Agenda item 59

Strengthening of the United Nations system

Review of technical cooperation in the United Nations

Report of the Secretary-General

Summary

The present report has been prepared pursuant to paragraph 23 of General Assembly resolution 57/300, by which the Assembly welcomed the proposal of the Secretary-General contained in action 15 of his report entitled “Strengthening the United Nations: an agenda for further change” (A/57/387 and Corr.1) to issue a document identifying roles and responsibilities for technical cooperation in key areas.

The report does not cover the full range of technical cooperation activities of the United Nations and its specialized agencies. It focuses on a limited number of issues. The issues have been chosen to illustrate both the breadth and differing natures of United Nations technical cooperation undertakings. By and large, the issues have been selected also because they have a close linkage to the United Nations Secretariat.

The report also analyses the factors that have an impact on the current division of labour among various United Nations entities, including those related to funding. Areas where further clarification of roles and responsibilities is required are identified in the report, and follow-up will be undertaken accordingly.

This report is being submitted for the information of the General Assembly. It should be read in conjunction with A/58/351 “Status of implementation of actions described in the report of the Secretary-General entitled ‘Strengthening of the United Nations: an agenda for further change’”.

I. Introduction

1. In the report “Strengthening of the United Nations: an agenda for further change” (A/57/387 and Corr.1), a commitment was made to review the technical cooperation activities of the United Nations and to prepare a document identifying the roles and responsibilities for technical cooperation in key areas. The present document is the response to that commitment. A key objective of the review is to provide succinct and highly generalized information on a representative selection of issues on which the United Nations undertakes technical cooperation with a view to assisting programme countries in their decision-making with regard to technical cooperation and donors in adjusting their funding decisions where required.

2. In order to identify issues where it might eventually prove necessary to clarify roles and responsibilities, it was decided that four key principles should apply:

(a) Lead responsibility for a given issue or activity should rest with the entity best equipped substantively to assume it;

(b) Entities in the lead on a given issue or activity should work in close collaboration with the rest of the United Nations rather than attempt to duplicate expertise available elsewhere in the Organization;

(c) More systematic efforts should be made to draw on the vast reservoir of knowledge and expertise that exists outside the United Nations system;

(d) Technical cooperation should be delivered to the maximum extent possible by the entities that have an established field presence and experience. Secretariat entities should provide policy guidance and expertise, as appropriate.

3. Technical cooperation activities in the United Nations cover a vast range of organizational units, countries and combinations of countries served, and the nearly limitless combinations of issues dealt with in individual project activities. Individual governing bodies have set policy and operational directives for the various organizational units that are generally sound, but that cannot at the same time reasonably be expected to take into consideration all elements of the interrelationships with other operating entities. The system is complex. Full and complete rationalization of activity is not feasible, nor is it necessarily desirable. The objective must in the end be to strive for the most optimal possible trade-off between the goals of order, cooperation and coherence within the United Nations system, while at the same time allowing technical cooperation units to respond to the directives of their governing boards and the needs of their clients and funders in a creative and innovative manner.

4. In conducting the review, it was decided to proceed on an issues rather than an institutional basis. This reflects the concern expressed by many interlocutors that issues generally have an impact on more than one technical cooperation delivery mechanism. While the institutional mandates may be quite clear, the problems themselves tend to be quite messy and seldom align neatly with the United Nations institutional mandates. Thus, it is by using issues as the starting point that the most practical clarification and guidance can be achieved.

5. The present report has selected a limited number of high-profile issues in order to examine how the system is currently functioning, and on that basis to review what clarification of roles and responsibilities might help to improve overall impact. The issues have been chosen to illustrate both the breadth and the differing natures of United Nations technical cooperation undertakings. By and large, the issues have been selected also because they have a close linkage to the United Nations Secretariat.

6. A limited number are traditional sectoral issues — such as energy. Others reflect cross-cutting issues that ultimately must be absorbed as fundamental guidance criteria into all technical cooperation activities — such as women and gender, peace-building and information and communication technologies. Still others reflect new and emerging issues of a sensitive political and cultural nature — such as rule of law and peace-building. Yet another — HIV/AIDS — reflects a primary preoccupation for many parts of the United Nations system, and has seen Member States undertake quite unique arrangements to promote a full and coherent United Nations system response to the challenge. Each type of issue has different implications for the challenges of ensuring effective coherence while at the same time clarifying roles and responsibilities.

7. For each issue, this report has been guided by several objectives:

(a) To document the main focus and activity types of each United Nations entity on the issue;

(b) To identify current structural challenges within the United Nations system to the effective and efficient delivery of technical cooperation;

(c) To highlight certain areas where future work may be required to determine if some form of consolidation, transfer or clarification of responsibilities is required.

8. In dealing with individual issues, the present report focuses first and foremost on the United Nations Secretariat, on the funds and programmes, on other United Nations entities such as the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) and the Joint United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS (UNAIDS) and on the regional commissions. Due to their separate legal structures, the technical cooperation roles of the specialized agencies have not been addressed. In order to provide some basic information necessary to understanding the broader activity structure for certain issues where the World Bank or the World Trade Organization (WTO) interrelate in a major way with the organizational entities of the United Nations, limited information on their activities has been provided. This is intended only to improve understanding of the broader picture and does not imply that these organizations otherwise fall within the scope of the report.

9. A conceptual approach to thinking about technical cooperation is provided later in this document. In assembling information it has not proved easy to draw a clear and consistent line between technical cooperation and other activities. Differing views exist within the system as to what activities legitimately fall under the heading of technical cooperation. While attempts to standardize the presentation of the information have been made, this has not always proved to be fully successful. Given the much broader interpretation given in the current era (see discussion below) as to the breadth of technical cooperation activities under a variety of related names, this report tends to cast its net broadly.

10. Mainstreaming also presents a series of challenges. Mainstreaming occurs when an organization attempts to ensure that some important consideration (such as gender or human rights) is integrated into all of the United Nations technical cooperation activities. For the present report, mainstreaming activities have generally been included where they have been judged to represent important components of achieving the broader United Nations objectives on the issue. This approach is not, however, without its difficulties, and the judgements made in the interest of simplification have by necessity been somewhat arbitrary. To fully include mainstreaming for issues such as women and gender, for example, would have meant showing virtually every organizational entity as engaged in technical cooperation in this area. It was decided to show this type of activity only in cases where it was listed by the entity as an area in which it had a separately organized programme component or a mainstreaming staff functional unit, or was clearly engaged in a variety of project activities oriented to the issue. The United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), for example, no longer shows women and gender as one of its main practice areas, but UNDP is actively engaged in a number of important project activities to achieve objectives related to women and gender issues. In addition, it has a major commitment, a mainstreaming staff function and policies and procedures for ensuring that gender issues are taken into account across its range of activities.

11. A further challenge for the present document has been in the degree of simplification required to provide basic information that is understandable and useful to the reader. A number of initiatives have been pursued throughout the system to prepare inventories of existing capacities in a number of specific sectors. In general, these initiatives have encountered a series of practical difficulties that were also present in the preparation of this document:

- at times insufficient information to allow activities to be classified
- too much detail, making it difficult to differentiate between main activity areas and secondary undertakings
- the lack of a common structure of definitions for classifying activities.

Given its breadth, the report does not attempt to replicate such useful issue-specific inventories. The objective here has been to provide a very simple guide. The costs of achieving such simplicity are a certain level of arbitrariness and the hiding of detail.

12. The report must also be put into the context of the broader framework of other reform activities and other ongoing deliberations within the United Nations. To assist in this process, the figure “Situational framework for reform action 15” provides a simple illustration.

Situational framework for reform action 15

13. Reform action 15 deals with issues such as lead agency responsibilities, challenges to effective and efficient delivery, and the respective mandates of the various operating entities. Inherent in this overall approach are the concepts of overlap and duplication. To aid the present discussion, arbitrary definitions have been assigned to these terms.

14. Overlap is considered to exist when more than one entity is engaged in delivering technical cooperation on the same issue. Using this definition, the material provided later in the document clearly indicates that overlap is extensive within the United Nations system. Duplication is considered to exist when more than one entity is doing essentially the same type of work, or bringing essentially the same expertise to bear. Overlap and duplication therefore have quite different meanings. While overlap is common within the system, duplication is much less evident. Even though they may be working on the same issues, most United Nations entities make unique and distinctive contributions based on their differing mandates and competencies. Through both formal and informal mechanisms, most entities are focused on activities that reflect their individual mandates and the special expertise they possess. Exceptions to this general observation exist, and will be discussed.

15. In essence, action 15 looks at United Nations technical cooperation activities from the supply side — how the system is functioning in terms of the rational organization of the technical cooperation activities that it supplies to programme countries. It is not possible to look at this issue in isolation from two other key considerations that affect technical cooperation delivery. The first is the organization of activities on the demand side. This comes down to the effectiveness of the United Nations system's overall ability to programme at the country level. This effectiveness is based on its overall ability to coordinate all of its activities — basically its ability to obtain the required input from the best source of supply within the system — in order to achieve an overall coherence of United Nations programming activity at the country level. The concept of coordination applies to both the demand and supply sides.

16. What the present paper defines as “demand issues” are being dealt with in action 14 of the reform package. In document A/57/387, the mandate given to action 14 is as follows:

“The United Nations Development Group will develop, by September 2003, an implementation plan to strengthen the effectiveness of the Organization's presence in developing countries. This plan will include such features as joint programming, pooling of resources, common databases and knowledge networks, dedicated support for the resident coordinator and integrated planning, budgeting and resource mobilization tools for countries emerging from conflict.”

17. Supply and demand do not live in isolated worlds. The organization and capacities on the supply side and the organization and capacities on the demand side must complement each other. While it is not the intent of the present document to encroach upon the discussion on action 14, certain observations will be made that arise out of supply-side considerations that are relevant to that work. Ultimately, the overall package must make sense.

18. Similarly, neither demand nor supply can live in isolation from the critical element that determines not only the extent, but also the structure of both the demand and supply sides — financing. As will be discussed later, donor funding practices have a critical impact on the structure and operations of both the demand and supply sides. The key issues here are the historic patterns of assessed and voluntary funding in the United Nations system, and the increasing trend on the part of donors to earmark their voluntary contributions for specific purposes.

19. These two factors have a direct impact on the manner in which both the supply and demand sides are organized and how they operate. Ultimately, the design of both the supply and demand sides can be fully rationalized, but if funding practices do not support such a rationalization, then it cannot succeed. In this regard, attention is drawn to the Economic and Social Council document E/2003/89, which specifically addresses the issue of the funding of development cooperation activities of the United Nations system.

20. There are at least two quite distinct aspects of financing that have to be examined. While the level of contributions is always a matter of concern, of equal importance is the way in which funds are provided. The present report will make some comments on how the way in which financing is provided to the United Nations technical cooperation system has a clear and immediate impact on the organization of the supply side.

21. The coherence of the United Nations system's technical cooperation delivery structure therefore depends on three critically linked factors, each of which is currently under review within the system: the organization and capacities on the supply side, the organization and capacities on the demand side, and the overall system of financing.

22. Before addressing the selected issues individually, some broader observations relating to the evolution of technical cooperation in the United Nations are required. Understanding today's technical cooperation environment, both within the United Nations and in the much broader development community, is an essential prerequisite for taking informed decisions on roles and responsibilities.

II. Broader issues having an impact on United Nations technical cooperation

A. What is technical cooperation?

23. Success in the development process varies greatly from region to region and from country to country. Models fixated on economic growth that proved successful in some countries in the post-Second World War era failed nevertheless to deliver universal results. Capital alone proved unsuccessful in dealing both with poverty and with broader economic and social development in many countries.

24. While advocates of the human dimensions of development had long been present in the aid community — and many of the most eloquent advocates were to be found in the United Nations system — it was not until the 1990s that a broader consensus started to coalesce around their fundamental view that the importance of human development was equal to or greater than that of the availability of development capital.

25. If the consensus did not emerge until the 1990s, strong evidence was available much earlier. In many countries, infrastructure alone did not bring about the desired developmental breakthroughs. The human dimensions of expertise — acquiring the information, skills and knowledge needed to run a modern society — came to the forefront as essential questions to be addressed. Attempts to transfer skills and knowledge systems were initially labelled technical assistance, a term that gave way subsequently to technical cooperation.

26. But technical cooperation also proved ultimately to be insufficient in many countries. Targeted skills transfers often did not permeate a society and achieve the multiplier effect desired. During the 1990s, UNDP (and others) conducted extensive reviews that concluded that while many technical cooperation projects had achieved their immediate objectives, they had been much less successful at developing local institutions and had limited impact in significantly strengthening local capacities. Emphasis then shifted from the use of expatriate technical cooperation personnel to the nurturing of national professionals.

27. That approach, while better, also failed to serve as a catalyst for economic and social take-off. Many now argue that if capacities in countries are truly to be developed, it is not enough to expand individual human skills. It is critical also to create societal values and structures that create incentives for people to use and extend those skills. This leads to the concept of capacity development, which entails three quite different levels of challenge:

- Individual: enabling individuals to embark on a continuous process of learning
- Institutional: seeking out and building on existing local initiatives to create stronger local institutions
- Societal: creating societal values and systems that allow individuals and institutions to grow and to create a transformation for development.¹

28. Evident within both the United Nations system and the World Bank are concerns about the ongoing relevance, quality and sustainability of technical cooperation activities. Past patterns of disappointment about technical cooperation results continue to exist. These concerns are particularly relevant to stand-alone technical cooperation projects. With the universal commitment to the Millennium Development Goals, it will be fundamentally important to situate technical cooperation properly within the broader strategic framework documents used by each country, including, where applicable, the Poverty Reduction Strategy Papers. Technical cooperation inputs must make sense in the broader programming framework. In the country context, the impact of technical cooperation activities, along with the longer-term sustainability of their impact, will have to be more aggressively monitored and evaluated.

29. Emphasis is increasingly shifting from the provision of outside experts to the building of knowledge networks using newly available technologies that allow developing country professionals direct access to the guidance and best-practice information that they need to act themselves. Other forms of more formally structured distance education and learning are also an important element of this new approach, particularly given the evolution of both the quality of and the access to improved communications technology. As the emphasis on knowledge networking grows, there is a corresponding reduction in the emphasis on formal knowledge transfer, the latter being an orientation that has resulted in questionable historical impact.

30. The present report will continue to use the traditional term of technical cooperation, but the term itself should be seen as also embracing the more modern concepts of capacity-building (including knowledge networking) at all three of the levels outlined above. In this context, the report includes certain activities such as analysis, policy development, advocacy and promotion where they are considered to be directly supportive of the organizations' other technical cooperation activities.

B. Multiplicity of United Nations technical cooperation suppliers

31. The United Nations system of technical cooperation is complex. Why are so many United Nations entities doing technical cooperation?

32. The simplest, but perhaps most superficial answer to this question is, "Because their governing bodies have instructed them to do so". The complexity of the United Nations technical cooperation system arises out of Member States acting in many different governing bodies to deal with the issues of particular concern to those bodies. They act first and foremost on an issues basis, and it is perhaps only in some of the more broadly mandated United Nations governance mechanisms, such as the General Assembly or the Economic and Social Council, that the broader emerging results for the United Nations system overall are reviewed.

33. For a variety of reasons, it is difficult for the United Nations senior governance bodies to impose full and complete "monopolistic task mandates" throughout the entire system, even if such an outcome were considered desirable. Central governance mechanisms recognize that individual programme governing boards working on a consensus basis are best able to manage their own affairs within the broader policy parameters of the overall United Nations system, particularly since sensitive issues of voluntary funding are normally involved. They are reluctant to intervene in a directive manner if it risks upsetting the negotiation of solutions by the boards of the funds or programmes. This unwillingness to intervene, however, contributes to the tendency of many United Nations entities to go their own way, regardless of the consequences for broader system coherence.

34. In addition to the "differing issues" explanation, the entities doing technical cooperation also fall into a limited number of categories of fundamentally different functional natures. These differing functional natures arise from the quite different starting points that are inherent to their fundamental mandates, and lead to quite different justifications for involvement in technical cooperation. These different functional natures can be generally characterized as follows:

(a) Entities whose primary objectives include technical cooperation, such as UNDP and the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD)/International Trade Centre. They exist first and foremost as entities established for the purpose of programming and delivering technical cooperation;

(b) Entities that combine certain types of direct field operational activities with technical cooperation — examples are the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) and the Department of Peacekeeping Operations (for peacekeeping operations). These entities are involved in technical cooperation because it flows naturally as a long-term approach to dealing with the short-term operational challenges they face;

(c) Entities that exist primarily for reasons of intergovernmental servicing, policy development and normative functions that result in governing body instructions to engage in supporting technical cooperation activities — examples include the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (for both drugs and crime), OHCHR, UNCTAD and the Department of Economic and Social Affairs. In some cases these entities are also responsible for promoting the implementation of the outcomes of global conferences and/or of specific international treaties and protocols. These entities are involved in technical cooperation because it is a natural extension to apply directly in the field the benefits of their normative, policy or analytical activities for the direct benefit of developing countries, or because countries require assistance in ratifying and implementing treaties and protocols. A second important motivation exists for these entities — that direct field experience is important in developing and maintaining the knowledge base that they require to exercise their normative, policy and intergovernmental servicing functions;

(d) Entities that have responsibility for promoting and mainstreaming certain cross-sectoral and cross-institutional themes, such as the Department of Economic and Social Affairs Division for the Advancement of Women and the United Nations Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM) on women and gender issues and OHCHR on human rights. These entities tend to have a dual mandate — advocacy for their issues within the United Nations system, and direct support in related areas to some developing countries. Some of the entities also have responsibilities relating to international treaties or protocols;

(e) Entities created for geographic purposes, most specifically the regional commissions, which exist first and foremost to promote regional solutions to shared problems.

35. What is evident from this simple examination of the origins of the technical cooperation entities is that each may have a legitimate and mandated interest in the same activity. The matrix of considerations to be brought to bear on any single project or programme activity is complex and multidimensional. It is not consistent with the multidimensional nature of the problems being addressed to assume that one single neat set of mandates can be created for United Nations technical cooperation that will ensure that emerging issues can be addressed by a single entity. That is not the reality of the modern world. This is a fundamental reality that underpins the present report. It is not possible to design one set of clear institutional mandates that would eliminate all overlap and create in essence a series of monopolistic suppliers within the United Nations system of technical cooperation.

36. Even the creation of some kind of single, monolithic, all-empowered United Nations technical cooperation agency would not necessarily solve the fundamental problem of developing, maintaining and mobilizing the range of skills required to address multidimensional problems. Such a move would shift the challenge of resolving the multidimensional matrix issues from an inter-organizational basis to an interdepartmental basis within the single organization. It is arguable that such a monolithic structure would prove to be more effective in achieving efficient and effective response to technical cooperation needs. The alternative is to be able to quickly assemble required teams from a variety of smaller organizations that are specialized, competent, manageable in size and flexible.

37. In such a situation, the key to effective response is the ability to build when required, and disassemble when no longer required, multidisciplinary teams of experts (or organizations) that can bring their unique and specialized capacities to bear in a common effort for the time period required. Where the time period is long, this may require some type of formal institutional relationship. Numerous examples of this type of relationship exist in the system today, UNAIDS being a most evident example. For shorter time frames, many less formal arrangements, such as joint task forces and working groups, pursue similar goals with less heavy mechanisms. Much of the day-to-day coordination work being done today takes place largely out of sight except to the professionals involved and is based on relatively informal arrangements, in which competent and interested parties cooperate in practical ways to mobilize from many different parties the range of required inputs.

38. There are, however, practical limits on the number of small organizational entities that should be encouraged. The more players, the more costly the supply-side coordination process and the more difficulty in achieving strategic coherence. In addition, while the technical competencies of the United Nations entities may be unique, they often replicate support-service functions that are less than optimally efficient.

39. If the United Nations system of technical cooperation at times appears excessively complex to the outside viewer, it is not without its logic. The entities that deliver technical cooperation were created to achieve certain objectives, and in many cases their mandates are highly specialized. While certain problems of interface do exist, the present review found very few situations where managers were not conscious of both the formal and practical limits of their mandates. Most recognize that in the extremely complex world of development, the contributions of many specialized players are required if the wide and varied scope of expertise required is to be successfully mobilized. The practical implications of human and financial resource limitations can nevertheless result in supply-side coordination that is less than optimal.

40. In a fast-changing world where problems are increasingly complex, the best managers work out the required informal working relationships to ensure that required inputs are brought to bear, without excessive introspection on the implications for formal mandates. Their solutions are inherently practical in nature. Such attitudes are essential for success in chaotic, rapidly evolving situations.

41. There are three main implications of these observations for the present report:

- First, as outlined earlier in this report, the fact that many United Nations entities operate in addressing the same basic problems does not in itself indicate that inefficient duplication exists. Overlap in terms of different entities bringing their unique competencies to bear on the same issue is not by definition duplicative. Quite the contrary, this can often reflect the group mobilization of a variety of skills to deal with a complex problem.
- Second, that activities may not be duplicative does not necessarily mean that they are optimally organized to reduce transaction costs and to contribute to the broader objectives of coordination and coherence at the country level. Many of the technical cooperation programmes of the United Nations system are very small, in terms of both financial and personnel resources. The existence of so many relatively small programmes, as well as the repetitive structures of the larger funds and programmes, does raise important cost-efficiency questions, particularly at the field level. The United Nations pays a cost for its intellectual diversity.

- Third, while order is necessary, formal mandate clarification is an imperfect tool for achieving broader system-wide coordination and coherence. The United Nations technical cooperation system does not lend itself to a simple and clear portrayal in an organizational chart. Daily working attitudes and effective programming mechanisms at the field level are more important to ensuring effective response than are detailed mandates. Governing-body members (and in many cases several governing bodies will be involved) will never be able to stay on top of and respond in a timely manner to all of the emerging changes in the working environment. Mandate clarification might therefore be best reserved for situations that clearly require it — situations involving new organizations or organizations on which the mandate changes of other entities have a secondary impact, or where clearly counter-productive duplication exists.

C. Transition in the United Nations

42. Many factors have contributed to a dramatic change in the United Nations technical cooperation environment over the past decade. Key institutions such as UNDP have assumed new roles. Donors have significantly adjusted their technical cooperation funding patterns. New strategic and planning frameworks have been introduced. The Millennium Development Goals are focusing all efforts on the fundamental objective of poverty reduction. New and important cross-sectoral issues have emerged.

1. A new role for the United Nations Development Programme

43. For more than three decades, UNDP served as the central funding agency for technical cooperation in the United Nations system. During that period, UNDP was a funding and not (primarily) a substantive agency. Programme countries allocated the resources available through the UNDP system of indicative planning figures and executed projects normally through a United Nations organizational entity other than UNDP. The normative and specialized entities of the United Nations looked to UNDP to fund projects that allowed them to implement the programme priorities established by their governing bodies.

44. Today, UNDP has repositioned itself. The old central funding agency concept is gone. UNDP has become both a substantive agency and a funding agency. It now delivers most of its project activities through the processes known as national execution or direct execution. UNDP has established six basic priority areas for the allocation of its resources and the concurrent development of its own substantive capacities and knowledge networks:

- (a) Democratic governance;
- (b) Poverty reduction;
- (c) Crisis prevention and recovery;
- (d) Energy and environment;

- (e) Information and communication technologies;
- (f) HIV/AIDS.

45. Despite the many benefits of the new UNDP mandate, the loss of the central funding role has removed one element that historically worked in favour of a coordinated supply-side approach, which was the requirement for many agencies to integrate their technical cooperation projects into the UNDP country programmes. This makes it more difficult to achieve coordination on the supply side, and could be said to increase directly the importance of both the demand side (programming at the country level) and of the financing system in achieving overall coherence.

46. As UNDP has moved from central funding, it has also advertised its move “upstream” — away from a focus on implementing individual projects at the field level, towards achieving a broader impact by influencing the policy development and strategic direction-setting of programme-country Governments. This move upstream has been at least partially dictated by the very severe resource constraints under which UNDP has operated over the past decade. Despite its move upstream, UNDP still essentially works in a project rather than programme mode.

47. In implementing its new mandate, UNDP has reoriented its activities in ways that have both reduced and increased its potential areas of duplication with other entities of the United Nations system. By and large, UNDP has defined its future role in terms of broader themes that cover many different specialized areas. By doing this, it has cast its net very broadly, to the point where many highly specialized activities undertaken by other entities now conceivably fall under its defined practice areas. The question then arises as to how UNDP will position itself in relation to these other entities. On the other hand, as part of its move upstream, UNDP largely exited specific sectoral fields (such as health and education) that are the focus of the specialized agencies in particular. This withdrawal has removed a number of areas of potential duplication.

48. The new role of UNDP is broadly seen as beneficial, but it is important to understand some of its direct and indirect implications:

(a) The central funding approach was historically an important element in working towards coherence on the supply side of the United Nations system of technical cooperation. With its demise, there is no longer a built-in mechanism that allocates funding to priority needs at some central point within the system. The implication is that this process must now be addressed primarily in the field;

(b) This also underscores the critical importance of donor funding practices in achieving overall coherence within the system. More entities must now raise a larger portion of their technical cooperation funding requirements through direct dealings with donors. Many closest to United Nations technical cooperation argue that the greatest force working against the rational organization and coherence of the United Nations technical cooperation system is donor practices that create excessive competition among United Nations entities for donor funding support;

(c) The United Nations system’s technical cooperation entities now operate in more of a market situation. Donors, through their willingness to support a growing number of supplementary funding modalities, as well as the creation of a variety of new programmes within the United Nations, have indicated that they wish to have choices as to the activities and units that they fund. Operating experience also demonstrates that programme countries also wish to be able to choose from a variety of service suppliers the one that can best address their individual needs. Having been instrumental in creating such a market situation, which is not without its benefits, Member States must, however, recognize that they cannot logically argue at the same time for a fully rationalized system devoid of competing entities;

(d) Access to UNDP as the traditional source of financing has now been either reduced or eliminated for most other United Nations technical cooperation entities as the combined result of both the changed funding approach and the switch to national or direct execution. This leaves them with two fundamental options: to withdraw from technical cooperation, or to engage in their own supplementary fund-raising activities. It is noteworthy in this regard that a number of entities outside of UNDP feel that they have in fact benefited overall from the reduction in UNDP funding. They point to two reasons for this perhaps unexpected result: they have been forced to improve the quality of their project activities in order to market them effectively to donors, and they have been able to develop new and more equal partnerships with UNDP. It should be noted that this positive conclusion is not universal, however, and some entities have seen their programmes shrink as they have been unable to replace UNDP funding;

(e) UNDP, for its part, is now challenged with the need to develop its required substantive sectoral expertise or supporting knowledge networks using voluntary funds, while some other technical cooperation entities support critical substantive backstopping and sometimes even direct technical cooperation project activities with funding from assessed budgets.

2. Changes in donor funding practices

49. Throughout most of the 1970s and late into the 1980s, earmarked resources tended to be the exception rather than the rule for United Nations funds and programmes. Earmarking can take many different forms. A decision to support the unified budget and work plan of UNAIDS reflects a very general earmarking towards a specific sector, as compared to providing the same funding as core resources to (for example) UNDP, with its multidimensional programme where allocation decisions are taken by its governing board.

50. More stringent earmarking takes place when a donor, even within the context of a multidimensional programme such as UNAIDS, UNDP or UNICEF, decides to earmark funding for one particular programme line. This can be carried further to specific earmarking not only for a specific programme, but also for the intended beneficiary. The most extreme earmarking occurs when a donor brings a programme or project already elaborated in considerable detail and essentially hires the United Nations entity to execute it on the donor's behalf.

51. All of these forms of earmarking represent movement away from the traditional key values of a multilateral institutional approach:

(a) Where the trust and ownership benefits of a multilateral programme are promoted through a process of shared decision-making by both the donor and programme countries that constitute the governing board;

(b) Where resources lose their identity of source when they are contributed to the common pool, which is then allocated according to the policies of the governing board;

(c) Where donors do not protect their legitimate interests (particularly on accountability) through bilateral relationships with the management of the organization or with individual beneficiary countries, but through the activities of the governing board, which reflects the interests of all Member States through a single point of policy direction to the responsible programme managers;

(d) Where important decisions are taken through a process of finding common ground with all participants that allows the work of the organization to proceed in an orderly manner;

(e) Where all members of the organization, as partners in the decision-making process, assume responsibility for the programme's political, policy, programme and financial viability.

52. Earmarking is an issue of increasing importance for the United Nations technical cooperation system. A few selected examples indicate the extent of the evolution of funding practices in recent years. The contribution data for the last two decades indicates that for UNDP earmarked contributions from major aid-providing countries represented 3 per cent of their total contributions in 1980 and 33 per cent of their total contributions in 2001. These figures do not include any amounts provided by major aid-providing countries in the form of third-party cost sharing. When all contribution sources are taken into account, the regular core resources of UNDP accounted for only 25 per cent of total contributions received in 2001.

53. The picture for UNICEF is similar but not as dramatic, since UNICEF was one of the first of the United Nations organizations to actively solicit supplementary resources through its "noted projects" approach. In 1980, 36 per cent of donor-country contributions were earmarked, a figure which reached 52 per cent in 2000.

54. Since financing is not the primary orientation of the present report, no comparable data for the other technical cooperation activities of the United Nations system was assembled. It is noteworthy, however, that the continued growth of the number of special funding arrangements within the United Nations structure represents an ongoing dilution of the multilateral characteristics of the system as a whole.

55. While some of the United Nations entities other than the funds and programmes have access to small amounts of assessed regular budget funding for their technical cooperation activities, most are largely dependent on voluntary funding, most of which is earmarked. For the latter entities, the strategic direction of their technical cooperation activities is largely dependent on the priorities of the donor countries concerned.

56. In his annual report to the UNDP Executive Board for 2001, the Administrator made the following observation:

"It should be noted that regular and other resources are not transposable. The ability of UNDP to fulfil its mandate and to mobilize other resources depends fundamentally on its having an adequate, secure regular funding base that guarantees its multilateral, impartial and universal character. In recalling its landmark decision 98/23 on the MYFF [multi-year funding framework] and core funding strategy, the Executive Board may wish to urge all donors to restore growth and predictability to the regular funding base of UNDP" (DP/2002/25, Summary).

57. The evolving pattern of donor financing of the United Nations technical cooperation system has many implications, only a few of which are listed here:

(a) Only a modest proportion of the total technical cooperation activity of the United Nations system can be programmed fully according to the policies and priorities established by the respective governing boards. While the programmes normally do not accept earmarking that is clearly inconsistent with governing policies, all earmarking distorts in some measure one or more components of board-approved policy by removing the funding from the control of those policies;

(b) While for some entities the level of earmarked funding has remained in a relatively stable growth pattern over an extended period, the specific purposes for which it is earmarked are less predictable. This means that effective programme planning and staffing are increasingly impaired as the level of earmarking grows;

(c) Entities with substantive normative and policy functions that may have no or only limited access to assessed funding find it increasingly difficult to maintain their status as centres of knowledge and expertise in their mandated sectors, particularly as the increasing levels of supplementary funding do not, in most cases, contribute appropriately to the support of core functions;

(d) Programme structures are being increasingly driven not by need, but by the availability of earmarked donor funding;

(e) In urgent situations, the lack of core funding hampers speed of response as the programmes await donor funding commitments.

D. The World Bank

58. Officials in all United Nations technical cooperation entities have commented on the impact of the World Bank (including the International Development Association (IDA)) as it expands its activities in capacity-building. The resource levels being brought by the World Bank to areas more traditionally associated with the United Nations system are in some cases reducing the United Nations system entities to niche players. The growth of the World Bank in these areas will almost certainly continue. It is therefore urgent to continue to develop practical means for the United Nations system and the World Bank to work together in a complementary manner.

59. In the field of technical cooperation, the Bank is devoting considerable attention to identifying broader systemic issues that have an impact on the development process, and particularly on the activities of all development assistance providers. For the Bank, two issues stand out in the broad area of technical cooperation as requiring attention: the programming and impact of capacity-building activities, and the urgent need for an increased harmonization of donor policies and procedures.

60. That the agendas of the Bank and the United Nations system are increasingly converging is evidenced not only by their joint commitment to the Millennium Development Goals, but also by a simple review of the thematic perspectives guiding the Bank's work:

- Addressing the social, institutional, and economic dimensions of poverty
- Investing in people
- Promoting environmentally and socially sustainable development
- Supporting private sector development and infrastructure
- Building strong financial systems
- Promoting the rule of law.

61. As a result of this convergence of basic goals, it is equally evident that the new directions of the Bank will increasingly bring it into play as a major factor in areas traditionally considered to be the “territory” of the United Nations system. Grant funding through the Bank has increased significantly in recent years and will continue to increase. In 2002, the Bank disbursed $1.9 billion in grant funding through its series of trust funds. Trust fund assets rose during the year from $4.38 billion to $5.34 billion — an increase of 22 per cent. The Bank describes its trust fund activities as leading

“to grant funding of high-priority development needs, including technical assistance and advisory services, debt relief, postconflict transition, and cofinancing. Trust funds help the Bank leverage its poverty reduction programs by funding key due diligence activities for development operations, promoting innovative approaches for projects, forging partnerships, and expanding the scope of development collaboration.”²

62. More than half of the Bank’s trust fund disbursements were from its five major programmes:

- (a) Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) Initiative;
- (c) Policy and Human Resource Development Fund;
- (d) Consultative Group on International Agricultural Research;
- (e) Ozone Trust Fund.

- (a) Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria;
- (b) Afghanistan Reconstruction Trust Fund;
- (c) Nile River Basin Trust Fund;
- (d) Eastern Greater Great Lakes Trust Fund;
- (e) Knowledge for Change Trust Fund;
- (f) Trust Fund for Capacity Building for Poverty Reduction Strategies in Low-Income Countries; and
- (g) Financial Sector Reform and Strengthening Initiative.

64. In addition to its trust funds, in its IDA 13 replenishment the World Bank’s governors have provided significantly increased levels of grant funds. For an overall IDA replenishment of approximately $23 billion, it is anticipated that grant commitments will be in the range of 18 to 21 per cent over the three-year period of the replenishment. This will mean the commitment of grant funding at the level of approximately $4.1 billion to $4.9 billion, or annual commitments in the range of $1.4 billion to $1.6 billion in addition to trust fund disbursements. This compares to the total of approximately $2.6 billion received by UNDP in 2001.

65. Important differences exist, however, which relate directly back to the systems of financing of the two organizations. For the Bank, its entire non-trust fund grant disbursements are allocated and disbursed according to the approved policies of the Bank covering the priority sectors and countries. For UNDP, the use of only 25 per cent (the core portion of total UNDP resource availability) is programmed fully according to the policies established by its Executive Board. The remaining 75 per cent is earmarked in some manner, which removes it at least partly from the central priority focus of UNDP.

66. While the Bank's grant usage patterns may have to be adjusted on the basis of practical operating experience, the following is the general allocation of the IDA 13 replenishment grant funds:

- Between 8 and 19 per cent (depending on need) will go to post-conflict activities
- About 6 per cent will go to natural disaster reconstruction
- About 22 per cent will go to HIV/AIDS projects in all IDA-only countries
- About 3 per cent will go to HIV/AIDS projects in IDA blend countries
- About 44 per cent will be allocated to debt-vulnerable IDA-only countries with per capita gross national product equal to or less than $360
- About 17 per cent will go to other IDA-only countries with per capita gross national product equal to or less than $360.

67. It must be a source of concern about the current governance and operational modalities of a variety of United Nations development activities that this growth in World Bank grant funding reflects a conscious decision by donors to bypass the United Nations in favour of the Bank. This underscores the importance of the question raised in paragraph 7 of document E/2003/89, on the funding of development cooperation activities of the United Nations system:

“The basic question to be addressed in this post-Monterrey period, when major donors have begun to increase their ODA [official development assistance], is where and how does multilateral development cooperation and, in particular, the operational work of the United Nations system, fit into the international development agenda.”

68. As that document correctly notes, it was the universal, democratic and neutral character of the United Nations that played a crucial role in building the consensus around the current development agenda. Although it may still be premature to draw conclusions about long-term trends, this key leadership role in creating a universal consensus around the Millennium Development Goals has not to date translated into a renewed commitment by donors to fund the United Nations system to play a growing operational role. The record to date indicates that donors prefer other channels.

69. In order to assist in the conceptualization of the issues addressed by the present report, a series of factors that could be driving donor choices are put forward. Each of these points is arguable, but denying them in their totality will make it difficult to improve the competitive position of the United Nations system in attracting increased resource flows in the future:

(a) Donors clearly have a voting control in the Bank that they do not have in the United Nations system. While they accept the legitimacy of the role of the United Nations in setting the broader policy agenda, they prefer much more direct control over the resulting programme delivery process;

(b) The Bank tends to speak with one voice (despite active internal debate), while the United Nations system speaks with many. Despite the complexity of the Bank, and the range of substantive and financial tools that it must bring together to achieve optimal impact, internal contradictions can be resolved through a single senior management team and a single governance structure. This contrasts with the United Nations system, where multiple management teams and multiple governing bodies are involved. To the extent that ensuring a consistent approach to the operational challenges of development programming is a virtue, then the decision-making structure of the Bank will be preferred;

(c) The Bank operates through a single presence at the field level. The United Nations operates through multiple presences, and it is moral suasion rather than directives that the United Nations (always, of course, guided by the wishes of the programme country) uses to attempt to achieve country-level coherence. Some United Nations entities resist voluntary coordination mechanisms because they clearly place a greater premium on their individual identities than on an integrated and coherent overall United Nations system response;

(d) The Bank has successfully managed a major delegation of both decision-making authority and personnel to the field. It also plays the leadership role in supporting the government on the Poverty Reduction Strategy Paper process, which is increasingly the guiding strategic document for country activities. While individual United Nations entities have engaged in similar processes for field strengthening and empowerment, multiple players are still involved, and the United Nations presence (as opposed to the presence of individual United Nations entities) is constrained by the minimal resources supporting the Resident Coordinator functions. Because the Resident Coordinator function is not supported with adequate resources, its leadership role is not exercised with sufficient quality to be respected by the other United Nations entities present;

(e) The Bank is perceived by donors to be more cost-efficient than the United Nations. This proposition is highly debatable, but little data exists to reach an objective judgement. The complexity of the United Nations structure, the number of individual entities involved and the small size of many of the programmes being managed are all issues relevant to the present report that may contribute to the perceived relative inefficiency of the United Nations system. The multiple field representation of the United Nations system directly contributes to both the impression and the reality of inefficiency.

70. As the thematic orientations of the Bank and the United Nations have become more common, the line of demarcation between their programming lines has become more blurred. So too has the historical role of the Bank as a lending institution in contrast to the United Nations as a granting system. In many areas, cooperation between the Bank and the United Nations has actually expanded, including at the country level. The potential for enhanced future collaboration certainly exists. There are many examples to demonstrate that even with an expanding technical cooperation mandate, the Bank prefers to work with established centres of outside expertise, such as some of the United Nations entities, rather than attempt to duplicate them internally. Centres of excellence with demonstrated competence within the United Nations system can clearly situate themselves advantageously within this Bank approach. The question yet to be answered is whether it is still possible to think in terms of some division of labour and complementarity of roles based on their respective competencies.

71. Recent trends indicate that, in the areas of technical cooperation and capacity-building, donors no longer draw a line between what the Bank is expected to do and what the United Nations is expected to do. Most donors have not adopted policies on the Bank's role versus the United Nations system's role, other than general exhortations against duplication. Despite this evolution, Bank officials recognize that the United Nations has skills that the Bank does not possess (and vice versa) and that the United Nations possesses in certain substantive issue areas both a moral authority and a political mandate that the Bank does not claim. The cultural sensitivity of the United Nations system is also generally recognized. If it is still possible to think about a delineation of roles, the basis for such a delineation will likely be found in areas where these characteristics are essential to effective functioning.

72. The United Nations and the Bank share a growing commitment to coordination and programme coherence, and therefore to increasingly close collaboration. The financial power of the Bank, supported by the quality and size of its human resource pool, will certainly have an impact on the nature of the future relationship between the two parties. Just how those objectives will be achieved is a complex challenge that in the end will no doubt have a variety of answers. Closer future collaboration may be based on negotiated cooperation agreements between the Bank and the United Nations entities. Of perhaps greater immediate practicality will be the importance of reaching collaborative working relationships in the programming process in the field. This will mean active and quality participation by the United Nations in some coherent form in the Poverty Reduction Strategy Paper process, and this will certainly imply a significant strengthening of both the United Nations field presence and its ability to function at the field level in a coherent manner, both with its United Nations and its external partners.

73. It could hypothetically be argued that rationalization of the supply side of United Nations technical cooperation is not so critical as long as the right inputs can be mobilized in a timely manner to meet priority needs in the programme country. Under such an approach, a competitive situation among the United Nations technical cooperation suppliers would provide choice, while overall coherence is achieved through the country programming process. Without ruling out the positive benefits of some element of choosing between alternative sources, the present report maintains that the supply side, the demand side and the financing modalities must all in the end be mutually supportive for optimal coherence to be achieved.

74. Since the present document deals primarily with the supply side of United Nations technical cooperation, it is useful to look first at mechanisms for coordination and coherence from that perspective. Coordination and coherence can be achieved in many different ways, including both formal and informal mechanisms. Historically, the United Nations system has attempted to achieve coherence both through the coordination of inputs at the supply end and through efforts to achieve coherent programming at the country level. All signs indicate that while the supply side must have some minimal coherence, there is a major shift of emphasis for achieving coherence at the field level.

75. Leaving formal processes temporarily aside, it is first important to recognize that informal coordination by responsible programme managers is achieved through the thousands of interpersonal contacts that take place each day throughout the system. The best possible tool for achieving system coherence at the practical operating level is the knowledgeable and competent manager — preferably working in the context of an agreed strategy framework for the United Nations as a whole that is supportive of the Poverty Reduction Strategy Paper or other country-led process. It is important to underline that this process of informal coordination, despite the inevitable deviations, is alive and well within the system, but is limited by practical resource constraints.

76. An essential part of recent reform efforts has been to support interpersonal processes with more formal coordination mechanisms aimed at achieving greater overall coherence and impact for United Nations technical cooperation and other activities. In efforts to promote coordination, however, one critically important element must be borne in mind — coordination is not a free commodity in a complex environment. Coordination must be looked at on the basis of the cost of lack of coordination versus the cost of coordination. Perfect coordination will never be achieved, and very high levels of coordination that may be achievable may, on the other hand, be unaffordable.

77. There is no single answer to the question, “How much coordination can the United Nations afford?” As a general rule, activities functioning in governmental and intergovernmental structures tend to be influenced by political factors more than by cost/benefit factors in answering this question. The political difficulties created by a real or perceived lack of coordination can be far more damaging to a governmental or intergovernmental body than the actual value of the loss incurred. In the case of the United Nations, the damage can be done to the image of the institution itself, to the Secretary-General, or to the images of the many different programmes that the system comprises, along with their executive heads.

78. Within the field of technical cooperation coordination, many formal mechanisms of quite differing natures exist to promote coordination objectives. A quite unique example of Governments intervening directly to establish an innovative response to a perceived coordination need lies in the creation of UNAIDS. In order to promote an effective and coordinated United Nations system response to the HIV/AIDS pandemic, UNAIDS was created by the Economic and Social Council as a joint programme of six (now eight) United Nations institutions. The challenge of the disease clearly motivated Member States to take extraordinary and innovative measures to maximize the timeliness and effectiveness of a coordinated United Nations system response.

79. UNAIDS has recently completed its first five-year evaluation. While reflecting the important accomplishments of UNAIDS during its first five years, it also highlights the original difficulties of enlisting coordination from a variety of system players “driven in the early years of the programme by concerns over mandates and inter-agency rivalry”.³ Few issues or substantive sectors can justify the creation of a UNAIDS model programme to promote coherence between the various United Nations players. Here the system falls back on a series of coordinating committees (including the Executive Committee of the United Nations Development Group, the Executive Committee for Economic and Social Affairs, the Executive Committee for Humanitarian Affairs and the Executive Committee for Peace and Security), a variety of inter-agency task teams, and common strategic and programming approaches such as the Common Country Assessments and the United Nations Development Assistance Frameworks.

80. Other assessments of these tools have been done, and their conclusions will not be repeated here. What perhaps deserves repetition is the general concern of technical cooperation entities, normally but not always the smaller ones, which do not benefit from their own field representation, in having their interests reflected in some of these mechanisms.

81. The United Nations system has made important progress in improving both supply-side and demand-side coordination during the period of the reform process. This has naturally involved costs — both the direct costs of the coordinating mechanisms and the indirect costs incurred by individual entities for participation in their work. Some feel that for the benefits of the investments made to date in supply-side coordination to be effectively realized, corresponding strengthening of the field-level coordination mechanisms must be made.

82. This problem of field representation is further exacerbated when the decentralization of programming authority of many bilateral and multilateral agencies is combined with the ongoing need to mobilize supplementary (earmarked) resources for technical cooperation activities. To the extent that smaller programmes may have a very limited field presence where the officials of other agencies are increasingly taking financial commitment decisions, their ability to mobilize resources is seriously affected.

83. One evident way to improve supply-side coordination would be to reduce the number of United Nations entities involved in the delivery of technical cooperation. An alternative to this approach would be to move further towards cooperative issue-by-issue programming involving a number of differing United Nations entities. UNAIDS represents a highly formalized example of such an approach. Other less formal approaches could also be developed. In the discussion of the selected issues (see annex), a number of areas where some rationalization may be required are briefly discussed. The possible rationalization of the supply side for a number of these issues could be ultimately dependent on the interpretation to be given to the very broadly defined practice areas of UNDP. At the extreme, some technical cooperation activities currently housed in other agencies could be absorbed into UNDP. Less radical would be to promote much closer working relationships between UNDP and other entities that house specialized skills that are relevant to UNDP practice areas.

III. Conclusions

84. The present report has provided basic information on the technical cooperation activities of the United Nations on a selected number of important issues. While the United Nations technical cooperation system is complex, it is not without its historical rationale. The variety of differing mechanisms that exist within the system for the delivery of technical cooperation continue to attract funding support from donors, and their services continue to be of value to developing countries. Donor funding practices have a major impact on the structure of the system. Rationalization of the supply-side structure must therefore be addressed cautiously, for it is not guaranteed that existing funding arrangements would follow any functional reorganization within the system. This and other factors tend to favour an incremental approach to rationalization rather than a fundamental restructuring. This report emphasizes the linkages between the supply side, the demand side and the system of financing. Each must complement and support the others if an optimal system is to be achieved.

85. Despite the large number of entities involved overall and the variety that may act on any single issue, the areas of outright duplication of roles that were identified are limited. A number of areas where some element of clarification may be required have been flagged. A process of follow-up on the main recommendations emerging from this report will be undertaken by the Deputy Secretary-General. Action will be taken to ensure that optimum synergies within the system are achieved. The Administrator of UNDP will be requested to undertake, in close collaboration with interested United Nations department heads, a review of a few key issues on which the division of labour can be improved and will report back to the Deputy Secretary-General. Attention will also be given to ensuring effective collaboration between the regional commissions and the funds and programmes, in cases where there is shared sectoral priority and where the required expertise exists. Member States will be informed of the follow-up actions as part of the triennial comprehensive policy review in 2004.

86. A complex and at times under-resourced system appears to be performing reasonably well. Managers are aware of their mandates, and are aware also of the need to work with others to achieve the range of required inputs. The system has not been designed for optimal efficiency, but rather has evolved over a number of decades as a result of incremental decision-making by governance bodies and by the system's funders. Any major structural rationalization would be a complex process involving the fundamental questioning of the continued relevance of a number of existing mandates and an assessment of donors' ultimate willingness to support any such rationalization with a reform of their own funding practices. Rationalization that imperils resource flows could prove, overall, to be counterproductive.

Discussion

The world is increasingly aware of the devastating social and economic consequences of natural disasters. The United Nations has increasingly turned its attention in recent years to reducing countries' vulnerability to natural disasters through the implementation of effective prevention, mitigation and preparedness activities.

Many United Nations entities are involved in technical cooperation activities in this area – involvements which generally arise as programming manifestations of their basic mandates. It is important to note that this assessment does not deal with issues of emergency response or of post-disaster reconstruction and development. Certain United Nations entities which one normally associates with these latter components of the overall disaster management cycle, such as UNICEF and WFP, do not therefore appear in this table.

At the global level, the UNDP, OCHA and the UN/ISDR all have mandates that overlap in the areas of prevention, mitigation and preparedness. These three entities have recognized that given the degree of overlap that exists, inefficient duplication may also exist. For this reason, they are currently engaged in a joint self-assessment process to examine how they inter-relate in five fundamental areas: coordination, advocacy, information management, policy development and capacity building. This report has now been completed although final decisions have not been taken. These decisions will guide any actions that may be required to rationalize activities in these important areas.

As this process evolves, it will however be important to recognize that 'disaster prevention and recovery' is one of UNDP's core programme sectors, and that its extensive field network should be a critical criterion in the allocation of work within the United Nations system where roles may not yet be fully agreed.

The activities of the other organizations in this area - such as UNFPA, DESA, UN-HABITAT, UNEP, and some of the regional commissions - are considered to be normal programming manifestations of their basic mandates, and therefore do not appear to raise issues of possible inefficient duplication within the system.

Discussion

With the greatly increased focus of aid policy on poverty reduction, aid strategies are increasingly directed towards achieving sustainable growth and development. A direct result is the increased emphasis being placed by almost all countries on enhancing their trade performance. The Monterrey Consensus underlined the importance of adequate funding for trade-related development activities. The Doha Ministerial Declaration places technical cooperation and capacity building at the core of the development dimension of the multilateral trading system.

The rationale for increasing assistance in the trade area is evident – developing countries will not be able to benefit from the increased opportunities of a more open world trading system if they do not understand how to participate in that system, or if they lack the resources to upgrade productive capabilities, strengthen the competitiveness of their products and generally enhance within their own countries a productive private-public sector dialogue. In this general environment, it is not therefore surprising to find so many UN entities involved in supporting, in many different forms, trade related activities.

Despite the number of players who overlap on the issue, little if any outright duplication was identified. Again, this falls back essentially on the fundamentally differing starting points of the different entities that are outlined in the main body of the report. In some ways, the trade activities within the UN system represent a successful model for achieving coherence based on mandate and competence specialization, despite the number of players involved.

Of particular note is the very positive working relationship that has evolved in Geneva between UNCTAD, the WTO and their joint programme, the International Trade Centre (ITC). WTO by its nature must be neutral, assisting all members equally in understanding, meeting the requirements of, and benefiting from the opportunities of membership. UNCTAD on the other hand, need not be neutral in assisting developing countries to extract maximum benefit from membership in WTO and through other trading relationships. To the extent that UNCTAD and WTO engage heavily with governments, the ITC focuses almost totally on assistance to the private sector with a heavy emphasis on the least developed countries. This close cooperation between these three bodies has manifested itself in the Joint Integrated Technical Assistance Programme (JITAP), which is focused on selected African countries.

Beyond JITAP, the three Geneva-based trade organizations have also built linkages with the World Bank, the UNDP and the IMF in mainstreaming trade into development plans and poverty reduction strategies through the Integrated Framework process. This more complex activity has had its growing pains, but its longer term success is crucial to ensuring that the critical benefits of trade are not neglected in strategic planning documents. The formalized cooperation between the UN and the Bretton Woods institutions in this area also reflects the type of cooperation that can add impact and improve the efficiency of both institutional families.

The regional commissions are also active in the trade area. Regional concerns, not the least of which are common interests and (sometimes) common and unique language requirements, underscore the relevance of regional commission activities. They represent important additionality to the global process through their regional perspective and process.

The involvement of programmes such as UNIFEM, UNIDO (not a formal part of this review), DESA and the Office of Legal Affairs (OLA) can also be seen as logical components of their broader responsibilities. It should be noted that DESA's activities in this area are primarily in the field of statistics. DESA's statistical functions are recognized and appreciated throughout the system.

No obvious areas of duplication were identified on trade issues within the United Nations entities.

Discussion

“Energy services are essential for development. Although energy itself is not a basic human need, it is critical for the fulfilment of all needs. Nearly one-third of the world has no access to electricity, and another third has only poor access. Reliance on traditional fuels for cooking and heating can have serious impacts on the environment and on people’s health. Wide disparities continue to exist in the levels of energy consumption within and between countries. Major changes in existing energy services delivery systems are required so that energy can become an instrument for sustainable development. Shifting the existing supply model to a focus on energy services will require fundamental readjustments of public policies to promote and adopt sustainable energy”.⁴

The examination of energy in this report raises an important question on the future organization of United Nations technical cooperation for energy and perhaps for other substantive issues. This is the future relationship that should exist between UNDP and DESA in areas of UNDP practice, where DESA has a record of providing most substantive and project execution capacity.

The above energy table indicates a high level of overlap between the technical activities of UNDP and DESA. There is one simple possible explanation for this – that UNDP uses DESA extensively for the implementation of UNDP funded activities and therefore the same activities show under both organizations. The issue however is more complex. First, UNDP is turning increasingly to alternative sources than DESA, including its own Sub-regional Resource Facilities and partners external to the United Nations system. Second, DESA is frequently involved at the request of the UNDP and programme countries. At other times, programme countries request DESA to undertake energy related activities from funding sources other than the UNDP. Some of these activities are mandated by the General Assembly and are funded through the regular budget. The relevant UN entities will review the division of labour between them with a view to ensuring a coherent and systematic response to requests from programming countries.

As with the other issues addressed in the appendices to this point, the activities of UNIFEM, UNEP, and the regional commissions can be seen as logical components of their broader responsibilities. They are not seen to pose significant issues.

Appendix E

Issue 4 - Peace-building

Presented in this Appendix E are a series of tables for issues that are considered to relate primarily to Peace-building. In the next Appendix F, a series of issues will be presented that relate to Rule of Law, but some of those issues are also important to Peace-building.

Discussion

There is one common characteristic to all of the activities undertaken under the broader terms of democratic governance, rule-of-law and peace-building: - their political and cultural sensitivity. These are therefore areas where the United Nations has a unique comparative advantage to act. Some rationalization of the supply of these services could prove beneficial. This would depend amongst other factors on how wide should be the range of activities that it might eventually prove desirable to group in UNDP under that organization's Democratic Governance practice area. In the area of peace-building, the political sensitivity of the activities combined with their close linkage in many cases to the peacekeeping operational responsibilities of DPKO may impose limits on the extent to which this proves possible or desirable.

In peace-building, a number of United Nations entities are involved in technical cooperation activities, although the number of parties under each sub-heading is not as extensive as for some of the other issues reviewed in this report. Consistent with previous observations, the different entities approach the subject from different perspectives, and in a number of cases the activities undertaken are quite limited.

In the area of peace-building, the line between the operational activities of certain United Nations entities (such as DPKO) and what might be considered technical cooperation is sometimes extremely difficult to determine, and will of course vary depending on the breadth of the definition of technical cooperation that is used. As this report has used a very broad definition, it may overstate the extent to which overlap exists.

An interesting aspect of the peace-building field structure is the four Peace-building Support Offices managed by the Department of Political Affairs (DPA). A recent joint DPA/UNDP review assessed the performance of these offices in the field, with a particular orientation towards their interface with the United Nations Country Teams. That report noted that “whereas there is almost universal support for the core political functions undertaken by the Representatives of the Secretary-General and peace-building offices, difficulties arise when peace-building offices become involved in operational activities which are traditionally the work of funds, programmes and agencies, particularly in the absence of a peace-building strategy. To the extent possible, peace-building offices should be catalysts and facilitators rather than direct implementers.” The report goes on to specify the manner in which responsibilities should be divided between the post-conflict peace-building support offices and the United Nations Country Teams.

Discussion

As with peace-building, rule-of-law issues are characterized by their political and cultural sensitivity. Several United Nations entities are involved in rule-of-law technical cooperation activities, but consistent with previous observations, from different perspectives. Extensive work has been done by the staff of the entities involved on a number of the relationship questions, and many observations and recommendations have been made.

Illustrative of some of this work is the Office of Internal Oversight Services (OIOS) recent review of progress made in resolving certain outstanding issues between UNDP and the Electoral Advisory Division of DPA. Another is a consultant's report on strengthening the ability of the OHCHR to support the United Nations country teams to integrate human rights considerations into development programming.

While the ability to examine in detail the individual relationship issues that were outlined in these various reports was very limited in the context of this broader review, it is possible to conclude that while progress continues to be made, elements of these and other relationship issues have not yet been fully resolved.

Concerned about the possibility of UNDP and UNODC working in isolated fashions, discussions have been held and are ongoing between the two organizations to achieve a closer working relationship and to better define their respective areas of comparative advantage. The geographic separation of the headquarters of UNDP and UNODC is perhaps also exacerbated by UNODC's role in furthering the implementation of various international protocols and the fundamentally different natures of their governing bodies, with those of the UNODC being more oriented to technical expertise in comparison to the more general aid management approach of UNDP's Executive Board. UNDP and UNODC also have quite different funding patterns. Although core financing is also a problem for UNDP, in excess of 90% of UNODC's technical cooperation resources are donor earmarked. Such a financing structure clearly limits the ability of UNODC to follow the strategic directions established by its boards. Whatever longer term direction is set for the UNDP Democratic Governance practice area, important (and under-funded) capacities exist in the UNODC that must continue to be fully integrated into any eventual joint UNDP/UNODC rule-of-law programming approach.

Discussion

Public Sector Management is another issue that raises the question of what should be the scope of UNDP's Democratic Governance practice area. Many of the same issues raised in the previous discussion on rule-of-law would also apply to any possible rationalization of roles in public sector management.

A partial rationalization of work has already evolved between UNDP and DESA wherein UNDP focuses primarily on legislature-related elements and DESA focuses on the public administration elements. Nevertheless, if rationalization of the supply side is an objective, then it is not evident that these functions need to be housed in two separate UN entities. Here again it must be noted that since UNDP uses DESA as an implementing agency for public administration activities, it is logical that both will, to some measure, show the same areas of activity.

One of UNCDF's main areas of activity is related to local governance and decentralization, which also fits clearly under UNDP's democratic governance priority. UNCDF's structure is however closely integrated with that of UNDP. For the other entities, their activities in public sector management are limited and manifestations of their primary programme mandates.

Discussion

‘Information and communications technology (ICT) has become an indispensable tool in the fight against world poverty. ICT provides developing nations with an unprecedented opportunity to meet vital development goals such as poverty reduction, basic healthcare, and education far more effectively than before. Those nations that succeed in harnessing the potential of ICT can look forward to greatly expanded economic growth, dramatically improved human welfare, and stronger forms of democratic government’.⁵

All United Nations entities use ICT in their programme delivery systems and incorporate its applicable components into their technical cooperation activities. The table above therefore deals only with those entities who have specifically identified programmes or projects designed specifically to achieve the ICT goals of their clients.

Again the pattern is similar to that identified under previous issues. ICT is one of the six sectoral priorities of UNDP. It covers a broad range of ICT applications and its sectoral strategy is based on building extensive external (to the UN) linkages and its knowledge network. Entities such as UNIFEM, UNV and ITC are in the area because it is a logical component of their broader mandates. Similarly, the regional commissions are involved because of the important regional implications of these technologies. DESA focuses primarily on ICT applications for government and therefore links its ICT involvement to its public sector management mandate. DESA also utilizes ICT extensively in other areas of technical cooperation such as statistics and population.

Once again, the major potential area for rationalization would appear to be between the UNDP and DESA. Any rationalization of the existing collaborative arrangements between UNDP and DESA on public sector management would also be relevant to ICT.

Discussion

The United Nations Mine Action Service (UNMAS) was formed in October 1997 to serve as the UN focal point for mine action. In 1998 the United Nations developed a mine action policy clearly defining the roles and responsibilities of each part of the UN system on mine action. In 2001, the Inter-Agency Coordination Group for Mine Action developed the United Nations Mine Action Strategy for 2001-2005, In 2003 this strategy was revised and the revised strategy is being presented to the 58th Session of the General Assembly.

The key elements of 1) focal point for United Nations action (UNMAS), 2) mine awareness education (UNICEF), 3) dissemination of information and advocacy on the humanitarian implications (OCHA) and 4) addressing the socio-economic consequences (UNDP) are located in four different United Nations agencies or departments in New York.

Various operational activities of a non-technical cooperation nature, perhaps more understandably, are located in 1) UNICEF (rehabilitation of victims), 2) WHO (victim assistance), 3) WFP (clearance activities to provide food assistance), and 4) UNMAS (clearance in support of peacekeeping and humanitarian actions).

There would appear to be legitimate reasons for keeping victim assistance and clearance operations in their current hands. The focal point, education and advocacy, dissemination of information, and socio-economic assessment and response, might however benefit from being located in a single organization. Further work will be undertaken in this area.

Discussion

The United Nations system's experience in dealing with the HIV/AIDS pandemic provides many valuable lessons on the overall objective of achieving coherence when specialized roles are being played by so many different entities – both within and outside of the United Nations system. It must first be noted that UNAIDS is not just the UNAIDS Secretariat. UNAIDS is a joint programme of its eight cosponsors. The term 'UNAIDS' therefore includes both its Secretariat and the HIV/AIDS activities of the eight cosponsoring agencies.

The Five Year Evaluation of UNAIDS (UNAIDS/PCB(13)/02.2) highlights a number of issues that are relevant in terms of further enhancing the coordination efforts of UNAIDS, but can also serve as a valuable framework for examining the issues inherent in coordination of the supply of technical assistance.

The major UN entities acting in the area of HIV/AIDS as outlined in the table above are all cosponsors of UNAIDS. The other entities shown are all involved as logical components of their special mandates. This report can add little to the careful and considered review, by both the governing bodies and management of all of the cosponsors, of the recommendations of the UNAIDS Five Year Evaluation Report that is currently underway.

Discussion

Mainstreaming Women and Gender considerations has been the focus of major efforts by most UN entities over the past decade. For some entities, it has also been a particular focus of stand-alone projects. UNDP has recently dropped the issue as one of its main sectoral priorities, but does have a staff officer devoted to policy and practical lesson development, and to advocating within the organization for a full integration of women and gender issues into its other programmes. In addition, UNDP has a particularly close working relationship with its partner UNIFEM. UNIFEM has taken the initiative to support coordination on gender equality issues. UNICEF, with its historic orientation to children and their mothers, and more recently with its programme focus on girls' education, is clearly a major player on the key women and gender issues. Other entities, such as UNAIDS, UNV, UNHCR, OHCHR, and the regional commissions play roles on the issue which are natural components of their broader programme responsibilities.

DESA/DAW is recognized by all other players as the normative and policy leader on the issue. But DAW is also involved in certain technical cooperation activities that might be provided elsewhere. The considerations that would apply are therefore fundamentally similar to those raised previously about the role of the Secretariat in relation to the funds and programmes. Any conclusions about possible rationalization would presumably be similar.

There are a number of funds and programmes involved in supporting advocacy activities on women's issues. While mainstreaming in all organizations is to be encouraged, the rationale for project funding from a variety of sources for similar activities is not evident. UNDP, UNICEF and UNFPA all have other important priorities to pursue. Some rationalization of this function might be considered.
