At the 4753rd meeting of the Council on 13 May 2003, the Secretary-General, opening the debate, underscored that Chapter VI of the Charter "stood at the heart of the Organization's system of collective security" and highlighted various ways in which the Council had used Chapter VI in recent years. Among them, he mentioned that the Council had more frequently entered into dialogue with the parties to the conflict, had worked more closely with the Economic and Social Council and with regional and subregional organizations, had sent fact-finding missions to the field, had called on the Secretary-General to use his good offices and had encouraged him to appoint a growing number of special representatives and envoys. He concluded by adding that, although recourse to Chapter VII might have increased in the past decade, the importance of Chapter VI had not been lessened and remained as "relevant" as before.³⁸⁵

Taking the floor after the Secretary-General, Mr. Jamsheed Marker, former Personal Representative of the Secretary-General for East Timor, noted that while Chapter VII constituted the "iron fist" of the Council, its latent efficacy could be considerably enhanced through a timely and judicious application of the "velvet glove" of Chapter VI. Among several suggestions on how to promote the pacific settlement of disputes, Mr. Marker encouraged the Council to utilize its mandatory enforcement authority under Chapter VII to persuade parties to engage in the processes for pacific settlement envisaged under Chapter VI.³⁸⁶

During the ensuing debate, several speakers recognized the primary role of the Security Council in the pacific settlement of disputes and voiced the need for the Council increasingly to explore and revert to the provisions of Chapter VI.³⁸⁷ While acknowledging the role of the Council, some speakers emphasized that the responsibility to prevent and resolve conflicts and disputes rested first and foremost with the parties to the dispute.³⁸⁸ The representative of Germany, echoed by the representative of the United States, drew attention to the Council's ability to anticipate emerging disputes and conflicts, and commented that, to react to them in the most appropriate way, the Council was dependent to a significant extent on an "early and solid knowledge of the situation".³⁸⁹ The representative of China, supported by the representatives of Germany and the United States, acknowledged that, unlike Chapter VII, Chapter VI provided more flexibility in the use of instruments to resolve disputes.³⁹⁰ The representative of the United States added that, over the years, mechanisms had been developed to enable the Council to prevent some disputes from reaching the stage where Chapter VII action was required. Chapter VI had been stretched to accommodate the emergence of peacekeeping, a concept not mentioned in the Charter but one which had been a valuable tool in dispute settlement.³⁹¹ The representative of the Syrian Arab Republic, however, pointed out that there was not "a clear dividing line between the two chapters". In his opinion, the Council should take into consideration, when deciding its course of action, the "feelings and reactions of the peoples of the world", for whom the use of Chapter VII was "not in their interest". He therefore concurred with the opinion of many legal experts who favoured diplomatic instruments and solutions based on peaceful negotiations and the provisions of Article 33 and other articles of the Charter that referred to peaceful solutions.³⁹² The representative of Pakistan, echoing Mr. Marker's earlier statement, encouraged the Council to use its mandatory enforcement authority under Chapter VII to persuade parties to disputes to engage in the processes for the peaceful settlement of disputes envisaged under Chapter VI.³⁹³ Focusing on the various tools available to the Council under Chapter VI, the representative of Bulgaria expressed the view that although some diversification in the use of those instruments was necessary, "a spirit of pragmatism and common sense" should always prevail in the face of the very varied situations the Council dealt with.³⁹⁴

Obligation of Member States to settle their disputes by peaceful means in the light of Article 33 (1) and recommendations for the settlement of disputes by the Security Council, in the light of Article 33 (2)

Article 33 stipulates the obligation of Member States to settle their disputes by peaceful means. Article 33 (1) gives primary responsibility in resolving a dispute to the parties concerned. Article 33 (2) gives the Security Council discretionary power to request the parties to settle their disputes by peaceful means, when it deems necessary. In the cases below, Article 33 was explicitly invoked by Council members mainly during debates on thematic issues related to conflict prevention and the pacific settlement of disputes. In one instance, an explicit reference to Article 33 was made by the representative of Pakistan in a letter dated 22 May 2002 addressed to the President of the Security Council in connection with the situation between India and Pakistan with respect to the Kashmir dispute.³⁹⁵ Included with the case studies in this section is one relating to the Central African region and another that concerns the situation in the Great Lakes region, exemplifying the Council's, increasing focus on the regional and subregional dimension of the peaceful settlement of disputes.

Similar letters bringing to the attention of the Security Council the situation between India and Pakistan in connection with the Jammu and Kashmir dispute were addressed to the President of the Security Council and the Secretary-General by the representative of Mali, as Chairman of the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC) Contact Group on Jammu and Kashmir (S/2002/657), and the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya (S/2002/13).

Role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts

At the 4174th meeting of the Council, on 20 July 2000, a few speakers explicitly highlighted the significance of the provisions enshrined in Article 33, and how they could play an important role in settling many disputes and preventing armed conflicts. The representative of Namibia called for the existing tools of Article 33 to be “further strengthened and completed”.³⁹⁶ The representative of Pakistan noted that, according to Article 33, parties to any dispute were required to use peaceful means for settlement and that the Security Council was empowered to call upon the parties to settle their disputes by such means. He also added that responsibility in that regard should not be evaded on the pretext that bilateral disputes should be resolved by the concerned parties alone, as all bilateral disputes, particularly those with implications for global peace and security, were by definition “international disputes”.³⁹⁷

The role of the Security Council in the pacific settlement of disputes

At the Council’s 4753rd meeting, on 13 May 2003, several speakers, in their statements, drew attention to the provisions enshrined in Article 33 and to the importance of the available tools for the settlement of disputes, including negotiation, enquiry, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, resort to regional arrangements, judicial settlement and other peaceful means.³⁹⁸ In that regard, the representative of India commented that the means provided for in Article 33 were not intended to be “exhaustive”, and that the reference to “other peaceful means of their choice” provided the parties with greater freedom of choice. He added that the Council was not to be bound by the list included in Article 33 (1) in its choice of procedures to assist parties in the settlement of disputes.³⁹⁹ The representative of Spain highlighted that, in both Chapter VIII and Article 33 of the Charter, it was established that Member States should utilize existing regional organizations, among other means of peaceful settlement, and therefore encouraged the Security Council to promote measures undertaken at the regional level.⁴⁰⁰

Central African region

At its 4871st meeting, on 24 November 2003, the Security Council discussed the interim report of the multidisciplinary assessment mission to the Central African subregion.⁴⁰¹ In its report, the mission pointed out a number of cross-border challenges, including ethnic tensions, refugee flows as well as cross-border movement of weapons, drugs and armed groups, which could be solved only through cooperation and an integrated, holistic subregional approach.

Introducing the report of the multidisciplinary assessment mission, the Assistant Secretary-General stressed, inter alia, the need for the United Nations to provide assistance to implement subregional policies to address the numerous cross-cutting challenges in the Central African region. Most speakers concurred with the report’s assessment concerning the primary challenges confronting the countries in Central Africa, and about the importance of a subregional approach to address the numerous cross-cutting challenges facing those countries. A number of speakers stressed the importance of strengthening existing subregional mechanisms and organizations, including the Economic Community of Central African States (ECCAS).⁴⁰² Moreover, several delegations welcomed the Secretary-General’s intention to appoint a Special Envoy for the region.⁴⁰³ The representative of Cameroon deplored the omission from the report of a recommendation in line with the request, which he believed had been made by all, and not just most, Governments in Central Africa during the mission’s visit, for a permanent United Nations presence in the subregion.⁴⁰⁴ The representative of France stated that the cross-border challenges confronting the countries in Central Africa made it necessary for the States of the region and the international community to coordinate appropriate responses. At the same time, France believed that the proposal to appoint a Special Envoy should be considered in the context of the international conference on the Great Lakes region.⁴⁰⁵ The representative of Germany stated that it was difficult to see how a mandate for an additional special envoy for Central Africa could avoid overlapping with the mandate of the Special Representative for the Great Lakes Region. His delegation therefore preferred that the United Nations missions in the Central African subregion identify possible areas of cooperation aimed at effectively addressing cross-cutting issues.⁴⁰⁶ The representative of Spain agreed with the report that it was preferable to make effective and coordinated use of existing structures in the region before considering the possibility of establishing new ones.⁴⁰⁷ The representative of the United Kingdom recognized the need for a comprehensive and concerted approach to the issues of peace, security and development in Central Africa, and stressed the importance of making effective operational linkages across the United Nations system and, where relevant, across borders. He stated that an integrated and holistic subregional approach was required to complement national solutions, but cautioned against imposing templates on different kinds of problems.⁴⁰⁸ The representative of the Russian Federation expressed concern that some African countries tended to appeal to the international community before fully exhausting national or regional possibilities. That applied to the “rather excessive approach for the establishment in Central Africa of a United Nations office”.⁴⁰⁹ The representative of the United States, noting that the international conference on the Great Lakes region might incorporate a number of the elements laid out in the report of the multidisciplinary mission, recommended that the decision on naming a Special Envoy be deferred until after the issuance of the results and recommendations of that conference. Moreover, he expressed concern about adding yet another layer of bureaucracy to the United Nations structures in the Central African region.⁴¹⁰ The representative of Chile recommended heeding the concern of the Secretary-General regarding the proliferation of United Nations offices in the region.⁴¹¹ The representative of the Congo, speaking on behalf of the 11 member States of ECCAS, underlined that it was imperative to have a subregional, coordinated approach, and for the subregion to have a United Nations interlocutor with a regional perspective.⁴¹² The representative of Equatorial Guinea stressed the special responsibility of the Council to address the crises in the region, and also expressed appreciation for the work of the United Nations Standing Advisory Committee on Security Questions in Central Africa. He underlined that despite recent positive developments, the countries of the region remained fragile, and he stressed the need for a permanent political United Nations presence with a subregional scope.⁴¹³ The Permanent Observer of the African Union, pointing to the abundance of subregional, regional and international organizations present in Central Africa, stressed the need to strengthen existing capacities, and hoped that a United Nations regional political presence could serve to enhance coordination among the various initiatives. As to what form the structure should take, he stated that the African Union relied on the flexibility shown by the countries in the subregion that were prepared to consider the issue further with the Special Envoy to be appointed by the Secretary-General. While supporting the request by the countries of the subregion, he emphasized that the form of coordination mattered less than its efficiency and effectiveness.⁴¹⁴ Finally, the Deputy Secretary-General for Political Affairs of ECCAS, noting the recent progress made towards consolidating peace and security in a number of countries in the region, argued that a new dynamic was under way in Central Africa and reiterated the call for a permanent United Nations regional office.⁴¹⁵

The situation in the Great Lakes region

At the 4865th meeting, on 20 November 2003, the Security Council convened a meeting to discuss the preparations for an international conference on the Great Lakes region, following the presentation of a report of the Secretary-General.⁴¹⁶ In his report, the Secretary-General stressed that the Council’s call for an international conference on the Great Lakes region entailed the recognition of the fact that the internal problems in the region tended to spread because of the close social, economic and cultural links of the inhabitants of the entire region, which was why a regional approach was needed. The purpose of the conference, under United Nations and African Union partnership, was to begin a process to bring together the leaders of the countries of the Great Lakes region to reach an agreement on a set of principles and launch selected programmes to help end the cycle of conflict and ensure durable peace, democracy and development in the whole region. It would also establish a regional framework to facilitate the adoption of a stability, security and development pact. He noted that the conference was not a one-time event but a process consisting of several stages, and he urged the core countries to focus on the priorities of the conference in order to formulate concrete and feasible policies.⁴¹⁷

At the meeting, most speakers strongly supported the conference, agreeing that a regional approach was essential to address the crisis affecting the Great Lakes region. They expressed hope that holding the conference would help consolidate the gains that had been made in the recent peace processes in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Burundi. A number of speakers stressed that the conference would have to be judged on whether it produced concrete measures to ensure a safeguard against a future resurgence of violence, instability and criminality,⁴¹⁸ while others, emphasizing the need for sufficient financial support, called on donors to provide it in a timely manner.⁴¹⁹ endanger the maintenance of international peace and security. In the following instances, the Article was implicitly and/or explicitly invoked, mainly in connection with the prevention of armed conflict.

Role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts

At the 4174th meeting of the Council, on 20 July 2000, the representative of China noted that the Security Council had taken some positive measures in regard to conflict prevention and peaceful resolution of conflicts, including the sending of fact-finding missions to areas of conflict. He further noted that setting up early warning systems or the sending of fact-finding or other special missions, which bear on the sovereignty of a State, should follow only after consent had been obtained from the countries or parties concerned.⁴²⁰ The representative of Malaysia also called for more frequent use of fact-finding missions, either by the Secretary-General or by the Council itself.⁴²¹

At the 4334th meeting, on 21 June 2001, the Council met to discuss the report of the Secretary-General on conflict prevention, which included a number of proposals to further enhance the capacity of the United Nations system for preventive action.⁴²² Introducing the report on behalf of the Secretary-General, the Deputy Secretary-General suggested that the Council could send fact-finding missions with multidisciplinary expert support to potential conflict areas, with the aim of working out comprehensive prevention strategies.⁴²³ Several delegations supported the proposal of dispatching fact-finding missions to potential conflict areas.⁴²⁴ The representative of the Russian Federation commented that such missions had already and repeatedly proven their necessity and “played an important role in the research for necessary solutions”.⁴²⁵ The representative of Costa Rica, however, cautioned that the scope of such missions should not be exaggerated and that they would not be useful if they were “quick and superficial” and without expert members.⁴²⁶ Similarly, the representative of Japan stressed that clear criteria for such missions must be established, that their terms of reference must be specified and their financing well clarified.⁴²⁷ The representative of South Africa referred to the Secretary-General’s use of inter-agency task forces, and suggested that these could play a valuable role, complementary to that of the fact-finding missions of the Council. As a consequence, he added, consideration should be given to the harmonization of the two approaches.⁴²⁸

Ensuring an effective role of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security

At the 4220th meeting of the Council, on 13 November 2000, the representative of Mali welcomed the Council’s initiative to more frequently deploy fact-finding missions to areas of tension as “a quick means of preventing crises”. At the same time, he acknowledged that conflict prevention measures should be taken in accordance with the principle of non-interference in the internal affairs of States.⁴²⁹

The role of the Security Council in the pacific settlement of disputes

At the 4753rd meeting of the Security Council, on 13 May 2003, the representative of Germany, referring to the different means available to the Council in addressing disputes, welcomed the Council’s practice of dispatching fact-finding missions to fragile situations and added that this instrument “could benefit from some intensification”. Furthermore, he emphasized that such “special missions” not only conveyed to the parties the clear message that a situation was under observation and a matter of concern to the Council, but also helped to “prepare for adequate solutions”.⁴³⁰ The representative of Spain stated that the Council should make greater use of its prerogative under Article 34 and, in particular, of Council missions in conflict zones, which would enable it to obtain “information first-hand while exerting pressure on the parties”.⁴³¹

Protection of civilians in armed conflict

At the 4130th meeting of the Security Council, on 19 April 2000, the Secretary-General, in his remarks, referred to a number of recommendations contained in his first report to the Security Council on the protection of civilians in armed conflict.⁴³² Recalling the successful deployment of a mission to the Central African Republic, he welcomed the Security Council’s willingness to consider the future establishment of preventive missions, including the dispatch of monitors and fact-finding missions in cases when such deployments could make a difference between peaceful settlement of disputes and violent conflict.⁴³³ The representative of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the European Union,⁴³⁴ supported the views expressed by the Secretary-General and added that early deployment of preventive missions such as fact-finding missions should be considered whenever possible.⁴³⁵ The representative of Egypt agreed that the Council could carry out certain actions, such as sending fact-finding missions to prevent conflicts and reach peaceful settlements, but noted that the consent of the State concerned was required, as those procedures “were in fact voluntary”.⁴³⁶

⁴³¹ Ibid., p. 12.

⁴³² In his report dated 8 September 1999, the Secretary-General recommended that the Security Council consider the deployment, in certain cases, of a preventive peacekeeping operation, or of another preventive monitoring presence. He also recommended that the Council increase its use of relevant provisions in the Charter, such as Articles 34 to 36, by investigating disputes at an early stage, inviting Member States to bring disputes to the Security Council’s attention and recommending appropriate procedures for dealing with disputes, and strengthen the relevance of Article 99 of the Charter by taking concrete action in response to threats against peace and security as these were identified by the Secretariat (see S/1999/957, paras. 12 and 13).

At its 4312th meeting, on 23 April 2001, the Council met to discuss the second report of the Secretary-General on the above-mentioned topic.⁴³⁷ In her statement, the Deputy Secretary-General advocated for more frequent use of fact-finding missions to conflict areas with a view to identifying the specific requirements for humanitarian assistance.⁴³⁸ Subsequently, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights commented that “establishing the facts” could play a crucial part in the protection of civilians in armed conflict.⁴³⁹ Referring to a number of instances in which human rights fact-finding missions had taken place, including in relation to Afghanistan, East Timor, Sierra Leone and Kosovo, the Commissioner further added that the reports of those missions should be available to the Security Council.⁴⁴⁰ Subsequently, in the debate, several speakers endorsed the Secretary-General’s recommendation regarding more frequent use of fact-finding missions to conflict areas with a focus on humanitarian assistance.⁴⁴¹ The representative of Ukraine stated that it was crucial for Council members to have a regular exchange of views with other organs of the United Nations system, such as the Economic and Social Council. He stated that there was “ample room” for the latter not only to participate in such missions, but also to lead them.⁴⁴² The representative of the United Kingdom commented that the Security Council should engage the parties in conflict and undertake fact-finding missions, and expressed the opinion that “in practice, these actions are those which are most likely to be taken up by actors that are represented in the field”. As a consequence, he “noted with interest” the proposal by Ukraine that the Economic and Social Council join in fact-finding missions, and called for clear arrangements for coordination with the other United Nations bodies.⁴⁴³ The representative of Indonesia cautioned that the

Women and peace and security

At the 4208th meeting of the Security Council, on 24 and 25 October 2000, the representative of the United States, supported by the representative of New Zealand, stated that the presence of women in all phases of peacekeeping and peacebuilding missions, including fact-finding missions, should be “visible and consistent”.⁴⁴⁵ The representative of Indonesia suggested that the Council include gender issues in the terms of reference of fact-finding missions.⁴⁴⁶ Similarly, the representative of Namibia suggested that fact-finding missions should include “a senior gender expert” so that the Council could gain a full appreciation of the gender dimension of ongoing or potential conflicts.⁴⁴⁷

Children and armed conflict

At the 4684th meeting of the Security Council, on 14 January 2003, the representative of Costa Rica noted that there was a need for fact-finding missions in cases of accusations of serious violations of the rights of the child. Those missions, he added, could also offer early warning in the event of a situation that might potentially threaten the security of children.⁴⁴⁸

Referral of disputes to the Security Council in the light of Article 35

Article 35 (1) and (2) grants Member States and non-member States the right to bring any dispute, or any situation of the nature referred to in Article 34, to the attention of the Security Council. Explicit references to that prerogative were made in the following instance.⁴⁴⁹

The role of the Security Council in the pacific settlement of disputes

At the 4753rd meeting of the Security Council, on 13 May 2003, in connection with the use of Article 35 by Member States, the representative of Greece, speaking on behalf of the European Union and associated countries, underlined the obligation of States to refer to the Council a dispute to which they were parties if they failed to reach an early solution by any of the means indicated in Article 33 of the Charter.⁴⁵⁰ Recalling the importance of diversifying the tools at the Council's disposal under Chapter VI, the representative of Bulgaria emphasized the importance of Article 35 of the Charter, which enables States to have greater recourse to the Council.⁴⁵¹

Referral of legal disputes in the light of Article 36 (3)

Article 36 (3) of the Charter stipulates that the Council, in making recommendations under Article 36, "should take into consideration that legal disputes should as a general rule be referred by the parties to the International Court of Justice in accordance with the provisions of the Statute of the Court".

In the following instances, Member States debated the question of whether the Council could make more frequent recourse to the provisions of Article 36.

The role of the Security Council in the peaceful settlement of disputes

At the 4753rd meeting of the Council, on 13 May 2003, speakers discussed, inter alia, the role of the International Court of Justice and the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea in the context of the pacific settlement of disputes. During the debate, many delegations emphasized the importance of those judicial mechanisms in the prevention and resolution of legal disputes.

With regard to the role of the International Court of Justice, the Secretary-General, in his statement, recalled the recommendations included in his report dated 7 June 2001,⁴⁵² including the one pertaining to earlier and more frequent resort to the Court by Member States to solve their disputes.⁴⁵³ Similarly, Mr. Nabil Elaraby, judge of the Court, invited the Council to make a better use of the mechanisms provided by the Charter and involving the Court. Emphasizing that the Council could consider a "strict application" of the provisions of Article 36 (3), he recalled that the provision had been used only once, in the Corfu Channel case in 1947. He also added that the Council could consider requesting, whenever necessary, an advisory opinion from the Court to clarify legal questions, as occurred in 1970 with respect to Namibia. He further underlined the importance of increasing the acceptance by States of the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court, recalling that that recommendation was contained in the report entitled "Agenda for peace",⁴⁵⁴ together with two other proposals aimed at enhancing the role of the Court: that when the submission of a dispute to the full Court was not practical, its Chambers could be used; and that authority should be conferred on the Secretary-General to request advisory opinions from the Court.⁴⁵⁵

During the debate, several speakers echoed the recommendations of the Secretary-General by drawing attention to Article 36 (3) in the Charter and encouraging the Council to make more use of the Article's provisions.⁴⁵⁶ In that connection, the representative of Mexico commented that it was essential for States that had not yet done so to make a declaration recognizing the jurisdiction of the Court with respect to any other State accepting the same obligation.⁴⁵⁷ The representative of Cameroon stated that, to preserve the credibility of the machinery established in the Charter, the Security Council and the United Nations should adopt measures to compel

States, if necessary and whenever circumstances so dictated, to implement forthwith and without equivocation the decisions established for peaceful procedures, especially decisions of the International Court of Justice.⁴⁵⁸ Similarly, the representative of Honduras noted that it was also a responsibility of the Security Council to make sure that the sentences from the Court were carried out.⁴⁵⁹ The representative of Pakistan underlined, inter alia, that particular consideration should be given to the suggestion of more frequently requesting advisory opinions of the Court.⁴⁶⁰

With regard to the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea, during the debate, a few speakers mentioned the importance of such a judicial mechanism in the context of the pacific settlement of disputes.⁴⁶¹ More specifically, the representative of Mexico stated that the Tribunal was becoming increasingly important in the pacific settlement of conflicts pertaining to the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, and in general in matters regarding ocean affairs.⁴⁶² The representative of Greece, speaking on behalf of the European Union and associated countries, expressed the view that early and more frequent resort to the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea would greatly contribute to the maintenance of international peace and security and the promotion of the primacy of international law in international relations.⁴⁶³

At its 4334th meeting, on 21 June 2001, the Council met to discuss the report of the Secretary-General on the prevention of armed conflict.⁴⁶⁴ In his report, the Secretary-General made four recommendations regarding the role of the International Court of Justice, as follows: (a) Member States should resort to the Court earlier and more often to settle disputes; (b) Member States that had not yet done so should accept the general jurisdiction of the Court; (c) Member States should adopt, when signing treaties, clauses providing for disputes to be referred to the Court; and (d) the General Assembly should authorize the Secretary-General and other United Nations organs to take advantage of the advisory competence of the Court, and other United Nations organs that already enjoyed such authorization should resort to the Court more frequently for advisory opinions.⁴⁶⁵

In the debate, several speakers supported the Secretary-General's call for a strengthening of the Court's role.⁴⁶⁶ The representative of the United Kingdom supported the Secretary-General's first two recommendations and urged Members of the Organization that had not yet done so, to accept the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court.⁴⁶⁷ The representative of the United States, supported by the representatives of Nigeria and Belarus, expressed the view that the United Nations system needed to improve cooperation and coordination, and that the Court had a contribution to make to this end.⁴⁶⁸

Referrals by the Secretary-General in the light of Article 99

Article 99 of the Charter empowers the Secretary-General to bring to the attention of the Security Council any matter which in his opinion may threaten the maintenance of international peace and security. In the discussions of the Council presented below, Member States generally welcomed the strengthening of the Secretary-General's prerogatives under Article 99, especially in connection with the prevention of armed conflicts and humanitarian crises, as well as the protection of civilians in armed conflict. In a number of instances, Article 99 was explicitly invoked by a Member State in communications addressed to the President of the Security Council and the Secretary-General. For example, in connection with the alleged enforcement of no-flight zones by United States and British aircraft, the representative of Iraq, by identical letters dated 2 December 2002 addressed to the President of the Council and the Secretary-General, expressed his hope that, in accordance with the Secretary-General's responsibilities as specified in Article 99 of the Charter, the Secretary-General would draw the attention of the Security Council to that situation and request the Council to carry out its duties under Article 39 of the Charter.⁴⁶⁹ Subsequently, in connection with the United States-led military action against Iraq, by two letters addressed to the Secretary-General dated 9 and 21 March 2003, respectively, the representative of Iraq appealed to the Secretary-General, under Article 99 of the Charter, to bring the new developments, posing a "threat to international peace and security", to the attention of the Security Council.⁴⁷⁰

Maintaining peace and security: humanitarian aspects of issues before the Security Council

At the 4109th meeting of the Security Council, on 9 March 2000, speakers recognized the importance of timely consideration of humanitarian issues in preventing the escalation of conflicts and in maintaining international peace and security. In that regard, the representative of the Netherlands encouraged the Secretary-General to include humanitarian issues in his briefings to the Council and underlined that the Secretary-General's exercise of his prerogative under Article 99 was an indispensable means for ensuring that the Council could discharge its duties in cases where humanitarian crises endangered international peace and security.⁴⁷¹ The representative of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the European Union and associated countries, called upon the Secretary-General to resort more often to the prerogative given to him under Article 99. In that connection, he commented that it was indispensable to improve and use the capacity of the Secretariat to enable the Security Council to consider ways in which it might regularly monitor potential conflicts or massive violations of human rights and humanitarian law either through the use of existing mechanisms, such as the International Humanitarian Fact-Finding Commission, or by other means.⁴⁷² The representative of Norway supported previous speakers in urging the Secretary-General to make full use of Article 99 and also stated that such use would require the establishment of mechanisms for early warning to provide time and opportunity for effective preventive diplomacy and pre-emptive conflict mediation.⁴⁷³

At the 4174th meeting of the Security Council, on 20 July 2000, many speakers underlined the critical role that the Secretary-General could play in making conflict prevention a more effective strategy.⁴⁷⁴ In that respect, a number of representatives explicitly invoked Article 99 and emphasized the importance of the role of the Secretary-General in using this prerogative.⁴⁷⁵ The representative of the United Kingdom, supported by the representative of Pakistan, commented that the Secretary-General needed to be given sufficient resources to make the early warning capacity of the Secretariat effective "in real life". He also noted that it was essential that the Secretariat be able to produce clear-sighted analysis, comprehensive and integrated planning and well-resourced implementation. Furthermore, he encouraged the Secretary-General to "act on his convictions" and when a situation merit the attention of the Council, to do so under his prerogatives under Article 99.⁴⁷⁶ Similarly, the representative of France reminded the Council of the role of the Secretary-General in alerting the Security Council to certain situations in accordance with Article 99 of the Charter, and remarked that the Secretariat's early warning, reaction and analysis capabilities should be bolstered so that the Secretary-General could be able to better perform that task.⁴⁷⁷ The representative of Pakistan stated that the Secretary-General should play a more proactive role, as envisaged in Article 99, and not find himself inhibited by one party in a particular conflict situation.⁴⁷⁸ Echoing that statement, the representative of Malaysia added that, in case of political sensitivities, it would be more appropriate for the Secretary-General to arrange informal exchanges of views. He added that the Council would benefit tremendously from timely and in-depth briefings by the Secretariat on potential conflict situations that would be brought to the attention of the Council by the Secretary-General by virtue of Article 99 of the Charter, which should be invoked more frequently than it had been in the past. Noting that the Secretary-General had been empowered to do so by the Charter, he pointed out that the latter should be encouraged to invoke this prerogative to give substance to the concept of conflict prevention.⁴⁷⁹ Similarly, the representative of Ukraine believed that the Secretary-General played an essential role in conflict prevention in bringing to the attention of the Security Council any matter that might threaten international peace and security, in accordance with Article 99 of the Charter.⁴⁸⁰ The representative of Tunisia stated that the role of the Secretary-General in conflict prevention was an essential one, which he should exercise in accordance with Article 99 of the Charter.⁴⁸¹ The representative of Brazil stated that, as a contribution to prevention, Article 99 of the Charter offered the Secretary-General a most valuable instrument for engaging the Council in preventive action and that the role played by the special representatives of the Secretary-General and by his good offices missions should also be underscored.⁴⁸²

At the 4334th meeting, on 21 June 2001, the Council met to consider the report of the Secretary-General dated 7 June 2001 on the prevention of armed conflicts.⁴⁸³ In his report, the Secretary-General pointed out that he had had a role in the prevention of armed conflict since the earliest days of the Organization, through “quiet diplomacy” or “good offices of the Secretary-General”. The mandate for prevention was derived from Article 99 of the Charter of the United Nations, which provided that the Secretary-General may bring to the attention of the Security Council any matter which in his opinion may threaten the maintenance of international peace and security.⁴⁸⁴ During the discussion, the representative of France reiterated that there was a need to strengthen the early warning, reaction and analysis capacities of the Secretariat so that the Secretary-General could be in a better position to perform his function according to Article 99.⁴⁸⁵ The representative of Singapore and the representative of Sweden echoed that view, and the representative of France welcomed the Secretary-General’s intention to initiate a practice of providing periodic regional or subregional reports to the Security Council on threats to international peace and security.⁴⁸⁶ The representative of Pakistan commented that, although under Article 99 the Secretary-General had a responsibility to bring to the notice of the Security Council any matter which might threaten international peace and security, this did not restrict the Secretary-General from using his good offices, fact-finding missions and personal envoys to prevent conflict.⁴⁸⁷

At its 4660th meeting, on 10 December 2002, the Council met to consider the latest report of the Secretary-General, dated 26 November 2002, on the protection of civilians in armed conflict.⁴⁸⁸ In the report, the Secretary-General outlined a number of practical initiatives to heighten awareness of the need to protect civilians in the daily work of the United Nations,⁴⁸⁹ inter alia, strengthening the relevance of Article 99 by taking concrete action in response to threats against peace and security identified by the Secretariat.⁴⁹⁰ During the debate, the representative of Mexico referred to Article 99 and to the power conferred to the Secretary-General in assisting the Security Council in matters of protecting civilians in armed conflict.⁴⁹¹ The representative of the United Kingdom, echoed by the representatives of Canada and Austria, encouraged the Secretary-General to make more use of his prerogative under Article 99 with the protection of civilians in mind.⁴⁹² Similarly, the representative of the Russian Federation remarked that the Secretary-General should act more promptly in conveying appropriate information to the Council about situations that could pose a threat to the maintenance of international peace and security, including instances of the deliberate denial of safe access by humanitarian personnel to civilians, as well as about other gross violations of the rights of civilians.⁴⁹³

In his report of 19 July 2000 on children and armed conflict, the Secretary-General stated that it was his intention to pay particular attention to issues regarding the protection of children affected by armed conflict when preparing periodic reports on disputes that could threaten international peace and security, as mandated by Article 99.⁴⁹⁴ On the basis of that recommendation, the Council, by resolution 1379 (2001) of 20 November 2001, requested the Secretary-General to attach to his reports to the Council a list of parties to armed conflicts that recruited or used children in violation of international obligations, in situations that could be brought to the attention of the Council in accordance with Article 99.⁴⁹⁵ At the 4684th meeting of the Security Council, on 14 January 2003, the representative of Costa Rica remarked that it was essential for the Secretary-General to make full use of his powers under Article 99 by referring to the Council any situations of armed conflict in which young people under the age of 18 were recruited or used in fighting.⁴⁹⁶

The situation in the Middle East, including the Palestinian question

At the 4515th meeting of the Council on 19 April 2002, the representative of Singapore, recalling the Secretary-General's call for the deployment of an impartial, robust and credible multinational force to the Middle East, remarked that the Secretary-General had fulfilled his Charter obligation under Article 99 by bringing the situation in the Middle East to the Council's attention.⁴⁹⁷

Efforts of the Secretary-General for the peaceful settlement of disputes in the light of Article 33

Role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts

At the 4174th meeting of the Security Council, on 20 July 2000, many speakers expressed appreciation for the analysis offered by the Secretary-General on conflict prevention strategies, and a number of delegations underlined the critical role that he had to play in order for prevention to be an effective strategy. They reiterated such previously identified conflict-prevention mechanisms as early warning systems and coordination within the United Nations system, and stressed that the Secretary-General, directly or through his special envoys, must enjoy both the authority and the resources to take action to prevent conflicts or their re-emergence.⁴⁹⁸ The representative of the United States stated that a possible means of strengthening the United Nations conflict-prevention and early warning capacity was to consider reinforcing the roles of the Special Representatives of the Secretary-General, in particular their abilities to identify hot spots and intervene early.⁴⁹⁹ In addition, the representative of the Russian Federation attached paramount importance to improving the means of preventing armed conflicts such as early warning systems, using inter alia the potential of the Secretary-General.⁵⁰⁰ The representative of Malaysia noted that truly preventive action or preventive diplomacy would involve the dispatch of a mission to a potential area of conflict that had not erupted and which resulted in averting the conflict. He added that such missions would more appropriately lie in the realm of preventive diplomacy, as opposed to preventive action, and might be best handled by the Secretary-General or his emissary in the context of his good offices or by individual Member States that were prepared to undertake such quiet and sensitive diplomacy.⁵⁰¹ The representative of Ukraine supported the Secretary-General's strategies for conflict prevention, involving the use of all available instruments, including confidence-building, early warning, fact-finding, good offices, mediation, citizen diplomacy measures, the naming of special representatives and the sending of envoys.⁵⁰² In addition, the representatives of Tunisia and Brazil underscored the role played by the special representatives of the Secretary-General and by his good offices missions in the prevention of armed conflicts.⁵⁰³

At the 4334th meeting of the Security Council, on 21 June 2001, the Council met to consider the report of the Secretary-General dated 7 June 2001 on the prevention of armed conflicts.⁵⁰⁴ In his report, the Secretary-General stressed that preventive diplomacy was an important part of his responsibilities, pursued through persuasion, confidence-building and information-sharing to find solutions to difficult problems at a very early stage. He saw the increasing demand for his engagement in this type of preventive action as recognition that the Secretary-General could do much quietly and discreetly outside the limelight, even though the results might not always be visible or easily assessed. He therefore intended to enhance in four ways, with the support of Member States, his traditional preventive role: first, by increasing the use of United Nations interdisciplinary fact-finding and confidence-building missions to volatile regions; second, by developing regional prevention strategies with regional partners and appropriate United Nations organs and agencies; third, by establishing an informal network of eminent persons for conflict prevention; and fourth, by improving the capacity and resource base for preventive action in the Secretariat.⁵⁰⁵ Several speakers voiced their support for an enhancement of the role of the Secretary-General in conflict prevention, as proposed in the report.⁵⁰⁶ The representative of Ukraine supported the proposals of the Secretary-General, and highlighted the idea of identifying eminent persons to serve as an informal network for advice and action in support of the Secretary-General's efforts to prevent and resolve armed conflicts.⁵⁰⁷ The representative of Singapore commended the recent efforts of the Secretary-General to play a more active role in conflict prevention and underscored the need to strengthen the Secretariat's early warning analysis capacities. The Secretary-General's visit to the Middle East and active role in the Middle East process, he added, was the most recent contribution he had made to the ongoing efforts to achieve a just and lasting solution in the Middle East.⁵⁰⁸ The representative of Iraq also supported the Secretary-General's recommendations, and encouraged the Council to support his initiatives and refrain from any action that could cause him to fail in his task.⁵⁰⁹ The representative of Pakistan commented that, although under Article 99 the Secretary-General had a responsibility to bring to the notice of the Council any matter which may threaten international peace and security, this did not restrict the Secretary-General from using his good offices, fact-finding missions and personal envoys to prevent conflict.⁵¹⁰

At the 4753rd meeting of the Council, on 13 May 2003, the Secretary-General recalled that, in recent years, the Council had increasingly requested him to use his good offices and appoint special representatives and envoys, as well as to deploy fact-finding missions to the field.⁵¹¹ Several speakers expressed support for to the Secretary-General's good offices role had been through his appointment of special representatives, who remained on the ground to work with the involved parties to find and implement peaceful solutions. He added that "strong, capable and experienced" special representatives could provide an extremely important link between peacemaking, peacekeeping and peacebuilding as a country moved from conflict to ceasefire and, then, reconstruction.⁵¹⁴

Introductory note

This chapter deals with action taken by the Security Council with respect to threats to the peace, breaches of the peace or acts of aggression, within the framework of Chapter VII of the Charter.

During the period under review, the Council invoked Chapter VII of the Charter in an increased number of its decisions. While most of the decisions related to Afghanistan, Iraq and Kuwait, and to acts of international terrorism, the Council also adopted measures under Chapter VII of the Charter in connection with Angola, Côte d'Ivoire, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, East Timor, Eritrea and Ethiopia, Liberia, Sierra Leone, Somalia and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.

The chapter is divided into nine parts, focusing on selected material that may best serve to highlight how the provisions of Chapter VII of the Charter were interpreted by the Council in its deliberations and applied in its decisions. Given the increase in the Council's practice under Chapter VII during the period under review, and to give due focus to the key elements that arose in its decisions or deliberations, individual Articles of the Charter have been dealt with in separate parts of the chapter. Thus parts I to IV of this chapter focus on the practice of the Council in accordance with Articles 39 to 42, while part V focuses on Articles 43 to 47. Parts VI and VII address, respectively, the obligations of Member States under Articles 48 and 49, and parts VIII and IX deal, respectively, with the practice of the Council with respect to Articles 50 and 51. Further, each part contains a section that focuses on the decisions of the Council and a section that highlights relevant excerpts of the Council's deliberations, illustrating the Council's practice with respect to the Article(s) considered. Each section treats the different aspects of the Council's consideration of the Article concerned, under different subheadings.

Part I

Determination of a threat to the peace, breach of the peace or act of aggression in accordance with Article 39 of the Charter

Article 39

The Security Council shall determine the existence of any threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression and shall make recommendations, or decide what measures shall be taken in accordance with Articles 41 and 42, to maintain or restore international peace and security.

Note

During the period under review, the Council did not explicitly invoke Article 39 in any of its decisions. The Council, however, did adopt several resolutions determining, or expressing concern, at the “existence of threats to regional and/or international peace and security” in connection with Afghanistan, Eritrea and Ethiopia, Iraq and Kuwait, and Somalia and with acts of international terrorism. The “continuance of a threat to international peace and security” was determined in connection with the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina. In all of the above-mentioned cases, the Council adopted measures under Chapter VII of the Charter. In several other instances, in connection with Angola, Côte d’Ivoire, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Liberia, Sierra Leone and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, the Council determined “new or continuing threats to international peace and security in the region”.

In connection with its consideration of thematic issues, the Council also identified generic threats to peace and security. In a number of decisions, the Council recognized and expressed concern at a wide range of non-traditional threats that might constitute a threat to international peace and security, such as the deliberate targeting of civilian populations, including children, in armed conflicts; the widespread violations of international humanitarian and human rights law in situations of armed conflict; and the HIV/AIDS pandemic. The Council also expressed its concern over the threat posed by the proliferation of small arms, light weapons and mercenary activities in areas of conflict.

Several issues regarding the interpretation of Article 39 and the determination of threats to the peace arose during the Council’s debates, mainly focusing on the threats constituted by the situations in Afghanistan and Iraq. Substantial discussion also emerged over non-traditional concepts of threats to the peace.

Section A outlines the decisions of the Council in which determinations were made regarding the existence or continuance of a threat to the peace. Section B reflects the constitutional discussion in the meetings of the Council arising in connection with the adoption of some of these resolutions.

Africa

The situation in Angola

By resolution 1295 (2000) of 18 April 2000, the Council determined that the continuing conflict in Angola constituted “a threat to international peace and security in the region”.¹

The situation in Côte d’Ivoire

By resolution 1464 (2003) of 4 February 2003, the Council noted the existence of a challenge to the stability of Côte d’Ivoire and determined that threats to stability in Côte d’Ivoire constituted “a threat to international peace and security in the region”.²

The situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo

By resolution 1291 (2000) of 24 February 2000, the Council noted with concern the illegal exploitation

² Resolution 1464 (2003), seventh preambular paragraph. By subsequent resolutions, the Council reiterated that the situation in Côte d’Ivoire constituted a threat to international peace and security in the region. of natural resources in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the potential consequences of those actions on the conflict, and reiterated its call for the withdrawal of foreign forces. It therefore determined that the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo constituted “a threat to international peace and security in the region”.³ By resolution 1304 (2000) of 15 June 2000, the Council expressed its deep concern and outrage at renewed fighting between Ugandan and Rwandan forces in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.⁴ By that and a number of subsequent resolutions, the Council determined that the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security in the region.⁵

By resolution 1484 (2003) of 30 May 2003, the Council determined that the situation in the Ituri region and in Bunia in particular constituted a threat to the peace process in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and “to peace and security in the Great Lakes region”.⁶

The situation between Eritrea and Ethiopia

By resolution 1297 (2000) of 12 May 2000, following the outbreak of renewed fighting between Eritrea and Ethiopia, the Council noted that the situation between the two countries constituted “a threat to peace and security” and stressed that renewed hostilities constituted “an even greater threat to the stability, security and economic development of the subregion”.⁷

By resolution 1298 (2000) of 17 May 2000, following the continuation of fighting between Eritrea and Ethiopia, the Council deplored the loss of human lives and regretted the diversion of resources to the conflict and its effects on the regional food crisis and general humanitarian situation of the civilian populations of the two States. It stressed that the hostilities constituted “an increasing threat to the stability, security and economic development of the subregion”, and determined that the situation constituted “a threat to regional peace and security”.⁸

The situation in Liberia

In a statement by the President dated 13 December 2002, the Council expressed its concern at the situation in Liberia and the threat it constituted to “international peace and security in the region”, as a result of the activities of the Government of Liberia and the continuing internal conflict in the country. The Council noted that the failure of the Government of Liberia, other States and other non-State actors to respect the Council’s measures threatened the peace process in Sierra Leone and the stability of the entire West African region.⁹

By resolution 1478 (2003) of 6 May 2003, the Council expressed its serious concern at the evidence that the Government of Liberia continued to breach the measures imposed by the Council, particularly through the acquisition of arms. The Council determined that the active support provided by the Government of Liberia to armed rebel groups in the region, including to rebels in Côte d’Ivoire and former combatants of the Revolutionary United Front (RUF) who continued to destabilize the region, constituted “a threat to international peace and security in the region”.¹⁰

By resolutions 1497 (2003) of 1 August 2003 and 1509 (2003) of 19 September 2003, the Council determined that the situation in Liberia constituted “a threat to international peace and security”, to “stability in West Africa” and “to the peace process for Liberia”.¹¹

The situation in Sierra Leone

By resolution 1289 (2000) of 7 February 2000, although noting the progress being made towards settling the conflict in Sierra Leone, the Council determined that the situation in the country continued to constitute “a threat to international peace and security in the region”.¹³

By resolution 1343 (2001) of 7 March 2001, the Council determined that the active support provided by the Government of Liberia to armed rebel groups in neighbouring countries, in particular its support for RUF in Sierra Leone, constituted “a threat to international peace and security in the region”.¹⁴

By resolution 1446 (2002) of 4 December 2002, the Council noted with concern that the situation in Liberia remained “a threat to security in Sierra Leone, especially the diamond-mining areas, and to other countries in the region” and reaffirmed that “the situation in the region continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security in the region”.¹⁵

The situation in Afghanistan

By a statement of the President dated 7 April 2000,¹⁷ Council members reiterated their grave concern at the continuing Afghan conflict as “a serious and growing threat to regional and international peace and security”.¹⁸ They condemned the use of the Afghan territory for the sheltering and training of terrorists and planning of terrorist acts, and reaffirmed their conviction that the suppression of international terrorism was essential for the maintenance of international peace and security.¹⁹ They further condemned attacks and planned attacks by terrorists affiliated with Osama bin Laden, which constituted “a continuing threat to the international community”.²⁰

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

By resolution 1441 (2002) of 8 November 2002, the Council recognized the threat that non-compliance by Iraq with Council resolutions and the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and long-range missiles posed to “international peace and security”.²⁹ It deplored the fact that Iraq had not provided an accurate, full, final and complete disclosure of all aspects of its weapons programmes.³⁰ It also deplored the fact that Iraq repeatedly obstructed access to sites designated by the United Nations Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), and the absence of international monitoring, inspection and verification of weapons of mass destruction and ballistic missiles. It also deplored the failure of the Government of Iraq to comply with its commitments with regard to terrorism and to end repression of its civilian population.³¹ By resolution 1483 (2003) of 22 May 2003, the Council determined that the situation in Iraq, although improved, continued to constitute “a threat to international peace and security”.³² That determination was reiterated by the Council in two subsequent resolutions adopted on 16 October 2003 and 24 November 2003, respectively.³³

Children and armed conflict

By resolution 1314 (2000) of 11 August 2000, the Council noted that the deliberate targeting of civilian populations or other protected persons, including children, and the committing of systematic, flagrant and widespread violations of international humanitarian and human rights law, including that relating to children, in situations of armed conflict might “constitute a threat to international peace and security”, and in that regard reaffirmed its readiness to consider such situations and, where necessary, to adopt appropriate steps.³⁴

Protection of civilians in armed conflict

By resolution 1296 (2000) of 19 April 2000, the Council noted that the deliberate targeting of civilian populations or other protected persons and the committing of systematic, flagrant and widespread violations of international humanitarian and human rights law in situations of armed conflict might constitute “a threat to international peace and security”, and reaffirmed its readiness to consider such situations and, where necessary, to adopt appropriate steps.³⁵

Role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts

By resolution 1366 (2001) of 30 August 2001, the Council expressed serious concern over the “threat to peace and security caused by the illicit trade in and the excessive and destabilizing accumulation of small arms and light weapons in areas of conflict and their potential to exacerbate and prolong armed conflict”.³⁶

Threats to international peace and security caused by terrorist acts

By resolution 1368 (2001) of 12 September 2001, the Council condemned the terrorist attacks of 11 September 2001 in New York, Washington, D.C. and Pennsylvania, and regarded such attacks, like any act of international terrorism, as “a threat to international peace and security”.³⁷ By its subsequent resolution 1373 (2001) of 28 September 2001, the Council reaffirmed that such acts constituted a “threat to international peace and security”.³⁸

By resolution 1377 (2001) of 12 November 2001, the Council declared that acts of international terrorism constituted “one of the most serious threats to international peace and security in the twenty-first century” and “a challenge to all States and to all of humanity”.³⁹ It stressed that acts of and the financing, planning, preparation and support for international terrorism were contrary to the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations.⁴⁰ It also underlined that acts of terrorism threatened “the social and economic development of all States” and undermined “global stability and prosperity”.⁴¹

In subsequent resolutions, the Council condemned the bomb attacks in Bali, Indonesia, on 12 October 2002; the taking of hostages in Moscow on 23 October 2002, the terrorist bomb attack at the Paradise Hotel in Kikambala, Kenya, on 28 November 2002; the bomb attack in Bogota on 7 February 2003; the terrorist acts in Iraq between August and October 2003; the bomb attacks in Istanbul on 15 and 20 November 2003; and other terrorist attacks in a number of countries, and regarded such acts, “like any act of international terrorism”, as “a threat to international peace and security”.⁴²

B. Discussion relating to Article 39

The situation in Afghanistan

At its 4251st meeting, on 19 December 2000, the Council adopted resolution 1333 (2000) by which it reaffirmed that the suppression of international terrorism was essential for the maintenance of international peace and security and determined that the failure of the Taliban authorities to respond to the demands of the Council constituted “a threat to international peace and security”.⁴⁴ During the debate, several speakers expressed their condemnation of the Taliban’s refusal to abide by Council decisions and their continuing harbouring of terrorists and support for terrorist activities.⁴⁵ The representative of the United States stated that the continuing support for terrorists by the Taliban, and in particular for Osama bin Laden, remained “a threat to international peace and security”.⁴⁶ The representative of Afghanistan argued that the resolution did not adequately deal with the threat of terrorism emanating from Afghanistan and that the Council needed to address the problem of Afghanistan in its entirety. He claimed that even though the draft clearly showed that outside elements were responsible for terrorist activities, it did not deal with “Pakistan’s well-known aggression in Afghanistan” which posed a “threat to regional security” and hampered “development and cooperation in the region”. He concluded that such acts constituted flagrant violations of the Charter and should be considered by the Council “under Chapter VII, Articles 39 to 42”.⁴⁷ international peace and security, which the Council had failed to address “properly”. See S/PV.4325, p. 16. By identical letters dated 14 September 2001 addressed to the Secretary-General and to the President of the Security Council (S/2001/870), the representative of Afghanistan proposed “the convening of a special meeting of the Security Council to address the presence of foreign military and armed personnel in Afghanistan” and its “threat to regional and international peace and security”.

At the 4774th meeting, on 17 June 2003, the representative of France invited the Council to “do its share” in tackling the drug production and trafficking from Afghanistan, which posed “a serious threat to international peace and security”, among the ranks of terrorism, arms proliferation and organized crime.⁵⁰ The representative of Angola concurred that the illicit traffic in drugs posed “a security threat to the whole region”.⁵¹

The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina

At its 4568th meeting, on 10 July 2002, the Council discussed the legal responsibility of peacekeepers to be prosecuted for crimes committed during peacekeeping operations. During the debate, the representative of the United States expressed his Government’s concern over the legal exposure of its peacekeepers under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, which had come into force on 1 July 2002. He urged the Council, based on Article 16 of the Rome Statute, to address the concerns of some Member States about the implications of the Rome Statute for countries that were not parties to it, but which wanted to continue to contribute peacekeepers to United Nations missions. He further emphasized that Article 16 of the Rome Statute enabled the Security Council to “make a renewable request to the Court not to commence or proceed with investigations or prosecutions for a 12-month period on the basis of a Chapter VII resolution”.⁵² Several speakers objected to this proposition by arguing that this was not a viable course of action since the Court’s activities did not constitute a threat to international peace and security, and hence there was no basis for a resolution under Chapter VII, such an invocation of Chapter VII being ultra vires.⁵³

Discussions in connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait mainly focused on two issues with regard to the determination of threats to the peace: whether the non-compliance by Iraq with Council decisions posed a threat to the peace, and whether the United States-led military action against Iraq constituted a threat to the peace.

Non-compliance by Iraq with Security Council decisions

By a letter dated 9 August 2000 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁵⁴ the representative of Kuwait requested the Council to urge the Government of Iraq to desist from its maintenance of an aggressive attitude that posed a “threat to security and stability in Kuwait and the region”.⁵⁵

By a letter dated 24 September 2002 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵⁶ the representative of the United Kingdom highlighted the “violent and aggressive” nature of the Iraqi regime and conveyed his Government’s concern over Iraq’s possession of weapons of mass destruction. He asserted that the existing Iraqi regime posed a “unique danger” and that there was an urgent need for a further concentrated international effort under the auspices of the United Nations to ensure that Iraq’s weapons of mass destruction could no longer pose an “international threat”.⁵⁷

At its 4625th meeting, on 16 October 2002, the Council discussed the situation between Iraq and Kuwait in the light of Iraq’s non-compliance with the Council’s resolutions. During the debate, while discussing the possibility of adopting a new resolution that would clearly set out the functions and powers of the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission (UNMOVIC) for a new round of inspections of Iraq, several speakers expressed their concern at the potential or existing threat to international peace and security posed by Iraq’s non-compliance with its disarmament obligations.⁵⁸

At its 4644th meeting, on 8 November 2002, the Council unanimously adopted resolution 1441 (2002) by which it recognized the threat to international peace and security posed by the non-compliance of Iraq with Council resolutions and the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and long-range missiles.⁵⁹ In the ensuing debate, the representative of Mexico stated that the resolution reflected the concerns of Member States in the Council about the need for Iraq to comply with its disarmament obligations and to renounce to weapons of mass destruction. He added that, should Iraq fail to comply, the Council’s response should be defined on the basis of its own determination as to the existence of a threat to international peace and security and proposed that that response be based on two clearly differentiated stages. The first stage would entail a credible process to evaluate the true military capability of Iraq and its intention to use its weapons or the ability of terrorist groups to have access to them. The second stage would entail the agreement of the Council and other States involved on the measures to be adopted, if the evaluation process detected a threat to international peace and security.⁶⁰

⁶⁰ S/PV.4644 and Corr.1, p. 6.

By a letter dated 25 November 2002 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁶¹ the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq referred to resolution 1441 (2002) and defined it as an attempt to “impose a forced interpretation of the concept of a threat to international peace and security, as referred to in Article 39 of the Charter of the United Nations, in order to justify United States aggression against Iraq”. He went on to argue that the non-compliance was “unsupported by any evidence” and that the Council was attempting to construct a “broad new interpretation of international peace and security” by considering that any interference by Iraq with inspection activities constituted such a threat. He declared that this interpretation ran counter to the principles set out in Article 39 of the Charter.⁶²

At its 4701st meeting, on 5 February 2003, the Council reviewed the progress of Iraq in fulfilling its disarmament obligations under Security Council resolution 1441 (2002). The Council also discussed the information presented by the United States regarding Iraq’s possession of weapons of mass destruction, as well as Iraq’s involvement in terrorism.⁶³ During the debate, several speakers expressed the view that the situation in Iraq and the country’s non-compliance with Council resolutions regarding disarmament posed “a threat to international peace and security”.⁶⁴ Others noted that, while Iraq might be in violation of Council resolutions, more evidence and inspections were required before further judgments and decisions could be made.⁶⁵ By contrast, the representative of Iraq maintained that his country posed no threat to regional or international peace and security since it had disarmed.⁶⁶

At its 4707th meeting, on 14 February 2003, the Council heard reports from the Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC and the Director-General of IAEA. Several representatives asserted that the situation in Iraq continued to pose a threat to international peace and security and that Iraq was in “material breach” of its Council obligations to disarm.⁶⁷ A number of speakers reaffirmed that, given the progress made by inspections and an increased degree of cooperation by Iraq, the inspections should be pursued further.⁶⁸ The representatives of France and the Russian Federation observed that since the 4701st meeting, held on 5 February 2003, the situation had ameliorated as a result of the greater effectiveness of inspections.⁶⁹ Given the absence of evidence of any forbidden activity, the representative of Iraq declared that some members of the Council were merely alleging, without any proof, the threat posed by Iraq to international peace and security.⁷⁰

At the 4709th meeting, on 18 February 2003, several speakers reiterated the view that Iraq’s possession of weapons of mass destruction and non-compliance with its obligations posed a threat to international peace and security.⁷¹ A number of representatives expressed the view that the links between States who possessed weapons of mass destruction and terrorists constituted a threat to international peace and security.⁷² The representative of Jordan insisted that the Security Council should find a peaceful solution to the crisis, and that the sanctions regime had proven to be of “unprecedented effectiveness”. He called for the sanctions regime to continue and, “if necessary, be enhanced, as its failure would constitute a threat to international peace and security”.⁷³ By contrast, other speakers stated that there was no evidence that the situation in Iraq constituted such a threat.⁷⁴

By a letter dated 24 February 2003 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁷⁵ the representatives of France, Germany and the Russian Federation stated that while suspicions remained, no evidence had been given that Iraq still possessed weapons of mass destruction or capabilities in that field.⁷⁶

At its 4714th meeting, on 7 March 2003, the Council debated the latest reports presented by the Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC and the Director-General of IAEA. Following the presentation, several speakers maintained that Iraq was not fully and unconditionally cooperating with the inspections regime and therefore remained in breach of its obligations.⁷⁷ Several representatives expressed the belief that, as a result of the progress made in the inspections regime, the inspections process needed to be continued and strengthened.⁷⁸ The representatives of the Syrian Arab Republic and Iraq noted that the latter had extensively cooperated with the inspectors and that there was no evidence of its non-compliance.⁷⁹ Similarly, the representative of Pakistan contended that the situation posed “no imminent threat to international peace and security”.⁸⁰

At its 4717th meeting, on 11 March 2003, the Council continued its debate on the compliance and implementation by Iraq of relevant Security Council resolutions. A number of speakers reiterated that Iraq was in material breach of its obligations and that the inspections could not continue indefinitely.⁸¹ The representative of Australia noted that the Security Council should recognize that threats to international security had changed and had to deal with the threat caused by the borderless scourge of international terrorism and the risk of illicit trade in prohibited and dual use items. He therefore added that it was urgent that the Council confronted this risk by disarming nations that built those weapons and defied international non-proliferation norms. He concluded that failure to do so would “both increase the immediate threat and set a precedent that we will all come to regret”.⁸² Other speakers reaffirmed that, given the progress achieved, the inspection regime needed to be maintained and provided with more time and resources to fulfill its mandate.⁸³ The representative of South Africa stressed that the Council’s reaction in the case of Iraq would define “a new international order” that would determine how the international community addressed conflict situations in the future.⁸⁴

By a letter dated 18 March 2003 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁸⁵ the representatives of Portugal, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States underlined that Saddam Hussein’s “brutal regime” still posed “a grave threat to the security of its region and the world”. They noted that Saddam Hussein had defied the resolutions of the Security Council and demanded the disarmament of his weapons of mass destruction.⁸⁶

At its 4721st meeting, on 19 March 2003, the Council heard briefings from the Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC and the Director-General of IAEA. During the discussion, the representative of Spain recalled that resolution 1441 (2002) recognized that the non-compliance of Iraq with the Council’s resolutions constituted a threat to international peace and security and decided that Iraq had failed to comply with the demands imposed by the international community. He further noted that, despite the Council having met several times to examine successive reports of the inspectors, Iraq had still not complied with the will of the international community, and, therefore, “peace and international security continue[d] unassured”.⁸⁷ By contrast, the representative of the Russian Federation argued that there was no evidence that Iraq posed such a threat. He stated that the Council, as the body bearing primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, fully shouldered its obligations by ensuring the deployment of international inspectors to Iraq and by establishing the conditions necessary for their activities. He added that if there were indisputable facts demonstrating that there was a direct threat from the territory of Iraq to the security of the United States, his country would be prepared to use “the entire arsenal of measures provided under the United Nations Charter to eliminate such a threat”. However, he concluded, the Council was not currently in possession of such evidence.⁸⁸

At its 4726th meeting, on 26 and 27 March 2003, the Council discussed the humanitarian situation in Iraq following the United States-led military action against Iraq. Several speakers maintained that Iraq had been in material breach of Council resolutions,⁸⁹ while others explicitly referred to this non-compliance as a threat to international peace and security.⁹⁰ In the view of a number of representatives, however, Iraq did not pose a threat to international peace and security.⁹¹ Several speakers pointed out that “pre-emptive” strikes had no foundation in international law.⁹²

By identical letters dated 10 July 2000 addressed to the Secretary-General and to the President of the Security Council,⁹³ the representative of Iraq informed the Council that the United States supported and financed “terrorist activities aimed at overthrowing the national regime and fomenting civil war in Iraq”, which constituted “a threat to the security and stability of a sovereign State and could also undermine security and stability in the region”.

By a series of letters addressed to the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council between November 2000 and October 2001,⁹⁴ the representative of Iraq declared that the acts of “piracy” by the United States naval forces stationed in the Arabian Gulf region represented “a serious threat to regional and international peace and security”. By another series of letters addressed to the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council between November 2000 and October 2001,⁹⁵ the representative of Iraq renewed his call to the countries participating in the “aggression” against Iraq to desist forthwith from internationally prohibited acts that violated Iraq’s sovereignty, placed its security and integrity in grave danger and posed a direct and serious threat to international peace and security.

At its 4625th meeting, on 16 October 2002, the Council convened in response to the request by South Africa to hold an emergency meeting to voice concern regarding the possibility that the United Nations was at that time being asked to consider proposals that opened up the “possibility of a war against a Member State”.⁹⁶ The representative of Yemen expressed his Government’s “grave concern” over the approach to “invade Iraq” and insisted that it constituted a “direct threat to the security and stability of the region”.⁹⁷ The representative of Lebanon declared that the Arab leaders expressed their total rejection of an attack on

Iraq and noted that a threat to the peace and security of “any Arab State” constituted “a threat to the national security of all Arab States”.⁹⁸

By identical letters dated 2 December 2002 addressed to the Secretary-General and to the President of the Security Council,⁹⁹ the representative of Iraq stated that the “imposition and enforcement of the two illegal no-flight zones” was a “tyrannical act and a flagrant breach of the Charter of the United Nations and the established principles of international law” and constituted “a serious threat to regional and international peace and security”. He also expressed the hope that the Secretary-General would “draw the attention of the Security Council” to the nature of the aggression and to the danger it posed “to peace and security in the region and throughout the world”.¹⁰⁰

At its 4709th meeting, on 18 February 2003, the Council debated Iraq’s compliance with the inspections regime regulated by resolution 1441 (2001). During the discussion, the representative of Iraq declared that the United States and the United Kingdom were continuing “their feverish efforts to launch an aggressive war” against Iraq. He held the belief that this would constitute “a dangerous precedent in international relations”, threatening the credibility of the United Nations and exposing international and regional peace and security to “grave dangers”.¹⁰¹ The representative of the League of Arab States indicated that the Arab Summit “categorically rejected any attack against Iraq or any threat against the peace and security of any Arab State” and that such “an attack was considered a threat to collective Arab national security”.¹⁰² The representative of Yemen concurred that the inspection and monitoring regime should continue and that a military “invasion” would lead to “the further destruction of Iraq and the further destabilization of the region”, which in turn would “constitute a threat to peace and security throughout the world”.¹⁰³

At the 4717th meeting, on 12 March 2003, the representative of Nigeria expressed his Government’s “deep concern over the consequences that the escalating situation regarding Iraq could have on international peace and security, in particular the adverse effects its mishandling could have on Africa”. He appealed to the international community not to take any “precipitate action” against Iraq which would be “detrimental to international peace and security”.¹⁰⁴

By two letters dated 9 and 14 March 2003, respectively, addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁰⁵ the representative of Iraq noted that the military action by joint American-British forces against Iraq posed a “threat to international peace and security”. By a subsequent letter dated 21 March 2003 addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁰⁶ the representative of Iraq qualified as “regrettable and reprehensible” that the Secretary-General had not condemned or denounced the aggression against Iraq and had not addressed any letter to the Council, under Article 99 of the Charter, to bring to its attention that such an aggression constituted “the gravest threat to international peace and security” and threatened “the fate and future of the United Nations in its very core”.¹⁰⁷

By a letter dated 24 March 2003 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁰⁸ the Permanent Observer of the League of Arab States, following the commencement of the United States-led military action against Iraq, transmitted a resolution of the League of Arab States which described the “aggression” against Iraq to be “a violation of the Charter of the United Nations and the principles of international law, a departure from international legitimacy, a threat to international peace and security and an act of defiance against the international community and world public opinion”.¹⁰⁹

At its 4726th meeting, on 26 March 2003, the Council debated the situation in Iraq following the United States-led military action. During the debate, several representatives deplored the negative impact the joint American-British military intervention in Iraq would have on various aspects of regional and international peace, security and stability.¹¹⁰ The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania underlined that, according to Article 39 of the Charter, only the Council could determine the existence of a breach of the peace or aggression and decide on an action. He warned that the “decision to go to war without the authority of the Council” would not only weaken the United Nations, but also had “the potential to endanger international peace and security”.¹¹¹

Between 2001 and 2003, at a number of meetings of the Council, Member States characterized unfolding developments in the Middle East as threats to peace and security.

At its 4438th meeting, on 14 December 2001, the Council discussed the situation in the Middle East in the light of the announcement by the Government of Israel that it would sever all contact with the Palestinian Authority and its elected leader, President Yasser Arafat. In their statements, a number of representatives characterized the situation in the Middle East as “a threat to international peace and security”.¹¹² The representative of Israel, however, objected to a draft resolution sponsored by Egypt and Tunisia,¹¹³ on the grounds that it failed to recognize “terror as the primary obstacle to peace and security in the region”.¹¹⁴

At its 4506th meeting, on 3 April 2002, the Council discussed the situation in the Middle East after a military action taken by Israeli forces in the Palestinian territory. During the debate, the representative of Tunisia declared that Israel’s “excessive recourse to military force” did not guarantee its security and could lead to “further deterioration and to a flare-up in the region as a whole, thereby creating a clear threat to international peace and security”.¹¹⁵ The representative of Chile condemned “both the horrific suicide attacks against the civilian population of Israel” and the military actions taken against Palestinian cities, labeling these events as “an affront to the civilized conscience of mankind and a threat to international peace and security”.¹¹⁶ The representative of Malaysia, speaking on behalf of the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC), pointed out that “Israeli terrorist actions and aggressive practices” posed “a threat to international peace and security” and urged the Council to take action under Chapter VII of the Charter.¹¹⁷ The representative of Morocco indicated that Israel had carried out the “collective murder of Palestinians” and that the situation had reached a level of danger that was “threatening international peace and security”.¹¹⁸ Similarly, the representative of Oman appealed to the Security Council “to fully shoulder its responsibilities” and “face up to the situation as a threat to international peace and security”.¹¹⁹ The representative of Bahrain warned that if “the Israeli occupation of the Palestinian and other occupied territories” did not end, international peace and security would be “constantly threatened”.¹²⁰ The representative of the Sudan concurred, indicating that Israel’s “real intentions” were to “push the region towards a total conflagration whose consequences, though as yet unknown, would definitely threaten international peace and security”.¹²¹ Along the same lines, the representative of Mauritius expressed his fear that an “Arab world in turmoil would have dire consequences for international peace and security, with eventual disastrous effects on the global economy”.¹²²

At its 4510th meeting, on 8 April 2002, the Council convened to discuss the situation in the Middle East after the Israeli occupation of Ramallah. The representative of Mauritius pointed out that Israel’s refusal to withdraw from the city constituted “a clear threat to international peace and security” and should not be tolerated by the Council.¹²³ Similarly, the representative of Tunisia declared that the “appalling

Israeli conduct” amounted to a clear threat to international peace and security.¹²⁴

At its 4515th meeting, on 18 April 2002, the Council discussed the situation in the Middle East in connection with a number of Israeli military actions in the Palestinian territory. The representative of Brazil urged the Council to assert its legitimate authority in dealing with the “grave threat to international peace and security”.¹²⁵ The representative of the Sudan called for “the dispatch of a multinational force to Palestine”, in the hope that it would “receive support and be implemented rapidly by the Council in its quest to maintain international peace and security”.¹²⁶

At its 4552nd meeting, on 13 June 2002, the Council discussed the situation in the Palestinian territories after Israel reoccupied Ramallah on 10 June 2002. During the debate, the representative of Ireland noted that “injustice, instability, insecurity”, and “a frozen political landscape” posed an “unacceptable and continuous threat to the region and to international peace and security” and stressed the international community’s “clear responsibility and duty to move beyond rhetoric and language”.¹²⁷

At its 4588th meeting, on 24 July 2002, the Council debated the situation in the Middle East in the light of the latest Israeli attacks in the northern part of Gaza City. During the discussion, the representative of Saudi Arabia called upon the international community “to shoulder its responsibility” with regard to that grave situation, which “threatened international peace and security”, and “to move immediately and resolutely to confront Israel with its responsibilities in conformity with relevant Security Council resolutions and international conventions”.¹²⁸ The representatives of the League of Arab States and Iraq concurred that the Israeli military actions represented “a threat to international peace and security”.¹²⁹

At its 4614th meeting, on 23 September 2003, the Council was briefed by the Secretary-General on the developments in respect of the road map to achieve a permanent settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. During the debate, the representative of Saudi Arabia emphasized that the Security Council had a responsibility to face the “injustice, denial of rights and threats to international peace and security stemming from Israeli practices”.¹³⁰

The situation in Africa

The impact of AIDS on peace and security in Africa

At its 4087th meeting, on 10 January 2000, the Council discussed the impact of HIV/AIDS on peace and security in Africa. The President of the Security Council (United States) pointed out that this was the first time the Council was discussing a health issue as a “security threat” which constituted a step away from the Council’s classic security agenda. He added that when a single disease threatened “everything, from economic strength to peacekeeping”, a security threat of the greatest magnitude was clearly to be faced.¹³¹ Taking the floor in his national capacity, the representative of the United States asserted that HIV/AIDS was “a global aggressor”, “one of the most devastating threats ever to confront the world community”.¹³² Following these opening remarks, in the ensuing debate, the majority of speakers acknowledged that HIV/AIDS posed a threat to security, economic, social, and political development in Africa and elsewhere. They highlighted that human security encompassed not only traditional threats to security but also humanitarian concerns.¹³³

Africa's food crisis as a threat to peace and security

At its 4652nd meeting, on 3 December 2002, the Council was briefed by the Executive Director of the World Food Programme (WFP) on the food crisis in Africa. During the ensuing debate, the representative of Ireland pointed out that the humanitarian situation in Southern Africa and the Horn of Africa was not only "intolerable from a moral and humanitarian perspective" but also posed "a threat to international peace and security of the most fundamental nature".¹³⁴

At its 4736th meeting, on 7 April 2003, the Council heard another report by the Executive Director of WFP. During the debate, the representative of Cameroon declared that the food crisis in Africa was a difficult and relevant issue which posed "a threat to international peace and security".¹³⁵

At its 4176th meeting, on 26 July 2000, the Council considered the latest report of the Secretary-General on children and armed conflict.¹³⁶ During the debate, several speakers expressed the view that the threat posed by armed conflict to children was a serious one that had consequences for the maintenance of international peace and security and its humanitarian aspects.¹³⁷ By contrast, the representative of India stated that, while this was a serious matter, there was no evidence that the plight of children in armed conflict represented a threat to international peace and security, and that the violation of the Convention on the Rights of the Child could not automatically be construed as a threat to international peace and security.¹³⁸

At its 4422nd meeting, on 20 November 2001, the Council discussed another report by the Secretary-General on ways to alleviate the plight of children in war situations.¹³⁹ In his statement, the representative of France emphasized that finding a way to improve the situation of children in armed conflicts posed a moral responsibility for

Justice and the rule of law: the United Nations role

At its 4833rd and 4835th meetings, on 24 and 30 September 2003 respectively, the Council discussed its responsibility to promote justice and the rule of law in its effort to maintain international peace and security. During the debate, a number of speakers recognized the relationship between the maintenance of peace and security and the promotion of the rule of law at both national and international levels.¹⁴¹

The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security: HIV/AIDS and international peacekeeping operations

At its 4172nd meeting, on 17 July 2000, the Council heard a statement by the Executive Director of the Joint United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS and adopted resolution 1308 (2000) by which it expressed its concern at the extent of the HIV/AIDS pandemic worldwide, and in Africa in particular. By the same resolution, the Council also recognized that the HIV/AIDS pandemic was exacerbated by conditions of violence and instability and, if unchecked, could pose a risk to stability and security.¹⁴² During the debate, the majority of speakers acknowledged that the HIV/AIDS pandemic was a global threat which had a security dimension and saluted the fact that the Council was addressing peacekeeping in the context of the HIV/AIDS issue, under the mantle of maintaining international peace and security.¹⁴³

At its 4259th meeting, on 19 January 2001, the Council continued its discussion of the threat posed by HIV/AIDS to international peace and security. During the debate, several representatives commended the Council for acknowledging the importance of the HIV/AIDS epidemic for peace and security, particularly in Africa.¹⁴⁴ The representative of Sweden emphasized that the spread of HIV/AIDS was not just a health issue, but also “a human development issue, an equity and equality issue and a significant threat to international peace and security” and therefore required the coordinated response of United Nations bodies, including the Council.¹⁴⁵ The representative of India pointed out that if the Council believed HIV/AIDS was a threat to international peace and security, it had “not only the right but also the duty, bearing in mind its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security”, to rule that Article 73 of the Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights (TRIPS) must be invoked to urgently provide affordable medicines that help in the treatment of the epidemic.¹⁴⁶

At its 4859th meeting, on 17 November 2003, the Council reviewed the implementation of resolution 1308 (2000). During the debate, several speakers reiterated the threat posed by the HIV/AIDS pandemic to international peace and security.¹⁴⁷

At its 4109th meeting, on 9 March 2000, the Council discussed the humanitarian consequences of conflict and the threat posed by humanitarian crises for peace and security. During the debate, several speakers emphasized that violations of international humanitarian law and human rights could pose a threat to international peace and security.¹⁴⁸ Other representatives acknowledged the connection between the humanitarian aspects of the issues before the Council and the maintenance of international peace and security.¹⁴⁹ The representative of the Russian Federation warned that, while the prevention and settlement of humanitarian crises had a direct bearing on the maintenance of regional and international stability, such violations could not be ended by taking actions that violated the Charter.¹⁵⁰ The representative of Belarus acknowledged the “human factor” as a central link in all activities to establish international peace and security, but stated that the concept of “humanitarian intervention”, which entailed ending war with war or stopping human rights violations with anti-humanitarian actions, was “illogical”.¹⁵¹ The representative of Norway endorsed the view that international law violations could threaten international peace and security and necessitated “the attention and action of the Security Council”, but insisted that the threat or use of force in international relations should have a legal basis in the Charter. He pointed out that, while a difficult humanitarian situation could be part of the Council’s assessment of whether a situation was a threat to international peace and security, it was not “in itself a sufficient legal basis for the threat or use of force”.¹⁵² The representative of Pakistan cautioned that such instances had to be assessed on a case-by-case basis and that the Council had to “be clear and certain about the purpose, scope and legitimacy” of international preventive actions in all humanitarian emergencies. He elaborated that for the humanitarian action to have general acceptance, it had to have legitimacy under international law and had to be taken in conformity with the Charter, after a breach or threat to international peace and security had been established. He also noted that a clear distinction had to be made between humanitarian crises as a result of wars, conflicts or disputes which, “by their very nature”, constituted threats to international peace and security, and other human rights issues.¹⁵³ The representatives of Brazil and the Islamic Republic of Iran urged the Council to take action only in the cases that posed real threats to international peace and security.¹⁵⁴

Proliferation of small arms and light weapons and mercenary activities: threats to peace and security in West Africa

At its 4720th meeting, on 18 March 2003, the Council unanimously adopted resolution 1467 (2003) by which it expressed its concern at the impact of the proliferation of small arms and light weapons on peace and security in West Africa.¹⁵⁵ During the debate, several speakers remarked that the proliferation of small arms, light weapons and mercenaries was a contributing factor to the conflicts and instability in West Africa. Other representatives stated that the proliferation of light weapons and the use of mercenaries in West Africa posed either a threat to international peace and security,¹⁵⁶ or a threat to peace and security in the subregion as a whole.¹⁵⁷ The representative of Cameroon asserted that the proliferation of such weapons in numerous regions of the world, particularly in West Africa, constituted “a grave threat to peace, security, stability, reconciliation and sustainable development at the individual, local, national, regional and international levels”.¹⁵⁸ The representative of the Syrian Arab Republic added that this issue posed a threat to peace and security not only in West Africa, but also in other parts of the world.¹⁵⁹

Protection of civilians in armed conflict

At its 4130th meeting, on 19 April 2000, the Council unanimously adopted resolution 1296 (2000) by which it noted that the deliberate targeting of civilian populations or other protected persons as well as the systematic, flagrant, and widespread violations of international humanitarian and human rights law in situations of armed conflict “may constitute a threat to international peace and security” and reaffirmed its readiness to consider such situations and, where necessary, “to adopt appropriate steps”.¹⁶⁰ During the debate preceding the adoption of the resolution, several representatives were in agreement that violence against civilians could pose a threat to international peace and security, and that in such cases the Council would have to act.¹⁶¹ The representative of China warned that attempts to “politicize humanitarian concerns” and interfere in other countries’ internal affairs would run counter to the principles of the Charter, and that the Council should treat the issue of civilians in armed conflict on a “case-by-case basis”.¹⁶²

At its 4312th meeting, on 23 April 2001, the Council heard a briefing by the Deputy Secretary-General who introduced the most recent report of the Secretary-General on the protection of civilians in armed conflict.¹⁶³ During the ensuing debate, the representative of the Russian Federation urged States to report “more quickly” to the Council any information on situations that could create a threat to international peace and security, including cases of deliberate refusal to provide safe and unhindered access for humanitarian personnel to civilians in need and gross violations of human rights, “where they may constitute a threat to international peace and security”.¹⁶⁴ The representative of Colombia urged the Council to consider the protection of civilians as one of the matters for which it was responsible when dealing with a situation that threatened international peace and security.¹⁶⁵ The representative of Yemen pointed out that the humanitarian dimension of conflicts had acquired special significance because of its potential “human tragedy and danger” at the national, regional and international levels, and its impact on international peace and security.¹⁶⁶

At its 4492nd meeting, on 15 March 2002, the Council continued its discussion on the protection of civilians in situations of armed conflict. In his statement, the representative of China noted that apart from the Palestinian-Israeli conflict, many armed conflicts around the world continued “to endanger the safety and security of innocent civilians and thus threaten regional and international peace and security”.¹⁶⁷

At its 4660th meeting, on 10 December 2002, the Council discussed the most recent report of the Secretary-General on the protection of civilians.¹⁶⁸ During the discussion, the representative of the Russian Federation reiterated his call to Member States to “act more promptly in conveying appropriate information to the Council” about situations that might pose a threat to the maintenance of international peace and security, including gross violations of the rights of civilians, if these posed a threat to international peace and security.¹⁶⁹ The representative of Chile stressed that the “adverse humanitarian consequences” generated by armed conflicts constituted a threat to international peace and security.¹⁷⁰

At its 4174th meeting, on 20 July 2000, the Council discussed its role in the prevention of armed conflicts. The representative of the United States reiterated his Government’s concerns about the “illicit trafficking of small arms and light weapons and the threat their uncontrolled proliferation and destabilizing accumulations” continued to pose to international peace and security.¹⁷¹ The representative of the Netherlands pointed out that, while “the overwhelming majority of present-day conflicts” on the Council’s agenda were of an internal and domestic nature, at the same time, they threatened international peace and security.¹⁷² The representative of Pakistan noted that an effective early-warning system should be developed with a view to identifying prospective conflict areas “without any discrimination” and that the international community must exercise “great care, caution and circumspection” in labeling situations as being threats to international peace and security.¹⁷³

At its 4334th meeting, on 21 June 2001, the Council considered the latest report of the Secretary-General on the prevention of armed conflict.¹⁷⁴ During the debate, the representative of Jamaica noted that the world was being constantly challenged by an increasing number of “deadly conflicts”, which threatened international peace and security as well as the social, political and economic well-being of the global community.¹⁷⁵

Small arms

By a letter dated 25 July 2001 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁷⁶ the representative of Colombia noted that it had been generally recognized in the international community that the excessive accumulation and circulation of, and the illicit trade in, small arms and light weapons posed “a global threat to peace and security”, contributed to the intensification of conflict and violence, and constituted an obstacle to peace efforts.¹⁷⁷

At its 4355th meeting, on 2 August 2001, the Council discussed the impact of the proliferation of small arms on international peace and security. During the debate, several speakers emphasized that the issue of small arms and light weapons could not be viewed in isolation from its peace and security perspective.¹⁷⁸ The representative of the Russian Federation expressed his concern with regard to the fact that the uncontrolled spread of small arms and light weapons could “pose a threat to regional peace and security”.¹⁷⁹ The representative of Mauritius reminded the Council that, in Africa, the “heavily armed negative forces” had been undermining peace and security for decades.¹⁸⁰ That point was reinforced by the representative of the Sudan who declared that Africa was the continent most affected by the threat of the proliferation of small arms and light weapons in the hands of rebel groups, thereby

“threatening peace and security in the continent”.¹⁸¹ The representative of Costa Rica drew attention to the fact that, in the hands of national armies, small arms were “a threat to international peace and security” and, in the hands of extremist groups or despotic regimes, light weapons became “a threat to internal peace and security”.¹⁸² The representative of Thailand emphasized that what made the problem of small arms an even greater threat to “international and national peace and stability” was its linkage with other problems of national and international concern, such as drug trafficking, money-laundering and cross-border terrorism. He further pointed out that when small arms were in the hands of these groups of people the threat to international and regional peace and stability increased manifold.¹⁸³

At its 4623rd meeting, on 11 October 2002, the Council was briefed by the Under-Secretary-General for Disarmament Affairs on the illicit proliferation and trade of arms and light weapons and their effects on international peace and security. During the debate, a number of representatives commented on the fact that the proliferation and illicit trade of small arms posed a threat to international peace and security.¹⁸⁴ Other speakers emphasized that, while the issue affected every region in the world, small arms were particularly prevalent in Africa.¹⁸⁵

United Nations peacekeeping

At its 4772nd meeting, on 12 June 2003, the Council discussed the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court to investigate or prosecute cases involving current or former peacekeeping personnel over acts or omissions relating to a United Nations operation. During the debate, several speakers voiced their concern with respect to resolution 1422 (2002), by which the Council had asked the Court not to commence any investigation or prosecution against peacekeeping personnel from a State not a party to the Rome Statute, unless the Council decided otherwise. They pointed out that a new resolution under

Chapter VII was about to be passed, despite the absence of any apparent threat to international peace and security, the fundamental precondition for action under Chapter VII of the Charter.¹⁸⁶

Women and peace and security

At its 4208th meeting, on 24 October 2000, the Council discussed the importance of integrating a gender perspective into the context of maintaining peace and security, as well as of considering the role of women in promoting peace and security. In his statement, the Executive Director of the United Nations Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM) stated that the topic of women and peace and security was a salient one especially considering that the “intertwining forces of conflict and gender inequality” threatened international peace and security.¹⁸⁷ The representative of Egypt noted that discussing “the conditions of women under occupation” would “prove the Council’s seriousness” when tackling humanitarian matters that might threaten international peace and security.¹⁸⁸ The representative of Australia felt that such a thematic debate contributed to “new ways of thinking about what constituted threats to international peace and security” and how to deal with them.¹⁸⁹

Conflicts in Africa: Security Council missions and United Nations mechanisms to promote peace and security

At its 4766th meeting, on 30 May 2003, the Council held a wrap-up meeting to discuss Security Council missions and United Nations mechanisms to promote peace and security in Africa. During the debate, the representative of the Russian Federation pointed out that armed groups were frequently manipulated from abroad and became “an extension of the interests of neighbouring countries”. He declared that this phenomenon had become “regional in nature”, and posed a threat to international peace and security.¹⁹⁰

Part II

Provisional measures to prevent the aggravation of a situation in accordance with Article 40 of the Charter

Article 40

In order to prevent an aggravation of the situation, the Security Council may, before making the recommendations or deciding upon the measures provided for in Article 39, call upon the parties concerned to comply with such provisional measures as it deems necessary or desirable. Such provisional measures shall be without prejudice to the rights, claims, or position of the parties concerned. The Security Council shall duly take account of failure to comply with such provisional measures.

Note

During the period under consideration, the Security Council did not adopt any resolution explicitly invoking Article 40. In a number of resolutions adopted under Chapter VII, the Council, without expressly referring to Article 40, called upon the parties to comply with certain provisional measures in order to prevent an aggravation of the situation concerned. During the period 2000 to 2003, types of measures that could be assumed as falling under Article 40 included the following: (a) the withdrawal of armed forces; (b) the cessation of hostilities; (c) the conclusion or observance of a ceasefire; (d) the negotiation of differences and disputes; (e) compliance with obligations under international humanitarian law; (f) the creation of the conditions necessary for unimpeded delivery of humanitarian assistance; and (g) cooperation with peacekeeping efforts and humanitarian assistance. Some of the specific measures that the Council called upon the parties concerned to take are outlined in section A. A number of Council resolutions contained the warning that, in the event of failure to comply with the terms of those resolutions, the Council would meet again and consider further steps. Those warnings, which might be considered as falling under Article 40, were expressed in various ways. In a number of instances, the Council warned that it would consider taking further measures if its calls were not heeded.¹⁹¹

¹⁹¹ See, for example, resolution 1355 (2001), para. 28.

During the Council's deliberations in the period under review there was no significant constitutional discussion regarding Article 40, but only occasional references by Member States in their statements.

The situation in Côte d'Ivoire

By resolution 1479 (2003) of 13 May 2003, noting the existence of challenges to the stability of Côte d'Ivoire and determining that the situation in the country constituted a threat to international peace and security in the region, the Council appealed to all Ivorian political forces to implement fully and without delay the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement.¹⁹² The Council also requested all Ivorian parties to cooperate with the United Nations Mission in Côte d'Ivoire in the execution of its mandate as well as to ensure the freedom of movement of its personnel throughout the country and the unimpeded and safe movement of the personnel of humanitarian agencies.¹⁹³

By a statement of the President dated 13 November 2003,¹⁹⁴ Council members urged all Ivorian political forces to implement fully, without delay or precondition all the provisions of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement, as well as those of the agreement reached in Accra on 8 March 2003 with a view to open, free and transparent elections being held in Côte d'Ivoire in 2005. In a subsequent statement by the President dated 4 December 2003,¹⁹⁵ the Council members strongly underscored to all the Ivorian parties their fundamental responsibility to respect the ceasefire in accordance with the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement, and called on all the parties to refrain from any act, as well as any incitement to such acts, that could compromise respect of the ceasefire. The Council also reiterated its call upon all parties in Côte d'Ivoire and countries of the region to guarantee the safety and full access of humanitarian agency personnel working in the field during the consolidation of the peace process.

By resolution 1291 (2000) of 24 February 2000, the Council called upon all parties in the Democratic Republic of the Congo to ensure the safe and unhindered access of relief personnel to all those in need, and recalled that the parties should also provide guarantees for the safety, security and freedom of movement for United Nations and associated humanitarian relief personnel. The Council also called upon all parties to cooperate with the International Committee of the Red Cross to enable it to carry out its mandates as well as the tasks entrusted to it under the Ceasefire Agreement. Additionally, the Council called upon all parties to the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo to protect human rights and respect international humanitarian law.¹⁹⁶

By resolution 1304 (2000) of 16 June 2000, expressing its serious concern at the humanitarian situation and the continuation of hostilities in the country, the Council demanded, inter alia, (a) that Ugandan and Rwandan forces, as well as forces of the Congolese armed opposition and other armed groups, immediately and completely withdraw from Kisangani, and called upon all parties to the Ceasefire Agreement to respect the demilitarization of the city and its environs; (b) that Uganda and Rwanda, which had violated the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, withdraw all their forces from the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo without further delay, in conformity with the timetable of the Ceasefire Agreement and the Kampala Disengagement Plan; (c) that each phase of withdrawal completed by Ugandan and Rwandan forces be reciprocated by the other parties in conformity with the same timetable; (d) that all other foreign military presence and activity, direct and indirect, in the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo be brought to an end, in conformity with the provisions of the Ceasefire Agreement; and (e) that all parties abstain from any offensive action during the process of disengagement and withdrawal of foreign forces. By the same resolution, the Council also demanded that the parties to the Ceasefire Agreement cooperate with the deployment of the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (MONUC) to the areas of operation deemed necessary by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, including by lifting restrictions on the freedom of movement of MONUC personnel and by ensuring their security. It further demanded that all parties comply in particular with the provisions of the Ceasefire Agreement relating to the normalization of the security situation along the borders of the Democratic Republic of the Congo with its neighbours.¹⁹⁷

By resolution 1341 (2001) of 22 February 2001, the Council demanded that the Ugandan and Rwandan forces, as well as all other foreign forces, withdraw from the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo in compliance with resolution 1304 (2000) and the Ceasefire Agreement, and urged those forces to take urgent steps to accelerate that withdrawal. The Council further demanded that all parties refrain from any offensive military action during the process of disengagement and withdrawal of foreign forces and that all armed forces and groups concerned bring an effective end to the recruitment, training and use of children in their armed forces. The Council also called upon the parties to extend full cooperation to MONUC, the United Nations Children's Fund and humanitarian organizations for the speedy demobilization, return and rehabilitation of such children.¹⁹⁸

By resolution 1355 (2001) of 15 June 2001, the Council reiterated its demand to the Ugandan and Rwandan forces and all other foreign forces to withdraw from the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo in compliance with previous Council's resolutions and the Ceasefire Agreement. Expressing concern at recent reports of military operations in North Kivu and South Kivu, the Council called upon all parties to refrain from any offensive action during the process of disengagement and withdrawal of foreign forces.¹⁹⁹ The Council also demanded that the Rassemblement congolais pour la démocratie demilitarize Kisangani in accordance with resolution 1304 (2000), and that all parties respect the demilitarization of the city and its environs.²⁰⁰ Finally, it demanded that all parties, including the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, cease immediately all forms of assistance and cooperation with all armed groups as referred to in the Ceasefire Agreement. The Council also expressed its readiness to consider possible measures which could be imposed, in accordance with its responsibilities and obligations under the Charter, in case of failure by parties to comply fully with the present resolution and other relevant resolutions.²⁰¹

By resolution 1399 (2002) of 19 March 2002, while condemning the resumption of fighting in the Moliro area and stressing that this constituted a major violation of the ceasefire, the Council demanded the immediate withdrawal of the Rassemblement congolais pour la démocratie-Goma troops from the areas of Moliro and Pweto, and further demanded that all parties withdraw to the defensive positions called for in the Harare disengagement sub-plans.²⁰²

Welcoming the signature by the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Rwanda of the Peace Agreement at Pretoria on 30 July 2002, as well as the signature by the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Uganda of the Luanda Agreement, by resolution 1445 (2002) of 4 December 2002, the Council called for a full cessation of hostilities involving regular forces and armed groups throughout the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, in particular in South Kiwu and in Ituri, and also called for the cessation of all support to the armed groups as referred to in the Ceasefire Agreement. The Council also called upon all parties to provide full access to MONUC and the Third Party Verification Mechanism throughout the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, including inside all ports, airports, airfields, military bases and border crossings. By the same resolution, the Council reiterated its demand for Kisangani to be demilitarized without further delay and demanded that all parties work to the immediate full restoration of freedom of movement on the Congo river.²⁰³

By resolution 1468 (2003) of 20 March 2003, the Council demanded that all parties to the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and in particular in Ituri, ensure the security of civilian population and grant to MONUC and to humanitarian organizations full and unimpeded access to the populations in need.²⁰⁴

By resolution 1484 (2003) of 30 May 2003, while deploying an Interim Emergency Multinational Force in Bunia, the Council demanded that all parties to the conflict in Ituri, in particular in Bunia, cease hostilities immediately, and reiterated that international humanitarian law must be respected. It also demanded that all Congolese parties and all States in the Great Lakes region respect human rights, cooperate with the Multinational Force and with MONUC in the stabilization of the situation in Bunia. The Council further demanded that the parties provide full freedom of movement to the Multinational Force and refrain from any military activity or from any activity that could further destabilize the situation in Ituri. In that regard, the Council demanded also the cessation of all support, in particular weapons and any other military materiel, to the armed groups and militias, and further demanded that all Congolese parties and all States in the region actively prevent the supply of such support.²⁰⁵

By resolution 1493 (2003) of 28 July 2003, the Council demanded that all the parties desist from any interference with the freedom of movement of United Nations personnel, and recalled that all the parties had the obligation to provide full and unhindered access to MONUC to allow it to carry out its mandate. The Council further demanded that all parties provide full access to military observers from MONUC, including in ports, airports, airfields, military bases and border crossings.²⁰⁶

By resolution 1297 (2000) of 12 May 2000, while stressing that the situation between Eritrea and Ethiopia constituted a threat to peace and security, the Council demanded that both parties cease immediately all military action and refrain from the further use of force and further demanded the earliest possible

The Council also reiterated its demand to reconvene as soon as possible, without preconditions, substantive peace talks, which would conclude a peaceful definitive settlement of the conflict.²⁰⁸

The situation in Liberia

By resolution 1497 (2003) of 1 August 2003, while authorizing the establishment of a Multinational Force in Liberia, the Council called upon all Liberian parties and Member States to cooperate fully with the Multinational Force in the execution of its mandate and to respect the security and freedom of movement of the Multinational Force, as well as to ensure the safe and unimpeded access of international humanitarian personnel to populations in need in Liberia.²⁰⁹

By a statement of the President dated 27 August 2003,²¹⁰ the Council expressed its concern at the humanitarian situation in Liberia and called upon all parties to allow full, secure and unimpeded access for humanitarian agencies and personnel. It further urged all parties to respect fully the ceasefire and to implement fully all their commitments under the Comprehensive Peace Agreement signed in Accra on 18 August 2003.

The Council also called upon all parties to cooperate fully in the deployment and operations of the United Nations Mission in Liberia (UNMIL), including by ensuring the

By the same resolution, the Council further called upon all parties to ensure, in accordance with relevant provisions of international law, the full, safe and unhindered access of relief personnel to all those in need and the delivery of humanitarian assistance, in particular to internally displaced persons and refugees.²¹¹

By resolution 1521 (2003) of 22 December 2003, the Council urged all parties to the Comprehensive Peace Agreement to implement fully their commitments and fulfill their responsibilities in the National Transitional Government of Liberia, and not to hinder the restoration of the Government's authority throughout the country, particularly over natural resources.²¹²

By resolution 1333 (2000) of 19 December 2000, the Council demanded that the Taliban comply with resolution 1267 (1999) and, in particular, cease the provision of sanctuary and training for international terrorists and their organizations. The Council also demanded that the Taliban comply without further delay with its demand in paragraph 2 of resolution 1267 (1999) that required the Taliban to turn over Osama bin Laden to appropriate authorities. Further, it demanded that the Taliban act swiftly to close all camps training terrorists within the territory under its control. B. Discussion relating to Article 40

During the Council's deliberations in the period under review, there was no significant constitutional discussion regarding Article 40. However, there were occasional references made to it or its language in order to support a specific demand relating to the question under consideration. For instance, at the 4515th meeting, held on 18 April 2002 in connection with the situation in the Middle East, including the Palestinian question, the representative of Morocco referred to Article 40 as a basis for the Council to adopt "provisional measures" to prevent the aggravation of the situation in the occupied Arab territories.²¹⁹

Part III

Measures not involving the use of armed force in accordance with Article 41 of the Charter

Article 41

The Security Council may decide what measures not involving the use of armed force are to be employed to give effect to its decisions, and it may call upon the Members of the United Nations to apply such measures. These may include complete or partial interruption of economic relations and of rail, sea, air, postal, telegraphic, radio, and other means of communication, and the severance of diplomatic relations.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council imposed or modified measures under Chapter VII, of the type provided for in Article 41, in connection with Afghanistan, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Eritrea and Ethiopia, Iraq, Liberia, Sierra Leone and Somalia, after having determined, in each case, the existence of a breach of the peace or a threat to the peace. During the period under consideration, the Council terminated measures imposed under Article 41 against Angola, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the Sudan and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.

In this part, section A outlines the decisions of the Security Council imposing, modifying or terminating measures under Article 41 of the Charter.²²⁰ Section B reflects the constitutional discussion in the meetings of the Council arising in connection with the adoption of some of those resolutions. It also includes salient issues raised in the Council's deliberations with reference to general matters relating to sanctions.

²²⁰ See Chapter V, part I, section B.

A. Decisions of the Security Council relating to Article 41

The situation in Afghanistan

Strengthening of measures imposed against Al-Qaida and the Taliban

By resolution 1333 (2000) of 19 December 2000, the Council reaffirmed its previous resolution 1267 (1999) which had imposed limited air embargo and financial sanctions on the Taliban, and imposed a wider range of measures that would come into force after one month for a period of 12 months. More specifically, the Council decided that States should freeze the funds of Osama bin Laden and individuals and entities associated with him. The Council also imposed an arms embargo over the territory of Afghanistan under control by the Taliban.²²¹ By the same resolution, the Committee established pursuant to resolution 1267 (1999) was requested to fulfil its mandate, in addition to those set out in resolution 1267 (1999), by undertaking the following tasks: (a) to establish and maintain updated lists based on information provided by States, and by regional and international organizations, of all points of entry and landing areas for aircraft within the territory of Afghanistan under control by the Taliban and to notify Member States of the contents of such lists; (b) to establish and maintain updated lists, based on information provided by States and regional organizations, of individuals and entities designated as being associated with Osama bin Laden; (c) to give consideration to, and decide upon, requests for the exceptions set out in the resolution; (d) to establish and maintain an updated list of approved organizations and governmental relief agencies which were providing humanitarian assistance to Afghanistan; (e) to make relevant information regarding implementation of those measures publicly available through appropriate media; (f) to consider, where and when appropriate, a visit to countries in the region by the Chairman of the Committee and such other members as might be required to enhance the full and effective implementation of the measures imposed by resolutions 1267 (1999) and 1333 (2000), with a view to urging States to comply with relevant Council resolutions; and (g) to make periodic reports to the Council on information submitted to it regarding resolutions 1267 (1999) and 1333 (2000), including possible violations of the measures reported to the Committee and recommendations for strengthening the effectiveness of those measures.²²² Finally, the Council requested the Secretary-General to appoint a committee of experts to make recommendations on how the arms embargo and the closure of terrorist camps could be monitored and to review the humanitarian implications of the measures imposed by resolutions 1267 (1999) and by resolution 1333 (2000).²²³

By resolution 1363 (2001) of 30 July 2001, the Council requested the Secretary-General to establish, in consultations with the Committee, a mechanism, comprised of a Monitoring Group, for a period of twelve months (a) to monitor the implementation of the measures imposed by resolutions 1267 (1999) and 1333 (2000); (b) to offer assistance to States bordering the territory of Afghanistan under Taliban control and other States in order to increase their capacity regarding the implementation of the measures imposed by resolutions 1267 (1999) and 1333 (2000); and (c) to collate, assess, verify wherever possible, report and make recommendations on information regarding violations of the measures imposed by resolutions 1267 (1999) and 1333 (2000).²²⁴

Termination of aviation sanctions

By resolution 1388 (2002) of 15 January 2002, the Council noted that Ariana Afghan Airlines was no longer owned, leased or operated by or on behalf of the Taliban, nor were its funds and other financial resources owned or controlled by the Taliban. It thus decided that the aviation-related and financial measures of resolution 1267 (1999) did not apply to Ariana Afghan Airlines aircraft or its funds and other financial resources. The Council also decided to terminate the measures calling for the closure of the airline's foreign offices in resolution 1333 (2000).²²⁵

By resolution 1390 (2002) of 16 January 2002, the Council decided to terminate the aviation sanctions imposed by resolution 1267 (1999).²²⁶

Modification of financial, travel and arms sanctions imposed against Al-Qaida and the Taliban

By resolution 1390 (2002) of 16 January 2002, the Council determined that the Taliban had failed to respond to the demands contained in resolutions 1214 (1998), 1267 (1999) and 1333 (2000). By the same resolution, the Council modified the sanctions regime originally imposed by resolutions 1267 (1999) and 1333 (2000) by further expanding the financial measures to include individuals and entities associated with Osama bin Laden, Al-Qaida and the Taliban as designated by the Committee. It decided that all States would ban the entry into or transit through their territories of those individuals, and decided also to review the travel ban in 12 months. The Council also requested the Secretary-General to assign the Monitoring Group to monitor, for a period of 12 months, the implementation of the measures, including the freezing of assets, the travel ban and the arms embargo, imposed and strengthened by the same resolution.²²⁷

By resolution 1452 (2002) of 20 December 2002, the Council decided that the financial measures imposed by resolutions 1267 (1999) and 1390 (2002) against the Taliban, Osama bin Laden, Al-Qaida and entities associated with them, did not apply to funds and other financial assets or economic resources that were determined by the relevant State(s) to be necessary for basic and extraordinary expenses.²²⁸

By resolution 1455 (2003) of 17 January 2003, the Council decided to improve the implementation of the freezing of assets, the travel ban and the arms embargo targeting Osama bin Laden, the Al-Qaida organization and the Taliban, as well as individuals and entities associated with them, as contained in the list maintained by the Committee, pursuant to resolutions 1267 (1999), 1333 (2000) and 1390 (2002). In addition, the Council called for an updated report from Member States on the implementation of the measures referred to above and reappointed the Monitoring Group to monitor for a further period of 12 months the implementation of the measures and to follow up on relevant leads relating to any incomplete implementation of those measures²²⁹.

The situation in Angola

Modification of measures imposed in connection with the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola

By resolution 1295 (2000) of 18 April 2000, the Council expressed its concern at violations of the measures relating to arms, petroleum, diamonds, finance, travel and aviation, imposed against the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola (UNITA) by resolutions 864 (1993), 1127 (1997) and 1173 (1998), at the reports of the supplying to UNITA of military assistance and of the presence of foreign mercenaries. The Council therefore requested the Secretary-General to establish a monitoring mechanism.²³⁰ By a number of subsequent resolutions the mandate of the monitoring mechanism was extended until 19 October 2002.²³¹

By resolution 1412 (2002) of 17 May 2002, welcoming the signing of a peace agreement by the Government of Angola and UNITA, the Council decided to suspend for 90 days the travel sanctions imposed against UNITA by resolution 1127 (1997).²³² The suspension was renewed by resolution 1432 (2002) of 15 August 2002 for an additional period of 90 days, with a view to encouraging further the peace process and national reconciliation in Angola.²³³

Termination of measures imposed against the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola

By resolution 1439 (2002) of 18 October 2002, the Council decided to lift the travel sanctions imposed against UNITA from 14 November 2002 onwards and to extend the mandate of the Monitoring Mechanism until 19 December 2002.²³⁴

By resolution 1448 (2002) of 9 December 2002, the Council decided to terminate with immediate effect the arms and petroleum embargo imposed by resolution 864 (1993), the travel and aviation-related measures imposed by resolution 1127 (1997) and the financial, diplomatic and commodity measures imposed by resolution 1173 (1998). It also decided to dissolve the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 864 (1993) concerning Angola.²³⁵

Embargo on arms deliveries to the Democratic Republic of the Congo

By resolution 1493 (2003) of 28 July 2003, the Council decided that all States, for an initial period of 12 months, were to take the necessary measures to prevent the supply, sale or transfer of arms and any related materiel, and the provision of any assistance, advice or training related to military activities, to all foreign and Congolese armed groups and militias operating in the territory of North and South Kivu and of Ituri, and to groups not party to the Global and All-inclusive Agreement on the Transition in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. The Council also decided that exceptions to those measures were to be considered, including supplies to the United Nations Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the Interim Emergency Multinational Force deployed in Bunia and the integrated Congolese national army and police forces, as well as supplies of non-lethal military equipment intended solely for humanitarian or protective use and related technical assistance and training.²³⁶

The situation between Eritrea and Ethiopia

Embargo on arms deliveries to Eritrea and Ethiopia

By resolution 1298 (2000) of 17 May 2000, the Council, “deeply disturbed by the continuation of fighting between Eritrea and Ethiopia”, decided that all States were to prevent the sale or supply to Eritrea and

Ethiopia of arms and related materiel, and the provision of any related technical assistance or training. The Council further decided that the above measures should not apply to supplies of non-lethal military equipment intended solely for humanitarian use. By the same resolution, the Council established a committee to monitor the implementation and violations of these measures and decided that the measures imposed were established for 12 months, at the end of which the Council would decide whether the Governments of Eritrea and Ethiopia had complied with demands to cease all military action, withdraw from military engagement and convene peace talks, and, accordingly, whether to extend those measures.²³⁷ By resolutions 1312 (2000) of 31 July 2000 and 1320 (2000) of 15 September 2000, the Council decided that the measures imposed by resolution 1298 (2000) would not apply to the sale or supply of equipment for the use of the United Nations Mine Action Service and the United Nations in general.²³⁸

Termination of the embargo on arms deliveries to Eritrea and Ethiopia

By a statement of the President dated 15 May 2001,²³⁹ Council members noted that the arms embargo imposed on the parties by resolution 1298 (2000) would expire on 16 May 2001. The Council recognized that the Algiers Agreements were consistent with the demands of the Council in that resolution, and therefore decided that the measures imposed were not to be extended beyond 16 May 2001. The Council also expressed its intention to take appropriate measures if the situation between Eritrea and Ethiopia again threatened regional peace and security.

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

Modification of measures imposed against Iraq

By resolution 1293 (2000) of 31 March 2000, the Council decided that up to a total of $600 million from the escrow account established pursuant to resolutions 1242 (1999) and 1281 (1999) could be used to meet any reasonable expenses, other than expenses payable in Iraq, pursuant to the provisions of paragraphs 28 and 29 of resolution 1284 (1999).²⁴⁰

By resolution 1302 (2000) of 8 June 2000, the Council, convinced of the need, as a temporary measure, to continue to provide for the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people, decided that the oil-for-food provisions of resolution 986 (1995) would be extended for a further period of six months.²⁴¹ That provision was renewed by several subsequent resolutions.²⁴²

By resolution 1352 (2001) of 1 June 2001, the Council expressed its intention to consider new arrangements for the sale or supply of commodities and products to Iraq and for the facilitation of civilian trade and economic cooperation with Iraq in civilian sectors, so that such new arrangements would improve significantly the flow of commodities and products to Iraq and improve the controls to prevent the sale or supply of prohibited or unauthorized items.²⁴³

By resolution 1382 (2001) of 29 November 2001, the Council noted the proposed Goods Review List and the procedures for its application, and decided to adopt the List and the procedures, subject to further modification, for implementation beginning on 30 May 2002.²⁴⁴

By resolution 1409 (2002) of 14 May 2002, the Council significantly changed the modalities of the oil-for-food programme, easing the supply of humanitarian goods to Iraq, while strengthening control over dual-use items. It decided to adopt, beginning on 30 May 2002, the proposed Goods Review List annexed to resolution 1382 (2001) and the revised procedures for its application attached to resolution 1409 (2002) as a basis for the humanitarian programme in Iraq.²⁴⁵ The Council, therefore, authorized States to permit the sale or supply of any commodities or products, other than those related to military products and subject to the procedures of the Goods Review List, and authorized the use of the funds in the escrow account to finance the sale or supply to Iraq of such goods.²⁴⁶

By resolution 1472 (2003) of 28 March 2003, the Council, following the commencement of military action in Iraq, recognized that in view of the exceptional circumstances prevailing in Iraq, technical and temporary adjustments should be made to the oil-for-food programme so as to ensure the implementation of the approved funded and non-funded contracts concluded by the Government of Iraq for the humanitarian relief of the people of Iraq. The Council therefore authorized the Secretary-General to undertake various steps to establish those measures, and expressed its readiness to consider making additional funds available to meet the humanitarian needs of the people of Iraq. It further decided that all applications outside the oil-for-food programme for distribution or use in Iraq of emergency humanitarian supplies and equipment, other than medicines, health supplies and foodstuffs, would be reviewed by the Committee.²⁴⁷ Those measures were extended by resolutions 1476 (2003) of 24 April 2003 and 1483 (2003) of 22 May 2003.

Termination and replacement of measures imposed against Iraq

By resolution 1483 (2003) of 22 May 2003, the Council decided (a) with the exception of the arms embargo, to lift the civilian sanctions imposed on Iraq following its invasion of Kuwait in 1990; and (b) to request the Secretary-General to terminate the oil-for-food programme within six months of the adoption of the resolution. By the same resolution, the Council further reduced the level of proceeds of all export sales of Iraqi petroleum, petroleum products and natural gas to be deposited into the Compensation Fund to 5 per cent. The Council also decided that all Member States in which there were financial assets or funds of the previous Government of Iraq, Saddam Hussein or other senior officials of the former Iraqi regime and their immediate family members, including entities owned or controlled indirectly or directly by them, should freeze those financial assets or funds or economic resources and immediately transfer them to the provisions until 4 December 2002; by its subsequent resolution, 1447 (2002), the Council decided to consider necessary adjustments to the Goods Review List for adoption within 30 days; and by resolution 1454 (2002), the Council approved the implementation of the adjustments to the Goods Review List specified in annex A to the resolution.

By resolution 1518 (2003) of 24 November 2003, the Council established a committee to continue to identify, in accordance with paragraphs 19 and 23 of resolution 1483 (2003), individuals and entities referred to in paragraph 19 of that resolution, including by updating the list of individuals and entities identified by the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990), and to report on its work to the Council.²⁴⁹

Termination of measures imposed against Liberia

By resolution 1343 (2001) of 7 March 2001, noting that the conflict in Liberia had been resolved, the Council decided to terminate the arms embargo imposed by resolution 788 (1992) and to dissolve the committee established under resolution 985 (1995).²⁵⁰

Imposition of arms, diamond and travel sanctions against Liberia

By resolution 1343 (2001) of 7 March 2001, after demanding that the Government of Liberia cease its support for the Revolutionary United Front in Sierra Leone and for other armed rebel groups in the region, the Council decided to establish a new set of sanctions measures. It decided that all States, for a period of 14 months, with a few exemptions, were to take the necessary measures to prevent the sale or supply to Liberia of arms and related materiel, technical training or assistance.²⁵¹ The Council also decided that all

States were to take the necessary measures to prevent the direct or indirect import of all rough diamonds from Liberia and that this measure would come into force after two months for a period of 12 months unless the Council determined before that date that Liberia had complied with its demands.²⁵² The Council further decided that, unless otherwise decided by the Committee on a case-by-case basis, all States were to take the necessary measures to prevent the entry into or transit through their territories of senior members of the Government of Liberia and its armed forces and their spouses and any other individuals providing financial and military support to armed rebel groups in countries neighbouring Liberia, in particular RUF in Sierra Leone.²⁵³ The Council requested the Secretary-General to establish a Committee of the Security Council to monitor the implementation of the above measures as well as a Panel of Experts to investigate any violations of the measures imposed.²⁵⁴

By resolution 1408 (2002) of May 2002, the Council decided that the measures imposed by resolution 1343 (2001) would remain in force for a further period of 12 months. By the same resolution, the Council requested the Secretary-General to re-establish the Panel of Experts for a further period of three months to conduct a follow-up assessment mission to Liberia and neighbouring States, in order to investigate and compile a report (a) on the Government of Liberia's compliance with the Council's demand in resolution 1343 (2001) concerning cessation of the Government's support for RUF in Sierra Leone and other armed rebel groups in the region; (b) on the potential economic, humanitarian and social impact on the Liberian population of the measures imposed by

Imposition of timber sanctions against Liberia

By resolution 1478 (2003) of 6 May 2003, the Council decided that the Government of Liberia had not complied fully with the demands in resolution 1343 (2001). The Council therefore decided that the measures imposed by resolution 1343 (2001), namely the arms embargo, the ban on the import of rough diamonds and the travel restrictions, would remain in force for an additional period of 12 months. In addition, it decided that all States were to take the necessary measures to prevent the import into their territories of all round logs and timber products originating in Liberia, to come into force on 7 July 2003 for a period of ten months. By the same resolution, the Council requested the Secretary-General to re-establish the Panel of Experts, for a period of five months, to conduct a follow-up assessment mission to Liberia and neighbouring States.²⁵⁶

Modification of measures imposed against Liberia

By resolution 1521 (2003) of 22 December 2003, noting the changed circumstances in Liberia, in particular, the departure of former President Charles Taylor, the formation of the National Transitional Government of Liberia and progress with the peace process in Sierra Leone, the Council dissolved the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 1343 (2001) concerning Liberia and terminated the measures imposed by resolutions 1343 (2001) and 1478 (2003). By the same resolution, the Council decided to establish a new set of measures for a period of 12 months, and a new Committee to oversee the implementation of the newly imposed measures.²⁵⁷ The Council decided that, with a few exemptions, all States should take the necessary measures to prevent the sale or supply to Liberia of arms and related materiel of all types and related technical training or assistance.²⁵⁸ The Council also

By the same resolution, the Council requested the Secretary-General to establish a five-member Panel of Experts, for a period of five months, (a) to conduct a follow-up assessment mission to Liberia and neighbouring States; (b) to report on the implementation of the sanctions measures, and to assess progress made towards the goals set out by the Council for the lifting of sanctions; and (c) to report to the Council through the Committee no later than 30 May 2004 with observations and recommendations, including, inter alia, how to minimize any humanitarian and socio-economic impact of the measures imposed by the same resolution.²⁶⁰

²⁵⁹ Resolution 1521 (2003), para. 4. By the same resolution, the Council further specified that these measures would be applicable (a) to those senior members of former President Charles Taylor's Government and their spouses and members of Liberia's former armed forces who retained links to former President Charles Taylor; (b) to those individuals determined to be in violation of the arms embargo; and (c) to any other individuals, or individuals associated with entities providing financial or military support to armed rebel groups in Liberia or in countries in the region. The Council decided that these measures would not apply where the Committee determined that such travel was justified on the grounds of humanitarian need or where the Committee concluded that an exemption would otherwise further the objectives of peace, stability and democracy in Liberia and lasting peace in the subregion.

The situation in Sierra Leone

Exemptions to the embargo on arms deliveries to Sierra Leone

By resolution 1299 (2000) of 19 May 2000, the Council decided that the arms embargo imposed by resolution 1171 (1998) did not apply to the sale or supply of arms and related materiel for the sole use in Sierra Leone of those Member States cooperating with the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL) and the Government of Sierra Leone.²⁶¹

Embargo on diamond imports from Sierra Leone

By resolution 1306 (2000) of 5 July 2000, the Council expressed its concern at the role played by the illicit trade in diamonds in fuelling the conflict in Sierra Leone and at reports that such diamonds transited through neighbouring countries. The Council therefore decided that all States were to take the necessary measures to prohibit the import of all rough diamonds from Sierra Leone. It further decided that rough diamonds controlled by the Government of Sierra Leone through the certificate of origin regime would be exempt from these measures once the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 1132 (1997) concerning Sierra Leone had reported that an effective regime was in operation. The Council decided to establish the measures for a period of 18 months, at the end of which the Council would review the situation in Sierra Leone, including the extent of the Government's authority over the diamond-producing areas, in order to decide whether to extend or modify the measures for a further period. It also requested the Secretary-General to establish a Panel of Experts to collect information on possible violations of the measures and the link between the trade in diamonds and the trade in arms and related materiel.²⁶² The Council renewed the above measures by resolutions 1385 (2001) and 1446 (2002), stressing that they should be terminated immediately whenever the Council deemed it appropriate.²⁶³

The situation in Somalia

Exemptions to the embargo on arms deliveries to Somalia

By resolution 1356 (2001) of 19 June 2001, the Council decided on exemptions to the arms embargo imposed by resolution 733 (1992). In particular, it decided that those measures would not apply to protective clothing, including flak jackets and military helmets, temporarily exported to Somalia by United Nations personnel, representatives of the media and humanitarian and development workers and associated personnel for their personal use only, or to supplies of non-lethal military equipment intended solely for humanitarian or protective use.²⁶⁴

Strengthening of measures imposed against Somalia

By resolution 1407 (2002) of 3 May 2002, the Council requested the Secretary-General to establish, in preparation for a Panel of Experts, a team of experts to provide the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 751 (1992) with an action plan detailing the resources and expertise that the panel of experts would require in order to generate independent information on violations of the arms embargo and for improving its enforcement.²⁶⁵

By resolution 1425 (2002) of 22 July 2002, the Council decided that the arms embargo imposed by resolution 733 (1992) should also prohibit the direct or indirect supply to Somalia of technical advice, financial and other assistance, and training related to military activities. It requested the Secretary-General to establish a panel of experts in order to generate independent information on violations of the arms embargo and as a step towards implementing and strengthening the embargo.²⁶⁶ The Panel was subsequently re-established by resolution 1474 (2003) of 8 April 2003.²⁶⁷

Letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991 from France, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America

Termination of measures

By resolution 1506 (2003) of 12 September 2003, the Council welcomed the letter dated 15 August 2003 from the delegation of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya,²⁶⁹ recounting steps taken by the Government to comply with resolutions 731 (1992), 748 (1992), 883 (1993) and 1192 (1998). The Council therefore decided to lift with immediate effect the aviation, travel, arms, diplomatic, representation, financial and petroleum-related measures imposed by resolution 748 (1992) and resolution 883 (1993). It also dissolved the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 748 (1992).²⁷⁰

Security Council resolution 1054 (1996) of 26 April 1996

Termination of measures

By resolution 1372 (2001) of 28 September 2001, the Council noted the steps taken by the Government of the Sudan to comply with the provisions of resolutions 1054 (1996) and 1070 (1996). It welcomed the accession of the Sudan to the relevant international conventions for the elimination of terrorism, its ratification of the 1997 International Convention for the Suppression of Terrorist Bombings²⁷¹ and its signing of the 1999 International Convention for the Suppression of Financing of Terrorism. It therefore decided to lift with immediate effect the diplomatic,

These steps related to the destruction of Pan Am flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland and Union de transports aeriens flight 772 over Niger, and involved accepting responsibility for the actions of Libyan officials, payment of appropriate compensation, renunciation of terrorism and a commitment to cooperating with any further requests for information in connection with the investigation.

Security Council resolution 1160 (1998)
of 31 March 1998

Termination of measures

By resolution 1367 (2001) of 10 September 2001, emphasizing the continuing authority of the Secretary-General's Special Representative to restrict and strictly control the flow of arms into, within and out of Kosovo pursuant to resolution 1244 (1999), the Council decided to terminate the arms embargo and dissolve the Security Council Committee established by resolution 1160 (1998).²⁷³

Children and armed conflict

By resolution 1314 (2000) of 11 August 2000, in connection with the protection of children in situation of armed conflict, the Council indicated its willingness, when imposing measures under Article 41, "to consider assessing the potential unintended consequences of sanctions on children and to take appropriate steps to minimize such consequences".²⁷⁴

Threats to international peace and security caused by terrorist acts

By resolution 1373 (2001) of 28 September 2001, the Council reaffirmed its unequivocal condemnation of the terrorist attacks of 11 September 2001 in New York, Washington, D.C. and Pennsylvania, and, acting under Chapter VII, decided that all States should cooperate in a wide range of areas, from suppressing the financing of terrorism to providing early warning, as well as cooperating in criminal investigations, exchanging information on possible terrorist acts, and reporting on the steps they had taken to implement that resolution. In particular, the Council decided that all States were to take the following actions: (a) to prevent and suppress the financing of terrorist acts; (b) to criminalize the wilful provision or collection of funds with the intention or knowledge that the funds would be used to carry out terrorist acts; (c) to freeze funds and other financial assets or economic resources of persons who committed or attempted to commit terrorist acts or participate in or facilitate the commission of terrorist acts; and (d) to prohibit their nationals or any persons and entities within their territories from making any funds, financial assets or economic resources or financial or other related services available for the benefit of such persons.²⁷⁵

The Council further decided that States were (a) to refrain from providing any form of support to entities or persons involved in terrorist acts, including by suppressing recruitment of members of terrorist groups and eliminating the supply of weapons to terrorists; (b) to take the necessary steps to prevent the commission of terrorist acts, including by provision of early warning to other States through exchange of information; (c) to deny safe haven to those who finance, plan, support or commit terrorist acts, or provide safe havens; (d) to prevent those who finance, plan, facilitate or commit terrorist acts from using their respective territories for those purposes against other States or their citizens; (e) to bring to justice any person who participates in the financing, planning, preparation or perpetration of terrorist acts and establish such terrorist acts as serious criminal offences in domestic laws and regulations, and ensure that the punishment duly reflects the seriousness of such acts; (f) to afford one another the greatest measure of assistance in connection with criminal investigations or criminal proceedings relating to the financing or support of terrorist acts, including assistance in obtaining evidence in their possession necessary for the proceedings; and (g) to prevent the movement of terrorist or terrorist groups by effective border controls and controls on issuance of identity papers and travel documents.²⁷⁶ By the same resolution, the Council decided to establish a Committee of the Security Council to monitor implementation of the resolution, with the assistance of appropriate expertise. The Council called upon all States to report to the Committee, no later than 90 days from the date of adoption of the resolution and, thereafter, according to a timetable to be proposed by the Committee, on the steps they had taken to implement the resolution itself. Furthermore, the Council directed the Committee to delineate its tasks, submit a work programme within 30 days of the adoption of the resolution, and to consider the support it required, in consultation with the Secretary-General. Finally, the Council expressed its

By resolution 1325 (2000) of 31 October 2000, in connection with women and peace and security, the Council reaffirmed its readiness, whenever measures were adopted under Article 41, “to give consideration to their potential impact on the civilian population, bearing in mind the special needs of women and girls, in order to consider humanitarian exemptions”.²⁷⁸

By resolution 1379 (2001) of 20 November 2001, in connection with children and armed conflict, the Council undertook to consider, “as appropriate when imposing measures under Article 41, the economic and social impact of sanctions on children, with a view to providing appropriate humanitarian exemptions that take account of their specific needs and their vulnerability and to minimizing such impact”.²⁷⁹

B. Discussion relating to Article 41

The situation in Afghanistan

At its 4251st meeting, on 19 December 2000, the Council adopted resolution 1333 (2000), by which it took a series of mandatory measures against the Taliban. During the debate, several speakers cautioned that the Taliban continued to flout the will of the international community, as expressed by the Council in resolution 1267 (1999), by failing to hand over Osama bin Laden, and asked for additional measures to be imposed against the Taliban.²⁸⁰ By contrast, the representative of China emphasized that his country was not in favour of “easily resorting to sanctions or of their repeated use”. He further stated that sanctions had to be adopted with great caution and prudence, and were a “double-edged sword”, adversely impacting the humanitarian situation in Afghanistan. He expressed the belief that a new round of sanctions would “naturally have a negative impact on the Afghan peace process,” and that a “unilateral arms embargo” could not achieve the objective of enhancing the peace process.²⁸¹ The representative of Canada noted that the resolution would send a “strong anti-terrorism message”, but drew attention to the necessity of monitoring the humanitarian situation in Afghanistan to ensure that the civilian population did not suffer “needlessly as a result of these new sanctions”. He remarked that the resolution could have been better targeted and more sensitive to humanitarian considerations, but welcomed the establishment of a committee of experts to monitor and report on the implementation and the humanitarian impact of the sanctions.²⁸² Likewise, the representative of the Netherlands insisted that the Council should continue to weigh the possible humanitarian and political impact these measures would have against the Council’s wider political objectives. He deemed unacceptable that “the Taliban should use the adoption of the current draft resolution as a pretext for blocking the delivery of humanitarian aid”.²⁸³

In regard to the humanitarian impact of measures imposed, the representative of Malaysia asserted that his country did not reject the use of sanctions, as long as they were “taken as a measure of last resort short of the use of force”, were targeted, had “minimal humanitarian impact on the population at large” and a “specific time-frame”. He held the belief that the sanctions imposed by the draft resolution would “exacerbate the sense of isolation and despair of the people of Afghanistan” and lead to the deterioration of the humanitarian situation in the Taliban-controlled areas in Afghanistan. He also noted that the periodic assessments regarding the humanitarian impact of the sanctions, to have been undertaken by the sanctions committee pursuant to resolution 1267 (1999), had not been carried out. He expressed concern at the negative impact of the proposed measures on the peace process in Afghanistan. He warned that the imposition of measures against the Taliban would, in effect, interfere with the civil war in the country and that the one-sided arms embargo compromised the neutrality of the Council.²⁸⁴ A number of representatives expressed confidence that the targeted nature of the sanctions would avoid their having an adverse impact on the civilian population of Afghanistan.²⁸⁵ The representative of the Russian Federation further noted that the Council should not acquiesce to “blackmail” by responding to threats by the Taliban to expel humanitarian workers if the Council imposed the sanctions. He insisted that the one-sided nature of the arms embargo was “fully justified” since the Taliban had “always banked on using military means to resolve the Afghan problem” and offered their territory for the use and protection of terrorists. He underlined that the Taliban had on many occasions reneged on their commitments to begin negotiations, and that this “consistent policy” of the Taliban was what negatively impacted the peace process, and not the decisions of the Council.²⁸⁶ The representative of the United States affirmed that the policies of the Taliban had “aggravated the already abysmal economic and social conditions of the people of Afghanistan”.²⁸⁷

In regard to the time-bound nature of the measures imposed, the representative of France recalled that this was the third time during the year that the Council had mandated a time-bound sanctions regime and saluted the formation of a new Council doctrine that was conducive to “avoiding the perpetuation of sanctions for indefinite time periods”.²⁸⁸ The representative of Ukraine also noted that the resolution established time limits for the sanctions regime and deemed that, by adopting these measures, the Council was sending “a clear message to the Taliban regarding the termination of the sanctions regime”.²⁸⁹

At its 4325th meeting, on 5 June 2001, the Council discussed the report of the Committee of Experts on Afghanistan appointed pursuant to resolution 1333 (2000) regarding the monitoring of the arms embargo against the Taliban and the closure of terrorist training camps in the Taliban-held areas of Afghanistan. During the debate, several speakers pledged their support for the monitoring mechanism recommended in the committee’s report.²⁹⁰ The representative of China pointed out that the establishment of a new sanctions monitoring mechanism would require the “close cooperation of States neighbouring Afghanistan” and the Council should, therefore, “carefully consider and respect the opinions of those neighbouring countries” before arriving at a decision.²⁹¹ The representative of Tunisia concurred and added that some of Afghanistan’s neighbours might need “concrete support” to strengthen and develop their monitoring mechanisms.²⁹² The representative of Mali maintained that the “goal of sanctions should not be to punish, but to modify behaviour”, and to attain that goal sanctions should be applied “rigorously”.²⁹³ The representative of Mauritius advised that the sanctions monitoring mechanism should not become a “mere reporting panel for further action by others”, but a “solid structure, with all financial and human resources to effectively deal with sanctions-busting cases”.²⁹⁴ The representative of Singapore cautioned that in creating the sanctions monitoring mechanism, the Security Council should not “unwittingly” institute measures that would impede the ability of humanitarian agencies to bring aid to the Afghan population.²⁹⁵ The representative of Uzbekistan added that the effectiveness of the monitoring mechanism would depend on the direct involvement and commitment of “all countries”.²⁹⁶ The representative of Pakistan expressed his Government’s general opposition to sanctions, “as a matter of principle” and called attention to the humanitarian consequences of sanctions in Afghanistan. He asked for sanctions to be lifted and the “wrong to be corrected”.²⁹⁷

At its 4283rd meeting, on 22 February 2001, the Council discussed the final report of the Monitoring Mechanism presented to the Council pursuant to resolution 1295 (2000), which established sanctions against UNITA. During the debate, several speakers commended the positive effect of the sanctions regime in diminishing the procurement of arms by UNITA and its capacity to wage war.²⁹⁸ The representative of France noted that, despite this success, sanctions violations had occurred in Angola and called for the Council to find the “proper means” to put an end to the violations.²⁹⁹ Similarly, the representative of Ukraine declared that the Council should encourage States to take “strong action” with respect to sanctions violations.³⁰⁰ Moreover, the representatives of Mali and Mauritius asked for secondary sanctions to be imposed on States that violated the measures adopted against UNITA.³⁰¹ In response, the representative of Colombia asserted that “imposing sanctions on Governments that violate sanctions” would run the “risk of proliferating such measures, operating selectively and politicizing the sanctions regime”.³⁰² The representatives of Brazil and Mozambique remarked that the success of the sanctions against UNITA depended on the continued commitment of the international community in the implementation of sanctions.³⁰³ Similarly, the representative of Togo asserted that the sanctions regime would be implemented effectively only “through substantive dialogue” and “ongoing cooperation with all States”,³⁰⁴ while the representative of Bulgaria noted that the full implementation of sanctions could be achieved only “through a synergy of actions at the national, regional and global levels”.³⁰⁵ Furthermore, several speakers emphasized the need to institutionalize the monitoring of sanctions, so that the requisite expertise and methodology would be applied for the whole duration of the sanctions regimes.³⁰⁶ Several speakers concurred that the sanctions against UNITA should not represent an end in themselves, but create the necessary conditions for a final political solution to the Angolan question.³⁰⁷ The representative of Sweden, speaking on behalf of the European Union and associated countries,³⁰⁸ expressed the European Union’s commitment to maintaining strong international pressure on UNITA and its leadership through the full implementation of the United Nations sanctions.³⁰⁹ Several representatives asked the Council to augment its sanctions against UNITA so as to compel it to return to the peace process as soon as possible.³¹⁰ By contrast, the representative of Bangladesh underlined that his Government encouraged “a process of peaceful resolution of disputes and of genuine national reconciliation”, alongside sanctions.³¹¹

At its 4418th meeting, on 15 November 2001, the Council heard a briefing by the Under-Secretary-General and Special Adviser of the Secretary-General on the situation in Angola and its effects on Angolan civilians. During the debate, several speakers expressed their satisfaction with the positive impact of the sanctions imposed on UNITA.³¹² The representative of Brazil observed that, while the situation in Angola had improved, thanks primarily to sanctions, stability was still a goal to be achieved and asked for strict compliance with the United Nations sanctions.³¹³ The representative of Malawi, however, argued that the UNITA attacks against civilians demonstrated that the sanctions regime was ineffectual and insisted on an investigation of every possible loophole in the sanctions regime. He called upon the international community to support the Southern African Development Community (SADC) in implementing the sanctions regime against UNITA.³¹⁴ Similarly, several representatives called for the international community to play its role in securing peace in Angola, by fully complying with the sanctions against UNITA.³¹⁵ The representative of Belgium insisted that sanctions were not a solution in themselves and that they should form part of a more comprehensive political framework.³¹⁶

With regard to the monitoring and strengthening of the measures imposed against UNITA, several speakers advocated the creation of a monitoring mechanism to increase the effectiveness of sanctions.³¹⁷ The representative of Mauritius, echoed by the representatives of Ukraine and Namibia, noted that sanctions should be not only “closely monitored, but also tightened”.³¹⁸ The representative of Cape Verde concluded that additional measures should be taken to put an end to criminal activities, and noted that such measures could be taken “only through effective monitoring mechanisms in the context of a review of the sanctions”.³¹⁹ The representative of Canada asked the Council to take “more resolute action” towards Member States that continued such violations by, for example, “imposing secondary sanctions”.³²⁰ The representative of Tunisia insisted that there could be “no military solution to the conflict” and that sanctions should be maintained until the peace process became irreversible.³²¹

At its 4517th meeting, on 23 April 2002, the Council was briefed on the situation in Angola by the Under-Secretary-General and Special Adviser of the Secretary-General for Special Assignments in Africa who remarked that, while the suspension of the ban on travel by UNITA officials was in effect, it would be “premature” to talk about the lifting of other sanctions.³²² The representative of Angola attested that sanctions remained an effective policy instrument to ensure the full implementation of the Lusaka Protocol and to prevent any departure from “the spirit of peace growing in Angola”. He acknowledged that sanctions would continue to act as a catalyst for enduring peace and expressed his Government’s willingness to cooperate with the Security Council on the

At its 4437th meeting, on 14 December 2001, the Council considered the report of the Panel of Experts on the Illegal Exploitation of Natural Resources and Other Forms of Wealth of the Democratic Republic of the Congo. The Chair of the Panel conveyed the Panel’s recommendation to establish “a moratorium on the purchase, transit and import of high-value commodities” from regions of the Democratic Republic of the Congo where foreign troops were present. He expressed the view that this would end the exploitation of natural resources that was “linked to the continuation of the conflict”.³²⁴ During the ensuing debate, several speakers expressed support for such a moratorium. The representative of Ireland noted that such action might “have an impact on consumers and persuade them to pressurize the companies that purchase the commodities in question to seek alternative sources”.³²⁵ The representative of Jamaica expressed the belief that a moratorium should be “targeted not only at the countries and groups in the region, but also at the end users” to ensure that the people of the Democratic Republic of the Congo benefited from the exploitation of their resources.³²⁶ The representative of Bangladesh stated that the moratorium should ideally also extend to cover financial transactions, arms transfers and military cooperation. He further noted that all parties concerned, including transit countries and the countries of destination of the Democratic Republic of the Congo’s illegally exploited resources, had a “moral obligation” to join the moratorium.³²⁷ The representative of Colombia stated that there was a need to “name and shame” those involved in the illegal exploitation of natural resources as well as the “international arms and munitions merchants” who were sustaining the fighting capacity of the armed groups committing atrocities against civilians of the Democratic Republic of the Congo.³²⁸ The representative of Nigeria urged the Council to consider the imposition of sanctions on any country that violated the resolution on the exploitation of mineral resources in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.³²⁹ Several speakers noted the need for more in-depth study of the moratorium measure and for assessment of the possible impact it could have on the economic and humanitarian situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.³³⁰ The representative of Uganda advocated more caution, as the moratorium could have “the effect of sanctions against the small farmers and artisan miners” and pointed out that the moratorium would “cripple the capacity of missionary groups and other non-governmental organizations” who delivered humanitarian services.³³¹ The representative of the United States expressed doubts about the proposed moratorium. He noted that such a targeted moratorium on resources from specific areas would likely be unenforceable because of the difficulty of tracking those kinds of commodities. He further asserted that such a move would risk having a negative impact on the Congolese population.³³² The representative of Japan emphasized the need to protect the legitimate trade in primary commodities in order to support efforts towards peace in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.³³³

At its 4642nd meeting, on 5 November 2002, the Council held a debate on the final report of the Panel of Experts on the illegal exploitation of natural resources and other forms of wealth of the Democratic Republic of the Congo. The representative of Belgium declared that the “establishment of a sanctions regime” was possible, but insisted that “the actions decided upon be part of a framework of a peace process and that they not affect it negatively”.³³⁴ The representative of the Russian Federation cautioned that the introduction of sanctions could give rise to “serious legal problems”, since it would be extremely difficult to prove that the plundering of the natural resources of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, posed “a threat to international peace and security”.³³⁵ The representative of Zimbabwe remarked that the Panel of Experts distinguished between the companies and individuals to be sanctioned on the basis of where they were located and warned that this approach appeared “paternalistic”.³³⁶ The representative of Cameroon appealed to the countries of transit and destination of the natural wealth exploited illegally in the Democratic Republic of the Congo finally to take “adequate measures to control and even, if necessary, to interdict such activities”.³³⁷ The representative of Colombia pointed out that the nationality of an individual or business should not “be used to evade responsibility” for acts that the international community wished to sanction.³³⁸ The representative of Bulgaria expressed support for the Panel’s appeal to the Governments that harbored the entities involved in illegal exploitation to “shoulder their responsibility” by “making detailed inquiries” into the cases referred to in the report and take the necessary steps to stop such illegal practices.³³⁹ The representative of the United States noted that the “naming of those involved and the description of how they worked, in and of itself” was a “valuable tool”. He emphasized that the responsibility of Governments to respond to the Panel’s report did not lie solely with States in the region, but also with those outside of it.³⁴⁰ The representative of China stressed the need to differentiate between “illegal exploitation and day-to-day economic and trade exchanges” in order to avoid a negative impact on the economic development of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the livelihood of its people.³⁴¹

At its 4790th meeting, on 18 July 2003, the Council discussed the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo in the aftermath of the installation of the Transitional Government of National Unity and the military operation undertaken by the Interim Emergency Multinational Force against the Union des patriotes congolais (UPC) on 11 July 2003 in Bunia. During the debate, several speakers called for the imposition of an arms embargo on all armed factions in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, accompanied by the establishment of a monitoring mechanism to ensure its implementation.³⁴² The representative of Germany also drew attention to the need to create an “efficient monitoring regime” so that the Council could “manifest its political will to impose punitive measures” on those who violated the embargo.³⁴³ The representative of Pakistan cautioned that the Council had to make the embargo “credible, effective and implementable” in order not to undermine the credibility of the Council. He stated that, in making the arms embargo more effective, the Council had to consider ways and means to track the illegal exploitation of resources to the sources of the funds as well as to the points where those resources and funds were converted into arms.³⁴⁴

By a letter dated 15 May 2000 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁴⁵ the representative of Ethiopia transmitted his Government’s opinion that the Council had made a “mockery of justice” by contemplating punitive measures, such as an arms embargo against Ethiopia, since Ethiopia was the victim of aggression by Eritrea. He also urged the Council to be conscious of the “enormous implications” of its decision. By a subsequent letter dated 18 May 2000 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁴⁶ the representative of Ethiopia complained that resolution 1298 (2000) was directed at his country, in spite of being “ostensibly aimed also at the aggressor country, Eritrea” and that the Council had committed a “grave mistake” by adopting the resolution.

By a letter dated 19 May 2000 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁴⁷ the representative of Eritrea expressed his Government’s “utter surprise and disappointment” with the “clear imbalance” of the arms embargo imposed by resolution 1298 (2000). It argued that the resolution unjustly applied an arms embargo on both Ethiopia, “the aggressor”, and Eritrea, “the victim”.

By a letter dated 9 January 2001 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁴⁸ the representative of Ethiopia reiterated his Government’s condemnation of the arms embargo imposed by resolution 1298 (2000). He further asserted that the arms embargo denied his country the “inherent right to defend itself”. He noted that by the Algiers Agreement of 12 December 2000, Eritrea and Ethiopia had in fact “gone beyond what was asked of them” by resolution 1298 (2000). He called on Security Council members to “shoulder their responsibilities by giving a boost to confidence in the region as a whole” and stressed that lifting the sanctions would be “an important symbolic gesture” to restore hope.

At its 4310th meeting, on 19 April 2001, the Council discussed the situation between Eritrea and Ethiopia in the light of the creation of the temporary security zone, which marked the formal separation of the Ethiopian and Eritrean forces. During the debate, the representative of the Russian Federation remarked that the establishment of a temporary security zone was a “qualitatively new stage in the consolidation of the process of settling the conflict”. He therefore advocated an “early lifting of sanctions against both States” considering that the process of stabilization was “forward-moving”.³⁴⁹

At its 4336th meeting, on 26 June 2001, the Council discussed the effects of the sanctions imposed on Iraq and considered ways of improving the humanitarian situation in the country. The Council also debated a draft resolution presented by the United Kingdom on a new set of arrangements (“smart” sanctions against Iraq). The representative of the United Kingdom noted that the aim of his country as the sponsor of the draft resolution was to set in place measures to liberalize the flow of goods to Iraq while ensuring that military-related items were not exported to Iraq. He therefore insisted that the only route to the ending of sanctions lay through the confidence of the Council that Iraq had disarmed in accordance with the United Nations resolutions.³⁵⁰ That view was reinforced by a number of representatives who called for the lifting of sanctions but only after Iraq had fully complied with the requirements of the international community.³⁵¹ By contrast, the representative of Jordan asserted that the sanctions on Iraq did not achieve their purpose and had repercussions on the entire region. He requested the lifting of the sanctions imposed against Iraq which, in his view, would revive the “dialogue between Baghdad and the United Nations in order to settle all the outstanding issues” that emanated from Iraq’s invasion of Kuwait.³⁵² Similarly, the representative of Turkey asked for the sanctions to be lifted “altogether in the nearest possible future”.³⁵³ Sharing that view, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya observed that the sanctions had become a “crime of genocide against the Iraqi people” and asked for their immediate removal.³⁵⁴ The representative of the Syrian Arab Republic remarked that economic sanctions had proved “worthless” while having a harmful effect on the people and asked for their elimination.³⁵⁵ The Observer of the League of Arab States called for the lifting of sanctions against Iraq, but also insisted on the need to guarantee the security and stability of Kuwait.³⁵⁶ The representative of the Russian Federation cautioned that the perpetuation of sanctions could worsen the situation in the Gulf region and that the proposed resolution would have negative humanitarian and economic consequences in Iraq.³⁵⁷ By contrast, the representatives of the United States and Mali expressed the view that the proposed smart sanctions would ease the harmful effects of sanctions on civilians.³⁵⁸ A number of representatives emphasized that sanctions should not be an end in themselves, but a tool for the maintenance of peace and security and that, to achieve that goal, the cooperation of the Government of Iraq was essential.³⁵⁹ The representative of Singapore asked for an increase in the effectiveness of sanctions to compel Iraq to comply, while at the same time making the sanctions more focused so that they would not impose “unduly onerous burdens” on the Iraqi people.³⁶⁰ The representative of Jamaica also spoke in favor of a sanctions regime that would be “focused, effectively targeted and of limited duration”.³⁶¹ Along the same lines, the representative of New Zealand called for sanctions “targeted for maximum effectiveness”.³⁶² Similarly, the representative of France expressed his Government’s disposition to ease the civilian sanctions as long as the Government of Iraq accepted the return of inspectors and the Council put in place a long-term monitoring mechanism.³⁶³ Finally, several speakers drew attention to the worsening humanitarian situation in Iraq and urged the Council to find ways to ease the effect of sanctions on the Iraqi people.³⁶⁴

At its 4625th meeting, on 16 October 2002, the Council continued its discussion on the sanctions regime imposed against Iraq. The representative of Iraq stressed that the measures imposed against his country constituted a “blatant violation of several provisions of the Charter”, but expressed his Government’s readiness to accept United Nations inspectors.³⁶⁵ The representative of South Africa asked the Council to make the lifting of sanctions conditional upon Iraq’s compliance with the relevant Security Council resolutions.³⁶⁶ The representative of Egypt also emphasized the need for Iraq “to implement scrupulously its obligations” and expressed his hope to see “progress on disarmament and the lifting of sanctions”.³⁶⁷ Iraq’s decision to allow the return of United Nations inspectors was commended by several speakers, who insisted that Iraq should comply with all its obligations before all sanctions against Iraq were lifted.³⁶⁸ Similarly, other representatives called on Iraq to adhere to its commitments under Security Council resolutions.³⁶⁹ The representative of Morocco insisted that military actions against Iraq should be avoided, and that instead sanctions should be used to persuade Iraq to comply with international law.³⁷⁰ The representative of Brazil underlined that the Council should “define positive incentives for full compliance” that would eventually lead to a gradual lifting of the sanctions regime.³⁷¹ Several speakers shared the view that Iraq’s cooperation with the inspectors should lay the foundation for lifting the sanctions and thus improve the humanitarian situation in Iraq.³⁷² The representatives of Belarus and Zimbabwe expressed support for an alteration of the sanctions regime against Iraq, to alleviate its humanitarian consequences.³⁷³ A number of speakers noted that the sanctions would have been lifted already had Iraq complied with its obligations.³⁷⁴ France insisted that the Council “must also demonstrate fairness by showing Iraq that war” was not inevitable if it “fully and scrupulously” fulfilled its obligations.³⁷⁵ The representative of Bulgaria also expressed his country’s commitment to a peaceful solution to the problem of disarming Iraq and for the lifting of sanctions.³⁷⁶ Several speakers expressed concern for the “humanitarian tragedy” suffered by the Iraqi people as a consequence of the sanctions.³⁷⁷ Also referring to the humanitarian consequences of sanctions against Iraq, a number of representatives called for their “early” or “immediate” removal to alleviate the suffering of the Iraqi people.³⁷⁸ introduced a number of adjustments to the way in which humanitarian deliveries to Iraq were carried out. The representative of the Russian Federation expressed his hope that as the relevant Security Council resolutions were implemented with the full cooperation of the Government of Iraq, a prospect would open for the “suspension and then the lifting of sanctions”.³⁷⁹ Similarly, the representative of the Syrian Arab Republic asserted that the cooperation of Iraq with United Nations weapons inspectors “should inevitably lead to the lifting of the sanctions” and not to “the sanctions regime being complicated by the addition of further restrictions under the pretext that certain goods could be of dual use”.³⁸⁰

At its 4717th meeting, on 11 March 2003, the Council continued its debate on non-compliance by Iraq with relevant Security Council resolutions. The representative of Iraq reiterated his Government’s readiness to cooperate in a fruitful and constructive manner to determine that weapons of mass destruction no longer existed in Iraq and sanctions could be lifted.³⁸¹ The representative of Malaysia emphasized that the disarmament efforts in Iraq “should not be an end in themselves”, but that they should constitute a step towards the lifting of sanctions.³⁸² Similarly, several speakers expressed their hope for a peaceful solution to the situation in Iraq, so that sanctions against Iraq could be lifted.³⁸³

At its 4761st meeting, on 22 May 2003, the Council adopted resolution 1483 (2003) which lifted the economic sanctions on Iraq imposed by resolution 661 (1990). The representative of the United States saluted the removal of sanctions as a “momentous event for the people of Iraq”.³⁸⁴ Several speakers expressed the belief that the lifting of sanctions would give the Iraqi Government access to resources necessary to rebuild the economy and improve the humanitarian situation.³⁸⁵ The representatives of Guinea and Cameroon concurred that the situation in

Iraq no longer justified the maintenance of economic sanctions against it.³⁸⁶

At its 4872nd meeting, on 24 November 2003, the Council adopted resolution 1518 (2003) which established a Committee to continue to identify individuals and entities dealing with Iraq's funds or other financial assets. The representative of Germany declared that his Government's preference was for the mandate of the new Committee to cover "all remaining sanctions, for example, including the arms embargo".³⁸⁷ Similarly, the representative of France endorsed a broadening of the Committee's mandate, to "monitor compliance of States with the arms embargo against Iraq".³⁸⁸

The situation in Liberia

At its 4815th meeting, on 27 August 2003, the Council was briefed by the Executive Secretary of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) on the progress made in bringing to an end the civil war in Liberia and establishing the basis for a lasting peace. In his briefing, the Executive Secretary of ECOWAS stressed that in the light of the interim Government's denunciation of support for rebel groups in the region and moves towards national unity and peace, there was a need to review the sanctions regime imposed against Liberia. He noted that the sanctions would make it impossible for the interim Government to function, and thereby urged the Council to consider lifting the sanctions imposed against Liberia, except for the arms embargo.³⁸⁹

The situation in the Middle East, including the Palestinian question

At its 4204th meeting, on 3 October 2000, the Council discussed the situation in the Middle East in the light of the clashes between Palestinian citizens and Israeli security forces. During the debate, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya called for the Council to stop the "Israeli aggression against the Palestinian people". He noted that if "this matter concerned Iraq, Libya or the Sudan, even by way of mere allegations, the Council would not have taken all this time to adopt resolutions and to implement sanctions". He called upon the Council to take the "necessary and effective measures" to provide full protection to the Palestinian civilians.³⁹⁰

At its 4506th meeting, on 3 April 2002, the Council debated the situation in the Middle East following a new military action taken by Israel in the Palestinian territories. The representative of Malaysia, conveying the position of the Organization of the Islamic Conference, called on the international community to take immediate action to stop the Israeli "aggression and illegitimate practices". It also requested the Council to take the necessary measures to provide international protection for the Palestinian people and to apply "deterrent sanctions against Israel".³⁹¹

At its 4510th meeting, on 8 April 2002, the Council discussed the situation in the Middle East in the aftermath of an escalation of the Israeli military campaign to reoccupy the city of Ramallah. During the debate, the representative of Mauritius noted that had any other country "challenged Security Council resolutions in such a manner", it would have been subjected to "all kinds of sanctions".³⁹² The representative of Malaysia asserted that the situation in the occupied Palestinian territories had deteriorated and echoed that the Council would have acted if a different country had defied it.³⁹³

At its 4168th meeting, on 5 July 2000, taking into consideration the role played by the illicit trade in diamonds in fuelling the conflict in Sierra Leone and the reports that such diamonds transited through neighbouring countries, the Council imposed an embargo against the import of all rough diamonds from Sierra Leone.³⁹⁴ During the debate preceding the adoption of the resolution, several speakers agreed that diamonds played an important role in fueling the conflict in Sierra Leone.³⁹⁵ The representative of the United Kingdom asserted that the measures imposed were a “robust and imaginative response” by the Security Council to the tragedy in Sierra Leone and would “shine a powerful light on an illicit trade which prefers to operate in the shadows”. He further noted that the draft resolution was “unusual in its direct appeal to the diamond trade” to address the problem.³⁹⁶ The representative of the United States indicated that the illicit trade in diamonds was closely linked to the illicit trade in small arms, and reminded all States of existing sanctions on arms shipments to the Revolutionary United Front. She indicated that the resolution was a necessary and critical step to assisting the Government of Sierra Leone in “re-establishing authority over its diamond-producing regions”.³⁹⁷ The representative of the Russian Federation observed that the measures were not “detrimental to the interests of legitimate participants in the international diamond market”.³⁹⁸ The representative of Canada expressed his Government’s hope that light would be shed on the link between the trade in diamonds and the supply of arms to rebel groups in Sierra Leone. He further stated that the Council would have to examine whether States, such as Liberia, had ceased their involvement in the illicit diamond trade and whether additional measures were required to enforce the arms embargo imposed against RUF.³⁹⁹ The representative of France argued that the measures would strengthen the existing arms embargo and agreed on the necessity of examining the links between the diamond and arms trades.⁴⁰⁰

With regard to the issue of the time-bound nature of sanctions, the representative of the United States expressed her concern “about the negative implications of putting in place time-limited sanctions”, stressing that Member States would have difficulties applying the sanctions if the measures were “turned off and on”.⁴⁰¹ The representative of the Netherlands concurred, suggesting periodic reviews of sanctions to relieve the unease of many members about the “phenomenon of sanctions that last much longer than originally intended”.⁴⁰² By contrast, several speakers conveyed their support for the use of time limits, as they would allow the Council to review the situation on the ground and thereby extend, modify or otherwise adjust the measures.⁴⁰³ The representative of Argentina, however, noted that, in the light of Government of Sierra Leone support for the measures and the targeting of a rebel movement “notorious for its unusual cruelty against the civilian population”, a longer initial period for the sanctions would make the regime “more functional and effective”.⁴⁰⁴

At its 4264th meeting, on 25 January 2001, the Council considered the report of the Panel of Experts appointed pursuant to resolution 1306 (2000), paragraph 19, in relation to Sierra Leone, to investigate the violations of the measures imposed against Sierra Leone and the link between the trade in diamonds and arms. The representative of the United Kingdom stressed that his Government would look very seriously at any hint that citizens and companies of the United Kingdom might be involved in violating sanctions and would investigate fully where necessary. He urged other States to do the same and to ensure that the violation of United Nations sanctions was a criminal offence in their domestic legislation.⁴⁰⁵ Several speakers expressed their support for a monitoring mechanism that would review the implementation of sanctions and assess their unintended consequences.⁴⁰⁶ A number of representatives asserted that a new “diamond certification system” was required for a better monitoring of exports.⁴⁰⁷ By contrast, the representative of the Russian Federation emphasized that the process of resolving the problem of conflict diamonds in Sierra Leone and other conflict areas in Africa had to be focused primarily on “specific measures to break the linkage between the illicit traffic in rough diamonds and the financing of rebel movements” and should not involve “the interest of legal participants in the international diamond business”.⁴⁰⁸

As for the humanitarian impact of the sanctions regime, several speakers expressed the need to precisely target sanctions to prevent humanitarian consequences on the civilian population.⁴⁰⁹ In that connection, the representative of Sierra Leone emphasized that weapons bought from the sale of diamonds were being used to “maim and kill” thousands of people in Sierra Leone.⁴¹⁰

With reference to the involvement of Liberia in the conflict, several speakers noted that the country was prolonging the conflict in Sierra Leone through its support for RUF, and called for the imposition of measures on Liberia designed to apply pressure to modify such behavior.⁴¹¹ The representative of the United Kingdom added that such measures would cease as soon as Liberia stopped its financial and military support to RUF.⁴¹² The representative of the United States indicated that the measures were intended to bring an end to President Taylor’s ongoing support to RUF and his “continued engagement in illicit arms-for-diamonds trafficking”, and “to undermine the Government of Liberia’s ability to conduct war against its neighbours”, without causing hardship for the people of Liberia.⁴¹³ The representative of France recommended that the sanctions against Liberia be limited in time, subject to periodical review, “motivational”, and linked to precise criteria for their lifting. He emphasized that his country advocated an “incremental approach” to the implementation of sanctions so as to allow the “democratically elected Government of Liberia to shoulder its responsibilities”.⁴¹⁴ In response, the representative of Liberia maintained that his Government was the target of “grossly unsubstantiated allegations of diamond smuggling and gun running” with RUF, and that it was “neither connected nor a party to the illicit trade of Sierra Leonean diamonds”. He further noted that the possible imposition of a travel ban on Liberian officials and diplomats had “no basis in the Charter” and would deny Liberia the opportunity to “conduct its external relations as a sovereign Member of the United Nations”.⁴¹⁵

Letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991 from France, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America

By a letter dated 15 August 2003 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴¹⁶ the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya stated that his country had met its obligations pursuant to the relevant Council resolutions and requested that the measures imposed by resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) be lifted.

By a letter dated 15 August 2003 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴¹⁷ the representatives of the United Kingdom and the United States noted that they were not opposed to the lifting of sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and that they expected the country to adhere fully to its commitments. A similar message was conveyed by a letter dated 12 September 2003 addressed to the Secretary-General from the representative of France.⁴¹⁸

At its 4820th meeting, on 9 and 12 September 2003, the Council adopted resolution 1506 (2003), by which it lifted the sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya imposed by resolutions 748 (1992) and 883 (1993) in the aftermath of the terrorist attacks against Pan Am flight 103 and Union de Transports Aeriens flight 772. During the subsequent debate, a number of speakers explained their vote in favour of the removal of sanctions based on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya’s fulfilment of the conditions previously imposed by the Council. They agreed it was a matter of justice for sanctions to be lifted once a country had complied with Security Council requirements.⁴¹⁹ The representative of the United States concurred that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had met its obligations and stated that his Government was not opposed to the “formal lifting” of sanctions. He cautioned, however, that the United States’ abstention should not be “misconstrued by Libya or by the world community as tacit United States acceptance” that the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had rehabilitated itself. Hence, he explained, the United States would keep in place the bilateral sanctions against the country.⁴²⁰ The representative of France declared that the lifting of sanctions constituted an important step in the process of reintegrating the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya in the international community, but also encouraged the latter to make “the necessary gestures beyond the requirements for the lifting of sanctions”.⁴²¹ Similarly, the representative of Germany declared that his Government was “relieved” that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had fulfilled the demands of the Council, therefore enabling the definite lifting of sanctions. However, he emphasized that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had to take the further step of addressing the bombing of a Berlin discotheque in 1986.⁴²² The representative of Pakistan indicated that the people of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had “paid a high price with the sanctions imposed collectively on them”, noticing that sanctions always had “unintended consequences”.⁴²³ Similarly, the representative of the Syrian Arab Republic recognized that the people of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had suffered for a long time because of the “unjust sanctions imposed against them”, and expressed his country’s belief that the Council should not impose sanctions that would “adversely impact the civilian population” and that would “expose children, women and men to suffering under collective sanctions” considered unacceptable under international law and the Charter.⁴²⁴

In a series of letters dated June 2000 addressed to the President,⁴²⁵ the representatives of the Sudan, Algeria, South Africa and Gabon expressed the support of their Governments for the removal of the sanctions against the Sudan, in the light of that country’s compliance with Council resolutions 1054 (1996) and 1070 (1996).

At its 4384th meeting, on 28 September 2001, the Council adopted resolution 1372 (2001), by which it lifted the sanctions against the Sudan imposed by paragraphs 3 and 4 of resolution 1054 (1996) and paragraph 3 of resolution 1070 (1996). During the debate following the vote, several representatives indicated that the Sudan had met its obligations under Security Council resolutions and welcomed the removal of sanctions.⁴²⁶ The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the resolution sent out a clear signal that the Council stood ready to act once it had determined that a country had complied with the demands set out in a resolution.⁴²⁷ The representative of the United States welcomed the steps taken by the Sudan, but expressed concern for “the enormous suffering of the Sudanese people” and the civil war in the country. He stressed that in the light of those considerations, the United States had abstained from the vote.⁴²⁸ The representative of Ireland welcomed the steps taken by the Sudan, but cautioned that the sanctions were lifted because only “very specific requirements” had been met. He indicated that Ireland remained “deeply concerned” at the wider political, humanitarian and human rights situation in the Sudan.⁴²⁹

General issues relating to sanctions

At its 4128th meeting, on 17 April 2000, the Council discussed a number of general issues relating to sanctions regimes, including the following: (a) the general purpose of sanctions; (b) the criteria used for their imposition and termination; (c) the concept of targeted sanctions; (d) the humanitarian impact of sanctions; and (e) the monitoring of sanctions.

General purpose of sanctions. Many speakers emphasized that sanctions should be employed as an option for ensuring compliance only after all other peaceful options had been exhausted.⁴³⁰ The representative of Jamaica pointed out that sanctions were an alternative to the use of force, while the representative of New Zealand characterized sanctions as a “middle course” between “diplomatic censure and the use of force”.⁴³¹ The representatives of France and the Netherlands noted that sanctions were often an intermediate measure between peaceful measures and the use of force.⁴³² The representative of Canada stressed that sanctions were a “very potent means” of promoting peace and an “effective way to prevent or stop violence against civilians” and to “save human lives in the face of brutality and destruction”.⁴³³ By contrast, the representative of Pakistan stated that his country was opposed to sanctions as a “matter of principle”, preferring the adoption of means leading to a peaceful resolution of conflicts.⁴³⁴ The representative of Argentina understood sanctions to be “an important element of preventive action” that made it possible “to express the international community’s rejection of a given position or action” without the use of force.⁴³⁵ The representative of Australia acknowledged that while sanctions could be a “blunt instrument,” they remained a “necessary instrument and an integral part of the graduated set of responses” available to the Council.⁴³⁶ Several speakers noted that sanctions should not be an end in themselves but a means to an end,⁴³⁷ while others emphasized that sanctions should be combined with incentives in order to achieve compliance.⁴³⁸ The representative of Argentina warned that attention should be paid to the design of sanctions to make sure that their use was not viewed as a “half measure”, thus jeopardizing their effectiveness and the credibility of the United Nations.⁴³⁹

Criteria for the imposition and termination of sanctions. A number of speakers observed that sanctions should be imposed only when the Council has clearly established a threat to the peace or a breach of the peace.⁴⁴⁰ Other representatives stated that national interests should not influence the imposition of economic sanctions.⁴⁴¹ In that respect, the representative of China cautioned that it was not appropriate to impose sanctions unilaterally in the absence of authorization by the Council.⁴⁴² The representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya stated that the Council “had ignored threats to the peace and acts of aggression”, while at the same time imposing the “severest sanctions when there was no threat to international peace and security” in order to achieve the “specific political objectives of particular States, utterly unrelated to international peace and security”.⁴⁴³ The representative of Cuba agreed that the implementation of sanctions could not represent “an exclusive right of a select club of countries” or a “coercive instrument in the hands of a few Security Council members”.⁴⁴⁴ The representative of Iraq argued that the United States was able to impose an “extremist use of sanctions” due to the “absence of any checks or balances in the Charter of the United Nations” to limit the excessive use of sanctions.⁴⁴⁵ The representative of the Russian Federation expressed the view that sanctions should not be used to overthrow or change the “legitimate Government or existing political regime in the targeted country”,⁴⁴⁶ while the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya commented that the Council should not use sanctions to “force people to abandon their political choices or values, or to impose a particular pattern of behavior”.⁴⁴⁷ Moreover, several representatives insisted that sanctions should have a clearly defined purpose, and should comprise the objective criteria for their suspension or termination.⁴⁴⁸ The representative of the United States observed that once sanctions were imposed, the burden of proof for their suspension or termination resided in “the demonstrated behavior of the sanctioned entity”. He remarked that, just as sanctions “must never be lightly entered into, they should not be terminated due to a lack of resolve, a lack of will or a lack of patience”.⁴⁴⁹ The representative of the Russian Federation asserted that often “biased approaches” prevailed in the imposition, implementation, and removal of sanctions. He elaborated that “new criteria” were “artificially introduced by setting various additional trial periods and control periods, and complex mechanisms for monitoring and accountability”.⁴⁵⁰

Targeted sanctions. The majority of speakers shared the view that sanctions should be better targeted in relation to those responsible for the sanctioned behaviour to ensure a more effective compliance with the Council’s decisions and prevent harming civilians.⁴⁵¹ The representative of New Zealand observed that, “in the case of comprehensive trade sanctions imposed on authoritarian regimes in particular,” there was the unintended effect of “manipulation and profiteering by the elite” that would escape any adverse impact on themselves and exploit the situation to their own advantage. He further stated that, in light of such unintended consequences, “the trend away from general trade sanctions towards a more selective approach” needed to be accelerated by identifying a limited range of goods and services that would “target the interests of the regimes and elites identified as responsible for threats to peace and security”.⁴⁵² The representative of Portugal recommended that a more unified and precise terminology be used in sanctions resolutions to enhance harmonized national implementation.⁴⁵³ By contrast, the representative of Australia cautioned that targeted sanctions remained “untested” and might not be appropriate in all instances.⁴⁵⁴ The representative of the United Kingdom, while expressing his support for “smart” sanctions, commented that in the financial arena he suspected that the “fox” would be able “to stay ahead of the hounds”.⁴⁵⁵ The representative of Iraq held the belief that the “idea of replacing the current sanctions regime against Iraq with a smart one” was “ill-intentioned” and was aimed at “entrenching the sanctions and rendering them an objective in of themselves”.⁴⁵⁶

Humanitarian impact of sanctions. The majority of representatives concurred about the possible humanitarian implications of sanctions and urged the Council to take them into account when imposing measures under Article 41 of the Charter.⁴⁵⁷ Several speakers also expressed concern at the impact sanctions had on third-parties such as States.⁴⁵⁸ The representative of Tunisia, echoed by the representative of Canada, commented that, as the implementation of sanctions was the “collective responsibility” of the international community, it was “entirely logical” that the costs of implementing sanctions had to be borne by the community as a whole and not just by a small number of States, such as the target State’s neighbors or economic partners.⁴⁵⁹ Several speakers contended that any assessment of the humanitarian or third-party impact of sanctions had to occur prior, during, as well as after their imposition.⁴⁶⁰ In contrast, the representative of the Netherlands explicitly stated that pre-assessment was not a viable option if sanctions were to remain an effective tool, and instead pointed to the need to monitor humanitarian and economic impacts of sanctions once they were in place.⁴⁶¹

Monitoring of sanctions. The majority of speakers agreed on the need to enhance capacities to implement and monitor sanctions at the national, regional and international levels.⁴⁶² The representative of France stated that the working methods of the sanctions committees had to be modified, as the rule of consensus had become a paralysing force. Furthermore, he advocated greater transparency in the conduct of business of the sanctions committees.⁴⁶³

At its 4394th meeting, on 22 October 2001, the Council discussed the results of the Interlaken and Bonn-Berlin processes on financial sanctions, arms embargoes and travel- and aviation-related sanctions. The Permanent Observer of Switzerland noted the important role played by sanctions in promoting international peace and security, but showed concern for the negative humanitarian impact of sanctions on civilians. He therefore voiced support for targeted sanctions.⁴⁶⁴ A similar position was held by the representative of Germany, who added that sanctions should not be a form of punishment, but should lead to compliance with the Charter of the United Nations.⁴⁶⁵ Several representatives indicated that the Council should focus on the implementation and monitoring of sanctions in order to improve their effectiveness.⁴⁶⁶ The Assistant Secretary-General for Political Affairs stressed that sanctions needed “continued refining to strengthen their effectiveness and to ease any possible negative impact” and advocated a “constructive dialogue on their implementation and monitoring”.⁴⁶⁷ Other speakers concurred that the focus should be on the national implementation and enforcement of sanctions.⁴⁶⁸ The representative of Mali noted that sanctions had “rarely achieved their goals” and recommended a “continuous evaluation of their socio-economic impact”.⁴⁶⁹ The representatives of Chile and Tunisia declared that sanctions were not an end in themselves and should be part of an overall strategy for conflict settlement and prevention.⁴⁷⁰ The representative of the Russian Federation emphasized that the introduction of sanctions was “an extreme measure to be applied only where all other methods of bringing political impact to bear” had been exhausted. He also insisted that sanctions should be “carefully targeted”, “subject to regular review”, and contain “conditions for lifting them”.⁴⁷¹

At its 4713th meeting, on 25 February 2003, the Council discussed general issues relating to sanctions in connection with the final report of the Stockholm Process on the Implementation of Targeted Sanctions. The representative of Sweden declared that the goals of the Stockholm Process were to find ways to improve the efficiency of sanctions, while minimizing their unintended consequences, and to suggest ways to strengthen the capacity to implement targeted sanctions.⁴⁷² Several speakers drew attention to the importance of minimizing the unintended consequences sanctions had on the population of the targeted States and/or on neighbouring States.⁴⁷³ Other speakers concurred that targeted sanctions were more efficient at reaching specific actors while reducing the risk of collateral impact on innocent civilian populations.⁴⁷⁴ The representative of the United States insisted that sanctions still remained a “viable and very useful policy option” for use by the Security Council to modify State behaviour. He also stressed the importance of targeted measures as a way for the Council to avoid unnecessary negative impact on civilians and other States.⁴⁷⁵ The representative of the Syrian Arab Republic remarked that targeted sanctions were more difficult to implement than collective sanctions. He also emphasized the role played by the political will of Member States for the effective implementation of sanctions.⁴⁷⁶ Several representatives voiced support for the creation of a monitoring mechanism to counter sanctions evasions and to maintain an accurate assessment of sanctions.⁴⁷⁷ The representative of Mexico advocated improving the coordination among sanctions committees, as well as the “possibility of including in United Nations peacekeeping operation mandates the requirement of reporting violations of sanctions regimes”.⁴⁷⁸

At its 4577th meeting, on 18 July 2002, the Council discussed the effect of sanctions imposed on Sierra Leone and Liberia and sought ways to encourage regional peace in the Mano River region. The representative of Guinea cautioned that the international community should remain vigilant in monitoring political normalization and reconciliation in Liberia and the stability of the subregion and asked for sanctions to be lifted only once the Government of Liberia had discharged “all of its commitments under the relevant resolutions of the Security Council”.⁴⁷⁹ The representative of Mexico stressed that, for sanctions to be effective, it was essential for the population to perceive them as mechanisms “contributing to peace and security and not as acts of reprisal or of political reprimand”. He also observed that sanctions were not a guarantee that weapons would not enter Sierra Leone again and emphasized the importance of compliance by third parties with the sanctions.⁴⁸⁰ The representative of Colombia drew attention to the difficulties of dealing with armed groups and maintained that sanctions against them should be applied if necessary.⁴⁸¹ The representative of Mauritius remarked that the sanctions imposed on Liberia had been of “tremendous help” in bringing peace to Sierra Leone, but suggested that the Council should find ways of engaging constructively with Liberia rather than isolating it “any further”.⁴⁸² Similarly, the representatives of China and Ireland reiterated the positive effect the sanctions against Liberia had had on the peace process in Sierra Leone.⁴⁸³ The representative of Norway expressed concern over the danger of the conflict in Liberia spilling over into neighbouring countries. He insisted that the sanctions on Liberia should be as effective as possible to prevent President Charles Taylor from continuing his destabilizing activities and to minimize the negative humanitarian impact.⁴⁸⁴

Children and armed conflict

At its 4176th meeting, on 26 July 2000, the Council discussed the role of the Security Council in protecting children in war-torn areas. The Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict called upon the Council to adopt a more active role in easing the impact of such sanctions on children, by using targeted sanctions against actors who flouted “international standards regarding the protection of children”.⁴⁸⁵ The representative of Bangladesh asserted that the Council had “a duty” to design sanctions regimes that did not affect the innocent.⁴⁸⁶ The representative of Malaysia expressed his Government’s concern about the “debilitating effects of sanctions on children” and voiced support for the “dispatching of assessment missions to targeted States” to minimize the unintended consequences on civilian populations, especially children.⁴⁸⁷ Similarly, the representative of Ukraine advocated the establishment of a permanent technical review mechanism that would monitor the impact of sanctions on civilians, in particular children.⁴⁸⁸ The representative of Tunisia supported the Secretary-General’s proposal for an assessment of the impact of sanctions on the civilian population before imposing the sanctions.⁴⁸⁹ The representative of France asked for an assessment of the consequences of sanctions before their implementation.⁴⁹⁰ The representative of Iraq expressed concern with the “indiscriminate and excessive application of sanctions by the Council” and concurred on the necessity of dispatching evaluation missions to assess the potential negative impact of sanctions.⁴⁹¹ The representative of Indonesia insisted that efforts should be made to relieve the suffering of children living under sanctions regimes by providing humanitarian exemptions so that children would not be denied access to basic necessities.⁴⁹²

At its 4422nd meeting, on 20 November 2001, the Council continued its discussion of possible measures to be taken to alleviate the plight of children affected by war. In his statement, the representative of the Republic of Korea remarked that, in the past years, there had been a surge in the number of armed conflicts and that innocent civilians had been increasingly targeted. He asked Member States to cooperate in imposing sanctions on individuals and groups involved in illegal trafficking of currency, arms and natural resources, which exacerbated armed conflict.⁴⁹³ The representatives of Iraq and Malaysia drew attention to the number of civilian victims resulting from the sanctions imposed on Iraq, and asked for the removal of those sanctions.⁴⁹⁴

Ensuring an effective role of the Security Council in the maintenance of peace and security, particularly in Africa

At its 4288th meeting, on 7 March 2001, the Council discussed ways to increase the effectiveness of the Security Council in the maintenance of peace and security, especially in Africa. The representative of Sweden noted that the systematic and deliberate violations of sanctions continued to fuel some of the conflicts in Africa. He urged the Council to make the objectives of sanctions and the criteria for lifting them “clear”, to assess the possible humanitarian impacts of sanctions and to ensure that appropriate mechanisms for review were incorporated into sanctions regimes.⁴⁹⁵ The representative of Egypt shared the view that the Council should establish a specific time frame for the duration of the sanctions and specific mechanisms for their lifting.⁴⁹⁶ Along the same lines, the representative of Belarus advocated an improvement of the principles and mechanisms for the establishment of enforcement measures, in particular of economic sanctions.⁴⁹⁷ The representative of Namibia agreed that the Council should take action against those who violated sanctions, but, at the same time, should ease or lift sanctions when the humanitarian situation demanded it.⁴⁹⁸

Protection of civilians in armed conflict

At its 4312th meeting, on 23 April 2001, the Council debated ways to improve the protection of civilians in armed conflict and lessen the effect of sanctions on civilians. The representative of Jamaica stressed the importance of a permanent technical review mechanism that would assess the unintended consequences of sanctions before they were imposed.⁴⁹⁹ The representative of China cautioned that protracted sanctions caused “enormous harm to civilians” and emphasized the need for action to curtail civilian suffering.⁵⁰⁰ The representative of Canada acknowledged that, despite certain setbacks, the Council had improved its “sanctions instrument”.⁵⁰¹ The representative of the Republic of Korea noted that targeted sanctions should be tailored to a specific regime and have clear goals. He also urged the Council to take into account the humanitarian implications of sanctions.⁵⁰² The representative of Switzerland shared the view that the Council should take better account of the humanitarian repercussions of sanctions regimes on civilian populations and promote targeted sanctions.⁵⁰³ The representative of Pakistan, however, stressed that there were “no smart sanctions, nor targeted sanctions, only unjust sanctions”.⁵⁰⁴ The representative of Sierra Leone drew attention to the role played by external actors in fostering conflict. He urged the Council to take action against those actors by using “the threat of the use of sanctions”.⁵⁰⁵ The representative of Iraq drew attention to the effects of sanctions on his country, stressing the “devastating impact of sanctions on children and infants”.⁵⁰⁶

At its 4877th meeting, on 9 December 2003, the Council continued its discussion on the means for better protecting civilians in armed conflict. The representative of Chile maintained that “sanctions should be reserved for very specific areas, focused directly on those responsible and avoid negatively affecting the civilian population”.⁵⁰⁷ The representative of Germany insisted that sanctions should be imposed “with the consequences for civilians in mind”.⁵⁰⁸ Similarly, the representative of Canada welcomed the Council’s efforts to develop more-targeted sanctions regimes to minimize the potential humanitarian impact of sanctions on civilian populations.⁵⁰⁹

Small arms

At its 4355th meeting, on 2 August 2002, the Council discussed the impact of the illicit trafficking of small arms and light weapons on conflict situations. In their statements, the representatives of Jamaica and Mauritius emphasized the role of targeted sanctions in limiting combatants’ access to resources and reducing the flow of arms to areas of conflict.⁵¹⁰ A number of speakers called for the establishment of a standing monitoring mechanism for sanctions that would more efficiently supervise compliance.⁵¹¹ The representative of Ukraine insisted that the Council should focus on ensuring the full implementation of its arms embargoes and other sanctions targeting illicit trade.⁵¹² That approach was supported by the representative of Brazil, who added that the Council should also provide “incentives” to all States to cooperate with the investigations of the sanctions committees.⁵¹³ The representative of Costa Rica asked the Council to investigate and find illicit supply routes for small arms and light weapons to various areas in conflict and impose appropriate sanctions on “the nations, entities or individuals involved in such activities”.⁵¹⁴

Wrap-up discussion on the work of the Security Council for the current month

At its 4466th meeting, on 31 January 2002, the Council discussed its activity for the current month. The representative of Colombia referred to resolution 1390 (2002) by which, in connection with the situation in Afghanistan, the Council had established the only sanctions regime that was “not linked to a specific territory or country” and instead had “global application”. He noted that its implementation would require new mechanisms and discussion of substantive topics “never before tackled in the Council”.⁵¹⁵ The representative of Singapore agreed that the resolution had global application while providing some “continuity” by retaining mechanisms such as the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 1267 (1999) concerning Al-Qaida and the Taliban and associated individuals and entities, the consolidated list issued by that Committee and the Monitoring Group established by resolution 1363 (2001).⁵¹⁶

At its 4748th meeting, on 30 April 2003, the Council discussed the role of the United Nations in post-conflict situations, especially with regard to Iraq. The Secretary-General noted that the Council would have to make difficult decisions in the near future, notably on the issue of sanctions. He also emphasized that the Council should play an important role in determining the role of the United Nations in the reconstruction of Iraq.⁵¹⁷ In that respect, the representative of the Russian Federation expressed his preference for the easing or suspension of “certain sanctions” in order to alleviate the humanitarian situation in the country.⁵¹⁸ The representative of Georgia cautioned that the Security Council’s handling of Iraq’s postwar reconstruction could serve as a “litmus test” of its commitment to peace and international security. He declared as unacceptable the attempts to “manipulate the technicalities of previously adopted resolutions” to prevent the Council from lifting the sanctions against Iraq.⁵¹⁹

Part IV

Measures to maintain or restore international peace and security in accordance with Article 42 of the Charter

Article 42

Should the Security Council consider that measures provided for in Article 41 would be inadequate or have proved to be inadequate, it may take such action by air, sea, or land forces as may be necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security. Such action may include demonstrations, blockade, and other operations by air, sea, or land forces of Members of the United Nations.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council did not explicitly invoke Article 42 in any of its decisions. However, the Council did adopt several resolutions by which it called on Member States to use “all necessary measures” to enforce its demands relating to the restoration of international peace and security and which may be of relevance to the Council’s interpretation and application of the principle in Article 42.

Section A presents eight case studies relating to the Council’s authorization of enforcement action under Chapter VII of the Charter, for the maintenance of peace and security: Afghanistan, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Côte d’Ivoire, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, East Timor, Iraq, Liberia and Sierra Leone. Section B covers highlights the salient issues that were raised in the Council’s deliberations in connection with the adoption of the relevant resolutions. Particular attention is also devoted to the discussion which arose in the Council in connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait and, specifically, on whether the Council should authorize the use of force against Iraq for its failure to comply with relevant Security Council resolutions.

A. Decisions of the Security Council relating to Article 42

The situation in Afghanistan

By resolution 1386 (2001) of 20 December 2001, the Council authorized the establishment, for a period of 6 months, of the International Security Assistance

Force (ISAF) to assist the Afghan Interim Authority in the maintenance of security in Kabul and its surrounding areas.⁵²⁰ It also authorized the Member States participating in the Force to “take all necessary measures to fulfill its mandate”.⁵²¹ The mandate of the Force was extended several times by subsequent Council resolutions.⁵²²

By resolution 1305 (2000) of 21 June 2000, the Security Council authorized Member States, acting through or in cooperation with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), in accordance with resolution 1088 (1996), to fulfil the role determined in the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina (Dayton Agreement), under annex 1-A, by taking “all necessary measures” to fulfil its mandate.⁵²³ By the same resolution, the Council also authorized the relevant Member States to “take all necessary measures”, at the request of the Stabilization Force (SFOR), either in defence of the Force or to assist the Force in carrying out its mission, and recognized the right of the Force to “take all necessary measures” to defend itself from attack or threat of attack. The Council also authorized the relevant Member States to “take all necessary measures” to ensure compliance with the rules and procedures established by the Commander of SFOR, governing command and control of airspace over Bosnia and Herzegovina with respect to all civilian and military air traffic.⁵²⁴ The mandate of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina was extended several times by subsequent Council resolutions.⁵²⁵

The situation in Côte d'Ivoire

By resolution 1464 (2003) of 4 February 2003, recalling the decision taken by the Economic Community of West African States to promote a peaceful settlement of the conflict and deploy a peacekeeping force in Côte d'Ivoire, the Council authorized Member States participating in the forces of ECOWAS, together with the French forces supporting them, to "take the necessary steps to guarantee the security and freedom of movement of their personnel" and to ensure "the protection of civilians immediately threatened with physical violence within their zones of operation, using the means available to them".⁵²⁶ The Council subsequently renewed the authorization by resolution 1498 (2003) of 4 August 2003.⁵²⁷

The situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo

By resolution 1291 (2000) of 24 February 2000, in connection with the expansion of the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (MONUC),⁵²⁸ the Council decided that the Mission might "take the necessary action [...] to protect United Nations and co-located Joint Military Commission personnel, facilities, installations and equipment, ensure the security and freedom of movement of its personnel, and protect civilians under imminent threat of physical violence".⁵²⁹ By several subsequent resolutions, the Council extended the Mission's mandate.⁵³⁰

By resolution 1484 (2003) of 30 May 2003, the Council authorized the deployment of an Interim Emergency Multinational Force in Bunia in close coordination with MONUC, and authorized the Member States participating in the Multinational Force in Bunia "to take all necessary measures to fulfill its mandate".⁵³¹

The situation in Timor-Leste

By resolution 1410 (2002) of 17 May 2002, the Council decided to establish, as of 20 May 2002 and for an initial period of 12 months, the United Nations Mission of Support in East Timor (UNMISET), with the following mandate: (a) to provide assistance to core administrative structures critical to the viability and political stability of East Timor; (b) to provide interim law enforcement and public security and to assist in the development of a new law enforcement agency in East Timor, the East Timor Police Service; and (c) to contribute to the maintenance of the external and internal security of East Timor.⁵³⁴ By the same resolution, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council authorized the Mission "to take the necessary actions, for the duration of its mandate, to fulfil its mandate",⁵³⁵ and decided to review this issue and all other aspects of the mandate of the Mission after 12 months. By resolution 1480 (2003) of 19 May 2003, the Council extended the mandate of UNMISET until 20 May 2004.⁵³⁶

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

By resolution 1511 (2003) of 16 October 2003, the Council authorized a multinational force under unified command “to take all necessary measures to contribute to the maintenance of security and stability in Iraq”, including for the purpose of (a) ensuring the necessary conditions for the implementation of the timetable and programme for the drafting of a new constitution for Iraq and for the holding of democratic elections; and (b) contributing to the security of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Iraq, the Governing Council and other institutions of the Iraqi interim administration, and key humanitarian and economic infrastructure.⁵³⁷

The situation in Liberia

By resolution 1497 (2003) of 1 August 2003, the Council authorized Member States to establish a Multinational Force in Liberia (a) to support the implementation of the 17 June 2003 ceasefire agreement; (b) to help to establish and maintain security in the period after the departure of the President of Liberia and the installation of a successor authority; (c) to secure the environment for the delivery of humanitarian assistance; and (d) to prepare for the introduction of a longer-term United Nations stabilization force to relieve the Multinational Force.⁵³⁸ By the same resolution, the Council authorized Member States participating in the Multinational Force to “take all necessary measures to fulfill its mandate”.⁵³⁹

The situation in Sierra Leone

By resolution 1289 (2000) of 7 February 2000, the Council authorized the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL) to “take the necessary action” to fulfil its mandate and ensure the security and freedom of movement of its personnel, as well as to afford protection to civilians under imminent threat of physical violence, within its capabilities and areas of deployment and taking into account the responsibilities of the Government of Sierra Leone.⁵⁴⁰

B. Discussion relating to Article 42

The situation in Afghanistan

At its 4414th meeting, on 13 November 2001, the Council discussed its role in setting Afghanistan on the path to a stable and lasting peace and in addressing the humanitarian needs of the Afghan people. The Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Afghanistan emphasized that the establishment of a new Government could not be achieved in the absence of “genuine and lasting security”. He noted that the pervasive presence of non-Afghan armed and terrorist groups with no interest in a lasting peace would necessitate the introduction of a “robust security force, able to deter and, if possible, defeat challenges” to the Afghan Government’s authority. He presented three options to the Council: an all-Afghan security force, a multinational force and a United Nations peacekeeping force, stressing that the preferred option was an all-Afghan force, provided it could be fielded in a “speedy, robust and credible manner”.⁵⁴¹ The representative of Norway noted that the refusal by the Taliban regime to comply with Council resolutions “left no alternative but to use military force”, in accordance with the right of self-defence. He advised that the efforts to assist Afghanistan would only be effective if they were “well coordinated and part of a comprehensive political and economic strategy” supported by a “necessary security presence”.⁵⁴² The representative of China called on the United Nations to play a “leading role” and provide, together with the international community, the necessary political, technical and financial assistance to Afghanistan “on an urgent basis”. He announced his Government’s willingness to take into “serious consideration” any proposals or recommendations conducive to restoring the peace, stability and neutrality of Afghanistan.⁵⁴³ The representative of the United States argued that the international presence should be re-established “as soon as possible”.⁵⁴⁴ The representative of the Netherlands noted that a Security Council resolution had to enable “swift action to ensure as soon as possible some international, preferably United Nations, presence” in the towns that had just changed hands. He pointed out that “transitional military arrangements” would be essential to create a secure environment.⁵⁴⁵ The representative of Pakistan pointed out the significance of the interim administration's move to Kabul and called for the creation of a multinational force "with the coalition providing back-up support" to secure the peace and security of Kabul.⁵⁴⁶ The representative of Italy asserted that a "proper security framework" was an indispensable element for stability and also for the distribution of humanitarian assistance.⁵⁴⁷ The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran observed that the United Nations political and monitoring presence was one of the prerequisites for a successful transition, and that the presence of a United Nations military force was needed to ensure peace, order and security until the national army and police were in place.⁵⁴⁸ The representative of Germany argued that without military means it would not be possible to destroy the "hotbed of terror" in Afghanistan. He underlined the importance of clear political, economic and humanitarian objectives and urged the Council to provide the "mandate necessary to this end" through a Security Council resolution.⁵⁴⁹ The representative of Kazakhstan expressed the view that the Security Council should adopt comprehensive measures in the "political, military, humanitarian and human rights arena" along the lines of Mr. Brahimi's recommendations.⁵⁵⁰ The representative of Argentina maintained that the new Government of Afghanistan had to be helped to attain stability and security and that, in this respect, the "support of a security mechanism with an international component" might be necessary.⁵⁵¹ The representative of Chile reaffirmed that the United Nations had a central role in "creating effective cooperation mechanisms between countries in order to tackle international terrorism", a role that should be "intensified" when it became necessary to adopt measures aimed at "creating conditions for national stability in Afghanistan and, as a result, in the region".⁵⁵²

At its 4092nd meeting, on 24 January 2000, the Council discussed ways to end to the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo based on the principles laid out in the Lusaka Agreement. During the debate, the representative of Mozambique stated that the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo could no longer afford further delays in the establishment of a full-fledged United Nations peacekeeping mission with an appropriate mandate under Chapter VII and with adequate numbers, taking into account the size of the country and the magnitude and complexity of the conflict.⁵⁵³ The representative of Zimbabwe indicated that the people of the Democratic Republic of the Congo did not require "more talk of sending observers to their country, but the invoking of Chapter VII of the Charter and the urgent dispatch of peacekeepers to keep the peace".⁵⁵⁴ The representative of Uganda echoed that position, demanding that a neutral international peacekeeping force be deployed as an "interpositional force" in the Democratic Republic of the Congo under the auspices of the United Nations. He proposed that the mission be established under Chapter VII of the Charter to enable it to deal effectively with questions of disarmament, demobilization and the protection of civilians.⁵⁵⁵ The representative of Namibia called for the speedy deployment of a United Nations peacekeeping force in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, military observers and peacekeepers alike, under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter.⁵⁵⁶ The representative of Canada expressed his Government's support for the "immediate creation of a robust United Nations mission" to assist in the implementation of the Lusaka Agreement, for which the mandate should include clear and unequivocal provision for the protection of civilians under Chapter VII of the Charter.⁵⁵⁷ The representative of Bangladesh concurred that a more robust mission with a Chapter VII mandate needed to be considered in due course for the implementation of the remaining provisions of the Lusaka Agreement.⁵⁵⁸

At its 4790th meeting, on 18 July 2003, the Council discussed the security situation in Bunia, following the installation of the Transitional Government of National Unity and a military operation undertaken by the Interim Emergency Multinational Force against the Union des patriotes congolais on 11 July 2003. During the debate, the High Representative for the Common Foreign and Security Policy of the European Union expressed support for a “strengthened presence” of MONUC to be deployed in Bunia, with a “mandate under Chapter VII”.⁵⁵⁹ The representatives of Mexico and France noted that the Council had been preparing a draft to strengthen the mandate of MONUC, giving the mission a “robust mandate”.⁵⁶⁰ Similarly, several other speakers called for the Council to strengthen MONUC and grant it a robust mandate so that it could act effectively in emergency situations on the ground.⁵⁶¹ The representative of the Russian Federation shared the view of the Secretary-General on the need to adapt MONUC’s mandate to the realities in the country and conveyed his support for the adoption of a new resolution with “new tasks” for the United Nations peacekeeping operation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.⁵⁶² The representative of the United Kingdom stressed that a Chapter VII authorization for MONUC was “important” as it would help deter violence, but only if it was “credibly embodied on the ground”.⁵⁶³ The representative of Chile also advocated a “robust mandate under Chapter VII” for MONUC, which would be “essential to protect civilian populations and military personnel” subjected to “danger and threat”.⁵⁶⁴ The representative of China concurred, indicating that, as a result of the latest development, both the “mandate and size” of MONUC had to be adjusted. He therefore asserted his support for the draft resolution that would change MONUC’s mandate.⁵⁶⁵ The representative of Pakistan voiced support for an expansion of MONUC “to a ceiling of 10,800 troops, Chapter VII cover for Ituri and, if required, for the Kivu, and the presence of a brigade-size force in Ituri, with a clear, realistic and robust mandate”. He added that the expanded presence of MONUC should be accompanied by a “strong message” to the warring factions and those who backed them that further hostilities, which undermined the peace process, would “no longer be tolerated”. He concluded that, in that regard, his delegation supported the imposition of an arms embargo on all the warring parties.⁵⁶⁶ The representative of South Africa insisted that, in addition to strengthening the numbers and capabilities of the MONUC forces, the operation should be given a mandate under Chapter VII so that it could effectively carry out the tasks assigned to it.⁵⁶⁷ The representative of Japan acknowledged that, given the seriousness of the situation in the area of Bunia and in order to advance the Ituri pacification process, the MONUC contingent deployed in the region required a “sufficiently robust enforcement mandate”, and expressed his support for granting such a mandate to MONUC. Nevertheless, he asked States to exercise caution, as a strong enforcement mandate for activities, such as providing security under Chapter VII, under circumstances in which certain parties were not participating in the ceasefire agreement or peace accord, would risk changing the extant practices of peacekeeping operations and “plunging the troops into very complicated situations”, in which they might be required to “engage in combat as if they were parties to the conflict”. He concluded that the Council should not “easily” confer such “robust powers” to other peacekeeping operations and that such a mandate “should be given to peacekeepers only in exceptional cases” in which the urgency of the situation made it “absolutely necessary” and in which there were countries willing to contribute troops, as well as the clear prospect that the troops dispatched with such a mandate would contribute to the improvement of the situation.⁵⁶⁸ The representative of the Philippines pointed out that the formation of a Transitional Government in the Democratic Republic of the Congo was only a first step and that the security situation in the Ituri region remained “fragile”. Hence, he endorsed the Secretary-General’s proposal to strengthen MONUC and announced his delegation’s support for an early adoption of the draft resolution, under

Chapter VII of the Charter.⁵⁶⁹ The representative of Nepal endorsed a quick, “fresh decision” by the Council to increase the Mission’s troop strength considerably and to adjust its mandate. He contended that only a “credible MONUC presence” could create confidence in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, which was critical “to stop hostilities in the Ituri region and elsewhere, to secure the Transitional Government on a firm footing in Kinshasa, and to implement an effective disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programme”.⁵⁷⁰

At its 4625th meeting, on 16 October 2002, the Security Council held an open debate on the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, during which a number of speakers discussed the possibility of the use of force against Iraq. Several speakers welcomed the decision by Iraq to accept the return of United Nations inspectors on its territory and expressed the view that the Council should seize upon such positive developments by authorizing the immediate return of inspectors to Iraq, which would in turn open the way for the full implementation of all Council resolutions on Iraq.⁵⁷¹

A conspicuous number of speakers stressed that the use of force should be considered as a last resort. Only if it turned out that the inspectors had been prevented from doing their job, and when that had been communicated to the Council should the Council decide on a position to adopt in the face of such a situation.⁵⁷² The representative of Morocco reminded the Council that the “common defence system provided for in Chapter VII of the Charter” was designed in a way that made resorting to the use of force “the very last means available to the Security Council”, after all other means had been exhausted, and emphasized that avoiding the use of force was “central to both the role and the responsibilities of the United Nations, especially of the Security Council”.⁵⁷³ The representative of Pakistan recalled that most of the resolutions relating to Iraq were adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter with an “explicit implication that enforcement action could be taken by the United Nations, as envisaged in Article 42 of the Charter, to secure compliance with its resolutions”. He underlined that any action involving the use of force should be considered only as a “last resort”, and that Article 42 should not provide the authority to one or more Member States “to resort to force unilaterally and on their own judgment, independently of the Security Council or without its explicit approval”.⁵⁷⁴ The representative of Liechtenstein stressed that ensuring full compliance with the Security Council decisions was indispensable to the Council’s credibility, and that the Council should do “everything possible, and be seen as doing everything possible, to ensure compliance with and implementation of its decisions without resorting to the use of force”.⁵⁷⁵

Similarly, other speakers made reference to the consequences that the use of force would cause. The representatives of Kuwait, Chile and Cambodia commented on the humanitarian impact of any military action against Iraq.⁵⁷⁶ The representative of Switzerland cautioned that the possible use of force should not be considered without account being taken of all the potential short and long-term consequences at the political, security, humanitarian and economic levels.⁵⁷⁷

Other delegations commented on the legitimacy of the use of force against Iraq. A number of speakers underlined that only the United Nations, and specifically the Security Council, could confer international legitimacy to any action against Iraq. The representative of South Africa noted that it would be inconsistent with the spirit and letter of the Charter if the Security Council were to authorize the use of military force against Iraq at a time when Iraq had indicated its willingness to abide by Council resolutions.⁵⁷⁸ The representative of Iraq called on

States to voice their objections to the “aggressive designs of the United States of America against Iraq” as silence “would be the beginning of the end of the collective security system” and would violate the principle of refraining from the use of force.⁵⁷⁹ The representative of Yemen pointed out that launching war solely on the basis of “reading one’s intentions” would open the door to exploding “hotbeds of tension and wars whose roots had been lying dormant”. He stressed that, in many cases, resorting to force illustrated a “shortcoming” more than it provided “evidence of the sensibility and rationality of the decision to use force”.⁵⁸⁰ The representative of Tunisia observed that advocating “an automatic recourse to force”, and “thus prejudging the outcome of inspections”, was unacceptable as it had not yet been established that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction. He underlined that an “ill-advised” act of force would undermine all the principles of the Charter, including the prohibition of the use of force.⁵⁸¹ The representative of India insisted that in contemplating the use of force, the question of legitimacy and the international rule of law were “important”, thus noting that, without an authorization of the Council “any support for a campaign would not be forthcoming”.⁵⁸²

Some speakers envisaged the possibility of the use or threat of use of force if Iraq did not fully comply with its obligations under Council resolutions. The representative of Mexico supported a two-stage action of the Council, the first of which would include the establishment of a revised system of inspections in Iraq. He further remarked that, if Iraq did not comply with the new resolution of the Council, the Council would have to determine, on the basis of the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission (UNMOVIC) and International Atomic Energy Agency reports, whether the non-compliance constituted a threat to international peace and security and “to decide on the measures to be adopted, preferably unanimously, including the possible use of force”.⁵⁸³ The representative of the United States expressed his Government’s hope that the use of force would not become necessary and that the Iraqi regime would give up its weapons of mass destruction.

Otherwise, he cautioned, his country would lead a global coalition to disarm the Iraqi regime.⁵⁸⁴ The representative of Argentina conveyed his confidence that the use of force, as the last resort for the Council, could be avoided, but acknowledged that force, exercised in accordance with the norms of international law, the Charter of the United Nations and the authorization of the Council, would become “the only option” once all negotiating mechanisms were exhausted.⁵⁸⁵ The representative of Cameroon asserted that Iraq had failed to comply with multiple Security Council resolutions and if that continued, the Council would have to take appropriate measures to ensure compliance with its decisions, in accordance with the provisions of Article 42.⁵⁸⁶ The representative of New Zealand asserted that if Iraq failed to comply with the inspection regime, the Council would need to make a “clear decision on further action”, and noted that use of force was “clearly not beyond the Council’s contemplation”.⁵⁸⁷

At its 4644th meeting, on 8 November 2002, the Council unanimously adopted resolution 1441 (2002) by which, acting under Chapter VII, it decided that Iraq’s failure to comply with the implementation of the resolution would constitute a further material breach of its obligations. During the debate, the Secretary-General stated that the newly adopted resolution clearly defined Iraq’s obligations to cooperate with the United Nations’ demands, and warned that in the event that Iraq’s defiance continued, the Council would have to face its responsibilities.⁵⁸⁸ The representative of the United States warned that, in “one way or another”, Iraq would be disarmed and stressed that the resolution contained no “hidden triggers” and no “automaticity” with respect to the use of force.⁵⁸⁹ Similarly, the representative of the United Kingdom noted that resolution 1441 (2002) contained no “automaticity”. Should Iraq commit a further breach of its disarmament obligations, the matter would return to the Council for discussion. In that regard he added that he would expect the Council to “then meet its responsibilities”. The disarmament of Iraq by peaceful means remained the preferred option of his delegation. But, if Iraq chose to reject the final opportunity it had been given, his delegation, he “trusted”, together with other members of the Council, would ensure that the task of disarmament required by the resolutions was completed.⁵⁹⁰ Several representatives, including China, France and the Russian Federation, reiterated that resolution 1441 (2002) did not provide an automatic right to the use of force against Iraq in case of non-compliance.⁵⁹¹ The representative of Ireland noted carefully and welcomed the assurance given by the sponsors that their purpose was to achieve disarmament through inspections, and not to establish a basis for the use of military force. The use of force, he stressed, was, and should remain, a matter of last resort.⁵⁹² In that context, several speakers drew attention to the clearly defined two-stage process outlined in paragraphs 4, 11 and 12 of the resolution. They welcomed the reaffirmation, by those provisions, of the central role of the Council on the issue of Iraq.⁵⁹³ The representative of the Syrian Arab Republic declared that his Government had voted in favour of the resolution owing to the assurances received from the representatives of the United States, United Kingdom, France and the Russian Federation that the resolution “would not be used as pretext” or as “a basis for any automatic strikes against Iraq”.⁵⁹⁴

At its 4707th meeting, on 14 February 2003, the Council heard a briefing by the Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC on the progress of inspections in Iraq. During the ensuing debate, several representatives, including France and the Russian Federation, urged the Council to reserve the “use of force” for the moment when it became clear that all peaceful means had failed.⁵⁹⁵ The representative of France also added that the use of force was not justified “at this time” and that there was an alternative to war, namely “disarming Iraq through inspections”.⁵⁹⁶ The representative of Angola expressed the view that use of force at this stage would deprive the international community of valuable information that could be provided through inspections. He therefore appealed to the Council to allow sufficient time for the inspectors to gather the necessary information to “make informed decisions at the appropriate time”.⁵⁹⁷ The representative of Germany warned that military action against Iraq would, in addition to the terrible humanitarian consequences, above all endanger the stability of a “tense and troubled region”. Consequently, he stressed that there should be “no automatism” leading the Council to the use of military force and that “all possible alternatives” needed to be “exhaustively explored”.⁵⁹⁸ By contrast, the representative of the United States expressed the view that the improvements of process, more inspectors and longer inspecting period, would not move the Council away from the central problem — that Iraq had failed to comply with resolution 1441 (2002) — and that the Council would have to consider in the very near future whether it had reached the point where it must face the issue “whether or not it is time to consider serious consequences of the kind intended by resolution 1441 (2002)”.⁵⁹⁹ The representative of Spain stated that if there was no change in the political attitude in Iraq, the Council would be obliged to “assume its responsibilities in the interest of peace and security of the world”, while the representative of the United Kingdom stated that the Council had reached that stage only by doing what the Charter required, which was to back a diplomatic process with a credible threat of force and also, if necessary, to be ready to use that threat of force.⁶⁰⁰

At its 4709th meeting, on 18 and 19 February 2003, the Council continued its discussion regarding Iraq’s compliance with resolution 1441 (2002). During the debate, a number of representatives reiterated their position that the use of force against Iraq should be considered only as a “last resort”, that the time to use military force had not yet arrived, given the progress of the inspections regime, and that therefore the use of force would not be justified at the present stage.⁶⁰¹ The representative of Malaysia recalled that the Council had never authorized the use of force “on the basis of a potential threat of violence” and that all past authorizations had been in response to “actual invasions”.⁶⁰² The representative of South Africa stated that, since the inspections process was working and Iraq was showing signs of cooperating more proactively with the inspectors, no information provided thus far would seem to justify the Council abandoning the inspections process and immediately resorting to the threatened “serious consequences”. Recalling that there were no time limits stipulated for inspections in resolution 1441 (2002), he held the view that resorting to war without fully exhausting all other options represented an admission of failure by the Council in carrying out its mandate of maintaining international peace.⁶⁰³ Other delegations emphasized that the right to use force against Iraq could be authorized only by the Security Council and under the Charter of the United Nations.⁶⁰⁴ For instance, the representative of Nigeria characterized as “imperative” that every effort be made to avoid the use of force. He contended that if the use of force became “inescapable” for the enforcement of Council resolutions and for the Council’s credibility, such enforcement action should be the result of the collective will and decisions of the Council, under Article 42 of the Charter.⁶⁰⁵ While recognizing that force could be used only as a last resort, the representative of Iceland concluded his remarks by emphasizing that the Council had to face “its responsibility” in the eventuality that all other means proved inadequate.⁶⁰⁶

At its 4714th meeting, on 7 March 2003, the Council considered the quarterly report of UNMOVIC. A number of speakers shared the view that the inspectors’ reports demonstrated that progress had been achieved in implementing resolution 1441 (2002) and therefore saw no need for a new resolution, pointing instead to the importance of accelerated and strengthened inspections.⁶⁰⁷ While signaling that Iraq’s efforts to comply with resolution 1441 (2002) had been insufficient, others also called for inspections to continue, although “not indefinitely”.⁶⁰⁸ The representative of France also underlined that the military agenda must not dictate the calendar of inspections, noting that he could not accept an ultimatum as long as inspectors were reporting cooperation, and would not allow a resolution to pass that authorized the automatic use of force.⁶⁰⁹ Similarly, the representative of China opposed a new resolution, “particularly one authorizing the use of force”,⁶¹⁰ while the representative of the Syrian Arab Republic questioned the rationale behind the necessity for “adopting a new resolution allowing the use of military force, as if war were the best and not the worst option” and expressed his hope that peace would prevail over the use of force.⁶¹¹ The representative of Iraq held that the United States and United Kingdom were unable to prove the existence of weapons of mass destruction in his country and aimed at advancing their “private agenda” in the region.⁶¹² In response, the representative of the United Kingdom observed that, since there had not been “active cooperation in the areas which matter” by Iraq, the only way disarmament could be achieved was by backing diplomacy with a credible threat of force. He recalled that “nothing” had ever been “automatic about the threat of force or the use of force”, indicating that the use of force was conditional rather than automatic.⁶¹³ The representative of the United States stressed that the “limited progress” noticed in Iraq’s behaviour was not the result of resolutions or inspectors, but of the “unified political will of the Council” and of the “willingness to use force”, if necessary, to ensure that the disarmament of Iraq was achieved.⁶¹⁴

At its 4717th meeting, on 11 March 2003, the Council continued to discuss the feasibility of a new resolution authorizing the use of force against Iraq. During the debate, a number of speakers voiced opposition to the prospect of an imminent military action against Iraq and underscored the need for the peaceful disarmament of Iraq. In their statements, many delegations expressed the view that inspections were making concrete progress towards a genuine resolution of the question.⁶¹⁵ The representative of Malaysia, speaking on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement, expressed his commitment to the “fundamental principles of the non-use of force and of respect for the sovereignty, territorial integrity, political independence and security of all Member States of the United Nations”.⁶¹⁶ Emphasizing that the fundamental issue at stake was the peaceful disarmament of Iraq, the representative of South Africa pointed out that resolution 1441 (2002) was about disarming Iraq through inspections and “not a declaration of war”. He therefore added that the use of military force was not “the best way to bring about democracy or to improve human rights in any country”.⁶¹⁷ The representative of Algeria indicated that, since the inspections were beginning to bear fruit and Iraq was entering into a phase of “proactive” cooperation with the inspectors, everything should be done to avoid the use of force.⁶¹⁸ Similarly, recalling that the latest reports of UNMOVIC and IAEA indicated progress in the cooperation of Iraq, the representative of India stated that force should be resorted to only as “the very last, unavoidable option”, and as authorized by the Council.⁶¹⁹

By contrast, the representative of Canada expressed the view that an open-ended inspections process would relieve the pressure on Iraq to disarm, adding that there was no doubt that Iraq had begun to disarm only when it faced heavy outside pressure. At the same time, he maintained that military action without a Council mandate would risk undermining respect for international law and raise questions about the Security Council and its authority and efficacy. He therefore stated that a message of absolute clarity should be sent by the Council to Baghdad on what was required, namely the following: (a) that the leadership of Iraq should publicly direct all levels of the Government to take all necessary disarmament decisions; (b) that the Council should ask IAEA to bring forward the programme of work urgently, including the list of key remaining disarmament tasks; (c) that the Council should set a deadline of three weeks for Iraq to demonstrate conclusively that it was implementing those tasks; and (d) that the Council should consider authorizing Member States eventually to use all necessary means to force compliance, unless it concluded that Iraq was complying.⁶²⁰

A number of speakers expressed the view that Iraqi cooperation with UNMOVIC and IAEA had not been immediate, unconditional and active, and that the United Nations inspectors had not received the information necessary to draw conclusions about Iraq’s possession of weapons of mass destruction.⁶²¹ At the same time, some delegations added that the inspections could not go on forever — their time limit must be short and precise, but achievable.⁶²² Several speakers maintained that Iraq had fallen short of what resolution 1441 (2002) required it to do, and had in fact only taken small and belated steps under pressure created by the threat of the use of force. The preceding speakers maintained that the best and perhaps last hope of achieving a peaceful solution was for the Council to send a clear message to Iraq through a new resolution, which set deadlines and included concrete demands that it must fully disarm.⁶²³ In appealing to Council members to support the draft, a number of speakers stated clearly that it was time that the Council faced its responsibilities, adding that the unity of the Council, particularly if force was required, needed to be maintained. For instance, the representative of El Salvador called upon the Council to “assume its lofty responsibilities and give effect to its decisions” under Chapter VII of the Charter.⁶²⁴ In the same way, the representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia expressed the view that the Council had to act “in an even firmer manner” and that the inspection process in Iraq could not go on “indefinitely”. He remarked that political pressure and the real threat of the use of force had proven to be the “right mechanisms” and had yielded results.⁶²⁵ Similarly, the representative of Colombia affirmed that only the threat of the use of force and the unanimous adoption by the Council of resolution 1441 (2002) had made it possible for “certain headway to be made”, but stressed that the use of force should be used as “last resort”.⁶²⁶

At its 4721st meeting, on 19 March 2003, the Council met to discuss Iraq’s progress on complying with relevant Council resolutions. During the debate, several representatives, including those of Germany, France, the Russian Federation and China, expressed the belief that it was still possible to disarm Iraq peacefully, specifically by adhering to the deadlines outlined in the work programme of UNMOVIC, considering the progress made by the inspection regime lately.⁶²⁷ In particular, Germany, echoed by the Russian Federation, stated that, under the existing circumstances, the policy of military intervention had “no credibility”, as there was no basis in the Charter for “regime change by military means”.⁶²⁸ The representative of the Russian Federation underlined that no decision of the Council authorized the use of force against Iraq outside the Charter of the United Nations, nor did it authorize “the violent overthrow of the leadership of a sovereign State”.⁶²⁹ The representative of the Syrian Arab Republic noted that the “attempts by some to blame the Security Council” for the failure to adopt a draft resolution authorizing military force against Iraq ignored the fact that the majority of the members of the Council rejected such a draft resolution, “thus rendering the use of the veto unnecessary by any country”.⁶³⁰ By contrast, while expressing regret that the Council had not been able to find an agreed way forward, the United Kingdom reiterated that it had been Iraq’s fundamental failure to disarm over a period of 12 years, despite pleas and pressure from the Council and the whole international community, which had led to the present situation. He also stressed that any action undertaken with regard to this matter would be in accordance with international law and based on relevant resolutions of the Council.⁶³¹ Similarly, the representative of Spain avowed that the legitimate recourse to the use of force to disarm Iraq of its weapons of mass destruction was based on “the logical linking of resolutions 660 (1990), 678 (1990), 687 (1991) and 1441 (2002), adopted pursuant to Chapter VII of the Charter”.⁶³²

At its 4726th meeting, on 26 March 2003, following the commencement of the United States-led military action against Iraq on 20 March 2003, the Council continued its discussion on the use of force against Iraq, with a particular focus on the legality of the military action undertaken. While a number of Member States maintained that the inspections should have been allowed to continue and that Iraq had indeed been actively cooperating with the inspectors,⁶³³ several others held that it was precisely because Iraq had failed to comply with Security Council resolutions that the coalition had been compelled to use force.⁶³⁴ During the debate, several representatives strongly objected to the use of force by coalition members, as a “unilateral” action which had failed to receive the authorization of the Council.⁶³⁵ Recalling the recent resolution adopted in Cairo at the Ministerial level by the League of Arab States, several speakers called the “Anglo-American aggression against Iraq” a flagrant violation of the Charter and of the principles of international law. Among others, the representative of Malaysia, speaking on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement, expressed his opposition to unilateral military actions or use of force, including those made without proper authorization from the Council. Pointing out that there was no authorization by the Council for the military action, he further underlined that the pre-emptive use of force threatened the foundation of international law.⁶³⁶ Similarly, a number of other speakers concurred that the military action was a violation of the Charter, calling it “unilateral action,” an “act of aggression” and a “unilateral attack”.⁶³⁷ The representative of the Russian Federation, echoed by the representative of Yemen, said that it was clear that the use of force against Iraq in an effort to change the political regime of a sovereign State ran counter to the fundamental principles contained in the Charter of the United Nations.⁶³⁸ Other speakers stressed that the “pre-emptive” use of force threatened the foundation of international law.⁶³⁹

By contrast, other Member States argued that failure to have taken action against the Iraqi regime would have been tantamount to tolerating breaches of the law and persistent disregard of the obligations to the United Nations.⁶⁴⁰ The actions of the coalition were, rather, in accordance with international law, they noted, pointing out that resolutions 678 (1990), 687 (1991) and 1441 (2002) provided authority for the use of force to disarm Iraq of weapons of mass destruction and to restore international peace and security to the region. They stressed that failure to take action to disarm effectively the Iraqi regime would be a serious political and military mistake and would lead to the further undermining of the authority of the United Nations. The representative of the United States, joined by the representative of the United Kingdom, underscored that the coalition, comprising more than 48 countries, was acting to compel Iraq’s compliance with Council resolutions “because the risk of inaction was too great to tolerate”.⁶⁴¹

At its 4099th meeting, on 7 February 2000, the Council adopted resolution 1289 (2000) by which it decided to extend the presence on the ground of the military component of the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone and to revise its mandate. During the debate preceding the adoption of the resolution, the representative of Sierra Leone welcomed “wholeheartedly” the fact that the revised mandate and the additional responsibilities of UNAMSIL were “fully backed by Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations”.⁶⁴² The representative of the United States acknowledged the need to expand the Mission’s mandate and welcomed the draft resolution that would grant United Nations troops “Chapter VII authority in the discharge of their mandate to take the necessary action to ensure the security and freedom of their personnel”.⁶⁴³ By contrast, the representative of the United Kingdom stressed that, while UNAMSIL was not a Chapter VII peace enforcement operation, his Government recognized in formulating the mandate for the force, that the task would require “a robust and serious stance against possible threats”.⁶⁴⁴

At its 4139th meeting, on 11 May 2000, the Council discussed the situation in Sierra Leone in the context of the abduction of several hundred United Nations peacekeepers in various parts of Sierra Leone. During the debate, many representatives called for a review of the mandate of UNAMSIL, with some of them expressing a preference for a Chapter VII operation.⁶⁴⁵ The representative of Algeria pointed out that the crisis at hand showed “very clearly” that the mandate and resources available to UNAMSIL were not adequate and appealed to the Council to review urgently the Mission’s mandate and then adopt a new resolution placing UNAMSIL action “within the context of Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, making it a peace-enforcement mission”.⁶⁴⁶ The representative of Canada called for the Council to recommit itself to establishing a strong and credible force in the face of “appalling provocation” on the part of the Revolutionary Unified Party (RUF). He pointed out that the Council should be prepared to revisit the UNAMSIL mandate “in the light of the fundamental changes in the situation on the ground” and to re-examine, on a regular basis, the Mission’s requirements in personnel and capabilities.⁶⁴⁷ The representative of Malaysia expressed the view that the question of the adequacy of the limited Chapter VII mandate given to UNAMSIL should be “promptly examined in the light of the hard realities on the ground and in the context of the changed environment from that originally envisaged”. He reminded the Council that his country had supported a limited Chapter VII mandate because there was “an agreement on the table and because the cooperation of the parties was assured to be forthcoming”. He stated that the reality was different and the response should be recalibrated appropriately.⁶⁴⁸ The representative of Bangladesh highlighted the need for a “much more robust mandate for a long-term solution of the problem in Sierra Leone” and, to make it effective, advocated a “full Chapter VII mandate for UNAMSIL”.⁶⁴⁹ Similarly, the representative of China spoke in favour of the Council adopting “appropriate measures” with respect to the situation in Sierra Leone, including a review of the mandate of UNAMSIL and the adoption of measures to ensure that its mandate was fully implemented. He asked the Secretariat to formulate recommendations in that regard, as soon as possible, for consideration by the Council.⁶⁵⁰

By contrast, other delegations were of the view that the current mandate was sufficient to deal with the situation, as it contained elements of Chapter VII, and that UNAMSIL should be reinforced only in terms of strength and resources.⁶⁵¹ The representative of the United Kingdom expressed the view that the UNAMSIL mandate was “sufficient” for it to carry out its tasks, as it contained elements that allowed for the “use of force in self-defence and, where possible, in defence of the civilian population”. The immediate objective, therefore, was to reinforce UNAMSIL and

“get it up to strength”. He asserted that, as the situation evolved, the decision on the mandate of the Mission would depend on the tasks expected from UNAMSIL. In addition, he agreed with the Secretary-General’s point that changing the Mission’s mandate would not “of itself change it into an effective peace enforcement mission” and stressed that “moving to peace enforcement would be a radical change of approach” which required careful thought.⁶⁵² The representative of the Russian Federation observed that the UNAMSIL mandate under resolution 1289 (2000) allowed sufficiently strong measures to be taken to ensure the safety of international personnel and of the Government of Sierra Leone. He underlined that of “key importance” was “the effective exercise by the military contingent of its mandate”. If fully deployed, he added, UNAMSIL would be able to stabilize the situation.⁶⁵³ Conveying the position of the European Union and associated countries,⁶⁵⁴ the representative of Portugal noted that UNAMSIL had authority, under Chapter VII of the Charter, to use force to ensure the security and freedom of movement of its personnel and to protect civilians, where possible. He therefore called on all States to provide UNAMSIL with the “means deemed necessary for the accomplishment of its mandate”.⁶⁵⁵ The representative of India affirmed that UNAMSIL needed to be “consolidated” as it was unable to implement many of the tasks given to it. He emphasized that, with the new “professional and well-equipped reinforcements,” UNAMSIL should concentrate on measures that would make it impossible for power “to be seized by force”. He further indicated that UNAMSIL already had a Chapter VII mandate to provide security at key locations and Government buildings and to use force in self-defence, and noted that, if all units in UNAMSIL acted “with discipline and courage” in accordance with their current mandate, they would be able to serve the United Nations and the people of Sierra Leone well.⁶⁵⁶ The representative of Jordan held the belief that a reconsideration of the UNAMSIL mandate might lead to “an absence of agreement between the troop contributors”, which would weaken the United Nations position in Sierra Leone. He endorsed the stance taken by India that the mandate should remain unchanged, under Chapter VII of the Charter, until the situation in Sierra Leone stabilized.⁶⁵⁷ Similarly, the representative of Pakistan observed that while an adequate mandate had been given to the Mission, the peacekeepers were not adequately equipped to act in line with the mandate. There had to be a balance and linkage between the mandate, composition of forces and operational posture adopted in the field. He stressed that the Council could not allow the peace process in Sierra Leone to fail, “despite invoking Chapter VII elements in the mandate of the Security Council”. He contended that there could not be “different types of Chapter VII missions in different regions” and that, if “Chapter VII missions in other regions” had successfully helped to establish peace, it had to be the case in Sierra Leone as well.⁶⁵⁸ Other speakers expressed their willingness to consider a revision of the UNAMSIL mandate, without however explicitly supporting it.⁶⁵⁹ The representative of Argentina indicated that it might be helpful to review the question of the mandate, and that his country would not oppose “any change in the mandate if it were necessary”. He nevertheless expressed the view that the UNAMSIL mandate was “sufficiently strong” to serve in the extant circumstances, being able to take all necessary measures to guarantee the security and freedom of movement of its personnel and to protect civilians under imminent threat of physical violence.⁶⁶⁰ While indicating his Government’s willingness to think about reviewing the mandate of UNAMSIL, the representative of France indicated that there should be “true cohesiveness” between the mandate of a force and the size, training and equipment of the contingents responsible for implementation, and opined that this was not “sufficiently” the case for UNAMSIL.⁶⁶¹ The representative of Ukraine voiced support for the “substantial strengthening” and reinforcement of UNAMSIL.⁶⁶² The representative of Japan remarked that it was for the Council to decide between two options: expanding the mandate of the Mission to include the task of peace enforcement by incorporating the ECOWAS Monitoring Group (ECOMOG) into the United Nations mission; or entrusting peace enforcement to ECOMOG itself. He suggested that what was “most important” was for the Council to respond promptly, before the situation deteriorated further.⁶⁶³

Security Council concerning the employment of contingents of that Member's armed forces.

Article 45

In order to enable the United Nations to take urgent military measures, Members shall hold immediately available national air-force contingents for combined international enforcement action. The strength and degree of readiness of these contingents and plans for their combined action shall be determined, within the limits laid down in the special agreement or agreements referred to in Article 43, by the Security Council with the assistance of the Military Staff Committee.

2. The Military Staff Committee shall consist of the Chiefs of Staff of the permanent members of the Security Council or their representatives. Any Member of the United Nations not permanently represented on the Committee shall be invited by the Committee to be associated with it when the efficient discharge of the Committee's responsibilities requires the participation of that Member in its work.

3. The Military Staff Committee shall be responsible under the Security Council for the strategic direction of any armed forces placed at the disposal of the Security Council. Questions relating to the command of such forces shall be worked out subsequently.

4. The Military Staff Committee, with the authorization of the Security Council and after consultation with appropriate regional agencies, may establish regional sub-committees.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council and the United Nations as a whole paid considerable attention to enhancing peacekeeping efforts and to improving consultations with troop-contributing countries. One major impetus was the report of the Panel on United Nations Peace Operations (the Brahimi report), which was released by the Secretary-General on 21 August 2000.⁶⁶⁴ This report took a critical look at past peacekeeping efforts and strove to clarify what United Nations peacekeeping was trying to accomplish and how it might be doing so. Its focus included preventive action, peacebuilding, peacekeeping strategy and concrete operational issues. Among other things, it aimed to improve the rapid deployment of forces and strengthen the surge capacity for planning, preparing and deploying missions. The report also stressed the importance of improved consultations with troop-contributing countries.

On 3 October 2000, the Council established the Security Council Working Group on the Brahimi Report to undertake a full examination of those recommendations in the report which fell within the purview of the Council, in particular peacekeeping operations. On the basis of a draft recommendation by the Working Group, the Council adopted resolution 1327 (2000) of 13 November 2000 in which, inter alia, it underlined the importance of an improved system of consultations among the troop-contributing countries, the Secretary-General and the Security Council, and agreed to strengthen significantly the existing system of consultations.⁶⁶⁵ By a statement of the President dated 31 January 2001,⁶⁶⁶ Council members gave further consideration to the issue and, by resolution 1353 (2001) of 13 June 2001, the Council specified the format, procedures and documentation of meetings with the troop-contributing countries. During the period under review, the Council held three meetings on the item entitled "Strengthening cooperation with troop-contributing countries”,⁶⁶⁷ and held 54 private meetings with troop-contributing countries, pursuant to resolution 1353 (2001).

⁶⁶⁴ S/2000/809. On 7 March 2000, the Secretary-General convened a high-level Panel to undertake a thorough review of the United Nations peace and security activities, and to present a clear set of specific, concrete and practical recommendations to assist the United Nations in conducting such activities better in the future. The Chairman of the Panel was Mr. Lakhdar Brahimi.

During the period under review, the Council did not explicitly refer to Articles 43 and 44 of the Charter in any of its decisions. The Council, however, adopted decisions by which it called upon States to enforce demands related to the maintenance of peace and security, and which are therefore of relevance to the interpretation of Articles 43 and 44.⁶⁶⁸ During the same period, the Council did not adopt any resolutions referring to Article 45 of the Charter, nor was there any constitutional discussion regarding the application and interpretation of this Article. By two resolutions, in accordance with the principles enshrined in Articles 46 and 47, the Council undertook to consider, inter alia, the possibility of using the Military Staff Committee as one of the means of enhancing the United Nations peacekeeping capacity.⁶⁶⁹

The following overview is divided into six sections. Section A contains decisions of the Council by which it imposed measure based on the principles of Article 43, and section B attempts to draw out the salient issues raised in the Council’s deliberations relevant to Article 43. Section C provides an overview of the Council’s decisions that may be interpreted as having reference to the principles contained in Article 44, while part D outlines the relevant discussion in that connection which took place in the Council’s deliberations. Section E outlines the Council’s decisions relating to the Military Staff Committee (Articles 46-47 of the Charter), and is followed by section F which attempts to identify the salient issues raised in the Council’s deliberations relevant to Articles 46 to 47.

Assistance Force for six months and called upon Member States to contribute personnel, equipment and other resources to it. It also encouraged neighbouring States and other Member States to provide to ISAF such necessary assistance as might be requested, including the provision of overflight clearances and transit.⁶⁷⁰ Subsequent resolutions extending the Mission’s mandate made similar requests for contributions.⁶⁷¹

By resolution 1305 (2000) of 21 June 2000, the Council authorized the Member States, acting through or in cooperation with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), to continue the multinational Stabilization Force established in accordance with its resolution 1088 (1996) for a further planned period of 12 months under unified command and control. The resolution invited all States, in particular those in the region, to continue to provide appropriate support and facilities, including transit facilities, for the Member States participating in SFOR. It also requested the Member States, acting through or in cooperation with NATO, to continue to report to the Council, through the appropriate channels and at least at monthly intervals.⁶⁷²

The situation in Côte d’Ivoire

By resolution 1464 (2003) of 4 February 2003, the Council authorized Member States participating in the Economic Community of West African States forces, in accordance with Chapter VIII, together with the French forces supporting them, to take the necessary steps to guarantee the security and freedom of movement of their personnel and to ensure the protection of civilians immediately threatened with physical violence within their zones of operation, using the means available to them, for a period of six months.

The resolution also called upon all States neighbouring Côte d’Ivoire to support the peace process by preventing any action that might undermine the security and territorial integrity of Côte d'Ivoire, particularly the movement of armed groups and mercenaries across their borders and illicit trafficking and proliferation of arms in the region, including small arms and light weapons.⁶⁷³

By resolution 1498 (2003) of 4 August 2003, the Council extended the Mission's mandate and requested ECOWAS, through the command of its force, and France to report to the Council periodically, through the Secretary-General, on all aspects of the implementation of their respective mandates.⁶⁷⁴

By resolution 1291 (2000) of 24 February 2000, the Council decided that the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo would establish, under the overall authority of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, a joint structure with the Joint Military Commission that would ensure close coordination during the period of deployment of MONUC.⁶⁷⁵

By resolution 1332 (2000) of 14 December 2000, the Council endorsed the proposal made by the Secretary-General to deploy, as soon as he considered that conditions would allow it and in accordance with the relevant provisions of resolution 1291 (2000), additional military observers, to monitor and verify the parties' implementation of the ceasefire and disengagement plans adopted in Maputo and Lusaka. It also expressed its readiness to support the Secretary-General, as soon as he considered that conditions would allow it, in the deployment of infantry units in support of the military observers in Kisangani and Mbandaka.⁶⁷⁶

By resolution 1355 (2001) of 15 June 2001, the Council updated the concept of operations put forward by the Secretary-General in his report of 8 June 2001, requested the Secretary-General to deploy military observers in locations where early withdrawal was implemented, with a view to monitoring the process, and reiterated the authorization contained in resolution 1291 (2000) for up to 5,537 military personnel for MONUC, including observers as deemed necessary by the Secretary-General. It also stressed the need for the co-location of the Joint Military Commission with MONUC in Kinshasa and reaffirmed that it was ready to support the Secretary-General, if and when he deemed it necessary and when conditions allowed it, to further deploy military personnel in the border areas in the east of the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC).⁶⁷⁷

By resolution 1417 (2002) of 14 June 2002, the Council extended the mandate of MONUC until 30 June 2003 and called upon Member States to contribute personnel to enable the Mission to reach its authorized strength of 5,537, including observers, within the time frame outlined in its concept of operation. It also took note of the recommendation by the Secretary-General for a troop ceiling increase and expressed its intention to consider authorizing it as soon as further progress had been achieved.⁶⁷⁸

By resolution 1493 (2003) of 28 July 2003, the Council extended and expanded the mandate of MONUC until 30 July 2004.⁶⁷⁹ It authorized an increase in the military strength of the Mission to 10,800 personnel. By the same resolution, the Council also encouraged MONUC, in coordination with other United Nations agencies, donors and non-governmental organizations, to provide assistance for the reform of the security forces, the re-establishment of a State based on the rule of law and the preparation and holding of elections, and welcomed the efforts of the Member States to support the transition and national reconciliation.⁶⁸⁰

The situation in Timor-Leste

By resolution 1410 (2002) of 17 May 2002, the Council established the United Nations Mission of Support in East Timor, authorizing the Mission to take the necessary actions to fulfil its mandate which consisted of the following elements: (a) to provide assistance to core administrative structures critical to the viability and political stability of East Timor; (b) to provide interim law enforcement and public security and to assist in the development of a new law enforcement agency in East Timor, the East Timor

Police Service; and (c) to contribute to the maintenance of the external and internal security of East Timor.⁶⁸¹

By the same resolution, the Council also decided that the Mission was to be headed by a Special Representative of the Secretary-General and should consist of the following: (a) a civilian component comprising an office of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General with focal points for gender and HIV/AIDS, a civilian support group of up to 100 personnel filling core functions, a serious crimes unit and a human rights unit; (b) a civilian police component initially comprised of 1,250 officers; and (c) a military component with an initial strength of up to 5,000 troops, including 120 military observers. The Council also urged Member States, international agencies and organizations to provide support “as requested by the Secretary-General”, in particular in support of the full establishment of the East Timor Police Service and East Timor Defence Force.⁶⁸²

By resolution 1473 (2003) of 4 April 2003, the Council decided that the composition and strength of the police component of UNMISSET and the schedule for its downsizing should be adjusted in line with paragraphs 33 and 35 of the special report of the Secretary-General dated 3 March 2003,⁶⁸³ and should include the following specific measures: (a) inclusion of an internationally formed unit for one year; (b) provision of additional training capacity in key areas specified in the special report of the Secretary-General; (c) greater emphasis on human rights and rule of law elements; (d) retention of a greater monitoring and advisory presence in districts where policing authority had been handed over to the Timor-Leste Police Force; (e) follow-up to the recommendations outlined in the report of the Joint Assessment Mission on policing of November 2002; and (f) adjustment of planning for the gradual transfer of policing authority to the Timor-Leste Police Force.⁶⁸⁴ The Council further decided that the schedule for the downsizing of the military component of UNMISSET for the period up until December 2003 should be adjusted in line with the letter of 28 March 2003 from the Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations addressed to the members of the Security Council; and, accordingly, that two battalions be retained within regions adjoining the Tactical Coordination Line during that period, together with associated force elements, including mobility; and that the number of military peacekeepers should be reduced to 1,750 more gradually than was foreseen in resolution 1410 (2002). Finally, the Council requested the Secretary-General to provide for approval by the Security Council, by 20 May 2003, a detailed military strategy for the revised schedule for the downsizing of the military component of UNMISSET, and also to keep the Council closely and regularly informed of developments on the ground and on the implementation of the revised military and police strategies.⁶⁸⁵

By resolution 1480 (2003) of 19 May 2003, the Council took note of the military strategy outlined by the Secretary-General in his report dated 21 April 2003,⁶⁸⁶ and decided to extend the mandate of UNMISSET until 20 May 2004.⁶⁸⁷

By resolution 1511 (2003) of 16 October 2003, the Council authorized a multinational force under a unified command to take all necessary measures to contribute to the maintenance of security and stability in Iraq. In that connection, the Council urged Member States to contribute assistance, including military forces, to the multinational force and requested that the United States, on behalf of the multinational force, report to the Council on the efforts and progress of this force, as appropriate, and not less than every six months.⁶⁸⁸

The situation in Sierra Leone

By resolution 1289 (2000) of 7 February 2000, the Council decided that the military component of the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone would be expanded to a maximum of 11,100 military personnel, subject to periodic review in the light of conditions on the ground and the progress made in the peace process. It stressed the importance of a smooth transition between the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group and UNAMSIL and urged all those concerned to consult over the timing of troop movements and withdrawals.⁶⁸⁹

By resolution 1299 (2000) of 19 May 2000, the Council decided that the military component of UNAMSIL would be expanded to a maximum of 13,000 military personnel. It also expressed its appreciation to all States that, to expedite the rapid reinforcement of UNAMSIL, had accelerated the deployment of their troops to UNAMSIL, made available additional personnel, and offered logistical, technical and other forms of military assistance, and called upon all those in a position to do so to provide further support.⁶⁹⁰

By resolution 1313 (2000) of 4 August 2000, the mandate of UNAMSIL was extended with the stated intention of strengthening its structure, capability and resources. Towards that end, the Council considered that the military component of UNAMSIL should be reinforced through accelerated troop rotations, as appropriate, and with further aviation and maritime assets, a strengthened force reserve, upgraded communications and specialist combat and logistic support assets. The Council stressed that the successful achievement of the objectives of the Mission would depend on the provision of fully equipped, complete units to UNAMSIL, with the required capabilities, effective command and control structure and capacity, a single chain of command, adequate resources and the commitment to implement the mandate of the Mission in full as authorized by the Council.⁶⁹¹

By resolution 1334 (2000) of 22 December 2000, the Council strongly urged all States in a position to do so seriously to consider contributing peacekeeping forces for Sierra Leone, and expressed its appreciation to those States who had already made such offers. It also expressed its intention, following consultations with troop-contributing countries, to respond promptly to any additional specific recommendations made by the Secretary-General in the next period on the force, strength and tasks of UNAMSIL.⁶⁹²

By resolution 1346 (2001) of 30 March 2001, the Council further extended the mandate of UNAMSIL and decided to increase its military component as recommended by the Secretary-General in his report.⁶⁹³ It also expressed its appreciation to those Member States who had provided additional troops and support elements to UNAMSIL, and those who had made commitments to do so. The Council encouraged the Secretary-General to continue his efforts to seek, if necessary, further properly trained and equipped forces to strengthen the military components of UNAMSIL to enable the Mission to implement fully its revised concept of operations, and requested the Secretary-General to inform the Council upon receipt of firm commitments to that end.⁶⁹⁴

By four subsequent resolutions, the Council further extended the mandate of UNAMSIL and expressed its appreciation to those Member States who had provided troops and support elements to UNAMSIL, and to those who had made commitments to do so.⁶⁹⁵ In one of the resolutions it also urged Member States able to do so to provide qualified civilian police trainers and advisers, and resources, to help the Sierra Leone Police fulfil its size and capacity targets.⁶⁹⁶

Ensuring an effective role of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security, particularly in Africa

By resolution 1318 (2000) of 7 September 2000, the Council underlined the importance of enhancing the United Nations capacity for rapid deployment of peacekeeping operations and urged Member States to provide sufficient and timely resources. The Council also welcomed the report of the Panel on United Nations Peace Operations and decided to consider the recommendations which fell within its area of responsibility expeditiously.⁶⁹⁷

Ensuring an effective role of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security

B. Discussion relating to Article 43

The situation in Sierra Leone

At its 4139th meeting, on 11 May 2000, the Council met to discuss the deterioration of the situation in Sierra Leone, including the detention of several hundred United Nations peacekeepers in various parts of the country. During the debate several tributes were paid to troop-contributing countries, and a discussion took place on whether the peacekeeping force had been sufficiently mandated and equipped. The representative of Algeria, while advocating a review of the UNAMSIL mandate within the context of Chapter VII of the Charter, informed the Council of the willingness of certain members of ECOWAS, as stated at the Abuja summit of 9 May 2000, to make the necessary troops available to the United Nations to strengthen its Mission in Sierra Leone. He further appealed to countries with the necessary resources to offer an appropriate logistic and financial contribution to UNAMSIL so that it could best discharge its revised mandate.⁶⁹⁹ The representative of the United Kingdom reported that his country had taken a number of “important steps” to support UNAMSIL, in particular by deploying the British Spearhead Battalion to Freetown securing the Lungi airport, thus freeing up UNAMSIL troops to concentrate on their wider tasks. He also pointed out that, at United Nations request, a United Kingdom military advisory team was also sent to Freetown to help the United Nations assess what technical support was needed to strengthen UNAMSIL. He stated that the Council should be ready to do anything necessary to assist in the reinforcement of UNAMSIL and that the United Kingdom would continue to offer technical and logistical support to help strengthen the Mission. He welcomed the willingness of the ECOWAS leaders, following their summit meeting in Abuja on 9 May, to consider, in the event of any new involvement of regional forces in Sierra Leone, the practical modalities of such involvement and, in that connection, warned that new troops should be “blue-hatted, properly equipped for the job they have to do, under a single United Nations chain of command and with the same rules of engagement”.⁷⁰⁰ The representative of Canada, recognizing the importance of a peacekeeping effort that was “truly multilateral and under the United Nations flag”, encouraged Member States to work towards the creation of a “strong, united and cohesive force” that should take the form of “an expanded UNAMSIL and should respect the fundamental military principle of unity of command”. He added that his country would offer an airlift for rapid deployment of troops from India and Bangladesh and that Canada was considering increasing its assistance to UNAMSIL troops, which were without sufficient equipment.⁷⁰¹ Similarly, the representative of the United States stated that his country would “assist the deployment of additional troops for UNAMSIL”.⁷⁰² In his statement, the representative of Malaysia expressed the view that, among the immediate priorities for UNAMSIL, the Mission should strengthen its presence by regrouping in larger numbers to enable the force to better defend itself in case of rebel attack. He believed that the time had come for the Council to consider the “possible next steps”, including as a priority the dispatch of a rapid reaction force to Sierra Leone for the purpose of stabilizing the situation and putting the political process “back on track”. Although supporting the idea that ECOMOG should play a pivotal role in helping the international community to restore order in the country, he stated that, under the present circumstances, all countries deploying troops in Sierra Leone should come under “the United Nations banner and under one command structure”, with adequate resources.⁷⁰³ The representative of Bangladesh stressed the need to bolster UNAMSIL by bringing it up to its mandated strength at the earliest date, by deploying “additional numbers on the ground”. In that regard, he informed the Council that the battalion his country promised to the Mission would be ready for airlifting along with all its equipment by 20 May 2000. He maintained that the Council should look into the possibility of mobilizing more troops, and stated his appreciation for the ECOWAS countries that expressed their intention of providing extra forces to bring stability to Sierra Leone. He cautioned, however, that the entire military presence on the ground should be under an integrated United Nations command with “one mandate provided by the Security Council”.⁷⁰⁴ Similarly, the representative of Namibia advocated that UNAMSIL be strengthened, and welcomed the decision of ECOWAS to put ECOMOG troops immediately at the disposal of UNAMSIL and their integration into the Mission. He added that many troop-contributing countries did not have the equipment that would make “a Chapter VII mandate meaningful” and thus appealed to those in a position to do so to contribute equipment to UNAMSIL. He further stated that the Council should not “abdicate” its responsibility in Sierra Leone and “pass it to ECOMOG”, unless ECOMOG could be provided with financial and logistical support.⁷⁰⁵ The representative of Argentina emphasized the need to speed up the transportation of the battalions that had been pledged in order to provide the required number of troops and the equipment required to deal with the current situation. He supported the Secretary-General’s request to increase the number of troops to 11,100, as quickly as possible.⁷⁰⁶ Similarly, the representative of the Russian Federation attached paramount importance to the speedy increase of UNAMSIL to 11,100 soldiers and officers. He specified that his country was at that time addressing with the United Nations the practical issues of providing an airlift to Sierra Leone for additional units for UNAMSIL and of sending a number of Russian military helicopters to Sierra Leone.⁷⁰⁷ In his statement, the representative of Jamaica commended the countries which had pledged rapidly to increase the troop strength of the Mission, endorsed the integration of ECOMOG troops into UNAMSIL, and called upon the international community to commit the necessary funding and the logistical expertise as required.⁷⁰⁸ Echoing the previous speaker, the representative of Ukraine supported a substantial reinforcement of UNAMSIL by increasing its “combat capabilities” and by ensuring that the Mission was properly equipped and performing its functions under the United Nations chain of command. He confirmed his country’s availability to support the reinforced Mission and, in that regard, he recalled that Ukraine was already involved in providing airlift support for the needs of UNAMSIL.⁷⁰⁹ The representative of France voiced his support for any proposal of the Secretary-General to reinforce UNAMSIL “with Blue Helmets” and stated that France stood ready to think about reviewing the mandate of the force to take into account the unilateral breaking of the Lomé Agreement by the Revolutionary United Front.⁷¹⁰ Supporting the strengthening of UNAMSIL through ECOWAS troops, the representative of Tunisia held the view that, for effective implementation, sufficient equipment and appropriate financial and logistical support should be given to the peacekeeping force under UNAMSIL command.⁷¹¹ Speaking on behalf of the European Union and associated countries,⁷¹² the representative of Portugal encouraged all States in a position to do so to assist and provide the means deemed necessary for the accomplishment of the Mission’s mandate. He echoed the words of the Secretary-General by inviting the Council to “back words with deeds, and mandates with resources needed to make them work”.⁷¹³ The representative of India informed the Council that his country was sending a second battalion urgently, together with other reinforcements, to bolster the Mission’s strength. He emphasized that, in the current crisis, it would be essential to preserve the unity of command of UNAMSIL, which should function as “a cohesive force”, and warned that undermining the leadership of UNAMSIL was “fraught with dangerous consequences for the Mission as a whole and for the troops under its command”.⁷¹⁴ The representative of Pakistan stated that, in carrying out their mandate, peacekeepers in Sierra Leone were mandated to take the necessary action to ensure the security and freedom of UNAMSIL personnel and, within their capabilities and areas of deployment, to afford protection to civilians under imminent threat of physical violence. According to the speaker, while an adequate mandate was given to the Mission to address such situations as hostage-taking, the peacekeepers deployed on the ground were not adequately equipped to act in accordance with the mandate. He therefore requested the Secretariat to assess what went wrong in the planning and deployment of peacekeepers in Sierra Leone, including the configuration of the force, to ensure that in the future the security component of a peacekeeping mission would serve as an asset rather than become a liability. He concluded by remarking that his country wished to see a practical concept of operation and configuration of force capable of supporting the implementation of the mandate of the Mission, such that its success did not depend only on the declared intentions of the parties involved in the conflict.⁷¹⁵ The representative of Jordan reported that his country was in the process of reinforcing UNAMSIL by committing two extra companies drawn from the country's special forces, as well as another battalion within a few days. He thus appealed to the Council not to consider "new initiatives" during the process of deployment of the Jordanian troops.⁷¹⁶

Ensuring an effective role of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security

At its 4220th meeting, on 13 November 2000, the Council considered the report of the Security Council Working Group on the Brahimi Report,⁷¹⁷ which included a draft resolution containing decisions and recommendations to strengthen United Nations peacekeeping operations. The draft resolution was subsequently adopted unanimously, without change, as resolution 1327 (2000). A key point in resolution 1327 (2000), as noted by many representatives in their statements following the voting, was the Council's resolve to give peacekeeping operations clear, credible and achievable mandates.⁷¹⁸ Several representatives noted the importance of rapid deployment and admitted that there was a gap between Council mandates and the commitments by Member States to make them achievable.⁷¹⁹ The representative of Bangladesh explicitly referred to Article 43 and stated that his country had proposed the inclusion of a paragraph in the draft resolution which would have addressed the commitment gap. He proposed that "the Council recognize that the contribution of troops by Member States possessing the greatest capacity and means, particularly permanent members of the Security Council, is critically important for bridging the commitment gap, facilitating rapid deployment and further increasing the operational effectiveness of United Nations peacekeeping operations". His delegation therefore suggested that each of the permanent members agree to provide at least 5 per cent, or another agreed percentage, of the troops for each United Nations peacekeeping operation.⁷²⁰ However, the proposal was not included in the resolution adopted.

Strengthening cooperation with troop-contributing countries

At its 4257th meeting, on 16 January 2001, the Council held an open debate on the item entitled "Strengthening cooperation with troop-contributing countries". In his statement, the representative of Zambia noted that, whenever the use of peacekeeping forces was contemplated, the Security Council should adhere to the provisions of Article 43 and Article 44 of the Charter.⁷²¹ Similarly, the representative of Mali stated that his country "would like us to be able to invoke Articles 43 and 44 whenever useful and whenever possible".⁷²²

Ensuring an effective role of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security, particularly in Africa

By resolution 1318 (2000) of 7 September 2000, the Council affirmed its determination to strengthen United Nations peacekeeping operations by, among other things, strengthening consultations with troop-contributing countries when deciding on such operations.⁷²³

Ensuring an effective role of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security

By resolution 1327 (2000) of 13 November 2000, the Security Council (a) encouraged the Secretary-General to begin his consultations with potential troop contributors well in advance of the establishment of peacekeeping operations, and requested him to report on his consultations during the consideration of new mandates; (b) underlined the importance of an improved system of consultations among the troop-contributing countries, the Secretary-General and the Council, to foster a common understanding of the situation on the ground, of the mandate of the mission and of its implementation; (c) agreed, in that regard, to strengthen significantly the existing system of consultations through the holding of private meetings with troop-contributing countries, including at their request and without prejudice to the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council, in particular when the Secretary-General had identified potential troop-contributing countries for a new or ongoing peacekeeping operation, during the implementation phase of an operation, when considering a change in, or renewal or completion of a peacekeeping mandate, or when a rapid deterioration in the situation on the ground threatened the safety and security of United Nations peacekeepers; and (d) welcomed the proposals of the Panel on United Nations Peace Operations for improving the capacity of the United Nations to deploy military, civilian police and other personnel rapidly, including through the United Nations standby-arrangements system, and urged the Secretary-General to consult current and potential troop-contributing countries on how best to achieve this important objective.⁷²⁴

Following an open debate on strengthening cooperation with troop-contributing countries at the 4257th meeting, on 16 January 2001,⁷²⁵ the Council made two related decisions under the item during the period under review.

⁷²⁴ Resolution 1327 (2000), annexes I, II and IV.

⁷²⁵ For a detailed summary of the debate, see section D, "Discussion relating to Article 44".

By a statement of the President dated 31 January 2001,⁷²⁶ the Council decided to establish a Working Group of the Whole on United Nations peacekeeping operations. While not replacing the private meetings with the troop-contributing countries, the Working Group was to address both generic peacekeeping issues relevant to the responsibilities of the Council and technical aspects of individual peacekeeping operations without prejudice to the competence of the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations. As a first step, the Working Group was given the task of undertaking an in-depth consideration of, inter alia, all the proposals made in the course of the Council's 4257th meeting, including ways to improve the three-way relationship between the Council, the troop-contributing countries and the Secretariat.

At its 4326th meeting, on 13 June 2001, the Council resumed its consideration of the item entitled "Strengthening cooperation with troop-contributing countries", and had before it the first report of the Security Council Working Group on Peacekeeping Operations.⁷²⁷ On the basis of a draft resolution contained in the report, the Council adopted resolution 1353 (2001) of 13 June 2001 which, inter alia, stressed the need to improve the relationship between the Security Council, the troop-contributing countries and the Secretariat to foster a spirit of partnership, cooperation, confidence and mutual trust. It also encouraged Member States to take steps to bridge the commitment gap with regard to personnel and equipment for specific United Nations peacekeeping operations.⁷²⁸ Annex II of the resolution laid out the format, procedures and documentation of meetings with the troop-contributing countries.

D. Discussion relating to Article 44

The situation in Sierra Leone

At its 4139th meeting, on 11 May 2000, the Council discussed, inter alia, a possible revision of the mandate for UNAMSIL. With respect to a review of the mandate and an increase of troops on the ground, the representative of India stated that he expected that troop contributors would be "associated in the Council's decision-making process, in the spirit of Article 44 of the Charter".⁷²⁹

Strengthening cooperation with troop-contributing countries

At its 4257th meeting, on 16 January 2001, the Council held an open debate on the item entitled "Strengthening cooperation with troop-contributing countries", during which 37 speakers, including representatives of 21 troop-contributing countries and the Deputy Secretary-General, addressed the Council.⁷³⁰

The representative of Egypt stated that measures to strengthen the relationship between the troop-contributing countries and the Security Council should lead to the participation by those countries in the Council's decision-making process "at all stages of the establishment, deployment and withdrawal of a peacekeeping operation", especially when the use of force was involved, "as provided for clearly in Article 44 of the Charter of the United Nations".⁷³¹ Similarly, the representative of Zambia noted that, whenever the use of peacekeeping forces was contemplated, the Security Council should adhere to the provisions of Article 43 and Article 44 of the Charter.⁷³² The representative of New Zealand affirmed that the question of strengthening cooperation with troop contributors should be approached from the perspective that the Charter guarantees, under Article 44, those troop contributors who are not members of the Council the right to be heard by the Council, "at the very least". Echoing previous speakers, he noted that the Charter included provisions contemplating the invitation of troop contributors to participate in the decisions of the Council concerning the employment of their contingents. He therefore maintained that those provisions should be considered as a "starting point in considering the possible establishment of new mechanisms and the procedural issues that flow therefrom". He concluded by affirming that Article 44 should be given "due weight in United Nations peacekeeping in the twenty-first century".⁷³³ The representative of Malaysia emphasized the need to establish a formalized mechanism of consultations between the Council and troop-contributing countries in order "to give effect to Article 44 of the Charter". In this connection, he added that meetings with troop-contributing countries could be made "more interactive and useful and less ritualistic if they were convened well ahead of the renewal of a peacekeeping operation, not just before, as is often the case".⁷³⁴ The representative of Bangladesh asserted that, as a policy issue, his country strongly favoured the involvement of troop-contributing countries in the decisions of the Council in accordance with the provisions of Article 44 of the Charter of the United Nations.⁷³⁵ Similarly, the representative of Mali stated that it should be possible "to invoke Articles 43 and 44 whenever useful and whenever possible".⁷³⁶

During the debate, several representatives referred to a proposal contained in the Brahimi report but not included in resolution 1327 (2000) that suggested the institutionalization of consultations with the troop-contributing countries through the establishment of ad hoc subsidiary organs of the Council, as provided for in Article 29.⁷³⁷ The representative of India, in referring to that proposal, expressed disappointment that this "attempt to arrive at an appropriate mechanism of mutually advantageous communication between troop contributors and the Council" was seen as "root canal work by the Council, particularly when this is an obligation on the Council and not an indulgence by it". Maintaining that the Council, when the use of force was being authorized, should implement Articles 43 and 44 of the Charter, he further specified that Article 44 stipulated that troop-contributing countries should "participate in the Council's decisions, not just be consulted".⁷³⁸ The representative of the Republic of Korea noted that what mattered was not the number of times troop-contributing countries were briefed or allowed to speak in the Council, but the degree to which they could substantially contribute to the decision-making process of peacekeeping operations.⁷³⁹ Similarly, the representative of Canada pointed out that the main issue was not a proper communication or consultation process with troop-contributing countries, even though improvements were possible, but that of better “cooperation and participation”.⁷⁴⁰ The representative of Argentina stated that, notwithstanding the fact that the Council had exclusive decision-making power, the Council’s decisions directly affected troop contributors, “since the risks of the operations fell mainly on their shoulders”.⁷⁴¹ The representative of Nigeria felt the need for better coordination and consultation between troop-contributing countries, the Security Council and the Secretariat. That, in his view, was the best way to forge trust and understanding among the various stakeholders and to ensure the success of the various United Nations peacekeeping operations. He added that, while the Council was responsible for issuing mandates and the Secretariat for logistics and administration through the Department of Peacekeeping Operations, it was the troop-contributing countries that actually translated Security Council mandates into action. He therefore deemed it important that the three entities continue to consult among themselves for the eventual success of any operation at hand.⁷⁴²

⁷³⁰ Prior to the 4257th meeting, by a letter dated 8 January 2001 addressed to the Secretary-General (S/2001/21), the representative of Singapore announced his country's intention, during its Presidency, to hold an open debate on strengthening cooperation with troop-contributing countries. The letter also contained two papers on the subject, providing background information to the issue as well as suggesting some specific questions that could be addressed by the participants in the open debate.

F. Discussion relating to Articles 46 and 47

Ensuring an effective role of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security

At the Council’s 4220th meeting, on 13 November 2000, the Russian Federation commented that, following the resolution on the Brahimi report,⁷⁴⁵ the Council had entered the equally important stage of implementing agreed decisions. He believed that the approach of using the Military Staff Committee as one of the means of enhancing the United Nations peacekeeping capacity would maintain balance in the distribution of responsibilities between Member States and the United Nations Secretariat.⁷⁴⁶

Ensuring an effective role of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security, particularly in Africa

At the 4288th meeting, on 7 March 2001, the representative of the Russian Federation recalled that, in resolution 1327 (2000), a decision was made to consider the question of how best to utilize the Military Staff Committee. He commented that there was a need not to leave all of it on paper or simply within the sphere of conversation, but to see what in fact could really be done.⁷⁴⁷

No exit without strategy

At the Council’s 4223rd meeting, on 15 November 2000, the representative of the Russian Federation noted that, for peacekeeping operations to conclude successfully, the United Nations rapid deployment capacity should be developed, the effectiveness of the planning enhanced, and the technical and financial resources of operations ensured. In that connection, he added that it was important to strengthen relevant Secretariat units, including the possibility of making full use of the capacity of the Military Staff Committee as “an important source of military expertise both for preparing for the possible deployment of an operation and for wrapping one up”.⁷⁴⁸

At the Council’s 4257th meeting, on 16 January 2001, the representative of India, in advancing his views on the relationship between the Security Council and the troop-contributing countries, reminded the Council that Article 47(2) of the Charter stipulated that the Military Staff Committee could include officers from any Member State, when the efficient discharge of the Committee’s responsibilities required the participation of that Member in its work. He further invited the Council to revive the Military Staff Committee and use it as a forum for consultations with troop-contributing countries on purely military aspects.⁷⁴⁹ In response, the representative of the Russian Federation stated that his delegation would regard India’s proposal on making more use of the Military Staff Committee in line with resolution 1327 (2000).⁷⁵⁰ The representative of Columbia also voiced his support for reviving the Military Staff Committee, with a broadened mandate that would reflect the concerns voiced by other delegations, while the representative of Mauritius concurred with India’s statement.⁷⁵¹

Wrap-up discussion on the work of the Security Council

At its 4343rd meeting, on 29 June 2001, the Council held a wrap-up discussion on the work of the Security Council during the month of June 2001. During the debate, the representative of the Russian Federation, recalling the need to follow up implementation of the Council’s decisions, stated that the Military Staff Committee, as a mechanism which should be useful for the Council’s work on peacekeeping, had been underutilized. He further recalled that the Council, in resolutions 1327 (2000) and 1353 (2001), had already emphasized the need to study the means to make more active use of the Military Staff Committee in order to strengthen United Nations peacekeeping operations. He concluded by stating that his delegation expected the Military Staff Committee “to respond to the Council’s resolutions”.⁷⁵² By a letter dated 6 July 2001 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁷⁵³ the representative of the Russian Federation enclosed a position paper containing proposals to enhance the activities of the Military Staff Committee in the context of strengthening United Nations peacekeeping potential.

Part VI

Obligations of Member States under Article 48 of the Charter

Article 48

- 1. The action required to carry out the decisions of the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security shall be taken by all the Members of the United Nations or by some of them, as the Security Council may determine.*
- 2. Such decisions shall be carried out by the Members of the United Nations directly and through their action in the appropriate international agencies of which they are members.*

Note

In accordance with Article 48, action required to carry out the Council’s decisions “shall be taken by all the Members of the United Nations or by some of them, as the Security Council may determine”, both “directly and through their action in the appropriate international agencies”. During the period under review, no decisions were adopted by the Council referring expressly to Article 48. In a number of instances, however, the Council adopted decisions in accordance with Chapter VII of the Charter that underlined the mandatory nature of those measures imposed and contained provisions that might be construed as implicit references to the principle enshrined in Article 48.⁷⁵⁴ In the absence of express references to the Article, it is not always possible to ascribe to the Council with any certainty decisions concerning that particular Article.

The following Council decisions may, nevertheless, help to shed light on the Council's interpretation and application of Article 48. Section A provides an overview of action required to carry out the Council's decisions adopted in accordance with the provisions of Article 41 of the Charter, while section B focuses on the action required to carry out Council's decisions imposing measures which involved the use of armed force in accordance with the provisions of Article 42 of the Charter.

During the period under consideration, the interpretation and application of Article 48 did not give rise to any significant constitutional discussion in the Council's deliberations.

A. Obligations arising pursuant to Security Council decisions adopted under Article 41

In decisions imposing measures not involving the use of armed force under Article 41 of the Charter, the Security Council consistently called upon "all States" to comply with relevant prohibitions.⁷⁵⁵ In some instances, the Council addressed its calls to comply with relevant prohibitions to "States" in general⁷⁵⁶ or "all Member States".⁷⁵⁷

In connection with the measures imposed against Liberia and Sierra Leone, the Council expressly included "all States in the region"⁷⁵⁸ and "all States in West Africa"⁷⁵⁹ among the addressees of its decisions.⁷⁶⁰ In one instance, in connection with the mandatory measures imposed against the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the Council explicitly decided that "all States, including the Democratic Republic of the Congo" were to take the necessary measures to comply with the relevant provisions of the resolution.⁷⁶¹ Similarly, in connection with measures imposed against Iraq, the Council urged "all States, and in particular the Government of Iraq", to provide their full cooperation in the effective implementation of the provisions of the resolution.⁷⁶²

In connection with the measures imposed against Angola, the Council called upon "relevant States" to take measures to ensure that members of the diamond industry abided by the measures contained in the relevant resolutions.⁷⁶³ The Council also urged "all States, including those geographically close to Angola" to take immediate steps to ensure criminal prosecution of nationals or other individuals operating on their territory who violate the measures imposed by the Council against the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola (UNITA).⁷⁶⁴

When imposing measures against Afghanistan, Ethiopia and Eritrea, and Sierra Leone, the Council in each case expressly stated in its decisions that States were to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of the resolution, "notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or any contract entered into or any licence or permit granted before the date of the respective resolution".⁷⁶⁵

In addition, when imposing sanctions against Afghanistan, Eritrea and Ethiopia, Liberia, Sierra Leone and Somalia, the Council required “all States”,⁷⁶⁶ or more generally “States”,⁷⁶⁷ to report on their compliance with relevant prohibitions, and provided that implementation reports received from States were to be examined by committees specifically mandated to monitor the implementation of sanctions, and to consider any information concerning violations of relevant State obligations. To ensure full compliance with relevant prohibitions, in connection with the situation in Sierra Leone and the situation between Eritrea and Ethiopia, the Council, by the same decisions, also requested “all States, relevant United Nations bodies and, as appropriate, other organizations and interested parties” to report to the Committee information on possible violations of the measures imposed by the Council.⁷⁶⁸ In one instance, when imposing measures against Somalia, the Council called on “the neighbouring States” to report to the Committee quarterly on their efforts to implement the arms embargo.⁷⁶⁹

By a number of decisions, while setting reporting obligations on the compliance with relevant prohibitions, the Council also addressed its calls to “all States” to cooperate with the relevant Panels of Experts and sanctions committees.⁷⁷⁰ In other instances, the Council explicitly called upon “all States, relevant United Nations bodies and, as appropriate, other organizations and interested parties” to cooperate fully with the Committee and the Panel of Experts.⁷⁷¹ With regard to the measures imposed against Somalia, the Council called upon “all States, in particular those in the region” to provide the relevant Committee with all available information on violations of the arms embargo and also requested “all States and the Transitional National Government and local authorities in Somalia” to cooperate fully with the Panel of Experts in its quest for information.⁷⁷² By a subsequent resolution, the Council called upon “all States in the region and regional organizations, in particular the Inter-Governmental Authority on Development (IGAD), the African Union, and the League of Arab States (LAS)”, to establish focal points to enhance cooperation with the Monitoring Group and to facilitate information exchange.⁷⁷³ By the same resolution, the Council requested that “the neighbouring States” report to the Committee quarterly on their efforts to implement the arms embargo.⁷⁷⁴

In its resolutions concerning, respectively, the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia and the International Tribunal for Rwanda, the Council decided that “all States” should cooperate fully with the Tribunals and their organs in accordance with resolutions 827 (1993) and 955 (1994) and the Statutes of the Tribunals.⁷⁷⁵ Furthermore, by resolution 1503 (2003), the Council set the “completion strategies” for the two Tribunals and called on “the international community” to assist national jurisdictions, in improving their capacity to prosecute cases transferred from the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia and the International Tribunal for Rwanda. By the same resolution, the Council also called on “all States, especially Serbia and Montenegro, Croatia, and Bosnia and Herzegovina, and on the Republika Srpska within Bosnia and Herzegovina” to intensify cooperation with and render all necessary assistance to the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia. Similarly, the Council called on “all States, especially Rwanda, Kenya, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and the Republic of the Congo” to intensify cooperation with and render all necessary assistance to the International Tribunal for Rwanda. Finally, by the same resolution, the Council called on “all States” to cooperate with the International Criminal Police Organization (ICPO-Interpol) in apprehending and transferring persons indicted by the Tribunals.⁷⁷⁶

B. Obligations arising pursuant to Security Council decisions adopted under Article 42

While the above-mentioned decisions adopted under Article 41 were formulated to ensure universal compliance and create binding obligations for all or some States, decisions in accordance with the provisions of Article 42 of the Charter, imposing measures involving the use of armed force, frequently took the form of authorizations or calls on States willing and in a position to take such action.

In a number of decisions providing for the use of “all necessary measures”⁷⁷⁷ to enforce previous resolutions, the Council addressed such authorizations to “Member States” in general,⁷⁷⁸ or more specifically ⁷⁷⁶ Resolution 1503 (2003), paras. 1-4.

⁷⁷⁷ The phrase “all necessary measures” was used by the Security Council in connection with the situation in Afghanistan (resolution 1386 (2001), para. 3); the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina (resolution 1305 (2000), para. 11); and the situation in Liberia (resolution 1497 (2003), para. 5). In connection with the situation in Côte d’Ivoire, reference was made to “the necessary steps” (resolution 1464 (2003), para. 9). In connection with the situation in Sierra Leone, the Council authorized UNAMSIL to “take the necessary action” to fulfil its mandate (resolution 1289 (2000), para. 10).

to “Member States participating”⁷⁷⁹ and “Member States acting”.⁷⁸⁰

By resolution 1386 (2001) of 20 December 2001, authorizing the establishment of the International Security Assistance Force to assist the interim authority of Afghanistan in the maintenance of security in Kabul and its surrounding areas, the Council called upon Member States to contribute personnel, equipment and other resources to the Force, authorized the Member States participating in the Force to take all necessary measures to fulfil its mandate, and called on them to assist the Afghan Interim Authority in the “establishment and training of new Afghan security and armed forces”.⁷⁸¹

By resolution 1497 (2003) of 1 August 2003, in connection with the situation in Liberia, the Council authorized “Member States” to establish a Multinational Force to “support the implementation of the 17 June 2003 ceasefire agreement”. By the terms of the resolution, the Council authorized the Member States participating in the Multinational Force, to take “all necessary measures” to fulfil its mandate. The Council also demanded that “all States in the region” refrain from any action that could contribute to instability in Liberia or on the borders between Liberia, Guinea, Sierra Leone and Côte d’Ivoire.⁷⁸²

By resolution 1484 (2003) of 30 May 2003, authorizing the deployment of an Interim Emergency Multinational Force in Bunia in close coordination with MONUC, the Council authorized the “Member States participating in the Multinational Force in Bunia” to take all necessary measures to fulfil its mandate, and called upon “Member States” to contribute personnel, equipment and other necessary financial and logistic resources to the Multinational Force.⁷⁸³

By resolution 1511 (2003) of 16 October 2003, the Council authorized a multinational force under unified command “to take all necessary measures” to contribute to the maintenance of security and stability in Iraq, and urged Member States to contribute assistance under that United Nations mandate, including military forces, to the multinational force.⁷⁸⁴

Some of the decisions authorizing the use of all necessary measures, in accordance with Article 42 of the Charter, expressly envisaged possible action through regional agencies or arrangements. By resolution 1305 (2000), adopted in connection with the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Council authorized “Member States acting” through or in cooperation with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, to fulfil the role determined in the Dayton Agreement. It further authorized “Member States” to take all necessary measures, at the request of the Stabilization Force, either in defence of SFOR or to assist the force in carrying out its mission. By the same resolution the Council also invited “all States, in particular those in the region” to continue to provide appropriate support and facilities, including transit facilities, for the above-mentioned Member States.⁷⁸⁵ In one instance, related to the situation in Côte d’Ivoire, the Council authorized “Member States participating in the ECOWAS forces deployed in accordance with Chapter VIII together with the French forces supporting them” to take the necessary steps to guarantee the security and freedom of movement of their personnel and to ensure, without prejudice to the responsibilities of the Government of National Reconciliation, the protection of civilians immediately threatened with physical violence within their zones of operation.⁷⁸⁶

Part VII

Obligations of Member States under Article 49 of the Charter

Article 49

The Members of the United Nations shall join in affording mutual assistance in carrying out the measures decided upon by the Security Council.

Note

During the period under review, the obligation of States to join in affording mutual assistance assumed specific relevance in connection with decisions under Chapter VII of the Charter by which the Security Council authorized or called on Member States to take measures to enforce the Council’s resolutions, even though those decisions contained no explicit references to Article 49. In the absence of explicit references to the Article, it is not always possible to ascribe to the Council with any certainty decisions concerning that particular Article. The Council decisions presented in sections A and B may, however, help to shed light on the Council’s interpretation and application of Article 49. Section A provides an overview of the Council’s decisions calling upon Member States to provide mutual assistance in carrying out the decisions adopted in accordance with the provisions of Article 41 of the Charter, while section B focuses on the Council’s decisions making similar calls in connection with the implementation of measures which involved the use of armed force in accordance with the provisions of Article 42 of the Charter.

During the period under consideration, the interpretation and application of Article 49 did not give rise to any significant constitutional discussion in the Council’s deliberations.

A. Calls for mutual assistance in the implementation of decisions adopted under Article 41

In its decisions imposing measures not involving the use of armed force, in accordance with the provisions of Article 41 of the Charter, the Security Council, in a number of instances, requested Member States in a position to do so to offer assistance to concerned States in the implementation of those measures. Such requests were made by the decisions outlined below.

The situation in Liberia

By resolution 1343 (2001) of 7 March 2001, the Council decided that all States were to take the necessary measures to prevent the direct or indirect import of all rough diamonds from Liberia. In that connection, it also urged all diamond exporting countries in West Africa to establish certificate-of-origin regimes for the trade in rough diamonds and called upon “States, relevant international organizations and other bodies in a position to do so to offer assistance” to the concerned Governments.⁷⁸⁷

By resolution 1306 (2000) of 5 July 2000, in connection with its request to all States to take the necessary measures to prohibit the import of all rough diamonds from Liberia, the Council requested “States, relevant international organizations and other bodies in a position to do so to offer assistance” to the Government of Sierra Leone to facilitate the full implementation of an effective certificate-of-origin regime for rough diamonds.⁷⁸⁸ By a subsequent resolution,⁷⁸⁹ the Council reiterated its call upon “States, relevant international organizations and other bodies in a position to do so to offer assistance” to the Government of Liberia and other diamond-exporting countries in West Africa with their certificate-of-origin regimes.

By resolution 1478 (2003) of 6 May 2006, calling upon States of the subregion to strengthen the measures they had taken to combat the spread of small arms and light weapons and mercenary activities, the Council urged “States in a position to do so to provide assistance to the Economic Community of West African States”.⁷⁹⁰

By resolution 1521 (2003) of 22 December 2003, in connection with its request to the National Transitional Government of Liberia to take urgent steps to establish an effective certificate-of-origin regime for trade in rough diamonds from Liberia, the Council called upon “States, relevant international organizations and others in a position to do so to offer assistance” to the National Transitional Government of Liberia in achieving the aforementioned objective.⁷⁹¹

By a statement of the President dated 31 October 2001,⁷⁹² the Council emphasized the necessity for efforts against international terrorism in accordance with resolution 1373 (2001), and welcomed the intention of the Transitional National Government of Somalia to take steps in that regard. By the same statement, the Council urged the international community, including through the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 1373 (2001) concerning counter-terrorism, to “provide assistance” to Somalia for the implementation of the aforementioned resolution.

B. Calls for mutual assistance in the implementation of decisions adopted under Article 42

In its decisions imposing measures involving the use of armed force, while calling upon States willing and in a position to take relevant enforcement action, the Security Council regularly requested “all States” to provide appropriate support and assistance to those States. Such requests were made by the decisions outlined below.

The situation in Afghanistan

By resolution 1386 (2001) of 20 December 2001, authorizing the International Security Assistance Force to take “all necessary means” to assist the Afghan Interim Authority in the maintenance of security in Kabul and its surrounding areas, the Council called upon Member States to “contribute personnel, equipment and other resources to the Force”, and invited those Member States to inform the leadership of the Force and the Secretary-General. The Council further encouraged neighbouring States and other Member States to provide to the Force such necessary assistance as might be requested, including overflight clearances and transit.⁷⁹³ By subsequent resolutions extending the mandate of ISAF, the Council called upon Member States to “contribute personnel, equipment and other resources to the Force, and to

The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina

By resolution 1305 (2000) of 21 June 2000, the Council paid tribute to those Member States that participated in the multinational Stabilization Force established in accordance with resolution 1088 (1996), and welcomed their willingness to assist the parties to the Peace Agreement by continuing to deploy a multinational Stabilization Force. By the same resolution, the Council also invited "all States, in particular those in the region to continue to provide appropriate support and facilities, including transit facilities, for the Member States participating in the Stabilization Force".⁷⁹⁵

The situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo

By resolution 1484 (2003) of 30 May 2003, the Council, authorizing the deployment of an Interim Emergency Multinational Force in Bunia in close coordination with the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, called upon all Member States and "in particular those in the Great Lakes region" to provide all necessary support to facilitate the swift deployment in Bunia of the Multinational Force.⁷⁹⁶

The situation in Liberia

establishing a Multinational Force in Liberia, the Council called upon Member States to "contribute personnel, equipment and other resources to the Multinational Force", and stressed that the expenses of the Multinational Force would be borne by the participating Member States and other voluntary contributions. By the same resolution, it also called upon all Liberian parties and Member States to "cooperate fully" with the Multinational Force in the execution of its mandate and to respect the security and freedom of movement of the Multinational Force, as well as to ensure the safe and unimpeded access of international humanitarian personnel to populations in need in Liberia.⁷⁹⁷

The situation in Sierra Leone

By a statement of the President dated 4 May 2000,⁷⁹⁸ in connection with the situation in Sierra Leone, the Council expressed its full support for the continued efforts of the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone in the fulfilment of its mandate, and called upon all States in a position to do so to "assist the Mission" in that regard. By resolution 1299 (2000) of 19 May 2000, the Council members expressed their appreciation to all States which, in order to expedite the rapid reinforcement of the Mission, had accelerated the deployment of their troops to the Mission, made available additional personnel and offered logistical, technical and other forms of military assistance, and called upon "all those in a position to do so to provide further support".⁷⁹⁹

Part VIII

Special economic problems of the nature described in Article 50 of the Charter

Article 50

If preventive or enforcement measures against any state are taken by the Security Council, any other state, whether a Member of the United Nations or not, which finds itself confronted with special economic problems arising from the carrying out of those measures shall have the right to consult the Security Council with regard to a solution of those problems.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council paid close attention to the issue of sanctions and their unintended negative impact on civilian populations and third States. With a view to minimizing those effects, the Council, through a note by the President, decided to establish an Informal Working Group to develop general recommendations on how to improve the effectiveness of sanction regimes and limit their unintended negative effects.⁸⁰⁰ The Council also held three meetings on the item entitled “General issues relating to sanctions” and, while considering other agenda items, also made decisions and discussed topics related to Article 50.

Section A of this part examines decisions of the Council relevant to Article 50, while section B highlights the salient issues raised in the Council’s deliberations regarding the interpretation and application of the Article. Finally, section C briefly presents material relating to the Council’s subsidiary bodies in connection with Article 50, as included in the reports of those bodies to the Council and in the reports of the Secretary-General on the “Implementation of the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations related to assistance to third States affected by the application of sanctions”.⁸⁰¹

A. Decisions of the Security Council relating to Article 50

The situation in Angola

By resolution 1295 (2000) of 18 April 2000, having noted the conclusions and recommendations of the Panel of Experts established by the Security Council pursuant to resolution 1237 (1999) of 7 May 1999, the Council requested the Secretary-General to establish a monitoring mechanism composed of up to five experts, for a period of six months, to collect additional relevant information and investigate relevant leads relating to any allegations of violations of the measures contained in resolutions 864 (1993), 1127 (1997) and 1173 (1998) concerning the situation in Angola, “including through visits to relevant countries”, and to report periodically to the relevant Committee established pursuant to resolution 864 (1993), including by providing a written report by 18 October 2000, with a view to “improving the implementation of the measures imposed against UNITA”.⁸⁰² The Council further requested the Secretary-General, acting in consultation with the Committee, to appoint experts to serve on the monitoring mechanism. Following consultations with the Committee, on 11 July 2000, the Secretary-General appointed five experts to serve on the monitoring mechanism.⁸⁰³

By resolution 1483 (2003) of 22 May 2003, the Council decided to terminate, with certain exceptions, all prohibitions related to trade with Iraq and the provision of financial or economic resources to Iraq, as established by resolution 661 (1990) and subsequent relevant resolutions. By the same resolution, the Council also decided to impose new targeted financial sanctions.⁸⁰⁴ By resolution 1518 (2003) of 24 November 2003, the Council established a Committee to administer the new measures imposed by resolution 1483 (2003). In his report on the implementation of the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations related to assistance to third States affected by the application of sanctions, the Secretary-General observed that, as a result of the modifications made to the measures imposed on Iraq since May 2003, all of the Council’s existing sanctions regimes “were now targeted in nature and, the unintended consequences for civilian populations and third States were minimized”.⁸⁰⁵

The situation in Liberia

By resolution 1478 (2003) of 6 May 2003, the Council decided to consider how best to minimize any humanitarian or socio-economic impact of the measures imposed by paragraph 17 of its resolution, and requested the Secretary-General and the Panel of Experts to submit a report in that regard.⁸⁰⁶ Pursuant to the request, the Secretary-General submitted a report dated 5 August 2003 by which he provided observations and recommendations on the possible humanitarian and socio-economic impacts of the timber sanctions imposed against Liberia.⁸⁰⁷ By a letter dated 7 August 2003 addressed to the President of the

By resolution 1521 (2003) of 22 December 2003, the Security Council requested the Panel of Experts on Liberia to report with observations and recommendations including, inter alia, how to minimize any humanitarian and socio-economic impact of timber sanctions against Liberia.⁸⁰⁹

By resolution 1306 (2000) of 5 July 2000, the Security Council requested the Committee established pursuant to resolution 1132 (1997) to hold an exploratory hearing in New York to assess the role of diamonds in the Sierra Leone conflict and the link between trade in Sierra Leone diamonds and trade in arms and related materiel in violation of resolution 1171 (1998), “involving representatives of interested States and regional organizations”, the diamond industry and other relevant experts.⁸¹⁰ The exploratory hearing was held on 31 July and 1 August 2000.⁸¹¹

General issues relating to sanctions

Establishment of an informal working group

In a note by the President dated 17 April 2000,⁸¹² the members of the Council decided to establish an informal working group to develop general recommendations on how to improve the effectiveness of United Nations sanctions. The working group was given the task of, among other things, examining the unintended impact of sanctions on third States and of assisting Member States in implementing sanctions. It was to report its findings to the Council by 30 November 2000, but the working group was unable to reach a consensus on all of the recommendations. By two subsequent notes by the President dated 15 January 2002 and 18 December 2003, respectively, the Council agreed to extend the mandate of the working group until 31 December 2004.⁸¹³ The working group’s proposed outcome document thus remained under consideration, with a focus on those issues for which there was no provisional agreement.

B. Discussion relating to Article 50

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

At the 4336th meeting, on 28 June 2001, the representative of India observed that the sanctions on Iraq had caused acute economic and financial hardship to other countries, including India. He complained that the request by India for relief under Article 50 was still pending with the sanctions committee.⁸¹⁴

Similarly, by a letter dated 24 June 2002 addressed to the President of the Council,⁸¹⁵ the representative of Tunisia submitted a matter relating to the requirements of Article 50 concerning the losses incurred by his country as a result of the consequences of the embargo imposed on Iraq by the Council since 1990. He therefore requested the Council to take note “once more” of the very serious impact of the sanctions and the challenges which the Tunisian national economy continued to face since the imposition of the embargo regime on Iraq. In that connection, he insisted on the necessity for the Council to understand Tunisia’s “urgent and vital need to maintain its national interests in cooperation with Iraq on the basis of Article 50 of the Charter of the United Nations”.⁸¹⁶

By a similar letter dated 17 July 2001 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁸¹⁷ the representative of Malaysia brought to the attention of the Council that many countries, including Malaysia, had suffered “enormous economic losses” as a result of the implementation of the Council’s sanctions against Iraq. To address those problems in accordance with the provisions of Article 50 of the Charter, the representative asked the Council to enable Malaysia to benefit from the provisions of Article 50 in the context of its economic and trade relations with Iraq, and thus to alleviate the negative consequences the country had suffered as a result of more than a decade of sanctions imposed against Iraq.

General issues relating to sanctions

The Council held three meetings on the item entitled “General issues relating to sanctions”, with much discussion focusing on issues relating to Article 50.⁸¹⁸ No decisions arose from those meetings, although progress was reported in the design and implementation of sanctions regimes.

At the 4128th meeting, on 17 April 2000, the Under-Secretary-General for Political Affairs asserted that it was essential for the United Nations system to develop a coordinated and integrated approach to minimize unintended consequences on civilian populations and third States. To that end, he recommended that the Council consider authorizing the Secretariat to dispatch assessment missions to targeted States and neighbouring countries either before sanctions were imposed or shortly thereafter. He also proposed that the Council consider including in its resolutions provisions to address the impact of sanctions on non-targeted States. He suggested that “practical assistance arising from Article 50” be addressed through special arrangements with individual neighbouring States and through donors’ conferences to identify possible forms of financial assistance and support for non-targeted States.⁸¹⁹ The representative of France stated that third States and targeted States were often not invited to speak before sanctions committees. He added that measures had been planned to that end, but had not been applied.⁸²⁰ The representative of Namibia noted that, while he believed that parties should be heard by the Council under the terms of Article 50, solutions needed to include the provision of special assistance to compensate for economic losses and adverse social impact.⁸²¹ The representative of Tunisia agreed that, notwithstanding Article 50, there was still no effective mechanism to compensate for losses suffered by third countries.⁸²² Several representatives noted the negative effects that their countries had suffered as a result of sanctions placed against another country,⁸²³ while others affirmed that the Council had to do more to minimize negative consequences for third States.⁸²⁴ The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of Canada, suggested that donor-country conferences addressing the needs of particular Member States adversely affected by sanctions might be a measure to address concerns related to Article 50.⁸²⁵ The representative of Malaysia stated that sanctions affected third countries since they often imposed extremely high economic costs on the major economic partners of targeted States. Emphasizing that this aspect was well recognized in Article 50 of the Charter, but very rarely invoked or seriously addressed, he regretted that assistance to disadvantaged States had been ad hoc and inadequate and, while some provisions for third-party compensation had been made, no such aid had been forthcoming in the case of the African sanctions regimes. Where little or no assistance was available, he asserted, the affected States may have had no choice but to continue surreptitiously with their traditional economic relationships to avoid economic hardship. On occasion, they had done so openly, as was clearly the case with respect to the sanctions regime on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, when the Organization of African Unity decided in 1998 to cease complying with the United Nations sanctions directed against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.⁸²⁶ The representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia stated that the implementation of Article 50 of the Charter had enormous political, economic, social and humanitarian importance for many Member States. His country regretted the non-implementation of Article 50 but was pleased by the decision to establish, on a temporary basis, an informal working group of the Council to develop general recommendations on how to improve the effectiveness of United Nations sanctions. He hoped that those recommendations would not neglect Article 50 of the Charter.⁸²⁷ The representative of Bulgaria similarly recognized the importance of the proper implementation of Article 50 and, in that connection, of the informal working group.⁸²⁸ at the 4128th meeting, the representative of Egypt drew the attention of the Council to the “collateral” and “large-scale damage” caused by sanctions to the interests of third States and their population, as it had been the case for his country. He invited the Council to consider establishing “more permanent mechanisms and measures” for the holding of the consultations provided for in Article 50 with third States that found or might find themselves confronted with special economic problems arising from the carrying out of enforcement measures imposed by the Council. He further noted that, in order to “implement Article 50 of the Charter in full”, the conclusions arrived at by the ad hoc expert group, convened in June 1998 in accordance with General Assembly resolution 52/162 to develop a methodology for assessing the consequences incurred by third States, constituted “an important step towards the practical implementation of the provisions of Articles 49 and 50 of the Charter”.⁸³⁰

At the 4394th meeting, on 22 and 25 October 2001, discussions on general issues relating to sanctions continued, with many representatives again emphasizing the need to minimize sanctions’ negative effects on third States.⁸³¹ In their statements, two speakers explicitly invoked Article 50 and the need to improve its implementation.⁸³² Pointing to improvements in sanctions regimes, the representative of Jamaica observed that there had been a shift by the Council in its approach to the design of sanctions. She stated that recent sanctions on Eritrea and Ethiopia, Liberia, Sierra Leone and the Taliban regime of Afghanistan had all been targeted and that, in designing those sanctions, the Council had borrowed extensively from the preliminary work and reports of the Bonn-Berlin and Interlaken processes, as well as from the work of its own working group on general issues of sanctions.⁸³³

At the 4713th meeting, on 25 February 2003, the State Secretary for Foreign Affairs of Sweden presented to the Council the results of the Stockholm Process on the Implementation of Targeted Sanctions.⁸³⁴ He recognized that, while the use of sanctions had increased, concern had been growing over the negative effects of economic sanctions on vulnerable populations and societies in general, with the collateral effects of sanctions on third States being highlighted.⁸³⁵ In his statement, the representative of Bulgaria informed the Council that, as an active participant in both the preparatory discussion and in the final meeting, held in Stockholm in November 2002, Bulgaria shared and supported the conclusions, guidelines and recommendations laid down in the final text of the report. He added that the inclusion of a special section dedicated to unintended consequences of sanctions implementation for third States and to the need for direct or indirect compensation for damages caused to them was backed by the experience of Bulgaria as a State severely affected by the sanctions imposed on the former Yugoslavia, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Iraq. He concluded that, although the practical implementation of the provisions of Article 50 had been extensively discussed in the Sixth Committee of the General Assembly, in the Security Council and during the Stockholm Process, there were still aspects to be clarified and work on these issues should continue.⁸³⁶

Briefing by Mr. Carl Bildt, Special Envoy of the Secretary-General for the Balkans

At the Council’s 4164th meeting, on 23 June 2000, the representative of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia suggested that if the Security Council would like to “shoulder fully its responsibility under the Charter”, it should address the implementation of Article 50 of the Charter.⁸³⁷

Ensuring an effective role of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security, particularly in Africa

At the Council's 4288th meeting, on 7 March 2001, the representative of Egypt emphasized the hope that the Council would consistently adhere to the provisions of Article 50 and would apply it without discrimination or politicization.⁸³⁸ At the same meeting, the representative of Tunisia indicated that reforms in the area of sanctions had to take into account the adverse impact of sanctions and the provisions of the Charter, in particular those of Article 50.⁸³⁹

C. Instances arising in Security Council subsidiary bodies

Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait

At its 4673rd meeting, on 18 December 2002, the Council heard a briefing by the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait. In his statement, the Chairman reported that the Committee was devoting a great deal of time to discussing reported violations of sanctions, as well as to humanitarian exemptions under resolution 661 and application of Article 50 of the Charter and, in that regard, drew attention to the various reports submitted to the Council by the Committee.⁸⁴⁰

The Chairman reported that in its deliberations concerning issues related to Article 50, the Committee had granted permission for Member States that were not members of the Committee to address it at formal meetings concerning their special economic problems falling under Article 50.⁸⁴¹

At its 215th meeting, on 19 March 2001, the Committee discussed how to proceed with the communications from Belarus and India concerning the application of Article 50 of the Charter. In that connection, at its 223rd meeting, on 10 September 2001, the Committee was briefed by the Secretariat on the history of the application of Article 50 and the past practice of the Committee. At its 224th meeting, on 9 October 2001, in response to letters from Belarus and India, the Committee agreed to send letters, with attached questions on matters for which clarifications were sought, inviting the representatives of Belarus and India to present their cases to the Committee. At its 227th meeting, on 3 December 2001, the Additional Secretary of the Ministry of External Relations of India addressed the Committee regarding special economic problems arising from the carrying out of preventive or enforcement measures imposed by the Council and stated that his country estimated to have lost $25 billion to $30 billion as a result of United Nations sanctions against Iraq. He suggested that India be compensated through an India-Iraq "wheat for oil" programme, given India's surplus production of wheat.⁸⁴² By a letter from the Chairman dated 28 February 2002, the Committee informed India that it had considered the matter at several formal and informal meetings but had been unable to reach a consensus, although it would continue to study the matter. India replied in a letter dated 26 March 2002, stating its disappointment that no consensus had been reached and requesting an expeditious and positive decision on the matter.⁸⁴³

In a letter dated 24 June 2002 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁸⁴⁴ the representative of Tunisia brought to the attention of the Council the impact of the Iraqi sanctions regime on the Tunisian economy during the past 11 years, totalling $7 billion as at May 2002. The members of the Council agreed to refer the letter to the Committee for its consideration.⁸⁴⁵ On 31 July 2002, at its 236th meeting, the Committee agreed to have the Chairman approach the representative of Tunisia to hear what kind of response, if any, he was expecting from the Committee.⁸⁴⁶

Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 1267 (1999) concerning Al-Qaida and the Taliban and associated individuals and entities

On 15 December 2003, several Member States attended an informal meeting of the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 1267 (1999) concerning Al-Qaida and the Taliban and associated individuals and entities. They addressed alleged inaccuracies contained in the second report completed by the Monitoring Group established pursuant to Security Council resolution 1363 (2001) and mandated by the Council to monitor the implementation of the measures imposed against Al-Qaida and the Taliban.⁸⁴⁷ Although the measures imposed against Al-Qaida and the Taliban and associated individuals and entities were targeted in nature and were not in themselves cited as causing special economic problems, one of the States appearing before the Committee argued that the allegations levelled against it by the Monitoring Group might result in decreased tourism, thus causing an adverse effect upon its economy.⁸⁴⁸

Part IX
Right of self-defence in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter

Article 51

Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence if an armed attack occurs against a Member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken measures necessary to maintain international peace and security. Measures taken by Members in the exercise of this right of self-defence shall be immediately reported to the Security Council and shall not in any way affect the authority and responsibility of the Security Council under the present Charter to take at any time such action as it deems necessary in order to maintain or restore international peace and security.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council reaffirmed the principle set out in Article 51 in four decisions relating to “threats to international peace and security caused by terrorist acts” and “small arms”, respectively. Those cases are presented in section A.

During the same period, in the course of the deliberations in the Council, a variety of issues occasioned pertinent arguments relating to the interpretation of the principle of self-defence. Specifically, the Council debated the application and interpretation of Article 51 in connection with the following items: (a) the situation in Afghanistan; (b) the situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo; (c) the situation between Iraq and Kuwait; (d) the situation in the Middle East, including the Palestinian question; (e) letters dated 5 October 2003 from, respectively, the permanent representatives of the Syrian Arab Republic and Lebanon addressed to the President of the Security Council; (f) small arms; (g) threats to international peace and security caused by terrorist acts; (h) the role of the Security Council in the pacific settlement of disputes; and (i) the role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts. The arguments advanced during the Council’s deliberations in connection with those situations are presented in section B.

Those cases will be followed by a brief overview in section C of instances in which the right of self-defence was invoked in official correspondence, but which did not give rise to any constitutional discussion relevant to Article 51.

A. Decisions of the Security Council relating to Article 51

Small arms

By two statements of the President dated 4 September 2001 and 31 October 2002, respectively,⁸⁴⁹ in connection with the Council’s consideration of the destabilizing role played by the accumulation and uncontrolled spread of small arms and light weapons in many regions of the world, the Council members reaffirmed “the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations and, subject to the Charter, the right of each State to import, produce and retain small arms and light weapons for its self-defence and security needs”.⁸⁵⁰

By resolution 1368 (2001) of 12 September 2001, the Council condemned the terrorist attacks which took place on 11 September 2001 and called on States to work together to bring to justice the perpetrators, organizers, and sponsors of the attacks, and to redouble their efforts to prevent and suppress terrorist acts. The Council also expressed its readiness to take all necessary steps to respond to the terrorist attacks of 11 September 2001 and to combat all forms of terrorism, in accordance with its responsibilities under the Charter of the United Nations. By the same resolution, the Council recognized “the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence in accordance with the Charter”.⁸⁵¹

By resolution 1373 (2001) of 28 September 2001, the Security Council decided that all States were to prevent and suppress the financing of terrorist acts and called on States to work together urgently to achieve these goals. The Council asserted that such acts constituted a threat to international peace and security and expressed its deep concern about the increase of acts of terrorism in various regions of the world. In that connection, the Council reaffirmed “the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence as recognized by the Charter”.⁸⁵²

B. Discussion relating to Article 51

The situation in Afghanistan

By a letter dated 7 October 2001 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁸⁵³ the representative of the United States announced that, acting in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, his Government, together with other States, would initiate actions “in the exercise of its inherent right of individual and collective self-defence following the armed attacks that were carried out against the United States on 11 September 2001”.⁸⁵⁴ He reported that the United States armed forces had initiated actions against Al-Qaida terrorist training camps and military installations of the Taliban regime in Afghanistan.

Through a series of letters addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁸⁵⁵ the representatives of the United Kingdom, Canada, France, Australia, Germany, the Netherlands, New Zealand and Poland reported that, in accordance with “the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence”, their respective Governments had undertaken actions involving the participation of military forces within the international efforts to combat the terrorist network responsible for the attacks against targets in the United States. By two letters addressed to the Secretary-General dated 8 and 17 October 2001, respectively,⁸⁵⁶ the representative of Belgium conveyed the European Union’s solidarity with the United States and its support for the actions taken by the latter “in self-defence”.

At its 4414th meeting, on 13 November 2001, the Council held an open debate on the situation in Afghanistan, mainly focusing on the country’s future political transition. During the debate, a number of speakers made reference to the actions taken by the United States armed forces in Afghanistan initiated on 7 October 2001. The representative of Norway emphasized the necessity of breaking the cycle of war and misrule in Afghanistan and argued that the Taliban regime in Afghanistan had ignored binding Security Council resolutions demanding it to stop harbouring and supporting terrorists. He therefore concluded that there was “no alternative but to use military force — in accordance with the right of self-defence”.⁸⁵⁷ The representative of Egypt recalled that military operations were pursued in Afghanistan in connection with the Council’s commitment to “the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence” as expressed in resolution 1368 (2001) of 12 September 2001.⁸⁵⁸ By contrast, the representative of Malaysia cautioned that although the use of military force was “a legitimate course of action as an act of self-defence”, it was not “the only course of action, the most effective or politically wise”, given the consequences of the military action on the Afghan people.⁸⁵⁹

By a letter dated 16 November 2001 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁸⁶⁰ the representative of Chile transmitted the statement on international terrorism issued by the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the Rio Group on the subject of international terrorism at their meeting on 14 November 2001. The statement reaffirmed the strong support by the Rio Group for the action taken to combat terrorism, “in exercise of the right of self-defence, in the framework of the Charter of the United Nations”, following the “appalling attacks in New York and Washington, D.C.”.⁸⁶¹

By a letter dated 20 November 2001 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁸⁶² the representative of Belgium presented the conclusions of the General Affairs Council of the European Union on Afghanistan. The General Affairs Council welcomed the recent developments on the ground which contributed to achieving the objectives of the international coalition against terrorism, and confirmed its unreserved support for the coalition’s action “undertaken in self-defence and in conformity with Security Council resolution 1368 (2001) of 12 September 2001”.

The situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo

At its 4092nd meeting, on 24 January 2000, the Council debated the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the necessity of implementing the Lusaka Ceasefire Agreement. The representative of Argentina acknowledged that the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo could not be analysed or effectively resolved without consideration of other key principles of international law, such as respect for the territorial integrity and political independence of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, non-interference in its internal affairs, the withdrawal of all foreign forces that were on its territory without its explicit consent, the inalienable right to individual or collective self-defence and the illegality of the acquisition of territory by force”.⁸⁶³

At the 4273rd meeting, on 7 February 2001, the representative of the United States pointed out that the human rights situation in areas under Rwandan occupation or under the control of the Congolese Rally for Democracy (Rassemblement congolais pour la démocratie) was deeply troubling. He noted that Rwanda’s claims to the right of self-defence were “badly undercut by the numerous Congolese civilian victims”.⁸⁶⁴

At its 4317th meeting, on 3 May 2001, the Council discussed the illegal exploitation of natural resources and other forms of wealth in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. During the debate, the representative of Zimbabwe stated that the military intervention by Angola, Namibia and Zimbabwe came as a result of the appeal by the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo. He explained that the Democratic Republic of the Congo’s request to the Southern African Development Community was in line with Article 51 of the Charter regarding the right of a State to ask for military assistance when its security, sovereignty and territorial integrity were threatened.⁸⁶⁵

At the Council’s 4437th meeting, on 14 December 2001, the representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo emphasized that no army of a SADC member country would have been brought into his country without the consent of the Government. He insisted that the Congolese Government viewed the condemnation of an initiative that enabled it to defend its national sovereignty as amounting to “depriving a State of its basic right under Article 51” of the Charter “to resort to individual or collective self-defence to preserve its sovereignty and territorial integrity”.⁸⁶⁶ Similarly, the representative of Zimbabwe pointed out that the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo had invited the SADC countries to come to its assistance in fending off aggression against its territory in exercise of its right to self-defence as enshrined in Article 51 of the United Nations Charter.⁸⁶⁷

By a letter dated 18 July 2001 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁸⁶⁸ the representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo commented on the situation in Kisangani, following the refusal by Rwanda and its allies to demilitarize the city. He stressed that the reported abuses in the occupied territories could not be blamed on the Government, as such clashes were initiated by the Congolese resistance. He invoked peoples' right to resist foreign occupation and domination and characterized the situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo as a "case of self-defence by the Congolese in the face of aggression".⁸⁶⁹

By a letter dated 25 February 2002 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁸⁷⁰ the representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo warned that troops of the Rwandan Patriotic Army had flagrantly violated the ceasefire by attacking troops based in Muliro, in the vicinity of Lake Tanganyika. In response, faced with a "situation of self-defence", the Forces armées congolaises had put up fierce resistance to the attackers, and had succeeded in driving the enemy troops beyond Kamamba. By a subsequent letter dated 28 February 2002 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁸⁷¹ the representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo reiterated that the Congolese armed forces had acted in self-defence when resisting Rwandan armed forces and had pushed them back beyond Kamamba.

By another letter dated 18 March 2002 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁸⁷² the representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo underlined his Government's duty to safeguard the territorial integrity and national sovereignty of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, "as authorized by the Charter of the United Nations, above all Article 51" against attacks from Rwanda and the Rassemblement congolais pour la démocratie (RCD)-Goma.⁸⁷³

By a letter dated 15 April 2002 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁸⁷⁴ the representative of Rwanda reported that the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo had "allied itself with the planners and perpetrators of the Rwandan genocide". He asked the members of the Council to re-examine the circumstances which had led Rwanda "to intervene militarily in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, in exercise of the inherent right of self-defence, pursuant to Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations".⁸⁷⁵

At the Council's 4634th meeting, on 24 October 2002, the representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo reaffirmed his Government's conviction that it was within its legitimate rights to take all necessary measures to respond to the Rwandese armed aggression "in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter, including seeking assistance from the States members of the Southern Africa Development Community by invoking their natural right to collective and individual self-defence".⁸⁷⁶ denouncing the violations of Iraq's airspace by United States and United Kingdom aircraft based in Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and Turkey, informed the Council that the Iraqi air forces, "acting in self-defence", had engaged the aircraft and had driven them off.

At its 4152nd meeting, on 8 June 2000, the Council unanimously adopted resolution 1302 (2000), by which it reaffirmed the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq and renewed the oil-for-food programme intended to alleviate the humanitarian impact of the sanctions imposed on Iraq. Responding to assertions made by the representative of the Russian Federation that the United States and United Kingdom aircraft had targeted civilian sites and the economic infrastructure in Iraq, the representative of the United States stated that the limited military operations of the United States aircraft were carried out "in self-defence" against military targets that threatened them and that they did not impact the overall humanitarian situation.⁸⁷⁸

By a letter dated 17 February 2001 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁸⁷⁹ the representative of Iraq pointed out that the right of self-defence could not justify the military actions initiated by the United States against Iraq, which could be qualified as "a unilateral use of armed force against the sovereignty of an independent State". In a subsequent letter dated 20 February 2001 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁸⁸⁰ the representative of Iraq reaffirmed his country's "legitimate and inherent right of self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter and its inherent right under international law to compensation for the damage, in both human and material terms", that was caused by military acts against its territory undertaken by the United States and the United Kingdom.⁸⁸¹ By the same letter, the representative of Iraq urged the Council to put an end to the aggression and to ensure that the aggressors would be made responsible. In identical letters dated 16 August 2001 addressed to the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council,⁸⁸² the representative of Iraq replied to allegations by the United States that its military attacks were a response to provocation on the part of Iraqi air defence personnel. He cautioned that such a view would mean that Iraq would be denied the right to self-defence affirmed by Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations.⁸⁸³

At its 4531st meeting, on 14 May 2002, the Council debated a number of proposals by the Syrian Arab Republic with a view to amending the draft resolution before the Council extending the provisions of the oil-for-food programme.⁸⁸⁴ In that connection, the representative of the Syrian Arab Republic affirmed that the proposals were intended to ensure that Iraq was not denied "its natural right to acquire means for self-defence, in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter, provided they did not include weapons of mass destruction".⁸⁸⁵

By a letter dated 28 May 2002 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁸⁸⁶ the representative of Iraq reaffirmed that the Iraqi army and people would continue "to exercise the right to legitimate self-defence" against the attacks by the United States and urged the international community "to endeavour to halt this aggression and bring its perpetrators to account".⁸⁸⁷ By a subsequent letter dated 11 June 2002 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁸⁸⁸ the representative of Iraq declared that the United States had violated resolutions 255 (1968) and 984 (1995) by threatening to use nuclear weapons against States that did not have nuclear weapons. He made reference to the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice of 8 July 1996⁸⁸⁹ that held as unlawful the threat or use of force by means of nuclear weapons that was contrary to Article 2 (4) of the Charter and that failed to meet all the requirements of Article 51.⁸⁹⁰ By a subsequent letter dated 15 August 2002 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁸⁹¹ the representative of Iraq reported on the effects of the United States-led military action against Iraq and requested the Council to recognize Iraq's right to defend itself under Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, and to reconsider its decisions that prevented Iraq from exercising its right of self-defence.

At its 4625th meeting, on 16 October 2002, the Council debated the question of Iraq's compliance with the norms of international law and relevant Security Council resolutions. The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran noted that the concept of "pre-emptive strike" distorted the "conventional understanding of the right of self-defence as clearly enshrined in customary international law and codified in the United Nations Charter".⁸⁹² The representative of Cuba concurred that the collective security system should be based on cooperation and not on doctrines that "constitute a violation of the spirit and letter of the Charter of the United Nations and that distort the inherent right of legitimate self-defence, as recognized by Article 51 of the Charter".⁸⁹³ During the course of the debate, several speakers made reference to the Secretary-General's address to the General Assembly on 12 September 2002 in which he emphasized that, while Article 51 of the Charter provided States with the right of self-defence, if attacked, when it came to addressing the broader threats to international peace and security, there was no substitute for the unique legitimacy provided by the United Nations.⁸⁹⁴

At the 4644th meeting on 8 November 2002, the representative of the United States, welcoming the adoption of resolution 1441 (2002), and affirming that the resolution did not contain any "hidden triggers" or "automaticity", noted that, "in one way or another", Iraq should be disarmed. He added that if the Council failed to act decisively in the event of further Iraqi violations, the resolution would "not constrain any Member State from acting to defend itself against the threat posed by Iraq or to enforce relevant United Nations resolutions and protect world peace and security".⁸⁹⁵

At its 4709th meeting, on 18 February 2003, the Council discussed the issue of disarmament in connection with Iraq. The representative of Cuba remarked that the doctrine of pre-emptive attack advocated the right to use, or threaten to use, force and to take unilateral military action against other States, in advance and in the face of indeterminate and vague threats. He asserted that this interpretation was a violation of the spirit and the letter of the Charter of the United Nations and turned "the inherent right of legitimate self-defence into a blank cheque".⁸⁹⁶ The representative of the Gambia argued that the position taken by African Governments on the issue was clear and fully consistent with the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations. Article 51 permitted the use of force only if an armed attack occurred and, even then, only until the Council had taken "measures necessary to maintain international peace and security".⁸⁹⁷ Meanwhile, the representative of Zimbabwe reminded the Council that a Member State could engage in individual and collective measures of self-defence even without the United Nations but, as shown by the Iraq case, Security Council authority had "assisted United States policy by adding the teeth of economic sanctions, extending a broad political umbrella and authorizing on-site monitoring on foreign-State territory".⁸⁹⁸

At its 4717th meeting, on 11 March 2003, the Council continued its deliberations on Iraq's compliance with Council resolutions and, specifically, on the alleged possession by Iraq of weapons of mass destruction. The representative of Cuba emphasized that, in the absence of evidence from inspections by the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency, a war against Iraq would be "unjust and totally unnecessary". Consequently, he concluded that Iraq did not pose a credible threat or risk to the national security of the United States and war against Iraq could not be seen as "an act of self-defence".⁸⁹⁹ In the continuation of the debate, the representative of the Sudan highlighted that the conventional view in international law was that the Charter prohibited war except in the case of self-defence, pursuant to Article 51 and to Chapter VII on the basis of Security Council resolutions".⁹⁰⁰

By a letter dated 16 March 2003 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁹⁰¹ the representative of Iraq declared that in view of the escalation of threats of aggression against Iraq and the increased massing of United States and British military in Kuwait, Iraq would take the necessary steps to exercise its legitimate right of self-defence, pursuant to Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, to protect the area of the port and city of Umm Qasr, the lives and property of Iraqi citizens and public property.

In the aftermath of the United States-led military action against Iraq initiated on 20 March 2003, by a letter dated 24 March 2003 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹⁰² the Permanent Observer of the League of Arab States to the United Nations transmitted a resolution adopted by the League that condemned the United States-led military action against Iraq, in conformity with Article 51 of the Charter.

At its 4726th meeting, on 26 March 2003, the Council convened in response to letters dated 24 March 2003 from the representatives of Iraq and Malaysia addressed to the President of the Council,⁹⁰³ and discussed, inter alia, the issue of the use of force in connection with the right of self-defence. The representative of Yemen stressed that using force against others for reasons other than self-defence and without a Council mandate constituted a flagrant violation of the principles of international law and the Charter.⁹⁰⁴ The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran held that the unilateral war against Iraq did not meet any standard of international legitimacy and that it was not waged in self-defence against any prior armed attack nor could Iraq be considered an imminent threat against the national security of “belligerent Powers”.⁹⁰⁵ Along the same lines, the representative of Lebanon cautioned that the invocation of the right to self-defence was an invalid argument, “since Article 51 of the Charter recognizes the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence only if an armed attack occurs against a Member of the United Nations”,⁹⁰⁶ a condition not met in the case of Iraq. Finally, the representative of Iraq reiterated his country’s commitment to the Geneva Conventions and the provisions of international humanitarian law, which his country would not disobey except in “self-defence of its people, its dignity, sovereignty and independence”.⁹⁰⁷

The situation in the Middle East, including the Palestinian question

At its 4506th meeting, on 3 April 2002, the Council debated the situation in the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem. During the discussion, the representative of South Africa stressed that Israel’s decision “to destroy Palestinian infrastructure, to humiliate and humble Palestinian civilians and to threaten the life of the legitimate, elected and internationally recognized leader of the Palestinian people” could not be justified “as acts of counter-terrorism or even self-defence”.⁹⁰⁸ The representative of Saudi Arabia concurred that Israel’s “state terrorism” was “not being undertaken in self-defence or as a means of protecting its citizens”, but as a means of protecting its occupation and of consecrating its usurpation of Palestinian territory.⁹⁰⁹ Referring to the humanitarian situation in the occupied territories, the representative of Singapore acknowledged Israel’s right to “exercise self-defence” but emphasized that, under international law, Israel must allow immediate medical access to the occupied areas by international humanitarian agencies such as the International Committee of the Red Cross.⁹¹⁰ The representative of Cuba asserted that the “right of self-defence” could not justify the illegal occupation of territories or the forced exile of Palestinians from their land of birth.⁹¹¹ The representative of Iraq warned that Israel and the United States sought to transform the right of self-defence into a political means to justify acts of aggression.⁹¹² Similarly, the representative of the Sudan qualified as unacceptable Israel’s justification for its actions as aiming to combat terrorism or providing self-defence.⁹¹³ That point of view was reinforced by the representative of Qatar, who insisted that the “Israeli onslaught” could not be categorized as self-defence.⁹¹⁴ However, the representative of Canada expressed his Government’s recognition for “Israel’s right to exist within secure and recognized borders and its right to self-defence against terrorist acts". Nonetheless, he recalled that the continuing Israeli incursions into Palestinian towns and cities fed the spiral of violence.⁹¹⁵ The representative of the Syrian Arab Republic insisted that Israel was misleading the world by claiming to commit its acts of aggression under "the guise of self-defence".⁹¹⁶ The representative of Mexico endorsed that view, declaring that his country was contesting Israel's invocation of the right to self-defence to explain its military incursions into Palestinian cities and the siege and kidnapping of the President of the Palestinian National Authority. He declared that, on the contrary, Israel was "not acting in accordance with the principles of legitimate self-defence recognized by Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations".⁹¹⁷ The Secretary-General cautioned that the Israeli actions since the adoption of Security Council resolution 1402 (2002) did not help to stabilize the situation in the region and emphasized that Israel could not use the right to self-defence as a "blank cheque".⁹¹⁸ He added that there was an urgent need to comply with all provisions of international law, particularly those that ban indiscriminate and disproportionate use of force as well as the humiliating treatment of the civilian population.⁹¹⁹

At the 4510th meeting, on 8 April 2002, speakers echoed the Secretary-General's position that Israel's right to self-defence was not a "blank cheque" and did not entitle it not to comply with the principles of international law.⁹²⁰ The representative of the United Arab Emirates called for the international community to distinguish between "the terrorism pursued by the Israeli Government and the legitimate right of the Palestinian people to self-defence and to resist occupation" until their territories had been liberated and an independent State had been established in independent Palestine.⁹²¹

At the 4515th meeting, on 18 April 2002, the representative of Brazil made reference to the Secretary-General's comment regarding the right of self-defence not constituting a "blank cheque" for aggression when stressing that Israel must allow full freedom of movement for humanitarian agencies in the Palestinian territories.⁹²² In reference to the humanitarian crisis in the occupied territories, the representative of India also contended that the right of self-defence could not be used as justification for the crisis.⁹²³ In response, the representative of Israel declared that the "Israeli actions in Jenin and elsewhere were undertaken reluctantly and in self-defence against an unrelenting campaign of violence and terrorism incited, supported and financed by the Palestinian Authority". He added that those actions were taken only after the Palestinian Authority was given ample opportunity to fulfill its commitment and after Israel had exercised restraint in the face of a wave of suicide-bombing massacres.⁹²⁴

At its 4588th meeting, on 24 July 2002, the Council met to discuss the escalation of military acts carried out by Israel in the Palestinian territory, and specifically the attack in the area of Yarmuk in the northern Gaza Strip. The representative of the Syrian Arab Republic reminded the Council that this was not the first time Israel had committed "massacre against the Palestinian people". He noted that Israel was pursuing "a systematic policy of destruction in a show of senseless force", for the sole purpose of preventing the Palestinian people from exercising their right to self-determination. He further added that Israeli actions perpetrated against the "defenceless Palestinian people" could not be regarded as acts of self-defence since Israel's nuclear weapons and weapons of mass destruction would be satisfactory for its defence, should it decide to withdraw to the lines it held prior to 4 June 1967.⁹²⁵ Other speakers agreed that the international community should not consider the recent Israeli aggression to be an act of self-defence.⁹²⁶ The President of the Council, speaking in his capacity as the representative of the United Kingdom, emphasized that, according to the norms of international law, actions taken by Israel in self-defence "must be proportionate” and that Israel must avoid civilian casualties and avoid damaging civilian property and infrastructure.⁹²⁷

At its 4722nd meeting, on 19 March 2003, the Council was briefed on the situation in the Middle East by the Special Coordinator for the Middle East Peace Process and Personal Representative of the Secretary-General. In his statement, he emphasized the obligation of Israel under international law to minimize the harm to innocent civilians but stressed that, like every other State, Israel had a “right to self-defence” which should be “exercised with caution, using reasonable means”.⁹²⁸ Similarly, at the 4741st meeting, on 16 April 2003, the Assistant Secretary-General for Political Affairs recognized Israel’s right to self-defence, but cautioned that it should be exercised within the boundaries of international law.⁹²⁹ At the 4846th meeting, on 21 October 2003, the Under-Secretary-General for Political Affairs reiterated that while “Israel’s right to defend itself against terrorist attacks” was recognized, the right of self-defence was neither unconditional nor unlimited and should be exercised in proportionate terms and in keeping with Israel’s obligations under international law.⁹³⁰

At its 4841st meeting, on 14 October 2003, the Council discussed the recent Israeli actions in the Rafah area. During the debate, the representative of France recognized “Israel’s inalienable right to security, its right to self-defence and its right to combat terrorist attacks”, but insisted that the struggle against terrorism could not justify everything and had to be carried out with respect for the law.⁹³¹ A similar point was made by the representative of Italy, on behalf of the European Union and associated countries⁹³², and by the representative of Norway.⁹³³ By contrast, the representative of Saudi Arabia argued that the international community viewed as terrorists those who resisted occupation, while the “unjust occupier and oppressor” who had usurped all the rights of others was “allowed to enjoy the right of self-defence to further its colonialism and entrench its occupation”.⁹³⁴ In response, the representative of Israel questioned whether “the energy of the Security Council should be expended debating security measures adopted in self-defence, or addressing the terrorism that made such measures necessary”.⁹³⁵

Letter dated 5 October 2003 from the Permanent Representative of Lebanon to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council (S/2003/943)

At its 4836th meeting, on 5 October 2003, the Council discussed two letters dated 5 October 2003 from the representatives of the Syrian Arab Republic and Lebanon, respectively.⁹³⁶ By the two letters, the aforementioned representatives requested the Council to convene an emergency meeting to consider Israel’s military action targeting a site situated inside the territory of the Syrian Arab Republic. During the debate, the representative of Israel insisted that Israel’s response to the suicide bombings against a terrorist training facility in the Syrian Arab Republic was “a clear act of self-defence in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter”.⁹³⁷ A series of speakers, however, contended that Israel’s actions did not qualify as an

At the 4757th meeting, on 19 May 2003, the Special Coordinator for the Middle East Peace Process and Personal Representative of the Secretary-General highlighted “Israel’s right to self-defence in the face of repeated terrorist attacks”. He maintained, however, that the United Nations must “repeat the call on the Israeli authorities to abandon the use of excessive force in densely populated areas and to protect the safety of civilians and preserve their property in keeping with Israel’s obligations under international humanitarian law” (S/PV.4757, p. 3).

⁹²⁹ S/PV.4741 and Corr.1, p. 2. At the 4773rd meeting, on 13 June 2003, the Under-Secretary-General for Political Affairs reaffirmed Israel’s “right to self-defence in the face of repeated terrorist attacks”, but cautioned that it was “incumbent upon Israel to pursue its security and self-defence in a manner that minimizes the suffering of Palestinian civilians” (S/PV.4773, p. 4).

exercise of the right to self-defence.⁹³⁸ The Permanent Observer of the League of Arab States to the United Nations reaffirmed its support of the Syrian Arab Republic and any measures that it might adopt in “self-defence against such aggression”.⁹³⁹ Similar views were expressed by other representatives in their statements.⁹⁴⁰ The representative of Egypt referred to the similarities between the present situation and that of 30 years ago when Egypt and the Syrian Arab Republic took military action against Israel to regain Egyptian territory in the Sinai which at the time was occupied by Israel. He asserted that Egypt’s actions at that point in time were in conformity with the right of self-defence and had taken place on Egyptian territory.⁹⁴¹

At its 4355th meeting, on 2 August 2001, the Council discussed the consequences of the illicit trafficking of small arms and light weapons, especially in conflict situations. The representative of the Russian Federation spoke in favor of a responsible policy in the supply of weapons to the international market, while expressing his support for the right to acquire weapons legally based on “the provisions of Article 51 of the United Nations Charter on the legitimate right of States to self-defence”.⁹⁴² The representative of Tunisia concurred that any action designed to cope with the problems of small arms and light weapons must take into account “the legitimate right of self-defence of States, in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter, and the right of peoples to self-determination”.⁹⁴³ Several speakers endorsed the necessity of finding a solution for the problem of small arms that would respect States’ and peoples’ right to self-defence in conformity with Article 51 of the Charter.⁹⁴⁴

At its 4623rd meeting, on 11 October 2002, the Council debated the Secretary-General’s report on small arms.⁹⁴⁵ Several speakers reminded the Council of the importance of respecting the right to self-defence when considering a solution to the problem of small arms and emphasized that States should have the right to acquire and produce small arms for self-defence and national security.⁹⁴⁶

At its 4720th meeting, on 18 March 2003, the Council discussed the proliferation of small arms and light weapons and the phenomenon of mercenaries in view of their negative effects on West Africa. In that connection, the representative of the Syrian Arab Republic confirmed the need to respect international law and the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations, in particular respect for national sovereignty, non-interference in the internal affairs of Members States and the right to individual or collective self-defence as stipulated by Article 51 of the Charter.⁹⁴⁷

At its 4413th meeting, on 12 November 2001, the Council discussed the threats to international peace and security caused by terrorist acts in the context of the attacks of 11 September 2001 against the United States. The representative of France argued that the armed response by the United States against Osama bin Laden, the Al-Qaida network and the Taliban system that supported them, was taken “in exercise of its right of self-defence” and therefore expressed “solidarity with that action”.⁹⁴⁸ The representative of Norway concurred that resolution 1368 (2001) made it clear that the attacks on 11 September 2001 against the United States constituted a threat to international peace and security, and thus “triggered the right to self-defence”. He added that the pursuit of terrorists and their backers in Afghanistan was being carried out in the exercise of that right, and that his Government fully supported the action by the United States⁹⁴⁹

At the Council’s 4512th meeting, on 15 April 2002, in relation to the terrorist acts of 11 September 2001, the representative of Mexico noted that the fight against terrorism should conform to the provisions of

At its 4618th meeting, on 4 October 2002, the Council continued its debate on ways to combat terrorism internationally. In that context, the representative of Egypt cautioned that terrorism should not be confused with “the legitimate right to self-defence against foreign occupation”.⁹⁵²

The role of the Security Council in the pacific settlement of disputes

At its 4753rd meeting, on 13 May 2003, the Council discussed the role of the Security Council in the pacific settlement of disputes. In his statement, the representative of India maintained that no State could permit aggression against its own territory. He added that nothing in the Charter could “impair the inherent right of each Member State to take all necessary measures for its self-defence” if there were an armed attack against it.⁹⁵³ Referring to the conflict in Nagorny-Karabakh, and responding to the representative of Azerbaijan who stated that “one fifth” of his country’s territory remained “under Armenian occupation”,⁹⁵⁴ the representative of Armenia argued that the conflict was not the result of armed aggression, as Azerbaijan tried to present it, “but the forced resort to self-defence of the Karabakh population”.⁹⁵⁵

Role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts

At its 4174th meeting, on 20 July 2000, the Council discussed the role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts. In that connection, the representative of Pakistan declared that the concept of preventive disarmament needed further “discussion and elaboration, because such a concept would militate against the inherent right to self-defence sanctified by the Charter of the United Nations”.⁹⁵⁶

Wrap-up discussion of the work of the Security Council for the current month

At its 4445th meeting, on 21 December 2001, the Council held a wrap-up discussion of the work of the Security Council during the year 2001. Referring to Afghanistan as a successful case, the representative of Singapore noticed that after 11 September 2001, the “decisive intervention of the United States-led military coalition, exercising the right of self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter, paved the way for a new Afghanistan to emerge” in which the humanitarian situation of the Afghan people had improved.⁹⁵⁷

C. Invocation of the right of self-defence in other instances

Communication concerning relations between Burundi and the Democratic Republic of the Congo

By a letter dated 11 May 2001 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹⁵⁸ the representative of Burundi reported that the Burundian rebellion in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and the threat it posed to Burundian trade on Lake Tanganyika, led Burundi to deploy a military self-defence operation covering the part of the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo along Lake Tanganyika. He noted that the purpose of the Burundian military operation was “strictly confined to self-defence”, and that Burundi had never had “political, territorial or economic designs on the Democratic Republic of the Congo”.⁹⁵⁹

Communications concerning the situation between Eritrea and Ethiopia

By a letter dated 7 April 2000 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹⁶² the representative of Ethiopia presented the state of affairs of the conflict between Eritrea and Ethiopia. He described the "liberation" of Badme by the Ethiopian forces in February 1999 as an "exercise of Ethiopia's right of legitimate self-defence under international law enshrined in Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations".⁹⁶³

In response, the representative of Eritrea, by a letter dated 12 May 2000 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹⁶⁴ called upon the Council to support the right of Eritrea to self-defence "in the wake of the war of aggression" carried out by Ethiopia.

By a letter dated 2 June 2000 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹⁶⁵ the representative of Ethiopia asserted that his Government had exercised its right of self-defence, and that they had verified that its territories had been cleared of invading forces.

In response, the representative of Eritrea, by a letter dated 9 June 2000 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹⁶⁶ argued that Ethiopia's offensive deep inside sovereign Eritrean territory was a flagrant act of invasion. He observed that while Eritrea had the right to self-defence, it could not engage in military activities in an area where it had redeployed "voluntarily from deep into its own sovereign territory".⁹⁶⁷

Communications concerning relations between Georgia and the Russian Federation

By a letter dated 11 September 2002 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁹⁶⁸ the representative of the Russian Federation cautioned Georgia to establish a security zone in the area of the Georgia-Russian Federation border and respect Security Council resolution 1373 (2001) of 28 September 2001. If Georgia failed to comply, and did not put an end to "the bandit sorties and attacks on adjoining areas in the Russian Federation", the Russian Federation would reserve the right to act in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations.⁹⁶⁹

By a letter dated 13 September 2002 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁹⁷⁰ the representative of Georgia expressed his Government's distress regarding the Russian Federation's threat to use force against Georgia. He conveyed his Government's willingness to cooperate in fighting global terrorism and qualified as unacceptable the Russian Federation's interpretation of Article 51 of the Charter⁹⁷¹ in a manner that would justify its aggressive intentions.

By identical letters dated 15 September 2002 addressed to the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council,⁹⁷² the representative of Georgia reiterated the "unaptness" of Article 51 of the Charter to explain the Russian Federation's actions towards Georgia, considering that Georgia did not attack the Russian Federation.

Communications concerning relations between India and Pakistan

By a letter dated 23 January 2000 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁹⁷³ the representative of Pakistan reported that, on 22 January 2000, Indian forces had crossed the border and attacked a Pakistani post between the two channels of the Tawi River. In response, he declared that the Pakistani forces "fought gallantly in self-defence and succeeded in repelling the Indian attack". He also announced that the Pakistan Armed Forces would "exercise their right of self-

By a letter dated 22 May 2002 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹⁷⁵ the representative of Pakistan announced his Government's readiness to join the international coalition against terrorism. He added that Pakistan would nevertheless be ready to meet resolutely any aggression by India, in the exercise of its inherent right to self-defence, against the territory of Pakistan or the territories in Kashmir.

Communications concerning relations between Iran and Iraq

By a letter dated 15 February 2000 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁹⁷⁶ the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran reported that terrorist groups from the Iraqi territory were operating along the Iranian border. He noted that Iran reserved its legitimate right to self-defence and would respond to such hostile acts if they continued.

In a series of letters addressed to the Secretary-General,⁹⁷⁷ the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran reported that members of the terrorist Mojahedin Khalq Organization, authorized by the Government of Iraq to be based on Iraqi soil, engaged in acts of sabotage against Iran. He stated that Iran considered intolerable the continuation of such hostile acts and reserved its right to legitimate self-defence and removal of any threats.

By a letter dated 18 April 2001 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹⁷⁸ the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran informed the Council that in response to the acts of terrorism committed by members of the terrorist Mojahedin Khalq Organization based in Iraq, the armed forces of Iran, in accordance with Article 51, took a "limited and proportionate defensive measure" against a number of that entity's bases in Iraq. If the Government of Iraq were "to take appropriate measures" to put an end to the use of Iraqi territory for cross-border attacks and terrorist operations against Iran, it would render unnecessary the measures taken in accordance with Article 51 by the Government of Iran.⁹⁷⁹

Communications concerning relations between Iraq and Saudi-Arabia

By identical letters dated 29 May 2001 addressed to the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council,⁹⁸⁰ the representative of Saudi Arabia reported that, on 23 May 2001, an Iraqi patrol crossed the Saudi-Iraqi international boundary. In response, members of the Saudi Frontier Force "were forced to respond to the fire in self-defence, and in the exchange between the Force and the members of the Iraqi patrol a number of Saudi soldiers were wounded".⁹⁸¹

Communications concerning the situation in Liberia

By a letter dated 11 May 2001 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁹⁸² the representative of Liberia indicated that the arms embargo imposed against Liberia had impaired the country's capacity adequately to exercise its right of self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter and announced that his Government reserved the right to defend itself in that connection.

By a letter dated 4 June 2001 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹⁸³ the representative of Liberia informed the Council of the armed attacks against Liberia from the territory of Guinea. He reasserted his Government's right to self-defence in the wake of armed aggression.

In a subsequent letter dated 6 September 2001 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹⁸⁴ the representative of Liberia asked the Council "to grant a limited waiver of the arms embargo imposed by resolution 1343 (2001) to permit the importation of essential military supplies under United Nations monitoring to be used for the sole purpose of self-defence". He argued that Liberia had an inherent right to self-defence and a "constitutional responsibility to provide for the protection of its sovereign territory, and the life and property of its citizens".

By a letter dated 31 October 2001 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁹⁸⁵ the representative of Liberia reiterated that the Liberian nation had been under attack from dissidents in Lofa County, in northern Liberia, since April 1999. He declared that the Government of Liberia, acting under Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, would utilize “every available means to defend its sovereignty, protect its territorial integrity and preserve its people”.⁹⁸⁶

At the 4405th meeting, on 5 November 2001, the representative of Liberia asked the Council to remove any constraints imposed on Liberia so that the country could defend its territory and sovereignty, “as is the inherent right of every Member of this Organization under its constitution and Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations”.⁹⁸⁷

By a letter dated 20 March 2002 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹⁸⁸ the representative of Liberia informed the Council that Liberia had “taken measures to provide for its legitimate self-defence in the wake of persistent armed attacks against its territory”. He further assured the Council that these measures were without prejudice to Security Council resolution 1343 (2001), and that his Government would continue to comply with the demands outlined in resolution 1343 (2001).

representative of Zimbabwe dismissed the Rwandan allegations of repeated violations of the Lusaka Ceasefire Agreement by Southern African Development Community allied forces. He urged the Security Council to “see through Rwanda’s subterfuge. The so-called right to self-defence is nothing more than an excuse by Rwanda to launch an offensive”.⁹⁹⁰

Communications concerning relations between the Sudan and Eritrea

By a letter dated 7 October 2002 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹⁹¹ the representative of the Sudan drew attention to the Eritrean attacks on eight Sudanese locations along the Sudanese boundary with Eritrea. Introductory note

Chapter XII covers the consideration by the Security Council of Articles of the Charter not dealt with in the preceding chapters. It consists of four parts: part I covers material pertaining to the purposes and principles of the United Nations, namely Articles 1 (2), 2 (4), 2 (5), 2 (6) and 2 (7). In part II, Articles 24 and 25 are considered in relation to the functions and powers of the Security Council. Part III deals with the practice of the Security Council in connection with the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter, Articles 52 to 54, concerning regional arrangements. Part IV considers miscellaneous provisions of the Charter, including material relating to Article 103.

Part I

Consideration of the purposes and principles of the United Nations (Articles 1 and 2 of the Charter)

A. Article 1, paragraph 2

Article 1, paragraph 2

[The Purposes of the United Nations are:]

To develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, and to take other appropriate measures to strengthen universal peace.

Note

During the period under review, there was one explicit reference to Article 1 (2) of the Charter in a resolution in connection with the situation in Western Sahara: by resolution 1359 (2001) of 29 June 2001, the Council reaffirmed the provisions contained in Article 1 (2) of the Charter.¹ There were also implicit references to the principle enshrined in Article 1 (2) in a number of resolutions and presidential statements.²

Article 1 (2) was explicitly invoked twice in the deliberations of the Council, without giving rise to a constitutional discussion. In the first instance, at the 4841st meeting, on 14 October 2003, concerning the situation in the Middle East, including the Palestinian question, the Article was invoked by the Permanent

Observer of Palestine in connection with the construction of a “separation wall” by Israel.³ In the second instance, at the 4625th meeting, on 16 October 2002 concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, the representative of Iraq argued that the United Nations sanctions against his country were “a violation of Article 1, paragraph 2 of the Charter, which deals with respect for the principle of equality among peoples — their equal rights and their right to self-determination”, since no sanctions should be imposed that would “cause international disagreements that are incompatible with the legal rights of the State or that prejudice the people’s right to self-determination”.⁴

The principle of self-determination was frequently invoked without giving rise to a constitutional discussion in the consideration of the agenda items entitled “The situation in East Timor”,⁵ “The situation in Western Sahara”,⁶ “The situation in the Middle East”,⁷ and “Security Council resolutions 1160 (1998), 1199 (1998), 1203 (1998), 1239 (1999) and 1244 (1999)”.⁸ While there were also other references to the principle of self-determination, they were often incidental and too numerous to be listed here. The Council also called for, welcomed, or otherwise expressed support for the holding of elections in a number of cases, including those relating to Bosnia and Herzegovina,⁹ Central African Republic,¹⁰ Côte d’Ivoire,¹¹ East Timor,¹² Guinea-Bissau,¹³ Haiti,¹⁴ Liberia,¹⁵ Sierra Leone,¹⁶ Somalia,¹⁷

The cases that follow reflect instances in which the Council dealt with questions relating to the principle enshrined in Article 1 (2), in connection with the situation in East Timor (case 1); Security Council resolutions 1160 (1998), 1199 (1998), 1203 (1998), 1239 (1999) and 1244 (1999) (case 2); and the situation between Iraq and Kuwait (case 3).

The situation in East Timor

On 20 May 2002, the Security Council convened the 4537th meeting, on the occasion of the independence of East Timor. At that meeting, several speakers congratulated the people of East Timor for their efforts to attain independence by democratic means, including by exercising their right to self-determination.²⁰ The Deputy Secretary-General noted the courageous contribution made in 1999 by Indonesia and Portugal in the signing of the 5 May Agreement,²¹ allowing the people of East Timor to express their will for self-determination.²² The representative of Portugal congratulated East Timor which had “exerted the right of self-determination and affirmed its independence”.²³ The representative of Indonesia commemorated the milestone event of the “birth of East Timor as a fully-fledged sovereign and independent nation”.²⁴ Several speakers noted the role played by the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and that the General Assembly, through its adoption of resolution 56/282, had removed East Timor from the list of non-self-governing territories.²⁵

At the same meeting, in a statement by the President, the Council welcomed the attainment of independence by East Timor, which marked the “culmination of a process of self-determination” and transition that had begun in May 1999, and looked forward to the day when East Timor would join as a State Member of the United Nations. The Council also affirmed its commitment to the sovereignty, political independence, territorial integrity and national unity of East Timor within its internationally recognized boundaries.²⁶

Following its consideration of the application of East Timor for admission to the United Nations²⁷ at the 4542nd meeting on 23 May 2002, the Council adopted resolution 1414 (2002), by which it recommended to the General Assembly that East Timor be admitted to membership of the United Nations.²⁸

Security Council resolutions 1160 (1998), 1199 (1998), 1203 (1998), 1239 (1999) and 1244 (1999)

As part of the political process designed to determine the future status of Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, in accordance with resolution 1244 (1999),²⁹ the Secretary-General, in his report of 22 April 2002, noted the need for a political roadmap for both the United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK), whose duties included facilitating such a process, and for the provisional institutions of self-government in Kosovo. He informed the Council that he had asked his Special Representative to develop benchmarks against which progress in the critical areas of the rule of law, functioning of democratic institutions, the economy, freedom of movement, the return of internally displaced persons and refugees and contributions to regional stability could be measured.³⁰ In his report of 9 October 2002, the Secretary-General informed the Council that the benchmarks process was being publicized in Kosovo under the slogan of “Standards before Status”.³¹

By a presidential statement dated 6 February 2003, the Council reiterated its full support for the Standards before Status policy, which postulated targets in the eight key areas: functioning of the democratic institutions, the rule of law, freedom of movement, the return of refugees and internally displaced persons, economy, property rights, dialogue with Belgrade, and the Kosovo Protection Corps. The Council welcomed the presentation of a detailed plan for its implementation that would provide the appropriate baseline against which progress could be measured and stated that the fulfilment of those targets was “essential to commencing a political process designed to determine Kosovo’s future, in accordance with resolution 1244 (1999)”.³²

At the 4742nd meeting, on 23 April 2003, most speakers reiterated their support for the Standards before Status approach to the situation in Kosovo reflected in resolution 1244 (1999).³³ The representative of the United Kingdom condemned unilateral statements on Kosovo’s final status from either side and agreed that there was considerable work to be done to fulfil the benchmarks. He also underlined the need for democratic governance to take hold in Kosovo before there could be a settlement of Kosovo’s status.³⁴ The representative of China expressed concern that, according to the report of the Secretary-General,³⁵ from time to time comments were made regarding the status of Kosovo. He reiterated the belief that Security Council resolution 1244 (1999) remained the international community’s policy basis with respect to the question of Kosovo.³⁶ The representative of

Pakistan, while supporting the full implementation of resolution 1244 (1999), noted that it considered the Standards before Status approach to be unique and applicable only in the case of Kosovo and expressed the view that the resolution of the status question should be the primary focus of the work of the Council in “all but the most exceptional cases”.³⁷ The representative of Albania reiterated the position that the processes underway in Kosovo were paving the way for the final status of Kosovo, which should “reflect and respect the right and will of all the people there to determine their future”.³⁸

By a presidential statement dated 12 December 2003, the Council expressed support for the prospect of a comprehensive review of the progress of the Provisional Institutions of Self-Government in meeting the standards. The Council stressed that further advancement towards a process to determine the future status of Kosovo in accordance with resolution 1244 (1999) would depend on the positive outcome of that comprehensive review.³⁹

Case 3 The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

At the 4726th meeting, on 26 March 2003, which was convened following the commencement of the military action against Iraq, the Secretary-General regretted that the intense efforts to achieve a peaceful solution, through the Security Council, had not succeeded and that the earlier inability of the Council to agree on a collective course of action placed an even greater burden on the Council. In that context, he emphasized that the Council should consider two guiding principles which should underpin all the efforts by the Council and its future decisions on Iraq: respect for the sovereignty, territorial integrity and independence of Iraq and respect for the right of the Iraqi people to determine their own political future and control their own natural resources.⁴⁰ During the debate, a number of speakers reiterated the importance of the two principles in finding a solution to the situation in Iraq.⁴¹

By resolution 1472 (2003) of 28 March 2003, the Council, inter alia, reaffirmed the respect for the right of the Iraqi people “to determine their own political future and to control their own natural resources”.⁴²

By resolution 1483 (2003) of 22 May 2003, the Council stressed the right of the Iraqi people freely to determine their own political future and control their own natural resources, expressed resolve that the day when Iraqis governed themselves had to come quickly, and encouraged efforts by the people of Iraq to form a representative government based on the rule of law that afforded equal rights and justice to all Iraqi citizens without regard to ethnicity, religion, or gender.⁴³ By the same resolution, the Council also noted the letter of 8 May 2003 from the representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom to the President⁴⁴ and recognized the specific authorities, responsibilities and obligations under applicable international law of those States as occupying Powers under unified command (the “Authority”). The Council called upon the Authority, consistent with the Charter and other relevant international law, to promote the welfare of the Iraqi people through the effective administration of the territory, including in particular working towards the restoration of conditions of security and stability and the creation of conditions in which the Iraqi people could freely determine their own political future.⁴⁵

At the 4808th meeting, on 14 August 2003, the Council adopted resolution 1500 (2003), by which it welcomed the establishment of the broadly representative Governing Council of Iraq on 13 July 2003, as an important step towards the formation by the people of Iraq of an internationally recognized, representative government that would exercise the sovereignty of Iraq.⁴⁶ Following the vote, a number of speakers welcomed the establishment of the Governing Council as a first step towards a sovereign, stable and democratic Iraq.⁴⁷ The representative of the United States maintained that in its expression of support for the Governing Council of Iraq, the resolution hastened the day when the people of Iraq would be in full command of their own affairs.⁴⁸ The representative of Pakistan wished that the resolution had contained the reaffirmation of other principles, including the right of the Iraqi people to choose their own political destiny and form of government and to exercise their right of self-determination.⁴⁹ The representative of Mexico held that, while his delegation associated itself with the consensus on welcoming the establishment of the interim Governing Council as a first logical step towards establishing a genuinely representative government that exercised the sovereignty of the Iraqi people, such welcome did not constitute legal recognition or endorsement, because the Governing Council was still under the authority of the occupying Powers.⁵⁰ The representative of the Syrian Arab Republic, which had abstained in the voting, stressed that the formation of the interim Governing Council of Iraq would gain credibility only from the fact that it was paving the way for the formation of a national government that represented the full spectrum of Iraqi society and was capable of fulfilling the aspirations of the Iraqi people. Therefore, only the Iraqi people could lend legitimacy to the Governing Council. He expressed the hope that the Council would work to, inter alia, establish an elected national government that enjoyed the support of the Iraqi people and was recognized by the international community.⁵¹

At the 4844th meeting, on 16 October 2003, the Council adopted resolution 1511 (2003), by which it reaffirmed the right of the Iraqi people freely to determine their own political future and control their own natural resources, and reiterated its resolve that the day when Iraqis govern themselves must come quickly. By the same resolution, the Council also underscored the temporary nature of the exercise by the Coalition Provisional Authority of the specific responsibilities, authorities and obligations under applicable international law recognized and set forth in resolution 1483 (2003), which would cease when an internationally recognized, representative government established by the people of Iraq was sworn in and assumed the responsibilities of the Authority.⁵²

Following the vote, the representative of the Russian Federation stated that it was essential that international efforts be united in the search for a long-term and stable political settlement that would enable the Iraqi people to take the leadership of their country into their own hands through a legitimately elected government. Regarding resolution 1511 (2003), he noted that the functions of the multinational force were subordinate to the tasks of promoting the restoration of the sovereignty of Iraq,⁵³ and as soon as that happened, the mandate of the multinational force would expire. If the legitimately elected government of Iraq requested some form of assistance to maintain security, then the Council would consider such a request.⁵⁴ The representative of Germany stated that his delegation would have wished for clearer guidelines with regard to timing of the transfer of sovereignty to the Iraqis, because only in that way could it be made clear that the current political status of Iraq was a temporary one. The representative of France also maintained that it would have been desirable for a clear text to set nearer and stricter deadlines for the transfer of responsibilities and the political transition. In particular, his country remained convinced that the sovereign assumption by the Iraqis of their own destiny was a necessary starting point to allow for the reconstruction and stabilization of Iraq; to marginalize those in Iraq who had chosen violence; and to mobilize the international community on behalf of Iraq.⁵⁵ The representative of Pakistan commented that the resolution would have gained considerably in clarity and credibility if it had clearly stipulated the principles which should guide the political transition in Iraq: respect for political independence, unity and territorial integrity of Iraq; the right of the Iraqi people to choose their own political destiny and form of Government; permanent sovereignty and control over their natural resources; and non-intervention and non-interference in their internal affairs.⁵⁶

⁵² Resolution 1511 (2003), second preambular paragraph.

At the same meeting, the representative of the United Kingdom noted that, while resolution 1511 (2003) was clear about giving control of Iraq to its people as quickly as possible, it did not prescribe to the Iraqis artificial schedules for the transfer of power. Instead it put the people of Iraq in the driving seat through the Iraqi interim administration and reaffirmed the temporary nature of the Coalition's powers.⁵⁷ The representative of the United States maintained that resolution 1511 (2003) confirmed Iraqi leadership in establishing a political horizon for the transfer of power and made clear that the interim Iraqi leadership embodied Iraqi sovereignty during the transition. He stressed that the Coalition would not waver from its stated objectives of transferring governing responsibilities and authorities to the people of Iraq as soon as practicable.⁵⁸ deplored and condemned violations of ceasefire agreements, and demanded respect for the ceasefire agreements.⁶² Furthermore, the Council, in its decisions, reaffirmed the principle of non-threat or non-use of force in international relations, reiterated its position against interference by States in internal affairs of others and condemned hostile action across the border of a Member State, as elaborated below.

Affirmation of the principle of non-threat or non-use of force

By a number of its decisions, the Council reaffirmed the principle of non-threat or non-use of force in international relations enshrined in Article 2 (4).

On the occasion of the Security Council meeting at the level of heads of State and Government, held on 7 September 2000 in the course of the Millennium Summit,⁶³ by resolution 1318 (2000), the Council adopted the declaration on ensuring an effective role for the Council in the maintenance of international peace and security, particularly in Africa, in which it reaffirmed the importance of adhering to the principles of non-threat or non-use of force in international relations in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations, and the peaceful settlement of international disputes.⁶⁴

all States to “refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations”.

In connection with the situation in the Middle East, by a presidential statement,⁶⁶ the Council reaffirmed its commitment to the full sovereignty, political independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries and, in that context, it asserted that all States should refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.”

Reiteration of the principle of non-interference by States in internal affairs of others

In some cases, the Council reiterated its position against interference by States in the internal affairs of other States. For example, in connection with the situation in Afghanistan, by a presidential statement of 7 April 2000,⁶⁷ the Council reiterated that “outside interference in the internal affairs of Afghanistan, including the involvement of foreign combatants and military personnel and the supply of weapons and other materials used in the conflict, should cease immediately.” It also called upon all States to take resolute measures to prohibit their military personnel from planning and participating in combat operations in Afghanistan, and immediately to withdraw their personnel and to assure that the supply of ammunition and other war-making materials was halted. The Council also expressed its deep concern at the continuing involvement in the fighting in Afghanistan, on the side of the Taliban forces, of thousands of non-Afghan nationals. By a presidential statement of 17 June 2003,⁶⁸ the Council expressed the belief that constructive and mutually supportive bilateral and regional relations between Afghanistan and all States, and in particular its neighbours, “based on the principles of mutual respect and non-interference in

Furthermore, in connection with the situation in Somalia, the Council, in a series of its decisions,⁶⁹ reiterated its insistence that all States, in particular those of the region, should “not interfere in the internal affairs of Somalia” and that such interference could jeopardize the sovereignty, territorial integrity, political independence and unity of that State.

In addition, in connection with the situation in Côte d’Ivoire, by a presidential statement of 20 December 2002, the Council stressed the need to respect the sovereignty, political unity and territorial integrity of that country and called upon all States in the region to “refrain from any interference in Côte d’Ivoire”.⁷⁰ Furthermore, by resolution 1464 (2003) of 4 February 2003, the Council called upon all States neighbouring Côte d’Ivoire to support the peace process by preventing “any action that might undermine the security and territorial integrity” of that country.⁷¹ The appeal was renewed in a subsequent resolution.⁷²

Condemnation of hostile action across the border of a Member State

In several situations under consideration, the Council called for cessation of involvement by foreign Governments in the conflicts and demanded the withdrawal of foreign forces from the territories of others. For example, in connection with the situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the Council, by its decisions, repeatedly called for the withdrawal of all foreign forces from the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo.⁷³ By resolution 1304 (2000) of 16 June 2000, the Council reiterated its unreserved condemnation of the fighting between Ugandan and Rwandan forces in Kisangani “in violation of the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Democratic Republic of the Congo”; demanded that Ugandan and Rwandan forces as well as forces of the Congolese armed opposition and other armed groups immediately and completely withdraw from Kisangani; and further demanded that Uganda and Rwanda, which had “violated the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Democratic Republic of the Congo,” withdraw all their forces from the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo without further delay.⁷⁴

In other instances, the Council demanded cessation of military action and further use of force and called for withdrawal of troops. In connection with the situation between Eritrea and Ethiopia, the Council, in its resolutions, reaffirming the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity of Eritrea and Ethiopia, demanded that both parties cease immediately all military action and refrain from the further use of force.⁷⁵

In connection with the situation in the Middle East, including the Palestinian question, the Council, by resolution 1402 (2002) of 30 March 2002, called for the withdrawal of Israeli troops from Palestinian cities, including Ramallah,⁷⁶ and by resolution 1435 (2002) of 24 September 2002, it demanded the expeditious withdrawal of the Israeli occupying forces from Palestinian cities towards the return to the positions held prior to September 2000.⁷⁷

Furthermore, on a number of occasions, the Council condemned incursions by States into other States, demanded that States, in particular, the neighbouring States, end military and financial support for armed groups and parties engaged in conflict, or insisted that the territory of a State should not be used to undermine stability in the area in question.

In connection with the situation in Somalia, the Council insisted, in its decisions, that the territory of Somalia should not be used to undermine stability in the subregion.⁷⁸

In connection with the situation in Sierra Leone, by resolution 1470 (2003) of 28 March 2003, the Council noted with concern the instability on the border between Sierra Leone and Liberia, and demanded that the armed forces of Liberia and any armed groups “refrain from illegal incursions into the territory of Sierra Leone”.⁷⁹

In connection with the situation in Guinea following recent attacks along its borders with Liberia and Sierra Leone, the Council, by a presidential statement of 21 December 2000, condemned the incursion into Guinea by rebel groups coming from Liberia and Sierra Leone. The Council reaffirmed its commitment to the sovereignty, political independence and territorial integrity of Guinea, expressed its serious concern over reports that “external military support” was being provided to those rebel groups, and called upon “all States, particularly Liberia, to refrain from providing any such military support and from any act that might contribute to further destabilization of the situation on the borders between Guinea, Liberia and Sierra Leone.” The Council further called upon all States in the region to prevent armed individuals from using their national territory to prepare and commit attacks in neighbouring countries.⁸⁰

In connection with the situation in Liberia, by resolution 1343 (2001) of 7 March 2001, the Council demanded that the Government of Liberia immediately cease its support for the Revolutionary United Front in Sierra Leone and for other armed rebel groups in the region.⁸¹ Furthermore, in a number of resolutions, the Council demanded that all States in the region cease military support for armed groups in neighbouring countries and take action to prevent armed individuals and groups from using their territory to prepare and commit attacks on neighbouring countries, and refrain from any action that might contribute to further destabilization of the situation in the region.⁸²

Case 4 The situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo

At the 4092nd meeting, on 24 January 2000, the Secretary-General, in his briefing, stressed as a top priority the need for an understanding of the limits of the use of force.⁸⁶ The President of the Democratic Republic of the Congo expressed his hope that the Council would be able to achieve agreement to “end the occupation” of a part of his country’s national territory by the “occupying armies of Rwanda, Uganda and Burundi,” in conformity with resolution 1234 (1999). He further recalled that Article 2 (3) and (4) of the Charter required Members to settle their international disputes by peaceful means and called on them to refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.⁸⁷

The President of Zimbabwe noted that the meeting was devoted to the preservation of the territorial integrity of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, as enshrined in Chapter I, Article 2, of the Charter. He added that the Southern African Development Community (SADC) allied forces had no territorial or other hidden agendas in that country and stressed that SADC was there, at the invitation of the sovereign Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, to uphold one of the most fundamental principles of the Charter, namely, respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of States and non-interference in the domestic affairs of a sovereign country.⁸⁸ Similarly, the representative of Namibia emphasized that his country was in the Democratic Republic of the Congo at the express invitation of that Government and in response to the request by a SADC member State. While reiterating the adherence of Namibia to the Ceasefire Agreement signed at Lusaka on 10 July 1999, he pointed out that there was the problem of interference by some of the other interlocutors who were not being too helpful because they seemed to have their own hidden agendas and pursued an outcome that was a blatant violation of the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political

The President of Uganda, for his part, argued that his country and the other neighbouring countries of the Democratic Republic of the Congo had legitimate security concerns, which had been recognized by the region and by the international community in the Lusaka Ceasefire Agreement. He also asked for the Council to be cognizant of the terrorist role played by the Sudan, sometimes using the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, with or without cooperation from Kinshasa, to destabilize the neighbouring countries. The issue, according to him, was not the territorial integrity of the Congo, as his country supported the territorial integrity of all the countries in Africa. He expected all foreign troops to withdraw in accordance with a timetable to be worked out according to the Ceasefire Agreement, by the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity (OAU), under the supervision of the United Nations interpositional force.⁹⁰ After touching on the genocide in Rwanda and arguing its linkage to the situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the President of Rwanda declared his country's commitment to the principles of the Ceasefire Agreement, stating that Rwanda had faithfully respected the ceasefire. Furthermore, he added that fundamental to them was article II of the Agreement, which addressed the security of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and its neighbouring countries.⁹¹ A few speakers acknowledged that the lasting solution to the conflict would require taking into account the legitimate security concerns of neighbouring States.⁹²

In his statement, the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity underscored the attachment of OAU to the principles enshrined in its Charter, of respect for the sovereignty, unity and territorial integrity of its member States and the peaceful settlement of disputes. Since those same principles had been under serious threat in the Democratic Republic of the Congo owing to the internal and external dimensions of that conflict, OAU, in tandem with the region and other partners, had worked assiduously to bring an end to the conflict.⁹³ The Facilitator of the Inter-Congolese Dialogue, echoing the views expressed by the Secretary-General of OAU concerning the inviolability of the national sovereignty and territory integrity of the country in question, explained that the origins of the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo reflected the internal political, economic and social problems within the country itself, as well as an external dimension relating to the security concerns of that country and of the neighbouring countries.⁹⁴

A number of speakers stressed, inter alia, the importance of respect for the territorial integrity, political independence and national sovereignty of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and other States in the region and the need for orderly withdrawal of all foreign forces.⁹⁵ In addition, the representative of Argentina argued that consideration of other key principles of international law was needed, including non-interference in the internal affairs of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the inalienable right to individual or collective self-defence, the illegality of the acquisition of territory by force and the inviolability of boundaries.⁹⁶ The representative of the Russian Federation observed that, owing to the complex nature of the conflict in question, any settlement would also be complex, which would need to ensure security and the inviolability of the borders of all the States in the region and strengthen cooperation between those States on the basis of the principles of "non-intervention in the internal affairs of other States and the non-use of force, in accordance with the Charter".⁹⁷

At the same meeting, the Council issued a presidential statement by which it reaffirmed the territorial integrity and national sovereignty of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, including over its natural resources, in accordance with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and the Charter of OAU and in that regard, reiterated its call for the immediate cessation of hostilities and the orderly

At the 4104th meeting, on 24 February 2000, prior to the adoption of resolution 1291 (2000), the representative of Ukraine remarked that his Government attached particular significance to the fact that the draft resolution⁹⁹ was accompanied by the explicit reaffirmation of the purposes and principles of the Charter, and the emphasis on the obligation of all States to refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the Organization.¹⁰⁰ By resolution 1291 (2000), the Council reaffirmed the above-mentioned principles and reiterated its call for the orderly withdrawal of all foreign forces from the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo in accordance with the Ceasefire Agreement.¹⁰¹

By resolution 1304 (2000) of 16 June 2000, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, reiterated its unreserved condemnation of the fighting between Ugandan and Rwandan forces in Kisangani in violation of the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, demanded that those forces and those allied to them desist from further fighting, and further demanded that Ugandan and Rwandan forces as well as forces of the Congolese armed opposition and other armed groups immediately and completely withdraw from Kisangani. The Council also demanded the following: (a) that Uganda and Rwanda, which had violated the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, withdraw all their forces from the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo without further delay, in conformity with the timetable of the Ceasefire Agreement and the Kampala Disengagement Plan; (b) that each phase of withdrawal completed by Ugandan and Rwandan forces be reciprocated by the other parties, in conformity with the same timetable; and (c) that all other foreign military presence and activity, direct and indirect, in the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo be brought to an end, in conformity with the provisions of the Ceasefire

Agreement. The Council demanded, in that context, that all parties abstain from any offensive action during the process of disengagement and withdrawal of foreign forces.¹⁰²

By resolution 1332 (2000) of 14 December 2000, the Council called for the withdrawal of Ugandan and Rwandan forces, and all other foreign forces, from the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, in compliance with resolution 1304 (2000) and the Ceasefire Agreement, and urged the forces to take urgent steps to accelerate that withdrawal.¹⁰³

At the 4271st meeting, on 2 February 2001, the Secretary-General, recalling the provisions of resolution 1304 (2000), looked forward to the early withdrawal of all foreign forces, as provided by the Ceasefire Agreement.¹⁰⁴ The President of the Democratic Republic of the Congo invited the authorities in Rwanda, Uganda and Burundi to return to a better sense of good-neighbourliness, with a view to achieving a peaceful settlement of differences. He further underscored the commitment of his country to relaunch the Ceasefire Agreement so that it would, among others, preserve the fundamental attributes of his country, including independence, sovereignty, territorial integrity and unity, which the Council had continuously reconfirmed. He also appealed to the international community to support the Congolese people as they moved towards the dialogue of peace which must be among them “without any interference”.¹⁰⁵

A number of speakers considered it imperative for foreign forces to withdraw in order to establish peace in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.¹⁰⁶ The representative of the United States held that the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo had a right, under the Charter, to demand that uninvited foreign forces depart its territory. At the same time, he maintained that the Governments of Rwanda and Uganda had a right, under the Charter, to demand that the Congolese territory not be used as a launching pad for attacks against their countries. He further argued that just as the international community was justified in calling for the withdrawal of Rwandan and Ugandan forces from the Democratic Republic of the Congo, so too must they call on all the Lusaka signatories to abandon support for former members of the Rwandese Armed Forces (ex-FAR) and Interahamwe.¹⁰⁷

The President of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, in responding to various statements made in the meeting, added that the final objective of democratization would come about only if the forces that had “invaded” his country were one way or the other forced to get out of it so that the country regained its national territorial integrity. He highlighted that his country was “under foreign occupation” which must end as soon as possible.¹⁰⁸

By a letter dated 13 July 2001 addressed to the Secretary-General, the representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo expressed his concern over the “openly proclaimed desire” of Rwanda and the Rassemblement congolais pour la démocratie (RCD-Goma) to “create a secessionist State” in the eastern Democratic Republic of the Congo, which was in violation of the principle of the charter of OAU regarding the inviolability of the borders that had emerged from decolonization, and of the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations, as well as of the relevant provisions of all the resolutions by which the Council reaffirmed the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of his country and all the States in the region.¹⁰⁹ In response, the representative of Rwanda, in a letter dated 19 July 2001 addressed to the President, rejected the claim made by the Democratic Republic of the Congo, by, inter alia, recalling the issue of nationality in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, which, according to him, affected neighbouring countries such as Rwanda.¹¹⁰

At the 4348th meeting, on 24 July 2001, the representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo commented that all the leaders of the region had been able to confirm their willingness to withdraw from the territory of his country in accordance with resolution 1304 (2000). However, while certain parties were indeed withdrawing some of their contingents, others showed reluctance to do so, combining withdrawal with rotation and redeployment and expressing their willingness to maintain troops in the border towns that happened to be rich in natural resources. With respect to the security concerns raised by certain parties and in particular by Rwanda, the representative maintained that those concerns represented yet another pretext aimed at maintaining the Rwandan occupation of his country. Recalling that from 1997 to 1998 his country had benefited from technical military assistance with Rwanda, with a view to helping to reorganize the Congolese armed forces, he pointed out that throughout that entire period, no one had mentioned any security concerns nor any relating to activities of former members of the Rwandese Armed Forces or Interahamwe. He argued that it had taken months for Rwanda to recognize the extent of its intervention, and that Rwanda then used as a justification the need to defend those Congolese whose nationality had been supposedly questioned and who had been reportedly persecuted by the Congolese authority. Referring to the 4273rd meeting,¹¹¹ the representative argued that the President of Rwanda did not answer convincingly the questions addressed to him “concerning the presence of forces of aggression on the Congolese territory, the permeability of common borders and the need to build a free, secure and democratic Rwandan society based on human rights, equality and respect for diversity”. He stressed that his country had no hidden agenda in Rwanda and that his country, which bore “no responsibility for the Rwandan genocide of 1994”, would not tolerate its territory being used as a base for the launching of operations aimed at destabilizing neighbouring countries with which it wished to be on good terms. Furthermore, he argued that the security guarantees in the Great Lakes region should not come at the expense of the sovereignty of the Democratic Republic of the Congo nor interfere with its territorial integrity.¹¹²

By a presidential statement dated 24 July 2001,¹¹³ the Council reiterated its demand that all parties accelerate the finalization and the implementation of comprehensive plans for the orderly withdrawal of all foreign troops from the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the disarmament, demobilization, reintegration, repatriation and resettlement of all armed groups referred to in chapter 9.1 of annex A to the Lusaka Ceasefire Agreement. Concerning the Inter-Congolese Dialogue, the Council emphasized the importance of an open, representative and inclusive dialogue, free from outside interference, leading to a consensus settlement.

By resolution 1376 (2001) of 9 November 2001, the Council reaffirmed the obligation of all States to refrain from the use of force against the territorial integrity and political independence of any State or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations, and reaffirmed also the political independence, territorial integrity and sovereignty of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, including over its natural resources. It further welcomed the withdrawal of some foreign forces from the Democratic Republic of the Congo, including the full Namibian contingent, as a positive step towards the full withdrawal of all foreign forces, and requested all States that had not yet done so to begin to implement, without delay, their full withdrawal in accordance with resolution 1304 (2000) of 16 June 2000.¹¹⁴

By resolution 1417 (2002) of 14 June 2002, the Council, reaffirming the obligation of all States to refrain from the use of force against the territorial integrity and political independence of any State or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes and principles of the United Nations, welcomed the commitments made by the President of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, during the Security Council mission to the Great Lakes, not to support the armed groups referred to in the Lusaka Ceasefire Agreement, and urged the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo urgently to take all necessary steps to ensure that its territory was not used to support those armed groups.¹¹⁵

At the 4596th meeting, on 8 August 2002, held following the signing of the Peace Agreement between the Governments of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the Republic of Rwanda on the Withdrawal of the Rwandan Troops from the Territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the Dismantling of the ex-FAR and Interahamwe Forces in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, signed in Pretoria on 30 July 2002,¹¹⁶ the representative of the Democratic Republic of the Congo thanked the Council for having convened a meeting to welcome the “recent and very significant advances made to put an end to the war of aggression” that had been waged against his country for more than four years. He affirmed that the Pretoria Agreement fell within the framework of the Lusaka Ceasefire Agreement and was in conformity with the provisions of relevant resolutions calling for the orderly withdrawal of all foreign troops. The representative stated that among the countries that had come to the assistance of his country in “defending its national sovereignty and its territorial integrity”, Namibia had totally withdrawn and Angola and Zimbabwe had repatriated a large number of their contingents. On the other hand, withdrawal movements of the uninvited forces had been observed only on the part of Uganda and Burundi. Rwanda had considerably increased its forces and remained the only country engaged in large-scale military operations on Congolese soil, he added. He asserted that the Pretoria Agreement was “the most serious opportunity for peace” since the beginning of war on 2 August 1998 and provided a response to security concerns expressed by Rwanda, although it was his country that had been experiencing total insecurity for four years. He believed that the Pretoria Agreement also envisaged the restoration of the national sovereignty and territorial integrity of his country, which had been gravely imperiled by the Rwandan presence, and embodied the ingredients for a return to normality for the Great Lakes region. The representative maintained that it was urgent that his country conclude with the Governments of Uganda and Burundi agreements similar to the Pretoria Agreement.¹¹⁷

The representative of Rwanda also praised the signing of the Pretoria Agreement which he considered was an “unprecedented” step towards the resolution of the conflict. He observed that for a long time the Council had urged Rwanda and the Democratic Republic of the Congo to work together to resolve the root causes of the conflict, that is, to find how to dissuade the ex-FAR and Interahamwe forces from carrying out attacks on Rwanda from bases in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. In his opinion, the disarmament, demobilization and repatriation of the armed forces in the Lusaka Ceasefire Agreement was not effectively implemented, and therefore, the security threat to affected countries, principally Rwanda, had not been reduced. What the Pretoria Agreement brought to the process was a solemn commitment by the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo to track, assemble and disarm former members of the Rwandese Armed Forces and Interahamwe forces. He stated that his country had undertaken to withdraw its troops from the Democratic Republic of the Congo as soon as the above-mentioned process got under way and was judged to be irreversible. The representative further stated that Rwanda fully recognized the problems caused by the presence and activities of their nationals in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and welcomed the decision of the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo to negotiate the Pretoria Agreement.¹¹⁸

By a presidential statement of 15 August 2002,¹¹⁹ the Council welcomed the Peace Agreement between the Governments of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Rwanda and the Programme of Implementation of the Peace Agreement between the Governments of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the Republic of Rwanda on the Withdrawal of the Rwandan Troops from the Territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the Dismantling of the ex-Rwandese Armed Forces and Interahamwe Forces in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, signed in Pretoria on 30 July 2002. The Council also welcomed the commitment of the Government of Rwanda, under the Pretoria Agreement, regarding the withdrawal of its troops from the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and took note of the submission by Rwanda of its initial troop withdrawal plan to the "Third Party".

By a presidential statement of 18 October 2002,¹²⁰ the Council welcomed the progress on withdrawal of foreign forces from the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and stressed that the withdrawals must be completed. The Council called upon all parties to the conflict to cease hostilities immediately and without preconditions, and called upon the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and all Governments in the region to exert their influence on all the parties to that effect and to refrain from any action which would further exacerbate the situation or undermine the peace process. The Council further stressed that no Government, military force or organization or individual should provide military or other supplies or any other form of support to any of the groups involved in the fighting in the east of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and in Burundi.

By resolution 1445 (2002) of 4 December 2002, the Council welcomed the signature of the Luanda Agreement on 6 September 2002 by the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Uganda,¹²¹ The Council also welcomed the decision taken by all foreign parties to withdraw fully their troops from the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, as well as progress in the implementation of those processes, including the withdrawals by Angola, Rwanda, Uganda and Zimbabwe. The Council noted the commitment of Uganda under the Luanda Agreement to complete the withdrawal of its forces no later than 15 December 2002, welcomed the positive interaction between the Governments of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Uganda since the signing of the Agreement, and called upon both parties to work, together and with the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (MONUC), towards conditions that would allow the Agreement to be implemented in full. The Council reiterated that no Government, military force or organization or individual should provide military or any other form of support to any of the groups involved in the fighting in the east of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, in particular in Ituri. The Council encouraged the Governments of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and, respectively, Rwanda and Uganda to take steps to normalize their relations and to cooperate to ensure mutual security along their borders, as provided for in the Pretoria Agreement and the Luanda Agreement, and also encouraged the Governments of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Burundi to take similar steps.¹²²

By a presidential statement of 16 May 2003,¹²³ the Council called upon all parties in the region to end all support to armed groups and to refrain from any action that might compromise the restoration of peace in Ituri, in particular the work of the Ituri interim administration, and reaffirmed its strong commitment to the sovereignty of the Democratic Republic of the Congo over all its territory.

By resolution 1484 (2003) of 30 May 2003, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, demanded that all Congolese parties and all States in the Great Lakes region refrain from any military activity or from any activity that could further destabilize the situation in Ituri, and in that regard demanded also the cessation of all support, in particular weapons and any other military materiel, to the armed groups and militias, and demanded further that all Congolese parties and all States in the region actively prevent the supply of such support.¹²⁴

The Security Council convened the 4726th meeting, on 26 March 2003, in connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, in response to letters dated 24 March 2003 from the representatives of Iraq and Malaysia addressed to the President of the Council.¹²⁵ The letter from the representative of Iraq, in particular, requested the convening of an urgent meeting with a view to “halting American-British aggression and the immediate withdrawal of the invading forces outside the international boundaries” of Iraq, reconfirming the sovereignty, political independence and territorial integrity of Iraq and preventing all States from interfering in its internal affairs.¹²⁶

At the meeting, the representative of Iraq argued that his country was subject to the American-British full-scale military aggression since 20 March 2003, which constituted a violation of international law and the Charter, in particular Article 2 (4) and (7). He emphasized that the Council had not authorized the use of force by those two States and that resolution 1441 (2002) did not allow the use of force.¹²⁷ The latter argument was supported by the Libyan Arab

Jamahiriya.¹²⁸ Similarly, pointing out that there was no authorization by the Council of the military action, the representative of Malaysia underlined that the pre-emptive use of force threatened the foundation of international law.¹²⁹ The representative of Yemen stressed that using force against others for reasons other than self-defence and without a Council mandate constituted a flagrant violation of the principles of international law and the Charter.¹³⁰ The representatives of Yemen and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya further regarded the declared policy to change the Iraqi regimens “an act of aggression” carried out against a sovereign, independent State that was a State Member of the Organization, and as interference in the domestic affairs of Iraq.¹³¹ A number of other speakers concurred that the military action was a violation of the Charter, calling it a “unilateral action,” “act of aggression” and “unilateral attack.”¹³² Furthermore, the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran held that the unilateral war against Iraq did not meet any standard of international legitimacy and that it was not waged in self-defence against any prior armed attack nor could Iraq be considered an imminent threat against the national security of the “belligerent Powers”.¹³³

According to the representatives of Argentina and Morocco, the use of force should be the last resort, once all peaceful means had been exhausted, and the use of force should be authorized by the Security Council.¹³⁴ The representative of Venezuela maintained that the Council must categorically reject the use of force, and therefore it should direct its efforts toward achieving an immediate ceasefire and ending the use of force.¹³⁵

In contrast, the representative of Poland regretted that Iraq had not abided by the provisions of resolution 1441 (2002) and held that the resolution contained “a warning of grave consequences in case of non-compliance, based on Chapter VII” of the Charter.

He continued that the use of force remained the only option when the peaceful means for the resolution of the Iraqi crisis had been exhausted as Council decisions, particularly those relating to weapons of mass destruction, were not abided by and the Iraqi regime constituted a threat to international peace and security.¹³⁶ The representative of Australia noted that existing Security Council resolutions, including resolutions 678 (1990), 687 (1991) and 1441 (2002), provided authority for the use of force to disarm Iraq of weapons of mass destruction and to restore international peace and security to the region.¹³⁷ The representative of the United Kingdom stressed that the action of his country with its coalition partners, to uphold United Nations resolutions, was both legitimate and multilateral and that the use of force was authorized in the circumstances under resolutions 678 (1990), 687 (1991) and 1441 (2002).¹³⁸ The representative of the United States underscored that the actions the coalition forces were undertaking were an appropriate response, legitimate and not unilateral, arguing that resolution 1441 (2002) explicitly found Iraq in continuing material breach and in view of additional material breaches by Iraq, the basis for the existing ceasefire had been removed and the use of force was authorized under resolution 678 (1990).¹³⁹

Letter dated 5 October 2003 from the Permanent Representative of the Syrian Arab Republic to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council (S/2003/939)

Letter dated 5 October 2003 from the Permanent Representative of Lebanon to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council (S/2003/943)

On 5 October 2003, the Security Council convened the 4836th meeting in response to the request contained in a letter dated 5 October 2003 from the representative of the Syrian Arab Republic addressed to the President of the Council.¹⁴⁰ By that letter, the representative of the Syrian Arab Republic requested a meeting to consider the “violations of Syrian and Lebanese airspace committed on that date by the Israeli air force and the missile attack carried out by the latter on the same day against a civilian site situated inside Syrian territory”.

At the meeting, the representative of the Syrian Arab Republic condemned the “unwarranted aggression” in flagrant violation of the Charter and of the Agreement on Disengagement between Israeli and Syrian forces, signed at Geneva in May 1974.¹⁴¹ The representative of Lebanon argued that excessive violations by Israel of his country’s air space and of the Blue Line arrangements sponsored by the United Nations in southern Lebanon led to an act of aggression against a Member State. He further argued that the Charter and the norms of international law “warn[ed]” against any act of aggression by any Member State against another irrespective of the reason and also held that a State should first resort to the Council to argue its case.¹⁴²

However, the representative of Israel argued that its “measured defensive response to the horrific suicide bombings against a terrorist training facility” in the Syrian Arab Republic was a clear act of self-defence in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter. He underscored that those actions came after Israel had exercised tremendous restraint despite countless acts of terrorism that had claimed hundreds of innocent lives, for which the Syrian Arab Republic was responsible, and after his country and the international community had repeatedly called on the Syrian Arab Republic to end its support of terrorism and comply with international law. He further argued that like any State faced with a critical and prolonged threat, Israel needed to exercise its inherent right and obligation to defend its citizens.¹⁴³ The representative of the United States called on all sides to avoid heightening the tension in the Middle East and to think carefully about the consequences of their actions. He added that it was in the interest of the Syrian Arab Republic and in the broader interests of Middle East peace that the Syrian Arab Republic stop harbouring and supporting the groups that perpetrated terrorist acts such as the one that had occurred in Haifa.¹⁴⁴

A number of speakers condemned the air attack by Israel against the Syrian Arab Republic as a violation of the norms of international law and the Charter and/or called on parties to exercise restraint and restore the political process;¹⁴⁵ some strongly opposed the attack, calling it an act of aggression against a Member State and echoing the argument made by the representative of the Syrian Arab Republic.¹⁴⁶

The representative of Pakistan observed that the Charter prescribed strict rules for the use of force by Member States, which was envisaged in only two circumstances: the first was in exercise of the right of self-defence against a direct act of aggression or use of force and the second was the collective use of force under Article 42 of the Charter, with the explicit authorization of the Council. He continued to argue that the attack by Israel against the territory of the Syrian Arab Republic had not met those strict requirements set out in the Charter and considered it an arbitrary attack in violation of the Charter and the relevant Council resolutions concerning the Middle East.¹⁴⁷ The representative of Morocco expressed the view that the Syrian Arab Republic had been a victim of Israeli recourse to the use of force, in violation of the Charter: Article 2 (4) called on all Member States to refrain from the use of force against the territorial integrity or the political independence of any State. He contended that the Israeli attack had been a flagrant violation of the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Syrian Arab Republic, and that it could not be the object of the sole legal justification envisaged in the Charter, legitimate self-defence.¹⁴⁸ The representative of Jordan made it clear that no party could act outside the jurisdiction of Article 2 (4) of the Charter, which prohibited the use of force except in two cases. The first case was the use of force under Article 51 of the Charter, which reflected the principle of self-defence. However, the exercise of that right on the part of any State was conditioned on a prior armed attack against it. The second case was authorization by the Council of the use of force under Chapter VII of the Charter.

Neither case applied in the case of the aerial attack by Israel against the Syrian Arab Republic, he argued.¹⁴⁹

C. Article 2, paragraph 5

Article 2, paragraph 5

All Members shall give the United Nations every assistance in any action it takes in accordance with the present Charter, and shall refrain from giving assistance to any state against which the United Nations is taking preventive or enforcement action.

Note

During the period under review, there were no explicit references to Article 2 (5) in the decisions or deliberations of the Security Council. However, in the report of the Panel on United Nations Peacekeeping Operations, Article 2 (5) was explicitly cited in the context of conflict prevention. As one of its key recommendations on preventive action, The Panel supported the Secretary-General's more frequent use of fact-finding missions to the areas of tensions, and stressed obligations of Member States, under Article 2 (5) of the Charter, to give "every assistance" to such activities of the United Nations.¹⁵⁰

In addition, the Council adopted several resolutions and issued a number of presidential statements which might have an implicit bearing on the principle enshrined in Article 2 (5). The following examples including calls for assistance relating to the good offices of the Secretary-General; measures imposed within the framework of Article 41 of the Charter; peacekeeping operations; enforcement actions of regional arrangements authorized by the Council; and multinational forces authorized by the Council, can be considered representative of the practice of the Council during the period under review concerning the principle enshrined in Article 2 (5).

Assistance relating to the good offices of the Secretary-General

With regard to the good offices of the Secretary-General and his representatives, for example, by a presidential statement of 26 January 2000, in connection with the situation concerning the ¹⁴⁹ Ibid., p. 18.

Democratic Republic of the Congo, the Council urged all parties to provide the Special Representative of the Secretary-General in the Democratic Republic of the Congo with “the assistance and cooperation” he would require to carry out his functions.¹⁵¹

Assistance relating to measures imposed within the framework of Article 41 of the Charter

During the period under review, implicit references to Article 2 (5) were frequently made in decisions of the Security Council in connection with the measures imposed by the Council under Chapter VII of the Charter. In a number of cases, the Council called on States to take action or otherwise strengthen their efforts in support of sanctions or other measures that had been imposed by the Council. In addition, in some cases, the Council explicitly requested Member States to cooperate with the relevant Committees and the monitoring and expert bodies established to oversee the implementation of the sanctions measures and with inspection bodies.

For instance, with regard to the situation in Liberia, by resolution 1343 (2001) of 7 March 2001, the Council called on all States to take the appropriate measures to ensure that individuals and companies in their jurisdiction acted in conformity with United Nations embargoes, in particular those established by resolutions 1171 (1998) and 1306 (2000), and to take the necessary judicial and administrative action to end any illegal activities by those individuals and companies.¹⁵²

In connection with the situation in Angola, by resolution 1295 (2000) of 18 April 2000, the Council requested the Secretary General to establish a monitoring mechanism, and called on all States to cooperate fully with it in the discharge of its mandate.¹⁵³ Furthermore, in a presidential statement dated 15 November 2001,¹⁵⁴ the Council called on Member States to comply fully with the implementation of the sanctions regime against the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola (UNITA) and to cooperate fully with the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 864 (1993) and the monitoring mechanism on sanctions against UNITA.

In connection with the situation in Somalia, by resolution 1407 (2002) of 3 May 2002, the Council called on “all States, the Transitional National Government and local authorities in Somalia” to cooperate fully with the Chairman of the Committee established pursuant to resolution 751 (1992) and the Team of Experts to be established by the same resolution in their quests for information in accordance with the resolution. It also requested all States to report to the Committee on measures they had in place to ensure the full implementation of the arms embargo and called upon all States, particularly those in the region, to provide the Committee with all available information on violations of the embargo.¹⁵⁵ In addition, by resolution 1519 (2003) of 16 December 2003, the Council called on all States in the region to cooperate with the Monitoring Group set up by that resolution, by establishing the focal points to enhance its cooperation and to facilitate information exchange.¹⁵⁶

In connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, by resolution 1302 (2000) of 8 June 2000 and subsequent resolutions, while extending the oil-for-food programme established by resolution 986 (1995), the Council appealed to all States to continue to facilitate the transit of humanitarian supplies to Iraq authorized by the Committee established pursuant to resolution 661 (1990), and to take all other appropriate measures to ensure that urgently needed humanitarian supplies reached the Iraqi people as rapidly as possible. The Council further urged all States, specifically the Government of Iraq, to provide their full cooperation in the “effective implementation” of the relevant resolution.¹⁵⁷

Furthermore, also with regard to the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, by resolution 1441(2002) of 8 November 2002, recalling that the effective operation of the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission (UNMOVIC) established pursuant to resolution 1284 (1999) and the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) was essential for the implementation of resolution 687 (1991) and other relevant resolutions, the Council requested all Member States “to give their full support” to UNMOVIC and IAEA “in the discharge of their mandates”.¹⁵⁸

Assistance relating to peacekeeping operations

In a number of decisions of the Council, Member States were requested to provide assistance to peacekeeping operations, including the provision of troops and material support.¹⁵⁹ For example, in connection with the situation between Eritrea and Ethiopia, by resolution 1312 (2000) of 31 July 2000, the Council called upon the parties to provide the United Nations Mission in Ethiopia and Eritrea (UNMEE) “with access, assistance, support and protection required for the performance of its duties”.¹⁶⁰

Assistance relating to enforcement actions by regional arrangements authorized by the Security Council

In some cases, the Security Council called upon Member States to assist enforcement actions taken by the regional arrangements which were authorized by the Security Council. For instance, in connection with the situation in Côte d’Ivoire, by a presidential statement of 25 July 2003,¹⁶¹ the Council called upon Member States to provide logistic and financial support to the Economic Community of West African States Mission in Côte d’Ivoire, authorized under Chapter VII of the Charter by resolution 1464 (2003) of 4 February 2003, so that it could continue to fulfill its mandate.

Assistance relating to multinational forces authorized by the Security Council

On occasion, the Security Council called for assistance to be provided to the multinational forces it had authorized. For example, in connection with the situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo, by resolution 1501 (2003) of 26 August 2003,

the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, authorized the States members of the Interim Emergency Multinational Force that had been authorized by resolution 1484 (2003) to provide assistance to the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo deployed in and the immediate surroundings of Bunia, if requested and if exceptional circumstances demanded it.¹⁶²

In other instances, the Council, by its resolutions,¹⁶³ requested full cooperation of Member States with the multinational forces. For instance, in connection with the situation in Afghanistan, by resolution 1386 (2001) of 20 December 2001, the Council encouraged neighbouring States and other Member States to “provide to the International Security Assistance Force such necessary assistance” as might be requested, “including overflight clearances and transit”.¹⁶⁴

Other activities of the United Nations

During the period under review, the Council called upon Member States to support the efforts by the United Nations in the areas of counter-terrorism, conflict resolution and humanitarian assistance.

For example, in connection with threats to international peace and security caused by terrorist acts, by resolution 1373 (2001) of 28 September 2001, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, decided that all States should “refrain from providing any form of support,” active or passive, to entities or persons involved in terrorist acts, including by suppressing recruitment of members of terrorist groups and eliminating the supply of weapons to terrorists.¹⁶⁵ and Kuwait, by resolution 1483 (2003) of 22 May 2003, called upon “all Member States in a position to do so to respond immediately to the humanitarian appeals by the United Nations and other international organizations for Iraq”.¹⁶⁶

D. Article 2, paragraph 6

Article 2, paragraph 6

The Organization shall ensure that states which are not Members of the United Nations act in accordance with these Principles so far as may be necessary for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Note

During the period under review, there was no explicit reference to Article 2 (6) in the decisions of the Security Council. Furthermore, no decisions included a reference to “States not Members of the United Nations” that might be described as an implicit reference to the principle enshrined in Article 2 (6). The Security Council in its decisions tended to refer to “all States” or simply to “States” when it made calls for States to take specific actions.¹⁶⁷ There were no explicit references to Article 2 (6) during the Council’s deliberations, nor did any constitutional discussion arise in connection with that Article.

E. Article 2, paragraph 7

Article 2, paragraph 7

Nothing contained in the present Charter shall authorize the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state or shall require the Members to submit such matters to settlement under the present Charter; but this principle shall not prejudice the application of enforcement measures under Chapter VII.

¹⁶⁶ Resolution 1483 (2003), para. 2.

¹⁶⁷ For references to “all States” or “States” contained in the decisions of the Council adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter, see chapter XI, part VI entitled “Obligations of Member States under Article 48 of the Charter”.

Note

During the period under review, there was no explicit reference to Article 2 (7) contained in the decisions adopted by the Council.

Article 2 (7) was explicitly referred to in several communications¹⁶⁸ during the reporting period. In addition, in a letter dated 16 September 2002¹⁶⁹ from the Secretary-General addressed to the President, transmitting a letter of the same date from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq addressed to the Secretary-General, the Minister drew attention to the decision of his Government to allow the return of the United Nations weapons inspectors to Iraq without conditions, and reiterated the importance of the commitment of all States Members of the Council and the United Nations to respect the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Iraq, as stipulated in the relevant Council resolutions and “in Article 2 of the Charter”.

During the deliberations of the Security Council, the principle enshrined in Article 2 (7), while not always invoked explicitly, was touched upon frequently, as illustrated by the cases presented below. The first two cases deal with the thematic debates on the humanitarian aspects of issues before the Security Council (case 7) and on the protection of civilians in armed conflict (case 8). Case 9 captures the relevant deliberations of the Council in two meetings held in connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait: one meeting was held following the decision by the Government of Iraq to allow the return of the United Nations weapons inspectors to Iraq without conditions, contained in the letter dated 16 September 2002 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq, addressed to the Secretary General,¹⁷⁰ and the other following the military action against Iraq by the United States, the United Kingdom and their allies which commenced on 20 March 2003.

¹⁶⁸ See, for example, the letter dated 5 October 2000 from the representative of Yugoslavia addressed to the President (S/2000/961); the letter dated 26 May 2001 from the representative of Iraq addressed to the Secretary-General (S/2001/532); and the letter dated 20 December 2002 from the representative of Iraq addressed to the Secretary-General (S/2002/1400).

Maintaining peace and security: humanitarian aspects of issues before the Security Council

At the 4109th meeting, on 9 March 2000, the Council held a thematic debate on the agenda item entitled “Maintaining peace and security: humanitarian aspects of issues before the Security Council.” In the course of the debate, speakers engaged in discussing the role and responsibility of the Security Council in dealing with humanitarian crises and providing humanitarian assistance. In particular, the representative of France argued that humanitarian crises could reach such degrees of seriousness that the response could only be a political one and, in certain circumstances, one that would also require the use of force to end large-scale violations of human rights and international humanitarian law, as those violations in themselves threatened international peace and security, and therefore fully justified the use of such action, in accordance with the Charter. He continued that such was the case in Kosovo and that under those circumstances the Council could not but exercise the responsibilities assigned to it under the Charter.¹⁷¹

While acknowledging that humanitarian activities were necessary in armed conflicts as a basic and undisputed duty of the international community, and in particular, of the Security Council, the representative of Tunisia underscored that the conduct of such humanitarian assistance “must of necessity strictly comply with the principles of sovereignty of States, their political independence, their territorial integrity and non-interference in their internal affairs”, as stipulated by the Charter of the United Nations and the international conventions in force.¹⁷²

The representative of Pakistan pointed out that the prospects of preventive action must be studied within the five fundamental parameters, one of which was respect for the principle of State sovereignty and non-interference and non-intervention in the internal affairs of States, although that principle could not be extended to situations where people under colonial rule, foreign occupation or alien domination were struggling for their inalienable right to self-determination.¹⁷³ The representative of India, explicitly referring to Article 2 (7), argued that it was the sovereign right of a State to determine whether it needed humanitarian assistance. According to him, if the State chose not to seek assistance, coercion or use of force by the Council or any other body would violate that Article.¹⁷⁴

Protection of civilians in armed conflict

At the 4130th meeting, on 19 April 2000, the Council held a thematic debate on the protection of civilians in armed conflict. Various speakers referred to the need to observe the purposes and principles of the United Nations, in particular, respect for the sovereignty, political independence and territorial integrity of States and non-interference in their internal affairs.¹⁷⁵

The representative of China held that the Government of a country in armed conflict tended to decide on the measures necessary to protect civilians in accordance with the nature and characteristics of the conflict and the circumstances of civilians in the area of conflict, and, in that regard, the positions of sovereign States should be respected by the Security Council, as action taken without the understanding and cooperation of the countries involved might lead those countries to resist. He also pointed out that any attempts to politicize humanitarian concerns, wantonly interfere in other countries’ internal affairs or worse yet, overturn a legitimate Government under the pretext of protecting civilians, ran counter to the purposes and principles of the Charter.¹⁷⁶ The representative of Tunisia also believed it essential, when dealing with the protection of civilians in armed conflict, to respect the principles of the sovereignty, political independence and territorial integrity of States and non-interference in their internal affairs, as well as to secure the consent and cooperation of the parties, in particular the Governments of the countries concerned.¹⁷⁷

In a similar vein, the representative of Egypt expressed the belief that the provision of humanitarian assistance to civilians in time of war, under the auspices of the United Nations or the International Committee of the Red Cross, should be conducted with the consent of or at the request of the countries concerned and that the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of States should be respected. He further insisted that humanitarian assistance must not be used as a cover for action in support of the political interests of any particular State or group of States.¹⁷⁸

At the same meeting, the Council adopted resolution 1296 (2000), in which the Council reaffirmed its commitment to the purposes of the Charter as set out in Article 1, paragraphs 1 to 4, and to the principles of the Charter as set out in Article 2, paragraphs 1 to 7, including its commitment to the principles of the political independence, sovereign equality and territorial integrity of all States, and respect for the sovereignty of all States.¹⁷⁹

At the 4625th meeting, on 16 October 2002, in connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, speakers touched upon the principle enshrined in Article 2 (7), in conjunction with the discussion on the sanctions regime against Iraq and on the role of the Council in resolving the situation.

Throughout the deliberations, a number of speakers reaffirmed their respect for the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Iraq.¹⁸⁰ The representative of the United Arab Emirates drew attention to the provisions of relevant Council resolutions calling for respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq and non-interference in its internal affairs.¹⁸¹

In his intervention, the representative of Iraq maintained that the sanctions regime was in violation of numerous Articles of the Charter, including Article 2 (7), which did not “allow the United Nations to intervene” in matters that were “essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any State”.¹⁸²

The representative of Malaysia argued that the focus in the Council should be on promoting United Nations diplomacy to resolve the problem through effective inspections and weapons destruction, not on “legitimizing war against Iraq to effect regime change”. He held that removing the Head of State or Government of a sovereign State was “illegal and against the Charter”.¹⁸³ A similar argument was also made by the representative of Viet Nam.¹⁸⁴

At the 4726th meeting, held on 26 March 2003 in response to the request contained in letters dated 24 March 2003 from the representatives of Iraq and Malaysia addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁸⁵ the Secretary-General stressed that respect for the sovereignty, territorial integrity and independence of Iraq should be a guiding principle in the future decisions by the Council on Iraq.¹⁸⁶ The representative of Iraq emphasized that the full-scale Anglo-Saxon military invasion and the aggressive war against his country constituted a blatant material breach of international law and the Charter, particularly Articles 2 (4) and 2 (7).¹⁸⁷ The representative of Pakistan underlined the principles prescribed in the Charter, including the principle of non-intervention and non-interference in internal affairs of a State, in containing the conflict and restoring the rule of law in Iraq.¹⁸⁸

Consideration of the functions and powers of the Security Council (Articles 24 and 25 of the Charter)

A. Article 24

1. In order to ensure prompt and effective action by the United Nations, its Members confer on the Security Council primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, and agree that in carrying out its duties under this responsibility the Security Council acts on their behalf.

2. In discharging these duties the Security Council shall act in accordance with the Purposes and Principles of the United Nations. The specific powers granted to the Security Council for the discharge of these duties are laid down in Chapters VI, VII, VIII, and XII.

3. The Security Council shall submit annual and, when necessary, special reports to the General Assembly for its consideration.

Note

During the period under review, none of the decisions adopted by the Council contained an explicit reference to Article 24 of the Charter.¹⁸⁹ However, Article 24, the provision by which the Members of the United Nations conferred on the Council primary responsibility for the maintenance of peace and security, was implicitly referred to in a number of resolutions and presidential statements, mostly in the context of the agenda items dealing with thematic and cross-cutting issues. By such decisions, the Council reaffirmed, reiterated, recalled or bore in mind its “primary responsibility” under the Charter for the maintenance of international peace and security.¹⁹⁰

In order to illustrate the interpretation and application of Article 24 by the Council, a number of cases were drawn from deliberations in which Council members engaged in discussing the role and responsibilities of the Council.

Cases 10 to 16 relate to thematic debates in which Member States touched upon the question of the mandate of the Security Council vis-à-vis other United Nations bodies in accordance with the Charter.

Case 17 reviews discussions in connection with the agenda items entitled “The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina” and “United Nations peacekeeping”. In which the Council dealt with the issue of exemption from prosecution in cases involving personnel from States not Parties to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court. Finally, relevant debates are set out concerning the situation in the Middle East, including the Palestinian question (case 18), and the situation between Iraq and Kuwait (case 19).

Case 10 Maintaining peace and security: humanitarian aspects of issues before the Security Council

At the outset of the 4109th meeting, on 9 March 2000, the President reaffirmed that the Charter of the United Nations conferred upon the Security Council the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security and stressed that the Council, in discharging such functions, needed a broad, more proactive approach. Furthermore, he expressed the view that the Council had a responsibility to address humanitarian issues relating to situations of conflict and take appropriate action.¹⁹³

At the same meeting, the representative of Canada pointed out that while advocating for the implementation of a comprehensive approach to conflict prevention, the Council must be prepared to respond quickly to situations in which populations were in grave need, by supporting their access to

In connection with threats to international peace and security caused by terrorist acts, see the letter dated 22 December 2003 from the Chairman of the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 1373 (2001) concerning counter-terrorism to the President of the Council, transmitting the third report from Angola submitted pursuant to para. 6 of resolution 1373 (2001) (S/2003/1210, p. 4).

protection and assistance and by identifying political solutions to resolve the underlying causes of humanitarian crises. He argued that given that humanitarian actions did not respond to the causes of conflict but to the needs of victims, humanitarian efforts should be matched by corresponding actions enabling political actors, and in particular the Council, to address and resolve conflict.¹⁹⁴ The representative of France stated that the Council had the primary responsibility to deal with situations in which violations of international humanitarian law and human rights threatened international peace and security, as in East Timor. Therefore, the Council also had the responsibility for continuing to deal with humanitarian situations in all aspects of its activities, as in the case of Iraq. The representative further stressed that although relieving civilian suffering was the task of United Nations agencies and humanitarian organizations, it should not absolve the Council of its responsibilities for dealing with crises.¹⁹⁵ The representative of Tunisia argued that the Security Council should shoulder its responsibility in the field of humanitarian activities as the duty of the international community.¹⁹⁶

The representative of China was of the view that the Security Council, in fulfilling its primary responsibility of maintaining international peace and security, and in reviewing situations of armed conflict, should also pay attention to humanitarian issues caused by conflicts and especially take into consideration factors such as humanitarian assistance, in order to help eliminate or alleviate humanitarian crises, while respecting the sovereignty of a recipient State.¹⁹⁷ The representative of the Russian Federation considered that, while not equating the functions of the Council with those of humanitarian organizations, the Council must lend active political support to the activities of those organizations which in general must be backed up by the authority of the Council.¹⁹⁸ Others also considered it essential that the Council, in dealing with specific situations, ensure the protection of civilians and consider humanitarian aspects of conflicts.¹⁹⁹

In that context, many speakers emphasized the importance of strengthening the coordination mechanisms in humanitarian activities among the relevant bodies of the United Nations system and others.²⁰⁰ At the same time, several speakers stressed the need to respect the mandate of all organs of the United Nations in accordance with the Charter.²⁰¹ For example, the representative of Egypt warned that the delicate balance established in the Charter between the responsibilities and functions of the primary bodies of the United Nations should be maintained, so that each could fulfil its respective tasks without encroaching upon the responsibilities of the other. He urged the Council, in fulfilling its tasks, to act in compliance with all the provisions of the Charter and in conformity with the specific role and responsibility assigned to it, in order to address all threats to international peace and security.²⁰² The representative of Colombia expressed concern that if the Council assumed the role, outside the scope of the Charter, of directing the response of the entire United Nations system to humanitarian emergencies, it would be unable properly to fulfil its mission of preserving international peace and security. He contended that the matter of humanitarian emergencies should be addressed by the General Assembly where the “proper guidance” to the humanitarian action could be given by all Member States.²⁰³ The representative of Brazil considered that the role of the Council was to add to the work of the other bodies of the United Nations, including the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly, without trying to replace them.²⁰⁴

At the same meeting, the representative of India pointed out that the Council was a creature of the Charter, in which Article 24 conferred on the Council primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. In that regard, he argued that nowhere did the Charter speak of humanitarian action or its aspects. The representative maintained that the membership of the United Nations, on behalf of which the Council acted in accordance with Article 24, agreed on the one hand that peacekeeping, another activity not mentioned in the Charter, was set up as a practical instrument. On the other hand, there was no agreement on the humanitarian aspect, and whether the Council should have a role in it.²⁰⁵

By a presidential statement dated 9 March 2000,²⁰⁶ the Council, recalling its primary responsibility under the Charter for the maintenance of international peace and security, recognized the importance of the humanitarian dimension to the maintenance of international peace and security and to its consideration of humanitarian issues relating to the protection of all civilians and other non-combatants in situations of armed conflict. It also recognized that humanitarian crises could be both causes and consequences of conflicts and that they could affect the Council's efforts to prevent and end conflicts and to deal with other threats to international peace and security. By the same presidential statement, the Council also underlined the importance of effective coordination among relevant United Nations organs and agencies as well as other organizations and actors in the field in situations of ongoing conflict and peacebuilding, and expressed its willingness to consider ways to improve such coordination.

The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security: HIV/AIDS and international peacekeeping operations

By resolution 1308 (2000) of 17 July 2000, the Council emphasized the important role of the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council in addressing HIV/AIDS, and stressed the need for coordinated efforts of all relevant United Nations organizations to address the HIV/AIDS pandemic in line with their respective mandates and to assist, wherever possible, in global efforts against it. By the same resolution, the Council also stressed that the HIV/AIDS pandemic, if unchecked, might pose a risk to stability and security.²⁰⁷

At the 4259th meeting, on 19 January 2001, recalling that his delegation had introduced the issue of

HIV/AIDS for the first time into the agenda of the Council in January 2000,²⁰⁸ the representative of the United States pointed out that there had been debates about whether the Council, "the highest international body legitimizing international involvement across borders" should address the matter at all. While acknowledging that others considered it appropriate that the issue be left entirely to the Economic and Social Council, he maintained that the earlier debate on the topic had been worth it, because the continued work by the Council would save lives.²⁰⁹ In that connection, some speakers recalled resolution 1308 (2000) and argued that HIV/AIDS was a threat to international peace and security, and therefore the Council had a role to play.²¹⁰

The representative of Costa Rica, however, while registering his concern in relation to the risk that peacekeepers might contract or spread HIV/AIDS, stressed that under the Charter, it was up to the General Assembly to study and coordinate efforts to combat the epidemic and for the Economic and Social Council to assess, and deal with, the social and developmental effects of the disease. He held that the competence of the Council in that area was severely limited.²¹¹

Peacebuilding: towards a comprehensive approach

At the 4272nd meeting, on 5 February 2001, several speakers acknowledged that peacebuilding was a multidimensional task, which required partnership and better coordination of the Security Council with other organs such as the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council as well as with other agencies responsible for peacebuilding.²¹²

²⁰⁸ At the 4087th meeting, on 10 January 2000, the Council discussed the agenda item entitled "The situation in Africa: the impact of AIDS on peace and security in Africa".

²⁰⁷ Resolution 1308 (2000), third, fourth and eleventh preambular paragraphs.

The representative of the United States pointed out that, while directing multiple United Nations agencies involved in peacebuilding was not the responsibility of the Council, the Council had in the past agreed that certain peacebuilding measures, such as disarmament, demobilization and reintegration activities and the rebuilding of local police forces, fell within its purview.²¹³ The representative of Colombia expressed the view that the Council should be considered as only one of the actors and sometimes “the least relevant one” among those involved in peacebuilding.²¹⁴ For his part, underscoring the importance of the main bodies of the Organization carrying out their work within their mandates in conformity with the Charter, the representative of Egypt held that the issue of peacebuilding fell within the competence of the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council, and therefore urged the Council to give more attention to emerging or ongoing conflicts and to focus on peacebuilding in a controlled manner as it related to post-conflict situations, so the Council was not diverted “from its main function of maintaining international peace and security”. While recognizing the Council’s role in peacebuilding, he also expressed concern about the overlap in the functions of the main bodies of the United Nations.²¹⁵ A similar concern was expressed by the representative of India, who held that most of what post-conflict peacebuilding involved lay “outside the mandate of the Council” and “within the purview of the General Assembly”.²¹⁶

By a presidential statement dated 20 February 2001,²¹⁷ the Council reaffirmed its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security and reiterated the value of including, as appropriate, peacebuilding elements in the mandates of peacekeeping operations. The Council further reiterated its willingness to consider ways to improve its cooperation with other United Nations bodies and organs directly by peacebuilding, in particular with the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council, which had a primary role in that field.

Role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflict

At the 4334th meeting, on 21 June 2001, many speakers expressed general support for greater interaction between the Council, the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council in dealing with the issue of conflict prevention. They also discussed the distribution of competencies established by the Charter among those principle organs of the United Nations. Some, in that context, stressed that the Council did have a key but not exclusive role to play in the area of conflict prevention.²¹⁸ For example, the representative of Iraq stressed that the Charter, in particular Articles 10, 11 and 14, entrusted the General Assembly with a role in the maintenance of international peace and security and in the prevention and settlement of conflicts. Nonetheless, the Security Council had expanded its mandate, and thereby exceeded the terms of reference of the General Assembly, which had led to a diminished role and competence of the General Assembly.²¹⁹ The representative of Nigeria argued that although Article 24 of the Charter bestowed on the Council the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, a successful conflict prevention strategy required the cooperation of all United Nations actors.²²⁰

By a presidential statement dated 20 July 2000, bearing in mind its primary responsibility under the Charter for the maintenance of international peace and security, the Council reaffirmed its role in taking appropriate steps aimed at the prevention of armed conflicts. In addition, the Council, stressing the importance of effective post-conflict peacebuilding strategies in preventing the re-emergence of conflicts, recognized the need for close cooperation among bodies of the United Nations system in the area of post-conflict peacebuilding and expressed its willingness to consider ways to improve such cooperation. The Council further affirmed that a reformed, strengthened and effective United Nations remained central to the maintenance of peace and security, of which prevention was a key component.²²¹ By resolution 1366 (2001) of 30 August 2001, the Council expressed its determination to pursue the objective of prevention of armed conflict “as an integral part of its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security”.²²²

Case 14 Small arms

At the 4355th meeting, convened on 2 August 2001, following the conclusion of the United Nations Conference on the Illicit Trade in Small Arms and Light Weapons in All Its Aspects, held in New York from 9 to 20 July 2001, many speakers recognized that the Security Council had an important contribution to make with respect to the issue of small arms, indicating that certain provisions of the Programme of Action to Prevent, Combat and Eradicate the Illicit Trade in Small Arms and Light Weapons in All Its Aspects adopted at the conclusion of the Conference²²³ were relevant to the role of the Council. At the same time, the representative of the United States cautioned the Council against seeking a more elaborate role beyond its competence.²²⁴ As to the relationship with the General Assembly, the representative of Brazil emphasized that with respect to small arms, the Council should avoid creating a process parallel to that of the Conference; that its role related, inter alia, to conflict prevention, arms embargoes and the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of former combatants.²²⁵ Stressing that the Programme of Action was adopted through a process initiated by the General Assembly, the representative of South Africa suggested that involvement of the Council on the issue of small arms should be “confined to specific areas related to the Council’s agenda”.²²⁶ Furthermore, the representative of the Sudan, speaking on behalf of the Group of Arab States, pointed out that the role of the Council must be a “supporting one in respect of the efforts undertaken by the General Assembly”.²²⁷ The representative of Pakistan maintained that the Council could contribute to the question of small arms, by focusing on the areas that were directly within its competence and jurisdiction, which meant that it fulfilled its Charter obligations towards the pacific settlement of disputes and the prevention of armed conflicts.²²⁸

At the same meeting, speakers encouraged coordination between the Security Council and other organs of the Organization, particularly the General Assembly and the specialized agencies, to promote a coherent system-wide approach to small arms.²²⁹

By a presidential statement dated 31 August 2001,²³⁰ the Council noted with grave concern that the destabilizing accumulation and uncontrolled spread of small arms and light weapons in many regions of the world, among other things, increased the intensity and duration of armed conflicts, undermined the sustainability of peace agreements and compromised the effectiveness of the Council in discharging its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. Welcoming the adoption of the Programme of Action, the Council recognized its responsibility in assisting in its implementation.

By a statement by the President dated 31 October 2002,²³¹ the Council recognized its responsibility to examine ways in which it could further contribute to dealing with the question of illicit trade in small arms and light weapons in situations under its consideration.

Case 15 Protection of civilians in armed conflict

At the 4492nd meeting, on 15 March 2002, the Council heard supportive opinions on the role of the Security Council in the protection of civilians in armed conflict. The representative of France, pointing out that the majority of the victims of conflict had shifted from soldiers to civilians, reaffirmed the primary responsibility of the Council for the maintenance of peace and security, and asserted that the ongoing debate was entirely justified.²³² The representative of the United States expressed the view that it had always considered the protection of civilians to be at the heart of the task of the United Nations and of the Security Council in dealing with conflicts.²³³ The representative of the Syrian Arab Republic maintained that the Council had decided to focus on the question of protection of civilians as an early warning element of the maintenance of international peace and security. He stated that the Council had a special responsibility to encourage Member States to fulfil their obligations with respect to the protection of civilians and that ways must be found to improve cooperation among the Council, the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council, each according to its mandate.²³⁴ Noting that resolutions 1265 (1999) and 1296 (2000) had established a solid base for the work of the Council in the area of protection of civilians, the representative of the Russian Federation was of the view that it was “only normal” for the Council to devote its attention to the issue.²³⁵

By a presidential statement dated 15 March 2002,²³⁶ the Council reaffirmed its concern at the hardships borne by civilians during armed conflict and recognized the consequent impact this had on durable peace, reconciliation and development, bearing in mind its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, and underlining the importance of taking measures aimed at conflict prevention and resolution.

By subsequent presidential statements dated 20 December 2002 and 15 December 2003,²³⁷ the Council reaffirmed the need to keep the protection of civilians in armed conflict as an important item on the agenda of the Council.

Case 16

The situation in Africa

Ad Hoc Working Group on Conflict Prevention and Resolution in Africa

At the 4538th meeting, on 22 May 2002, following a briefing by the Chairman of the Ad Hoc Working Group on Conflict Prevention and Resolution in Africa, the representative of Cuba observed that many measures necessary for eliminating the causes of conflict in Africa and consolidating peace and sustainable development were “clearly beyond the mandate of the Security Council” and corresponded to the work of such organs as the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council. Therefore, one of the functions of the Working Group should be to consider carefully the activities undertaken by the Council in Africa as the Council might not be the appropriate organ to undertake them. He further argued that his delegation’s concerns stemmed not only from the conceptual perspective but also from a concern over the suffering of the countries where the Council assumed functions that were beyond its competence, and for which it was not duly prepared. He emphasized that the work of the Working Group should “complement and not substitute” for the efforts of other organs to address problems in Africa, and should avoid duplications. He also hoped that it would contribute to improved coordination and communication among the General Assembly, the Council and the Economic and Social Council.²³⁸ The representative of India contended that post-conflict peacebuilding did not fall within the purview of the Council, but lay with other bodies and organs of the Organization. He contended that as and when those bodies required the involvement and the cooperation of the Security Council, they would invite it.²³⁹

Case 17

The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina

United Nations peacekeeping

In a letter dated 3 July 2002 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representative of Canada requested the Council to convene a meeting on the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, stressing that at issue was not just an extension of the United Nations

²³⁹ Ibid., p. 32.

Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina (UNMIBH), but the “potentially irreversible” decision of the Council which could negatively affect, inter alia, the integrity of treaty negotiations and the “credibility of the Council”.²⁴⁰ In response to that request, the Council convened the 4568th meeting, on 10 July 2002, in connection with the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

At the meeting, the representative of Canada raised concerns over the discussion that had been taking place in the Council regarding exemptions for peacekeepers from prosecution by the International Criminal Court. He maintained that the Council had not been empowered to rewrite treaties. He further argued that the draft resolutions being circulated²⁴¹ contained elements that “exceed[ed] the Council’s mandate” and that passage of them would “undermine the credibility of the Council”.²⁴² Similarly, the representatives of New Zealand and South Africa stated that the authority and the role of the Council entrusted to it by the Charter would be open to question, if the Council attempted to change the negotiated terms of a treaty without the approval of its States parties.²⁴³ Other speakers also expressed concern over the legitimacy of the proposal which, in their opinion, exceeded the competency of the Council.²⁴⁴

Specifically referring to Article 24 of the Charter, the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran expressed regret that the one-sided approach adopted by a permanent member of the Council was, inter alia, putting in jeopardy the future of United Nations peacekeeping. He further argued that such an approach ran counter to the spirit and letter of the Charter, especially Article 24, which maintained that the Council acted “on behalf of the general membership”.²⁴⁵ The representative of Jordan was of the view that it was almost inconceivable, given the obligations conferred upon it by Article 24, that the Council could ponder putting at risk the lives of potentially millions of people and existing peacekeeping operations because of differences in opinions on the International Criminal Court.²⁴⁶ Explicitly citing Article 24 of the Charter, the representative of Mongolia recalled that Member States viewed the Council as the main United Nations body that was called upon, not only to strengthen international peace and security, but also to safeguard State sovereignty and independence in the case of threats or a crisis.²⁴⁷

The representative of Fiji explicitly referred to Article 24 (1), stating that the functions and powers of the Council, including those set out in Chapter VII, did not include amending treaties and that doing so would violate established principles of international treaty law.²⁴⁸

However, the representative of the United States argued that the proposal by his delegation, in which article 16 of the Rome Statute was used, was consistent with both the Statute and the primary responsibility of the Council for maintaining international peace and security.²⁴⁹

By resolution 1422 (2002) of 12 July 2002, under the agenda item entitled “United Nations peacekeeping”, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, requested the International Criminal Court to suspend for 12 months, starting 1 July 2002, the investigation or prosecution cases involving personnel from States not Parties to the Rome Statute of the Court, and expressed the intention to renew that request under the same conditions each 1 July for further twelve-month periods for as long as it might be necessary.²⁵⁰

At the 4772nd meeting, on 12 June 2003, in connection with United Nations peacekeeping, some speakers, without explicitly invoking Article 24, contested the proposed renewal of the provisions of resolution 1422 (2002). The representative of Canada indicated his concern about the legitimacy of the action recommended by the Council and stated that under the Charter, Member States had entrusted “certain powers under certain conditions” to the Council in order to maintain international peace and security. The representative further indicated his dismay that the Council, in purporting to act in the name of Member States, would take action in the absence of any apparent threat to international peace and security which was the precondition for action under Chapter VII of the Charter.²⁵¹ The representative of New Zealand also expressed concern that the intention of the Council to renew resolution 1422 (2002) on an annual basis was inconsistent with both the terms and the purpose of the provision. As such, it touched directly on the obligations assumed by States parties under the Rome Statute, without their consent. He further stated that such an approach stretched the legitimate limits of the role and responsibility entrusted to the Council under the Charter.²⁵² The representative of Jordan expressed the belief that the Council should not be rewriting treaties previously negotiated by all States comprising the entire international community.²⁵³

The representative of Liechtenstein stated that resolution 1422 (2002) was more damaging to the Council itself than to the International Criminal Court, and that many of the comments offered the previous year made it clear that the resolution effectively raised questions about the credibility of the action by the Council. He drew attention to the fact that at a time when the relevance of the Council and the Organization as a whole was openly questioned by many critics, the Council would do itself a disservice by renewing automatically or indefinitely the provisions of resolution 1422 (2002).²⁵⁴ The representative of South Africa also questioned the renewal of resolution 1422 (2002) and urged the Council to use its authority wisely and in the interest of humankind as a whole, and not allow itself to jeopardize the Court or frustrate the ends of international criminal justice.²⁵⁵

At the same meeting, there were a number of explicit references to Article 24. The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran expressed regret that a unilateral approach by one member of the Council had created an untenable and unsound situation in the Council and undoubtedly, such an approach ran counter to the spirit and letter of the Charter, especially Article 24, which maintained that the Council acted on behalf of the membership of the United Nations.²⁵⁶ The representative of Nigeria also reaffirmed that Member States had collectively conferred on the Council the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, under Article 24.²⁵⁷ While supporting the draft resolution,²⁵⁸ the representative of Pakistan stated that his Government strongly adhered to the position that the Council, despite its wide authority and responsibilities, was not empowered to unilaterally amend or abrogate international treaties and agreements freely entered into by sovereign States. He further reaffirmed that the powers of the Security Council were constrained under paragraph 2 of Article 24 of the Charter, which obliged it to discharge its duties in accordance with the purposes and principles of the Charter.²⁵⁹ At the meeting, the draft resolution was adopted as resolution 1487 (2003) by which the Council extended for a twelve-month period the provisions of resolution 1422 (2002).

Case 18 The situation in the Middle East, including the Palestinian question

At the 4231st meeting, on 22 November 2000, convened in connection with the situation in the Middle East, including the Palestinian question, the representative of Palestine affirmed that, to put an end to the situation, the responsibility of the Council was consistent and clear in accordance with the Charter. He noted that first, concrete measures needed to be taken to end the Israeli campaign against the Palestinian people and secondly, the Council must provide the necessary international protection for Palestinian civilians under Israeli occupation.²⁶⁰ For his part, the representative of Israel held the belief that as the organ with the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, the Council was duty-bound to encourage the parties to return to the path of bilateral negotiation and compromise. He further urged the Council to call upon the Palestinians to adhere to the commitments they had undertaken to renew security cooperation with Israel and to call for an end to the violence and to return to the negotiating table. The representative of Israel assured the Council that, if the Palestinians were to take those actions, the bloodshed would end immediately.²⁶¹

Several speakers called upon the Council to fulfil its obligations under the Charter and to act without delay to stop the violence. The representative of Malaysia emphasized that the Council, with the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, must live up to its obligations and that its credibility was at stake.²⁶² The representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya stated that if the Council was to express the will of the international community and to maintain international peace and security, it should be just and shoulder its responsibilities under the Charter and its own resolutions.²⁶³ A similar call was made by the representative of Egypt.²⁶⁴

In subsequent meetings on the agenda item, also expressed the opinion speakers that the Council should assume the responsibility vested in it by the Charter, by explicitly citing Article 24.²⁶⁵

Case 19 The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

At the 4336th meeting, held on 28 June 2001 in response to the request contained in a letter dated 15 June 2001 from the representative of the Russian Federation addressed to the President,²⁶⁶ the Council considered, inter alia, the effects of the sanctions imposed on Iraq and ways of improving the humanitarian situation in that country. At the meeting, the representative of Canada, referring to a draft resolution submitted by the United Kingdom to modify the oil-for-food programme,²⁶⁷ recalled that Article 24 of the Charter specified that members of the Council were to “act on behalf of the entire United Nations membership”. Therefore, he appealed to all members of the Council to act corporately in the common interest by supporting the draft resolution, since that was “their duty under the Charter” and “our expectation of them as our representatives”.²⁶⁸

At the 4625th meeting, on 16 October 2002, following the decision of the Government of Iraq to resume weapons inspections in Iraq, the Deputy Secretary-General stated that non-compliance by Iraq with Security Council resolutions posed a challenge to the Organization and in particular to the Council. She further reaffirmed that in Article 24 of the Charter, Member States had conferred on the Council primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security and that it was essential that the Council should face up to its grave responsibility.²⁶⁹

At the same meeting, the representative of Jordan called on all Member States to work towards achieving a solution through peaceful means in order to avoid making the situation in the Middle East even more critical, which, in his opinion, compelled the Council to assume its responsibilities as provided for in the Charter, including paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 24.²⁷⁰

The representative of Morocco expressed the view that resolutions of the Council should be respected, as the Council adopted them “on behalf of” Member States, in accordance with the purposes and principles of the United Nations and in line with the provisions of Article 24 of the Charter.²⁷¹ Explicitly citing Article 24, the representative of Jamaica also reaffirmed that the Council was entrusted with the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security on behalf of the membership of the Organization, and that in discharging its responsibilities, the Council should act in accordance with the purposes and principles of the United Nations. As such, he argued that the Council was accountable to the wider membership, especially in discussing a matter of great importance for the world.²⁷²

At the same meeting, the representative of Iraq held that the embargo imposed against his country was a blatant violation of several provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, such as Article 24, which called for the Council to work in keeping with the purposes and principles of the Charter.²⁷³

Following the commencement of the military action against Iraq by the United States and its allies, at the 4726th meeting, on 26 March 2003, the Secretary-General urged Member States to reunite to uphold the principles of the Charter. This was essential for the Council to recover its rightful role, entrusted to it by the Charter, as the body with primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security.²⁷⁴

The representative of Iraq argued that, while consideration of humanitarian questions was important, the Council should pay attention first to the cessation of “the war of aggression”, not the humanitarian aspects. He continued that the focus on the latter was an attempt to distract the Council from its main role in the maintenance of international peace and security.²⁷⁵ Similarly, the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran held that the international community expected the Council to live up to its obligations and call for an immediate ceasefire and the withdrawal of foreign troops from Iraq.²⁷⁶

The representative of Malaysia, speaking on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement, expressed disappointment at the failed attempts to avert the war in Iraq and called on the Council to pronounce itself on the issue of the ongoing military action against Iraq. He called on the Council to use its power and authority as mandated by the Charter, “to revert to the multilateral process” to resolve the current issue. He further pointed out that “as the custodian of international peace and security”, the Council had a “special and heightened” responsibility to ensure that the international world order was based on the principles of justice and international law.²⁷⁷ The representative of the League of Arab States called upon the Council to shoulder its obligations as the organ responsible for the maintenance of international peace and security. He urged the Council to put an end to the war and initiate an immediate withdrawal of the “invading forces”, which was the responsibility of the Council. The credibility of the Council, he said, depended upon that.²⁷⁸ The representative of Jamaica, referring explicitly to Article 24, also reminded the Council of its responsibility.²⁷⁹

B. Article 25

Article 25

The Members of the United Nations agree to accept and carry out the decisions of the Security Council in accordance with the present Charter.

Note

During the period under review, the Council did not adopt any decisions that explicitly invoked Article 25 of the Charter. In the deliberations of the Council, however, there were several occasions²⁸⁰ on which explicit references to Article 25 of the Charter were made.

On one such occasion, a speaker noted the relationship between Articles 24 and 25. At the 4568th meeting, on 10 July 2002, the representative of Mongolia noted that Article 24 of the Charter conferred on the Security Council primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security and that Member States viewed the Council as the main United Nations body that was called upon, not only to strengthen international peace and security, but also to safeguard their sovereignty and independence in case of threats or crisis. He stated that it was because of that trust and faith that Member States agreed, in Article 25 of the Charter, to accept and carry out the decisions of the Council.²⁸¹

The principle enshrined in Article 25 was referred to, without being invoked explicitly, in a large number of resolutions and presidential statements. In particular, the binding nature of the decisions of the Council, within the context of Article 25, was reaffirmed in a resolution in connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, by which the Council requested the Secretary-General immediately to notify Iraq of the resolution, which was binding on Iraq.²⁸² In addition, by a presidential statement of 20 July 2000, in connection with the role of the Security Council in the prevention of armed conflicts, the Council recalled “the obligation of all Member States to accept and carry out” its decisions, including those for the prevention of armed conflicts.²⁸³

In other instances, the Council demanded that Member States comply with relevant resolutions, reminding them that non-compliance was in a violation of the Charter. For example, in connection with the situation in Somalia, by resolution 1474 (2003) of 8 April 2003, noting with regret that the arms embargo on Somalia had been continuously violated since its imposition in 1992, the Council stressed the obligation of “all States and other actors” to comply with resolution 733 (1992) and reaffirmed that non-compliance constituted “a violation of the provisions of the Charter”.²⁸⁴ Similar provisions were included in resolution 1519 (2003) of 16 December 2003.²⁸⁵

In a draft resolution that was not adopted during the period under review, the Council, recalling “the obligation of Members of the United Nations to accept and carry out decisions of the Security Council”, would have condemned the failure of implementation of its resolutions and demanded the immediate implementation of a resolution.²⁸⁶

During the period under review, there were a few instances in which Article 25 was explicitly cited in communications.²⁸⁷

In one case, during the deliberations of the Council concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, an aspect of the application of Article 25 was touched upon, namely the binding nature of the decisions of the Council (case 20).

Case 20 The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

At the 4625th meeting, on 16 and 17 October 2002, many speakers urged Iraq to implement relevant Security Council resolutions. The representative of Pakistan, explicitly citing Article 25 of the Charter, opined that the Article imposed a “clear-cut” obligation on Member States to implement the decisions of the Security Council without conditions.²⁸⁸

However, several speakers expressed concern about “discrimination” or “double standards” of the Council in seeking the implementation of its decisions in connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, compared to those, in particular, in connection with the situation in the Middle East, including the Palestinian question.²⁸⁹ The representative of South Africa argued that the Council should ensure consistency in the way it acted to enforce its decisions and to avoid subjectivity and vagueness in its resolutions. He further underlined that, the Council, by clearly defining the objectives of its decisions and setting clear benchmarks for compliance, could facilitate efforts by Member States to fully comply with their obligations.²⁹⁰ Similarly, the representative of Algeria, in referring to resolution 1435 (2002), expressed the view that the Council must be consistent and fair and ensure compliance with its resolutions in every instance.²⁹¹ The representative of Jordan stated that the implementation of Security Council resolutions was an obligation of all States, without exception, including resolutions on the Middle East, whether they were adopted with regard to Iraq or to the occupied Palestinian territories.²⁹² The representative of Malaysia argued that what was required of Iraq, with respect to compliance with Council decisions, must also be required of others, particularly Israel, which had ignored many of them with impunity.²⁹³ The representative of Saudi Arabia stressed that Council resolutions, under whatever Chapter of the Charter they might be adopted, were binding, particularly since they addressed issues of international peace and security.²⁹⁴

The representative of Israel, for his part, contended that there was indeed a double standard directed against Israel, which could explain the failure to see any distinction between “binding resolutions, adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter — resolutions that set out specific actions to be taken by Iraq, independent of the actions of any other party — and interdependent recommendations or statements of the principle, adopted under Chapter VI”, that were designed to move all the parties forward in the Middle East. He continued by affirming that unlike resolutions concerning Iraq, the resolutions of the Council on the

Israeli-Palestinian conflict did not envision Israeli action without reciprocal commitment and implementation by other parties to the dispute, and that they could not be compared to resolutions adopted under Chapter VII which addressed the threat posed by the aggressive intentions of one regime to both the region and the world.²⁹⁵

The representative of the Syrian Arab Republic, however, rejected the view expressed by the representative of Israel as “distortion” of the Charter and affirmed that Article 25 called on all States to implement Council resolutions and that all Council resolutions were binding and must be implemented, and therefore, all resolutions were binding on all Members.²⁹⁶ The representative of Singapore, echoed by the representative of Mauritius, explicitly cited Article 25 and held that irrespective of whether they were adopted under Chapter VI or Chapter VII of the Charter, all Council resolutions must be complied with and no Council resolution on any issue could be cast aside without consequences. The representative of Singapore continued by stating that, to maintain its credibility and authority, the Council must vigorously pursue the implementation of all its resolutions, whether they were on Iraq, the Middle East, the Balkans or Africa.²⁹⁷ The representative of Palestine renounced the statement by the representative of Israel indicating that there was a difference in the nature of the resolutions adopted pursuant to Chapter VII and those pursuant to Chapter VI of the Charter. He declared that, while recognizing the existence of an enforcement mechanism pursuant to Chapter VII, to attempt to give the impression that some resolutions were binding and others were not was “legally false”, and maintained that Article 25 was clear and all Council resolutions were binding.²⁹⁸

Consideration of the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter

Article 52

2. The Members of the United Nations entering into such arrangements or constituting such agencies shall make every effort to achieve pacific settlement of local disputes through such regional arrangements or by such regional agencies before referring them to the Security Council.

3. The Security Council shall encourage the development of pacific settlement of local disputes through such regional arrangements or by such regional agencies either on the initiative of the states concerned or by reference from the Security Council.

4. This Article in no way impairs the application of Articles 34 and 35.

Article 53

1. The Security Council shall, where appropriate, utilize such regional arrangements or agencies for enforcement action under its authority. But no enforcement action shall be taken under regional arrangements or by regional agencies without the authorization of the Security Council, with the exception of measures against any enemy state, as defined in paragraph 2 of this Article, provided for pursuant to Article 107 or in regional arrangements directed against renewal of aggressive policy on the part of any such state, until such time as the Organization may, on request of the Governments concerned, be charged with the responsibility for preventing further aggression by such a state.

2. The term enemy state as used in paragraph 1 of this Article applies to any state which during the Second World War has been an enemy of any signatory of the present Charter.

Article 54

The Security Council shall at all times be kept fully informed of activities undertaken or in contemplation under regional arrangements or by regional agencies for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council further broadened its cooperation and coordination with regional arrangements or agencies in the maintenance of international peace and security, as provided for in Chapter VIII of the Charter.²⁹⁹ The more active involvement of regional organizations in the maintenance of peace and security provided for a wider range of options for the Council as to the nature and modalities of cooperation with those regional arrangements, which differed in mandate, structure, capacity and experience in peace-related activities.

Underscoring its expanding cooperation with regional organizations, in April 2003, the Security Council held its first thematic debate, with participation of several regional organizations,³⁰⁰ on the agenda item entitled “The Security Council and regional organizations: facing the new challenges to international peace and security”.³⁰¹

²⁹⁹ Chapter VIII of the Charter refers to “regional arrangements and agencies”. The Repertoire follows the practice of the Council in its use of these terms as synonymous with “regional organizations”.

³⁰⁰ Participating regional organizations included the Organization of American States (OAS), the League of Arab States (LAS), the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), the African Union, the European Union and the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS). For additional information regarding participation of representatives of regional organizations in meetings of the Council, see chapter III, annex II.

³⁰¹ In parallel, the Secretary-General continued a high-level meeting process with the heads of regional organizations with a view to strengthening mutual cooperation between regional organizations and the United Nations, particularly, in the context of Chapter VIII of the

The resolutions and presidential statements adopted by the Council during the period under consideration revealed an increased recognition of regional organizations and of their growing or potential role in international peace and security. Most of the activities of regional organizations praised or endorsed by the Council concerned efforts at the peaceful settlement of disputes. In other instances, regional organizations were called upon to assist in the monitoring and implementation of mandatory measures imposed by the Council under Chapter VII of the Charter. Furthermore, in three instances, the Council authorized the use of force by regional organizations to support the respective peacekeeping operations in the performance of their mandates.

While all instances of cooperation with regional arrangements could be considered to fall within the framework of Chapter VIII of the Charter, the Council, on occasion, invoked Chapter VIII or the relevant Articles therein in its decisions.³⁰² A number of explicit references to Chapter VIII as well as to Articles 52, 53 and 54 of the Charter were also made in Charter, on issues related to peace and security. By a presidential statement dated 20 February 2001 (S/PRST/2001/5), the Council welcomed the convening of the fourth high-level meeting between the United Nations and regional organizations and its results as conveyed by the Secretary-General in his letter of 12 February 2001 (S/2001/138). Upon the conclusion of the fifth high-level meeting between the United Nations and regional organizations in July 2003, by identical letters dated 22 October 2003 addressed to the President of the Security Council and the President of the General Assembly (S/2003/1022-A/58/444), the Secretary-General transmitted the conclusions of the meeting. Subsequently, reference was made to the outcome of the fifth high-level meeting during the deliberations of the Council.

³⁰⁴ By a letter dated 5 April 2000 addressed to the President of the Council, the representative of Djibouti, as President of the Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD) at the time, emphasized that IGAD was the main forum for peace efforts in the Sudan. While recognizing the primary responsibility of the Council for the maintenance of peace and security and its involvement in the pacific settlement of conflicts, he held that taking up the question of peace in the Sudan in the Council might have a negative impact on the peace process currently under way under the auspices of IGAD. He expressed hope that the Council, in accordance with Article 52 of the Charter, would do its utmost to "give a chance to the laudable efforts undertaken by IGAD for the resolution of the conflict in the Sudan" (S/2000/288). Additionally, by a letter dated 31 July 2000 addressed to the President of the Council, Mr. Jovanovic of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia reference to Article 53 was made in another communication.³⁰⁵ Explicit references to Article 54 were made occasionally by regional organizations in communications informing the Council of activities undertaken or contemplated by them for the maintenance of international peace and security.³⁰⁶

The practice of the Council under Chapter VIII of the Charter is set out below in five sections. Section A captures the relevant debates and decisions of the Council on general and thematic issues that touch upon the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter. Section B illustrates various ways in which the Council, in dealing with specific situations under its consideration, encouraged and supported efforts by regional organizations in the peaceful settlement of disputes. Section C sets out cases in which regional organizations were involved in the implementation of Chapter VII measures. Section D depicts four cases in which the Council considered or authorized enforcement action by regional organizations. Considering that the sanctions by the European Union were not based on international law and were contrary to the purposes and principles of the Charter, the Council was called upon to consider the lack of legal basis of the continued impositions of the sanctions, to declare them illegal and to propose that they be urgently lifted (S/2000/753).

A. General consideration of the provisions of Chapter VIII

On several occasions, as described below, the Council discussed the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter in the context of its deliberations on thematic and cross-cutting issues.

Ensuring an effective role of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security, particularly in Africa

At the 4194th meeting, on 7 September 2000, the President of China, while underscoring the responsibility of the Council for the maintenance of international peace and security, stressed the need to pay close attention to the opinions of regional organizations, such as the Organization of African Unity.³⁰⁷ The President of France also emphasized the need to strengthen the partnership between the Council and regional organizations. He noted that some progress had been made, but closer consultations at an earlier stage were critical when planning to call on the United Nations to facilitate implementation of an agreement or to take over a regional action.³⁰⁸ The President of Mali noted that cooperation with regional organizations should be strengthened to enable the United Nations to be more effective at prevention and at deploying locally based operations. He added that the international community and the Council had to employ a consistent strategy to build the capacity of OAU and of a future African union, and of regional organizations, as well as to cooperate with them.³⁰⁹ A few speakers called for greater coordination³¹⁰ and consultation with regional organizations.³¹¹

By resolution 1318 (2000), adopted at the same meeting, the Security Council called for the strengthening of cooperation and communication between the United Nations and regional or subregional organizations or arrangements, in accordance with Chapter VIII of the Charter, and in particular with respect to peacekeeping operations.³¹²

At the 4288th meeting, on 7 March 2001, several speakers stressed the need to strengthen cooperation and communication with regional and subregional organizations, citing examples of Council meetings with the ministerial delegation of the Economic Community of West African States and the Political Committee of the Lusaka Ceasefire Agreement process, both on the situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo.³¹³ The representative of Canada held that, while the Secretary-General had made substantial progress in improving the ability to work with regional and subregional bodies, such progress had not been matched by the Council, which had been too often absent when peace agreements were negotiated, resulting in the United Nations falling short of fulfilling its commitments. He noted, however, that when the Council had engaged regional or subregional bodies, too often the result had been to delay effective Council action.³¹⁴ Similarly, while acknowledging the existing cooperation between the Council and regional organizations, the representative of France underscored the importance of implementing that cooperation in a satisfactory manner. Pointing out the limited capacity of regional and subregional organizations to implement their decisions, he advocated the early involvement of the Council in the preparation of regional action, so that the Council could assume a mandate or undertake a mission from the regional organizations.³¹⁵

Peacebuilding: towards a comprehensive approach

At the 4272nd meeting, held on 5 February 2001, several speakers welcomed the timing of the debate in the light of the fourth high-level meeting between the United Nations and regional organizations³¹⁶ on 6 and

7 February 2001, which concerned cooperation with regional organizations in peacebuilding.³¹⁷ With respect to developing a comprehensive peacebuilding strategy, a number of speakers maintained that an integrated approach required thorough and timely coordination between actors on the ground and those at the centre and, most notably, between the United Nations and regional organizations.³¹⁸ The representative of the United Kingdom noted that the capacity of regional organizations could be extended, for example, by sharing information and analysis, the “double-hatting” of special envoys, and the arrangement of specialized training and secondments.³¹⁹ The representative of Colombia held that peacebuilding missions need not be carried out principally by the United Nations. Rather, depending on the specific conditions, the lead could be taken by a regional organization.³²⁰

Some speakers also argued that the United Nations and the regional actors possessed different strengths and capabilities in the area of conflict prevention and peacebuilding, and therefore the focus should be on achieving greater complementarity and synergy between the United Nations and regional organizations, using their respective comparative advantages.³²¹

commenting on the increasingly important role played by regional organizations in the maintenance of peace and security and conflict prevention, in line with their mandate under Chapter VIII of the Charter, some speakers reminded the Council that intervention by regional organizations needed to be done with its authorization, as provided for by Article 53 of the Charter.³²³ Other speakers, while urging for more cooperation with regional arrangements, reaffirmed the primacy of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security.³²⁴ Furthermore, the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania asserted that preventive action at the regional level, in the context of Chapter VIII, needed to be enhanced and that regional arrangements could act as an effective spearhead for subsequent Council action.³²⁵ The representative of Canada cited examples of cooperation, albeit “far from perfect”, between the United Nations and regional organizations such as those in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Ethiopia and Eritrea, and Sierra Leone, where regional organizations had taken the lead in the negotiation of peace agreements with the United Nations following the implementation phase. He argued that for such joint efforts to succeed, close coordination was needed.³²⁶ The representative of Indonesia called for regional organizations to play an active role in initiating and implementing conflict-prevention measures.³²⁷ The representative of the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC), commenting that conflict prevention differed from one region to the next, noted that creating an effective coordination mechanism among the United Nations agencies and regional organizations would make it possible to derive benefits, as laid out in Chapter VIII of the Charter, from the comparative advantages of every organization.³²⁸

By a presidential statement of the same date, the Council recognized the important role that regional organizations played in the prevention of armed conflicts and re-emphasized the need for effective and sustained cooperation and coordination between the United Nations and regional organizations and arrangements, in accordance with the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter. The Council expressed its willingness, within its responsibilities, to support the efforts of the Secretary-General in collaborating with the leadership of regional organizations and arrangements in order to develop strategies and programmes to be employed at the regional level. In that regard, the Council encouraged the strengthening of the modalities of cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations and arrangements, including in early warning and the mutual exchange of information. Additionally, it recognized the need to enhance the capacity of the Organization of African Unity.³²⁹

In his report dated 7 June 2001, included in the agenda of the 4360th meeting, held on 30 August 2001, the Secretary-General recognized that Chapter VIII of the Charter provided a broad mandate for interaction between the United Nations and regional organizations in conflict prevention. He held that regional organizations, because of their proximity, could contribute to conflict prevention in a number of ways, as they could provide a local forum for efforts to decrease tensions, and promote and facilitate a comprehensive regional approach to cross-border issues.³³⁰

By resolution 1366 (2001) of 30 August 2001, the Council, bearing in mind its primary responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security and reaffirming its role in the prevention of armed conflicts, called upon Member States as well as regional and subregional organizations and arrangements to support the development of a comprehensive conflict prevention strategy, as proposed by the Secretary-General in his report of 7 June 2001.³³¹ It called for the enhancement of the capacity for conflict prevention of regional organizations, in particular in Africa, by extending international assistance to, inter alia, OAU, its successor organization and ECOWAS.³³²

The Security Council and regional organizations: facing the new challenges to international peace and security

At the 4739th meeting, on 11 April 2003, the Security Council held its first thematic debate on the agenda item entitled “The Security Council and regional organizations: facing the new challenges to international peace and security”. While recalling the primary responsibility of the Council for the maintenance of international peace and security, a number of speakers stated that cooperation with regional organizations was important and that a dynamic relationship with regional organizations needed to be developed, on the basis of the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter.³³³ The representative of Germany, welcoming the initiative of the President to discuss questions related to Chapter VIII, commented that the potential of that Chapter seemed to be unfolding in a positive manner. However, he noted that if the primacy of the Council in the maintenance of international peace and security was rejected, the very foundation of international law as represented by the Charter would be brought into question. Therefore, it was imperative that regional security operations remained mandated by the Council. The representative added that to bring the primacy of the United Nations and the Council and the complementarity of regional organizations into sync with one another, regular dialogue between them should take place.³³⁴ The representative of France echoed that position.³³⁵ The representative of Angola reasserted the key role regional organizations played, but added that they could not substitute for the role and character of the United Nations as a universal Organization.³³⁶ The representative of Chile commented that the fruitful work of regional organizations should be promoted through a dynamic and energetic relationship with the Council within the framework of Chapter VIII, adding that there were clear benefits to the close synergy between those organizations and the Council.³³⁷ The representative of the United States asserted that regional organizations had a greater vested interest and sensitivity in regional situations and underlined that the United Nations should rely increasingly on regional organizations to assume responsibility for peacekeeping efforts and, in that regard, welcomed the decision of the African Union to establish a Peace and Security Council.³³⁸

Referring to the “distressing circumstances” in the Middle East, the Permanent Observer of the League of Arab States noted that the League had played the role expected of it by responding to the deteriorating situation in the region with regard to Palestine, Iraq and regional security, all in line with the principles and purposes of the Charter and the Articles relevant to the role of the Council and regional organizations in the pacific settlement of disputes. He further stated that LAS, working collectively with Arab diplomacy, had made a tremendous effort in support of the Council’s mission to inspect weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. Recalling that Chapter VIII allowed regional organizations considerable leeway in the settlement of disputes, while leaving primary responsibility with the Council, the representative of LAS stated that the Council did not deal with all regional organizations on the same footing, as it sometimes utilized some regional organizations while at other times it ignored others in a similar situation.³³⁹ The representative of Pakistan reiterated that regional arrangements were valuable only so long as they acted on the basis of the principles of the Charter.³⁴⁰

Referring to the need for a sensible division of labour among regional and subregional structures, by taking each of their comparative advantages into account, the representative of the Russian Federation reaffirmed that authorization by, and accountability to, the Council should be inherent in any regional or coalition peacekeeping operation, particularly when enforcement action was included in its mandate.³⁴¹

Citing Articles 52, 53 and 54 of the Charter, which recognized the potential of regional organizations in conflict prevention and the maintenance of peace, the representative of Cameroon stated that regional organizations aspired to, and had managed to, become more involved in conflict prevention and peacekeeping operations carried out by the United Nations in their respective areas.³⁴² The representative of Greece, speaking on behalf of the European Union and associated countries,³⁴³ commented that, in relation to operational interaction, the European Union was intensifying its practical cooperation with the United Nations system and other regional and subregional organizations. He highlighted the European Union Police Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina as the “first example of the practical possibilities of cooperation” between the United Nations and the European Union crisis management operations. He further expressed the view that in order to strengthen the collective security system of the United Nations, regional arrangements or agencies should enhance their role in conflict prevention.³⁴⁴

Maintenance of peace and security and post-conflict peacebuilding

At the 4118th meeting, on 23 March 2000, the representative of Algeria asserted that the growing reluctance of some countries to participate in peacekeeping operations, especially in Africa, had led to the greater involvement of regional organizations. That, in turn, made more acute the problem of the relationship between the United Nations and regional peacekeeping organizations, against the backdrop of the problem of financing operations and the material, logistic and military capacities of the regional organizations in playing their new role.³⁴⁵ Underscoring the role of regional organizations in post-conflict peacebuilding, the representative of Mongolia expressed the view that the international community and regional organizations should play an important role in addressing the problems of various post-conflict groups on the basis of new power-sharing or other agreed arrangements. He noted that, bearing in mind their nature, obligations and interests, regional organizations had a special stake and role to play in post-conflict peacebuilding — a role that no other international body could effectively fulfil.³⁴⁶

Strengthening cooperation between the United Nations system and the Central African region in the maintenance of peace and security

At the 4630th meeting, on 22 October 2002, some speakers called for strengthening the relationship between the Security Council and African regional and subregional organizations.³⁴⁷ In that context, the representative of Egypt urged the Council to give its political weight to the limited peacekeeping operations that regional organizations were able to undertake.³⁴⁸ Asserting that the African Union and subregional organizations could work closely with the United Nations on the basis of a comparative advantage in advocacy, preventive actions and peacemaking, the representative of Mauritius commented that subregional institutions could, in certain situations, advise the United Nations as to whether the situations necessitated that the Organization play a lead role or that of a simple coordinator. He concluded that in that way their respective roles would be clearly defined at the very early stages of emerging conflicts.³⁴⁹ The representative of the Russian Federation pointed out that regional organizations, owing to their geographical proximity and greater familiarity with unique local situations, could take the initiative in preventive diplomacy and the peaceful settlement of disputes, as demonstrated in Angola and, to a certain extent, the Democratic Republic of the Congo. He added, however, that peacekeeping operations by regional organizations could be launched only with “clear authorization by the Security Council”.³⁵⁰ The representative of Mexico asserted that cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations, recognized in Chapter VIII of the Charter, ensured not only better knowledge of the situation on the ground, but also a strategy that was commensurate with needs.³⁵¹

The role of the Security Council in the pacific settlement of disputes

At the 4753rd meeting, on 13 May 2003, referring to the various ways in which the Security Council had used Chapter VI in recent years, the Secretary-General mentioned Council attempts to work more closely with regional and subregional organizations to prevent and resolve conflicts in Africa.³⁵² He recalled some of the recommendations contained in his report of 7 June 2001,³⁵³ including the use of regional prevention mechanisms. Some speakers highlighted the importance of coordination by the Council with regional organizations in the pacific settlement of disputes.³⁵⁴ A few speakers noted that regional organizations played a crucial role in assisting the Council in understanding the root causes of conflict and in advising on the best way to cope with a situation. They further emphasized that regional organizations had closer knowledge and were particularly well placed to provide early warning and to maintain political mechanisms for the settlement of disputes.³⁵⁵ The representative of Guinea, while noting that the Council had a crucial role to play in seeking pacific settlement of conflicts, emphasized that regional organizations were appropriate channels for the prevention, management and settlement of conflicts.³⁵⁶ Other speakers emphasized the role of the Council under Chapter VIII to encourage the pacific settlement of disputes through regional arrangements.³⁵⁷ The representative of Greece, speaking on behalf of the European Union and associated countries,³⁵⁸ urged States parties to regional arrangements to try to achieve pacific settlement of their disputes through such mechanisms, in accordance with Articles 33 and 52 of the Charter.³⁵⁹

The situation in Africa

By a presidential statement dated 31 January 2002,³⁶⁰ the Security Council, recalling its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security as well as the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter of the United Nations, underscored the importance of partnership and enhanced coordination and cooperation, based on complementarity and comparative advantage, between the United Nations, OAU and subregional organizations in Africa in the promotion of regional peace and stability. The Council also emphasized the importance of enhanced cooperation and of ensuring better coordination between the United Nations and OAU with the view to achieving a lasting solution to conflicts. The Council further expressed its readiness to deepen its cooperation with OAU and subregional organizations and invited them to inform it at the earliest possible stage over their decisions and initiatives that could have implications relating to its responsibilities under the Charter. In addition, the Council called on the United Nations system to intensify its cooperation with OAU and subregional organizations in Africa in the field of capacity-building, particularly in early warning, conflict prevention and peacekeeping. It also stressed the importance of effective interaction between the United Nations system and OAU and subregional organizations through the exchange of information and analysis at the conflict prevention stage; coordination and clear understanding of respective roles in forwarding peace processes; and coordinated support to national and regional peacebuilding efforts.

At the 4460th meeting, on 29 January 2002, many speakers focused on the need to strengthen and develop the relationship between the United Nations, OAU and African subregional organizations in order to develop integrated approaches to conflict prevention, conflict settlement, and post-conflict peacebuilding, reconstruction and development.³⁶¹ Some speakers

Pointing out that the maintenance of international peace and security was first and foremost the responsibility of the Council and that there should be no dilution by shifting the obligation to regional organizations, the representative of India observed that while the idea of building an African peacekeeping capacity looked attractive, such organizations should be backed politically and, more importantly, through an infusion of the resources required. Citing the important role that regional and subregional organizations played in Ethiopia and Eritrea or Burundi, he nevertheless remained sceptical of the tendency, particularly evident in Africa, to transfer responsibility and subcontract initiatives to regional and subregional organizations, which might not necessarily be prepared for them.³⁶⁶

Conflicts in Africa: Security Council missions and United Nations mechanisms to promote peace and security

At the 4766th meeting, on 30 May 2003, a number of speakers emphasized the importance of coordination and cooperation between the Security Council and regional and subregional bodies,³⁶⁷ while others underlined the importance of providing regional arrangements with financial and political support.³⁶⁸ The representative of Cameroon maintained that the Council had, in a consistent and encouraging way, developed an exemplary institutional relationship with the Economic Community of West African States, citing the situation in Côte d'Ivoire as one example, but added that the Council had sometimes proved to be highly selective when there had been a contradictory regional decision on a conflict under consideration.³⁶⁹ The representative of the Russian Federation shared his satisfaction with the intensification of the peacekeeping efforts of the African Union, ECOWAS, the Southern African Development Community and the Intergovernmental Authority on Development, but expressed concern that, in some cases, the assessments of the Council and the African institutions did not coincide and that the requests of the African partners did not always find Council support.³⁷⁰ Citing the role of the African Union, among others, in resolving the situations in Central and Western Africa, the representative of Tunisia held that the efforts and initiatives to be carried out should be based on parameters established by African States themselves in pursuance of the principles and objectives of the

B. Encouragement or calls by the Security Council for action by regional arrangements in the pacific settlement of disputes

During the period under review, the Security Council, on various occasions, expressed encouragement and support for efforts undertaken by regional organizations in the pacific settlement of disputes, including the peace processes carried out under the auspices of regional organizations, such as the Lusaka process undertaken by OAU on behalf of the Democratic Republic of Congo. The Council also supported the deployment of the subregional peacekeeping force in Côte d'Ivoire by the Economic Community of West African States. In Sierra Leone, a United Nations mission took over some functions assigned to the ECOWAS peacekeeping mission and the two operated side by side. Furthermore, to harmonize the activities of the Organization and to promote cooperation with ECOWAS, the Council supported the establishment of the first United Nations regional peacebuilding office — the United Nations Office in West Africa (UNOWA). The practice of the Council in that regard is set out below, by region and by chronological order.

Africa

The situation in Côte d'Ivoire

In connection with the situation in Côte d'Ivoire, the Security Council supported the efforts by ECOWAS to achieve a pacific settlement of the conflict, which included support for deployment of a subregional peacekeeping force.

By a presidential statement dated 20 December 2002,³⁷² the Council strongly supported the efforts of ECOWAS to promote a peaceful resolution of the conflict and urged the leaders of ECOWAS to continue their efforts in a coordinated manner. Furthermore, the Council expressed its full support for the deployment in Côte d'Ivoire of the Economic Community of West

African States Monitoring Group (ECOMOG) by 31 December 2002, as called for in the final communiqué of the ECOWAS Summit in Dakar, adopted on 18 December 2002.³⁷³

By resolution 1464 (2003) of 4 February 2003, the Council recalled its full support for the efforts of ECOWAS to promote a peaceful settlement of the conflict, and also expressed its appreciation for the efforts of the African Union to reach a settlement.³⁷⁴ By the same resolution, the Council welcomed the deployment of the ECOWAS forces with a view to contributing to a peaceful solution of the crisis and, in particular, to the implementation of the Linas-Marcoussis Agreement.³⁷⁵

At the 4746th meeting, on 29 April 2003, the Executive Secretary of ECOWAS expressed the view that the Council was being challenged to find ways to support worthy subregional efforts to maintain peace and security, which, after all, was the primary responsibility of the Council. In addition, he suggested that the Council should look at cases of "successful subregional deployment of troops under Chapter VIII" of the Charter to stabilize crisis situations and deliberate whether it might not be prudent for the Council to provide the requisite resources for such forces. Citing Côte d'Ivoire as an example, he argued that the Council should encourage ECOWAS and other subregional organizations to continue to play a leading role and called for the creation of the right synergy and collaborative working relationships between ECOWAS and the Council to deal with issues of peace and security.³⁷⁶

In accordance with rule 55 of the rules of procedure, at the close of the 4747th meeting, held in private on 29 April 2003, the Council issued a communiqué through the Secretary-General, welcoming the action taken by ECOWAS with a view to resolving the crisis in Côte d'Ivoire. Furthermore, by resolution 1479 (2003) of 13 May 2003, the Council established the United Nations Mission in Côte d'Ivoire (MINUCI) with a mandate to facilitate the implementation by the Ivorian parties of the Linas-

Marcoussis Agreement, complementing the operations of ECOWAS forces.³⁷⁷

By a presidential statement dated 25 July 2003, the Council welcomed the satisfactory deployment of the ECOWAS peacekeeping force in the western part of the country to support the implementation of the ceasefire agreement reached on 3 May 2003. By resolution 1514 (2003) of 13 November 2003, the Council continued to reiterate its full support for the efforts of ECOWAS in promoting a peaceful settlement of the conflict.³⁷⁸

The situation in Guinea following recent attacks along its borders with Liberia and Sierra Leone

Letter dated 30 April 2001 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council (S/2001/434)

At the 4319th meeting, on 14 May 2001, at which no action was taken, the Council discussed, inter alia, the efforts of ECOWAS to advance the peace process and the report of the Inter-Agency Mission to West Africa.³⁷⁹ The Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations noted the efforts of ECOWAS to advance the peace process.³⁸⁰ The representative of Tunisia stated that ECOWAS should be fully involved in the activities in the subregion and supported the recommendations of the Inter-Agency Mission regarding the provision of assistance to ECOWAS to strengthen its institutional, logistical and financial capacities to enable it to shoulder its weighty responsibilities. He further recalled that the United Nations and the Council were called upon to support the initiatives of that subregional organization under Chapter VIII of the Charter, particularly its initiatives to settle the problems by political means and to put an end to the humanitarian crisis in the subregion.³⁸¹ Many speakers supported the role played by ECOWAS in the context of the West Africa region and called for more cooperation and coordination between the United Nations and ECOWAS.³⁸² Furthermore, a number of speakers welcomed the recommendation of the above-mentioned report to establish a United Nations office for West Africa.³⁸³

On the basis of its consideration of the report of the Inter-Agency Mission to West Africa,³⁸⁴ the Council, by a presidential statement dated 19 December 2001,³⁸⁵ fully supported the initiatives taken with a view to implementing the recommendations in the report. In particular, the Council welcomed the establishment of the Office of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for West Africa to ensure, inter alia, the strengthening of harmonization and coordination of the activities of the United Nations system in an integrated regional perspective and the development of a fruitful partnership with ECOWAS, other subregional organizations and international and national actors. The Council stressed the need to strengthen further the capacities of ECOWAS in areas that would enable it to act as the “engine of subregional integration and increased cooperation with the United Nations system”.

The situation in Sierra Leone

In Sierra Leone, the Security Council welcomed the efforts by ECOWAS in the peaceful settlement of the dispute, and provided its support by expanding the peacekeeping operation of the United Nations to take over some functions performed by the ECOWAS peacekeeping operation, both of which continued to operate side by side throughout the reporting period.

In his report of 11 January 2000, the Secretary-General observed that, following the decision of Nigeria to withdraw its troops from Sierra Leone, the ECOWAS Monitoring Group would be unable to continue to perform the vital functions of providing security and protection to the Government of Sierra Leone. He therefore recommended that the Council authorize the expansion of the mandate of the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL), established by resolution 1270 (1999) of 22 October

1999, in order for UNAMSIL to assume the functions that were assigned to ECOMOG.³⁸⁶

By resolution 1289 (2000) of 7 February 2000, the Council welcomed the efforts made by ECOMOG and UNAMSIL towards the implementation of the Peace Agreement, signed in Lomé on 7 July 1999.³⁸⁷ In addition, the Council, while taking note of the decision of the Governments of Ghana, Guinea and Nigeria, to withdraw their remaining ECOMOG contingents from Sierra Leone,³⁸⁸ expressed its appreciation of ECOMOG for its indispensable contribution towards the restoration of democracy and the maintenance of peace, security and stability in Sierra Leone. The Council, in deciding to expand the mandate of UNAMSIL,³⁸⁹ stressed the importance of a smooth transition between ECOMOG and UNAMSIL for the successful implementation of the Peace Agreement and the stability of Sierra Leone and, in that regard, urged all those concerned to consult over the timing of troop movements and withdrawals.³⁹⁰ By subsequent resolutions and presidential statements, the Council continued to support and encourage the efforts of ECOWAS towards a lasting and final settlement of the crisis in the Mano River Union region.³⁹¹ In particular, by resolution 1370 (2001) of 20 November 2001, the Council underlined the importance of the continuing political and other support that the United Nations provided to the efforts made by ECOWAS to stabilize the region.³⁹²

The situation in Liberia

With regard to the situation in Liberia, the Security Council continuously commended the efforts by ECOWAS and the African Union towards the restoration of peace and stability in the region. In particular, following the signing of the ceasefire agreement in July 2003, the Council commended the role of ECOWAS in facilitating the peace process, citing Chapter VIII of the Charter.

By a series of resolutions, the Council welcomed the continued efforts of ECOWAS to restore peace and security in the region and bring lasting peace in Liberia.³⁹³ By a presidential statement dated 13 December 2002, the Council recognized that the success of a comprehensive international strategy to Liberia rested on the direct and active involvement of the African Union, ECOWAS and the International Contact Group, working with the United Nations offices in the region in accordance with their mandates.³⁹⁴ By resolution 1478 (2003) of 6 May 2003, the Council called upon the parties to enter without delay into bilateral ceasefire negotiations under the auspices of ECOWAS and the newly appointed mediator of ECOWAS.³⁹⁵

By resolution 1497 (2003) of 1 August 2003, the Council commended ECOWAS for its leadership role in facilitating the achievement of the Agreement on Ceasefire and Cessation of Hostilities between the Government of the Republic of Liberia and Liberians United for Reconciliation and Democracy and the Movement for Democracy in Liberia, signed in Accra on 17 June 2003,³⁹⁶ and recognized the role it had played and necessarily would continue to play in the Liberia peace process, “consistent with Chapter VIII of the Charter”.³⁹⁷

At the 4815th meeting, on 27 August 2003, the Executive Secretary of ECOWAS noted that the excellent working relationship between the Council and ECOWAS in the resolution of the Liberian crisis was “a shining example of the partnership that should exist between the United Nations and regional organizations in tackling regional issues of peace and security”. He added that there was much to gain from deepening collaboration to better handle conflicts and political instability in that region.³⁹⁸ By a presidential statement issued at the same meeting,³⁹⁹ the Council expressed its appreciation for the efforts of ECOWAS in negotiating the Comprehensive Peace Agreement between the Government of Liberia, rebel groups, political parties and civil society, signed in Accra, on 18 August 2003.

In respect of the role played by the African Union, by resolution 1509 (2003) of 19 September 2003, the Council welcomed the continued support of the African Union for the leadership role of ECOWAS in the peace process in Liberia, and further encouraged the African Union to continue to support the peace process through close collaboration and coordination with ECOWAS and the United Nations.⁴⁰⁰

The situation in Burundi

In Burundi, the Security Council continued to support the peace process in cooperation with the Organization of African Unity/African Union. Following the establishment by the African Union of a peacekeeping force in Burundi in April 2003, the Council renewed its support for such a regional effort and began to consider ways to further support the regional peacekeeping operation on the ground.

By resolution 1375 (2001) of 29 October 2001, the Council commended the continued efforts of, and support from, the Organization of African Unity/African Union for the peace process in Burundi.⁴⁰¹ By a presidential statement dated 18 December 2002,⁴⁰² the Council paid tribute to the role that the African Union, among other actors, had played in the process towards the signing of the Ceasefire Agreement between the Transitional Government of Burundi and the Conseil national pour la défense de la démocratie-Forces pour la défense de la démocratie, signed at Arusha on 2 December 2002.⁴⁰³

At the 4655th meeting, on 4 December 2002, the Facilitator of the Burundi peace process noted that the implementation process of the Ceasefire Agreement would require strong support from the United Nations. While aware of the difficulties of deploying a United Nations peacekeeping operation in the absence of a total ceasefire as in Burundi, he noted that regional States felt that “creativity and innovation” in looking at the situation would make it possible for the United Nations to become involved. He argued that the United Nations’ support for a unique situation in Burundi was possible under Chapter VIII of the Charter, which supported the establishment of regional initiatives for the resolution of conflicts, provided that such arrangements were consistent with the purposes and principles of the United Nations, as well as Chapter VI, which provided for the use of regional initiatives for the resolution of disputes without the active, direct involvement of the United Nations, but with its full support. The Facilitator also explained that the decision by regional leaders to deploy the African mission was based on the understanding that it was a bridging mechanism to open the way for the United Nations. He called for support from the Council as the African countries did not have all the resources.⁴⁰⁴

At the same meeting, the representative of Ireland noted that the efforts of all regional actors reflected well on the attempts of the African Union to find African solutions to the problems of the region.⁴⁰⁵ Some speakers, while recognizing the peace process in Burundi as a regional initiative, held that the Council had a role to play in the settlement of the dispute.⁴⁰⁶ The representative of France asserted that the Council would have to reflect on its support for a possible African mission or whatever formula the Secretary-General could recommend in support of the peace process, once all the parties had agreed to a ceasefire.⁴⁰⁷

On 2 April 2003, the African Mission in Burundi (AMIB) was established to provide security for the cantonment of combatants and to assist the demobilization, disarmament and reintegration of the armed groups.⁴⁰⁸ By a presidential statement dated 2 May 2003,⁴⁰⁹ the Council expressed its support for the speedy deployment of AMIB to facilitate the continuing implementation of the ceasefire agreements.

At the 4876th meeting, on 4 December 2003, the Facilitator commented that the establishment of the African Union mission was “in line with Chapter VIII of the Charter” and called for “more direct” United Nations involvement to achieve the continued success of the Burundi peace process. The Facilitator held that conditions were conducive for the United Nations to take over AMIB, “re-hat” the existing military contingent and deploy a United Nations peacekeeping operation. He underscored that, in the interim, AMIB needed material, logistical and financial support to enable it to continue its work while preparations continued for more robust involvement by the United Nations.⁴¹⁰ A number of speakers expressed their appreciation to the African Union and countries in the region for solving regional problems by their own efforts.⁴¹¹ Noting the importance of reinforcing efforts on the ground, some speakers supported the idea of establishing a United Nations peacekeeping operation to supplement or eventually replace AMIB.⁴¹² In that context, the representative of Angola stressed that the presence of the African Union reflected the important engagement of Africa in peacebuilding in Burundi, in accordance with the provisions of the Charter, and contended that it was necessary for the Council to apply equal standards to Burundi, as in Liberia and the Democratic Republic of the Congo.⁴¹³

The situation concerning the Democratic Republic of the Congo

In the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the Security Council supported the efforts by Southern African Development Community and the Organization of African Unity/African Union to advance the peace process.

By a presidential statement dated 26 January 2000, the Council valued the vital contribution of SADC and expressed its appreciation for the role of the Organization of African Unity in the Lusaka process.⁴¹⁴ By resolution 1332 (2000) of 14 December 2000, the Council stressed the need for a coordinated approach involving the United Nations and OAU to create new momentum for further progress in the peace process.⁴¹⁵ By a presidential statement dated 23 July 2002,⁴¹⁶ the Council welcomed the efforts and good offices of South Africa, in its capacity as chair of the African Union, to help the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Rwanda reach an agreement to tackle the problem of the armed groups and to take forward the withdrawal of Rwandan troops. In addition, the Council welcomed the support of the African Union for that process.

Furthermore, by a series of resolutions,⁴¹⁷ the Council continuously reaffirmed the importance of holding, at the appropriate time, an international conference on peace, security, democracy and development in the Great Lakes region under the auspices of the United Nations and OAU, with the participation of all the Governments of the region and all others concerned.

The situation in Somalia

During the period under review, by a series of decisions,⁴¹⁸ the Security Council continued to support and encourage the efforts made by the Intergovernmental Authority on Development, the Organization of African Unity/African Union and the League of Arab States to find a political solution to the crisis in Somalia and called for closer interaction between those organizations and the Council in support of national reconciliation.

In his report of 25 October 2002,⁴¹⁹ the Secretary-General observed that the international community had welcomed the opening of the Somali National Reconciliation Conference at Eldoret, Kenya, on 15 October 2002, and stressed that efforts made by all the IGAD countries to bring about a coherent regional approach towards national reconciliation in Somalia were appreciated. He added that the progress made by the peace process since the ninth IGAD Summit in Khartoum in January 2002 had indeed been

Middle East

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

In Iraq, during the period under review, the Security Council recognized the efforts of such organizations as the League of Arab States and the Organization of the Islamic Conference, for a peaceful resolution of the situation.

By a letter dated 16 September 2002 addressed to the President, the Secretary-General transmitted a letter of the same date from the representative of Iraq addressed to the Secretary-General, informing the Council that, in response to the appeals of the Secretaries-General of the United Nations and LAS, his country had decided to allow the return of the United Nations weapons inspectors to Iraq without conditions.⁴⁴²

By resolution 1441 (2002) of 8 November 2002, the Council established an enhanced inspection regime with the aim of bringing to full and verified completion the disarmament process established by resolution 687 (1991) and subsequent resolutions. The Council also commended the Secretary-General and the members of LAS for their efforts.⁴⁴³

At the 4717th meeting, on 11 March 2003, held in response to the request from the Non-Aligned Movement (NAM),⁴⁴⁴ the representative of Algeria pointed out that the Council had to listen to the regional organizations and other groupings — be it the European Union, OAU, LAS or OIC — who had spoken out for a peaceful settlement to the crisis, the primacy of the role of the United Nations and respect for international legality. He asserted that the Council was all the more duty-bound to do so because close cooperation between the Council and regional organizations was desirable, encouraged and clearly provided for by the Charter and because all those bodies and regional groupings were calling on the Council unanimously to ensure that the logic of peace prevailed over that of war.⁴⁴⁵

C. Calls by the Security Council for involvement of regional arrangements in the implementation of Chapter VII measures

During the period under review, regional arrangements were increasingly called upon to assist in the implementation of measures imposed by the Security Council under Chapter VII of the Charter, as in the cases of Afghanistan, Liberia, Sierra Leone, Somalia and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. In Liberia, the Council requested input from the Economic Community of West African States with a view to the termination of such measures. The practice of the Council in this regard is set out below by region.

The situation in Sierra Leone

By resolution 1306 (2000) of 5 July 2000, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, requested the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 1132 (1997), to strengthen the existing contacts with, inter alia, regional organizations, in particular ECOWAS and the Organization of African Unity, with a view to

The situation in Liberia

In connection with the situation in Liberia, the Council cooperated with the Economic Community of West African States in the implementation and termination of the mandatory measures against Liberia. Additionally, the Council extended logistical support to the ECOWAS forces in Liberia and subsequently, on 1 October 2003, reassigned those forces as United Nations peacekeepers.

By resolution 1343 (2001) of 7 March 2001, the Council welcomed the intention of ECOWAS to monitor, in close cooperation with the United Nations, the implementation of measures to prohibit the export of rough diamonds from Sierra Leone pursuant to resolution 1306 (2000) of 5 July 2000 and to report thereon after a period of two months.⁴⁴⁷ By a series of resolutions, the Council further invited ECOWAS to report regularly to the Security Council Committee established pursuant to paragraph 14 of resolution 1343 (2001) on all activities undertaken by its members in the implementation of relevant measures.⁴⁴⁸

Furthermore, by resolution 1478 (2003) of 6 May 2003, the Council, following the establishment of the Panel of Experts, called upon all members of ECOWAS to cooperate fully with the Panel in the identification of violations of the arms embargo against Liberia.⁴⁴⁹

In respect of the termination of sanctions against Liberia,⁴⁵⁰ the Council, by a series of resolutions, expressed its readiness to terminate the measures imposed with regard to Liberian-registered aircraft, and the ban on the import of rough diamonds not controlled through the certificate of origin regime of the Government of Sierra Leone, taking into account, inter alia, input from ECOWAS.⁴⁵¹

In connection with peacekeeping activities, the Council, by resolution 1497 (2003) of 1 August 2003, authorized the establishment of a Multinational Force in Liberia under Chapter VII of the Charter. The Council also authorized the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone to extend the necessary logistical support to the forward elements of ECOWAS in the Multinational Force in Liberia for a limited duration.⁴⁵²

By resolution 1509 (2003) of 19 September 2003, the Council commended the rapid and professional deployment to Liberia of the forces of the ECOWAS Mission in Liberia (ECOMIL), pursuant to resolution 1497 (2003).⁴⁵³ Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council also established the United Nations Mission in Liberia (UNMIL) and requested the Secretary-General to transfer authority from the forces of ECOMIL to UNMIL on 1 October 2003.⁴⁵⁴ In his report dated 15 December 2003, the Secretary-General informed the Council that UNMIL had taken over peacekeeping duties from ECOMIL on 1 October 2003, as stipulated in resolution 1509 (2003), and all ECOMIL troops had been reassigned to UNMIL as United Nations peacekeepers.⁴⁵⁵

The Security Council called upon regional organizations, in particular the Intergovernmental Authority on Development, the African Union and the League of Arab States, to cooperate with it and its subsidiary bodies in the implementation of the arms embargo against Somalia imposed by resolutions 733 (1992) and 1356 (2001).

By resolution 1474 (2003) of 8 April 2003, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, decided to re-establish a Panel of Experts whose mandate included exploring the possibility of establishing a monitoring mechanism for the implementation of the arms embargo with partners inside and outside Somalia, "in close cooperation with regional and international organizations, including with the African Union." The Council also called upon regional organizations, in particular the African Union and LAS, to assist Somali parties and the States in the

D. Consideration or authorization by the Security Council of enforcement action by regional arrangements

During the period under review, the Security Council gave its authorization to regional arrangements to take the necessary action in their peacekeeping activities, as in the cases of Afghanistan and Côte d'Ivoire. In the case of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, the Council recalled the authorization it had given the Kosovo Force by resolution 1244 (1999) of 10 June 1999. In one instance, the Council considered but did not take a decision on authorization of the use of force by a regional organization.

The situation in Côte d'Ivoire

By resolution 1464 (2003) of 4 February 2003, the Council, recalling the decision taken at the ECOWAS Summit, held in Accra on 29 September 2002, to deploy a peacekeeping force in Côte d'Ivoire, authorized Member States participating in the ECOWAS forces, in accordance with Chapter VIII of the Charter, to "take the necessary steps" to guarantee the security and freedom of movement of their personnel and to ensure the protection of civilians immediately threatened with physical violence within their zones of operation. In addition, the Council requested that ECOWAS, through the command of its force, report to the Council periodically, through the Secretary-General, on all aspects of implementation of its mandate.⁴⁶⁵ The ECOWAS forces, whose authorization was renewed by resolution 1498 (2003) of 4 August 2003, remained on the ground in parallel to the United Nations Mission in Côte d'Ivoire, which was established by resolution 1479 (2003) of 13 May 2003.⁴⁶⁶

E. Consultation, briefing and reporting by regional arrangements

The increasing collaboration between the Security Council and regional arrangements witnessed a corresponding growth in the exchange of information between the two, using different modalities.

During the reporting period, the practice continued whereby the Security Council was kept informed of the activities of regional organizations by means of communications addressed to the President of the Council or the Secretary-General from various organs or States holding the rotating Chairmanship/Presidency or simply membership of the regional organizations, from States parties to a situation, or from other States concerning matters pertaining to regional organizations.⁴⁷⁴ Moreover, while the reporting obligation of regional organizations under Article 54 of the Charter applied to all activities undertaken or contemplated by them, in several instances where the Council authorized coercive measures within the meaning of Article 53, it explicitly requested the involved regional organizations to report to it on a regular basis.⁴⁷⁵

In addition to communications transmitting mainly reports, resolutions, memoranda and statements from regional arrangements, the Council has increasingly utilized the practice of receiving briefings by regional organizations at its formal meetings concerning activities undertaken or in contemplation by them for the maintenance of international peace and security, independently or in cooperation with the Council.⁴⁷⁶ Regional organizations were frequently invited to participate and make statements in the context of thematic debates, as well as in Council deliberations on a number of specific situations of immediate concern to them.⁴⁷⁷ In the context of its closed consultative meetings with troop-contributing countries, the Council, by resolution 1353 (2001), annex II, section B, explicitly listed representatives of regional and subregional organizations among the parties to be invited, whether they were contributing troops or not.⁴⁷⁸

Furthermore, during the period under review, the Council welcomed and established several consultative mechanisms with a view to building a dialogue with regional organizations. For example, by presidential statements dated 19 December 2001 and 31 January 2002,⁴⁷⁹ the Council welcomed the establishment of the Office of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for West Africa to ensure, among other things, the development of a fruitful partnership with the Economic Community of West African States and other subregional organizations. With respect to ⁴⁷⁵ For example, in connection with the item entitled "The situation in Côte d'Ivoire", the Council, by paragraph 10 of resolution 1464 (2003) requested ECOWAS to report periodically on all aspects of the implementation of its mandate. Similarly, in connection with the item entitled "The situation in Afghanistan", by paragraphs 2 and 5 of resolution 1510 (2003), the Council requested ISAF to submit quarterly reports.

⁴⁷⁶ For example, ECOWAS was invited to brief the Council at the 4720th meeting, on 18 March 2003, in connection with the item entitled "Proliferation of small arms and light weapons and mercenary activities: threats to peace and security in West Africa." ECOWAS and the African Union briefed the Council at the 4739th meeting, on 11 April 2003, in connection with the item entitled "The Security Council and regional organizations: facing the new challenges to international peace and security". At the 4815th meeting, on 27 August 2003, in connection with the item entitled "The situation in Liberia" and at the 4873rd meeting, on 24 November 2003, in connection with the item entitled "The situation in Côte d'Ivoire", the Council heard briefings by the Executive Secretary of ECOWAS. At the 4860th meeting, on 18 November 2003, in connection with the item entitled "The situation in Guinea-Bissau", the Council heard a briefing by the representative of the Chairman of ECOWAS.

Furthermore, by resolution 1377 (2001) of 12 November 2001, the Council invited the Committee to explore with international, regional, and subregional organizations the promotion of best practices in those areas, the availability of existing assistance programmes that might facilitate the implementation of resolution 1373 (2001) and the promotion of possible synergies between those assistance programmes.⁴⁸¹

Part IV

Consideration of the miscellaneous provisions of the Charter

Article 103

In the event of a conflict between the obligations of the Members of the United Nations under the present Charter and their obligations under any other international agreement, their obligations under the present Charter shall prevail.

Note

During the period under review, Article 103 was not explicitly invoked in any resolution or decision. However, the Security Council, in a number of resolutions imposing mandatory measures under Chapter VII of the Charter against Afghanistan, Eritrea and Ethiopia, Liberia and Sierra Leone, implicitly referred to the principle enshrined in Article 103, by emphasizing the primacy of the obligations under the Charter over those contracted by Member States under any other international agreement. For example, by resolution 1298 (2000) of 17 May 2000, in connection with the situation between Eritrea and Ethiopia, the Council called upon all States and all international and regional organizations to act strictly in conformity with the resolution, “notwithstanding the existence of any rights granted or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or of any contract entered into or any licence or permit granted prior to the entry into force of measures” imposed by the resolution.⁴⁸² Similar language was used in resolutions 1306 (2000) of 5 July 2000⁴⁸³ and 1333 (2000) of 19 December 2000,⁴⁸⁴ by which the Council imposed mandatory measures against Sierra Leone and against individuals or entities belonging to or associated with Al-Qaida and/or the Taliban, respectively.

Additionally, by resolution 1343 (2001) of 7 March 2001, by which the Council imposed measures against Liberia, the Council called upon States and international and regional organizations to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of the resolution, notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations entered into or any licence or permit granted prior to the date of adoption of the resolution.⁴⁸⁵

Article 103 was explicitly referred to once in the deliberations of the Council, at the 4568th meeting, on 10 July 2002, in connection with the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, in which Member States discussed the question of impunity of United Nations peacekeepers under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court that entered into force on 1 July 2002 (case 21).⁴⁸⁶ Furthermore, during the deliberations in connection with the situation in Angola, the Council touched upon the principle enshrined in Article 103, including obligations arising pursuant to decisions of the Council imposing mandatory measures under Chapter VII of the Charter (case 22).

There was also one communication during the reporting period in which explicit reference to Article 103 was made.⁴⁸⁷

Case 21

The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina

United Nations peacekeeping

In connection with the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, at the 4563rd meeting, on 30 June 2002, a draft resolution,⁴⁸⁸ by which the Security Council would have extended the mandate of the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina for six months, was not adopted owing to the negative vote of a permanent member of the Council. The representative of the United States, before voting, explained his concern regarding the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court which would enter into force on 1 July 2002, in particular the need for his Government to ensure national jurisdiction over its personnel and officials involved in United Nations peacekeeping. He stressed that the proposal by his Government, calling for the establishment of immunity for United Nations peacekeeping, built on immunities that were already recognized in the United Nations system and reflected in status-of-forces and status-of-mission agreements. He further insisted that the Rome Statute itself recognized the concept of immunity and that the consequence of providing United Nations peacekeepers with such immunity would be the creation of a legal obligation on States to observe that immunity. He expressed the view that pursuant to Article 98 of the Rome Statute of the Court, the compliance of parties to the Statute with such obligations was “entirely consistent” with the Statute.⁴⁸⁹

Following that meeting, in his letter dated 3 July 2002 to the President, the representative of Canada requested an open meeting of the Council, stressing that the issue raised in the deliberations of the Council concerning UNMIBH involved not just the extension of the mission, but a “potentially irreversible decision negatively affecting the integrity of the Rome Statute of the Court, the integrity of treaty negotiations more generally, the credibility of the Council, the viability of international law with respect to the investigation and prosecution of grievous crimes, and the established responsibilities of States under international law to act on such crimes”.⁴⁹⁰

At the 4568th meeting, held on 10 July 2002 in response to the request contained in the above-mentioned letter, most speakers voiced their concerns over the draft text that was circulating among members of the Council⁴⁹¹ in connection with granting immunity from prosecution to United Nations peacekeepers from States not parties to the Rome Statute. Pointing out that sufficient safeguards against unwarranted and politically motivated prosecution were included in the Statute, a number of speakers expressed opposition to the circulating text as it would attempt to modify a provision of an international treaty, by means of a Council resolution, and undermine the viability and the integrity of the multinational legal framework.⁴⁹²

Furthermore, some speakers stated that, if such a text were to be adopted, Member States that were parties to the Statute would be forced to question the legality of the Council decision and the role of the Council.⁴⁹³ In that connection, the representative of Mongolia pointed out that no State should be placed in a situation in which it was “forced to breach its international obligations” under either the Charter or the Statute.⁴⁹⁴ The representative of Brazil expressed the view that the Council was not vested with treaty-making and treaty-reviewing powers and could not create new obligations for the States parties to the Statute, which could be amended only through the procedures provided in the Statute.⁴⁹⁵ The representative of Ukraine also argued against the creation of a conflict between the powers of the Council under Chapter VII of the Charter and the legal obligations entered into by Member States in compliance with the provisions of the Charter.⁴⁹⁶ Stating that Article 103 provided for Charter obligations to prevail in the event of a conflict between Charter obligations and other international obligations, the representative of Singapore raised the question of the desirability of Council action in connection with the International Criminal Court.⁴⁹⁷

The representative of the United States, reiterating concerns over the legal exposure of his country's peacekeepers under the Rome Statute, argued that his country respected the obligation of those States that had ratified the Statute and that in its proposals before the Council, it sought to work "within the provisions of the Statute". He further stated that the proposed solution was consistent with the obligations of all Member States, including those that were parties to the Statute.⁴⁹⁸

At the 4572nd meeting, on 12 July 2002, under the item entitled "United Nations peacekeeping", the Council adopted resolution 1422 (2002) by which, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, it requested the International Criminal Court to suspend for 12 months starting 1 July 2002 any investigations or prosecutions involving personnel from States not Parties to the Rome Statute of the Court.⁴⁹⁹ The Council also expressed the intention to renew the above-mentioned request under the same conditions each 1 July for further 12-month periods for as long as it might be necessary and decided that Member States should take no action inconsistent with the provision for deferral and "with their international obligations". By resolution 1487 (2003) of 12 June 2003, the Council extended the provisions of resolution 1422 (2002) for a further 12-month period starting 1 July 2003.

The situation in Angola

The monitoring mechanism established by resolution 1295 (2000) to monitor sanctions imposed against the União Nacional Para a Independência Total de Angola, in its final report dated 21 December 2000,⁵⁰⁰ noted that the Schengen Agreement seemed to conflict with the sanctions imposed by resolution 1127 (1997), or was at least used as a reason for not implementing the sanctions fully. In addition, it pointed out that while paragraph 10 of resolution 1127 (1997) called upon States to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of the resolution, notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreements, many countries considered themselves unable to expel senior officials of UNITA and send them to Angola for reasons relating to the adherence of international instruments regarding refugees and political asylum.⁵⁰¹ In conclusion, the report recommended that the States parties to the Schengen Agreement should look into the problem of UNITA abusing its structures with a view to closing existing loopholes.⁵⁰²

At the 4283rd meeting, on 22 February 2001, members of the Council considered the above-mentioned report of the monitoring mechanism. The representative of Ukraine agreed that the relevant requirements of resolution 1127 (1997) regarding the travel restrictions on UNITA representatives should be fully implemented, "notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations under any other international agreements".⁵⁰³ The representative of Bangladesh, referring to the report of the mechanism, emphasized that there was "a conflict between the national obligation of member States of the Schengen Agreement to allow their nationals free movement across their borders and the international obligation flowing from the relevant Council resolutions".⁵⁰⁴

At the 4418th meeting, on 15 November 2001, the representative of Angola stressed that obligations resulting from Council resolutions prevailed over any other obligation to which Member States might be subject by virtue of any treaty or international agreement to which they were or might become party, and that such principle should also be applied to sanctions against UNITA.⁵⁰⁵
