This record is subject to correction. Corrections should be sent under the signature of a member of the delegation concerned within one week of the date of publication to the Chief of the Official Records Editing Section, room DC2-750, 2 United Nations Plaza, and incorporated in a copy of the record.

Corrections will be issued after the end of the session, in a separate corrigendum for each Committee.

The meeting was called to order at 3.10 p.m.

(A/60/40, 44, 129, 336, 392 and 408)

(b) Human rights questions, including alternative approaches for improving the effective enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms (continued) (A/60/134, 266, 272, 286, 299, 301 and Add.1, 305, 321, 326, 333, 338 and Corr.1, 339 and Corr.1, 340, 348, 350, 353, 357, 374, 384, 392, 399 and 431; A/C.3/60/3 and 5)

(c) Human rights situations and reports of special rapporteurs and representatives (continued)
(A/60/221, 271, 306, 324, 349, 354, 356, 359, 367, 370, 395 and 422)

(A/60/36 and 343)

1. Ms. Jahangir (Special Rapporteur on freedom of religion or belief) reviewed the activities she had undertaken since her appointment in July 2004. In the course of visits to Nigeria, Sri Lanka and France, she had noted that the basic principles relating to the right to freedom of religion or belief had been generally respected by the Governments concerned. However, two key areas of controversy were the limits placed on the right to propagate one's religion for the purposes of conversion and the freedom to wear religious symbols in State schools. Religion or freedom of religion had sometimes been used as grounds for violating other human rights or generating a climate of religious intolerance. Interreligious dialogue needed to be encouraged at all levels to help create harmony between religious communities so that they could live side by side in mutual respect, and such initiatives should not be limited to religious leaders alone.

2. In her interim report (A/60/399), the Special Rapporteur had developed two issues of concern to her mandate: first, the right to adopt a religion of one's choice, to change or to maintain a religion or not to have a religion at all, and second, the freedom of religion or belief of persons deprived of their liberty. On the first issue, she had received numerous reports, including cases of alleged forcible conversions. Violations and limitations were unacceptable and, when they were committed by non-State actors, States had an obligation to ensure the enjoyment of the right to freedom of religion or belief. On the second issue, she had received several allegations of situations where the right of freedom of religion or belief of detained persons had been violated, or where the religion of detained persons had been used for purposes of ill-treatment. All Governments should give more emphasis to freedom of religion in the training of personnel at detention facilities.

3. Her programme of country visits for the coming year had not yet been organized, and she drew the attention of all Governments to the critical importance of country visits and the cooperation expected from Governments. Her report had included a list of the countries that had been visited thus far and a list of the countries to which a request for an invitation had been transmitted. She was concerned that the number of countries that did not want to extend an invitation to visit was increasing, and that such refusals often came from countries for which she had received substantial allegations of violations of the right to freedom of religion or belief. She therefore supported the creation of a mechanism to deal with the human rights situation in those States where serious concerns existed but which were not cooperating with in situ visits.

4. Intolerance, if met in similar terms, would only breed further intolerance and extremism. It was therefore essential that Governments should continue to uphold fully the norms of human rights relating to freedom of religion or belief in their efforts to curb violence, even when the latter was perpetrated in the name of religion.

5. Ms. Hall (United Kingdom), speaking on behalf of the European Union, noted that the Special Rapporteur had stated that the events of 11 September 2001 had unfairly and illegally made targets of Muslims, and that religious leaders needed to denounce violence in stronger terms if Islam was to be de-linked from terrorism. She wondered how the Special Rapporteur would encourage more religious leaders to speak out against violence. In regard to continuing violations of the human rights of certain religious communities such as the Baha'i, she asked what the Special Rapporteur intended to do to raise international awareness of the issue. On the issue of the mainstreaming of gender in the Special Rapporteur's work, she asked what the experiences of those efforts had been to date.

6. Mr. Omotosho (Nigeria), noting that his country had been one of those visited by the Special Rapporteur, said that coverage of Nigeria in her report had been fair, accurate and balanced. Still, it was important for a country's religious complexity to be taken into account and Special Rapporteurs should not see themselves as prosecutors. In that context, he wondered how countries might be encouraged to extend invitations more readily.

7. Mr. Hussain (Pakistan) sought comments on the situation of those who followed the divine commandments of a divine faith. To what extent could followers of a religion be expected to adhere to standards created by fallible human beings?

8. Ms. Hart (Canada), said it was critical that the Special Rapporteur should be invited to make in situ visits and asked for further information about the possible new mechanism to deal with the human rights situation in those States where serious concerns existed but which did not cooperate with in situ visits.

9. Ms. Levin (United States of America) asked whether a tiered system of religion discriminated against or belittled those on lower tiers.

10. Mr. El Badri (Egypt) noted that the report of the Special Rapporteur had touched on the rise of Islamophobia in many parts of the world. He wondered how that issue should be approached, particularly with respect to Muslims living in non-Muslim countries, and what responsibility States bore in dealing with the defamation of certain religions.

11. Ms. Jahangir (Special Rapporteur on freedom of religion or belief), referring to the questions from the representative of the United Kingdom, said that, as she had indicated in her report, religious leaders needed to denounce violence in stronger terms. Some sort of political action by religious leaders might be needed, but that lay outside her area of competence. So far as the violations of human rights of certain religious minorities were concerned, it was evident that tacit support for some forms of violence existed and that certain religious minorities such as the Baha'i were being persecuted. It was essential for Governments to denounce violence in all circumstances, regardless of the religious affiliations of those involved, and political leaders had to unite in denouncing violence with a single voice. As for gender mainstreaming, the whole question of the interplay between the rights of women and the right to freedom of religion or belief had been examined. She had looked at the question of religious symbols, particularly the case of headscarves in France, and had looked at the question of interfaith marriage during her visit to Nigeria. Those questions were tied to the right of women to make their own decisions autonomously, and she planned to explore the issue in greater depth.

12. In reference to the question from the representative of Nigeria on encouraging countries to extend invitations to her to make in situ visits, she pointed out that the purpose of such visits was to follow up on reported violations, which were often denied by Governments. In situ visits were the only way to look into them. As to how Governments might be encouraged to cooperate by extending invitations, perhaps some degree of peer pressure might be applied, or more space might be devoted to the issue in her reports.

13. In reference to the question from the representative of Pakistan, she said that, in pursuing her mandate, she had to focus on human-rights instruments and deal with human-rights standards. While laws might be in conflict with beliefs, human rights were universal and a consensus was needed in applying them to all religions and religious groups.

14. In reference to the question from the representative of Canada, she would welcome ideas from delegates on the workings of a new mechanism to deal more systematically with countries that did not cooperate with special procedures in terms of in situ visits.

15. In reference to the question from the representative of the United States of America she said that the basic principle was that the registration of religious communities should be simple and straightforward, and not involve extensive formal requirements. The only purpose of registration should be to establish an incorporated legal entity for the purpose of enjoying financial or tax benefits. It should not be construed as a licence to practise a religion, and no one religious group should be able to exert influence over the registration of other religious groups.

16. In reference to the question from the representative of Egypt, she said that every religious minority had its own special problems in each country. A tendency to discount the beliefs of others, especially of Muslims, had recently gained strength; and in some countries, as alarmists had begun to speak out more stridently, Muslims had been stigmatized. It was important to look to what Governments could do, and to what Muslims could do. A balance had to be found between freedom of expression and freedom of religion or belief, and problems should be examined case by case.

17. Mr. Despouy (Special Rapporteur on the independence of judges and lawyers) introduced his report on the independence of judges and lawyers (A/60/321), which identified the issues that had been of greatest concern to him since the sixty-first session of the Commission on Human Rights and described his main activities in 2005. The report also addressed the right to a fair trial in the context of the fight against terrorism, the activities of the International Criminal Court and the establishment of the Iraqi Special Tribunal, and raised other issues that he intended to address in his next report, such as, the right to the truth, access to justice and the challenges that transitional situations posed for the judiciary, particularly in societies emerging from conflict.

18. The first substantive issue addressed in the report (paras. 11-29) concerned his two missions to Ecuador, in April and July 2005, following the unconstitutional dismissal of the Constitutional Court, Supreme Electoral Court and Supreme Court and the subsequent ousting of the President of the Republic, Lucio Gutiérrez. He planned to submit a final report to the Commission on Human Rights at its next session, as the process of selecting judges that had begun in July 2005 was still ongoing and, even with international support, had come up against many difficulties internally. Almost a year later, the Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court had still not been appointed and Ecuador's international image was being damaged as a result. The reappointment of both Courts was essential to ensuring respect for the rule of law, rebuilding the country's institutions and ensuring democratic stability. He therefore called on the leaders of Ecuador's main sectors swiftly to fill the institutional vacuum and urged the international community to continue offering its support. The absence of an independent Constitutional Court and Supreme Court was extremely worrying. He hoped that Ecuador would have a Supreme Court by the time he submitted his final report to the Commission on Human Rights.

19. Turning to counter-terrorism and the right to a fair trial (paras. 30-34), he mentioned in particular his concern at the dangerous tendency to roll back existing levels of international protection and at the adoption by many States of national measures that contravened international human rights standards, such as the resumption of proceedings before military commissions, which did not comply with standards concerning the right to a fair trial. He, the Chairperson-Rapporteur of the Working Group on Arbitrary Detention, the Special Rapporteur on the right to health, and the Special Rapporteur on the question of torture had repeatedly requested permission from the United States Government to visit Guantánamo Bay but as yet none of their requests had been granted. The United States had, however, responded to a questionnaire sent by the Special Rapporteurs and the two sides were now engaged in intense dialogue concerning when they might be able to have access to Guantánamo Bay, Iraq, Afghanistan and other detention centres where persons accused of terrorism were being held.

20. On the subject of the International Criminal Court (paras. 35-41), he mentioned in particular the welcome recent accessions to the Rome Statute and the Agreement on the Privileges and Immunities of the International Criminal Court; his concern about the continued opposition of some Governments to the Court, particularly when it took the form of bilateral immunity agreements with States parties; and the Security Council's decision to refer to the Court the grave human rights violations occurring in the Darfur region of the Sudan, a valuable precedent that he hoped would be applied to other such situations.

21. As for the Iraqi Special Tribunal (paras. 42-43), he expressed his concern at the manner in which trials were being conducted and identified a number of shortcomings, some of which could be traced back to the manner and circumstances of the Tribunal's establishment. He was particularly concerned that the Tribunal's jurisdiction was restricted to specific people and a specific time frame; in other words, it could only try Iraqis for acts committed before 1 May 2003. In his view, the Tribunal's power to impose capital punishment demonstrated the extent to which it contravened international human rights standards. Recent events that had led to the suspension of proceedings and the widespread lack of security confirmed his concerns that physical conditions made a proper trial impossible. In his report (para. 43), he therefore urged the Iraqi authorities to ask the United Nations to set up an independent tribunal which complied with international human rights standards. The recent assassination of one of Saddam Hussein's defence lawyers demonstrated the extent to which his concerns were well-founded.

22. In September 2005, after submitting his report, he had visited Tajikistan, where he had taken note of the reforms carried out since the country's independence and, in particular, the end of its civil war, namely the introduction of a moratorium on the death penalty, the adoption of a new civil code and penal code, and the ratification of the main international human rights treaties. However, the country still needed to make substantive reforms in key areas if the members of its judiciary were to be independent. He had also noted that, owing to the legacy of the Soviet system, in legal proceedings the public prosecutor was superior to defence lawyers. Such a situation undermined the role of judges, who at times were unable to act independently for fear of the possible repercussions of their acts. He would be submitting a detailed report on his mission to the Commission on Human Rights.

23. During his mission to Kyrgyzstan, meanwhile, he had welcomed the efforts undertaken in the context of Constitutional reform, while stressing the need to continue overhauling the country's institutions, particularly the judiciary, in order to ensure stable and ongoing development in the country. He had also expressed his concern at the population's lack of trust in the judicial system owing to the inability of procedures to protect their rights, particularly regarding habeas corpus and due process. He noted a number of characteristics common to both Tajikistan and Kyrgyzstan: both country visits had taken place at the invitation of the respective Government; in both countries there was a political will to carry out reforms; and in both countries some but not all authorities were open to international cooperation, which was essential.

24. During his visit to Kyrgyzstan, he had also had the opportunity to speak with four Uzbek citizens who had been detained in the south of the country after fleeing the tragic events that had occurred in Andijan in May 2005. He welcomed the Kyrgyz Government's decision to transfer most of the Uzbek refugees to third countries, but was very concerned about the four Uzbek citizens still being detained and called on the authorities to facilitate their transfer to third countries. Such action was particularly important given that some Uzbek citizens had been forcibly returned, without judicial intervention, in June 2005. He had recently received a note from the Uzbek authorities but had not yet been able to analyse it properly. In any case, it was his understanding that the principle of the non-refoulement of asylum-seekers was an unquestionable principle of international law.

25. Noting that his was a very broad and complex mandate, he said that, in almost all regions, the situation of judges and lawyers was a matter of concern. Follow-up by the Committee was therefore essential to ensuring respect for human rights and helping countries rebuild their institutions.

26. Mr. Moncayo (Ecuador) thanked the Special Rapporteur for his invaluable work in Ecuador, which demonstrated what the United Nations was capable of achieving when facing serious crises and should therefore be taken into account in the current discussion about United Nations reform. The Special Rapporteur had not only denounced the irregularities of the Government, but had also proclaimed that the rule of law had been broken and established a procedure for restoring it. His Government, National Congress and, most importantly, civil society were all involved in the intense debate currently under way concerning the form and content of essential reforms, some of which had been identified some time ago but never implemented. His Government was also promoting a National Agreement which would enable the political system to address problems and make the necessary changes, in order to ensure constitutional stability, the rule of law and full democracy. The process that the Special Rapporteur had started was now entering its final phase and could, he hoped, be concluded by November 2005. In that regard, he hoped that Ecuador would be able to continue to count on the support of the Special Rapporteur, whom he invited to visit the country again, and of the international community in general.

27. Ms. Hall (United Kingdom), speaking on behalf of the European Union, said that her delegation would be interested to know: whether the Special Rapporteur had had the opportunity to follow up directly with the Ecuadorian authorities since his visit on the issues relating to the Supreme Court; how he planned to take into account the draft principles governing the administration of justice through military tribunals contained in the report submitted by Mr. Emmanuel Decaux on the administration of justice through military tribunals (E/CN.4/Sub.2/2005/9) in fulfilling his mandate; and what measures he would recommend to overcome the general population's lack of trust in the judicial system witnessed in Kyrgyzstan and Tajikistan and in important periods of transitional justice in general.

28. Ms. Levin (United States of America), responding to the Special Rapporteur's criticism of the establishment of military tribunals at Guantánamo Bay, said that the military commission process provided for a full and fair trial, while protecting national security information, and included fundamental principles of justice, such as the presumption of innocence, proof of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, appointment of military counsel at no cost, the right to hire civilian defence counsel and the ability to present evidence and call witnesses. Her Government would continue to evaluate how it conducted commissions and, when appropriate, make changes to improve the process. In that regard, in August 2005, it had approved several changes to the rules governing military commissions. Such changes followed a careful review of commission procedures and took account of a number of factors, including issues that had arisen in connection with military commission proceedings that had begun in late 2004, a review of relevant domestic and international legal standards and suggestions from outside organizations on possible improvements to the process. Lastly, her Government was giving serious consideration to the Special Rapporteur's request to visit the detention centre at Guantánamo and looked forward to discussing the issue with him bilaterally in the coming days.

29. Ms. Carvalho (Portugal), Vice-Chairman, took the Chair.

30. Mr. Perez (Switzerland) said that his delegation would be interested to know how the Special Rapporteur intended to work with the High Commissioner for Human Rights during the preparation of its study on the right to the truth.

31. Mr. Despouy (Special Rapporteur on the independence of judges and lawyers), responding to the representative of Ecuador, said that another visit would be very useful when drafting his final report to the Commission on Human Rights. While he appreciated that a considerable effort was being made, the international community must continue to accompany the process, which he hoped would soon be completed.

32. In response to the representative of the United Kingdom, he said that he had followed up directly with the Ecuadorian authorities twice: during his first visit in April 2005, he had spoken in person with various authorities, including the then President, Lucio Gutiérrez; and a month before submitting his report to the Commission on Human Rights, he had spoken to President Gutiérrez by telephone, to express his concern that the situation was worsening rather than improving. He had also informed the Commission on Human Rights that he no longer had any faith in Ecuador's institutional stability because the root causes of the conflict were not being addressed. Since the ousting of the former President, he had been in close contact with the new authorities, who had pushed forward many of his recommendations. Ecuador could serve as an example in the future, both in terms of the important role played by the international community and because it demonstrated how a judicial crisis could become an institutional crisis and ultimately lead to the ousting of a constitutional President.

33. The draft principles governing the administration of justice through military tribunals, meanwhile, were an important step forward in the protection of human rights. Historically, the most serious human rights violations had occurred as a result of military tribunals and special laws. The establishment of principles and guarantees was a significant step forward, as they would reinforce international human rights principles and jurisprudence. He very much hoped that the principles would be adopted by the Commission on Human Rights and later by the General Assembly.

34. As for the situation in Tajikistan and Kyrgyzstan, he said that he would address the issue specifically in his next report. Suffice to say for now that, owing to their heritage as former Soviet republics, there was still a tendency in Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan and Kazakhstan — which he had visited on a previous occasion — for the public prosecutor to intervene in the civil and, in particular, criminal process. Such a situation disrupted the equilibrium needed to guarantee the independence of the judiciary, as the defence was not properly represented and judges did not enjoy the role of referee that they generally enjoyed in developed systems. Both Kyrgyzstan and Tajikistan were aware of the need to address such issues in the context of future reforms and were moving away from a model in which the judiciary was not fully independent towards a structure that complied with international standards.

35. Noting that as Special Rapporteur he had been asked to conduct a study on transitional situations, he said that for decades his own region of Latin America had suffered coups and military dictatorships, even though many States in the region had Constitutions clearly setting out the distribution of power and the independence of the judiciary. With the restoration of democracy, existing institutions had had to be brought back into line with the constitutional system. Kyrgyzstan and Tajikistan were undergoing a similar transition towards the rule of law and an independent judiciary. However, in some countries emerging from critical situations — such as Afghanistan — the State — if there had ever been one — had been all but destroyed. In all transitional situations, rebuilding the judiciary was an essential part of rebuilding institutions. As Special Rapporteur, he would be drawing on the work of the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) when addressing those issues. He also noted that in a study conducted in 2004, the Secretary-General had stressed the importance of addressing issues relating to justice in countries where peacekeepers had been withdrawn. The United Nations system faced the specific challenge of how it could best help resolve transitional situations and, in particular, what cooperation mechanism it could provide for the reconstruction of the judiciary.

36. Turning to the comments made by the representative of the United States, he said that he had taken note of the reforms carried out as a result of studies on Guantánamo detainees and of the jurisprudence that was building up within the United States, which demonstrated that independent domestic mechanisms were in place to examine such situations. He hoped that the dialogue established some time previously would ultimately result in the Special Rapporteurs concerned being able to visit Guantánamo and report back to the Commission on Human Rights.

37. Responding to the representative of Switzerland, he said that the right to the truth was closely linked to transitional situations whereby countries emerging from brutal dictatorships were faced with the need to push the transition forward and to a certain extent bury the past. Historically, it had been thought that to achieve national reconciliation it was important to forget the past. Today, however, it was generally acknowledged that it was possible to face and even investigate the past without compromising the development of a country's institutions. He would, of course, draw on experiences from his own region, in particular his own country, Argentina, which had known no limits when investigating its own past. He would be addressing both the right to the truth and the challenges for the judiciary in transitional situations in conjunction with OHCHR. In that regard, he had recently participated in a seminar organized by OHCHR.

38. Noting that he would be submitting four reports to the Commission on Human Rights at its next session, he said that the experience of Ecuador shed light on the role of the Special Rapporteur on the independence of judges and lawyers, particularly with regard to the creation of a standing Human Rights Council, for there was a dimension that went beyond establishing the facts, to include helping countries rebuild.

39. Ms. Wasu (Iraq), in response to the Special Rapporteur's concern about the procedures of the Special Tribunal to deal with crimes against humanity, said that the Tribunal had been established by the Governing Council and reflected the will of the Iraqi people to have appropriate legal instruments. After consultations with international experts and non-governmental organizations, as well as with Iraqi lawyers and judges, the legislators had attempted to bring the procedures in line with international standards and to concentrate on crimes condemned by international law, such as genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity. They also sought to ensure that the Tribunal only had jurisdiction over Iraqi people, either living in Iraq or abroad from 1968 to 2003, so that it would cover crimes committed in the war against the Islamic Republic of Iran and the State of Kuwait. At the national level, the work of the Tribunal was based on laws pertaining to administration during the transitional period and national security. At the international level, it was based on the four Geneva Conventions and the Universal Declaration on Human Rights.

40. Mr. Despouy (Special Rapporteur on the independence of judges and lawyers) said that reservations had been raised concerning the fact that the Special Tribunal only dealt with cases prior to the occupation. It was not the moment to analyse the nature of the implementation. During the past decade, considerable progress had been achieved with international tribunals, especially in the case of Rwanda, Sierra Leone and Cambodia, and his comments had been intended to reflect what the international community could do with regard to crimes against humanity. It was to be hoped that any judgements given would be seen as an act of justice, not just a mere procedure.

41. Ms. Ertürk (Special Rapporteur on violence against women, its causes and consequences) said that she was convinced more than ever before that the United Nations, as the only multilateral forum where the international community could address common problems, continued to have the potential to improve women's lives worldwide. To realize such potential, the international community should join forces in supporting and improving United Nations mechanisms.

42. Her annual report to the sixty-first session of the Commission on Human Rights (E/CN.4/2005/72) had focused on intersections of violence against women and HIV/AIDS. The vulnerability of the increasing number of women with the disease was largely rooted in pervasive gender inequality and discrimination, which often manifested itself in multiple forms of violence. As victims of violence, women were susceptible to HIV/AIDS infection, which, in turn, increased the risk of further violence against them. Not only were women subjected to rape and sexual assault, but they were at risk in monogamous and long-term relationships on account of male infidelity and refusal to use condoms. Women living with HIV/AIDS were also stigmatized more severely and were often rejected by family members and ostracized by their community, which prevented them from having access to adequate treatment.

43. Programmes for the prevention and treatment of the pandemic could not succeed without challenging the unequal power structures governing relationships between women and men. In her report to the sixty-first session of the Commission on Human Rights, she had elaborated recommendations under five broad categories: ending violence against women; addressing the gender dimensions of HIV/AIDS, discrimination and stigma; ensuring women's equal access to health care; empowering women for their full enjoyment of all human rights; and promoting global action against HIV/AIDS.

44. Since December 2004, she had undertaken four country missions to the Russian Federation, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Mexico and Afghanistan. In Afghanistan, she had been particularly disturbed by the continued existence of multiple normative systems that undermined the establishment of the rule of law in that country, which was an essential element of the protection of women's rights. Both the Government of Afghanistan and the international community involved in the reconstruction process should prioritize women's rights if sustainable security and stability were to be achieved. In 2006, she would be visiting the Governments of Algeria and the Netherlands.

45. She had recently participated in a regional consultation for the Asia-Pacific region and would, in the near future, be attending regional consultations for the Africa and Central Asia regions. Regional consultations had become an integral component of her work and she encouraged civil society actors to initiate similar meetings in other regions. She had also participated in numerous meetings organized by States and civil society concerning her mandate.

46. Her next report to the Commission on Human Rights would focus on the due diligence standard, as defined under article 4 (c) of the Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women. Failure of States to exercise due diligence to prevent, investigate and punish acts of violence against women constituted a violation of women's human rights. The concept had become intimately associated with women's human rights advocacy and yet, despite frequent use of the term, there was a lack of agreement and clarity as to what the standard required. In her report, she intended to lay out the most common usage of the due diligence standard, which emphasized response to violence against women in the context of the criminal justice system, access to services and legislative reform. It would examine how the due diligence standard could best be applied at the individual, community, State and transnational levels.

47. In an era of globalization, actors outside the realm of the State had entered the stage of politics and undermined the State's capacity to comply with its due diligence obligation, while creating a vacuum in legislation for the protection of women. In her report she would examine the utility of the due diligence standard in expanding the boundaries of State responsibility to respond more effectively to violence against women perpetrated by non-State actors and examine how those actors could be held accountable. She was convinced that effective implementation of the due diligence standard required measurable indicators, time-bound targets and disaggregated data to measure compliance. Identifying indicators on violence against women and State compliance with human rights standards would be a crucial step towards assisting Governments to develop effective strategies and she would be undertaking a project in that area.

48. In conclusion, she emphasized the importance of her being able to work more closely with the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women and the Commission on the Status of Women.

49. Ms. Hall (United Kingdom), speaking on behalf of the European Union, referred to the Special Rapporteur's report on intersections of violence against women and HIV/AIDS (E/CN.4/2005/72), in which she had mentioned a global coalition against HIV/AIDS. It would be interesting to learn what steps had been taken, whether the Special Rapporteur had worked with the Joint United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS (UNAIDS) and the World Health Organization (WHO) and how she planned to proceed in 2006. She also wanted to know what progress she had made in consultations with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) concerning cases in which women were at risk of being deported to countries where they might be subjected to violence. Finally, she asked the Special Rapporteur what lessons she had learned during her country visits in which she had focused on cultural practices in families and communities that resulted in violence to women.

50. Ms. Gallardo Hernandez (El Salvador) was concerned about a number of allegations made by the Special Rapporteur in her report on violence against women after her mission to El Salvador (E/CN.4/2005/72/Add.2). The report referred to situations in which girls were perceived as a legitimate sexual replacement for the mother if the mother was sterile, an allegation which was entirely condemned by the Government of El Salvador. However, she wished to question the legal and political implications of the example given of a 10-year-old girl who had been raped and impregnated by her father and forced to keep the child. The international community did not have a common position on abortion and the Constitution of El Salvador respected the "right of life" of the human embryo from the moment of conception. Any violations of that right constituted a crime under the Penal Code. The Government of El Salvador wished to make reservations with regard to a "pseudo-right" upon which Member States might not have agreed.

51. Ms. Hart (Canada) reiterated her support for the Special Rapporteur's concept of due diligence and hoped it would be integrated in the Secretary-General's in-depth study on all forms of violence against women. She further stressed the importance of developing indicators on violence against women and looked forward to hearing the Special Rapporteur's further views on the subject.

52. Ms. García-Matos (Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela) recalled that the Special Rapporteur in her report to the Commission on Human Rights on intersections of violence against women and HIV/AIDS (E/CN.4/2005/72, para. 69), had referred to a case of a teenager infected with HIV who had been sterilized without her knowledge or consent at a maternity ward after giving birth to her child. That case was an isolated one, which had occurred in 1997, when different legislation for the protection of minors had been in force, and did not reflect normal practice or Government policy; on the contrary, such acts were punishable under the law. Her Government condemned all such acts and was committed to protecting women, children and adolescents. Current legislation was in conformity with the Constitution and the Basic Act on Protection of Boys, Girls and Adolescents. Victims of abuse had the right to seek redress through the authorities, the justice system and non-governmental organizations. She therefore reiterated the reservations with regard to that paragraph which her delegation had already expressed in the Commission on Human Rights.

53. Mr. La Yifan (China) reiterated his Government's support for the work of the Special Rapporteur and asked whether she believed that the work of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women should be consolidated with the other treaty bodies in Geneva.

54. Ms. Ertürk (Special Rapporteur on violence against women, its causes and consequences) said that she was collaborating with organizations such as the Joint United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS (UNAIDS) and the Global Coalition on Women and AIDS to identify areas for further cooperation. She was also collaborating with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and attended briefings both at headquarters and in country; that collaboration had been very helpful with regard to communications received by her. For example, while she was in Turkey she had prevailed on the Turkish Government to cancel deportation orders against three Iranian women asylum-seekers whose claim had been denied but who said that they could face domestic or other violence if returned to Iran; she had then convinced UNHCR to review their files and two of them had been granted refugee status. She stressed the importance of the communications procedure which was not aimed at exposing the failings of Governments but rather at drawing the attention of Governments and the international community to areas where they could be more diligent.

55. With regard to cultural practices, she said that, generally speaking, violations of women's rights, especially violence against women, were a cross-cutting issue which affected all classes, nations and cultures. Violence against women was a symptom of a culture of oppression and was typical of all oppressive relationships. She intended to publish a report on that specific issue in the hope of drawing attention to and coming to terms with cultural factors which could be obstacles to the elimination of violence against women.

56. She said that following the most recent session of the Commission on Human Rights she had requested the Government of El Salvador to provide its comments regarding her report in writing but to date had received no response. She stressed that her report did not seek to promote abortion but she wished to underscore the need to address the problem of girls and young women who became pregnant as a result of rape or incest, especially if abortion was not an option. The international community and Member States had an obligation to address that problem and establish mechanisms to protect victims and their children, who were also stigmatized because they were illegitimate.

57. She agreed with the representative of Venezuela that the case noted in her report was an isolated one and did not reflect State policy. Even isolated cases should, however, be taken seriously with a view to addressing any problems, not only through formal Government policies but also through additional steps to ensure policies were actually implemented.

58. Although during her tenure as Director of the Division for the Advancement of Women she had opposed the transfer of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women to Geneva, she was currently more familiar with the mechanisms in Geneva and could see the merit of closer cooperation with other human rights treaty bodies. There should in fact be closer collaboration between the Commission on the Status of Women and the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women and greater interaction between Geneva and New York. Closer cooperation between herself and the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women, which concentrated on women's human rights, and the Commission on the Status of Women, which was a more policy-oriented body, would be most beneficial. Further study was needed on how to strengthen the work of those mechanisms through increased collaboration.

59. Mr. Aksen (Turkey) agreed that increased cooperation between the bodies and mechanisms responsible for women's issues would be beneficial and merited consideration but stressed that increased cooperation should strive to make existing mechanisms more effective and should avoid duplication and the creation of new mechanisms. He wondered what the current situation was and how it could be improved.

60. Mr. Osmane (Algeria) said the Special Rapporteur was welcome to visit his country and could count on the full cooperation of the authorities.

61. Mr. Hussain (Pakistan) expressed concern at the emergence of new types of cultural practices which affected women, such as the trafficking and exploitation of women, including migrant women and women who were undocumented or in irregular situations. He agreed that benchmarks should be established on reducing demand for the women who were victims of such practices but wondered how they could be enforced and whether inspections would be possible in the areas where such practices were common. He inquired if any information was available on abuses against women in those categories, including violence; that entire issue required further study including with regard to States which had ratified relevant international instruments but in which systematic violation of women's rights continued.

62. Ms. Banzom (Philippines) stressed the need for the Special Rapporteur to collaborate with other mechanisms of the Commission on Human Rights, such as the Special Rapporteur on the human rights of migrants, including with regard to domestic workers, in order to better understand the issues surrounding violence against women, especially women in the most vulnerable categories.

63. Ms. Ertürk (Special Rapporteur on violence against women, its causes and consequences) said that there were few established channels of communication between herself, the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women and the Commission on the Status of Women, although she had of course addressed the Committee and the various relevant reports were available to each body. She also had an opportunity to interact with other Special Rapporteurs and other treaty bodies at the Meetings of Chairpersons of Human Rights Treaty Bodies but such interaction was at a very general level, and she stressed the need for some direct investment in collaboration mechanisms. She had no direct access to the Commission on the Status of Women although her reports were of course available to it. She suggested that she could be invited to make a report to the Commission.

64. If the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women was transferred to Geneva, where she was based, direct contact would be facilitated and it would be easier to cooperate in identifying trends and developing strategies to improve the situation of women. During her tenure as Director of the Division for the Advancement of Women she had commissioned a report on the working methods of the Commission on the Status of Women which had recommended increased collaboration between Geneva and New York; however, little had been done to date. Further collaboration would indeed be beneficial to all concerned.

65. She thanked the representative of Algeria for his invitation and said she looked forward to visiting his country. With regard to new practices which affected the rights of women, she reiterated that any culture of oppression of women was a source of violence against women. With regard to phenomena such as trafficking, it was important to try to eliminate the demand, but it was even more important to empower women, thereby ending unequal power structures and discrimination. The elimination of gender inequality would have a powerful effect on all other factors.

66. There were insufficient data on trafficking in women and migrant women. It would be helpful to have closer collaboration with other specialized mechanisms and even to undertake joint missions to countries where trafficking was common or where there were large numbers of migrant women. Trafficking and migration were transnational problems which required States to collaborate to develop new remedies and strategies. She called on all States which had not done so to ratify all relevant conventions, including the International Convention on the Rights of Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families. During country visits she appealed to States to fully implement the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women and urged States which had not yet done so to ratify that Convention so that universal ratification could be achieved by the upcoming thirtieth anniversary of the Convention.

67. Monsignor Dimaculangan (Observer for the Holy See), referring to the statement by the representative of El Salvador, said that the Catholic Church did not require constitutional or legislative provisions prohibiting abortion. It was however pro-life and therefore could not recognize the right to abortion. Rather than offering an anti-life option in the case of victims of incest and rape, a better option was to educate men and promote a culture of respect for women among men, with a view to eliminating such abuse.

68. Mr. Hussain (Pakistan) said that, while in the long-term empowerment of women and the elimination of gender inequality should resolve the problem of violence against women, it was urgent to also expose the horrific current abuses in situations where the rights of millions to women were being violated.

69. Ms. Ertürk (Special Rapporteur on violence against women, its causes and consequences) said that in order to eliminate violence against women, every effort must be made at all levels, not only in the long term but immediately, to change mindsets. Violence against women was an inherently political issue because wherever women were considered to be subordinate or inferior there would be violence. That was at the heart of her theme of the need for due diligence on the part of the authorities and for a political commitment to act decisively and urgently to address the issue of violence against women.

The meeting rose at 5.40 p.m.
