FOREWORD

The year 2003 was one of the most challenging in the history of the United Nations. It began with divisions in the Security Council on how to resolve the Iraq crisis. Despite intense diplomatic efforts, some Member States took the position that the use of force was necessary. The war in Iraq that followed severely tested long-standing principles of collective security and the very resilience of the Organization.

United Nations personnel returned to Iraq in June to provide humanitarian and reconstruction assistance, and to help Iraqis establish post-conflict governance institutions and arrangements. But on 19 August, a savage terrorist attack on the Organization's headquarters in Baghdad resulted in the death of my Special Representative, Sergio Vieira de Mello, and 21 others, and the wounding of many more. The loss of such dear friends and courageous colleagues was a terrible blow to the United Nations, personally and professionally. It also raised fundamental questions about how best to protect our personnel and pursue our work in volatile situations where the United Nations is needed but may also become a target. The Organization continues to mourn our losses and wrestle with these complex questions.

In addition to the controversies and tragedies surrounding the Iraq crisis, many other challenges cast a shadow over the world in 2003, including international terrorism, the risks associated with weapons of mass destruction, a surge in infectious disease—epitomized by the effects of AIDS in Africa—and the long-standing blights of extreme poverty, hunger, environmental degradation, human rights violations and humanitarian emergencies. I told the General Assembly in September that the international system had reached a “fork in the road” in its efforts to meet these challenges. It was against that backdrop of acute concern that, in November, I established a High-level Panel on Threats, Challenges and Change and asked it to assess current threats to global security, and then to make bold yet practicable recommendations for improving the world's ability to face those threats, and for reforming the United Nations itself.

Through its coverage of a difficult year, this volume of the Yearbook of the United Nations shows that the achievement of the purposes of our Organization requires a shared consensus about its fundamental goals. While Member States need not agree on all issues, they should, in calculating their national interests, give due weight to the value and importance of a just and stable world order.

About the 2003 edition of the Yearbook

This volume of the YEARBOOK OF THE UNITED NATIONS continues the tradition of providing the most comprehensive coverage of the activities of the United Nations. It is an indispensable reference tool for the research community, diplomats, government officials and the general public seeking readily available information on the UN system and its related organizations.

Efforts by the Department of Public Information to achieve a more timely publication have resulted in having to rely on provisional documentation and other materials to prepare the relevant articles. Largely, Security Council resolutions and presidential statements, Economic and Social Council resolutions and some other texts in the present volume are provisional.

Structure and scope of articles

The Yearbook is subject-oriented and divided into six parts covering political and security questions; human rights issues; economic and social questions; legal questions; institutional, administrative and budgetary questions; and intergovernmental organizations related to the United Nations. Chapters and topical headings present summaries of pertinent UN activities, including those of intergovernmental and expert bodies, major reports, Secretariat activities and, in selected cases, the views of States in written communications.

Activities of United Nations bodies. All resolutions, decisions and other major activities of the principal organs and, on a selective basis, those of subsidiary bodies are either reproduced or summarized in the appropriate chapter. The texts of all resolutions and decisions of substantive nature adopted in 2003 by the General Assembly, the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council are reproduced or summarized under the relevant topic. These texts are preceded by procedural details giving date of adoption, meeting number and vote totals (in favour-against-abstaining) if any; and an indication of their approval by a sessional or subsidiary body prior to final adoption. The texts are followed by details of any recorded or roll-call vote on the resolution/decision as a whole.

Major reports. Most reports of the Secretary-General, in 2003, along with selected reports from other UN sources, such as seminars and working groups, are summarized briefly.

Secretariat activities. The operational activities of the United Nations for development and humanitarian assistance are described under the relevant topics. For major activities financed outside the UN regular budget, selected information is given on contributions and expenditures.

Views of States. Written communications sent to the United Nations by Member States and circulated as documents of the principal organs have been summarized in selected cases, under the relevant topics. Substantive actions by the Security Council have been analysed and brief reviews of the Council's deliberations given, particularly in cases where an issue was taken up but no resolution was adopted.

Related organizations. The Yearbook also briefly describes the 2003 activities of the specialized agencies and other related organizations of the UN system.

Multilateral treaties. Information on signatories and parties to multilateral treaties and conventions is taken from Multilateral Treaties Deposited with the Secretary-General: Status as at 31 December 2003 (S1/LEG/SER.E/22 (vols. I & II)), Sales No. E.04.V.2.

Terminology

Formal titles of bodies, organizational units, conventions, declarations and officials are given in full on first mention in an article or sequence of articles. They are also used in resolution/decision texts, and in the SUBJECT INDEX under the key word of the title. Short titles may be used in subsequent references.

How to find information in the Yearbook

The user may locate information on the United Nations activities contained in this volume by the use of the Table of Contents, the Subject Index, the Index of Resolutions and Decisions and the Index of Security Council presidential statements. The volume also has five appendices: Appendix I comprises a roster of Member States; Appendix II reproduces the Charter of the United Nations, including the Statute of the International Court of Justice; Appendix III gives the structure of the principal organs of the United Nations; Appendix IV provides the agenda for each session of the principal organs in 2003; and Appendix V gives the addresses of the United Nations information centres and services worldwide.

EXPLANATORY NOTE ON DOCUMENTS

References in square brackets in each chapter of Parts One to Five of this volume give the symbols of the main documents issued in 2003 on the topic. The following is a guide to the principal document symbols:

A/- refers to documents of the General Assembly, numbered in separate series by session. Thus, A/58/- refers to documents issued for consideration at the fifty-eighth session, beginning with A/58/1. Documents of special and emergency special sessions are identified as A/S- and A/ES-, followed by the session number.

A/C.- refers to documents of the Assembly's Main Committees, e.g. A/C.1/- is a document of the First Committee, A/C.6/-, a document of the Sixth Committee. A/BUR/- refers to documents of the General Committee. A/AC.- documents are those of the Assembly's ad hoc bodies and A/CN.-, of its commissions; e.g. A/AC.105/- identifies documents of the Assembly's Committee on the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space, A/CN.4/-, of its International Law Commission. Assembly resolutions and decisions since the thirty-first (1976) session have been identified by two arabic numerals; the first indicates the session of adoption; the second, the sequential number in the series. Resolutions are numbered consecutively from 1 at each session. Decisions since the fifty-seventh session are numbered consecutively, from 401 for those concerned with elections and appointments, and from 501 for all other decisions. Decisions of special and emergency special sessions are numbered consecutively, from 11 for those concerned with elections and appointments, and from 21 for all other decisions.

E/- refers to documents of the Economic and Social Council, numbered in separate series by year. Thus, E/2003/- refers to documents issued for consideration by the Council at its 2003 sessions, beginning with E/2003/1. E/AC.-, E/C.- and E/CN.-, followed by identifying numbers, refer to documents of the Council's subsidiary ad hoc bodies, committees and commissions. For example, E/CN.5/- refers to documents of the Council's Commission for Social Development, E/C.2/-, to documents of its Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations. E/ICEF/- documents are those of the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF). Symbols for the Council's resolutions and decisions, since 1978, consist of two arabic numerals: the first indicates the year of adoption and the second, the sequential number in the series. There are two series: one for resolutions, beginning with 1 (resolution 2003/1); and one for decisions, beginning with 201 (decision 2003/201).

S/- refers to documents of the Security Council. Its resolutions are identified by consecutive numbers followed by the year of adoption in parentheses, beginning with resolution 1 (1946).

ST/-, followed by symbols representing the issuing department or office, refers to documents of the United Nations Secretariat.

Documents of certain bodies bear special symbols, including the following:

CD/-	Conference on Disarmament
CERD/-	Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination
DC/-	Disarmament Commission
DP/-	United Nations Development Programme
HS/-	Commission on Human Settlements
ITC/-	International Trade Centre
TD/-	United Nations Conference on Trade and Development
UNEP/-	United Nations Environment Programme

Many documents of the regional commissions bear special symbols, which are sometimes preceded by the following:

E/ECA/-	Economic Commission for Africa
E/ECE/-	Economic Commission for Europe
E/ECLAC/-	Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean
E/ESCAP/-	Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific
E/ESCWA/-	Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia

"L" in a symbol refers to documents of limited distribution, such as draft resolutions; "CONF." to documents of a conference; "INF." to those of general information. Summary records are designated by "SR.", verbatim records by "PV.", each followed by the meeting number.

United Nations sales publications each carry a sales number with the following components separated by periods: a capital letter indicating the language(s) of the publication; two arabic numerals indicating the year; a Roman numeral indicating the subject category; a capital letter indicating a subdivision of the category, if any; and an arabic numeral indicating the number of the publication within the category. Examples: E.03.II.A.2; E/F/R.03.II.E.7; E.03.X.1.

Report of the Secretary-General on the work of the Organization

Following is the Secretary-General's report on the work of the Organization, dated 28 August 2003, submitted to the fifty-eighth session of the General Assembly. The Assembly took note of it on 9 October (decision 58/506). On 23 December, the Assembly decided that the agenda item would remain for consideration during the resumed fifty-eighth (2004) session (decision 58/565).

Introduction

1. This is my seventh annual report on the work of the United Nations. Once again I take stock of what the Organization has done during the past year and how it has responded to the heavy demands upon it. The chapters of this report bear evidence of the ever-increasing number and scope of the tasks that the Organization performs in diverse areas such as peace and security, economic and social development, humanitarian assistance, international law, human rights and the environment. The Organization has made good progress in many areas, but in other important fields it will take more time to achieve its goals.

2. Undoubtedly, in the area of peace and security, it has been a trying year for the United Nations. The war in Iraq severely tested the principle of collective security and the resilience of the Organization. Rarely in its fifty-eight-year history have such dire forecasts been made about the United Nations. The United Nations will emerge strengthened if we make a measured appreciation of what happened, think about the sort of Organization we want in the future, and start making the necessary changes.

3. On 19 August 2003 the United Nations headquarters in Iraq was subjected to a cold-blooded and savage attack. This was the most deliberate and vicious attack against the United Nations in its history. My Special Representative, Sergio Vieira de Mello, and other devoted servants of the United Nations were brutally murdered, and many others were wounded. I would like to pay tribute to all of them for their courage and commitment to the ideals of the United Nations. I wish to express my profound and heartfelt sympathy to their loved ones. Those extremists who killed our colleagues have committed a crime, not only against the United Nations, but against Iraq itself.

4. During the past year the United Nations has been involved in peace operations in many parts of the world, including Afghanistan, Côte d'Ivoire, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Kosovo, Sierra Leone and Timor-Leste. In Liberia, the multinational force authorized by the Security Council is helping to restore security and stability, and in due course will be replaced by a United Nations peacekeeping force. Peace agreements by themselves, however, mark only the first step in bringing lasting peace and prosperity to war-torn societies. The traumatic rupture of economic, political and social relations between groups and individuals characterizes such societies. Creating or rebuilding civil society is a crucial long-term commitment and is essential to establishing and consolidating democracy. Democratic institutions and principles should be embedded within a self-sustaining civil society. Countries emerging from civil strife must find their own paths to humane governance and national reconciliation, but international assistance will often be necessary.

5. The international community continues to take action to combat international terrorism, especially in view of new attacks in Indonesia, Morocco, the Russian Federation, Saudi Arabia and elsewhere. Human rights must not be sacrificed in the struggle against international terrorism, however. Moreover, while poverty and grievance over injustices are only indirectly related to terrorism, and cannot excuse it, these indirect links must nonetheless be taken into account in strategies aimed at reducing the incidence of terrorist acts. Promoting measures to reduce poverty, address injustices, strengthen good governance and build tolerance are essential to that end, as well as for their own sake. To keep a genuinely global coalition against terrorism together the world will need to see progress on the other fronts of the struggle for a humane and just world order.

6. Disarmament, including the eradication of weapons of mass destruction, remains a major priority for the international community. Recent developments have underlined the potential threat of weapons of mass destruction falling into the hands of terrorists. The existing global disarmament norms relevant to weapons of mass destruction need to be strengthened and protected against erosion. Disarmament requires multilateral cooperation and can be accomplished only in an atmosphere of trust.

7. While the immediate and urgent challenges of peace and security require sedulous attention, it is also important that they should not divert attention from our work in economic and social development. At present, there is a wide gap between the rhetoric of inclusion and the reality of exclusion. Our efforts for peace will be in vain unless we can begin to bridge this gap by achieving real progress for the poorest countries in the world. Furthermore, our efforts to contain and resolve conflicts should not drain resources from other fights that we are waging around the world to protect refugees and displaced persons, to combat HIV/AIDS and other diseases, and to promote sustainable development.

8. The outbreak of the severe acute respiratory syndrome (SARS) was a sobering reminder of the world's vulnerability to disease and the risks of it spreading rapidly across borders. At the same time, the effective coordinated response demonstrated the value of multilateral cooperation, in this case through the professional and speedy intervention of the World Health Organization.

9. In order to address the broad range of contemporary international problems it is important to forge partnerships and alliances. Governments alone do not have the capacity to find solutions to these problems. We must continue to find greater opportunities for the private sector, non-governmental organizations and civil society, in general, to contribute to the realization of the Organization's goals.

10. The United Nations is not an end in itself. Rather, it is an instrument for achieving common ends. The strength and effectiveness of the Organization depends on the active support of its Member States and their policies. Moreover, achievement of the Organization's purposes requires a shared consensus about its fundamental goals. That does not mean that Member States need to agree on all issues. However, it does mean that they should be ready to use the Organization to achieve mutual objectives and to accommodate different national interests. In calculating their national interests, they should give due weight to the value and importance of a just and stable world order.

Chapter I

Achieving peace and security

11. During the past year, United Nations activities in the area of peace and security continued to focus on the prevention and resolution of conflict and the provision of assistance to societies emerging from conflict. While the United Nations attempted to address a variety of new challenges in this field, issues such as terrorism and the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction remained of great concern. The war in Iraq highlighted how rapidly the security environment in which we now live can evolve, as well as the diversity of perceptions on how global peace and security should be maintained.

12. Increasingly, civil conflicts pose a serious threat to international peace and security. They create situations in which perpetrators of violence act with impunity. In these zones of impunity, the scourges of our time—drug trafficking, arms trafficking, human trafficking, the training of terrorists—flourish. Illicit transboundary networks of finance and trade link these zones, fomenting instability that affects entire regions, or even the international system itself. Decades of development efforts and centuries of social cohesion can thus be undone in a short period of time. The impact on women and girls is particularly severe, as is made clear in my report on women and peace and security submitted to the Security Council in October 2002. The complex nature of present threats to peace and security has led the United Nations system increasingly to focus on thematic issues. Indicative of this is the continuing practice of the Security Council to convene open meetings on questions such as children and armed conflict, women and peace and security, civilians in armed conflict and small arms. This practice has now been expanded to include thematic issues in a regional context, such as small arms and mercenary activities as threats to peace and security in West Africa (18 March 2003) and Africa's food crisis as a threat to peace and security (7 April 2003).

13. The means available to the United Nations for the discharge of its responsibilities in the area of international peace and security vary from preventive diplomacy to peacemaking, peacekeeping and peace-building. In practice, the issues falling within these four areas of action are integrally related. In Cyprus and Western Sahara, for example, peacemaking and peace-keeping have been taking place side by side for years. Any peace-building effort—Afghanistan is a good example—has a strong component of preventive diplomacy, as applied in the context of a post-conflict situation. The present report contains a special section on Iraq, in acknowledgement of the central place that this question occupied on the agenda of the Organization and in the attention of world public opinion over the year under review.

Iraq

14. On 16 September 2002, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq informed me that his Government had decided to allow the return of United Nations weapons inspectors without conditions. This followed a series of discussions I had held with the Iraqi side in March, May and July 2002, as well as my appeal in the General Assembly in September 2002, urging Iraq to comply with its obligations under Security Council resolutions. I welcomed the resumption of inspections by the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission (UNMOVIC) in Iraq in November 2002 that followed the unanimous adoption of Security Council resolution 1441(2002). It was with regret that I noted in the report of 27 January 2003 of the Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC that while Iraq was cooperating on process it did not appear to have come to a genuine acceptance of its obligations.

15. By early March 2003 there were divisions in the Security Council as to how to proceed. I continued to urge united international action, as well as constant and persistent pressure on the leadership of Iraq, through daily exchanges with Council members, the League of Arab States, UNMOVIC and others both in New York and in capitals. By mid-March it was clear, however, that some Member States had taken the position that it was impossible to resolve the crisis without the use of force. On 17 March I informed the Council that I would suspend United Nations activities in Iraq and withdraw all remaining United Nations system personnel the following day.

16. Following the end of major hostilities, which had resulted in the occupation of Iraq by a coalition headed by the United States of America and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and after protracted deliberations, the Security Council adopted, on 22 May 2003, resolution 1483(2003). In paragraph 8 of the resolution the Council requested me to appoint a Special Representative whose responsibilities would include coordinating United Nations activities in Iraq and, in coordination with the Coalition Provisional Authority, assisting the people of Iraq in such areas as humanitarian assistance, reconstruction and development, human rights, legal and judicial reform and the restoration of an internationally recognized, representative Government of Iraq. I proceeded to appoint a Special Representative for an initial period of four months.

17. My Special Representative travelled extensively throughout Iraq and met representatives of a wide and diverse spectrum of Iraqi society. He and his team also established regular contacts with the Administrator and other officials of the Coalition Provisional Authority. I and my Special Representative initiated a dialogue with leaders of countries neighbouring Iraq and the broader international community. In my first report to the Security Council (S/2003/715) I stressed the fundamental principles underlying the activities of the United Nations under resolution 1483 (2003)—including the need to restore sovereignty to the people of Iraq as soon as possible and the need to respect the Iraqi people's right to determine their political future—and our desire to keep foremost in mind the interests of the Iraqi people in our assistance activities. The report provided an initial assessment of the scope of the challenges involved in implementing the mandate conferred by resolution 1483(2003) and indicated those areas in which I consider that the United Nations can play a useful role, on the basis of its expertise and comparative advantage. To this end, I proposed the establishment of a United Nations Assistance Mission for Iraq (UNAMI). On 14 August, the Security Council, by resolution 1500(2003), decided to establish UNAMI for an initial period of 12 months. The Council also welcomed the establishment, on 13 July 2003, of the broadly representative Governing Council of Iraq, as an important step towards the formation of an internationally recognized, representative and sovereign Government of Iraq.

18. The wanton attack on the United Nations headquarters building in Baghdad on 19 August 2003 dealt a severe blow to the Organization's efforts at assisting Iraq's return to normalcy. My Special Representative, Sergio Vieira de Mello, and several international and local staff members lost their lives in this cowardly act, while many more were injured. Their sacrifice will not be in vain. The United Nations will continue helping the Iraqi people to rebuild their country and regain their sovereignty, under leaders of their own choosing. Meanwhile, I shall continue to emphasize that it is vital that the people of Iraq see a clear timetable with a specific sequence of events leading to the full restoration of sovereignty as soon as possible. This means that the establishment of the Governing Council must be followed by a constitutional process run by Iraqis for Iraqis. To this end, the United Nations will maintain an active role in facilitating and supporting the political process. My new Special Representative will continue to work with the Governing Council and the Coalition Provisional Authority and will pursue further the dialogue with leaders of the countries of the region and beyond.

Conflict prevention and peacemaking

19. A comprehensive exercise is under way to implement my report of 2001 on the prevention of armed conflict. A vital task in this respect is to foster the building of conflict prevention capacities at local and national levels and the elaboration of regional preventive strategies that would integrate political and developmental elements. The United Nations System Chief Executives Board for Coordination chose preventing armed conflict as the main theme of its second regular session of 2002, offering an opportunity to promote greater coherence and coordination in system-wide efforts in the field of structural conflict prevention, at the national, regional and international levels. The resolution recently adopted by the General Assembly on the prevention of armed conflict gives the United Nations a strong mandate not only to continue but to expand and intensify its conflict prevention activities.

20. After almost three years of violence and confrontation, new hope for the resumption of the stalled Middle East peace process has finally emerged. Following the appointment of a Prime Minister of the Palestinian Authority, a road map to a permanent two-State solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict was formally presented to the parties on 30 April 2003. This performance-based blueprint, elaborated by the Quartet (the United Nations, the European Union, the Russian Federation and the United States of America) at a series of meetings, includes clear phases, timelines and benchmarks. It aims at achieving progress through parallel and reciprocal steps by the two parties in the political, security, economic, humanitarian and institution-building fields, under an effective international monitoring mechanism. This process should lead to the establishment of an independent, democratic and viable Palestinian State existing side by side in peace and security with Israel and its other neighbours, as affirmed in Security Council resolution 1397(2002). I was particularly encouraged by the outcome of the summit meeting between the parties and the President of the United States of America at Aqaba, Jordan, on 4 June 2003, where the two sides made a firm commitment to implementing the road map.

21. Despite the recent signs of progress, the vicious circle of violence, retaliation and revenge continued during most of the period under review, resulting in further substantial loss of life and destruction. A total collapse of the Palestinian economy was prevented only by the infusion of significant foreign assistance, including through the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East and other United Nations agencies and programmes. A deteriorating security environment and problems of access hampered the efforts of the United Nations and others to address the growing humanitarian crisis in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, as further detailed in the following chapter.

22. Through my direct contacts and the Quartet mechanism, most recently at the meeting of the Quartet on 22 June 2003 on the shores of the Dead Sea, in Jordan, I remained personally engaged in efforts at achieving peace in the Middle East. The Security Council was kept informed of those efforts and relevant developments in monthly briefings by the Secretariat. The final goal of the road map, and of the entire peace process, remains a comprehensive settlement of the Middle East conflict, including the Syrian-Israeli and Lebanese-Israeli tracks, on the basis of Security Council resolutions 242(1967), 338(1973) and 1397(2002), the Madrid Peace Conference of 1991 and the principle of land for peace, agreements previously reached by the parties, and the peace initiative endorsed by the League of Arab States at its Beirut summit in March 2002.

23. I regret to report that the Cyprus problem, despite the intensive exercise of my good offices, remains unresolved. The lifting of travel restrictions between the north and south of the island in recent months, while welcome, is no substitute for a comprehensive settlement of the core issues. A unique opportunity to achieve a settlement was squandered—a settlement which would have allowed a reunited Cyprus to sign the Treaty of Accession to the European Union on 16 April 2003. With time running out before the Treaty's signature, and with hopes renewed by the election in November 2002 of a Government of Turkey that seemed genuinely disposed to resolving the question, I submitted in November 2002 a draft comprehensive settlement to the two Cypriot leaders. Despite their agreeing to negotiate on the basis of that plan, the negotiations failed to result in an agreement and in April 2003 I closed the office of my Special Adviser. A settlement before the entry into force of the Treaty of Accession to the European Union—on 1 May 2004—would still allow a reunited Cyprus to accede to the European Union. I do not believe, however, that any purpose would be served by my taking a new initiative unless the parties demonstrate their commitment to a settlement on the basis of the plan. Should such a commitment be forthcoming, I shall resume active efforts to resolve this long-standing dispute. In the meantime, the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus continues to monitor the buffer zone across the island.

24. Early in 2003, the Government of Angola and the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA) completed the implementation of the political aspects of the 1994 Lusaka Protocol. This led to the dissolution of the United Nations Mission in Angola. The Security Council lifted sanctions against UNITA in December 2002. Responsibility for the remaining activities envisaged by the Security Council was transferred to a strengthened office of the United Nations Resident Coordinator, through which the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) and other United Nations agencies are supporting communities in the sustainable reintegration of former combatants and internally displaced persons. They are also working to strengthen national capacity on mine action and implement mine-clearing operations; monitor the respect of human rights through a special unit attached to the Resident Coordinator's Office; and strengthen international coordination to assist the Government in organizing a donor conference.

25. In Burundi, the second phase of the transition began in May 2003 with the inauguration of the new President and Vice-President. Facilitation efforts involving the United Nations led to the signing of ceasefire agreements between the Transitional Government and three of the four armed groups, and the establishment of a Joint Ceasefire Commission. In April 2003, the African Union authorized the deployment of the African Mission in Burundi to assist in the implementation of the ceasefire. United Nations agencies are continuing to help the African Union to demobilize and reintegrate combatants in support of the full implementation of the Arusha Agreement. Nonetheless, the continuation of the fighting, most recently in July 2003, points to the urgent need to address all of the outstanding issues in the peace process. I welcome the regional initiatives aimed at implementing a ceasefire.

26. My Representative for Somalia continued to encourage the parties to reach an inclusive and credible agreement at the Somalia National Reconciliation Conference that opened in October 2002 in Kenya, under the auspices of the Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD). By mid-2003, Somali delegates had endorsed the reports of five of the six Reconciliation Committees covering important issues relating to peace-building in Somalia. Still under discussion, before they could move to power-sharing, was a report on the question of a provisional charter for a future transitional Government. I hope that the Somali leaders will build on the Eldoret Declaration of 27 October 2002 and reach a final and inclusive agreement backed by a serious commitment to its implementation.

27. Progress achieved at the IGAD-led peace talks on the Sudan has improved the prospects for lasting peace there. The momentum created by the signing of the Machakos Protocol, in July 2002, if sustained, could lead to a comprehensive agreement soon. My Special Adviser and staff from the Secretariat will continue to support the mediation efforts. In addition, the United Nations Resident Coordinator in the Sudan has prepared an extensive programme to promote economic recovery and thus buttress the peace talks.

28. Faced with a continuing stalemate in Western Sahara, the Security Council requested my Personal Envoy to put forward a political solution that would provide for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara, taking into account concerns expressed by the parties and consulting, as appropriate, others with relevant experience. A plan was accordingly presented to Morocco, the Frente POLISARIO, Algeria and Mauritania in January 2003. In March, Morocco and the Frente POLISARIO expressed their reservations to the plan. Early in July, however, the Frente POLISARIO informed my Personal Envoy of its acceptance of the peace plan. On 9 July, another text of the peace plan, amended to add a third ballot choice in the eventual referendum, providing for self-government or autonomy, was transmitted to the parties. On 31 July, the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1495(2003), by which it expressed its support for the peace plan for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara and called upon the parties to work with the United Nations and with each other towards its acceptance and implementation. Meanwhile, the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara continued to monitor the ceasefire between the parties, in effect since September 1991.

29. Since my first meeting in Paris, in September 2002, with the President of Cameroon and the President of Nigeria, my good offices were made available to the two countries as they negotiated a resolution of their border dispute. At the request of the two heads of State, after our second meeting in November 2002 at Geneva, I established the Cameroon-Nigeria Mixed Commission, chaired by my Special Representative for West Africa, to facilitate a peaceful implementation of the ruling of the International Court of Justice of October 2002 on the land and maritime boundary between Cameroon and Nigeria and help to build confidence between the two countries. The Mixed Commission holds periodic meetings, alternately in Yaoundé and Abuja. Progress has been made with the creation of two subcommissions, one on the demarcation of the land boundary and another on affected populations. The latter subcommission will assess the situation of the populations affected by the Court's ruling and consider modalities relating to the protection of their rights.

30. In Latin America, the United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala continued to oversee the implementation of the 1996 peace agreements, the timeline for which extends to 2004. Although the Government had pledged to accelerate implementation after a meeting of the Consultative Group in February 2002, the Group concluded at its subsequent meeting in May 2003 that insufficient progress had been made. Increased attacks on human rights defenders and judges, and persistent social unrest, were of particular concern. Conversely, renewed civil society activism in support of the peace agreements allowed some grounds for optimism.

31. I continued to provide my good offices to the search for a peaceful solution to the nearly 40-year-old conflict in Colombia. Despite the rupture in talks between the Government of Colombia and the two major guerrilla groups—the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia and the National Liberation Army—my Special Adviser on Colombia has continued, through regular contacts with the Government, guerrilla groups, civil society and the international community, to assist peacemaking efforts. In addition, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) has worked with the United Nations country team and my Special Adviser to address the growing problem of displaced persons within the country. The expanding conflict, which is fuelled by funds from the illicit drug trade, constitutes a significant challenge for the United Nations organizations that are working to alleviate its adverse humanitarian effects and address its root causes.

32. Relations between India and Pakistan improved, and it was announced in May 2003 that the two countries would appoint High Commissioners to each other's capitals, restore rail, road and air links, and take other confidence-building measures. I hope that those measures will lead to the resumption of sustained dialogue and to real progress towards a peaceful settlement of the outstanding problems between these two neighbours, including over Jammu and Kashmir.

33. Despite a ceasefire agreement and several rounds of talks between the Government of Nepal and the Communist Party of Nepal (Maoist), the emerging peace process is still fragile. The United Nations remains prepared to provide assistance to strengthen the process, including in the area of human rights. The United Nations system, through the Resident Coordinator and programmes such as UNDP and the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), has reoriented humanitarian, reconstruction and development assistance to better support the peace process.

34. The peace process in Sri Lanka, which had begun to make encouraging progress after the ceasefire of February 2002, suffered a setback in April 2003, when the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam suspended participation in negotiations with the Government of Sri Lanka. I fully support the ongoing efforts by the Governments of Norway and Japan to further the peace process, and hope the talks will resume as soon as possible. The United Nations system, through the Resident Coordinator and in collaboration with the World Bank, will continue to support the process through reconstruction and development activities.

35. The implementation of the Bougainville Peace Agreement of August 2001 between the Bougainville parties and the Government of Papua New Guinea has made significant headway. Following the verification and notification by the United Nations Political Office in Bougainville (UNPOB) of the completion of stage II of the weapons disposal plan at the end of July 2003, the constitutional amendments providing for the establishment of an autonomous Bougainville Government and a referendum on Bougainville's future political status have become operational. While UNPOB is expected to successfully complete its mandate by the end of 2003, the United Nations system and the donor community will need to continue providing assistance to the parties in the implementation of the Agreement.

36. I am gratified to note the continuing cooperation between the United Nations and the Government of Indonesia in support of the latter's pursuit of political, economic and social reforms. I remain convinced that Indonesia's national unity and territorial integrity can best be ensured through respect for democratic norms and the promotion of human rights. Accordingly,

I have called upon all parties to the conflict in Aceh to uphold their obligations to protect civilians in armed conflict and to resume dialogue. I have also been following closely the Indonesian Ad Hoc Human Rights Tribunal for Crimes Committed in East Timor; I firmly believe that the perpetrators of serious human rights violations in 1999 in Timor-Leste (then East Timor) must be brought to justice.

37. I have been paying particular attention to the crisis on the Korean Peninsula that was triggered by an alleged admission in October 2002 by the Democratic People's Republic of Korea that it was carrying out a uranium-enrichment programme. This was followed by the withdrawal of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea from the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons and by its claim to possess nuclear weapons. A legacy of deep mutual mistrust and hostility between the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and other States, particularly the United States of America, has contributed to continuing tensions in the region. In January 2003, I became concerned that the humanitarian pipeline to the Democratic People's Republic of Korea might dry up. I dispatched my Personal Envoy to the country in January and March 2003 to help prevent a humanitarian disaster and prepare the way for a negotiated settlement. My Envoy had extensive and useful discussions with senior government officials in Pyongyang, as well as in other capitals concerned about developments on the Korean Peninsula. The dangers inherent in the Korean situation cast an ominous cloud over the security and stability of the region. The international consensus that the Korean Peninsula should be free of nuclear weapons and the commitment of all major players to finding a peaceful solution to the crisis allow for guarded optimism that a comprehensive resolution can be achieved. I shall continue to lend my full support to the multilateral diplomatic process launched in April 2003 in Beijing and expanded thereafter.

38. My Special Envoy to Myanmar undertook his ninth and tenth missions to Yangon in November 2002 and June 2003, respectively, to try to facilitate national reconciliation and democratization. My Envoy met the major political actors—leaders of the State Peace and Development Council, officials of the National League for Democracy (NLD) and ethnic minority political parties. The incident of 30 May 2003, which resulted in the detention of many NLD officials, including Daw Aung San Suu Kyi, renewed concerns about progress towards national reconciliation and the eventual transition to democracy. I have urged and will continue to urge the Government of Myanmar to heed the call by the international community, including the countries of the region, and release Daw Aung San Suu Kyi and other NLD leaders without further delay.

Peacekeeping and peace-building

39. Peacekeeping and peace-building are two sides of the same coin, providing as they do assistance to societies emerging from conflict so that they can consolidate their fragile peace. Whether through the dispatch of Blue Helmets or by authorizing the deployment of a multinational force, the United Nations has actively supported the transition from war to peace in many parts of the world. Moreover, through its peace-building efforts, the Organization and the broader United Nations system have provided political, humanitarian and development assistance to meet immediate emergency and reconstruction needs, as well as to establish viable institutions. I am glad to note the successful completion of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the United Nations Mission of Observers in Prevlaka, which demonstrate that the United Nations can complete complex mandates within a realistic time frame.

40. On 4 December 2002, the Security Council authorized a gradual increase in the troop strength of the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (MONUC) to 8,700, with a view to contributing to the disarmament, demobilization and repatriation of foreign armed groups. On 17 December, the participants in the inter-Congolese dialogue signed a Global and All-Inclusive Agreement and, on 2 April 2003, the Final Act, formally endorsing that Agreement, the Transitional Constitution and 36 resolutions that had been adopted at an earlier session of the inter-Congolese dialogue, in April 2002, thus paving the way for the formation of a Transitional Government. In May 2003, in view of the progress made at the national level, I presented to the Security Council a comprehensive strategy for the role of MONUC in support of the transition. Despite the political progress, however, fighting continued in the eastern regions of the country; it was especially intense in Ituri and the Kivus, where massacres and widespread human rights violations were committed. In response to the rapid deterioration of security in Ituri, and recognizing the threat it posed to the peace process, the Security Council on 30 May authorized the deployment of an Interim Emergency Multinational Force in Bunia, in the Ituri region. The Force was fielded by the European Union, with France as the lead nation. The deployment of that Force, until 1 September 2003, offered the United Nations and the international community the opportunity to work in the meantime to strengthen local political institutions and ensure that the humanitarian crisis did not continue to deteriorate. The Transitional Government was formally installed in July 2003, with the swearing-in of the four new Vice-Presidents, the Ministers and the Deputy Ministers. By resolution 1493(2003) of 28 July, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, the Security Council authorized an increase in the Mission's strength to 10,800.

41. In September 2002, Côte d'Ivoire was plunged into a civil conflict when a group of soldiers, in an attempted coup, simultaneously attacked military installations in Abidjan, Bouaké and Korhogo. While security forces loyal to the Government quickly regained control of Abidjan, the rebels prevailed in the northern half of the country. Mediation efforts by the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) resulted, in October 2002, in a ceasefire agreement monitored by French and ECOWAS forces. In January 2003, the Ivorian parties signed the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement, which called for the creation of a Government of National Reconciliation whose main tasks would be to prepare a timetable for credible and transparent national elections, restructure the defence and security forces and disarm all armed groups. In May 2003, the Security Council authorized the establishment of the United Nations Mission in Côte d'Ivoire (MINUCI), with a mandate to facilitate the implementation of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement, complementing the operations of the French and ECOWAS forces. The Mission's deployment has proceeded successfully, an initial group of 26 military liaison officers having arrived in Abidjan on 23 June 2003. Throughout the peacemaking process, my Special Representative for West Africa played a critical supporting role in the international efforts that resulted in the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement.

42. The United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL) began to implement its drawdown plan, which provides for the total withdrawal of the Mission by the end of 2004, while continuing to assist the Government of Sierra Leone in consolidating peace. The pace of the Mission's drawdown is guided by the ability of the security forces of Sierra Leone to guarantee the security of the country. While the Government took commendable steps to consolidate its authority, its capacity to deliver basic services to the population in the provinces has been limited. The Government has taken measures to restore its control over diamond mining but significant illegal mining persists. The resettlement of internally displaced persons was completed in December 2002, while the repatriation of Sierra Leonean refugees from neighbouring countries continues. UNHCR, UNDP and the World Bank have been working to ensure recovery at the local level, to strengthen the Government's capacity to deliver services and to provide economic alternatives for former combatants and refugees. The Truth and Reconciliation Commission and the Special Court have started functioning and the Security Council has authorized the deployment of 170 civilian police to UNAMSIL to assist in the training of the local police.

43. During the reporting period, the United Nations Peace-building Support Offices in the Central African Republic, Guinea-Bissau and Liberia intensified their efforts to facilitate the promotion of good governance and national reconciliation, the consolidation of democratic processes and the mobilization of international support for the formulation and implementation of reconstruction and development programmes. The respective United Nations country teams have been closely associated with this endeavour. The lack of cooperation on the part of governing parties, however, and the failure by national stakeholders to resolve their major differences on governance issues have seriously hampered the United Nations peace-building efforts, especially in the Central African Republic and Liberia.

44. Regrettably, the situation in Liberia took a dangerous turn as renewed fighting erupted in Monrovia in flagrant violation of a ceasefire agreement signed by the warring parties in Accra on 17 June 2003. In addition to inflicting a severe blow to the promising prospects for the restoration of peace in the country, hostilities led to a humanitarian catastrophe and threatened stability in the entire West African subregion. The United Nations, together with other principal international players, has actively supported the sustained peacemaking efforts of the leaders of ECOWAS. On 28 June 2003, I addressed a letter to the President of the Security Council, with the request that the Council take urgent action to authorize, under Chapter VII of the Charter, the deployment to Liberia of a highly trained and well-equipped multinational force, under the lead of a Member State, to prevent a major humanitarian tragedy and to stabilize the situation in the country. In anticipation of a greater United Nations involvement in these efforts, I appointed a Special Representative for Liberia with the main tasks of coordinating United Nations activities, supporting the emerging transitional arrangements and leading an eventual United Nations peacekeeping operation in that country. On 1 August, the Security Council, by resolution 1497(2003), authorized Member States to establish a Multinational Force in Liberia and declared its readiness to establish a follow-on, longer-term United Nations stabilization force to relieve the Multinational Force. On 4 August, ECOWAS elements of the Multinational Force started deploying in Liberia with United Nations support. To facilitate the cessation of hostilities and the conclusion of a comprehensive peace agreement, President Charles Taylor relinquished power and left Liberia on 11 August, in keeping with the commitment he had made at the opening of the peace talks in Accra on 4 June. I welcomed the subsequent signing by the Liberian parties, on 18 August, also in Accra, of a comprehensive peace agreement, and called on all concerned to seize this opportunity to work together to restore peace and stability in the country.

45. The United Nations Mission in Ethiopia and Eritrea continued to support the peace process by monitoring the Temporary Security Zone; providing logistical support to the Eritrea-Ethiopia Boundary Commission; and delivering quick-impact projects and coordinating humanitarian assistance in the Temporary Security Zone and adjacent areas. The Mine Action Coordination Centre has continued to coordinate all mine-related activities within the Zone and to clear access routes to boundary pillar sites. It is important that both parties cooperate fully with the Boundary Commission to ensure the demarcation of the border without undue delay. It is equally important for the parties to initiate a political dialogue, in particular to develop mechanisms to resolve residual and future disputes peacefully.

46. In March 2003, just before the United States-led invasion of Iraq from Kuwait, the mandate of the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission (UNIKOM) was suspended and most of its staff evacuated. UNIKOM maintained a small rear headquarters in Kuwait City to provide a peacekeeping presence, undertake political and military liaison functions, and support United Nations humanitarian assistance programmes for Iraq. While much of UNIKOM headquarters at Umm Qasr and other infrastructure were destroyed in the conflict, Camp Khor, on the Kuwaiti side of the border, reopened in May to support humanitarian operations. On 3 July, the Security Council, in resolution 1490(2003), noted that UNIKOM had successfully fulfilled its mandate from 1991 to 2003 and extended it for a final period of three months. The Mission's remaining personnel are preparing for the liquidation of UNIKOM and transferring many of its removable assets to other missions.

47. The United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon continued to monitor the Blue Line between Israel and Lebanon and to liaise with the parties to avert or contain tensions. There were few violent incidents and only minor ground violations of the Line. Frequent Israeli violations of Lebanese airspace, however, drew retaliatory anti-aircraft fire from Hizbollah. I have continued to remind the parties to respect fully the Blue Line. The Lebanese armed forces increased their activity in the south, but the Government of Lebanon has yet to take all necessary steps to restore its full authority there. The Mine Action Coordination Centre coordinated the clearance of over 4 million square metres of mined area in southern Lebanon.

48. The Government of the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste worked to strengthen its institutions and security, drawing upon the assistance provided by the United Nations Mission of Support in East Timor (UNMISET) and by United Nations agencies. The Government's civil administration and police force progressively assumed greater responsibility for the management of day-to-day affairs in their respective areas. In an important gesture of commitment to human rights principles, the Parliament of Timor-Leste ratified six core human rights treaties and four optional protocols in December 2002. However, in response to rioting in Dili in December 2002 and violent attacks by armed elements in January and February 2003, the Security Council decided to slow the downsizing schedule for the military and police components of UNMISET.

49. In Afghanistan, the security situation has continued to challenge the implementation of the Bonn Agreement of December 2001. Progress has nevertheless been made. All the commissions called for in the Agreement have been formed and have begun their work in their respective areas of human rights, constitutional and judicial reform, and the reorganization of the civil service. The United Nations Assistance Mission in Afghanistan and other United Nations entities have been providing critical support to those commissions. The Transitional Administration adopted concrete measures to extend its control over the country. These included launching a new currency and formulating a national development budget. In May 2003, the Administration secured an agreement with important provincial governors and commanders that called for the centralization of customs revenues and prohibited provincial leaders from simultaneously holding civil and military positions, but those commitments have been only partially implemented. The Transitional Administration has placed security sector reform at the centre of its agenda. This includes the reform of the Ministry of Defence to make it nationally representative, as a precondition for the implementation of the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration plan. The signing of a declaration on good-neighbourly relations by Afghanistan and neighbouring States on 22 December 2002 was a further step towards the objective of consolidating stability and security in the region.

50. The United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia (UNOMIG) continued to monitor compliance with the ceasefire agreement of 1994. The Group of Friends, under the chairmanship of the United Nations, met at Geneva in February and July 2003, to review progress towards a comprehensive settlement and to consider options for taking the peace process forward. The Georgian and Abkhaz sides took part in the second meeting. My Special Representative, with the support of the Group of Friends, remained in close contact with the parties to build on the momentum generated by those two meetings, as well as the meeting of President Putin and President Shevardnadze in March 2003, particularly in the areas of economic cooperation and the return of refugees and internally displaced persons. My Special Representative also supported efforts to build confidence and advance towards a comprehensive settlement of the conflict, on the basis of the paper entitled "Basic Principles for the Distribution of Competencies between Tbilisi and Sukhumi" and its letter of transmittal. I remain concerned about security in the Kodori Valley, where four UNOMIG personnel were held hostage for six days in June 2003, the sixth such incident since the establishment of the Mission in 1993. None of the perpetrators of those acts, or those responsible for shooting down a helicopter in 2001, have ever been identified and brought to justice.

51. The United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK) continued to support the establishment of democratic provisional institutions of self-government, as foreseen by the Constitutional Framework for Provisional Self-Government in Kosovo. The gradual transfer of the non-reserved responsibilities listed in chapter 5 of the Constitutional Framework from UNMIK to the provisional institutions continued, at a pace that took into account the capacity of those institutions to assume such responsibilities. The overall authority of UNMIK and the reserved responsibilities listed in chapter 8 of the Constitutional Framework will not be transferred. The Mission, with support from UNDP, maintained efforts to combat organized crime and to create the basis for a viable market economy. It also increased its efforts to foster conditions for minority return and to resolve property right claims by displaced persons. UNMIK continued to seek the resolution of issues that need to be addressed with authorities in Belgrade and encouraged a direct dialogue on practical matters between Belgrade and Pristina.

52. The United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina successfully completed its work in December 2002, having established State-level law enforcement institutions and transformed a 40,000 strong wartime militia into a 16,000 strong professional police force. Remaining responsibilities relating to the reform of the police were transferred to the European Union Police Mission. The United Nations Mission of Observers in Prevlaka also completed its tasks in December 2002, having helped to shield this strategically important area from the fighting in the region and to create the space for a political solution to the dispute.

53. Building on last year's efforts to enhance the strategic deployment stocks at Brindisi, the Secretariat this year improved its capacity to deploy staff with the development of a rapid deployment roster for civilian personnel. The Civilian Police Division of the Department of Peacekeeping Operations also established a 100-person roster of dedicated professionals available at short notice. I am most grateful for the cooperation of Member States in this regard. Furthermore, the Division, in collaboration with other United Nations entities, enhanced its capacity to address policing, judicial and corrections matters by establishing a Criminal Law and Judicial Advisory Unit early in 2003.

The United Nations and regional organizations

54. The United Nations continues to work with and rely on regional organizations for the advancement of common goals such as international peace and security, development and respect for human rights. The biennial high-level meetings of the United Nations and regional organizations, a forum inaugurated in 1994, have been instrumental in strengthening cooperation, especially in the areas of conflict prevention and peace-building. In the light of the increasing need for a joint response to challenges to peace and security around the world, I convened the fifth high-level meeting in July 2003, on the theme "New challenges to peace and security, including international terrorism". The conclusions of the meeting, which I intend to make available for wider distribution, confirmed the keen interest of the participants in jointly confronting the new challenges and in meeting more frequently to develop common strategies and policies.

55. During the period under review, the United Nations forged a number of innovative partnerships with regional organizations. For example, as mentioned earlier, the European Union and the United Nations recently combined their efforts in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, where a European Union force was deployed in June 2003 under the authority of the Security Council to keep the peace in the Ituri region. Similarly, in Afghanistan, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization agreed to assume, in August 2003, the leadership of the International Security Assistance Force operating under a Security Council mandate. In the area of development, the signature in April 2003 of a Framework Agreement with the European Commission makes it easier for the United Nations to access Commission funds in the joint pursuit of the Millennium Development Goals.

56. The United Nations also continued to cooperate closely with the African Union and sub-regional organizations in Africa to assist in the management and resolution of conflicts. The African Chiefs of Defence Staff and the Union's Executive Council, assisted by the United Nations, adopted a number of proposals to enhance Africa's peacekeeping capacity. In addition, my Special Representative for West Africa, with the support of United Nations agencies and the Secretariat, worked closely with ECOWAS to develop an integrated subregional approach to address the challenges facing West African States. At the Security Council's request, I sent a multidisciplinary assessment mission to Central Africa in June 2003 to seek ways for the United Nations to enhance its cooperation with subregional institutions towards achieving sustainable peace. A representative of ECOWAS joined the mission. For its part, UNDP has been developing a comprehensive programme of support for the African Union in building its capacity for conflict management.

57. In Asia, I welcome the increasing contacts and cooperation between the secretariats of the United Nations and the Association of South-East Asian Nations (ASEAN) on matters relating to regional peace and security. In February 2003, the third regional workshop on conflict prevention, conflict resolution and peace-building in South-East Asia was held in Singapore, focusing on ASEAN and United Nations experiences in anticipating and mediating conflicts. In Latin America, I have welcomed and supported, since their inception, the tireless mediation efforts launched by the Secretary-General of the Organization of American States, concerning the situation in Venezuela and that in Haiti. In the Pacific region, I am pleased to note the increased cooperation between the United Nations and the Pacific Islands Forum.

Electoral assistance

58. Electoral assistance is seen by the United Nations as a tool for conflict prevention. A timely and well-executed electoral process which is transparent and inclusive can prevent an increase in tension and violence that could otherwise result from dissatisfaction in the face of real or perceived electoral irregularities. For example, in response to a request from the Palestinian Authority, the United Nations deployed two electoral teams to help establish the Palestinian Central Electoral Commission and to prepare for a voter registration exercise. It did so to enable the Commission to adequately carry out transparent and efficient elections or a referendum when called upon to do so under the road map. This is to ensure that the peace process would not lose momentum for lack of a credible voters register or because of an inadequately prepared Electoral Commission. Moreover, a senior electoral adviser was put in place to counsel the United Nations Special Coordinator for the Middle East Peace Process on the impact of the electoral process on the implementation of the road map.

59. The limited capacity of the Jamaican authorities to properly respond to electoral complaints had given rise to violence in previous elections in Jamaica. To meet the Government's request for assistance in preventing a repetition of violent incidents during the new electoral period, the United Nations focused on enhancing the legal and investigative capacities of the Jamaican electoral authorities and Jamaica's Political Ombudsperson, so as to enable them to deal with electoral appeals and complaints. While the impact of this assistance is difficult to quantify, no deaths were attributed to the parliamentary elections held late in 2002.

60. From September 2002 to July 2003, the United Nations received 32 official requests for electoral assistance. Positive responses were provided to 20 of those requests, nine remain under consideration and three could not be fulfilled.

Terrorism

61. Terrorism continues to pose a major threat to international peace and security. The Counter-Terrorism Committee, established pursuant to Security Council resolution 1373(2001), continued to review reports from Member States on the implementation of relevant measures to suppress and prevent terrorism. It also continued to facilitate the provision to States of the assistance they required to comply with their obligations under resolution 1373(2001). The United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime launched, in October 2002, the Global Programme against Terrorism, as a framework for its operational activities in this field, and obtained the approval of the General Assembly to strengthen the Terrorism Prevention Branch of the Centre for International Crime Prevention. The Department of Public Information will ensure that the Organization's principled positions and activities relating to terrorism obtain broad coverage.

62. Countering the financing of terrorism has become a principal area of focus for the international community. Assistance to Governments in identifying, tracing and seizing illicit assets increases the ability of States to confront both conventional criminality and terrorism. Assistance provided in this area by the Office on Drugs and Crime includes legislative drafting and capacity-building for investigators, prosecutors and the financial sector, as well as the establishment and strengthening of financial intelligence units—which together form the basis for targeting money-laundering and terrorist financing.

63. While we are vigorously pursuing the struggle against terrorism, it is important to make sure that the dignity of individuals and their fundamental freedoms, as well as democratic practices and the due process of law, are not trampled on. To this end, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights continues to emphasize the importance of respecting human rights in the context of counter-terrorism efforts and has strengthened contacts between the United Nations human rights bodies and the Counter-Terrorism Committee. In my public pronouncements, I have consistently stressed that there is no trade-off between human rights and security: respecting human rights must be a fundamental element in the fight against terrorism. Promoting values of tolerance and the dialogue among civilizations is also of paramount importance.

Disarmament

64. The year 2003 marks the twenty-fifth anniversary of the convening of the first special session of the General Assembly devoted to disarmament. Yet the body of multilateral disarmament norms has been slowly eroded as a result of weakened international commitment, while the structures set up to deliberate and negotiate further measures remain at a standstill. I am particularly concerned with the prolonged stalemate in the Conference on Disarmament. Lack of agreement on its programme of work has again blocked substantive work, even on issues where there is consensus to begin negotiations. The Conference must be allowed to play its mandated role as the sole multilateral disarmament negotiating body.

65. Developments in 2003 heightened the concern of the world community that nuclear, biological or chemical weapons might be used by State or non-State actors. Universal adherence to, and full and effective compliance with, negotiated multilateral agreements are powerful tools in the battle against the use and proliferation of such weapons. The danger that weapons of mass destruction might fall into the hands of terrorists has been a major global concern. Concerted efforts to promote disarmament, non-proliferation and the security of weapon-related materials are essential for preventing terrorists from obtaining such weapons.

66. I welcomed the entry into force of the Moscow Treaty on Strategic Offensive Reductions between the Russian Federation and the United States of America in June 2003. Further steps to make reductions in strategic nuclear weapons irreversible, transparent and verifiable would greatly strengthen international peace and security. At the second session of the Preparatory Committee for the 2005 Review Conference of the Parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, States parties reaffirmed that the Treaty remained the cornerstone of the global non-proliferation regime and the essential foundation for nuclear disarmament. Nevertheless, the decision of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to withdraw from the Treaty, the first such decision since the Treaty's entry into force 33 years ago, particularly undermined confidence in its effective implementation. While there has been a marked increase in adherence to the Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban Treaty, further efforts are needed to ensure that that Treaty enters into force.

67. The First Biennial Meeting of States to Consider the Implementation of the Programme of Action to Prevent, Combat and Eradicate the Illicit Trade in Small Arms and Light Weapons in All Its Aspects was held in New York in July 2003. After just two years of activity, 99 States were able to present national status reports. I am encouraged by the many initiatives being taken at the national, regional and international levels to stem the illicit trade in these weapons. The Meeting confirmed the need for partnerships at all of those levels, including with civil society, to assist States in implementing the Programme of Action adopted in 2001. The United Nations will continue to do its part to encourage and assist States in their efforts to mitigate the impact on security, development and human rights of the illicit trade in small arms and light weapons.

Sanctions

68. Sanctions remain an important tool in promoting and maintaining international peace and security. Their frequent use in the late 1990s has, however, raised concerns about their effect on civilian populations and their consequences for the humanitarian situation in the targeted country or region. I have been encouraged by progress during the period under review towards refining international sanctions so that they maximize pressure on the intended targets while minimizing adverse effects on the general population and third States. The Security Council now frequently requests assessment reports on the humanitarian implications of current and possible future sanction regimes. The Office for the Co-ordination of Humanitarian Affairs of the Secretariat has been mandated to carry out such assessments. In addition to the establishment of panels of experts and monitoring mechanisms, improved implementation of targeted sanctions also requires regular, accurate and transparent reporting by States. Such reporting helps sanctions committees to gauge the level of compliance and is useful in identifying technical assistance required by States to improve implementation. I was pleased to note that some of the findings from the Stockholm Process on the Implementation of Targeted Sanctions were reflected in the enhanced reporting requirements contained in Security Council resolution 1455(2003). I wish to encourage further expert discussions on the potential use of targeted measures to prevent or contain conflict.

69. Sanctions were reinforced or expanded against Somalia and Liberia and members of the Taliban and Al-Qa'idah. The Security Council lifted sanctions against UNITA, in view of the end of the war in Angola and the transformation of UNITA into a political party, and decided not to renew prohibitions against the import of rough diamonds from Sierra Leone, given that Government's full participation in the Kimberley Process. The Council also terminated all prohibitions relating to trade with Iraq, except with regard to the supply of arms.

Chapter II

Meeting humanitarian commitments

70. There have been significant improvements and disturbing setbacks in humanitarian affairs over the past year. While long-standing conflicts in Angola, Sierra Leone and the Sudan appear to be moving towards resolution, thus easing the humanitarian situation in those countries, outbreaks of fighting in Côte d'Ivoire, the eastern Democratic Republic of the Congo and Liberia have exacerbated the already devastating human suffering in those areas. Protracted conflicts in Colombia and the Occupied Palestinian Territory continue to give rise to grave concern. Numerous natural disasters have caused much suffering and loss of life, and in some places have wreaked havoc on populations already ravaged by war or infectious diseases such as malaria, tuberculosis and, especially, HIV/AIDS.

71. The United Nations system has sought to respond to the numerous humanitarian crises both equitably and efficiently, placing the principles of humanity, neutrality and impartiality at the core of its efforts. Significant energies have been expended over the year in ensuring a more coherent and strategically coordinated humanitarian response, through further strengthening the consolidated appeals process and partnerships with recipient countries, non-governmental organizations and other international institutions.

The challenge of protecting and assisting refugees and displaced populations

72. Over the past year nascent peace processes in several previously war-torn countries have created opportunities to improve substantially the lives of many returning refugees and internally displaced persons. In Afghanistan, over 2 million refugees and 750,000 internally displaced persons returned home following the fall of the Taliban regime. In Angola, almost 130,000 refugees repatriated spontaneously from neighbouring countries and more than a million internally displaced persons returned to their villages. In Sierra Leone, some 75,000 refugees returned to their homes from Guinea and Liberia and nearly the entire population of internally displaced persons was returned or resettled by December 2002. In Sri Lanka, some 240,000 uprooted people returned to their home areas following the beginning of peace negotiations. The majority of the 170,000 persons from the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia who had fled their homes in 2001 were able to return, signifying the end of the emergency.

73. Tragically, millions of refugees around the world remain affected by vicious cycles of conflict and upheaval, with little hope for return. In Africa alone, there were over 3 million persons in such "protracted" refugee situations, including from the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Eritrea, Somalia and the Sudan. In Western Sahara, around 165,000 refugees continued to languish in camps more than a quarter of a century since the dispute began, still waiting for a political solution. Despite progress made in Afghanistan, over 1.1 million Afghan refugees remained in the Islamic Republic of Iran and 1.2 million in Pakistan. Overall, the global number of refugees was estimated in early 2003 to be some 10.3 million persons, a decrease of 1.7 million, or 14 per cent, compared with one year earlier. The total population of concern to the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, including refugees, asylum seekers and internally displaced persons, as well as those who returned during the year, increased slightly, from 19.8 million in early 2002 to some 20.5 million in early 2003. Whereas many refugees were able to return home, almost 300,000 additional persons were forced to flee their homes and became refugees in 2002, mainly from Burundi (29,000), the Democratic Republic of the Congo (39,000) and Liberia (105,000). The largest refugee outflows occurred in Africa. In West Africa, the conflicts in Côte d'Ivoire and Liberia led to tragic displacements across the entire subregion and sparked instability in neighbouring countries, while also jeopardizing efforts at consolidating stability in Sierra Leone.

74. Although States have the primary responsibility for the well-being of their citizens, UNHCR has in recent years become more engaged in responding to situations where the protection needs of internally displaced persons mirror those of refugees. Over 6 million internally displaced persons continue to endure suffering and abuse in Burundi, Colombia and the Sudan. In the Democratic Republic of the Congo, optimism over successful peace negotiations was tempered by continuing bloodshed and displacement, in particular in the Ituri region. In Indonesia, the resumption of a military offensive against the separatist movement in Aceh also led to the displacement of thousands of people. There are currently some 370,000 internally displaced persons in the Russian Federation. The work of my Representative on Internally Displaced Persons has contributed significantly to gaining international attention and enhancing the response to the problem of internal displacement. The Guiding Principles on Internal Displacement, which were developed by my Representative and a team of legal experts, provide guidance to all pertinent actors and set forth the rights and guarantees applicable in all relevant phases, that is, during displacement, return, resettlement and reintegration. The Guiding Principles have increasingly been taken into account in the work of regional organizations and have been of assistance in the drafting of legislation on internal displacement in a number of countries. The Internal Displacement Unit of the Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs has maintained its focus on providing support to specific internal displacement crises, while promoting United Nations system-wide improvements in dealing with such crises. Training workshops and expert advice and guidance provided by the Unit, in collaboration with other humanitarian partners, have for example led to the expression of interest on the part of the authorities of the Sudan in developing a national policy on internally displaced people.

75. The return of refugees and displaced populations presents enormous challenges. Achieving sustainable solutions entails the arduous task of rebuilding shattered economies and finding gainful employment for populations who have known little but war. One approach, referred to as the "4 Rs" (repatriation, reintegration, rehabilitation and reconstruction), brings humanitarian and development actors together in the context of post-conflict situations. In Sierra Leone and Sri Lanka, UNHCR and UNDP have been working to effectively target development and reintegration assistance to areas with high numbers of returnees. Special "4R" collaboration is under way in Afghanistan and Eritrea as well. A United Nations University study emphasizes that the management of refugee movements and protection of displaced people should be an integral part of conflict settlement, peacebuilding and regional security.

76. In developing countries that host refugees, lack of security has remained a major problem. Refugee camps and settlements have been infiltrated by armed elements. The forced recruitment of refugees, especially children—including those previously demobilized—by both government forces and rebel groups have also been of major concern. Such problems were particularly prevalent in the West Africa region over the past year. In Guinea, UNHCR was forced to move some 33,000 refugees from a camp near the Liberian border to a safer location some 250 miles away, following repeated raids by Liberian armed groups.

77. The Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, UNICEF and partner agencies have committed considerable resources over the year to improving the protection of refugee women and children. Girls and women have been routinely targeted by campaigns of gender-based violence, including rape, mutilation, prostitution, forced pregnancy and sexual slavery. In response to incidents of sexual and gender-based violence in refugee camps, a series of preventive and remedial measures were put in place, including investigation systems, recourse mechanisms and programmes of victim support. In Guinea, UNHCR and its non-governmental organization partners promoted the establishment of refugee associations in camps to enhance prevention of and response to sexual and gender-based violence. In Sierra Leone, a sensitization campaign was undertaken by UNICEF in all camps, in the communities surrounding the camps and in four interim care centres. Other measures taken in Sierra Leone included development of a community monitoring system and complaints mechanism in the camps, training of humanitarian workers on sexual abuse and exploitation and training for police in interviewing in cases of sexual abuse, sexual exploitation and domestic violence. UNICEF, the World Food Programme (WFP) and non-governmental organization partners have jointly spearheaded training of United Nations and non-governmental organization staff and partners in preventing and responding to sexual exploitation in six countries in Southern Africa.

78. The period under review has seen new challenges to the protection of refugees, many of them linked to broader developments in the international arena. Security concerns have led to new and stringent checks by States at entry points to their territories, making it increasingly difficult for asylum-seekers to gain access to asylum procedures. Many Governments seem to be succumbing to the temptation of applying discriminatory measures in order to limit the admission of all potential immigrants, including asylum-seekers. Cases of arbitrary detention have also become commonplace in some countries. As a result, public support for the asylum process has been undermined and refugees have faced unfair suspicion, prejudice and xenophobia. Recognizing that States have legitimate security concerns linked to the asylum-migration nexus, UNHCR has been exploring ways to work with Governments on those issues. The year 2002 witnessed the completion of the Global Consultations on International Protection, involving States, intergovernmental organizations, non-governmental organizations, academics, legal practitioners and refugees. As a result of that process, an Agenda for Protection was adopted, reflecting a renewed commitment to address gaps in international protection. UNHCR, as part of its commitment to the process, launched the Convention Plus initiative, the purpose of which is to develop special arrangements that promote durable solutions and fairer burden-sharing.

Delivering humanitarian assistance and the challenge of underfunded emergencies

79. As I mentioned earlier, the consolidated appeals process continued to be strengthened as a strategic planning tool for the United Nations and its partners. During the reporting period, the United Nations and its partners produced 27 consolidated appeals for humanitarian assistance, requesting a total of $5.8 billion from the international community. The overall response to those appeals as at 21 July 2003 stood at 52 per cent. With the funds made available, even if not at the desired level, the United Nations was able to provide food, shelter, medicine and other life-saving assistance to 45 million victims of conflict, drought and other emergencies.

80. The donor community has generously supported WFP humanitarian operations, providing almost $1.8 billion over the course of 2002. However, not all WFP operations were fully funded and the significant shortfalls compromised assistance efforts in places such as Colombia, Eritrea, the Occupied Palestinian Territory, the Sudan and Tajikistan. In addition, the benefits of food aid can only be fully realized when combined with other programmes. Adequate funding for non-food assistance is therefore critical to ensuring the success of humanitarian action. Such non-food assistance must include support for the restoration of livelihoods, including in sectors such as agriculture. Underfunding of the emergency and early rehabilitation activities of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) jeopardized its ability to assist displaced or other disaster-affected persons in recovering their productive capacity.

81. Health sector programmes in the consolidated appeals remained chronically under-resourced, receiving on average only 10 per cent of the resources requested. Nevertheless, the World Health Organization (WHO) worked to fight a malaria epidemic, meningitis and cholera in Burundi, helped manage a yellow fever epidemic in Guinea and was able to respond to an outbreak of Lassa fever in the refugee camps in Sierra Leone within 48 hours. The severe acute respiratory syndrome (SARS) was the first new disease to emerge in the twenty-first century. When it was first identified by WHO, in February 2003, it was apparent that the disease spread rapidly within hospitals and was being transported by aircraft, that no therapy was effective and that SARS could inflict enormous damage to economies. WHO coordinated global action to identify the cause of SARS, control outbreaks and prevent the disease from becoming established as it moved from country to country. The United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA) was able to provide basic maternity care and HIV prevention for internally displaced people and refugees in a dozen countries. However, because donor support for these reproductive health needs was insufficient and, moreover, concentrated on a few highly visible emergencies, assistance for many populations facing conflict was inadequate. Adequate attention to health is crucial in dealing with humanitarian emergencies and requires coordinated action and timely provision of the necessary funds by the donors.

82. Underfunding has a particularly direct impact on the lives of children and women. For example, low funding over the past year meant that UNICEF work to provide emergency health assistance in the Republic of the Congo had to focus on high-risk areas and not the entire country. Whereas 1.2 million children should have been vaccinated against measles, only 200,000 were covered, given the low level of resources received. In education, of the 1,700 schools that needed to be re-equipped, only 120 could be covered. In the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, only limited types of medicine could be made available, mainly for the treatment of childhood illnesses.

83. The general shortfall in resources experienced by UNHCR over the year has continued to impede efforts to provide much needed protection and material assistance, in particular in sub-Saharan Africa. At the end of 2002, its overall budget of $829 million was underfunded by some $100 million, which has led in many cases to the scaling back of already reduced assistance and services to more than 4 million refugees and other people of concern to UNHCR, especially in Africa, where the needs are the greatest.

84. Though funding constraints limited the scale of their operations, WHO, UNICEF and their non-governmental partners carried out measles and vitamin A campaigns in Afghanistan, Angola, Burundi, Somalia and elsewhere. Between January 2002 and June 2003, 15.3 million children between six months and 12 years of age were vaccinated against measles and received vitamin A supplements in Afghanistan (93 per cent coverage), preventing an estimated 35,000 child deaths. In Angola, between September 2002 and June 2003, 7.2 million children between nine months and 14 years of age were vaccinated against measles and received vitamin A supplements (95 per cent coverage), averting an estimated 10,000 child deaths. United Nations bodies and their partners also organized successful national immunization days for the eradication of polio in Afghanistan, Liberia, Somalia and the Sudan. Between September 2002 and May 2003, 34 million doses of oral polio vaccine were administered to 6.5 million children under five years of age in Afghanistan, through different rounds of national and subnational immunization days. It is encouraging to note that there has been only one reported case of polio to date this year in Afghanistan.

85. The past year saw a number of important achievements in Afghanistan, allowing for significant economic progress to take place. Higher rainfall in some parts of the country and heavy snowfall resulted in improved harvests, with more people now being able to meet their basic food needs. Significant numbers of Afghans, especially women and children, however, remained vulnerable and continued to rely on food aid. In 2002, WFP fed over 323,700 children in Afghanistan through the back-to-school programme, supported the return and resettlement of 330,000 families and helped to strengthen the civil service through the provision of salary supplements to 251,000 civil servants. Despite marked improvement, however, security continues to be a major constraint on humanitarian action in Afghanistan.

86. In the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, a government assessment of the nutritional status of children made in collaboration with UNICEF and WFP indicated a significant improvement between 1998 and 2002. Food assistance had contributed directly to improving the nutritional status of vulnerable groups, though the needs of those groups remained high. The situation could deteriorate again. WFP was forced to suspend distributions to 3 million beneficiaries as a result of funding shortages at the end of 2002.

87. In Angola, the end of the conflict in April 2002 led to the mass return of internally displaced persons and refugees and the opening up of previously inaccessible areas. The Government estimates that 2.3 million internally displaced persons have returned to their homes, while another 1.4 million remain displaced. WFP has been able to increase the number of people it assists by over 80 per cent, substantially supporting the consolidation of the newly realized peace, and UNICEF has expanded school access.

88. The humanitarian situation continued to worsen in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, in particular its eastern region. Access to the most vulnerable remained the main challenge, driven by lack of security, harassment by the conflicting parties and poor infrastructure. Violence against civilians was rampant, in particular sexual violence against women and girls. UNICEF, together with non-governmental organization partners, provided psychological assistance to almost 1,000 women survivors of sexual violence in South Kivu and strengthened community support networks. UNFPA worked to sensitize military and police leaders to the need to prevent gender violence.

89. In Eritrea and Ethiopia, drought has again sharply increased the number of people in need of relief assistance. Such assistance is necessary to save lives, prevent mass migration and preserve the assets of farmers and pastoralists. In response to the increasingly alarming situation, in June 2003 I appointed a Special Envoy for the Humanitarian Crisis in the Horn of Africa, who visited Eritrea and Ethiopia in July 2003. While persisting drought conditions and their long-term effects continued to increase the number of people in need of humanitarian assistance in both countries, Ethiopia has been particularly hard hit. Despite generous donor support, which secured almost 100 per cent of funding requirements of the consolidated inter-agency appeal for Ethiopia for 2003, malnutrition levels in many areas of the country continued to increase and, by July 2003, it was determined that an additional 2.3 million people would require assistance until the end of the year, thus bringing the total number of beneficiaries to over 13.1 million.

90. The humanitarian crisis in Southern Africa threatens to be one of the most severe and complex humanitarian disasters of the last decade, the result of a combination of erratic rainfall, poverty, economic decline, inadequate food security policies and high rates of HIV/AIDS infection. During 2002, the number of people at risk of severe food insecurity rose from 12.8 million to 14.4 million. Generous donor support enabled WFP to mobilize capacity rapidly to help millions of people in Lesotho, Malawi, Mozambique, Swaziland, Zambia and Zimbabwe. United Nations entities have been working together in the Regional Inter-Agency Coordination and Support Office to raise awareness and emphasize the need to move beyond the traditional emergency response in order to find durable solutions.

91. My Special Envoy for Humanitarian Needs in Southern Africa has played an important role in raising donor awareness to the unique nature of the crisis, the first major emergency in which high rates of HIV/AIDS infection have played a significant role in exacerbating food insecurity and malnutrition. The HIV/AIDS epidemic has introduced a new complexity into humanitarian crises, which requires rethinking of humanitarian assistance. The lessons learned from the regional response indicate not only that methods for food security analysis, food rations and/or nutrition-related activities should be adjusted, but also that such efforts need to be combined with emergency development action in the social and health sectors.

92. Old and new conflicts in West Africa put considerable strain on humanitarian intervention efforts during the past year and endangered the stability of fragile neighbouring countries. In a worrisome trend, both the escalation of the conflict in Liberia and renewed fighting in Côte d'Ivoire were marked by a blatant disregard for the protection of civilians, increase in recruitment and use of children in armed conflict and contempt for humanitarian work. In an environment without law and order, humanitarian efforts have proved extremely difficult, especially in Liberia, where the escalation of the country's civil war in March 2003 resulted in a humanitarian crisis of immense proportions. Sustained combat in the capital city of Monrovia led to a complete breakdown of law and order, the displacement of about 50 per cent of the city's population and the evacuation of all United Nations international personnel. The arrival of peacekeepers in August 2003, as well as the transitional political arrangements, have provided a new opportunity for humanitarian agencies to assess the situation and resume relief operations for the most vulnerable groups. On 6 August 2003, the United Nations launched a revised consolidated inter-agency appeal for Liberia, requesting $69 million to respond to the increased humanitarian needs. Efforts are under way to strengthen the overall capacity of the humanitarian community to deal effectively with the situation.

93. In Iraq, the Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs played a key role in the establishment and maintenance of humanitarian coordination mechanisms both prior to and after the onset of the war in March 2003, at the field and headquarters levels. WFP succeeded in dispatching over 1.13 million tons of food commodities into Iraq between April and June 2003. WFP also managed a United Nations joint logistics centre for the Iraq crisis, coordinating the logistics capabilities of humanitarian agencies, and provided common airlift services for the relief operation by managing the United Nations humanitarian air service. WHO led efforts in the health sector through the supply of badly needed drugs and other medical items, public health programmes and rehabilitation of health facilities. UNICEF led the United Nations emergency efforts in the provision of non-food assistance, including critical supplies for child survival, supplemental nutrition and basic education materials, as well as in the provision of emergency water supplies, in collaboration with non-governmental organization partners. UNDP installed generators and rehabilitated electricity facilities that provided power supply for the operation of hospitals, water-pumping stations and sewage-treatment plants.

94. The oil-for-food programme, administered by the Office of the Iraq Programme, has continued to deliver supplies to meet the basic humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people. Prior to the war, the programme, among other achievements, had succeeded in reducing by half malnutrition rates among children under the age of five. In its resolution 1483(2003), the Security Council stipulated that the programme should be phased out by 21 November 2003. Until that time, the United Nations and its entities and programmes, in coordination with the Coalition Provisional Authority and the emerging Iraqi authorities, will continue to review and prioritize contracts, as well as facilitate the shipment of civilian goods to Iraq from a delivery pipeline valued at some $10 billion. Separately, on 28 March 2003, the United Nations launched a flash appeal for dealing with the Iraq crisis, seeking $2.2 billion. The flash appeal was revised in June 2003, when outstanding requirements of $259 million were presented, reflecting resources already made available by donors and through the oil-for-food programme, as well as new priorities that emerged after the end of major hostilities.

95. The United Nations Development Group has been working, in collaboration with the Office of the Humanitarian Coordinator for Iraq, the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, under the overall coordination of my Special Representative for Iraq, to identify priorities for Iraq's reconstruction through a joint needs assessment. That exercise is being carried out bearing in mind issues of gender, human rights, environment and capacity-building. The United Nations Development Group has also convened a donor liaison group, consisting of over 50 members who regularly share information on the needs assessment process and on the donor conference on the reconstruction of Iraq scheduled for October 2003.

96. In the Occupied Palestinian Territory, the humanitarian situation has yet to show signs of improvement following the parties' embarking on implementation of the Quartet's road map in June 2003. For most of the past year, the situation has been increasingly desperate and the local population has been facing unprecedented levels of hardship. Closures and curfews have crippled the economy, plunging 1.3 million Palestinians into poverty. Military operations have left over 10,000 homeless. The United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) has been delivering emergency assistance to over 1 million affected Palestinians, including food aid, shelter reconstruction and employment creation. Heavy restrictions on movement in the Occupied Palestinian Territory have posed serious obstacles to the operations of UNRWA and other international agencies. At the same time, UNRWA received only $37.3 million in funding against an appeal for $94 million to cover emergency operations between January and July 2003. Despite a $37.5 million shortfall in its 2003 regular budget as at 30 June, UNRWA continued to deliver regular education, health and relief and social services to a population of over 4 million registered Palestinian refugees in Jordan, Lebanon, the Syrian Arab Republic, the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. WHO played a key role in coordinating the health sector and in providing technical assistance in key domains, such as nutrition and mental health. It also advocated for access and the right to health of the Palestinian population. The UNDP Programme of Assistance to the Palestinian People provided some emergency assistance, in addition to major employment and technical assistance.

Natural disaster management: responding to emergencies and building capacity

97. Severe floods recurred across Asia between September and November 2002. Serious damage was caused by cyclones in the Pacific region in January 2003. In May 2003, earthquakes occurred in Algeria and Turkey and torrential rains led to the most serious flooding and landslides in Sri Lanka since 1947. Severe and continual rainfall that began in late June 2003 has led to flooding in a number of provinces in China, affecting 130 million people and resulting in the evacuation of more than 3 million from their homes and the death of over 800 persons. Droughts continued to affect large parts of the population in African and Asian countries, compounding very challenging situations also associated with conflicts and lethal epidemics such as HIV/AIDS. From 1 September 2002 to 8 August 2003, the Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs responded to 75 natural disasters, mobilizing international assistance through appeals and situation reports, providing emergency cash grants, channelling grants from donor Governments and fielding United Nations disaster assessment and coordination missions.

98. The efforts of the United Nations to reduce the impact of natural hazards through mitigating vulnerability and disaster risks have been undermined by limited funding. Humanitarian donors shy away from channelling monies to activities with a longer-term impact, while development donors have not yet fully assumed that responsibility. Nevertheless, advocacy efforts have ensured heightened awareness of the imperative to reduce risk and vulnerability to natural hazards and other technological and environmental disasters in order to achieve sustainable development. The International Strategy for Disaster Reduction, coordinated by its secretariat, has increasingly been utilized to guide commitment and action by United Nations entities, other international and regional organizations and Governments. The special emphasis on developing subregional and national plans in Africa has been further strengthened by the creation of an International Strategy for Disaster Reduction outreach programme for Africa and by activities undertaken jointly by the secretariat, UNDP, the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) and others. Regional consultations have been carried out in Asia, Europe and the South Pacific and are further planned in Africa and the Americas. UNDP has contributed to increased capacity for disaster reduction in 33 countries worldwide, including early warning systems, strengthening of national disaster offices, risk reduction tools and strategies, support to legislative systems and strengthening knowledge networks. Other United Nations entities are also gradually developing substantive disaster reduction programmes and activities within the framework of the International Strategy.

Coordination of assistance and the protection of civilians in armed conflict

99. Effective humanitarian responses require well-managed coordination and rapid resource mobilization. Working through the inter-agency system, the Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs strives to ensure an adequate response to humanitarian crises by mobilizing resources, promoting access to vulnerable populations and undertaking field coordination. Furthermore, the United Nations system as a whole is committed to ensuring a smooth transition from provision of humanitarian assistance to development activities in post-conflict situations.

100. An example of an effective coordinated approach to a humanitarian crisis was the extensive inter-agency contingency preparations for the Iraq conflict. Well in advance of the outbreak of the war, a regional humanitarian coordination office was established, from which the humanitarian response was planned and coordinated in close collaboration with non-governmental organizations.

101. There has been considerable activity on the part of the Organization over the past year towards mainstreaming protection issues into the policies and decision-making processes of Member States and the United Nations system at large, including in the discussions of the Security Council. In November 2002, in my third report to the Security Council on the protection of civilians in armed conflict, I highlighted three emerging challenges: (a) gender-based violence in humanitarian crises and conflict situations; (b) the harmful consequences of the commercial exploitation of conflict; and (c) the escalating threat of global terrorism.

102. The continuing challenge is to identify and utilize more effective means of implementing the principles and policies that are in place, to mainstream them into the humanitarian work of the United Nations system and to translate them into specific measures in the field. Some important steps have been taken in that regard. For example, United Nations entities in Afghanistan, Burundi and Iraq have used the aide-memoire formulated by the Security Council (S/PRST/2002/6, annex) to put together an active collaborative framework for the protection of civilians that has led to a more coherent inter-agency response. In Iraq, human rights officers deployed with the Office of the Humanitarian Coordinator for Iraq developed a policy framework on human rights protection together with United Nations humanitarian bodies and other international organizations to guide humanitarian assistance. Human rights advisers led inter-agency technical working groups on protection-related issues in Côte d'Ivoire and Iraq. Another significant development has been the inclusion of protection principles in the mandates of certain peacekeeping missions, including the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the Economic Community of West African States and French forces in Côte d'Ivoire.

103. A series of regional workshops on issues of protection of civilians in armed conflict was launched in October 2002. Since that time, workshops have been held in East Asia and the Pacific, Europe, the South Pacific, Southern Africa and West Africa, with additional workshops planned in the coming months in Latin America and South Asia. The workshops aim to examine the nature of humanitarian challenges during complex emergencies within each region and to explore possible means of addressing such challenges from a regional perspective. All these activities are consistent with my call for a "culture of protection" within the international community. The continued commitment of Member States to those issues will be vital in consolidating the positive gains made through our collective efforts to date.

104. Child soldiers continue to be a tragic part of many conflicts. For example, in northern Uganda, an estimated 8,400 children were abducted between June 2002 and May 2003. This is a sharp increase compared with the 12,000 registered child abductions in the 11-year period from 1990 to 2001. Some progress has been made, however, in child soldier disarmament, demobiliza-tion and reintegration over the year. In Afghanistan, UNICEF has been helping support a child-specific component as part of the Afghanistan New Beginnings Programme, with the aim to disarm, demobilize and reintegrate all under-age soldiers by 2005. Under the leadership of the World Bank, the Multi-Country Demobilization and Reintegration Programme in the greater Great Lakes region of Africa brings together Governments, United Nations entities, regional organizations and the international financial institutions to facilitate the demobilization and reintegration of fighters in seven countries in the subregion. Specific projects for demobilization, disarmament and reintegration of child soldiers in Burundi and the Democratic Republic of the Congo have been developed with UNICEF and are about to be launched.

Chapter III

Cooperating for development

105. Over the past year, the Organization supported Member States in their efforts to achieve the Millennium Development Goals and addressed specific issues emerging from recent major United Nations conferences and summits.

106. I am pleased to report good progress in response to the guidance provided by Member States and in line with my vision for reform of the United Nations. The United Nations system, including the specialized agencies, has continued to strive to achieve greater coherence in their policies and programmes with a view to improving the efficiency and impact of the support they provide at the country level.

Eradicating extreme poverty

107. Extreme poverty is a multidimensional phenomenon with varied causes, including insufficient economic growth and investment, persistent societal inequalities, inadequate social safety nets, a lack of investment in education and health and a shortage of development finance, as well as prevailing international financial and trade relations that leave lower-income countries at a disadvantage. To enhance the process of development, the following elements are critical: new and increased financing for development; cooperation from the private sector; a successful development round of trade negotiations; the alleviation of urban and rural poverty; secure access to food, good health and education; improved governance; opportunities for women living in poverty; and use of new technologies such as information and communications technologies for poverty eradication purposes. The Organization is making every effort to ensure that those issues are addressed at the global, regional and national levels.

108. In its follow-up to the International Conference on Financing for Development, the General Assembly, at its fifty-seventh session, established the high-level dialogue on financing for development, as well as the Financing for Development Office in the Department of Economic and Social Affairs of the Secretariat, which became operational in January 2003. The high-level dialogue will serve as the intergovernmental focal point for the general follow-up to the Conference. The United Nations system, in cooperation with other key stakeholders, including the Bretton Woods institutions and the World Trade Organization (WTO), the private sector and civil society, will undertake activities to help accelerate the process of implementation of the Monterrey Consensus adopted by the Conference.

109. As also envisaged in the Monterrey Consensus, the Economic and Social Council held the first of a new series of high-level meetings in April 2003 with the Bretton Woods institutions and WTO in which ministers of finance and development cooperation, governors of central banks and senior officials from several international organizations participated. The outcome of the meeting, embodied in the summary by the President of the Council (A/58/77-E/2003/62), included a number of recommendations to advance the implementation of the policy commitments in the Monterrey Consensus and to facilitate the discussion process in the high-level dialogue, the first biennial meeting of which is to be held by the General Assembly in October 2003.

110. Economic growth is essential to meet the Millennium Development Goals, in particular the first goal of eradicating extreme poverty. In its Human Development Report 2003: Millennium Development Goals, UNDP estimates that an annual GDP growth of 2.9 per cent per year is required between now and 2015 to reach the Millennium Development Goals—about double the present level. This will not be achieved without concurrent growth in the domestic private sector, the key engine of economic growth and employment generation.

111. As a follow-up to the International Conference on Financing for Development and the World Summit on Sustainable Development and as called for by the General Assembly in its resolution 57/265, I launched, in July 2003, in New York, the Commission on the Private Sector and Development. The main purpose of the Commission, which is composed of prominent leaders from business, the public sector, academia and civil society, is to develop strategic recommendations on how to promote a strong, indigenous private sector in developing countries and to initiate programmes with the highest potential impact in private sector development. The Commission will submit a report to me by the end of 2003 with specific policy recommendations for developing and developed countries, as well as multilateral development agencies. The Commission will seek to highlight successful initiatives already under way in the field of private sector development. Its overall recommendations will also be forwarded for consideration to heads of national and multilateral development agencies, as well as to leaders in the private sector.

112. Increased and more equitable world trade holds forth the prospect of helping nations to combat poverty and hunger and achieve the Millennium Development Goals, including through increased income for small farmers. The Organization, in particular the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, continues to advocate policies that enhance free and fair trade. The Doha Ministerial Declaration, adopted by the Fourth Ministerial Conference of WTO in November 2001, launched a work programme of trade negotiations to be accomplished by no later than 1 January 2005. By placing development at the heart of multilateral trade negotiations, the Doha Declaration provides a major opportunity as well as a challenge for all stakeholders to fully integrate the concerns and interests of developing countries into the trade negotiations and work programme. The Fifth Ministerial Conference of WTO, to be held at Cancun, Mexico, in September 2003, will take stock of progress in the Doha work programme and provide political guidance and take decisions as necessary. The successful conclusion of the development round of trade negotiations is vital to reviving the world economy. The Fifth Ministerial Conference represents an important milestone on the road to a successful conclusion of the Doha round. I urge Member States to make every effort to ensure a successful outcome of the meeting as well as the success of the round as a whole.

113. Extreme poverty is becoming an increasingly urban phenomenon, with nearly half the world's population now living in cities and 1 billion people in slums. The rate of rural to urban migration in developing countries is increasing at a pace that far exceeds the rate of urbanization as a whole and the phenomenon is having a substantial impact on the food and nutritional security of both producers and consumers in developing countries. At the same time, however, over 60 per cent of the population of low- to middle-income countries live in rural areas and depend on agriculture for their livelihood. Poverty reduction strategies need to take account of both groups in terms of their particular needs. During 2002, Governments launched the Global Campaign for Secure Tenure in collaboration with the United Nations Human Settlements Programme (UN-Habitat) in Brazil, Burkina Faso, Jamaica, Nicaragua, the Philippines and Senegal. The Global Campaign on Urban Governance was launched in Jamaica and the Philippines, where UNDP has supported civic dialogue on critical development questions. The preparations for and launch and follow-up of both campaigns have increased popular awareness of the issues and led to partnerships between civil society and Governments on those issues, leading in many cases to immediate specific policy and legislative outcomes. For example, the Global Campaign on Urban Governance provided input to the review of the Kenya Local Governance Act, drawing on examples of legislation for participatory governance from Bolivia, the Philippines and South Africa. In India, an urban slum improvement policy has been initiated and an urban reform incentive fund has been set up. In Nigeria, a new ministry of housing and urban development has been established and in Namibia a law on flexible land tenure has been drafted with a view to ensuring security of tenure for slum-dwellers.

114. Addressing urban poverty needs to go hand in hand with fighting rural poverty. At its high-level segment, held in July 2003, the Economic and Social Council adopted a ministerial declaration on promoting an integrated approach to rural development in developing countries for poverty eradication and sustainable development. A key message of the declaration was the call for renewed political will to make the global partnership work for rural development. Many countries emphasized the overriding impact of the policies of developed countries on rural development, notably those regarding restricted market access, agricultural producer subsidies and insufficient aid. All recognized that rural development was the responsibility of each country and was predicated on an enabling national environment. The issue of rural poverty is thus back on the international agenda.

115. Economic well-being, nutrition and good health are mutually reinforcing. Eradication of poverty will improve nutrition and health, while poor nutrition and ill health carry adverse economic costs and impede efforts aimed at poverty eradication. The Organization continues to focus on activities that will help improve access to food and ensure good health. FAO is currently assisting countries in revising and updating their food security and agricultural development strategies. As a result, to date, across the regions of the world, over 150 national strategies for food security and agricultural development have been prepared. Governments have officially endorsed some 117 such strategies. The International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD) continues to advocate strategies that build on the initiative and capabilities of poor rural producers. Acting as a catalyst, IFAD brings together key stakeholders and mobilizes resources, knowledge and policies to enable the rural poor to overcome poverty. In particular, IFAD projects provide financing and help raise additional resources to increase the access of rural poor people to land, water and other essential resources, to develop rural financial services in support of small enterprises and to encourage sustainable agricultural production, as well as to increase marketing opportunities and access to markets.

116. Food aid will remain an important instrument for hunger reduction, especially in emergency and post-conflict situations. In 2002, WFP provided food aid to 72 million of the world's poorest people. Overall, 77 per cent of WFP resources, or more than $1 billion, was used for activities in the 50 countries identified in the FAO report State of Food Insecurity in the World 2002 as having the greatest number of hungry people as a proportion of total population.

117. In the area of health, the Global Polio Eradication Initiative, led by UNICEF, WHO, the Centers for Disease Control of the United States and Rotary International, made further strides in 2002. Seven countries were polio-endemic by the end of 2002, down from 10 a year earlier. A record 500 million children received oral polio vaccine in 93 countries; UNICEF purchased and delivered the majority of the vaccines, some 1.3 billion doses. UNICEF and other key stakeholders also supported national and subnational immunization days, reaching more than 200 million children. UNICEF also worked with WHO, Médecins Sans Frontières, the International Committee of the Red Cross and other partners in responding to outbreaks of cholera, meningitis and malaria.

118. An adequate primary education is closely linked to the escape from poverty. In 2003, almost one third of all children in developing countries failed to complete the minimum education requirements for basic literacy and it is estimated that 134 million children in those countries are not in school or have never been to school. Among poor children, the majority of those who have never had access to any formal schooling are girls. Yet girls' education is unquestionably one of the keys to achieving poverty reduction.

UNICEF has supported basic education by focusing on a strengthening of the cognitive and psychosocial aspects of early childhood care. This covers the promotion of universal access to and completion of quality basic education, including the development of a healthy, effective and protective learning environment. An important aspect of the support is the promotion of community participation and parents' involvement in schools.

119. Over the past year, the Organization continued to address the challenge of weak institutional structures and inadequate administrative capacity. In 2002, the United Nations Committee of Experts on Public Administration suggested priority areas for Member States to build further capacity in governance and public administration, including in human resource management, knowledge management, management of information and communication technology and the decentralization of administration. To that end, for example, during 2002-2003, the Department of Economic and Social Affairs, in cooperation with UNDP, helped in strengthening municipal and district administration in Rwanda through the preparation of relevant legislation, creation of new management structures and training. The Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia (ESCWA) is building an online database on democracy and good governance practices in the region, including data on the rule of law, human rights and freedom.

120. Promoting the creation of greater economic opportunities for women is critical to the eradication of poverty, since the majority of the people living in poverty, in particular in developing countries, are women. During 2002, the United Nations Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM) collaborated with ESCWA and the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific to help national institutions mainstream gender perspectives into statistical systems to better track women's participation in the formal and informal economies. The 2003 Household Income and Expenditure Survey in Mexico is benefiting from that initiative. UNIFEM is also helping to develop strategies to link low-income producers to markets in Burkina Faso, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, Nigeria, Rwanda, South Asia and the Arab States. Such strategies include facilitating women's access to potential purchasers of their products, through, inter alia, the organization of cooperatives, the use of information and communication technologies—including web sites—for information exchange, and the holding of trading fairs for their products. The second Forum of Women Entrepreneurs, organized by the Economic Commission for Europe at Geneva in March 2003, exchanged good practices in improving access to financing and information and communication technology for small businesses run by women.

121. In Jordan, a partnership initiated by UNIFEM in 2000 with Cisco Systems, Inc., and the Government of Jordan is yielding positive results in increasing women's ability to access and shape the information and communication technology sector through the development of 10 Cisco networking academies. The project has achieved 63.3 per cent female enrolment in the academies and has produced better information and data on Jordanian women in the information and communication technology sector and greater interest among planners in that area in using such information as a basis for policies and programmes.

122. In 2002, the United Nations Information and Communication Technologies Task Force continued to address policy issues such as the integration of national electronic strategies into overall development and poverty eradication strategies, as well as information and communication technology as an instrument for the advancement and empowerment of women, as emphasized by the Commission on the Status of Women at its forty-seventh session, in March 2003. In 2002, the Task Force undertook a number of initiatives to address different aspects of the ICT for Development agenda. In partnership with UNDP and the United Nations Fund for International Partnerships, the Task Force launched digital diaspora networks for Africa and the Caribbean. Those initiatives aim at creating a network that will link the technological, entrepreneurial, professional and financial resources of members of the diasporas in North America and Europe with their counterparts in Africa and the Caribbean.

123. The Global Virtual University, which I launched in June 2003, a joint initiative of the United Nations University (UNU) and UNEP, is a tangible example of cooperation in building digital bridges to promote human security and prosperity through environmentally sustainable development. The Global Virtual University is an international network of cooperating universities and institutions organized as a branch of UNU with an administrative centre at Arendal, Norway. Its core institutions are UNU, UNEP, the UNEP Global Resource Information Data Centre in Norway (GRID-Arendal) and Agder University College in Norway and it will deliver online courses and programmes on environment and development with a global outreach. Additionally, universities in Ghana, Uganda and South Africa are among its participants.

124. At the regional level, ESCWA is cooperating with the International Labour Organization, the Arab Fund for Economic and Social Development and a number of national non-governmental organizations in implementing the Regional Agenda for Action on Technology, Employment and Poverty Alleviation. That initiative aims at harnessing selected new technologies for employment creation and poverty alleviation with emphasis on economically disadvantaged rural communities. The Agenda includes provision for setting up technology community centres to bring literacy, basic education and vocational training to impoverished communities. The first three of a series of such centres will be launched in Lebanon in September 2003. Others are to follow shortly, both in Lebanon and other member countries. In Africa, technical assistance provided by the Economic Commission for Africa (ECA) is helping strengthen public financial management and build capacity for information and communication technology for development in support of the African Information Society Initiative.

Achieving the Millennium Development Goals

125. In July 2002, the entire United Nations system endorsed a core strategy for supporting the achievement of the Millennium Development Goals. The main elements of that strategy include monitoring progress at the national and global levels, operational support to national priorities, research and advocacy.

126. The United Nations Development Group, the Executive Committee on Economic and Social Affairs and the World Bank are collaborating to monitor progress in the implementation of the United Nations Millennium Declaration (General Assembly resolution 55/2) and to improve the process of reporting and analysing indicators at the national and international levels. My annual report on implementation of the Millennium Development Goals will document progress and shortfalls in attaining the Goals. At the country level, as at June 2003, 37 national Millennium Development Goal reports had been completed, with technical and financial support from UNDP, and I expect that at least an additional 60 will be completed by the end of 2003. The reports are helping to ensure that the Millennium Development Goals become a central part of the development debate throughout societies.

127. In its operational response to the Millennium Development Goals, the United Nations system at the country level has striven to bring its collective expertise together to support the achievement of national goals. It is worth noting that 117 countries had completed common country assessments and 86 the United Nations Development Assistance Framework by June 2003.

128. The emergence of the World Bank's poverty reduction strategy papers as a critical national tool for focusing expenditures and development assistance on poverty reduction priorities, including the Millennium Development Goals, is providing an opportunity for the United Nations system to further the Goals through its support to national Governments. To date, 30 countries have completed full poverty reduction strategy papers and 48 have completed interim papers.

129. As a contribution to the debate on obstacles to and policies for achieving the Millennium Development Goals, part II of the World Economic and Social Survey 2003 examines the links between certain macroeconomic policies and poverty, reviewing the relationships between growth-oriented policies and poverty, the impact of trade policies on poverty and the consequences for the urban poor of macroeconomic policy responses to shocks. It analyses the effects of some policies more directly aimed at poverty reduction, such as market-based approaches to land reform and the liberalization and privatization of staple food markets in Africa. It also examines the increase in poverty in the countries with economies in transition since 1990, as well as government and individual reactions. Additionally, under the research pillar, the Millennium Project and its task forces and secretariat collaborated with UNDP in the preparation of the Human Development Report 2003: Millennium Development Goals, published in July.

130. In October 2002, I launched the Millennium Development Goal campaign to make the commitments better known throughout the world and to ensure that they are the focus of global action. A Millennium Campaign Unit was established in November 2002 and is assembling a core team of developing and developed country nationals and has started to build networks and partnerships across civil society, parliamentarians, media and other key groups worldwide.

131. The Millennium Campaign team has met with officials from the Organization, parliamentarians, development ministers, religious leaders, media, civil society, non-governmental organizations, trade unions and research institutions. It has established working relationships with parliamentary networks such as the Inter-Parliamentary Union and the Parliamentary Network on the World Bank and has been participating actively in key Parliamentary Network meetings as they begin the process of collaborating on Millennium Development Goal handbooks for parliamentarians. In developing countries, the Campaign is linking and building coalitions for action to encourage Governments to implement pro-poor policies. By means of numerous public speaking engagements, seminars and conferences, including campaign tours through northern Europe and Italy, goal 8 of the Millennium Development Goals, which emphasizes developing global partnerships for development, has taken a central place in many national debates on the Goals. On many occasions, before a variety of audiences, the message has been promoted that action needs to be taken on debt, aid, trade and transfer of technology.

132. Achieving the Millennium Development Goals will require a collective response to the challenges faced by the international community in the area of development. The outcomes of recent major United Nations conferences and summits, in particular, the International Conference on Financing for Development, held at Monterrey, Mexico, in March 2002, the World Summit on Sustainable Development, held at Johannesburg, South Africa, in August 2002, and the Second World Assembly on Ageing, held at Madrid in April 2002, have elaborated upon and added to the commitments made in the Millennium Declaration adopted at the Millennium Summit held at United Nations Headquarters in September 2000. Moreover, at the summit of the Group of Eight in May 2003, the eight heads of State reiterated their support to achieving the Millennium Development Goals and the commitments made at Monterrey. The major challenge continues to be converting those international commitments through cooperation for development into better lives for people around the world. What the conferences and summits have further illustrated is that such implementation needs to be, more than ever before, a multi-stakeholder undertaking involving Governments, civil society, business and others.

Sustainable development

133. The Plan of Implementation adopted at the World Summit on Sustainable Development led to an increased focus on implementation through the adoption of several goals and targets. Those goals and targets were in such areas as water, sanitation, health and energy as well as related to the use and production of chemicals and the maintenance and restoration of fish stocks. The Plan encouraged the development of a 10-year framework of programmes to accelerate the shift towards sustainable consumption and production.

134. Over 200 partnerships for sustainable development were announced as part of the follow-up to the World Summit. Entities of the United Nations system have engaged in many of those partnerships and a significant amount of resources has already been committed for them. I am confident that the partnerships will help to engage key actors in the implementation process.

135. To build on the momentum generated by the World Summit, the Commission on Sustainable Development has reoriented its work to ensure the implementation of the commitments made in Johannesburg. The Organization will fully support the work of the Commission in its activities. The United Nations System Chief Executives Board for Coordination is now finalizing the inter-agency mechanisms for system-wide follow-up to the Summit in such areas as fresh water, sanitation, energy, oceans and coastal areas, and sustainable consumption and production. Those mechanisms will make possible the coordination of policy initiatives by the concerned entities of the United Nations system. At the field level, the Organization is assisting Governments in integrating the outcomes of the Summit into national strategies related to sustainable development. Many member entities of the Executive Committee on Economic and Social Affairs, such as the regional commissions, UNEP, UNDP, UN-Habitat and the Department of Economic and Social Affairs, have made encouraging headway in integrating the operational and normative aspects of the Organization's work in the area of sustainable development through advisory services and technical cooperation. A major objective of such technical cooperation is the creation of national capacity for the implementation of the outcomes of the Summit and previous conferences and summits.

136. In 2002, a secretariat became operational in the Department of Economic and Social Affairs to support the United Nations Forum on Forests, which is recognized in the Johannesburg Plan of Implementation as a key intergovernmental mechanism to facilitate and coordinate the implementation of sustainable forest management worldwide. At its third session, held at Geneva in June 2003, the Forum decided to establish ad hoc expert groups for the protection of forests. Among other issues, those groups will address the finance and transfer of environmentally sound technologies for the preservation of forests.

137. The issue of water and sanitation remained high on the international agenda. In December 2002, the General Assembly declared 2003 International Year of Freshwater. In my message to the Third World Water Forum, held at Kyoto, Shiga and Osaka, Japan, in March 2003, I called for action to secure access to safe drinking water and improve sanitation, especially for the poor and vulnerable. On 22 March 2003, World Water Day, the Organization launched its first World Water Development Report: Water for People, Water for Life, the most comprehensive, up-to-date review of the state of the world's water resources.

Africa

138. At its fifty-seventh session, the General Assembly welcomed the New Partnership for Africa's Development (NEPAD), as a programme of the African Union, which should serve as the framework for the international community's support for Africa's development. The Assembly also endorsed my decision to establish the Office of the Special Adviser on Africa in the Secretariat. The main functions of the Office include support for my role in global coordination and advocacy on Africa as well as reporting to the Assembly and the Economic and Social Council in their deliberations on Africa.

139. The Economic Commission for Africa provides support for the implementation of the New Partnership for Africa's Development at the regional level. ECA chairs the annual regional consultation meetings of United Nations entities working in Africa, which is a platform for promoting system-wide coordination and effectiveness in support of the New Partnership. ECA has also been actively involved in developing the codes and standards on economic and corporate governance for the African Peer Review Mechanism. It is also currently undertaking joint technical work with the secretariat of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development aimed at developing an institutional framework for mutual accountability and policy consistency in response to a request from the NEPAD Heads of State and Government Implementation Committee. In 2002, ECA conducted studies, issued reports and organized meetings and workshops on the capacity of the African public sector for effective management and the enhancement of participation of civil society in development and governance processes. ECA technical cooperation is promoting a broad measure of consensus on what constitutes a capable State, a better understanding of governance processes, maintaining governance issues on the agenda of policy makers and assessment of institutional capacity.

140. The United Nations Development Programme developed a strategic framework for supporting the New Partnership for Africa's Development and its secretariat, especially in its promotion of democratic governance, and has continued to implement the information and communication technology initiatives for Africa of the Tokyo International Conference on African Development aimed at modernizing the communication sector in Africa. The project has so far assisted in the formulation of four national information and communication technology strategies, in Cameroon, Nigeria, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zambia, and the establishment of 36 Cisco networking academies in Africa. Two workshops were held, in Benin and Malaysia, which promoted partnerships between Asian and African private sectors. The workshops enabled 30 African countries to share experience with their Asian counterparts and to identify ways of working closer together in an effort to bolster South-South cooperation.

141. The Department of Economic and Social Affairs, in cooperation with UNDP, supported the Pan-African Conference of Ministers of Public Service, held at Stellenbosch, South Africa, in May 2003, by providing advisory services and technical assistance in capacity-building to improve public administration in Africa. The Fifth Africa Governance Forum, held at Maputo in May 2002, on the theme "Local governance for poverty eradication in Africa" and supported by UNDP, ECA and the Department of Economic and Social Affairs, yielded a set of principles for decentralization and people-centred government. Those principles are expected to reform public sector management and enhance the knowledge and skills of senior civil servants.

142. The United Nations Children's Fund and the African Union will shortly be launching a white paper entitled "The Young Face of NEPAD", in support of giving higher priority to investing in African children for a better future for the continent. Support to African Governments in achieving the objectives of the New Partnership for Africa's Development will be consistent with achieving the Millennium Development Goals, in particular the child and maternal mortality targets. UNICEF thematic work in the areas of HIV/AIDS, girls' education and immunization are also important contributions to progress towards the objectives of the New Partnership. For instance, by the end of 2002, 37 African countries had applied for support from the Global Alliance for Vaccines and Immunization. UNICEF technical staff continue to provide assistance to national counterparts in the poverty reduction strategy papers, the common country assessment and the United Nations Development Assistance Framework processes to help ensure that poverty reduction strategies and debt relief have a positive effect on basic services for children and women that are linked to meeting the developmental objectives of the New Partnership. For example, UNICEF technical staff assisted national counterparts in preparing viable proposals for funding by the Global Alliance for Vaccines and Immunization.

143. The United Nations Population Fund developed and adopted a plan of action for implementation in 2003 that focuses on five objectives of the New Partnership: poverty reduction, health, education, water and sanitation and agriculture. Through its national and regional programmes in Africa, UNFPA is supporting the objectives and activities of the New Partnership through data collection and analysis, provision of reproductive services and capacity-building in the areas of population and development.

144. Food aid continues to be important to Africa. In 2002, WFP provided 2.1 million tons of food aid, or 55 per cent of its total food deliveries, to sub-Saharan Africa and spent 56 per cent of its resources in that region, amounting to $899 million. WFP also purchased more than 590,000 tons of food in sub-Saharan Africa, for a total value of more than $120 million, stimulating local production and markets.

Addressing the needs of the least developed countries, landlocked developing countries and small island developing States

145. Making development more inclusive involves ensuring that particular groups of vulnerable countries, in particular least developed countries, landlocked developing countries and small island developing States, are not left out of the global economy and the development process. During 2002, the Office of the High Representative for the Least Developed Countries, Landlocked Developing Countries and Small Island Developing States continued its efforts to promote mainstreaming of the Brussels Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the Decade 2001-2010 into the work agendas of the various agencies, funds and programmes of the Organization. Other multilateral organizations that have taken similar steps are the African Development Bank, the Asian Development Bank, the Inter-Parliamentary Union and the South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation. I have encouraged the foreign ministers of the least developed countries to establish national arrangements for the implementation, follow-up, monitoring and review of the Brussels Programme of Action.

146. Over the past year, the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development made substantive and operational contributions to the implementation of the international programmes and initiatives related to least developed countries, landlocked developing countries and small island developing States. UNFPA continued to provide two thirds of its resources to the least developed countries, especially in Africa, for programmes covering reproductive health and rights, with an emphasis on HIV/AIDS prevention and care; gender equality and empowerment of women; and population and development strategies.

147. Major attention has been given to the preparation of the International Ministerial Conference of Landlocked and Transit Developing Countries and Donor Countries and International Financial and Development Institutions on Transit Transport Cooperation, being held in Almaty on 28 and 29 August 2003. This is the first ever United Nations event to address the special needs of landlocked developing countries.

148. Particular attention has been given to the implementation of the Barbados Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States and the Johannesburg Plan of Implementation to enable the Organization to address the developmental challenges of small island developing States arising from their small size, vulnerability to natural disasters, fragile ecosystems and limited or lack of natural resources and freshwater. The Organization is participating actively in the preparations for the International Meeting to Review the Implementation of the Barbados Programme of Action, to be held in Mauritius in 2004.

Battling HIV/AIDS

149. In the past year, the eight co-sponsors and the secretariat of the Joint United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS (UNAIDS) have been engaged in providing support for the effective implementation of the Declaration of Commitment adopted by the General Assembly at its special session on HIV/AIDS, in 2001. A global consensus has emerged on policies and programmes necessary to fight the disease. UNAIDS has supported efforts to increase global awareness of the disease through education and dissemination of information to the public; to improve access to treatment in areas that are plagued by scarce resources; and to strengthen the capacity of communities with the engagement of civil society in its fight against the disease.

150. Over the past year, HIV/AIDS continued to be a key priority for the Organization's operational activities in development. During 2002, United Nations theme groups on HIV/AIDS have assisted countries to develop multisectoral plans and to integrate HIV/AIDS into development planning instruments. I am pleased to note that, by the end of 2002, a total number of 102 countries had developed national strategic plans for HIV/AIDS.

151. The World Health Organization, with UNICEF and UNAIDS, developed and disseminated strategic information in a number of key areas to support countries in the rational selection and use of HIV medicines. WHO, UNICEF, UNAIDS and Médecins Sans Frontières continue to maintain and provide updated information on prices and sources of HIV medicines in the public domain. That initiative is being expanded to include information on drug registration in countries. UNDP facilitated community conversations in Ethiopia and South Africa on HIV/AIDS to address underlying factors that fuel the epidemic and to strengthen the capacity of communities to initiate and sustain prevention, care and treatment programmes.

152. The World Food Programme, in collaboration with IFAD and FAO, provided food assistance to 34 HIV/AIDS-related projects in over 20 countries worldwide, seeking to ensure that AIDS-affected households received food rations and food baskets adjusted to suit their needs. FAO continued to provide technical assistance to ministries of agriculture to strengthen their capacity to address the agricultural labour shortages created by the HIV/AIDS epidemic and to develop food and nutrition-based interventions to mitigate its effects.

153. UNICEF country offices have demonstrated substantial commitment to achieving the medium-term goals. Growth in expenditure on HIV/AIDS-related activities has more than tripled, from an estimated $30 million in 2000 to $67 million in 2001 and $96 million in 2002, and all 127 country offices supported HIV/AIDS-related activities and/or advocacy in 2002.

154. The United Nations Development Fund for Women is currently working with national AIDS councils in 10 countries to strengthen the councils' capacity to enhance their programmes from a gender perspective. In an effort to support gender-sensitive action worldwide, in February 2003 UNIFEM and UNAIDS launched the first electronic portal on gender and HIV/AIDS.

155. Individuals in refugee situations are often particularly vulnerable to disease. UNHCR and its partners continue to advocate for and accelerate the implementation of HIV/AIDS prevention and care projects in refugee situations. In close collaboration with UNAIDS, UNHCR completed, in February 2002, a Strategic Plan on HIV/AIDS for 2002-2004, which is being implemented in Africa.

156. In the past year, the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime has initiated comprehensive drug-related HIV/AIDS prevention activities in several countries in Central and Eastern Europe, as well as in Africa, Central Asia, East Asia and the Pacific, Latin America and the Caribbean and South Asia.

157. The Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria remains an essential tool of the world community in striving to achieve goal 6 of the Millennium Development Goals, "Combat HIV/AIDS, malaria and other diseases". The commitment of the Fund's Board and secretariat is that it will remain a financing mechanism and not become an operational agency. Success in the field will therefore depend on the active collaboration of the Fund's partners, including Governments, international organizations, the private sector and civil society. The United Nations system is committed to making the Global Fund a success. To date, the Fund has approved proposals, worth $1.5 billion, for activities in 92 countries. Grants to individual countries can represent a significant proportion of the total public spending on health.

Social development

158. The United Nations promotes policies and activities for social development, which focus on achieving a "society for all" that integrates and provides opportunities for specific social groups. The aim is to integrate the particular issues, concerns and interests of those groups into policy-making, so that they become full participants in society and active contributors to national development.

Indigenous issues

159. An example of the Organization's unique role in promoting participation for all is its support for the Permanent Forum on Indigenous Issues. A new secretariat was established within the Department of Economic and Social Affairs in February 2003. The Forum will advise the Economic and Social Council in the areas of development, environment, health, education, culture and human rights.

Ageing and people with disabilities

160. The Madrid International Plan of Action on Ageing, adopted by the Second World Assembly on Ageing in April 2002, formulated objectives and recommendations for action in three priority areas: older persons and development; advancing health and well-being into old age; and ensuring an enabling and supportive environment for older people. Emphasis is placed on building capacity for national implementation of the Madrid International Plan of Action and for incorporating ageing into national policies and international programmes.

161. Follow-up at the regional level includes the adoption by the ECE Ministerial Conference on Ageing, held in Berlin in September 2002, of a Ministerial Declaration and a Regional Implementation Strategy for the Madrid International Plan of Action on Ageing. That Strategy addresses the economic and social concerns related to ageing societies in the region. Governments in the region of Asia and the Pacific adopted the Shanghai Implementation Strategy as a regional guideline for follow-up to the Madrid Plan and the Macao Plan of Action on Ageing for Asia and the Pacific. The Strategy has provided a broad policy framework for Governments in developing national policies on ageing and in encouraging stronger partnership with civil society and older people themselves.

162. The rights of persons with disabilities are currently the focus of work of the Ad Hoc Committee on a Comprehensive and Integral International Convention on the Protection and Promotion of the Rights and Dignity of Persons with Disabilities. The Organization will address issues of concern to people with disabilities worldwide.

Combating illicit drug use and preventing crime

163. The United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime supported alternative income-generating projects aimed at benefiting rural women and children. For example, in Viet Nam, the Office has over the past year been developing a replicable methodology for the substitution of income from opium production among ethnic minority people in Ky Son District. Those activities also contributed to drug demand reduction by strengthening the capacity of national institutions and encouraging community-based development programmes.

164. With the return of large-scale opium production to Afghanistan, resulting in 3,400 tons of opium in 2002, Afghanistan is the source of three quarters of global annual opium production. In 2002, law enforcement measures by the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime focused on providing support to strengthening law enforcement capacity in neighbouring and transit countries. In the first half of 2003, the Office initiated a package of new law enforcement activities for West and Central Asia worth more than $25 million. That initiative seeks to strengthen capacity for border control, including cross-border cooperation in countries neighbouring Afghanistan, and to support the creation of new drug enforcement units in Kabul and important Afghan provinces and set up new controls along key Afghan borders.

165. The Office has also introduced a CD-ROM-based training programme for law enforcement training in South-East Asia and Turkey and is involved in setting up law enforcement training centres and national databases on crime and public security in Brazil.

166. During the last year, the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime managed technical assistance projects to combat corruption and trafficking in persons. Corruption projects in Colombia, Hungary, Nigeria, Romania and South Africa aimed at supporting the development and implementation of national anti-corruption programmes and assisting those countries in strengthening judicial integrity and capacity. Anti-trafficking projects in the Czech Republic, Poland, the Philippines and West Africa aimed at improving the criminal justice response to trafficking in persons, encouraging the implementation of victim support initiatives and assisting with the implementation of the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime.

Chapter IV

The international legal order and human rights

Human rights development

167. Human rights remain very central to the work of the United Nations. Over the past year I have been encouraged by a growing international consensus concerning the universality of human rights; the efforts by Member States to implement international human rights conventions; international cooperation in building national capacity in human rights; the increasing integration of human rights into activities relating to development, conflict prevention, peacemaking, peacekeeping, peace-building and humanitarian assistance; and the growing strength of the international human rights movement.

168. At the same time, problems in the implementation of human rights continue to be experienced in many parts of the world and gross violations have not ceased. A slowing international economy and inadequacies in governance have lessened the ability of Governments to uphold minimum standards of economic and social rights, as well as of civil and political rights. The Governments of some developed countries show signs of resentment as international human rights conventions are applied to them. At the same time, there is a corresponding disquiet on the part of developing countries in the Commission on Human Rights on the issue of how to deal with allegations of gross violations of human rights levelled at some of them.

169. As the Organization acknowledges such areas of progress and also the challenges that it faces in the field of human rights, it is important to note the large areas of common ground among the membership on such issues and to build on them in enhancing international cooperation for the effective protection of human rights in the future. The number of ratifications of international human rights treaties has continued to increase, consistent with one of the goals of the United Nations Millennium Declaration. Over the past 12 months, five new States have become parties to the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination; one to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights; one to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights; four to the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment; one to the Convention on the Rights of the Child; five to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women; and three to the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families, which entered into force on 1 July 2003. There have also been additional ratifications to the two Optional Protocols to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the two Optional Protocols to the Convention on the Rights of the Child and the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women. I should like to use this occasion to appeal, once more, to States that have not yet done so to ratify or accede to the fundamental international human rights treaties.

170. The work of the expert bodies established under the human rights treaties continues to be of critical importance. Over the past year the Human Rights Committee, the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, the Committee on the Rights of the Child and the Committee against Torture have, among them, considered the reports of 112 States parties and adopted five general comments that clarify the meaning of the treaties and offer practical pointers on their implementation. The petitions procedures operating under a number of international human rights treaties offer valuable opportunities to enhance international protection. Over the past year, expert bodies have adopted well over 100 decisions and views on individual cases, most of which contribute in significant ways to the development of international human rights law. Moreover, a number of practical measures have been taken to improve the methods of work of the treaty bodies and enhance cooperation among them. These include the adoption by the Human Rights Committee and the Committee against Torture of mechanisms to follow up on the adoption of concluding observations.

171. The special rapporteurs and experts appointed by the Commission on Human Rights have continued to perform an indispensable role as front-line protection actors. There are now some 40 such special appointees in action. Over the past year their reports have touched upon numerous human rights themes concerning a total of about 60 situations in different countries. These individual experts, serving in their personal capacity, have issued over 700 urgent appeals to Governments seeking the protection of persons or groups in need. Efforts have continued during the past year to strengthen their methods of operation, including measures to better clarify relations between them and staff of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, the introduction of induction sessions and briefing material for new holders of special mandates, better coordination and follow-up to communications with Governments, and increased interaction with strategic partners inside and outside the United Nations system. The interactive dialogue between special procedure mandate-holders and members of the Commission, which has been inspired by the similar exchange taking place within the framework of the Third Committee of the General Assembly, has proved successful and will no doubt be enhanced in coming years. A new Special Procedures Branch has been established within the Office of the High Commissioner to enhance the effectiveness of the special rapporteurs and experts, including helping to develop criteria for appointment, harmonizing operational standards, improving awareness of their activities and providing an adequate level of staff support.

172. In my report of September 2002 entitled "Strengthening of the United Nations: an agenda for further change", I called for intensified efforts to strengthen cooperation within the United Nations system in support of building national capacity in human rights. This is an area where we are seeing important positive developments. Over the past year the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, using mainly voluntary contributions, has assisted some 50 national human rights institutions, as well as regional secretariats serving such institutions. The Office of the High Commissioner has engaged in human rights technical cooperation projects in 32 countries and maintains a field presence in 29 countries. The human rights work of the United Nations thus increasingly emphasizes the importance of effectively functioning national protection systems. To the same end, significant progress has been made in integrating human rights into the development activities of the United Nations system. In May 2003, the second inter-agency workshop on rights-based approaches to development adopted a number of recommendations for strengthening our activities in that area. At my request, the High Commissioner for Human Rights, in cooperation with the United Nations Development Group and the Executive Committee on Humanitarian Affairs, is preparing a joint plan of action to strengthen human rights-related United Nations action at the country level. The plan, to be adopted in September 2003 and implemented over the next three years, will include specific measures required to improve the capacity of the development and humanitarian agencies of the United Nations to cooperatively assist Member States in their efforts to establish and develop national human rights promotion and protection systems.

173. Human rights violations are often particularly severe in societies undergoing major political, social and economic transformation. A United Nations University study reaffirms the priority of human rights practices in societies in transition, not only because of their intrinsic value, but also because of their multiplier effects on democratization, economic development and conflict resolution.

174. The fifty-ninth session of the Commission on Human Rights, in 2003, included an unprecedented high-level segment, which lasted four days and attracted some 70 dignitaries from around the world. At the same time, more than 40 national human rights institutions participated in the work of the Commission, providing their perspectives, assessments and insights. This has been a significant development in the activity of the Commission. Also, for the first time, national human rights institutions have been invited to participate in the drafting of an international human rights instrument through the work of the Ad Hoc Committee on a Comprehensive and Integral International Convention on the Protection and Promotion of the Rights and Dignity of Persons with Disabilities.

175. Participation in the sessions of the Commission on Human Rights has been impressive by any standard. This past year, in addition to the 53 member States, 100 observer Governments and some 1,600 representatives of non-governmental organizations attended, together with representatives of regional and subregional organizations and entities of the United Nations system. The Commission has thus evolved into a major forum for partnership between governmental and non-governmental representatives within the United Nations system.

176. The Commission on Human Rights is not without problems, however. There has been public disquiet over the fact that Governments accused of gross violations of human rights are admitted to membership in the Commission. There has been concern about the tone of discussion in the Commission and the fact that it does not address certain situations of grave violations of human rights. These are all important questions that I hope will be seriously addressed by the Bureau of the Commission prior to the next session.

177. At the end of the day, United Nations human rights activities must inspire public trust. Promotional activities without adequate and effective protection will not win that trust—neither of the people at large, nor of the non-governmental organizations and civil society actors on whom we depend so greatly for our human rights work. I should like to take this opportunity to express my appreciation to all those organizations and individuals in the human rights movement who make our human rights work possible, whether it be through research, fact-finding, protection, human rights education or the dissemination of information.

The International Criminal Court

178. Since the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court entered into force on 1 July 2002, much progress has been made in turning the Court into a functioning judicial institution. The Assembly of States Parties to the Statute held its first session in September 2002 and took important decisions, including the adoption of a number of ancillary instruments necessary for the Court's efficient and effective operation. Notable among these were the Elements of Crimes and the Court's Rules of Procedure and Evidence. At its resumed first session, in February 2003, the Assembly elected the 18 judges of the Court—7 women and 11 men, representing all regions, legal systems and traditions. On 11 March 2003, at an inaugural meeting in The Hague, the 18 judges gave solemn undertakings to perform their duties and exercise their powers honourably, faithfully, impartially and conscientiously. They also elected the Presidency of the Court. In April 2003, at the second resumption of its first session and after several months of consultations, the Assembly took the additional step of electing the Court's first Prosecutor. It also made recommendations on the election of the Registrar. The Prosecutor subsequently gave his solemn undertaking on 16 June 2003 and the judges elected the Registrar on 25 June. With the judges, the Presidency, the Prosecutor and the Registrar in place, the process of electing key officials to constitute the organs of the Court has been completed. In the year ahead, the focus will shift from institution-building to preparing for the Court to exercise its investigative and prosecutorial powers and discharge its judicial functions.

179. The number of States that have ratified or acceded to the Rome Statute has continued to increase steadily. Ninety-one States, from all regions, are now parties to the Statute, compared with 76 this time last year. I am greatly encouraged by this steady increase in support and would appeal to all Member States that have not yet done so to ratify or accede to the Statute and to take the necessary steps to implement its provisions.

180. Pursuant to General Assembly resolution 57/23 of 19 November 2002, the United Nations Secretariat has served as the provisional secretariat of the Assembly of States Parties. The Assembly of States Parties is expected to decide, at its second session, in early September, on the establishment of its own secretariat. I am confident that, in any event, the ties between the United Nations and the Court will endure: the Organization and the Court will be linked by a formal relationship agreement and bonds of history. For over half a century, the United Nations has played a central role in the efforts to establish a permanent international criminal court—an affirmation of the shared conviction that justice and peace are indispensable for human development. The establishment of such a court represents a lasting contribution by the United Nations to the maintenance of international peace and security and to the promotion of the rule of law and respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms around the world.

International Tribunals

International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia

181. The International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia handed down judgements in two cases during the past year. On 29 November 2002, Trial Chamber II convicted Mitar Vasiljevic, accused of acts against the Muslim population around Višegrad, in Bosnia and Herzegovina, of persecution and murder and sentenced him to 20 years' imprisonment. On 31 March 2003, Trial Chamber I, Section A, convicted Mladen Naletilic and Vinko Martinovic, for their treatment of Bosnian Muslim civilians and prisoners of war, of crimes against humanity, violations of the laws and customs of war and grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and sentenced them to 20 and 18 years' imprisonment, respectively. In addition, five accused entered guilty pleas. On 2 October 2002, Biljana Plavšić, formerly active in the Presidency of the Serbian Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina and later a member of the collective and expanded Presidencies of the Republika Srpska, pleaded guilty to the crime of persecution. In February 2003, the Tribunal sentenced her to 11 years' imprisonment. Subsequently, in May 2003, Momir Nikolic and Dragan Obrenovic, accused of crimes in connection with the fall of Srebrenica, and, in June 2003, Predrag Banovic, accused of crimes at the Keraterm camp, pleaded guilty to the crime of persecution. A further four trials, involving seven accused, are continuing. In July 2003, Darko Mrdja, a former commander of a Bosnian Serb special police unit, pleaded guilty to the crimes of murder and inhumane acts. Meanwhile, in April 2003, the Appeals Chamber rejected the appeals of Zdravko Mucic, a Bosnian Croat, and Hazim Delic and Esad Landzo, both Bosnian Muslims, and confirmed their sentences for murder, torture and inhuman treatment committed while they were staff members at the Celebici prison camp in central Bosnia and Herzegovina. On 31 July 2003, Milomir Stakic, a former leading figure in the Municipality of Prijedor, Bosnia and Herzegovina, where atrocities were committed against non-Serbs, was found guilty of extermination, murder, persecution and deportation.

182. Having received, in July 2002, Security Council endorsement of its completion strategy—that is, to concentrate on trying political, military and paramilitary leaders and to transfer cases involving mid-level accused to national courts for trial—the Tribunal embarked upon implementation of that strategy. In October 2002, it amended its Rules of Procedure and Evidence to provide for the possible referral of certain cases to national courts with jurisdiction over the place where a crime had been committed or a suspect had been arrested. At a more practical level, the Tribunal provided the Office of the High Representative for Bosnia and Herzegovina with advice regarding its project to establish a specialized war crimes chamber in the State Court of Bosnia and Herzegovina, to which the Tribunal could refer certain cases for trial. In February 2003, the Tribunal and the Office of the High Representative signed Joint Conclusions, establishing a basis for a common plan to implement that project. The Tribunal and the High Representative will be taking further steps in that connection in the coming months.

183. In the past year, 11 further accused were transferred to The Hague, bringing the total number of detainees to 50, with 7 more on provisional release. Among those taken into custody were Milan Milutinovic, the former President of Serbia, Vojislav Seselj, the chairman of the Serbian Radical Party and a member of the Serbian parliament, and Jovica Stanisic, Chief of the State Security Service of the Republic of Serbia.

184. On 29 July 2003, I addressed a letter to the President of the Security Council in which I mentioned that I had formed the view, following consultations with members of the Council, that it was now time to split the positions of Prosecutor of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia and Prosecutor of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, so that they were occupied by different people. I further indicated in my letter that, as the two Tribunals moved towards implementing their respective completion strategies, it seemed essential and in the interests of efficiency and effectiveness that each Tribunal have its own Prosecutor, who would be able to devote his or her entire energies and attention to the organization, oversight, management and conduct of the outstanding investigations and prosecutions before that Tribunal. By resolution 1503(2003) of 28 August, the Security Council endorsed that suggestion.

International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda

185. The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda has conducted nine trials over the course of the past year, involving a total of 23 accused. In three of those cases, it handed down judgements. On 19 February 2003, Trial Chamber I convicted Gérard Ntakirutimana, a medical doctor, of genocide and crimes against humanity and sentenced him to 25 years' imprisonment. It also found his father, Elizaphan Ntakirutimana, a pastor of the Seventh Day Adventist Church, guilty of aiding and abetting in genocide, sentencing him to 10 years' imprisonment. On 15 May 2003, Trial Chamber I convicted Eliézer Niyitegeka, Minister of Information in Rwanda's Interim Government of 1994, of genocide and crimes against humanity and sentenced him to life imprisonment. On the same day, Trial Chamber III found Laurent Semanza, former bourgmestre of Bicumbi Commune, guilty of complicity to commit genocide and crimes against humanity, sentencing him to 25 years' imprisonment. This brings to 11 the total number of judgements that the Tribunal has handed down since trials began in 1997. Four further cases are nearing completion. The Tribunal expects to have rendered 15 judgements, involving a total of 21 accused, by the end of 2003. Two further trials, involving 10 accused, are currently ongoing and I expect four more, involving another 10 accused, to start later this year.

186. In addition to conducting trials, the three Trial Chambers have supervised pre-trial preparations in 21 cases during the past year, involving 31 accused. The Appeals Chamber, for its part, delivered a judgement on an appeal against conviction—it rejected that appeal and confirmed the original sentence—as well as six decisions on interlocutory appeals and 15 other decisions and orders. The judges also held two plenary meetings at which they considered and adopted a number of changes to the Tribunal's Rules of Procedure and Evidence, which should help to expedite proceedings. Following a decision by the Security Council, in its resolution 1431 (2002) of 14 August 2002, to establish a pool of ad litem judges for the Tribunal, so as to further expedite the Tribunal's work, the General Assembly elected 18 such judges on 25 June 2003, each to serve for a four-year term with immediate effect.

187. The Prosecutor has continued investigations and expects to submit indictments against up to 26 additional accused by the end of 2004. The Prosecutor's investigations will then be complete. It is possible that the Tribunal may refer a number of other cases that the Prosecutor has investigated to national courts for trial, including to those of Rwanda. The Registry has undergone changes to strengthen its capacity to support both the Tribunal's other organs and the Defence Counsel. Moreover, a Coordination Council now meets monthly to coordinate the work of the Tribunal's three organs, while a Management Committee meets every fortnight to ensure the best direction of administrative and judicial support from the Registry to the Chambers.

Special Court for Sierra Leone

188. In December 2002, the judges of the Trials and Appeals Chambers of the Special Court for Sierra Leone took their oaths of office in Freetown and elected the President of the Special Court.

189. Over the past year, the Prosecutor and his Office have been investigating crime scenes in Sierra Leone, conducting investigations abroad and interviewing potential witnesses. On 10 March 2003, the Prosecutor announced his first indictments, including those of the commander of the Revolutionary United Front, Foday Sankoh, and of a Minister in the Government of Sierra Leone, Hinga Norman. On 4 June 2003, the Prosecutor announced the indictment of Charles Taylor, President of Liberia. The indictment accuses Mr. Taylor of "bearing the greatest responsibility" for war crimes, crimes against humanity and serious violations of international humanitarian law in Sierra Leone since 30 November 1996. The Court had in fact confirmed Mr. Taylor's indictment three months previously, on 7 March, but had ordered that it remain under seal. To date, the Prosecutor has indicted 12 individuals, 8 of whom are now under arrest. One former Revolutionary United Front commander, Sam Bockarie, was killed in Liberia and the Court is conducting a forensic examination of his remains. The Court is also following up reports that a further indictee, the former leader of the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council, Johnny Paul Koroma, has also been killed in Liberia. In July 2003, Foday Sankoh died while in the custody of the Court awaiting trial.

190. In conjunction with the Management Committee of the Special Court, I have launched several appeals to Member States for funding since March 2003, so as to enable the Court to continue its activities beyond this calendar year. I would take this opportunity to appeal once again to Member States to contribute to the Trust Fund for the Special Court.

Enhancing the rule of law

191. As has been apparent from my previous reports, I have made the strengthening of the international rule of law a priority for the Organization. One of the principal ways in which the United Nations can contribute to that objective is by promoting the full and active participation of States in the international legal order. In that connection, it is gratifying to note the success of the treaty events organized each year since 2000, with a view to encouraging wider participation in the multilateral treaty framework. Last year's event, which took place during the World Summit on Sustainable Development, resulted in the performance by 48 States of a total of 83 treaty actions related to 39 treaties in the field of economic development and environmental protection. I have invited Governments to participate in a treaty event entitled "Focus 2003: multilateral treaties against transnational organized crime and terrorism", to be held during the general debate at the fifty-eighth session of the General Assembly.

192. Many States fail to sign or ratify treaties, however, not because of any lack of political will, but because of a simple shortage of technical expertise necessary for the performance of treaty actions. Some also lack the expertise to enact the necessary laws to implement the treaties that they have signed or ratified or to train the personnel required to apply those laws. In order to address those needs, I have invited States to inform me of any specific areas in which they might require technical assistance and have adapted the assistance that the Organization currently offers in the light of their responses. The Treaty Section of the Office of Legal Affairs and the United Nations Institute for Training and Research now provide training sessions on treaty law and practice twice a year at Headquarters for government officials, staff members of entities of the United Nations system and representatives of non-governmental organizations. This year, the programme was expanded to the regional level, with a workshop in the Lao People's Democratic Republic in February 2003, and another to follow in Fiji in September 2003. Some 15 other developing countries have requested training sessions in their capitals. I am exploring funding possibilities so that I can respond positively to this demand. More generally, with a view to streamlining the provision of technical legal assistance offered by the United Nations system, I asked all departments, funds, agencies and programmes in March 2002 to review the assistance that they currently offer. One result of that exercise has been the creation of an easily accessible technical legal assistance web site, through which Governments can identify and access the assistance that the Organization makes available. That web site now receives some 5,000 to 6,000 hits every month.

193. Over the past year, the Organization has also taken further steps towards enforcing international law. In December 2002, the General Assembly asked me to resume negotiations to conclude an agreement with the Government of Cambodia on the establishment, with international assistance, of extraordinary chambers within the existing court structure of Cambodia for the prosecution of serious violations of Cambodian law and international law committed during the period of Democratic Kampuchea. Those negotiations resulted in the preparation of a draft agreement between the United Nations and Cambodia, signed at Phnom Penh on 17 March 2003. On 13 May 2003, the General Assembly approved the draft agreement and requested me and the Government of Cambodia to take all the necessary measures for it to enter into force. The Agreement was signed at a ceremony at Phnom Penh on 6 June 2003.

194. Much work lies ahead, both for the United Nations and for Cambodia, before the Agreement can enter into force. The Government of Cambodia will have to submit the Agreement to the relevant national authorities for ratification, take the necessary steps to amend Cambodian law to bring it into line with the Agreement and ensure that the Agreement, once ratified, will apply as law within Cambodia. There is much that the United Nations will have to do also. In particular, I shall have to secure voluntary contributions to fund the assistance that the United Nations is to provide under the Agreement. To that end, I shall soon be launching an appeal to States. First, though, I shall need to form a better picture of the probable requirements of the extraordinary chambers in terms of personnel, equipment, furniture, supplies and other operational needs. I hope to be able to send a planning mission to Phnom Penh for that purpose in September 2003. I am fully conscious of the need to act quickly. Otherwise, as the General Assembly has pointed out, the opportunity of bringing to justice the senior leaders of the Khmer Rouge and those who were most responsible for the terrible atrocities of the Khmer Rouge period may soon be lost. The Cambodian people have waited a long time to see those individuals brought to trial and it is our hope that they will not have to wait much longer.

Legal affairs

195. During the past year, the International Law Commission advanced its work on reservations to treaties by adopting further guidelines on the formulation and communication of reservations and interpretative declarations. It considered several draft articles on diplomatic protection, reviewed progress on the topic of unilateral acts of States and agreed on a conceptual outline for the topic of international liability in case of loss from transboundary harm arising out of hazardous activities. It also appointed special rapporteurs for two of the new topics in its work programme, namely, the responsibility of international organizations and shared natural resources. In the case of the third new topic—fragmentation of international law: difficulties arising out of diversification and expansion of international law—it decided to begin by studying the lex specialis rule and the question of self-contained regimes. Meanwhile, the Ad Hoc Committee on Jurisdictional Immunities of States and Their Property succeeded, in February 2003, in resolving all of the outstanding issues regarding the draft articles on the jurisdictional immunities of States and their property that the International Law Commission had adopted in 1991 and recommended that the General Assembly now take a decision on their final form.

196. In July 2003, the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law finalized and adopted its Model Legislative Provisions on Privately Financed Infrastructure Projects and gave preliminary approval to a draft legislative guide on insolvency law. The Commission highlighted the importance of strengthening its secretariat, within existing resources, so as to help it respond to the increasing demands on it to develop uniform commercial legislation, provide technical legislative assistance, disseminate information on the latest legal developments and coordinate its work with other international organizations.

197. The Sixth Committee of the General Assembly and the Ad Hoc Committee established by General Assembly resolution 51/210 of 17 December 1996 continued their efforts to prepare a draft comprehensive convention on international terrorism and a draft convention for the suppression of acts of nuclear terrorism. Questions of definition and other issues regarding its scope of application, including its relationship with existing and future instruments, stand in the way of adoption of a comprehensive convention, while issues concerning the scope of the draft convention for the suppression of acts of nuclear terrorism have made it difficult to reach agreement on that instrument. Meanwhile, the Ad Hoc Committee on the Scope of Legal Protection under the Convention on the Safety of United Nations and Associated Personnel reconvened in March 2003. A number of important issues concerning measures to enhance the existing legal regime under the Convention still require reflection by States. I intend to remain actively engaged in this important matter.

198. As far as the law of the sea is concerned, several challenges lie ahead: promoting the sustainable development of ocean resources, strengthening implementation of the international legal obligations of flag States and enhancing inter-agency cooperation. In response to concerns regarding inadequate implementation by flag States of international rules and standards for ship safety, pollution prevention, fisheries conservation and labour conditions, I established an Inter-Agency Consultative Group on Flag State Implementation in March 2003 to study the issue. The question of flag State implementation also arose at the fourth meeting of the Open-ended Informal Consultative Process on Oceans and the Law of the Sea, held in June 2003 to consider issues relating to safety of navigation, protection of vulnerable marine ecosystems and inter-agency cooperation and coordination. That meeting also highlighted a number of other issues: transport of hazardous substances; protection of biodiversity on the high seas; the need to take further measures to combat illegal, unreported fishing; the need for more effective inter-agency cooperation and coordination; and establishment of a regular process for global reporting and assessment of the state of the marine environment (Global Marine Assessment). I shall be submitting a report on this last issue to the General Assembly at its fifty-eighth session.

199. During the past year, the Office of Legal Affairs provided advice to various Secretariat units in connection with the formulation of the new Security Council resolutions relating to Iraq, in particular with regard to the operation of the oil-for-food programme. Also of particular note was the role that the Office played in developing and implementing a procedure for the election of the judges and Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court and, in conjunction with the Government of Sierra Leone, implementing the agreement on the establishment of the Special Court for Sierra Leone. Meanwhile, the Office continued to advise the United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo on the exercise of its legislative and executive authority and to provide advice and support to the Organization's other peacekeeping missions, especially in handling claims and in concluding and implementing arrangements with troop-contributing countries. It also provided advice on a wide range of other issues of concern to the Organization, including procurement, the negotiation of contracts—many involving complex and novel questions, in particular those relating to the capital master plan—and the implementation of personnel reforms.

Chapter V

Enhancing management

Administration and management

200. The delegation of administrative authority to the departments and offices of the Secretariat, with concomitant accountability of programme managers, continues to be strengthened through the implementation of results-based budgeting and management. The development and use of a web-based management performance indicator system, with five indicators—recruitment tracking, status of gender balance, regular budget expenditures, extrabudgetary resource expenditures, and implementation of the recommendations in the audits of the Office of Internal Oversight Services—have provided a management tool for the programme managers and their executive offices across the Secretariat to implement actions within their programme units that will achieve the objectives of the programme.

Common support services

201. The Department of Management and the Department of Peacekeeping Operations have engaged in a partnership with a view to increasing support to peacekeeping missions through the implementation of new arrangements for field procurement. Clearer lines of responsibility and accountability have been established and redundant procedures have been eliminated. Technical and direct procurement support to the peacekeeping missions has included the evaluation of candidates for procurement positions in field missions, and the establishment of training programmes, briefings and a hotline to support peacekeeping procurement staff on any procurement-related matter on a round-the-clock basis.

202. Several common service initiatives, such as the sharing of procurement contracts, the creation of a standardized identity document applicable throughout the Organization and system-wide collective bargaining with international airlines for more favourable fares and conditions are being worked on. Included in these initiatives are organizations that are not a part of the United Nations system, such as the Asian Development Bank, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, the European Union and Interpol. Such collective endeavours are expected to lead to a greater consistency of practices within the Organization and to yield financial benefits.

Human resources management

203. Since the introduction of the new staff selection system on 1 May 2002 and the revised performance management appraisal system (e-PAS), emphasis has been placed on the institutionalization of these systems, and on improvements to the information technology support tools. The staff selection system has resulted in greater accountability, transparency, a faster recruitment process, and a larger pool of candidates, particularly from developing countries. The revised electronic e-PAS system, which supports discussion between supervisors and staff, has increased compliance and achieved a more measurable appraisal system throughout the Secretariat and in peacekeeping missions. Expanded learning and career support programmes, including mentoring and career resource centres, are strengthening the skills and competencies of staff and managers and contributing to changing the management culture of the Organization. There is a particular focus on Junior Professional staff, including targeted training courses, mentoring and a managed reassignment programme. The flexible working arrangements which came into effect on 1 February 2003, Secretariat-wide, are part of an effort to assist staff to strike a better balance between their professional and personal lives. A priority is the further development and implementation of a Secretariat-wide policy on HIV/AIDS that will enhance awareness and expand access to voluntary counselling and testing, care and treatment.

204. The security of United Nations personnel remains an issue of paramount importance. Regrettably, attacks continued throughout the year under review, but new measures put in place appeared to be having a positive impact. The number of staff members who lost their lives in the service of the Organization during the 12 months prior to August 2003 was the lowest since 1992. All this was changed dramatically by the devastating attack in Baghdad, on 19 August 2003. That shocking incident obliges us to look again at the conditions in which we work and to consider fundamental changes, however sad and painful that may be.

Capital master plan

205. The capital master plan approved in 2002 by the General Assembly authorizes the implementation of the refurbishment of the Headquarters complex and the remaining phases of design development. At the Assembly's request, the possibilities for a financial package from the host country, as well as other contributions from the public and private sectors, are being explored. New York City has offered to construct a new building south of the Headquarters that would serve as alternate accommodation during the renovation and later for the consolidation of United Nations offices currently scattered in the vicinity of the Secretariat. This generous offer is very welcome.

Financial situation

206. The positive financial trends of the last two years are continuing. All three indicators—cash in hand, debt to Member States and amounts unpaid by Member States—continue to improve. One particular trend indicates that there may be problems ahead, however. The number of Member States paying their regular budget contribution in full is slipping from the earlier years when steady progress was made. In fact, in 2002, only 117 Member States paid their regular budget contributions in full, reflecting a serious setback in the progress achieved between 1994, when only 75 Member States paid in full, and 2000, when 141 Member States paid in full. This means that deficits in the regular budget may occur.

Accountability and oversight

207. The Office of Internal Oversight Services is working to strengthen the Organization's integrity and ethics systems through the sponsorship of a United Nations organizational integrity initiative to increase staff awareness and protect the Organization's resources and reputation. The Office is also providing more structured and integrated planning of its oversight assignments through its risk management framework. Under this framework, a risk analysis is made of all the client departments, offices, funds and programmes of the Office of Internal Oversight Services to identify and prioritize those programme and operational areas having a high vulnerability to inefficiencies, fraud, waste and abuse.

Monitoring, evaluation and consulting

208. In the past year, the Office of Internal Oversight Services provided consulting to other departments on changing their work processes and organizational structures with a view to implementing the continuing reform of the Secretariat. Working in close collaboration with four client departments and offices, the Office contributed to ensuring the sustainability and effectiveness of adopted solutions. In response to a request of the General Assembly, a review by the Office of Internal Oversight Services of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights produced 17 recommendations on streamlining and strengthening its activities and management.

209. An in-depth evaluation of the Division for Ocean Affairs and the Law of the Sea of the Office of Legal Affairs concluded that it had effectively discharged the responsibilities of the Secretary-General under the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea. The Office of Internal Oversight Services recommended that the Division actively participate in setting up a new international coordination mechanism requested by the General Assembly to better respond to the growing demand for technical assistance from States parties to the Convention. The Office of Internal Oversight Services made proposals to the Committee for Programme and Coordination for a pilot thematic evaluation intended to provide a systematic review of the activities carried out by several programmes of the Organization sharing common purposes.

Audit management

210. From July 2002 to June 2003, the Internal Audit Division conducted 101 audits, 5 of which resulted in reports to the General Assembly. An audit of United Nations information centres (A/57/747), for example, highlighted the need for an urgent reassessment of the information centre concept in terms of usefulness and continuing relevance. Significant resources were spent on the operations of information centres in developed countries, and the Office of Internal Oversight Services called for a different approach and a reorientation towards developing countries. The Office recommended inter alia that the Department of Public Information reassess and update the goals and strategies of information centres, and the Department has already begun implementing many of the recommendations. Other audits examined the status of recommendations concerning the liquidation of peacekeeping missions (A/57/622), the procurement of goods and services for peacekeeping missions from Governments using letters of assist (A/57/718), and the policies and procedures for recruiting staff for the Department of Peacekeeping Operations (A/57/224).

211. An audit of the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women examined the sustainability of the Institute, and made a series of recommendations to address its financial and operating difficulties. As recommended by the Office of Internal Oversight Services, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees changed the rules for project agreements with international non-governmental organizations. This has resulted in more reliable financial information and competitive procurement, as well as greater transparency in project staff spending.

Investigations

212. The Investigations Division is exploring ways to deal with the increased volume of allegations of misconduct, mismanagement, abuse of authority and waste of resources, 20 per cent of which were categorized as significant to the Organization in 2002, in part through new partnerships with national law enforcement authorities. For example, in the investigations of refugee smuggling in East Africa and sexual exploitation in West Africa, the Division coordinated ad hoc task forces, which, in addition to investigators, included experts on loan from other agencies or on special service agreements, in areas such as medicine, human rights, child and refugee protection, law and sexual abuse counselling.

213. In close collaboration with the Anti-Fraud Office (OLAF) of the European Commission, the Division recovered $4.2 million that had been misappropriated by a former senior staff member of the United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo. The investigation led to the successful prosecution of the staff member by the German authorities in June 2003. In an effort to establish normative standards, the Fourth Conference of International Investigators, hosted by OLAF and held at Brussels in April 2003, unanimously endorsed the guidelines for the conduct of investigations by investigators of international and bilateral organizations which had been drafted and presented by the Division.

Strengthening the Organization

214. The main rationale behind my agenda for further change was to align the activities of the Organization with the priorities agreed upon at the Millennium Summit and the global conferences. During the first half of 2003, major efforts were made to ensure that the programme budget for the biennium 2004-2005 to be presented to the General Assembly reflected this alignment. The proposal which will go before the Assembly later in 2003 includes the reorganization of two major departments, the Department of General Assembly and Conference Management and the Department of Public Information. I also intend to establish a strategic planning capacity in the Department of Economic and Social Affairs, strengthen the management of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights and increase investment in support to human rights at the national level. Additional investments in staff training and information technology underpin these proposals.

215. There are several areas where the reforms have already taken effect. Efforts to improve the servicing of the General Assembly, through better planning of meetings and related documentation, and work to sharpen the focus of our public information activities are beginning to yield results. The role of the office of the Special Adviser on Africa has been strengthened to ensure a coherent and integrated approach to United Nations deliberations, reports and advocacy in support of Africa and in the follow-up to the New Partnership for Africa's Development.

216. In other instances, work is under way, but not yet complete. For example plans to strengthen actions relating to human rights at the country level, the clarification of roles and responsibilities in the area of technical cooperation, efforts to streamline reporting and publications, and the work of a high-level panel to review the relationship between the Organization and civil society will require additional work. The funds and programmes have made considerable progress in strengthening their country-level impact by developing collaborative programming and budgeting tools for joint programming and pooling of resources. The new programming tools will be introduced in 2003, with the aim of expanding their use to more than 80 country programmes by 2006.

217. The reform package also contained several systemic improvements to the planning and budgeting process. Initial steps have been taken to improve the budget documents themselves, with shorter, more strategic presentations, in particular for peacekeeping operations, and the inclusion of results-based indicators for all programmatic areas. Detailed descriptions of other proposed changes will be contained in other reports submitted to the General Assembly at its fifty-eighth session.

218. Efforts to strengthen the Organization ultimately depend on an able, versatile and well-managed workforce. Improvements to the management of human resources through the new recruitment and placement system are now showing results. Work is in progress to further reduce the barriers to staff mobility both within and between United Nations organizations, particularly in the field. Additional measures will be taken to grant individual programme managers greater decision-making responsibilities.

Chapter VI

Partnerships

Communications

219. Renewed focus and greater clarity of purpose were the twin objectives I mentioned two years ago in initiating a comprehensive review of the work of the Department of Public Information. A new operating model and a new organizational structure for the Department have now been put in place. Activities are now grouped more strategically under three Divisions. A Strategic Communications Division responsible for devising and disseminating information on priority themes, and an Outreach Division, which develops supportive partnerships with civil society, have been established, while the existing News and Media Division has been reorganized to increase its capacity to deliver timely, accurate, objective and balanced news.

220. The key element in the new operating model is the identification of Secretariat departments as departmental "clients" that establish their own communications priorities based on priorities laid down by the General Assembly, which the Department of Public Information then communicates strategically to various target audiences. Once established, these priorities form the basis of issues-driven promotional campaigns, implemented using all the media assets of the Department, including print, radio, television and the Internet. Strategic partnerships with the Member States, civil society, the private sector and academic institutions will also serve to disseminate the messages both internationally and, at the local level, through the United Nations information centres. In a clear endorsement of the new strategic direction, the Committee on Information at its twenty-fifth session, in April/May 2003, welcomed the restructuring of the Department of Public Information, including its new operating model and organizational structure.

221. The Department is also engaged in strategic partnerships with entities within the United Nations system. A new communications strategy is being developed for the World Summit on the Information Society, to be held at Geneva in December 2003 in cooperation with the International Telecommunication Union. The Department is also working towards engaging the media as stakeholders in the information society, and emphasizing the role of freedom of speech and the press. In association with the television industry and the Government of Switzerland, the Department is organizing a parallel event at the Summit, the World Electronic Media Forum, which will focus on the role of the electronic media in the information society.

222. As part of an invigorated strategy of outreach to non-State actors, in November 2002 the Department constituted a Civil Society Service in the Outreach Division, charged with integrating all programmes servicing non-governmental organizations, educational institutions and the general public, as well as initiating and fostering partnerships with new entities, including those in the private sector and the media. A new Educational Outreach Section in that Service orients key products, including the flagship publication UN Chronicle, the multimedia UN Works programme and the global teaching and learning project, Cyberschoolbus, to the needs of students and teachers the world over.

223. Using new technologies, the Department continues to provide audiences worldwide with instant access to the latest news about the United Nations. On 5 February 2003, the United Nations web site reached a new milestone when it was accessed more than 10 million times in a single 24-hour period. The number of times the site is accessed has grown from more than 11.5 million in 1996 to some 1,695 million hits in 2002, owing in part to the addition of material in all of the official languages. Since September 2002 over 28,000 links have been provided to parliamentary documents on the Official Document System.

224. The United Nations is making increasing use of webcasting—live broadcasting over the Internet of meetings and events. On 7 March, 24,000 users in 66 countries watched the webcast of the Security Council meeting on Iraq live, and many more accessed the images later. An Arabic version of the United Nations News Centre web site has been added to the French and English sites, and sites in the other official languages are now in preparation. A measure of the success of the Centre is the growing number of news outlets and web sites that refer to the United Nations News Service as the source of the material they publish.

225. United Nations Radio has firmly established itself as one of the important traditional multimedia channels for strategically communicating the activities and concerns of the Organization to audiences in all regions of the world. A recent survey offered a conservative estimate that some 133 million people listen to United Nations Radio programmes at least once a week in the six official languages, as well as in Portuguese and Kiswahili. Since April 2003, 10 new official television partners have joined in the dissemination of United Nations Television and have aired about 50 hours of United Nations programming to some 2 billion viewers.

226. The Department of Public Information has undertaken a number of initiatives aimed at strengthening the Organization's public information capacities in its peacekeeping and political missions in the field. Standard operating procedures for field-based public information units are being prepared, in close collaboration with the Department of Peacekeeping Operations. By agreement with the Department of Peacekeeping Operations, a public information expert is now stationed at the United Nations Logistics Base at Brindisi, Italy, to aid in the development of a public information training capacity. A roster of public information personnel for rapid deployment has been established, and a training programme for rapidly deployable field personnel is in preparation. The Department has also organized the dispatch of a senior public information officer to assess the situation on the ground in Côte d'Ivoire and to provide recommendations on local media development, which have been used to guide regional inter-agency efforts to address media issues in that country.

227. In my report entitled "Strengthening of the United Nations: an agenda for further change", I proposed the rationalization of the network of United Nations information centres around regional hubs, starting with the creation of a Western European hub. The Secretariat is implementing a plan for the establishment of the proposed hub in Western Europe by the beginning of 2004 and, in parallel, is closing nine existing information centres in that region.

228. A noteworthy achievement of the Dag Hammarskjöld Library, launched on 7 February 2003, was the redesigned interface to its main databases, UNBISnet, which is now more powerful and easier to search. Important reference tools, such as the United Nations Documentation Research Guide and the United Nations conferences and observances page, have been updated and on 27 March the UNBIS Thesaurus was launched. It is fully electronic and, like the Documentation Research Guide and the conferences and observances page, is available in all six official languages.

229. A major development for United Nations libraries was the formation in March 2003 of the Steering Committee for the Modernization and Integrated Management of United Nations Libraries, under the leadership of the Department of Public Information. This initiative is intended to create a more modern, efficient and accessible system of library services throughout the Organization.

230. The Cartographic Section of the Department continues to provide valuable technical assistance to the Eritrea-Ethiopia Boundary Commission in its preparation for the demarcation of the international boundary between the two countries, following the successful delimitation of the boundary in April 2002. United Nations cartographers also helped the Cameroon-Nigeria Mixed Commission in developing a work plan for the demarcation of the international boundary between those two countries in February 2003. The Section will, however, be transferred to the Department of Peacekeeping Operations in 2004.

United Nations Fund for International Partnerships

231. Through the successful partnership of the United Nations Fund for International Partnerships (UNFIP) and the United Nations Foundation, $489 million has been programmed, as at 31 December 2002, for 251 projects worldwide in four programme areas, namely, children's health; population and women; environment; and peace, security and human rights. Other multilateral and bilateral donors provided approximately $175 million in additional funding for programmes and projects supported by UNFIP and the Foundation.

232. The projects that comprised the UNFIP children's health programme have contributed to preventing the death of 240,000 children by providing 37 million vaccinations against measles in 2002. These projects have strengthened the national health systems of target countries with continuing training of health-care workers, the promotion of injection safety and the inclusion in the measles campaigns of other health activities, such as vitamin A supplementation, immunization against polio and the distribution of bed nets to prevent malaria. As a result of the $82 million made available in 2002 through the efforts of the Foundation and UNFIP, all but seven countries worldwide are now free of polio.

233. Biodiversity emerged as a central priority of the World Summit on Sustainable Development, which underlined the importance of providing and sustaining the livelihoods of poor rural communities. Funding provided by UNFIP and the Foundation to the United Nations Environment Programme catalysed a major initiative in May 2003, targeted at reversing the decline of coral reefs. In September 2002, UNFIP also facilitated a partnership between the Department of Economic and Social Affairs and the E7—an umbrella organization of nine electric utilities in Japan, Europe and North America—to work together to expand the access to electricity of the poor.

234. The United Nations Fund for International Partnerships also provided advice to the private sector and foundations on partnerships with the United Nations system, including guidance on policies and procedures and suggestions on strategic ways for corporations and foundations to support the Millennium Development Goals. The Fund is also engaged in establishing ties with numerous organizations that aim to raise funds for the causes of the Organization.

Project services

235. In 2002, the United Nations Office for Project Services (UNOPS) acquired a total of $509 million in new business for its project portfolio. Business acquired from UNDP amounted to $334.2 million or 66 per cent, a balance amounting to $174.9 million or 34 per cent coming from other entities within the United Nations system. On the loan portfolio, the International Fund for Agricultural Development entrusted project supervision and loan administration responsibilities to UNOPS for 14 additional projects totalling $225 million in the course of 2002, compared to $328 million in 2001.

236. The United Nations Office for Project Services continued to support the mine action programmes of three major clients—UNDP, the Mine Action Service and the Office of the Iraq Programme—in 18 countries around the world. That role expanded significantly in the course of the year, with increased activities in northern Iraq, new responsibilities for the existing programme in Afghanistan, and the formulation of new programmes, which are expected to expand, in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the Sudan.

237. A new form of partnership was initiated in 2002 with the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria. In April 2003, UNOPS was designated by the Fund as one of the four pre-qualified Local Fund Agents, its task being to provide management services and to supervise, on behalf of the Fund, the implementation of nationally executed programmes financed by the Fund. To date, UNOPS has signed agreements with or has been designated to be the Local Fund Agent for China, India, Mongolia, Serbia and Montenegro and Timor-Leste, and negotiations for similar work in other countries are under way. Elsewhere, UNOPS is exploring options to assist the Fund's operations by supporting principal recipients in the implementation of project activities.

238. In May 2003, the Joint United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS entrusted to UNOPS the implementation of a project entitled "AIDS in Africa: scenarios for the future", developed and funded in partnership with Shell United Kingdom. The project aims at responding to the impact of the HIV/AIDS epidemic in Africa and forming a shared understanding of the problem. Other objectives are to help to activate a broad-based response from all segments of society and to overcome the stigma and discrimination experienced by HIV-positive individuals. The Global Business Development division of Shell International will support the project through technical know-how and contributions to the budget.

239. An example of combining private sector expertise with United Nations goals is the UNDP Human Development Programme in Angola, the execution of which is entrusted to UNOPS and which is supported by the Italian private sector firm Coop, a consortium of over 200 consumer cooperatives. Under the programme, which aims to improve the lives of the children in Angola, 100,000 children were vaccinated and 6,000 children obtained a daily meal, on a budget of $260,715. UNOPS is facilitating the link between Coop and the local economic development agencies created by the Human Development Programme with the objective of bringing Angolan coffee to the Italian market, establishing viable trade relations and creating synergies between development assistance and the private sector. Similar arrangements are being made in the framework of other UNDP-funded projects to be executed by UNOPS in Mozambique and South Africa.

Civil society and business partnerships

240. In my report entitled "Strengthening of the United Nations: an agenda for further change", I highlighted the engagement of civil society as an aspect of the United Nations reform process and announced that I would assemble a group of eminent persons representing a variety of perspectives and experiences to review past and current practices and recommend improvements to make the interaction between civil society and the United Nations more meaningful. In February 2003 I appointed Fernando Enrique Cardoso, former President of Brazil, to chair the High-level Panel on Civil Society, comprising 12 individuals with backgrounds spanning the governmental and non-governmental sectors.

241. The main task of the Panel is to produce a set of practical recommendations on how the Organization's relationship with civil society, and with the private sector and parliaments, could be improved. In particular, the Panel will identify best practices in the Organization and other international organizations with a view to identifying new and better ways of interacting with civil society. The Panel will also examine ways in which the participation of civil society actors from developing countries can be facilitated. At its first meeting, held in New York on 2 and 3 June 2003, the Panel agreed upon a work programme that emphasizes an open, transparent and consultative process. The Panel will submit its final report in April 2004.

242. In the past year the Organization forged several new partnerships. This was an important innovation of the World Summit on Sustainable Development, during which more than 200 partnerships were launched by a wide variety of stakeholders, including various agencies, funds and programmes within the Organization. These partnerships were aimed at implementing sustainable development through various means such as capacity-building, education and improving access to information. The Organization must ensure that the partnerships are successful and help in the effective implementation of the commitments made at the Summit.

243. The Organization continued to strengthen its partnership with the private sector. During the reporting period, the number of companies participating in the Global Compact doubled from approximately 500 to more than 1,000, more than half of which were in developing countries in all regions of the world. At the same time, the Global Compact was launched in 14 countries, bringing to more than 50 the number of countries where the Global Compact has taken root. Moreover, the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) was wel-came as an additional member of the Global Compact's core group of agencies, until then consisting of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, the International Labour Organization, UNDP and UNEP. The core group of agencies supports the Compact by providing training materials on its principles and supporting outreach activities. UNIDO will be responsible for small and medium-sized enterprises.

244. In January 2003, the Global Compact adopted a new strategic approach to conducting its operations whereby companies are asked to publish a "communication on progress" in their annual or other prominent reports to increase transparency and public accountability. A significant element of this strategic approach is its emphasis on policy dialogues within multi-stakeholder forums to identify and address problems in areas of interest to the international community. During the reporting period, the Global Compact convened policy dialogues on business and sustainable development in 2002; and HIV/AIDS in the workplace and supply chain management and partnerships in 2003, involving participants from business, labour and civil society. These dialogues have resulted in joint initiatives such as the development and application of a business guide to help companies to ensure that their behaviour is not negatively contributing to conflicts; a common set of recommendations on how companies, non-governmental organizations, Governments and intergovernmental organizations can contribute to greater transparency and help to combat corruption; and an initiative on promoting awareness about HIV/AIDS in the workplace. An initiative to encourage sustainable business in the world's least developed countries was launched in Ethiopia, and activities are planned for Angola, Bangladesh, Cambodia and Madagascar. The initiative brings companies together with other stakeholders to identify business opportunities in the least developed countries that will be sustainable and will be designed in ways to help local small and medium-sized enterprises.

245. To enable the Global Compact to accomplish its objective of helping to create a more sustainable and inclusive global economy and to ensure that the Compact's new strategy of "communication on progress" has a significant impact, the Organization must continue to give the Global Compact the creative space it needs to grow.

Conclusion

246. In the perspective of human experience one year is a fleeting moment. It will not be possible for some time to make final judgements on many of the activities of the United Nations. It is clear, nevertheless, that the Organization is contributing to international stability and progress in positive and practical ways, and that it is making a real difference in the lives of individual people around the world.

247. The record of the United Nations activities has also shown that the system is exceedingly flexible. The Organization will need to maintain its capacity to adapt to new challenges and global conditions, while remaining faithful to the purposes and principles of the Charter.

248. Despite its imperfections, the United Nations still embodies the hopes of the peoples of the world for a peaceful and just world. This review of the Organization's work in the past year should contribute to a better understanding of the role which the United Nations plays in global affairs, in particular as an effective instrument of international cooperation.

Political and security questions

Chapter I

International peace and security

The year 2003 was a particularly challenging one for the United Nations in the area of international peace and security. World attention focused on the declaration of war in Iraq and its aftermath, which gave rise to deep divisions in the international community, severely testing the principle of collective security and the resilience of the Organization, and caused questions to be asked regarding the relevance of the United Nations. In December, the General Assembly welcomed the establishment by the Secretary-General of a High-level Panel on Threats, Challenges and Change, the aim of which was to recommend measures for ensuring effective collective action, based on, among other things, a thorough assessment of existing approaches, instruments and mechanisms, including the principal organs of the United Nations.

International terrorism continued to pose a major threat to peace and security. The Security Council held a high-level meeting in January at which it adopted a declaration aimed at reinforcing the international community's mobilization against terrorism. It also examined the work of its Counter-Terrorism Committee throughout the year.

Both the Council and the Assembly continued to focus on the prevention and resolution of conflict and the provision of assistance to countries emerging from conflict. In July, the Assembly emphasized the importance of a comprehensive and coherent strategy for the prevention of conflict and adopted the Secretary-General's recommendations in that regard. In follow-up to that resolution, the Assembly, in September, held an open interactive dialogue on the role of civil society in the prevention of armed conflict. In the context of the international conflict-prevention strategy, the Council and the Assembly strongly supported the adoption of the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme to regulate the sale of rough diamonds. The Council examined its continuing role in the settlement of disputes, and both the Council and the Secretariat held high-level meetings with regional organizations on ways to meet the new challenges to international peace and security. The Council also considered issues relating to the rule of law in post-conflict situations. The Organization maintained 15 political and peace-building missions during 2003.

Efforts to streamline and better manage the Organization's peacekeeping operations included strengthening of the rapid deployment and standby arrangements system and development of a detailed plan for the phased establishment of the strategic deployment stocks system at the United Nations Logistics Base in Brindisi, Italy. The Council considered several peacekeeping-related issues, including gender mainstreaming in all peacekeeping activities and the Secretariat's efforts to develop a coherent policy towards that end, the role of HIV/AIDS and efforts to reduce the risk of peacekeepers contracting or transmitting the disease while on mission, issues related to peacekeeping and the international legal system and the role mine action could play in peacekeeping operations. The safety of UN peacekeepers and associated humanitarian personnel was a priority issue, especially in the light of the bombing of the UN mission in Iraq, in which 22 international and local staff died, including the Secretary-General's Special Representative, and many more were injured. In May, the Assembly decided to donate, as the Secretary-General had done, its portion of the financial award of the Nobel Peace Prize to the United Nations Nobel Peace Prize Memorial Fund, created by the Secretary-General to provide financial assistance for the education of children of UN civilian personnel killed in the line of duty. During the year, the United Nations created one new peacekeeping mission and one mission completed its mandate. At the end of 2003, the number of missions in operation totalled 13, the same as in 2002, and the number of military personnel and civilian police serving under UN command stood at 45,815.

The Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations, which met in March, made recommendations on procedures for consultations with troop-contributing countries, action to enhance UN peacekeeping capacity and increased co-operation with regional arrangements.

The positive financial position of UN peacekeeping operations continued during the financial period 1 July 2002 to 30 June 2003. As a result of scaled-down activities due to the closure of missions and the creation of only one new mission during that period, expenditure decreased slightly to $2,501 million, compared to a final figure of $2,572 million for the previous financial period. Unpaid assessed contributions also declined to $1.1 billion, compared to $1.2 billion the previous year. The Assembly considered various aspects of peacekeeping financing, including the peacekeeping support account, the financing of the United Nations Logistics Base, the liquidation of closed missions, the Peacekeeping Reserve Fund, proposals for consolidating peacekeeping accounts, the management of peacekeeping trust funds, reimbursement issues, and procurement and inventory management. It also considered a number of personnel issues, including recruitment policies and procedures.

Promotion of international peace and security

Follow-up to Millennium Summit (2000)

In response to General Assembly resolution 57/145 [YUN 2002, p. 41], the Secretary-General submitted a September report [A/58/323] (see also p. 1385) on the implementation of the United Nations Millennium Declaration, adopted at the Millennium Summit in 2000 [YUN 2000, p. 49]. The Secretary-General evaluated progress made or not made in the areas of peace and security, development, and human rights and democracy, and re-examined some of the underlying assumptions of the Declaration, observing that it could no longer be taken for granted that the multilateral institutions were strong enough to cope with all the challenges facing them. He said that, since the Millennium Summit (ibid., p. 47), the international community had had to deal with both new and old threats to international peace and security. However, the climate of cooperation and consensus that was evident following the terrorist attacks in the United States on 11 September 2001 [YUN 2001, p. 60], in terms of the global condemnation, swift adoption of anti-terrorism measures and support for the reconstruction of Afghanistan, was seriously eroded by the war against Iraq (see p. 333). That war exposed deep divisions in the international community and brought to the fore questions of principle and practice that challenged the United Nations and the international community. The Secretary-General stressed that it was vitally important that the international community not allow those differences to persist but to find unity of purpose based on a common security agenda, which should reflect a global consensus on the major threats to peace and security. Such an agenda should strengthen international solidarity based on the shared universal values enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations and not shy away from the need to improve and, where necessary, change the structure and functions of the United Nations and other international institutions. He said that the great strength of the United Nations remained its legitimacy, founded on the principles of international law, for which there was no substitute in the international arena. The conduct of international affairs should, therefore, be in conformity with those principles. The United Nations itself was at a critical juncture, and unless the Security Council regained the confidence of States and of world public opinion, individual States would increasingly resort to their own national perceptions of emerging threats and to their own judgement on how best to address them. To forestall such a development, the United Nations would have to demonstrate its ability to deal effectively with the most difficult issues. In particular, the ability of the Council to garner the widest possible support for its decisions and actions would be enhanced if it was perceived to be broadly representative of the international community and the geopolitical realities of the contemporary world. The Secretary-General hoped, therefore, that Member States would redouble their efforts to reach agreement on the enlargement of the Council.

The Secretary-General also addressed other peace and security issues, such as the need to strengthen and complement existing weapons of mass destruction regimes (see p. 532), the threat posed by small arms and the need for cooperation in tightening export controls and facilitating the identification of sources of illicit weapons (see p. 562), sanctions, terrorism (see p. 63), prevention of violent conflict (see p. 54) and peacekeeping and peace-building.

The collective record of achievement in implementing the commitments of the Millennium Declaration in the area of peace and security was mixed, the Secretary-General concluded. To improve on that record, greater efforts were needed to produce innovative reforms, to be candid in evaluating existing mechanisms and working methods, and to engage in meaningful dialogues on the principles and practices that should guide the Organization in the years ahead. Above all, it was necessary to be intensely aware of the changes in the international security environment. Current challenges to peace and security were global and required complex and collective responses. Legitimacy of action, which might include military action, was essential to ensuring durable solutions to the security needs of the times, and the Charter remained the indispensable basis for legitimate international action. The world looked to the United Nations to address global security threats with the global interest in mind. Therefore, a renewed commitment to work collectively, in accordance with the Charter, was needed. A collective security system built on fairness and consistency would be the best way to meet both old and new challenges.

High-level Panel on Threats, Challenges and Change

The Secretary-General, presenting his annual report on the work of the Organization (see p. 3) to the General Assembly on 23 September [A/58/PV.7], said that events over the preceding 12 months had called into question the shared vision of global solidarity and security expressed in the Millennium Declaration [YUN 2000, p. 49]. He announced his intention to establish a high-level panel of eminent personalities to examine current challenges to peace and security; consider the contribution that collective action could make in addressing those challenges; review the functioning of major UN organs and the relationship between them; and recommend ways of strengthening the United Nations, through reform of its institutions and processes. The panel would focus primarily on threats to peace and security but would also examine other global challenges, insofar as they might influence or connect with those threats. He would ask the panel to report to him before the beginning of the fifty-ninth session of the Assembly in 2004.

By a 3 November letter [A/58/612], the Secretary-General transmitted to the Assembly President the terms of reference of the High-level Panel on Threats, Challenges and Change, to be chaired by Anand Panyarachun, former Prime Minister of Thailand, and comprising eminent persons from Australia, Brazil, China, Egypt, France, Ghana, India, Japan, Norway, Pakistan, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom, the United Republic of Tanzania, the United States and Uruguay.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 3 December [meeting 68], the General Assembly adopted resolution 58/16 [draft: A/58/L.7/Rev.1 & Add.1] without vote [agenda item 60].

Responding to global threats and challenges

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 55/162 of 14 December 2000, 56/95 of 14 December 2001 and 57/144 of 16 December 2002 on the follow-up to the outcome of the Millennium Summit, and its resolution 57/145 of 16 December 2002,

Guided by the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations,

Reaffirming the coordinating and leading role of the United Nations in establishing a cohesive and effective system for responding to global threats and challenges, and welcoming the ongoing efforts of Member States and the Secretary-General to this end,

Recognizing the importance, in the context of implementing the United Nations Millennium Declaration, of a comprehensive approach aimed at addressing global threats and challenges in accordance with the Charter, international law and relevant international instruments,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of the Millennium Declaration and the observations contained therein on ways and means to promote further, with the United Nations lead, a more comprehensive and coherent response to the global threats and challenges of the twenty-first century,

Taking note of the letter dated 3 November 2003 from the Secretary-General to the President of the General Assembly regarding the establishment of the High-level Panel on Threats, Challenges and Change,

1. Commends the increased interaction of Member States, the agencies and organizations of the United Nations system and the international and regional organizations cooperating with the United Nations, aimed at countering various global threats and challenges, in particular those posed by international terrorism in all its forms and manifestations, transnational organized crime, regional conflicts, poverty, unsustainable development, illicit drug trafficking, money-laundering, infectious diseases, environmental degradation, natural disasters, complex emergency situations and others;

2. Expresses its appreciation to Member States and relevant regional and other organizations for submitting to the Secretary-General their contributions on the issues referred to in paragraphs 1 and 2 of resolution 57/145;

3. Encourages the United Nations, its Member States, the agencies and organizations of the United Nations system and other international and regional organizations to continue their efforts towards establishing a comprehensive and effective strategy for responding to global threats and challenges;

4. Welcomes the establishment by the Secretary-General of the High-level Panel on Threats, Challenges and Change to make recommendations for the elements of a collective action, and expresses its readiness to consider as a matter of priority at its fifty-ninth session the recommendations of the Secretary-General thereon.

Conflict prevention

On 3 July [meeting 93], the General Assembly, having considered the Secretary-General's 2001 report on the prevention of armed conflict [YUN 2001, p. 48], adopted resolution 57/337 [draft: A/57/L.79] without vote [agenda item 10].

Prevention of armed conflict

The General Assembly,

Guided by the purposes and principles enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations,

Recalling Chapter VI and Article 2.3 of the Charter of the United Nations,

Recalling also the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples as contained in its resolution 1514(XV) of 14 December 1960,

Recognizing that multilateral cooperation under United Nations auspices could be an effective means to prevent armed conflict and to address its root causes,

Reaffirming its commitment to the principles of the political independence, the sovereign equality and the territorial integrity of all States,

Guided by the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Cooperation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, annexed to its resolution 2625(XXV) of 24 October 1970,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the prevention of armed conflict,

Bearing in mind its responsibilities, functions and powers under the Charter of the United Nations, and thus recalling all its relevant resolutions in matters related to the question of the prevention of armed conflict,

Recalling all Security Council resolutions relating to the prevention of armed conflict, and noting all Security Council presidential statements related to this matter,

Recognizing that the prevention of armed conflict and the pacific settlement of disputes could be useful tools for the United Nations in order to build a solid foundation for peace,

Alarmed by the human costs and devastating humanitarian, economic, environmental, political and social consequences of armed conflict, and recognizing the imperatives, including moral, of the prevention of armed conflict and its benefits for peace and development, in particular by addressing the root causes of armed conflict,

Recognizing that peace and development are mutually reinforcing, including in the prevention of armed conflict,

Recognizing also the importance of humanitarian assistance in ensuring an effective transition from conflict to peace and in preventing the recurrence of armed conflict,

Affirming that the fulfilment of the obligation to respect and ensure respect in all circumstances for the provisions of international humanitarian law, particularly the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, will enhance the prospects for the peaceful resolution of armed conflict and for the prevention of its occurrence and recurrence,

Affirming also that full respect for all human rights and fundamental freedoms for all is one of the key elements for the prevention of armed conflict,

Recognizing that the root causes of armed conflict are multidimensional in nature, thus requiring a comprehensive and integrated approach to the prevention of armed conflict,

Determined to establish a just and lasting peace all over the world in accordance with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations, and upholding the sovereign equality of all States, respect for their territorial integrity and political independence, resolution of disputes by peaceful means and in conformity with the principles of justice and international law, the right of self-determination of peoples which remain under colonial domination and foreign occupation, non-interference in the internal affairs of States, respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, respect for the equal rights of all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion, and international cooperation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural or humanitarian character,

Welcoming the adoption of the Global Agenda for Dialogue among Civilizations, and recognizing the continued inter-religious dialogues and the promotion of religious harmony as contributions to the prevention of armed conflict,

Affirming that the ethnic, cultural and religious identity of minorities, where they exist, must be protected, and that persons belonging to such minorities should be treated equally and enjoy their human rights and fundamental freedoms without discrimination of any kind,

Resolving to take appropriate measures, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, combined with the efforts of Member States, to prevent armed conflicts,

1. Takes note with appreciation of the report of the Secretary-General on the prevention of armed conflict;

2. Emphasizes the importance of a comprehensive and coherent strategy comprising short-term operational and long-term structural measures for the prevention of armed conflict, and recognizes the ten principles outlined in the report of the Secretary-General;

3. Reaffirms the primary responsibility of Member States for the prevention of armed conflict, recalls the important role of the United Nations in this regard, and invites Member States, where appropriate, to adopt national strategies, taking into account, inter alia, those ten principles, as well as such elements as multilateral and regional cooperation, mutual benefit, sovereign equality, transparency and confidence-building measures;

4. Encourages Member States to utilize regional arrangements or agencies, where available, for the peaceful settlement of their disputes;

5. Reiterates its call upon the Member States to settle their disputes by peaceful means as set forth in Chapter VI of the Charter of the United Nations, including by the most effective use of the International Court of Justice;

6. Resolves that all Member States strictly adhere to their obligations as laid down in the Charter of the United Nations;

7. Calls upon the parties to any dispute, the continuance of which is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security, to seek a solution by negotiation, enquiry, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, judicial settlement, resort to regional agencies or arrangements, or other peaceful means of their own choice in accordance with Article 33 of the Charter of the United Nations;

8. Reaffirms the primary responsibility of the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security, especially should the parties to such a dispute fail to settle it by the means indicated in paragraph 7 above in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, and also notes in this regard the Manila Declaration on the Peaceful Settlement of International Disputes;

9. Emphasizes that the prevention of armed conflict would be promoted by continued cooperation among Member States, the United Nations system, the Bretton Woods institutions and regional and sub-regional organizations, noting that the private sector and civil society have supporting roles to play;

10. Reaffirms, in the context of the prevention of armed conflict, the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by force and of acts of colonization, and affirms the need to bring an end to situations of foreign occupation, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and international law;

11. Recognizes the need for mainstreaming and coordinating the prevention of armed conflict throughout the United Nations system, and calls upon all its relevant organs, organizations and bodies to consider, in accordance with their respective mandates, how they could best include a conflict prevention perspective in their activities, where appropriate, and to inform the General Assembly, pursuant to resolution 55/281 of 1 August 2001, no later than at its fifty-ninth session, of progress achieved in this regard;

12. Calls upon Member States and the international community to abide by the resolve of the Millennium Assembly to make the United Nations more effective in maintaining peace and security by giving it the resources and tools it needs for conflict prevention;

13. Calls for strengthening the capacity of the United Nations in order to carry out more effectively its responsibilities for the prevention of armed conflict, including relevant peace-building and development activities, and requests the Secretary-General to submit a detailed review of the capacity of the United Nations system in the context of the report on the implementation of the present resolution;

14. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a comprehensive report on the implementation of the present resolution, taking into account, inter alia, the views expressed by Member States and the organs, agencies, funds and programmes of the United Nations system in accordance with resolution 55/281, for consideration no later than at its fifty-ninth session;

15. Decides to adopt the conclusions and recommendations, based on its consideration of the report of the Secretary-General, as contained in the annex to the present resolution;

16. Decides also to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-ninth session a specific item entitled "Prevention of armed conflict".

Annex

General Assembly conclusions and recommendations on the prevention of armed conflict

Role of Member States

1. Calls upon Member States to achieve the goals embodied in the United Nations Millennium Declaration, including the internationally agreed development goals, as well as the outcomes of the major United Nations conferences and summits;

2. Calls in this regard upon Member States and the international community at large to support poverty eradication measures and the development strategies of developing countries;

3. Urges developed countries that have not done so to make concrete efforts towards the target of providing 0.7 per cent of their gross national product as official development assistance to developing countries and 0.15 to 0.20 per cent of their gross national product as official development assistance to least developed countries, as reconfirmed at the Third United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries, and encourages developing countries to build on progress achieved in ensuring that official development assistance is used effectively to help to achieve development goals and targets;

4. Encourages greater transparency in armaments by Member States, as appropriate, including broader and more active participation in the United Nations instruments relating to arms registers and military expenditures, and calls upon them strongly to support confidence-building measures in this area;

5. Calls upon Member States to implement the obligations assumed by them as States parties to treaties in such areas as arms control, non-proliferation and disarmament and to strengthen their international verification instruments;

6. Reaffirms the resolve of the international community to strive for the elimination of weapons of mass destruction;

7. Invites Member States that have not already done so to consider, as appropriate, becoming parties to arms control, non-proliferation and disarmament treaties;

8. Urges Member States, as well as relevant United Nations bodies, to take appropriate measures to fully implement the Programme of Action to Prevent, Combat and Eradicate the Illicit Trade in Small Arms and Light Weapons in All Its Aspects;

9. Urges Member States which have not already done so to consider ratification, acceptance, approval of or accession to the international human rights and international humanitarian law instruments, and also other international instruments relevant to the prevention of armed conflict;

10. Calls upon Member States to comply in good faith with the obligations assumed by them as States parties to international legal instruments relevant to the prevention of armed conflict;

11. Notes the entry into force on 1 July 2002 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and the subsequent establishment of the International Criminal Court;

12. Stresses the need to bring to justice the perpetrators of war crimes and crimes against humanity as a significant contribution towards the promotion of a culture of prevention;

13. Also stresses the important role that women, in their various capacities, and with their expertise, training and knowledge, can play with regard to the prevention of armed conflict, in all its aspects, and calls for the strengthening of that role in all relevant institutions at the national, regional and international levels;

14. Urges Member States to make the most effective use of existing and new procedures and methods for the peaceful settlement of their disputes, including, as appropriate, arbitration, mediation and other treaty-based arrangements, and the International Court of Justice, to settle their disputes in a peaceful manner and thereby promote the role of international law in international relations;

15. Emphasizes the need, at all levels of society and among nations, for strengthening freedom, justice, democracy, tolerance, solidarity, cooperation, pluralism, cultural diversity, dialogue and understanding as important elements for preventing armed conflict;

16. Encourages Member States to strengthen national capacities for addressing structural risk factors, as deemed useful by national Governments, with the support, as appropriate, of the international community, including the United Nations system, the Bretton Woods institutions and regional and sub-regional organizations;

Role of the General Assembly

17. Expresses its determination to make more effective use of its powers under Articles 10, 11, 13, 14, 15 and 17 of the Charter of the United Nations for the prevention of armed conflict;

18. Intends to make fuller use of Article 96 of the Charter of the United Nations;

19. Decides to consider ways of enhancing interaction with the other United Nations organs, especially the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council, and with the Secretary-General in terms of developing and implementing long- and short-term measures and strategies aimed at preventing armed conflict;

Role of the Security Council

20. Takes note of the provisions contained in Security Council resolution 1366(2001) of 30 August 2001, in particular the commitment of the Council to take early and effective action to prevent armed conflict;

21. Encourages the Security Council to give prompt consideration to early warning or prevention cases brought to its attention by the Secretary-General, and to use appropriate mechanisms, such as the Ad Hoc Working Group on Conflict Prevention and Resolution in Africa, with due regard to relevant regional and subregional dimensions, in accordance with Article 99 of the Charter of the United Nations;

22. Further encourages the Security Council to keep under close review situations of potential armed conflict and to consider seriously cases of potential armed conflict brought to its attention by a State or the General Assembly or on the basis of information furnished by the Economic and Social Council;

23. Recognizes that the United Nations can continue to play an important role in the prevention of armed conflict by promoting conflict resolution and dispute settlement;

24. Encourages the continued strengthening of the process of the peaceful settlement of disputes and efforts to make it more effective;

25. Notes the commitment of the Security Council to make wider and effective use of the procedures and means enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations, particularly in Chapter VI, as one of the essential components of its work to promote and maintain international peace and security;

26. Reaffirms that the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, for which the prevention of armed conflict is important, is conferred upon the Security Council, and reiterates that, under Article 25 of the Charter of the United Nations, the Members of the United Nations have agreed to accept and carry out the decisions of the Security Council in accordance with the Charter;

27. Recommends that the Security Council continue to mandate peacekeeping operations and include, as appropriate, peace-building elements therein, in such a way as to generate conditions which, to the maximum extent possible, help to avoid the recurrence of armed conflict;

28. Encourages the Security Council to continue to invite the office of the United Nations Emergency Relief Coordinator and other relevant United Nations agencies to brief its members on emergency situations which it deems to represent a threat to international peace and security, and to support the implementation of protection and assistance activities by relevant United Nations agencies in accordance with their respective mandates;

29. Notes the willingness of the Security Council to consider, in the context of United Nations peacekeeping operations, preventive deployments with the consent and cooperation of the Member States concerned;

30. Encourages the Security Council to give, as appropriate, greater attention to gender perspectives in all its activities aimed at the prevention of armed conflict;

31. Encourages the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council to strengthen their mutual cooperation and coordination, in accordance with their respective mandates, for the prevention of armed conflict;

Role of the Economic and Social Council

32. Supports the more active involvement of the Economic and Social Council with regard to the prevention of armed conflict, taking into account the relevant recommendations of the Secretary-General and the need to promote socio-economic measures, including economic growth, in support of poverty eradication and development, as a core element of Council strategy in that regard;

33. Welcomes Economic and Social Council resolution 2002/1 of 15 July 2002, which envisages the creation of ad hoc advisory groups on African countries emerging from conflicts, as well as Council decision 2002/304 of 25 October 2002, by which the Ad Hoc Advisory Group on Guinea-Bissau was created, requests the Council to present a report on the lessons learned by the ad hoc advisory groups during its substantive session of 2004, and recommends that such endeavours be further strengthened, including through measures that promote more effective responses in cooperation and coordination with the United Nations system as a whole, the Bretton Woods institutions and the World Trade Organization;

Role of the Secretary-General

34. Welcomes the intention of the Security Council to engage within the United Nations system in a focused dialogue on what practical measures the United Nations system needs to take to promote greater coherence in its activities aimed at the prevention of armed conflict, and recommends that consideration be given, inter alia, to identifying the proper framework for the elaboration of system-wide coherent and action-oriented strategies within the United Nations system, at Headquarters and in the field, and for rationalizing the funding procedures for the prevention of armed conflict;

35. Recalls, in that context, the need to strengthen the capacity of the United Nations for early warning, collection of information and analysis, as referred to in its resolution 47/120 A of 18 December 1992, and notes the relevant conclusions and recommendations endorsed in its resolution 56/225 of 24 December 2001;

36. Supports the intention of the Secretary-General to improve the use of means placed at his disposal and within his authority to facilitate the prevention of armed conflict, including through fact-finding missions and confidence-building measures;

Interaction between the United Nations and other international actors in the prevention of armed conflict: role of regional organizations and civil society

Regional organizations

37. Calls for the strengthening of cooperation, where appropriate, between the United Nations and regional organizations in the field of prevention of armed conflict, in accordance with their respective mandates, in particular in capacity-building and the coordination of their respective activities, and for that purpose requests the Secretary-General to present concrete proposals for enhancing Secretariat support of those activities within his comprehensive report;

38. Encourages the continuation of high-level United Nations/regional organizations meetings, including on the prevention of armed conflict, and requests the Secretary-General to keep the General Assembly informed accordingly;

39. Recognizes the important supporting role of civil society in the prevention of armed conflict, and invites it to continue to support efforts for the prevention of armed conflict and to pursue practices that foster a climate of peace, help to prevent or mitigate crisis situations and contribute to reconciliation.

Speaking after the adoption of the resolution, the Deputy Secretary-General said that, after two years of hard work, the Assembly had its first substantive resolution on the important issue of armed conflict prevention; she hoped it would become a landmark for UN efforts in that area. The Secretariat was committed to strengthening the capacity of the UN system to carry out more effectively its responsibilities for the prevention of armed conflict. It would submit a detailed review of the UN system capacity in the context of the comprehensive report on the implementation of the resolution that the Assembly had requested in paragraph 14.

Related action. The Security Council, on 30 January, adopted resolution 1460(2003) on children and armed conflict (see p. 788). The Council President issued, on 15 December, statement S/PRST/2003/27 on the protection of civilians in armed conflict (see p. 727).

Role of civil society in conflict prevention

Following the adoption of resolution 57/337 (see p. 50), the President of the General Assembly's fifty-seventh session organized, on 4 September, an open interactive dialogue on the role of civil society in the prevention of armed conflict. The aim of the meeting was to build on the momentum of the resolution in terms of follow-up activities; explore how best to link the work of civil society in conflict prevention with that of Governments and the United Nations; offer substantive content for permanent missions in New York to consider the core issues and respond to the concerns, questions and ideas of Member States; and update Member States about the work of the Global Partnership for the Prevention of Armed Conflict (see below).

In his report on the meeting, transmitted to the Assembly on 12 September [A/57/864], the Assembly President said that civil society organizations provided an array of capabilities and opportunities to supplement the role of Governments and the United Nations in conflict prevention. They could sometimes reach parties on the ground that Governments could not reach, and participants in the dialogue had noted that civil society organizations could also contribute to conflict prevention in the areas of analysis, partnership, sustainability and networks. However, interacting and coordinating with civil society remained a challenge for Governments and the United Nations; how to create strategic linkages among Governments, intergovernmental organizations and civil society to complement each other's work rather than impede or duplicate efforts was not well understood.

The Assembly President noted that, in response to the Secretary-General's 2001 report on the prevention of armed conflict [YUN 2001, p. 48], the Global Partnership for the Prevention of Armed Conflict was established to engage civil society actors from the grass roots to the international level in integrating and mainstreaming conflict prevention, with a view to improving international responses in preventing conflict at all levels. Its goals were: to explore fully the role of civil society in conflict prevention and peacebuilding; to develop a coherent body of research and theory to help the conflict prevention community play its full part in the international debate; to improve interaction between civil society groups, the United Nations, regional organizations and Governments; and to strengthen regional and international networking between conflict prevention actors. Secretariats for the project had been established at the European Centre for Conflict Prevention (Utrecht, Netherlands), with the UN-NGO (non-governmental organization) Conflict Prevention Working Group (New York), and in each region. Regional conferences to produce mutually agreed-upon regional plans of action would be followed by an international conference (New York, June 2005). Among the expected outcomes of the process were: regional publications documenting lessons learned and best practices; regional and international plans of action to guide conflict prevention initiatives; a global network of conflict prevention actors; commitments from Member States to realign existing conflict management mechanisms towards prevention; and support for Member States in their efforts to prevent conflict.

The President stated that the open meeting had shown that, while many questions and concerns existed about the engagement with civil society organizations, there was clear support for exploring and understanding the issues that would strengthen the partnerships among Governments, intergovernmental agencies and civil society in preventing deadly conflicts. Participating Member States recommended that: the Assembly examine its role in the prevention of violent conflict as it related to Article 14 of the Charter, and consider whether such issues should be regularly addressed in the Fourth (Special Political and Decolonization) Committee; the United Nations and Member States support the Global Partnership for the Prevention of Armed Conflict initiative; missions at UN Headquarters appoint a liaison to work with the UN-NGO Conflict Prevention Working Group; UN offices, agencies and programmes link with the Conflict Prevention Working Group and encourage their field offices to liaise with the coordinators of regional conferences; the UN Department of Political Affairs further explore how to establish consultation mechanisms with the Global Partnership in the process of preparing the report to the Assembly's fifty-ninth (2004) session; and Governments continue to support the process financially and other Member States and civil society organizations and foundations aid in the global initiative.

UN role in conflict prevention

Reports of Secretary-General. In a September report [A/58/323] on the implementation of the Millennium Declaration [YUN 2000, p. 49], the Secretary-General said that, as part of its efforts to better understand the current challenges and devise strategies to address them more effectively, the United Nations had to make even greater efforts to prevent the outbreak of violence well before internal tensions and conflicts eroded Governments and economies to the point of collapse. The UN system had been engaged in a comprehensive exercise to implement his 2001 report on the prevention of armed conflict [YUN 2001, p. 48] and to better carry out its obligations, including support of regional, subregional and national efforts to develop preventive strategies. General Assembly resolution 57/337 (see p. 50) on the prevention of armed conflict gave the United Nations a strong mandate to continue, expand and intensify its conflict prevention activities, and recognized the value of early warning in the prevention of armed conflict. The Secretary-General said that he intended to report more systematically on efforts to strengthen UN capacity in that area in his comprehensive report on conflict prevention, to be submitted in 2004.

He drew attention to the need for effective measures to address the economic incentives that established and maintained war economies, such as the Kimberley Process of diamond certification (see p. 55), and called for further measures against money-laundering. Also, more efforts were needed not only to punish actors involved in war economies but to provide viable economic alternatives.

In response to Assembly resolution 55/281 [YUN 2001, p. 50], the Secretary-General submitted, in September, an interim report on the prevention of armed conflict [A/58/365-S/2003/888], which provided an analytical overview of UN conflict prevention efforts, particularly in the areas of capacity-building, development assistance, human rights, the rule of law, regional dimensions, the role of women, preventive action and terrorism, disarmament, the role of major UN organs and international financial institutions, civil society, the private sector and training.

In elaborating a way forward, the Secretary-General said that, while some progress had been made in improving UN conflict prevention capacity, the Organization had to integrate conflict prevention further into its activities and build a more structured link between political and socio-economic strategies, ensuring that conflict prevention became a deliberate component in planning and coordinating development programmes. There should also be greater coherence and coordination of UN efforts in structural prevention at national, regional and international levels. Moreover, the UN system needed to strengthen its capacity for coordinating all international efforts; make further progress in responding to the political economy of armed conflicts, by exploring the policy aspects of the issues surrounding resource-based intra-State conflicts and the economic agendas of civil war and devising instruments for addressing war economies at all stages of a conflict; and devote greater attention to the potential threats posed by environmental problems, particularly the implications of the scarcity of certain natural resources, including the consideration of ways to build additional capacity to analyse and address potential threats of conflicts emanating from international natural resource disparities. The Secretary-General invited, in the context of resolution 57/337 (see p. 50), Member States, the UN system and its partners, regional organizations, international financial institutions and civil society to prepare for a substantial discussion on the way forward.

Implementation of JIU recommendations. In an August report [A/58/220] on the implementation of the 1995 recommendations [YUN 1995, p. 177], of the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) on strengthening the UN system capacity for conflict prevention [A/50/853], the Secretary-General indicated that, since the issuance of that report and his comments and those of the Administrative Committee on Coordination thereon [YUN 1997, p. 37], major developments had taken place in conflict prevention and JIU's recommendations had, in many cases, been implemented system-wide.

CEB consideration. The High-level Committee on Programmes of the United Nations System Chief Executives Board for Coordination (CEB), at its sixth session (Rome, Italy, 18-19 September) [CEB/2003/7], emphasized the need for comprehensive system-wide responses to ensure mutual reinforcement in the political, peacekeeping, peace-building and development areas of the system's work and the importance of close interaction with the UN Department of Political Affairs. It also suggested that the UN system would benefit from mechanisms to systematically channel political insights and information accumulated by field staff into the system's situational analysis process.

Conflict diamonds

Kimberley Process. Two meetings of the Kimberley Process, established in 2000 [YUN 2000, p. 76] to stem the flow of rough diamonds used by rebels to finance armed conflict, protect the legitimate diamond industry and achieve the creation and implementation of an international certification scheme for rough diamonds based on national certification schemes, were held in 2002 (Ottawa, Canada, 18-20 March, and Interlaken, Switzerland, 4-5 November). At the Interlaken meeting, Ministers and other heads of delegation adopted the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme, the text of which was annexed to the Interlaken Declaration on the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme for Rough Diamonds. They also committed themselves to the simultaneous launch of the Scheme on 1 January 2003 and reaffirmed their determination to monitor the trade in rough diamonds in order to prevent trade in conflict diamonds. South Africa would chair the Process in the first year of implementation.

On 17 January [S/2003/70], South Africa requested the Security Council to delay its consideration of the draft resolution on the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme (see below) until the Assembly had received the report on the Interlaken Declaration, so as not to pre-empt the debate in the Assembly.

On 29 January [A/57/489], in accordance with Assembly resolution 56/263 [YUN 2002, p. 44], South Africa submitted to the Assembly the final report on the Kimberley Process.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 28 January (meeting 4694), the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1459(2003). The draft [S/2003/54] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Noting with deep concern the linkage between the illicit trade in rough diamonds from certain regions of the world and the fuelling of armed conflicts that affect international peace and security,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions to control the illicit trade in rough diamonds, including resolutions 1173(1998) of 12 June 1998, 1306(2000) of 5 July 2000, 1343(2001) of 7 March 2001, 1385(2001) of 19 December 2001 and 1408(2002) of 6 May 2002,

Highlighting in particular resolution 1295(2000) of 18 April 2000, in which the Council welcomed the proposal that led to the adoption of the Interlaken Declaration of 5 November 2002 on the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme for Rough Diamonds,

Highlighting the importance of conflict prevention through efforts to hinder the fuelling of conflicts by illicit trade in rough diamonds, which is the very nature of the Kimberley Process,

Noting in particular the importance of the major diamond producing, trading, and processing countries participating in the Kimberley Process system of self-regulation,

Expressing its appreciation to the Governments of South Africa, Namibia, Belgium, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, Angola, Botswana, Canada and Switzerland for hosting meetings of the Kimberley Process,

Noting with appreciation the important contribution made by industry and civil society to the development of the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme,

Noting the decision made at the meeting held in Interlaken, Switzerland, on 5 November 2002 to launch the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme beginning on 1 January 2003,

Welcoming the progress achieved at the Interlaken meeting in developing the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme, including the adoption of the Interlaken Declaration,

1. Strongly supports the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme, as well as the ongoing process to refine and implement the regime, adopted at the Interlaken conference as a valuable contribution against trafficking in conflict diamonds, looks forward to its implementation, and strongly encourages the participants to further resolve outstanding issues;

2. Welcomes the voluntary system of industry self-regulation, as described in the Interlaken Declaration of 5 November 2002 on the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme for Rough Diamonds;

3. Stresses that the widest possible participation in the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme is essential and should be encouraged and facilitated, and urges all Member States to participate actively in the Scheme.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 15 April [meeting 83], the General Assembly adopted resolution 57/302 [draft: A/57/L.76/Rev.1 & Add.1] without vote [agenda item 27].

The role of diamonds in fuelling conflict: breaking the link between the illicit transaction of rough diamonds and armed conflict as a contribution to prevention and settlement of conflicts

The General Assembly,

Recognizing that the trade in conflict diamonds is a matter of serious international concern, which can be directly linked to the fuelling of armed conflict, the activities of rebel movements aimed at undermining or overthrowing legitimate Governments, and the illicit traffic in and proliferation of armaments, especially small arms and light weapons,

Recognizing also the devastating impact of conflicts fuelled by the trade in conflict diamonds on the peace, safety and security of people in affected countries, and the systematic and gross human rights violations that have been perpetrated in such conflicts,

Noting the negative impact of such conflicts on regional stability and the obligations placed upon States by the Charter of the United Nations regarding the maintenance of international peace and security,

Recognizing, therefore, that urgent action to curb the trade in conflict diamonds is imperative,

Recognizing also the positive benefits of the legitimate diamond trade to producing countries, and underlining the need for urgent international action to prevent the problem of conflict diamonds from negatively affecting the trade in legitimate diamonds, which makes a critical contribution to the economies of many of the producing, exporting and importing States, especially developing States,

Noting that the vast majority of rough diamonds produced in the world are from legitimate sources,

Recalling the Charter and all the relevant resolutions of the Security Council related to conflict diamonds, and determined to contribute to and support the implementation of the measures provided for in those resolutions,

Recalling also Security Council resolution 1459(2003) of 28 January 2003, in which the Council strongly supported the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme, as well as the ongoing process to refine and implement the regime, as a valuable contribution against trafficking in conflict diamonds,

Recalling further its resolutions 55/56 of 1 December 2000 and 56/263 of 13 March 2002, in which it called for the development of proposals for a simple and workable international certification scheme for rough diamonds, based primarily on national certification schemes and on internationally agreed minimum standards, under the Kimberley Process,

Believing that the introduction of the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme should substantially reduce the opportunity for conflict diamonds to play a role in fuelling armed conflict and should help to protect legitimate trade and ensure the effective implementation of the relevant resolutions on trade in conflict diamonds,

Recalling the objective of ensuring that the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme is simple, effective and pragmatic, that it does not impede the present legitimate trade in diamonds or impose an undue burden on Governments or industry, particularly smaller producers, and that it does not hinder the development of the diamond industry,

Acknowledging the important initiatives already taken to address the problem of conflict diamonds, in particular by the Governments of Angola, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Guinea and Sierra Leone and by other key producing, exporting and importing countries, and encouraging those Governments to continue the initiatives,

Acknowledging also the continued efforts of regional organizations and other groups of countries to curb conflict diamonds,

Welcoming the important contribution made by the diamond industry, in particular the World Diamond Council, as well as civil society, to assist international efforts to stop the trade in conflict diamonds,

Welcoming also the voluntary self-regulation initiatives for the diamond industry announced by the World Diamond Council, and recognizing that a system of such voluntary self-regulation will contribute, as described in the Interlaken Declaration of 5 November 2002 on the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme for Rough Diamonds, to ensuring the effectiveness of national systems of internal controls for rough diamonds,

Recognizing that the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme will be credible only if all participants have established internal systems of control designed to eliminate the presence of conflict diamonds in the chain of producing, exporting and importing rough diamonds within their own territories, while taking into account that differences in production methods and trading practices, as well as differences in institutional controls thereof, may require different approaches to meet minimum standards,

Welcoming the important contribution of the Kimberley Process, which was initiated by African diamond-producing countries,

Noting with appreciation that the Kimberley Process has pursued its deliberations on an inclusive basis, involving concerned stakeholders, including producing, exporting and importing States, the diamond industry and civil society,

Recognizing that State sovereignty should be fully respected and the principles of equality, mutual benefits and consensus should be adhered to,

Welcoming the Interlaken Declaration, which successfully launched the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme,

1. Notes with appreciation the report of the Chair of the Kimberley Process submitted pursuant to resolution 56/263, and congratulates the Governments, and the representatives of the regional economic integration organizations, the organized diamond industry and civil society participating in the Kimberley Process, on having finalized the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme;

2. Recognizes that the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme can help to ensure the effective implementation of relevant resolutions of the Security Council containing sanctions on the trade in conflict diamonds, and calls for full implementation of existing Council measures targeting the illicit trade in rough diamonds that play a role in fuelling conflict;

3. Strongly supports the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme presented in the form of the document entitled "Kimberley Process Certification Scheme";

4. Notes the commitment made at the Kimberley Process ministerial meeting on 5 November 2002 to ensure that measures taken to implement the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme for Rough Diamonds will be consistent with international trade rules;

5. Welcomes the decision to implement the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme from 1 January 2003;

6. Also welcomes the decision to collate and disseminate relevant statistical data on the production of and international trade in rough diamonds, as a tool for effective implementation;

7. Stresses that the widest possible participation in the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme is essential and should be encouraged and facilitated, and urges all Member States to participate actively in the Certification Scheme;

8. Welcomes the willingness expressed by the Government of South Africa to chair the Kimberley Process during its first year of implementation;

9. Requests the Chair of the Kimberley Process to present to the General Assembly at its fifty-eighth session a report on the implementation of the process;

10. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-eighth session the item entitled "The role of diamonds in fuelling conflict".

Implementation of 1970 Declaration

The General Assembly, by decision 58/516 of 8 December, included in the provisional agenda of its fifty-ninth (2004) session the item entitled "Review of the implementation of the Declaration on the Strengthening of International Security" [YUN 1970, p. 105].

Peacemaking and peace-building

Security Council role in settlement of disputes

On 13 May [meeting 4753], the Security Council discussed its role in the pacific settlement of disputes. Addressing the Council, the Secretary-General said that Chapter VI of the UN Charter, which dealt with the pacific settlement of disputes, stood at the heart of the Organization's system of collective security. While the framers of the Charter understood clearly the need for an enforcement mechanism and provided for the use of force against threats to international peace and security, their hopes for a better world lay in the peaceful resolution of armed conflicts. In recent years, the Council had used Chapter VI in various ways, including direct dialogue with the parties to conflict, working more closely with the Economic and Social Council and with regional and subregional organizations to prevent and resolve conflicts in Africa, use of the Secretary-General's good offices and encouraging him to appoint more special representatives and envoys, and fact-finding missions.

Those efforts had achieved mixed results, raising questions as to what had been learned from those experiences and what could be done better. The Secretary-General referred to the recommendations contained in his 2001 report on the prevention of armed conflict [YUN 2001, p. 48], in particular the use of regional prevention mechanisms, more frequent resort to the International Court of Justice and increased reporting by the UN system to the Security Council about serious violations of international law or of human rights, and about potential conflicts arising from ethnic, religious or territorial disputes, or from poverty or other factors. He suggested that the Council could help identify and address root causes early; ensure an integrated approach that would bring together all actors, including civil society; and support other UN organs in their efforts to resolve disputes or address volatile situations. He appealed to the Council to be imaginative, to use its influence and to focus on implementation and action.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 13 May [meeting 4753], following consultations among the Security Council members, the President made statement S/PRST/2003/5 on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council, guided by the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations, reaffirms its commitment to maintain international peace and security through effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace or other breaches of the peace and to bring about, by peaceful means and in conformity with the principles of justice and international law, the adjustment or settlement of international disputes or situations which might lead to a breach of the peace.

The Council recognizes that the United Nations and its organs can play an important role in preventing disputes arising between parties, in preventing existing disputes escalating into conflicts and in containing and resolving the conflicts when they occur. The Council recalls, in this regard, the successes of the United Nations in these areas.

The Council recalls that the Charter, particularly Chapter VI, sets forth the means and a framework for the pacific settlement of disputes.

The Council underscores the fact that efforts to strengthen the process of the peaceful settlement of disputes should be continued and made more effective.

The Council reiterates its commitment to make a wider and more effective use of the procedures and means enshrined in the provisions of the Charter regarding the pacific settlement of disputes, particularly Articles 33 to 38 (Chapter VI), as one of the essential components of its work to promote and maintain international peace and security.

The Council decides to continue to keep this item under review.

Cooperation with regional organizations

Security Council public meeting. On 11 April [meeting 4739], the Security Council held a high-level meeting with representatives of regional organizations (the African Union, the League of Arab States, the Organization of American States, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, the European Union, the Economic Community of West African States) on the theme "The Security Council and regional organizations: facing the new challenges to international peace and security".

In a summary of the discussions, transmitted to the Secretary-General on 25 April [S/2003/506], Mexico reported that the meeting provided an opportunity for sharing experiences regarding specific capacities, instruments for early warning, prevention, management and resolution of conflicts and exchange of information. Among the issues discussed were the need to pay attention to the root causes of instability and threats to peace and security and to find new ways of cooperation and coordination between the United Nations and regional organizations in the maintenance of peace and security. That cooperation should be based on the principle of complementarity so as to make the best use of the comparative advantages of each organization; it should also take place within a flexible framework. There was also a need to develop a comprehensive and integrated approach to conflict prevention, management and resolution.

The meeting proposed: holding a regular high-level dialogue between the Council and regional organizations; improving the exchange of information; establishing a global system to deal with the current challenges and threats to international peace and security; promoting early coordination between the Council and regional organizations before decisions were taken that might involve or affect them; and convening an international conference on international peace, under UN auspices, preceded by regional meetings on the subject.

High-level meeting between the UN and regional organizations. The fifth high-level meeting between the United Nations and regional organizations (New York, 29-30 July) was held under the theme "New challenges to international peace and security, including international terrorism". The 21 participating organizations examined potential threats to international security, such as civil wars and complex emergencies, the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, international terrorism, gross violations of human rights, genocide, organized crime and other threats, such as environmental degradation and the spread of diseases. As Chairman of the meeting, the Secretary-General transmitted the conclusions in identical letters to the Presidents of the General Assembly and the Security Council on 10 October [A/58/444-S/2003/1022]. He said that the meeting raised important questions relating to the strengthening of cooperation to respond to new challenges and reviewed the follow-up to its previous meetings on cooperation in conflict prevention and peacebuilding (YUN 2001, p. 56). The meeting also reaffirmed support for multilateralism and international institutions and for the international community to provide effective responses to current challenges to international peace and security. Concern was expressed by many that human rights should not be undermined in counter-terrorism efforts. Participants agreed on a framework for further cooperation in confronting challenges to international peace and security, including international terrorism.

Report of Secretary-General. The Secretary-General, in his report on the work of the Organization [A/58/1], gave examples of United Nations cooperation with regional organizations in the areas of peace and security, development and respect for human rights (see p. 12).

Electoral assistance

In his annual report on the work of the Organization [A/58/1], the Secretary-General stated that, from September 2002 to July 2003, the United Nations received 32 official requests for electoral assistance. Positive responses were provided to 20 of those requests, 9 remained under consideration and 3 could not be fulfilled.

In response to General Assembly resolution 56/159 [YUN 2001, p. 640], the Secretary-General submitted an August report on strengthening the role of the United Nations in enhancing the effectiveness of the principle of periodic and genuine elections and the promotion of democratization [A/58/212]. He said that the Organization provided four categories of electoral assistance: technical assistance; the organization and conduct of elections; observation or monitoring of elections; and participation where elections were expected to play a significant role in the peace-building phase of political negotiations. The last category was a relatively recent development, and experience suggested that it was highly valuable and should be encouraged. The provision of electoral assistance as a component of peacekeeping and peace-building missions had increased. Over the preceding two years, the Electoral Assistance Division had worked with major UN missions in Afghanistan, the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Sierra Leone. That was in part a reflection of the role that elections could play in solidifying peace-building efforts and providing alternative dispute resolution mechanisms that could replace the use of violence.

Justice and the rule of law

The Secretary-General, in a January report on the implementation of the recommendations of the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations [A/57/711], stated that the Executive Committee on Peace and Security Task Force for the Development of Comprehensive Rule-of-Law Strategies for Peace Operations had prepared a detailed report identifying rule-of-law-related expertise available within the UN system for assisting the UN Department of Peacekeeping Operations (DPKO) and field missions; governmental, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations that might be able to provide such expertise; possible arrangements for UN partners; and guidelines, manuals and handbooks for rule-of-law-related activities developed by the UN system. The Task Force proposals emphasized the need for the United Nations to consult more closely with local actors at the country level and engage them in a meaningful way in devising and undertaking rule-of-law initiatives in peace operations, so as not to impose a rule-of-law strategy on them.

The Special Committee, at its 2003 session [A/57/767], agreed that an essential element to sustained stability in a post-conflict environment was the strengthening and consolidation of local rule-of-law capacity, which should be the focus of attention of UN peacekeeping missions. It welcomed the report of the Executive Committee on Peace and Security Task Force (see above) and asked the Secretariat to report on the implementation of those recommendations in 2004, and to consult with Member States on the means for sharing information on available national rule-of-law resources with the Secretariat.

Security Council consideration. At a ministerial-level meeting on 24 September [meeting 4833] and on 30 September [meeting 4835], the Security Council discussed the issue of justice and the rule of law: the United Nations role. Opening the debate on 24 September, the Council President said that justice and the rule of law were vital for the proper functioning of States and were essential elements in creating and sustaining stable, peaceful and democratic States. The debate was therefore an opportunity to affirm again the central importance of the rule of law and justice in the work of the United Nations, and to ascertain how the international community could better prepare to support States coming out of conflict.

The Secretary-General stated that the Council had a responsibility to promote justice and the rule of law in its efforts to maintain international peace and security and to rebuild shattered societies. Through its many complex operations, the United Nations had learned that people lost faith in a peace process when they did not feel safe from crime, secure in returning to their homes, able to start rebuilding a normal life or confident that the injustices of the past would be addressed. Without credible machinery to enforce the law and resolve disputes, people resorted to violent or illegal means. A comprehensive approach to justice and the rule of law was required that encompassed the entire criminal justice chain and many issues beyond the criminal justice system. UN actions should be based on the Charter, UN standards for human rights and the administration of justice and the principles of international humanitarian law, human rights law, refugee law and criminal law. Local actors should be involved from the start, with the United Nations guiding and reinforcing, and leaving behind strong local institutions when it departed.

As to justice for victims of past crimes, ending the climate of impunity was vital to restoring public confidence and building international support to implement peace agreements. Transitional justice mechanisms had to concentrate not only on individual responsibility for serious crimes, but also on achieving national reconciliation. Criminal justice mechanisms should be tailored to meet the needs of victims and victim societies, with courts being supplemented with mechanisms such as truth and reconciliation commissions if necessary. There should be no amnesty for war crimes, genocide, crimes against humanity or other serious violations of international human rights and humanitarian law, but the rights of the accused should be scrupulously protected.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 24 September [meeting 4833], following consultations among Security Council members, the President made statement S/PRST/2003/15 on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council met at the ministerial level on 24 September 2003 to consider "Justice and the rule of law: the United Nations role". Ministers expressed their respective views and understandings on, and reaffirmed the vital importance of, these issues, recalling the repeated emphasis given to them in the work of the Council, for example in the context of the protection of civilians in armed conflict, in relation to peacekeeping operations and in connection with international criminal justice.

The statements made on 24 September demonstrated the abundant wealth of relevant experience and expertise that exists within the United Nations system and in the Member States. Ministers considered that it would be appropriate to examine further how to harness and direct this expertise and experience so that it would be more readily accessible to the Council, to the wider United Nations membership and to the international community as a whole, so that the lessons and experience of the past could be, as appropriate, learned and built on. The Council welcomed in particular the offer by the Secretary-General to provide a report which could guide and inform further consideration of these matters.

The Council invites all Members of the United Nations, and other parts of the United Nations system with relevant experience and expertise, to contribute to this process of reflection and analysis on these matters, beginning with the further meeting on this subject which will be convened on 30 September 2003.

During the Council's continued consideration of the issue on 30 September, the Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations said that it was time to fundamentally rethink the way in which the United Nations addressed the rule of law in post-conflict societies. The rule of law should figure more prominently from the early stages of peace negotiations, be recognized as a key element of any post-conflict effort, and be reflected by political actors and donors when drafting peace agreements, adopting and interpreting peacekeeping mandates and funding programmes.

Highlighting some of the steps taken over the preceding year to enhance UN rule-of-law capacities, the Under-Secretary-General pointed to the establishment, in February, of the Criminal Law and Judicial Advisory Unit within DPKO's Civilian Police Division. Rule-of-law focal points in 11 UN departments and agencies were conferring regularly on rule-of-law issues that arose in peacekeeping. The Criminal Law and Judicial Advisory Unit was also considering establishing a rule-of-law trust fund to draw upon the resources and expertise of entities outside the UN system to support rule-of-law aspects of peace operations.

On the subject of post-conflict justice, the Under-Secretary-General said that there was much that the Council could do to facilitate UN efforts. The Organization should conduct case-by-case assessments of all mechanisms available. In addition, there should be broader assistance and support to national justice systems. When domestic justice capacities collapsed, the Organization should mandate interim measures, including international support for the establishment of temporary courts, policing capacities and detention facilities, and the provision of provisional codes for criminal law and procedure.

The Under-Secretary-General concluded that there was no single approach to justice and the rule of law, and any strategy adopted should be tailored to the needs and conditions of the host country and have as its primary objective the promotion of national ownership of justice systems and capacity-building.

Political and peace-building missions in 2003

During 2003, 15 UN political and peace-building missions and offices were in operation: 9 in Africa, 1 in the Americas, 4 in Asia and the Pacific and 1 in the Middle East.

In Africa, the United Nations Mission in Angola completed its mandated political tasks and ended on 15 February. The mandate and size of the United Nations Office in Burundi were revised to include assistance to the Joint Ceasefire Commission. The Security Council extended the mandates of the United Nations Peace-building Office in the Central African Republic and of the United Nations Peace-building Support Office in Guinea-Bissau until 31 December 2004. The activities of the United Nations Political Office for Somalia were continued for the 2004-2005 biennium. The mandate of the Office of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for the Great Lakes Region was extended until 31 December 2004 and that of the United Nations

Peace-building Support Office in Liberia (UNOL) was expanded to include assistance to the Government in addressing capacity needs in the areas of human rights and the conduct of elections. Following further political developments in Liberia, the Secretary-General closed UNOL in September and transferred its functions to the new peacekeeping operation, the United Nations Mission in Liberia. In May, the Council authorized the establishment of the United Nations Mission in Côte d'Ivoire and, in November, extended its mandate to 4 February 2004.

In the Americas, the Organization continued to support the United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala, whose mandate was extended until 31 December 2003 by General Assembly resolution 57/161 [YUN 2002, p. 247].

In Asia and the Pacific, the mandate of the United Nations Political Office in Bougainville (UNPOB) (Papua New Guinea) was extended for a final period until 31 December 2003; on 23 December, the Council noted the Secretary-General's intention to establish for six months, as of 1 January 2004, a small United Nations Observer Mission in Bougainville to replace UNPOB. The mandate of the United Nations Assistance Mission in Afghanistan, which was extended for a 12-month period ending 28 March 2004, was to fulfil the tasks and responsibilities, including those related to human rights, the rule of law and gender issues, entrusted to the United Nations in the 2001 Bonn Agreement [YUN 2001, p. 263]. The mandate of the United Nations Tajikistan Office of Peace-building was extended to 1 June 2004. The United Nations Command continued to maintain the implementation of the 1953 Armistice Agreement [YUN 1953, p. 136] concerning the Korean peninsula.

During the year, the Council authorized visiting missions by its members to Afghanistan (31 October–8 November) (see p. 302), Central Africa (7–16 June) (see pp. 127 and 149) and West Africa (26 June–5 July) (see p. 163).

Threats to international peace and security

International terrorism

High-level meeting of the Security Council: combating terrorism

On 20 January [meeting 4688], the Security Council held a high-level meeting on combating terrorism.

The Secretary-General stated that the ministerial meeting showed the steady determination of the international community to address the scourge of terrorism and was a sign of the importance the world placed on dealing effectively with that global threat. However, the problem required sustained, long-term action to be addressed successfully. In that regard, the United Nations had to set effective international norms, issue a clear message on the unacceptability of violence targeting civilians and deny terrorists the opportunity to commit their appalling crimes. The Council's Counter-Terrorism Committee (CTC) (see p. 66) would continue to have a key role in that area, as would the common efforts to prevent the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. Greater efforts were needed to ensure universality, verification and full implementation of the key treaties relating to those weapons, tighten national export controls over the items needed to produce them, criminalize the acquisition or use of such weapons by non-State groups and sustain broad, international cooperation by clearly articulating the work of various international, regional and subregional organizations in that effort. The United Nations also had to provide the legal and organizational framework within which the international campaign against terrorism could unfold.

However, questions were being asked about the damage caused by the war on terrorism to the presumption of innocence, human rights, the rule of law and the very fabric of democratic governance. The danger was that, in pursuit of security, crucial liberties were being sacrificed, thereby weakening common security and corroding democratic government from within. Some States were using the fight against terrorism to threaten or justify new military action on long-running disputes, while others combating various forms of unrest or insurgency were finding it tempting to abandon political negotiation for military action.

The Secretary-General called on the United Nations and its Members not to lose sight of the broader international agenda in their fight against terrorism. While there was an urgent and compelling need to prevent acts of terror, there was a no less compelling need to pursue the goals enshrined in the Charter. To the extent that the Organization succeeded in combating poverty, injustice, suffering and war, it was also likely to help end the conditions that served as justification for those who would commit acts of terror.

The CTC Chairman briefed the Council on the Committee's work in fulfilment of resolution 1373(2001) [YUN 2001, p. 61] (see p. 66).

The Council adopted a declaration aimed at reinforcing the international community's mobilization against terrorism (see below).

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 20 January [meeting 4688], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1456(2003). The draft [S/2003/60] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council

Decides to adopt the attached declaration on the issue of combating terrorism.

Annex

The Security Council,

Meeting at the level of Ministers for Foreign Affairs on 20 January 2003, reaffirms that:

(a) Terrorism in all its forms and manifestations constitutes one of the most serious threats to peace and security;

(b) Any acts of terrorism are criminal and unjustifiable, regardless of their motivation, whenever and by whomsoever committed and are to be unequivocally condemned, especially when they indiscriminately target or injure civilians;

(c) There is a serious and growing danger of terrorist access to and use of nuclear, chemical, biological and other potentially deadly materials, and therefore a need to strengthen controls on these materials;

(d) It has become easier, in an increasingly globalized world, for terrorists to exploit sophisticated technology, communications and resources for their criminal objectives;

(e) Measures to detect and stem the flow of finance and funds for terrorist purposes must be urgently strengthened;

(f) Terrorists must also be prevented from making use of other criminal activities such as transnational organized crime, illicit drugs and drug trafficking, money-laundering and illicit arms trafficking;

(g) Since terrorists and their supporters exploit instability and intolerance to justify their criminal acts, the Council is determined to counter this by contributing to the peaceful resolution of disputes and by working to create a climate of mutual tolerance and respect;

(h) Terrorism can only be defeated, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and international law, by a sustained comprehensive approach involving the active participation and collaboration of all

States and international and regional organizations, and by redoubled efforts at the national level.

The Council therefore calls for the following steps to be taken:

1. All States must take urgent action to prevent and suppress all active and passive support to terrorism, and, in particular, comply fully with all relevant resolutions of the Council, in particular resolutions 1373(2001) of 28 September 2001, 1390(2002) of 16 January 2002 and 1455(2003) of 17 January 2003;

2. The Council calls upon States:

(a) To become parties, as a matter of urgency, to all relevant international conventions and protocols relating to terrorism, in particular the International Convention for the Suppression of the Financing of Terrorism of 9 December 1999, and to support all international initiatives taken with that aim, and to make full use of the sources of assistance and guidance which are now becoming available;

(b) To assist each other, to the maximum extent possible, in the prevention, investigation, prosecution and punishment of acts of terrorism, wherever they occur;

(c) To cooperate closely to implement fully the sanctions against terrorists and their associates, in particular Al-Qa'idah and the Taliban and their associates, as reflected in resolutions 1267(1999) of 15 October 1999, 1390(2002) and 1455(2003), to take urgent actions to deny them access to the financial resources they need to carry out their actions, and to cooperate fully with the Monitoring Group established pursuant to resolution 1363(2001);

3. States must bring to justice those who finance, plan, support or commit terrorist acts or provide safe havens, in accordance with international law, in particular on the basis of the principle to extradite or prosecute;

4. The Counter-Terrorism Committee must intensify its efforts to promote the implementation by Member States of all aspects of resolution 1373(2001), in particular by reviewing reports by States and facilitating international assistance and cooperation, and by continuing to operate in a transparent and effective manner, and in that regard the Council:

(a) Stresses the obligation of States to report to the Committee, according to the timetable set by the Committee, calls upon the 13 States that have not yet submitted a first report and on the 56 States that are late in submitting further reports to do so by 31 March, and requests the Committee to report regularly on progress;

(b) Calls upon States to respond promptly and fully to the requests for information, comments and questions of the Committee in full and on time, and instructs the Committee to inform the Council of progress, including any difficulties it encounters;

(c) Requests the Committee, in monitoring the implementation of resolution 1373(2001), to bear in mind all international best practices, codes and standards which are relevant to the implementation of resolution 1373(2001), and underlines its support for the approach of the Committee in constructing a dialogue with each State on further action required to implement fully resolution 1373(2001);

5. States should assist each other to improve their capacity to prevent and fight terrorism, and notes that such cooperation will help to facilitate the full and timely implementation of resolution 1373(2001), and invites the Counter-Terrorism Committee to step up its efforts to facilitate the provision of technical and other assistance by developing targets and priorities for global action;

6. States must ensure that any measures taken to combat terrorism comply with all their obligations under international law, and should adopt such measures in accordance with international law, in particular international human rights, refugee and humanitarian law;

7. International organizations should evaluate ways in which they can enhance the effectiveness of their action against terrorism, including by establishing dialogue and exchanges of information with each other and with other relevant international actors, and directs this appeal in particular to those technical agencies and organizations whose activities relate to the control of the use of or access to nuclear, chemical, biological and other deadly materials; in this context the importance of fully complying with existing legal obligations in the field of disarmament, arms limitation and non-proliferation and, where necessary, strengthening international instruments in this field should be underlined;

8. Regional and subregional organizations should work with the Counter-Terrorism Committee and other international organizations to facilitate sharing of best practice in the fight against terrorism, and to assist their members in fulfilling their obligation to combat terrorism;

9. Those participating in the special meeting of the Counter-Terrorism Committee with international, regional and subregional organizations on 7 March 2003 should use that opportunity to make urgent progress on the matters referred to in the present declaration which involve the work of such organizations;

The Council also:

10. Emphasizes that continuing international efforts to enhance dialogue and broaden understanding among civilizations, in an effort to prevent the indiscriminate targeting of different religions and cultures, to strengthen further the campaign against terrorism and to address unresolved regional conflicts and the full range of global issues, including development issues, will contribute to international cooperation and collaboration, which by themselves are necessary to sustain the broadest possible fight against terrorism;

11. Reaffirms its strong determination to intensify its fight against terrorism in accordance with its responsibilities under the Charter, takes note of the contributions made during its meeting on 20 January 2003 with a view to enhancing the role of the United Nations in this regard, and invites Member States to make further contributions to this end;

12. Invites the Secretary-General to submit within 28 days a report summarizing any proposals made during its ministerial meeting and any commentary or response to these proposals by any member of the Council;

13. Encourages States Members of the United Nations to cooperate in resolving all outstanding issues with a view to the adoption, by consensus, of the draft comprehensive convention on international terrorism and the draft international convention for the suppression of acts of nuclear terrorism;

14. Decides to review actions taken towards the realization of the present declaration at further meetings of the Council.

Follow-up to resolution 1456(2003)

Report of Secretary-General. In a February report [S/2003/191 & Add.1], the Secretary-General, in response to resolution 1456(2003) (see p. 63), submitted a summary of proposals made by Council members during its 20 January ministerial meeting as reflected in the provisional verbatim record [S/PV.4688] and written replies from four Council members (Chile, France, Russian Federation, Syrian Arab Republic). The proposals related to international instruments, international cooperation, the role of the international, regional and subregional organizations, assistance and CTC.

CTC action. In a 14 February letter [S/2003/198], the CTC Chairman submitted to the Security Council President a summary of the action in response to the Council's declaration contained in resolution 1456(2003).

Security Council consideration. The Security Council again discussed the question of threats to international peace and security caused by terrorist acts on 20 February [meeting 4710].

2003 terrorist incidents

Colombia

In an 8 February press statement [SG/SM/8599], the Secretary-General expressed his shock at the terrorist attack on a crowded social club in Bogotá, Colombia, on 7 February, and his sympathy for the victims and their families. He strongly condemned the bombing and all other terrorist attacks by any actor in the conflict.

The Security Council, in resolution 1465 (2003) (see p. 285) of 13 February, condemned the bomb attack and urged all States to work with and to support Colombia in finding and bringing the perpetrators, organizers and sponsors to justice.

Iraq

On 19 August, 15 UN staff members and seven others were killed, including the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Iraq, Sergio Vieira de Mello, and well over 100 were wounded in a bomb attack on UN headquarters in Baghdad, Iraq.

In a 20 August statement (S/PRST/2003/13) (see p. 347), the Security Council President condemned the terrorist attack and underlined the need to bring the perpetrators to justice.

The Russian Federation, on 19 August [S/2003/822], and Mali, on 22 August [A/58/315-S/2003/845], on behalf of the members of the Human Security Network (Austria, Canada, Chile, Greece, Ireland, Jordan, Mali, Netherlands, Norway, Slovenia, South Africa, Switzerland, Thailand), condemned the 19 August terrorist attack and expressed their condolences to the families of the victims.

In resolution 1511(2003) of 16 October (see p. 348), the Council condemned the terrorist bombings of the Embassy of Jordan in Iraq on 7 August, of the United Nations headquarters in Baghdad on 19 August, of Imam Ali Mosque in Najaf on 29 August and of the Embassy of Turkey in Iraq on 14 October, the murder of a Spanish diplomat on 9 October and the assassination of Dr. Akila al-Hashimi, who died on 25 September, and emphasized that those responsible should be brought to justice.

Turkey

On 15 November, two bombs exploded simultaneously in Istanbul, Turkey, near the Neve Shalom and Beth Israel Synagogues. At least 20 people were reported to have been killed and more than 300 wounded, mostly worshippers attending weekly Sabbath services.

On 20 November, 27 persons died and 450 others were wounded as a result of explosions that took place in Istanbul in front of the HSBC Bank Directorate General and 10 minutes later in front of the United Kingdom Consulate. The Consul General was among those killed.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 20 November [meeting 4867], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1516 (2003). The draft [S/2003/1106] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and its relevant resolutions, in particular its resolution 1373(2001) of 28 September 2001,

Reaffirming also the need to combat by all means, in accordance with the Charter, threats to international peace and security caused by terrorist acts,

1. Condemns in the strongest terms the bomb attacks in Istanbul, Turkey, on 15 and 20 November 2003 in which many lives were claimed and people injured, as well as other terrorist acts in various countries, and regards such acts, like any act of terrorism, as a threat to peace and security;

2. Expresses its deepest sympathy and condolences to the people and Governments of Turkey and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and to the victims of the terrorist attacks and their families;

3. Urges all States, in accordance with their obligations under resolution 1373(2001), to cooperate in efforts to find and bring to justice the perpetrators, organizers and sponsors of these terrorist attacks;

4. Expresses its reinforced determination to combat all forms of terrorism, in accordance with its responsibilities under the Charter of the United Nations.

Measures to eliminate international terrorism

During 2003, the United Nations pursued action on several fronts to combat and eliminate international terrorism. The General Assembly adopted resolution 58/48 (see p. 580) on measures to prevent terrorists from acquiring weapons of mass destruction, resolution 58/81 on measures to eliminate international terrorism (see p. 1339) and resolution 58/136 on strengthening international cooperation and technical assistance in promoting the implementation of the universal conventions and protocols related to terrorism within the framework of the activities of the Centre for International Crime Prevention of the UN Office on Drugs and Crime (see p. 1149).

The Security Council met five times to consider the work of its Counter-Terrorism Committee and adopted a number of statements (see below).

Communications. In letters dated 12 May [A/58/78-S/2003/541] and 13 May [A/57/812-S/2003/544], respectively, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Cuba responded to the sections relevant to their countries in a 30 April report published by the Office of the Coordinator for Counterterrorism of the United States Government.

On 10 September [S/2003/898], Georgia noted that United States President George W. Bush had, by an 8 August executive order, declared Shamil Basayev, who had assumed responsibility for various terrorist attacks in the Russian Federation, as dangerous for the United States and its citizens. Georgia joined the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States in requesting that the United Nations include Mr. Basayev in the list of dangerous terrorists.

On 11 September [S/2003/892], Italy, on behalf of the European Union (EU), in a statement to commemorate the 11 September 2001 terrorist attacks in the United States [YUN 2001, p. 60], said that the EU had adopted a wide and significant set of measures and had participated in the activities of international forums aimed at preventing and suppressing terrorism. It had also promoted political dialogue to raise awareness of the need for appropriate and effective domestic and international legislative measures.

On the same date [A/58/361-S/2003/877], and also in commemoration of the 11 September 2001 attacks in the United States, the Russian Federation said that it had adopted and would continue to adopt a firm and uncompromising position in the fight against terrorism.

Counter-Terrorism Committee

In 2003, the Counter-Terrorism Committee (CTC), established by Security Council resolution 1373(2001) [YUN 2001, p. 61], updated the consolidated directory of contact persons in each State, in a number of international/regional organizations and agencies, and in the UN Secretariat, who would provide information or assistance in connection with matters arising under resolution 1373(2001). The revisions were transmitted by the Committee Chairman to the Council President on 28 March [S/2002/1031/Rev.1], 22 July [S/2003/786] and 21 November [S/2003/1121].

The Chairman also submitted CTC's work programmes for the 90-day periods 1 January to 31 March [S/2003/72], 1 April to 30 June [S/2003/387], 1 July to 30 September [S/2003/710] (see p. 68) and 1 October to 31 December [S/2003/995]. The Council considered those reports at meetings held on 4 April, 6 May, 23 July and 16 October under the agenda item "Threats to international peace and security caused by terrorist acts".

In an 8 January note [S/2003/30], the Council President reported that Council members had agreed to elect Ismael Abraão Gaspar Martins (Angola), Adolfo Aguilar Zinser (Mexico) and Sergey Lavrov (Russian Federation) as Vice-Chairmen of CTC with immediate effect. Inocencio Arias (Spain) was elected as the next CTC Chairman. He would take over that position from Sir Jeremy Greenstock (United Kingdom) following the review of CTC's structure and activities, which would take place no later than 4 April.

Security Council consideration (January). The CTC Chairman, reporting to the Council on the Committee's work on 20 January [meeting 4688], said that, for all the progress made by CTC in monitoring and encouraging implementation of resolution 1373(2001), achieving real improvements in practice on the ground everywhere was taking too long. The over 280 reports received from 178 Member States in 15 months showed that the vast majority of Governments had begun to respond to the challenge to prevent and suppress terrorism; parliaments had begun to consider or to adopt new laws and Governments had reviewed the strength of their institutions to fight terrorism, and in some cases had already strengthened them. However, much more remained to be done to raise the bar against terrorism everywhere.

The Chairman suggested that States should begin to work towards the shared goal to further global implementation of resolution 1373(2001). Thirteen States had not yet submitted a report to CTC, 2 had made no contact with it and 11 were working on reports, 3 with outside assistance set up by CTC. The final date for submission of reports was 31 March, after which any non-reporting State would be held to be non-compliant with resolution 1373(2001). States needed to improve their implementation of that resolution, including by becoming party to the 12 conventions and protocols on terrorism [YUN 2001, p. 69].

CTC had not as yet initiated action on paragraph 4 of resolution 1373(2001) on the potential links between terrorism and other forms of international organized crime. However, the structures that the Committee was helping to put in place for counter-terrorism might have a wider value and effectiveness in strengthening the capacity of Governments against international crime of all kinds. There might be advantages also for the Council's work against the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction.

On 31 March [S/2003/404 & Corr.1], the CTC Chairman, recalling that the Council, in resolution 1456(2003), had requested Member States to submit all outstanding first and subsequent reports by 31 March, stated that 351 reports had been received from 188 Member States and five others by that date. The annex to the Chairman's letter indicated that three States had failed to submit a report by the 31 March deadline and had not availed themselves of the Committee's offer of advice and guidance. A total of 41 States had failed to meet the 31 March deadline for the submission of all outstanding second reports and 32 of them were more than three months late. The Chairman suggested that the issue of States' obligation to report to the Committee be considered soon by the Council.

Security Council consideration (April). Reporting to the Council on 4 April [meeting 4734], the CTC Chairman, referring to the Committee's seventh 90-day work programme [S/2003/387], said that the Council should decide what further action to take with respect to the three States that had still not submitted even a preliminary report and the 51 States that had not met the deadline set by CTC for subsequent reports.

For those States that were furthest ahead in their reporting, CTC was moving from examining legislation to establishing the existence of adequate and effectively functioning executive machinery. As it moved into stages B and C—the existence and utilization of government machinery to prevent terrorist activities and bring terrorists to justice—CTC would need to deepen its understanding of what was required of States, and communicate that to Governments. States had to be proactive in their response, setting their own benchmarks or using their regional organizations to do so.

A meeting hosted by the CTC Chairman on 6 March with representatives of some 60 international, regional and subregional organizations with counter-terrorism programmes was important for establishing a global structure. Participants recognized that every organization had its own role and mandate, but agreed that, by working together, they could shorten the journey and add more value to the fight against terrorism. In practical terms, creating a global network meant a better flow of information. The CTC web site would be expanded to host the best information, in a user-friendly format. CTC would further develop the list of contact points, making contacts as simple as possible. The CTC Chairman encouraged all States and international, regional and subregional organizations to use those contact points and the information about what others were doing to develop collective action.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 4 April [meeting 4734], following consultations among Security Council members, the President made statement S/PRST/2003/3 on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council welcomes the briefing by the Chairman of the Counter-Terrorism Committee on the work of the Committee.

The Council recalls the statement by its President of 8 October 2002 (S/PRST/2002/26), which recorded the intention of the Council to review the structure and activities of the Counter-Terrorism Committee no later than 4 April 2003. The Council thanks Sir Jeremy Greenstock, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, for his chairmanship of the Committee during the first 18 months of its work, and confirms the appointment of Mr. Arias, of Spain, as the new Chairman. The Council also confirms the continuation in office of Mr. Gaspar Martins, of Angola, Mr. Aguilar Zinser, of Mexico, and Mr. Lavrov, of the Russian Federation, as Vice-Chairmen of the Committee.

The Council invites the Counter-Terrorism Committee to pursue its agenda as set out in the work programme for the Committee for the seventh 90-day period.

The Council notes that 3 States have not yet submitted a report to the Counter-Terrorism Committee, and that 51 Member States are late in submitting a further report, in contravention of the requirements set out in resolution 1373(2001) of 28 September 2001. It calls upon them urgently to do so, in order to maintain the universality of response which resolution 1373(2001) requires.

Security Council consideration (May). The Prime Minister of Spain, José María Aznar, whose country took over the chairmanship of CTC in April, told the Security Council on 6 May [meeting 4752] that the strategic challenge posed by terrorism required more ambitious collective responses. The Council should strengthen CTC and enhance the means available to it and its capacity for supervision, facilitating assistance to countries, and coordination with other international and regional organizations. Cooperation with disarmament agencies, especially those responsible for weapons of mass destruction, should be a priority. To increase CTC's operational capability and visibility, the Council should consider empowering it to draw up a general list of terrorist organizations, similar to the list kept by the Committee established by resolution 1267(1999) [YUN 1999, p. 265] on Al-Qaida and the Taliban (see p. 312). It was essential to strengthen mechanisms for curbing the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and the availability of such weapons to terrorist groups. Existing measures to cut off financing to and dismantle financial networks that provided resources to terrorists should also be improved.

Zero tolerance for terrorism should come first in any code of conduct promulgated by the international community, and counter-terrorism assistance should be regularly incorporated into international, bilateral and multilateral cooperation programmes. The World Bank, the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the Group of Eight major industrialized nations (G-8) should play a particularly relevant role in that area. The Council should elaborate procedures to prevent terrorist groups from using the UN system as a platform for conveying their violent message to the world, and set up an institutional mechanism within the UN framework as a forum for terrorism victims to speak out. It should also address the social factors that terrorist organizations used as excuses, and foster dialogue among civilizations, religions and cultures.

Security Council consideration (July). On 23 July [meeting 4792], the CTC Chairman presented to the Security Council the Committee's 90-day work programme for the period 1 July to 30 September [S/2003/710]. He described the scope of CTC's activity over the preceding year, noting that, as at 30 June 2003, 37 States were parties to the 12 conventions and protocols related to the fight against terrorism [YUN 2001, p. 69], compared to only two in September 2001, and that 385 reports had been received from Member States. However, in the short term, CTC faced two important challenges. The first related to technical assistance to those States that demonstrated genuine political will to fight terrorism but had difficulties implementing resolution 1373(2001) [ibid., p. 61]. The Directory of Counter-Terrorism Information and Sources of Assistance and the Matrix of Assistance were no longer adequate. CTC needed to adopt a more proactive role and ensure that the needs of those States were met, while promoting and coordinating available international assistance towards those priorities it was currently identifying. The second challenge was to tighten the links between CTC and relevant international, regional and subregional organizations. The plan of action adopted at the 6 March meeting with those organizations (see p. 67) had been implemented and had produced good results. The Chairman drew attention to the contacts between CTC and the Organization for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons, the World Customs Organization, Interpol and the International Atomic Energy Agency, which highlighted the danger represented by terrorist groups having access to weapons of mass destruction or to radioactive, chemical or biological material. The latter threat had not been given sufficient attention and CTC intended to remain seized of the matter.

Security Council consideration (October). The Security Council President, in a 3 October note [S/2003/935], indicated that, in the light of the Council's decision in statement S/PRST/2003/3 (see p. 67) to review CTC structure and activities by 4 October, Council members had agreed that the review would take place during October. CTC Chairman Inocencio Arias would report to the Council on CTC activities.

On 16 October [meeting 4845], the CTC Chairman informed the Council that CTC's rate of review of reports submitted by States had slowed down somewhat compared to previous periods because of the more complex phase of the work. As States moved from stage A (verifying that adequate anti-terrorist legislation was in place) to stage B (actual implementation of those measures), the Committee had taken more time to review reports and draft letters, and had to find a balance between the amount of attention given to States at both stages. For that purpose, CTC had prepared a working paper on the criteria for the drafting of letters and the need to give attention to all States in line with the principle of equal treatment, while providing flexibility for proper follow-up of States' efforts to implement resolution 1373(2001). By 30 September, CTC had received a total of 419 reports from Member States and others, including 196 initial reports, 102 second reports and 71 third reports. Although all Member States had submitted initial reports, 48 States were late in responding. The Committee agreed that the Chairman would present to the Council, no later than 31 October, a list of States that had not submitted their reports on time at that date.

CTC's work had included, at one of its meetings, consideration of the issue of States becoming parties to the relevant international conventions and protocols relating to terrorism. Its team of experts had presented a report on the status of State participation and of the positive impact of resolution 1373(2001) and of the work of the Committee itself. CTC continued to apply to its working methods the criteria of coordination, transparency and equality of treatment to each case. It was working to ensure a more active approach for collaborating with those States facing difficulties in implementing resolution 1373(2001). With regard to transparency, the Committee's web page had been completely redesigned to provide for easier and quicker consultation. The English version was fully operative and the French and Spanish would be ready shortly. The web page would also be available soon in Arabic, Chinese and Russian. CTC had strengthened ties with international, regional and subregional organizations, and those working more directly in the fight against terrorism. On 7 October, a second meeting was held with those organizations in Washington, D.C., at which a great deal of information was exchanged. The next meeting was scheduled for March 2004 in Vienna. The Committee would continue, as its main priorities, to follow closely the flow of information exchanges with States, provide technical assistance and ensure adequate coordination of counter-terrorism efforts by international and regional organizations in combating terrorism.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 16 October [meeting 4845], following consultations among Security Council members, the President made statement S/PRST/2003/17 on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council welcomes the briefing by the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 1373(2001) concerning counter-terrorism (the Counter-Terrorism Committee) on the work of the Committee.

The Council reaffirms that terrorism in all its forms and manifestations constitutes one of the most serious threats to peace and security and that any acts of terrorism are criminal and unjustifiable, regardless of their motivation, whenever and by whomsoever committed.

The Council recalls the statement by its President of 4 April 2003, which recorded the intention of the Council to review the structure and activities of the Counter-Terrorism Committee no later than 4 October 2003. The Council confirms the continuation of the current arrangements for the Bureau of the Committee for a further six months. It invites the Committee to pursue its agenda as set out in the work programme for the Committee for the ninth 90-day period, focusing on practical measures designed to increase the means available to States to combat terrorism, helping States to identify the problems faced by States in implementing resolution 1373(2001) of 20 September 2001, attempting to find solutions to them, working to increase the number of States which are parties to the international conventions and protocols related to counter-terrorism, and deepening its dialogue with international, regional and subregional organizations active in the areas covered by the resolution. The Council invites these organizations to continue to find ways of improving their collective action against terrorism and, where appropriate, to work with donor States to establish suitable programmes.

The Council notes that 48 Member States are late in submitting their reports as called for in resolution 1373(2001). It calls upon them urgently to do so, in order to maintain the universality of response which resolution 1373(2001) requires. By 31 October 2003 the Chairman of the Counter-Terrorism Committee will forward to the Council the list of the States which, at that date, are late in submitting their reports.

The Council invites the Counter-Terrorism Committee to continue reporting on its activities at regular intervals and expresses its intention to review the structure and activities of the Committee no later than 4 April 2004.

Report of CTC Chairman. On 31 October [S/2003/1056 & Corr.2], the CTC Chairman, in accordance with the Committee's ninth 90-day work programme [S/2003/995] and presidential statement S/PRST/2003/17 (see above), presented to the Security Council the list of the 56 States that had failed to meet the 31 October deadline for the submission of outstanding second and third reports on measures they had adopted to implement resolution 1373(2001).

Reports of States. Between January and December, the CTC Chairman transmitted to the Council President reports submitted by Member States on action they had taken or planned to take to implement resolution 1373(2001) and letters from the Committee requesting follow-up information: [S/2003/15-26, S/2003/127-129, S/2003/145-147,

S/2003/179-180, S/2003/258-266, S/2003/267 & Add.1, S/2003/268-280, S/2003/307-308, S/2003/346, S/2003/353-356, S/2003/361, S/2003/383-386, S/2003/388, S/2003/402-403, S/2003/420, S/2003/424-429, S/2003/433-448, S/2003/451 & Corr.1, S/2003/452-464, S/2003/471, S/2003/473-497, S/2003/513, S/2003/521, S/2003/526, S/2003/531-537, S/2003/552, S/2003/568, S/2003/583-598, S/2003/622-628, S/2003/631-634, S/2003/646-651, S/2003/670-671, S/2003/676, S/2003/700-702, S/2003/710, S/2003/719-725, S/2003/729, S/2003/734-748, S/2003/773-776, S/2003/787-790, S/2003/816, S/2003/833, S/2003/837-842, S/2003/852, S/2003/854, S/2003/856, S/2003/860-862, S/2003/868-871, S/2003/894, S/2003/896-897, S/2003/903-906, S/2003/908-912, S/2003/915, S/2003/953-965, S/2003/964-968, S/2003/978-979, S/2003/997-1012, S/2003/1014-1015, S/2003/1018, S/2003/1036-1044, S/2003/1050, S/2003/1057-1065, S/2003/1084-1086, S/2003/1103-1104, S/2003/1117-1119, S/2003/1122-1133, S/2003/1140, S/2003/1150-1156].

CTC conference and support services

The Secretary-General, in his second performance report on the 2002-2003 programme budget [A/58/558], indicated that total estimated CTC conference-servicing requirements for 2002-2003 would amount to $12,425,900, and related support services requirements would total $587,700. Taking into account the amounts already appropriated for the biennium in General Assembly resolution 57/292 [YUN 2002, p. 1375] ($6,531,900 for conference servicing and $364,200 for support services), an additional appropriation of $5,094,100 was required to cover the balance of the requirements for the biennium.

The appropriation was approved in Assembly resolution 58/267 A of 23 December (see p. 1397).

The Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly in December revised estimates under sections of the proposed 2004-2005 programme budget relating to conference and support services for CTC. Because of the extraordinary nature of CTC activities, requirements for those services were not initially included in the 2004-2005 proposed programme budget (see p. 1399). Following the pattern of requests made in the first and second years of the 2002-2003 biennium [YUN 2002, p. 56], resources amounting to $4,843,750 were being requested for 2004 only.

The Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ), in a 3 December report [A/58/7/Add.17] on the Secretary-General's proposals, recommended that the Assembly authorize him to enter into commitments in the amount of $4,193,000 and that any additional appropriations required be dealt with in the context of the first performance report for the 2004-2005 biennium, which should include detailed information on expenditures for 2004.

The Assembly, in resolution 58/272 (see p. 1417), appropriated $8,193,000 to support CTC's meeting requirements for the 2004-2005 biennium.

Action by Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice

The Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice, at its twelfth session (13-22 May) [E/2003/30], recommended to the Economic and Social Council for approval a draft resolution for adoption by the General Assembly entitled "Strengthening international cooperation and technical assistance in promoting the implementation of the universal conventions and protocols related to terrorism within the framework of the activities of the Centre for International Crime Prevention". That resolution was approved by the Council as resolution 2003/22 and adopted by the Assembly as resolution 58/136 (see p. 1149).

IAEA action

The General Conference of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), at its forty-seventh session (Vienna, 15-19 September) (see p. 1505), adopted resolution GC(47)/RES/8 relating to progress on measures to protect against nuclear and radiological terrorism. It called on member States to continue providing political, financial and technical support to improve nuclear and radiological security and prevent nuclear and radiological terrorism, and to support the Nuclear Security Fund.

Action by other organizations to combat terrorism

On 22 January 2003 [S/2003/85], the Secretary-General transmitted to the Security Council President a 6 December 2002 letter from the Secretary General of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), in which he communicated the decisions taken at the Prague Summit of Heads of State and Government (21-22 November 2002) relevant to the fight against terrorism. Those decisions included the creation of a NATO Response Force, approval of the Prague Capabilities Commitment to improve and develop new military capabilities for modern warfare in a high-threat environment, and endorsement of a military concept for defence against terrorism.

On 6 June [A/57/826-S/2003/637], France transmitted to the Secretary-General the statement adopted by the G-8 heads of State and Government at their 2003 Summit (Evian, 29 May-3 June) on securing radioactive sources as part of the fight against the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. Annexed to the statement was the G-8 Action Plan aimed at preventing acts of radiological terrorism.

On 20 November [A/58/608], Lithuania transmitted to the Secretary-General a summary of the seminar, organized in cooperation with the UN Office on Drugs and Crime (Vilnius, 6-7 November), on the theme "Ratification and implementation of the universal anti-terrorism instruments in the Baltic States".

On 3 December [A/58/619], Tajikistan transmitted to the Secretary-General the text of a 27 November statement by the States of the Collective Security Treaty Organization (Armenia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Russian Federation, Tajikistan) on their efforts to build a counter-terrorism capacity.

Peacekeeping operations

In 2003, the United Nations continued to manage its peacekeeping operations through implementation of the recommendations contained in the report of the Panel on United Nations Peace Operations (Brahimi report) [YUN 2000, p. 83] and those of the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations, whose mandate was to review the whole question of peacekeeping operations in all their aspects. The Special Committee held a general debate on 3 and 4 March, during which it approved a number of recommendations for submission to the General Assembly. It also considered other general issues related to peacekeeping operations and made recommendations for improving their effectiveness.

General aspects of UN peacekeeping

Nobel Peace Prize Memorial Fund

The Secretary-General, on 21 May [A/57/816], submitted to the General Assembly the report requested by the Assembly President on the disposition of the financial award of approximately $1 million of the 2001 Nobel Peace Prize (YUN 2001, p. 46) to the Secretary-General and the United Nations. He referred to his earlier decision to establish the United Nations Peace Prize Memorial Fund for the receipt and administration of the proceeds of the Nobel Peace Prize and to donate his share of that award to the Fund, which would provide financial assistance for the education of children of United Nations civilian personnel killed in the line of duty in the service of peace. It would function as a special account under the Financial Regulations and Rules of the United Nations, and could also receive and administer further contributions.

The Secretary-General believed that it would be appropriate to use the entire award for those who had made the greatest sacrifice by giving their lives for the cause of peace, and was therefore seeking the Assembly's concurrence regarding the disposition of the United Nations portion of the Prize.

By decision 57/586 of 29 May, the Assembly decided that the United Nations portion of the 2001 Nobel Peace Prize should be donated to the United Nations Nobel Peace Prize Memorial Fund.

Security Council Working Group on Peacekeeping Operations

By a 7 January note [S/2003/12], the Security Council President reported that Council members had agreed that Cristián Maquieira (Chile) would serve as Chairman of the Security Council Working Group on Peacekeeping Operations until 31 December, replacing Wegger Christian Srommen (Norway).

On 18 December [S/2003/1184], the Council President stated that Council members had agreed that the Working Group would continue its work until 31 December 2004.

Standby arrangements and rapid deployment

The Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations, at its 2003 session (3-4 March) [A/57/767], reiterated the validity of the goal of enhancing UN capacity to deploy peacekeeping operations within 30 days, or 90 days in the case of a complex operation, after the adoption of a mandate, and its belief that, to meet those time frames, the Secretariat should have the capacity to act in a timely manner on the three interdependent aspects of personnel, materiel readiness and funding.

Regarding personnel, the Special Committee encouraged the Secretariat to focus on improving predeployment training and preparations of UN on-call mechanisms, and better cooperation among field units of troop-contributing countries. It welcomed the progress made towards making operational the on-call lists and rosters and the Rapid Deployment Team, and encouraged further training of relevant personnel. In that regard, it noted the upcoming On-Call List Training Course (Hungary, 13-22 May) and the Command Post Exercise (Argentina, June), and asked the Secretariat to share the outcome of those exercises with Member States. The Committee encouraged DPKO to investigate the possibility of a short-term assignment of some of its military officers with the civilian Rapid Deployment Teams and to assist the core planning team deployed in the field during the first phase of a mission. It welcomed the introduction of the civilian police on-call roster, the model police headquarters and corresponding job descriptions as important steps towards preparing for the rapid deployment of civilian police.

In the area of materiel readiness, the Special Committee supported the continuing development of the strategic deployment stocks at the UN Logistics Base (UNLB) at Brindisi, Italy, and the establishment of management mechanisms, policies and procedures to ensure their effective use. Recognizing that many troop-contributing countries faced logistical support problems, the Committee recommended that the United Nations continue to assist countries to overcome shortfalls in contingent-owned equipment or self-sustainability difficulties. The Secretariat should submit the results of its ongoing consideration of ways to overcome equipment shortfalls faced by troop-contributing countries.

In relation to funding, the Special Committee reiterated its request that the Secretariat report before its next session on the difficulties troop-contributing countries faced in complying with rapid deployment requirements and recommend ways of overcoming those difficulties, including the financial aspects. To that end, the Committee requested the creation of a working group to consider the issue, including ways to assure timely reimbursement in the rapid deployment phase.

Concerning strategic lift, the Special Committee welcomed efforts to clarify capabilities regarding specialized enabling resources and strategic lift capabilities, and recommended that DPKO provide Member States with detailed requirements regarding enabling resources. It supported the contracting of private companies to provide the required capabilities. It encouraged the Secretariat to continue to secure firm pledges for strategic lift, and urged those with the means to do so to make such pledges to the United Nations Standby Arrangements System.

Communication. The Secretary-General, in a 4 March letter to the Security Council President [S/2003/284], sought the Council's approval to discontinue the periodic reporting on the progress of the arrangements for standby units and resources, as requested by the Council in statement S/PRST/1994/22 [YUN 1994, p. 118], and to consolidate the reporting on those arrangements in the annual report to the Special Committee. Troop-contributing countries would continue to receive an annual oral briefing on the subject.

On 7 March [S/2003/285], the Council approved the Secretary-General's proposal.

Strategic deployment stocks

In response to General Assembly resolution 56/292 [YUN 2002, p. 64], the Secretary-General submitted a 12 March report on the status of the implementation of the strategic deployment stocks [A/57/751]. He stated that the DPKO Office of Mission Support had developed a detailed project plan for the phased establishment of those critical stocks at UNLB. The plan, which would enable the deployment of a traditional mission headquarters and of traditional and complex missions, took into account the concurrent development of the human resources capacity and the physical infrastructure necessary to receive, inspect and store strategic deployment stocks assets. A phased requisitioning and delivery plan was also developed, based on the use of systems contracts as the procurement strategy to ensure continuity, uniformity and ease of replenishment. Italy, as part of its voluntary contributions in kind to the United Nations, was constructing three warehouses at UNLB. The Office of Mission Support had undertaken a detailed analysis of the property management needs, including the development of a comprehensive inventory management system. In January, DPKO conducted a pilot exercise in rapid deployment at UNLB.

The current strategic deployment stocks holdings at UNLB exceeded $32.5 million in value, including equipment transferred from DPKO's reserve and surplus stocks from peacekeeping operations. As at 20 February, out of the total budget of $141,546,000 approved by the Assembly in resolution 56/292 to meet the requirements of the strategic deployment stocks, expenditures and pre-encumbrances amounted to $115,783,000, including general temporary assistance. The Secretary-General therefore proposed that the validity period in respect of those approved resources be extended to 30 June 2004. The Secretary-General also reported on efforts to improve the procedures for liquidating closed missions.

In an April report [A/57/772/Add.9], ACABQ stated that it had no objection to the Secretary-General's proposal to extend the validity period of resolution 56/292 and recommended that he consolidate the report on the implementation of the strategic deployment stocks with that on UNLB budget and performance.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 June [meeting 90], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee [A/57/656/Add.1], adopted resolution 57/315 without vote [agenda item 126].

Status of the implementation of the strategic deployment stocks

Recalling its resolution 56/292 of 27 June 2002 concerning the establishment of the strategic deployment stocks,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the status of the implementation of the strategic deployment stocks and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General;
2. Endorses the conclusions and recommendations contained in the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, and requests the Secretary-General to ensure their full implementation, subject to the provisions of the present resolution;
3. Decides to extend the validity period in respect of the resources approved in its resolution 56/292 to 30 June 2004;
4. Recalls paragraph 2 of its resolution 56/292, and requests the Secretary-General to include the procurement statistics in future reports;
5. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to submit to it separate reports on the implementation of the strategic deployment stocks and on the budget and performance of the United Nations Logistics Base at Brindisi, Italy, at its fifty-eighth session.

Consultations with troop contributors

The Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations [A/57/767] reiterated the need for substantive and meaningful consultations and cooperation between the Security Council, the Secretariat and the troop-contributing countries (TCCs). It believed that the meetings and mechanisms established by Council resolution 1353 (2001) [YUN 2001, p. 80] and the Council President's January 2002 note [YUN 2002, p. 65] had improved the consultation process. It recommended that consultative meetings should be more transparent and that all potentially significant actors should be informed beforehand of those meetings.

The Special Committee welcomed the Secretary-General's commitment that cooperation between the Secretariat and TCCs would remain a high priority for the Secretariat in 2003. It urged the Secretariat to consult with TCCs in a timely manner when planning any change in the tasks, rules of engagement, operational concepts or command and control structure affecting personnel, equipment, training and logistics requirements, or a drawdown of troops in any peacekeeping operation. Member States concerned should be fully consulted and provided with a timely account of UN investigations or inquiries into incidents involving possible responsibility on the part of any of their personnel. They should also be involved in the investigation of cases where the loss of or damage to property or death or personal injury was alleged to have been caused by gross negligence or wilful misconduct of nationally contributed personnel or equipment, and therefore a TCC could be seen as liable for such claims. The outcome of the investigation should be made available to the TCC to enable its national authorities to consider questions of legal liability.

The Special Committee recommended that the Secretariat develop additional modalities for information-sharing with TCCs and other personnel contributors. In that regard, it commended DPKO for conducting the first course for TCCs, New York-based military advisers, civilian police advisers and/or officials responsible for peacekeeping issues at permanent missions, and encouraged DPKO to hold the course annually. DPKO was encouraged to make more use of issue-specific workshops and briefings to pursue a focused cooperation with Member States on questions related to peacekeeping, and to consult with them in developing and updating peacekeeping-related guidelines and policy documents. It should provide access for Member States to a comprehensive and up-to-date list of existing and anticipated peacekeeping-related policy papers, guidelines, manuals, standard operating procedures and training materials and to any peacekeeping-related documents, including through the Internet. It recommended that TCCs and DPKO should improve communication relating to pre-deployment visits.

Safety and security

The Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations [A/57/767], expressing grave concern about the continuing attacks and other acts of violence against UN and associated personnel, stressed that host countries and others should take steps to ensure their safety and security, including a legal regime with no impunity for the perpetrators of such attacks. The Committee urged those States that had not done so to consider becoming parties to the 1994 Convention on the Safety of United Nations and Associated Personnel, adopted by General Assembly resolution 49/59 [YUN 1994, p. 1289] (see p. 1340). It emphasized that status-of-forces and status-of-mission agreements should include specific measures to enhance personnel safety and security, based on the Convention.

The Special Committee stressed the need to expedite consultations to delineate clear lines of responsibility and ensure close coordination between the Office of the United Nations Security Coordinator and DPKO, and requested that the outcome of those consultations be conveyed to Member States. It noted the need to further improve information collection, analysis and dissemination at Headquarters and in the field, and recommended that DPKO's strengthened capacity, especially that of the Situation Centre, be utilized for that purpose.

As the majority of recent incidents involving the death or injury of UN peacekeeping personnel resulted from accidents, the Special Committee welcomed the establishment of a safety council to promote safety awareness, and encouraged Member States to share with the Secretariat relevant information on national safety programmes. The Secretariat should report on its work to formalize a policy on protection from nuclear, biological and chemical threats in the field. The Special Committee noted the progress achieved by DPKO in ensuring the safety of air operations in peacekeeping operations, in particular through the implementation of international aviation standards, rigorous contractual procedures and continuous monitoring of the Department's aviation operations.

The Secretariat should ensure that expeditious, comprehensive, impartial and transparent investigations or inquiries were conducted into incidents leading to loss of life or serious injury among UN peacekeeping personnel and provide TCCs with the results at the earliest stage possible. Early implementation of standard operating procedures to avoid repetition of such accidents should be encouraged, and TCCs of the concerned mission should be provided with information on the actual measures implemented.

Women and peacekeeping

Report of Secretary-General. In response to General Assembly resolution 56/293 [YUN 2002, p. 77], the Secretary-General submitted a February report on gender mainstreaming in peacekeeping activities [A/57/731]. The Assembly had requested the Secretary-General to develop a coherent policy on gender mainstreaming in all of the Organization's peacekeeping activities; the request was related to his proposal for additional resources under the Support Account for the establishment of a senior gender adviser post within DPKO.

The Secretary-General said that peacekeeping missions should identify and address gender-specific problems, such as sexual and gender-based violence against women and girls and prostitution (often combined with trafficking). DPKO's plan of action for gender mainstreaming would build gender perspectives into the work of the different components of peacekeeping operations and determine the most effective means of addressing gender perspectives in the day-to-day work of DPKO both at Headquarters and in the field. Attention to gender perspectives had to be included in all initial assessments and mission statements and plans, so that the needs and priorities of women and men were addressed in the policy frameworks, strategies and programming processes. The development of policies and procedures, codes of conduct, manuals and guidelines had to give adequate consideration to gender perspectives.

In conclusion, the Secretary-General said that work carried out so far on gender mainstreaming in peacekeeping had been financed through voluntary contributions. To ensure that it was systematically and effectively addressed, both at Headquarters and in the field, a full-time, dedicated gender advisory capacity was necessary at Headquarters in the form of a senior gender adviser located in the DPKO Peacekeeping Best Practices Unit, where mainstreaming would be part of the decision-making processes of all peacekeeping activities.

Special Committee consideration. The Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations [A/57/767], while commending Secretariat efforts to mainstream a gender perspective in DPKO activities, pursuant to Security Council resolution 1325(2000) [YUN 2000, p. 1113] and General Assembly resolution 55/71 [ibid., p. 1107], encouraged the Secretariat to pursue that policy further, including implementation of the recommendations contained in the Secretary-General's 2002 report on women, peace and security [YUN 2002, p. 67].

The Special Committee noted that further action was required to systematically integrate a gender perspective in the mandates of peacekeeping operations and in adequately addressing the specific needs of women in conflict situations. It reiterated its support for the creation of a focal point within DPKO's Peacekeeping Best Practices Unit to support the work of gender offices in field missions and help to mainstream gender issues in all aspects of the Department's work. The Special Committee encouraged Member States to provide the names of qualified candidates, especially women candidates, to serve in high-level positions in peacekeeping activities.

Security Council consideration. On 29 October [meeting 4832], the Security Council considered the issue of women and peace and security. Briefing the Council, the Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations, Jean-Marie Guéhenno, described steps taken by DPKO to implement Council resolution 1325(2000), especially in the context of multidimensional peacekeeping operations. DPKO's efforts were focused on five main areas highlighted in the resolution: increasing the number of women in peacekeeping operations; integrating a gender perspective into peacekeeping operations; training in gender awareness and HIV/AIDS issues (see below); strengthening discipline for peacekeeping personnel; and combating trafficking in human beings.

On the issue of gender balance among peacekeeping personnel, DPKO had started, on a pilot basis, to encourage more women applicants by targeting professional women's associations with vacancy announcements. Although women represented one third of Professional staff in the current 15 peacekeeping missions, DPKO intended to be more effective in identifying suitable women candidates for senior positions and in recruiting Professional-level women for missions.

As to gender mainstreaming, a number of practical field manuals were being produced to help demystify the issue, and a gender resource package, a field manual on gender issues for military commanders and one on gender issues in mine action were being developed. The temporary Gender Adviser, based at DPKO headquarters, had already begun to assist in more effectively coordinating efforts on gender issues, in facilitating cross-regional learning, and in identifying some of the main gaps and a comprehensive strategy to move forward. A network of gender focal points would also be established to assist in mainstreaming efforts. The Under-Secretary-General said that he intended to ensure that all future, multidimensional peacekeeping operations included strong gender expertise, in the form of a gender affairs unit that had access to senior-level decision-making in all areas of the mission's work.

As to disciplinary issues, DPKO, following a thorough review of existing policies and procedures, provided all missions in July with an updated set of disciplinary directives covering sexual abuse and exploitation and other types of serious misconduct. Each mission had an active strategy to prevent and respond to those problems and would appoint a senior focal point to receive complaints of misconduct by peacekeeping personnel.

On the issue of trafficking women, DPKO was undertaking a lessons-learned study on anti-trafficking programmes in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the Kosovo province of Yugoslavia, which would help to identify best practices and some lessons learned in tackling the problem.

The Senior Gender Adviser of the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo also briefed the Council.

Peacekeeping and HIV/AIDS

During the Security Council's consideration on 17 November of HIV/AIDS and international peacekeeping [meeting 4859], at which it was briefed by the Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations and the Executive Director of the Joint United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS (UNAIDS) (see p. 1247), Dr. Peter Piot, the Under-Secretary-General said that, since his last report on the subject [YUN 2001, p. 77], the number of people infected had grown to approximately 42 million. DPKO and UNAIDS were working together on HIV/AIDS and peacekeeping to reduce the risk of peacekeepers contracting or transmitting HIV while on mission. DPKO currently had HIV/AIDS policy advisers, supported by United Nations Volunteers, in four major peacekeeping operations and intended to deploy them in all major peacekeeping missions. HIV/AIDS focal points were established in six missions and others were being identified in the remaining operations. A primary element of DPKO's training strategy was to update and improve training materials. The three publications "Protect yourself, and those you care about, against HIV/AIDS", "HIV prevention and behaviour change in international military populations" and "Policy guidelines on HIV/AIDS prevention and control for United Nations military planners and commanders" were being reviewed and simplified to make them accessible to the broadest possible audience. DPKO had also developed a pre-deployment training module on HIV/AIDS and, with UNAIDS, was distributing HIV/AIDS awareness cards to peacekeepers covering the basic facts about the disease and codes of conduct. Currently available in 10 languages, the goal was for the cards to become a standard feature of a peacekeeper's uniform. Mission training cells for military personnel in eight peacekeeping operations were working closely with the HIV/AIDS policy advisers and focal points to ensure that HIV awareness was included in induction programmes. Similar induction training was conducted for civilian police personnel.

DPKO efforts did not stop at HIV/AIDS awareness and training. To counter behaviour that increased the risk of contracting or transmitting HIV, the Department took a zero tolerance stance regarding sexual abuse and exploitation by peacekeeping personnel. Updated disciplinary directives had been sent to missions, and reporting and investigation mechanisms were being strengthened. DPKO was introducing voluntary confidential counselling and testing capabilities into missions. It had also concluded a memorandum of understanding with the United Nations Population Fund for the provision of reproductive health items to both staff and uniformed personnel in all missions. To measure the impact of its efforts, DPKO was carrying out more systematic mission assessments and was working with UNAIDS to set up monitoring and evaluation systems.

The UNAIDS Executive Director said that UNAIDS had addressed AIDS and security in three ways: it had taken action in conjunction with DPKO in implementing aspects of Council resolution 1308(2000) [YUN 2000, p. 82] relating to peacekeeping forces; it was spearheading a wider response to AIDS among uniformed services; and it was expanding the response to AIDS as a pre-eminent humanitarian and security challenge. UNAIDS had established an expert panel on HIV testing in UN peacekeeping operations, whose report had informed the formulation of DPKO policy, and was establishing a comprehensive information base for targeting and evaluating HIV activities among peacekeepers.

Despite the progress, major challenges remained, such as a lack of reliable data on the spread of HIV among peacekeepers, the need to back up AIDS responses among peacekeepers by concerted leadership and the challenge of sustainability as peacekeepers were rotated through their missions in relatively short time frames, making it imperative that mission responses were reinforced in the ongoing programmes for uniformed services. UNAIDS was currently working with armed forces to ensure that HIV awareness and prevention took place prior to deployment and was reinforced at demobilization.

The United Kingdom proposed that the Council, on the basis of a progress report by the Secretary-General, hold a further discussion on HIV/AIDS in 2004 to consider strengthening the Council's response to resolution 1308(2000); draw on the experience of UNAIDS, DPKO, civil society groups and others to establish clearly the links between peace, security and HIV/AIDS, with suggestions for action; and ask the Secretary-General to conduct an assessment of both aspects for consideration by the Council in 2005.

The United States told the meeting that, as part of the international partnership against HIV/AIDS in Africa, its Department of Defense had been working with African armed forces to help create policies to deal with HIV/AIDS in a military setting by developing education programmes to reduce the spread of the disease among their personnel. The United States also underwrote the preparation and printing of a UN training booklet on HIV/AIDS awareness and prevention to be used by peacekeeping forces.

Peacekeeping and the international legal system

On 12 June [meeting 4772], at the request of Canada, Jordan, Liechtenstein, New Zealand and Switzerland [S/2003/620], and of Greece, on behalf of the EU [S/2003/639], the Security Council held a public meeting to consider a draft resolution (see p. 77), which sought to renew the request contained in Council resolution 1422(2002) [YUN 2002, p. 70]. By the draft, the Council would again request the International Criminal Court (ICC), consistent with article 16 of the Rome Statute establishing the Court [YUN 1998, p. 1209], to delay for a 12-month period, starting 1 July 2003, investigation or prosecution of any case involving current or former officials from a State not party to the Rome Statute and would express the intention to renew that request each 1 July for as long as might be necessary.

Addressing the Council, the Secretary-General said that article 16 of the Statute was not intended to cover such a sweeping request, but only a specific one relating to a particular situation. He did not believe that request was necessary since it dealt with a hypothetical and highly improbable case. Additionally, people serving in UN peacekeeping missions remained under the jurisdiction of their home States, and any of them accused of committing a crime during a mission were immediately repatriated and dealt with by their country's national courts. Also, no case was admissible in ICC if it had already been or was being investigated or prosecuted by a State that had jurisdiction over it, unless that State was unwilling or unable genuinely to investigate or prosecute. He assumed that the home State of a peacekeeper accused of the kind of crime that fell under ICC jurisdiction would be most anxious to investigate that accusation and prosecute that person, if there was a prima facie case. The case would then not be admissible in ICC.

The adoption of resolution 1422(2002) had given Member States more time to study the Rome Statute and to digest its implications. While the Council might feel it necessary to renew the request for a further 12 months, since the Court was still in its infancy, the Secretary-General hoped that that did not become an annual routine, since it would be interpreted by the world as meaning that the Council wished to claim absolute and permanent immunity for people serving in the operations it established or authorized, undermining not only ICC's authority but also that of the Council and the legitimacy of UN peacekeeping.

Canada appealed to the Council to ensure that the extraordinary situation created by the draft resolution [S/2003/630] did not become perma-ment. The Rome Statute's array of safeguards and checks and balances screened out any frivolous claims that might be submitted. ICC's principal purpose was to try the perpetrators of heinous crimes, which was the centrepiece in the effort to end impunity for genocide and other mass crimes. Its deterrent character was crucial in sparing future potential victims. ICC's jurisdictional reach was not limitless and its approach was entirely founded in established law. Canada said that it was also concerned about the legitimacy of the action recommended to the Council, which it urged not to renew resolution 1422(2002) indefinitely.

Greece said the EU reiterated its belief that the concerns expressed by the United States about politically motivated prosecutions were unfounded, since those concerns had been met and sufficient safeguards against such prosecutions had been built into the Statute.

New Zealand stated that it saw no need for immunity in principle. There should be no double standard for personnel engaged in UN missions. To put such personnel above the law placed their moral authority and the institution of UN peacekeeping in serious jeopardy. Moreover, the use of the procedure laid down in article 16 of the Rome Statute in a generic resolution, not in response to a particular fact situation and with the intention to renew it on an annual basis, was inconsistent with the terms and purpose of that provision. It also stretched the legitimate limits of the role and responsibility entrusted to the Council under the Charter.

Pakistan, speaking in support of the draft, said that it was unfortunate that the Rome Statute did not provide for reservations by countries, since that might have ensured wider adherence to it. As the largest contributor to UN peacekeeping operations, Pakistan believed that UN peacekeepers should not be exposed to any arbitrary or unilateral action by any national or international body, since that could reduce the incentive for Member States to offer UN peacekeeping forces.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 12 June [meeting 4772], the Security Council adopted resolution 1487(2003) by vote (12-0-3). The draft [S/2003/630] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Noting the entry into force on 1 July 2002 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, done at Rome on 17 July 1998 (the Rome Statute),

Emphasizing the importance to international peace and security of United Nations operations,

Noting that not all States are parties to the Rome Statute,

Noting also that States parties to the Rome Statute have chosen to accept its jurisdiction in accordance with the Statute, in particular the principle of complementarity,

Noting further that States not party to the Rome Statute will continue to fulfil their responsibilities in their national jurisdictions in relation to international crimes,

Determining that operations established or authorized by the Security Council are deployed to maintain or restore international peace and security,

Determining also that it is in the interest of international peace and security to facilitate the ability of Member States to contribute to operations established or authorized by the Council,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Requests, consistent with the provisions of article 16 of the Rome Statute, that the International Criminal Court, if a case arises involving current or former officials or personnel from a contributing State not a party to the Rome Statute over acts or omissions relating to a United Nations established or authorized operation, shall for a twelve-month period starting 1 July 2003 not commence or proceed with investigation or prosecution of any such case, unless the Security Council decides otherwise;

2. Expresses the intention to renew the request set out in paragraph 1 above under the same conditions each 1 July for further twelve-month periods for as long as may be necessary;

3. Decides that Member States shall take no action inconsistent with paragraph 1 above and with their international obligations;

4. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

VOTE ON RESOLUTION 1487(2003):

In favour: Angola, Bulgaria, Cameroon, Chile, China, Guinea, Mexico, Pakistan, Russian Federation, Spain, United Kingdom, United States.

Against: None.

Abstaining: France, Germany, Syrian Arab Republic.

In a statement after the vote, the United States said that it recognized the difficulty of recruiting troop contributors to UN peacekeeping operations and it was important that Member States not add concern about ICC jurisdiction to that difficulty. It did not agree that the resolution was unnecessary, since even one instance of ICC attempting to exercise jurisdiction over those involved in UN peacekeeping operations would have a seriously damaging impact on future UN operations. ICC was not a UN institution and was vulnerable at every stage of any proceeding to politicization. The Rome Statute provided no adequate check and having confidence in ICC's correct behaviour was not a sufficient safeguard.

France, explaining its abstention, said that the Court's professionalism would be judged on the facts. The recognized quality and competence of its members ensured without doubt the credibility of that international body, which provided the best safeguard against any possible suspicion of a politically motivated Court. The renewal of resolution 1422(2002) risked lending credence to the perception that such exemptions were permanent, which could only weaken the Court and harm its authority.

Germany stated that it did not share the view that ICC was an impediment to peacekeeping. On the contrary, it was a safeguard and, as an institution designed to prevent impunity, it could play an important role in protecting peacekeepers in the execution of their missions.

The Syrian Arab Republic said it did not see any justification for renewing resolution 1422 (2002). The Court was a reality and had become almost universal, since 90 States were party to the Rome Statute and 140 had signed it. Hence, the adoption of resolution 1487(2003) would result in the gradual weakening of the Court's role in persecuting those who had perpetrated the most heinous crimes that came under its jurisdiction.

Comprehensive review of peacekeeping

Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations

As requested by the General Assembly in resolution 56/225 B [YUN 2002, p. 71], the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations continued its comprehensive review of the question of peacekeeping operations in all their aspects [A/57/767]. In response to the Committee's request, the Secretary-General submitted a January report on the implementation of its recommendations [A/57/711].

The Special Committee held an organizational meeting on 3 March and a general debate on 3 and 4 March. It considered guiding principles, definitions and implementation of mandates; cooperation with troop-contributing countries; and enhancing UN peacekeeping capacity, including lessons learned and implementation of best practices, rapid deployment, recruitment and training, gender and peacekeeping, the safety and security of UN and associated personnel, and cooperation with regional arrangements.

The Special Committee welcomed the six issues recommended by the Secretary-General in his January report for particular attention by the Secretariat and Member States in 2003: integrating lessons learned and best practices into operational planning and coordination; developing and implementing comprehensive strategies for challenges faced by complex peacekeeping operations; enhancing rapid deployment capability; strengthening training; minimizing disciplinary problems; and strengthening regional peacekeeping capacities, particularly in Africa. It encouraged the Secretariat to continue collaborating with it in those areas and to communicate with Member States on critical areas and key topics related to the operation and management of peacekeeping operations. The Special Committee requested a briefing by the UN Office of Internal Oversight Services (OIOS) on its evaluation of DPKO's restructuring and an independent review by the Secretariat of the reform process initiated by the report of the Panel on United Nations Peace Operations [YUN 2000, p. 83] for Assembly consideration in 2004.

The Special Committee supported the Secretary-General in ensuring that the Peacekeeping Best Practices Unit played a more prominent role in DPKO's work and encouraged the Department and relevant parts of the UN system to strengthen their dialogue with the Unit. To strengthen best practices, the Special Committee encouraged the Unit to discuss themes of common interest with Member States that had participated in UN peacekeeping missions, develop validation mechanisms for lessons learned and best practices, and make recommendations for applying best practices and implementing lessons learned in the planning and conduct of ongoing and future missions. It endorsed the proposal to develop a field-level lessons-learned network and supported the incorporation of lessons learned in the conduct of all mission tasks.

The Secretariat should further suggest ways to address the Organization's informational and analytical requirements, mainly with respect to peacekeeping operations. The Secretary-General should inform Member States, in his next report to the Committee, on progress made in strengthening relationships between the Secretariat, other UN agencies and the Bretton Woods institutions (the World Bank Group and IMF).

The Special Committee supported the integration of civilian police expertise and other rule-of-law elements in the planning for new missions, and encouraged an increased focus on UN policing issues in peacekeeping operations. Stressing that civilian police and corrections personnel might be required to use enforcement measures, it requested the Secretariat to consider assigning such personnel privileges and immunities equivalent to those of armed military personnel and to report on that issue before the Committee's 2004 session. The Secretariat should also review its policy regarding the recruitment of retired police officers for peacekeeping operations and raising the age-limit for civilian police service.

The Special Committee acknowledged the need for additional research and analysis on the interrelated areas of disarmament, demobiliza-tion and reintegration, security sector reform and the strengthening of the rule of law in post-conflict environments, in order to draw lessons for the planning and conduct of current and future peacekeeping operations, and for conceptual clarity and an appraisal of the expertise and capacities within and outside the UN system to ensure operational coherence. It stressed the importance of early planning and coordination of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration components in peacekeeping operations and the provision of resources to accomplish the mandated tasks.

The Special Committee urged the strengthening of cooperation between the United Nations and relevant regional arrangements and agencies to enhance the capabilities of the international community in the maintenance of international peace and security, and encouraged the Secretary-General to take concrete steps towards that end.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 June [meeting 90], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fourth (Special Political and Decolonization) Committee [A/57/522/Add.1], adopted resolution 57/336 without vote [agenda item 78].

Comprehensive review of the whole question of peacekeeping operations in all their aspects

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 2006(XIX) of 18 February 1965 and all other relevant resolutions,

Recalling in particular its resolutions 56/225 B of 22 May 2002 and 57/129 of 11 December 2002,

Affirming that the efforts of the United Nations in the peaceful settlement of disputes, inter alia, through its peacekeeping operations, are indispensable,

Convinced of the need for the United Nations to continue to improve its capabilities in the field of peacekeeping and to enhance the effective and efficient deployment of its peacekeeping operations,

Considering the contribution that all States Members of the United Nations make to peacekeeping,

Noting the widespread interest in contributing to the work of the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations expressed by many Member States, in particular troop-contributing countries,

Bearing in mind the continuous necessity of preserving the efficiency and strengthening the effectiveness of the work of the Special Committee,

1. Welcomes the report of the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations;

2. Endorses the proposals, recommendations and conclusions of the Special Committee, contained in paragraphs 39 to 206 of its report;

3. Urges Member States, the Secretariat and relevant organs of the United Nations to take all necessary steps to implement the proposals, recommendations and conclusions of the Special Committee;

4. Reiterates that those Member States that become personnel contributors to United Nations peacekeeping operations in years to come or participate in the future in the Special Committee for three consecutive years as observers shall, upon request in writing to the Chairman of the Special Committee, become members at the following session of the Special Committee;

5. Decides that the Special Committee, in accordance with its mandate, shall continue its efforts for a comprehensive review of the whole question of peacekeeping operations in all their aspects and shall review the implementation of its previous proposals and consider any new proposals so as to enhance the capacity of the United Nations to fulfil its responsibilities in this field;

6. Requests the Special Committee to submit a report on its work to the General Assembly at its fifty-eighth session;

7. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-eighth session the item entitled "Comprehensive review of the whole question of peacekeeping operations in all their aspects".

By decision 58/524 of 9 December, the Assembly took note of the report of the Fourth Committee on its consideration of the agenda item "Comprehensive review of the whole question of peacekeeping operations in all their aspects" [A/58/474]. On 23 December, the Assembly decided that that agenda item would remain for consideration during its resumed fifty-eighth (2004) session (decision 58/565).

Operations in 2003

On 1 January, 13 UN peacekeeping operations were in place—4 in Africa, 3 in Asia, 3 in Europe and 3 in the Middle East. During the year, 1 mission ended and 1 was launched. The total number in place at the end of the year remained at 13.

Africa

In Africa, the mandate of the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL) was twice extended by the Security Council for six months, the second time from 30 September 2003 to 31 March 2004. In July, the Council approved the Secretary-General's recommendation to draw down the Mission's forces towards a final withdrawal by December 2004. Also in July, the Council extended the mandate of the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (MONUC) until 30 July 2004. In May, it had authorized deployment until 1 September 2003 of an Interim Emergency Multinational Force in Bunia, in cooperation with MONUC, and requested the Secretary-General to deploy a reinforced UN presence in Bunia by mid-August. The mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara

(MINURSO) was extended until 31 January 2004. The Council also extended the mandate of the United Nations Mission in Ethiopia and Eritrea (UNMEE) until 15 March 2004. In September, the Council established the United Nations Mission in Liberia (UNMIL) to, among other things, support implementation of the ceasefire agreement (see p. 188).

In other action, the Council, in August, renewed for six months the authorization given to Member States participating in the forces of the Economic Community of West African States together with the French forces supporting them in Côte d'Ivoire (resolution 1498(2003)) (see p. 177).

Asia

In Asia, in the wake of the action of the coalition led by the United States and the United Kingdom in Iraq (see p. 333), the Council, in July, decided that the final mandate of the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission (UNIKOM) would end on 6 October; the demilitarized zone between the two countries would also end on that date. The United Nations Military Observer Group in India and Pakistan (UNMOGIP), established in 1949, remained in place to monitor the ceasefire in Jammu and Kashmir. The Council extended the mandate of the United Nations Mission of Support in East Timor (UNMISSET) until 20 May 2004.

In other action, the Council, in October, extended the authorization of the International Security Assistance Force in Afghanistan for a further period of 12 months and expanded its mandate to include support for the Afghan Transitional Authority and its successors in maintaining security in areas outside Kabul and its environs (resolution 1510(2003)) (see p. 310). Also in October, it authorized a multinational force under unified command to contribute to the maintenance of security and stability in Iraq (resolution 1511 (2003)) (see p. 348).

Europe

In Europe, the Security Council extended the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia (UNOMIG) until 31 January 2004 and endorsed the Secretary-General's recommendation that a civilian police component be added to strengthen its capacity to carry out its mandate. The Council also extended the mandate of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus (UNFICYP) until 15 June 2004. The United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK), Serbia and Montenegro (formerly the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia), remained in place.

Middle East

Three long-standing operations continued in the Middle East: the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization (UNTSO), which continued to observe the truce in Palestine; the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL), whose mandate was extended until 31 January 2004; and the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force (UNDOF), whose mandate was renewed until 30 June 2004.

Roster of 2003 operations

UNTSO

United Nations Truce Supervision Organization

Established: June 1948.

Mandate: To assist in supervising the observance of the truce in Palestine.

Strength as at December 2003: 154 military observers.

Ended: 6 October 2003.

Mandate: To monitor the demilitarized zone along the border between Iraq and Kuwait.

MINURSO

United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara

Established: April 1991.

Mandate: To monitor and verify the implementation of a settlement plan for Western Sahara and assist in the holding of a referendum in the Territory.

Strength as at December 2003: 27 troops, 200 military observers.

UNOMIG

United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia

Established: August 1993.

Mandate: To verify compliance with a ceasefire agreement between the parties to the conflict in Georgia and investigate ceasefire violations; expanded in 1994 to include monitoring the implementation of an agreement on a ceasefire and separation of forces and observing the operation of a multinational peacekeeping force.

Strength as at December 2003: 118 military observers, 10 civilian police.

UNMIK

United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo

Established: June 1999.

Mandate: To promote, among other things, the establishment of substantial autonomy and self-government in Kosovo, perform basic civilian administrative functions, organize and oversee the development of provisional institutions, facilitate a political process to determine Kosovo's future status, support reconstruction of key infrastructure, maintain civil law and order, protect human rights and assure the return of refugees and displaced persons.

Strength as at December 2003: 3,691 civilian police, 40 military observers.

UNAMSIL

United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone

Established: October 1999.

Mandate: To cooperate with the Government of Sierra Leone and other parties in the implementation of the Peace Agreement signed in Lomé, Togo, on 7 July 1999, including, among other things, to assist in the implementation of the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration plan, monitor adherence to the ceasefire agreement of 18 May 1999 and facilitate the delivery of humanitarian assistance.

Strength as at December 2003: 11,232 troops, 269 military observers, 130 civilian police.

MONUC

United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo

Established: November 1999.

Mandate: To establish contacts with the signatories to the Ceasefire Agreement, provide technical assistance in implementation of the Agreement, provide information on security conditions, plan for the observation of the ceasefire, facilitate the delivery of humanitarian assistance and assist in the protection of human rights.

Strength as at December 2003: 9,981 troops, 553 military observers, 115 civilian police.

UNMEE

United Nations Mission in Ethiopia and Eritrea

Established: July 2000.

Mandate: To establish and put into operation the mechanism for verifying the cessation of hostilities and to assist the Military Coordination Commission in tasks related to demining and in administrative support to its field offices.

Strength as at December 2003: 3,795 troops, 209 military observers.

UNMISSET

United Nations Mission of Support in East Timor

Established: May 2002.

Mandate: To provide assistance to the core administrative structures and interim law enforcement and public security of East Timor (re-named Timor-Leste), including assisting in the development of the East Timor Police Service, and contribute to the maintenance of East Timor's external and internal security.

Strength as at December 2003: 1,675 troops, 319 civilian police, 79 military observers.

UNMIL

United Nations Mission in Liberia

Established: 19 September 2003.

Mandate: To support the implementation of the ceasefire agreement and the peace process; protect UN staff and facilities and civilians; support humanitarian and human rights activities; and assist in national security reform, including national police training and formation of a new, restructured military.

Strength as at December 2003: 8,387 troops, 107 military observers, 312 civilian police.

Financial and administrative aspects of peacekeeping operations

Financing

Expenditures for United Nations peacekeeping activities for the period 1 July 2002 to 30 June 2003 totalled $2,501 million, compared to a final figure of $2,572 million for the previous 12-month period. The decrease in expenditure (3 per cent) resulted from scaled-down operations in UNIFIL, UNIKOM, UNAMSIL, UNMIK and the United Nations Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET)/UNMISSET, and the completion of the mandate of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina (UNMIBH), offset by an increase in spending in MONUC.

The overall positive financial position of UN peacekeeping operations was relatively unchanged from the previous year, with increased cash availability in active missions offset by reduced cash in the closed missions (see below). Outstanding unpaid assessments for active peacekeeping operations declined 23 per cent from $662.2 million to $508.3 million. As at 30 June 2003, total unpaid assessments amounted to $1.1 billion, compared to $1.2 billion the previous year. That enabled earlier settlement of debts in active missions to troop-contributing countries. On the other hand, closed missions had reduced cash as funds were used for strategic deployment stocks at UNLB (see p. 72) and $84.4 million was returned to Member States. Available cash for all operations totalled $1,717.4 million, while liabilities came to $1,477.2 million.

Notes of Secretary-General. In accordance with General Assembly resolution 49/233 A [YUN 1994, p. 1338], the Secretary-General submitted to the Assembly's Fifth Committee a February note [A/C.5/37/34] providing information on proposed budgetary requirements for all peacekeeping operations, UNLB and the support account for peacekeeping operations for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004 in the amount of $2,186,658,800. That amount was updated in March [A/C.5/37/34/Rev.1] to $2,304,623,700, reflecting revised estimates for the expansion of MONUC, as authorized by Security Council resolution 1445(2002) [YUN 2002, p. 123].

Financial performance and proposed budgets

In February/March [A/57/772], ACABQ considered the financial performance reports for the period 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002 and the proposed budgets for the period 1 July 2003 to 30

June 2004 of UNOMIG, MINURSO, UNAMSIL, UNFICYP, UNMIK, UNIFIL, UNDOF, UNMEE, UNLB, MONUC, UNTAET and UNMISSET. It also considered the Secretary-General's overview report [A/57/723] on the financing of UN peacekeeping operations: budget performance for the period 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002 and budget for the period 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004, the report on the financial performance of UNMIBH, including the liaison offices in Belgrade and Zagreb and the United Nations Mission of Observers in Prevlaka from 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002 [A/57/684], and the report on the financial performance of the support account for peacekeeping operations for the period 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002 [A/57/725] and the proposed budget of the support account for the period 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004 [A/57/732].

Expenditures for peacekeeping missions, including UNLB and the support account for peacekeeping operations, for the period ended 30 June 2002 amounted to $2,548.5 million against appropriations of $2,773.3 million gross, leaving an unencumbered balance of $224.8 million. For the preceding period ended 30 June 2001, the unencumbered balance was $258.1 million. ACABQ took those balances into account in its recommendations on budget requirements for 2003/04. UNLB expenditures totalled $9 million against a provision of the same amount, while expenditures against the support account for peacekeeping operations totalled $84.3 million from a provision of $89.7 million. As at 28 February 2003, unliquidated obligations amounted to $221 million.

Commenting on the performance reports, ACABQ noted in a number of missions that substantial resources were regularly retained to meet obligations to vendors, staff and others. It considered that the large amounts of unliquidated obligations and savings regularly realized on prior period obligations indicated a laxity in obligating funds and illustrated weaknesses in budget implementation and monitoring, and requested that those problems be addressed. Noting the numerous budget variances (savings or over-expenditures), with only generic explanations provided, ACABQ recommended that in the future overruns or savings be fully explained, with specific information on the circumstances that led to the savings or overruns in a particular object of expenditure.

Concerning the delegation of financial authority, ACABQ trusted that, when the delegation of authority in budget implementation to chief administrative officers had been effected and monitoring tools were in place at Headquarters and in the field, questions concerning the analysis of budget implementation would be answered promptly.

Having considered results-based budgeting, objective-setting and presentation, ACABQ welcomed the efforts to streamline the budget presentation. However, the results-based budgeting exercise still appeared to be primarily Headquarters-driven and, because it was still relatively new, systematic and more focused training and coaching should be continued to ensure a coherent and comprehensive understanding and commitment to it in all the missions.

ACABQ, referring to the Secretary-General's overview report on the financing of UN peacekeeping (see p. 82), suggested that the report in future should include such cross-cutting issues as air operations, procurement and inventory management. For each mission, the Secretariat should combine in a single document the performance report and the proposed budget.

Acknowledging the Secretary-General's intention that the new results-based budget format would improve decision-making and permit the General Assembly to focus on policy issues rather than details, ACABQ requested that he clearly indicate those policy issues requiring Assembly attention and reinstate the introductory information in the budget document that had been eliminated. Mandate objectives defined in budget documents should be in strict compliance with those established by the Security Council and, except for the support component, the number of expected accomplishments, indicators of achievement and planned outputs should be reduced to facilitate monitoring and reporting.

ACABQ was of the opinion that having a uniform framework comprising three or four components (political, military, civilian police and support) for all missions had led to anomalies in some missions, and considered that it might be appropriate for some missions, depending on their mandate, to have additional ones. The Secretary-General was asked to explain, in the next budget submission, the rationale for the components used to prepare the budgets. The mandate implementation plan should constitute the framework for budget preparation and performance reporting and a clear link should be established in performance reports between the results-based framework and the existing mandate plan. Expected accomplishments, indicators of achievement and planned outputs under each component should be relevant and realistic, and the support component dealing with operational costs should include plans to increase efficiency and productivity. The Committee shared the concerns of the Board of Auditors [A/57/5, vol. II] that not all missions had well-developed tools to measure, monitor and evaluate actual performance against the objectives set out in the proposed results-based programme budgets.

ACABQ, noting the substantial capital expenditure required for communication and information technology projects, recommended that future requirements for new and replacement programmes be based on a comprehensive analysis of the functional requirements of the field missions. A clear time frame for completing such projects should be indicated in the proposed budget submission and the status of their implementation reflected in the performance report. The information provided on the nine information technology systems in DPKO showed a lack of a comprehensive identification of needs and a potential for duplication of databases. The review it had requested of the many databases developed or being developed, with a view to ensuring compatibility and interactivity, had not been undertaken. ACABQ recommended that the Secretariat, in the context of the 2004/05 peacekeeping budgets, evaluate the cost-benefit and the efficiency and productivity results of the DPKO information technology systems to be implemented by the end of 2003 to ensure that the objectives had been realized and to correct any weaknesses. It reiterated its caution against the tendency to acquire the most up-to-date communication and data-processing equipment, which might not be appropriate to the practical needs of the mission.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 June [meeting 90], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/57/656/Add.1], adopted resolution 57/290 B without vote [agenda item 126].

Administrative and budgetary aspects of the financing of the United Nations peacekeeping operations

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General entitled "Overview of the financing of the United Nations peacekeeping operations: budget performance for the period from 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002 and budget for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004" and the relevant sections of the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions thereon,

Welcoming the presentation of the overview report,

Results-based budgeting and budget presentation

1. Recalls its resolutions 55/231 of 23 December 2000, 56/293 of 27 June 2002 and 57/300 of 20 December 2002;

2. Welcomes the continuing efforts of the Secretary-General to implement a results-based budgeting format and the timely presentation of the proposed peacekeeping budgets for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004;

3. Endorses the observations and recommendations of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions contained in paragraphs 37 to 56 and 134 to 136 of its report, subject to the provisions of the present resolution;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure that, in applying results-based budgeting to peacekeeping budgets, the specific characteristics and mandates of each peacekeeping mission are taken fully into account;

5. Notes the intention of the Secretary-General, as reflected in paragraph 44 of the report of the Advisory Committee, that the new budget format will improve decision-making, and reaffirms that the peacekeeping budget documents should contain all the information needed for Member States to reach well-informed decisions, including a full justification of the resources requested;

6. Reiterates that the format of the budgets should be in accordance with the mandates of the General Assembly;

7. Requests the Joint Inspection Unit to submit to the General Assembly at its resumed sixtieth session an evaluation of the implementation of results-based budgeting in peacekeeping operations;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to develop further the link between mission objectives and the resources requested in the proposed peacekeeping budgets for the period from 1 July 2004 to 30 June 2005;

9. Decides that the performance reports and the proposed budgets for peacekeeping operations and the support account should continue to be presented in separate documents;

Communication and information technology

10. Notes with concern the observations of the Advisory Committee on the expansion of information technology programmes in some peacekeeping missions undergoing downsizing of activities and personnel and its caution against an apparent tendency to acquire the most up-to-date communication and data-processing equipment, which might not be appropriate for the practical needs of the missions;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-eighth session a comprehensive report on the functional requirements of field missions for communication and information technology, including replacement programmes, disposal of used information technology assets, the status of ongoing and new projects and an evaluation of current policies and practices in terms of their cost-effectiveness, efficiency and productivity benefits;

12. Also requests the Secretary-General to ensure that the above-mentioned report is consistent with the direction of the Organization's broader information and communication technology strategy and that it takes into account the observations and recommendations of the Advisory Committee contained in paragraphs 102 to 106 of its report;

Training

13. Further requests the Secretary-General to ensure that investments in training are based on need, aimed at improving efficiency and performance and congruent with the career development of staff;

14. Requests the Secretary-General, with the assistance of the Office of Internal Oversight Services of the Secretariat, to refine the policy of management on training and training-related travel costs in the Department of Peacekeeping Operations of the Secretariat and in peacekeeping missions, taking into account requirements related to the provision by the United Nations of training for military personnel, civilian police and civilian staff and considering paragraphs 127 to 133 of the report of the Advisory Committee, and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its resumed fifty-eighth session;

Recruitment

15. Recalls paragraph 2 of its resolution 57/287 A of 20 December 2002;

16. Notes with concern the continuing delays in the recruitment of personnel in the Department of Peacekeeping Operations and its negative impact on peacekeeping missions, in particular those in Africa;

17. Requests the Secretary-General to encourage greater use of national staff, as defined in paragraph 80 of the report of the Advisory Committee, whenever possible and cost-effective, and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its resumed fifty-eighth session;

18. Urges the Secretary-General to expedite recruitment for field missions, taking into account, as appropriate, the delegation of recruitment authority to field missions and their accountability in that regard, including the use of fair and transparent recruitment procedures and monitoring mechanisms, consistent with the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly, and to report to it thereon at its resumed fifty-eighth session;

19. Endorses the observations and recommendations of the Advisory Committee contained in paragraphs 78 and 80 to 85 of its report;

20. Stresses that any reclassification of posts should be consistent with the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and the United Nations Staff Rules and Regulations;

Official travel

21. Reiterates that future resource requests for official travel should be adequately justified, including how such travel will help to achieve a measurable result in fulfilling stated objectives;

Procurement and contract management

22. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its resumed fifty-eighth session a comprehensive report on procurement and contract management for peacekeeping operations containing specific proposals addressing any possible conflict of interest that may arise in this area concerning United Nations staff members associated with the procurement cycle, including the feasibility of establishing a code of ethics, a declaration of independence and provisions to ensure confidentiality of information associated with their functions as United Nations staff members, also taking into account paragraphs 116 to 119 of the report of the Advisory Committee.

On 23 December, the Assembly decided that the item on the administrative and budgetary aspects of the financing of UN peacekeeping operations would remain for consideration at its resumed fifty-eighth (2004) session (decision 58/565).

Closed missions

In April [A/57/789], the Secretary-General updated the information, as at 30 June 2002, on the financial position of 10 closed peacekeeping missions for which financial performance reports had already been submitted: the Military Observer Group of the United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala (MINUGUA); the United Nations Mission in Haiti (UNMIH); the United Nations Observer Group in Central America (ONUCA) and the United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador (ONUSAL); the United Nations Operation in Mozambique (ONUMOZ); the United Nations Operation in Somalia (UNOSOM); the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force (UNPREDEP); the United Nations Protection Force, the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia, UNPREDEP and the United Nations Peace Forces headquarters (UNPF); the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti (UNSMIH), the United Nations Transition Mission in Haiti (UNTMH) and the United Nations Civilian Police Mission in Haiti (MIPONUH); the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium (UNTAES) and the Civilian Police Support Group; and the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia (UNTAC).

The Secretary-General recommended that, in the light of the overall financial situation of the Organization and the fact that assessed contributions to peacekeeping in the amount of $1.5 billion remained unpaid as at 15 March 2003, the return of cash available for credit to Member States be suspended until the financial position improved in respect of the fund balances of those missions.

In a May report on improving the financial situation of the United Nations [A/57/489/Add.1], the Secretary-General indicated that if, of the $339 million available in the closed missions, $169 million was to be returned to Member States, a balance of only $170 million would remain. He therefore recommended, in view of the projected decrease in peacekeeping cash and as a matter of prudent financial management, that financial regulation 5.5 of the Financial Regulations and Rules in respect of the closed missions be suspended to give the Organization a degree of financial flexibility until its financial situation improved.

Addressing the Fifth Committee on 19 May [A/C.5/57/SR.52], the ACABQ Chairman stated that suspension of financial regulation 5.5 would result in the retention of a revised amount of $168.9 million. ACABQ recommended that more clarification and information be provided in the context of its examination of the report on improving the financial situation of the United Nations and the performance reports of closed missions before a decision was taken on the suspension of the relevant financial regulation.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 June [meeting 90], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/57/656/Add.1], adopted resolution 57/323 without vote [agenda item 126].

Closed peacekeeping missions

The General Assembly

1. Takes note of the reports of the Secretary-General on the updated financial position of closed peacekeeping missions as at 30 June 2002, and on the financing of the United Nations Transition Assistance Group, the United Nations Angola Verification Mission and the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola, the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan, the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia, the United Nations Observer Mission Uganda-Rwanda and the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda, and the United Nations Mission in the Central African Republic, and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to return 50 per cent of the net cash available for credit to Member States as at 30 June 2002, in the amount of 84,446,000 United States dollars, by 30 June 2003, based on the scale applicable to the missions' last assessment;

3. Decides to postpone the return of the remaining 50 per cent of the net cash available for credit to Member States, in the amount of 84,446,000 dollars, until 31 March 2004, based on the scale applicable to the missions' last assessment, in respect of the fund balances of the United Nations Mission in Haiti; the United Nations Observer Group in Central America and the United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador; the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force; the United Nations Protection Force, the United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia, the United Nations Preventive Deployment Force and the United Nations Peace Forces headquarters; the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium and the Civilian Police Support Group; the United Nations Angola Verification Mission and the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola; the United Nations Observer Mission Uganda-Rwanda and the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda; the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan; the United Nations Transition Assistance Group; and the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia in the light of the overall financial situation of the Organization and the fact that assessed contributions to peacekeeping in the amount of 1.4 billion dollars remain unpaid as at 31 March 2003;

4. Also decides that the provisions of financial regulation 5.5 of the Financial Regulations and Rules of the United Nations should be suspended in respect of the liabilities and fund balance of the Military Observer Group of the United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala; the United Nations Operation in Mozambique; the United Nations Operation in Somalia II; the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti; the United Nations Transition Mission in Haiti and the United Nations Civilian Police Mission in Haiti; the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia; and the United Nations Mission in the Central African Republic in the light of the cash shortage of these missions;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to provide an updated report and make proposals for consideration at its resumed fifty-eighth session on how to address the issue of outstanding dues owed to Member States from closed peacekeeping missions that are in net cash deficit;

6. Takes note of the reports of the Secretary-General on the disposition of assets of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan, the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda and the United Nations Mission in the Central African Republic;

7. Approves the donation of assets of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda with a total inventory value of 12,581,000 dollars and corresponding residual value of 2,401,300 dollars to the Government of Rwanda;

8. Also approves the donation of assets of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda with a total inventory value of 79,200 dollars and corresponding residual value of 53,400 dollars to the medical unit of a Member State;

9. Decides to consider at its fifty-eighth session the updated report on the position of closed peacekeeping missions requested in paragraph 5 above under the agenda item entitled "Administrative and budgetary aspects of the financing of the United Nations peacekeeping operations".

Peacekeeping support account

The Secretary-General, in February [A/57/725], submitted the performance report on the budget of the support account for peacekeeping operations for the period 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002. Expenditures for the period totalled $84,343,000 against an apportionment of $89,749,250, resulting in an unencumbered balance of $5,406,250, which was due mainly to a higher-than-budgeted vacancy rate and underexpenditures in respect of travel, communications and information technology.

Also in February [A/57/732], the Secretary-General submitted the budget for the support account for peacekeeping operations for the period 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004 in the amount of $115,863,100 gross ($100,318,500 net), which provided for 761 posts.

In April [A/57/776], ACABQ recommended resource reductions totalling $4,371,300 gross ($4,090,800 net) and that the Assembly approve total staffing and non-staffing requirements of $111,491,800 gross ($96,227,700 net) for the period 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004. It also recommended that miscellaneous income of $3,126,000 for 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002 be applied to the resources required for the period 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004 and that the balance ($108,365,800 gross ($93,101,700 net)) be prorated among individual peacekeeping operation budgets for that period.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 June [meeting 90], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/57/656/Add.1], adopted resolution 57/318 without vote [agenda item 126].

Support account for peacekeeping operations

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 45/258 of 3 May 1991, 47/218 A of 23 December 1992, 48/226 A of 23 December 1993, 56/241 of 24 December 2001 and 56/293 of 27 June 2002, its decisions 48/489 of 8 July 1994, 49/469 of 23 December 1994 and 50/473 of 23 December 1995 and other relevant resolutions of the General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General entitled "Overview of the financing of the United Nations peacekeeping operations: budget performance for the period from 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002 and budget for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004", his report on the financial performance of the support account for peacekeeping operations for the period from 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002, his report on the budget for the support account for peacekeeping operations for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004, and the related reports of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Having also considered the reports of the Secretary-General on the experience with resident investigators and on gender mainstreaming in peacekeeping activities, as well as the above-mentioned reports of the Advisory Committee, specifically paragraphs 86 to 95 of the first report with regard to resident investigators and auditors, and paragraph 31 of the second report with regard to gender mainstreaming in peacekeeping activities,

Recognizing the importance of the United Nations being able to respond and deploy rapidly a peacekeeping operation upon adoption of a relevant resolution of the Security Council, within thirty days for traditional peacekeeping operations and ninety days for complex peacekeeping operations,

Recognizing also the need for adequate support during all phases of peacekeeping operations, including the liquidation and termination phases,

Mindful that the level of the support account should broadly correspond to the mandates, number, size and complexity of peacekeeping missions,

1. Takes note of the reports of the Secretary-General on the financing of the support account for peacekeeping operations;

2. Also takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the experience with resident investigators;

3. Further takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on gender mainstreaming in peacekeeping activities;

4. Reaffirms the need for effective and efficient administration and financial management of peacekeeping operations, and urges the Secretary-General to continue to identify measures to increase the productivity and efficiency of the support account;

5. Affirms the need for adequate funding for the backstopping of peacekeeping operations, as well as the need for full justification for that funding in support account budget submissions;

6. Endorses the conclusions and recommendations contained in the relevant paragraphs of the reports of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, subject to the provisions of the present resolution;

7. Decides to maintain, for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004, the funding mechanism for the support account used in the current period, from 1 July 2002 to 30 June 2003, as approved in paragraph 3 of its resolution 50/221 B of 7 June 1996;

8. Reaffirms the need for the Secretary-General to ensure that delegation of authority to the Department of Peacekeeping Operations of the Secretariat and field missions is in strict compliance with relevant resolutions and decisions and the relevant rules and procedures of the General Assembly on this matter;

9. Also reaffirms that any delegation of authority to the Department of Peacekeeping Operations and field missions requires full accountability of programme managers;

10. Further reaffirms paragraph 15 of its resolution 56/293, and requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its resumed fifty-eighth session a comprehensive report on measures taken in this regard and the criteria used for recruitment to all support account posts, in particular those in the Department of Peacekeeping Operations, bearing in mind that the system of desirable ranges does not currently apply to support account posts;

11. Regrets that the D-2 post for the administration of change management is still vacant, and urges the Secretary-General to fill it as soon as possible;

12. Requests the Secretary-General to review the level of the support account on a regular basis, taking into consideration the number, size and complexity of peacekeeping operations;

13. Requests the Board of Auditors to carry out a review of the implementation of the recommendations of the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations and the Panel on United Nations Peace Operations as approved by the General Assembly, to gauge the effects of management reform measures taken since the approval of the report and to report thereon to the Assembly at its fifty-eighth session;

14. Decides to review at its resumed fifty-eighth session the existing posts approved in its resolutions 55/238 of 23 December 2000, 56/241 and 56/293 and in the present resolution in order to consider their justification, taking into account the ongoing evaluation by the Office of Internal Oversight Services of the Secretariat of the impact of the recent restructuring of the Department of Peacekeeping Operations on its performance in the backstopping of peacekeeping operations;

15. Approves the establishment of eight posts (2 P-4, 4 P-3 and 2 General Service) for the Investigations Division of the Office of Internal Oversight Services, to be divided evenly between the regional hubs in Vienna and Nairobi, and decides to review these posts and functions in the next support account budget, taking into account the relevant workload and coverage of their activities;

16. Also approves the establishment of a P-3 post and general temporary assistance for one General Service post (Other level) in the Executive Office of the Office of Internal Oversight Services;

17. Further approves the transfer from peacekeeping operations budgets to the support account budget of 27 resident auditor and assistant posts at the same level as in the budget for the period from 1 July 2002 to 30 June 2003, to be deployed as necessary, bearing in mind that whenever a mission's mandate is adjusted or terminated, the number of audit posts should be adjusted or terminated accordingly;

18. Decides that any support account posts that remain vacant and any new posts that are not filled for twelve months from the date of their establishment would require rejustification in the subsequent budget submission, and requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-ninth session on the implementation of this decision;

19. Requests the Secretary-General to include in the next support account report details of reclassification upward and reclassification downward, if any, of posts, as well as the breakdown of appointments to posts reclassified upward in the previous two years, as between internal and external candidates, and to provide annual data thereafter;

20. Decides that the person recruited to the gender adviser post shall be responsible for all operational support activities and all related activities pertaining to the implementation of individual mandates of various peacekeeping operations in the area of gender mainstreaming, including those activities relating to the field operations of each peacekeeping mission;

21. Affirms that the Office of the Special Adviser on Gender Issues and Advancement of Women is the competent authority for gender mainstreaming in the United Nations as a whole and is responsible for the formulation of policy as mandated by the intergovernmental bodies, and in this regard requests the Department of Peacekeeping Operations to establish a viable, effective mechanism for close coordination with the Special Adviser, ensuring that all plans of action on gender mainstreaming in peacekeeping operations are consistent with the existing mandates;

22. Stresses that the creation of a gender adviser in the Best Practices Unit of the Department of Peacekeeping Operations does not constitute a precedent to be followed by other departments and should not itself lead to the establishment of a gender unit in the Department, and also stresses the importance of not duplicating functions and capacities that already exist elsewhere in the Secretariat;

23. Decides to review the establishment and the level of the post of gender adviser in the context of paragraph 14 above;

24. Requests the Secretary-General, through the Office of Internal Oversight Services, to report to the General Assembly at its resumed fifty-eighth session on the cases processed by the regional investigators;

25. Decides to establish, on a trial basis, a P-4 post in the Monitoring, Evaluation and Consulting Division of the Office of Internal Oversight Services to undertake oversight functions with regard to military aspects of peacekeeping operations, and also not to approve the amount covering six months of consultancy services for three experts mentioned in paragraph 70 of the report of the Advisory Committee;

26. Requests the Secretary-General to report on the implementation and impact of this decision in the context of his support account budget proposal for the period from 1 July 2005 to 30 June 2006;

27. Concurs with the observation of the Advisory Committee in paragraph 51 of its report that the term "inspectorate" or "inspector-general" does not appropriately reflect the intended use of the consultancy funds requested in paragraph 43 of the report of the Secretary-General on the budget for the support account for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004 and should not be used;

28. Requests the Secretary-General to report on the relationship between the proposals requested in paragraphs 43 and 62 of his report, and decides to review this issue in the context of the consideration of the proposed budget for the support account for the period from 1 July 2005 to 30 June 2006;

29. Decides not to approve the resources requested in paragraph 115 of the report of the Secretary-General, and requests the Secretary-General to present a full justification for the establishment of those posts in the context of his next budget submission for the support account for the period from 1 July 2004 to 30 June 2005;

30. Approves the Military Division training budget at the level requested by the Secretary-General;

31. Regrets that the Secretary-General has not included in his report an annex containing information on the status of implementation of relevant adopted recommendations made by the Advisory Committee and other oversight bodies, as requested in paragraph 17 of its resolution 56/293;

Financial performance report for the period from 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002

32. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the financial performance of the support account for peacekeeping operations for the period from 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002;

Budget estimates for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004

33. Approves the support account requirements in the amount of 112,075,800 United States dollars for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004, including 702 continuing and 41 new temporary posts and their related post and non-post requirements;

Financing of requirements for the support account for peacekeeping operations

34. Decides that requirements for the support account for peacekeeping operations for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004 shall be financed as follows:

(a) The unencumbered balance and other income in the total amount of 8,532,250 dollars in respect of the period ended 30 June 2002 to be applied to the resources required for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004;

(b) The increase of 517,100 dollars in the estimated staff assessment income in respect of the financial period ended 30 June 2002 to be added to the credits from the amount referred to in subparagraph (a) above;

(c) The amount of 33,250,000 dollars in excess of the authorized level of the Peacekeeping Reserve Fund in respect of the period ended 30 June 2002 to be applied to the resources required for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004;

(d) The balance of 70,293,550 dollars to be prorated among the budgets of the active peacekeeping operations for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004;

(e) The estimated staff assessment income of 15,320,200 dollars for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004 to be set off against the balance referred to in subparagraph (d) above, to be prorated among the individual active peacekeeping operations budgets.

Also on 18 June, by decision 57/588, the Assembly deferred until its fifty-eighth session consideration of the ACABQ report on the financial performance report for the period 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002 and proposed budget for the support account for peacekeeping operations for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004.

Peacekeeping Reserve Fund

The Secretary-General reported in April [A/57/798] that the level of the United Nations Peacekeeping Reserve Fund, established by General Assembly resolution 47/217 [YUN 1992, p. 1022] to ensure the rapid deployment of peacekeeping operations, stood at $197,387,000 as at 30 June 2002. Following the transfer of $14,137,000 to the UNLB account to meet requirements for the strategic deployment stocks in accordance with Assembly resolution 56/292 [YUN 2002, p. 64], the amount remaining in the Fund stood at $183,250,000, $33,250,000 above the authorized level of $150,000,000. The Secretary-General recommended that the excess amount be applied to the support account for peacekeeping operations for the period 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004.

In May [A/C.5/57/SR.52], ACABQ agreed with the Secretary-General's proposal to restore the Fund to its authorized level of $150,000,000.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 June [meeting 90], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/57/656/Add.1], adopted resolution 57/317 without vote [agenda item 126].

Peacekeeping Reserve Fund

The General Assembly,

Having considered the note by the Secretary-General on the Peacekeeping Reserve Fund and the related reports of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Recalling its resolution 47/217 of 23 December 1992 on the establishment of the Peacekeeping Reserve Fund and its resolutions 49/233 A of 23 December 1994 and 51/218 E of 17 June 1997,

Recalling also its resolution 57/290 A of 20 December 2002 on the inclusion of Switzerland and Timor-Leste in the Peacekeeping Reserve Fund,

Reaffirming the general principles underlying the financing of United Nations peacekeeping operations, as stated in General Assembly resolutions 1874(S-IV) of 27 June 1963, 3101(XXVIII) of 11 December 1973 and 55/235 of 23 December 2000,

1. Takes note of the status of contributions to the Peacekeeping Reserve Fund as at 31 December 2002;

2. Endorses the recommendation contained in the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, and requests the Secretary-General to ensure its full implementation;

3. Decides to apply the amount of 33,250,000 United States dollars, representing the amount in excess of the authorized level of 150 million dollars for the Fund, to the requirements of the support account for peacekeeping operations for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004;

4. Requests the Secretary-General, consequent upon the full establishment of the strategic deployment stocks and the pre-mandate commitment authority, to review the level of the Fund and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its resumed fifty-eighth session.

Consolidation of peacekeeping accounts

In March [A/57/746], the Secretary-General, in response to the General Assembly request contained in resolution 56/293 [YUN 2002, p. 77] that he report on the feasibility of consolidating the accounts of the different peacekeeping missions, said that it was not possible to implement that request within the framework of current practice for reporting, budgeting and financing of peacekeeping operations and the Financial Regulations and Rules, which treated each peacekeeping mission independently. However, he did outline the possible benefits of consolidation and examined the range of issues that would need to be taken into account.

The potential benefits included greater flexibility in utilizing peacekeeping resources, thus eliminating the need for cross-borrowing between accounts, more consistent and timely reimbursement to troop-contributing Governments, and streamlined legislative and administrative processes for financing, with only one peacekeeping financing resolution to be adopted and one assessment on Member States to be approved.

If consolidation were applied retroactively, outstanding contributions to each operation, under financial regulation 3.5 whereby contributions were applied to the oldest outstanding arrears, would be commingled. If applied prospectively, amounts owed up to the date of consolidation would be mission-specific, while amounts owed thereafter would not. A mechanism for applying subsequent receipts would need to be developed, and financial regulations and rules changed. For accounts of active peacekeeping missions combined prospectively, transitional measures would be required to provide the missions with sufficient cash from the date of consolidation until the receipt of new assessments, and to prioritize the settlement of liabilities.

As at 30 June 2002, 20 closed peacekeeping missions had combined assets of $1,231 million and combined liabilities amounting to $462 million. Of those 20 missions, 12 had sufficient cash to meet all of their respective outstanding liabilities.

The Secretary-General suggested a phased approach to consolidation, with accounts of active peacekeeping missions being consolidated retroactively, with separate accounts maintained for closed missions. Procedures for the appropriation and assessment of resources would need to be revised. The Assembly resolution on the financing of peacekeeping operations, including the support account and UNLB, would contain a single amount to be appropriated and assessed on Member States, with each operation constituting a section, as in the case of the regular budget, and defining the Secretary-General's authority to transfer funds between peacekeeping operations. Assessments would be de-linked from the continuation of Security Council mandates. That approach would streamline the budget approval process, reduce the number of legislative decisions required and assessments to be approved and facilitate planning for Member States. Unencumbered balances, interest and other miscellaneous income would be offset against the next appropriation for peacekeeping. New peacekeeping operations could be financed in accordance with sections IV and XI of resolution 49/233 A [YUN 1994, p. 1338] and resolution 56/292 [YUN 2002, p. 64]. A consolidated summary of the budgetary requirements would serve as the basis for the Assembly to appropriate funds and decide on the financing of peacekeeping operations. Separate annual budget and performance reports would, however, continue to be prepared for each peacekeeping operation, the support account for peacekeeping operations and UNLB. Financial statements for active missions would report on consolidated expenditures compared to the overall appropriation. Final performance reports and annual updates would not be required for those missions since the accounts would be open-ended. However, final performance reports would continue to be submitted in respect of the closed missions, for which separate accounts would be maintained.

ACABQ, in an April report [A/57/772], acknowledged that the approach outlined by the Secretary-General was not compatible with current financial procedures and pointed out that de-linking assessments from Council action on individual mandates might create complications for some Member States which, in accordance with their domestic legal requirements, required Council action before they could pay assessments. The Assembly should provide further guidance on the matter.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 June [meeting 90], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/57/656/Add.1], adopted resolution 57/319 without vote [agenda item 126].

Feasibility of consolidating the accounts of the various peacekeeping operations

Recalling paragraph 10 of its resolution 56/293 of 27 June 2002,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the feasibility of consolidating the accounts of the various peacekeeping operations and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General and of the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions;

2. Decides to defer consideration of this question until the second part of its resumed fifty-eighth session, and requests the Secretary-General to provide a comprehensive report, taking into account the views expressed, questions raised and information requested by Member States at its fifty-seventh session, including a simulation of the options proposed.

Peacekeeping trust funds

ACABQ action. ACABQ, in an April report on the administrative and budgetary aspects of the financing of peacekeeping operations [A/57/772], considered the question of inactive peacekeeping trust funds. It requested the Secretariat to consult with donor Member States on the disposition of the assets of those trust funds and recommended that the Assembly request Member States concerned to respond promptly to the Secretariat on the matter. The Secretary-General should complete the closing of inactive trust funds within a reasonable time.

OIOS report. In November [A/58/613], pursuant to General Assembly resolutions 48/218 B [YUN 1994, p. 1362], 54/244 [YUN 1999, p. 1274] and 57/278 B (see p. 91), the Secretary-General transmitted to the Assembly the report of OIOS on the administration of peacekeeping trust funds. OIOS conducted an audit of 31 trust funds designated by the Office of Programme Planning, Budget and Accounts (OPPBA) as being related to peacekeeping operations, with a combined balance of $170 million as at 30 June 2002, to assess the effectiveness of their administration. Of the funds reviewed, 11 were active, 8 had ceased operations and showed a combined balance of $53,177,000, with no expenditures during the fiscal year ended 30 June 2002, and 5 others related to closed peacekeeping/political missions had a combined total balance of $3,770,000.

OIOS identified a number of common issues that needed to be addressed, including the role of implementing offices and the need for DPKO to support and monitor the designated executing bodies. To improve the management of the trust funds, OIOS recommended that, when the original purpose of a trust fund had been fulfilled or the implementing office had ceased operations, OPPBA should recommend to the donor(s) re-directing the remaining resources and designating a new implementing office, or closing the trust fund and returning the unspent balance to the donor(s). DPKO should issue a standard operating procedures manual for administering peacekeeping trust funds, which should include guidelines for determining advances and progress payments to the executing agencies, and financial reporting formats. DPKO should, in cooperation with OPPBA, develop a mechanism to finance the administrative and management costs of peacekeeping trust funds. To enhance transparency of trust fund utilization, DPKO should establish a web site to publicize information on trust fund activities and fund balances.

All the recommendations were accepted by either OPPBA or DPKO.

Apportionment of costs

In a July report with a later addendum [A/58/157 & Add.1], the Secretary-General described the implementation of General Assembly resolution 55/235 [YUN 2000, p. 102], by which the Assembly adopted a new system of adjustments of the scale of assessments for the regular budget to be used in fixing rates of assessment applicable to Member States for peacekeeping operations, and resolution 55/236 [ibid., p. 104] establishing the criteria for voluntary movements within that system. Annexed to the report were: the list of peacekeeping levels, based on average per capita gross national income of Member States and other factors; and a table showing the initial levels and voluntary and ad hoc movements for 2001-2003, the initial composition of levels and assumed voluntary and ad hoc movements for 2004-2006, and relevant transitional periods, and the respective percentage of rates of assessment for the regular budget payable by each Member State for peacekeeping operations during 2004-2006. In resolution 55/235, the Assembly had, as an ad hoc arrangement, decided on a graduated rate for the share of the Republic of Korea in the costs of peacekeeping operations, ranging from 36 per cent of the regular budget assessment rate on 1 July 2001 and reaching 100 per cent in 2005. On 10 July 2003, the Republic of Korea requested that it be assigned to level D of the system for establishing rates of assessment. The updated composition levels, subject to the Assembly's decision with respect to the placement of the Republic of Korea in 2004-2005, would be used, together with the scale of assessments for 2004-2006, to establish each Member State's peacekeeping rate(s) of assessment.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 23 December [meeting 79], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/58/381], adopted resolution 58/256 without vote [agenda item 133].

Scale of assessments for the apportionment of the expenses of United Nations peacekeeping operations

Recalling its resolutions 55/235 and 55/236 of 23 December 2000,

Recalling also its request to the Secretary-General in its resolution 55/235 to update the composition of the levels of contribution of Member States for peacekeeping operations described therein on a triennial basis, in conjunction with the regular budget scale of assessment reviews, in accordance with the criteria established in the resolution, and to report thereon to the General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of its resolutions 55/235 and 55/236,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General and of the updated composition of levels of contribution for peacekeeping operations for the period 2004 to 2006 contained therein;

2. Endorses the updated composition of levels of contribution for peacekeeping operations for the period 2004 to 2006 contained in the addendum to the report of the Secretary-General;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its sixty-first session on the updating of the composition of levels of contribution for peacekeeping operations for the period 2007 to 2009, in accordance with the provisions of resolution 55/235.

Also on 23 December, the Assembly decided that the item on the scale of assessments for the apportionment of expenses of UN peacekeeping operations would remain for consideration at its resumed fifty-eighth (2004) session (decision 58/565).

Accounts and auditing

At its resumed fifty-seventh session, the General Assembly considered the financial report and audited financial statements for UN peacekeeping operations for the 12-month period 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002 [A/57/5, vol. II & Corr.5], the Secretary-General's report on the implementation of the recommendations of the Board of Auditors [A/57/416/Add.2] and the related ACABQ report [A/57/772].

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 June [meeting 90], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/57/639/Add.1], adopted resolution 57/278 B without vote [agenda item 110].

Financial reports and audited financial statements, and reports of the Board of Auditors

The General Assembly,

Having considered the financial report and audited financial statements for the twelve-month period from 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002 and the report of the Board of Auditors on the United Nations peacekeeping operations, the related section of the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions and the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of the recommendations of the Board of Auditors concerning United Nations peacekeeping operations in respect of that period,

1. Accepts the audited financial statements of the United Nations peacekeeping operations for the period from 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002;

2. Takes note of the observations and endorses the recommendations of the Board of Auditors contained in its report;

3. Also takes note of the observations and endorses the recommendations contained in the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions related to the report of the Board of Auditors;

4. Commends the Board of Auditors for the quality of its report and the streamlined format thereof;

5. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of the recommendations of the Board of Auditors concerning United Nations peacekeeping operations in respect of the financial period ended 30 June 2002;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to ensure that internal control in peacekeeping missions is improved with respect to the optimum use of audit resources;

7. Also requests the Secretary-General to ensure the full implementation of the recommendations of the Board of Auditors and the related recommendations of the Advisory Committee in a prompt and timely manner;

8. Further requests the Secretary-General to submit the report of the Office of Internal Oversight Services referred to in paragraph 26 of the report of the Board of Auditors to the General Assembly at its fifty-eighth session.

Resident auditors and investigators

Board of Auditors. The Board of Auditors, in its report on the audit of UN peacekeeping operations for the period 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002 [A/57/5, vol. II & Corr.5], indicated that it had followed up on the action taken by the Internal Audit Division to implement the seven recommendations made in its report for the financial period ended 30 June 2001 [YUN 2002, p. 79]. One recommendation (14 per cent) had been fully implemented and six (86 per cent) were under implementation. The Board recommended that the Internal Audit Division review the standard terms of reference of resident auditors.

ACABQ consideration. ACABQ, in its April report [A/57/772], noting that some 60 per cent of the Board's audit activity was carried out in field offices and peacekeeping missions, said that such fieldwork would be considerably facilitated if the Secretariat and OIOS were to ensure that the internal audit function and the resident audit capacity in peacekeeping missions were operating effectively and efficiently. Having considered the Secretary-General's 2002 report on the experience with resident investigators in peacekeeping operations [YUN 2002, p. 80], the Committee noted that OIOS was pleased with the results of mission-based investigations. However, ACABQ was concerned that the demonstrated growth in cases in the missions might have resulted from an increasing number of administrative management cases referred by mission management to OIOS investigators. Noting the OIOS observation that many peacekeeping cases routinely remained on the inactive list owing to a lack of resources to conduct investigations, ACABQ stated that there was a need to refine further the methodology for determining the cases to be investigated by OIOS, so that cases related to administrative management issues would be investigated and resolved expeditiously by the mission management itself. Based on the information provided to it, ACABQ was unable to assess whether the recommendations of the Board of Auditors on the capacity of the resident auditors to perform structured value-for-money and information and communication technology audits were being implemented or were even implementable.

Reimbursement issues

Equipment

The General Assembly, at its resumed fifty-seventh session, considered the Secretary-

General's 2002 reports [YUN 2002, pp. 81-82] on the processing of claims for equipment contributed and self-sustainment undertaken at peacekeeping missions [A/C.5/56/44], on the reform of the procedure for determining reimbursement to Member States for contingent-owned equipment [A/56/999] and on the practical aspects of wet-lease, dry-lease and self-sustainment arrangements [A/57/397].

ACABQ report. ACABQ, in April [A/57/772], considered the report of the Board of Auditors (see above) and the Secretary-General's 2002 reports concerning equipment [YUN 2002, p. 81].

With regard to staff capacity and expertise in the field to manage the contingent-owned equipment system, ACABQ stated that, given the importance of the subject, further progress needed to be made on the matter. It stressed the importance of further review by the Board of Auditors of such issues as memorandums of understanding, pre-deployment inspections, arrival inspections, and verification reports and personnel resources. It noted that memorandums of understanding and status-of-forces agreements had been fraught with problems and delays and expressed concern that the United Nations was often forced to start mission operations without those instruments in place. ACABQ recognized the need to streamline the process for negotiating and approving memorandums of understanding, including reducing the number of steps involved with a view to signing them before deployment. The Secretariat should analyse the experience and make suggestions for possible changes at the next meeting of the Working Group on Reimbursement of Contingent-owned Equipment in 2004.

Noting the discrepancies between equipment negotiated in memorandums of understanding with troop-contributing countries and what was actually deployed, ACABQ recognized the importance of pre-deployment inspections to improve the content of the memorandums of understanding, reduce the possibility of variances in equipment and self-sustainment and improve claims processing. It welcomed the suggestions contained in the Secretary-General's 2002 reports on streamlining the production and processing of verification reports, including electronic submission, and trusted that a reduction in the frequency of reporting requirements would not affect the completion and quality of the reports, and consequent certification and payment of reimbursement for contingent-owned equipment claims. ACABQ recommended that the Secretariat make suggestions to the Working Group on Reimbursement of Contingent-owned Equipment for modifying the current monthly reporting cycle, which was considered too laborious and inefficient, while ensuring that the services contracted for were provided in a timely manner and without compromising the prompt processing of claims and reimbursement.

ACABQ looked forward to the implementation of the plan to process all claims for major equipment contributed and self-sustainment undertaken at peacekeeping operations and suggested that efforts should continue for the early reimbursement of troop costs and amounts held under accounts payable. Those countries that were not in the new contingent-owned equipment arrangement should be encouraged to join, which would end the write-off phenomenon (see below). The Secretariat should prepare a comprehensive working paper, including input data, to facilitate and focus the work of the 2004 meeting of the Working Group on Reimbursement of Contingent-owned Equipment. On the basis of the Working Group's recommendations, the Secretariat should prepare a comprehensive report on the issues that would require legislative action by the General Assembly.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 June [meeting 90], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/57/656/Add.1], adopted resolution 57/314 without vote [agenda item 126].

Management of contingent-owned equipment arrangements

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 49/233 A of 23 December 1994, 50/222 of 11 April 1996, 51/218 E of 17 June 1997, 54/19 A of 29 October 1999 and 54/19 B of 15 June 2000, 55/238 of 23 December 2000, paragraph 12 of resolution 55/271 of 14 June 2001, and resolutions 55/274 of 14 June 2001 and 56/241 of 24 December 2001,

Recalling also its decision 55/452 of 23 December 2000 to convene the post-Phase V Working Group,

Recalling further its resolution 55/274 of 14 June 2001, in which the Secretary-General was requested to convene in 2004 an open-ended working group of experts, for a period of no less than ten working days, to hold a triennial review of reimbursement rates for contingent-owned equipment and self-sustainment, including medical services,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General, on the processing of claims for equipment contributed and self-sustainment undertaken at peacekeeping missions, on the reform of the procedures for determining reimbursement to Member States for contingent-owned equipment and troop costs, and on the practical aspects of wet-lease, dry-lease and self-sustainment arrangements and the section of the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions on the management of contingent-owned equipment arrangements,

1. Takes note of the reports of the Secretary-General;

2. Also takes note of the observations and recommendations of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions on the management of contingent-owned equipment arrangements, as contained in paragraphs 60 to 76 of its report;

3. Affirms the importance of conducting peacekeeping operations with the maximum of efficiency and effectiveness and the need to minimize delays in processing reimbursements to troop- and equipment-contributing countries;

4. Recognizes the fact that delay and uncertainty in reimbursements to troop-contributing countries of troop and contingent-owned equipment costs adversely affect the ability of current and potential troop-contributing countries to participate effectively in United Nations peacekeeping operations, and in this context emphasizes the need for all Member States to pay their assessed contributions to all peacekeeping operations in full, on time and without conditions;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a comprehensive report, taking into account, inter alia, the observations of the Advisory Committee and based on the experience gained so far, and make suggestions for any modification to the current reporting cycle to the Working Group on Reimbursement of Contingent-owned Equipment at its forthcoming meeting, scheduled for February 2004;

6. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit a comprehensive report, on the basis of recommendations of the Working Group, on issues that would require legislative action by the General Assembly at its fifty-ninth session.

Write-off of contingent-owned equipment

Note of Secretary-General. In response to General Assembly decision 56/470 [YUN 2002, p. 81], the Secretary-General submitted an April note [A/57/788] summarizing the status of the processing and settlement of contingent-owned equipment written off at seven liquidated missions. He said that all of the 1,365 cases pending for the 2001-2002 period had been processed. Out of the total reimbursable amount of $34,818,855, $27,561,460 had been paid. Of the remaining amount, $2,348,538 was under certification/placed in accounts payable; $3,861,455 was awaiting the concurrence of five Member States; $1,047,403 was awaiting funding for certification; and $67,727 had been placed in accounts receivable. The Secretariat was requesting Member States to concur with the proposed amounts in order to certify those claims by 30 June 2003.

By decision 57/590 of 18 June, the Assembly concurred with the Secretariat's request.

Troops

In response to General Assembly resolution 55/274 [YUN 2001, p. 100], the Secretary-General, in April, submitted a report [A/57/774] in which he proposed a new methodology for reimbursement to Governments of troop costs, covering troops and formed police units. The proposed methodology for the review of rates of reimbursement was predicated on direct costs incurred by troop contributors and simplicity of the data collection, and analysis and efficiency in the reimbursement process. The troop-cost components would be maintained, with the addition of post-deployment medical costs and peacekeeping-related training costs. The coverage of the survey would be maintained, with specific guidelines set out in the questionnaire for the number of military personnel on which the response was to be based. Cost information for military observers would be excluded. The items of personal clothing, personal gear and equipment would be modified to reflect the soldier's kit. Medical requirements, excluding those considered as national responsibility or endemic to specific peacekeeping operations, would be revised on the basis of the manual on contingent-owned equipment. Requirements for peacekeeping-related training would be updated on the basis of the proposed DPKO training manual. The proposed methodology would also include criteria for determining the validity of the survey. The Secretary-General proposed that the Assembly consider changing the periodicity of the review to a five-year cycle. The proposed questionnaire, which was annexed to the Secretary-General's report, would reflect the cost components in the new methodology.

In introducing the report in the Fifth Committee [A/C.5/57/SR.52], the UN Controller noted that it had taken into account the views of Member States as reflected in the proposals of the post-Phase V Working Group on reformed procedures for determining reimbursement of contingent-owned equipment [YUN 2001, p. 100], which had failed to agree on a methodology for determining reimbursement. The general principles to be taken into account in the reimbursement of troop costs should be built into the Organization's agreements with troop contributors.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 June [meeting 90], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/57/656/Add.1], adopted resolution 57/321 without vote [agenda item 126].

Review of the rates of reimbursement to the Governments of troop-contributing States

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the review of the rates of reimbursement to the Governments of troop-contributing States,

1. Decides to request the Working Group on reform procedures for determining reimbursement of contingent-owned equipment to consider the proposed methodology contained in the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Requests the Working Group to report on the results of its review to the General Assembly at its fifty-ninth session through the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions.

Management of peacekeeping assets

Liquidation

The General Assembly had before it in June the Secretary-General's 2002 report [YUN 2002, p. 83], by which he transmitted the OIOS update of the status of implementation of its recommendations on mission liquidation activities at the United Nations [A/56/896] and a follow-up review of the status of those recommendations [A/57/622]. It also considered ACABQ's April report [A/57/772], which concluded, from the findings and observations of the Board of Auditors on the liquidation of field missions [A/57/5, vol. II], that numerous problems relating to liquidation had occurred because of the lack of budgeting, finance, accounting, procurement and inventory management skills. ACABQ stressed that staff possessing those skills in missions under liquidation should be given the opportunity to serve in other missions. Recalling its earlier comments on the persistent weaknesses of the mission liquidation process and the lengthy period between the end of a mission and the date of the final performance report, ACABQ remained concerned that all the weaknesses relating to the Secretariat's capacity to handle liquidations and other related tasks had not been fully addressed. Moreover, the expected guidelines for mission liquidation had not been promulgated. The Committee noted some improvements in the liquidation of UNMIBH (see p. 398), but was not convinced that a roster of properly qualified and experienced personnel in mission liquidation was being maintained. ACABQ recommended that the Secretary-General make innovative proposals for using and retaining peacekeeping operation personnel in those areas. However, it stressed that contractual appointments of limited duration to work for peacekeeping operations should not give rise to expectations of offers of career appointments at the United Nations.

By decision 57/588 of 18 June, the Assembly deferred until its fifty-eighth session consideration of the OIOS 2002 reports.

Field assets control system

In response to General Assembly resolution 56/290 [YUN 2002, p. 83], the Secretary-General submitted a March report on progress in the implementation of the field assets control system (FACS) [A/57/765], covering developments since his previous report in 2001 [YUN 2001, p. 102]. The Secretary-General said that the Communications and Information Technology Service had decided that FACS should be phased out by mid-2004 and replaced by an upgraded web-based system, Galileo, using structured query language. The new system would include additional data-management, analysis and reporting tools for more effective, reliable and timely information management and enhanced data exchange and reporting. Galileo would be centrally managed and administered from UNLB and UN Headquarters. It would enhance the ability of the Logistics Support Division to effectively monitor property records and allow other field missions to review the property registers of existing missions to maximize the use of the Organization's assets. The web-based system would also enhance real-time reporting and be more intuitive and user-friendly.

The Galileo system, which would be integrated with the Mercury procurement system and the Integrated Management Information System, would be implemented at UNLB in July and at Headquarters in August 2003, and would be deployed in all current missions by March 2004. Once Galileo was fully implemented in all missions, FACS would be decommissioned.

By decision 57/588 of 18 June, the Assembly deferred to its fifty-eighth (2003) session consideration of the Secretary-General's report on FACS.

Procurement and inventory management

ACABQ, in April [A/57/772], noted that the Board of Auditors, in its report for the financial period ended 30 June 2002 [A/57/5, vol. III], had identified problems in procurement and contract management relating to the issue of a code of ethics for procurement and inadequate training of procurement officers, among other issues. ACABQ found timely and essential the Board's recommendation that the Administration expedite the promulgation and implementation of a code of ethics and declaration of independence by all staff members associated with the procurement cycle. It welcomed the Board's intention to update the audit manual to take account of best practices, and requested the Board to follow up on the implementation of its recommendation on a code of ethics.

With regard to training, ACABQ trusted that the implementation of the Procurement Division's training programme would eliminate the deficiencies identified by the Board. It noted DPKO's intention to conduct a comprehensive review of the acquisition process and requested the Board to follow up on the issues reflected in its report and to include the related information in its next audit report on peacekeeping operations.

As to inventory management, ACABQ was concerned that no progress had been made in achieving efficiency in recording and accounting for inventory and in the work of the Local Property Survey Boards. It stressed that the volume and value of the Organization's inventory in peacekeeping operations demanded that greater attention be paid to proper and effective inventory management, including disposal of obsolete and unusable assets. The Administration should report to the Board of Auditors on the implementation of its recommendations on inventory management and the Board was asked to ascertain whether changes had been made to remedy the inefficiency and other weaknesses it had identified in its current and previous audits.

In resolution 57/290 B of 18 June (see p. 83), the Assembly requested the Secretary-General to submit to its resumed fifty-eighth (2004) session a comprehensive report on procurement and contract management for peacekeeping operations.

OIOS report. In January [A/57/718], the Secretary-General, in response to General Assembly resolutions 48/218 B [YUN 1994, p. 1362] and 54/244 [YUN 1999, p. 1274], transmitted the OIOS report on the audit of the procurement of goods and services by DPKO through letters of assist to determine the effectiveness of that procurement method and DPKO's compliance with the relevant Financial Regulations and Rules. A sample of 35 letters of assist valued at $71.4 million was reviewed out of the 274 issued by DPKO valued at $183 million during 2000-2001.

The audit showed that the Procurement Division of the Office of Central Support Services had not revised the guidelines for administering letters of assist, nor had DPKO drawn up a comprehensive list of strictly military goods and services that were unavailable through commercial sources. Letters of assist sometimes included goods and services that could be procured from commercial sources through competitive bidding. DPKO's Finance Management and Support Service had made $11.6 million in payments before the relevant letters of assist were completed and/or signed by the providing Government and had processed claims for goods and services without the required letters of assist. DPKO's selection criteria were also unclear.

To increase transparency and ensure more economical procurement, OIOS recommended that DPKO: ensure that letters of assist were expeditiously prepared and submitted for government signature in order to adequately obligate funds and support payments; promulgate, in consultation with the Procurement Division, revised guidelines for letters of assist that specified the prerequisites for their use, included selection procedures, and required the use of cost-comparison methods; discontinue the use of letters of assist for procuring medical supplies, transferring that responsibility to the Procurement Division, except for supplies provided under memorandums of understanding with Member States; establish, in cooperation with the Procurement Division, a roster of Governments willing to provide goods and services under letters of assist and develop competitive procurement procedures for their award; and ensure that the issuance of letters of assist was based on adequate cost comparison and analysis of competitive offers obtained from the largest possible number of Member States.

OIOS also recommended that the UN Controller review and authorize the payment of claims that were not supported by a duly signed letter of assist after obtaining the necessary justification for such claims from DPKO.

The Assembly, in resolution 57/287 C of 15 April (see p. 1387), requested the Secretary-General to ensure that the applicable OIOS recommendations were implemented fully by relevant departments and peacekeeping missions.

UN Logistics Base

The General Assembly, at its resumed fifty-seventh session, considered the financial performance report of the United Nations Logistics Base in Brindisi for the period 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002 [A/57/671]. Expenditures for the period totalled $8,970,800 gross ($8,149,600 net), resulting in an unencumbered balance of $11,800 gross ($24,800 net). The Assembly was asked to take action on that balance and on the interest income of $289,000, other/miscellaneous income of $156,000 and savings on or cancellation of prior-period obligations of $246,000.

The Assembly also had before it the proposed budget for the period 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004, amounting to $23,262,900 gross ($22,004,400 net) [A/57/670 & Corr.1], which represented an increase of $8,969,700 gross in total resources in relation to the apportionment for the previous period. The proposed increase reflected an 11.9 per cent rise in civilian personnel costs, a 103.1 per cent increase in operational costs, and a 2.7 per cent increase in staff assessment. The budget provided for the deployment of 37 international and 99 national staff.

Commenting on the performance report for 2001/02, ACABQ, in April [A/57/772/Add.9], requested that information on the technique used and the experience gained in identifying and estimating the cost of each service provided on a reimbursable basis be made available to peacekeeping missions, and that a methodology for reflecting the impact of reimbursable expenditure in the budget estimates be developed and used in the next budget estimate.

Regarding the 2003/04 budget estimates, ACABQ recommended that the current budget presentation be maintained, and that the Secretary-General consolidate the report on the implementation of the strategic deployment stocks with that on the budget and performance of UNLB. It requested a comprehensive examination of the merits of transferring to UNLB post and non-post resources of the support account for peacekeeping operations earmarked for meeting communications and information technology needs and retaining at Headquarters only a few posts for policy and liaison functions. It did not recommend approval of the proposed increases for miscellaneous supplies, services and equipment, training and travel. ACABQ recommended that the unencumbered balance and other income from the previous period be applied to the 2003/04 proposed budget and that the Assembly approve cost estimates of $22,208,100 gross for the period 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004.

In June [A/C.5/57/38], the Secretary-General submitted to the Fifth Committee a note on the amounts to be apportioned in respect of each peacekeeping mission, including the prorated share of UNLB for the period 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 June [meeting 90], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/57/656/Add.1], adopted resolution 57/320 without vote [agenda item 126].

Financing of the United Nations Logistics Base at Brindisi, Italy

The General Assembly,

Recalling section XIV of its resolution 49/233 A of 23 December 1994,

Recalling also its decision 50/500 of 17 September 1996 on the financing of the United Nations Logistics Base at Brindisi, Italy, and its subsequent resolutions thereon, the latest of which was resolution 56/289 of 27 June 2002,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Logistics Base and the related reports of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Reiterating the importance of establishing an accurate inventory of assets,

1. Notes with appreciation the facilities provided by the Government of Italy to the United Nations Logistics Base at Brindisi, Italy;

2. Takes note of the reports of the Secretary-General;

3. Endorses the observations and recommendations contained in the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to include in his report on a comprehensive examination of the merits of establishing a global procurement hub for all peacekeeping missions in Brindisi recommended by the Advisory Committee, the merits of relocating to Brindisi all support account post and non-post resources at Headquarters pertaining to the Logistics Division, as well as those related to communications and information technology services related to peacekeeping missions;

5. Reiterates the need to implement, as a matter of priority, an effective inventory management standard, especially in respect of peacekeeping operations involving high inventory value;

Financial performance report for the period from 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002

6. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the financial performance of the United Nations Logistics Base for the period from 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002;

Budget estimates for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004

7. Approves the cost estimates for the United Nations Logistics Base amounting to 22,208,100 United States dollars for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004;

Financing of the cost estimates

8. Decides to apply the unencumbered balance and other income in the total amount of 702,800 dollars in respect of the financial period ended 30 June 2002 to the resources required for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004;

9. Decides also that the increase in the estimated staff assessment income of 13,000 dollars in respect of the financial period ended 30 June 2002 shall be added to the credits from the amount referred to in paragraph 8 above;

10. Decides further to prorate the balance of 21,505,300 dollars among the individual active peacekeeping operation budgets to meet the financing requirements of the United Nations Logistics Base for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004;

11. Decides to set off against the balance referred to in paragraph 10 above the estimated staff assessment income of 1,258,500 dollars for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004, to be prorated among the individual active peacekeeping operation budgets;

12. Decides also to consider during its fifty-eighth session the question of the financing of the United Nations Logistics Base.

On 23 December, on the basis of a recommendation by the Secretary-General [A/58/596], supported by ACABQ [A/58/609], the Assembly, by decision 58/557, approved the transfer of five additional buildings pledged by Italy to UNLB. (See p. 1500 for further details.)

Personnel matters

Mission subsistence allowance

On 23 December [meeting 79], the General Assembly, having considered the 2001 OIOS report [YUN 2001, p. 104] [A/56/648] on the audit of the establishment and management of mission subsistence allowance rates, adopted, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/58/582], resolution 58/258 without vote [agenda item 134].

Report of the Office of Internal Oversight Services on the audit of the establishment and management of mission subsistence allowance rates

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 48/218 B of 29 July 1994 and 54/244 of 23 December 1999,

Having considered the report of the Office of Internal Oversight Services on the audit of the establishment and management of mission subsistence allowance rates,

1. Takes note of the report of the Office of Internal Oversight Services on the audit of the establishment and management of mission subsistence allowance rates;

2. Reaffirms its resolution 56/246 of 24 December 2001, in particular paragraph 8;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to entrust the Office of Internal Oversight Services with the submission of an updated report on the question of mission subsistence allowance rates to the General Assembly at the second part of its resumed fifty-eighth session.

Death and disability benefits

At its resumed fifty-seventh session, the General Assembly considered the Secretary-General's annual reports on the processing of death and disability claims in 2001 [YUN 2002, p. 85] and 2002 [A/C.5/57/37], submitted in response to Assembly decision 54/459 B [YUN 2000, p. 113] and ACABQ recommendations [YUN 2001, p. 105]. He indicated that, during 2002, 82 claims were received, bringing the total number of claims available for processing to 160. Of that number, 126 were processed for a total value of $2,962,236, leaving 34 pending as at 31 December 2002, including 21 for which documentation from troop contributors was lacking. All claims based on the old methodology had been processed. The new methodology was working well and the Claims and Information Management Section had been able to process claims in a timely manner. The Secretary-General suggested that the Assembly might consider whether there was a continuing need for annual reporting outside the framework of the overall claims processing.

ACABQ, in April [A/57/772], recommended that future information on death and disability benefits be included in the overview of the general report on peacekeeping operations.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 June [meeting 90], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/57/656/Add.1], adopted resolution 57/316 without vote [agenda item 126].

Death and disability benefits

The General Assembly,

Having considered the notes by the Secretary-General on death and disability benefits, as well as the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

1. Takes note of the notes by the Secretary-General on death and disability benefits;
2. Decides that, in future, information on death and disability benefits shall be included in the overview of the general report on peacekeeping operations.

Recruitment policies and procedures

ACABQ, in April [A/57/772], pointed out that delays and deficiencies continued to plague DPKO recruitment and placement activities. Taking into account the information that upon implementation of the new staff selection system (Galaxy) the targeted time frame for filling vacancies in peacekeeping operations would be reduced from 180 to 95 days, ACABQ recommended that the General Assembly consider establishing a procedure whereby any post that became vacant or any new post that was not filled within 12 months after it became vacant or was approved should be deemed to have lapsed. It encouraged greater use of national staff, whose designation currently included both national professional officers and local staff, wherever feasible and cost-effective. While not objecting to the practice of reassigning national staff from one mission to another, since it could temporarily provide urgently needed skills at short notice, particularly in the start-up phase of new missions, ACABQ cautioned that missions needed to recruit their own staff as quickly as possible. It decided to revert to the matter in the context of its examination of the Secretary-General's report on the future of Field Service officers and to follow up on the review of the Field Service category when considering the peacekeeping budgets in 2004. Noting the considerable underexpenditure for the period 2001/02 in the civilian personnel component of some missions, resulting from the recruitment of international staff below approved grades, ACABQ was of the view that when posts were consistently filled at lower levels in missions with limited duration, the level of the higher graded posts should be reviewed and reclassified accordingly.

In general, ACABQ was of the opinion that missions should have greater authority in the hiring and management of staff. Missions needed to plan and manage more carefully the departure of staff, particularly heads of services, including the preparation of handing-over notes. There should be more collaboration among missions and between the missions and Headquarters on of that issue and on staff mobility between Headquarters and missions.

The Assembly, in resolution 57/290 B of 18 June (see p. 83), endorsed ACABQ's observations and recommendations on the recruitment of DPKO personnel.

Field Service category of staff

On 18 June [meeting 90], the General Assembly, having considered the 2001 OIOS report [YUN 2001, p. 106] [A/56/202] on the audit of the policies and procedures of DPKO for the recruitment of international civilian staff for field missions, adopted, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/57/656/Add.1], resolution 57/322 without vote [agenda item 126].

Report of the Office of Internal Oversight Services on the audit of the policies and procedures of the Department of Peacekeeping Operations for recruiting international civilian staff for field missions

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 48/218 B of 29 July 1994 and 54/244 of 23 December 1999,

Having considered the report of the Office of Internal Oversight Services on the audit of the policies and procedures of the Department of Peacekeeping Operations for recruiting international civilian staff for field missions,

1. Takes note of the report of the Office of Internal Oversight Services;
2. Requests the Secretary-General to conduct, through the Office of Internal Oversight Services, a follow-up audit of the policies and procedures for recruiting international civilian staff for field missions, and to submit a report thereon to the General Assembly for its consideration at its resumed fifty-eighth session.

On 23 December [meeting 79], the Assembly, having considered the 2002 report [YUN 2002, p. 86] [A/57/78] of the Joint Inspection Unit on reforming the Field Service category of staff in UN peace operations, the Secretary-General's comments thereon [A/57/78/Add.1] and those of ACABQ [A/57/434], adopted, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/58/582], resolution 58/257 without vote [agenda item 134].

Report of the Joint Inspection Unit on reforming the Field Service category of personnel in United Nations peace operations

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Joint Inspection Unit on reforming the Field Service category of personnel in United Nations peace operations and the note by the Secretary-General transmitting his comments thereon,

Having also considered the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

1. Takes note of the report of the Joint Inspection Unit on reforming the Field Service category of personnel in United Nations peace operations and of the comments of the Secretary-General thereon;
2. Also takes note of the related observations and recommendations made by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions;
3. Approves recommendations 1 to 6 contained in the report of the Joint Inspection Unit.

Temporary assignments

In response to General Assembly decision 56/471 [YUN 2002, p. 86], the Secretary-General submitted, in April, a report on assignment of staff in peacekeeping missions [A/57/787]. The report reviewed each category of mission staff eligible for detail or reassignment to, or between, DPKO field missions and outlined the application and selection processes. It also reviewed the related organizational policy and guidelines in the light of relevant administrative instructions and improvements in the Department's internal mechanisms for addressing vacancy and mobility issues in field missions. Since March 2002, vacancy announcements, either generic or specific, had become the normal means of filling vacant posts in field missions; all prospective applicants had access to those announcements through the DPKO web site. Inherent in the wider use of vacancy announcements was a more transparent and competitive process providing enhanced opportunities for career development and mobility of all UN staff, international and locally recruited, in field missions.

To further enhance the integrity of the recruitment and selection process, DPKO had trained all of its mission Placement Officers and Chief Civilian Personnel Officers in competency-based interviewing. In March, it launched the Rapid Deployment Roster to enhance its ability to deploy pre-screened and pre-trained experienced field staff to a new mission within 14 days.

In conclusion, the Secretary-General stated that perhaps the most critical constraint limiting career and mobility of civilian staff in field missions was the recent reduction in the total number of posts in peacekeeping operations. However, the enhanced recruitment, selection and reassignment mechanisms were ensuring that DPKO civilian staff had greater opportunity than at any previous time to pursue and achieve career and mobility goals.

In decision 57/588 of 18 June, the Assembly deferred until its fifty-eighth session consideration of the Secretary-General's report.

UN Volunteers

By decision 58/564 A of 23 December, the General Assembly deferred until its resumed fifty-eighth (2004) session consideration of the Secretary-General's 2001 report [YUN 2001, p. 814] on the participation of United Nations Volunteers in peacekeeping operations.

Conduct and discipline

The Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations [A/57/767] affirmed the need to ensure that all UN peacekeeping personnel functioned in a manner that preserved the image, credibility, impartiality and integrity of the Organization. The Committee fully supported DPKO's initiatives to prevent misconduct, including the abuse of power and sexual exploitation, and emphasized the need to build greater awareness among UN peacekeepers of their responsibilities, including through improved pre-deployment training; it encouraged the Department to continue to develop training materials to that end.

The Special Committee recommended that common principles and guidelines for accountability be developed and incorporated into the training of UN personnel deployed in peacekeeping missions. It agreed that a single standard of conduct should apply to all peacekeeping personnel and asked the Secretariat, in consultation with troop-contributing countries, to develop a common understanding and agreed procedures for handling cases of alleged violations of the peacekeeping code of conduct. Considering that, in handling such cases, there was the need for agreement on applicable laws, the Committee requested the Secretariat to convene a meeting with Member States in 2003 to discuss ways of meeting the challenges in that area and minimizing misconduct.

The Special Committee emphasized that cases of alleged misconduct should be handled through cooperation between troop-contributing countries concerned and the mission leadership, including with regard to public information, and the need for taking action while respecting national laws. It urged the Secretariat to involve the contributing country concerned from the very outset in an investigation into any case of alleged misconduct, and to make the outcome of the investigation, including all related evidence, available to that country, in order to enable its national judicial authorities to take legal steps.

Mine action

Special Committee consideration. The Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations

[A/57/767], aware of the important role mine action could play in peacekeeping operations, said that mine action activities should be implemented in such a manner that their viable continuity was guaranteed to the maximum degree possible. It welcomed the ongoing "Study of the role of the military in mine action" being conducted at the request of the United Nations by the Geneva International Centre for Humanitarian Demining (GICHD) and hoped that its results would be useful for troop-contributing countries in conducting mine action tasks in peacekeeping operations. The Committee welcomed the rapid response plan in support of the emergency deployment of mine action assets in peacekeeping operations and humanitarian programmes, and encouraged the coordination of mine action training and mine-risk education material and procedures used by troop-contributing countries and relevant UN agencies.

Security Council consideration. On 13 November [meeting 4858], the Security Council considered the importance of mine action for peacekeeping operations. The meeting was addressed by the Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations and Martin Dahinden, Director of GICHD.

The Under-Secretary-General said that, since the Council last considered the issue [YUN 1996, p. 42], UN mine action had made remarkable progress. The United Nations Mine Action Service within DPKO, the United Nations Development Programme and the United Nations Children's Fund were the lead actors in undertaking and coordinating mine action initiatives. The Council was going one step further by acknowledging the contribution of mine action to peacekeeping operations and to efforts to maintain international peace and security. The meeting offered an opportunity for the Council to call on a range of actors to undertake specific actions that could greatly enhance mine action in a peacekeeping context. To that end, he raised a number of issues the Council might wish to consider and address. Firstly, although there was a strong normative framework on landmines, an instrument that addressed unexploded ordnance and other explosive remnants of war would greatly facilitate post-conflict clearance efforts. The rights of mine survivors should also be reflected in the proposed international convention on protection and promotion of the rights and dignity of persons with disabilities being discussed in the General Assembly (see p. 1107). Secondly, parties to conflict should be aware of the important confidence-building role that mine action could play, and the United Nations could ensure that special representatives of the Secretary-General, negotiators, moderators and facilitators of peace processes systematically received the United Nations Mine Action Guidelines for Ceasefire and Peace Agreements. The Council could urge parties to conflicts to incorporate mine action into their discussions, whenever relevant. Thirdly, peacekeeping troops could play an important role in mine clearance and, in that regard, the Council should consider calling on troop-contributing countries to train their peacekeeping troops to demine in accordance with the International Mine Action Standards developed by GICHD. Fourthly, peacekeeping missions could collect information on the scope and impact of the landmine and unexploded ordnance problem, and fifthly, mine action could be an important part of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programmes.

Member States should be encouraged to provide adequate and sustained financial assistance for mine action, thereby alleviating the suffering of populations affected by mines, unexploded ordnance and other explosive remnants of war.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 19 November [meeting 4864], following consultations among Security Council members, the President made statement S/PRST/2003/22 on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council expresses its grave concern at the harmful and widespread impact of landmines and unexploded ordnance on civilian populations, especially children, and on humanitarian workers and United Nations staff and, in this regard, stresses the vital importance of eliminating the threat of landmines.

The Council recognizes the long-term consequences of landmines and unexploded ordnance for durable peace, security and development.

The Council welcomes the effective coordination of mine action activities within the United Nations system and the important mandate of the United Nations Mine Action Service of the Department of Peacekeeping Operations, in particular its role in ensuring the coordination of mine action throughout the United Nations system and the provision of support to multidimensional peacekeeping operations, as well as the role of the United Nations Development Programme in addressing the problem from a development perspective, and providing technical, management and resource mobilization assistance to Governments of mine-affected States, and the role of the United Nations Children's Fund as the lead agency for mine-risk education. The Council also recognizes the significant contribution to mine action made by States, international and regional organizations and local and international non-governmental organizations.

The Council urges all Member States to respect relevant international law that addresses landmines and unexploded ordnance, and the rights of persons affected by them, stressing the importance of international technical assistance in helping mine-affected States to harmonize their domestic laws with international obligations.

The Council urges all parties to armed conflicts to abide by their mine-related commitments, to cooperate to the fullest extent possible, with mine-risk education and mine-clearing activities, and to ensure that abandoned stockpiles are adequately guarded or destroyed.

The Council encourages Governments whose countries are affected by the presence of landmines and unexploded ordnance to include a mine action impact assessment in all development planning and to incorporate a strategic plan for mine action in the national development plans and poverty reduction strategies.

The Council recognizes that mine action can play an important role in peace-building and confidence-building in post-conflict situations, and encourages mine-affected States to strengthen cooperation with the United Nations, relevant non-governmental organizations and civil society, where appropriate.

The Council calls upon the Secretary-General to provide information on the scope and humanitarian impact of the mine and unexploded ordnance problem in all relevant country-specific reports to the Council, and expresses its readiness to consider mine action concerns in all of its country-specific deliberations, as appropriate.

The Council notes the importance of ensuring that the provision of technical advice and support for mine action is reflected in the mandates and personnel planning for peacekeeping operations, and expresses its intention to address mine action concerns in the mandates and personnel planning for peacekeeping operations, whenever appropriate.

The Council recognizes the contribution that peacekeeping personnel can make in the areas of mine-risk education and demining, and calls upon troop-contributing countries, where appropriate, to train selected personnel to demine in accordance with the International Mine Action Standards.

The Council recognizes the important role mine action can play in disarmament, demobilization and reintegration efforts by employing former soldiers in mine action programmes and encourages the Secretary-General to consider including mine action in disarmament, demobilization and reintegration initiatives and to reflect such proposals in his reports to the Council, as appropriate.

The Council urges Member States, as appropriate, to provide adequate and sustained financial assistance to support mine action and alleviate the suffering of populations affected by mines and unexploded ordnance, and, whenever possible, to increase their support through further contributions to the Voluntary Trust Fund for Assistance in Mine Action. The Council calls particular attention to the need to address the socio-economic, physical and psychosocial reintegration of landmine survivors, the need to facilitate the orderly return of refugees and internally displaced persons affected by mines and unexploded ordnance, the need to restore land to productive use, and the need to prioritize mine action efforts to enable the risk-free movement of people and goods.

The Council considers that a comprehensive and coordinated approach by Member States, the United Nations and regional and local organizations is required to address the threat and the impact of mines and unexploded ordnance.

To this end, the Council supports the general review made by the General Assembly on this matter since 1993, and invites the Secretary-General to address this subject, as needed, in his reports on the general activities of peacekeeping operations.

Cooperation with regional organizations

The Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations [A/57/767] urged the strengthening of cooperation between the United Nations and relevant regional arrangements and agencies to enhance the capabilities of the international community in the maintenance of international peace and security. It appreciated the possibility of the practical realization of such cooperation at the regional and subregional levels and encouraged the Secretary-General to take concrete steps towards that end. In that regard, the Committee noted the successful cooperation between the United Nations and a number of subregional arrangements and agencies.

With regard to Africa, the Special Committee welcomed DPKO efforts to work closely with all relevant actors in the continent at the regional, subregional and national levels, in particular for the enhancement of the capabilities of African troop contributors and in capacity-building for regional and subregional organizations. The Committee also welcomed a close relationship among the United Nations, the African Union and subregional organizations, and encouraged those organizations, in close consultation with donors, to discuss the modalities for a suitable focal point or clearing house for activities aimed at strengthening African peacekeeping capacity.

The Committee recommended that the Secretariat study the best cases of cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations within the context of peacekeeping in order to identify adequate modalities of cooperation and to report the results to the Committee. It also encouraged further use of existing models of cooperation, such as that between the European Union and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe.

Chapter II

Africa

In 2003, Africa continued to be beset by conflicts and political dissension and the United Nations remained involved in the search for solutions. Two regions in particular were the focus of UN attention—the Great Lakes area and West Africa—and although some progress was achieved in peace-making efforts, the conflicts raised tension and threatened to spread beyond national borders. During the year, the Security Council sent missions to both regions. The Council also examined the causes of conflict in Africa and ways to promote peace and security in order to prevent further hostilities, as did the General Assembly. The Secretary-General also sent a multidisciplinary mission to countries in the Great Lakes region in a renewed effort to move the peace process forward and to investigate the possibility of a comprehensive and integrated approach to peace, security and development. The mission found that the crisis of governance and widespread poverty were the two main underlying causes of conflict in that region.

In the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), fighting between numerous armed militias, whose alliances were constantly shifting, intensified at the beginning of the year, despite signs in late 2002 of progress towards establishing a two-year transitional Government leading up to national elections. The presence of foreign troops in eastern DRC, the site of most of the fighting, further complicated the already tense situation and threatened the stability of the whole region. However, the United Nations, which had increased the size of its mission in the DRC to nearly 11,000 troops, and others continued mediation efforts. In April, participants in the Inter-Congolese Dialogue signed a Final Act endorsing measures to restore peace and national sovereignty, and agreeing to implement the framework for the transitional Government. As the parties agreed, President Joseph Kabila remained in office when a new Government was formed and some foreign troops were withdrawn. A pacification process was begun in eastern DRC, and the parties agreed to a plan for cantonment and demilitarization of their troops. The political institutions of the transitional Government began to function in late 2003, although progress remained slow.

Burundi's Transitional Government witnessed a peaceful transition of power at the level of head of State in 2003. The African Union (AU) deployed a mission to Burundi to oversee the ceasefire agreements and the United Nations Office in Burundi continued to play a role in the peace process, which included agreement by most political parties on defence and security power-sharing.

In Rwanda, which still suffered from the effects of the 1994 genocide, the Government expressed determination to bring peace to the country through reconciliation and by bringing to justice the extremists who carried the greatest responsibility for the genocide. Presidential and parliamentary elections were held, and were, for the most part, orderly. A number of former combatants returned from the DRC during the year.

A coup d'état in the Central African Republic overturned the plans for a national dialogue under President-elect Félix Patassé. Led by General François Bozizé, the new authorities, as part of a transition period, organized a national dialogue that included all political opinions, and stated their intention to hold national elections in late 2004.

Conflicts continued in West Africa, and the concurrent fighting in Côte d'Ivoire, Liberia and Sierra Leone threatened the stability of the whole region, as did the movement of armed militias and individuals between countries to seek refuge, loot and/or serve as mercenaries. The United Nations, the AU, the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) and the European Union (EU) were involved in mediating efforts in those countries and in Guinea-Bissau.

Political factions of Côte d'Ivoire reached an agreement in January, signed at Linas-Marcoussis, France, on a power-sharing mechanism to govern the country, but little progress was made in implementing its terms. The three main rebel movements (the Forces Nouvelles) seized control of the northern half of the country and the Government retained control of the south. In May, the Security Council created the United Nations Mission in Côte d'Ivoire (MINUCI), with an initial strength of 255 troops, to complement and eventually replace the ECOWAS and French forces already serving as peacekeepers. In May, the opposition parties withdrew from the Government of National Reconciliation and fighting resumed; however, the peace process took hold again in December when the two sides agreed to resume disarmament and demobilization of troops, and the opposition rejoined the Government.

In Liberia, rebel movements gained control of nearly two thirds of the country, and elections, originally scheduled for October, were postponed until 2004 due to the resumption of civil war. Although a ceasefire was signed in June by the Government and two rebel groups, it was soon violated and Liberia was plunged into a new cycle of violence. ECOWAS sent a vanguard peace-keeping force to the country in August, which was followed by a multinational force and, on 7 October, by the United Nations Mission in Liberia (UNMIL), which was established by the Security Council with a mandated maximum strength of 15,000 troops. Following the departure of President Charles Taylor from the country, a peace agreement was signed by the Government, two rebel groups, political parties and civil society leaders, providing for a national transitional Government. By the end of the year, some mechanisms for its implementation were set up, but the armed groups had not yet complied with its terms.

Sierra Leone remained relatively calm in 2003 as the Government continued, after 10 years of civil war, to disarm ex-combatants and reintegrate them into society. Having set benchmarks for the withdrawal of the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL) peacekeeping troops, the Security Council approved the Mission's reduction from nearly 16,000 troops to 11,500 by the end of the year. Fighting continued to occur along the Sierra Leone/Liberia border, and fighting in Liberia caused thousands of refugees to flee to Sierra Leone, threatening the security on the Sierra Leonean side of the border. The Government made efforts to reduce tensions internally, in particular by establishing a special court to try war crimes and by regaining control of diamond mining.

Guinea-Bissau's serious political and economic situation deteriorated in 2003. Opposition leaders accused the Government of arbitrary decision-making, restrictions on the media and harassment of political opponents. A non-violent coup d'état, led by the military, overthrew the Government in September. An agreement was reached on a transitional Government, which pledged to hold legislative and presidential elections within 6 and 18 months, respectively.

The United Nations continued to mediate in the Eritrea-Ethiopia border dispute and in monitoring the implementation of the 2000 Algiers Agreements on a ceasefire and solving the border issue. Following the completion in 2002 of the border's delimitation, efforts focused in 2003 on demarcation of the border. Both sides were presented with maps of the delimited border and asked for comments. Ethiopia, which had previously accepted the delimitation decision, questioned the boundary, leaving the path for future progress unclear at the end of the year. The situation on the ground remained calm, despite some restrictions on the movement of the United Nations Mission in Ethiopia and Eritrea (UNMEE). Progress was made in the release of the remaining prisoners of war.

The parties to the national reconciliation process in Somalia, begun in 2002 at the Eldoret (Kenya) Conference, continued to participate in discussions on setting up federal governance structures and establishing a ceasefire; the United Nations remained involved in the discussions. Nevertheless, fighting continued in parts of Somalia, especially in Mogadishu and Baidoa, blocking airports and seaports and thus slowing delivery of humanitarian aid.

The United Nations pursued efforts to hold a referendum in Western Sahara, which would give the people the right to decide the fate of the Territory, by electing either independence or integration with Morocco. The decision to hold a referendum was made in 1990 by the Government of Morocco and the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguia el-Hamra y de Río de Oro (POLISARIO). In 2003, the Secretary-General's Personal Envoy attempted to break the deadlock over the form of any future Government by proposing a new peace plan. POLISARIO eventually accepted the plan, but Morocco had not given a definitive response by the end of the year. The Identification Commission completed its work on the electronic archiving of the nearly 145,000 individual files of persons who applied to be included on the list of voters. During the year, POLISARIO released 643 Moroccan prisoners of war and continued to hold another 600 in detention.

Angola demonstrated in 2003 that it was firmly on the path of political, social and economic recovery, following the 2002 signing of a memorandum of understanding between the Government and the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA). Discussions were held by the two sides in 2003 on the structure of the new Government, and agreement was reached on a basic framework. The Government announced that the next general elections would be held in 2004. The Secretary-General reported that the United Nations Mission in Angola (UNMA) had completed its political mandate, and recommended that the UN Resident Coordinator take over responsibility for UN system activities in Angola.

In the Sudan, the situation improved following the 2002 signing of the Machakos Protocol by the Government and the rebel group, the Sudan People's Liberation Movement/Army (SPLM/A), which provided for autonomy in SPLM/A territory in the south for six years and for holding negotiations on a comprehensive ceasefire. As security improved in 2003, delivery of humanitarian assistance increased; however, armed conflict and ethnic violence continued and natural calamities caused large-scale displacement of people. In September, the Government and SPLM/A signed an agreement on security arrangements, providing for the Sudan to have two armies under separate command and control during the six-year interim period.

The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya announced steps it had taken to comply with 1992 and 1993 Security Council resolutions, which had imposed sanctions against it. Actions taken concerned handing over the Libyan nationals charged with the 1988 bombing of Pan Am flight 103 to the appropriate authorities, payment of compensation to the families of the victims, and acceptance of responsibility for the action of Libyan officials. In September, the Council lifted its sanctions. Libya announced in December that it was halting its programmes for developing weapons of mass destruction.

Promotion of peace in Africa

The General Assembly and the Security Council continued, throughout 2003, to examine the causes of conflict in Africa and ways to promote sustainable peace and development on the continent. In January, Angola took over from Mauritius the chairmanship of the Ad Hoc Working Group on Conflict Prevention and Resolution in Africa; the Council agreed that the Working Group would continue its work until the end of the year. The Working Group reported in December on its consideration of: cooperation between the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council; confidence-building in African regions affected by conflict; enhancing the Security Council's role in prevention and resolution of African conflicts; and enhancing cooperation with the African Union (AU) and subregional organizations.

The Security Council held a meeting in May to consider how Council missions and UN mechanisms could promote peace and security to prevent conflicts in Africa. The Council dispatched two missions to Africa—to Central Africa in June and to West Africa in June/July.

In December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 58/235 (see p. 106) on implementation of the Secretary-General's 1998 recommendations dealing with the causes of conflict and the promotion of durable peace and sustainable development in Africa.

Appointments. The Secretary-General, on 27 January [S/2003/125], informed the Security Council of his decision to extend until February 2004 the mandate of Ibrahim Gambari as his Adviser for Special Assignments in Africa. Mr. Gambari was participating actively in promoting the peace process in Angola and was advising the Secretary-General on other issues relating to Africa and on the work of the Ad Hoc Open-ended Working Group on the Causes of Conflict and the Promotion of Durable Peace and Sustainable Development in Africa. The Secretary-General also intended to entrust Mr. Gambari with the coordination of the preparation of special reports on Africa in the Secretariat and to place under his responsibility the resources allocated to the Office of the Special Coordinator for Africa and the Least Developed Countries. On 31 January [S/2003/126], the Council took note of the appointment.

The Council, on 7 January [S/2003/11], appointed Ismael Abraão Gaspar Martins, the Permanent Representative of Angola to the United Nations, as Chairman of the Ad Hoc Working Group on Conflict Prevention and Resolution in Africa, established on 1 March 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 93], for a period ending 1 March 2003. On 28 February [S/2003/235], the Council agreed that the Working Group would continue its work until 31 December 2003 and that Mr. Gaspar Martins would continue as Chairman.

Security Council consideration. The Security Council, on 30 May [meeting 4766], discussed "Conflicts in Africa: Security Council missions and United Nations mechanisms to promote peace and security", aimed at exploring how the UN system could promote durable solutions and peace and stability in Africa. As the Council President for May (Pakistan) explained in an August assessment of his presidency [S/2003/826], he had proposed, in a non-paper, that on the eve of Council missions to the Central and West African subregions in June and July, the Council should examine UN involvement with Africa and discuss the efficacy of missions and of other mechanisms for UN engagement with the continent, the imperative of moving from conflict management to conflict prevention and final resolution, the need to find further ways to deepen engagement with Africa, and the desirability of a comprehensive and integrated approach, including cooperation between the main UN organs.

Addressing the Council, the Secretary-General's Adviser for Special Assignments in Africa said that Council missions to Africa were a clear demonstration of engagement with crises and conflicts on the continent. However, they needed to be effective instruments for conflict prevention, management and resolution. Mission locations, timing and expected accomplishments needed to be addressed, and the Council should explore linkages between peace and security, on the one hand, and social and economic development, on the other. He suggested that the Council apply lessons learned from previous missions, by using multidisciplinary UN expert support before and after missions, collaborating actively with regional and subregional organizations, taking regional and global dimensions into account, and planning post-conflict peace-building efforts involving the United Nations, the Bretton Woods institutions (the World Bank Group and the International Monetary Fund) and donor countries. The forthcoming missions to Central Africa (see p. 109) and West Africa (see p. 163) would enable the Council to evaluate the current mandate and resources of the various UN peace operations, to revisit the possibility of convening an international conference on the Great Lakes region, and to assess the capacity of regional organizations to participate in peace operations.

The Chairman of the Ad Hoc Working Group on Conflict Prevention and Resolution in Africa (see p. 104) focused on the need for enhancing the efficiency of the mechanisms currently used by the United Nations in its engagement with Africa, especially the growing role of ad hoc working groups, which, if properly used, could be important tools in promoting peace and dealing with crises. The working groups should cooperate and coordinate with sanctions committees, as sanctions were useful in guaranteeing compliance with internationally accepted norms, leading to the resolution of conflict, as had happened in Angola. The Chairman said the fact that recommendations made by the Ad Hoc Working Group on Conflict Prevention and Resolution in Africa in 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 93] had not been implemented continued to be of great concern and indicated a need to make the recommendations of working groups more implementable and action-friendly.

The Council President for May issued on 11 July [S/2003/705] a summary of the suggestions made during the 30 May meeting on Africa.

Among other things, members made general suggestions with regard to the need to take the regional and global dimensions of African conflicts fully into account; the importance of the "partnership" of the Security Council with African regional and subregional organizations and the requirement for greater balance and harmony between regional efforts and Council action; the need for the Council to back up regional initiatives with both political and financial support and to follow up on the implementation of its own decisions and resolutions; and the requirement for African capabilities in the fields of conflict prevention, management and resolution to be strengthened. Specific suggestions were made with regard to: Security Council missions as effective instruments for conflict prevention, management and resolution; conflict prevention measures; addressing the root causes of Africa's conflicts; the illegal exploitation of resources; the proliferation of small arms and light weapons; illegal armed groups from neighbouring countries; sanctions; peacekeeping operations; disarmament, demobilization and reintegration; the humanitarian and human rights dimension; peace and development; other UN mechanisms; intra-United Nations coordination; and new mechanisms.

Working Group. On 22 December [S/2003/1188], the Security Council President transmitted a letter from the Chairman of the Ad Hoc Working Group on Conflict Prevention and Resolution in Africa, established by the Council in 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 93], by which he submitted the report on the Working Group's activities. The Group's work had focused on enhancing cooperation between the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council; promoting confidence-building in African regions affected by conflicts; enhancing the Security Council's role in preventing and resolving conflicts in Africa; and enhancing cooperation with the AU and African subregional organizations.

The Working Group held two joint meetings with the Ad Hoc Advisory Group on Guinea-Bissau, established by the Economic and Social Council by decision 2002/304 [YUN 2002, p. 920], and the Group of Friends of Guinea-Bissau, prior to two Security Council meetings on Guinea-Bissau (see pp. 225 and 227). It also coordinated efforts with the Economic and Social Council Advisory Group on Burundi (see p. 947).

The Working Group participated in preparations for the Security Council mission to the Central African region and to the joint Security Council/Economic and Social Council mission to Guinea-Bissau, both in June.

With regard to conflict prevention and resolution, the Working Group, in April, considered the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), stressing the need for a firm commitment by the Security Council to prevent the events in the Ituri region from having an adverse impact on the peace process. Following the Council's 20 November public briefing on preparations for convening an international conference on the Great Lakes region (see p. 112), the Working Group met with non-members of the Council to discuss the issue. The Working Group also undertook consultations with the AU and African subregional organizations to enhance cooperation between them and the United Nations in conflict prevention and resolution.

Report of Secretary-General. In response to General Assembly resolution 57/296 [YUN 2002, p. 97], the Secretary-General submitted a report in September [A/58/352] on implementation of the recommendations contained in his 1998 report on the causes of conflict and the promotion of durable peace and sustainable development in Africa [YUN 1998, p. 66]. The September report updated information contained in a 2002 follow-up report on the subject [YUN 2002, p. 95], discussing progress in implementing the recommendations concerning responding to conflict situations by appointing special mediators or special commissions to examine the sources of dispute and recommend solutions; stopping arms proliferation and halting increases in military expenditure; UN peacekeeping in Africa; UN support for African initiatives to resolve disputes; protecting civilians in conflict situations; refugees' security issues; post-conflict reconstruction and development; and providing structural adjustment programmes. It also described action to build durable peace and encourage sustainable development by: promoting good governance; securing respect for human rights and the rule of law; enhancing administrative capacity; creating a positive environment for investment and economic growth; emphasizing social development; investing in human resources; supporting public health priorities; eliminating discrimination against women; restructuring international aid; reducing the debt burden; opening international markets; supporting regional cooperation and integration; and harmonizing international and bilateral initiatives.

Although progress had been made over the review period, it had been slow and uneven. The efforts of African countries and the international community needed to be accelerated in order to implement the recommendations in a timely manner. Among problems encountered were lack of political will, persistent conflicts, weak governance, weak human and institutional capacity for economic management and administration, and limited financial resources to tackle development challenges, particularly reconstruction and rehabilitation in post-conflict countries. In view of the multiplicity of reporting frameworks in which the UN system addressed the issues raised in the Secretary-General's report and the numerous forums in which they were reviewed, it was proposed that the current format for reporting on implementation of the Secretary-General's recommendations be discontinued. Instead, the follow-up and reporting on implementation should be mainstreamed in the existing reports of the Secretary-General and the UN subsidiary bodies.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 23 December [meeting 78], the General Assembly adopted resolution 58/235 [draft: A/58/L.56 & Add.1] without vote [agenda item 39 (b)].

Implementation of the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General on the causes of conflict and the promotion of durable peace and sustainable development in Africa

The General Assembly,

Recalling the report of the Open-ended Ad Hoc Working Group on the Causes of Conflict and the Promotion of Durable Peace and Sustainable Development in Africa, and resolutions 53/92 of 7 December 1998, 54/234 of 22 December 1999, 55/217 of 21 December 2000, 55/281 of 1 August 2001, 56/37 of 4 December 2001, 57/296 of 20 December 2002 and 57/337 of 3 July 2003,

Recalling also, in this context, Security Council resolutions 1325(2000) of 31 October 2000 on women and peace and security, and 1366(2001) of 30 August 2001 on the prevention of armed conflicts,

Having considered the updated matrix for 2002 contained in the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General on the causes of conflict and the promotion of durable peace and sustainable development in Africa,

Recalling its resolution 57/7 of 4 November 2002 on the final review and appraisal of the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s and support for the New Partnership for Africa's Development,

Noting that prevention of conflict must remain the fundamental focus of the work of the United Nations and that peace, security and development, in particular within post-conflict contexts, are inextricably linked,

Noting also that conflict prevention and the consolidation of peace require coordinated, sustained and integrated efforts from the United Nations system and Member States,

Recalling section VII of the United Nations Millennium Declaration, which highlights the special needs of Africa,

Reaffirming that the implementation of the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-

General on the causes of conflict and the promotion of durable peace and sustainable development in Africa must remain a priority on the agenda of the United Nations system and of the Member States,

Underscores the fact that the responsibility for peace and security in Africa, including the capacity to address the root causes of conflict and to resolve conflicts in a peaceful manner, lies primarily with African countries themselves and with regional and sub-regional structures,

Underscores also the need to strengthen further the political will to ensure the required political, financial and technical support critical for the effective implementation of the recommendations in all of the areas included in the report of the Secretary-General,

Reaffirms that the General Assembly must continue to play the primary role in monitoring the implementation of the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General and assessing the progress made,

1. Takes note with appreciation of the updated matrix for 2002 contained in the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General on the causes of conflict and the promotion of durable peace and sustainable development in Africa, and the further advances in a wide range of areas made since the last progress report;

2. Notes with appreciation that many strides have been made in the prevention and settlement of disputes and that there have been sustained efforts by African regional and subregional initiatives of late to mediate and resolve conflicts;

3. Requests Member States to ensure that such initiatives continue to be taken in close consultation and coordination with the United Nations in order to ensure that the United Nations can have a clear role, as appropriate, in the subsequent implementation of such mediated settlements;

4. Welcomes the efforts undertaken by African countries towards the establishment of a Peace and Security Council within the African Union, and encourages the States members of the African Union that have not yet ratified the protocol relating to the establishment of the Council to do so;

5. Encourages African countries to continue their efforts to develop African capacity to undertake peace-support operations at the regional and subregional levels and the United Nations and donor countries to establish suitable mechanisms to assist African States in developing their capacity to undertake peace-support operations in a coherent and coordinated manner;

6. Welcomes the European Union decision to establish a peace facility to support the establishment of the African Peace and Security Mechanism and the implementation of peace initiatives undertaken by the African Union;

7. Also welcomes the establishment of the Ad Hoc Working Group on Conflict Prevention and Resolution in Africa of the Security Council and of the Ad Hoc Advisory Group on African Countries Emerging from Conflict, within the framework of the Economic and Social Council;

8. Notes with concern that progress in the implementation of the recommendations in the report of the Secretary-General remains slow and uneven;

9. Notes that conflict prevention and peace consolidation efforts, in particular efforts to eradicate poverty, promote respect for human rights, strengthen rule-of-law institutions, re-establish transparent and accountable public administration, encourage democratic reform and demobilize, disarm and reintegrate ex-combatants should be supported by Member States and the United Nations system through enhanced coordination, coherence and sustained financial and political support;

10. Decides to continue to monitor the implementation of the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General on the causes of conflict and the promotion of durable peace and sustainable development in Africa;

11. Welcomes the designation of the Office of the Special Adviser on Africa as a focal point within the Secretariat which should continue to monitor, through the already established interdepartmental task force on Africa affairs, the implementation of the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General on the causes of conflict and the promotion of durable peace and sustainable development in Africa, with special regard being given to preventive action and post-conflict peace consolidation, and make recommendations as to how the implementation of those recommendations could be further enhanced;

12. Calls upon Member States to provide financial and technical assistance in a coordinated and sustained way in order to support activities to eradicate poverty, promote respect for human rights, strengthen rule-of-law institutions and promote transparent and accountable public administration;

13. Encourages the Secretary-General to explore and recommend suitable arrangements and mechanisms through which Member States could more effectively address the multidisciplinary causes of conflict, including their regional dimensions, and strengthen the coordinated and sustained manner in which they could provide financial and technical assistance in preventive action as well as post-conflict peace-building;

14. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-ninth session a report on the implementation of the present resolution, taking into account recent developments related to the co-operation of Africa with the international community on these matters.

The Economic and Social Council, in follow-up to resolution 2002/I [YUN 2002, p. 919], stressed the need to assess progress made in the implementation of recommendations made by ad hoc advisory groups on African countries emerging from conflict (resolution 2003/50) (see p. 947).

Central Africa and Great Lakes region

In 2003, both the Security Council and the Secretary-General sent missions to Central Africa in an effort to move the peace process forward in the countries of the region. In the DRC, the Council encouraged the Congolese parties to put into practice the agreement reached in December 2002 (the All-Inclusive Agreement) on a two-year transition period, to be followed by national elections. Its focus in Burundi was to urge the parties to carry forward with the second phase of the transition under its new President, with assistance from the regional mediators and the African peacekeeping mission. The Secretary-General's multidisciplinary mission determined that the major underlying causes of conflict in the subregion were the crisis of governance and widespread poverty.

The UN Standing Advisory Committee on Security Questions in Central Africa held two sessions in 2003 (see pp. 111 and 573), at which it reviewed the geopolitical and security situation in the subregion, evaluated implementation of its previous decisions and recommendations, and made new recommendations.

The United Nations and the AU began preparations for holding in 2004 an international conference on the Great Lakes region, which would aim to agree on a set of principles to help end the cycle of conflict and ensure peace, security, democracy and good governance and development in that region. The Security Council considered that such a conference would help build on the progress made in the DRC and Burundi peace processes to promote the national reconciliation process in all countries of the region.

Within the region, the DRC faced the most intractable problems, particularly at the beginning of the year when there was an upsurge of violence in the eastern parts of the country. The presence of foreign troops contributed to the confusing situation of warfare among numerous armed militias. The United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (MONUC) remained in the country to assist in the implementation of the 1999 Lusaka Ceasefire Agreement, among other tasks, and the Security Council increased its size to a maximum of 10,800 troops. During the period of heightened conflict, the United Nations remained involved in mediation efforts, in coordination with others, especially Angola and South Africa. In April, the participants in the Inter-Congolese Dialogue signed a Final Act endorsing a package of agreements on restoring peace and national sovereignty, including the All-Inclusive Agreement of December 2002. As provided for under its terms, Joseph Kabila was sworn in as President when the new transitional Government was formed. The principal political institutions of the transition began to function in late 2003. However, the political parties remained unable to overcome their mutual distrust and progress remained slow.

After 10 years of conflict, developments in Burundi in 2003 followed a mostly positive trajectory towards fulfilling the terms of the 2000 Arusha Agreement on Peace and Reconciliation, by which the signatories outlined plans for a three-year transitional Government and the eventual integration of the Burundi national defence force, with equal numbers of Hutu and Tutsi troops. Although not signed by all the armed groups, much of the Agreement was implemented or was under discussion in 2003. Among the most significant positive developments during the year were the decision by President Buyoya to step down on 1 May under arrangements for the transitional Government, the deployment of an African mission in Burundi to oversee ceasefire agreements, and the signing in November of a comprehensive ceasefire implementation document. The United Nations Office in Burundi remained involved in the peace process, and the Secretary-General enlarged it by adding five specialized staff and other support personnel.

At the time when peace processes in the DRC and Burundi were showing signs of progress, Rwanda was emerging from the shadow of the 1994 genocide and the Government expressed its determination to bring lasting peace to the country and the region, noting that former combatants were returning from the DRC. Presidential and parliamentary elections were held in a mostly orderly manner. As proposed by the AU, the General Assembly decided to designate 7 April 2004 as the International Day of Reflection on the Genocide in Rwanda.

In the Central African Republic, a coup d'état in March, led by General François Bozizé, preempted the expected installation of President-elect Félix Patassé and interrupted plans for a national dialogue. Nevertheless, the new authorities pledged to organize the national dialogue during a transition period leading up to national elections in 2004. An interim Government under the National Transition Council would reportedly include all political parties, including that of former President Patassé. The Central African Economic and Monetary Community sent a multinational force to the country, which was later joined by French forces, to help the new administration restore stability. Held in late 2003 at the Government's initiative, a national dialogue drew up recommendations on a new constitution and electoral procedure.

On 30 October [S/2003/1066], the Secretary-General informed the Security Council that the mandate of his Special Representative for the Great Lakes Region, Ibrahim Fall, would expire on 31 December 2003 and that he intended to extend the mandate until 31 December 2004. He remarked that Mr. Fall had pursued consultations on the international conference on the Great Lakes region (see p. 111) which had led to the launching of the preparatory process of that conference. The Council, on 4 November [S/2003/1067], took note of the intention.

Security Council mission. On 21 May [S/2003/558], the Security Council President informed the Secretary-General of the Council's decision to send a mission to Central Africa in June and of the mission's composition and terms of reference. In the DRC (see p. 127), the mission would emphasize the need to take the peace process forward and would invite the Congolese parties to implement their commitments in the framework of the Inter-Congolese Dialogue. All parties would be pressed to carry out their obligations under relevant Council resolutions, including those to demilitarize Kisangani, ensure the re-opening of the Congo River to civilian traffic and provide humanitarian organizations with access to populations in need. The mission would also evaluate the role of MONUC on the basis of the Secretary-General's recommendations on adjusting MONUC's concept.

In Burundi (see p. 149), the mission would express support for the second phase of the transition and the new President, the regional mediators and the African peacekeeping mission, as well as the Implementation Monitoring Committee and the Joint Ceasefire Commission, and would assess the future of the relationship between the United Nations and the African peacekeeping mission.

The mission travelled to the region from 7 to 16 June, visiting Pretoria, South Africa; Luanda, Angola; Kinshasa and Bunia, DRC; Bujumbura, Burundi; Kigali, Rwanda; Dar es Salaam, United Republic of Tanzania; and Entebbe, Uganda. It issued its report on 17 June [S/2003/653]. The mission made recommendations on both the DRC and Burundi (see below under country headings), which were considered by the Council on 25 July.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 25 July [meeting 4794], following consultations among Security Council members, the President made statement S/PRST/2003/12, which also dealt with the Council's mission to West Africa (see p. 162), on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council welcomes the recommendations made in the reports of its mission to Central Africa undertaken from 7 to 16 June 2003 and its mission to West Africa undertaken from 26 June to 5 July 2003.

The Council endorses the recommendations which fall within its area of responsibility and wishes to see them implemented. It has already taken the relevant recommendations into account in preparing its resolution renewing and strengthening the mandate of the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

Where responsibility for implementation falls to others, the Council looks forward to working in partnership with them, including United Nations agencies and programmes; Governments in Central and West Africa; regional and subregional organizations, notably the Economic Community of West African States; donor countries; non-governmental organizations and civil society. The Council invites them to keep it informed of their efforts at implementation, so that the Council can support them and take any further action necessary.

The Council emphasizes the importance of a sub-regional approach to issues such as small arms and light weapons, mercenaries, child soldiers and humanitarian access. It stresses that follow-up activity by the United Nations will require close cooperation and coordination throughout the United Nations system. Action in these areas should also involve the appropriate organizations, especially in West Africa.

The Council invites the Secretary-General to follow up those recommendations which lie within his responsibility, and would be grateful for a report on progress by 30 November 2003.

The Council recognizes that resources may be needed to implement its recommendations. Therefore it will continue to encourage donor countries in a position to do so to support such efforts, and to assist regional and subregional organizations in this respect.

The Council intends to review progress in implementing the recommendations in December 2003.

Multidisciplinary mission. The President of the Security Council announced on 17 April [SC/7735] that Council members welcomed the Secretary-General's intention to dispatch a multidisciplinary mission to Central Africa to assess the implementation of a comprehensive, integrated, resolute and concerted approach to peace, security and development in Central Africa, as requested by the Council in presidential statement S/PRST/2002/31 [YUN 2002, p. 101]. The Council welcomed the ongoing consultations between the Secretariat and the Economic Community of Central African States (ECCAS) on the preparations for the mission and the decision to associate ECCAS with the mission. It expressed support for the Secretary-General's proposals to strengthen the coordination between the diverse UN structures in the countries of the subregion and to promote the strengthening of the partnership between the UN system and Central African States.

The Secretary-General dispatched the multi-disciplinary mission to the 11 ECCAS member States (Angola, Burundi, Cameroon, the Central African Republic, Chad, the Congo, the DRC, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon, Rwanda, Sao Tome and Principe) from 8 to 22 June. The mission's report was forwarded to the Council on 10 November [S/2003/1077].

The mission observed that the subregion, while rich in a wide variety of natural resources, contained the largest number of countries that ranked lowest in almost all of the human development indices. It was also characterized by the recurrence of armed rebellions and conflicts that had hampered its development for decades; seven of the countries were either in conflict or in post-conflict situations, the most recent outbreaks being the coup d'état in the Central African Republic in March and the attempted coup in Sao Tome and Principe in July. The root causes of the current situation in the subregion could be traced to two main internal sources, namely, the crisis of governance and widespread poverty. The mission's report went on to discuss peace and security issues, the challenges of poverty, humanitarian issues, human rights, HIV/AIDS, the work of subregional institutions and the United Nations in the subregion, and the question of regional integration.

The mission observed that the issues of peace and security lay at the core of the challenges confronting the subregion. While UN offices and missions in Burundi, the Central African Republic and the DRC were focused on country-specific problems of peace consolidation and peace-keeping, there was an urgent need for the United Nations to help implement subregional policies to address cross-cutting challenges, including the promotion of good governance, and to stem the illegal flow of arms, drugs and militia. Because of the close linkage between poverty and conflict, it was essential for the UN system to develop a holistic and integrated approach to the problems of Central Africa, to address conflicts at their core, and to enhance the ability of national, subregional and international actors to be more proactive in identifying and preventing future threats. Cross-border challenges, such as population movements, drugs and small arms trafficking, and transnational movements of mercenaries and militias, should be addressed more vigorously with UN support. Joint activities in border areas, such as health, education and disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programmes, could combat such phenomena. The liberalization of cross-border trade, especially in agricultural products, would help to improve market access and promote relationships between border populations. Policies to promote respect for human rights, the rule of law and the development of inclusive and responsive governance would facilitate peace and stability, as would strengthening institutional capacities of governance at the national, subregional and regional levels and of justice systems to ensure predictability and reliability in the discharge of justice. Human rights protection systems should be strengthened by enhancing national institutional capacity, human rights education, and a mechanism to address the fate of victims of conflicts, including by providing compensation and rehabilitation. Efforts to prevent and fight HIV/AIDS should be intensified and coordinated at the subregional level. Central African subregional institutions, including ECCAS, the Central African Economic and Monetary Community and the Economic Community of the Great Lakes Countries, should integrate the problem of HIV/AIDS into the agenda of peace, security, and political, economic and social issues. The Organisation de coordination pour la lutte contre les endémies en Afrique centrale should ensure the coordination of the subregional monitoring of health issues in order to establish a regional HIV/AIDS strategy, develop a UN assistance programme and integrate HIV/AIDS issues into the concept of peacekeeping operations in the region, specifically in Burundi, the Central African Republic and the DRC, and into the demobilization programmes in Angola, Burundi, the Central African Republic, Chad, the Republic of the Congo and the DRC.

In his letter transmitting the mission's report, the Secretary-General stated that he was in general agreement with the mission's assessment. He had requested a thorough review of UN programmes with a view to enhancing their coherence and effectiveness and would keep the Council informed. Although most Governments in the subregion had expressed their desire for a UN office, the Secretary-General was concerned about the proliferation of offices; there were already a number of UN structures in the subregion, including three offices headed by Special Representatives of the Secretary-General. However, he proposed the appointment of a special envoy to work on political issues with Governments in the subregion and to interface with the UN entities involved in development and humanitarian activities in Central Africa.

The Central African Republic, in a 25 November letter [S/2003/1137], stressed that it supported the establishment of a UN office in the subregion in order to centralize and analyse the activities of UN agencies. That proposal was endorsed by the twentieth ministerial meeting of the member States of the UN Standing Advisory Committee on Security Questions in Central Africa (see below). The Central African Republic remained convinced of the need for such an office despite the Secretary-General's proposal to appoint a special envoy.

Security Council consideration. On 24 November [meeting 1871], the Security Council considered the multidisciplinary mission's report and was briefed by the mission leader, Tuliameni Kalomoh, Assistant Secretary-General for Political Affairs. The mission report stressed the need for the United Nations to help the subregion implement subregional policies and to support efforts directed at addressing cross-cutting challenges, including the promotion of good governance. It emphasized the interlinkages between poverty and conflict and called on the international community to support the ECCAS countries in their efforts to curb the widespread circulation of weapons and gangs of mercenaries in the subregion. It was also important to support the economic stabilization of Central African countries, which were emerging from conflict and embarking on the road to democratic reform.

Advisory Committee on Security Questions. The nineteenth and twentieth ministerial meetings of the United Nations Standing Advisory Committee on Security Questions in Central Africa were held in 2003 (Brazzaville, Congo, 14-17 May [A/57/823-S/2003/610]; Malabo, Equatorial Guinea, 27-31 October [A/58/560-S/2003/1075]). In addition to the member States (Angola, Burundi, Cameroon, Central African Republic, Chad, Congo, DRC, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon, Rwanda, Sao Tome and Principe), representatives of the United Nations and ECCAS participated in the meetings. The nineteenth meeting was preceded by a seminar (12-14 May) on the implementation in Central Africa of the Programme of Action adopted by the 2001 United Nations Conference on the Illicit Trade in Small Arms and Light Weapons in All Its Aspects [YUN 2001, p. 499].

At both meetings, the Committee reviewed the geopolitical and security situation in each Central African country. It took note with satisfaction of the intensification of action by the ECCAS member States within the framework of cooperation in security matters, aimed at lessening tensions, combating insecurity in the border areas, and facilitating exchanges between the various national structures dealing with those questions. It recommended continued cooperation among the security forces of the Central African countries, particularly within the framework of periodic meetings and joint operations. The Committee expressed concern at the persistence of organized crime and insecurity in countries of the subregion, and particularly at the phenomenon of roadblocks. It recommended the intensification of information sharing and the organization of large-scale joint operations to combat the phenomenon. It also called on countries that had not done so to sign and/or ratify the Protocol on the Council for Peace and Security in Central Africa, the Mutual Assistance Pact [YUN 2000, p. 528] and the Non-Aggression Pact between the countries of Central Africa.

The Committee, in May, reiterated its commitment to organize, in cooperation with ECCAS, a military peacekeeping exercise involving the armed forces of its members. It took note of the strengthening of relations between the United Nations and ECCAS since the signing in 2000 of the Memorandum of Cooperation between the two organizations, and noted, in particular, the forthcoming Security Council mission to the region (see p. 109). The Committee also reiterated the need to undertake a study to evaluate the costs and modalities of implementing the early warning mechanism for the region.

The Committee, in October, expressed the view that the outcomes of the UN multidisciplinary mission should include the establishment of a subregional bureau in Central Africa.

The Secretary-General, in response to General Assembly resolution 57/88 [YUN 2002, p. 532], submitted a 22 July report [A/58/177] on the regional confidence-building measures and activities of the Committee at its eighteenth [YUN 2002, p. 99] and nineteenth sessions.

International conference on Great Lakes

In response to a 1997 Security Council request contained in presidential statement S/PRST/1997/22 [YUN 1997, p. 77], the Secretary-General submitted a 17 November report on preparations for an international conference on the Great Lakes region [S/2003/1099]. The Council had called for an international conference on various occasions, starting in 1994 with presidential statement S/PRST/1994/59 concerning Rwanda [YUN 1994, p. 309], and the United Nations had explored the issue with the AU and the core countries (Burundi, DRC, Kenya, Rwanda, Uganda, United Republic of Tanzania). It was stressed that the conference should be action-oriented and focus on specific issues, and that it should be owned by the region. The core countries launched the preparatory process at the meeting of national coordinators (Nairobi, Kenya, 23-24 June), chaired jointly by the United Nations and the AU, which determined the timetable, structure and themes. The purpose of the conference would be to initiate a process that would bring together the leaders of the countries of the Great Lakes region to reach an agreed set of principles (good-neighbourly relations, stability, peace, development, etc.) and launch action to help end the cycle of conflict and ensure durable peace, stability, security, democracy, good governance and development. Participation would also include other stakeholders, including representatives of civil society in the core countries, neighbouring countries and friends of the region, and international development partners. The conference would not be a one-time event but a multi-stage process culminating in two ministerial summits to adopt a declaration of principles and concrete plans of action, which together would constitute the Stability, Security and Development Pact. The preparatory process would involve meetings of national preparatory committees and a regional preparatory committee, and a set of thematic meetings (subregional organizations, women, youth). A self-constituted Group of Friends of the Great Lakes region was being established under Canada's facilitation to work out coordinated ways of providing political, diplomatic, financial and technical support to the conference. Within the UN system, the Special Representative was coordinating with relevant UN agencies, through the inter-agency steering group that he had established in Nairobi. The target date for the first summit was June 2004.

The Secretary-General expressed the view that the stage had been set for the preparations for the conference to proceed. There was a new momentum in the region, as witnessed by the transitional DRC Government, the forward movement of the Burundi peace process and general elections in Rwanda, which made it an opportune time to proceed. To ensure the success of the conference, he urged the core countries to focus on the conference's priorities in order to formulate concrete and feasible policies and activities in the proposed thematic areas. The Secretary-General would seek the political commitment and financial support of the international community.

The Security Council considered the Secretary-General's report on 20 November [meeting 4865]. Addressing the Council, the Secretary-General said that the idea of an international conference had been revived by recent developments, including the adoption, in September, by the countries of the region of the Declaration of Principles on Good-neighbourly Relations and Cooperation. The Special Representative of the Secretary-General for the Great Lakes region, Ibrahima Fall, described the structure of the organizational process for the conference.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 20 November [meeting 4865], following consultations among Security Council members, the President made statement S/PRST/2003/23 on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council recalls its presidential statement of 24 April 1997 (S/PRST/1997/22) and its other relevant statements and resolutions calling for the holding at an appropriate time of an international conference on peace, security, democracy and development in the Great Lakes region of Africa, with the participation of all Governments of the region of the Great Lakes and Central Africa and all others concerned, to be organized under the aegis of the United Nations and the African Union, with a view to achieving a sustainable peace, security and stability for all countries in the region, in particular through the full normalization of their relations and the establishment of confidence-building measures and mechanisms.

The Council considers that the holding of the proposed conference will help build on the progress made in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Burundi peace processes to achieve lasting peace and promote the national reconciliation processes in all countries concerned in the region.

The Council welcomes the progress made towards the convening of the proposed conference, expresses satisfaction at the fact that the countries of the region have launched the preparatory process for the conference with the first meeting of their national coordinators, held in Nairobi in June 2003, and considers it now crucial to follow up this initial step with intensified efforts. It takes note with appreciation of the briefing by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for the Great Lakes region, Mr. Ibrahima Fall, and welcomes the offer made by the Government of Tanzania to host a summit during the year 2004.

The Council encourages the Governments concerned, with the support of their civil societies, their neighbours and development partners, to continue their efforts to bring about a successful conference, based on a regional, all-inclusive and action-oriented approach. It stresses the importance of the participation in this conference of all States concerned, in particular those neighbouring the Democratic Republic of the Congo or Burundi, and encourages the States in the region to reach early agreement on participation in the conference.

The Council emphasizes the relevance to the proposed conference of the Solemn Declaration of the Conference on Security, Stability, Development and Cooperation in Africa adopted by the Organization of African Unity Lomé Summit in July 2000, of the Maputo Decision adopted by the Executive Council of the African Union in July 2003 and of the Declaration of Principles on Good-neighbourly Relations and Cooperation adopted by the Governments of Burundi, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Rwanda and Uganda in New York on 25 September 2003, as well as of the framework of the New Partnership for Africa's Development.

The Council appeals to the countries of the region and to the international community to provide sustained political and diplomatic support as well as adequate technical and financial assistance so that the conference is well prepared and timely, and so that effective follow-up actions are taken. It commends the active partnership between the United Nations and the African Union in all aspects relating to the preparation of the proposed conference, and welcomes the appointment of Mr. Keli Walubita as Special Envoy of the Chairperson of the African Union Commission for the Great Lakes region.

The Council calls on the countries of the region and the members of the international community to support the efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for the Great Lakes region and the Special Envoy of the Chairperson of the African Union Commission for the Great Lakes region, expresses its gratitude to the Secretary-General for keeping it informed of developments in the region and requests him to continue to do so on a regular basis.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

In early 2003, the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC) deteriorated, despite positive developments in late 2002 indicating progress in implementing the 1999 Lusaka Ceasefire Agreement [YUN 1999, p. 87], the withdrawal of large numbers of foreign forces from the country [YUN 2002, p. 109] and the signature in December 2002 of the Global and All-Inclusive Agreement on the Transition in the DRC [ibid., p. 125], which provided for a two-year transitional Government followed by national elections. As provided for in that Agreement, President Joseph Kabila remained in office and continued as Supreme Commander of the Armed Forces.

As allegiances among the warring parties shifted, a new scale of violence emerged, characterized by the use of looting, rape and summary execution as tools of warfare. Also, Ugandan troops that had remained in the DRC retook Bunia in March, thereby reinforcing their presence in the eastern region. The situation in eastern DRC, in particular in the Ituri region, was threatening peace and stability throughout the DRC and the Great Lakes region. Against that background, the United Nations continued to press the parties to end hostilities and establish the Ituri Pacification Committee as envisaged in the 2002 Luanda Agreement [ibid., p. 116] between the DRC and Uganda, and the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (MONUC) pursued its peacekeeping activities, in particular by assisting in disarmament efforts. With the mediation of South Africa and the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General, the Congolese parties reached agreement in Pretoria on 6 March on transitional arrangements for the DRC Government.

On 2 April in Sun City, South Africa, the participants in the Inter-Congolese Dialogue signed the Final Act of the inter-Congolese political negotiations that had started in October 2001 [YUN 2001, p. 131], thereby endorsing a package of agreements that constituted a comprehensive programme for the restoration of peace and national sovereignty during a two-year transition period. The agreements comprised the 2002 All-Inclusive Agreement, the Transitional Constitution, a 6 March memorandum on military and security issues, and the resolutions adopted in 2002 by the Inter-Congolese Dialogue. The Congolese parties took the first steps towards the establishment of the transitional Government—Joseph Kabila was sworn in as President for that period, amnesty was granted for certain actions relating to war, and the military court was abolished. Ugandan troops began returning home in late April, and some Rwandan combatants were also repatriated. Following the Ugandan withdrawal from Ituri province, hostilities again broke out causing flows of refugees into Uganda. In May, the Security Council authorized the short-term deployment of an interim emergency multinational force in Bunia, Ituri province, in coordination with MONUC, which was already deployed in the town, to help stabilize conditions and to contribute to the security of the civilian population and UN and humanitarian staff. The interim force, sent by the European Union (EU) and replaced in September by MONUC, was able to restore stability to Bunia.

On 30 June, President Kabila announced the formation of the Government of National Unity and Transition, which was made up of all parties participating in the dialogue and was designed to function until elections could be organized and concluded. Welcoming the transitional Government, the Security Council extended MONUC's mandate until 30 July 2004 and authorized an increase in size to 10,800 military personnel.

Under the aegis of the Secretary-General, a meeting of regional heads of State concluded on 25 September with the adoption of the Principles on Good-neighbourly Relations and Cooperation between the DRC and Burundi, Rwanda and Uganda. In that document, the four States, recognizing that the establishment of the DRC Government was essential for the peace and security necessary to ensure good-neighbourly relations, reaffirmed their commitment to: respect the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of one another; prevent the supply of arms and support to armed groups in eastern

Although the principal political institutions of the transition began to function in late 2003 and several steps were taken towards implementing the All-Inclusive Agreement, progress remained slow and challenges remained. The inability of the transitional leaders to act as a truly unified government and to overcome the atmosphere of distrust remained among major obstacles, as did the continued, though diminished, fighting in eastern DRC.

In January, the Secretary-General extended the mandate of the Panel of Experts on the Illegal Exploitation of Natural Resources and Other Forms of Wealth in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and expanded its role. The Panel reported in October that illegal exploitation remained one of the main sources of funding for groups involved in perpetuating conflict, especially in eastern DRC. The Security Council, in November, condemned the continuing illegal exploitation of natural resources and urged States to take steps to end those activities.

Appointment. On 16 May [S/2003/562], the Secretary-General informed the Security Council that the current Special Representative for the DRC, Amos Namanga Ngongi (Cameroon), would conclude his assignment on 30 June. Consequently, he intended to appoint William Lacy Swing (United States) as his successor, effective 1 July. Mr. Swing had previously served as his Special Representative for Western Sahara. The Council, on 22 May [S/2003/563], took note of the Secretary-General's intention.

Political and military situation

In a 15 January press statement [SC/7634-AFR/543], the Security Council called on all Congolese parties to implement without delay the 2002 All-Inclusive Agreement [YUN 202, p. 125] in order to establish a transitional Government that would lead to elections in the DRC and stressed the need to resolve the key outstanding issues, especially the question of security for all parties in Kinshasa. The Council members expressed deep concern at the resumption of fighting in eastern DRC and instability in the north-east. They urged the parties to abide by the terms of the Gbadolite agreement, signed on 30 December 2002 [ibid.], on the withdrawal of forces in the Beni area, and in particular to cease all military activities there. The members strongly condemned the massacres and systematic violations of human rights perpetrated by the Movement for the Liberation of the Congo (MLC) and the Congolese Rally for Democracy/National (RCD/N) troops in Ituri, stating that Jean-Pierre Bemba, the MLC leader, bore the responsibility for the security of civilian populations in the territory under his control. The members demanded that Mr. Bemba ensure that those massacres and violations ceased immediately and hold the perpetrators accountable. MONUC and the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) would continue to monitor the situation. The Council stressed the importance of implementation by both Rwanda and the DRC of their commitments under the 2002 Pretoria Agreement [YUN 202, p. 115] on the withdrawal of Rwandan troops from DRC territory, and encouraged further efforts by MONUC and the Third Party Verification Mechanism to continue to verify implementation of those commitments, in particular the full withdrawal of Rwandan forces and the absence of all forms of support to the foreign armed groups by the Government of the DRC. The Council members expressed concern at reports of continuing sponsorship of proxy groups in the DRC, and called on both sides to cooperate with the verification efforts of MONUC and the Third Party Verification Mechanism.

Communications (January/February). In a 16 January letter [S/2003/52], the DRC thanked the Security Council for the 15 January statement (above). It stated that in north-eastern DRC, particularly in Ituri, adults and children had been murdered and mutilated, and others were victims of cannibalism, among other atrocities. Those intolerable acts were acknowledged by the person chiefly responsible, namely the MLC President, Mr. Bemba. MLC and RCD/N had aimed their attacks in particular at indigenous Pygmies and the Nande ethnic group, which could be qualified as genocide and ethnic cleansing under international law. With a view to ending impunity and ensuring that Mr. Bemba and others responsible for the abuses in Orientale province, particularly in Ituri, were brought to justice, the DRC requested the Council to establish an international criminal court to try all persons alleged to have committed serious violations of international humanitarian law there.

Rwanda, on 16 January [S/2003/63], complained that the DRC had wrongly accused it of failing to withdraw its troops from the DRC, whereas it was the DRC that had not complied with its commitments under the 2002 Pretoria Agreement. Rwanda called on the Council to demand that the DRC respect those commitments, especially the provisions relating to the disarmament and demobilization of the former Rwandan Army forces (ex-FAR) and Interahamwe militiamen responsible for the 1994 genocide of Rwandans [YUN 1994, p. 281]. On 31 January [S/2003/134], the DRC said that a concentration of forces of the Rwandan Patriotic Army had been observed in Kanyabayonga, a DRC town near the Rwandan and Ugandan borders, and that the town might become the point of confrontation between troops from the Rwandan and Ugandan armies in DRC territory. Responding on 4 February [S/2003/149], Rwanda denied the allegations and said that the Rwanda Defence Forces (RDF) had completely withdrawn from the DRC, in conformity with the Pretoria Agreement.

In another letter of 16 January [S/2003/64], the DRC, referring to its complaint in December 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 125] that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had been aiding MLC, said that the misunderstanding had been resolved.

Security Council consideration. The Security Council, on 13 February [meeting 4705], considered the situation in the DRC and was briefed by Jean-Marie Guéhenno, Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations, who updated the Council on the military situation in the north-east and efforts to achieve a peaceful settlement. He noted that there had been continuous heavy fighting in and around the Ituri region since October 2002, despite the signing of the All-Inclusive Agreement. Following the signing of the Gbadolite ceasefire agreement on 30 December 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 125], MLC began its withdrawal from the Mambasa-Komanda area, which was completed on 3 February. Subsequently, the Union de patriotes congolais (UPC), which was not a signatory to the Gbadolite agreement, had aligned itself with the Goma faction of RCD (RCD-Goma) and took over Komanda, establishing 14 checkpoints. A new Hema-Lendu grouping, the Front for Integration and Peace, opposed UPC and called for the retention of Ugandan forces in Ituri.

MONUC was working to defuse tensions and recommend peace-building mechanisms and to organize a local ceasefire leading up to the convening of the Ituri Pacification Committee (IPC), as stipulated in the 2002 Luanda Agreement [ibid., p. 116]. On 10 February, DRC President Kabila, Ugandan President Yoweri Kaguta Museveni and Angolan President José Eduardo Dos Santos signed an amendment to the Luanda accord, which allowed for a new timetable for the work of the envisaged IPC—composed of two representatives each from MONUC and from the DRC and Uganda Governments and four representatives from the parties represented on the ground in Ituri. IPC was expected to conclude its work on 20 March, and the total withdrawal of Ugandan troops from the DRC would follow (see also p. 120).

Briefing the Council, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, Sergio Vieira de Mello, said that the impunity with which the Government and other parties to the conflict continued to commit grave violations of human rights represented a major obstacle to lasting peace. The humanitarian situation was deteriorating further because the warring parties were not allowing access by humanitarian workers to impoverished populations, many of whom (estimated at 100,000 persons) had been forced to flee their homes. The economic interests that were at the root of the continued plundering of natural resources and of State revenues were contributing to conditions of anarchy and grave violations of human rights in eastern DRC, as was the rapid deterioration of the economy. In addition, widespread corruption within the judicial system, the armed forces and the police, among others, made public administration ineffective. A mission to Bunia had confirmed gross violations of human rights, and in areas controlled by UPC since August 2002 the human rights situation had also deteriorated significantly. Recent events included persecution on ethnic and tribal grounds, extortion of property, rape, and the forced recruitment of children by military personnel, causing thousands of civilians to flee. The High Commissioner recommended that the Pretoria peace process be based on solid human rights grounds and that effective judicial and national human rights protection systems be created.

Report of Secretary-General (February). The Secretary-General, in response to Security Council resolution 1417(2002) [YUN 2002, p. 112], submitted on 21 February [S/2003/211] his thirteenth report on MONUC and the situation in the DRC, covering developments since his 18 October 2002 report [YUN 2002, p.120]. Despite the signing of the All-Inclusive Agreement, which established the structure of the transitional Government, and the Gbadolite ceasefire agreement, military activities continued. In the Ituri region of eastern DRC, there was widespread insecurity, massive displacement and severely restricted humanitarian access. The neutral Facilitator of the Inter-Congolese Dialogue, Sir Ketumile Masire, was expected to convene the final session of the Dialogue in the coming weeks. At that session, the parties were expected to endorse the All-Inclusive Agreement and adopt the transitional constitution. In the meantime, the Facilitator was consulting with the Congolese parties on preparations for that session, in particular on the formation of a national army, security in Kinshasa and finalization of the draft constitution. The Secretary-General's Special Envoy for the Inter-

Congolese Dialogue, Moustapha Niasse, was pursuing efforts to bring the parties to consensus on those issues.

In January, UPC, which was not covered by the Gbadolite ceasefire agreement, entered into an alliance with RCD-Goma. Throughout that month, MONUC tried to verify allegations of Rwandan troops operating north-east of Bunia and reports of Rwandan material support to UPC; Rwanda denied the presence of any of its troops in the DRC. Throughout the period, the Secretary-General's Special Representative engaged the parties to end hostilities and establish IPC, as envisaged in the 2002 Luanda Agreement. However, fighting continued despite those efforts. On 9 February, the Foreign Ministers of the DRC and Uganda signed an amendment to the Luanda Agreement, allowing for a new timetable for IPC's work. Following the withdrawal of Rwandan troops from North and South Kivu, RCD-Goma territorial control in the area was significantly reduced, leaving a patchwork of unofficial authorities and armed groups. Mayi-Mayi groups appeared to have at least nominal control over large areas, while RCD-Goma control was centred on key towns and cities.

Despite the difficulties in distinguishing between Rwandan and RCD-Goma combatants, MONUC continued to investigate allegations of the presence of foreign troops. There were persistent but unconfirmed reports that RDF was supporting RCD-Goma. Aside from Ugandan troops in Bunia, MONUC found no evidence of formed foreign military units remaining in the DRC.

Despite assurances by President Kabila, MONUC was denied unrestricted access to airports at Kinshasa and Gbadolite and to rail and air transport leaving Lubumbashi. Thus, the Mission had no direct evidence to address suspicions that the DRC continued to support armed groups in the east. On 24 January, MONUC visited Moliro and ascertained that the Congolese Armed Forces (FAC) were occupying that area with up to three battalions and were being allowed access to Lake Tanganyika in violation of the Harare disengagement and redeployment sub-plans, agreed to in 2000 [YUN 2000, p. 137]. In a letter to the DRC Government, MONUC called for FAC to withdraw to the defensive positions outlined in the Harare sub-plans and reiterated in Security Council resolution 1899(2002) [YUN 2002, p. 106].

Under its main operational activity—disarmament, demobilization, repatriation, resettlement or reintegration (DDRRR)—MONUC made efforts to ensure that information on DDRRR reached the rank and file Interahamwe/ex-FAR combatants deep in the forest, in the face of obstruction by hard-line leaders and the de facto authorities. As at 20 February, the total number of Rwandans repatriated by MONUC stood at over 1,000. Working with South Africa in the Third Party Verification Mechanism established pursuant to the 2002 Pretoria Agreement [YUN 2002, p. 115], MONUC also sought to address the situation of the Armée pour la libération de Rwanda (ex-FAR/Interahamwe) leaders apprehended by the DRC Government. Ultimately, 11 of the 19 leaders apprehended in Kinshasa voluntarily agreed to be repatriated and were returned to Rwanda on 22 January. On 15 January, military sector boundaries were redrawn to facilitate DDRRR operations.

At the time of the report, MONUC had trained a total of 161 civilian police officers and had conducted a training programme in criminal law, criminal procedure and human rights for 53 judicial police officers in Kinsangani, among other training activities. MONUC's other operations were in the area of public information, human rights, child protection, mainstreaming gender issues, HIV/AIDS, humanitarian assistance, demining and quick-impact projects.

The Secretary-General, while welcoming the signing of the All-Inclusive Agreement in 2002, said that the Congolese leaders had not taken the steps required to implement it and continued to engage in military confrontation. Despite the declared withdrawal of most of the foreign forces and the commencement of DDRRR, the military situation on the ground, particularly in the Ituri region and the Kivus, continued to be volatile. He warned that prompt inauguration of the transitional Government was critical if the political momentum created by the Pretoria Agreement was not to be lost. He called on all parties to cooperate with his Special Envoy and the neutral Facilitator to resolve the remaining issues, convene expeditiously the final session of the Inter-Congolese Dialogue, ratify the All-Inclusive Agreement and adopt the transitional constitution. MONUC had been hampered by security conditions in its efforts to verify the reports on the presence of foreign forces. The Secretary-General urged the DRC and neighbouring countries to build regional mechanisms to resolve such issues. Equally important for the peace process, he said, was the establishment of IPC. The potentially explosive nature of the military and political situation in the north-east, and the risk that it could draw in military forces from neighbouring States, were sources of major concern. The importance of a political solution to underpin any military disengagement and ceasefire was key.

Since his previous report, MONUC had made progress in the voluntary repatriation of foreign armed groups, with significant numbers returning to Rwanda. The cooperation of the Rwandan authorities and the contribution of South Africa had been crucial in that regard. In that same period, over 100,000 persons in the north-east around Beni had been displaced as a result of military offensives in which horrendous human rights abuses were perpetrated. Some Congolese leaders had been implicated in those abuses and that impunity had to end.

The Special Representative, Amos Namanga Ngongi, and MONUC were in a position to support the transitional arrangements and to coordinate assistance during the transition period. In addition to its observation and peacemaking efforts, MONUC would be able to help create conditions for holding free and fair elections, including in the areas of security sector reform, rule of law and technical assistance for elections. MONUC was currently exploring those areas.

Communications (February/March). In letters of 3 and 7 February [S/2003/136, S/2003/157], Rwanda protested the issuance by MONUC of press releases indicating that reports had been received regarding the presence of Rwandan troops in DRC territory. Rwanda pointed out that MONUC had not verified the presence of Rwandan troops in Ituri or eastern DRC and demanded to know the sources of the information.

On 12 February [S/2003/172], the DRC forwarded the joint communiqué of the consultative summit between Presidents Kabila of the DRC and Museveni of Uganda, signed in Dar es Salaam, United Republic of Tanzania, on 10 February on the complete withdrawal of Ugandan troops from the DRC, the normalization of relations and an amendment to the 2002 Luanda Agreement. The amendment specified a new timetable for establishing IPC. In the communiqué, the two leaders noted with concern the deterioration in the security and humanitarian situation in Ituri. They agreed that IPC would work from 17 February to 20 March, following which Ugandan troops would be totally withdrawn from Ituri. They agreed to establish a standing consultation mechanism that would permit them to monitor developments in Ituri and take action for the maintenance of peace and security. Uganda also transmitted the texts to the Council [S/2003/213].

The DRC, on 19 February [S/2003/199], transmitted the final communiqué of the meeting of ministers to draw up the modalities for the establishment of IPC between the DRC and Uganda (Luanda, Angola, 14 February). A Preparatory Committee would meet in Bunia on 17 February prior to the launching of IPC, scheduled for 25 February. The meeting also resolved issues regarding the timetable, composition and tasks of IPC. The communiqué was signed by Angola, the DRC, Uganda and MONUC.

On 6 March [S/2003/291], the DRC issued a press release on the situation in Ituri, expressing concern over the rising violence, generated by UPC. Demanding implementation of the 2002 Luanda Agreement, it requested the parties to respect international humanitarian law by protecting the lives of civilians. The DRC called on the international community to demand that Rwanda and Uganda protect civilian populations in the territories under their control. Referring to that communication on 11 March [S/2003/303], Rwanda said that its troops had totally withdrawn from the DRC in 2002, and that the situation in Ituri was a creation of the United Nations, the DRC and Uganda. Rwanda called for the withdrawal of Ugandan forces from the DRC and called on the United Nations to demand that Ugandan forces and FAC leave the Ituri region. On 12 March [S/2003/316], Uganda transmitted an 11 March statement by its Minister of Defence on the situation in Ituri. The Minister said that Uganda would deploy adequate forces to stabilize Bunia and its environs, secure roads to Bunia to ensure a supply of food, facilitate the distribution of food and medicine by humanitarian agencies, and make preparations with MONUC to start IPC. Rwanda, on 14 March [S/2003/318], transmitted a government statement alleging that Ugandan forces had overrun Bunia on 6 March and continued to reinforce the Ituri region with heavy armaments. The DRC continued to supply the ex-FAR and Interahamwe, which were a threat to Rwanda's borders, as were the Ugandan troops in eastern DRC.

Report of UN High Commissioner for Human Rights. In response to a request made by the Security Council during its 13 February meeting on the situation in the DRC [meeting 4705], the Council President circulated on 24 February the report of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights on the human rights situation in the DRC [S/2003/216], covering the period from 18 July 2002 to 30 January 2003. The report, which was based on the joint efforts of OHCHR and MONUC and the High Commissioner's visit to the country from 12 to 15 January, stated that the human rights situation remained grave throughout the DRC, and all parties to the conflict continued to commit gross violations of human rights with impunity. There had been a widespread failure to provide minimum guarantees to the particular needs of the most marginalized and vulnerable people—women, children, the internally displaced and those affected by HIV/AIDS. MONUC, OHCHR and the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on the situation of human rights in the DRC (see p. 810) continued to document massive violations of human rights in the country, especially in areas controlled by RCD-Goma, MLC and UPC. In Government-controlled territory, concerns continued over the administration of justice because of the weakness of the judicial system. The High Commissioner's overall assessment was that the prevailing human rights situation was alarming and a threat to the fragile peace process. Despite the conclusion of the Pretoria and other peace agreements, the ongoing war in the east was causing massive violations of human rights and terrible suffering to thousands of civilians.

The report described some specific atrocities in the territories controlled by the Government and rebels, including arbitrary executions, killings, rape, mutilations, cannibalism, torture, abductions and looting. It also provided information on follow-up action with regard to the May 2002 massacres in Kisangani [YUN 2002, p. 109].

The High Commissioner concluded that there would be a continuing need for the Security Council to exert all possible pressure on the Government and other belligerents and their supporters, notably Rwanda and Uganda, to put an immediate end to the human rights violations and to the culture of impunity. All commanders had to be held responsible for gross violations committed by fighters under their control, and consideration should be given to establishing an international commission of inquiry to investigate violations by all sides. Having ratified the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court [YUN 1998, p. 1209], the DRC should be pressed to pass the necessary legislation so that those who committed war crimes or crimes against humanity might be prosecuted by the Court, should national jurisdiction be unable to do so. The Truth Commission, to be established pursuant to a resolution adopted by all parties in the 2002 Inter-Congolese Dialogue [YUN 2002, p. 107], would be useful in promoting reconciliation. It could conduct investigations, take testimony from witnesses, victims and perpetrators, and recommend reforms needed to prevent the recurrence of abuses.

Security Council press statements (February/March). On 26 February, the Security Council President issued a press statement [SC/7674] in which Council members expressed their concern at the serious violations of human rights reported by the High Commissioner. They reiterated that there could be no impunity and that each party was responsible for maintaining law and order in the areas under its control. With regard to the Ituri situation, members called on UPC to cooperate with MONUC and humanitarian organizations and to facilitate the implementation of IPC. Regional Governments, in particular the DRC, Rwanda and Uganda, were urged to support the peace process in Ituri, and to refrain from taking or supporting any action that could aggravate the situation. The Congolese parties were urged to implement the 2002 All-Inclusive Agreement and to establish the transitional Government. Full access should be provided to MONUC to enable it to verify the implementation of the Pretoria Agreement. Members condemned the attack against a MONUC helicopter in Bunia and demanded that the perpetrators be brought to justice.

In a 10 March press statement [SC/7684- AFR/577], Council members welcomed the agreement reached on 6 March among Congolese parties in Pretoria on transitional arrangements and stressed the importance of the DRC transitional Government being established as soon as possible. They expressed their concern at the continuation of fighting in Bunia and demanded the immediate cessation of hostilities and that IPC be established immediately. They urged Uganda to abide by its commitment to withdraw its troops by 20 March and demanded that all parties ensure the security of civilian populations and guarantee humanitarian organizations full access to those in need.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (March)

On 20 March [meeting 4723], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1468(2003). The draft [S/2003/334] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions and the statements by its President regarding the Democratic Republic of the Congo,

Expressing its full support for the efforts of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights and its appreciation of his report on the situation in Ituri, and recalling the previous report on the situation in Kisangani,

Welcoming the thirteenth report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo,

Commending the Government of Angola for its efforts in ensuring the implementation by the parties of the Luanda Agreement, which establishes the basis for a settlement in the Ituri area, and expressing its gratitude to the Government of Angola for its readiness to continue these efforts,

Commending the Government of South Africa for its role in cooperation with the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General in helping the Congolese parties to reach an agreement on the transitional arrangements,

Commending the efforts of the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General, the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and their teams for helping to steer the negotiations in Pretoria to a successful conclusion,

Determining that the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo continues to pose a threat to international peace and security in the region,

1. Welcomes the agreement reached by the Congolese parties, in Pretoria on 6 March 2003, on the transitional arrangements, commends the Congolese parties, whose responsibility it is to implement fully the commitments they have made, for their efforts in settling the outstanding issues, and calls upon them to establish as soon as possible the Transitional Government in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and stresses that any effort to undermine or delay its establishment would be unacceptable;

2. Condemns the massacres and other systematic violations of international humanitarian law and human rights perpetrated in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, in particular sexual violence against women and girls as a tool of warfare and atrocities perpetrated in the Ituri area by troops of the Mouvement de libération du Congo and the Rassemblement congolais pour la démocratie-National, as well as the acts of violence recently perpetrated by the forces of the Union des patriotes congolais, and reiterates that there will be no impunity for such acts and that the perpetrators will be held accountable;

3. Stresses that the military officers whose names are mentioned in the report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights in connection with serious violations of international humanitarian law and human rights should be brought to justice through further investigation and, if it is warranted by that investigation, be held accountable through a credible judicial process;

4. Calls upon the Congolese parties, when they are selecting individuals for key posts in the Transitional Government, to take into account the commitment and record of those individuals with regard to respect for international humanitarian law and human rights and the promotion of the well-being of all Congolese;

5. Strongly encourages the Congolese parties forming the Transitional Government to establish as soon as possible a truth and reconciliation commission charged with determining responsibility for serious violations of international humanitarian and human rights law, as set forth in the resolutions adopted within the framework of the Inter-Congolese Dialogue held in Sun City, South Africa, in April 2002;

6. Reiterates that all parties claiming a role in the future of the Democratic Republic of the Congo must demonstrate their respect for human rights and international humanitarian law, as well as the security and well-being of civilian populations, and emphasizes that the Transitional Government in the Democratic Republic of the Congo will have to restore law and order and respect for human rights and end impunity, across the entire country;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to increase the number of personnel in the human rights component of the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo to assist and enhance, in accordance with its current mandate, the capacity of the Congolese parties to investigate all serious violations of international humanitarian law and human rights perpetrated on the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo since the beginning of the conflict in August 1998, and also requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the High Commissioner, to make recommendations to the Security Council on other ways to help the Transitional Government in the Democratic Republic of the Congo to address the issue of impunity;

8. Expresses its deep concern over the heavy fighting in Bunia, demands that all parties to the conflict in Ituri immediately cease the hostilities and that all parties sign an unconditional ceasefire agreement, stresses that they must cooperate with the Mission to set up without further delay the Ituri Pacification Commission, and also stresses that the necessary steps must be taken to restore public order in Bunia, in accordance with the agreements reached among the Congolese parties and within the framework of the Commission;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to increase the presence of the Mission in the Ituri area, as security conditions permit, in particular military observers and human rights personnel to monitor developments on the ground, including the use of airfields in the Ituri area, and also requests the Mission to provide further support and assistance to humanitarian efforts, as well as to facilitate the formation of the Ituri Pacification Commission and to assist the work of the Commission as consistent with the current mandate of the Mission, in consultation with all Congolese parties to the conflict;

10. Encourages the Mission in its efforts to consult with the relevant parties on possible options for addressing the immediate security situation in the Ituri area, and requests that the Mission keep the Council informed of its efforts in this regard;

11. Demands that all Governments in the Great Lakes region immediately cease military and financial support to all parties engaged in armed conflict in the Ituri region, stresses the need for all Congolese parties, including the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, to respect their commitments under the Ceasefire Agreement signed at Lusaka on 10 July 1999, as well as the Kampala plan and the Harare sub-plans for disengagement and redeployment, and reiterates that all foreign troops must be withdrawn from the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo;

12. Calls upon the Government of Uganda to complete the withdrawal of all its troops without further delay and, in this regard, expresses its concern that the commitment of that Government to withdraw by 20 March 2003 has not been met, and concerned also at the statement of 14 March 2003 issued by the Ministry for Foreign Affairs and Regional Cooperation of Rwanda, calls upon the Government of Rwanda not to return any forces to the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and stresses that any renewal of the strengthening of a foreign military presence on the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo would be unacceptable and would undermine the progress achieved thus far in the peace process;

13. Expresses its deep concern at the rising tensions between Rwanda and Uganda and their proxies on the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and stresses that the Governments of those two countries must take steps to build mutual confidence, must settle their concerns through peaceful means, and without any interference in Congolese affairs, and must refrain from any action that could undermine the peace process;

14. Demands that all parties to the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and in particular in Ituri, ensure the security of civilian populations and grant to the Mission and to humanitarian organizations full and unimpeded access to the populations in need;

15. Reiterates the demand expressed in its resolution 1460(2003) of 30 January 2003 that all parties to the conflict provide information without delay on steps they have taken to halt the recruitment or use of children in armed conflict, in violation of the international obligations applicable to them, as well as its demands with regard to the protection of children contained in its resolutions 1261(1999) of 25 August 1999, 1314(2000) of 11 August 2000, 1379(2001) of 20 November 2001 and 1460(2003);

16. Recalls its demand that full and unimpeded access be granted to the Mission and the Third Party Verification Mechanism so that they could verify the implementation of the Peace Agreement signed at Pretoria on 30 July 2002 and investigate the allegations of the presence of Rwandan troops on the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, as well as allegations of support by the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo to the armed groups in the east of the country, reiterates that both would be unacceptable and would undermine the continuation of the peace process, and stresses that any ongoing military activity in the east of the Democratic Republic of the Congo has a detrimental effect on Mission operations of disarmament, demobilization, repatriation, reintegration or resettlement of armed groups;

17. Requests that the Mission report as soon as possible to the Council on the results of its investigations referred to in paragraph 16 above;

18. Expresses its support to the broad orientations set out by the Secretary-General in paragraph 59 of his last report on the role of the Mission in support of the peace process, and expresses its intention to consider his recommendations in this regard;

19. Reiterates its full support for the Mission and the efforts it continues to deploy to help the parties in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and in the region to advance their peace process, and stresses the importance of the Mission moving forward with its phase III deployment, in accordance with resolution 1445(2002) of 4 December 2002;

20. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Communications (March/April). Rwanda, in a 25 March letter [S/2003/369] to the Council President, welcomed resolution 1468(2003) and the recent progress made in the Inter-Congolese Dialogue, which brought together participants from numerous factions under the aegis of the neutral Facilitator. It hoped that the United Nations would continue to help Congolese parties overcome the few remaining obstacles, particularly the establishment of the security mechanisms for the transitional Government. It appreciated the Council's concern at the rising tension between Rwanda and Uganda, supported the implementation of the Lusaka [YUN 1999, p. 87] and Pretoria [YUN 2002, p. 115] Agreements through the Dialogue, and called for an immediate withdrawal of Ugandan and Kinshasa forces from Ituri and a deployment of a neutral force in Bunia and at strategic points. The DRC, it said, continued to support the ex-FAR/Interahamwe, enabling them to take over most positions previously held by Rwandan forces, thus posing a threat to Rwanda.

On 8 April [S/2003/413], Uganda transmitted a 3 April statement on resolution 1468(2003), in which it welcomed recent progress by the Congolese parties with regard to transitional arrangements. Uganda shared the Security Council's concern on the situation in Ituri, noting that it would be further aggravated if Ugandan troops were withdrawn without alternative arrangements. Following a ceasefire in Ituri province, which was signed on 18 March in Bunia, with only UPC not signing, IPC was officially inaugurated on 1 April. Uganda was therefore ready to withdraw its troops as soon as alternative security arrangements were put in place. Uganda expressed concern about Rwanda's allegations against it but affirmed that it had no designs to harm Rwanda.

On 9 April [S/2003/415], Rwanda reported to the Security Council that it had observed the massacres of innocent populations on 3 March in parts of eastern DRC controlled by Ugandan forces and their allies. Rwanda disapproved of the mandate for security stewardship in the eastern DRC that the Council had given to Uganda only because its forces were deployed on the ground. It also reaffirmed its rejection of IPC, which was aimed at enabling Kinshasa to reassert its authority in Ituri, as long as the Inter-Congolese Dialogue had not been fully implemented. Rwanda further reaffirmed its view that a quick deployment of a neutral force in eastern DRC, especially in all strategic points held by the Ugandan troops and their allies, would be the best option for solving the crisis. In the meantime, MONUC and the Third Party Verification Mechanism should be enabled to take control of all airfields and ports in eastern DRC, in order to check resupplying and infiltration forces.

On 29 April [S/2003/514], Uganda transmitted a statement issued by the ministerial meeting of Angola, the DRC and Uganda, the signatories of the 2002 Luanda Agreement [YUN 2002, p. 116], with the participation of MONUC (Bunia, 15 April). The delegations expressed satisfaction with the results of IPC. The DRC urged Uganda to communicate its detailed plan of withdrawal, in accordance with the Luanda Agreement, and insisted on the deployment in Ituri of an international force, as well as the National Congolese Police. Uganda provided explanations regarding its presence in Bunia and Ituri and confirmed the strength and location of troops, which would be conveyed to MONUC. It also recalled the presence of elements of Ugandan dissidents deployed in Ituri and reaffirmed its willingness to withdraw all troops by 24 April. It hoped an international force would be deployed in its place, in order to avoid any security vacuum. MONUC indicated that an assessment of the security context of Ituri was being made. The DRC and Uganda reiterated the need for implementation of the security mechanism regarding the western slopes of the Rwenzori Mountains and agreed that experts from both parties would examine modalities at a later date.

Events in Drodro and Mambasa

The Security Council President issued a press statement on 8 April [SC/7722-AFR/599] in which members condemned an offensive launched by RCD-Goma in eastern DRC, and urged it immediately to recall its troops to the agreed positions. Condemning the massacres in the Ituri area and calling for the perpetrators to be brought to justice, members requested the High Commissioner for Human Rights to investigate those events. They called on the Ugandan forces to withdraw from DRC territory without delay and recalled that so long as they were deployed on the ground, those forces had the responsibility to ensure the safety of the civilian population. They further called on all parties to cooperate fully with IPC. Council members demanded the immediate cessation of the fighting and massacres in eastern DRC and called on all Congolese parties to ensure that the transitional Government was established as soon as possible.

On 25 June [S/2003/674], the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a MONUC report on incidents that took place in Mambasa in late 2002 and early 2003 and a report of the High Commissioner for Human Rights on the events of 3 April in Drodro, Ituri, which he submitted in response to the request contained in the Council's 8 April press statement (see above). From the testimonies of 503 people, the MONUC special investigation team determined that there was a pattern of looting, killing and violence against women, used as premeditated tools of war by MLC, RCD/N and UPC military forces in October and December 2002. Acts of cannibalism, preceded by corporal mutilations and sectioning of internal body parts, particularly concerning the internal body parts of Pygmies, could be considered to be purc fetishism. The fact of forcing family members to eat body parts of their loved ones could be considered as psychological torture. Most of those violations seemed to have been committed with the aim of taking revenge on the Nande and Pygmy populations perceived as assisting and supporting the RCD-Liberation Movement (ML) authorities.

The team made recommendations aimed at restoring justice and supporting the victims, including: follow-up of rape cases by a female human rights investigator; follow-up of forced disappearance cases; arranging psychological support for victims of rape and eyewitnesses of executions and cannibalism; sending a forensic team to analyse mass graves; providing emergency humanitarian assistance for schools and medical facilities; and providing trauma counselling for children affected by the violations.

In his report on the 3 April events in Drodro, the High Commissioner for Human Rights observed that the human rights situation in Ituri had been deteriorating for nearly five years. The armed conflict that broke out in August 1998 and continuing dissension among the rebel movements and factions, coupled with the interference of neighbouring countries, had exacerbated the situation. As violence increased, the different ethnic groups of the region had organized themselves into militias or armed groups, with the aim, among other things, of influencing the DRC political process. The current cycle of violence began in August 2002, when a UPC faction captured Bunia. In January 2003, after the signing of the All-Inclusive Agreement [YUN 2002, p. 125], a political and military alliance was forged between UPC and RCD-Goma, which led to further deterioration in Bunia. That event, as well as dissent within UPC, led to the establishment of another armed faction, the Front pour l'intégration et la paix en Ituri, which, with support from foreign troops, seized Bunia on 6 March and forced the UPC leader, Thomas Lubanga, and his militias to fall back to Drodro (80 kilometres west of Bunia), where they came under armed attack on 3 April. The report, based on a mission to the area by a special investigation team (18 April–5 May), highlighted the human rights situation in Ituri following the 3 April events in Drodro.

The investigation team determined that about 408 people were summarily executed, including people burned alive. More than 80 others were badly wounded and/or mutilated, about 150 shops were looted and several dozen heads of livestock were stolen. Those events made the already precarious human rights situation throughout Ituri worse. Accounts received by the investigation team indicated that the attacks on Drodro were carried out by Lendu militias; witnesses also reported that some of the attackers wore olive-green mottled military uniforms like those of the Ugandan troops in the region. Further attacks on the vulnerable population of Ituri by Lendu militias took place on 8, 11, 12, 15, 17 and 18 April in various villages, resulting in numerous massacres and atrocities, and thousands of people were left homeless to roam the area, malnourished and without the barest necessities. More recently, following the withdrawal of Ugandan troops and the deployment of the Rapid Reaction Police from Kinshasa, the security situation in Bunia had deteriorated dramatically. Clashes continued between armed militias, and the premises and warehouses of humanitarian agencies were looted, as were private houses. The mostly Hema population was massacred and militia members attacked MONUC, forcing its troops to fire into the air to disperse them. Humanitarian workers were evacuated to Kisangani and Goma and were thereby prevented from assisting the affected population.

In general, the situation in Ituri, in particular in the Drodro area, was extremely threatening to stability in the DRC and the Great Lakes region, and required a response from the international community and the Congolese actors. The events in Drodro occurred during a conflict when various rebel movements were founded—movements backed by neighbouring countries and riven by internal dissension. The proliferation of rival factions and tribal armed groups, which were manipulated and run by a handful of warlords and certain neighbouring countries desirous of protecting their interests or influencing the political process in the DRC, largely explained the unprecedented violence that swept Ituri for months and was responsible for serious human rights violations and a disastrous humanitarian situation.

In the High Commissioner's view, the underlying cause of the situation was a vicious cycle of grave human rights violations and vengeance, buttressed by impunity. He recommended that the future transitional Government establish an appropriate judicial body to try alleged perpetrators of serious human rights violations and breaches of international humanitarian law, and affirmed his readiness to cooperate with the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court in that regard. The High Commissioner urged the Security Council to strengthen the presence of military observers so that humanitarian organizations and human rights observers could move into Ituri and provide support for national human right institutions and for enhancing the judicial system.

The Security Council considered the report on 7 July [meeting 4784].

Press statements (May). In a 5 May press statement [SC/7749-AFR/613], Security Council members expressed concern on the situation in Ituri.

They urged all parties and regional States to support the IPC process and urged Uganda to fulfil its commitment to withdraw its forces from the area. Condemning all harassment of MONUC personnel and the violence that had taken place in the Kivus, they called for an end to support to armed militias and the fuelling of ethnic tensions. They reiterated that the leaders of all warring factions should be personally accountable for human rights violations.

Following a briefing by the Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations, Jean-Marie Guéhenno, on the deteriorating situation in Bunia, the Council, on 9 May [SC/7755-AFR/616], issued a press statement condemning attacks against MONUC headquarters in Bunia, where a 700-member guard contingent had been deployed in support of the IPC process. It called on the parties to cease aggression and violence, especially against the civilian population and MONUC.

Letter from Secretary-General (15 May). The Secretary-General, in a 15 May letter to the Security Council President [S/2003/574], expressed concern about the rapidly deteriorating situation in and around Bunia, which had become the site of major violent clashes between Hema- and Lendu-based militia groups, and which had been exacerbated by outside interference. Anticipating further worsening of the situation, he requested the Council to consider urgently his proposal for the rapid deployment to Bunia of a well-trained and well-equipped multinational force, under the leadership of a Member State, to provide security at the airport and other vital installations and to protect the civilian population. The force would be in place for a limited period until a reinforced UN presence could be deployed. All parties, in particular the States involved in the conflict in the DRC, should desist from interference in the affairs of the region. In the face of the current crisis in Ituri, the international community should act decisively to offset the looming humanitarian catastrophe in Bunia and rescue the nascent political process.

Dar es Salaam agreement. On 16 May in Dar es Salaam, the United Republic of Tanzania facilitated a summit between the protagonists in Ituri, all of whom signed a new commitment to restart pacification and proceed with the cantonment of their troops for the purpose of demilitarization. They also supported the Secretary-General's efforts to obtain an international rapid reaction force for Ituri.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (16 May)

On 16 May [meeting 4756], following consultations among Security Council members, the President made statement S/PRST/2003/6 on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council condemns the recent killings, violence and other human rights violations and atrocities in Bunia, as well as the attacks against the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the internally displaced persons who have sought refuge at the Mission premises, and reiterates that there will be no impunity for such acts and that the perpetrators will be held accountable. It demands that all hostilities in Ituri cease immediately. The fighting is unacceptable. It threatens the stability of the Ituri area and severely undermines the continuation of the peace process and the establishment of the Transitional National Government.

The Council fully supports the work initiated by the Ituri Pacification Commission, established by the Luanda Agreement of 6 September 2002, under which the Ituri interim administration was formed, encourages donors to provide additional funding and emphasizes that it is up to the various Congolese parties in Ituri to pursue an effective, inclusive political and security mechanism in this framework.

The Council welcomes the Agreement on the Engagement to Relaunch the Ituri Pacification Process, signed in Dar es Salaam on 16 May 2003, and calls upon the parties to implement it fully and without delay.

The Council calls upon all parties in the region to end all support to armed groups and to refrain from any action that might compromise the restoration of peace in Ituri, in particular the work of the Ituri interim administration, and reaffirms its strong commitment to the sovereignty of the Democratic Republic of the Congo over all its territory.

The Council expresses its concern at the deteriorating humanitarian situation in Bunia and demands that all parties grant full and unimpeded access for humanitarian aid and guarantee the safety and security of humanitarian personnel. It also calls upon the donor community to continue to support the humanitarian organizations.

The Council pays tribute to the work that has been achieved by the staff and contingents of the Mission in Ituri, in very difficult conditions, and fully supports them.

The Council welcomes the efforts by the Secretary-General to address the urgent humanitarian and security situation in Bunia, including options for sending an emergency international force, and encourages him to complete consultations to this end as a matter of urgency.

The Council demands that all Congolese parties and regional States involved in the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo refrain from any action that could undermine the possible deployment of an international force, and support the deployment.

Communications (May). Uganda, on 16 May [S/2003/553], discussed developments in eastern DRC. Uganda had completed withdrawal of its forces from Bunia and was therefore no longer responsible for the maintenance of security in Ituri province. Uganda had warned the international community that withdrawal of its forces without deployment of adequate UN forces would create a security vacuum that would lead to renewal of the Lendu-Hema conflict, and indeed the level of deployment of MONUC and the Congolese police deployment had proved inadequate to cope with the situation that arose. Following Uganda's withdrawal, inter-ethnic conflict erupted, resulting in an influx of DRC citizens (estimated at 50,000 to 60,000 people), mostly Hema, to Uganda. The resulting humanitarian crisis brought about an urgent need for food, water and shelter for the refugees, for which Uganda appealed to the international community. Uganda also called on the Security Council to expand MONUC's role from peace monitoring to peace enforcement, under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, and to increase MONUC's deployment to fill the security vacuum in Ituri.

By another 16 May letter [S/2003/560], Uganda transmitted a press release following discussions held by its Third Deputy Prime Minister/Minister for Foreign Affairs, James Wapakhabulo, with French Foreign Minister Dominique de Villepin. The French Foreign Minister appreciated the gravity of the situation in north-eastern DRC and the need for a more robust MONUC deployment in Ituri.

Report of Secretary-General (May). In response to Security Council resolution 1417(2002) [YUN 2002, p. 112], the Secretary-General submitted, on 27 May, his second special report on MONUC [S/2003/566 & Corr.1]. The report also covered major developments in the DRC since his report in February (see p. 115). He said that on 2 April in Sun City, the participants in the Inter-Congolese Dialogue signed the Final Act of the inter-Congolese political negotiations that had started in October 2001 [YUN 2001, p. 131], by which they endorsed a package of agreements that constituted a comprehensive programme for the restoration of peace and national sovereignty during a transition period of two years. The agreements comprised the 2002 Global and All-Inclusive Agreement on the Transition in the DRC [YUN 2002, p. 125], the Transitional Constitution, the memorandum of 6 March on military and security issues, and the resolutions adopted in 2002 by the Inter-Congolese Dialogue in Sun City [YUN 2002, p. 107]. Since the signing of the Final Act, the Congolese parties had taken steps towards establishing the transitional Government: Mr. Kabila was sworn in as President for the transitional period on 7 April; amnesty was granted for certain actions relating to war; the military court was abolished; the Follow-up Commission held meetings to prepare for the new institutions; and the Special Representative, on 10 April, convened the first meeting of the International Committee in Support of the Transition in Kinshasa (comprising representatives of the permanent members of the Security Council and Angola, Belgium, Canada, Gabon, Mozambique, South Africa and Zambia, plus the AU and the EU).

Despite political progress at the national level, hostilities, which were accompanied by widespread and gross violations of human rights, continued in the east, in particular between Lendu-based and Hema-based militias in Ituri, and between RCD-Goma, Mayi-Mayi and other armed groups in North and South Kivu. The root causes of the Ituri conflict, which related to an indigenous power struggle over land and resources, had been exacerbated by the protagonists of the wider conflict in the DRC. As a result of the proliferation of armed groups and their constantly shifting allegiances, the situation in the region had become volatile and unpredictable. UPC engaged in large-scale military operations in four localities in Ituri, resulting in killings, destruction of property and displacement of a large number of people. Since the first major fighting in 1999, the death toll was estimated at more than 60,000. Between 500,000 and 600,000 internally displaced persons—many of whom remained in hiding and could not be accounted for—were dispersed throughout the area, as were almost 100,000 refugees from the Sudan and Uganda.

On 6 March, Ugandan forces recaptured Bunia, which had been under UPC control since August 2002. Subsequently, the Ugandan presence in Ituri was reinforced to over 7,000 troops, who were deployed to strategic locations in the region. Their deployment did not stem the activities of armed militias, however.

In view of rising tensions between Rwanda and Uganda over the increased presence of the latter's forces in the region, the Special Representative proposed a trilateral meeting of the heads of State of the DRC, Rwanda and Uganda, which was held on 9 April in Cape Town, South Africa, and hosted by President Thabo Mbeki. The three leaders confirmed the timetable for Ugandan withdrawal from Ituri, from 24 April to 14 May.

MONUC intensified its consultations with key players in early March, which led to the Governments of the DRC and Uganda and six armed groups (except for UPC, which had lost almost all of its territorial control) reaching a ceasefire agreement that paved the way for convening IPC. The 177 delegates who attended IPC (Bunia, 4-14 April) represented the main communities and groups in Ituri, including UPC. It was agreed to set up an interim administration, which began work on 25 April.

In order to assist in the political process initiated by IPC, MONUC increased its presence in the Bunia area and had 720 troops in place at the time of the report. Their tasks included a presence at the airfield and protection of UN personnel and facilities and sites of IPC meetings. The number of military observer teams in Ituri was also increased. On 26 April, one military observer was killed and another wounded in a landmine accident.

On 25 April, Uganda began withdrawing its troops from Ituri and had completed its withdrawal from Bunia on 6 May. Immediately after the departure of Ugandan troops from Bunia, Hema- and Lendu-based militia groups sought to establish control over the town, resulting in violent clashes and looting, including of UN premises. MONUC was forced to return fire to repel the aggressors. In talks with the Special Representative, President Kabila agreed to deploy troops to Bunia.

RCD-Goma continued to redeploy nearly all its military force away from positions on the disengagement line to conduct offensives in the North and South Kivu and Maniema provinces. Those offensives resulted in serious human rights violations, triggering new waves of population displacement.

The persistent outbreaks of fighting in eastern DRC continued to hamper and delay MONUC operations to disarm, demobilize and repatriate foreign ex-combatants, the main focus of the Mission. MONUC had repatriated more than 1,500 Rwandans, including both combatants and their dependants, since October 2002, while the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) had repatriated 3,021 Rwandan refugees. The voluntary DDRRR programme was hindered by the security situation and by lack of cooperation from the parties concerned. RCD-Goma had not offered its full cooperation and Mayi-Mayi representatives had proved to be unreliable. Nevertheless, MONUC persuaded some combatants to enter the DDRRR process. Progress was also made in reopening the Congo River; the first private commercial traffic allowed by RCD-Goma arrived in Kisangani in February.

MONUC revised its deployment strategy to re-adjust its structure from that based on the 1999 Lusaka Agreement [YUN 1999, p. 87] to one that met the needs of the changing political and military situation. It closed two coordination centres and 22 team sites and redeployed the troops to other priority areas.

The report outlined the responsibilities of the Congolese parties and the role of MONUC during the forthcoming two- to three-year transitional period. First, the transitional Government would have to put in place the transitional institutions and ensure their functioning, and lay the ground for the elected Government that would be established at the end of the transition by preparing for elections and drafting a new Constitution. It would also have to address security and military matters and economic development. The parties would have to observe a number of key benchmarks, including: cessation of hostilities and military support to armed groups; lifting of restrictions on the free movement of people and goods; the liberalization of political activity; the dismantling of armed groups; and taking steps to establish the high command of the national armed forces and to form the initial unit of the integrated police force.

MONUC's priorities would be: to provide political support to the transition by assisting the Congolese parties in implementing their commitments, leading to the holding of elections; to contribute to local conflict resolution and the maintenance of security; to continue DRRR of foreign armed groups and Congolese combatants; to promote the coordination of international political and donor efforts with regard to the transition; to contribute to confidence-building between the DRC and neighbouring States; and to continue activities in the areas of human rights, humanitarian affairs, child protection and gender affairs. The immediate goals were to help establish the transitional Government; contribute to security in Kinshasa; assist in reconciliation efforts in Ituri; contribute to local-level conflict resolution; and continue DRRR of armed groups in the Kivus. Given MONUC's new responsibilities, the leadership structure, both civilian and military, would need to be strengthened.

The Secretary-General observed that the DRC, after nearly five years of continuous fighting, found itself at an intersection of peace and war. The definitive and successful conclusion of the Inter-Congolese Dialogue was a crucial milestone that constituted the commitment by the Congolese parties finally to pursue a path of peace and reconciliation. Since the signing of the 1999 Lusaka Ceasefire Agreement, MONUC's primary role had been to facilitate the implementation of that document and supplementary bilateral agreements that provided the framework for addressing the military dimension of the conflict. Despite slow and partial compliance by the parties, there had been some major achievements, including the disengagement of foreign armed forces and their allies to defensive positions, the withdrawal of the majority of foreign troops from the DRC and initial progress in the ad hoc disarmament, demobilization and repatriation of Rwandan armed groups.

MONUC would be required to play a central role in facilitating the transition process and the Mission should be reconfigured and augmented accordingly. The All-Inclusive Agreement and President Kabila had requested the United Nations to deploy a force to participate in the proposed multi-layered confidence-building security system to give confidence to transitional leaders in Kinshasa. The proposed system would comprise the existing Congolese police structures to carry out normal law and order functions; the close protection corps to act as personal bodyguards for political leaders; and a MONUC military contingent of some 740 personnel. Any elements of the Congolese Armed Forces currently deployed in Kinshasa would be garrisoned and monitored by MONUC. A newly formed integrated police unit would be trained to take over security tasks from MONUC. Before the formation of the transitional Government, MONUC would redeploy two guard units, to be assisted by 30 additional military police personnel, to the security zone in the capital. In addition, MONUC civilian police officers would advise, monitor and report on the conduct of the various Congolese entities with security responsibilities. Those arrangements would last from six to nine months and would require 104 security personnel in addition to the MONUC military contingent.

MONUC had already established a Transition Support Unit, which would be supplemented by an electoral assistance cell to plan UN support for elections. The Secretary-General also recommended imposing an arms embargo in Ituri and the Kivus.

As for the MONUC military presence, it would be enhanced by the establishment of the IPC Support Unit, in which all MONUC substantive components would be represented (political affairs, human rights, humanitarian affairs, child protection, public information). MONUC would work closely with the humanitarian and development community in Ituri, which was designing a strategy for that long-inaccessible region. In order to provide protection to UN personnel and assets in Ituri and to establish a framework of security in support of the political process, it was assessed that a brigade-size formation (three battalions with support and totalling up to 3,800 personnel) would be necessary. The current deployment in Bunia of nearly 800 Uruguayan troops was the minimum that was militarily acceptable to establish security for UN operations at the Bunia airfield, protect UN personnel and resources, support the IPC peace process and prepare for follow-on deployments and logistic sustainment. Since the deployment of a large force would take some months, leaving a dangerous interim gap in a volatile area, the Secretary-General called on the Security Council to consider urgently the rapid deployment to Bunia of a highly trained and well-equipped force, under the leadership of a Member State, to provide security at the airport and other vital installations and to protect the civilian population, as a temporary arrangement before the deployment of a reinforced UN presence. Such a deployment—for a limited period—should be authorized under Chapter VII of the UN Charter.

In the Kivus, ongoing military offensives continued to cause widespread suffering and undermine DDRRR activities. The Secretary-General called on RCD-Goma, various Mayi-Mayi groups and other local militias to cease hostilities immediately. MONUC had a role to play in encouraging and assisting local and international partners in conflict resolution in the Kivus by expanding the presence of its civilian personnel and military observers.

DDRRR of foreign armed groups remained an important goal, as that process lay at the heart of the Great Lakes conflict. However, equally important for the transition process in the DRC was the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of Congolese armed and irregular forces. The Secretary-General proposed that MONUC's mandate be expanded to assist the transitional Government in planning that task.

The Secretary-General stated that the priorities he had outlined would require further resources; he therefore recommended that MONUC's mandate be extended for another year, until 30 June 2004, and that the authorized military strength be increased to 10,800 all ranks. He further recommended that civilian police personnel be increased from 100 to 134 police officers and that other specialized personnel be augmented.

The Secretary-General observed that the peace process could not move forward without the demonstrated commitment of the Congolese leaders and a number of key benchmarks had to be observed by the parties in that regard: immediate cessation of hostilities and of inflammatory rhetoric; lifting of restrictions on the free movement of goods and people; liberalization of political activity; disbandment of armed groups or their transformation into political parties; and taking steps to establish the high command of the integrated national armed forces and to form an initial unit of integrated police. In addition, the Government should be held accountable for the effective management of the natural resources of the DRC.

Press statement (28 May). The President of the Security Council issued a 28 May press statement [SC/7770-APR/626] in which Council members condemned the recent violence and atrocities committed in the DRC, especially the murder of two MONUC military observers, as well as the looting of humanitarian and medical equipment. They called for full cooperation and restraint by all parties, including neighbouring States, and for them to refrain from arming the belligerents. There was unanimous support in the Council for the Secretary-General's proposal to deploy a multinational force in Bunia.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (30 May and 4 June)

On 30 May [meeting 4764], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1484(2003). The draft [S/2003/578] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions and the statements by its President on the Democratic Republic of the Congo, in particular the statement of 16 May 2003,

Determined to promote the peace process at the national level, in particular to facilitate the early establishment of an inclusive Transitional Government in the Democratic Republic of the Congo,

Expressing its utmost concern at the fighting and atrocities in Ituri, as well as the gravity of the humanitarian situation in the town of Bunia,

Reaffirming its full support for the political process initiated by the Ituri Pacification Commission, calling for its swift resumption and for the establishment of an effective, inclusive security mechanism within this framework, to complement and support the existing Ituri interim administration,

Recognizing the urgent need for a secure base to allow the full functioning of the institutions of the Ituri interim administration, and recognizing that the Agreement on the Engagement and Relaunch the Ituri Pacification Process, signed in Dar es Salaam on 16 May 2003, reaffirms the commitment of the Ituri parties to the Ituri interim administration, and commits them to join a process of cantonment and demilitarization,

Commending the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo for its efforts to stabilize the situation in Bunia and to support the political process in Ituri, in particular the effective performance of the Uruguayan contingent deployed there, recognizing the need to support the work of the Mission in the field, and deploring attacks on the Mission and the consequent loss of life,

Taking note of the request of the Secretary-General addressed to the Security Council in his letter dated 15 May 2003, and taking note also of the support for this request expressed in the letter to the Secretary-General from the President of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and also by the Ituri parties on 16 May 2003 in Dar es Salaam, as well as the support expressed in the letters to the Secretary-General from the President of the Rwandese Republic and from the Minister of State for Foreign Affairs of Uganda, as requested by the Secretary-General, for the deployment of a multinational force in Bunia,

Determining that the situation in the Ituri region, in Bunia in particular, constitutes a threat to the peace process in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and to peace and security in the Great Lakes region,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Authorizes the deployment, until 1 September 2003, of an Interim Emergency Multinational Force in Bunia in close coordination with the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, in particular its contingent currently deployed in the town, to contribute to the stabilization of the security conditions and the improvement of the humanitarian situation in Bunia, to ensure the protection of the airport and of the internally displaced persons in the camps in Bunia and, if the situation requires it, to contribute to the safety of the civilian population, United Nations personnel and the humanitarian presence in the town;

2. Stresses that this Multinational Force is to be deployed on a strictly temporary basis to allow the Secretary-General to reinforce the presence of the Mission in Bunia, and in this regard authorizes the Secretary-General to deploy, within the overall ceiling authorized for the Mission, a reinforced United Nations presence to Bunia, and requests him to do so by mid-August 2003;

3. Calls upon Member States to contribute personnel, equipment and other necessary financial and logistic resources to the Multinational Force, and invites contributing Member States to so inform the leadership of the Force and the Secretary-General;

4. Authorizes the Member States participating in the Multinational Force in Bunia to take all necessary measures to fulfil its mandate;

5. Demands that all parties to the conflict in Ituri, in particular in Bunia, cease hostilities immediately, and reiterates that international humanitarian law must be respected and that there will be no impunity for violators;

6. Strongly condemns the deliberate killing of unarmed personnel of the Mission and staff of humanitarian organizations in Ituri, and demands that the perpetrators be brought to justice;

7. Demands that all Congolese parties and all States in the Great Lakes region respect human rights, cooperate with the Multinational Force and with the Mission in the stabilization of the situation in Bunia and provide assistance, as appropriate, that they provide full freedom of movement to the Force and that they refrain from any military activity or from any activity that could further destabilize the situation in Ituri, and in this regard demands also the cessation of all support, in particular weapons and any other military materiel, to the armed groups and militias, and demands further that all Congolese parties and all States in the region actively prevent the supply of such support;

8. Calls upon all Member States, in particular those in the Great Lakes region, to provide all necessary support to facilitate the swift deployment in Bunia of the Multinational Force;

9. Requests the leadership of the Multinational Force in Bunia to report regularly to the Security Council, through the Secretary-General, on the implementation of its mandate;

10. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

The Security Council met on 4 June [meeting 4767] with the troop-contributing countries to MONUC and was briefed by Hédi Annabi, Assistant Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations. Senegal, in a letter of 1 June [S/2003/602], said that it would participate in the Interim Emergency Multinational Force, pursuant to resolution 1484(2003) (above). On 2 June [S/2003/611], Morocco, as Chairman of the African Group, said that the Group supported the Secretary-General's recommendation on increasing the number of MONUC staff. South Africa, as Chairman of the AU, transmitted on 16 June [S/2003/654] a communiqué issued by the Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution (Addis Ababa, 12-13 June), which included a decision on the DRC. Welcoming resolution 1484(2003), the Central Organ recommended that MONUC's mandate be extended to the disarmament of armed groups and demobilization of child soldiers.

Security Council mission

On 17 June [S/2003/653], the Security Council issued a report on its mission to Central Africa from 7 to 16 June (see also p. 149). In the light of the Secretary-General's 27 May report (see p. 123), the mission chose to concentrate, with regard to the DRC, on the urgent questions of the installation of the transitional Government and the creation of a unified national army; the situation in Bunia; the situation in North Kivu; the need for regional countries to exert a positive influence on the situation; and the end of impunity.

The mission registered its expectation with all concerned parties in the DRC that a functioning transitional Government would be set up by 30 June, with a unified national army capable of defending its national borders and population, and a developing economy in control of the country's natural resources. The mission recommended that the Security Council be prepared to pledge its support to the transitional Government and to call on donors to assist in the reconstruction of the country. The installation of the transitional Government and the conclusion of a ceasefire in Burundi (see p. 152) could clear the way for convening an international conference on the Great Lakes region. Having visited Bunia, the mission expressed concern about the possibility of further fighting after the expiration of the mandate of the Interim Emergency Multinational Force on 1 September and suggested a more robust mandate for MONUC in order to avert further conflict and humanitarian catastrophe. The mission emphasized that the parties to the conflict in Ituri should understand that it was in their interest to find a solution to their disputes within the context of IPC, the only legitimate framework that included all the actors in Ituri. The mission heard allegations of the continued supply of arms to the belligerents by outside parties, including foreign parties, and discussed the possibility of imposing an arms embargo on Ituri, as proposed by the Secretary-General.

The mission noted the ongoing fighting in North Kivu, in particular the offensive launched by RCD-Goma. It deplored the impunity that characterized much of the fighting and the accompanying human rights abuses and humanitarian crises in eastern DRC. Noting that some progress had been made in establishing mechanisms to enforce international criminal justice, the mission recommended that consideration be given to practical steps to end impunity in the DRC and Burundi. As to reports of continuing illegal exploitation of natural resources, the mission recommended that the Council act on the recommendations to be made by the Expert Panel in its forthcoming report (see p. 140).

The Security Council considered the mission's report on 18 June [meeting 4775] and the Secretary-General's 27 May report on 26 June [meeting 4780]. At the 18 June meeting, the head of the Council's mission said that both the DRC and Burundi were at a critical juncture in their history. Rwanda said that the DRC Government had maintained its support for the ex-FAR and Interahamwe militias and had spread the rumour that Rwandan Defence Forces had never fully withdrawn from the DRC to justify its reoccupation of South and North Kivu, with the support of the Interahamwe, the ex-FAR, the Mayi-Mayi rebels and RCD-Kisangani/ML. The DRC said that since the signing of the final document on the Inter-Congolese Dialogue, it had taken the necessary steps to install the transitional Government. However, the war hindered the search for a political solution, as did the lack of cooperation demonstrated by certain elements, in particular RCD-Goma, and the negative role that Rwanda played in eastern DRC. The political process undertaken by IPC had stagnated as a result of the renewed hostilities between the Hema and the Lendu in Bunia. The DRC urged the Council to extend and strengthen MONUC's mandate.

Extension of MONUC mandate

On 26 June [meeting 4780], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1489(2003). The draft [S/2003/667] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 1291(2000) of 24 February 2000 and other relevant resolutions concerning the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, especially resolutions 1468(2003) of 20 March 2003 and 1484(2003) of 30 May 2003,

Reaffirming its commitment to the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and of all States of the region,

Deeply concerned over the continuation of hostilities in the eastern part of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, in particular in the province of North Kivu,

Taking note of the second special report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, of 27 May 2003, and the recommendations contained therein,

Reaffirming its readiness to support the peace and national reconciliation process, in particular through the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, in accordance with resolution 1291(2000),

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo until 30 July 2003;

2. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Press statement (26 June). On 26 June [SC/7801-APR/651], the President of the Security Council issued a press statement on the DRC situation, in which Council members expressed their deep concern over the latest developments in the east, particularly in the Kivus. Condemning the recent escalation of fighting, especially the RCD-Goma offensives, which posed a threat to the political process, they called for an immediate cessation of hostilities and complete withdrawal to the previously agreed positions. All Congolese parties, including the Government, were urged to refrain from any new deployments or other provocative actions. Council members urged all parties to comply with all previous agreements and disengagement plans, and with the Acte d'Engagement for the cessation of hostilities in eastern and north-eastern DRC, signed in Bujumbura, Burundi, on 19 June. Expressing concern at the deteriorating humanitarian situation, they reiterated their call on the parties to provide safe access for international humanitarian assistance. They condemned the recent abduction of two MONUC military observers, welcomed their release and demanded that all parties abide by their obligation to provide unhindered access to MONUC to enable it to carry out its mandate.

Installation of transitional Government

On 30 June, President Kabila announced the composition of the Government of National Unity and Transition in the DRC. The President of the Security Council, in a 2 July press statement [SC/7805-AFR/654], said that Council members welcomed the announcement and encouraged the Congolese parties to allow the transitional institutions to begin functioning. They reiterated the terms of their press statement of 26 June (p. 128) and their concern over the latest developments in eastern DRC.

By a 14 July letter [S/2003/712], Italy transmitted to the Secretary-General a statement by the EU Presidency welcoming the formation of the transitional Government. It called on the new Government to take action to achieve the objectives laid down in the 2002 All-Inclusive Agreement [YUN 2002, p. 125], in particular the holding of free and transparent elections and the formation of a restructured and integrated national army.

At a meeting on 7 July [meeting 4784], the Security Council considered the reports from the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights and MONUC on the events that had taken place in Drodro and Mambasa [S/2003/674] (see p. 121). The Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations, Mr. Guéhenno, reported that the installation of the DRC transitional Government had been delayed due to lack of agreement on the distribution of the military command posts. However, the matter was resolved on 29 June when the parties signed the Second Memorandum on the Army and Security. On 30 June, President Kabila announced the composition of the transitional Government, which would consist of 36 ministers and 25 deputy ministers representing the various components of the Inter-Congolese Dialogue. MONUC was consulting with the parties to ensure that the security concerns of the political leaders, especially MLC and RCD-Goma, were met.

In the Kivus, following the 19 June signing in Bujumbura of the Acte d'Engagement for a cessation of hostilities, the DRC Government, RCD-Kisangani/ML and RCD-Goma, under the mediation of MONUC, established on 26 June the Mission de Vérification Conjointe to verify the withdrawal of RCD-Goma to 15 kilometres south of their positions at Rwese and Kimbulu, as well as the maintenance of the current positions of RCD-Kisangani/ML and the cantonment of FAC troops at Mavivi. MONUC had confirmed that the parties were complying with the initial phase of the ceasefire and withdrawal.

Meanwhile, the situation in Ituri was improving. In Bunia, the security situation was stable and the Interim Emergency Multinational Force (IEMF), with MONUC's cooperation, was patrolling the town, which was declared a weapon-free zone as of 25 June. The two forces were also facilitating the return to town of Lendu inhabitants, and some 6,000 internally displaced persons had returned from camps and outlying areas. The deployment of IEMF in Bunia had begun to change the balance between the warring parties and the legitimate political actors in Ituri.

Reporting to the Council on 18 July [meeting 4790], Mr. Guéhenno said that the security situation in Bunia remained calm but tense following a military operation undertaken by IEMF against UPC on 11 July, in response to its continuing attempt to undermine the weapon-free-zone policy. The operation resulted in some UPC casualties and the confiscation of a large number of weapons. The increased number of returning displaced persons had required reinforced security measures in Bunia, and the humanitarian situation remained a concern. MONUC, with others, was involved in human rights training, recruitment of Iturian police for airport duties, preparing an interim disarmament and reintegration plan for child soldiers, and establishing a trust fund for the Ituri interim administration.

Amos Namanga Ngoni, former Special Representative of the Secretary-General for the DRC, focused on the transitional process and problems encountered since the formation of the transitional Government, such as RCD-Goma's unilateral decision to repartition three military regions. On 15 July, all parties except RCD agreed on the distribution of the military regions among the parties. The formal handover of power between the outgoing and incoming ministers and vice-ministers took place on 15 and 16 July. The establishment of the transitional Government, four years after the signing of the Lusaka Ceasefire Agreement [YUN 1999, p. 87], was a historic milestone.

Addressing the EU decision to deploy IEMF (known as Artemis) to Bunia, the EU Secretary-General, Javier Solana, stated that it was the first EU military operation outside Europe. The multinational force made it possible to stop the massacres there and helped to relaunch the stalled peace process. The rapid deployment of the European multinational force halted the spiral of violence in Ituri and made it possible to relaunch negotiations. The EU was committed to supporting the transition in the DRC until the holding of elections. In that context, Mr. Solana announced that the EU had, on 9 July, adopted a programme of support amounting to 205 million euros.

The EU General Affairs Council issued a 21 July statement [S/2003/772] indicating that, as stipulated in Security Council resolution 1484(2003) (see p. 126) the Artemis military operation would come to an end on 1 September. It asked the Secretary-General to consider certain measures to support the political process under way, including setting up an integrated police unit and support for the electoral process.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (July)

On 28 July (meeting 4797), the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1493(2003). The draft [S/2003/757] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions and the statements by its President concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo,

Reaffirming its commitment to respect for the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and of all the States of the region,

Reaffirming the obligations of all States to refrain from the use of force against the territorial integrity and political independence of any State or in any other manner incompatible with the purposes and principles of the United Nations,

Concerned by the continued illegal exploitation of the natural resources of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and reaffirming in this regard its commitment to respect for the sovereignty of the Democratic Republic of the Congo over its natural resources,

Welcoming the conclusion of the Global and All-Inclusive Agreement on the Transition in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, signed in Pretoria on 17 December 2002, and the subsequent establishment of the Government of National Unity and Transition,

Deeply concerned by the continuation of hostilities in the eastern part of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, particularly in North and South Kivu and in Ituri, and by the grave violations of human rights and international humanitarian law that accompany them,

Recalling that it is incumbent upon all parties to cooperate in the overall deployment of the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo,

Renewing its support to the Interim Emergency Multinational Force deployed in Bunia, and stressing the need to ensure effective and timely replacement of the Force, as requested in resolution 1484(2003) of 30 May 2003, to contribute in the best way to the stabilization of Ituri,

Taking note of the second special report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, of 27 May 2003, and of the recommendations contained therein,

Taking note also of the report of the Security Council mission to Central Africa, of 17 June 2003,

Noting that the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security in the region,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Expresses satisfaction at the promulgation, on 4 April 2003, of the Transitional Constitution in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and at the formation, announced on 30 June 2003, of the Government of National Unity and Transition, encourages the Congolese parties to take the necessary decisions in order to allow the transitional institutions to begin functioning effectively, and encourages them also in this regard to include representatives of the interim institutions that emerged from the Ituri Pacification Commission in the transitional institutions;

2. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo until 30 July 2004;

3. Notes with appreciation the recommendations contained in the second special report of the Secretary-General, and authorizes increasing the military strength of the Mission to 10,800 personnel;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure through his Special Representative for the Democratic Republic of the Congo, who convenes the International Committee in support of the Transition, the coordination of all the activities of the United Nations system in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and to facilitate coordination with other national and international actors of activities in support of the transition;

5. Encourages the Mission, in coordination with United Nations agencies, donors and non-governmental organizations, to provide assistance during the transition period for the reform of the security forces, the re-establishment of a State based on the rule of law and the preparation and holding of elections, throughout the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and welcomes in this regard the efforts of the Member States to support the transition and national reconciliation;

6. Approves the temporary deployment of Mission personnel intended, during the first months of the establishment of the transitional institutions, to participate in a multi-layer security system in Kinshasa in accordance with paragraphs 35 to 38 of the second special report of the Secretary-General, approves also the reconfiguration of the civilian police component of the Mission as outlined in paragraph 42 of that report, and encourages the Mission to continue to support police development in areas of urgent need;

7. Encourages donors to support the establishment of an integrated Congolese police unit and approves the provision by the Mission of the additional assistance that might be needed for its training;

8. Strongly condemns the acts of violence systematically perpetrated against civilians, including the massacres, as well as other atrocities and violations of international humanitarian law and human rights, in particular sexual violence against women and girls, stresses the need to bring to justice those responsible, including those at the command level, and urges all parties, including the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, to take all necessary steps to prevent further violations of human rights and international humanitarian law, in particular those committed against civilians;

9. Reaffirms the importance of a gender perspective in peacekeeping operations in accordance with resolution 1325(2000) of 31 October 2000, recalls the need to address violence against women and girls as a tool of warfare, and in this respect encourages the Mission to continue to actively address this issue, and calls upon the Mission to increase the deployment of women as military observers as well as in other capacities;

10. Reaffirms also that all Congolese parties have an obligation to respect human rights, international humanitarian law and the security and well-being of the civilian population;

11. Urges the Government of National Unity and Transition to ensure that the protection of human rights and the establishment of a State based on the rule of law and of an independent judiciary are among its highest priorities, including the establishment of the necessary institutions as reflected in the Global and All-Inclusive Agreement on the Transition in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, encourages the Secretary-General, through his Special Representative, and the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights to coordinate their efforts, in particular to assist the transitional authorities of the Democratic Republic of the Congo in order to put an end to impunity, and encourages also the African Union to play a role in this regard;

12. States that it is profoundly preoccupied by the humanitarian situation throughout the country, in particular in the eastern regions, and demands that all parties guarantee the security of the civilian population, thereby enabling the Mission and humanitarian organizations to have total, unrestricted and immediate access to the population groups in need;

13. Strongly condemns the continued recruitment and use of children in the hostilities in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, especially in North and South Kivu and in Ituri, and reiterates the request addressed to all parties in Security Council resolution 1460(2003) of 30 January 2003 to provide the Special Representative of the Secretary-General with information on the measures they have taken to put an end to the recruitment and use of children in their armed components, as well as the requests concerning the protection of children set forth in resolution 1261(1999) of 25 August 1999 and subsequent resolutions;

14. Strongly condemns also the continuing armed conflict in the eastern part of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, especially the serious ceasefire violations that occurred recently in North and South Kivu, including in particular the offensives by the Rassemblement congolais pour la démocratie-Goma, demands that all parties, in compliance with the Acte d'Engagement for the cessation of hostilities in the eastern and north-eastern Democratic Republic of the Congo, signed in Bujumbura on 19 June 2003, establish without delay or precondition the full cessation of hostilities and withdraw to the positions agreed to in the Kampala plan and the Harare sub-plans for disengagement and redeployment, and that they refrain from any provocative action;

15. Demands that all parties desist from any interference with freedom of movement of United Nations personnel, recalls that all parties have the obligation to provide full and unhindered access to the Mission to allow it to carry out its mandate, and asks the Special Representative of the Secretary-General to report any failure to comply with this obligation:

16. Expresses concern at the fact that the continuing hostilities in the eastern part of the Democratic Republic of the Congo are seriously compromising Mission action in the process of the disarmament, demobilization, repatriation, reintegration or resettlement of the foreign armed groups referred to in chapter 9.1 of annex A to the Ceasefire Agreement signed at Lusaka on 10 July 1999, urges all parties concerned to cooperate with the Mission, and underscores the importance of making rapid and appreciable progress in that process;

17. Authorizes the Mission to assist the Government of National Unity and Transition in disarming and demobilizing those Congolese combatants who may voluntarily decide to enter the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration process within the framework of the Multi-Country Demobilization and Reintegration Programme, pending the establishment of a national disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programme in coordination with the United Nations Development Programme and other agencies concerned;

18. Demands that all States, in particular those in the region, including the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ensure that no direct or indirect assistance, especially military or financial assistance, is given to the movements and armed groups present in the Democratic Republic of the Congo;

19. Demands also that all parties provide full access to military observers from the Mission, including in ports, airports, airfields, military bases and border crossings, and requests the Secretary-General to deploy military observers from the Mission in North and South Kivu and in Ituri and to report to the Council regularly on the position of the movements and armed groups and on information concerning arms supply and the presence of foreign military, especially by monitoring the use of landing strips in that region;

20. Decides that all States, including the Democratic Republic of the Congo, shall, for an initial period of twelve months from the adoption of the present resolution, take the necessary measures to prevent the direct or indirect supply, sale or transfer, from their territories or by their nationals, or using their flag vessels or aircraft, of arms and any related materiel, and the provision of any assistance, advice or training related to military activities, to all foreign and Congolese armed groups and militias operating in the territory of North and South Kivu and of Ituri, and to groups not party to the Global and All-Inclusive Agreement, in the Democratic Republic of the Congo;

21. Decides also that the measures imposed by paragraph 20 above shall not apply to:

(a) Supplies to the Mission, the Interim Emergency Multinational Force deployed in Bunia and the integrated Congolese national army and police forces;

(b) Supplies of non-lethal military equipment intended solely for humanitarian or protective use, and related technical assistance and training as notified in advance to the Secretary-General through his Special Representative;

22. Decides further that, at the end of the initial twelve months, the Council will review the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, in particular in the eastern part of the country, with a view to renewing the measures stipulated in paragraph 20 above if no significant progress has been made in the peace process, in particular an end to support for armed groups, an effective ceasefire and progress in the disarmament, demobilization, repatriation, reintegration or resettlement by foreign and Congolese armed groups;

23. Expresses its determination closely to monitor compliance with the measures laid down in paragraph 20 above and to consider steps that are necessary to ensure the effective monitoring and implementation of those measures, including the possible establishment of a monitoring mechanism;

24. Urges the States neighbouring the Democratic Republic of the Congo, particularly Rwanda and Uganda, which have an influence over movements and armed groups operating in the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, to exercise a positive influence on them to settle their disputes by peaceful means and join in the process of national reconciliation;

25. Authorizes the Mission to take the necessary measures in the areas of deployment of its armed units, and as it deems it within its capabilities:

(a) To protect United Nations personnel, facilities, installations and equipment;

(b) To ensure the security and freedom of movement of its personnel, including in particular those engaged in missions of observation, verification or disarmament, demobilization, repatriation, reintegration or resettlement;

(c) To protect civilians and humanitarian workers under imminent threat of physical violence;

(d) To contribute to the improvement of the security conditions in which humanitarian assistance is provided;

26. Also authorizes the Mission to use all necessary means to fulfil its mandate in the Ituri district and, as it deems it within its capabilities, in North and South Kivu;

27. Requests the Secretary-General to deploy in the Ituri district, as soon as possible, the tactical brigade-size force whose concept of operations is set out in paragraphs 48 to 54 of his second special report, including the reinforced presence of the Mission in Bunia, by mid-August 2003 as requested in resolution 1484(2003), particularly with a view to helping to stabilize the security conditions, improving the humanitarian situation, ensuring the protection of airfields and displaced persons living in camps and, if the circumstances warrant it, helping to ensure the security of the civilian population and the personnel of the United Nations and the humanitarian organizations in Bunia and its environs and eventually, as the situation permits, in other parts of Ituri;

28. Condemns categorically the illegal exploitation of the natural resources and other sources of wealth of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and expresses its intention to consider means that could be used to end it, awaits with interest the report to be submitted shortly by the Panel of Experts on such illegal exploitation and on the link that exists between it and the continuation of hostilities, and demands that all parties and interested States offer full cooperation to the Panel;

29. Encourages the Governments of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Rwanda, Uganda and Burundi to take steps to normalize their relations and to cooperate in ensuring mutual security along their common borders, and invites these Governments to conclude good-neighbourly agreements among themselves;

30. Reaffirms that an international conference on peace, security, democracy and development in the Great Lakes region of Africa, with the participation of all the Governments of the region and all other parties concerned, should be organized at the appropriate time under the aegis of the United Nations and the African Union, with a view to strengthening stability in the region and working out conditions that will enable everyone to enjoy the right to live peacefully within national borders;

31. Reiterates its support unreservedly for the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and for all Mission personnel, and for the efforts they continue to make to assist the parties in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and in the region to advance the peace process;

32. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Communication. The Secretary-General, on 14 August [S/2003/821], informed the Security Council President that MONUC's deployment of a brigade-size force to Bunia would be completed by 15 August. The Bangladeshi troops would join the Uruguayan battalion already there, to ensure a smooth transition from IEMF on 1 September. Given the expectation that the situation in Bunia could become volatile during the transition period, the EU and France, as lead nation, had informed the Secretary-General that IEMF would be ready to provide emergency support to MONUC, if required. The Secretary-General recommended that the Council authorize IEMF to provide assistance to MONUC in and around Bunia.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (August)

On 26 August [meeting 4813], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1501 (2003). The draft [S/2003/832] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling its relevant resolutions and statements by its President on the Democratic Republic of the Congo, in particular resolutions 1484(2003) of 30 May 2003 and 1493(2003) of 28 July 2003,

Reaffirming its commitment to respect for the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and all the States of the region,

Deeply concerned by the continuation of hostilities in the eastern part of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, particularly in the district of Ituri as well as in the provinces of North and South Kivu,

Reaffirming its support to the peace process and national reconciliation, in particular through the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo,

Also reaffirming its support to the Interim Emergency Multinational Force deployed in Bunia in accordance with resolution 1484(2003), and stressing the need to ensure the best conditions for the transfer of authority from the Force to the Mission on 1 September 2003 to contribute in the most efficient way possible to the continuing stabilization of Ituri,

Having taken note of the letter dated 14 August 2003 from the Secretary-General addressed to the Security Council President and of the recommendation contained therein,

Noting that the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security in the region,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Approves the recommendation contained in the Secretary-General's letter of 14 August 2003;

2. Authorizes the States members of the Interim Emergency Multinational Force, within the limits of the means at the disposal of those elements of the Force which will not yet have left Bunia before 1 September 2003, to provide assistance to the contingent of the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of Congo deployed in the town and its immediate surroundings, if the Mission requests them to do so and if exceptional circumstances demand it, during the period of disengagement of the Force, which should last until 15 September 2003 at the latest;

3. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Press statement (3 September). On 3 September, the Council heard a presentation from the Secretariat on the completion of the IEMF mandate, deployed in Bunia in accordance with resolution 1484(2003) (see p. 126), and on the transfer of responsibility to MONUC on 1 September. In a press statement released that day [SC/7862-AFR/695], the President said that Council members welcomed the EU's deployment of that force, which helped to avoid a humanitarian tragedy and was instrumental in stabilizing the situation in Bunia. They expressed concern regarding the continuing hostilities in eastern DRC, in particular in Ituri and the Kivus. Warning all parties against supplying arms and not to engage in further violence, they noted that MONUC had a Chapter VII mandate, on the basis of which it continued to operate.

Principles on good-neighbourly relations

In accordance with Security Council resolution 1493(2003) (see p. 130), the Secretary-General, on 25 September, convened a high-level meeting of heads of State and senior representatives of Burundi, the DRC, Rwanda and Uganda, as well as Angola, Mozambique, South Africa and the United Republic of Tanzania. As he reported in a 7 October letter to the General Assembly and the Council [A/58/428-S/2003/983], he sought to build on the recent positive developments in and around the DRC, including the establishment of the transitional Government. The meeting concluded with the adoption of the Principles on Good-Neighbourly Relations and Cooperation between the DRC and Burundi, Rwanda and Uganda. In that document, the four States, recognizing that the establishment of the Government of National Unity and Transition in the DRC was an essential factor for the peace and security necessary to ensure the development of good-neighbourly relations, reaffirmed their commitment to: respect the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of one another; refrain from interfering in one another's internal affairs; refrain from disrupting the stability, national unity and territorial integrity of one another; prevent the supply of arms and support to armed groups operating in eastern DRC; pursue peaceful means to resolve their disputes; normalize their bilateral relations by re-establishing full diplomatic relations; and cooperate with one another in the political, security, economic, social and cultural fields, in accordance with the principles of sovereign equality and non-intervention and with the aim of promoting peace and development and assuring mutual security along their common borders. The countries decided to pursue bilateral discussions on how to implement those principles.

Communications (October/November). On 6 October [S/2003/950], the DRC referred to Security Council resolution 1304(2000) [YUN 2000, p. 131], in which the Council expressed the view that Uganda and Rwanda should make reparations for loss of life and property damage they had inflicted in Kisangani and requested the Secretary-General to submit an assessment of the damage as a basis for such reparations. Noting the Secretary-General's 2000 report on the inter-agency assessment mission (ibid., p. 134) he had sent to Kisangani in response to that request, the DRC asked the Council to follow up the report by authorizing the United Nations to establish the cost of the events in Kisangani in June 2000, in order to complete the process of bringing justice to the people of that town.

The DRC informed the Council on 7 October [S/2003/969] of a massacre in Katchele, 70 kilometres north-west of Bunia, in which 23 civilians were killed. The DRC requested the Council to speed up sending MONUC reinforcements to Ituri, to conduct an investigation of the events in Katchele, and to address the issue of impunity that prevailed in Ituri, with a view to compelling warlords who held sway there and their outside supporters to answer for their acts before judicial bodies. On 16 October [S/2003/1017], the DRC said there were indications that Rwanda might be attempting to renew the fighting and called on the Council and the Secretary-General to expand MONUC's deployment to cover the area between Lake Albert and Lake Tanganyika. It urged the Council to apply measures provided for under Chapter VII of the UN Charter against the leaders of Rwanda.

In a 13 October declaration [S/2003/1024], the EU Presidency condemned the renewed massacres in Katchele, which demonstrated the persistence of elements opposing the peace process in the DRC, despite the progress made in recent months. It noted the decision of the International Criminal Court to examine the investigations into the events in Ituri.

On 10 November [S/2003/1076], Rwanda alleged that the illegal supply of arms and ammunition to militia groups in eastern DRC was continuing. In that regard, it referred to the recent crash at Kamina of a cargo aircraft, which delivered arms to both Congolese and foreign armed groups in South Kivu, including ex-FAR/Interahamwe militia. Congolese authorities had prevented MONUC from investigating the matter. It was regrettable that the delivery of weapons occurred less than one month after the goodwill mission of the Minister for Foreign Affairs and Cooperation of Rwanda to Kinshasa. Rwanda also regretted that the DRC had prevented MONUC from carrying out inspection and verification at Kamina.

Press statement (12 November). Having heard a Secretariat briefing on the Ituri situation, particularly the fighting provoked by UPC and other militias on 5 November, which prompted a MONUC response, the Security Council, in a 12 November press statement by the President [SC/7915-AFR/753], condemned the attacks and expressed concern at the continuing hostilities in eastern DRC, particularly in Ituri and the Kivus. The members also condemned the events of October in Katchele. They urged all the parties to ensure respect for human rights and international humanitarian law, to refrain from giving support to armed groups and to cooperate with MONUC.

Report of Secretary-General (November). In his fourteenth report on MONUC, submitted on 17 November [S/2003/1098], the Secretary-General said that despite the advances made in forming the transitional Government in the DRC during the six-month reporting period, fighting and conflict continued in Ituri and eastern DRC, necessitating the full deployment and active engagement of MONUC. In Bunia, approximately 420 civilians had been killed in fighting between Lendu and Hema militias since the departure of Ugandan troops in May. Widespread rape and looting also occurred. In border areas between Uganda and Ituri, MONUC reported 380 cases of human rights abuses, including killings, forced disappearances, mutilations, rape and systematic looting and destruction of property. In view of the increasing threat levels, MONUC military observers were evacuated to Bunia, during which process two observers were killed.

As the situation deteriorated, the Security Council, on 30 May, had authorized, by resolution 1484(2003), the deployment of EU-led IEMF (see p. 126). That force, which began deploying to Bunia in June, restored a measure of security to the town. At its strongest, IEMF numbered just over 1,000 troops in Bunia and 500 support staff in Entebbe, Uganda. From mid-August, with the gradual deployment of the MONUC Ituri brigade (an authorized force of 4,800), the Mission started to take over operational tasks from IEMF, which fully withdrew from the area by 15 September. Agreement was reached among the parties to respect Bunia as a weapon-free zone as from 16 September, following which MONUC began to carry out cordon-and-search operations in Bunia to restore a sense of security in the town and dominate the armed factions. By November, the situation was calm but tense in Bunia, and MONUC began expanding its presence outside the city. With the exception of UPC, the armed groups in Ituri expressed willingness to be incorporated into the new national armed forces. MONUC was making concerted efforts to obtain information from the armed groups on the numbers and locations of their troops.

MONUC intensified its local conflict resolution efforts in the Kivus, Maniema and northern Katanga. Ceasefire agreements were reached between various military groups during October, resulting in the withdrawal of forces in certain local conflicts and increased humanitarian access in South Kivu. MONUC also assisted the transitional Government in implementing a national DDRRR programme, demobilizing child soldiers, normalizing relations with neighbouring States, and monitoring the arms embargo imposed on the Kivus and Ituri.

MONUC played a role in facilitating the political transition and preparing for elections. The transitional Government, established on 30 June, was composed of 36 Ministers and 25 Vice-Ministers from the eight components and entities of the Inter-Congolese Dialogue [YUN 2001, p. 131], who were chosen under the auspices of the Follow-up Commission. That Commission was established on 14 April to address outstanding issues for the installation of the transitional Government. However, two major political parties, the Union pour la démocratie et le progrès social and the Parti Lumumbiste unifié, were not represented in the transitional Government as they did not agree on the process of nominating representatives. On 1 August, the neutral Facilitator of the Inter-Congolese Dialogue, Sir Ketumile Masire, formally handed over to President Kabila the final report of the Dialogue and its 36 resolutions, which were to form the basis of the transitional Government's activities during the two-year period leading to elections. Having completed the tasks assigned to it in the All-Inclusive Agreement, the Follow-up Commission held its final meeting on 18 August and presented its final report to the Council of Ministers on 29 August. The Council of Ministers and four inter-ministerial commissions began to meet regularly and, on 8 August, adopted a comprehensive set of policy goals. On 22 August, the 500-member National Assembly and the 120-member Senate were inaugurated in Kinshasa. The process leading to the installation of the transitional Government was not easy and was supported throughout by the International Committee in Support of the Transition, chaired by the Secretary-General's Special Representative. The presence of all major transitional leaders in Kinshasa owed much to the deployment by MONUC of the "neutral force", which provided security and transportation to those members of the transitional Government who needed it.

A key challenge for the establishment of the transitional Government was how to reach agreement on integrating the armed forces of the belligerents. On 29 June, the Congolese parties signed Memorandum II on the army and security, which provided for the allocation of senior posts in the integrated High Command of the armed forces. That was followed by an agreement to allocate three military regions to the former Government; two each to MLC and RCD-Goma; and one each to RCD-N, RCD-Kisangani/ML and the Mayi-Mayi. After further discussions, President Kabila appointed the Chiefs of Staff of the armed forces and the commanders and deputy commanders of the 10 military regions. However, at that juncture, there was still lack of clarity on the modalities for the integration and restructuring of the armed forces, and effective collaboration at the level of the Chiefs of Staff was lacking.

The All-Inclusive Agreement called for elections to be held within two years of the establishment of the transitional Government. With that in mind, MONUC facilitated meetings of members of the international community in the DRC and established an Electoral Assistance Unit (EAU) to coordinate support. Although the Independent Electoral Commission had not been formally established by law, its members held meetings and EAU was helping the Commission to develop an organizational structure and electoral road map.

MONUC also provided assistance in other areas, such as restoring and strengthening the rule of law by creating institutions and processes; supporting the establishment of an integrated police unit and training a future Congolese national police; investigating human rights abuses, data gathering and analysis, and engaging in capacity-building for Congolese civil society and officials; protecting delivery of humanitarian assistance; protecting children who were victims of the conflict; providing mine clearance; promoting support for women political leaders; informing the public about HIV/AIDS; and enhancing public information capacities.

In general, the Secretary-General found that significant progress had been achieved in the DRC during the reporting period, although considerable work remained to be done on a number of key issues of the peace process. On the positive side, former belligerents were working together in the transitional Government, the process of uniting the formerly divided territory had begun, and peacemaking trends at the local level were encouraging. In addition, the DRC's relations with Rwanda and Uganda had improved. South Africa had played an important role in collaborating with MONUC in the framework of the Third Party Verification Mechanism to help the parties implement the provisions of the All-Inclusive Agreement.

Outstanding challenges included the continuing presence of foreign armed combatants in eastern DRC, which affected the security situation. The recent agreement between the DRC and Rwanda to establish a joint mechanism with MONUC to address DDDR of Rwandan combatants was a step in the right direction. There continued to be allegations of the presence in the DRC of Rwandan military personnel, which MONUC was investigating. The transitional Government needed to extend State administration throughout the eastern part of the country, integrate the armed forces at the provincial level and extend political and economic benefits to the population of the region, especially in North and South Kivu. The situation in Ituri had been a particular concern, and the EU's deployment of the well-equipped IEMF for a limited period of time helped to stave off an impending humanitarian crisis. Another key concern was the flow of arms into the country, and its link to the illegal exploitation of natural resources. The arms transfers had contributed to the ongoing violence, especially in the east, while the illegal exploitation of resources had robbed the Congolese people of their national wealth (see p. 140). Despite the signs of progress, the tangible benefits of peace had not yet filtered down to the war-weary Congolese population; socio-economic conditions remained dire throughout the country and gross human rights violations continued.

Press statement (11 December). The Security Council was briefed on the situation in the DRC by the Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations on 11 December. The Council President issued a press statement [S/7949-APR/794], in which Council members welcomed the improvement of bilateral relations between the DRC, Rwanda and Uganda and encouraged them to work on concrete confidence-building measures. Expressing appreciation for the involvement of the AU, and in particular of South Africa and other regional actors, in moving the peace process forward, they took note of the progress made by the transitional Government and urged it to accelerate the implementation of the All-Inclusive Agreement, in particular by the adoption of a national disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programme, and reform of the armed and police forces. The members urged all foreign armed groups to enter DDRRR activities. They stressed the need to adopt legislation establishing the Institutions in Support of Democracy, in particular for enabling the Independent Electoral Commission and the Haute Autorité des Médias to function. They urged all the parties to the conflict, including the DRC Government, to undertake all necessary measures to stop violations of human rights and international humanitarian law and to bring to justice those who had committed, ordered or contributed in any way to such crimes. The members urged the DRC Government and the National Parliament to conduct national consultations on the formation and composition of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) and to adopt a revised TRC law, which upheld human rights principles. They called on Member States and international organizations to assist the Government in re-establishing the rule of law throughout the country. They also urged Member States to support the implementation of the arms embargo imposed by Council resolution 1493(2003) (see p. 130) and efforts to end the illegal exploitation of natural resources and their financing (see p. 140). Council members reaffirmed their determination to address that issue and related problems posed by the illicit flow of weapons into the DRC, including by considering the possible establishment of a monitoring mechanism.

Communications (December). On 10 December [S/2003/1164], Rwanda welcomed the return from the DRC of the Commander of the Forces

combattantes Abacunguzi, with a total of 100 troops, on 14 November. The event was a step in the DDRRR process, which was a cornerstone of the stabilization of the DRC and the Great Lakes region. At the same time, Rwanda expressed concern about those "génocidaires" who chose to continue with armed conflict from DRC territory. Those hardliners were forcibly preventing the return to Rwanda of many ex-FAR/Interahamwe combatants who were ready to give up arms and follow their former Commander.

The DRC, on 15 December [S/2003/1778], referred to Rwanda's letter and said that the stabilization of the region as a whole would become total when Rwanda ceased to be the centre of tension. The DRC repeated its request that the Security Council set up an international criminal court to prosecute those responsible for serious international humanitarian law violations and human rights abuses committed in DRC territory on or after 28 August 1998. It also requested the Council to require Rwanda to participate in the process of an international conference on the Great Lakes and Central Africa.

Situation at year's end. Although the principal political institutions of the transition began to function in late 2003 and several steps were taken towards the implementation of key provisions of the Global and All-Inclusive Agreement [YUN 2002, p. 125], overall progress remained slow [S/2004/251]. Delays were encountered in setting the legislative agenda; extending State administration; integrating the military; disarmament, demobilization and reintegration; and preparation for elections. Furthermore, tensions within the transitional Government increased. In that connection, President Kabila, on 23 December, sought confirmation by the Supreme Court of his sole legal authority over the appointment of governors and control over military intelligence, a move criticized by some members of the transitional Government as undermining the principles of power sharing.

On 18 December, the transitional Government established an inter-ministerial committee to oversee the planning of a national disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programme, a commission to coordinate and implement the national programme and a Committee for the Management of Demobilization and Reintegration Funds. The World Bank was expected to provide funds for the programme, which was in the planning stages and would involve a role for MONUC.

President Kabila, on 24 November, requested the United Nations to assist in organizing the constitutional referendum and election preparations. Accordingly, MONUC convened an international technical committee on the electoral process, which met weekly under the Mission's chairmanship.

Concerning relations with neighbouring States, the DRC and Rwanda, despite having agreed to confidence-building measures, had not yet set up a joint bilateral commission. Meetings of the joint security commission of the DRC and Uganda were postponed several times.

There was some limited progress in solidifying the political process in Ituri. The meeting on 17 December of the Comité de concertation des groupes armés (CCGA) in Bunia agreed, in principle, to launch a pilot disarmament project. Since then, MONUC, CCGA and the Ituri interim administration continued to verify the Ituri armed groups' designated assembly areas to prepare for disarmament and reintegration. However, armed groups continued to jockey for power and hostile attacks continued.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

The General Assembly, on 15 September, decided, at the request of the DRC [A/57/860], to defer consideration of the item entitled "Armed aggression against the Democratic Republic of the Congo" and to include it in the draft agenda of its fifty-eighth session (decision 57/597).

In resolution 58/123 of 17 December, the Assembly took action on special assistance for the economic recovery and reconstruction of the DRC (see p. 944).

MONUC financing

In June, the General Assembly considered a number of reports of the Secretary-General concerning the MONUC budget.

A performance report on the MONUC budget, covering 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002 [A/57/682], stated that, of the total apportionment of $450 million, $388.8 million was spent, leaving an unexpended balance of $61.2 million (13.6 per cent). The difference was mostly attributable to slow deployment of military contingents and delays in recruiting civilian staff. The Secretary-General recommended that the Assembly: offset the amount of $41 million unassessed during the 2001/02 period against the unencumbered balance of $61.2 million for the period ended 30 June 2002; decide on the treatment of the remaining unencumbered balance of $20.2 million for 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002; and decide on other miscellaneous income and adjustments for the period ended 30 June 2002 amounting to $23 million.

The MONUC budget for 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004 [A/57/683 & Add.1] was revised following the Security Council's expansion of the Mission by resolution 1445(2002) [YUN 2002, p. 123]. The revised budget amounted to $636.5 million, inclusive of budgeted voluntary contributions in kind in the amount of $1.7 million, representing an additional $118 million. It provided for the deployment of 7,749 troops, 760 military observers, 100 civilian police, 849 international staff, 1,245 national staff and 341 United Nations Volunteers. The Secretary-General recommended that the Assembly appropriate $634.8 million to maintain the Mission from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004, and assess that amount at a monthly rate of $52.9 million, should the Council decide to continue MONUC's mandate.

In a February report [A/57/723], the Secretary-General provided an overview of the financing of UN peacekeeping operations in general, based on budget performance for 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002 and budgets for 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004. It stated that MONUC's budget implementation rate for 2001/02 stood at 86 per cent.

In a March progress report on the status of the airfield services contract for MONUC [A/57/756], the Secretary-General stated that final contract negotiations with the recommended vendor of airfield services to replace the existing contract were being undertaken to conclude a contract to commence the services from 1 April. It was planned to use a commercial contractor for services at five sites, with contingent resources being deployed to three others and possibly more airfields as requirements developed.

In its May review of the financial reports and proposed budget [A/57/772/Add.10], the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) recommended approval of the Secretary-General's proposals contained in the 2001/02 performance report. Since it was expected that the Council would soon expand MONUC's mandate and that a new budget would be forthcoming, ACABQ recommended that the Assembly appropriate $582 million gross ($572.3 million net), pending the submission of a new budget for 2003/04.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION (June)

On 18 June [meeting 90], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee [A/57/831], adopted resolution 57/335 without vote [agenda item 151].

Financing of the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo

The General Assembly,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the related reports of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Recalling Security Council resolutions 1258(1999) of 6 August 1999 and 1279(1999) of 30 November 1999 regarding, respectively, the deployment to the Congo region of military liaison personnel and the establishment of the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and the subsequent resolutions by which the Council extended the mandate of the Mission, the latest of which was resolution 1417(2002) of 14 June 2002,

Recalling also Security Council resolution 1445(2002) of 4 December 2002, by which the Council endorsed the new concept of operation and authorized the expansion of the Mission,

Recalling further its resolution 54/260 A of 7 April 2000, as well as subsequent resolutions on the financing of the Mission, the latest of which was resolution 56/252 C of 27 June 2002,

Reaffirming the general principles underlying the financing of United Nations peacekeeping operations, as stated in General Assembly resolutions 1874(S-IV) of 27 June 1963, 3101(XXVIII) of 11 December 1973 and 55/235 of 23 December 2000,

Noting with appreciation that voluntary contributions have been made to the Mission,

Mindful of the fact that it is essential to provide the Mission with the necessary financial resources to enable it to fulfil its responsibilities under the relevant resolutions of the Security Council,

1. Takes note of the status of contributions to the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo as at 31 March 2003, including the contributions outstanding in the amount of 211.9 million United States dollars, representing some 17 per cent of the total assessed contributions, notes with concern that only twenty-six Member States have paid their assessed contributions in full, and urges all other Member States, in particular those in arrears, to ensure payment of their outstanding assessed contributions;

2. Expresses its appreciation to those Member States which have paid their assessed contributions in full, and urges all other Member States to make every possible effort to ensure payment of their assessed contributions to the Mission in full;

3. Expresses concern at the financial situation with regard to peacekeeping activities, in particular as regards the reimbursements to troop contributors that bear additional burdens owing to overdue payments by Member States of their assessments;

4. Also expresses concern at the delay experienced by the Secretary-General in deploying and providing adequate resources to some recent peacekeeping missions, in particular those in Africa;

5. Emphasizes that all future and existing peacekeeping missions shall be given equal and non-discriminatory treatment in respect of financial and administrative arrangements;

6. Also emphasizes that all peacekeeping missions shall be provided with adequate resources for the effective and efficient discharge of their respective mandates;

7. Reiterates its request to the Secretary-General to make the fullest possible use of facilities and equipment at the United Nations Logistics Base at Brindisi, Italy, in order to minimize the costs of procurement for the Mission;

8. Takes note of the progress report of the Secretary-General on the status of the airfield services contract for the Mission, and looks forward to the further review of the subject by the Board of Auditors;

9. Reaffirms the relevant provisions of its resolutions 55/232 of 23 December 2000 and 55/247 of 12 April 2001;

10. Also reaffirms its resolution 49/233 A of 23 December 1994 and decision 49/478 A of 31 March 1995;

11. Notes the intention of the Secretary-General to submit a revised proposed budget for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004, reflecting the developments in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and further decisions of the Security Council, to the General Assembly at the main part of its fifty-eighth session;

12. Endorses the conclusions and recommendations contained in the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, and requests the Secretary-General to ensure their full implementation, with the understanding that the Secretary-General should have adequate resources to address the changing situation on the ground, subject to the provisions of the present resolution;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to take all necessary action to ensure that the Mission is administered with maximum efficiency and economy, particularly with regard to air transport;

14. Also requests the Secretary-General, in order to reduce the cost of employing General Service staff, to continue efforts to recruit local staff for the Mission against General Service posts, commensurate with the requirements of the Mission;

Financial performance report for the period from 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002

15. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the financial performance of the Mission for the period from July 2001 to 30 June 2002;

16. Decides to offset the amount of 41 million dollars, which had been appropriated but not apportioned during the financial period ended 30 June 2001 against the unencumbered balance of 61,173,000 dollars in respect of the financial period ended 30 June 2002;

Budget estimates for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004

17. Decides also to appropriate to the Special Account for the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo the amount of 608,228,150 dollars for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004, inclusive of 582 million dollars for the maintenance of the Mission, 20,083,850 dollars for the support account for peacekeeping operations and 6,144,300 dollars for the United Nations Logistics Base, pending the submission of the revised proposed budget to the General Assembly;

Financing of the appropriation

18. Decides further to apportion among Member States the amount of 608,228,150 dollars at a monthly rate of 50,685,679 dollars, in accordance with the levels set out in resolution 55/235, as adjusted by the General Assembly in its resolutions 55/236 of 23 December 2000, and 57/290 A of 20 December 2002, and taking into account the scale of assessments for 2003, as set out in its resolutions 55/5 B of 23 December 2000 and 57/4 B of 20 December 2002, and for 2004, subject to the decision of the Security Council to extend the mandate of the Mission, pending the submission of the revised proposed budget to the Assembly;

19. Decides that, in accordance with the provisions of its resolution 973(X) of 15 December 1955, there shall be set off against the apportionment among Member States, as provided for in paragraph 18 above, their respective share in the Tax Equalization Fund of 14,599,236 dollars at a monthly rate of 1,216,603 dollars, comprising the estimated staff assessment income of 9,710,736 dollars approved for the Mission, the prorated share of 4,525,200 dollars of the estimated staff assessment income approved for the support account, and the prorated share of 363,300 dollars of the estimated staff assessment income approved for the United Nations Logistics Base;

20. Decides also that for Member States that have fulfilled their financial obligations to the Mission, there shall be set off against their apportionment, as provided for in paragraph 18 above, their respective share of the remaining unencumbered balance and other income in the total amount of 43,158,000 dollars in respect of the financial period ended 30 June 2002, in accordance with the levels set out in resolution 55/235, as adjusted by the General Assembly in its resolutions 55/236, and 57/290 A and taking into account the scale of assessments for 2002, as set out in its resolutions 55/5 B and 57/4 B;

21. Decides further that for Member States that have not fulfilled their financial obligations to the Mission, their respective share of the remaining unencumbered balance and other income in the total amount of 43,158,000 dollars in respect of the financial period ended 30 June 2002 shall be set off against their outstanding obligations, in accordance with the scheme set out in paragraph 20 above;

22. Decides that the decrease of 448,600 dollars in the estimated staff assessment income in respect of the financial period ended 30 June 2002 shall be set off against the credits from the amount referred to in paragraphs 20 and 21 above;

23. Emphasizes that no peacekeeping mission shall be financed by borrowing funds from other active peacekeeping missions;

24. Encourages the Secretary-General to continue to take additional measures to ensure the safety and security of all personnel under the auspices of the United Nations participating in the Mission;

25. Invites voluntary contributions to the Mission in cash and in the form of services and supplies acceptable to the Secretary-General, to be administered, as appropriate, in accordance with the procedure and practices established by the General Assembly;

26. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-eighth session the item entitled "Financing of the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo".

Following the Security Council's adoption of resolution 1493(2003) of 28 July (see p. 130), by which MONUC's mandate was extended until 30 July 2004, the Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly a September report containing MONUC's revised budget for 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004 [A/58/381]. The total requirements of $677.3 million included budgeted voluntary contributions in kind of $2.27 million. The budget provided for the phased deployment of 10,040 troops, 760 military observers, 182 civilian police, 938 international staff, 1,299 national staff and 419 United Nations Volunteers.

ACABQ reviewed the report and issued its comments in October [A/58/447 & Corr.1]. It found that there had been a continuing and serious trend of overbudgeting for the Mission, that economies of scale should have been achieved as a result of the increase in troop strength, that duplication could be avoided through streamlining, that ratios for vehicles and computer equipment could not be justified and that travel costs could be reduced. Therefore, ACABQ recommended an appropriation of $59 million in addition to the $582 million gross ($572.3 million net) already appropriated by the Assembly in resolution 57/335 (above) for 2003/04, a reduction of $34 million, or 5 per cent. It also recommended that the total amount assessed should not exceed $582 million gross.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION (December)

On 23 December [meeting 79], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/58/583], adopted resolution 58/259 A without vote [agenda item 138].

Financing of the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Recalling Security Council resolutions 1258(1999) of 6 August 1999 and 1279(1999) of 30 November 1999, regarding, respectively, the deployment to the Congo region of military liaison personnel and the establishment of the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and the subsequent resolutions by which the Council extended the mandate of the Mission, the latest of which was resolution 1493(2003) of 28 July 2003, by which the Council also authorized increasing the military strength of the Mission,

Recalling also its resolution 54/260 A of 7 April 2000, on the financing of the Mission, and its subsequent resolutions thereon, the latest of which was resolution 57/335 of 18 June 2003,

Reaffirming the general principles underlying the financing of United Nations peacekeeping operations, as stated in General Assembly resolutions 1874(S-IV) of 27 June 1963, 3101(XXVIII) of 11 December 1973 and 55/235 of 23 December 2000,

Noting with appreciation that voluntary contributions have been made to the Mission,

Mindful of the fact that it is essential to provide the Mission with the necessary financial resources to enable it to fulfil its responsibilities under the relevant resolutions of the Security Council,

1. Takes note of the status of contributions to the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo as at 31 October 2003, including the contributions outstanding in the amount of 139.7 million United States dollars, representing some 9.1 per cent of the total assessed contributions, notes with concern that only thirty-two Member States have paid their assessed contributions in full, and urges all other Member States, in particular those in arrears, to ensure payment of their outstanding assessed contributions;

2. Expresses its appreciation to those Member States which have paid their assessed contributions in full, and urges all other Member States to make every possible effort to ensure payment of their assessed contributions to the Mission in full;

3. Expresses concern at the financial situation with regard to peacekeeping activities, in particular as regards the reimbursements to troop contributors that bear additional burdens owing to overdue payments by Member States of their assessments;

4. Also expresses concern at the delay experienced by the Secretary-General in deploying some recent peacekeeping missions, in particular those in Africa, and in providing them with adequate resources;

5. Emphasizes that all future and existing peacekeeping missions shall be given equal and non-discriminatory treatment in respect of financial and administrative arrangements;

6. Also emphasizes that all peacekeeping missions shall be provided with adequate resources for the effective and efficient discharge of their respective mandates;

7. Reiterates its request to the Secretary-General to make the fullest possible use of facilities and equipment at the United Nations Logistics Base at Brindisi, Italy, in order to minimize the costs of procurement for the Mission;

8. Endorses the conclusions and recommendations contained in the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, and requests the Secretary-General to ensure their full implementation;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to take all necessary action to ensure that the Mission is administered with a maximum of efficiency and economy, particularly with regard to air transport;

10. Also requests the Secretary-General, in order to reduce the cost of employing General Service staff, to continue efforts to recruit local staff for the Mission against General Service posts, commensurate with the requirements of the Mission;

Budget estimates for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004

11. Decides to appropriate to the Special Account for the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo the amount of 59,038,300 dollars for the maintenance of the Mission for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004, in addition to the amount of 582 million dollars already appropriated and apportioned for the same period under the terms of its resolution 57/335;

12. Emphasizes that no peacekeeping mission shall be financed by borrowing funds from other active peacekeeping missions;

13. Encourages the Secretary-General to continue to take additional measures to ensure the safety and security of all personnel under the auspices of the United Nations participating in the Mission;

14. Invites voluntary contributions to the Mission in cash and in the form of services and supplies acceptable to the Secretary-General, to be administered, as appropriate, in accordance with the procedure and practices established by the General Assembly;

15. Decides to keep under review during its fifty-eighth session the item entitled "Financing of the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo".

Exploitation of natural resources

In January, the Security Council considered the 15 October 2002 report of the Panel of Experts on the Illegal Exploitation of Natural Resources and Other Forms of Wealth of the Democratic Republic of the Congo (YUN 2002, p. 132). The Panel was established by the Secretary-General, in response to presidential statement S/PRST/2000/20 [YUN 2000, p. 128], to collect information on illegal exploitation and to analyse the links between such exploitation and the conflicts. The report had concluded that the plundering of DRC natural resources was fuelling the conflict. Criminal groups linked to the armies of Rwanda, Uganda and Zimbabwe and the DRC Government had benefited from small conflicts, and had built up a self-financing war economy centred on mineral exploitation. While troop withdrawals had taken place, the countries involved (Rwanda and Zimbabwe) and Ugandan individuals continued to exercise economic control over parts of the DRC.

Following a debate on the issue in late 2002 (YUN 2002, p. 134), the Council took action in January and extended and expanded the mandate of the Panel (below).

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (January)

On 24 January [meeting 4691], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1457 (2003). The draft [S/2003/83] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 1291(2000) of 24 February 2000, 1304(2000) of 16 June 2000, 1323(2000) of 13 October 2000, 1332(2000) of 14 December 2000, 1341(2001) of 22 February 2001, 1355(2001) of 15 June 2001, 1376(2001) of 9 November 2001, 1417(2002) of 14 June 2002 and 1445(2002) of 4 December 2002, and the statements by its President of 26 January (S/PRST/2000/2), 2 June (S/PRST/2000/20) and 7 September 2000 (S/PRST/2000/28) and 3 May (S/PRST/2001/13) and 19 December 2001 (S/PRST/2001/39),

Reaffirming the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and of all other States in the region,

Reaffirming also the sovereignty of the Democratic Republic of the Congo over its natural resources,

Recalling the letters dated 12 April and 10 November 2001 and 22 May 2002 from the Secretary-General,

Reiterating its commitment to take appropriate action to help to put an end to the plundering of the resources of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, in support of the peace process,

Determining that the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo continues to constitute a threat to international peace and stability in the Great Lakes region,

1. Takes note of the report of the Panel of Experts on the Illegal Exploitation of Natural Resources and Other Forms of Wealth of the Democratic Republic of the Congo (hereinafter "the Panel"), transmitted by the Secretary-General in his letter dated 15 October 2002;

2. Strongly condemns the illegal exploitation of the natural resources of the Democratic Republic of the Congo;

3. Notes with concern that the plundering of the natural resources and other forms of wealth of the Democratic Republic of the Congo continues and that it is one of the main elements fuelling the conflict in the region, and in this regard demands that all States concerned take immediate steps to end these illegal activities which are perpetuating the conflict, impeding the economic development of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and exacerbating the suffering of its people;

4. Reiterates that the natural resources of the Democratic Republic of the Congo should be exploited transparently, legally and on a fair commercial basis, to benefit the country and its people;

5. Stresses that the completion of the withdrawal of all foreign troops from the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo as well as the early establishment of an all-inclusive Transitional Government in the country, which will ensure that central government control is reinstated and that viable administrations are empowered to protect and regulate the exploitation activities, are important steps towards ending the plundering of the natural resources of the Democratic Republic of the Congo;

6. Stresses also that the possible convening of an international conference on peace, security, democracy and development in the Great Lakes region at the appropriate time could help the States of the region in promoting a sound regional economic integration, to the benefit of all the States in the region;

7. Notes the importance of the natural resources and extractive sectors for the future of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, encourages States, international financial institutions and other organizations to assist Governments in the region in their efforts to create appropriate national structures and institutions to control the exploitation of resources, and encourages the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo to work closely with the international financial institutions and the donor community to establish Congolese institutional capacity to ensure that these sectors are controlled and operated in a transparent and legitimate way, so that the riches of the Democratic Republic of the Congo can benefit the Congolese people;

8. Stresses the importance of following up the independent findings of the Panel regarding the link between the illegal exploitation of the natural resources of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the continuation of the conflict, stresses the importance of exerting the necessary pressure to put an end to such exploitation, notes that the reports of the Panel to date have made a useful contribution to the peace process in this regard, and therefore requests the Secretary-General to give a new mandate to the Panel for a period of six months, at the end of which the Panel should provide a report to the Security Council;

9. Stresses also that the new mandate of the Panel should include:

(a) Further review of relevant data and analysis of information previously gathered by the Panel, as well as any new information, including, specifically, material provided by individuals and entities named in the previous reports of the Panel, in order to verify, reinforce and, where necessary, update the findings of the Panel and/or to clear parties named in its previous reports, with a view to adjusting accordingly the lists attached to those reports;

(b) Information on actions taken by Governments in response to the previous recommendations of the Panel, including information on how capacity-building and reforms in the region are affecting exploitation activities;

(c) An assessment of the actions taken by all those named in the reports in respect of paragraphs 12 and 15 below;

(d) Recommendations on measures that a Transitional Government in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and other Governments in the region could take to develop and enhance their policies, legal framework and administrative capacity to ensure that the resources of the Democratic Republic of the Congo are exploited legally and on a fair commercial basis, to benefit the Congolese people;

10. Requests the Chairman of the Panel to brief the Council on any progress towards the cessation of the plundering of the natural resources of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, three months after the resumption of the work of the Panel;

11. Invites, in the interests of transparency, individuals, companies and States which have been named in the last report of the Panel to send their reactions, with due regard to commercial confidentiality, to the Secretary-General no later than 31 March 2003, and requests the Secretary-General to arrange for the publication of those reactions, upon request by individuals, companies and States named in the report of 8 October 2002, as an attachment to this report, no later than 15 April 2003;

12. Stresses the importance of dialogue between the Panel, individuals, companies and States, and requests in this regard that the Panel provide to the individuals, companies and States named, upon request, all information and documentation connecting them to the illegal exploitation of the natural resources of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and requests the Panel to establish a procedure to provide to Member States, upon request, information previously collected by the Panel to help them to take the necessary investigative action, subject to the duty of the Panel to preserve the safety of its sources, and in accordance with

United Nations established practice, in consultation with the Office of Legal Affairs of the Secretariat;

13. Emphasizes the duty of the individuals, companies and States named in the report to respect the confidentiality of the material to be given to them by the Panel so as to ensure that the safety of the sources of the Panel is preserved;

14. Requests the Panel to provide information to the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development Committee on International Investment and Multinational Enterprises and to the National Contact Points for the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development Guidelines for Multinational Enterprises in the States where business enterprises listed in annex III to the last report as being allegedly in contravention of the guidelines of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development are registered, in accordance with United Nations established practice;

15. Urges all States, especially those in the region, to conduct their own investigations, including, as appropriate, through judicial means, in order to clarify credibly the findings of the Panel, taking into account the fact that the Panel, which is not a judicial body, does not have the resources to carry out an investigation whereby those findings can be considered as established facts;

16. Notes with satisfaction, in this regard, the decision of the Attorney General of the Democratic Republic of the Congo to start a judicial procedure, commends the decision of the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo to suspend momentarily the officials named in the reports pending further clarification, and requests the Panel to cooperate fully with the Office of the Attorney General and to provide to that Office information it may need to conduct its investigations, subject to the duty of the Panel to preserve the safety of its sources and in accordance with United Nations established practice, in consultation with the Office of Legal Affairs;

17. Also notes with satisfaction the actions taken by other States, including the decision by the Government of Uganda to establish a Judicial Commission of Inquiry, urges all States concerned, and in particular the Governments of Zimbabwe and Rwanda, to cooperate fully with the Panel and to investigate further the accusations made through due judicial process, and stresses the importance of collaboration between the Panel and all investigative bodies;

18. Encourages all organizations concerned to consider, as appropriate, the relevant recommendations contained in the reports of the Panel, and in particular encourages the organizations of specialized industries to monitor trade in commodities from conflict areas, in particular the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and to collect data in this regard, with a view to helping to put an end to the plundering of the natural resources in those areas;

19. Encourages the implementation of the decisions taken within the framework of the Inter-Congolese Dialogue, especially its recommendation to establish a special commission to examine the validity of economic and financial agreements in the Democratic Republic of the Congo;

20. Expresses its full support to the Panel, and reiterates that all parties and relevant States must extend their full cooperation to the Panel, while ensuring necessary security for the experts;

21. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Appointments. Referring to resolution 1457 (2003) (above), the Secretary-General, on 26 February [S/2003/226], informed the Security Council of his intention to reappoint Mahmoud Kassem (Egypt) to continue to chair the Expert Panel, and to appoint four Panel members. A proposal on an additional Panel member would be forthcoming. The reconstituted Panel was expected to reassemble in early March in New York before proceeding to the Great Lakes region.

Responses to Panel's report. The Security Council, in order to give more time to those individuals, companies and States wishing to respond to the Expert Panel's 2002 report, decided on 24 March [S/2003/340] to extend the deadlines set out in resolution 1457(2003) to 31 May for submission, in order for the reactions to be published no later than 20 June. On 20 June [S/2002/1146/Add.1], the Secretary-General submitted to the Council responses received from 58 of the individuals, companies and States named in the Panel's report.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (August)

On 13 August [meeting 4807], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1499(2003). The draft [S/2003/803] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous relevant resolutions and statements by its President on the Democratic Republic of the Congo, in particular resolutions 1457(2003) of 24 January 2003 and 1493(2003) of 28 July 2003,

Welcoming recent progress in the political process and the establishment of the transitional Government in the Democratic Republic of the Congo,

Noting with great concern that the plundering of natural resources of the Democratic Republic of the Congo continues, especially in the eastern part of the country, as reported to the Council on 24 July 2003 in an interim briefing by the Chairman of the Panel of Experts on the Illegal Exploitation of Natural Resources and Other Forms of Wealth of the Democratic Republic of the Congo (hereinafter "the Panel"), and stressing that appropriate action should be taken with regard to those responsible for such activities,

Taking note of the efforts of the Panel to establish constructive dialogue with individuals, companies and States named in its report of 8 October 2002,

Welcoming the publication, as an attachment to the report of the Panel, of the reactions of those individuals, companies and States,

Recognizing that exchanging information and attempting to resolve issues will help the transparency of the work of the Panel as well as heighten awareness of the illegal exploitation of natural resources and other forms of wealth of the Democratic Republic of the Congo in the context of the conflict and, in particular, its connection with the illicit trade of small arms and light weapons,

Taking note of the intention of the Panel, in accordance with paragraph 9 of resolution 1457(2003), to remove from the annexes to its report the names of those parties with which it has or will have reached a resolution by the end of its mandate,

Renewing its support to the Panel in its efforts to secure, including through dialogue with parties named in its latest report, particularly with Governments concerned, a clearer picture of activities related to the illegal exploitation of natural resources in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and to update its findings during the remainder of its mandate period,

1. Requests the Secretary-General to extend the mandate of the Panel until 31 October 2003 to enable it to complete the remaining elements of its mandate, at the end of which the Panel will submit a final report to the Council;

2. Reiterates its demand that all States concerned take immediate steps to end the illegal exploitation of natural resources and other forms of wealth in the Democratic Republic of the Congo;

3. Requests the Panel to provide the necessary information to the Governments concerned, as required in paragraphs 12 and 13 of resolution 1457(2003), with due regard to safety of sources, in order to enable them, if necessary, to take appropriate action according to their national laws and international obligations;

4. Calls upon all States to respect the relevant Security Council resolutions in this regard;

5. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Report of Expert Panel. In response to resolution 1457(2003) (see p. 140), by which the Security Council requested the Secretary-General to give a new mandate to the Panel of Experts for a period of six months, the Secretary-General, on 23 October [S/2003/1027], submitted to the Council the Panel's final report under that mandate on the illegal exploitation of DRC natural resources and other forms of wealth.

The Panel noted that its October 2002 report [YUN 2002, p. 132] had drawn strong reactions from entities named therein. Of the 157 parties mentioned, responses were received from 119, with whom the Panel met. The Panel grouped the results of its work into five categories: resolved cases, where a solution to the issues that led to the entities being listed was found; provisional resolution, dependent on companies fulfilling commitments after the end of the Panel's mandate; companies, together with their owners, which had been referred to national contact points for updating or further investigation; companies and individuals that had been referred to Governments for further investigation; and parties that did not react to the Panel's report.

The report described the transmission of information for investigations by government authorities in the DRC, Rwanda and Zimbabwe, and noted that the Panel had provided the national contact points of Belgium, Germany and the United Kingdom with information and documentation on a number of individuals and companies under their jurisdiction that were named in the Panel's previous report. The Panel identified States in the region through which goods originating in the DRC might be passing, including Angola, Burundi, the Central African Republic, the Congo, Kenya, Mozambique, Rwanda, Uganda, the United Republic of Tanzania, Zambia and Zimbabwe; and requested them to describe measures they were taking to curb illegal exploitation of the DRC's natural resources. Only Rwanda, Uganda, Zambia and Zimbabwe responded.

During the year since the Panel's previous report, illegal resource exploitation continued to be one of the main sources of funding for groups involved in the conflict, especially in eastern and north-eastern DRC. Such exploitation was characterized by intense competition among the various political and military actors as they sought to maintain or expand their control over territory. The power vacuum caused by the withdrawal of Rwandan and Ugandan armed forces spurred the proliferation of militias, who vied for control over strategic zones where lucrative resources were located and which were formerly held by the foreign forces. The Panel believed that the deteriorating security situation in eastern DRC, which resulted from intensifying armed confrontations among the militias, had a direct impact on the level and nature of resource exploitation, compared to previous years. Overall, the transition of control from foreign forces to the armed groups had led to a temporary reduction in the volume of illegally exploited resources.

From a variety of sources, the Panel determined that much of the recent resource exploitation was concentrated in gold and diamonds, in particular from Ituri, other parts of Orientale province, North and South Kivu and Maniema. Also financed with moneys collected at customs border posts, political and military actors were able to fund their military activities, including the supply of arms. The Panel repeated its earlier assertion that it was difficult to stem or halt illegal exploitation without also tackling the issue of arms trafficking. Accordingly, the focus of the Panel's fieldwork and fact-finding had been on the patterns and trends in arms trafficking and the groups involved. The Panel gathered information on how those groups were adjusting to political developments, especially the establishment of the Government of National Unity. It was clear that they were developing strategies to build and extend their political and economic control in various parts of the DRC. The details on exploitation and arms trafficking had been made available to the Security Council and could be useful for an arms monitoring mechanism, should the Council decide to establish one.

In the absence of a strong, central and democratically elected Government that was in control of its territory, illegal resource exploitation would continue to serve as the fuel for conflicts in the region, to the detriment of the Congolese people. The establishment of the transitional Government was a step in the right direction, but major obstacles continued to be faced. Financial and technical support from the international community was needed to strengthen national capacity to assume control and regulate the exploitation of natural resources. The extension of government authority in problematic areas, accompanied by a reform of the rule-of-law sector and the re-establishment of a criminal justice capacity, was needed to ensure that the Government was in control of its natural resources for the benefit of the population. The most important factor in ensuring the reunification of the national territory would be the integration of the new armed forces. While the transitional partners had reached agreement on the command structure of those forces, actual integration had yet to take place.

Immediate institutional reforms were needed to ensure that the newly elected Government, once in place, could ensure the legal exploitation of natural resources, including: control of the national borders through effective customs administration; strengthening the government auditing function so that it could undertake regular auditing of all government departments and agencies, including in the provinces; and breaking up the large State-owned mineral resource enterprises. Disclosure of revenues earned from natural resources by both private companies and the Government should be implemented in the DRC as a step towards ensuring a more equitable distribution of the national wealth.

Immediate interim measures recommended by the Panel included placing emphasis on stemming and, if possible, halting the flow of illegal arms to the DRC, an area where the international community could play a role, as the Security Council had done by imposing the arms embargo on Ituri and the Kivus in resolution 1493(2003) (see p. 130). In that connection, the Panel suggested that the Council establish a monitoring mechanism, as envisaged in that resolution, to track the full scope of the arms flow supply chain from manufacturer to final beneficiary, including the financing of the process through the illegal exploitation of resources, thus deterring arms trafficking and curbing arms flows. It was also vital to break the dependency link between armed groups carrying out natural resource exploitation and local communities if those activities were to be brought to an end. In that regard, specific quick-impact projects needed to be undertaken to convince people of the advantages of peace: hospitals, clinics and schools needed to be reopened, local policing re-established and jobs created. However, none of those measures could be sustained unless a regional solution was found. The Principles on Good-Neighbourly Relations adopted by the parties on 25 September were a step in that direction. Confidence-building measures were needed to take forward those principles, particularly with regard to tackling the issue of foreign-armed groups in the DRC from Burundi, Rwanda and Uganda, including the ex-FAR/Interahamwe. Also to be addressed was the status of the Banyamulenge and other ethnic groups, such as the Banyarwandans in North and South Kivu.

The Panel observed that its work had spurred Governments, non-governmental organizations (NGOs) and others to pursue their own investigations into the plundering of resources. The Governments of the DRC, Uganda and Belgium had taken such action. In general, the Panel had made valuable contributions to the Security Council's work on peace and security issues. There was, nevertheless, a need to analyse, institutionalize and make available the experiences and lessons learned from investigations mandated by the Council on Afghanistan, Angola, the DRC, Liberia, Sierra Leone and Somalia. The Panel concluded that, to be effective, monitoring activities concerning arms and revenue flows in conflict situations should be institutionalized and cover longer periods. That would require high levels of expertise, flexibility in conducting fieldwork and adequate support of relevant UN bodies and the Secretariat.

Communications (October/November). In late 2003, the Security Council received letters from three Governments reacting to the Expert Panel's October report (see above). Rwanda, on 30 October [S/2003/1048], raised objections to the methodology used by the Panel and said it had been unfairly targeted for condemnation. On 14 November [S/2003/1095], South Africa expressed willingness to investigate allegations against South African-owned or -based entities and individuals, based on credible information. Uganda, on 20 November [S/2003/1116], requested that the report be corrected with regard to the names of two officers of the Uganda People's Defence Forces listed as not responding to the Panel.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (November)

On 19 November [meeting 4863], following consultations among Security Council members, the President made statement S/PRST/2003/21 on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council,

Takes note of the final report of the Panel of Experts on the Illegal Exploitation of Natural Resources and Other Forms of Wealth in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (the Panel), which concludes its work, and emphasizes the connection, in the context of the continuing conflict, between the illegal exploitation of natural resources and trafficking in raw materials and arms, which the Panel has highlighted;

Condemns the continuing illegal exploitation of natural resources in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, especially in the eastern part of the country, recalls that it has always categorically condemned these activities, which are one of the main elements perpetuating the conflict, and reaffirms the importance of stopping them by exerting, if need be, the necessary pressure on the armed groups, traffickers and all other actors involved;

Urges all States concerned, especially those in the region, to take the appropriate steps to end these illegal activities, by proceeding with their own investigations, on the basis, in particular, of information and documentation accumulated by the Panel during its work and forwarded to Governments, including through judicial means where possible, and, if necessary, to report to the Council;

Reaffirms its determination to closely monitor compliance with the arms embargo imposed in resolution 1493(2003) of 28 July 2003 and expresses its intention to address the problem posed by the illicit flow of weapons into the Democratic Republic of the Congo, including by considering the possible establishment of a monitoring mechanism;

Emphasizes that the prompt re-establishment, by the Government of National Unity and Transition, of State authority throughout the territory, and the establishment of competent administrations to protect and control exploitation activities will constitute decisive elements for ending the plundering of natural resources in the Democratic Republic of the Congo;

Encourages the Government of National Unity and Transition to implement the resolutions adopted in Sun City, South Africa, in April 2002 within the framework of the Inter-Congolese Dialogue;

Encourages States, trade-sector organizations and specialized bodies to monitor the trade in raw materials from the region in order to put an end to the plundering of natural resources in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, particularly within the framework of the Kimberley Process;

Encourages States, the international financial community and the international organizations concerned to provide the aid needed to the Government of National Unity and Transition and to cooperate closely with it in order to support the establishment of national institutions capable of ensuring that the natural resources are exploited transparently to effectively benefit the Congolese people;

Expresses the wish that convening at an appropriate time an international conference on peace, security, democracy and development in the Great Lakes region of Africa will encourage the promotion of regional co-operation to the benefit of all States concerned;

Expresses its intention to continue following closely this situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

Burundi

A number of positive developments took place in Burundi in 2003 as efforts to implement the 2000 Arusha Agreement on Peace and Reconciliation [YUN 2000, p. 146] bore fruit. That Agreement, signed by most political parties but not by some of the main combatant rebel forces, provided a framework for political reform, including the establishment of a three-year transitional Government and the eventual integration of a Burundi national defence force composed of 50 per cent Hutu and 50 per cent Tutsi forces. In late 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 138], ceasefire agreements were signed by the transitional Government of Burundi, established in November 2001 [YUN 2001, p. 148], and three of the four main armed groups. The most significant advances in 2003 were the peaceful transfer of power from the President to the Vice-President on 1 May at the end of the first phase of the three-year transitional period of government; the deployment of the AU African Mission in Burundi and the establishment of the Joint Ceasefire Commission to oversee implementation of the ceasefire agreements; the signing in October and November of the Pretoria Protocols on political, defence and security power-sharing by the transitional Government and the Conseil national pour la défense de la démocratie-Forces pour la défense de la démocratie (CNDD-FDD); and the signing on 16 November of a comprehensive ceasefire implementation document.

The United Nations continued to play a role in the peace process, mainly through the United Nations Office in Burundi (UNOB). Given UNOB's responsibilities, the Secretary-General increased its staff by five specialized staff and the necessary support staff [S/2003/920]. On 29 September [S/2003/921], the Security Council took note of those decisions.

Although the trend in Burundi during 2003 mostly indicated a movement towards a peaceful resolution of the 10-year-old conflict, there was an upsurge of hostilities in April when CNDD-FDD forces attacked Bujumbura and other cities. However, the conflict subsided after the signing of the Pretoria Protocols and, by the end of the year, 95 per cent of the country enjoyed peace. Meanwhile, most main political parties had become part of the peace process and members of the transitional Government, but the Forces nationales de libération remained unwilling to seek a peaceful resolution to the conflict.

The Deputy President of South Africa, Jacob Zuma, continued to act as Facilitator of the Burundi peace process.

Political and military developments

The Secretary-General, on 8 January [S/2003/29], informed the Security Council that the Secretariat was ready in principle to provide the necessary expertise and advice for the planned AU African mission to Burundi provided for in the December 2002 Ceasefire Agreement signed by the transitional Government of Burundi and the CNDD-FDD faction [YUN 2002, p. 139]. The Secretariat had already developed the proposed terms of reference for the chairman of the Joint Ceasefire Commission and was approaching Member States to ascertain their interest in nominating candidates to fill that position. A planning exercise had begun to assist in developing a plan of operations for the proposed African mission.

Meanwhile, the Secretariat awaited additional information from the parties, the Facilitator of the Burundi peace process and/or the Regional Initiative in order to proceed with providing assistance. The information needed included: the relationship of the Joint Ceasefire Commission to the African mission; definition of the objectives and mandate of the African mission; identification of a lead nation for the proposed mission; identification of focal points within all Burundian parties involved to provide information on the number and location of troops, weapons, supply requirements, number of dependants, logistical and communication equipment and transportation needs; identification of special needs in logistical support among potential troop-contributing countries; and agreement on key modalities of cantonment of the armed Burundian elements (location, size, transportation of combatants, availability of locally produced food, availability of water and accessibility). The Secretariat was also awaiting a formal request from the parties regarding the provision of a senior military officer to chair the Joint Ceasefire Commission. The Secretary-General's Special Representative for Burundi, Berhanu Dinka, would take up those and other issues with his regional interlocutors.

The AU Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution (Addis Ababa, 14 January), in a decision on Burundi [S/2003/53], expressed satisfaction at the signing of the October 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 138] and the December 2002 [ibid., p. 139] ceasefire agreements, the former between the transitional Government and Jean-Bosco Ndayikengurukiye's faction of CNDD-FDD and Alain Mugabarabona's faction of the Parti pour la libération du peuple hutu-Forces nationales de libération (PALIPEHUTU-FNL), and the latter between the transitional Government and Pierre Nkurunziza's faction of CNDD-FDD. Urging the parties to respect the agreements, the Central Organ expressed concern at recent incidents between the armed forces of Burundi and combatants of CNDD-FDD (Nkurunziza). In particular, it condemned the 12 January ambush of a convoy of vehicles in which several people were killed and many wounded. The Central Organ urged Agathon Rwasa's faction of PALIPEHUTU-FNL to join in the peace process and to end its attacks. It underscored the urgent need to deploy the African mission to supervise the ceasefire and welcomed the initiative of the Interim Chairperson to convene on 15 and 16 January a meeting of experts from the Regional Initiative, the Mediation, the AU Commission and the United Nations to discuss the proposed African mission. The Interim Chairperson was authorized to deploy observers to facilitate communication between the parties, and the United Nations was requested to contribute to the implementation of the ceasefire.

The Central Organ, meeting on 3 February in Addis Ababa at the level of heads of State and Government [S/2003/142], approved the deployment of the African mission and expressed appreciation to South Africa, Ethiopia and Mozambique, which had indicated their willingness to contribute troops. The Central Organ requested South Africa, the Chair of the AU, to lead efforts to deploy the mission in Burundi speedily. It appealed to the international community to provide financial and logistical support for the mission, and to support the deployment of the AU observers to maintain and consolidate the truce between the parties pending the mission's deployment.

Further ceasefire negotiations

President Pierre Buyoya of Burundi and the signatories of the ceasefire agreements of October and December 2002 met in Pretoria and signed joint declarations on 25 and 27 January 2003, respectively, reiterating their commitment to the implementation of the agreements. The transitional Government and CNDD-FDD (Nkurunziza) met again in Pretoria from 9 to 15 February, with a view to reaching agreement on the remaining political and military/security issues, but were unable to make any progress at that time.

The January agreements were welcomed by members of the Security Council in a press statement issued by the Council President on 30 January [SC/7653-AFR/552]. The members also welcomed the decision of Mr. Ndayikengurukiye (PALIPEHUTU-FNL) and Mr. Mugabarabona (CNDD-FDD) to return to Burundi on 10 February and to start cantonment of their troops in mid-February. They reiterated support for the Regional Initiative, South African facilitation and the AU, and commended the AU Central Organ for endorsing the deployment of observers, to be followed immediately by the African mission. The parties to the agreements were urged to refrain from military actions, stop recruitment of fighters and continue negotiations. Council members demanded that PALIPEHUTU-FNL (Agathon Rwaswa) immediately cease hostilities and join the peace process, with a view to negotiating a ceasefire agreement. The parties were urged to work towards reform of the security sector and provide the information necessary for a demobilization, disarmament and reintegration plan. All Burundian parties using child soldiers were called on to halt those activities.

In February, the Secretary-General, in response to Security Council statement S/PRST/2002/40 of 18 December 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 140], appointed Colonel El Hadji Alioune Samba (Senegal) as Chairman of the Joint Ceasefire Commission. The Commission operated as a subsidiary organ of the Implementation Monitoring Committee. The Secretary-General informed the Council of the appointment on 29 May [S/2003/920].

Transfer of power

The first 18-month phase of the three-year transition period of the Government of Burundi, as agreed in 2001 [YUN 2001, p. 146], ended on 30 April. After consultations with all Burundian political actors and with the countries of the Regional Peace Initiative on Burundi, the Facilitation and other leaders, President Buyoya announced on 29 March [S/2003/397] that he would step down as planned and hand over power to his Vice-President, Domitien Ndayizeye. On the same day, the Union for National Progress Party (UPRONA) and the Front for Democracy in Burundi concluded an agreement in Pretoria setting out some of the key tasks to be accomplished during the second phase of the transition and the framework for cooperation between them. The Security Council President, in a 3 April press statement [SC/7716-AFR/596], said that Council members welcomed Mr. Buyoya's announcement to yield the presidency on 1 May for the second phase of the transition; they called on the political parties and the Burundian people to continue to settle the issues linked to the restoration of peace through dialogue and consultation.

Both the announcement and the agreement were well received by the general public. The Burundi army expressed support and declared that it had no intention of interfering with the transfer of power and was under the total control of the President, regardless of political affiliations. The majority of political parties expressed support, but the reactions of CNDD-FDD (Nkurunziza), PALIPEHUTU-FNL (Rwaswa) and Charles Mukasi, leader of a faction of UPRONA that opposed the Arusha Agreement, were negative. For CNDD-FDD (Nkurunziza), the transfer of power did not have any particular significance before the conclusion of a sustainable ceasefire agreement with it, followed by fair and free elections.

Burundi informed the Security Council of the specific political and security commitments made by the President and Vice-President regarding the conduct of the second phase of the transition period, signed in Pretoria on 28 March [S/2003/394]. Political commitments included: steps towards the passage of the draft law on punishing crimes of genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity; guaranteeing a balance between the two political-ethnic families—G-7 (Hutu) and G-10 (Tutsi)—particularly at the Executive level; organizing a debate on the electoral system; ensuring the adoption of measures to deal with past acts of genocide, exclusion and impunity; the combating and punishment of terrorism, intimidation or propaganda aimed at dividing citizens along ethnic or political lines; and the establishment of the International Judicial Commission of Inquiry and the International Criminal Tribunal to prosecute and punish crimes of genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity committed in Burundi between 1 July 1962 and 28 August 2000. In the security area, they pledged to finalize details of the ceasefire, the cantonment process, the integration of rebels in the defence and security forces, the disarmament and demobilization processes, and the reintegration of the demobilized elements; take all steps to obtain a comprehensive and lasting ceasefire, including calling for the political disqualification of PALIPEHUTU-FNL should it persist in following the path of violence; give political and financial support to the national army for security; and maintain a balance between Hutus and Tutsis in the defence and security forces.

In a 16 April press statement [SC/7734-AFR/605], the Council President said that Council members again paid tribute to the upcoming political change in Burundi and encouraged all parties to pursue their efforts in favour of the implementation of the Arusha Agreement in the context of the second period of the transition. They underlined the importance of President Buyoya's commitment to the 1 May handover and recommended that the political leaders of Burundi continue to seek consensus and shared management of public affairs.

Establishment of African mission

The ceasefire agreements of October and December 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 138] called for the deployment of an international peace force and the establishment of the Joint Ceasefire Commission to assist the parties in implementing the agreements. The AU, in February 2003, decided to deploy the African Mission in Burundi (AMIB), and the transitional Government and the AU signed a status-of-forces agreement on 26 March, outlining their commitments and obligations. AU military observers began arriving in Bujumbura in February and were deployed to other towns in March.

On 2 April in Addis Ababa [S/2003/399], the Central Organ of the AU Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution mandated the deployment of troops for AMIB from Ethiopia, Mozambique and South Africa for a total strength of some 3,500 for an initial period of one year. AMIB would oversee the implementation of the ceasefire agreements; maintain liaison between the parties; facilitate the activities of the Joint Ceasefire Commission and the technical committees for establishing and restructuring the national defence and police forces; secure assembly and disengagement areas; facilitate safe passage for the parties during planned movements to designated assembly areas; provide assistance to the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration process; facilitate the delivery of humanitarian assistance; coordinate mission activities with the UN presence in Burundi; and provide protection for designated returning leaders.

Burundi, on 7 April [S/2003/409], drew the Security Council's attention to the Central Organ's communiqué [S/2003/399], in which it implied that AMIB would eventually be replaced by a UN peacekeeping operation. Burundi stated that a special trust fund should be created to provide financial and logistical support for AMIB.

The twentieth Summit of the Great Lakes Regional Peace Initiative on Burundi (16 November, Dar es Salaam, United Republic of Tanzania) [S/2003/1112] requested the Deputy President of South Africa, Jacob Zuma, as Facilitator of the Burundi peace process, to request the Security Council to deploy a peacekeeping operation to Burundi (see p. 151). The Summit also appealed for urgent direct assistance from the United Nations for the Burundi peace process. Accordingly, Mr. Zuma briefed the Council on 4 December (see p. 153).

By December [S/2003/1146], 2,645 AMIB troops were deployed in Burundi, including 866 from Ethiopia, 228 from Mozambique, 1,508 from South Africa and 43 military observers from Benin, Burkina Faso, Gabon, Mali and Tunisia. Ethiopia was prepared to increase the size of its contingent to 1,300. In June, AMIB established the first cantonment site at Moyange and, by December, some 190 ex-combatants of PALIPEHUTU-FNL (Mugabarabona) and CNDD-FDD (Ndayiken-gurukiye), including 27 child soldiers, were at the site.

Press statement (16 April). In a 16 April press statement [SC/7734-AFR/605], the President of the Security Council said that Council members paid tribute to the AU for the deployment of observers and encouraged the deployment of AMIB forces without delay. In that connection, they called on the international community to mobilize the necessary funds to allow AMIB's deployment. Members supported the political transition (see p. 147) and welcomed the adoption by the Transitional National Assembly of the law on the punishment of crimes of genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (May)

On 2 May [meeting 4749], following consultations among Security Council members, the President made statement S/PRST/2003/4 on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council congratulates the Burundian parties on a peaceful transition of power in accordance with the Arusha Peace and Reconciliation Agreement for Burundi of 28 August 2000. The transition in presidency represents a major milestone in the implementation of the Agreement.

The Council believes that it is now crucial to follow up this positive development with the implementation of those provisions agreed upon in Arusha, United Republic of Tanzania, that are still outstanding, such as meaningful security-sector and judicial reforms. Resolving such pressing issues, as well as others that are related, is the only way to ensure that the thirty-six-month transitional period is a success.

The Council condemns the attacks carried out on 17 and 25 April 2003 on Bujumbura and other cities by the forces of the Conseil national pour la défense de la démocratie-Front national pour la défense de la démocratie of Mr. Pierre Nkurunziza. The Council takes note of the statement made on 27 April 2003 by the Conseil national pour la défense de la démocratie-Front national pour la défense de la démocratie that it would refrain from attacking unless attacked, and urges all Burundian parties, in particular the Conseil national pour la défense de la démocratie-Front national pour la défense de la démocratie, to observe the terms of the ceasefire agreements and implement them without delay.

The Council reiterates its demands that the Force nationale de libération of Mr. Agathon Rwasa lay down its arms and immediately enter into a ceasefire with the Government of Burundi, without preconditions. The unwillingness of the Force nationale de libération to date to seek a peaceful resolution of this conflict makes it difficult for the international community to accept the legitimacy of its concerns.

The Council urges all relevant regional parties and actors to continue their efforts to bring about a lasting peace in Burundi and stands ready to consider steps against those who are found to continue to support armed attacks by the Burundian rebels.

The Council also expresses support for the speedy deployment of the African mission in Burundi to facilitate the continuing implementation of the ceasefire agreements. The Council appeals for adequate and sustained international assistance to the mission, while underscoring the importance of providing the donor community with as many details as possible to enable it to make determinations regarding the best way to assist the mission.

The Council urges donors to support the economy of Burundi, to honour the engagements undertaken at the Paris and Geneva Conferences and, within their abilities, to provide as a matter of the utmost urgency budgetary and balance-of-payments support to the Government of Burundi and to contribute generously to the transitional debt relief fund, with continued strong performance on economic reforms by the Government of Burundi.

The Council urges the Burundian parties to take serious, meaningful steps to address human rights and accountability issues. In this regard, the Council welcomes the approval by the Burundian Senate on 23 April 2003 of legislation on genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity and legislation establishing a truth and reconciliation commission. The Council looks forward to their effective implementation.

The Council reaffirms the vital importance of the Burundian parties themselves taking ownership of the process to address the devastating impact of impunity, as detailed in the Arusha accords. The international community pledges its willingness and readiness to assist in efforts to build up the Burundian capacity for promoting respect for human rights standards and the rule of law.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to continue to support the peace process in Burundi, including the immediate and full implementation of the Ceasefire Agreement signed by the Burundian parties on 2 December 2002.

Press statement (27 May). In a 27 May press statement [SC/7769-AFR/624], Council members welcomed the positive developments in Burundi and encouraged the political actors and armed groups to opt for dialogue and to eschew violence. They supported the proposed regional summit (see p. 151) and urged all Burundian parties to cooperate within the region and with the Facilitation on outstanding issues. Members urged Mr. Rwasa's FNL to cease hostilities, to join the peace process and to start negotiations with the transitional Government. The deployment of AMIB was welcomed, and donor countries were urged to contribute to it. Members commended the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank for their decision to release the second tranche of their respective post-conflict programmes for Burundi.

Communication (August), Mozambique, on 13 August [S/2003/814], provided the Security Council with an update on the deployment status of AMIB. The size of the mission was about 3,500 troops, contributed by South Africa (the lead nation), Ethiopia and Mozambique, at an estimated cost of $190 million for the one-year operation. One third of the force had been deployed. The process of cantonment of combatants of CNDD-FDD (Ndayikengurukiye) and PALIPEHUTU-FNL (Mugabarabona) had begun, but the mission faced serious financial and logistical constraints which needed to be addressed.

Security Council mission

The Security Council sent a mission to the Great Lakes region from 7 to 16 June [S/2003/653] (see also p. 127). The mission's objective in Burundi was to demonstrate the Council's support for the second phase of the political transition at a time when the peace process was facing challenges, in particular the need for a cessation of hostilities through a political process and the framework of the 2000 Arusha Agreement [YUN 2000, p. 146], support for AMIB, the mobilization of economic and financial assistance to the country, and the fight against impunity.

All of the mission's interlocutors stressed that the continuation of fighting was the most serious obstacle to the full implementation of the Arusha peace process; they urged the mission to exert pressure on FNL (which had not signed a ceasefire agreement) and FDD (which had signed a ceasefire agreement) to cease hostilities. The mission expressed concern at the very slow pace of ceasefire negotiations between the Government and FDD and FNL, and called on the rebel groups to cease hostilities immediately and join the Arusha process. At the same time, the army would have to exercise restraint and the mission encouraged the Government to make room for the rebel groups in the institutions created by the Arusha Agreement. Both parties assured the mission that they would do their utmost to resolve outstanding issues. The mission encouraged the transitional Government to put in place measures to enable some FDD combatants in the DRC to be repatriated voluntarily to Burundi as a confidence-building measure.

In meetings with AMIB, the mission was told that the preparation of cantonment sites was hampered by the parties' failure to provide their forces' location and troop strength to the Joint Ceasefire Commission. The mission reiterated the Council's support for AMIB on three levels—political, financial and technical.

The mission discussed with the transitional Government and the armed movements the issue of combating impunity and accountability for human rights violations, stressing that those responsible for violations of international humanitarian law would be prosecuted. The Government stressed the importance of establishing an international judiciary commission of inquiry, as provided for in the Arusha Agreement, to help Burundi put an end to impunity and facilitate genuine national reconciliation.

The mission, noting that the Burundi peace process was at a critical juncture, recommended that the Council call on the international financial community to assist AMIB with adequate financial and logistical assistance and on the Secretary-General to provide appropriate expertise. It also saw a need to provide budgetary and economic support to the transitional Government and welcomed the planned September donors' round table, to be organized by UNDP.

Security situation

The security situation, which began to deteriorate in March, culminated in intensive shelling of Bujumbura in April and July by CNDD-FDD (Nkurunziza) and PALIPEHUTU-FNL (Rwasa), respectively [S/2003/1146]. CNDD-FDD (Nkurunziza) also abducted four members of Parliament on 29 June and attacked the cantonment site of Muyange the next day. The attack was repelled by AMIB forces.

The Security Council condemned the April attacks in S/PRST/2003/4 (see p. 148). In a press statement of 10 July [SC/7813-AFR/659], the President of the Council said that members expressed their deep concern over the latest resumption of hostilities and the deterioration of the humanitarian situation. They condemned the attack launched on Bujumbura since 7 July by PALIPEHUTU-FNL (Rwasa) and called on FNL to end its offensive and to enter into negotiations with the transitional Government without further delay. Members also condemned the abduction of persons and the attack on the Muyange cantonment site by CNDD-FDD (Nkurunziza) and called on that group to stop resorting to violence. They called on all parties to engage in good faith in the search for a peaceful solution through dialogue and to abide by the agreements they had signed. Members urged States in the region to exert their influence on the Burundian rebel groups so that they would cease resorting to violence and join the Arusha Agreement peace process. The proposal to convene a summit of the Regional Initiative to help in the resolution of outstanding issues was welcomed.

The AU, in a communiqué issued by the Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution (Addis Ababa, 24 July) [S/2003/760], welcomed the results achieved by AMIB, particularly the cantonment of the combatants of CNDD-FDD (Ndayikengurukiye) and PALIPEHUTU-FNL (Mugabarabona). The Central Organ also welcomed the results of the regional consultative summit on Burundi (Dar es Salaam, 20 July), particularly the commitment by the transitional Government and CNDD-FDD (Nkurunziza) to work towards implementation of the December 2002 ceasefire agreement. The Central Organ urged PALIPEHUTU-FNL (Rwasa) to join the peace process, with a view to concluding a ceasefire agreement and to put an immediate end to its attacks. It expressed concern over the inadequacy of financial and logistical resources that was hampering the completion of AMIB's deployment and appealed to the international community for assistance.

Relative calm returned to Burundi after the July attacks and the release of the abducted Parliament members. Security Council members, in a 14 August press statement [SC/7844-AFR/688], welcomed those developments and again condemned the violence, in particular the atrocities committed against the civilian population and the use of children in warfare. They welcomed the commitments made by the parties concerned during the 20 July summit of the Regional Initiative and encouraged the Burundian parties, in particular FDD (Nkurunziza) and the Governments concerned, especially those of neighbouring States, to abide by those commitments. They expressed the hope that the negotiations taking place would lead to the implementation of a comprehensive agreement in time for the next summit of the Regional Initiative. The Council members reaffirmed their appeal to FNL (Rwasa) to enter into negotiations with the transitional Government, with a view to rejoining the Arusha peace process. They reaffirmed their support for AMIB and appealed to contributors for financial or logistic support. They welcomed the recent contribution of 25 million euros from the EU. Expressing concern at the humanitarian situation, Council members called on all Burundian parties to facilitate the access of humanitarian agencies to populations in need. The members confirmed the Council's readiness to consider procedures for international assistance to combat impunity. They welcomed Economic and Social Council resolution 2003/16 establishing the Ad Hoc Advisory Group on Burundi (see p. 947). By decision 2003/311, the Council decided on organizational details of the Advisory Group and informed the Security Council of those actions on 25 August [S/2003/836].

The Security Council held a private meeting on 22 September [meeting 4832] to consider the situation in Burundi and heard a statement by President Ndayizeye, among others.

Pretoria Protocols

On 8 October, the transitional Government of President Ndayizeye and Pierre Nkurunziza's CNDD-FDD signed the Pretoria Protocol on political, defence and security power sharing in Burundi [S/2003/971]. Under its terms, CNDD-FDD would have four ministries, including a Minister of State. The number of its representatives in the legislature (National Assembly and Senate) was also determined, as was its representation in governorships of provinces, the diplomatic corps, local government, public enterprises, the new Burundi National Defence Force, police force and gendarmerie. The combatants of CNDD-FDD would move to cantonment areas designated by the Joint Ceasefire Commission under AMIB supervision, and the Burundi Armed Forces would be confined to areas agreed upon by AMIB, with certain elements being exempted.

The outstanding issues—participation of CNDD-FDD in the Senate, temporary immunity, the Forces Technical Agreement, and the transformation of CNDD-FDD (Nkurunziza) into a political party—were resolved at another round of discussions (Pretoria, 30 October–2 November), when the transitional Government and CNDD-FDD (Nkurunziza) signed the second Pretoria Protocol.

The President of the Security Council, in a 9 October press statement [SC/7891-AFR/726], said that Council members welcomed the signing of the first Pretoria Protocol and commended the transitional Government and CNDD-FDD for their commitment to peace, and President Thabo Mbeki and Facilitator Zuma of South Africa and other regional leaders for helping them reach agreement. The Council demanded that FNL join the negotiations without delay.

The EU, in a 13 October statement [S/2003/1025], congratulated the signatories of the Pretoria Protocol. It called on the parties to implement swiftly the agreement's political and military clauses and confirmed its willingness to assist in Burundi's peace and reconstruction process. The EU affirmed its support for the multi-country demobilization and reintegration programme, to which it was the main contributor, and its political and financial support for AMIB. The EU called on Agathon Rwasa's FNL to pursue the path of dialogue.

The President of the Security Council, on behalf of Council members, issued a 6 November press statement [SC/7912-AFR/747] expressing satisfaction with the signing of the supplementary Pretoria Protocol and welcoming efforts made in that regard by President Mbeki and other regional heads of State. The members welcomed the forthcoming regional summit (see below) and emphasized the importance of respecting the timetable for the cessation of hostilities, disengagement, cantonment and quartering in barracks of forces, and the entry of CNDD-FDD into the transitional institutions, as stipulated in the Pretoria Protocol. The members urged PALIPEHUTU-FNL (Rwasa), the last armed rebel group that had not joined the Arusha Agreement peace process, to do so without delay.

The signing of the Pretoria Protocols and the consequent resumption of food delivery to CNDD-FDD (Nkurunziza) combatants in three provinces had a positive impact, with a significant reduction in violence throughout the country.

Regional peace initiative and Global Ceasefire Agreement

The Twentieth Summit of the Great Lakes Regional Peace Initiative on Burundi (Dar es Salaam, 16 November) [S/2003/1112] endorsed the two Pretoria Protocols and called on all Burundian parties to proceed to the preparation of free and fair elections, as agreed in the schedule for the transition. It urged the region and the Facilitation, as guarantors, to continue to monitor the implementation of the agreements. The Summit called on PALIPEHUTU-FNL (Rwasa) to suspend hostilities and to participate in the negotiations with the transitional Government within three months, and mandated the Facilitator to engage that party to begin negotiations with the Government. Transmitting the Summit's communiqué to the Security Council, Burundi drew attention to the request that the Council deploy a peacekeeping operation in Burundi, taking into account the qualitative change that had taken place following the signing of the Pretoria Protocols, which had created a condition of peace and stability in over 95 per cent of Burundi's territory.

The Summit witnessed the signing, on 16 November in Dar es Salaam, of the Global Ceasefire Agreement between the transitional Government of Burundi and CNDD-FDD. By that Agreement, forwarded to the Security Council by Burundi [S/2003/1105], the two sides embraced the agreements and protocols signed since December 2002 and made them part of the 2000 Arusha Agreement. It revoked all earlier conflicting provisions of the Arusha Agreement in relation to CNDD-FDD. The parties appealed to PALIPEHUTU-FNL to join negotiations with the Government as soon as possible, failing which the signatories, the Regional Peace Initiative, the AU and the United Nations would deem it to be an organization inimical to the peace and security of Burundi and would treat it as such.

The EU, in a 19 November statement [S/2003/1136], welcomed the signing of the Global Ceasefire Agreement. At the same time, the EU regretted that fighting was still going on in several provinces of Burundi, especially in rural Bujumbura. It appealed to FNL (Rwasa) to abandon the military option and to the Government to keep the door open for negotiations.

Report of Secretary-General. The Secretary-General reported to the Security Council on 4 December [S/2003/1146] on the situation in Burundi, his first report on that topic since November 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 139]. He described the transfer of power to the transitional Government, the ceasefire negotiations, agreements between the parties and the security situation (above).

In accordance with the Global Ceasefire Agreement, President Ndayizeye formed a new 27-member cabinet on 23 November, including CNDD-FDD leader Pierre Nkurunziza as Minister in charge of good governance and State inspection. Members from his movement subsequently arrived in Bujumbura to take up their new positions in the transitional institutions, including the Joint Ceasefire Commission. PALIPEHUTU-FNL (Rwasa), on the other hand, refused to join the peace process. The territorial area controlled by that movement was, however, limited to the province of Bujumbura Rural, and the movement was weakened since its attacks on Bujumbura in July. Consequently, its ability to hinder the general move towards peace in Burundi was limited. The Secretary-General's Special Representative, Berhanu Dinka, continued efforts to initiate dialogue with that party.

At the time of the report, 27 members representing the transitional Government, CNDD (Léonard Nyangoma), PALIPEHUTU (Etienne Karatasi), FROLINA (Joseph Karumba), CNDD-FDD (Ndayikengurukiye), PALIPEHUTU-FNL (Mu-gabarabona) and CNDD-FDD (Nkurunziza) were participating in the Joint Ceasefire Commission.

The Implementation Monitoring Committee, chaired by the Special Representative, held five regular sessions and one special session in Bujumbura in 2003. In addition to monitoring ceasefires, the Committee tried to resolve disputes between parties to the Arusha Agreement. It pressed for laws on provisional immunity; punishment for genocide, war crimes and other crimes against humanity; and the establishment of the National Commission for the Rehabilitation of Refugees and Sinistrés. It was also working for laws to be enacted on the post-transitional constitution; the electoral code; the mandate, composition, functioning and working conditions of the defence and security forces; and the establishment of a truth and reconciliation commission.

The security situation improved considerably by late 2003, following the signing of the Pretoria Protocols in October and November, and no new clashes were reported between the army and CNDD-FDD (Nkurunziza). However, skirmishes occurred between CNDD-FDD (Nkurunziza) and PALIPEHUTU-FNL (Rwasa) in Bujumbura Rural and Bubanza provinces, leading to the displacement of more than 30,000 people. Assassinations and abductions targeting local administrators around Bujumbura Rural by PALIPEHUTU-FNL (Rwasa) remained a concern.

The socio-economic situation in Burundi deteriorated during 2003. With a high population density and a large population increase, Burundi, classified as a least developed country and a highly indebted poor country, suffered from a shortage of farmland, an illiteracy rate of 52 per cent, a high rate of HIV infection and a life expectancy of 48 years. From 1990 to 2003, Burundi's gross domestic product dropped by 20 per cent. The humanitarian and human rights situation continued to be of serious concern. Humanitarian access remained difficult in some areas, and non-governmental agencies had been the targets of robberies and kidnappings, limiting the distribution of aid, especially for the first nine months of the year. Civilians continued to be the victims of killings, attacks and arbitrary arrests by all factions. Rape and sexual abuses were committed by soldiers and militias of the transitional Government and the armed movements on an unprecedented scale. In the first six months of 2003, more than 800 civilians were reported killed and there were reports of mass graves.

The Secretary-General observed that increased resources had been made available to UNOB for 2003 and the costs related to the ceasefire negotiations continued to be supported by a grant from the United States through the United Nations Trust Fund. However, in order to respond to the increasing needs in peacekeeping-related issues, security sector reform and disarmament, demobilization and reintegration, it would be necessary again to augment the UNOB staff.

The Secretary-General concluded that the transfer of power and the ceasefire negotiations had created a new hope for a democratic and peaceful Burundi, transforming the nature of its politics from one characterized by ethnic-based exclusion to one based on peaceful competition between political alliances. Nevertheless, the socio-economic situation remained a serious concern and could threaten the political gains. Following the request made on 4 December to the Security Council by the Facilitator, Mr. Zuma, for the United Nations to take over from AMIB (see below), the Secretary-General instructed the Secretariat to begin assessing the situation, with a view to making recommendations on the way forward. The transitional period was to end in one year and many challenges lay ahead, including the adoption of a post-transition constitution and electoral code, and the preparations for and conduct of elections.

Security Council consideration. At a Security Council meeting on 4 December [meeting 4876], the Facilitator for the Burundi peace process, Deputy President Zuma of South Africa, requested urgent direct assistance to help consolidate the gains already made, prepare for elections in 11 months' time and place Burundi on the road to lasting peace and stability. Significant developments had taken place in 2003 and the year was ending on a positive note. Progress included the establishment of AMIB, the conclusion of negotiations, the implementation of various agreements and the transformation of the security apparatus. Since the signing of the first Pretoria Protocol between the Government and CNDD-FDD on 8 October, the level of violence had declined, bringing peace to at least 95 per cent of the territory of Burundi. Thus, the Burundi peace process had entered a decisive and irreversible stage. The implementation of all the ceasefire agreements and the Pretoria Protocols had been swift, and change was evident. Those developments had significantly boosted the implementation of the Arusha Agreement, which guided the transitional period; Burundi had successfully completed the first two thirds of the transition period, at the end of which a democratically elected legislature and executive should be in place. Although PALIPEHUTU-FNL (Rwasa) remained outside the peace process, that did not present a major obstacle. The Facilitator had sent a communication to that party in an attempt to include it in the process. Among the goals faced by the Government were the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of returning combatants and the return of refugees and internally displaced persons. CNDD (Ndayikengurukiye) and PALIPEHUTU-FNL (Mugabarabona) had begun to canton some of their combatants and those of CNDD-FDD (Nkurunziza) were already proceeding to assembly points to be cantoned.

AMIB, which was responsible for the cantonment and disarmament of the combatants prior to demobilization, required immediate financial resources to carry out its mandate and to maintain its force. The continued success of the peace process required more direct UN involvement, in particular by taking over the mission, re-hatting the existing military contingent and deploying a UN peacekeeping operation. A more immediate relief need was the provision of material, logistical and financial support to AMIB pending more UN involvement.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (December)

On 22 December [meeting 4891], following consultations among Security Council members, the President made statement S/PRST/2003/30 on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council reaffirms its full support for the peace process of the Arusha for Peace and Reconciliation Agreement for Burundi of 28 August 2000 (the Arusha Agreement), calls on all the Burundian parties to implement their commitments and assures them of its determination to support their efforts in this direction.

The Council welcomes the progress recently made by the Burundian parties, in particular by the signing, at Pretoria, of the protocols of 8 October and 2 November 2003 and by the conclusion, on 16 November 2003 in Dar es Salaam, United Republic of Tanzania, of the Global Ceasefire Agreement between the Transitional Government of Burundi and the Conseil national pour la défense de la démocratie-Forces pour la défense de la démocratie of Mr. Nkurunziza.

The Council welcomes with satisfaction the formation of the new Transitional Government and the participation of the Conseil national pour la défense de la démocratie-Forces pour la défense de la démocratie in the transitional institutions; it again urges the Parti pour la libération du peuple hutu-Forces nationales de libération of Mr. Rwasa, the last rebel group that has not yet joined the peace process of the Arusha Agreement, to do so without further delay.

The Council pays tribute to the efforts of the States of the Regional Initiative and of the Facilitation, in particular South Africa, in favour of peace in Burundi; it expresses its support for the mission of the African Union in Burundi and for its South African, Ethiopian and Mozambican contingents, and calls on donors to give it financial, material and logistical support as soon as possible.

The Council welcomes the recent mission of the Ad Hoc Advisory Group on Burundi of the Economic and Social Council, and calls upon donors and the international financial community to mobilize during the next Forum of Burundi's Partners for Development, scheduled for 13 and 14 January 2004 in Brussels, and to honour fully the pledges made so far.

The Council expresses its concern at the dire humanitarian situation of the population of Burundi and recalls that all parties involved are responsible for the security of the civilian population, which includes facilitating total, unrestricted and immediate access to the population for the humanitarian organizations.

The Council condemns all acts of violence as well as violations of human rights and international humanitarian law, and reaffirms its determination to support Burundian efforts to prevent such acts, based on the rule of law, in order to put an end to impunity.

The Council takes note of the address made by the President of the Republic of Burundi, Mr. Ndayizeye, to the Council on 22 September 2003. It takes note also of the request made by the Deputy President of the Republic of South Africa, Mr. Zuma, on behalf of the States of the Regional Initiative, when he spoke before the Council on 4 December 2003, and which is referred to in paragraph 71 of the latest report of the Secretary-General on the situation in Burundi, of 4 December 2003.

The Council welcomes the decision of the Secretary-General to examine the situation with a view to submitting recommendations to the Council, and requests him in this regard to undertake, as soon as he deems it convenient, the appropriate preparatory work and assessment on how the United Nations might provide the most efficient support for the full implementation of the Arusha agreement.

The Council takes note of the latest report of the Secretary-General on the situation in Burundi; it welcomes the work carried out, in often difficult conditions, by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and the staff of the United Nations Office in Burundi, and approves the recommendations contained in paragraphs 63 to 65 of the report regarding the renewal of the mandate of the Office.

Rwanda

The presence of Rwandan armed groups in the DRC continued to adversely affect relations between the two countries in the early part of 2003 (see above under "Democratic Republic of the Congo"). During the Security Council mission to Central Africa (7-16 June) [S/2003/653] (see also p. 109), which visited Kigali, the attention of the Rwandan Government was drawn to the disruptions in MONUC's DRRR operations caused by military offensives by RCD-Goma in North and South Kivu.

Communications. Rwanda, on 19 November [S/2003/113], informed the Security Council that officers and forces of the Forces combattantes Abacunguzi (FOCA), the armed wing of the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda, known as the ex-FAR/Interahamwe, had returned peacefully from the DRC on 14 November. The return was an important step in the Government's efforts to unite and reconcile all Rwandan people. The leader of FOCA, Major-General Paul Rwarakabije, and all those who chose to return through peaceful means, would be resettled and integrated into Rwandan society. Those who chose to continue with armed conflict would be dealt with forcefully. Rwanda called on the region and the international community to help bring those extremists to justice.

The EU, in a 13 October statement [S/2003/1023], welcomed Rwanda's parliamentary elections, which represented an important step towards national reconciliation and consolidation of viable democratic institutions. Like the presidential poll on 25 August, the parliamentary elections were conducted in an orderly manner, reflecting the care taken by the Rwandan authorities with Rwanda's political transition. At the same time, the EU noted the comments made by its election observer mission in a 3 October statement concerning the obstacles to opposition activities, such as intimidation, threats and arrests that marked the election campaign, as well as the irregularities discovered at a number of polling stations. The achievement of a political transition in Rwanda came at a time when the peace processes in the DRC and Burundi were showing signs of progress, and the EU reaffirmed its willingness to assist the reconciliation process in the Great Lakes region.

International Day of Reflection on 1994 Genocide

The AU Executive Council, at its second ordinary session (N'Djamena, Chad, 3-6 March) [A/57/775], decided that 7 April 2004, the tenth anniversary of the Rwandan genocide [YUN 1994, p. 282], would be commemorated as a day of remembrance of the victims of that tragedy and reaffirmation of Africa's resolve to prevent and fight genocide on the continent. It recommended that the United Nations and the international community take appropriate steps to commemorate 7 April 2004 as a day of reflection and recommitment against genocide.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 23 December [meeting 78], the General Assembly adopted resolution 58/234 [draft: A/58/L.55 & Add.1] without vote [agenda item 39 (b)].

International Day of Reflection on the 1994 Genocide in Rwanda

The General Assembly,
Guided by the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights,

Recalling its resolution 260 A (III) of 9 December 1948, by which it adopted the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, as well as its resolution 53/43 of 2 December 1998, entitled "Fiftieth anniversary of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide", and its other resolutions relevant to the issue of genocide,

Recalling also the findings and recommendations of the Independent Inquiry commissioned by the Secretary-General, with the approval of the Security Council, into the actions of the United Nations during the 1994 genocide in Rwanda,

Recalling further Security Council resolution 955 (1994) of 8 November 1994 on the establishment of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighbouring States between 1 January and 31 December 1994,

Recalling the report containing the findings and recommendations of the International Panel of Eminent Personalities commissioned by the former Organization of African Unity to investigate the genocide in Rwanda and the surrounding events, entitled "Rwanda: The Preventable Genocide",

Noting with concern that many alleged perpetrators of genocide continue to elude justice,

Recognizing the importance of combating impunity for all violations that constitute the crime of genocide,

Convinced that exposing and holding the perpetrators, including their accomplices, accountable, as well as restoring the dignity of victims through acknowledgement and commemoration of their suffering, would guide societies in the prevention of future violations,

Taking note of the recommendation of the Executive Council of the African Union, at its second ordinary session, held in N'Djamena from 3 to 6 March 2003, that the United Nations and the international community proclaim, in commemoration of the 1994 genocide in Rwanda, an international day of reflection and recommitment to the fight against genocide throughout the world,

Recognizing that April 2004 is the tenth anniversary of the genocide in Rwanda,

1. Decides to designate 7 April 2004 as the International Day of Reflection on the Genocide in Rwanda;

2. Encourages all Member States, organizations of the United Nations system and other relevant international organizations, as well as civil society organizations, to observe the International Day, including special observances and activities in memory of the victims of the genocide in Rwanda;

3. Encourages all Member States, organizations of the United Nations system and other relevant international organizations to consider promoting implementation of the recommendations contained in the report of the Independent Inquiry into the actions of the United Nations during the 1994 genocide in Rwanda;

4. Calls upon all States to act in accordance with the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide so as to ensure that there is no repetition of events of the kind that occurred in Rwanda in 1994.

Financing of UNAMIR and UNOMUR

In a 4 March report [A/57/753] on financing of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda (UNAMIR), the Secretary-General provided details on the final disposition of the assets of the Mission, which withdrew from Rwanda in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 62]. The inventory value of the UNAMIR assets as at 31 December 1996 amounted to $64,472,700. Of that amount, 59.5 per cent was transferred to other missions or for temporary storage, 31.4 per cent was disposed of in the mission area, and 9.1 per cent was written off. The Secretary-General proposed that the General Assembly approve the donation of assets with a total inventory value of $12.6 million to the Government of Rwanda and donate assets with a total inventory value of $79,200 to the medical unit of a Member State.

On 17 April [A/57/791], the Secretary-General issued the final performance report of UNAMIR and the United Nations Observer Mission in Uganda-Rwanda (UNOMUR). UNOMUR was established in 1993 [YUN 1993, p. 284] and merged later that year with UNAMIR. The report contained information on income and expenditure, cash position, outstanding liabilities and fund balances, as well as unpaid assessed contributions as at 30 June 2002. In the light of the overall financial situation of the Organization and the fact that, as at 15 March 2003, assessed contributions to peacekeeping in the amount of $1.5 billion remained unpaid, the Secretary-General proposed that the return of cash available for credit to Member States ($45 million) be suspended until the financial situation improved.

Central African Republic

The United Nations Peace-building Support Office in the Central African Republic (BONUCA), established by Security Council presidential statement S/PRST/2000/5 [YUN 2000, p. 162] to take over from the United Nations Mission in the Central African Republic, supported the Government's efforts to return to stability following the attempted takeover in October 2002 by partisans of the former Chief of Staff, General François Bozizé, and an armed rebellion in the northern part of the country. On 15 March 2003, General Bozizé was successful in leading a coup d'état that overturned President-elect Ange Félix Patassé and interrupted preparations for a national dialogue. However, the new authorities pledged to organize a national dialogue during a transition period that would lead to national elections in 2004. Arrangements were made for an interim Government under the National Transition Council (NTC) representing all political opinions, including the party of President Patassé.

The security situation, aggravated by the devastated economy, remained unstable, both before and after the coup d'état, and there were continued reports of human rights abuses. The Central African Economic and Monetary Community (CEMAC) sent in a multinational force, later joined by French forces, to help the new Government restore stability. Positive developments included reintegration of former military and civilian refugees.

At the Government's initiative, the national dialogue was held in late 2003. It made recommendations to the Government on adopting a new constitution, revising the electoral code and establishing a census-based electoral list.

Report of Secretary-General (June). In response to presidential statement S/PRST/2001/25 [YUN 2001, p. 156], the Secretary-General submitted a 20 June report on the situation in the Central African Republic and BONUS activities [S/2003/661], covering the first six months of 2003. His previous report of 3 January [S/2003/5] covered developments in the second half of 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 144].

The first half of 2003 was marked principally by the 15 March coup d'état led by General Bozizé, which overthrew the regime of President Patassé, thereby interrupting the well-advanced preparations for national dialogue. The coordinators of the dialogue, appointed by Mr. Patassé at the end of December 2002, had met all the parties involved, from both within and outside the country in January and February 2003. The new authorities pledged to organize the national dialogue during the period of transition. The Secretary-General condemned the assumption of power by non-constitutional means in a press release of 17 March [SC/SM/8637-AFR/584], as did the Security Council in a 20 March press statement [SC/7700-AFR/588].

The new authorities stated that the interruption in the democratic process was temporary and was designed to enable favourable conditions for a return to democracy. To that end, they pursued management by consensus for the transition period, with the involvement of every political opinion and other actors of civil society. Elections were scheduled for the second half of 2004, and the Security Council, in a 17 April press statement [SC/7736-AFR/607], expressed the hope that elections would be held as soon as possible. The authorities, however, made the fulfilment of that commitment conditional upon substantial assistance from the international community for restoration of security and improvement of the economic situation.

Meanwhile, institutional arrangements for the transition were in place: a 28-member Government representing all political opinions, including the Mouvement de Libération du Peuple Centrafricain, the party of President Patassé; and NTC, a consultative body that included political actors and civil society organizations. General Bozizé granted amnesty to those responsible for the attempted coup of 28 May 2001 [YUN 2001, p. 154], including ex-President André Kolingba, said to be the instigator of the abortive coup. Soldiers who had participated in that action began to return to the Central African Republic and were reintegrated into the army, and ex-President Kolingba, who had been demoted to private after the attempted coup, was restored to the rank of General. General Bozizé stated that he would not be a candidate in the next presidential elections, thereby bringing relative calm to the transition process.

The security situation continued to be unstable, both before and after the 15 March coup d'état. During the initial days following the coup, Chadian troops were brought in to help end the looting in Bangui and to carry out disarmament operations. Since then, however, lack of security held sway in Bangui, with numerous auto thefts and some acts of armed violence. The situation was little better in the interior of the country where roadblocks were reported on the main highways and weapons proliferated.

The Multinational Force of CEMAC (380 troops), in which the Gabonese and Congolese contingents (139 and 120 men, respectively) were joined by 121 Chadian troops, resumed patrol and monitoring operations in Bangui. The special CEMAC summit (Libreville, Gabon, 3 June) adopted a new mandate for the Force, expanding its duties. The 300 French troops, who arrived the day after the coup d'état and evacuated foreign nationals, provided protection for Bangui airport. Control of the security situation remained the prerequisite for the normal functioning of the State and for the resumption of economic activities, a smooth transition and ensuring the fairness of the elections. Restoring security would require the restructuring of the defence and security forces and systematic disarmament in Bangui and the provinces. The new authorities had begun the reorganization of the military. The BONUS military team continued its assistance and advisory activities, together with evaluation and disarmament. Its civilian police team continued to monitor the security situation and helped in the return of looted property. It also continued its training activities for the Central African police and gendarmerie.

The Central African economy, which was already extremely fragile because of repeated political-military troubles, collapsed completely after the coup d'état. Owing to the lack of cooperation programmes of any kind with the Bretton Woods institutions (the World Bank Group and IMF), the State had been without budgetary support since January 2001, with the exception of recent Chinese assistance in the amount of $20 million. The new Central African authorities had stated their desire to resume discussions with the Bretton Woods institutions in order to conclude a post-conflict programme. The CEMAC special summit (Brazzaville, Congo, 21 March) also requested those institutions to provide support to the Central African Republic, whose State infrastructure and facilities had been destroyed, with all economic and industrial activity halted. The new Government had made the issue of salaries and pensions its priority, and social tension, which had been simmering for a number of years, was subsiding.

The overall human rights situation deteriorated during the first half of 2003 due to incidents between the rebels and loyalist forces prior to the coup d'état and atrocities committed by the so-called patriotic forces or liberators (composed of Chadians and Central Africans) afterwards. The Government army's recapture in February of then rebel-held towns triggered violations of human rights and humanitarian law—looting, summary executions, rape, forced disappearances, inhuman and cruel treatment, and enrolment of young people. After the coup, there was widespread looting in Bangui by General Bozizé's forces and others, the targets being the residences of former authorities, ministries, diplomatic missions, offices of some UN agencies and residences of UN personnel. The new Government pledged to respect human rights, and a Ministry of Justice, Human Rights and Good Governance was established. BONUCA continued to observe and investigate human rights violations and to assist in national capacity-building in human rights promotion and protection.

Three months after the coup d'état, the overall situation in the Central African Republic was being brought under control with considerable difficulty, said the Secretary-General, and the restoration of security remained the top priority for the new authorities. He urged the international community to provide assistance and promote the conclusion of an agreement on a post-conflict programme between the Central African Republic and the Bretton Woods institutions, once the new Government had announced and implemented the calendar for the transition period. The authorities envisaged a return to constitutional legality in January 2005. If that commitment was honoured, the transition would last 22 months, with a national dialogue in 2003, a constitutional referendum in early 2004, and general elections (presidential, legislative and municipal) in late 2004. On the basis of that calendar, submitted to them by General Bozizé, the CEMAC heads of State, at the special summit (Libreville, 3 June), officially recognized the new regime. The activities of BONUCA would be adjusted in the light of the requirements of the new situation in the country.

Press statements. The Security Council, through its President, issued four press statements on the Central African Republic during 2003.

On 8 January [SC/7626-AFR/541], having been briefed by the Representative of the Secretary-General for the Central African Republic, General Lamine Cissé (Senegal), Council members noted with satisfaction President Patassé's appeal for a national dialogue and welcomed the recent establishment of the national dialogue coordination committee. They encouraged the Central African authorities to create the conditions for a comprehensive and all-inclusive dialogue, and requested the Secretary-General to provide assistance in that regard. Members also welcomed the ongoing deployment of the CEMAC force under Gabon's leadership and with French logistical and financial support.

On 20 March [SC/7700-AFR/588], Council members condemned the 15 March coup d'état and the ensuing violence and pillaging. They invited all the leaders of the Central African Republic to begin a genuine, political, all-inclusive dialogue immediately, in order to restore legality, national cohesion and civil peace and to ensure the restoration of democracy. They reiterated their support for the action of the Secretary-General's Representative as head of BONUCA, and for the efforts of CEMAC and the AU.

On 17 April [SC/7736-AFR/607], having again been briefed by the Secretary-General's Representative, Council members welcomed the political progress in the Central African Republic, the call for a national dialogue and the appointment of a Government of National Unity, including the nomination of a respected Prime Minister. They considered it indispensable that the Central African Republic authorities elaborate a plan for the national dialogue, including a time frame, and hold elections as soon as possible. They invited the donor community to help in the reconstruction of the country.

Council members, on 15 July [SC/7815-AFR/665], following a briefing by the Secretary-General's Representative, noted with satisfaction that the Central African authorities had opted for a consensual management of the transition period by involving all the political factions and the other actors of civil society. They invited the authorities to fulfil their commitment to organize an inclusive national dialogue and to respect the timetable agreed for the return to constitutional legality, especially the holding of presidential elections before the end of 2004. They expressed concern about the continuing insecurity and human rights violations, and stressed that the restructuring of the security forces, supported by CEMAC, BONUCA and France, and systematic disarmament were essential for restoring security. They insisted on the need for BONUCA to continue its inquiries into human rights violations and to continue to work to strengthen national capacities regarding the rule of law. They called on Member States to provide financial or logistical support to the CEMAC force. Council members would consider convening a public meeting in early 2004 to examine whether constitutional legality had been restored in the Central African Republic.

Communications. On 2 January [S/2003/3], the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya informed the Security Council President that the forces of the Community of Sahel-Saharan States (CEN-SAD) had withdrawn from the Central African Republic and responsibility for ensuring the security of the country had been transferred to the forces of CEMAC. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, on 31 January [S/2003/135], described the efforts of the CEN-SAD forces, which had been sent to the Central African Republic in 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 143] at the request of the Government.

The AU Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution, at a meeting of heads of State and Government (Addis Ababa, 3 February) [S/2003/142], welcomed the deployment of CEMAC troops in the Central African Republic and requested UN and AU members to provide assistance to the force. It encouraged President Patassé to pursue his efforts to convene a national dialogue. At another meeting held at the ambassadorial level (Addis Ababa, 17 March) [S/2003/344], the Central Organ condemned the 15 March coup d'état and recommended that the Central African Republic be suspended from participating in AU activities until constitutional rule was restored.

Report of Secretary-General (December). On 29 December [S/2003/1209], the Secretary-General reported on the situation in the Central African Republic and BONUCA activities from July to December. That period was marked by three significant events: the activities of NTC; the national dialogue; and General Bozizé's appointment of Célestin Le Roi Gaoumbalet, a retired official of two inter-African banks, as Prime Minister.

Endowed with a consultative status and charged with assisting the head of State and the Government in legislative matters, NTC held its first session from 21 July to 4 September. It recommended that the Government respect the 12 June commitments it had made to the EU on a road map to find a viable strategy to the structural crisis, that the national dialogue be resumed and that the Government be required to explain its actions. Two more NTC sessions were held in late 2003, at which a number of draft ordinances were adopted.

At the Government's initiative, the national dialogue was held from 15 September to 27 October to assess the country's situation and to consider steps for national reconciliation. It adopted recommendations concerning the electoral process, namely the adoption of a new constitution, revision of the electoral code, and a new census-based electoral list. In that regard, the United Nations sent an assessment mission to Bangui (23 November–13 December), which would make recommendations on support that the UN system might provide in the preparations for and the holding of elections. The dialogue also adopted a solemn declaration that declared tribal hatred and division to be crimes against the State and made a commitment to promote national unity, democracy, freedom of press and opinion, justice and good governance.

Security forces in Bangui were strengthened during the reporting period, following rumours of incursions by mercenaries and instances of hold-ups, rape and murder. Abuses were committed by members of the security forces in some cases, which was a major cause for concern. In the interior, the phenomenon of roadblocks continued, especially on the main highways. It was essential for defence and security forces to be supplemented by a CEMAC force, so that they could operate in the interior of the country while helping to restore security to Bangui. The restructuring of the Central African Armed Forces continued. France, with BONUCA assistance, was helping to train the troops. The BONUCA Civilian Police Section was continuing to monitor the security situation and to strengthen the capacities of the police and the gendarmerie (military police). Training had been organized for 120 police officers and 190 gendarmes.

The economic situation remained precarious, with negative economic growth expected for 2003. In an effort to alleviate the State's severe cash-flow problems, talks were held between representatives of the Government and officials of the Bretton Woods institutions (Paris, 30 October–

7 November) on resuming a cooperation programme. The Government also began discussions with the EU on resuming cooperation, which the EU agreed to on a progressive basis, particularly in health, direct support to the population, electoral assistance, good governance and the reform of public finances. The level of budgetary revenue remained very low, with total revenue for 2003 at some 25 per cent below that of 2002. Arrears owed to multilateral and bilateral creditors continued to rise. The new authorities, who froze the salary arrears payable by previous Governments, had been able to make some outstanding salary payments to civil servants, thanks to its partners, including France, China and CEMAC member States, and were thus able to ensure the resumption, somewhat delayed, of the 2003/04 school year.

The human rights situation deteriorated, with reports of rape, theft, abduction, torture and violations of the right to life. Nevertheless, some positive developments were observed, including the acceleration of the reintegration of former military and civilian refugees; the lifting of the curfew that had been in place since 15 March; the strengthening of the process of re-establishing the National Human Rights Commission; the issuance of birth certificates to 97 pygmy children; and the representation of ethnic minorities on NTC and in the national dialogue. The BONUCA human rights section continued to monitor and investigate human rights violations, to conduct its awareness-raising programme, and to strengthen national capacities for the promotion and respect of human rights.

The Secretary-General stated that the overall situation in the Central African Republic was less troubled than it was before the national dialogue, when the atmosphere was charged with suspicion and rumours. However, he was concerned by the re-emergence of acts of rape, hold-ups and violations of the right to life. Only a complete disarmament, supported by the regular payment of salaries to civil servants and State officials, and the restoration of security throughout the country would make it possible to hold credible and transparent elections. He therefore called for strengthening the CEMAC Multinational Force, with a view to restoring security to the country, and for the Government to adopt a new basic law and a revised electoral code, in accordance with the recommendations of the national dialogue. He appealed to the donor community to assist the new authorities in their multisectoral efforts, particularly the restoration of security, in order to ensure the rapid return to constitutional legality through the holding of democratic elections.

Extension of BONUCA mandate

The Secretary-General, on 5 September [S/2003/889], following consultations with the Government of the Central African Republic, proposed an extension of the mandate of the United Nations Peace-building Support Office in the Central African Republic (BONUCA) for an additional year, until 31 December 2004. The extension would enable BONUCA to continue to support the Government's efforts to restore constitutional legality through national dialogue and to strengthen national capacities for the promotion of the rule of law during the transitional period leading up to the general elections, expected to take place in 2004. On 11 September [S/2003/890], the Security Council took note of the proposal.

MINURCA financing

The resumed fifty-seventh session of the General Assembly had before it the Secretary-General's report [A/57/631] on the final disposition of the assets of the United Nations Mission in the Central African Republic (MINURCA), which was withdrawn in 2000 [YUN 2000, p. 161] and replaced by BONUCA. The inventory value of the Mission's assets as at 30 April 2000 amounted to some $12.5 million, 52.5 per cent ($6,545,300) of which had been transferred to other peace-keeping operations or the United Nations Logistics Base at Brindisi, Italy, for temporary storage. The remaining 47.5 per cent related to assets that had been disposed of in the Mission area ($3,058,700) or reported as written off ($2,842,400) or as lost ($20,500). The Secretary-General suggested that the General Assembly take note of the report.

On 17 April [A/57/795], the Secretary-General issued the final performance report of MINURCA, which contained information on income and expenditure, assets, outstanding liabilities and fund balances as at 30 June 2002. The total assessed contributions had been fully appropriated by the General Assembly for the operation of the Mission. The Secretary-General recommended that the provisions of the UN financial regulations be suspended in respect of the liabilities and fund balance of $36,253,000, in the light of the cash shortage of the Mission.

West Africa

West Africa continued to be an area of major and growing concern to the United Nations in 2003. In June, the Security Council sent a mission to the subregion to examine the links between the conflicts in Côte d'Ivoire, Liberia and Sierra Leone and with regard to Guinea-Bissau. The Council, on 18 March, adopted a declaration on the proliferation of small arms and light weapons and mercenary activities, which posed threats to peace and security in West Africa. The concurrent conflicts in Côte d'Ivoire, Liberia and Sierra Leone were further complicated by the movement of armed groups and individuals crossing borders to seek refuge, loot and/or serve as mercenaries. The United Nations, the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), the AU and the EU attempted to mediate with the parties to the various conflicts.

Following an outbreak of fighting in late 2002, the political factions in Côte d'Ivoire reached an agreement in January 2003, signed at Linas-Marcoussis, France, on a mechanism for power sharing. Although some progress was made in implementing its terms, the parties continued to disagree; the three main rebel movements jointly controlled the northern half of the country and the Government retained control of the south. In May, the Security Council responded to the situation by sending in a peacekeeping force, the United Nations Mission in Côte d'Ivoire (MINUCI), to complement the ECOWAS and French forces already serving there. In May, the opposition forces withdrew from the Government of National Reconciliation in protest against some of the President's appointments, and sporadic fighting followed. However, by the end of the year, the stalemate was reversed, and the peace process gained new momentum in December when the two sides met and resumed preparations for the disarmament and demobilization programme. The withdrawal of heavy weapons from the zone between the forces began that month and the opposition announced the end of their suspension of participation in the Government.

In Liberia, fighting between Government forces and two dissident movements was most widespread during the first half of the year, and the rebels gained control of nearly two thirds of the country. Elections, originally scheduled for October, had to be postponed to 2004 due to the lack of security and the resumption of civil war. The United Nations Peace-building Support Office in Liberia (UNOL) spearheaded UN attempts to promote national reconciliation. In June, a ceasefire agreement was signed by the three main opposing parties, but it was soon violated. ECOWAS sent a vanguard peacekeeping force to Liberia in August, which was soon followed by a multinational force and, in September, by the United Nations Mission in Liberia (UNMIL). Following the departure of President Charles Taylor from the country, a Comprehensive Peace Agreement was reached in Accra, Ghana, on 18 August by the Government, two rebel groups, political parties and civil society leaders, which provided for the establishment of a National Transitional Government. By the end of the year, mechanisms for the implementation of the peace process were in place, but the armed groups had not demonstrated full commitment to the peace process.

The situation in Sierra Leone remained relatively stable in 2003, after a decade of civil war that came to an end in 2002 with the completion of the disarmament process and the holding of elections. The security situation improved as the benchmarks set by the Security Council for the reduction of troops of the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL) were met. Under the drawdown plans, the Mission reduced its forces from nearly 16,000 to 11,500 troops. Meanwhile, the Government continued to disarm ex-combatants and reintegrate them into society. Despite the generally positive trends, some areas remained volatile on the Sierra Leone/Liberia border. Fighting in Liberia, which threatened to spill over into Sierra Leone, precipitated an influx of thousands of refugees into Sierra Leone. The Government's efforts to bring peace and reduce tensions internally included setting up a Special Court to try serious crimes linked to the civil war and a Truth and Reconciliation Commission. The Government also reclaimed control of the diamond mining and selling in much of the country by expanding its certificate-of-origin regime, thus bringing in badly needed revenues. In view of that progress, the Security Council did not renew its embargo against Sierra Leonean rough diamonds.

Guinea-Bissau's serious political, economic and social problems, which were monitored by the United Nations Peace-building Support Office in Guinea-Bissau (UNOGBIS), continued to deteriorate throughout most of 2003. Progress towards revising the constitution remained stalled, and opposition leaders accused the Government of arbitrary decision-making, harsh restrictions on the media and harassment of political opponents. Preparations for legislative elections were under way when a non-violent coup d'état, led by the military, overthrew the Government of President Kumba Yalá in September. An agreement was quickly reached and a transitional Government was established, led by a transitional President, Henrique Pereira Rosa. The new Government pledged to hold legislative elections within an agreed time limit of six months and to hold presidential elections a year later.

Threats to peace and security

On 18 March [meeting 4720], the Security Council held a workshop on the proliferation of small arms and light weapons and mercenary activities: threats to peace and security in West Africa. Addressing the Council, the Secretary-General said that the uncontrolled proliferation of small arms and light weapons and the use of mercenaries sustained conflict, exacerbated violence, fuelled crime and terrorism, promoted cultures of violence, violated international humanitarian law and impeded political, economic and social development. The easy availability of small arms and light weapons was linked to the rise in the victimization of women and children and with the phenomenon of child soldiers. That link was particularly evident in West Africa, where the conflicts in Liberia, Sierra Leone and, more recently, Côte d'Ivoire had been fuelled by an unregulated trade in small arms, often paid for with the proceeds from the illicit exploitation of natural resources. The flood of arms in the region had been accompanied by—and had facilitated—a rise in mercenaries' activities. That problem was linked, in turn, to the failure to adequately fund and implement disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programmes and the failure to provide enough assistance to countries such as Liberia and Guinea-Bissau in restructuring their armed forces as part of post-conflict peace-building arrangements.

One response to the problem was offered by legal instruments and other international agreements, including the 2001 Programme of Action to Prevent, Combat and Eradicate the Illicit Trade in Small Arms and Light Weapons in All Its Aspects [YUN 2001, p. 499] and the 1989 International Convention against the Recruitment, Use, Financing and Training of Mercenaries [YUN 1989, p. 825].

The Security Council had demanded that countries in the Mano River Union (MRU) (Guinea, Liberia, Sierra Leone) cease military support for armed groups in neighbouring countries and refrain from actions that might contribute to the destabilization of the situation on their borders. It had also imposed arms embargoes. The heads of State of ECOWAS agreed to work towards making the region a child-soldier-free zone and had put in place a moratorium on the import, export and manufacture of small arms in the region. To support the moratorium, the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) had helped the countries involved to strengthen controls at border posts, to establish arms registers, to build up the capacity of national monitoring commissions and to collect and destroy illicit arms. UNAMSIL and UNOL were helping Sierra Leone and Liberia, respectively, to address small arms issues and the full range of post-conflict reconstruction and development tasks. Spillover effects from one country to the next had been common, underscoring the need for regional cooperation and a comprehensive approach.

The Director of UNDP's Programme for Coordination and Assistance for Security and Development (PCASED), who addressed the Council at its invitation, gave a presentation on the Programme's efforts to combat the proliferation of weapons in West Africa, where there were more than 10 million arms. PCASED involved a range of actors—international organizations, States, national organizations, NGOs, media and civil society groups—through national commissions established by States and the national and transnational bodies of civil society. Its mission was to promote the culture of peace, train security forces, establish border controls, create a regional register of light weapons, harmonize laws, collect and destroy weapons, extend the spirit of moratorium to the rest of Africa, mobilize resources and begin a dialogue with arms manufacturers. At that time, 13 of the 15 countries in the West Africa region had national commissions, with Côte d'Ivoire and Liberia being the exceptions. PCASED had assisted Mali and Benin in strengthening border controls and was involved in training the security forces of the 15 participating countries. In West Africa, PCASED had destroyed 38,000 weapons and, with Canada's help, it intended to destroy all government landmine stocks, with demining programmes to follow.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 18 March [meeting 4720], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1467(2003). The draft [S/2003/328] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council

Decides to adopt the attached declaration on the item entitled "Proliferation of small arms and light weapons and mercenary activities: threats to peace and security in West Africa".

Annex

The Security Council expresses its profound concern at the impact of the proliferation of small arms and light weapons, as well as mercenary activities, on peace and security in West Africa. These contribute to serious violations of human rights and international humanitarian law, which the Council condemns. The Council requests States of the subregion to ensure that relevant measures adopted at the national, regional and international levels to combat these problems are put into effect.

The Council calls upon the States of the subregion to strengthen the measures adopted and to consider other appropriate steps, taking into account the recommendations emanating from this workshop. The Council also emphasizes the need for the States of the subregion to strengthen their cooperation in order to identify individuals and entities that engage illegally in trafficking in small arms and light weapons and provide support for mercenary activities in West Africa.

The Council acknowledges the need to involve national commissions or national committees and other relevant local structures, including civil society, more fully in the practical implementation of the Moratorium on the Importation, Exportation and Manufacture of Small Arms and Light Weapons, adopted by the Economic Community of West African States on 31 October 1998, and of the Programme of Action to Prevent, Combat and Eradicate the Illicit Trade in Small Arms and Light Weapons in All Its Aspects, adopted by the United Nations Conference on the Illicit Trade in Small Arms and Light Weapons in All Its Aspects.

The Council calls upon the States of West Africa to consider the following recommendations that might contribute to the more effective implementation of the Moratorium:

(a) Broadening the Moratorium to include an information-exchange mechanism for all types of small arms procured by members of the Economic Community of West African States as well as for arms transfers by supplier countries;

(b) Enhancement of transparency in armaments, including through the establishment of an Economic Community of West African States register that would record national inventories of small arms and light weapons;

(c) Strengthening national commissions set up to oversee implementation of the Moratorium, in terms of staffing and equipment, and developing national plans of action;

(d) Taking necessary measures to build the capacity of the secretariat of the Economic Community of West African States;

(e) Computerization of aircraft registration lists to ensure better monitoring of airspace, in accordance with the provisions of the Convention on International Civil Aviation, signed at Chicago, United States of America, on 7 December 1944;

(f) Introduction of a standardized end-user certificate for imported weapons.

The Council expresses concern at the serious violations of the arms embargoes in West Africa and calls upon Member States to comply fully with the relevant resolutions of the Council.

The Council expresses its concern at links between mercenary activities, illicit arms trafficking and the violation of arms embargoes, which help to foster and prolong conflicts in West Africa.

The Council emphasizes the need to make peoples and entities of the subregion aware of the danger and the consequences of the illicit trade in small arms and light weapons and of mercenary activities.

The Council encourages all members of the Economic Community of West African States, especially those most affected by the illicit trade in small arms and light weapons, to submit, as did other States, national reports to the Secretary-General on actions undertaken to implement the Programme of Action, in advance of the 2003 biennial review meeting.

The Council appeals to the donor community to assist States of the subregion in implementing and strengthening measures relating to the proliferation of small arms and light weapons and mercenary activities.

The Council calls upon relevant parties to conflicts in West Africa to recognize the importance of activities related to disarmament, demobilization and reintegration in post-conflict situations, and of including such measures in the text of negotiated agreements, as well as specific measures for the collection and disposal of illicit and/or surplus small arms.

The Council calls upon all States in the subregion to cease military support for armed groups in neighbouring countries and to take action to prevent armed individuals and groups using their territory to prepare and launch attacks on neighbouring countries.

The Council calls upon arms-producing and exporting countries that have not yet done so to enact stringent laws, regulations and administrative procedures in order to ensure, through their implementation, more effective control over the transfer to West Africa of small arms by manufacturers, suppliers, brokers, and shipping and transit agents, including a mechanism that would facilitate the identification of illicit arms transfers, as well as careful scrutiny of end-user certificates.

The Council reiterates its call to regional and sub-regional organizations to develop policies, activities and advocacy for the benefit of war-affected children in their regions. In this regard, the Council welcomes the Accra Declaration and the Plan of Action adopted at the Conference on War-Affected Children in West Africa, held in Accra on 27 and 28 April 2000, and the subsequent establishment of a Child Protection Unit at the secretariat of the Economic Community of West African States.

Security Council mission to West Africa

The Security Council, on 5 May [S/2003/525], informed the Secretary-General that it had decided to send a mission to the West African subregion from 15 to 23 May, and had agreed on the mission's terms of reference. Regarding the region as a whole, it would: demonstrate continuing Council interest in the subregion; encourage more cooperation among countries of the subregion (e.g., MRU and ECOWAS); review the activities of the Office of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for West Africa; examine the links between the conflicts in Liberia, Côte d'Ivoire and Sierra Leone and their impact on neighbouring countries; assess progress towards the protection of civilians and children affected by armed conflict; and emphasize the need for countries to respect human rights and international humanitarian law.

With regard to Sierra Leone, the mission would: assess the success of UNAMSIL; assess progress in the UNAMSIL drawdown and the ability of the national forces to provide security; assess the transition from peacekeeping to longer-term development; and examine how the Special Court and the Truth and Reconciliation Commission were addressing justice and reconciliation (see p. 213). In Liberia, the mission's mandate was to: urge the Government and rebel groups to engage in ceasefire negotiations and to implement Security Council resolutions; call on the Government to cooperate more with neighbouring countries; assess the Government's response to the Council's proposals for resolving the crisis; and assess the impact of UNOL and the Government's expectations of its new mandate (see p. 185). In Côte d'Ivoire, the mission would: urge all parties to respect the ceasefire and implement the January Linas-Marcoussis Agreement (see p. 166); discuss progress with the UN mission in Côte d'Ivoire; emphasize the need for respect for human rights; and consider security issues in western Côte d'Ivoire (see p. 169). The mission's mandate in respect to Guinea-Bissau was to: urge the Government and President Kumba Yalá to ensure that the forthcoming elections were conducted fairly; and urge the Government to endorse the partnership approach defined by the ad hoc advisory group of the Economic and Social Council (see p. 948).

On 28 May [S/2003/579], Mauritius, as Chairman of the African Group, welcomed the Security Council's decision to send missions to the Great Lakes region (see p. 109) and to West Africa, but expressed concern that the Council was considering excluding Guinea-Bissau from the countries to be visited.

Security Council mission. In its 7 July report on its mission to West Africa [S/2003/688], which it had postponed to 26 June to 5 July, the Security Council stated that it had visited Guinea-Bissau, Nigeria, Ghana, Côte d'Ivoire, Guinea and Sierra Leone. Although the mission was scheduled to visit Liberia, those plans were cancelled due to the conflict there, and it travelled instead to Accra, Ghana, where the parties to the Liberian peace talks, led by ECOWAS, were gathered. In addition to making observations on the subregion as a whole, the mission also made specific observations with regard to Côte d'Ivoire, Guinea-Bissau, Liberia and Sierra Leone (see below under country headings).

The mission took place when the stability of the subregion was particularly precarious. Although Sierra Leone was more stable than it had been at the time of the Council's 2000 mission [YUN 2000, p. 208], the situation in some other countries of the subregion had deteriorated. Côte d'Ivoire, which recently emerged from conflict, was struggling with implementing the Linas-Marcoussis peace agreement (see p. 176); Guinea-Bissau, although apparently peaceful, was at risk of falling back into conflict with postponements of the legislative elections, democratic freedoms threatened, economic regeneration inhibited and the National Assembly's powers usurped; and, most seriously, the conflict had intensified in Liberia, with hundreds of civilians killed even as peace talks were under way. The mission therefore concentrated on supporting efforts to improve the situation in those three countries.

The mission determined that the reasons for instability in West Africa were many, including abject poverty, poor standards of governance and irresponsible leadership in certain countries, illegal exploitation of natural resources and cross-border flows of small arms and mercenaries. An additional major factor was the persistent tendency of certain Governments, in particular Liberia, to exacerbate already existing tensions in neighbouring countries by meddling in domestic disputes and using proxies to undermine Governments. The mission believed that the Security Council, as agreed in resolution 1478(2003) (see p. 203), should consider ways to promote regional compliance by following up its demand that such interference, particularly the provision of weapons to armed groups in neighbouring countries, must cease. The mission called on the international community to step up support for ECOWAS, which was gaining experience in resolving crises, promoting better governance, sub-regional economic integration, observance of human rights and international humanitarian law and implementation of peace agreements. The mission recommended that the Secretary-General's Special Representative for West Africa, Ahmedou Ould-Abdallah, undertake, in conjunction with the ECOWAS Executive Secretary, a study of ways in which the international community could increase cooperation with, and strengthen the capacity of, ECOWAS. The study should make practical proposals for helping ECOWAS to address subregional problems such as the flows of small arms and mercenaries and the use of child soldiers. In the meantime, the Security Council would benefit from more regular exchanges with the ECOWAS Executive Secretary and invited him to transmit ECOWAS reports to the Council.

A major disadvantage for troop-contributing countries of ECOWAS-led peacekeeping operations was that, unlike UN peacekeeping forces, there was no automatic reimbursement for deployment costs. The mission recommended that the international community give priority to providing timely and adequate funds and materiel for ECOWAS peacekeeping forces. The mission shared the ECOWAS view that a concerted regional approach was needed for stability, and called for additional resources for the new Office of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for West Africa, based in Dakar, Senegal. It also recommended that an officer from the Special Representative's Office be co-located at ECOWAS headquarters. The mission also recommended that donors consider the funding proposals made by the Economic Commission for Africa (ECA) for strengthening the MRU secretariat and for economic initiatives among MRU countries. Donor assistance, from both the UN system and Member States, was needed for the security sector (expert assistance, training and funding).

The mission was encouraged by the ECOWAS stance regarding the non-recognition of groups taking power by force, as well as insistence on respect for constitutional legality, the rule of law and human rights.

As to the ready availability of weapons, the mission recommended that Member States should take steps to stem arms sales to countries under Security Council embargoes. Council sanctions committees should monitor national efforts to investigate and prosecute sanctions violators. The mission recommended that the United Nations and ECOWAS propose measures to strengthen the 1998 ECOWAS moratorium on small arms and light weapons [YUN 1998, p. 525], as proposed in Council resolution 1467(2003) (see p. 161), through establishing mechanisms for verification and information exchange. Halting mercenaries' activities was another area requiring international action.

Before departing for the subregion, the mission was briefed on the desperate human rights and humanitarian situations there. The mission stressed that the principle of no impunity had to be upheld, and that the Council would consider imposing serious measures against Governments and groups that consistently committed human rights abuses or violated international humanitarian law. It urged the parties to conflict to prosecute those responsible for the recruitment of children, requested the Secretary-General's representatives in the subregion to monitor the protection of children and of women from sexual and other types of violence, called on donors to make further contributions for the protection of refugees, and expressed the hope that the Office of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for West Africa would undertake collaborative efforts with other UN bodies to devise a practical regional approach to unemployment, which was a perennial source of instability. The issues of peace and security and of sustainable development in Africa should be jointly pursued through strengthened cooperation by the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council.

Security Council action. On 25 July [meeting 4794], the Security Council considered the reports of its missions to Central Africa (see p. 109) and to West Africa (above). In statement S/PRST/2003/12 (see p. 109) of the same date, the Council endorsed the recommendations contained in the two reports. It looked forward to further collaboration with other organizations, including ECOWAS, and intended to review progress in implementing the recommendations in December.

Report of Secretary-General. In a 5 December report [S/2003/1147], the Secretary-General described progress made in implementing the recommendations of the Security Council mission to West Africa (above). The report highlighted the steps taken or envisaged in implementing the recommendations concerning Côte d'Ivoire, Guinea-Bissau, Liberia and Sierra Leone (see below), and presented a preliminary assessment of practical ways to address cross-border issues.

As to strengthening cooperation with ECOWAS, the Special Representative for West Africa was engaged in consultations with ECOWAS in that regard and a joint UNDP/UN Office for West Africa/European Commission mission would shortly visit ECOWAS headquarters in Abuja, Nigeria, and the four zonal observation and monitoring bureaux in order to undertake an assessment of ECOWAS capacity in early warning, conflict prevention and peace-building, as a key element in preparing the study requested by the Security Council mission. A focal point for ECOWAS matters would be designated within the Office for West Africa. The Special Representative had also been asked to explore with ECOWAS possible areas for cooperation to address the challenges in implementing the moratorium on small arms and light weapons. The Secretary-General expected to submit to the Council a separate report on such cross-border issues as the use of mercenaries and child soldiers and the spread of small arms. He was exploring ways of strengthening the Office for West Africa, reactivating MRU, promoting security sector reform, developing a framework for regional disarmament, demobilization and reintegration, mainstreaming into all UN activities in the subregion the protection of children and women against sexual violence and exploitation, and adopting a regional approach to youth employment.

The Secretary-General observed that the cross-border issues identified by the Council mission to West Africa were at the core of instability in the subregion. The Special Representative would work with UN presences in the subregion and other partners to form a strategy to address those issues, which would include the utilization of the comparative advantages of all the organizations concerned and the possibility of developing co-operative arrangements between them and the UN Office for West Africa.

Côte d'Ivoire

In 2003, political factions in Côte d'Ivoire reached agreement on the creation of a Government of National Reconciliation in the wake of an attempted coup d'état in September 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 180]. The parties signed an agreement in Linas-Marcoussis, France, on 28 January 2003, which established a mechanism for power sharing, defined the tasks of the new Government and called for national elections in 2005. Although some progress was made in fulfilling the terms of the agreement, the parties continued to disagree over power-sharing arrangements, and thus, further implementation of the agreement was delayed. The ministers nominated by the rebel movements did not take up their posts, claiming that their personal security was at risk. In the meantime, both France and ECOWAS maintained peacekeeping forces in Côte d'Ivoire. The three main rebel movements, which formed an umbrella group called the Forces nouvelles, retained control of the northern half of the country and the Government had control of the south.

The Security Council, acting on the Secretary-General's proposal for a peacekeeping force, established on 13 May the United Nations Mission in Côte d'Ivoire (MINUCI) at an initial strength of 255 military and civilian personnel. Its mandate was to facilitate the implementation of the Linas-Marcoussis agreement and complement the operations of the French and ECOWAS forces. A small civilian staff was assigned to support the Special Representative of the Secretary-General on political, legal, electoral, humanitarian and human rights issues, among others.

Further progress was made in the peace process, including the adoption of a plan for disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of forces; the opening of dialogue between the national forces and the Forces nouvelles, resulting in a declaration on 4 July proclaiming the end of the war; the extension of the ceasefire line to western areas not previously covered; and the adoption of an amnesty law. Nevertheless, the Forces nouvelles withdrew from the Government of National Reconciliation in September in protest over the President's appointments of the Ministers of Defence and National Security, and sporadic fighting ensued.

The subsequent stalemate in the peace process led to a deterioration of the situation, in particular in the northern provinces where a state of lawlessness prevailed for several months. In December, President Laurent Gbagbo said that priority should be given to the programme of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration, and, at his initiative, it was agreed to resume preparations for that programme and the situation improved. The withdrawal of heavy weapons from the zone of confidence began on 13 December and was verified by a joint UN-ECOWAS team. On 23 December, the Forces nouvelles announced that the group had decided to end its suspension of participation in the Government.

Appointment. On 7 February [S/2003/168], the Secretary-General informed the Security Council of his decision to appoint Albert Tévoedjré (Benin) as his Special Representative for Côte d'Ivoire. The Council, on 12 February [S/2003/169], took note of his decision.

Human rights situation

Human rights mission

By a 24 January letter [S/2003/90], the Secretary-General transmitted to the Security Council the report of the human rights fact-finding mission to Côte d'Ivoire (23-29 December 2002), led by the Deputy High Commissioner for Human Rights, Bertrand Ramcharan. In statement S/PRST/2002/42 of 20 December 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 181], the Council had welcomed the Secretary-General's decision to dispatch a human rights team to gather precise information about violations of human rights and international humanitarian law.

The mission identified several human rights-related issues that were at the root of the conflict: the difficult process of transition to multiparty democracy after three decades of guided democracy under a one-party State; the essence of nationhood and the contested concept of "ivoirité" (involving the rights of migrants to vote, citizenship, nationality and the right to be elected to high office in Côte d'Ivoire, a prosperous country that had become home to millions of neighbouring nationals); the qualifications to hold the highest office in the land; the right of long-term residents to enjoy their property and possessions in the rural areas and to pass on such property to their heirs; and the right of long-term migrants to become nationals of their adopted country on a basis of equality. A related issue was the new Constitution adopted in 2002, which defined requirements for presidential candidates (a candidate had to be of Ivorian origin with Ivorian parents) and consequently excluded a number of potential candidates.

The recent conflict had given rise to a substantial flow of internally displaced persons, estimated at over 600,000, the vast majority of them women and children. Many migrants wished to return to their countries of origin but their repatriation was made difficult by the numerous combat zones. Almost 72,000 refugees had taken refuge in Côte d'Ivoire, 60,000 of them in the north near the border with Liberia.

The mission stated that the human rights problems in Côte d'Ivoire existed in both the areas under the control of the rebels and those under the control of government forces. It had compiled information dealing with violations of the right to life, detentions and arbitrary arrests, forced disappearances, acts of torture and other inhuman and degrading treatment, treatment of children, acts of incitement to hatred and xenophobia, violations of the freedom of expression and opinion and damage to public and private property.

The mission made a number of recommendations to ensure respect for human rights, including: agreement by all parties on a human rights platform, along with a general ceasefire; investigations into grave breaches of human rights and humanitarian law and no impunity for those breaches; the bringing to justice of members of death squads; a commitment by all parties to the establishment of a truth and reconciliation commission, a national human rights action plan, an independent national commission on human rights and an independent media commission; the establishment of an independent organ to deal with relations between the army and civilians in the context of army reform; a national consensus on a national constitution, and on the law regarding ownership of rural property; an independent assessment of the question of nationality; and an independent review of electoral laws from the point of view of international human rights norms regarding the right of all citizens to participate in politics.

Communication. Côte d'Ivoire, on 5 March [A/57/739-S/2003/338], described the mission's report as based on an ambiguous mandate, lacking rigour in its analysis of the facts, full of inaccuracies and biased. It stated that the mission had sanctioned the argument of force as a fait accompli, to the detriment of the requirements of democracy and human rights.

Further developments

The Secretary-General, in his 26 March report on Côte d'Ivoire [S/2003/374 & Corr.1] (see p. 169), said that since the human rights mission more violations of human rights had taken place, including the looting and destruction of private property during the violent demonstrations that ensued after the signing of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement (see below) and a resurgence in violence against the media, in particular the attacks on the premises of a newspaper and a radio station. Also, a well-known actor had been abducted and murdered, allegedly by death squads, and 60 villagers were reported to have been killed by Liberian mercenaries.

Côte d'Ivoire, in a letter of 21 May [S/2003/575] to the Security Council, transmitted the statement it made to the Commission on Human Rights, outlining its efforts to promote human rights. It repeated its invitation to the special rapporteurs on discrimination, torture and displaced persons to visit Côte d'Ivoire as soon as the territory was completely liberated.

Peacemaking efforts

A number of organizations and States undertook efforts to support Côte d'Ivoire in restoring peace and security. On 16 January [S/2003/51], Togo forwarded to the Security Council a ceasefire agreement between the Government of Côte d'Ivoire, the Ivorian Popular Movement of the Great West and the Movement for Justice and Peace, signed at Lomé, Togo, on 13 January under the auspices of President Gnassingbé Eyadema of Togo, who was coordinator of the ECOWAS high-level Contact Group on the crisis in Côte d'Ivoire. Those two organizations were thus joining the Patriotic Movement of Côte d'Ivoire, which had already signed a ceasefire agreement in October 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 181]. Under the agreement, the parties agreed to cease hostilities so that a comprehensive peace agreement could be negotiated and to accept the deployment of ECOWAS troops and other personnel in the buffer zone during the ceasefire. They also agreed to ensure freedom of movement of persons and property, and of humanitarian agencies and displaced persons.

The ECOWAS high-level contact group on the crisis in Côte d'Ivoire (Lomé, 20 January) forwarded to the Security Council a communiqué [S/2003/75] in which it urged Ivorians to work hard to strengthen national unity and noted the initiative of the French Government to hold a round table of all the protagonists in the crisis and organize a summit of countries concerned.

Linas-Marcoussis Agreement

At the invitation of the President of France, Jacques Chirac, a round table of 10 Ivorian political groups was held at Linas-Marcoussis, France, from 15 to 23 January. The round table was chaired by the Chairman of the French Constitutional Commission, Pierre Mazeaud, assisted by Judge Keba Mbaye (Senegal) and the former Prime Minister of Côte d'Ivoire, Seydou Diarra, with representatives of the AU, ECOWAS and the United Nations as facilitators. The round table adopted the 23 January Linas-Marcoussis Agreement, which France transmitted to the Security Council on 27 January [S/2003/99], along with the conclusions of the Conference of Heads of State on Côte d'Ivoire (Paris, 25-26 January), which was chaired jointly by the President of France, the AU Chairman and the UN Secretary-General, and attended by the heads of State of concerned African countries and representatives of numerous international organizations.

The round table welcomed the ceasefire made possible and guaranteed by the deployment of ECOWAS forces, supported by French troops, and demanded strict compliance with it. It called for the release of all political prisoners. Stressing the need to restore the authority of the State, it recalled its commitment to democratic accession to and exercise of power. To that end, it agreed that a Government of National Reconciliation would be set up immediately to ensure a return to peace and stability. It would be charged with strengthening the independence of the justice system, restoring the administration and public services and rebuilding the country. The new Government would be led by a consensus Prime Minister appointed by the President, in consultation with other political parties. The Prime Minister, whose mandate would last until the next national elections, scheduled for 2005, would not be eligible to run for office in those elections. The Government would be responsible for restructuring the defence and security forces and for organizing the regrouping and disarmament of all armed groups.

An annex to the Agreement set out a programme for resolving issues that constituted the root causes of instability in Côte d'Ivoire, such as the question of citizenship, the status of foreign nationals, the electoral system, eligibility to run for the presidency, the land tenure regime, incitement to hatred and xenophobia by certain media, the creation of a human rights commission consisting of representatives from all parties, regrouping, disarming and demobilizing and economic recovery and the need for social cohesion.

During the heads of State meeting, President Laurent Gbagbo, in consultation with other Ivorian parties, appointed the former Prime Minister, Seydou Diarra, to head the new Government of National Reconciliation.

The peace agreement provided for the establishment of a committee to follow up on the implementation of the Agreement (the Monitoring Committee). It was composed of representatives of the United Nations, the AU, ECOWAS, the EU, the European Commission, the International Organization of la Francophonie, the Bretton Woods institutions, the Group of Eight industrialized countries, a representative of the troop-contributing countries and France.

Both the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement and the conclusions adopted by the heads of State on 26 January envisaged a UN role in the implementation of the Agreement, including participating in and chairing the Monitoring Committee. The Agreement stipulated that the new Government would seek assistance from ECOWAS, France and the United Nations in guaranteeing the reform and restructuring of the defence and security forces. In their communiqué, the heads of State proposed strengthening the UN presence in Côte d'Ivoire, in particular in security, humanitarian assistance and human rights, as well as the deployment of civilian and military observers, who would help to supervise the implementation of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement. They also expressed the wish that the Security Council would endorse the peacekeeping operation launched by ECOWAS and France, and authorize that operation to ensure the freedom of movement and security of its personnel, and to guarantee the protection of civilians facing the imminent threat of violence.

Press statement (28 January). In a 28 January press statement [SC/7646-AFR/551], Council members expressed satisfaction with the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement and urged the parties to implement it and to avoid further violence. They welcomed ongoing efforts to deploy the ECOWAS Military Observer Group (ECOMOG) force, under Senegalese command, and appealed to the international community to lend its support. They also expressed appreciation for the efforts of the AU to bring about a settlement and thanked France for its diplomatic efforts and military deployment. They expressed the wish for United Nations support in the implementation of the peace process, and stated their intention to consider promptly the Secretary-General's recommendations to that end.

Communications. ECOWAS, at its twenty-sixth ordinary summit (Dakar, Senegal, 31 January), issued a statement on Côte d'Ivoire [S/2003/141], expressing concern over the persistence of the Ivorian crisis and resolving to support the outcome of the Linas-Marcoussis round table. It was decided that ECOWAS would play the role assigned to it within the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement, and that the ECOWAS Contact Group (Ghana, Guinea-Bissau, Mali, Niger, Nigeria, Senegal, Togo) would continue to monitor and facilitate the application of the Agreement.

The AU Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution, at its seventh ordinary session held at the level of heads of State and Government (Addis Ababa, 3 February) [S/2003/142], welcomed the signing of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement and mandated ECOWAS to continue the initiatives taken by leaders of the region to bring peace to Côte d'Ivoire. It condemned the violations of human rights committed against the civilian populations and urged all the parties to respect human rights and international humanitarian law.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (February)

On 4 February [meeting 4700], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1464 (2003). The draft [S/2003/140] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its strong commitment to the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and unity of Côte d'Ivoire,

Recalling the importance of the principles of good-neighbourliness, non-interference and regional co-operation,

Recalling also the decision taken by the Economic Community of West African States Summit, held in Accra on 29 September 2002, to deploy a peacekeeping force in Côte d'Ivoire,

Recalling its full support for the efforts of the Economic Community of West African States to promote a peaceful settlement of the conflict, and also appreciating the efforts of the African Union to reach a settlement,

Welcoming the convening, at the invitation of France, of the Round Table of Ivorian political forces, held in Linas-Marcoussis from 15 to 23 January 2003, and the Conference of Heads of State on Côte d'Ivoire, held in Paris on 25 and 26 January 2003,

Welcoming also the statement issued on 31 January 2003 following the twenty-sixth ordinary Summit of the Heads of State and Government of the Economic Community of West African States, held in Dakar, as well as the communiqué issued on 3 February 2003 following the seventh ordinary session of the Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution of the African Union, held at the level of heads of State and Government in Addis Ababa,

Noting the existence of challenges to the stability of Côte d'Ivoire, and determining that the situation in Côte d'Ivoire constitutes a threat to international peace and security in the region,

1. Endorses the agreement signed by the Ivorian political forces in Linas-Marcoussis, France, on 23 January 2003 ("the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement") and adopted by the Conference of Heads of State on Côte d'Ivoire, and calls upon all Ivorian political forces to implement it fully and without delay;

2. Notes the provisions in the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement for the formation of a Government of National Reconciliation, and calls upon all Ivorian political forces to work with the President and the Prime Minister towards the establishment of a balanced and stable Government;

3. Also notes the provisions in the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement for the establishment of a Monitoring Committee, calls upon all the members of that Committee to monitor closely compliance with the terms of the Agreement, and urges all parties to cooperate fully with the Committee;

4. Expresses its gratitude to the Secretary-General for the vital role he has played in the smooth conduct of these meetings, and encourages him to continue to contribute to a final settlement of the Ivorian crisis;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council at the earliest possible date recommendations on how the United Nations could support fully the implementation of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement, in accordance with the request by the Round Table of Ivorian political forces and by the Conference of Heads of State on Côte d'Ivoire, and declares its readiness to take appropriate measures on the basis of these recommendations;

6. Welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to appoint a Special Representative for Côte d'Ivoire, based in Abidjan, and requests him to do so as soon as possible;

7. Condemns violations of human rights and international humanitarian law that have taken place in Côte d'Ivoire since 19 September 2002 and stresses the need to bring to justice those responsible, and urges all parties, including the Government, to take all necessary steps to prevent further violations of human rights and international humanitarian law, in particular against civilians regardless of their origin;

8. Welcomes the deployment of forces of the Economic Community of West African States and French troops with a view to contributing to a peaceful solution of the crisis and, in particular, to the implementation of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement;

9. Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, and in accordance with the proposal contained in paragraph 14 of the conclusions of the Conference of Heads of State on Côte d'Ivoire, authorizes Member States participating in the forces of the Economic Community of West African States in accordance with Chapter VIII of the Charter together with the French forces supporting them to take the necessary steps to guarantee the security and freedom of movement of their personnel and to ensure, without prejudice to the responsibilities of the Government of National Reconciliation, the protection of civilians immediately threatened with physical violence within their zones of operation, using the means available to them, for a period of six months, after which the Council will assess the situation on the basis of the reports referred to in paragraph 10 below and decide whether to renew this authorization;

10. Requests the Economic Community of West African States, through the command of its force, and France to report to the Council periodically, through the Secretary-General, on all aspects of the implementation of their respective mandates;

11. Calls upon all States neighbouring Côte d'Ivoire to support the peace process by preventing any action that might undermine the security and territorial integrity of Côte d'Ivoire, particularly the movement of armed groups and mercenaries across their borders and illicit trafficking and proliferation of arms in the region, including small arms and light weapons;

12. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Press statement (21 February). In a 21 February press statement [SC/7668-AFR/566], Security Council members expressed satisfaction that the Monitoring Committee of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement was fully operational, under the chairmanship of the Secretary-General's Special Representative for Côte d'Ivoire. They called on all Ivorian political forces to implement the Agreement without delay and to cooperate with the Monitoring Committee to that end. They encouraged the newly appointed Prime Minister to continue his efforts towards establishing a balanced and stable Government. Members expressed concern at the humanitarian and economic consequences of the Ivorian crisis for the whole region and called on all parties to respect human rights and international humanitarian law for the entire population regardless of its origin. They expressed support for ECOWAS forces and the French forces supporting them and called on Member States to provide financial and logistical support to the ECOWAS forces.

Political developments and renewed fighting

Communication. On 5 March [A/57/754-S/2003/313], Côte d'Ivoire forwarded to the Secretary-General the text of an address by President Gbagbo concerning the Ivorian crisis. The President affirmed that it was never the intention of those who drafted the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement that the national army, gendarmerie and police should be disarmed, nor had he formed a Government, despite the recent claims by certain individuals that they were ministers. He observed that the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement was a compromise text that, in part, contradicted the Constitution of Côte d'Ivoire; it attempted, in places, to edge the presidential regime in the direction of a parliamentary regime. The President intended to retain all the prerogatives assigned to him under the Constitution. In the event of contradiction between the Agreement and the Constitution, he would apply the Constitution; otherwise, he would work for the implementation of the Agreement.

Press statement (14 March). In a 14 March press statement [SC/7691-AFR/582], Security Council members, having been briefed by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Côte d'Ivoire, welcomed the first meeting of the Government of National Reconciliation and called on all the parties to participate in subsequent meetings. They called on all parties to implement the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement without delay and on the Government to draw up a timetable for implementation. Council members noted with satisfaction the ECOWAS decision to ensure the safety of all members of the Government of National Reconciliation. They condemned the renewal of fighting in the west of the country and the events that had transpired, in particular in Bangolo. They expressed concern that the fighting had essentially opposed Liberian combatants and called on the parties to desist from using children in the conflict. They also expressed concern at the deplorable humanitarian situation and called on all parties, in particular in the west, to allow relief agencies unimpeded access to civilian populations.

Report of Secretary-General (March). In response to Security Council resolution 1464(2003) (above), the Secretary-General submitted a 26 March report on Côte d'Ivoire [S/2003/374 & Corr.1]. He described the root problems of instability that stemmed from a protracted power struggle following the death of long-term President Félix Houphouët-Boigny in 1993. He stated that the current crisis had erupted in September 2002 with an attempted coup [YUN 2002, p. 180], which began with attacks by soldiers on military installations in the capital, Abidjan, and the second largest city, Bouaké, and in the northern town of Korhogo. While loyalist security forces regained control of Abidjan, rebels retained control of the northern half of the country, and allegations that foreign elements were supporting the rebels prompted harassment of foreigners, including migrant workers from neighbouring countries and refugees from Liberia and Sierra Leone. By the end of September, the rebel forces were operating under the umbrella of a political movement called the Patriotic Movement of Côte d'Ivoire (MPCI), which demanded the resignation of President Gbagbo, the holding of inclusive national elections, a review of the Constitution and an end to the domination by southerners of the country's affairs. The situation was further compounded by the emergence of two new armed groups—the Ivorian Popular Movement of the Great West (MPIGO) and the Movement for Justice and Peace (MJP)—which seized the towns of Danané and Man and demanded the President's resignation. Following a ceasefire agreement between the Government and MPCI in October 2002, ECOWAS, in December, decided to deploy the ECOWAS Peace Force for Côte d'Ivoire (ECOFORCE).

In a fresh initiative, the Foreign Minister of France, Dominique de Villepin, visited Côte d'Ivoire in January 2003 and secured the agreement of all Ivorian political groups to attend a round-table meeting in France. ECOWAS brokered a ceasefire between the Government and MPIGO and MJP, and the signing of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement on 23 January followed (see p. 167).

The implementation of that Agreement encountered serious obstacles soon after it was signed. Newly appointed Prime Minister Diarra was unable to return immediately to Côte d'Ivoire because a series of often violent demonstrations erupted in Abidjan and other towns to protest the allocation of the Defence and Interior Ministries to rebel movements. Leaders of major political parties also rejected the allocation of those assignments, as did the President. The situation calmed down following an address to the nation by the President (see above).

Efforts by the ECOWAS Contact Group on Côte d'Ivoire to break the impasse on implementing the Agreement culminated in a summit meeting with President Gbagbo in Yamoussoukro on 10 February, attended by the Presidents of Togo, Ghana and Nigeria, the interim Chairman of the AU Commission and the Vice-President of South Africa. Mr. Diarra was installed as Prime Minister on that occasion. The meeting explored alternative arrangements for the allocation of posts in the new Government of National Unity that would be acceptable to all parties. The rebel movements refused to attend on the grounds that they did not wish to renegotiate the understandings already reached. Some progress towards breaking the stalemate was finally made at a meeting of the 10 signatories to the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement, convened by Ghana's President, John Agyekum Kufuor, the ECOWAS Chairman (Accra, 6-8 March), at which they agreed to create a 15-member National Security Council comprising representatives of each of the 10 signatories, as well as the army, the gendarmerie, the police, President Gbagbo and Prime Minister Diarra, to oversee the functioning of the two disputed ministries (Accra II Agreement). They requested the Prime Minister to submit candidates for the two ministries, who would be appointed by consensus, and they reached a new understanding on the allocation of the other cabinet posts. On 10 March, President Gbagbo issued a decree delegating authority to the Prime Minister to implement the work programme set out in the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement, but only for a six-month period. On 11 March, representatives of the rebel movements travelled to Yamoussoukro for talks with the President on the formation of the new Government.

A UN multidisciplinary technical assessment mission, headed by the Assistant Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations, Hédi Annabi, visited Côte d'Ivoire from 24 February to 7 March (see p. 183). Several stakeholders expressed the view to the mission that the understandings reached at the Paris summit concerning the power-sharing arrangement that allocated key cabinet posts to the rebel movements were primarily responsible for the impasse. It was widely felt that those understandings, known as the Kléber arrangements, should be separated from the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement, to which all parties had to remain committed. Another obstacle, in the view of many, was the President's reluctance to delegate to the Prime Minister the necessary authority to implement the Agreement. Implementation of other aspects of the Agreement hinged on installation of the Government. There was concern that a prolonged stalemate might lead to renewed hostilities and entrench the current de facto partition of the country. Security and protection of the Prime Minister and his cabinet was also a major concern. The ultimate challenge posed by the crisis was the 2005 elections. The new Government would have to decide how to tackle the issues relating to national identity, citizenship and the status of foreign nationals, the root cause of the crisis. Preparations for elections would be a key area for UN and other assistance.

The military situation in the country had been relatively stable since the ceasefire agreements between the Government and the three rebel movements came into effect. The majority of incidents reported to the assessment mission were more the result of independent action by local rebel commanders than part of any coordinated military action. The ceasefire remained precarious, however, and steps were needed to underpin it with a political settlement. The crisis in Côte d'Ivoire assumed regional dimensions as Liberia and Côte d'Ivoire exchanged accusations about cross-border attacks launched by armed elements from the other's territory. In addition to the two rebel movements operating in western Côte d'Ivoire, there were reports of rogue armed groups, consisting mainly of Liberian elements and some former Sierra Leonean combatants. In addition, both the rebel movements and the government forces were reported to have recruited Liberian nationals.

French forces, numbering approximately 3,900, had been fundamental to maintaining the ceasefire in Côte d'Ivoire. Under arrangements for the deployment of ECOFORCE, French troops would pull back to assume a supporting role in all areas, except in the west where they would maintain their current deployment; they would also continue to provide a quick-reaction capability. ECOFORCE, with contingents from Benin, Ghana, the Niger, Senegal and Togo, was in the process of deploying a 1,300-member task force to monitor the ceasefire and to facilitate the movement of humanitarian agencies; however, logistical constraints were delaying full deployment. ECOWAS recommended that the force be increased to 3,411 troops, including 300 security personnel to protect the new Government. The assessment mission confirmed that no real planning had been done for the programme of disarmament, demobilization, repatriation, resettlement and reintegration of forces, as envisaged in the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement, principally because of the delay in the formation of the Government of National Reconciliation.

The humanitarian situation remained precarious, with population displacements, widespread human rights abuses and a deteriorating social and economic situation. An estimated 800,000 people were internally displaced, and up to 400,000 had fled the country. UNHCR was concerned about Liberian refugees in the country, in the wake of growing hostility against Liberian nationals who were seen as a security threat. There were reports of continuing recruitment of child soldiers. In view of the security situation, UN staff in Côte d'Ivoire were greatly reduced in late 2002, so that only 82 essential staff remained in the country. The Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA), UNHCR, OIICHR, the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), the World Food Programme (WFP), the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), the World Health Organization (WHO), UNDP and the International Organization for Migration (IOM) were helping to address the humanitarian consequences of the conflict.

The assessment mission also suggested options for UN action in the military sphere: establishing a military advisory team in the Special Representative's office; deploying a military liaison group that would be co-located with the French and ECOWAS field headquarters; deploying military observers throughout the country; and launching a fully fledged peacekeeping operation. The mission was of the opinion that the United Nations could play a role complementing the operations of the French and ECOWAS forces, and the Secretary-General supported the second option of sending in a military liaison group of 76 personnel, comprising a headquarters team and liaison teams at the location of each of the three rebel movements (MPCI, MFIGO and MJP) and at the main locations of the national army of Côte d'Ivoire (FANCI) and the French and ECOWAS forces. The other options would be reviewed as the situation developed. Civilian activities would include assistance for the electoral process and a human rights component. In the meantime, a civil affairs component in the office of the Special Representative would be set up immediately.

The Secretary-General stated that the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement offered the best chance for the Ivorian people to resolve the conflict peacefully. However, disagreements over power-sharing arrangements had delayed implementation and prolonged the suffering of the population. Although the new Government had met twice, the ministers nominated by the rebel movements had not taken up their posts in protest over their personal security and the responsibility for the fighting in the western part of the country. In the Secretary-General's view, priority should be given to providing security to members of the Government. He expressed concern about the logistical constraints facing the ECOWAS force, and appealed to donors to provide the necessary resources to assist in protecting the new Government. He underlined the need for the international community to pay more attention to the interlinkages of the conflicts in the region. In particular, the interaction between the conflict in Liberia and the developments in Côte d'Ivoire and Sierra Leone called for steps to resolve the Liberian conflict, which was increasingly becoming the source of continuing instability in the wider region. His Special Representative for West Africa would examine the impact of the various aspects of the Côte d'Ivoire crisis on the sub-region and explore ways of addressing them. The Special Representative for Côte d'Ivoire, having convened several meetings of the Monitoring Committee, would devise a coordination mechanism for a UN response within Côte d'Ivoire. Once the Government of National Reconciliation was functional, it should develop a work programme for implementing the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement, thus enabling the United Nations and others to determine assistance they could provide to accomplish the key tasks, including the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of armed groups, preparations for the national elections and reconstruction of the country. In the meantime, the Secretary-General recommended that the Security Council approve his proposed arrangements for UN support to the Ivorian peace process and that a UN mission in Côte d'Ivoire, to be called the Mission des Nations Unies en Côte d'Ivoire (MINUCI), be established for that purpose. That mission would be headed by his Special Representative who would have overall authority for coordinating UN system activities in the country.

In an 11 April addendum [S/2003/374/Add.1] to his report, the Secretary-General said that the financial implications for establishing MINUCI were projected at $26.9 million for a 12-month period. That amount would cover the deployment of 255 military and civilian personnel, consisting of 76 military liaison officers, 85 international and 89 national staff and 5 UN Volunteers, plus related operational costs.

Press statements (March/April). In a 28 March press statement [SC/7714-APR/592], Security Council members expressed concern about incidents that took place in Daloa on 26 March during a demonstration organized by the "Jeunes Patriotes" and called on the Ivorian authorities to ensure that such incidents did not recur. Members reaffirmed support for the ECOWAS and French forces in their efforts to implement the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement. They condemned the recruitment of mercenaries by any of the parties and requested that an investigation of the violations of human rights in Côte d'Ivoire, in particular the massacres, be conducted. They stressed that neighbouring States should work to prevent the supply of mercenaries who further destabilized Côte d'Ivoire.

On 15 April [SC/7732-APR/603], Council members welcomed the new decree delegating powers to the Prime Minister and the progressive formation of the Government of National Reconciliation. They expressed concern about recent violations of the ceasefire and the use of mercenaries, other foreign-armed elements and forced recruitment, including recruitment of children, and demanded that all parties refrain from those practices.

Communications (April). On 22 April [S/2003/472], Ghana forwarded to the Security Council the report of the ECOWAS Mission in Côte d'Ivoire (ECOMICI) and the Force Commander's operational review. Working in cooperation with the French force, Operation Unicorn, ECOMICI's mission was to ensure security by separating former belligerents in the centre of the country along the ceasefire line and by providing security for the authorities of the new Government at Yamoussoukro and Abidjan. At its current strength of 1,300 troops, ECOMICI had insufficient human, technical and financial resources, and it was recommended that the force level be raised in phases to 3,205 troops.

President Gbagbo, in an 11 April letter to the Chairman of the Monitoring Committee for the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement, which was transmitted to the Security Council on 22 April

[S/2003/470], stated that the rebels were stepping up their attacks on all fronts, and he urged the ECOWAS and French forces to take forceful action against the attackers. On 28 April [S/2003/510], Côte d'Ivoire described the Government's efforts to implement the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement and expressed concern at the lack of interest of the international community with regard to the numerous violations of the Agreement, in particular the ceasefire. Since the crisis began, it said, the Council had not issued any statements condemning the atrocities committed in the occupied areas.

Security Council consideration. On 29 April [meeting 4746], the Security Council considered the situation in Côte d'Ivoire. The Secretary-General said that ECOWAS had found it necessary to increase substantially the size of ECOFORCE, and he appealed to the international community to provide it with the additional financial resources required for the next six months. In order to complement the peacekeeping efforts of ECOWAS and France, he had recommended the establishment of a small UN operation to strengthen the UN role in the Ivorian peace process (see above).

Ghana said that the ECOWAS mandate had been expanded from monitoring the ceasefire to include protecting the new Government, patrolling the borders, demobilizing and disarming the various militias, and creating the conditions to enable the new Government to control the national territory, for which it needed financial assistance. Côte d'Ivoire said that it would abide by all its international commitments. It warned that, despite the Government's efforts, the situation continued to be fragile, particularly in the western part of the country where there were rebels from Liberia and Sierra Leone. On the diplomatic level, the heads of State of Côte d'Ivoire and Liberia met on 27 April in Kara, Togo, and decided on the interposition of forces (Ivorian national forces, and forces from Liberia, ECOFORCE and France) along their joint border.

The Council, in a 29 April communiqué [S/PV.4747], welcomed the action taken by ECOWAS to resolve the Côte d'Ivoire crisis and supported its appeal for logistical and financial support for ECOFORCE.

Establishment of MINUCI

Acting on the Secretary-General's recommendation contained in his 26 March report (see p. 169), the Security Council, on 13 May, established the United Nations Mission in Côte d'Ivoire.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (May)

On 13 May [meeting 4754], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1479(2003). The draft [S/2003/539] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 1464(2003) of 4 February 2003, the statement by its President of 20 December 2002 (S/PRST/2002/42), as well as its resolutions 1460(2003) of 30 January 2003 and 1467(2003) of 18 March 2003,

Reaffirming its strong commitment to the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and unity of Côte d'Ivoire, and reaffirming its opposition to any attempts to seize power by unconstitutional means,

Recalling the importance of the principles of good-neighbourliness, non-interference and regional co-operation,

Recalling its full support for the efforts of the Economic Community of West African States and France to promote a peaceful settlement of the conflict, and reiterating its appreciation for the efforts of the African Union to reach a settlement,

Reaffirming its endorsement of the agreement signed by the Ivorian political forces at Linas-Marcoussis, France, on 23 January 2003 ("the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement") and approved by the Conference of Heads of State on Côte d'Ivoire, held in Paris on 25 and 26 January 2003,

Noting with satisfaction the conclusions reached at the meeting held in Accra from 6 to 8 March 2003, under the chairmanship of the President of Ghana, the current presidency of the Economic Community of West African States,

Noting with satisfaction also the appointment of the Government of National Reconciliation and the cabinet meeting of 3 April 2003, attended by all the constituent political groups, in the presence of the Presidents of Ghana, Nigeria and Togo,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 26 March 2003 and the recommendations contained therein,

Noting the existence of challenges to the stability of Côte d'Ivoire, and determining that the situation in Côte d'Ivoire constitutes a threat to international peace and security in the region,

1. Reaffirms its strong support for the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, and approves his full authority for the coordination and conduct of all the activities of the United Nations system in Côte d'Ivoire;

2. Decides to establish, for an initial period of six months, a United Nations Mission in Côte d'Ivoire, with a mandate to facilitate the implementation by the Ivorian parties of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement, and including a military component on the basis of option (b) identified in the report of the Secretary-General, complementing the operations of the French forces and the forces of the Economic Community of West African States;

3. Approves the establishment of a small staff to support the Special Representative of the Secretary-General on political, legal, civil affairs, civilian police, elections, media and public relations, humanitarian and human rights issues, and the establishment of a military liaison group whose tasks shall include:

(a) Providing advice to the Special Representative on military matters;

(b) Monitoring the military situation, including the security of Liberian refugees, and reporting to the Special Representative thereon;

(c) Establishing liaison with the French and Economic Community of West African States forces for the purpose of advising the Special Representative on military and related developments;

(d) Establishing also liaison with the Forces armées nationales de Côte d'Ivoire and the Forces nouvelles, in order to build confidence and trust between the armed groups, in cooperation with the French and the forces of the Economic Community of West African States, in particular concerning helicopters and combat aircraft;

(e) Providing input to forward planning on disengagement, disarmament and demobilization and identifying future tasks, in order to advise the Government of Côte d'Ivoire and support the French and the forces of the Economic Community of West African States;

(f) Reporting to the Special Representative on the above issues;

4. Stresses that the military liaison group should be initially composed of twenty-six military officers and that up to fifty additional officers may be progressively deployed when the Secretary-General determines that there is a need and that security conditions permit;

5. Requests that, in addition to the recommendations made in the report of the Secretary-General regarding the organization of the Mission, in particular its reference to the human rights components of the Mission, special attention be given to the gender component within the staff of the Mission and to the situation of women and girls, consistent with resolution 1325(2000) of 31 October 2000;

6. Renews its appeal to all Ivorian political forces to implement fully and without delay the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement, and invites the Government of National Reconciliation to this end to develop a timetable for implementing the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement and to communicate this timetable to the Monitoring Committee;

7. Recalls the importance of sparing no effort, in keeping with the spirit of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement, to enable the Government of National Reconciliation fully to exercise its mandate during this transitional period;

8. Emphasizes again the need to bring to justice those responsible for the serious violations of human rights and international humanitarian law that have taken place in Côte d'Ivoire since 19 September 2002, and reiterates its demand that all Ivorian parties take all the necessary measures to prevent further violations of human rights and international humanitarian law, particularly against civilian populations whatever their origins;

9. Stresses the importance of an early start to the process of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration;

10. Requests all Ivorian parties to cooperate with the Mission in the execution of its mandate, to ensure the freedom of movement of its personnel throughout the country and the unimpeded and safe movement of the personnel of humanitarian agencies, and to support efforts to find safe and durable solutions for refugees and displaced persons;

11. Requests the forces of the Economic Community of West African States and the French forces, in the execution of their mandate in accordance with resolution 1464(2003), to continue to work in close consultation with the Special Representative and the Monitoring Committee, and to continue to report to the Council periodically on all aspects of the implementation of their respective mandates;

12. Welcomes the complete ceasefire reached on 3 May 2003 between the Forces armées nationales de Côte d'Ivoire and the Forces nouvelles for the entire territory of Côte d'Ivoire, in particular the west, and welcomes the intention of the forces of the Economic Community of West African States and the French forces to lend their full support in the implementation of this ceasefire;

13. Renews its appeal to all the States in the region to support the peace process by refraining from any action that might undermine the security and territorial integrity of Côte d'Ivoire, particularly the movement of armed groups and mercenaries across their borders and the illicit trafficking and proliferation in the region of arms, especially small arms and light weapons;

14. Urges all Ivorian parties to refrain from any recruitment or use of mercenaries or foreign military units, and expresses its intention to consider possible actions to address this issue;

15. Demands that, in accordance with its resolution 1460(2003), all parties to the conflict who are recruiting or using children in violation of the international obligations applicable to them immediately halt such recruitment or use of children;

16. Emphasizes again the urgent need to provide logistic and financial support to the forces of the Economic Community of West African States, including through an appropriate trust fund established by the Economic Community of West African States to this effect, and calls upon the member States to provide substantial international aid to meet the emergency humanitarian needs and permit the reconstruction of the country, and in this context stresses that the return of internally displaced persons, particularly to the north of the country, would be important for the process of reconstruction;

17. Stresses the importance of the regional dimension of the conflict and its consequences for neighbouring States, and invites the donor community to help the neighbouring States to face the humanitarian and economic consequences of the crisis;

18. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council every three months on the implementation of the present resolution and to provide monthly updates;

19. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Pursuant to resolution 1479(2003) (above), the Secretary-General, on 29 May [S/2003/606], informed the Council of his intention to appoint Brigadier General Abdul Hafiz (Bangladesh) as Chief Military Liaison Officer of MINUCI, effective 4 June. Eighteen countries had agreed to provide military liaison officers for the initial group of 26 officers to be deployed to MINUCI. The Council, on 3 June [S/2003/607], took note of the information.

Press statement (3 June). In a 3 June press statement [SC/7776-AFR/681], the Council expressed satisfaction at the presentation to the National Assembly, by the Prime Minister, of a draft programme for implementing the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement. They also welcomed the start of discussions between FANCI and the Forces nouvelles (comprising MPCI, MPIGO and MJP) on arrangements for disarmament. They called on the parties to continue to take the Linas-Marcoussis process forward, particularly by appointing ministers for defence, the interior and women's affairs. Members welcomed the successful implementation, in particular in the west, of the complete ceasefire reached on 3 May. They expressed concern at the humanitarian situation in Côte d'Ivoire, especially regarding the situation of Liberian refugees who had recently crossed the border into Côte d'Ivoire.

MINUCI financing

In September [A/58/370], the Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly the budget for MINUCI for 13 May 2003 to 30 June 2004, which amounted to $29,881,700. The budget provided for the phased deployment of 76 military liaison officers, 76 international civilian personnel, including 7 United Nations Volunteers, and 81 national staff. Of the total amount, $1,009,700 was incurred for the period 13 May to 30 June 2003 from the amount of $1,746,200 previously authorized by ACABQ. The total resource requirements for MINUCI for 13 May 2003 to 30 June 2004 were linked to the Mission's objective through a number of results-based frameworks, grouped by components, namely, substantive civilian, military and support. ACABQ, in an October report [A/58/538], commented on the proposed budget. It urged the Mission to re-examine its structure, with a view to consolidating some units and revising grade levels. It recommended approval of $28,872,000 for the Mission for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004 and stated that it was for the Assembly to decide whether a special account would be established for MINUCI.

In October [A/58/535], the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General that MINUCI was not a peacekeeping operation. Therefore, the Department of Peacekeeping Operations was to administer MINUCI as a special political mission for budgetary and other purposes. In the course of upcoming consultations on the renewal of MINUCI's mandate, Council members would review its possible designation as a peacekeeping mission and would evaluate possible reinforcement of the UN presence in Côte d'Ivoire. The Secretary-General, taking note of the Council's view on the matter, said that, as the issue also related to the administrative and budgetary aspects of a UN field operation, he would transmit the matter to the Assembly. He also expressed the hope that the Council would reach an early agreement on reinforcing MINUCI. The Secretary-General and the Council President exchanged views on the status of MINUCI in letters transmitted on 29 October [A/C.5/58/12] to the Assembly's Fifth Committee, with the Secretary-General pointing out that the UN Charter assigned to the Assembly the responsibility of apportioning the expenses of the Organization.

In a 17 November note on the MINUCI budget [A/58/598], the Secretary-General reviewed what had transpired in regard to the MINUCI budget and noted that, on 13 November, the Council had extended the Mission's mandate until 4 February 2004. Consequently, he said, should the Assembly decide that the Mission should be financed under the regular budget, resources amounting to $13,865,700 gross ($13,414,500 net) for the period from 13 May to 31 December 2003 would be required for appropriation under the 2002-2003 biennium programme budget.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 23 December [meeting 79], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/58/586], adopted resolution 58/275 without vote [agenda items 120, 121 & 161].

Financing of the United Nations Mission in Côte d'Ivoire

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the budget for the United Nations Mission in Côte d'Ivoire for the period from 13 May 2003 to 30 June 2004, the note by the Secretary-General concerning the budget for the United Nations Mission in Côte d'Ivoire and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Having also considered the letter dated 27 October 2003 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the General Assembly and the letter dated 29 October 2003 from the President of the General Assembly addressed to the Chairman of the Fifth Committee regarding the United Nations Mission in Côte d'Ivoire,

1. Reaffirms in the context of the decision of the Security Council with respect to the financing of the United Nations Mission in Côte d'Ivoire, the role of the General Assembly, as set out in Article 17 of the Charter of the United Nations, as the organ to consider and approve the budget of the Organization, as well as the apportionment of its expenses among Member States;

2. Notes that the financing of the Mission up to now has been provided in accordance with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 49/233 A of 23 December 1994;

3. Decides, as a provisional and exceptional measure, to finance the Mission up to the expiration of its current mandate in accordance with the scale of assessments for the apportionment of the expenses of the United Nations under the regular budget;

4. Decides also that the issue of the most appropriate funding for the Mission upon the renewal of its mandate should be considered by the General Assembly at the first part of its resumed fifty-eighth session, in the context of established norms and practice;

5. Requests the President of the General Assembly to bring to the attention of the President of the Security Council the contents of the present resolution.

Also on 23 December, the Assembly decided that it would consider the agenda item on the financing of MINUCI at its resumed fifty-eighth (2004) session (decision 58/565).

Security Council mission to West Africa. In its 7 July report [S/2003/688], the Security Council mission to West Africa (see p. 162) commented and made recommendations on the situation in Côte d'Ivoire. It emphasized to all parties that strict implementation of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement was the only path acceptable to the international community. The ECOWAS Executive Secretary reported to the mission that there had been significant achievements since the 13 March inauguration of the Government of National Reconciliation. However, strong sentiments and opposition had been expressed by President Gbagbo's party on some issues, especially the question of amnesty for certain Forces nouvelles personnel. The mission also learned that the delay in appointing the ministers of defence and national security was a serious impediment to progress. While recognizing progress in implementing the Agreement, the mission warned that decisive action by President Gbagbo on a number of key issues was essential if a creeping deterioration in the situation was to be avoided. The mission encouraged all parties to take the required steps so that the programme of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration could proceed according to plan. In that connection, it suggested that MINUCI pay attention to the important lessons learned from a similar experience in Sierra Leone. The mission identified a number of areas where government action was needed, including the need to appoint ministers of defence and national security and the assured security of all government ministers. Emphasizing the importance of holding elections in 2005, the mission recommended that, at the appropriate time, the Council should support international involvement in the electoral process. The mission hoped that MINUCI would soon receive its full complement of staffing, especially in crucial areas such as the political and human rights components.

The Council, in presidential statement S/PRST/2003/12 of 25 July (see p. 109), endorsed the recommendations of the mission.

Implementation of Linas-Marcoussis Agreement

On 4 July, the Defence and Security Forces of Côte d'Ivoire and the Armed Forces of the Forces Nouvelles issued a Joint Declaration stating that the war was ended [S/2003/704]. Noting that the 3 May ceasefire had been observed, the two sides expressed support for the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement and the Accra arrangements, and affirmed that they were subordinate to the President and the Government of National Reconciliation. They recommended that the President appoint the ministers for defence and security, called for an amnesty law, urged an end to the rearmament of forces, and asked the population groups in Côte d'Ivoire to develop tolerance and respect for diversity.

Security Council consideration. Prime Minister Diarra, addressing the Council on 25 July [meeting 4793], described progress in implementing the Agreement and affirmed that ministers had been appointed and were working. He noted that the ceasefire agreement had been extended westward to the border with Liberia, the buffer zone between the two forces had been defined, and the cantonment areas—eight for the National Armed Forces and nine for the Forces nouvelles—had been designated. Relations with neighbouring countries had been normalized. He noted in particular official visits by ministers to Burkina Faso and Mali and by the Foreign Minister of Burkina Faso (see p. 179) and the President of Mali to Côte d'Ivoire. Safe transportation corridors to neighbouring countries had been opened. The Council of Ministers had adopted an amnesty bill which would be considered by the National Assembly on 4 August. The authority of the State had also been strengthened, as had security for political figures. Discussions on the appointment of ministers for defence and internal security were still ongoing. Côte d'Ivoire was seeking assistance from the Council for peacekeeping and from the international community for the reconstruction of the country's economy and infrastructure and for the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration (DDR) programme. That programme, for which a timetable had been drawn up, encompassed amnesty, grouping, disarmament, demobilization, reintegration and restructuring.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (July/August)

On 25 July, following consultations among Security Council members, the President made statement S/PRST/2003/11 on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council reiterates the need for Ivorian political forces to implement fully and without delay all the provisions of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement, as well as those of the agreement signed in Accra on 8 March 2003 ("Accra II"), with a view to open, free and transparent elections being held in 2005. The Council takes note with satisfaction of the formation of a Government of National Reconciliation and the progress made, particularly the identification of cantonment areas and the delegation of powers to the Prime Minister, and is looking forward to new progress in accordance with the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement. The Council also welcomes the Joint Declaration of the Defence and Security Forces of Côte d'Ivoire and the Armed Forces of the Forces Nouvelles of 4 July 2003.

The Council emphasizes, however, that much remains to be done to achieve the full implementation of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement. In this regard, the Council endorses the recommendations of its mission to West Africa. The Council calls upon Ivorian political forces to redouble their efforts in the following areas: voting for the amnesty bill submitted to the National Assembly by the Government, the complete implementation of a "disarmament, demobilization and reintegration" programme, the extension of public services and the authority of the State to areas still under the control of the Forces nouvelles, the appointment of ministers for defence and interior security, the guarantee of equal security for all ministers, the dismantling of militias throughout the country and the termination of the activities of mercenaries and of the purchase of weapons.

The Council renews its support and encouragement to the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Côte d'Ivoire. It asks him to keep the Council closely informed of developments towards the full implementation of the above objectives. It is pleased that the United Nations Mission in Côte d'Ivoire is now operational and hopes that it will soon be fully staffed, including in such crucial areas as the political and human rights components.

The Council reiterates its full support for the efforts of the Economic Community of West African States and France in contributing to a peaceful solution to the crisis. It welcomes in particular the satisfactory deployment of their peacekeeping forces in the western part of the country to support the implementation of the ceasefire reached on 3 May 2003. The Council calls upon Member States to continue to respond to the appeal made at the donors conference in Paris on 18 July 2003, attended by the Executive Secretary of the Economic Community of West African States and the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, and to provide logistic and financial support to the Economic Community of West African States Mission in Côte d'Ivoire so that it can continue to fulfil its important mandate.

The Council invites donor countries to contribute to the reconstruction of Côte d'Ivoire in compliance with the commitments undertaken at Kléber.

The Council expresses its concern at the continued existence of regional factors of instability, particularly the use of mercenaries and child soldiers, and the spread of small arms and light weapons, which prevent a lasting solution to the crisis in the region. The Council requests the Secretary-General to submit recommendations to the Council as soon as possible on ways to combat such subregional and cross-border problems, focusing in particular on better coordination of United Nations efforts.

The Council is convinced that a lasting solution to the problems of the subregion also requires genuine cooperation among all States concerned, together with confidence-building measures and the personal commitment of heads of State in the subregion.

On 4 August [meeting 4804], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1498(2003). The draft [S/2003/783] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 1464(2003) of 4 February 2003 and 1479(2003) of 13 May 2003, and the statement by its President of 25 July 2003,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General,

Reaffirming its strong commitment to the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and unity of Côte d'Ivoire,

Reaffirming the importance of the principles of good-neighbourliness, non-interference and regional cooperation,

Stressing the importance of the commitment of the Government of National Reconciliation to redeploy administration throughout the territory of Côte d'Ivoire,

Reaffirming the need to implement the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programme,

Welcoming the implementation of the United Nations Mission in Côte d'Ivoire, in accordance with its resolution 1479(2003),

Reaffirming its full support for the national reconciliation process in Côte d'Ivoire,

1. Decides to renew for a period of six months the authorization given to Member States participating in forces of the Economic Community of West African States together with French forces supporting them;

2. Requests the Economic Community of West African States, through the command of its force, and France to report to the Council periodically, through the Secretary-General, on all aspects of the implementation of their respective mandates;

3. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Report of Secretary-General (August). In response to Security Council resolution 1479(2003) (see p. 173), the Secretary-General, on 8 August, issued his first report on MINUCI [S/2003/801]. He stated that the security situation in Côte d'Ivoire had improved since his March report (see p. 169). Under the terms of the 3 May ceasefire signed by FIANCI and the Forces nouvelles, the French forces and the ECOWAS forces deployed to the western region jointly with FIANCI and the Forces nouvelles on 24 May to create a weapons-free zone of confidence, extend the ceasefire line to the border between Côte d'Ivoire and Liberia, and disarm or expel armed Liberian elements from that area. As a result of that deployment, the security situation in the inaccessible western region had significantly improved, resulting in the return of displaced villagers and the resumption of humanitarian activities. FIANCI and the Forces nouvelles had established a mechanism for conducting a dialogue on security issues, through which they reached agreement on specific cantonment areas for their respective troops. The two sides, together with the French and ECOWAS forces, set up joint headquarters in Bouaké and Bangolo to facilitate coordination among the quadripartite forces. Another significant development was the 4 July declaration by FIANCI and the Forces nouvelles formally proclaiming the end of the war and pledging loyalty to the President (see p. 176).

Remaining negative trends included militias opposing the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement and creating serious security and human rights challenges in the capital, political figures calling for a campaign of civil disobedience against Cabinet ministers affiliated with the Forces nouvelles, uncontrolled elements of the Forces nouvelles maintaining checkpoints along major roads in the north and Liberian elements maintaining a presence in the west. Both FIANCI and the Forces nouvelles were reported to be rearming, undermining the confidence between the two sides.

Efforts to implement the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement had yielded mixed results. On the positive side, the Government of National Reconciliation had been installed and was functioning under the leadership of the Prime Minister. On 28 May, the new Government presented its draft programme for implementing the Agreement for consideration by the National Assembly. It included proposals regarding citizenship, national identity and the status of foreign nationals; the electoral system; eligibility for election to the Presidency; land tenure laws; the media; rights and freedoms of the individual; economic recovery and social cohesion; and DDR. It envisaged mechanisms to develop proof of Ivorian nationality, including a national commission on naturalization to review existing laws, study legislation on the identification process in ECOWAS countries and recommend residence permit requirements for ECOWAS nationals and measures to improve the status of foreign nationals.

With respect to the electoral system, the Government planned to restructure the Independent Electoral Commission, introduce legislation on voter identification, review preparation of the voters' register and funding for political parties, and take measures to ensure the independence of the judiciary in adjudicating on electoral disputes. Regarding rights and freedoms of the individual, it was proposed to set up a National Human Rights Commission and establish an international commission to investigate cases of serious violations of human rights and humanitarian law. Legislation on the media and information was foreseen, including on freedom of the press and strengthened media regulatory bodies.

On 9 July, the Government announced a timetable for the DDR programme, in which the cantonment of forces would begin on 31 July and end by 15 August. The commencement of the disarmament component was delayed, however, because the Forces nouvelles linked it to the adoption of an amnesty law and the appointment of the defence and interior ministers. The amnesty law, as Côte d'Ivoire informed the Security Council [S/2003/810], was eventually adopted on 6 August for political acts against the security of the State from September 2000 to September 2002. Other steps towards implementation included the Government's efforts to extend State authority throughout the country and to restore public services in the north and west. The Government also initiated efforts to repair relations and to restore trade links with Burkina Faso and Mali, which had been disrupted during the conflict.

Despite such signs of progress, some members of the ruling party, the Front populaire ivoirien (FPI), still viewed the Agreement as non-workable and in conflict with certain provisions of the national Constitution and were attempting to undermine its implementation.

The Monitoring Committee, which had been meeting on a regular basis, considered grievances from all the political parties.

The group of 26 military liaison officers authorized under Council resolution 1479(2003) (see p. 173) were deployed to MINUCI on 23 June; the pace of further deployment would depend on security conditions.

Persistent violence and lack of security continued to undermine the protection of human rights throughout the country (see p. 165). In March, the Ministry of Human Rights was established. Another positive development was the Government's agreement in principle to visits by the special rapporteurs of the Commission on Human Rights on contemporary forms of racism, racial discrimination, xenophobia and related intolerance, and the promotion and protection of freedom of opinion and expression, as well as by the Special Representative on internally displaced persons. In response to a request by President Gbagbo, the Secretary-General sent a team to Côte d'Ivoire to assess the need for an international commission of inquiry into human rights violations committed during the conflict. Most of the team's interlocutors expressed interest in such a commission. A team of human rights officers, including a gender specialist and child protection officers, had been assigned to MINUCI.

The humanitarian situation remained worrisome. Half a million people, mostly migrant workers from regional countries, had fled Côte d'Ivoire as a result of xenophobia and ethnic tensions. In addition, an estimated 800,000 people were internally displaced. Food security had become noticeably precarious in the north and the west. The United Nations established an Inter-Agency Humanitarian Coordination Committee in February to ensure complementarity of humanitarian operations.

Côte d'Ivoire continued to face a severe economic and social crisis, which also had adverse repercussions for the neighbouring countries of Burkina Faso, Guinea, Mali and the Niger, which depended on Côte d'Ivoire's transport facilities for imports and exports and on remittances from their migrant nationals.

The Secretary-General said that the United Nations stood ready to provide appropriate support in the organization and conduct of the planned elections in Côte d'Ivoire, should the new Government request such support. He warned that peace was not yet at hand. Although the Government was functioning, it remained incomplete and often worked in disharmony, and all parties had yet to demonstrate their full commitment to the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement. The Secretary-General urged the parties to make the concessions necessary to end the impasse over appointments to the vacant ministerial portfolios and to curb the activities of those groups and individuals who sought to undermine the peace process. The presence of the French and ECOWAS forces remained indispensable if the prevailing, albeit fragile, stability was to be sustained. He appealed to Member States to provide the requisite financial assistance to those forces on an urgent basis. The deployment of MINUCI military and civilian personnel continued to make satisfactory progress, and the Mission was engaged in monitoring and liaison activities that complemented the peacekeeping operations of the French and ECOWAS forces. The Secretary-General expressed concern about the existence of armed Liberian elements in western Côte d'Ivoire, which constituted a threat to the efforts to stabilize both countries. He was encouraged about the ECOWAS and Security Council efforts to resolve the conflict in Liberia, which had been the primary source of instability in the subregion. He believed that a peacekeeping operation in Liberia would open up possibilities for addressing cross-cutting regional issues, such as the use of child soldiers and mercenaries, and the exploitation of national resources to fuel conflicts. Pursuant to the request contained in Council presidential statement S/PRST/2003/11 (see p. 176), the Secretary-General had asked his Special Representative for West Africa to conduct a comprehensive study on those issues.

Communications (August-October). Côte d'Ivoire, in a 29 August letter to the Security Council [S/2003/849], said that a plot had been uncovered to destabilize the Government. In a message to the nation, which was annexed to the letter, President Gbagbo said that the plot involved attempts to assassinate senior government members and himself. Rebels had already killed two French servicemen near Lake Kossou. On 19 September [S/2003/913], Côte d'Ivoire forwarded a statement of its President on the first anniversary of the outbreak of the armed rebellion, in which he described efforts to achieve a peaceful transition to democracy and called on the rebels to lay down their weapons.

The EU, in a 22 September statement [S/2003/924], condemned the use of violence in the political process in Côte d'Ivoire. It welcomed the fact that the Government of National Reconciliation was complete and the reopening of the border with Burkina Faso as a prelude to the re-establishment of rail traffic between the two countries. On 27 October [S/2003/1054], the EU condemned the murder in Abidjan of journalist Jean Hélenc, and considered it a matter of urgency that the authorities re-establish control over the security forces.

Press statement (3 October). Having been briefed by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Côte d'Ivoire, Security Council members issued a 3 October press statement [SC/7886-AFR/719] expressing concern that implementation of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement had lost momentum and that sporadic violence had erupted. They took particular note of recent events in Bouaké and stressed the importance of re-establishing the authority of the State throughout the territory of Côte d'Ivoire. They urged all Ivorian parties, in particular the Forces nouvelles, to take all necessary measures to restore confidence and called for the full and quick implementation of the Agreement. Members of the Council noted some positive developments in implementing the national reconciliation process, in particular the reopening of the border between Côte d'Ivoire and Burkina Faso and the resumption of rail traffic between the two countries. They also welcomed the fact that all members of the Government of National Reconciliation had been appointed.

Efforts to improve relations between Côte d'Ivoire and Burkina Faso were made during the May visit of the Foreign Minister of Burkina Faso to Abidjan. In a final communiqué [S/2003/564], the two countries outlined steps to secure the border and to restore and renew economic and trade relations.

Report of Secretary-General (November). In his second report on MINUCI [S/2003/1069], the Secretary-General provided an assessment of the implementation of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement and described MINUCI activities since his previous (August) report (see p. 177). He noted that, following the signing of the Agreement, the peace process in Côte d'Ivoire had made progress until early August. In addition to developments covered in his August report, positive steps included the reopening of road and rail links between the Government-held south and the northern provinces that were still under control of the Forces nouvelles and the release of some 50 prisoners of war by the Government. The Government set up a Commission on National Reunification and made initial efforts, with limited success, to re-establish State authority in areas controlled by the Forces nouvelles.

The protracted impasse over the appointments of the ministers of defence and internal security appeared to have been resolved when, on 12 September, President Gbagbo announced appointments to those posts. However, the Forces nouvelles rejected the appointments and withdrew from the Government on 23 September. In addition, they objected that the President had not allowed the Government and the Prime Minister to exercise the full authority granted to them under the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement. Without the participation of the eight Cabinet ministers from the Forces nouvelles who were boycotting it, the Government was severely handicapped.

The Monitoring Committee on the implementation of the Agreement encouraged the parties to resolve their differences through renewed dialogue. On 26 September, six major political parties issued a memorandum that identified the key issues that needed to be addressed in order to unblock the impasse, including the activities of militias, the ineffective functioning of State institutions due to the "incomplete" delegation of authority to the Prime Minister, and the need for disciplinary procedures involving civil servants to be processed through the Ministry of Labour. President Gbagbo indicated his readiness to convene a forum of all Ivorian political forces to resolve the stalemate. The Council of Ministers, in October, took some decisions to address the concerns of the Forces nouvelles.

Although the ceasefire was continuing to hold, the situation remained tense due to the political stalemate. In the northern provinces controlled by the Forces nouvelles, there was an upsurge of violence by "uncontrolled" armed elements and a situation of lawlessness was emerging. In the Government-controlled south, militia activities were causing concern, and in Abidjan the situation remained unpredictable. In western Côte d'Ivoire, the presence of peacekeeping forces had reduced the activities of the mainly Liberian armed elements. As a result, farming and other economic activities had resumed in some areas. However, there were reports of a residual presence of armed Liberian elements near Toulépleu. Uncontrolled Forces nouvelles combatants were also still harassing the population in some towns; unprovoked fire on a French boat patrol in the Lake Kossou area had resulted in the death of two French soldiers.

The humanitarian situation remained equally worrisome, particularly in the north and west where hundreds of thousands of people lacked basic health care and other public services and tens of thousands of children faced a second consecutive year without schools. Humanitarian organizations had reported high rates of malnutrition in the west. International aid organizations were distributing food, but were not able to fully meet the needs of the vulnerable populations due to the security situation and limited resources. On the human rights front, some progress was made by both sides (FANCI and the Forces nouvelles) in implementing international norms and standards on the protection of children associated with armed groups. However, it was reported that the Forces nouvelles continued to use child soldiers at roadblocks and in other military activities. The economic situation continued to deteriorate, with the growth that Côte d'Ivoire enjoyed in early 2002 completely reversed by the military and political crisis that began in September of that year. The slow pace of implementation of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement would probably translate into another year of economic contraction.

At the time of the report, the French forces (Licorne) were deployed in the eastern and central sectors of the country to backstop ECOMICI troops (totalling 1,383 troops) that were monitoring the ceasefire line. In the west, the Licorne forces maintained a heavy presence. They had recently deployed in Bouaké, at the request of the Forces nouvelles. ECOMICI troops continued to face severe troop and logistical shortfalls and their operations were plagued by a precarious financial situation. FANCI troops conducted patrols in the Government-controlled south and maintained a heavy presence in Abidjan. The military component of the Forces nouvelles remained a loosely knit outfit led by non-commissioned officers who operated in a semi-autonomous manner. MINUCI's strength stood at 34 UN military liaison officers and 42 more were expected in November and December. Their tasks included liaising with all military forces on the ground, monitoring the security situation, building confidence between the two sides and monitoring the security of Liberian refugees. MINUCI's civilian component was focusing on monitoring the human rights situation and the media, on preparations for the 2005 elections, and on working within the framework of the Monitoring Committee to facilitate the peace process. The public information unit maintained dialogue with the Ivorian media in order to promote the dissemination of accurate and objective information on the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement and the MINUCI mandate.

The Secretary-General observed that, since his August report, the Ivorian peace process had encountered serious difficulties. To keep the peace process on track, differences among the Ivorian political actors over the power-sharing concept envisaged in the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement had to be addressed. The Forces nouvelles and six other signatory parties to the Agreement insisted that the President had not delegated sufficient powers to the Prime Minister and the Government of National Reconciliation as envisaged under the Agreement. The President, however, rejected that interpretation and pointed to the executive powers invested exclusively in the President. Another disagreement was over the restructuring of the defence and security forces, and the related issue of disarmament. The Secretary-General expressed concern that nine months after the signing of the Agreement, some of its key provisions had not been implemented; until they were, the peace process was likely to remain tenuous and the holding of elections would not be possible without the reunification of the country. Once the stalemate was resolved, the United Nations would dispatch an electoral assessment mission to Côte d'Ivoire. The Secretary-General noted that the Security Council was discussing the reinforcement of MINUCI; in the meantime, he recommended that its mandate be renewed for another six months. He noted that, with the recent deployment of a UN peacekeeping operation in Liberia and the consolidation of peace in Sierra Leone (see p. 210), the international community had the opportunity to pursue an effective regional approach to bringing lasting stability to Côte d'Ivoire, Liberia and Sierra Leone.

Communications (November). ECOWAS, having held an 11 November summit meeting on West Africa, issued a press statement, which Ghana transmitted to the Security Council [S/2003/1082]. The heads of State appealed to the Council to increase the strength of ECOMICI and transform it into a UN peacekeeping force.

On 12 November [S/2003/1081], Côte d'Ivoire said that, in considering whether to renew MINUCI's mandate, the Council should re-examine the Mission's very nature. The current status of MINUCI had proved to have limitations for the implementation of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement: it had no direct mandate to intervene in order to maintain the peace; it complemented the operations carried out by the French and ECOWAS forces, which themselves were limited by their mandate; and its military component was made up of 76 unarmed liaison officers. Maintenance of peace and security was the responsibility of the French (4,000 troops) and ECOWAS (1,383 troops) forces. For Côte d'Ivoire, the only desirable option was for MINUCI to be turned into a UN peacekeeping operation which would include ECOMICI and for the French forces to preserve their current status. In order for MINUCI to be able to carry out such a mission, it would need to expand to at least 10,000 troops.

Extension of MINUCI

On 13 November [meeting 4857], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1514 (2003). The draft [S/2003/1083] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its previous resolutions concerning Côte d'Ivoire, in particular its resolution 1479(2003) of 13 May 2003, in which it authorized the establishment of a special political mission in Côte d'Ivoire, as confirmed in the letter dated 13 October 2003 from the President of the Security Council addressed to the Secretary-General, and its resolutions 1464(2003) of 4 February 2003 and 1498(2003) of 4 August 2003,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 4 November 2003,

Reaffirming its strong commitment to the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and unity of Côte d'Ivoire, and reaffirming its opposition to any attempts to take power by unconstitutional means,

Reaffirming its endorsement of the agreement signed by the Ivorian political forces at Linas-Marcoussis on 24 January 2003 ("Linas-Marcoussis Agreement") and approved by the Conference of Heads of State on Côte d'Ivoire held in Paris on 25 and 26 January 2003,

Stressing the urgent need for all parties to participate fully in the Government of National Reconciliation so as to enable it to implement fully all the provisions of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement,

Stressing also the importance of the commitment of the Government of National Reconciliation to resume effective administration throughout Côte d'Ivoire, and reminding all Ivorian parties of their obligation to contribute positively thereto,

Reaffirming the need for the Government of National Reconciliation to commit itself fully and immediately to the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programme, including the dismantling of militias, and to the restructuring of the armed forces,

Recalling the importance of the principles of good-neighbourliness, non-interference and cooperation in the relations between States of the region,

Further recalling its full support for the efforts of the Economic Community of West African States and France to promote a peaceful settlement of the conflict,

Noting the continued need for the United Nations Mission in Côte d'Ivoire in accordance with its resolution 1479(2003),

Noting with concern the continued existence of challenges to the stability of Côte d'Ivoire and determining that the situation in Côte d'Ivoire continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security in the region,

1. Decides that the mandate of the United Nations special political mission in Côte d'Ivoire, the United Nations Mission in Côte d'Ivoire, shall be extended until 4 February 2004;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council by 10 January 2004 on the efforts of the Mission to facilitate peace and stability in Côte d'Ivoire, including how those efforts might be improved and in particular the possible reinforcement of the United Nations presence in Côte d'Ivoire;

3. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

At the same meeting, following consultations among Council members, the President made statement S/PRST/2003/20 on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council urges all Ivorian political forces to implement fully, without delay or precondition, all the provisions of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement as well as those of the agreement reached in Accra on 8 March 2003 ("Accra II"), with a view to open, free and transparent elections being held in Côte d'Ivoire in 2005.

The Council notes with satisfaction the progress made since the statement by its President on 25 July 2003, in particular the appointment of Ministers of the Interior and Defence, the adoption of the amnesty bill by the National Assembly, the reopening of the border with Mali and Burkina Faso and the decisions taken by the Council of Ministers on 16 October to restore public order and reform the statute of Ivorian radio and television.

The Council expresses its serious concern, however, that the implementation of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement has slowed down. It emphasizes in particular the importance of the entire Government of National Reconciliation meeting as soon as possible in order to implement fully the content of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement. It reaffirms in this context the urgency of carrying out the cantonment operations of the forces involved, to allow the beginning of disarmament and demobilization, accompanied by measures for reintegration into the regular army or civilian life.

The Council further emphasizes the urgent need to begin reforming land law and electoral rules, restore public services and the authority of the State throughout the territory of Côte d'Ivoire and end the use of mercenaries and the illicit purchase of weapons in violation of national laws.

The Council condemns firmly the grave human rights violations. It further condemns the murder of a French journalist on 21 October in Abidjan. The Security Council calls for a full investigation by the Ivorian authorities of this crime and the punishment of the perpetrators in accordance with the law. It also calls upon them to ensure that organs of the press and groups which sponsor them refrain from encouraging any remark that might incite hatred or violence.

The Council expresses its concern for the grave humanitarian situation in the field. In this context, the Council supports the activities of all United Nations agencies aimed at assisting the Ivorian people.

The Council further condemns the hostile acts against United Nations personnel in Bouaké and Man on 24 and 25 October 2003, and recalls that all the parties are obliged, by resolution 1479(2003) of 13 May 2003, to cooperate with the special political mission established by the Security Council, the United Nations Mission in Côte d'Ivoire, and to ensure freedom of movement of its personnel.

The Council reiterates its full support for the efforts of the Economic Community of West African States, France and the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Côte d'Ivoire with a view to stabilizing the country and seeking a peaceful settlement of the conflict. The Council welcomes in particular the recent initiatives of the Presidents of the Republic of Ghana and the Federal Republic of Nigeria and the holding of a regional summit in Accra on 11 November 2003 to address security problems in the region.

The Council commends the action of the forces of the Economic Community of West African States and France, and that of the UN Mission in Côte d'Ivoire, and pays tribute to the commitment and dedication shown by their personnel. It also welcomes the efforts of the Office of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for West Africa and of all United Nations missions in the region to coordinate their action in order to address regional issues in an appropriate manner. It expresses its intention to examine the recommendations by the Secretary-General on ways to facilitate peace and stability in Côte d'Ivoire.

The Security Council continued its discussion of the situation in Côte d'Ivoire on 24 November [meetings 4873 & 4874]. The Secretary-General expressed concern about the current political stalemate created by the withdrawal of the Forces nouvelles from the Government on 23 September. Already, there were signs that the situation in some parts of the northern provinces was degenerating into lawlessness and there was a danger that Côte d'Ivoire could slip back into conflict. In order to jump-start the stalled peace process, the parties had to tackle the fundamental issues behind the deadlock, as he had indicated in his November report. The Secretary-General planned to send an assessment mission to Côte d'Ivoire soon to review the situation on the ground, so that he could make recommendations to the Council that would possibly include reinforcing the UN presence in the country.

The ECOWAS representative spoke of the effect of the crisis on the economy of West Africa as a whole and called for a comprehensive regional approach to the linked crises in Côte d'Ivoire, Liberia and Sierra Leone.

Communications (December). On 3 December [S/2003/1165], Côte d'Ivoire transmitted to the Security Council the text of an address by President Gbagbo to the nation. He announced that the Council of Ministers had begun, on 27 November, to discuss the laws suggested in the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement and affirmed that disarmament had priority among the tasks set by the Agreement. Peace in Côte d'Ivoire was at hand and that would help to safeguard prosperity throughout the subregion.

On 4 December in Yamoussoukro, under the auspices of President Gbagbo, representatives of FIANCI and the Forces nouvelles met with the Prime Minister; representatives of MINUCI, ECOMICI and the French forces were also in attendance. In a final communiqué [S/2003/1182], they agreed on the need to do everything possible to create a climate conducive to the resumption of talks in order to restore normalcy and lasting peace. They agreed to: withdraw units from Allanguouassou and Bania and all other units stationed in the zone of confidence by 5 December; release all detained soldiers on 7 December; and hold a meeting on 10 December to set a timetable for removing unauthorized checkpoints, establishing administration of the zone of confidence, cantonment of troops, and collecting light arms and heavy weapons.

In a 9 December statement on Côte d'Ivoire [S/2003/1181], the EU welcomed the Yamoussoukro meeting and Mr. Gbagbo's statements on upholding the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (December)

On 4 December [meeting 4875], following consultations among Security Council members, the President made statement S/PRST/2003/25 on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council is gravely concerned by attempts on the part of armed elements, observed on 29 and 30 November 2003 by forces of the Economic Community of West African States and France, to cross the ceasefire line, and by the serious consequences that could arise as a result.

The Council reiterates its full support for the forces of the Economic Community of West African States and France and lauds their action to prevent those attempts, in accordance with resolutions 1464 (2003) of 4 February 2003 and 1498(2003) of 4 August 2003,

The Council strongly underscores to all the Ivorian parties their fundamental responsibility to respect the ceasefire in accordance with the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement.

The Council calls upon all the parties to refrain from any act that might compromise respect of the ceasefire and the implementation of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement, as well as any incitement to such acts.

The Council reiterates the urgent need for all the parties to take all possible measures to accelerate the implementation of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement. In this context, it once again underscores the importance of having the Forces nouvelles return and participate fully in the Government of National Reconciliation and the full Government meet immediately and taking steps to implement all the provisions of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement. It also reaffirms the urgent need to conduct operations to canton the forces on the ground, in order to begin disarmament and demobilization, accompanied by measures to facilitate their reintegration into the regular army or into civilian life.

The Council reiterates in this regard its intention to consider the recommendations of the Secretary-General on the means of facilitating peace and stability in Côte d'Ivoire.

The Council welcomes the commitments undertaken by President Laurent Gbagbo in his speech on 27 November 2003, in which he reaffirmed his intention to implement without delay the provisions of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement, and expects the fulfilment of those commitments.

The Council calls upon all parties in Côte d'Ivoire and countries of the region to guarantee the safety and full access of personnel of humanitarian agencies working in the field during the consolidation of the peace process.

Follow-up to Security Council mission. The Secretary-General, in his 5 December progress report (S/2003/1147) on the recommendations of the Security Council mission to West Africa (see p. 163), highlighted the steps taken to implement the recommendations and assessed practical ways to address the cross-border issues identified by the mission.

The Secretary-General estimated that well over 60 per cent of the national territory was under the control of the Forces nouvelles, who precluded the establishment of the central Government's administrative presence, thereby partitioning the country. The extension of administration throughout the national territory had stalled. On 27 October, the President established an operational structure to facilitate the process of redeploying administrators in the country, and 139 administrators took up their posts in western provinces in early November. The Forces nouvelles protested the deployments as tantamount to the use of force.

Prior to the stalemate over the appointment of the ministers of defence and national security, several steps were taken to consolidate peace, including: the creation of zones of confidence along the ceasefire lines; the holding of meetings between military commanders of the Forces nouvelles and FANCI; the mounting of joint operations against Liberian armed elements in the west; and the identification of 17 cantonment sites for the DDR process. Preparations for DDR and efforts to disband the various militias and terminate mercenary activities remained hampered by the political stalemate. The Secretary-General warned that, if allowed to continue, the political impasse could dangerously consolidate the de facto partition of Côte d'Ivoire with unpredictable consequences for the country and the subregion. He expressed the hope that Council members would consider the ECOWAS call for an increase in the troop strength of MINUCI and for its transformation into a peacekeeping mission.

Mission to Côte d'Ivoire (December). As requested by the Security Council in resolution 1514(2003) (see p. 181), the Secretary-General dispatched an assessment mission to Côte d'Ivoire, headed by Assistant Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations Hédi Annabi, to collect information on MINUCI's efforts to facilitate peace and stability and report on how those efforts could be improved, particularly by possibly reinforcing the UN presence there. The mission visited Côte d'Ivoire from 3 to 11 December and Mr. Annabi also met with the ECOWAS Chairman and the President of Ghana in Accra on 9 December and with senior French officials in Paris on 12 December (S/2004/3). The mission report noted that the President and the Prime Minister had initiated meetings that yielded important decisions aimed at stabilizing the security situation and reinvigorating the peace process. On 4 December, President Gbagbo chaired a meeting of senior military officers of FANCI and Forces nouvelles, with the participation of Licorne, ECOMICI and MINUCI. The two sides agreed to resume preparations for the cantonment of their forces, the quartering of heavy weapons in designated areas and the implementation of the DDR programme. They also reaffirmed their commitment to preserving the unity of the country. A follow-up meeting was held in Bouaké on 10 December, at which the two sides decided to begin dismantling their checkpoints and withdrawing heavy weapons from the zone of confidence to specific quartering locations. As a result, the situation improved.

The withdrawal of heavy weapons from the zone of confidence began on 13 December, and a joint ECOMICI/MINUCI team verified the completion of the process between 26 and 29 December. The dismantling of checkpoints was also under way. Also, on 7 December, the Forces nouvelles released 40 FANCI and police personnel who had been held as prisoners of war.

In the political arena, the Prime Minister visited Bouaké on 5 December for consultations to convince the Forces nouvelles to return to the new Government. However, an 11 December shooting incident prompted a decision by the Forces nouvelles to delay their return to the Government. In addition, there appeared to be divisions within the Forces nouvelles over the matter. Nonetheless, on 23 December a Forces nouvelles spokesman announced that the group had decided to end its suspension of participation in the Government. In an effort to address regional aspects of the situation, President Gbagbo met with the Presidents of Burkina Faso (26 November) and of Mali (28 November). The Chairman of the National Transitional Government of Liberia, Charles Gyude Bryant, also held consultations with President Gbagbo in Abidjan on 24 November on the peace processes in the two countries and the repatriation of Liberian refugees and armed elements.

By the end of 2003, ECOMICI troop strength stood at 1,478 and that of the Licorne force stood at some 4,000; MINUCI had 71 military liaison officers.

The assessment mission looked into several proposals for the possible reinforcement of the UN role, taking into account the serious troop and logistical shortfalls faced by ECOMICI. The mission concluded that serious consideration had to be given to the ECOWAS proposal to deploy a UN peacekeeping force in Côte d'Ivoire and to reassign the ECOMICI contingents to that force. The Secretary-General put forward suggestions based on the mission's findings, for the military, civilian, police and judicial, electoral, DDR, human rights, public information and political and civil affairs components of a possibly reinforced UN presence in Côte d'Ivoire. He recommended that, if the Ivorian parties made sufficient progress to ensure that the peace process would become irreversible by 4 February 2004—the date on which the mandates of MINUCI, ECOMICI and Licorne were due to expire—the Security Council should consider authorizing a multidimensional peacekeeping operation. The operation would comprise a military component of 6,240 troops, including 200 military observers and 120 staff officers, and a civilian component, the size of which would be determined based on the recommendations of a small technical team, scheduled to visit Côte d'Ivoire in January 2004.

Liberia

Events in Liberia during 2003 were dominated by the divisions between the Government and the opposing party, the Liberians United for Reconciliation and Democracy (LURD), and later a new dissident movement, the Movement for Democracy in Liberia. The fighting was violent and widespread during the first part of the year and the two rebel movements gained control of nearly two thirds of the country by early May. The concomitant conflicts in neighbouring Côte d'Ivoire and Sierra Leone threatened stability in the sub-region. Elections that were originally scheduled for October were postponed until 2004 due to the lack of security. However, conditions improved late in the year following President Charles Taylor's departure from the country and the arrival of a multinational force.

The United Nations Peace-building Support Office in Liberia (UNOL) tried to facilitate the promotion of national reconciliation, good governance and respect for the rule of law and human rights. In April, the Security Council revised UNOL's mandate to focus on assisting the Government to address capacity-building needs in human rights and preparations for elections, as well as on developing a peace-building strategy. Those peace-building efforts were hampered by the inability of the Government and opposition party leaders to resolve their differences over key issues of governance. The Government's policy of exclusion and harassment of political opponents and abuse of human rights undermined efforts to promote reconciliation. That situation, coupled with the lack of reform of the security sector, contributed to the resumption of the civil war.

Mediating efforts yielded some results in mid-year. On 17 June, a ceasefire agreement was signed by the three main opposing parties. The agreement was subsequently broken, however, when LURD forces entered Monrovia on several occasions, plunging Liberia into a new cycle of violence. At that point, the Secretary-General proposed a three-phase deployment of international troops to Liberia: first, the deployment of an ECOWAS vanguard force, followed by a reinforced multinational force, which in turn would be relieved by a UN peacekeeping operation. The deployment of the ECOWAS Mission in Liberia (ECOMIL) began in August to support the implementation of the ceasefire agreement.

On 11 August, President Taylor handed over power to Vice-President Moses Blah and left the country. That move, coupled with the arrival of the multinational force in Liberia, made conditions favourable for further progress towards a settlement. On 18 August, the Comprehensive Peace Agreement was reached by Liberia's Government, two rebel groups, political parties and civil society leaders meeting in Accra, Ghana. The Agreement declared an end to the war and provided for the establishment of a National Transitional Government of Liberia, as well as for monitoring mechanisms.

On 19 September, the Council established the United Nations Mission in Liberia (UNMIL) with a strength of up to 15,000 troops, to be accompanied by civilian police and civilian staff. Its main tasks were to observe and monitor the implementation of the ceasefire agreement, to assist in developing cantonment sites and disarming combatants, to monitor disengagement and cantonment, and to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian aid. UNMIL also assumed the functions of UNOL.

The smooth transfer of authority on 14 October from the interim Government led by President Blah to the National Transitional Government of Liberia, led by Chairman Charles Gyude Bryant, augured well for credible future national elections. By the end of the year, the main mechanisms for implementing the peace process were in place, including the National Transitional Government, the National Transitional Legislative Assembly, monitoring committees and a programme for disarmament, demobilization, reintegration and rehabilitation for former combatants. However, skirmishes and serious human rights violations continued, as UNMIL lacked adequate troops and equipment to deploy into the interior of the country, and the armed groups had yet to demonstrate their full commitment to the peace process.

The Security Council, having received a report from its Panel of Experts on Liberia, which determined that Liberia had not complied with demands that it halt support to rebels in Sierra Leone, decided in January to re-establish the Panel. Further reports indicated that Liberia continued to support armed rebel groups in the region, and that the arms, diamond and timber sanctions continued to be violated. In December, however, the Council, taking into consideration the changed circumstances in Liberia, in particular the departure of President Taylor and the formation of the National Transitional Government, revised the sanctions, expressing its readiness to lift those against diamonds and timber once there was evidence that profits from those sources were not used to fuel conflict.

Peace-building efforts

The Secretary-General, on 15 January [S/2003/49], referred to the Security Council's 29 November 2002 letter [YUN 2002, p. 176], in which it outlined the tasks to be implemented by UNOL as part of a revised mandate. As requested by the Council, he had drawn up recommendations for a detailed revised mandate for UNOL, incorporating the Council's additions, and Liberia had been provided with a draft revised mandate for its consideration and agreement. The draft took into account the situation on the ground and Security Council presidential statement S/PRST/2002/36 [ibid.], which outlined a strategy for the peace process. In its initial reaction, the Government said it was studying the revised mandate and that it would respond soon. The Secretary-General informed the Council that he would report Liberia's reaction as soon as it was received.

Press statement (17 January). In a 17 January press statement [SC/7637-AFR/544], Council members expressed regret that Liberia had not responded to the Secretary-General's proposals for a revised UNOL mandate and urged it to do so as soon as possible. They called on the Government and LURD to work together to bring the armed conflict to an end through dialogue, and to create the security conditions necessary for inclusive, peaceful and free legislative and presidential elections, including a ceasefire to guarantee safety for all. They welcomed the outcome of the first meeting of the International Contact Group (Dakar, Senegal, 19 December 2002). Council members expressed concern regarding human rights in Liberia and called on the Government and LURD to ensure that humanitarian aid workers were allowed free access to displaced civilians and refugees. They called on the Government to create the conditions for free, fair and transparent elections and to allow international observers to monitor the electoral process. The Government was urged to build peace in the region, including through restoring relations with its neighbours and the international community.

Report of Secretary-General (February). In response to a Security Council request [YUN 2002, p. 176], the Secretary-General submitted a 26 February report on the situation in Liberia [S/2003/227]. He stated that the main challenge confronting Liberia remained the continuing insurgency mounted by the rebel movement LURD, whose fighters had attacked government forces and seized territory in various parts of the country. In early February, following the capture of the city of Bopolu, LURD fighters reportedly came within 20 miles of the capital, Monrovia, before government troops drove them back more than 50 miles. The situation remained volatile, with the rebels in control of several towns and cities.

The rebel activities coincided with worrisome developments on Liberia's borders with Côte d'Ivoire (see p. 165) and Sierra Leone (see p. 210). The Government of Liberia, which denied allegations of involvement in Côte d'Ivoire's crisis, had moved troops to its eastern border with Côte d'Ivoire to prevent a spillover from fighting there, especially following reports of an armed incursion into the Liberian border town of Gbein, which left two Liberian soldiers dead. Similarly, on the border with Sierra Leone, armed men continued to cross over from Liberia, some of them said to be looting and harassing villages inside Sierra Leone. After LURD seized control of parts of the area bordering Sierra Leone, there was an influx of about 6,000 Liberian refugees. During the same period, about 250 soldiers of the Armed Forces of Liberia fled into Sierra Leone, whose Government was concerned about the possible overstretching of an internment camp that had been constructed to receive a small number of armed elements from Liberia. However, since the inception of joint border patrols by Sierra Leone and UN forces, reports of incursions had declined. On 14 January, Côte d'Ivoire informed the United Nations of the alleged presence in Guiglo, Côte d'Ivoire, of the former Revolutionary United Front commander, Sam Bockarie, who had reportedly participated in the fighting in that region. He was also said to have looted Ivorian villages and sold the stolen goods at the border with Liberia.

Meanwhile, the overall political climate in Liberia remained tense and volatile. The National Peace and Reconciliation Conference, begun in August 2002 and suspended the following month, appeared to have lost the necessary momentum to move the peace process forward. The fact that the reconciliation process did not involve all stakeholders, including exiled politicians, apparently cast doubts on its credibility.

Efforts by ECOWAS to bring the Government and LURD together at the negotiating table included a meeting between ECOWAS parliamentarians, civil society and members of the Inter-Religious Councils of the Mano River Union (MRU) countries (Guinea, Liberia, Sierra Leone) and LURD representatives (Freetown, Sierra Leone, 7-9 February), at which LURD agreed to commit itself to a peaceful resolution of the crisis by the end of the year and to engage in dialogue with the Government.

The difficult internal and subregional situation had severely constrained economic revitalization. With the Government devoting 60 per cent of its budget to the military sector, growth had stalled and unemployment was estimated to be more than 80 per cent. The authorities had taken steps to regulate the mining and marketing of diamonds under the Kimberley Process, and to infuse accountability into its timber and maritime trade.

The Government asserted that, regardless of the prevailing political and security environment, it was determined to go ahead with the legislative and presidential elections scheduled for October. However, a number of obstacles had to be overcome for fair elections to be held on time: a ceasefire with LURD; a reconstituted Elections Commission and the deployment of an international stabilization force for public security. It was argued that the 10-year residency clause contained in the Constitution was a major impediment to holding a fair presidential election, as several opposition candidates who had fled the country would be disqualified. On 2 January, the Elections Commission released the electoral calendar, which provided for the electoral campaign to commence on 20 June and for voting to be held on 14 October.

Concerns over Liberia's human rights situation (see also p. 683) related mainly to the activities of the Anti-Terrorist Unit and the National Police, who were accused of harassing the civilian population in the pursuit of alleged accomplices of LURD rebels. Other concerns were a pervasive culture of impunity, the use of child soldiers by both sides, and the need for human rights education among the civilian population and security agencies. The difficult humanitarian situation was complicated by an estimated 180,000 internally displaced persons in camps and tens of thousands of others squatting in host communities, as well as the ongoing civil conflict in neighbouring Côte d'Ivoire, which forced Liberian refugees to return. In addition, Liberia was hosting 17,000 Sierra Leonean refugees in camps around Monrovia.

The Secretary-General observed that Liberia needed to end the fighting as the first step towards sustainable peace. The subregional dimensions of the Liberian conflict had come to the fore with reports of the involvement of Liberian armed groups on both sides of the fighting in Côte d'Ivoire. The movement of Liberian refugees and incursions by armed groups into Sierra Leone had also been recorded, rendering that country vulnerable to destabilization.

The conflict in Liberia was one that neither the Government nor LURD was likely to win. The international community should discontinue external military support to LURD, as it had achieved only the massive displacement of innocent civilians, the deaths of thousands of people and the wanton destruction of infrastructure and personal property. If decisive action was not taken to end the tragedy, the Secretary-General warned, a generalized humanitarian and economic crisis could engulf the entire West African region.

The Secretary-General drew the Council's attention to two letters dated 18 February from President Taylor. The first alleged that Guinea had provided military and other support to LURD and the second referred to the sanctions regime imposed on Liberia under Council resolutions 1343(2001) [YUN 2001, p. 181] and 1408(2002) [YUN 2002, p. 169]. The International Contact Group on Liberia, which was scheduled to meet in New York on 28 February, provided the best forum for the international community to engage Liberia and to find a comprehensive solution to the crisis, in addition to addressing the strained relations among the MRU countries. It should also assist Liberia in creating the conditions for the conduct of free and fair elections. The Secretary-General reported that progress had been made in the dialogue between the United Nations and Liberia on a revised mandate for UNOL.

Security Council press statements (March and May). On 5 March [SC/7678-AFR/572], Security Council members, having been briefed by the Representative of the Secretary-General in Liberia, Abou Moussa (Chad), expressed concern at the humanitarian situation in Liberia and called on the Government and LURD to stop human rights abuses and to give unrestricted access to humanitarian organizations. Members welcomed the conclusions of the International Contact Group on Liberia held on 28 February. They encouraged ECOWAS efforts to facilitate ceasefire talks, especially the suggestion that a meeting be held in Mali on 10 March, and urged the Government and LURD to participate constructively. They called on all regional States to refrain from any interference in the affairs of their neighbours, particularly through the movement of arms or mercenaries.

On 5 May [SC/7750-AFR/614], Council members reviewed sanctions against Liberia (see p. 201) and reiterated their concern at the deteriorating security and humanitarian situation in the country and the subregion. They expressed their intention to renew the sanctions and to extend them to include a ban on timber exports.

Revised UNOL mandate

The Secretary-General, on 11 April [S/2003/468], informed the Security Council that Liberia had agreed to the draft revised mandate of UNOL. In finalizing the draft, consideration was given to the capacity-building needs of the Government in human rights and the conduct of elections. Under the new mandate, UNOL would: provide good offices and other services to defuse tensions through promoting national reconciliation and resolution of conflicts; support the Government in implementing any future peace agreements; monitor the political and security situation; enhance respect for human rights, in particular by providing training for security agencies; offer assistance to the authorities and the public for strengthening democratic institutions and the rule of law, including promotion of an independent press; contribute to the preparation of free and fair elections in 2003; promote dialogue between the Government, the United Nations and the international community on peace and security in Liberia; develop a peace-building strategy in which political objectives, programme assistance and human rights considerations were integrated; mobilize national and international political support for such a strategy; provide support to the UN Office in West Africa, in particular pertaining to developments in the MRU subregion as they related to Liberia; and engage in an educational campaign to present UN policies and activities regarding Liberia.

On 21 April [S/2003/469], the Council approved the revised UNOL mandate. In resolution 1478 (2003) (see p. 203) of 6 May, the Council welcomed the Government's agreement to the revised mandate and called on all States in the region to participate in all regional peace initiatives, particularly those of ECOWAS, the International Contact Group, MRU and the Rabat Process. It called on Liberia and LURD to enter into ceasefire negotiations under ECOWAS auspices and the mediation of former President Abdulsalami Abubakar of Nigeria.

Report of Secretary-General (June). On 2 June [S/2003/582], the Secretary-General reported on the situation in Liberia in the three months since his previous report (see p. 185), a period that continued to be dominated by the LURD insurgency. Having consolidated its grip on main areas in Lofa County, LURD had reportedly captured other localities, including Tubmanburg, Zwedru and Greenville. It had also launched attacks on other towns, engaging government troops, and on internally displaced persons' camps on the outskirts of Monrovia. In early May, government forces launched an offensive in a bid to retake positions lost to the rebels. Another dissident movement, known as the Movement for Democracy in Liberia (MODEL), surfaced in the south-east, apparently the result of the breaking apart of LURD. Its troops had gained control of the port of Greenville.

In an effort to revitalize the Liberian peace process, the Co-Chairmen of the International Contact Group on Liberia (ICGL), Nana Akufo-Addo, Foreign Minister of Ghana, representing the ECOWAS Chairman, President J. A. Kufuor of Ghana, and Hans Dahlgren, Foreign Minister of Sweden and EU special representative to MRU countries, visited Guinea, Sierra Leone and Liberia on 14 and 15 April. During the visit, President Taylor expressed the readiness of the Liberian Government to negotiate unconditionally on a ceasefire. On 7 April, Abdulsalami Abubakar, former President of Nigeria, was designated by ECOWAS as mediator for the Liberia peace process. LURD had previously accepted the idea of negotiations that would include other stakeholders. On 10 April, Liberia invited the Secretary-General to dispatch a joint UN/AU/ECOWAS needs assessment mission to evaluate the conditions for free and fair elections in Liberia, in accordance with the ICGL recommendation. President Taylor expressed his readiness to hold direct talks with LURD, to be followed by the disarmament of all combatants, including the Anti-Terrorist Unit and government militias.

Meanwhile, Liberia's Elections Commission continued with preparations for the general and presidential elections scheduled for October, although there was a growing sentiment among the public that the requisite conditions did not currently exist, due to the lack of a ceasefire and a stabilization force. Additional problems included logistical and financial obstacles and the need for the Elections Commission to be more neutral and inclusive. Equally important were the issues of voter registration, the delimitation of constituencies and basic civic education. The Chairman of the Commission had concluded that elections as scheduled would be impossible without foreign aid.

The joint UN/AU/ECOWAS needs assessment mission, having visited Liberia from 4 to 9 May, determined that the political, security, military and humanitarian situation was not conducive to the holding of credible elections in October as scheduled. The list of requirements for elections included: providing a secure environment countrywide; restructuring the Elections Commission to ensure independence from the Government and the ruling party; removing major legal impediments to the holding of credible elections; enhancing the operational capabilities of the Commission; and improving communications and interaction between the Commission and political parties, civil society organizations and the media. At a meeting in Brussels on 12 May, ICGL agreed on the immediate steps needed to move the ECOWAS-led peace process forward, namely: a comprehensive political framework for a ceasefire agreement; and preparations for the round-table talks of Liberian parties, scheduled to start in Accra, Ghana, on 4 June, with an agenda, timetable, military planning for the mobilization and deployment of a ceasefire-monitoring mechanism, and benchmarks for attaining peace and stability in Liberia.

The deteriorating security situation had resulted in the inability of humanitarian agencies to provide assistance to 11 of Liberia's 15 counties, or 70 per cent of the country. Government security forces were increasingly unequipped to offer protection to civilians. Armed militiamen continued to attack and loot the camps for displaced persons. All parties continued to commit human rights abuses, and there were reports of extrajudicial killings, torture, rape, deliberate targeting of civilians, abductions, mutilations, the use of civilians for forced labour and forcible recruitment of children.

The Secretary-General stated that the need for a binding ceasefire was the most critical issue and both sides had agreed to hold direct talks and to cooperate with the ECOWAS mediator. They had also agreed that, following a ceasefire, an international force should be deployed to monitor compliance by the parties. The mandate of that force would be defined during the forthcoming peace talks in Accra. In the Secretary-General's view, it was urgent to end the fighting and to deploy a monitoring mechanism once a ceasefire was declared. In addition, the warring parties should be warned that violations of human rights and international humanitarian law should stop; otherwise, violators would be held accountable. He warned that Liberia remained the epicentre of the continuing endemic instability which was affecting the political, humanitarian and security landscape throughout much of West Africa.

Ceasefire agreement

The period of deteriorating security conditions in Liberia was followed on 4 June by President Taylor's announcement that he was prepared to step down no later than the end of his current term. That announcement was welcomed by the Security Council President in an 11 June press statement [SC/7787-APR/644]. Council members urged all combatants to cease hostilities immediately and agree to a ceasefire and to work together to create a peace process, including a transitional Government. They further demanded that the parties ensure the security and unrestricted access of humanitarian workers.

The AU Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution (Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, 12-13 June) [S/2003/654] also urged all the parties to agree to a ceasefire and welcomed the holding of peace talks in Akosombo, Ghana, between the Government, LURD and MODEL, under ECOWAS auspices.

On 17 June in Accra, the Government, LURD and MODEL signed the Agreement on Ceasefire and Cessation of Hostilities [S/2003/657]. Under its terms, an ECOWAS-led Joint Verification Team, with two representatives from each of the parties, plus UN, AU and ICGL representatives, would verify information provided by the parties on the locations of their units, including combat equipment. A Joint Monitoring Committee, chaired by an ECOWAS representative and with representatives from the parties and the United Nations, the AU and ICGL, would supervise and monitor the ceasefire. Talks would commence immediately on a comprehensive peace agreement, to be reached within 30 days, which would include: deployment of an international stabilization force; a disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programme; restructuring of the security forces; human rights concerns; humanitarian issues; socio-economic reforms; reconstruction; creation of a democratic space; formation of a transitional Government; and elections.

The Secretary-General, on 18 June [S/2003/659], informed the Security Council that ECOWAS had requested the United Nations to provide a helicopter for the Joint Verification Team and invited the United Nations to designate two military officers to participate; the United Nations had made arrangements to comply with the request. On 23 June [S/2003/664], the Council took note of the information.

Despite the signing of the ceasefire, the situation in Liberia deteriorated. The Secretary-General, on 28 June [S/2003/678], urged the Council to take action to support the ceasefire agreement and expressed deep concern at the flagrant ceasefire violations, noting that several hundred civilians had been killed in fighting in and around Monrovia and wanton destruction of property and widespread looting had occurred. Approximately a million people, one third of the population of Liberia, were seeking refuge in Monrovia. Virtually all international relief operations had ceased in the capital and most of the country, and a combination of cholera outbreaks and food shortages in an environment of violence, disruption of services and cessation of humanitarian aid threatened to produce a major humanitarian catastrophe. The Secretary-General appealed to ECOWAS to press for observance of the ceasefire agreement and for a comprehensive political arrangement.

The Secretary-General requested the Council to authorize the deployment to Liberia of a highly trained and well-equipped multinational force, under the lead of a Member State, to prevent a major humanitarian tragedy and to stabilize the situation. Such a force would be authorized under Chapter VII of the UN Charter. In the meantime, the Liberian parties should immediately and unconditionally respect the ceasefire, allow the resumption of humanitarian assistance and resume peace talks under ECOWAS auspices. All States, in particular Liberia's neighbours, should desist from any action that might be construed as supporting any party to the conflict.

The Security Council mission to West Africa (26 June-5 July) (see p. 163) had planned to visit Liberia. However, because of the continuing conflict, the mission travelled instead to Accra, where the parties were gathered for peace talks, which were suspended between 27 June and 4 July because of ceasefire violations. In its 7 July report [S/2003/688], the mission noted the delay in deploying the Joint Verification Team, in what appeared to be a tactic to gain time to win military advantage. LURD and MODEL apparently had no common objectives beyond the exclusion from power of President Taylor. ECOWAS hoped to be ready to secure the ceasefire by creating a buffer zone through the deployment of a stabilization force, but it needed financial and logistical assistance from the international community. The ECOWAS Executive Secretary hoped the United States would consider involvement in such a force and that a neutral transitional Government could then be appointed for a period of 18 to 24 months. President Obasanjo of Nigeria informed the mission that the indictment of President Taylor by the Special Court for Sierra Leone had complicated his departure from office, as he was now insisting that the indictment first be rescinded.

The mission recommended that the Security Council urgently consider authorizing an international stabilization force on the basis of current ECOWAS plans, taking account of the ECOWAS appeal for troops and other support from outside the region. Plans for deployment should be drawn up rapidly, since delay would risk renewed breakdowns of the ceasefire. Liberia was likely to require increased UN attention and involvement in the short to medium term. The mission suggested that the Secretary-General appoint a senior representative in Liberia.

The Secretary-General, in an 8 July letter [S/2003/695], described to the Council a number of initiatives he had taken. He had appointed Jacques Paul Klein (United States) as his Special Representative for Liberia to coordinate UN activities in that country. In anticipation of the early deployment of the multinational force and consequent improvement in the security situation, he had instructed his Special Representative to expedite the return to Liberia of all UN agencies providing humanitarian assistance. With a view to advancing developments on the political front, he had sent Ahmedou Ould-Abdallah, Special Representative for West Africa, to Accra to provide UN support, in cooperation with ECOWAS, to the ongoing dialogue among the Liberian parties. He had also requested his Representative in Liberia, Abou Moussa, and the Resident Coordinator, Marc de Bernis, who were evacuated during the fighting, to return to Monrovia and prepare for the return of UN and associated personnel. The Secretary-General expressed the hope for an early establishment of transitional arrangements in Liberia. On 10 July [S/2003/696], the Council took note of the information conveyed by the Secretary-General.

Council members, in a 24 July press statement [SC/7824-APR/674], expressed concern regarding the continuing deterioration of the security situation and the humanitarian crisis in Liberia. They reiterated that President Taylor had to honour his commitment to leave Liberia so that a transitional Government could be installed and peace restored. They urged LURD to stop its indiscriminate shelling of Monrovia immediately, welcomed the imminent deployment of an ECOWAS vanguard force to Liberia and called on the international community to support ECOWAS efforts.

Both the EU and the AU issued July statements calling for adherence to the ceasefire agreement. The EU Presidency [S/2003/764, S/2003/792] also called on the Liberian parties to sign a comprehensive peace agreement that would end the 13 years of conflict, and stressed the importance of the deployment of an interposition force/international stabilization force and the departure of President Taylor. The AU Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution (Addis Ababa, 24 July) [S/2003/760] welcomed the ECOWAS decision to deploy a vanguard force in Monrovia and appealed urgently to the international community to assist ECOWAS and take measures to deploy an international stabilization force.

Establishment of multinational force

The Secretary-General, on 29 July [S/2003/769], informed the Security Council that ECOWAS had indicated its readiness to deploy 1,500 troops to Liberia by mid-August, to serve as a "vanguard force" for the multinational force that he had proposed on 28 June (see p. 189). The vanguard force would comprise two battalions from Nigeria, one of which would be transferred from UNAMSIL, and a third battalion made up of 250 troops each from Ghana, Mali and Senegal. Expressing concern at the dramatic deterioration of the situation following renewed fighting in Monrovia on 18 July, the Secretary-General said it was essential to accelerate the deployment of the vanguard force to pave the way for an early deployment of the multinational force. The United States had announced that it would position appropriate military capabilities off Liberia's coast to support the deployment of the ECOWAS forces.

The deployment of the vanguard force would be the first phase of a three-phase deployment. The deployment of the full multinational force would constitute phase 2, and the establishment of a UN peacekeeping operation would constitute phase 3. Phase 2 troops would arrive immediately after President Taylor's departure. That multinational force would be relieved by a UN peacekeeping operation within the shortest possible time. It would be important for the Security Council to make an early decision on the establishment of such a UN mission, and to authorize a robust mandate in order to ensure that it had a credible deterrence capability. The main objective of the peacekeeping force would be to support implementation of the envisaged peace agreement, culminating in the holding of elections, for which the force would ensure the necessary conditions. An assessment mission would be sent to Liberia to determine the number of troops and other personnel needed. Jacques Klein, the Special Representative, would lead United Nations activities in Liberia. In view of those plans, the mandate of UNOL would have to be terminated and the staff and assets absorbed by the office of the Special Representative.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (August)

On 1 August [meeting 4803], the Security Council adopted resolution 1497(2003) by vote (12-0-3). The draft [S/2003/784] was submitted by the United States.

The Security Council,

Deeply concerned over the conflict in Liberia and its effects on the humanitarian situation, including the tragic loss of countless innocent lives, in that country, and its destabilizing effect on the region,

Stressing the need to create a secure environment that enables respect for human rights, including the well-being and rehabilitation of children, protects the well-being of civilians and supports the mission of humanitarian workers,

Reminding the parties of their obligations under the Liberian ceasefire agreement, signed in Accra, 17 June 2003,

Recalling that, in paragraph 4 of its resolution 1343 (2001) of 7 March 2001, the Council demanded that all States take action to prevent armed individuals and groups from using their territory to prepare and commit attacks on neighbouring countries and refrain from any action that might contribute to further destabilization on the borders between Guinea, Liberia and Sierra Leone,

Commending the Economic Community of West African States, in particular its Chairman, President John Kufuor of the Republic of Ghana, for its leadership role in facilitating the achievement of the aforementioned ceasefire agreement, and recognizing the critically important role it has played and necessarily will continue to play in the Liberia peace process, consistent with Chapter VIII of the Charter of the United Nations,

Commending also President Olusegun Obasanjo of the Federal Republic of Nigeria for his efforts to bring peace to Liberia,

Recalling the Secretary-General's request of 28 June 2003 to the Security Council to authorize the deployment of a multinational force to Liberia,

Determining that the situation in Liberia constitutes a threat to international peace and security, to stability in the West African subregion and to the peace process for Liberia,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter,

1. Authorizes Member States to establish a Multinational Force in Liberia to support the implementation of the ceasefire agreement of 17 June 2003, including establishing conditions for initial stages of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration activities, to help to establish and maintain security in the period after the departure of the current President and the installation of a successor authority, taking into account the agreements to be reached by the Liberian parties, to secure the environment for the delivery of humanitarian assistance and to prepare for the introduction of a longer-term United Nations stabilization force to relieve the Multinational Force;

2. Declares its readiness to establish such a follow-on United Nations stabilization force to support the transitional government and to assist in the implementation of a comprehensive peace agreement for Liberia, and requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council recommendations on the size, structure and mandate of this force, preferably by 15 August 2003, and its subsequent deployment no later than 1 October 2003;

3. Authorizes the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone to extend the necessary logistical support, for a limited period of up to thirty days, to the forward elements of the Economic Community of West African States in the Multinational Force, without prejudicing the operational capability of the Mission with respect to its mandate in Sierra Leone;

4. Requests the Secretary-General, pending a decision by the Security Council on the establishment of a United Nations peacekeeping operation in Liberia, to take the necessary steps, including the necessary logistical support to the elements of the Economic Community of West African States in the Multinational

Force, and pre-positioning critical logistical and personnel requirements to facilitate the rapid deployment of the envisaged operation;

5. Authorizes the Member States participating in the Multinational Force to take all necessary measures to fulfil its mandate;

6. Calls upon Member States to contribute personnel, equipment and other resources to the Multinational Force, and stresses that the expenses of the Multinational Force will be borne by the participating Member States and other voluntary contributions;

7. Decides that current or former officials or personnel from a contributing State which is not a party to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court shall be subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of that contributing State for all alleged acts or omissions arising out of or related to the Multinational Force or the United Nations stabilization force in Liberia, unless such exclusive jurisdiction has been expressly waived by that contributing State;

8. Decides also that the measures imposed by paragraphs 5 (a) and (b) of resolution 1343(2001) shall not apply to supplies of arms and related materiel and technical training and assistance intended solely for support of and use by the Multinational Force;

9. Demands that all States in the region refrain from any action that might contribute to instability in Liberia or on the borders between Liberia, Guinea, Sierra Leone and Côte d'Ivoire;

10. Calls upon the Liberian parties to cooperate with the Joint Verification Team and Joint Monitoring Commission as established under the ceasefire agreement of 17 June 2003;

11. Calls upon all Liberian parties and Member States to cooperate fully with the Multinational Force in the execution of its mandate and to respect the security and freedom of movement of the Multinational Force, as well as to ensure the safe and unimpeded access of international humanitarian personnel to populations in need in Liberia;

12. Stresses the urgent need for all Liberian parties who are signatories to the ceasefire agreement of 17 June 2003, in particular the leadership of Liberians United for Reconciliation and Democracy and the Movement for Democracy in Liberia, immediately and scrupulously to uphold the ceasefire agreement, to cease using violent means and to agree as soon as possible to an all-inclusive political framework for a transitional government until such time when free and fair elections can be held, and notes that critical to this endeavour is the fulfilment of the commitment to depart from Liberia made by President Charles Taylor;

13. Urges Liberians United for Reconciliation and Democracy and the Movement for Democracy in Liberia to refrain from any attempt to seize power by force, bearing in mind the position of the African Union on unconstitutional changes of government as stated in the 1999 Algiers decision and the 2000 Lomé Decision;

14. Decides to review the implementation of the present resolution within thirty days of adoption to consider the report and recommendations of the Secretary-General called for in paragraph 2 above and further steps that might be necessary;

15. Requests that the Secretary-General, through his Special Representative, report to the Council periodically on the situation in Liberia in relation to the implementation of the present resolution, including information on implementation by the Multinational Force of its mandate;

16. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

VOTE ON RESOLUTION 1497(2003):

In favour: Angola, Bulgaria, Cameroon, Chile, China, Guinea, Pakistan, Russian Federation, Spain, Syrian Arab Republic, United Kingdom, United States.

Against: None.

Abstaining: France, Germany, Mexico.

Comprehensive Peace Agreement

On 18 August in Accra, the Government of Liberia, LURD, MODEL and 18 political parties signed the Comprehensive Peace Agreement, which Ghana forwarded to the Security Council on 27 August [S/2003/850]. Under the terms of the Agreement, the signatories agreed to abide by the 17 June ceasefire agreement (see p. 189) and called on ECOWAS to establish immediately a multinational force to be deployed as an interposition force, the mandate of which was outlined in the Agreement and included a mechanism for monitoring implementation. The parties also agreed on the need for deployment of an international stabilization force in Liberia and requested the United Nations, in collaboration with ECOWAS, the AU and ICGL, to deploy such a force to support the Transitional Government in Liberia and to assist in implementing the Comprehensive Peace Agreement. The force's mandate, which was outlined in the Agreement, included monitoring disengagement and cantonment of forces, collecting weapons at disarmament sites, assisting in the delivery of humanitarian assistance, providing advice to the Transitional Government on forming a new and restructured Liberian army, and protecting civilians and political leaders under imminent threat of violence.

Other articles of the Agreement dealt with: disengagement of forces; a process for the cantonment, disarmament, demobilization, rehabilitation and reintegration of troops; security sector reform, including the disbandment of irregular forces, reforming and restructuring of the Liberian armed forces, and restructuring of the police and other security services; release of prisoners and abductees; human rights issues, including the establishment of a Truth and Reconciliation Commission; providing access for delivery of humanitarian relief; the establishment of a Governance Reform Commission that would ensure transparency and accountability; electoral reform and organization of elections; establishment of an all-inclusive National Transitional Government; post-conflict rehabilitation and reconstruction, including reintegration of refugees and displaced persons, paying special attention to the rehabilitation of vulnerable groups or war victims (children, women, the elderly and the disabled); and a general amnesty for those engaged in military activities during the Liberian civil conflict. The parties called on ECOWAS, the United Nations, the AU and ICGL to use their good offices to ensure that the Peace Agreement was implemented.

Under the Agreement, the National Transitional Government had the responsibility to ensure implementation of the Agreement, including preparation of elections to be held in October 2005. On 21 August, Gyude Bryant, head of the Liberia Action Party, was appointed as Chairman of the National Transitional Government.

Security Council consideration. Addressing the Security Council on 27 August [meeting 4815], the Chairman of ECOWAS, Ghana's Foreign Minister, Nana Akufo-Addo, said that the departure of President Taylor on 11 August for Nigeria had contributed significantly to the conclusion of the Peace Agreement. The ECOWAS interposition force was currently deployed at a strength of 1,696 troops and would increase to about 3,500 by September.

The ECOWAS Executive Secretary, Mohamed Ibn Chambas, said that the issue of armed groups that roamed freely in the MRU area and in western Côte d'Ivoire remained a problem, as did the proliferation of small arms and light weapons in West Africa. He called on the Council to lift its sanctions against Liberia (see p. 201) in order to allow the forthcoming Transitional Government to function effectively.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (August)

On 27 August [meeting 4815], following consultations among Security Council members, the President made statement S/PRST/2003/14 on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council welcomes the briefing provided by representatives of the Economic Community of West African States, including Mr. Nana Akufo-Addo, Minister for Foreign Affairs of Ghana, Mr. Mamadou Bamba, Minister for Foreign Affairs of Côte d'Ivoire, Mr. François Fall, Minister for Foreign Affairs of Guinea, Mr. Oluyemi Adeniji, Minister for Foreign Affairs of Nigeria, Mr. Papa Louis Fall, Permanent Representative of Senegal to the United Nations, and Mr. Mohamed Ibn Chambas, Executive Secretary of the Economic Community of West African States, on the Comprehensive Peace Agreement reached in Accra on 18 August 2003.

The Council welcomes the Comprehensive Peace Agreement reached by the Government of Liberia, rebel groups, political parties and civil society leaders in Accra on 18 August 2003.

The Council appreciates the efforts of the Economic Community of West African States, particularly those of Mr. John Kufuor, Chairman of that organization and President of the Republic of Ghana,

Mr. Mohamed Ibn Chambas, Executive Secretary, and mediator General Abdulsalami Abubakar, in negotiating this agreement.

The Council remains concerned at the situation in Liberia, particularly the continuing dire humanitarian situation of much of the population. It calls upon all parties to allow full, secure and unimpeded access for humanitarian agencies and personnel.

The Council again stresses the need to create a secure environment that enables respect for human rights, including the well-being and rehabilitation of children, especially child combatants, protects the well-being of civilians and supports the mission of humanitarian workers.

The Council pays tribute to the donors that are supporting the deployment of the Economic Community of West African States' Mission in Liberia, encourages all Member States to provide financial, logistical and material support to the Member States participating in the force led by the Economic Community of West African States, and calls upon the donor community to provide urgent humanitarian assistance to those in need in Liberia.

The Council urges all parties to respect fully the ceasefire and to implement fully all their commitments under the Comprehensive Peace Agreement signed at Accra on 18 August 2003, including through full cooperation with the Economic Community of West African States' Mission in Liberia, the United Nations, the International Contact Group on Liberia, the African Union and the United States of America to establish a Joint Monitoring Committee, which is a critical aspect of the Liberian peace process, as required under the Accra agreement.

The Council reaffirms its readiness, as stated in paragraph 2 of its resolution 1497(2003) of 1 August 2003, to establish a follow-on United Nations stabilization force to support the transitional government and to assist in the implementation of a comprehensive peace agreement for Liberia.

Communications (September). Both the EU [S/2003/859] and the AU [S/2003/876] issued September statements welcoming the Comprehensive Peace Agreement. The EU stressed the importance of completing the deployment of ECOMIL as a vanguard force of the UN stabilization force, in accordance with resolution 1497(2003) (see p. 190). The AU urged the warring factions to observe the 17 June ceasefire agreement.

Report of Secretary-General (September). As requested by the Security Council in resolution 1497(2003) (see p. 190), the Secretary-General submitted an 11 September report on Liberia [S/2003/875], in which he provided the historical background of the Liberian conflict and an account of recent political and military developments. Based on the findings of an August/September assessment mission to Liberia, led by his Special Representative, the Secretary-General presented recommendations for establishing a UN peacekeeping mission (see below).

The Secretary-General noted that the security situation in Liberia continued to improve following the signing of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement, although it was still highly unstable. Government forces were estimated at over 20,000 troops, LURD had a strength of some 5,000 fighters, mainly in western Liberia, and MODEL had a force of 1,500 to 3,000 fighters, operating in the eastern parts of the country. Judicial institutions and the police suffered from problems of corruption and had nearly ceased to function. Of the estimated 250,000 people who had lost their lives in war-related circumstances since 1989, at least half were civilian non-combatants; all sides were responsible for violations of human rights and abuses. The humanitarian situation remained dire; nearly a million Liberians, or a third of the population, were displaced. Large numbers of refugees from Sierra Leone, Côte d'Ivoire and other countries added to the humanitarian woes. The cumulative impact of the conflict had reduced the already declining living standards. Liberia was one of the world's poorest countries, with high illiteracy rates and unemployment, and 75 per cent of the population lived below the poverty line.

Following the deployment of ECOMIL, the UN country team started to return to Monrovia on 11 August. The humanitarian community gave priority to rapid assessments and emergency interventions, particularly in the food, health, nutrition, water and sanitation, education and protection sectors. It was expected that the majority of internally displaced persons would, for the time being, remain in camps and would be dependent on aid for months to come.

One of the greatest challenges in Liberia and the neighbouring countries was the presence of thousands of combatants, including children, of various nationalities. Successful disarmament, demobilization and reintegration (DDR) of those ex-combatants would be crucial to sustainable peace and security. In Liberia alone, there were an estimated 27,000 to 38,000 combatants, many of whom were children. The Secretary-General urged all stakeholders, particularly the National Transitional Government and all other Liberian parties, ECOMIL, the proposed UN peacekeeping operation, all aid agencies and NGO partners, to coordinate efforts to develop an effective DDR programme. Adequate and secure funding would be required for maintaining cantonment sites, supporting ex-combatants and their families during the process, and providing cash and other incentives to encourage them to disarm and demobilize. The UN force should be responsible for disarming and demobilizing the combatants in the cantonment sites. Particular attention should be given to the needs of child combatants, women among the fighting forces, dependants of combatants, camp followers and abductees. Any DDR programme for Liberia should be linked to the ongoing DDR process in Côte d'Ivoire and benefit from lessons learned in Sierra Leone and other peace initiatives in the region and should form part of a strategy aimed at the political and economic recovery of the West African sub-region.

The Secretary-General viewed the transfer of power from President Taylor to Vice-President Blah and the signing of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement as a unique window of opportunity to end the suffering and to find a peaceful solution to a conflict that had been the epicentre of instability in the subregion. There remained, however, formidable challenges to lasting peace, and he called on the parties to abide by the terms of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement. The effective functioning of the National Transitional Government would be crucial to its implementation.

Establishment of UNMIL

As envisaged by Security Council resolution 1497(2003) (see p. 190) and the Comprehensive Peace Agreement, the Secretary-General recommended the establishment of a multidimensional UN peacekeeping operation in Liberia, the United Nations Mission in Liberia (UNMIL) [S/2003/875]. On the basis of the findings of the multidisciplinary assessment mission, he proposed a mandate that included supporting the National Transitional Government and the other parties in implementing the Agreement, monitoring the ceasefire, protecting civilians and supporting the safe return of refugees, assisting in the DDR programme and monitoring the human rights situation. The mission would be composed of political, military, civilian police, criminal justice, civil affairs, human rights, gender, child protection, DDR, public information and support components, and would have an electoral component in due course. The Secretary-General described the tasks of each of those components. The mission would also include a mechanism for coordinating its activities with those of the humanitarian and development community and would coordinate closely with ECOWAS and the AU. It would be headed by his Special Representative, who would have overall authority for the Mission and the UN system in Liberia.

The Secretary-General recommended that the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, authorize the deployment of a multidimensional UN peacekeeping operation with adequate resources, and a troop strength of up to 15,000, including 250 military observers, 160 staff officers and up to 875 civilian police officers and an additional five armed formed units, each comprising 120 officers and a significant civilian component and necessary support staff.

On 16 September [S/2003/899], the Secretary-General, noting the planned UN peacekeeping force for Liberia, informed the Council that he intended to close the operations of UNOL as soon as the deployment of the peacekeeping mission was authorized. The major functions performed by UNOL would be transferred to the new UN operation in Liberia.

Security Council consideration. The Security Council considered the proposal for UNMIL at a private meeting on 15 September [meeting 4825] and at an open meeting the next day [meeting 4826]. The Special Representative, Mr. Klein, said that Liberia's massive humanitarian and political crisis called for immediate intervention. The UN force had to be credible, well trained and well equipped, as its tasks were many and arduous.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (September)

On 19 September [meeting 4830], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1509 (2003). The draft [S/2003/898] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions and the statements by its President on Liberia, including its resolution 1497 (2003) of 1 August 2003 and the statement by its President of 27 August 2003, and other relevant resolutions and statements,

Expressing its utmost concern at the dire consequences of the prolonged conflict for the civilian population throughout Liberia, in particular the increase in the number of refugees and internally displaced persons,

Stressing the urgent need for substantial humanitarian assistance to the Liberian population,

Deploring all violations of human rights, particularly atrocities against civilian populations, including widespread sexual violence against women and children,

Expressing its deep concern at the limited access of humanitarian workers to populations in need, including refugees and internally displaced persons, and stressing the need for the continuation of the relief operations of the United Nations and other agencies, as well as the promotion and monitoring of human rights,

Emphasizing the need for all parties to safeguard the welfare and security of humanitarian workers and United Nations personnel in accordance with applicable rules and principles of international law, and recalling in this regard its resolution 1502(2003) of 26 August 2003,

Mindful of the need for accountability for violations of international humanitarian law, and urging the transitional government, once established, to ensure that the protection of human rights and the establishment of a State based on the rule of law and of an independent judiciary are among its highest priorities,

Reiterating its support for the efforts of the Economic Community of West African States, particularly those of Mr. John Kufuor, Chairman of that organization and President of the Republic of Ghana, Mr. Mohammed Ibn Chambas, Executive Secretary, and mediator General Abdulsalami Abubakar, as well as those of President Olusegun Obasanjo of the Federal Republic of Nigeria, to bring peace to Liberia, and recognizing the critically important role that they continue to play in the Liberia peace process,

Welcoming the continued support of the African Union for the leadership role of the Economic Community of West African States in the peace process in Liberia, in particular the appointment of an African Union Special Envoy for Liberia, and further encouraging the African Union to continue to support the peace process through close collaboration and coordination with the Economic Community of West African States and the United Nations,

Commending the rapid and professional deployment to Liberia of the forces of the Economic Community of West African States' Mission in Liberia, pursuant to Council resolution 1497(2003), as well as Member States which have assisted the Economic Community of West African States in its efforts, and stressing the responsibilities of all parties to cooperate with Mission forces in Liberia,

Noting that lasting stability in Liberia will depend on peace in the subregion, and emphasizing the importance of cooperation among the countries of the subregion to this end, as well as the need for coordination of United Nations efforts to contribute to the consolidation of peace and security in the subregion,

Gravely concerned by the use of child soldiers by armed rebel militias, government forces and other militias,

Reaffirming its support, as set out in the statement by its President of 27 August 2003, for the Comprehensive Peace Agreement reached by the Government of Liberia, rebel groups, political parties and civil society leaders in Accra on 18 August 2003 and the Liberian ceasefire agreement signed at Accra on 17 June 2003,

Reaffirming that the primary responsibility for implementing the Comprehensive Peace Agreement and the ceasefire agreement rests with the parties, and urging the parties to move forward with the implementation of those agreements immediately in order to ensure the peaceful formation of a transitional government by 14 October 2003,

Welcoming the resignation and departure from Liberia of former President Charles Taylor on 11 August 2003 and the peaceful transfer of power from Mr. Taylor,

Stressing the importance of the Joint Monitoring Committee, as provided for by the ceasefire agreement of 17 June 2003, to ensuring peace in Liberia, and urging all parties to establish this body as quickly as possible,

Recalling the framework for the establishment of a longer-term United Nations stabilization force to relieve the forces of the Economic Community of West African States' Mission in Liberia, as set out in resolution 1497(2003),

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 11 September 2003 and the recommendations contained therein,

Taking note of the intention of the Secretary-General to terminate the mandate of the United Nations Office in Liberia, as indicated in his letter dated 16 September 2003 addressed to the President of the Security Council,

Taking note also of the intention of the Secretary-General to transfer the major functions performed by the United Nations Office in Liberia to the United Nations Mission in Liberia, together with staff of the Office, as appropriate,

Determining that the situation in Liberia continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security in the region, to stability in the West African subregion and to the peace process for Liberia,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides to establish the United Nations Mission in Liberia, the stabilization force called for in resolution 1497(2003), for a period of twelve months, requests the Secretary-General to transfer authority from the forces of the Economic Community of West African States' Mission in Liberia led by the Economic Community of West African States to the United Nations Mission in Liberia on 1 October 2003, and decides that the Mission shall consist of up to 15,000 United Nations military personnel, including up to 250 military observers and 160 staff officers, and up to 1,115 civilian police officers, including formed units to assist in the maintenance of law and order throughout Liberia, and the appropriate civilian component;

2. Welcomes the appointment by the Secretary-General of his Special Representative for Liberia to direct the operations of the Mission and coordinate all United Nations activities in Liberia;

3. Decides that the Mission shall have the following mandate:

Support for implementation of the ceasefire agreement

(a) To observe and monitor the implementation of the ceasefire agreement and investigate violations of the ceasefire;

(b) To establish and maintain continuous liaison with the field headquarters of military forces of all the parties;

(c) To assist in the development of cantonment sites and to provide security at these sites;

(d) To observe and monitor disengagement and cantonment of military forces of all the parties;

(e) To support the work of the Joint Monitoring Committee;

(f) To develop, as soon as possible, preferably within thirty days of the adoption of the present resolution, in cooperation with the Joint Monitoring Committee, relevant international financial institutions, international development organizations and donor nations, an action plan for the overall implementation of a disarmament, demobilization, reintegration and repatriation programme for all armed parties, with particular attention to the special needs of child combatants and women, and addressing the inclusion of non-Liberian combatants;

(g) To carry out voluntary disarmament and to collect and destroy weapons and ammunition as part of an organized disarmament, demobilization, reintegration and repatriation programme;

(h) To liaise with the Joint Monitoring Committee and to advise on the implementation of its functions under the Comprehensive Peace Agreement and the ceasefire agreement;

(i) To provide security at key government installations, in particular ports, airports and other vital infrastructure;

Protection of United Nations staff, facilities and civilians

(j) To protect United Nations personnel, facilities, installations and equipment, to ensure the security and freedom of movement of its personnel and, without prejudice to the efforts of the government, to protect civilians under imminent threat of physical violence, within its capabilities;

Support for humanitarian and human rights assistance

(k) To facilitate the provision of humanitarian assistance, including by helping to establish the necessary security conditions;

(l) To contribute towards international efforts to promote and protect human rights in Liberia, with particular attention to vulnerable groups, including refugees, returning refugees and internally displaced persons, women, children and demobilized child soldiers, within its capabilities and under acceptable security conditions, in close cooperation with other United Nations agencies, related organizations, governmental organizations and non-governmental organizations;

(m) To ensure an adequate human rights presence, capacity and expertise within the Mission to carry out human rights promotion, protection and monitoring activities;

Support for security reform

(n) To assist the transitional government of Liberia in monitoring and restructuring the police force of Liberia, consistent with democratic policing, to develop a civilian police training programme and to assist otherwise in the training of civilian police, in cooperation with the Economic Community of West African States, international organizations and interested States;

(o) To assist the transitional government in the formation of a new and restructured Liberian military, in cooperation with the Economic Community of West African States, international organizations and interested States;

Support for implementation of the peace process

(p) To assist the transitional government, in conjunction with the Economic Community of West African States and other international partners, in the re-establishment of national authority throughout the country, including the establishment of a functioning administrative structure at both the national and the local levels;

(q) To assist the transitional government, in conjunction with the Economic Community of West African States and other international partners, in developing a strategy to consolidate governmental institutions, including a national legal framework and judicial and correctional institutions;

(r) To assist the transitional government in restoring proper administration of natural resources;

(s) To assist the transitional government, in conjunction with the Economic Community of West African States and other international partners, in preparing for national elections scheduled for no later than the end of 2005;

4. Demands that the Liberian parties cease hostilities throughout Liberia and fulfil their obligations under the Comprehensive Peace Agreement and the ceasefire agreement, including cooperation in the formation of the Joint Monitoring Committee as established under the ceasefire agreement;

5. Calls upon all parties to cooperate fully in the deployment and operations of the Mission, including by ensuring the safety, security and freedom of movement of United Nations personnel, together with associated personnel, throughout Liberia;

6. Encourages the Mission, within its capabilities and areas of deployment, to support the voluntary return of refugees and internally displaced persons;

7. Requests the Government of Liberia to conclude a status-of-forces agreement with the Secretary-General within thirty days of the adoption of the present resolution, and notes that, pending the conclusion of such an agreement, the model status-of-forces agreement dated 9 October 1990 shall apply provisionally;

8. Calls upon all parties to ensure, in accordance with relevant provisions of international law, the full, safe and unhindered access of relief personnel to all those in need and the delivery of humanitarian assistance, in particular to internally displaced persons and refugees;

9. Recognizes the importance of the protection of children in armed conflict, in accordance with its resolution 1379(2001) of 20 November 2001 and related resolutions;

10. Demands that all parties cease all use of child soldiers and cease all human rights violations and atrocities against the Liberian population, and stresses the need to bring to justice those responsible;

11. Reaffirms the importance of a gender perspective in peacekeeping operations and post-conflict peace-building, in accordance with resolution 1325 (2000) of 31 October 2000, recalls the need to address violence against women and girls as a tool of warfare, and encourages the Mission as well as the Liberian parties actively to address these issues;

12. Decides that the measures imposed by paragraphs 5 (a) and (b) of resolution 1343(2001) of 7 March 2001 shall not apply to supplies of arms and related materiel and technical training and assistance intended solely for the support of or use by the Mission;

13. Reiterates its demand that all States in the region cease military support for armed groups in neighbouring countries, take action to prevent armed individuals and groups from using their territory to prepare and commit attacks on neighbouring countries and refrain from any actions that might contribute to further destabilization of the situation in the region, and declares its readiness to consider, if necessary, ways of promoting compliance with this demand;

14. Calls upon the transitional government to restore fully Liberia's relations with its neighbours and to normalize Liberia's relations with the international community;

15. Calls upon the international community to consider how it might help future economic development in Liberia aimed at achieving long-term stability in the country and improving the welfare of its people;

16. Stresses the need for an effective public information capacity, including the establishment, as necessary, of United Nations radio stations to promote understanding of the peace process and the role of the Mission among local communities and the parties;

17. Calls upon the Liberian parties to engage for the purpose of addressing the question of disarmament, demobilization, reintegration and repatriation on an urgent basis, and urges the parties, in particular the transitional government of Liberia, and the rebel groups Liberians United for Reconciliation and Democracy and the Movement for Democracy in Liberia, to work closely with the Mission, the Joint Monitoring Committee, relevant assistance organizations and donor nations in the implementation of a disarmament, demobilization, reintegration and repatriation programme;

18. Calls upon the international donor community to provide assistance for the implementation of a disarmament, demobilization, reintegration and repatriation programme, and sustained international assistance to the peace process, and to contribute to consolidated humanitarian appeals;

19. Requests the Secretary-General to provide regular updates, including a formal report every ninety days to the Council, on the progress in the implementation of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement and the present resolution, including the implementation of the mandate of the Mission;

20. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

The Secretary-General, on 29 September [S/2003/926], informed the Security Council of his intention to appoint Lieutenant General Ishmael Opande (Kenya) as UNMIL Force Commander as of 1 October. On 1 October [S/2003/927], the Council took note of his intention.

In a 9 October press statement [SC/7890-AFR/725], Council members expressed appreciation for the service performed by ECOWAS forces in Liberia and looked forward to a smooth transition from ECOWAS to UNMIL. They welcomed the fact that the new headquarters would be operational by 1 November and that forces would be fully deployed by March 2004. Members expressed concern that former President Taylor was still attempting to influence events in Liberia and noted that any interference from him could threaten the peace agreement. They underscored the importance for Liberia of a programme to demobilize, disarm, reintegrate and repatriate combatants to peace and security and urged all parties to commit to those efforts. They called on all armed groups to respect the ceasefire, to support the Transitional Government and to cooperate in such a programme.

Security Council mission. The Secretary-General reported in December [S/2003/1147] on progress made in implementing the recommendations of the Security Council mission to West Africa (see p. 163). With regard to Liberia, he reported that the ceasefire was generally holding despite sporadic harassment of civilians in some places by all warring parties. A disarmament, demobilization, reintegration and rehabilitation (DDRR) action plan had been completed for 38,000 combatants, including 8,000 child soldiers and 1,000 female combatants. UNMIL had taken over from the ECOMIL force on 1 October. Although Monrovia and its surroundings were secured, UNMIL needed more troops to deploy inside the country so as to stabilize it. Monitoring of the ceasefire had begun, and a number of organizations were working together on improving respect for international humanitarian law and human rights.

In general, the mission found, the early steps taken towards implementing the peace process augured well for the stability of Liberia and for the consolidation of peace in Sierra Leone. However, stabilizing Liberia remained a challenge and was contingent upon the timely mobilization and deployment of the required troops throughout the country, especially as disarmament and demobilization of combatants began.

Report of Secretary-General (December). In accordance with Security Council resolution 1509(2003) (see p. 194), the Secretary-General, on 15 December [S/2003/1175], issued his first progress report on UNMIL.

UNMIL took over peacekeeping responsibilities from ECOMIL on 1 October. All of the approximately 3,600 ECOMIL troops from Benin, the Gambia, Ghana, Guinea-Bissau, Mali, Nigeria, Senegal and Togo were reassigned to UNMIL, switching hats to become UN peacekeepers. Shortly after the takeover, United States ships that had been positioned off the coast since August withdrew from the area. As at 12 December, UNMIL troop strength stood at 5,900 military personnel. More contingents from Bangladesh, Namibia, Pakistan, Sweden and Ukraine, as well as military observers from various Member States, were scheduled to arrive in early 2004, with full deployment expected by the end of February. Delays in finding the necessary troops and equipment, in particular helicopters and signals units, had hampered deployment.

Ceasefire violations were reported in a number of locations. In Monrovia, a violation occurred on 1 October, the day of the handover from ECOMIL to UNMIL, after which UNMIL stepped up its patrols and the ceasefire held there until 7 December, when there were riots by former government soldiers and militias at the launching of the disarmament and demobilization exercise at a cantonment site near the city. Beyond Monrovia and the areas to which UNMIL had deployed, the security situation remained volatile and there was sporadic fighting. Until UNMIL received sufficient troops to deploy to areas affected by clashes, further sporadic fighting, looting and harassment of civilians were likely.

The Joint Monitoring Committee had been a valuable mechanism for monitoring the ceasefire, maintaining dialogue among the armed groups, and facilitating contacts between UNMIL and the ground commanders of those groups. The Committee, comprising representatives of MODEL, LURD and former government forces and chaired by the UNMIL Force Commander, played a key role in the efforts to end the sporadic fighting in the interior of the country. At the first meeting convened by UNMIL on 6 October, the armed groups agreed to declare Monrovia and key areas on the outskirts of the city a "weapon-free zone". Pursuant to that decision, the then interim President, Moses Blah, handed over to UNMIL several tons of arms and ammunition belonging to the former government forces. UNMIL also collected 22 tons of arms and ammunition that had been illegally imported by former President Charles Taylor but were seized by ECOMIL. In addition, some 800 militia personnel loyal to former President Taylor handed over their weapons to UNMIL. In preparation for the cantonment and disarmament of combatants, the Committee was collecting information from the armed groups on the numbers and location of their forces.

UNMIL cooperated with a number of other UN and international organizations on the elaboration of an action plan for DDRR, which would target an estimated 40,000 combatants. The initial phase, which began on 7 December, targeted 1,000 from each of the three armed factions. The plan would involve disarmament, destruction of weapons and interviews for reintegration. Before being discharged from the cantonment sites, each former combatant would receive a stipend for resettlement expenses and would begin a long-term reintegration programme. Special arrangements would be made for child and female combatants. A subregional approach involving foreign combatants in Liberia was being discussed by UNMIL and a number of other UN missions, offices and agencies. A National Commission for DDRR was established to oversee the whole programme and make policy decisions. A Joint Implementation Unit was established to coordinate the implementation of the DDRR process on the ground. By the end of the year, the cantonment facilities for the former government forces were established, but facilities for the LURD and MODEL forces had yet to be prepared.

As requested by the Security Council in resolution 1509(2003), UNMIL civilian police, expected to total 80 by the end of the year, would assist the national police in restructuring and training the force. To that end, a nucleus of the interim police force, comprising 20 police officers, had already received "fast track" training by UNMIL.

The National Transitional Government of Liberia, a key element of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement, was inaugurated on 14 October and power was transferred from the interim Government led by President Moses Blah to the new Government led by Chairman Charles Gyude Bryant. The signatory parties to the Peace Agreement submitted nominations for the 22 Cabinet posts allocated to them under its terms. However, Chairman Bryant rejected the nominations made by LURD for three posts. LURD threatened to pull out of the peace process and to refuse access by UNMIL to areas under its control. Following a series of meetings convened by UNMIL, the three armed groups, on 27 November, renewed their demands for more senior government posts. On 28 November, the Implementation Monitoring Committee, comprising representatives of UNMIL, ECOWAS, the AU, the EU and ICGL, held its first meeting, at which it condemned the attempt by the armed groups to make the attainment of government posts a precondition for their participation in the DDRR programme. It also requested the Joint Monitoring Committee to recommend measures to be taken against parties responsible for continuing violations of the ceasefire agreement, adding that those breaking international humanitarian law would be held accountable for their crimes. The National Transitional Legislative Assembly also began its work, electing officers and establishing its committees. Nine of the 67 seats in that body were not filled at the time of the report.

The UNMIL civil affairs component conducted an assessment of the functional capacities of government ministries and other public administration structures. The preliminary findings indicated that, of the 22 ministries surveyed, only two were working. All the others either were partially functioning or had closed down completely due to looting and non-payment of salaries. The UNMIL mandate envisaged the setting up of judicial and corrections components within the Mission's structure, to include training, advisory and court monitoring programmes. Other UNMIL assistance was planned in the areas of controlling the exploitation of natural resources, electoral planning and public information.

The humanitarian situation in Monrovia was gradually improving. Relief assistance was being delivered to vulnerable groups in and around the capital. Since August, UN agencies and their partners had delivered food assistance to about 380,000 beneficiaries, helped to reduce cholera and prevent fatalities through chlorination of open wells, benefiting 400,000 people, vaccinated 600,000 children against measles, supported basic health-care services in accessible areas, provided protection and assistance to internally displaced persons and refugees, and assisted in the repatriation of Sierra Leonean refugees. Assessment missions by humanitarian agencies, with UNMIL assistance, revealed massive destruction and vandalizing of physical infrastructure and the total collapse of basic social services. UN agencies formulated a consolidated inter-agency appeal aimed at responding to the immediate needs of the Liberian population, in which they requested $137 million to support proposed programmes (see p. 931).

The human rights situation in Liberia remained a major cause for concern. The ongoing skirmishes between the armed factions were accompanied by attacks on civilians, often including deliberate killings, mutilations, rape, torture, arson, abduction and harassment, in addition to extortion, looting and the destruction of property. Reports were received of reprisal attacks and atrocities against ethnic Gio and Mano peoples by Krahn elements associated with MODEL. In collaboration with other organizations, UNMIL was documenting cases of serious violations of human rights and humanitarian law, including information on the perpetrators, victims and eyewitnesses.

In general, the Secretary-General found there had been an encouraging start to the efforts to re-establish security, facilitate the delivery of humanitarian assistance and promote the peace process in Liberia over the previous three months. UNMIL had begun extending its influence beyond the capital through air and ground patrols and had established liaison with the political and military leadership of the three parties. The main mechanisms for the implementation of the peace process were in place. It was essential at that point to expedite the deployment of UNMIL beyond the Monrovia area in order to stabilize the situation in the interior where skirmishes and human rights violations had continued since the signing of the peace agreements. To that end, more specialized support units were needed, in particular helicopter gunships and signals units. Regrettably, the armed groups had yet to demonstrate their full commitment to the peace process, as was apparent from the ongoing skirmishes, violations of human rights and the selfish pursuit of lucrative government posts. The riots that broke out at the beginning of the DDR process were particularly worrisome.

Liberia remained a main source of instability in neighbouring States, and the conflicts in Sierra Leone and Côte d'Ivoire were linked to the situation there. Subregional challenges needed to be tackled in a coordinated manner.

Later developments. On 25 December, the movement of the first contingent of UNMIL troops outside Monrovia was stopped just outside the capital by LURD elements (S/2004/229). LURD leaders contended that UNMIL deployment should not take place until a dispute between them and the Chairman of the National Transitional Government over the appointment of 84 assistant ministerial positions had been resolved. However, UNMIL insisted that there should be no linkage between the two issues, and a Pakistani unit was deployed to Klay Junction on 27 December without further hindrance. UNMIL troops subsequently deployed to Gbarnga and Buchanan on 31 December.

The DDR process at Camp Scheffelin, on the outskirts of Monrovia, was suspended on 17 December and a review of the operational aspects of the programme was carried out. At that time, 12,664 combatants had been disarmed, registered and given receipts as identification for their participation in the process; 8,686 assorted weapons had been collected.

The civilian police component began its programme of co-location with the Liberian National Police on 15 December. A joint crime prevention patrol programme entitled "Operation Restore Calm" was launched on the same day.

UN agencies and NGOs were in the process of relocating internally displaced persons from irregular shelters in central Monrovia back to their homes in the city or to recognized camps.

Financing of UNOMIL and UNMIL

UNOMIL

In April [A/57/794], the Secretary-General issued the final performance report of the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia (UNOMIL), whose mandate ended in 1997 [YUN 1997, p. 123]. The report contained information on income and expenditure, assets, outstanding liabilities and fund balances as at 30 June 2002. UNOMIL's assets as at 30 June 2002 comprised $3,576,000 in uncollected assessments and other receivables and net cash available of $12,930,000. In the light of the overall financial situation of the Organization and the fact that as at 15 March 2003 assessed contributions to peacekeeping in the amount of $1.5 billion remained unpaid, the Secretary-General proposed that the return of cash available for credit to Member States be suspended until the financial situation improved.

UNMIL

On 22 September [A/58/233], the Secretary-General requested the inclusion in the agenda of the fifty-eighth (2003) session of the General Assembly of an item on UNMIL financing.

On 29 October [A/58/539], he issued the budget for UNMIL for the period from 1 August 2003 to 30 June 2004, which amounted to $564,614,300, including contributions in kind totalling $120,000. The budget provided for the phased deployment of 14,785 military contingent personnel, 215 military observers, 1,115 civilian police officers, 893 international civilian personnel, including 286 United Nations Volunteers, and 768 national staff. The Secretary-General recommended that the Assembly appropriate the total amount for the operation of the Mission for the 11-month period, inclusive of $47,462,700 previously authorized by ACABQ to meet the initial critical logistical costs and personnel requirements for the period from 1 August to 31 December 2003.

ACABQ reviewed the proposed budget and issued its comments and recommendations in a November report [A/58/591]. It recommended appropriation of the amount of $564,494,300 gross ($559,284,300 net) for the operation of UNMIL for the period from 1 August 2003 to 30 June 2004, inclusive of the $47,462,700 already authorized. It further recommended that the total amount assessed for that period not exceed $450 million at that time.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 23 December [meeting 79], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/58/589], adopted resolution 58/261 A without vote [agenda item 165].

Financing of the United Nations Mission in LiberiaThe General Assembly,*

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Mission in Liberia and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Recalling Security Council resolution 1497(2003) of 1 August 2003, by which the Council declared its readiness to establish a United Nations stabilization force to support the transitional government and to assist in the implementation of a comprehensive peace agreement for Liberia,

Recalling also Security Council resolution 1509(2003) of 19 September 2003, by which the Council decided to establish the United Nations Mission in Liberia for a period of twelve months,

Reaffirming the general principles underlying the financing of United Nations peacekeeping operations, as stated in its resolutions 1874(S-IV) of 27 June 1963, 3101(XXVIII) of 11 December 1973 and 55/235 of 23 December 2000,

Noting with appreciation that voluntary contributions have been made to the Mission,

Mindful of the fact that it is essential to provide the Mission with the necessary financial resources to enable it to fulfil its responsibilities under the relevant resolution of the Security Council,

1. Expresses concern at the financial situation with regard to peacekeeping activities, in particular as regards the reimbursements to troop contributors that bear additional burdens owing to overdue payments by Member States of their assessments;

2. Also expresses concern at the delay experienced by the Secretary-General in deploying some recent peacekeeping missions, in particular those in Africa, and in providing them with adequate resources;

3. Emphasizes that all future and existing peacekeeping missions shall be given equal and non-discriminatory treatment in respect of financial and administrative arrangements;

4. Also emphasizes that all peacekeeping missions shall be provided with adequate resources for the effective and efficient discharge of their respective mandates;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to make the fullest possible use of facilities and equipment at the United Nations Logistics Base at Brindisi, Italy, in order to minimize the costs of procurement for the Mission;

6. Endorses the conclusions and recommendations contained in the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, and requests the Secretary-General to ensure their full implementation;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to take all necessary action to ensure that the Mission is administered with a maximum of efficiency and economy;

8. Also requests the Secretary-General, in order to reduce the cost of employing General Service staff, to make efforts to recruit local staff for the Mission against General Service posts, commensurate with the requirements of the Mission;

Budget estimates for the period from 1 August 2003 to 30 June 2004

9. Authorizes the Secretary-General to establish a special account for the United Nations Mission in Liberia for the purpose of accounting for income received and expenditure incurred in respect of the Mission;

10. Decides to appropriate to the Special Account for the United Nations Mission in Liberia the amount of 564,494,300 United States dollars for the period from 1 August 2003 to 30 June 2004, inclusive of the amount of 47,462,700 dollars previously authorized by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions for the operation of the Mission under the terms of section IV of General Assembly resolution 49/233 A of 23 December 1994 for the period from 1 August to 31 December 2003;

Financing of the appropriation

11. Decides also to apportion among Member States the amount of 450 million dollars at a monthly rate of 40,909,090 dollars, in accordance with the levels set out in resolution 55/235, as adjusted by the General Assembly in its resolutions 55/236 of 23 December 2000 and 57/290 A of 20 December 2002, and taking into account the scale of assessments for 2003 as set out in its resolutions 55/5 B of 23 December 2000 and 57/4 B of 20 December 2002 and the scale of assessments for 2004 as set out in its resolution 58/1 B of 23 December 2003;

12. Decides further that, in accordance with the provisions of its resolution 973(X) of 15 December 1955, there shall be set off against the apportionment among Member States, as provided for in paragraph 11 above, their respective share in the Tax Equalization Fund of 5,210,000 dollars at a monthly rate of 473,636 dollars, representing the estimated staff assessment income approved for the Mission;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to pursue, through collaboration between the United Nations Mission in Liberia, the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone and the United Nations Mission in Côte d'Ivoire, opportunities for optimizing, where possible, the provision and management of support resources and service delivery to the three missions;

14. Emphasizes that no peacekeeping mission shall be financed by borrowing funds from other active peacekeeping missions;

15. Notes with appreciation the utilization of the strategic deployment stocks to the Mission at the start-up stage;

16. Encourages the Secretary-General to take additional measures to ensure the safety and security of all personnel under the auspices of the United Nations participating in the Mission;

17. Invites voluntary contributions to the Mission in cash and in the form of services and supplies acceptable to the Secretary-General, to be administered, as appropriate, in accordance with the procedure and practices established by the General Assembly;

18. Decides to keep under review during its fifty-eighth session the item entitled "Financing of the United Nations Mission in Liberia".

Also on 23 December, the Assembly decided that the agenda item on UNMIL financing would remain for consideration during its resumed fifty-eighth (2004) session (decision 58/565).

Sanctions

In January, the Security Council considered the October 2002 report [YUN 2002, p. 172] of the Panel of Experts on Liberia, appointed pursuant to Council resolution 1408(2002) [ibid., p. 169]. The Panel was set up to investigate Liberia's compliance with demands made by the Council in resolution 1343(2001) [YUN 2001, p. 181] that sought to end any Liberian military or financial support of the Revolutionary United Front (RUF) of Sierra Leone and other rebel movements, including transfer of arms, military training, provision of communications and logistical assistance, and the import of Sierra Leonean rough diamonds not controlled through the certificate-of-origin regime. The Council had also demanded that Liberia ground all Liberia-registered aircraft until it had updated its aircraft register, as required under international agreements.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (January)

On 28 January [meeting 4693], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1458 (2003). The draft [S/2003/98] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 1408(2002) of 6 May 2002,

Noting that the next six-monthly review by the Security Council of the measures imposed by paragraphs 5 to 7 of resolution 1343(2001) of 7 March 2001, and extended by paragraph 5 of resolution 1408(2002), is scheduled to take place on or before 6 May 2003,

Deeply concerned about the situation in Liberia and neighbouring countries, especially in Côte d'Ivoire,

Recognizing the importance of monitoring the implementation of the provisions of resolutions 1343(2001) and 1408(2002),

1. Takes note of the report of the Panel of Experts on Liberia dated 25 October 2002, submitted pursuant to paragraph 16 of resolution 1408(2002);

2. Expresses its intention to continue to give full consideration to the report;

3. Decides to re-establish the Panel of Experts appointed pursuant to paragraph 16 of resolution 1408(2002) for a further period of three months commencing no later than 10 February 2003;

4. Requests the Panel of Experts to conduct a follow-up assessment mission to Liberia and neighbouring States, in order to investigate and compile a report on compliance by the Government of Liberia with the demands referred to in paragraph 2 of resolution 1343(2001) and on any violations of the measures referred to in paragraph 5 of resolution 1408(2002), including any involving rebel movements, to conduct a review of the audits referred to in paragraph 10 of resolution 1408(2002), and to report to the Council through the Security Council Committee established pursuant to paragraph 14 of resolution 1343(2001) (the Committee) no later than 16 April 2003 with the observations and recommendations of the Panel in relation to the tasks set out herein;

5. Also requests the Panel of Experts, as far as possible, to bring any relevant information collected in the course of the investigations conducted in accordance with its mandate to the attention of the States concerned for prompt and thorough investigation and, where appropriate, corrective action, and to allow them the right of reply;

6. Requests the Secretary-General, upon the adoption of the present resolution and acting in consultation with the Committee, to appoint no more than five experts, with the range of expertise necessary to fulfil the mandate of the Panel referred to in paragraph 4 above, drawing as much as possible and as appropriate on the expertise of the members of the Panel of Experts appointed pursuant to paragraph 16 of resolution 1408(2002), and also requests the Secretary-General to make the necessary financial arrangements to support the work of the Panel;

7. Urges all States, relevant United Nations bodies and, as appropriate, other organizations and interested parties to cooperate fully with the Committee and with the Panel of Experts, including by supplying information on possible violations of the measures imposed by paragraphs 5 to 7 of resolution 1343(2001);

8. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

In accordance with the Council decision to re-establish the Panel of Experts on Liberia in resolution 1458(2003) (above), the Secretary-General, in letters of 14 February [S/2003/185] and 5 March [S/2003/251], informed the Council of his appointment of five members to the Panel.

The AC Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution, at a meeting of heads of State and Government (Addis Ababa, 3 February) [S/2003/142], reiterated its appeal to the Council to reconsider its decision on the sanctions imposed against Liberia.

Report of Secretary-General (April). As requested by the Security Council in resolution 1408(2002) [YUN 2002, p. 169], the Secretary-General issued on 22 April [S/2003/466] his second six-monthly report on whether Liberia had complied with the Council's demands made in that resolution. The report drew on information provided by UNOL, the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL) and ECOWAS. The Government of Liberia claimed that it was in compliance with the Council's demands. With regard to the ban on the importation of uncertified rough diamonds, the Government reiterated that it was still in force. Concerning the export of diamonds, the Government stated that it had set in motion measures to ensure that only diamonds produced in Liberia would be exported with the Kimberley Process certificate of origin. However, mining activities were being carried out by the LURD rebel movement in the diamond-producing areas in the north and the Government could not determine which diamonds had been mined there.

The Government maintained that RUF as a rebel group no longer existed, since it had been transformed into a political party, the Revolutionary United Front Party, and had contested the 2002 elections in Sierra Leone. However, unofficial sources indicated that some RUF elements remained in Liberia. It was also alleged that Sam Bockarie and some RUF elements were engaged in the western front of the Ivorian conflict, with the connivance of the Liberian Government.

Report of Panel (April). On 24 April [S/2003/498] the Panel of Experts on Liberia issued a report, which was submitted to the Security Council. The Panel determined that Liberia's conflict was once more no longer isolated as its refugees and armed fighters had spilled over into its neighbours. Armed youths from Liberia, Sierra Leone, Guinea and, most recently, Côte d'Ivoire, who had become accustomed to a life of conflict, banditry and lawlessness had joined armed groups in Liberia and in western Côte d'Ivoire, posing new risks of a vicious cycle of violence in the subregion. The region was awash with weapons, and several companies that were involved in sanctions-busting by providing arms to Liberia were also delivering weapons to its neighbours, including Côte d'Ivoire. The Panel documented Guinea's support for LURD fighters in Liberia. Guinea was also used as a supply route for arms and supplies. The Panel had some evidence that the Government of Côte d'Ivoire was supporting the newly formed Lima armed militia and the rebel group MODEL.

Internal violence in Liberia had escalated in 2003, causing many humanitarian agencies to withdraw their staff. Poor governance, corruption and insecurity had ensured that there had been no significant investment in years, resulting in 85 per cent unemployment.

President Taylor, in March, openly declared that Liberia would import weapons for self-defence, and the Government provided the Panel with a list of weapons it had procured. The Panel concluded that those weapons were obtained in Serbia in 2002 from the arms manufacturer Zastava, using a false Nigerian end-user certificate. The Panel suspected that preparations were under way for trans-shipments of 50 tons of Serbian military equipment from Belgrade to Liberia via Kinshasa, using an end-user certificate from the DRC. The Panel, noting that Liberia and Guinea continued to violate the arms embargo, said that the basis for the imposition of the sanctions against Liberia needed to be reassessed because violence and conflict were spreading across the region and were generated not only by Liberian forces.

The Government of Liberia and LURD had made the control of diamond-producing areas a key military objective. In the current context, it would be difficult to find an area in Liberia from which rough diamonds could be declared "conflict-free". It was clearly the Government's objective to stamp out the illegal trade in diamonds and a plan was being developed to implement the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme, launched in 2002. Progress had been made in that regard but only an end to the internal conflict could guarantee success.

Government accounting was far from transparent. Revenues over the previous five years had never exceeded $85 million and the Government could be relying increasingly on off-budget income to fund its high defence expenditure. The Panel had documentary evidence of $7.5 million

(more than 10 per cent of average annual government revenue) of either questionable or clearly off-budget income, at least some of which was used for defence-related spending. Significant gains were realized by the import/export monopolies organized by the Government.

Among its recommendations, the Panel said that, in the light of the changed situation and escalating hostilities in the region, a new approach by the Security Council to the situation in West Africa was required that must include the input of key regional actors. The financing of armed non-State actors and the funding sources of their foreign sponsors required investigation. To prevent Liberia from further decay, international assistance was required to reorganize its revenue system.

The Panel recommended that: the moratorium on the importation, exportation and manufacturing of small arms in West Africa and its implementation mechanism, the Programme for Coordination and Assistance for Security and Development, should be strengthened through international assistance and technical support, and should become an information exchange mechanism for all types of weapons procured by ECOWAS members; an international mechanism for harmonizing and verifying all end-user certificates for weapons should be established; the Liberian Civil Aviation Authority should cooperate with the modalities of responsibilities, as provided for in the November 2001 letter of agreement between the Flight Information Region and the Approach Control Unit of Robertsfield International Airport [YUN 2001, p. 185], and also register all its aircraft; and, in order to define which areas could be classified "conflict-free" and from where diamonds were fit for export, the services of international mining and geological consultants should be engaged. In addition, the Panel named six individuals against whom financial sanctions should be imposed.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (May)

On 6 May [meeting 4751], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1478(2003). The draft [S/2003/522] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 1132(1997) of 8 October 1997, 1171(1998) of 5 June 1998, 1306(2000) of 5 July 2000, 1343(2001) of 7 March 2001, 1385(2001) of 19 December 2001, 1395(2002) of 27 February 2002, 1400(2002) of 28 March 2002, 1408(2002) of 6 May 2002, 1458(2003) of 28 January 2003, 1467(2003) of 18 March 2003 and its other resolutions and the statements by its President on the situation in the region,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 22 April 2003,

Taking note also of the reports of the Panel of Experts on Liberia dated 25 October 2002 and 24 April 2003 submitted pursuant to paragraph 16 of resolution 1408 (2002) and paragraph 4 of resolution 1458(2003) respectively,

Expressing serious concern at the findings of the Panel of Experts regarding the actions of the Government of Liberia and of Liberians United for Reconciliation and Democracy and other armed rebel groups, including the evidence that the Government of Liberia continues to breach the measures imposed pursuant to resolution 1343(2001), particularly through the acquisition of arms,

Welcoming General Assembly resolution 57/302 of 30 April 2003 and Security Council resolution 1459 (2003) of 28 January 2003, welcoming the launch of the Kimberley Process, on 1 January 2003, and recalling its concern at the role played by the illicit trade in diamonds in the conflict in the region,

Welcoming also the continued efforts of the Economic Community of West African States and the International Contact Group on Liberia to work towards the restoration of peace and stability in the region, particularly the appointment of General Abdulsalami Abubakar, former President of the Federal Republic of Nigeria, as a mediator in the conflict in Liberia,

Noting the positive effects of the Rabat Process on peace and security in the subregion, and encouraging all countries of the Mano River Union to reinvigorate the Process with further meetings and renewed cooperation,

Encouraging civil society initiatives in the region, including those of the Mano River Union Women's Peace Network, to continue their contribution towards regional peace,

Welcoming the summit meeting between the Presidents of the Republic of Liberia and the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, held in Togo on 26 April 2003, and encouraging them to continue dialogue,

Calling upon all States, and in particular the Government of Liberia, to cooperate fully with the Special Court for Sierra Leone,

Recalling the Economic Community of West African States Moratorium on the Importation, Exportation and Manufacture of Small Arms and Light Weapons in West Africa adopted in Abuja on 31 October 1998, and its extension from 5 July 2001,

Deeply concerned about the deteriorating humanitarian situation and widespread human rights violations in Liberia, and about the serious instability in Liberia and neighbouring countries, including Côte d'Ivoire,

Determining that the active support provided by the Government of Liberia to armed rebel groups in the region, including to rebels in Côte d'Ivoire and former combatants of the Revolutionary United Front who continue to destabilize the region, constitutes a threat to international peace and security in the region,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides that the Government of Liberia has not complied fully with the demands set out in resolution 1343(2001);

2. Notes with concern that the new aircraft registry updated by the Government of Liberia in response to the demand set out in paragraph 2 (e) of resolution 1343(2001) remains inactive;

3. Stresses that the demands referred to in paragraph 1 above are intended to help to consolidate and assure peace and stability in Sierra Leone and to build and strengthen peaceful relations among the countries of the region;

4. Calls upon all States in the region, and particularly the Government of Liberia, to participate actively in all regional peace initiatives, particularly those of the Economic Community of West African States, the International Contact Group on Liberia, the Mano River Union and the Rabat Process, and expresses its strong support for those initiatives;

5. Calls upon the Government of Liberia and Liberians United for Reconciliation and Democracy to enter without delay into bilateral ceasefire negotiations under the auspices of the Economic Community of West African States and the mediation of General Abdulsalami Abubakar, former President of Nigeria;

6. Stresses its readiness to grant exemptions from the measures imposed by paragraph 7 (a) of resolution 1343(2001) in cases of travel which would assist in the peaceful resolution of the conflict in the subregion;

7. Welcomes the agreement of the Government of Liberia to the revised mandate of the United Nations Peace-building Support Office in Liberia, and calls upon the Government to respond constructively to the statement by the President of the Security Council of 13 December 2002 (S/PRST/2002/36);

8. Calls upon the Government of Liberia and all parties, particularly Liberians United for Reconciliation and Democracy and other armed rebel groups, to ensure unimpeded and safe movement for the personnel of United Nations humanitarian agencies and non-governmental organizations, to end the use of child soldiers and to prevent sexual violence and torture;

9. Reiterates its demand that all States in the region cease military support for armed groups in neighbouring countries, take action to prevent armed individuals and groups using their territory to prepare and commit attacks on neighbouring countries and refrain from any actions that might contribute to further destabilization of the situation in the region, and declares its readiness to consider, if necessary, ways of promoting compliance with this demand;

10. Decides that the measures imposed by paragraphs 5 to 7 of resolution 1343(2001) shall remain in force for a further period of twelve months from 0001 hours eastern daylight time on 7 May 2003 and that, before the end of this period, the Council will decide whether the Government of Liberia has complied with the demands referred to in paragraph 1 above, and, accordingly, whether to extend these measures for a further period with the same conditions;

11. Recalls that the measures imposed by paragraph 5 of resolution 1343(2001) apply to all sales or supply of arms and related materiel to any recipient in Liberia, including all non-State actors, such as Liberians United for Reconciliation and Democracy;

12. Decides that the measures imposed by paragraphs 5 to 7 of resolution 1343(2001) and by paragraph 17 below shall be terminated immediately if the Council, taking into account, inter alia, the reports of the expert panel referred to in paragraph 25 below and the report of the Secretary-General referred to in paragraph 20 below, input from the Economic Community of West African States, any relevant information provided by the Security Council Committee established pursuant to paragraph 14 of resolution 1343(2001) (the Committee) and the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 1132 (1997) and any other relevant information, particularly the conclusions of its forthcoming mission to West Africa, determines that the Government of Liberia has complied with the demands referred to in paragraph 1 above;

13. Reiterates its call upon the Government of Liberia to establish an effective certificate-of-origin regime for Liberian rough diamonds that is transparent, internationally verifiable and fully compatible with the Kimberley Process, and to provide the Committee with a detailed description of the proposed regime;

14. Decides, notwithstanding paragraph 15 of resolution 1343(2001), that rough diamonds controlled by the Government of Liberia through the certificate-of-origin regime shall be exempt from the measures imposed by paragraph 6 of resolution 1343(2001) when the Committee has reported to the Council, taking into account expert advice obtained through the Secretary-General, that an effective and internationally verifiable regime is ready to become fully operational and to be properly implemented;

15. Calls again upon States, relevant international organizations and other bodies in a position to do so to offer assistance to the Government of Liberia and other diamond-exporting countries in West Africa with their certificate-of-origin regimes;

16. Considers that the audits commissioned by the Government of Liberia pursuant to paragraph 10 of resolution 1408(2002) do not demonstrate that the revenue derived by the Government of Liberia from the Liberia Ship and Corporate Registry and the Liberian timber industry is used for legitimate social, humanitarian and development purposes, and is not used in violation of resolution 1408(2002);

17. Decides that:

(a) All States shall take the necessary measures to prevent, for a period of ten months, the import into their territories of all round logs and timber products originating in Liberia;

(b) These measures shall come into force at 0001 hours eastern daylight time on 7 July 2003, unless the Council decides otherwise;

(c) At the end of this period of ten months, the Council will decide whether the Government of Liberia has complied with the demands referred to in paragraph 1 above and, accordingly, whether to extend these measures for a further period with the same conditions;

18. Decides also to consider, by 7 September 2003, how best to minimize any humanitarian or socio-economic impact of the measures imposed by paragraph 17 above, including the possibility of allowing timber exports to resume in order to fund humanitarian programmes, taking into account the recommendations of the expert panel requested in paragraph 25 below and the assessment of the Secretary-General requested in paragraph 19 below;

19. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report to the Council by 7 August 2003 on the possible humanitarian or socio-economic impact of the measures imposed by paragraph 17 above;

20. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit a report to the Council by 21 October 2003, and thereafter at six-monthly intervals from that date, drawing on information from all relevant sources, including the United Nations Peace-building Support Office in Liberia, the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone and the Economic Community of West African States, on whether Liberia has complied with the demands referred to in paragraph 1 above, and calls upon the Government of Liberia to support United Nations efforts to verify all information on compliance which is brought to the notice of the United Nations;

21. Invites the Economic Community of West African States to report regularly to the Committee on all activities undertaken by its members pursuant to paragraphs 10 and 17 above and in the implementation of the present resolution, particularly on the implementation of the Economic Community of West African States Moratorium on the Importation, Exportation and Manufacture of Small Arms and Light Weapons in West Africa referred to in the preamble to the present resolution;

22. Calls upon States of the subregion to strengthen the measures they have taken to combat the spread of small arms and light weapons and mercenary activities and to improve the effectiveness of the Moratorium, and urges States in a position to do so to provide assistance to the Economic Community of West African States to this end;

23. Calls upon all parties to conflicts in the region to include disarmament, demobilization and reintegration provisions in peace agreements;

24. Requests the Committee to carry out the tasks set out in the present resolution and to continue with its mandate as set out in paragraphs 14 (a) to (h) of resolution 1343(2001) and in resolution 1408(2002);

25. Requests the Secretary-General to establish, within one month from the date of adoption of the present resolution, in consultation with the Committee, for a period of five months, a Panel of Experts consisting of up to six members, with the range of expertise necessary to fulfil the mandate of the Panel described in the present paragraph, drawing as much as possible and as appropriate on the expertise of the members of the Panel of Experts established pursuant to resolution 1458(2003), to undertake the following tasks:

(a) To conduct a follow-up assessment mission to Liberia and neighbouring States in order to investigate and compile a report on the compliance by Government of Liberia with the demands referred to in paragraph 1 above, and on any violations of the measures referred to in paragraphs 10 and 17 above, including any involving rebel movements;

(b) To investigate whether any revenues of the Government of Liberia are used in violation of the present resolution, with particular emphasis on the effect on the Liberian populace of any possible diversion of funds from civilian purposes;

(c) To assess the possible humanitarian and socio-economic impact of the measures imposed by paragraph 17 above and to make recommendations to the Council through the Committee by 7 August 2003 on how to minimize any such impact;

(d) To report to the Council through the Committee no later than 7 October 2003 with observations and recommendations, particularly on how to improve the effectiveness of implementing and monitoring the measures referred to in paragraph 5 of resolution 1343(2001), including any recommendations pertinent to paragraphs 28 and 29 below, and also requests the Secretary-General to provide the necessary resources;

26. Requests the Panel of Experts referred to in paragraph 25 above, as far as possible, to bring any relevant information collected in the course of the investigations conducted in accordance with its mandate to the attention of the States concerned for prompt and thorough investigation and, where appropriate, corrective action, and to allow them the right of reply;

27. Calls upon all States to take appropriate measures to ensure that individuals and companies within their jurisdiction, in particular those referred to in the reports of the Panels of Experts established pursuant to resolutions 1343(2001), 1395(2002), 1408(2002) and 1458(2003), respectively, act in conformity with United Nations embargoes, in particular those established by resolutions 1171(1998), 1306(2000) and 1343(2001), and, as appropriate, to take the necessary judicial and administrative action to end any illegal activities by those individuals and companies;

28. Decides that all States shall take the necessary measures to prevent entry into or transit through their territories of any individuals, including from Liberians United for Reconciliation and Democracy or other armed rebel groups, determined by the Committee, taking account of information provided by the Panel of Experts and other relevant sources, to be in violation of paragraph 5 of resolution 1343(2001), provided that nothing in the present paragraph shall oblige a State to refuse entry into its territory by its own nationals;

29. Requests the Committee to establish, maintain and update, taking account of information provided by the Panel of Experts and other relevant sources, a list of air and maritime companies whose aircraft and vessels have been used in violation of paragraph 5 of resolution 1343(2001);

30. Calls upon all members of the Economic Community of West African States to cooperate fully with the Panel of Experts in the identification of such aircraft and vessels, and in particular to inform the Panel about any transit on their territory of aircraft and vessels suspected of being used in violation of paragraph 5 of resolution 1343(2001);

31. Asks the Government of Liberia to authorize the Approach and Control Unit at Robertsfield International Airport to provide regularly to the Flight Information Region in Conakry statistical data related to aircraft listed pursuant to paragraph 29 above;

32. Decides to conduct reviews of the measures referred to in paragraphs 10 and 17 above before 7 November 2003, and every six months thereafter;

33. Urges all States, relevant United Nations bodies and, as appropriate, other organizations and all interested parties to cooperate fully with the Committee and with the Panel of Experts referred to in paragraph 25 above, including by supplying information on possible violations of the measures referred to in paragraphs 10 and 17 above;

34. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

In response to paragraph 25 of resolution 1478(2003) (see p. 203), the Secretary-General, on 5 June [S/2003/618], informed the Security Council of the names of the six members he had appointed to form a Panel of Experts to conduct a follow-up assessment mission to Liberia and neighbouring States, in order to investigate and compile a report on the Liberian Government's compliance with the demands set out in resolution 1343(2001) [YUN 2001, p. 181]; to investigate whether any government revenues were used in violation of resolution 1478(2003); and to assess the possible humanitarian and socio-economic impact of the measures to take effect pursuant to paragraph 17 of that resolution.

Report of Secretary-General (August). In response to Security Council resolution 1478(2003) (see p. 203), the Secretary-General submitted a 5 August report [S/2003/793] on the possible humanitarian and socio-economic impact of the sanctions against timber products originating in Liberia imposed by that resolution. He stated that the Liberian timber industry faced the double constraints of insecurity and sanctions, either of which was sufficient to preclude logging and the export of timber. The timber sanctions on Liberia would have an impact on humanitarian and socio-economic conditions only when the security environment did not already preclude timber export. A newly reconstituted timber sector in Liberia—built on accountability and transparency—could be a driving force for economic growth and sustainable development in the country, but only in the absence of widespread conflict. The current sanctions might permit a breathing period during which the industry could be restructured and alternative sources of revenue such as rubber production or cash crop cultivation could be encouraged. Such diversification would serve to reduce Liberia's dependency on timber and ensure that the timber sector did not re-emerge as a magnet for militia groups and exploitative corporations.

The Secretary-General made several suggestions to mitigate the potential impact of sanctions, including the development of an exemption procedure for specific timber products. Further possible exemptions to the timber ban should be explored in line with recommendations developed as part of the Stockholm Process, the Swedish initiative to enhance the effectiveness of targeted sanctions. They included processes of certification, as in the Kimberley Process, and the listing of approved traders. A mechanism could be established to allow the sale of Liberian timber under externally managed and audited conditions. In addition, specific humanitarian and development programmes could be developed to help mitigate the socio-economic and humanitarian impact of the timber ban. The Council might also consider establishing a long-term monitoring mechanism to review the possible implications of the sanctions regime.

Report of Panel (August). On 7 August [S/2003/779], the Panel of Experts established pursuant to paragraph 25 of Security Council resolution 1478(2003) (see p. 203) submitted its report on the possible humanitarian and socio-economic impact of the timber sanctions against Liberia. The Panel stated that, when the timber sanctions entered into force on 7 July, most timber companies in Liberia had already ceased operations due to the ongoing civil war. Operators feared for the safety of their workers and worried that their equipment would be looted by combatants. Some logging companies removed their equipment from Liberia and abandoned, at least temporarily, their concession, claiming that they had done so once they learned from the Panel that sanctions applied to all exports of forest products. Armed non-State actors had contacted logging operators and NGOs to express their interest in resuming logging to generate revenue. In order to assess their intentions, the Panel had presented the Government of Liberia, LURD and MODEL with a detailed questionnaire relating to the provisions for compliance with the timber sanctions, requesting answers by 15 July. The Panel had received neither answers nor information as to when answers would be forthcoming.

The long-term degradation of the humanitarian and socio-economic conditions that Liberians had endured had to serve as a baseline before any additional burdens imposed on the country could be measured. The most obvious benefit of the timber sanctions was that armed State and non-State actors were deprived of timber revenue. Also, violations of human rights, of rural Liberians in particular, associated with the timber industry would decrease, as would the overharvesting of Liberian forests. The negative impacts associated with the stark reduction of export income and employment might have long-term consequences for the redevelopment of Liberia. However, those negative impacts might currently be overshadowed by the negative effects of the civil war. Rural communities located within the logging concessions did not benefit greatly from the operations, and communities were no better served by social services whether they were inside or outside the concessions.

The Panel recommended that, in order to deprive all combatants of the benefits of war, the Security Council declare a moratorium on all commercial activities in the extractive industries, as had been proposed by the NGO Coalition of Liberia, to remain in place until peace and stability were restored and good governance was established. Increased emergency aid should be provided to minimize the impact of sanctions while the timber industry was reformed. Over the long term, the Panel said, the United Nations and international donors should help Liberia to reform the timber sector in order to achieve good governance. The Council should encourage Member States, civil society and UN field presences to monitor and report any violations of the timber sanctions, and the Secretary-General should be requested to report quarterly on the implementation of the timber sanctions and their effects on Liberians.

Report of Panel (October). In response to paragraph 25 of Security Council resolution 1478(2003), the Panel of Experts on Liberia submitted an October report [S/2003/937 & Add.1] describing the rapidly changing situation there, with a peace agreement having been signed in August and the National Transitional Government taking power in October. Although levels of violence were declining, until UNMIL forces were deployed throughout the country and DDRR efforts were fully under way, the current proliferation of weapons in the subregion continued to be a threat to peace and stability, not only in Liberia but also in Côte d'Ivoire, Guinea and Sierra Leone. The Panel continued to find evidence of Guinea's support for LURD. After the peace agreement was signed, the Panel witnessed efforts by Guinea to control the presence of LURD forces in the Forest Region (Guinée forestière). The challenge for the international community was to provide adequate support to the Transitional Government while remaining vigilant to the re-emergence of corruption and State-sanctioned violence. Domestic debts resulting from corrupt practices would threaten the economic reconstruction of Liberia, as would the shortage of government revenue.

Despite the ceasefire, on 6 August the Liberian Minister of Defence attempted to receive a shipment of weapons at Robertsfield International Airport; however, the effort was blocked by UN peacekeepers. Other illegal weapons were found in the possession of Liberian government troops. Porous borders and insecurity in neighbouring countries had made the full enforcement of the arms embargo impossible. The restrictions imposed by resolution 1478(2003) on the trafficking of Liberian diamonds had failed to prevent their trade either regionally or internationally. While there had been a recent, steady decline in production, that was the result of internal insecurity and operational constraints imposed by seasonal climatic conditions, rather than the impact of sanctions. Liberian diamonds continued to enter the international market and the internationally accredited certification scheme introduced by neighbouring countries had failed to prevent it. The flow would continue as production increased with improving security and the onset of the dry season. Similarly, there was little evidence of violations of the timber sanctions, as civil war and the rainy season had prevented a resumption of logging since sanctions entered into force on 7 July. The real test would come in November, when conditions would permit logging. The Panel recommended that the sanctions should remain until the industry and the Government had been reformed. As for civil aviation, Liberia had violated the rules of civil aviation since 2000. Its non-compliance with civil aviation regulations continued to endanger air safety in the region, and flight movements in and out of Liberia remained uncoordinated. The new Liberian aircraft registry was still not operational. During its visit to Monrovia, the Panel noted Liberia's lack of human resources and equipment for civil aviation. It also reported that the travel ban was being violated and that no mechanism existed for monitoring the offshore marine activities of Liberia.

Although the immediate effects of the timber ban on the socio-economic and humanitarian situation were not readily apparent, the Panel was of the view that Liberia's economy would surely suffer from the elimination of significantly more than 50 per cent of export income as a result of that action. It pointed out that the National Transitional Government lacked funding to operate properly and to rebuild the necessary institutions to govern.

The Panel recommended that: all Security Council sanctions remain in place; UNMIL monitor the main ports, airports and border crossings to ensure that sanctions were not violated and that all illegal shipments were seized; an independent economic commission of inquiry be formed to protect the new Government from corruption and diversion of government revenues, assist in rebuilding corrupt institutions and conduct investigations of all revenue-producing entities; financial sanctions be imposed on all accounts, assets and property owned and controlled, directly or indirectly, by former President Taylor, to prevent him from further diverting government revenues and to facilitate the repatriation of already diverted funds; and the embargo on Liberian rough diamonds be kept in place until a certification scheme could be implemented and monitored.

Letter of Secretary-General (5 November). The Secretary-General, on 5 November [S/2003/

1071], said that due to the prevailing situation in Liberia, which had necessitated the evacuation of UN personnel, it was not possible to gather the information needed to prepare the third six-monthly report on Liberia's compliance with the Council's demand contained in resolution 1408 (2002) [YUN 2002, p. 169]. It would be necessary to defer submission of that report until early 2004.

Security Council press statement (4 December). Following a review of the measures on Liberia pursuant to resolution 1478(2003), the Security Council President, in a 4 December press statement [SC/7943-AFR/782], stated that there was a general agreement among Council members that the measures should be continued for the time being. The objective of the measures would continue to be to support the peace process in Liberia and to further consolidate peace and stability in the subregion. Bearing in mind the recent positive developments in Liberia, the Council members agreed that there was a need to redefine the legal basis for the sanctions and to evolve appropriate criteria for their eventual lifting.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (December)

On 22 December (meeting 4890), the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1521 (2003). The draft [S/2003/1180] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions and the statements by its President on the situation in Liberia and West Africa,

Taking note of the reports of the Panel of Experts on Liberia of 30 July and 2 October 2003 submitted pursuant to resolution 1478(2003) of 6 May 2003,

Expressing serious concern at the findings of the Panel of Experts that the measures imposed by resolution 1343(2001) of 7 March 2001 continue to be breached, particularly through the acquisition of arms,

Welcoming the Comprehensive Peace Agreement signed by the former Government of Liberia, Liberians United for Reconciliation and Democracy and the Movement for Democracy in Liberia at Accra on 18 August 2003, and the fact that the National Transitional Government of Liberia under Chairman Gyude Bryant took office on 14 October 2003,

Calling upon all States in the region, particularly the National Transitional Government of Liberia, to work together to build lasting regional peace, including through the Economic Community of West African States, the International Contact Group on Liberia, the Mano River Union and the Rabat Process,

Noting with concern, however, that the ceasefire and the Comprehensive Peace Agreement are not yet being universally implemented throughout Liberia and that much of the country remains outside the authority of the National Transitional Government of Liberia, particularly those areas to which the United Nations Mission in Liberia has not yet deployed,

Recognizing the linkage between the illegal exploitation of natural resources such as diamonds and timber, illicit trade in such resources and the proliferation and trafficking of illegal arms as a major source of fuelling and exacerbating conflicts in West Africa, particularly in Liberia,

Determining that the situation in Liberia and the proliferation of arms and armed non-State actors, including mercenaries, in the subregion continue to constitute a threat to international peace and security in West Africa, in particular to the peace process in Liberia,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

Recalling its resolutions 1343(2001), 1408(2002) of 6 May 2002, 1478(2003), 1497(2003) of 1 August 2003 and 1509(2003) of 19 September 2003,

Noting that the changed circumstances in Liberia, in particular the departure of former President Charles Taylor and the formation of the National Transitional Government of Liberia, and progress with the peace process in Sierra Leone, require the determination of the Council for action under Chapter VII of the Charter to be revised to reflect these altered circumstances,

1. Decides to terminate the prohibitions imposed by paragraphs 5 to 7 of resolution 1343(2001) and paragraphs 17 and 28 of resolution 1478(2003) and to dissolve the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 1343(2001) concerning Liberia;

B

2. (a) Decides also that all States shall take the necessary measures to prevent the sale or supply to Liberia, by their nationals or from their territories or using their flag vessels or aircraft, of arms and related materiel of all types, including weapons and ammunition, military vehicles and equipment, paramilitary equipment and spare parts for the aforementioned, whether or not these originated in their territories;

(b) Decides further that all States shall take the necessary measures to prevent any provision to Liberia by their nationals or from their territories of technical training or assistance related to the provision, manufacture, maintenance or use of the items in subparagraph (a) above;

(c) Reaffirms that the measures in subparagraphs (a) and (b) above apply to all sales or supply of arms and related materiel destined for any recipient in Liberia, including all non-State actors, such as Liberians United for Reconciliation and Democracy and the Movement for Democracy in Liberia, and to all former and current militias and armed groups;

(d) Decides that the measures imposed by subparagraphs (a) and (b) above shall not apply to supplies of arms and related materiel and technical training and assistance intended solely for the support of or use by the United Nations Mission in Liberia;

(e) Decides also that the measures imposed by subparagraphs (a) and (b) above shall not apply to supplies of arms and related materiel and technical training and assistance intended solely for the support of or use in an international training and reform programme for the Liberian armed forces and police, as approved in advance by the Committee established pursuant to paragraph 21 below ("the Committee");

(f) Decides further that the measures imposed by subparagraphs (a) and (b) above shall not apply to supplies of non-lethal military equipment intended solely for humanitarian or protective use, and related technical assistance or training, as approved in advance by the Committee;

(g) Affirms that the measures imposed by subparagraph (a) above do not apply to protective clothing, including flak jackets and military helmets, temporarily exported to Liberia by United Nations personnel, representatives of the media and humanitarian and development workers and associated personnel for their personal use only;

3. Demands that all States in West Africa take action to prevent armed individuals and groups from using their territory to prepare and commit attacks on neighbouring countries and refrain from any action that might contribute to further destabilization of the situation in the subregion;

4. (a) Decides that all States shall take the necessary measures to prevent the entry into or transit through their territories of all individuals, as designated by the Committee, who constitute a threat to the peace process in Liberia or who are engaged in activities aimed at undermining peace and stability in Liberia and the subregion, including those senior members of the Government of former President Charles Taylor and their spouses and members of Liberia's former armed forces who retain links to former President Charles Taylor, those individuals determined by the Committee to be in violation of paragraph 2 above and any other individuals, or individuals associated with entities, providing financial or military support to armed rebel groups in Liberia or in countries in the region, provided that nothing in the present paragraph shall oblige a State to refuse entry into its territory to its own nationals;

(b) Decides also that the measures in paragraph 4 (a) above shall continue to apply to the individuals already designated pursuant to paragraph 7 (a) of resolution 1343(2001), pending the designation of individuals by the Committee as required by and in accordance with paragraph 4 (a) above;

(c) Decides further that the measures imposed by paragraph 4 (a) above shall not apply where the Committee determines that such travel is justified on the grounds of humanitarian need, including religious obligation, or where the Committee concludes that an exemption would otherwise further the objectives of the resolutions of the Council, for the creation of peace, stability and democracy in Liberia and lasting peace in the subregion;

5. Expresses its readiness to terminate the measures imposed by paragraphs 2 (a) and (b) and 4 (a) above when the Council determines that the ceasefire in Liberia is being fully respected and maintained, disarmament, demobilization, reintegration, repatriation and restructuring of the security sector have been completed, the provisions of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement are being fully implemented and significant progress has been made in establishing and maintaining stability in Liberia and the subregion;

6. Decides that all States shall take the necessary measures to prevent the direct or indirect import of all rough diamonds from Liberia to their territory, whether or not such diamonds originated in Liberia;

7. Calls upon the National Transitional Government of Liberia to take urgent steps to establish an effective certificate-of-origin regime for trade in Liberian rough diamonds that is transparent and internationally verifiable with a view to joining the Kimberley Process, and to provide the Committee with a detailed description of the proposed regime;

8. Expresses its readiness to terminate the measures referred to in paragraph 6 above when the Committee, taking into account expert advice, decides that Liberia has established a transparent, effective and internationally verifiable certificate-of-origin regime for Liberian rough diamonds;

9. Encourages the National Transitional Government of Liberia to take steps to join the Kimberley Process as soon as possible;

10. Decides that all States shall take the necessary measures to prevent the import into their territories of all round logs and timber products originating in Liberia;

11. Urges the National Transitional Government of Liberia to establish its full authority and control over the timber-producing areas and to take all necessary steps to ensure that government revenues from the Liberian timber industry are not used to fuel conflict or otherwise in violation of the resolutions of the Council but are used for legitimate purposes for the benefit of the Liberian people, including development;

12. Expresses its readiness to terminate the measures imposed by paragraph 10 above once the Council determines that the goals in paragraph 11 above have been achieved;

13. Encourages the National Transitional Government of Liberia to establish oversight mechanisms for the timber industry that will promote responsible business practices and to establish transparent accounting and auditing mechanisms to ensure that all government revenues, including those from the Liberian International Ship and Corporate Registry, are not used to fuel conflict or otherwise in violation of the resolutions of the Council but are used for legitimate purposes for the benefit of the Liberian people, including development;

14. Urges all parties to the Comprehensive Peace Agreement of 18 August 2003 to implement fully their commitments and fulfil their responsibilities in the National Transitional Government of Liberia, and not to hinder the restoration of the Government's authority throughout the country, particularly over natural resources;

15. Calls upon States, relevant international organizations and others in a position to do so to offer assistance to the National Transitional Government of Liberia in achieving the objectives in paragraphs 7, 11 and 13 above, including the promotion of responsible and environmentally sustainable business practices in the timber industry, and to offer assistance with the implementation of the Moratorium on the Importation, Exportation and Manufacture of Small Arms and Light Weapons in West Africa adopted by the Economic Community of West African States in Abuja on 31 October 1998;

16. Encourages the United Nations and other donors to assist the Liberian civil aviation authorities, including through technical assistance, in improving the professionalism of their staff and their training capabilities and in complying with the standards and practices of the International Civil Aviation Organization;

17. Takes note of the establishment by the National Transitional Government of Liberia of a review committee with the task of establishing procedures to fulfil the demands of the Council for the lifting of the measures imposed by the present resolution;

18. Decides that the measures in paragraphs 2, 4, 6 and 10 above are established for twelve months from the date of adoption of the present resolution, unless otherwise decided, and that, at the end of this period, the Council shall review the position, assess progress towards the goals in paragraphs 5, 7 and 11 and decide accordingly whether to continue those measures;

19. Decides also to review the measures in paragraphs 2, 4, 6 and 10 above by 17 June 2004, to assess progress towards the goals in paragraphs 5, 7 and 11 and to decide accordingly whether to terminate those measures;

20. Decides further to keep under regular review the measures imposed by paragraphs 6 and 10 above so as to terminate them as soon as possible once the conditions in paragraphs 7 and 11 above have been met, in order to create revenue for the reconstruction and development of Liberia;

21. Decides to establish, in accordance with rule 28 of its provisional rules of procedure, a Committee of the Security Council, consisting of all the members of the Council, to undertake the following tasks:

(a) To monitor the implementation of the measures in paragraphs 2, 4, 6 and 10 above, taking into consideration the reports of the expert panel established pursuant to paragraph 22 below;

(b) To seek from all States, particularly those in the subregion, information about the actions taken by them to implement effectively those measures;

(c) To consider and decide upon requests for the exemptions set out in paragraphs 2 (e) and (f) and 4 (c) above;

(d) To designate the individuals subject to the measures imposed by paragraph 4 above and to update that list regularly;

(e) To make relevant information publicly available through appropriate media, including the list referred to in subparagraph (d) above;

(f) To consider and take appropriate action, within the framework of the present resolution, on pending issues or concerns brought to its attention concerning the measures imposed by resolutions 1343(2001), 1408(2002) and 1478(2003) while those resolutions were in force;

(g) To report to the Council with its observations and recommendations;

22. Requests the Secretary-General to establish, within one month of the date of adoption of the present resolution, in consultation with the Committee, for a period of five months, a Panel of Experts consisting of up to five members, with the range of expertise necessary to fulfil the mandate of the Panel described in the present paragraph, drawing as much as possible on the expertise of the members of the Panel of Experts established pursuant to resolution 1478(2003), to undertake the following tasks:

(a) To conduct a follow-up assessment mission to Liberia and neighbouring States in order to investigate and compile a report on the implementation, and any violations, of the measures referred to in paragraphs 2, 4, 6 and 10 above, including any violations involving rebel movements and neighbouring countries, and including any information relevant to designation by the Committee of the individuals described in paragraph 4 (a) above, and also including the various sources of financing, such as from natural resources, for the illicit trade in arms;

(b) To assess the progress made towards the goals described in paragraphs 5, 7 and 11 above;

(c) To report to the Council, through the Committee, no later than 30 May 2004, with observations and recommendations, including how to minimize any humanitarian and socio-economic impact of the measures imposed by paragraph 10 above;

23. Welcomes the readiness of the United Nations Mission in Liberia, within its capabilities and its areas of deployment and without prejudice to its mandate, once it is fully deployed and carrying out its core functions, to assist the Committee established pursuant to paragraph 21 above and the Panel of Experts established pursuant to paragraph 22 above in monitoring the measures in paragraphs 2, 4, 6 and 10 above, and requests the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone and the United Nations Mission in Côte d'Ivoire, likewise without prejudicing their capacities to carry out their respective mandates, to assist the Committee and the Panel of Experts by passing to the Committee and the Panel any information relevant to the implementation of the measures in paragraphs 2, 4, 6 and 10 above, in the context of enhanced coordination among United Nations missions and offices in West Africa;

24. Reiterates its call upon the international donor community to provide assistance for the implementation of a programme of disarmament, demobilization, reintegration and repatriation, and sustained international assistance to the peace process, and to contribute generously to consolidated humanitarian appeals, and further requests the donor community to respond to the immediate financial, administrative and technical needs of the National Transitional Government of Liberia;

25. Encourages the National Transitional Government of Liberia to undertake, with the assistance of the United Nations Mission in Liberia, appropriate actions to sensitize the Liberian population to the rationale of the measures in the present resolution, including the criteria for their termination;

26. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report to the Council by 30 May 2004, drawing on information from all relevant sources, including the National Transitional Government of Liberia, the United Nations Mission in Liberia and the Economic Community of West African States, on progress made towards the goals described in paragraphs 5, 7 and 11 above;

27. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Sierra Leone

After a decade of civil war, the situation in Sierra Leone improved markedly in 2003 as further progress was made in implementing the 2000 Agreement on the Ceasefire and Cessation of Hostilities (Abuja Agreement) [YUN 2000, p. 210], the disarmament process was completed and elections were held. Throughout the year, the security situation in Sierra Leone became increasingly stable, facilitating the consolidation of peace and the implementation of the benchmarks set by the Security Council in 2002 for the reduction of troops of the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL). Under those drawdown plans, the Mission continued to reduce its size in four phases. At the beginning of the year, UNAMSIL began the second phase, which envisaged the withdrawal of 3,900 troops from its force of nearly 16,000. Further reductions were linked to benchmarks, including, most importantly, progress in strengthening the capacity of the Sierra Leone police and armed forces to maintain security and stability. The Government's plan to disarm ex-combatants and reintegrate them into society was largely successful and, by the end of the year, nearly 48,000 of the 57,000 registered ex-combatants either were in the resettlement programme or had completed it.

Although the general trend towards stability was positive, some areas on the Liberian border remained volatile and plans by ex-combatants and others to destabilize the Government were uncovered. The joint mechanisms established by UNAMSIL and the Sierra Leone Government to review the security situation met regularly, and the Secretary-General, in a number of 2003 reports, provided assessments of achievement of the benchmarks. Consequently, UNAMSIL continued to reduce its troop strength by stages, as scheduled. At the end of the year, some 11,500 peacekeeping troops remained in the country.

Stability in Sierra Leone was also dependent on peace in the subregion, especially in Liberia where the conflict in the first half of the year threatened to spill over into Sierra Leone. The renewal of fighting in Liberia in early 2003 precipitated an influx of thousands of refugees into Sierra Leone.

The Special Court set up by the Government to try serious crimes committed during the war issued nine indictments, and the Truth and Reconciliation Commission began work by collecting statements.

The Government also made progress in reasserting its control over diamond mining and selling, thereby increasing official exports and bringing new revenue to the country. Sierra Leone reported that its certificate-of-origin regime to control the export of diamonds had been successful in curtailing the use of diamonds to fuel conflict. In the light of the country's efforts to manage and control its diamond industry, the Security Council decided not to renew its embargo against Sierra Leonean rough diamonds.

Appointment. On 28 November [S/2003/1142], the Secretary-General informed the Security Council of his intention to appoint Daudi Ngelautwa Mwakawago (United Republic of Tanzania) as his Special Representative for Sierra Leone, to replace Oluwemi Adeniji (Nigeria). On 3 December [S/2003/1143], the Council took note of the decision.

UNAMSIL activities

Press statement (10 January). The Security Council considered the Secretary-General's December 2002 report on UNAMSIL [YUN 2002, p. 158] in January 2003. In a 10 January press statement [SC/7629-APR/542], Council members commended him and UNAMSIL for their role in maintaining peace in Sierra Leone and providing a platform for post-conflict reconstruction. They welcomed the progress made by UNAMSIL in its restructuring and the first two phases of its drawdown plans, and encouraged it to continue. They underlined the importance of the Government of Sierra Leone continuing to strengthen the army and police, including through adequate logistical and infrastructural support, so that they could soon assume full responsibility for security. Noting with concern that government control was not yet fully re-established in some regions of Sierra Leone, including the diamond-producing areas, Council members urged the Government to make rapid progress in that regard, including by adopting a policy for the diamond sector.

Members welcomed the progress with reintegration, and hoped that all ex-combatants would have received training by the end of 2003. Sharing the Secretary-General's concerns about the regional security situation, they stressed the need to find a solution to the conflicts in Liberia and Côte d'Ivoire and encouraged States' efforts in helping to find a solution. They reiterated the importance of relaunching the political dialogue among the MRU countries.

The commencement of work by the Special Court was welcomed and members reiterated their full support for the Court and for the Truth and Reconciliation Commission as important elements of the reconciliation process in Sierra Leone.

Communication (March). On 14 March [S/2003/330], Sierra Leone forwarded to the Council an aide-memoire and a letter from President Alhaji Ahmad Tejan Kabbah, in which he reviewed progress achieved in consolidating peace and security and in promoting national recovery. He noted that, despite the end of the rebel war and the holding of elections in 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 153], Sierra Leone continued to face external and internal security threats. In particular, the border area with Liberia was home to dissident groups who served as a recruitment pool for both LURD and the Armed Forces of Liberia. The upsurge in the fighting in Liberia had caused the movement of displaced persons and refugees into Sierra Leone. Internally, there had been recent attacks on the Government by dissident groups. The President therefore urged a cautious approach to the reduction of the number of UNAMSIL troops. He recommended that the Mission not be downsized by any significant number until such time as Sierra Leone could be sure that peace and security in the country was no longer threatened.

Report of Secretary-General (March). On 17 March (S/2003/321 & Corr.1), the Secretary-General, in response to Security Council resolution 1436 (2002) [YUN 2002, p. 157], issued his seventeenth report on UNAMSIL. During the three-month reporting period since his previous report [ibid., p. 158], the overall political and security situation in Sierra Leone had remained generally stable, albeit volatile on the Liberian border. The stability had facilitated the process of gradual peace consolidation and implementation of some of the benchmarks for UNAMSIL's drawdown that the Secretary-General had proposed in September 2002 [ibid., p. 155].

Nevertheless, a number of alarming developments were reported in early 2003. In particular, on 13 January, an armory of the Republic of Sierra Leone Armed Forces (RSLAF) was attacked, unsuccessfully, by a group of former soldiers and some civilians who sought to steal weapons. An investigation of the attack uncovered a plan involving ex-combatants and some serving soldiers aimed at destabilizing State authority and hindering the work of the Special Court (see p. 213). Johnny Paul Koroma, the former Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC) leader and later a member of Parliament, was implicated in the plot. During an attempt by the police to arrest him, he escaped and remained at large. About 100 other suspects were detained. It was widely believed that ex-combatants who feared indictments were seeking to frustrate the functioning of the Special Court and the Truth and Reconciliation Commission. On 10 March, the Prosecutor of the Special Court announced that indictments had been brought against former Revolutionary United Front (RUF), AFRC, West Side Boys and Civil Defence Force (CDF) leaders, namely, Foday Sankoh, Mr. Koroma, Sam Bockarie, Issa Sesay, Alex Brima, Moris Kallon and Sam Hinga Norman, all of whom, except for Mr. Koroma and Mr. Bockarie, were in custody. Their indictments were for such crimes as murder, rape, extermination, acts of terror, enslavement, looting and burning, sexual slavery, conscription of children into an armed force and attacks on UNAMSIL peacekeepers and humanitarian workers.

In January, some 70 Liberian combatants, believed to be LURD members, crossed into Sierra Leone and attacked a village. RSLAF troops in the area retreated, leaving behind some of their equipment. No progress was made in disbanding all CDF structures despite the Government's agreement to do so.

The implementation of the second phase of the UNAMSIL drawdown plan was expected to be completed in May, when the total force would be reduced to 13,000. A period of review and consolidation would follow. However, planning for phase 3 of the drawdown was already at an advanced stage; it was envisaged that the force would be reduced to about 5,000 by the end of 2004. UNAMSIL expected to implement phase 3 in several steps, each to be followed by an assessment of the prevailing security situation.

The joint mechanisms established by UNAMSIL and the Sierra Leone Government to evaluate the security situation during the drawdown process included an integrated planning group and joint meetings of UNAMSIL and the National Security Coordination Group, which met regularly in early 2003. The Sierra Leone police, at a strength of only 6,053, focused on recruiting and training new cadets with the intention of reaching 9,500 officers by 2005. RSLAF continued to improve its effectiveness through a training and restructuring plan led by the United Kingdom. The intention was to reduce the force from its current strength of 14,000 to about 10,500. Joint UNAMSIL/RSLAF border operations were intensified during the reporting period, which led to improved security around Mandavulahun village, near the Liberian border. However, operations were hindered by the lamentable state of the vehicle fleet and of communications equipment. The situation at the Liberian border continued to pose a threat to the security and stability of Sierra Leone.

Progress was made in consolidating State authority throughout the country. The full deployment of government officials to all districts by March had almost been completed, and the Government planned to devolve powers to the districts in order to promote local governance through decentralization. The Government also made progress with the programme to offer reintegration opportunities to registered ex-combatants. It estimated that 14,700 were awaiting inclusion in the programme. Reintegration of ex-combatants into communities would largely depend on prospects for economic recovery. Restoration of government control over the country's mineral resources, particularly diamond mining, was of critical importance for Sierra Leone's future. Although official exports of diamonds increased to $41 million in 2002 from about $26 million in 2001, illegal diamond mining and trade persisted. The Government, with UNDP assistance, launched an initiative to set up community-based projects in diamond-producing chiefdoms.

UNAMSIL intensified its human rights monitoring and capacity-building activities during the reporting period. It continued to monitor police stations, prisons and the administration of justice and to provide human rights training for the police and RSLAF. It also expanded the training of peacekeepers in the rights and protection of children. The Truth and Reconciliation Commission continued to make progress in recruitment, management and statement-taking despite financial constraints. It opened its new office in Freetown on 17 February. By mid-February, the Commission had collected over 3,500 statements.

The Special Court for Sierra Leone made significant progress in its operations in early 2003, including the announcement of the indictments of seven individuals for war crimes (see p. 212). In January, the Registry of the Special Court opened its permanent site in Freetown. The Witnesses and Victims Support Unit was established and preparations were under way to create a defence support section, which would include both Sierra Leonean and international lawyers.

The renewal of fighting in Liberia precipitated a new influx of refugees into Sierra Leone. As at 4 March, more than 7,800 refugees had been registered crossing into Sierra Leone, but the total number was estimated at more than 9,000. More than 51,000 Sierra Leonean displaced persons returned to their places of origin between December 2002 and January 2003; of those, 13,500 were formally resettled with humanitarian assistance. The UNHCR programme for the repatriation of Sierra Leonean refugees from Guinea, Liberia and other countries in the subregion continued, with some 200,000 having returned from asylum countries.

The Secretary-General commented that recent developments had proved the prudence of pursuing a gradual drawdown of UNAMSIL, consistent with progress made in building up the capacity of the Sierra Leone police and army. Recent challenges to both services had exposed considerable shortcomings, and additional efforts were needed; therefore a cautious approach to the pace of the drawdown was fully justifiable. The Secretary-General recommended that the Council extend UNAMSIL's mandate for a further period of six months.

Press statements (March). The President of the Security Council issued a 14 March press statement [SC/7692-AFR/583] in which Council members noted the Special Court's announcement of indictments against seven individuals charged with crimes against humanity, war crimes and other violations of humanitarian law. Council members welcomed the indictments as the start of a judicial process aimed at bringing to justice those individuals who bore the greatest responsibility for the suffering inflicted on the people of Sierra Leone. They called on other States in the region to support the efforts of the Special Court in combating impunity and addressing accountability for the atrocities that had been committed in Sierra Leone.

In a 21 March press statement [SC/7702-AFR/589], Council members welcomed the role played by UNAMSIL in maintaining stability in Sierra Leone. They agreed that UNAMSIL's rate of withdrawal should take into account the security conditions and the capacity of the Sierra Leone police and army to maintain them, as indicated in the Secretary-General's March report. They invited States to contribute to financing the UN reintegration and civilian police training programmes. The members reiterated their concern at the destabilizing impact of the conflict in Liberia on the subregion, and on Sierra Leone in particular. They called on the Liberian Government and LURD to initiate a direct dialogue with a view to a peaceful settlement of their dispute. The Council members decided to consider a resolution extending UNAMSIL's mandate for another six months.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (March)

On 28 March [meeting 4729], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1470(2003). The draft [S/2003/375] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions and the statements by its President concerning the situation in Sierra Leone,

Affirming the commitment of all States to respect the sovereignty, political independence and territorial integrity of Sierra Leone,

Expressing its concern at the continuing fragile security situation in the Mano River region, particularly the conflict in Liberia and its consequences for neighbouring States, including Côte d'Ivoire, and at the substantial number of refugees and the humanitarian consequences for the civilian, refugee and internally displaced populations in the region, and emphasizing the importance of cooperation among the countries of the subregion,

Recognizing that the security situation in Sierra Leone remains fragile, and recognizing also the need to strengthen further the capacity and to mobilize the resources of the Sierra Leone police and armed forces to enable them to maintain security and stability independently.

Noting certain recent challenges to security, described in paragraphs 2 to 9 of the report of the Secretary-General of 17 March 2003,

Reiterating the importance of the effective consolidation of State authority throughout Sierra Leone, particularly in the diamond fields, the reintegration of ex-combatants, the voluntary and unhindered return of refugees and internally displaced persons and full respect for human rights and the rule of law, with special attention to the protection of women and children, and stressing continued United Nations support to the Government of Sierra Leone in fulfilling these objectives,

Emphasizing the importance of the Special Court for Sierra Leone and the Truth and Reconciliation Commission in taking effective action on impunity and accountability and in promoting reconciliation,

Emphasizing also the importance of the continuing support of the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone to the Government of Sierra Leone in the consolidation of peace and stability,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General,

1. Decides that the mandate of the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone shall be extended for a period of six months from 30 March 2003;

2. Expresses its appreciation to those Member States providing troops, civilian police personnel and support elements to the Mission and to those who have made commitments to do so;

3. Commends the Mission for the progress made in the adjustments to its size, composition and deployment, as outlined in paragraphs 10 and 11 of the report of the Secretary-General, achieved while continuing to support the Sierra Leonean security forces in maintaining internal security and protecting Sierra Leone's territorial integrity;

4. Urges the Mission, guided by an evaluation of the security situation and the capacity and ability of the Sierra Leonean security sector to take responsibility for internal and external security, to complete phase 2 of the plan of the Secretary-General, as planned, and to embark on phase 3 as soon as practicable thereafter;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to provide the Council with detailed plans for the remainder of the drawdown once phase 3 is under way, including options for faster and slower withdrawal depending on the security situation and the capacity and ability of the Sierra Leonean security sector to take responsibility for internal and external security;

6. Expresses concern at the continuing financial shortfall in the multi-donor trust fund for the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programme, and urges the Government of Sierra Leone to seek actively the urgently needed additional resources for reintegration;

7. Emphasizes that the development of the administrative capacities of the Government of Sierra Leone, particularly an effective and sustainable police force, army, penal system and independent judiciary, is essential to long-term peace and development, and urges the Government of Sierra Leone, with the assistance of donors and the Mission in accordance with its mandate, to accelerate the consolidation of civil authority and public services throughout the country and to strengthen the operational effectiveness and capabilities of the security sector;

8. Calls upon States, international organizations and non-governmental organizations to continue to support the national recovery strategy of the Government of Sierra Leone;

9. Notes the efforts made by the Government of Sierra Leone towards effective control of the diamond-mining areas, urges the Government of Sierra Leone to consider urgently relevant policy options for more effective regulation and control of diamond-mining activities, and encourages the Government of Sierra Leone to adopt and implement such a policy as soon as possible;

10. Welcomes the progress with deployment of United Nations civilian police to the Mission, and urges Member States able to do so to provide qualified civilian police trainers and advisers, and resources, to help the Sierra Leone Police to fulfil its size and capacity targets;

11. Reiterates its strong support for the Special Court for Sierra Leone, appeals to States to contribute generously to the Trust Fund for the Special Court, as requested in the letter from the Secretary-General dated 18 March 2003, appeals to existing donors to disburse their pledges rapidly, and urges all States to cooperate fully with the Court;

12. Welcomes the launch of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission and the progress made in its activities, and urges donors to commit funds to it generously;

13. Urges the Presidents of the Mano River Union member States to resume dialogue and to implement their commitments to building regional peace and security, encourages the Economic Community of West African States, and Morocco, to continue their efforts towards a settlement of the crisis in the Mano River Union region, and expresses its support for the efforts of the International Contact Group on Liberia towards a resolution of the conflict in that country;

14. Notes with concern the recent instability on the border between Sierra Leone and Liberia, demands that the armed forces of Liberia and any armed groups refrain from illegal incursions into the territory of Sierra Leone, calls upon all States to comply fully with all relevant resolutions of the Security Council, including the embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia, and encourages the Sierra Leonean armed forces, together with the Mission, to maintain intensive patrolling of the border with Liberia;

15. Encourages the Government of Sierra Leone to pay special attention to the needs of women and children affected by the war, bearing in mind paragraph 42 of the report of the Secretary-General;

16. Encourages the continued support of the Mission, within its capabilities and areas of deployment, for the voluntary return of refugees and displaced persons, and urges all stakeholders to continue to cooperate to this end to fulfil their commitments under the Agreement on the Ceasefire and Cessation of Hostilities, signed in Abuja on 10 November 2000;

17. Welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to keep the security, political, humanitarian and human rights situation in Sierra Leone under close review and to report to the Council, after due consultations with troop-contributing countries and the Government of Sierra Leone, with any additional recommendations;

18. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

UNAMSIL drawdown

Report of Secretary-General (June). On 23 June [S/2003/663], the Secretary-General issued his eighteenth report on UNAMSIL, which included, as requested by Security Council resolution 1470(2003) (above), plans and options for the remainder of UNAMSIL's drawdown process.

During the reporting period, the security situation remained generally stable, though challenges remained. Unconfirmed reports indicated that Mr. Koroma, who had escaped from arrest, had been recently killed in Liberia where he reportedly had been leading an armed group. Although the Government had undertaken to dismantle CDF by January, the Force continued to exist as an organized group and, in some sectors, operated almost in parallel to the Government's security sector. The influx of a large number of young men to the diamond-mining areas of Kono district and Tongo Fields and the activities of local military youth groups who resented the influx of outsiders also remained a potential source of instability. Youth groups, mainly former combatants, continued to challenge the local authorities.

While the internal situation had improved, external factors contributed to the security risk, particularly the conflict in Liberia, which could have a destabilizing effect on Sierra Leone and the Mano River subregion. Combatants from both sides in the Liberian conflict were seeking refuge in Sierra Leone, giving rise to fears of spillover in the fighting.

In 2002, the Secretary-General had made initial proposals for the drawdown of UNAMSIL [YUN 2002, p. 155], including benchmarks to guide the pace of the process, such as strengthening the capacity of the Sierra Leone police and armed forces, the reintegration of former combatants, consolidating State authority throughout the country and restoring government control over diamond mining. The joint mechanisms established by UNAMSIL and the Government of Sierra Leone to monitor and evaluate the major factors relating to the key security benchmarks continued to meet regularly. UN civilian police continued to assist in training new police officers, and Sierra Leone planned to increase police strength from the current level of about 6,800 to the pre-war level of 9,500. Since September 2002, 592 recruits had graduated from training school and another 199 were expected to graduate in July 2003. The deployment of national police was limited by the lack of police infrastructure in the provinces and inadequate transport and communication equipment. Any further delay in expanding the police's capability could result in a security vacuum in areas vacated by UNAMSIL, with serious security risks.

The restructuring of RSLAF continued, with the goal of reducing the force from the current level of 14,000 to 10,500. A third of the RSLAF troops were deployed in the Sierra Leone-Liberia border areas. Since operations lacked the necessary infrastructure and logistics, the army continued to rely on UNAMSIL for some support.

The availability of reintegration opportunities to former combatants had improved, with 5,500 additional ex-combatants having benefited from new projects. Some 9,100 ex-combatants had yet to benefit from reintegration projects. The Government intended to complete the programme by the end of 2003 but lacked sufficient resources. In order to remove small arms and light weapons from general circulation, UNDP was implementing an arms collection programme that would develop new firearms-licensing procedures and a small-arms database.

The deployment of government officials to all districts was completed. However, the capacity of government structures to deliver services in the provinces remained feeble, owing to logistic and infrastructure constraints and lack of qualified personnel. Nationwide district consultations on decentralization and local government reform were completed in April and the Government was seeking opinions on the type of local government structures to be put in place and the type of local elections to be conducted. Progress was also made in the rehabilitation of the judicial sector. Courts resumed sittings in all districts and justices of the peace were assigned to over 20 locations throughout the country.

There was a significant increase in licensed mining activities and in official exports of rough diamonds. More government mining officers and monitors were sent to the mining areas. Although official exports were reported to have reached $25 million between January and May 2003, there was ample evidence that illicit mining persisted in many parts of the country. The Government had yet to put in place a comprehensive legislative framework and a mining policy for better control and regulation of diamond-mining activities. UNAMSIL supported the Government's ground and aerial surveys of mining sites in selected areas.

The drawdown of UNAMSIL was proceeding as planned, with the first two phases having been completed, thus reducing the Mission's troop strength to 13,074 personnel. As requested by the Council in resolution 1470(2003), the Secretariat reviewed the current pace of UNAMSIL's drawdown and developed options for an accelerated and a slower withdrawal, as well as a modified status quo drawdown, taking into account the evolving security situation and Sierra Leone's ability to take responsibility for internal and external security. Under the accelerated plan, all UNAMSIL troops would leave Sierra Leone by June 2004; under the slower plan, UNAMSIL would complete its withdrawal by June 2005; and under the modified status quo plan, withdrawal would be completed by December 2004. The Secretary-General recommended that the Security Council approve the modified status quo option, under which the forthcoming phase 3 of the drawdown plan would be conducted in four stages, with specific reductions by certain dates.

Significant progress was made, with UNAMSIL assistance, in promoting human rights, national reconciliation and justice, and in addressing the needs of children affected by the conflict. The Truth and Reconciliation Commission began public hearings on 14 April, with victims and perpetrators of the civil war telling their stories in public.

Two more indictments were issued by the Special Court and the pre-trial hearings of those in detention began. In June, the Court announced the indictment of President Charles Taylor of Liberia. The case against former RUF leader Foday Sankoh was adjourned sine die to enable him to undergo examinations to establish his mental fitness to stand trial. The body of Sam Bockarie was returned to Sierra Leone for identification by the Court. UNAMSIL continued to provide logistics and security support to the Special Court.

With regard to gender mainstreaming, UNAMSIL's Human Rights Section promoted women's rights with its monitoring and capacity-building activities. Its Gender Specialist monitored and reported human rights abuses against women and girls and promoted women's human rights. The activities of the HIV/AIDS Unit focused on awareness training for the Mission's staff and participation in a UN Theme Group on HIV/AIDS.

The number of refugees entering Sierra Leone from Liberia decreased significantly during the reporting period. An eighth refugee camp was opened in April, increasing the absorption capacity; some 55,000 Liberian refugees were accommodated in camps. There was concern about Liberian combatants infiltrating Sierra Leone among the refugees, and an effort was made to separate those individuals from refugees in order to preserve the humanitarian character of asylum. Repatriation from Liberia was suspended when the security situation there became difficult. An estimated 47,000 Sierra Leonean refugees remained in Guinea, more than half of them in UNHCR camps, and 40,000 were in Liberia.

The Secretary-General reported that the gradual and calibrated approach to the UNAMSIL drawdown was yielding the desired benefits. In particular, the extended presence of the Mission had assured a stable security environment and enabled the Government to make steady progress in consolidating peace and in promoting national reconciliation, justice and national reconstruction. Of the 57,000 disarmed ex-combatants, 48,000 had been reintegrated. The resettlement of internally displaced persons had been completed, and the pace of resettling refugees had accelerated until recent events in Liberia. The conflicts in Liberia and Côte d'Ivoire added to the instability in the subregion as a whole.

Security Council mission (June/July). The Security Council mission to West Africa (26 June–5 July) [S/2003/688] (see p. 163) visited Sierra Leone and recommended that the Government intensify its efforts to develop the capacity of the Sierra Leonean armed forces and police to ensure security after UNAMSIL's departure. It further recommended that: the Government should make a special effort to consolidate its control over the diamond-mining areas by ensuring police deployment there and enforcing the certification regime; the Council should recognize the linkage between establishing peace in Liberia and consolidating stability in Sierra Leone and the MRU subregion, and take that into account when deciding on the best option for UNAMSIL's drawdown; the successful disarmament, demobilization and reintegration (DDR) programme in Sierra Leone should be assessed by the UN system to ensure that lessons were learned, particularly in due course for Liberia; the Council should examine the UNAMSIL experience in peacekeeping, peace-building, humanitarian and development efforts, so that the transition to development could be more effectively managed in other UN operations; the role of women in conflict and peacemaking should also be examined by the Council and the UN system; and the local elections in 2004 should allow as much community representation as possible, and should be monitored by the UN system.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (July)

On 18 July [meeting 4789], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1492(2003). The draft [S/2003/713] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions and the statements by its President concerning the situation in Sierra Leone,

Recognizing the continuing fragile security situation in the Mano River region, particularly the conflict in Liberia and the need to strengthen further the capacity of the Sierra Leonean police and armed forces to enable them to maintain security and stability independently,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 23 June 2003, particularly the options for the drawdown of the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone described in paragraphs 32 to 40 thereof,

1. Approves the recommendation of the Secretary-General, set out in paragraph 68 of his report, that the drawdown of the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone should proceed according to the "modified status quo" option towards withdrawal by December 2004, and welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to submit additional recommendations to the Council in early 2004 concerning a residual presence of the United Nations;

2. Decides to monitor closely the key benchmarks for the drawdown, and requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council at the end of each phase, and at regular intervals, on the progress made with respect to the benchmarks, and to make any necessary recommendations on the planning of subsequent phases of the withdrawal;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to proceed accordingly;

4. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Report of Secretary-General (September). In response to Security Council resolution 1492 (2003), the Secretary-General, on 5 September, submitted his nineteenth report on UNAMSIL [S/2003/863 & Add.1]. He addressed, in particular, progress made in achieving the benchmarks that would guide the drawdown of the Mission.

The security situation in Sierra Leone remained generally stable and further progress was achieved toward peace consolidation. On 29 July, UNAMSIL troops were put on alert after the death of the former RUF leader, Foday Sankoh, but there was no major public reaction. The stability allowed UNAMSIL to complete the first stage of phase 3 of the drawdown plan, reducing the number of troops to 12,311 by August.

Nevertheless, some problems persisted. The continuing influx of young men to the diamond-mining areas remained a potential source of instability, as did the restiveness of some ex-combatants of CDF, RUF and AFRC/ex-Sierra Leone Army. However, UNAMSIL believed that those problems did not pose immediate internal threats to the country's security. Should the environment remain favourable, the Mission's strength would be gradually reduced to 5,000 by October 2004.

The Secretary-General described progress in implementing specific benchmarks he had outlined in 2002 to guide the UNAMSIL drawdown process: strengthening the capacity of the Sierra Leone police and the armed forces; consolidation of State authority; reintegration of ex-combatants; restoration of government control over diamond mining; and improving human rights, national reconciliation and justice.

By August, the number of Liberian refugees in Sierra Leone camps was reduced by 10 per cent, to 54,298, bringing the total number of confirmed refugees in Sierra Leone to 66,184. Repatriation of Sierra Leonean refugees from Guinea slowed down and was suspended with the onset of heavy rains, while repatriation from Liberia was resumed for a short period before the operation was terminated because of insecurity. The economy of the country also improved, sustained by the dynamic growth of donor-financed imports, large-scale resettlement and reconstruction activities, expansion of land under cultivation, more mining and domestic commerce and increasing investor confidence.

The Secretary-General observed that, with UNAMSIL's continued drawdown, the responsibility for national security in some parts of the country was being shifted to the Government, which was confronted with problems of lack of adequate equipment and infrastructure. Much needed to be done to strengthen the presence of the Sierra Leone police in the areas to be vacated by UNAMSIL, especially in the east. The plan to increase the size of the police force to its pre-war level of 9,500 might be achieved by the end of 2005, a year after UNAMSIL was expected to leave. The Secretary-General urged the Government and its international partners to address the logistical and infrastructure needs of both the police and the army. Given the need to continue the gradual drawdown of UNAMSIL without jeopardizing the security situation in Sierra Leone, he recommended that the Security Council extend its mandate for another six months, until 31 March 2004.

Progress had been made relating to the control of diamond mining. The Secretary-General called for further action, such as establishing a computerized databank on mining licences, a review of incentives for staff of the Ministry of Mineral Resources, and the use of banking channels for all diamond trading transactions.

In other areas, the Secretary-General urged the Government to ensure that the CDF structure was totally dismantled and that the DDR programme was completed on schedule. He also appealed to donors to provide funding in the critical area of the administration of justice and to support the establishment of a national human rights commission.

Recent important developments in Liberia, in particular the Comprehensive Peace Agreement signed in Accra, had given hope that stability would improve. An unregulated return to Sierra Leone of former combatants who might have been involved in the fighting in Liberia would, however, be a matter of serious concern.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (September)

On 19 September [meeting 4829], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1508 (2003). The draft [S/2003/895] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions and the statements by its President concerning the situation in Sierra Leone,

Affirming the commitment of all States to respect the sovereignty, political independence and territorial integrity of Sierra Leone,

Welcoming the increasingly stable security situation in Sierra Leone, while encouraging further progress towards strengthening the capacity of the Sierra Leone police and armed forces to maintain security and stability independently,

Noting that lasting stability in Sierra Leone will depend on peace in the subregion, especially in Liberia, and emphasizing the importance of cooperation among the countries of the subregion to this end, as well as the need for coordination of United Nations efforts to contribute to the consolidation of peace and security in the subregion,

Reiterating the importance of the effective consolidation of stability and State authority throughout Sierra Leone, particularly in the diamond fields, the reintegration of ex-combatants, the voluntary and unhindered return of refugees and internally displaced persons, and full respect for human rights and the rule of law, paying special attention to the protection of women and children, and stressing continued United Nations support to the Government of Sierra Leone in fulfilling these objectives,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General,

1. Decides that the mandate of the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone shall be extended for a period of six months from 30 September 2003;

2. Expresses its appreciation to those Member States providing troops, civilian police personnel and support elements to the Mission and those who have made commitments to do so;

3. Commends the Mission for the progress made to date in the adjustments to its size, composition and deployment, in accordance with Security Council resolutions 1436(2002) of 24 September 2002 and 1492(2003) of 18 July 2003, and welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to continue with those adjustments, as outlined in paragraph 10 of his report;

4. Emphasizes that the development of the administrative capacities of the Government of Sierra Leone, particularly an effective and sustainable police force, army, penal system and independent judiciary, is essential to long-term peace and development, and urges the Government of Sierra Leone, with the assistance of donors and the Mission, in accordance with its mandate, to accelerate the consolidation of civil authority and public services throughout the country and to continue to strengthen the operational effectiveness and capabilities of the security sector;

5. Urges the Government of Sierra Leone to continue to strengthen its control over and regulation of diamond mining, including through the High-level Steering Committee, and encourages Member States to volunteer candidates for the post of diamond mining police adviser;

6. Notes with serious concern the precarious financial situation of the Special Court for Sierra Leone, reiterates its appeal to States to contribute generously to the Court, as requested in the letter from the Secretary-General dated 18 March 2003, and urges all States to cooperate fully with the Court;

7. Commends the Truth and Reconciliation Commission for its work, encourages States to contribute generously to it, and welcomes the intention of the Government of Sierra Leone to establish a Human Rights Commission;

8. Expresses its strong support for the efforts of the Economic Community of West African States towards building peace in the subregion, and encourages the Presidents of the member States of the Mano River Union to resume dialogue and to implement their commitments to building regional peace and security;

9. Welcomes the deployment of forces of the Economic Community of West African States to Liberia, supported by the Mission, reiterates its demand that armed groups in Liberia refrain from illegal incursions into Sierra Leone, and encourages the Sierra Leonean armed forces, together with the Mission, to maintain intensive patrolling of the border with Liberia;

10. Encourages the continued support of the Mission, within its capabilities and areas of deployment, for the voluntary return of refugees and displaced persons;

11. Welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to keep the security, political, humanitarian and human rights situation in Sierra Leone under close review and to report to the Council, after due consultations with troop-contributing countries and the Government of Sierra Leone, with any additional recommendations;

12. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Follow-up to Security Council mission. On 5 December [S/2003/1147], the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a progress report on the recommendations of the Council mission to West Africa (see p. 163). With regard to Sierra Leone, he observed that the capacity of the army and police had been enhanced, as recommended, particularly that of the police, but further work was needed. For the army, its needs included construction of barracks, improvement of the transport fleet and communications equipment, and acquisition of armed helicopters. For the police, accelerated training of recruits and mid-level officers and construction of essential infrastructure were needed. Tightened control along the borders in the eastern part of the country and political progress in Liberia would contribute to stability in Sierra Leone and in the MRU subregion.

Several lessons had been learned from the UNAMSIL multidimensional peacekeeping operation, including: the importance of keeping open the lines of communication with the warring parties; the usefulness of the two-track approach to dealing with RUF in implementing DDR programmes; the significant role played by the coordination mechanisms; and the importance of the information strategy and administrative support. In an effort to consider the different roles of women in peacemaking and peace-building, UNAMSIL had established a Gender Task Force to support the participation of women in promoting peace and in decision-making, and it intended to facilitate the full participation of women in the forthcoming local elections.

The Government had made progress in reasserting its control over diamonds; official exports had reached $30 million by October 2003. UNAMSIL was continuing to support the Government in the management and governance of diamonds, including in formulating a national resource policy, assisting the police in implementing a strategy for policing diamond mining, jointly patrolling mining areas to help curb illicit mining, and offering public information facilities for sensitization campaigns and assisting the Ministry of Information and Broadcasting in developing programmes in diamond area communities. UNAMSIL would continue to support both the Special Court for Sierra Leone and the Truth and Reconciliation Commission and to seek adequate financial resources to meet their operational requirements.

The Secretary-General concluded that while significant progress had been achieved consolidating peace in Sierra Leone, much remained to be done to ensure that the planned gradual withdrawal of UNAMSIL continued to take into account the Government's ability to assume its primary responsibility for internal and external security, to enhance control over natural resources and to consolidate civil administration throughout the country. In order to address the dilemma related to the drawdown and the still fragile peace, he intended to dispatch an assessment mission to Sierra Leone in early 2004 to evaluate the progress made in accomplishing the benchmarks defined for the withdrawal. In the meantime, it was vital that UNAMSIL continue to monitor the movements of armed elements along Liberia's borders in order to prevent incursions. In response to a Council request that missions in the region develop a contingency plan for preventing cross-border movements of foreign combatants and devise a mechanism to harmonize their activities in areas of mutual concern, UNAMSIL convened a meeting of UN missions in West Africa (Freetown, 14 November), which adopted specific mechanisms for harmonization among the missions.

Report of Secretary-General (December). On 23 December [S/2003/1201], the Secretary-General submitted his twentieth report on UNAMSIL, in which he described progress in implementing phase 3 of the Mission's withdrawal, and assessed the security situation and implementation of the benchmarks.

UNAMSIL had completed the second stage of the four stages of phase 3 and, in December, had begun the third stage, which was expected to be completed in June 2004. The third stage would result in the complete drawdown of UN troops from Sector Centre, its return to Sierra Leone responsibility, reduction of UNAMSIL's troop strength to 10,500 and UNAMSIL's deployment in only two Sectors, East and West. As at 15 December 2003, troop strength stood at 11,528.

The political and security situation in Sierra Leone remained generally stable. UNAMSIL and the Government held regular joint evaluations of the security environment within the framework of the National Security Council Coordinating Group. Local security committees comprising senior members of the national police, the army and the civil service were established to identify security threats and to coordinate responses. UNAMSIL continued to work closely with the security committees and conducted joint exercises with the police and the army. Its intention was to reduce its visibility gradually. The main potential security threat in Sector Centre was the presence of the former CDF, which maintained its structures in some areas. In addition, an internment camp accommodating elements of the former Liberian Armed Forces and of LURD were located in that Sector. The area along the border with Liberia also continued to pose a security challenge. With regard to the diamond-producing areas, UNAMSIL estimated that half of all mining activities were conducted without government licences.

With regard to the key benchmark of strengthening the capacity of the Sierra Leone police and army, UNAMSIL, together with UNDP and other partners, supported the Government's recruitment and training of police; during the year, some 600 recruits joined the force. Training was provided in the areas of family support, criminal intelligence and investigation, drugs, commercial crime, forensics, traffic management, airport security and monitoring of diamond mining. The adjustment of the RSLAF force from 14,000 to 10,500 troops was on track and the effort to address the shortage of barracks was gathering momentum. However, RSLAF still lacked adequate communications equipment and vehicles.

Progress was made in consolidating State authority throughout the country at the provincial and district levels. Advances were also made in extending the judiciary throughout the country, including the rehabilitation and construction of courts and penitentiary facilities, although restoration of the rule of law and speedy dispensation of justice were impeded by resource constraints. Legislation on local government reform and decentralization, in preparation for local elections in May 2004, was drafted for presentation to Parliament. Having been requested by the Government to organize and conduct those elections, the United Nations sent an electoral needs-assessment mission to Sierra Leone in December, which identified needs in logistics, communications, security, public information and establishing an electoral unit.

The Government maintained the date for the completion of the DDR programme at 31 December 2003. It reported that of 56,751 ex-combatants registered for the programme, 32,892 had completed their training and 15,322 were still in programmes. Diamond mining came under tighter government controls, with the number of licences issued reaching 1,800, compared to 900 in June 2002. Official exports of diamonds in 2003 reached $65 million at the end of October.

UNAMSIL continued its human rights monitoring activities, assisted in drafting legislation for a national human rights commission, and supported the Government in strengthening the protection of vulnerable children. The Truth and Reconciliation Commission was granted an extension of its mandate until the end of 2003 and continued its public hearings. The Special Court continued with pre-trial hearings for the nine individuals indicted for war crimes.

There were no significant influxes of refugees into Sierra Leone from Liberia in the latter half of 2003, and the number of Liberians seeking refuge in Sierra Leone was almost unchanged, at about 67,000, of whom 55,600 were accommodated in eight camps, 8,300 in urban areas and 3,100 in the border regions. The repatriation of the 40,000 Sierra Leonean refugees who resided in the subregion recommenced in October with flights from Côte d'Ivoire and Ghana, and by road from Guinea. It was hoped that up to 5,000 Sierra Leoneans would return before the end of 2003. The United Nations Transitional Appeal for Relief and Recovery in Sierra Leone in 2004 was launched in Dublin, Ireland, on 19 November.

Sierra Leone's economic performance maintained a positive trend in 2003; early data indicated that the real gross domestic product target of 6.5 per cent growth was likely to be achieved, largely due to agricultural output, growth in diamond production, a modest increase in manufacturing output and expansion in construction activities.

As mandated by the Security Council, UNAMSIL continued to support UNMIL and maintained contacts with other UN missions in the subregion. Following the inauguration of UNMIL on 1 October (see p. 197), UNAMSIL supported the deployment of the Bangladeshi battalion to Liberia, sent a number of military observers on temporary attachment to UNMIL and assisted in training programmes.

The Secretary-General observed that the stable security situation in Sierra Leone had facilitated the consolidation of peace and the implementation of the drawdown benchmarks. Progress was also made in the gradual handover of responsibility for national security to the Sierra Leone police and RSLAF. However, additional resources were urgently required to continue enhancing the capacity of the security sector so that the armed forces and police could project a credible deterrence profile. The Secretary-General appealed to donors to provide assistance to the Government, particularly in the security sector.

The ongoing efforts to stabilize Liberia were beginning to have a positive impact on the Mano River region. The recent meeting in Freetown of the heads and force commanders of the UN peacekeeping and political missions in West Africa was an important new development. That forum would provide a framework for addressing subregional issues, in particular cross-border problems.

The Secretary-General remained concerned, however, about the numbers of foreign combatants in Liberia and the Liberian internees in Sierra Leone. As the peace process took hold in Liberia, it was expected that the repatriation of those combatants and their reintegration into civilian life would become possible.

UNAMSIL financing

At its resumed fifty-seventh session in 2003, the General Assembly had before it a number of reports of the Secretary-General on UNAMSIL financing. In the performance report on the UNAMSIL budget for 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002 [A/57/680], the Secretary-General stated that, of the $692 million apportioned, expenditures totalled $617.6 million. The Secretary-General proposed a budget for UNAMSIL for 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004 [A/57/681] of $520,053,600 gross, providing for the deployment of 12,740 troops, 260 military observers, 170 civilian police advisers, 356 international and 569 national staff, as well as 147 United Nations Volunteers.

Having reviewed those two reports, ACABQ, in May [A/57/772/Add.3], recommended that the Assembly approve a reduction in the UNAMSIL appropriation for the 2001/02 budget from the $717,603,059 provided for in resolution 56/251 A [YUN 2001, p. 175] to $676,603,059, corresponding to the amount actually assessed for the period. It suggested that the unencumbered balance of $33,353,600 resulting from the reduced appropriation should be credited to Member States, as should other income amounting to $23,207,000. ACABQ recommended approval of the Secretary-General's 2003/04 budget proposal and made suggestions for economies.

In a February overview of the financing of UN peacekeeping operations, covering the budget performance for 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002 and proposed budgets for 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004 [A/57/723], the Secretary-General stated that the main factors affecting UNAMSIL's budget performance for the 2001/02 period were: savings in the rotation of military personnel; delays in recruiting international civilian staff and UN Volunteers; reduced requirements for prefabricated facilities; and lower transportation costs.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION (June)

On 18 June [meeting 90], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/57/657/Add.1], adopted resolution 57/291 B without vote [agenda item 134].

Financing of the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone

The General Assembly,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone and the related reports of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Bearing in mind Security Council resolution 1270 (1999) of 22 October 1999 concerning the establishment of the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone, and the subsequent resolutions by which the Council revised and extended the mandate of the Mission, the latest of which was resolution 1470(2003) of 28 March 2003,

Recalling its resolution 53/29 of 20 November 1998 on the financing of the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone and subsequent resolutions on the financing of the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone, the latest of which was resolution 57/291 A of 20 December 2002,

Reaffirming the general principles underlying the financing of United Nations peacekeeping operations, as stated in General Assembly resolutions 1874(S-IV) of 27 June 1963, 3101(XXVIII) of 11 December 1973 and 55/235 of 23 December 2000,

Noting with appreciation that voluntary contributions have been made to the Mission,

Mindful of the fact that it is essential to provide the Mission with the necessary financial resources to enable it to fulfil its responsibilities under the relevant resolutions of the Security Council,

1. Takes note of the status of contributions to the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone and the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone as at 31 March 2003, including the contributions outstanding in the amount of 170 million United States dollars, representing some 9 per cent of the total assessed contributions, notes with concern that only twenty-seven Member States have paid their assessed contributions in full, and urges all other Member States, in particular those in arrears, to ensure payment of their outstanding assessed contributions;

2. Expresses its appreciation to those Member States which have paid their assessed contributions in full, and urges all other Member States to make every possible effort to ensure payment of their assessed contributions to the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone in full;

3. Expresses concern at the financial situation with regard to peacekeeping activities, in particular as regards the reimbursements to troop contributors that bear additional burdens owing to overdue payments by Member States of their assessments;

4. Also expresses concern at the delay experienced by the Secretary-General in deploying and providing adequate resources to some recent peacekeeping missions, in particular those in Africa;

5. Emphasizes that all future and existing peacekeeping missions shall be given equal and non-discriminatory treatment in respect of financial and administrative arrangements;

6. Also emphasizes that all peacekeeping missions shall be provided with adequate resources for the effective and efficient discharge of their respective mandates;

7. Reiterates its request to the Secretary-General to make the fullest possible use of facilities and equipment at the United Nations Logistics Base at Brindisi, Italy, in order to minimize the costs of procurement for the Mission;

8. Endorses the conclusions and recommendations contained in the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, and requests the Secretary-General to ensure their full implementation;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to take all necessary action to ensure that the Mission is administered with a maximum of efficiency and economy;

10. Also requests the Secretary-General, in order to reduce the cost of employing General Service staff, to continue efforts to recruit local staff for the Mission against General Service posts, commensurate with the requirements of the Mission;

11. Expresses concern at the persistent delays in the recruitment and placement of personnel, and requests the Secretary-General to take immediate measures to redress the situation, and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its fifty-eighth session;

Financial performance report for the period from 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002

12. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the financial performance of the Mission for the period from 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002;

13. Decides to reduce the appropriation authorized for the Mission for the period from 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002 under the terms of General Assembly resolution 56/251 A of 24 December 2001 from 717,603,059 dollars to 676,603,059 dollars, the amount apportioned among Member States in respect of the same period;

14. Decides also to approve the decrease in the estimated staff assessment income for the period from 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002 from 8,317,778 dollars to 7,989,378 dollars;

Budget estimates for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004

15. Decides further to appropriate to the Special Account for the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone the amount of 543,489,900 dollars for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004, inclusive of 520,053,600 dollars for the maintenance of the Mission, 17,946,000 dollars for the support account for peacekeeping operations and 5,490,300 dollars for the United Nations Logistics Base;

16. Decides to apportion among Member States the amount of 509,436,300 dollars at a monthly rate of 42,453,025 dollars, in accordance with the levels set out in resolution 55/235, as adjusted by the General Assembly in its resolutions 55/236 of 23 December 2000 and 57/290 A of 20 December 2002, and taking into account the scale of assessments for 2003, as set out in its resolutions 55/5 B of 23 December 2000 and 57/4 B of 20 December 2002, and for 2004, subject to a decision of the Security Council to extend the mandate of the Mission;

17. Decides also that, in accordance with the provisions of its resolution 978(X) of 15 December 1955, there shall be set off against the apportionment among Member States, as provided for in paragraph 16 above, their respective share in the Tax Equalization Fund of 10,167,800 dollars at a monthly rate of 847,317 dollars, comprising the estimated staff assessment income of 5.8 million dollars approved for the Mission, the prorated share of 4,043,200 dollars of the estimated staff assessment income approved for the support account and the prorated share of 324,600 dollars of the estimated staff assessment income approved for the United Nations Logistics Base;

18. Decides further that for Member States that have fulfilled their financial obligations to the Mission, there shall be set off against their apportionment, as provided for in paragraph 16 above, their respective share of the remaining unencumbered balance and of other income in the total amount of 56,560,600 dollars in respect of the financial period ended 30 June 2002, in accordance with the levels set out in resolution 55/235, as adjusted by the General Assembly in its resolutions 55/236 and 57/290 A, and taking into account the scale of assessments for 2002, as set out in its resolutions 55/5 B and 57/4 B;

19. Decides that, for Member States that have not fulfilled their financial obligations to the Mission, there shall be set off against their outstanding obligations their respective share of the remaining unencumbered balance and other income in the total amount of 56,560,600 dollars in respect of the financial period ended 30 June 2002, in accordance with the scheme set out in paragraph 18 above;

20. Decides also that the decrease of 510,300 dollars in the estimated staff assessment income in respect of the financial period ended 30 June 2002 shall be set off against the credits from the amount referred to in paragraphs 18 and 19 above, and that the respective shares of Member States therein shall be applied in accordance with the provisions of those paragraphs as appropriate;

21. Emphasizes that no peacekeeping mission shall be financed by borrowing funds from other active peacekeeping missions;

22. Encourages the Secretary-General to continue to take additional measures to ensure the safety and security of all personnel under the auspices of the United Nations participating in the Mission;

23. Invites voluntary contributions to the Mission in cash and in the form of services and supplies acceptable to the Secretary-General, to be administered, as appropriate, in accordance with the procedure and practices established by the General Assembly;

24. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-eighth session the item entitled "Financing of the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone".

Sanctions

On 20 May [S/2003/559 & Corr.1], the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 1132(1997) concerning Sierra Leone [YUN 1997, p. 135] forwarded to the Council a letter from Sierra Leone enclosing the fifth review of the certificate-of-origin regime for the export of Sierra Leone diamonds. The review was prepared by the Government in compliance with resolution 1306(2000) [YUN 2000, p. 201], in which the Council had requested Sierra Leone to establish a regime to control the export of its rough diamonds, the profits from which were being used to fuel conflicts. With the end of the rebel war, the completion of the disarmament and demobilization of ex-combatants, and the Government's effort to establish physical control of all alluvial diamond-mining areas and to discourage illicit mining, the certificate-of-origin regime was achieving its primary objective and had made a remarkable contribution to Sierra Leone's post-war development programmes. Although Liberia had not yet established an internationally verifiable certificate-of-origin regime, reports were no longer being received of uncertified Sierra Leonean diamonds transiting through its territory (see p. 201). According to Sierra Leone, the effectiveness of its regime, and that of neighbouring Guinea, had been strengthened by the establishment of the Kimberley Process Certification Scheme [YUN 2000, p. 76]. Sierra Leone's regime was fully compatible with the Kimberley Process. The prospects for its further success depended less on the incidence of illicit mining and smuggling of Sierra Leone diamonds than on adherence by all participants to their responsibilities and obligations under the global Scheme.

Security Council members, in a 5 June press statement [SC/7778-AFR/634] issued by the President on their behalf, said that the UN embargo against the import of rough diamonds from Sierra Leone without a valid certificate of origin, imposed by resolution 1306(2000) and renewed by resolution 1446(2002) [YUN 2002, p. 163], expired on 4 June. In the light of Sierra Leone's increased efforts to control and manage its diamond industry and ensure proper control over diamond-mining areas, and the Government's full participation in the Kimberley Process, members of the Council had agreed not to renew those measures. Council members commended the Government's efforts to strengthen the management of the diamond industry and encouraged the Government to continue those efforts and to work closely with UNAMSIL in ensuring the security of the diamond-mining areas. They agreed that the Council would continue to pay close attention to Sierra Leone's diamond sector because of its importance to the future stability and security of the country.

Guinea-Bissau

Guinea-Bissau continued to be beset by grave political, economic and social problems. The United Nations, through the Secretary-General's Representative and the United Nations Peacebuilding Support Office in Guinea-Bissau (UNOGBIS), monitored internal developments and the situation along its borders. At the beginning of the year, the Secretary-General warned of political and institutional instability that were generating tensions and described a deteriorating situation. Progress towards revising the constitution remained stalled and the National Assembly was not functioning. Opposition leaders accused the Government of President Koumba Yalá of arbitrary decisions, restrictions on media and harassment of political opponents. Sub-regional organizations and UN bodies became involved in the search for solutions. While internal tensions rose, particularly within the military, the security situation along the borders remained relatively calm.

Preparations for legislative elections were well under way when a military coup took place on 14 September. Three days later, an agreement was reached, providing for the resignation of President Yalá, a provisional Government of civilians, and the soldiers' return to barracks. A Political Transition Charter, which was signed in September by the Military Committee, 23 of the 24 registered political parties and civil society organizations set up a transitional Government and a transitional National Council. The Charter also provided for legislative elections to be held within six months and for presidential elections to take place one year later.

The transitional President, Henrique Pereira Rosa, and the Government pledged to hold elections within the stated time frame. Further work was done to prepare for elections and to restore the judicial system. At the request of President Rosa, the UNOGBIS mandate was extended for one year, until the end of 2004.

Developments and UNOGBIS activities

The economic, social and political problems of Guinea-Bissau, more specifically its post-conflict needs, were studied by the Ad Hoc Advisory Group on Guinea-Bissau, which issued its report in January [E/2003/8] (see p. 948). The Advisory Group, established by Economic and Social Council decision 2002/304 [YUN 2002, p. 920], reported that Guinea-Bissau was a country still emerging from conflict, having halted its civil strife three years earlier. However, the current situation suggested that it was slowly sliding back into conflict. The President of the Economic and Social Council, on 5 February [S/2003/176], drew the attention of the Security Council to the Advisory Group's report. He noted that the Economic and Social Council, in resolution 2003/1 of 31 January (see p. 948), had welcomed the Advisory Group's recommendations and endorsed the proposed partnership approach. That approach foresaw a compact under which assistance would be provided contingent on political and constitutional measures being taken by the Government and plans of action being drawn up addressing both short- and long-term development needs. The Economic and Social Council President noted with pleasure that Jagdish Koonjul (Mauritius), former Chairman of the Ad Hoc Working Group of the Security Council on Conflict Prevention and Resolution in Africa, had participated in the Advisory Group.

Security Council members, in a 5 March press statement [SC/7677-AFR/371], expressed concern at the political instability in the country. They appealed to the Government to ensure that the forthcoming legislative elections were conducted in a transparent, fair and credible manner. They stressed the need to elect the President and Vice-President of the Supreme Court before the elections and called on the international community to stand ready to send observers and to provide funding. Council members called on ECOWAS to become more strongly involved in the solution of the problems faced by Guinea-Bissau.

Members further expressed concern at the serious economic situation in Guinea-Bissau and called on the Government to take steps to facilitate a constructive dialogue with the international community and to fully endorse the partnership approach defined by the Advisory Group. They welcomed the Secretary-General's decision to assist Guinea-Bissau in holding free and transparent elections and appealed to the donor community to contribute financially to the implementation of the political and economic process in the country. Members expressed concern at the proliferation of small arms in Guinea-Bissau and asked the Government to put an end to it. They were also concerned by information regarding the human rights situation. They expressed their strong support for the Representative of the Secretary-General, David Stephen (United Kingdom), and for UNOGBIS.

Report of Secretary-General (June). The Secretary-General, in response to Security Council resolution 1233 (1999) [YUN 1999, p. 140], reported on 9 June [S/2003/621] on developments in Guinea-Bissau and UNOGBIS activities since his previous report of 13 December 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 179]. During that period, he said, the overall situation worsened. Amid political and institutional instability, electoral uncertainty had continued to generate tensions, as the question of the promulgation of the revised constitution remained unresolved. President Yalá continued to argue that, since the National Assembly was not functioning, it was not possible either to make progress on the constitutional issue or to hold elections for President and Vice-President of the Supreme Court of Justice until a new National Assembly had been elected.

The lack of progress in the constitutional and electoral spheres had been mirrored by a general deterioration in the political climate. Opposition leaders continued to accuse the Government of arbitrary executive decisions, restrictions imposed on the media, harassment of political opponents by security officials, the imposition of travel bans on prominent personalities and limitation of access to the media by political parties. Moreover, frequent ministerial changes, notably the President's dismissal of several close associates, raised concerns about the stability and continuity of the Government's activities. Tensions increased when the dismissed Minister of Defence was taken into custody on 30 April in connection with an alleged coup plot. Preparations for the elections, rescheduled for 6 July, were slow and by mid-May none of the benchmarks of the electoral timetable had been met. Opposition parties called for the appointment of a "Government of national unity" until elections were held.

To encourage dialogue between the ruling Partido da Renovação Social and the major opposition parties, UNOGBIS facilitated meetings on 18 March, 1 April and 22 May on the country's future and current issues. It also completed preparations for a six-month countrywide programme of activities to consolidate the process of national reconciliation and to promote the culture of conflict prevention. In preparation for the programme, it assisted the Federation of Women of Guinea-Bissau in launching a plan of action to maximize the participation of women in the political process, including in the elections.

Subregional organizations stepped up efforts to help stabilize the country. On 14 March, the Chairman of the Organization of Portuguese-speaking African States, President dos Santos of Angola, convened an extraordinary summit, attended by President Yalá. In their 14 March communiqué, the heads of State encouraged the authorities of Guinea-Bissau to pursue dialogue and called on the international community to provide technical, logistic and material support for the legislative elections. On 7 April, the ECOWAS Mediation and Security Council met in Abidjan to discuss the security situation in West Africa, including the rising political tensions in Guinea-Bissau. In a press statement, ECOWAS recommended the dispatch to Guinea-Bissau of a delegation of its Council of Elders to assist the Government to strengthen democratic governance and reduce political tensions. The Group of Friends of Guinea-Bissau, the Security Council's Ad Hoc Working Group on Conflict Prevention and Resolution in Africa, and the Economic and Social Council's Ad Hoc Advisory Group on Guinea-Bissau worked together to explore ways to assist the country.

The situation along the border with Senegal remained calm and the security measures put in place two years earlier had been largely successful in preventing incursions into Guinea-Bissau by armed elements of the separatist Movement of Democratic Forces of Casamance (MFDC). In order to promote peace in the subregion, President Yalá offered to host consultations involving MFDC factions at the request of President Wade of Senegal. Internally, there were reported tensions in the armed forces over the non-payment of salaries and desertions. On 9 May, the Chief of Staff of the Armed Forces denounced reports of an imminent coup d'état. The Demobilization, Reinsertion and Reintegration Programme had entered the reintegration phase, which was expected to end in June with the reinsertion of 6,000 ex-combatants. Demining continued to be carried out by two NGOs with support from UNDP. Despite reports of increased criminal activity, the police lacked any quick-reaction capability and training was rudimentary.

The human rights situation had become more fragile, with frequent cases of intimidation of political opponents, sometimes involving physical force, and several prominent personalities had been prevented from travelling abroad. National radio and television broadcasting facilities were monopolized by the ruling party and the private media were subjected to repressive measures. UNOGBIS continued to monitor the human rights situation. Having finally been allowed access to individuals being detained in connection with an alleged coup d'état, UNOGBIS determined that the prisoners were being held in unsatisfactory conditions.

The worsening social and economic situation sharpened political tensions. With accumulated salary arrears owed by the Government reaching $11 million, public dissatisfaction and frustration resulted in periodic strikes by public sector workers, and the Government was forced to pay some workers in rice. Economic assistance was provided by a number of UN agencies.

The Secretary-General concluded that Guinea-Bissau, which had seemed so promising following the end of the 1998-1999 armed conflict and the holding of free and fair general elections, was once again embarked on a downward course. The forthcoming legislative elections were viewed as a crucial test of Guinea-Bissau's young democratic process. The United Nations was providing technical assistance to the National Electoral Commission and would be prepared to coordinate international observation; however, should it be determined that conditions were not conducive for free, fair and credible elections, the Organization could reconsider its assistance. The Secretary-General decided to send another electoral mission to Guinea-Bissau to review the situation.

Security Council consideration. The Security Council, on 19 June [meeting 4776], considered the Secretary-General's June report and was briefed by his Representative for Guinea-Bissau and Head of UNOGBIS, David Stephen. In the context of the approaching elections scheduled for 6 July, Mr. Stephen said that the opposition continued to accuse the Government of restrictions on civil liberties. The caretaker Government continued in office, the National Assembly remained dissolved, and judicial institutions continued to be weak. An electoral needs-assessment mission of the UN Department of Political Affairs, after a visit to the country (5-11 June), noted that it was not technically feasible for the elections to be held on 6 July and urged the authorities to undertake the planned electoral census or revision of the electoral registers with a minimum of delay. Although the President had concurred that the polling date could not be maintained, he had not yet announced publicly that elections would be postponed. Meanwhile, the economic situation remained critical. Among positive developments, the private Radio Bombolom had reopened and continued to function, and the former Minister of Defence and Mr. Yalá's political adviser, who had been detained since April, were provisionally released.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 19 June [meeting 4776], following consultations among Security Council members, the President made statement S/PRST/2003/8 on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council, recalling its previous statements on Guinea-Bissau, including the statement by its President of 29 November 2000 (S/PRST/2000/37), having considered the report of the Secretary-General on developments in Guinea-Bissau and on the activities of the United Nations Peace-building Support Office in that country, and anticipating the Council mission to Guinea-Bissau, expresses its concern with regard to the fragile political situation in Guinea-Bissau, to the persistent economic and social crisis and to continuing disturbing information regarding the human rights situation. It urges the leaders of the country, and the international community, to work more purposefully together to ensure that the development, humanitarian and peace-building agendas are quickly put back on track.

The Council appeals to the President and the Government of Guinea-Bissau to organize effectively and in a timely manner the forthcoming legislative elections and to ensure that these elections are conducted in a transparent, fair and credible manner, in accordance with the Constitution and the electoral laws. It is the expectation of the Council that neither candidates nor political parties will be subjected to violence and intimidation and that the presence of international observers at these elections will be acceptable to all parties. The Council also expresses the hope that, following the successful conduct of the elections, the Government will embark upon additional concrete measures to show further proof of its commitment to democracy and the rule of law by promulgating the new Constitution and by having the President and Vice-President of the Supreme Court duly elected without further delay.

The Council calls upon the Government of Guinea-Bissau to take the necessary steps to facilitate a constructive dialogue with the international community and the Bretton Woods institutions and to endorse fully the partnership approach defined by the Economic and Social Council Ad Hoc Advisory Group on Guinea-Bissau.

The Council appeals to the donor community to contribute financially to the implementation of the political and economic process in Guinea-Bissau, including necessary support for the legislative elections.

The Council expresses its concern with regard to the situation of human rights and civil liberties and urges the Government of Guinea-Bissau to take the necessary measures in order to improve this situation. It stresses the importance of full respect for freedom of speech and freedom of the press.

The Council acknowledges the importance of the regional dimension in the solution of the problems faced by Guinea-Bissau and, in that regard, calls upon the Economic Community of West African States and the Organization of Portuguese-Speaking African Countries to further strengthen their involvement, and expresses its intention to intensify its cooperation with these organizations.

The Council welcomes the willingness of President Kumba Yalá to host negotiations on the issue of Casamance and appeals to him to continue to cooperate constructively with the Government of Senegal in order to contribute to a solution of this issue.

The Council recognizes and commends the important role played by the Representative of the Secretary-General as well as by the United Nations country team towards helping to consolidate peace, democracy and the rule of law, and expresses its appreciation for their activities.

The Council expresses its full support to the forthcoming mission to Guinea-Bissau, which will be led by the Permanent Representative of Mexico to the United Nations and will be the first part of an overall mission to West Africa, and looks forward to its conclusions and recommendations.

The Council expresses its intention to keep the situation in Guinea-Bissau under regular review.

Advisory Group. The Economic and Social Council's Ad Hoc Advisory Group on Guinea-Bissau, in a supplementary report dated 1 July [E/2003/95] covering its activities since January (see p. 949), noted that it had carried out a joint mission with the Security Council (see below). The Advisory Group concluded that the holding of elections was an urgent priority, and recommended that the Economic and Social Council further appeal to donors to consider funding the elections through contributions to the UNDP Trust Fund. In resolution 2003/53 of 24 July (see p. 949), the Economic and Social Council reiterated the need to foster a comprehensive approach to Guinea-Bissau's problems in its post-conflict phase, in particular to prepare a long-term programme of support, based on its development priorities.

By a 25 August letter [S/2003/836], the President of the Economic and Social Council informed the Security Council President of the work of the Advisory Group, drawing attention to the supplementary report. He noted the growing working relationship between the two Councils on the situation in Guinea-Bissau, including the joint mission (see below). The Advisory Group's mandate had been extended until 2004.

Security Council mission. The Security Council's mission to West Africa (see p. 163), accompanied by the Economic and Social Council's Ad Hoc Advisory Group on Guinea-Bissau, visited Guinea-Bissau on 27 and 28 June. In its 7 July report [S/2003/688], the mission said that President Yalá had set 12 October as the election date and welcomed international observers, but he made no commitments on restoring democratic freedoms or respecting human rights. The mission stressed the desire of the international community to increase assistance to Guinea-Bissau, but warned that it was contingent on the Government taking the requisite steps to fulfil the partnership approach arrangement.

The overall impression gained by the mission was that Guinea-Bissau was gripped by a deep social, economic, administrative and political crisis. UNOGBIS was increasingly obliged to play a preventive, pre-conflict role. There were concerns that mounting tensions and public discontent could result in popular unrest, perhaps even civil war. While welcoming the President's statement on holding elections, the mission stated that other requirements had to be met, including the revision of electoral registers and ensuring that all parties could campaign freely and had equal access to the media. It recommended that the Security Council monitor progress in the electoral process and in implementing other steps mentioned in presidential statement S/PRST/2003/8. The mission proposed that the Council request the Secretary-General to provide an update by the end of July and regularly thereafter during the electoral period. The mission urged donors to provide financial and technical assistance for electoral preparations, contingent on the Government's creating conditions for credible elections. International electoral observers could play an important role in that respect. The mission recommended that the Security Council continue collaborative initiatives with the Economic and Social Council in the area of peacebuilding in post-conflict countries.

Security Council press statement (4 August). Having heard a briefing by the Secretary-General's Representative, Security Council members, in a 4 August press statement [SC/7838-AFR/683], welcomed the progress made since the June/July mission to West Africa, especially the announcement by President Yalá of the 12 October date for parliamentary elections, which constituted an important factor for the stability of the country. Council members encouraged President Yalá and his Government to continue working towards holding legislative elections in a transparent, fair and credible manner and commended the international community for having pledged the necessary resources for the organization of the elections. They further noted that the National Electoral Commission had invited international organizations to send observers. In regard to the electoral process, members expressed concern at the delay in voters' registration and appealed to the Government to speed up that process. They also expressed concern at the serious economic situation in the country and appealed for assistance for sustainable development. The Council encouraged the Guinea-Bissau authorities to restore good governance.

Coup d'état

On 14 September, the military staged a coup d'état in Guinea-Bissau, overthrowing President Yalá. In a 15 September press statement [SC/7873], Security Council members condemned the assumption of power through non-constitutional means, especially by threat or the use of force. They called for the speedy restoration of constitutional order and the holding of legislative elections as soon as possible, and called on the parties concerned to ensure the safety and security of all in Guinea-Bissau. Members welcomed the constructive role played by members of ECOWAS to find a peaceful resolution to the crisis.

On 19 September [S/2003/919], Ghana transmitted to the Security Council an ECOWAS communiqué issued following a fact-finding mission to Guinea-Bissau (15-17 September). ECOWAS expressed serious concern about the deepening political crisis and the attempt by the armed forces to remove President Yalá from office. The visiting delegation reminded the leadership of the armed forces about the Algiers Declaration of the Organization of African Unity of 1999 and the ECOWAS protocols on democratic governance, which stipulated that no recognition would be given to any Government that came to power through unconstitutional means or use of force. After discussions with all stakeholders, the following was agreed: the armed forces were not interested in political power and would return to barracks; a transitional Government of national unity composed solely of civilians would be formed through consultations with all stakeholders; President Yalá agreed to step down in the interest of national unity and stability; the transitional Government would be led by a civilian; the transition would be of reasonable duration, at the end of which legislative and presidential elections would be conducted; and ECOWAS would launch an international appeal for support to enable the country to embark on a democratic transition and socio-economic reconstruction.

Also on 19 September [S/2003/923], Italy forwarded an EU statement condemning the coup d'état and the unconstitutional seizure of power. The EU took note of the Military Committee's announcement of its intention to ensure a prompt return to constitutional order and civilian rule. It expressed its commitment to work with the international community to support a quick restoration of constitutional legality, democratic principles and national reconciliation in Guinea-Bissau.

Security Council consideration (September and November). The Security Council, on 29 September [meeting 4834], considered the situation in Guinea-Bissau. It heard a briefing by Tuliameni Kalomoh, Assistant Secretary-General for Political Affairs, who noted that the military officers who staged the coup d'état under the leadership of General Verissimo Correia Seabra had said their action was motivated by the need to re-establish the authority of the State, to rid the public administration of partisanship, to establish a transitional Government to include all political orientations and to create the foundations for elections. Immediately following the coup, ECOWAS had undertaken mediation efforts and, with support from the Community of Portuguese-Speaking Countries, helped reach an agreement on 17 September between President Yalá and the military contingent that staged the coup. Mr. Yalá resigned and a 16-member Ad Hoc Technical Commission, which included representatives of all political parties and of civil society, and religious and traditional leaders, was established to elaborate a transitional charter. The Military Committee nominated Henrique Perreira Rosa, an economist and the former Chairman of the National Electoral Commission in 1994, as transitional President.

On 28 September, agreement was reached on the Political Transitional Charter, which would guide the process of return to constitutional normality. The 56-member National Transition Council would fulfil the role of a parliament. No dates were set for elections, but it was agreed that they would be held within six months (before 28 March 2004), followed by presidential elections within a year of the first round. The urgent task for the international community was to help ensure a successful transition by responding to the economic and budgetary needs of the transitional Government.

The Special Envoy of the Community of Portuguese-Speaking Countries, José Ramos Horta, said that it appeared that the military intervention that brought down Mr. Yalá was welcomed by all of Guinea-Bissau society. He reported that the change occurred without any violence and those involved were motivated by social and economic conditions.

At a private meeting on 18 November [meeting 4860], the Council continued discussions on Guinea-Bissau.

UNOGBIS mandate. The Secretary-General, in an 11 November letter [S/2003/1096], informed the Security Council that President Rosa had requested the extension of the UNOGBIS mandate for one year, until 31 December 2004, to facilitate dialogue among all actors in Guinea-Bissau and to promote national reconciliation during the transition. The Secretary-General proposed that the current mandate be extended for one year and be revised as follows: to support political dialogue, national reconciliation, the rule of law and respect for human rights, and to strengthen democratic institutions; to encourage the Government and other national stakeholders to restore constitutional normality and to create a conducive environment for peace, stability and the holding of free and transparent elections; to assist with elections; to support national efforts aimed at strengthening the country's capacities for conflict prevention and for the peaceful management of differences; to encourage initiatives aimed at maintaining friendly relations between Guinea-Bissau and its neighbours; to encourage the Government to enact the programme of small arms collection and destruction; and to facilitate, in cooperation with the UN country team, the Bretton Woods institutions and others, international political support to address the post-conflict recovery priorities.

The Council, on 14 November [S/2003/1097], took note of the proposal to extend the UNOGBIS mandate and the revised mandate.

Follow-up to Security Council mission. The Secretary-General, in a December progress report [S/2003/1147] on the recommendations of the Security Council mission to West Africa (see p. 163), described the current situation in Guinea-Bissau. The National Election Commission had resumed its work and was expected to finalize the electoral register in November. It had recommended that the legislative elections be held by the end of January 2004, ahead of the 28 March deadline. The Secretary-General welcomed the declared commitment of the newly formed Government to restore legality and hold elections.

With regard to cooperation between the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council in peace-building, the latter's Ad Hoc Advisory Group on Guinea-Bissau, whose mandate had been extended until February 2004, continued to monitor the electoral process and maintained close relations with Guinea-Bissau's major development partners. On 17 November, the Group held a meeting at UN Headquarters with a high-level delegation of the transitional Government, senior UN officials, representatives of the Bretton Woods institutions and donor countries to discuss ways to provide support to the transitional Government. The next day, President Rosa appealed to the Security Council, in a private session, to mobilize urgent assistance for his country. The Secretary-General said it was essential that the international community remain engaged with Guinea-Bissau, including by providing urgent financial and other support to help the authorities follow through on their commitments.

Report of Secretary-General (December). On 5 December [S/2003/1157], the Secretary-General reported on developments in Guinea-Bissau and on UNOGBIS activities, focusing on the efforts of the transitional authorities to implement the transition and on the UNOGBIS contribution in that regard.

After the military coup, the transitional Government, led by a civilian Prime Minister, Artur Sanhá, the National Transitional Council, acting as a parliament, and the transitional President, Mr. Rosa, were sworn in and began to carry out their functions. During the critical time leading up to the transition, UNOGBIS and the Secretary-General's Representative provided good offices and advice to all actors in Guinea-Bissau in order to foster dialogue.

The transitional authorities had taken a number of positive steps towards implementing the Transition Charter. The National Transitional Council approved the appointment of a new Attorney-General, who took office in November, and reinstated Supreme Court judges and other legal officials. It announced that elections for the President and Vice-President of the Supreme Court would be held on 16 December. The Government paid civil service salaries for October and planned to establish a regular payment plan. The State and independent broadcasting and print media were functioning normally. The transitional authorities had made contacts with regional and international partners to engage them in dialogue on possible support for a transition to democracy.

The security situation in Guinea-Bissau had improved, with patrols along the borders having been strengthened. The situation along the border with Senegal remained calm although occasional incidents were reported. In August, Guinea-Bissau sent a contingent of 650 members to join UNMIL. Internally, tensions were reported among the army rank and file over the backlog of salary arrears and poor conditions in the barracks. The reintegration phase of the demobilization, reinsertion and reintegration programme was in progress and was scheduled to end in June 2004. The trust fund for the programme was able to fund only 4,372 beneficiaries, identified as the most vulnerable of a total of 11,300 ex-combatants. Despite the lack of resources and mounting salary arrears, members of the police force were still reporting to work and fulfilling their law and order duties. The transitional Government planned to establish a police training centre, and the UNOGBIS civilian police adviser was assisting in formulating those plans.

UNOGBIS continued to monitor the human rights situation, focusing on civil liberties and dialogue with the authorities. It followed the cases of 10 members of the military detained since December 2002 for allegedly plotting a coup. Former President Yalá remained under house arrest.

The economic and social situation threatened to disrupt the fragile political consensus. Revenue collection had almost collapsed, while expenditure was not controlled or recorded. The non-payment of salaries for most of the year to public sector workers, the inability of the majority of children to attend school, and the high mortality rate fed social tensions. The UN country team worked with other UN and international bodies to deal with those problems. Although the Government intended to draw up a development strategy to be presented to a round-table conference planned for 2004, there was an immediate need for a bridging mechanism to mobilize and coordinate assistance to Guinea-Bissau. The World Bank planned an informal meeting of donors for December and UNDP had established a multi-donor fund to address the most urgent needs of the population.

The Secretary-General observed that the recent removal of the democratically elected President, however reprehensible, should not be seen as a single event interrupting an ongoing democratic process, but as the culmination of an untenable situation during which constitutional norms were repeatedly violated. It was encouraging that the transitional Government had taken some steps in the right direction. It had appealed to the international community for urgent assistance. The crucial task in 2004 would be to help Guinea-Bissau to create a propitious political environment for the peaceful conduct of the transition, as it would be nearing its conclusion in 2005, and in particular for the holding of credible legislative elections by March 2004. In that regard, he hoped that the international community would remain engaged to help ensure that commitments were fulfilled.

Security Council press statement (December). The Security Council considered the Secretary-General's report and was briefed by his Representative during informal consultations on 19 December [S/2003/662]. The President then issued a press statement saying that Council members welcomed the positive steps taken recently by the new authorities, especially the announcement of 28 March 2004 as the date for the parliamentary elections. They expressed concern about the critical economic and social situation and renewed their appeal to the international community to provide urgent assistance to Guinea-Bissau. They welcomed the assistance by some countries and organizations, including the contributions to the Emergency Economic Management Fund, established by UNDP, and called on other donors to contribute to it. They also commended the constructive role of the Bretton Woods institutions, the African Development Bank and UNDP.

Members encouraged the AU, ECOWAS and the Community of Portuguese-Speaking Countries to remain actively engaged in Guinea-Bissau. They commended the Ad Hoc Working Group on Conflict Prevention and Resolution in Africa, the Economic and Social Council's Advisory Group on Guinea-Bissau and the Group of Friends of Guinea-Bissau for their role in the follow-up provided to the situation in Guinea-Bissau. They expressed appreciation for the support provided by the UN system for the peace-building process and encouraged it to provide further support.

Horn of Africa

Appointment. The Secretary-General, on 15 January [S/2003/66], informed the Security Council that his Special Adviser, Mohamed Sahnoun (Algeria), had been following developments in the Horn of Africa, especially Somalia and the Sudan, and was providing advice on a possible UN role in negotiating settlements of the conflicts in those countries. Recently, regional peace efforts under the auspices of the Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD) in Somalia (see p. 241) and the Sudan (see p. 256) had been reinvigorated. Significant progress was made in the IGAD-led peace process on the Sudan, resulting in the signing of the Machakos (Kenya) Protocol in July 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 217]. The two sides were expected to resume negotiations in January 2003 on a comprehensive peace agreement, with Mr. Sahnoun representing the Secretary-General. Mr. Sahnoun had also taken part in the IGAD peace initiatives with regard to Somalia and had participated in meetings of the IGAD Partners' Forum in support of the peace processes in both Somalia and the Sudan; he would continue to do so as the pace of negotiations to reach agreements was accelerated.

In view of those undertakings, the Secretary-General had decided to extend the appointment of his Special Adviser until 31 December 2003. The Council, on 20 January [S/2003/67], took note of the decision.

On 14 November [S/2003/1138], the Secretary-General informed the Council that Mr. Sahnoun continued to carry out his functions, especially in Somalia and the Sudan, having led the UN observer delegation at the Sudan peace talks and attended the Somalia National Reconciliation Conference, both in Kenya. He had also represented the Secretary-General at the tenth IGAD summit in Kampala, Uganda, in October. The Secretary-General had decided to extend his appointment until 31 December 2004; on 21 November [S/2003/1139], the Council took note of his decision.

Eritrea-Ethiopia

The United Nations continued to carry out oversight of the implementation of the 2000 Algiers ceasefire and peace agreements between Eritrea and Ethiopia [YUN 2000, p. 180] (known collectively as the Algiers Agreements), including regulating their border dispute, which had led to armed conflict in 1998 and periodic outbreaks of fighting since then. The United Nations Mission in Ethiopia and Eritrea (UNMEE), established in 2000, continued to monitor the border region inside and near the Temporary Security Zone and to support the work of the Boundary Commission, a body set up by the Agreements to determine the border. In 2003, the Commission focused on demarcation of the border, following the completion in 2002 of the border's delimitation. The border area remained generally calm throughout 2003.

In the early months of the year, both sides cooperated with the Boundary Commission and UNMEE, and progress was made in implementing the Algiers Agreements, particularly regarding the release of the remaining prisoners of war. However, progress on the boundary question soon stalled. The Commission submitted maps indicating the delimitation line to both parties and they responded with comments. Despite having previously accepted the delimitation decision, Ethiopia raised issues questioning the boundary as determined by that decision. Eritrea raised issues of a technical nature. Both sides continued to restrict the freedom of movement of UNMEE in areas inside and adjacent to the Temporary Security Zone and both banned direct flights by UN aircraft between Addis Ababa and Asmara. The Secretary-General described the peace process as being at a critical stage and warned that the loss of momentum could have an impact on the longer-term goals of reconstruction and development. Preliminary arrangements were made for placing demarcation pillars along the border. However, the work came to a standstill by the end of the year and the Boundary Commission decided to reduce its activity in the area to a minimum so that it could be resumed, if required.

Implementation of Algiers Agreements

In early 2003, further progress was made in implementing the Algiers Agreements and the parties had generally been cooperating throughout the peace process, according to the Secretary-General [S/2003/257].

Security Council members, having been briefed by Hedi Annabi, Assistant Secretary-General, Department of Peacekeeping Operations, during informal consultations on 7 January, issued a press statement [SC/7625-AFR/539] welcoming the progress made since the Secretary-General's last (December 2002) report [YUN 2002, p. 192]. They urged Ethiopia and Eritrea to continue to extend to UNMEE and the Boundary Commission full cooperation in order to ensure the smooth demarcation of the border. In that regard, members welcomed the seventh report of the Eritrea-Ethiopia Boundary Commission, in particular the schedule for demarcation [ibid., p. 193], and urged the two sides to engage in discussions with the Secretary-General's Special Representative, Legwaila Joseph Legwaila (Botswana), to address any issues that might arise during the demarcation process.

Council members welcomed the release by Ethiopia of all remaining Eritrean prisoners of war in November 2002, under the auspices of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), as did Eritrea for the Ethiopian prisoners. They called on both parties to resolve all other outstanding issues, including the establishment of a direct high-altitude air corridor between the two capitals.

Members expressed concern about the likely shortfall in the Trust Fund for the Delimitation and Demarcation of the Border once demarcation began. They called on the international community to contribute to the Fund so that the demarcation process could be concluded, in accordance with the Boundary Commission's schedule. Also expressing concern about the looming drought in the two countries and the implications for the peace process, they supported the Secretary-General's appeal for assistance for humanitarian operations through the consolidated appeals process and other mechanisms.

Eritrea, on 6 January [S/2003/8], raised with the Council the Secretary-General's failure to mention, in his December 2002 report, Ethiopia's violation of an order of the Boundary Commission concerning the removal of Ethiopian settlers from the Eritrea territory of Dembe Mengul.

Report of Secretary-General (March). On 6 March [S/2003/257], the Secretary-General submitted a progress report on Ethiopia and Eritrea, updating developments since his December 2002 report [YUN 2002, p. 192] and describing UNMEE activities. As at 26 February, the total strength of UNMEE's military component stood at 4,082 personnel. Annexed to the report was the eighth report of the Eritrea-Ethiopia Boundary Commission.

During the review period, stated the Secretary-General, the situation in the Temporary Security Zone along the joint border and its adjacent areas remained generally calm. UNMEE continued to conduct aerial reconnaissance and ground patrols of the Zone and frequent inspections of militia and police weapon cantonment sites there, and also maintained checkpoints and standing patrols at various strategic locations. The armed forces of both countries cooperated relatively well with UNMEE and no significant changes in military activities were observed. However, local Ethiopian herdsmen and their livestock had been entering grazing land in the Zone's Sector Centre, around Drum Drum and Gafnath Aromo, almost on a daily basis, despite the warnings of UNMEE peacekeepers. Although generally peaceful in nature, the incursions had caused tension and, on 18 December 2002, an Ethiopian herdsman was found shot in the Zone. UNMEE worked to keep the situation calm and met with local authorities to encourage them to be more active in preventing cross-border incidents.

UNMEE continued to experience restrictions on its freedom of movement and denial of access to military authorities by Eritrea, primarily in Sector East, in violation of the model status-of-forces agreement. In Ethiopia, UNMEE personnel passing through the Addis Ababa airport were subjected to immigration formalities in violation of the existing status-of-forces agreement. There had been no progress regarding the establishment of a direct high-altitude flight route for UNMEE aircraft between Asmara and Addis Ababa, compelling UNMEE to have to fly via longer routes at considerable expense and with security implications. The Secretary-General appealed to both parties to resolve that issue.

The Military Coordination Commission held its fifteenth meeting in Nairobi on 29 January, focusing on recent incidents within the Temporary Security Zone and adjacent areas, and on ways to strengthen existing mechanisms for resolving such problems at the local level. The Commission also discussed preparations for demining in support of demarcation of the border.

The Eritrean authorities maintained their position that UNMEE national staff should discharge national service obligations, and some national mission staff had been detained, contravening the model status-of-forces agreement.

In meetings with the Special Representative, Prime Minister Meles Zenawi of Ethiopia expressed concerns regarding the Boundary Commission's demarcation of the border and noted that if those concerns were not addressed, Ethiopia might reject the Commission's demarcation decisions. Mr. Legwaila immediately consulted with the representatives of the Guarantors and Facilitators of the peace process and the group of Friends of UNMEE regarding Ethiopia's position.

At a meeting between the Commission and the parties (London, 8-9 February), a number of matters were discussed that were covered in the Commission's eighth report (see p. 232). Meanwhile, in accordance with its adjusted mandate under resolution 1430(2002) [YUN 2002, p. 189], UNMEE provided support to the Commission in the implementation of the delimitation decision, including through demining activities and providing security for Commission personnel in the field. Landmines and unexploded ordnance constituted a major threat to the population on both sides of the border, as well as to UN personnel. From December 2002 to early February 2003, nine civilians were killed in mine accidents. A recent spate of incidents involving newly laid anti-tank mines in Sector West was of grave concern. Increasingly, UNMEE was focusing on mine action activities associated with the demarcation of the border. In that connection, the Mission consulted with the parties to establish coordination and liaison procedures to facilitate movement for demining operations in support of demarcation.

Progress was made in clearing routes in the Temporary Security Zone, with over 2,000 kilometres of routes having been surveyed or cleared. It was expected that the two countries would provide freedom of movement in the border areas for UNMEE demining efforts for demarcation.

The border areas of Ethiopia and Eritrea were hard hit by the prevailing drought in the region (see also p. 927 and 961). According to humanitarian agencies, malnutrition was rising in both countries and donor response had been slow. Quick-impact projects were an important part of UNMEE's work in the Mission area. Repatriations of civilians by both Ethiopia and Eritrea, under ICRC auspices, had declined. During the reporting period, Ethiopia repatriated 99 persons of Eritrean origin, while Eritrea repatriated 155 persons of Ethiopian origin.

The Secretary-General concluded that, while further progress had been made in implementing the Algiers Agreements, the peace process had reached a critical stage. The parties had generally been cooperating throughout the process; however, it was time for them to translate their commitments into real action, by implementing the April 2002 delimitation decision [YUN 2002, p. 187]. He called on the leaders of both countries to exercise statesmanship and flexibility. Recent démarches made to his Special Representative and to the diplomatic community, together with representations made to the Boundary Commission (see below), could have serious consequences. Issues that arose in the Commission had to be addressed within its proper legal framework, as efforts to reopen fundamental matters already settled through binding arbitration could only be counterproductive. The United Nations was prepared to facilitate the resolution of problems that might arise as a result of the transfer of territorial control, possibly by dispatching a needs-assessment mission and/or mobilizing international assistance. However, such support could be provided only on the basis of an accepted demarcation line.

The Secretary-General noted that although there had been no serious ceasefire violations since the establishment of the Temporary Security Zone, recent cross-border incidents were a source of concern. It was particularly important that both countries begin to sensitize their populations about the demarcation process and its implications. UNMEE, meanwhile, would continue to monitor the situation in the Zone and adjacent areas, and was prepared to assist the parties in normalizing relations. To that end, he recommended that the UNMEE mandate be extended for six months, until 15 September 2003.

Boundary Commission (March). In the eighth report of the Boundary Commission, which was annexed to the Secretary-General's 6 March report, the Commission confirmed that the maps drawn up indicating the demarcation line had been delivered to the two parties for their comments, which, the Commission indicated, were to be of an essentially technical nature. The comments were received in January. Those filed by Eritrea (17 pages) were of a technical nature, while those filed by Ethiopia (141 pages) went far beyond the scope intended. They contained a detailed exposition of views regarding the steps Ethiopia deemed necessary for completing the demarcation. In a number of respects, the comments amounted to an attempt to reopen the substance of the Commission's April 2002 decision on delimitation [YUN 2002, p. 187], notwithstanding Ethiopia's repeated statements of its acceptance of that decision. The main thrust of the Ethiopian comments was that the boundary should be varied so as to take better account of human and physical geography. The Commission had always made it clear that it did not have the power to vary the boundary delimited by the April 2002 decision. In the absence of agreement by both sides on variations to the boundary line, the Commission's ability to ameliorate problems was limited to minor clarifications justified principally by the enlargement of the scale of the maps with which it was working. In addition to seeking variations to the boundary line in terms that appeared to undermine not only the delimitation decision but also the peace process as a whole, Ethiopia had complained that Eritrea had been using the Commission's fieldwork as a cover for an Eritrean military intelligence-collection operation and stated that fieldwork would only be allowed to continue if Eritrea nominated new field liaison officers. Since demarcation could not continue in the absence of field liaison officers of one party, Ethiopia's demand amounted to a prohibition of further fieldwork pending Eritrea's replacement of its officers by others acceptable to Ethiopia. In response to the Commission's requirement that each party appoint two ad hoc field officers in order for demarcation to continue, Eritrea had nominated two officers but Ethiopia had not. The Commission further noted that Ethiopia had not implemented the Commission's order of 17 July 2002 requiring it to withdraw its nationals from Dembe Mengul in Eritrea, after they had returned there with Ethiopian governmental support.

Other issues that remained to be resolved were the preparation of large-scale maps, the marking of boundary pillar sites, arrangements relating to pillar construction and mine clearance and maintenance of cleared areas. The Commission hoped that the Security Council would: confirm that the Commission did not have the authority to vary the delimitation line to meet local needs as asserted by Ethiopia; call on the parties to cooperate with the Commission so that it could fulfil its mandate of expeditiously delimiting and demarcating the boundary; clarify UNMEE's mandate so as to permit accommodation of contractors' personnel within UNMEE encampments; and authorize UNMEE to provide security for Commission personnel.

The Boundary Commission, in a 31 March addendum to the Secretary-General's report (S/2003/257/Add.1), provided observations on its approach to the demarcation phase of its work in the light of certain considerations advanced by the parties in their January comments on the maps indicating the demarcation line. It explained the basis on which the delimitation process was carried out and stated that the next steps were clear: the surveyors would establish locations of the marker pillars and the contractors would construct them. During those operations, the parties had to cooperate with the Commission and the Commission's personnel had to be fully safeguarded. The parties needed to discuss with the chief surveyor the manner in which they would fulfil those undertakings.

Communication. Eritrea, on 11 March (S/2003/305), stated that Ethiopia's efforts to impede the preparatory fieldwork of demarcation ranged from threatening to shoot down the Boundary Commission's helicopter carrying Commission personnel and contractors to refusal to issue appropriate flight permits. Most significantly, Ethiopia refused to accept the delimitation decision of the Commission, in violation of the Algiers Agreements. Those actions were a recipe for conflict and posed a threat to regional peace and security.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (March)

On 14 March [meeting 4719], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1466(2003). The draft (S/2003/312) was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its previous resolutions and statements pertaining to the situation between Ethiopia and Eritrea, and the requirements contained therein, including in particular its resolution 1434(2002) of 6 September 2002,

Reaffirming its unwavering support for the peace process and its commitment, including through the role played by the United Nations Mission in Ethiopia and Eritrea in the implementation of its mandate, to the full and expeditious implementation of the comprehensive Peace Agreement signed by the parties on 12

December 2000 and the preceding Agreement on Cessation of Hostilities of 18 June 2000 (hereinafter referred to collectively as "the Algiers Agreements"), the Delimitation Decision of the Boundary Commission of 13 April 2002, embraced by the parties as final and binding in accordance with the Algiers Agreements, including the Orders issued on 17 July 2002, and the ensuing binding Demarcation Directions,

Commending the Governments of Ethiopia and Eritrea on the progress made thus far in the peace process, including the recently concluded release and repatriation of prisoners of war, and calling upon both parties to cooperate with the International Committee of the Red Cross to clarify and to resolve the remaining issues in accordance with the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and with the commitments made in the Algiers Agreements,

Reiterating the need for both parties to fulfil their obligations under international law, including international humanitarian law, human rights law and refugee law, and to ensure the safety of all personnel of the United Nations, the Boundary Commission, the International Committee of the Red Cross and other humanitarian organizations,

Noting that the peace process is about to enter its crucial phase of demarcation, and emphasizing the importance of ensuring expeditious implementation of the Boundary Decision while maintaining stability in all areas affected by the Decision,

Stressing that only the full implementation of the Algiers Agreements will lead to sustainable peace, which is a crucial precondition to address reconstruction and development needs as well as economic recovery,

Noting with concern the continued violations of the model status-of-forces agreement, which Ethiopia has signed and Eritrea has agreed to respect,

Welcoming the eighth report of the Boundary Commission, noting the concerns expressed therein with regard to full adherence by the parties to the Boundary Decision and demarcation-related decisions of the Commission, and expressing its full support for the work of the Commission and the legal framework within which the Commission is taking its decisions,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission in Ethiopia and Eritrea until 15 September 2003 at the troop and military observer levels authorized by its resolution 1320(2000) of 15 September 2000;

2. Urges both Ethiopia and Eritrea to continue to assume their responsibilities and fulfil their commitments under the Algiers Agreements, and calls upon them to cooperate fully and promptly with the Boundary Commission to enable it to fulfil the mandate conferred upon it by the parties of expeditiously delimiting and demarcating the boundary, to implement fully the binding Demarcation Directions of the Commission, to abide promptly by all its Orders, including those issued on 17 July 2002, and to take all steps necessary to provide the necessary security on the ground for the staff of the Commission operating in territories under their control;

3. Expresses concern regarding recent incidents of incursions across the southern boundary of the Temporary Security Zone and calls upon both parties to ensure an immediate end to such incidents and to cooperate fully with investigations by the Mission in this regard, and expresses further concern about the placement by unknown entities of anti-tank mines in the Temporary Security Zone;

4. Calls upon the parties to cooperate fully and expeditiously with the Mission in the implementation of its mandate to ensure the personal security of the staff of the Mission when operating in territories under their control, and to facilitate their work, including by establishing a direct high-altitude flight route for the Mission between Asmara and Addis Ababa, which would relieve the unnecessary additional cost to the Mission;

5. Demands that the parties allow the Mission full freedom of movement and remove with immediate effect any and all restrictions on, and impediments to the work of, the Mission and its staff in the discharge of its mandate;

6. Affirms the ability of the Mission, within its existing verification mandate, to monitor fulfilment by the parties of their responsibilities with regard to the security of the Boundary Commission staff working in the field;

7. Notes the work done by the Mine Action Coordination Centre of the Mission in demining and education on risk related to mines, and urges the parties to pursue efforts on mine clearance;

8. Urges the two parties to engage expeditiously in further discussions with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General so that they reach agreement on the timing and modalities of territorial transfer, which could include the establishment by the parties of a mechanism for the resolution of problems in this regard;

9. Also urges the two parties to begin to sensitize their populations about the demarcation process and its implications, including the role of the United Nations in support of this process;

10. Calls upon the parties to refrain from unilateral troop or population movements, including the establishment of any new settlements in areas near the border, until demarcation and orderly transfer of territorial control has been accomplished, in accordance with article 4, paragraph 16, of the comprehensive Peace Agreement;

11. Reaffirms its decision to review frequently the progress made by the parties in the implementation of their commitments pursuant to the Algiers Agreements, including through the Boundary Commission, and to review any implications for the Mission, including with regard to the process of territorial transfers during the demarcation as outlined by the Secretary-General in his report of 10 July 2002;

12. Encourages the guarantors, facilitators and witnesses of the Algiers Agreements and the Friends of the United Nations Mission in Ethiopia and Eritrea to intensify further their contacts with the authorities of both countries with a view to contributing to an expeditious demarcation process;

13. Welcomes the contributions by Member States to the Trust Fund in Support of the Delimitation and Demarcation of the Ethiopia-Eritrea Border, and calls upon the international community to continue to contribute urgently to the Trust Fund in order to facilitate the conclusion of the demarcation process in accordance with the schedule of the Boundary Commission;

14. Calls again upon the parties to increase their efforts to take measures that will build confidence and contribute to the normalization of relations between them, including in particular their political relations and those in the areas listed in paragraph 14 of resolution 1398(2002) of 15 March 2002;

15. Expresses its concern at the prevailing drought and worsening humanitarian situation in Ethiopia and Eritrea and the implications this could have for the peace process, and calls upon Member States to continue to provide prompt and generous support for humanitarian operations in Ethiopia and Eritrea;

16. Invites the African Union to continue to lend its full support to the peace process;

17. Expresses its strong support for the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, Mr. Legwaila Joseph Legwaila, the Force Commander of the Mission, Major General Robert Gordon, the military and civilian personnel of the Mission and the Boundary Commission for their work in support of the peace process;

18. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Report of Secretary-General (June). On 23 June [S/2003/665], the Secretary-General issued a progress report on Ethiopia and Eritrea.

In general, the situation in the UNMEE area remained calm during the three-month reporting period and the parties cooperated with the Mission. Both countries maintained a defensive military posture on either side of the Temporary Security Zone, with no observed change in force levels. The number of border incursions by Ethiopian herdsmen entering the Zone to graze their livestock had increased, especially in Sector Centre, and UNMEE raised the matter with Ethiopia because it heightened the risk of conflict. The Mission was investigating three shooting incidents, two in Sector Centre and one in Sector West. Restrictions continued to be imposed on UNMEE freedom of movement in areas adjacent to the Zone. Eritrea had still not signed the status-of-forces agreement with the United Nations and, until it did, the model status-of-forces agreement would continue to be in effect.

The Military Coordination Commission held its sixteenth meeting (Djibouti, 19 March) and both parties agreed to do all in their power to prevent mine placement in the Temporary Security Zone and adjacent areas. They agreed to cooperate in the repatriation or burial of mortal remains in the Zone. At the Commission's seventeenth meeting (Nairobi, 16 June), the parties agreed to an UNMEE proposal on the collection and repatriation of an estimated 164 bodies.

Some progress was made in the demarcation process, but it had not proceeded as quickly as anticipated. Demining activities continued, but the Temporary Security Zone remained dangerous, and four civilians were killed in mine accidents during the reporting period.

The Secretary-General reiterated that the peace process was at a critical stage. Although the parties, in general, respected the integrity of the Temporary Security Zone, lasting peace could not be built on the basis of temporary arrangements. Lost momentum could prove difficult to regain and could impact on the longer-term goals of reconstruction and development. Specifically, progress was required in two areas—expeditious demarcation of the border and political dialogue between the parties to consolidate the peace process. The absence of political contacts since the negotiation of the Algiers Agreements had hindered the normalization of bilateral relations, a vital element of any peace process.

Claims Commission. The Eritrea-Ethiopia Claims Commission, established under the Algiers Agreements to decide on claims for loss, damage or injury by one Government against the other, and by nationals against the Government of the other party or government-owned entities, issued a report which was annexed to the Secretary-General's June report. An independent body based in The Hague, the Claims Commission received claims in 2001 and held hearings on liability, memorials and counter-memorials in those claims in 2002. Hearings on the parties' prisoner-of-war claims took place over 10 days in December 2002, and the Commission was preparing its awards. In the light of requests from both parties, the Commission, in February 2003, adjusted its schedule of future filings and hearings to take account of requirements resulting from other proceedings involving the parties and of the complexity of the remaining work. The Commission and the parties met informally several times to discuss the means for facilitating the claims process.

Boundary Commission (June). The Boundary Commission, in its ninth report, which was annexed to the Secretary-General's June report, said that Eritrea, on 15 April, had submitted its consolidated comments on the boundary in the area of Tserona and Zalambessa and on the specific provisions of Ethiopia's January comments. Ethiopia's comments were submitted on 2 May. The Commission's work continued with regard to: preparing and revising maps in response to the parties' January comments; marking boundary pillar sites on a sector-by-sector basis, beginning with the Eastern Sector; drafting specifications for pillar emplacement and transmitting them to prospective bidders; preparing field accommodation and facilities for contractors; and exploring the security needs of construction personnel.

In July [S/2003/665/Add.1], the Commission issued a schedule of its activities for the next 12 months.

Boundary Commission decision. The Boundary Commission issued a 7 July decision on the difference concerning the appointment by Eritrea and Ethiopia of field liaison officers for the boundary demarcation process (see p. 232). The Secretary-General transmitted the decision to the Security Council on 18 July [S/2003/752]. The Commission noted that difficulties arose in the initial appointment of the officers, attributable to a lack of specificity in appointment procedures, notably concerning the appointment of currently serving military officers. The Commission decided that field liaison officers would have to be appointed for the remaining demarcation activity under more detailed appointment procedures, and it amended the demarcation directions accordingly.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (July)

On 17 July [meeting 4787], following consultations among Security Council members, the President made statement S/PRST/2003/10 on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council, recalling all its resolutions and statements by its President regarding the situation between Ethiopia and Eritrea, as well as the conclusions of the Security Council mission to Eritrea and Ethiopia in 2002, welcomes the progress report of the Secretary-General of 23 June 2003.

The Council reaffirms the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity of Ethiopia and Eritrea, and its support for the Delimitation Decision of the Eritrea-Ethiopia Boundary Commission of 13 April 2002.

The Council welcomes the public commitment of both parties to a full and expeditious implementation of the comprehensive Peace Agreement signed in Algiers on 12 December 2000, and reaffirms its commitment to contribute to the completion of the peace process. The Council welcomes the parties' acceptance of the Delimitation Decision of 13 April 2002 as final and binding.

The Council welcomes the fact that the situation in the Temporary Security Zone has remained calm and that the parties have cooperated well with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and with the United Nations Mission in Ethiopia and Eritrea. The Council reiterates its serious concern about outstanding issues referred to in the report of the Secretary-General, in particular some restrictions on the freedom of movement of the Mission that remain and the continuing absence of a direct high-altitude flight route for aircraft of the Mission between Asmara and Addis Ababa, resulting in additional costs to the Mission.

The Council supports the observation made by the Secretary-General in his progress report that expedition demarcation of the border is crucial, and expresses concern at the delays so far, particularly given the operational cost of the Mission at a time of growing demands on United Nations peacekeeping. Delays would be contrary to the wish of both parties to achieve lasting peace and stability as manifested in the Algiers Agreement.

The Council urges the parties to provide their full and prompt cooperation to the Boundary Commission for the beginning of demarcation in Sector East and for the initiation of survey work in Sectors Centre and West. The Council calls upon the parties to pursue any matters that may arise in connection with the implementation of the Delimitation Decision of the Boundary Commission within the provisions of the Algiers Agreement.

The Council encourages the parties to continue their cooperation with the Military Coordination Commission in order to resolve military and security coordination issues arising from the activities of the Boundary Commission. The Council welcomes assurances given by both parties regarding the provision of security for the staff of the Boundary Commission and contractors operating in the Temporary Security Zone and adjacent areas during demarcation.

The Council regrets the absence of political contacts between the parties. It believes that political dialogue between the two countries is crucial for the success of the peace process and the consolidation of progress made thus far. The Council calls upon both parties to normalize their relationship through political dialogue, including confidence-building measures such as holding alternating meetings of the Military Coordination Commission in each other's capital.

The Council underlines the readiness of the United Nations to facilitate political dialogue if requested and to offer strong support in addressing the humanitarian and development challenges that would result from the demarcation of the border.

The Council encourages the Mission to continue its local outreach activities in order to provide valuable information about the peace process and mine-awareness programmes to the local population. The Council welcomes the intention of the Mission to continue quick-impact projects, which provide direct assistance to communities in the border regions, and welcomes the recommendation of the Secretary-General contained in paragraph 22 of his report. The Council, expressing appreciation to those Member States that have already provided contributions to the Trust Fund in Support of the Delimitation and Demarcation of the Ethiopia-Eritrea Border and to the Trust Fund to Support the Peace Process in Ethiopia and Eritrea, calls upon Member States in a position to do so to urgently provide further support to these Trust Funds.

The Council is concerned about the serious shortfall of resources received in response to the consolidated appeals to address the humanitarian consequences of the drought in Ethiopia and Eritrea and calls upon Member States and the international community to contribute generously to these appeals.

Report of Secretary-General (September). To his 4 September progress report on Ethiopia and Eritrea (S/2003/858), the Secretary-General annexed the Boundary Commission's tenth report (see below).

During the reporting period, the situation in the Temporary Security Zone and the adjacent areas remained generally calm, and the opposing forces reduced their training and related activities at forward locations on both sides of the Zone. UNMEE, in monitoring the positions of the armed forces of both sides and observing militia and police activities, found that cooperation remained good. However, the number of Ethiopian herdsmen and livestock entering the Zone on a daily basis in Sector Centre had again increased. On a number of occasions, Ethiopian militia fired shots from their territory to signal to the herdsmen the presence of Eritrean militia in the vicinity. In August, several more serious incidents occurred in Sector Centre. Ethiopian militia, on two occasions, pointed their weapons at UNMEE patrols in response to advice not to enter the Zone. At other times, a total of 102 personnel, most of them in Ethiopian army uniforms, entered the Zone and refused to leave when UNMEE protested. In Sector West, livestock rustling increased across the southern boundary of the Zone. With ICRC assistance, UNMEE recovered and repatriated to Ethiopia the mortal remains of 220 fallen soldiers discovered in former battlefields.

The two parties continued to impose restrictions on the Mission's freedom of movement in the Zone and adjacent areas, particularly in Sector Centre. There was no improvement with regard to the difficulties faced by UNMEE personnel entering and exiting the airports in Addis Ababa and Asmara and there were still no direct UN flights between the capitals.

The Military Coordination Commission held its seventeenth and eighteenth meetings (Nairobi, 16 June and 30 July) to discuss demining in support of demarcation; the recovery and repatriation of mortal remains in Sector East; demobilization and restructuring of the armed forces of the two countries; the schedule of the Boundary Commission's activities; security of Commission contractors; and other demarcation issues. Efforts to have the parties hold meetings alternately in the two capitals were not successful.

The Boundary Commission held an internal meeting (New York, 10-11 August) to discuss technical issues relating to the demarcation of the border. The Special Representative attended part of the meeting in order to brief the Commission on UNMEE efforts to support demarcation. He also discussed means of monitoring the parties' provision of security for the Commission's field staff and contractors, in accordance with Security Council resolutions. Meanwhile, the Commission had prepared marked maps of Sector East, showing the line and proposed sites for the boundary pillars. The maps were sent to the parties for comments on 21 August. As the work progressed, UNMEE intensified its demining activities in the border areas, including access routes to possible boundary pillar sites.

The Eritrea-Ethiopia Claims Commission issued its first awards on 1 July. They concerned the treatment of prisoners of war by the two countries during the 1998-2000 conflict. The Commission made 12 findings of liability for violation of international law against Eritrea and eight findings against Ethiopia. The most serious issues of liability against Ethiopia were the failure to provide a proper diet and the delay in repatriation. Those against Eritrea were the refusal to allow ICRC to visit prisoner-of-war camps, failing to protect Ethiopian prisoners of war from being killed at capture and permitting pervasive and continuous physical and mental abuse.

Demining activities continued, but the danger of landmines and unexploded ordnance remained. From early June to mid-August, 14 mine-related incidents occurred in Sectors West and Centre, killing two civilians and injuring 17. Investigations revealed that some of the mines in Sector West were newly planted by unknown perpetrators. From 1 June to 10 August, UNMEE destroyed 62 mines and 821 pieces of unexploded ordnance, and cleared 2.4 million square metres of land and 282.5 kilometres of road. Route verification and road clearance for Sector West were completed in mid-July.

The drought in Ethiopia and Eritrea remained a major concern (see also p. 927 and 961), with more than 13.2 million people in Ethiopia and 2 million in Eritrea in need of relief. In view of the seriousness of the situation, the Secretary-General appointed Martti Ahtisaari in June as his Special Envoy for the Humanitarian Crisis in the Horn of Africa. UNMEE and its implementing partners completed 77 quick-impact projects in the areas of water supply, education and health and sanitation, and 31 additional projects were approved. UNMEE requested Ethiopia to permit access to refugee camps near the Temporary Security Zone, but was turned down. Under ICRC auspices, 213 Ethiopian and six Eritrean civilians were repatriated.

The Secretary-General urged Eritrea and Ethiopia to do their utmost to prevent cross-border incidents before they escalated, and, above all, to proceed with the expeditious demarcation of the border. According to the Boundary Commission's schedule of activities, the first step was the appointment of field liaison officers for the remaining demarcation activities. Eritrea had made those appointments, but until Ethiopia made its appointments and provided the necessary security assurances, it would not be possible for the Commission to begin the field surveys. The Secretary-General again warned that the peace process should not be allowed to lose momentum. The delays in the demarcation process were a source of concern, particularly given the operational cost of UNMEE at a time of growing demands on UN peacekeeping. UNMEE was never meant to be a permanent arrangement. The time might be approaching when the parties would have to be more actively assisted in fulfilling both the letter and the spirit of the Algiers Agreements and concluding the process without further delay. In the meantime, UNMEE had to carry out its mandate, which the Secretary-General recommended should be extended for an additional six months, until 15 March 2004.

Boundary Commission (August). In its tenth report covering 10 June to 29 August, the Boundary Commission stated that the UN Committee on Contracts had approved the selection of contractors for boundary pillar emplacement and the survey of boundary pillars. Once the contracts had been signed, deployment of staff and equipment to the Eastern Sector could begin, with pillar emplacement scheduled to commence shortly thereafter. Preparations for pillar emplacement were continuing in the remaining two sectors. Eritrea had notified the Commission of the appointment of its field liaison officers and had approved the establishment of contractors' accommodation and meal facilities at Barentu. Preparations were continuing for establishing similar facilities in Adigrat and Assab. The Commission had requested the parties to develop procedures for ensuring the security of all demarcation personnel, including arrangements for communication and for facilitating UNMEE's role. Expeditious demarcation of the boundary depended on the cooperation of the two parties, including the granting of prompt approval for flights and site inspections.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (September)

On 12 September [meeting 4822], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1507 (2003). The draft [S/2003/872] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its previous resolutions and the statements by its President pertaining to the situation between Ethiopia and Eritrea, and the requirements contained therein, including in particular resolution

1466(2003) of 14 March 2003 and the statement by its President of 17 July 2003,

Reaffirming its unwavering support for the peace process and its commitment, including through the role played by the United Nations Mission in Ethiopia and Eritrea in the implementation of its mandate, to the full and expeditious implementation of the comprehensive Peace Agreement signed at Algiers by the Governments of Ethiopia and Eritrea (hereinafter referred to as "the parties") on 12 December 2000 and the preceding Agreement on Cessation of Hostilities signed on 18 June 2000 ("the Algiers Agreements"), and the delimitation decision of the Boundary Commission of 13 April 2002, embraced by the parties as final and binding in accordance with the Algiers Agreements,

Noting that the peace process has now entered its crucial phase of demarcation, and emphasizing the importance of ensuring expeditious implementation of the decision of the Boundary Commission while maintaining stability in all areas affected by the decision,

Expressing concern at delays in the demarcation process, particularly given the operational cost of the Mission at a time of growing demands on United Nations peacekeeping,

Expressing concern also at the continuing humanitarian crisis in Ethiopia and Eritrea and the implications that this could have on the peace process, and calling upon Member States to continue to provide prompt and generous support for humanitarian operations in Ethiopia and Eritrea,

Reiterating its urgent demand that the parties allow the Mission full freedom of movement and remove with immediate effect any and all restrictions on, and impediments to the work of, the Mission and its staff in the discharge of their mandate,

Expressing concern regarding the reported increase in incidents of incursions at the local level into the Temporary Security Zone and calling upon both parties to prevent such incidents, and expressing further concern about the increasing number of mine incidents in the Temporary Security Zone, including newly planted mines,

Noting the work done by the Mine Action Coordination Centre of the Mission in demining and education on risk related to mines, and urging the parties to pursue efforts on mine clearance,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 4 September 2003, and fully supporting the observations and recommendations made therein,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission in Ethiopia and Eritrea until 15 March 2004 at the troop and military observer levels authorized by its resolution 1320(2000) of 15 September 2000;

2. Calls for the demarcation of the boundary to begin as scheduled by the Boundary Commission, and further calls upon the parties to create the necessary conditions for demarcation to proceed, including the appointment of field liaison officers;

3. Urges the Governments of Ethiopia and Eritrea to assume their responsibilities and to take further concrete steps to fulfil their commitments under the Algiers Agreements;

4. Calls upon Ethiopia and Eritrea to cooperate fully and promptly with the Boundary Commission to enable it to fulfil the mandate conferred upon it by the parties of expeditiously demarcating the boundary and to implement fully the Demarcation Directions and Orders of the Commission, and to take all necessary steps to provide the necessary security on the ground for the staff and contractors of the Commission operating in territories under their control, and welcomes assurances given by both parties in this regard;

5. Urges the parties to cooperate fully and expeditiously with the Mission in the implementation of its mandate, to ensure the personal security of all Mission staff operating in territories under their control and to facilitate their work, including by establishing a direct high-altitude flight route between Asmara and Addis Ababa to relieve the unnecessary additional cost to the Mission and by lifting all visa restrictions on Mission personnel and mission partners;

6. Reaffirms the crucial importance of political dialogue between the two countries for the success of the peace process and the consolidation of progress made so far, welcomes initiatives to facilitate this dialogue, and calls again upon both parties to normalize their relations through political dialogue, including confidence-building measures;

7. Decides to follow closely the progress made by the parties in the implementation of their commitments under the Algiers Agreements, including through the Boundary Commission, and to review any implications for the Mission;

8. Welcomes the contributions by Member States to the Trust Fund in Support of the Delimitation and Demarcation of the Ethiopia-Eritrea Border, and calls upon the international community to continue to contribute urgently to the Trust Fund in order to facilitate the conclusion of the demarcation process in accordance with the schedule of the Boundary Commission;

9. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Communication. The EU Presidency, in a 23 September statement [S/2003/925], expressed concern at delays in the demarcation process and called on the parties to abide by the peace agreements, the Boundary Commission's rulings and Security Council resolution 1507(2003) (above) so as to ensure that the border demarcation began as scheduled. The EU called on both Governments to normalize their relationship through political dialogue in order to ensure the success of the peace process.

Report of Secretary-General (December). On 19 December [S/2003/1186], the Secretary-General issued a progress report on Ethiopia and Eritrea, to which was annexed the eleventh report of the Boundary Commission (see p. 239).

During the reporting period, serious difficulties in the peace process had resulted from delays in implementing the Boundary Commission's decision and inflammatory rhetoric of the parties in that regard. However, the overall situation in the Temporary Security Zone and adjacent areas remained relatively stable. UNMEE reported that cooperation with the parties on the ground remained relatively good, although Eritrea continued to hinder the Mission's freedom of movement. There was an increase in military training exercises in September and October on both sides, in particular in Ethiopia, but those manoeuvres subsided towards the end of the reporting period. The incursions by Ethiopian herdsmen and their livestock into the Zone decreased marginally and incidents of armed Ethiopian militia accompanying them had all but ceased. On 1 November, a shooting incident took place near Fawlina in the Zone's Sector West. Reportedly, a small group of uniformed men fired on two Eritrean militiamen, killing one of them. Another incident occurred on 10 December, when Eritrean militiamen exchanged fire with four Ethiopian soldiers.

Towards the end of the reporting period, UNMEE faced greater restrictions on its movement, particularly on the Eritrean side, and it appeared that Eritrea was hardening its unfounded position that the UNMEE mandate was limited solely to monitoring the Zone and that it had no mandate to monitor the redeployed positions of the armed forces of both parties outside the Zone. UNMEE staff entering and exiting Ethiopia and Eritrea continued to experience difficulties at the airports in Addis Ababa and Asmara, including through the imposition of visa regimes. No direct flights were allowed between the capitals.

The Military Coordination Commission held meetings in Nairobi on 17 September, 5 November and 15 December. While acknowledging difficulties in the peace process at the political level, the two sides stressed their commitment to the Commission process and their intention to ensure military stability on the ground. As at 10 December, the total strength of the UNMEE military component was 4,098. Eritrea had still not signed the status-of-forces agreement, despite repeated requests to do so.

Landmines remained a threat to everyone in the Temporary Security Zone and three children were killed in incidents during the reporting period. UNMEE made further progress in mine-clearing, having destroyed 67 mines and 152 pieces of unexploded ordnance and cleared 830,000 square metres of land and 525 kilometres of road. In addition, UNMEE provided training to 3,610 Eritrean civilians in the Temporary Security Zone.

The drought and consequences of the border war, coupled with the poverty in Eritrea and Ethiopia, remained of major concern to the United Nations and its humanitarian partners. Related issues of concern included malnutrition, displaced persons unable to return to their homes, the repatriation and reintegration of Eritrean refugees from the Sudan, and widespread disease. The General Assembly, in resolution 58/24 of 5 December (see p. 961), took action on emergency humanitarian assistance to Ethiopia. A total of 82 quick-impact projects had been completed in the Zone and adjacent areas, most of which focused on water, education and health.

In the area of human rights, UNMEE continued to monitor cross-border abductions, detentions and disappearances, most of which were resolved quickly. It monitored camps populated by internally displaced persons, deportees and returnees, and sought to improve conditions for the safe return of Eritrean civilians to five border villages. The number of Eritrean refugees and asylum-seekers at the camp near Shiraro, Ethiopia, continued to grow. In October, the arrival of 300 new refugees brought the total to 6,200, including nearly 4,000 ethnic Kunama who left Eritrea after the war when the Ethiopian forces withdrew from Sector West. UNMEE had not been allowed to visit that camp although the population fell within the Mission's human rights mandate.

In general, the situation between Ethiopia and Eritrea remained difficult, even precarious, at the end of the year. While there were no evident signs of preparations for hostilities by either side, recent inflammatory statements, in particular in Eritrea, had done nothing to advance the peace process. A fundamental requirement for the successful completion of the peace process and normalization of relations between the two sides lay in the expeditious demarcation of their common border. While welcoming Eritrea's continued cooperation with the Boundary Commission, the Secretary-General regretted Ethiopia's failure to extend the necessary cooperation, and he emphasized the importance and mutual benefits that would be derived from normalizing relations. He encouraged any positive initiative undertaken towards political dialogue between the two countries, including that of the AU Chairman.

Boundary Commission (November). In its eleventh report, which was annexed to the Secretary-General's December report (above), the Boundary Commission stated that Eritrea had appointed its field liaison officers, submitted a proposal for security arrangements for the boundary demarcation work and paid its contributions to the Commission's expenses. Although Ethiopia had yet to respond on those matters, it had indicated that it would appoint field liaison officers and give security assurances in relation only to the Eastern Sector and Mareb River section of the boundary. The contractors selected to emplace pillars along the whole boundary would not conclude a contract unless given security assurances. A work programme had been prepared for the field assessment of pillar sites and the parties' liaison representatives had been contacted to discuss the programme, security in the field and the demarcation in the Eastern Sector. On 19 September, the Prime Minister of Ethiopia wrote to the Secretary-General, describing the Commission's decisions on Badme and parts of Sector Centre as illegal, unjust and irresponsible, thus making it clear that Ethiopia's complaint was with the delimitation decision rather than with the demarcation process. At a meeting between the Commission and the parties (The Hague, 19 November), Ethiopia expressed willingness to agree to pillar emplacement in the Eastern Sector, while refusing to permit work in the other two sectors. Eritrea maintained its position that the demarcation of the boundary could not be divided as Ethiopia sought since there was no assurance that Ethiopia would not raise insuperable problems in relation to the demarcation of the remaining sectors of the boundary. The Commission concluded that Ethiopia was presenting its dissatisfaction with the boundary as laid down in the delimitation decision in the form of procedural impediments to the demarcation process, which it was not entitled to interpose. Until the positions of either or both parties were modified, there was nothing more that the Commission could do. For the time being, it would maintain its presence in the area but would reduce its activity to the minimum compatible with its being able to resume it, if and when the parties made it possible.

UNMEE financing

On 5 February [A/57/672], the Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly the financial performance report on UNMEE for 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002. The Assembly had apportioned $198,400,000 for the operation of the Mission for that period, of which $185,007,700 was spent, resulting in an unencumbered balance of $13,392,300, a variance of 6.8 per cent.

Having reviewed that report, as well as the Secretary-General's proposed budget for UNMEE for 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004 [YUN 2002, p. 195], ACABQ issued an 8 April report [A/57/772/Add.8 & Corr.1] containing its comments. It recommended that the unencumbered balance and interest and other income in the amount of $10,547,000 be credited to Member States in a manner to be determined by the Assembly. In view of the persistent underexpenditures experienced by UNMEE, ACABQ recommended that the estimated budget requirement of $198,400,000 be reduced by $10,000,000, or approximately 5 per cent. Accordingly, it recommended that the Assembly appropriate $188,400,000 gross for the period 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 June [meeting 90], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/57/828], adopted resolution 57/328 without vote [agenda item 130].

Financing of the United Nations Mission in Ethiopia and Eritrea

The General Assembly,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Mission in Ethiopia and Eritrea and the related reports of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Bearing in mind Security Council resolution 1312(2000) of 31 July 2000, by which the Council established the United Nations Mission in Ethiopia and Eritrea, and the subsequent resolutions by which the Council extended the mandate of the Mission, the latest of which was resolution 1466(2003) of 14 March 2003,

Recalling its resolution 55/237 of 23 December 2000 on the financing of the Mission and its subsequent resolutions thereon, the latest of which was resolution 56/250 B of 27 June 2002,

Reaffirming the general principles underlying the financing of United Nations peacekeeping operations, as stated in General Assembly resolutions 1874(S-IV) of 27 June 1963, 3101(XXVIII) of 11 December 1973 and 55/235 of 23 December 2000,

Noting with appreciation that voluntary contributions have been made to the Mission,

Mindful of the fact that it is essential to provide the Mission with the necessary financial resources to enable it to fulfil its responsibilities under the relevant resolutions of the Security Council,

1. Takes note of the status of contributions to the United Nations Mission in Ethiopia and Eritrea as at 31 March 2003, including the contributions outstanding in the amount of 30.3 million United States dollars, representing some 6 per cent of the total assessed contributions, notes with concern that only thirty-two Member States have paid their assessed contributions in full, and urges all other Member States, in particular those in arrears, to ensure payment of their outstanding assessed contributions;

2. Expresses its appreciation to those Member States which have paid their assessed contributions in full, and urges all other Member States to make every possible effort to ensure payment of their assessed contributions to the Mission in full;

3. Expresses concern at the financial situation with regard to peacekeeping activities, in particular as regards the reimbursements to troop contributors that bear additional burdens owing to overdue payments by Member States of their assessments;

4. Also expresses concern at the delay experienced by the Secretary-General in deploying and providing adequate resources to some recent peacekeeping missions, in particular those in Africa;

5. Emphasizes that all future and existing peacekeeping missions shall be given equal and non-discriminatory treatment in respect of financial and administrative arrangements;

6. Also emphasizes that all peacekeeping missions shall be provided with adequate resources for the effective and efficient discharge of their respective mandates;

7. Reiterates its request to the Secretary-General to make the fullest possible use of facilities and equipment at the United Nations Logistics Base at Brindisi, Italy, in order to minimize the costs of procurement for the Mission;

8. Endorses the conclusions and recommendations contained in the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, and requests the Secretary-General to ensure their full implementation;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to take all necessary action to ensure that the Mission is administered with a maximum of efficiency and economy;

10. Also requests the Secretary-General, in order to reduce the cost of employing General Service staff, to continue efforts to recruit local staff for the Mission against General Service posts, commensurate with the requirements of the Mission;

Financial performance report for the period from 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002

11. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the financial performance of the Mission for the period from 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002;

Budget estimates for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004

12. Decides to appropriate to the Special Account for the United Nations Mission in Ethiopia and Eritrea the amount of 196,890,300 dollars for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004, inclusive of 188.4 million dollars for the maintenance of the Mission, 6,501,300 dollars for the support account for peacekeeping operations and 1,989,000 dollars for the United Nations Logistics Base;

Financing of the appropriation

13. Decides also to apportion among Member States the amount of 196,890,300 dollars at a monthly rate of 16,407,525 dollars, in accordance with the levels set out in resolution 55/235, as adjusted by the General Assembly in its resolutions 55/236 of 23 December 2000 and 57/290 A of 20 December 2002, and taking into account the scale of assessments for 2003, as set out in its resolutions 55/5 B of 23 December 2000 and 57/4 B of 20 December 2002, and for 2004, subject to the decision of the Security Council to extend the mandate of the Mission;

14. Decides further that, in accordance with the provisions of its resolution 973(X) of 15 December 1955, there shall be set off against the apportionment among Member States, as provided for in paragraph 13 above, their respective share in the Tax Equalization Fund of 5,482,300 dollars at a monthly rate of 456,858 dollars, comprising the estimated staff assessment income of

3.9 million dollars approved for the Mission, the prorated share of 1,464,700 dollars of the estimated staff assessment income approved for the support account and the prorated share of 117,600 dollars of the estimated staff assessment income approved for the United Nations Logistics Base;

15. Decides that for Member States that have fulfilled their financial obligations to the Mission, there shall be set off against their apportionment, as provided for in paragraph 13 above, their respective share of the unencumbered balance and other income in the total amount of 23,939,300 dollars in respect of the financial period ended 30 June 2002, in accordance with the levels set out in resolution 55/235, as adjusted by the General Assembly in its resolutions 55/236 and 57/290 A, and taking into account the scale of assessments for 2002, as set out in its resolutions 55/5 B and 57/4 B;

16. Decides also that for Member States that have not fulfilled their financial obligations to the Mission, there shall be set off against their outstanding obligations their respective share of the unencumbered balance and other income in the total amount of 23,939,300 dollars in respect of the financial period ended 30 June 2002, in accordance with the scheme set out in paragraph 15 above;

17. Decides further that the decrease of 402,200 dollars in the estimated staff assessment income in respect of the financial period ended 30 June 2002 shall be set off against the credits from the amount referred to in paragraphs 15 and 16 above;

18. Emphasizes that no peacekeeping operation shall be financed by borrowing funds from other active peacekeeping operations;

19. Encourages the Secretary-General to continue to take additional measures to ensure the safety and security of all personnel under the auspices of the United Nations participating in peacekeeping operations;

20. Invites voluntary contributions to the Mission in cash and in the form of services and supplies acceptable to the Secretary-General, to be administered, as appropriate, in accordance with the procedure and practices established by the General Assembly;

21. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-eighth session the item entitled "Financing of the United Nations Mission in Ethiopia and Eritrea".

On 19 December [A/57/658], the Secretary-General submitted to the Assembly the budget for UNMEE for 1 July 2004 to 30 June 2005, which amounted to $201,460,800 gross. The budget provided for the deployment of 3,980 troops, 220 military observers, 256 international staff, 273 national staff and 82 United Nations Volunteers.

Somalia

During 2003, Somali leaders and their representatives, with the notable exception of those from Somaliland, continued to participate in the deliberations of the Eldoret (Kenya) Conference Process, which, in October 2002, under the auspices of IGAD, had led to the signing of the Declaration on Cessation of Hostilities and the Structures and Principles of the Somalia National Reconciliation Process (the Eldoret Declaration) [YUN 2002, p. 202]. Despite the Eldoret Declaration and the signing in December 2002 by five Mogadishu faction leaders and the Transitional National Government (TNG), set up by the Arta (Djibouti) Conference in 2000 [YUN 2000, p. 215], of agreements on ensuring security in Mogadishu and on reopening the airport and seaport there, fighting continued and those facilities remained blocked in 2003. While parts of Somalia remained unstable, relative stability prevailed in significant portions of the country. The six reconciliation committees of the Somali national reconciliation process continued their work despite disagreements over the representation of those bodies. Some progress was made in mid-2003 with the approval of the reports of five of the committees. Disagreements on federalism and a provisional charter remained the major stumbling block. On 5 July, the Somali Leaders Committee at the Conference reached an accord on a federal system of government, which was adopted by the plenary. However, the TNG President said his Government rejected the agreement, and other Somali leaders also denounced it. The situation was complicated by the 26 August expiration of TNG, as stipulated by the Arta Conference.

The United Nations Political Office for Somalia (UNPOS), led by the Secretary-General's Representative, Winston A. Tubman (Liberia), remained involved in the peace process and humanitarian efforts, and continued to operate from Nairobi.

Conflict and violence within Somalia continued to cause suffering and to hinder humanitarian activities throughout the year; UN activities were curtailed due to the insecurity prevailing in many parts of the country. In December, the General Assembly, in resolution 58/115 (see p. 928), called on the international community to assist in providing humanitarian relief and in the economic and social rehabilitation of Somalia.

Twice during the year, the Panel of Experts established by the Security Council to investigate violations of the arms embargo against Somalia reported on its findings. It determined that Somalia was subject to ongoing violations of the arms embargo, mainly by a continuous inflow of small quantities of weapons and ammunition from regional countries, which fed the local open arms markets and faction leaders' warehouses. The arms flow had consequences for the security and stability of the region. The Council decided to establish a monitoring group to investigate violations of the arms embargo and to make recommendations on strengthening the ban.

National reconciliation process and security situation

Report of Secretary-General (February). The Secretary-General, in a 26 February report on the situation in Somalia [S/2003/231], submitted in response to the request contained in the Security Council President's statement S/PRST/2001/30 [YUN 2001, p. 210], described developments since his previous report in October 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 201]. He focused on the Somali national reconciliation process at Eldoret, held under IGAD auspices and chaired by Kenya.

During the reporting period, many Somali leaders and their representatives participated in the Eldoret Conference discussions, with the main exception of Somaliland, which refused to join the peace process. Inter- and intra-clan fighting continued to break out in a number of places, particularly in south Mogadishu, Baidoa, Luuq, Kismayo and Qardho district. In Somaliland, security conditions remained generally calm, and local and municipal elections took place in December 2002 without incident. "Presidential" and "parliamentary" elections were scheduled for 15 April and late May 2003, respectively.

The security situation in several areas, particularly in the south, the Mogadishu area and Baidoa, posed serious difficulties for the delivery of humanitarian aid, as did the continued closure of the seaport and airport in Mogadishu. The level of banditry and extortion remained high and the kidnapping of Somalis working for the United Nations and other international aid organizations remained a serious concern. Following attacks on aid workers in October and December 2002, a security assessment was carried out and all UN operations in the area were suspended until 14 January 2003. The provision of humanitarian assistance to a significant proportion of the population, already facing destitution, malnutrition and lack of basic social services, was repeatedly disrupted. Baidoa and Mogadishu remained closed to UN international staff because of fighting. Internally displaced persons continued to live in congested and unsanitary conditions in camps. The United Nations Humanitarian Coordinator launched a two-pronged strategy for addressing the issue of humanitarian access, first, by directly engaging with clan and faction leaders in Eldoret; and, secondly, by approaching representatives of the leaders and civil society, business and religious leaders in the field. Once access was more assured, a coordinated response to the needs of vulnerable communities would be established.

The second phase of the Somali national reconciliation process experienced difficulties due to controversy regarding the number of participants both in the plenary meeting of the Conference and in the six reconciliation committees that would report on specific aspects of the process. The Kenyan Special Envoy and Chairman of the IGAD Technical Committee, Elijah Mwangale, decided on a formula that gave an equal number of seats (84 each) to the four main clans of Somalia and half that number to the minority clans as a group. Membership in the six committees remained unresolved, as did the issue of civil society representation. Bethuel Kiplagat was named Kenya's new Special Envoy on 18 January.

The Foreign Ministers of the front-line States (Djibouti, Ethiopia, Kenya) held consultations on the reconciliation process in Addis Ababa on 2 February. Expressing concern about the violations of the Eldoret Declaration, they established a committee to monitor implementation and take appropriate action. They agreed to establish a mechanism to monitor ceasefire violations, which would consist of representatives of the IGAD Technical Committee and international partners. They welcomed the planned relocation of the Conference venue from Eldoret to Mbagathi, on the outskirts of Nairobi, as a cost-saving measure, and agreed to meet once a month to discuss the process; the first meeting was scheduled for 1 March. On 26 January, the Leaders Committee of the Eldoret Conference called for the representation of Somaliland at the national reconciliation process, a call that was promptly rejected by Somaliland.

The Secretary-General's Representative and staff of UNPOS, located in Nairobi, maintained a permanent presence at the Conference and provided assistance to the IGAD Technical Committee, the Somali parties and civil society groups. The Representative also participated in the meeting of the IGAD Foreign Ministers of the front-line States (Addis Ababa, 2 February). Many UN-affiliated bodies and agencies provided assistance in support of peace and reconciliation in Somalia, including the World Bank, UNDP, the United Nations Development Fund for Women, UNHCR, UNICEF, UNESCO, UNFPA, FAO and WHO.

Efforts by the international community to support the Somali national reconciliation process, launched under IGAD auspices and led by Kenya, included the AU's appointment of a Special Envoy for Somalia and a generous financial contribution from the EU.

The Secretary-General observed that the continued outbreaks of hostilities were motivated by individual rivalries of faction leaders and criminal activities rather than wider issues. It was those with weapons of war who continued to hold the people of Somalia hostage to the cycle of violence. He encouraged the Somali leaders participating in the Conference to cooperate in the IGAD-led endeavour aimed at ending over a decade of conflict in Somalia and the suffering it had caused the Somali people. The work of the six reconciliation committees had continued despite controversy regarding representation at the plenary meetings of the Conference. However, serious hostilities involving the militias and supporters of some of the very leaders who had signed the Eldoret Declaration and the December 2002 agreements had hindered the delivery of essential humanitarian and development assistance. The Mogadishu seaport and airport remained closed and fighting in and around Baidoa had blocked off an essential port of entry for delivering assistance.

While some parts of Somalia remained unstable, relative stability continued to prevail in significant portions of the country. In some of those areas, community-based peace-building activities had evolved with little outside support. Those initiatives presented windows of opportunity for the United Nations, NGOs and donors to help to maintain and build upon the peace and stability that had been achieved. Failure to do so could result in renewed conflict over scarce resources as an impoverished people struggled to survive and rebuild their lives. The Secretary-General welcomed contributions to the Trust Fund for Peace-building in Somalia and the early contributions to the 2003 Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for Somalia (see p. 928).

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (March)

On 12 March [meeting 4718], following consultations among Security Council members, the President made statement S/PRST/2003/2 on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council, recalling its decisions concerning the situation in Somalia, in particular the statements by its President of 28 March (S/PRST/2002/8) and 12 December 2002 (S/PRST/2002/35), and welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 26 February 2003, reaffirms its commitment to a comprehensive and lasting settlement of the situation in Somalia, and its respect for the sovereignty, territorial integrity, political independence and unity of the country, consistent with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations.

The Council reiterates its firm support for the Somalia National Reconciliation Process and the ongoing Somalia National Reconciliation Conference in Kenya, launched under the auspices of the Intergovernmental Authority on Development and led by the Government of Kenya. The Council strongly encourages all parties throughout Somalia to participate in the process, which offers a unique opportunity for all Somalis to end the suffering of their people and to restore peace and stability to their country. The Council demands that the Somali parties abide by and implement expeditiously the decisions adopted throughout the process, including the Declaration on Cessation of Hostilities and the Structures and Principles of the Somalia National Reconciliation Process of 27 October 2002 (hereinafter referred to as "the Eldoret Declaration"), as well as the December 2002 agreement reached by five Mogadishu faction leaders and the Transitional National Government regarding the restoration of peace and security in Mogadishu and a subsequent agreement among the five faction leaders which included a commitment to make efforts to reopen the international airport and seaport in Mogadishu, as mentioned in paragraph 26 of the report of the Secretary-General.

The Council commends the Government of Kenya for its crucial role in facilitating the Somalia National Reconciliation Process, and calls upon the Technical Committee of the Intergovernmental Authority comprising the three front-line States (Djibouti, Ethiopia and Kenya) to continue their active role in promoting the Process. The Council welcomes the appointment of Ambassador Bethuel Kiplagat as the Special Envoy of Kenya to the Process. The Council also welcomes the appointment of Mr. Muhammad Ali Fom as the Special Envoy of the African Union for Somalia, the generous financial contribution of the European Union, Norway and the United States of America, and the sustained engagement of their envoys, as well as those of the Partners Forum of the Intergovernmental Authority and the League of Arab States. The Council strongly encourages their continued active and positive role in support of the reconciliation process.

The Council notes that the six reconciliation committees of the Somalia National Reconciliation Process have continued their work despite difficulties faced by the Somali participants regarding representation. The Council urges all parties involved to participate fully in the six reconciliation committees and to resolve the representation issue, and welcomes the establishment of an arbitration committee in this regard. The Council supports the commitment of the Secretary-General to assist in the work of the six reconciliation committees with technical support and relevant expertise.

The Council expresses its strong regret that, even after the signing of the Eldoret Declaration, fighting continued to break out in Somalia, in particular in Mogadishu and Baidoa. The Council condemns all those involved in the fighting and calls for an immediate end to all acts of violence in Somalia. The Council shares the conclusion of the Secretary-General that it is those that have weapons of war who continue to hold the people of Somalia hostage to the cycle of violence. The Council also shares the view of the Secretary-General that these people will be held accountable by the Somali people and the international community for their actions if they persist on the path of confrontation and conflict. In this regard, the Council welcomes the establishment of a mechanism by the front-line States of the Intergovernmental Authority to monitor compliance with the Eldoret Declaration and their intention to consider appropriate measures against all individuals and groups violating the Eldoret Declaration and the December 2002 agreements.

The Council notes with serious concern the continued flow of weapons and ammunition supplies to Somalia, as well as allegations of the role of some of the neighbouring States in breach of the arms embargo established pursuant to resolution 733(1992) of 23 January 1992, and calls upon all States and other actors to comply scrupulously with the arms embargo. The Council welcomes the work of the Panel of Experts established pursuant to resolution 1425(2002) of 22 July 2002, and expresses its intention to give full consideration to and take appropriate action regarding the report of the Panel as a step towards reinforcing the arms embargo and disarmament.

The Council, insisting that persons and entities must not be allowed to take advantage of the situation in Somalia to finance, plan, facilitate, support or commit terrorist acts from the country, emphasizes that efforts to combat terrorism in Somalia are inseparable from the establishment of peace and governance in the country. In this spirit, the Council urges the international community to provide assistance to Somalia for the further and comprehensive implementation of resolution 1373(2001) of 28 September 2001.

The Council expresses serious concern regarding the humanitarian situation in Somalia, in particular that of internally displaced persons, especially in the area of Mogadishu. The Council urges the Somali leaders to live up to their commitments under the Eldoret Declaration, to facilitate the delivery of much-needed humanitarian assistance, to ensure the safety of all international and national aid workers, to provide immediate safe access for all humanitarian personnel, and to support the return and reintegration of refugees. The Council calls upon Member States to respond urgently and generously to the United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for 2003.

The Council notes that, while some parts of Somalia remain unstable, relative stability continues to prevail in significant portions of the country. The Council welcomes the evolution of the community-based peace-building activities and calls for the acceleration of comprehensive peace-building activities. The Council requests the Secretary-General to continue putting in place, in a coherent manner, preparatory activities on the ground for a comprehensive post-conflict peace-building mission in Somalia once security conditions permit, as stipulated in the statement by the President of the Security Council of 28 March 2002, which should take into account combating poverty and strengthening public institutions.

The Council stresses that a comprehensive post-conflict peace-building programme with special emphasis on disarmament, demobilization, rehabilitation and reintegration will be an important contribution towards the restoration of peace and stability in Somalia. The Council welcomes the contribution of Ireland, Italy and Norway to the Trust Fund for Peace-building in Somalia and calls upon other donors to do the same without delay.

The Council commends the work done by the United Nations Country Team, the Red Cross and Red Crescent Movements and non-governmental organizations in support of peace and reconciliation in Somalia. The Council encourages the Secretary-General to continue to support actively the Intergovernmental Authority-sponsored Somalia National Reconciliation Process and to continue to implement and enhance ongoing humanitarian and peace-building activities on the ground.

The Council reiterates its commitment to assist the Somali parties and support the mediation by the Intergovernmental Authority in the implementation of the steps and conclusions for peace, as adopted throughout the Somalia National Reconciliation Process.

Report of Secretary-General (June). On 10 June [S/2003/636], the Secretary-General reported on the situation in Somalia over the preceding four months, focusing on the national reconciliation process at Mbagathi, Kenya, and covering political and security developments, humanitarian conditions and UN development activities.

Kenya's new Special Envoy, Mr. Kiplagat, undertook several initiatives to restructure the reconciliation process: he set up a Somali arbitration committee, with representatives from each major clan, to handle the persistent problems relating to representation at the Conference; and, in order to harmonize the reports of the six reconciliation committees, he set up a technical harmonization committee composed of Somali experts. Those committees were working on draft texts on federalism and a provisional charter; disarmament, demobilization and reintegration; land and property rights; economic recovery, institution-building and resource mobilization; conflict resolution and reconciliation; and regional and international relations. Some members of the Somali Leaders Committee objected to the establishment of the technical harmonization committee, preferring instead to handle the harmonization effort at the political level.

The Kenyan Foreign Minister, on 14 May, launched the plenary of the second phase of the Reconciliation Conference, which was to consider the committees' reports. TNG, represented by its Prime Minister and the Speaker of the Transitional National Assembly, and many other leaders continued to participate in the Conference. Others, based in Mogadishu and Kismayo, were absent for almost two months but returned to Mbagathi for the start of the second phase. On 11 March, a TNG representative accused Ethiopia of amassing troops on its border with Somalia and of crossing the border at several locations. He demanded that Ethiopia be excluded from the IGAD Technical Committee (comprising the front-line States and the IGAD secretariat) that was overseeing the reconciliation process. Ethiopia denied the allegations.

Following the decision of the Foreign Ministers of the front-line States to establish a committee to monitor implementation of the Eldoret Declaration, comprising IGAD, the AU, the United Nations, the European Commission, the League of Arab States and some IGAD Partners Forum member States, the Ceasefire Monitoring Committee, on 4 March, addressed the escalation of hostilities in Somalia, in particular the fighting in the Medina district of Mogadishu and the fighting at Buale in the Juba Valley.

The Secretary-General's Representative and UNPOS continued to actively monitor and support the reconciliation process, while the country team and its partners contributed to peace-building and reconciliation efforts inside Somalia. The Representative met with Somali leaders, IGAD representatives and donors to coordinate support for the process. The United Nations continued to support women's human rights issues at the Conference and provided a gender expert to work with the IGAD mediation team. Two meetings of the Somalia Contact Group were held during the reporting period (New York, 14 March; Nairobi, 27 March), at which progress in the reconciliation process was discussed, as well as the need for increased international support in that process. The Commission on Human Rights extended the mandate of the independent expert on the human rights situation in Somalia for another year (see p. 685).

The TNG President, Abdikassim Salad Hassan, and some faction leaders based in Mogadishu met on 27 March. Citing the lack of progress at the Mbagathi Conference, they affirmed their intention to proceed with efforts to restore security in Mogadishu and to convene a Somali national reconciliation conference inside Somalia. Hussein Aidid and a number of Somali leaders who continued their participation at the Mbagathi Conference denounced the Mogadishu meeting as divisive. He urged the Somali leaders meeting in Mogadishu to proceed to Mbagathi. According to the Prime Minister's Office, the Mogadishu meeting was not intended to be an alternative to the Mbagathi Conference but a way to bring security and stability to the capital. Reports indicated that disagreements had emerged between President Hassan, who remained in Mogadishu, and the Prime Minister and the Speaker of the Transitional National Assembly, who were leading the TNG delegation at Mbagathi. Differences on how the reconciliation process should proceed were also reported among members of the delegation. On 26 May, the Prime Minister returned to Mogadishu for consultations.

After an eight-month recess, the Transitional National Assembly reconvened on 28 April with 165 of the 245 members present. It debated the possibilities of reviewing the Transitional National Charter, with the aim of extending TNG's term of office beyond August 2003, when its three-year term expired.

In Somaliland, "presidential elections" took place on 14 April, and the announced winner was the incumbent, Dahir Riyale Kahin. In Puntland, Colonel Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed and his opponents participated in a reconciliation conference in Bossaso to end the conflict between his administration and the Puntland Salvation Movement, led by General Ade Muse Hirse. The two sides entered into a power-sharing agreement on 17 May. While the security conditions in Somaliland and Puntland remained calm, the border dispute with regard to Sool and Sanaag districts caused tensions between the two administrations.

Security conditions in southern Somalia remained a serious concern, with no clear local authority in many areas that could control the activities of bandits who extorted money from travellers and merchants and where clan feuds continued to claim lives. In March, humanitarian staff were withdrawn from areas where fighting occurred between the Abgal and Habr Gedir subclans. The security situation also remained difficult in Baidoa, Gedo and Kismayo. Although fighting had subsided in the Buale district, the conflict had claimed numerous lives and led to the displacement of people. The situation in Mogadishu remained dangerous and unpredictable, and access to the city for humanitarian agencies was very limited.

The Somali people continued to struggle with chronic food insecurity, poverty, disease, drought and severely limited educational and employment opportunities. Its human development index remained one of the lowest in the world. About 400,000 Somalis were refugees in neighbouring countries, while up to 370,000 others were internally displaced. In May, the UN country team and its partners reviewed the 2003 Common Humanitarian Action Plan, as well as the international response to the United Nations Consolidated Appeal (see p. 928). They noted that considerable progress had been made in the delivery of humanitarian relief, the reintegration of refugees, the promotion of the rule of law through law enforcement training and judicial reform, and poverty reduction through increased remittance flows and livestock exports. However, at that time, only 24 per cent of the $77.8 million requested through the Appeal had been funded.

Peace-building activities by UN agencies were focused on four strategic operational objectives of the country team: protection and human rights; provision of basic services; HIV/AIDS prevention; and education. Progress in all of those areas was ongoing through multi-agency, multi-sectoral peace-building initiatives focused on the enhancement of skills for Somalis, the provision of basic services and exchanges of technical personnel.

Observing that the Somalia National Reconciliation Conference at Mbagathi was about to enter its final phase, which would entail negotiations on the formation of an all-inclusive Government for Somalia, the Secretary-General stated that the future of the reconciliation process continued to rest largely in Somali hands. The international community could only assist the Somali efforts and commitment to end years of conflict and deprivation. He deplored the frequent violations by the Somali parties of their commitments under the Eldoret Declaration and commended the IGAD efforts to monitor implementation of the Declaration, its appointment of a Coordinator of the Ceasefire Monitoring Committee and the AU decision to dispatch monitors to Somalia. He also expressed concern about the absence of some Somali leaders from the Conference, in some cases for two months, alleging insufficient representation or displeasure with the IGAD efforts. Most of them, however, had returned to the Conference to complete the second phase and to initiate the third and final phase on formation of an all-inclusive Government.

Press statement by Security Council (16 July). Following informal consultations on 16 July, the Security Council President issued a press statement [SC/7816-AFR/668] saying that members reiterated their firm support for the ongoing Somali National Reconciliation Conference at Mbagathi. They took note of recent progress and expressed the hope that the Conference would conclude successfully in the near future. Members noted the efforts of the Ceasefire Monitoring Committee in preparing the monitoring of the implementation of the Eldoret Declaration, and the work of the AU and IGAD fact-finding mission to Somalia. They called on all States to comply with the arms embargo against Somalia (see p. 250). They expressed concern regarding the humanitarian situation in Somalia and urged the Somali parties to assure the delivery of humanitarian assistance.

Communications. On 16 June [S/2003/654], South Africa forwarded to the Security Council a communiqué issued by the AU Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution (Addis Ababa, 12-13 June), which included a decision on Somalia. The Central Organ expressed appreciation to the IGAD front-line States for their involvement and welcomed the dispatch of the joint technical IGAD-AU fact-finding mission to Somalia from 22 May to 2 June. It expressed the AU's readiness to play the role expected of it in establishing a mechanism to monitor the cessation of hostilities in Somalia, including the deployment of an AU observer mission there, and requested the Interim Chairperson of the Commission of the AU to undertake the necessary consultations with IGAD and the Somali parties towards the establishment of such a mechanism.

On 10 September [S/2003/876], Mozambique forwarded the decisions of another meeting of the Central Organ (Addis Ababa, 29 August). With regard to Somalia, the Central Organ recalled an earlier appeal to the international community to support the deployment of an international force in Somalia to help facilitate the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration process and requested the Commission Chairperson to study all aspects of such a force. It took note of the outcome of the AU reconnaissance mission to Somalia from 22 to 31 July. It requested the Commission Chairperson to pursue his consultations with the Somali parties, the IGAD Technical Committee and AU members on the deployment of an AU Military Observer Mission in Somalia that would precede the deployment of an international force. The Central Organ urged the Somali parties to demonstrate the political will required to bring the Mbagathi Conference to a successful conclusion.

On 16 July [S/2003/756], Italy submitted to the Council an EU statement on the peace process in Somalia. The Union welcomed the signing on 5 July by Somali leaders in Kenya of a document setting out the principles that would govern the passage from the second to the third phase of the Mbagathi Conference, as well as the four years of the transitional federal Government of the Republic of Somalia (see below). The EU urged those leaders who had been unable to return to Kenya to do so, allowing the Conference to move into the third phase.

Agreement on transitional federal Government

The Secretary-General reported in October [S/2003/987] (see p. 248) that the plenary of the Somalia National Reconciliation Conference had endorsed, by mid-June, the reports prepared by five of the six reconciliation committees, namely those on disarmament, demobilization and reintegration; land and property rights; economic recovery, institution-building and resource mobilization; regional and international relations; and conflict resolution and reconciliation. Disagreements in the committee on federalism and a provisional charter prevented it from concluding its report. The major points of disagreement concerned the length of the transitional period, the members of Parliament and the modality for their selection, the timing of the establishment of a federal system of government and the status of the existing regional and local authorities, in particular Somaliland.

President Mwai Kibaki of Kenya announced the appointment of Mohammed Abdi Affey as Kenya's Ambassador to Somalia. He would assist Mr. Kiplagat, the Kenyan Special Envoy and Chairman of the Conference.

On 5 July, after three weeks of negotiations, the Somali Leaders Committee at the Conference reached an accord that was expected to be part of a draft charter. It was agreed that a federal system of government, to be called the transitional federal Government, would be formed in Somalia during a four-year transitional period. The process of federalism would develop gradually and be completed in two and a half years. The Parliament would comprise 351 members, 12 per cent of whom would be women. The signatories to the Eldoret Declaration and political leaders at the Conference, in consultation with traditional leaders within their respective clan structures, would select the members of Parliament. The transitional federal Government would immediately initiate a dialogue on national unity with Somaliland. The agreement was put before the Conference plenary and adopted by acclamation.

The TNG President, Mr. Hassan, criticized the agreement, claiming that it would divide the country because it would implicitly recognize Somaliland. Stating that his Government would not be party to such a process, he disowned the signatures of the TNG Prime Minister and Speaker of the Transitional National Assembly, whom he had designated to lead the TNG delegation to the Conference. He disagreed with the selection process for members of Parliament and objected to the placing of Arabic, along with English, as one of the two second official languages, instead of placing it on the same level as Somali as one of the two first official languages. Other Somali leaders also denounced the 5 July agreement and declared they had withdrawn from the Conference.

The agreement sharpened the differences between Mr. Hassan on the one hand and his Prime Minister and the Speaker of the Assembly on the other. A session of the Assembly was convened in Mogadishu on 9 August, with 124 of the 245 members in attendance, and it voted for the removal of the Prime Minister and the Speaker. Discussions on the draft charter continued from 5 July until 15 September, and the IGAD Technical Committee worked with the participants to address the concerns raised by some Somali leaders. Mr. Kiplagat circulated a fourth version raising the status of Arabic and affirming the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Somalia. A fifth version removed the call for negotiations with Somaliland. Differences remained on implementation of federalism during the transition. After protracted discussions, a draft charter was adopted on 15 September, but that outcome was rejected by Mr. Hassan and other Somali leaders who had returned to Nairobi. International observers, including the Secretary-General's Representative, tried to find a middle ground between the 5 July agreement and the 15 September decision. On 20 September, Mr. Hassan and the other leaders returned to Mogadishu, stating that the Conference had collapsed and that they would open another reconciliation process in Somalia.

The AU (Maputo, Mozambique, 10-12 July) endorsed the Somali national reconciliation process and undertook to deploy a military observer mission to Somalia to monitor the cessation of hostilities as provided for in the Eldoret Declaration once a comprehensive agreement was reached. Subsequently, an AU/IGAD reconnaissance mission visited Somalia (21-31 July) in an effort to establish mechanisms to support the deployment of some 75 AU monitors. Having encountered difficulties and threats during its visit, the mission concluded that, given the prevailing political and military conditions, more work was needed before military observers could be deployed. It emphasized that the Somali leaders it had consulted were ready to disarm but that for that to happen the assistance of the international community was essential.

Report of Secretary-General (October). In his October report [S/2003/987], the Secretary-General stated that security in the southern parts of Somalia, including Mogadishu, remained precarious. Mounting crime in Mogadishu included frequent abductions, carjackings and civilian deaths. Fierce clashes broke out in Jawhar in July but calm returned in September. Militias clashed in July over control of water in South Mudug, resulting in some 50 people killed. Inter-clan fighting around Baidoa also continued. The lack of local authority and lawlessness made many areas inaccessible to aid workers. Nonetheless, several NGOs and UN agencies continued minimal operations, primarily in the health and education sectors. Puntland authorities agreed that aid workers could visit vulnerable communities in the Sool and Sanaag regions. Those areas, claimed by both Somaliland and Puntland, were visited by the resident and humanitarian coordinator for an assessment. As a result of the combination of food insecurity and poor health conditions, Somalis continued to suffer from malnutrition.

UN agencies were helping authorities in Somalia to improve the administration of justice by developing the rule of law, building their capacity to enforce the law and improving the application of human rights standards. Those programmes had been implemented only in the relatively peaceful area in the north-west, mainly in Somaliland, but plans were being made to expand them to less stable regions in the north-east, centre and south. Activities included the drawing up of training programmes for legal professionals and administrators, helping to draft a statute on establishing a human rights commission, working on establishing legal aid clinics, assessing the rehabilitation needs of court buildings, and building up the capacity of mine action services. On the basis of a child protection study, priority areas to be addressed were identified, including sexual violence, children engaged in exploitative labour, protection of children with disabilities, and minority children. UN agencies and their partners completed assessments of the judiciary system and collated recommendations on ways to improve justice as it affected women. Training was provided to women's organizations for the formation of a women's national human rights advocacy network, the development of advocacy tools and training manuals, the integration of gender and human rights issues into legal systems, and the inclusion of a bill of rights in the future federal and regional charters.

With regard to the refugee situation, UNHCR and other agencies worked with local authorities to assure protection, assistance and durable solutions. From the beginning of 2003, 5,569 people were voluntarily repatriated to Somaliland and Puntland from Djibouti, Ethiopia and Kenya. A UN reintegration programme in north-west Somalia provided new classrooms and furniture for 16 schools. It also carried out projects to repair roads, rehabilitate dams and wells, reconstruct schools and health facilities, and complete a water system to provide clean water to 60,000 people. The World Bank, in addition to its low-income countries under stress initiative, was funding, with the European Commission, the development of a Somali livestock sector strategy. UN agencies continued efforts to improve the standards, procedures and international acceptance of the Somali remittance industry. The strategic framework for the prevention and control of HIV/AIDS and sexually transmitted infections within Somali populations was finalized, providing a foundation on which to build interventions throughout the country.

The Secretary-General observed that, notwithstanding the progress made at the Mbagathi Conference in approving the reports of the five reconciliation committees, further advances had been slow owing to the differences on the issue of federalism and on the relationship of the future transitional Government with existing regional and local authorities, in particular Somaliland. The situation had been complicated by the expiration on 26 August of the TNG mandate, deriving from the agreement reached in August 2000 at the Somali National Peace Conference held at Arta, Djibouti [YUN 2000, p. 215]. Somali leaders faced the challenge of bridging their differences in order to reach agreement on a viable government.

At the current critical juncture in the reconciliation process, the sustained commitment of the IGAD front-line States, in particular, remained vital for the success of the Conference, the Secretary-General affirmed. Key UN Member States, from within and outside the region, should monitor and support the efforts of Somali leaders and the IGAD Technical Committee to help ensure that the Conference culminated in an inclusive and comprehensive agreement. UNPOS and the UN country team were developing a peace-building plan to be implemented in Somalia once a definitive agreement was reached at the Conference.

Pending an agreement at the Conference and improvement of the security situation that would permit him to propose the establishment of a peace-building office in Somalia and adjustments to the UNPOS mandate, the Secretary-General intended to continue UNPOS activities for the 2004-2005 biennium at the current resource level.

The Secretary-General restated that intention on 10 November [S/2003/1092]; on 13 November [S/2003/1093], the Council took note of the information and intention.

Appointment. The Secretary-General, on 22 October [S/2003/1051], informed the Security Council that the mandate of his Representative for Somalia, Winston A. Tubman, would expire at the end of 2003. Mr. Tubman had been working to advance the peace process through contacts with Somali leaders, civic organizations and the States and organizations concerned, and had provided support to the National Reconciliation Conference that was ongoing in Kenya. The Secretary-General intended to extend his mandate until 31 December 2004. On 28 October

[S/2003/1052], the Council took note of the information.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (November)

On 11 November [meeting 4856], following consultations among Security Council members, the President made statement S/PRST/2003/19 on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council, recalling its previous decisions concerning the situation in Somalia, in particular the statement by its President of 12 March 2003, and welcoming the report of the Secretary-General of 13 October 2003, reaffirms its commitment to a comprehensive and lasting settlement of the situation in Somalia and its respect for the sovereignty, territorial integrity, political independence and unity of the country, consistent with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations.

The Council reiterates its firm support for the Somali National Reconciliation Process launched under the auspices of the Intergovernmental Authority on Development and led by Kenya. The Council commends the progress made and acknowledges the challenges ahead.

The Council welcomes the relevant decisions made by the tenth Summit of the Intergovernmental Authority on Development and the first Intergovernmental Authority on Development Ministerial Facilitation Committee meeting on the Somali peace process in October 2003.

The Council urges all Somali leaders to participate constructively in the meeting of leaders planned by the Facilitation Committee in Kenya in November 2003 to bridge their differences and to reach agreements on a viable government and a durable and inclusive solution to the conflict in Somalia.

The Council commends the Government of Kenya for its crucial role in facilitating the Somali National Reconciliation Process, and President Yoweri Museveni of Uganda for joining in the facilitation work, and encourages the Facilitation Committee to work concertedly towards a successful conclusion of the Process.

The Council also commends the support given by the African Union to the Somali National Reconciliation Process, including its participation in the Process and its commitment to deploy a military observer mission to Somalia once a comprehensive agreement is reached.

The Council calls upon the international community to continue its efforts to support the Intergovernmental Authority in its facilitation of the Somali National Reconciliation Process, and calls upon the donor countries to contribute to the Process, the Trust Fund for Peace-building in Somalia and the United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for Somalia.

The Council expresses serious concern regarding the humanitarian situation in Somalia, and calls upon the Somali leaders to facilitate the delivery of much-needed humanitarian assistance and to assure the safety of all international and national aid workers.

The Council welcomes the forthcoming mission of the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 751 (1992) to Somalia and States in the region, from 11 to 21 November 2003, as a step towards giving full effect to the arms embargo. The Council calls upon relevant States and organizations to cooperate with the above-mentioned mission.

The Council reiterates that a comprehensive peace-building programme with special emphasis on disarmament, demobilization, rehabilitation and reintegration will be important to post-conflict Somali.

The Council expresses its readiness to assist the Somali parties and support the Intergovernmental Authority in implementation of the agreements reached in the Somali National Reconciliation Process.

Communication. The EU Presidency, in a 16 December statement [S/2003/1191], welcomed the decision of the IGAD Facilitation Committee to convene a retreat of Somali leaders in order to prepare the third and final phase of the National Reconciliation Conference. It urged all Somali leaders to return to Kenya without delay, with a view to achieving a political settlement for the good of the Somali people.

Further developments. By mid-September, developments at the Somalia National Reconciliation Conference in Mbagathi, which was largely financed by the EU, led to an impasse over the contested adoption of a charter [S/2004/115]. Some leaders, including transitional President Hassan, rejected the adoption and returned to Somalia. On 30 September, a group of them announced the formation of the National Salvation Council consisting of 12 factions under the chairmanship of Musse Sudi. On 7 October, the National Salvation Council signed a memorandum of understanding with the TNG President, in which it acknowledged the TNG's continuance in office. The signatories also announced their intention to convene a new national reconciliation conference separate from the one at Mbagathi.

At the tenth IGAD summit (Kampala, Uganda, 24 October), the heads of State focused on ways to get the national reconciliation process back on track. They decided to expand the membership of the IGAD Technical Committee to include Eritrea, the Sudan and Uganda, in addition to Djibouti, Ethiopia and Kenya, and renamed it the IGAD Facilitation Committee. The AU Special Envoy for Somalia was made a member of the Committee.

The Facilitation Committee, at a ministerial-level meeting (Nairobi, 28 October), agreed that Somali leaders would be invited to a Leaders' Consultation in Kenya on 20 November and that phase three of the Conference would commence only after the successful conclusion of the Consultation. The National Salvation Council and TNG raised several objections to the proposed Consultation, mainly centred on representation. International observers at the Conference, including the Secretary-General's Representative, met with representatives of the TNG and the National Salvation Council in Mogadishu in order to persuade them to participate in the Leaders' Consultation, as well as with leaders of opposing views. Despite its efforts, the Facilitation Committee was obliged to postpone the Leaders' Consultation until 2004 due to the continuing impasse.

The Under-Secretary-General for Political Affairs, Kieran Prendergast, visited the region from 7 to 16 November and held discussions with a wide spectrum of Somali leaders and others involved in the issue of Somali reconciliation to assess the situation and plan for a future UN role in the country.

Following the removal of the Prime Minister and Speaker of the Transitional National Assembly, Mustafa Gududow was elected as the new Speaker on 4 December, and transitional President Hassan appointed Mohamed Abdi Yussuf as the new Prime Minister, who then appointed a cabinet of 37 ministers.

On 21 December, the Somaliland Parliament adopted a resolution asserting Somaliland's authority over the Sool and Sanaag regions, which were also claimed by Puntland. On 27 December, forces loyal to the Puntland administration assumed control of Las-Anod district in the Sool region.

During the last three months of the year, breaches in security in Somaliland, a previously peaceful area, raised serious concerns. In other areas, sporadic inter-clan fighting took place, leaving many dead. Crime and violence in Mogadishu remained a problem and threats of kidnapping and direct attacks on UN and other humanitarian workers continued to be high. Humanitarian deliveries were reduced in most parts of the country.

Arms embargo

Panel of Experts (March). On 25 March [S/2003/225], the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 751 (1992) [YUN 1992, p. 202] concerning Somalia transmitted to the Council the report of the Panel of Experts established by resolution 1425 (2002) [YUN 2002, p. 206], and mandated to collect independent information on violations of the arms embargo on Somalia and to make recommendations on steps for implementing it. The Panel of Experts found a clear pattern of violation of the arms embargo. Weapons, equipment, training of militia and financial support to Somali factions had been given regularly by neighbouring States and others since the arms embargo was established in 1992. Weapons were also purchased by Somali factions on the international market. Those violations continued, even as the factions and their neighbours were participating in the Somalia National Reconciliation Conference.

The Panel believed that the sanctions regime should be enhanced and implemented with determination. The Somali faction leaders were convinced that they could proceed as usual since they had not seen any real enforcement of the embargo over the preceding 12 years. Those years of conflict had further fragmented Somali society as the fighting increasingly was carried out for the advancement of personal material interests.

The vast majority of the cases investigated by the Panel involved numerous shipments of relatively small amounts of arms and ammunition; the nature of the Somali conflict demanded little more. Fighting in Somalia was normally carried out by small numbers of poorly trained and undisciplined militia members and lasted no more than a few days before ammunition and other supplies were exhausted. Since Somalia was a deeply impoverished country, the faction leaders had to struggle to raise sufficient money to pay their militia members and obtain arms and ammunition. Fighting centred on the control of property or income-generating infrastructure, such as harbours, airports, markets, bridges or road junctions that could be "taxed". Faction leaders had also devised other schemes to raise money, some clearly illegal.

The arms market in Somalia was supplied by both external and internal sources, and arms, cash and ammunition were readily fungible and used to purchase other goods, such as food and khat, the local drug of choice. Ethiopia had played an overt military role in Somalia. It was a major source of weapons for a number of Somali groups and had also invaded and occupied parts of Somalia. After the establishment of the TNG, Ethiopia helped to establish the Somali Reconciliation and Restoration Council, made up of factions hostile to the TNG and its allies. The Ethiopian military provided training and some arms and supplies to all members of the Council. Eritrea had also been a major supplier of arms and ammunition to Somali groups and, at times, Somalia had become a secondary battleground in the war between Eritrea and Ethiopia. Yemen provided a small amount of military assistance to the TNG soon after it was established. According to reliable sources, Djibouti was a trans-shipment point for weapons to Somalia, principally for the TNG. Egypt had acknowledged providing training and uniforms to the TNG police. The TNG also received assistance from Kuwait, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the Sudan.

One concern about Somalia was that because of its lack of an effective central Government it could become a haven for international terrorists; so far there was no evidence of that. The continuing lawlessness in Somalia, particularly in the coastal areas, was a threat not only to Somalis but also to the international community. The recent finding that material and explosives used in the terrorist attack of November 2002 in Mombasa, Kenya [YUN 2002, p. 51], were trans-shipped through Somalia to north Kenya was a case in point. The international community could and should do more about security and unsustainable exploitation in Somalia's exclusive economic zone.

The warlords' use of extortion to raise money and the creeping trend to corruption, made possible by the general lawlessness of the country, would be a serious problem over the long term. Piracy and kidnapping were other means by which local militias extorted money from both the international community and the Somalis. The trade in khat was a significant source of revenue for the warlords. The long and remote Somali coast had the potential to accommodate both trade for the north-eastern region of Africa and a wide range of undesirable activities, from unsustainable exploitation of natural resources to arms trafficking, piracy and terrorist operations.

Although the Eldoret Declaration [YUN 2002, p. 202] was signed by all factions attending the Conference and witnessed by the neighbouring countries, most factions continued to fight and import weapons. The Panel therefore recommended that the sanctions be implemented with increased determination. Successful enforcement required an alliance of Governments and Somalis to monitor violations of the arms embargo and deprive violators of any safe haven. The Panel also recommended that all commercial relationships and banking activities that might be linked to arms purchases and the financing of war in Somalia be prevented. It welcomed and encouraged efforts by Somalia's business and civil community and certain segments of non-Somali interest groups to support and participate in actions to strengthen the embargo and the affiliated prohibitions on the financing of arms purchases. Most notably, such support had been expressed in the Declaration of Support by the members of the Dubai-based Somali Business Council and the Somali Intellectuals Association, and in letters from reputable leading currency printing companies.

The Panel believed that an effectively implemented arms embargo could cut the flows of arms to Somalia and concomitantly limit the level of armed conflict. That could contribute to the successful completion of a Somali peace agreement. The embargo had to be enforced to be effective, it warned. Official censure of States that violated the embargo was an important step, but continued vigorous monitoring was also necessary. The Panel also believed that it was important for the Security Council both to renew the Panel's mandate for six months and to implement its recommendations.

The Panel's specific recommendations included that: the United Nations create an Internet-based register of government officials who were authorized to sign end-user certificates for arms exports; a list of individuals deemed to be in violation of the embargo be drawn up so that their funds and assets could be frozen and any international travel banned; a further investigation be carried out of persistent violations of the embargo, including identification of violators and their supporters; and a Somali-based effort be organized to assist in identifying and impeding embargo violators, with the assistance of already deployed military and law-enforcement resources of the Member States.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (April)

On 8 April [meeting 4737], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1474(2003). The draft [S/2003/408] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its previous resolutions concerning the situation in Somalia, in particular resolution 733(1992) of 23 January 1992, by which it established an embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Somalia (hereinafter referred to as "the arms embargo"), resolution 1407(2002) of 3 May 2002, resolution 1425(2002) of 22 July 2002, and the statements by its President of 28 March (S/PRST/2002/8) and 12 December 2002 (S/PRSI/2002/35), and of 12 March 2003 (S/PRST/2003/2),

Noting with regret that the arms embargo has been continuously violated since 1992, including since the signing of the Declaration on Cessation of Hostilities and the Structures and Principles of the Somalia National Reconciliation Process ("the Eldoret Declaration") on 27 October 2002, and expressing concern over the illegal activities linked to the financing of arms purchases and military activities by the violators of the arms embargo in Somalia,

Reiterating its firm support for the Somalia National Reconciliation Process and the ongoing Somalia National Reconciliation Conference, reaffirming the importance of the sovereignty, territorial integrity, political independence and unity of Somalia, consistent with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations, and commending the efforts of Kenya as the host of the Somalia National Reconciliation Conference sponsored by the Intergovernmental Authority on Development,

Reiterating its insistence that all States, in particular those of the region, should not interfere in the internal affairs of Somalia. Such interference only further destabilizes Somalia, contributes to a climate of fear and impacts adversely on human rights, and could jeopardize the sovereignty, territorial integrity, political independence and unity of Somalia. Stressing that the territory of Somalia should not be used to undermine stability in the subregion,

Reiterating its serious concern over the continued flow of weapons and ammunition supplies to and through Somalia from sources outside the country, in contravention of the arms embargo, which is severely undermining peace and security and the political efforts for national reconciliation in Somalia, and which undermines the commitments made at the Great Lakes and the Horn of Africa Conference on the Proliferation of Small Arms and Light Weapons, held in Nairobi from 12 to 15 March 2000,

Recognizing the importance of improving the implementation and enhancing the monitoring of the arms embargo in Somalia through persistent and vigilant investigation into violations of the arms embargo,

Determining that the situation in Somalia constitutes a threat to international peace and security in the region,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter,

1. Stresses the obligation of all States and other actors to comply fully with resolution 733(1992), and reaffirms that non-compliance constitutes a violation of the provisions of the Charter;

2. Welcomes the report of the Panel of Experts dated 25 March 2003 submitted pursuant to paragraph 11 of resolution 1425(2002), notes with interest the observations and recommendations contained therein, and expresses its intention to give full consideration to the report;

3. Decides to re-establish a Panel of Experts for a period of six months commencing no later than three weeks from the date of the adoption of the present resolution, to be based in Nairobi, with the following mandate:

(a) To investigate the violations of the arms embargo covering access to Somalia by land, air and sea, in particular by pursuing any sources that might reveal information related to violations;

(b) To detail information and make specific recommendations in relevant areas of expertise related to violations and measures to give effect to and strengthen the arms embargo in its various aspects;

(c) To carry out field-based research, where possible, in Somalia, States neighbouring Somalia and other States, as appropriate;

(d) To assess the capacity of States in the region to implement fully the arms embargo, including through a review of national customs and border-control regimes;

(e) To focus on the ongoing arms embargo violations, including transfers of ammunition, single-use weapons, and small arms;

(f) To seek to identify those who continue to violate the arms embargo inside and outside Somalia, and their active supporters, and to provide the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 751(1992) of 24 April 1992 (hereinafter referred to as "the Committee") with a draft list for possible future actions;

(g) To explore the possibility of establishing a monitoring mechanism for the implementation of the arms embargo with partners inside and outside Somalia in close cooperation with regional and international organizations, including with the African Union;

(h) To refine the recommendations provided in the report of the Panel of Experts;

4. Requests the Secretary-General, upon the adoption of the present resolution and acting in consultation with the Committee, to appoint up to four experts, including the Chairman, drawing as much as possible and as appropriate on the expertise of the members of the Panel of Experts appointed pursuant to resolution 1425(2002), and also requests the Secretary-General to make the necessary financial arrangements to support the work of the Panel;

5. Also requests the Secretary-General to ensure that the Panel of Experts comprises, and has access to, sufficient expertise in the areas of armament and the financing thereof, civil aviation, maritime transport and regional affairs, including specialized knowledge of Somalia, in accordance with the resource requirements and administrative and financial arrangements outlined in the report of the Team of Experts pursuant to resolution 1407(2002);

6. Requests all Somali and regional parties as well as government officials and other actors contacted outside the region to cooperate fully with the Panel of Experts in the discharge of its mandate, and requests the Panel of Experts to notify the Council immediately, through the Committee, of any lack of cooperation;

7. Requests the Panel of Experts to provide a mid-term briefing to the Council, through the Committee, and to submit a final report at the end of its mandated period to the Council, through the Committee, for its consideration;

8. Decides to send a mission of the Committee, led by the Chairman of the Committee, to the region at the earliest possible stage after the Panel of Experts has resumed its work to demonstrate the determination of the Council to give full effect to the arms embargo;

9. Calls again upon all States, in particular those in the region, to provide the Committee with all available information on violations of the arms embargo;

10. Invites the neighbouring States to report to the Committee quarterly on their efforts to implement the arms embargo;

11. Calls upon regional organizations, in particular the African Union and the League of Arab States, as well as States that have the resources, to assist Somali parties and the States in the region in their efforts to implement fully the arms embargo;

12. Expresses its determination to review the situation regarding the implementation of the arms embargo in Somalia on the basis of information provided by the Panel of Experts in its reports;

13. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Following a 14 April briefing on the Panel's report by the Chairman of the Committee on the arms embargo, the Council President issued a press statement [SC/7728-AFR/601] in which members welcomed the report, which recommended that all parties inside and outside Somalia be invited to take up their responsibilities in implementing the arms embargo. They expressed concern about the continued flow of weapons and military equipment from sources outside Somalia and called on all Member States to cooperate with the re-established Panel of Experts.

On 10 April [S/2003/423], the TNG of Somalia welcomed the Panel's report, expressed appreciation for the concern expressed on the flow of arms to Somalia and welcomed the extension of the Panel's mandate. It also welcomed the Panel's findings that, among the neighbouring countries of Somalia, Ethiopia and its favourite Somali warlords continued to be the major violators of the arms embargo. The TNG concurred with the Panel's view that the arms embargo should be enforced and sanctions imposed against violators (States or individuals). On the other hand, the TNG refuted the Panel's assertion that the TNG had not fully cooperated with it. The TNG also objected to the Panel's description of police uniforms and equipment as military assistance and the Panel's recommendation for creating regulatory caretaker agencies for Somalia to deal with civil aviation, fiduciary and maritime administration matters.

The Secretary-General, on 30 April [S/2003/515], informed the Council of his appointment of four experts who would form the Panel to investigate violations of the arms embargo. When one member was unable to complete his service, the Secretary-General informed the Council on 28 July [S/2003/770] of his replacement.

On 20 August, following a briefing by the Chairman of the Committee on sanctions against Somalia on the mid-term report of the Panel of Experts, the Council President issued a press statement [SC/7849-AFR/690] in which Council members welcomed the Panel's work so far, which was in support of the Somali national reconciliation process and the ongoing Somali National Reconciliation Conference in Kenya. They reiterated their concern about the persistent flow of weapons and ammunition to Somalia, stressed the responsibility of Member States to implement the arms embargo and reiterated the call on all Somali and regional parties, as well as officials and other actors contacted outside the region, to cooperate with the Panel. Members welcomed the working relationships set up between the Panel and regional and international organizations, in particular the AC and IGAD, and the decision of the Chairman to lead a mission to the region in October. Members emphasized the need for an information campaign to publicize the mission's objectives.

Panel of Experts (November). The Panel of Experts, in accordance with resolution 1474 (2003) (see p. 252), issued a report that was transmitted to the Council by its Committee on sanctions against Somalia on 4 November [S/2003/1035]. The report, based on thorough monitoring over the previous six months, showed a continuous influx of small quantities of weapons and ammunition into Somalia that fed the local open arms markets and faction leaders' warehouses. Major violations of the arms embargo during that period using large vessels or heavy cargo aircraft showed a reduction over previous years, but the constant micro-flow of weapons and ammunition represented hundreds of tons of arms in violation of the embargo.

The Panel also found evidence linking violations of the arms embargo with illicit arms flows to neighbouring countries, piracy in Somali and international waters, and activities of armed groups and extremists beyond Somalia's borders. Weapons shipments destined for Somalia tended to originate in or were routed through Djibouti, Eritrea, Ethiopia, the United Arab Emirates and Yemen. The main entry points were the ports that served Puntland (Boosaaso), Mogadishu (Marha and El Ma'an) and Kismayo, together with airstrips around Mogadishu. The preferred method of sanctions-busting was to transport weapons in a small fishing vessel or concealed in an aircraft's cargo hold. They were then distributed through a long chain of brokers throughout Somalia. Dhows sailing from Yemen to north-east Somalia carried much of the traffic and most shipments went unnoticed and unreported. The bulk of the merchandise was destined for Mogadishu, the hub of the Somali arms trade. About 1,250 flights arrived in Somalia each month, mainly from other States in the region. Their cargo was rarely inspected and regulation of air traffic was limited. Likewise the 1,600-kilometre border between Somalia and Ethiopia was largely unmonitored and traffic passed freely.

Somali faction leaders paid for their arms in a variety of ways, for example, with cash received from foreign sponsors, with the proceeds of taxes and charges levied at ports, airports and road-blocks, with khat, or with counterfeit Somali shillings printed abroad. Transnational terrorists had been able to obtain not only small arms but also portable air defence systems, light anti-tank weapons and explosives. The Panel determined that it remained relatively easy to obtain surface-to-air missiles and import them into Somalia.

The front-line States and regional actors were key external players in Somali affairs. Although they had shown greater respect for the arms embargo over the past six months than in previous years, many persisted in violations and few had taken active measures to curb commercial arms transfers to Somalia. The Panel often found their support for its work lacking, but even where support was provided many lacked the tools to sufficiently monitor exports and/or trans-shipments through their ports, airports, land border crossings, territorial waters and airspace. Many observers attributed reduced arms flows in recent months to the Security Council's monitoring of the embargo. As the Somali peace process entered a critical stage, enforcement of the embargo and robust monitoring could help to reinforce commitment to dialogue, reduce the scope for armed conflict and mitigate its consequences if it happened.

Having discussed the Panel's report, Council members, in a 3 December press statement [SC/7941- AFR/781], said that they had begun to consider a range of measures to improve the effectiveness of the arms embargo. Council members underlined the critical role of the effective enforcement and monitoring of the sanctions regime for the Somalia national peace and reconciliation talks and reiterated the Council's active engagement in the process. They emphasized the need for a united approach and stronger support of the international community for enhanced implementation of the arms embargo and urged the front-line and neighbouring States to comply fully with their obligations under the relevant Council resolutions. They stressed the risks of the continued flow of weapons and ammunition supplies to and through Somalia for stability and security in Africa, and appealed for sustained regional efforts and cooperation to improve the monitoring and implementation of the embargo.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (December)

On 16 December [meeting 4885], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1519 (2003). The draft [S/2003/1177] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its previous resolutions concerning the situation in Somalia, in particular resolution 733(1992) of 23 January 1992, by which it established an embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Somalia (hereinafter referred to as "the arms embargo"), resolution 1356(2001) of 19 June 2001, resolution 1407(2002) of 3 May 2002, resolution 1425(2002) of 22 July 2002, resolution 1474(2003) of 8 April 2003, and the statements by its President of 12 March and 11 November 2003,

Reiterating its firm support for the Somali National Reconciliation Process and the ongoing Somali National Reconciliation Conference, commending the efforts of Kenya as the host of the Conference sponsored by the Intergovernmental Authority on Development, and reaffirming the importance of the sovereignty, territorial integrity, political independence and unity of Somalia, consistent with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations,

Reiterating its insistence that States, in particular those of the region, should not interfere in the internal affairs of Somalia—such interference only further destabilizes Somalia, contributes to a climate of fear and impacts adversely on human rights, and could jeopardize the sovereignty, territorial integrity, political independence and unity of Somalia—and stressing that the territory of Somalia should not be used to undermine stability in the subregion,

Reiterating its serious concern over the continued flow of weapons and ammunition supplies to and through Somalia from sources outside the country, in contravention of the arms embargo, bearing in mind that the Somali National Reconciliation Process and the implementation of the arms embargo serve as mutually reinforcing processes,

Having considered the report of the Panel of Experts of 4 November 2003, submitted pursuant to paragraph 7 of resolution 1474(2003),

Welcoming the mission of the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 751(1992) of 24 April 1992 (hereinafter referred to as “the Committee”), led by the Chairman of the Committee, to the States in the region, from 11 to 21 November 2003, as a step towards giving full effect to the arms embargo,

Reiterating the importance of improving the implementation and enhancing the monitoring of the arms embargo in Somalia through persistent and vigilant investigation into violations of the arms embargo, and expressing its determination to hold those violators accountable,

Determining that the situation in Somalia constitutes a threat to international peace and security in the region,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter,

1. Stresses the obligation of all States and other actors to comply fully with resolution 733(1992) and resolution 1356(2001), and reaffirms that non-compliance constitutes a violation of the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to establish a monitoring group (hereinafter referred to as the “Monitoring Group”) composed of up to four experts, for a period of six months commencing as soon as possible from the date of adoption of the present resolution, to be based in Nairobi, with the following mandate, which should focus on the ongoing arms embargo violations, including transfers of ammunition, single-use weapons, and small arms:

(a) To investigate the violations of the arms embargo covering access to Somalia by land, air and sea;

(b) To detail information and make specific recommendations in relevant areas of expertise related to violations and measures to give effect to and strengthen the implementation of the arms embargo in its various aspects;

(c) To carry out field-based investigations in Somalia, where possible, and in States neighbouring Somalia and other States, as appropriate;

(d) To assess the progress made by the States in the region to implement fully the arms embargo, including through a review of national customs and border control regimes;

(e) To provide the Committee in its final report with a draft list of those who continue to violate the arms embargo inside and outside Somalia, and their active supporters, with a view to possible future measures by the Council;

(f) To make recommendations based on its investigations and the previous reports of the Panel of Experts appointed pursuant to resolutions 1425(2002) and 1474(2003);

3. Also requests the Secretary-General to make the necessary financial arrangements to support the work of the Monitoring Group;

4. Requests all Somali and regional parties as well as Government officials and other actors contacted outside the region to cooperate fully with the Monitoring Group in the discharge of its mandate, and requests the Monitoring Group to notify the Security Council immediately, through the Committee, of any lack of cooperation;

5. Calls upon all States in the region and regional organizations, in particular the Intergovernmental Authority on Development, the African Union and the League of Arab States, to establish focal points to enhance cooperation with the Monitoring Group and to facilitate information exchange;

6. Requests the Monitoring Group to provide a mid-term briefing to the Council, through the Committee, and to submit a final report at the end of its mandated period to the Security Council, through the Committee, for its consideration;

7. Encourages all States signatories to the Nairobi Declaration on the Problem of the Proliferation of Illicit Small Arms and Light Weapons in the Great Lakes Region and the Horn of Africa to implement quickly the measures required by the Coordinated Agenda for Action as an important means in support of the arms embargo on Somalia;

8. Calls upon the neighbouring States to report to the Committee quarterly on their efforts to implement the arms embargo, bearing in mind their crucial role in the implementation of the arms embargo;

9. Encourages the donor community, including the Partner Forum Group of the Intergovernmental Authority on Development, to provide technical and material assistance to States in the region, as well as to the regional organizations, in particular the Intergovernmental Authority on Development, the African Union and the League of Arab States, in support of their national and regional capacity for monitoring and implementing the arms embargo, including for monitoring the coastline, land and air boundaries with Somalia;

10. Encourages Member States from the region to continue their efforts in enacting legislation or regulations necessary to ensure the effective implementation of the arms embargo;

11. Expresses its determination to review the situation regarding the implementation of the arms embargo in Somalia on the basis of information provided by the Monitoring Group in its reports;

12. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Security Council Committee. On 31 December, the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 751(1992) [YUN 1992, p. 202] concerning the arms embargo on Somalia submitted its report covering activities in 2003 [S/2003/1216]. The Committee held a number of meetings to discuss the findings of the two reports issued by the Panel of Experts (see p. 254). It sent a mission to the region from 11 to 21 November, which visited Djibouti, Egypt, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Italy, Kenya and Yemen; owing to security considerations, travel to Somalia was not possible.

The Committee approved three requests from the United Kingdom to import humanitarian mine-clearance equipment to Somalia and one similar request from UNDP.

During the year, the Committee stepped up its level of engagement. The activities of the Panel of Experts and the Committee's mission to the region were indications of its determination to give full effect to the arms embargo. As in the past, the Committee continued to rely on the cooperation of States and organizations in a position to provide information on violations of the arms embargo.

Sudan

Internal situation

More than two decades of turmoil had taken their toll on the Sudan; the consequence of protracted warfare between government troops based in the north and rebels based in the south. The situation improved following the July 2002 signing of the Machakos (Kenya) Protocol between the Government and the rebel group, the Sudan People's Liberation Movement/Army (SPLM/A) [YUN 2002, p. 217].

With the improved security, delivery of humanitarian assistance increased (see p. 929). Nevertheless, armed conflict and ethnic violence continued to destroy infrastructure, isolate populations, erode coping mechanisms and limit access to markets and resulted in human rights violations. Natural calamities further diverted and drained vital government resources and caused new large-scale displacement of people. The war had resulted in 2 million deaths, and some 4 million people had been displaced. A memorandum of understanding on resumption of peace negotiations, signed on 15 October 2002 by the Government and SPLM/A, provided for the two sides to extend the cessation of hostilities and to facilitate humanitarian access. Further progress on humanitarian access was made under the auspices of the Technical Committee on Humanitarian Assistance, which was chaired by the Secretary-General's Special Envoy for Humanitarian Affairs for the Sudan.

In September, the Government and SPLM/A met in Naivasha, Kenya, and signed an agreement on security arrangements. Under its terms, the Sudan would have two armies under separate command and control during a six-year interim period. The two sides also agreed on a proportional reduction of forces and on establishing joint units under the command of the President.

Communications. The AU Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution, at its ninety-second ordinary session (Addis Ababa, 12-13 June), forwarded the decisions adopted to the Security Council on 16 June [S/2003/654], including one on the Sudan. The Central Organ welcomed the progress made in the peace process under the auspices of IGAD, and commended Kenya and its Special Envoy, Lazarus K. Sumbeiywo, for their efforts in facilitating the negotiations between the Sudanese Government and SPLM/A. It appealed to both parties to display the necessary spirit of accommodation so that a lasting solution could be found to the conflict. The Central Organ welcomed the adoption by the parties, during the fifth session of the Political Committee Task Force (Nairobi, 7-21 May), of the Verification and Monitoring Team's Tasking Procedures, within the framework of the addendum of 4 February 2003 to the Memorandum of Understanding on Cessation of Hostilities of 15 October 2002. The Central Organ supported the AU's participation in the work of the Verification and Monitoring Team. It appealed to the international community to provide the necessary resources for post-conflict reconstruction efforts.

In a 15 January statement forwarded to the Council [S/2003/80], the EU Presidency condemned the executions of three persons recently sentenced to death in the Sudan and called on the Government to refrain from further executions and other forms of cruel or inhuman punishment. It stressed that such actions went against the benchmarks applied in the framework of the ongoing dialogue between the EU and the Government of the Sudan.

On 8 August [S/2003/817], the EU Presidency, welcoming the forthcoming resumption, on 10 August, of the IGAD-sponsored peace talks on the Sudan, said that it was time to strike final compromises on the outstanding issues and reach a comprehensive agreement to end the conflict and the sufferings of the civilian population in the Sudan. It called on the parties to work with the IGAD mediators, led by Kenya, with a view to achieving a comprehensive solution, based on strict observance of the rule of law and full respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. The EU welcomed the extension of the cessation of hostilities and of the addendum on the Verification and Monitoring Team's procedures for a further three months and stood ready to support the monitoring mechanism.

Framework agreement on security

The Government of the Sudan and SPLM/A, on 25 September in Naivasha, Kenya, signed the Framework Agreement on Security Arrangements during the Interim Period, which the Sudan forwarded to the Security Council on 2 October [S/2003/934]. Under its terms, the Sudan would have two armies under separate command and control during the six-year interim period. They agreed on the principles of proportional downsizing of the forces on both sides, following the completion of comprehensive ceasefire arrangements, which would be monitored by international observers. Both sides agreed to contribute troops to serve in joint/integrated units to be deployed by the President.

The EU Presidency, in a 25 September statement [S/2003/948], welcomed the Agreement, which it said augured well for the continuation of negotiations on the remaining outstanding issues. It encouraged the parties to seize the momentum and to reach a final and comprehensive agreement.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 10 October [meeting 4839], following consultations among Security Council members, the President made statement S/PRST/2003/16 on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council welcomes the agreement on security arrangements reached in Naivasha, Kenya, on 25 September 2003, between the Government of the Sudan and the Sudan People's Liberation Movement/Army. The Council reiterates its welcome for the signing of the Machakos Protocol on 20 July 2002, which represents a viable basis for a resolution of the conflict in the Sudan. The Council looks forward to the successful conclusion of a comprehensive peace agreement, based on the Machakos Protocol. The Council further expresses its appreciation of the key role played by the Intergovernmental Authority on Development, under the leadership of the Kenyan President, the Kenyan Special Envoy, the envoys of the other Intergovernmental Authority member States and the International Observers in the Sudan peace talks.

The Council also welcomes the continuation of the ceasefire and the establishment of the Verification and Monitoring Team, the Joint Military Commission and the Civilian Protection Monitoring Team and encourages Member States in a position to do so to contribute financial and logistical resources.

The Council assures the parties of its readiness to support them in the implementation of the comprehensive peace agreement and requests the Secretary-General, in this connection, to initiate preparatory work, as soon as possible, in consultation with the parties, the Intergovernmental Authority facilitators and the International Observers, on how the United Nations could best fully support the implementation of a comprehensive peace agreement.

Sudan-Uganda

The Defence Minister of the Sudan, Major General Bakri Hassan Saleh, and his Ugandan counterpart, Amama Mbabazi, met in Uganda on 8 and 9 January and issued a communiqué, which Uganda forwarded to the Security Council on 15 January [S/2003/71]. They reviewed cooperation in defence, in particular implementation of existing agreements and protocols. The Ministers agreed that the Sudan People's Armed Forces would deploy in the camps formerly occupied by the Uganda-based Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) as soon as possible. The Sudanese Government reiterated its position against any contacts between its army and the LRA. The two countries agreed to deploy liaison army officers in the joint operations rooms at Gulu, Juba, Arua and Kitgum, on both sides of the joint border.

North Africa

Western Sahara

The United Nations continued its efforts to bring an end to the dispute over the governance of Western Sahara. The Personal Envoy of the Secretary-General attempted to bring the two parties together to reach agreement based on his new proposal. Those parties, Morocco and the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguia el-Hamra y de Río de Oro (POLISARIO), had agreed in 1990 to hold a referendum for the people to decide between independence or integration of the Territory with Morocco. Since then, United Nations plans to organize elections had been resisted by both sides. On the ground, the Secretary-General's Special Representative continued to meet with representatives of the parties and neighbouring States. The United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO), established by Security Council resolution 690(1991) [YUN 1991, p. 794] to implement the settlement plan approved by the Council in resolution 658(1990) [YUN 1990, p. 920], continued to monitor the ceasefire between Morocco and POLISARIO and to report on developments.

Progress towards a political solution was incremental in 2003, mainly due to the reluctance of Morocco to accept the compromises proposed by the Personal Envoy in the peace plan for self-determination that he submitted to the parties at the beginning of the year. Morocco, however, did not completely reject the negotiating process, and the Security Council, affirming that Morocco needed more time to reflect on the proposal, agreed on five occasions to extend MINURSO's mandate for relatively short periods of time. Under the peace plan, there would be a transition period during which responsibilities would be divided between the parties before the holding of a referendum for self-determination. Unlike earlier plans, it would not require the approval of both sides at every step of implementation. When both sides raised various objections, the Secretary-General concluded that their responses suggested that they lacked the genuine will required to achieve a political solution. Later, POLISARIO indicated its acceptance of the peace plan. At that point, the Secretary-General urged Morocco to seize the opportunity for solving the long-standing dispute; however, by the close of the year, Morocco had not given a definitive response.

The Identification Commission completed its work on the electronic archiving of the nearly 245,000 individual files of persons who applied to be included in the list of voters for the referendum. Those archives were transferred to the United Nations Office at Geneva for safe keeping and, consequently, the MINURSO civilian police component, whose primary mandate was to protect the Commission's records, was withdrawn from the Territory by the end of the year. POLISARIO continued to impose some minor restrictions on the freedom of movement of MINURSO personnel. Both parties cooperated with the Mission on marking and disposing of landmines and unexploded ordnance.

During the year, POLISARIO released 643 Moroccan prisoners of war. More than 600 were still detained by POLISARIO, some of whom had been in detention for more than 20 years. Some progress was made on other confidence-building measures, including an agreement on telephone and personal mail services between some refugee camps in Tindouf, Algeria, and the Territory. However, those steps were not implemented in 2003.

Report of Secretary-General (January). The Secretary-General, in response to Security Council resolution 1429(2002) [YUN 2002, p. 212], submitted a 16 January report on the situation concerning Western Sahara [S/2003/59]. The Council had requested him to report before the end of MINURSO's current mandate (31 January).

Since his previous report of April 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 211], his Special Representative, William Lacy Swing (United States), continued his regular contacts with representatives of the parties and neighbouring States, holding exchanges with representatives of Morocco and POLISARIO in Laayoune (northern sector of Western Sahara) and the Tindouf (western Algeria) area, respectively, in order to keep an open channel of communication with them and to review the situation on the ground. He also visited the capitals of regional countries.

The Identification Commission continued its work in offices in both Laayoune and Tindouf on the electronic archiving of the 244,643 individual files of persons who had applied to be included in the list of voters for the referendum in Western Sahara. Initiated in August 2001, that work had so far resulted in the electronic archiving of some 177,000 files and was expected to be completed in April 2003.

The MINURSO military component, which stood at 211 military observers and troops, continued to monitor the ceasefire between the Royal Moroccan Army and the POLISARIO military forces, which had been in effect since 1991. The MINURSO area of responsibility remained generally calm. The civilian police component of MINURSO continued to provide protection for the files and sensitive materials at the Identification Commission centres at Laayoune and Tindouf. Training activities also continued. MINURSO military observers were deployed across Western Sahara at 10 sites.

The Secretary-General's Personal Envoy, James A. Baker III (United States), had embarked on a visit to the region to present to the parties and neighbouring countries a proposal for a political solution to the conflict over Western Sahara, as requested by the Council in resolution 1429(2002). For almost two decades, the Council and the United Nations had worked diligently to assist the parties to find a solution to the conflict. During that time, every possible option had been presented to them aimed at reaching an agreed solution. The responsibility for a positive culmination of those efforts rested solely with the parties. To give them time to consider the proposal presented by his Personal Envoy, the Secretary-General recommended a technical rollover of MINURSO's mandate for two months, until 31 March 2003. During that period, the United Nations would do all it could to address the humanitarian requirements of the Saharan refugees and to work with ICRC to address the plight of the prisoners of war and persons unaccounted for. He called on the international community to provide the resources necessary for WFP and UNHCR to cover the refugee food requirements. He urged the parties to release all those retained for so long, in contravention of international humanitarian law, and to embark on confidence-building measures to help to alleviate the suffering of the refugees.

Security Council statement. In a 23 January press statement [SC/7640], the Security Council President said that Council members welcomed the Secretary-General's January report (above) and agreed with his observation that the responsibility for a solution rested solely with the parties. They recalled the need to release without further delay all remaining prisoners of war, in compliance with international humanitarian law. They also recalled that Council resolution 1429(2002) called on Morocco and POLISARIO to continue to cooperate with ICRC to resolve the problem of the fate of all those unaccounted for since the beginning of the conflict. Council members expressed concern that confidence-building measures remained stalled and called on the parties to make the necessary compromises to allow person-to-person contact between Saharans on both sides of the berm (defensive sandwall). They agreed to extend MINURSO's mandate to give the parties time to consider the proposal presented to them by the Secretary-General's Personal Envoy.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (January)

On 30 January [meeting 4698], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1463 (2003). The draft [S/2003/116] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its previous resolutions on Western Sahara, in particular resolution 1429(2002) of 30 July 2002,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara until 31 March 2003 in order to give the parties time to consider the proposal presented to them by the Personal Envoy of the Secretary-General;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to provide a report on the situation by 17 March 2003;

3. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Communication. The Secretary-General, on 19 March [S/2003/341], informed the Security Council of the activities of his Personal Envoy, pursuant to resolution 1463(2003) (above). In January, Mr. Baker had presented his proposal, entitled "Peace plan for self-determination for the people of Western Sahara", to King Mohammed VI of Morocco, to President Abdelaziz Bouteflika of Algeria, to the Secretary-General of POLISARIO, Mohamed Abdelaziz, and to President Maouya Ould Sid' Ahmed Taya of Mauritania. Council members had received a copy of the proposal in March. When presenting his proposal to the parties, Mr. Baker indicated that their views on it should be made available to him by early March, but not all parties had responded. In order to allow sufficient time to those parties and to the Personal Envoy to assess the responses, the Secretary-General proposed to defer submission of his report to the Council until 19 May. He also proposed that the Council consider authorizing a technical extension of MINURSO's mandate for another two months, until 31 May 2003.

Security Council statement. In a 25 March press statement [SC/7703], Security Council members stated that they intended to extend MINURSO's mandate to 31 May in order to give the Secretary-General's Personal Envoy sufficient time to evaluate the parties' responses to his proposal. They welcomed POLISARIO's recent release of prisoners of war; they recalled, however, that all prisoners of war still in detention should be released without further delay. The members requested the two parties to continue to cooperate with ICRC's efforts to solve the problem of the fate of all persons who had disappeared since the beginning of the conflict. They also expressed concern at the humanitarian situation of persons affected by the ongoing crisis.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (March)

On 25 March [meeting 4725], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1469(2003). The draft [S/2003/360] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its previous resolutions on Western Sahara, in particular resolution 1429(2002) of 30 July 2002,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara until 31 May 2003;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to provide a report on the situation by 19 May 2003 as proposed by the Secretary-General in his letter dated 19 March 2003 addressed to the President of the Security Council;

3. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Report of Secretary-General (May). In response to resolution 1469(2003) (see above), the Secretary-General submitted a 23 May report on the situation concerning Western Sahara [S/2003/565 & Corr.1]. Annexed to the report were the Personal Envoy's proposal for a peace plan for the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara, as well as the responses of the parties (Morocco, POLISARIO) and the neighbouring States (Algeria, Mauritania).

During the period since his previous (January) report, the Special Representative continued to maintain regular contacts with representatives of the parties and with senior officials of neighbouring countries during visits to Rabat, Tindouf, Algiers and Nouakchott. The Identification Commission completed its work on the electronic archiving of the 244,643 individual files of persons who applied to be included in the list of voters for the referendum in Western Sahara. All files had been scanned, archived and stored on both hard disks and back-up tapes to ensure security of the database. Continuing its monitoring duties, the MINURSO military component, which stood at 229 military observers and troops, reported that the area remained calm. POLISARIO continued to impose some minor limitations on MINURSO's freedom of movement. The Mission cooperated with the parties on the marking and disposal of mines and unexploded ordnance, and also assisted in preparing a regional landmine safety workshop for Western Sahara, to be held in Mauritania in June. Work began on establishing an information system that would consolidate data on mines and unexploded ordnance that MINURSO had collected over the years.

The Special Representative continued to impress upon POLISARIO the need to release all remaining prisoners of war and upon both parties to cooperate with ICRC in determining the fate of persons who were unaccounted for. On 26 February, ICRC repatriated 100 prisoners of war to Morocco. POLISARIO continued to hold 1,160 prisoners of war, some of whom had been in detention for more than 20 years.

Although the parties had agreed in late 2002 on certain confidence-building measures concerning Western Saharan refugees, the two sides expressed divergent views on the selection criteria of family visits between the Tindouf area refugees and their communities of origin in Western Sahara. Efforts to achieve a compromise formula had failed so far, and neither side was willing to reconsider the use of the provisional list of voters as the primary basis for participant selection. The United Nations pursued other confidence-building measures, focusing on activities that were not contested, such as telephone and personal mail services between some Tindouf refugee camps and the Territory, which the two parties approved.

The Secretary-General assessed the progress achieved and problems encountered by his Personal Envoy, summarizing activities since his appointment in 1997. By late 2002, there was still little movement by either side towards a feasible settlement plan to resolve the dispute over Western Sahara; therefore, the Secretary-General and his Personal Envoy presented to the Security Council four options that would not have required the concurrence of the parties [YUN 2002, p. 211]. The Council was not able to agree on any of those options; instead it supported efforts to find a political solution. The Council expressed its readiness to consider any approach providing for self-determination that might be proposed by the Secretary-General and his Personal Envoy. Subsequently, Mr. Baker, assisted by a constitutional expert, drafted a peace plan for self-determination for the people of Western Sahara, which was annexed to the Secretary-General's report. The proposal was presented and explained to the parties and neighbouring countries during his visit to the region from 14 to 17 January 2003.

The Secretary-General believed that the peace plan provided a fair and balanced approach towards a political solution, giving each side some of what it wanted and incorporating elements of previous plans they had agreed on. It envisaged a period of transition during which there would be a division of responsibilities between the parties before the holding of a referendum that would provide the bona fide residents of Western Sahara with an opportunity to decide their future. Unlike the earlier settlement plan, the peace plan did not require the consent of both parties at each and every step of its implementation.

The Secretary-General observed that the proposed plan offered an optimum political solution to the conflict, providing the bona fide residents of Western Sahara, following an appropriate transitional period, the opportunity to determine their own future, which, in turn, would promote peace and stability in the region and would open the way to enhanced exchanges and cooperation between the countries of the Arab Maghreb Union. By combining elements of the framework agreement, favoured by Morocco, and the settlement plan, favoured by POLISARIO, it represented a compromise.

The main objection of Morocco to the peace plan seemed to be that, in the referendum to determine the final status of Western Sahara, one of the ballot choices was independence; however, independence was also one of the two ballot choices under the settlement plan, which Morocco had accepted. It was difficult to envision a political solution that, as required by Security Council resolution 1429(2002) [YUN 2002, p. 212], provided for self-determination but precluded the possibility of independence as one of several ballot questions. The Secretary-General noted that there was one amendment to the peace plan that might assuage the concern of Morocco over the ballot for the referendum. That would be to provide a third ballot choice providing for continuation of the division of authority as set forth in the peace plan, in other words, self-government or autonomy. Morocco had for some time supported the concept of self-government or autonomy as the solution to the conflict over Western Sahara. The Secretary-General and his Personal Envoy proposed that the third ballot question be included on the ballot for the referendum on the peace plan. If none of the three ballot questions obtained a majority of votes, the one receiving the fewest votes would be eliminated and a run-off referendum would be held to allow the voters to choose between the two other possibilities. If the third option, self-government or autonomy, prevailed, the electorate for future elections of the executive and legislative bodies of the Western Sahara Authority would be the bona fide residents of Western Sahara over the age of 18.

POLISARIO's chief objection seemed to be that the peace plan was not the settlement plan. POLISARIO suggested that the parties revert to the implementation of the settlement plan, with two new elements: that the Identification Commission would process all 130,000 appeals, with no requirement that sheikhs participate, and the Commission's decisions would be accepted as final; and that a mechanism would be added to provide for enforcement of the referendum results under Chapter VII of the UN Charter. The Secretary-General observed that even with those two new elements, the settlement plan would still require the parties' consent at every stage of implementation. It was difficult to envision Morocco consenting to POLISARIO proposal as a way of implementing the settlement plan. As far as adding a Chapter VII mechanism to enforce the referendum results, the Secretary-General recalled that, following his report of February 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 210], the Security Council would not choose any of the four options he and his Personal Envoy had proposed because neither party would consent or agree to one of them. It was therefore unlikely that the Council would decide to enforce the referendum result under Chapter VII.

The responses of the parties also contained a number of ostensibly technical objections to the peace plan. In the Secretary-General's view, when taken together, the objections suggested that the parties lacked the genuine will required to achieve a political solution to the conflict. He cautioned that one or both parties might approach the Council to elicit support for a process in which objections and/or changes to the peace plan would be negotiated between them; however, the Secretary-General felt that such an approach would not be conducive to moving forward. He and his Personal Envoy believed that the parties should accept the plan as proposed. Recommending that the Council endorse the peace plan, or fifth option, the Secretary-General said that it combined elements of the draft framework agreement and agreed elements of the settlement plan, and that it was fair and balanced. Following a transitional period of self-government, the proposal offered the bona fide residents of Western Sahara an opportunity to determine their future for themselves.

The Secretary-General stated that he had reluctantly come to the conclusion that unless and until the parties demonstrated their readiness to assume their own responsibilities and make the compromises necessary to reach a successful outcome to the conflict, a fresh initiative to find a solution to the issue was likely to suffer the same fate as earlier ones. He urged the Council to seize the opportunity to address the long-standing issue of Western Sahara by requesting the parties to agree to the peace plan as amended and to work with the United Nations in its implementation. He added that if the parties could not agree on an approach for a political solution and if the Council was not in a position to ask them to take steps that they did not perceive to be in their own interest, despite the fact that it might be in the interest of the population of Western Sahara, the Council might consider whether it would remain actively seized of that political process. In order to give the Council sufficient time to reflect on its decision, the Secretary-General proposed that the MINURSO mandate be extended for two months, until 31 July.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (May, July)

On 30 May [meeting 4765], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1485(2003). The draft [S/2003/377] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling all its resolutions on Western Sahara, in particular resolution 1429(2002) of 30 July 2002,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 23 May 2003,

Commending the work of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Western Sahara, including his efforts to resolve the pending humanitarian issues related to the conflict and to implement Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees confidence-building measures,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara until 31 July 2003 in order to consider further the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

On 31 July [meeting 4801], the Council unanimously adopted resolution 1495(2003). The draft [S/2003/777] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling all its resolutions on the question of Western Sahara, and reaffirming in particular resolution 1429(2002) of 30 July 2002,

Stressing that, in view of the lack of progress in the settlement of the dispute over Western Sahara, a political solution is critically needed,

Concerned that this lack of progress continues to cause suffering to the people of Western Sahara, remains a source of potential instability in the region and obstructs the economic development of the Maghreb region,

Reaffirming its commitment to assist the parties to achieve a just, lasting and mutually acceptable political solution which will provide for the self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in the context of arrangements consistent with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations, and noting the role and responsibilities of the parties in this respect,

Commending the parties for their continuing commitment to the ceasefire, and welcoming the essential contribution which the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara is making in that regard,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 23 May 2003 and the peace plan for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara presented by his Personal Envoy, as well as the responses of the parties and the neighbouring States,

Acting under Chapter VI of the Charter,

1. Continues to support strongly the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Personal Envoy, and similarly supports their peace plan for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara as an optimum political solution on the basis of agreement between the two parties;

2. Calls upon the parties to work with the United Nations and with each other towards acceptance and implementation of the peace plan;

3. Calls upon all the parties and the States of the region to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General and his Personal Envoy;

4. Reaffirms its call upon the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguia El-Hamra y de Río de Oro to release without further delay all remaining prisoners of war in compliance with international humanitarian law, and its call upon Morocco and the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguia El-Hamra y de Río de Oro to continue to cooperate with the International Committee of the Red Cross to resolve the fate of persons who are unaccounted for since the beginning of the conflict;

5. Reiterates its call upon the parties to collaborate with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in the implementation of confidence-building measures, and continues to urge the international community to provide generous support to the Office of the High Commissioner and the World Food Programme in order to help them to overcome the deteriorating food situation among the refugees;

6. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara until 31 October 2003;

7. Requests that the Secretary-General submit a report on the situation, before the end of the present mandate, that contains information on progress made in the implementation of the present resolution;

8. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Appointment. The Secretary-General, on 5 August [S/2003/796], informed the Security Council of his intention to appoint Alvaro de Soto (Peru) as his Special Representative for Western Sahara. Mr. de Soto would replace Mr. Swing, who had been appointed as Special Representative for the Democratic Republic of the Congo. The Council took note of his intention on 8 August [S/2003/797].

Report of Secretary-General (October). In response to Security Council resolution 1495(2003) (above), the Secretary-General submitted a 16 October report on the situation concerning Western Sahara [S/2003/1016], covering developments since his May report.

His Personal Envoy had met with a high-level delegation from Morocco (Houston, Texas, United States, 17 September) to discuss the peace plan for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara. The delegation asked for some more time to reflect and consult before giving its final response to resolution 1495(2003), in particular the Council's call on the parties to work with the United Nations and with each other towards acceptance and implementation of the plan.

MINURSO, on 7 October, completed the transfer of all sensitive files of the Identification Commission to the United Nations Office at Geneva for safe storage. The Commission would therefore be reduced and its staff was scheduled to be withdrawn from the Mission by the end of the year. The authorized Commission posts would remain budgeted to the end of the current fiscal year (30 June 2004) to permit the Council to reactivate the Commission quickly should it decide to do so. With the transfer of files, the civilian police component completed its protection duties; accordingly, the remaining police officers were being withdrawn from the Mission, with the budgeted posts retained to the end of the fiscal year.

The MINURSO military component, which stood at 222 military observers and troops, reported that the area of operations remained calm. POLISARIO continued to impose some limitations on the Mission's freedom of movement in areas east of the buffer strip. During the reporting period, MINURSO had marked 56 mines and pieces of unexploded ordnance on both sides of the berm and monitored 31 disposal operations carried out by the Moroccan army. On 1 September, a field containing an unspecified number of grenades was discovered and marked at Bir Lahlou on the eastern side of the berm.

POLISARIO released 243 Moroccan prisoners of war in response to a request from a Member State. On 1 September, those persons were repatriated to Morocco by ICRC. In a 3 September press statement [SC/7863], Security Council members welcomed their release, as did the Secretary-General, who reiterated his call to POLISARIO to expedite the release of all remaining prisoners of war. According to ICRC figures, 914 such prisoners remained, most of whom had been in detention for more than 20 years. Some progress was reported concerning the determination of the fate of unaccounted-for persons, and the Secretary-General urged the two parties to cooperate further with ICRC in that regard. In May, ICRC interviewed four individuals in the Territory who had appeared on a POLISARIO list of unaccounted-for persons, who were subsequently removed from the list.

While the food pipeline for the Western Saharan refugees was relatively stable for some months, WFP foresaw shortages in basic foodstuffs by December if new contributions were not made. Donor interest in the refugee assistance programme remained relatively low.

UNHCR and MINURSO continued to promote a package of confidence-building measures with regard to refugees. On 15 April, UNHCR inaugurated a pilot telephone service between a refugee camp and the Territory; however, the programme was suspended by POLISARIO the next day. In May, Morocco reiterated its agreement to start mail service between the Tindouf refugee camps and the Territory, but requested that further technical discussions on modalities be held before it was started. During those discussions in October, UNHCR informed Algeria that Morocco was proposing that a direct mail service be established between the two national postal services and reminded Algeria that its formal concurrence was needed before the UNHCR-operated telephone service between the refugee camps in Algeria and the Territory could be resumed. The issue of family visits was not on the agenda of the UNHCR talks given the long-standing disagreement between the parties on selection criteria for the participants.

The Secretary-General congratulated the parties on the release of 243 Moroccan prisoners of war, the clarification of the fate of four previously unaccounted-for persons and the agreement on implementing confidence-building measures, all steps towards fostering a positive atmosphere between the parties. He called on the two sides to pursue the confidence-building measures. He also pointed out that Morocco continued to oppose the proposed peace plan, even after it had been adjusted to include a third ballot choice in the referendum, i.e., autonomy for Western Sahara, in addition to the choices of independence or integration with Morocco. Should the parties not be willing to make the necessary compromises on a political solution, the latest initiative would likely meet the same fate as earlier proposals. The acceptance of the peace plan by POLISARIO offered a window of opportunity for solving the long-standing dispute, the Secretary-General said, and he urged Morocco to seize the opportunity and engage in the process by accepting and implementing the plan.

In that context, following his 17 September discussions with the Moroccan delegation, Mr. Baker recommended that Morocco, as it had requested, be given more time to reflect before giving its final response by extending MINURSO's mandate. The Secretary-General agreed with the recommendation and proposed an extension of three months, until 31 January 2004.

Communication. Morocco, in a 21 October letter to the Security Council [S/2003/1028], commented on the Secretary-General's report (above). It claimed that the Secretariat had departed from its neutrality and objectivity by deliberately misinterpreting Council resolution 1495(2003), failing to take into account the content of the resolution, the work done in preparation for its adoption and comments made following its adoption. It was incorrect to infer from that resolution that Morocco was expected to simply sign the Personal Envoy's plan and implement it. Morocco also took issue with the Secretariat's selective presentation and partial interpretation of its objections to the Personal Envoy's proposal. Morocco's reaction concerned the entire architecture of the proposed framework, which was more a product of the settlement plan—a plan Morocco described as unworkable—than of the quest for a third way, or a definitive political solution that would respect Morocco's sovereignty and territorial integrity. All of Morocco's objections were recorded and confirmed in its 10 March observations on the draft peace plan. Since the process of settling the Western Sahara question was at a crucial stage, Morocco called on the Council to assume its responsibilities by putting an end to the dangerous turn that the process had taken. In particular, it called for respecting the terms of resolution 1495(2003).

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (October)

On 28 October [meeting 4850], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1513 (2003). The draft [S/2003/1034] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous resolutions on Western Sahara, and reaffirming, in particular, resolution 1495 (2003) of 31 July 2003,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara until 31 January 2004;
2. Requests that the Secretary-General provide a report on the situation before the end of the present mandate;
3. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Communication. Algeria, on 28 October [S/2003/1045], affirmed its support for the peace plan and for the Council's decision to give Morocco a reprieve to reflect on its final response. It hoped that Morocco would follow POLISARIO's steps and choose to seize the opportunity that was offered.

Further developments. The new Special Representative for Western Sahara, Mr. de Soto, assumed his duties in Laayoune on 29 October and, in November, visited Rabat, Tindouf, Algiers and Nouakchott, where he had introductory meetings with officials of the Governments of Algeria, Mauritania and Morocco and of POLISARIO [S/2004/39]. He was in contact with ICRC officials regarding Moroccan prisoners of war and the fate of persons unaccounted for. With WFP and UNHCR officials, he discussed humanitarian assistance to the refugees in the Tindouf area and other issues.

On 23 December, the Personal Envoy met with a Moroccan delegation to discuss issues pertaining to Morocco's final response to resolution 1495(2003).

The civilian police component of MINURSO completed its mandated duties with the transfer of the Identification Commission files and materials to the United Nations Office at Geneva and was withdrawn from the Mission on 31 December.

On 7 November, POLISARIO announced the release of a further 300 Moroccan prisoners of war, who were repatriated to Morocco under ICRC auspices. That move left 613 such prisoners still in detention.

In November, UNHCR, in consultation with the Special Representative, submitted to Morocco and POLISARIO, and Algeria as the country of asylum, a detailed plan of action defining the modalities for the implementation of the exchange of family visits between the refugee camps in Tindouf and the Territory. In December, the Special Representative and UNHCR staff met in Geneva with POLISARIO representatives to discuss the proposed plan for the exchange of family visits and to seek activation of other confidence-building measures, namely telephone and mail services. POLISARIO reiterated its support for the measures as a package, while accepting that implementation could take place gradually. It expressed readiness to resume the UNHCR telephone service and to start the mail service under the terms proposed by UNHCR, which was, that mail would be collected and distributed by UNHCR on both sides. During discussions in Rabat on 19 December, the Moroccan authorities urged the Special Representative and UNHCR to work for the quick resumption of the telephone service between the camps and the Territory and supported mail service using the Moroccan postal service for the collection and distribution of mail in the Territory. UNHCR stressed the need for its unhindered access to the beneficiaries of the service and assurance of confidentiality of the mail and neutrality in its handling. Following consultations with the parties, UNHCR adjusted its initial plan for implementing confidence-building measures, taking into account the comments of Morocco, POLISARIO and Algeria. A new version of the plan of action for the confidence-building measures was submitted to the parties for their final consideration.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

The General Assembly had before it the Secretary-General's July report summarizing developments in Western Sahara from 1 July 2002 to 30 June 2003 [A/58/171].

On 9 December [meeting 72], the Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fourth (Special Political and Decolonization) Committee [A/58/480], adopted resolution 58/109 without vote [agenda item 19].

Question of Western Sahara

The General Assembly,

Having considered in depth the question of Western Sahara,

Reaffirming the inalienable right of all peoples to self-determination and independence, in accordance with the principles set forth in the Charter of the United Nations and General Assembly resolution 1514(XV) of 14 December 1960 containing the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

Recalling its resolution 57/135 of 11 December 2002, Recalling also all resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council on the question of Western Sahara,

Recalling further Security Council resolutions 658 (1990) of 27 June 1990 and 690(1991) of 29 April 1991, by which the Security Council approved the settlement plan for Western Sahara,

Recalling Security Council resolutions 1359(2001) of 29 June 2001 and 1429(2002) of 30 July 2002, as well as resolution 1495(2003) of 31 July 2003, in which the Council expressed its support of the peace plan for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara as an optimum political solution on the basis of agreement between the two parties,

Taking note of the responses of the parties and neighbouring States to the Personal Envoy of the Secretary-General, concerning the peace plan, contained in the report of the Secretary-General of 23 May 2003,

Reaffirming the responsibility of the United Nations towards the people of Western Sahara,

Noting with satisfaction the entry into force of the ceasefire in accordance with the proposal made by the Secretary-General, and stressing the importance it attaches to the maintenance of the ceasefire as an integral part of the settlement plan,

Underlining, in this regard, the validity of the settlement plan, while noting the fundamental differences between the parties in its implementation,

Stressing that the lack of progress in the settlement of the dispute on Western Sahara continues to cause suffering to the people of Western Sahara, remains a source of potential instability in the region and obstructs the economic development of the Maghreb region and that, in view of this, the search for a political solution is critically needed,

Welcoming the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Personal Envoy in search of a mutually acceptable political solution, which will provide for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara,

Having examined the relevant chapter of the report of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

Having also examined the report of the Secretary-General,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General;
2. Underlines Security Council resolution 1495 (2003), in which the Council expressed its support of the peace plan for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara as an optimum political solution on the basis of agreement between the two parties;

3. Continues to support strongly the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Personal Envoy in order to achieve a mutually acceptable political solution to the dispute over Western Sahara;

4. Commends the Secretary-General and his Personal Envoy for their outstanding efforts and the two parties for the spirit of cooperation they have shown in the support they provide for those efforts;

5. Calls upon all the parties and the States of the region to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General and his Personal Envoy;

6. Reaffirms the responsibility of the United Nations towards the people of Western Sahara;

7. Calls upon the parties to cooperate with the International Committee of the Red Cross in its efforts to solve the problem of the fate of the people unaccounted for, and calls upon the parties to abide by their obligations under international humanitarian law to release without further delay all those held since the start of the conflict;

8. Requests the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples to continue to consider the situation in Western Sahara and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its fifty-ninth session;

9. Invites the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-ninth session a report on the implementation of the present resolution.

MINURSO

In 2003, the military component of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO), which was under the command of Major General Gyorgy Száraz (Hungary), continued its functions of monitoring the ceasefire between the Royal Moroccan Army and the POLISARIO forces that came into effect in 1991 [YUN 1991, p. 796]. It maintained a strength of approximately 230 troops, its authorized size, throughout the year. The civilian police component, with an authorized strength of 26, was withdrawn at the end of the year, following completion of its mandated duties to protect the Identification Commission's files and documents, as those records were sent to the United Nations Office at Geneva for safe storage.

On 13 February [S/2003/192], the Secretary-General informed the Security Council of his intention to add Croatia, Mongolia and Sri Lanka to the list of countries providing military personnel to MINURSO. The Council took note of the intention on 18 February [S/2003/193].

MINURSO financing

The resumed fifty-seventh session of the General Assembly had before it the performance report on the MINURSO budget for 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002 [A/57/674]. Expenditures for the year totalled $39,090,500 (gross), against a total apportionment of $48,849,600, leaving an unencumbered balance of $9,759,100. The Secretary-General also submitted the MINURSO budget for 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004 [A/57/675 & Corr.1], which amounted to $44,239,400, inclusive of budgeted voluntary contributions in kind of $1,776,100.

Having reviewed those reports, ACABQ, in April [A/57/772/Add.2], recommended that $41,529,500 gross ($38,488,500 net) be appropriated for the maintenance of MINURSO for 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004 and that the amount be as-essed at a monthly rate of $3,460,792 gross ($3,207,375 net) should the Security Council decide to extend MINURSO's mandate beyond 31 May 2003.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 June [meeting 90], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/57/834], adopted resolution 57/331 without vote [agenda item 135].

Financing of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara

The General Assembly,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara and the related reports of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Recalling Security Council resolution 690(1991) of 29 April 1991, by which the Council established the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara, and the subsequent resolutions by which the Council extended the mandate of the Mission, the latest of which was resolution 1485(2003) of 30 May 2003,

Recalling also its resolution 45/266 of 17 May 1991 on the financing of the Mission and its subsequent resolutions and decisions thereon, the latest of which was resolution 56/298 of 27 June 2002,

Reaffirming the general principles underlying the financing of United Nations peacekeeping operations, as stated in General Assembly resolutions 1874(S-IV) of 27 June 1963, 3101(XXVII) of 11 December 1973 and 55/235 of 23 December 2000,

Noting with appreciation that voluntary contributions have been made to the Mission,

Mindful of the fact that it is essential to provide the Mission with the necessary financial resources to enable it to fulfil its responsibilities under the relevant resolutions of the Security Council,

1. Takes note of the status of contributions to the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara as at 31 March 2003, including the contributions outstanding in the amount of 48.1 million United States dollars, representing some 10 per cent of the total assessed contributions, notes with concern that only twenty-three Member States have paid their assessed contributions in full, and urges all other Member States, in particular those in arrears, to ensure payment of their outstanding assessed contributions;

2. Expresses its appreciation to those Member States which have paid their assessed contributions in full;

3. Expresses concern at the financial situation with regard to peacekeeping activities, in particular as regards the reimbursements to troop contributors that bear additional burdens owing to overdue payments by Member States of their assessments;

4. Urges all other Member States to make every possible effort to ensure payment of their assessed contributions to the Mission in full;

5. Expresses concern at the delay experienced by the Secretary-General in deploying and providing adequate resources to some recent peacekeeping missions, in particular those in Africa;

6. Emphasizes that all future and existing peacekeeping missions shall be given equal and non-discriminatory treatment in respect of financial and administrative arrangements;

7. Also emphasizes that all peacekeeping missions shall be provided with adequate resources for the effective and efficient discharge of their respective mandates;

8. Reiterates its request to the Secretary-General to make the fullest possible use of facilities and equipment at the United Nations Logistics Base at Brindisi, Italy, in order to minimize the costs of procurement for the Mission;

9. Endorses the conclusions and recommendations contained in the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, and requests the Secretary-General to ensure their full implementation without prejudice to a future discussion and decision on the proposal to create the post of Deputy Force Commander;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to take all necessary action to ensure that the Mission is administered with a maximum of efficiency and economy;

11. Also requests the Secretary-General, in order to reduce the cost of employing General Service staff, to continue efforts to recruit local staff for the Mission against General Service posts, commensurate with the requirements of the Mission;

Financial performance report for the period from 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002

12. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the financial performance of the Mission for the period from 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002;

Budget estimates for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004

13. Decides to appropriate to the Special Account for the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara the amount of 43,401,000 dollars for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004, inclusive of 41,529,500 dollars for the maintenance of the Mission, 1,433,100 dollars for the support account for peacekeeping operations and 438,400 dollars for the United Nations Logistics Base;

Financing of the appropriation

14. Decides also to apportion among Member States the amount of 43,401,000 dollars at a monthly rate of 3,616,750 dollars, in accordance with the levels set out in resolution 55/235, as adjusted by the General Assembly in its resolutions 55/236 of 23 December 2000 and 57/290 A of 20 December 2002, and taking into account the scale of assessments for 2003, as set out in its resolutions 55/5 B of 23 December 2000 and 57/4 B of 20 December 2002, and for 2004, subject to a decision of the Security Council to extend the mandate of the Mission;

15. Decides further that, in accordance with the provisions of its resolution 973(X) of 15 December 1955, there shall be set off against the apportionment among Member States, as provided for in paragraph 14 above, their respective share in the Tax Equalization Fund of 3,389,800 dollars at a monthly rate of 282,483 dollars, comprising the estimated staff assessment income of 3,041,000 dollars approved for the Mission, the prorated share of 322,900 dollars of the estimated staff assessment income approved for the support account and the prorated share of 25,900 dollars of the estimated staff assessment income approved for the United Nations Logistics Base;

16. Decides that for Member States that have fulfilled their financial obligations to the Mission, there shall be set off against their apportionment, as provided for in paragraph 14 above, their respective share of the unencumbered balance and of other income in the total amount of 12,289,500 dollars in respect of the financial period ended 30 June 2002, in accordance with the levels set out in resolution 55/235, as adjusted by the General Assembly in its resolutions 55/236 and 57/290 A, and taking into account the scale of assessments for 2002, as set out in its resolutions 55/5 B and 57/4 B;

17. Decides also that for Member States that have not fulfilled their financial obligations to the Mission, there shall be set off against their outstanding obligations their respective share of the unencumbered balance and other income in the total amount of 12,289,500 dollars in respect of the financial period ended 30 June 2002, in accordance with the scheme set out in paragraph 16 above;

18. Decides further that the decrease of 817,500 dollars in the estimated staff assessment income in respect of the financial period ended 30 June 2002 shall be set off against the credits from the amount referred to in paragraphs 16 and 17 above;

19. Emphasizes that no peacekeeping mission shall be financed by borrowing funds from other active peacekeeping missions;

20. Encourages the Secretary-General to continue to take additional measures to ensure the safety and security of all personnel under the auspices of the United Nations participating in the Mission;

21. Invites voluntary contributions to the Mission in cash and in the form of services and supplies acceptable to the Secretary-General, to be administered, as appropriate, in accordance with the procedure and practices established by the General Assembly;

22. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-eighth session the item entitled "Financing of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara".

Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

In 2003, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya informed the Security Council of the steps it had taken to comply with Council resolutions adopted in 1992 and 1993, by which the Council had imposed sanctions on Libya because of its failure to cooperate in establishing responsibility for the terrorist attacks against Pan Am flight 103 on 21 December 1988 and Union de transports aériens (UTA) flight 772 on 19 September 1989. The steps taken by Libya related to bringing to justice two suspects charged with the Pan Am flight 103 bombing over Lockerbie, Scotland, payment of compensation to the victims' families, and Libya's acceptance of responsibility for the actions of its officials. The Council decided in September to lift the sanctions, with immediate effect. In December, Libya announced that it was halting its programmes for developing weapons of mass destruction and agreed to sign a number of international treaties on fighting terrorism.

Lockerbie question

The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, on 20 January [A/37/716, S/2003/82], reacted to the 2 January decision of President George W. Bush of the United States to extend the comprehensive sanctions against Libya for a further year, beginning on 7 January. The sanctions included the freezing of Libyan assets in United States banks, the barring of Libyan students from advanced studies in the United States and a ban on the export to Libya of United States technical equipment. Libya expressed its displeasure at that measure, which it found in contradiction with events, particularly Libya's positive attitude with regard to improving relations between the two countries. Noting that the United States sanctions had been unilaterally applied since 1986, Libya said that Mr. Bush was linking them with the 1988 Pan Am 103 incident (see p. 1300) and with Libya's failure to comply with Security Council resolutions 731 (1992) [YUN 1992, p. 53], 748(1992) [ibid., p. 58] and 883(1993) [YUN 1993, p. 100]. Libya contended that it had complied with those resolutions and trusted that the United States would rescind its coercive measures.

On 15 August [S/2003/818], Libya informed the Council that the remaining issues relating to the fulfilment of all Council resolutions resulting from the Lockerbie incident had been resolved. It had facilitated bringing to justice the two suspects charged with the bombing of Pan Am flight 103 and accepted responsibility for the actions of its officials. It had cooperated with the Scottish investigating authorities before and during the trial and had arranged for payment of appropriate compensation. In addition, Libya was committed to cooperating in the international fight against terrorism.

The United Kingdom and the United States, referring to the Libyan statement in a letter of their own dated 15 August [S/2003/819], noted recent actions by Libya and said they were prepared to lift the measures set forth by the Council in resolutions 748(1992) and 883(1993) once the necessary compensation sums were transferred to the agreed escrow account.

Security Council consideration. On 9 and 12 September [meeting 4820, Parts I & II], the Security Council considered the 15 August letters from Libya and from the United Kingdom and the United States (above) concerning the Lockerbie question. The Council President observed that the bombing of Pan Am flight 103 over Lockerbie was an appalling act of terrorism which cost the lives of 270 people. Following painstaking negotiations, Libya had accepted responsibility and had agreed to pay a substantial sum of compensation to victims' relatives; in addition, it had agreed to cooperate with any further Lockerbie investigation and had renounced terrorism. Those actions opened the possibility of Libya moving back into the international community and of the lifting of sanctions. The President added that the Council needed to act unanimously on the question and that other related issues needed to be resolved; he therefore suggested that the Council adjourn for consultations. The Council voted unanimously in favour of that procedural motion and resumed its discussion on 12 September.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 12 September [meeting 4820, Part II], the Security Council adopted resolution 1506(2003) by vote (13-0-2). The draft [S/2003/824] was submitted by Bulgaria and the United Kingdom.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 731(1992) of 21 January 1992, 748(1992) of 31 March 1992, 883(1993) of 11 November 1993 and 1192(1998) of 27 August 1998 relating to the destruction of Pan Am flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland, and the destruction of Union de transports aériens flight 772 over Niger,

Recalling also the statement by its President of 8 April 1999,

Welcoming the letter dated 15 August 2003 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council recounting steps that the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya has taken to comply with the above-mentioned resolutions, particularly concerning acceptance of responsibility for the actions of Libyan officials, payment of appropriate compensation, renunciation of terrorism and a commitment to cooperating with any further requests for information in connection with the investigation,

Welcoming also the letter dated 15 August 2003 from the Permanent Representatives of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides to lift, with immediate effect, the measures set forth in paragraphs 4 to 6 of its resolution 748(1992) and paragraphs 3 to 7 of its resolution 883(1993);

2. Decides also to dissolve the Security Council Committee established pursuant to paragraph 9 of resolution 748(1992);

3. Decides further that it has concluded its consideration of the item entitled "Letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991, from France, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America", and hereby removes this item from the list of matters of which the Council is seized.

VOTE ON RESOLUTION 1506(2003):

In favour: Angola, Bulgaria, Cameroon, Chile, China, Germany, Guinea, Mexico, Pakistan, Russian Federation, Spain, Syrian Arab Republic, United Kingdom.

Against: None.

Abstaining: France, United States.

Following the vote, the United States acknowledged that Libya had addressed the UN requirements related to the Pan Am 103 bombing, accepting responsibility for the actions of its officials and making arrangements for paying compensation. However, the United States continued to have serious concerns about other aspects of Libyan behaviour, including its poor human rights record, its rejection of democratic norms and standards, its irresponsible behaviour in Africa, its history of involvement in terrorism and, in particular, its pursuit of weapons of mass destruction and their delivery.

The United Kingdom said that Libya, by accepting responsibility and agreeing to pay compensation, had met the requirements the Council had placed on it when imposing sanctions. It had also denounced terrorism, and, as a demonstration, had signed the 12 international conventions on the fight against terrorism.

France announced that an agreement had been reached on 11 September between the representatives of the families of those lost on UTA flight 772 and the Qaddafi Foundation. That had allowed France not to oppose the lifting of sanctions.

Communication. On 19 December [A/58/664, S/2003/1196], Libya said that during talks between Libyan, United States and United Kingdom experts concerning Libyan military activities, the Libyan experts briefed their counterparts on Libya's materials, equipment and programmes, such as centrifuges and containers for transporting chemicals that might be used to produce internationally banned weapons. Following those talks, Libya decided to eliminate such materials, equipment and programmes, thus ridding itself of all internationally proscribed weapons. Libya also decided to limit its missile activities to missiles with a range consistent with that agreed under the Missile Technology Control Regime. It would take such steps in a transparent manner that permitted verification, including immediate international monitoring.

Libya affirmed that it considered itself bound by the 1968 Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons [YUN 1968, p. 17], the Agreement on Safeguards of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) and the 1971 Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production and Stockpiling of Bacteriological (Biological) and Toxin Weapons and on Their Destruction [YUN 1971, p. 19] and that it accepted any other commitments, including the Model Protocol Additional to the Safeguards Agreement, approved by the IAEA Board of Governors in 1997 [YUN 1997, p. 486], and the Convention.

Libya believed that the arms race was conducive neither to its own security nor to that of the region and ran counter to its strong desire for a peaceful world. Through its unilateral initiative, Libya wished to encourage all countries to follow its example, starting with those of the Middle East region.

Press statement. In a 23 December press statement [SC/7967], Security Council members took note of Libya's 19 December letter announcing that it would abandon voluntarily its programmes for developing weapons of mass destruction (WMDs). They welcomed Libya's announcement and its recognition of the strength of the international community's concerns over WMD proliferation and its voluntary decision to address those concerns. Council members looked forward to an early implementation of all the commitments made in the announcement, including the subjection to urgent international verification. In that context, they welcomed and encouraged Libya's cooperation with others, including the United Nations and other relevant international bodies, to ensure the verified elimination of all its WMD programmes.

1986 attack against Libya

The General Assembly, by decision 58/512 of 10 November, deferred consideration of the item "Declaration of the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity on the aerial and naval military attack against the Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya by the present United States Administration in April 1986 and included it in the provisional agenda of its fifty-ninth (2004) session.

Angola

Within a year of the signing of a memorandum of understanding between the Angolan Government and the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA), Angola was firmly placed on the path of political, social and economic recovery. For the first time since independence in 1975 [YUN 1975, p. 853], Angolans could live without fear of a recurrent war. The AU Executive Council (Ndjamena, Chad, 3-6 March)

[A/57/775] lifted its sanctions against UNITA, as the Security Council had done by resolution 1448(2002) in December 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 232].

During 2003, the Government and UNITA held discussions on the structure of the new Government and agreement was reached on a basic outline. Some other political parties did not support those decisions, however, claiming that the bilateral talks had circumvented them. The Government announced that the next general elections would take place in 2004, but other parties believed that the time frame was insufficient for proper preparations.

The United Nations Mission in Angola (UNMA) continued to assist with the reintegration of ex-combatants, coordination of humanitarian assistance, support for mine action and protection of human rights. The Secretary-General reported that UNMA had completed its political mandate and called for the UN Resident Coordinator to take over the responsibility for UN system activities in Angola at the completion of the UNMA mandate on 15 February.

Political developments

Report of Secretary-General. The Secretary-General, in response to Security Council resolution 1433(2002) [YUN 2002, p. 224], submitted a 7 February report on UNMA [S/2003/158], covering developments in Angola since his previous report of December 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 225] and making recommendations on the future role of the United Nations in that country.

The Secretary-General recalled that UNMA's mandate, as laid out in resolution 1433(2002), by which the Mission was established, was to assist the parties in the consolidation of peace. He reported that there was a consensus between the Government and UNITA that the implementation of the 1994 Lusaka Protocol for the Cessation of Hostilities and the Resolution of Outstanding Military Issues [YUN 1994, p. 346] had been completed. Those two actors, along with other political parties and members of civil society, had since been engaged in identifying the priorities to move the country from a state of armed conflict towards normalcy.

The political commissions of the ruling party, Movimento Popular da Libertação de Angola (MPLA), and UNITA held high-level talks in Luanda from 2 to 5 December 2002 to discuss issues of national interest, in particular a review of the Constitution. They agreed on four main issues, namely, that the President should remain head of State and Government, as well as party leader, the President would appoint provincial Governors on the recommendation of the majority party in each province, the legislature would be unicameral, and a National Council would be established in addition to the legislature, as a consultative body in which "traditional rulers" could participate. Some other political parties did not support those conclusions, however, arguing that the bilateral agreements between MPLA and UNITA had circumvented the Parliament's Constitution Drafting Committee, in which other parties were represented.

President José Eduardo dos Santos appointed the Minister of the Interior, Fernando da Piedade Dias dos Santos, as the new Prime Minister of the Government of Unity and National Reconciliation on 5 December 2002 and the Cabinet was named. Some opposition parties and members of civil society felt that the new Cabinet did not represent sufficient change. The National Assembly approved the $6 billion budget for 2003 that was submitted by the new Government; UNITA abstained in the vote, stating that it had not been consulted beforehand.

The Government indicated that the next general elections would take place in 2004; however, some MPLA and UNITA representatives said the necessary conditions did not yet exist. They proposed postponing the elections by one or two years to allow time to achieve national objectives such as revising the Constitution, elaborating a new electoral law, establishing an independent electoral commission, registering eligible voters and resettling or returning internally displaced persons and ex-combatants. Some representatives from both parties, however, felt that elections should be held as soon as possible. President dos Santos promised to pursue a national consensus on fixing the date for the next general elections.

UNMA activities

UNMA continued to implement its mandated tasks, which included support for the reintegration of ex-combatants, the facilitation and coordination of humanitarian assistance, the provision of technical support for mine action and the protection and promotion of human rights.

The demobilization, resettlement and reintegration of UNITA ex-combatants was one of the Government's main priorities to ensure stability. By the end of January, approximately 90,000 ex-combatants had been registered, and an estimated 15,000 were waiting to move to their designated reception areas from the provinces and neighbouring countries. Owing to operational problems, however, the registration process was halted. Among factors that hindered the demobilization, resettlement and reintegration process was a politicized ex-combatant population, which was not always cooperative with the authorities. A lack of adequate facilities, inaccessible roads, mine infestation and inadequately prepared resettlement areas had added considerably to delays. A further difficulty was that government payments to ex-combatants had been irregular and not universal. About 20 per cent of ex-combatants were still waiting to be included on the payroll. Some communities had expelled resettled ex-combatants, forcing them to return to reception areas. Despite the Government's announced intention to close all reception areas by the end of 2002, only four had been closed by reporting time and 34 were still open. The Government estimated that it could take up to one year to transfer the remaining ex-combatants and their dependants from their current locations to the more than 600 areas designated for resettlement.

UNMA continued to play a coordinating role, including by ensuring that information on ex-combatants gathered by the Angolan Armed Forces during the disarmament phase was shared with the civilian institutions that provided social services. The Technical Group on demobilization, resettlement and reintegration, under the chairmanship of UNMA, integrated and coordinated the activities of the UN system in Angola. It worked with the World Bank, which was preparing to fund a multi-donor resettlement programme to cover the demobilization of some 167,000 and the payment of reintegration benefits to 108,000 ex-combatants.

Although the humanitarian situation in the country had become more stable since late 2002, the need for emergency assistance remained pressing in many parts of Angola. Approximately 1.8 million people, including ex-combatants and their family members, required food assistance to survive, and that number was expected to increase until the April harvest. Mortality rates remained at emergency levels, particularly in remote locations. The onset of seasonal rains and mine incidents had severely affected humanitarian operations.

The end of hostilities had led to major population movements. During 2002, 1.3 million internally displaced persons returned to 500 communities and 85,000 refugees spontaneously returned from neighbouring countries. Basic conditions were in place in 30 per cent of the return sites. According to the Government, 2.8 million people were displaced at the beginning of 2003, and as many as 400,000 refugees remained in neighbouring countries. It was expected that some 1.2 million internally displaced persons, ex-combatants and refugees would return to their areas of origin during 2003. UN assistance was focused on reducing poverty and creating the conditions for sustainable development. Other areas that received UN support included mine action, promotion and protection of human rights, child protection and development activities.

The Secretary-General reported that UNMA had completed its mandated political tasks, as set out in resolution 1433(2002) [YUN 2002, p. 224]. However, the residual tasks foreseen in that resolution, including in the areas of human rights, mine action, reintegration and resettlement of ex-combatants, humanitarian assistance, economic recovery and electoral assistance, required continued attention and support, for which financing was needed. In that context, the Secretary-General requested his Special Representative to consult with Angola and other national and international stakeholders to determine how the United Nations could continue to assist the Government and people in the consolidation of peace in the country. Those discussions took place in Luanda from 18 January to 1 February. As a result, the Secretary-General proposed that the UN Resident Coordinator resume the responsibility for UN activities in the country upon the conclusion of the UNMA mandate on 15 February, including assisting the Government's efforts to implement the residual tasks under resolution 1433(2002). The Office of the Resident Coordinator would be strengthened for that transitional period by adding a unit under his supervision to address the residual tasks, for which additional resources might be required.

The Security Council President, in a 12 February press statement [SC/7660-APR/562], said that Council members welcomed the steps taken by the Angolan Government towards the full implementation of the Lusaka Protocol. They welcomed the Secretary-General's report on the completion of UNMA on 15 February, and commended his Special Representative in Angola, Ibrahim A. Gambari, for his efforts to bring that phase of the UN involvement in Angola to a conclusion.

Financing of UNAVEM/MONUA

On 17 April, the Secretary-General submitted the final performance report of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission (UNAVEM) and the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola (MONUA). The former's mandate expired in 1997 [YUN 1997, p. 103], when it was transformed into the latter, whose mandate expired in 1999 [YUN 1999, p. 106]. The report contained information on income and expenditure, assets, outstanding liabilities and reserves and fund balances as at 30 June 2002, when net cash (assets less liabilities) for UNAVEM/MONUA totalled $54,658,000. That amount plus uncollected assessments and other receivables in the amount of $60,434,000 brought the fund balance to $115,092,000. The Secretary-General recommended that an amount of $12,458,000 be retained from the balance of appropriations to meet the cost of outstanding government claims. In the light of the overall financial situation of the Organization and the fact that assessed contributions to peacekeeping as at 15 March in the amount of $1.5 billion remained unpaid, he recommended that the return of cash available for credit to Member States be suspended until the financial situation improved.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 June [meeting 90], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee [A/57/830], adopted resolution 57/329 without vote [agenda item 131].

Financing of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission and the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission and the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

1. Authorizes the Secretary-General to retain an amount of 12,458,000 United States dollars from the balance of appropriations of 72,831,000 dollars to meet the cost of outstanding Government claims;

2. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-eighth session the item entitled "Financing of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission and the United Nations Observer Mission in Angola".

Other questions

Cooperation between the AU and the UN system

The United Nations and the African Union (AU) continued to cooperate in many areas, especially regarding the conflict situations and threats to peace and security in Africa. The AU forwarded to the United Nations the decisions and statements of its various bodies on African political issues [S/2003/142, A/57/775, S/2003/654, S/2003/760, S/2003/876, A/58/626], including those concerning Angola, Burundi, Côte d'Ivoire, the Central African Republic, the DRC, Liberia, Rwanda, Somalia and the Sudan (see above under relevant country headings). Other decisions or statements concerned the Comoros, Madagascar, Mauritania and Sao Tome and Principe (see below), and the broader issues of terrorism in Africa, combating corruption, defence and security, and democracy and good governance.

Comoros

With regard to the Comoros, the AU Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution, at a meeting held at the level of heads of State and Government (Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, 3 February) [S/2003/142], took note of the outcome of the ministerial meeting of the countries of the region and the Troika (Mozambique, South Africa, Zambia) (Moroni, Comoros, 28-29 January) and endorsed its recommendations. It called on the Comorian parties to cooperate in implementing those recommendations, in particular the holding of legislative elections according to the timetable proposed by the Follow-up Committee of the Fomboni Agreement of 17 February 2001, in order to complete the process of establishing institutions of the Union of the Comoros, including the National Assembly, Assemblies of the islands and the Constitutional Court.

The Fomboni Agreement (the Framework Agreement for Reconciliation in the Comoros) between the Government and separatist leaders outlined a plan for decentralizing political power in the Comoros. It provided for a new Comorian State with a new Constitution and institutions. The establishment of the new State was accepted by a referendum in December 2001, and an interim Government of transition was established in January 2002.

The AU Executive Council, at its third ordinary session (Maputo, Mozambique, 4-8 July) [A/58/626], expressed concern at the difficulties encountered in implementing the Fomboni Agreement and reiterated that it remained the appropriate framework for resolving the crisis in the Comoros. Taking note of the results of the official visit to South Africa on 20 June of the three Presidents of the autonomous islands of the Comoros, the Executive Council encouraged the Ministerial Committee of the countries of the region and the Troika to pursue their efforts to resolve all outstanding issues in order to pave the way for legislative elections.

Madagascar

The AU Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution, held at the level of heads of State and Government (Addis Ababa, 3 February) [S/2003/142], took note of the evolution of the situation in Madagascar and recommended that the AU Assembly recognize Marc Ravalomanana as the legitimate President of Madagascar. It underscored the need for national reconciliation to create conditions for lasting peace and stability and requested the engagement of the Government and the Malagasy parties, including through the convening of a round table to address all outstanding issues related to human rights, the rule of law and the issue of political detainees.

The AU Assembly also adopted a decision on Madagascar at its second ordinary session (Maputo, 10-12 July) [A/58/626]. The Assembly endorsed the Central Organ's decision and decided that Madagascar should resume its seat within the AU. It encouraged the Government to continue its policy of national reconciliation.

Mauritania

The AU Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution, at its ninety-second ordinary session (Addis Ababa, 12-13 June) [S/2003/654], condemned the attempted coup d'état that took place in Mauritania on 8 June, which was in flagrant contradiction with the principles of the AU Constitutive Act and with relevant AU declarations and decisions. It expressed satisfaction that constitutional order had been restored and appealed to the people of Mauritania to respect that order and uphold democratic principles.

Sao Tome and Principe

The AU Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution, in a communiqué issued after its ninety-third ordinary session (Addis Ababa, 24 July) [S/2003/760], condemned the coup d'état that took place in Sao Tome and Principe on 16 July and welcomed the successful resolution of the crisis through the restoration of constitutional order and the return of the elected President, Fradique de Menezes, thanks to international mediation by representatives of the Economic Community of Central African States (ECCAS), the AU, the Community of Portuguese-speaking Countries and Nigeria. The Central Organ expressed grave concern over the resurgence of coups d'état on the continent.

Chapter III

Americas

In 2003, the United Nations continued its assistance to countries in the Americas region in their efforts to strengthen political stability, security and judicial reform, human rights, demilitarization and the strengthening of civilian power, indigenous rights and socio-economic development. The Organization monitored the political and security situation in Central America, where signs of fragmentation and personalism in political parties had fostered alliances that sought short-term political gain to the detriment of consensus-building around key policy issues.

The United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala (MINUGUA) continued to fulfil its mandate of verifying compliance with the 1996 peace accords between the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca, and to monitor compliance with the 2000-2004 verification timetable. Implementation of the accords fell short of expectations as progress was overshadowed by a worsening public security situation, persistent corruption, setbacks in the fight against impunity and an ongoing climate of intimidation against justice officials and human rights defenders. However, elections were held successfully in December and the General Assembly extended MINUGUA's mandate for the final time, until 31 December 2004.

In Haiti, despite efforts by the Organization of American States and the Caribbean Community Secretariat, the political and security crisis continued. By late 2003, a newly united opposition movement was calling for the President's resignation. The UN system continued its long-term programme of support for the country.

On 13 February, the Security Council condemned a bomb attack in Bogotá, Colombia, and urged all States to work together and to cooperate with and provide support and assistance to the Colombian authorities in their efforts to find and bring to justice the perpetrators, organizers and sponsors of that terrorist attack. The Council expressed its reinforced determination to combat all forms of terrorism.

In November, the Assembly again called on States to refrain from promulgating laws that imposed economic and trade measures on other States, such as the ongoing United States economic embargo against Cuba.

Central America

In response to General Assembly resolution 57/160 [YUN 2002, p. 241], the Secretary-General submitted an August report on the situation in Central America [A/58/270], focusing in particular on efforts to overcome the aftermath of the conflicts of the 1980s and to build equitable, democratic and peaceful societies. The report also provided information on the work of the UN system on the isthmus since September 2002 and on implementation of the 1996 Guatemala Agreement [YUN 1996, p. 168].

The Secretary-General stated that electoral processes in El Salvador and Guatemala in 2003 had brought key actors in both countries' civil wars closer than ever to executive responsibilities at the national level since the signing of the respective peace agreements. El Salvador's peaceful and orderly municipal and legislative elections on 16 March transformed the party of the former insurgent movement, Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional (FMLN), into the country's leading political force. However, voter absenteeism reached 60 per cent, and organizational and voter-counting problems confirmed the urgent need for electoral reform. Leading up to Guatemala's national elections (9 November and 28 December), a voter registration drive was launched to counter the historically low participation, particularly among indigenous people. However, congress was unable to obtain the two-thirds majority required to approve an Electoral and Political Parties Law that would have expanded opportunities for participation, particularly by members of the Mayan, Xinka and Garifuna indigenous groups. The Supreme Electoral Tribunal and the Supreme Court of Justice upheld the ban on retired General Efraín Ríos Montt registering as a presidential candidate. However, the ban was subsequently overturned by the Constitutional Court. That ruling prompted an outcry by human rights representatives and many sectors of the population and was received with concern by the international community in Guatemala. The retired General, founder of the ruling Frente Republicano Guatemalteco, was the top military commander at the peak of the civil war, which resulted in the violent deaths of 200,000 people. In a positive step, representatives of the political parties signed on 10 July the Ethical-Political Agreement on the electoral process and a declaration of commitment to the peace agreements.

Efforts to improve the human rights situation in Central America continued to be affected by the lack of sufficient budgetary allocations to the leading national human rights institutions and deficiencies in the way States addressed the pervasive problem of common crime. In Guatemala, a climate of intimidation clouded efforts to enhance the human rights situation and to fight impunity. In March, the Guatemalan Government and the Human Rights Ombudsman's Office reached an agreement to establish the Commission for the Investigation of Illegal Groups and Clandestine Security Apparatuses, with the participation of the United Nations and the Organization of American States (OAS). The Secretary-General was considering recommendations from an exploratory technical mission that he had sent to assess the viability of such a commission and to determine the conditions for possible UN participation. The Ombudsman's Office continued to face challenges but showed encouraging signs of reorganization and strengthening under new leadership. However, the reform process was still hindered by low budgetary allocations and excessive reliance on international cooperation to finance reforms. The common element in the threats and attacks reported in Guatemala had been the lack of results in official investigations; the State's institutional response had been isolated and limited and progress in combating impunity was fragile. The Guatemalan National Civil Police was significantly weakened by lack of resources, and the Government responded to the growing crime problem by resorting to the army for joint operations.

In El Salvador, civil society and its organizations were becoming more mature in the defence, promotion and fulfilment of human rights. The Ombudsman's Office continued to be underfunded and remained isolated from other related State institutions. A new Human Rights Division of the Salvadoran National Civil Police had yet to develop significantly, and the resolution of criminal cases continued to be low. In Honduras, the rate of extrajudicial killings of children remained high and, according to the Public Ministry, there were 74 cases against officials regarding such killings. The proliferation of largely unregistered firearms in the country posed a threat to public security, and an initiative that gave carriers three months to hand over illegal firearms had been met with a lukewarm response. However, the crime rate had decreased as a result of joint police and armed forces operations. The large number of private security companies and the increased participation in citizen security committees had raised concerns about the State's control of such activities. In Nicaragua, the Government had launched an initiative to improve public security, which included investing in crime prevention and working closely with local communities. Also, efforts to modernize the National Police had met with significant success.

In the area of judicial reform and the rule of law, countries in the region had taken important steps to establish a more transparent justice sector. In Honduras and Nicaragua, new criminal procedure codes had introduced significant advances. In El Salvador, on the other hand, the codes still required a full review. However, measures to improve access to prompt and due justice still fell short of expectations, particularly for the indigenous population and the rural poor of the region. Penitentiary system reforms had made little headway and high levels of pre-trial detentions continued to result in overcrowding and lawlessness in prisons. On 5 April, a massacre in a Honduras prison claimed 69 lives, exposing the need for an overhaul of the penitentiary system. In further efforts to strengthen public safety in the region, the Central American countries held the Special Summit on Regional Security (Belize City, 4 September) and the Special Summit on Security (Guatemala City, 17 July).

In the area of good governance, efforts were made to tackle corruption in the region. On 12 December 2002, Nicaragua's National Assembly had stripped former President Arnoldo Alemán, implicated in a $100 million corruption scandal, of his parliamentary immunity; Mr. Alemán was subsequently convicted of money-laundering. Nicaragua also established a multi-donor trust fund to support the fight against corruption, created a Public Ethics Office within the Presidency, advanced the implementation of the Integrated Financial Management System for real-time monitoring of budget execution, began discussing a bill to regulate the transfer of resources from the central budget to the municipalities, and was using foreign financial support to improve the internal audit capacity of its institutions and municipalities. In El Salvador, the Legislative Assembly approved a law reforming the Government's auditing agency, the Court of Accounts. In Honduras, the Comptroller General's Office and the Board of Administrative Integrity were replaced by the Superior Court of Accounts, and the National Congress elected the Court's three members. However, that process was criticized for lack of transparency. The Honduras National Anticorruption Council was limited in its ability to carry out its mandate, owing to the absence of the relevant organic law. In a positive development, Honduras undertook an international audit of the military institute and related companies, which forged a closer relationship between the armed forces and civil society. Guatemala's 2003 budget law came slightly closer than in the previous year to realizing its institutional requirements to carry out the peace agreements but remained insufficient for any significant expansion or improvement in the services required of ministries, secretariats and the other government institutions. New accusations surfaced regarding corruption and influence of drug trafficking and organized crime in Guatemala's governmental spheres; in January, the United States announced that it had decertified Guatemala as a cooperative ally in the fight against illegal drugs.

According to the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean, the gross domestic product (GDP) of Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras and Nicaragua grew by 1.9 per cent, but the per capita GDP fell by 0.46 per cent. The 2003 human development index of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), calculated on the basis of life expectancy, adult literacy, level of schooling and per capita GDP, placed the Central American countries, except Costa Rica, in the category of nations with "medium human development"; Costa Rica was classified as a country with "high human development". In January, Central American ministers met with the United States Trade Representative to launch negotiations on the Central America Free Trade Agreement. In addition, talks regarding the Canada-Central America Four Free Trade Agreement, involving Canada, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras and Nicaragua, were ongoing. Negotiations on a Central American common customs union continued and a mechanism for trade dispute resolution was approved. On 2 June, in Washington, D.C., delegates of the eight countries involved in the Puebla-Panama Plan—a comprehensive initiative for regional integration and development [YUN 2001, p. 240]—adopted a strategy for the implementation of the Mesoamerican Initiative for Sustainable Development.

The Central American Integration System (SICA) continued to promote regional coordination. The Nineteenth Ministerial Conference on Political Dialogue and Economic Cooperation between the European Union (EU) and SICA (Panama City, 12 May) acknowledged the importance of civil society's participation in strengthening EU-Central America relations, agreed that meetings of the civil society forums in each region should be encouraged, and stated their intention to work on the definition of international forums and mechanisms for consultation on topics such as the peaceful solution of conflicts, the fight against drugs and terrorism. The first round of negotiations of the Political Dialogue and Cooperation Agreement was held in Panama from 13 to 15 May. The OAS Inter-American Committee against Terrorism held its third regular session (San Salvador, El Salvador, 22-24 January), during which the Secretary-General of SICA informed participants of anti-terrorism actions taken by Central American countries. El Salvador ratified the 2002 Inter-American Convention against Terrorism and Nicaragua adhered in June. Costa Rica and Peru signed a letter of understanding relating to the inter-American fight against corruption. The XI Institutionalized Ministerial Meeting between the Rio Group (of Latin American and Caribbean States) and the EU (Athens, Greece, 28 March) discussed EU-Rio Group relations and social cohesion and democratic governance in the new economic environment. The Rio Group, at its XVII Summit of Heads of State and Government (Cuzco, Peru, 23-24 May), adopted the "Cuzco Consensus", a strategic agenda for overcoming poverty and social exclusion and covering democratic governance, cultural identity and external relations, as well as the promotion of a free and fair international trade system. Signatories of the Consensus agreed to hold a special meeting within the framework of the General Assembly's fifty-eighth (2003) session.

Border disputes between Central American countries continued their course in the International Court of Justice (see PART FOUR, Chapter I) and OAS facilitated progress in the Guatemala/Belize boundary dispute. The Secretary-General stated that it was encouraging that bilateral disputes were increasingly finding resolution through established international channels.

The United Nations continued to support the process of peace-building and development in Central America. On 29 May, El Salvador submitted an inventory of the armaments of its armed forces. FMLN, in an 8 July letter to the Secretary-General, confirmed its decision to lift its reservation regarding the permanent character of the armed forces, and its recognition of the role that the armed forces currently fulfilled and the transformation of its doctrine, vision, values and organization. In Guatemala, the United Nations continued to verify compliance with the 1996 Agreement on a Firm and Lasting Peace [YUN 1996, p. 168]. Progress in implementation of the Agreement fell short of expectations and was insufficient to inject needed momentum into the peace process. Advances were recorded in such areas as legislation against discrimination, the re-deployment of military units and the development of a national reparations programme for the victims of human rights violations committed during the armed conflict. However, setbacks occurred in key areas of human rights, demilitarization and the fight against impunity. At the Consultative Group for Guatemala meeting (Guatemala City, 13-14 May), organized by the Inter-American Development Bank, participants agreed that the peace agreements should remain Guatemala's essential road map for development.

UNDP partnered with Central American countries to respond to natural disasters and to ensure continuity after humanitarian relief by putting in place early recovery initiatives. In Guatemala, UNDP's project on an early flood-warning system in the valleys of Madre Vieja River, implemented by the National Coordinator for Disaster Reduction, was helping to reduce risks and sustain human development among highly vulnerable communities. In Honduras, the UN system strengthened its strategic contribution to the development of rural society, and supported risk management, fortification of prevention measures, handling the hydrographic river basins, sustainable rural development, inter-institutional support to the forest sector and decentralization. By March, UNDP, through a capacity-building project in Nicaragua, had trained 86 local authorities and community members in disaster risk management.

The Secretary-General observed that concerted efforts would be required to ensure that all Central American countries and all segments of their populations benefited from new arrangements such as the Central American Free Trade Association and the Puebla-Panama Plan. Only by promoting inclusion at the political, socio-economic and cultural levels would the region achieve peaceful, democratic and just societies, and the United Nations and the international community should continue to accompany the Central American countries in their efforts to reach those goals.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 23 December [meeting 79], the General Assembly adopted resolution 58/239 [draft: A/58/L.38 & Add.1] without vote [agenda item 26].

The situation in Central America: progress in fashioning a region of peace, freedom, democracy and development

The General Assembly,

Recalling its relevant resolutions in which it requests the Secretary-General, the United Nations system and the international community to give the Central American peoples the fullest possible support and assistance for the maintenance and strengthening of peace, democracy and sustainable development, as well as the relevant Security Council resolutions,

Reaffirming all its relevant resolutions in which it stresses the importance of international economic, financial and technical cooperation and support, both bilateral and multilateral, aimed at promoting the economic and social development of Central America with a view to supplementing the efforts of the Central American peoples and Governments to consolidate peace and democracy,

Reaffirming also the close link and interaction between peace, democracy and sustainable development, as fundamental and permanent pillars of the political action of the Central American Governments aimed at realizing the legitimate aspirations of the Central American peoples with regard to economic development and social justice,

Recognizing that peace and democracy in Central America are the outcome of a long and arduous process in which obstacles have been encountered but have been overcome through the efforts of the peoples and Governments of the region, with the assistance and cooperation of the United Nations system and the international community,

Commending the efforts of the Central American Governments to continue fulfilling the commitments they have assumed under national, regional and international agreements with a view to strengthening democratic governance in the region by promoting and protecting human rights, implementing social programmes designed to eradicate poverty and eliminate unemployment, improving public safety, strengthening the judiciary, consolidating a modern and transparent public administration and combating corruption,

Taking note of the existence throughout Central America of freely elected Governments, indicating the achievement of political, economic and social changes that are creating a climate conducive to the promotion of economic growth and advancement towards the further development of democratic, just and equitable societies,

Emphasizing, in this context, the importance of the progress made in connection with the Central American Integration System, the Alliance for the Sustainable Development of Central America, the establishment of the regional social policy contained in the Treaty on Central American Social Integration and the Framework Treaty on Democratic Security in Central America, and in other areas,

Noting with satisfaction the progress made in the region in the search for peaceful solutions to existing territorial and border disputes, in accordance with the principles of public international law and the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations,

Recognizing that the slow development of the economies of the area has been aggravated in the past two years by an unfavourable international economic climate, which has had an adverse effect on the efforts of the peoples and Governments of the region to promote sustainable economic development in an efficient manner,

Recognizing with satisfaction the progress made by the Central American region in the promotion and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, and the obligation of States to continue guaranteeing their effective enjoyment,

Recognizing the efforts of the region to enhance public safety by taking steps to combat the illicit trade in small arms and light weapons, by arms limitation and control, and by combating transnational organized crime and terrorism,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the situation in Central America;

2. Commends the efforts of the peoples and Governments of the Central American countries to consolidate peace and democracy and promote sustainable development by implementing the commitments adopted at the meetings and summit meetings held in the region;

3. Recognizes the progress made towards the implementation of the peace agreements in the region, and in that context reiterates its special appreciation and congratulations to the people and Government of El Salvador for the successful fulfilment of the commitments set forth in those agreements, and expresses its profound thanks to the Secretary-General for accompanying that process and for the commendable way in which he has carried out his verification work, which is considered to be completed;

4. Urges the Government of Guatemala to give renewed impetus to the fulfilment of the commitments contained in the peace agreements, in the context of reprogramming for the period 2001-2004, and to the understanding reached during the fifth meeting of the Consultative Group for Guatemala, organized by the Inter-American Development Bank and held in Guatemala City on 13 and 14 May 2003;

5. Urges the Governments of the region to continue to guarantee free, fair and transparent elections with a view to consolidating democracy in Central America;

6. Commends the efforts and actions undertaken in the region to combat the scourge of corruption, urges all the States of the area to continue their actions with a view to eradicating that evil, and in that context takes note of the congratulations expressed in the report of the Secretary-General with regard to the work done by the Government of Nicaragua in this field;

7. Views with satisfaction the approval of important reforms relating to the conduct of public affairs and judicial matters in Central America, and in that context expresses special satisfaction concerning the progress made in Honduras towards completion of the political transformation process initiated in September 2001, and urges the Central American Governments to redouble their efforts with a view to strengthening those areas even further;

8. Urges Member States to continue combining efforts to adapt, strengthen and promote even further the Central American integration process, and appeals to the international community to continue supporting that process in order to contribute to the sustainable development of the region;

9. Notes with satisfaction the progress made by the Central American Governments in the peaceful settlement of their territorial and border disputes, and strongly urges them to continue working to resolve outstanding issues in full compliance with the norms of international law and the relevant international decisions and judgements;

10. Emphasizes the importance of foreign trade for the development of Central America, and in this context stresses the value of negotiating balanced free-trade agreements between the region and its counterparts outside the region;

11. Reaffirms the importance of the Puebla-Panama Plan as a means of promoting the economic and social development of the Mesoamerican region, and recognizes in that connection the progress made in implementing the Plan;

12. Urges the Governments of the Central American countries to continue strengthening the institutions responsible for the promotion and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, thus helping to ensure their full and effective enjoyment by all the peoples of the region;

13. Appeals to the Central American Governments to continue their efforts to combat the illicit trade in small arms and light weapons, promote arms limitation and control and combat transnational organized crime and terrorism by fulfilling the obligations assumed in the relevant international agreements;

14. Appreciates the efforts of the Central American countries to strengthen public safety in the area by organizing summit meetings on that issue, such as the Special Summit on Regional Security, held in Belize City on 4 September 2003, and the Special Summit on Security, held in Guatemala City on 17 July 2003;

15. Welcomes the efforts made to strengthen civilian police forces and promote the demilitarization of the region, in particular the actions taken in the context of the regional plan to combat organized crime, and emphasizes the need for the international community to continue lending its support to the relevant institutions in the field of public safety;

16. Takes note with satisfaction of the intention of the Government of Guatemala to establish a Commission for the Investigation of Illegal Groups and Clandestine Security Apparatuses, and urges the Secretary-General to support that initiative with a view to its prompt implementation;

17. Appreciates the initiative of the Government of Nicaragua relating to the programme for arms limitation and control in Central America to achieve a reasonable balance of forces and to foster stability, mutual trust and transparency, which will be implemented in the region in accordance with the established schedule;

18. Emphasizes the need for the international community, especially the organs, funds and programmes of the United Nations system and the donor community, to continue their cooperation with and assistance to the Central American countries, including the provision of bilateral and multilateral financial resources, with the aim of supporting the promotion of sustainable development and the consolidation of peace, freedom and democracy in the region;

19. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to lend his fullest support to the initiatives and activities of the Central American Governments, in particular their efforts to consolidate democracy through the promotion of integration and the implementation of a comprehensive sustainable development programme and to submit to the General Assembly a complete consolidated report on the implementation of all the relevant resolutions on Central America at its sixtieth session, under the item entitled "The situation in Central America: progress in fashioning a region of peace, freedom, democracy and development", and decides that, henceforth, the item will be considered every two years.

On 17 December, the Assembly adopted resolution 58/117 (see p. 950) on international assistance to and cooperation with the Alliance for the Sustainable Development of Central America.

Guatemala

Although progress in Guatemala's peace process fell short of expectations in 2003, peaceful elections took place in December. Advances included the approval of a reparations programme for victims of human rights violations committed during the armed conflict, the partial redeployment of the military in conformity with peacetime needs and the passage of legislation that penalized discrimination, stipulated that public services should be provided in indigenous languages, broadened protection of the rights of children and created civilian service as an alternative to mandatory military service. However, too many governmental initiatives were inconclusive or limited in relation to the magnitude of the problems they sought to address. Advances were overshadowed in the public eye by the worsening public security situation, persistent corruption, obstacles in the fight against impunity and an ongoing climate of intimidation against justice officials and human rights defenders.

The United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala (MINUGUA) (see below) continued to verify the 1996 Agreement on a Firm and Lasting Peace [YUN 1996, p. 168], signed by the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca (URNG), and monitored compliance with the 2000-2004 verification timetable [YUN 2000, p. 239]. The calendar established in the 1997 Agreement on the Implementation, Compliance and Verification Timetable for the Peace Agreements [YUN 1997, p. 176] for the period 1997-2000, also signed by the Government and URNG, expired in December 2000. Since much of the peace agenda remained outstanding, the Commission to Follow Up the Implementation of the Peace Agreements rescheduled pending commitments in an implementation timetable for 2000-2004, which recognized that the basis of the Timetable Agreement and the peace agreements as a whole remained valid. MINUGUA also embarked on a transition programme to strengthen the capacity of Guatemalan governing and civil institutions to carry forward the peace agenda after the Mission's withdrawal.

In resolution 58/238 of 23 December, the General Assembly authorized a final renewal of MINUGUA's mandate from 1 January to 31 December 2004 (see p. 283).

MINUGUA

The mandate of MINUGUA, which had been extended to 31 December 2003 by General Assembly resolution 57/161 [YUN 2002, p. 247], included verification of all agreements signed by the Government of Guatemala and URNG, covering human rights, demilitarization and the strengthening of civilian power, indigenous rights, and socio-economic aspects and the agrarian situation. The Mission also verified compliance with the 2000-2004 timetable for the implementation of pending commitments under the peace agreements, and provided good offices, technical assistance and information to the public on its activities and the results of its verification.

Report of Secretary-General. In response to Assembly resolution 57/161, the Secretary-General submitted an August report [A/58/262] covering the state of implementation of the 1996 peace agreements (see p. 280). He also described MINUGUA's transition strategy in preparation for its departure from Guatemala and presented a plan for restructuring the Mission in 2004 as the final stage in the phase-out process leading to its closure.

In view of the fact that a new Government would assume office in January 2004, President Alfonso Portillo had requested in September 2002 that MINUGUA's mandate be extended until the end of 2004.

The Secretary-General noted that implementation of the peace accords since September 2002 had fallen short of expectations and was insufficient to inject new momentum into the peace process. Although progress in specific areas had been verified by the Mission, there were also negative developments, such as the worsening public security situation, persistent corruption, obstacles in the fight against impunity and an ongoing climate of intimidation against justice officials and human rights defenders.

Violence was reported at the start of the election campaign period, and the build-up to the elections, to be held in November and December, was generating tensions at the local level. Electoral authorities had come under increased pressure, especially after a controversial ruling in July by the nation's highest court permitting the presidential candidacy of retired General Efraín Ríos Montt.

The Secretary-General stated that, following the elections, the country's new leaders would face enormous challenges to overcome disunity and provide coherent direction forward. With changes at both national and local levels and the customary enormous staff turnover, it would be no small task to ensure the continuity of the important institutions and programmes that had been developed as part of the peace agreements. The new Government would have a great responsibility in that regard, but civil society and the private sector would also need to play a forceful role and lend their creativity to the building of a stronger and more effective consensus around the peace agenda. The support of the international community and of the United Nations, in particular, would continue to be crucial as new authorities took over and tackled their new functions.

During 2003, MINUGUA focused on building the capacity of partners in Guatemalan institutions to provide oversight and to promote and monitor issues defined in the peace accords. Upon MINUGUA's departure, the Office of the Human Rights Ombudsman would have the national mandate and territorial coverage to investigate complaints and call for State action regarding human rights problems. Support for the Office, pursuant to a memorandum of understanding signed in October 2002, had involved all of the Mission's substantive units and field offices. Major accomplishments in 2003 included country-wide staff training on human rights monitoring and other peace issues, increased joint verification and technical assistance to create computerized information systems. MINUGUA's work with civil society aimed to complement efforts with the Office of the Human Rights Ombudsman and other key State institutions, especially on issues and in regions where the responsible State entities remained weak. That work involved training and providing technical support. Technical assistance had also been provided to local indigenous and women's organizations working in the decentralized structures for participatory planning and oversight, known as Development Councils.

MINUGUA continued to serve as an observer on the Commission to Follow Up the Implementation of the Peace Agreements, participating in discussions to revamp the peace institutions (including the Commission itself) as a step in reinvigorating the peace process. With significant reform and sufficient resources, the Commission could provide general monitoring and oversight of the pending peace agenda and serve as a national advocate for the peace agreements.

In addition to transition efforts with national institutions and organizations, complementary measures had been advanced to ensure specific follow-on by the specialized agencies, funds and programmes of the UN system, as well as by members of the international community. That work would intensify in 2004.

It was envisaged that the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) would upgrade its current technical assistance project. MINUGUA had been working with OHCHR to implement a joint work plan on indigenous peoples' rights and had assisted in developing plans for OHCHR's future work in Guatemala.

The Mission was also working with the UN country team to develop the new United Nations Development Assistance Framework and to build greater capacity for monitoring and reporting on the implementation of the pending socio-economic commitments contained in the peace agreements. It coordinated efforts to produce a supplement to the annual Human Development Report that integrated information from several UN programmes and agencies and presented a joint assessment of the status of the commitments. Follow-up needs established and lessons learned from completed Trust Fund projects on a range of socio-economic, justice, public security and defence issues had been presented to UNDP, which had taken measures to provide greater support and technical assistance to national institutions in those areas. MINUGUA staff were working with the donor community and cooperation agencies to identify priorities that had emerged as a result of the Mission's phase-out process. The Mission also worked closely with the Dialogue Group—composed of major bilateral donors and multilateral development banks—on the implementation of the pending commitments contained in the peace agreements. It would continue to provide information and analysis to the Dialogue Group, given the Group's key role in facilitating direct communication between the international community and Guatemalan political actors on the peace agenda and its potential for channelling cooperation efforts towards consolidation of the peace process after MINUGUA's departure.

Beginning in the third quarter of 2003, the National Transition Volunteers programme, another component of the transition strategy, would train up to 60 Guatemalans, giving priority to indigenous people and to those committed to working in provincial areas, and would integrate them into the Mission's substantive activities, including its verification work. The Mission would then seek formal agreements with the Ombudsman, key human rights and indigenous organizations and other appropriate institutions with the aim of facilitating the volunteers' employment once the Mission had ended.

MINUGUA would continue to verify compliance with the peace agreements in two broad areas—human rights, and demilitarization and the strengthening of civilian power—but with sharply defined priorities, given both budgetary constraints and advances in the transition process. The Office of the Spokesperson, with fewer staff, would continue to play a key role in publicizing peace-process achievements and providing information on the Mission's transition and withdrawal. The Transition Unit, which would also be smaller, would continue to provide strategic advice and monitor benchmarks in the transition process, coordinate follow-on with the Office of the Human Rights Ombudsman and work with the country team and bilateral cooperation agencies to ensure political, technical and financial support for national transition partners. Two thematic advisory units would be maintained in 2004—on human rights and on demilitarization and strengthening civilian power. The advisory units on indigenous rights and on economic policy and rural development would be phased out in 2003 and follow-up mechanisms would be put in place. MINUGUA was seeking support to extend the Programme of Institutional Assistance for Legal Reform into 2004, as its extensive contacts and knowledge of peace accord legislative initiatives would provide significant support to the Mission's political focus, especially work in the new Congress. In addition, it was expected that the National Transition Volunteers programme would be financed by the Trust Fund and implemented directly by the Mission.

The Secretary-General stated that the new Government, to be elected in 2003, together with civil society and the private sector, must work with increased energy and commitment to lead the country into a new period characterized by the rule of law and full human development.

In view of the remaining challenges to the peace process, the Secretary-General recommends that the General Assembly authorize the renewal of MINUGUA's mandate from 1 January to 31 December 2004.

Verification of compliance

In response to General Assembly resolution 57/161 [YUN 2002, p. 247], the Secretary-General in August submitted his eighth report [A/58/267] on the verification of compliance with the agreements signed by the Government of Guatemala and URNG [YUN 1996, p. 168].

The implementation of the commitments entered into by the two parties was governed by the Timetable Agreement [YUN 1997, p. 176], which expired in December 2000. The Commission to Follow Up the Implementation of the Peace Agreements rescheduled pending commitments in an implementation timetable for 2000-2004 [YUN 2000, p. 245].

During the first half of 2003, implementation of the peace accords had lagged and key implementing institutions suffered from inadequate budget resources. The Secretary-General stated that while there had been some advances in the peace accords, the sustainability of the process could be ensured only if Guatemalans assumed full ownership and responsibility to carry it forward.

In March, the Government and the Human Rights Ombudsman agreed to establish an internationally backed investigation into the existence of clandestine groups with the participation of the United Nations and OAS. The Secretary-General sent a technical exploratory mission of independent experts and UN officials to Guatemala to assess the viability of such a commission.

New accusations surfaced regarding corruption and the influence of drug trafficking and organized crime in governmental spheres and, in January, the United States Government decertified Guatemala as a cooperative ally in the fight against illegal drugs. In positive steps, the Government dissolved its anti-narcotics police after members were implicated in corruption and serious human rights violations, and the Attorney General initiated investigations of five former military officers suspected of involvement in illicit activities.

The Government, donors and representatives of civil society and political parties participated in a Consultative Group meeting (Guatemala City, 13-14 May) to evaluate progress in implementing the peace agreements since its 2002 meeting [YUN 2002, p. 244]. Participants agreed that the peace agreements should remain Guatemala's essential road map for development. The President of Guatemala announced that he would introduce legislation to strengthen the Commission to Follow Up the Implementation of the Peace Agreements and the Peace Secretariat of the Presidency so as to ensure the continuation of the peace accords under the next administration. The largest donors expressed continued strong support provided Guatemalans remained committed to moving ahead in the peace process. Following the Consultative Group meeting, the Government presented measures to advance the peace agenda during the remaining months of the Administration, including full demobilization of the Presidential General Staff, passage of a 2004 budget reflecting peace priorities, reductions in the army, initiation of the national reparations programme and the investigation into clandestine groups, as well as the passage of pending legislation, including the land registry law and laws on access to information, on classification and declassification, and on elections and political parties.

The Under-Secretary-General for Political Affairs, Kieran Prendergast, visited Guatemala from 4 to 8 July to review MINUGUA's transition plans. He met with President Portillo and high government officials, electoral authorities and leaders of civil society and underlined the need to intensify national efforts to implement the peace agreements and to hold credible and transparent elections. He emphasized that the rule of law and broader political participation were the keys to Guatemala's future.

MINUGUA's verification activities focused on human rights, the rights and identity of indigenous peoples, demilitarization and the strengthening of civilian power, and socio-economic aspects and the agrarian situation. It took into account the implementation and verification timetable established by the Commission to Follow Up the Implementation of the Peace Agreements, which extended through 2004. It also considered the governmental commitments made at the 2002 Consultative Group meeting for Guatemala [YUN 2002, p. 244].

With the end of the armed conflict, Guatemala's human rights situation improved dramatically, as reflected in reduced levels of such violations as executions, forced disappearances and torture. Political killings were greatly reduced and freedom of the media increased. However, public security deteriorated, impunity persisted, and the climate of intimidation against human rights defenders, social activists and journalists continued. Human rights activists, judges, prosecutors, attorneys, witnesses and forensic anthropologists had also been subject to threats, harassment and violence. A common element in such cases was the lack of results in official investigations and a limited response from justice sector authorities.

In March, in an effort to identify and combat clandestine groups believed to be responsible for such incidents, the Government and the Human Rights Ombudsman, with the support of non-governmental human rights organizations, agreed to create a Commission for the Investigation of Illegal Groups and Clandestine Security Apparatuses and asked the United Nations to support the initiative. Although some justice sector institutions, including the National Civilian Police, received nominal budgetary increases for 2003, the amounts remained insufficient to undertake much-needed expansion and reform plans. In July, the Government inaugurated a National Reparations Commission to create and administer a national reparations programme for victims of Guatemala's 36-year-long armed conflict. The Secretary-General stated that it was important that Congress reverse its earlier refusal to support national reparations and ensure the funding base and institutional stability of payments by enacting the programme into law.

As to the identity and rights of indigenous peoples, Congress, in May, passed a new law that facilitated the use of indigenous languages in official spheres. Legislation that penalized discrimination, including on the basis of gender, was also adopted. However, Guatemala had still not recognized the competence of the UN Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination to receive individual complaints. Also pending was legislation to recognize indigenous people's right to land ownership and indigenous access to radio frequencies and to bilingual education. In addition, the Office for the Defence of Indigenous Women's Rights still lacked a sufficient budget to effectively expand its coverage into the country's interior. There were few advances in promoting access to the justice system by indigenous peoples in their own languages, and educational reforms to reflect linguistic and cultural diversity progressed slowly. In March, President Portillo inaugurated a presidential commission for the elimination of discrimination and racism against indigenous peoples. Its effectiveness would ultimately depend on its ability to generate recommendations and on the Government's willingness to implement them.

Advances in consolidating civilian institutions and reshaping the military continued to be slow, despite progress towards dissolving the Presidential General Staff and redeploying the military according to national defence criteria rather than internal security considerations. Results were mixed on the legislative agenda. Despite discussions between the Government and civil society organizations, laws on access to information and the classification of State information, controls over firearms and munitions, and the regulation of private security firms had yet to be enacted. Congress, however, passed a law establishing a civilian alternative to mandatory military service. In public security, the Government responded to the growing crime problem by involving the army in public security, rather than by strengthening the National Civilian Police. A February 2003 presidential decree established an Advisory Council on Security, composed of prominent citizens, to contribute to the formulation of public security and defence policy. Draft regulations on police discipline, which would help to remove abusive or corrupt officials, were still awaiting approval by the executive branch.

Progress under the Agreement on Social and Economic Aspects and the Agrarian Situation was hindered by inadequate resources for relevant institutions and lack of movement on key legislation in land and rural development, fiscal policy and transparency, decentralization, education, health and housing, and the resettlement of uprooted populations and incorporation of ex-combatants. On the other hand, the Government's continued transfer of funds to the military resulted in a 24 per cent increase in the 2003 budget of the National Defence Ministry and a 95 per cent increase for the Presidential General Staff. On the positive side, the Government agreed to a proposal from civil society organizations to fund a "coffee emergency" plan, including crop diversification and the acquisition of new lands for unemployed peasants, as the depression of coffee prices continued; presented a land registry bill to Congress for action in April; opened discussions on defining a rural development policy with peasant and indigenous groups and members of the private sector; and created a new System for the Decentralization of Educational Management. However, the law on agrarian and environmental jurisdiction remained pending; laws regarding idle lands and territorial taxes recorded no progress; and the Trust Fund for Productive Projects, directed at both the demobilized and the resettled populations, had been awaiting implementation for two years. The Secretary-General urged that national resources be assigned to the Fund. In May, a major EU-funded project in support of the reincorporation of ex-combatants came to a close.

The Secretary-General observed that he was encouraged that Guatemala's main political parties were committed to carrying on with the peace process and by the involvement of civil society organizations and their enthusiasm in framing future work agendas around the agreements' implementation. He stated that, during its remaining months in office, the current Administration should make every effort to implement pending commitments in the peace accords; completely dissolve the Presidential General Staff; accelerate actions against discrimination; reduce military spending and dedicate significantly increased resources to social needs and rule of law institutions in the 2004 budget; adopt in its entirety the list of priority peace legislation prepared by the Commission to Follow Up the Implementation of the Peace Agreements, including the land registry law, the laws on access to information and the classification and declassification of State information and a framework law on civilian intelligence; pass legislation to strengthen the key institutions created by the accords; and begin implementation of the national reparations programme for victims of human rights violations. The Secretary-General indicated that the international community should continue to focus its cooperation on the framework of the peace accords, while national efforts were being strengthened to sustain the process.

On 9 November and 28 December, Guatemala held national elections, which resulted in Oscar José Rafael Berger Perdomo of the Gran Alianza Nacional party being elected President for a four-year term.

Human rights

In November, the Secretary-General transmitted to the General Assembly MINUGUA's fourteenth report [A/58/566] on human rights in Guatemala, which described the Mission's activities from July 2002 to June 2003.

During the reporting period, hopes for improving the human rights situation were dampened by the loss of momentum for the reform of public security and justice institutions. Deterioration of the National Civilian Police and slow modernization of the courts and the Public Prosecutor's Office had undermined key commitments of the peace agreements. There was almost no significant progress in combating impunity or eliminating clandestine groups; human rights defenders and judicial sector officials remained subject to threats, harassment and fatal attacks; and systematic discrimination against indigenous communities continued unabated. Although important advances had been made in promoting human rights since 1997, they might prove to be of limited value without the strengthening of fundamental State institutions.

The Secretary-General stated that it was a cause for concern in Guatemala that, not only were reforms progressing slowly, but the Government and a number of other political and social sectors no longer appeared committed to the changes that were at the heart of the peace process. It was thus urgent for the new Government (2004-2008), with political will, organization and adequate resources, to build on achievements to end impunity and achieve justice for human rights violations; it should adopt a public security strategy that would include the doubling of the police force to 40,000 officers by the end of 2008, the establishment of strong internal professional controls, the dismissal of officers with poor human rights and performance records, comprehensive new recruiting programmes and the strengthening and expansion of the Police Academy. In addition, the prison system required a full overhaul, beginning with the adoption of the prison reform legislation rejected by Congress earlier in the year and implementation of the recommendations of the Commission for the Transformation of the Penal System. Also, the judicial sector must intensify the speed and depth of modernization programmes. The Supreme Court and the Public Prosecutor should fully institutionalize and support the transparent implementation of civil service career structures that had been put in place; the installation of management systems to monitor the flow of cases and performance of every judge and prosecutor should be accelerated; security for judicial sector officials had to be substantially improved; and Constitutional Court magistrates should be selected on the basis of qualifications and merit.

The Supreme Court and the Public Prosecutor should accelerate the full integration of indigenous legal traditions and practices into the formal legal system, dramatically increase the bilingual capacity of the system and educate personnel on indigenous legal customs. Access to justice programmes, particularly the judicial administrative centres and the proposed expansion of the justice of the peace jurisdiction, should be modified to incorporate fully the equity-based, informal and local dispute resolution practices of indigenous communities. The Coordinating Body for Modernization of the Justice Sector, directed by the heads of the Supreme Court, the Office of the Public Prosecutor, the Interior Ministry and the Public Defender Institute, should assume its original purpose of coordinating modernization policies of all the justice sector's actors. What was required was a political commitment by the new Government and Congress to the urgent implementation of those reforms and a significant reallocation of budget resources for the 2004-2008 period to those priorities. Civil society organizations should continue to work to produce independent, non-partisan analyses of the human rights situation, actively engage the State on important issues, and seek cross-sector alliances to advance the strengthening of democratic norms and practices.

Following a request by Guatemala's President, the Secretary-General recommended to the General Assembly that MINUGUA's mandate be extended until the end of 2004.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 23 December [meeting 79], the General Assembly adopted resolution 58/238 [draft: A/58/L.30/Rev.1 & Add.1] without vote [agenda item 26].

United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 57/161 of 16 December 2002, in which it decided to authorize the renewal of the mandate of the United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala from 1 January to 31 December 2003,

Taking into account the fact that the Government of Guatemala has reaffirmed its commitment to the full implementation of the peace agreements,

Underlining the fact that substantive aspects of the peace agreements have yet to be implemented and that the timetable for implementation and verification established by the Commission to Follow Up the Implementation of the Peace Agreements extends through 2004,

Taking into account the request of the Government of Guatemala for an extension of the mandate of the Mission until the end of 2004, in view of the desirability of maintaining the presence of the Mission during the first year of the new Government, which will take office in January 2004,

Taking into account also the fact that civil society organizations in Guatemala and the international community expressed concerns about potential setbacks to implementation of the peace agreements should the Mission depart Guatemala before a new Government had taken office and demonstrated its commitment to the peace process,

Taking note of the fact that on 10 July 2003, under the auspices of the Organization of American States, representatives of the main political parties of Guatemala signed a declaration expressing support for the peace agreements as State accords that should be incorporated into government plans for the peace process,

Taking into account the eighth report of the Secretary-General on the verification of compliance with the peace agreements,

Taking into account also the fourteenth report of the Mission on human rights,

Taking into account further the report of the Commission for Historical Clarification,

Stressing the positive role played by the Mission in support of the Guatemala peace process, and emphasizing the need for the Mission to continue to enjoy the full support of all parties concerned,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the work of the Mission and the recommendations contained therein,

1. Welcomes the eighth report of the Secretary-General on the verification of compliance with the peace agreements;

2. Also welcomes the fourteenth report of the United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala on human rights;

3. Calls upon the Government of Guatemala to maintain its commitment to the full implementation of the peace agreements;

4. Also calls upon newly elected public officials to act on the commitments made by representatives of the main political parties in July 2003 to support the peace agreements as State accords that should be incorporated into government plans for the peace process;

5. Takes note of the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General on the work of the Mission aimed at ensuring that the Mission responds adequately to the demands of the peace process until 31 December 2004, in view of the many outstanding matters still to be addressed and the need to ensure the commitment of the new Government to the peace agreements;

6. Notes that, while in 2003 the Mission verified four broad areas of the peace agreements, in 2004 it will concentrate only on two areas, human rights and demilitarization and the strengthening of civilian power;

7. Also notes the results of the meeting of the Consultative Group for Guatemala, held in Guatemala City on 13 and 14 May 2003, at which all participants agreed that the peace agreements should remain Guatemala's essential road map for development;

8. Further notes that, while advances were verified in certain areas, such as the passage of legislation against discrimination in its many manifestations, the redeployment of military units and the development of a national reparations programme for the victims of human rights violations committed during the armed conflict, progress in the implementation of the peace agreements in the past year fell short of expectations and was insufficient to inject new momentum into the peace process;

9. Notes that the consolidation of the peace-building process remains a significant challenge which will require greater political will, the involvement of all sectors of society and the continued engagement of the international community;

10. Notes with concern the climate of intimidation against justice officials, human rights defenders, social activists and journalists;

11. Takes note of the agreement reached in March 2003 by the Government of Guatemala and the Human Rights Ombudsman, with the support of civil society, and currently being revised, to create a Commission for the Investigation of Illegal Groups and Clandestine Security Apparatuses;

12. Welcomes the agreement signed on 1 December 2003 between the Government of Guatemala and the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights for the establishment of an office of the High Commissioner in Guatemala, with a mandate to monitor the human rights situation in the country and advise the Government on formulating and implementing policies, programmes and measures to promote and protect human rights;

13. Calls upon the Government to further reduce military spending and to allocate adequate budgets to those institutions and programmes that are given priority under the peace accords;

14. Underlines the importance of implementing fully the Agreement on Identity and Rights of Indigenous Peoples as a key to fighting discrimination and consolidating peace and equality in Guatemala, and highlights the need to implement fully the Agreement on Social and Economic Aspects and Agrarian Situation as a means of addressing the root causes of the armed conflict;

15. Calls upon the Government to implement the recommendations of the Commission for Historical Clarification, with a view to promoting national reconciliation, upholding the right to truth and providing redress for the victims of human rights abuses and violence committed during the thirty-six-year conflict;

16. Invites the international community, and in particular the specialized agencies, funds and programmes of the United Nations system, to continue to support the consolidation of the peace-building process, with the peace agreements as the framework for their technical and financial assistance programmes and projects, and stresses the continued importance of close cooperation among them in the context of the United Nations Development Assistance Framework for Guatemala;

17. Urges the international community to support financially, through existing mechanisms of international cooperation, the strengthening of national capacities to ensure the consolidation of the peace process in Guatemala;

18. Also urges the international community to support financially the strengthening of the capacities of the specialized agencies, funds and programmes of the United Nations system, including the future office of the High Commissioner in Guatemala City, as the Mission prepares to intensify its work to ensure specific follow-on by the entities of the United Nations system, as well as by members of the international community, within the framework of a general transition strategy;

19. Stresses that, while the Mission has played a key role in promoting the consolidation of peace and the observance of human rights and in verifying compliance with the revised timetable for the implementation of pending commitments under the peace agreements, the long-term success of the peace process depends on the capacities and renewed commitment to the peace agreements of Guatemalan institutions, both of the State and of civil society;

20. Requests the United Nations system in Guatemala to continue to monitor and report annually, utilizing the methodology and indicators developed with the Mission, on the implementation of the Agreement on Social and Economic Aspects and Agrarian Situation as part of the national human development report of the United Nations Development Programme;

21. Decides to authorize a final renewal of the mandate of the United Nations Verification Mission in Guatemala from 1 January to 31 December 2004;

22. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report on the implementation of the present resolution to the General Assembly at the beginning of its fifty-ninth session, as well as a final report on the work of the Mission before the end of that session, together with the recommendations that he may deem appropriate.

Haiti

During 2003, the political and security crisis in Haiti, which had been ongoing since the contested election of President Jean-Bertrand Aristide in 2000 [YUN 2000, p. 249], deepened. By the end of the year, a newly united opposition movement, comprising political parties, civil society actors and the private sector, was calling for the President's resignation.

Political and security situation

In an April report to the Economic and Social Council on the long-term programme of support for Haiti [E/2003/54] (see also p. 952), the Secretary-General observed that the political crisis in Haiti was continuing despite the efforts of OAS to help the country emerge from the impasse and strengthen its institutions.

On 19 and 20 March, a high-level OAS/Caribbean Community delegation visited Haiti and called on the Government to take specific steps to create a climate conducive to the holding of free and credible local and legislative elections in 2003, while calling on the opposition and civil society to respect their obligations in that regard. In its report to the OAS Permanent Council on 3 April, the delegation took a negative view of developments in Haiti and deplored the fact that the Government and the opposition were continually hurling accusations at each other, thus impeding the electoral process.

In resolution 2003/46 of 23 July (see p. 952), the Council took action on the Secretary-General's report.

Financing of missions

UNMIH, UNSMIH, UNTMIH, MIPONUH

In an April report [A/57/789], the Secretary-General presented to the General Assembly the updated financial position of closed peace-keeping missions as at 30 June 2002, including the United Nations Mission in Haiti (UNMIH) (mandate ended 30 June 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 174]), the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti (UNSMIH) (mandate ended 31 July 1997 [YUN 1997, p. 188]), the United Nations Transition Mission in Haiti (UNTMIH) (mandate ended 30 November 1997 [ibid., p. 191]) and the United Nations Civilian Police Mission in Haiti (MIPONUH) (mandate ended 15 March 2000 [YUN 2000, p. 249]). The report showed fund balances of $27.2 million for UNMIH and $11.2 million for UNSMIH/UNTMIH/MIPONUH.

The Assembly, in resolution 57/323 of 18 June (see p. 85), took action on the Secretary-General's report.

Other questions

Colombia

In an 8 February statement [SG/SM/8599], the Secretary-General expressed shock at the terrorist attack on a social club in Bogotá, Colombia, on 7 February. He condemned the bombing and all other terrorist attacks by any actor in the Colombian conflict, and stated that the killing of innocent civilians would deepen the conflict and further undermine Colombia's hopes for the peace it sought and deserved. He extended his profound sympathy to the families of the victims.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 13 February [meeting 4706], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1465 (2003). The draft [S/2003/177] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and its relevant resolutions, in particular resolution 1373(2001) of 28 September 2001,

Reaffirming also the need to combat by all means, in accordance with the Charter, threats to international peace and security caused by terrorist acts,

1. Condemns in the strongest terms the bomb attack in Bogotá on 7 February 2003 in which many lives were lost and people injured, and regards such an act, like any act of terrorism, as a threat to peace and security;

2. Expresses its deepest sympathy and condolences to the people and the Government of Colombia and to the victims of the bomb attack and their families;

3. Urges all States, in accordance with their obligations under resolution 1373(2001), to work together urgently and to cooperate with and provide support and assistance, as appropriate, to the Colombian authorities in their efforts to find and bring to justice the perpetrators, organizers and sponsors of this terrorist attack;

4. Expresses its reinforced determination to combat all forms of terrorism, in accordance with its responsibilities under the Charter.

Cuba-United States

In August [A/58/287], the Secretary-General, in response to General Assembly resolution 57/11 [YUN 2002, p. 252], submitted information received as at 16 July 2003 from 86 States and 19 UN bodies and agencies on the implementation of the resolution, by which the Assembly had called on States to refrain from unilateral application of economic and trade measures against States, and urged them to repeal or invalidate such measures. The preamble to resolution 57/11 had made particular reference to the Helms-Burton Act, promulgated by the United States in 1996, which had strengthened sanctions against Cuba.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 4 November [meeting 54], the General Assembly adopted resolution 58/7 [draft: A/58/L.4] by recorded vote (179-3-2) [agenda item 29].

Necessity of ending the economic, commercial and financial embargo imposed by the United States of America against Cuba

The General Assembly,

Determined to encourage strict compliance with the purposes and principles enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations,

Reaffirming, among other principles, the sovereign equality of States, non-intervention and non-interference in their internal affairs and freedom of international trade and navigation, which are also enshrined in many international legal instruments,

Recalling the statements of the heads of State or Government at the Ibero-American Summits concerning the need to eliminate the unilateral application of economic and trade measures by one State against another that affect the free flow of international trade,

Concerned at the continued promulgation and application by Member States of laws and regulations, such as that promulgated on 12 March 1996 known as the "Helms-Burton Act", the extraterritorial effects of which affect the sovereignty of other States, the legitimate interests of entities or persons under their jurisdiction and the freedom of trade and navigation,

Taking note of declarations and resolutions of different intergovernmental forums, bodies and Governments that express the rejection by the international community and public opinion of the promulgation and application of regulations of the kind referred to above,

Recalling its resolutions 47/19 of 24 November 1992, 48/16 of 3 November 1993, 49/9 of 26 October 1994, 50/10 of 2 November 1995, 51/17 of 12 November 1996, 52/10 of 5 November 1997, 53/4 of 14 October 1998, 54/21 of 9 November 1999, 55/20 of 9 November 2000, 56/9 of 27 November 2001 and 57/11 of 12 November 2002,

Concerned that, since the adoption of its resolutions 47/19, 48/16, 49/9, 50/10, 51/17, 52/10, 53/4, 54/21, 55/20, 56/9 and 57/11, further measures of that nature aimed at strengthening and extending the economic, commercial and financial embargo against Cuba continue to be promulgated and applied, and concerned also at the adverse effects of such measures on the Cuban people and on Cuban nationals living in other countries,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of resolution 57/11;

2. Reiterates its call upon all States to refrain from promulgating and applying laws and measures of the kind referred to in the preamble to the present resolution in conformity with their obligations under the Charter of the United Nations and international law, which, inter alia, reaffirm the freedom of trade and navigation;

3. Once again urges States that have and continue to apply such laws and measures to take the necessary steps to repeal or invalidate them as soon as possible in accordance with their legal regime;

4. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the appropriate organs and agencies of the United Nations system, to prepare a report on the implementation of the present resolution in the light of the purposes and principles of the Charter and international law and to submit it to the General Assembly at its fifty-ninth session;

5. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-ninth session the item entitled "Necessity of ending the economic, commercial and financial embargo imposed by the United States of America against Cuba".

RECORDED VOTE ON RESOLUTION 58/7:

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Andorra, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Armenia, Australia, Austria, Azerbaijan, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belarus, Belgium, Belize, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cambodia, Cameroon, Canada, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Costa Rica, Côte d'Ivoire, Croatia, Cuba, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Democratic People's Republic of Korea, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Eritrea, Estonia, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Gambia, Georgia, Germany, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Ireland, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kazakhstan, Kenya, Kiribati, Kyrgyzstan, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Latvia, Lebanon, Lesotho, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Liechtenstein, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Monaco, Mongolia, Mozambique, Myanmar, Namibia, Nauru, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Republic of Korea, Republic of Moldova, Romania, Russian Federation, Rwanda, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, San Marino, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Serbia and Montenegro, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Slovakia, Slovenia, Solomon Islands, Somalia, South Africa, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Switzerland, Syrian Arab Republic, Tajikistan, Thailand, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Timor-Leste, Togo, Tonga, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Turkmenistan, Tuvalu, Uganda, Ukraine, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: Israel, Marshall Islands, United States.

Abstaining: Micronesia, Morocco.

El Salvador-Honduras

On 12 March [S/2003/306], Honduras transmitted to the Security Council President the text of a memorandum from its Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs to the Minister for Foreign Affairs of El Salvador. The memorandum acknowledged receipt of El Salvador's 11 March note concerning the demarcation of the common boundary delimited by the International Court of Justice (ICJ) on 11 September 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 983]. (El Salvador had filed an Application with ICJ for revision of the Judgment in September 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 1272].) Honduras stated that, following agreement to start the demarcation process [ibid., p. 255], reconnaissance visits were initiated in October 2002. The small differences noted prior to that time between the coordinates fixed by the Judgment and the geographical accidents identified were natural and inherent in a delimitation process. (See also p. 1306)

On 8 April [S/2003/430], Honduras transmitted to the Council President the text of a letter to the Pan American Institute of Geography and History, in which Honduras requested the appointment of a technical expert who was not a national or resident of either El Salvador or Honduras to act as third and final arbitrator in resolving technical differences in the 1992 ICJ demarcation Judgment between the two countries. Included in the appendices to the letter were the minutes of the meeting of the Special Demarcation Commission (Metapán, El Salvador, 24-28 February), at which no agreement was reached on the appointment of an arbitrator.

On 20 May (S/2003/561), Honduras transmitted to the Council President a document announcing that OAS, on 30 April, had appointed technical expert John Gates (United States) to assist in resolving the demarcation issue.

Chapter IV

Asia and the Pacific

The year 2003 was a challenging one for the United Nations in the Asia and Pacific region as the war in Iraq severely tested the principle of collective security and the resilience of the Organization.

In Afghanistan, the security situation continued to endanger the peace process. Increased terrorist activity, factional fighting and activities associated with the illegal narcotics trade posed the greatest challenges to stability and socio-economic development. Lack of security in certain parts of the country forced the United Nations to suspend its mission support in four southern provinces. Despite those setbacks, progress continued to be made in implementing the 2001 Bonn Agreement. Constructive events included the beginning of the demobilization, disarmament and reintegration programme, the drafting of a constitution, the commencement of the electoral registration process and the convening of a nationwide constitutional assembly, or Loya Jirga. In May, the Afghan Transitional Authority (TA), led by President Hamid Karzai, secured an agreement with provincial governors and commanders that prohibited provincial leaders from simultaneously holding civil and military positions and called for the centralization of customs revenues; however, those commitments were only partially implemented by the end of the year. The United Nations Assistance Mission in Afghanistan (UNAMA) continued to assist in the implementation of the Bonn Agreement and in reconstruction. The Security Council established an electoral unit within UNAMA to assist the TA with preparations for the holding of national elections, scheduled to take place in 2004. UNAMA's mandate was extended for an additional period of one year. A Council mission visited Afghanistan from 31 October to 7 November to reaffirm its support for the peace process. The Security Council expanded the mandate of the International Security Assistance Force, which continued to assist the TA in the maintenance of security in the capital, Kabul, to allow it to operate in areas outside Kabul and its environs. The North Atlantic Treaty Organization assumed leadership of the Force in August. The Council also adopted new sanctions against Osama bin Laden, the terrorist organization Al-Qaida, the Taliban and their associates. The Secretary-General's Special Representative for Afghanistan, Lakhdar Brahimi, continued to coordinate UN activities in the country.

The war in Iraq, which began on 20 March, severely tested the cohesiveness and purpose of the United Nations. Rarely in its 58-year history had such dire forecasts been made about the Organization. On 19 August, the UN headquarters in Baghdad was subjected to a deliberate and vicious terrorist attack. The Secretary-General's Special Representative for Iraq, Sergio Vieira de Mello, and 21 other persons were killed and many others were wounded. The attack dealt a severe blow to the ability of the United Nations to assist Iraq in the post-war phase. Prior to the commencement of military action, the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency carried out extensive inspection activities in Iraq and provided the Security Council with periodic updates on their findings. The Council convened repeatedly at the ministerial level to discuss the situation in Iraq. Three permanent members of the Council strongly opposed the use of force. On 17 March, the Secretary-General suspended UN activities in Iraq and the following day withdrew all UN system personnel. As at 19 March, UN inspectors reported that they had not found any evidence of proscribed weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, though the time available to them was considered insufficient to complete an overall assessment. UN personnel started returning to Iraq in April, following the overthrow of Saddam Hussein's regime by coalition forces, led by the United States. The Coalition Provisional Authority was established by the occupying forces to provide for the provisional administration of Iraq. In July, the Authority established the Governing Council of Iraq, the principal body of the Iraqi interim administration. An escalation of attacks against the United Nations and other foreign organizations, which started in August 2003, led the Secretary-General to temporarily relocate all UN international staff outside the country. Although the United Nations Assistance Mission for Iraq was established in August, its core was set up in Nicosia, Cyprus, due to the deteriorating security situation. In November, the Authority and the Governing Council signed an agreement setting out a political process for the restoration of sovereignty by 30 June 2004, and for the drafting of a new constitution and the holding of national elections. Following the end of major military hostilities, the Security Council lifted civilian sanctions on Iraq. Consequently, the Council's Sanctions Committee and the humanitarian oil-for-food programme were phased out over a period of six months and terminated on 21 November 2003 after 13 years of a comprehensive sanctions regime. The Council established the international Advisory and Monitoring Board, an independent oversight body, to monitor oil sales in Iraq, and established a new committee to continue identifying individuals and entities affiliated with the former Iraqi regime for the purpose of freezing their funds, financial assets and economic resources. The fall of the Hussein regime led to the discovery of mass graves in Iraq and the identification of remains, including those of Kuwaiti missing persons. In March, the mandate of the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission was suspended and most of its staff evacuated. The Mission maintained a small peacekeeping force in Kuwait City to support, among other things, UN humanitarian assistance programmes for Iraq. In July, the Council extended the Mission's mandate for a final three-month period, until 6 October. On 13 December, Saddam Hussein was captured by Coalition forces.

During the year, Timor-Leste continued to establish and strengthen its national institutions with assistance from the United Nations Mission of Support in East Timor (UNMISET) and UN agencies. The Timorese civil administration and police force progressively assumed greater responsibility in their respective areas. However, in response to violent attacks by armed elements in January and February, the Security Council decided to slow down the downsizing schedule for the military and police components of UNMISET. The Mission's mandate was extended for a further year, until 20 May 2004. Relations between Indonesia and Timor-Leste continued to improve, although the two countries did not reach a final agreement on a provisional border line by the target date of 30 November. The ratification of the Timor Sea Treaty between Timor-Leste and Australia paved the way for the exploitation of mineral resources in the Timor Sea and the sharing of revenues, with 90 per cent being awarded to Timor-Leste.

In 2003, the United Nations resumed negotiations with the Government of Cambodia on the establishment of extraordinary chambers within the existing court structure of Cambodia for the prosecution of serious violations of Cambodian law and international law committed during the period of Democratic Kampuchea. Those negotiations resulted in the preparation of a draft agreement between the United Nations and Cambodia, which the General Assembly approved in May, and which was signed on 6 June.

Particular attention was paid to developments in the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, as the country informed the Security Council in January that it was putting into effect its 1993 decision to withdraw from the 1968 Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons. The activities of the United Nations Tajikistan Office of Peace-building were extended for another year, until 1 June 2004, in order to continue to support Tajikistan in its post-conflict peace-building efforts. Among other concerns in the region that were brought to the attention of the United Nations were the deterioration of law and order in Solomon Islands and the situation in Bougainville, Papua New Guinea.

Afghanistan

During 2003, further progress was made in implementing the 2001 Bonn Agreement (YUN 2001, p. 263), which had set in motion Afghanistan's transition from war and instability to peace and democracy. Major steps included the pilot phase of the demobilization, disarmament and reintegration programme, the drafting of a constitution, the beginning of electoral registration and the convening of the Constitutional Loya Jirga (grand council), which was still in session as at 31 December. However, the deterioration in security, brought about by increased terrorist activity, factional fighting, activities associated with the narcotics trade and unchecked criminality, impeded the peace process. The absence of a secure environment led the United Nations to suspend its mission support in four southern provinces. The Afghan Transitional Authority (TA), led by President Hamid Karzai, enacted security reform measures and, in May, through the Afghan National Security Council, forbade the use of private militias and called for the transfer of provincial revenues to the TA.

The United Nations Assistance Mission in Afghanistan (UNAMA), under the leadership of the Secretary-General's Special Representative, Lakhdar Brahimi (Algeria), continued its efforts on behalf of Afghanistan throughout the year, together with its partner organizations. In March, the Security Council extended UNAMA's mandate to provide support for the implementation of the Bonn Agreement for an additional period of one year. The Council also established an electoral unit within UNAMA to assist the TA with preparations for the national elections, scheduled for 2004. Noting the link between drug trafficking and terrorism, the Council further called for coordinated efforts to combat the drug trade in Afghanistan.

A Security Council mission visited Afghanistan in October/November with the primary purpose of reaffirming the international community's support for the peace process and to send a strong signal to the Afghan people that their plight remained high on the Council's agenda. The mission, among other things, called for an end to factional fighting.

In January, the Council also adopted new sanctions measures against Osama bin Laden, Al-Qaida, the Taliban and their associates, including a freeze of financial and economic assets, a travel ban and an arms embargo. In order to clarify its identity and mandate, the Afghanistan Sanctions Committee changed its name to the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 1267(1999) [YUN 1999, p. 265] concerning Al-Qaida and the Taliban and associated individuals and entities. Although the Committee's consolidated list remained a critical tool for implementing all sanctions measures, it was felt that there was a need to further upgrade the list's information quality. The Monitoring Group was reappointed to monitor the implementation of the sanctions measures for a further period of one year.

The International Security Assistance Force (ISAF), a multinational force established by Security Council resolution 1386(2001) [YUN 2001, p. 267], continued to assist the Afghan Government in the maintenance of security in Kabul and its surrounding areas. The North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) assumed lead command for ISAF in August, replacing Germany and the Netherlands. Those two countries had assumed lead command in February 2003 from Turkey. In October, the Council expanded ISAF's mandate to allow it to support the TA in the maintenance of security in areas outside of Kabul and its environs.

The Economic and Social Council, in July, adopted resolution 2003/43 on the situation of women and girls in Afghanistan (see p. 1175).

Situation in Afghanistan

The situation in Afghanistan in 2003 was described by the Secretary-General in three progress reports to the Security Council and the General Assembly dated 18 March [A/57/762-

S/2003/333], 23 July [A/57/850-S/2003/754 & Corr.1] and 30 December [S/2003/1212]. The reports described the status of implementation of the 2001 Bonn Agreement, in particular the work of the TA; political and security issues; humanitarian relief, recovery and reconstruction; developments regarding UN deployment in Afghanistan; and UNAMA's activities and mandate. In a 3 December report to the Assembly [A/58/616], which focused on international assistance for the reconstruction of Afghanistan, the Secretary-General described key political and humanitarian developments from July 2002 to November 2003.

Security Council consideration (January and February). The Security Council discussed the situation in Afghanistan on 31 January [meeting 4699] and 24 February [meeting 4711].

On 31 January, the Council was briefed by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Afghanistan, Lakhdar Brahimi, who said that in 2003 Afghanistan would have to strengthen and rebuild the foundations of the State, address the political and security uncertainties and meet the rising expectations of its people. To that end, President Hamid Karzai had been discussing with the United Nations and other partners the need for the Afghan Government to articulate a clear plan of action setting out the main goals for 2003. Broadly, there was a need to focus on three main areas: strengthening the key State institutions; national reconciliation; and reconstruction projects throughout the country. With respect to State institutions, progress had to be made on building the army and training and reform of the police. The drafting and ratification of the new constitution would also be a fundamental State-building exercise. With respect to national reconciliation, the political base supporting the peace process had to be broadened as too many Afghans felt excluded from the Government and the political transformation that Afghanistan was undergoing. As to reconstruction, Afghans had to be presented with clearly identified projects that could build the economy and increase confidence in the Government. Some reports suggested that support for the Taliban was growing in some parts of Afghanistan, a reminder that the peace process was far from secure.

The security situation on the ground during January had been relatively calm, with no outbreak of major, sustained fighting. However, security incidents continued to occur as a result of inter-factional tension and sporadic terrorist activity. Although tensions had been reduced in parts of the country through mediation, the high rate of criminal activity by armed groups in and around the city of Mazar-e-Sharif and attacks against the United States-led coalition forces continued. The Afghan TA continued to implement its agenda for security sector reform. In January, subcommissions for the recruitment of a new national army and for the demobilization and disarmament of former combatants were established. France and the United States, which were providing training for the new army, estimated that by the end of 2003 approximately 7,000 soldiers would have completed the basic training course. Japan had committed significant funding to the Afghan New Beginnings Programme, aimed at registering soldiers and, through a series of benefits and training packages, assisting them in their reintegration into civilian life. The German-led national police training project was providing training for some 1,450 police officers. However, the TA continued to face difficulties in paying police salaries.

In the justice sector, the Afghan Judicial Commission's draft plan for legislative and constitutional reform and the rebuilding of the judicial system was being finalized in consultation with Italy, the lead nation in support of that sector, the UN and its agencies and donors. Progress in establishing the rule of law would continue to be constrained by the depleted pool of experienced lawyers and the limited capacity of the penal system. On 27 January, the Constitutional Drafting Commission, together with UNAMA and the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), met with donors and interested Member States represented in Kabul to discuss the constitutional process. The Commission was expected to finalize a preliminary draft by March. That draft would be reviewed by the full Constitutional Commission, whose 30 or so members were being selected. From April through early June, the Constitutional Commission was to conduct countrywide public consultations to discern the public's view on key constitutional issues. Taking into account the results of those consultations, the Commission would finalize a draft by late August. The final step would be the convening of a Loya Jirga (grand council), tentatively scheduled for October, to review and adopt the constitution. As for the elections scheduled to take place in June 2004, UNAMA, assisted by the Electoral Assistance Division of the UN Department of Political Affairs, was in the process of assembling an electoral team in Kabul to assist the TA on electoral matters and to help build electoral capacity inside that Government. The Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission had been implementing its work programme with the support of UNAMA, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights and UNDP. That programme covered capacity-building in the fields of investigations and monitoring, human rights education, promotion of the rights of women and transitional justice.

The United Nations Transitional Assistance Programme for Afghanistan (TAPA) [YUN 2002, p. 900] reflected an agreement between the TA and the UN assistance agencies on relief, recovery and reconstruction programmes and their linkage to national priorities identified by the Afghan Government itself. TAPA aimed to ameliorate the underlying causes of humanitarian needs and to establish the foundation for rehabilitation and long-term development. TAPA's aims included the Mine Action Programme's target to clear high-impact areas of mines and unexploded ordnance within five years and preparations for the national census.

Illegal drug production and trafficking in Afghanistan remained a critical concern, with significant poppy cultivation resuming in 2002 after several years of reduced production. Certain aspects of the drug economy—such as the refining and transportation of drug products—were driven by the opportunity for massive and illicit profit, which, in the past, had been used to nurture a war economy. The TA had launched a poppy eradication programme in conjunction with the governors of the five main drug-producing provinces. Although it was too early to evaluate the effectiveness of that campaign, it was clear that alternative livelihoods in drug-producing areas were needed for the eradication programme to be sustainable over the long term.

On 24 February, the Council was briefed on the latest developments in Afghanistan by Jean-Marie Guehenno, Under-Secretary-General (USG) for Peacekeeping Operations. Also participating in the meeting were Harald Braun, Special Representative of the German Government for the training of the Afghan police force, at the request of Germany [S/2003/200], and Mutsuyoshi Nishimura, Ambassador of Japan in charge of Afghan Aid Coordination, at the request of Japan [S/2003/209].

The USG said that progress had been made with respect to the implementation of the political transition outlined in the 2001 Bonn Agreement [YUN 2001, p. 263], especially in the drafting of a new constitution. President Karzai's office was preparing a decree that would establish the Constitutional Commission and detail the main elements of the constitutional process. The nine members of the functioning Constitutional Drafting Commission would be made part of the larger Constitutional Commission, to be established in March. A list of almost 80 candidates for possible selection to the Commission had been compiled by President Karzai's office. Public consultations on the constitutional process would take place between April and June throughout the country and among the Afghan diaspora in Iran and Pakistan. Technical assistance from UNAMA, UNDP, bilateral donors and academic sources had been made available to the Drafting Commission and its secretariat. Progress had also been made in the preparations for the elections, scheduled for June 2004. On 15 February, President Karzai sent the Secretary-General a letter formally requesting UNAMA's assistance in organizing the electoral process and coordinating international electoral assistance. The head of UNAMA's electoral section, who had arrived in Kabul, had begun to work on preparations for the elections. A core team of electoral experts was in the process of being deployed to UNAMA. On the Afghan side, President Karzai had identified a number of candidates for membership in the electoral commission, which was expected to be formed in March. Once the commission was established, it would work with UNAMA to create an Afghan electoral authority to manage the electoral process. At the same time, the TA was finalizing its budget for the next financial year, which would begin on 21 March. Afghans were optimistic that the international community would fulfil the commitments it had already made for 2003. The TA looked forward to receiving between $1.7 billion and $2 billion in aid for 2003. However, it was concerned about the slow pace of allocations.

While the Bonn process had averted full-scale fighting between major rival factions, Afghans continued to suffer on a human level from the insecurity created by the conjunction of weak national security institutions and strong local commanders. In eastern Afghanistan, the Government's poppy-eradication campaign continued to face strong opposition from local tribes who did not feel they had been offered sufficient compensation. UN activities had been suspended in four districts in Nangarhar as a result of that tension. Despite a general sense of concern about security conditions across the country, the handover of ISAF command from Turkey to Germany and the Netherlands proceeded smoothly (see p. 308). The challenges of reforming the Afghan security sector were significant: the national army needed to be built, factional armies had to be dissolved, and assistance had to be provided to help ex-combatants reintegrate into civilian life. There was also a need for the creation of a national police force, the re-establishment of the rule of law, the rehabilitation of the justice sector and the countering of the cultivation of and trafficking in illicit drugs. Finally, the bloated and intrusive intelligence structures also needed to be reformed. Security sector reform was all the more urgent because of the need to provide minimal conditions of stability to ensure that the Constitutional Loya Jirga and the national elections were meaningful and credible. The United Nations had established four trust funds for contributions to the police, the justice sector, disarmament, demobilization and reintegration (DDR) of former combatants and the payment of salaries, and the provision of non-lethal equipment to the Afghan national army. While support from the international community was necessary, the political underpinnings of security sector reform had to be strengthened by the deeds and words of the TA.

Mr. Nishimura said that Afghanistan was still replete with weapons and armaments and, despite some notable progress, there was a high level of tension between the armed formations. Nation-building could not succeed under those conditions, nor could national reconciliation be achieved. For the people of Afghanistan, the restoration of peace and the rule of law was their greatest aspiration. There was unanimous agreement among all parties that DDR of soldiers and officers was of the highest priority. However, a new national army and national police force also had to be created to allow the State to exercise the sole enforcement capacity. Counter-narcotics actions and an independent judiciary were likewise necessary. Mindful of those considerations, President Karzai, on 1 December 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 271], had issued a decree outlining principles and conditions with respect to security, the military and DDR. The decree stated that a new Afghanistan National Army (ANA) would be created of not more than 70,000 soldiers. More importantly, the decree stipulated that military formations, armed groups and any other military or paramilitary units that were not a part of ANA would be prohibited. On 11 January 2003, President Karzai took further steps to move ahead with DDR by issuing decrees establishing four government commissions. Nevertheless, it was anticipated that DDR in Afghanistan would be difficult in view of the heavy legacy of factional rivalries. The fact that a new army had to be built in parallel with DDR added to the complexity of the undertaking. Japan had pledged a contribution of $35 million to jump-start the Partnership for Peace Programme, a basic component of the DDR process. Ultimately, the success of DDR would depend on the economic capacity of the country itself and on its ability to generate enough job opportunities to absorb former combatants.

Mr. Braun said that Germany had assumed the lead role in rebuilding the Afghan police force.

Based on an assessment carried out in 2002 by German and Afghan experts and in coordination with other lead nations in the security sector, a three-stage timetable was established. In the first stage, starting with the Bonn process in late 2001 [YUN 2001, p. 263] and running to the Emergency Loya Jirga in June 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 266], the basic structures of the new national police were created in Kabul. The second stage, which was under way and set to last until the 2004 parliamentary elections, comprised the consolidation and expansion of central structures in Kabul and the gradual extension of those structures into the provinces. The third stage would ensure the functionality of federal and provincial police forces and their interlinking with other security structures, in addition to the gradual withdrawal of Germany as a lead nation by the end of 2005. The implementation of the timetable faced some difficulties: the security situation had not significantly improved, with the exception of Kabul, where ISAF guaranteed a reasonably secure environment; regional cooperation in the effort to include all provinces in police training had not been uniformly satisfactory; progress had been difficult in the reconstruction of other security sectors, such as the army and in the fight against illicit drugs; and financing had also been a problem. Notwithstanding those restraining factors, the timetable remained on course. Among other things, the groundwork had been laid for a functioning police force in Kabul; training courses for police officers had begun; the reorganization of the police and of the Ministry of the Interior was making good progress; and the integration of the provinces into the police rebuilding programme had commenced. A strategy for national police reconstruction through 2005 that was synchronized with advances in demobilization and armed forces build-up was being fine-tuned by the Ministry of the Interior. However, much remained to be done before the Bonn process became irreversible and before the Afghan Government could acquire the structures and gain the experience necessary for carrying forward the building process on its own.

Following the open meeting, the Council held a constructive exchange of views [S/PV.4712] with Mr. Braun and the USG for Peacekeeping Operations.

Communications (March). On 4 March [A/57/759-S/2003/332], Malaysia, as Chairman of the Coordinating Bureau of the Non-Aligned Movement, transmitted to the Secretary-General the documents adopted at the Thirteenth Conference of Heads of State or Government of the Non-Aligned Countries (Kuala Lumpur, 20-25 February). In the Final Document, the heads of State or Government expressed concern that terrorist groups in Afghanistan, including former Taliban cadres, were regrouping in the southern and eastern parts of the country.

On 18 March [S/2003/335], Portugal, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States transmitted to the Security Council President the text of a statement entitled "Commitment to transatlantic solidarity" adopted at the Atlantic Summit (Azores, Portugal, 16 March). The four countries said, among other things, that they were working to bring security to Afghanistan and to root out the terrorists that remained inside Afghan territory. (For further details on the Summit, see p. 332.)

Report of Secretary-General (March). In his 18 March report on the situation in Afghanistan and its implications for international peace and security [A/57/762-S/2003/333], submitted in response to Security Council resolution 1401(2002) [YUN 2002, p. 264] and General Assembly resolutions 57/113 A [ibid., p. 273] and 57/113 B [ibid., p. 900], the Secretary-General summarized the key developments in Afghanistan since his 21 October 2002 report [ibid., p. 269]. He said that progress had been made by the Afghan TA, supported by UNAMA, in implementing the Bonn Agreement. The consolidation of government authority by the TA, in particular through the adoption of a national development budget, the successful completion of a currency reform operation, and the implementation of national programmes to provide clear, tangible economic benefits to the Afghan population had advanced. Progress was also made in key political processes to further the transition towards a multi-ethnic, gender-sensitive and fully representative Afghan Government. They included the Afghan-led constitutional process, by which a draft constitution was to be prepared by March 2003, followed by public consultations and a Constitutional Loya Jirga. Another key process was the preparation of national elections to be held in June 2004. The Electoral Assistance Division of the UN Department of Political Affairs was working with UNAMA to define the modalities for assistance.

Security remained the most serious challenge facing the peace process. Afghans in many parts of the country remained unprotected by legitimate State security structures. Criminal activity by armed groups was particularly evident in the north, east and south, and in many areas confrontation between local commanders continued to contribute to instability, while sporadic acts of terror continued to occur all too frequently. Reports from several sources in the first months of 2003 pointed to increased activity by elements hostile to the Government and to the international community in Afghanistan. It appeared that remnant Taliban groups were trying to reorganize in the south-eastern and eastern border areas. However, some progress was made in security sector reform in January with the creation of four commissions to coordinate the related processes of DDR and the building of the national army. The reorganization and training of ANA troops by France and the United States continued; six ANA battalions had been created with newly trained troops and some ANA units had been deployed on limited operations outside Kabul where they conducted patrols and supported local disarmament efforts. Those deployments, which had been generally well received by local populations, had demonstrated that the new army was developing as a professional and disciplined force. The creation of an effective national army and police depended on the successful reintegration into civilian life of members of non-official military formations. On 22 February, Japan, as lead nation for DDR, hosted a conference in Tokyo to mobilize international support for the process. Contributions and pledges totalling $50.7 million were made. Japan pledged $35 million to UNDP for DDR. Progress was also made in rebuilding the national police force. Discussions were under way on the reorganization of the Ministry of the Interior; the German-led police training programme continued; and the Government had taken steps to ensure the accountability of its police force. The Judicial Commission, entrusted with reforming the justice sector, had identified a set of priorities, which included rehabilitation of court premises and short training programmes for judges and other law officers.

Poppy cultivation and the production of and trafficking in drugs remained a major concern, both nationally and internationally. Afghanistan, once again, was expected to be the largest producer of opium in 2003. Crop eradication, based on a presidential decree, was reportedly taking place in many parts of the country, though verification remained problematic. The success of the eradication campaign would depend upon credible police enforcement and the availability of alternative sources of livelihoods to farmers. The United Kingdom, the lead nation in that sector, was working closely with a core group of government ministries, donors and the United Nations to integrate anti-drug activities and identify alternative livelihood projects.

In Afghanistan in general, the lack of adequate national security and law enforcement capacity and the weakness of the justice system exacerbated human rights violations. Abuses were committed in all parts of the country, most often by forces under the control of regional factions or local commanders. The internally displaced persons situation had stabilized somewhat, though families were still moving from the north in search of assistance. The return of the approximately 480,000 internally displaced persons to their home communities would depend on an improvement in the drought-affected areas, the resolution of land disputes and political developments in the north.

UNAMA had completed the task of assimilating the personnel and equipment of the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan and the United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Assistance to Afghanistan. The Secretary-General proposed adjustments to UNAMA's structure in a few key areas, the most important of which concerned small additions to the military and police adviser's units, and the establishment of an electoral section headed by a senior expert and supported by an appropriately sized team.

The Secretary-General observed that the TA and the international community, along with UNAMA, could draw satisfaction from a number of significant accomplishments: the timetable of the Bonn Agreement had largely been kept; some 1.5 million refugees and 500,000 internally displaced persons had returned to their homes; a comprehensive national budget had been developed; and no major outbreak of fighting had occurred. At the same time, Afghanistan's peace process remained fragile. Insecurity and the lack of law and order continued to impact negatively on the lives of Afghans, whittling away at the support for the transitional process. Too many Afghans remained dissatisfied at the pace of reconstruction and economic development and far too many remained uncertain as to whether the transitional process was truly national, providing political space and equal opportunities to all Afghans regardless of their political or ethnic affiliation. After 23 years of war, the progress made in 2002 had begun to shore up the fragile foundations of peace, but stability and national reconciliation were by no means firmly consolidated. That goal required progress on a number of fronts in 2003. Key State institutions had to be entrenched and more control over the continuing problem of security and lawlessness had to be achieved. The army and police would be key institutions in that respect and progress in the overall DDR reform effort would help to promote an improved human rights environment, economic development and the Government's ability to enhance its authority and legitimacy. Success in the constitution-drafting process would provide the legal foundations for the institutions of a peaceful, democratic Afghanistan. Specific preparations for elections in 2004 would also have to be advanced in 2003.

Security Council consideration (27 March). On 27 March [meeting 4727], the Security Council discussed the situation in Afghanistan. Assistant Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations Hédi Annabi said that UNAMA's focus over the next year would be to continue to assist the TA to consolidate its authority throughout the country and implement national policies that reached the entire nation. That effort would require enhancing administrative capacity, carrying out security sector reform and furthering the political transformation towards representative government. The determination of the Afghan Government to take the leading role in rebuilding its State and the economy was demonstrated during preparations for the 2003 national budget, which was presented to donors at the Afghanistan Development Forum (Kabul, 13-14 March) and at the Afghanistan High-level Strategic Forum (Brussels, Belgium, 17 March). The budget set the role of the State as regulator and guarantor of social well-being and enshrined the principles of geographic equity in the allocation of resources. It provided for some $2.26 billion in expenditure. The TA estimated that it would collect internal revenues of $200 million and donors had pledged $1.87 billion to date, leaving a funding gap of around $191 million in the 2003 budget. At the heart of the budget process was the issue of government ownership and leadership in setting national priorities for the overall reconstruction agenda—in other words, of transforming an ad hoc system that developed during the years of civil war, when non-governmental organizations (NGOs), the United Nations and other international organizations gradually assumed some State functions related to the delivery of services, into one where the State itself had the capacity to exercise its responsibility for national development. The United Nations had supported that transformation, working with and within ministries to build their capacity and coordinating UN programme priorities with national programme priorities. The TA had already taken steps to effect that transformation, in particular through a currency exchange exercise; through staffing changes that better reflected the ethnic composition of the population; and through the establishment of a number of commissions. Despite that progress, a number of challenges remained, in particular the need to strengthen the links between Kabul and the provinces and to augment the capacity of the provincial and local governments. Since the lack of security threatened the peace process at all levels, security sector reform and the fight against illicit drugs were paramount. Meetings were taking place in Kabul on a regular basis to allow the heads of national commissions, the various lead nations and UNAMA to come together to supervise cooperation among themselves on security sector reforms and to push various programmes and processes forward. The reforms had to be coupled with a political transformation process, of which the drafting of a new constitution and preparations for general elections in 2004 were key components. In order to support the elections, and following a February request by President Karzai, the Secretary-General had proposed the establishment of an electoral section within UNAMA. Electoral consultants, who had already been deployed to UNAMA to assist the Government with the election preparation process, had confirmed that the holding of a registration and election would be a very complex exercise. The United Nations envisioned an electoral section within UNAMA that would be able to provide expert advice and technical assistance to the Afghan electoral management body on such issues as voter registration, voter education, the development of political party laws and the development of the electoral system itself. A certain amount of institutional development had to occur and an adequate level of security had to be in place if the elections were to be meaningful and credible. The Afghan Government had to continue to establish the framework for future elections and UNAMA's electoral section had to be established and provided with adequate resources.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (March)

On 28 March [meeting 4730], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1471(2003). The draft [S/2003/380] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its previous resolutions on Afghanistan, in particular resolution 1401(2002) of 28 March 2002 establishing the United Nations Assistance Mission in Afghanistan,

Reaffirming its strong commitment to the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Afghanistan, as well as its endorsement of the Declaration on Good-Neighbourly Relations, signed by the Transitional Administration of Afghanistan and the Governments of the People's Republic of China, the Islamic Republic of Iran, the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, the Republic of Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and the Republic of Uzbekistan, the States neighbouring Afghanistan, in Kabul on 22 December 2002 and its call upon all States to respect and support the implementation of the provisions thereof,

Recognizing the Transitional Administration as the sole legitimate Government of Afghanistan pending democratic elections to be held by June 2004, and reiterating its strong support for the full implementation of the Agreement on Provisional Arrangements in Afghanistan Pending the Re-establishment of Permanent Government Institutions, signed in Bonn, Germany, on 5 December 2001 (the Bonn Agreement), in particular annex II regarding the role of the United Nations during the interim period,

Recognizing also that the United Nations must continue to play its central and impartial role in the international efforts to assist the Afghan people in consolidating peace in Afghanistan and rebuilding their country,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Assistance Mission in Afghanistan for an additional period of twelve months from the date of adoption of the present resolution;

2. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 18 March 2003 and the recommendations contained therein, endorses the proposal of the Secretary-General that an electoral unit be established within the Mission, and encourages Member States to support the United Nations electoral activities in Afghanistan;

3. Stresses that the continued provision of focused recovery and reconstruction assistance can contribute significantly to the implementation of the Bonn Agreement and, to this end, urges bilateral and multilateral donors to coordinate closely with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and with the Transitional Administration, in particular through the Afghan Consultative Group process;

4. Stresses also, in the context of paragraph 3 above, that while humanitarian assistance should be provided wherever there is a need, recovery or reconstruction assistance ought to be provided, through the Transitional Administration, and implemented effectively, where local authorities demonstrate a commitment to maintaining a secure environment, respecting human rights and countering narcotics;

5. Reaffirms its strong support for the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and the concept of a fully integrated Mission, and endorses the full authority of the Special Representative, in accordance with its relevant resolutions, over all United Nations activities in Afghanistan;

6. Requests the Mission, with the support of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, to continue to assist the Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission in the full implementation of the human rights provisions of the Bonn Agreement and the National Human Rights Programme for Afghanistan, in order to support the protection and development of human rights in Afghanistan;

7. Calls upon all Afghan parties to cooperate with the Mission in the implementation of its mandate and to ensure the security and freedom of movement of its staff throughout the country;

8. Requests the International Security Assistance Force, in implementing its mandate in accordance with resolution 1444(2002) of 27 November 2002, to continue to work in close consultation with the Secretary-General and his Special Representative;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council every four months on the implementation of the present resolution;

10. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Communication (May). On 1 May [A/57/805-S/2003/323], Tajikistan, as chair of the Collective Security Treaty Organization, transmitted to the Secretary-General the 28 April statement of the heads of State of Armenia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, the Russian Federation and Tajikistan issued at a meeting in Dushanbe. The participants said that there was a need to coordinate and harmonize action by the international community to find a final solution to the Afghan crisis and to bring about post-conflict development in Afghanistan.

Security Council consideration (May). On 6 May [meeting 4750], the Security Council discussed the situation in Afghanistan and heard a briefing on the latest developments by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Afghanistan, Mr. Brahimi.

Mr. Brahimi said that although specific aspects of the Bonn Agreement were proceeding, the process as a whole was challenged by the deterioration in the security environment: daily harassment and intimidation; inter-ethnic and inter-factional strife; greater activity on the part of elements linked to the Taliban and to the warlord Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, leader of the Islamic fundamentalist group Hizb-I-Islami; and the drug economy. The process was also challenged by the fact that national security institutions were perceived by many Afghans, perhaps the majority, as not serving the broad national interests of all the people of Afghanistan.

In an important step forward towards meeting the time frame set out in Bonn for convening the Constitutional Loya Jirga, the Constitutional Commission was inaugurated on 26 April. Composed of 35 members, including seven women, the Commission represented the full ethnic, regional and religious diversity of the Afghan people. The previously established Drafting Committee had prepared a preliminary draft constitution; over the summer months, the Commission was to consult the public on their views and aspirations related to the constitution. That would require the members of the Commission to break up into subcommittees that would visit all parts of the country and hold scores of meetings with elders, religious and community leaders, women, intellectuals, traders and ordinary people. The United Nations would support and participate in those activities. On the basis of its findings, the Commission would finalize a draft constitution and present it to the Constitutional Loya Jirga, scheduled for October, for its consideration and ratification. In reference to the elections, the United Nations was in the process of establishing UNAMA's electoral unit, and early planning for national voter registration had begun. In order to plan and effectively fulfil UNAMA's assistance in all phases of the electoral process, the electoral unit would require an element of assured funding through the assessed budget. A complementary budget for voluntary funding had also been prepared. The registration exercise would require the recruitment and training of some 3,000 Afghans who would have to spend time in each of the nearly 400 districts and visit thousands of villages. As in the case with the consultations of the Constitutional Commission, that exercise could be conducted only within a secure environment.

With regard to the drug economy, the TA was in the final stage of completing a 10-year national drug control strategy in an effort to control poppy cultivation.

The rate of assisted refugee returns to Afghanistan increased significantly during April. It was estimated that in 2003, approximately 600,000 Afghans would return from Pakistan, 500,000 from Iran and 100,000 from other countries. In the judicial sector, the Judicial Reform Commission had completed a survey of the state of the judiciary in 10 provinces and major urban centres in the country. With respect to the reform of the public administration, progress, although slow, was picking up, owing in part to the growing role of the Civil Service Commission.

As to the human rights situation, UNAMA was investigating alleged cases of summary executions, rape and other forms of sexual violence, and continuing political intimidation, including against women. Fighting and insecurity had led to renewed displacement of Pashtun families. Security remained the central issue. Rivalries among factions and local commanders, impunity with regard to human rights violations and daily harassment of ordinary Afghan citizens by both commanders and local security forces were all too common. Forces believed to be associated with the Taliban, with Al-Qaida and with the warlord Hekmatyar had stepped up operations against the coalition as well as against Afghan military and non-military targets in the south, the south-east and the east. The threat posed by those elements was driven home by the murder of an International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) worker in late March—the first such killing of a foreigner since 1998. As the attacks on NGOs and international organizations became more threatening, the pressure to suspend or withdraw operations increased. ICRC and a number of NGOs were reducing their operations in the south, with immediate consequences for key programmes that provided support to local populations. The United Nations was also reviewing its operations and its security measures. Afghanistan's neighhours played a crucial role in helping to ensure the country's security, especially since hostile elements were reported crossing into Afghanistan over the eastern and southern borders. Pakistan had expressed its readiness to address the problem and had deployed armed forces in the border areas. Insecurity was also exacerbated by continuing factional clashes. The ultimate solution to such problems was the creation of an Afghan security force capable of ensuring peace. President Karzai announced the start date of 22 June for a DDR programme to be carried out by the Afghan New Beginnings Programme, supported by the international community, with Japan and the United Nations in the lead. The planned DDR programme would include those officers and soldiers who were in military formations under the umbrella of the Ministry of Defence, up to a maximum of 100,000 persons. However, before the DDR programme could start, there was a need to reform the Ministry of Defence, the Ministry of the Interior and the intelligence structures. Encouraging progress had been made in the building of a new national army and a national police service, but those efforts and the nationwide DDR programme would be successful only if there was confidence among all Afghans that the new security structures would serve the interests of the whole nation. The senior leaders of the Afghan military met in Kabul on 19 and 20 April to discuss the building of the new army. Their verbal expressions of support for a new multi-ethnic army had to be matched by actions to demobilize their own forces to ensure that the new army would be under civilian control and the only instrument of force remaining in the country. The Special Representative asked the Security Council to consider what international measures were available to help ensure the security needed for the Bonn process to proceed effectively. The expansion of ISAF beyond Kabul and a strengthened Afghan police presence remained part of a potential response to the question of security. However, the United Nations Law and Order Trust Fund for Afghanistan was insufficient to allow the Ministry of the Interior to strengthen the Afghan police. Of the $120 million the Trust Fund expected to cover needs until June 2004, only $11 million had been paid into the Fund and a further $35 million to $40 million had been pledged.

Communications (June). On 3 June [A/57/824-S/2003/619], Iran transmitted to the Secretary-General the documents adopted by the Islamic Conference of Foreign Ministers at its thirtieth session (Tehran, 28-30 May). The Conference, among other things, called on the international community to assist the Afghan TA to curb the planting of opium poppies and the production and trafficking of narcotics and to strengthen the crop substitution programme in Afghanistan.

By a 9 June letter to the Council President [S/2003/641], France transmitted the text of the Paris Statement, issued at the end of the Conference on Drug Routes from Central Asia to Europe (Paris, 21-22 May). The Conference took note of the fight against drugs undertaken by the TA and the international community in Afghanistan. It called on the international community to support the Afghan National Drug Commission and to encourage action aimed at promoting sustainable alternative development.

On 10 June [A/58/94-S/2003/642], the Russian Federation transmitted to the Secretary-General the text of the Declaration of the heads of State of the members of the Shanghai Cooperation Organization (Moscow, 29 May). The members (China, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Russia, Tajikistan, Uzbekistan) said that there was a need for the elaboration, under UN auspices, of an international strategy for comprehensive action to counter the threat of illegal drugs from Afghanistan.

Security Council consideration (June). On 17 June (meeting 4774), the Security Council discussed the situation in Afghanistan and was briefed on the latest developments by the USG for Peacekeeping Operations, Mr. Guéhenno, and by the Director-General of the United Nations Office at Vienna and Executive Director of the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime, Antonio Maria Costa.

Mr. Guéhenno said that some positive progress was made over the preceding month. Most notably, President Karzai took resolute action towards establishing and affirming the Government's authority in the provinces. Also, public consultations on the constitution commenced and planning for the electoral process was in its final stages. However, the security situation remained a serious impediment to progress and was a major risk to the entire process, and the TA's authority beyond Kabul was still too limited. The majority of provincial authorities continued to act with an autonomy that denied the TA the means to implement its national development plan. Yet the population expected the TA to improve the economic situation and the security environment. In a determined effort to assert the authority of his Government, President Karzai summoned 12 of the country's most powerful governors and regional commanders to Kabul on 20 May and threatened to resign if he failed to secure their full cooperation. The persons brought together committed themselves to implementing a 13-point decision of the National Security Council, which sought, among other things, to forbid the recruitment of private militias and military action unauthorized by the central Government, to reaffirm the ban on any individual holding both military and civilian posts and to dissolve some extragovernmental bodies. The National Security Council decision also required that all governors transfer provincial income to the central Government. However, signs that written agreements did not necessarily translate into tangible action were already visible. For example, the governor of Herat province, Ismael Khan, had already signalled his unwillingness to yield any authority to Kabul and had refused to resign one of his posts.

On 7 June, a suicide car bomber detonated a large explosive alongside a German ISAF bus, killing four personnel and one bystander and injuring 29 personnel in the most deadly attack on the international security force in its 18 months of operation. The incident underscored that Kabul was not immune to the security problems of the hinterland. In response to a series of attacks and threats to demining teams, the UN Mine Action Centre was forced to suspend all activities in 10 provinces and along the Kabul-Kandahar road. In effect, one third of the country was inaccessible to the United Nations, which seriously hindered the ability of the Organization and others to carry out reconstruction efforts and to lay the groundwork for the Constitutional Loya Jirga, for the elections and for DDR. Ultimately, national security structures would have to assume responsibility for domestic security, backed by a functioning justice system. Satisfactory progress had been made in the training of the national army and police forces by the lead nations—the United States and Germany, respectively. However, the funding for the forces' salaries was inadequate. The establishment and deployment of three international civilian-military provincial reconstruction teams, with 185 personnel, were assisting in improving security in the provinces. Those teams could provide a platform for supporting security sector reforms and for assisting in the provincial training of police. They could also carry out infrastructure work to support government authority, such as renovating police stations, rebuilding courthouses and constructing barracks for the new Afghan National Army. The commencement of DDR had been made contingent on the implementation of a series of confidence-building measures, signalling that reform of the Ministry of Defence was irreversible.

Mr. Costa said that less than 1 per cent of the land in Afghanistan was devoted to opium poppy cultivation and no more than 6 per cent of its families benefited from the resulting illicit income. The slow progress in re-establishing the rule of law was hurting the TA's ability to reduce the drug economy. In 2003, according to a preliminary survey, opium cultivation appeared to have spread to new areas, while a perceptible decrease had taken place in the traditional provinces. On balance, neither the total surface under cultivation nor the volume of output was likely to change significantly from 2002 levels. However, in the coming years, Afghanistan would continue to be the world's largest opium producer, due to the fact that over the past 20 years, the entire Afghan infrastructure in the countryside had been destroyed, resulting in a war economy in which arms, drugs, smuggling and opium had provided the means of livelihood, savings, credit and the means of exchange for almost one fifth of the economy. About 20 per cent of Afghanistan's gross domestic product was derived from that activity. The drug dealers, among them the remnants of the Taliban and Al-Qaida, had a vested interest in ensuring that the Afghan State remained weak. In pursuing their goals, they were fomenting regional strife and nourishing separatist ambitions and armed conflicts to destabilize the Government. Corruption among State officials was also both a cause and a consequence of narco-trafficking in Afghanistan. However, perhaps the greatest threat had come from the spread of HIV/AIDS because of drug injection. In some of the countries neighbouring Afghanistan, four out of every five new cases of HIV infection had been caused in that way. Unless the problem was brought under control, the risk of a pandemic in the region could not be excluded. In addition, the massive drug trafficking from Afghanistan endangered economic and social stability in the countries located along the trafficking routes, thereby fuelling crime, money-laundering and terrorist activities beyond the Afghan border. The Afghan drug economy could be reconverted to one of peace and growth if the TA was assisted by neighbouring and consumer countries to address the roots of the matter.

The United States said that it was contributing to alternative development, drug treatment and drug reduction programmes and, in addition, was helping to build Afghan national capacities for drug policy-making and enforcement. It expressed concern at the upswing in violence in both Kabul and the provinces. Taliban and Al-Qaida elements appeared to be targeting foreigners, military and civilian, rather than engaging coalition forces.

Afghanistan said that the consolidation of peace, security and stability largely depended on the international community's sustained engagement in providing the necessary assistance for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Afghanistan's social and economic infrastructure. The success of the DDR process, due to commence by the end of June, was dependent on economic growth and the creation of employment. With respect to narcotics, the Afghan Government had issued two decrees banning the cultivation, production, trafficking and consumption of narcotic drugs. However, the practical success of the implementation of those decrees rested on credible law enforcement and the availability of alternative sources of livelihood for farmers. Supporting the central institutions of Afghanistan in establishing and consolidating effective government control over the opium-producing areas was essential for any drug control strategy. Likewise, other initiatives should focus on re-establishing a sustainable rural economy not only for landowners but also for seasonal labourers and labour forces involved in the opium economy. The TA's drug strategy encompassed programmes for alternative livelihoods, the enhancement of the capacity of law enforcement agencies and the improvement of national legislation. The Afghan Government was committed to eliminating opium production through the implementation of the national long-term drug control strategy by the year 2013.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (June)

On 17 June [meeting 4774], following consultations among Security Council members, the President made statement S/PRST/2003/7 on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council reaffirms its strong commitment to the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Afghanistan.

The Council stresses that security remains a serious challenge facing Afghanistan. In particular, the Council expresses its concern over the increased number of attacks against international and local humanitarian personnel, coalition forces, the International Security Assistance Force and Afghan Transitional Administration targets carried out by the Taliban and other rebel elements. In this regard, the Council condemns in the strongest terms the attack against the Force in Kabul on 7 June 2003. The Council also expresses its concern over other security threats, including from illicit drug trafficking. The Council stresses the need to improve the security situation in the provinces and further to extend the authority of the Administration throughout the country. Against this backdrop, the Council underlines the importance of accelerating the comprehensive reform of the security sector of Afghanistan, including the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of former combatants.

The Council welcomes the establishment and deployment of international civilian-military Provincial Reconstruction Teams in the provinces and encourages States to support further efforts to assist in improving security in the regions.

The Council believes that constructive and mutually supportive bilateral and regional relations between Afghanistan and all States, and in particular its neighbours, based on the principles of mutual respect and non-interference in each other's affairs, are important for stability in Afghanistan. The Council calls upon all States to respect the Declaration on Good-Neighbourly Relations, signed by the Transitional Administration of Afghanistan and the Governments of the People's Republic of China, the Islamic Republic of Iran, the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, the Republic of Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and the Republic of Uzbekistan, the States neighbouring Afghanistan, in Kabul on 22 December 2002 and to support the implementation of the provisions thereof.

The Council reaffirms the principles established in the Political Declaration adopted by the General Assembly at its twentieth special session, inter alia, that action against the world drug problem is a common and shared responsibility requiring an integrated and balanced approach in full conformity with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and international law.

The Council recognizes the links between illicit drug trafficking and terrorism as well as other forms of crime, and the challenges posed by these activities inside Afghanistan as well as to transit and neighbouring States and other States affected by the trafficking in drugs from Afghanistan.

The Council expresses its concern at the increasing risk of the spread of HIV/AIDS associated with drug abuse in the region and beyond.

The Council stresses that security will be enhanced by continued coordinated efforts to combat the production of illicit drugs in Afghanistan as well as to interdict narco-trafficking beyond its borders. The Council recognizes that the effort to counter the problem of drugs originating in Afghanistan will be effective only when it is integrated into the wider context of reconstruction and development programmes in the country.

The Council expresses its concern that despite the efforts pursued, the volume of illegal opium production inside Afghanistan in 2002 has returned to former high levels. The Council notes with concern the assessment contained in the Opium Rapid Assessment Survey of the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime that opium poppy cultivation has been reported in several districts of Afghanistan for the first time. The Council stresses the need to promote the comprehensive international approach, carried out, inter alia, under the auspices of the United Nations and through other international forums, in support of the drugs strategy of the Transitional Administration to eliminate the illicit cultivation of opium poppy. The Council also supports the fight against illicit trafficking in drugs and precursors within Afghanistan and in neighbouring States and countries along trafficking routes, including increased co-operation among them to strengthen anti-narcotic controls to curb the flow of drugs. Extensive efforts have also to be made to reduce the demand for drugs globally in order to contribute to the sustainability of the elimination of illicit cultivation in Afghanistan. The Council welcomes the comprehensive drug strategy for Afghanistan as set out in the drugs strategy of the Transitional Administration and calls for help to be provided within the framework of that strategy. The Council also welcomes the Paris Pact, introduced at the International Conference on Drug Routes from Central Asia to Europe, held in Paris on 21 and 22 May 2003, and thanks the Government of France for convening the Conference.

The Council expresses its support for the commitment by the Transitional Administration to eliminate drug production by the year 2013 and its efforts to implement the decrees prohibiting the cultivation, production and processing of the opium poppy, including illicit drug trafficking and drug abuse.

The Council welcomes the significant contribution by the Office on Drugs and Crime and notes that the work of the Office in Afghanistan is restrained by the lack, in the opium-growing areas of that country, of general stability and security which the international community as a whole should endeavour to ensure. The Council also welcomes projects under way by individual States to counter the threat of drugs in Afghanistan. Most of these projects are long-term, which is vital to eliminate drugs on a sustainable basis. The Council underscores the pressing need to achieve as soon as possible a significant and sustainable decrease in opium production in Afghanistan.

The Council acknowledges the necessity of coordination through the lead nation on this and all other issues in Afghanistan and, in this regard, expresses its gratitude to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and Germany for their work on counter-narcotics and police issues, respectively.

The Council recognizes the problems caused to neighbouring countries by the increase in Afghan opium production, as well as the efforts made by them and other countries to interdict illicit drugs.

The Council stresses the need to promote the effective realization of anti-drug projects for Afghanistan. These efforts can be reinforced through promulgation of a comprehensive programme of action in the region and in the States of transit and destination. The Council notes in this regard a major coordinating capacity available through the Office on Drugs and Crime, and calls upon all those concerned to cooperate with the Office in order to adopt harmonized measures in this area. The Council notes the call for all those concerned to adopt compatible and harmonized measures for law enforcement and counter-narcotics efforts through support for implementation of the drugs strategy of the Transitional Administration and the Paris Pact, supported by the G-8 Summit held in Evian, France, on 3 June 2003. The Council urges donor States to work within such a consultative process to maximize the effects of their bilateral and multilateral assistance programmes.

The Council urges the international community, in collaboration with the Office on Drugs and Crime and in accordance with the drugs strategy of the Transitional Administration, to provide assistance to the Administration that addresses, inter alia, certain key areas, including development of alternative livelihoods and markets, improving national institutional capacities, enforcing prohibitions on illicit cultivation and manufacturing and trafficking in drugs, encouraging demand reduction and building up the effective use of intelligence, including aerospace monitoring.

The Council urges the international community, in collaboration with the United Nations Assistance Mission in Afghanistan and the Office on Drugs and Crime, to encourage cooperation among affected countries, specifically in strengthening border controls, in assisting the flow of information between and among appropriate security and law enforcement agencies, in combating groups involved in illicit drug trafficking and related crimes, particularly money-laundering, in carrying out operational interdiction activities and controlled deliveries, in encouraging demand reduction and in coordinating information and intelligence to maximize the effectiveness of all measures taken inside Afghanistan and beyond its borders.

The Council invites the Secretary-General to include in his next report to the Security Council and the General Assembly on the situation in Afghanistan a summary of proposals made during its 4774th meeting, held on 17 June 2003, and any commentary and response to those proposals by any Member State and to submit his relevant recommendations to the Council for its consideration.

The Council decides to remain seized of the matter.

Communication (July). On 9 July [A/58/131-S/2003/703], Kazakhstan transmitted to the Secretary-General the text of the Joint Statement by the heads of State of the members of the Central Asian Cooperation Organization (Almaty, 5 July). The heads of State said that strengthening peace and stability in Afghanistan and establishing good-neighbourly relations with that country were in keeping with the basic interests of the countries of Central Asia. Joint efforts to restore Afghanistan's economy and infrastructure would make a substantial contribution to ensuring regional security and stability.

Report of Secretary-General (July). In a 23 July report [A/57/850-S/2003/754 & Corr.1], the Secretary-General described the continuing efforts by the Afghan TA to implement the Bonn Agreement [YUN 2001, p. 263]. The deteriorating security situation was identified as the main challenge facing the Afghan peace process and the international community was called on to continue its engagement in Afghanistan. The report drew attention to measures taken by the TA to expand its authority throughout the country, the most significant of which was the 20 May decision by the Afghan National Security Council to ban private military personnel and to enforce the collection of provincial revenues. The TA had also made progress in civil service reform through the establishment of the Independent Reforms Commission of Administrative and Civil Services. The constitutional process had progressed with the establishment of the Constitutional Commission, which conducted public consultations throughout the country in June and July. A draft constitution would be made public in September and would be discussed at the Constitutional Loya Jirga, scheduled for October. Preparations for national elections continued. The TA had decided to establish an Interim Afghan Election Commission, which would allow for greater Afghan involvement in the electoral process. The furthering of the political process, together with reconstruction programmes, the improvement in the human rights situation, counter-narcotics programmes, and other aspects of the Bonn process, all depended to a great extent on the security situation. It was noted that security conditions had deteriorated in many parts of the country. Despite progress made in rebuilding the national army and police, much more needed to be done to reform the security sector, and there remained a need for international security assistance beyond Kabul. In view of continuing threats against journalists, the importance of reforming the press law was emphasized. The report also highlighted efforts by the TA and the United Nations to address women's rights, the status of refugee returns, health care and the reconstruction of transportation infrastructure.

The Secretary-General reported that, on 16 April, NATO had stated that it would assume control of ISAF following the completion of the lead command by Germany and the Netherlands in August. NATO command should provide more stability to the Force, particularly by eliminating the need to find a new lead country every six months.

On 17 June, in response to cross-border infiltration of forces opposed to the TA, Afghanistan, Pakistan and the United States established a commission to determine the origin of cross-border attacks and to find mutually agreeable solutions.

UNAMA activities included the establishment of the United Nations Operations Centre in Kabul to assist in the co-location of staff and the bringing together of UN constituent agencies. UNAMA was also conducting a review of its management structure, part of its efforts to enhance the integration of policy coordination between the various components of the Mission and among the members of the UN country team. The Secretary-General proposed that the Military Advisory Unit be enlarged by a further four military liaison officers, bringing the total strength to 12 officers. That would make possible the permanent deployment of one officer to each of the eight regional field offices, and the involvement of the Unit in monitoring DDR at locations across the country in order to build confidence.

The Secretary-General observed that, in spite of considerable obstacles, the implementation of the Bonn Agreement continued to be largely on track. However, the consequences of the civil war were still apparent and strong factional interests were attempting to entrench themselves in the wake of the Taliban's collapse. Therefore, the creation of an environment where the standards of freedom and fairness enunciated in Bonn prevailed remained a major challenge.

On 30 September [S/2003/922], the Council took note of the Secretary-General's intention to increase the Military Advisory Unit to a total strength of 12 officers.

Communication (October). On 3 October [A/58/415-S/2003/952], Iran transmitted to the Secretary-General the final communiqué of the Annual Coordination Meeting of Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the Member States of the Organization of the Islamic Countries (New York, 30 September). In accordance with the Kabul Declaration on Good-Neighbourly Relations of 22 December 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 274], Afghanistan's neighbouring countries reaffirmed their commitment to constructive and supportive bilateral relations based on the principles of territorial integrity, cooperation and non-interference in each other's internal affairs.

Security Council consideration (October). On 24 October [meeting 4848], the Security Council discussed the situation in Afghanistan. The USG for Peacekeeping Operations, Mr. Guéhenno, said that as the final and most important stages of the peace process moved ahead, many of the fundamental and structural causes of insecurity remained unresolved. That was demonstrated in the northern part of the country when, on 9 October, after months of relative calm, the arrest of elements affiliated with Jamiat (an Islamic political party) sparked factional tensions that flared into the worst fighting in the region since the signing of the Bonn Agreement. Sporadic tribal and inter-factional conflicts also contributed to insecurity in the provinces of the south, south-east and east, but the primary source of insecurity remained the risk of terrorist attacks and continued and sizeable cross-border infiltrations by suspected Taliban, Al-Qaida and Hizb-I-Islami elements. In several border districts, the Taliban had been able to establish de facto control over district administration. Attacks by terrorists against government, military and humanitarian personnel were steadily increasing. The trend towards the targeting of civilians who supported the central Government and the peace process indicated that the United Nations itself had to be viewed as a potential target. As a result, the United Nations and the humanitarian community had taken further security precautions, particularly in the south. All UN missions were temporarily suspended in four southern provinces. In Kandahar, armed escorts were required in four districts, and the missions were suspended in another five. Those precautions were restricting reconstruction and the political process, including UNAMA's ability to ensure effective monitoring of the registration of electors for the Constitutional Loya Jirga in the south of the country. Despite serious challenges, the TA had made some progress in addressing the causes of insecurity. In fact, reform of the senior level of the Ministry of Defence had been completed. Although the reform was less sweeping than expected, it marked a step in the right direction to permit the pilot DDR programme to commence. In September, President Karzai postponed the Constitutional Loya Jirga until the end of Ramadan, which fell between the end of November and early December. The revised schedule had provided the Constitutional Commission more time for finalizing the draft constitution. The legal and institutional structures necessary for the national election were gradually being put in place. The registration decree, establishing the guidelines for voter eligibility, was finalized on 9 September and the political parties law, laying out the legal framework for the formation of political parties, was ratified on 12 October.

The Security Council's unanimous adoption on 13 October of resolution 1510(2003) (see p. 310), by which it expanded ISAF beyond Kabul, was a welcome and much needed development. Also, Germany's decision to deploy a Provincial Reconstruction Team to Kunduz was a welcome first step, which, it was hoped, would encourage other countries to contribute. The international community had taken steps to improve the overall security situation in Afghanistan with available assets on the ground. A joint coordination cell had been established to improve coordination between the TA, the United Nations, NATO and the coalition in support of the Bonn process. There was also a need for greater donor commitment in order to allow Afghanistan to recover from the near total devastation of its infrastructure and social capital after years of war.

Security Council mission

On 1 October [S/2003/930], the Council President informed the Secretary-General that the Council had decided to send a mission to Afghanistan from 31 October to 7 November 2003, which would be led by Gunter Pleuger (Germany). The mission's objectives would be, among other things, to review the progress achieved so far and to encourage the TA to further strengthen the implementation of the Bonn Agreement; to observe UNAMA's operations, including its role in assisting the TA in preparing for the elections, implementing the constitution and coordinating all UN activities; to observe ISAF's operations; to review the humanitarian and human rights situation; to review the implementation of the Kabul Declaration on Good-Neighbourly Relations of 22 December 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 274]; and to convey a message to regional and factional leaders about the need to reject all violence and to condemn extremist, terrorist and illegal drug activities.

Report of Security Council mission. The report of the Security Council mission to Afghanistan (31 October–7 November) was issued on 11 November [S/2003/1074]. The mission, which was based in Kabul, visited Herat and Mazar-e-Sharif and held extensive discussions on the implementation of the Bonn Agreement [YUN 2001, p. 263] and the implications of Council resolution 1510(2003) (see p. 310) with the TA, regional leaders, UNAMA, UN agencies, ISAF, the coalition forces, the diplomatic community, NGOs and civil society.

In its recommendations, the mission reminded all Afghan parties that had made a commitment to participate in the DDR process that the new national army, police and border police forces were to be responsible for security and law and order in Afghanistan, and all other armed units were to be dissolved. As a first step towards dissolution, the mission recommended that all factional forces be withdrawn from Kabul urgently. The mission drew the international community's attention to the need for enhanced assistance activities in the security sector, particularly with regard to the accelerated training and further deployment of the national police and Afghan national army, and called for further funds for the Law and Order Trust Fund. The TA was urged to take all possible measures to strengthen national unity and reconciliation and to ensure universal participation in the peace process, particularly with regard to the role of women. As a concrete measure, the mission recommended that the TA follow through with the reform of the Ministry of Defence; such reform should be extended to other key institutions. The mission recognized the difficulty of organizing general elections because of insecurity and the risk of disenfranchising a large segment of the population from the political process. It stressed the importance of tackling those issues so that the elections could be held within the time frame provided in the Bonn Agreement. In that regard, the mission noted the transitional provisions of the draft constitution, in particular the definition of a transitional period contained in it, which would include presidential elections followed by parliamentary elections as soon as possible. In order to ensure the necessary financial support and political momentum for peace and stability in Afghanistan, the mission noted with interest President Karzai's wish to convene a follow-up conference to the Bonn process early in 2004, following the conclusion of the Constitutional Loya Jirga. The Secretary-General was invited to study the possibilities for such a conference. The mission called on all Afghanistan's neighbours to fully implement the Kabul Declaration on Good-Neighbourly Relations and to redouble their efforts to help preserve peace and security in Afghanistan, especially in the southern and south-eastern areas. In order to strengthen the central Government and the basic institutions of the State, the mission recommended that the TA initiate a process of national reconciliation directed to all Afghans willing to help rebuild the country irrespective of past events.

Security Council consideration (November). On 11 November [meeting 4855], the Security Council discussed the report of the its mission to Afghanistan. The head of the mission, Mr. Pleuger, reviewed the report's main findings and recommendations, noting that the primary purpose of the mission was to send a signal to the Afghan people that Afghanistan remained high on the Council's agenda and that the international community continued to support the peace process. The mission had also sent a clear message to the local and provincial authorities that it was imperative that they stop factional fighting and cooperate with the central Government. The mission was impressed by the eagerness of the Afghans to stand together and rebuild their country. In particular, and in contrast to other crisis areas, there was, despite the continuing ethnic divisions and factional fighting, an Afghan national identity and there appeared to be no separatist tendencies.

Communication (November). On 21 November [A/58/611-S/2003/1134], India and the Russian Federation transmitted to the Secretary-General the Declaration of the Russian Federation and the Republic of India on Global Challenges and Threats to International Security and Stability, which was adopted during the visit of the Prime Minister of India, Atal Bihari Vajpayee, to the Russian Federation on 12 November. With regard to Afghanistan, both countries expressed support for the TA's work on national reconstruction and for the international community's efforts to bring peace, national reconciliation and economic revival to Afghanistan.

Report of Secretary-General (December). In response to General Assembly resolutions 57/113 A [YUN 2002, p. 273] and 57/113 B [ibid., p. 900], the Secretary-General submitted a 3 December report on the situation in Afghanistan and its implications for international peace and security [A/58/616], covering the period from July 2002 to November 2003. He also reported on emergency international assistance for peace, normalcy and reconstruction of war-stricken Afghanistan (see p. 934). Highlighting the deteriorating security situation throughout the country, the report stated that unchecked criminality, outbreaks of factional fighting and activities surrounding the narcotics trade had all had a negative impact on the Bonn process. During the reporting period, attacks on international and national staff of the assistance community had intensified. The main security threats continued to be terrorist attacks by suspected supporters of Al-Qaida, the Taliban and the warlord Hekmatyar against government forces, the United Nations and the humanitarian community. The attacks had occurred mostly in areas along the border in the south and south-east. It remained essential to create a secure environment in the south of Afghanistan so that reconstruction activities could take place. Equally crucial were the TA's efforts to extend its authority, enhance its administrative capacity and deliver socio-economic benefits on a nationwide scale. Important achievements included the rehabilitation of the national primary education system and one of the largest UN-assisted refugee repatriation efforts in history. The report concluded that the international community had to decide whether to increase its level of involvement in Afghanistan or risk failure. The mandate set in Bonn could be accomplished only if the security situation improved, allowing adequate protection to UN programmes and staff, NGOs and others assisting the Afghan population.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 5 December [meeting 70], the General Assembly adopted resolution 58/27 A [draft: A/58/L.32 & Add.1] without vote [agenda item 28].

The situation in Afghanistan and its implications for international peace and security

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 57/113 A of 6 December 2002 and all its previous relevant resolutions,

Recalling also all relevant Security Council resolutions and statements by the President of the Council on the situation in Afghanistan, in particular resolutions 1267(1999) of 15 October 1999, 1378(2001) of 14 November 2001, 1383(2001) of 6 December 2001, 1390(2002) of 16 January 2002, 1401(2002) of 28 March 2002, 1453(2002) of 24 December 2002 and 1510(2003) of 13 October 2003,

Reaffirming its continued strong commitment to the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Afghanistan, and respecting its multi-cultural, multi-ethnic and historical heritage,

Reaffirming its condemnation of all use of Afghan territory for terrorist activities, and welcoming the ongoing successful efforts of the Afghan people and the Operation Enduring Freedom coalition to combat terrorism on their territory,

Convinced that the main responsibility for finding a political solution lies with the Afghan people themselves, expressing in this regard its full support for President Karzai and the Afghan Transitional Administration, and reaffirming its continued support for the implementation of the provisions of the agreement reached among various Afghan groups in Bonn, Germany, on 5 December 2001, including the holding of free and fair elections in 2004,

Convinced also that a political consolidation aimed at the adoption of a pluralistic and democratic constitution and the establishment of a broad-based, multi-ethnic, fully representative and gender-sensitive government, which respects the rule of law, the human rights of all Afghans and the international obligations of Afghanistan and is committed to peace with all countries, can lead to durable peace and reconciliation,

Recognizing the urgent need for the creation of an effective and ethnically balanced Afghan national army, Ministry of Defence and national police force, and acknowledging the importance of the first steps taken in this regard by the Transitional Administration,

Reiterating that a fair and effective justice system that respects international norms and standards, including by ensuring the accountability of perpetrators of violations of human rights, remains of high importance,

Encouraging the Transitional Administration to consider initiating a process of national reconciliation,

Taking note of the positive developments in Afghanistan in the past two years, in particular the return of a large number of refugees and internally displaced persons, the increased Afghan ownership as illustrated by the progress in implementing education and health programmes, the development of a comprehensive national budget, the introduction of the new currency, the publication of a draft text for a constitution, the beginning of the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration process and the reforms thus far in the security sector, and stressing that these processes should be expedited and carried through to completion,

Expressing its appreciation and strong support for the ongoing efforts of the Secretary-General, his Special Representative for Afghanistan and the staff of the United Nations Assistance Mission in Afghanistan to promote peace and stability in Afghanistan, stressing in particular in this regard the highly valuable role that the current Special Representative of the Secretary-General has played throughout the ongoing process,

Reiterating that the United Nations must continue to play its central and impartial role in the international efforts to assist the Afghan people in consolidating peace in Afghanistan and rebuilding their country and its institutions, as well as in efforts to provide humanitarian assistance, provide for rehabilitation and reconstruction and national capacity-building and facilitate the orderly return of refugees,

Recognizing the need for continued strong international commitment to humanitarian assistance and for programmes, under the ownership of the Transitional Administration, of rehabilitation and reconstruction, and noting that visible progress in this regard can further enhance the authority of the Transitional Administration and greatly contribute to the peace process,

Commending the international efforts to help the Transitional Administration to provide a secure environment in Afghanistan, and stressing the need for a coordinated approach across all parts of the security sector and the importance of a national army and police force that are ethnically balanced, professional and accountable to legitimate civilian authorities,

Welcoming, in this regard, the important role played by both the International Security Assistance Force and its respective lead nations in improving security conditions in and around Kabul and other parts of Afghanistan,

Recognizing the need for Afghanistan and its neighbours to work closely together to promote peace, security, stability and mutually beneficial relations, including through trade and investment, and welcoming therefore the signature of the Kabul Declaration on Good-neighbourly Relations on 22 December 2002 and the Declaration on Encouraging Closer Trade, Transit and Investment Cooperation on 22 September 2003,

Noting that, despite improvements in the security sector, the lack of security still remains the most serious challenge facing Afghanistan and Afghans today, expressing its deep concern over a number of recent security incidents in Afghanistan, including the terrorist attacks against United Nations staff, national and international humanitarian personnel and the International Security Assistance Force, noting the necessity of further enhancing the capacity of the Transitional Administration to exercise its authority nationwide, and commending the steps already taken in that regard,

Deeply concerned about the continued increase in the cultivation, production and trafficking of narcotic drugs in Afghanistan, which is undermining stability and security, as well as the political and economic reconstruction of Afghanistan, and has dangerous repercussions in the region and far beyond, and welcoming in this context the commitment of the Transitional Administration to rid Afghanistan of this pernicious production and trade,

Recognizing that the social and economic development of Afghanistan, specifically the development of gainful and sustainable livelihoods in the formal productive sector, is an important condition for the successful implementation of the comprehensive national drug control strategy of the Transitional Administration,

Recognizing also the need for enhanced international cooperation and support to accelerate the implementation of the Afghan national drug control strategy, and looking forward in this regard to the international counter-narcotics conference in Kabul in 2004, to be hosted by the Transitional Administration, the United Nations and the United Kingdom,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Welcomes the recent Security Council mission to Afghanistan and its report, which contains several positive recommendations;

3. Stresses that the fragile situation in Afghanistan poses a continuing risk to peace and stability in the region, and expresses its determination to further assist the efforts of the Transitional Administration to prevent the use of Afghan territory for terrorism;

4. Reiterates its strong support for the Transitional Administration in the full implementation of the Bonn Agreement, endorses its priorities, as presented in the National Development Framework and national budget, which are the restoration of the economic infrastructure, the strengthening of the central government, the constitutional process, the building of a national army and police force under civilian control, the verified and fair implementation of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration, demining activities, the rebuilding of the justice system, respect for human rights, and combating illicit drug production and trafficking, and urges the international community to support the efforts in these areas;

5. Stresses the importance of strengthening the authority of the Transitional Administration, facilitating security sector reform and reconstruction efforts throughout the country and providing a secure environment for the constitutional process and the preparations for the general elections, and in this regard welcomes the recent expansion of the International Security Assistance Force mandate in accordance with the Bonn Agreement, as well as the progressive establishment of provincial reconstruction teams in various parts of Afghanistan;

6. Calls upon all Afghan groups to renounce the use of violence, respect human rights and international humanitarian law, respect the authority of the Transitional Administration and implement fully the provisions of the Bonn Agreement;

7. Welcomes the role of the Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission in the promotion and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms in Afghanistan, including through the provision of expert advice to the Constitutional Commission, and encourages the Transitional Administration and the international community to continue to provide appropriate assistance and support to allow the Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission to fulfil its mandate;

8. Stresses the fundamental importance for a peaceful, democratic Afghanistan of the upcoming constitutional Loya Jirga and elections in 2004, in accordance with the time frame set out in the Bonn Agreement for the creation of a representative government, and underscores the need for the broad and open participation of all Afghans, including women, in the political process in a secure environment;

9. Reiterates the importance of the full and equal participation of and representation by women in political, civil, economic, cultural and social life throughout the country, calls upon the Transitional Administration to protect and promote the equal rights of men and women, and notes in this respect the ratification by Afghanistan of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women on 5 March 2003;

10. Commends and strongly supports the important role of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Afghanistan and the staff of the United Nations Assistance Mission in Afghanistan in support of efforts of the Transitional Administration to fully implement the Bonn Agreement, and endorses the concept of the Assistance Mission as a fully integrated Mission under the authority of the Special Representative and with a light international footprint;

11. Calls upon donor countries to fulfil promptly their assumed commitments made at the International Conference on Reconstruction Assistance to Afghanistan, held in Tokyo on 21 and 22 January 2002, and reiterated in Dubai, United Arab Emirates, on 21 September 2003, invites them to provide additional resources beyond those pledged so far, and also calls upon all Member States to provide humanitarian assistance and to support the Transitional Administration through measures in accordance with the national development budget published by the Transitional Administration;

12. Calls upon the international community to support the efforts of the Transitional Administration to coordinate assistance, to formulate a strategy for the long-term development of Afghanistan and to allocate sufficient funds to the Afghanistan Reconstruction Trust Fund;

13. Calls upon the signatories of the Kabul Declaration on Good-neighbourly Relations to respect their commitments under the Declaration, and calls upon all other States to respect and support the implementation of its provisions and to promote regional stability;

14. Welcomes, in this regard, the signing of the Declaration on Encouraging Closer Trade, Transit and Investment Cooperation as a further sign of the commitment of Afghanistan and its neighbours to closer regional cooperation;

15. Calls upon the members of the Tripartite Commission to redouble their efforts to support peace and security in the southern and south-eastern border areas of Afghanistan;

16. Calls for continued international assistance to the vast number of Afghan refugees and internally displaced persons to facilitate their safe and orderly return and sustainable reintegration into society so as to contribute to the stability of the entire country;

17. Welcomes the efforts of the Transitional Administration to respect fully the international obligations of Afghanistan with regard to narcotic drugs, and calls upon it to strengthen further its efforts to eliminate the annual poppy crop, as well as to efficiently enforce relevant national laws and regulations against narcotic drugs;

18. Calls upon the international community to assist the Transitional Administration in the implementation of its comprehensive national drug control strategy, aimed at eliminating illicit poppy cultivation, which continues to constitute a serious threat to the successful political and economic reconstruction of Afghanistan, including through support for increased law enforcement, crop substitution and other alternative livelihood and development programmes and capacity-building for drug control institutions;

19. Supports the fight against the illicit trafficking of drugs and precursors within Afghanistan and in neighbouring States and countries along trafficking routes, including increased cooperation among them to strengthen anti-narcotic controls to curb the drug flow, and welcomes the presentation in Moscow on 29 October 2003 of the latest report of the United Nations International Drug Control Programme on drugs in Afghanistan;

20. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly every four months during its fifty-eighth session on the progress of the United Nations and the efforts of his Special Representative to promote peace in Afghanistan, and to report to the Assembly at its fifty-ninth session on the progress made in the implementation of the present resolution;

21. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-ninth session the item entitled "The situation in Afghanistan and its implications for international peace and security".

On the same day, the Assembly adopted resolution 58/27 B on emergency international assistance for peace, normalcy and reconstruction of war-stricken Afghanistan (see p. 934).

On 23 December, the Assembly decided that the item on the situation in Afghanistan and its implications for international peace and security would remain for consideration at its resumed fifty-eighth (2004) session (decision 58/565).

Communications (December). On 16 December [A/58/755-S/2004/277], Liechtenstein transmitted to the Secretary-General the report of an international meeting of experts on the theme "Building security and State in Afghanistan—a critical assessment" (Princeton University, United States, 17-19 October). Participants agreed that in Afghanistan the needs for establishing security and building of State and society were urgent and closely interconnected and that solutions had to be holistic. They urged delivery of immediate international financial assistance to both security and State-building endeavours.

On 22 December [A/58/663], Tajikistan transmitted to the Secretary-General the text of the statement on Afghanistan issued by the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the member States of the Collective Security Treaty Organization (Bishkek, Kyrgyzstan, 19 November). The Ministers noted the progress achieved by the TA with respect to State-building and the efforts made to combat extremist forces, but noted with concern the growing threat of narcotic drugs emanating from Afghanistan and the unceasing activity of extremist groups. Alongside the need to boost efforts to eradicate terrorism, it was also important to eliminate the social base of terrorism and to revive and rebuild the country's economy.

Report of Secretary-General (December). In response to Security Council resolution 1471 (2003) (see p. 295), the Secretary-General submitted a 30 December report on the situation in Afghanistan and its implications for international peace and security [S/2003/1212]. He stated that the peace process in Afghanistan had reached a critical juncture, two years since the beginning of the implementation of the Bonn Agreement [YUN 2001, p. 263]. A great deal had been accomplished, including the establishment of the TA itself, the return of some 4.2 million children to school, one third of them girls, and the beginning of security sector reform. During the reporting period, the most sensitive and potentially divisive steps of the Bonn process began: the pilot phase of the DDR programme on 24 October, the electoral registration on 1 December and the Constitutional Loya Jirga on 14 December, which was still ongoing. However, fundamental challenges needed to be overcome if the peace process was to become irreversible, in particular the problem of insecurity. The reporting period saw an increase in terrorist activity, factional fighting, activities associated with narcotics trade and unchecked criminality. Attacks on international and national staff of the assistance community and TA officials had been concentrated in the south and south-east regions. A car-bomb attack on UN offices in Kandahar on 13 November was followed three days later by the assassination of an international staff member of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in Ghazni. In the absence of sufficient forces to provide security, much of the south and south-east of the country had become effectively off limits to UN and TA officials. Lack of access to assistance or State structures risked further alienating the population, which was predominantly Pashtun. In response to the increased threats against the UN and the aid community, President Karzai, on 26 November, established two national task forces, bringing together the Afghan security ministries, ISAF, the coalition forces and the United Nations. One task force was working on short-term measures to ensure the necessary security for the Bonn process and for aid and reconstruction efforts, while the second would work on responses to security threats over the longer term.

Under the Afghan New Beginnings Programme and with financing from Japan and UNDP assistance, the pilot phase of the DDR programme began on 24 October in Kunduz province; it was later extended to Paktia province and Kabul. Hundreds of ex-soldiers and officers had been disarmed and had selected reintegration options, such as agricultural assistance, vocational training and job placement, and demining training. With the aim of establishing a 70,000-strong national army under a 10-year plan, 12 battalions had been trained under the lead of the United States, representing a total force of 6,500. The Ministry of the Interior had begun implementing reforms geared towards the implementation of a five-year plan to develop a national police service of some 50,000 members and a force of 12,000 border guards. It was projected that some 213 higher-ranking and 2,000 lower-ranking officers would be trained by mid-2004. The deployment of newly recruited police officers in three provinces had contributed to stability and public confidence. Yet, at such an early stage of the process, the number of trained police remained too low and ill equipped to provide the full support needed by the central Government in its efforts to establish itself in the provinces. In the justice sector, the civil and criminal codes and other legal frameworks were being reviewed and updated. As part of the efforts to strengthen governance at the provincial level, the justice sector was developing an integrated model of intervention in Paktia province, which combined reconstruction, rehabilitation and refurbishing of judicial and corrections buildings, and training for magistrates, administrative justice personnel, police, corrections staff and defence counsels. The absence of an international commitment to develop a penitentiary system was a significant obstacle to the establishment of institutions for the provision of law and order. The countering of narcotics activities in Afghanistan would continue to face numerous internal obstacles: an environment of rural underdevelopment, the absence of rule of law, the limitations on financial resources for law enforcement and the paucity of alternative livelihoods. Efforts to counter poppy production continued to meet with violent opposition in a number of areas.

On 11 August, control of ISAF was transferred from Germany and the Netherlands to NATO (see p. 308). In addition, three new provincial reconstruction teams were established under coalition command. Communication links had been established between provincial centres and Kabul, and between provincial police stations and the Ministry of the Interior, in an effort to expand the TA's authority across the country. Nevertheless, insecurity continued to be a significant constraint as, beyond Kabul, some factional leaders continued to resist the Government's efforts to install national appointees in the provinces and districts. The TA was working closely with UNAMA, the coalition forces, ISAF and donor Governments to formulate a nationwide stabilization plan aimed at bringing together security improvements, better local governance and reconstruction activities.

The draft constitution was made public on 3 November by the Constitutional Review Commission, the culmination of a drafting process that included a significant national consultation. The draft provided for a strong presidential system of government and a bicameral legislature, codified respect for fundamental rights and called for the nation's laws not to be in contradiction with the religion of Islam. The draft also outlined transitional measures, including those for elections. The Constitutional Loya Jirga, which commenced its deliberations on 14 December and was still ongoing as at 30 December, comprised 502 participants. Ten working committees had been established to review the draft constitution and propose amendments. While debate had been vigorous, delegates had expressed concerns about domineering attitudes expressed by jihadi groups.

The TA had established the institutional framework necessary for the voter registration process; in July it created the Joint Electoral Management Body and the Interim Afghan Electoral Commission to oversee the registration process. Lack of early donor funding caused the start of the electoral registration to be delayed from 15 October to 1 December. In addition, lack of security in certain areas of the country was delaying the deployment of registration teams to remote rural areas.

Some progress had been achieved in regional relations. On 22 September (Dubai, United Arab Emirates), Afghanistan and its neighbours signed the Declaration on Encouraging Closer Trade, Transit and Investment Cooperation Between the Signatory Governments of the Kabul Declaration on Good-Neighbourly Relations [YUN 2002, p. 274], to respect and build on their commitments to support regional political stability and mutual economic well-being. Pakistan had deployed and maintained troops along its border with Afghanistan, in order to deter cross-border infiltration of elements hostile to the Afghan Government. However, there were persistent reports of Taliban leaders operating from inside Pakistan. The tripartite commission formed by Afghanistan, Pakistan and the United States was working to address the issue of cross-border security.

In response to the increased threat of attacks against UN staff and premises, UNAMA and the UN agencies had been reviewing and, where necessary, upgrading security measures at all office compounds and residences. New UNAMA electoral offices were constructed in the eight regional centres in time for the start of the 1 December electoral registration campaign.

The Secretary-General observed that the problem of insecurity remained the main challenge to the successful implementation of the Bonn process. The political elements of that process had been carried forward by concentrating activities in city and regional centres, thereby mitigating threats that predominated in rural areas. The time had come for the international community and the Afghan Government to make the necessary commitments to complete the transition in Afghanistan. President Karzai had discussed with the Security Council mission the possibility of a second international conference and the Special Representative for Afghanistan, Mr. Brahimi, had circulated a non-paper to the TA and diplomatic corps in Kabul. The non-paper acknowledged gains made under the Bonn process, but pointed out that to ensure success further reforms were needed to broaden the representativeness of government, improvements in the security situation had to be made to end the misrule of factions and counter the terrorist threat, and more progress in reconstruction had to be made. The non-paper further argued that donor commitments were needed, beyond the timelines of the Bonn Agreement, to consolidate government authority, entrench the rule of law, counter the threat of the narcotics economy and carry Afghanistan's peace process to the point of irreversibility. The Secretary-General said that one way of addressing the issues raised in that non-paper might be the convening of a new donor conference, in the first months of 2004, to chart the way forward.

International Security Assistance Force

The International Security Assistance Force, a multinational force established by Security Council resolution 1386(2001) [YUN 2001, p. 267], was mandated, among other things, to assist the Afghan Government in the maintenance of security in Kabul and its surrounding areas. Turkey, which had assumed lead nation status for ISAF from the United Kingdom in June 2002, handed over that responsibility to Germany and the Netherlands on 10 February. Those two countries, in turn, handed over ISAF's lead command to NATO on 11 August. The event represented the first operation to be commanded by NATO outside the territory of NATO member States and it brought with it the benefit of continuity of command.

Communications (January/February). During January and February, the Secretary-General received a number of communications from Member States, pledging military personnel, equipment and other resources to ISAF: Hungary [S/2003/78], Belgium [S/2003/159] and Azerbaijan [S/2003/248].

Report of ISAF (February). In response to Security Council resolutions 1386(2001) [YUN 2001, p. 267], 1413(2002) [YUN 2002, p. 276] and 1444 (2002) [ibid., p. 278], Turkey submitted to the Secretary-General a February report [S/2003/210] on ISAF's activities, covering the period from 1 November 2002 to 10 February 2003.

Security circumstances in Kabul continued to improve during the reporting period. The calm and peaceful atmosphere in the capital had consolidated further and no major incident had occurred since the night curfew was lifted, for the first time since 1979, on 3 November 2002. Taking advantage of the improved security in the city, President Karzai asked ISAF to help the local security entities in tackling ordinary crime in some parts of Kabul. ISAF continued to assist the local community through the Civil-Military Cooperation programme, which channelled assistance in the fields of education, health and urban infrastructure through selected quick-impact projects. Arrangements for a smooth transfer of the ISAF command from Turkey to the joint German-Dutch leadership had been completed.

Communication of Secretary-General (April). On 16 April [S/2003/503], the Secretary-General transmitted to the Security Council President a 16 April letter from NATO, which stated that the North Atlantic Council had decided to continue and enhance NATO support to ISAF, beginning in August. As 14 NATO nations already contributed approximately 95 per cent of ISAF's troops, that enhanced support was a logical continuation of NATO efforts to date. The additional support would consist of the following: an in-theatre deployed composite headquarters, including the required communications and logistics support; a force commander from a troop-contributing allied nation; and strategic coordination, command and control exercised by the supreme headquarters of the allied Powers in Europe, with an ISAF operations coordination cell to involve participating nations. The political direction and coordination responsibilities would be undertaken by the North Atlantic Council in close consultation with non-NATO contributors to ISAF. Increased involvement by NATO would be within the context of ISAF's UN mandate and NATO would operate according to Security Council resolutions. ISAF would therefore continue to operate distinct from Operation Enduring Freedom.

On 23 April [S/2003/504], the Council took note of the Secretary-General's communication.

Reports of ISAF (May and August). On 19 May [S/2003/555], Germany and the Netherlands submitted to the Secretary-General a report on ISAF activities from 10 February to 10 May. The joint Germany-Netherlands command said that the security situation in Kabul had remained by and large stable and virtually similar to that in the preceding period. It seemed clear, however, that the increasing instability and rising number of incidents in the southern and south-eastern parts of Afghanistan could converge on the larger Kabul area and pose a threat to ISAF's area of responsibility. Although the TA was in charge of security structures, the international community had assumed specific responsibilities with regard to security sector reform. Key issues in that context were DDR of factional armies, build-up of the Afghan National Army (ANA) and re-establishment of a functional national police. ISAF was contributing to the training of ANA and the national police on a limited scale and stood ready to assist with the DDR process in Kabul if requested by the TA. To achieve safe and secure air lines of communications for its mission, ISAF assisted the TA in the development of Kabul International Airport. In close consultation with UNAMA, ISAF was also monitoring the constitution and election processes as the TA prepared for the convening of the Constitutional Loya Jirga.

On 11 August [S/2003/807], Germany and the Netherlands submitted to the Secretary-General their final report on ISAF, covering the period from 11 May to 11 August, up to the handover of ISAF's command to NATO. The overall security situation remained a point of concern throughout the period. However, although ISAF suffered casualties due to attacks and other incidents, it managed to improve security in and around Kabul. ISAF continued to contribute to the development of Afghan security structures by providing training support to ANA, the police and the border police. Regular contacts with Afghan authorities, the UN Special Representative and the United States military had ensured permanent ISAF input into all major processes related to security.

Communications of Secretary-General (October). On 7 October [S/2003/970], the Secretary-General transmitted to the Security Council President two communications, dated 2 and 6 October, from NATO's Secretary-General, which stated that on 1 October the North Atlantic Council had agreed on a longer-term strategy for NATO in its ISAF role in Afghanistan. The elements of the strategy comprised the political objective of supporting the Bonn process, the desired end state of a self-sustaining, moderate and democratic Afghan government, and benchmarks for a handover strategy.

On 6 October, the NATO Secretary-General transmitted to the Secretary-General information on key issues concerning NATO's possible expansion of the ISAF mission, which had been agreed to by the North Atlantic Council. It was agreed that the expansion of the ISAF mission would strengthen the TA's ability to provide a secure environment for the Afghan population; such expansion would be subject to the adoption of a Security Council resolution providing appropriate authority and the identification and provision of appropriate assets; the Provincial Reconstruction Team (PRT) in Kunduz, which Germany had offered to mount, would operate as a pilot project under a new, expanded ISAF Security Council mandate; ISAF, in principle, could expand in a progressive, flexible manner, taking into account the political context, to include other PRTs under an expanded mandate; ISAF, also in principle, could undertake temporary deployment outside Kabul, in support of specific events or processes, such as electoral or DDR-related events; and it was imperative that there be clear command and control arrangements between ISAF, Operation Enduring Freedom and PRTs.

On 13 October [S/2003/986], the Secretary-General transmitted to the Council President a 10 October communication he had received from Afghanistan's Minister for Foreign Affairs. The Minister said that, notwithstanding the considerable progress made in providing security in Kabul and the surrounding areas thanks to the assistance of ISAF, the security situation in various parts of the country remained relatively unstable and was an impediment to further progress in reconstruction and development overall. Afghan authorities welcomed NATO's intention to deploy a pilot project in Kunduz and to undertake deployments outside Kabul in support of specific events or processes subject to a new Security Council mandate. The Afghan Government therefore requested the Council to consider expanding ISAF's mandate.

Expansion of ISAF mandate

On 13 October [meeting 4840], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1510 (2003). The draft [S/2003/984] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its previous resolutions on Afghanistan, in particular resolutions 1386(2001) of 20 December 2001, 1413(2002) of 23 May 2002 and 1444(2002) of 27 November 2002,

Reaffirming its strong commitment to the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Afghanistan,

Reaffirming its resolutions 1368(2001) of 12 September 2001 and 1373(2001) of 28 September 2001, and reiterating its support for international efforts to root out terrorism in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations,

Recognizing that the responsibility for providing security and law and order throughout the country resides with the Afghans themselves, and welcoming the continuing cooperation of the Afghan Transitional Authority with the International Security Assistance Force,

Reaffirming the importance of the Agreement on Provisional Arrangements in Afghanistan Pending the Re-establishment of Permanent Government Institutions, signed in Bonn, Germany, on 5 December 2001 (the Bonn Agreement), and recalling in particular annex I thereto, which, inter alia, provides for the progressive expansion of the Force to other urban centres and other areas beyond Kabul,

Stressing the importance of extending central government authority to all parts of Afghanistan, of comprehensive disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of all armed factions, and of security sector reform, including reconstitution of the new Afghan National Army and Afghan National Police,

Recognizing the constraints upon the full implementation of the Bonn Agreement resulting from concerns about the security situation in parts of Afghanistan,

Noting the letter dated 10 October 2003 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Afghanistan requesting the assistance of the Force outside Kabul,

Noting also the letter dated 6 October 2003 from the Secretary-General of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to the Secretary-General regarding a possible expansion of the mission of the Force,

Determining that the situation in Afghanistan still constitutes a threat to international peace and security,

Determined to ensure the full implementation of the mandate of the Force, in consultation with the Afghan Transitional Authority and its successors,

Acting for these reasons under Chapter VII of the Charter,

1. Authorizes expansion of the mandate of the International Security Assistance Force to allow it, as resources permit, to support the Afghan Transitional Authority and its successors in the maintenance of security in areas of Afghanistan outside of Kabul and its environs, so that the Afghan authorities as well as the personnel of the United Nations and other international civilian personnel engaged, in particular, in reconstruction and humanitarian efforts, can operate in a secure environment, and to provide security assistance for the performance of other tasks in support of the Agreement on Provisional Arrangements in Afghanistan Pending the Re-establishment of Permanent Government Institutions (the Bonn Agreement);

2. Calls upon the Force to continue to work in close consultation with the Afghan Transitional Authority and its successors and the Special Representative of the Secretary-General as well as with the Operation Enduring Freedom Coalition in the implementation of the mandate of the Force, and to report to the Security Council on the implementation of the measures set out in paragraph 1 above;

3. Decides to extend the authorization of the Force, as defined in resolution 1386(2001) and the present resolution, for a period of twelve months;

4. Authorizes the Member States participating in the Force to take all necessary measures to fulfil its mandate;

5. Requests the leadership of the Force to provide quarterly reports on the implementation of its mandate to the Security Council through the Secretary-General;

6. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, France said it considered that ISAF's extension did not entail a commitment of its forces outside Kabul. France did not plan to involve itself in missions beyond those it was already fulfilling.

Later developments. In a later report [S/2004/222] covering ISAF activities in November and December, NATO said that the security situation in Kabul and its environs remained generally calm, but not stable. On 30 December, ISAF took the first step in expanding its supporting role to the TA by taking responsibility for the operations of the German PRT in Konduz. Five attacks on ISAF, which included rockets and improvised explosive devices, took place in December with no fatalities.

Sanctions

The Security Council adopted new measures against Osama bin Laden, Al-Qaida, the Taliban, their associates and associated entities. Those measures included a freeze on financial and economic assets, a travel ban and an arms embargo. They were to be applied by all countries against individuals and entities designated by the Sanctions Committee. The Council also requested the Secretary-General to reappoint five experts to the Monitoring Group to monitor, for a further period of 12 months, the implementation of the sanctions measures.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 17 January [meeting 4686], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1455 (2003). The draft [S/2003/48] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 1267(1999) of 15 October 1999, 1333(2000) of 19 December 2000, 1363(2001) of 30 July 2001, 1373(2001) of 28 September 2001, 1390(2002) of 16 January 2002 and 1452(2002) of 20 December 2002,

Underlining the obligation placed upon all Member States to implement, in full, resolution 1373(2001), including with regard to any member of the Taliban and

Al-Qaida, and any individuals, groups, undertakings and entities associated with the Taliban and Al-Qaida, who have participated in the financing, planning, facilitating and preparation or perpetration of terrorist acts or in supporting terrorist acts, as well as to facilitate the implementation of counter-terrorism obligations in accordance with relevant Security Council resolutions,

Reaffirming the need to combat by all means, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and international law, threats to international peace and security caused by terrorist acts,

Noting that, in giving effect to the measures in paragraph 4 (b) of resolution 1267(1999), paragraph 8 (c) of resolution 1333(2000) and paragraphs 1 and 2 of resolution 1390(2002), full account is to be taken of the provisions of paragraphs 1 and 2 of resolution 1452(2002),

Reiterating its condemnation of the Al-Qaida network and other associated terrorist groups for ongoing and multiple criminal terrorist acts, aimed at causing the deaths of innocent civilians, and other victims, and the destruction of property,

Reiterating its unequivocal condemnation of all forms of terrorism and terrorist acts as noted in resolutions 1368(2001) of 12 September 2001, 1438(2002) of 14 October 2002, 1440(2002) of 24 October 2002 and 1450(2002) of 13 December 2002,

Reaffirming that acts of international terrorism constitute a threat to international peace and security,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter,

1. Decides to improve the implementation of the measures imposed by paragraph 4 (b) of resolution 1267(1999), paragraph 8 (c) of resolution 1333(2000) and paragraphs 1 and 2 of resolution 1390(2002);

2. Also decides that the measures referred to in paragraph 1 above will be further improved in twelve months, or sooner if necessary;

3. Stresses the need for improved coordination and increased exchange of information between the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 1267(1999) (hereinafter referred to as "the Committee") and the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 1373(2001);

4. Requests the Committee to communicate to Member States the list referred to in paragraph 2 of resolution 1390(2002) at least every three months, and stresses to all Member States the importance of submitting to the Committee the names of and identifying information, to the extent possible, about members of Al-Qaida and the Taliban and other individuals, groups, undertakings and entities associated with them so that the Committee can consider adding new names and details to its list, unless to do so would compromise investigations or enforcement actions;

5. Calls upon all States to continue to take urgent steps to enforce and strengthen through legislative enactments or administrative measures, where appropriate, the measures imposed under domestic laws or regulations against their nationals and other individuals or entities operating in their territory to prevent and punish violations of the measures referred to in paragraph 1 above, and to inform the Committee of the adoption of such measures, and invites States to report the results of all related investigations or enforcement actions to the Committee, unless to do so would compromise the investigations or enforcement actions;

6. Also calls upon all States to submit an updated report to the Committee no later than ninety days from the adoption of the present resolution on all steps taken to implement the measures referred to in paragraph 1 above and all related investigations and enforcement actions, including a comprehensive summary of frozen assets of listed individuals and entities within the territories of Member States, unless to do so would compromise investigations or enforcement actions;

7. Calls upon all States, relevant United Nations bodies, and, as appropriate, other organizations and interested parties to cooperate fully with the Committee and with the Monitoring Group referred to in paragraph 8 below, including by supplying such information as may be sought by the Committee pursuant to all pertinent resolutions and by providing all relevant information, to the extent possible, to facilitate proper identification of all listed individuals and entities;

8. Requests the Secretary-General, upon adoption of the present resolution and acting in consultation with the Committee, to reappoint five experts, drawing, as much as possible and as appropriate, on the expertise of the members of the Monitoring Group established pursuant to paragraph 4 (a) of resolution 1363(2001), to monitor for a further period of twelve months the implementation of the measures referred to in paragraph 1 above and to follow up relevant leads relating to any incomplete implementation of those measures;

9. Requests the Chairman of the Committee to report orally at least every ninety days to the Council in detail on the overall work of the Committee and the Monitoring Group, and stipulates that these updates shall include a summary of progress in submitting the reports referred to in paragraph 6 of resolution 1390(2002) and paragraph 6 above;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure that the Monitoring Group and the Committee and its Chairman have access to sufficient expertise and resources as and when required to assist in the discharge of their responsibilities;

11. Requests the Committee to consider, where and when appropriate, a visit to selected countries by the Chairman of the Committee and/or Committee members to enhance the full and effective implementation of the measures referred to in paragraph 1 above, with a view to encouraging States to implement all relevant Council resolutions;

12. Requests the Monitoring Group to submit a detailed work programme within thirty days of the adoption of the present resolution and to assist the Committee in providing guidance for Member States on the format of the reports referred to in paragraph 6 above;

13. Also requests the Monitoring Group to submit two written reports to the Committee, the first by 15 June 2003 and the second by 1 November 2003, on implementation of the measures referred to in paragraph 1 above and to brief the Committee when the Committee so requests;

14. Requests the Committee, through its Chairman, to provide the Council by 1 August 2003 and by 15 December 2003 with detailed oral assessments of implementation by Member States of the measures referred to in paragraph 1 above based on reports by Member States referred to in paragraph 6 above, paragraph 6 of resolution 1390(2002) and all pertinent parts of reports submitted by Member States under resolution 1373(2001), and in line with transparent criteria to be determined by the Committee and communicated to all Member States, in addition to considering supplementary recommendations by the Monitoring Group, with a view to recommending further measures for consideration by the Council to improve the measures referred to in paragraph 1 above;

15. Also requests the Committee, based on its oral assessments, through its Chairman, to the Council referred to in paragraph 14 above, to prepare and circulate a written assessment to the Council of actions taken by States to implement the measures referred to in paragraph 1 above;

16. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Sanctions Committee activities

The Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 1267(1999) [YUN 1999, p. 265] (the Afghanistan Sanctions Committee) submitted a report [S/2004/281] covering its activities from 1 January to 31 December 2003. During that period, the Committee held 4 formal meetings and 36 informal consultations at the expert level. On 2 September, the Committee agreed to change its name, in order to clarify its identity and mandate, to the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 1267(1999) concerning Al-Qaida and the Taliban and associated individuals and entities (the Al-Qaida and Taliban Sanctions Committee).

On 7 January [S/2003/10], the Security Council, following consultations among its members, elected the Chairman and Vice-Chairmen of the Committee for a term ending 31 December 2003. On 19 June [S/2003/660], the Council agreed to elect Heraldo Muñoz (Chile) as the new Chairman of the Committee, following the departure of his predecessor, Juan Gabriel Valdés (Chile).

The main task before the Committee in 2003 was the objective assessment and evaluation of implementation by States of the arms embargo, the travel ban and the assets freeze imposed by the Council on the individuals and entities on the Committee's consolidated list. Among the Committee's achievements in 2003 were the issuance of a reformatted version of the consolidated list and its approval of the names of 77 individuals and entities for addition to the list. The list represented the Committee's key instrument for the implementation of its mandate and served as the fundamental tool available to States in implementing the sanctions measures. Both the Al-Qaida and the Taliban sections of the list were improved as a result of amendments proposed by Member States. Despite those improvements, further upgrades of the quality of information on the list remained high on the Committee's agenda. Despite the unsatisfactory number of reports submitted by States to the Committee, the reports received did, nevertheless, provide some indication of trends in State compliance. Another avenue available to the Committee was the direct monitoring, in situ, of State implementation. In that regard, the Committee benefited from the two reports submitted by the Monitoring Group (see below). The Committee also gained improved insight of the implementation by States of the sanctions measures through two visits that the Committee's Chairman undertook to selected countries. The task before the Committee remained to evaluate whether States collectively were doing enough to neutralize the Al-Qaida network and the Taliban and to prevent the supporters of those organizations from launching terrorist attacks.

Monitoring Group

The Monitoring Group on Afghanistan, which was established by Security Council resolution 1363(2001) [YUN 2001, p. 270] and reported to the Sanctions Committee, had the mandate of monitoring the implementation of the measures imposed by resolutions 1287(1999) [YUN 1999, p. 265] and 1333(2000) [YUN 2000, p. 273]. To that end, the Group would collate, assess, verify, report and make recommendations on information regarding violations of the measures imposed. Resolution 1363(2001) also called for the establishment of a Sanctions Enforcement Support Team, under the coordination of the Monitoring Group and specialized in customs, border security and counter-terrorism, to be deployed in the States bordering Afghanistan.

Communication of Secretary-General (February). On 3 February [S/2003/143], the Secretary-General informed the Security Council President that he had reappointed the Monitoring Group to monitor for a further period of 12 months, until 17 January 2004, the implementation of the measures referred to in paragraph 1 of Council resolution 1455(2003) (see p. 311) and to follow up relevant leads relating to any incomplete implementation of those measures.

Reports of Monitoring Group (July and December). In response to Security Council resolution 1455(2003) (see p. 311), the Sanctions Committee Chairman transmitted to the Council President two reports, on 7 July [S/2003/669 & Corr.1] and 1 December [S/2003/1070], on the Monitoring Group's activities.

The July report noted that during the reporting period (18 January–31 May 2003) there had been marked successes in the fight against the Al-Qaida network and in the efforts to find and detain key Al-Qaida leaders. The arrest of members of Osama bin Laden's original command team dented the organization's operational capability and provided intelligence concerning the network. That had led to the break-up of cells in a number of countries and the detention of substantial numbers of the network's supporters and operatives. However, Al-Qaida and groups associated with it still posed a threat to international peace and security. They retained strong appeal among Islamic extremist elements around the world and were able to draw on a substantial number of cadres trained in Afghanistan or at training centres elsewhere associated with the Al-Qaida network. There were also indications that the network had been able to reconstitute its level of support. The international community had created new cooperative means and measures to deal with the Al-Qaida financial support network. Numerous countries had adopted new laws, regulations and procedures enabling them to better identify and deter terrorism financing and to take action against those responsible. Despite those successes, the fight against terrorist financing was far from over. Al-Qaida was still able to exploit loopholes and had developed new techniques to acquire, utilize and distribute funds and logistical resources. Substantial funds were still available from the illicit drug trade, through charities and from deep-pocket donors for indoctrination, recruitment and training. Progress against Al-Qaida in those areas would require increased political and economic pressure and the provision of substantial technical assistance and financial aid. Charities and the use of informal transfer mechanisms such as hawala continued to pose challenges in the war against terrorist financing. Some steps had been taken in that regard, but a greater effort was still necessary to identify and designate Al-Qaida contributors and those handling their assets. Further success in bringing down Al-Qaida financial networks would require a sustained international effort, along with increased international cooperation, information sharing and coordination.

The Sanctions Committee's consolidated list, which was established by the Security Council to define the individuals and entities that were subject to Council measures, only included a small subset of known Al-Qaida operatives and others associated with the network, including persons trained in terrorism techniques. That had seriously reduced the overall effectiveness of the measures contained in Council resolutions 1390 (2002) [YUN 2002, p. 281] and 1455(2003). The principal value of the travel ban was to serve as a "political statement", intended to make it clear to countries that they should not permit members of the Taliban, Al-Qaida or associated groups to gather or seek refuge in or transit their territories. As a practical matter, few, if any, of the designated Al-Qaida members were likely to seek open entry or transit using their own name and legitimate documents. No instances had been reported to the Committee by countries of designated individuals being stopped or turned back. There had been some reports, however, of countries locating, detaining and extraditing persons suspected of supporting or participating in Al-Qaida terrorist actions. Despite the travel ban, members of Al-Qaida had retained a high degree of mobility and had been able to carry out and contribute to terrorist attacks in several countries around the world. Ostensibly unlisted Al-Qaida members remained free to move from country to country. To date, no attempts by the individuals or entities designated on the comprehensive list to breach or circumvent the arms embargo measures had been discovered or reported by any States to the Committee or the Group. Nonetheless, Al-Qaida, the Taliban and groups associated with them were still able to acquire adequate quantities of weapons and explosives where and when they needed them. That situation was reinforced by reports of a marked increase in the number and the intensity of attacks against coalition forces in Afghanistan. In addition, the activities of groups associated with Al-Qaida in Algeria, Chechnya, Kenya, the Philippines and Saudi Arabia demonstrated that the network was able to acquire all the arms and ammunition it needed for its operations. That fact emphasized the need for greater efforts on the part of all States to interdict the movement of illegal weapons to the Al-Qaida network, particularly those States bordering the above-mentioned areas. The reports submitted to the Group by 51 countries concerning implementation of the sanctions measures demonstrated a wide degree of compliance in adopting and applying the measures imposed under resolution 1455(2003) and previous related resolutions. However, almost half of the reporting States indicated that they had encountered problems with regard to incorporating the comprehensive list within their own regulatory framework. That was due, in large measure, to the absence of required minimum identification data associated with the names.

In the December report, the Group said that Al-Qaida ideology had continued to spread, raising the spectre of further terrorist attacks and further threats to international peace and security. More of those attacks were being perpetrated by suicide bombers and no region had been spared from such terrorist activities. Iraq had become a fertile ground for Al-Qaida, as it was readily accessible to Al-Qaida followers anxious to take up the battle against the coalition forces. Progress was being made, worldwide, by law enforcement agencies and military and security forces in dealing with Al-Qaida and in neutralizing its operatives and supporters. While the UN consolidated list had grown in numbers, it had not kept pace with the actions taken, or the increased intelligence and other information available, concerning Al-Qaida, the Taliban and associated individuals and entities. The list contained a total of 371 names of individuals and entities. That was a small subset of individuals and entities associated with the terrorist network and it reflected a continuing reluctance on the part of many States to provide such names to the Al-Qaida and Taliban Sanctions Committee. In many cases, States had preferred to communicate such information only through bilateral channels.

Important progress had been made towards cutting off Al-Qaida financing. A large part of its funds had been located and frozen, and many key financial managers had been incarcerated. Yet, many Al-Qaida sources of funding had not been uncovered and the network continued to receive funds from charities, deep-pocket donors and business and criminal activities, including the drug trade. Extensive use was still being made of alternative remittance systems, and Al-Qaida had shifted much of its financial activity to areas in Africa, the Middle East and South-East Asia where the authorities lacked the resources to regulate such activity. Controlling charities used for purposes that supported terrorism was proving extremely difficult as the close association of such charities with both religious and humanitarian relief purposes had made government regulation and oversight very sensitive. Even when charities had been designated, it had proved difficult to shut them down. The use of shell companies and offshore trusts to hide the identity of individuals or entities engaged in the financing of terrorism was also a difficult problem. The issue was complicated further by a reluctance on the part of States to freeze tangible assets such as business or property. Another problem pertained to the fact that almost a third of the countries that had submitted the required reports to the Committee had indicated that they had not yet incorporated all the names on the UN consolidated list in their national lists. Only about a half of the States reported that they regularly transmitted updated lists to their border services.

The arms embargo was another area of concern. The Group continued to encounter difficulties in monitoring and reporting on the implementation of the arms embargo as countries were reluctant to provide information concerning the seizure of illegal weapons and explosives believed destined for Al-Qaida, the Taliban and their associates. Several countries in the Middle East were aware that weapons were crossing their borders, but indicated that they had great difficulties in controlling such illegal traffic. The international community had to remain alert also to the increasing availability of man-portable air-defence systems to non-State actors. The scope of Council resolutions and their incomplete implementation appeared unable to stop Al-Qaida, the Taliban and their networks from obtaining whatever weapons they needed. The risk of Al-Qaida's acquiring and using weapons of mass destruction also continued to grow. The terrorist network had already taken the decision to use chemical and biological weapons; the only restraint it faced was the technical complexity of operating them properly and effectively. The possible use of a dirty bomb was also of great concern. The Group concluded that without a tougher and more comprehensive resolution—a resolution that would obligate States to take the mandated measures—the role played by the United Nations in that important battle risked becoming marginalized.

Communication (December). On 22 December [S/2003/1200], Italy transmitted to the Council President an aide-memoire concerning the reactions of the competent Italian authorities to the Monitoring Group's December report.

In 2003, the issue of Iraq tested the unity and resilience of the United Nations, and the Organization's staff in Baghdad were the target of a deliberate terrorist bombing. On 20 March, coalition forces, led by the United States, launched a military attack against Iraq without the endorsement of the United Nations and despite a concerted effort at the international level to avert the armed conflict. Following the fall of the Iraqi regime, the Coalition Provisional Authority (the Authority) was established by the occupying forces to provide for, among other things, the interim administration of Iraq. In July, the Authority established the Governing Council of Iraq as its principal body.

Prior to the launching of military action on 20 March, the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission (UNMOVIC) and the International Atomic Agency (IAEA) carried out inspection activities in Iraq with regard to its compliance with weapons-related obligations and provided the Security Council with periodic updates on their findings. The Secretary-General suspended UN activities in Iraq on 17 March and withdrew all remaining UN system personnel on the following day. As at 19 March, UN inspectors reported that they had not found any evidence of proscribed weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, although the time available to the inspectors was not sufficient to complete an overall review and assessment. UN personnel started to return to Iraq in April, following the end of major hostilities. In May, the Secretary-General appointed Sergio Vieira de Mello as his Special Representative for Iraq, whose responsibilities included coordinating all UN activities in Iraq and working with the occupying forces in rebuilding the country.

On 19 August, the UN headquarters in Baghdad was subjected to a terrorist attack, which killed 22 persons, including the Secretary-General's Special Representative, and wounded more than 150 others. The attack dealt a severe blow to the Organization's efforts to assist Iraq to return to normality.

In view of the escalation in hostile attacks against the United Nations and other foreign organizations and in the light of the overall serious deterioration of the security environment in Iraq, the Secretary-General decided, on 4 November, to temporarily relocate all UN international staff outside the country. However, the UN system continued to manage a broad range of essential assistance activities in all parts of the country, from both within and outside Iraq.

The United Nations Assistance Mission for Iraq was established in August. However, due to deteriorating security conditions, the Secretary-General decided to set up the Mission's core in Nicosia, Cyprus; additional staff were deployed to a small office in Amman, Jordan, and other locations in the region.

The Security Council, in resolution 1511 (2003) of 16 October, invited the Governing Council to provide, by 15 December 2003, a timetable and a programme for the drafting of a new constitution for Iraq and for the holding of democratic elections. It also resolved that the United Nations should strengthen and pursue its vital role in Iraq as circumstances permitted and authorized a multinational force to take all necessary measures to contribute to the maintenance of security and stability in Iraq. On 15 November, the Authority and the Governing Council signed an agreement setting out a political process for the restoration of sovereignty by 30 June 2004, and for the drafting of a new constitution and the holding of elections under that constitution.

On 22 May, the Council lifted civilian sanctions against Iraq with the adoption of resolution 1483(2003). Among other things, the resolution's adoption opened the way for the resumption of oil exports, with revenues deposited in a Development Fund for Iraq held by Iraq's Central Bank, and provided for the termination of the Sanctions Committee and the oil-for-food programme by 21 November 2003, transferring responsibility for the administration of any remaining programme activities to the Authority. By resolution 1518(2003) of 24 November, the Council established a new committee to continue identifying individuals and entities affiliated with the former Iraqi regime for the purpose of freezing their funds, financial assets and economic resources.

Work continued on the repatriation or return of all Kuwaiti and third-country nationals from Iraq, and on the return of all Kuwaiti property seized by Iraq during the 1990 invasion and occupation of Kuwait. The fall of Saddam Hussein's regime led to the discovery of mass graves in Iraq and the identification of remains, including those of Kuwaiti missing persons. The Security Council extended the mandate of the Secretary-General's High-level Coordinator, especially in view of the fact that Kuwaiti property, including its national archives, had yet to be returned to Kuwait.

The mandate of the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission (UNIKOM) was terminated on 6 October when the Council also decided to end the demilitarized zone area along the Iraq-Kuwait border.

On 13 December, Coalition forces captured Saddam Hussein, who was hiding at a farmhouse 10 miles south of his hometown of Tikrit.

By decision 58/514 of 5 December and decision 58/527 of 17 December, the General Assembly deferred consideration of, respectively, the consequences of the Iraqi occupation of and aggression against Kuwait, and armed Israeli aggression against the Iraqi nuclear installations and its grave consequences for the established international system on the peaceful uses of nuclear energy, the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons and international peace and security. It included both items in the provisional agenda of its fifty-ninth (2004) session.

UN Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission and IAEA activities

Iraqi communications (January-March). In communications dated between 1 January and 17 March, Iraq transmitted to the Secretary-General and the Security Council President daily reports on the activities of UNMOVIC and IAEA inspection teams [S/2003/2, S/2003/4, S/2003/13, S/2003/31, S/2003/32, S/2003/33, S/2003/34, S/2003/35, S/2003/37, S/2003/41, S/2003/42, S/2003/43, S/2003/47, S/2003/50, S/2003/56, S/2003/65, S/2003/68, S/2003/69, S/2003/76, S/2003/86, S/2003/87, S/2003/92, S/2003/100, S/2003/104, S/2003/105, S/2003/106, S/2003/121, S/2003/122, S/2003/133, S/2003/137, S/2003/138, S/2003/139, S/2003/144, S/2003/150, S/2003/155, S/2003/160, S/2003/165, S/2003/166, S/2003/167, S/2003/174, S/2003/175, S/2003/181, S/2003/186, S/2003/187, S/2003/188, S/2003/189, S/2003/190, S/2003/205, S/2003/206, S/2003/218, S/2003/219, S/2003/220, S/2003/221, S/2003/228, S/2003/229, S/2003/234, S/2003/236, S/2003/237, S/2003/244, S/2003/245, S/2003/250, S/2003/256, S/2003/286, S/2003/293, S/2003/294, S/2003/295, S/2003/304, S/2003/309, S/2003/315, S/2003/317, S/2003/322, S/2003/323, S/2003/324, S/2003/339].

UNMOVIC

On 18 March, UNMOVIC suspended its weapons inspection activities following the Secretary-General's decision to withdraw all UN staff from Iraq in the light of the imminent outbreak of military conflict. UNMOVIC's Executive Chairman, Hans Blix, and IAEA's Director General, Mohamed ElBaradei, kept the Security Council informed on inspection activities carried out in Iraq until that time. The Commission carried out biological, chemical, missile and multi-disciplinary inspections. On 30 June 2003, Mr. Blix ended his assignment. After the 19 August terrorist attack against the UN headquarters in Baghdad, UNMOVIC's inspection-specific equipment was transferred to the Cyprus field office, which assumed the responsibility of the management of the remaining UNMOVIC local staff in Iraq. UNMOVIC had resumed weapons inspection activities in Iraq on 27 November 2002, after a four-year absence.

By a 14 November letter [S/2003/1108], the Secretary-General proposed to the Security Council that Chen Weixiong (China) be appointed to the UNMOVIC College of Commissioners, replacing Li Junhua (China). On 18 November [S/2003/1110], he proposed that Susan F. Burk (United States) be appointed to the College, replacing John Wolf (United States). In two separate replies of 20 November [S/2003/1109], [S/2003/1111], the Council agreed with the Secretary-General's proposals.

Reports of UNMOVIC (February, May, August, November). As called for in Security Council resolution 1284(1999) [YUN 1999, p. 230], UNMOVIC submitted to the Council, through the Secretary-General, four quarterly reports on its activities.

Throughout the year, the Executive Chairman continued his practice of providing monthly briefings to the Council President and kept the Secretary-General informed about UNMOVIC's activities. UNMOVIC staff training courses were held throughout the year.

The February report [S/2003/232] said that the period under review, from 1 December 2002 to 28 February 2003, had been one of intense activity in Iraq due to the resumption of inspections and monitoring in November 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 288]. Since the arrival of the first inspectors in Iraq on 27 November 2002, UNMOVIC had conducted more than 550 inspections covering approximately 350 sites, including 44 new sites. All inspections were performed without notice and access was in virtually all cases provided promptly; in no case had the inspectors seen convincing evidence that the Iraqi side knew in advance of their impending arrival. The inspections took place throughout Iraq at industrial sites, ammunition depots, research centres, universities, presidential sites, mobile laboratories, private houses, missile production facilities, military camps and agricultural sites. At all sites that had been inspected before 1998, re-baselining activities were performed. Those included identification of the function and contents of each building, new or old, at the site. Also included were verification of previously tagged equipment, application of seals and tags, evaluation of locations for the future installation of cameras and other monitors, and the taking of samples and interviews with site personnel. At certain sites, ground-penetrating radar was used to look for underground structures or buried equipment. Inspections were effectively helping to bridge the gap in knowledge that arose due to the absence of inspections between December 1998 and November 2002.

More than 200 chemical and more than 100 biological samples had been collected at different sites. Three quarters of those had been screened using UNMOVIC's own analytical laboratory capabilities at the Baghdad Ongoing Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Centre. The results to date had been consistent with Iraq's 7 December 2002 declaration [YUN 2002, p. 288], submitted in response to Security Council resolution 1441(2002) [ibid., p. 292]. UNMOVIC had identified and started the destruction of approximately 50 litres of mustard declared by Iraq that had been placed under United Nations Special Commission (UNSCOM) supervision in 1998. Towards the end of February 2003, when the rotation of inspectors took place, the number of UNMOVIC personnel in Iraq reached a total of 202 staff, including 84 inspectors. On 19 and 20 January and on

8 and 9 February, the UNMOVIC Executive Chairman and the IAEA Director General, visited Baghdad to discuss relevant inspection and cooperation issues with Iraqi officials. The January meetings were devoted to stocktaking of the inspections that had taken place so far and to resolving certain operational issues. A joint statement, issued upon conclusion of the talks, recorded a number of matters that had been solved and some that remained unsolved, such as flights by U-2 surveillance planes, the conduct of interviews and the enactment of national legislation. At the February meetings, the Iraqi side handed over a number of papers regarding unresolved disarmament issues. However, the papers did not contain any new evidence, nor did they resolve any of the open issues. Following the February meetings, Iraq formally accepted UNMOVIC's use of aerial surveillance platforms and undertook to take the necessary measures to ensure their safety. The first such flight was conducted by a high-altitude U-2 surveillance aircraft on 17 February. During the reporting period, UNMOVIC requested 28 individuals to present themselves for interviews in Baghdad without the presence of observers. At first, none of them agreed. At the January meetings, the Iraqi side committed itself to encouraging persons to accept interviews in private and UNMOVIC started examining the practical modalities for conducting interviews outside Iraq. In February, UNMOVIC directed Iraq to destroy a proscribed missile system and some reconstituted casting chambers that could be used to produce motors for missiles capable of surpassing the 150-kilometre range limit imposed on Iraq by Council resolution 687(1991) [YUN 1991, p. 172]. The destruction process was to commence on 1 March.

The twelfth session of the UNMOVIC College of Commissioners (New York, 24-25 February) discussed, among other things, a draft paper prepared by UNMOVIC outlining clusters of unresolved disarmament issues. UNMOVIC's Executive Chairman observed that, during the reporting period, Iraq could have made greater efforts to find any remaining proscribed items or provide credible evidence showing the absence of such items. The results in terms of disarmament had been very limited and it was hard to understand why a number of measures, which were implemented only in mid-January, could not have been initiated earlier.

The May report [S/2003/580] covered the period from 1 March to 31 May and also provided a wider perspective on UNMOVIC's activities since the resumption of inspections in November 2002. The report noted that on 18 March, UNMOVIC suspended its inspection activities following the Secretary-General's 17 March decision to withdraw all UN staff from Iraq. Following the armed action against Iraq, which started on 20 March, the Coalition Provisional Authority (the Authority) organized units to identify any Iraqi weapons of mass destruction (WMD) and other proscribed items and to engage in the task of disarming Iraq, which was formerly pursued by UNMOVIC and IAEA. The findings of the relevant units established by the Authority had not been made available to UNMOVIC except through public media reports, nor had the Commission been approached by the Coalition for information or assistance. Between November 2002 and March 2003, UNMOVIC did not find evidence of the continuation or resumption of programmes of WMD or significant quantities of proscribed items from before the adoption of Council resolution 687(1991). A small number of undeclared empty chemical warheads that appeared to have been produced prior to 1990 were uncovered and, together with a few other proscribed items, were destroyed. Some 70 missiles that were determined to exceed the range limits set by the Security Council and associated equipment were destroyed under UNMOVIC supervision before its operations were suspended. Inspections and declarations and documents submitted by Iraq, not least during the period under review, contributed to a better understanding of previous weapons programmes. However, the long list of proscribed items unaccounted for was not shortened either by the inspections or by Iraqi declarations and documentation. From the end of January 2003, the Iraqi side, which until then had been cooperative in terms of process but not equally cooperative in terms of substance, devoted much effort to providing explanations and proposing methods of inquiry into such issues as the production and destruction of anthrax, the VX nerve agent and long-range missiles. Despite those efforts, little progress was made in the solution of outstanding issues during the time of UNMOVIC operations in Iraq.

By the time inspections were suspended, UNMOVIC had performed a number of inspections in order to verify intelligence information that Iraq had mobile units for the production of biological weapons. The Iraqi side denied that any such units existed and provided the Commission with pictures of legitimate vehicles, which they suggested could have been mistaken for mobile units. However, none of the vehicles in those pictures resembled the trucks described by the Coalition. Furthermore, the Commission was not able, before the suspension of inspections, to complete its inquiry into the Iraqi programmes of remotely piloted vehicles and unmanned aerial vehicles, notably to establish whether any of them were designed for the dissemination of chemical or biological weapons or had a longer range than was permitted. UNMOVIC remained ready to resume its inspection activities; the resolutions that guided its work until the armed action would continue to be implemented to the extent that they were still relevant and had not been rendered obsolete by resolution 1483(2003) (see p. 338). It was clear that most of the work performed by the Commission to date relating to the oil-for-food programme would be phased out. From the day of the first resumed inspection on 27 November 2002 until the day of the withdrawal of all UN personnel on 18 March 2003, UNMOVIC conducted 731 inspections, covering 411 sites, 88 of which had not been inspected before. During the first phase of inspections, the focus was on assessing activities and equipment at the sites, determining the changes made since 1998 and identifying existing key personnel. The early inspections provided knowledge about Iraq's programmes and about State companies involved in such activities. The second period, from mid-January to March, was characterized by reinspection of some of the sites with a more investigative approach. The largest effort was expended on industrial and research and development sites, followed by military sites. During the period 1 to 17 March, UNMOVIC made 15 requests for interviews with Iraqi scientists, bringing the total number of requests since January 2003 to 54. During that short period, nine interviews were actually conducted, bringing the total number of interviews in all disciplines to 14. All interviews were conducted under UNMOVIC procedures and format: no witnesses, recording or videotaping were allowed and interviews were conducted in locations selected by UNMOVIC. Information obtained during interviews was found useful and led in some cases to an updating of the assessments contained in UNMOVIC's list of unresolved disarmament issues.

In addition to the portable chemical and biological detectors for in situ direct determination of traces of chemical and biological agents, UNMOVIC had at its disposal advanced geophysical equipment for the search of hidden structures and storage spaces, including ground-penetrating radar; electromagnetic induction soil change mapping; computer and server forensics; and remote drilling and sampling systems for munitions. At the thirteenth session of the College of Commissioners (New York, 28 May), it was agreed that a compendium encompassing the knowledge and experience gained by UNMOVIC and its predecessor over the years would be useful as an objective record. The Executive Chairman observed that even though some of its mandated functions were no longer operable, UNMOVIC continued to be a subsidiary organ of the Security Council until the Council decided otherwise.

The August report [S/2003/844] covered the period from 1 June to 31 August. On 30 June, the UNMOVIC Executive Chairman, Mr. Blix, ended his assignment. The Secretary-General appointed the Deputy Executive Chairman, Demetrius Perricos, as Acting Executive Chairman effective 1 July. Resolution 1483(2003) of 22 May (see p. 338) underlined the intention of the Council to revisit the mandates of UNMOVIC and IAEA as set forth in earlier resolutions. Since that had yet to transpire, UNMOVIC had continued with those parts of its mandate that remained operable, such as developing monitoring and verification projects to adapt to the altered environment in Iraq following the war. The 19 August terrorist attack against the UN headquarters in Baghdad (see p. 346), which included UNMOVIC offices, caused numerous deaths and injuries among international and Iraqi staff. Two UNMOVIC local staff lost their lives in the attack. Given the routine nature of UNMOVIC's activity during the reporting period, the College of Commissioners was not convened in August.

The November report [S/2003/1135], which covered the period from 1 September to 30 November, also provided a historical review of the destruction, removal or rendering harmless of items and materials in connection with Iraq's proscribed biological programme. During the reporting period, no information was available to UNMOVIC on the results of the investigations of the United States-led Iraq Survey Group, other than the statement released to the public on the interim progress report made by the Group to the United States Senate Select Committee on Intelligence. The general impression from that statement was that most of the findings outlined related to complex subjects familiar to UNMOVIC. However, in the absence of access to the full report, UNMOVIC was not in a position to properly assess the information contained in the statement. After the 19 August attack against the UN headquarters in Baghdad, all of UNMOVIC's inspection-specific equipment was transferred to the Cyprus field office, which assumed the responsibility of the management of the remaining UNMOVIC local staff in Baghdad. The fourteenth session of the College of Commissioners (New York, 21 November) recognized the considerable verification experience and expertise of UNMOVIC, as well as its multidisciplinary approach, which it hoped would be given due recognition in any future discussions in the Security Council in the context of revisiting UNMOVIC's mandate.

A later report [S/2004/160] noted that UNMOVIC was continuing to assess material that was in the public domain on the issues pertaining to Iraq's WMD and to compare it against what was known by UNMOVIC about Iraq's various weapons programmes.

IAEA

IAEA report (January). In accordance with Security Council resolution 1441(2002) [YUN 2002, p. 292], IAEA submitted to the Council, through the Secretary-General, a 27 January update [S/2003/95] on its verification activities in Iraq. Since the resumption of inspections on 27 November 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 289], IAEA had conducted 139 inspections at 106 sites, including two presidential sites. The focus of the first phase of inspections was reconnaissance: re-establishment of IAEA's knowledge of Iraq's remaining nuclear capabilities, including confirmation of the locations of major equipment, of nuclear material and significant non-nuclear materials, and of key technical personnel. The first step of the reconnaissance phase was to inspect facilities that were known to have been of significance in the past programme and to confirm that no nuclear activities had been revived at those locations. IAEA also re-inspected several dozen facilities that had been deemed, prior to 1998, capable of supporting the resumption of a nuclear programme. The Agency reported no signs of nuclear activities at any of those facilities.

While IAEA was still continuing with its reconnaissance, the inspectors had initiated the investigative phase, with particular emphasis on Iraq's activities since 1998, focusing on those areas of concern identified by States and by IAEA. Eight sites, all of which had been associated with Iraq's past nuclear activities, were inspected to ascertain whether there had been developments in technical capabilities, organization, structure, facility boundaries or personnel. IAEA observed that, at the majority of those sites, the equipment and laboratories had deteriorated to such a degree that the resumption of nuclear activities would require substantial renovation and no signs of nuclear activity had been found. Several other facilities that had never been inspected by IAEA or by UNSCOM in the past were inspected in response to information that indicated the presence of large industrial capabilities at those locations. None of those facilities had proved to be nuclear-related or to require their declaration by Iraq.

Prior to the withdrawal of IAEA from Iraq in 1998, the Agency had removed from Iraq all nuclear-weapons-usable nuclear material. The remaining stocks of nuclear material were stored under IAEA seal in a storage facility referred to as Location C, just outside the Tuwaita complex. An inspection of Location C in December 2002 confirmed that the IAEA seals and the inventory of nuclear material remained intact. IAEA had conducted many interviews with Iraqi scientists since the resumption of inspections, some in the form of group interviews. States had expressed concerns about attempts by Iraq to procure high-strength aluminium tubes. Those concerns arose from the fact that high-strength aluminium tubes with appropriate characteristics could be used as components of equipment for the enrichment of uranium. Iraqi officials indicated to IAEA that the tubes had been intended for use in connection with a programme aimed at reverse engineering 81-millimetre rockets. The Agency conducted a series of inspections at sites involved in the production and storage of reverse engineered rockets, held discussions with and interviewed Iraq personnel, took samples of aluminium tubes and had begun a review of the documentation provided by Iraq relating to contracts with private traders. As a result of those efforts, it had been possible to confirm the existence of a programme for producing 81-millimetre rockets. While it would be possible to modify such tubes for the manufacture of centrifuges, they were not directly suitable for such use. In support of the IAEA inspections, Iraqi authorities had provided access to all facilities visited without conditions and without delay. They had also been cooperative in making available additional original documentation. However, those documents did not include any information relevant to questions and concerns outstanding since 1998. The IAEA Director General and the UNMOVIC Executive Chairman visited Baghdad on 19 and 20 January 2003, with a view to encouraging greater transparency and more proactive cooperation on the part of Iraq. IAEA observed that in the first eight weeks of inspections, it had visited all sites identified by it or by States as significant. Although not all of the laboratory results of sample analysis were yet available, no evidence of ongoing prohibited nuclear or nuclear-related activities at those locations had been detected, nor had the inspections revealed signs of new nuclear facilities or direct support to any nuclear activity. However, further verification activities would be necessary before IAEA would be able to provide credible assurance that Iraq had no nuclear weapons programme.

IAEA work programme

In response to Security Council resolution 1284(1999) [YUN 1999, p. 230], the IAEA Director General, on 19 March [S/2003/342], submitted to the Council, through the Secretary-General, the IAEA work programme for the discharge of its mandate. The nature and content of the work programme were based on an understanding of Iraq's past achievements and of its capability to support nuclear or nuclear-related activities. For IAEA to resolve the key issue of whether Iraq had revived or attempted to revive its nuclear weapons programme between 1998 and 2002, a number of key tasks needed to be implemented by Iraq. Although Iraq had initiated work on many of those tasks, it still needed to provide: a complete description of all technical activities related to nuclear weapons components research and development and production, and uranium conversion and enrichment developments; access to all documents; the names and whereabouts of all individuals requested by IAEA, and full access to Iraqi officials for purposes of interviewing; a complete description of the evolution of its industrial infrastructure since 1998; explanations of and documentation on procurement attempts and offers related to the possible development of Iraq's nuclear-related capabilities; and a full description of its post-1998 procurement system. Iraq was also required to enact comprehensive legislation that would secure the enforcement of all prohibitions associated with relevant Council resolutions. Assuming that Iraq would complete those tasks, and barring unforeseen circumstances, IAEA could, within two to three months, provide the Council with an objective assessment of whether Iraq had revived or attempted to revive its nuclear weapons programme. The Agency emphasized that the verification process always had some degree of uncertainty and could not provide absolute guarantees regarding the absence of small-scale nuclear activities. Nevertheless, an intrusive inspection system, such as the one that IAEA was implementing in Iraq, could minimize the risk of prohibited activities going undetected, and deter the revival of a nuclear weapons programme. IAEA monitoring and verification would entail: comprehensive and regular reporting by Iraq on its activities and on its imports and exports; unconditional and immediate access for unannounced inspections at any site deemed necessary by IAEA; the conduct of location-specific and wide-area environmental monitoring; real-time monitoring for the detection of radiation signatures; and the introduction of new technologies and methods of verification. Technical meetings with and interviews of Iraqi personnel would remain a key element of the monitoring and verification regime.

IAEA reports (April and October). In accordance with Security Council resolution 1051 (1996) [YUN 1996, p. 218], IAEA submitted to the Council, through the Secretary-General, two consolidated six-monthly reports, on 11 April [S/2003/422] and 10 October [S/2003/993], on the Agency's verification activities in Iraq.

In April, IAEA said that the meetings between its Director General and the UNMOVIC Executive Chairman with Iraqi officials (19-20 January and 9 February) (see also p. 317) permitted the refinement and extension of the practical arrangements for resuming inspections that had been endorsed in resolution 1441 (2002) [YUN 2002, p. 292]. Since the first group of inspectors arrived in Iraq on 25 November 2002, IAEA had carried out 237 inspections at some 148 locations, including 27 new locations. More than 1,600 different buildings were inspected. Inspections were undertaken at State-run and private industrial facilities, research centres and universities, either at locations where Iraq's technical capabilities were known to have existed in the past or at new locations suggested by remote monitoring and analysis or identified by other States. IAEA sought to determine what, if anything, had occurred in Iraq since 1998 relevant to the establishment of nuclear capabilities. The vast majority of the inspections were carried out with no prior announcement and a number of them were carried out in cooperation with UNMOVIC. IAEA's activities included a radiometric survey of Iraq's main watercourses, the reinstatement of aerosol sampling and land- and vehicle-based radiometric surveys. The Agency also implemented a programme aimed at understanding Iraq's procurement pattern. Between November 2002 and 17 March 2003, Iraqi authorities provided access to all facilities requested by IAEA, including presidential compounds, private residences and new sites, without conditions or delay. A large number of documents that detailed Iraq's pre-1991 laser enrichment programme were found in the home of a former Iraqi scientist. Iraq provided an updated list of 430 technical staff involved in the Iraqi nuclear programme in the past. IAEA conducted some interviews with individuals and groups in their workplaces, while others were conducted during pre-arranged meetings with scientists and others known to have been involved in the past with the nuclear programme. The Agency was able to interview 17 individuals at locations chosen by it. Some restrictions were imposed on IAEA at the beginning, when interviewees first refused to be interviewed without the presence of an Iraqi observer. Subsequently, two individuals accepted to be interviewed in private but without being taped. Most of those interviews proved to be of help in improving IAEA's understanding of Iraq's nuclear-related capabilities.

As at 17 March 2003, IAEA had not found in Iraq any evidence of the revival of a nuclear programme prohibited under resolutions 687(1991) [YUN 1991, p. 172] and 707(1991) [ibid., p. 188]. However, the time available before inspections were suspended on 17 March was not sufficient to permit IAEA to complete its overall review and assessment. That review would have required further investigation of various types of assets needed for Iraq to develop a nuclear programme and investigation of all the possible processes of nuclear weapon development. The industrial capacity in Iraq had deteriorated substantially over the preceding decade, mainly due to the lack of equipment and of consistent maintenance by Iraq of sophisticated equipment. All previously inspected and tagged critical machine tools were accounted for. At a few inspection sites, new machine tools had been installed, and at a few others machine tools that had been inoperative in 1998 were retrofitted. Many areas of Iraqi expertise seemed to have gone through significant depletion through the years, particularly as a result of the departure of many qualified staff. Less than a third of the group that conducted Iraq's centrifuge enrichment research and development work from 1987 to 1991 remained in the company that succeeded that group. All known procured, indigenously produced and practically recoverable uranium compounds that had not been removed by 1994 had remained in IAEA custody and were stored under IAEA seal. The inspection and verification of the nuclear material subject to IAEA safeguards stored at Location C at Tuwaitha did not uncover any discrepancies. The Agency systematically explored Iraq's nuclear material production capabilities and found no indication of the revival of any facilities destroyed in 1991 that had been related to uranium concentration or conversion. IAEA investigated reports centring on documents provided to it by a number of States that pointed to an agreement between the Niger and Iraq on the sale of uranium to Iraq between 1999 and 2001. Based on its analysis, IAEA concluded, with the concurrence of outside experts, that those documents were in fact forged and the allegations were thus unfounded.

The Agency noted that on 17 March, in consultation with the Security Council President and the Secretary-General, it had withdrawn its staff from Iraq, as part of the decision to withdraw all UN staff, out of concern for their safety and following an advisory of upcoming military action.

As at that date, IAEA found no evidence or plausible indication of the revival of a nuclear weapons programme in Iraq. Nevertheless, that did not mean that IAEA had completed its investigations on whether Iraq had attempted to revive its nuclear programme between 1998 and 2002. Provided that Iraq's cooperation had remained active, and barring unforeseen circumstances, IAEA would have been able to provide the Council with credible assurance regarding the absence of such revival within two to three months of continuing verification activities. However, any such assurance, as with any verification process, would have had a degree of uncertainty. It was for that reason that IAEA would have moved to the implementation of its reinforced ongoing monitoring and verification plan, which was designed to act as an effective deterrent to and insurance against resumption by Iraq of its nuclear weapons programme, while permitting IAEA to continue to look for possible past activities. Though inspections had been halted due to the military action, IAEA's mandate remained valid, and the Agency, as the sole legal authority to verify Iraq's nuclear activities, remained ready to resume its verification activities as soon as conditions permitted.

In October, IAEA reported that it had not been in a position to implement its mandate in Iraq since 17 March. In June, however, following media reports of looting of nuclear and radioactive material at the Tuwaitha complex, the Director General requested that the Agency inspect the nuclear material storage facility near the Tuwaitha complex (see below). Since April, IAEA had analysed the wealth of additional information collected during inspections; consolidated its overall information assets and analysed a variety of new information, including satellite imagery, to update its knowledge of the relevant facilities in Iraq; refined its plan for resumed verification activities; and evaluated lessons learned through its past experience in Iraq. IAEA had also been able, with the support of member States, to continue with some of its investigations outside Iraq, following up inspections and subsequent analysis. Those post-inspections activities had revealed no evidence of the revival of a nuclear weapons programme in Iraq.

In a later report [S/2004/285], the Agency stated that it still had not been in a position to implement its mandate in Iraq during the last months of 2003.

IAEA mission in Tuwaitha

Following extensive media reports of looting of nuclear and radioactive material at the Tuwaitha complex in Iraq, the IAEA Director General requested, and the Authority agreed, that IAEA should conduct an inspection, in order to verify the nuclear material subject to safeguards stored at Location C Nuclear Material Storage Facility near the Tuwaitha complex south of Baghdad. The report on the inspection mission (7-23 June 2003) was submitted to the Security Council on 15 July [S/2003/711].

The nuclear material inspected was in two buildings: building 1 contained a large variety of uranium compounds, while building 2 contained only yellowcake and ammonium diuranate waste. The inspection team found that some safeguards seals applied to the two buildings after the December 2002 inventory verification had been removed, as the team had been informed by the Authority prior to the start of the mission. The inspection team estimated that at least 10 kilograms of uranium compounds could have been dispersed, but that the quantity and type of uranium dispersed were not sensitive from a proliferation point of view.

WMD allegations

Communications (2-24 January). On 2 January [S/2003/7], South Africa, on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement, called on the Security Council to allow the UNMOVIC Executive Chairman and the IAEA Director General to present their views in an open meeting, thus allowing the rest of the UN membership to receive a first-hand account of their reports.

On 22 January [S/2003/88], Iraq informed the Secretary-General and the Council President that, pursuant to resolution 715(1991) [YUN 1991, p. 194], it had sent its biannual declarations on the sites, equipment and materials subject to monitoring, for the period from July 2002 to January 2003, to the Baghdad Ongoing Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Centre.

On 24 January [S/2003/93], Iraq said that Iraqi scientists who had been contacted to cooperate with UNMOVIC and IAEA requests for private interviews had agreed to do so, but had requested a witness to be present during the interviews.

On the same day [S/2003/94], Iraq said that the declaration submitted by it on 7 December 2002 [YUN 2002, p. 289] to the United Nations, together with the cooperation displayed by Iraqi agencies with the inspection teams since the resumption of inspections in November 2002, proved that Iraq was acting in good faith and was resolved to fulfil its obligations, with the aim of proving that it was not concealing any activity or weapons proscribed by relevant Security Council resolutions. Attestation of those facts should lead the Council to reject American and British threats of aggression directed against Iraq.

On 24 January [S/2003/97], Turkey transmitted to the Secretary-General and the Council President the Joint Declaration of the Regional Initiative on Iraq (Istanbul, 23 January), with the participation of Egypt, Iran, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, the Syrian Arab Republic and Turkey. The participants expressed their common resolve to attain a peaceful solution to the Iraqi issue and stressed that the countries of the region did not wish to live through yet another war and all its devastating consequences. They called on the Iraqi leadership to move irreversibly and sincerely towards assuming its responsibilities in restoring peace and in cooperating with UNMOVIC and IAEA.

Security Council consideration (27 January). On 27 January [meeting 4692], the Security Council invited the Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC, Mr. Blix, and the Director General of IAEA, Mr. ElBaradei, to brief it on the latest developments in Iraq.

Mr. Blix, in reviewing the inspections regime since 1991, said that Iraq appeared not to have come to a genuine acceptance of the disarmament that was demanded of it and that it needed to carry out to win the confidence of the world. However, Iraq had, on the whole, cooperated rather well so far with UNMOVIC on issues pertaining to procedures, mechanisms, infrastructure and practical arrangements. Previewing information contained in his February report (see p. 317), Mr. Blix said that access had been provided to all those sites that UNMOVIC had requested to inspect. Nevertheless, there had been some problems. While UNMOVIC had a U-2 plane at its disposal for aerial surveillance purposes, Iraq had refused to guarantee its safety unless a number of conditions were fulfilled. There had also been a number of incidents and instances of harassment, such as demonstrations in front of UNMOVIC offices and at inspection sites, which were unlikely to occur in Iraq without initiative or encouragement from the authorities. In addition, the December 2002 declaration that Iraq had submitted to the United Nations, which contained a good deal of welcome new material and information, could also have provided supporting evidence regarding the many open disarmament issues. Reports prepared by UNMOVIC experts did not contend that WMD remained in Iraq, nor did they exclude the possibility. They did, however, point to a lack of evidence and to inconsistencies. Regrettably, the declaration did not contain any new evidence that would eliminate unresolved questions. Some of those unresolved questions pertained to whether Iraq had weaponized the nerve agent VX; evidence of the destruction of the biological warfare agent anthrax; and whether Iraq had retained SCUD-type missiles after the 1991 Gulf War [YUN 1991, p. 167]. Though Iraq continued to state that there were no proscribed items in its territory, information provided by Member States indicated the movement and concealment of missiles and chemical weapons and mobile units for biological weapons production. UNMOVIC would follow up any credible leads. It was concerned that Iraq was placing documents in the homes of private individuals, as inspectors had discovered 3,000 pages of documents pertaining to the laser enrichment of uranium inside the private home of a scientist.

Mr. ElBaradei said that IAEA had been engaged since 27 November 2002 in the process of verifying the existence or absence of a nuclear weapon programme in Iraq. An updated progress report on IAEA activities during that period was submitted to the Security Council on 27 January (see p. 319). IAEA had made good progress in its knowledge of Iraq's nuclear capabilities. The investigative inspections focused on areas of concern identified by Member States; facilities identified through satellite images as having been modified or constructed since 1998; and other inspection leads identified independently by IAEA. Iraq's December 2002 declaration was consistent with IAEA's existing understanding of Iraq's pre-1991 nuclear programme. However, it did not provide any new information relevant to certain questions that had been outstanding since 1998, in particular regarding Iraq's progress prior to 1991 related to weapons design and centrifuge development. While those questions did not constitute unresolved disarmament issues, they nevertheless needed further clarification. The inspectors, among other things, had conducted a number of interviews of Iraqi scientists, managers and technicians as a valuable source of information about past and ongoing programmes and activities. IAEA was also investigating reports of Iraqi efforts to import uranium since 1991. IAEA had emphasized to Iraqi officials the need to shift from passive support—responding as needed to inspectors' requests—to proactive support—voluntarily assisting inspectors by providing documentation, people and other evidence that would assist in filling the remaining gaps in IAEA's information. IAEA noted that inspections were time-consuming, but, if successful, they could ensure disarmament through peaceful means. It was worth recalling that in past experience with Iraq, the elimination of its nuclear weapons programme was accomplished mostly through intrusive inspections. The presence of international inspectors in Iraq served as an effective deterrent to, and insurance against, resumption of programmes to develop WMD. IAEA had found no evidence that Iraq had revived its nuclear weapons programme since its elimination in the 1990s. However, IAEA's work was steadily progressing and should be allowed to run its natural course. Barring exceptional circumstances and provided there was sustained, proactive cooperation by Iraq, IAEA should be able within the next few months to provide credible assurance that Iraq had no nuclear programme.

Communications (31 January–4 February). On 31 January [S/2003/131], Iraq responded to some of the comments made by Mr. Blix during his 27 January briefing to the Security Council. Iraq had made every effort to implement Council resolution 1441(2002) [YUN 2002, p. 292] and had supported its December 2002 declaration concerning the unilateral destruction of biological weapons with irrefutable evidence. Iraq emphasized that it had provided unlimited cooperation to both UNMOVIC and IAEA, and had declared all its proscribed programmes and taken the necessary steps to eliminate them. What remained were not WMD programmes, but rather questions about earlier programmes. The allegation that Iraq still had a WMD programme was a politically motivated lie by the United States and its vassals for the purpose of keeping the disarmament file open-ended and providing cover for aggression against Iraq. If the United States had any real, convincing evidence to contradict the Iraqi declarations, it would have presented it. The inspections carried out since November 2002 did not find anything that contradicted Iraq's declarations.

Also on 31 January [S/2003/132], Iraq said that the United States had called for a Security Council meeting on 5 February at which its Secretary of State, Colin Powell, would present what had been dubbed evidence of Iraq's possession of WMD. Iraq requested the United States, through the Secretary-General, to submit its alleged evidence to UNMOVIC or IAEA, so as to enable the two organizations to begin their investigations immediately and inform the Council of the extent to which those allegations were correct.

On 4 February [S/2003/142], South Africa transmitted to the Council President the text of the communiqué issued by the seventh ordinary session of the Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution of the African Union, held at the level of heads of State and Government (Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, 3 February). The Central Organ was of the view that a military confrontation in Iraq would be a destabilizing factor for the whole region and would have far-reaching economic and security consequences for all countries of the world, and, particularly, for those of Africa.

Security Council consideration (5 February). On 5 February [meeting 4701], the Security Council considered the situation between Iraq and Kuwait and heard a presentation by the Secretary of State of the United States, Mr. Powell, who said he had asked for the meeting for two purposes: to support the core assessments made by Mr. Blix and Mr. ElBaradei in their 27 January reports to the Council; and to provide the Council with information that the United States had obtained about Iraq's WMD and involvement in terrorism. The material came from a number of sources, including technical, such as intercepted telephone conversations and satellite photos, and from testimony from individuals. The evidence and conclusions pointed to the fact that Saddam Hussein and his regime had made no effort to disarm and were actually concealing their efforts to produce more WMD. According to the Secretary of State, intercepted telephone conversations among Iraqi officials (two tapes of which were played for the Council) and satellite photos (several of which were projected on a screen) proved that Iraq had carried out a policy of evasion and deception that went back 12 years—a policy set at the highest levels of the Iraqi Government. The voluminous December 2002 declaration submitted by Iraq was but an attempt to overwhelm the Security Council with useless information in order to give the false impression that the inspection process was working. According to sources, documents were being moved to avoid detection and hard drives of computers at Iraqi weapons facilities were being replaced. However, WMD were also being moved to keep them from being found by inspectors.

The Secretary of State stressed that his statement was backed by solid sources based on solid intelligence. Iraq was also trying to hide people, as it had not complied with its obligation to allow immediate, unimpeded, unrestricted and private access to all officials and other persons associated with the weapons programme, and it had been reported that Saddam Hussein had directly participated in the effort to prevent interviews by threatening Iraqi scientists with serious consequences. In addition, the Iraqis had never accounted for all the biological agents they admitted they had and, in addition, had never accounted for all the organic material used to make them. They also had not accounted for many of the weapons filled with those agents, such as their R-400 bombs. The United States had first-hand descriptions of biological weapons factories on wheels and on rails. The trucks and train cars were easily moved and were designed to evade detection by inspectors. In a matter of months, they could produce a quantity of biological poison equal to the entire amount that Iraq claimed to have produced in the years prior to the 1991 Gulf War. The United States knew that Iraq had at least seven mobile biological agent factories and the truck-mounted ones had at least two or three trucks each; that meant that the mobile production facilities were very few—perhaps 18 trucks. It had taken the inspectors four years to find out that Iraq was making biological weapons; Mr. Powell asked how long would it take them to find even one of those 18 trucks, without Iraq coming forward as it was supposed to do with information about those kinds of capabilities. The Iraqi regime had also developed ways to disperse lethal biological agents into the water supply and air. Iraq, in fact, had a programme to modify aerial fuel tanks for Mirage jets, allowing the aircraft to spray anthrax. As to chemical weapons, Iraq had embedded key portions of its illicit chemical weapons infrastructure within its legitimate civilian industry. That dual-use infrastructure could turn from clandestine to commercial and then back again. Inspections would be unlikely to turn up anything prohibited, especially if there was any warning that the inspections were coming. The United States estimated that Iraq had a stockpile of between 100 and 500 tons of chemical weapons agent, enough to fill 16,000 battlefield rockets. Saddam Hussein had used chemical weapons against his neighbours and his own people and had recently authorized his field commanders to use them again; he would not be giving out those orders if he did not have the weapons or the intent to use them. Iraq also had a massive clandestine nuclear weapons programme that covered several different techniques to enrich uranium, including electromagnetic isotope separation, gas centrifuge and gas diffusion. Saddam Hussein was so determined to obtain a nuclear bomb that he had made repeated attempts to acquire high-specification aluminium tubes from 11 different countries—even after inspection resumed. United States experts thought that those tubes were intended to serve as rotors in centrifuges used to enrich uranium. Iraq was also developing systems to deliver WMD, in particular ballistic missiles and unmanned aerial vehicles (UAVs). UAVs were well suited for dispensing chemical and biological weapons and there was ample intelligence that Iraq had dedicated much effort to developing and testing spray devices that could be adapted for UAVs.

The Secretary of State also said that there existed a nexus between Iraq and the Al-Qaida terrorist network. In fact, Iraq was harbouring a terrorist network headed by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, an associate and collaborator of Osama bin Laden, which operated from a camp located in north-eastern Iraq. Although Iraqi officials denied accusations of ties with Al-Qaida, those denials were simply not credible. In 2002, said the Secretary of State, Al-Qaida associates had bragged that the situation in Iraq was “good”—that Baghdad could be transited quickly. Ties between Iraq and Al-Qaida went back to the early and mid-1990s, when President Hussein and bin Laden reached an understanding that Al-Qaida would no longer support activities against Baghdad. From the late 1990s until 2001, the Iraqi Embassy in Pakistan played the role of liaison to the Al-Qaida organization. Although some claimed that those contacts did not amount to much, the Secretary of State said that hatred and ambition were enough to bring Iraq and Al-Qaida together—enough for Al-Qaida to turn to Iraq for help in acquiring expertise on WMD. Saddam Hussein was determined to keep his WMD and determined to make more. The United States would not and could not run the risk that Iraq someday would use those weapons. Leaving Saddam Hussein in possession of those weapons for a few months or years was not an option—not in a post-11 September world. Iraq posed a threat and remained in material breach of Council resolutions. By its failure to seize its one last opportunity to come clean and disarm, Iraq had put itself in deeper material breach and closer to the day when it would face serious consequences for its continued defiance of the Council. The United States Government had an obligation to its citizens—and to the Security Council—to see that resolutions were complied with. The United States wrote resolution 1441(2002) [YUN 2002, p. 292] to try to preserve the peace and to give Iraq one last chance. Iraq was not taking that one last chance. The Council, therefore, could not shrink from its duty and responsibility.

France said that by adopting resolution 1441(2002), the Council had chosen to act through the path of inspections. That policy rested on three fundamental points: a clear objective on which there could be no compromise—the disarmament of Iraq; a method—a rigorous system of inspections that required Iraq's active cooperation and that affirmed the Council's central role at each stage; and finally, a requirement—that of the Council's unity. Important results had already been achieved through the inspections regime, which had enabled UNMOVIC and IAEA to progress in their knowledge of Iraq's capacity. There remained some grey areas in Iraq's cooperation, particularly unresolved questions in the ballistic, chemical and biological domains. Those uncertainties were not acceptable.

There was evidence that Iraq could produce the chemical agents vx and yperite and that it possibly possessed significant stocks of anthrax and botulism toxin. The absence of long-range delivery systems reduced the potential threat of those weapons, but there was disturbing evidence of Iraq's continued determination to acquire ballistic missiles beyond the authorized 150-kilometre range. In the nuclear domain, there was a need to clarify in particular any attempt by Iraq to acquire aluminium tubes. It was a demanding démarche, anchored in resolution 1441(2002), that the Council had to take together. If that path was to fail and lead into a dead end, France ruled out no option, including the recourse to force. For the time being, however, the inspections regime had to be strengthened, since it had not been explored to the end. Use of force could only be a final recourse. With the choice between military intervention and an inspections regime that was inadequate for lack of cooperation on Iraq's part, the Council had to choose to strengthen the means of the inspection. To do that, the Council had to define the requisite tools for increasing the operational capabilities of UNMOVIC and IAEA. France proposed doubling or tripling the number of inspectors, opening up more regional offices, establishing a specialized body to keep under surveillance the sites and areas already inspected, increasing the capabilities for monitoring and collecting information on Iraqi territory and establishing a coordination and information-processing centre that would supply Mr. Blix and Mr. ElBaradei, in real time and in a coordinated way, with all the intelligence resources they might need. With the consent of the inspection teams' leaders, the Council could define a demanding and realistic time frame for moving forward in the assessment and elimination of outstanding issues. That enhanced regime of inspections and monitoring could be complemented by having a permanent UN coordinator for disarmament stationed in Iraq and working under the authority of Mr. Blix and Mr. ElBaradei. Iraq had to cooperate actively, however; it had to comply immediately with the demands of UNMOVIC and IAEA. Before the inspectors' next report, due on 14 February, Iraq would have to promote new elements. It was the Council's moral and political duty first to devote all its energies to Iraq's disarmament in peace and in compliance with the rule of law and justice.

Iraq stated that Mr. Powell's pronouncements on Iraq's possession of WMD were utterly unrelated to the reality on the ground. It noted that, in a 30 January statement to The New York Times, Mr. Blix had confirmed that the inspections did not support any of the scenarios alleged by Mr. Powell and he had recently said that UNMOVIC had found no proof of the presence of the mobile laboratories whose existence Mr. Powell alleged. Iraq reminded the Council that WMD programmes could not be easily hidden like an aspirin pill; inspectors had criss-crossed all of Iraq and found no evidence of them. It further referred to a recent statement by a United States official who reported complaints that United States Administration officials had exaggerated reports of WMD in Iraq and of Iraq's presumed relationship with Al-Qaida in order to bolster their case for war.

Communications (10 February). On 10 February [S/2003/164], France, Germany and the Russian Federation transmitted to the Security Council President the text of a joint declaration issued by the three countries on the situation in Iraq, appealing to other Council members to support the declaration. The declaration stated that the common aim of the international community was to disarm Iraq. There was a debate over the means to achieve that. That debate had to continue in the spirit of friendship and respect that characterized the relations of the three countries with the United States. The inspections conducted by UNMOVIC and IAEA had already yielded results. Germany, France and Russia favoured the continuation of inspections and the substantial strengthening of their human and technical capabilities. There was still an alternative to war; the use of force could only be the last resort. It was up to Iraq to face up to its responsibilities in full and to cooperate actively with the inspections regime.

On the same day [S/2003/161], Iraq transmitted to the Secretary-General the text of a television interview with President Hussein by a British former Labour Member of Parliament, Tony Benn, which contained Iraq's position with respect to the elimination of WMD. Among other things, President Hussein said that Iraq had no relationship with Al-Qaida. He also said that if the purpose of the inspectors was to make sure that Iraq was free of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons, then they could do that, for those weapons were not aspirin tablets that a person could hide in his pocket. He repeated that Iraq was free of such weapons.

Security Council consideration (14 and 18-19 February). On 14 February [meeting 4707], the Security Council heard briefings from the UNMOVIC Executive Chairman, Mr. Blix, and the IAEA Director General, Mr. ElBaradei.

Mr. Blix said that through more than 400 inspections covering over 300 sites, UNMOVIC had obtained a good knowledge of the industrial and scientific landscape of Iraq, as well as of its missile capabilities. However, as before, it did not know every cave and corner. Access to sites had been without problems, including to presidential sites and private residences. UNMOVIC had found no WMD nor any related proscribed items, only a small number of empty chemical munitions that should have been declared and destroyed. However, many proscribed weapons and items were not accounted for. UNMOVIC was aware that many governmental intelligence organizations were convinced that proscribed weapons continued to exist in Iraq. Governments had many sources of information that were not available to inspectors. For their part, inspectors had to base their reports only on evidence that they could themselves examine. The December 2002 declaration submitted by Iraq missed the opportunity to provide the fresh material and evidence needed to respond to the unresolved disarmament questions. That was perhaps the most important problem that the international community faced.

Mr. ElBaradei said that IAEA had conducted a total of 177 inspections at 125 locations. Iraq had continued to provide immediate access to all locations. IAEA had carried out, among other things, environmental sampling and radiation detection surveys. In addition, it continued to interview key Iraqi personnel. Iraq had provided further documentation on such issues as the importation of uranium and the attempted procurement of aluminium tubes, which IAEA continued to pursue. In the course of an inspection conducted in connection with the aluminium tube investigation, IAEA inspectors found a number of documents relevant to transactions aimed at the procurement of carbon fibre, a dual-use material used by Iraq in its past clandestine uranium enrichment programme for the manufacture of gas centrifuge rotors. A review of those documents suggested that the carbon fibre sought by Iraq was not intended for enrichment purposes, as the specifications of the material appeared not to be consistent with those needed for manufacturing rotor tubes. To date, IAEA had found no evidence of ongoing prohibited nuclear or non-nuclear activities in Iraq. However, a number of issues were still under investigation and the Agency was not yet in a position to reach a conclusion about them.

France said the option of inspections had not been exhausted and it could provide an effective response to the imperative of disarming Iraq. The use of force would have such heavy consequences for the people, the region and international stability that it should be envisaged only as the last resort. The reports presented by UNMOVIC and IAEA pointed out that the inspections were producing results. There were those who believed that continuing the inspection process would be a kind of delaying tactic aimed at preventing military intervention. That raised the question of the time allotted to Iraq, which was the centre of the debate. According to France, two options were available. The option of war could be seen, on the face of it, to be the swifter, though, after winning the war, peace had to be built. That process would be long and difficult, because it would be necessary to preserve Iraq's unity and to restore stability in a lasting way in a country and a region harshly affected by the intrusion of force. In the light of that perspective, there was the alternative offered by inspections, which enabled the international community to move forward on the path of the peaceful disarmament of Iraq. As to the alleged links between Al-Qaida and the Iraqi regime, France's research and information, gathered with other allies, could not establish those links. Moreover, there was a need to assess the impact that a disputed military action would have on that level. Such an intervention could deepen divisions among societies, among cultures, among peoples—divisions that could nurture terrorism.

The United States said that it was pleased that there had been improvements with respect to the inspection process, but noted that the inspectors still did not have the freedom of access around Iraq that they needed in order to do their job well. What was needed was not more inspections, nor more immediate access, but, instead, immediate, active, unconditional, full cooperation on the part of Iraq. What was needed was for Iraq to disarm. The United States had not seen the level of cooperation on the part of Iraq that was expected, anticipated and hoped for when resolution 1441(2002) was adopted. More inspections and a longer inspection period would not solve the central problem that the international community was facing. That central problem was that Iraq had failed to comply with resolution 1441(2002). The threat of force had to remain. Force should always be the last resort, but the international community could not allow the process to be endlessly strung out, as Iraq was trying to do.

Iraq stressed that it had chosen the path of peace and opted for solutions that would satisfy the international community. It was prepared to assist in making clear the true picture in order to avoid the objections of those who wished to start a war in Iraq.

The Security Council, in a closed meeting on the same day [meeting 4708], had a constructive exchange of views with the UNMOVIC Executive Chairman and the IAEA Director General.

At the request of South Africa, on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement [S/2003/153], the Security Council, on 18 and 19 February, held an open debate on the situation in Iraq [meeting 4709]. The representative of the League of Arab States (LAS), at the request of the Syrian Arab Republic [S/2003/184], participated in the discussion without the right to vote. The Council had before it a 14 February letter from South Africa [S/2003/183], which informed the Council President that Iraq had accepted South Africa's offer to send to Baghdad a team of government representatives, scientists, engineers and technicians who would share with Iraq their experience in disarmament and in how to eradicate WMD under international supervision based on the South African disarmament programme of the early 1990s.

Addressing the Council, South Africa said that the message that had emanated from the 14 February Council debate was that the inspection process in Iraq was working and that Iraq was showing clear signs of cooperating more proactively with the inspectors. Significantly, the inspectors had also had the opportunity to verify the accuracy of the information that had been provided by several countries. None of that information seemed to justify the abandonment of the inspection process and resorting to serious consequences. The Council had yet to utilize fully the inspection mechanisms of resolution 1441(2002) [YUN 2002, p. 292] that would make for more robust and intrusive inspections. South Africa urged the Council to explore fully practical options to enhance the inspection regime, such as the deployment of additional inspectors, surveillance aircraft and mobile customs teams. Although questions had been raised about how long the inspections should be allowed to continue in Iraq, South Africa recalled that there were no time limitations stipulated for inspections in resolution 1441(2002). As Mr. Blix had stated, the time frame would depend on which task one had in mind: the elimination of WMD and related items or monitoring to verify that no new proscribed activities occurred. Mr. Blix pointed out that monitoring was essential and that it would remain an open-ended and ongoing process until the Council should decide otherwise. South Africa believed that the Council had to redouble its efforts to bring about a peaceful resolution to the situation in Iraq. The United Nations was an organization founded on the need to preserve peace and security. Its credibility and legitimacy could not be undermined by the Iraq issue.

Iraq said that the United States had transformed the issue of inspections from a technical and scientific one into a political one. The United States had requested Iraq to prove that it was free of the alleged WMD, although what had been originally requested was active cooperation with the inspectors. The launching of an attack by the United States and the United Kingdom against Iraq would be proof of the failure of the entire international system. Iraq reaffirmed its commitment to continuing full and active cooperation with UNMOVIC and IAEA.

LAS said that in order to preserve the peace in the Arab region and throughout the world, the international community should reject the option of war and give the inspectors sufficient time to achieve a peaceful settlement of the Iraqi question.

Greece, speaking on behalf of the European Union (EU), said that full and effective disarmament in Iraq should be achieved peacefully. Force should be used only as a last resort. It was for the Iraqi regime to end the crisis by complying with the Council's demands. The EU added that although the UN inspectors should be given the time and resources that the Council believed they needed, inspections could not continue indefinitely in the absence of full Iraqi cooperation. The EU recognized that the unity of the international community, as expressed in resolution 1441(2002), and the military build-up had been essential in obtaining the return of the inspectors. The EU would work with Arab countries and LAS to bring home to Saddam Hussein the extreme danger of miscalculation of the situation and the need for full compliance with resolution 1441(2002).

Communications (19 February–6 March). On 19 February [S/2003/203], Iraq replied to the allegations made in the 5 February statement by the United States Secretary of State to the Security Council. Among other things, Iraq refuted allegations that it had biological weapons factories on wheels and on rails, stating that if the United States had such evidence, it would have submitted it to the inspectors and that UNMOVIC and IAEA were inspecting and monitoring all over Iraq but had found no evidence to confirm the authenticity of those allegations. As to the Jordanian Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, there was no evidence that he had entered Iraq over any border crossing either under his real name or using the aliases that the Jordanian side had indicated to Iraq. According to available information, it appeared that he was in the Al-Bayara region in the north of Iraq, which had not been under central authority since 1991. Terrorist elements were capable of entering and exiting many countries as they used false passports and names; no country could claim itself immune from their infiltration.

On 20 February [S/2003/207], the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya said that the Security Council or the United States should issue a text stating that if Iraq was in possession of WMD and turned them over to the inspectors, there would no longer be any grounds for military preparations. The Council should also adopt a resolution that called for the continuation of the inspectors' work.

Also on 20 February [S/2003/208], El Salvador expressed concern at the failure of Iraq to comply with its clear disarmament obligations. It called on Iraq to cooperate with the inspectors without further delay.

On 24 February [S/2003/214], France, Germany and the Russian Federation transmitted to the Council President a joint memorandum on the situation in Iraq. The three countries said that, while suspicions remained, no evidence had been given that Iraq still possessed WMD or capabilities in that field. Inspections had just reached their full pace and were functioning without hindrance; they had already produced results. While not yet fully satisfactory, Iraqi cooperation was improving. The Council had to step up its efforts to give a real chance to the peaceful settlement of the crisis. In that context, the unity of the Council had to be preserved and the pressure on Iraq had to be increased. Those conditions could be reached through the implementation of the following proposals: a clear programme of action for the inspections; reinforced inspections; and timelines for inspections and assessment. UNMOVIC and IAEA had to submit their programme of work for approval by the Council in accordance with resolution 1284(1999) [YUN 1999, p. 230]. The key remaining tasks had to be defined according to their degree of priority. What was required of Iraq for implementation of each task had to be clearly defined and precise. Further measures to strengthen inspections could include an increase in and diversification of staff and expertise; establishment of mobile units designed in particular to check on trucks; completion of the new system of aerial surveillance; and systematic processing of data provided by that system. The implementation of the inspections programme should be sequenced according to a realistic and rigorous timeline. The inspectors should be asked to submit the programme of work outlining the key substantive tasks for Iraq to accomplish; Chief Inspectors should report to the Council on the implementation of the programme of work every three weeks; a report of UNMOVIC and IAEA assessing the progress made in completing the tasks should be submitted by the inspectors 120 days after the adoption of the programme of work; UNMOVIC and IAEA should report immediately to the Council if and when Iraq interfered with inspections activities; and, at any time, additional Council meetings could be decided, including at a high level. The three countries stressed that to render possible a peaceful solution, inspections should be given the necessary time and resources. However, Iraq had to disarm and cooperate actively with the inspections.

On 28 February [S/2003/238], China and the Russian Federation transmitted to the Secretary-General the texts of the joint communiqués of the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the two countries (Beijing, 27 February) on the situation on the Korean peninsula and on the Iraq question. The sides favoured a resolution of the Iraqi crisis by political and diplomatic means within the framework of resolution 1441(2002). They stated that the UN inspections had achieved definitive progress and should proceed further.

On 3 March [A/57/743-S/2003/247], Bahrain transmitted to the Secretary-General the Final Declaration of the summit-level fifteenth regular session of the LAS Council (Sharm el-Sheikh, Egypt, 1 March). LAS, among other things, emphasized its categorical rejection of a strike against Iraq or a threat to the security and integrity of any Arab country and underscored the need to resolve the Iraqi crisis peacefully, within the framework of international legitimacy. It also requested that the UN inspection teams be given sufficient time to complete their mission in Iraq. On the same day [S/2003/254], LAS transmitted to the Council President the texts of the resolutions of the fifteenth session of the LAS Council, including that on the Iraq crisis.

On 4 March [A/57/757-S/2003/329], Malaysia, as Chairman of the Coordinating Bureau of the Non-Aligned Movement, transmitted to the Secretary-General the statement concerning Iraq adopted at the Thirteenth Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries (Kuala Lumpur, 20-25 February). The heads of State or Government said that war against Iraq would be devastating for the whole region and that it would have far-reaching political, economic and humanitarian consequences for all countries of the world, particularly the States in the region. They reaffirmed their commitment to the principle of non-use of force and called on Iraq to continue to comply with Council resolution 1441(2002).

On 5 March [S/2003/253], France, Germany and the Russian Federation transmitted to the Council President the joint statement by the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the three countries adopted in Paris that day. They reaffirmed that the disarmament of Iraq could be achieved by peaceful means and that the inspections were producing encouraging results. They emphasized that the inspections should be speeded up, in keeping with the proposals set forth in their 24 February memorandum to the Council (see p. 329). Using that method, the inspectors should submit their work programme without delay, accompanied by regular progress reports to the Council. In those circumstances, the three countries noted that they would not allow a proposed resolution to be adopted that authorized the use of force.

On 6 March [A/57/748-S/2003/288], Qatar transmitted to the Secretary-General the text of a communiqué on Iraq, adopted at the second emergency session of the Islamic Summit (Doha, Qatar, 5 March). The Conference categorically rejected any strike against Iraq and emphasized the need to settle the Iraqi question by peaceful means within the framework of the United Nations. Also on 6 March [A/57/749-S/2003/289], Qatar transmitted to the Secretary-General the text of the statement made by the Emir of Qatar, Sheikh Hamad bin Khalifa Al-Thani, at that session.

Security Council consideration (7 and 11-12 March). At the request of Malaysia, on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement [S/2003/246], the Security Council held an open meeting on 7 March, at which it heard briefings by UNMOVIC Executive Chairman Mr. Blix and by IAEA Director General Mr. ElBaradei [meeting 4714].

Presenting UNMOVIC's February quarterly report [S/2003/232] (see p. 317), which described three months of inspections, Mr. Blix said that Iraq, which had a highly developed administrative system, should be able to provide more documentary evidence about its proscribed weapons programme. UNMOVIC had not found underground facilities for chemical or biological production or storage. However, it needed to increase its staff in Iraq both for the monitoring of ground transportation and for the inspection of underground facilities. Iraq had started to destroy missiles that were not within the permissible range set by the Council. That process constituted a substantial measure of disarmament, the first since the middle of the 1990s. As at 7 March, 34 missiles, including two combat warheads and one launcher, had been destroyed under UNMOVIC supervision. There was also a significant Iraqi effort under way to clarify a major source of uncertainty as to the quantities of biological and chemical weapons that were unilaterally destroyed in 1991. The Iraqi side had not persisted in attaching conditions to the inspections. However, while the numerous initiatives that were being taken by Iraq with a view to resolving some long-standing open disarmament issues could be seen as active or even proactive, those initiatives, three or four months since the adoption of resolution 1441(2002) [YUN 2002, p. 292], could not be said to constitute immediate cooperation, nor did they necessarily cover all areas of relevance. They were nevertheless welcome, and UNMOVIC was responding to them in the hope of solving outstanding disarmament issues. UNMOVIC was in the process of drafting its work programme (see p. 333), which, among other things, contained a list of key remaining disarmament tasks. Mr. Blix said that the verification and inspection process could not be instant. Even with a proactive Iraqi attitude, it would still take some time to verify sites and items, analyse documents, interview relevant persons and draw conclusions. It would not take years, or weeks, but months.

Mr. ElBaradei said that Iraq's industrial capacity had deteriorated substantially since 1998, a fact of direct relevance to Iraq's capability for resuming a nuclear weapons programme. In recent weeks, Iraq had provided a considerable amount of documentation pertaining to outstanding issues, including Iraq's efforts to procure aluminium tubes, its attempted procurement of magnets and magnet-production capabilities and its reported attempt to import uranium. IAEA had concluded that Iraq's efforts to import aluminium tubes were not likely to have been related to the manufacture of centrifuges and, moreover, it was highly unlikely that Iraq could have achieved the considerable redesign needed to use them in a revived centrifuge programme. IAEA experts had also verified that none of the magnets that Iraq had declared could be used directly for centrifuge magnetic bearings. IAEA would continue to monitor and inspect equipment and material that could be used to make magnets for enrichment centrifuges. With regard to allegations that Iraq had sought to buy uranium from the Niger in recent years, IAEA concluded, after a thorough investigation, that the documents provided by a number of States, which pointed to an agreement between Iraq and the Niger for the sale of uranium, were not authentic and thus the allegations were unfounded. In the area of nuclear weapons, there was no indication of resumed nuclear activities in those buildings that were identified through the use of satellite imagery as having been reconstructed or newly erected since 1998, nor any indication of nuclear-related prohibited activities at any inspected sites. Also, there was no indication that Iraq had attempted to import uranium since 1990. After three months of intrusive inspections, IAEA had found no evidence or plausible indication of the revival of a nuclear-related programme in Iraq.

The United States said that, despite the progress that had been mentioned by Mr. Blix and Mr. ElBaradei, Iraq was still not cooperating. If Iraq genuinely wanted to disarm, the international community would not need to look for mobile biological units or require an extensive programme to search for underground facilities that were known to exist, nor should the inspectors have to search for evidence and proof. UNMOVIC and IAEA reports noted an acceleration of Iraqi initiatives. However, Iraq's small steps were certainly not initiatives as they were not provided willingly and freely by the Iraqis, but had been pulled out by the possibility of military force. The United States expressed pleasure that some missiles were being destroyed but added that evidence showed that the infrastructure to make more missiles remained within Iraq and had not been identified and destroyed. Iraq's intention to keep from turning over all of its WMD had not changed and, thus, it was not cooperating with the international community in the manner intended by resolution 1441(2002). Iraq still had the capability to manufacture chemical and biological weapons and still had tens of thousands of delivery systems, including UAVs. The United States believed that the draft resolution that had been circulated was appropriate and that the Council should soon vote on it.

The Russian Federation said that it had consistently sought to solve the Iraq problem on the basis of international law and of Council resolutions, which was the proper and reliable way. Progress had been achieved in implementing resolution 1441(2002) and Iraq's level of cooperation with the inspectors was very different from the practice under UNSCOM. Russia was firmly in favour of continuing and strengthening inspection activities and of making them more focused.

France said that it was clear that the international community was moving towards the complete elimination of WMD programmes in Iraq. However, Iraq still had to provide information in a timely fashion, so that the inspectors could obtain the most precise knowledge possible about any existing inventories or programmes. There was a need to keep the pressure on Baghdad, while the American and British military presence in the region supported the collective resolve of the international community. That pressure had to be used to achieve the objective of disarmament through inspections. Those inspections could not go on indefinitely and the pace had to be stepped up. However, the military agenda could not dictate the calendar of inspections. France agreed to accelerated timetables, but could not accept an ultimatum as long as the inspectors were reporting progress in terms of cooperation; as that would mean war. To those who believed that war would be the quickest way to disarm Iraq, France replied that it would create divisions and cause wounds that would be long in healing. As a permanent member of the Security Council, France would not allow a resolution to be adopted that authorized the automatic use of force.

China believed that the Council should provide strong support and guidance to the two inspection bodies. It also urged Iraq to strengthen its cooperation. It was not in favour of a new resolution, particularly one authorizing the use of force.

The United Kingdom observed that no Council member had stated that Iraq was fully in compliance with resolution 1441(2002). Iraq had dragged its feet on as many elements of procedural and substantive cooperation as possible. It defied experience to believe that continuing inspections with no firm end date would achieve complete disarmament. The United Kingdom, on behalf of the sponsors of the draft resolution on Iraq (Spain, United Kingdom, United States), would ask the Secretariat to circulate an amendment, specifying a further period beyond the adoption of a resolution for Iraq to take the final opportunity to disarm and bring itself into compliance.

Iraq stated that a possible war of aggression against Iraq had become imminent, regardless of any decision by the Council. The United States and the United Kingdom continued to fabricate facts and evidence suggesting Iraq's possession of WMD; however, they had not managed to convince the international community. Their claims were an attempt to mask their real agenda, which was a complete takeover of Iraq's oil and the political and economic domination of the entire Arab region. The new draft resolution and the most recent amendment did not relate to disarmament; the aim was to drag the Council into taking action that would have detrimental consequences, not only for Iraq, but for the very credibility of the United Nations. War against Iraq would wreak destruction, but would not unearth any WMD as there were no such weapons.

At the request of Malaysia, on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement [S/2003/283], the Council, on 11 and 12 March, held an open debate on the situation in Iraq [meeting 4717]. LAS, at the request of the Syrian Arab Republic [S/2003/292], and the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC), at the request of the Sudan [S/2003/298], participated in the discussion without the right to vote.

Iraq said that Mr. Blix and Mr. ElBaradei had confirmed that inspections had not found any WMD or programmes to produce such weapons inside Iraqi territory. The allegations made by the United States Secretary of State on 5 February were refuted by the facts in the possession of the inspectors following four months of reinforced monitoring. Therefore, none of those allegations had proved to be true. Iraq reconfirmed its decision to rid itself of WMD and its readiness to cooperate with UNMOVIC.

Malaysia welcomed and supported all efforts exerted to avert war against Iraq and called for the persistent continuation of such efforts based on multilateral diplomacy, as opposed to unilateral actions.

Canada said that the division within the Security Council had drawn the focus of the world away from the issue of disarming Iraq and shifted it, instead, onto diplomatic competition, which served no one's interests but Saddam Hussein's. On 18 February, Canada had proposed a set of ideas to bridge that very destructive divide. It suggested that the key remaining disarmament tasks be established and prioritized by the weapons inspectors and that a deadline be established for Iraq to implement them. As Mr. Blix had noted, while cooperation by Iraq had to be immediate and proactive, disarmament and verification could not be instantaneous.

OIC said that the position opposed to war against Iraq enjoyed overwhelming popular support, as highlighted by the many rallies and demonstrations held in hundreds of cities throughout the world and as expressed in many recommendations made by governmental and intergovernmental organizations in many countries. OIC added that the use of military force against Iraq, at that particular moment, when Iraq was cooperating with the Council's demands, was unjustified and represented an assault on the pan-Arab and Islamic world.

Communications (13-18 March). On 13 March [S/2003/311], South Africa said that the deliberations on Iraq would be enhanced if the Security Council received a draft work programme containing the key remaining disarmament tasks from the weapons inspectors.

On 15 March [S/2003/320], Germany transmitted to the Council President the joint declaration by the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of France, Germany and the Russian Federation, adopted on that day. The three countries reaffirmed that nothing justified abandoning the inspections process or resorting to force. Iraq's disarmament had begun, and there was every reason to believe that it could be completed rapidly and in accordance with the rules set out by the Council. Iraq, for its part, had to cooperate actively and unconditionally. The three countries, supported by China, had submitted proposals for achieving disarmament in Iraq by defining key disarmament tasks and establishing a rigorous timetable. UNMOVIC's programme of work was soon to be submitted to the Council (see p. 333). The three countries proposed that the Council meet at the ministerial level to approve key disarmament tasks and establish an implementation timetable that was both demanding and realistic. A peaceful approach was preferred by the Council and supported by the vast majority of the international community.

On 17 March [S/2003/347], the Russian Federation informed the Secretary-General that in connection with the meeting of the leaders of Portugal, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States held in the Azores, Portugal, on the situation relating to Iraq (see below), it deemed it appropriate to confirm its support for a political settlement of the Iraq problem. The use of force against Iraq was without legal foundation.

By an 18 March letter to the Secretary-General and the Council President [S/2003/325], Iraq noted that the decision by the UN Secretariat to withdraw all UN staff from Iraq, such as in the case of UNIKOM, would make it easier for the United States to wage its aggression against Iraq.

Azores meeting

On 18 March [S/2003/335], Portugal, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States transmitted to the Council President the texts of two statements adopted by the Atlantic Summit (Azores, 16 March) entitled "A vision for Iraq and the Iraqi people" and "Commitment to transatlantic solidarity". The first statement said that for 12 years, Saddam Hussein had defied the international community. If he refused to cooperate fully with the United Nations, he brought on himself the serious consequences foreseen in resolution 1441(2002). In those circumstances, the four countries would undertake a solemn obligation to help the Iraqi people build a new Iraq at peace with itself and its neighbours. The Iraqi people deserved to be lifted from insecurity and tyranny and freed to determine for themselves the future of their country. The statement also said that the four countries would work to prevent and repair damage done by Hussein's regime to the natural resources of Iraq and pledged to protect them. All Iraqis should share the wealth generated by their national economy. The four countries would seek a swift end to international sanctions and support an international reconstruction programme. They would also fight terrorism in all its forms and Iraq should never again be a haven for terrorists of any kind. In achieving that vision, the four countries planned to work in close partnership with international institutions, including the United Nations. If conflict occurred, the four countries planned to seek the adoption of new Council resolutions that would affirm Iraq's territorial integrity, ensure rapid delivery of humanitarian relief and endorse an appropriate post-conflict administration for Iraq. They would also propose that the Secretary-General be given authority, on an interim basis, to ensure that the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people continued to be met through the oil-for-food programme. Any military presence, should it be necessary, would be temporary and intended to promote security and the elimination of WMD, the delivery of humanitarian aid and the conditions for the reconstruction of Iraq.

The statement on the commitment to transatlantic solidarity stressed that the four countries would face and overcome terrorism and the spread of WMD. They would not allow differences of the moment to be exploited in ways that brought no solutions.

Military conflict and occupation

On 20 March, coalition forces, led by the United States, commenced military action against Iraq.

Earlier, on 18 March [S/2003/337], the Security Council, taking note of the Secretary-General's decision to suspend, for security reasons, the work of the UN humanitarian personnel in Iraq, stood ready to consider as soon as possible the proposals being prepared by the Secretary-General on how to meet the humanitarian needs of the people of Iraq, taking into account the urgency of the humanitarian situation there.

Security Council consideration (19 March). On 19 March [meeting 4721], the Council was briefed by the Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC, Mr. Blix.

Mr. Blix presented UNMOVIC's draft work programme. He said that during the three and a half months of resumed inspections in Iraq, UNMOVIC had learned a great deal that had been useful for the drafting of its work programme and for the selection of key remaining disarmament tasks. It would have been difficult to draft the work programme without that knowledge and practical experience. Mr. Blix expressed sadness that the inspection work carried out in Iraq did not bring the assurances needed about the absence of WMD or other proscribed items, that no more time was available for inspections and that armed action seemed imminent. He observed that UNMOVIC had withdrawn all its staff from Iraq on the previous day. Mr. Blix noted that the work programme prepared by UNMOVIC inspectors and other resources deployed in Iraq, and submitted to the Council in accordance with resolution 1284(1999) [YUN 1999, p. 230], seemed to have only limited practical relevance considering the situation on the ground. UNMOVIC was a subsidiary organ of the Council. Until the adoption of a new decision by the Council on the role and functions of the Commission, the previous resolutions remained valid to the extent that was practicable. It was evidently for the Council to consider the next steps.

An IAEA representative informed the Council that the IAEA Director General had also transmitted the Agency's work programme, which was self-explanatory.

Germany said that the world was facing an imminent war in Iraq and the Security Council could not remain silent in that situation. The developments of the last few hours had brought the work of the United Nations on the ground to a standstill and those developments were cause for the deepest concern. Mr. Blix's work programme provided clear and convincing guidelines on how to disarm Iraq peacefully within a short space of time and showed that peaceful means had not been exhausted. Germany emphatically rejected the impending war.

France said the Council was meeting just a few hours before the commencement of hostilities. The choice before the Council was between two visions of the world: on one side stood those who thought that they could resolve the world's complexity through swift preventive action, while on the other side stood those who chose resolute action and a long-term approach. In order to ensure collective security, there was a need to take into account the manifold crises and their dimensions, including the cultural and religious ones. France said that the Iraqi problem had allowed the Council to craft an instrument, through the inspection regime, that was unprecedented and could serve as an example. On that basis, an innovative, permanent disarmament body could be established under UN aegis. It also said that an outbreak of force in an unstable area, such as Iraq, could only exacerbate the tensions and fractures on which terrorism fed. However, over and above the differences among countries, there was a need to restore the unity of the international community and to start preparing for the required humanitarian assistance in Iraq. The Secretary-General had already started to mobilize the various UN agencies. France would take part in the collective effort to assist the Iraqi people. Next, it would be necessary to build peace; no single country had the means to build Iraq's future and, above all, no State could claim the necessary legitimacy. The legal and moral authority for such an undertaking could stem only from the United Nations. Two principles had to guide the Council's action: respect for the unity and territorial integrity of Iraq and the preservation of its sovereignty. Similarly, it would be up to the United Nations to establish a framework for Iraq's economic reconstruction.

The United States said that, regrettably, the Council's discussion on UNMOVIC's work programme was incompatible with Iraq's non-compliance with resolution 1441 (2002) [YUN 2002, p. 292] and the current reality on the ground. No realistic programme of work or outline of key unresolved issues could be developed pursuant to resolution 1284 (1999) [YUN 1999, p. 230] while Iraq failed to cooperate fully, actively and unconditionally, nor could it be developed in the absence of sound information on Iraqi programmes since 1998. Considering a work programme at that particular time was out of touch with the reality that was confronting the international community, as the situation on the ground would change and so would the nature of the remaining disarmament tasks. That said, however, the United States did not exclude the possibility that it may prove useful to return to those documents at some time in the future. In the meantime, the Council would face new challenges related to the future of Iraq. The United States shared the concern for meeting the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people. Towards that end, it was fielding the Disaster Assistance Response Team, composed of United States civilian humanitarian experts, to the region to assess needs, to liaise with partners and to provide in-field grant-making capacity. It had also pre-positioned millions of dollars worth of food rationing and relief supplies. In addition, the United States had contributed over $60 million to more than a dozen different UN agencies. In recognizing the importance of the oil-for-food programme in order to meet the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people, the United States was prepared to present in the near future a draft humanitarian resolution that would ensure the continuity of the programme.

The Secretary-General expressed regret that it had not been possible to reach a common position. Whatever the differing views on the Iraqi issue, it was a sad day for the United Nations and the international community; millions of people around the world shared that sense of disappointment and were deeply alarmed by the prospect of imminent war. The plight of the Iraqi people was the Secretary-General's immediate concern. Over the preceding 20 years, Iraqis had been through two major wars, internal uprisings and conflict, and more than a decade of debilitating sanctions. In the short term, the conflict that was clearly about to start could make the situation much worse. Under international law, the responsibility for protecting civilians in conflict fell on the belligerents. In any area under military occupation, responsibility for the welfare of the population fell on the occupying Power. Without in any way assuming or diminishing that ultimate responsibility, the United Nations would do whatever it could to help. The UN humanitarian agencies had for some time been engaged in preparing for that contingency. The United Nations had done its best to assess the possible effects of war, in terms of population displacement and human need, and to position its personnel and equipment accordingly. Of the $123.5 million requested by the United Nations for those preparations, only $45 million had been pledged and only $34 million had been received. The United Nations had also examined the situation caused by the suspension of the activities of the oil-for-food programme and ways that the programme could be adjusted to enable the United Nations to continue providing humanitarian assistance to the Iraqi people during and after hostilities. Such adjustments would require decisions by the Security Council. The Secretary-General expressed the hope that the effort to relieve the suffering of the Iraqi people and to rehabilitate their society after so much destruction might prove to be the task around which the unity of the Council could be rebuilt.

Communications (19-26 March). By a 19 March letter [S/2003/343], the Emir of Qatar, as Chairman of the Ninth Islamic Summit Conference, reaffirmed that the diplomatic and peaceful efforts being made with a view to the elimination of WMD had to be given a chance and rejected the principle of war against Iraq.

Also on 19 March [A/58/68-S/2003/357], Malaysia transmitted to the Secretary-General the statement made that day by the Troika of the Non-Aligned Movement (Cuba, Malaysia, South Africa) on the developments concerning Iraq. The Troika viewed the imminent unilateral military action by the United States and its allies as an illegitimate act of aggression.

On 20 March, in three similar letters to the Council President, Australia [S/2003/352], the United Kingdom [S/2003/350] and the United States [S/2003/351] said that their respective armed forces had engaged in military action in Iraq on that day. The action followed a long history of non-cooperation by Iraq with the United Nations and numerous findings by the Security Council that Iraq had failed to comply with its disarmament obligations. In its resolution 1441(2002) [YUN 2002, p. 292], the Council recognized that Iraq's possession of WMD constituted a threat to international peace and security, that Iraq had failed to disarm and that in consequence Iraq was in material breach of the conditions for the ceasefire at the end of hostilities in 1991 laid down by the Council in resolution 687(1991) [YUN 1991, p. 172]. Military action was undertaken only when it became apparent that there was no other way of achieving compliance by Iraq.

On 20 March [S/2003/348], Russia said that the military action against Iraq was taking place in defiance of world public opinion and in violation of the principles and norms of the UN Charter and international law. Nothing could justify that military action—neither accusations that Iraq was supporting international terrorism, nor the desire to change the political regime in that country, which was in direct contradiction of international law. Political regimes could be determined only by the citizens of the State in question. Iraq posed no threat either to neighbouring States or to other countries or regions of the world, because, especially after a 10-year blockade, it was a weak country, both militarily and economically. It was even less of a danger because international inspectors were working there. Russia called for the early termination of military action and expressed its conviction that the central role in resolving crises around the world, including the situation in Iraq, belonged to the Security Council.

On 24 March [S/2003/364], the Syrian Arab Republic informed the Council President that, on 23 March, British and United States planes bombed a Syrian civilian bus carrying Syrian workers on their way back to Syria from Iraq. Five Syrian nationals were killed and many others wounded. Syria condemned that action and reserved the right to demand compensation according to relevant international laws.

On the same day [S/2003/365], LAS transmitted to the Council President the text of a resolution entitled "The American/British aggression against fraternal Iraq and its implications for the security and safety of neighbouring Arab States and Arab national security", adopted by the LAS Council during its one hundred and nineteenth regular session (Cairo, Egypt, 22-25 March). LAS, among other things, condemned the American/British aggression against Iraq and called for an immediate and unconditional withdrawal of the invading forces. It affirmed that Arab States had to refrain from joining in any military action against the territorial integrity of Iraq.

Also on 24 March [S/2003/366], Costa Rica transmitted to the Secretary-General a position paper concerning the reconstruction of Iraq following the armed conflict.

In another 24 March letter [S/2003/373], Uganda informed the Council President that it had decided to support the United States-led coalition to disarm Iraq by force and was ready to assist in any way possible.

On 26 March [S/2003/376], Qatar transmitted to the Secretary-General the text of a communiqué issued by the General Secretariat of the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) relating to the situation in the Middle East region owing to the confrontation in Iraq. GCC expressed the hope that military operations would be halted as soon as possible and stressed its rejection of any violation of Iraq's territorial integrity.

Security Council consideration (26-27 March). At the request of Iraq, on behalf of LAS, with the reservation of Kuwait [S/2003/362], and Malaysia, on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement [S/2003/363], the Council, on 26 and 27 March, held an open meeting on the situation in Iraq [meeting 4726]. LAS, at the request of the Syrian Arab Republic [S/2003/370], OIC, at the request of the Sudan [S/2003/371], and the Permanent Observer of Palestine, at his own request [S/2003/372], participated in the discussion without the right to vote.

The Secretary-General said that the Council, which had had Iraq on its agenda for 12 years, had to rediscover its unity of purpose. The war had to be brought to an end as soon as possible, but, while it continued, it was essential to protect the civilian population, the wounded and the prisoners of war, on both sides, and to bring relief to the victims. That obligation was binding on all the belligerents. The Geneva Conventions and all other instruments of international humanitarian law had to be respected. In particular, the 1949 Fourth Geneva Convention, under which those in effective control of any territory were responsible for meeting the humanitarian needs of its population and were required to maintain dialogue and cooperation with international organizations engaged in humanitarian relief, had to be scrupulously respected. The oil-for-food programme had been halted, with a value of some $2.4 billion in supplies, mainly food, in the pipeline. The Council needed to determine how it would adjust the programme to make it possible for those supplies to reach the Iraqi people and to ensure that food, medicine and other essential life-sustaining supplies continued to be provided. The humanitarian effort required in the coming weeks and months was going to be very costly. The United Nations was about to launch a flash appeal to donors, and he urged Member States to respond swiftly and generously. The Council had to determine how it would address the many needs of the Iraqi people, whatever the outcome of the war, and what the United Nations itself might be asked to undertake. A Council mandate was needed for anything beyond strictly humanitarian relief. The Secretary-General said that in the last few months the peoples of the world had showed how much they expected of the United Nations, and of the Security Council in particular. Many of them were bitterly disappointed. Their faith in the United Nations could be restored only if the Council was able to identify and work constructively towards specific goals. He urged the five permanent members, in particular, to show leadership by making a concerted effort to overcome their differences. For his part, the Secretary-General emphasized two guiding principles on which he believed there was no disagreement, and which should guide all the Council's efforts and future decisions on Iraq. The first principle was respect for Iraq's sovereignty, territorial integrity and independence, and the second was respect for the right of the Iraqi people to determine their own political future and control their own natural resources. The Secretary-General appealed to all Member States to begin healing divisions so that the Council could recover its rightful role as the body with primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Iraq said that the American-British full-scale military aggression commenced at dawn on 20 March. The goal of the aggression was the occupation of Iraq and the change of its political regime. The Iraqi armed forces and armed civilian units were fighting fierce battles against that aggression. The international community was well aware that the Council had not authorized the use of force. Both the United States and the United Kingdom confirmed, when resolution 1441(2002) was adopted [YUN 2002, p. 292], that it did not contain a hidden agenda, trigger or automatic use of force. Nevertheless, despite the opposition to war of the majority of Council members, those two countries launched a war against Iraq.

The United Kingdom said that it was aware that Member States, perhaps without exception, found the situation in Iraq deeply disappointing and distasteful, but they could not set aside the universally available evidence that Iraq was repeatedly defying the United Nations in refusing to complete disarmament of its WMD under the terms of successive resolutions. Resolution 1441(2002) was adopted unanimously but not implemented with any rigour by a united Council.

Coalition action was therefore under way to enforce Council decisions on complete Iraqi disarmament. Military action was both legitimate and multilateral, as it was authorized under resolutions 678(1990) [YUN 1990, p. 204], 687(1991) [YUN 1991, p. 172] and 1441(2002). A broad coalition of well over 40 States was supporting the action materially or politically. The United Kingdom regretted the differences within the Council that had marked the past few months of discussions on that subject. The time had come to put those aside and to unite to ensure that the United Nations and the international community could act quickly to meet the needs of the Iraqi people during and after military action. The first priority was to ensure that the changing realities on the ground were reflected in the operation of the oil-for-food programme, on which 60 per cent of Iraqis remained dependent. Progress had been made within the Council on a draft resolution that would amend the programme. It was hoped that the outstanding issues could be resolved rapidly so that the Secretary-General could have the necessary authority to maximize the UN role in delivering humanitarian relief. Looking further ahead, there was a need to consider the role that the United Nations could play in building a stable and prosperous Iraq. The United Kingdom was convinced that the United Nations had to take a central role in the future of that country.

Communication (28 March). On 28 March [S/2003/391], Iran informed the Secretary-General that its airspace had been violated and that its territory had been hit by the belligerents in the war against Iraq.

Special Adviser

On 7 April [SG/SM/8660-IK/343], the Secretary-General met with members of the Security Council to inform them that he had appointed Rafeuddin Ahmed as his Special Adviser on Iraq. Mr. Ahmed would consider possible UN roles in post-war Iraq and their legal, political, operational and resource implications. Any role beyond the coordination of humanitarian activities in Iraq, and other activities mandated by existing resolutions, would first require a new mandate from the Council. The Council members welcomed Mr. Ahmed's appointment.

Iraqi initiatives

On 15 April, near the town of Nasiriyah, up to 100 Iraqis representing every part of the country met to discuss Iraq's future and how best to chart a course towards a democratic representative government. United States officials and coalition representatives also attended. At the end of the session, the Iraqi participants approved a final statement proposing 13 principles for a future Iraqi government. The principles, among other things, stressed that Iraq had to be democratic; the future government should not be based on communal identity; a future government had to be organized as a democratic federal system, but on the basis of countrywide consultation; the rule of law had to be paramount; the Baath party had to be dissolved; and political violence had to be rejected.

On 28 April, over 250 Iraqi representatives, from inside Iraq and from the expatriate and opposition communities, convened in Baghdad to advance the national dialogue among Iraqis regarding composition of an Iraqi interim authority.

Security Council note (5 May). On 5 May [S/2003/524], the Council President circulated a note from the Holy See containing a Statement of Patriarchs and Bishops of Iraq, issued on 29 April. The Statement, among other things, asked that the new Iraqi constitution recognize Christians' religious, social and political rights and envision a legal statute in which each person would be considered according to his or her capacities, without discrimination.

Coalition Provisional Authority

On 8 May [S/2003/538], the United Kingdom and the United States informed the Council President that they continued to act together to ensure the complete disarmament of Iraq of WMD and means of delivery. The Coalition States would abide by their obligations under international law and would ensure that Iraq's oil was protected and used for the benefit of the Iraqi people. In order to meet those objectives and obligations in the post-conflict period, the Coalition, acting under existing command and control arrangements through the Commander of Coalition Forces, had created the Coalition Provisional Authority (the Authority), which included the Office of Reconstruction and Humanitarian Assistance, to exercise powers of government temporarily and, as necessary, to provide security, to allow the delivery of humanitarian aid and to eliminate WMD. The Coalition partners, working through the Authority, would, among other things, provide for security in and for the provisional administration of Iraq by deterring hostilities; maintaining Iraq's territorial integrity and securing its borders; eliminating all of Iraq's WMD; facilitating the orderly and voluntary return of refugees and displaced persons; maintaining civil law and order; eliminating all terrorist infrastructure and resources within Iraq; supporting and coordinating demining activities; promoting accountability for crimes committed by the previous Iraqi regime; and assuming immediate control of Iraqi institutions responsible for military and security matters. The Coalition was facilitating the efforts of the Iraqi people to take the first steps towards forming a representative government, based on the rule of law, that afforded fundamental freedoms and equal protection and justice to the Iraqi people without regard to ethnicity, religion or gender. According to the Coalition, the United Nations had a vital role to play in providing humanitarian relief, in supporting the reconstruction of Iraq and in helping in the formation of an Iraqi interim authority.

Security Council consideration (22 May). On 22 May [meeting 4762], the Council discussed the response to the humanitarian situation in Iraq (see also p. 936) and heard briefings by the Deputy Secretary-General (DSG), Louise Fréchette, and other UN and intergovernmental organization officials.

The DSG said that the breakdown of essential services and law and order in Iraq had resulted in a range of urgent humanitarian needs. A major humanitarian crisis had been averted, but the civilian population, and children in particular, remained at risk, especially if the security situation did not improve substantially in the near future. UN agencies were at work throughout the country, providing food, water, medicine and other emergency assistance. They had helped repair water and sanitation facilities, assisted in the restoration of electricity and provided relief to internally displaced persons and malnourished children. International UN staff had begun to return to Iraq in April, and more than 300 of them were now deployed, in addition to 3,400 national staff. The overarching priority of virtually all UN assistance efforts was the reactivation of essential public services, including the public distribution system for food. However, the delivery of assistance was made all the more difficult, if not impossible, by the general lack of law and order. Many looted facilities were repaired and restocked only to be looted again. Also, staff movements were limited in many urban areas and people in need could not be reached. The Organization's ability to respond to the urgent needs in Iraq depended greatly on whether the necessary resources would be available. As at 22 May, more than $700 million had been received in response to the UN flash appeal. Moreover, as implementation of resolution 1472(2003) of 28 March on the use of oil-for-food funds to provide aid (see p. 363) continued, the Office of the Iraq Programme and UN agencies had confirmed that nearly $1 billion worth of priority humanitarian supplies could be shipped by 3 June. As UN agencies continued to expand their presence in Iraq, they were conducting comprehensive assessments that would enable the UN system to re-prioritize its response plans. Based on those new assessments, the United Nations would be launching a revised humanitarian appeal in the second half of June.

Lifting of economic sanctions

On 22 May [meeting 4761], the Security Council adopted resolution 1483(2003) by vote (14-0). The draft [S/2003/556] was submitted by Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States. The Syrian Arab Republic, which did not participate in the voting, later explained that it would have voted in favour of the resolution had it been granted additional time before the vote, as it had requested on more than one occasion. Syria provided a further explanation to the Council President in writing [S/2003/567].

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions,

Reaffirming the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq,

Reaffirming also the importance of the disarmament of Iraqi weapons of mass destruction and of eventual confirmation of the disarmament of Iraq,

Stressing the right of the Iraqi people freely to determine their own political future and to control their own natural resources, welcoming the commitment of all parties concerned to support the creation of an environment in which they may do so as soon as possible, and expressing resolve that the day when Iraqis govern themselves must come quickly,

Encouraging efforts by the people of Iraq to form a representative Government based on the rule of law that affords equal rights and justice to all Iraqi citizens without regard to ethnicity, religion or gender, and, in this connection, recalling resolution 1325(2000) of 31 October 2000,

Welcoming the first steps of the Iraqi people in this regard, and noting in this connection the Nasiriyah statement of 15 April 2003 and the Baghdad statement of 28 April 2003,

Resolved that the United Nations should play a vital role in humanitarian relief, in the reconstruction of Iraq and in the restoration and establishment of national and local institutions for representative governance,

Taking note of the statement made on 12 April 2003 by the Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors of the Group of Seven Industrialized Nations in which they recognized the need for a multilateral effort to help to rebuild and develop Iraq and the need for assistance from the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank in these efforts,

Welcoming the resumption of humanitarian assistance and the continuing efforts of the Secretary-General and the specialized agencies to provide food and medicine to the people of Iraq,

Welcoming also the appointment by the Secretary-General of his Special Adviser on Iraq,

Affirming the need for accountability for crimes and atrocities committed by the previous Iraqi regime,

Stressing the need for respect for the archaeological, historical, cultural and religious heritage of Iraq and for the continued protection of archaeological, historical, cultural and religious sites, as well as museums, libraries and monuments,

Noting the letter dated 8 May 2003 from the Permanent Representatives of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council, and recognizing the specific authorities, responsibilities and obligations under applicable international law of these States as occupying Powers under unified command ("the Authority"),

Noting also that other States that are not occupying Powers are working now, or in the future may work, under the Authority,

Welcoming the willingness of Member States to contribute to stability and security in Iraq by contributing personnel, equipment and other resources under the Authority,

Concerned that many Kuwaitis and third-State nationals have not been accounted for since 2 August 1990,

Determining that the situation in Iraq, although improved, continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Appeals to Member States and concerned organizations to assist the people of Iraq in their efforts to reform their institutions and rebuild their country, and to contribute to conditions of stability and security in Iraq in accordance with the present resolution;

2. Calls upon all Member States in a position to do so to respond immediately to the humanitarian appeals of the United Nations and other international organizations for Iraq and to help to meet the humanitarian and other needs of the Iraqi people by providing food, medical supplies, and resources necessary for reconstruction and rehabilitation of Iraq's economic infrastructure;

3. Appeals to Member States to deny safe haven to those members of the previous Iraqi regime who are alleged to be responsible for crimes and atrocities and to support actions to bring them to justice;

4. Calls upon the Authority, consistent with the Charter of the United Nations and other relevant international law, to promote the welfare of the Iraqi people through the effective administration of the territory, in particular working towards the restoration of conditions of security and stability and the creation of conditions in which the Iraqi people can freely determine their own political future;

5. Calls upon all concerned to comply fully with their obligations under international law, in particular the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and the Regulations concerning the Laws and Customs of War on Land, adopted at The Hague on 18 October 1907;

6. Calls upon the Authority and relevant organizations and individuals to continue efforts to locate, identify and repatriate all Kuwaiti and third-State nationals or the remains of those present in Iraq on or after 2 August 1990, as well as the Kuwaiti archives, that the previous Iraqi regime failed to undertake, and in this regard directs the High-Level Coordinator, in consultation with the International Committee of the Red Cross and the Tripartite Commission, and with the appropriate support of the people of Iraq and in coordination with the Authority, to take steps to fulfil his mandate with respect to the fate of Kuwaiti and third-State national missing persons and property;

7. Decides that all Member States shall take appropriate steps to facilitate the safe return to Iraqi institutions of Iraqi cultural property and other items of archaeological, historical, cultural, rare scientific and religious importance, illegally removed from the Iraq National Museum, the National Library and other locations in Iraq since the adoption of resolution 661(1990) of 6 August 1990, including by establishing a prohibition on trade in or transfer of such items and items with respect to which reasonable suspicion exists that they have been illegally removed, and calls upon the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, Interpol and other international organizations, as appropriate, to assist in the implementation of the present paragraph;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to appoint a Special Representative for Iraq, whose independent responsibilities shall involve reporting regularly to the Council on his activities pursuant to the present resolution, coordinating activities of the United Nations in post-conflict processes in Iraq, coordinating among United Nations and international agencies engaged in humanitarian assistance and reconstruction activities in Iraq and, in coordination with the Authority, assisting the people of Iraq through:

(a) Coordinating humanitarian and reconstruction assistance by United Nations agencies and between United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations;

(b) Promoting the safe, orderly and voluntary return of refugees and displaced persons;

(c) Working intensively with the Authority, the people of Iraq and others concerned to advance efforts to restore and establish national and local institutions for representative governance, including by working together to facilitate a process leading to an internationally recognized, representative Government of Iraq;

(d) Facilitating the reconstruction of key infrastructure, in cooperation with other international organizations;

(e) Promoting economic reconstruction and the conditions for sustainable development, including through coordination with national and regional organizations, as appropriate, civil society, donors and the international financial institutions;

(f) Encouraging international efforts to contribute to basic civilian administration functions;

(g) Promoting the protection of human rights;

(h) Encouraging international efforts to rebuild the capacity of the Iraqi civilian police force;

(i) Encouraging international efforts to promote legal and judicial reform;

9. Supports the formation, by the people of Iraq with the help of the Authority and working with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, of an Iraqi interim administration as a transitional administration run by Iraqis until an internationally recognized, representative Government is established by the people of Iraq and assumes the responsibilities of the Authority;

10. Decides that, with the exception of prohibitions related to the sale or supply to Iraq of arms and related materiel other than those arms and related materiel required by the Authority to serve the purposes of the present and other related resolutions, all prohibitions related to trade with Iraq and the provision of financial or economic resources to Iraq established pursuant to resolution 661(1990) and subsequent relevant resolutions, including resolution 778(1992) of 2 October 1992, shall no longer apply;

11. Reaffirms that Iraq must meet its disarmament obligations, encourages the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America to keep the Council informed of their activities in this regard, and underlines the intention of the Council to revisit the mandates of the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency as set forth in resolutions 687(1991) of 3 April 1991, 1284(1999) of 17 December 1999 and 1441(2002) of 8 November 2002;

12. Notes the establishment of a Development Fund for Iraq to be held by the Central Bank of Iraq and to be audited by independent public accountants approved by the International Advisory and Monitoring Board of the Development Fund for Iraq, and looks forward to the early meeting of that Board, whose members shall include duly qualified representatives of the Secretary-General, of the Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund, of the Director-General of the Arab Fund for Social and Economic Development and of the President of the World Bank;

13. Notes also that the funds in the Development Fund for Iraq shall be disbursed at the direction of the Authority, in consultation with the Iraqi interim administration, for the purposes set out in paragraph 14 below;

14. Underlines the fact that the Development Fund for Iraq shall be used in a transparent manner to meet the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people, for economic reconstruction and the repair of Iraq's infrastructure, for the continued disarmament of Iraq, for the costs of Iraqi civilian administration and for other purposes benefiting the people of Iraq;

15. Calls upon the international financial institutions to assist the people of Iraq in the reconstruction and development of their economy and to facilitate assistance by the broader donor community, and welcomes the readiness of creditors, including those of the Paris Club, to seek a solution to the sovereign debt problems of Iraq;

16. Requests that the Secretary-General, in coordination with the Authority, continue the exercise of his responsibilities pursuant to Council resolutions 1472(2003) of 28 March 2003 and 1476(2003) of 24 April 2003, for a period of six months following the adoption of the present resolution, and terminate within this time period, in the most cost-effective manner, the ongoing operations of the "Oil-for-Food" Programme (the Programme), both at Headquarters level and in the field, transferring responsibility for the administration of any remaining activity under the Programme to the Authority, including by taking the following necessary measures:

(a) To facilitate as soon as possible the shipment and authenticated delivery of priority civilian goods as identified by the Secretary-General and representatives designated by him, in coordination with the Authority and the Iraqi interim administration, under approved and funded contracts previously concluded by the previous Government of Iraq, for the humanitarian relief of the people of Iraq, including, as necessary, negotiating adjustments in the terms or conditions of these contracts and respective letters of credit as set forth in paragraph 4 (d) of resolution 1472(2003);

(b) To review, in the light of changed circumstances, in coordination with the Authority and the Iraqi interim administration, the relative utility of each approved and funded contract with a view to determining whether such contracts contain items required to meet the needs of the people of Iraq both now and during reconstruction, and to postpone action on those contracts determined to be of questionable utility and the respective letters of credit until an internationally recognized, representative Government of Iraq is in a position to make its own determination as to whether such contracts shall be fulfilled;

(c) To provide to the Council within 21 days following the adoption of the present resolution, for the review and consideration of the Council, an estimated operating budget based on funds already set aside in the account established pursuant to paragraph 8 (d) of resolution 986(1995) of 14 April 1995, identifying:

- (i) All known and projected costs to the United Nations required to ensure the continued functioning of the activities associated with implementation of the present resolution, including operating and administrative expenses associated with the relevant United Nations agencies and programmes responsible for the implementation of the Programme both at Headquarters and in the field;
- (ii) All known and projected costs associated with termination of the Programme;
- (iii) All known and projected costs associated with restoring funds of the Government of Iraq that were provided by Member States to the Secretary-General as requested in paragraph 1 of resolution 778(1992);
- (iv) All known and projected costs associated with the Special Representative and the qualified representative of the Secretary-General identified to serve on the International Advisory and Monitoring Board, for the six-month time period defined above, following which these costs shall be borne by the United Nations;

(d) To consolidate into a single fund the accounts established pursuant to paragraphs 8 (a) and (b) of resolution 986(1995);

(e) To fulfil all remaining obligations related to the termination of the Programme, including negotiating, in the most cost-effective manner, any necessary settlement payments, which shall be made from the escrow accounts established pursuant to paragraphs 8 (a) and (b) of resolution 986(1995), with those parties that have previously entered into contractual obligations with the Secretary-General under the Programme, and to determine, in coordination with the Authority and the Iraqi interim administration, the future status of contracts undertaken by the United Nations and related agencies under the accounts established pursuant to paragraphs 8 (b) and (d) of resolution 986(1995);

(f) To provide the Council, 30 days prior to the termination of the Programme, with a comprehensive strategy developed in close coordination with the Authority and the Iraqi interim administration that would lead to the delivery of all relevant documentation and the transfer of all operational responsibility of the Programme to the Authority;

17. Requests also that the Secretary-General transfer as soon as possible to the Development Fund for Iraq one billion United States dollars from unencumbered funds in the accounts established pursuant to paragraphs 8 (a) and (b) of resolution 986(1995), restore Government of Iraq funds that were provided by Member States to the Secretary-General as requested in paragraph 1 of resolution 778(1992), and decides that, after deducting all relevant United Nations expenses associated with the shipment of authorized contracts and costs to the Programme outlined in paragraph 16 (c) above, including residual obligations, all surplus funds in the escrow accounts established pursuant to paragraphs 8 (a), (b), (d) and (f) of resolution 986(1995) shall be transferred at the earliest possible time to the Development Fund for Iraq;

18. Decides to terminate, effective on the adoption of the present resolution, the functions related to the observation and monitoring activities undertaken by the Secretary-General under the Programme, including the monitoring of the export of petroleum and petroleum products from Iraq;

19. Decides also to terminate the Security Council Committee established pursuant to paragraph 6 of resolution 661(1990) at the conclusion of the six-month period called for in paragraph 16 above, and decides further that the Committee shall identify individuals and entities referred to in paragraph 23 below;

20. Decides further that all export sales of petroleum, petroleum products and natural gas from Iraq following the date of adoption of the present resolution shall be made consistent with prevailing international market best practices, to be audited by independent public accountants reporting to the International Advisory and Monitoring Board referred to in paragraph 12 above in order to ensure transparency, and decides that, except as provided in paragraph 21 below, all proceeds from such sales shall be deposited into the Development Fund for Iraq until such time as an internationally recognized, representative Government of Iraq is properly constituted;

21. Decides that 5 per cent of the proceeds referred to in paragraph 20 above shall be deposited into the Compensation Fund established pursuant to resolution 687(1991) and subsequent relevant resolutions and that, unless an internationally recognized, representative Government of Iraq and the Governing Council of the United Nations Compensation Commission, in the exercise of its authority over methods of ensuring that payments are made into the Compensation Fund, decide otherwise, this requirement shall be binding upon a properly constituted, internationally recognized, representative Government of Iraq and any successor thereto;

22. Notes the relevance of the establishment of an internationally recognized, representative Government of Iraq and the desirability of prompt completion of the restructuring of Iraq's debt as referred to in paragraph 15 above, decides that, until 31 December 2007, unless the Council decides otherwise, petroleum, petroleum products and natural gas originating in Iraq shall be immune, until title passes to the initial purchaser, from legal proceedings against them and not be subject to any form of attachment, garnishment or execution, and that all States shall take any steps that may be necessary under their respective domestic legal systems to assure this protection, and that proceeds and obligations arising from sales thereof, as well as the Development Fund for Iraq, shall enjoy privileges and immunities equivalent to those enjoyed by the United Nations except that the above-mentioned privileges and immunities will not apply with respect to any legal proceeding in which recourse to such proceeds or obligations is necessary to satisfy liability for damages assessed in connection with an ecological accident, including an oil spill, that occurs after the date of adoption of the present resolution;

23. Decides that all Member States in which there are:

(a) Funds or other financial assets or economic resources of the previous Government of Iraq or its state bodies, corporations, or agencies, located outside Iraq as of the date of adoption of the present resolution; or

(b) Funds or other financial assets or economic resources that have been removed from Iraq or acquired by Saddam Hussein or other senior officials of the former Iraqi regime and their immediate family members, including entities owned or controlled, directly or indirectly, by them or by persons acting on their behalf or at their direction, shall freeze without delay those funds or other financial assets or economic resources and, unless these funds or other financial assets or economic resources are themselves the subject of a prior judicial, administrative or arbitral lien or judgement, immediately shall cause their transfer to the Development Fund for Iraq, it being understood that, unless otherwise addressed, claims made by private individuals or non-government entities on those transferred funds or other financial assets may be presented to the internationally recognized, representative Government of Iraq; and decides also that all such funds or other financial assets or economic resources shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and protections as provided under paragraph 22 above;

24. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council at regular intervals on the work of his Special Representative with respect to the implementation of the present resolution and on the work of the International Advisory and Monitoring Board, and encourages the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America to inform the Council at regular intervals of their efforts pursuant to the present resolution;

25. Decides to review the implementation of the present resolution within twelve months of the adoption thereof and to consider further steps that might be necessary;

26. Calls upon Member States and international and regional organizations to contribute to the implementation of the present resolution;

27. Decides to remain seized of this matter.

VOTE ON RESOLUTION 1483(2003):

In favour: Angola, Bulgaria, Cameroon, Chile, China, France, Germany, Guinea, Mexico, Pakistan, Russian Federation, Spain, United Kingdom, United States.

Against: None.

Speaking after the vote, the United States said that the lifting of sanctions marked a momentous event for the people of Iraq. The United Nations was to play a vital role in rebuilding Iraq. By recognizing the fluidity of the political situation and that decisions would be made on the ground, the Council had provided a flexible framework under Chapter VII for the Authority, Member States, the United Nations and others in the international community to participate in the administration and reconstruction of Iraq. The resolution affirmed the commitment to the development of an internationally recognized representative Iraqi Government and created a robust mandate for the Secretary-General's Special Representative. The resolution also established a framework for an orderly phase-out of the oil-for-food programme, thereby preserving, for a transitional period, what had become a safety net for the Iraqi people. In addition, it established transparency in all processes and UN participation in monitoring the sale of Iraqi oil resources and expenditures of oil proceeds. In that context, the United States was pleased to announce the creation of the Development Fund for Iraq in the Central Bank of Iraq. The Authority would disburse funds only for the purposes it determined to benefit the Iraqi people. The resolution lifted export restrictions to Iraq, with the exception of trade in arms and related materiel not required by the Authority. Aviation restrictions were also lifted, but Iraq's disarmament obligations remained, and Member States were still barred from assisting Iraq in acquiring WMD and proscribed missile systems or proceeding with civil nuclear activities so long as those restrictions remained in effect. The resolution provided Iraq with adequate time to recover capacity eroded during the sanctions years, yet it preserved its obligations to Kuwait and others who suffered from Saddam Hussein's aggression dating from 1990. It addressed Iraq's sovereign debt, the violations of human rights and international humanitarian law by the previous regime. It also directed Member States to act quickly to seize and return to the Iraqi people money stolen by the Hussein regime.

The Secretary-General said that the international community should be gratified that the Council had come together to chart the way forward in Iraq. The Council had adopted a resolution that spelled out the assistance it expected the United Nations to give to the people of Iraq in coordination with the occupying Powers, which had the responsibility for the effective administration of the territory. The most important task would be to ensure that the Iraqi people were able as soon as possible, through a transparent and impartially managed political process, to form a free and representative Government of their own choice. The Secretary-General would nominate his Special Representative without delay (see below).

Special Representative

On 23 May [S/2003/570], the Secretary-General informed the Security Council President of his intention to appoint as his Special Representative for Iraq, for a period of four months, Sergio Vieira de Mello (Brazil), the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights.

On 27 May [S/2003/571], the Council took note of the Secretary-General's intention.

Communication (3 June). On 3 June [S/2003/612], Iran transmitted to the Secretary-General the Joint Declaration on the regional initiative regarding Iraq, issued by Iraq's neighbouring countries during the thirtieth session of the Islamic Conference of Foreign Ministers (Tehran, 28-30 May). The Foreign Ministers of Bahrain, Egypt, Iran, Jordan, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, the Syrian Arab Republic and Turkey reiterated the right of the Iraqi people to freely determine their political future and to establish a fully representative and broad-based Government in a safe and peaceful environment. They also emphasized the inalienable right of the Iraqi people to enjoy a decent and comfortable life based on the rule of law, equality and respect for fundamental human rights and freedoms. They underlined the central role of the United Nations in post-war Iraq, especially with regard to the establishment of a representative Government, rehabilitation of local institutions, provision of humanitarian relief and reconstruction, and called for the speedy restoration of full Iraqi sovereignty through the establishment of a legitimate Government and an end to occupation.

Security Council consideration (5 June). On 5 June [meeting 4768], the Council was briefed by the UNMOVIC Executive Chairman, Mr. Blix, on UNMOVIC's report covering 1 March to 31 May [S/2003/580] (see p. 317). He said that for many years neither UNSCOM nor UNMOVIC made significant finds of proscribed weapons, probably because the items were unilaterally destroyed by the Iraqi authorities or else because they were effectively concealed by them. He trusted that in the new environment in Iraq, in which there was full access and cooperation, and in which knowledgeable witnesses should no longer be inhibited from revealing what they knew, it should be possible to establish the truth about those weapons. In resolution 1483(2003) (see p. 338), the Council declared its intention to revisit the mandate of UNMOVIC, and it was aware that UNMOVIC remained ready to resume work in Iraq as an independent verifier or to conduct long-term monitoring, should the Council so decide. Mr. Blix said that his briefing was likely to be his last one and he thanked the Secretary-General and the UN Secretariat for the cooperation they had provided since the creation of UNMOVIC.

The Council President took note of Mr. Blix's intention to retire from his post at the end of June and expressed the Council's gratitude to him for his service.

Communication (10 June). On 10 June [A/58/94-S/2003/642], the Russian Federation transmitted to the Secretary-General the text of the Declaration by the heads of State of the members of the Shanghai Cooperation Organization (Moscow, 29 May) (China, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, the Russian Federation, Tajikistan, Uzbekistan). The Declaration, among other things, noted that the United Nations should have an important role to play in the reconstruction of Iraq. A precondition for that country's transition to peace and the building of a democratic society was respect for the national interests and sovereign rights of the Iraqi people and concrete and effective aid on the part of the international community.

Report of Secretary-General (July). In response to resolution 1483(2003), the Secretary-General submitted a 17 July report [S/2003/715] on the work of his Special Representative with respect to the implementation of that resolution, provided an initial assessment of the scope of the challenges involved in implementing the mandate conferred by the resolution and recommended an overall approach and structure for the UN presence in Iraq for the remainder of 2003, taking into account the Council's request to terminate the oil-for-food programme in November 2003.

The Secretary-General's Special Representative, Sergio Vieira de Mello, arrived in Baghdad on 2 June and embarked on broad consultations to define the UN role. He had brought Iraqi and Authority representatives together with the United Nations to discuss issues such as the rule of law, past human rights violations and the constitutional process. Contacts had also been initiated with representatives of the diplomatic community in Baghdad and visiting parliamentary delegations. Several common themes ran through the discussions that the Special Representative had with Iraqis of different backgrounds. There was an overwhelming demand for the early restoration of sovereignty and the message was conveyed that democracy could not be imposed from outside. Serious concern was expressed about the process of de-Ba'athification and the dissolution of the Iraqi army. Above all, the Special Representative's contacts expressed deep concern about the precarious, some believed deteriorating, security situation, particularly in Baghdad. Many Iraqis lodged criticism about aspects of the past UN record in Iraq, but they also expressed appreciation for UN humanitarian efforts and stressed the need for the Organization to play an active role, not least in facilitating and supporting the political transition process.

The Special Representative had made efforts to meet with many Iraqi political groups, both the newly emerging and those well established. Their unanimous concern was the urgent need to establish an Iraqi provisional government that could help address some of the immediate practical challenges faced in the country. Iraqis emphasized that they themselves had to conduct the constitutional process and that an Iraqi interim authority should be in place before such a process began. The Special Representative strongly advocated that the Authority devolve real executive authority to a broadly representative and self-selecting Iraqi leadership, including in policy and decision-making, and in the preparation and execution of a budget. That advice was favourably received by the Authority and, on 13 July, it established the Governing Council, the principal body of the interim administration of Iraq, a move that was welcomed by the Secretary-General. The 25-member Council, which included three women, had a slight Shi'ah majority and an equal representation of Kurds and Sunnis, with additional Christian and Turkmen representation. The Council would name an interim minister for each ministry and would have the right to set policies and take decisions, in cooperation with the Authority, and to designate international representation during the interim period. The Council would also consider appointing a preparatory constitutional commission to recommend a process by which a new constitution would be prepared and approved. According to the Authority, the full restoration of sovereignty would come after the drafting of a new constitution and the holding of national elections. The Special Representative had proposed that voter registration should begin in the near future to demonstrate that tangible steps were being taken to pave the way for elections. To that end, the Secretary-General had instructed the Electoral Assistance Division of the UN Department of Political Affairs to send an assessment mission to Iraq to discuss with relevant Iraqi and Authority counterparts the various possible modalities for electoral registration and the electoral process. The Secretary-General said that the United Nations could make a significant contribution in the constitutional and electoral processes, as its involvement would confer legitimacy and place at the disposal of the Iraqi people the wealth of experience accrued by the United Nations in those fields over the years.

Lack of security and restricted freedom of movement had affected UN activities, particularly humanitarian work, and had the potential to impair reconstruction planning. The work of the UN humanitarian agencies was further impeded by the massive presence of explosive ordnance, mines and unexploded ordnance. So far, UN personnel had seldom been the target of deliberate hostility, with the exception of one incident in the city of Basra on 17 June when a crowd trapped two UN vehicles, apparently not distinguishing the United Nations from the Authority. Both vehicles were eventually released. Shots were fired outside the UN compound at the Canal Hotel in Baghdad on 29 June, causing Coalition forces to go into high alert. On 6 July, a World Food Programme (WFP) office in Mosul and later an empty WFP vehicle were attacked by armed individuals; no WFP staff were hurt in those incidents. However, the international staff presence in Mosul was reduced from 27 to 4. UN contractors and facilities remained vulnerable to criminal activity, both random and organized. For ordinary Iraqis and UN personnel, the principal security threat came from violent crime. Criminals, some of whom were organized and most of whom were armed, continued to take advantage of the easy availability of weapons and the vacuum in rule-of-law institutions. The principal concerns of Iraqis included the lack of personal security and of basic services such as water, electricity and fuel. Some concern had been expressed at the potentially serious implications of the recent dissolution by the Authority of the Iraqi army, which numbered half a million personnel. The United Nations had made available to the Authority its experience and body of best practice in disarmament, demobilization and re-integration. At the Authority's request, a small team of UN experts flew to Baghdad for a week to provide information on lessons learned from previous disarmament programmes run by the Organization.

The Special Representative had also been engaged in a preliminary process of identifying the human rights challenges in Iraq and assessing the resources needed to address them. On 30 June and 1 July, the Special Representative and his team convened the first human rights conference under UN auspices in Baghdad. Organized jointly with the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, the conference brought together Iraqi and international experts, in addition to the Authority, to share perspectives, identify practical measures and develop policy options on justice for past crimes. A central concern raised at the conference was the Authority's actions, especially the treatment and conditions of detention of Iraqi prisoners. The Special Representative had urged the Authority to ensure better treatment of detainees and urged a continued dialogue with the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) on that issue. Vital to the promotion of human rights and respect for the rule of law was the development of civil society, in particular effective and independent human rights and women's rights groups, and free and independent media. To that end, the Special Representative had placed emphasis on training. The United Nations had already been called upon by various sources to train public officials, particularly those involved in the administration of justice. The Special Representative intended to examine the possibility of providing such training, and the possibility of specific programmes to ensure access to justice by vulnerable groups. He also emphasized to all political parties and movements the need to promote the full participation of Iraqi women in the transitional political and constitutional processes.

A number of Governments had informally approached the Special Representative to explore the possibility of deploying international police under UN auspices. Currently, executive law enforcement responsibilities in Iraq were the sole responsibility of the Authority, under resolution 1483(2003). Discussions on that issue between the Special Representative and the Authority had led the Secretary-General to believe that establishing an international police force, under UN auspices, could create a parallel system of law enforcement, which would not be effective for improving law and order. There was scope for UN involvement in the area of civilian policing, in terms of making available its experience in aspects of local police training and development. The UN initial focus would be to provide input into the human rights provisions of the training curricula for the newly recruited Iraqi police, and to provide advice to the Authority and the relevant Iraqi law enforcement institutions, once established, on the development and implementation of independent law enforcement oversight mechanisms. Justice was the focus of the first trilateral meeting (25 June) convened by the United Nations with representatives of the Iraqi judicial community and the Authority. The purpose was to share the UN experience in fostering reform of the judicial system and to provide a forum for promoting dialogue among Iraqis on the issue.

Under international humanitarian law, the Authority bore the primary responsibility for the welfare of the Iraqi people, including the provision of public services. UN agencies had been assisting and would continue to assist the Iraqi people under their standing humanitarian mandates. The UN revised humanitarian appeal for Iraq was launched on 23 June (see also p. 936), specifying requirements for an additional $259 million for the UN system to ensure that it could carry out its activities until the end of 2003. The Special Representative would work to ensure as smooth and integrated a transition as possible from humanitarian and emergency rehabilitation work to economic recovery and reconstruction. To that end, the Secretary-General had designated the Humanitarian Coordinator, Ramiro Lopes da Silva (Portugal), as his Deputy Special Representative and as Resident Coordinator to oversee that process, which entailed, among other things, supervising the winding down, completion and transfer to the Authority of the oil-for-food programme, as prescribed in Council resolution 1483(2003) (see p. 338). The United Nations, in concert with the Authority, had begun to review the applications that had been prioritized and was seeking to verify that the requisite procedures established by the Office of the Iraq Programme had been fully respected and that the process was transparent. All parties were confident that the review of approved and funded applications would be completed prior to the cessation of the programme in November 2003.

UN agencies were in transition from activities launched under the humanitarian appeal on 23 June and progressively moving into reconstruction, recovery and development activities. An informal meeting on reconstruction in Iraq, held in New York on 24 June, helped to further define the framework for the coordination of reconstruction and development efforts.

The Secretary-General said that the focus of UN action in Iraq for the remainder of 2003 would include the following: delivering humanitarian assistance, promoting the safe, orderly and voluntary return of refugees and displaced persons, and conducting emergency rehabilitation; engaging in the facilitation of national dialogue and consensus-building on the political transition process; assisting in the establishment of electoral processes; promoting the protection of human rights; implementing, through UNDP, two concrete projects relating to the emergency rehabilitation of the courts and support for the Judicial Training Centre in Baghdad; establishing an Iraqi media centre; ensuring the orderly phasing out of the oil-for-food programme by 21 November 2003; contributing, through UNDP and international financial institutions, to assessing potential needs for economic reconstruction and sustainable development; sharing UN experiences and lessons learned with Iraqis and the Authority on post-conflict processes in general, as requested; and assisting the Iraqi interim administration to gradually rejoin the international community.

The Secretary-General outlined the structure for the proposed United Nations Assistance Mission for Iraq (UNAMI). In view of the broad range of responsibilities entrusted to the Special Representative, it was envisaged that the staff strength should consist of over 300 civilian staff combined. That figure was inclusive of both substantive and support international and local personnel in Baghdad and each of the regions. The number of international staff would be less than half the total figure, as UNAMI would rely on a skilled Iraqi force. UNAMI's structure envisaged maximum reliance on the existing capacity and structure of the Office of the Humanitarian Coordinator and on the Humanitarian Coordinator himself, whom the Secretary-General concurrently appointed as the Resident Coordinator of the UN country team (of agencies, funds and programmes) and as his Deputy Special Representative for Iraq.

The Secretary-General observed that Iraq could not be treated in isolation from the region. He believed that an inclusive way of working with Iraq's neighbours would need to be found. The Special Representative intended to continue the contacts that the Secretary-General had initiated in Amman, Jordan, during a visit from 21 to 23 June and before long would visit all of Iraq's neighbours.

Security Council consideration (July). On 22 July [meeting 4791], the Council discussed the situation in Iraq and heard a briefing by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Iraq, Mr. Vieira de Mello. At the request of Spain [S/2003/750], members of the Governing Council of Iraq participated in the discussion without the right to vote. The Council had before it the Secretary-General's 17 July report.

Introducing the Secretary-General's report, Mr. Vieira de Mello said that the formation in July of Iraq's Governing Council was a significant step forward and a new stage that succeeded the disorienting power vacuum left from the fall of the previous regime. He had visited Iran, Saudi Arabia and the Syrian Arab Republic and had accompanied the Secretary-General to Amman in June, where they had held talks on Iraq and resolution 1483(2003) (see p. 338). He reported that all the regional officials and leaders he met with expressed their desire to see a new Iraq at peace with itself and its neighbours and wished the United Nations to take the lead in achieving that vision.

Security in Iraq remained tenuous. It was imperative that law and order be restored throughout the country as soon as possible as, without them, every area of activity would be impacted for the worse. Iraqis cooperating with the Authority, as well as Iraqi policemen, had been the subject of attacks. In parallel, common law criminality was a major problem. The potential impact of the violence could not be underestimated as it threatened to undermine confidence in the transition and to shake the resolve of Iraqis committed to leading their country through a very delicate period in its history. The UN presence in Iraq remained vulnerable; UN security in Iraq relied significantly on the reputation of the United Nations and its ability to demonstrate its independence. The United Nations was in Iraq to assist the people.

Iraq found itself in a difficult position: a post-conflict situation, but with hostilities occurring every day, awash with weapons and under military occupation. In that context, the protection of human rights was a major concern. The Special Representative had raised with the Authority concerns regarding searches, arrests, the treatment of detainees and the duration of preventive detention. He had also visited the main Iraqi detention complex at Abu Ghraib. The Authority had provided him with responses on action taken to address and resolve those questions.

The Special Representative concluded that, in order to succeed, the Governing Council would need the full support of the international community and of the Iraqi people, whose trust it would need to earn anew each day. It had to be empowered to deliver tangible improvements to the welfare of the population while not becoming the object of criticism. There was also a need for a clear timetable for the earliest restoration of Iraqi sovereignty. Resolution 1483(2003) provided considerable scope for the United Nations to play an effective role in Iraq. It was not a clear mandate, but at the same time the situation in Iraq was exceptional and therefore it required an exceptional approach. The lack of clarity allowed the UN role in Iraq to emerge and develop as the situation on the ground evolved. What the United Nations could not do was replace the Authority, nor should it ever replace the rightful role that Iraqis had to play in shaping the future of their country. What the United Nations could do was to help build consensus among Iraqis and between Iraqis and the Authority.

The head of the delegation of the Governing Council of Iraq, Adnan Pachachi, said that Iraq had rid itself of the tyrannical regime that oppressed the Iraqi people for three decades. A State marked by the intelligence services, mandatory arrests and random executions had ended, never to return. The primary goal of the Governing Council was to shorten the duration of the interim administration period and put together an elected Government under a constitution to be endorsed by the population in free elections. The Governing Council would need to ensure security and stability and to establish institutions that could rebuild the national police and the national army. There was also a need to appoint ministers and to reopen Iraqi embassies abroad. Iraq would require assistance in all areas in order to rebuild its economy, modernize its industrial sector, reform its educational system, improve its sanitation services and provide basic necessities to all its citizens. The United Nations would have a vital role to play in all those areas. In addition, there was a need to re-examine the legislation enacted by the previous regime and to constitute special tribunals in order to bring to justice those who committed criminal acts under that regime.

Communication (31 July). On 31 July [S/2003/782], the United States transmitted to the Council President a letter from the Acting Governor of the Central Bank of Iraq, who said that resolution 1483(2003) (see p. 338) created an obligation for all Member States to identify, freeze and transfer to the Development Fund for Iraq all funds, financial assets or economic resources in their jurisdictions that were established or held by the previous Iraqi Government. Those funds and resources included not only those of the previous Government, but also those of its State bodies, corporations, agencies and entities that had been removed from Iraq or acquired by Saddam Hussein or other senior officials of the former Iraqi regime and their immediate family members. Those funds were urgently needed for humanitarian, reconstruction, civilian administration and other purposes benefiting the people of Iraq.

Establishment of UNAMI

On 14 August [meeting 4808], the Security Council adopted resolution 1500(2003) by vote (14-0-1). The draft [S/2003/812] was submitted by Angola, Bulgaria, Cameroon, Chile, Guinea, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States.

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions, in particular resolution 1483(2003) of 22 May 2003,

Reaffirming the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq,

Reaffirming also the vital role for the United Nations in Iraq which was set out in relevant paragraphs of resolution 1483(2003),

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 17 July 2003,

1. Welcomes the establishment of the broadly representative Governing Council of Iraq on 13 July 2003, as an important step towards the formation by the people of Iraq of an internationally recognized, representative government that will exercise the sovereignty of Iraq;

2. Decides to establish the United Nations Assistance Mission for Iraq to support the Secretary-General in the fulfilment of his mandate under resolution 1483(2003), in accordance with the structure and responsibilities set out in his report of 17 July 2003, for an initial period of twelve months;

3. Decides to remain seized of this matter.

VOTE ON RESOLUTION 1500(2003):

In favour: Angola, Bulgaria, Cameroon, Chile, China, France, Germany, Guinea, Mexico, Pakistan, Russian Federation, Spain, United Kingdom, United States.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Syrian Arab Republic.

Speaking after the vote, the United States said the adopted resolution sent a clear signal to those who opposed the political transformation under way in Iraq that they were out of step with world opinion. The resolution endorsed the vital role that the United Nations was playing in Iraq. The United States supported the Secretary-General's request to create UNAMI.

The Syrian Arab Republic said that it had abstained in the vote in keeping with its responsibility as the Arab representative on the Council. All Arab States supported the need to end the occupation of Iraq and to form a legitimate national Iraqi Government, as soon as possible and within a clear time frame. Syria regretted that consultations on the draft resolution did not include the input of rotating members of the Council, including Syria.

Attack on UN headquarters in Baghdad

On 19 August, at approximately 1630 hours local time, a flatbed truck carrying an estimated 1,000 kilograms of high explosives was detonated on the service road adjacent to the south-west corner of the Canal Hotel, UN headquarters in Baghdad. The attack was carefully planned and deliberately targeted the compound's weakest point, with devastating effect. It resulted in the death of 22 persons (15 of them UN staff members) and the wounding of more than 150. The Special Representative for Iraq and UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, Mr. Vieira de Mello, was among those killed. The attack represented the most deliberate and devastating attack against the United Nations in its history.

In a 19 August press statement [SG/SM/8822-1K/375], the Secretary-General denounced the attack as an inexcusable act of unprovoked and murderous violence against men and women who went to Iraq to help the Iraqi people. In a second press statement [SG/SM/8823-1K/376], issued after the death of Mr. Vieira de Mello was confirmed, he said that the loss of his top envoy for Iraq was a bitter blow for the United Nations and for him personally.

Communications (19-20 August). On 19 August [S/2003/822], the Russian Federation expressed shock at the terrorist act against the UN compound in Baghdad.

On 20 August [S/2003/827], Malaysia, on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement, condemning the attack, said that such attacks could not break the will of the international community to continue to extend all possible assistance to the Iraqi people to regain their national sovereignty.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (20 August)

On 20 August [meeting 4811], following consultations among Security Council members, the President made statement S/PRST/2003/13 on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council unequivocally condemns the terrorist attack that took place on 19 August 2003 against the United Nations headquarters in Baghdad and thereby against the international community as a whole, causing numerous deaths and injuries among international personnel and Iraqi people.

The Council condemns in the strongest terms the perpetrators of that attack and underlines the need to bring them to justice.

The Council pays tribute to and expresses its deepest admiration for all those among the United Nations personnel who have lost their lives or have been injured in the service of the United Nations and of the Iraqi people, including the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, Mr. Sergio Vieira de Mello.

The Council expresses its deepest sympathy and condolences to the victims and their families.

The Council reaffirms the imperative to respect, in all circumstances, the safety and security of United Nations personnel and the need for adequate security measures to be taken in this regard.

The Council reaffirms its determination to assist the Iraqi people to build peace and justice in their country and to determine their own political future by themselves. It welcomes in this regard the determination of the United Nations to continue its operation in Iraq to fulfil its mandate in the service of the Iraqi people, and will not be intimidated by such attacks.

Security Council consideration (21 August). On 21 August [meeting 4812], the Council heard briefings from the representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom on Iraq. Both countries expressed outrage at the attack against the United Nations and extended their deepest sympathies to the victims and their families.

The United States said that the timing of the attack was no accident; it occurred at a critical juncture, when the impact of initial plans and efforts had begun to take positive effect. A secure, democratic and stable Iraq was a threat and a target for those who wished to turn the clock back to the days of tyranny. As a response, the Security Council had to stand together and invigorate its struggle against terrorism. The United States highlighted some markers of progress since the adoption of resolution 1483(2003), the most significant of which was the formation of the Governing Council. The Authority was working to improve economic and security conditions. It had initiated programmes to enable Iraqis to develop a capacity to foil saboteurs who targeted their electrical infrastructure, oil industry and other sectors critical to Iraq's renewal. Tens of thousands of Iraqi police had answered the call to return to work, and recruitment and training were under way to put thousands more on the streets. Nearly 38,000 police officers were deployed throughout the country, some 6,000 in Baghdad. The ultimate goal was to have approximately 65,000 police countrywide. The Authority had also started training a new Iraqi army.

The United Kingdom highlighted progress in the humanitarian, education and health sectors. It also reported on efforts to establish representative governance, especially at the local level, and on human rights reforms.

Appointment of acting Special Representative.

On 22 August [S/2003/830], the Secretary-General informed the Council President that, owing to the untimely death of Mr. Vieira de Mello, he had appointed, on an interim basis, Ramiro Lopes da Silva as his acting Special Representative for Iraq.

On the same day [S/2003/831], the Council took note of the Secretary-General's appointment.

Communications (22 August-8 September). On 22 August [A/58/315-S/2003/845], Mali, on behalf of the Human Security Network (Austria, Canada, Chile, Greece, Ireland, Jordan, Mali, Netherlands, Norway, Slovenia, South Africa, Switzerland, Thailand), condemned the 19 August terrorist attacks committed against the United Nations in Baghdad and expressed concern about the increasing number of attacks against the personnel of international organizations in conflict areas.

On 8 September [S/2003/867], Poland informed the Council President that it had decided to dispatch stability forces (both military and an adequate civilian component) and lead a multi-national division of stability forces in the central-south sector of Iraq.

General Assembly action. On 15 September, the General Assembly condemned the attack on UN personnel and premises in Baghdad (resolution 57/338) (see p. 1452).

Downsizing of UN staff in Iraq

On 25 September [SG/SM/8899-1K/395], the Secretary-General ordered the temporary redeployment of UN international staff in Iraq. International staff members remaining in the country totalled 86, and that number could be expected to diminish even further. Essential humanitarian activities in Iraq would continue, thanks to the efforts of more than 4,000 national staff.

Communication (3 October). On 3 October [A/58/415-S/2003/952], Iran transmitted to the Secretary-General the final communiqué of the Annual Coordination Meeting of Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the member States of OIC (New York, 30 September). The Ministers, among other things, emphasized the responsibility of the occupying Powers to safeguard the civil and religious liberties of the Iraqi people. They also took note of resolution 1483(2003) (see p. 338) and called on member States to support and assist Iraq in its efforts to reactivate economic institutions and infrastructure.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (October)

On 16 October [meeting 4844], the Council unanimously adopted resolution 1511(2003). The draft [S/2003/992] was submitted by Cameroon, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its previous resolutions on Iraq, including resolutions 1483(2003) of 22 May 2003 and 1500(2003) of 14 August 2003, and its resolutions on threats to international peace and security caused by terrorist acts, including resolution 1373(2001) of 28 September 2001, and other relevant resolutions,

Underscoring that the sovereignty of Iraq resides in the State of Iraq, reaffirming the right of the Iraqi people freely to determine their own political future and control their own natural resources, reiterating its resolve that the day when Iraqis govern themselves must come quickly, and recognizing the importance of international support, particularly that of countries in the region, Iraq's neighbours, and regional organizations, in taking forward this process expeditiously,

Recognizing that international support for the restoration of conditions of stability and security is essential to the well-being of the people of Iraq as well as to the ability of all concerned to carry out their work on behalf of the people of Iraq, and welcoming contributions by Member States in this regard under resolution 1483(2003),

Welcoming the decision of the Governing Council of Iraq to form a preparatory constitutional committee to prepare for a constitutional conference that will draft a constitution to embody the aspirations of the Iraqi people, and urging it to complete this process quickly,

Affirming that the terrorist bombings of the Embassy of Jordan on 7 August 2003, of the United Nations headquarters in Baghdad on 19 August 2003, of the Imam Ali Mosque in Najaf on 29 August 2003 and of the Embassy of Turkey on 14 October 2003, and the murder of a Spanish diplomat on 9 October 2003 are attacks on the people of Iraq, the United Nations and the international community, and deploring the assassination of Dr. Akila al-Hashimi, who died on 25 September 2003, as an attack directed against the future of Iraq,

Recalling and reaffirming, in that context, the statement by its President of 20 August 2003 and its resolution 1502(2003) of 26 August 2003,

Determining that the situation in Iraq, although improved, continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Reaffirms the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq, and underscores, in that context, the temporary nature of the exercise by the Coalition Provisional Authority ("the Authority") of the specific responsibilities, authorities and obligations under applicable international law recognized and set forth in resolution 1483(2003), which will cease when an internationally recognized, representative government established by the people of Iraq is sworn in and assumes the responsibilities of the Authority, inter alia, through steps envisaged in paragraphs 4 to 7 and 10 below;

2. Welcomes the positive response of the international community, in forums such as the League of Arab States, the Organization of the Islamic Conference, the United Nations General Assembly and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, to the establishment of the broadly representative Governing Council of Iraq as an important step towards an internationally recognized, representative government;

3. Supports the efforts of the Governing Council to mobilize the people of Iraq, including by the appointment of a cabinet of ministers and a preparatory constitutional committee to lead a process in which the Iraqi people will progressively take control of their own affairs;

4. Determines that the Governing Council and its ministers are the principal bodies of the Iraqi interim administration, which, without prejudice to its further evolution, embodies the sovereignty of the State of Iraq during the transitional period until an internationally recognized, representative government is established and assumes the responsibilities of the Authority;

5. Affirms that the administration of Iraq will be progressively undertaken by the evolving structures of the Iraqi interim administration;

6. Calls upon the Authority, in this context, to return governing responsibilities and authorities to the people of Iraq as soon as practicable, and requests the Authority, in cooperation, as appropriate, with the Governing Council and the Secretary-General, to report to the Security Council on the progress being made;

7. Invites the Governing Council to provide to the Security Council for its review, no later than 15 December 2003, in cooperation with the Authority and, as circumstances permit, the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, a timetable and a programme for the drafting of a new constitution for Iraq and for the holding of democratic elections under that constitution;

8. Resolves that the United Nations, acting through the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and the United Nations Assistance Mission for Iraq, should strengthen its vital role in Iraq, including by providing humanitarian relief, promoting the economic reconstruction of and conditions for sustainable development in Iraq, and advancing efforts to restore and establish national and local institutions for representative government;

9. Requests that, as circumstances permit, the Secretary-General pursue the course of action outlined in paragraphs 98 and 99 of his report of 17 July 2003;

10. Takes note of the intention of the Governing Council to hold a constitutional conference and, recognizing that the convening of the conference will be a milestone in the movement to the full exercise of sovereignty, calls for its preparation through national dialogue and consensus-building as soon as practicable, and requests the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, at the time of the convening of the conference or as circumstances permit, to lend the unique expertise of the United Nations to the Iraqi people in this process of political transition, including the establishment of electoral processes;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure that the resources of the United Nations and associated organizations are available if requested by the Governing Council and, as circumstances permit, to assist in the furtherance of the programme provided by the Governing Council under paragraph 7 above, and encourages other organizations with expertise in this area to support the Governing Council if requested;

12. Also requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council on his responsibilities under the present resolution and the development and implementation of a timetable and programme under paragraph 7 above;

13. Determines that the provision of security and stability is essential to the successful completion of the political process as outlined in paragraph 7 above and to the ability of the United Nations to contribute effectively to that process and the implementation of resolution 1483(2003), and authorizes a multinational force under unified command to take all necessary measures to contribute to the maintenance of security and stability in Iraq, including for the purpose of ensuring necessary conditions for the implementation of the timetable and programme, as well as to contribute to the security of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Iraq, the Governing Council and other institutions of the Iraqi interim administration, and key humanitarian and economic infrastructure;

14. Urges Member States to contribute assistance under this United Nations mandate, including military forces, to the multinational force referred to in paragraph 13 above;

15. Decides that it shall review the requirements and mission of the multinational force referred to in paragraph 13 above not later than one year from the date of adoption of the present resolution, and that in any case the mandate of the force shall expire upon the completion of the political process as described in paragraphs 4 to 7 and 10 above, and expresses its readiness to consider on that occasion any future need for the continuation of the multinational force, taking into account the views of an internationally recognized, representative government of Iraq;

16. Emphasizes the importance of establishing effective Iraqi police and security forces in maintaining law, order and security and combating terrorism consistent with paragraph 4 of resolution 1483(2003), and calls upon Member States and international and regional organizations to contribute to the training and equipping of Iraqi police and security forces;

17. Expresses its deep sympathy and condolences for the personal losses suffered by the Iraqi people and by the United Nations and the families of those United Nations personnel and other innocent victims who were killed or injured in recent tragic attacks;

18. Unequivocally condemns the terrorist bombings of the Embassy of Jordan on 7 August 2003, of the United Nations headquarters in Baghdad on 19 August 2003, of the Imam Ali Mosque in Najaf on 29 August 2003 and of the Embassy of Turkey on 14 October 2003, the murder of a Spanish diplomat on 9 October 2003 and the assassination of Dr. Akila al-Hashimi, who died on 25 September 2003, and emphasizes that those responsible must be brought to justice;

19. Calls upon Member States to prevent the transit of terrorists to Iraq, arms for terrorists and financing that would support terrorists, and emphasizes the importance of strengthening the cooperation of the countries of the region, particularly neighbours of Iraq, in this regard;

20. Appeals to Member States and the international financial institutions to strengthen their efforts to assist the people of Iraq in the reconstruction and development of their economy, and urges those institutions to take immediate steps to provide their full range of loans and other financial assistance to Iraq, working with the Governing Council and appropriate Iraqi ministries;

21. Urges Member States and international and regional organizations to support the Iraq reconstruction effort initiated at the United Nations technical consultations of 24 June 2003, including through substantial pledges at the international donors conference to be held in Madrid on 23 and 24 October 2003;

22. Calls upon Member States and concerned organizations to help meet the needs of the Iraqi people by providing resources necessary for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Iraq's economic infrastructure;

23. Emphasizes that the International Advisory and Monitoring Board referred to in paragraph 12 of resolution 1483(2003) should be established as a priority, and reiterates that the Development Fund for Iraq shall be used in a transparent manner as set out in paragraph 14 of resolution 1483(2003);

24. Reminds all Member States of their obligations under paragraphs 19 and 23 of resolution 1483(2003), in particular the obligation to immediately cause the transfer of funds, other financial assets and economic resources to the Development Fund for Iraq for the benefit of the Iraqi people;

25. Requests that the United States of America, on behalf of the multinational force as outlined in paragraph 13 above, report to the Security Council on the efforts and progress of this force, as appropriate and not less than every six months;

26. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the Secretary-General commended Council members for having reached a significant agreement on what was a particularly important resolution to address the complex situation in Iraq. It was critical to the Iraqi people, the region and the entire international community that the goal of an Iraq at peace with itself and with its neighbours be reached. The Secretary-General said he would do his utmost to implement the mandate established by the Council, bearing in mind the constraints on building up the required capacity and his obligation to care for the safety and security of UN staff. He was grateful to the Council for the flexibility that the new resolution gave him in that respect. Although the United Nations had only a skeletal presence on the ground, the Organization was determined to continue helping the Iraqi people from both inside and outside the country, primarily by providing humanitarian assistance.

International Advisory and Monitoring Board

On 22 October [S/2003/1030], the Secretary-General informed the Council President that he, together with the executive heads of the Arab Fund for Economic and Social Development, the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, had approved the terms of reference for the establishment of the International Advisory and Monitoring Board (IAMB), as emphasized in resolution 1511(2003) (above). A copy of the Board's terms of reference was attached to the letter. The purpose of IAMB was to promote the objectives set out in Council resolution 1483(2003) (see p. 338) of ensuring that the Development Fund for Iraq was used in a transparent manner for the purposes set out in paragraph 14 of that resolution and that the export sales of petroleum, petroleum products and natural gas from Iraq were made consistent with prevailing international market best practices. The executive heads intended to make the appointment of their representatives to IAMB forthwith and looked forward to an early IAMB meeting.

Communications (4-21 November). On 4 November [S/2003/1073], Egypt, Iran, Jordan, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, the Syrian Arab Republic and Turkey transmitted to the Secretary-General and the Council President the text of the final statement of the meeting of the Foreign Ministers of Iraq's neighbouring countries (Damascus, Syria, 1-2 November). The Ministers, among other things, rejected any measure that could lead to the disintegration of Iraq and emphasized the importance of enhancing the UN role in that country. They also expressed their concern about the existence of terrorist groups in Iraq and the threat they represented for neighbouring countries.

On 21 November [A/58/611-S/2003/1134], India and the Russian Federation transmitted to the Secretary-General the text of the Declaration of the Russian Federation and the Republic of India on Global Challenges and Threats to International Security and Stability (Moscow, 12 November). The two countries said that a specific time plan of action should be adopted under the aegis of the United Nations for the speediest restoration of the State sovereignty of Iraq, for the stabilization of the political and humanitarian situation and for ensuring Iraq's economic growth with broad international participation.

Security Council consideration (21 November). On 21 November [meeting 4869], the Council heard briefings by the United States and the United Kingdom on the latest developments in Iraq.

The United States said that violence continued to be directed against the Iraqi people and all those who were trying to assist them in creating a new Iraq. Iraqis were taking on increasing responsibilities for their security every day and were working to rebuild a strong police force and a new army. They also continued to take over administrative responsibilities and to provide for the delivery of basic services. Iraq's ministries were run by Iraqi ministers, appointed by and reporting to the Iraqi Governing Council. The 15 November announcement by the Governing Council of a political process to establish a representative transitional national assembly to assume full sovereign powers in 2004 was a step forward in Iraq's political transition. Under that process, a transitional national assembly would be formed to elect an executive branch, select ministers and serve as a legislative body. By 30 June 2004, that new transitional administration would assume full responsibility for governing Iraq. The Authority would then dissolve, as would the Iraqi Governing Council. The Transitional National Assembly would be formed through caucuses at the provincial level. The selection and structure and powers of the Assembly would be established by a fundamental law, with basic principles of openness and transparency. The delegates to the Assembly should be selected no later than 31 May 2004. The fundamental law would protect freedom of speech and religion and would include a statement of equal rights for all Iraqis. The law would define the relationship between the central Government and provincial authorities and would have an expiration date, by which time a permanent constitution for Iraq was to be drafted and a new Government of Iraq elected. The agreement signed between the Governing Council and the Authority on 15 November established a time line for the direct election of a constitutional convention, no later than 15 March 2005, to draft a permanent constitution for Iraq. The constitution would be ratified through a popular referendum, and a new Iraqi Government would be elected under the terms of the ratified constitution no later than 31 December 2005. Three basic steps—increased assumption by Iraqis for security, creation of the Governing Council, appointment of effective ministers to run Iraqi ministries and continuing transfer of political authority to Iraqis—were part of the Authority's planning for post-Saddam Iraq.

The continued support of the international community in reconstruction efforts was also critical. At a donors conference (Madrid, 23-24 October), the international community pledged over $33 billion in support to Iraq. The Coalition stressed that the United Nations had a vital role to play in Iraq and stood ready to discuss with UN officials appropriate security support, as envisioned under resolution 1511(2003) (see p. 348). Security and stability underpinned all other efforts on the ground. Despite the killings, bombings and other attacks, much of Iraq remained calm. The reality that could not be captured by a television camera was that Iraqis were coming together to expand conditions of security and stability, adding more than 130,000 personnel to the security effort. Over 60,000 police officers were back on the streets and over 12,000 Iraqi border personnel were on duty. The first battalion of the new Iraqi army was formed in October 2003, and by the autumn of 2004 the Iraqi army would have expanded to about 35,000 troops. Notwithstanding those efforts, the United States acknowledged that security conditions in Iraq remained a major preoccupation and that there was a need to deliver a sustainable, improved security situation, particularly in the centre of the country. Over the coming months, the Authority would continue to work with the Governing Council to promote diverse and representative citizen participation within, and among, communities throughout Iraq. The focus would be on increasing financial transparency and accountability and on strengthening the capacity of local administrations to provide municipal services. In June, the Iraqi Survey Group assumed responsibility for searching for and eliminating Iraqi WMD, prohibited missile-delivery systems and related infrastructure. In October, an interim report on the Group's activities detailed numerous violations by Saddam Hussein's regime of its mandated obligations under Council resolutions, including deliberate efforts to conceal from the United Nations equipment and programme activities related to WMD during inspections from November 2002 to March 2003.

The United Kingdom briefed the Council on the main points relating to the provision of basic services, economic and reconstruction issues and human rights and justice.

Constitutional and electoral timetable

On 2 December [S/2003/1169], the Council President acknowledged the receipt of a 24 November letter from the interim President of the Iraqi Governing Council, Jalal Talabani, regarding the timetable agreed upon with the Authority in accordance with paragraph 7 of Council resolution 1511(2003) (see p. 348). The contents of the letter had been brought to the attention of Council members.

On 11 December [S/2003/1170], Iraq requested that its 24 November letter be circulated as a Security Council document. The letter stated that the Governing Council had decided to hold general elections for the establishment of a constitutional convention no later than 15 March 2005. The constitution would then be submitted to the Iraqi people for approval in a referendum. By the end of 2005, elections would be held to elect a new government in accordance with the provisions of the constitution. The Governing Council and the transitional government, to be elected by the end of June 2004, would make the necessary preparations for those elections, which would include conducting a population census, drafting a law containing electoral regulations and adopting laws concerning political parties, the press and meetings. Prior to commencing the constitutional process, the transitional governing council would draft, no later than the end of February 2004, a law concerning the administration of the Iraqi State in accordance with the following principles: respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, including freedom of religion and equality of all citizens; separation of the three branches of government; introduction of some degree of decentralization in the administration of the governorates, taking into consideration the situation in Iraqi Kurdistan; establishment of the principle of civilian control of the Iraqi armed and security forces; and establishment of a unified federal, democratic and multi-lateral system that would respect the Islamic identity of the majority of the Iraqi people while ensuring the rights of other religions. The aforementioned law would also provide for the establishment of a provisional legislative body in accordance with procedures that would guarantee broad representation of all segments of Iraqi society. That body, to be established no later than the end of May 2004, would elect a provisional Iraqi government no later than the end of June 2004, at which point the Authority and the Governing Council would be dissolved.

Report of Secretary-General (December). In response to resolution 1483(2003) (see p. 338), the Secretary-General submitted a December report (S/2003/1149) on UN activities and key developments in Iraq since his July report (see p. 342).

The Secretary-General said that, at the beginning of August, the United Nations stood at a critical point with respect to its role and engagement in Iraq. On the one hand, UN agencies, funds and programmes were playing a key role in a variety of sectors, including food and nutrition assistance, the delivery of medical supplies, educational materials and drinking water, and emergency repairs of essential facilities. Thanks in part to UN support for the efforts of the Authority and Iraqi ministries, improvements in the provision of basic services were becoming noticeable. The Authority's efforts to restore Iraqi capacities in the field of law and order were beginning to bear fruit and the formation of the Iraqi Governing Council on 13 July offered the potential to provide a credible and representative Iraqi interlocutor with which the United Nations could develop a comprehensive programme of action. However, major uncertainties remained about the future role of the United Nations. First, the Governing Council and the Authority had not expressed any clear or shared vision on the role to be played by the United Nations in the remainder of the political transition process and other key areas suggested in his 17 July report. Second, on that and other issues, divisions became apparent among Iraqis within and outside the Governing Council. Third, armed attacks against the Coalition forces, Iraqi institutions and other civilian and international targets intensified in sophistication, scale and breadth, precipitating a sharp downturn in the overall security situation. By the time the Security Council, in resolution 1500(2003) of 14 August (see p. 346), authorized the establishment of UNAMI, the situation was already considerably different from that envisaged less than a month earlier, when the Secretary-General outlined the proposed concept of operations for the Mission in his July report.

Responsibility for the 19 August attack against UN headquarters in Baghdad (see p. 346) remained uncertain. Although the Abu-Hafs al-Masri Brigades, a group affiliated with Al-Qaida, among others, claimed responsibility in a message published on the Internet and in Arabic newspapers, the authenticity of the message had not been established. On 21 August, the Secretary-General dispatched to Iraq an investigation team led by the senior security officer of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights and comprising members of the Office of the United Nations Security Coordinator, the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia and the Office of Internal Oversight Services. They were tasked with determining and recording the events leading up to the explosion and immediately thereafter, assessing the adequacy of preventive measures and making recommendations on required adjustments to enable UN personnel to operate in greater safety in the future. He also instructed the UN Security Coordinator, Tun Myat, to visit Iraq from 23 to 30 August to review the security situation and to make recommendations on what reductions in the number of UN personnel in the country might be required on security grounds. The Security Coordinator, in a 2 September report to the Secretary-General, noted that the overall security situation in Iraq had deteriorated dramatically in August. Iraq had entered a new phase in which all foreign organizations and Iraqis who cooperated with the Authority were potential targets of deliberate and hostile attacks. That type of security threat had not been anticipated. The United Nations had chosen offices in locations that would facilitate contact with and accessibility to Iraqi partners and beneficiaries. The more than 800 international UN personnel deployed throughout the country were thus extremely vulnerable to further attacks. Coalition forces were not in a position to provide dedicated protection to all of them. Hence, the reduction of international personnel, well under way before 2 September, continued after the submission of the Security Coordinator's report. On 5 September, the UN Under-Secretary-General for Political Affairs informed the Security Council in informal consultations of the Secretary-General's decision to withdraw from Iraq all international personnel other than those required for essential humanitarian assistance activities and security and logistics support. On the basis of those criteria, the Secretary-General had decided to reduce the number of international staff in Baghdad from 400 to approximately 50 and in the three northern governorates from 400 to approximately 30, and to vacate the UN offices in Basra, Hilla and Mosul.

On 22 September, the Secretary-General appointed an Independent Panel on the Safety and Security of United Nations Personnel in Iraq. Led by the former President of Finland, Martti Ahtisaari, the Panel was tasked with, among other things, examining the adequacy of UN security, management and practices prior to the attack, the circumstances of the attack itself and the actions taken by various parties in the immediate aftermath. The Panel's report, submitted on 20 October, concluded that there was no place in Iraq without risk and that a new security approach was needed in order to ensure staff security in such a high-risk environment. It also argued that the UN security management system was in need of drastic reform, especially in the light of the new type of threat faced in Iraq and potentially elsewhere. It recommended a separate and independent audit and accountability procedure to review the responsibilities of key individuals in the decision-making processes on security matters prior to the 19 August attack. Accordingly, the Secretary-General established a team on 4 November, headed by Gerald Walzer, former Deputy High Commissioner for Refugees, to determine accountability at all managerial levels at UN Headquarters and in the field with respect to relevant decisions taken prior to the attack. The team was asked to present its findings to the Secretary-General with the least possible delay.

Meanwhile, on 22 September, a second suicide attack was launched against UN headquarters at the Canal Hotel in Baghdad, resulting in the death of one Iraqi policeman and the wounding of others, including two UN national staff. Other attacks directed against civilian foreign organizations, and against Iraqi civilians, coupled with the findings of the Panel led by President Ahtisaari, led the Secretary-General to draw down further the international UN presence in Iraq during the months of September and October; that included the relocation of international programme staff from Baghdad after the 22 September attack. That period of retrenchment culminated with the Secretary-General's decision, on 4 November, to relocate temporarily all international UN staff from Baghdad, pending a comprehensive review of UN operations in Iraq and their security implications, leaving only a small core presence of international personnel in Erbil.

Despite the 19 August attack and the subsequent relocation of UN staff, a substantial number of planned UN activities had continued. That was particularly true with respect to humanitarian relief and emergency rehabilitation efforts, the reconstruction needs assessment process and the termination of the oil-for-food programme. On 23 October, the Secretary-General attended the opening of the international donors conference for the reconstruction of Iraq in Madrid. At the end of the conference, participants announced pledges amounting to more than $33 billion in grants and loans until the end of 2007. In order to help coordinate and channel contributions towards reconstruction and development in Iraq, the United Nations and the World Bank were requested to present terms of reference for an international reconstruction trust fund facility for Iraq. To build on the respective strengths and comparative advantages of both the United Nations and the World Bank, the proposed facility comprised two trust funds. The World Bank trust fund would concentrate mainly on technical assistance and infrastructure support, while the UN-managed trust fund would focus on technical assistance, quick-impact projects and transition activities.

There were significant political developments in Iraq post-19 August, especially with respect to the provisions of resolution 1483(2003). They included the 1 September appointment of interim ministers by the Governing Council and the completion of the preparatory constitutional committee's report; the adoption of resolution 1511 (2003) (see p. 348); and the 15 November agreement reached between the Governing Council and the Authority on the political transition process. With regard to resolution 1511(2003), the Secretary-General was particularly grateful to the sponsors for inserting the caveat "as circumstances permit" with respect to the implementation of the original plans of UNAMI, and in support of the implementation of a timetable and programme for the drafting of a new constitution and the holding of elections, with support from the United Nations "if requested by the Governing Council". In doing so, the Council took into consideration his concerns that the United Nations should not take on responsibilities it could not successfully carry out. For UN engagement to be successful, adequate measures for staff security needed to be in place first. Furthermore, the Secretary-General said that in order for the UN role in the political process to be effective, it needed to be supported by all members of the Governing Council, key Iraqi figures outside the process, the Coalition, key States in the region, a united Security Council and major donor countries.

The 15 November agreement on the political process set out a timetable and programme for drafting a new constitution and holding elections under that constitution (see above). Though the agreement made no specific mention of any role for the United Nations, both the Governing Council and the Authority expressed their desire for the Organization to play an active part in its implementation.

The fact that a sovereign transitional Iraqi Government was envisaged to be established by 30 June 2004 required the United Nations to focus immediately on humanitarian assistance, emergency rehabilitation, technical assistance for ministries related thereto and the initiation of reconstruction programmes. On the political front, it had yet to be established what role, if any, Iraqis and the Authority would like the United Nations to play in the formation of the national assembly by 31 May 2004, how substantive that role might be in relation to the security risks and whether circumstances would permit the Organization to play any such role effectively. The Secretary-General welcomed the holding of regional meetings to encourage and support the political process in Iraq. He established an advisory group on Iraq, composed of neighbouring countries, Egypt and Security Council members. His aim in doing so was to initiate an informal dialogue and to develop a common basis for approaching the situation in Iraq. He also intended to enhance contacts between the United Nations and regional countries and regional organizations with a view to building confidence at three levels: between Iraq and its neighbours, within the region itself and between the region and the larger international community. In the longer term, if the Iraqis requested and as circumstances permitted, the United Nations would make available to the Iraqi people its expertise on the constitutional and electoral processes. However, no determination of electoral assistance by the United Nations could be made without a specific request of the Member States and the launching of a needs assessment mission, as per standard UN practices.

Irrespective of whatever direct contribution the United Nations might make to the political process in the immediate or long term, there was ample potential for it to continue to play an important role in Iraq. The key task was to develop a detailed plan of action that took into consideration the conditions and circumstances required if the United Nations was to play that role effectively both inside and outside the country. To that end, a detailed planning process was initiated at a meeting held in Nicosia, Cyprus, from 11 to 15 November. Representatives of 20 UN departments, agencies, funds and programmes, including the UN agency country team for Iraq, and UNAMI personnel participated. The Nicosia meeting and subsequent meetings at UN Headquarters had resulted in a plan for future UN activities in Iraq in the immediate to medium term, with respect to security, the deployment of UNAMI and criteria for revisions to the UN country strategy for relief, recovery and reconstruction for 2004.

The substantive programmatic review highlighted the fact that the security environment was unlikely to improve and could deteriorate even further; the United Nations would remain a high-value, high-impact target for terrorist activity in Iraq for the foreseeable future. The acting UN Security Coordinator assessed the risk to UN personnel in Iraq as falling in the high to critical category, but considered that, over time, gradual improvements in the security environment, coupled with the full implementation of a range of protective measures, had the potential to reduce the risk to medium to high. Those measures included protection by a highly mobile, responsive armed force on a countrywide basis; preparation and implementation of enhanced Minimum Operating Safety Standards to include security plans and procedures and significant office and residential building upgrades; the establishment of an effective, well-trained and well-equipped security management and coordination structure; training on security matters for staff at all levels; a highly capable and responsive emergency medical support element; protected vehicles; and a comprehensive, far-reaching public information strategy that could effectively explain the role and tasks of the United Nations. In summary, establishing the necessary security conditions would be a time-consuming and expensive process. Under those circumstances, it was difficult to envisage the United Nations operating with a large number of international staff inside Iraq in the near future, unless there was an unexpected and significant improvement in the overall security situation.

It was impossible to forecast if and when circumstances would permit the full deployment of UNAMI in Iraq. The operation would need to build up incrementally, at a pace and scope that could not yet be defined. At the same time, prudent contingency planning was required to enable the United Nations to respond as quickly as possible to requests for assistance from the Iraqi people. Therefore, the Secretary-General decided to commence the incremental process of establishing UNAMI by setting up the core of the Mission outside Iraq, in Nicosia. Additional UNAMI staff would be deployed to a small office in Amman and other locations in the region. He envisaged an integrated core team of approximately 40 international UNAMI staff in total to be in place by early 2004; that number would be expected to increase to up to 60 international staff once a new Special Representative had been appointed. That core UNAMI team would initially be managed by Ross Mountain, who would serve as acting Special Representative, until such time as a new Special Representative was appointed. The core UNAMI team would lead operational planning efforts for the eventual deployment of UNAMI in Iraq, and also coordinate the activities and provide guidance to UN agencies. The political and human rights officers would meet with Iraqis travelling in the region to discuss with them the political and human rights situation in the country. The UNAMI core team would also lead the articulation and subsequent implementation of a public information strategy through media outlets based in the region and national staff in Iraq.

During the Nicosia consultations, progress was made in working out modalities to implement an integrated approach to the UN relief, recovery and reconstruction activities. The basis for the UN assistance efforts would be a fully integrated UN country team strategy for 2004, which would be finalized by January 2004 and reviewed on a quarterly basis to reflect emerging needs and changing circumstances. The implementation of UN programmes on the ground would be led by an integrated implementation team.

The Secretary-General observed that in order to mitigate the possibility that the insurgency in Iraq would grow over time, various steps had to be taken. First and foremost, there was a need to act on the recognition that the mounting insecurity problem could not be solved through military means alone. A political solution was required, one that would entail making the political transition process more inclusive. That also meant empowering Iraqi institutions to take the decisions that would shape the political and economic future of their country. In order to command widespread support, those institutions needed to function effectively and transparently. Political steps of that kind would make it clearer that the foreign occupation of Iraq was to be short-lived and that it would soon give way to a fully fledged Iraqi Government, hence making it more difficult for insurgents to rally support. Second, the articulation of a national agenda that was seen to be truly representative of all segments of Iraqi society required national reconciliation and unity, not revenge and/or collective punishment.

Third, intensified efforts by Coalition forces to demonstrate that they were adhering to international humanitarian law and human rights instruments would make it much more difficult for the insurgents to rally support for their cause. Fourth, it was essential that all those in the international community who were in a position to support the implementation of an Iraqi agenda should do so. The UN would not disengage from Iraq, even though most UN international staff had been temporarily relocated outside the country.

In a later report [S/2004/625], the Secretary-General said that the security environment in Iraq had not improved. On 30 December, the President of the Iraqi Governing Council requested the United Nations to help determine whether elections were feasible by 30 June 2004 and, if not, to identify alternative means of forming an interim Iraqi Government to which sovereignty could be restored. The Secretary-General planned to convene a meeting in January 2004 with representatives of the Governing Council and the Authority to deal with that request. IAMB was constituted in October 2003 and held an organizational session on 5 December in New York when it was agreed that the Secretary-General's representative on the Board, Jean-Pierre Halbwachs, would chair it for a term of no more than one year. The Board oversaw the audits conducted by international accounting firms to ensure that the Development Fund for Iraq was used in a transparent manner for the purposes set out in resolution 1483(2003) and that oil export sales were made consistent with prevailing international market best practices.

Security Council consideration (16 December). On 16 December [meeting 4883], the Council was briefed by the Secretary-General on his December report.

Noting that the Council was meeting three days after the capture by Coalition forces of Saddam Hussein, the Secretary-General said that the capture was not just a symbol of the downfall of the former Iraqi regime, but also an opportunity for a new beginning in the vital task of helping Iraqis to take control of their destiny. The task of restoring the effective exercise of sovereignty to Iraqis, in the form of a provisional Government, was urgent. It was essential that the process leading to the formation of a provisional Government be fully inclusive and transparent. It was also right that Saddam Hussein should be held accountable for past deeds, through a procedure that met the highest international standards of due process. Accounting for the past would be an important part of bringing about national reconciliation. Owing to the persistent security concerns and the temporary relocation of staff outside Iraq, the Organization would need to find creative ways of intensifying its engagement despite diminished capacity on the ground, as explained in the December report. Iraq was likely to remain a difficult environment and the international community should not expect that the end of the occupation and formation of a provisional Government would automatically bring about an end to insecurity, even though that should bring some improvement. There was no panacea; only a credible and inclusive transition offered the best hope of stability and of political mobilization by Iraqis against the violence.

Iraq presented to the Council the timetable set out in the 15 November agreement on political process signed between the Iraqi Governing Council and the Coalition Authority (see p. 354). Iraq stated that Saddam Hussein had to answer to the Iraqi people for his crimes against humanity. At last Iraq could begin the long-overdue healing process of seeking unity and national reconciliation.

The Security Council, in a closed meeting held on the same day [meeting 4884], held a constructive exchange of views with the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq, Hoshya Zebari.

Communication (17 December). On 17 December [S/2003/1190], the EU informed the Secretary-General that it welcomed the capture of Saddam Hussein as a crucial further step towards peace, stability and democracy in Iraq and in the region.

In a later communication [A/58/673-S/2004/7], Kuwait transmitted to the Secretary-General the texts of the closing statement and of the Kuwait Declaration that were adopted by the Supreme Council of the Gulf Cooperation Council at its twenty-fourth session (Kuwait, 21-22 December). The Supreme Council rejected any attempt to dismember Iraq and stressed the importance of a vital role for the United Nations in the country. It also expressed satisfaction with the new direction in United States policy aimed at accelerating the handover of power to Iraqis.

POWs, Kuwaiti property and missing persons

Communication (February). On 10 February [S/2003/162], Iraq informed the Secretary-General that on 3 February it had handed over Kuwaiti archives and property to Kuwait.

Reports of Secretary-General (April, June, August, December). Pursuant to Security Council resolution 1284(1999) [YUN 1999, p. 230], the Secretary-General submitted reports in April [S/2003/419], June [S/2003/614], August [S/2003/813] and December [S/2003/1161] on compliance by Iraq with its obligations regarding the repatriation or return of all Kuwaiti and third-country nationals or their remains, and on the return of all Kuwaiti property, including archives, seized by Iraq during its occupation of Kuwait, which began in August 1990 [YUN 1990, p. 189]. The High-level Coordinator for compliance by Iraq with its obligations regarding the return of Kuwaiti nationals and property, Yuli M. Vorontsov (Russian Federation), regularly briefed the Security Council throughout the year.

In April, the Secretary-General observed that some progress had been achieved with the resumption of the meetings of the Technical Subcommittee of the Tripartite Commission, with five being held since the beginning of 2003. However, no concrete results had been achieved. The meetings were interrupted owing to the outbreak of the conflict in Iraq on 20 March. The Subcommittee was established in 1994 to expedite the search for all persons for whom inquiry files had been opened. The Commission, established in 1991 under ICRC auspices, dealt with the questions of persons still unaccounted for, and was made up of representatives of France, Iraq, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, the United Kingdom and the United States. However, at the end of 1998, Iraq decided not to participate in the Commission's work, arguing that it no longer held captive Kuwaiti prisoners in its territory and, thus, the issue had become one of missing persons, not prisoners of war (POWs). In December 2002, Iraq had expressed its willingness to resume participation in the Technical Subcommittee, and an Iraqi delegation, for the first time since 1998, participated on the sidelines of the Tripartite Commission's meeting.

In his June report, the Secretary-General said that prior to the outbreak of hostilities in Iraq, the then Government of Iraq demonstrated some limited cooperation on the return of Kuwaiti property. However, while some property and some documents were handed over, the Kuwaiti archives, along with Kuwaiti military equipment seized by Iraq, remained largely unreturned. Council resolution 1483(2003) of 22 May (see p. 338) directed the High-level Coordinator to proceed with his duties in fulfilment of his mandate. Lists of Kuwaiti property returned on 22 December 2002 and 3 February 2003 were attached to the report.

In August, the Secretary-General said that the Coalition's discovery of mass graves in Iraq and the subsequent identification of remains, including those of Kuwaiti missing persons, had brought to light the atrocities perpetrated by the previous Iraqi regime. The Tripartite Commission had formulated procedures to exhume and identify the mortal remains of missing Kuwaitis at its Technical Subcommittee meetings. The Secretary-General encouraged continuing collaboration between Iraq and Kuwait within the framework of the Tripartite Commission and ICRC. He said that in the light of the ongoing progress, the Council might wish to consider bringing the High-level Coordinator's mandate to a close with the submission of the December 2003 report on the repatriation and return of all Kuwaitis and third-country nationals or their remains.

In December, the Secretary-General said that after many years of manoeuvring and denial by the previous Iraqi Government, a grim truth was unveiling itself. The discovery of mass graves in Iraq containing the mortal remains of Kuwaitis was a gruesome and devastating development. While hope had not faded that some of the 605 persons in question would be found alive, the prospects for that to happen were diminishing. There was also the possibility that the fate of many individuals would remain unknown for many years to come, if it was ever to emerge. The Secretary-General said that the removal from Kuwait of civilians, their execution in cold blood in remote sites in Iraq, and a decade-long cover-up of the truth constituted a grave violation of human rights and international humanitarian law. Those responsible for the crimes, particularly those who ordered the executions, had to be brought to justice. He regretted that the Kuwaiti archives and military equipment had not been returned to the country. However, the fall of Saddam Hussein's regime and the opening of avenues for direct contact between the parties concerned inspired hope for an early resolution of all outstanding questions. There was room for further progress towards a satisfactory solution of the remaining humanitarian concerns of the State and people of Kuwait, and more time would be needed and more efforts required before those concerns could be settled. Given the fact that not all files relating to the issues of Kuwaiti prisoners and third-country nationals and Kuwaiti properties had been completely closed, Kuwait had called on the United Nations to pursue and resolve those issues and was in favour of extending the High-level Coordinator's mandate. The Secretary-General said that the Council would have to determine whether it would wish the mandate to continue.

In presidential statement S/PRST/2003/28 of 18 December (see below), the Council agreed that the High-level Coordinator's mandate should continue.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 4887], the Security Council was briefed by the Secretary-General's High-level Coordinator. Following consultations among Council members, the President made statement S/PRST/2003/28 on behalf of the Council:

The Security Council today heard a briefing from Mr. Yuli Vorontsov, the Secretary-General's High-level Coordinator, on the fourteenth report of the Secretary-General submitted in accordance with paragraph 14 of Council resolution 1284(1999).

The Council expressed its full support towards Mr. Vorontsov and for his tireless efforts on the issues of Kuwaiti and third-country nationals and the return of all Kuwaiti property. The Council agreed that his mandate should continue in accordance with paragraph 14 of resolution 1284(1999) of 17 December 1999.

The Council shared the views expressed by the Secretary-General in his report. The Council has strongly condemned the killing of Kuwaiti and third-country nationals by the previous Iraqi regime in violation of international law, especially the removal from Kuwait of civilian men and women, their execution in cold blood in remote sites in Iraq and a decade-long cover-up of the truth. The Council expressed its strong hope that those responsible for these horrendous crimes would be brought to justice.

The Council expressed its deep condolences to all of the families of the Kuwaiti and third-country nationals and expressed its continuing concern for the plight of the families of those persons whose whereabouts were still unknown.

The Council stressed the importance of the work of the Coalition Provisional Authority, the International Committee of the Red Cross, the Tripartite Commission and its Technical Subcommittee and called upon all parties concerned to continue to work towards a satisfactory solution to all of the outstanding humanitarian aspects covered by Mr. Vorontsov's mandate.

The Council expressed its deep regret that Kuwaiti property, including its national archives, had not yet been returned to Kuwait and encouraged the Coalition Provisional Authority and other parties concerned to continue their commitment to the search for and return of all Kuwaiti properties and archives, in accordance with paragraph 6 of resolution 1483(2003) of 22 May 2003. The Council agreed to continue to keep Mr. Vorontsov's mandate under review and looked forward to receiving his next report.

Later communication. Kuwait transmitted to the Secretary-General the texts of the closing statement and of the Kuwait Declaration that were adopted by the Supreme Council of the Gulf Cooperation Council at its twenty-fourth session (Kuwait, 21-22 December). The Supreme Council applauded the statement made by the Security Council President on 18 December, praised the efforts of ICRC and the Technical Subcommittee, and appealed to all parties concerned to continue their joint efforts to resolve the outstanding problems related to the repatriation or return of all Kuwaiti and third-country nationals or their remains.

UN Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission

In March, just before the United States-led invasion of Iraq from Kuwait, the mandate of the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission (UNIKOM) was suspended and most of its staff evacuated. UNIKOM maintained a small rear headquarters in Kuwait City to provide a peacekeeping presence, undertake political and military liaison functions, and support UN humanitarian assistance programmes for Iraq. On 25 March [S/2003/367], Kuwait informed the Security Council President that between 20 and 24 March, Iraq had launched 11 missiles, including a Scud missile, against Kuwait. While much of UNIKOM headquarters at Umm Qasr and other infrastructure were destroyed in the conflict, Camp Khor, on the Kuwaiti side of the border, reopened in May to support humanitarian operations. On 3 July, the Security Council, in resolution 1490 (2003) (see p. 359), noted that UNIKOM had successfully fulfilled its mandate from 1991 to 2003 and extended it for a final period of three months, up to 6 October 2003. Also, on 6 October, the Council decided to end the demilitarized zone (DMZ), an area about 200 to 240 kilometres long and extending 10 kilometres into Iraq and 5 kilometres into Kuwait from the Iraq-Kuwait border.

UNIKOM, established by Security Council resolution 687(1991) [YUN 1991, p. 172], discharged its functions until October in accordance with its terms of reference, as expanded by resolution 806(1993) [YUN 1993, p. 406]. Until March 2003, UNIKOM operations involved surveillance, control, investigation and liaison. Surveillance of the DMZ was based on ground and air patrols and observation points. Control operations included static checkpoints, random checks and maintenance of a mobile reserve force. For operational purposes, the DMZ was divided into northern, southern and maritime sectors, with seven, six and three patrol and observation bases, respectively. Investigation teams were stationed in those sectors and at UNIKOM headquarters. Continued liaison was maintained with Iraqi and Kuwaiti authorities at all levels.

The military observers were responsible for patrol, observation, investigation and liaison activities. The infantry battalion was deployed at Camp Khor, with two companies deployed in Camp Abdally and Camp Sierra in the northern and southern DMZ sectors. The battalion conducted patrols within the sectors and manned checkpoints at border-crossing sites, making random checks in cooperation with Iraqi and Kuwaiti liaison officers. It also provided security for UNIKOM personnel and installations.

UNIKOM maintained headquarters at Umm Qasr in Iraq, liaison offices in Baghdad and Kuwait City and a support centre at Camp Khor.

By a 6 January letter to the Council President [S/2003/27], the Secretary-General proposed to appoint Brigadier General Franciszek Gągor (Poland) as UNIKOM's Force Commander, replacing Major General Miguel Angel Moreno (Argentina).

On 9 January [S/2003/28], the Council took note of the Secretary-General's proposal.

Major General Gągor left the Mission area on 7 July and the Chief of Staff, Brigadier General Upinder Singh Klair (India), was appointed Head of Mission.

Reports of Secretary-General (March, June, October). UNIKOM's activities were described in three reports of the Secretary-General, covering the periods 16 September 2002 to 21 March 2003 [S/2003/393 & Add.1], 22 March to 15 June [S/2003/656] and 16 June to 1 October [S/2003/933].

In the March report, the Secretary-General said that during the period under review, the situation along the border between Iraq and Kuwait became increasingly tense owing to the massive military build-up on the Kuwaiti side of the border. UNIKOM continued to carry out its responsibilities and contributed to the maintenance of stability in the border region until 17 March, when conditions on the ground dictated withdrawal of most of the Mission for security reasons. A small headquarters, consisting of 12 military officers, 20 essential civilian staff and some local staff, remained in Kuwait City. UNIKOM's personnel had been dispersed temporarily and the timing of their return to their assignments would be decided in consultation with the Council. The Secretary-General recommended that the residual peacekeeping presence in Kuwait City be maintained at an appropriate level for a further three months, until 6 July 2003.

In June, the Secretary-General said that the Mission continued to maintain its rear headquarters in Kuwait City to ensure a peacekeeping presence in the UNIKOM area of operations. It undertook high-level military and political liaison duties, retained a capacity to conduct contingency planning for a continued or modified operation, undertook residual tasks for the Mission, such as recovery, reconciliation and disposal of assets, and provided support to other entities of the UN system in the region. Most of UNIKOM's property and premises on the Iraqi side of the DMZ were totally destroyed or stolen during or soon after the military conflict. The Secretary-General said that since the conflict in Iraq had subsided, and following the adoption of Council resolution 1483(2003) (see p. 338), the Council might wish to consider whether the continued presence of UNIKOM in Kuwait with a suspended mandate and in changed circumstances was still desirable. In those altered conditions, he recommended that the residual peacekeeping presence of UNIKOM be maintained for a final three months, until 6 October 2003, when the Mission would be closed. During that period, UNIKOM would scale down its military presence to a minimum, continue to provide support from both the Kheitan Support Centre and Camp Khor to humanitarian assistance operations in Iraq, maintain liaison with Kuwaiti authorities, undertake the reconciliation and liquidation of UNIKOM assets and, most importantly, make appropriate arrangements for handing over its activities in assistance to humanitarian operations to other entities in the area. That would also allow more time for the assessment of the security situation in the Mission's former area of operations, as requested by Kuwait.

In his October report, the Secretary-General said that UNIKOM continued to reduce its staff and finalized preparations for the liquidation of its assets as part of its final mandate period authorized in Council resolution 1490(2003) (see below). It also provided support to humanitarian assistance operations in Iraq and made arrangements for the handover of its facilities to the host country and UN agencies in Kuwait. UNIKOM expected that the technical liquidation of its activities would be completed one month after the closure of the Mission. After the 19 August attack against the UN headquarters in Baghdad, UNIKOM provided urgently needed assets, such as prefabricated accommodations, supplies, water tanks and communications equipment, for the continuation of UN operations in Baghdad. The Secretary-General said that in its last phase, as a residual peacekeeping presence operating in a difficult environment affected by the conflict in Iraq from mid-March until the completion of its mandate on 6 October, UNIKOM proved to be a significant source of support for humanitarian agencies deployed in Iraq and Kuwait.

Communications. In two separate letters addressed to the Secretary-General dated 14 March [S/2003/319] and 16 March [S/2003/327], Iraq said that the UN decision to withdraw UNIKOM observers from their posts along the Iraqi-Kuwaiti border was inconsistent with the Organization's responsibility to maintain peace and security and a violation of relevant Council resolutions.

Security Council consideration (2-3 April). On 2 April, in a closed meeting [meeting 4783], the Council heard a briefing by the UN Assistant Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations and had a constructive exchange of views with representatives of the troop-contributing countries to UNIKOM.

On 3 April [S/2003/400], the Council concurred with the Secretary-General's recommendation, expressed in his March report (see above), that a peacekeeping presence be retained at an appropriate level for a further three months, until 6 July 2003.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 3 July [meeting 4783], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1490(2003). The draft [S/2003/684] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling all its relevant resolutions, including resolutions 687(1991) of 3 April 1991, 689(1991) of 9 April 1991, 806(1993) of 5 February 1993, 833(1993) of 27 May 1993 and 1483(2003) of 22 May 2003,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 17 June 2003 on the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission,

Reaffirming the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq and Kuwait,

Recognizing that the continued operation of the Mission and of a demilitarized zone established pursuant to resolution 687(1991) is no longer necessary to protect against threats to international security posed by Iraqi actions against Kuwait,

Expressing its appreciation for the substantial voluntary contributions made to the Mission by the Government of Kuwait,

Commending the superior role played by personnel of the Mission and the Department of Peacekeeping Operations of the Secretariat, and noting that the Mission successfully fulfilled its mandate from 1991 to 2003,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides to continue the mandate of the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission for a final period, until 6 October 2003;

2. Directs the Secretary-General to negotiate the transfer of non-removable property of the Mission and of those assets that cannot be disposed of otherwise to the States of Kuwait and Iraq, as appropriate;

3. Decides to end the demilitarized zone extending 10 kilometres into Iraq and 5 kilometres into Kuwait from the Iraq-Kuwait border at the end of mandate of the Mission on 6 October 2003;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council on the completion of the mandate of the Mission;

5. Expresses its appreciation of the decision of the Government of Kuwait to defray, since 1 November 1993, two thirds of the cost of the Mission;

6. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Financing

On 18 June [meeting 90], the General Assembly considered the Secretary-General's reports on UNIKOM's budget for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004 [A/57/664 & Corr.1], the performance report on the budget for the period from 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002 [A/57/665], the overview of the financing of UN peacekeeping operations: budget performance for the period from 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002 and budget for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004 [A/57/723], and the financing of UNIKOM for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004 [A/57/811], together with the related reports of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) on the administrative and budgetary aspects of the financing of UN peacekeeping operations [A/57/772] and on the financing of UNIKOM [A/57/813]. On the recommendation of the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee [A/57/833], the Assembly adopted resolution 57/330 without vote [agenda item 132 (a)].

Financing of the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission

The General Assembly,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission and the related reports of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Recalling Security Council resolutions 687(1991) of 3 April 1991 and 689(1991) of 9 April 1991, by which the Council decided to establish the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission and to review the question of its termination or continuation every six months,

Recalling also its resolution 45/260 of 3 May 1991 on the financing of the Observation Mission and its subsequent resolutions and decisions thereon, the latest of which was resolution 56/297 of 27 June 2002,

Reaffirming the general principles underlying the financing of United Nations peacekeeping operations, as stated in General Assembly resolutions 1874(S-IV) of 27 June 1963, 3101(XXVII) of 11 December 1973 and 55/235 of 23 December 2000,

Expressing its appreciation for the substantial voluntary contributions made to the Observation Mission by the Government of Kuwait and the contributions of other Governments,

Mindful of the fact that it is essential to provide the Observation Mission with the necessary financial resources to enable it to fulfil its responsibilities under the relevant resolutions of the Security Council,

1. Takes note of the status of contributions to the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission as at 31 March 2003, including the contributions outstanding in the amount of 10.2 million United States dollars, representing some 3 per cent of the total assessed contributions, notes with concern that only thirty-six Member States have paid their assessed contributions in full, and urges all other Member States, in particular those in arrears, to ensure payment of their outstanding assessed contributions;

2. Expresses its continued appreciation of the decision of the Government of Kuwait to defray two thirds of the cost of the Observation Mission, effective 1 November 1993;

3. Expresses its appreciation to those Member States which have paid their assessed contributions in full, and urges all other Member States to make every possible effort to ensure payment of their assessed contributions to the Observation Mission in full;

4. Expresses concern at the financial situation with regard to peacekeeping activities, in particular as regards the reimbursements to troop contributors that bear additional burdens owing to overdue payments by Member States of their assessments;

5. Also expresses concern at the delay experienced by the Secretary-General in deploying and providing adequate resources to some recent peacekeeping missions, in particular those in Africa;

6. Emphasizes that all future and existing peacekeeping missions shall be given equal and non-discriminatory treatment in respect of financial and administrative arrangements;

7. Also emphasizes that all peacekeeping missions shall be provided with adequate resources for the effective and efficient discharge of their respective mandates;

8. Reiterates its request to the Secretary-General to make the fullest possible use of facilities and equipment at the United Nations Logistics Base at Brindisi, Italy, in order to minimize the costs of procurement for the Observation Mission;

9. Endorses the recommendation contained in paragraph 5 of the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, and requests the Secretary-General to ensure its full implementation;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to take all necessary action to ensure that the Observation Mission is administered with maximum efficiency and economy;

11. Also requests the Secretary-General, in order to reduce the cost of employing General Service staff, to continue efforts to recruit local staff for the Observation Mission against General Service posts, commensurate with the requirements of the Observation Mission;

Financial performance report for the period from 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002

12. Decides to continue its consideration of the report of the Secretary-General on the financial performance of the Observation Mission for the period from 1 July 2001 to 30 June 2002, and of the treatment of the unencumbered balance and other income in the total amount of 6,443,300 dollars in respect of the financial period ended 30 June 2002, at the main part of its fifty-eighth session;

Budget estimates for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004

13. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the budget of the Observation Mission and the note by the Secretary-General on the financing of the Observation Mission for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004;

14. Authorizes the Secretary-General to enter into commitments in an amount not exceeding 12 million dollars for the period from 1 July to 31 October 2003, to be financed from the accumulated fund balance in the Special Account for the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission;

15. Emphasizes that no peacekeeping mission shall be financed by borrowing funds from other active peacekeeping missions;

16. Encourages the Secretary-General to continue to take additional measures to ensure the safety and security of all personnel under the auspices of the United Nations participating in the Observation Mission;

17. Invites voluntary contributions to the Observation Mission in cash and in the form of services and supplies acceptable to the Secretary-General, to be administered, as appropriate, in accordance with the procedure and practices established by the General Assembly;

18. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-eighth session, under the item entitled "Financing of the activities arising from Security Council resolution 687(1991)", the sub-item entitled "Financing of the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission".

On 23 December, the Assembly took note of the Secretary-General's note on the financing of UNIKOM for the period from 1 July 2003 to 30 June 2004 [A/58/386] and the related report of ACABQ [A/58/441], and decided to keep under review, during its fifty-eighth (2004) session, the sub-item entitled "Financing of the activities arising from Security Council resolution 687(1991): United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission" (decision 58/559).

Also on 23 December, the Assembly decided that the item on the financing of activities arising from resolution 687(1991) remained for consideration at the fifty-eighth session (decision 58/565).

Arms and related sanctions

Sanctions Committee activities

The Security Council Committee established by resolution 661(1990) [YUN 1990, p. 192] (Sanctions Committee for Iraq) was terminated on 21 November 2003 in accordance with resolution 1483(2003) (see p. 338).

During the year, the Committee issued four reports on the implementation of the arms and related sanctions against Iraq, in accordance with the guidelines approved by Council resolution 700(1991) [YUN 1991, p. 198] for facilitating full international implementation of resolution 687(1991) [ibid., p. 172]. The reports were transmitted to the Council on 16 January [S/2003/61], 25 April

[S/2003/507], 14 July [S/2003/714] and 10 October [S/2003/1032]. All of the reports noted that no State or international organization had consulted the Committee on whether certain items fell within the provisions of paragraph 24 of resolution 687(1991) and no international organization had reported any relevant information requested under the guidelines. The October report noted that since April 2003, the situation concerning Iraq had undergone fundamental changes and the Council had lifted all prohibitions related to trade with Iraq. However, prohibitions related to the sale or supply to Iraq of arms and related materiel were still in place; hence the Committee had continued to submit its reports and would continue to fulfil its mandate until the termination of its work on 21 November.

Security Council consideration (22 December). On 22 December (meeting 4888), the Security Council heard a presentation by the Chairman of the Sanctions Committee for Iraq who noted that the Committee had been terminated on 21 November, in accordance with Council resolution 1483(2003), after 13 years of a comprehensive sanctions regime. As a subsidiary organ of the Council, the Committee had executed the political decisions of the Council as manifested in relevant Council resolutions. The Committee's mandate comprised two major elements: the implementation and supervision of the sanctions regime against Iraq and the humanitarian oil-for-food programme. Confronted with the interruption of the programme in March due to the military conflict, the Council adopted resolution 1472(2003) (see p. 363), which allowed humanitarian emergency deliveries out of the existing pipeline of approved contracts. The adoption of the resolution on 28 March was the first time that the Council achieved consensus on an issue related to Iraq after months of division. After the war and adoption of resolution 1483(2003) on 22 May, the Committee was tasked to supervise the transitional process leading to the termination of the oil-for-food programme on 21 November and the transfer of all responsibilities from the Office of the Iraq Programme to the Coalition Provisional Authority. The Committee also fulfilled its additional new task pursuant to paragraphs 19 and 23 of resolution 1483(2003) relating to funds or other assets or resources that had been removed from Iraq or acquired by Saddam Hussein or other officials of the former regime (see also p. 362). On 11 June, the Committee adopted guidelines to identify individuals and entities whose financial assets should be transferred to the Development Fund for Iraq; on 26 June, a first list of such individuals was adopted by the Committee and a list of respective entities followed on 21 November.

Establishment of Security Council Committee pursuant to resolution 1483(2003)

On 24 November [meeting 4872], the Council unanimously adopted resolution 1518(2003). The draft [S/2003/1107] was submitted by Bulgaria, Chile, Guinea, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States. Council members had before them two press releases from the Sanctions Committee, dated 12 June [SC/7791-1K/365] and 29 July [SC/7831-1K/372], which set the guidelines and definitions for the application of paragraphs 19 and 23 of resolution 1483(2003) (see p. 338).

The Security Council,

Recalling all of its relevant resolutions,

Recalling further its earlier decision in resolution 1483(2003) of 22 May 2003 to terminate the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661(1990),

Stressing the importance of all Member States fulfilling their obligations under paragraph 10 of resolution 1483(2003),

Determining that the situation in Iraq, although improved, continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides to establish, with immediate effect, in accordance with rule 28 of its provisional rules of procedure, a Committee of the Security Council, consisting of all the members of the Council, to continue to identify pursuant to paragraph 19 of resolution 1483(2003) individuals and entities referred to in paragraph 19 of that resolution, including by updating the list of individuals and entities that have already been identified by the Committee established pursuant to paragraph 6 of resolution 661(1990), and to report on its work to the Council;

2. Decides also to adopt the guidelines and definitions previously agreed by the Committee established pursuant to paragraph 6 of resolution 661(1990) to implement the provisions of paragraphs 19 and 23 of resolution 1483(2003), and decides that the guidelines and definitions can be amended by the Committee in the light of further considerations;

3. Decides further that the mandate of the Committee referred to in paragraph 1 above shall be kept under review, and decides to consider the possible authorization of the additional task of observing fulfilment by Member States of their obligations under paragraph 10 of resolution 1483(2003);

4. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, France said that the adopted resolution created a new committee in charge of taking over from the Sanctions Committee pursuant to Council resolution 661(1990), in order to ensure the follow-up of the implementation of freezes and transfers of the financial assets of the Government of Saddam Hussein and of high officials of his regime, as provided for in resolution 1483(2003). It was important to ensure, from a practical and technical standpoint, the continuity of the monitoring of the implementation of those financial sanctions. France stressed that for reasons of principle related to the coherence of the Council's practice in monitoring the implementation of sanctions, and bearing in mind the situation in Iraq, it would seem particularly desirable to broaden the mandate of the new committee as soon as possible to include monitoring the arms embargo.

Oil-for-food programme

In accordance with Security Council resolution 1483(2003) (see p. 338), the oil-for-food programme was phased out over a six-month period and terminated on 21 November 2003. Responsibility for the administration of any remaining programme activities was transferred to the Coalition Provisional Authority. The programme, established by Council resolution 986(1995) [YUN 1995, p. 475], authorized States to import Iraqi petroleum and petroleum products as a temporary measure to finance humanitarian assistance, thereby alleviating the adverse consequences of the sanctions regime on the Iraqi people.

Phase XII

Sanctions Committee report. The Sanctions Committee report for phase XII, 30 May to 4 December 2002, of the oil-for-food programme was transmitted to the Council President on 3 March [S/2003/331]. Issues considered by the Committee included the sale of petroleum and petroleum products, humanitarian supplies to Iraq, and matters relating to oil-industry spare parts and equipment for Iraq. The Committee also held formal and informal meetings to discuss various issues related to the humanitarian situation in Iraq and implementation of the oil-for-food programme. The oil overseers continued to advise the Committee on oil-pricing mechanisms, oil contract approvals and amendments, management of revenue objectives and other pertinent questions related to export and monitoring.

As at 31 October 2002, the oil overseers, on behalf of the Committee, had approved 192 oil contracts involving purchasers from 41 countries. The total quantity of oil approved for export under those contracts corresponded to 475 million barrels, with an estimated value of 11.5 billion euros. The contracted amount exceeded the Iraqi export capacity during the phase and the actual volume of oil lifted was expected to be substantially lower. The average rate of Iraqi crude oil exports from the start of the phase until 31 October was only 1.14 million barrels per day, representing about half of the assumed achievable and sustainable export level of 2.1 million barrels per day. Applications received as at 31 October for exports of humanitarian supplies to Iraq under phase XI totalled 1,897, of which 1,418 were approved by the Committee. From the beginning of phase XII until 31 October, 716 applications were received, of which 502 were approved. From the beginning of the programme up to 31 October 2002, 10,063 applications had been approved, with a total value of $22.34 billion. The work of confirmation of goods arrival by the independent inspection agents (Cotecna) continued at five entry points to Iraq. From the beginning of the process to 31 October, the total allocation for oil-industry spare parts and equipment amounted to $4.8 billion. Although the Multinational Interception Force reported a significant reduction in illegal oil exports from Iraq by sea in 2002, oil smuggling continued on a decreasing scale in the Gulf area.

Phase XIII

In accordance with paragraph 1 of Security Council resolution 1447(2002) [YUN 2002, p. 313], the new 180-day extension (phase XIII) of the humanitarian programme established by resolution 986(1995) [YUN 1995, p. 475] began on 5 December 2002. The distribution plan for the new phase was approved by the Secretary-General on 3 January [S/2003/6], on the understanding that its implementation would be governed by resolutions 986(1995), 1281(1999) [YUN 1999, p. 250], 1284(1999) [ibid., p. 230], 1302(2000) [YUN 2000, p. 307], 1330(2000) [ibid., p. 310], 1360(2001) [YUN 2001, p. 305], 1382(2001) [ibid., p. 308], 1409(2002) [YUN 2002, p. 304], 1447(2002) and 1454(2002) [ibid., p. 307] and by the 1996 Memorandum of Understanding between the UN Secretariat and Iraq [YUN 1996, p. 226], without prejudice to Sanctions Committee procedures. The categorized lists of goods received and amended for the phase XII distribution plan [YUN 2002, p. 313] would constitute the basis for the categorized list for phase XIII. UNMOVIC and IAEA technical experts would provide further assessment following the submission of applications.

Communications (21-28 March). On 21 March [S/2003/358], Iraq condemned the submission by the UN Secretariat of a draft resolution containing changes to be made in the oil-for-food programme.

On 28 March [S/2003/389], Iraq informed the Council President that any discussion of an amendment to the 1996 Memorandum of Understanding between Iraq and the UN Secretariat without Iraq's participation was a violation of Council resolution 986(1995) and brooked no justification whatsoever.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (March)

On 28 March [meeting 4732], the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1472(2003). The draft [S/2003/381] was submitted by Angola, Bulgaria, Cameroon, Chile, China, France, Germany, Guinea, Mexico, Pakistan, the Russian Federation, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States.

The Security Council,

Noting that under the provisions of article 55 of the fourth Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, to the fullest extent of the means available to it, the occupying Power has the duty of ensuring the food and medical supplies of the population, and should, in particular, bring in the necessary foodstuffs, medical stores and other articles if the resources of the occupied territory are inadequate,

Convinced of the urgent need to continue to provide humanitarian relief to the people of Iraq throughout the country on an equitable basis, and of the need to extend such humanitarian relief measures to the people of Iraq who leave the country as a result of hostilities,

Recalling its relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 661(1990) of 6 August 1990, 986(1995) of 14 April 1995, 1409(2002) of 14 May 2002 and 1454(2002) of 30 December 2002, as they provide for humanitarian relief to the people of Iraq,

Noting the decision taken by the Secretary-General on 17 March 2003 to withdraw all United Nations and international staff tasked with the implementation of the "Oil-for-Food" Programme (hereinafter "the Programme") established pursuant to resolution 986(1995),

Stressing the necessity to make every effort to sustain the operation of the present national food basket distribution network,

Stressing also the need for consideration of a further reassessment of the Programme during and after the emergency phase,

Reaffirming the respect for the right of the people of Iraq to determine their own political future and to control their own natural resources,

Reaffirming the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Requests all parties concerned to abide strictly by their obligations under international law, in particular the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and the Regulations concerning the Laws and Customs of War on Land, adopted at The Hague on 18 October 1907, including those relating to the essential civilian needs of the people of Iraq, both inside and outside Iraq;

2. Calls upon the international community also to provide immediate humanitarian assistance to the people of Iraq, both inside and outside Iraq in consultation with relevant States, and in particular to respond immediately to any future humanitarian appeal of the United Nations, and supports the activities of the International Committee of the Red Cross and other international humanitarian organizations;

3. Recognizes that additionally, in view of the exceptional circumstances prevailing currently in Iraq, on an interim and exceptional basis, technical and temporary adjustments should be made to the Programme so as to ensure the implementation of the approved funded and non-funded contracts concluded by the Government of Iraq for the humanitarian relief of the people of Iraq, including to meet the needs of refugees and internally displaced persons, in accordance with the present resolution;

4. Authorizes the Secretary-General and representatives designated by him to undertake as an urgent first step, and with the necessary coordination, the following measures:

(a) To establish alternative locations, both inside and outside Iraq, in consultation with the respective Governments, for the delivery, inspection and authenticated confirmation of humanitarian supplies and equipment provided under the Programme, as well as to redirect shipments of goods to those locations, as necessary;

(b) To review, as a matter of urgency, the approved funded and non-funded contracts concluded by the Government of Iraq to determine the relative priorities of the need for adequate medicine, health supplies, foodstuffs and other materials and supplies for essential civilian needs represented in these contracts, which can be shipped within the period of the present mandate, to proceed with these contracts in accordance with such priorities;

(c) To contact suppliers of these contracts to determine the precise location of contracted goods and, when necessary, to require suppliers to delay, accelerate or divert shipments;

(d) To negotiate and agree upon necessary adjustments in the terms or conditions of these contracts and their respective letters of credit and to implement the measures referred to in paragraphs 4 (a), (b) and (c), notwithstanding distribution plans approved under the Programme;

(e) To negotiate and execute new contracts for essential medical items under the Programme and to authorize issuance of the relevant letters of credit, notwithstanding approved distribution plans, provided that such items cannot be delivered in execution of contracts pursuant to paragraph 4 (b) and subject to the approval of the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990);

(f) To transfer unencumbered funds between the accounts created pursuant to paragraphs 8 (a) and (b) of resolution 986(1995) on an exceptional and reimbursable basis as necessary to ensure the delivery of essential humanitarian supplies to the people of Iraq and to use the funds in the escrow accounts referred to in paragraphs 8 (a) and (b) of resolution 986(1995) to implement the Programme as provided for in the present resolution, irrespective of the phase in which such funds entered the escrow accounts or the phase to which those funds may have been allocated;

(g) To use, subject to procedures to be decided by the Committee prior to the end of the period set out in paragraph 10 below and based on recommendations provided by the Office of the Iraq Programme, funds deposited in the accounts created pursuant to paragraphs 8 (a) and (b) of resolution 986(1995), as necessary and appropriate, to compensate suppliers and shippers for agreed additional shipping, transportation and storage costs incurred as a result of diverting and delaying shipments as directed by him according to the provisions of paragraphs 4 (a), (b) and (c) in order to perform his functions set out in paragraph 4(d);

(h) To meet additional operational and administrative costs resulting from the implementation of the temporarily modified Programme by the funds in the escrow account established pursuant to paragraph 8 (d) of resolution 986(1995) in the same manner as costs arising from those activities set forth in paragraph 8(d) of resolution 986(1995) in order to perform his functions set out in paragraph 4 (d);

(i) To use funds deposited in the escrow accounts established pursuant to paragraphs 8 (a) and (b) of resolution 986(1995) for the purchase of locally produced goods and to meet the local cost for essential civilian needs which have been funded in accordance with the provisions of resolution 986(1995) and related resolutions, including, where appropriate, the costs of milling, transportation and other costs necessary to facilitate the delivery of essential humanitarian supplies to the people of Iraq;

5. Expresses its readiness as a second step to authorize the Secretary-General to perform additional functions with the necessary coordination, as soon as the situation permits, as activities of the Programme in Iraq require;

6. Expresses its readiness also to consider making additional funds available, including from the account created pursuant to paragraph 8 (c) of resolution 986(1995), on an exceptional and reimbursable basis, to meet further the humanitarian needs of the people of Iraq;

7. Decides that, notwithstanding the provisions of resolution 661(1990) and resolution 687(1991) of 3 April 1991 and for the duration of the present resolution, all applications outside the Programme submitted by the United Nations agencies, programmes and funds, other international organizations and non-governmental organizations for distribution or use in Iraq of emergency humanitarian supplies and equipment, other than medicines, health supplies and foodstuffs, shall be reviewed by the Committee, under a 24-hour no-objection procedure;

8. Urges all parties concerned, consistent with the Geneva Conventions and the Hague Regulations, to allow full, unimpeded access by international humanitarian organizations to all people of Iraq in need of assistance, to make available all necessary facilities for their operations and to promote the safety, security and freedom of movement of United Nations and associated personnel and their assets, as well as personnel of humanitarian organizations in Iraq in meeting such needs;

9. Directs the Committee to monitor closely the implementation of the provisions of paragraph 4 above and, in that regard, requests the Secretary-General to update the Committee on the measures as they are being taken and to consult with the Committee on prioritization of contracts for shipments of goods, other than foodstuffs, medicines, health and water sanitation related supplies;

10. Decides that the provisions contained in paragraph 4 above shall remain in force for a period of 45 days following the date of adoption of the present resolution and may be subject to further renewal by the Council;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to take all measures required for the implementation of the present resolution and to report to the Council prior to the termination of the period defined in paragraph 10 above;

12. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the United States said it had full confidence that the Secretary-General and the UN Office of the Iraq Programme would effectively carry out the task of resuming the oil-for-food programme. The United States would facilitate the necessary coordination on the ground in Iraq between coalition authorities and the United Nations and associated relief agency staff, as oil-for-food supplies and other humanitarian assistance arrived and were distributed as circumstances on the ground permitted. It also added that it was gratified that the Council had been able to come together to take that step to meet the immediate humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people.

Communication (31 March). On 31 March [S/2003/396], the Russian Federation said that the adoption of resolution 1472(2003) did not alter the essence of the humanitarian programme, which had been operating for seven years on the basis of Council resolutions and the 1996 Memorandum of Understanding. It merely involved some procedural specifications pertaining to the operation of the programme for the purpose of promptly solving humanitarian problems caused by the war in Iraq. The adoption of the resolution did not mean a legitimization of the military action by the members of the coalition. Under international humanitarian law, the members of the coalition bore responsibility for solving humanitarian problems in the occupied territories.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (April)

On 24 April (meeting 4743), the Council unanimously adopted resolution 1476(2003). The draft [S/2003/465] was prepared in consultations among Council members.

The Security Council,

Recalling its relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 661(1990) of 6 August 1990, 986(1995) of 14 April 1995, 1409(2002) of 14 May 2002, 1454(2002) of 30 December 2002 and 1472(2003) of 28 March 2003, as they provide for humanitarian relief to the people of Iraq,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides that the provisions contained in paragraph 4 of resolution 1472(2003) shall remain in force until 3 June 2003 and may be subject to further renewal by the Council;

2. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Communication. On 24 April [S/2003/499], South Africa, on behalf of South African companies that held contracts under the oil-for-food programme, requested the Council President to provide more information regarding the temporary adjustments that were made to the programme pursuant to resolution 1472(2003) (see p. 363). The request related mainly to goods that were not identified as priority goods, but were already deemed eligible for payment.

Report of Secretary-General (May). In response to resolution 1447(2002), the Secretary-General submitted a 28 May progress report on phase XIII of the oil-for-food programme [S/2003/576]. The report provided information on all implementation aspects up to 23 May 2003.

The Secretary-General observed that since its inception in 1996, the programme had been implemented within the context of a rigorous sanctions regime. It had made a major difference in the daily lives of the Iraqi people, serving as a lifeline to a large segment of the population. As at 20 May, oil proceeds since the start of the programme's implementation totalled approximately $65 billion, of which more than $46 billion had been allocated to the humanitarian programme. A total of $38 billion had been apportioned to the 15 governorates of the centre and south and $8.11 billion to the three northern governorates. More than $28 billion worth of goods had been delivered to Iraq as a whole, including $13 billion for foodstuffs, $2.2 billion for food handling, $2.21 billion for medicines, $1.17 billion for water and sanitation, $2.01 billion for electricity, $2.29 billion for agriculture and irrigation, $1.66 billion for housing, $1.19 billion for transportation and telecommunications, $586 million for education and $1.6 billion for oil-industry spare parts and equipment. In addition, goods to the value of $9.4 billion were in the pipeline for the centre/south and $1.55 million for the three northern governorates. The implementation of programme activities during phase XIII was suspended temporarily due to the military conflict, which necessitated the withdrawal of UN international personnel from Iraq on 17 March. However, some activities continued to be undertaken by the UN national staff, especially with regard to the distribution of food and medical supplies. Despite precarious security conditions, an increasing number of UN international staff began returning to Iraq as of 4 April and resumed implementation of programme activities.

On 22 May, the Security Council, in resolution 1483(2003) (see p. 338), decided that, with the exception of prohibitions related to the sale or supply of arms and related materiel, all prohibitions related to trade with Iraq and the provision of financial or economic resources to Iraq would no longer apply. By the same resolution, the Council also decided to phase out the oil-for-food programme over a period of six months. The Secretary-General would continue to fulfil the responsibilities entrusted to him under resolutions 1472(2003) (see p. 363) and 1476(2003) (see p. 365), in coordination with the Authority, and would terminate within that time period the programme's operations and transfer responsibility for the administration of the remaining activities to the Authority.

Report of Secretary-General (June). Pursuant to paragraph 16 (c) of resolution 1483(2003), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council on 11 June a report [S/2003/640] on the estimated operating budget needed to ensure the continued functioning of activities associated with the implementation of that resolution, including the termination of the oil-for-food programme; the projected costs associated with restoring Iraqi government funds that were provided by Member States to the Secretary-General as requested in resolution 778(1992) [YUN 1992, p. 320]; and the projected costs associated with the Secretary-General's Special Representative and the qualified representative to serve on the International Advisory and Monitoring Board (IAMB).

The Secretary-General said that, since the adoption of the resolution, the monitoring and observation tasks deriving from resolution 986(1995) [YUN 1995, p. 475] and the management of letters of credit in respect of oil sales had been discontinued. All substantive operations would be phased out within the six months following the adoption of resolution 1483(2003), including the handover of operational responsibilities and relevant documentation to the Authority/Iraqi interim administration. All UN agencies that supported the implementation of resolution 986(1995) would cease their activities by the end of November 2003. During that period, there would be a need to continue to provide administrative, financial, personnel, information technology, transport, technical, procurement, logistical and warehousing support. After 21 November, a limited number of administrative personnel would remain in Iraq to complete the necessary administrative tasks and close down at the field level; that phase was scheduled to be completed by the end of December 2003. With regard to the administrative tasks at respective agencies' headquarters, it was anticipated that they would be completed by the end of March 2004. A limited number of staff would be required in New York until the end of June 2004.

With regard to letters of credit issued for the purchase of humanitarian supplies for the south/centre of Iraq, since they were irrevocable and non-transferable they would continue to be handled by the United Nations beyond 21 November and would therefore not be transferred to the Authority. As at 11 June, some 3,000 such letters of credit were outstanding, with a value of some $8 billion. The United Nations would retain responsibility for their administration until they were executed or they expired. Collateral for the full value of the letters of credit would be kept by the United Nations. Any balance left after the execution or expiration of such letters of credit would be transferred to the Development Fund for Iraq. For the period after 21 November, the Secretary-General would be making arrangements with the Authority to have the Authority designated as the entity authorized to give authenticated confirmation of the delivery of goods. Assuming that all deliveries were completed by 21 November under outstanding letters of credit, it was anticipated that all letters of credit would have been submitted, authenticated and processed by the end of June 2004; that would allow all financial transactions to be registered in 2004, a final financial statement for the whole operation to be prepared by December 2004 and a final external audit report to be prepared by April 2005.

Given its complexity, it was difficult to evaluate fully, within the time given, the precise costs of effectively terminating the programme and handing over residual activities in an orderly manner. The best estimate for all known and projected costs to ensure the continued functioning of activities associated with the implementation of resolution 1483(2003), both at Headquarters and in the field, including the termination of the oil-for-food programme, were estimated at $106.6 million. Of that amount, $81 million related to the period ending 21 November; the remaining $25.6 million related to liquidation tasks. In addition, there was a need to have a contingency reserve to meet any potential costs that might arise but could not be identified in preparing the estimates. Such a contingency would be established at 15 per cent of the total estimated costs. The known and projected costs associated with restoring the Iraqi government funds that were provided by Member States to the Secretary-General as requested in resolution 778(1992) [YUN 1992, p. 320] were minimal. The restoration of funds to Member States as per paragraph 17 of resolution 1483(2003) was under way. An amount of $404.9 million would be restored, $65.8 million of which would be refunded from balances remaining in the account and the remainder of $339.1 million would be funded from unencumbered funds in the accounts established pursuant to resolution 986(1995).

The costs associated with the Secretary-General's Special Representative and his qualified representative to serve on IAMB should constitute expenses of the Organization rather than be funded from the account established pursuant to resolution 986(1995). No provision had therefore been made in that connection. The balance at the end of May 2003 in that account was estimated at $400 million. After deduction of the estimated operating budget ($106.6 million) and the contingency reserve ($16 million), the surplus available for transfer to the Development Fund for Iraq amounted to $277.4 million. Upon the final closing of the accounts and subsequent to their final audit, any balance remaining from the operational budget and/or the contingency fund would be transferred to the Development Fund for Iraq.

Security Council consideration (28 October). On 28 October [meeting 4851], the Council was briefed by the Executive Director of the Office of the Iraq Programme (OIP), Benon Sevan.

Mr. Sevan said that the United Nations would terminate the oil-for-food programme on 21 November and would continue to facilitate a smooth handover to the Authority, in close cooperation with the relevant Iraqi authorities. In view of the common position taken by the United Nations and the Authority, he saw no alternative to the transfer of assets, ongoing operations and responsibility for the administration of and remaining activity under the programme to the Authority "as is", together with the relevant documentation. Handing over a multi-billion-dollar programme of such complexity and magnitude in a six-month period, as mandated by resolution 1483(2003), would have been difficult even under the best of circumstances. Doing so under conditions of insecurity and reduced on-site staffing capacity required a degree of realism, understanding and pragmatism. Most of the phase-down activities had been undertaken in the three Iraqi northern governorates, where the United Nations was responsible for the implementation of the programme on behalf of the former Government of Iraq. In the north, the handover involved the transfer of projects, assets, inventories and relevant documentation, contracts signed by the United Nations and its agencies with international and national contractors, in addition to an agreement with the Authority on liabilities and calculations concerning ongoing costs of projects after their handover to the Authority. Some $8.1 billion had been allocated to the three northern governorates since the start of the programme's implementation in December 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 225].

With regard to the 15 governorates in the centre and south of Iraq, prior to the war the UN role was limited primarily to monitoring and observing the distribution and utilization of humanitarian supplies provided under the programme. Handover arrangements for the centre and south involved a tripartite review by the United Nations, the Authority and relevant Iraqi authorities of all remaining contracts for humanitarian supplies and equipment submitted under the programme. The review had covered approved and fully-funded contracts, and also those approved but not funded. Adjustments had been made for alternative delivery and authentication sites to enable the delivery of supplies and equipment to Iraq. It was envisaged from the outset that those activities would take place inside Iraq. However, that scenario was undermined by chronic insecurity and, in particular, the 19 August terrorist attack on the UN headquarters in Baghdad. Given the reduction in UN personnel and the late deployment of a handover team by the Authority, the intended joint physical review of all programme assets by the United Nations, the Authority and the local authorities had not been possible. Accordingly, completed and ongoing projects and activities would be transferred to the Authority through dossiers prepared for each project and activity.

As at 27 October, 3,154 approved and funded contracts worth some $6.36 billion had been classified to have relative utility. The number of approved and funded contracts that had not been included in the final review was estimated to be 1,621, with a total value of $1.5 billion. Also, 273 approved but unfunded contracts worth some $700 million had been funded following determination of their relative utility and urgent need. There remained 3,319 approved but unfunded contracts, with a total value of $6.5 billion. Based on the essential needs of the Iraqi people, as identified by the United Nations, the Authority and relevant Iraqi authorities, and following the OIP Executive Director's recommendation, the Sanctions Committee approved, on an exceptional basis, 13 projects for the procurement of items, with a total value of $459 million, not covered by approved and funded or unfunded contracts. As at October, UN agencies and programmes had arranged the delivery of goods worth $1 billion. Some of the goods were still at locations outside Iraq and if they could not be delivered to Iraq by 21 November, arrangements would be made for their transfer to the Authority outside Iraq. A total of $398 million worth of goods was established to be in transit to Iraq when the UN independent inspection agents were withdrawn in mid-March 2003 due to security conditions. A total value of $315 million for such goods had been prioritized and arrangements had been made for the suppliers of the remaining goods to be compensated. The independent inspection agent, Cotecna, was stationed at inspection sites outside Iraq and was authenticating the arrival of goods consistent with arrangements agreed upon between the United Nations, the Authority and the relevant Iraqi authorities. However, due to the fact that Cotecna personnel were not permitted to operate at the port of Umm Qasr, the issuance of authenticated confirmation for goods destined for that port would need to be halted, unless the Authority provided appropriate indemnifications. The Authority had not provided OIP with information regarding contact points within the port or an update concerning any arrangements made to confirm the arrival of goods. Since 10 October, Cotecna had inspected 25 consignments under the revised authentication procedures, with no confirmation of receipt. If that matter was not urgently addressed, the confidence of suppliers in the authentication process could erode, which, in turn, could adversely affect the delivery pipeline. Furthermore, in July, the Authority was provided with details of 21 contracts in connection with which suppliers claimed to have provided services prior to the war, which could not be authenticated due to the withdrawal of Cotecna. Despite repeated reminders, the Authority had only been able to produce a negative response in connection with two of the contracts concerned.

The entire oil-for-food database would be transferred to the Authority on 21 November. The Authority needed to ensure that appropriate arrangements were in place, effective 22 November, for the management of the billions of dollars' worth of supplies and equipment to Iraq from the programme's delivery pipeline and for authenticating the arrival of those goods in order to facilitate payment to suppliers—perhaps through retention of Cotecna's services by the Authority for a limited period after the termination of the programme. Each UN agency and programme had devised individual exit strategies, based on the levels of project implementation and the possible future humanitarian involvement of the organizations concerned under their respective regular programme activities. An agreement had been reached with the Authority for the funding of ongoing projects to be completed after 21 November. Special arrangements would need to be made for goods held or warehoused outside Iraq, largely in neighbouring States. Since the start of the programme in 1996, approximately $65 billion worth of oil was exported; more than $46 billion of that amount was allocated to the programme after deductions for other accounts pursuant to relevant resolutions. Under the programme, more than $30 billion worth of goods had been delivered to Iraq as a whole, including foodstuffs worth $12 billion; food handling worth $2.2 billion; agriculture worth $2.4 billion; medicines worth $2.3 billion; water and sanitation worth $1.3 billion; electricity sector goods worth $2.2 billion; housing worth $1.7 billion; and, for the oil sector, goods worth $1.9 billion.

The United Kingdom said that the Authority and Iraqi ministry officials were engaged in developing an effective transition strategy to ensure the efficient delivery of goods as well as adequate warehousing and inventory management. The Authority would continue to honour its existing commitments to support the fulfilment of all prioritized contracts and was focused on designing a sustainable and predictable goods-authentication system that would pose no problems to suppliers.
