experts' comments to the Committee for pre-screening and official processing once the required funds became available.

Other matters before the Committee were several requests from Turkey, one for the transfer to it of $46,286,616.44 in transportation costs during the first 90 days of Iraqi oil exportation; and two others, for shipments of parts and equipment required for pipeline repair and maintenance. The Committee approved one request provided the parts and equipment remained in Turkey until they were needed in Iraq. It deferred consideration of the second until completion of immediate repair work on the pipeline.

On 30 May, shortly before the end of the initial 180-period, the Sanctions Committee submitted its second report [S/1997/417], according to which approval of oil contracts continued to proceed smoothly with excellent cooperation among the overseers, national oil purchasers and SOMO, although some practical difficulties continued to be encountered. Humanitarian supplies had started arriving in Iraq and the urgent humanitarian needs of the Iraqi civilian population were being met.

As at 30 May, 217 national oil purchasers from 39 countries, authorized to communicate directly with the overseers, had been nominated. A total of 51 contracts had been approved. The quantity of oil approved for export under those contracts amounted to approximately 121 million barrels at an estimated value of $2.16 billion. Because of the market's volatility, the oil overseers monitored price fluctuations together with the contract volumes remaining for the second 90-day period, as well as the schedule and volume of individual liftings, in order to maximize the revenue for oil delivered through 7 June 1997 without exceeding the 180-day revenue objective of $2.14 billion, including the pipeline fee.

For the second 90 days, the overseers recommended to the Committee three sets of updated pricing mechanisms for loadings in March, April and May submitted by SOMO; all new contracts submitted during the period employed Committee-approved pricing mechanisms. By 30 May, some 114 loadings, totalling 119.5 million barrels, with an estimated value of $2.16 billion had been completed. The letters of credit opened for each of the loadings were confirmed by the overseers.

The overseers had so far submitted 23 weekly reports to the Committee. The Saybolt independent inspection agents continued to monitor the oil export loadings from Iraq. A Saybolt representative who briefed the Committee on 20 May described the oil monitoring operation as effective and smooth, adding that the monitors had enjoyed the full cooperation of the Iraqi and Turkish authorities.

In April, the Committee approved a list of certain items, drawn up with the assistance of DHA and WHO, to be dealt with on a priority basis. It adopted a second set of points of understanding to allow it to process applications based on anticipated revenues as determined by the issuance of an irrevocable letter of credit for oil shipments and confirmation of lifting of oil cargoes. In May, the Committee adopted a third set of points of understanding: the Secretariat would circulate for the Committee's consideration all contracts meeting the requirements of its procedures; incomplete applications would not be circulated until clarification was obtained from the applicant State and the Permanent Mission of Iraq to the United Nations; the Secretariat would process all incoming applications within two business days if possible; if a contract was put on hold, the delegations concerned should indicate to the Secretariat the specific reasons to enable quick resolution; and the Secretariat should obtain additional resources to support processing as necessary.

As at 30 May, the Secretariat had received 630 applications, 24 of which were subsequently cancelled. Of the 574 circulated to the Committee for action, 331 totalling approximately $816 million were approved and 191 were placed on hold. Of the remaining 52, 14 were blocked and 38 were awaiting Committee action.

As to the authentication of the arrival in Iraq of humanitarian supplies by the independent Lloyd's inspection agents, a Lloyd's representative, at a Committee meeting in May, gave an overview of the agents' activities, adding that co-operation with Iraqi authorities had been excellent. As at 30 May, 44 consignments of humanitarian supplies had been confirmed as having arrived in Iraq in total or in partial shipments.

With respect to Turkey's requests mentioned in the Committee's March report, Turkey, at the Committee's suggestion, submitted an amendment to the contract between SOMO and the Turkish Petroleum Refineries Corporation providing for the transfer to Turkey of the $46,286,616.44 in oil transportation fees. The Committee approved the requested transfer on the understanding that it would take place only after proceeds from oil sales to cover the fees in question had been deposited in the UN Iraq Account and deductions for the Compensation Fund had been made. Also on the Committee's suggestion, Turkey submitted a detailed export contract on its request for parts and equipment for pipeline repairs in Iraq.

Communications. By a series of communications between 25 April and 25 May [S/1997/338, 377, 382, 401 & Corr.1, 402, 403], Iraq requested the Secretary-General to intervene urgently in the processing of priority contract applications before the Sanctions Committee and to prevail upon the United States to desist from deliberately hindering their approval or from blocking or putting holds on them without justification or for groundless reasons and regardless of clarifications presented by the applicant State and Iraq. The applications blocked or placed on hold, numbering 182 by 20 May, were for foodstuffs, medicines and other health supplies, emergency vehicles and a contract for a malaria-control insecticide. Iraq accused the United States of using the Sanctions Committee as a tool for what it described as its irresponsible policy towards Iraq.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

The Security Council met on 4 June [meeting 3786] to consider the second reports of the Secretary-General and the Sanctions Committee for Iraq. At that meeting it unanimously adopted resolution 1111(1997), based on a draft [S/1997/428] prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous resolutions and, in particular, resolution 986(1995) of 14 April 1995,

Convinced of the need as a temporary measure to continue to provide for the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people until the fulfilment by Iraq of the relevant Security Council resolutions, including notably resolution 687(1991) of 3 April 1991, allows the Council to take further action with regard to the prohibitions referred to in resolution 661(1990) of 6 August 1990, in accordance with the provisions of those resolutions,

Determined to avoid any further deterioration of the current humanitarian situation,

Convinced also of the need for equitable distribution of humanitarian relief to all segments of the Iraqi population throughout the country,

Welcoming the report submitted by the Secretary-General in accordance with paragraph 11 of resolution 986(1995), as well as the report submitted in accordance with paragraph 12 of resolution 986(1995) by the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661(1990),

Reaffirming the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides that the provisions of resolution 986(1995), except those contained in paragraphs 4, 11 and 12, shall remain in force for another period of 180 days beginning at 0001 hours eastern daylight time on 8 June 1997;

2. Also decides to conduct a thorough review of all aspects of the implementation of the present resolution 90 days after the entry into force of paragraph 1 above and again prior to the end of the 180-day period, on receipt of the reports referred to in paragraphs 3 and 4 below, and expresses its intention, prior to the end of the 180-day period, to consider favourably renewal of the provisions of the present resolution, provided that the reports referred to in paragraphs 3 and 4 below indicate that those provisions are being satisfactorily implemented;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council 90 days after the date of entry into force of paragraph 1 above, and again prior to the end of the 180-day period, on the basis of observation by United Nations personnel in Iraq, and on the basis of consultations with the Government of Iraq, on whether Iraq has ensured the equitable distribution of medicine, health supplies, foodstuffs, and materials and supplies for essential civilian needs, financed in accordance with paragraph 8 (a) of resolution 986(1995), including in his reports any observations he may have on the adequacy of the revenues to meet Iraq's humanitarian needs, and on Iraq's capacity to export sufficient quantities of petroleum and petroleum products to produce the sum referred to in paragraph 1 of resolution 986(1995);

4. Requests the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661(1990), in close coordination with the Secretary-General, to report to the Council 90 days after the date of entry into force of paragraph 1 above and again prior to the end of the 180-day period on the implementation of the arrangements in paragraphs 1, 2, 6, 8, 9 and 10 of resolution 986(1995);

5. Directs the Committee established by resolution 661(1990) to process expeditiously contract applications submitted under the present resolution as soon as the Secretary-General has approved the new plan submitted by the Government of Iraq, guaranteeing equitable distribution and including a description of the goods to be purchased with the revenues of the sale of petroleum and petroleum products authorized by the present resolution;

6. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

On 7 June, the Secretary-General transmitted to the Council [S/1997/439] the text of an exchange of letters between the Secretariat of the United Nations and the Permanent Mission of Iraq to the United Nations extending, in the light of the above resolution, the 1996 Memorandum of Understanding concerning the implementation of resolution 986(1995) for a period of 180 days, effective 8 June 1997.

Accordingly, Iraq, on 4 August, submitted a revised distribution plan for the purchase and distribution of humanitarian supplies for an additional 180-day period, which the Secretary-General transmitted to the Council on the same date [S/1997/606], together with a letter, also of 4 August, from the Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs. The letter acknowledged and approved the plan on behalf of the Secretary-General subject to the condition that its implementation would be governed by resolutions 986(1995) and 1111(1997) and the Memorandum of Understanding, and would be without prejudice to the procedures employed by the Sanctions Committee. The Secretary-General's transmittal letter stated that a copy of the categorized list of supplies and goods that accompanied Iraq's distribution plan was being made available to the Sanctions Committee. That list had been scrutinized by UNSCOM experts who had identified items that would be subject to notification under the export/import monitoring mechanism for Iraq. The list of items falling under that category was also being forwarded to the Committee.

Phase U

Report of Secretary-General (September). Pursuant to Security Council resolution 1111(1997), which extended the provisions of resolution 986(1995) for an additional 180 days, from 0001 hours eastern standard time on 8 June to 4 December (phase II), the Secretary-General, on 8 September, submitted his 90-day report [S/1997/685], indicating that, since no humanitarian goods under phase II had reached Iraq, he would report on implementation activities before the end of the current 180-day period. The report noted that, upon the completion of Staffan de Mistura's assignment as United Nations Humanitarian Coordinator for Iraq at the end of August, the Secretary-General appointed Denis Halliday as the new Coordinator effective

1 September. In addition to regular briefings of the Sanctions Committee by senior Secretariat officials and the weekly reports of the Committee's secretariat, DHA since June had been providing the Committee with comprehensive fortnightly reports on implementation activities in Iraq.

Following the 180-day (or six-month) extension of the Memorandum of Understanding, a new distribution plan for the three northern governorates, prepared by UN officials in consultation with local counterparts there, was submitted to the Government of Iraq on 29 June and its annexes on 5 July. The Government submitted its own country-wide distribution plan to the Secretary-General on 21 July. On the basis of issues raised by the United Nations, the Government submitted a revised plan on 4 August, which the Secretary-General approved on the same date. The Government had assured him earlier that the unmet needs of vulnerable groups in central and southern Iraq would be addressed outside the framework of resolution 986(1995).

Owing to the delayed resumption of oil sales, on 8 August, the total revenue generated for the first 90-day period would be about $500 million below the objective of $1.07 billion for that period. At Iraq's request, the Secretary-General, on 31 July, approved a fourth entry point for humanitarian shipments on the Iraq-Syrian Arab Republic border, on the basis of the findings of a technical mission dispatched to that area. The deployment of 10 additional Lloyd's independent inspection agents was under way to confirm arrivals of authorized goods there.

Proceeds from oil sales under phase II were not expected to be deposited to the UN Iraq Account before mid-September. The last proceeds due from the first 180-day period were deposited on 27 June, bringing total proceeds to $2,149,806,395.

By the end of the first 180-day period, over 700,000 tons of food and related items had reached Iraq, accounting for some 29 per cent of the total allocation for those goods under the first distribution plan. As of 31 August, a cumulative total of 1,831,101 tons had reached Iraq, representing some 82 per cent of the total allocation; 1,516,378 tons had been distributed to governorates. Medicines and medical supplies valued at some $17,369,615, representing 9.6 per cent of the allocation for that sector, had also arrived; supplies worth $14.9 million had been distributed to health facilities.

In the three northern governorates, the pace of implementation had quickened. With the arrival of pesticides, bulk quantities of therapeutic milk and school rehabilitation materials, FAO, UNICEF and UNESCO had begun their respective projects, as had UNCHS its water and sanitation projects for internally displaced persons. Due to Turkey's military action in the north, distribution of the July food basket was delayed and UN observers were unable to reach certain areas during July and August.

The United Nations Guard Contingent in Iraq [YUN1991,p.206], provided by Member States with equipment and operating costs funded entirely from voluntary contributions, continued to protect UN personnel, assets and operations linked to the United Nations Inter-Agency Humanitarian Programme in the northern governorates. Its main activities included security patrolling, planning and preparedness, protection of UN facilities, escorting relief convoys and operating a communications and movement-tracking facility. It also provided an emergency medical service. In July, a review mission led by DUA confirmed the continued need for the Contingent, but at a reduced level of about 130 guards, and recommended new vehicles and communications equipment.

Activities of the UN observers included routine visits to health facilities in all governorates, checking stock records and verifying supplies, providing advice on aspects of supply management, and gathering information on the status of equipment, transport, storage, and water and electricity supplies. In general, the UN observers continued to be granted ready access to facilities and records. Geographical observers reported a marked upsurge in hostile comments towards them after the Ministry of Trade's announcement of ration reductions in May and June. Popular disappointment continued to be voiced against the United Nations over the slow implementation pace of the humanitarian programme, particularly erratic food distributions, delays in the arrival of medicines and severe power outages. The number of beneficiaries declining to be interviewed had increased. On six occasions, geographical observers withdrew or reduced the number of observation visits to minimize potential confrontation.

As to the efficiency of the implementation process, the UN observers reported that, once food arrived at any of the three entry points, dispatch and distribution were efficient. Handling losses at the port of Umm Qasr and in warehouses were within acceptable limits. Ration agents complained, however, that losses of pulses and rice due to the poor quality of the sacking were in excess of the 2 per cent transit allowance granted by the Ministry of Trade, forcing them to make up the losses. Delayed arrivals of wheat grain had led the Ministry to shift stocks between silos to maintain flour production, thus complicating effective tracking of grain and flour production. That was compounded by the rapid processing rate, poor record-keeping at some mills and, sometimes, lack of timely Ministry information. Almost all agents distributed rations within the specified 48 hours. Spot checks of 6,092 beneficiaries conducted by WFP in June found that fewer than 1 per cent expressed dissatisfaction with their ration agents. In the three northern governorates, a larger number of anomalies was reported, such as short measures, faulty scales and overcharging by agents. The well-publicized revocation of licences from 76 agents in Suleimaniyah and from 12 agents in Arbil led to a drop in reported incidents of unacceptable practices. Following UN scrutiny of secondary transporters in Suleimaniyah, only 1 per cent of ration agents complained of being overcharged in August, compared with 5 to 10 per cent in May.

Erratic supply deliveries in May, June and July led to inefficiencies in food distribution, affecting ration agents and beneficiaries alike. As to the quality of food commodities, only negligible quantities were found to be unacceptable. Every item of the $20.6 million worth of medical supplies delivered met specifications, save one, which was under re-examination. In general, the medicine and medical supplies worth $14.9 million distributed to the governorates were received by the end-user facilities within 21 to 28 days of their release. Lack of transportation had emerged as an unexpected impediment to the efficiency of distribution, as had the lack of stable refrigeration in transit for supplies requiring temperature control. As a result, urgently needed supplies remained uncollected for weeks after being ready for collection.

As to equitability of distribution, UN observers paid particular attention to all matters relating to the fairness of registration procedures and their implementation by central and local authorities. With the Government's cooperation, UN observers had been able to follow up any apparent registration anomalies. In the three northern governorates, WFP was successful in securing the deletion of some 22,840 cases of double registration. UN observers consistently reported that no governorate had received less of a single commodity and attributed distribution delays to logistical difficulties. Owing to a range of technical problems and the rate at which applications had been approved by the Sanctions Committee, medical commodities had not reached Iraq in a coordinated or complementary manner, and most had been destined for hospitals and specialized facilities. There had thus been relatively little distribution to primary health-care facilities.

To assess the adequacy of resources, the United Nations had to undertake surveys within the framework of resolution 986(1995) and of the Memorandum of Understanding. While the Government had given permission for a nutritional survey by UNICEF, it had yet to release data collected from 6,375 households in central and southern Iraq during the 1996 multiple indicator cluster survey. Survey data for 2,175 households in the three northern governorates had enabled the United Nations to identify more accurately the neediest areas. A recent FAO/WFP nutrition survey (9 June-8 July) confirmed in general terms previous assessments by UNICEF that, improved food supply notwithstanding, child malnutrition remained serious and widespread, particularly in children under five. Standard indicators, such as morbidity, for determining the adequacy of medical supplies could not be applied until sufficient quantities had been distributed throughout the country. Nor was it possible to comment on the adequacy of supplies for the water and sanitation, agriculture, education and electricity sectors, since none had arrived.

The Secretary-General observed that the Government's suspension of oil sales (in the first two months following adoption of resolution 1111(1997)) pending the approval of its new distribution plan was expected to result in a significant revenue shortfall for the first 90 days of the extended 180-day period. In view of the adverse consequences for the humanitarian programme and on the UN capacity to discharge its implementation responsibilities, he said the Council might wish to consider an appropriate mechanism to meet the expected shortfall.

Concerned about the adverse impact of delays in the arrival of humanitarian goods on those whom resolution 986(1995) intended to assist, the Secretary-General urged renewed efforts by all parties to ensure the expeditious processing, approval and delivery of humanitarian goods. He noted the joint effort of the United Nations and the Government of Iraq in structuring the second distribution plan to minimize recurrence of the technical difficulties encountered in the first plan. He welcomed in particular the computerization by DHA, in collaboration with the Government, of the extensive categorized list of humanitarian goods annexed to the plan to facilitate the submission and processing of contracts for Sanctions Committee approval.

The Secretary-General recalled that, in approving the Government's new distribution plan, he had confirmed the acceptance by the United Nations of the Government's assurances as a commitment that the necessary additional resources would be made available for vulnerable groups in central and southern Iraq. He informed the Government that the United Nations would continue to observe the situation of those groups to determine and report on the adequacy of resources to meet the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi population.

Sanctions Committee report (September). On 8 September, the Sanctions Committee for Iraq submitted its 90-day report [S/1997/692] under phase II. The report stated that, following the approval of the SOMO pricing mechanisms submitted to the Committee on 5 August, Iraq resumed petroleum sales on 8 August. The overseers continued to advise the Committee on prices, volumes, liftings, destinations, management of the 90-day revenue objective of $1.07 billion (including the pipeline fee) and other pertinent questions related to imports and monitoring of petroleum exports originating in Iraq in accordance with resolutions 986(1995) and 1111(1997).

By 5 September, the overseers had reviewed and approved a total of 24 contracts from purchasers in 13 countries. The oil for export under those contracts corresponded to about 107.9 million barrels for the entire 180-day period renewed by resolution 1111(1997). Completed in the first 90-day period were 30 liftings totalling 35.7 million barrels, with an estimated value of $571 million.

Pursuant to paragraph 2 of the Committee's procedures, 238 national oil purchasers from 40 countries authorized to communicate directly with the overseers had been nominated. To date, the overseers had submitted 37 weekly reports to the Committee on the contracts they had considered for the sale of petroleum originating in Iraq, including the cumulative quantity and approximate value of petroleum authorized for export.

On 20 August, the Committee adopted further points of understanding, to take effect on 1 September, by which it circulated to all Member States a revised form of notification or request to export humanitarian goods to Iraq, together with an accompanying guidance note, and extended the validity period of its contract approval letters from 120 days to 180, with a possible further extension of another 90 days on request.

Of 855 applications received under Council resolution 986(1995), 42 were subsequently cancelled and 24 were awaiting further information from the applicant States. Of the 789 circulated to the Committee, 687, for exports totalling approximately $1,207 million, were approved, 79 were placed on hold, 20 were blocked and 3 were awaiting Committee action. No export applications under resolution 1111(1997) had been received. Owing to the delayed resumption of oil sales, funds for exports to Iraq would not be available in the escrow account until mid-September. As of 5 September, 226 consignments of humanitarian supplies had been confirmed as having arrived in Iraq in total or in partial shipments.

In keeping with previously approved arrangements, two transfers to Turkey in pipeline fees amounting to $96,571,233 for the first 180 days had been effected.

Owing to the two-month delay in the export of petroleum following the adoption of resolution 1111(1997), the total revenue generated by Iraqi oil exports did not reach the objective of $1.07 billion in the first 90-day period ending 5 September. The likely implications of the shortfall in oil revenues had been brought to the attention of the Security Council.

Communications. Between June and September, Iraq continued to address letters to the Secretary-General [S/1997/441, 452, 544, 629], drawing attention to the persistent and unjustified practice of the United States, and also of the United Kingdom, in the Sanctions Committee of placing on hold or blocking large numbers of applications for the export to Iraq of such basic humanitarian goods as beans, cooking oil, flour, rice, sugar, tea, medical supplies, batteries, sewer-cleaning vehicles, tyres, and spare parts for trucks and tractors. Iraq also drew attention to the three-day search and interrogation to which the United States navy subjected the Iraq-bound ship Kwang Myong carrying 4,000 tons of detergent from Viet Nam, after which it ordered the crew to throw into the sea certain items of equipment and to turn back [S/1997/663, 696, 731].

Iraq urged the Secretary-General to assume his role and press for the elimination of those obstacles to the timely implementation of the humanitarian programme authorized by the Security Council.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

The Security Council met on 12 September [meeting 3817] to consider the 90-day reports of the Secretary-General and the Sanctions Committee. Also before it was a further letter from Iraq to the Secretary-General [S/1997/690] stating that the previously described difficulties and obstacles posed by the United States and the United Kingdom in the way of the proper and timely implementation of the humanitarian programme continued into the first 90 days of the second 180-day period. On the same date, the Council adopted resolution 1129(1997) by vote (14-0-1), based on a draft [S/1997/709] sponsored by the United Kingdom and the United States.

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous resolutions, in particular resolutions 986(1995) of 14 April 1995 and 1111(1997) of 4 June 1997,

Reaffirming that the implementation period of resolution 1111(1997) began at 0001 hours eastern daylight time, on 8 June 1997, and that the export of petroleum and petroleum products by Iraq pursuant to resolution 1111(1997) did not require the approval by the Secretary-General of the distribution plan mentioned in paragraph 8 (a) (ii) of resolution 986(1995),

Taking note of the decision by the Government of Iraq not to export petroleum and petroleum products permitted pursuant to resolution 1111(1997) during the period 8 June to 13 August 1997,

Deeply concerned about the resulting humanitarian consequences for the Iraqi people, since the shortfall in the revenue from the sale of petroleum and petroleum products will delay the provision of humanitarian relief and create hardship for the Iraqi people,

Noting that, as set out in the report of the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661(1990), Iraq will not be able to export petroleum and petroleum products worth two billion United States dollars by the end of the period set by resolution 1111(1997) while complying with the requirement not to produce a sum exceeding one billion United States dollars every 90 days, set out in paragraph 1 of resolution 986(1995) and renewed in resolution 1111(1997),

Acknowledging the situation with regard to the delivery of humanitarian goods to Iraq as described in the report of the Secretary-General, and encouraging the continuing efforts to improve this situation,

Stressing the importance of an equitable distribution of humanitarian goods as called for by paragraph 8 (a) (ii) of resolution 986(1995),

Determined to avoid any further deterioration of the current humanitarian situation,

Reaffirming the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides that the provisions of resolution 1111(1997) shall remain in force, except that States are authorized to permit the import of petroleum and petroleum products originating in Iraq, including financial and other essential transactions directly relating thereto, sufficient to produce a sum not exceeding a total of one billion United States dollars within a period of 120 days from 0001 hours eastern daylight time on 8 June 1997 and, thereafter, a sum not exceeding a total of one billion United States dollars within a period of 60 days from 0001 hours eastern daylight time on 4 October 1997;

2. Decides also that the provisions of paragraph 1 above shall apply only to the period of implementation of resolution 1111(1997), and expresses its firm intention that under any future resolutions authorizing States to permit the import of petroleum and petroleum products originating in Iraq, the time limits within which imports may be permitted established in such resolutions shall be strictly enforced;

3. Expresses its full support for the intention of the Secretary-General, stated in his report to the Security Council, to follow up his observations concerning the needs of vulnerable groups in Iraq by monitoring the actions of the Government of Iraq in respect of these groups;

4. Stresses that contracts for the purchase of humanitarian supplies submitted in accordance with resolution 1111(1997) must be limited to items which appear on the list of supplies annexed to the second distribution plan prepared by the Government of Iraq and approved by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 8 (a) (ii) of resolution 986(1995), or appropriate amendments to the plan must be requested prior to the purchase of items not on the annexed list;

5. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

VOTE ON RESOLUTION 1129(1997):

In favour: Chile, China, Costa Rica, Egypt, France, Guinea-Bissau, Japan, Kenya, Poland, Portugal, Republic of Korea, Sweden, United Kingdom, United States.

Against: None.

Abstain: Russian Federation.

Iraq, in 16 September comments [S/1997/717] on the resolution, reaffirmed the need to respect the principle of parallelism between the flow of Iraqi petroleum and the provision of humanitarian goods to Iraq and called on the United Kingdom and the United States to desist from hindering the smooth and speedy approval of contracts for those goods.

Report of Secretary-General (November). On 28 November, the Secretary-General submitted his second report [S/1997/935] under phase II of the humanitarian programme for Iraq. The report covered implementation activities up to 15 November under phases I and II, including those of the United Nations Inter-Agency Humanitarian Programme in the three northern governorates. It noted that, on 15 October, the Secretary-General established the Office of the Iraq Programme at UN Headquarters, with Benon V. Sevan as Executive Director, to consolidate and manage Secretariat activities pursuant to Council resolutions 661(1990) and 986(1995) and subsequent resolutions.

As a result of the alteration of the 180 days under phase II into 120- and 60-day periods, it was determined that the revenue generated for the 120-day period was $1.07 billion. By 15 November, 746 letters of credit for humanitarian goods, amounting to about $1,175,908,000, had been approved or issued under resolution 986(1995); 819 payments totalling $823,621,000 had been made to suppliers for deliveries under the terms of their letters of credit, with $357,654,000 held as collateral to cover payments to suppliers whose letters of credit remained open. Approved or issued under resolution 1111(1997) were 54 letters of credit amounting to some $473,316,000.

Between 11 August and 3 November, 109 letters of credit for the export of oil from Iraq under the same resolution were confirmed. The anticipated revenue of approximately $1,914 million from those oil sales was expected to vary according to the market price of crude oil. By 21 November, $1,537,366,526 in oil proceeds had been deposited to the UN Iraq Account and allocated against expenditures, as follows: $738.2 million for the purchase of humanitarian supplies by the Government of Iraq (against payments amounting to $473.3 million) and $181 million for the purchase of those to be distributed in the three northern governorates by the United Nations Inter-Agency Humanitarian Programme (against recorded expenditures of $41.3 million); $417.6 million transferred directly to the United Nations Compensation Fund (of $96.2 million allotted to the United Nations Compensation Commission, $20.1 million was for operating expenditures and the balance for the second instalment of "A" and "C" claims); $30.8 million for UN operational and administrative expenses associated with the implementation of resolution 986(1995) (against administrative costs of $22 million for all UN entities); $10.4 million for UNSCOM operating expenses (against expenditures of $8.4 million); $145.4 million held for oil transportation costs through Turkey (of $69 million allocated for pipeline fees, $48.3 million was disbursed in November); and $12.3 million transferred directly to the escrow account established pursuant to resolutions 706(1991) and 712(1991) for the repayments envisaged under paragraph 6 of resolution 778(1992), as specified in resolution 986(1995).

An estimated cumulative total of 2.69 million tons of food and related items had arrived in-country, accounting for 92 per cent of approved contracts. Under phase II, a cumulative total of 286 tons had reached warehouses, or 0.015 per cent of total contracts approved; 99 applications for some 1,877,575 tons of food worth about $632 million had been approved; and foodstuffs had begun to arrive on 2 November. Medicines and medical appliances representing 42.6 per cent of the $210 million allocation ($181 million for the 15 central and southern governorates and $29 million for the three northern governorates) had been received and supplies worth about $34 million had been distributed to governorate departments of health for onward distribution to health facilities.

With respect to phase I allocations, applications for goods in the water and sanitation sector worth $17,589,252, or 73 per cent of the $24 million allocation, had been approved; shipments worth $6,181,716 had arrived, including water-purification chemicals, dosing pumps and chlorinators. Electricity equipment worth $3.7 million, or over 10.5 per cent of the $36 million allocation, was delivered, beginning on 17 September, and distributed to designated thermal power stations; power grid cable and transformers were distributed to four General Establishment of Electricity Distribution facilities in Baghdad and in central, southern and northern Iraq. While agricultural goods worth $4.1 million, or 17 per cent of the $24 million allocation, had arrived, deliveries had been such that some 60 per cent of the goods (pesticides, harvester spare parts and bee-keeping supplies) missed the summer season and would not be used before March 1998. Educational materials were not expected until early 1998.

In the northern governorates, implementation for most sectors, in particular resettlement and agriculture, accelerated over the reporting period. Deliveries and distribution of health supplies, medicines, foodstuffs and educational materials showed modest improvements. The first distribution of a full food ration in August was followed by late distributions in September due to supply shortages at the national level, coupled with local logistical difficulties. Continuing shortages in October precluded distribution of vegetable ghee, salt, soap and about half the entitlement of pulses of that month's ration, and government stocks were not available in the north to offset such periodic shortfalls. The resumption on 13 October of active hostilities in the three governorates was a setback to the humanitarian programme; however, where WFP could not reach local ration agents, food distribution continued through local authorities. By 31 October, some 320,572 tons of food and related items had reached WFP warehouses in Kirkuk and Mosul, compared with a total requirement of 310,000 tons.

In the nutrition sector, WFP continued providing supplementary feeding to about 328,000 persons, including pregnant and nursing mothers, residents of hospitals and other institutions and returning refugees or internally displaced persons awaiting registration for food rations. UNICEF distributed an additional 66.3 tons of nutritional supplies to about 25,000 vulnerable children through a network of 13 nutritional rehabilitation centres and 87 primary health-care centres.

With respect to phase I allocations for the northern governorates, arrivals of medicines increased from about 3 per cent to 16.2 per cent but remained dependent on the receipt of supplies at central warehouses in Baghdad. The arrival of WHO supplies for upgrading hospital services rose to over 26 per cent of allocation. By 7 November, 5 per cent of water and sanitation materials had been delivered. By 15 November, agricultural goods worth $11.2 million had arrived, as had 22 per cent and 20.9 per cent of educational materials for UNICEF and UNESCO, respectively. The major portion of electricity equipment was expected to arrive by September 1998. As to housing and supporting infrastructure for the approximately 500,000 internally displaced persons, 26 per cent of construction was under way and three sanitation projects were completed. In the demining sector, most of the equipment and vehicles under the $2.3 million allocation had been shipped to Iraq; implementation had been temporarily disrupted, however, by the unexpected withdrawal of the implementing partner.

Observation activities under the three-tier observation mechanism continued. Between July and 12 November, all commodities entering Iraq were tracked or spot-checked from the point of entry or relevant central warehouses to the regional/governorate warehouses, intermediary storage or processing plants, end-user facilities, sites and individual beneficiaries.

With respect to the effectiveness of the implementation process, the report noted that, because of the erratic arrival of foodstuffs, some commodities had to be distributed in reduced amounts, scheduled distributions for a given month spilled over into the next, and ration agents had to make multiple trips to collect their allocations, leading to complaints about additional transport costs. The processing and distribution of flour was marked by continuing difficulties due to insufficient grain stocks, power supply interruptions, the lack of back-up generators and shortage of spares, causing the closure of up to 10 out of the 109 mills at any given time. Besides the random and partial arrival of phase I medicines and medical supplies, most health facilities, including private pharmacies, continued to experience difficulties in the timely collection of commodities due to transport problems.

Water and sanitation supplies distributed to date were transported efficiently to end-users and the corresponding documentation were properly maintained. Nevertheless, with the delayed arrival of those supplies and the relatively small allocation for the sector, there had hardly been any measurable improvement. The 60 per cent of agricultural equipment and supplies that had arrived missed the 1997 summer season and would therefore be stored until the following season. While supplies in the electricity sector had been promptly forwarded to their final destinations, efficiency was hampered by the complex nature of that sector and by the uncoordinated arrival of supplies. In the education sector, pre-observation visits to schools confirmed that the allocation plan and warehousing and transport arrangements were in place to ensure the effective distribution of supplies upon their arrival to the 15 central and southern governorates. In the three northern governorates, student and teacher/classroom kits were distributed to all 2,020 primary schools in the distribution plan. Approximately 20 per cent of the resettlement projects were under implementation and activities were well within schedule, despite constraints created by the initial irregular allocation of operational resources and the lengthy procedure for obtaining contract approval from UNCHS headquarters in Nairobi, Kenya.

As to equitability, disproportionate amounts of medicines and medical supplies had been received for specialized centres due to the random arrival of supplies. In the water and sanitation sector, distribution was according to allocation plans drawn up by the respective water authorities of the 15 governorates. Distribution of agricultural machinery and spare parts varied with the changes in cropping patterns, varying food demands, weather restrictions, locations of weed, insect and disease infestations, unforeseen machinery malfunctions, the number of contracts approved and/or blocked and seasonal migrations of harvesters. Distribution of ground sprayers was complicated by the need for prior inspection because of their dual-purpose classification. Resettlement resources had been equitably allocated among the internally displaced groups. Although shelter and human settlement rehabilitation needs in the 15 central and southern governorates were similar to if not more pressing than those in the three northern governorates, the 15 were not covered under either phase I or II of the programme; consequently, there was no equity in that sector.

With respect to the adequacy of the programme, the 1996 multiple indicator cluster survey in the 15 governorates indicated that 11 per cent of children up to five years old were acutely malnourished and wasting; 31 per cent were chronically malnourished and thus subject to stunting; and 26 per cent were underweight. Two additional nutritional status surveys conducted in April and October 1997 indicated that infant malnutrition remained prevalent. An FAO/WFP assessment conducted in Baghdad and Kerbala in June also confirmed high levels of malnutrition in children and adults alike. The current food ration of 2,030 kilocalories and its composition fell far short of meeting the nutritional needs of the Iraqi population and required enhancement. As regularly reported by the UN observers, the health infrastructure had deteriorated so that utilization of new equipment and other items allocated to the health sector would have limited impact if related urgent needs, such as proper water supply and sewage treatment, immediate repair and maintenance of water and sewage pipe systems, improved electricity service and food rations, and critical environmental issues, were not adequately addressed.

To assess the adequacy and effectiveness of supplies in the agriculture sector, an impact study had to be conducted over one or two seasons to ascertain their total effect. In the electricity sector, a small increase could be expected in the output of power stations after the installation and utilization of equipment allotted for the sector under phases I and II. However, the Government's technical assessment, as confirmed by UN observers, suggested that that increase was expected to be offset by the rate of deterioration in other power stations and in parts of the distribution network not benefiting from similar inputs. In the education sector, it was estimated that the $ 18 million allocated for primary education under phases I and II in the central and southern governorates would meet only 15 to 20 per cent of the most urgent requirements for textbooks, desks and physical plant rehabilitation. The resources provided for rehabilitation and resettlement under the two phases were minimal relative to the needs of the target population. As to vulnerable groups, the UN agencies felt that a new food basket with higher energy/protein/micronutrient content was required for the whole Iraqi population.

The Secretary-General reported with regret that, despite the ongoing implementation of resolutions 986(1995) and 1111(1997), the population of Iraq continued to face a serious nutritional and health situation and that there was an urgent need to contain the risk of a further deterioration. The slow and erratic pace at which humanitarian supplies arrived in Iraq had been such that, at the close of phase II, there were still outstanding deliveries under phase I, and the overwhelming majority of phase II inputs had yet to be submitted, processed and/or approved. There was clearly an urgent need for a systematic review of the whole process. There was also a need to review the operating difficulties of the distribution systems, in particular those related to the food and health sectors, and the extent to which the deterioration of basic infrastructure in other sectors was undermining the value of humanitarian inputs. The Council would also appreciate the need to reviewing the nutritional value of the current food basket in relation to the general population and also to the specific needs of those most at risk of malnutrition.

The Secretary-General felt that, after almost a year's experience in implementing the programme, it might be timely to re-emphasize the importance of realism and pragmatism. Even if all supplies arrived on time, what was being provided under resolutions 986(1995) and 1111(1997) would be insufficient to address, even as a temporary measure, all the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people. Moreover, in view of identified needs that remained unmet, he appealed to the international community to continue humanitarian programmes throughout the country.

The Secretary-General therefore drew attention to a variety of initiatives that ought to be taken to ensure achievement of the objectives of the two resolutions. Given the scale of urgent humanitarian requirements in Iraq, the Council might wish to consider increasing the revenues envisaged to meet Iraq's priority humanitarian requirements. To assist the Council, he had requested the Office of the Iraq Programme to review the priority requirements in all sectors, with particular emphasis on enhancing the efficiency and adequacy of the distribution plan. He had also directed that Office to formulate recommendations that addressed concerns over processing and supply issues, in particular to devise a system that ensured that interrelated applications were clearly identified as such and brought to the attention of the Sanctions Committee. He welcomed the Committee's efforts to refine and clarify its working procedures, encouraging it to go further in that direction to expedite the approval process.

In view of Iraq's continuing humanitarian needs, the Secretary-General recommended that the Council extend the provisions of resolution 986(1995) for a further six-month period.

Sanctions Committee report (December). On 2 December, the Sanctions Committee submitted its second report [S/1997/942] pursuant to resolution 1111(1997), according to which 33 contracts for the export of oil from Iraq, involving purchasers from 14 countries, had been reviewed and approved by the overseers under phase II. The total quantity of oil approved under those contracts corresponded to approximately 126.8 million barrels for the 180 days. All contracts submitted employed the SOMO pricing mechanisms approved by the Committee on the recommendation of the overseers.

In the first 120 days, 57 loadings, totalling 65.4 million barrels, were completed. During the next 60 days, 54 liftings totalling 56 million barrels, estimated at $974 million, had been completed, with seven liftings remaining to be completed for that period. At current prices, the revenue for the 180-day period, including the remaining seven liftings, was projected at about $2.14 billion (including the pipeline fee).

Pursuant to Committee procedures, 237 national oil purchasers authorized to communicate directly with the overseers had been nominated from 40 countries. The Committee held informal meetings to deal with issues arising from the processing of applications and to discuss questions related to the transition of the operation from phase I to phase II.

Under phase I, 929 applications had been received by 1 December, of which 65 were later cancelled and 10 were awaiting either additional information from the applicant States or funds to become available in the UN Iraq Account. Of the 854 circulated to the Committee, 778, totalling approximately $1,218 million, were approved, 31 were placed on hold and 45 were blocked. A cumulative total of 303 applications had been received by 15 November under the 13 per cent account (for the three northern governorates), of which 290 were approved and 13 were pending.

Funds for exports to Iraq under resolution 1111(1997) became available in the UN Iraq Account on 12 September. Under phase II, 239 applications had been received by 1 December, of which 6 were subsequently cancelled and 92 were waiting either for additional information from the applicant States or for funds to become available in the UN Iraq Account. Of the remaining 141 circulated to the Committee, 117, worth some $747.5 million, were approved, 7 were placed on hold, 1 was blocked and 16 were awaiting Committee action. Under the 13 per cent account, 64 applications had been submitted by 15 November, of which 51 were approved.

Owing to the delayed start in the sales of petroleum after the adoption of resolution 1111(1997), humanitarian supplies approved under phase II started to arrive in Iraq only on 2 November. As at 1 December, 469 consignments of humanitarian supplies had been confirmed as having arrived in Iraq in total or in partial shipments.

During the reporting period, the Committee approved Turkey's second request for equipment and parts for pipeline maintenance in Iraq, repeating the proviso that the materials should remain in Turkey for shipment to Iraq only when needed. (Iraq protested against and rejected that proviso on 24 December [S/1997/1013].)

Communications. Iraq, on 6 October [S/1997/778], reiterated its complaint about the large number of export applications that were on hold or blocked by the United States and the scores of others that had yet to be circulated to the Sanctions Committee. On 29 November [S/1997/937], in addition to repeating the same complaint, Iraq strongly urged that, in view of the approaching end of phase II, the Secretary-General take the steps necessary to complete the processing of all contracts under phases I and II. It suggested that, to overcome the obstacles posed by the United States, the export of oil and the import of humanitarian supplies stipulated with each 180-day period should be completed within that period; the principle of equivalence between those two operations should be applied; and a simple notification procedure should be used for approving purchase contracts for materials conforming to the approved categorized list.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

The Security Council met on 4 December [meeting 3840] to consider the second reports of the Secretary-General and the Sanctions Committee under phase II of the humanitarian programme for Iraq. Following a debate on those reports, the Council unanimously adopted resolution 1143(1997), based on a draft [S/1997/951] prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous resolutions, in particular resolutions 986(1995) of 14 April 1995, 1111(1997) of 4 June 1997 and 1129(1997) of 12 September 1997,

Convinced of the need as a temporary measure to continue to provide for the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people until the fulfilment by Iraq of the relevant resolutions, including notably resolution 687(1991) of 3 April 1991, allows the Council to take further action with regard to the prohibitions referred to in resolution 661(1990) of 6 August 1990, in accordance with the provisions of those resolutions,

Convinced also of the need for equitable distribution of humanitarian relief to all segments of the Iraqi population throughout the country,

Noting with concern that, despite the ongoing implementation of resolutions 986(1995) and 1111(1997), the population of Iraq continues to face a serious nutritional and health situation,

Determined to avoid any further deterioration of the current humanitarian situation,

Noting with appreciation the recommendation of the Secretary-General that the Council re-examine the adequacy of the revenues provided by resolution 986(1995) and consider how best to meet the priority humanitarian requirements of the Iraqi people, including the possibility of increasing those revenues,

Noting also with appreciation the intention of the Secretary-General to include in his supplementary report recommendations on ways to improve the processing and supply of humanitarian goods under resolution 986(1995),

Welcoming the efforts made by the Committee established by resolution 661(1990) to refine and clarify its working procedures, and encouraging the Committee to go further in that direction in order to expedite the approval process,

Reaffirming the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides that the provisions of resolution 986(1995), except those contained in paragraphs 4, 11 and 12, shall remain in force for another period of 180 days beginning at 0001 hours eastern standard time, on 5 December 1997;

2. Also decides that the provisions of the distribution plan in respect of goods purchased in accordance with resolution 1111(1997) shall continue to apply to foodstuffs, medicine and health supplies purchased in accordance with the present resolution pending the approval of the Secretary-General of a new distribution plan, to be submitted by the Government of Iraq before 5 January 1998;

3. Further decides to conduct a thorough review of all aspects of the implementation of the present resolution 90 days after the entry into force of paragraph 1 above and again prior to the end of the 180-day period, on receipt of the reports referred to in paragraphs 4 and 5 below, and expresses its intention, prior to the end of the 180-day period, to consider favourably renewal of the provisions of the present resolution, provided that the reports referred to in paragraphs 4 and 5 below indicate that those provisions are being satisfactorily implemented;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council 90 days after the date of entry into force of paragraph 1 above, and again prior to the end of the 180-day period, on the basis of observation by United Nations personnel in Iraq, and on the basis of consultations with the Government of Iraq, on whether Iraq has ensured the equitable distribution of medicine, health supplies, foodstuffs, and materials and supplies for essential civilian needs, financed in accordance with paragraph 8 (a) of resolution 986(1995), including in his reports any observations he may have on the adequacy of the revenues to meet Iraq's humanitarian needs, and on Iraq's capacity to export sufficient quantities of petroleum and petroleum products to produce the sum referred to in paragraph 1 of resolution 986(1995);

5. Requests the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661(1990), in close coordination with the Secretary-General, to report to the Council 90 days after the date of entry into force of paragraph 1 above and again prior to the end of the 180-day period on the implementation of the arrangements in paragraphs 1, 2, 6, 8, 9 and 10 of resolution 986(1995);

6. Welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to submit a supplementary report, and expresses its willingness, in the light of his recommendations, to find ways of improving the implementation of the humanitarian programme and to take such action over additional resources as needed to meet priority humanitarian requirements of the Iraqi people, as well as to consider an extension of the time-frame for the implementation of the present resolution;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to submit his supplementary report to the Council no later than 30 January 1998;

8. Stresses the need to ensure respect for the security and safety of all persons appointed by the Secretary-General for the implementation of the present resolution in Iraq;

9. Requests the Committee established by resolution 661(1990) to continue, in close coordination with the Secretary-General, to refine and clarify working procedures in order to expedite the approval process and to report to the Council no later than 30 January 1998;

10. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

On 6 December [S/1997/963], the Secretary-General transmitted to the Council an exchange of letters of the same date from the Legal Counsel of the United Nations and the Government of Iraq, by which the Legal Counsel proposed, and Iraq agreed, that the provisions of the 1996 Memorandum of Understanding be extended for an additional period of 180 days, effective 5 December 1997, provided that the Memorandum's provisions applicable to the distribution plans approved pursuant to paragraph 8 (a) (ii) of Council resolution 986(1995) and paragraph 5 of resolution 1111(1997) should be applicable to the new distribution plan referred to in paragraph 2 of resolution 1143(1997); and, further, that if Iraq agreed to the proposal, his letter and Iraq's reply should constitute an agreement between the Secretariat of the United Nations and the Government of Iraq.

UN Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission

The United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission (UNIKOM), established by Security Council resolution 687(1991) [YUN 1991, p. 172], continued in 1997 to discharge its functions in accordance with its terms of reference, as expanded by Council resolution 806(1993) [YUN 1993, p. 406]: to monitor the Khawr Abd Allah waterway and the demilitarized zone (DMZ) along the Iraq-Kuwait boundary established under the 1991 resolution, as adjusted in accordance with the 1993 technically demarcated international boundary line [YUN 1993, p. 403]; to deter violations of the boundary through its presence in and surveillance of the DMZ; to observe any potentially hostile action mounted from the territory of one State into the other; and, as from 1993, to take physical action to prevent or redress small-scale violations of the DMZ or the boundary.

UNIKOM operations consisted of surveillance, control, investigation and liaison. Surveillance of the DMZ—an area about 200 kilometres long and extending 10 kilometres into Iraq and 5 kilometres into Kuwait—was based on patrol and observation bases, ground and air patrols, and observation points. Control operations included static checkpoints, random checks and maintenance of a force mobile reserve. Since mid-1996 [YUN 1996, p. 231], UNIKOM had kept its division of the DMZ into the northern and southern operational sectors, where it maintained 10 and 8 patrol/observation bases, respectively. Regarding the recommended improvement of the monitoring system of the Khawr Abd Allah waterway [ibid.], construction had begun of the additional observation post on Warbah Island, two patrol boats and two support craft were being fitted out and arrangements for the purchase of the radar units to upgrade the observation posts at Al Faw and at the entrance of the Al Zubayr waterway were being finalized.

UNIKOM's infantry battalion, deployed at Camp Khor, Kuwait, at a company camp at Al'Abdali and at platoon camps in the two sectors, conducted armed patrols within the sectors, deploying its mobile reserve in sensitive situations as necessary, manned checkpoints at border-crossing sites and conducted random checks in cooperation with Iraqi and Kuwaiti liaison officers; it also provided security for UNIKOM personnel and its installations where and when necessary.

UNIKOM maintained headquarters at Umm Qasr in Iraq, liaison offices in Baghdad and Kuwait City and a support base in Camp Khor.

Reports of Secretary-General (March and September). During the year, the Secretary-General submitted two six-monthly reports on the activities of UNIKOM, the first on 26 March [S/1997/255], covering the period 24 September 1996 to 26 March 1997; and the second, on 24 September [S/1997/740], covering the period 27 March to 23 September.

The reports stated that the situation in the DMZ was generally calm, with only 22 minor incidents occurring during the second reporting period—14 on the Iraqi side and 8 on the Kuwaiti side; no injuries were sustained and damage to property was usually slight. Complaints by one party against the other increased, from 23 in the first period to 35 in the second, the majority by Kuwait, over incursions by Iraqi fishing boats into its territorial waters in the Khawr Abd Allah west of Warbah Island and cross-border ground incursions and shootings within the DMZ. Iraq likewise complained about violations of its territorial waters in the same waterway and of its airspace over Safwan and Umm Qasr. From the last days of February into the first part of March, UNIKOM observed increased activities in the Khawr Abd Allah waterway, including the presence of some armed Iraqi boats.

Violations within the DMZ recorded by UNIKOM decreased from 161 during the first period (including 14 ground incursions into Kuwait mainly by military and armed personnel) to 87 during the second (including 26 waterway violations by Iraqi fishing boats and 12 ground violations by armed personnel from either party and tracer sightings on the Iraqi side). Of the 248 violations recorded, 196 were airspace violations by military aircraft of the types that had been used by Gulf War coalition forces and by aircraft flying too high to be identified.

UNIKOM continued to dispose of unexploded mines and bomblets in the DMZ, mostly on the Iraqi side, detonating 930 unexploded devices during the second reporting period. It also continued to provide security and logistic support for the meetings of the Technical Subcommittee on Military and Civilian Missing Prisoners of War and Mortal Remains, a subcommittee of the International Committee of the Red Cross. The eight meetings of that Subcommittee (6 November and 15 December 1996, 28-29 January, 19 March, 30 April, 2 June, 16 July and 18 August 1997) were attended by delegations from Iraq and Kuwait and observers from France, Saudi Arabia, the United Kingdom and the United States.

UNIKOM continued to maintain constant and close liaison with the authorities of both parties at all levels, who cooperated with the Mission in the conduct of its operations.

The Secretary-General concluded that UNIKOM continued to contribute to the maintenance of calm and stability in the DMZ and recommended that it be maintained.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (April and October)

The Security Council informed the Secretary-General on 7 April [S/1997/286] and on 6 October [S/1997/773] that, in the light of each of his two reports, the Council had reviewed the question of termination or continuation of UNIKOM and its modalities of operation and concurred with his recommendation that UNIKOM be maintained. The Council decided to review the question once again by 4 April 1998.

Composition

Major-General Gian Giuseppe Santillo (Italy) served as Force Commander until 30 November. He was succeeded by Major-General Esa Kalervo Tarvainen (Finland), whose appointment the Secretary-General proposed to the Council on 24 October [S/1997/841] and was agreed to by the Council on 3 November [S/1997/842]. As of August, UNIKOM had an overall strength of 1,283, comprising 194 military observers from 32 Member States; an infantry battalion of 765 from Bangladesh; 125 support personnel, including an engineering unit of 42 from Argentina, a logistics unit of 34 from Austria, a helicopter unit of 35 from Bangladesh and a medical unit of 14 from Germany; and a civilian staff of 199.

Financing

On 13 June 1997 [meeting 101], the General Assembly considered the Secretary-General's reports on UNIKOM of 4 March [A/51/658/Add.1] on its financial performance from 1 January to 30 June 1996, of 5 March [A/51/658/Add.2] containing its proposed budget for the 12-month period from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998, and of 21 May [A/51/658/Add.3] on the recovery of overpayment of mission subsistence allowance, together with the related reports of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions [A/51/683/Add.1] and of the Office of Internal Oversight Services [A/51/432]. On the recommendation of the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee [A/51/726/Add.1], the Assembly adopted resolution 51/234 without vote [agenda item 125 (a)].

Financing of the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission

The General Assembly,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission, the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions and the report of the Office of Internal Oversight Services,

Recalling Security Council resolutions 687(1991) of 3 April 1991 and 689(1991) of 9 April 1991, by which the Council decided to establish the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission and to review the question of its termination or continuation every six months,

Recalling also its resolution 45/260 of 3 May 1991 on the financing of the Observation Mission and its subsequent resolutions and decisions thereon, the latest of which were resolution 50/234 of 7 June 1996 and decision 51/440 of 16 December 1996,

Reaffirming that the costs of the Observation Mission that are not covered by voluntary contributions are expenses of the Organization to be borne by Member States in accordance with Article 17, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations,

Recalling its previous decisions regarding the fact that, in order to meet the expenditures caused by the Observation Mission; a different procedure is required from that applied to meet expenditures of the regular budget of the United Nations,

Taking into account the fact that the economically more developed countries are in a position to make relatively larger contributions and that the economically less developed countries have a relatively limited capacity to contribute towards such an operation,

Bearing in mind the special responsibilities of the States permanent members of the Security Council, as indicated in General Assembly resolution 1874(S-IV) of 27 June 1963, in the financing of such operations,

Expressing its appreciation for the substantial voluntary contributions made to the Observation Mission by the Government of Kuwait and the contributions of other Governments,

Mindful of the fact that it is essential to provide the Observation Mission with the necessary financial resources to enable it to fulfil its responsibilities under the relevant resolutions of the Security Council,

1. Takes note of the status of contributions to the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission as at 15 May 1997, including the contributions outstanding in the amount of 9,455,734 United States dollars, representing 4 per cent of the total assessed contributions from the inception of the Mission to the period ending 30 April 1997, notes that some 32 per cent of the Member States have paid their assessed contributions in full, and urges all other Member States concerned, in particular those in arrears, to ensure the payment of their outstanding assessed contributions;

2. Expresses its continued appreciation of the decision of the Government of Kuwait to defray two thirds of the cost of the Observation Mission, effective 1 November 1993;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to take all necessary action to ensure that the Observation Mission is administered with a maximum of efficiency and economy;

8. Decides to appropriate to the Special Account for the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission the amount of 51,487,500 dollars gross (49,599,300 dollars net) for the maintenance of the Observation Mission for the period from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998, inclusive of an amount of 1,952,100 dollars for the support account for peacekeeping operations, a two-thirds share of this amount, equivalent to 33,066,200 dollars, to be funded through voluntary contributions from the Government of Kuwait, subject to the review by the Security Council with regard to the question of termination or continuation of the Mission;

9. Decides also, as an ad hoc arrangement, taking into consideration the funding through voluntary contributions from the Government of Kuwait of the two-thirds share of the cost of the Observation Mission, equivalent to 33,066,200 dollars, to apportion among Member States the amount of 18,421,300 dollars gross (16,533,100 dollars net), representing one third of the cost of the maintenance of the Observation Mission for the period from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998, the said amount to be assessed at a monthly rate of 1,535,108 dollars gross (1,377,758 dollars net), in accordance with the composition of groups set out in paragraphs 3 and 4 of General Assembly resolution 43/232 of 1 March 1989, as adjusted by the Assembly in its resolutions

44/192 B of 21 December 1989, 45/269 of 27 August 1991, 46/198 A of 20 December 1991, 47/218 A of 23 December 1992, 49/249 A of 20 July 1995, 49/249 B of 14 September 1995, 50/224 of 11 April 1996 and 51/218 A and B of 18 December 1996 and its decisions 48/472 A of 23 December 1993 and 50/451 B of 23 December 1995, and taking into account the scale of assessments for the year 1997, as set out in its resolution 49/19 B of 23 December 1994 and its decision 50/471 A of 23 December 1995, and for the year 1998, subject to the review by the Security Council with regard to the question of termination or continuation of the Observation Mission;

10. Decides further that, in accordance with the provisions of its resolution 973(X) of 15 December 1955, there shall be set off against the apportionment among Member States, as provided for in paragraph 9 above, their respective share in the Tax Equalization Fund of the estimated staff assessment income of 1,888,200 dollars approved for the period from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998;

12. Decides also that, for Member States that have not fulfilled their financial obligations to the Observation Mission, their share of the unencumbered balance of 1,723,200 dollars gross (1,440,000 dollars net) for the period from 1 January to 30 June 1996 shall be set off against their outstanding obligations;

13. Decides further that two thirds of the net unencumbered balance of 4,320,000 dollars, equivalent to 2,880,000 dollars, shall be returned to the Government of Kuwait;

14. Requests the Secretary-General to continue his efforts to recover the overpayment of mission subsistence allowance in the estimated amount of 988,443.5 dollars and to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session on the results of action taken for its recovery, including measures taken with respect to those responsible for the overpayment; on the financing of UNIKOM at the resumed fifty-second session in 1998.

Other matters

UN Compensation Commission and Fund

The United Nations Compensation Commission, established in 1991 [YUN 1991, p. 196] for the resolution and payment through the United Nations Compensation Fund, established at the same time, of claims against Iraq for losses and damage resulting from its 1990 invasion and occupation of Kuwait [YUN 1990, p. 189], continued in 1997 to expedite the prompt settlement of claims. The Commission was headquartered in Geneva, where its Governing Council held all of its sessions.

Governing Council activities

The Governing Council of the Commission held three regular sessions during the year: the twenty-fourth (23-24 June) [S/1997/546], the twenty-fifth (29 September-1 October) [S/1997/809] and the twenty-sixth (15-17 December) [S/1998/37]. Iraq and Kuwait addressed all three sessions and Turkey addressed the June session.

In June, the Council considered the report and recommendations of the Panel of Commissioners that reviewed the fifth instalment of category C claims (individual claims for damage and injury up to $100,000), covering 76,751 claims filed by 43 Governments and three UN entities on behalf of individuals not in a position to file their claims through Governments (annex I). The recommendations included: compensation payments for 76,720 claims totalling $720,924,558.14, with interest calculated from 2 August 1990; and corrected amounts for three claims from the first instalment [YUN 1994, p. 479] and for another three from the second instalment [YUN 1996, p. 235]. The 31 claims not recommended for compensation related to money losses resulting from the claimants' departure from Iraq or Kuwait, already claimed for under category A (departure losses). Those recommendations were approved by Council decision 41 of 24 June (annex II), which also reaffirmed that, when funds became available, payments should be made in accordance with the priorities and payment mechanism set forth in its decision 17 [YUN 1994, p. 478]. The Commission's Executive Secretary, in his first report to the Council (annex III), indicated that, as the Panel for category A claims had concluded its review of all claims in that category and was no longer functioning, he was reporting requests for corrections to already approved claim A awards directly to the Council.

At the September/October session, the Council discussed the final report on the jurisdictional phase of the review by the Panel of Commissioners of the Egyptian workers' claims, together with the Panel's recommendations (annex I). In question were approximately 1.24 million claims for about $491 million, the dollar value of funds deposited by the Egyptian workers into banks in Iraq for transfer to beneficiaries in Egypt, in accordance with agreements between Egypt and Iraq, but transfers of which ceased following Iraq's invasion of Kuwait. On the basis of a thorough examination of all aspects of the claim, including briefs and documents filed by Egypt and Iraq, as well as oral hearings, the Panel recommended that compensation in the amount of $84,393,992 be awarded for 223,817 claims, that all other workers' claims be dismissed and that interest be paid on the total amount awarded, calculated from 15 October 1990, at a rate to be determined by the Governing Council at the appropriate time. By decision 43 of 1 October (annex II), the Council approved the Panel's recommendations and further decided that, for payment purposes, the 223,817 claims should be considered as part of the fifth instalment of category C claims. In a statement, also of 1 October (annex III), the Governing Council President noted that the Commission did not have exclusive competence to consider claims against Iraq arising from its unlawful invasion and occupation of Kuwait; thus all claimants, including those whose claims had been dismissed by the Panel, had the right to pursue their claims through other mechanisms. Governments were reminded, however, to observe the requirements of decision 13 [YUN 1992, p. 317] to avoid multiple recovery of compensation by claimants for the same loss. The Executive Secretary, in his second report (annex IV), set out the corrections that had been requested to 16 already approved category A claim awards in the first and third to sixth instalments of that category. The corrections as set out in that report were approved by a decision of the Council, also of 1 October (annex V), which directed the Executive Secretary to effect those corrections.

At the December session, the Council considered the first report and recommendations of the Panel of Commissioners that reviewed part one of the first instalment of category F claims—for losses from contract, business transaction or course of dealing, real property, other tangible property, bank accounts and securities, income-producing property, payment or relief to others, evacuation costs of citizens or other nationals, public service expenditures, environmental damage and depletion of natural resources (annex I). That instalment covered 11 claims, 9 of which totalled approximately $4,506,800 filed by eight Governments for certain of their political subdivisions, agencies, ministries, instrumentalities or controlled entities. On the basis of its evaluation of the claims and advice of the loss adjusters, the Panel recommended that specific amounts of compensation, totalling $2,220,043, be awarded for the nine claims. The Panel would issue a separate report in due course for the remaining two claims (the "Kuwaiti claims") submitted by Kuwait University and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Kuwait.

By decision 45 of 17 December (annex II), the Council approved the Panel's recommendations, reaffirming that when the funds became available payments should be made in accordance with decision 17 [YUN 1994, p. 478] and recalling that Governments and international organizations should distribute amounts received to the designated claimants within six months of receiving payment and, under the terms of decision 18 [ibid.], provide information on such distribution no later than three months thereafter. The decision also requested the Executive Secretary to provide a copy of the report to the Secretary-General, Iraq and the Governments concerned. With that approval, the Council had begun the resolution of large claims. All claims in categories A and B (death or serious personal injury) and five out of seven instalments of claims in category C had been successfully resolved.

Also at the December session, the Council conducted a protracted discussion of the report of the Panel of Commissioners that reviewed part one of the first instalment of category D claims (individual claims for damages above $100,000), regarding which a decision would be taken at a special session. In addition, the Council took note of the Executive Secretary's report on the September-November activities of the Commission and approved his proposed budget for the 1998-1999 biennium.

Complaints

Iraq, on 31 August [S/1997/679], transmitted to the Secretary-General a 17 August press report that British soldiers shot to death seven Iraqi prisoners of war (POWs) captured during the Gulf War. Calling that a violation of international humanitarian law, in particular of the 1949 Geneva Convention relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, Iraq asked the Secretary-General to urge the United Kingdom to disclose the details of the crime and institute legal proceedings against the perpetrators—a demand it reiterated in October [S/1997/796]. The United Kingdom responded on 30 September [S/1997/760] that it had rigorously applied its policy of treating Iraqi POWs in full accord with the Convention, in stark contrast to Iraq's treatment of British POWs. While no evidence had been adduced to corroborate the allegation, the United Kingdom assured Iraq that it would bring the offenders to justice should the allegation be proved true.

Throughout the year, Iraq addressed numerous communications to the Secretary-General and the Security Council drawing attention to violations of its airspace by United States and other aircraft based in Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, as well as to violations of its territorial waters by United States and other warships. The hundreds of sorties reported every 15 days from January to April were said to have been flown by French, United Kingdom and United States warplanes; those from 1 May to 11 November were attributed exclusively to United States aircraft. Also reported were three intrusions some four kilometres into Iraqi airspace by Saudi Arabian helicopters. In reporting what it described as an escalation of United States violations—169 sorties over the north of the country and 815 over the south—between 29 October and 11 November [S/1997/875, 881], Iraq stated that, in the face of such continual violations and threat of United States military action, it would have no alternative but to defend its sovereignty and security. From 12 November to 27 December, Iraq submitted two- to five-day counts of airspace violations by United States aircraft flying at such speeds and altitudes as to alarm the civilian population and cause serious damage to public and private property, for which Iraq affirmed its lawful right to seek compensation.

Iraq further drew attention to some 17 incidents that occurred between 20 December 1996 and 21 April 1997 and during October, in which United States frigates subjected Iraqi civilian vessels operating within Iraqi territorial waters to unwarranted and long searches as well as to harassment by its low-flying, armed navy helicopters hovering over such vessels and over the ports of Umm Qasr and Mina al-Bakr. In all instances, Iraq requested the United Nations to intervene and to bring to a halt all such violations and acts of provocation.

Interference in its internal affairs was the subject of two communications from Iraq. One was dated 14 July [S/1997/548], according to which an article in The Washington Post of 26 June and a television broadcast on the same day by the American Broadcasting Corporation further confirmed what Iraq had claimed on 4 November 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 239], that the United States Government pursued an official policy aimed at bringing about a change in Iraq's political system. Not only had the United States expended up to $100 million to organize, train and arm rebels in northern Iraq and broadcast hostile propaganda against the Iraqi Government so as to foment a civil war that would lead to a coup, it had also established, without Security Council authority, the no-fly zones [YUN 1996, p. 238] in northern and southern Iraq and was exploiting certain UNSCOM inspection teams to enable American spies to implement their country's hostile policy towards Iraq. Iraq asked the Security Council to assume its responsibilities under the Charter of the United Nations and demand that the United States end its flagrant intervention in Iraq's internal affairs.

On 3 October [S/1997/770], Iraq also drew attention to a 30 September press statement by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office of the United Kingdom assuring leading Iraqi opposition groups whom it hosted at a meeting that British policy towards Iraq had not changed under the new Government, which still had serious concerns about the danger that the Iraqi regime represented to the Iraqi people and the region. Iraq categorized that statement as constituting an official acknowledgement of attempts by the British Government to interfere in Iraq's internal affairs with a view to overthrowing its national Government, undermining its security and stability, encroaching on its sovereignty and destroying its national unity.

In addition, Iraq submitted reports [S/1997/143, 299, 678, 797, 978] on the disposal of large numbers of unexploded ordnance left behind by what Iraq said was the 1991 30-Power aggression against it, which continued to be found in the central and southern governorates. Iraq also reported some deaths and injuries of children from exploding mines.

Iraq-Turkey

Iraq continued in 1997 to claim that Turkey, under the pretext of repelling elements hostile to its Government, persisted in its brutal military air and ground incursions into northern Iraq. It accused Turkey of complicity in perpetuating the anomalous situation created there by the United States and its allies, which allowed such incursions and prevented Iraq from re-establishing national control over the area. It condemned and protested those violations of its airspace and territory, reasserted its right under international law to seek compensation for the damage and suffering inflicted on the northern Iraqi citizens, and reiterated its call on Turkey to reconsider its policy and promote collaboration, good-neighbourliness and mutual respect for each other's sovereignty.

As described by Iraq in a number of communications to the Secretary-General and the Security Council, Turkey's acts of aggression and intimidation included constant reconnaissance sorties by Turkish aircraft, repeated heavy aerial bombardment and artillery shelling of towns and villages, and offensive ground operations some 8 to 10 kilometres deep into Iraqi territory by up to brigade-strength infantry troops supported by artillery, tanks and fighter planes. In May, it reported the massing of some 120,000 Turkish troops along the border [S/1997/354], together with large numbers of armoured personnel carriers and tanks, and the subsequent large-scale and protracted military operation [S/1997/376] launched in northern Iraq in that month. Iraq further reported two similar massive operations [S/1997/968, 1017] in December.

Turkey stressed in January [S/1997/7] and again in July [S/1997/552] that its foreign policy towards Iraq from the outset of the Gulf War crisis had been consistent and in line with relevant Council resolutions: it stood and continued to stand for Iraq's rights as a sovereign State and neighbour at international forums, and fully respected those resolutions and meticulously fulfilled its responsibilities issuing from them. Iraq's inability to exercise authority over its northern territory, Turkey explained, had made the area a safe haven for the terrorist PKK (Kurdish Workers' Party) organization, which frequently launched attacks from there against Turkey. Turkey regarded the defence of its borders and people as a priority. Not only did it make public the objectives and limited scope and duration of its recent operation in northern Iraq, but it also informed Iraq of it in time through diplomatic channels to avoid any misunderstanding. Indeed, the Turkish armed forces conducted their operation with the cooperation of the Kurdistan Democratic Party in northern Iraq and had begun withdrawing on 20 June. Turkey thus failed to understand the allegations of aggression and intimidation imputed to it by Iraq.

In a statement issued in May [A/52/157], the Presidency of the European Union stressed that, despite its appreciation of Turkey's wish to end terrorist actions, a solution to the Kurdish problem could only be achieved politically, not militarily, and called on Turkey to exercise the utmost restraint and promptly to withdraw its military forces from Iraq. Also in May [S/1997/416], the Group of Arab States at the United Nations said it opposed any security or other arrangements, irrespective of the grounds on which they were based, which could violate Iraq's sovereignty, territorial integrity or security. Iraq stated that the Council's failure to show any interest in so grave a matter as the incursion into a sovereign State of "tens of thousands of Turkish armed forces, supported by tanks, artillery and aircraft" raised serious questions regarding the Council resolutions imposing a long series of harsh conditions and sanctions on Iraq [S/1997/393].

Afghanistan

A peaceful settlement of the conflict in Afghanistan remained elusive in 1997, notwithstanding the efforts of the United Nations, in particular the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan, to mediate peace among the country's warring factions. In the upheaval caused by offensives and counter-offensives during the year, the military balance between the Taliban and the Northern Alliance, formally known as the United National and Islamic Front for the Salvation of Afghanistan (UNIFSA), see-sawed wildly. Even as both sides agreed in principle on a negotiated settlement, each seemed determined to pursue military victory over the other. Neither achieved sizeable territorial gains or significant political advantage, despite the expenditure of large quantities of externally supplied arms and equipment, the loss of many lives and the displacement of large segments of the Afghan population.

The Taliban, in their bid for international recognition as the legitimate Government of Afghanistan based on their control of almost two thirds of the country, including the capital, Kabul, undertook a series of missions to East Asia, the Gulf region and the United States, gaining recognition from Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates.

In view of the continued conflict and human tragedy, and the stalemated efforts towards a political dialogue, the Secretary-General appointed a Special Envoy for Afghanistan in July to undertake a mission to consult with all concerned, including the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC), on their positions and proposals related to peacemaking efforts in the country. The Secretary-General also convened two informal consultative meetings of concerned countries in New York to address the situation in Afghanistan.

In three presidential statements, the Security Council called on all Afghan parties to put an immediate end to the fighting and return to the negotiating table, stressed that all external interference in Afghan affairs must cease, and, reiterating that continuation of the conflict provided a fertile ground for terrorism and illegal drug production and trafficking, called on the parties to halt such activities. The General Assembly urged the parties to take similar action, encouraged the Secretary-General to pursue the question of preliminary studies on a fair and verifiable arms embargo on Afghanistan and supported his call for an international framework to address the external aspects of the Afghan question.

(For the credentials of Afghanistan to the fifty-second session of the General Assembly, see PART FIVE, Chapter IV.)

UN Special Mission to Afghanistan

Pursuant to General Assembly resolution 51/195 B [YUN 1996, p. 248], the Secretary-General submitted four reports to the Assembly and the Security Council in 1997 on the situation in Afghanistan, one every three months from the date of that resolution's adoption on 17 December 1996. The reports described the military, political and humanitarian developments and progress of the peacemaking efforts of the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan (UN-SMA). Established in 1993 by General Assembly resolution 48/208 [YUN 1993, p. 732], UNSMA was headed by Norbert Heinrich Holl (Germany) until the end of 1997. It maintained temporary headquarters in Islamabad, Pakistan, where it would remain until conditions allowed its return to Kabul.

Report of Secretary-General (March). In his 16 March report [A/51/838-S/1997/240 & Corr.1], the Secretary-General stated that the military situation in Afghanistan witnessed yet another upset at the beginning of the year, with the Taliban forces sweeping through most of the positions held to the north of Kabul by the Supreme Council for the Defence of Afghanistan (SCDA), the opposition coalition (also referred to as the Northern Alliance) composed, in March, of the National Islamic Movement of Afghanistan (NIMA), led by General Rashid Dostum; the Jamiat-I-Islami, led by Professor Burhanuddin Rabbani and his chief military officer, Commander Ahmad Shah Massoud; and the Hezb-I-Wahdat-I-Islami, led by Karim Khalili. Unrest also occurred in Jalalabad, the provincial capital of Nangarhar, Kunar province, in the vicinity of Pul-I-Khumri in Baghlan province and in Konduz.

The Secretary-General noted that, at the end of the reporting period, the Taliban controlled 19 of the 30 provinces of Afghanistan and significant parts of Badghis, Parwan and Kapisa provinces. SCDA was confined to eight northern provinces, in addition to those parts of Badghis, Parwan and Kapisa not held by the Taliban.

Of the rival factions seeking political legitimacy, the Taliban appeared determined to gain military and political control of the whole country and to establish their vision of an Islamic State. By virtue of their control of two thirds of the country, the Taliban were insistent in their demand for formal international recognition as the effective Islamic Government of Afghanistan, entitled to occupy the country's seat in the UN General Assembly, to which the SCDA alliance strenuously objected. Each blamed the other for encouraging foreign interference in Afghanistan's internal affairs, although both were believed to be receiving material and financial support from external allies.

Countries in the region and beyond held meetings on the military developments in the country, especially the recent Taliban northward advances. The Foreign Ministers of Iran, Pakistan and Turkey met (Istanbul, 5 January) to discuss the situation and adopted a declaration calling on the Afghan parties to observe a ceasefire during the holy month of Ramadan and pointing out that a military solution was not a feasible option. Iran subsequently convened a meeting of the Afghan parties (Tehran, 25-26 January), also attended by the Head of UNSMA as an observer, along with representatives of Pakistan, Turkey and Turkmenistan. The Taliban and the Hezb-i-Wahdat did not take part, however. That meeting adopted a declaration urging the warring parties to abandon armed conflict in favour of a constructive dialogue to settle their differences. Fearing possible spillage of the fighting into their borders, the Defence Ministers of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, the Russian Federation, Tajikistan and Uzbekistan also met (Tashkent, 24-25 February) to reaffirm their 1996 commitment [YUN 1996,p.246]tojointdefence.

In spite of continued instability in certain areas, UN agencies and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) continued to carry out their humanitarian activities throughout Afghanistan. Of deep concern were certain Taliban policies, particularly regarding women's access to education and employment and other human rights issues, as well as the continued displacement of people in several areas, including Badghis province and the cities of Herat and Mazar-i-Sharif. Also viewed with apprehension was the reported forcible displacement of people from villages north of Kabul. Between 24 February and 2 March, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees registered some 4,600 internally displaced persons at the Khair Khana checkpoint north of Kabul, bringing the number of arrivals since 2 January to over 115,000. In view of the increased pressure which the displaced were putting on an already overburdened Kabul, the United Nations requested the Taliban authorities to encourage the displaced to return to their home communities and to issue an official statement to that effect. UN agencies and the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) stressed to local authorities that such a return was a priority for all humanitarian organizations.

In addition to those concerns, the Secretary-General noted that certain incidents continued to inhibit the international community's ability to respond to Afghanistan's pressing humanitarian needs. A case in point was the Taliban's detention in Kabul on 21 February of two French nationals working for Action contre la faim, a French-based NGO. Through UNSMA, the Secretary-General appealed for the workers' immediate release, which the Security Council also urged on 25 February.

Given the prevailing circumstances, the Department of Humanitarian Affairs (DHA) of the Secretariat, in cooperation with the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), convened an International Forum on Assistance to Afghanistan (Ashgabat, Turkmenistan, 21-22 January), at which the Head of UNSMA stressed the close link between the donor community's provision of aid and the achievement of progress towards a political settlement. As DHA informed the Council on 28 January, the development of a strategic framework to address Afghanistan's immediate relief and longer-term rehabilitation and development needs was under way.

UNSMA continued its efforts to bring about negotiations for a ceasefire. To that end, it convened an Intra-Afghan Working Group (Islamabad, 13-15 January), which brought together the Taliban and SCDA for the first time. Discussed were a ceasefire, including the creation of an all-party commission to supervise it; the exchange of prisoners and remains; the status of Kabul as a neutral city administered by a civilian authority; the deployment of a neutral police force; and the establishment of a broad-based Islamic Government in Afghanistan. Not being a decision-making body, the Working Group discussed those issues ad referendum.

At the Working Group's second meeting (Islamabad, 24-26 February), confidence-building measures, the draft of a ceasefire agreement prepared by UNSMA, prisoner exchange and the situation in Kabul were considered at length. The two sides tentatively agreed to the UNSMA proposal that a political-level meeting between General Dostum and Mullah Rabbani be convened by 17 March to discuss key issues considered by the Working Group; each further agreed to draw up a list of up to 50 prisoners of war (POWs) for exchange as a confidence-building measure. On 4 March, the Head of UNSMA travelled to Kandahar to discuss with the Taliban Shura member and Governor of Kandahar, Mullah Mohammad Hassan, the next steps to be taken, including the proposed political-level meeting and POW exchange. On 6 March, he flew to Mazar-i-Sharif for a similar discussion with General Dostum. Various other consultations he had had with Member States to seek and coordinate their assistance with the UN peace effort included those with the Presidents of Turkmenistan (21 January) and of Uzbekistan (22 January), with Iranian leaders (25-26 January) and, in Pakistan, with officials and envoys of several other countries.

The Secretary-General reiterated his conviction that a negotiated settlement was the only solution to the long-standing conflict in Afghanistan and that the United Nations was the most appropriate forum to bring that about. He proposed to convene a meeting of concerned countries, like that held on 18 November 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 245], to discuss how best to promote a negotiated settlement and reinforce UN peacemaking efforts. He intended to consult the Afghan parties, Member States and international organizations, in particular OIC, on the advisability of proposals for an intra-Afghan meeting to be held outside Afghanistan, for which he would put forward a plan if and when he deemed it would contribute to the peace process.

The Secretary-General concluded with a renewed appeal to the warring factions to cease all hostilities and take up serious negotiations under the good offices of UNSMA. He urged the countries with influence in Afghanistan to coordinate their activities with those of UNSMA and to refrain from supporting one Afghan party against others.

Communications. By two letters in January, Afghanistan informed the Secretary-General and the Security Council of the forcible transfer of more than 60,000 civilians from Charikar to Kabul [S/1997/54] and of the mass deportation of ethnic Tajiks in districts north of Kabul [S/1997/96]. On 13 April [A/51/875-S/1997/315], it drew attention to reports of massive military mobilization for an assault on northern Afghanistan by the Taliban, who were receiving outside reinforcements at an enormous rate. Afghanistan requested that the Secretary-General and the Security Council take action to prevent the imminent assault.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (April)

The Security Council met from 14 to 16 April [meetings 3765 & resumption 1 & 3766] in Order to consider the situation in Afghanistan. At their request, Afghanistan, Germany, Iran, Italy, the Netherlands, Pakistan, Tajikistan and Turkey were invited to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. At Indonesia's request [S/1997/305], the Permanent Observer of OIC to the United Nations was also invited. Before the Council was the March report of the Secretary-General.

On 16 April, following consultations among its members, the Council authorized its President to make the statement below [S/PRST/1997/20] on the Council's behalf:

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 16 March 1997 concerning the situation in Afghanistan. It has also considered the views expressed at its 3765th meeting, on 14 and 15 April 1997, on the subject.

The Council expresses its grave concern at the continued fighting in Afghanistan and its intensification in recent months. It reiterates that the continuation of the conflict threatens to destabilize the region and prevents steps towards the formation of a fully representative and broad-based government able to address effectively Afghanistan's acute social and economic problems.

The Council calls upon the Afghan parties to cease immediately all hostile actions and to enter into sustained negotiations. The Council strongly believes that a negotiated settlement is the only solution to the long-standing conflict in this country.

The Council fully supports the United Nations efforts to facilitate national reconciliation in Afghanistan. It is convinced that the United Nations must continue to play the central role in assisting the warring Afghan factions in engaging in a fully-fledged negotiating process on the basis of Council resolution 1076(1996) and General Assembly resolution 51/195. The Council welcomes the activities of the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan and supports further efforts by the Secretary-General to give a new impetus to its work. In this context, it welcomes the holding by the Special Mission of intra-Afghan working group meetings in Islamabad but regrets that these efforts have not yet achieved positive results.

The Council deeply regrets that many important provisions of Council resolution 1076(1996) and General Assembly resolution 51/195 remain unimplemented. It calls upon all Afghan parties, in particular the Taliban, to abide by these resolutions, to cooperate fully with the Special Mission and to participate in serious and honest negotiations through the good offices of the Mission. The Council urges interested countries to coordinate their activities with those of the Special Mission and to refrain from supporting one Afghan party against another.

The Council welcomes the convening by the Secretary-General of a meeting of concerned countries on 16 April 1997, following the earlier meeting held in New York on 18 November 1996.

The Council takes note of the intention of the Secretary-General to consult the Afghan parties and all those concerned on the advisability of an intra-Afghan meeting at some stage and requests him to put forward a concrete plan if and when he decides that it will contribute to the peace process.

The Council again calls upon all States to end immediately the supply of arms and ammunition to all parties to the conflict in Afghanistan.

The Council reiterates its concern that the continuation of the conflict in Afghanistan provides a fertile ground for terrorism and drug trafficking which destabilize the region and beyond, and calls upon the leaders of the Afghan parties to halt such activities.

The Council is deeply concerned at the worsening of the humanitarian situation, including the displacement of the civilian population. It is also deeply concerned at the discrimination against women and other violations of human rights and of international humanitarian law in Afghanistan. The Council deplores the mistreatment of personnel of international humanitarian organizations, which inhibits the ability of the international community to respond to Afghanistan's pressing humanitarian needs.

The Council welcomes the convening of an International Forum on Assistance to Afghanistan on 21 and 22 January 1997 at Ashgabat and the forthcoming meeting of the Afghanistan Support Group on 21 April 1997 in Geneva. It encourages all States and international organizations to continue to extend all possible humanitarian assistance, which should be distributed equitably throughout the country.

The Council will remain seized of the matter and requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep it regularly informed of the situation in Afghanistan.

Communication from Secretary-General. On 1 May [S/1997/347], the Secretary-General informed the Security Council that, as he had proposed, he had convened a second informal consultative meeting of concerned countries to address the situation in Afghanistan (New York, 16 April), with the Under-Secretary-General for Political Affairs presiding. The meeting, he said, demonstrated the enduring consensus on the grave dangers of the continued armed conflict for the region and on the central role of the United Nations in coordinating efforts to achieve a peaceful solution. The participants agreed that the territorial integrity and unity of Afghanistan had to be preserved, that the only solution to the conflict was a national accord based on recognition of the legitimate interests and rights of all the Afghan people, and that all forms of foreign interference had to cease. A number of countries, preoccupied by the flow of arms into Afghanistan, supported an arms embargo, while others expressed doubt about its practical effectiveness and whether it could be applied even-handedly.

Proposals were put forward for an intra-Afghan dialogue under UN auspices to be held outside Afghanistan. Many delegations favoured expanding UN consultations beyond the leadership of the factions to include broadly representative Afghan communities and personalities; others suggested increased Council involvement.

The Council, on 13 May [S/1997/366], welcomed the Secretary-General's initiative, took note of the consultative meeting's proposals and stated that the meeting represented a useful international framework which could be convened more frequently. The Council reaffirmed its support for the continuing efforts of the United Nations, in particular those of UNSMA, and stressed that the initiatives of concerned countries should be coordinated with those of the United Nations.

Report of Secretary-General (June). On 16 June [A/51/929-S/1997/482], the Secretary-General reported that the situation in Afghanistan remained volatile. Sporadic fighting continued in: the entrances to the Salang pass and the Panjshir valley north of Kabul; the Ghorband valley bordering Bamyan and Wardak provinces in the central region; Badghis, in the north-west; and the eastern provinces of Kunar, Laghman and Nangarhar. A stand-off between the Taliban and the opposition that persisted in the first two months of the reporting period was broken on 19 May, when General Abdul Malik, a key NIMA commander, staged what appeared to be a pro-Taliban revolt against NIMA leader General Dostum, succeeding on 24 May in wresting control of Mazar-i-Sharif, the NIMA stronghold, from General Dostum, who fled to Turkey.

The Taliban seized that event to launch an offensive on 26-27 May that gained them control of the Salang pass. An estimated 5,000 to 10,000 Taliban troops infiltrated areas north of the Hindu Kush for the first time, including Mazar-e-Sharif, Konduz and Takhar provinces, and began to disarm the NIMA and Hezb-i-Wahdat forces there and to impose strict Shariah Islamic law, closing girls' schools and banning the employment of women. The situation took another twist on 27 May, when General Malik, alarmed by the Taliban's rush to disarm his troops, decided to change sides again and, with the Hezb-i-Wahdat, militarily forced the Taliban to withdraw from Mazar-e-Sharif on 28 May. The Taliban were reported to have suffered a few hundred casualties, with several hundred taken prisoner, among them high-ranking officials, including the Governor of Herat. During the Taliban retreat, Commander Massoud of the Northern Alliance broke out of the Panjshir valley and cut off the northern side of the Salang Tunnel on the Salang/Pul-I-Khumri road. The following day, the Massoud forces retook Golbahar and Jabal-os-Siraj, at the southern end of the Salang pass, trapping some 2,000 Taliban forces north of the Hindu Kush.

The Secretary-General reported that the fighting in Mazar-e-Sharif forced the United Nations on 29-30 May to evacuate 65 international aid workers, journalists and foreign consular staff from that city. A number of NGO and ICRC staff decided to stay behind. The situation in the north remained tense and fluid. Fighting continued at the western, central and northern fronts, and also to the north of Kabul. In Badghis, the front line returned to the Bala Murghab. In the central region of Hazarajat, the two sides were locked in battle in the lowland areas of the Shebar pass, around Sheik Ali and Lulenji in the Ghorband valley, as well as in Wardak province. Reports were that the Taliban were regrouping for a renewed drive to conquer the north and that the opposition was gearing up for defence.

At the end of the reporting period, the Taliban remained in control of about two thirds of Afghanistan. Among the opposition alliance, General Malik's forces controlled the five northern provinces: Balkh (Mazar-e-Sharif), Faryab, Jowzjan, Samangan and Saripul; Professor Rabani and Commander Massoud controlled Badkshan, Konduz, Takhar and part of Kapisa. Bamyan remained under Mr. Khalili.

The political situation during the reporting period was dominated by the military events detailed above. Despite their setback in Mazar-e-Sharif, the Taliban remained determined to overrun the northern region. Unabated foreign support of one faction or another had enabled the antagonists to continue on a confrontational path. Many countries in the region, viewing the Taliban's determination with concern, held extensive consultations regarding the territorial integrity of Afghanistan, the possible outflow of refugees, the destabilization of the border areas and the flow of illegal arms and drugs. At the summit meeting of the 10-member Economic Cooperation Organization (Ashgabat, 13-14 May), the central Asian countries called for a ceasefire and negotiations through UN mediation. A similar call was made by the twelfth Ministerial Conference of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries (New Delhi, 7-8 April) [A/51/912-S/1997/406], adding that a settlement should include the demilitarization of Kabul and the establishment of a fully representative and broad-based transitional government of national unity. On the question of representation at the United Nations, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates had recognized the Taliban as the legitimate representative of Afghanistan.

Commenting on the humanitarian situation, the Secretary-General said that a food and nutrition assessment recently undertaken by UN agencies concluded that the situation was difficult but not alarming for the short term. It recommended that the World Food Programme (WFP) should continue to the end of June the expansion of its safety net scheme under which an additional 110,000 beneficiaries were covered in Kabul, Jalalabad and Kandahar; that donors should endeavour to meet the food aid requirements of WFP, ICRC and NGOs; and that a population-based nutrition survey be carried out periodically to avert high mortality due to malnutrition. The Afghanistan Support Group, at its first meeting (Geneva, 21 April), attended by donor countries, concerned organizations and the Head of UNSMA, discussed support for humanitarian assistance, the UN peace mission, the implementation of a strategic framework and a peace-building programme of international assistance, including emergency relief and reconstruction, and measures to ensure a common approach to upholding women's rights. DHA dispatched a mission to Afghanistan in April to review that issue. Its recommendations and those of the Humanitarian/Resident Coordinator were currently under consideration for the purpose of developing a unified position for all UN agencies working in Afghanistan.

The Secretary-General stated that the Head of UNSMA, in his pursuit of a ceasefire and negotiated settlement, continued to update him and the Council on developments and to consult with senior Secretariat officials and with officials of countries within and outside the region, including Islamabad, London, Moscow, New Delhi and Washington. He maintained regular contact with leaders of the Taliban and the Northern Alliance and other Afghan personalities. The Head of UNSMA was unsuccessful, however, in his attempts to bring about the political-level meeting he had proposed between the opposing sides in a venue outside Afghanistan to follow up the work of the January and February meetings of the Intra-Afghan Working Group.

The Secretary-General observed that the futility of continued fighting, repeatedly underlined by Member States, was increasingly fuelled by strong ethnic feelings between the predominantly Pashtun Taliban, on the one hand, and the Uzbeks, Tajiks and Hazaras who comprised the opposition camp, on the other. While the Member States concerned claimed to agree on the need for peace, it appeared that a number of them were not ready to put concerted pressure on the warring factions to stop their senseless civil war. He noted, however, that some Afghan individuals and groups had taken initiatives to mobilize moderate, influential Afghans inside and outside Afghanistan who were not directly involved in the ongoing fighting. Noting also that only $26.7 million, or about 20 per cent, of the $133 million sought by the 1997 United Nations consolidated appeal for emergency humanitarian assistance for Afghanistan had been received, he urged the international community to provide generous support for the impoverished people of Afghanistan. He called on the Member States concerned to cease their military support to the warring factions, to address in a more substantive way how best to resolve the Afghan conflict and to coordinate their efforts in that regard closely with the United Nations.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (July)

The Security Council met on 9 July [meeting 3796] to consider the Secretary-General's June report. The Council also had before it three letters. One was from Pakistan, dated 27 May [A/51/911-S/1997/408], announcing that country's decision to accord formal recognition to the "new Government of the Islamic State of Afghanistan" under Taliban leadership, adding that the current situation needed to be remedied in which the Burhanuddin Rabbani regime continued to be recognized by the international community even though it had long lost its legitimacy and had been ousted from Kabul. The two other letters were from Afghanistan, one of 2 June [A/51/914-S/1997/424] drawing attention to the involvement of as many as 68 Pakistani military personnel in the recent Taliban operations in the northern provinces, including Mazar-e-Sharif; and another of 16 June [A/51/925-S/1997/463] transmitting the first declaration of the United National and Islamic Front for the Salvation of Afghanistan, outlining essential concepts and major practical points for the solution of the Afghan conflict.

Following consultations among its members, the Council authorized its President to make the statement below [S/PRST/1997/35] on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 16 June 1997 concerning the situation in Afghanistan.

The Council expresses its grave concern at the continued escalation of military confrontation in Afghanistan. It calls for an immediate end to the fighting.

The Council calls upon all Afghan parties to return to the negotiating table immediately and to work together towards the formation of a broad-based, fully representative government that will protect the rights of all Afghans and abide by Afghanistan's international obligations.

The Council, taking into account risks of regional destabilization, believes that peace and stability in Afghanistan can best be attained through intra-Afghan political negotiations under United Nations auspices with the active and coordinated assistance of all countries concerned. It urges the Afghan parties and countries concerned to abide by the provisions of relevant resolutions on Afghanistan adopted by the Council and the General Assembly.

The Council stresses that all external interference in Afghan affairs must cease, and, in this context, it calls upon all States to end immediately the supply of arms and ammunition to all parties to the conflict in Afghanistan.

The Council is deeply concerned at the continuing discrimination against girls and women and other violations of human rights, as well as at violations of international humanitarian law.

The Council reiterates that the continuation of the conflict in Afghanistan provides a fertile ground for terrorism and illegal drug production and trafficking, which destabilize the region and beyond, and calls upon the leaders of the Afghan parties to halt such activities.

The Council is deeply concerned at the worsening of the humanitarian situation, including the displacement of the civilian population. In this regard, it calls upon Member States to respond generously to the 1997 United Nations consolidated appeal for emergency humanitarian assistance for Afghanistan.

The Council reaffirms its full support for the efforts of the United Nations in Afghanistan, in particular the activities of the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan. It requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep it regularly informed of the situation and his efforts, as well as those of the Special Mission.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Communication from Secretary-General. By identical letters of 28 July [A/51/952-S/1997/592] to the General Assembly and the Security Council, the Secretary-General informed them of his decision to appoint a Special Envoy, Lakhdar Brahimi (Algeria), to undertake a short-term mission to consult relevant and interested countries and parties, as well as OIC, on their positions and proposals related to peacemaking efforts in Afghanistan. In so doing, he stressed that the Special Envoy's mandate and activities were discrete from those of UNSMA. The Council welcomed that decision on 31 July [S/1997/597] and expressed full support for the Special Envoy.

Report of Secretary-General (September). The Secretary-General reported on 17 September [A/52/358-S/1997/719] that the military confrontation between the Taliban and the Northern Alliance continued on all fronts during the reporting period. The political situation remained basically unchanged. From their headquarters in Kandahar, the Taliban continued to control Kabul and the predominantly Pashtun-populated areas, while the Northern Alliance, comprising principally the Uzbek, Tajik and Hazara populations, controlled their respective areas from Mazar-e-Sharif, Taloqan and Bamyan. The de facto division of the country along ethnic lines remained a troubling aspect of the situation.

The current six constituent parties of the Northern Alliance—the Junbish-I-Milli (NIMA), the Hezb-I-Wahdat-I-Islami, the Jamiat-I-Islami, the Harakat-I-Islami (led by Sheikh Asef Mohseini), the Jabha-I-Nejat-I-Milli and the Hezb-i-Islami (breakaway faction of the Hezb-I-Wahdat-I-Islami, led by Mohammed Akbari)—forged a more coherent political grouping formally called the "United National and Islamic Front for the Salvation of Afghanistan". Its new government, formed in mid-August, received a setback on 21 August, when its new Prime Minister, Abdul Rahim Ghaffoorzai, died in a plane crash at Bamyan airport. Rejecting UNIFSA's claim to be the legal Government of Afghanistan, the Taliban continued to seek international recognition by dispatching delegations to China, Japan, the Republic of Korea and Thailand. To bolster their position, the Taliban claimed that people in the areas they controlled were living in peace and safety. Continued factional fighting north of Kabul and elsewhere, however, resulted in an increase in the number of internally displaced persons, many of whom had been forced from their homes and, in some cases, arrested merely on suspicion of sympathizing with the anti-Taliban forces. The reality remained that Afghanistan was deadlocked in civil war, with its people bereft of effective government.

Foreign military support to the two sides was undiminished. According to eyewitness reports, on some days during the July and August fighting north of Kabul as many as three or four unmarked transport aircraft were unloading cargoes of arms and ammunition at Mazar-e-Sharif airport for the Northern Alliance; numerous truck convoys of war materiel, along with fuel and other logistical support, were also being supplied to Taliban-controlled territory.

The humanitarian situation remained serious. In August, ICRC reported that the number of direct victims of the conflict had risen sharply since the beginning of the year, as attested by the 200,000 persons displaced by the fighting in the north of Kabul. ICRC further observed the alarmingly high death rate among the war-injured in the districts north of the capital, where one in every two or three eventually died for lack of appropriate care. A joint mission of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations and WFP estimated that, although the cereal harvest for 1997 was expected to be 18 per cent higher than the 1996 harvest of 3.1 million metric tons, emergency food aid was nevertheless required to meet the needs of some 1.75 million people. A landmine survey revealed a situation worse than previously thought. New information indicated that nearly 777—not 550—square kilometres had been mined, of which 322 square kilometres were agricultural, commercial and residential areas and thus required priority demining. However, the Mine Action Programme was faced with a severe lack of funding and urgently needed $4 million to maintain essential activities.

Some 50 representatives of the United Nations, donors, NGOs, ICRC and the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies participated in a meeting (Islamabad, 2 July) to review the implementation of the 1997 consolidated inter-agency appeal for assistance to Afghanistan. As of 3 September, pledges and contributions totalled $41 million, or 31 per cent of the $133 million required. On 2 September, the UNDP Administrator visited Kandahar. He surveyed two UN-supported community-based projects and met with representatives of UN agencies as well as of the Taliban.

The Secretary-General referred to a letter he had sent to all members of the Administrative Committee on Coordination in June, requesting their cooperation in the implementation of the policies and measures adopted by the Executive Committee on Humanitarian Affairs to promote the Afghan authorities' adherence to international legal instruments on the elimination of discrimination against girls and women. He said his Special Adviser on gender issues, Angela King, chaired the meetings of the Ad Hoc Inter-Agency Group on Gender Issues in Afghanistan.

With the permission of the Uzbek authorities, essential commodities were transported by barges in late July from Termez to the northern Afghanistan city of Hairaton: WFP brought in almost 2,000 tons of wheat; ICRC, 3,000 tons of wheat flour; and the United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Assistance to Afghanistan, 10,000 litres of diesel. In Mazar-e-Sharif, humanitarian operations were temporarily suspended in September owing to increased fighting in and around that city.

The Head of UNSMA continued his contacts with the warring parties in an effort to engage them in political dialogue. From 18 to 27 June, he held consultations in Tashkent, Moscow, Paris, Bonn and Rome, meeting with Foreign Ministry and other officials and with former King Zahir Shah. He subsequently shuttled between the Afghan parties, beginning with the Northern Alliance on 10 July and concluding with the Taliban on 7 August, to explore the possibility of their holding direct negotiations, under the good offices of UNSMA, at a neutral location outside the region. Negotiations would begin with a step-by-step approach towards a ceasefire and exchange of prisoners and thence to broader talks aimed at national reconciliation and a durable political settlement.

Both sides agreed in principle on the need for direct talks. The Taliban demanded that the Northern Alliance take certain "confidence-building measures", including the release of some or all of their prisoners, particularly their emissaries who had gone to Mazar to negotiate with General Malik. Flatly rejecting any such measures, General Malik said it was illogical to release POWs before a ceasefire was arranged and made a demand of his own: the demilitarization of Kabul. In a second round of talks, the Northern Alliance appeared ready to meet without preconditions, preferably within the region, but the Taliban refused to drop their demand for prior POW release.

In parallel with UNSMA's negotiating effort, Iran and Pakistan continued their own contacts in Afghanistan with the parties to promote an intra-Afghan dialogue under UN auspices.

In connection with his appointment of Lakhdar Brahimi as Special Envoy for Afghanistan (see above), the Secretary-General said that Mr. Brahimi had begun his mission of consultations on 15 August. The Secretary-General would report in due course on the mission's findings.

Communications. By two letters addressed to the Secretary-General and the Security Council, Afghanistan transmitted two UNIFSA declarations, one issued on 25 July [S/1997/588], calling on the Taliban to abide by the General Assembly and Council resolutions on the demilitarization of Kabul, as well as on the United Nations and OIC to help in the convocation of a Loya Jirga (Grand Decision Making Assembly) within six to nine months; and another declaration adopted on 20 September [A/52/384-S/1997/733], advancing a set of principles to serve as the framework for the future political system in Afghanistan. On 29 September [A/52/403-S/1997/754], Afghanistan warned of Pakistan's escalating attempts to eradicate popular anti-Taliban resistance in the country by dispatching as many as 600 Pakistani special combat troops into Afghanistan, poised with the Taliban for an offensive to the north of Kabul.

Uzbekistan issued a statement on 23 September [A/52/391-S/1997/744] regarding steps to safeguard its border with Afghanistan where clashes between the Afghan parties were occurring. A similar statement was issued on 3 April by Kazakhstan [A/51/854-S/1997/274], which also voiced concern about the fighting near the borders of the Commonwealth of Independent States.

Report of Secretary-General (November).

The Secretary-General's 14 November report [A/52/682-S/1997/894], on developments during the past two months, noted that the fighting had taken a heavy toll in civilian and military casualties, with an estimated 2,000 Taliban troops either killed or captured since May.

The political situation was as deadlocked as the fighting. As to the humanitarian situation, the Secretary-General expressed extreme concern that, in the chaos resulting from the renewed fighting in Mazar-e-Sharif in September, not only were the UN humanitarian and political activities in the area seriously disrupted, but UN offices were also repeatedly looted and, at one point, UN personnel were falsely accused by some Mazar officials of directing the Taliban aerial attacks on the city and threatened with reprisal. Looted UN vehicles were repainted and brazenly used by local factions. Also of concern was General Malik's refusal to allow ICRC to visit the Taliban prisoners captured in May. Especially worrying was the Taliban's refusal to start negotiations with the Northern Alliance without preconditions, as well as their social and administrative practices, which denied to girls and women their right to education, employment and health care. Furthermore, Afghanistan had become the world's largest producer of heroin from poppies cultivated largely in areas under Taliban control. The Secretary-General hoped that the Taliban would implement their recent agreement with the United Nations International Drug Control Programme to work out ways of eliminating poppy cultivation (see also PART THREE, Chapter XIV).

The Special Envoy for Afghanistan, in addition to meeting a number of permanent representatives to the United Nations and representatives of various Afghan parties present in New York, visited Washington in early August for extensive talks with senior officials of the United States Department of State and with foreign diplomats stationed in that city. From 14 August to 23 September, he undertook a 13-nation tour of Afghanistan, France, India, Iran, Italy, Japan, Pakistan, the Russian Federation, Saudi Arabia, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, the United Kingdom and Uzbekistan. In Afghanistan, he visited the cities of Kandahar, Mazar-e-Sharif and Bamyan, accompanied by the Head of UNSMA. In Kandahar, he met the Acting Taliban Foreign Minister, the Deputy Head of the Taliban Supreme Shura in Kabul and the Governor of Kandahar. In Mazar-e-Sharif, he met the leader of NIMA, the newly appointed Prime Minister of the Northern Alliance and representatives of the Jamiat-I-Islami, the Harakat-I-Islami and the Hezb-i-Islami. After his return to New York on 23 September, the Special Envoy continued consultations with representatives of the Afghan parties and the countries concerned, including the Foreign Ministers of Iran, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Oman, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan, who were attending the General Assembly. On 30 September, he briefed the Security Council on his mission.

The Secretary-General described the third consultative meeting of Member States with influence in Afghanistan (New York, 1 October), which he convened under the chairmanship of the Under-Secretary-General for Political Affairs. In attendance were OIC and the group of 21 countries: China, Egypt, France, Germany, India, Iran, Italy, Japan, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Netherlands, Pakistan, Russian Federation, Saudi Arabia, Sweden, Tajikistan, Turkey, Turkmenistan, United Kingdom, United States and Uzbekistan. The Special Envoy and the UNDP Administrator briefed the meeting on their respective missions.

The participants shared the view that the volatile situation in Afghanistan carried serious implications for regional peace and stability. They emphasized the importance of perseverance by the international community in its efforts to bring about a political settlement despite the heretofore insurmountable odds. They believed that there could be no solution based on the dominance of any one ethnic group and that there was a need for a broad-based government. They fully supported the peacemaking activities of UNSMA and felt that the United Nations, as a neutral and impartial mediator, should play the central peacemaking role in Afghanistan. Many stressed the need for more cooperation and coordination among Member States, in particular those in the region, in facilitating peacemaking efforts. There was agreement on the importance of addressing the question of foreign interference, especially the supply of arms to the factions, as a key factor in the prolongation of the fighting. The participants underscored the need for the Afghans to demonstrate a genuine political will to move towards national reconciliation through direct dialogue.

The participants expressed great concern about Afghanistan's contribution to the international drug trade, the influx of Afghan refugees into neighbouring countries, the humanitarian situation in Afghanistan, including serious human rights violations, and the urgent need for mine-clearing. They also felt that the peacemaking activities of the United Nations should be closely coordinated with its humanitarian relief and reconstruction activities.

Following the consultative meeting, the Special Envoy and the Under-Secretary-General for Political Affairs convened a series of small informal gatherings in New York of representatives of Afghanistan's immediate neighbours and of other concerned countries. To date, there had been three meetings of the group of eight countries—China, Iran, Pakistan, the Russian Federation, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, the United States and Uzbekistan—for an exchange of views on the external aspects of the Afghan question, among them how to curb the flow of arms into Afghanistan.

The Secretary-General observed that, despite their declared readiness to work with the United Nations for peace, the Afghan factions had so far failed to prove their willingness to do so by laying down their arms. At any given time there had always been at least one party which felt it could achieve military victory over its opponents and showed a willingness to compromise only when it felt threatened by a reversal in the military situation. At the same time, there were spoilers inside and outside the country who fared better with the continuation of the conflict than they would otherwise—a classic situation in failed States where thriving warlords, smugglers, terrorists and drug dealers would lose out with the return of peace, law and order.

A similar situation prevailed with the main foreign providers of support to the Afghan warring parties, the Secretary-General said. While enthusiastically proclaiming their support for UN peacemaking efforts, they continued to fan the fires of conflict by pouring in arms, money and other supplies to their preferred Afghan factions. Those external players had to be held responsible for exacerbating the bloody conflict in Afghanistan and for fuelling a fire that was already spreading beyond that country's borders, seriously threatening the region and beyond in the form of terrorism, banditry, narcotics trafficking, refugee flows and increasing ethnic and sectarian tension.

The Secretary-General felt it necessary to establish a solid international framework to address the external aspects of the Afghan question in a coherent manner, such as the flow of arms into Afghanistan, to curb which he suggested that the United Nations and Member States should undertake preliminary studies on how a mandatory arms embargo could be implemented in a fair and verifiable manner. Part of his efforts in that direction were the meetings held in New York of countries with influence in Afghanistan (the group of 21), as well as those of the immediate neighbours and other countries (the group of eight). He would continue to convene such informal meetings, with the participation of his Special Envoy. He would maintain through UNSMA and at UN Headquarters close contact with the warring parties, as well as with other influential Afghan individuals and organizations, with a view to preparing the ground for an intra-Afghan dialogue. UNSMA would continue in the primary role of conducting UN peacemaking activities in Afghanistan and maintain its temporary headquarters in Islamabad. Meanwhile, he would explore the possibility of opening a small office in Turkmenistan to enhance UNSMA's information-gathering and liaison capabilities, especially with those parties for whom the location of its headquarters in Islamabad presented difficulties.

The Secretary-General stated that, in the absence of any positive signs suggesting a fundamental change of attitude of those Governments capable of contributing decisively to a peaceful solution to the conflict, it had become increasingly difficult to justify the continuation of UN peace efforts and their attendant costs. He had been somewhat encouraged, however, by the increased attention to the Afghanistan situation manifested by a number of countries which had begun to discuss among themselves the adoption of practical measures to persuade the Afghan parties to embark on serious negotiations. But much more needed to be done by Governments with a greater sense of unity for the peace efforts spearheaded by the United Nations to stand a realistic chance of success.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (December)

The Security Council met on 16 December [meeting 3841] to consider the November report of the Secretary-General. Following consultations among its members, the Council authorized its President to make the statement below [S/PRST/1997/55] on the Council's behalf:

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 14 November 1997 on the situation in Afghanistan and its implications for international peace and security, which was also considered by the General Assembly.

The Council reiterates its grave concern at the continued military confrontation in Afghanistan, which has caused human suffering and material destruction, which threatens to lead to the disintegration of the country and which represents a growing threat to regional and international peace and security. It deplores the unwillingness of the Afghan warring factions to lay down their arms and cooperate with the United Nations for peace.

The Council stresses that the Afghan conflict has no military solution and that the primary responsibility for finding a peaceful settlement lies with the Afghan parties themselves. It urges all Afghan parties to take genuine confidence-building measures, to agree immediately on a ceasefire, and to engage without preconditions in a political dialogue aimed at achieving national reconciliation, a lasting political settlement of the conflict and the formation of a broad-based, fully representative government that will protect the rights of all Afghans and abide by Afghanistan's international obligations.

The Council deplores the fact that foreign military support to the Afghan parties continued unabated through 1997 and reiterates its call to all States to end immediately the supply of arms, ammunition, military equipment, training or any other military support to all parties to the conflict in Afghanistan, including the involvement of foreign military personnel.

The Council encourages the Secretary-General and Member States to undertake preliminary studies on how an effective arms embargo could be imposed and implemented in a fair and verifiable manner.

The Council insists that the United Nations, as a universally recognized and impartial intermediary, must be given all necessary support so that it can continue to play a pivotal, central role in coordinated international efforts, including the efforts of interested countries and organizations, towards a peaceful resolution of the Afghan conflict. It believes that peace and stability in Afghanistan can best be attained through intra-Afghan political negotiations under United Nations auspices with the active and coordinated assistance of all countries concerned. The Council reiterates its full support for the activities and mandates of the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan and those of the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General for Afghanistan.

The Council supports the efforts of the Secretary-General aimed at the establishment of a solid international framework in order to address the external aspects of the Afghan question and, in this context, welcomes the convening of meetings of concerned countries as well as those of the immediate neighbours and other countries.

The Council remains deeply concerned at the continuing discrimination against girls and women and other violations of human rights, as well as at violations of international humanitarian law in Afghanistan.

The Council notes with deep concern the reports about mass killings of prisoners of war and civilians in Afghanistan and supports the intention of the Secretary-General to continue to investigate fully such reports.

The Council expresses serious concern over the looting of United Nations premises and food supplies and deliberate restrictions placed on the access of humanitarian organizations to some parts of the country and on other humanitarian operations, and urges all parties to prevent their recurrence.

The Council reiterates that the continuation of the conflict in Afghanistan provides a fertile ground for terrorism and illegal drug production and trafficking which destabilize the region and beyond, and calls upon the leaders of the Afghan parties to halt such activities.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep it regularly informed about the situation in Afghanistan and his efforts.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 19 December [meeting 78], the General Assembly, having also considered the Secretary-General's November report, adopted resolution 52/211 B without vote [draft: A/52/L.68 & Add.1] [agenda items 20 (c) and 43].

Tajikistan

The United Nations, through the good offices of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Tajikistan, Germ Dietrich Merrem, and assistance from neighbouring countries, in particular Iran, Pakistan and the Russian Federation, stepped up efforts in 1997 to maintain the momentum of negotiations between the Government of Tajikistan and the United Tajik Opposition (UTO) towards paving the way for national reconciliation. The negotiations were propelled forward by the personal involvement of the President of Tajikistan, Emomali S. Rakhmonov, and the Opposition leader, S. Abdullo Nuri, who, in several rounds of inter-Tajik talks during the first half of the year, concluded a number of protocols that culminated in the signing, in June, of the General Agreement on the Establishment of Peace and National Accord in Tajikistan.

The Secretary-General observed that the parties, through a Commission on National Reconciliation (CNR), had begun to implement their commitments under the General Agreement, launching the period of transition expected to lead to elections and the formation of a new Government. In support of their implementation efforts, the Contact Group of guarantor States and organizations had also begun meeting and a donor conference had been scheduled.

In accordance with the additional functions requested of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan (UNMOT) during the transition period and on the recommendation of the Secretary-General, the Security Council, in November, expanded the Mission's mandate and extended it for a six-month period to May 1998.

Inter-Tajik agreements

As noted by the Secretary-General in his reports on the situation in Tajikistan (below), the President of Tajikistan and the leader of UTO held a series of inter-Tajik talks during the first half of 1997, beginning with the 6-19 January round that included the signing on 13 January of the Protocol on Refugees [S/1997/55]. Under that Protocol, the parties would step up efforts towards the voluntary return of all refugees and involuntarily displaced persons to their permanent residences, to which end they would reactivate the 1994 Joint Commission on Refugees; the Government of Tajikistan would assume the obligation to reintegrate the returnees into the country's social and economic life. Included was an appeal to the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) to grant the Tajik refugees identity documents, as well as to the International Monetary Fund (IMF), the World Bank and other financial institutions to provide financial support for the returnees.

At the next round of talks, held in Moscow between 26 February and 8 March, the parties signed the Protocol on Military Issues [S/1997/209], setting forth two sets of provisions, for the reintegration, disarmament and disbandment of the armed units of UTO and for the reform of the power structures of the Government, as well as provisions on confidence-building measures and on the role of the United Nations, through UNMOT, in the Protocol's implementation. Also included were general provisions assigning to a Subcommission on military issues of CNR the implementation of the two sets of provisions and stipulating the exchange of related information between the two sides, a timetable for carrying out those provisions and the treatment of armed units not known to the parties.

Before the Moscow talks, the parties held a meeting in Mashhad, Iran, on 20 and 21 February, also attended by the Special Representative, at which they signed agreements on the Statute of the Commission on National Reconciliation and on an Additional Protocol (to the 1996 Protocol on the main functions and powers of CNR [YUN 1996, p. 261]) on the distribution of senior government posts [S/1997/169].

The President and the UTO leader met again in Bishkek, Kyrgyzstan, from 16 to 18 May, at the end of which they signed the Protocol on Political Questions and the Bishkek Memorandum [S/1997/385]. The Protocol provided for the adoption of a reciprocal pardon act and an amnesty act; the establishment of a central electoral commission, with 25 per cent of its seats to be allocated to UTO; reform of the Government by incorporating UTO representatives in the structures of the executive branch and judicial and law-enforcement bodies on a quota basis; and the lifting of the ban on the activities of political parties and movements of UTO and of the media after the implementation of the second phase of the Protocol on Military Questions. By the Bishkek Memorandum, the parties agreed, inter alia, on the deployment of 460 UTO forces in Dushanbe plus 40 to protect CNR, which would begin to function upon the signing of a general agreement on peace and national accord.

The Tehran round of talks, opened and suspended on 9 April, resumed from 22 to 28 May and concluded with the signing of the Protocol on the Guarantees of Implementation of the General Agreement on the Establishment of Peace and National Accord in Tajikistan [S/1997/410]. By the Protocol, the parties spelt out the main provisions laid down in the 1995 Protocol on the fundamental principles for establishing peace and national accord in Tajikistan [YUN 1995, p. 502]; the 1996 bilateral Agreement and Protocol on the main functions and powers of CNR [YUN 1996, p. 261]; and the 1997 Additional Protocol to the latter Protocol, the CNR Statute, and the three protocols on refugees and political and military issues. The parties requested the United Nations to provide implementation guarantees through the possible adoption of a new UNMOT mandate to include monitoring of the parties' implementation of the General Agreement, the provision of expertise, consultation and good offices and possibly other functions. Afghanistan, Iran, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Pakistan, the Russian Federation, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan agreed to act as guarantor States. As such, they would constitute a Contact Group, which would also include the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) and the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC), with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General as coordinator.

Finally, in Moscow on 27 June, the President of Tajikistan, the leader of UTO and the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Tajikistan signed the General Agreement on the Establishment of Peace and National Accord in Tajikistan and the Moscow Declaration. The Tajik parties also signed a Protocol of Mutual Understanding, which was witnessed by the Special Representative and the Foreign Ministers of Iran and the Russian Federation. The texts of the three documents were circulated by the Russian Federation on 1 July [A/52/219-S/1997/510].

UN Mission of Observers in Tajikistan

The United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan was established by Security Council resolution 968(1994) [YUN 1994, p. 596] for a period of up to six months, subject to the proviso that it would continue beyond 6 February 1995 only if the Tajik parties agreed to extend the 1994 Agreement on a Temporary Ceasefire and the Cessation of Other Hostile Acts on the Tajik-Afghan Border and within the Country for the Duration of the Talks [ibid., p. 594]. The Council had since extended UNMOT a number of times. The extensions in 1997 were made on 14 March and 12 June, each for three months; on 12 September, for two months; and on 14 November, for six months, until 15 May 1998, with an expanded size and revised mandate.

During 1997, UNMOT, in accordance with its original mandate, continued to assist the Joint Commission established under the 1994 Agreement as the formal machinery for implementing that Agreement; to investigate ceasefire violations and report them to the United Nations and the Joint Commission; to provide good offices; to maintain close contact with the parties and liaison with the OSCE Mission in Tajikistan and with the Collective Peacekeeping Forces of CIS; and to provide support for the Secretary-General's Special Envoy (later replaced by the Special Representative) for Tajikistan, as well as political liaison and coordination services.

With the signing in June of the General Agreement on the Establishment of Peace and National Accord in Tajikistan and in accordance with the parties' request for assistance in the implementation of that Agreement, the Council, on the recommendation of the Secretary-General, revised the mandate of UNMOT on 14 November by resolution 1138(1997).

UNMOT maintained headquarters in Dushanbe and team sites in Garm, Kalai-Khumb, Khorog, Kurgan-Tyube, Moskovskiy, Pianj, Tavildara and Vanj, each team site comprising military observers and civilian personnel. UNMOT also maintained a liaison post in Taloqan, Afghanistan.

Personnel security

In view of the continuing high level of violence in Tajikistan, the question of providing security for UN personnel was of paramount concern to the Secretary-General, especially in the discharge of their expanded tasks. As pointed out in his September report [S/1997/686], the area posing the greatest risk extended from Dushanbe to Komsomolabad, through which ran the main road and air route for the movement and supply of UNMOT teams to be stationed in the Karategin Valley and the Tavildara sector. As a result of exploring with the parties the possibility that they might jointly provide security with a combined force drawn from the Tajik army and UTO fighters, the Secretary-General informed the Council on 17 October [S/1997/808] that the President of Tajikistan and the UTO leader had confirmed their agreement to the formation of a Joint Security Unit, which would provide security, including armed escorts, for UNMOT personnel and transports, mainly in the area from Dushanbe to Komsomolabad.

The Secretary-General later reported that the Unit, which would consist of two infantry companies, would be formally established by presidential decree [S/1997/859]. UNMOT had prepared the Unit's rules of engagement and standard operating procedures, as well as a training programme aimed at shaping an effective and disciplined Unit that would set an example for others in the process of reintegration and modernization. UNMOT would support the Unit with communications equipment, rations and fuel. Liaison would be performed by military observers assigned to it. The Unit was expected to begin functioning by the end of November.

Composition

UNMOT was under the command of the Chief Military Observer, Brigadier-General Boleslaw Izydorczyk (Poland), appointed by the Secretary-General through an exchange of letters with the Security Council on 20 and 27 January 1997 [S/1997/76 & 77], to succeed Brigadier-General Hasan Abaza (Jordan), who relinquished his post on 31 December 1996. Brigadier-General Izydorczyk assumed his responsibilities on 10 March 1997.

As at 5 November 1997, UNMOT comprised 44 military observers from nine contributing countries and 67 civilian personnel, of whom 27 were internationally recruited. As expanded by Council resolution 1138(1997), to include also support to the Joint Security Unit (see above), UNMOT would have a strength of 75 military observers and 2 civilian police. It would be supported by 46 international staff and 100 locally recruited staff.

Financing

On 13 June 1997 [meeting 101], the General Assembly considered the Secretary-General's reports on UNMOT of 24 January [A/51/784] and 11 February [A/51/784/Add.1] on its financial performance from 17 June to 15 December 1995 and from 16 December 1995 to 30 June 1996, respectively; and of 12 February 1997 [A/51/784/Add.2] on its proposed budget for the 12-month period from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998, together with the related reports of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions [A/51/8501 and of the Office of Internal Oversight Services [A/51/432]. On the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/51/920], the Assembly adopted resolution 51/237 without vote [agenda item 138].

Financing of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan, the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions and the report of the Office of Internal Oversight Services,

Recalling Security Council resolution 968(1994) of 16 December 1994, by which the Council established the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan, and the subsequent resolutions by which the Council extended the mandate of the Mission of Observers, the latest of which was resolution 1099(1997) of 14 March 1997,

8. Decides also that, in accordance with the provisions of its resolution 973(X) of 15 December 1955, there shall be set off against the apportionment among Member States, as provided for in paragraph 7 above, their respective share in the Tax Equalization Fund of the estimated staff assessment income of 554,400 dollars approved for the period from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998;

Activities

Report of Secretary-General (January). In his report of 21 January [S/1997/56], the Secretary-General reviewed developments in Tajikistan during the preceding month, including compliance by the Government and UTO with the provisions of the ceasefire restored as from 12 December 1996 under the terms of their bilateral Agreement initialled in Khushdeh, Afghanistan, on 11 December 1996 and formally signed in Moscow on 23 December [YUN 1996, p. 261]. Thereport annexed a joint statement on the main agreements reached during the 10-11 December 1996 inter-Tajik talks and an appeal for the extension of UNMOT (annex I); the agreement on the restoration of the 1994 ceasefire (annex II); a Protocol on Refugees signed on 13 January 1997 (annex III); and a joint statement on the results of the inter-Tajik talks held in Tehran, Iran, from 6 to 19 January (annex IV), as described below.

At that round of inter-Tajik talks, the President of Tajikistan and the UTO leader achieved progress on the statute of CNR, governing its functioning during the transition period until a new parliament was formed, leaving unresolved, however, the allocation of the CNR seats and appropriate security guarantees for UTO members. The parties also discussed a draft protocol on political problems, initialling agreement on three substantive issues: mutual forgiveness and amnesty, UTO participation in a central electoral commission, and the integration of UTO representatives into the Government during the transition period. Agreement was not reached on a fourth issue, namely, the modalities and conditions for reforming military and political movements into political parties and for lifting the ban on their activities. The talks concluded with the signing of the Protocol on Refugees.

As reported by UNMOT, the security situation was such that, on 20 December 1996, 23 persons, including Joint Commission members, government officials and servicemen and 9 UN personnel travelling from Garm to the capital, Dushanbe, were taken hostage and held in Kalainav, 5 kilometres west of Obigarm, by an armed group who requested the release of UTO-held prisoners. All the hostages were released by 26 December following intensive negotiations by the Government, UTO and UNMOT, although the armed group's demand for the release of Commander Rizvon Sodirov and some of his men, who were being held by UTO in northern Afghanistan, was not met. Acts of violence undermined security in Dushanbe in mid-December, when three bombs exploded in the town centre, claiming the lives of several people. In early January 1997, two Tajik security officers were murdered and four Russian servicemen lost their lives to what was believed to have been terrorist acts. In Tursunzade on 8 January, fighting broke out between the Government's Rapid Reaction Brigade and the mayor's security forces over the Brigade Commander's demand that the previous mayor be reinstated and stolen equipment returned. In the process, the Brigade took over the administration building. Presidential Guard forces dispatched to protect the town's aluminium plant were blocked by some 400 townspeople. The situation in Tursunzade, the site of previous disturbances, remained unsettled.

A demonstration was held in Khujand on 18 January, demanding representation of the National Renaissance Block (founded by three former Prime Ministers from the region) in CNR. The local government agreed to send a message to the President urging him to meet with the Block's leader regarding the inclusion of the interests of all political parties and movements on the agenda of the next inter-Tajik talks. In the Karategin Valley and the Tavildara sector, tense calm prevailed. The Government and UTO continued their contacts and agreed that all checkpoints along the Garm-Dushanbe road should be removed and the road be opened to civilian traffic. On 16 January, the Government confirmed that, in accordance with the terms of the ceasefire, UTO had released all government military personnel taken prisoner during the fighting in November and December 1996. However, the activity of armed groups not under the effective control of either the Government or UTO, notably that led by Rizvon Sodirov, continued to pose serious obstacles to the ceasefire's implementation.

The Secretary-General observed that the situation in Tajikistan remained extremely fluid. However, the parties' December 1996 agreements had given new impetus to efforts aimed at achieving reconciliation, which, he pointed out, required the international community's vigorous support. The agreements also entailed new responsibilities for UNMOT, which it would discharge to the extent that its essential security requirements were met. The Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Tajikistan would pursue with the parties the practical implications of cooperation with CNR for UN operations in Tajikistan.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (February)

The Security Council met on 7 February [meeting 3739] to consider the Secretary-General's January report, together with its annexes. At its request, Tajikistan was invited to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. In addition to the report, the Council had before it several communications transmitting the following documents: a statement by Ukraine [YUN 1996, p. 262] calling for the unconditional release of the hostages seized on 20 December (see above); the 1996 bilateral Agreement between the Government of Tajikistan and UTO and the Protocol on the basic functions and powers of CNR [ibid., p. 261]; and a joint statement by Iran and the Russian Federation welcoming the agreement of the two sides to a complete ceasefire and the formation of organs of authority [ibid.].

Following consultations among its members, the Council authorized its President to make the statement below [S/PRST/1997/6] on the Council's behalf:

The Security Council has considered the progress report of the Secretary-General of 21 January 1997 on the situation in Tajikistan, submitted pursuant to paragraph 6 of Council resolution 1089(1996) of 13 December 1996.

The Council welcomes the signing in Moscow on 23 December 1996 by the President of Tajikistan and the leader of the United Tajik Opposition of the agreement, including the protocol on the Commission on National Reconciliation, and notes the progress made in the inter-Tajik talks in Tehran, in particular the signing of the protocol on refugees. It believes that these agreements, provided they are carried out as written, represent a qualitative change for the better and give a new impetus to efforts aimed at achieving national reconciliation. The Council urges the parties to honour and implement consistently and in good faith the agreements already reached, in particular in the course of negotiating future agreements. It also urges them to make further substantive progress at the next rounds of the inter-Tajik talks.

The Council notes with satisfaction that the ceasefire has been generally observed by the parties since December 1996 and calls upon them to maintain it scrupulously for the whole duration of the inter-Tajik talks in accordance with their obligations and commitments.

The Council commends the efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and calls upon the parties to cooperate fully with him in continuing the inter-Tajik talks. The Council also commends the efforts of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan in fulfilling its mandate.

The Council calls upon the parties to ensure the safety and the freedom of movement of the personnel of the United Nations, the collective peacekeeping forces of the Commonwealth of Independent States and other international personnel in Tajikistan.

The Council strongly condemns the attacks on and kidnapping of international personnel, in particular personnel of the Mission, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the International Committee of the Red Cross and others, and demands the immediate release of all those taken hostage. It stresses the inadmissibility of kidnapping and any other mistreatment of United Nations personnel and supports the efforts of the Secretary-General to ensure that the essential security requirements of the Mission are met.

In this context, the Council expresses satisfaction at the efforts by and cooperation between the Mission, the Russian Federation and the parties to resolve the hostage crisis.

The Council considers it necessary for the United Nations to continue its vigorous support for the political process in Tajikistan. It takes note of the request from the parties to the Mission to extend the necessary assistance in the implementation of the Moscow agreement and to cooperate closely with the Commission on National Reconciliation in its activities. The Council accepts the recommendation of the Secretary-General not to change the nature and size of the United Nations presence in Tajikistan at this stage. It requests the Secretary-General to keep the situation under review and to submit in due course his recommendations with regard to the United Nations presence in Tajikistan in the light of the progress in implementation of the inter-Tajik agreements and bearing in mind the request for assistance by the parties contained in the Moscow agreement and the tasks and functions that would be required to provide such assistance.

The Council expresses deep concern over the deteriorating humanitarian situation in Tajikistan and calls for continuing emergency relief, including assistance for the return of refugees, in the context of the implementation of the protocol on refugees, and support to Tajikistan for rehabilitation, aimed at mitigation of the consequences of the war and reconstruction of its economy.

Report of Secretary-General (March). Pursuant to Security Council resolution 1089(1996) [YUN 1996, p. 260], the Secretary-General submitted a 5 March report [S/1997/198] updating the record of developments in Tajikistan and of the activities of UNMOT and his Special Representative. According to the report, the ceasefire between the Government and UTO generally held. The tense calm that had prevailed in the Karategin Valley and the Tavildara sector eased as a result of the joint efforts of high-level government and UTO representatives, with the support of the Joint Commission and UNMOT, to ensure the implementation of the ceasefire accord. Responding to a request from the two parties to deploy additional teams in the area, UNMOT carried out a number of patrols in mid-January to confirm the security guarantees it had received from both for free and unimpeded movement along the Dushanbe-Garm road. Having encountered no obstacles, UNMOT prepared for an initial deployment to Komsomolabad and Childara on 7 February.

Meanwhile, on 3 February, five UNMOT personnel en route from Garm to Dushanbe for the medical evacuation of a military observer were taken hostage by the same armed group that had staged the hostage-taking of 20 December 1996. Commanded by Bakhrom Sodirov, the group again demanded the return of its leader, Rizvon Sodirov, along with 40 of his fighters, from northern Afghanistan. The group subsequently abducted additional hostages: seven on 5 February—a representative of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) together with her interpreter, and five journalists, including three Russians; four staff of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) in Dushanbe on 6 February; and, on 7 February, the Tajik Minister for Security who was negotiating the release of the other hostages.

Between the release of the two ICRC staff and the sick UNMOT military observer on 7 and 11 February, respectively, Rizvon Sodirov was delivered to the armed group's camp at Kalainav. Continued negotiations, conducted personally by the President, in consultation with the UTO leader, UNMOT, the Russian Federation and Commander Ahmad Shah Massoud of the Northern Alliance of Afghanistan, achieved the release of the remaining hostages in three stages that began on 14 February with the exchange of two hostages for the 40 Sodirov fighters who had arrived in Obigarm from Afghanistan that day, and continued on 16 February, with the release of five more hostages as the fighters were delivered to the Kalainav camp, and on 17 February with the release of the remaining six hostages. Immediately thereafter, government and UTO forces reportedly besieged the Sodirov group, apparently without a decisive result.

On 18 February, seven persons, including Russians, were assassinated in Dushanbe. Five UTO members suspected of the assassinations and other killings were arrested and in government custody. UNMOT had since been warned that UTO elements might take UN personnel hostage to obtain the release of those five suspects.

In the light of those developments, the Secretary-General, on 8 February, authorized the suspension of all UN activities in Tajikistan and the relocation of all UN personnel to Tashkent, Uzbekistan, except for a small UNMOT team in Dushanbe and a civilian liaison office in Khujand. The UNMOT liaison officer in Taloqan was also withdrawn. For the time being, military observers whose tour of duty had come to an end were not being replaced.

The Special Representative continued his contacts with both sides, as well as with representatives of observer countries, in an effort to bridge the gap on certain outstanding political issues and to advance preparations for the next round of inter-Tajik talks on military issues. A number of Tajik groups not represented by either the Government or UTO had expressed to UNMOT their desire to be included in the political process. The parties were thus encouraged to associate relevant groups with the talks in some form or another.

At the invitation of the Russian Federation, the next round of inter-Tajik talks began in Moscow on 26 February, which the Special Representative opened. The Government and UTO presented working papers on military issues, specifically the reform of government power structures (the armed forces, police and security apparatus) and the disarmament and reintegration of UTO forces into those structures or civilian life. The talks were interrupted on 3 March, however, to allow UTO to visit the five UTO detainees in Dushanbe. The Government also allowed UNMOT and ICRC access to them. As later reported by the Secretary-General [S/1997/415], the talks concluded on 8 March with the signing of the Protocol on Military Issues [S/1997/209]. Prior to the Moscow meetings, the parties met in Mashhad, Iran, on 20 and 21 February, also attended by the Special Representative, at the conclusion of which they signed agreements on the Statute of CNR and on an additional protocol (to the protocol on CNR's functions and powers) on the distribution of senior government posts [S/1997/169]. They also issued a joint communique deploring acts of terrorism.

The Secretary-General observed that the agreements reached in Mashhad added to the growing list of substantive agreements concluded in the last two and a half months. The negotiating process, propelled forward by the decisive personal involvement of the President and the UTO leader, had acquired a strong momentum. At the same time, however, he was profoundly disturbed by the threats to UN personnel, who were trying to provide support to that process in the face of great difficulty. He said he could not in good conscience allow them to return to Tajikistan to conduct their functions unless their safety was reasonably assured. He had thus decided that, so long as the situation in the country continued in a state of flux and international personnel were at particular risk, he would maintain the suspension of UN activities, except for a limited UNMOT presence. That decision remained subject to a reassessment of the situation and to the Government's institution of further, more rigorous security measures.

In the circumstances, the Secretary-General recommended that the Council extend the UNMOT mandate, due to expire on 15 March, for a further period of three months, until 15 June. Should the Council agree to that extension, the cost of maintaining UNMOT was estimated at $623,242 gross per month, assuming continuance of its existing strength and responsibilities.

Communication. The Presidency of the European Union (EU) issued a declaration on 12 March [A/51/840-S/1997/246] by which the EU welcomed the results of the latest inter-Tajik talks in Mashhad and Moscow and called on all parties to the conflict to ensure the safety of UN personnel and all others engaged in providing assistance in Tajikistan and to avoid hostage-taking.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (March)

The Security Council met on 14 March [meeting 3752] to consider the Secretary-General's March report. At its request, Tajikistan was invited to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. Following statements from Tajikistan, the Russian Federation and the United States, the Council unanimously adopted resolution 1099(1997), based on a draft [S/1997/216] prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions and the statements by its President,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 5 March 1997,

Reaffirming its commitment to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Tajikistan and to the inviolability of its borders,

Welcoming the agreements signed by the President of Tajikistan and the leader of the United Tajik Opposition since December 1996, by which the efforts towards national reconciliation have made important progress and gained strong momentum, noting with satisfaction the personal contribution made in this respect by the President of Tajikistan and the leader of the United Tajik Opposition, with the assistance of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative, and encouraging the parties to continue their efforts to this end,

Welcoming, in particular, the results of the latest round of inter-Tajik talks held in Moscow from 26 February to 8 March 1997, including the signing of the protocol on military issues, which contains agreements on reintegration, disarmament and disbandment of the armed units of the United Tajik Opposition, reforming the power structures of the Republic of Tajikistan and a detailed timetable for their implementation,

Taking note of the requests of the parties, contained in the statute of the Commission on National Reconciliation and in the protocol on military issues, for the assistance of the United Nations in the full and effective implementation of those agreements,

Gravely concerned about the worsening humanitarian situation in Tajikistan,

Deeply concerned about continuing attacks on the personnel of the United Nations, the collective peacekeeping forces of the Commonwealth of Independent States and other international personnel in Tajikistan, and deploring the deterioration in the security situation which necessitated the decision of the Secretary-General to suspend the United Nations activities in Tajikistan, except for a limited presence of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan,

1. Expresses its appreciation for the report of the Secretary-General of 5 March 1997;

2. Welcomes the agreements reached by the parties since December 1996, in particular the protocol on military issues, which represents an important new step towards the successful completion of the task of national reconciliation in Tajikistan, and calls upon the parties to honour and implement consistently and in good faith those agreements, as well as to make further substantive progress in the next rounds of the inter-Tajik talks;

3. Expresses its satisfaction that the ceasefire has been generally observed by the parties since December 1996, and calls upon the parties to maintain it scrupulously for the whole duration of the inter-Tajik talks, in accordance with their obligations and commitments;

4. Strongly condemns the acts of mistreatment against personnel of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan and other international personnel, and urgently calls upon the parties to cooperate in bringing the perpetrators to justice, to ensure the safety and freedom of movement of the personnel of the United Nations, the collective peacekeeping forces of the Commonwealth of Independent States and other international personnel, and to cooperate fully with the Mission;

5. Calls upon the Government of Tajikistan, in particular, to take further, more rigorous security measures to this end, thus enabling the international community vigorously to support Tajikistan on its difficult path from armed conflict to normal peaceful life;

6. Decides to extend the mandate of the Mission until 15 June 1997, subject to the proviso that the Tehran agreement remains in force and the parties demonstrate their commitment to the agreements already reached, and further decides that this mandate will remain in effect until that date unless the Secretary-General reports to the Council that these conditions have not been met;

7. Welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to inform the Council of any significant developments with regard to the situation in Tajikistan, in particular of a decision to resume all those United Nations activities presently suspended, including those of the Mission;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to inform the Council by 30 April 1997 on possible ways and means by which the United Nations could assist in the implementation of the protocol on military issues;

9. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit a report on the situation in Tajikistan to the Council no later than 1 June 1997, including recommendations on the United Nations presence in Tajikistan, in particular the manner in which the United Nations can assist in the implementation of the inter-Tajik agreements, based on the requests by the parties contained in those agreements and in the light of the security situation;

10. Commends the efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and of the personnel of the Mission, and calls upon the parties to cooperate fully with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General in conducting the inter-Tajik talks in order to achieve a comprehensive political settlement;

11. Calls upon Member States and others concerned to respond promptly and generously to the consolidated inter-agency donor alert on urgent humanitarian needs for the period from 1 December 1996 to 31 May 1997, launched by the Secretary-General, and to offer support to Tajikistan for rehabilitation, aimed at mitigation of the consequences of the war and reconstruction of its economy;

12. Encourages Member States to contribute to the voluntary fund established by the Secretary-General in accordance with its resolution 968(1994) of 16 December 1994;

13. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Communication. By a decision adopted in Moscow on 28 March [S/1997/268], the CIS Council of Heads of State, responding to the appeal of the President of Tajikistan, extended the length of stay of the CIS collective peacekeeping forces to 30 June.

Report of Secretary-General (May). As requested by Security Council resolution 1099(1997), the Secretary-General submitted a report of 30 May [S/1997/415] on the situation in Tajikistan, which also contained recommendations on the UN presence in the country. He noted that the parties met in Tehran on 9 April for another round of inter-Tajik talks, which were almost immediately suspended by UTO over the Government's request to the Russian Federation and other CIS countries to arrest and extradite 11 UTO supporters charged with complicity in the Dushanbe assassinations of 18 February, as well as the continued detention of the five UTO members suspected of being the assassins (see above). UTO also protested against the Government's arrest of eight opposition fighters in Shuroabad. As the talks remained stalled, the parties left Tehran on 16 April.

On the initiative of the Special Representative, the President and the UTO leader met in Bishkek, Kyrgyzstan, from 16 to 18 May, at the end of which they signed the Protocol on Political Questions and the Bishkek Memorandum [S/1997/385].

The Tehran round of talks resumed from 22 to 28 May, which concluded with the signing of the Protocol on the Guarantees of Implementation of the General Agreement on the Establishment of Peace and National Accord in Tajikistan [S/1997/410]. Among the provisions of the Protocol was a request by the parties that the United Nations provide implementation guarantees through the possible adoption of a new UNMOT mandate to include monitoring of the parties' implementation of the General Agreement, the provision of expertise, consultation and good offices and possibly other functions.

The Secretary-General reported that the ceasefire continued to hold. Both sides coordinated efforts to ensure wide acceptance of the Protocol on Military Issues by sending joint delegations to visit their field commanders in the Karategin Valley and the Tavildara sector, and in Tepeei-Samarkandi and Kofarnikhon. A government delegation also visited Leninabad province to explain the provisions of the protocols and to mobilize support for the peace process. However, tensions rose in early April in Tepeei-Samarkandi, where an opposition commander claimed the agreements were violated by the Government and, on 7 May, took two Joint Commission members and a government official hostage, demanding the withdrawal of government forces from the area. The situation was defused and the hostages released following UTO and UNMOT intervention. On 24 May, the Government lodged a protest with the Joint Commission against the establishment of new UTO posts in Tepeei-Samarkandi, Nurek and Kofarnikhon.

The security situation, particularly in Dushanbe, in Nurek and along the road from Dushanbe to Garm/Tavildara, remained precarious for six weeks from 17 February, as the Government and UTO mounted a joint operation against the hostage takers based in the hills near Obigarm. One of their two leaders (Bakhrom Sodirov) was captured; the other (Rizvon Sodirov) remained at large. On 30 April, an attempt was made to assassinate the President during his visit to Khujand, in Leninabad. The President ascribed the assassination attempt to criminal elements, stating that it was not politically motivated. The UTO leadership condemned the attempt, as did the Parliament [S/1997/353]. In separate incidents in Dushanbe in March and May, two Russian servicemen of the CIS peacekeeping forces were shot and killed; also, on 27 March, an explosive device was thrown at a parked vehicle belonging to an international non-governmental organization (NGO). In the second week of April, a confrontation between two army units in Tursunzade, reportedly over control of the aluminium plant there, resulted in some 25 casualties.

UN activities in the country resumed on 12 May, when the Secretary-General authorized the return from Tashkent of the heads of UN agencies and essential staff and the military observers. UNMOT resumed liaison with the Government, the Joint Commission, the CIS peacekeeping forces and the Russian border forces, and carried out limited patrolling. In the aftermath of the hostage crisis in February, UNMOT instituted stringent security measures. The Government also strengthened security around UNMOT premises, but had yet to ensure that the UNMOT headquarters building, currently shared by a Tajik NGO, was exclusively for UN use. Owing to the uncertain security along the road from Dushanbe to points east, UNMOT, in mid-April, leased a helicopter, but the airport authorities had so far impeded its use.

Provision of humanitarian assistance in the country was seriously affected during the suspension of UN activities (8 February-12 May). However, some agencies were able to continue implementing emergency programmes through local staff. The World Food Programme (WFP) distributed some 3,200 metric tons of food through its large network of food monitors in Gorniy Badakhshan and Khatlon provinces during March and April; and the United Nations Children's Fund was able to deliver drugs and vaccines to Leninabad. Other humanitarian organizations, such as ICRC and the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies (IFRC), and NGOs played a key role in ensuring the continuation of relief and rehabilitation assistance programmes. The UN agencies agreed on 10 April to extend the donor alert for another three months, until the end of August. As part of its programme of emergency assistance to Tajikistan, WFP, on 23 May, issued an appeal for emergency food aid for one year, estimated at $16 million, for 500,000 people. The UN agencies and the Bretton Woods institutions (IMF and the World Bank) had begun discussions at the field level on the development of an appropriate inter-agency strategy to support the peace process, which would include, among other elements, the transition from humanitarian relief to rehabilitation and development assistance.

The Secretary-General stated that the signing of the protocol on the guarantees of implementation of the General Agreement completed the series of separate protocols to be concluded by the parties called for in the 1995 Protocol on the fundamental principles for establishing peace and national accord [YUN 1995, p. 502]. He was gratified that the determination and effort invested by the United Nations in those negotiations had been rewarded by success. He said the agreements were broad in scope and complex, and putting them into political practice required the parties' good faith and constant effort. Far from being self-implementing, the agreements envisioned the support and assistance of the international community in almost every aspect of their implementation and assigned to the United Nations a leading role in that regard. They also enlisted the assistance of two regional organizations: OSCE, to assist in the development of democratic political and legal institutions and processes; and the CIS peacekeeping forces, to escort, under UNMOT supervision, UTO personnel, weapons and ammunition from the Tajik-Afghan border to designated assembly areas.

UNMOT, in addition to monitoring the cease-fire and providing general political support and good offices, as well as technical and specialized advice as appropriate, would, pursuant to the Protocol on Military Issues, also monitor the process of reintegration, disarmament and disbandment of the UTO armed units and the reform of the governmental power structures. The Secretary-General pointed out that, for UNMOT to fulfil those additional tasks, its military strength and civilian complement would need to be significantly increased. It was imperative to keep in mind, he added, that security was an important consideration in the UNMOT operation, since in certain parts of Tajikistan deployment of unarmed personnel entailed unacceptable levels of risk. He suggested that the CIS peacekeeping forces could assume responsibility for the security of UN personnel, subject to its acceptance by all parties concerned.

Pending further developments issuing from the agreements, the Secretary-General recommended extension of the UNMOT mandate, due to expire on 15 June, for a period of three months, until 15 September. Should the Council agree to the recommended extension, the cost of maintaining UNMOT would be limited to approximately $664,000 a month, based on an estimated cost of $7,967,700 gross for the 12-month period from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (June)

The Security Council met on 12 June [meeting 3788] to consider the Secretary-General's May report and invited Tajikistan, at its request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The Council adopted resolution 1113(1997) unanimously, based on a draft [S/1997/444] prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions and the statements by its President,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 30 May 1997 on the situation in Tajikistan,

Reaffirming its commitment to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Tajikistan and to the inviolability of its borders,

Welcoming the signing by the Government of the Republic of Tajikistan and the United Tajik Opposition in Moscow on 8 March 1997 of the protocol on military issues, in Bishkek on 18 May 1997 of the protocol on political questions and in Tehran on 28 May 1997 of the protocol on the guarantees of implementation of the general agreement on the establishment of peace and national accord in Tajikistan,

Noting that those agreements foresee the support and assistance of the international community, in particular the United Nations, in different aspects of their implementation,

Expressing concern that the security situation in Tajikistan remains precarious and that the humanitarian situation has continued to deteriorate,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 30 May 1997;

2. Calls upon the parties to implement fully the agreements reached in the course of the inter-Tajik talks, and encourages them to sign the general agreement on the establishment of peace and national accord in Tajikistan as a matter of priority;

3. Emphasizes that the implementation of the agreements reached in the course of the inter-Tajik talks will require the consistent good faith and constant effort of the parties, as well as the sustained and vigorous support of the United Nations and the international community;

4. Calls upon the parties to cooperate further in ensuring the safety and freedom of movement of the personnel of the United Nations, the collective peacekeeping forces of the Commonwealth of Independent States and other international personnel;

5. Commends the efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and of the personnel of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan, and calls upon the parties to cooperate fully with them;

6. Decides to extend the mandate of the Mission for a period of three months until 15 September 1997;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council informed of significant developments and to present to the Council, as soon as appropriate, detailed recommendations on the role of the United Nations in support of the implementation of the inter-Tajik agreements and the adjustment of the mandate and strength of the Mission;

8. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Report of Secretary-General (September). In his report of 4 September [S/1997/686], the Secretary-General stated that, in Moscow on 27 June, the President of Tajikistan, the leader of UTO and the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Tajikistan signed the General Agreement on the Establishment of Peace and National Accord in Tajikistan and the Moscow Declaration. The Tajik parties also signed a Protocol of Mutual Understanding, witnessed by the Special Representative and the Foreign Ministers of Iran and the Russian Federation. The signing ceremony was attended by the Russian President, the Foreign Ministers of the observer countries, the OIC Secretary-General, senior OSCE officials and the UN Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations. The texts of the three documents were circulated by the Russian Federation on 1 July [A/52/219-S/1997/510].

While in Moscow, the OIC Secretary-General signed the 28 May Protocol on the guarantees of implementation of the General Agreement, to which Uzbekistan acceded on 26 August. The Contact Group of guarantor States and organizations—Afghanistan, Iran, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Pakistan, Russian Federation, Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, OSCE, OIC—created by that Protocol convened in Dushanbe on 16 July and had since met several times.

In accordance with the Protocol of Mutual Understanding, CNR met in Moscow from 7 to 11 July, during which it adopted an Act on Mutual Forgiveness, signed by the President on 14 July, and prepared a draft Act on Amnesty, which the Parliament adopted on 1 August. Those acts, marking a step forward in the process of national reconciliation, were followed by the exchange of 49 captured government soldiers and 48 detained UTO supporters between 18 and 20 July. The parties confirmed their intention to complete preparations for CNR to begin its work, including arrangements for the stationing of the 460 UTO fighters in Dushanbe, which were finalized on 2 September.

The Secretary-General observed that the General Agreement and the separate protocols constituted a broad mandate for political change but did not provide a detailed blueprint, nor did the General Agreement contain a formal timetable for all the measures to be accomplished during the transition period. It was left to CNR to work out solutions to the many issues to be addressed. Consequently, the related assistance expected from the international community had been described largely in general terms, with some exceptions, notably in the Protocol on Military Issues. During the negotiations, the deadline of July 1998 in that Protocol was taken as the target date for the completion of the transition as a whole.

The Protocol on Refugees established a timetable of 12 to 18 months (from January 1997) for the return of refugees and internally displaced persons to their places of residence. UNHCR would continue to carry out its responsibilities in that respect.

On the day of the signing of the General Agreement, the President and the UTO leader wrote to the Secretary-General [S/1997/508] to express their gratitude for the help of the United Nations during the negotiating process and to request further assistance in implementing the inter-Tajik agreements, in particular in organizing a meeting of potential donors. Accordingly, under the Special Representative's leadership, UN agencies, bilateral agencies and NGOs subsequently prepared a draft document addressing the specific support requirements, for presentation to a donor conference to be arranged.

To ensure unity of purpose and effort, and in accordance with his reform plan streamlining UN multidisciplinary field operations [A/51/950], the Secretary-General gave his Special Representative authority during the transition period over all UN entities in Tajikistan and appointed the United Nations Resident Coordinator as his Deputy. At UN Headquarters, a Task Force on Tajikistan had been established to draw up priorities for peace-building and to ensure coordination.

The Secretary-General outlined the additional functions of UNMOT for the duration of the transition period (see above, under "UN Mission of Observers in Tajikistan"), to discharge which its military component would need to be increased from its authorized strength of 44 military observers to 120. Deployment would be in small teams at the agreed 10 assembly areas (Vanj, Garm, Jirgatal, Komsomolabad, Kofarnikhon, Rushan, Tavildara and Tajikabad districts and the towns of Khorog and Magmurud) for the registration of UTO armed units, at the two crossing points (Ishkashim and Nizhniy Pianj, in Afghan territory) for the transfer to Tajikistan of other UTO units currently in Afghanistan and at certain regional centres, as well as at UNMOT headquarters in Dushanbe. The increase took into account that the crossing points were to be closed after two months. The number of military observers could be reduced once the merger of former UTO units with the governmental power structures was under way. The administrative component of UNMOT would be strengthened correspondingly, as would its communications, road and air transport and other facilities, bearing in mind the mountainous terrain, poor road conditions and road links cut off during the harsh winter months.

The Secretary-General recommended that the Security Council expand the mandate of UNMOT to include the functions he outlined, authorize its strengthening in the numbers indicated above, and extend the mandate for an initial period of six months. In an addendum to his report [S/1997/686/Add.1], the Secretary-General stated that the cost associated with the expansion of UNMOT was estimated at approximately $14.8 million for the six-month period. Annexed to the addendum was a breakdown of that figure by main categories of expenditure.

In his review of developments on the ground, the Secretary-General reported that the situation in Tajikistan continued to be volatile. In several parts of the country, violent incidents occurred, including: bomb explosions in Khorog, the administrative capital of Gorno-Badakhshan, and near the presidential palace in Dushanbe, killing or injuring several people; the killing and wounding of members of the CIS peacekeeping forces; fighting in August among government forces in Khatlon province and in the Leninabad towns of Hissar, Shakhriau and Tursunzade, as well as in the outskirts of Dushanbe; kidnapping and hostage-taking in exchange for persons in government custody; and large-scale theft of livestock, allegedly taken to UTO strongholds in Tavildara.

The ceasefire continued to hold until 19 August, when fighting broke out in the Kofarnikhon and Teppei-Samarkandi areas between Interior Ministry troops and UTO forces over the arrest on criminal charges of three UTO members, in exchange for whom UTO took three policemen hostage. At the same time, UTO fighters in neighbouring Turkobad took four civilians hostage, demanding the return of a vehicle confiscated by the police; in their clash with the police on 27 August, five UTO fighters were killed. On 29 August, UTO engaged Ministry of Defence troops in intense fighting some 9 kilometres east of Dushanbe; UTO took nine prisoners, but released five the next day. Negotiations by the Joint Commission, in collaboration with UNMOT, defused tensions and obtained the release of hostages.

On 23 August, the UNMOT helicopter en route from Childara to Dushanbe with a number of officials on board had to make an emergency landing at Komsomolabad due to engine trouble. An inspection revealed two bullet holes in the aircraft. With respect to UNMOT's freedom of movement, the UTO field commander in Garm informed UNMOT in writing on 18 August that it would not be allowed to fly its helicopter over the area unless a UTO representative was on board or to patrol certain areas by road. The UTO field commander in Tavildara informed UNMOT of similar restrictions in his area of responsibility. UNMOT lodged a protest with the UTO leader and was pursuing the matter.

The fighting in Khatlon in August forced the temporary evacuation of UN staff from that area, thus reducing humanitarian assistance activities there. Other humanitarian organizations continued their relief and rehabilitation assistance programmes, especially during the floods in May and June. WFP contributed daily rations for distribution to over 2,100 families identified by IFRC. The donor alert, extended through August, resulted in only half of the $22 million target, mostly against WFP food aid requirements.

UNHCR resumed the voluntary repatriation of refugees from Afghanistan on 17 July. As at 28 August, more than 3,000 persons were repatriated through Nizhniy-Pianj. Preparations were also under way for the return of refugees through Ishkashim and Termez. UNHCR issued an appeal in early August for $9.7 million to cover costs connected with the return and initial reintegration of some 25,000 refugees, mostly from northern Afghanistan, over the next 18 months. Some 2,000 internally displaced persons were airlifted from Khorog to Dushanbe by the International Organization for Migration; another 2,600 were returned from Dushanbe to Darvaz district and Sagirdasht with government assistance.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (September)

The Security Council met on 12 September [meeting 3816] to consider the foregoing report of the Secretary-General. At its request, Tajikistan was invited to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The Council adopted resolution 1128(1997) unanimously on the basis of a draft [S/1997/708] prepared in consultations among its members.

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions and the statements by its President,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 4 September 1997 on the situation in Tajikistan,

Reaffirming its commitment to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Tajikistan and to the inviolability of its borders,

Welcoming the successful conclusion of the inter-Tajik talks, conducted under United Nations auspices since 1994, with the signing by the President of Tajikistan and the leader of the United Tajik Opposition in Moscow on 27 June 1997 of the General Agreement on the Establishment of Peace and National Accord in Tajikistan,

Noting that the implementation of the General Agreement will require the consistent good faith and constant effort of the parties, as well as the sustained and vigorous support of the United Nations and the international community,

Taking note with appreciation of the readiness of the collective peacekeeping forces of the Commonwealth of Independent States to assist in providing security for United Nations personnel at the request of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan and with the agreement of the parties,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 4 September 1997;

2. Takes note of the recommendations on the expansion of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan, contained in the report of the Secretary-General;

5. Calls upon the parties to cooperate further in ensuring the safety and freedom of movement of the personnel of the United Nations, the collective peacekeeping forces of the Commonwealth of Independent States and other international personnel;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to explore ways to provide security for United Nations personnel;

7. Decides to extend the present mandate of the Mission for a period of two months until 15 November 1997;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council informed of all significant developments, in particular on an adequate solution to the security problem, and expresses its readiness to take a decision concerning the extension of the mandate of the Mission recommended by the Secretary-General;

9. Encourages Member States and others concerned to continue to respond promptly and generously to the urgent humanitarian needs in Tajikistan and to offer support to Tajikistan for rehabilitation, aimed at mitigation of the consequences of the war and reconstruction of its economy;

10. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Report of Secretary-General (November).

The Secretary-General reported on 5 November [S/1997/859] on progress in the implementation of the General Agreement on the Establishment of Peace and National Accord in Tajikistan. At its first session held in Dushanbe on 15 September, CNR—composed of equal numbers of government and UTO representatives under the chairmanship of the UTO leader—set up four subcommittees, on political, legal, military and refugee issues. The Joint Commission was made into a working group of the military Subcommittee, and the Joint Commission on Refugees became a working group of the Subcommittee on refugees. Also set up was a working group on the implementation of the Amnesty Law. The subcommittees and working groups were composed also of equal numbers of government and UTO representatives. On 25 September, CNR adopted its programme of work and agreed on a timetable of three months for the implementation of the General Agreement.

Work on political issues concentrated on the complex task of allocating 30 per cent of senior government positions to UTO members, which required a delicate balancing of diverse interests between the parties, as well as within each camp. With the assistance of UNMOT and the CIS peacekeeping forces, the political Subcommittee, entrusted with ensuring the release of prisoners of war (POWs) in accordance with the Act on Mutual Forgiveness, obtained the release from UTO of 119 POWs on 17 September and 19 October in Tavildara.

The Subcommittee on legal issues focused on the release of prisoners in implementation of the Amnesty Law. Of the more than 700 individual cases submitted for review, over 500 had been processed and recommendations for amnesty transmitted to the government authorities. The Government agreed to the release of 161 detainees, of whom 78 (58 UTO supporters and 20 others) were set free on 20 October. In addition, the Subcommittee organized a round-table discussion on 8 October on the question of amendments and additions to the Constitution, with the participation of government officials, legal experts and UNMOT, OSCE and ICRC representatives.

The Subcommittee on military issues set in motion the registration of the UTO military inside Tajikistan, with more than 1,000 already registered in Tavildara and Garm. UNMOT teams stationed in Kalai-Khumb and Garm were monitoring the process. In late September, UTO requested priority repatriation from north-east Afghanistan of some 260 of its fighters and for their entry into Tajikistan through Kalai-Khumb rather than through the designated Ishkashim and Nizhniy-Pianj entry points, which was difficult and dangerous to negotiate due to the shifting situation in Afghanistan. Although agreed to in principle, that repatriation had not taken place. CNR issued an appeal to armed formations whose loyalty was not clear to declare their allegiance to either the Government or UTO by 16 November, after which they would be considered illegal and subject to forcible disarmament.

The Subcommittee on refugees directed much of its effort to the repatriation of Tajik refugees from northern Afghanistan. Repatriation from camps in the Konduz area was completed by 18 October, despite repeated flare-ups of fierce fighting in the region, bringing the number of returnees to some 6,700 persons since the operation began in July. Of particular concern was the situation of some 6,000 refugees caught in the fighting between Afghan factions in and around the Sakhi Camp near Mazar-e-Sharif in late September and early October, in which two refugees were killed and as many as 40 were wounded. Following the fighting, UNHCR, with the assistance of Uzbek and Tajik authorities, was able to begin repatriating those refugees to Tajikistan via Uzbekistan on 24 October. The repatriation of all Tajik refugees from Afghanistan was expected to be completed by December.

During the preceding two months, the efforts of humanitarian organizations centred on the preparation of winter relief programmes: distribution of food, coal and shoes, as well as assisting returnees from northern Afghanistan. Humanitarian organizations concentrated their efforts in Khatlon province, where the majority of refugees were returning, while movement east of Dushanbe continued to be difficult. The rehabilitation, reconstruction and development programme financed by the United Nations Development Programme and executed by the United Nations Office for Project Services re-established its activities in the Karategin Valley. UN agencies updated the donor alert for urgent humanitarian needs in Tajikistan, extending the period until the end of December and listing shortfalls, mainly in the water and sanitation, education and health sectors.

The Secretary-General stated that the ceasefire between the Government and UTO was firmly maintained, although the level of violence continued to be high in the central part of the country, including Dushanbe and environs, where UNMOT recorded 16 bomb explosions, a number of killings and nightly sporadic firings. Clashes also continued between armed groups and government forces in the Kofarnikhon and Leninskiy areas and in Tursunzade and Shakhinau. For the foreseeable future, therefore, the safety of UN personnel would remain an important concern. The Government and UTO were addressing that concern by forming a Joint Security Unit (see above, under "Personnel security"). An additional reassurance was the CIS decision to authorize its collective peacekeeping forces to provide security to the United Nations on request.

The Secretary-General noted that the Government and UTO made serious efforts through CNR to carry out their commitments under the General Agreement. He stressed that the support provided by the international community was crucial to the implementation of the Agreement. The Contact Group could provide a valuable political contribution. As for material support, the Secretary-General hoped that the donor conference on international peace and reconciliation in Tajikistan, scheduled for 24 and 25 November in Vienna, would generate the much-needed resources (see also PART THREE, Chapter III). Its focus would be on activities directly related to political reconciliation and democratization; demobilization and reintegration of ex-combatants and reform of power structures; repatriation and reintegration of refugees and internally displaced persons; and rehabilitation and development for the communities most affected. An aggregate amount of some $65 million was being sought.

It remained for UNMOT to be given the capacity to make the substantive contribution expected of it. The Secretary-General therefore recommended that the Council expand the mandate of UNMOT, in accordance with the proposals contained in his September report [S/1997/686]. He revised his previous cost estimate to include support to the Joint Security Unit and to provide for 75 military observers, 2 civilian police, 46 international staff and 100 locally recruited staff at a reduced cost of $13.7 million. A breakdown of the revised estimate by main categories of expenditure was annexed to the report. As at 31 October 1997, unpaid assessed contributions to the Special Account for UNMOT from inception to 15 November 1997 amounted to $2,283,915, which represented some 10 per cent of the assessment for UNMOT. The unpaid assessed contributions for all peacekeeping operations amounted to $1.6 billion.

11. Commends the efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and of the personnel of the Mission, and encourages them to continue assisting the parties in the implementation of the General Agreement;

12. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council informed of all significant developments, in particular regarding the security situation, and also requests him to report on the implementation of the present resolution within three months of its adoption;

13. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

The Secretary-General, on 9 December [S/1997/970], notified the Council that, having received authorization to increase the number of military observers serving with UNMOT, he had asked the current contributors of military observers, as well as other Governments, to make the required additional personnel available. The Governments of the Czech Republic, Ghana, Indonesia, Nepal, Nigeria and the Republic of Korea had responded favourably and, following the usual consultations, he proposed to add those Member States to the list of those providing military observers. The Council agreed to the proposal on 12 December [S/1997/971].

Korean question

The United Nations Command (UNC) continued in 1997 to implement the maintenance of the 1953 Korean Armistice Agreement. The submission of its annual report to the Security Council on its implementation activities in 1996 drew a renewed call from the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK) for the replacement of the Agreement by a new mechanism to be negotiated directly between senior military officers of the DPRK and the United States.

The International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), which remained unable to report to the Council on the full compliance by the DPRK with its obligations under its safeguards agreement with the Agency, was commended by the General Assembly for its continuing, impartial efforts to secure that compliance.

Communications. The Foreign Ministry of the DPRK issued a 2 July memorandum [S/1997/514] on the occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the 1972 joint communique by the two Koreas, laying down three agreed principles for their peaceful reunification.

On 12 September [A/52/353], the DPRK drew attention to what it called the arms build-up by the Republic of Korea. It claimed that the United States, while arguing for a four-way negotiation for the establishment of peace on the Korean peninsula, was supplying the Republic with the latest military equipment and munitions on a large scale. The DPRK warned the two countries not to test its military potential and demanded that the United States withdraw its troops from the Republic of Korea.

Armistice Agreement

On 28 July, the United States, on behalf of the Unified Command established pursuant to Security Council resolution 84(1950) [YUN 1950, p. 230], submitted to the Council the annual report of UNC [S/1997/596] concerning the maintenance in 1996 of the 1953 Armistice Agreement [YUN 1953, p. 136, GA res. 725(VIII)].

The report provided a synopsis of 1996 events and their impact on UNC's continuing efforts to maintain the Agreement. It stated that UNC, of which 9 UN Member States (Australia, Canada, Colombia, France, New Zealand, Philippines, Thailand, United Kingdom, United States) of the original 16 remained represented, would continue carrying out its obligations under the Agreement until a durable peace was achieved through political dialogue by the parties directly concerned with the Korean conflict. As the Korean People's Army (KPA) remained adamant in its refusal to participate in joint investigations of reported violations of the Agreement within the demilitarized zone (DMZ). UNC continued to dispatch its observer teams into the UNC (southern) portion of the DMZ and to conduct unilateral investigations of alleged violations there. The Republic of Korea currently provided "police" for that portion of the DMZ.

In keeping with the Agreement, the Commander-in-Chief of UNC appointed Major-General Cha Ki Mun of the Republic of Korea Army as the Senior Member of the UNC component of the Military Armistice Commission (MAC), set up to supervise the implementation, as well as to settle violations, of the Agreement.

Throughout 1996, the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission (NNSC), established under the Agreement as an integral part of the Korean Armistice, remained represented by only two (rather than four) neutral nations in residence, Sweden and Switzerland. NNSC held weekly meetings in the joint security area in Panmunjom to review and evaluate UNC reports regarding the number of arriving and departing military personnel. The Polish member (forced by unilateral KPA measures to withdraw in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 464]) returned to Panmunjom in 1996 to meet with the Swiss and Swedish members on 30 January, 29 April, 6-7 May and 1-2 October. KPA remained unresponsive to continued UNC calls to nominate a successor for Czechoslovakia and to restore support to the Polish member.

In 1996, KPA and the United States reached an agreement on the Korean War remains issue, by which the United States would compensate KPA for costs associated with the recovery of remains returned between 1990 and 1994, and KPA would allow a team from the United States Army Central Identification Laboratory in Hawaii to participate in two joint recovery operations north of the military demarcation line. The first operation resulted in the recovery of one United States soldier, whose remains were returned and positively identified in September.

The report recorded nine dates between 15 February and 13 October in which KPA violated the Armistice Agreement in the joint security area, the military demarcation line and the DMZ. The most significant of those violations took place on 5-7 April and on 18 September. The April violation involved the reinforcement of the KPA guard force in the joint security area by over 200 additional soldiers armed with assault rifles, heavy and medium machine-guns, rocket-grenade launchers and recoilless rifles. KPA refused to accept any telephonic protests from UNC MAC or to meet to discuss the matter. The September violation was the infiltration into the Republic of Korea of the 26-man crew of a DPRK submarine that had run aground in the Republic's eastern coastal waters some 60 miles south of the DMZ [YUN 1996, p. 265]. In its search for the crew, the Republic's Army killed 24 of the crew and captured one; the last remained unaccounted for.

Further reported were separate UNC repatriations to the DPRK of the remains of the 24 submarine crew referred to above, four civilians and four KPA soldiers believed to be victims of drowning. A KPA soldier, swept southwards by the flood waters of the Imjin River, was also repatriated. The DPRK Red Cross also repatriated the remains of a South Korean civilian who had apparently drowned.

While not directly involved in the North-South dialogue or negotiations on the reunification of the two Koreas, UNC provided administrative assistance and security for those talks and other contacts held in the joint security area in Panmunjom.

Communications. The DPRK, commenting on the UNC report on 15 September [S/1997/714], claimed the United States had totally distorted the facts presented by the report so as to place responsibility for the paralysed Korean Armistice system on the DPRK, when in fact it rested with the United States. The DPRK reiterated its proposal that, to resolve the impasse in the Armistice arrangements, its senior military officers and those of the United States should negotiate the establishment of a new mechanism in conformity with the actual situation.

Earlier, the DPRK alleged that, on 16 July, a group of its soldiers on routine patrol on the north side of the military demarcation line was suddenly attacked by the Republic of Korea Army with a barrage of several thousand shells and bullets [S/1997/566]. The DPRK blamed the United States for the incident, which, it said, could have been avoided had maintenance of the DMZ not been left to its "puppet", the Republic of Korea.

Referring to the incident as a clear violation of the Korean Armistice Agreement [S/1997/591], the Republic of Korea stated on 28 July that the incident involved 14 North Korean soldiers who intruded some 70 to 100 metres into the UNC side of the DMZ near Cheolwon, Kangwondo, and, ignoring warning shots, proceeded further southwards, firing automatic and heavy weapons. A 30-minute exchange of fire ensued. The Republic of Korea urged the DPRK to abide by the Armistice Agreement until replaced by an alternative arrangement, as stipulated in their Agreement on Reconciliation, Non-Aggression and Ex the North of Korea, which was signed in 1991 [YUN 1991, p. 154] and entered into force on 19 February 1992.

IAEA safeguards inspections

Pursuant to the agreement between IAEA and the DPRK for the application of safeguards in connection with the 1968 Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons (safeguards agreement) [YUN 1968, p. 17, GA res. 2373(XXII)], in force since 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 73], IAEA continued to secure full compliance by the DPRK with that agreement. To that end, IAEA continued to dispatch to the country inspection teams from Vienna, in addition to the IAEA inspectors (currently two to four) continuously present in the Nyongbyon area. Developments in the safeguards implementation were reported to the General Conference of IAEA through its Board of Governors and communicated to the Security Council through the Secretary-General.

IAEA report. The IAEA Director General, in his report transmitted on 14 October [S/1997/793], stated that the inspectors resident in Nyongbyon continued to monitor the freeze of operations instituted by the DPRK in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 442] in technical buildings at the following sites: the Radiochemical Laboratory of the Institute of Radiochemistry of Nyongbyon, the Fuel Rod Fabrication Plant, the 5-MWe Experimental Power Reactor and the two larger 50-MWe and 200-MWe Nuclear Power Plants under construction at the time of the freeze. The canning operation for the irradiated fuel rods from the 5-MWe reactor, begun in 1996, was about 90 per cent complete, with the rods placed in containers and under IAEA seals. Four inspectors, on rotation every few weeks, were continuously present in the Nyongbyon area during the canning operation.

The Director General stated that the seventh round of technical discussions was held (Pyongyang, 20-24 January) between IAEA and the DPRK, but that, once again, no progress was made on outstanding issues. They included the preservation of information, which must remain available to enable IAEA to verify the correctness and completeness of the DPRK's initial declaration under its safeguards agreement; and its refusal to accept key technical measures, such as the measurement of liquid wastes at the Radiochemical Laboratory (reprocessing plant) to verify that there was no movement or any operation involving such wastes. The DPRK was of the view that IAEA requirements were "excessive" and, as it had repeatedly stated, not in line with progress in the implementation of that provision of the 1994 Agreed Framework between the DPRK and the United States [YUN 1994, p. 442] calling for the replacement of the DPRK's graphite-moderated reactors and related facilities with light-water nuclear reactors. (The ground-breaking for the construction of two 1,000-MWe reactors took place at Sinpo on 19 August.) That repeated linkage underlined the fundamental difference of view between IAEA and the DPRK concerning the safeguards agreement: whereas IAEA regarded that agreement as binding and in force, the DPRK regarded acceptance of measures required to enable IAEA to monitor the freeze as being solely within the context of the Agreed Framework rather than as part of the implementation of the safeguards agreement. Thus the DPRK indicated that, until a significant portion of the light-water project was completed—but before the delivery of key nuclear components—IAEA could carry out ad hoc and routine inspections under the safeguards agreement only at facilities not under the freeze.

The Director General stated that the DPRK had accepted some verification activities, such as containment and surveillance measures needed to monitor the freeze, but had declined the installation of monitoring equipment at nuclear waste tanks or any sampling or measurements at any location in the five plants indicated above. It had moreover declined measurements for assessing the total amount of plutonium in spent fuel rods from the 5-MWe Experimental Power Reactor. The DPRK had also imposed limitations on access by IAEA inspectors to certain technical support buildings at the facility sites subject to the freeze, which the DPRK excluded from the scope of IAEA verification activities on the grounds that they had changed the nature of their operations at the time of the freeze and hence were not subject to monitoring. The DPRK stated that it had agreed to freeze only those technical buildings directly related to its nuclear programme, not those indirectly related to it. It appeared to be the case, therefore, that the DPRK could consider the matter of access as requests to be allowed by it on a case-by-case basis, not as a right of the inspectors.

The Director General noted an improvement in the means of communication between IAEA inspectors in the DPRK and IAEA headquarters, as well as between the Department of Safeguards of DPRK's General Department of Atomic Energy and that of IAEA. The DPRK had also accepted the designation of additional inspectors and, in January, clarified that the nuclear graphite manufactured for use at the 50-MWe Nuclear Power Plant was subject to IAEA monitoring. About half of the required graphite blocks were presented to IAEA, with the statement that the manufacture of such blocks and other nuclear-related equipment and components had ceased since July 1993. IAEA was awaiting formal confirmation of that statement from the DPRK.

By a 3 October resolution, the General Conference of IAEA called on the DPRK to comply with the safeguards agreement and urged it to cooperate fully with IAEA in the implementation of that agreement.

Following informal consultation in September, an eighth round of technical discussions was held (Vienna, 21-24 October). The Director General noted, however, that no progress was made on the outstanding issues associated with the DPRK's compliance with the IAEA-DPRK safeguards agreement.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

By resolution 52/11 of 12 November, the General Assembly commended the Director General and secretariat of IAEA for their continuing, impartial efforts to implement the safeguards agreement still in force between IAEA and the DPRK, including their efforts to monitor the freeze of specified facilities in that country as requested by the Security Council. The Assembly expressed concern about the continuing non-compliance of the DPRK with the safeguards agreement. It urged the DPRK to cooperate fully with IAEA in the implementation of that agreement and to take all steps IAEA might deem necessary to preserve all information relevant to verifying the accuracy and completeness of the DPRK's initial report on the inventory of nuclear material subject to safeguards until the DPRK came into full compliance with its safeguards agreement.

Cambodia

The year 1997 saw the eruption of armed violence in Cambodia in early July, marking the culmination of mounting tensions between the two major political parties—the United National Front for an Independent, Neutral, Peaceful and Cooperative Cambodia, led by the First Prime Minister, Prince Norodom Ranariddh; and the Cambodia People's Party, led by the Second Prime Minister, Samdech Hun Sen—which made up the government coalition that emerged from the 1993 elections, supervised by the United Nations in accordance with the 1991 Paris Agreements on Cambodia [YUN 1991, p. 155]. The First Prime Minister, absent from the country at the time, was replaced and five members of the National Assembly fled the country. The Secretary-General and the Security Council called on all parties to respect their commitments under the 1991 Paris Agreements and urged them to resolve their differences through political dialogue. The European Union (EU) joined in those urgings.

In meetings held by the Secretary-General with Cambodian leaders and the Association of South-East Asian Nations (ASEAN), a consensus emerged on the desirability of those political leaders and officials who had left Cambodia to return to the country and resume their offices. Towards the end of October, guarantees for their safe return and resumption of office were communicated to the Secretary-General by the Cambodian authorities. Subject to the approval of the Council, the Secretary-General indicated his readiness to provide UN assistance in monitoring that process, as requested by ASEAN.

(For the question of the credentials of Cambodia to the fifty-second session of the General Assembly, see PART FIVE, Chapter IV.)

Political developments

During the first half of the year, the tense relationship between the co-Prime Ministers of Cambodia that had been building up for months gradually erupted into violence as the country began gearing up for national elections due in 1998. In Phnom Penh on 30 March 1997, a peaceful rally lawfully organized by Sam Rainsy, head of the Khmer Nation Party and reported to be a political ally of the First Prime Minister, was attacked by a grenade, killing at least 16 people and injuring over 100 others. The Secretary-General deplored the attack and called for an investigation by the Royal Government of Cambodia and on all sides to exercise restraint and ensure a political process conducive to free and fair elections. On 22 April [A/52/125-S/1997/334], the First Prime Minister referred to the incident as a setback for democracy in Cambodia, saying it was imperative that the Office of the Secretary-General's Representative in Cambodia be maintained as the country moved closer to the communal and legislative elections. He would therefore welcome the nomination of a successor upon the expiration of the current Representative's term of office.

The worsening situation escalated into armed violence during 5-6 July. In its wake, the First Prime Minister was replaced in absentia and many government officials and opposition figures fled the country. Following that event, the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Human Rights in Cambodia issued a report documenting over 40 extrajudicial killings of persons loyal to the First Prime Minister and of other opposition figures, as well as numerous cases of disappearances (see also PART TWO, Chapter I). On 7 July [S/1997/533], the Presidency of the EU appealed for an immediate and unconditional ceasefire and called on the Cambodian authorities quickly to re-establish operation of the country's constitutional institutions. The EU further called on ASEAN to use its influence to persuade those authorities to re-establish calm and reminded the Government of its public undertaking to the international community when it announced that legislative elections would be held in May 1998. The Secretary-General expressed grave concern over the fighting and dismay to learn of the death in custody of Hor Sok, co-Secretary of State for the Interior Ministry. He called on the co-Prime Ministers to resolve the ongoing political crisis through negotiations, in accordance with the 1991 Paris Agreements and the Cambodian Constitution, which held that "the Kingdom of Cambodia adopts a policy of liberal democracy and pluralism".

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

The Security Council met on 11 July [meeting 37991 regarding the recent developments in Cambodia and, following consultations among its members, authorized its President to make the statement below [S/PRST/1997/37]:

The Security Council is gravely concerned at recent developments in Cambodia, including violence, which have the effect of jeopardizing continued progress of the Cambodian peace process, and calls for an immediate end to the fighting.

The Council reaffirms the need to respect the principles of national unity, territorial integrity and sovereignty of the Kingdom of Cambodia.

The Council calls upon all parties to respect fully their commitments under the Paris agreements on Cambodia. It urges them to resolve their differences through peaceful means and political dialogue and in accordance with the spirit of national reconciliation.

The Council calls upon the parties again to ensure the effective and smooth operation of constitutional institutions.

The Council condemns all acts of violence and calls upon all parties to ensure the safety and security of persons and to respect the principles and rules of humanitarian law.

The Council reminds the Cambodian Government of its public undertaking that free and fair legislative elections would be held in May 1998. It stresses the importance of this electoral process.

The Council welcomes and supports all efforts to promote dialogue among the parties, including those undertaken by the countries of the Association of South-East Asian Nations and other signatory States of the Paris agreements on Cambodia.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Communications. On 16 July [A/51/944-S/1997/556], Cambodia's Second Vice-President and member of the Permanent Committee of the National Assembly, Son Soubert, referred to what he termed the barbaric coup d'etat staged by the Second Prime Minister and declared that, under the Constitution, the National Assembly could not be legally convened without prior adoption of the session's agenda by the Permanent Committee's 12 members (reduced to six, as five had fled the country and the Assembly President had become Acting Chief of State) and that a "new" First Prime Minister could not be elected at will in the absence of an agreement between the Assembly's President and co-Vice-Presidents. That declaration was preceded by the Parliament's statement of 15 July condemning the coup and calling for: the reconvening of the Paris Conference to reaffirm the implementation of the Paris Agreements; non-recognition of the Government installed by Second Prime Minister Hun Sen or of any decisions made by an intimidated Parliament; the establishment of a tribunal to mete justice to the perpetrators of genocide or crimes against humanity in Cambodia; pressure on Hun Sen to stop his strategy of intimidation; the protection of opposition parties from arrest and execution; sanctions against Cambodia until democracy and human rights were restored; and a declaration by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization for the protection of the Angkor temples.

On 16 July [S/1997/557], First Prime Minister Ranariddh appealed to the Security Council to deny recognition to the Second Prime Minister's "new puppet First Prime Minister". On 18 July [A/51/947-S/1997/570], First Prime Minister Ranariddh stated that the reported reason for the actions taken against him by the Cambodian People's Party was that he had "joined hands" with the Khmer Rouge, whose hard-core armed soldiers had penetrated in and around Phnom Penh, and that he had chosen to absent himself from the country early in the month; the Royal Government thus took "preventive actions" to defend the Constitution and the country's achievements since the 1993 elections [YUN 1993, p. 370]. On 24 July [A/51/949-S/1997/584], First Prime Minister Ranariddh informed the Secretary-General of the move by the "Acting Head of State", Samdech Chea Sim, to recall the Permanent Representative of Cambodia to the United Nations, Prince Sisowath Sirirath. Without his approval, the First Prime Minister contended, the Permanent Representative, jointly appointed by him and the Second Prime Minister, could not be recalled.

On 21 July [A/51/953-S/1997/593], the members of the National Assembly requested their Acting Chairman to postpone any Assembly meetings until such time as the situation in the country returned to normal because, in the current climate of intimidation, they could not carry out their duties in a spirit of independence and according to their consciences. They underscored that: the 12-member National Assembly and its Standing Committee could not be replaced before May 1998; a quorum of seven was required for the Standing Committee to meet; only the Committee could convene the Assembly and set its agenda; and a group of 10 Parliament members could request postponement of any Assembly meeting.

In a statement issued on 1 August [S/1997/611], First Prime Minister Ranariddh referred to the American Broadcasting Corporation's televised interview of Second Prime Minister Hun Sen in which he suggested cooperation between the Royal Cambodian Armed Forces and the Royal Thai Armed Forces to try to capture the Khmer Rouge leader, Pol Pot, and bring him before an international tribunal for the crime of genocide. According to the statement, Hun Sen, until that interview, had always held that "his old boss Pol Pot" was dead and was not interested at all in seeing Pol Pot brought to trial, for in all likelihood he had many secrets that might implicate Hun Sen and a former senior commander of the Khmer Rouge forces. The suggestion was yet another ploy, the statement continued, to win international support for Hun Sen's coup d'etat, capitalizing on the world's revulsion at Pol Pot and the Khmer Rouge.

In a 14 August statement [S/1997/659], the EU renewed its support for ASEAN's mediation efforts in the Cambodian crisis, noting that ASEAN did not rule out the possibility of organizing an informal meeting of all the parties involved in order to restore political stability in the country.

Further developments

Fighting between the forces loyal to the First Prime Minister and those loyal to the Second Prime Minister intensified in the north and north-west of Cambodia during the second half of August, which the Secretary-General viewed with deep concern. He further expressed sympathy for the plight of some 200,000 Cambodians driven from their homes into Thailand by the fighting (see PART THREE, Chapter XII).

Letter from Secretary-General. On 27 October [S/1997/998], the Secretary-General informed the Security Council of recent developments in Cambodia subsequent to the 5-6 July events, of which the Secretariat had briefed the Council in informal consultations, and of his September meetings in New York with Cambodian leaders and ASEAN Foreign Ministers. He said a consensus emerged at those discussions that it was highly desirable for those political leaders, in particular the National Assembly members, who had left Cambodia following those events to return as soon as possible in order to participate fully in the political process by drawing up pending key legislation to ensure a level playing field for free and fair elections in 1998. Measures to ensure their return in satisfactory condition were also discussed.

The Secretary-General attached a 22 October letter from Ung Huot (who signed as First Prime Minister) and Second Prime Minister Hun Sen recording the Government's undertakings to guarantee the physical security and safety of those members of the National Assembly and other political leaders wishing to return to Cambodia and resume their political activities in connection with the forthcoming elections; to maintain and respect the parliamentary immunity of the National Assembly members; to guarantee all other political leaders' freedom from arrest and detention in respect of acts done and words spoken prior to their return, and thereafter in respect of acts and words in connection with their electoral activities; and to ensure that all political leaders enjoyed freedom from intimidation and threat in respect of any and all political activities relating to the election, and, in particular, freedom of movement, assembly and speech, as provided for under the Constitution and electoral law, without discrimination. The letter also reiterated the Government's readiness for the United Nations to monitor implementation. The Secretary-General was confident that the letter provided the necessary guarantees to meet the legitimate concerns of the political leaders.

Also attached was a 22 October letter from the ASEAN Governments of Indonesia, the Philippines and Thailand requesting UN assistance and cooperation in monitoring the safe return of all political leaders and other leading personalities of the United National Front for an Independent, Neutral, Peaceful and Cooperative Cambodia, as well as of other parties, and the unfettered resumption of their political activities. The Secretary-General said he would be ready to provide such assistance and cooperation, subject to the Council's approval and on the understanding that the role of the United Nations would be essentially political, since, as indicated by the letter, the Cambodian authorities would be responsible for the actual safety of the returnees and the unfettered resumption of their political activities.

The Secretary-General also attached a 24 October letter from First Prime Minister Ranariddh inquiring as to whether the safety guarantees also applied to him. After consulting the Legal Counsel, the Secretary-General was of the view that the guarantees offered in the 22 October letter applied fully to Prince Ranariddh and was writing to him accordingly. The Secretary-General said those guarantees combined with the monitoring role of the United Nations provided an adequate atmosphere for the political leaders' return.

The Council, on 30 October [S/1997/999], welcomed the assurances given by the Cambodian authorities and expressed support for the steps the Secretary-General intended to take, as described in his letter.

Office of Secretary-General's Representative in Cambodia

The Office of the Secretary-General's Representative in Cambodia, set up in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 450], remained in place in Phnom Penh in 1997. By an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the Security Council on 30 May [S/1997/426] and 3 June [S/1997/427], Lakhan L. Mehrotra (India) was appointed as the Secretary-General's Representative, succeeding Benny Widyono, who relinquished that post in May. Mr. Mehrotra assumed his duties on 16 June.

The Representative's mandate was extended by the Secretary-General on 7 April [S/1997/307] and again on 8 October [S/1997/787], each time for a six-month period. The Council took note of those extensions on 14 April [S/1997/308] and 13 October [S/1997/788], respectively. One military adviser continued to assist the Representative in the discharge of his mandate.

UNTAC financing

The question of the liquidation of the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia (UNTAC), terminated in 1993 [YUN 1993, p. 371], and the closure of its financial books remained to be completed. Thus, the General Assembly, by decision 51/483 of 15 September, included in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second session the item on the financing and liquidation of UNTAC. By decision 52/456 of 22 December, the Assembly decided that the Fifth Committee should continue its consideration of the same item at the resumed fifty-second session in 1998.

Other matters

Iran-Iraq

In communications addressed to the Secretary-General in 1997, Iran and Iraq continued to charge each other with repeated violations of their 1988 ceasefire agreement [YUN 1988, p. 188] and of their 1991 Tehran agreements [YUN 1991, p. 163] on the area of separation between them.

As alleged by Iran, Iraqi violations, recorded on an almost daily basis, included: in addition to vehicular and helicopter patrolling, motor-boat patrolling of the Arvand Rud (Shatt al-Arab); military exercises by up to 200 troops; deployment of up to 350 troops; troop and occasionally tank movements in and out of the area of separation; firings at Iranian boundary police and border guards; random cross-border firings with small-arms fire, and heavy weapons, as well as detonations from specific geographical coordinates; emplacing long-range air-defence cannons and machine-guns; constructing roads, repairing embankments, excavating canals and building bunkers; putting up tents and flagpoles; border intrusions for the purpose of planting mines; and frequent infiltrations on land and by boat of Iraqi-supported, armed anti-revolution elements, as well as armed smugglers, extorting villagers and seizing fishing boats and fishermen.

By notes of 19 April [S/1997/521] and 19 May [S/1997/783], Iran lodged a protest with the Embassy of Iraq in Tehran against the repeated harassment of Iranian fishing and passenger boats by armed Iraqi vessels, singling out the Iraqi tug-boat Alhamra. Iran claimed its boats were usually fired upon, their communications equipment destroyed and property looted. On 2 October [S/1997/768], Iran reported that, in response to an incursion into its territory on 29 September by two heavily armed groups belonging to an Iranian terrorist organization based in Iraq, it launched what it termed a limited defensive air bombardment of the groups' terrorist bases in Iraq. Describing that operation as a fresh act of armed aggression by Iran, Iraq claimed [S/1997/753] that its inability to exercise control over its northern territory owing to the United States-imposed no-fly zone was being taken advantage of by Iran to engage in aggressions against Iraq.

Iraq countercharged Iran with frequent violations of its territory, in particular of its airspace and territorial waters, citing civilian incursions within its borders; the hijacking of Iraqi fishing boats; the frequent firing at such boats and at fishermen, killing some of them; the kidnapping of Iraqi citizens, including shepherds, fishermen and frontier police; sustained cross-border firings; shooting of Iraqi border guards; and, in the area of separation, mine-laying and the setting up of observation posts and customs posts. Iraq also claimed instances of Iranian bomb and missile attacks within Iraq.

On 31 December 1996 [S/1997/31], Iraq transmitted two letters further confirming the responsibility of the Iraqi Al-Da'wah party based in Iran and supported by that country for the assassination attempt made on the Iraqi President's son in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 269]. On 13 January 1997 [S/1997/34], Iraq reported that the Embassy of Iran in Baghdad returned the two Iraqi notes requesting the extradition to Iraq or the trial in Iran of the perpetrators of that attempted assassination, stating only that the notes contained groundless and unacceptable charges that were outside the scope of diplomatic affairs; it did not address the matter of the terrorist activities of the Al-Da'wah party. Iraq requested UN intervention to persuade Iran to bring the perpetrators to trial or surrender them to Iraq for that purpose. Iraq reiterated that request to the Secretary-General on 25 January [S/1997/86].

Iran responded on 14 January [S/1997/38] that a number of Iraqi opposition groups inside and outside Iraq had claimed responsibility for the assassination attempt. To blame Iran for Iraq's chaotic domestic problems was an old Iraqi trick to divert attention from its escalated instigation of and support for a terrorist group within its borders to carry out attacks against Iran.

By letters of 27 January [S/1997/87] and 30 July [S/1997/599], Iran also rejected certain violations alleged against it in 1996 and explained that its arrest and subsequent investigation of four Iraqis resulted in their release; and that its investigation of the incident involving 11 Iraqi launches also resulted in the release of the launches and their crews, except for two that were still under investigation.

On 16 September [S/1997/726], Iraq protested in the strongest terms against the use which Iran had begun to make of Iraq's 115 military and 27 civil aircraft entrusted to it under a 1991 agreement between the two countries. Iraq claimed that the military aircraft had been repainted and integrated into Iran's air force and the civilian aircraft distributed to its civil aviation company and to the air force transport command for use in internal transport operations. Iran asked the Secretary-General to use his good offices with Iran to impress upon it the obligation to return all of the aircraft in question and to ask it to desist from making any modifications to them.

Iran—United States

Iran continued in 1997 to protest against what it said were illegal United States activities within Iranian territorial waters and airspace and to demand an end to them. Iran's notes of protest against those activities were transmitted by the Interests Section of the Islamic Republic of Iran in Washington, D.C., to the United States Department of State through the Embassy of Pakistan, copies of which Iran provided to the Secretary-General.

The illegal activities cited by Iran involved warships of the United States which, in separate incidents, were reported to have issued a warning to a helicopter belonging to the Iranian oil company HTX which was flying to an oil platform, halted an Iranian ship for a thorough inspection and ordered two others to change their course [S/1997/159]; locked radar on the Iranian battleship Khadang [S/1997/346]; fired at two Iranian motor boats from a four-mile distance with eight rounds of semi-heavy shots and ordered a naval helicopter to overfly another motor boat, causing it to fill with water [S/1997/598]; and intercepted an Iranian sea-patrolling aircraft and, on several occasions, violated Iranian territorial waters. United States aircraft were also cited as having violated Iranian airspace [S/1997/610].

United Arab Emirates—Iran

Greater Tunb, Lesser Tunb and Abu Musa

By identical letters of 2 January to the Secretary-General and the Security Council [S/1997/8], the United Arab Emirates annexed the texts of its notes verbale of 1992 and 1996 to the Iranian Embassy in Abu Dhabi lodging protests against Iran's decisions regarding Abu Musa, an island belonging to the United Arab Emirates. Those decisions involved the prevention of the return to Abu Musa of Iranians under the employ of the Emirates and Iranian activities on the island, specifically the holding of a soccer tournament, the building of an airfield and the opening of a cold-storage plant and a fish-processing factory—all of which the United Arab Emirates regarded as constituting a flagrant violation of Iran's 1971 memorandum of understanding with Abu Musa [YUN 1971, p. 210], the imposition of an unlawful state of affairs and an attempt to bring the island under Iranian sovereignty by use of force.

On 12 February [S/1997/122], the United Arab Emirates requested the Security Council to continue to be seized of item 10 of the list of matters before it on 4 January, namely, a 3 December 1971 letter from the Permanent Representatives of Algeria, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen (Yemen since 1990) and Iraq concerning Iran's occupation of the Greater Tunb, the Lesser Tunb and Abu Musa, three islands belonging to the United Arab Emirates. Calling that letter an interference in its internal affairs, Iran emphasized on 28 May [S/1997/411] the need to resolve the existing misunderstandings in bilateral negotiations. Kuwait on 16 April [S/1997/329] transmitted a 31 March resolution adopted by the Council of the League of Arab States renewing affirmation of the sovereignty of the United Arab Emirates over the three islands, expressing disapproval of Iran's persistence in implementing measures aimed at consolidating its occupation of those islands and renewing its call on Iran to solve the dispute over them, including to agree to refer the case to the International Court of Justice. A similar statement was made by the Ministerial Council of the Gulf Cooperation Council [A/52/180-S/1997/448] at its sixty-third session (Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, 31 May).

On 4 May [A/52/154-S/1997/383] and 20 May [A/52/186-S/1997/477], the United Arab Emirates vigorously protested Iran's announced construction of an airport on Abu Musa and on the Greater Tunb, as well as of a dock on the Greater Tunb, as unwarranted acts of provocation. Responding on 9 October [S/1997/784], Iran reaffirmed its position of principle that only through bilateral negotiations could misunderstandings be resolved. The United Arab Emirates issued protests on 24 August [A/52/361-S/1997/720] against the naval exercises conducted by Iran on Abu Musa on 11-13 August, and on 18 November [S/1997/941] against the fact that Iran had given the names Tunb to an Iranian pilot vessel and Abu Musa to an Iranian naval pontoon in order to impose a fait accompli and perpetuate Iran's occupation of the three islands.

Other complaints lodged with the Iranian Embassy in Abu Dhabi concerned Iran's violation of the territorial waters of the United Arab Emirates between May and November 1996 [A/51/771-S/1997/10] and in January 1997 [A/52/71 & S/1997/101]. Iran explained on 2 March [A/52/160] that one of the apparent violations cited was in fact due to the separation of a barge from its tugboat because of bad weather and consequent drift into the waters of the United Arab Emirates.

India-Pakistan

The United Nations Military Observer Group in India and Pakistan (UNMOGIP) continued in 1997 to monitor the situation in Jammu and Kashmir. As at 31 December, UNMOGIP had a strength of 44 military observers under the command of the Chief Military Observer. Major-General Choung-Jun Ahn (Republic of Korea), appointed by an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the Security Council on 11 March [S/1997/220] and 14 March [S/1997/221], assumed his duties as Chief Military Observer on 27 March, succeeding Major-General Alfonso Pessolano (Italy).

UNMOGIP headquarters alternated between Srinagar, Kashmir, in the summer (1 May to 31 October) and Rawalpindi, Pakistan, in the winter (1 November to 30 April).

Communication. By a memorandum issued in Islamabad, Pakistan, on 15 August [A/52/286-S/1997/647], the Special Committee of the National Assembly of Pakistan on Kashmir recalled that the principles embodied in Security Council resolutions 47(1948) [YUN 1947-48, p. 396], 51(1948) [ibid., p. 402], 80(1950) [YUN 1950, p. 308] and 91(1951) [YUN 1951, p. 343], as well as in the 1948 [YUN 1947-48, p. 402] and 1949 [YUN 1948-49, p. 280] resolutions of the United Nations Commission for India and Pakistan, expressly stated that the final disposition of Jammu and Kashmir would be in accordance with the will of its people expressed through a free and impartial plebiscite under UN auspices. Also recalled was the Indian Prime Minister's reiteration before the Indian Parliament on 26 June 1952 that, if after a proper plebiscite the people of Kashmir did not want to be with India, India would accept that and would not send an army against Kashmir. The Special Committee claimed that, instead of fulfilling that promise, India had reacted with violence to the legitimate demands of Kashmir: over the past eight years, 60,000 innocent Kashmiris had perished at the hands of the 600,000-strong Indian security forces present in Kashmir; a reign of terror had been unleashed, characterized by extrajudicial executions, forced relocation of the population, gang rapes of women and systematic efforts to obliterate the ethnic, social and cultural identity of the Kashmiri people.

The Special Committee asserted that India's denial of the inalienable right of self-determination to the people of Kashmir could not be permitted and the atrocities being perpetrated on them could not be condoned. It urged the United Nations to hold a plebiscite in Jammu and Kashmir without further delay; to call on India to withdraw its army of occupation from there, to end its repression of the Kashmiris and to continue the dialogue with Pakistan to resolve peacefully all outstanding issues between them, including their dispute over Jammu and Kashmir; to demand that international human rights organizations be given full access to Jammu and Kashmir; and to ask the Commission on Human Rights to appoint a Special Rapporteur on Jammu and Kashmir.

Chapter V

Europe and the Mediterranean

The resolution of the complex situation in the territories of the former Yugoslavia-Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) (FRY) and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia (FYROM)—continued to be the major focus of United Nations attention in the region of Europe and the Mediterranean. However, the situation in Albania and Georgia, including the region of Abkhazia, and the conflicts between Armenia and Azerbaijan over the Nagorny Karabakh region and in the Mediterranean island of Cyprus were of no less concern as United Nations efforts to find solutions to those continuing conflicts intensified.

In the countries of the former Yugoslavia, United Nations peacekeeping efforts in 1997 achieved mixed results in the restoration of peace and stability. The United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina (UNMIBH) continued to assist the parties in implementing the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the Annexes (also known as the Dayton-Paris Peace Agreement or the Peace Agreement) and the separate Dayton Agreement on implementing the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina. Two major implementation bodies of the Agreement met during the year—the Steering Board of the Peace Implementation Council (PIC) in Sintra, Portugal, in May, and the PIC Conference in Bonn, Germany, in December. The Council noted that, despite some progress, peace and the institutions of civil society to uphold it remained fragile. In March and again in May, the Security Council authorized an increase in UNMIBH police personnel. In December, the Council extended UNMIBH's mandate for a further six months, until June 1998.

The United Nations achieved significant success in its efforts towards the full implementation of the 12 November 1995 Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium. In July, the Council extended the mandate of the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium (UNTAES) for a final period until 15 January 1998, following the successful holding of elections and the implementation by Croatia of its commitments with respect to the return of refugees and displaced persons. The Council created a new police monitoring mission to replace UNTAES on the termination of its mandate. However, no progress was made in settling the conflict in the Prevlaka peninsula, where the United Nations Mission of Observers (UNMOP) continued to monitor its demilitarization.

In FYROM, reduction of the military component of the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force (UNPREDEP) began in March but was suspended until May in view of the situation in neighbouring Albania and its possible effects on Albanian-speaking minorities throughout the region. The reductions resumed on 1 October as the situation improved. In December, the Council decided to extend UNPREDEP's mandate for a final period until August 1998 and to complete withdrawal of the military component soon thereafter. It requested the Secretary-General to submit recommendations on the most appropriate type of international presence in the country after that date.

With regard to the situation in Albania, the Council, in March, authorized the deployment of a multinational force (known as Operation Alba), led by Italy, for three months to help restore and uphold the rule of law and the integrity of Albania's institutions and to deal with the humanitarian crisis that had resulted from the chaos and unrest caused by failed investment schemes. The force, which was extended in June for another 45 days, was withdrawn in early August as the situation returned to normal.

The Georgian peace process was revitalized during the year as the Secretary-General convened talks on the conflict in July and November at which all sides agreed to the strengthening of United Nations involvement in the peace process and approved a programme of action and a mechanism for doing so, including a coordinating council. However, in November, the Council expressed regret that despite those efforts there had been no visible progress on the future political status of Abkhazia and the return of refugees and displaced persons. The Council extended the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia (UNOMIG) for a further six months, until 31 January 1998.

The Secretary-General intensified his efforts to bring about a comprehensive settlement of the Cyprus issue. He convened talks in July in the

New York area and in Switzerland in August between the leaders of the Greek and Turkish communities to consider principles and objectives of a settlement and modalities of future negotiations. Although those talks were inconclusive, the Secretary-General's Special Adviser continued to consult with the two leaders on the modalities of their continuation.

The United Nations continued to cooperate with the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) in its efforts to achieve a settlement of the armed conflict between Armenia and Azerbaijan over the Nagorny Karabakh region. No progress was made during the year towards that end.

In other areas, the General Assembly stressed that closer engagement of Balkan States in co-operation agreements would favourably influence the political and economic situation in the region, as well as good-neighbourly relations among all Balkan States. It also adopted resolutions on strengthening cooperation between the United Nations and OSCE and on strengthening security and cooperation in the Mediterranean.

The former Yugoslavia

During 1997, the United Nations continued to work towards restoring peace and stability in the countries of the former Yugoslavia-Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) (FRY) and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia (FYROM)—through its peacekeeping missions in those countries. The United Nations Transitional Administration in Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium (UNTAES) handed over executive power to the Croatian authorities and, in August, began its phased withdrawal from the region. The Security Council created a new police monitoring mission that would replace UNTAES on the termination of its mandate on 15 January 1998. Likewise in FYROM, the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force (UNPREDEP) recommenced its withdrawal in October following a suspension due to the crisis in neighbouring Albania earlier in the year. The Council extended UNPREDEP's mandate for a final period until August 1998. The United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina (UNMIBH) continued to assist that country to return to stability. The Council increased the strength of the mission by 306 police and 11 personnel.

Combined financing of UN operations

During its resumed fifty-first session in 1997, the General Assembly continued consideration of the Secretary-General's report on the financial performance of the United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR), the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia (UNCRO), UNPREDEP and the United Nations Peace Forces headquarters (UNPF) for the period 1 January to 30 June 1996, which it had begun in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 279], and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions [A/51/872]. During that period, UNPF had undertaken pre-liquidation tasks in respect of UNCRO and UNPROFOR, including the disposition of assets and settlement of claims and the transition to the Implementation Force (IFOR). It continued to provide administrative and logistic support to UNPREDEP and to the new peacekeeping operations in Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium (UNTAES) and in Bosnia and Herzegovina (UNMIBH). (Details of the financing of the respective peacekeeping operations in the former Yugoslavia are to be found in the relevant sections below.)

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 13 June [meeting 101], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee [A/51/639/Add.2], adopted resolution 51/12 B without vote [agenda item 129].

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Protection Force, the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia, the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force and the United Nations Peace Forces headquarters and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Reaffirming that the costs of the combined Forces are expenses of the Organization to be borne by Member States in accordance with Article 17, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations,

Recalling its previous decisions regarding the fact that, in order to meet the expenditures caused by the combined Forces, a different procedure is required from that applied to meet expenditures of the regular budget of the United Nations,

Taking into account the fact that the economically more developed countries are in a position to make relatively larger contributions and that the economically less developed countries have a relatively limited capacity to contribute towards such an operation,

Bearing in mind the special responsibilities of the States permanent members of the Security Council, as indicated in General Assembly resolution 1874(S-IV) of 27 June 1963, in the financing of such operations,

16. Decides further to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second session the item entitled "Financing of the United Nations Protection Force, the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia, the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force and the United Nations Peace Forces headquarters".

On 22 December, the Assembly, by decision 52/456, decided that the Fifth Committee, at its resumed fifty-second (1998) session, should continue to consider the item on the financing of UNPROFOR, UNCRO, UNPREDEP and UNPF headquarters.

State succession issues

During 1997, the Special Negotiator on succession issues of the Office of the High Representative continued to hold meetings with the five successor States of the former Federal Republic of Yugoslavia-Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, FRY, FYROM and Slovenia—in their continued search for an agreement on State succession issues; the process was in its sixth year. At the first plenary conference on succession issues in 1997 (Brussels, Belgium, 22-24 January), disagreement continued regarding the definition and identification of state property and the different interpretations of the process of dissolution of Yugoslavia. The Special Negotiator undertook to prepare proposals for the apportionment of state archives and a list of embassies abroad that were subject to division.

On 30 May [S/1997/434], the Ministerial Meeting of the Steering Board of the Peace Implementation Council (Sintra, Portugal) (see below under "Bosnia and Herzegovina") noted that settlement of succession issues was regarded by international financial institutions as a prerequisite for normalizing their relations with FRY. Economic resources that would be released by a settlement of such issues would be a great help to all countries of the region. The international community, through the Special Negotiator, remained ready to assist the parties in their collective effort to reach a settlement. However, that would only be meaningful if the five States were willing to make the substantial compromises necessary. The Steering Board urged the parties urgently to seek an agreement.

At the Peace Implementation Conference (Bonn, Germany, 9-10 December) [A/52/728-S/1997/979] (see below), the Peace Implementation Council noted that, despite many rounds of discussion on settlement proposals, the five States had been unable to make any progress. It called on them to reach agreement on all outstanding succession issues within the context of the Special Negotiator's draft Framework Memorandum on Succession Issues of 13 November and, as a first step, and without waiting for an overall settlement, to reach agreement as soon as possible on certain specific action, including effective access by the five States to records and data held by any of those States that could be relevant to the settlement of succession issues.

The High Representative reported to the Secretary-General [S/1998/40] that the five countries had met in Brussels (9-11 December) to discuss the revised draft Framework Memorandum on Succession Issues. Those negotiations were to continue on the basis of the revised text and in the light of the conclusions of the Bonn Peace Implementation Conference.

In related developments, Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia, in a joint statement, which they transmitted to the Secretary-General on 11 August [A/52/277-S/1997/638], reaffirmed their commitment to preserving and strengthening the integrity, sovereignty and political independence of Bosnia and Herzegovina. They agreed to exchange a draft agreement for regulating relations between the two countries.

Bosnia and Herzegovina

In 1997, the implementation of the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina (the Peace Agreement), signed in December 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 544], remained at the heart of United Nations activities in that nation.

Deeply involved in the implementation process were: the High Representative, responsible for the Agreement's civilian aspects [YUN 1996, p. 293], the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina (UNMIBH) [Ibid., p. 294], the key entities of which were the International Police Task Force (IPTF) and the Mine Action Centre (MAC), and the multinational Stabilization Force (SFOR), led by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), which had replaced the Implementation Force (IFOR) in December 1996 [Ibid. p. 293] and which was responsible for the military aspects of the Agreement.

Two major meetings were held on the implementation of the Peace Agreement. The Steering Board of the Peace Implementation Council (PIC), which met in Sintra, Portugal, in May, underlined that the international community would not tolerate any attempts at the partition of Bosnia and Herzegovina. The country would remain united and sovereign, consisting of two multi-ethnic entities—the Federation and Republika Srpska. In Bonn, Germany, in December, the PIC Peace Implementation Conference noted that considerable progress had been made in implementing peace and stability in Bosnia and Herzegovina during the year, but that peace and the institutions of civil society to uphold it remained fragile amid a legacy of bitterness and distrust.

In June, Carlos Westendorp (Spain) replaced Carl Bildt (Sweden) as High Representative.

The Council authorized an increase in UNMIBH's authorized strength in March and again in April. In December, it extended the UNMIBH mandate for an additional period, terminating on 21 June 1998.

Implementation of Peace Agreement

Progress in implementing the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina was the subject of reviews in May by the PIC Steering Board at the Foreign Ministerial level and in December by the PIC Peace Implementation Conference. The PIC Steering Board, which was established in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 511], comprised Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom, the United States, the European Union (EU) Presidency, the European Commission (the administrative arm of the EU) and the Organization of the Islamic Conference.

In December 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 290], the Conference, having approved a 12-month action plan, had declared that in 1997 its objectives would be to consolidate peace, encourage reconciliation and economic, political and social regeneration, and take radical steps to restore Bosnia and Herzegovina to economic health and prosperity.

PIC Steering Board meeting (May). The PIC Steering Board met at the Foreign Ministerial level in Sintra, Portugal, on 30 May to review progress in the implementation of the Peace Agreement for Bosnia and Herzegovina, in the light of the conclusions of its November 1996 meeting in Paris [YUN 1996, p. 308] and the guidelines from the Peace Implementation Conference held in London in December of that year [Ibid., p. 309].

In the Political Declaration that emerged from the Sintra meeting [S/1997/434], the Steering Board said that, while significant progress had been made during 1996 and the first part of 1997 in realizing the goals of the Peace Agreement, major problems and challenges remained.

The Board agreed unanimously that all the authorities of Bosnia and Herzegovina were failing to live up fully to their obligations under the Peace Agreement. It arrived at that conclusion having reviewed developments since the London Conference, when the PIC countries had reaffirmed their willingness to assist with the development of Bosnia and Herzegovina, but on the clear condition that all the authorities of the country fulfilled their own binding commitments to move the peace process forward. The main responsibility for the future of the country rested with the elected and constitutional representatives, the Board said. The help they would receive from the international community would be dependent upon the commitment they demonstrated to the Peace Agreement.

The Board asked the High Representative to supply a list of shortcomings or non-compliance by the authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina in the implementation of the Peace Agreement, and to recommend specific action to be taken by the international community in each case.

The Board's conclusions also addressed issues of security cooperation and arms control; the unity of Bosnia and Herzegovina as a State with two multi-ethnic entities; full implementation of the Constitution of Bosnia and Herzegovina; cooperation on war crimes; economic reform; conditionality for refugee return; public security; human rights; freedom of movement, trade and communications; local elections; the media; the situation in the Brcko area; succession negotiations; civilian funding shortfalls; and nomination of a new High Representative (see below).

Regarding arms control, the Board noted the entities' less than full compliance; it expressed great concern about the level of armaments and military spending in the country and in the region. The high levels of military and military-related spending in both the Federation and Republika Srpska imposed a heavy burden on the country and diverted financial means from economic reconstruction and essential social spending, such as health and education. The Board called for a significant reduction in military expenditure. It was deeply concerned that the authorities had yet to provide the Bosnia and Herzegovina Demining Commission with material and financial support; such support should be provided immediately so that the Commission could tackle the extensive demining task ahead.

The Board stated that Bosnia and Herzegovina would remain a united and sovereign country consisting of two multi-ethnic entities. The international community would not tolerate any attempts at partition or tendencies in either entity to develop patterns of cooperation with neighbouring countries that were inconsistent with the country's sovereignty and territorial integrity.

With regard to full implementation of the Constitution, FRY and Bosnia and Herzegovina should fulfil immediately their commitments to establish unconditional, full diplomatic relations and open embassies in Sarajevo and Belgrade. The Board expected Bosnia and Herzegovina to appoint or confirm the country's ambassadors by 1 August 1997 at the latest and requested the High Representative to assist in the process. If, however, the matter was not solved by that date, the Board would take further steps, including dealing only with those ambassadors of Bosnia and Herzegovina who represented the new authorities of the united country. The Board also expected a quick decision on the common flag of Bosnia and Herzegovina. After 1 September 1997, it would recommend to all countries and organizations that existing flags and symbols not be recognized as those of the country unless so decided as laid down in the Constitution.

In the matter of war crimes, the Board said that although cooperation with the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY) (see PART FOUR, Chapter II) had improved, the failure to hand over indicted persons remained a matter of grave concern. The situation in Republika Srpska, where Radovan Karadzic continued to influence the political decision-making of the entity in violation of both the letter and the spirit of previous undertakings, was unacceptable. The Board supported the High Representative's recommendation to the Security Council to deny new economic assistance to those municipalities that continued to tolerate indicted persons working in a public capacity, and would follow that up.

As to economic reform, the Board urged the authorities of the entities to establish a sound legal and political basis for an open and dynamic free market economy. It demanded the immediate and unconditional opening of the full border between Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia. In addition, the Board asked the High Representative to proceed speedily with preparing the second package of essential legislation to be presented to the authorities of the country. It should include legislation on frequency management and telecommunications, airspace management, permanent election law, immigration law and permanent law on customs and customs tariffs.

Addressing refugee return, the Board said there would be continued instability in Bosnia and Herzegovina unless a process was put in place to enable refugees and displaced persons to return to their pre-war homes in a peaceful, orderly and phased manner. Although all the authorities had agreed, as part of the Peace Agreement, to support those returns, none had abided by it in practice. International economic aid was conditional upon compliance with, and implementation of, the Peace Agreement. The Board called for the Federation and Republika Srpska to amend their property laws in order to make possible the full implementation of annex 7 of the Peace Agreement. The existing laws placed insurmountable legal barriers in the path of return, effectively blocking hundreds of thousands of pre-war occupants from returning to their homes.

Regarding public security, the Board expected both entities to accelerate the restructuring of their police forces in line with the two plans prepared under the guidance of IPTF. Republika Srpska in particular was behind in restructuring commitments. The authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina were called on to take further measures to provide the necessary control and security to address smuggling, terrorism and crime along its international borders.

The Board was deeply concerned about the pattern of discrimination and harassment of ethnic minorities throughout the country and with the complacency of responsible authorities in the face of such abuses (see also PART TWO, Chapter III). The police not only frequently condoned violence on ethnic and political grounds, they were often responsible for violations themselves. The legal system remained inadequate to meet that challenge, and efforts to ensure adherence to the rule of law needed to be a priority. In that connection, the Board asked the High Representative to report to PIC on compliance with the conclusions of the report submitted to the Florence meeting in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 306] and to recommend specific action.

Freedom of movement throughout Bosnia and Herzegovina was a key provision of the Peace Agreement and the Constitution, and no authorities had the right to impede the full freedom of movement of persons, goods, services and capital, the Board stated. It insisted that further progress be made towards working collectively, and on an equal basis, in the Civil Aviation Authority (CAA) and opening the regional airports of Mostar, Tuzla and Banja Luka. The Board further insisted that the authorities of Bosnia and Herzegovina ensure that CAA was reconstituted and operational by the end of July. If that action was not undertaken, the Board would recommend that international aviation authorities cease to cooperate with the existing body.

The Board underlined the importance of the municipal elections set for 13-14 September, noting that the process would not be complete until elected officials had been installed. The Board stated that the promotion of independent media was an essential step for developing democratic institutions and of particular importance in preparing the ground for the elections. The need to encourage independent publishers and broadcasters was stressed.

In the matter of Brcko (see below), the Board stressed that full cooperation with the Supervisor and his decisions, as well as adherence to all parts of the Peace Agreement, were essential obligations for both of the entities, and recalled that any final award by the Arbiter would take compliance by the authorities fully into account. The Board expressed deep concern at the failure of Republika Srpska authorities to safeguard the freedom of movement in the area and strongly censured the Federation for its failure to cooperate in the Brcko process, particularly for blocking economic assistance to Brcko, hindering the return of refugees through its failure to accept agreed procedures and withholding its support for the electoral process.

Peace Implementation Conference (December). The Peace Implementation Conference of PIC (Bonn, Germany, 9-10 December) [A/52/728-S/1997/979] reviewed progress in implementing the Peace Agreement since its second meeting in London in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 309] and the Ministerial Meeting of the PIC Steering Board earlier in 1997 (see above). The Conference discussed human rights, legal reform and war crimes; constitutional and other legal matters; refugees and displaced persons; public order and police issues; the media; elections; economic reconstruction and reform; the situation in Brcko; security and arms control; regional matters; and the role of the High Representative.

PIC concluded that considerable progress had been made in implementing peace and stability in Bosnia and Herzegovina since its last meeting, especially in the following areas: the municipal elections of September and the special elections for the Republika Srpska Assembly in November; arms control and confidence- and security-building measures; restructuring and reform of police; the beginning of minority returns in the Federation and to a lesser degree in Republika Srpska; economic revival in the Federation; development of non-partisan professional media; and the more than doubling of the number of persons indicted for war crimes in the custody of ICTY. PIC welcomed the results obtained in enhancing the climate of security and in addressing the main prerequisites for reconciliation, tolerance and democracy, as well as freedom of movement and the improvement of the economy.

However, much more could have been achieved had the authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina contributed their full share to the construction of a civil and democratic society, PIC said. Implementation of the Peace Agreement was entering its third year and the consolidation period its last phase, yet a huge effort was still needed to achieve the ultimate goal of making peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and its entities self-sustainable. In particular, progress was needed to build functioning governmental and administrative structures, to further democratization, to ensure the adequate protection of human rights, police reform and the rule of law, to establish a proper management of the economy—including the fight against corruption and revenue evasion—and to complete successfully the return of refugees and displaced persons.

Noting that peace and the institutions of civil society to uphold it remained fragile, PIC highlighted the following matters of concern: the majority of common institutions were operating insufficiently and permanent facilities had not been established; illegal structures of government in the Federation had not been dissolved or integrated; serious problems of local administration, notably in Mostar (see below), continued to exist and the implementation of municipal elections still encountered resistance in several municipalities; lack of strong multi-ethnic political parties and a structured civil society; lack of legislation on demining and the continuing manufacture of mines; human rights were still not adequately protected, citizenship was not legally defined, there was no Bosnia and Herzegovina passport or jointly agreed flag; property and housing legislation blocked the return of refugees and displaced persons to their pre-war homes; the police were still sometimes used to obstruct the implementation of election results, did not deal effectively with politically or ethnically motivated crimes, were responsible for documented cases of abuse of persons in custody and, more generally, were not sufficiently obliged by the political leadership to advance the goals of the Peace Agreement; human rights violations remained endemic, despite improvement in some areas: neither entity had taken steps to ensure that its laws were compatible with the European Convention on Human Rights; comprehensive plans to facilitate returns had not been implemented; there were no functioning public corporations; Bosnia and Herzegovina had failed to finance its common institutions or service its external debt on time, implement common policies on foreign trade, apply a common customs tariff, issue common bank notes, achieve transparency and good governance in the use of public funds, and establish effective institutions to curb corruption and revenue evasion; and full normalization of Bosnia and Herzegovina's relations with its immediate neighbours had not taken place.

PIC said it would continue to assist Bosnia and Herzegovina in 1998, but concluded that an even more persistent approach on the part of the international community was required. The actions of the authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina too often fell short of their words, the Council said; recent reports by the World Bank and the European Commission's Customs and Fiscal Assistance Office (EC-CAFAO) were new, sobering evidence of that attitude. Continued procrastination could even endanger the progress that had been achieved thus far.

PIC again made clear to the authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina that assistance by the international community remained conditional upon compliance with the Peace Agreement and subsequent obligations. It reaffirmed that it would tolerate neither any tendencies to dominate the political institutions of Bosnia and Herzegovina nor any attempts to undermine its sovereignty and territorial integrity.

The Council insisted that all persons indicted for war crimes be handed over to ICTY, and it drew particular attention to the failure of the authorities of Republika Srpska and FRY to carry out that obligation.

The Republic of Croatia and FRY were reminded of their obligations under the Peace Agreement, which the Council expected would be discharged in their entirety, voluntarily and immediately.

The Council recognized and supported what it called the emerging consensus on the need for a military presence to continue beyond June 1998, considering it indispensable for the maintenance of a stable security environment and, in particular, for helping to create secure conditions for the conduct by the High Representative, as well as by the United Nations, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) and other international organizations, of tasks associated with the Peace Agreement. It stressed that the presence of SFOR and IFOR, its predecessor, had been the greatest single contributor to sub-regional security since the signing of the Peace Agreement and would continue to be in the short to medium term. It welcomed NATO's plans to consider options for a multinational follow-on force to SFOR beyond June 1998.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

29. Decides to include in the provisional agenda at its fifty-third session the item entitled "The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina".

Civilian aspects

The civilian aspects of the 1995 Peace Agreement [YUN 1995, p. 544] entailed a wide range of activities, including humanitarian aid, rehabilitation of infrastructure and economic reconstruction, establishment of political and constitutional institutions, promotion of respect for human rights and the holding of free and fair elections. The High Representative, who chaired the PIC Steering Board and other key implementation bodies, was the final authority with regard to implementing the civilian aspects. UNMIBH, which comprised a UN civilian office, IPTF and MAC, reported to the Secretary-General through the United Nations Coordinator.

High Representative

The PIC Steering Board, in May (see above), nominated Carlos Westendorp (Spain) to serve as the High Representative from 20 June 1997, replacing Carl Bildt (Sweden), who was named first High Representative in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 547].

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 12 June [meeting 3787], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1112(1997). The draft [S/1997/445] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 1031(1995) of 15 December 1995 and 1088(1996) of 12 December 1996,

Recalling also the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the annexes thereto (collectively the "Peace Agreement"),

1. Welcomes the conclusions of the Ministerial Meeting of the Steering Board of the Peace Implementation Council held in Sintra, Portugal, on 30 May 1997, and agrees with the designation of Mr. Carlos Westendorp as High Representative in succession to Mr. Carl Bildt;

2. Expresses its warmest appreciation to Mr. Carl Bildt for his work as High Representative;

3. Reaffirms the importance it attaches to the role of the High Representative in monitoring the implementation of the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the annexes thereto (collectively the "Peace Agreement") and giving guidance to and coordinating the activities of the civilian organizations and agencies involved in assisting the parties to implement the Peace Agreement, and also reaffirms that the High Representative is the final authority in theatre regarding the interpretation of annex 10 of the Peace Agreement concerning civilian implementation and that in case of dispute he may give his interpretation and make his recommendations, including to the authorities of Bosnia and Herzegovina or its entities, and make them known publicly.

Reports of High Representative. The High Representative reported four times on the implementation process during the year, covering the period from 1 December 1996 to 31 March 1997 [S/1997/310], from 1 April to 30 June [S/1997/542], from 1 July to 30 September [S/1997/804], and from 1 October to 31 December [S/1998/40]. He described progress in the civilian implementation of the Agreement, which he had been mandated to monitor, mobilize and coordinate. (For details, see below under specific subjects.)

During the year, the High Representative convened monthly PIC Steering Board meetings at the level of political directors of the respective Foreign Ministries and weekly meetings at the ambassadorial level in Sarajevo, each devoted to specific issues of the peace process.

The High Representative stated that, by the end of 1997, considerable progress had been made in implementing peace and stability in Bosnia and Herzegovina and in enhancing the climate of reconciliation, tolerance and democracy. Achievements included the establishment and functioning of common institutions, holding of free elections and commencement of economic reconstruction—all prerequisites for the three constituent peoples—Bosniacs (Bosnian Muslims), Bosnian Croats and Bosnian Serbs—to live peacefully together. The overall picture in Bosnia and Herzegovina was changing for the better and life was returning to normal.

Notwithstanding those accomplishments, however, huge and complex tasks lay ahead. The High Representative felt that it would be premature to say that the peace process was yet irreversible or lasting. The main responsibility for turning the Peace Agreement into living reality, he said, lay with those who signed it.

UN Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina (UNMIBH)

During 1997, the Secretary-General submitted four reports to the Security Council on the activities of UNMIBH [S/1997/224 & Add.1, S/1997/468, S/1997/694, S/1997/966].

Special Representative and Coordinator. On 31 January [S/1997/102], the Secretary-General informed the Security Council of his intention to appoint Kai Eide (Norway) as his Special Representative and Coordinator of United Nations Operations in Bosnia and Herzegovina to replace Iqbal Riza (Pakistan). The Council agreed with the appointment on 4 February [S/1997/103].

On 26 November [S/1997/938], the Secretary-General informed the Council that Mr. Eide would relinquish his post on 15 January 1998 and that he intended to appoint Elizabeth Rehn (Finland) to replace him as of 16 January. The Council agreed on 1 December [S/1997/939].

Report of Secretary-General (March). In a 14 March report [S/1997/224 & Add.1], the Secretary-General stated that during the first three months of the stabilization or consolidation period, admirable progress had been achieved in some areas, particularly in the establishment of joint institutions. In others, however, progress remained dangerously slow. Tensions persisted between the different ethnic communities, with violence frequently erupting when displaced persons attempted to return to their homes.

The Secretary-General stated that, should the Security Council agree that IPTF was to carry out the international policing proposed by the Brcko Implementation Conference in March (see below), an increase in UNMIBH's authorized strength (186 police and 11 civilian personnel) would be required. In addition, the IPTF Commissioner had determined that the additional human rights investigation tasks that the Council had endorsed for IPTF in resolution 1088 (1996) [YUN 1996, p. 310] would require that the force be strengthened with 120 police personnel. The Secretary-General therefore requested the Council to consider authorizing an increase of 306 personnel for IPTF plus 11 additional civilian staff.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (March)

On 31 March [meeting 3760], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1103(1997). The draft [S/1997/263] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions concerning the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia, including resolutions 1035(1995) of 21 December 1995 and 1088(1996) of 12 December 1996,

Recalling also the need for the implementation of the provisions of the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the annexes thereto (collectively the "Peace Agreement"), in particular those provisions relating to cooperation with the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia,

Noting that the International Police Task Force has been entrusted with the tasks set out in annex 11 of the Peace Agreement, including the tasks referred to in the conclusions of the Peace Implementation Conference held in London on 4 and 5 December 1996 and agreed upon by the authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Taking note of the decision of 14 February 1997 by the arbitral tribunal on the disputed portion of the Inter-Entity Boundary Line in the Brcko area, and noting the holding of the Brcko Implementation Conference in Vienna on 7 March 1997,

Reminding all parties to annex 2 of the Peace Agreement of their obligation, in accordance with article V of that annex, to be bound by the decision of the arbitral tribunal and to implement it without delay,

Expressing its appreciation to the personnel of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina, including those of the International Police Task Force, for their work in assisting in the implementation of the Peace Agreement in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and to all other personnel of the international community engaged in implementing the Peace Agreement,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 14 March 1997,

1. Decides to authorize an increase in the strength of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina by 186 police and 11 civilian personnel, in the light of the recommendation of the Secretary-General concerning the role of the International Police Task Force in Brcko, contained in his report of 14 March 1997, and in order to enable it to carry out its mandate set out in annex 11 of the Peace Agreement and resolution 1088(1996) of 12 December 1996;

2. Acknowledges the importance of ensuring that the International Police Task Force is able to carry out all the tasks with which it has been entrusted, in particular those tasks set out in the conclusions of the London Conference and agreed upon by the authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and decides to consider expeditiously the recommendations of the Secretary-General concerning those tasks, contained in his report of 14 March 1997;

3. Urges Member States, with the support of the Secretary-General, to provide qualified police monitors and other forms of assistance and support to the International Police Task Force and in support of the Peace Agreement;

4. Calls upon all parties to the Peace Agreement to implement all aspects of that Agreement and to cooperate in full with the International Police Task Force in the conduct of its activities;

5. Stresses the need for the continued closest possible coordination between the multinational Stabilization Force and the International Police Task Force, in particular in the area of Brcko;

6. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Communication. On 5 May [S/1997/351], the Secretary-General transmitted to the Security Council an IPTF report on the human rights situation in Mostar (1 January-15 February 1997) (see below). He reiterated his 14 March recommendation that IPTF be strengthened by 120 personnel to carry out the human rights investigation tasks authorized by the Council in resolution 1088(1996).

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (May)

On 16 May [meeting 3776], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1107(1997). The draft [S/1997/371] was sponsored by France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Portugal, the Russian Federation, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 1103(1997) of 31 March 1997 concerning the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina, including the International Police Task Force,

Recalling also the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the annexes thereto (collectively the "Peace Agreement"),

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 14 March 1997 and his letter dated 5 May 1997 to the President of the Security Council,

1. Decides to authorize an increase in the strength of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina by 120 police personnel, in the light of the recommendation of the Secretary-General concerning the tasks of the International Police Task Force set out in the conclusions of the Peace Implementation Conference held in London on 4 and 5 December 1996 and agreed upon by the authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina, in order to enable the Task Force to carry out its mandate set out in annex 11 of the Peace Agreement and resolution 1088(1996) of 12 December 1996;

2. Urges Member States to provide qualified police monitors and other forms of assistance and support to the International Police Task Force and in support of the Peace Agreement;

3. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Reports of Secretary-General. In a 16 June report [S/1997/468], the Secretary-General stated that the authorized strength of IPTF had increased from 1,721 to 2,027 in accordance with the Security Council's 31 March and 16 May resolutions (see above). He described the activities during the reporting period of IPTF, Civil Affairs, the Legal Office, MAC and the Trust Fund Unit of UNMIBH and of other members of the UN system.

The Secretary-General observed that cooperation between SFOR and the United Nations was excellent and it was largely due to SFOR support that IPTF had been able to make progress. The withdrawal or large-scale reduction of SFOR would render the position of IPTF largely untenable and would negatively affect other vital UN operations, such as those of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR). That situation was likely to continue for at least another year.

The situation in Mostar had improved, said the Secretary-General, and an agreement on the restructuring of the Neretva Canton Police (Sarajevo) had provided the context for the next phase of IPTF activity, particularly in the area of police reform. However, the refusal of the Republika Srpska Government to cooperate fully with IPTF was causing great concern.

On 8 September [S/1997/694], the Secretary-General presented the Security Council with an update of UNMIBH's activities and those of other UN operations in Bosnia and Herzegovina. He expressed concern about the tense and volatile situation in Republika Srpska, where the authorities continued to follow a policy of minimum implementation of the Peace Agreement. While welcoming the agreement by the Presidency of Bosnia and Herzegovina on diplomatic representation, he regretted the failure to achieve within the agreed time-frame agreements on a common currency, a citizenship law or passports.

In a 10 December report [S/1997/966], the Secretary-General again described UNMIBH activities and those of other UN operations in Bosnia and Herzegovina. He reported that the Mission had suffered a tragic setback on 17 September when a helicopter crashed in central Bosnia, killing 12 UNMIBH members.

The period under review had seen progress towards implementing the Peace Agreement, including the inauguration of joint Bosniac-Croat police forces in the two mixed cantons of the Federation; the initiation of a comprehensive police restructuring programme in Republika Srpska; and the appointment of a multi-ethnic police leadership in the contested city of Brcko. However, that progress was in its early stages and still fragile and would require UNMIBH's continued engagement in developing the capacity for policing according to internationally acceptable standards.

Police restructuring had to be accompanied by reform of the judicial system, the monitoring of which was another UNMIBH function. However, a wider range of activities in that area had not been possible due to a lack of resources and qualified personnel. Reforming the police, the judicial system and the prisons had to be addressed in an integrated way if a fair and non-discriminatory law and order environment was to be created, the Secretary-General said. Also, financial crime, smuggling and other illicit operations were causing loss of revenue to Bosnia and Herzegovina. UNMIBH was ready to begin training entity police forces in detecting those kinds of crime and to assist in establishing special anti-corruption units. In order to carry out the tasks related to judicial reform and economic crime, UNMIBH would require an increase in human and financial resources.

The Secretary-General stated that although much had been achieved in the two years of experience with the complex arrangements of the Peace Agreement, much also remained to be done. He therefore recommended an extension of the UNMIBH mandate for a further 12 months. He noted, however, that the presence of IPTF monitors was contingent on the continued existence of a credible international military force.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (December)

On 19 December [meeting 3842], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1144(1997). The draft [S/1997/989] was sponsored by France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Portugal, the Russian Federation, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States.

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions concerning the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia, including resolutions 1031(1995) of 15 December 1995, 1035(1995) of 21 December 1995, 1088(1996) of 12 December 1996, 1103(1997) of 31 March 1997 and 1107(1997) of 16 May 1997,

Expressing its continued commitment to the political settlement of the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia, preserving the sovereignty and territorial integrity of all States there within their internationally recognized borders,

Welcoming the conclusions of the Ministerial Meeting of the Steering Board of the Peace Implementation Council held in Sintra, Portugal, on 30 May 1997 and the Peace Implementation Conference held in Bonn on 9 and 10 December 1997,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 10 December 1997, and taking note of his observations, in particular with regard to the International Police Task Force,

Affirming its full support for the High Representative and his staff and his responsibility in implementing the civilian aspects of the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the annexes thereto (collectively the "Peace Agreement"),

Commending the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina, in particular the International Police Task Force for its valuable work in such areas as police restructuring, training, weapons inspections and promoting freedom of movement, as well as its assistance in connection with the elections in Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Expressing its appreciation to the personnel of the Mission, and commending the leadership and dedication of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and the Commissioner of the International Police Task Force in their efforts to support the implementation of the Peace Agreement,

Noting that the presence of International Police Task Force monitors is contingent on the existence of adequate security arrangements which, at present, can only be secured by a credible international military force,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina, which includes the International Police Task Force, for an additional period terminating on 21 June 1998, which will be renewed for a further period unless significant changes are made to the security arrangements as currently provided by the multinational Stabilization Force, and decides also that the Task Force shall continue to be entrusted with the tasks set out in annex 11 of the Peace Agreement, including the tasks referred to in the conclusions of the Peace Implementation Conference held in London on 4 and 5 December 1996 and of the Ministerial Meeting of the Steering Board of the Peace Implementation Council held in Sintra on 30 May 1997 and the Peace Implementation Conference held in Bonn on 9 and 10 December 1997, and agreed upon by the authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina;

2. Expresses its support for the conclusions of the Bonn Conference, and encourages the Secretary-General to pursue implementation of its relevant recommendations, in particular on the restructuring of the International Police Task Force;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council informed regularly about the work of the International Police Task Force and, in particular, its progress in assisting the restructuring of law enforcement agencies; to report every three months on the implementation of the mandate of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina as a whole; and to include in his first report a description of action taken to implement recommendations of the Bonn Conference on restructuring the Task Force, particularly the creation of specialized Task Force units to train Bosnian police to address more effectively key public security issues;

4. Reaffirms that the successful implementation of the tasks of the International Police Task Force rests on the quality, experience and professional skill of its personnel, and urges Member States, with the support of the Secretary-General, to ensure the provision of such qualified personnel;

5. Urges Member States to provide training, equipment and related assistance for local police forces in coordination with the International Police Task Force, recognizing that resources are critical to the success of the police reform efforts of the Task Force;

6. Calls upon all concerned to ensure the closest possible coordination among the Office of the High Representative, the multinational Stabilization Force, the Mission and the relevant civilian organizations and agencies in order to ensure the successful implementation of the Peace Agreement and the priority objectives of the civilian consolidation plans, as well as the security of the International Police Task Force;

7. Pays tribute to the victims of the helicopter crash of 17 September 1997 in Bosnia and Herzegovina, including members of the Office of the High Representative, the International Police Task Force and a bilateral assistance programme, for their sacrifice in advancing the peace process;

8. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

UNMIBH financing

The Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly a report on the financing of UNMIBH for the period 1 July 1997-30 June 1998 [A/51/519/Add.1 & Corr.1]. Although the United Nations Mission of Observers in Prevlaka (UNMOP) was an independent mission, for administrative and budgetary purposes it was treated as part of UNMIBH. The Secretary-General's budget for the maintenance of UNMIBH, including UNMOP, for that period totalled $172,587,000 gross ($164,511,600 net). In response to a request by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) [A/51/681], the Secretary-General submitted a February addendum [A/51/519/Add.2] containing information on the criteria used in conducting the local salary survey carried out in UNMIBH and reducing the cost estimates to take account of the discontinuance of hazard duty allowance as of 1 December 1996. The revised cost estimates amounted to $165,597,600 gross ($157,522,200 net). In another addendum [A/51/519/Add.3], the Secretary-General presented the financial performance report of UNMIBH, including UNMOP and the Office of the Special Coordinator for Sarajevo, for the period 1 January-30 June 1996. The Assembly, by resolution 50/241 [YUN 1996, p. 279], had appropriated $43,849,300 gross ($42,662,500 net) for that period. Expenditures amounted to $37,332,500 gross ($36,161,700 net), resulting in an unencumbered balance of $6,516,800 gross ($6,500,800 net). In a May report [A/51/519/Add.4], the Secretary-General presented a revised budget for the period 1 July 1997-30 June 1998 incorporating the additional requirements for the international policing in Brcko authorized by the Security Council by resolution 1103(1997) (see above). Those additional requirements totalled $12,930,000 (gross)($12,394,200 net).

For its consideration of UNMIBH financing, the Assembly also had before it related ACABQ reports [A/51/872, A/51/910].

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 13 June [meeting 101], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee [A/51/710/Add.1], adopted resolution 51/152 B without vote [agenda item 153].

Financing of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina

The General Assembly,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the related reports of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Recalling Security Council resolution 1035(1995) of 21 December 1995, by which the Council established the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina for an initial period of one year, and Council resolution 1088(1996) of 12 December 1996, by which the Council extended the mandate of the Mission to 21 December 1997,

Recalling also Security Council resolution 1093(1997) of 14 January 1997, in which the Council authorized the United Nations military observers to continue to monitor the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula until 15 July 1997,

Recalling further its decision 50/481 of 11 April 1996 on the financing of the Mission and its subsequent resolutions thereon, the latest of which was resolution 51/152 A of 16 December 1996,

Reaffirming that the costs of the Mission are expenses of the Organization to be borne by Member States in accordance with Article 17, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations,

Recalling its previous decisions regarding the fact that, in order to meet the expenditures caused by the Mission, a different procedure is required from that applied to meet expenditures of the regular budget of the United Nations,

Taking into account the fact that the economically more developed countries are in a position to make relatively larger contributions and that the economically less developed countries have a relatively limited capacity to contribute towards such an operation,

Bearing in mind the special responsibilities of the States permanent members of the Security Council, as indicated in General Assembly resolution 1874(S-IV) of 27 June 1963, in the financing of such operations,

Mindful of the fact that it is essential to provide the Mission with the necessary financial resources to enable it to fulfil its responsibilities under the relevant resolutions of the Security Council,

1. Takes note of the status of contributions to the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina as at 15 May 1997, including the contributions outstanding in the amount of 27.4 million United States dollars, representing 18 per cent of the total assessed contributions from the inception of the Mission to the period ending 30 June 1997, notes that some 21 per cent of the Member States have paid their assessed contributions in full, and urges all other Member States concerned, in particular those in arrears, to ensure the payment of their outstanding assessed contributions;

2. Expresses concern about the financial situation with regard to peacekeeping activities, in particular as regards the reimbursement of troop contributors, which bear burdens owing to overdue payments by Member States of their assessments;

3. Expresses its appreciation to those Member States which have paid their assessed contributions in full;

4. Urges all other Member States to make every possible effort to ensure payment of their assessed contributions to the Mission in full and on time;

5. Endorses the observations and recommendations contained in the reports of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions;

6. Approves, on an exceptional basis, the special arrangements for the Mission with regard to the application of article IV of the financial regulations of the United Nations, whereby appropriations required in respect of obligations owed to Governments providing contingents and/or logistic support to the Mission shall be retained beyond the period stipulated under financial regulations 4.3 and 4.4, as set out in the annex to the present resolution;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to take all necessary action to ensure that the Mission is administered with a maximum of efficiency and economy;

8. Decides to appropriate to the Special Account for the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina the amount of 178,880,900 dollars gross (170,269,700 dollars net) for the maintenance of the Mission for the period from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998, inclusive of the amount of 6,880,900 dollars for the support account for peacekeeping operations, to be apportioned among Member States at a monthly rate of 14,906,742 dollars gross (14,189,142 dollars net) in accordance with the composition of groups set out in paragraphs 3 and 4 of General Assembly resolution 43/232 of 1 March 1989, as adjusted by the Assembly in its resolutions 44/192 B of 21 December 1989, 45/269 of 27 August 1991, 46/198 A of 20 December 1991, 47/218 A of 23 December 1992, 49/249 A of 20 July 1995, 49/249 B of 14 September 1995, 50/224 of 11 April 1996 and 51/218 A and B of 18 December 1996 and its decisions 48/472 A of 23 December 1993 and 50/451 B of 23 December 1995, and taking into account the scale of assessments for the year 1997, as set out in its resolution 49/19 B of 23 December 1994 and its decision 50/471 A of 23 December 1995, and for the year 1998, subject to the decision of the Security Council to extend the mandate of the Mission beyond 21 December 1997;

9. Decides also that, in accordance with the provisions of its resolution 973(X) of 15 December 1955, there shall be set off against the apportionment among Member States, as provided for in paragraph 8 above, their respective share in the Tax Equalization Fund of the estimated staff assessment income of 8,611,200 dollars approved for the Mission for the period from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998;

10. Decides further that, for Member States that have fulfilled their financial obligations to the Mission, there shall be set off against the apportionment, as provided for in paragraph 8 above, their respective share in the unencumbered balance of 6,516,800 dollars gross (6,500,800 dollars net) in respect of the period ending 30 June 1996;

11. Decides that, for Member States that have not fulfilled their financial obligations to the Mission, their share of the unencumbered balance of 6,516,800 dollars gross (6,500,800 dollars net) for the period ending 30 June 1996 shall be set off against their outstanding obligations;

12. Invites voluntary contributions to the Mission in cash and in the form of services and supplies acceptable to the Secretary-General, to be administered, as appropriate, in accordance with the procedure and practices established by the General Assembly;

13. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second session the item entitled "Financing of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina".

ANNEX

Special arrangements with regard to the application of article IV of the financial regulations of the United Nations

1. At the end of the twelve-month period provided for in financial regulation 4.3, any unliquidated obligations of the financial period in question relating to goods supplied and services rendered by Governments for which claims have been received or which are covered by established reimbursement rates shall be transferred to accounts payable; such accounts shall remain recorded in the Special Account for the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina until payment is effected.

2. (a) Any other unliquidated obligations of the financial period in question owed to Governments for goods supplied and services rendered, as well as other obligations owed to Governments, for which required claims have not yet been received shall remain valid for an additional period of four years following the end of the twelve-month period provided for in regulation 4.3;

(b) Claims received during this four-year period shall be treated as provided for under paragraph 1 of the present annex, if appropriate;

(c) At the end of the additional four-year period, any unliquidated obligations shall be cancelled and the then remaining balance of any appropriations retained therefor shall be surrendered.

In July [A/51/519/Add.5 & Corr.1], the Secretary-General presented a revision to the UNMIBH budget for the period 1 July 1997-30 June 1998, which incorporated additional requirements of $7,943,900 gross ($7,600,400 net) relating to the investigation of human rights abuses by police in Bosnia and Herzegovina, as approved by the Security Council in resolution 1107(1997) (see above). The revision also included the costs of the transfer of central support to the operations in the former Yugoslavia from the United Nations Peace Forces headquarters to UNMIBH, amounting to $2,664,100 gross ($2,387,200 net).

The Assembly also had before it an ACABQ report [A/52/546] stating that ACABQ did not believe it necessary to appropriate an additional $10.6 million gross over and above the $ 178.9 million already appropriated. It recommended, however, that the Secretary-General be authorized to retain in the UNMIBH account the unencumbered balance for the period 1 July 1996-30 June 1997 until the Assembly had taken a decision on the performance report for 1 July 1997-30 June 1998.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 76], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/52/690], adopted decision 52/437 by which it authorized the Secretary-General to enter into commitments in an amount not to exceed $10,608,000 gross ($9,987,600 net) for the maintenance of UNMIBH for the period 1 July 1997-30 June 1998, in addition to the $178,880,900 gross ($170,269,700 net) already appropriated. It requested the Secretary-General to employ locally recruited staff for UNMIBH General Service posts and to report to the Assembly on the matter. It decided to keep the item on the financing of UNMIBH under review.

On 22 December (decision 52/456), the Assembly decided that the Fifth Committee should continue to consider the financing of UNMIBH at the resumed fifty-second (1998) session.

International Police Task Force (IPTF)

During 1997, the authorized strength of UNMIBH's International Police Task Force (IPTF) rose from 1,721 to 2,027, following increases approved by the Security Council in resolutions 1103(1997) and 1107(1997) (see above). Some 40 countries provided personnel to man 64 stations.

Monitoring police activities throughout the country remained the major focus of IPTF during the year, as did assisting in the return of refugees to villages in the zone of separation. Restructuring and training of police in the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina and in Republika Srpska also continued.

On 6 February [S/1997/118], the Secretary-General informed the Council of his intention to appoint Manfred Seitner (Denmark) as Commissioner of IPTF, replacing Peter FitzGerald (Ireland), and the Council agreed with that appointment on 11 February [S/1997/119]. Mr. Seitner took over on 3 March.

On 14 March [S/1997/224 & Add.1], the Secretary-General reported that a regional IPTF office had been established in Mostar following an increase in tension there. In early February, tensions also rose in the Brcko area (see below) causing IPTF to enhance its presence in the region. In the context of restructuring the police in the Federation, the first new cantonal police force was put in place in Sarajevo in February. The number of officers was reduced by almost 900 in Sarajevo alone; only professionally trained police were being retained. A plan to restructure the police in Republika Srpska, which was submitted to IPTF by the Ministry of the Interior on 31 January, did not envisage publishing the names of potential police officers. IPTF was working with the authorities to encourage them to correct that shortcoming. A course on executive (VIP) protection was held in Ireland in mid-March for a multi-ethnic group of police officers—the first training exercise involving officers from both entities—who were responsible for protecting members of the Presidency of Bosnia and Herzegovina. IPTF had conducted its first investigation of human rights violations by the local police in West Mostar in mid-February (see below) and documented serious violations by the Bosnian Croat Police, as well as unprofessional policing practices on both sides. The IPTF Commissioner had determined that in order to carry out satisfactorily additional and existing tasks relating to human rights investigations, monitoring of the local police, strengthening of police training, police restructuring and developing guidelines for democratic principles, the Force would have to move from a primarily generalist one to one with a substantial number of police experts in specialized fields. However, IPTF would still need to maintain a presence throughout the country and monitor key locations, such as Mostar, the resettlement area of the zone of separation and other areas where substantial tensions remained. IPTF's authorized strength was increased by the Council by resolution 1103(1997) of 31 March.

The Secretary-General stated in June [S/1997/468] that IPTF's main goals continued to be to contribute to improving freedom of movement, to monitor and assist in establishing safe conditions for returning refugees and displaced persons and for the period of the forthcoming election campaign, and to assist in restructuring and training local police. The Force was also carrying out investigations into allegations of human rights violations by local police. In that regard, IPTF had introduced a new policy to prevent vehicles bearing the licence plates of the other entity from being stopped and harassed by the local police, by which those forces were forbidden to hold static checkpoints for longer than 30 minutes unless prior approval was obtained from IPTF. The Federation Government had endorsed the new policy, although local compliance remained unsatisfactory. The Republika Srpska authorities had refused to accept it but were avoiding direct confrontation when approached by IPTF patrols. Other activities being carried out by IPTF included assisting local police to combat crime, advising local police on operational issues and serving as a bridge between the forces of the two entities, and investigating incidents in Gajevi, Brcko and Drvar. IPTF was also liaising closely with OSCE on the Implementation Plan for the September municipal elections.

In September [S/1997/694], the Secretary-General reported that police monitoring, restructuring and training activities in the Federation were continuing. Although efforts were being made to agree on police restructuring with the Republika Srpska authorities, the constitutional crisis in that entity made the task even more difficult. Also, sporadic violence against international organizations in Republika Srpska, which was precipitated by SFOR efforts to detain two men with sealed indictments for crimes against humanity from ICTY, impeded negotiations on restructuring. In that context, the Special Representative came to an agreement with the SFOR Commander on 7 August on the status of paramilitary forces, by which such forces would be treated as military units, subject to SFOR control. On 17 August, evidence was revealed of interception of communications of the Republika Srpska's President by the police and of intimidation of two judges of the Constitutional Court. IPTF then initiated an urgent investigation of allegations of human rights abuses at the Banja Luka Public Security Centre, during which it uncovered large quantities of illegal weapons and ammunition. A further operation uncovered additional large quantities of weapons from four other police stations in Banja Luka. On 28 August, disturbances between supporters of the President and of the Prime Minister broke out in Brcko, during which a number of attacks were made on UN personnel and property. Only one IPTF monitor was slightly injured but more than 30 vehicles were seriously damaged and the IPTF station was completely looted. Investigations of human rights violations by local police were carried out in Sarajevo, Jajce and Banja Luka.

In December [S/1997/966], the Secretary-General stated that police training was continuing, progress had been made with regard to the agreement concerning paramilitary forces in Republika Srpska and police restructuring in the Federation had maintained its rate of progress. In all municipalities of the ethnically mixed Neretva and Central Bosnia Cantons of the Federation, Bosniac and Croat police officers were patrolling together. In a cooperative effort, IPTF and SFOR carried out 563 weapons inspections in local police stations between 20 August and 30 November. Illegal weapons were found in 121 cases: 49 in Republika Srpska and 72 in the Federation. IPTF cooperated closely with OSCE and SFOR in implementing the municipal elections held on 13 and 14 September and the elections for the Republika Srpska Assembly on 22 and 23 November. IPTF then worked with OSCE and local authorities to develop security plans for inaugural sessions of the municipal assemblies. However, as at 1 December, only 15 of 136 municipal administrations had fulfilled the conditions for final certification by OSCE and 9 municipalities had not met at all.

Mine Action Centre (MAC)

By the end of 1997, MAC of UNMIBH had 120 trained deminers in Banja Luka, Tuzla and Mostar and 40 in Bihac, where they operated under the terms of a contract between UNMIBH and a non-governmental organization. In addition, about 750 trained civilian deminers were working on programmes funded by the European Commission, Norwegian People's Aid, MAC and the World Bank.

Information continued to be collected in the MAC database, which by year's end documented more than 18,000 minefields [S/1997/966]. By 30 November, the total area surveyed and cleared in 1997 by all organizations participating in demining programmes was about 5 square kilometres.

During the spring, the return of displaced persons and refugees had led to a sharp increase in the number of civilian mine casualties and fatalities, the Secretary-General reported in June [S/1997/468], and the demand for mine-clearing assistance had risen.

On 15 October, a Memorandum of Understanding on the UN Mine-Action Plan was signed by the United Nations and the Council of Ministers of Bosnia and Herzegovina and Agreed Principles for Demining after 1 January 1998 were signed by the Council of Ministers on 30 October. Discussions were under way in order to reach agreement on administrative arrangements for the Bosnia and Herzegovina mine action centre and the entity mine action centres, in order to complete the establishment of demining structures in the country by 31 December, as called for in the conclusions of the 1996 Peace Implementation Conference [YUN 1996, p. 309].

Constitution

The High Representative, in his April report [S/1997/310], noted that the focus of his Office's attention during the first months of 1997 had been on constitutional implementation. All the common institutions (the Presidency, the Council of Ministers, the Parliamentary Assembly, the Constitutional Court, the Central Bank and the Standing Committee on Military Matters) had been established and, in most cases, had started to work. However, in order to be more than empty shells of little relevance, those institutions had to take decisions on the laws and other issues that would turn the State into a functioning reality. The High Representative's Office had presented to the Council of Ministers a quick-start package of interim essential legislation that comprised laws and other measures that constituted the minimum for the State to start functioning in the key areas under its control.

The High Representative stated that by the end of the year [S/1998/40], the Presidency, the Council of Ministers and the Parliamentary Assembly were meeting regularly, although the efficiency of their work continued to be hampered by the lack of administrative structures and permanent locations. A notable achievement was the efficient work of the Constitutional Court, which ruled on a number of cases in December. However, it was necessary for the authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina to provide the Court with full funding.

A matter of concern was that the authorities had not made better progress in implementing key aspects of the Bosnia and Herzegovina Constitution and in passing important legislation. The High Representative had decided to enact legislation on the customs tariffs schedule and the draft law on citizenship due to inaction by the authorities. The authorities should rapidly adopt an election law and ensure consistency and cooperation between the entities in the area of legal reform, the High Representative said.

Civil affairs

At the beginning of 1997, the Secretary-General reported [S/1997/224 & Add.1] that 49 Civil Affairs officers were deployed at UNMIBH headquarters, four regional headquarters (Banja Luka, Mostar, Sarajevo and Tuzla), and at a liaison office in Pale. Support was provided to IPTF, local political trends and events were analysed, and good offices were made available for local confidence-building and problem-solving.

Civil Affairs officers also trained new IPTF officers and participated in the OSCE-led effort to create conditions in which voters in the municipal elections could make free and informed choices at the ballot box. The officers also worked with IPTF to identify areas of possible intercommunal conflict and addressed police and human rights problems.

The Secretary-General reported in December [S/1997/966] that Civil Affairs officers in the field had cooperated with IPTF and SFOR in finding solutions to numerous delays and difficulties encountered during the municipal elections in September and the Republika Srpska Assembly elections in November. Civil Affairs also worked closely with the High Representative in developing the operational plan for introducing a common licence plate for Bosnia and Herzegovina. In Brcko, Civil Affairs assisted in preparing orders issued by the Supervisor concerning the establishment of a multi-ethnic police force.

Federation issues

The High Representative reported in April [S/1997/310] that the implementation of the Federation remained a major activity of his Office. The first months of 1997 were characterized by continuing mistrust between the Federation partners.

The Federation—with its Bosnian Muslim (Bosniac) and Bosnian Croat populations—was one of two constituent entities of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the other being Republika Srpska, established in areas of the Republic that had not been under its control and where primarily Bosnian Serbs resided. The Federation was considered an essential prerequisite for the establishment of a multi-ethnic, democratic society in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

An eruption of violence in Mostar on 10 February (see below), when West Mostar police shot at Bosniac cemetery visitors and assaults and evictions in the Mostar area followed, interfered with progress on some Federation issues, the High Representative stated.

On 18 March, both Federation Houses of the Federation Assembly elected the new Federation President, Vladimir Soljic, and his Deputy, Ejup Ganic. On 20 March, the Government adopted a draft law on the Federation Implementation Council, which would, if adopted by the Federation Assembly, facilitate the removal from office of officials who obstructed the implementation of the Federation. On the same day, the Government adopted the Federation budget.

On 27 March, a comprehensive agreement was signed to implement the Sarajevo Protocol, with precise steps outlined to establish the City Council, elect a mayor and deputies, and amend the Federation and Canton constitutions. Bosniacs, Croats and Serbs would have guaranteed rights in the governance of the city. If implemented, the High Representative said, the agreement would ensure the multi-ethnic character of Sarajevo and improve the climate in the Federation.

Over the course of the year [S/1997/542, S/1997/804], the High Representative reported that the political and security climate continued to improve. On 4 September, the Sarajevo Canton Assembly adopted the constitutional amendments necessary to establish the city of Sarajevo.

By the end of the year [S/1998/40], the High Representative said that considerable results had been achieved with regard to police restructuring and refugee return. The political and security situation in the Federation continued to improve, despite some security incidents with possible terrorist background. The successful establishment of a joint police force and progress in judicial reform had contributed to those advances.

Nevertheless, there were still signs of old structures being kept alive despite the fact that they should have been disbanded as the structures of the Federation and the new common institutions of Bosnia and Herzegovina were established and functioning.

Republika Srpska issues

The High Representative reported during 1997 on issues related specifically to Republika Srpska, the entity of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina where primarily Bosnian Serbs resided.

In April [S/1997/310], the High Representative stated that, on 7 February, the National Assembly adopted the Law on the Government of Republika Srpska and Law on Ministries, which rationalized the structure of the Government and decreased the total number of ministries. The main pillars of the Government's programme remained: defence of territorial integrity; organized settlement of the population to areas close to the inter-entity boundary line; economic reconstruction; and social protection of the people.

The High Representative was concerned that Republika Srpska continued the pretence of statehood; a number of its laws were filled with references and terminology to that effect. The continuation of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs was contrary to the Peace Agreement, as was reference to crucial issues of foreign economic policy in the newly adopted Law on the Senate.

An agreement between the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) and Republika Srpska was signed in Belgrade on 28 February, establishing a special parallel relationship. The formation of a virtual customs union between them, on which negotiations were taking place, would be contrary to the Peace Agreement, the High Representative warned. He was also concerned about the apparent disrespect displayed by some Republika leaders for the provisions and procedures of the Republika Srpska Constitution.

In July [S/1997/542], the High Representative described the constitutional and political crisis that erupted in Republika Srpska in June when the Government refused to follow decisions by the President to suspend the Minister of the Interior and, subsequently, to dissolve the Parliament. The crisis mirrored a growing rift between hardliners of the Serbian Democratic Party (SDS) and those who wished to implement the Peace Agreement.

In October [S/1997/804], the High Representative reported that the constitutional crisis had deepened. On 10 July, the Venice Commission, an advisory body of law experts, confirmed that the President had acted within her rights in dissolving the Assembly and that the Government could, until new elections, only continue its work in a caretaker capacity. On 15 August, the Republika Srpska Constitutional Court ruled that the President's decision had been unconstitutional.

The security situation in the Republika worsened further when, on 10 July, SFOR tried to apprehend two persons accused of war crimes. The result was one arrest and the death of the former chief of police of Prijedor. The SDS leadership then orchestrated a defamation campaign and launched attacks against representatives of international organizations.

The political crisis in Republika Srpska was still continuing at the end of the year [S/1998/40] with the dissolved National Assembly continuing to meet and pass laws that were not legally valid. Elections for the National Assembly were held on 22-23 November and did not produce a clear majority for any party or party coalition, although SDS remained the party with the greatest number of seats. Following persistent pressure from the High Representative, the first session of the National Assembly met on 27 December.

Restructuring of the Republika Srpska police moved forward, particularly in Banja Luka and Brcko. However, the overall security environment remained tense at times. ICTY arrest warrants for persons under Republika Srpska jurisdiction had not been complied with. In that regard, the continuing influence of Radovan Karadzic on the political life of Republika Srpska was unacceptable, the High Representative stated.

The economic situation remained grim, with high levels of unemployment and low wages and pensions. There was no sizeable foreign investment in Republika Srpska in 1997 and international aid was limited and linked to cooperation with the peace process.

Brcko and the Inter-Entity Boundary Line

On 14 February [S/1997/126], the High Representative transmitted to the Security Council President the decision adopted that day in Rome by the Arbitral Tribunal established in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 293] to settle the dispute over control of the Brcko area in north-eastern Bosnia and Herzegovina, and the related positioning of the Inter-Entity Boundary Line (IEBL) in that area. The parties had agreed under annex 2 of the Peace Agreement that the IEBL would constitute the boundary between the Federation and Republika Srpska.

In its Award, which was final and binding, the Tribunal stated that there was a clear need to establish a programme for proper implementation of the Dayton Accords in the Brcko area. The High Representative would, as soon as was feasible, establish an office and staff in Brcko under the leadership of a Deputy High Representative for Brcko ("the Brcko Supervisor" or "Supervisor"), whose functions would be to supervise the Agreement's implementation throughout the area for not less than one year and to strengthen local democratic institutions. The Agreement went on to describe the Supervisor's mandate and the institutions that he should establish with the participation of OSCE, UNHCR, SFOR, the World Bank, IMF, the institutions of Bosnia and Herzegovina, local ethnic groups and other official and unofficial groups.

As to the disputed boundary, absent any further action by the Tribunal, the IEBL would remain unchanged and the Tribunal would continue to monitor the situation in the area during the period of interim supervision. The Tribunal would entertain from either party requests for further action affecting the Award with respect to the allocation of political responsibilities in the area, provided that any such requests were received between 1 December 1997 and 15 January 1998. It would render any further decision by 15 March 1998.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 14 February [meeting 3740], the Security Council President made the following statement [S/PRST/1997/7] on behalf of the members:

The Security Council notes the announcement of the decision on 14 February 1997 by the arbitral tribunal on the disputed portion of the Inter-Entity Boundary Line in the Brcko area, pursuant to article V of annex 2 to the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

The Council reminds the parties to annex 2 to the General Framework Agreement of their obligation to be bound by the decision of the arbitral tribunal and to implement the decision without delay. The Council underscores the importance of prompt and full cooperation by the parties to the General Framework Agreement and the annexes thereto (collectively the "Peace Agreement") in carrying out their commitments to implement the Peace Agreement in its entirety.

In his March report [S/1997/224 & Add.1], the Secretary-General observed that the Brcko arbitration award placed obligations on Republika Srpska relating to freedom of movement, the return of refugees and the restructuring of the police, as decided at the Brcko Implementation Conference (Vienna, 6-7 March).

In resolution 1103(1997) of 31 March, the Security Council authorized an increase in UN-MIBH of 186 police and 11 civilians in connection with the IPTF role in Brcko, as recommended by the Secretary-General (see above).

Mostar violence

On 7 March [S/1997/204], the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council President an IPTF report on an outbreak of violence in Mostar in the south-west of Bosnia and Herzegovina on 10 February that resulted in the death of one person and the wounding of at least 20 others.

An IPTF investigation established that a procession of several hundred Bosniacs marched from East Mostar towards a cemetery in West Mostar. The cemetery visit, of which the West Mostar police had been notified, was part of the Bajram religious holiday observance. Three IPTF monitors accompanied the group, which was led by religious and political leaders, including the Deputy Mayor of Mostar. The procession crossed the former confrontation line between the communities of East and West Mostar and proceeded—despite several tense encounters with West Mostar police—to the cemetery. When the marchers reached the edge of the cemetery, some police officers began beating them with batons. As the marchers retreated, at least two plain-clothes officers began firing at the marchers' backs, causing the death and injuries.

As reports of the violence spread, random attacks on citizens within the city and on routes into and out of Mostar were reported. Many were by Bosniacs against Bosnian Croats, but some were against Bosniacs by Bosnian Croats. Twenty-eight Bosniac families were illegally evicted from their apartments and 19 others fled West Mostar in fear. In the days following the evictions, those wishing to return to their apartments were reinstated.

The investigation found that the actions by law enforcement officers—excessive force in beating marchers and unnecessary and disproportionate lethal force-were criminal acts and constituted violations of internationally recognized standards of law enforcement. There had been a concerted effort at the highest level of the West Mostar police to hide the facts of the confrontation, and the failure of the police of both East Mostar and West Mostar to protect potential and actual victims of the cross-ethnic attacks following the 10 February confrontation illustrated the serious absence of professional police leadership throughout the area.

Communications. On 11 February [S/1997/121], Bosnia and Herzegovina transmitted to the Security Council President a statement by the Chair of the Presidency of the country that resulted from a telephone discussion between the Chair, Alija Izetbegovic, and the President of Croatia, Franjo Tudjman, on the subject of the situation in Mostar. The two leaders had agreed that an independent IPTF commission should determine the causes of and responsibility for the incident and that those responsible should face the consequences.

On 19 February [S/1997/140], Bosnia and Herzegovina forwarded to the Council President the decisions on Mostar adopted at a 12 February meeting attended by officials of the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, representatives of the Office of the High Representative, IPTF and SFOR, including SFOR's commanding officer.

Among other things, the participants reconfirmed the request for an independent IPTF investigation and affirmed that the perpetrators would be arrested and brought to trial and that office holders, including police suspected of instigating or taking part in the violence, would be relieved of their duties and, if found responsible, dismissed from their offices. The participants also: guaranteed evicted citizens a prompt return to their homes and the prompt arrest and prosecution of those responsible for the evictions; appealed to IPTF and SFOR to keep an increased presence in Mostar until the situation had further stabilized and full freedom of movement was re-established; and deplored inflammatory statements in the media that had aggravated the situation and contributed considerably to the escalation of the crisis. They further agreed to monitor the situation in Mostar closely and to convene a follow-up meeting as soon as the IPTF report was submitted.

On 3 March [S/1997/183], Bosnia and Herzegovina forwarded to the Council President a letter from the Principal Deputy High Representative containing comments on the IPTF investigation of the Mostar incident (see above). It was vital, he said, to demonstrate to the citizens of Bosnia and Herzegovina that crimes did not go unpunished. In that connection, he asked that several actions be taken, including prosecution of several West Mostar police officers, including the Deputy Chief, who were named by IPTF in connection with the shooting and dismissal from office by 26 February of the Chief of the West Mostar police, for allegedly obstructing the IPTF investigation, and his replacement by a police professional from outside the Mostar region. The Principal Deputy High Representative would recommend to EU Governments and to Steering Board members that they bar from travel to Europe or overseas those who had been identified in the IPTF report as perpetrators of the violence. Criminal investigations and judicial proceedings relating to all police officers involved in the 10 February incident must proceed promptly with complete international monitoring, he said.

Although the violence was inexcusable, it could not be seen in a vacuum said the Principal Deputy High Representative. The weeks preceding 10 February had seen a series of incidents, including grenade attacks on both sides of the city, without the political leadership undertaking serious joint efforts to calm the growing tensions. He would not hesitate to request the intervention of Bosnia and Herzegovina and action by EU Governments regarding travel restrictions against any politician in the Herzegovina Neretva Canton who, through inflammatory statements, continued to foster antagonisms.

The principals of the major implementation agencies in Bosnia and Herzegovina had requested IPTF and the Human Rights Coordination Centre of the Office of the High Representative to submit an additional report detailing the incidents preceding and following the violence of 10 February for consideration by the Federation partners. The Federation partners, the Principal Deputy High Representative said, must commit themselves to draw all necessary conclusions, including personal consequences for all officials and police officers who had failed to perform their duties.

The Principal Deputy High Representative also outlined the steps taken in implementing the 12 February decisions on Mostar (see above). The Reinstatement Team (composed of Mostar police, IPTF and SFOR) had successfully assisted all persons illegally evicted in the wake of the events of 10 February to return to their homes. The team would continue its work. In particular, it would reinstate any persons whom the Mostar Deputy Federation Ombudsman had determined were illegally evicted, should the authorities fail to act promptly to implement the Ombudsman's findings.

While the number of illegal evictions had decreased substantially, the threat of illegal eviction continued. In addition, freedom of movement had not yet been fully established.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 11 March [meeting 3749], the Security Council President made the following statement [S/PRST/1997/12] on behalf of the members:

The Security Council has considered the letter dated 7 March 1997, and the annex thereto, from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council concerning the incident on 10 February 1997 involving a violent assault against a group of civilians attempting to visit a graveyard in West Mostar in the presence of the International Police Task Force, in which one person died and others were wounded.

The Council notes that the participants in the meeting on 12 February 1997 referred to in the letter from the Secretary-General agreed, inter alia, to request the International Police Task Force to conduct an investigation into that incident, to accept and endorse the report in full, and to draw the necessary conclusions concerning the arrest, the bringing to trial and dismissal from office of those found responsible for instigating or participating in violent acts.

The Council fully supports the conclusions drawn from the International Police Task Force report by the Office of the High Representative and fully supported by the Task Force, the Commander of the Stabilization Force in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the members of the Contact Group.

The Council strongly condemns the involvement by West Mostar police officers in the violent assault on 10 February 1997 as referred to in the International Police Task Force report annexed to the letter dated 7 March 1997 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council.

The Council also condemns the failure of the local police to provide protection to civilians subject to inter-ethnic attacks which occurred throughout Mostar both before and after the incident on 10 February 1997, and stresses the importance it attaches to preventing such incidents in the future.

The Council takes note of the announced suspension of some of the police officers identified in the International Police Task Force report but remains deeply concerned by the failure to date of the responsible authorities to take all the necessary steps to implement the conclusions drawn from that report. It strongly condemns attempts by those authorities to place conditions upon the arrest and prosecution of the police officers identified in the International Police Task Force report as having fired upon the group of civilians.

The Council demands that the responsible authorities, notably in West Mostar, immediately implement the conclusions drawn from the International Police Task Force report and, in particular, suspend all relevant police officers and arrest and prosecute them without further delay. It also calls upon the responsible authorities to investigate all police officers involved in the incident.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to keep it informed of the situation. It will remain actively seized of the matter.

Communications. On 21 March [A/51/841-S/1997/245], the Netherlands forwarded to the Secretary-General the common position of the EU on restrictive measures against persons having perpetrated violent acts during the incidents in Mostar on 10 February. The EU Council agreed with the recommendations of the Office of the High Representative that those identified as perpetrators of violence during the Mostar incidents should be banned from travelling to Europe and overseas. The three persons who had allegedly perpetrated violent acts during the Mostar incident (Ivan Hrkac, Bozo Peric, Zeljko Planinic) would be reported for purposes of non-admission in the territories of the member States. That list would be updated following the outcome of further investigations and judicial proceedings.

On 26 March [S/1997/256], the Secretary-General transmitted to the Security Council a letter from the Principal Deputy High Representative in Bosnia and Herzegovina in which he reported that five police officers had been tried in West Mostar on minor charges in a seriously flawed trial that took no account of the shooting that killed one person and wounded at least 20 others. Among the five were the three officers—Hrkac, Planinic and Peric—who had been clearly identified in the IPTF report as having shot at the backs of retreating visitors at the cemetery. Planinic was sentenced to one year and Hrkac and Peric to six months in prison, but the sentences were suspended and the three left the court free men. Justice had not been achieved, the Principal Deputy High Representative said.

In a letter to the President and Vice-President of the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Principal Deputy High Representative had requested that the Government ensure without delay correct legal proceedings based on a new indictment, founded in the facts, and that a proper criminal investigation of the suspects be undertaken. He also requested that the Lower Court in East Mostar not open parallel proceedings against the suspects or proceed with trials in absentia, in violation of international fair trial standards. He had further raised the expectation that IPTF would have complete access to any site, person, activity, proceeding or other item or event throughout the criminal investigation and legal proceedings, in accordance with annex 11 of the Peace Agreement.

On 5 May [S/1997/351], in response to the Security Council's request to be kept informed, contained in the 11 March presidential statement (see above), the Secretary-General submitted the summary of a report on human rights and the security situation in Mostar, prepared by IPTF and the Human Rights Coordinating Centre. He stated that there had been no further action by the responsible authorities to implement the Council's demands. However, the general situation in Mostar had improved. Evictions from West Mostar had stopped and 100 police officers (50 Bosniacs and 50 Croats) were jointly patrolling the central districts of the town. IPTF had also made progress in negotiating the establishment of the joint Federation police force in the Neretva (Mostar) Canton.

Elections

Municipal elections. In April [S/1997/310], the High Representative stated that the 1997 municipal elections, scheduled for 13 and 14 September, would be of critical importance to the future development of Bosnia and Herzegovina; a sound election process was considered the essential ingredient in the peace implementation process. The overall approach in preparations for the elections should include ensuring higher quality than had prevailed for the general elections in September 1996; complete international supervision of all polling stations and of every stage of the election process; and that OSCE should have the structures for the likely re-runs, as well as for the installation of elected officials. The Provisional Election Commission (PEC) had adopted specific rules enabling refugees to vote in an intended place of residence as well as giving displaced persons the right to vote where they currently resided, provided they proved continuous residence before 31 July 1996.

Among other things, it was determined that, for registration to succeed, local election commissions had to be trained and fully functioning before the registration process was launched on 5 May; that registration centres had to be conveniently located and internationally supervised; that the 2,300 polling stations envisaged be deemed sufficient in number; and that a massive and effective voter education campaign be undertaken.

An Advisory Commission, working under the auspices of the Council of Europe, was established in February to examine issues related to municipal structures, including some new ones. Management of the post-election situation was also considered of importance.

In July [S/1997/542], the High Representative reported that special attention was being paid to Brcko and Mostar in preparations for the elections. The affirmative voter registration in Bosnia and Herzegovina, which would clearly define the electorate, began on 5 May. Certain irregularities had been disclosed in a number of areas. Where claims had been substantiated, candidates had been struck from party lists and voters had been re-registered. Since a solution to the territorial reorganization within the Federation had not been found, 18 municipalities remained divided by the IEBL without governing authorities, disenfranchising some 60,000 voters. An Election Implementation Plan, agreed to by the High Representative and OSCE, was endorsed by the PIC Steering Board in Sintra on 30 May.

The High Representative reported in October [S/1997/804] that the 13-14 September elections had been held in a calm, orderly and dignified manner. Threats of election boycott were encountered throughout the preparation period. Although representatives of both the Federation and Republika Srpska withdrew from the work of PEC prior to the election, negotiations resulted in their return before elections took place. Approximately 80 to 85 per cent of the electorate participated.

The Election Results Implementation Committee monitored all aspects of the parties' implementation of municipal elections. The High Representative stated that the establishment of the Permanent Elections Commission would take place once an Election Law had been adopted by the Bosnia and Herzegovina Parliamentary Assembly.

Republika Srpska elections. Elections for the Republika Srpska National Assembly were held in a calm and secure environment on 22 and 23 November, with a voter turnout of 79 per cent, the High Representative reported [S/1998/40]. However, they did not produce a clear majority for any party or party coalition, he said, adding that it was his interpretation that that was a sign of increasing political pluralism and democratization of the political landscape in the Republika Srpska and in Bosnia and Herzegovina as a whole. He felt that the results demonstrated that the people of Republika Srpska desired change in their political leadership.

Refugees and displaced persons

It was estimated that, since the beginning of 1997, some 150,000 refugees and displaced people had returned to their homes in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Secretary-General said in his December report on UNMIBH activities [S/1997/966]. Of those, 100,000 were from countries of asylum. During the year, repatriation assistance (shelter and transport) was provided throughout Bosnia and Herzegovina and targeted assistance went to extremely vulnerable individuals (the elderly, the handicapped and orphans) and residents of collective centres. The development of the Open City initiative, whereby UNHCR and its partners gave support and material assistance to communities that offered to declare themselves "open cities" by welcoming previous residents from all ethnic backgrounds who wished to return, was pursued with vigour, with UNHCR recognizing six open cities during 1997: Konjic, Busovaca, Vogosca, Bihac, Gorazde and Kakanj.

The plight of refugees and displaced persons was also addressed at the Peace Implementation Conference (Bonn, December) [A/52/728-S/1997/979]. PIC welcomed the return of more than 400,000 refugees and displaced persons since the signing of the Peace Agreement, but noted that over 600,000 Bosnian refugees remained abroad and over 800,000 remained displaced internally. It acknowledged that large-scale repatriation in 1998 would be contingent on successful minority return movements, particularly to Sarajevo and Republika Srpska. The overall conditions for return had not significantly improved, despite some amelioration in freedom of movement and respect for human rights. Because of continued obstruction, large numbers of returning refugees and displaced persons were being relocated against their will in places other than their original homes.

PIC demanded that the authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina act resolutely to remove all barriers to return. It urged the entity Governments to instruct cantonal and municipal authorities to elaborate phased return plans, starting with the identification of areas where returns or preparations for returns to empty housing space could happen immediately. Such plans should be made in cooperation with UNHCR, with the Return and Reconstruction Task Force (RRTF) and international organizations, and associations of displaced persons and refugees, and be completed by the end of February 1998. Regarding Sarajevo, PIC endorsed the efforts of the High Representative and UNHCR to develop a Sarajevo return strategy and called on the authorities to agree on that strategy prior to the conference on return to Sarajevo, which was expected to be held in early 1998. In particular, PIC called for a review of implementation and a timetable for full implementation of the February 1996 Rome Statement on Sarajevo and the October 1996 Sarajevo Protocol, particularly regarding minority rights and multi-ethnic participation in governance.

Human rights

The High Representative, in a report covering the period October-December 1997 [S/1998/40], said that systemic human rights violations continued to occur in both entities, despite gradual improvement in freedom of movement, fewer arbitrary arrests and a more responsible attitude on the part of the authorities. Few steps had been taken by Federation or Republika Srpska authorities to ensure that the rights and freedoms set forth in the European Convention on Human Rights were effectively protected. Harassment, violence and destruction of property on the basis of ethnicity remained substantial problems, and discrimination on ethnic or political grounds was endemic, particularly in Republika Srpska. The role of police in addressing those violations itself continued to present significant concerns, particularly as police response was influenced by political and ethnic criteria, and reports of abuse in police custody were frequent. In those respects, the situation during the reporting period remained fundamentally unchanged. Property and housing laws that blocked the return of hundreds of thousands were still in force, making full implementation of annex 7 of the Peace Agreement impossible. Both entities needed to take urgent steps to amend those laws, the High Representative said. As reiterated at the Bonn Conference, the Federation would be held to its commitment, made at the Federation Forum on 12 November 1997, to adopt the three draft laws submitted by his office. The Republika Srpska had been urgently asked to amend its property and housing legislation within 60 days of the new Government taking office. If the entities failed to take those actions, the High Representative would recommend additional measures as sanctions. Establishing the conditions for safe return, including functioning human rights protection mechanisms, was also an essential component of the implementation of annex 7, as were efforts to address current discrimination and difficulties associated with both civil registration and acquiring access to personal documents throughout Bosnia and Herzegovina.

The Constitutions of the entities themselves embodied insupportable distinctions between ethnic groups in their designation of "constituent peoples", the High Representative said. Those provisions should be amended to accord equal status to Bosniacs, Croats and Serbs, along with members of other groups, in order to foster multi-ethnicity and ensure that the fundamental principle of equal rights for all people was fully respected. In addition, the current education policy and programmes of both entities did not promote understanding and reconciliation. It was essential that the responsible authorities move expeditiously to develop an education programme consistent with those principles and with the right of parents to choose the nature of the education their children received.

The Human Rights Task Force had emphasized the urgent need for criminal justice reform in both entities. In particular, there was a need for criminal law and procedure codes to be harmonized with the European Convention on Human Rights. As noted at the Bonn Conference, the Federation should implement the recommendations of the expert team regarding the criminal procedure code by 31 January.

The Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights had continued to support the mandate of the Special Rapporteur by keeping her informed of relevant developments and intervening with local authorities on her behalf, the Secretary-General said in his 10 December report [S/1997/966]. It also continued efforts to reform the judicial system of Bosnia and Herzegovina, including conducting and coordinating trial monitoring activities; providing human rights expertise to the expert team for criminal justice reform; supporting a project on a judicial training institute; and conducting a project to provide suspects with lawyers familiar with international human rights law. In addition, the Office was monitoring the procedure for the appointment of judges, in particular in the Federation, to assess its consistency with relevant human rights standards.

Economic rehabilitation and reconstruction

The international community continued to fuel economic recovery in 1997, the High Representative stated [S/1998/40]. An estimated $1.5 billion in aid had been implemented so far in the country, approximately 95 per cent of which was in the Federation, including Sarajevo, and the proportion of financial help for Republika Srpska was increasing. In the fourth quarter of 1997, eight grant agreements were signed with the authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina. The World Bank approved credits totalling $27 million for two projects with a total cost of $123 million. That included the reconstruction assistance project ($82 million), which was dedicated to Republika Srpska. Some 150 new contracts were signed during the last quarter of the year. In the same period, the European Commission had contracted grants for a total of $125 million. Together with the Commission on Public Corporations, the High Representative's Office held negotiations to establish a Railway Corporation in Bosnia and Herzegovina. A framework agreement was to be signed in January by which the parties would resume traffic immediately; final negotiations on the organization of the sector were to be completed by March. Preliminary discussions had also started on postal services.

Although the Arbitral Award (see above) stated the significance of economic revitalization of the Brcko area, only slow progress had been made by international donors and development agencies in that regard. Following a donors' conference on 4 and 5 November, several donors demonstrated interest in funding specific projects.

The World Bank's mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina continued to implement the economic reconstruction programme approved at the Brussels conference in December 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 547], the Secretary-General said in December 1997 [S/1997/966]. The Bank was also helping Bosnia and Herzegovina to introduce reforms in the economic system to put economic growth on a sustained basis and to speed the transition to a market economy. A total of $408 million in World Bank funds had been mobilized for 18 specific projects and a fund of $150 million was being managed to co-finance those projects, bringing the value of projects prepared by the World Bank and being implemented to nearly $1.5 billion. At the end of September, contracts signed using World Bank-administered funds totalled 2,184, for a value of $320 million. The Bank had mobilized substantial resources to rebuild houses in UNHCR target zones and to implement job-creation programmes and other schemes for infrastructure development. The World Bank and the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) had closely coordinated their programmes, resulting in excellent leverage of UNDP efforts and a particularly valuable contribution by UNDP to the Bank-led reconstruction efforts.

UNDP continued to expand its activities within its country cooperation framework, focusing primarily on multisectoral area-based development programmes supported by selected national sectoral projects and assistance to policy development.

Military aspects of Agreement

Stabilization Force

During 1997, the Secretary-General of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) reported monthly to the Security Council, in accordance with resolution 1088(1996) [YUN 1996, p. 310], on the activities of the multinational Stabilization Force (SFOR), also known as Operation Joint Guard [S/1997/81, S/1997/193, S/1997/257, S/1997/369, S/1997/602, S/1997/636, S/1997/718, S/1997/794, S/1997/893, S/1997/975]. The Force operated under the leadership of NATO, as had its predecessor, IFOR. At the end of 1997, approximately 36,000 troops were deployed in Bosnia and Herzegovina and in Croatia, with contributions from all 16 NATO member countries and 20 non-NATO nations.

At the end of January [S/1997/81], NATO reported that there had been a successful transition from IFOR (Operation Joint Endeavour) to SFOR, which intended to build on IFOR achievements and to contribute to the secure environment necessary for the consolidation and stabilization of peace in the region.

Throughout the year, SFOR conducted surveillance and reconnaissance by means of ground and air patrols; carried out inspections of military sites; confiscated and destroyed unauthorized weapons; provided security for the return of refugees; monitored demining activities; and reported on general compliance with the military provisions of the Peace Agreement. It also supported the international civil organizations in Bosnia and Herzegovina. It worked with IPTF to maintain local security and facilitate freedom of movement; assisted the Office of the High Representative, UNHCR and IPTF in implementing procedures for the orderly return of refugees and displaced persons in the zone of separation; provided technical experts and assistance in telecommunications and engineering; and assisted IPTF in defining entity jurisdictional boundaries. SFOR and OSCE had also established a cooperative relationship, particularly with regard to preparing for the elections.

Croatia

During 1997, the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium (UNTAES) continued to assist Croatia and the local Serb community in the process of peacefully reintegrating the subregion into Croatia. The mandate of UNTAES, which was established by the Security Council in 1996 [res. 1037(1996)], included demilitarization, reintegration of institutions and the creation of conditions to permit the holding of elections.

Following Croatia's 13 January announcement guaranteeing the local Serb population representation and voice at various levels of local, regional and national government and affirming its intention to protect their legal and civil rights, elections in the UNTAES region and nationwide were held on 13 April. In addition to being an important milestone for the legitimate representation of the local population in the Croatian constitutional and legal system, the elections also opened the way for the return of displaced persons in Croatia. On 24 April, Croatia adopted Agreed Procedures on Return, which provided guiding principles and specific mechanisms to govern a programme of return of Croatian citizens to their homes throughout Croatia. On 26 June, the Permanent Council of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) authorized the build-up of its mission personnel to 250 to assist with and monitor implementation of Croatian legislation and commitments on the two-way return of refugees and displaced persons and the protection of their rights.

In the light of those developments, the Security Council, on 14 July, extended the UNTAES mandate until 15 January 1998 and endorsed the Secretary-General's plan for the gradual devolution of executive authority for civil administration by the Transitional Administrator to Croatian authorities and for the restructuring of UNTAES.

Further advances in the reintegration process were made in October, when Croatia adopted a comprehensive programme of national reconciliation and appointed a multi-ethnic National Board for the Realization of the Programme on the Establishment of Confidence, Acceleration of Returns and Normalization of Life. By December, two thirds of the local reconciliation committees had been established.

In December, the Secretary-General reported that Croatia had shown more political will to complete reintegration successfully and had increased efforts to meet its obligations, although some commitments remained to be fulfilled. The Council called on the Government to implement fully and promptly all of its obligations and commitments, including those reached with UNTAES. It decided to establish immediately after the termination of UNTAES on 15 January 1998 a support group of 180 UN civilian police for nine months to continue to monitor the performance of the Croatian police in the Danube region, particularly in connection with the return of displaced persons.

The Council also considered the situation with regard to the monitoring of the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula. The Secretary-General pointed out that compliance with the practical options proposed by the United Nations Mission of Observers in Prevlaka (UNMOP) to reduce tension and improve safety and security in the area confirmed the lessening of tensions in the region. However, while both parties continued to reiterate their firm commitment to a negotiated resolution of the disputed issues of Prevlaka, substantive talks had not started and there was no prospect in sight that the long-term violations in the UN-controlled zone would end. Recent developments at other parts of the border between Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY), on the other hand, gave him grounds for hope that the two countries could solve the disputed issue of Prevlaka through mutual negotiations. Under the circumstances, he recommended a further six-month extension of the UNMOP mandate, to 15 July 1998.

UN Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium (UNTAES)

The United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium (UNTAES) continued to assist in the implementation of the 1995 Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium (the Basic Agreement) [YUN 1995, p. 587] between Croatia and the local Serb authorities. Major-General W. Hanset (Belgium) was appointed Force Commander through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the Security Council [S/1997/66, S/1997/67] to succeed Major-General J. Schoups (Belgium), who completed his tour of duty on 15 January. By a similar exchange of letters [S/1997/578, S/1997/579], William Walker (United States) was appointed Transitional Administrator for UNTAES, with effect from 1 August, to replace Jacques Paul Klein (United States). In July, the Council extended the UNTAES mandate until 15 January 1998. It also endorsed the Secretary-General's plan for restructuring UNTAES and for drawing down its military component from the authorized strength of 5,000 to 720 by mid-October 1997. The number of military observers remained at 100, while the civilian police strength was reduced from 600 to 250. On 19 December, the Council, noting that the UNTAES mandate would terminate on 15 January 1998, decided to establish as of 16 January a support group of 180 civilian police monitors for a single period of up to nine months.

Political developments

In January [S/1997/62], the Secretary-General informed the Security Council that during the last quarter of 1996 UNTAES had shifted its focus mainly to political issues and particularly to resolving outstanding policy issues required for the holding of elections. In December 1996, at the last 1996 meeting of the Joint Implementation Committee (JIC) on Elections, the Croatian position was that all residents of Eastern Slavonia eligible for Croatian citizenship, and who were living in the region at the beginning of the UNTAES mandate on 15 January 1996, should be entitled to vote. Elections should be for existing Croatian institutions within existing electoral boundaries and should take place simultaneously with nationwide Croatian local and regional elections scheduled for 16 March 1997. For its part, the local Serb delegation to JIC believed that the region should be a single territorial unit with the same status as a county under Croatian law. Elections in the region should be held after elections in the rest of Croatia and all residents of the region, irrespective of origin or date of entry into the region, should be qualified to vote if they were citizens of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. To help solve the political deadlock, the Transitional Administrator met with local Serb leaders and Croatian government officials to explore areas of flexibility and compromise. While the Government of Croatia was willing to offer additional guarantees to local Serbs, the local Serb Regional Assembly made no concession on its position of a single region. On 26 December 1996, the Transitional Administrator proposed to President Tudjman of Croatia and the President of the local Executive Council elements of a political package as a framework for elections and for long-term guarantees for the local Serb community. The Croatian authorities indicated their readiness to discuss those proposals but no response was received from local Serb leaders. On 30 December, the Transitional Administrator commenced intensive consultations with President Tudjman and the Government of Croatia on the political package for elections, resulting in a 13 January 1997 letter from Croatia (see below) containing guarantees on the completion of the peaceful reintegration of the UNTAES region.

Communications (January). By a 13 January letter [S/1997/27], Croatia informed the Security Council President that, under the terms of the Basic Agreement, elections in the UNTAES region and local elections nationwide would be held on 16 March. Local bodies of authority in parts of Osijek-Baranja and Vukovar-Sirmium counties, which were under the Transitional Administrator, would be established no later than 30 days thereafter, following certification of the elections by the Transitional Administrator. Serbs, and all other Croatian citizens, were eligible to participate if they had resided in Osijek-Baranja and Vukovar-Sirmium counties at the time of the 1991 census. Possession of Croatian citizenship/identity documents was a prerequisite for participation in the elections. Croatian citizens of Serb ethnicity, who had settled in the area prior to the UNTAES mandate and were currently living in the area under the Transitional Administration, but were not domiciled in that particular area at the time of the 1991 census, might choose to vote for either local bodies of authority, provided they were living in the areas covered by those bodies or such local bodies of authority in the area of their 1991 residence. Voter registration would be organized by UNTAES and the Croatian authorities; the latter would also issue the necessary citizenship/identity documents. Local Serbs were guaranteed a post of Sub-Prefect in both counties as well as proportional representation, including at senior levels, in local health services, the police and judiciary. For the first year, Serb and non-Croat police would number approximately 700 to 800. Serbs would be able to appoint a Joint Council of Municipalities to meet once every four months with the Croatian President or with the chief of the Presidential cabinet. The representation of Serbs and other minorities in the House of Representatives of the Croatian Parliament would also be subject to proportional representation, based on the results of the next census. The President would appoint two Serb representatives as deputies in the House of Counties. They were also guaranteed senior-level posts in the Ministry of Reconstruction and Development and the Office for Displaced Persons and Refugees; Assistant Minister in the Ministries of the Interior, Justice and Education and Culture; and participation at the expert level in the working bodies of the Croatian Parliament. All minorities were guaranteed full rights with respect to educational and cultural autonomy, including the entitlement to prepare and implement a curriculum fostering cultural identity, history and heritage. They would also have full rights to preserve and foster individual cultural identity. Serbs throughout Croatia could establish a Council of the Serb Ethnic Community that might make proposals to the President on issues of common interest for the national minority. The Minister of Defence would enact a deferment for all members of the Serb community from the UNTAES area of compulsory military service for two years from the end of the UNTAES mandate, with the possibility of a further deferment thereafter. War victims, particularly the disabled, widows and orphans, were guaranteed full health and social rights. Croatia reaffirmed that nothing in the letter should derogate from the obligations of the Croatian Constitution, the Basic Agreement and Security Council resolution 1037(1996) [YUN1996, p. 319], among other documents.

In response, FRY forwarded to the Council President a 16 January letter [S/1997/64] from the local Serb Executive Council and Regional Assembly to the Transitional Administrator seeking additional guarantees. They included: complete and permanent demilitarization of the UNTAES region; exemption from military service for Serbs for at least 15 years; the right of all displaced persons and refugees in Croatia to remain in their present accommodation until their original homes were rebuilt, or to be compensated for destroyed or damaged property, or to be provided adequate accommodation in the area where they lived; and the creation of a single, self-administered county for the region.

Communication from Secretary-General. The Secretary-General, on 21 January [S/1997/62], drew the Security Council's attention to the terms for elections as set out in Croatia's 13 January letter and to the Transitional Administrator's view that the rights and guarantees described therein, if fully and genuinely implemented, constituted a solid basis for holding elections simultaneously with nationwide elections in Croatia and offered substantial progress towards completing the process of peaceful reintegration of the region. He said that Croatia had also indicated to the Transitional Administrator its agreement to international monitoring of the implementation of the commitments outlined in the letter.

The Secretary-General observed that UNTAES had no mandate to pursue directly the question of the post-UNTAES military status of the region. However, as a confidence-building measure, the Transitional Administrator was encouraging Croatia to maintain the demilitarized status of the region and to reach agreement with FRY and Hungary on a demilitarized common border area. With regard to the prolonged exemption from military duty for local Serbs, the Secretary-General informed the Council that Croatian officials had indicated to UNTAES that applications for a second period of deferment of military service would be given positive consideration. He also noted the right to equal treatment with respect to housing, access to reconstruction grants and loans, and to property compensation, as guaranteed by existing Croatian law. He believed that Croatia should be encouraged to make a statement reaffirming its obligations under the Constitution, Croatian law and the Basic Agreement to treat all of its citizens equally regardless of their ethnicity. In the Secretary-General's view, the proposed political package, taken in conjunction with the Basic Agreement and Security Council resolution 1037(1996) and the guarantees contained in the December 1996 Affidavit of Employment, by which Croatia affirmed the protection of the rights of employees of public enterprises and institutions in the UNTAES area, constituted a framework of guarantees for those Serbs wishing to stay in Croatia. He recommended that the Council consider favourably Croatia's 13 January letter and reiterated that strict compliance by all sides with the obligations outlined therein and the full support of the international community were essential to the reintegration process.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (January)

On 31 January [meeting 3737], the Security Council considered the Secretary-General's letter and other communications, including a 25 January letter [S/1997/78] from FRY. FRY stated that Croatia's 13 January letter, while containing a number of useful initiatives and positive elements, failed to address certain issues, and some of its positions departed from the text and goals of the Basic Agreement. In that regard, it considered the requests set out by the Serbs in their 16 January letter to the Council to be well founded and deserving of careful consideration.

The Council authorized the President to make the following statement [S/PRST/1997/4] on its behalf:

The Security Council has considered the letter from the Secretary-General dated 21 January 1997 concerning developments with respect to the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, and welcomes his evaluation.

The Council welcomes the letter dated 13 January 1997 from the Government of Croatia on the completion of the peaceful reintegration of the region under the Transitional Administration, which guarantees the local Serb community representation and a voice at various levels of local, regional and national government, provides for a limited deferment of military service and affirms the intention of the Government of Croatia to provide the local Serb population with the protection of their legal and civil rights under Croatian law. The Council calls upon the Government of Croatia to implement fully the commitments contained in that letter and the oral guarantees made by Croatian officials to the Transitional Administration, as specified in the letter from the Secretary-General dated 21 January 1997.

The Council also takes note of the letter dated 16 January 1997 from the local Serb Executive Council and Regional Assembly on this matter.

The Council recalls the statement by its President of 15 August 1996 and again underlines the importance of the holding of elections, the organization of which is the responsibility of the Transitional Administration, in accordance with the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium signed on 12 November 1995. The Council shares the view of the Transitional Administrator that the rights and guarantees outlined in the letter from the Government of Croatia, if fully implemented, constitute a solid basis for the holding of elections simultaneously with nationwide elections in Croatia, and offer substantial progress towards the completion of the process of peaceful reintegration of the region. In this context, the Council emphasizes that the holding and certification of elections, upon a decision by the Transitional Administration, within the envisaged time-frame will only be possible if the Croatian authorities fulfil their obligations with respect to the completion of the issuance of citizenship and identity documents for all eligible voters and relevant technical documents, and provide all information as required by the Transitional Administration for certification of the elections. The Council underlines the need for full cooperation by the local Serbs.

The Council reiterates the importance of confidence-building measures which could benefit residents of the region beyond the expiration of the mandate of the Transitional Administration. In this regard, it encourages the Croatian authorities to maintain the present demilitarized status of the region.

The Council reaffirms the importance of effectively implementing the right of all residents in the region to equal treatment with respect to housing, access to reconstruction grants and loans, and to property compensation, as guaranteed by Croatian law. It reiterates the right of all refugees and displaced persons to return to their places of origin. It also reiterates the right of residents of a State to choose freely where they wish to live. The upholding of these principles is of vital importance for the stability of the region. In this connection, it strongly encourages the Government of Croatia to reaffirm its obligation, under the provisions of the Croatian Constitution, Croatian law and the Basic Agreement, to treat all its citizens equally regardless of their ethnicity.

The Council stresses that the restoration of the multi-ethnic character of Eastern Slavonia is important to international efforts to maintain peace and stability in the region of the former Yugoslavia as a whole. The Council encourages the Croatian Government to take such steps as are needed to promote goodwill, build confidence and provide assurances of a safe, secure and stable environment to all people in the region. These steps should include full implementation of its Amnesty Law, full cooperation with the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia, improved cooperation with respect to local Serbs who wish to return to other areas of Croatia, full compliance with the Basic Agreement and full cooperation with the Transitional Administration and other international organizations. The Council welcomes the commitments by the Government of Croatia with regard to the establishment of a Joint Council of Municipalities, a Council of the Serb Ethnic Community and with respect to educational and cultural autonomy of the Serb population and other minorities in the region. The Council notes the reassurances of the Croatian authorities that applications for a second period of deferment of military service for local Serbs will be considered in a positive manner.

The Council condemns the incident that occurred at Vukovar on 31 January 1997, which resulted in the death of a Transitional Administration peacekeeper and injuries to other Transitional Administration personnel.

The Council calls upon both sides to cooperate in good faith on the basis of the Basic Agreement. It also calls upon them to continue to cooperate with the Transitional Administrator and with the Transitional Administration in order to ensure the success of the process of reintegration. It calls upon the international community to support fully this endeavour.

The Council expresses its appreciation to the Transitional Administrator and his staff, and reaffirms its full support for them.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter.

Report of Secretary-General (February). In a 24 February report [S/1997/148], the Secretary-General stated that, following consultations with Croatia, the Transitional Administrator had decided that elections in the region and nationwide would be held simultaneously on 13 April. That gave UNTAES an additional four weeks to complete its technical preparations. Agreement was also reached with Croatia on 31 January on expedited procedures for voter registration and the issuance of Croatian documents. However, implementation of the procedures had been uneven and dates promised for the introduction of new procedures had slipped. Despite Croatia's efforts to resolve delays in issuing documents, UNTAES had noted cases of applications pending for over two months. In addition, Serbs had expressed concern that the unique markings on documents issued raised doubts as to their validity and usefulness in the long term, particularly after the departure of UNTAES. Meanwhile, according to the Croatian Foreign Ministry, as at 3 February, the Government had issued 57,143 documents to the residents of the Danube region, out of 68,310 requests. The Secretary-General noted, however, that Croatian statistics on documents issued remained imprecise and did not differentiate between those actually issued and those denied. UNTAES was therefore unable to verify what percentage of the eligible voting population had received the necessary documents. It was clear, however, that most males of draft age had not been able to obtain Croatian passports. Voter registration of displaced persons commenced on 4 February but only a small proportion of them had so far done so. Furthermore, the Serb community had not yet nominated representatives to the local election commissions, and civic and voter education had been affected by delays in agreements on election processes. Difficulties relating to election logistics remained to be resolved, including agreement on a methodology for voting in absentia. The UNTAES Electoral Unit, which was actively engaged in establishing the conditions for free and fair elections, had instituted regular meetings with the Croatian Electoral Commission to coordinate and review progress in election operations and logistics.

Reviewing the general situation, the Secretary-General reported that, between 8 and 17 February, the Transitional Administrator had consulted with the parties concerned and the President of FRY, who expressed his full support for the holding of early elections to allow UNTAES more time for monitoring the situation in the region in the post-election period. He also expressed readiness to undertake bilateral negotiations with Croatia on issues of particular concern to the region. Croatia had responded positively to those proposals and agreed to enter into bilateral meetings at the Foreign Minister level.

The Secretary-General also drew attention to UNTAES reports on the growing rift between moderate Serb leaders wishing to stay in Croatia and others who were intimidating the majority of residents and obstructing the exercise of their rights. Moderate Serb leaders had expressed their willingness to participate in the elections if progress could be made on redrawing local municipal electoral boundaries that had been redrawn in 1991-1992, leaving Serbs in minority positions in several municipalities. They had also sought clarification of the functions and powers of institutions and positions outlined in Croatia's 13 January letter. The Secretary-General noted that in January, under instructions from the Regional Assembly, Serb negotiators had participated minimally in all joint negotiating bodies. However, on 5 February, following intensive meetings with the Transitional Administrator and consultations in Belgrade, the Regional Assembly endorsed the resumption of political negotiations, urged Serbs to stay in the region, acknowledged the necessity of holding elections once all preconditions were met, and sought guarantees concerning implementation of the Amnesty Law and long-term international monitoring. Despite those decisions, certain Serb leaders continued to mobilize sections of the population and to spread false rumours, creating an atmosphere of political agitation and uncertainty. In early February, daily peaceful demonstrations commenced in Vukovar and other towns, during which the demonstrators accused UNTAES of taking sides with the Croatian Government against Serbs.

The military situation remained generally calm but tension in the southern part of the region increased in late January. On 31 January, a member of the UNTAES military component was killed in Vukovar. Since its inception on 2 October 1996, the weapons buy-back programme, financed by the Government of Croatia and organized by the UNTAES military component, had collected over 15,000 weapons and 435,000 rounds of ammunition. However, it was believed that considerable quantities of small arms and ammunition remained in private hands.

Progress in the Joint Implementation Committees had been slow due to delays by the local Serb authorities. The Transitional Administrator had emphasized to the Serbs the need to adhere to the 28 February deadline for reintegrating public enterprises into the Croatian economy. On 14 February, Croatia issued an additional affidavit of employment guaranteeing the continued employment of Serb employees in those enterprises, including health institutions. Other significant areas of progress included the beginning on 15 December 1996 of an UNTAES-sponsored visits programme to enable individuals with Croatian documents to enter or leave the region for up to seven days. Approximately, 2,500 people used the programme each week. At the same time, despite intensive efforts by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) and UNTAES, little progress had been made regarding the return of refugees and displaced persons. The Croatian Office for Displaced Persons and Refugees had not extended its services equally to Serbs by establishing offices throughout the region. Other obstacles included security concerns for Serb returnees in other parts of Croatia, the slow pace of demining in villages targeted for Serb returns, a shortage of adequate housing and the occupation by Bosnian Croats of houses owned by Serbs. Despite repeated suggestions by the Transitional Administrator, the Croatian side had so far not been willing to form a single association of both Croat and Serb displaced persons to address their common interests. However, it had indicated an interest in the formation of a joint Croat and Serb displaced-person coordination group after the elections. On 13 February, the Transitional Administrator sought from Croatia its commitment to the effective implementation of the right of all residents in the region to equal treatment with respect to housing and access to reconstruction grants and loans and to property compensation. The Administrator presented to the Government an outline of a "Start-up and recovery package for displaced persons", drafted jointly with UNHCR, to enable Serbs to return home or to build a new life in Croatia.

The Secretary-General agreed with the Transitional Administrator's view that 13 April was a realistic and achievable date for the holding of free and fair elections. He called on the residents of the region to consider carefully their options, to follow wise leadership and to take up their future as citizens of Croatia. He expressed concern about the increase in the number of people leaving the region, which, in his view, could constitute a threat to international efforts to promote peace both in the region and in the wider area. The success of peaceful reintegration and the proof of Croatian good intent would be determined by the confidence-building measures taken by Croatia, he said. Croatia had not yet publicly confirmed the oral guarantees relating to international monitoring of the implementation of the commitments outlined in its 13 January letter and to a favourable consideration of applications for the second period of deferment of military service, the Secretary-General noted. It had also not yet responded to the Council's encouragement to reaffirm its obligations under the provisions of the Croatian Constitution, Croatian law and the Basic Agreement to treat all its citizens equally regardless of their ethnicity. The Secretary-General also expressed concern over the lack of progress with respect to the future of displaced persons and the establishment of equal treatment with respect to housing, access to reconstruction grants and loans and to property compensation. He welcomed the commitment of FRY and Croatia to make progress in their bilateral relations in regard to permanent demilitarization of the border region, delimitation of their common border, abolition of the visa regime and the opening of transport and commercial links. He observed that progress in those areas would contribute substantially to confidence-building and wider regional security.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (March)

On 7 March [meeting 3746], the Security Council considered the Secretary-General's report. It also had before it a 4 March letter [S/1997/188] from FRY to the Council President, in which it drew attention to the inconsistent application and flouting by Croatia of its commitments under the Basic Agreement, relevant Council resolutions and Presidential statements, its own oral guarantees to the Transitional Administrator and the commitments given in its 13 January letter. According to FRY, that gave little cause for local Serbs to believe that Croatia was willing to integrate the region and led them to leave in even greater numbers. FRY proposed a number of elements for inclusion in a Council resolution, the adoption of which would exert more effective influence on Croatia to implement consistently and fully the commitments it had undertaken.

The Council authorized its President to make the following statement [S/PRST/1997/10] on its behalf:

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 24 February 1997 on the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium and recent developments in that region. It recalls the statement by its President of 31 January 1997 and reiterates its call on the parties to cooperate fully with the Transitional Administration and the Transitional Administrator.

The Council shares the observation contained in the report of the Secretary-General that, with the full cooperation of the parties, 13 April 1997 is a realistic and achievable date for the holding of free and fair elections in the region.

The Council underlines that it is in the best interests of the members of the Serb community to collect their citizenship documents, to participate fully in those elections, and to take part in Croatian political life as equal citizens on the basis of the implementation of the rights and guarantees contained in the letter dated 13 January 1997 from the Government of Croatia. The Council deplores disruptive activities by some elements of the Serb community in the region creating an atmosphere of political agitation and uncertainty. It calls upon all residents of the region to follow wise leadership, to stay in the region, and to take up their future as citizens of the Republic of Croatia.

The Council stresses that the holding of the elections will also depend on the readiness of the Government of Croatia to meet all preconditions, including the issuance of documents, provision of data and timely completion of the technical arrangements required for certification. The Council acknowledges the encouraging progress the Government of Croatia is making in this respect. It is, however, concerned that implementation of these procedures has been uneven. The Council urges the Government of Croatia to redouble its efforts to ensure the completion of the necessary technical preparations for the holding of elections.

The Council strongly urges the Croatian Government to issue, as a gesture towards reassuring the Serb community, formal public confirmation of the oral guarantees made to the Transitional Administration as specified by the Secretary-General in his letter dated 21 January 1997 and to reaffirm its obligations as referred to in paragraphs 28 and 29 of the report of the Secretary-General. It also calls upon the Government of Croatia to apply its Amnesty Law fairly and consistently to all persons subject to its jurisdiction. The Council stresses that, to a large measure, the long-term success of peaceful reintegration will be determined by the commitment of the Government of Croatia to reconciliation and to ensuring that those Serbs who are currently resident in the region will enjoy equal rights as Croatian citizens.

The Council shares the serious concern, as stated in the report of the Secretary-General, that no progress has been made concerning the future of displaced persons in the region and the establishment of equal treatment with respect to housing, access to reconstruction grants and loans and property compensation, in accordance with the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium and Croatian law. The Council reaffirms the right of all refugees and displaced persons to return to their homes of origin throughout the Republic of Croatia and to live there in conditions of security. It welcomes the proposal elaborated by the Transitional Administration and the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees concerning the return of displaced persons, and urges the Government of Croatia to pursue discussions on that proposal without delay, to cooperate closely with the Transitional Administration and the Office of the High Commissioner in implementation, and to make a clear and unambiguous public statement and undertake concrete actions confirming the equal rights of all displaced persons regardless of their ethnicity.

The Council welcomes the commitment by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Republic of Croatia to make progress in their bilateral relations, in particular with respect to the permanent demilitarization of the border region and the abolition of the visa regime, which would constitute a major contribution to local confidence-building and the stabilization of the region.

The Council recalls its resolution 1079(1996) of 15 November 1996 and expresses its intention to consider recommendations, to be submitted by the Secretary-General as soon as possible after the successful holding of elections, concerning the further United Nations presence consistent with the fulfilment of the Basic Agreement.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to keep it regularly informed of the situation. It will remain actively seized of the matter.

Communications (April). On 9 April [S/1997/294], Croatia provided the Security Council President with data on the documents programme in the Croatian Danube region and on the status of Serbs and other minorities in Croatia. According to Croatia, 348,000 documents had been issued to residents of the region, out of 355,446 applications, including 120,000 domovnicas (citizenship certificates) needed for voter registration. However, the majority of Serbs were not using their documents to register to vote. The programme had been extremely successful due to the tremendous resources the Government had committed to the task. Croatia stated that, contrary to expectations, there had been no organized Serb exodus. It had encouraged Serbs on numerous occasions and at various levels to stay, including overtures from President Tudjman. The Government had also facilitated the return of 58 per cent of Serbs who had fled Croatia and had since made requests to return. Moreover, the situation in already reintegrated territories had stabilized. A working group, involving the Government, UNTAES and UNHCR, had been formed to strengthen the return process in both directions.

Croatia stressed the multi-ethnic composition of the country.

FRY, in an 11 April letter [S/1997/302] to the Council President, disputed both the data provided by Croatia, as compared to that provided by UNTAES, and the Croatian assessment of the situation in the country. It called on Croatia to enable all Serbian "expellees" and refugees living in the region to return to the homes they had fled and to grant them fair compensation for destroyed property. It should also revoke its laws denying Serbs the right to enjoy their property and stop altering the demography of the regions settled predominantly by Serbs by settling them with Croatian refugees. FRY said that it had proposed to Croatia a series of agreements to strengthen the legal basis for inter-State, good-neighbourly and stable relations, as well as an agreement on dual citizenship, to help promote a feeling of security among Serbs in Croatia.

Elections

Local elections for 25 municipal councils and three city councils in the UNTAES region were conducted as scheduled on 13 April and extended, because of technical difficulties, to 14 and 15 April. Those elections were held simultaneously with regional elections for two county assemblies and national elections for the Upper House of the Croatian Parliament. Nearly 500 international observers were deployed throughout Croatia to observe the elections. Within the UNTAES region, over 150 UNTAES observers were deployed at all polling stations. In addition, 30 observer teams from OSCE and observers from the Council of Europe and representatives of the diplomatic community visited numerous polling stations. Preliminary results prepared by the Local Electoral Commissions were announced by UNTAES on 19 April and certified by the Transitional Administrator on 22 April. Official results were announced on 30 April and confirmed by the Electoral Appeals Commission.

There were 193 polling stations in the region, including 30 locations for absentee voting for authorities outside the region. Displaced persons elsewhere in Croatia voted in absentia at 645 polling stations in 75 polling locations. The final number of voters inside the region was more than 71,000, and over 56,000 persons voted for the local authorities in absentia elsewhere in Croatia.

Communication from Secretary-General (April). The Secretary-General, reporting on the results of the elections in a 29 April letter [S/1997/343] to the Security Council President, said that the Transitional Administrator had indicated that no intimidation, violence or electoral improprieties were observed or reported at any time during the election period. In addition, the Electoral Appeals Commission had reported that most complaints received were either corrected by the Transitional Administrator or dismissed after due consideration. The Media Experts Commission reported that several infractions of the code of conduct were corrected by local intervention. Both Commissions concluded the elections were free and fair.

The Transitional Administrator expressed the view that the elections had opened the way for the two-way return of all displaced persons in Croatia and praised the adoption by the Croatian Government, on 24 April, of the Agreed Procedures on Return [S/1997/341], developed by the Joint Working Group on the Operational Procedures of Return, which was composed of representatives of the Croatian Government, UNTAES and UNHCR. The procedures provided for guiding principles and specific mechanisms for a programme of return of Croatian citizens to their homes throughout Croatia. They covered family reunion, vacant inhabitable homes, homes damaged or destroyed by war, and homes that were being used temporarily.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (May)

The Security Council met on 8 May [meeting 3775] to consider the Secretary-General's report of 29 April. It also had before it a letter [A/52/133-S/1997/348] from the Netherlands addressed to the Secretary-General, informing him of a 30 April statement by the European Union welcoming the holding of elections in the region and pointing out that strict respect for human rights and for the rights of minorities throughout the country remained a prerequisite for the ultimate success of the reintegration process.

Following consultations among the members, the Council authorized its President to make the following statement [S/PRST/1997/26] on its behalf:

The Security Council welcomes the letter from the Secretary-General dated 29 April 1997, which conveys the conclusions of the Transitional Administrator regarding the successful holding of the elections in the region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium in the Republic of Croatia beginning on 13 April 1997, under the direction of the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium.

The Council shares the assessment of the Transitional Administrator that the holding of the elections has been an essential step for further progress in the peaceful reintegration of the region and marks an important milestone for the legitimate representation of the local population in the Croatian constitutional and legal system. It urges early formation of the newly elected bodies of local government and prompt and full implementation of the undertakings contained in the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium and the letter dated 13 January 1997 from the Government of Croatia, including the establishment of the Joint Council of Municipalities and the appointment of local Serbs to the guaranteed positions in the parliamentary and administrative structures of Croatia.

The Council underlines the finding of the Transitional Administrator that no intimidation, violence or electoral improprieties were observed or reported before, during or after the elections. The Council welcomes the goodwill and sense of cooperation demonstrated by the parties to the process.

The Council emphasizes the importance of the two-way return of all displaced persons in Croatia, as well as the right of residents of a State to choose freely where they wish to live. In this context, it welcomes the Agreement of the Joint Working Group on the Operational Procedures of Return. It urges the Government of Croatia strictly to implement this agreement. The Council calls upon both sides to cooperate in good faith on the basis of the Basic Agreement and stresses the need to respect human rights, including rights of persons belonging to minorities, throughout the country, in order to ensure the success of the process of reintegration.

The Council expresses its appreciation to the Transitional Administration and to those elements of the international community, including observers from the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, the Council of Europe and members of the diplomatic community, whose efforts made possible the successful holding of elections. The Council commends the Transitional Administration for resolving technical difficulties by taking decisive actions, which contributed significantly to the successful holding of the elections.

The Council looks forward to the recommendations of the Secretary-General, in the light of the progress of the parties towards fulfilling the Basic Agreement, for the further United Nations presence in Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, possibly a restructured Transitional Administration, consistent with the fulfilment of the Basic Agreement, for the six-month period beginning 16 July 1997, in accordance with Council resolution 1079(1996).

Post-election situation

Communications (June). FRY, in a 2 June letter [S/1997/425] to the Security Council President, requested the extension of the UNTAES mandate until the expiration of the transitional period. According to FRY, it would be the best guarantee for preserving peace and security and fully protecting the local Serb population. It would also represent an unambiguous signal and support of the international community to all parties to continue to fully implement the Basic Agreement and honour all obligations assumed unilaterally or otherwise.

On 13 June, Croatia submitted to the Council President a report [S/1997/454] on the results so far achieved in the peaceful reintegration and restoration of constitutional and legal order in the UNTAES region and a letter from its Foreign Minister requesting that, in the light of the success of the completion of the UNTAES mandate, the follow-on UN mission in the region should be restructured. The military component should commence a progressive process of disengagement on 16 July. The civilian component should gradually diminish its executive powers and transfer them to the elected authorities, provide support and assistance to the new local bodies, and monitor and assist in the return of displaced persons and human rights. The follow-on mission should also facilitate the phasing-in of the OSCE monitoring mission in Croatia, which should be expanded and strengthened to take over monitoring in the region completely on 15 January 1998, when the UN mandate in the region would end. Croatia would be agreeable to a future limited and reconstructed UN presence in the region to complete the transfer of executive authority from the Transitional Administration to the legally elected authorities immediately after 15 July.

Report of Secretary-General (June). In a 23 June report [S/1997/487], the Secretary-General described the post-election situation in the UNTAES region and outlined his plans for the continued presence of the United Nations. He stated that with UNTAES encouragement, the ruling Croatian Democratic Union (HDZ) and the Independent Democratic Serb Party (SDSS), both of which had won 12 seats in the Vukovar city council elections, had negotiated a power-sharing arrangement throughout the region and an agreement on the use of symbols and flags, thereby enabling all regional, municipal and town councils to be duly constituted by 6 June. However, at the inaugural meeting of the Vukovar Town Assembly on 28 May, attempts were made by local HDZ officials to sabotage the pre-agreed power-sharing arrangements and to disenfranchise the SDSS members of the Assembly. Serb confidence in Croatian intentions was badly shaken and, as at 16 June, full constitution of the Vukovar Assembly remained incomplete. On 16 May, the Joint Council of Municipalities (JCM) was constituted in Vukovar but was not granted legal status by Croatian officials until 6 June. However, difficulties remained regarding the modalities of registration. JCM, at the initiative of UNTAES, presented to President Tudjman on 27 May a list of proposed Serb candidates for appointment to senior positions in the Croatian administrative structures, which was accepted on 2 June. Although oral guarantees to appoint two Serbs from the region to the Croatian House of Counties were not fulfilled, a compromise was reached whereby an additional Serb from Baranja was to be appointed Assistant Minister for Culture in the Ministry of Education and Culture. On 2 June, at the invitation of local Serb leaders, President Tudjman visited Beli Manastir, where his comments on the need for national reconciliation and his promise to review the list of alleged war criminals not included under the Amnesty Law were well received. However, during his visit to Vukovar on 8 June, his message of reconciliation was overshadowed by HDZ propaganda and the singing of Croat nationalistic songs. Among the local population, fears were rekindled about the future of Serbs in Vukovar once Croat displaced persons returned in substantial numbers. The Secretary-General reported that Croat officials were still not implementing all the decisions of the central Government and had on several occasions been uncooperative, using bureaucratic means to delay or stop promised support to the region. A State Commission was formed, headed by the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Reconstruction, Jure Radic, to coordinate Croatian State activities in the region and ensure that local politicians implemented national policy. While the Commission had made progress on non-controversial technical aspects of reintegration, President Tudjman's personal intervention was still required for more difficult issues.

The return to their homes of displaced Serbs occupying Croat housing was a priority task for UNTAES. Croatia opened six branches of the Office for Displaced Persons and Refugees in the region. By 13 June, some 5,000 families, representing some 11,000 individuals or approximately 25 per cent of the displaced persons estimated to be residing in the region, had registered with the Office. However, by 21 June only 105 families had been processed and 26 individuals had returned from the region. That slow pace of processing, coupled with a number of hostile incidents, particularly those on 13 May in villages around Hrvatska Kostajnica in which the local Croat population reacted violently to the appearance of a handful of Serb returnees, had seriously eroded Serb confidence in the possibility of return. Croatia blamed those incidents on "spontaneous" returns, which took place outside the operational procedures. In the absence of a government programme of national reconciliation and effective police security throughout Croatia, UNHCR and UNTAES agreed that all potential returnees should be encouraged to use the operational procedures to be assured of their full rights, social benefits and security. The Joint Working Group on Returns played an essential confidence-building role for displaced persons by encouraging and monitoring two-way returns and assisting Croatia to develop further mechanisms for local residents who had previously occupied socially owned housing and for the equitable disposal or purchase of property through the Land Bank concept.

The reintegration of regional public institutions and enterprises had progressed rapidly. Since March, road maintenance, telephone and posts, railways, water supply and flood control had been successfully reintegrated. Some 800 Serbs had accepted Croatian work contracts, including senior managerial positions, and Croatia had agreed to modalities for reintegrating the region's pension fund and its beneficiaries. On 1 June, Croatian law was introduced for new cases in the region as existing laws were being phased out. Judges were to be appointed on the basis of proportional representation but the integration of the local judiciary was still beset with difficulties. On 6 June, the Croatian Minister for Health signed an agreement to reintegrate the health system and to assume financial responsibility for the Vukovar hospital and the Beli Manastir health centre. In the area of education, agreement was reached on 29 May on the issuance of Croatian employment contracts to 1,200 local employees and of education certificates for students.

On 19 May, UNTAES initiated the transformation of the monetary and financial system by introducing the kuna as legal tender, integrating the local payments system into that of Croatia and regulating all economic activity in accordance with Croatian commercial laws.

The security situation continued to cause concern in view of reports of harassment, intimidation, killings and physical assault of Serbs. Looting continued unabated, particularly in areas where ethnic Croats had resettled. The situation in the former Sector North was particularly volatile because of the relatively modest returns of displaced persons from the UNTAES-administered region. The application of the Amnesty Law continued to cause widespread concern among the Serb population. In that regard, the Croatian Ministry of Justice announced that an investigation into 146 suspected war criminals would be carried out in conjunction with Serb representatives from Eastern Slavonia. However, the Prosecutor for the International Tribunal for the Prosecution for Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia (see PART FOUR, Chapter II) reported that Croatia's cooperation with the Tribunal was far from satisfactory. There were often delays and obstruction in investigations that Croatia perceived to be against its interest. Further, an agreement on the status of the Prosecutor's Liaison Office in Zagreb had not yet been concluded and there had been no progress in arresting most accused criminals.

The Secretary-General observed that UNTAES had made significant achievements in demilitarization, reintegration of institutions and creation of conditions that had permitted successful elections to be held. The people of the region appeared to have accepted Croatian citizenship and statehood and the institutional and political parameters for reintegration into the Croatian legal and constitutional system had been defined. However, while the institutional reintegration of the territory into the region was being finalized, the reintegration of the people had hardly begun. Although President Tudjman had reaffirmed to the Transitional Administrator Croatia's intention to fulfil its various obligations and guarantees, he had given no specific programmes or timetables for reassuring the local population and for successfully completing integration. Of particular concern was Croatia's intention to allow unrestricted access to the region without adequate measures to prevent harassment and intimidation of local residents by extremist Croat elements.

Regarding the future of UNTAES, the Secretary-General expressed concern that a precipitate transfer of authority to Croatia and the withdrawal of UNTAES in the near term could lead to a mass exodus of Serbs, create a humanitarian crisis for neighbouring countries, set back the process of bilateral normalization of relations, imperil regional security and create an unwelcome precedent for collective international peace efforts in Bosnia and Herzegovina. He therefore considered the two-phase exit strategy proposed by the Transitional Administrator to be an effective and cost-efficient programme for the successful completion of peaceful reintegration and the withdrawal of UNTAES. In the first phase of that strategy, the Transitional Administrator would devolve to Croatia executive responsibility for the major part of the region's civil administration while maintaining his authority and ability to intervene and overrule decisions should the situation deteriorate and the achievements of UNTAES be threatened. In the second phase, and subject to satisfactory Croatian performance, remaining executive functions would be devolved, with Croatia assuming responsibility for the continued demilitarization of the region and the gradual integration of the Transitional Police Force (TPF) into the Croatian police force. In the first phase, UNTAES troop strength would be reduced from 5,000 to 2,530 by 15 August, and to 720 by mid-October. The number of military observers would remain unchanged at 100 but the civilian police force could be reduced from its authorized strength of 600 to 450, until the achievement of full integration of TPF, and subsequently to 250. A revised civil affairs structure with a strengthened focus on returns and human rights would be based around the new municipalities to monitor implementation of the Basic Agreement and other Croatian guarantees and commitments. By October, the strength of the civilian component would be reduced from 485 to 315 international staff and from 746 to 399 local staff, in addition to 70 United Nations Volunteers. In the following months, UNTAES would monitor Croatian performance in meeting mutually reinforcing and interdependent "benchmarks", which would give confidence to the region and thus permit a smooth downsizing of the mission.

The Secretary-General observed that the essential prerequisite for peaceful reintegration was the full cooperation of Croatia, which was responsible for convincing the local population that the reintegration of the people of the region was sustainable and that the process of reconciliation and return was irreversible. He welcomed the readiness of OSCE to increase its presence throughout Croatia to support local authorities and urged Croatia to extend its fullest cooperation to OSCE.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (July)

On 14 July [meeting 3800], the Security Council considered the Secretary-General's report of 23 June, including his plan for the gradual devolution of executive responsibility for civil administration in the region and for restructuring UNTAES. It also had before it a 27 June letter [S/1997/496], in which Croatia assured the Council that the successes of the UNTAES mandate could be maintained by the newly elected and constituted local authorities and monitored by OSCE, whose new mandate (see below) had strengthened the United Nations ability to exit the region by 15 January 1998.

Also before the Council was an 8 July letter [S/1997/522] from Denmark, transmitting a 26 June decision of the OSCE Permanent Council. The Council authorized its mission to assist with and monitor implementation of Croatian legislation and commitments on the two-way return of all refugees and displaced persons, on the protection of their rights and on the protection of persons belonging to national minorities. The mission would make specific recommendations to Croatia and refer urgent issues to the Permanent Council. The Council also authorized the build-up of mission personnel, starting in July, to 250, with a view to full deployment by 15 January 1998.

On the basis of a draft resolution [S/1997/538] sponsored by Belgium, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Portugal, the Republic of Korea, the Russian Federation, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States, the Council unanimously adopted resolution 1120(1997).

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions concerning the territories of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium of the Republic of Croatia, in particular resolutions 1023(1995) of 22 November 1995, 1025(1995) of 30 November 1995, 1037(1996) of 15 January 1996, 1043(1996) of 31 January 1996, 1069(1996) of 30 July 1996 and 1079(1996) of 15 November 1996,

Reaffirming once again its commitment to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Croatia, and emphasizing in this regard that the territories of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium are integral parts of the Republic of Croatia,

Expressing its appreciation for the substantial achievements of the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium in facilitating progress towards the peaceful return of the region to the control of the Republic of Croatia, and expressing further its deep appreciation to the dedicated military and civilian personnel of the Transitional Administration for their outstanding contributions to its mission, and to the Transitional Administrator, Mr. Jacques Paul Klein, for his leadership and dedication,

Recalling the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium between the Government of the Republic of Croatia and the local Serb community, signed on 12 November 1995, which promotes the mutual confidence, safety and security of all inhabitants of the region,

Emphasizing the importance of the obligation of the Government of the Republic of Croatia to allow all refugees and displaced persons to return in safety to their homes throughout the Republic of Croatia, and further emphasizing the importance of the two-way return of all displaced persons in the Republic of Croatia,

Welcoming the Agreement of the Joint Working Group on the Operational Procedures of Return, but noting with concern that the lack of conditions necessary for the return of displaced persons to the former United Nations Protected Areas from the region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium prevents the return in any substantial number of those displaced persons seeking to return to Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium from other parts of Croatia,

Expressing its grave concern over the lack of improvement in respect for human rights, including the rights of persons belonging to minorities, in Croatia and in particular in the former United Nations Protected Areas, and strongly deploring recent incidents of ethnically motivated violence in Hrvatska Kostajnica and similar incidents,

Reiterating its concern about the failure of the Government of the Republic of Croatia to cooperate fully with the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia, and in this context recalling the obligation of the States in the region to surrender to the Tribunal all those indicted,

Reiterating also its concern about continued uncertainty regarding implementation of the Amnesty Law, which has been detrimental to the building of confidence and trust among Croatia's ethnic communities,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 23 June 1997, and noting in particular his recommendations for the continued presence of the Transitional Administration after 15 July 1997, with an appropriate restructuring of the mission,

Recalling that the Basic Agreement provides that the transitional period of twelve months may be extended at most to another period of the same duration if so requested by one of the parties, and noting that the local Serb community has requested such an extension, as indicated by the Secretary-General in his report of 28 August 1996,

Determining that the situation in Croatia continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security,

Determined to ensure the security and freedom of movement of the personnel of the United Nations peacekeeping operations in the Republic of Croatia, and to these ends, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Expresses its full support for the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, and calls upon the Government of the Republic of Croatia and the local Serb community to cooperate fully with the Transitional Administration and other international bodies and to fulfil all obligations and commitments specified in the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium and all relevant Security Council resolutions, as well as in the letter from Government of the Republic of Croatia dated 13 January 1997;

2. Reaffirms in particular the importance of full compliance by the parties, in particular by the Government of the Republic of Croatia, with their commitments, as specified in the Basic Agreement, to respect the highest standards of human rights and fundamental freedoms and to promote an atmosphere of confidence among local residents, regardless of their ethnic origin, and urges the Government of the Republic of Croatia to ensure respect for the rights of all persons of all national ethnic groups;

3. Reaffirms also the right of all refugees and displaced persons originating from the Republic of Croatia to return to their homes of origin throughout the Republic of Croatia;

4. Strongly urges the Government of the Republic of Croatia to eliminate promptly the administrative and legal obstacles to the return of refugees and displaced persons, in particular those posed by the Law on the Temporary Takeover and Administration of Specified Property; to create the necessary conditions of security, safety, and social and economic opportunity for those returning to their homes in Croatia, including the prompt payment of pensions; and to foster the successful implementation of the Agreement of the Joint Working Group on the Operational Procedures of Return, treating all returnees equally, regardless of ethnic origin;

5. Reminds the local Serb population in Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium of the importance of continuing to demonstrate a constructive attitude towards the reintegration of the region and a willingness to cooperate fully with the Government of the Republic of Croatia in building a stable and positive future for the region;

6. Reiterates its previous calls on all the States in the region, including the Government of the Republic of Croatia, to cooperate fully with the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia;

7. Urges the Government of the Republic of Croatia to eliminate ambiguities in implementation of the Amnesty Law and to implement it fairly and objectively in accordance with international standards, in particular by concluding all investigations of crimes covered by the amnesty and undertaking an immediate and comprehensive review with United Nations and local Serb participation of all charges outstanding against individuals for serious violations of international humanitarian law which are not covered by the amnesty, in order to end proceedings against all individuals against whom there is insufficient evidence;

8. Decides to extend the mandate of the Transitional Administration until 15 January 1998, as envisaged in its resolution 1079(1996) as well as in the Basic Agreement;

9. Endorses the plan for the gradual devolution of executive responsibility for civil administration in the region by the Transitional Administrator, as set out in the report of the Secretary-General of 23 June 1997;

10. Also endorses the plan for restructuring the Transitional Administration, as set out in the report of the Secretary-General of 23 June 1997, and, in particular, the proposal for achieving the drawdown of the military component of the Transitional Administration by 15 October 1997;

11. Stresses that the pace of the gradual devolution of executive responsibility would be commensurate with the demonstrated ability of Croatia to reassure the Serb population and successfully complete peaceful reintegration;

12. Reiterates its decision in its resolution 1037(1996) that Member States, acting nationally or through regional organizations or arrangements, may, at the request of the Transitional Administration and on the basis of procedures communicated to the United Nations, take all necessary measures, including close air support, in defence of the Transitional Administration and, as appropriate, to assist in the withdrawal of the Transitional Administration;

13. Requests that the Transitional Administration and the multinational Stabilization Force authorized by the Council in resolution 1088(1996) of 12 December 1996 continue to cooperate, as appropriate, with each other as well as with the High Representative;

14. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep the Council regularly informed of the situation and to report in any case no later than 6 October 1997 on all aspects relevant to the peaceful reintegration of the region;

15. Stresses the importance of demilitarization of the area, and in that context stresses further the importance of achieving bilateral agreements on demilitarization and a liberal border regime in the region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, accompanied by appropriate confidence-building measures as suggested in the report of the Secretary-General of 23 June 1997;

16. Calls upon the Government of the Republic of Croatia, inter alia, to initiate a country-wide public programme of national reconciliation, to take all necessary steps for the official establishment and legal registration of the Joint Council of Municipalities, and to fulfil all its obligations as specified in the various agreements signed with the Transitional Administration;

17. Welcomes the renewed mandate of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe of 26 June 1997 providing for a continued and reinforced presence of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe in the Republic of Croatia, with a particular focus on two-way return of all refugees and displaced persons, protection of their rights, and the protection of persons belonging to national minorities, welcomes also the decision of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe for the build-up of its mission personnel starting in July 1997 with a view to full deployment by 15 January 1998, and urges the Government of the Republic of Croatia to cooperate fully with the mission of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe to that end;

18. Underlines the observation of the Secretary-General that the essential prerequisite for the successful completion of peaceful reintegration of the region is the full cooperation of the Government of the Republic of Croatia, which bears the responsibility for convincing the local population that the reintegration of the people of the region is sustainable and that the process of reconciliation and return is irreversible;

19. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (September)

On 18 September [meeting 3818], the Security Council met to consider the lack of progress by Croatia in fulfilling the conditions for the transfer of executive authority. The Council authorized its President to make the following statement [S/PRST/1997/45] on its behalf:

The Security Council expresses its deep concern at the lack of substantial progress by the Government of the Republic of Croatia in fulfilling the conditions and tasks that are key to the transfer of executive authority to the Republic of Croatia in the territories of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, as noted in its resolution 1120(1997) and the report of the Secretary-General of 23 June 1997.

In this regard, the Council calls upon the Croatian Government to meet its obligations and commitments and to take immediate action in the following areas: to remove all administrative and legal obsta-des to the two-way return of all displaced persons as well as to the return of refugees; to ensure security and social and economic opportunity, including property rights, for all returnees; to take effective measures to prevent harassment of returnees; to implement measures to establish effective local government administrations; to ensure the regular payment of benefits to all pension and welfare recipients and open Croatian pension offices in the region; to ensure further economic reintegration; to initiate a country-wide public programme of national reconciliation and curb media attacks on ethnic groups; and to implement fully and fairly the Amnesty Law and cooperate fully with the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia. In this context, the Council notes the recent information provided by the Croatian Government on steps intended to address some of these issues and urges the Croatian Government to implement these steps without delay.

The Council emphasizes that the prompt completion of the tasks outlined above, as well as the fulfilment by the Croatian Government of its obligations under the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, the agreements between the Croatian Government and the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, as well as the letter from the Croatian Government dated 13 January 1997, will determine the pace of further devolution of executive authority for the civil administration to the Croatian Government as well as further Council action. The Council urges all parties to cooperate fully with the Transitional Administration and looks forward to the report of the Secretary-General due no later than 6 October 1997, as requested in its resolution 1120(1997).

Communication (September). On 24 September [S/1997/745], Croatia submitted to the Security Council President a 22 September report on the implementation of its letter of intent of 13 January on the peaceful reintegration of the Croatian Danube region and the establishment of the constitutional and legal order of the Republic of Croatia in the counties of Osijek-Baranja and Vukovar-Sirmium, which were under UNTAES administration. The report concluded that the international community, with the cooperation of the Government of Croatia, had made substantial gains in reintegrating Eastern Slavonia into Croatia and that the devolution of authority from the United Nations in favour of Croatia could continue as envisioned. The Government would continue to fulfil its obligations and would not accept a further UN mandate in Eastern Slavonia after the expiration of the UNTAES mandate on 15 January 1998.

Croatia pointed out that it had spent an estimated $1.7 billion for the reconstruction and revitalization of Eastern Slavonia and other reintegrated territories, of which only 2 per cent came from international assistance. The international community had hardly responded to calls for assistance and it was extremely difficult for Croatia to carry that burden alone in view of its overall war damage, estimated at $13 billion in direct costs; the costs incurred for Bosnian refugees, which had reached $1.1 billion by the end of 1996; and funds already spent on reconstruction and planned for future expenditure. The report stated that the documents programme was completed on 31 August and resulted in 154,443 persons receiving citizenship certificates (domovnica) in the region. That figure exceeded the pre-war population of Serbs in the region (70,000) and the pre-UNTAES estimates of the region's population (120,000), which indicated that as many as 50,000 persons formerly affiliated with the rebels displaced in the region had received documents, as had 34,443 persons currently living in other countries. The results of the programme were a true reflection of the Government's intentions and goodwill towards the former rebels who had accepted the rights and duties arising from citizenship. Progress had also been achieved over the past few months in two-way returns. In support of that statement, the report cited information provided by UNHCR that, by the end of August, over 8,000 Croatian Serb displaced had returned to the former Sectors North, South and West. Croatia contended that the information referred to those returns effected since the Government/UNTAES/UNHCR agreement on returns of 23 April and claimed that it was the only side in the region that had shown a positive flow into the territory it controlled by persons who had taken up arms against it. Croatia again stated that it was a multi-ethnic country and all ethnic groups were represented in its Government, commerce and public life. There had been difficulties with the reintegration of persons formerly affiliated with the rebels but it nevertheless continued with substantial success. The report provided detailed information on reintegration of the legal and economic system and on the return of displaced persons.

Report of Secretary-General (October). In accordance with Security Council resolution 1120(1997), the Secretary-General submitted a 2 October report [S/1997/767] on all aspects relevant to the peaceful reintegration into Croatia of the region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium. He informed the Council that over the previous 20 months, the Government of Croatia had achieved many of the goals established in the Basic Agreement and in its letter of 13 January; most technical reintegration issues had been successfully addressed. However, as at 25 September, substantial goals still remained to be accomplished before the end of the UNTAES mandate. He was particularly concerned that Croatia had sought to repudiate commitments made in key documents and to ignore the results of the April elections by using the 1991 census as the basis for determining Croat/Serb proportional representation in local institutions. In addition, that standard was not applied elsewhere in Croatia where Serbs constituted a clear majority in 1991. Croatia's insistence and pressure for the termination of the UNTAES mandate had increased but the progress achieved did not give confidence that the peaceful reintegration of the people of the region was as yet self-sustainable and irreversible.

On the positive side, the Secretary-General pointed out that Croatian control of regional public services and utilities had generally made substantial progress. Regular electricity was supplied to most areas, postal and telecommunication services were operational, rail services on two lines had been reintroduced, roads were being repaired, over 15,000 vehicles had been registered, some 17,000 drivers licences had been issued, and taxation and employment bureaux had been reintegrated. Some 4,200 work contracts had been offered in reintegrated public enterprises and institutions, of which 96 per cent had been accepted by local residents. All public employees were receiving at least part of their salaries.

However, progress had not extended to the areas of education, health and judiciary. Several employment issues remained to be resolved; the complete reintegration of schools had not yet been achieved; and the reintegration of the health sector had been slow and difficult. The 16 June agreement to provide medical supplies and assume immediate financial responsibility for medical facilities was not fulfilled until 28 August. In addition, only on 23 September did Croatia implement its commitments on proportional Serb representation in the judiciary, coordinate with UNTAES the judicial competition examinations and appoint Serbs to judicial posts in the Osijek-Baranja District Court, the State Prosecutor's Office and the Commercial Court. There continued to be a demonstrable lack of commitment by Croatian officials to work towards establishing effective local government administration. Municipalities throughout the region lacked adequate financial resources and Croatia had still not legally recognized the boundaries of new municipalities. Croat institutions "in exile" had not been formally annulled and few Croat officials resided or had a regular presence in the region. Only the tax and customs authorities operated on a full-time basis.

After a three-month delay, on 29 August, the Joint Council of Municipalities was finally registered, had begun to participate in resolving local issues and was holding meetings with senior officials in Zagreb. The Serb National Council had started to function. Four Serb assistant ministers and two senior advisers had been appointed, although the cooperation and facilities provided to them were not always adequate. The regional system for social welfare, unemployment and pensions had been technically reintegrated into Croatian structures in July. Most of the region's residents had received Croatian documents. As at 25 September, some 146,000 citizenship documents, 130,000 Croatian identity cards and 126,000 passports had been issued. However, over 1,300 residents had been denied naturalization for having failed to meet the provisions of Croatian citizenship law.

No action had been taken to initiate a country-wide public programme of national reconciliation, as called for by the Security Council, although President Tudjman had assured the Transitional Administrator on 12 August that a national steering council would be established and that swift action would be taken to develop and implement a well-resourced programme. Instead, the State-owned media had attacked the concept as naive and Croatian television continued to broadcast inflammatory footage of events during the war. Even UNTAES proposals for establishing a day of reconciliation had not met with positive results. In general, the ethical and moral basis for reconciliation had been ignored by Croatian institutions and responsible officials. Within the context of reintegration and reconciliation, UNTAES facilitated the efforts of a tripartite (Croats, Serbs and UNTAES) missing persons commission by providing organizational and investigative oversight and security and acting as a buffer between the parties. Since July, over 100 remains had been exhumed under appropriate safeguards and conditions of dignity.

Some progress had been made in respect of the return of displaced persons and refugees. According to Croatian statistics, since April over 5,200 Serbs had returned to their homes in Croatia. In the same period, only 320 Croat displaced persons had returned to the region with official confirmation of the Office for Displaced Persons and Refugees. An additional 1,500 Croats had returned spontaneously, mainly to reconstructed villages in the south of the region. In the Secretary-General's view, two-way returns had been held up by the slow action of the Office for Displaced Persons and Refugees, the uncertain security and economic situation in areas of potential return and legal impediments to getting back property. Approximately 23,000 displaced persons living in the region had registered with the Office for Displaced Persons and Refugees; more than half of them wished to return to homes in other parts of Croatia but, as at 15 September, only 3,250 individuals had received official confirmation that arrangements for their return had been completed. UNTAES, UNHCR and the Croatian Government had participated in public forum meetings throughout Croatia to address the concerns of communities to which Serbs were returning. During those meetings it was clear that the continued presence of UNHCR throughout the country was essential to the confidence and welfare of displaced persons and returnees. Croatia had not yet rescinded its Law on the Temporary Takeover and Administration of Specified Property, as urged in Security Council resolution 1120(1997), or restored tenants' rights to Serb displaced persons living in socially owned apartments. Property claims commissions established in the former Sectors remained ineffective in resolving claims filed by displaced Croatian Serbs wishing to return. In addition, the possibilities for displaced persons to receive just compensation or to stay in the region, as provided in the Basic Agreement, had not been sufficiently addressed by Croatia.

In terms of the Amnesty Law, while Croatia had publicly stated that it no longer possessed a "war crimes list" of persons whose alleged criminal acts fell outside the Amnesty Law, UN staff had spoken with Croatian officials who had confirmed that various prosecutors' offices had lists of Croatian Serbs who were either being investigated or had been charged with war crimes or acts of genocide.

Considerable progress had been made in the organizational establishment of the Transitional Police Force (TPF), which consisted of 910 Serbs, 841 Croats and 52 members of other ethnic minorities. However, it did not enjoy significant confidence amongst either Serbs or returning Croats. Its inter-ethnic cohesion was yet to be fully established and some Serb officers complained that they had been discriminated against because of their ethnicity. Officers were also reluctant to take action against members of their own ethnic community. The Secretary-General considered that, in the absence of local confidence and evidence of the ability of TPF to control inter-ethnic tensions, it was essential that it continued operating under the authority of the Transitional Administrator and day-to-day control of the UN civilian police.

Concerning bilateral issues, Croatia and FRY signed a "soft border regime" agreement on 15 September. Until the agreement's entrance into force on 1 November, UNTAES would maintain a "free border" policy, with limited controls to deny transborder criminal activity. A modified customs regime had been established and agreement had been reached between the two countries on the long-term demilitarization of the border zone.

The UNTAES Human Rights Monitoring Unit became functional in early August, based on arrangements agreed with UNHCR. Numerous cases of human rights violations had been identified and, while there was no pattern of gross violations in the region, their cumulative effect and discriminatory practices were such that Serbs in the region had little confidence in the will of the Croatian authorities to protect them after the departure of UNTAES. Confirmed human rights abuses included unfair trial procedures in war crimes cases; attacks on Serb displaced persons from the region in other parts of Croatia, either by Croat police officers or with their apparent collusion; abuses by Croat TPF officers, usually involving harassment of Serb displaced persons; and discrimination against Serbs in education, employment, pensions and health care. The Secretary-General pointed out that reports of intimidation and harassment of Serb displaced persons by Croats from outside the region had increased during the past two months. On 1 June, under the authority of the Transitional Administrator, Croatian law became effective in the UNTAES region even though the reintegration of the judicial system was still pending.

With regard to the restructuring of UNTAES, the Secretary-General reported that its military component had been reduced to 2,530 personnel and the security situation in the region had enabled the preparation of plans for a further draw-down. UNTAES military activities were focusing on facilitating the reintegration and reconciliation process, while supporting the safe return of displaced persons and refugees. United Nations military observers continued to facilitate the two-way return of displaced persons, identify vacant houses and monitor human rights issues, while the 400 civilian police continued to monitor all TPF operations, control checkpoints and border crossings, conduct patrols throughout the region, carry out special investigations and monitor courts and prisons.

The Secretary-General observed that deficiencies in Croatian cooperation and performance over the past two months had delayed the decision by the Transitional Administrator that conditions had been achieved for the transfer of authority to Croatia. The first phase of the UNTAES exit strategy had not been completed and authority could not be handed over as scheduled as it would jeopardize the achievements made. However, the Secretary-General considered that Croatia could meet its obligations and commitments if it applied itself with sufficient diligence in the time remaining. The Transitional Administrator was of the view that the military situation in the region would allow the second phase repatriation of the military contingent to start by 15 October and be completed by 15 November. However, because conditions had not yet enabled the full integration of TPF into the Croatian police force, a civilian police strength of 400 would be required until 15 January 1998. It was also essential that the number of UN military observers should remain unchanged at 100. UNTAES would continue close cooperation with OSCE to assist in establishing its long-term mission.

The Secretary-General concluded that the recent renewed commitment of Croatia had to be put into practice immediately to establish sufficient confidence that the termination of the UNTAES mandate could be achieved without jeopardizing the results of two years of intensive international investment in the process of peaceful reintegration of the region and its people.

Communication (October). On 3 October [S/1997/772], Croatia submitted to the Security Council President the text of its Programme for the Establishment of Trust, Accelerated Return, and Normalization of Living Conditions in the War-affected Regions of the Republic of Croatia. The Programme's goals were: the creation of a general climate of tolerance and security; the realization of equality of all citizens with regard to the State administration; the establishment of trust between all citizens; the creation of general social, political, security and economic conditions for normalization of life; the speedy, secure and organized return of all Croatian citizens to those regions of Croatia from which they had been expelled or displaced; the inclusion of all citizens in building a democratic society; and creation of a political framework for the implementation of relevant legal norms. A national committee for monitoring the realization of the Programme was to be established, while counties, cities and municipalities were to establish their own committees to monitor the Programme in their areas. The Programme was to be implemented mainly in the political, legal, administrative, internal affairs, economic, social, cultural and educational fields, as well as in reconstruction and return and the media.

Croatia stated that the reconciliation programme showed the Government's commitment to integrating as equal citizens all persons formerly affiliated with the occupying forces who had accepted the rights and duties arising from Croatian citizenship. Croatia also informed the Council President of additional action it had taken in the reintegration process, including the complete integration of the Danube region into the Croatian judicial system and the adoption by the Croatian Parliament of a law on validation of previously unlawful documents issued in the occupied territories.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (October)

On 20 October [meeting 3824], following consultations among its members, the Security Council authorized the President to make the following statement [S/PRST/1997/48] on its behalf:

The Security Council welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 2 October 1997 on the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium and agrees with its balanced and objective assessment.

The Council notes with approval several positive actions taken by the Government of Croatia which are contained in the report, as well as those which have occurred since the report was issued. These developments include the recent agreements relating to education, progress on the reintegration of the judiciary, the law on convalidation, moves towards recognition of pensioner service, assistance to local governments and municipalities, and provision of documentation on twenty-five war crimes cases to the Transitional Administration. The Council is also encouraged by the increased cooperation with the International Tribunal on the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia. The Council expects the Government of Croatia to continue to build upon these positive steps and accelerate its efforts in order fully to complete these initiatives.

The Council welcomes the recent establishment by the Government of Croatia of a programme for national reconciliation. A final assessment of this programme must await its full and prompt implementation.

The Council continues to note with concern that there are still many outstanding areas and issues of contention and non-compliance, which require further, urgent action from the Government of Croatia. The Council reiterates its call upon the Government of Croatia to curb media attacks on ethnic groups. The Council also underlines, in particular, the importance of the removal of all legal and administrative barriers, thus allowing the accelerated voluntary two-way return of displaced persons, including their right to choose to live in the region, as well as the return of refugees. It calls upon the Government of Croatia to give immediate effect to recent decisions of the Constitutional Court regarding the Law on the Temporary Takeover and Administration of

Specified Property, and to take further action to promote the safe return of owners to their homes and the resolution of the issue of lost tenancy rights, including ensuring access to reconstruction assistance.

Much progress in these and other outstanding areas must be made on an urgent basis, in order for the Government of Croatia to comply fully with its obligations and create the conditions for a successful completion of the Transitional Administration. For its part, the local Serb population must also take more active measures to participate in the reintegration process.

The Council notes the urgent need for all local government bodies in the region, particularly the City Council of Vukovar, to commence full normal functions immediately.

The Council expresses its concern about the behaviour of some officers of the Transitional Police Force, and urges full cooperation with the Transitional Administration in improving the performance of the Force. The Council approves the intention of the Secretary-General to retain United Nations civilian police and military observers at current levels to the end of the mandate of the Transitional Administration. The Council also notes the need to address concerns relating to the continuation of police monitoring functions.

The Council welcomes the close cooperation between the Transitional Administration and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe in expanding the long-term mission of that latter in Croatia.

The Council shares the assessment of the Secretary-General that there is sufficient time for Croatia to comply fully with its obligations and commitments before 15 January 1998 and urges the Government of Croatia to redouble its efforts in the time remaining. The Council looks forward to the next report of the Secretary-General on all aspects relevant to the peaceful reintegration of the region, due by the beginning of December.

Report of Secretary-General (December). In a 4 December report [S/1997/953], the Secretary-General stated that, since his October report, Croatia had shown more political will to complete reintegration successfully and had increased efforts to meet its obligations. Important progress had been made, although not all obligations had been fulfilled. Some commitments could not be fully implemented within the two-year transitional period envisaged in the 1995 Basic Agreement and Croatian performance in other areas could be evaluated only with the passage of time. Reviewing the UNTAES role over the preceding two years, the Secretary-General stated that its success in the entire integration process was a positive precedent for peace throughout the former Yugoslavia. It had provided stability to enable Croatia and FRY to normalize their relations and enter into increasingly cooperative bilateral agreements, which were essential to the full economic development of the Danube border area.

Among the specific positive developments in Croatia since his last report, the Secretary-General cited the adoption by Croatia, on 2 October, of a comprehensive programme of national reconciliation (see above), and the establishment, on 9 October, of a multi-ethnic national Board for the Realization of the Programme on the Establishment of Confidence, Acceleration of Returns and Normalization of Life to implement the programme. The Board had initiated meetings with national media representatives, religious leaders and non-governmental organizations to urge moderation and support for reconciliation. There had also been a welcome improvement in media coverage of Serbs in Croatia.

Since October, the two main Croat and Serb political parties in the region had made intensive efforts to establish fully functioning local municipalities. However, that task remained incomplete in most of them as they continued to face financial and legal difficulties. Although local Serb representatives in Croatian institutions had become progressively more active, their effectiveness was hampered by a lack of skills, finance and support. The Joint Council of Municipalities had not yet received promised government funding and had not yet met with President Tudjman in accordance with the Croatian Government guarantees of 13 January. Serb performance in planning for the long-term establishment of local Serb-language media had been disappointing. UNTAES had finally negotiated an agreement to allow continued broadcasting by four local Serb radio stations and for a daily television news programme.

The Secretary-General reported that, with very few exceptions, all public services and enterprises had been reintegrated and that Ministries had generally complied with commitments to proportional representation in employment. However, State enterprises at all levels had been slow and sometimes unwilling to issue permanent work contracts to Serbs. Progress in reintegration had been made in health and education. On 15 November, the Minister of Health agreed to provide one-year contracts to Serb medical personnel and to provide medical services to all residents of the region regardless of whether they were in possession of Croatian health cards. In mid-November, the implementation of agreements had started on the use of minority languages, allocation of principals' positions, the renewal of contracts for teachers whose credentials had not yet been validated and the delivery of Cyrillic textbooks. Some 13,000 residents were regularly receiving full or partial pensions, but approximately 2,400 applications were still pending. Availability of social welfare assistance was improving slowly but unemployment benefits remained problematic.

Concerning the return of displaced persons and refugees, Croatian statistics showed that some 9,000 Serbs and 6,000 Croats had returned to their homes throughout Croatia. Croatia had still not responded to the repeated calls by the Security Council to remove legal obstacles to returns and consequently no long-term mechanisms had been established for returns to occupied homes. The Law on Temporary Take-over of Property remained in effect and proposed changes to it gave no assurance that Croat and Serb displaced persons would receive equal treatment. Also, there had been no resolution of the problem of restoration of lost tenancy rights in socially owned apartments in other parts of Croatia and Croatia had not presented a plan of options, as guaranteed in the Basic Agreement, for those Serb displaced persons who wished to receive just compensation or to remain in the region.

On 30 September, UNTAES and the Minister of Justice signed a declaration fully establishing the Croatian judiciary in the region, under which at least 40 per cent of all judges and other judicial personnel had to be Serbs. The Secretary-General stated that the Government of Croatia had begun to comply satisfactorily with those undertakings. Meanwhile, the application of the Amnesty Law continued to be a cause for anxiety to many Serbs as Croatia had not met its obligations to reduce public concern by concluding investigations of alleged serious crimes against international humanitarian law. The Osijek County Court alone had stated that there might be as many as 4,000 cases that needed to be reviewed before amnesty could be confirmed.

There had been an improvement in inter-ethnic cooperation in TPF, although Serb officers continued to be apprehensive about their personal future and work prospects once the Force was integrated into the Croatian police. Having acknowledged that TPF had not yet demonstrated the professional qualities or inter-ethnic cohesion necessary to police the multi-ethnic communities of the region effectively and impartially, Croatia had requested the continued presence of UN civilian police in the Danube region following the end of the UNTAES mandate.

Progress continued in the normalization of relations between Croatia and FRY. Cross-border rail traffic resumed on 11 November but implementation of the "soft border" agreement was postponed to 1 December.

Summing up, the Secretary-General stated that there was general consensus that UNTAES had successfully achieved its basic objectives, although full implementation of Croatian commitments remained incomplete. The performance of the past two months should be the baseline for additional efforts, which, if sustained, gave hope that the termination of UNTAES on 15 January 1998 would not jeopardize the results of two years of intensive international effort in the region. He emphasized, however, two essential conditions for achieving the long-term goals established by the Security Council: the complete and unreversed commitment of Croatia to the permanent reintegration of its Serb citizens; and the continued close scrutiny by the international community of Croatian performance.

In the circumstances, the Secretary-General recommended the termination of UNTAES on 15 January 1998 and the progressive turnover by the Transitional Administrator to Croatia of operational control of all remaining functions in the region. He also recommended that the Council establish a support group of 180 civilian police monitors for nine months, with the option of an earlier termination should circumstances so permit, whose task would be to continue to monitor the performance of the Croatian police in the Danube region, particularly in connection with the return of displaced persons. That would include monitoring investigations by the Croatian police of any allegations of police misconduct and the provision of training to improve the professional capability of the local police. The Secretary-General would appoint a senior UN official to head both the support group and the United Nations Liaison Office in Zagreb, which would retain its separate functions.

On 17 December [S/1997/953/Add.1], the Secretary-General notified the Council that the estimated costs for the civilian police group for nine months would be $17.6 million. That estimate provided for 180 civilian police, supported by a civilian establishment of 53 international and 165 local personnel.

In a later report [S/1998/59], the Secretary-General informed the Council of Croatia's continued efforts and political will to meet its obligations. Since early December, considerable efforts had been made to establish fully functioning municipalities, and mutually acceptable arrangements were made to ensure a continued media voice for the Serb community within the region. In addition, representatives of the Joint Council of Municipalities had held their first meeting with President Tudjman. An agreement on the reintegration of health services was signed between UNTAES and Croatia on 3 December, providing for full financing of health facilities and equal access to health care for all residents of the region, together with arrangements to nostrify medical diplomas for 300 health care specialists by 10 January 1998. Progress was also achieved in increasing the availability of social welfare. According to government figures, since 5 December 11,437 pensions had been paid and 143 individuals had received unemployment benefits. In the area of public safety and security, UNTAES, on 15 December, transferred responsibility for the management and operational control of TPF to the Croatian Ministry of the Interior. The "soft border" agreement between Croatia and FRY was implemented on 14 December.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (December)

On 19 December [meeting 3843], the Security Council considered the Secretary-General's 4 December report. It also had before it a 20 November letter from Croatia [S/1997/913] concerning its request to the Secretary-General for the presence in Croatia of civilian police monitors after the withdrawal of UNTAES. Croatia accepted the Secretary-General's proposals regarding the establishment and functions of the civilian police support group. Having considered a draft resolution [S/1997/990] submitted by Belgium, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Portugal, the Russian Federation, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States, the Council unanimously adopted resolution 1145(1997).

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions concerning the territories of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium of the Republic of Croatia (the Region),

Reaffirming its commitment to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Croatia, and emphasizing in this regard that the territories of the Region are integral parts of the Republic of Croatia,

Recalling the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium between the Government of the Republic of Croatia and the local Serb community, signed on 12 November 1995, which promotes the mutual confidence, safety and security of all inhabitants in the Region,

Noting the termination of the mandate of the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium on 15 January 1998, as envisaged in its resolution 1079(1996) of 15 November 1996 as well as in the Basic Agreement, and in accordance with its resolution 1120(1997) of 14 July 1997, and expressing its deep appreciation to the Transitional Administrators for their leadership of the efforts of the United Nations in promoting peace, stability and democracy in the Region, and to the civilian and military personnel of the Transitional Administration for their dedication and achievement in facilitating the peaceful reintegration of the Region into the Republic of Croatia,

Emphasizing the continuing obligation of the Government of the Republic of Croatia, under the Basic Agreement and international conventions, to allow all refugees and displaced persons to return in safety to their homes throughout the Republic of Croatia, and further emphasizing the urgency and importance of the two-way return of all displaced persons in the Republic of Croatia,

Recalling the mandate of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe of 26 June 1997 providing for a continued and reinforced presence of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe in the Republic of Croatia, with a focus on the two-way return of all refugees and displaced persons, the protection of their rights, and the protection of persons belonging to national minorities,

Welcoming the letter dated 20 November 1997 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Croatia to the Secretary-General requesting a continued presence of United Nations civilian police monitors after the termination of the mandate of the Transitional Administration,

Welcoming also the report of the Secretary-General of 4 December 1997 and the recommendations contained therein, including the recommendation for the establishment of a support group of civilian police monitors,

Stressing that the Croatian authorities bear the main responsibility for the successful completion of the peaceful reintegration of the Region and the true reconciliation of the people,

1. Notes that the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium will terminate on 15 January 1998, and expresses its continued full support for the Transitional Administration as it completes its mandate;

5. Stresses the need for the Government of the Republic of Croatia to pursue the economic revitalization of the Region, and notes, in this respect, the importance of past and future involvement by the international community;

6. Notes with approval the recent improved performance of the Government of the Republic of Croatia towards fulfilling its obligations, including the adoption of a comprehensive programme of national reconciliation, and encourages continued progress in this regard;

7. Reaffirms the right of all refugees and displaced persons originating from the Republic of Croatia to return to their homes of origin throughout the Republic of Croatia, welcomes the fact that some progress has been made in the peaceful two-way return of displaced persons and the return of refugees in the Region, and calls upon the Government of the Republic of Croatia to remove legal obstacles and other impediments to two-way returns, including through the resolution of property issues, the establishment of straightforward procedures for returns, the adequate funding of the Joint Council and all relevant activities of municipalities, the clarification and full implementation of the Amnesty Law, and other measures, as set out in the report of the Secretary-General;

8. Reminds the local Serb community of the continued importance of demonstrating a constructive attitude and participating actively in the process of reintegration and national reconciliation;

9. Stresses that the achievement of the long-term goals for the Region established by the Security Council depend upon the commitment of the Government of the Republic of Croatia to the permanent reintegration of its Serb citizens and upon the vigilant and active role of the international community, and in this regard welcomes the key role of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe;

11. Reiterates its call upon all the States in the region, including the Government of the Republic of Croatia, to cooperate fully with the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia, and recalls its encouragement by the increased cooperation of the Government of the Republic of Croatia with the Tribunal;

dom of movement of all civilian police monitors and other international personnel, and requests that it provide all necessary support and assistance to the civilian police monitors;

17. Encourages liaison between the support group and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe with a view to facilitating a smooth transition of responsibility to that organization;

18. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

UNTAES financing

The Secretary-General presented to the resumed fifty-first session of the General Assembly cost estimates of $274,993,600 gross ($265,657,000 net) for the period 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998 for the maintenance of UNTAES [A/51/520/Add.1]. The estimates also covered the costs of the liaison offices in Belgrade and Zagreb. In February [A/51/520/Add.3], he revised those budget estimates downwards to $266,619,500 gross ($257,283,800 net) to take account of the discontinuation of the payment of hazard duty allowance in the mission area.

The Secretary-General also submitted the financial performance report [A/51/520/Add.2] for UNTAES for the period 15 January to 30 June 1996, showing an unencumbered balance of $18,826,400 gross ($18,880,000 net).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 13 June [meeting 101], the General Assembly, having considered the revised cost estimates and the related report [A/51/872] of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ), and on the recommendation of the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee [A/51/711/Add.1], adopted resolution 51/153 B without vote [agenda item 154].

Financing of the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium

The General Assembly,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Recalling Security Council resolution 1037(1996) of 15 January 1996, by which the Council established the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium for an initial period of twelve months, and Council resolution 1079(1996) of 15 November 1996, in which the Council extended the mandate of the Transitional Administration to 15 July 1997,

Recalling also its decision 50/481 of 11 April 1996 on the financing of the Transitional Administration and its subsequent resolutions thereon, the latest of which was resolution 51/153 A of 16 December 1996,

Reaffirming that the costs of the Transitional Administration are expenses of the Organization to be borne by Member States in accordance with Article 17, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations,

Recalling its previous decisions regarding the fact that, in order to meet the expenditures caused by the Transitional Administration, a different procedure is required from that applied to meet expenditures of the regular budget of the United Nations,

Taking into account the fact that the economically more developed countries are in a position to make relatively larger contributions and that the economically less developed countries have a relatively limited capacity to contribute towards such an operation,

Bearing in mind the special responsibilities of the States permanent members of the Security Council, as indicated in General Assembly resolution 1874(S-IV) of 27 June 1963, in the financing of such operations,

Noting with appreciation that voluntary contributions have been made to the Transitional Administration,

Mindful of the fact that it is essential to provide the Transitional Administration with the necessary financial resources to enable it to fulfil its responsibilities under the relevant resolutions of the Security Council,

1. UN Mission of Observers in Prevlaka (UNMOP)

During 1997, the United Nations Mission of Observers in Prevlaka (UNMOP), which had become a separate mission in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 330], continued to monitor the demilitarization of the disputed Prevlaka peninsula and of neighbouring areas in Croatia and FRY by carrying out patrols on both sides of the border. The mission, which comprised 28 military observers, also maintained contacts with local authorities in order to strengthen liaison, reduce tension, improve safety and security and promote confidence between the parties. The Chief Military Observer, Colonel Harold Mwakio Tangai (Kenya), discussed matters concerning the implementation of Security Council resolutions with the authorities in Zagreb, Belgrade and Podgorica. While the situation in the mission area remained generally stable during the year, some occasional violations of the demilitarization regime raised tensions.

Both Croatia and FRY continued to reiterate their firm commitment to a negotiated resolution of the disputed issues of Prevlaka in accordance with article 4 of the Agreement on Normalization of Relations between them, signed in Belgrade on 23 August 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 340]. However, substantial negotiations did not start in 1997.

In January, the Council authorized a six-month extension of UNMOP until 15 July; a further six-month extension until 15 January 1998 was authorized in July.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (January)

On 14 January [meeting 3731], the Security Council considered the Secretary-General's report of 31 December 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 333] on the situation in Prevlaka. The President drew the Council's attention to letters of 28 October 1996 from FRY [Ibid., p. 332] and 25 November 1996 [Ibid., p. 333] from Croatia on the Prevlaka issue. The Council adopted resolution 1093(1997) unanimously. The draft [S/1997/29] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling its earlier relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 779(1992) of 6 October 1992, 981(1995) of 31 March 1995, 1025(1995) of 30 November 1995, 1038(1996) of 15 January 1996 and 1066(1996) of 15 July 1996,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 31 December 1996,

Reaffirming once again its commitment to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Croatia,

Noting the Joint Declaration signed at Geneva on 30 September 1992 by the Presidents of the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia by which they reaffirmed their agreement concerning the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula, emphasizing the contribution that this demilitarization has made to the decrease of tension in the region, and stressing the need for the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to agree on a settlement which would resolve their differences peacefully,

Noting with concern the violations in the United Nations designated zones in the region, and other activities, including restrictions on the freedom of movement of United Nations military observers, referred to in the report of the Secretary-General, which have dangerously increased tensions,

Welcoming the mutual recognition among all the successor States to the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia within their internationally recognized borders, and stressing the importance of full normalization of relations among those States,

Commending the Agreement on Normalization of Relations between the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, signed in Belgrade on 23 August 1996, committing the parties to resolve peacefully the disputed issue of Prevlaka by negotiations in the spirit of the Charter of the United Nations and good-neighbourly relations,

Determining that the situation in Croatia continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security,

1. Authorizes the United Nations military observers to continue monitoring the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula, in accordance with resolutions 779(1992) and 981(1995) and paragraphs 19 and 20 of the report of the Secretary-General of 13 December 1995, until 15 July 1997;

2. Urges the parties to abide by their mutual commitments and to implement fully the Agreement on

Normalization of Relations between the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, and stresses that these are critical for the establishment of peace and security throughout the region;

3. Calls upon the parties to adopt the practical options proposed by the United Nations military observers for the improvement of safety and security in the area, as referred to in the report of the Secretary-General of 31 December 1996, and requests that the Secretary-General report by 15 April 1997 on progress made in implementing those practical options, in particular regarding the freedom of movement of the military observers throughout the area and respect for the demilitarization regime;

4. Calls upon the parties to cease and refrain from all violations and from military or other activities which may increase tension, to cooperate fully with the United Nations military observers and to ensure their safety and freedom of movement, including through the removal of landmines;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council by 5 July 1997, for its early consideration, a report on the situation in the Prevlaka peninsula as well as on progress made by the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia towards a settlement which would resolve their differences peacefully;

6. Requests the United Nations military observers and the multinational Stabilization Force authorized by the Council in resolution 1088(1996) of 12 December 1996 to cooperate fully with each other;

7. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Report of Secretary-General (April). In a 14 April report [S/1997/311], the Secretary-General informed the Security Council that Croatia and FRY had made no progress towards adopting the practical options proposed by UNMOP in May 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 332] to reduce tension and improve safety and security in the area. Both parties continued to restrict UNMOP's freedom of movement in the northern part of the demilitarized zone and access elsewhere was denied randomly and even constantly at several Croatian positions. Minefields on both sides of the international border of the demilitarized zone still constituted a hazard to UN military observers. The Chief Military Observer had conveyed to the authorities in Zagreb, Belgrade and Podgorica the new elements contained in the Council's 14 January resolution and had offered specific suggestions for lifting restrictions on the freedom of movement of UN military observers and on the removal of landmines. The parties had shown no willingness to take unilateral steps to improve respect for the demilitarization regime in Prevlaka and neighbouring areas. Both sides insisted on guaranteed reciprocity, which made it difficult if not impossible for meaningful progress to be made. The parties had also raised various concerns related to UNMOP's procedures, balance in reporting and dimensions of designated zones.

The Secretary-General stated that tension had increased in the UNMOP area due to a substantial increase in the number of Croatian special police personnel in the UN-designated zones, and to the fact that Croatian heavy weapons were observed inside the zones on two occasions. In February, a three-day exercise by the Yugoslav navy outside the UNMOP area of responsibility had prompted a strong reaction by Croatia, which partly restricted the movement of UN military observers on coastal roads inside the demilitarized zone. Croatian police boats entered the UN-controlled zone occasionally and, in March, a Yugoslav navy missile boat violated the zone.

The Secretary-General observed that since Croatia and FRY had indicated that their continuing bilateral negotiations, pursuant to the 1996 Agreement on Normalization of Relations [YUN 1996, p. 333], had not yet addressed the Prevlaka issues directly and that there had been no progress towards settling the dispute, UNMOP would continue to carry out its mandate within the existing constraints and would continue its efforts to enhance security confidence-building between the parties.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (April)

On 25 April [meeting 3772], the Security Council authorized its President to make the following statement [S/PRST/1997/23] on its behalf:

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 14 April 1997 concerning the United Nations Mission of Observers in Prevlaka and expresses its disappointment at the general lack of improvement in the situation in Prevlaka.

The Council is concerned by the assessment of the Secretary-General that, while the situation generally has been stable, several developments have led to an increase in tension in the area. The Council is particularly concerned by the descriptions in the report of continuing violations of the demilitarization regime, including movements of heavy weapons and of special police of the Republic of Croatia, and the entry by a navy missile boat of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia into the demilitarized zone, in disregard of the concerns and requests previously expressed by the Council.

The Council calls upon the parties to refrain from provocative actions of all kinds, to cease violations of the demilitarized zone and to cooperate fully with the United Nations military observers.

The Council also notes the observations in the report of the Secretary-General about the lack of any progress towards adopting the practical options proposed to the parties by the United Nations military observers in May 1996, as referred to in the report of the Secretary-General of 31 December 1996, to improve the safety and security of the area. The Council reiterates its call upon both parties to adopt these practical options with a view to their early implementation, to remove landmines from areas patrolled by the military observers, and to stop their interference with the freedom of movement of the military observers and with the implementation of the mandate of the observers.

The Council calls upon the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to resolve the disputed issue of Prevlaka through bilateral negotiations pursuant to the Agreement on Normalization of Relations, signed by them in Belgrade on 23 August 1996, and in the spirit of the Charter of the United Nations and good-neighbourly relations.

The Council emphasizes its confidence in and support for the work of the United Nations military observers. It expresses its appreciation to the military observers and to the Member States who have provided personnel and other forms of support.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Communications (May). FRY informed the Security Council President on 27 May [S/1997/394] that no acceptable solution to the Prevlaka problem had been reached nor had any significant progress been made in that regard, primarily because Croatia was not ready to negotiate and also because of Croatia's attitude on the ground. Consequently, FRY considered it necessary for the Council to extend UNMOP's mandate after 15 July to maintain security and strengthen confidence in the peninsula until a mutually agreed solution could be found in bilateral negotiations with Croatia.

On 29 May [S/1997/412], Croatia informed the Council that it was awaiting a response from FRY to its proposals for a possible security arrangement, including the possibility of demilitarizing broader areas on both sides of the border. Croatia was confident that such an arrangement could be found and, while it had shown understanding for FRY's security concerns in respect of Boka Kotorska, it believed that those concerns could be resolved only through arrangements that respected existing internationally recognized borders.

Report of Secretary-General (July). In response to the Security Council request contained in resolution 1093(1997), the Secretary-General, in a 1 July report [S/1997/506], informed the Council that, despite encouragement by the Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations, Croatia and FRY had failed to make any progress in adopting the practical options proposed by UNMOP to reduce tension and improve safety and security in the area. The long-standing violations of the demilitarization regime, previously reported, persisted. He also reported that, in their bilateral negotiations, the parties had not addressed the Prevlaka dispute directly. The unresolved dispute continued to obstruct progress towards opening the international border crossing at Debeli Brijeg, which lay within the demilitarized zone. At meetings in April and June, Croatian and Yugoslav representatives were unable to reach agreement on the status of the crossing.

The Secretary-General provided the Council with information on new violations of the demilitarization regime. In May, for example, 56 boxes of mortar ammunition were seen inside the demilitarized zone at a Croatian position where compatible mortars had been observed in February. Also in May, the Yugoslav authorities confirmed for the first time that three positions that UNMOP had observed in the northern part of the demilitarized zone were manned by Yugoslav troops. Croatia and the media alleged that those positions were located on the Croatian side of the border. However, UNMOP, because of the restrictions imposed on its movements, could not verify the strength and armament of the Yugoslav army troops at those positions. Also, the waters of the UN-controlled zone continued to be violated by Croatian and Yugoslav fishing boats and, occasionally, by Croatian police boats and Yugoslav navy ships. The Secretary-General warned that those violations increased the possibility that incidents might occur between the parties. As to the freedom of movement of UN observers, the Secretary-General reported that the situation had worsened in June when Croatia denied access to positions in the north-western part of the demilitarized zone. FRY, on the other hand, had lifted a long-standing minor restriction in May.

The Secretary-General pointed out that the letters addressed to the Security Council President on 21 and 29 May by FRY and Croatia, respectively, showed that the parties still retained differing interpretations of the Prevlaka dispute. Croatia regarded the dispute as a security issue to be settled by an arrangement that would provide security for each State within existing borders, while FRY viewed the dispute as centred upon territorial possession of the Prevlaka peninsula. Nevertheless, the Secretary-General was convinced that the parties could fulfil their commitment under the Agreement on Normalization of Relations to resolve the issue of Prevlaka peacefully. He recommended a further extension of UNMOP's mandate until 15 January 1998.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (July)

On 14 July [meeting 3800], the Security Council, having considered a draft resolution [S/1997/537] prepared in consultations among its members, unanimously adopted resolution 1119 (1997).

The Security Council,

Recalling its earlier relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 779(1992) of 6 October 1992, 981(1995) of 31 March 1995, 1025(1995) of 30 November 1995, 1038(1996) of 15 January 1996, 1066(1996) of 15 July 1996 and 1093(1997) of 14 January 1997, as well as the statement by its President of 25 April 1997.

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 1 July 1997,

Reaffirming once again its commitment to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Croatia,

Noting with concern that the parties have failed to make any progress in adopting the practical options proposed by the United Nations military observers in May 1996, as referred to in the report of the Secretary-General of 31 December 1996, to reduce tension and improve safety and security in the area, or in reaching a peaceful settlement of the Prevlaka issue,

Noting the observation contained in the report of the Secretary-General of 1 July 1997 that the presence of the United Nations military observers continues to be essential to maintain conditions that are conducive to a negotiated settlement of the disputed issue of Prevlaka,

Determining that the situation in Croatia continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security,

1. Authorizes the United Nations military observers to continue monitoring the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula, in accordance with resolutions 779(1992) and 981(1995) and paragraphs 19 and 20 of the report of the Secretary-General of 13 December 1995, until 15 January 1998;

2. Renews its call upon the parties to abide by their mutual commitments, implement fully the Agreement on Normalization of Relations between the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia of 23 August 1996, adopt the practical options proposed by the United Nations military observers for the improvement of safety and security in the area, cease all violations of the demilitarization regime and military or other activities which may increase tension, and cooperate fully with the United Nations military observers and ensure their safety and freedom of movement, including through the removal of landmines;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council by 5 January 1998 a report on the situation in the Prevlaka peninsula as well as on progress made by the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia towards a settlement to resolve their differences peacefully;

4. Requests the United Nations military observers and the multinational Stabilization Force authorized by the Council in resolution 1088(1996) of 12 December 1996 to cooperate with each other;

5. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Report of Secretary-General (December). Responding to the Security Council's request contained in the above resolution, the Secretary-General, in a 30 December report [S/1997/1019], stated that progress had been made towards implementing the UNMOP practical options. Following negotiations between UNMOP and Croatian officials, a minefield along a road inside the UN-controlled zone was cleared; some 67 mines were removed during November and December. Croatian authorities then closed three positions of the Special Police inside the area, which allowed UN military observers to patrol roads inside the zone without risk to their safety. Efforts by the Chief Military Observer to establish procedures for regular access to positions throughout the UNMOP area were not successful, although Yugoslav authorities had lifted the partial restriction on UN military observers to Border Police positions and on their use of a road in the demilitarized zone. As in his previous reports, the Secretary-General informed the Council that the parties had made no progress towards a settlement of the Prevlaka dispute.

The situation on the ground in the UNMOP area remained stable, said the Secretary-General. Occasional violations of the demilitarization regime had decreased and were of lesser significance. However, violations in the "Blue Zone"—the demilitarization regime in the UN-controlled zone—continued, caused by the presence of approximately 30 Croatian Special Police and six Yugoslav Border Police. The most significant long-standing violation in the demilitarized zone ("Yellow Zone") was the continuing presence of Yugoslav army troops in the north-western part of the area. In addition, the waters of the UN-controlled zone continued to be violated frequently by both sides. At the same time, it was observed that the number of Croatian Special Police personnel deployed in the UNMOP area of responsibility had decreased.

The Secretary-General observed that compliance with the practical options proposed by UNMOP had confirmed the lessening of tensions in the region. While both parties continued to reiterate their firm commitment to a negotiated resolution of the disputed issues of Prevlaka, substantive talks had not started and there was no prospect of an end to the long-term violations in the UN-controlled zone. However, recent developments in other parts of the border between Croatia and FRY gave him grounds for hope that the two countries could solve the disputed issue of Prevlaka through mutual negotiations. Believing that the continued presence of UNMOP was indispensable, the Secretary-General recommended a further six-month extension of the UNMOP mandate, to 15 July 1998.

The Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly recommendations on the financing of UNMOP for the period 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998 [A/51/519/Add.1 & Corr.1], which, for administrative and budgetary purposes, were treated as part of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina (UNMIBH). (Details of those proposals and General Assembly action are to be found above, under "Bosnia and Herzegovina".)

Human rights concerns

In a 5 March report [S/1997/195], the Secretary-General provided to the Security Council information on the situation of human rights in Croatia obtained from UNHCR, the Office of the Prosecutor of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, the monitoring mission of OSCE, the European Community Monitoring Mission and the International Committee of the Red Cross. The report, which covered developments since the previous report on the subject in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 333], also took account of information received from the Government of Croatia and from local and international non-governmental human rights organizations active in Croatia. Specific reference was made to the progress of measures taken by the Croatian Government to implement Security Council resolutions 1009(1995) [YUN 1995, p. 583] and 1019(1995) [Ibid., p. 560] and presidential statement S/PRST/1996/48 [YUN 1996, p. 340]. The Council had demanded that Croatia take urgent measures to end large-scale violations of human rights and humanitarian law, which were reported to have been perpetrated against the local Serb population in parts of its territory over which it had regained control in 1995 [YUN 1995, pp. 573 & 580].

The Secretary-General observed that Croatian Serbs, particularly in the former Sector South around Knin, continued to live in conditions of serious insecurity. Incidents of looting and harassment remained common, attributed mostly to recent Croat settlers and persons crossing the border with Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Croatian police continued to be ineffective in restoring security. Among the most serious acts committed was a "booby-trap" incident in Josani, Korenica municipality, in January, when a Serbian returning to his home moved a piece of injuring him seriously. The situation in Western Slavonia (former Sector West) was generally more favourable. Croatia, in contrast to the assessment of most international observers that security measures were inadequate, maintained that it had deployed the necessary number of police officers to the former sectors, who were doing their best to ensure general safety in the region. To support its position, Croatia advised that between 4 August 1995 and 31 December 1996 it had dealt with 41 murder cases, of which 21 had been solved, as had 40 of the 68 cases of robbery.

Difficult living conditions for remaining Serbs had been eased considerably during the 1996/1997 winter by intensive humanitarian programmes conducted by international organizations in cooperation with Croatia and the Croatian Red Cross. Positive developments included the provision of identity documents to virtually all remaining Serbs and restoration of some services, including electricity. However, many elderly Serbs remained isolated and vulnerable.

While more than 14,000 persons had received permission to return to the country, less than a quarter of them had done so, mostly because of the insecure conditions. UNHCR had facilitated the return of some 550 Croatian refugees from FRY. However, its programme to arrange the return of younger relatives of extremely vulnerable elderly individuals had made almost no progress, owing to the slow response of the Government. According to data from FRY, some 35,000 Croatian refugees in that country had expressed the desire to return immediately and it was believed that more would do so if conditions of personal and economic security improved. It was also virtually impossible for those refugees in FRY to return without Croatian documents or relatives in Croatia. Little progress had been made on resolving the property issue. Few Croatian Serb refugees had succeeded in regaining access to their homes and little if any corrective action had been taken by the local housing commissions, effectively leaving hundreds of Croatian Serbs homeless. Despite the 1996 Agreement on Normalization of Relations between Croatia and FRY [YUN 1996, p. 340], which included provisions to ensure to returning refugees and displaced persons the return of their property or a just compensation, and the establishment of a bilateral commission to implement that agreement, there had been little progress on the issue. While Croatia continued to insist upon its commitment to the return process, public remarks and official disposition, as well as developments on the ground, had led some observers to question the sincerity of that commitment. In the region administered by UNTAES, the application of the Amnesty Law continued to cause widespread concern among the Serb population. In addition, evidence showed that the detention and prosecution situation remained to be resolved. Appeals had been made to the Government to finalize its list of war crime suspects on the basis of existing evidence, to remove uncertainty and ensure that arbitrary arrests were not made among Serbs returning to Croatia. An additional concern related to the detention of some 18 persons who were reportedly being held by Croatia as prisoners of war in contravention of the commitments under the 1995 General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina [YUN 1995, p. 544].

Croatia had become a member of the Council of Europe in 1996 and had signed the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and its Protocols, the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities, and the European Convention for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. A working group was examining the compatibility of Croatian law with those human rights instruments. Croatia continued to cooperate with the Special Rapporteur for human rights in the former Yugoslavia, Elizabeth Rehn, and with the OSCE monitoring mission in the country. In February, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights/Centre for Human Rights submitted a report to the Croatian Government on the need for possible technical cooperation projects in human rights.

There remained strong grounds for concern that the Government was withholding its full cooperation with the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia. The Office of the Prosecutor reported that the Government had failed to provide requested assistance and information. No further arrests of accused persons had occurred and Croatia had informed the Prosecutor that no person indicted by the Tribunal was on Croatian territory.

International observers had noted the hostility that continued to characterize inter-ethnic relations in the former Sectors. It was therefore clear that if there was to be genuine improvement in the situation in the former Sectors, efforts by both international and local organizations to promote confidence and reconciliation would continue to be needed in the foreseeable future. (For further details on the human rights situation in Croatia, see PART TWO, Chapter III.)

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 19 March [meeting 3753], the Security Council, following consultations among its members, authorized the President to make the following statement on its behalf [S/PRST/1997/15]:

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General on Croatia of 5 March 1997, submitted pursuant to Council resolutions 1009 (1995) and 1019 (1995). It also recalls the statement by its President of 20 December 1996.

The Council remains deeply concerned that, although the Government of Croatia maintains that it has deployed the necessary number of police officers, Croatian Serbs continue to live in conditions of serious insecurity throughout the areas which had been designated United Nations Protected Areas and were known as Sectors West, North and South, particularly in the area of former Sector South around Knin. It calls upon the Government of Croatia to take further steps to restore a climate of law and order in those areas.

The Council welcomes the fact that difficult living conditions for remaining Serbs have been considerably eased during recent months by intensive humanitarian programmes conducted by international organizations. In this context, it calls upon the Government of Croatia to assume fully its responsibilities, in cooperation with all relevant international organizations, to ensure that the social and economic situation of all inhabitants in the former sectors improves.

The Council expresses its concern that there continues to be little progress with regard to the return of Croatian Serb displaced persons and refugees to the areas. It calls upon the Government of Croatia to accelerate its efforts to improve conditions of personal and economic security, to remove bureaucratic obstacles to the rapid issue of documentation to all Serb families and to resolve promptly the property issue, by a return of property or just compensation, in order to facilitate the return of Croatian Serbs to the former sectors.

The Council calls upon the Government of Croatia to remove uncertainty about the implementation of its Amnesty Law, in particular by finalizing without delay the list of war crime suspects on the basis of existing evidence and in strict accordance with international law, and to put an end to arbitrary arrests, particularly of Serbs returning to Croatia.

The Council recalls the obligations of Croatia arising from relevant universal human rights instruments to which it is a party. It welcomes the commitments undertaken by the Government of Croatia in relation to the Council of Europe, including its signature of the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities, and expects that the Government of Croatia will implement those commitments fully.

The Council is concerned that the Government of Croatia continues to withhold its full cooperation with the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia. It underlines the obligation of the Government of Croatia, in accordance with resolution 827 (1993), to respond promptly and in full to all requests from the International Tribunal. It also calls upon the Government of Croatia to conduct investigations into and the prosecution of persons accused of serious violations of international humanitarian law, especially those committed in the course of military operations in 1995.

The Council stresses the importance of the effective implementation of the measures outlined in the paragraphs above for promoting confidence and reconciliation in Croatia as well as for the peaceful reintegration of the region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium. In this context, the Council requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep it informed on a regular basis and to report again on the humanitarian and human rights situation in Croatia within his report to be submitted by 1 July 1997 pursuant to paragraph 6 of resolution 1079 (1996).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

The General Assembly, in resolution 52/147 of December, urged Croatia to allow the expeditious voluntary return of all refugees, including those from FRY, and of displaced persons, to take measures to secure their safety and human rights, to resolve the issue of property rights, to ensure equal access to protection and to social and housing reconstruction assistance regardless of ethnicity and to investigate and arrest those responsible for acts of violence and intimidation aimed at driving people away.

Occupied territories

By a 22 July letter [A/52/231], Croatia drew attention to its 1994 request [YUN 1994, p. 564] that an item entitled "The situation in the occupied territories of Croatia" be included in the General Assembly's agenda and to Assembly resolution 49/43 on the subject [Ibid., p. 565]. Croatia also noted that, at its request, the Assembly had deferred consideration of the item in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 572] and in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 318]. Bearing in mind that the reintegration of the occupied territories had largely been completed, Croatia requested that the item on the situation in the occupied territories of Croatia not be included in the agenda of the Assembly's fifty-second session.

The Fourth (Special Political and Decolonization) Committee, on 19 December, decided to take no action on the item. By decision 52/418 of 10 December, the Assembly took note of the Fourth Committee's report [A/52/624].

The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia (FYROM)

Developments within the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia (FYROM) were uneven during 1997, with the successful holding of local elections and the establishment of an Ombudsman on the one hand and protests by ethnic communities with regard to instruction in local languages and the display of flags of national minorities on the other. However, the issue of major concern to the United Nations during the year was the possibility of the crisis in Albania (see below) spilling over to FYROM.

The United Nations Preventive Deployment Force (UNPREDEP)—described by the Secretary-General as the international community's first serious effort at preventive deployment—had, as mandated by the Security Council, begun to reduce its military component at the end of March. However, given the situation in Albania, which could possibly affect minority Albanian-speaking populations throughout the region, the Council, on the Secretary-General's recommendation, suspended the military reduction until the end of UNPREDEP's mandate on 31 May. On 28 May, the Council extended UNPREDEP's mandate until 30 November. In August, the Secretary-General informed the Council that, given the improved situation in the region, he intended to implement the Council's decision to start a two-month phased reduction of UNPREDEP, starting on 1 October. In December, the Council again extended the UNPREDEP mandate—at the reduced troop strength—for a final period until 31 August 1998.

During the year, there was a further gradual improvement of relations between FYROM and some of its neighbours. Although the name-related dispute with Greece remained unsolved, both countries continued negotiations under the auspices of the Secretary-General's Personal Envoy, Cyrus R. Vance (United States), and economic relations between the two countries intensified significantly. While there were a number of incidents, including exchanges of fire, along the Albanian border, some improvement in the exercise of authority by Albanian border personnel was observed. Despite the fact that there was little progress regarding the demarcation of the border with the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, the patrols of both sides appeared to honour their commitment to avoid hostile actions.

UN Preventive Deployment Force (UNPREDEP)

The United Nations Preventive Deployment Force (UNPREDEP) successfully contributed to preventing the spillover of conflicts elsewhere in the region into FYROM. The military units of the Force actively patrolled their respective areas of operation, while the military observers and civilian police continued their community and border patrols. The civilian component of the mission was actively involved in monitoring and reporting on developments that might affect the maintenance of peace and stability in the country. It assisted in promoting a better understanding among the various segments of the population and existing political forces, with a view to easing inter-ethnic tensions and strengthening the application of international standards on human rights. The mission continued to be headed by Henryk J. Sokalski (Poland). Through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the Security Council on 17 June [S/1997/466, S/1997/467], Brigadier-General Bent Sohneman (Denmark) was appointed as UNPREDEP Force Commander. He replaced Brigadier-General Bo Lennart Wrangler (Sweden), who completed his tour of duty on 3 June.

In accordance with Security Council resolution 1110(1997), the reduction of the military component by 300 all ranks commenced on 1 October and was completed by 30 November. After that the strength of UNPREDEP consisted of two mechanized infantry battalions: a Nordic composite battalion and a United States Army task force, each with a strength of 350 personnel. The two battalions were supported by a 50-person heavy engineering platoon from Indonesia. There were also 35 military observers and 26 civilian police monitors.

Based exclusively on voluntary contributions, UNPREDEP endeavoured to reach out to the vulnerable segments of society through institution-building and experience-sharing. Those initiatives played an important role in building confidence between the people of the host country and the mission. Since mid-1995, the sum total of the extrabudgetary resources mobilized by the office of the Special Representative for social integration projects had amounted to some $6 million.

Communications (March/April). In a 7 March letter [S/1997/205] to the Secretary-General, FYROM expressed concern that the overall situation in the region had deteriorated, especially with the escalation of the crisis in neighbouring Albania, where a state of emergency had been declared. Any further escalation of riots might cause flows of refugees that could seriously jeopardize security in the region. Under those circumstances, FYROM requested an urgent suspension of the reduction of UNPREDEP military personnel, as foreseen in Security Council resolution 1082(1996) [YUN 1996, p. 346].

In a 1 April letter [S/1997/267], FYROM outlined the factors that complicated the overall political and security situation in the region and had direct implications for his country. He requested that the existing mandate and composition (1,050 troops) of UNPREDEP be extended for a six-month period.

On 3 April [S/1997/276], the Secretary-General informed the President of the Council that recent developments in Albania had demonstrated that stability in the Balkan region remained extremely fragile. UNPREDEP had commenced the mandated reduction of its military component at the end of March when it began dismantling its observation posts along the borders with the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY) and Albania. Considering the situation in the region, however, the Special Representative and the Force Commander, with the Secretary-General's agreement, had temporarily suspended the drawdown. However, in order to meet the 30 April deadline for the mandated reduction, UNPREDEP would be required to resume the drawdown in the coming days.

UNPREDEP had considered concentrating the drawdown on the border between FYROM and FRY. However, there was a clear possibility that reducing UNPREDEP's strength on the northern border at that sensitive time might have negative repercussions. Although UNPREDEP had been a most successful mission, proceeding with the planned reduction during a period when further regional instability continued to be a possibility could put at risk the credibility of the international community's first serious effort at preventive deployment. The Secretary-General therefore recommended that the Council approve the suspension of the reduction of the UNPREDEP military component until the end of the existing mandate on 31 May.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (April)

On 9 April [meeting 3764], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1105(1997). The draft [S/1997/290] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 1082(1996) of 27 November 1996,

Reaffirming its commitment to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia,

Having considered the letter dated 3 April 1997, and the recommendation contained therein, from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council,

1. Decides to suspend the reduction of the military component of the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force referred to in its resolution 1082(1996) until the end of the current mandate on 31 May 1997;

2. Welcomes the redeployment of the Force already achieved in the light of the situation in Albania, and encourages the Secretary-General to continue further redeployment of the Force taking into consideration the situation in the region, consistent with the mandate of the Force;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council by 15 May 1997 a report containing recommendations on a subsequent international presence in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, as referred to in its resolution 1082(1996);

4. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Activities

Report of Secretary-General (May). In a 12 May report [S/1997/365 & Add.1], prepared in response to Security Council resolution 1105(1997), the Secretary-General described the composition, strength and mandate of UNPREDEP, as well as activities of other UN organizations, agencies and programmes in FYROM. He also summarized developments in and around the country. In most of the neighbouring countries, public unrest and tension had been evident: social unrest occurred in Bulgaria and FRY; State institutions collapsed and social structures disintegrated in Albania; the situation in Kosovo remained tense; and in Bosnia and Herzegovina, difficulties had been encountered in implementing the civilian aspects of the Dayton-Paris Peace Agreement [YUN 1995, p. 544]. Despite significant progress in developing relations in many areas between FYROM and FRY, no final agreement had been reached on the border demarcation. While relations with Greece had further improved, the dispute on the name-related issues remained.

Domestically, developments had been uneven. On the one hand, local elections had taken place in which all political parties participated; they had strengthened the pluralistic composition of the political scene and the exercise of grass-roots democracy. Parliament had established an Ombudsman, adopted a law on instruction in the languages of ethnic communities and passed a declaration on promoting inter-ethnic relations. On the other hand, a number of worrisome developments had been observed. The passage of the law on ethnic language instruction had sparked daily protests, followed by a hunger strike, by ethnic Macedonian students and had been criticized as insufficient by the ethnic Albanian political parties. Also, radical demands had resumed in some ethnic Albanian communities to establish ethnically based federalism in the Republic. Those developments had tested the country's fragile communal mosaic, said the Secretary-General. Unless they were tackled in earnest by all concerned, inter-ethnic relations might ultimately prove to be a significant destabilizing factor in the country.

Taking into account all those factors and in light of the strong view conveyed by the Government of FYROM for a continued UNPREDEP presence, the Secretary-General recommended that UNPREDEP's mandate be renewed for an additional six months until 30 November. He also recommended that the strength of the Force be maintained for a period of four months, up to 30 September, with a view to starting as of 1 October, taking into account the conditions prevailing at that time, a two-month phased reduction of the military component to the 750 troop level foreseen by the Council in resolution 1082(1996) [YUN 1996, p. 346]. The Secretary-General stated that he had instructed his Special Representative and the Force Commander to evaluate the effectiveness and composition of the mission and to recommend measures to ensure that the mission implemented all of its mandates in a cost-effective and coherent fashion. He had also requested an examination of the feasibility of reorganizing the mission in order to enhance the role of the civilian police, military observer and civilian elements.

In the addendum to his report, the Secretary-General informed the Council that the cost of maintaining UNPREDEP at its present strength for a 12-month period was an estimated $49.5 million gross (equivalent to $4,125,000 per month). Therefore, should the Council decide to extend the Force's mandate, the cost would be within the resources to be provided by the General Assembly. The Secretary-General also reported that, as at 30 April, unpaid assessed contributions to the UNPREDEP special account for the 12-month period ending 30 June amounted to $7.8 million.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (May)

On 28 May [meeting 3783], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1110(1997). The draft [S/1997/405] was sponsored by France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Portugal, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States.

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 1082(1996) of 27 November 1996 and 1105(1997) of 9 April 1997,

Recalling also its resolution 1101(1997) of 28 March 1997, in which the Security Council expressed its deep concern over the situation in Albania,

Reaffirming its commitment to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia,

Reiterating its appreciation for the important role played by the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force in contributing to the maintenance of peace and stability, and paying tribute to the personnel of the Force in the performance of their mandate,

Welcoming the significant progress made by the Governments of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in developing their mutual relations in many areas, and reiterating its call upon the two Governments to implement in full their agreement of 8 April 1996, in particular regarding the demarcation of their mutual border in the light of the willingness shown by them to resolve the matter,

Taking note of the letter of 1 April 1997 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia to the Secretary-General, requesting the extension of the mandate of the Force,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 12 May 1997 and the recommendations contained therein,

Noting his observation that recent developments in the region, in particular in Albania, have demonstrated that stability there remains fragile,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force until 30 November 1997 and to start as of 1 October 1997, taking into account the conditions prevailing at that time, a two-month phased reduction of the military component by 300 all ranks;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council regularly informed about any relevant developments, and further requests the Secretary-General to review the composition, deployment, strength and mandate of the Force as outlined in his report, taking into consideration the situation prevailing at that time in the region, in particular in Albania, including in the context of elections in that country, and to submit a report to the Council by 15 August 1997 for its consideration;

3. Welcomes the redeployment of the Force already achieved in the light of the situation in Albania, and encourages the Secretary-General to continue further redeployment of the Force taking into consideration the situation in the region, consistent with the mandate of the Force;

4. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Communication (July). On 17 July [A/52/254-S/1997/567], Albania transmitted a letter from its Minister for Foreign Affairs to the Secretary-General expressing deep concern that, since 9 July, FYROM military and special forces had been attacking Albanian civilians who had gathered peacefully in some cities predominantly inhabited by them to protest the adoption of a law on the use of flags. The Minister stated that the excessive and unnecessary use of force against the Albanians in FYROM had struck a serious blow to the efforts for enhanced regional stability and that the full integration and equal participation of the Albanian population in the life of the country was crucial for its durable stability. He encouraged the Security Council to send a mission to FYROM, composed of its members and representatives of States contributing troops to UNPREDEP, in order to gain first-hand information on the situation. The Secretary-General was invited to instruct the UNPREDEP Commander to report to him on the recent events in FYROM.

Report of Secretary-General (August). In an 11 August report [S/1997/631], the Secretary-General stated that while the composition, strength and mandate of UNPREDEP remained unchanged, there had been some redeployment, with three observation posts added along the western border of the mission area. Along that part of the border, the Secretary-General reported, UN soldiers had been exposed to frequent cross-border shooting from Albania, either by armed groups of illegal border-crossers or by other individuals. On a few occasions, UNPREDEP observation towers were deliberately shot at, as a result of which one soldier was injured. Active community patrolling by UN military observers had contributed to the easing of some tensions in the border area.

The civilian component of the mission continued to play an important role in the good offices mandate of the Special Representative, including maintaining an active dialogue with the authorities and political forces in the country and encouraging inter-ethnic communication and interaction. With the support of several Governments and international organizations, UNPREDEP had initiated a number of development projects, which had played a significant role in promoting mutual confidence and goodwill across society. The Special Representative continued to coordinate all UN activities in the country and to ensure cooperation with regional organizations monitoring developments in the area. In its monitoring of the border areas, the civilian police component of the mission was providing a unique tool for liaison with judicial and police authorities and with the population of the country, including the ethnic minorities. In addition, a special project on crime prevention and criminal justice had been initiated, which included a training programme for the local police. The UNPREDEP public information component had developed and implemented a programme to raise local and international awareness about the activities of the first UN preventive deployment operation.

Describing recent developments in FYROM, the Secretary-General stated that inter-ethnic relations within the country had suffered a setback as a result of a controversy over the public display of flags of national minorities. On 9 July, the Government had launched a massive law-enforcement operation in Gostivar to remove Albanian and Turkish flags from the front of the municipal building. During clashes with the police, three demonstrators died and many were wounded in what appeared to be excessive use of force by government special police forces. In response to severe criticism of the police action, the Government established a ministerial commission to investigate the events. The commission presented its report to the National Assembly, which would consider it after the summer recess. A few days before the Gostivar incident, a unification congress of two major ethnic Albanian opposition parties called for parallel governmental structures, autonomous institutions, a pan-Albanian parliament and ethnic regionalization. The appearance of black-shirted paramilitary guards during the congress was a disquieting manifestation of ethnic extremism.

The Secretary-General noted that the situation in neighbouring Albania had improved since the parliamentary elections there (see below). The underlying justification for extending the UNPREDEP mandate prior to that crisis had been to prevent conflicts elsewhere in the former Yugoslavia from spilling over or threatening FYROM. It was evident that the situation in FYROM was still intimately linked to the overall situation in the region, particularly at its borders. However, the country's relations with its neighbours had continued to strengthen, as had its relations with other members of the international community. Internally, however, economic and social problems continued to pose a significant threat to the country's integration and long-term stability and further exacerbated inter-ethnic tensions. Those problems gave rise to the question of whether the current mandate of UNPREDEP was relevant to the existing situation and whether it could be implemented with fewer resources. It seemed advisable to the Secretary-General to pursue the implementation of the Council's decision to start, as at 1 October, a two-month phased reduction of the military component of UNPREDEP by 300 all ranks, bearing in mind the conditions prevailing at that time in the region. He had instructed his staff to consult with the Government of FYROM and other interested parties on the type of international presence that would be appropriate after 1 December 1997.

Communications (August, November). In a 21 August letter [S/1997/654] to the Secretary-General, Albania expressed regret that there were some inaccurate statements in the Secretary-General's August report. According to Albania's information, during the unification congress of two ethnic Albanian political parties in Tetovo, FYROM, no resolution or statement was released by the leaders or on their behalf calling for parallel government structures, autonomous institutions or a pan-Albanian parliament and ethnic regionalization. Albania stressed that the full integration and equal participation of the Albanian population in the life of FYROM was crucial for the stability and for the very existence of that country.

In a 27 August letter [A/52/301-S/1997/668] to the Secretary-General, FYROM expressed surprise and disappointment at the content of Albania's letter of 17 July (see above). FYROM stated that Albania had wrongly located the legal basis of the action of the State authorities in Gostivar on 9 July and had misinterpreted the law of FYROM. The Albanian minority in FYROM, represented by its political parties, had all along participated in the political decision-making process in the Parliament of the country and the largest party of the Albanian minority—the Party for Democratic Prosperity—had voted for the adoption of the Law on the Use of Flags of the National Minorities. FYROM underlined that the legal basis for the action taken by the Ministry of Interior, to remove the illegal flags, had been the order of the Constitutional Court of the country. The Court also abolished decisions previously taken by the city assemblies of Tetovo and Gostivar, which enabled permanent flying in front of the municipal buildings of the national flags of Albania and Turkey. The events that followed the removal of the flags were obvious results of the political manipulation of certain political groups of the Albanian minority. FYROM explained that the recently adopted Law on the Use of Flags guaranteed the right to unrestricted use of the flags of the country's minorities for private purposes and at public institutions during State holidays.

On 3 November [S/1997/838 & Corr.1], FYROM transmitted to the Secretary-General a letter from its Minister for Foreign Affairs, in which he described the most recent developments in the region, particularly in Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Kosovo and Montenegro. The Minister concluded that those sources of destabilization would require a longer period to be resolved and that the presence of UNPREDEP until the end of that period, which could last for 12 months, was necessary.

In a 10 November letter to the Security Council President [S/1997/890], the Secretary-General, referring to Council resolution 845 (1993) [YUN 1993, p. 209] concerning the difference between Greece and FYROM with regard to the latter State's name, informed the Council that his Personal Envoy, Cyrus Vance, was continuing his mission of good offices and that the most recent meeting between the parties had taken place on 2 October. The Secretary-General also informed the Council that, following a personal request by Mr. Vance and with the consent of the parties, he had decided to appoint Matthew Nimetz (United States) as Deputy to his Personal Envoy. Mr. Nimetz would chair the continuing talks between Greece and FYROM. On 14 November [S/1997/891], the Council President informed the Secretary-General that the Council had taken note of his decision.

Report of Secretary-General (November). In his report of 20 November [S/1997/911 & Add.1], the Secretary-General described developments in FYROM since his August report. In accordance with Council resolution 1110 (1997), the two-month phased reduction of the UNPREDEP military component by 300 all ranks commenced on 1 October and would be completed by 30 November. By the end of the troop drawdown, the total number of observation posts, manned by the Nordic and United States battalions, would be reduced from 19 to 8, all of which would be situated at the most sensitive border points. The Secretary-General felt that the troop reduction of 300 could be considered as the start of a phased exit in response to the improved situation in the region.

With regard to recent developments in the region, the Secretary-General noted that there had been a further gradual improvement of relations between FYROM and some of its neighbours. Although the name-related dispute with Greece remained unsolved, both countries were continuing negotiations under the auspices of the Secretary-General's Personal Envoy. Economic relations between the two countries had intensified significantly, as had cross-border traffic. The situation along the Albanian border had been characterized by a number of incidents, including exchanges of fire. Although some improvement in the exercise of authority by Albanian border personnel had been observed, there had been a number of incidents where UN personnel had been exposed to indiscriminate firing by individuals along the border. There had been little progress regarding the demarcation of the border with FRY, but border patrols of both sides appeared to honour their commitment to avoid hostile actions.

Regarding the domestic situation, the Secretary-General noted that inter-ethnic tensions and socio-economic difficulties continued to affect negatively the strengthening of the country's stability. The political scene continued to reflect strains between the ruling coalition and the opposition parties, which were calling for early elections. An inter-party dialogue on issues most vital to the nation, initiated by the President of the Republic, was the most positive development of recent months.

The Secretary-General stated that peace and stability in FYROM continued to depend largely on developments in other parts of the region. In that regard, concerns had emerged over the uncertainty of the outcome of the presidential elections in Serbia. Increased violence in Kosovo had also raised fears of a spillover effect on ethnic Albanians in FYROM. The slow progress in implementing the civilian aspects of the Dayton-Paris Peace Agreement in Bosnia and Herzegovina, particularly in the Republika Srpska, had underscored the need for a long-term commitment by the international community in that country. The Secretary-General stressed that, once the UNPREDEP operation terminated, proper successor arrangements had to be put in place to reassure the Government of the international community's continued commitment to peace and stability in the country. The Council might wish, the Secretary-General suggested, to observe the effectiveness of the initial reduction of the military component by 300 before contemplating its next step. In any event, any further downsizing could hardly be implemented before the spring of 1998 due to the severe winter conditions. In the meantime, the Secretary-General recommended extending the UNPREDEP mandate for an additional six-month period until 31 May 1998. The addendum to the Secretary-General's report addressed the financial aspect of his recommendation.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (November/December)

On 28 November [meeting 3836], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1140 (1997). The draft [S/1997/932] was prepared in consultations among Council members. In a statement before the vote, the Council President said that informal consultations were still continuing on some technical aspects of UNPREDEP's mandate. However, since that mandate would expire on 30 November, the Council's members had decided to adopt the current draft text to allow time to complete consultations.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 1110(1997) of 28 May 1997,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force for an additional period terminating on 4 December 1997;
2. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

On 4 December [meeting 3839], the Security Council continued its consideration of the Secretary-General's 20 November report (see above) and unanimously adopted resolution 1142(1997). The draft [S/1997/948] was sponsored by Costa Rica, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Portugal, the Russian Federation, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States.

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions concerning the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia, in particular resolutions 1105(1997) of 9 April 1997 and 1110(1997) of 28 May 1997,

Recalling also its resolutions 1101(1997) of 28 March 1997 and 1114(1997) of 19 June 1997, in which the Council expressed concern over the situation in Albania,

Reaffirming its commitment to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia,

Reiterating its appreciation for the important role played by the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force in contributing to the maintenance of peace and stability, and paying tribute to the personnel of the Force in the performance of their mandate,

Reiterating its call upon the Governments of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to implement in full their agreement of 8 April 1996, in particular regarding the demarcation of their mutual border,

Welcoming the phased reduction and restructuring of the troop strength of the Force, which has taken place pursuant to resolution 1110(1997),

Taking note of the letter dated 31 October 1997 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia to the Secretary-General, requesting the extension of the mandate of the Force.

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 20 November 1997 and the recommendations contained therein,

Taking note of the observation of the Secretary-General that there have been a number of positive developments in the overall situation in the area, in particular the stabilization of the situation in Albania, but that peace and stability in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia continue to depend largely on developments in other parts of the region,

Bearing in mind the intention of Member States and interested organizations to consider actively the instituting of possible alternatives to the Force,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force for a final period until 31 August 1998, with the withdrawal of the military component immediately thereafter;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council by 1 June 1998 on the modalities of the termination of the Force, including practical steps for the complete withdrawal of the military component immediately after 31 August 1998, and to submit recommendations on the type of international presence that would be most appropriate for the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia after 31 August 1998;

3. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Financing of UNPREDEP

At its resumed fifty-first session, the General Assembly had before it reports by the Secretary-General on the financing of UNPREDEP [A/51/508 & Corr.1 & Add.1-3]. The original cost of maintaining the Force for the period from 1 July 1996 to 30 June 1997 had been estimated at $52,351,500 gross ($50,835,900 net), said the report. However, due mainly to delays in deployment of civilian staff and a reduced provision for contingent-owned equipment, the updated cost estimates for that period amounted to $51,402,600 gross ($50,046,000 net), representing a 1.8 per cent decrease in gross terms. For the period 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998, the Secretary-General proposed a budget totalling $44,298,000 gross ($42,760,800 net), representing a 12.1 per cent decrease in gross terms compared to the resources allocated for the previous 12-month period. That was mainly due to a reduction in the Force's military strength and to reductions for vehicle spare parts, supplies and services, among other things. That proposed budget was later revised [A/51/508/Add.3] in light of Security Council resolution 1105(1997), in which the Council suspended the reduction of the UNPREDEP military component (see above).

That revision proposed a budget of $49,474,800 gross ($47,937,600 net) for the period from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998 and provided for the retention of the Force's military strength of 1,050 troops.

The Assembly also had before it reports of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions [A/51/872, A/51/910], in which it commented on the Secretary-General's proposed budget and on the financial performance report of UNPREDEP [A/51/508/Add.2] for the period from 1 January to 30 June 1996.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 13 June [meeting 101], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/51/712/Add.1], adopted resolution 51/154 B without vote [agenda item 155].

The General Assembly,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force and the related reports of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Recalling Security Council resolution 983(1995) of 31 March 1995, by which the Council decided that the United Nations Protection Force within the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia should be known as the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force, and Council resolution 1110(1997) of 28 May 1997, in which the Council extended the mandate of the Force to 30 November 1997,

Recalling also its decision 50/481 of 11 April 1996 on the financing of the Force and its subsequent resolutions thereon, the latest of which was resolution 51/154 A of 16 December 1996,

Reaffirming that the costs of the Force are expenses of the Organization to be borne by Member States in accordance with Article 17, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations,

Recalling its previous decisions regarding the fact that, in order to meet the expenditures caused by the Force, a different procedure is required from that applied to meet expenditures of the regular budget of the United Nations,

Taking into account the fact that the economically more developed countries are in a position to make relatively larger contributions and that the economically less developed countries have a relatively limited capacity to contribute towards such an operation,

Bearing in mind the special responsibilities of the States permanent members of the Security Council, as indicated in General Assembly resolution 1874(S-IV) of 27 June 1963, in the financing of such operations,

Noting with appreciation that voluntary contributions have been made to the Force by certain Governments,

Mindful of the fact that it is essential to provide the Force with the necessary financial resources to enable it to fulfil its responsibilities under the relevant resolutions of the Security Council,

1. Takes note of the status of contributions to the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force as at 15 May 1997, including the contributions outstanding in the amount of 7.8 million United States dollars, representing 15 per cent of the total assessed contributions from the inception of the Force to the period ending 30 June 1997, notes that some 23 per cent of the Member States have paid their assessed contributions in full, and urges all other Member States concerned, in par-particular those in arrears, to ensure the payment of their outstanding assessed contributions;

2. Expresses concern about the financial situation with regard to peacekeeping activities, in particular as regards the reimbursement of troop contributors, which bear burdens owing to overdue payments by Member States of their assessments;

3. Expresses its appreciation to those Member States which have paid their assessed contributions in full;

4. Urges all other Member States to make every possible effort to ensure payment of their assessed contributions to the Force in full and on time;

5. Endorses the observations and recommendations contained in the reports of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions;

6. Approves, on an exceptional basis, the special arrangements for the Force with regard to the application of article IV of the financial regulations of the United Nations, whereby appropriations required in respect of obligations owed to Governments providing contingents and/or logistic support to the Force shall be retained beyond the period stipulated under financial regulations 4.3 and 4.4, as set out in the annex to the present resolution;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to take all necessary action to ensure that the Force is administered with a maximum of efficiency and economy;

8. Decides to appropriate to the Special Account for the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force the amount of 46,506,700 dollars gross (44,969,500 dollars net) for the maintenance of the Force for the period from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998, inclusive of the amount of 1,906,700 dollars for the support account for peacekeeping operations, to be assessed on Member States at a monthly rate of 4,283,892 dollars gross (4,142,192 dollars net) during the period from 1 July to 31 October 1997 and at a monthly rate of 3,671,392 dollars gross (3,550,092 dollars net) thereafter, in accordance with the composition of groups set out in paragraphs 3 and 4 of General Assembly resolution 43/232 of 1 March 1989, as adjusted by the Assembly in its resolutions 44/192 B of 21 December 1989, 45/269 of 27 August 1991, 46/198 A of 20 December 1991, 47/218 A of 23 December 1992, 49/249 A of 20 July 1995, 49/249 B of 14 September 1995, 50/224 of 11 April 1996 and 51/218 A and B of 18 December 1996 and its decisions 48/472 A of 23 December 1993 and 50/451 B of 23 December 1995, and taking into account the scale of assessments for the year 1997, as set out in its resolution 49/19 B of 23 December 1994 and its decision 50/471 A of 23 December 1995, and for the year 1998, subject to the decision of the Security Council to extend the mandate of the Force beyond 30 November 1997;

9. Decides also that, in accordance with the provisions of its resolution 973(X) of 15 December 1955, there shall be set off against the apportionment among Member States, as provided for in paragraph 8 above, their respective share in the Tax Equalization Fund of the estimated staff assessment income of 1,537,200 dollars approved for the Force for the period from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998;

10. Decides further that, for Member States that have fulfilled their financial obligations to the Force, there shall be set off against the apportionment, as provided for in paragraph 8 above, their respective share in the unencumbered balance of 5,259,700 dollars gross (5,070,300 dollars net) in respect of the period ending 30 June 1996;

11. Decides that, for Member States that have not fulfilled their financial obligations to the Force, their share of the unencumbered balance of 5,259,700 dollars gross (5,070,300 dollars net) for the period ending 30 June 1996 shall be set off against their outstanding obligations;

12. Invites voluntary contributions to the Force in cash and in the form of services and supplies acceptable to the Secretary-General, to be administered, as appropriate, in accordance with the procedure and practices established by the General Assembly;

13. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second session the item entitled "Financing of the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force".

By decision 52/456 of 22 December, the Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee, decided that the Committee should continue its consideration of the financing of UN-PREDEP at the resumed fifty-second (1998) session.

Albania

During the early months of 1997, following the collapse of a number of pyramid investment schemes, Albania suffered a severe general crisis that had economic, political and institutional dimensions. Massive unrest swept entire regions of the country and the ensuing chaos resulted in looting of weapons from military armouries, destruction of public and private property and the deaths of more than 1,500 people. The state of emergency proclaimed by the Albanian Parliament was not effective as many areas of the country were under rebel control and the humanitarian situation deteriorated as stocks of food, medicine and medical supplies became badly depleted. The crisis also had repercussions for neighbouring Italy as tens of thousands of Albanian refugees fled there.

Following Albania's appeal for assistance, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) supported Italy's initiative to create a multinational protection force to assist the Albanian authorities to deliver humanitarian assistance and create a secure environment for the international organizations working in the country. On 28 March, the Security Council authorized the deployment of such a force (known as Operation Alba), led by Italy, for an initial period of three months and requested the participating Member States to report to it on the force's activities at two-week intervals. By the beginning of May, the force, which ultimately comprised over 7,000 troops from 11 OSCE member States, was having a positive effect on the security situation in Albania. Commercial and industrial activities were resuming, schools had reopened and the curfew was reduced; however, armed bands were still active and organized crime and racketeering were creating obstacles to full resumption of economic and social life. On 19 June, the Council extended the force for another 45 days to provide a security framework for the Albanian elections.

On 14 August, the multinational force having withdrawn from Albania three days earlier, the Council considered the eleventh and final report on the operation of the force and held an open debate on the situation in Albania. Speaking before the Council, the Permanent Representative of Albania expressed his Government's profound thanks to the countries that had contributed to the force, stating that it had established safe zones for the distribution of humanitarian aid and had created a positive atmosphere of confidence and safety during the parliamentary elections. In a statement made on behalf of the Council, the President noted that the mandate of the force had been successfully fulfilled and encouraged the international community to assist and support the economic, social and institutional rehabilitation of Albania.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (13 March)

On 13 March [meeting 3751], the Security Council, at the request of Albania [S/1997/215] and Italy

[S/1997/214], met to consider the situation in Albania. Following consultations, the Council President made the following statement [S/PRST/1997/14] on behalf of the members:

The Security Council, having considered the letter dated 13 March 1997 to the President of the Council from the Permanent Representative of Albania to the United Nations and the letter dated 12 March 1997 to the President from the Permanent Representative of Italy to the United Nations, expresses its deep concern about the deteriorating situation in Albania. It urges all concerned to refrain from hostilities and acts of violence and to cooperate with diplomatic efforts to reach a peaceful solution to the crisis.

The Council calls upon the parties involved to continue the political dialogue and to live up to the commitments undertaken on 9 March 1997 in Tirana. It urges all political forces to work together to lower tension and facilitate the stabilization of the country.

The Council calls upon the parties not to impede the provision of humanitarian assistance to the civilian population and, in this context, recalls the importance of keeping open all means of communication in the country. It encourages Member States and international organizations to help with the provision of humanitarian assistance.

The Council stresses the importance of regional stability and fully supports the diplomatic efforts of the international community, in particular those of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and the European Union, to find a peaceful solution to the crisis.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to keep it informed of developments in the situation in Albania.

The Council will remain seized of the matter.

Communications (March). On 14 March [A/52/94-S/1997/230], the Netherlands transmitted to the Secretary-General a 7 March statement by the Presidency of the European Union (EU), made on the occasion of his visit to Albania, that expressed concern at the situation there and its possible implications for the region. The EU, while recognizing the need to restore law and order and deploring the violence that had occurred, stated that it expected maximum self-restraint from all sides and urged that further violence be avoided. The Albanian authorities and all other parties were called on to respect human rights, including minority rights, and fundamental freedoms. The Union urged Albania, as a member of OSCE, to cooperate fully with the Personal Representative of the OSCE Chairman during his forthcoming mission to Albania. The EU had always given strong support to the creation of a democratic Albania and continued to support that goal; however, that would require Albania's acceptance of the principles and practices of democracy.

By a letter of 17 March to the Secretary-General [S/1997/226], the Netherlands transmitted a declaration made that day by the EU Presidency stating that EU Ministers, at a meeting in Apeldoorn, Netherlands (15-16 March), noted the request of the new Albanian Government for EU assistance. The Union took note of a number of elements, including that consultations should take place on the need for a Security Council resolution. The Presidency would send a high-level mission to Tirana, comprising also representatives of OSCE, the European Commission, Greece and Italy. In a further letter of 24 March [S/1997/251], the Netherlands drew attention to the conclusions of the EU Council of the same day, in which, following consideration of the report of the EU mission that had visited Albania, it had established an Advisory Mission to Albania to advise on humanitarian, economic, political and security-related developments.

On 27 March [S/1997/258], Italy informed the Secretary-General that the humanitarian situation in Albania continued to deteriorate, requiring prompt action by the international community. The OSCE Permanent Council had adopted a decision establishing the conditions for launching a prompt and complex effort to assist Albania. Italy was promoting the creation of a multinational protection force, the objective of which was to help create a safe and secure environment for international organizations to provide support in areas of international assistance. Italy was ready to take the lead in organizing and commanding a temporary humanitarian operation for Albania.

By a 28 March letter [S/1997/259], Albania informed the Council President that the situation in the country remained serious. Government control and law and order had yet to be achieved in a significant part of the country and a matter of grave concern was the humanitarian situation, which was further aggravated because of lack of security and the increasing need for basic humanitarian goods. In response to an official appeal by the Albanian Government, OSCE had agreed to support the offer of some member States to participate in a military or police force to protect humanitarian activities in Albania. Albania stated that the force would stay in the country until the conditions on the ground made it possible for the Government to ensure the safe delivery of humanitarian goods and until the forthcoming elections. Albania appealed to the Council to authorize promptly the deployment of such a force.

Annexed to Albania's letter was updated information on the Albanian crisis, the decision of the OSCE Permanent Council adopted on 27 March and the conclusions of the meeting of the EU Council held on 24 March.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (March)

On 28 March [meeting 3758], the Security Council adopted resolution 1101(1997) by vote (14-0-1), based on a draft [S/1997/260], orally revised, sponsored by Albania, Austria, Belgium, France, Greece, Italy, Poland, Portugal, the Republic of Korea, Romania, Spain, Sweden, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States, subsequently joined by Denmark, Finland, Germany, Ireland and the Netherlands.

The Security Council,

Taking note of the letter of 28 March 1997 from the Permanent Representative of Albania to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council,

Taking note also of the letter of 27 March 1997 from the Permanent Representative of Italy to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General,

Taking note further of decision No. 160 of 27 March 1997 of the Permanent Council of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, including the decision to provide the coordinating framework within which other international organizations can play their part in their respective areas of competence,

Recalling the statement of the President of the Security Council of 13 March 1997 on the situation in Albania, Reiterating its deep concern over the deteriorating situation in Albania,

Underlining the need for all concerned to refrain from hostilities and acts of violence, and reiterating its call to the parties involved to continue the political dialogue,

Stressing the importance of regional stability, and in this context fully supporting the diplomatic efforts of the international community to find a peaceful solution to the crisis, in particular those of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and the European Union,

Affirming the sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity of the Republic of Albania,

Determining that the present situation of crisis in Albania constitutes a threat to peace and security in the region,

1. Condemns all acts of violence, and calls for their immediate end;

2. Welcomes the offer made by certain Member States to establish a temporary and limited multinational protection force to facilitate the safe and prompt delivery of humanitarian assistance and to help create a secure environment for the missions of international organizations in Albania, including those providing humanitarian assistance;

3. Welcomes also the offer by a Member State, contained in its letter, to take the lead in organizing and commanding the temporary multinational protection force, and takes note of all the objectives contained in that letter;

4. Authorizes the Member States participating in the multinational protection force to conduct the operation in a neutral and impartial way to achieve the objectives set out in paragraph 2 above, and, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, further authorizes those Member States to ensure the security and freedom of movement of the personnel of the multinational protection force;

5. Calls upon all those concerned in Albania to cooperate with the multinational protection force and international humanitarian agencies for the safe and prompt delivery of humanitarian assistance;

6. Decides that the operation shall be limited to a period of three months from the adoption of the present resolution, at which time the Council will assess the situation on the basis of the reports referred to in paragraph 9 below;

7. Also decides that the cost of implementing this temporary operation shall be borne by the participating Member States;

8. Encourages the Member States participating in the multinational protection force to cooperate closely with the Government of Albania, the United Nations, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, the European Union and all international organizations involved in rendering humanitarian assistance in Albania;

9. Requests the Member States participating in the multinational protection force to provide periodic reports to the Council, at least every two weeks, through the Secretary-General, the first such report to be made no later than fourteen days after the adoption of the present resolution, inter alia, specifying the parameters and modalities of the operation on the basis of consultations between those Member States and the Government of Albania;

10. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

VOTE ON RESOLUTION 1101(1997):

In favour: Chile, Costa Rica, Egypt, France, Guinea-Bissau, Japan, Kenya, Poland, Portugal, Republic of Korea, Russian Federation, Sweden, United Kingdom, United States.

Against: None.

Abstain: China.

Speaking before the vote, China said that although it supported the international community's efforts to settle the question, the situation was an internal affair. For the Council to authorize action in a country because of internal strife was inconsistent with the Charter. However, in view of Albania's request for assistance, China would not stand in the way of the resolution's adoption.

Reports on multinational protection force (April-June). In response to the request contained in resolution 1101(1997), the Secretary-General transmitted to the Security Council every two weeks reports submitted by Italy on the multinational protection force for Albania. The first report, dated 9 April [S/1997/296], specified the parameters and modalities of the operation on the basis of consultations between the Member States participating in the force and the Government of Albania. It was foreseen that the force would consist of some 6,000 troops. Austria, Denmark, France, Greece, Italy, Romania, Spain and Turkey had committed to contribute to it. The force's political guidance would be provided by a Steering Committee, which would keep in close contact with the Government of Albania. The Steering Committee would also liaise closely with the United Nations, OSCE and the EU as well as with all international organizations involved in humanitarian assistance to Albania.

The second report [S/1997/335] summarized the first week of operations in Albania, noting that the overall situation had been relatively quiet and the deployment of the force had affected the security situation in a positive manner. Tensions had decreased and few clashes were being recorded. The local police were slowly regaining control, some schools had reopened and commercial activities were resuming. However, some local incidents had been reported, with casualties among civilians. The general attitude of the population towards the force was positive. Further improvements in the situation were noted in the third [S/1997/362], fourth [S/1997/392] and fifth [S/1997/440] reports as public institutions slowly restarted their activities. However, illegal activities by armed gangs persisted and some violence appeared to be politically motivated. Isolated shootings, mostly not aimed at the force, had caused casualties among the civilian population. As at 4 June, the force comprised 6,365 men from 10 countries (Austria, Denmark, France, Greece, Italy, Portugal, Romania, Slovenia, Spain and Turkey).

The sixth report [S/1997/460] was a special one that referred to the modalities of the force's presence after 28 June, the date when the force was due to withdraw and the day before the planned elections in Albania. The Steering Committee had met on 10 June to consider several requests by the Albanian authorities for the force to remain during the electoral process to help ensure a safe and secure environment for the OSCE monitoring teams. The Steering Committee therefore recommended that the force's mandate, contained in resolution 1101(1997), be extended to cover the completion of the electoral process and in any event not longer than 45 days after the termination of the original mandate.

Communication (June). In a 16 June letter addressed to the Council President [S/1997/464], Albania expressed appreciation for the prompt Council action that had led to the creation of the multinational protection force. Although major improvements had taken place in the field of public order, numerous challenges still existed and a serious threat remained for public security in certain areas in the light of the upcoming parliamentary elections, which were crucial for the future of the country. The Government of Albania therefore requested that the force be extended for another three months.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (June)

On 19 June [meeting 3791], the Secretary-General adopted resolution 1114(1997) by vote (14-0-1), based on a draft [S/1997/472] sponsored by Albania, Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Poland, Portugal, the Republic of Korea, Romania, Spain, Sweden, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 1101(1997) of 28 March 1997,

Recalling also the statement by its President of 13 March 1997 on the situation in Albania,

Taking note of the letter dated 16 June 1997 from the Permanent Representative of Albania to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council,

Taking note also of the sixth report to the Council on the operation of the multinational protection force in Albania,

Taking note further of decision No. 160 of 27 March 1997 of the Permanent Council of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, including the decision to provide the coordinating framework within which other international organizations can play their part in their respective areas of competence,

Expressing its appreciation for the neutral and impartial way in which the mandate of the Council has been carried out by the multinational protection force, in close cooperation with the Albanian authorities,

Reiterating its concern over the situation in Albania,

Underlining the need for all concerned to refrain from hostilities and acts of violence, and calling on the parties involved to continue the political dialogue and facilitate the electoral process,

Stressing the importance of regional stability, and in this context fully supporting the diplomatic efforts of the international community, particularly the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and the European Union, to find a peaceful solution to the crisis and assist in the electoral process in Albania, in cooperation with the Albanian authorities,

Noting the need over a short period of time, as underlined in the sixth report on the operation of the multinational protection force in Albania, for a limited increase in the contingent originally planned, for the purpose of protecting the mission of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, especially in view of the planned elections,

Reaffirming the sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity of the Republic of Albania,

Determining that the present situation in Albania constitutes a threat to peace and security in the region,

1. Condemns all acts of violence, and calls for their immediate end;

2. Welcomes the readiness of the countries contributing to the multinational protection force to maintain their military contingents in Albania for a limited time as part of the multinational protection force in the framework of the mandate provided by resolution 1101(1997);

3. Welcomes also the intention of the countries contributing to the multinational protection force to continue, within the framework of the mandate provided by resolution 1101(1997), to facilitate the safe and prompt delivery of humanitarian assistance and to help create a secure environment for the missions of international organizations in Albania, including those providing humanitarian assistance, and takes note of all the elements contained in the sixth report to the Council on the operation of the multinational protection force in Albania, concerning, inter alia, the electoral monitoring mission of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe/Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights;

4. Authorizes the Member States participating in the multinational protection force to conduct the operation in a neutral and impartial way to achieve the objectives set out in paragraph 3 above and acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, further authorizes those Member States to ensure the security and freedom of movement of the personnel of the multinational protection force;

5. Calls upon all those concerned in Albania to cooperate with the multinational protection force and with the missions of the international organizations;

6. Decides that the operation shall be limited to a period of forty-five days from 28 June 1997, at which time the Council will assess the situation on the basis of the reports referred to in paragraph 9 below;

7. Also decides that the cost of implementing this temporary operation will be borne by the participating Member States;

8. Encourages the Member States participating in the multinational protection force to cooperate closely with the Government of Albania, the United Nations, the Organization of Security and Cooperation in Europe, the European Union and all international organizations involved in rendering humanitarian assistance in Albania;

9. Requests the Member States participating in the multinational protection force to provide periodic reports to the Council through the Secretary-General, at least every two weeks, the first such report to be made no later than fourteen days after the adoption of this resolution, inter alia, specifying the parameters and modalities of the operation on the basis of consultations between those Member States and the Government of Albania;

10. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

VOTE ON RESOLUTION 1114(1997):

In favour: Chile, Costa Rica, Egypt, France, Guinea-Bissau, Japan, Kenya, Poland, Portugal, Republic of Korea, Russian Federation, Sweden, United Kingdom, United States.

Against: None.

Abstain: China.

Reports on multinational protection force (June-August). The seventh biweekly report, dated 28 June [S/1997/501], stated that the situation in Albania remained tense with continuing clashes between rival gangs resulting in casualties, especially in the south of the country. The force had been involved in some incidents, including the freeing of OSCE monitors who had been taken hostage and intervention in the case of a humanitarian convoy that had been attacked by an armed gang. The force was committed to helping to create a secure environment and the best possible conditions for holding regular and fair elections. Belgium became the eleventh country to contribute to the force.

The eighth report [S/1997/513] noted that the first round in the Albanian elections had taken place on 29 June and had generally run smoothly, given the local circumstances. Before and during the electoral process, the force had extended its deployment virtually throughout the country, increased its strength to 7,215 units and provided protection to OSCE monitoring teams, either indirectly, within the enlarged security framework, or directly, providing escorts on a case-by-case basis. Despite growing tensions on the eve of the elections, no incidents involving OSCE monitors were reported on election day. Some violence did occur, however, specifically the killing of a political leader that may have been linked to the elections. The force had to intervene in two cases of stolen ballot papers and in two cases where armed gangs surrounded polling stations at the end of the voting process.

The ninth report [S/1997/551] covered the second round of voting, which took place on 6 and 13 July. Prior to the elections, on 4 July, the force had moved to protect OSCE monitoring teams at the headquarters of the Central Electoral Commission in Tirana when gunshots were fired, leaving one dead and several wounded. The 6 July elections passed relatively smoothly, although the voting had to be suspended temporarily in some cases. At one polling station, an electoral officer was killed and two were injured when a gunman opened fire. The final voting operations on 13 July took place without incident. The tenth biweekly report [S/1997/601] set out the operational plan for the withdrawal of the force at the end of the mission (12 August), the duration of which had been limited by the Security Council.

The eleventh and final report on the multinational protection force for Albania [S/1997/632] stated that the force's withdrawal was completed on 11 August. The force, which comprised units from 11 countries, with Italy as the lead nation, had facilitated the safe and prompt delivery of humanitarian assistance and helped create a secure environment during the electoral process, the report said. The force carried out 1,598 missions, covering a total of 2,735,764 kilometres. Its activities included 1,397 daily escorts, 65 route security missions, 27 dedicated escorts for long humanitarian missions, 151 reconnaissance missions and 37 sanitary missions. During the elections the force provided security to 238 OSCE teams. Within the security framework provided by the force, humanitarian aid was distributed to 73 locations. The report concluded that, as a result of Operation Alba, it was hoped that a dramatic page of Albanian history had been turned. A new phase had to start without delay, focusing on the rehabilitation of state institutions and the return of the country to an orderly social, political and economic condition. An international conference was held in Rome on 31 July in preparation for a ministerial conference and a donors' conference in the autumn.

Communications (August). In a 5 August letter [S/1997/614] to the Security Council President, Italy expressed the view that it would be appropriate for the Council to conduct a thorough discussion of the results of the multinational protection force in Albania. Italy requested that an open meeting of the Council be held upon the expiration of the force's mandate.

That request was supported by Albania in an 8 August letter to the Council President [S/1997/628].

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (August)

On 14 August [meetings 3811 & 3812], the Security Council, at the request of Albania [S/1997/628] and Italy [S/1997/614], met to consider the results of the multinational protection force in Albania. In accordance with rule 37 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure, Albania, Denmark, Germany, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, Romania, Slovenia, Spain, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and Turkey were invited, at their request, to participate in the discussion.

Following consultations, the Council President made the following statement [S/PRST/1997/44] on behalf of the members:

The Security Council has considered the eleventh and last report of the operation of the multinational protection force in Albania of 11 August 1997, submitted pursuant to the requirement set out in paragraph 9 of resolution 1114(1997).

The Council notes with appreciation that the mandate of the multinational protection force, as set out in its resolutions 1101(1997) and 1114(1997), has been fulfilled successfully. The presence of the multinational protection force has contributed to the facilitation of safe and prompt delivery of humanitarian assistance in Albania. Its presence has also helped to create a secure environment for the missions of international organizations in Albania, as part of the efforts of the international community, particularly the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and the European Union, to find a peaceful solution to the crisis and to assist international organizations in their role in the electoral process in close cooperation with the Albanian authorities.

The Council recognizes the role played by the multinational protection force and the Governments of the participating countries under Italian leadership in the full discharge of the mandate in assisting the Albanian authorities and the international organizations involved.

The Council is of the view that the Albanian people and their authorities bear the primary responsibility for the future of Albania and for restoring normal conditions in the country. The necessary international assistance will be conditional upon Albania's own efforts at achieving reconciliation, security, rehabilitation and economic reform.

In this respect, the Council encourages the international community to assist and support the economic, social and institutional rehabilitation of Albania and welcomes the steps that have already been taken in this direction, including the preparatory meetings for the ministerial conference to be held in Rome in autumn 1997.

Georgia

The United Nations, in consultation with the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), and with the Russian Federation as facilitator, renewed its efforts to revitalize the Georgian/Abkhaz peace process in 1997. High-level talks on the conflict were convened by the Secretary-General in Geneva in July and November to map out areas where concrete political progress could be made. All sides agreed to the strengthening of United Nations involvement in the peace process and approved a programme of action and a mechanism for doing so, including the establishment of a Coordinating Council. Discussions between the Georgian and Abkhaz sides on the draft protocol proposed by the Russian Federation for a Georgian-Abkhaz settlement also continued. During the year, the two sides also maintained bilateral negotiations in their efforts to maintain the momentum of the peace process and cooperation in a number of areas.

The Security Council, in November, regretted that, despite strenuous efforts to reactivate the peace process, there had been no visible progress on the future political status of Abkhazia and the permanent return of refugees and displaced persons. It called on the Secretary-General to continue his efforts to that end and on the parties to cooperate fully with those efforts. The Council extended the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia (UNOMIG) twice during the year. The second six-month extension was to terminate on 31 January 1998.

With effect from 1 July, the Secretary-General appointed Liviu Bota (Romania) as his resident Special Representative for Georgia to succeed his Special Envoy for Georgia, Edouard Brunner (Switzerland), who had carried out that function for four years.

UN Observer Mission in Georgia

The United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia, established by Security Council resolution 858(1993) [YUN 1993, p. 509], continued in 1997 to monitor and verify compliance with the 1994 Agreement on a Ceasefire and Separation of Forces [YUN 1994, p. 583] and to fulfil other tasks as mandated by the Security Council in resolution 937(1994) [Ibid., p. 584]. The Mission operated in close collaboration with the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) peacekeeping force that had been in the zone of conflict, at the request of the parties, since 1994 [Ibid., p. 583]. The Council extended the Mission's mandate twice during the year, the first time until 31 July 1997 (resolution 1096(1997)) and the second until 31 January 1998 (resolution 1124(1997)).

On 8 April, the Security Council agreed [S/1997/292] to the Secretary-General's appointment [S/1997/291] of Major-General Harun Ar-Rashid (Bangladesh) to succeed Major-General Per Källström (Sweden) as Chief Military Observer of UNOMIG as of 1 May. On 12 June, the Council agreed [S/1997/450] to his appointment [S/1997/449] of Liviu Bota (Romania) to succeed Edouard Brunner (Switzerland) as his Special Representative for Georgia and Head of Mission with effect from 1 July. Mr. Bota was based in Tbilisi and Sukhumi.

Composition

Under the command of Chief Military Observer Major-General Källström until the end of April and under Major-General Ar-Rashid thereafter, UNOMIG, as at 9 January, maintained a strength of 125 military observers drawn from 23 countries, compared to its authorized strength of 136. By 24 October, that strength had been further reduced to 109 to accommodate an engineering unit that would undertake mine-detection and -clearing operations.

In addition to its main headquarters in Sukhumi (Abkhazia, Georgia), UNOMIG maintained an administrative headquarters in Pit-sunda, a liaison office in the Georgian capital of Tbilisi and team bases and a sector headquarters in each of the Gali and Zugdidi sectors. A team base in the Kodori valley was manned by observers operating from Sukhumi.

Activities

Report of Secretary-General (January). In response to a Security Council request contained in resolution 1065(1996) [YUN 1996, p. 356] for him to report regularly on the situation in Abkhazia, including the UNOMIG operation, the Secretary-General submitted a 20 January 1997 report [S/1997/47] containing updated information and recommendations regarding the peacemaking process and UN role after the expiry of the UNOMIG mandate on 31 January. He stated that key issues of the Georgian/Abkhaz peace process, such as the future political status of Abkhazia and the return of refugees and displaced persons, remained unresolved. However, the desirability of a political solution had been underlined in the increasingly frequent direct contacts between the two parties, the latest of which was an 8 January meeting in Gagra between the Foreign Minister of Georgia, Irakli Menagarishvili, and the Abkhaz leader, Vladislav Ardzinba, accompanied by the Abkhaz "Foreign Minister", Konstantin Ozgan. Both sides stated that the meeting had been useful, though it had not produced any concrete results. They discussed a visit by their respective speakers of parliament to Sukhumi and Tbilisi and a possible meeting between Georgian President Eduard Shevardnadze and Mr. Ardzinba, and closer co-operation on the Inguri power station issue. There had also been a number of meetings between representatives of the Georgian and Russian Governments.

The situation in the Gali security and restricted weapons zones remained unsettled and acts of violence increased, especially the indiscriminate laying of mines. The situation in the Zugdidi sector was also tense at times. Several murders, kidnappings, attacks, explosions and acts of looting had been reported. Both sides continued to violate the Moscow Agreement of 14 May 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 583]; between 10 September 1996 and 9 January 1997, UNOMIG reported 8 such violations by the Abkhaz side and 172 by the Georgian side.

The Secretary-General expressed his intention to initiate contacts with the two sides to assist them in unblocking the peace process. He would also discuss with the Russian authorities the modalities of cooperation between the United Nations and the Russian Federation, in its capacity as facilitator in the Georgian/Abkhaz peace process. In order to revitalize the UN role in the peace process, the Secretary-General proposed initiating UN-led expert meetings at the local level, covering fields such as energy, transportation and communications. UN-led negotiations on the future political status of Abkhazia within the territorial integrity of Georgia could also be resumed.

The Secretary-General recommended a further six-month extension of the UNOMIG mandate until 31 July. Should the Council authorize such an extension, he said, the monthly maintenance cost of UNOMIG until 30 June would be limited to the appropriation contained in General Assembly resolution 50/237 [YUN 1996, p. 360] (equivalent to $1,424,100 per month).

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (January)

The Security Council met on 30 January to consider the Secretary-General's report. Also before it was a 21 January letter from Georgia [S/1997/57] transmitting the provisions of the final document of the December 1996 Lisbon summit of OSCE that pertained to the situation in Georgia and a 24 January letter from Georgia [S/1997/75] transmitting a letter from the Chairman of the Supreme Council of Abkhazia, who condemned the appeals of the Abkhaz separatist leadership for economic aid and the lifting of restrictions imposed by Georgia to prevent the influx of illegal cargoes, mercenaries, narcotics and arms. Georgia also transmitted a 30 January statement [S/1997/95] stressing the importance of intensifying direct contacts with the Abkhaz side, despite the failure so far of those attempts or international efforts to thaw the situation. It also expressed its belief that the Security Council would continue to revive the peace process and give it new impetus.

On the same day [meeting 3735], the Council unanimously adopted resolution 1096(1997). The draft [S/1997/93] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its relevant resolutions, in particular resolution 1065(1996) of 12 July 1996, and recalling the statement by its President of 22 October 1996,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 20 January 1997,

Acknowledging the efforts in support of the peace process of the Secretary-General and his Special Envoy, the Russian Federation as facilitator, and the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General on Georgia, as mentioned in the report,

Noting with deep concern the continued failure by the parties to resolve their differences due to the uncompromising position taken by the Abkhaz side, and underlining the necessity for the parties to intensify without delay their efforts, under the auspices of the United Nations and with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator, to achieve an early and comprehensive political settlement of the conflict, including on the political status of Abkhazia within the State of Georgia, which fully respects the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia,

Noting the opening of the United Nations Human Rights Office in Abkhazia, Georgia,

Reaffirming the necessity for the parties strictly to respect human rights, and expressing its support for the efforts of the Secretary-General to find ways to improve their observance as an integral part of the work towards a comprehensive political settlement,

Noting with concern recent frequent violations on both sides of the Agreement on a Ceasefire and Separation of Forces signed in Moscow on 14 May 1994, as well as acts of violence organized by armed groups operating from south of the Inguri river and beyond the control of the Government of Georgia,

Commending the contribution that the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia and the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States have made to stabilize the situation in the zone of conflict, noting that the cooperation between the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force has developed considerably, and stressing the importance of continued close cooperation and coordination between them in the performance of their respective mandates,

Deeply concerned at the continued deterioration of the security conditions in the Gali region, with an increase of acts of violence by armed groups, and indiscriminate laying of mines, including new types of mines, and deeply concerned also at the continued deterioration of the safety and security of the local populations, of the refugees and displaced persons returning to the region and of the personnel of the Mission and of the collective peacekeeping force,

Reminding the parties that the ability of the international community to assist them depends on their political will to resolve the conflict through dialogue and mutual accommodation, as well as their full cooperation with the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force, including the fulfilment of their obligations regarding the safety and freedom of movement of international personnel,

Taking note of the decision taken by the Council of Heads of State of the Commonwealth of Independent States on 17 October 1996 to expand the mandate of the collective peacekeeping force in the conflict zone in Abkhazia, Georgia, and to extend it until 31 January 1997,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 20 January 1997;

2. Reiterates its deep concern at the continued deadlock in achieving a comprehensive settlement of the conflict in Abkhazia, Georgia;

3. Reaffirms its commitment to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia, within its internationally recognized borders, and to the necessity of defining the status of Abkhazia in strict accordance with these principles, and underlines the unacceptability of any action by the Abkhaz leadership in contravention of these principles, in particular the holding on 23 November 1996 and 7 December 1996 of illegitimate and self-styled parliamentary elections in Abkhazia, Georgia;

4. Reaffirms its full support for an active role for the United Nations in the peace process, welcomes the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Envoy aimed at achieving a comprehensive political settlement of the conflict, including on the political status of

Abkhazia within the State of Georgia, which fully respects the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia, as well as the efforts that are being undertaken by the Russian Federation in its capacity as facilitator to continue to intensify the search for a peaceful settlement of the conflict, and encourages the Secretary-General to continue his efforts to that end, with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator, and with the support of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe;

5. Welcomes, in this context, the initiative of the Secretary-General, as outlined in his report, to strengthen the role of the United Nations in the peace process;

6. Calls upon the parties, in particular the Abkhaz side, to achieve substantive progress without further delay towards a comprehensive political settlement, and further calls upon them to cooperate fully with the efforts undertaken by the Secretary-General, with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator;

7. Welcomes the renewal of direct dialogue at a high level between the parties, calls upon them to intensify the search for a peaceful solution by further expanding their contacts, and requests the Secretary-General to make available all appropriate support if so requested by the parties;

8. Reaffirms the right of all refugees and displaced persons affected by the conflict to return to their homes in secure conditions in accordance with international law and as set out in the Quadripartite Agreement on Voluntary Return of Refugees and Displaced Persons of 4 April 1994, condemns the continued obstruction of that return, and stresses the unacceptability of any linkage of the return of refugees and displaced persons with the question of the political status of Abkhazia, Georgia;

9. Recalls the conclusions of the Lisbon summit of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe regarding the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia, and reaffirms the unacceptability of the demographic changes resulting from the conflict;

10. Reiterates its condemnation of killings, particularly those ethnically motivated, and other ethnically related acts of violence;

11. Reiterates its demand that the Abkhaz side accelerate significantly the process of voluntary return of refugees and displaced persons without delay or preconditions, in particular by accepting a timetable on the basis of that proposed by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, and further demands that it guarantee the safety of spontaneous returnees already in the area and regularize their status in cooperation with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and in accordance with the Quadripartite Agreement, in particular in the Gali region;

12. Welcomes, in this context, the holding of the meeting on 23 and 24 December 1996 in Gali on the resumption of the orderly repatriation of refugees and displaced persons, in particular to the Gali region, and calls upon the parties to continue these negotiations;

13. Calls upon the parties to ensure the full implementation of the Agreement on a Ceasefire and Separation of Forces, signed in Moscow on 14 May 1994;

14. Condemns the continued laying of mines, including new types of mines, in the Gali region, which has already caused several deaths and injuries among the civilian population and the peacekeepers and observers of the international community, and calls upon the parties to take all measures in their power to prevent the laying of mines and intensified activities by armed groups and to cooperate fully with the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia and the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States in order to honour their commitments to ensure the safety and the freedom of movement of all personnel of the United Nations, the collective peacekeeping force and international humanitarian organizations;

15. Urges the Secretary-General to take the necessary steps in response to the threat posed by the laying of mines in order to improve security conditions so as to minimize the danger to Mission personnel and to create conditions for the effective performance of the mandate of the Mission;

16. Decides to extend the mandate of the Mission for a new period terminating on 31 July 1997, subject to a review by the Council of the mandate of the Mission in the event of any changes that may be made in the mandate of the collective peacekeeping force;

17. Expresses its full support for the implementation of a concrete programme for the protection and promotion of human rights in Abkhazia, Georgia, notes, in this context, the opening on 10 December 1996 of the United Nations Human Rights Office in Abkhazia, Georgia, as part of the Mission, under the authority of the Head of Mission, and requests the Secretary-General to continue to pursue the necessary follow-up arrangements with the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and to continue close cooperation with the Government of Georgia;

18. Reiterates its encouragement to States to contribute to the voluntary fund in support of the implementation of the Moscow Agreement and/or for humanitarian aspects, including demining, as specified by donors;

19. Requests the Secretary-General to consider the means of providing technical and financial assistance aimed at the reconstruction of the economy of Abkhazia, Georgia, following the successful outcome of the political negotiations;

20. Also requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep the Council regularly informed, and to submit a report after three months from the date of the adoption of the present resolution on the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia, including on the operations of the Mission and to provide recommendations in that report on the nature of the United Nations presence, and in this context expresses its intention to conduct a thorough review of the operation at the end of its current mandate;

21. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Communications (February-April). By a 10 February letter [S/1997/117], Georgia informed the Secretary-General that President Shevardnadze, on 1 February, had issued a decree on the implementation of the above resolution. The decree ruled that the Ministries of Internal Affairs and of State Security should ensure compliance with the 1994 Moscow Agreement [YUN 1994, p. 583] by intensifying activities to prevent the laying of mines and penetration of illegal armed groups into the security zone. The decree ordered the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to prepare recommendations with a view to intensifying direct dialogue with the Abkhaz side and negotiations with the active participation of the United Nations and the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General on Georgia. The Foreign Ministry was also charged with ensuring close cooperation with the UN/OSCE joint Human Rights Office in Sukhumi. The decree further required that the Ministries of Finance and of Foreign Economic Relations elaborate a comprehensive plan for the post-conflict economic rehabilitation of Abkhazia, Georgia.

On 26 February [S/1997/154], Georgia reported a terrorist act carried out in the Gali region on 22 February, in which a nurse and two soldiers of the CIS peacekeeping force were killed. Georgia reiterated its position, reflected in the presidential decree of 1 February, that it would continue to ensure the safety of international observers and contribute to the comprehensive settlement of the dispute.

By a 1 April letter [S/1997/268], the Russian Federation transmitted to the Secretary-General the texts of instruments adopted by the CIS Council of Heads of State in Moscow on 28 March. The Council decided to extend the mandate of the CIS peacekeeping force in Abkhazia to 31 July. It also expanded the security zone and instructed the force's command to prepare a plan for redeploying the force in the Gali district and other measures for the organized return of refugees and displaced persons. The Council further instructed the Council of Ministers for Foreign Affairs and the Council of Ministers of Defence of CIS to amend the force's mandate, bearing in mind the change in the situation in the conflict zone.

Report of Secretary-General (April). The Secretary-General submitted a 25 April report [S/1997/340] updating information on the situation in Abkhazia since his 20 January report, including the operations of UNOMIG, and providing recommendations on the nature of the UN presence.

He stated that on 13 March the Chairman of the Georgian Parliament had informed him that the absence of progress in the settlement of the conflict, including the problem of the refugees and internally displaced persons, had created widespread dissatisfaction among the Georgian population and the country's leadership was increasingly being urged to take decisive action to resolve the conflict. Bilateral contacts between the two sides had continued. President Shevardnadze of Georgia and the Abkhaz leader, Mr. Ardzinba, agreed to establish a joint/bilateral commission chaired by senior representatives from both sides. Bilateral contacts at the working level had also taken place, most notably in early March in the Gali region when senior officials responsible for energy problems met to address issues related to the hydroelectric power station at Inguri-GES. In addition, the Russian Federation had contacted the two sides in February to spell out the goals of the negotiations and to decide on the machinery for the comprehensive settlement of the conflict. The talks focused on the draft text of a declaration, proposed by the Russian Federation, on the principles for a settlement and confidence-building measures between the parties to the conflict.

In February, the Ministries of Communication of Georgia and the Russian Federation signed an agreement by which all external telephone communications to and from Sukhumi would be routed through Tbilisi, instead of through the territory of the Russian Federation. The Abkhaz leadership protested that agreement and threatened to end all contacts with the Georgian side if the status quo ante was not restored. A number of European organizations had visited Georgia, as had non-governmental organizations and research institutions from a number of countries, in order to bring together Georgian and Abkhaz individuals in an effort to facilitate progress towards the political settlement of the conflict. The Group of Friends of the Secretary-General on Georgia (France, Germany, Russian Federation, United Kingdom, United States) also maintained contact with the parties to the conflict and with the Secretary-General's representatives. The Secretary-General was exploring ways to revive the UN role in the peace process and was pursuing modalities of cooperation between the United Nations and the Russian Federation, in its capacity as facilitator in the Georgian/Abkhaz peace process.

The United Nations Human Rights Office in Abkhazia, established in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 360], had begun its work and the Abkhaz authorities had shown readiness to work with it. The Office had already produced promising results, as reflected in the creation of a grass-roots organization for human rights and democracy in Abkhazia and the establishment by the Abkhaz leader, Mr. Ardzinba, of a human rights commission within his administration to cooperate with the UN Office. The Office had established contacts with the Government of Georgia and the Abkhaz authorities and with organizations concerned with human rights issues. A basic but systematic monitoring of human rights violations had commenced, focusing on compliance by the Abkhaz authorities with international human rights standards.

The situation in the Gali restricted weapons zone and, in particular, the security zone remained unsettled and tense. Acts of violence continued and had even increased during the first weeks of April. The most serious incident was the direct targeting of CIS peacekeepers, resulting in the death of three members of the force; 10 members were injured in separate incidents. UNOMIG personnel and property were also the victims of robbery and theft.

Despite the relatively high number of violations, both sides had generally complied with the 1994 Moscow Agreement during the preceding three months. UNOMIG reported 11 violations by the Abkhaz side and 56 by the Georgian side, most of them minor.

The Secretary-General stated that, in response to increased demand arising from a strengthened UN involvement in the peacemaking process, he planned to appoint, as a successor to his Special Envoy for Georgia, a resident Special Representative to be based in Tbilisi and Sukhumi. He intended to convene a meeting with both sides at an appropriate location to map out the areas where concrete political progress could be made. In the meantime, he was instructing his Deputy Special Envoy, Liviu Bota, to consult the Russian authorities further on the proposal to revitalize the Coordinating Commission, which would serve as the umbrella for the establishment of expert groups on energy, transportation and communications. He also intended to strengthen the political element of UNOMIG, by deploying throughout the mission area additional officers specialized in political, civil and legal affairs. He also planned to build upon the positive results recently achieved with the arrival of mine-protected vehicles and the resurfacing of the main roads to improve the safety of the military observers and the operational effectiveness of UNOMIG.

Communications (April). On 30 April [A/52/130-S/1997/345], Azerbaijan and Georgia transmitted to the Secretary-General the text of a 22 April resolution adopted by the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe. By the resolution, which concerned conflicts in Transcaucasia, including the situation in Georgia, the Council expressed the hope that the efforts of the parties concerned, the United Nations, OSCE and the Russian Federation would soon lead to an institutional balance acceptable to Tbilisi and Sukhumi so that the refugees could return and the populations of the region could resume their peaceful living conditions.

On 28 April [S/1997/339], Georgia transmitted a 23 April letter from President Shevardnadze to the Security Council President, drawing attention to the evidence provided by the State Commission for the Investigation of the Policy of Ethnic Cleansing/Genocide carried out against the Georgian Population in Abkhazia, Georgia [A/52/116-S/1997/317], which pointed to the Abkhaz separatist policy of forcibly altering the demographics of Abkhazia and to the grave atrocities committed in that process. The Commission's findings suggested that punitive measures against the perpetrators should be considered and that it would be desirable for the United Nations to send experts to Georgia to carry out a full examination of the crimes, including ethnic cleansing. Attention was also drawn to the decision of the CIS heads of State to move the peacekeeping forces deeper into the conflict zone. There were signs that the implementation of that operation was threatened, primarily because the separatist leadership opposed the return of the refugees and displaced persons and the restoration of the natural regional demographics. The Georgian President said that it was time to consider the combination of persuasion and coercion. It was imperative that the UN role in the solution of the conflict be invigorated and that plans be made for a comprehensive resolution of the conflict based on the principles of the United Nations and OSCE.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (May)

On 8 May [meeting 3774], the Security Council authorized its President to make the following statement [S/PRST/1997/25] on its behalf:

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 25 April 1997 concerning the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia. It has also taken note of the letter dated 1 April 1997 from the Permanent Representative of the Russian Federation to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General and of the letter dated 28 April 1997 from the Permanent Representative of Georgia to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council.

The Council reiterates its full support for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia within its internationally recognized borders.

The Council reaffirms its full support for a more active role for the United Nations, with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator, aimed at achieving a comprehensive political settlement.

The Council acknowledges the efforts in support of the peace process of the Secretary-General and his Special Envoy, with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator, and of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General on Georgia, as mentioned in the report of the Secretary-General of 25 April 1997.

In this context, the Council fully supports the proposals made by the Secretary-General in his report of 25 April 1997 to strengthen the involvement of the United Nations in the peacemaking process. It fully supports, in particular, the intention of the Secretary-General to convene a meeting with both sides to map out the areas where concrete political progress can be made. The Council encourages the Secretary-General to explore the idea of revitalizing the Coordinating Commission and establishing expert groups on questions of mutual interest.

The Council welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to appoint a resident Special Representative, as a successor to his current Special Envoy for Georgia, and to strengthen the political element of the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia.

The Council further encourages the Secretary-General to take such steps as are necessary, in cooperation with the parties, in order to ensure a prompt and safe return of the refugees and displaced persons to their homes, with the assistance of all relevant international organizations. The Council takes note of the initiation of activities by the United Nations Human Rights Office in Abkhazia, Georgia.

The Council continues to stress that the primary responsibility for reinvigorating the peace process rests upon the parties themselves. It welcomes the continuation of direct dialogue between the parties. The Council calls upon them, in particular the Abkhaz side, to intensify the search for a peaceful solution by further expanding their contacts, and requests the Secretary-General to make available all appropriate support if so requested by the parties. The Council notes the appeal of the Secretary-General to both parties to pursue the current discussions on the implementation of the decisions adopted by the Council of Heads of State of the Commonwealth of Independent States on 28 March 1997.

The Council remains deeply concerned at the continued deterioration of the security conditions in the Gali region, including acts of violence by armed groups, indiscriminate laying of mines and armed robbery, and the resulting deterioration of the safety and security of the local populations, of the refugees and displaced persons returning to the region, and of the personnel of the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States. The Council condemns the acts of violence which have led to the loss of life of members of the collective peacekeeping force. It welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to continue to make every effort to build upon the positive results recently achieved in order to improve the safety of the military observers and the operational effectiveness of the Mission.

The Council reminds the parties of their obligation to ensure the safety and freedom of movement of the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force and, in particular, to prevent the laying of mines.

The Council welcomes the good cooperation between the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force and their efforts to promote stabilization of the situation in the zone of conflict.

The Council also welcomes the continued efforts by the United Nations agencies and humanitarian organizations to address the urgent needs of those suffering most from the consequences of the conflict in Abkhazia, Georgia, in particular internally displaced persons, and encourages further contributions to that end. It also reiterates its encouragement to States to contribute to the voluntary fund in support of the implementation of the Agreement on a Ceasefire and Separation of Forces and/or for humanitarian aspects, including demining, as specified by donors.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep it closely informed of the situation.

Report of Secretary-General (July). In an 18 July report [S/1997/558], the Secretary-General stated that although the key issues of the Georgian/Abkhaz peace process, such as Abkhazia's future political status and the return of refugees, remained unresolved, vigorous efforts were being made by the United Nations, the Russian Federation, the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General on Georgia and OSCE to revitalize that process. Both parties to the conflict and the Russian Federation had expressed support for a more active role for the United Nations in the peace process. In particular, they had supported the Secretary-General's initiative to convene a high-level meeting on the conflict to map out areas where concrete political progress could be made (see below).

In May, a Russian delegation had visited Sukhumi to meet with Abkhaz leaders, and the Russian Federation had hosted intensive Georgian-Abkhaz consultations in Moscow in June on a draft Protocol on a Georgian-Abkhaz settlement, containing basic principles for a peaceful settlement of the conflict. However, no agreement had been reached on the text of the draft Protocol, although some rapprochement between the positions of the two parties was reported. Further unofficial contacts and discussions on the issue continued, including visits in July by the Deputy Secretary of the Security Council of the Russian Federation to Tbilisi and Sukhumi for discussions with both parties in an attempt to move the peace process forward. The Abkhaz side proposed that the two sides to the conflict conclude a treaty providing for the renunciation of the use of force, while the Georgian side stated that it did not see the need for such a treaty, since the commitment of the two parties to solve all existing problems peacefully had already been included in documents signed earlier. However, on 27 May, President Shevardnadze suggested the convening of an international conference on Abkhazia, Georgia, under UN auspices.

Georgia did not support continuation of the CIS peacekeeping force in the conflict zone after the expiry of its mandate on 31 July, unless the decisions of the CIS summit meeting of 28 March (see above) on the expansion of the security zone and the repatriation of the refugees and internally displaced persons were implemented. It did however emphasize that, if the force were withdrawn, the Georgian side would not resume hostilities. Following the adoption by the Russian State Duma of a resolution requesting the Russian President to secure the presence of the CIS peacekeeping force beyond 31 July, the Secretary of the Russian Defence Council visited Tbilisi in July to discuss the issue of the force with Georgian leaders.

UNOMIG, the strength of which had been reduced to 116 military observers, continued to operate in the restricted weapons zones of the Zugdidi and Gali sectors and in the Kodori valley. Although UNOMIG had made vigorous efforts to improve the safety of its staff, personnel and property had been the victims of acts of robbery and theft on nine occasions during the preceding three months. UNOMIG continued to observe the activities of the CIS peacekeeping force and cooperation between the commanding officers was very good, in spite of changes in the leadership of the peacekeeping force.

The Secretary-General stated that prospects for progress in the Georgian/Abkhaz peace process had improved and there appeared to be a serious effort towards accommodation and compromise. He recommended that the Security Council extend UNOMIG's mandate until 31 January 1998. However, the extension should be reviewed if there were changes in the mandate of the CIS peacekeeping force.

High-level meeting. On 29 July [S/1997/558/Add.1], the Secretary-General reported that a high-level meeting had taken place in Geneva from 23 to 25 July under the chairmanship of his Special Representative for Georgia. The meeting was held with the participation of the two parties to the conflict and was attended by the Russian Federation (as facilitator), OSCE and representatives of the States belonging to the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General on Georgia. The goals of the talks were to map out areas where concrete political progress could be made, in particular on practical issues, and to re-establish a process of continuing work towards achieving a comprehensive political settlement. The parties welcomed the Secretary-General's proposals to strengthen UN involvement in the peacemaking process and reaffirmed their commitment to the non-use of force or threat of the use of force against each other as expressed in their communique of 13 January 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 578]. The Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Georgia, the representatives of OSCE and the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General on Georgia called on the Russian Federation and the parties to agree on continuing the CIS peacekeeping operation in order to secure favourable and peaceful conditions for the continuation of negotiations to achieve a comprehensive settlement of the conflict. A follow-up meeting was to be convened in September.

Communication (July). President Shevardnadze, in a 28 July letter to the Secretary-General [S/1997/590], stated that the high-level meeting attested to the importance that the international community attached to the settlement of the Abkhazia conflict. Despite all efforts, however, the talks were fraught with serious problems, in particular the resistance by the Abkhaz party to a more active and effective participation of the international community in resolving the conflict. The failure to recognize that the peace process should not be monopolized by anyone was likely to further protract the resolution of the conflict, thus affecting the progress of the peace talks in the future. It was, therefore, imperative that the Security Council and the international community at large should give an adequate assessment to that destructive position. President Shevardnadze believed that the Geneva process should continue and hoped that the next round of negotiations would be held in September.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (July)

Having met on 31 July [meeting 3807] to consider the Secretary-General's report, the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1124 (1997). The draft [S/1997/594] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions, reaffirming in particular resolution 1096(1997) of 30 January 1997, and recalling the statement by its President of 8 May 1997,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 18 July 1997,

Reiterating its full support for the more active role for the United Nations, with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator, aimed at achieving a comprehensive political settlement,

Acknowledging the efforts in support of the peace process of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative, with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator, as well as the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General on Georgia and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, as mentioned in the report,

Welcoming, in this context, the indication given in the report that prospects for progress in the peace process have improved, noting with deep concern the continued failure by the parties to resolve their differences, and underlining the necessity for the parties to intensify without delay their efforts to achieve an early and comprehensive political settlement of the conflict, including on the political status of Abkhazia within the State of Georgia, which fully respects the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia,

Reaffirming the necessity for the parties strictly to respect human rights, expressing its support for the efforts of the Secretary-General to find ways to improve their observance as an integral part of the work towards a comprehensive political settlement, and noting developments in the work of the United Nations Human Rights Office in Abkhazia, Georgia,

Commending the contribution that the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia and the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States have made in stabilizing the situation in the zone of conflict, noting that the cooperation between the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force is good and has continued to develop, and stressing the importance of continued close cooperation and coordination between them in the performance of their respective mandates,

Deeply concerned at the continuing unstable and tense security conditions in the Gali region, characterized by acts of violence by armed groups, by armed robbery, and other common crime and, most seriously, by the laying of mines, including new types of mines, and deeply concerned also at the resulting lack of safety and security for the local populations, for the refugees and displaced persons returning to the region and for the personnel of the Mission and of the collective peacekeeping force,

Reminding the parties that the ability of the international community to assist them depends on their political will to resolve the conflict through dialogue and mutual accommodation, as well as their full cooperation with the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force, including the fulfilment of their obligations regarding the safety and freedom of movement of international personnel,

Taking note of the decision taken by the Council of Heads of State of the Commonwealth of Independent States on 28 March 1997 to expand the mandate of the collective peacekeeping force in the conflict zone in Abkhazia, Georgia, and to extend it until 31 July 1997, but noting with concern the uncertainty surrounding its extension beyond that date,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 18 July 1997;

2. Reiterates its deep concern at the continued deadlock in achieving a comprehensive settlement of the conflict in Abkhazia, Georgia;

3. Reaffirms its commitment to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia, within its internationally recognized borders, and to the necessity of defining the status of Abkhazia in strict accordance with these principles, and underlines the unacceptability of any action by the Abkhaz leadership in contravention of these principles;

4. Welcomes the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative aimed at achieving a comprehensive political settlement of the conflict, including on the political status of Abkhazia within the State of Georgia, which fully respects the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia, and the efforts undertaken by the Russian Federation in its capacity as facilitator, in particular during the last round of talks between the parties held in Moscow in June 1997, to continue to intensify the search for a peaceful settlement of the conflict;

5. Reaffirms its support for the more active role for the United Nations in the peace process, encourages the Secretary-General to continue his efforts to that end, with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator, and with the support of the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General on Georgia and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, and welcomes in this context the holding of a high-level meeting on the conflict, in Geneva from 23 to 25 July 1997, under the aegis of the United Nations, to map out the areas where concrete political progress could be made;

6. Takes notes of the addendum to the report of the Secretary-General, supports the intention of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General to resume the meeting in September, and calls upon the Abkhaz side, in particular, to engage constructively at this resumed meeting;

7. Stresses that the primary responsibility for reinvigorating the peace process rests upon the parties themselves, calls upon them to achieve substantive progress without further delay towards a comprehensive political settlement, and further calls upon them to cooperate fully with the efforts undertaken by the Secretary-General and his Special Representative, with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator;

8. Welcomes the continuation of direct dialogue between the parties, calls upon them to intensify the search for a peaceful solution by further expanding their contacts, requests the Secretary-General to make available all appropriate support if so requested by the parties, and recalls the appeal of the Secretary-General to both parties to pursue the discussions on the implementation of the above-mentioned decisions adopted by the Council of Heads of State of the Commonwealth of Independent States on 28 March 1997;

9. Recalls the conclusions of the Lisbon summit of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe regarding the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia, and reaffirms the unacceptability of the demographic changes resulting from the conflict;

10. Reiterates its condemnation of killings, particularly those ethnically motivated, and other ethnically related acts of violence;

11. Reaffirms the right of all refugees and displaced persons affected by the conflict to return to their homes in secure conditions in accordance with international law and as set out in the Quadripartite Agreement on Voluntary Return of Refugees and Displaced Persons of 4 April 1994, condemns the continued obstruction of that return, and stresses the unacceptability of any linkage of the return of refugees and displaced persons with the question of the political status of Abkhazia, Georgia;

12. Reiterates its demand that the Abkhaz side accelerate significantly the process of voluntary return of refugees and displaced persons without delay or preconditions, in particular by accepting a timetable on the basis of that proposed by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, and further demands that it guarantee the safety of spontaneous returnees already in the area and regularize their status in cooperation with the Office of the High Commissioner and in accordance with the Quadripartite Agreement, in particular in the Gali region;

13. Calls upon the parties to ensure the full implementation of the Agreement on a Ceasefire and Separation of Forces signed in Moscow on 14 May 1994;

14. Condemns the continued laying of mines, including new types of mines, in the Gali region, which has already caused several deaths and injuries among the civilian population and the peacekeepers and observers of the international community, and calls upon the parties to take all measures in their power to prevent the laying of mines and intensified activities by armed groups and to cooperate fully with the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia and the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States in order to honour their commitments to ensure the safety and the freedom of movement of all personnel of the United Nations, the collective peacekeeping force and international humanitarian organizations;

15. Urges the Secretary-General to continue to take the necessary steps in response to the threat posed by the laying of mines in order to improve security conditions so as to minimize the danger to Mission personnel and to create conditions for the effective performance of the mandate of the Mission;

16. Decides to extend the mandate of the Mission for a new period terminating on 31 January 1998 subject to a review by the Council of the mandate in the event of any changes that may be made in the mandate or in the presence of the collective peacekeeping force, and welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General, as mentioned in his report, to keep the Council informed of developments in this regard;

17. Reiterates its full support for the implementation of a concrete programme for the protection and promotion of human rights in Abkhazia, Georgia;

18. Welcomes the continued efforts by the United Nations agencies and humanitarian organizations to address the urgent needs of those suffering most from the consequences of the conflict in Abkhazia, Georgia, in particular internally displaced persons, encourages further contributions to that end, and reiterates its encouragement to States to contribute to the voluntary fund in support of the implementation of the Moscow Agreement and/or for humanitarian aspects, including demining, as specified by donors;

19. Requests the Secretary-General to consider the means of providing technical and financial assistance aimed at the reconstruction of the economy of Abkhazia, Georgia, following the successful outcome of the political negotiations;

20. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep the Council regularly informed, to report after three months from the date of the adoption of the present resolution on the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia, including on the operations of the Mission, and to provide recommendations in that report on the nature of the United Nations presence, and in this context expresses its intention to conduct a thorough review of the operation at the end of its current mandate;

21. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Communications (August). By a 22 August letter [S/1997/657], Georgia informed the Security Council President that, as a result of the initiative of the Russian President, Boris Yeltsin, a meeting was held on 14 August in Tbilisi between an Abkhaz delegation, headed by Mr. Ardzinba, and a Georgian delegation, headed by President Shevardnadze, with the participation of the Russian Foreign Minister, Yevgeny Primakov. In a statement issued at the end of the meeting, the parties declared their determination to put an end to the conflict and to restore relations of peace and mutual respect. They were convinced that the time had come to embark on a course leading to peace and prosperity and to act jointly in a spirit of compromise and reconciliation. The parties undertook not to resort to arms to resolve their differences, nor to permit the renewal of bloodshed. Differences of opinion would be resolved exclusively by peaceful political means, through negotiations and consultations, both bilateral and with the assistance of the Russian Federation, under the auspices of the United Nations and the participation of OSCE and CIS. The meeting noted that it had been possible to reach agreement on a number of key problems but substantial differences remained on certain issues.

Report of Secretary-General (October). In a 28 October report [S/1997/827], the Secretary-General stated that the Georgian/Abkhaz peace process had been reactivated and there had been bilateral contacts between the two sides to the conflict. However, there continued to be no visible progress on the key issues—the future political status of Abkhazia and the permanent return of refugees and displaced persons. Nevertheless, both sides had reaffirmed their commitment to resolving the conflict by political means. At a meeting with Georgian President Shevardnadze on 21 July in New York, the Secretary-General discussed important aspects of the peace process, including the UN role in the political and peacekeeping fields.

It had been intended to resume the adjourned high-level meeting on the conflict, held in July, on 13 October in Geneva. However, the Abkhaz leader, Mr. Ardzinba, had stated that his side needed more time for preparation on substantive issues. He had also indicated that the text of the draft Protocol proposed by the Russian Federation, as agreed by him, could not be subject to further discussion and should simply be signed. The Russian Federation had also expressed preference for a postponement of the Geneva meeting since it had scheduled negotiations with the two sides in Moscow on the text of the draft Protocol during that period. Following further consultations, it was agreed that the meeting should be resumed in Geneva on 17 November.

Georgian/Abkhaz negotiations took place in Sukhumi on 9 and 10 September under the chairmanship of the First Deputy Foreign Minister of the Russian Federation, Boris Pastukhov. The Secretary-General's Special Representative, the Chief Military Observer of UNOMIG and the head of the Georgia office of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees participated in the meeting. In a joint communique adopted at the end of the negotiations, the parties reaffirmed their determination to strive towards a prompt resolution of existing problems and the signing of the draft Protocol in Moscow in the near future. They agreed that the discussion on the process of an orderly and phased return of refugees and displaced persons should continue and expressed their intention to coordinate efforts to eliminate bandit groups, whose activities disrupted the peace process and impeded a settlement of the conflict and the return of refugees. The two sides supported intensifying the efforts of the CIS peacekeeping force to end the activities of such groups in the conflict zone and welcomed the reinvigoration of the UN role in the peace process.

Bilateral contacts between the two sides included a 14 August meeting between President Shevardnadze and Mr. Ardzinba in Tbilisi and a 20 August visit by a Georgian government delegation to Sukhumi where it met with the Abkhaz leaders. At the latter meeting, questions of cooperation in energy and communications were discussed and it was decided to set up a Coordination Commission to address practical matters. On 21 and 22 September, an Abkhaz delegation visited Tbilisi and had talks with government officials, mainly on economic issues, in the framework of the Coordination Commission. The two sides reportedly also agreed to open another channel of dialogue, among parliamentarians. In a public statement, the Abkhaz side said that unresolved political issues were affecting cooperation in various domains, including transport and communications. The next session of the Coordination Commission was scheduled for early November in Sukhumi.

Meanwhile, the situation in the Gali and Zugdidi restricted weapons and security zones remained unsettled and tense. Criminal activities against the local population and international personnel continued and local authorities on both sides of the Inguri river remained unable to deal fully with the situation. Armed groups increased their activities in the restricted weapons zone and in areas beyond the UNOMIG area of responsibility. In addition, on two occasions, and for the first time since the inception of the Mission, both the CIS peacekeeping force and UNOMIG were the victims of hostage-taking incidents in the Zugdidi sector. In the second incident, in view of the immediate grave danger to the hostages, UNOMIG agreed to pay part of the ransom requested by the hostage-takers. The hostages were released unharmed, but the Secretary-General stated that the payment of ransom was contrary to established UN policy and stressed that the incident did not set a precedent. In October, the Council of Heads of State of CIS extended the mandate of the CIS peacekeeping force to 31 January 1998.

The Secretary-General reported that a UN medical survey team had visited UNOMIG to assess its medical, logistical and operational requirements, and recommended that it be provided with helicopter support for medical evacuation and with an additional ambulance. Although UNOMIG had made efforts to improve the safety of its staff, its personnel and property were again the victims of acts of violence, including hostage-taking, robbery and theft. A number of improvements were being put in place and arrangements made to provide the Mission with ballistic-protective vehicles to enhance the security of the military observers and to enable them to patrol areas where armed bandits and other groups were believed to operate.

In a November addendum [S/1997/827/Add.1] to his report, the Secretary-General submitted estimated costs for the ambulance and 15 ballistic-protective vehicles for UNOMIG, amounting to some $1.7 million. The helicopter for medical evacuations would be provided through a reconfiguration of resources already provided for air support. The Secretary-General undertook to report to the General Assembly on additional requirements needed for the purchase of the vehicles.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (November)

The Security Council met on 6 November [meeting 3830] to consider the Secretary-General's report. Following consultations among its members, the Council authorized its President to make the following statement [S/PRST/1997/50] on its behalf:

The Security Council has considered the report of the Secretary-General of 28 October 1997 concerning the situation in Abkhazia, Georgia.

The Council regrets that, despite strenuous efforts to reactivate the peace process, there has been no visible progress on the key issues of the settlement—the future political status of Abkhazia and the permanent return of refugees and displaced persons.

The Council attaches particular importance to the more active role for the United Nations in the peace process, and encourages the Secretary-General to continue his efforts to that end, with the assistance of the Russian Federation as facilitator, and with the support of the Group of Friends of the Secretary-

General on Georgia and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe. The Council calls upon the parties to cooperate fully with these efforts.

In this context, the Council regrets that the adjourned high-level meeting on the conflict, held in Geneva under the aegis of the United Nations, did not resume in October as initially planned. It welcomes the intention of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General to resume this meeting on 17 November to map out the areas where concrete political progress could be made, to take forward discussion of social and economic issues in support of a comprehensive settlement of the conflict, and to address the issue of the return of refugees. The Council calls upon all concerned to do their utmost for the resumption of this meeting with the constructive engagement in particular of the Abkhaz side.

The Council commends the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative aimed at achieving a comprehensive settlement of the conflict, including on the political status of Abkhazia within the State of Georgia, which respects fully the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia, and the efforts undertaken by the Russian Federation as facilitator, in particular the initiative put forward by the President of the Russian Federation on 1 August 1997 and the Georgian-Abkhaz negotiations held in Sukhumi on 9 and 10 September with the participation of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General. The Council welcomes the meeting of the President of Georgia and Mr. Vladislav Ardzinba in Tbilisi on 14 August 1997, facilitated by the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Russian Federation, and the continuation of direct dialogue between the parties, and calls upon them to intensify the search for a peaceful solution by further expanding their contacts.

The Council further encourages the Secretary-General to take such steps as are necessary, in cooperation with the parties, to ensure a prompt and safe return of the refugees and displaced persons to their homes, with the assistance of all relevant international organizations.

The Council welcomes the decision of the Council of Heads of State of the Commonwealth of Independent States mentioned in the report of the Secretary-General to extend the mandate of the collective peacekeeping force of the Commonwealth of Independent States until 31 January 1998.

The Council welcomes the good cooperation between the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia and the collective peacekeeping force and their efforts to promote stabilization of the situation in the zone of conflict. The Council calls upon the parties to cooperate fully with the Mission and the peacekeeping force.

The Council expresses concern at the continuing violations of the Agreement on a Ceasefire and Separation of Forces signed in Moscow on 14 May 1994 and calls upon the parties to ensure the full implementation of this agreement.

The Council remains deeply concerned at the continuing unstable and tense security conditions in the Gali and Zugdidi sectors and in the Kodori valley. The Council strongly condemns the kidnapping of personnel of the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force.

The Council also condemns the continued laying of mines, including more sophisticated types of mines, which has already caused several deaths and injuries among the civilian population and the peacekeepers and observers of the international community. It calls upon the parties to take all measures in their power to prevent the laying of mines and intensified activities by armed groups and to co-operate fully with the Mission and the collective peacekeeping force in order to honour their commitments to ensure the safety and the freedom of movement of all personnel of the United Nations, the collective peacekeeping force and international humanitarian organizations.

The Council supports the additional measures envisaged by the Secretary-General in the report to improve the safety of Mission personnel and to create conditions for the effective performance of the mandate of the Mission.

The Council welcomes the continued efforts by the United Nations agencies and humanitarian organizations to address the urgent needs of those suffering most from the consequences of the conflict in Abkhazia, Georgia, in particular internally displaced persons, encourages further contributions to that end, and reiterates its encouragement to States to contribute to the voluntary fund in support of the implementation of the Moscow Agreement and/or for humanitarian aspects, including demining, as specified by donors.

The Council reminds the parties that the ability of the international community to assist them depends on their political will to resolve the conflict through dialogue and mutual accommodation.

Further report of Secretary-General. As later reported by the Secretary-General [S/1998/51], the high-level meeting between the Georgian and Abkhaz sides reconvened in Geneva on 17 November. On 19 November, both sides adopted a Concluding Statement, in which they welcomed the Secretary-General's proposals to strengthen UN involvement in the peacemaking process, approved a programme of action and set up a mechanism for its implementation. The mechanism provided for the establishment of a Coordinating Council and, within its framework, that of working groups on issues related to the lasting non-resumption of hostilities and security problems; refugees and internally displaced persons; and economic and social problems. Separate groups of experts might be established to study specific aspects of issues relating to the comprehensive settlement of the conflict. Those bodies would meet under the chairmanship of the Secretary-General's Special Representative, with the participation of the Russian Federation and OSCE, and with the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General acting as observers. The first session of the Coordinating Council, which took place on 18 December in Sukhumi, adopted a "Statute of the Coordinating Council", in which it was emphasized that the Council had been established to implement the provisions of the Concluding Statement adopted on 19 November. Meetings of the three working groups were held to approve their programmes of work. The Coordinating Council decided, inter alia, to send a needs-assessment mission to Abkhazia in February 1998. Bilateral contacts were also made between the two sides, as a result of which it was agreed to re-establish some direct telephone communications. In December, a representative of the Abkhaz authorities visited Tbilisi and discussed with President Shevardnadze issues pertaining to the peaceful settlement of the conflict, the return of refugees and internally displaced persons and economic cooperation. Representatives of the Russian Federation met on several occasions with the two sides in order to promote progress in the peace process, including negotiations on the draft Protocol on a Georgian-Abkhaz settlement. The Group of Friends of the Secretary-General also maintained contacts with the two sides.

The situation in the security and restricted weapons zones of the Gali sector deteriorated, particularly in October and November when an explosion occurred at a power station and an Abkhaz army truck was involved in a mine incident.

The Secretary-General stated that much groundwork had been laid towards achieving substantive progress in the Georgian-Abkhaz peace process. However, progress in the area of the return of refugees and displaced persons was urgently needed.

Financing

In a February report [A/51/793], the Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly the budget for UNOMIG for the 12-month period from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998. It provided for a strength of 135 military observers and 140 civilian staff. The budget totalled $19,872,800 gross ($18,874,400 net), including budgeted voluntary contributions in kind totalling $2,057,600. An amount of $984,700 was included for helicopter air support. Also before the Assembly was the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions [A/51/855] and the report of the Office of Internal Oversight Services [A/51/432].

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 13 June [meeting 101], on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/51/503/Add.1], the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/236 without vote [agenda item 133].

Financing of the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia, the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions and the report of the Office of Internal Oversight Services,

Recalling Security Council resolution 854(1993) of 6 August 1993, by which the Council approved the deployment of an advance team of up to ten United Nations military observers for a period of three months and the incorporation of the advance team into a United Nations observer mission if such a mission was formally established by the Council,

Recalling also Security Council resolution 858(1993) of 24 August 1993, by which the Council decided to establish the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia, and the subsequent resolutions by which the Council extended the mandate of the Observer Mission, the latest of which was resolution 1096(1997) of 30 January 1997,

Recalling further its decision 48/475 A of 23 December 1993 on the financing of the Observer Mission and its subsequent resolutions and decisions thereon, the latest of which was decision 51/406 of 17 October 1996,

Reaffirming that the costs of the Observer Mission are expenses of the Organization to be borne by Member States in accordance with Article 17, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations,

Recalling its previous decisions regarding the fact that, in order to meet the expenditures caused by the Observer Mission, a different procedure is required from that applied to meet expenditures of the regular budget of the United Nations,

Taking into account the fact that the economically more developed countries are in a position to make relatively larger contributions and that the economically less developed countries have a relatively limited capacity to contribute towards such an operation,

Bearing in mind the special responsibilities of the States permanent members of the Security Council, as indicated in General Assembly resolution 1874(S-IV) of 27 June 1963, in the financing of such operations,

Noting with appreciation that voluntary contributions have been made to the Observer Mission,

Mindful of the fact that it is essential to provide the Observer Mission with the necessary financial resources to enable it to fulfil its responsibilities under the relevant resolutions of the Security Council,

1. Takes note of the status of contributions to the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia as at 15 May 1997, including the contributions outstanding in the amount of 6 million United States dollars, representing 12 per cent of the total assessed contributions from the inception of the Observer Mission to the period ending 30 June 1997, notes that some 20 per cent of the Member States have paid their assessed contributions in full, and urges all other Member States concerned, in particular those in arrears, to ensure the payment of their outstanding assessed contributions;

2. Expresses concern about the financial situation with regard to peacekeeping activities, in particular as regards the reimbursement of troop contributors, which bear burdens owing to overdue payments by Member States of their assessments;

3. Expresses its appreciation to those Member States which have paid their assessed contributions in full;

4. Urges all other Member States to make every possible effort to ensure payment of their assessed contributions to the Observer Mission in full and on time;

5. Endorses the observations and recommendations contained in the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to take all necessary action to ensure that the Observer Mission is administered with a maximum of efficiency and economy;

7. Decides to appropriate to the Special Account for the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia the amount of 18,580,500 dollars gross (17,582,100 dollars net) for the maintenance of the Observer Mission for the period from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998, inclusive of the amount of 765,300 dollars for the support account for peacekeeping operations, to be assessed on Member States at a monthly rate of 1,548,375 dollars gross (1,465,175 dollars net) in accordance with the composition of groups set out in paragraphs 3 and 4 of General Assembly resolution 43/232 of 1 March 1989, as adjusted by the Assembly in its resolutions 44/192 B of 21 December 1989, 45/269 of 27 August 1991, 46/198 A of 20 December 1991, 47/218 A of 23 December 1992, 49/249 A of 20 July 1995, 49/249 B of 14 September 1995, 50/224 of 11 April 1996 and 51/218 A and B of 18 December 1996 and its decisions 48/472 A of 23 December 1993 and 50/451 B of 23 December 1995, and taking into account the scale of assessments for the year 1997, as set out in its resolution 49/19 B of 23 December 1994 and its decision 50/471 A of 23 December 1995, and for the year 1998, subject to the decision of the Security Council to extend the mandate of the Observer Mission beyond 31 July 1997;

8. Decides also that, in accordance with the provisions of its resolution 973(X) of 15 December 1955, there shall be set off against the apportionment among Member States, as provided for in paragraph 7 above, their respective share in the Tax Equalization Fund of the estimated staff assessment income of 998,400 dollars approved for the Observer Mission for the period from 1 July 1997 to 30 June 1998;

9. Decides further that, for Member States that have fulfilled their financial obligations to the Observer Mission, there shall be set off against the apportionment, as provided for in paragraph 7 above, their respective share in the unencumbered balance of 1,056,950 dollars gross (831,900 dollars net) in respect of the period ending 30 June 1996;

10. Decides that, for Member States that have not fulfilled their financial obligations to the Observer Mission, their share of the unencumbered balance of 1,056,950 dollars gross (831,900 dollars net) for the period ending 30 June 1996 shall be set off against their outstanding obligations;

11. Invites voluntary contributions to the Observer Mission in cash and in the form of services and supplies acceptable to the Secretary-General, to be administered, as appropriate, in accordance with the procedure and practices established by the General Assembly;

12. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second session the item entitled "Financing of the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia".

On 22 December, the Assembly, by decision 52/456, decided to continue consideration of the agenda item on financing of UNOMIG at its resumed fifty-second (1998) session.

Armenia-Azerbaijan

In 1997, the Minsk Group of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) continued its efforts to reach a settlement of the armed conflict between Armenia and Azerbaijan that had erupted in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 388] over the Nagorny Karabakh region of Azerbaijan.

Communications. During 1997, Azerbaijan and Armenia addressed several letters to the Secretary-General and the Security Council President regarding developments in the conflict between them.

On 24 February, Azerbaijan submitted a statement [A/52/81-S/1997/153] marking the fifth anniversary of what it characterized as an act of genocide against the Azerbaijani people in 1992 when civilians were allegedly slaughtered by Armenian nationalists supported by the Soviet Army. Azerbaijan called on all parties involved in the conflict to pursue constructive negotiations within the framework of the Minsk Group.

Armenia, in a 3 March statement [A/52/85-S/1997/180], said that the responsibility for the 1992 killings lay with the Azeri opposition group, the Azerbaijani National Front. It also cited a number of alleged atrocities and other wrongful acts by Azerbaijan against Armenians.

On 25 March [S/1997/252], Armenia informed the Security Council President that, in response to an appeal by the Co-Chairmen of the Minsk Group, it had decided, as a demonstration of goodwill before the resumption of negotiations, unilaterally to release all Azeri prisoners in Armenia. It called on Nagorny Karabakh and Azerbaijan to release all their prisoners of war.

In April [E/CN.4/1997/138], Azerbaijan forwarded to the Commission on Human Rights a letter accusing Armenia of systematically carrying out subversive and terrorist acts inside Azerbaijan. The letter cited specific alleged acts and said that the facts provided sufficient grounds for including Armenia on the list of States that supported terrorism at the State level.

Azerbaijan sent to the Secretary-General a 16 April letter [A/52/123-S/1997/331] accusing Armenia of violating the ceasefire in its conflict with Azerbaijan by firing on a team of OSCE mediators who were monitoring compliance with the ceasefire regime.

Azerbaijan transmitted to the Secretary-General a 21 February statement [S/1997/147] concerning news reports in the Russian Federation and elsewhere about alleged illegal deliveries of Russian tanks and other weaponry to Armenia. The shipments were reportedly made with the complicity of elements within the Russian leadership who were bypassing the President and Government of the Russian Federation. The statement welcomed the action by the Russian Federation to investigate the allegations with the aim of learning whether such deliveries had occurred.

In a 28 February statement [A/52/84-S/1997/179], Armenia accused Azerbaijan of seeking to exploit reports of alleged illegal arms transfers from Russia to Armenia and of itself engaging in an improper arms build-up.

In a 3 March statement [S/1997/186], Azerbaijan expressed astonishment at Armenia's accusations and repeated its earlier charges that Armenia was illegally and secretly acquiring weapons for aggressive purposes. It said it expected active steps by the Russian Federation to halt the practice of illegal weapons deliveries to Armenia.

On 13 March [S/1997/219], Azerbaijan cited an ITAR-TASS news agency report that key Russian Federation officials had confirmed that military equipment had been improperly transferred to Armenia between 1994 and 1996. Azerbaijan called for appropriate punitive measures by the international community against Armenia.

Azerbaijan transmitted to the Secretary-General the text of a 14 March appeal [S/1997/229] to the President of the Russian Federation accusing "certain ruling circles" within the Russian Federation of stubbornly refuting the arms transfer allegations, despite reports in the Russian media that the transfers did occur. That posture raised doubts as to the objectivity and sincerity of the Federation's position as Co-Chairman of the Minsk Group, Azerbaijan said.

On 3 April [S/1997/270], Azerbaijan transmitted to the Secretary-General a 27 March decision of the Council of Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the Commonwealth of Independent States, in which it noted that the Russian Federation's Minister for Foreign Affairs stated that Russia was investigating the allegations of arms transfers. If the allegations proved true, measures should be taken and the guilty parties prosecuted.

Azerbaijan sent to the Secretary-General the text of a 4 April appeal [S/1997/323] to the President of the Russian Federation stating that the Federation was allegedly arming and training Armenian military personnel. The situation raised serious doubts within Azerbaijan as to the sincerity of Russia's policy in the Caucasus, Azerbaijan said, and also raised the prospect of widening the war. Azerbaijan urged the President to investigate the alleged arms transfers, to return the military equipment to Russia under supervision of international observers, and to punish the guilty parties.

In a 5 September letter to the Secretary-General [A/52/322], Azerbaijan expressed deep concern about the 29 August signing by the Russian Federation and Armenia of a treaty of friendship, cooperation and mutual assistance, particularly those articles that provided for the two States to render military assistance to each other. The formal establishment of a Russian-Armenian military alliance constituted a direct threat to Azerbaijan's security, sovereignty and territorial integrity, it said. The treaty demonstrated that the Russian Federation was acting in violation of its obligations as the Co-Chairman of the OSCE Minsk Group.

On 23 August [S/1997/662], Azerbaijan transmitted to the Secretary-General two statements concerning reports that an election would be held on 1 September for president of the occupied territory of the Nagorny Karabakh region. The first, by Azerbaijan's Central Election Commission, said that such an election was a provocative action by Armenia and Armenian separatists in the Nagorny Karabakh region, whose aim was to create a puppet regime in the occupied territory of Azerbaijan. Azerbaijan called for international condemnation of the planned election, and asked the Minsk Group to take steps to prevent it. The second statement, by the Azerbaijani Parliament, largely reiterated that of the Commission.

In a 29 August letter to the Secretary-General [S/1997/676], Armenia accused Azerbaijan of having disseminated false information regarding what it termed the Nagorny Karabakh Republic. Armenia enclosed a document that it said contained the facts with regard to refugees, displaced persons and territories occupied during military actions in the conflict between Armenia and Azerbaijan.

On 10 September [S/1997/703], Azerbaijan responded to Armenia's 29 August letter. It stated that no Republic of Nagorny Karabakh existed in the territory of Azerbaijan; the so-called Republic was nothing more than a tactical ruse by Armenia aimed at annexing the Nagorny Karabakh region to Armenia. Azerbaijan categorically rejected any attempt to disseminate within the United Nations the notion of an administrative and territorial entity that did not exist in Azerbaijani territory.

In October [A/52/564-S/1997/847], Azerbaijan transmitted to the Secretary-General the text of the Strasbourg joint statement by the Presidents of Azerbaijan and Armenia, made at their meeting during the summit of the Council of Europe (Strasbourg, France, 10-11 October). Both countries, said the statement, remained committed to a peaceful settlement of the Nagorny Karabakh conflict by political means, in the first place through negotiations. They expressed the belief that the Minsk Group framework would, with a constructive attitude by all parties involved, would make it possible to achieve real progress in settling the conflict.

Cyprus

In 1997, the Secretary-General intensified efforts to bring about a comprehensive settlement of the Cyprus issue by convening direct talks between the leaders of the Greek and Turkish communities who had expressed their readiness to make further efforts towards that end. At those talks, which were held in the New York area in July and in Switzerland in August, the leaders considered a draft statement proposed by the Secretary-General setting out the principles and objectives of a settlement and for the establishment of modalities for future negotiations. However, the talks ended inconclusively, and the Secretary-General held the view that an early third round of talks would have been unproductive. Nevertheless, his Special Adviser, Diego Cordovez, and his Deputy Special Representative, Gustave Feissel, continued to consult with the leaders of the two communities on the modalities of continuing the process of negotiations in 1998.

In the meantime, the Security Council extended the mandate of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus (UNFICYP) until 30 June 1998. UNFICYP, in an effort to have its 1996 proposals for the reduction of tension along the ceasefire lines accepted by the two communities, submitted revised proposals in June. In October, the Turkish forces declared their willingness to accept UNFICYP's revised package, provided the National Guard did likewise. Agreement was reached with both communities on 31 July on a number of humanitarian issues, in particular the problem of missing persons.

The question of Cyprus was included in the agenda of the General Assembly's fifty-second session by Assembly decision 51/479 of 15 September. By decision 52/459 of 22 December, the Assembly decided that the item should remain for consideration during that session.

Incidents

Communications. Throughout 1997, the Secretary-General received numerous letters from the Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot sides, as well as from Greece and Turkey, containing charges and countercharges, protests and accusations and statements of explanation of position.

A number of communications between 25 February and 12 November contained protests by Cyprus against violations of Cypriot airspace and unauthorized intrusions into the flight information region of Nicosia by military aircraft of the Turkish Air Force, and letters from Turkey refuting those allegations. On 28 January [A/51/786-S/1997/84] and 19 June [A/51/928-S/1997/476], Cyprus also protested the docking of Turkish naval vessels in the ports of Famagusta and Kyrenia, which were declared closed to all vessels in 1974. On 25 June [A/51/934-S/1997/491], Turkey stated that such visits concerned the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus and Turkey, two sovereign, independent States that recognized each other; Greek Cypriot allegations concerning the visits were another instance of the propaganda campaign being carried out without regard to the need to suspend such harmful rhetoric, particularly on the eve of direct talks between the two leaders in New York (see below).

On 31 January [A/51/795-S/1997/111], Turkey drew attention to the decision of the Greek Cypriot administration to purchase an S-300 surface-to-air missile system from the Russian Federation, which, it said, demonstrated the hostile intentions of the Greek Cypriot side and would only serve to heighten tension on the island. On 19 September [A/52/383-S/1997/732], Turkey said that the missile system constituted a direct threat to the security of the Turkish Cypriots and to Turkey itself. Turkey expressed its intention to take corresponding measures and stated that it, together with the Turkish Cypriot side, was also determined not to allow the installation of missiles in south Cyprus to be used as a bargaining element in the negotiation process. Turkey requested that the Secretary-General urgently take initiatives to prevent the deployment of the missiles on the island. On the same date [A/52/386-S/1997/738], Rauf R. Denktas, President of the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus, said that the acquisition of the technologically sophisticated missile system, which threatened to take the arms build-up on Cyprus to a new and disturbing qualitative level, added a highly destabilizing dimension to the military equation on the island and the region between guarantor States Turkey and Greece. He called on the Secretary-General to impress upon the Greek Cypriot leadership not to go ahead with the deployment of the missiles. Greece, on 26 September [A/52/398-S/1997/752], stated that as an independent State, Cyprus had exercised its fundamental right of self-defence and its responsibility to protect its citizens from aggression by improving the deterrent capabilities of the Cypriot National Guard. To redress the overwhelming military imbalance on the island, Cyprus had undertaken to upgrade its defence. Greece, as a Guarantor Power, had the legal and moral obligation to assist that effort, given its commitment under the 1960 Treaties of Alliance and Guarantees to support Cyprus in the event of an attack by Turkey. Also on 26 September [A/52/397-S/1997/739], Cyprus affirmed that the purchase of the S-300 ground-to-air missile system was exclusively for defensive purposes following repeated threats by Turkey and could only be used against incoming attacking aircraft. Cyprus, with no air force, could not possibly pose a threat to a major military Power like Turkey, it said. However, deployment of the missiles would not be necessary if substantial progress in finding a solution to the Cyprus problem was achieved. Cyprus protested the threat of the use of force by Turkey and its escalating aggressive attitude and actions against Cyprus. On 29 September [A/52/412-S/1997/762], the President of Cyprus, Glafcos Clerides, reiterated that the purchase of the missiles was for defensive purposes and said that he wished to record his protest against the threats by Turkey. On 4 [A/52/569-S/1997/852] and 20 [A/52/692-S/1997/915] November, Cyprus drew the attention of the Secretary-General to Turkey's substantial reinforcement of the armaments of its military forces in Cyprus.

In a 7 August letter to the Secretary-General [A/51/961-S/1997/624], Cyprus protested the "association agreement" between Turkey and the Turkish Cypriot community, signed on 6 August during the visit of the Foreign Minister of Turkey to the Turkish-occupied areas of Cyprus. Cyprus stated that the association agreement provided, inter alia, for the establishment of a 20-member association council to begin a process leading to gradual integration of the occupied areas of Cyprus into Turkey. In response [A/51/963-S/1997/648], Turkey referred to the "Agenda 2000" report of the European Union (EU), which envisaged the opening of accession negotiations between the EU and South Cyprus. Turkey said that, in the face of those developments, Turkey and the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus had announced financial and economic integration measures to alleviate the effects of the embargoes on the Turkish Cypriots and to forge closer ties in defence and foreign policy to protect the interests of the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus. The planned association council would determine the measures for partial economic and financial integration and closer association in security and foreign affairs.

On the question of Cyprus joining the EU, Turkey, on 25 July [A/51/951-S/1997/585] and 29 September [A/52/404-S/1997/757], forwarded to the Secretary-General legal opinions prepared by internationally renowned lawyers to the effect that the Greek Cypriot side had no lawful or constitutional authority to act as the sole legitimate government in the island. Since 1963, stated one jurist, the co-founders of the 1960 bicomunal Republic of Cyprus had had their own separate democratically elected administrations and the Greek Cypriot regime had never exercised sovereignty over the whole of Cyprus. The other legal opinion underlined the fact that by virtue of the 1959 London-Zurich Agreements and the 1960 Treaty of Guarantee, the Greek Cypriot administration could not become a member of the EU before Turkey, and could not even apply for membership. On 15 October [A/52/481-S/1997/805], Cyprus submitted a legal opinion by three prominent international jurists, who stated that the Republic of Cyprus was fully eligible to become a member of the EU and rejected the above-cited legal positions presented by Turkey.

Letters from Cyprus and Greece contained complaints about the desecration of sacred places of worship and acts of vandalism at historic monuments. The Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus refuted those allegations.

Good offices mission

Peace talks on a comprehensive settlement

On 17 April [S/1997/320], the Secretary-General informed the Security Council President of his determination to intensify efforts to bring about a comprehensive settlement of the Cyprus issue and to convene direct talks between the two leaders. To that end, he had appointed Diego Cordovez (Ecuador) as his Special Adviser on Cyprus as of 28 April, to succeed Han Sang-Joo, who was unable to continue due to other pressing commitments. Mr. Cordovez would prepare, and assist the Secretary-General in chairing, the next rounds of the intercommunal talks.

Report of Secretary-General (June). In a 20 June report on his mission of good offices in Cyprus [S/1997/480], the Secretary-General said that on 27 January he had written to the leaders of the Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot communities underlining the importance he attached to finding an early settlement of the Cyprus problem. In his discussions with the two leaders in February and April, they had expressed their readiness to make further efforts to reach a comprehensive solution. The consultations held between the two leaders and his representatives in recent months had clarified aspects of the task of achieving the common objective of a viable and comprehensive solution to the Cyprus problem. By a 9 June letter, the Secretary-General had invited the two leaders to a first session of face-to-face negotiations to be held in the New York area from 9 to 13 July. Those talks would constitute the beginning of a process that should continue as long as needed to achieve agreement on a comprehensive solution. He envisaged another session in August and a third, if necessary. The Secretary-General believed that there was a need for new approaches and procedures and a sustained process of direct negotiations leading to the conclusion of instruments that would constitute a comprehensive settlement. He said that the permanent members of the Security Council also fully supported the early convening, under the aegis of the United Nations, of direct negotiations between the leaders of the two Cypriot communities to secure an overall settlement, and a number of Governments, as well as the EU Presidency, had appointed special envoys and representatives in support of the efforts carried out within the framework of the Secretary-General's good offices mission. The Secretary-General asked the Council and all concerned to urge the parties to embark upon a sustained process of negotiations that would lead to the conclusion of the instruments that would constitute a comprehensive settlement of the Cyprus issue.

Report of Secretary-General (December). The Secretary-General reported in December [S/1997/973] that the first round of talks had been held in Troutbeck, Dutchess County, New York, from 9 to 12 July. The two leaders had considered a draft statement, suggested by the Secretary-General, for launching the process of negotiations that would set out the principles and objectives of the settlement and establish the modalities for future negotiations. They subsequently met in Nicosia with the Deputy Special Representative, Gustave Feissel, to consider humanitarian matters and concluded a 31 July agreement to achieve progress on the issue of missing persons (see below).

At the opening of the second round of talks, held in Glion-sur-Montreux, Switzerland, from 11 to 15 August, the Turkish Cypriot leader informed the Special Adviser that, in the light of the publication of an EU document entitled "Agenda 2000" (relating to negotiations on EU membership for Cyprus), and pending clarification of some of the statements contained in that document, he would not be able to adopt any formal understandings or agreements. Although two further versions of the Secretary-General's draft statement were considered, the talks ended inconclusively. The Secretary-General considered that, in the circumstances, an early third round of talks would have been unproductive.

In subsequent discussions held in New York with the leaders of the Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot communities, on 6 October and 3 November, respectively, the Secretary-General urged both leaders to show their political will to reach a settlement and to make a special effort to see recent developments in a positive light. At their invitation, Mr. Cordovez, the Special Adviser, visited Nicosia from 18 to 21 November for consultations with the two leaders and with the political party leaders of the two communities. He subsequently visited Athens, Ankara and London, the capitals of the three Guarantor Powers, and Brussels. On 27 November, Mr. Cordovez participated in a meeting held in Paris.

The Secretary-General stated that he had asked Mr. Cordovez to convey to the two community leaders, and to the Governments of Greece, Turkey and the United Kingdom, that he remained committed to continuing his good offices mission at the earliest appropriate time. He felt that to allow the present status quo to continue would entail serious danger.

In November, the two community leaders agreed that Mr. Cordovez should return to Nicosia in March 1998 to discuss the detailed modalities of a continuing process of negotiations and, it was hoped, set it in motion.

UNFICYP

The United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus (UNFICYP), established in 1964 by Security Council resolution 186(1964) [YUN 1964, p. 165.1, continued in 1997 to monitor the ceasefire lines of the Turkish forces and the Cypriot National Guard; to maintain the military status quo and prevent a recurrence of fighting; and to undertake humanitarian and economic activities. In the absence of a formal ceasefire agreement, the military status quo, as recorded by UNFICYP in 1974, remained the standard by which the Force judged whether changes constituted violations of the status quo.

Composition and deployment

UNFICYP, under the overall authority of the Deputy Special Representative and Chief of Mission, Gustave Feissel, continued to monitor the ceasefire lines and to keep the area between the ceasefire lines of the Turkish forces on the northern side and that of the Cypriot National Guard on the southern side, known as the buffer zone, under constant surveillance from 22 permanent observation posts, 2 posts for daytime surveillance and 19 patrol bases for periodic daily surveillance. It also carried out periodic surveillance from 118 additional observation posts and maintained surveillance of the seaward extension of the ceasefire lines for 5 kilometres.

As at December 1997, UNFICYP, under the command of Major-General Evergisto Arturo de Vergara (Argentina), who succeeded Brigadier-General Ahti T. P. Vartiainen (Finland) on 1 March, comprised 1,230 troops and 35 civilian police from Argentina, Australia, Austria, Canada, Finland, Hungary, Ireland, Slovenia and the United Kingdom. Its civilian component numbered 335, of whom 44 had been recruited internationally and 291 locally.

Activities (December 1996-June 1997)

On 5 June, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report [S/1997/437 & Corr.1 & Add.1] covering developments and activities of UNFICYP from 11 December 1996 to 5 June 1997. Although both sides had generally respected the ceasefire and the status quo, said the report, minor incidents, such as frequent discharges of weapons, stone throwing, pointing of weapons and shouting of abuse, reflected the continued tension existing between the two sides along the ceasefire lines. There were also a number of shooting incidents, the most serious being two incidents in the area of Louroujina, south-east of Nicosia, on 27 January and 6 February.

Military construction by both sides continued. The National Guard in Nicosia strengthened its positions near Nicosia International Airport, in the area near the Nicosia Central Prison and along the ceasefire lines east of the city, while Turkish forces continued construction and improvement of positions along the length of the buffer zone. There were a number of reports of overflights of Cypriot airspace by Turkish Air Force aircraft. In May, Cyprus announced that Greek military aircraft would not enter Cypriot airspace during the planned "Toxotis" exercise and Turkey announced that its forces would reciprocate in their exercises later in the year. In the fenced areas of Varosha, some buildings continued to be occupied by students and instances of property being removed were protested to the Turkish forces. On 6 January, Cyprus announced the purchase of S-300 surface-to-air missile systems (see above), which were scheduled to arrive towards the middle of 1998. The announcement drew a strong response from Turkey, including threats of retaliation.

As a follow-up to UNFICYP's 1996 proposals for reducing tension along the ceasefire lines, endorsed by the Security Council in resolution 1092 (1996) [YUN 1996, p. 369], the Secretary-General reported that, despite some 40 meetings with both sides at the Chief-of-Staff level, progress had not been possible. Although a convergence of views was achieved on some aspects between UNFICYP and one or the other side, no agreement was reached with both on the same subject. Only on 26 May did both sides submit detailed comments and suggestions on all the elements of UNFICYP's proposals. UNFICYP was continuing its efforts to elicit a positive response from both sides to the entire package of proposals.

UNFICYP intensified efforts to promote and facilitate bicomunal events, working closely with interested diplomatic missions on the island. On 19 May, a bicomunal concert by well-known singers from Greece and Turkey was held under UNFICYP auspices in the buffer zone near the Ledra Palace checkpoints. The concert generated a great deal of debate about bicomunal contacts, and a demonstration in Nicosia in protest against the concert resulted in violent clashes with the police. Demonstrations by Greek Cypriots also continued at the Ledra Palace checkpoint in Nicosia with the purpose of dissuading tourists from crossing to the northern part of the island.

The Secretary-General recommended that the Security Council extend UNFICYP's mandate for a further six months, until 31 December.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 27 June [meeting 3794], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1117(1997). The draft [S/1997/492] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 5 June 1997 on the United Nations operation in Cyprus,

Welcoming also the letter of 20 June 1997 to the President of the Security Council from the Secretary-General on his mission of good offices in Cyprus,

Noting that the Government of Cyprus has agreed that in view of the prevailing conditions on the island it is necessary to keep the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus beyond 30 June 1997,

Reaffirming its earlier relevant resolutions on Cyprus, in particular resolutions 186(1964) of 4 March 1964, 939(1994) of 29 July 1994 and 1092(1996) of 23 December 1996,

Noting with concern that tensions along the ceasefire lines remain high, despite the decrease in the number of serious incidents over the last six months,

Reiterating its concern that negotiations on a final political solution have been at an impasse for too long,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus for a further period ending on 31 December 1997;

2. Reminds both sides of their obligation to prevent any violence directed against Force personnel, to cooperate fully with the Force and to ensure its complete freedom of movement;

3. Underlines the importance of agreement by both sides to the reciprocal measures for the reduction of tension along the ceasefire lines proposed by the Force, as set forth in resolution 1092(1996), deeply regrets the fact that, in spite of the efforts of the Force, neither side has so far accepted such measures as a package, and reiterates its call upon both sides to do so without further delay or preconditions;

4. Calls upon the military authorities on both sides to refrain from any action, particularly in the vicinity of the buffer zone, which would exacerbate tensions;

5. Reiterates its grave concern at the continuing excessive level of military forces and armaments in the Republic of Cyprus and the rate at which they are being expanded, upgraded and modernized, including by the introduction of sophisticated weaponry, and the lack of progress towards any significant reduction in the number of foreign troops in the Republic of Cyprus, which threaten to raise tensions both on the island and in the region and complicate efforts to negotiate an overall political settlement;

6. Again calls upon all concerned to commit themselves to a reduction in defence spending and a reduction in the number of foreign troops in the Republic of Cyprus to help restore confidence between the parties and as a first step towards the withdrawal of non-Cypriot forces as described in the set of ideas, stresses the importance of eventual demilitarization of the Republic of Cyprus as an objective in the context of an overall comprehensive settlement, and calls upon the Secretary-General to promote efforts in this direction;

7. Reiterates that the status quo is unacceptable, and stresses its support for the Secretary-General's mission of good offices and the importance of the concerted efforts to work with the Secretary-General towards an overall comprehensive settlement;

8. Welcomes the decision of the Secretary-General to launch a sustained process of direct negotiations between the leaders of the two Cypriot communities with the aim of securing an overall comprehensive settlement;

9. Calls upon the leaders to commit themselves to the process of negotiations, including through participation in the first session of such negotiations, to be held from 9 to 13 July 1997, urges them to cooperate actively and constructively with the Secretary-General and his Special Adviser on Cyprus, Mr. Diego Cordovez, to that end, and stresses that full support of all concerned is necessary for this process to produce results;

10. Calls upon the parties to create a climate for reconciliation and genuine mutual confidence on both sides and to avoid any actions which might increase tension;

11. Reaffirms its position that a Cyprus settlement must be based on a State of Cyprus with a single sovereignty and international personality and a single citizenship, with its independence and territorial integrity safeguarded, and comprising two politically equal communities as described in the relevant Security Council resolutions, in a bicomunal and bi-zonal federation, and that such a settlement must exclude union in whole or in part with any other country or any form of partition or secession;

12. Welcomes the continuous efforts by the Force to implement its humanitarian mandate in respect of Greek Cypriots and Maronites living in the northern part of the island, and Turkish Cypriots living in the southern part, and regrets that there has been no further progress on the implementation of recommendations arising out of the humanitarian review undertaken by the Force in 1995;

13. Welcomes also the efforts of the United Nations and others concerned to promote the holding of bicomunal events so as to build trust and mutual respect between the two communities, urges that these efforts be continued, acknowledges the recent cooperation from all concerned on both sides to that end, and strongly encourages them to take further steps to facilitate such bicomunal events and to ensure that they take place in conditions of safety and security;

14. Reaffirms that the decision of the European Union concerning the opening of accession negotiations with Cyprus is an important development that should facilitate an overall settlement;

15. Requests the Secretary-General to keep under review the structure and strength of the Force with a view to its possible restructuring, and to present any new considerations he may have in this regard;

16. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit a report by 10 December 1997 on the implementation of the present resolution.

17. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Activities (June-December 1997)

Reporting on 8 December [S/1997/962 & Add.1] on developments in Cyprus and on UNFICYP activities from 6 June to 8 December, the Secretary-General stated that the level of tension along the ceasefire lines was higher than the norm, but lower than during the same period in 1996. Although both sides generally respected the ceasefire and the military status quo, there were frequent incidents and an increased number of restrictions of UNFICYP movement. Both sides continued to dispute the delineation of their respective ceasefire lines as well as the authority of UNFICYP in a number of areas in the UN buffer zone. The National Guard had violated the agreed arrangements for the civilian-use areas of Athienou and that part of the Nicosia-Larnaca highway that ran through the buffer zone, while Turkish forces had violated the agreed military status quo arrangements in two locations in Sector 4, denied access through the Lefka checkpoint for all UNFICYP personnel, and challenged UNFICYP's right to move freely through some parts of the buffer zone. That had resulted in a number of incidents of restriction of movement, including some occasions when physical force was used against UNFICYP foot patrols.

There was a slight rise in the number of serious shooting incidents in or near the buffer zone. The most serious incident occurred on 8 October when Turkish forces fired seven rifle shots towards a Greek Cypriot farmer who, despite UNFICYP warnings, had driven his tractor beyond the farming security line. The incidents underlined the need for agreement on UNFICYP proposals to reduce tension along the ceasefire lines as called for in Security Council resolution 1117(1997) and previous resolutions.

Both sides undertook major military construction works extending eastward from Nicosia, including anti-tank ditches and other defensive fortifications. In the Pedieos River area, to the west of the Old City of Nicosia, both sides carried out "tit for tat" construction by building a network of bunkers with connecting trenches.

On 26 September, the leaders of the two communities met jointly with Gustave Feissel, the Deputy Special Representative and Chief of Mission in Cyprus, in efforts to reach agreement on security matters. It was suggested that the two leaders should take the opportunity to endorse the UNFICYP package of proposals for unmanning, the prohibition of loaded weapons along the ceasefire lines and the code of conduct. The two leaders agreed that Mr. Feissel would follow the meeting with separate discussions with each of them in the hope of preparing the ground for an agreed joint statement. Mr. Feissel was pursuing that with the two leaders.

Turkish aircraft violated Cypriot airspace during the National Guard annual military exercises from 11 to 16 October. On 15 October, Greek military aircraft violated the spirit of the ceasefire by flying within 1,000 metres of the buffer zone. On 16 October, the Secretary-General issued a statement in which he recalled the Security Council resolutions that called on all concerned to commit themselves to a reduction in defence spending and a reduction in the number of foreign troops on the island, and called on the parties to create a climate for reconciliation and genuine mutual confidence on both sides and to avoid any actions that might increase tension. However, on 3 November, Turkish forces helicopters violated the buffer zone during the Turkish forces annual military exercise in Cyprus and,
