eign investment in the Overseas Territories. Whereas previously the Government had generally required a measure of Portuguese participation in the capital and in the administration of enterprises established with foreign capital, this will no longer be the case. Enterprises entirely or largely foreign-owned by residents in Portuguese Territory or persons domiciled overseas may now be established in various economic sectors with the same rights to enjoy tax and duty exemptions as national enterprises. As a general rule, however, foreign enterprises will be excluded from public services, activities relating to the public domain, and activities of special importance to national defence. Although mineral resources belong to the public domain, mining in the Overseas Territories is no longer in the restricted category. Foreign companies may not however acquire real rights in land in the Territories except with the authorization of the Overseas Minister. Foreign companies will also be able to remit freely all legally imported capital, as well as earnings from such capital and from other specified activities. National enterprises, on the other hand, may be authorized to contract, with the guarantee of national credit institutions, external loans not exceeding 2,500 million escudos or one third of their capital or their reserve fund.

59. The new regulations for co-ordinating industrial development in Portugal and the Overseas Territories, which are described in a later section, include the following activities in which free participation of foreign capital (either through direct investment, loans or through the purchase of shares) will always be authorized: (i) agricultural improvements, land preparation, including irrigation projects, livestock and cattle-raising and the processing of agricultural products; (ii) improvement and extension of industrial installations and reorganization of industries in accordance with the new law; (iii) development of extractive industries, including petroleum and other energy sources; (iv) fishing; (v) improvement of transport and communications; and (vi) development of tourist trade (Dispatch, 31 September 1965, Diário do Governo, Series I, No. 214).

60. In May a group of Portuguese businessmen and government officials visited various countries in the European Economic Community to interest them in opportunities for investment in Portugal and the Overseas Territories. Apart from various industrial and commercial interests, also represented on the mission were the Banco Burnay, the Bank of Lisbon and the Azores, the Banco Totta-Aliança, the Banco Português do Atlântico and the Banco de Angola. In the Overseas Territories the sectors suggested for foreign investments included mining (especially diamonds, petroleum and iron, see below and A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex I) and agriculture (especially coffee, cotton, sisal, tea and fibres). (These activities are discussed in a separate study on the role of agriculture in Angola and Mozambique which is in preparation.)

61. By the end of 1965, some new investments of foreign capital had been announced. These included in Angola new investments by Petrangol and by Mabor in a tire factory (see paras. 117 and 124 below). In Mozambique new investments were announced for production of sugar and cashew (see paras. 163 and 164 below).

(d) Banking and credit facilities

62. New laws (Decrees 46,243 and 46,492) were introduced in 1965 to make available to the Territories more commercial banking and credit facilities and at the same time to mobilize local domestic savings. Minimum capital and reserves required by law for banks or branches of banks established in the Territories have been reduced, and under the new law no Portuguese-owned institutions other than commercial and investment banks will be allowed to establish branches in the Overseas Territories. Foreign-owned credit institutions may operate in the Territories if the capital of the main branch in the Territory is not less than half of the minimum capital requirements specified.

63. In August 1965 an overseas commercial and industrial credit bank was established in association with the Banco Borges e Irmão. The bank will have its headquarters in Angola and a branch in Mozambique. Other partners in the credit bank include Manufatura Nacional de Borracha, Borges e Irmão Comercial, Lda., Star Imobiliária and Industrial Têxtil do Ave. The registered capital is 150 million escudos and can be raised to 200 million escudos. By the end of 1965, 75 million escudos had been paid up and transferred to the two Territories. Thirty thousand shares of 1,000 escudos each have been offered for sale to residents in the Territories. The special function of the bank, a private institution, will be to provide medium and long-term loans for industry and buildings, and short-term credit facilities, such as warrants for not longer than six months. The bank will also undertake economic and financial studies of a regional and technical nature. Up to the time of its establishment this was the third Portuguese bank in Angola; the other two are the Bank of Angola which is the official bank of issue of the Territory and the Commercial Bank of Angola, established over a year ago in association with the Banco Português do Atlântico. The only other Portuguese bank in Mozambique and in the other Territories under Portuguese administration is the National Overseas Bank (Banco Nacional Ultramarino).

64. In January 1966, the Banco Pinto e Sotto Mayor was reported to be establishing branches in Mozambique. Importance is attached to this move as a transfer of large sums of capital for use in the development in that Territory.

(e) Co-ordination of industrial development in Portugal and the Overseas Territories

65. In November 1965 new legislation (Decree 46,666) laid down conditions for the establishment of industries in the Overseas Territories and for the co-ordination of industrial development in the Portuguese realm.

66. Industries are divided into two categories: those which are of "national" interest and affect the economy of the entire Portuguese realm, and those which may be regulated by the Territorial Governments. Industries subject to national regulations (condicionamento) include the following: foods (including sugar factories but not including drinks and beverages); chemicals, metals, light engineering and metal parts, armaments, machinery, construction and various transforming industries. The Government of each Territory will be free to authorize the establishment of industries not included in the national classification and to lay down plans for their development. Competition among industries is to be avoided and industries must observe health and labour regulations.

67. Conditions for the establishment of industries in Portugal and the Overseas Territories are to be gradually brought into uniformity. For the Territories this will mean that they will have the right to establish various industries (not on the "national" list) using imported primary materials, which previously, under Decree 26,509, 11 April 1936, were only approved after a lengthy process of examination and consideration by various Territorial authorities and competent bodies in Lisbon. Another advantage to the Territories is that they may now authorize the establishment of new industries, even if the products are not lower in price than similar products imported from other parts of the Portuguese realm. In particular, the Territories will no longer be restricted as regards the establishment of cotton textile factories.

68. At the same time, the new legislation introduces wider government control over various industrial activities. Licences are now required for new factory buildings or extensions, and government authorization is required for changes (as for instance of equipment) which affect production or change in location within the Portuguese realm. (In Cape Verde, the change in location from one island to another will also require government approval.) From press reports it appears that the new regulations also enable the Portuguese Government to restrict the establishment of foreign companies in Portugal when this appears necessary as a protective measure for home industries.

(f) Settlement in the Overseas Territories

69. As reported previously (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex II), European settlement of the Overseas Territories, especially of Angola and Mozambique, has always been a cornerstone of Portuguese colonial policy. Following the uprising in Angola in 1961, new emphasis was given to the need for "the creation of multi-racial communities and the implantation overseas of new Portuguese tropical civilizations" as "the sole buttress of the national presence in those lands and a factor for peace..." (ibid., para. 158).

70. New Provincial Settlement Boards were created in both Angola and Mozambique to co-ordinate plans and to accelerate settlement mainly of Portuguese families in the Territories. Though in Angola the Settlement Board was successful in establishing a chain of small nuclear settlements, the average rate of settlement overseas was only about 10,000 persons each year.

71. When the Transitional Development Plan was drawn up last year (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, para. 36), it became evident that with the anticipated natural annual increase of the active population by 43,000 persons, the gradual displacement of labour into industry, and the concurrent mechanization of agriculture, one of the main problems would be to find jobs for the surplus labour of Portugal. During 1965 the whole question of overseas settlement was reviewed in the National Assembly and in the Overseas Council and the political, economic, social and administrative aspects were carefully examined.

72. At its October meeting the Overseas Council, which is the highest policy-making body for the Overseas Territories (see A/5800/Rev.1, chap. V, paras. 25-28) emphasized especially the political importance of the settlement of the Overseas Territories from the point of view of both Portugal's internal situation and external relations: settlement of population from Portugal would not only provide the Territories with labour and stimulate economic development but would also play an important role in national defence and the establishment of Portuguese civilization there.

73. Among other aspects, the Overseas Council considered the question of the most desirable "national level" of settlement overseas, the organization of settlement services and the type of settlements, questions relating to the economic and social welfare of the local population arising from such settlements, and the functions of the existing settlement boards.

74. As a first step towards stemming the emigration of labour from Portugal to other European countries, a National Employment Service was established on 11 December 1965 (Decree 46,731). This agency will set up public employment placement bureaux, establish rosters of technical and professional personnel, carry out studies of the needs of the labour market and facilitate transfers within the professions. It will also work with the Overseas Ministry in defining and supervising emigration to foreign countries.

75. Later, in a press conference held on 22 December, the Under-Secretary of State for Overseas Territories explained in some detail the Government's position on this question, which was based on provisions in the Constitution (article 133) and the Overseas Organic Law of 1963 (article LXIX). In recent years out of every four persons emigrating from Portugal only one went to settle in the Overseas Territories. It was therefore necessary to improve conditions in the Territories in order to attract those who were now migrating elsewhere. The Government considered that increased migration would help to accelerate the social and cultural progress of the "less evolved" indigenous inhabitants (nativos menos evoluídos) of the Overseas Territories because it would bring them in closer contact with "more civilized" (mais civilizados) peoples.

76. Intensified settlement would not be limited to increasing the number of Portuguese in the Territories in Africa, but would include the "fixing" of Africans in agricultural settlements for the dual purpose of replacing shifting agriculture with more modern techniques and of opening up new areas for farming and substantially increased production, especially of some crops now imported from foreign countries. (A more detailed account of recent developments of African agriculture settlements is given in the study on the role of agriculture in Angola and Mozambique which is being prepared.)

77. It was recently reported in the Press that the National Assembly early this year "put new pressure on the authorities to increase the flow of settlers to Angola and Mozambique as a counterpart to the military effort to hold on to the African Territories". One of the deputies from Mozambique (Mr. Moreira Longo) stressed the need "to increase the civilized population" in Mozambique especially in the interior. He also proposed that the Government should encourage soldier settlers in the Territories, a scheme which has been in effect in Angola for some time (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex II, paras. 181-183). Another deputy from Mozambique, Dr. Henriques Nazaré, took a somewhat different view. Drawing attention to the fact that Africans in urban areas lived largely in sub-standard dwellings on the periphery of urban communities, he believed that first priority should be given to improving African housing in urban areas and eliminating what amounts to housing segregation (isolacionismo habitacional) of the races. He believed that the resentment created by this problem was among the causes of the war and that the importance of its solution had not been sufficiently recognized. He said that he was against "ready-made solutions" among which he included attempts to settle European farmers in Angola and Mozambique.

78. Experience has shown that one of Portugal's main difficulties in increasing European settlement in the African Territories has been the high cost involved. Recently the Vice-President of the Overseas Council, José Bacelar Bebian, was said to have estimated that it costs the Government about 300,000 escudos ($US10,500) to settle a single family in Africa with the necessary land, housing and general living facilities (see also A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex II, para. 121).

79. In 1965, it was announced in the Press that the Mozambique authorities had offered farms of 5,000 ha. each in the Tete district to farmers from drought-stricken areas in South Africa. The settlers would be required to pay a foro of 0.50 escudos per hectare for twenty years and would be required to undertake all costs of development. In November 1965, it was reported that eighty South Africans, mostly from the West Transvaal, had signed contracts.

(g) Reorganization of technical services in the Territories

80. Because of the important roles agriculture and mining are expected to have in the future economic development of the Territories, during 1965 the agriculture and forestry services and the geological and mines services in the Overseas Territories were reorganized and strengthened. As noted below, training facilities for agricultural staff are being expanded in both Angola and Mozambique. The two larger Territories will each have a Geological and Mines Department with five divisions, for licences, supervision (fiscalização) and geological survey, mining development, applied geology, general services and administrative services. In the smaller Territories there will be Geological and Mines Bureaux.

Education

81. In September 1964 (Decree 45,908, 10 September), following the extension of compulsory primary education to the Overseas Territories, the special adaptation courses for African children which had existed before were formally integrated into the overseas primary school system, which is now the same for all children, except that for those who do not speak Portuguese there is a pre-primary class. The 1964 reform made it mandatory for all schools in rural areas (where they are known as postos escolares) to provide not only the pre-primary but also the first three elementary classes. This has made it necessary to upgrade many of the former adaptation classes for Africans which used to be mainly entrusted by the Government to the Catholic missions.

82. During 1965 considerable sums were allocated in both Territories for teacher-training (monitors) and the expansion of school buildings, which are urgently needed if compulsory primary education is to be implemented. Pending the provision of adequate facilities, under the 1964 reform, children of school age may be excused from attending if they live more than 5 km. from a school and no free transportation is provided.

In July the school inspection system for the Overseas Territories was revised and strengthened (Decree 46,447, 20 July) to enable it to better supervise and co-ordinate all educational activities.

83. Greater emphasis is being given to education in general and agricultural education in particular with a view to increased production. Under a decree (46,464) of 31 July 1965, agricultural education in the Overseas Territories has been reorganized. Courses will be provided at three levels: elementary, secondary and vocational (médio). Secondary agricultural education is to be provided in escolas práticas and in the industrial schools. Vocational training for agricultural officers (regentes) will be provided in separate institutions and will include more advanced training in agronomy. Agricultural education at the secondary and vocational levels will be under the supervision of the Education Services as regards administrative and pedagogical aspects and the special departments concerned will be responsible for the technical aspects and the supply of materials and specialized personnel. Special courses are also to be offered to adults working in agriculture.

84. No changes were reported during the year in the organization of the academic secondary schools (liceus) which have always been based on the same pattern as their counterparts in Portugal. Further details on educational facilities including the Estudos Gerais Universitários and enrolment are given in the relevant sections below.

85. As reported previously (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. V, para. 104) since 1963 more scholarships have been made available to students in the Overseas Territories. In 1964 (Decree 45,769) a system of reimbursable scholarships was introduced consisting of loans granted on the basis of merit and repayable in instalments after completion of the course. A total of 302 outright scholarships and 33 "scholarship-loans" were granted in 1964 to students from the six Territories (excluding Macau). The number of scholarships and scholarship-loans respectively granted to each Territory were as follows: Cape Verde, 27 and 8; Guinea under Portuguese administration, 48 and 4; São Tomé, 15 and 4; Angola, 116 and 14; Mozambique, 37 and 2; Timor, 26 and 1.

86. In May 1965 (Order 21,310) rational awards for secondary education were extended to include students in Guinea under Portuguese administration, São Tomé and Príncipe and Timor. As a result of the increased number of students in the Overseas Territories during recent years, it was reported in March 1966 that the scholarship system for secondary students was being revised. Currently the total value of scholarships is 14.7 million escudos, of which 5 million is for students in Angola, 4.8 million for Mozambique, 507,000 for Guinea under Portuguese administration, 450,000 for Cape Verde, 105,000 for São Tomé and Príncipe and 48,000 for Timor.

2. Angola

Constitutional and political

(a) Election of the Head of State

87. The election of the Head of State occasioned little comment in the Angolan Press. Out of a total membership of 616 representatives in the electoral college, Angola had 51 composed as follows: 7 deputies to the National Assembly, 2 members of the Corporative Chamber, 24 members from the Legislative Council appointed from among themselves, and 18 representatives of the municipal councils.

88. It is significant that Angola, with a total population of 4.8 million at the 1960 census and an estimated population of 5.5 million in 1965 had only 18 representatives of municipal councils (out of 51 members) whereas Portugal and the adjacent islands had 158 representatives of municipal councils (out of 438 members). As reported previously, for each district or each Territory not divided into districts, the number of representatives in the electoral college is equal to half the number of municipal councils (when this is an odd number, the number of representatives is half the next even number). Furthermore, under the 1963 electoral law, municipal councils are established only in concelhos where there are more than 500 qualified voters. Presumably for this reason less than half the administrative units in Angola (67 concelhos and 22 circunscrições) were represented.

(b) Elections to the National Assembly

89. In the elections to the National Assembly, there was only one list of seven candidates presented by the National Union. There were no Opposition candidates. An editorial in the Angolan Press said that this showed that there were no differences of political opinion in the Territory on the need for the defence of Portugal's overseas "patrimony". It urged the people "to vote en masse to shout to the world that Angola is Portugal, and that it will always be Portugal".

90. Only four of the National Union candidates were persons born in Angola; the other three were born in Portugal. Two out of the seven were persons actually holding government posts in Angola (Provincial Secretary of Education, director of the State Pharmacy in Moçamedes). One was the representative of Angola in the Overseas Council, concurrently a member of the Economic and Social Council in Angola and the director-general of ANGOL. The others included: a lawyer who was president of the Commercial Association in Lobito; a member of the Economic and Social Council elected by the economic interests in the Territory; a journalist who had been on official missions; a director of an important company with interests in coffee, who is concurrently a member of the governing council of the Coffee Institute.

91. The proposal by the Opposition in Portugal that the Overseas Territories should have the right of self-determination was denounced by various public figures and press editorials as traitorous and as an insult to the people of Angola who were giving their lives and fighting for a greater Portugal. For several days the Press carried a message that was also being broadcast calling on all Portuguese of Angola to affirm their loyalty to Portugal on 19 October by covering the whole Territory with the Portuguese flag. The message said that on that day every vehicle, every entrance and every window must fly the Portuguese flag; no one should fail to do so if he were a loyal Portuguese. The Lisbon papers reported the demonstration on 19 October as a spontaneous expression of Angola's loyalty to Portugal and a denunciation of any relationship with Portugal other than complete integration and identity.

92. Press reports of the elections on 7 November described the voting stations as crowded with lines of people and cars drawn up in front. No figures were published of the number of registered voters or of the number of votes cast. The voting results were given in terms of the percentage of registered voters who voted. The Lisbon newspaper of 8 November carried a report from Luanda saying "We can affirm, without a shadow of exaggeration, that all Angola voted". Preliminary figures published in the Press showed that, in Angola, the voting percentages of the electorate by district was as follows: Cabinda, 84 per cent; Cuando-Cubango, 91 per cent; Luanda, 71.6 per cent; Uíge, 95 per cent; Benguela, 77.8 per cent; and Malanje 89.7 per cent. However, since only about 1 per cent of the total population voted in Mozambique (see paras. 146-147), it is probable that the percentage in Angola was less than 5 per cent of the total population.¹⁴

93. In a statement issued on 11 November the MPLA (Movimento Popular de Libertação de Angola) said that the Portuguese Opposition proposal was for self-determination at a fixed date for the colonies, with an autonomous transitional government in which half the members would be Portuguese who would safeguard the interests of their compatriots. This was unacceptable. The MPLA would oppose "any attempt at implanting a neo-colonialist system in Angola". Armed resistance would end only when conditions were established which guaranteed the exercise of power by the Angolan people. These conditions were: (i) recognition of the right to self-determination and independence and to national and international sovereignty for Angola; (ii) withdrawal of all armed forces to their bases of origin; (iii) the safeguarding of the nation's unity and territorial integrity; (iv) unconditional release of all political prisoners and the repatriation to Angola of all political refugees and exiles; (v) guarantees for the exercise of democratic rights and freedom for political and trade union activities; (vi) establishment of principles and guarantees for the election of a national parliament on the basis of universal, direct and secret suffrage; (vii) elections for organs of government in all towns.

(c) Local administration

94. During the year, following discussions in the Economic and Social Council and the Legislative Council, some changes were made in the local administrative structure of the Territory as it was previously reported (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. V, paras. 46-53). Municipal councils and municipal commissions were given identical powers and functions, and the administrative posts (postos de circunscrição) were abolished. In December, the Boletim Oficial de Angola (No. 50) published a list of the new administrative divisions of the Territory which, it reported, had been "made necessary by population or administrative requirements due to economic and social progress". Over twenty new concelhos were created, a number of administrative posts were changed to circunscrições and the corresponding municipal councils and municipal commissions were established. New elections will be held to these bodies.

The military situation in Angola

95. From the published reports and statements by Portuguese officials and Press, it is difficult to ascertain what the real situation is in Angola. On the one hand, there are claims that the war in Angola is over. Thus the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Portugal, speaking at the 1253rd meeting of the Security Council on 9 November 1965, cited reports of visitors, one of whom described Angola as a country of "real peace and progress". On the other hand, the President of Portugal and other officials now emphasize that Portugal is waging a war on three fronts, in Angola, Mozambique and Guinea under Portuguese administration.

96. On one point nearly all reports agree that there are still some 50,000 Portuguese troops in Angola. In January 1966, for instance, it was reported in the Press that "military posts are strung around the perimeter of Luanda, linked in some sections by miles of wire and lit at night by searchlights. Troops man checkpoints on the roads leading inland and special passes are needed to go through areas of strategic importance". Reports also indicate continued concern in the Territory with political security measures. In March 1966, for instance, the Government closed the Cultural Society of Angola (Sociedade Cultural de Angola) on grounds that it had allowed "infiltrations" and activities not provided for in its charter.

97. In addition to the regular armed forces, there are now not only the civil defence and volunteer corps, the militia and local troops (forças de quadrícula) but since the end of 1964 a new public security police force of over 7,000 men has been created. In 1965, a commando-troop training centre was set up in Luanda which provides a three-month course of specialized training followed by one month of experience.

98. In November, the structure of the Civil Defence and Volunteer Corps, which has grown substantially, was formalized. Under Decree 46,656 the Corps includes permanent, general and special staff. The permanent staff consist of the corps leaders and commanders. The general staff are divided into (a) self-defence and service units, comprising the local population, public servants and employees of private enterprises; and (b) forças de intervenção made up of volunteers, whose task is to destroy armed bands of guerrillas.

99. Since early January the Diário de Notícias of Lisbon has carried a series of articles entitled "Three fronts in three months. All the truth about the war against terrorism in the Overseas Territories". The articles give descriptions of military actions against "terrorists" both from past accounts and from the author's own observations. There are descriptions of the air force base in Luanda, which has over 1,500 men, of the helicopter force which searches out guerrillas in the forest areas, of the parachute troops who are air-lifted to areas of activity . . . The articles are accompanied by pictures of commando-troops in training, troops returning from a day's action and of wounded soldiers in the military hospital in Luanda. Some of the articles are about the countryside that is said to have been restored to peace since 1961, describing the newly settled villages which have schools in the open air when no school building is available; and describing the activities of the volunteer corps or the soldiers stationed on farms to protect them.

100. For a period during 1965 there appears to have been a lull in military activities; one report said that military action against the terrorists appeared to have reached a stalemate. Later, in August, there was a report by the Gouvernement révolutionnaire de l'Angola en exil (GRAE) that poison gas and napalm bombs were being used by the Portuguese troops in a region about eighty miles east of Luanda. A Portuguese Defence Ministry spokesman said, however, that chemicals have not been used in Angola, that there had been no action in 1965 in the region mentioned, and that the situation in Angola "was now almost completely under control".

¹⁴ The qualifications for voting are set out briefly in A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, para. 9

101. Towards the end of the year the official military communiqués, still issued every week, began to reveal increased activity. The communiqué for the week 29 December 1965 to 5 January 1966 was headlined "Intensive activity of the Armed Forces in North Angola". Action was reported (in the region of Bula, Fazenda Riquinha, Camacume, Dongo, Menga, Mifume and Quingina) by land, air and naval forces against groups of guerrillas near the frontier as well as in the Dembos and Uíge regions against "the criminal action of outlaws".

102. Significantly, in May 1965, residents and farmers in the district of Uíge, Zani, Cabinda and Cuanza North were exempted from payment of licence fees for the use and carrying of weapons, for defence, war and recreation (hunting, Angola, Legislative Instrument 3,550 1 May). In July (Legislative Instrument 3,560, 10 July) this provision was extended to Luanda district, the concelhos of Ambriz and Nambuangongo, the administrative posts of Ucuá, Quicabo, Barra do Dande and the concelho of Dande.

Economic conditions

103. The Lusitania News Agency reported in January that Angola's estimated budget for 1966 at nearly 4,000 million escudos is the highest the Territory has ever had, and there will be a surplus balance of 5.5 million escudos. The total estimated revenue for 1966 is 3,958.9 million escudos, which is only 12.3 million more than that for 1965. There has been only a slight increase in the ordinary revenue from 3,815.2 million in 1965 to 3,829.9 in 1966, but extraordinary revenue dropped from 131.4 million to 128.9 million. In contrast, in 1966 the estimated ordinary expenditure has increased by 20 million escudos, so that the anticipated surplus will be 5.3 million less than that in 1965.

104. In 1966, revenue from State enterprises and participation in private enterprises is expected to increase by 47.3 million escudos and from indirect taxes by 51.7 million escudos. In spite of the fact that the minimum general tax was revised in September 1965 (Governor General's Despatch, 4 September, Boletim Oficial de Angola, No. 200) and is levied at an average rate of 200-250 escudos in most districts and 350 escudos in the more economically developed areas, the 1966 estimated revenue from this source is 11 million escudos lower than in 1965.

105. The 1966 Angola budget provides for an estimated expenditure of 626 million escudos for the armed forces which is 30 per cent higher than the original 1965 estimates. Angola's actual share in national defence costs last year for overseas military forces was 554.9 million escudos, or approximately 14 per cent of the total estimated expenditure, with 380.8 million for the army, 52.1 million for the navy and 122.0 million for the air force. Of the total, about one half (282.6 million escudos) was from the Territory's ordinary revenue in accordance with a 1959 provision (Decree 42,559); 14 per cent was from the special tax introduced in 1961 on Territorial services with an "autonomous" budget; about 7 per cent from the Territory's surpluses; 20 per cent from the revised tax on profits introduced at the end of 1964; and the remainder from the Defence Fund and the Territory's extraordinary revenue.

106. The revised defence tax on profits (Decree 46,112, 29 December 1964) which came into effect in 1965 applies to individuals or companies, national or foreign, who have annual profits exceeding 500,000 escudos. It applies to income from trading industries, urban real estate or from exploitation of natural resources. Under the earlier provisions (Decree 45,067, 7 June 1963) which were found to produce insufficient revenue, the tax had applied only to companies established in the Territory for more than five years, earning profits of more than 1 million escudos and which were subject to the industrial or exploitation tax, but did not apply to companies exempt from income tax under their contracts. Reports indicate that companies such as Tanganyika Concessions, which own the Benguela Railway, and which was previously exempt, may now have to pay the profits tax. Another innovation is that the profits tax now applies also to interest and dividends of 500,000 escudos or more, or which, together with earnings from other operations listed above, yield an income over that amount. As a means of ensuring full collection of the new tax, the Angola Government in August ordered (Boletim Oficial de Angola, No. 34, p. 1143) that all companies, foreign or Portuguese, operating in the Territory, irrespective of the location of their headquarters, should submit a list of their shareholders together with information on the number of shares held and interest and dividends paid.

107. Defence expenditures in Angola are not limited to the allocations for the three armed forces. The Civil Defence and Volunteer Corps, for instance, which is an integral part of the Territorial defence forces, is supported mainly by special taxes. In addition, much of the development expenditure on infrastructure has been allocated to projects of immediate need for defence, such as airports, radio communications, etc. Although Angola pays for a large share of the defence costs out of its budget, some of the costs are also paid for by the Portuguese Government. In 1964 the Government of Angola loaned 104 million escudos to the Defence Ministry in Portugal for the local military region (Decree 46,760, 20 December 1965).

108. As already reported, under the Transitional Development Plan 1965-1967 for Angola, a total investment of 7,210 million escudos is to be made over the three-year period (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, para. 62). About 34 per cent will be from external sources (including a private loan from the General Trade Co., a company with headquarters in Geneva, Switzerland, of $US35 million for equipment). Of the remaining 4,360 million escudos which is to be financed by "national sources", loans from Portugal will provide 1,000 million escudos, the Government of Angola will provide 750 million escudos from revenue, 600 million will be raised by the issue of development bonds, 200 million will come from financing companies¹⁵ and 1,607.5 million from private investment. The Territory is expected to finance its annual share of 250 million escudos from (a) budgetary surpluses of 100 million escudos, (b) an equal amount from the 2.5 per cent Development Fund tax on exports and (c) 50 million escudos from the sobrevalorização export tax, mainly on coffee.¹⁶

109. Full details on the implementation of the Plan during 1965 are not yet available. It was reported in September that an allocation of public sector funds of 955 million escudos was made for development expenditure during the year. This is 11 million escudos more than the average annual investment envisaged in the Territorial Development Plan and greater recourse is made to Angola's own finances than was originally envisaged. Despite the tight financial situation and the small surplus in the budget last year, budgetary surpluses will provide 240 million which, together with 60 million from the sobrevalorização tax and 20 million from the Development Fund, brings Angola's contribution from its own revenues up to 320 million escudos. The remaining 635 million is to be provided as follows: 370 million by loans from Portugal, 65 million from credit institutions and financing companies, and 200 million by the issue of development bonds.

¹⁵ Participação privada no capital das previstas sociedades de financiamento e de desenvolvimento (see Development Plan).

¹⁶ This tax is levied on the difference in the current export price of certain commodities as compared with the 1949 price.

110. Allocated development expenditure during 1965 amounted to 1,040 million escudos as follows: agriculture and livestock, 14 per cent; roads, railways, ports and airports, 29 per cent; Cunene Valley development and hydroelectric power development, 16 per cent; industries, 14 per cent; health, education, social welfare and radio communications, 13 per cent; studies of natural resources, 8 per cent; fishing, 3 per cent; and improvement of local housing, 3 per cent.

111. In his New Year's speech, the Governor General noted that the economic situation in 1965 had not fulfilled expectations; there had been a drop in prices of agricultural products, exports of petroleum as well as of iron both fell below the 1964 level, and the Territory continued to suffer from the exchange situation (a pressão cambial).

112. Detailed trade and production statistics are not yet available for 1965. Reports indicate that compared with the previous year, production of coffee dropped by 16 per cent due to bad weather, sisal remained at the same level but there were some gains in the production of maize, cotton, oilseeds and tobacco, and sugar production was reported to be around 70,000 metric tons, against 68,200 in 1963-1964, and 73,200 tons in 1962-1963. According to some sources, the 1966 harvest is expected to show greater gains as a result of intensified efforts in recent years to increase agricultural production.

113. It may be noted that while the Transitional Development Plan places greater emphasis on the expansion of African agriculture, no large investments are planned in this sector. The Government hopes to stimulate African production of such crops as maize and cotton mainly by improving the price to growers, which hitherto has been low, and by reducing export duties on these crops. As such measures would reduce Territorial income, it was at first planned in July 1965 to raise export duties on coffee and sisal and to introduce certain taxes on consumer goods to compensate for the anticipated loss but these were later withdrawn when the exports of those two crops proved to be less encouraging than had been expected. A new tax on consumer goods has however been reintroduced.

114. In the mining sector, increased diamond production in 1965 is expected to compensate for the lower output of iron, petroleum and salt. Diamond production totalled 1,149,068 carats in 1964, and the Angola Diamond Company reported a profit of 192.3 million escudos out of which a dividend of 110 escudos per share was paid. (The shares have a nominal value of 170 escudos.) The value of diamonds produced in the first ten months of 1965 was reported to be 74 million escudos more than in the corresponding period of 1964.

115. There is continued interest in diamond prospecting. In the first nine months of 1965, twenty-five new requests for prospecting concessions were filed. A new concession was granted to the Sociedade Angolana de Pedras Preciosas e Diamantes (DIPETRA), a Portuguese company. The concession granted to the South African Angola Exploration Company was revoked in April (Order 21,220, 14 April) for having failed to meet the required conditions.

116. Crude petroleum production increased from 800,000 tons in 1963 to 905,000 tons in 1964, but fell short of the previously anticipated 1 million tons (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, para. 55). Exports of crude oil totalled 361,000 tons (compared with 318,000 in 1963), of which 292,000 went to Portugal where a new refinery has been established, and 70,000 tons to foreign countries. Early in 1965, the Government ordered that all excess fuel oil produced by the refinery in Luanda should be absorbed by the Portuguese domestic market. However, output of crude oil during the year was reported to have dropped to 700,000 tons, due to technical reasons.

117. At the end of 1965 Petrangol signed a new contract with the Portuguese Government (Decree 46,822, 31 December). This contract replaces all previous ones, and it is reported that, in consequence, Petrofina's contract with Petrangol as an associated concessionary company will also be cancelled.¹⁷ Petrangol is authorized to increase its capital from 150 to 900 million escudos and the duration of its contract is extended to 1970. Petrangol will undertake to invest 1,250 million escudos in prospecting and development of new deposits, with an annual average of 100-150 million escudos to be spent in the Cuanza district concession, and 50 million in its concession in the Congo district. It may reduce the annual expenditures only with the approval of the Government and provided discovered reserves are not less than 75 million tons. The Government will receive a 12.5 per cent royalty on surface value of oil extracted, and 50 per cent of the profits of Petrangol and of such companies operating with it on a "joint venture" basis. The Government controls the choice of such companies. The Government will receive a bonus of 30 million escudos on the signing of the contract, an annual sum of 1 million escudos which will be paid into the Mining Development Fund which is being set up, and it will also receive two loans, one of 250 million escudos at 4 per cent interest for three years, and another of 40 million escudos at no interest for ten years.

118. During the year there were conflicting reports as to the ability and possibility of Angola supplying oil to South Africa and Southern Rhodesia. In October 1965 the Diário de Notícias in Lisbon carried a report from Lourenço Marques that a well-informed source in Johannesburg had revealed that negotiations for the supply of Angolan oil to South Africa were in progress and that supply would start soon. In November, an official of Petrofina in Brussels said that Petrangol "for technical and contractual reasons" would not be able to supply Southern Rhodesia with oil if sanctions were imposed. The participation of the General Mining Corporation in a joint banking enterprise with Portugal (see para. 50 above) is reported to indicate Federale Mynbou Beperk's continued interest in Angolan oil since the two companies are closely connected.

¹⁷ For details of relations of Petrangol with Petrofina, see A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex I, paras. 179-181.

119. During the year, Alfred Krupp made a visit to Angola where his company is participating in the development of the Cassinga iron mines operated under concession by the Companhia Mineira do Lobito (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex I, para. 207). Machinery and equipment for use at the Cassinga Mines have been granted special tariff privileges and a new government body has been established to co-ordinate the development of road, rail and port facilities at Moçâmedes in connexion with the Cassinga Mine project. In June 1965 (Decree 46,372) the Portuguese Government gave its guarantee to the 1,300 million escudo loan previously contracted by the Companhia Mineira do Lombige and the Sociedade Mineira do Lombige with the consortium headed by Krupp (of Essen, Germany). The Yawata Iron and Steel Company of Japan is reported to have already concluded an agreement for 6 million tons of iron ore to be delivered in six years, at an agreed price of $US 8.14 per ton C.I.F. Japan. In 1965, it was reported that Japanese industrialists, with the backing of the Bank of Japan, were ready to invest up to $US 120 million in Angola for the establishment of a metal industry.

120. Following reports in 1964 of the discovery of new deposits of manganese, nickel and platinum at the Bay of Tigers, copper deposits were discovered in 1965 near Mina River in the Benguela district. Because the copper deposits are relatively near the Benguela Railway, the ore could be easily exported.

121. A new mining company has been formed to exploit the manganese deposits in the Moxico district. The newly established Sociedade Mineira do Cassai, Lda. will co-operate with the Spanish Steel Group and expects to produce 100,000 tons annually for ten years. The Spanish interests will finance the equipment, construct a 70 km rail link and provide the rolling stock. Various companies in the United States of America, South Africa and the Federal Republic of Germany are reported to be interested in the purchase of the manganese ore.

122. Apart from the mining sector, several other new foreign investments were reported during the year. One is an investment of 130 million escudos by the Interamerican Capital Corporation of New York for the hydroelectric power station at Alto Catumbela. Interamerican has financed other projects in Angola, including roads, the Luanda Airport and factories. It has also financed the Sal Airport in the Cape Verde Islands. The president of Interamerican is Frederick J. Evans, who is also president of Evans and Dell Company which has supplied all the equipment and construction materials used.

123. During the first six months of 1965, traffic on the Benguela Railway through Lobito port was equal to that of the entire previous year. As a result of increased loads, early in 1966 Tanganyika Concessions Ltd. announced a plan to double the Benguela Railway's westward capacity from 1.5 million tons to 3 million tons annually within two years, at a cost of £5 million. The plan involves the construction of a second line between Cubal and Lobito. At present the Benguela Railway is a single-track line with wood-burning engines. The Company's concession on the railway has thirty-five more years before it expires.

124. From 1962 to 1964 an average of some 1,300 new transforming industries have been registered each year. The capital invested annually has averaged around 150 million escudos, providing employment for an additional 3,500 persons each year. By the end of 1964 there were a total of 17,316 establishments with a combined investment of 2,560 million escudos, employing some 58,000 persons. New investments in transforming industries already made or planned include 200 million escudos by the Companhia de Celulose mainly for paper pulp; 138 million escudos for the manufacture of ferrous ingots (ferro-ligas); 250 million escudos for a foundry and sheet metal works; and the aluminium industry already reported which was established with a capital of 10 million escudos, but may increase this to 500 million escudos. New industries reported established in 1965 include a 30 million escudo sisal rope factory, Companhia de Fiação e Cordoaria de Angola (COFIANG) by a group of sisal interests in the Benguela district; the investment by the Companhia do Açúcar de Angola of 95 million escudos to increase the capacity of its factories at Donde and Loge; the establishment of a new tire factory, Mahor, with a registered capital of 60 million escudos which may be increased to 150 million; a new plant to build farm tractors and other agricultural machinery; a new bicycle and motor-cycle manufacturing factory; a match factory (15.7 million escudos); a yeast factory by a Dutch group which already has interests in Portugal; a Swedish car assembly plant; a joint French-Angolan wine bottling and manufacturing plant; a fertilizer plant (50 million escudos); a battery factory (300 million escudos); a factory for making mining explosives; and a cotton spinning mill.

125. The largest increases in output of the transforming industries were beer (with an increase of 3.7 million litres in the first ten months), flour, biscuits and soft drinks. These gains, mainly of non-essential consumer goods could be due to a rising standard of living, and could be due, at least partially, to the increase in the number of troops from Portugal and the European settlers. (In 1965 it was estimated that the total population of Angola was 5.5 million and there were 300,000 Europeans.) There were increases in the output of textiles and refined petroleum, which account for respectively one tenth and one third of the total industrial output. There were also increases in the output of chemicals and cement.

126. Despite these increases Angola remains dependent on Portugal for a large range of imports of both durable and non-durable goods. During the first nine months of the year the adverse trade balance was 1,000 million escudos higher than in the corresponding period in 1964, due to a simultaneous increase in imports and a drop in exports. As a result, Angola's balance of payments deteriorated. Towards the end of the year a series of editorials appeared in the Angolan Press suggesting that curbs should be reintroduced on imports.

127. In November, in a speech at the opening of the new sisal factory, COFIANG, the Angola Provincial Secretary of the Economy took the opportunity to explain that the balance of trade had deteriorated mainly due to essential imports, that any restrictions on imports would necessarily have an impact on the standard of living in the Territory and have an adverse effect on the economy of Portugal and the taxable capacity of the nation (capacidade tributária da Nação).

128. At the beginning of this year, the Angola Government issued a more detailed statement on the trade situation. It pointed out that under the existing legislation, regulating the economic integration of the Portuguese realm (espaço português) it was not possible for Angola to take measures to restrict imports from other "national" Territories; such measures can only be made by the Council of Ministers for Economic Affairs in Lisbon for limited periods, after consulting the competent organs, especially the Monetary Fund of the escudo zone (Fundo Monetário da Zona do Escudo). Nor could Angola take measures against foreign countries with which Portugal had special trade agreements, as for instance the EFTA and GATT countries.

129. The official statement showed that during the period from January to August 1965, as compared with the same period in 1964, imports of essential consumer goods increased by 205 million escudos, non-essential consumer goods by 71 million, and production goods by 440 million. Of the essential consumer goods only 37 million had been for durables, mainly refrigerating units, and of the non-durables, almost two thirds had been for clothing, about one fifth for food, and 12 per cent for drugs. Of the production goods, 55 per cent was for equipment and 45 per cent for various primary materials, intermediate or semi-manufactured goods. The Government stated that as the adverse balance of trade was due mainly to production needs, the effect on the balance of payments was a small price to pay for the future economic growth of the Territory. With the new industries which the Territory would be able to establish under the new regulations, including textile factories, Angola would in a few years' time become more self-sufficient and would be able to improve its balance-of-payments situation.

130. According to the study on the Transitional Development Plan, 1965-1967, Angola's invisible transfers amounted in 1962 to 576 million escudos (of which 121 million represented transfers of profits, and 455 million private transfers). In 1965, according to one report, invisible transfers to Portugal of rents, profits and office maintenance costs, which alone amounted to some 808 million escudos, had contributed to the balance-of-payments difficulties. It was reported in July 1965 that new exchange control measures were envisaged on all transfers of over 60,000 escudos including transfers within the escudo zone; these would have to be submitted to the Exchange Council (Conselho de Câmbios) in Luanda.

Land concession and settlement

131. As has already been reported (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex II, paras. 73-79), with the influx of new settlers from Portugal from the mid-1950's onwards, procedures for granting land concessions broke down. One of the main causes was the lack of adequate staff to survey the areas to be concessioned. The geographical and cadastral survey services of the Territories have since been reorganized and in October 1965, a new Inspector of the Cadastral Survey was appointed in Angola. On that occasion, the Provincial Secretary for Rural Development noted that during the ten-year period 1950-1959, there were over 13,000 requests for concessions, and that at the end of December 1964, there were 14,769 requests for concessions pending action. He stated that while some of the delays had been due to the applicants themselves who failed to reply to requests for further information, government measures were needed to deal with the situation. The inspection teams had an important role to play in helping the concessionnaires fulfil their obligations. They would be particularly important in the rural areas where noncompliance with the law was often due to the fact that the inhabitants had hardly any means of knowing it, and strict enforcement would only be possible when they were better informed. In urban areas it was also important to speed up the process of granting charters to the local government bodies in respect of the land within their competence.

132. As noted above (paras. 72-77) the whole question of intensifying settlement in the Overseas Territories, the reorganization of the settlement services and the role of the Provincial Settlement Boards in Angola and Mozambique, have been under discussion in Lisbon. On his visit to Lisbon in February, the Governor-General of Angola said that, in spite of its defects and mistakes, the Angola Provincial Settlement Board was in fact the most experienced body in the whole country in matters concerning population, reorganization (reordenamento) and settlement of persons from various parts of the nation. While Angola did not have the most fertile soil, there was plenty of work for all who came. (For 1966, however, the estimated budget for the Angola Provincial Settlement Board is only 145 million escudos, compared with 160 million in 1965.)

133. Because of recurrent earthquakes in the Azores, the Portuguese Government has drawn up plans for settlement of families from the islands in Angola. A new group of sixty families with some 356 persons is being settled in Angola. Twenty of the families will be settled at Cela and forty will be in the area of Bela Vista. These families will engage in dairy farming.

134. A new proposal for the establishment of soldier-settlers in "defensive settlements" in Angola appeared in an official publication in 1965. The principal areas suggested for these settlements include the northern frontier and other strategic locations linked by major lines of transport. Estimated costs of settlement of each family is 200,000 escudos.

Education

135. A pamphlet published by the Angola Provincial Education Services describes in some detail the present school system and the organization of the Territorial Education Services. Statistics given in the pamphlet show that between the school years 1960-1961 and 1962-1963 the number of official and private primary schools increased from 2,011 to 2,329; the number of teachers from 2,890 to 3,356; pupils from 105,781 to 123,641; expenditures on education increased from 35.5 million escudos in 1961 to 62 million in 1963. For 1966 the estimated expenditure of the Education Services is 242 million escudos. In addition 22.5 million escudos is allocated for the Estudos Gerais Universitários and 31.2 million as a subsidy to the Catholic Missions.

136. The latest school statistics for the school year 1963-1964, which was before the unification of the primary system (see A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, paras. 37-41), are given below.

137. The new "unified" primary school system was introduced in 1964-1965; no detailed statistics are yet available. During 1965, 485 school "posts" (postos escolares) were established in twelve of the districts. (The school post provides the first three primary grades and the preparatory language instruction class.) In addition, eleven school posts were raised to the elementary primary level (with four out of the five primary grades). The school posts are located by districts as follows: Benguela, 35; Bié, 45; Cabinda, 56; Cuando-Cubango, 12; Cuanza North, 64; Cuanza South, 39; Huíla, 14; Lunda, 56; Malenje, 3; Moxico, 28; and Uíge, 23.

ANGOLA SCHOOL STATISTICS, 1963-1964

Type of school	Number	Number of teachers	Number of pupils	Expenditure (million escudos)
Adaptation	1,241	1,954	98,615	...
Primary	50,000 ^a	...
Elementary professional	7	100	2,094	...
Technical primary	24	460	10,205	27.7
Liceu (secondary)	51 ^b	542	10,403	20.9
Post-primary vocational training (médio):
Industrial and commercial	4	53	208	...
Primary teacher training (escolas de magistério primário)	3	...	97	...
Estudos Gerais Universitários	—	...	273	...

^a Based on the 1964 information that total primary enrolment was around 150,000.

^b Nine official, 42 private.

138. With the expansion of the rural school posts as a means of eliminating illiteracy, there is a re-crudescence of interest in the training of an "élite", and the provision of the necessary facilities. A number of new post primary and secondary schools were established during the year. Up to September 1965, these included one liceu (academic secondary school); two elementary technical schools at Henrique de Carvalho and at Cubal; the elementary technical school at Novo Redondo was up-graded to an industrial and commercial school, as was the commercial school at Lobito.

139. According to the information contained in the Transitional Development Plan, the average rate of increase of secondary school enrolment including both academic and technical schools during the period 1953-1962, was 16 per cent per year. It was envisaged that with the expansion of primary education, the number of secondary pupils would be 26,000 in 1967-1968, 46,000 in 1972-1973, and 82,000 by the school year 1977-1978. Of this total it is expected that about half of the students will be in the academic secondary schools. The Transitional Development Plan therefore envisages that the Territory will require 58 secondary schools by 1967-1968, increasing to 102 and 136 respectively in the two following quinquennial periods. Assuming the total population of Angola to be 5.5 million in 1967-1968, the secondary enrolment will then be approximately one per 2,000 population.

140. The main objective of the Estudos Gerais Universitários de Angola begun in 1963 (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. V, para. 102), as the Minister of National Education noted in 1965 when he visited the Territory for the opening of the new school year, is to create a teaching staff at the higher level for the preparation of the qualified technical personnel needed. Courses are provided at three centres. The medical and surgical training, and a wide range of engineering courses are at Luanda, where there is also a National Laboratory for Civil Engineering. The higher school for veterinary studies and the higher institute for agronomy are at Nova Lisboa, and during the year new courses in agronomy were added. The courses for the training of technical professional teachers, including those in agriculture and forestry are at Sá da Bandeira. A centre for the study of Humanities is to be added later.

Public Health

141. Under the Transitional Development Plan 1965-1967 for Angola, while provision is made for the extension of available medical facilities, emphasis is mainly on preventive medicine and other measures for improving public health. These include special campaigns, increased training of technical personnel, public health education, and measures against communicable diseases. Annual expenditure envisaged under the Development Plan amount to some 80 million escudos.

142. During 1965 work was begun to enlarge the hospital in Luanda. The first phase involves an expenditure of 23 million escudos and an increase of 300 beds; the second phase will cost 50 million escudos and raise the total capacity to 1,000 beds. Two new rural hospitals are being built, one in Vila General Machado, the other in Vila Teixeira de Sousa.

143. The 1966 budget for Angola shows that Government medical services consisted of 2 central hospitals, 13 regional hospitals, 3 sub-regional hospitals, 57 rural hospitals, 97 health delegacias, and 258 sanitary posts. The estimated expenditure of the Public Health Services amounts to 200.4 million escudos.

3. Mozambique

Constitutional and political

(a) Election of the Head of State

144. Although a local press report lists the names of fifty-two persons, Mozambique was officially represented by fifty-one members in the electoral college which elected the Head of State (see paras. 13-17 above). They were the seven deputies to the National Assembly, two members of the Corporative Chamber, twenty-four members of the Legislative Council, chosen by election within that body, and eighteen representatives of the municipal councils.

145. It is significant that Mozambique, with a total population in 1960 of 6.6 million had the same number of representatives as Angola, with a population of 4.8 million whereas Portugal and adjacent islands, with a population of 8.9 million, had 438 representatives.

(b) Elections to the National Assembly

146. In the election of Mozambique's seven deputies to the National Assembly, held on 7 November 1965, 64,034 persons voted, representing 87.17 per cent of the registered electorate.

147. The qualifications for voting in the elections to the National Assembly are briefly set out in the previous report of the Special Committee (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, para. 9), where it was pointed out that the two alternative requirements, literacy in Portuguese or payment of a minimum amount of certain taxes, would restrict the numbers of the indigenous people eligible to vote. The results show that out of an estimated population of over 6.6 million (including about 97,000 Europeans and 31,000 mistos),¹⁸ only 1.1 per cent were registered and less than 1 per cent actually voted. The following table shows the number of voters in each district, compared with the estimated population in 1960:

POPULATION^a

District	Number of voters	Total	Europeans	Voters as percentage of population
Cabo Delgado	2,979	542,165	1,482	0.5
Gaza	5,652	675,150	7,422	0.8
Inhamitane	3,982	583,722	1,913	0.7
Lourenço Marques	17,892	441,363	48,182	4.0
Manica e Sofala	14,801	781,070	19,668	1.9
Moçambique	9,016	1,444,555	8,074	0.6
Niassa	1,512	276,810	992	0.6
Tete	2,663	470,100	2,169	0.6
Zambézia	5,546	1,363,619	7,436	0.4

^a Population figures are for 1960 (provisional).

148. As in Angola, the results of the elections, in which there were no Opposition candidates, were hailed as "a reaffirmation of the people's confidence in the policy of intransigent defence of national Territory". The pre-electoral campaign period had been mainly devoted to public discussion of the manifesto published by the Opposition in Portugal, in particular the proposal for self-determination of the Overseas Territories, which had been denounced as "a traitorous attempt to disintegrate the Portuguese nation" in numerous press commentaries, statements by public figures and organized bodies and at mass public rallies.

149. Of the seven candidates of the Government organized National Union who were elected without contest, only three were born in Mozambique, three of the others having been born in Portugal and one in Macau. Three were re-elected as deputies, a fourth was already a member of the Overseas Council. By occupation, they included a businessman and sisal producer, a secondary school teacher, a lawyer, a doctor of medicine, two company directors, one of them a director of the Companhia do Boror, the Sociedade de Estudos e Investimentos de Moçambique and the Companhia Industrial de Fundição e Laminagem (CIFEL) and also a member of the Legislative Council, and the seventh a former executive of the Sociedade Hidroeléctrica do Revue and now president of the municipal council of Beira.

The military situation in Mozambique

150. As noted in the report of the Special Committee for 1965 (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, paras. 83-86), there has been fighting between the Portuguese armed forces and insurgents led by the Mozambique Liberation Front (FRELIMO) since September 1964 when the latter declared an insurrection in the Territory.

151. The fighting is of a guerrilla nature and it is difficult to ascertain the real situation because of conflicting reports. According to Portuguese military bulletins, the hostilities have been confined to clashes with small armed groups of guerrillas in restricted areas of the northern and north-western parts of the Territory; near the frontier of Tanzania and more recently in the Tete district on the border with Zambia. According to these reports, the principal areas of insurgent activity are the Maconde plateau, between the Rovuma and Massalo rivers and the country adjacent to Lake Nyasa. Early in 1965, fighting was reported in the region of Milange, but it is reported that insurgent forces in this area have been liquidated. FRELIMO sources, in contrast, stated in October and December that the fighting was widespread and that large areas in Northern Mozambique were under their control.

152. It appears from reports that the fighting, consisting mainly of small-scale clashes, was sporadic at the outset but grew more frequent after mid-1965 when Portuguese forces, numbering 20,000 under a newly appointed commander, Brig. Gen. António dos Santos, began extensive military and air operations from a chain of combined air and land bases established since 1961 near the northern borders of Cabo Delgado and Niassa districts. It appears that Portuguese forces were reinforced during the year. In August, the Portuguese military commander stated in a press interview that the armed forces in the Territory, presumably including military, mobile police and militia, numbered between 40,000 and 50,000, a substantial increase over the 25,000 troops reported a year earlier. In November 1965 and February 1966 there were press reports of further large reinforcements, the latter report being denied in Lisbon.

153. From about September 1965 onwards Portuguese forces, including parachutists, special fusiliers (an élite corps of specially trained commandos), police and militia, supported from the air, have been engaged in a series of combined operations to track down groups of guerrillas in the Messalo River area, near the Tanzania border, and in the Maniamba area near Lake Nyasa. The local population is being grouped in specially constructed village settlements (aldeamentos) defended by military units, while, at the same time, camps of "recuperated" Africans suspected of aiding the guerrillas are being established near military centres. As a result of the increased military operations, the number of clashes has become more frequent as can be seen from the conflicting reports of casualties from both sides. According to Portuguese official sources, Portuguese military casualties between the outbreak of hostilities in 1964 and March 1966 were eighty-five while in the month of January 1966 alone it was claimed that ¹⁸ These figures are provisional estimates for 1960 published in the Anuário Estatístico of 1963. It is unofficially estimated that the European population had increased to 150,000 in 1965.

187 insurgents had been killed, wounded or captured. A FRELIMO communiqué on the other hand claimed that in January 100 Portuguese troops were killed or wounded against eight insurgents.

154. The disturbances in these northern areas were accompanied during late 1964 and early 1965 by large movements of African refugees, first across the Rovuma River into Tanzania and later, in smaller numbers, into Malawi and Zambia. As reported previously (ibid., para. 86), the refugees in Tanzania were being cared for in camps by the Tanzanian authorities with supplementary assistance from the UN/FAO World Food Programme. In July 1965, it was announced by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees that a tripartite agreement had been signed with the Government of Tanzania and the Tanganyika Christian Refugee Service for settling 10,000 refugees at Rutamba in Southern Tanzania. The project would take three years to complete and would cost a total of $US1.8 million. The Government of Tanzania would make available at least three acres per family unit and would supply goods and services to the value of $US43,000. The UN/FAO World Food Programme would supply $US500,000 worth of commodities. The High Commissioner had been asked to contribute $US412,300 and $US278,000 would be made available by religious and other sources.

155. In July 1965 it was reported that about 2,000 refugees from Niassa district had taken refuge at a missionary centre on Likoma island in Malawi and subsequent information indicated that their numbers had increased to over 3,000 by September, although many refugees had already returned to Mozambique. In February 1966, it was reported in the Press that about 3,500 refugees were housed in two government camps in eastern Zambia.

Security measures

156. In early 1965, a number of non-Portuguese newspapers carried reports suggesting that there had been widespread arrests for political reasons in Mozambique. These reports were officially denied by the Government, which, however, admitted that eight persons, among them the former editor of a local newspaper and three other well-known intellectuals, had been arrested for political activities. In August 1965 the chief of the political police PIDE (Policia Internacional de Defesa do Estado) was quoted in the Press as stating that these arrests were part of an action taken to eliminate a subversive group established by FRELIMO in southern Mozambique. It was reported that a number of other arrests had been made in connexion with the case and that in consequence the Centro Associativo dos Negros da Provincia de Moçambique, a cultural and educational association and centre for Africans in Lourenço Marques, with a membership of 15,000 had been closed. It was later disclosed that the association had been banned because members of its directorate were accused of subversive political activities but that, after an interruption, the centre would be permitted to resume its educational activities.

Economic conditions

157. Mozambique's defence expenditures continue to rise as the result of the hostilities which began in 1964. The amount allocated in 1965 to the armed services was 578,730,000 escudos,¹⁹ of which 437.7 million was for the army, 108 million for the air force and 33 million for the naval forces. The bulk of this, 510 million, was to be paid by the Territory, to be derived from (a) ordinary revenue (195.8 million); (b) the receipts of autonomous parastatal bodies (205.2 million); (c) the Government's share in the receipts of the Beira Railway (48 million); and (d) a public loan (61 million).²⁰ The remaining 68.7 million escudos was to be derived from the Overseas Military Defence Fund in Portugal. It may be noted that these military expenditures, which represent only part of the total cost of defence, comprise about 12 per cent of the Territory's budget and are increasing at the rate of about 80 million escudos yearly. In 1965 (Legislative Instrument No. 2,614, 10 July) a new National Defence Stamp tax was introduced, payable on all receipts over 100 escudos and on all other legal documents. It was estimated that the new tax would yield about 16.5 million escudos from automobile licences alone. Apart from increased taxation, however, the main source of defence funds are additional appropriations from the receipts of the "autonomous services", particularly the government-controlled railways, ports and harbours which derive their revenue largely from the important transit trade of Mozambique's neighbours. The fact that this major sector of Mozambique's economy is controlled by the Territorial Government permits a degree of flexibility in public financing which is not obtainable in Angola where revenue increases must come primarily from increased taxes or contributions from the private sector.

158. Increased contributions from the "autonomous services" and, to a lesser extent, increased revenues from direct and indirect taxes resulting from the growth of economic activity, have enabled total government expenditure to grow more rapidly than expenditure on defence and so have not prevented increased expenditure in other sectors. Thus, the estimates of ordinary revenue and expenditure for 1966, amounting to 4,143 million escudos, show an increase of 293.6 million over the preceding year and nearly 400 million over 1964. The main sources are: receipts from "autonomous services", 1,695.4 million (an increase of 176.2 million over 1965); indirect taxes, mainly customs duties, 731.3 million escudos (an increase of 32.6 million); and direct taxes, 648 million (increased by only 4.9 million). It may be noted that direct taxes yield less than one sixth of ordinary revenue.

159. Under the various headings of ordinary expenditure for 1966, the following allocations may be noted: public debt servicing, 240.5 million escudos (increased by 34 million over 1965); national defence, 549.4 million (increased by 80.2 million); ports, railways, and transport, 1,340 million (increased by 120 million); agriculture and forestry, 33.7 million (increased by 0.2 million); and health and welfare, 175.1 million (increased by 17.8 million). For education the 1966 allocations included: government education services, 158.2 million (increased by 14.5 million); assistance to Portuguese Catholic missions, 69.5 million; and Estudos Gerais Universitários, 19 million. Thus, despite increases, expenditure on education represents less than 6 per cent of the ordinary budget, health and welfare about 4 per cent and agriculture and forestry less than 1 per cent, not including expenditures from separate funds which exist for certain regulated crops.

¹⁹ Orders Nos. 21, 243-5, 26 April 1965.

²⁰ Decree No. 46,236, 18 March 1965.

160. The Transitional Development Plan, 1965-1967 (see A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, paras. 89 and 90), provided in the case of Mozambique for an investment target of 5,400 million escudos over the three-year period, to be financed as follows: external loans, 1,500 million escudos; Government of Portugal, 1,120 million; Territorial funds, 750 million; private sector, 1,980 million; and credit institutions, 50 million. The division by major sectors was: transport and port facilities, 1,771 million; industries, 1,436 million (including 1,350 million for transforming industries); agriculture, 760 million (including 500 million for irrigation and settlement schemes); education and health, 500 million; electricity, 400 million; fisheries, 328 million; and housing and tourism, 144 million.

161. Under the Plan the yearly target contribution from the public sector amounts to about 624 million escudos, of which 250 million was to be furnished by the Territory and about 374 million by the Government of Portugal. In 1965 public expenditure under the Plan amounted to 611 million escudos, only slightly less than the target. Of this total, 423 million consisted of loans from Portugal and 100 million was obtained from an issue by the Territorial Government of treasury bonds at 5 per cent interest. The bond issue was made under a general authorization announced in July permitting the Mozambique Government to issue bonds up to a maximum of 500 million escudos. As yet no information is available on Portugal's contribution under the Plan for 1966, but in February it was announced that the Territorial Government had been authorized to borrow 200 million escudos at 2 per cent interest from the Banco Nacional Ultramarino, which will be used mainly to finance the development of transport communications. It was also announced that credits amounting to 23 million escudos had been opened for agricultural, irrigation and settlement schemes to be financed under the Development Plan.

162. As may be expected, a large part of the public funds are being used to improve the Territory's road, railway and port facilities. The opening in late 1964 of the Swaziland railway, increasing transit trade and tourism, which are Mozambique's main source of foreign exchange, and also continuing growth of its own foreign commerce, have placed a heavy burden on the existing port and transport facilities. This is reflected in the volume of goods handled at Mozambique ports and by the volume of traffic on the railways, which in both cases was more than 15 per cent greater during the first eight months of 1965 than during the corresponding period of 1964. To cope with this extra burden, 140 million escudos were spent during 1965 on additional port facilities at Beira and substantial sums on similar improvements at Lourenço Marques. At the latter port work was begun on the construction of large loading and storage installations which will handle Rhodesian sugar exports and eventually exports of sugar to be produced in the Lourenço Marques area. The cost of the project which includes storage capacity for 80,000 tons of sugar, will be 66 million escudos. Work was also completed on a new mineral ore loading quay designed to handle iron ore from Swaziland, on the construction of a new railway terminal at Beira (costing 50 million escudos) and contracts were issued (totaling 64.7 million escudos) for the purchase of new rolling stock for the Mozambique railway where existing wood-burning locomotives are also being replaced by diesel at a cost of 125 million escudos. A major undertaking, which is being financed under the Development Plan, consists of a crash programme of road development, including especially the construction of an important road linking Lourenço Marques and Beira, for part of which contracts totalling 200 million escudos were announced in 1965, and the extension and improvement of roads in the north.

163. According to reports, Mozambique is entering upon a period of significant expansion in several sectors of its domestic economy. In the field of sugar production, three new companies, involving capital investments in the region of one half billion escudos each, have been, or are being formed. This combined output should, within a few years, increase the Territory's sugar production (totalling 181,775 tons in 1963/64) by about half. Two of these are Portuguese companies, the third, located in the lower Zambezi Valley, being a subsidiary of the Anglo-American Corporation of South Africa (which also has interests in cashew processing, fishing and prospecting for diamonds at Pafuri). In addition, the Sena Sugar Estates, Ltd., which is the largest of the existing producers, began in January 1965 a capital investment programme involving approximately 360 million escudos, which will increase its output by about 25 per cent. (Details of these developments will be contained in a separate study on the role of agriculture in Angola and Mozambique which is in preparation.)

164. The most notable development in the past few years has however been the growth of cashew production and processing. For the first time cashew exports assumed first place among the Territory's exports in 1964, producing an export revenue of 608 million escudos compared with 565 million for raw cotton which was formerly Mozambique's leading export. This represented a 38.5 per cent increase in the value of cashew exported over 1963. Because the export value of cashew is about twice that of the unprocessed nut, recent investment has centred on the establishment of processing factories. In 1965 work was begun on the construction of an important decorticating factory in the district of Gaza with funds (20 million escudos) provided jointly by South African (mainly Anglo-American Corporation), Italian and local Portuguese interests. The factory is linked with a large-scale project for the development of cashew farming in an area of 30,000 ha. to be allocated to European settlers and Africans. Also in 1965, a subsidiary of the Companhia União Fabril of Portugal obtained authorization for the construction of three processing factories, at Nacala, Nampula and Porto Amélia, with a combined processing capacity of 70,000 tons of raw cashew.

165. Although manufacturing and transforming industries play only a minor role in what is predominantly an agricultural economy, these sectors also show signs of increasing activity. Most notable were a 29 per cent increase in building construction from 1963 to 1964, increases of 26.7 and 23.3 per cent in the values respectively of non-electrical and electrical machinery imported and a marked increase in the number of new industrial enterprises registered (from 431 to 647) in the two years. Much of the new investment is, however, in consumer goods, notably clothing and textiles, breweries, flour milling and other food-stuffs, furniture and light metal and electrical equipment. Among the most important new investments announced during 1965 was a fertilizer factory to be constructed near Nova Sofala at a cost of 200 million escudos, the contractual work being undertaken by a French firm, Sodeix. French contractors are also engaged, on behalf of local financial interests, in the construction of a bicycle factory which will produce 35,000 bicycles and 3,000 motor-bicycles yearly. Other new investments include a brewery (70 million escudos), a meat processing and dairy products factory (20 million escudos), a bedding factory (30 million escudos) and a flour mill (25 million escudos). Negotiations are in process for the construction of factories to produce automobile tires and light aluminium goods.

166. In the more basic sector of electricity supply, it was announced in December 1965, that contracts had been signed for the construction of a thermal electricity plant to supply the town of Nacala, the work to be completed by the end of 1966 at a cost of 150 million escudos. Investigational work is proceeding on a proposed hydroelectric project on the Elefantes River, one of the main tributaries of the Limpopo, from which power would be supplied to Lourenço Marques. The Sociedade Hidroelétrica do Revuê is also increasing its productive capacity at Vila Pery by constructing a new dam at Chicambe to cost 80 million escudos. In December, a new agreement was signed between Portugal and Southern Rhodesia extending until July 1971 the existing arrangement whereby part of the power produced by Revuê is supplied to Umtali.

167. Also in 1965, the pipeline constructed to supply crude oil from the port of Beira to the Rhodesian refinery at Feruka (Umtali) came into operation. As noted in the Special Committee's report for 1965 (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, para. 93), the pipeline is owned by a mixed company in which British interests hold 62 per cent of the stock, but which has, under Portuguese law, a majority of Portuguese directors. Following the "unilateral declaration of independence" in Southern Rhodesia, supplies of oil through the pipeline ceased owing to the embargo on oil shipments destined for Southern Rhodesia imposed by the United Kingdom on its nationals and also by other Governments acting in pursuance of Security Council resolution 217 (1965). Though reports indicate that no oil has been delivered to the pipeline terminal since December 1965, press reports in March 1966 noted the construction of new petroleum storage tanks at the port of Beira. Portugal is reported to have informed the United Kingdom Government that these tanks are being built by a Portuguese company as a precautionary measure to avoid dependence on existing facilities which are owned by foreign interests. There have also been reports of the passage of petroleum products in railway tank cars from South Africa to Southern Rhodesia through Lourenço Marques. (For more detailed information on this matter, see chap. III, paras. 270-277.)

168. Mozambique, as has been noted before, suffers from a chronic deficit both in its balance of trade and in its balance of payments with the exterior. Despite substantial increases in the export value of cashew and wood products, which increased by 38.5 and 48.9 per cent respectively in 1964, the value of exports increased by only 5.1 per cent, from 2.9 billion escudos in 1963 to 3.0 billion escudos in 1964, whereas imports increased by 10.2 per cent, from 4.1 billion escudos to 4.5 billion escudos, leaving a net deficit of 416 million escudos. This growing trade deficit was partly attributable to a sharp decrease in sugar exports due to adverse weather conditions and to the re-equipping of the Sena plantations, as well as the continuing low level of cotton exports since 1961. The main cause, however, was a marked increase in the importation of industrial equipment and consumer goods. Preliminary statistics for the first eight months of 1965 show a similar pattern in the relative growth of imports and exports. Commenting on this situation, the writer of an article in a Mozambique newspaper observed that one of the reasons for the slower increase in the value of exports was the failure of some of the main agricultural producers to take advantage of the higher export prices which they could obtain by further processing of their products locally. He referred in particular to the absence in the Territory of any industrial processing of sisal²¹ coconuts and sugar by-products.

169. The increased deficit in the balance of trade for 1964 was partly offset by greater revenue derived from the transit trade of neighbouring territories. As a result the deficit in the balance of payments decreased from 386 million escudos in 1963 to 223 million in 1964. Data for the first four months of 1965 indicate that this trend was continuing.

170. On the other hand, Mozambique's exports in 1966 will probably show the effects of a severe cyclone accompanied by flooding which struck the Territory in early January. Newspaper reports indicate widespread and severe damage, particularly to cashew plantations in the district of Gaza and to banana and wheat crops in the districts of Inhambane and Lourenço Marques.

Educational conditions

171. An analysis of the educational situation in Mozambique presents certain difficulties owing to the limited information available and to the redefinition of the term "primary school" according to Decree-Law 45,908 of September 1964 (see paras. 81-86 above) whereby the term is now restricted to schools which provide at least the pre-primary class and the first three elementary classes (postos escolares). In Mozambique many rural schools provide less than this minimum and hence since 1964 are not included in the statistics of primary enrolments.

172. On the basis of the earlier definition, it can be seen that in the past five years there has been a large relative increase in education at the primary level. Thus, in 1963, there were 3,600 officially recognized primary teaching establishments of all kinds, with 5,600 teachers and a pupil enrolment of 400,000. Compared with 1955, this represents an increase of 1,400 establishments, 3,200 teachers and 130,000 pupils.²²

173. Statistics published by the Government of Mozambique,²³ compiled presumably on the basis of the new definition of primary schools contained in Decree-Law 45,810, show a primary school enrolment of 44,725 in 1963-1964. The following table shows their composition by major ethnic groups in comparison with population figures for the respective ethnic groups in 1960:

Ethnic group	Primary enrolments	Percentage of population group
African	23,093	0.35
Chinese (anarclos)	294	14.0
European	10,358	10.6
Indian	2,412	13.9
Mestiços	7,020	22.3
Not specified	1,548	—

²¹ It has been reported in the Press that the construction of a sisal rope factory at Nacala is under consideration.

²² Boletim Geral do Ultramar, January-February 1965.

²³ Mozambique: Serviços de Estatística Geral, Estatística do Ensino.

174. According to the same source, the number of pupils enrolled at the secondary level in 1963-1964 was 18,415. The following table shows their composition by ethnic group in comparison with the population figures for the same groups in 1960:

Ethnic group	Primary enrolments	Percentage of population group
African	2,781	0.04
Chinese (anarelos)	794	37.8
European	10,914	11.2
Indian	1,381	8.0
Mestiços	2,291	7.2
Not specified	254	—

175. It may also be noted that in relative terms, the rate of increase has been greater for secondary than for primary education. Thus enrolments at grammar (liceal) schools increased from 1,106 in 1956-1957 to 4,124 in 1963-1964, while enrolments in technical professional schools (i.e., including commercial and trade schools and training institutions for the public service) increased from 2,285 in 1955-1956 to 8,639 in 1963-1964.

176. There is very little information concerning the development of primary and secondary education during 1965, though it may be noted that under the Transitional Development Plan for 1965-1967, 220 million escudos were allocated for the construction of new schools and teacher training. It was reported in the Press at the end of 1964 and in January 1965 that the building of five new primary schools and one elementary technical school had been authorized, at a total cost of nearly 8 million escudos. Later in 1965, it was announced that two new secondary schools (liceus) were being constructed at Vila Cabral and Nampula.

177. Particular emphasis is apparently being given to the expansion of agricultural training as a result of Decree 46,464 of 31 July 1965 (see paras. 81-86 above). In early 1965 the Territory possessed one school of agriculture at the secondary or technical level (escola prática de agricultura) in the Limpopo Valley and three training institutions run by the Agricultural Department; in addition, three elementary agricultural schools were being established and one post-secondary vocational training centre for agricultural staff (regentes) was in the planning stage.²⁴ It was subsequently reported in the Press that as a first step in implementation of Decree 46,464, measures were being taken to institute courses in agriculture and agricultural mechanics in the industrial (secondary) schools.

178. Progress was made during 1965 in the development of the General University Studies (Estudos Gerais Universitários) at Lourenço Marques which has a planned enrolment of more than 3,000 students by 1970-1975 and an ultimate target of 8,000 by 1980. Opened in November 1963 with an enrolment of 282 students, it now has, according to press reports, a student body of nearly 600. In the last academic year, 1964-1965, the enrolment totalled 329 (of whom 75 were training as secondary school teachers, 167 were studying engineering, 53 medicine, 19 veterinary science and 15 were in the institute of agronomy and forestry, these being the only departments then functioning). The institution has so far been housed in temporary quarters and the pace of expansion depends mainly on the availability of funds for construction and equipment. Capital expenditure up to 1965 amounted to 132 million escudos and included the construction of laboratories for agronomy, biology and chemistry. In 1965 the teacher-training courses were extended to include the training of assistant teachers for the eighth (agriculture) and eleventh (forestry) groups in the technical professional schools.

179. Admission to the Estudos Gerais Universitários requires a two-year course beyond the level available at present in the secondary schools and students who do not obtain a scholarship (of which there are about 100) pay fees at a standard rate of about 1,500 escudos yearly. It may be noted that, of 291 students undertaking higher studies (Estudos Gerais Universitários and Institute of Social Assistants) in 1963-1964, 269 were reported to be Europeans, 15 Indians, 5 Africans and 2 mestiços.

4. Guinea under Portuguese administration

Constitutional and political

(a) Election of the Head of State

180. For the election of the Head of State, held in July 1965, Guinea under Portuguese administration was represented in the electoral college by five members as follows: the deputy to the National Assembly; the member representing the Territory in the Corporative Chamber; one representative of municipal councils; and two numbers from the Territory's Legislative Council.

(b) Elections to the National Assembly

181. Dr. Pinto Bull, the Secretary-General and incumbent deputy in the National Assembly, was again the National Union candidate. He was re-elected. The Portuguese Press reported that 85 per cent of the registered voters took part in the election.

The military situation in the Territory

182. Fighting, which first broke out in 1963 (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. V, paras. 180-181) continued in 1965, and in fact most news reports speak of the Territory as being in a state of war. As in Angola and Mozambique, there are conflicting accounts of the actual military situation, but all accounts seem to indicate that the guerrilla war will not end soon.

183. Almost every Portuguese military bulletin issued in 1966 refers to fighting on the northern, eastern and southern borders of the Territory with descriptions of the operations of the army, navy and air force. North of the Cacheu River, there is almost continuous guerrilla activity, around Susana, S. Domingos, Bigene and Farim. Activities are also reported around Bissorã and Mansabá and other communities which lie some 30 to 50 km. inside the border; but Bissorã is not much more than 100 km. in a straight line north-east of Bissau, the capital of the Territory. Similarly along the eastern and southern frontiers, almost every week there are reported activities of Government forces in many locations against "bandits". In the south, however, there is also activity around Catió and Buba, which are not along the border. From the frequency of reports of canoes seized, it seems that the rivers and other waterways are also important areas of fighting.

184. During 1965, PAIGC (Partido Africano da Independência da Guiné e Cabo Verde) claimed that a significant proportion of the Territory's estimated 800,000 population is now included within the "liberated areas" where it is setting up villages with widened self-rule on democratic lines and economic and social services are being organized. In November 1965, a spokesman for the Portuguese Defence Ministry denied that guerrillas controlled the regions of Bué in the north-east and S. Domingos in the north-west.

²⁴ Boletim Geral do Ultramar, January-February 1965.

185. In a recent newspaper article, a British Member of Parliament said that reports of "rebel domination of two thirds of the Territory" were unfounded, and that Bissau Island and Bijagós archipelago have been immune from fighting. "Elsewhere", he said, "deep penetration by land or water is hard to stop". After describing the medical and educational work by the Portuguese troops in the villages, the article goes on to say "The scale of warfare has grown on both sides", and reports the existence of a "people's army" larger than previous guerrilla groups, with main bases in Como Island and the Central Oió region. The guerrilla fighters are reported to be well armed. (There have been frequent Portuguese reports of arms captured from them.) The Portuguese, on the other hand, have "distributed thousands of mausers and grenades to village volunteers, and sub-machine-guns to their leaders. Villages are wired and fortified . . .".

Economic conditions

186. For 1965, expenditures on the armed forces in Guinea under Portuguese administration were: 31.3 million escudos for the army, of which 4.6 million came from the Territory's revenue, 24.5 from complementary payments by Portugal under the extraordinary budget; and 2.1 million for the Overseas Defence Fund; 16 million escudos for the navy; and 20.6 million for the air force. The Territory's total share in these expenditures was 30.6 million escudos (Orders 21,216, 21,215 and 21,218, April 1965). This was almost 20 per cent of the Territory's estimated revenue for 1965 which was 151,750,079 escudos (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, para. 105), and as estimated expenditures totalled 151,750,791 escudos, no surplus was anticipated.

187. Since 1957 the Territory's budget has remained around this figure (150.1 million in 1957; 150.9 million in 1958; 151.1 million in 1959; 141.0 million in 1960). As noted by the Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Territory, General Arnaldo Schulz in 1965, because of its small budget, the Territory cannot afford the necessary staff and administrative services it needs, including education. He said that what the Territory required to consolidate a military victory was more staff, private investments, industrial development and more education. He was confident that better days lay ahead when Portugal would give greater support to the Territory.

188. As stated in the Special Committee's report for 1965 (ibid., para. 108), an allocation of 180 million escudos is made to the Territory under the Transitional Development Plan 1965-1967. Because of the tight financial situation of the Territory²⁵ and the uncertainty of any definitive private investments, the entire allocation is to be financed from public funds from Portugal (Projecto de Plano Intercalar de Fomento para 1965-1967).

189. There is very little information on the extent of the implementation of the Transitional Development Plan. During the year two allocations totalling 19 million escudos were made to the Territory from the Portuguese Treasury (under Decree 43,519, 28 February 1961. This amount is to be included in the extraordinary budget for 1965 of the Overseas Ministry, but is in fact a loan at 4 per cent interest repayable in twenty years). More than half of the 19 million escudos is for development of transport and communications (9.1 million) and ports and harbours (2.5 million). The remainder is for development of fishing, 1.8 million; industries, 0.5 million; education, 2.2 million; water supplies, 2 million; and tourism, 1 million.

190. In December 1965 the Ministry of Finance was authorized (Decree 46,683) (see para. 57 above) to grant the Territory each year loans up to the amounts determined by the Council of Ministers for Economic Affairs for the implementation of the Transitional Development Plan. According to a report of January 1966 loans from the Central Government to the Territory for the Development Plan amounted to 35 million escudos in 1965. This represents a little over one half of the average annual investments envisaged in the Transitional Development Plan.

191. A new contract has been signed between Portugal and Esso Exploration Inc. of New York which is to take over the concession for petroleum prospecting formerly held by the now extinct Esso Exploration Guinea Inc. The former company is reported to have spent close to 250 million escudos ($US8.5 million) in prospecting but has not located any commercially exploitable deposits.

192. The new contract grants the New York company a concession of about 50,000 km² which includes all the land area of the Territory (33,700 km²) and the sea, lake and river shores. The initial period of the contract is for five years. The company undertakes to spend in prospecting 24 million escudos in the first year, 59 million in the second year, 78 million in the third year and 68 million in each of the last two years. Within three months of the signing of the contract the company will pay the Government of Guinea under Portuguese administration a sum of $US40 million, constituting an advance payment of the first year's rent and a 25 per cent advance payment of the rent of the four subsequent years. If the area as later determined is greater, the Territory will be entitled to receive an additional payment. If, however, the area is smaller, no refund will be made.

193. Among other developments during the year were the establishment of a Technical Commission for Economic Planning and Co-ordination and the establishment of a new agriculture and livestock credit fund to provide long-, medium- and short-term loans for agriculture, livestock, industry or property. As reported previously (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, paras. 35 and 109), under the Transitional Development Plan 1965-1967 about 15 per cent (33.2 million escudos) is for special projects for the production of rice, manioc, oil palms, bananas and cashew.

194. There are no recent trade statistics or information on agricultural production for 1965. In December 1964 the main exports to Portugal were 280 tons of coconuts, valued at 896,000 escudos; hides and skins, 300,000 kilos, valued at 222,893 escudos; unshelled peanuts, 32,028 kilos, valued at 140,603 escudos; and 6,866 kilos of beeswax, valued at 122,353 escudos. Main imports during that month were 1.2 million litres of gasoline, 226,994 kilos of sugar, 229,900 kilos of potatoes, and 214,102 litres of wine. The Territory, which since 1960 has had to import rice, was authorized in 1965 to import up to 10,000 tons from any source, free of import duty. Rice prices were also revised, and the purchase of hand-processed rice was permitted in four concelhos.

²⁵ According to the study made in the preparation of the Transitional Development Plan, it was envisaged that the Territory would have a surplus balance totalling 19 million escudos during the period 1965-1967, and a surplus of 4 million escudos at the end of 1964. From this 23 million, however, 12 million were to be allocated for other extraordinary expenditures and only 11 million escudos would be available to finance the Plan. As seen above, the 1965 budget had no surplus. Details of the 1966 budget are not yet available.

Education

195. The latest available school statistics for the Territory are for 1963, when there were 163 government primary schools with 212 teachers and 12,000 pupils. (Total population of the Territory at the 1960 census was 530,380, of which about 40 per cent are Moslems.) In addition there was one academic high school with 20 teachers and 272 students; one commercial and industrial (vocational) school with 26 teachers and 308 students; an elementary professional school with 4 teachers and 19 students and 79 other (Koranic) schools with 81 teachers and 718 students. There were 105 persons in government-training programmes: 65 studying land survey and topography (agrimensura e topografia) and 40 undergoing technical training for work in the ports and harbours.

5. Cape Verde

Constitutional and political

196. For the election of the Head of State, held in July 1965, Cape Verde was represented in the electoral college by thirteen members as follows: two deputies to the National Assembly, one member of the Corporative Chamber, six representatives of the municipal councils and four from the Legislative Council of the Territory. Cape Verde has two representatives in the National Assembly and there were only two candidates of the National Union. The Portuguese Press reported that 86.5 per cent of the registered voters took part in the elections.

Economic and financial

197. For 1965, expenditure on the armed services for Cape Verde amounted to 23.8 million escudos. This included an allocation of 10.4 million for the army of which 1 million was from the Territory's ordinary budget, 7.6 million from Portugal, and 1.8 million from the Overseas Military Defence Fund; expenditure on the navy amounted to 2.1 million escudos and on the air force to 1.3 million escudos. The Territory's share of total defence expenditure was 1.7 million escudos, including 400,000 escudos for the navy and 300,000 for the air force (Orders 21,157, 21,158, 21,159, 10 March 1965).

198. Cape Verde's estimated budget for 1965 was balanced at 84,673,000 escudos, compared with 70.9 million in 1963, 65.0 million in 1962 and 61.2 million in 1961. Whereas ordinary expenditure has been increasing there has been a marked decline in extraordinary expenditures, for which the budget estimates allowed only 2,690,000 escudos in 1965. This may be compared with the allocations of 38.7 million in 1963, 67.3 million in 1962 and 71.6 million in 1961.

199. Estimated ordinary expenditure for 1965 included the following allocations: 2.9 million escudos for servicing the Territory's public debt (the same amount as in previous years); 27 million escudos for administrative services (including approximately 10 million for education, in contrast to 9 million in 1963); 3.5 million for national defence, 9.2 million for maritime services and 13.4 million for various general expenditures.

200. As reported previously (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, paras. 35 and 113), a total of 500 million escudos is to be invested in Cape Verde under the Transitional Development Plan 1965-1967. The Plan originally envisaged that about half of the total investments would be from external sources, mainly for the development of fisheries. It appears that for 1965 at least, the only source of investments was from funds provided by Portugal.

201. In February 1965 (Order 7,224, 27 February), Portugal made available to the Territory a "reimbursable subsidy" (subsídio reembolsável da Metrópole) of 73 million escudos for various projects under the Transitional Development Plan. Of the total, more than half (43 million escudos) was for improvement of transport and communications. The other main items were: agriculture, 8.5 million; industry, 5.5 million; health and welfare, 6 million; education, 2.5 million; housing and local improvements, 3.3 million; and energy, 2 million escudos. Fisheries, in which Krupp of the Federal Republic of Germany is still reported to be interested but has not yet committed any investments, was allocated 1.5 million escudos.

202. In July 1965, Cape Verde also received a loan of 3,075,000 escudos from Portugal under the provisions governing the Territory's budget (Decree 40,712 of 1 August 1956). This was allocated as follows: roads, 2,008,000; ports, 20,000; airport, 764,000; education, 224,000; and health, 54,000.

203. At the end of the year the Ministry of Finance in Portugal was authorized to grant the Territory loans needed for the implementation of the Transitional Development Plan; such loans were to be without interest (see para. 57 above). In January 1966 it was reported that total loans to Cape Verde for 1965 amounted to 101 million escudos.

204. Cape Verde chronically suffers from drought and in the past has experienced serious famines. Under the Transitional Development Plan investments in the agricultural sector are concentrated on irrigation, reafforestation, and reorganization of farms so as to make the best use possible of the available water supplies. During 1965 the special team which had been set up to improve agriculture was replaced by a temporary Brigada Técnica de Fomento Agrário with increased staff. This new team is to promote agricultural co-operatives, draw up plans for land use, ensure the maximum use of existing and new irrigation installations, and encourage reafforestation and soil conservation. The team comprises three agricultural officers, one veterinary doctor, thirteen technical personnel and other administrative staff. In August (Order 21,473, 17 August) a special credit of 690,000 escudos was made for setting up a large irrigated collective farm.

205. The traditional crops of the Territory are maize, beans and sugar cane. The only export crops of any importance are purqueira (physic-nut), coffee and bananas. In 1959 (Decree 42,390, 15 July) coffee growing was made compulsory in certain irrigated areas on the islands of Santiago, Santo Antao and Fogo to increase the Territory's exports. At the time the measure led to a protest to the Overseas Ministry that this interfered with the food production of the Territory; this protest was rejected by the Overseas Ministry as groundless because in the case of Santiago and Santo Antão the compulsory measures applied only to one quarter of the irrigated farming land in the areas marked for coffee growing; in the case of Fogo where rain is more plentiful, although all designated areas had to be planted with coffee, the farmers none the less were able to grow food crops between the coffee trees.

206. According to available information, in 1965 the Territory imported rice and was authorized to import 12,000 tons of maize from Angola free of import duties (Order 7,209, 13 February).

207. Since 1962, the Portuguese Government has sponsored the settlement in Angola of a considerable number of people from Cape Verde, partly as a means of solving the problem of over-population in the islands. The present population of Cape Verde is estimated to be approximately 215,000 and is expected to increase to about 268,500 by 1970. According to official information, the latter figure would be 100,000 persons more than the Territory could support. As reported previously (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex II, paras. 178-180), the settlers are chosen from rural workers in Cape Verde with special aptitudes for farming and the conditions for their settlement are different from those for farmers migrating from Portugal. The Cape Verde heads of family migrate first; they may not be more than forty-five years old and are organized into groups under a cabo chefe. The rest of the family may proceed to Angola only after the head of family has been able to provide for their installation. Some of the migrating groups are settled as peasant farmers, but others are apparently sponsored as rural workers, of whom the authorities in Angola consider the Territory to be in need.

208. There are no trade statistics available for 1965. During the first three quarters of 1964, the main exports, comprising mainly pozzuolana earth (agglomerated silica-containing earth used for cement and concrete manufacture), salt, fresh, canned and brine pickled tuna, amounted to 1.7 million escudos. Imports for the same period comprised mainly fresh, condensed and evaporated milk, 1.1 million escudos; butter, 1.4 million escudos; and potatoes, 1.2 million escudos.

Education

209. The latest available education statistics for the Territory are for 1963 (Boletim Geral do Ultramar, May 1965). In that year, there were 307 primary schools (183 government and 124 private) with 378 teachers and 18,593 pupils; five secondary schools (2 liceus and 3 technical professional schools) with 75 teachers and 1,491 students, of whom 1,076 were in the two liceus. In addition there were 2 elementary vocational schools with 7 teachers and 83 students. There were also 185 civil service personnel in training.

6. São Tomé and Príncipe

Constitutional and political

210. For the election of the Head of State in July 1965, the Territory was represented in the electoral college by five members as follows: the deputy to the National Assembly, the member in the Corporative Chamber, one representative of municipal councils, and two members from the Territory's Legislative Council.

211. For the elections to the National Assembly, which were by direct suffrage (see para. 32), the number of registered voters was 5,024 or about 10 per cent of the total population. Of these, 3,804 persons voted, representing 76.6 per cent of the electorate.

Economic and financial

212. For 1965, total expenditure on the armed services for São Tomé and Príncipe was 8.8 million escudos. This included an allocation of 5.9 million escudos for the army, of which 2 million was derived from the Territory's own budget, 2.7 million from Portugal and 1.2 million from the Overseas Military Defence Fund; expenditure on the navy and air force amounted to 2.3 million and 627,100 escudos respectively. The Territory's share in these defence expenditures was 3 million escudos.

213. The new airport in São Tomé, which was completed in 1964 and can be used by jet planes in an emergency, is jointly maintained and operated by funds from Angola, Mozambique and São Tomé and Príncipe (Decreto 45,745, 1 June). In 1964 the share of costs was 1 million escudos each for the larger Territories and 300,000 escudos for the islands. For 1966 the cost is estimated at 4 million escudos, of which Angola and Mozambique are each to pay 1.7 million escudos and the Territory 600,000 escudos.

214. There is no information on the 1965 budget or the estimated budget for 1966. As in the case of Cape Verde, whereas ordinary revenue increased from 59 million escudos to 67 million escudos between 1960 and 1963, the total budget, including extraordinary revenue, showed an opposite trend, decreasing from 117 million escudos in 1961 to 111.7 million escudos in 1962 and 104.5 million escudos in 1963.

215. Although there was a budgetary surplus in each of the years 1961-1963, development expenditures under the extraordinary budget decreased from 51.8 million escudos in 1961 to 40.4 million in 1962 and 34.5 million in 1963. Between 1961 and 1963 the public debt servicing charge rose by 30 per cent from 6.1 million to 7.8 million escudos. Expenditure on public education services rose from 6.2 per cent to 6.8 per cent of the ordinary budget but public health services dropped from 22.8 per cent to 11.8 per cent.

216. As reported previously (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, paras. 35, 120 and 121), a total of 180 million escudos is to be invested in the Territory under the Transitional Development Plan 1965-1967. However, as the Territory has no financial resources of its own, the Plan envisages that the total amount is to be financed from the Central Government of Portugal.

217. During 1965, special allocations amounting to some 21 million escudos were made to finance various projects under the Transitional Development Plan. Of this total, 7.1 million escudos was for ports, navigation and transportation; 2.9 million escudos for electric power; 5.7 million escudos for housing and local improvements; over 2 million escudos for cartography; 1.1 million for health and welfare; and 750,000 for education.

218. At the end of the year the Ministry of Finance was authorized to grant the Territory each year the necessary funds for the implementation of the Transitional Development Plan. In January 1966 it was reported that loans to the Territory amounted to 36 million escudos for the year 1965. Among other measures, a Technical Committee for Planning and Economic Integration was set up to co-ordinate development projects, and the Territorial Government was authorized to establish a special loan fund (Caixa de Crédito de São Tomé e Príncipe) (Decree 46,358, 28 May 1965) to provide loans for agriculture, industry (including fishing and mining) and building construction, including housing. This fund is to be financed from the Territory's own resources and it is also hoped that it will provide a channel for mobilizing local savings. One of the main objectives of the fund is to encourage the introduction of new crops for export, especially bananas and pineapple, in view of the continuing drop in world market prices of the traditional export crops of the Territory.

219. The Territory's principal export crops are cocoa, coffee, palm oil, coconuts and copra. However, as reported in the Transitional Development Plan, cocoa production, grown on about 27,000 ha. remained almost stationary between 1953 and 1962; coffee which is grown on some 2,500 ha., slightly decreased, especially during the period 1960-1962; coconuts (grown on 4,000 ha.) and palm oil production in 1962 were 66 per cent and 38 per cent respectively of the volume produced in 1953. Although about 90 per cent of the production is from large plantations, output has remained low partly because of exhaustion and an insufficient rate of renewal of the palms.

220. In 1965, three lectures in the University Extension course in Lisbon on the Overseas Territories drew attention to the urgent need in São Tomé and Príncipe to improve the agricultural situation and to reorganize land use in order to increase productivity and reduce costs of production. The possibility of large-scale banana growing is under study, but it is not yet certain that it would be sufficiently profitable.

221. The islands also have a population problem. The Transitional Development Plan estimates that only 3,500 persons are employed on the plantations and about 20,000 persons are engaged in agriculture on their own account. As the population of the Territory is expected to increase from an estimated 50,200 in 1965 to 66,500 in 1975, and the active population from 28,100 to 37,200, the Transitional Development Plan envisages opening up new opportunities in agriculture through changes in the labour regulations. There is also a project for settling 200 families over the period 1965-1967 on available land on the island of São Tomé. The cost of settling each family is estimated at 70,000 escudos.

222. In March 1966, one of the deputies told the National Assembly in Lisbon that, despite the loans made by the Central Government, the Territory was finding it difficult to implement the Development Plan, and might not be able to fulfil the targets because of the financial burden involved. It was suggested that the Central Government should relieve the Territory of the interest charges on the loans granted to it for development.

Education

223. The latest available statistics concerning education in the Territory are for 1963. School facilities then included 30 primary schools (14 government and 16 private) with 120 teachers and 4,992 students; one secondary school (liceu) with 37 teachers, and 583 students; and one elementary vocational school with 9 teachers and 91 students. The total school enrolment was 5,732, including 66 pupils in kindergarten.

7. Macau

Constitutional and political

224. At the presidential elections in July, the Territory was represented by five members in the electoral college; the deputy to the National Assembly, the member in the Corporative Chamber, one representative of municipal councils and two members from the Territory's Legislative Council.

225. Macau has one member in the National Assembly. There is no information on the results of the election to the National Assembly in November.

Economic and financial

226. For 1965, total expenditure on the armed services for Macau was 24.7 million escudos. The allocation for the army was 23.9 million escudos, of which 13.3 million was from the Territory's own budget, 1.3 million escudos from 'autonomous services', 4.7 million from Portugal and 3.2 million from the Overseas Military Defence Fund. The allocation for naval forces was 829,800 escudos from the territorial budget (Orders 21,077, 21,179, 21,180). The total share of these costs borne by the Territory was 14.2 million escudos. In September 1965 it was reported that there were some 4,000 troops from Angola and Mozambique in the Territory. There is no information on the 1965 budget and the 1966 estimated budget. In contrast to Cape Verde and São Tomé and Príncipe, both the ordinary and extraordinary revenues increased during the period 1960-1963. The ordinary revenue increased from 113.1 million escudos in 1960 to 195.1 million in 1963 and the extraordinary revenue from 12.5 million to 42 million escudos. During this period ordinary expenditure rose from 103.4 million to 167.2 million escudos; public education expenditure doubled, and public health expenditure increased by more than 50 per cent, from 7.6 million escudos to 11.6 million escudos. In 1963, the Territory's public debt service charge was slightly over one per cent of the ordinary expenditure, education was 3.3 per cent and public health about 7 per cent.

227. During 1965 the defence tax in Macau was abolished (Decree Law 46,167, 20 January) and in its place 25 per cent of the imposto complementar was earmarked as a receipt of the Overseas Military Defence Fund.

228. As reported previously (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, paras. 35 and 126), a total of 660 million escudos is to be invested in the Territory, with almost one third allocated to develop tourism. In contrast to the other smaller Territories, the Transitional Development Plan envisages that the Territory will be able to finance the entire programme without recourse to external sources. Eighty per cent of the total is expected to come from private sources and 18 per cent (120 million escudos) is to be financed from the Territory's budget (20 million from the ordinary budget and 100 million from the extraordinary budget).

229. In recent years tourism has increased; in 1964 the Territory had over one million visitors. A considerable number of new industries have been established in Macau, and though it is reported that foreign trade has increased and exports exceeded 600 million escudos in 1964, there are as yet no detailed figures available. Gold remains an important item in Macau's trade, and in 1966 it was reported that 1.4 million ounces were imported. The tax on gold was increased in 1965 and now provides the Government with a guaranteed minimum revenue of $US1.4 million a year. In 1965 total imports, including gold, were valued at $US46 million, and exports at $US21 million. The main exports are textiles and fish.

Education

230. The latest available school statistics are for 1963. There were 43 primary schools (14 government and 29 private) with 403 teachers and 13,775 students; 13 academic secondary schools (one government and 12 private) with 258 teachers and 4,705 students; 3 technical vocational schools with 34 teachers and 521 students. In addition the Chinese Community had 158 primary schools with 36,737 students, 35 secondary schools with 5,205 students and one special school with 18 students. The total school enrolment in 1963 was 59,714 which included 3,977 children in kindergarten and 105 civil service personnel in training.

8. Timor

Constitutional and political

231. At the presidential elections in July, the Territory was represented by five members in the electoral college: the deputy to the National Assembly, the member in the Corporative Chamber, one representative of municipal councils and two members from the Territory's Legislative Council.

232. Timor has one representative in the National Assembly. There is no information on the size of the electorate or the number of persons who voted in the November elections to the National Assembly.

Economic and financial

233. For 1965 total expenditure on the armed services for the Territory was 27.8 million escudos. The allocation for the army was 26.1 million escudos, of which 3.5 million was from the territorial budget, 22 million from Portugal and 534,500 from the Overseas Military Defence Fund. The allocation for the navy was 1.7 million, of which the Territory's share was 1 million escudos. The total cost to the Territory for the armed forces was 4.5 million escudos.

234. There is no information available on the Territory's 1965 budget or the estimated budget for 1966. In 1964, the ordinary budget was 70 million escudos compared with 66.5 million in 1963, 65.2 million in 1962 and 54.6 million in 1961. However, in 1964 only 59 million escudos was from the Territory's own revenues and the balance was made up from budgetary surpluses of previous years and subsidies from Angola, Mozambique and Macau.

235. In each of the years 1961-1963 the Territory's extraordinary revenue, which was nearly all used for basic development projects, was almost as much as the total ordinary revenue. The Territory has very little public debt and the debt servicing charge in 1963 was less than 1.5 per cent of the ordinary expenditure. The Governor of the Territory stated at the opening of the session of the Legislative Council in 1965 that the Territory's small resources are insufficient to provide adequately for its administrative and development needs. Without outside subsidies, the Territory could only afford the most basic administrative services.

236. In 1963 the cost of maintaining armed forces in the Territory was 5.1 million escudos, about 8 per cent of the total ordinary expenditure; direct expenditure on public education services was 2 million escudos and subsidies to the Catholic Missions for education to 3.1 million escudos. Public health expenditure was 6.4 million, or just over 10 per cent of the total ordinary expenditure.

237. As reported previously (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, paras. 35 and 129-132), under the Transitional Development Plan 1965-1967, a total of 270 million escudos is to be invested. When the Plan was drawn up it was originally envisaged that the Territory would have a 5 million escudos budgetary surplus at the end of 1964 and an additional 27 million escudos from surpluses between 1965 and 1967, but because of prior commitments on these funds, only 11 million escudos would be available for development projects. It was accordingly decided that the entire amount of 270 million escudos would have to be financed by the Central Government of Portugal.

238. In June 1965 a special allocation of 12 million escudos was made in the form of subsidies from the Central Government to the Territory for various projects under the Transitional Development Plan. Of the total, 10 million was for transport and communications including: roads, 1.3 million escudos; ports and navigation, 4 million; telecommunications, 4.8 million; 711,000 for agriculture, forestry and livestock development; 526,000 for industries; 272,000 for education; and 73,000 for public health projects.

239. Legislation authorizing the Minister of Finance to grant loans to the Territory for the Transitional Development Plan was approved at the end of 1965 (see para. 57 above). In January 1966 it was reported that Portugal had made a loan to the Territory of 56 million escudos for the implementation of the Transitional Development Plan in 1965. This represented less than two thirds of the average annual investments envisaged under the Plan.

240. The Territory's major exports are coffee, copra and rubber, which respectively made up 73, 11 and 9 per cent of the value of the total exports in 1962. Because of increased imports, especially for construction, in 1964 the Territory had a trade deficit of 22 million escudos. A contributory cause of this trade deficit was the drop in coffee exports to 1,332 tons, compared with 2,523 tons in 1963. In addition, due to bad weather and a poor harvest, the Territory had had to import some 1,000 tons of maize and 40 tons of rice.

241. As was pointed out in the Transitional Development Plan, the Territory has very few industries and other enterprises apart from those engaged in trading, and as a consequence only some 3,000-6,000 persons (out of the total population of 517,000 at the 1960 census) are in paid employment outside the traditional sector. To encourage agricultural development, in 1965 the land concession legislation of 1961 (see A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex II) was extended to Timor (Order 21,283 of 11 May). Land concessions may now be granted free of charge to settlers as well as to military personnel on indefinite leave (militares licenciados) even if they are not stationed in the Territory.

242. In November 1965 the Timor Government was authorized to set up a special farm credit fund (Caixa Agro-Pecuária de Timor) to promote medium and long-term loans for agriculture and livestock schemes. Exceptionally, the Fund may also grant short-term loans as working capital. The Fund is also to provide other services such as rentals of farm equipment and breeding stock.

243. In December 1965, one of the deputies told the National Assembly that although subsidies and loans from the Central Government had provided the Territory with certain facilities, including the international airport at Baucau, which is reported to have cost $US5 million, the expansion of the port at Dili, electricity supply for the capital of the Territory and new roads, the Territory was still faced with serious economic problems. He suggested that greater efforts were needed, especially, for instance, to increase tourism.

Education

244. In 1963 there were 165 primary schools (120 government and 45 private) with 494 teachers and 16,500 students; there was one secondary school with 23 teachers and 368 students. In addition there were 18 primary and one secondary schools outside the official school system, with 1,423 pupils. The total enrolment in 1963 was 18,426 which included 12 pupils in kindergarten, 79 civil service personnel in training, and 44 ecclesiastical students.

C. CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

INTRODUCTION

245. The Special Committee considered the Territories under Portuguese administration at its 418th, 419th, 420th, 427th, 436th, 450th-455th meetings held in Africa between 25 May 1966 and 22 June 1966.

246. On the question of refugees from the Territories under Portuguese administration, the Special Committee had before it a note by the Secretariat (A/AC.109/L.293 and Add.1) concerning the situation with regard to refugees from Angola, Mozambique and Guinea under Portuguese administration, and the measures taken to extend material and other assistance to them by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, specialized agencies concerned, and Member States in response to operative paragraph 5 of the resolution on the Territories under Portuguese administration adopted by the Special Committee on 10 June 1965 (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, para. 430) and resolutions 2107 (XX) and 2040 (XX) adopted by the General Assembly on 21 December 1965 and 7 December 1965 respectively.

247. During its consideration of this item, the Special Committee had before it, as its 452nd meeting, a document (A/AC.109/168) containing a note dated 7 June 1966 from the Permanent Mission of Portugal to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting comments on the working paper prepared by the Secretariat on the Territories under Portuguese administration.

248. Following a statement by the Representative of the Secretary-General concerning the circumstances in which the note was circulated as an official document, the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania proposed that the Special Committee should request the Secretary-General to withdraw from circulation the document in question and that in future similar communications be not circulated as official Committee documents without prior consultation with the Committee.

249. Speaking in favour of the proposal, several representatives pointed out that in its note the Portuguese Government had again advanced arguments regarding the status of the Territories under Portuguese administration which had been specifically rejected by the United Nations organs concerned. They also stated that addressing the Secretary-General instead of the Special Committee was an expedient by the Portuguese Government to divert attention away from its repeated violations of Charter principles and United Nations resolutions concerning the Territories. Further, by accusing the Secretariat of inaccuracies, misleading statements and political bias, the Portuguese Government was in effect attacking the Committee while at the same time refusing to acknowledge the validity of its work and to co-operate with it. One of these representatives suggested that the Committee should also recommend that the General Assembly adopt the procedure proposed by the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania with regard to similar communications.

250. In opposing the proposal, some other representatives stated that they believed in the right of every Member State to have its communications circulated as official documents regardless of the acceptability to other Member States of the views contained therein. In their opinion, to depart from established practice in this respect would constitute a dangerous precedent which could operate to the disadvantage of all delegations.

251. At the same meeting, the Committee adopted the proposal of the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania by a roll-call vote of 15 to 4, with 2 abstentions.

WRITTEN PETITIONS AND HEARINGS

252. The Special Committee circulated the following written petitions concerning the Territories under Portuguese administration:²⁶

Document No.	Petitioner
Angola
Mr. Nzoimbengene, Information Bureau, Mouvement de défense des intérêts de l'Angola (MDIA)	A/AC.109/PET.427
Messrs. Lukoki Lunzinga, Munanza Fernandes, Tshingani Mingie li, Nto-Bako Angola Party	A/AC.109/PET.428
Mr. Lukoki Lunzinga, Nto-Bako Angola Party	A/AC.109/PET.428/ Add.1
Messrs. Matondo Afonso-Proença, President, Makumbi Edouard, Secretary-General, Putuilo José Milton, Director of Foreign Affairs, Front patriotique pour l'indépendance du Kongo dit Portugais (FPIKP)	A/AC.109/PET.429
Mr. José Paulo Chiringueno, President, Partido Nacional Africano (PNA)	A/AC.109/PET.430
Mr. Carlos Pinto Nunes Vunzi, General Chairman, União Progressista Nacional de Angola (UPRONA)	A/AC.109/PET.447

²⁶ The following petitions were circulated after the Special Committee had adopted a resolution concerning Territories under Portuguese administration (see para. 675 below) at its 455th meeting on 22 June 1966: A/AC.109/PET.428/Add.1, A/AC.109/PET.549, A/AC.109/PET.550, A/AC.109/PET.567 and A/AC.109/PET.568.

Petitioner	Document No.	Petitioner	Document No.
Messrs. Carlos Pinto Nunes Vunzi, General Chairman, David Muanza, General Secretary, União Progressista Nacional de Angola (UPRONA)	A/AC.109/PET.447/Add.1	Territories under Portuguese administration
Mr. Daniel Julio Chipenda, representative, Movimento Popular de Libertação de Angola (MPLA)	A/AC.109/PET.460	Mr. J. D'Assunção, União de Portugueses Anti-Colonialistas en Marrocos	A/AC.109/PET.549
Mr. Luis d'Almeida, representative in Algeria, Mouvement populaire de libération de l'Angola (MPLA)	A/AC.109/PET.460/Add.1	São Tomé and Príncipe
Messrs. François Lele, General Chairman, Fernando António, Deputy Chairman, Kuta François, Secretary for Education, Nto-Bako Angola Party	A/AC.109/PET.471	Mr. Virgílio Sousa Carvalho, Comité de Libertação de S. Tomé e Príncipe (CLSTP)	A/AC.109/PET.512
Mesdames Anne Mfidi, President General, Marie Luyindula, Vice-President General, Rose-line N'Simba, Secretary-General, Ida Mavinduanga, representative, Union des Femmes Angolaises (UFA)	A/AC.109/PET.472	Mr. Mário de Andrade, Conferência das Organizações Nacionalistas das Colônias Portuguesas (CONCP)	A/AC.109/PET.510
Mr. José M. E. B. Ervedosa	A/AC.109/PET.509	253. The Special Committee heard the following petitioners concerning Angola, Mozambique and Portuguese Guinea:
Mr. Mário Moutinho de Pádua, Frente Patriótica de Libertação Nacional (FPLN)	A/AC.109/PET.513	Angola
Mr. Manuel Sertório, Junta Revolucionária Portuguesa, Frente Patriótica de Libertação Nacional (FPLN)	A/AC.109/PET.513/Add.1	Mr. Daniel Júlio Chipenda, Movimento Popular de Libertação de Angola (MPLA), representative in Mar es Salaam (A/AC.109/PET.460)	420th
Mr. Johnny Eduardo, representative, Gouvernement révolutionnaire de l'Angola en exil (GRAE)	A/AC.109/PET.514	Mr. Luis d'Almeida, Mouvement Populaire de Libération de l'Angola (MPLA), representative in Algiers (A/AC.109/PET.460/Add.1)	453rd-454th
Messrs. Luis Ranque Franque, President, and Antonio Eduardo Sozinho Zau, Secretary for Foreign Relations, Front pour la libération de l'enclave de Cabinda (FLEC)	A/AC.109/PET.567	Mr. José M. E. B. Ervedosa, Frente Patriótica de Libertação Nacional (FPLN), (A/AC.109/PET.509)	450th
Associação dos Conguenses da Expressão Portuguesa, Ngwizani A Kongo (NGWIZAKO)	A/AC.109/PET.568	Messrs. Mário Moutinho de Pádua and Manuel Aligre, Frente Patriótica de Libertação Nacional (FPLN), (A/AC.109/PET.513 and Add.1)	454th
Mozambique		Mr. Johnny Eduardo, Gouvernement révolutionnaire de l'Angola en exil (GRAE), (A/AC.109/PET.514)	454th
Mr. Uria T. Simango, Vice-President, Frente de Libertação de Moçambique (FRE-LIMO)	A/AC.109/PET.459	Mozambique
Mr. Narciso Mbule, Secretary for External Affairs, Union Démocratique Nationale de Mozambique (UDENAMO)	A/AC.109/PET.481	Messrs. Eduardo Mondlane and Marcelino dos Santos, Frente de Libertação de Moçambique (FRE-LIMO), (A/AC.109/PET.459)	418th-419th
Mr. R. M. Mjumbe, Secretary-General, Mozambique African National Union (MANU)	A/AC.109/PET.550	Mr. Narciso Mbule, União Democrática Nacional de Moçambique (UDENAMO), (A/AC.109/PET.481)	436th
Guinea, called Portuguese Guinea		Guinea, called Portuguese Guinea
Mrs. Dulce Almada-Duarte, Partido Africano da Independência da Guiné e Cabo Verde (PAIGC)	A/AC.109/PET.511	Mr. Amílcar Cabral, Secretary-General, Partido Africano da Independência da Guiné e Cabo Verde (PAIGC), and four associates: Mrs. Joyce Lussu, Messrs. Justin Vieyra, Isídio Romeco, and Piero Nelli (A/AC.109/PET.511 and Add.1)	451st-452nd
Mr. Abílio Duarte, representative, Partido Africano da Independência da Guiné e Cabo Verde (PAIGC)	A/AC.109/PET.511/Add.1	São Tomé and Príncipe
Mr. Gard Chaliand	A/AC.109/PET.516	Mr. Thomas Medeiros, Comité de Libertação de São Tomé e Príncipe (CLSTP), (A/AC.109/PET.512)	454th
		Other
		Mr. Mário de Andrade, Conferência das Organizações Nacionalistas das Colônias Portuguesas (CONCP), (A/AC.109/PET.510)	450th

Petitioners concerning Angola

254. Mr. Chipenda, speaking on behalf of MPLA, stated that in the present phase of the struggle for the immediate and complete independence of Angola, the whole Angolan population looked to MPLA for its salvation. MPLA was the only nationalist movement directing the armed struggle in Angola to destroy the colonial system, to defend the people against the atrocities of the Portuguese army and establish a régime controlled by the working peasant masses who constituted the overwhelming majority of the population.

255. It was true that MPLA's principal field of action was the national territory. The whole orientation and planning of its activity reflected the demands of the liberation struggle.

256. The MPLA leaders having given priority to the development of activities inside rather than outside the country, a systematic campaign was being waged to mobilize and politicize the masses. To hasten the process, MPLA had created the Centre d'instruction révolutionnaire (CIR) to provide its members with politico-military training and a thorough knowledge of their country with a view to training revolutionary cadres and winning over more of the masses to their cause. Depending on their aptitudes, the persons thus trained would be called on to undertake university studies, would continue their secondary studies only, or would become direct participants in the politico-military struggle. The MPLA had also established political commissariats to work in its guerrilla units and co-operate with the traditional authorities of the people.

257. As the illiteracy rate in Angola was 99 per cent, in fighting for the total and complete independence of their country MPLA was also trying to eliminate illiteracy as soon as possible. It had procured textbooks, established schools and planned to give higher education to those best qualified to benefit from it in MPLA itself. MPLA had already sent almost 350 young Angolans to secondary and higher educational establishments abroad to ensure the training of its future cadres. The revolution proposed to transform all structures set up by colonialism. Only by eliminating illiteracy among the Angolan people could that objective be attained.

258. Despite the prohibition of all political and revolutionary activity imposed by the repressive forces of Portuguese colonialism on the Angolan population, MPLA had succeeded in establishing and dispersing throughout the national territory numerous action committees which engaged in the clandestine work of mobilization, politicization, sabotage, reporting the movements or manoeuvres of the colonialist army and supporting the guerrillas.

259. The military action proper was going on mainly in the Cabinda district, in the north of Angola, where MPLA units were engaged in guerrilla operations, harassment and sabotage to hold down the Portuguese Forces. In the Cabinda district the guerrillas completely controlled almost 30 per cent of the territory, including the zones situated between Miconge and Luali. There were also outposts deeper in the interior, particularly in the Nambuangongo and Dembos regions, where commandos tried to intercept new enemy columns and supplies on their way to the Portuguese forces operating in the Cabinda region.

260. During the past year, the MPLA guerrilla units had carried out over 300 actions against the colonialist troops in the Cabinda district; 2,165 enemy soldiers had been killed and more than 300 wounded; 7 traitors who had served the Portuguese colonialist forces as guides in the bush had been eliminated, and 53 military and civil vehicles had been completely destroyed. P-19 radios of United States make, G3 and FN weapons of Belgian make, UZI machine-guns of Israel make²⁷ and other weapons manufactured in the Federal Republic of Germany, as well as a large quantity of war matériel of various origins, had fallen into the hands of the MPLA fighters.

261. It was estimated that there were 50,000 Portuguese forces in Angola including Africans, but the disarray in the enemy ranks was growing daily, as was proved by the numerous desertion attempts, which forced the enemy security police to keep a very strict watch. Several Angolans had succeeded in deserting from the colonialist army and were now serving among the MPLA revolutionary troops. Only five more African soldiers of the Portuguese army had been reported as deserters.

262. In an attempt to stop the gradual escape of the Angolan people to the liberated zones under MPLA control, the Portuguese army was now trying to settle the people around its military barracks, which to some extent impeded the MPLA troops. MPLA was making successful efforts to overcome that difficulty.

263. As a result of MPLA's guerrilla activities, the Portuguese colonialists had been forced to abandon their forestry operations at Cabinda, and this had seriously affected their economic situation. The saw-mills were at a standstill, and their operatives were now looking for work in the large towns of Angola.

264. The Angolan populations integrated in the liberated zones and the refugees took an active part in the struggle, either by constituting people's militias, or by participating in agriculture in those zones. Other groups helped the information networks and took part in the sabotage of colonialist enterprises.

265. To meet the requirements of the liberation struggle, MPLA was doing everything possible to step up the military training of new members both in the liberated zones and in friendly countries, thanks to which its military strength was growing considerably. The essential conditions and the material means required for that purpose more or less existed. But the lack of freedom of action in the countries bordering on Angola and the impossibility of transporting weapons and men through those countries were preventing the creation of new battle areas and, in consequence, the extension of the national liberation struggle to the whole of Angola.

266. The Portuguese colonialists had recently strengthened their repressive measures. They had stepped up their military training with the aid of their allies, already well known in Angola by the acts of banditry perpetrated against the local population.

267. Press and radio continued to appeal to the settlers to take part in training, repeating the proverb: "Forewarned is forearmed". The training of civilian volunteer paratroopers, intended to protect the Portuguese settlers, had also been stepped up.

268. At the same time Portugal was still trying to implement a policy of settlement in Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea. Its aim was to turn each of those countries into a sort of new Brazil. A law enacted in 1961 made provisions for European families to go and settle the overseas territories. Numerous nationals of other countries were to be or already had been settled alongside the Portuguese settlers. According to some estimates, about 10,000 Portuguese left Portugal every year for Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea. Settlers sent to Angola were offered land and all the necessary facilities to farm it. In the two principal settlement regions, thousands of settlers had seized the best lands by force, leaving wretched Angolan areas which were far from sufficient to sustain the indigenous population. The settlers were established mainly in Madale and Ansela and were assisted by foreign technicians. Portugal had concluded an agreement to that effect with the Federal Republic of Germany, whose nationals enjoyed very great influence in Angola.

²⁷ See letters dated 12 September and 25 October 1966 from the Permanent Representative of Israel to the United Nations addressed to the Chairman of the Special Committee (A/AC.109/212).

269. Although elections had been held in 1965 to the National Assembly, in view of the way elections were conducted in Portugal and Angola no importance should be attached to the results. In every case they were a Portuguese manoeuvre designed to give a false idea of stability of the Salazar régime. Actually all forms of struggle and political organization were forbidden in Angola. The fascist police (PIDE) had been introduced in Angola, where it infiltrated the people to spy on them and to try to learn the secrets of their activities on behalf of liberation.

270. In the towns, the prisons were filled with Angolan patriots; the colonialists had recently arrested 400 Angolans in the towns of Luanda, Lobito, Benguela and Nova-Lisboa. In April five boys and two girls accused of being MPLA members had been arrested and tried. Three of them had been given prison sentences ranging from three and a half to eight and a half years. It was the same in Portugal. Blood flowed in Salazar's prisons. Two freedom fighters had had to be committed to psychiatric hospitals. Three others had been condemned to prison sentences ranging from three and a half to eight and a half years. The crimes of PIDE, as they cruelly persecuted the people to prevent them from taking part in the struggle for independence, were beyond reckoning.

271. All those repressive measures had had no influence on the Angolan people, who were only too well aware of the enemy's intentions. The Angolan people continued to fight vigorously for the national independence of Angola.

272. There was another extremely important aspect of the struggle which went beyond the purely national framework: the close co-operation between MPLA and the revolutionary organizations of the other Portuguese colonies in the Conferência das Organizações Nacionalistas das Colónias Portuguesas (CONCP). That body, to which only truly revolutionary organizations genuinely representing the peoples of the Portuguese colonies belonged, now constituted a powerful force in the fight for the liberation of Angola, so-called Portuguese Guinea, Mozambique and São Tomé and Príncipe. CONCP acted as a catalyst, prompting the popular forces to unite in the struggle against Portuguese colonialism and at the same time strengthening domestic unity. For the first time in the history of the liberation movements, MPLA, PAIGC, FRELIMO and CLSTP presented a solid and united bloc.

273. It seemed strange that a small country like Portugal could maintain so vast a colonial empire, where it was now fighting on three fronts. In fact, the situation was explained by the massive support which the imperialist countries of NATO were giving the Portuguese Government. As was known, the Federal Republic of Germany, the United Kingdom, France, Belgium and the United States were interested in exploiting the wealth of the Portuguese colonies, particularly Angola. The Portuguese colonial domination enabled them to continue and even intensify their policy of plundering the country's wealth.

274. The imperialist countries' assistance to Portugal took two principal forms: direct assistance to Portugal in its policy of repression, and sabotage of the national liberation movement.

275. The direct assistance, which enabled the Portuguese Government to confront the national liberation struggle in its colonies, took three principal forms: military support, political-diplomatic support and economic support.

276. The war matériel (aircraft, napalm bombs, tanks, weapons of all kinds, etc.) used by Portugal came from the Federal Republic of Germany, the United States, the United Kingdom, France and Belgium. In part that assistance was provided through NATO, since Portugal as a member of NATO has a right to military assistance from that organization; in part it was provided under bilateral agreements between Portugal and its allies. Under cover of assistance to a member country of NATO, the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany were thus providing large quantities of matériel to the Portuguese colonialists.

277. The politico-military support given Portugal by its allies could be seen, for example, in the United Nations, where the United States, France and the United Kingdom sabotaged the resolutions, adopted by an overwhelming majority, which condemned Portuguese colonial policy; it was also displayed in the international organizations where those Powers sought to prevent the adoption of measures against Portugal; it was further revealed by the powerful pressure brought to bear on the countries adjacent to the Portuguese colonies to impel them to prohibit the activities of nationalist movements in their territory.

278. As an example, he recalled the hostile attitude adopted by the Democratic Republic of the Congo towards MPLA. Since July 1963 the Congolese authorities had shown by the difficulties they made for MPLA that they took no account of the resolutions adopted by the Organization of African Unity. That organization, meeting in regular session at Accra from 21 to 25 October 1965, had adopted a resolution asking all States bordering on the Portuguese colonies to grant greater freedom of action and movement to the men and matériel necessary for the rapid success of the liberation movements.

279. Replying to questions, the petitioner said that the military and political co-operation between the African colonialist Powers was becoming ever closer. A tripartite pact had been signed between Portugal, South Africa and Southern Rhodesia. Portugal had been the first country in the world to allow the Government of Ian Smith to establish diplomatic representation in its territory. That fact alone sufficed to show that there actually was an alliance between South Africa, Portugal and Southern Rhodesia. Southern Rhodesia could get petroleum from Angola because Portugal had concluded an alliance with Southern Rhodesia which enabled it to assist the Government of Ian Smith. Moreover, the Portuguese Minister for Foreign Affairs had recently stated that every State Member of the United Nations was free to apply the decisions of the Security Council and the specialized agencies as it thought fit.

280. Moreover, Portugal's allies, including the Federal Republic of Germany, were continuing to give Portugal material and military assistance. The MPLA was in a position to prove the collusion which existed between the Federal Republic of Germany and Portugal, since it had undertaken a thorough study of the question and could point to specific cases of co-operation between those two Powers. The co-operation revealed itself in all spheres. The Federal Republic of Germany had recently given Portugal $40 million. It had sent it sixty military aircraft. It supplied Portugal with large quantities of weapons. It had built a large military base in Portugal, where the instructors were German. It had built hospitals in Portuguese territory where the wounded of the Portuguese army were cared for, and also a large munitions factory near Lisbon whose technicians were German. He would give the Secretariat a document setting forth all those facts, and showing that the Portuguese army received direct technical assistance from the Federal Republic of Germany. The Portuguese Government was able to send troops to Angola to the degree that the Federal Republic of Germany sent German troops to ensure the security of Portugal. The strength of the German forces was difficult to evaluate.

281. As far as economic support was concerned, it was given to the Portuguese Government in exchange for important concessions. That support enabled Portugal to overcome many obstacles, while foreign capital was invested in Portugal and in its colonies. Portugal did not only seek military aid from its allies with which to fight the liberation movements; it was also trying to develop the settler economy.

282. As to the sabotage of the national liberation movement by the imperialist forces, it revealed itself in two principal ways: struggle against the action of the authentic nationalist forces, and support of political groups or individuals attracted by the neo-colonialist compromise and hostile to the armed revolutionary struggle. Imperialism in its multiple forms sought particularly to destroy MPLA or to prevent it from intensifying its struggle for the liberation of Angola.

283. He was convinced that all the international organizations would one day be obliged to support the struggle of his people. He paid a tribute to the efforts of the United Nations and the Special Committee to help the liberation movements. He hoped that the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly would continue its work and oblige States Members of the Organization to comply with the resolutions of the General Assembly. It was true that for the moment certain international organizations were hostile to the liberation movements. The reasons for that hostility were well known and had been described. On the other hand, the Angolan people received the unconditional support of the OAU, the Organization of Afro-Asian Peoples and, since recently, the Tri-continental Conference. The higher deliberative bodies of Africa had come out in favour of MPLA. Thus, the Conference of the Organization of Afro-Asian Solidarity had recognized MPLA as the only valid representative of the Angolan people fighting for national liberation. The same position had been taken by the Tri-continental Conference, which again confirmed that MPLA was recognized as the only revolutionary force in Angola.

284. On 10 June 1965 the United Nations Special Committee on Colonialism had adopted at Dar es Salaam a resolution calling upon all States Members of the United Nations, and "in particular the military allies of Portugal" in the Atlantic Alliance, to refrain from supplying that country with arms and munitions "so long as the Portuguese Government fails to renounce its policy of colonial domination". That resolution had been adopted by 18 votes to 2 (United States and United Kingdom) with 3 abstentions (Australia, Denmark and Italy).

285. As the Portuguese Government continued, MPLA was obliged once again to appeal to the members of the Special Committee to see to it that the decisions of the United Nations concerning the sanctions applicable to Portugal were complied with.

286. MPLA dedicated itself to defending the interests of the peasant and working masses of Angola. MPLA considered that its duty was to intensify the armed struggle, which was the only way of bringing the Angolan people to total and complete independence. It therefore asked the United Nations Special Committee to see to it that all countries bordering on the oppressed territories received material and assistance enabling them to give effective support to all the liberation movements.

287. Mr. D'Almeida, speaking on behalf of MPLA, said that, as the previous petitioners had said practically all that there was to be said about the present situation in Angola, he would not speak at any length on the subject, especially since a draft resolution on the question had already been submitted to the Special Committee.

288. On behalf of his people under arms, however, he wished to express his joy and pride at appearing before the Special Committee on the eternally illustrious soil of Algeria. The Angolan people and MPLA were among those who had derived the greatest benefit from Algeria's devotion to the ideal of national liberation.

289. A people's liberation must, above all, be the work of the people themselves. Liberation from the criminal grip of colonialism and imperialism depended on their spirit, their revolutionary ability and their confidence in themselves. The time for lamentation was past; it was useless to denounce the oppressive régimes, because they paid no heed. The only way of countering colonialism was to inflict mortal blows upon it. The Angolan people did not like war but they would continue to fight to the end, until every inch of Angolan territory was free.

290. Some days earlier, the freedom fighters had extended their front and taken it to the centre and the east of the country. So far the Portuguese forces had met armed resistance in the north only, since the previous May, Angolan troops had blown up several strategic bridges and inflicted serious losses on the Portuguese colonial army. In particular, the freedom fighters had inflicted terrible blows on the Salazar army in the regions where the great foreign mining companies' exploitation of the indigenous people was at its harshest. Those companies maintained Belgian, Portuguese, South African and West German mercenary troops, which terrorized the peasant population.

291. He wished to draw the Special Committee's attention to the permanent danger of South African intervention in Angola. A military pact had been concluded between Verwoerd, Salazar and Ian Smith, all champions of fascism. The pact provided for direct intervention by the signatories in the event of revolutionary activity spreading. The South African daily newspaper The Star of Johannesburg had stated in November 1964 that the defensive system of South Africa on the ground depended at present on the possibilities of local defence in Mozambique, Angola and Southern Rhodesia, and that Africa would certainly not remain inactive if one of those bastions were to be threatened.

292. As if to illustrate the military pact between imperialist criminals, groups of armed police from South West Africa had recently crossed the southern frontier of Angola and carried out massive arrests among the political and military personnel in the area. It was probable that those arrested had subsequently been massacred by the Verwoerd police.

293. His party hoped that, in order to put an end to Portuguese aggression, the Security Council would decide to place a complete embargo on the sale and provision of arms and ammunition to Portugal by its allies and friends. Recently two villages in the Republic of the Congo had been bombed by Portuguese aircraft as a reprisal: in fact, the brother countries on Angola's borders which harboured the leaders of revolutionary movements—Senegal, Guinea and the Republic of the Congo—were all threatened by the Portuguese criminals. For example, in February 1966 Salazar, infuriated that Zambia, Tanzania and Malawi were giving support to the revolutionary movements, had threatened those countries with military intervention.

294. The MPLA also hoped that the United Nations and its specialized agencies, such as UNICEF, WHO, UNESCO and the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, would give refugees and the people of the territories which were already liberated assistance in health, education and economic and social development.

295. In conclusion, he affirmed his faith in the future of the Angolan people, who in the prisons, the bush and the forests of Angola were already building the Angola of tomorrow—a free, democratic and fraternal Angola.

296. Mr. Ervedosa, a member of the Patriotic National Liberation Front of Portugal, speaking as a petitioner from Angola, said that he had spent exactly 663 days in Angola, from 21 April 1961 to 10 February 1963, as an officer of the Portuguese air force. During that time he had acted as assistant operations officer at the headquarters of the Second Regional Air Command (Angola) and, during the last two months of that period, as commander of squadron 91 of Lockheed "Harpoon" PV-2 tactical bombers (Luanda). Although he was, like the overwhelming majority of Portugal professional army staff, apolitical, his awakened conscience had led him into active opposition to the colonial war. Having been denounced by one of his comrades, he had been illegally discharged from the army and kept in custody for eight and a half months in the Aljube political prison at Lisbon during the inquiry. As the political police had been unable to discover political motives for his act of rebellion, he had not even been tried.

297. The Patriotic National Liberation Front of Portugal was an organization which was composed of Portuguese opponents of fascism and colonialism of varying political views. He had not joined that organization until he had emigrated clandestinely from Portugal with the intention of actively opposing the colonial war and bearing witness to all the facts which had led him to put into practice the grave decisions which had ended his army career.

298. He would confine himself to the facts he had ascertained directly, without going into detail. Nevertheless, in the day-to-day contact he had had with the social environment in which he had lived, the evidence he had been able to gather was both varied and eloquent; it was, generally speaking, in the form of personal confidences and such testimony was both convincing and necessarily anonymous.

299. He wished to present to the Committee the testimony of people who had experienced the war in Angola and had learnt in Angola to detest war.

300. It was true that all the horrors, all the crimes committed in Angola by the Portuguese fascists could not be described otherwise than in statements in which subjective considerations and the weight of the evidence were contradictory, but the internal revulsion, the implicit or explicit rejection of complicity, the pure horror of oneself, acquired a most important documentary value. The evidence he had been able to collect in Angola led to the following three major conclusions, which the supreme tribunal of the United Nations could not ignore: in the Portuguese Territories a war was being waged which the generality of the Portuguese nation condemned; an inhuman and anti-national political régime forbade the Portuguese nation to express that reprobation; and, in the middle of the twentieth century, the States united under the United Nations banner could not achieve unanimity in condemning Portuguese fascism and bringing it to an end, despite the fact that the methods and objectives of that political régime differed only in scope from those of nazism, which had plunged the world into the most murderous war mankind had ever experienced.

301. Turning to the facts that he himself had verified, he said that, according to a report by the information section of the headquarters of the Second Air Region (Angola), the number of Angolans killed as a result of military, police and civil repression from 16 March to 30 June 1961 was between 50,000 and 80,000.

302. During the same period the mission instructions issued by the Second Regional Air Command had ordered attacks on and the destruction of the people in the rebel area. Attacks had been launched against and destroyed almost all the villages in that area.

303. From the end of June 1961 onwards the mission instructions had ordered attacks on people camouflaged in the jungle, which had been carried out methodically and systematically in the form of "armed reconnaissance" (patrol flights over specific areas, with attacks on clandestine villages discovered during the mission) and "localized attacks" (attacks by groups of aircraft against targets of the same type).

304. On the subject of the equipment used and its origin, he said that reconditioned Lockheed "Harpoon" PV-2 tactical bombers from the 1960 NATO allocation, sold at a nominal price to the Portuguese Government, were permanently stationed in the Territory. There were also North American "Harvard" T-6 training aircraft, adapted for tactical support, Dornier DO-27 communications aircraft, with 37 mm rocket launching systems, and Republic "Thunderjet" F-84 tactical support aircraft, which again were recently re-conditioned aircraft from the NATO allocation sold at a nominal price to the Portuguese Government.

305. Lockheed "Neptune" P2V-5 long-range patrol aircraft from the NATO allocation assigned to air base 6 at Montijo, Portugal, had been used for regular missions.

306. The weapons had included containers of napalm, mainly of United States origin, and 20-lb., 100-lb., 500-lb. and 750-lb. high-power bombs, some originally supplied by NATO, some of local manufacture and some supplied by the Republic of South Africa. The Portuguese air force also had depth charges (which had replaced napalm in attacks on the people in the jungle, since they were the only effective weapon in areas of dense vegetation), which were part of the NATO allocation and were stored at air base 6, at Montijo, Portugal.

307. On the subject of alliances, he stated that in February 1962 two working meetings had been held, one at Salisbury and one at Luanda, between the headquarters staff of the Second Air Region and the Command of the Royal Rhodesian Air Force. Those meetings had led to the exchange of operational information, the planning of joint co-ordination arrangements and the study of methods of operational co-operation, the sole purpose of which was the repression of nationalism in both Territories.

308. The operational orders given by the High Command to the Second Regional Air Command in the period from 16 March to 30 June 1961 had been to crush every sign of rebellion and annihilate all Angolans found in the rebel area.

309. In conclusion, he said that he was prepared to provide the members of the Special Committee with any additional information on the facts he had described and on any other matter relating to Angola in the period from 21 April 1961 to 10 February 1963.

310. Describing the weapons used, the petitioner said that he had never seen the brand on the recoilless guns at close quarters but he presumed that they were of United States origin. Generally speaking, however, the weapons were manufactured outside Portugal, since that country was not equipped for arms production on a large scale. There was, however, a small arms factory at Luanda.

311. All the information he was in a position to supply related to the period from April 1961 to February 1963 and concerned air force operations. The order had been to attack and destroy any group of Angolans found outside the areas controlled by the Portuguese. The weapon used had generally been napalm, but when people had taken refuge in the jungle that weapon had become ineffective and had been replaced by depth charges.

312. He did not know the exact procedure as to the allocations of NATO weapons granted to Portugal. Some of the aircraft were not based in Angola. The Portuguese had resorted to the subterfuge of using them in rotation as if for manoeuvres. The same observation applied to the F-86 aircraft in so-called Portuguese Guinea, which were also part of the NATO allocation. Some depth charges from the NATO allocation had been supplied by a NATO country, but he did not know which. He had also noted the presence of Lockheed "Neptune" P2V-5 long-range patrol aircraft, which were of United States manufacture. The propagation of shock waves from depth charges was less violent on land than on sea. That type of bomb, however, caused internal haemorrhages and killed all persons within a radius of twenty metres. It was, however, not possible to estimate the number of persons actually killed in bombing operations. No check could be made on the spot, because the nationalists carried off the bodies of all those killed. In areas of dense vegetation, however, that type of explosive caused considerable damage.

313. At the first meeting of air staff officers at Salisbury, the general staff of the Royal Air Force had tried to obtain information on the type of weapons used and on existing means of co-ordination.

314. Some fifty diagrams had been brought to Salisbury and the officers responsible for security services at the bases had been briefed on the defence systems of the bases, the type of weapons and the smallest details of the whole defence system.

315. At the time when he had been on a tour of duty in Angola, there had been twelve twin-engined Lockheed "Harpoon" PV-2 bombers at the air base and six at Luanda, and four of those aircraft had later been sent to Beira, in Mozambique. There had also been some twelve or fourteen Republic F-84 "Thunderjets" and about twenty North American T-6 aircraft, in addition to Lockheed P2V-5 "Neptune" patrol aircraft.

316. He had no information after 10 February 1963 as to the extent NATO countries had trained Portuguese army officers and pilots for combat duty. Up to that time some Portuguese army officers had received training in the United States under a NATO co-operation programme. He thought, however, that Portugal was in a position to train its own air personnel for the purpose of repression. The Portuguese were present in Angola in sufficient numbers and did not need reinforcements from outside. Portugal did, however, receive considerable financial assistance from its allies which was far more valuable to it than assistance in manpower.

317. As to air attacks the method had varied according to the type of weapon used. In the case of some bombs there had been a compulsory safety altitude; for the depth charges, the altitude had been slightly lower; machine-gun attacks had been made at a fairly low altitude and for the dropping of napalm bombs the aircraft had skimmed two or three metres above the tallest obstacle.

318. There had been indiscriminate bombings except in the controlled zones. Up to 30 June 1961 the north of Angola had been entirely controlled by the nationalist forces, except for a few very small centres of population. After 30 June 1961 the Portuguese had increased their forces by about 50,000 men. Some of the people had taken refuge in the forests and others had surrendered to the Portuguese. The zone not controlled by the nationalists was jungle. Nevertheless, the heavy bombardments had had no effect on the morale of the freedom fighters. Nothing could now damage the morale of the nationalist forces and they were prepared to fight to the end to obtain independence for their country.

319. Asked whether he thought that, after the Salazar régime, there would be a more liberal régime in Portugal, particularly with regard to colonial matters, and that that régime would grant the Portuguese Territories the right to self-determination, the petitioner said that there was already a very strong anticolonialist opposition in Portugal. Thousands of political detainees in Salazar's gaols were anti-colonialists and there were also clandestine movements working against the present Government.

320. If the Salazar Government continued to receive all manner of assistance from its allies, the existing fascist apparatus might be able to retain power. If such assistance were eliminated immediately, the Government which succeeded the Salazar Government would probably adopt a different attitude. Sufficient proof of that was provided, in his opinion, by the number of Portuguese who emigrated daily and the rebellion of some soldiers who refused to leave on operational duties, not to mention the many deserters who took refuge in France, Belgium and the Federal Republic of Germany.

321. Mr. de Pádua, speaking as a member of the Frente Patriótica de Libertação Nacional, stated that he had been a medical officer with the rank of second lieutenant in the Portuguese army. He had been sent to Angola about the end of April 1961 and had deserted in late October 1961. He was a member of the Portuguese FPLN and had been engaged in anti-fascist activities in Portugal long before going to Angola. His purpose in testifying was to supply the members of the Special Committee with some facts concerning the beginnings of the war in Angola and the terrible repression inflicted on the Africans in that country.

322. He was also making a written contribution concerning that war, in the form of a work entitled Guerre en Angola, which had been published in Brazil in 1963 and had recently been translated into Russian in the Soviet Union. The greater part of the book, in diary form, had been written in Angola with a view to publication abroad. Some apparent contradictions in the book were in fact clarifications due to a better knowledge of the facts. In view of the limited time allotted to him for his statement, he would not dwell on a description of the tortures he had witnessed, on the course of the war or on the feelings of the settlers and of the troops. Instead, he wished to give the members of the Committee a brief account of the beginnings of the Angolan revolution which he had witnessed.

323. A knowledge of how the war had begun in Angola was very important. The workers in the Baixa do Cassange, a plateau where cotton was grown as the single crop, had gone on strike. Their annual wages had been about 150 escudos, or approximately 30 new francs. While it was true that the purchasing power of 150 escudos in Angola was greater than the purchasing power of 30 new francs in Paris, those figures gave some idea of the extreme financial straits of the Angolan workers. The fascist colonialist rulers had responded to the strike by bombing villages with napalm. On 4 February 1961, Angolan nationalists had attacked a police barracks and a military fortress at Luanda. During the following days, while the police and military casualties were being buried, the settlers, with the support and approval of the army, had attacked the Angolans and, according to the most moderate estimates, had killed 3,000 of them.

324. It was difficult to imagine the atmosphere which had prevailed in Angola at that time among the settlers and the fascist colonialist authorities, especially following the operations of 15 March in northern Angola. The atmosphere had been one of homicidal mania and complete lack of respect for the lives of the African people or for their most elementary rights. He had himself been able to gauge the extent and the systematic nature of the devastation which had been ordered when he had been sent into the heart of the area of military operations in the north. His unit command, for instance, had received orders, on entering the area in revolt, to "kill every living creature, including animals". He had seen villages bombed, or rather razed, with napalm, after being ransacked. He had seen settlers furiously brandishing the severed heads of Angolans on pikes; he had seen and heard things which would trouble the sleep of any normal man anywhere in the world. Those members of the Special Committee who would like to know the facts might refer to his book. He wished, however, to stress the assistance given by the army to the settlers, its accomplices.

325. The colonialist army was obviously racist despite all the statements made by self-proclaimed "multi-racialists". No further proof was needed than the talks which had been given to the Portuguese troops on board the transports taking them to Angola. They had been commanded to fight the Angolans on the pretext of preventing the loss of markets, not to mention statements designed to give them a superiority complex.

326. The weapons used by the parachutists and special troops which he had seen with his own eyes had formed part of the armaments of the Portuguese NATO division. Some of the napalm bombs had come from South Africa through NATO. According to some senior officers—as Manuel Alegre could confirm—Israel, acting as an intermediary for the Federal Republic of Germany in that instance, had supplied the Portuguese with USI sub-machine-guns. Bomb fragments found in the encampments of the fighting units bore inscriptions in English. A colonialist and fascist régime capable of using such methods for the avowed purpose of genocide would never, if left to itself, come to its senses and embark seriously on a process of decolonization. It was therefore necessary to take extremely strong measures, which alone might force the Portuguese Government to relinquish the Territories it occupied.

327. Referring next to the case of the Portuguese people, he pointed out that it was too often forgotten that the régime in Portugal was a particularly savage fascist régime which imprisoned Portuguese by the thousand, that the régime did not give even the Portuguese the right to elect their representatives freely and democratically, and that young Portuguese were not asked whether or not they wanted to go to war. As the Committee was already aware, most Portuguese soldiers had little enthusiasm for the idea of going to their deaths in Africa to defend the interests of Portuguese or foreign monopolies. That had been demonstrated by the Portuguese people on a number of occasions. The Portuguese army numbered thousands of deserters who had been forced to leave their country. Lastly, it appeared beyond any doubt that the Portuguese Government was a government of traitors to the Portuguese people and a growing threat to the whole of mankind. He emphasized that he was not the only deserter from the Portuguese army—far from it. In Algiers itself, other deserters or servicemen who had revolted against fascism were taking advantage of revolutionary Algeria's very generous welcome. They included his colleague, Manuel Alegre, who would address the Committee with a view to informing its members of the living conditions of Angolan and Portuguese patriots detained in Angolan prisons towards the end of 1963.

328. Mr. Manuel Alegre, speaking as a member of the Frente Patriótica de Libertação Nacional, said that the colonial war was an outgrowth of fascist oppression in Portugal. The bombings with napalm, the massacre of women, children and old people, the concentration camps, the tortures, and all the atrocities committed in Angola, Mozambique and "Portuguese" Guinea were the corollary of the tortures and political murders perpetrated day after day in Portugal by the forces of repression of the Salazar régime. Everything which occurred in Angola was simply the extension, in a colonized country, of the activities of the fascist régime which had been oppressing the Portuguese people for forty years.

329. He had been a law student at the University of Coimbra when he had been inducted into the fascist army in 1961. Before that date, he had participated in the students' struggle to gain freedom of association and he had taken a militant part in the clandestine democratic organizations fighting against fascist power in Portugal. He had arrived in Angola on 19 July 1962. Everything he had seen there had confirmed his belief that the colonial war was a crime, not only against the peoples of the colonies, but also against the Portuguese people.

330. Two days after his arrival, a settler born in Angola had told him how he had violated an Angolan girl with his knife. In the officers' mess of the infantry regiment at Luanda, he had often heard war criminals boast of their exploits. Second Lieutenant Machado Querido, for instance, had used a special method for interrogating prisoners by sinking his knife very slowly into their heads. Second Lieutenant Linhares had practised what he called political culture by trying to strike off the heads of the prisoners at one blow. He had also seen Lieutenant Mendonça walk the streets of Luanda wearing a belt decorated with human ears. That was an odious symbol of a frightful war. On the road from Luanda to Nambuangongo, all the villages through which he had passed had been destroyed. He had seen only Portuguese soldiers. The Angolans had been dead. At Nambuangongo, a Portuguese captain had explained to him that chemical warfare must be used, expressing the view that that was the only effective solution. A few days later, the soldiers under the command of the same captain had refused to continue waging war. The captain had found no way of forcing them to obey except by killing one of them. The troops had then mutinied. The PIDE had accused him (the petitioner) of having been the ringleader of the mutiny, but that was not true. The soldiers who had mutinied had done so as a violent expression of their dissatisfaction and despair.

331. At that time, he had been working with his commanding officer and other comrades in organizing a military revolt to overthrow fascist power in Angola. He had succeeded in recruiting many comrades and in establishing a revolutionary military junta to co-ordinate the actions of all the clandestine groups inside the armed forces themselves. The military junta had, of course, been set up with the participation of some senior officers. Unfortunately, some indiscretions had been committed, and the commanding officer and several other officers had been sent back to Portugal, where they had been dismissed from the army and then arrested by the PIDE.

332. On 17 April 1963, he had been arrested at Luanda, in defiance of all civilian or military law. The fascist military authorities had demobilized him and handed him over to the PIDE at Luanda itself. He had been imprisoned in the São Paulo fortress, where he had been interrogated for fifteen days and fifteen nights without a break. He had spent two and a half months alone in a cell. Nevertheless, he considered his situation relatively privileged, since the São Paulo fortress had housed other prisoners who were neither Whites nor Portuguese. They had been treated like animals. Day and night, from his cell he had heard the cries of tortured prisoners. The torturers had not even made an attempt at secrecy. To them, the Angola prisoners had not been human beings. They had not realized that he (the petitioner) would one day tell the world all he had seen in the living hell of the São Paulo fortress. To the PIDE agents, nothing had been more normal than to torture an Angolan. For instance, while walking in the prison yard, he had seen a man lying naked on the ground, with his feet and hands tied, while the PIDE agents burnt him with cigarette-ends. They had asked him, laughing, whether he would like to join in the fun. His reply had been that the only way in which he could imagine joining in was by taking the place of his Angolan comrade.

333. Three Angolans—Luandino Vieira, António Jacinto and António Cardoso—had been imprisoned in the cells next to his own. They had been completely isolated from the other prisoners. They too had been tortured, and they had been awaiting trial for twenty-nine months. One day, they had succeeded in passing to him the following message: "Take heart, comrade! We are in this struggle together. Our peoples will overcome. Long live free Portugal! Long live free Angola!" That letter had given concrete proof of the solidarity of the Portuguese democrats and the Angolan patriots, fighting for one and the same cause.

334. Luandino Vieira, António Jacinto and António Cardoso had been sentenced to fourteen years' imprisonment. They were now serving their sentence in the Tarrafal concentration camp in the Cape Verde Islands.

335. By the admission of the prison warden himself, about 2,000 Angolan prisoners had been rotting in the government gaols at Luanda in 1963. After being tortured, those prisoners had been sent, without ever being brought to trial, to concentration camps in southern Angola. In December 1963, he himself had been taken back to Portugal, where he had been placed under restriction at Coimbra. Five months later, he had left Portugal secretly, in order to avoid being rearrested and deported to Angola, where he would have been tried by a military tribunal.

336. He would not conclude without emphasizing that the true representatives of his homeland were not the delegates of Salazar. Those delegates represented no one but the boards of directors of certain monopolies. The true representatives of his country were in Portugal, in the political prisons, where they were being tortured by Salazar's police tormentors. They were the Portuguese men and women who were fighting for freedom, the deserters, and the thousands of emigrants living in every country of the world except Angola, Mozambique and "Portuguese" Guinea.

337. A régime which had never respected the most elementary rights of its own people could hardly respect the right of the colonized peoples to independence. The oppression of the peoples of Angola, Mozambique and "Portuguese" Guinea was an outgrowth of the oppression of the Portuguese people themselves. The men inlicting tortures in the Portuguese colonies were the same men who were inflicting tortures in Portugal, and that was why all the natural allies of the Portuguese people in their fight for freedom were the sister peoples of Angola, Mozambique and "Portuguese" Guinea. The Portuguese people could not be free so long as the peoples of the colonies were not free. The fight which the Frente Patriótica de Libertação Nacional (FPLN) was waging against the colonial war was a matter not only of solidarity, but also of patriotism. In fighting for recognition of the right of the colonized peoples to independence, FPLN was at the same time fighting for the national independence of its homeland.

338. By an overwhelming majority, the Portuguese people were opposed to the colonial war. Those feelings found expression in many desertions, in demonstrations at railway stations and instruction centres, in the fact that thousands of workers refused to contribute part of their wages to military expenditures, and in political statements by representatives of the opposition ranging from Catholics to communists. On 1 May 1962, in the streets of Lisbon, 100,000 persons, courageously defying the forces of the police, had shouted: "Peace in Angola!"

339. The fascist Government had dissolved the Association of Portuguese Writers because it had awarded the highest Portuguese prize for literature to Luandino Vieira. The members of the governing body of that renowned institution had been arrested and accused of betraying their homeland. Yet who were the traitors? Those who were fighting for freedom and human dignity, or those who for so long had daily been doing freedom and dignity to death in Angola, Mozambique, "Portuguese" Guinea and Portugal itself?

340. Those who lent their assistance to Salazar to enable him to retain power should not forget that they were making themselves the accomplices of an unlawful régime, condemned by history, and that a day would come when the Portuguese people and the peoples of the colonies would be able to distinguish between those who had been the friends of Salazar and those who had been with the Frente Patriótica de Libertação Nacional in its fight for freedom.

341. Replying to a question, one of the petitioners reaffirmed that at the time when he had deserted in 1961 he had seen some sub-machine-guns which, according to a colonel in his unit, were of Israel manufacture. It would appear that, in that instance, Israel had served as an intermediary for the Federal Republic of Germany.

342. Mr. Eduardo, speaking on behalf of the Gouvernement révolutionnaire de l'Angola en exil (GRAE), said that, since 1961, the problem of Angola had been given particular attention by the United Nations and was one of the problems that were almost permanently on the agenda of the Organization's sessions. Consequently, the historical background of the question had been recounted on a number of occasions by, among others, petitioners from his movement (immediately before and ever since the beginning of the armed insurrection by the Angolan peasants and workers) before the various United Nations bodies, and he would confine himself to highlighting the systematic refusal of the Portuguese colonialists to comply with United Nations recommendations.

343. The Portuguese colonialists, flouting all the Organization's recommendations concerning the granting of independence to the peoples under their colonial domination, were continuing their massacres, particularly in Angola, where villages were continually being razed and burnt and old people, women and children were being murdered. That was the reason for the ever-increasing exodus of Angolans to the Democratic Republic of the Congo, as indicated by a recent report by the United Nations Secretariat, which noted that the number of Angolan refugees in the Democratic Republic of the Congo since the beginning of the war in Angola was more than 220,000 and that 20,000 refugees had arrived in the Congo during 1965 alone. However, the figure of 600,000 Angolan refugees given by the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo was much nearer the truth.

344. The colonialists, not content with dropping waves of napalm bombs which caused unspeakable havoc among innocent people, had from time to time since May 1965 (as reported by the Angolan Press and Information Agency on 8 June 1965) been using poison gas which spread death far and wide.

345. The Angolan refugees constantly streaming into the Democratic Republic of the Congo bore in their flesh the traces of the atrocities committed by Salazar's "Christian" army, and it was regrettable that the Special Committee had not visited the area in order to assess the depth of the grief and misfortunes heaped on the most numerous and most sorely tried refugees at present to be found in Africa (if not the world). Nevertheless, he hoped that the United Nations would no longer be satisfied simply to record the movement of the Angolan refugees into the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and that in the near future those hundreds of thousands of human beings would be assured of the actual and effective material assistance and support of the Organization.

346. He therefore categorically denied the allegations by Portuguese officials that conditions in Angola were "normal"; for conditions which were claimed to be "normal" did not justify the constant dispatch of military reinforcements, massacres of the population, regular weekly communiqués on the war in Angola by the high command of the Portuguese colonialist army or the award of decorations for their crimes (which were called "heroism") to the Portuguese troops who had so woefully distinguished themselves in the savage slaughter of defenceless human beings.

347. According to the reactionary Portuguese newspaper O Primeiro de Janeiro of 7 May 1966, the Portuguese Minister for the Armed Forces had decorated the following soldiers: António Júlio Salgueiro Gonçalves, José Francisco de Oliveira, António Coelho da Silva, Jorge Cláudio Cabrita, João Manuel de Carvalho Margarido and Desidério Trindade Vilas (to mention only those) for "services rendered to the (Portuguese) nation in defence of its territorial integrity". Salazar himself, speaking at Braga on 28 May 1966 on the occasion of the fortieth anniversary of what the Portuguese called the "national revolution", had reaffirmed: "I have no intention of relinquishing power, since such a decision would be interpreted as a relinquishment of the policy which Portugal has hitherto pursued to safeguard its territorial integrity." He had added: "Such a decision might jeopardize the position which Portugal has been able to establish overseas through the combat waged by thousands of anonymous heroes."

348. All those gestures, all those statements, required no comment.

349. It sufficed to say that the Portuguese troops, with such encouragement, were redoubling their savagery, in the knowledge that decorations would in future be awarded to them on the basis of the number of Negro heads they collected "in defence of the Portuguese homeland". The exact number of Negro heads sent by Portuguese soldiers each week to their relatives and friends back in Portugal would never be known. The Angolan National Liberation Army had captured hundreds of letters from Portuguese soldiers giving evidence of that macabre traffic which, in many cases, was carried on through official channels, namely, by ordinary mail. GRAE would provide the General Assembly of the United Nations with some specimens at its forthcoming session.

350. The number of summary executions committed in cold blood could not be counted. On 18 November, for instance, the Angolan Press and Information Agency had reported the odious execution by Portuguese "paras" (on 15 November 1965) in the stadium at Carmona (Uíge) of some thirty Angolan patriots who had been arrested on the day following violent clashes between Angolan resistance forces and Portuguese troops. The victims of that act of barbarism had included Ambrósio H. D'inganga, Carlos Pinto Abreu, Simão B. de Vasco, Júlio Ginga, Silva Luhando, Dionísio de Vicente, and an eighteen-year-old girl, Formosinha Artur.

351. In addition, no one now knew exactly how many Angolan patriots were huddled together and dying in the countless colonialist prisons. He would not mention any names, for the names, in his view, were not important. Thus, there could be no distinguishing between the many heroic brethren who were suffering and dying in Salazar's gaols for having demanded their right to freedom. He would simply state forcefully that he demanded the release of all of them, whether one or ten, one thousand or ten thousand. He was not begging for their release, since he knew that the colonialists could not refuse it indefinitely; the struggle which the freedom fighters were waging would inevitably lead to the release of those brethren in the not very distant future. However, he had constantly denounced in the past, and would never cease to denounce, the dastardly murders and other cruelties inflicted on such political prisoners or prisoners of war by the Portuguese colonialists.

352. GRAE, while placing its trust in the United Nations and expressing its deep gratitude for all the steps taken by sister non-aligned countries and by all the other friendly countries in support of the Angolan people's right to self-determination, would continue the armed struggle with unshakable determination for as long as it was forced to do so by the rulers at Lisbon. The Angolan National Liberation Front (the parent body of GRAE), which was the movement of the exploited masses in Angola and the guarantor of their unity of action in the armed struggle, intended to liquidate the colonial past and to open the way to a genuinely national future. The Angolan people would therefore fight to the end or, in other words, until colonialism and its vestiges were completely eliminated.

353. It was for that reason that the Angolan people, through the voice of their combat organization, rejected the Portuguese schemes for the introduction of spurious social and economic "reforms" in Angola, such as the bogus abolition of native status—which would be tantamount to making the integration of Angola into Portugal a fact—the wage "increases" for Africans, the spurious ending of forced labour, the construction of schools, hospitals and roads, and the inclusion in some administrative bodies of Africans who were tools of colonialism.

354. All such transparent schemes deceived no one but their authors, the Portuguese colonialists; for the Angolan masses were not fighting to "reform" colonialism or to sit, symbolically, side by side with their tormentors in institutions set up precisely for the purpose of subjugating them. The Angolan people knew that colonialism did not "reform"; it did not improve. Consequently, the Angolan people would never fall into that absurdity, into that trap. The Angolan masses were fighting for the freedom of every Angolan, because they would never be granted freedom under any colonial administration, whether traditional or reformed. The reform to which the Angolan people aspired was self-determination, which meant the return of Angolan soil to the Angolans. As everyone was aware, however, such reform was not possible under colonial law.

355. The Portuguese colonialists described the use of poison gas and the systematic slaughter of innocent people as "legitimate" because, as they put it, that was part of their policy of defending their "historic rights". GRAE had taken up arms on 15 March 1961 in order to have the right to life, for there should be no other right in Angola than the right to life, liberty, dignity and self-determination. Injustice could not be legitimate. What was legitimate was a people's refusal to allow itself to be exterminated, a people's refusal to continue to live in slavery; what was legitimate was, in short, its resistance in the face of the aggressor; hence the legitimacy of its fight.

356. Taking advantage of the present opportunity, he wished vehemently to denounce the assistance given to Portugal in its colonial war by imperialism. Day after day, dozens of innocent Angolans were being savagely cut down by Salazar's horde of killers with the help of United States sub-machine-guns and dollars, French and German bombers and tanks, Belgian rifles, and the material and political support of several other NATO countries. The experience of five years of resistance showed that, without help from those countries, Portuguese colonialism would long since have succumbed to the blows struck by the Angolan freedom fighters.

357. He wished to denounce with equal force the racist alliance between Salazar, Verwoerd and Ian Smith. That alliance constituted a serious threat to peace in Africa and a great danger to millions of human beings. The problems of Southern Rhodesia, Angola, Mozambique and South Africa were now inseparable, since only concerted action aimed at those countries together, and not separately, would determine the final success of the struggle against racism and colonialism in the southern part of the African continent.

358. In a speech to the Sociedade Histórica da Independência de Portugal on 11 May 1966, the President of that society, Abel de Abreu Sotto-Mayor, after paying tribute "to the ability of the Portuguese soldier, his high racial qualities—superior to those of any other people—his courage and his discipline", had stated: "Our soldiers are not fighting for Portugal alone; they are fighting for the West also . . . for Portugal is today in Africa one of the last bastions of Western freedom and civilization. With South Africa and Rhodesia, we constitute a defensive bloc against Russian and Chinese cupidity in Africa . . ." (the Portuguese newspaper O Primeiro de Janeiro of 12 May 1966).

359. In the minds of the Portuguese colonialists, as could be seen, the right of peoples was a legal fiction, or rather a passport for communism.

360. The United Nations, exercising its moral force, must bring Portugal to its senses, or it would stultify itself. For that reason, the United Nations must show greater firmness in 1966. Portugal must not continue to flout the Organization's recommendations and to scorn the almost universal censure of its policies.

361. He reaffirmed that he was categorically opposed to the sending to Angola—as requested by the Portuguese Government—of a United Nations commission to “appraise” what the colonialists called the “imposing work” accomplished by Portugal over five centuries. He was aware, and the world was aware, that a guided tour of that kind would not enable any such commission to see what really was to be seen—the misery of the people, their aspirations, the areas where showers of napalm bombs were falling continually, the villages razed to the ground, the concentration camps, all the political prisoners and prisoners of war, and the common graves heaped with the bones of hundreds of thousands of Angolans foully murdered by soldiers who proudly received decorations from Salazar for their actions.

362. Moreover, GRAE felt that world opinion did not need to send a commission to Angola in order to know that the Angolans did not enjoy fundamental freedoms, as enunciated in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Petitioners concerning Mozambique

363. Mr. Mondlane, speaking on behalf of the Mozambique Liberation Front (FRELIMO), said that the people of Mozambique welcomed the opportunity to address the Special Committee again and thanked the Government of Tanzania for inviting the Committee to meet again in Dar es Salaam, thus demonstrating to the whole world its determination to fight for the complete elimination of colonialism and imperialism in Africa.

364. FRELIMO considered the Special Committee an important vehicle for imparting the views of the peoples of non-independent Africa to the United Nations. Consequently, it was very eager to present all the information which might be of some use in the preparation of the resolutions which had to be adopted by the United Nations before the necessary steps could be taken to force Portugal to stop its criminal activities in Africa.

365. He recalled that, in June 1965, the representatives of the United Nations had been informed of the situation, problems and needs of FRELIMO. The reasons for launching an armed struggle against the Portuguese army and police in Mozambique had been explained and reference had been made to the privations which the people of Mozambique were suffering under the ruthless Salazar. The Special Committee had also been informed of the difficulties faced by the ordinary African citizens of Mozambique and of the fact that the Portuguese authorities were forcing hundreds of thousands of Mozambican men to seek employment in the neighbouring racist States of South Africa and Rhodesia, leaving their wives and children alone and, earning only a bare living wage, to work for the white settlers and the international economic interests which were making huge profits. The Committee had learnt that thousands of Mozambican men and women were being herded monthly into forced labour (which the Portuguese Government cynically termed contratados) to work for European and Asian settlers in private homes, factories, railways and harbours, and on farms and plantations. Mention had been made of what some foreign observers of Portuguese colonialism had called “modern slavery”, whereby the Portuguese Government, in collusion with concessionary companies, forced African peasants to produce cotton, rice, ground-nuts and other marketable crops and to sell them ultimately to those companies at a price far below the cost of production. As a consequence of those practices, hundreds of thousands of Mozambican men had had to leave to seek employment in the neighbouring countries. Representatives might recall hearing two African elders, one a farmer and the other a school teacher and radio transmission specialist, who had presented evidence from their own personal experiences corroborating those charges against Portuguese colonialism. Lastly, the Committee had been told of the steps which the people of Mozambique had been forced to take to correct the situation: they had to form a single national liberation movement, the Mozambique Liberation Front, or FRELIMO, and had pledged themselves to seek redress.

366. That had been in June 1964. At that time the African people of Mozambique had still believed, however mistakenly, that the United Nations, through its trusteeship system, would bring about the final emancipation of the colonial peoples peacefully. Since then, however, they had learned an unhappy lesson. After sending their representatives to every session of the United Nations General Assembly to present their views and getting no action except platitudinous resolutions, they had decided to take direct action. Thus, in September 1964, an armed insurrection had been launched in Mozambique against Portuguese colonialism.

367. Since December 1965, when the United Nations had been presented with information on the atrocities perpetrated by the Portuguese against the people of Mozambique, the armed struggle of its Liberation Front had been developed. The number of trained and armed freedom fighters had been increased from a few hundred to a few thousand. They had been able to force the Portuguese army and police into a defensive position in at least two fifths of the country and the people of Mozambique could now boast of semi-liberated areas covering about one fifth of the country. In those areas, the people were, for the first time in more than seventy years—and in some areas for more than a hundred years—able to handle their own affairs without the haunting persecution of the Portuguese police and administration. Thus, in spite of the frequent attacks of the Portuguese air forces, the people were now organizing their own schools, clinics, courts and, where possible, even marketing their own produce. Unfortunately, those who were unable to provide sufficient military protection for their crops and stock had been forced to migrate to more uncomfortable sections of the country, and some had even had to emigrate to neighbouring independent African States, such as Tanzania, Zambia and Malawi, in tens of thousands, thus causing them to seek international humanitarian assistance, as representatives would recall from the annual reports of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

368. Of course, the Portuguese were not alone in their determination to maintain white supremacy in southern Africa. They were supported by the settler-controlled Republics of South Africa and Rhodesia which, together with the fascist Salazar régime of Portugal, had formed a racist alliance, intent on keeping the white man in power. Late in 1965, an agreement had been signed between Portugal and South Africa, allegedly to settle several thousand South African white farmers in the Tete Province of Mozambique. That information had been publicized, in South African and Portuguese papers, as an arrangement to help to relieve South Africa of population pressure by sending white farmers to Mozambique. However, it had been discovered that the real intention of the two Governments was to cover up a much more sinister scheme, namely, to provide the Portuguese army with South African white mercenaries to help to stamp out the Mozambican liberation struggle. The Committee's attention was called to that situation in Mozambique because, in the opinion of FRELIMO, it was a violation of international law and constituted interference in the internal affairs of Mozambique.

369. In that connexion, the Committee might be interested to know that Mr. Ian Smith had been quoted by the BBC towards the end of the previous week as having boasted of the intimate co-operation existing between the three racist Governments of the alliance: Portugal, South Africa and Rhodesia. According to the report, he had thanked the Portuguese Government specifically for continuing to provide transportation and other facilities to Rhodesia in an effort to frustrate any effect which the so-called oil blockade by the United Kingdom Government might have. It was, of course, obvious that under the present circumstances the Mozambique Liberation Front had no alternative but to take the necessary steps not only to destroy the Portuguese colonialists within its own territory but also to do everything in its power to support the struggle of the people of Zimbabwe and South Africa in their efforts for national liberation.

370. Referring again to the role being played by a member of Western European and North American Powers, members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), in the question of colonialism, he said that under the guise of participating in an alliance for the defence of democracy, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the United States of America, France, the Federal Republic of Germany and a few other Powers were supplying Portugal with some of the most deadly modern weapons and training her soldiers in the techniques of counter-guerrilla warfare. When convincing arguments against that anti-democratic alliance with a fascist régime such as Salazar's Portugal were presented, the answer given was that there was a clause in the NATO Agreement stipulating, inter alia, that no weapons acquired through the NATO Agreement should be used for the maintenance of a colonial Power anywhere in Africa south of the Tropic of Cancer. Yet, in the same Agreement, nothing was said about the deployment of military personnel trained and/or maintained under NATO auspices in colonial Africa; nothing was said about prohibiting the same NATO Powers from giving or selling their own weapons to Portugal outside the NATO Agreement, nor about an outright exclusion of a State whose attitude towards self-determination, self-government and independence was as fascist as that of Portugal. The Mozambican people often asked themselves, in view of that situation, what kind of democracy the Western Powers intended to defend. In the absence of any satisfactory answer, its people could only conclude that the United States, the United Kingdom, France, the Federal Republic of Germany and their allies in NATO were aware of and agreed with Portugal's anti-democratic position on her colonies, and knowingly wished to maintain their support for the continuation of colonialism in Africa.

371. Finally, since those same Powers, with the exception of the Federal Republic of Germany, were Members of the United Nations and consequently subscribed to the principles guiding the world body, which stood for the complete emancipation of all peoples from colonialism, the Mozambique Liberation Front appealed to them to consider their role vis-à-vis their ally, Portugal. While nothing on earth would deter the people of Mozambique from continuing to struggle for their complete liberation, they wished to appeal to the United Nations to try to find a formula which would force those NATO Powers to withdraw their support from Portugal.

372. Mr. dos Santos, speaking on behalf of FRELIMO, described the development of the struggle for national liberation in Mozambique during the past six months.

373. He said that the struggle for national liberation was growing and the areas controlled by FRELIMO were increasing in extent and importance. Large areas of the provinces of Cabo Delgado, Niassa, Zambézia and Tete were outside Portuguese control. In the first two provinces, the greater part of the population lived under the control of FRELIMO guerrillas. In the provinces of Zambézia and Tete, the areas under the authority of FRELIMO were not so great. In those semi-liberated areas, FRELIMO was engaged in reconstruction activities. It had increased agricultural output and established hospitals where combatants and the civil population were cared for. The literacy campaign was progressing satisfactorily.

374. There had been much fighting, particularly in the regions of Mueda, Diaca, Muidumbe, Chai, Macomia, Muembe, Valadim, Catur, Nova Freixo, Marupa and Massangulo. In the course of those engagements Portuguese troops had suffered heavy losses: several hundreds had been killed or wounded, while the guerrillas had seized a large number of arms, machine-guns, rifles, offensive and defensive grenades, mines, motor vehicles and other military equipment. One aircraft and one helicopter had been shot down, bridges and railways had been sabotaged and lorries destroyed. In addition, many African soldiers had deserted to join FRELIMO.

375. The campaign of oppression by Portuguese forces had compelled several thousands of people to take refuge in Tanzania, Malawi and Zambia. Their situation remained difficult, particularly in Malawi, where they were bereft of everything, or almost everything.

376. In the face of the popular struggle, Portuguese colonialism was reacting like a wounded beast. The army and the PIDE (political police) worked in close co-operation, in particular during military operations. The Portuguese troops received precise and official instructions: they had orders to massacre the population of the villages or to intern them by force in concentration camps built for the purpose near military and administrative posts. Peasants' houses were systematically burnt and crops and livestock were stolen or destroyed.

377. In the previous January, the Régulo (traditional chief) of Maniamba had been arrested because he had been found carrying a FRELIMO membership card. The soldiers had buried him alive up to his neck. When interrogated, he had refused to speak. After two days, he had decided to do so, but only to say "Yes, I am a member of FRELIMO and I supply FRELIMO guerrillas with food. FRELIMO will free Mozambique." That brave man died. The Portuguese had cut off his head.

378. The Portuguese often practised another kind of torture, which consisted in bursting the ear drums and putting out the eyes of persons they suspected of supporting the fighters. The soldiers then abandoned their victim in a lonely place, saying "Now go back to FRELIMO and get your eyes and ears back". They murdered pregnant women, opened their stomachs and tore out the foetus. In order to force prisoners to speak, they used a special apparatus which crushed their fingers one by one. Since the beginning of May, 7,500 soldiers had arrived from Portugal in three troop ships to reinforce those already there.

379. He assured the Committee that the many atrocities committed by the Portuguese army and PIDE would never lead the Mozambican militants to follow their example that was neither naïveté nor idealism on their part. If FRELIMO held to its principles, if it declined to confuse the colonialist or fascist Portuguese Government with the Portuguese people, to murder civilians or torture prisoners, that was because its cause was just and its action revolutionary. In Mozambique, it was the Mozambican people who were defending the great principles of humanity and not the fascist and colonialist Government of Portugal, even if that Government enjoyed the support of NATO. FRELIMO was sure of winning. It intended to continue its fight, to develop its activities and to improve its methods in order to liberate its country and its people once and for all.

380. In reply to questions, Mr. Mondlane and Mr. dos Santos said that the Portuguese medical services in Mozambique were unsatisfactory, to say the least. In a country whose population totalled more than 7 million, the first medical training programme, for Europeans and Asians alone, had been established three years previously. However, it only provided training at the lower level, and would not reach the standard of a full medical school for another ten to fifteen years. Assuming that Mozambique was a province of Portugal, as claimed by that country, the treatment it received differed considerably not only from that of the internal provinces, where both medical training and hospitals were provided all over the country, but also from that in such overseas provinces as Goa where, despite the fact that it had a population of only half a million, the Portuguese Government had established a medical school some twenty years previously.

381. Throughout the whole of Mozambique, there was not one African doctor. Of the 200 European doctors, two thirds were concentrated in the capital, where over half the European population was to be found. While two or three hospitals existed for the training of nursing assistants, there were no plans to train African nurses.

382. In areas where the armed struggle for independence was taking place, there were only mission clinics and, when they were closed because communications had been cut, FRELIMO had to set up its own clinics. In that connexion, the Mozambique Liberation Front had drawn up in Dar es Salaam a programme for training nurses outside the Portuguese system. The first class would be graduated that month and the nurses would be sent to serve the civilian population in clinics throughout Mozambique.

383. The Portuguese Government's assimilation policy was a bluff. There was no assimilation and there never had been. It was enough to recall the nature of Portuguese colonization and of colonization in general to realize that any idea of assimilation was alien to it. In the mind of the colonizer, there could be no question of absorbing the colonized people, of whom nothing was asked but to be slaves and to produce. Until the past few years, Portuguese statements of policy had laid down a policy of assimilation. According to those texts, a Mozambican who aspired to become Portuguese must know how to read and write, have a job compatible with Portuguese citizenship (i.e., a job which enabled him to be well dressed, to eat in the Portuguese manner, etc.), and forget his African traditions in favour of a culture imported from Portugal. He was asked, in short, to stop being Mozambican, without being offered anything in exchange but the assurance of complete depersonalization. The present policy went still further. The idea was to make all Mozambicans Portuguese without going through the intermediate stage. Only the liberation struggle could put an end to that intolerable situation.

384. According to statistics compiled towards the end of the previous decade, only 4,500 Africans had been assimilated out of a total African population of 6.5 million. It was hardly likely, therefore, that the existing African population of 7 million would be absorbed by 150,000 Europeans. In his opinion, assimilation, to which constant reference was made in Europe and elsewhere, was merely an instrument of propaganda. A journalist of repute, in a serious article in The New York Times, had even referred to Portuguese policy in that connexion as the one hopeful sign among all the problems in southern Africa. Such a statement did not deserve to be taken seriously.

385. There was in fact no material difference between South African apartheid and the racial discrimination practised by the Portuguese Government, since so long as a person was not Portuguese he was not a citizen and so long as he was not a citizen he had no rights. In Mozambique there was no law on race, but the inhabitants were regimented in the same way as in South Africa. There were practically no cultural amenities for Africans. The Portuguese advocated intermarriage to solve the race problem but there were only 150,000 Europeans out of a population of 7 million. He observed that wherever there were white minorities they were bound to establish systems of segregation. For instance, the whole of the capital city was segregated into luxury European, mediocre Asian and slum African quarters. All professional positions were occupied by Europeans, and Asians kept the shops and did clerical work. There was no sincerity of intention in the invitation extended to the United Nations. Although the Portuguese had invited the United Nations to make an on-the-spot inspection, any mission it sent would be guided and given a false impression.

386. Subsequently, with reference to an extract quoted from The Economist of 23 April 1966 which commented on the difference between Portuguese rule in Africa and that of South Africa, the petitioners said that, while The Economist generally presented a truer analysis than many other newspapers, the campaign of the Portuguese to make propaganda out of those facts had caught on among many people abroad, including those responsible for such an objective newspaper as The Economist.

387. An important factor in the colonial situation was the system of exploiting the production of marketable products. Up to 1942, more than half the country had been in the hands of concessionary companies, which had controlled not only the land but the people living on it, who had to work at wages set by them. In 1942 the Portuguese Government had decided to take direct control. Its policy from that time had been to give Africans the nominal ownership of the land but to stipulate what must be grown on it. A number of concessionary companies had been set up to determine what land was most suitable for various crops and the local population was forced to grow those crops and sell to the companies at prices fixed by the Government. The result was a system of modern slavery.

388. Answering a question on FRELIMO's activities, the petitioners said that their organization was carrying out extensive programmes in the social field. Much of the support received in that connexion had been contributed as a result of information it had circulated to representatives at the General Assembly and contacts made, through the Organization of African Unity (OAU), with the Afro-Asian countries.

389. FRELIMO's programme of general education was divided into three parts. In the first place, it was educating people to prepare them for civil service and administrative posts when the country gained its independence. Most of the students were sent abroad for their higher education.

390. Secondly, it was endeavouring to provide secondary education for the population: a secondary school, currently attended by more than 120 Mozambican students, had been established in Dar es Salaam. In Mozambique, there was not even one secondary school for Africans, whose only chance of such education was, therefore, to gain admission to a European school. Out of a total African population of 7 million, fifteen had completed their secondary education. The only institutions which made any efforts in that direction were Roman Catholic seminaries for training priests, and it was there that most of the students sent abroad received their earlier education. Apart from the medical school, to which he had already referred, FRELIMO was also planning to establish a school for teachers.

391. Thirdly, programmes had been initiated in the bush areas of Mozambique to deal with the problem of illiteracy and primary schools had also been set up. However, there was no permanency about such establishments, which had to be moved according to the position of the Portuguese army.

392. At the basic level, which was the literacy level, progress was still weak owing to lack of qualified personnel and premises. However, foreign appeals had been launched. Secondary and technical education was available and schooling was provided by United Nations Member States in all parts of the world. The third level of education could only be obtained abroad. Some forty Mozambique pupils went abroad annually, mostly for technical education. The Patrice Lumumba Friendship University in Moscow had special arrangements to enable students to complete their secondary education before beginning university courses. Similar arrangements were made by three United States universities, but it was impossible for those pupils to enter Western European universities. The country needed more scholarships abroad and would be able to engage all graduates on their return. It could also provide students for short training courses of one to six months in any country that was willing to help Mozambique.

393. FRELIMO required extensive aid in the establishment of literacy programmes but, despite the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly, assistance did not appear to be forthcoming from the specialized agencies. They offered various excuses but, since the United Nations had pronounced itself on the matter, they should have no difficulty in providing such assistance. It would also be valuable if the Special Committee could encourage States Members of the United Nations to offer FRELIMO facilities for training its members in the techniques of teaching.

394. Asked whether students from Mozambique who went abroad to study did in fact return to provide the leadership for which they had been trained, the petitioners said that no problem had arisen in absorbing Mozambique students who had returned after graduating. The country was in dire need of teaching staff; it had already received teachers from various European countries and had appealed for more. There was also a great need for medical staff: there was as yet no African doctor in the country, but the first medical student was in the process of finishing his studies. Economists also were badly needed. There was therefore no reason for any Mozambique student to fail to find his place in the country on finishing his studies, and the Governments of the countries in which the students had been working were willing to help them to return. He did know of one case of a student in the United States who had had psychological problems, and on whose behalf an appeal had been made that he be allowed to remain in that country to receive the mental treatment that was not available in Tanzania, but that was a special case.

395. In reply to a question regarding the attitude of the churches in Mozambique, the petitioners observed that Portugal considered itself a bastion of Christianity. A new agreement between Church and State further strengthened the Church, which handled all education of African children. They were even obliged to attend school at different times of the year from European and Asian children, to whom the stringent regulations did not apply. The Portuguese Government gave a little money for the education of African children, and since the Church wanted the exclusive right to handle education it had no alternative but to support the Government. It was, however, to their credit that there was currently a more liberal policy in the Vatican and that missionaries now showed less enthusiasm for maintaining colonialism.

396. As to the concrete assistance that could be provided by the Special Committee and the United Nations, the petitioners felt that the terms of the resolutions adopted by the Special Committee and the General Assembly respectively expressed many of the wishes of the African people in Mozambique. However, there was no clear indication of any action having been taken to implement those resolutions, and the countries which had voted against them continued to support Portugal, South Africa and Rhodesia. Also, apart from the United Nations scholarship programme, no positive contribution had been made by other agencies, with the sole exception of the office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. They hoped the specialized agencies would be requested to indicate what action they were prepared to take.

397. The situation of refugees in Malawi was desperate. For more than a year, since the arrival there of the first group of refugees, the problem had been increasing. FRELIMO had done everything it could to make the plight of the refugees known to the Government of Malawi, and although that Government was doing what it could, no clearly defined plans had been made to relieve the situation. Most of the refugees had gone to the islands in the Lake of Malawi, the waters of which were officially considered to belong to Mozambique, although the islands themselves were Malawi territory. There were now over 8,000 refugees, most of them still on the two islands, with a few also in the border area of south Malawi.

398. With regard to possible further help from the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the Special Committee itself should ask the High Commissioner what approach the Malawi Government had made to him, what relationship, if any, had developed, and what problems had prevented the refugees in Malawi from being given the same assistance as those, for example, in Tanzania. Religious and other humanitarian bodies were not being given the same facilities to help refugees in Malawi as they were in other countries. The petitioners appealed to the Special Committee to see that such facilities were made available.

399. In reply to a question as to how the United Nations could also help to spread the truth on the behaviour of the Portuguese and of the countries which supported Salazar, the petitioners said that, although a number of excellent publications on the Portuguese colonies had been issued by the United Nations, they were not made available to the public. The working papers prepared by the Secretariat for the Special Committee were thorough and factually accurate, but the annual reports which were issued to the public included only a few references to those Territories. They therefore suggested that the United Nations should draw up a document, for distribution either to the general public or to the General Assembly, to include all the relevant facts and to demonstrate why so many Members of the United Nations had condemned Portuguese policy.

400. In spite of General Assembly resolution 2107 (XX) the United States, the United Kingdom, France, the Federal Republic of Germany and Belgium were supplying weapons to Portugal either through NATO or through other channels. FRELIMO had been able to establish with certainty, and had a list of weapons captured from the Portuguese army with serial numbers to prove it, that the Portuguese army was in possession of weapons (rifles, automatic rifles and machine-guns) originating in Belgium, the Federal Republic of Germany, France, the United States and the United Kingdom. In addition, the Portuguese forces had recently taken delivery of Italian aircraft built in the Federal Republic of Germany.

401. Before General Assembly resolution 2107 (XX) could be implemented, those Powers would have to withdraw their support to Portugal. They would also have to put a stop to the training of its officers under NATO auspices, which they alleged was carried out in the normal process of their programme for defending Europe. However, it could safely be assumed that all Portuguese senior staff officers had received special training at NATO, especially in view of the known concern of certain Western Powers at the extent of guerrilla warfare throughout the world.

402. Although the official position of the NATO Powers was that they undertook no activity south of the Tropic of Cancer, there was evidence of indirect aid; according to the testimony of a Portuguese prisoner, there were Portuguese paratroops in Mozambique which had been equipped by NATO. The reason for their presence was unknown; but the Portuguese Government would certainly never admit publicly that they were there to fight. The prisoner had also said that the construction of air bases was continuing, and eight jet airplanes had been bought from the Federal Republic of Germany. It was evident that NATO aid alone enabled Portugal to foot its military bills.

403. The tactics of the Western Powers were camouflaged; had they been genuinely opposed to colonialism and sympathetic to the people's struggle for liberation, they would at least, in the light of resolution 2107 (XX), have withdrawn all aid tending to strengthen Portugal's position.

404. A further violation of the terms of resolution 2107 (XX) was the financial assistance rendered by Western European and United States banks to Portugal, which could not otherwise have continued the war in Africa since it already absorbed over half of its national budget. The Western Powers should therefore withdraw their aid to Portugal.

405. In reply to a request for details of Portuguese atrocities in Mozambique, which should be drawn to the attention, in particular, of those countries represented in the Special Committee which still afforded indirect assistance to Portugal, the petitioners said that the Portuguese Government had to resort to torture in order to maintain its colonial rule in Mozambique. FRELIMO intended to submit a detailed report to the Special Committee on the tortures to which the people of Mozambique were subjected by the Portuguese.

406. As to Portugal's attitude to the rebel régime in Rhodesia, it had not been unexpected in view of the arrangements made earlier to establish an embassy in Lisbon and to continue traffic communications between Beira, Lourenço Marques and Salisbury.

407. The petitioners said that the situation in Rhodesia would only be changed by a force from within, and the Mozambique Liberation Front would do its utmost to effect that change, as soon as its material resources permitted. The Europeans in Rhodesia were well aware that FRELIMO intended to demolish the oil pipeline as soon as possible and, for that reason, it was kept under constant surveillance, both on the ground and from the air. FRELIMO would support the Africans in Rhodesia in every possible way, since no real freedom could be gained for Mozambique while Rhodesia and South Africa remained in the hands of foreign Powers.

408. There was also co-ordination among South Africa, Southern Rhodesia and Portugal with regard to their political policies for control of the African populations. There was also military co-ordination. Every six months Portuguese officers went to Salisbury for discussion, and a high-ranking officer paid regular visits to Mozambique. Further, South Africa was committed to support Mozambique.

409. The three countries aided one another economically. For instance, Mozambique provided Southern Rhodesia and South Africa about 300,000 labourers each year under contract.

410. The economic relations between Portugal and Mozambique constituted an obstacle to the liberation of the people of Mozambique. One of the objectives of FRELIMO's struggle was to break up the old economic structures imposed by colonialism and to replace them with others which would permit the people of Mozambique to develop their potentialities freely.

411. The flow of capital from the Western world to Portugal and its colonies continued. In addition to the Colonial Bank of Portugal, there were two other well-known banks still operating in the country: the Standard Bank of South Africa and Barclays Bank, both of which had very close links with South Africa and Southern Rhodesia.

412. Although the Portuguese Government had established an import-export organization in Mozambique, such activities had for many years been in the hands of foreign companies. Portuguese participation had developed only since the Second World War.

413. The import-export business of Mozambique was linked directly with the hinterland of South Africa and Southern Rhodesia. There was an agreement between Portugal and South Africa under which nearly 50 per cent of the goods exported from the Witwatersrand area had to go through Mozambique, in exchange for which 150,000 Mozambique labourers were sent each year to work as cheap labour in the mining and other industries in South Africa. The Portuguese Government in Mozambique was also, under that agreement, given financial assistance by South Africa for running its railways. A similar situation prevailed vis-à-vis Southern Rhodesia.

414. Under the present circumstances, opening the Territories further to foreign companies would only be detrimental and delay independence. In the past three years some western European companies had also obtained large concessions, particularly in Angola. The people of the country should be given freedom to use their energies to satisfy their own basic needs. If foreign companies were to be invited it must be by a government freely elected by majority. They disagreed strongly with the views of the anti-Salazar Portuguese white settlers, who only wanted freedom from Portugal in order to gain control themselves.

415. Recalling operative paragraph 5 of General Assembly resolution 2107 (XX) which "condemns the policy of the Government of Portugal which violates the economic and political rights of the indigenous population by the establishment, on a large scale, of foreign immigrants in the Territories and by the exporting of workers to South Africa", the petitioners said that the question of white settlement affected Angola—which was nearer to Portugal and more wealthy—to a greater degree than Mozambique, which did nevertheless have thousands of European settlers.

416. The question of exploiting the land for the benefit of European companies was exacerbated by the fact that when Africans had developed certain areas of the country from forest swamp the Government took them for so-called civilized settlement, mostly by Europeans. There was one such area in which, among a total of more than 15,000 families, no more than fifteen to twenty were Africans. The policy of the Portuguese Government was to bring in more Europeans so that it could be claimed that the area was preponderantly white. In June 1960 when the peasants in the north of Mozambique had disputed the right of the Portuguese authorities to repossess by force the fertile lands of the Macondes plateau, they had been massacred by the Portuguese administration. It was Portugal's policy to settle a white population in those territories, particularly in the Limpopo valley. It seized land from the Africans and drove out the local inhabitants, replacing them with white settlers.

417. In reply to a question the petitioners said that recent estimates put the number of Portuguese soldiers in Mozambique at approximately 50,000. That did not, however, take account of a further 7,500 men who, according to Portuguese information agencies, had arrived in the past month, nor of a further 6,000 who were known to have arrived in Mozambique only a few days previously. At that rate, the number of Portuguese soldiers could be expected to reach 75,000 by the end of 1966.

418. The Portuguese had issued propaganda statements throughout the world in which they claimed to have closed all borders to prevent infiltration. They had then, however, apparently contradicted themselves by stating, according to the article in The New York Times to which he had referred earlier, that any terrorists who were caught while endeavouring to cross the border between Tanzania and Mozambique were sent back to Tanzania by the police. That would hardly have been possible if their first claim was true. However, every effort was being made by the Portuguese forces to guard all borders between Mozambique and neighbouring countries.

419. The Portuguese Government had also been conscripting Africans, but many of them had deserted. Ninety-five per cent of them were mere youngsters unaware that they were going to a war. Whenever there was an armed clash they were threatened with execution if they did not fire on their own people. It was therefore difficult to assess the morale of the Portuguese, but as their army was adequately replenished and equipped it was probably fairly high. Nevertheless, how long Portugal could continue, despite support from its allies, was an open question. Since 1961, increasing proportions of its national budget had been devoted to military expenditure. At the same time, vast sums accrued from the companies operating in the colonies.

420. He asked to comment upon the allegation of the colonial Powers that the imposition of sanctions would harm Africans most of all, the petitioners said that there was an apparent lack of sincerity on the part of the colonial Powers; the suggestion that Africans would be harmed most by the imposition of sanctions was not to be taken seriously. So far as Mozambique was concerned, the European population would be most affected by such action since they were the consumers of the goods concerned. The African population produced its own goods in sufficient quantity and ultimately, it was even intended to export such produce to neighbouring countries.

421. The allegations of Portugal, South Africa and Southern Rhodesia that all African liberation movements were communist inspired had not affected the popularity of FRELIMO abroad. Such statements carried weight only in Europe and America. The Portuguese efforts to brand FRELIMO as communist would only result in increased popularity in some African countries. Furthermore, such efforts provided the communist States with excellent propaganda since FRELIMO, which was fighting for the freedom of the people, was identified within Africa with the ideology and goals of world communism. In the mind of the average Mozambican, therefore, the peoples of the communist nations were genuine fighters for the cause of freedom in Mozambique. Whether FRELIMO was communist or not was immaterial to the African people, who did not question its ideology or principles but only the attitude of those who supported Portugal.

422. Asked whether information on FRELIMO's activities reached the occupied zone in Mozambique, thus forming a core of passive resistance throughout the whole population, the petitioners said that FRELIMO gave the people as much information as possible, in order to encourage them to prepare for passive resistance. Thus the bulletin La Voix de la révolution was distributed throughout the country, as were numerous tracts. Use was also made of the radio services of independent African States to disseminate as much news as possible. Furthermore, in Africa, the "bush telegraph" still operated and messages travelled fast by word of mouth to all parts of Mozambique. FRELIMO was making every effort to provide the people with the facts, particularly since it wished to counter the Portuguese allegation that its members were merely terrorists bent on slaughter.

423. FRELIMO's activities were carried out by both civilian and military personnel. All non-military programmes, whether educational, economic or administrative, were carried out primarily by civilians. The main role of the military, which were engaged in an unemotional and rational fight, was to protect the population from the Portuguese army.

424. Replying to a question as to the possibility of a significant increase in the number of eligible voters under the prevailing system, the petitioners said that new legal measures were intended to favour white settlers, whose average age was higher than that of the African population. Those settlers therefore had a far greater proportion of eligible voters on that score alone. However, that did not fully account for the figures of 2,000 African votes out of a total vote of 64,000. Even if there were to be a rapid increase in the number of African voters under the present system, FRELIMO rejected the idea of unity with Portugal. The people of Mozambique wanted a parliament in their own country and not in Lisbon. What was needed was a radical change of direction in legislation.

425. Mr. Mbule, speaking on behalf of UDENAMO, said that when the Portuguese settlers had arrived in Mozambique five centuries ago, they had introduced a policy of "divide and rule" by creating misunderstandings amongst the various tribes.

426. It was well known that Portugal was a small, poor, backward and militarily weak nation, which had been under British protection since 1173, as a safeguard against Spanish ambitions. That alliance had also served to protect Portugal's colonies in Africa, although Portugal had never done anything for the benefit of the African population in those Territories except to exploit them. Despite condemnation by world opinion that situation still prevailed. Not being content with setting tribe against tribe, they had gone one step further by introducing in 1928 Salazar's infamous policy of "assimilation"—the division of the people by class. That policy had crushed the morals and integrity of the people and was aimed at a small elite of Africans with a limited knowledge of Portuguese. Those people isolated themselves from the masses and tried to lead a Portuguese way of life by attempting to adopt Portuguese customs and habits; they were even ashamed to speak their mother tongue. They thus acquired the status of Portuguese assimilados, which entitled them to discriminatory salaries and special privileges designed to make them feel true "black" Portuguese citizens. It was in the hands of the assimilados that Portugal had placed her last hope of remaining in Africa. Their presence made any attempt to liberate the country useless, and they were more dangerous than the Portuguese themselves in the struggle for freedom and independence.

427. By means of that system Portugal intended to set up another white racist State along the lines of South Africa and Southern Rhodesia, and it was with that end in mind that in 1951 they had revised the Constitution by changing the word "colony" to "overseas Portugal". However, it had not brought about the desired change in the lives of the people; on the contrary, Portugal had persisted in its defiant attitude and had continued to deprive the population of their human rights and legitimate aspirations for freedom and independence.

428. In an attempt to appease world opinion and deceive the United Nations, Portugal had in 1961 proclaimed some reforms, but those reforms not only failed to meet the aspirations of the people but put the white settlers in a better position to assume political responsibility if Portugal was eventually forced to accede to the people's demand for self-determination.

429. On announcing those reforms in 1961, the former Minister for Overseas Provinces, Mr. Moreira, had said that his Government believed it necessary to increase the settlement of the African Provinces by European Portuguese who would make their home there and that measures were being taken to deal realistically and firmly with that problem, which was of the highest priority. The influx of settlers and the efforts made to decentralize the internal administration were all part of the scheme to turn the colony into countries like South Africa and Southern Rhodesia. Portugal's "multiracial integration" policy was aimed at deceiving the world; Portugal had no wish to be on close terms with the African people—it was only interested in making its home there by force and in denying the people their right to the land it had acquired by perfidy and treachery.

430. Portugal's idea was, by abolishing the 1954 Native Statute, to suppress the people's claim for independence; it intended to interpret Chapter XI of the United Nations Charter as it wished and refused to co-operate with the United Nations. It was therefore somewhat surprising that Portugal was still a full Member of the United Nations.

431. Since 1961 the African population had been facing systematic extermination, designed to enable the Portuguese settlers to take possession of their property and settle in their homeland. For that purpose a terrorist racist organization, similar to the OAS in Algeria, had been established in connivance with the Government. What, then, had been the use of abolishing the Native Statute and declaring Mozambique an Overseas Province whose inhabitants were automatically Portuguese citizens, if the people were to be persecuted and exterminated?

432. One of the methods used to scatter the people in densely populated areas was to instil fear and terror. In August 1964, 20,000 people from Muede had fled to Tanzania; again in March and August 1965 refugees had fled from Niassa to Malawi; many thousands had been arrested, among them Dr. Domingos Arono José Craveirinha a well-known journalist; the Portuguese had sent 3,000 soldiers to crush a nationalist demonstration at Tete which had resulted in the massacre of many hundreds of innocent people, the arrest of many others and the fleeing of some 12,000 to Zambia. Those were but a few examples of the atrocities which were occurring daily. The number of refugees was constantly increasing and would continue to do so as long as the Portuguese were allowed to sabotage and suppress the liberation struggle in Mozambique. Portugal preached equality but practised discrimination.

433. In 1961, after the uprising in Angola, fearing its repercussions in other Territories, especially Mozambique, Portugal had taken preventive measures by forming, in April, the Polícia Internacional da Defesa do Estado (PIDE). That organization was composed of murderers, bandits and ex-criminals to whom Salazar had granted pardons on condition that they co-operate with his criminal policy. The headquarters of PIDE was set up in Laureço Marques and Beira. Many people, including Dr. Agostinho Illunga, Dinis Mondlane and Tomás Nyatumba, had been charged with high treason against the Government. In 1962 they had been sentenced to five years' imprisonment in Lisbon plus fifteen years' residence in Portugal and deprived of all political rights.

434. Innumerable arrests were planned by the "black" Portuguese and their network of informers and executed by the white man. PIDE was a terrorist organization modelled after the Gestapo. Some PIDE members succeeded in joining liberation movements for the purpose of betraying them. They tried to expel freedom fighters from the Party and even from the host country; they had gaols where nationalists were kept indefinitely; with the money they obtained from Portugal they enticed nationalist leaders to return to their homeland where they faced immediate arrest, as in the case of Daniel Mahlayeye, Matias Mboa, Bomba Tembe, José Cavane and many others. They called themselves the "Mozambique Liberation Front" and three years ago had proclaimed a fictitious armed struggle to confuse world opinion. Recently they claimed to control two thirds of Mozambique, yet they were reluctant to unite with the people. That situation was a major obstacle in the struggle for liberation but it did not lessen the determination of the oppressed people of Mozambique to fight colonialism, racism and neo-colonialism to the bitter end.

435. Southern Rhodesia provided a concrete example of imperialist manoeuvres; Ian Smith would never have dared to proclaim the unilateral declaration of independence had he not been assured of the support of the "Unholy Alliance"—Verwoerd, Smith and Salazar.

436. Since 1961, when Portugal had announced its intention to encourage the immigration of white settlers, there had been a large increase in the white population, especially in the north. A substantial number of troops had settled there after the Angola uprising. That was part of a plan to make it virtually impossible for nationalist forces trained outside the country to penetrate into Mozambique.

437. Although Portugal was a poor country, it boasted of being able to resist 12 million Africans.

That was thanks to the material support of NATO, which was encouraging the creation of a racist empire in southern Africa.

438. In Mozambique, the Portuguese forces consisted of divisions of the regular army, with artillery, engineers, and army medical corps, infantry, cavalry and an army service corps, a special army of hunters, a volunteer corps, an air force, a police force and a reserve force. All those forces were well equipped with modern weapons and unlimited supplies of ammunition. In the previous year they had numbered 45,000 men, but that figure had been increased to 60,000 last December.

439. As a result of Portugal's colonial policy, Mozambique had become a police State, a land of gaols and concentration camps and a battlefield where the African people lived in terror.

440. As for the authentic opposition groups, UDENAMO had been the first party of the kind formed outside Mozambique.

441. In 1962 a liberation front had been created. In 1963, however, several members of the front had been expelled and had gone to Cairo and formed UDENAMO. In spite of meetings in Cairo with FRELIMO leaders in 1963 and 1964, UDENAMO had not rejoined FRELIMO. UDENAMO members, like those of FRELIMO, were freedom fighters; but to liberate Mozambique through an armed struggle would be impossible without unity.

442. On behalf of UDENAMO the petitioner appealed to the Special Committee, since all possible means of moral pressure and persuasion had been exhausted and since all the United Nations resolutions concerning Portuguese administration in Mozambique had been ignored by Portugal, to place the problem before the Security Council. The Security Council should adopt strong measures to prevent Portugal from terrorizing and exterminating the African population from Mozambique and should force Portugal to implement all previous United Nations resolutions in order to restore peace and respect for the lives and property of the people.

443. He also renewed UDENAMO's protest against Portugal's violation of the Declaration of Human Rights and requested the Special Committee to bring the case before the Security Council.

Petitioners concerning Guinea under Portuguese administration

444. Mr. Amílcar Cabral, speaking on behalf of the Partido Africano da Independência da Guiné e Cabo Verde (PAIGC), said that the situation in Guinea had developed considerably in the past year, but the crucial problem unfortunately remained unchanged. The armed struggle was continuing in Guinea and the Cape Verde Islands. The people of Guinea hated war, but war was being forced upon them by Portugal's refusal to recognize their most elementary rights. Moreover, by their struggle the people of Guinea were defending the cause of the United Nations, which was the cause of all mankind. Three years of armed combat had convinced the fighters that they were fighting not only Portuguese oppression but all régimes in which man was still being oppressed by man.

445. He was appearing before the Special Committee as a freedom fighter and not as a politician. His country's struggle, however, was a political struggle: its purpose was not to kill all the Portuguese soldiers or to win a war, but just to be free, and that was a political objective.

446. In order to assist the Committee in its work, he had brought with him several impartial witnesses who had no special connexion with so-called Portuguese Guinea and who were prepared to testify. He had also brought with him, as in the previous year, some documentary films which would do more to enlighten the members of the Special Committee on what was really happening in his country than any oral testimony.

447. The Chairman of his party had again been sentenced to solitary confinement, other leaders had recently been tortured and arbitrary arrests were still increasing.

448. On the morning of 5 June, ten bombers and four jet aircraft had bombed a small village in Guinea where a meeting of active leaders had been held the previous day. The village had been completely destroyed, seven persons had been killed and fifteen seriously wounded. The aircraft had been American B-26s and Fiats manufactured in the Federal Republic of Germany. Portugal, which was an underdeveloped country ranking last among the European nations, did not manufacture aircraft. Why, then, were the Western countries helping to bomb the people of Guinea? He did not understand the contradictions in the attitude taken by the United States, which proclaimed itself the friend of Africa but continued to help Salazar and the Portuguese criminals. The legitimate aspirations of the people of Guinea were in no way incompatible with those of the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany.

449. He expressed the hope that the Special Committee—since it could not provide arms for the people of Guinea—would use its influence to see that they received international assistance for purposes of strengthening their economy and improving public health and education. The areas of the country which had already been liberated were in urgent need of such assistance.

450. The PAIGC had already liberated almost half the Guinean territory, so much so that the enemy forces were obliged to keep to the confines of their barracks. All that the eye-witnesses who were with him had seen of the Portuguese had been their aircraft. Throughout the liberated regions, the people were in no danger of being arrested or massacred by Portuguese troops. It was only the air-raids that claimed victims.

451. In the rest of Guinea, large areas were outside Portuguese control. Some people regarded them as liberated. The PAIGC was less categorical, because it was not yet in control of them. The actual situation was that in the south the liberated regions were Catió, Fulacunda, about half the Xitoli region and the Boé region; in the north, the PAIGC controlled the Oio and Farim regions, about half the São Domingos region, approximately 30 per cent of the Canchungo region and approximately 25 per cent of the Gabu region. At Bissau the Portuguese no longer exercised any political or military control. In fact, all they held now was their own towns.

452. In reply to questions, he said that the PAIGC did not yet control a single inch of the territory of the Cape Verde Islands. It was confining itself at present to consolidating its local organization in order to launch the armed struggle as soon as possible, since Portugal's attitude left it no other choice. Starvation and the brutality of the occupying Power had in fact become intolerable.

453. The administrative problems of the Territories of which he was the spokesman were, indeed, fundamental issues. The Portuguese had been in so-called Portuguese Guinea for five centuries, and for five centuries the Portuguese had systematically acted in such a way as to prevent the local people from administering their own affairs. The population was 99.7 per cent illiterate. The problem of key personnel was therefore crucial. Efforts were being made to solve it with the help of the few national elements available and the experts supplied by African nations. The liberated regions had been divided into zones administered by the PAIGC. At the regional and zonal levels, the party was endeavouring to settle the administrative, health, education, economic and other problems.

454. In the public health field the main problem was that of doctors and medical supplies. During the last session of the Special Committee, the petitioners had asked the United Nations to intervene with the International Red Cross and other competent organizations to obtain medical assistance from them. They had also requested that the World Health Organization (WHO), either directly or through the agency of the neighbouring African countries, should find the means of sending doctors to their liberation movement. At present, the situation with regard to doctors and medical supplies was still very grave. His party was trying to solve the problem. It had set up health centres at its bases for treatment of the less serious casualties and the general population. It had established a military hospital in the south and another in the north. Some medical orderlies who had been trained by the Portuguese at Bissau were in turn giving medical training to young volunteers of both sexes.

455. With regard to education, the party had established nearly a hundred schools in the liberated regions; it now had four times as many primary schools and pupils as under the Portuguese: there were over 8,000 children enrolled at school as against 2,000 at the time when education had been the responsibility of the occupying Power. The party was engaged in training cadres, both inside and outside the country. It was receiving foreign aid for that purpose. For the coming July it had organized a teachers' finishing course in Guinea. The country's universities had all been mobilized to ensure the development of literary and scientific education. The problem of teachers was acute, since for language reasons there could be no question of making use of foreign instructors. The lack of textbooks and school equipment was also a very serious problem. The party had published reading books, out of its own resources, and had bought some scientific works and mathematics textbooks, but its requirements in the way of books and educational equipment were still considerable. If UNESCO, for which he had the greatest admiration, could help his movement in that field, it would thereby be making a most effective contribution to the struggle against illiteracy.

456. As far as the country's economy was concerned, it could not even be called under-developed. It was not developed at all. Portugal had made Portuguese Guinea a colony whose business was slaves first and then factories. Monoculture had been the rule until now. Efforts were now being made to encourage new crops, in particular ground-nuts. Up to the present he himself had been the only agricultural expert in the country but was awaiting the arrival of three colleagues from abroad.

457. The economy of so-called Portuguese Guinea was basically agricultural. The party had drawn up a report on the possibilities for the development of that economy and was starting to put the conclusions of its report into effect. Besides ground-nuts, the cultivation of other oil-bearing crops, manioc and sweet potatoes was being developed. There were now some people's shops where they could obtain manufactured goods from abroad in exchange for the agricultural products at their disposal. It was a barter system into which money did not enter. The manufactured goods of prime necessity came mainly from gifts.

458. The school children were going to carry out a tree-planting programme. Furthermore, the Territory possessed unexploited petroleum and bauxite resources. The party was counting on the co-operation of foreign countries and the United Nations to help it to exploit its resources and thus gradually to raise the level of living of the population, which was at present extremely low.

459. In reply to questions he said that Portuguese reprisals mainly took the form of bombing isolated villages from the air, while in the big centres, the Portuguese settlers were still arresting and torturing patriots. One of his associates who had been on an assignment for Jeune Afrique in the north of the country and had gone into a bombed village near the Farim River after some aircraft had flown over and would later describe his experience to the Committee.

460. The morale of the Portuguese troops was very low. They were taking part in the war because they did not know how to get out of it. Many soldiers deserted and turned up with the forces of the liberation army. More recently, one of the deserters had said that at least 60 per cent of the soldiers in his barracks were tired of the war and wanted only to see the end of it. In that atmosphere there were constant conflicts between soldiers and men. For at least a year and a half the Portuguese had been on the defensive. In fact, their only offensives were directed against the civilian population, whom they bombed relentlessly. The liberation army, on the other hand, had made a point of constantly taking the offensive. That was the very principle of its struggle. His country would fight to the end to achieve independence.

461. He quoted an extract from an article by the Portuguese journalist, Martinho Simões, that had appeared in the Diário de Notícias for April 1966:

"I think 'sad' is the word that best describes the mission of the men who make up the mobile fighting units. Indeed, they must expect the most hostile living conditions. Clearing the way for themselves through the capim, tearing their flesh on the rough tarraço (tamarisk), getting bogged down in the mud which covers large areas of the Guinean soil (how many times are they not forced to advance hand in hand or else 'swim' over the viscous substance), they have only themselves to rely on.

"They know that the enemy is on the watch for them, hidden in the dense vegetation. They know that the attack will come at any moment—or rather, in the worst circumstances: when some obstacle immobilizes them or when some mishap lowers the efficiency of their security system. They know that if the terrorists decide to take the offensive, it is because they have calculated beforehand that the situation is favourable to them, either because of their numerical superiority, or because of the quantity and quality of the arms at their disposal, or else because they occupy a favourable position. They know that ambush is an imminent danger. They know that they will not have a single moment of rest, however long the expedition lasts. . . .

". . . Meanwhile, in the barracks, the garrisons must constantly keep on the alert. The 'bandoleiros' (brigands) are cowards. They come, under cover of silence and the dark of night, hurl the instruments of death supplied to them in abundance by the Communists and flee back to their encampments in the neighbouring countries."

462. To supplement the information he had provided he asked the Committee to hear his four associates, Mrs. Joyce Lusso, Mr. Justin Vieyra, Mr. Isidro Romero and Mr. Piero Nelli, whom he had included in his request for a hearing (A/AC.109/PET.511 and Add.1) and who would each describe what he had personally seen in Guinea. Two of them were film-makers, one French and one Italian, and two were Italian journalists.

463. Mrs. Joyce Lusso said that she had recently returned from a journey to the southern part of so-called Portuguese Guinea. She had been mainly interested in the civil organization of the region. The war there was a harsh necessity and it was proceeding, all things considered, in circumstances which gave every ground for hope. It was still necessary, however, to establish a society capable of administering its own affairs in those areas. The Portuguese had so far prevented that. The 99.7 per cent of the population who were illiterate were ipso facto deprived of their civil rights. Under Portuguese law, Guinea was not a colony but a province, the inhabitants of which had the same rights as Portuguese citizens provided that they fulfilled the required conditions, which it was quite impossible for them to do. In fact, in order to vote, every Guinean citizen had to know Portuguese, be familiar with Portuguese custom and culture and submit financial guarantees. That being so, the vast majority of the population were actually governed by a colonial statute which had quickly reduced them to slavery, inasmuch as they were forced to accept inadmissible work contracts and in some cases were liable to deportation.

464. With the support of the population, the liberation army had managed to keep Portuguese troops out of the liberated zones. The occupying Power had no recourse but bombing. In fact, reconnaissance aircraft and bombers were the only vestiges of mechanization that the country owed to the Portuguese. Those towns and villages were bombed, either once or repeatedly, and rather than seeking safety in flight the local population was persisting in rebuilding them, with admirable tenacity.

465. The administration of the liberated regions was entrusted to two interregional administrative committees, subdivided into four regional committees in the north and six in the south. The regions were subdivided into sectors or provinces, each covering a certain number of villages or communes and administered by five party members and five representatives elected by the people. The whole population, men and women, took part in administrative activities and in the organization of production and distribution at the village level.

466. At the interregional and regional committee levels, the administrative heads were appointed by the party. At the sectoral and communal levels, some administrators were appointed by the party, while others were elected according to democratic procedures. The relationship between the administrative services, the armed forces and the party was an extremely flexible one. There was no hierarchical crystallization, but constant osmosis between the military life and civilian life. It was an extremely interesting phenomenon to observe, to which men and women contributed equally. The regular army had been formed with the help of foreign countries. It was supplemented by groups of partisans in the maquis and by popular militias. Justice was dispensed by democratically elected committees, except in cases which called for the establishment of a special court.

467. The local economy was still a subsistence economy, which sufficed to feed the population. Each committee organized communal work in the territory under its jurisdiction. There, as elsewhere, the women worked side by side with the men.

468. Education at all levels was one of the prime concerns of the committee, which was building schools in the forests to try to protect their pupils against enemy bombing, for it should be stressed that the Portuguese showed a predilection for attacking school sites.

469. She had visited several schools in the liberated regions. The buildings were primitive: roofs of foliage and branches, tree trunks for tables and benches. Text-books were lacking. The whole village, however, was taking part in an amazing way in the literacy campaign that had been undertaken. The teachers were very young people who had just completed their secondary education and were devoting two years to teaching before leaving for advanced study abroad.

470. She appealed to all to help those bush schools to obtain school equipment, paper and cotton fabric to make pinafores for the children.

471. To sum up, she had been able to see for herself that the foundations of a future democratic society were already laid and that that society was developing coherently, on the basis of exchanges between doctrine and experience.

472. Replying to a question, the petitioner said that there was no lack of food. The people of the southern regions were industrious and despite the lack of modern equipment they used highly advanced methods. Rice was cultivated as in Italy and production was so abundant that it was possible to build up stocks in the people's shops and the silos. The rice might be used as trading currency if the lack of communications did not make it impossible to transport. The country also produced ground-nut oil and palm oil. There was an abundance of livestock and poultry. The people were well fed, strong and healthy. The party was planning the country's agriculture in order to replace the monoculture system established by the Portuguese by a subsistence economy.

473. The liberation army had at its disposal a more than satisfactory supply of arms and, in particular, anti-aircraft batteries, bazookas and very efficient mortars, which enabled the fighters to drive off enemy bombers. The army was very well organized. It was closely linked with the population and there was no trace of hierarchical crystallization in it. The fighters had no ranks. They were not professional soldiers. The cadres were locally recruited and there were no foreign volunteers in the liberation army. Its advance was rational and coherent. Around the liberated zones, the popular army had the upper hand and the Portuguese avoided engagements. The Portuguese bases had been reinforced, but they were completely isolated and cut off, so much so that their provisions were brought by helicopter. The regular army, with the help of advance actions carried out by the partisans, made frequent forays into enemy territory. It should not be forgotten that the war had started only four years ago. Soon the liberation army would pursue its advance and seize the large towns; that would present not only military problems but political problems which all the forces of democracy would have to help in resolving.

474. Mr. Justin Vieyra said that he had spent three days in the Guinean maquis, from 5 to 8 June 1966. He had been with some maquis leaders when, at about 5 o'clock on the morning of 5 June, his friend Nino had told him to run and lie down in the grass to escape the bombers. His terror had been such that he had been able to count only four bombers, but there had certainly been more of them. An hour later, he had gone into the bombed village. He had counted seven dead or dying, one of whom had been disembowelled. He had seen the corpses of a four-year-old child, a young woman and so forth, and a village devastated by bombing, for the aircraft had returned to the attack several times. While he was on the river, in the open, he had seen two jet aircraft machine-gunning the bombed village. The next day the same village had been looted.

475. During the four days he had spent on Guinean territory, it had been the atrocities which had struck him most of all. He appealed to those Africans who were unaware that war was at their door. A mistake was all that was needed for Dakar or any of the Guinean towns to suffer the same fate as the martyred village he had passed through. It should be noted above all that the Portuguese were not attacking soldiers but the civilian population in the villages, which showed the atrocity of that inhuman war.

476. Mr. Isidro Romero, a French film-maker, said that he had travelled through northern and southern Guinea. In the southern part of the Territory he had been able to take some interesting shots. The group he was with had been waiting for a column coming to get arms. The column had arrived bearing on a stretcher two wounded, a man and a child, the sole survivors of a village that had been attacked by the Portuguese. The child had tried to run away. He had been shot down by a bullet in the heel, and then a Portuguese officer had come and given him what he had thought was the finishing stroke. The deadly bullet, passing through the child's ear, had torn out his cheek, but unfortunately for the Portuguese the child has survived to bear witness to their atrocities. The film that was to be shown to the Committee would illustrate that story.

477. He recalled the case of the wounded man he had seen beside the child of whom he had already spoken. The man, who was middle-aged, had received bazooka splinters in his leg ten days earlier. As the liberation army had no anti-gangrene serum, the man's leg was slowly rotting and the wound was crawling with huge worms. The members of the Special Committee would be able to see in the film that was to be shown to them some pictures that were not easy to stomach, dramatically illustrating the fighters' lack of medical supplies.

478. As a film-maker, he had taken part in an ambush organized by the detachment of the liberation army which had launched an attack on the Portuguese town of Mançoa. The detachment had taken a road that some African workers were repairing under the supervision of Portuguese soldiers. At about 1 p.m. it had attacked the lorries taking the Portuguese soldiers back to their barracks and had set fire to eleven enemy lorries and two automatic machine-guns. It had, of course, spared the lorry carrying the African labourers.

479. Mr. Piero Nelli, an Italian film-maker, said that he and his team had made their first stop in a village which the Portuguese had bombed immediately after their departure. The bombing had left a number of dead, including five girls. During its northward march, the team had passed through another village that had been completely destroyed by the Portuguese. While shooting the film they had seen aircraft bombing a third village a few miles away and had managed to film the bombing. They had later gone to the headquarters of the army of the north and had visited field hospitals there, where the wounded partisans were given treatment. It was true that the sight of soldiers wounded in a war had shocked him less than seeing the deliberate butchering of innocent women and children, so implacable were the laws of war.

480. Describing the films that were to be shown to the Committee which had been shot during fifteen days in the maquis, he said that he had managed to take some shots inside a field hospital in the north which was devoted mainly to the treatment of war casualties. He had seen some amazing things there: the morning was devoted to the medical care usually given to the wounded, injections, dressings and so forth. Then, young student nurses attended in rotation two-hour courses dealing not only with nursing and first aid but also with general therapy. He himself had been present at a clinical lecture on angina pectoris. On the night of 2-3 February 1966, immediately after he had crossed the frontier between Senegal and so-called Portuguese Guinea, he had seen a school in a forest where a sixteen-year-old youth was teaching soldiers and children to read.

481. The aspirations of the people had been expressed in very simple and naive terms by a peasant woman during a meeting held at the northern headquarters of the Guinean liberation army: "We want to open people's shops in the north of the country where purchases can be made by barter. We want our men to come back and work the land. We want the war to end, but we also want to win it, because this war is a just one, because this war has given us hospitals, schools and freedom, because this war gives us back the land that belongs to us."

482. Replying to a question on the morale of the Portuguese troops, he recalled two episodes at which he had been present in person. Firstly, he had taken part in the fighting near Mansoa, where the Guinean army had laid an ambush for the Portuguese troops. The troops had arrived. All their heavy fire had been concentrated on the liberation army detachment facing them, but they had confined themselves to remaining on the defensive. A group of about thirty freedom fighters had attacked a hundred men, four armoured trucks and two tanks. They had destroyed two trucks and put thirty to forty men out of action. The reason for the Portuguese failure to counter-attack was that they were not sure of the morale of their troops. Secondly, he had seen Portuguese troops disembarking on the other side of Farim and embarking in a gunboat guided by a helicopter. The soldiers had made their way through the bush, shooting at random. They had advanced in disarray, but had made no attempt to attack.

483. In reply to further questions the petitioner, Mr. Cabral, said that the question of the Territories under Portuguese domination should be brought before the Security Council and that the United Nations specialized agencies should give the nationalist liberation movements assistance. It was essential that the Security Council should declare the sanctions against Portugal obligatory and place an embargo on the supply of arms, if the resolutions were to be really effective. It should also be recognized that the nationalist movements were creating the necessary conditions for the implementation of the principles of the Charter, the Declaration on Human Rights, self-determination and independence. Assistance from the specialized agencies, such as UNICEF, UNESCO, WHO and the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, could be provided through the intermediary of CONCP.

484. The nationalists' various movements were already preparing themselves to take over responsibilities of government after independence and a new experiment was in progress in Guinea and Cape Verde. The planning had to be by progressive stages, taking account of the economic, social and cultural situation of the region. Although extensive areas had been liberated, there was no question, for the moment, of setting up a provisional government; nevertheless, in all the liberated regions administrative organs were being created and gradually separated from the party structure. As an example, he mentioned the establishment of a civil registry office and health services, and arrangements for a census during the current year. All the leaders of the struggle and all educated people were devoting themselves to economic, social and cultural studies, in order to be able to assume all responsibilities after independence.

485. In the years since 1950 the patriots in the different territories had begun to become aware of their position as men and Africans. They had first of all created combined movements for the common struggle. From 1956 onwards, national organizations had been set up in each Territory. In 1961 the first conference of nationalist movements had been held in Casablanca, following which it had been possible to establish a Secretariat. The second conference, which had been held at Dar es Salaam, in 1965, had made it possible to establish concrete bases for co-ordination at the political and military level with a view to the reconstruction of the countries. At that conference it had been decided, among other things, that one person would represent the Portuguese Territories at international conferences in future. Another meeting was to be held at Brazzaville in the near future with a view to strengthening that co-ordination. A military commission was engaged in co-ordinating military activities in the various countries and a social commission was dealing with questions of education and health assistance. There was also a joint programme for primary schools. Other bodies had been established to promote the exchange of experience, for the struggle was the same for all; every nationalist was aware of himself as an African and was fighting for the liberation of his country and his people.

486. Not only the Portuguese Territories but all the African States and all peace- and freedom-loving States throughout the world were concerned about the establishment of a fascist régime in South Africa and in Southern Rhodesia. The consequences were in part subjective and in part objective. From the subjective point of view, the fact that a racist régime was developing with impunity in Africa strengthened the hopes, the illusions and the machinations of the Portuguese colonialists. From the objective point of view, it was clear that Portugal, Southern Rhodesia and South Africa were taking practical steps to persecute, arrest and massacre the African. In Guinea, for example, Portugal in agreement with South Africa, was building a large airport on an island, to replace the African airports from which South Africa was barred. The airport would also give Portugal a secure base from which to bomb the people of the Cape Verde Islands and Guinea.

487. After three years of struggle, the people had discovered the secret of the colonial war being waged by Portugal, a poor and backward country. Portugal was in fact using American arms, as a journalist had written in The Washington Post. The people had realized that Portugal was receiving aircraft, napalm bombs and automatic weapons from its NATO allies. The States members of NATO replied that they did not authorize Portugal to use those weapons. If, however, you gave a knife to a madman bent on killing, how could you expect him not to use it? He also pointed out that the ESSO Company had renewed a contract with Portugal. At the start of the war of liberation the company's technicians had been dismissed, but after three years of fighting, when it was realized that the struggle would continue, the American company had concluded a new contract. He had asked a United States Embassy representative in Conakry the reason for that and had been told that the company was no doubt anxious to keep its leading position. In the present situation, that act was regarded as an unfriendly one, since it put more funds at Portugal's disposal for the continuation of its struggle.

488. As to the reported delivery of Italian FIAT aircraft by the Federal Republic of Germany to Portugal, that was because within the framework of the Common Market and the agreements between Italy and the Federal Republic, FIAT aircraft were being assembled in the Federal Republic of Germany. There were twenty of those aircraft operating in Guinea. Thus aircraft designed by Italian brains and built by German manpower were being delivered for use in the Territories under Portuguese domination to exterminate the people, whose sole desire was to build their country in peace, like the Italian people.

489. Besides the aircraft and arms from the Federal Republic of Germany and the United States, other arms had been found, such as machine-guns and grenades, for example, made in Italy and Belgium. Furthermore, it was almost certain that the helicopters being used in Guinea were French-manufactured Alouettes.

490. Up to four months earlier the total strength of the Portuguese troops in the Territory had been about 20,000 men but, following the many losses it had suffered, Portugal had raised that figure to 25,000. He could not say whether there were any mercenaries among them. With respect to aviation, there were technicians at Bissau hidden in a villa some distance from the town who were probably not Portuguese, for they did not look Portuguese and did not speak that language. He did not know what their nationality was but he supposed they were South Africans. It was quite likely that the countries which were supplying planes to Portugal were also sending it technicians to look after them.

491. The Portuguese had on several occasions violated the air space of Guinea and Senegal, and both countries had brought complaints of the violation of their frontiers before the Security Council. Such violations were a common occurrence. The previous month, on 6 May 1966 if he was not mistaken, the Portuguese had crossed the Guinean frontier in order to go and set fire to a village and to capture the chiefs of the village because the nationalist forces had made a mortar attack on one of their barracks in Buruntuma. There had followed an exchange of fire between the Portuguese troops and the Guinean troops, but Guinea had not brought that incident before the Security Council for it considered it to be part of the daily struggle. He understood that Portuguese aircraft had been brought down in the Congo (Brazzaville), too. Portuguese troops had also repeatedly crossed the Senegalese frontier to burn down villages.

492. Replying to a question on armaments used by his movement, he said that every national liberation struggle had its own laws. The arms used had to correspond to the actual needs of the struggle. At the beginning the fighters had had only traditional and primitive weapons, lances and pistols. Subsequently, they had managed to obtain rifles, machine pistols and even small cannon. Aircraft and sophisticated weapons would be necessary, but technical staff able to use them would also be needed. Although the nationalist forces had captured some tanks they did not keep them, because they were unable to use them. They therefore destroyed them with mines or bazookas. The tanks were usually of American origin or from the Federal Republic of Germany. In the fighters' day-to-day struggle it was the men who counted above all, and there were many ready to sacrifice their lives for the triumph of their cause.

493. The system of colonial justice in the Territory was the same as in all colonial countries. Guinea was regarded as a comarca, i.e., as a division of the Portuguese judicial system, subject to the authority of Lisbon. There was one system of justice for the Europeans and the assimilados and another for the indigenous population. The latter were dealt summary justice by the local administrator. They were arrested and given no possibility of defence, and their fate depended on the arbitrary wishes of that administrator. In general they were sentenced to prison, corporal punishment or forced labour. He suggested that for fuller information on that question the representative of Sierra Leone might consult the report which had been submitted to the Special Committee on Territories under Portuguese administration at Conakry in 1962. The report, entitled "The People of so-called Portuguese Guinea before the United Nations" gave some very precise details on the way in which justice was administered in that Territory.

494. PAIGC did not consider that there were really any Guinean representatives in the Portuguese National Assembly. The Portuguese Government chose the representatives of so-called Portuguese Guinea itself, in order to be able to claim that there were representatives of that country in the National Assembly. There were at present four so-called Guineans among the members of that Assembly but only one of them was really a Guinean and the PAIGC regarded him as a traitor. There were no real elections in so-called Portuguese Guinea.

495. As to the attitude of the PAIGC, if Mr. Salazar no longer held power and Portugal's colonial policy subsequently changed and became favourable to independence for Guinea called Portuguese Guinea, the petitioner said that his party was not struggling against the Portuguese people, but against Salazar's fascist régime. It was not certain whether the disappearance of that régime would necessarily lead to a change of attitude on the part of the Portuguese Government. If, however, such were the case, the PAIGC would be ready to collaborate with the Portuguese Government if that Government recognized its just claims. The Guineans did not like war; they had been impelled to fight, against their will.

496. PAIGC was at present making efforts to spread the idea of liberty among the Portuguese soldiers, so that they might appreciate the liberation movement and ultimately defect and enlist in its ranks, and it had already achieved some results. In fact, a good many of the Portuguese troops were illiterate and understood nothing about the struggle they were forced to engage in. Portugal was trying to keep them in ignorance, to prevent them revolting. The Political Commissioner of the nationalist army had prepared leaflets for the Portuguese soldiers, to be planted on the route the soldiers were to take. The leaflets, however, never included any words of hatred of the Portuguese. Some leaflets had been planted in the north of the country encouraging the Portuguese soldiers to desert.

497. One deserter, a twenty-year-old Portuguese, who had been in Guinea for ten months, when asked whether he knew why he was fighting a war, had replied that the Portuguese officers told their troops they were to go and disperse the bandits. The deserter had said, moreover, that the exit of his barracks was guarded and that the supply of provisions was very bad. On being asked whether he thought the nationalists had any chance of winning the war, the soldier had replied in the affirmative, pointing out that the Portuguese did not know the terrain well and that that was why they always put their African recruits in forward positions.

Petitioners concerning São Tomé and Príncipe

498. Mr. Medeiros, speaking on behalf of the Comité de Libertação de São Tomé e Príncipe (CLSTP), said that the fact that the Special Committee, in the closing stage of its journey, had included the question of the Portuguese Territories in its agenda signified that the struggle of those peoples was now one of the most important events in the African continent.

499. That event, which was unprecedented in the history of Portuguese colonialism, showed that in the present circumstances the people of São Tomé and Príncipe, regardless of their geographical situation, the size of their Territory and the number of their population, was determined to liquidate colonial domination completely.

500. It caused him particular joy to see, in the Special Committee, delegates representing peoples of Africa, Asia and Latin America which, in equally difficult circumstances, were waging a struggle to consolidate their political and economic independence.

501. Three years had elapsed since the last contact between the representative of São Tomé and Príncipe and the Fourth Committee of the United Nations.

502. An understanding of the various problems created by the Portuguese presence in that country revealed that the relationship between colonizer and colonized continued to be dominated by a pattern in which the colonizer was the landowner and the African a mere instrument of production.

503. While the roça (a huge agricultural property) was still the nucleus of agrarian activities in the island, which were tied to the exploitation of the productive land, great changes had been made in its physiognomy for the purpose of concentrating everything in the hands of two large Portuguese monopolies, Banco Nacional Ultramarino and Companhia União Fabril.

504. Those huge agricultural properties occupied 93 per cent of the arable land, and their internal configuration gave the archipelago the appearance of a collection of "micro-states" in which the periphery was occupied by the indigenous population. Their economic activities were quite limited, and they entailed subsistence agriculture in an area representing 7 per cent of the arable land and monopolizing 52 per cent of the population of the archipelago.

505. The annual national income of the inhabitants of São Tomé and Príncipe was about $US25. The standard of living of the population was one of the lowest in the world, and the infant mortality rate was 42 per thousand. In addition, tropical diseases, illiteracy, which was about 85 per cent, and malnutrition were facts of everyday life; hence the conflict which was daily becoming more bitter owing to the scarcity of manpower.

506. The emergence of a revolutionary spirit, resulting from the conditions in which the Portuguese presence had been imposed (colonization, slavery, oppression and resistance to oppression), and the patient action of the Comité de Libertação de São Tomé e Príncipe had caused Portugal to strengthen its military apparatus; a complete war machine had been established and was being perfected, in order to stifle at birth the aspirations of the people of São Tomé and Príncipe to independence.

507. In December 1965, a group of seventeen patriots in São Tomé, including the very well-known poetess Alda de Espírito Santo, had been arrested.

508. The PIDE (political police) were using unhappily traditional methods of torture on them. In particular, a young student, António Lamba, had had to be admitted to a psychiatric clinic because of the ill-treatment inflicted on him.

509. The historical perspective and the importance of the struggle of the people of São Tomé and Príncipe might not be appreciated if geographical size alone was considered. Whereas in the past the islands of São Tomé and Príncipe, owing to their geographical situation, had functioned as depots for slaves, the archipelago was now actually becoming, in view of the expansion of the struggles for liberation in Angola and Mozambique, a military base against the nationalist movements in those countries, as well as in São Tomé and Príncipe.

510. The archipelago was gaining importance in the context of air communications between Portugal and its Territories, especially since the independent African countries had closed their harbours and airports to the Portuguese colonialists.

511. The archipelago functioned as a supporting and supply base for aircraft flying from Lisbon to Angola and Mozambique. In addition, the struggle by the imperialist Powers for the reconquest of Africa made the archipelago a supporting base for any future punitive operations against neighbouring countries. For instance, the Bonn militarists and revanchistes were toying with the idea of establishing a military base in the island of São Tomé.

512. It was for that reason that the airport at São Tomé had been improved in the light of new military needs. As a result of the improvements, Angola and Mozambique were required to contribute 1.7 million escudos each, and São Tomé 600,000 escudos, to the operational budget of the airport, under the terms of Decree No. 45,745 of 1 June 1965.

513. Armed struggle was the only solution to the colonial conflict in São Tomé and Príncipe, and CLSTP was fully aware of the risks involved in that solution. Portugal's attitude both towards the peoples of the archipelago and towards the neighbouring African States were such that the Portuguese Government must be regarded as an aggressor. That being so, the Security Council must apply obligatory sanctions against Portugal and, in particular, must place an embargo on the supply of arms and military matériel.

514. He was glad that that point and others raised by all the representatives of the peoples of the Portuguese Territories had been included in the draft resolutions of the Special Committee (A/AC.109/L.315 and A/AC.109/L.313).

515. The people of São Tomé and Príncipe had been living for five centuries under the weight of Portuguese colonial domination, and the history of their struggle showed that decolonization could be achieved only by the will of the people, guided exclusively by the revolutionary ideal.

516. In conclusion, he wished to pay ardent tribute to the Algerian people, whose struggle for liberation was a lesson to all and formed part of the heritage of progressive men everywhere.

Petitioner concerning other Territories under Portuguese administration

517. Mr. de Andrade, speaking on behalf of the Conferência das Organizações Nacionalistas das Colónias Portuguesas (CONCP), said that the formation of the Committee on Decolonization was the culmination of a prolonged struggle within the United Nations to have colonialism condemned, one of the most significant landmarks of which had been the adoption of resolution 1514 (XV) on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples.

518. The time had passed when reports of the violence practised by the colonial administration were drowned by the many other conflicts in which the great imperialist Powers were involved. The whole world was now aware that Portugal was exploiting its colonies and rejecting the demands and aspirations of the indigenous populations. The reports drawn up by the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly described, not a "Portuguese oasis of peace", but battlefields of national liberation wars.

519. The spirit and letter of the United Nations Charter provided a legal basis and moral support for the war of liberation being waged by the peoples of the Portuguese colonies. The General Assembly resolution of 20 December 1965 recognized the legitimacy of the means employed to make the right to self-determination and independence prevail. It was for that reason that one of the leaders of the nationalist movements had rightly declared that those who were fighting were anonymous United Nations fighters. In confronting that just people's war, Portugal had the advantage of the complicity and the diplomatic, military and economic support of the members of NATO. Those countries were contravening the principles of the Charter, of which they were signatories.

520. The Conferência das Organizações Nacionalistas das Colónias Portuguesas described itself as a unified fighting front for the elimination of Portuguese colonialism. It had grown out of the need to co-ordinate the efforts of various existing organizations with a view to enabling them to attain their immediate objective: the conquest of national independence. The Conference had reorganized itself in December 1965 in order better to co-ordinate the political and military action of its member nationalist movements. The Conference played the part of a catalyst of the popular forces and organized concerted action at the international level. Since the meeting at Casablanca in April 1961 at which it had been formed, CONCP had been in touch constantly with the United Nations, OAU and the African States. It had been lobbying for an economic and diplomatic boycott of Portugal. The adoption by the General Assembly of resolution 1514 (XV) had placed the problem of eradicating colonialism in a new light and provided wider scope for international action by nationalist movements. The CONCP mission which had visited New York in November 1965 had submitted to the Fourth Committee specific proposals, the spirit, if not the letter, of which was reproduced in the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly at its previous session.

521. The national liberation movement in Portuguese colonies had always had a dual aim. Firstly, it sought to destroy the Portuguese colonial structures and to gain effective control of vast regions of Angola, Mozambique and Guinea; secondly, it was engaged in national reconstruction in all spheres of political, administrative, economic, social and cultural life. Where terror and arbitrary rule, ignorance and disease had formerly prevailed, it established the democracy inherent in the nature of nationalist movements and set up schools and health centres. That factor introduced a new dimension into the task of decolonization. From the moment when armed struggle had come to be seen as the only means of securing the right to self-determination, nationalist movements had had to alter the emphasis of their efforts. Decolonization should, in fact, deprive Portugal of any opportunity of establishing another type of domination after independence was achieved. It should be noted, in that connexion, that the Portuguese Government had never shown any inclination for a negotiated solution to the problem of its colonies on the basis of the right to self-determination. There was abundant proof that Portugal did not recognize the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of the Territories under its domination were paramount; the nationalist movements had therefore had to undertake the responsibility of themselves administering the peoples in wartime. The liberation movements played a peaceful part in that sphere: they respected the culture of the peoples and provided for their political, economic and social advance. The international consequences of that state of affairs were obvious. By speaking the language of justice, law, democracy and culture, the liberation movements were helping to strengthen international peace and security. In the light of that new information on the situation in the liberated areas, Chapter XI, and particularly Article 73, of the Charter relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories no longer appeared to have any meaning.

522. He expressed appreciation of the work done by the High Commissioner for Refugees. That problem was sufficiently important to form the subject of a seminar in which the leaders of the nationalist movements could participate.

523. CONCP, which acted on behalf of the Comité de Libertação de São Tomé e Príncipe, the Frente de Libertação de Moçambique, the Movimento Popular de Libertação de Angola and the Partido Africano da Independência de Guiné e Cabo Verde, considered that the question of the Territories administered by Portugal should not only appear on the agenda of the twenty-first session of the General Assembly but be brought before the Security Council. The implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples could have no meaning unless the Special Committee took into account the new situation created by the nationalist movements, which already controlled extensive areas. The nationalist movements considered that, in accordance with the spirit and the letter of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX), operative paragraph 10, they were entitled to recommend the Special Committee to determine, in agreement with the national liberation movements, the types of priority assistance to be given to the struggling peoples. Although the practical help which might be given by the specialized agencies to nationalist movements would have to be discussed, he thought the most effective help would undoubtedly be that affecting education and would be provided by UNESCO and the High Commissioner for Refugees. In this connexion he hoped that the Committee would endorse the idea of holding a seminar on the refugee problem. A number of African countries were accepting refugees and nationals of countries which were fighting against Portugal. It would be desirable for the nationalist movements and CONCP to take part in the organization of the seminar and to contribute to it by providing information.

524. On the other hand in pursuance of operative paragraph 11 of the same resolution, he felt that the Committee should recommend the expulsion of Portugal from the specialized agencies of the United Nations.

525. The United Nations, and the Special Committee in particular, had aroused immense hopes among the peoples under Portuguese administration and had created an atmosphere of confidence among the leaders of the political movements. In appealing to the Committee, CONCP had been prompted by the desire to help, however modestly, in making international peace, justice and co-operation prevail throughout the world.

526. In reply to a question, the petitioner said that CONCP, comprising the organizations he had named before, had been established in April 1961, two months after the start of the armed struggle in Angola. The Union des populations de l'Angola was not a member of the unified organization, although it had been invited to the constituent assembly of CONCP in April 1961. The Union had said at that time that it was materially impossible for it to send a representative to Casablanca. CONCP had repeated its appeal and had stated that it was prepared to welcome any movement which was fighting to achieve specific aims.

527. CONCP was the catalyst of the peoples' forces and its role was to co-ordinate all political and military action, in order to hasten the defeat of the common enemy. Each nationalist organization had to make a contribution to it. CONCP was headed by the Conference, which met every two years. Between meetings of the Conference, the Governing Council, composed of the leaders of the four political parties which were members of CONCP, was responsible for interpreting the resolutions of the Conference and putting them into effect. The executive body, which acted as a permanent secretariat, comprised four sections, under the direction of officials of the nationalist movements. CONCP had its own sources of information. It had drawn up a programme of action, approved by the Council, which was divided into two parts: the political and military struggle, and national reconstruction. Action to promote national reconstruction was the responsibility of a special committee for education and culture, and was carried out both in areas which had been wrested from the colonial administration and in the frontier areas which gave shelter to the nationalist movements.

528. Many areas were already controlled by the nationalist movement; in Cabinda, for instance, the area controlled represented 30 per cent of the territory. The administrative system set up in those areas reflected the structure of the parties.

529. In order to make the Conference better known, it had drawn up a plan of action and propaganda. The Governing Council was at present strengthening the permanent secretariat, which would have an information section large enough to cover various regions. As the nationalist movements were having difficulties in connexion with their information services, particularly in countries which were hostile to them, the information and propaganda section was going to try to arrange for the various supporting committees of the nationalist movements to represent it in Latin America and even in Western countries.

530. In his opinion it was not true that sanctions would cause most suffering to the Africans, and the policy of sanctions against Portugal should be continued. He expressed satisfaction with the efforts of the Special Committee and of all peace-loving Members of the United Nations to make sanctions against Portugal and the commercial and political boycott of that country a reality. With regard to operative paragraph 7 of resolution 2107 (XX), approaches had been made to the African States which were best placed to respond favourably. It was encouraging to note that many recommendations made to the Fourth Committee had been included in draft resolutions submitted to the General Assembly. In the matter of the commercial boycott the role of the great Western Powers was obviously decisive. That boycott was linked with the alliance between Portugal and its NATO partners. That important problem might be reviewed, not only by the General Assembly, but also by the Security Council.

531. Although the United States and other Western Powers had rejected allegations that they were providing assistance to Portugal through NATO, there was ample proof that help existed, in the form of military equipment and weapons captured by fighting members of the nationalist movements. That evidence required no comment. Other petitioners from nationalist movements which operated in the maquis would provide material proof. Those movements had prepared several reports on the matter. It was well known that German instructors were being sent to Portugal under the co-operation arrangements between Portugal and the Federal Republic of Germany.

532. The Federal Republic of Germany was also providing military, political and economic assistance to Portugal. The pact between the Federal Republic of Germany and Portugal showed that the fascist spirit which still prevailed in that country was in harmony with the fascist tendency of the Portuguese Government. That problem would be difficult to solve except by intensifying the struggle, which would eventually make it possible to break the alliance between the Federal Republic of Germany and Portugal.

533. In reply to a question he said that he had no exact figures of loans and investments made by the Federal Republic of Germany. The representatives of the nationalist movements which had documents available on the subject would, however, willingly supply them. He assured the Committee that those documents would be placed before it in the near future.

534. Summing up CONCP's position he said that it hoped the Security Council would continue to keep the question of the Territories under Portuguese administration before it, because Portugal's attitude was a threat to international peace. Since the Security Council was the only international body which could adopt resolutions of a mandatory nature, it was the Council's responsibility to deal with that question and to decide, if appropriate, to expel Portugal from the United Nations. The second demand submitted concerned the development of the conflict between CONCP and the administering Power. As matters stood, it was the nationalist movements which should direct the work of decolonization; for that they needed assistance from the United Nations and the specialized agencies. It was the opinion of CONCP that the assistance which, in accordance with resolutions of the United Nations, should be refused to Portugal should logically be transferred to the liberation movements.

GENERAL STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

535. The representative of Ethiopia said that the problem regarding the question of Territories under Portuguese administration had never been and never would be lack of clarity in the objectives and intents of those interested, but rather want of rigour in the measures adopted to make Portugal realize its folly and to force it to respond favourably to the demands of the indigenous people of its Territories and to civilized world opinion.

536. The conditions of the unfortunate millions of African brothers in Angola, Mozambique, so-called Portuguese Guinea and other Territories under the yoke of Portuguese colonial domination were too well known to require detailed treatment. Portuguese tyranny and the cruelty with which the African majority in the Portuguese Territories was being repressed was a well-known tragedy that had shocked the conscience of mankind. The Committee at a previous meeting had had a first-hand account of the methods of repression used by the Portuguese fascists against innocent people struggling for freedom. His delegation wished to express once again its appreciation to Mr. Ervedosa who, because of lofty humanitarian motives and high moral conscience, had resigned from the ranks of the Portuguese Army in protest against the barbarous acts perpetrated by Portugal. He hoped that the world would see more Portuguese of his calibre and sense of dedication taking the side of justice in the future.

537. He had no intention of repeating the atrocities of the crime Portugal was committing against humanity. Neither would it be necessary for him to review the various concrete recommendations made by the Committee and various other organs of the United Nations on the matter. Nevertheless, inasmuch as it was the Committee's duty to make constant use of that forum to keep concerned world opinion informed on the developments of those Territories, he felt obliged to recall some salient features of the measures so far adopted.

538. In recognition of the large-scale human tragedy involved in the problem of Portuguese colonial administration, the General Assembly of the United Nations and its various organs had on several occasions considered and made clear proposals and recommendations concerning those Territories which were mercilessly being exploited by Portugal. There was no doubt in anybody's mind that those Territories were non-self-governing within the meaning of Chapter XI of the United Nations Charter. Therefore, the claim made by the Portuguese authorities that Portugal and its so-called overseas Territories constituted one "pluri-continental and multi-racial nation" was without any foundation and had been rejected beyond doubt. The situation resulting from the highly unrealistic position held by Portugal, both as regards the African population of its Territories and the neighbouring States, seriously disturbed international peace and security.

539. Prime Minister Salazar, explaining his Government's policy regarding its Territories, said that in the case of Portugal the only thing that mattered was to determine whether the laws conferred on the citizens of the Territories the same political rights, i.e., those through which the individual influenced the character of the State.

540. If one asked whether that had been achieved in Portuguese Territories, the answer was a definite no. Judged by any moral standard, Portugal could not escape condemnation for the outmoded policy it was perpetrating in its Territories.

541. The General Assembly, the Security Council and the Special Committee had time and again requested the Government of Portugal, among other things, to recognize the inalienable rights of the people of the Territories under its administration to self-determination and independence in accordance with the provisions of the Charter and resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960, which solemnly proclaimed the necessity of bringing to a speedy and unconditional end colonialism in all its forms and manifestations.

542. From what the Committee had heard from the petitioners and from the various reports in the Territories, it was obvious that the situation in the Portuguese Territories had taken a turn for the worse. Each passing day marked atrocious crimes committed against humanity. Each day more and more Africans were exiled from their homes, imprisoned and tortured. Thousands were put to death by one of the most brutal military forces the world had ever known.

543. For that cruel and inhuman operation, Portugal was spending millions of dollars to maintain its overseas army. During the period 1961-1965, its expenditure had amounted to about $US600 million. For a country as poor and backward as Portugal, that was not a small sum to raise. It was clear how and from what sources Portugal drew its supply to carry out the shameful war it was conducting against the African people in its Territories. A number of resolutions had been passed by the Committee requesting all Member States to refrain from offering assistance to Portugal which would enable it to continue its repression of the peoples of the Territories, and to take measures to prevent not only the sale and supply of arms and military equipment to the Portuguese Government for that purpose, including the sale and shipment of equipment and materials for the manufacture and maintenance of arms and ammunition to be used in the Territories. It was his delegation's earnest hope that all Members would comply with that request and, as recommended, inform the Secretary-General of the United Nations on measures they had taken towards the implementation of all the recommendations.

544. Years had passed since the Portuguese had begun their open colonial war in Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea. In that conduct, they had proved themselves to be most cruel and merciless in brutally suppressing all manifestations of national sentiment among the populations.

545. Nevertheless, the outcries of the millions of Africans would not remain unheeded for much longer. The sooner Portugal realized that it could not reverse the course of history, the better for its own good. No matter how barbarously the Portuguese instrument of oppression was intensified, no matter how generous its allies, no matter how well calculated its social, economic and psychological warfare against the African people, Portugal could not endure the might of the wave of history and the awakened African spirit. Moreover, systems of human oppression such as that set up by Portugal were doomed to collapse by the forces of their own evil.

546. The representative of Afghanistan recalled that over five years had elapsed since the adoption by the General Assembly of resolution 1514 (XV), but that Portuguese Territories were still being subjected to the most ruthless form of colonial exploitation. Portugal's action in holding to those Territories by force of arms had aroused world-wide indignation. It had shown that it had no intention of implementing the resolutions of the Security Council and the General Assembly or even of preparing the Territories for self-determination, giving as an excuse that they were part of metropolitan Portugal. However, similar policies followed in the past by other colonial Powers had always failed.

547. Portugal itself was a poor country and was striving to attain a higher level of development. But for five years it had been carrying on an expensive colonial war. It was obvious that Portugal could not wage that war alone and that it was receiving assistance from its allies, in particular from South Africa and Southern Rhodesia.

548. Paragraph 8 of General Assembly resolution 2107 (XX) of 21 December 1965 requested all States, and in particular Portugal's NATO allies, to desist from supplying it with arms; if that resolution was implemented it would help to paralyse Portugal. Collusion between Portugal, South Africa and Southern Rhodesia had, however, assured impunity for Portugal.

549. The petitioners whom the Committee had heard in Dar es Salaam had testified to the fact that several thousand Whites had been settled by South Africa in Mozambique and that Portugal was forcing thousands of Mozambicans to seek employment in South Africa and Southern Rhodesia. The economic implications of such action were revolting: those three countries were forming a sort of common market of cheap mobile labour.

550. There was a spark of hope in that desperate situation: the freedom fighters, who had not only liberated large tracts of Portuguese-dominated Territories but were even administering them. That was significant in view of the fact that Portugal was maintaining that the liberation movement was not an organized force but a band of foreign agents. Another important fact was that the Conferência das Organizações Nacionalistas das Colónias Portuguesas (CONCP) grouped all the nationalist movements.

551. The Committee had to decide upon the best course of action for it to adopt. His delegation believed that, because of the explosive situation in the Portuguese Territories, and because of Portugal's non-compliance with the United Nations resolutions, the Committee should recommend that the Security Council make implementation of resolution 2107 (XX) obligatory and should also urge the High Commissioner for Refugees and the specialized agencies to do their utmost to assist refugees and others in the Portuguese Territories. That was the least the Committee could do to help the valiant people of those Territories.

552. The representative of Mali said that the petitioners had given the Special Committee an objective account of the inhuman behaviour of the forces sent by the Portuguese Government to subdue Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea and also convincing proof of the conspiracy hatched against the African people by the big international financial monopolies supporting the reactionary Government in Lisbon. His delegation denounced such support and vigorously condemned it, because it was contrary to the United Nations Charter and ran counter to the resolutions already adopted by the Security Council, the General Assembly and the Special Committee asking all States to break off economic relations with Portugal and to refrain from giving it financial aid so long as it failed to respect the United Nations resolutions.

553. In the working paper prepared by the Secretariat (paras. 1-244 above), reference was made to a statement by Salazar that the Territories of Angola, Mozambique and Guinea were an integral part of Portugal and there could be no question of self-determination for the inhabitants. He rejected such allegations. Geographically, those Territories could not be an integral part of Portugal, which was situated in Europe. The legal tie binding those countries to Portugal must be sought; to that end he quoted a statement by Mr. Ramani of Malaysia, who had said in the Security Council on 9 November 1965:

"Therefore, if the substance of this relationship can be established between Portugal and its Territories in Africa and Asia, it matters not the slightest whether you call it a colony or an overseas territory or an overseas province. Anyone who takes the trouble to examine the Portuguese constitutional documents I referred to a short while ago will have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the Territories about which we are concerned in this debate are, in the commonly accepted parlance, the colonial Non-Self-Governing Territories of Portugal.

"If I may illustrate: in part II of the Portuguese Constitution, chapter VI carries in its title the term 'Metropolitan Portugal'. Chapter VII is entitled 'Overseas Portugal'; article 133 is extremely significant, and with your permission, I shall read it out to you:

"It is intrinsic in the Portuguese Nation to fulfil its historic mission of colonization in the lands of the Discoveries under their sovereignty and to diffuse among the populations inhabiting them the benefits of their civilization, as also to exercise the moral influence enjoined upon it by the Patronage of the East."

And there you find that dreadful word "colonization" nakedly and unashamedly standing out.

"Article 134 states that the overseas Territories of Portugal described in sub-paragraphs II to V of article 1, shall be known as 'provinces' and that 'their politico-administrative organization shall be on lines best suited to their geographical situation and their social standards'. That nomenclature alone—calling them provinces—will not in fact and in truth make the overseas Territories provinces of metropolitan Portugal, even though they form, in constitutional terms, an integral part of the Portuguese State for the purposes of the Constitution, as Article 135 provides."²⁸

554. If it were accepted, then, that the Territories of Angola, Mozambique and Guinea (Bissau) were colonies, they came under Chapter XI of the Charter and should be examined in the light of Article 73 of the Charter, which made it an obligation for administering Powers to lead the peoples under their administration towards the management of their own affairs. It was the duty of the United Nations to take action against the Portuguese Government and to oblige it to respect the Charter. A date should be set for Portugal to liberate all its colonies and withdraw its military bases. He denounced the conspiracy between the Governments of Portugal, South Africa and the United Kingdom, on account of the iniquitous régime they had deliberately set up in Salisbury. Those forces of evil were helping one another by ruthlessly repressing the slightest impulse of the African people towards independence. In the elections that had just taken place, for example, Portugal had provided by law for one deputy for every 80,000 inhabitants in the national Portuguese territory, one for every 650,000 in Angola and one for every 900,000 in Mozambique. Such arbitrary distribution not sufficing, the law further stipulated that to vote in the elections the indigenous inhabitants must fulfil the following conditions: under the legislation in force, the people entitled to vote were male Portuguese citizens who had attained their majority and who (a) had been emancipated and could read and write Portuguese; (b) although unable to read or write, nevertheless had legal and political capacity and contributed to the State or to the administrative bodies a sum not less than 100 escudos in payment of any of the following taxes: property tax, industrial tax, professional tax or tax on the use of capital. Thus, although the Portuguese Government maintained that the right to vote was granted to all under conditions of equality, there were still at least two barriers—one relating to personal competence, the other to property assessment—which deprived the majority of the indigenous population of the right to vote. The same law existed under different names in Rhodesia and South Africa, in all its arbitrariness and iniquity. In such circumstances the indigenous people had no choice but armed struggle to recover their legitimate right to be men.

555. Driven back to the wall, imperialism was supporting Salazar's fascist régime with all its forces, in order to perpetuate a domination condemned by history and doomed to failure. Mr. Salazar had excluded the possibility of a "political solution" to put an end to the fighting in the Territories under Portuguese administration in Africa. He had stated, moreover, that the prosecution of the military effort was the only means of ensuring order in those Territories and the peaceful advancement of their inhabitants.

556. The Secretariat's report showed a progression in the military allocations in the Portuguese budget. Some taxes had been increased. It was clear, however, that those resources were insufficient, for nearly all the imperialist Powers were giving financial support to the Portuguese Government. Their assistance was not confined to the financial domain but also took the form of armaments, within the framework of NATO. It mattered little whether the NATO countries supplied arms to the Portuguese Government on a multilateral or a bilateral basis; what should be denounced was the use that the Salazar Government was making of them in Africa. Thousands of Africans were falling under the murderous blows of those arms. Portugal and its allies should be condemned, because the war being waged against the population of the Territories under Portuguese administration was unjust and ran counter to human rights. The reason for those heinous crimes was to be found in the conclusions of Sub-Committee I, which had studied the economic aspect of Portuguese colonization in the African Territories. Sub-Committee I had concluded that, by their material and financial support of the Portuguese Government, the foreign economic activities and financial interests in the Territories under Portuguese domination were preventing the various Territories from attaining independence. Thus, under the cover of laws promulgated in Lisbon, for the sole purpose of boosting the Portuguese economy, it had been declared that the mineral resources and natural wealth did not form part of the patrimony of the Overseas Territories. That wealth was being cynically exploited and dispatched to Portugal or other European countries which, through the Portuguese Government, had acquired mining concessions with the power of life and death over the peace-loving African inhabitants. Thus the indigenous inhabitants, robbed of their land, were reduced to slavery by the settlers who had moved from Portugal to Africa. Various European companies had been formed for plundering the Angolan subsoil. The political aspect of that exploitation was obvious: it enabled the Portuguese Government to realize substantial profits, while sparing it any reverberations at the social level and opening outlets for it in Europe and the United States. Petroleum extraction had not been overlooked; it involved not only Portuguese capital, but also a whole conglomeration of trusts. It was odd that the petroleum companies had only become interested in petroleum extraction there at the moment when the liberation movements had started their struggle.

557. There seemed reason to think that Portugal by itself had neither the resources nor the economic potential needed to resist for long the revolutionary movement unfolding in the countries that were still subject to its domination. Those examples showed the evils of the investments made by the monopolies to the profit of the Portuguese Government.

558. The capitalists should be made to realize that they must give fresh thought to their method of investment in the Territories under Portuguese domination while waiting for the peoples of Angola, Mozambique and Guinea to rid themselves of the Portuguese colonial yoke. They must respect the various resolutions adopted by the General Assembly and the Security Council and tell their ally, Portugal, to withdraw its military forces and liberate its colonies, in implementation of the Declaration appearing in resolution 1514 (XV).

²⁸ Official Records of the Security Council, Twentieth Year, 1254th meeting, paras. 34-36.

559. Unfortunately, it was not possible to believe the statements of the imperialist Powers when they were daily offering 10 million escudos to Portugal, thus enabling it to finance its genocidal war against the African people. It was not possible to believe the United Kingdom's statements when, according to the Johannesburg Star, the special brigade of the Southern Rhodesian secret police was co-operating with the Portuguese Secret Service in tracking down rebels passing through the country on their way to Tanzania and repatriating them to Mozambique. Mr. Mondlane and the newspaper agreed on that point. In his statement, Mr. Mondlane had said that a truck carrying seventy-five persons had disappeared on the Swaziland border. It was obvious that the secret police had done their work and no one should be surprised to learn that the seventy-five persons were in South Africa in some reserve, or even that they had been sold in the coal mines, enabling Portugal to collect the 50 per cent profit on deals involving Mozambican workers handed over to the South African racists by the Portuguese administrators.

560. It was the disgrace of the mid-twentieth century that a State that was economically poor, the poorest State in Europe, should hang on desperately in Africa, robbing the inhabitants, plundering the wealth of the subsoil and leaving the natural and rightful owners sunk in poverty and ignorance. Human rights were scoffed at, the United Nations Charter was trampled under foot by the very people who had drawn it up to prevent any fresh crime against humanity.

561. The Special Committee should make definite recommendations to the General Assembly and the Security Council; the latter should enforce the sanctions that had already been adopted against Portugal. Mali, for its part, was already implementing all the resolutions adopted by the United Nations.

562. A recommendation should be made to the Secretary-General to give and increase aid to the nationalists, who had freed a large part of their country and were devoting themselves to the task of national reconstruction. He assured the nationalists of the unconditional support of the people and Government of the Republic of Mali. The struggle for liberation was a just one and was in step with the march of history. His delegation would give its support to any resolution setting forth such measures, which represented the minimum that could be done pending the complete liberation of the Territories under Portuguese domination—which could not be long in coming.

563. The representative of the Ivory Coast said that the information given by the petitioners showed that the situation in the Territories under Portuguese domination had not improved and was still extremely serious. Those Territories were the scene of an armed struggle imposed on peace-loving inhabitants by Salazar's fascist régime. The people of the Territories in question had for hundreds of years been suffering poverty, affliction and ignorance.

564. For years the United Nations had been trying, by means of appropriate resolutions, to persuade the Portuguese authorities to abandon their anachronistic concept of self-determination and acknowledge the right of the people in the Territories under their domination to freedom, to self-determination as universally defined, in particular in United Nations resolution 1514 (XV), and to independence. To those efforts should be added the collective or individual approaches made by States friendly to Portugal. Unfortunately, the Portuguese authorities replied only with disdainful refusals; what was more, they were continuing and intensifying the armed struggle with the help of the equipment they received through NATO. It would therefore be desirable for NATO members to take practical steps to prevent Salazar using the arms placed at his disposal and stored in Portugal.

565. The testimony of journalists and films provided further proof of the atrocities that Portugal was inflicting on the peoples under its domination. In the eyes of his delegation, those crimes were more shocking than those of the Nazis, who in their day aroused the indignation of the whole world.

566. He considered that the States and financial monopolies which were enabling Salazar to continue his war of extermination should be denounced.

567. After being informed of the mass exodus of the inhabitants of Mozambique, Angola and so-called Portuguese Guinea, the Committee should press for increased aid to be given to the refugees.

568. Portugal, which wanted to identify itself with a certain civilization, should realize that the course of history was irreversible and that, despite the perfection of the arms it possessed, its colonial empire would suffer the same fate as all the other colonial empires.

569. His delegation was ready to give its support to any resolution reaffirming the inalienable right of the peoples of the Territories under Portuguese domination, condemning the barbarous actions of the Salazar-régime and urging all States, and in particular Portugal's allies, to refrain from giving Portugal military and financial aid. The Security Council should make the sanctions that had been adopted against the Lisbon Government compulsory. If such measures were applied, Salazar's régime would be unable to survive.

570. He repeated his appeal to the great Powers, in particular the NATO Powers, to refrain from helping Portugal. In turning a deaf ear to the Africans' appeal, they were conniving in the genocide committed in the Territories under Portuguese domination. He hoped that after the direct and precise evidence that had been produced there would be no more abstentions in the ranks of the Committee and that Portugal would finally be isolated.

571. The Ivory Coast, in unison with all the other States that loved peace and freedom, would do all in its power to free Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea from Salazar's iniquitous régime.

572. The representative of Iraq said that, among the various colonial problems with which the Special Committee and the United Nations were faced, that of the African Territories under Portuguese administration presented special aspects which had far-reaching consequences. Portugal continued to deny the African people's right to self-determination and independence, at the same time refusing to recognize that the Territories in question were in fact colonies for which it was accountable both before the United Nations and before the world. Unlike the Verwoerd régime in South Africa, which openly advocated the evil policy of apartheid, Portugal professed to practise no policy of discrimination against the indigenous population and endeavoured to dismiss the whole matter under the guise of assimilation. Portugal's assertion that the nationalist struggle in the Territories under its domination was instigated from abroad was completely belied by the fact that, in Angola, the African people had been fighting heroically for independence for more than five years—a fight for which Portugal had had to obtain help from its friends, including Israel. As the petitioners in Dar es Salaam had informed the Committee, the armed struggle was spreading to the remaining Portuguese Territories, including Guinea and Cape Verde. But Portugal's desperate efforts to maintain a foothold in Africa would ultimately collapse before the rising tide of African nationalism. Every United Nations Member State, and particularly those with special relations with Portugal, would have to shoulder their responsibilities by helping to bring about the speedy liquidation of the Portuguese colonial empire in Africa.

573. The representative of Poland said that the question of the African Territories under Portuguese administration had been under consideration by the United Nations for over a decade, and many recommendations had been made on the subject. Nevertheless, Portugal, like the racist régimes in South Africa and Southern Rhodesia, persisted in refusing to implement the terms of the relevant United Nations resolutions and to comply with the provisions of the Charter and the Declaration of the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

574. Portugal's attitude was unique, since it was the only administering Power which still maintained that its Territories were overseas provinces forming an integral part of the metropolitan country. That attitude was, however, dictated by economic interests, since the Territories earned foreign exchange, and particularly hard currency, which Portugal used to offset its balance-of-payments deficit. The export of coffee and diamonds provided the main source for such earnings, which were further increased by the revenue received from the railways in Angola and Mozambique, and from the services rendered by the East African ports of Beira and Lourenço Marques. The significant fact about Angolan coffee was not that it was the largest exported commodity but that, since it was purchased mainly by the United States, it earned US dollars and other foreign exchange. As for Angola's next largest exported commodity—diamonds—in 1962, total production amounted to approximately 986,000 carats, which had been sold to the United Kingdom at an average price of less than $US22 per carat. Even in the Portuguese Press there had been indignant comments, since that was far below the world market price at which diamonds were sold by South West Africa. Furthermore, Angola and Mozambique supplied raw materials such as oil, iron ore, gold and uranium, and Portuguese companies were making huge profits from their sale as well as from the sale of copper, cocoa, sugar, cotton, meat, textiles and glass. The Portuguese Government even derived a considerable income from the sale of African labours in South Africa, where workers were forced to migrate to work in the mines. Most of the industries in Angola and Mozambique were subsidiaries of parent companies in Southern Rhodesia and South Africa. From the Special Committee's study in that connexion, it was evident that the monopolies to which Sakkar had granted concessions for the exploitation of Angolan and Mozambican wealth, were reaping huge profits at the expense of the local population. Such companies included the Angola Diamond Company, the Belgian Petrofina Trust, the Gulf Oil Corporation of America, the Mozambique Gulf Oil Company, the Rockefeller Trust, Standard Oil of New Jersey and the West German Krupp Trust. Portuguese colonialism had powerful allies in those monopolies which controlled the economy of southern Africa from the Cape to Katanga. To protect the interests of the monopolies and to maintain white supremacy and colonialism in Africa, certain Western Powers were providing Portugal with financial, political and military aid so that it was able to defy United Nations resolutions. Mr. Luís Almeida, the representative in Algeria of the Mouvement populaire de libération de l'Angola (MPLA), had recently revealed that the large American, West German, Belgian and British companies had even established private armies of mercenaries to protect their interests.

575. The fact that Portugal continued to receive aid from its allies, and was thus enabled to withstand a war on three fronts, had been unanimously confirmed by the petitioners who had appeared before the Committee. The petitioners had considered that the United Nations could contribute most to the liberation of the suppressed African peoples under Portuguese rule by requiring the United States, the Federal Republic of Germany and the United Kingdom to withhold all military and economic support from Portugal. The Committee had heard evidence, time and again, that Portugal had used weapons manufactured in those countries in Angola, Portuguese Guinea and Mozambique, which further went to prove that it was intensifying the war of extermination against the African people. In the Portuguese Territories, the most inhuman conditions existed: tens of thousands of Africans had died either from ill-treatment or from bombing and other attacks with modern arms. The Committee had heard from Mr. Cabral, the leader of the Partido Africano da Independência de Guiné e Cabo Verde (PAIGC), of an air attack carried out by bombers and jets of American and German make against the innocent and peaceful inhabitants of a village. Dr. Mondlane, the leader of FRELIMO, had also informed the Committee that West Germany not only supplied Portugal with weapons but had also established a military base in Portugal where armed forces of the NATO Powers were trained in guerrilla warfare. All appeals by the various organs of the United Nations, requesting States to withhold from the Portuguese Government any assistance which would enable it to continue its suppression of the African people in the Territories under its domination, had been ignored by West Germany and other members of the NATO alliance.

576. A letter had been addressed to the Secretary-General of the United Nations by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the German Democratic Republic on 23 March 1966. It referred to resolution 218 (1965) adopted by the Security Council, in accordance with which all States were required to report upon the measures taken to implement operative paragraph 7 of that resolution. He would quote the following paragraphs from that letter:

"Proceeding from its principled attitude, the Government of the German Democratic Republic has always strictly adhered to all decisions taken by the United Nations with regard to the Portuguese colonial policy. On this point the German Democratic Republic is fundamentally different from the West German Federal Republic, whose moral and material support for Portuguese colonialism was sharply condemned during the debates of the Fourth Committee of the twentieth session of the United Nations General Assembly.

"The German Democratic Republic maintains neither diplomatic nor consular relations with the Portuguese colonial régime.

"It does not grant any assistance that could be used by Portugal to suppress the people in the territories under its administration.

"Nor has it, in the past, ever sold or delivered to Portugal weapons, ammunition, military equipment or other material for the production and maintenance of weapons and ammunition, nor will it in the future supply the Portuguese colonial régime with any such objects.

"Moreover, in instructions issued by the Ministry of Foreign and Inter-German Trade on 5 April 1965, all foreign trade enterprises of the German Democratic Republic were directed that no deliveries whatever, neither direct nor indirect, of the German Democratic Republic be made to Portuguese enterprises in the territories still under Portuguese colonial rule."

577. Portugal not only stubbornly refused to implement United Nations resolutions but was actually stiffening its policy of oppression and using military force to prevent the people from attaining their inalienable right to self-determination and independence. His Government has consistently condemned Portugal's colonial policy and had, on many occasions, denounced those Western Powers of the NATO alliance which continued to provide Portugal with active political, moral and military support. It was the view of his Government that Portugal's NATO allies were responsible for its continued domination over vast tracts of the African continent. The existing explosive situation in the Portuguese Territories, which constituted a threat to peace, originated in the community of interests among a group of neo-nazi countries which were opposed to the independence and development of Africa. The questions of the Portuguese-dominated Territories in Africa, of Southern Rhodesia and of South Africa could not be dissociated from one another; and the situation in each would have been very different had the United States, West Germany and the United Kingdom complied with the relevant United Nations resolutions.

578. Long-term action was required: the United Nations in accordance with the principles of freedom and justice enshrined in the Charter and in the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, should take effective measures. The time had come to isolate Portugal, economically, politically and militarily so that it would be forced to abandon its intransigent and defiant policy. It was the Special Committee's duty to ensure that positive action was taken to put an end to the inhuman suffering of the unhappy peoples of the Portuguese-dominated Territories in Africa who, for almost 500 years, had lived in virtual slavery, a prey to poverty, disease and ignorance. The Polish people considered the struggle of the peoples of Angola, Portuguese Guinea and Mozambique to be just and right, and those people and their leaders were to be congratulated for having already liberated a part of their homeland. It was to be hoped that the various national liberation movements would join their efforts in the heroic struggle against Portugal and its allies.

579. He agreed with the suggestion made by the petitioners that the Committee should request the Security Council to examine General Assembly resolution 2107(XX) and Security Council resolution 218 (1965) with a view to making the action envisaged therein mandatory, in accordance with Chapter VII of the Charter. He also wished to reiterate his request that the specialized agencies should be asked to increase their assistance to the national liberation movements in the Territories under Portuguese domination and to the people who had suffered, and were still suffering, from the war waged by the Portuguese colonial forces.

580. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania expressed his delegation's gratitude to the petitioners for the information which they had provided to the Special Committee both in Algiers and in Dar es Salaam and which had thrown further light on the atrocities perpetrated against the African people in the Portuguese-dominated Territories. The Committee had rightly always considered those Territories in conjunction since colonialism, no matter where it existed, inevitably meant subjugation and oppression. The African people who were resisting the Portuguese aggressors, striking blow for blow, waged a struggle which would not only liberate their homeland but which would also, in his delegation's opinion, uphold and strengthen the United Nations Charter and the aims of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

581. Analysing the general situation, he said that the fact that Portugal was a poor and backward nation helped to explain the origin of its colonial aggression. With the support of powerful allies, it had been able to maintain its policy of subjugating African peoples. Despite the terms of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, the Portuguese imperialists persisted in denying independence to the Territories under their domination and had in fact increased their aggressive and criminal activities against the people who had, as a result, been forced to take up arms to defend themselves and to free their lands.

582. Referring to an extract from Mr. Ronald Segal's foreword to Professor James Duffy's book Portugal in Africa, he said that it illustrated the futility and inhumanity of Portuguese colonialism in Africa and served as a warning to Portugal's allies.

583. In considering the question of the Territories under Portuguese administration, three basic factors had to be taken into account: first, the atrocities committed by the Portuguese armed forces; secondly, the support Portugal received from regional groupings abroad and which it used, with the knowledge of those who supplied such support, against the African people; and thirdly, the role played by foreign elements and financial monopolies in the Territories concerned.

584. With regard to the first factor, while colonial oppression was always to be condemned, that perpetrated against the people of Angola, Portuguese Guinea and Mozambique was in a class by itself. The petitioners who had appeared before the Committee had revealed that entire villages had been razed by Portuguese bombers, and had furnished documentary evidence of the dismemberment of children. Furthermore, Mr. Ervedosa had informed the Committee that the Portuguese air force in Angola were under orders to bomb African villages indiscriminately. The objective was obviously to annihilate the heroic African people who were resisting colonial oppression. Needless to say, as a result of such brutal crimes, Mr. Ervedosa had revolted against the Portuguese régime. That same petitioner, who had only provided information on events to which he himself had been an eye-witness, had also stated that between March and June 1961 thousands of Africans had been killed, the majority women and children. It was to be hoped that such scandalous facts would stir the conscience of those nations which still refused to recognize the evils perpetrated by Portugal.

585. The fact that Portugal, poor and backward as it was, could afford to continue to wage an aggressive war against the African people brought him to the second basic factor to be taken into account. As the Committee had been informed by the petitioners both in Dar es Salaam and in Algiers, Portugal received arms from NATO members. The petitioners had even been able to name their make. While it was undoubtedly true, as the United States representative had stated at the time, that those arms were obsolete weapons from the Second World War, they were nevertheless instruments of destruction, capable of taking a heavy toll of lives. Moreover, in an article in The New York Times of 25 October 1964, reference had been made to the fact that the Federal Republic of Germany was selling arms and equipment to Portugal and Mr. Cabral, one of the petitioners, had informed the Committee only the day before that the Federal Republic of Germany was also assembling Italian-designed FIAT 91 aircraft, under licence, for Portugal to use in its war against the African people. In a further article in The New York Times of 16 March 1965, it had been stated that France was to sell sixty jet fighters to Portugal and was negotiating the construction of warships for that country. All the petitioners from the Portuguese-oppressed Territories in Africa had testified to the presence there of many types of weapons, including tanks, aircraft, rockets and bombs.

586. Despite the denials which would undoubtedly be heard, all evidence pointed to the fact that certain members of NATO, for example, the United States, France and the Federal Republic of Germany, materially aided the aggressive forces of the Portuguese colonialists. Nevertheless, those countries repeatedly asserted that, under the NATO pact, such armaments were intended only for Portugal's use in Europe. They should not delude themselves, however; the Portuguese régime would never honour a commitment not to use such weapons against the African people and, in fact, was flouting world opinion simply because it had the support of Western countries. Ironically enough, arms supplied under NATO auspices were also used within Portugal against those who opposed not only colonialist wars but also Salazar's fascist régime. Certain Western countries, while loudly proclaiming their support for democracy, were therefore nevertheless helping to strengthen that totalitarian régime. The only conclusion to be drawn by Africans was that such countries were prepared to support Portugal so long as it remained white and anti-communist; a crime against the African people was not so serious as a crime against their financial interests. Thus it was evident, as clearly demonstrated by the representatives of the peoples of Angola, Portuguese Guinea and Mozambique who had appeared before the Committee as petitioners, that Portugal was only able to pursue its war against the African people because it received a vast amount of material support from its allies. And such support was granted because Portugal co-operated in the exploitation of Africa's rich natural resources.

587. The third basic factor to which he had referred concerned the economic exploitation of the Territories under Portuguese domination. There would, of course, be much talk of the value of investments and of the need for free trade in the development of such Territories. However, no matter what advantages might be involved, there was no doubt that investments in colonized Territories, and the activities of the financial monopolies there, would act as an impediment to the attainment of freedom and independence by the peoples of those Territories. That fact had been clearly demonstrated in the study carried out by Sub-Committee I—a study which had been adopted by the Committee and upheld by a majority in the General Assembly. The working paper prepared by the Secretariat in that connexion had also shown that the foreign companies operating in the Portuguese colonies contributed a part of the profits for the "defence" of those Territories; in effect, that meant the criminal war waged against the African people by the Portuguese colonialists in their futile attempt to cling on to African lands. But Portugal only needed to defend itself against the Salazar régime. In Africa, neither Portugal nor its allies had anything to defend, since the resources of that continent belonged to the Africans alone.

588. Quoting an extract from the book Mission to Portugal by a former Brazilian Ambassador to Portugal, he said that it illustrated the exploitation by a minority group of Portugal's riches which by right belonged to the people. Similarly, it was the lust for the rich resources of the African Territories under Portuguese domination which drove certain financial monopolies to attain their ends at any price. According to the information bulletin "Free Angola" No. 3 (1965), such financial monopolies included the Angola Diamond Company, a branch of the Anglo-American Diamond Corporation Ltd., the Teresa Berman Company, associated with Lay Frères and the Sociedade Comercial João Fernandes, which dealt in manganese production. That ore was entirely monopolized by the Companhia Mineira do Lobito, Krupps of Essen, Germany, Jojgaard and Schultz A/S, Denmark, and Lagos e Irmao, Portugal. It was further stated in the information bulletin that the complicity of such financial interests in the Portuguese colonial war in Angola was unquestionable, as would be seen upon an examination of the aims and tax policy proclaimed by the territorial Government in 1962, in which reference was made to a defence tax payable by all firms established for over five years with a net profit of 1 million escudos and over. Those facts, collected by the people of Angola, were further documented in other records and had been corroborated by the freedom fighters from Mozambique and Portuguese Guinea.

589. It was the opinion of his delegation that there were only two ways in which a solution to the problem could be found. Either Portugal, and all those countries which had not hitherto done so, should accept and implement the provisions of the relevant United Nations resolutions, and those who claimed to oppose Portugal's colonial policies, yet nevertheless assisted it materially, should withdraw all such support; or, alternatively, force should be used. Portugal was intensifying its criminal policy with the support of its allies and, in the face of that situation, the gallant people had had to take up arms to defend themselves and to free their land. African people did not want war but it had been forced upon them, and their legitimate struggle would ultimately be crowned with victory.

590. Lastly, his delegation considered that the Security Council should meet in Africa to hear the views of the freedom fighters who had appeared before the Committee during its current session.

591. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that each time the questions of Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea were considered by the Special Committee, reference was made to new crimes perpetrated by the colonizers against the population. The cruel oppression to which the people of the Territories under Portuguese domination were subjected did not merely affect Africa: it was also a threat to world peace and security. The police régime of the colonialists could be compared to the hateful Hitler régime. The responsibility for that criminal policy lay not only with the Salazar régime but also with its NATO allies, who were providing substantial assistance of various kinds to Portugal. Thanks to that assistance, Portugal, which was one of the poorest and most backward countries in Europe, was able to go on sending armed forces equipped with ultra-modern weapons to its Territories. According to the information provided by the petitioners, Portugal, in a desperate effort to avoid defeat, had increased its military forces in Guinea. Mr. Mondlane had stated that the number of troops in Mozambique had been increased by 7,500 and that Portugal planned to have a total of 70,000 men there. Thus Portugal had more than 100,000 men with modern equipment in its Territories. Furthermore, Portugal had embarked on the construction of military bases, aerodromes and strategic roads which threatened the independence of other African States. The facts which the petitioners had laid before the Committee proved that the States members of NATO were helping the Portuguese régime. In recent years the United States had given Portugal financial and military aid amounting to several hundred million dollars. United States aircraft had been used and were still being used to bomb the indigenous people in the Portuguese Territories.

592. There was also the aid given by the United Kingdom and the Federal Republic of Germany, which was constantly increasing. Mr. Cabral had referred to the delivery of FIAT aircraft to the Portuguese Government and there had recently been a newspaper report that Bonn planned to deliver forty jet fighters, built in Italy under United States licence. The States belonging to NATO continued to deny that they were helping Portugal and alleged that Portugal promised not to use the weapons and equipment that it was given. The Portuguese colonies were a source of profit not only to Portugal but also to the international financial monopolies with headquarters in New York, London and Frankfurt. In return for privileges which enabled them to amass enormous profits, the financial monopolies were supporting Portugal by granting it large sums of money. Thus the international monopolies had openly concluded an alliance with Portugal in order to stamp out the nationalist movements. The monopolies were the main obstacle on the road to the liberation and independence of the people suffering under the colonial yoke. The strategic position of the Portuguese colonies was also one of the reasons underlying the behaviour of the States members of NATO. In that connexion, he recalled a statement by the United States Secretary of State to the effect that Portugal was the only ally which had made and was making an important contribution to mutual security. That statement had been quoted in a Portuguese newspaper, which had written that the frontiers of the United States and the Western countries passed through the Azores, Angola, Mozambique and Guinea. There was more assistance, however, than that of NATO. Portugal was receiving more and more effective assistance from Southern Rhodesia and South Africa. Those facts showed that the reactionary forces of colonialism and racism, united in an unholy alliance, were constantly increasing, with the support of their Western allies. In the hands of Portugal and its partners, the African Territories were being used as fortresses and military strongholds. The representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom and the Federal Republic of Germany were trying to influence their young allies to prevent them from taking steps against the Verwoerd, Salazar and Ian Smith régimes. In the above-mentioned statement the United States Secretary of State had also said that to sacrifice the interests of Portugal by supporting, in one way or another, the attacks on Portugal in the United Nations was productive only of disaster. An article had appeared in the newspaper Le Monde concerning a statement by the Minister of Justice of the Federal Republic of Germany to the effect that the Portuguese policy in its overseas Territories had always been and still was the most modern policy pursued by a European country. The New York Times had recently published a statement by the Portuguese Minister for Foreign Affairs pointing out that, following negotiations with United States statesmen, everything seemed to indicate that the United States had adopted a more realistic attitude to Portugal's policies in its African Territories.

593. No assistance could prevent the collapse of the Portuguese colonial empire, as was shown by the increasingly relentless struggle of the African people under the Portuguese colonial yoke to achieve recognition of their inalienable rights. He welcomed the victories gained during that just struggle and the liberation of certain areas, where a new life based on democracy, independence and freedom was being established. The United Nations and all countries which opposed colonial régimes should give all possible moral and material assistance to those fighting for peace. The specialized agencies should be asked to provide multi-lateral assistance to nationalist organizations and movements, in such matters as education and health, for example. The Special Committee should denounce the colonialist bloc consisting of Portugal, Southern Rhodesia and South Africa, as also the NATO members who were assisting Portugal. It should ask the Security Council to take specific steps to ensure the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and to make the sanctions envisaged compulsory. The Security Council should insist upon Portugal withdrawing its armed forces from the Territories under its domination and dismantling its bases and military installations. The Special Committee should also recommend to the Security Council and the General Assembly that they should set a date for the independence of the Portuguese colonies. The Soviet Union would support the draft resolution if it took those comments into account. Lastly, he gave the Committee a very important piece of information which he had just received from New York. The United Nations Secretariat had announced in a press release that the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development had granted Portugal two loans amounting to $30 million to enable it to expand its network of electric power stations. That decision ran counter to the decisions of the Committee and the General Assembly and to resolution 2107 (XX), which appealed to the Bank to refrain from granting Portugal any financial, economic or technical assistance so long as the Government of Portugal failed to implement General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). The Special Committee should examine the Bank's decision and ask for it to be cancelled.

594. The representative of Denmark noted with regret that the situation had scarcely changed since 1965. The party responsible for that deplorable situation was Portugal, which was stubbornly pursuing a disastrous and anachronistic colonial policy. The Danish Government absolutely condemned Portugal's policy, which was unworthy of the present day. Denmark had always complied with the request in the Security Council resolution of 31 July 1963 for an arms embargo. He deplored the fact that not all countries had done the same. Apart from any moral considerations, all countries in the world should realize that the situation in the Territories under Portuguese domination could have extremely serious consequences.

595. There was no need to dwell any further on the activities of the Portuguese colonialists. The members of the Committee were already fully informed on that subject. It was indeed a matter for astonishment every time that the Lisbon Government repeated that everything was calm in the Portuguese Territories. There was much evidence to enlighten world opinion on what was going on in the Territories administered by Portugal; furthermore, the Portuguese Government had itself confirmed that the indigenous populations were putting up serious resistance. In December 1965 Salazar had stated that one of the main problems facing Portugal was the defence of its national territorial integrity and that it was not possible to forecast for how long the Portuguese Government and people would have to defend their overseas Territories. That was tantamount to stating that the Africans were still being deprived of their most elementary rights and that the armed struggle of Portugal against the indigenous people would be continued. That was a dead end, for the course of history was in the direction of self-determination.

596. The representative of India said that the situation in the Territories under Portuguese domination had long been under consideration in various organs of the United Nations. When the United Nations had had a preponderance of colonial Powers and of countries supporting them, Portugal had evaded any critical examination of its policies. In the late 1950's, and particularly since 1960, the situation had changed with the emergence to independence of many countries in Africa and Asia and their admission to the United Nations. Thereafter Portugal could no longer be protected, at least in discussion, by its allies.

597. It was a matter of great regret, however, that in spite of continuous exhortation by the United Nations to Portugal to alter its policies and to recognize the inevitable success of the freedom struggles of all colonial peoples, the lot of the subject peoples in Portuguese Territories had remained unchanged. Indeed, from the testimony given by the petitioners in Dar es Salaam and in Algiers, it was clear that the situation in the Portuguese Territories had worsened and that repression had become more ruthless. One could only marvel at the ingenuity of the colonial authorities in devising new and more inhuman methods of suppressing the legitimate struggle of the people under Portuguese domination. Words could scarcely express the suffering of those brave people; and Indians could well appreciate that anguish through their own experience of the tyranny of Portuguese colonialism.

598. Though a small and backward country, Portugal was able to defy the United Nations in oppressing the people of its Territories, which were many times the size of Portugal. Two factors explained that state of affairs.

599. The first was the notorious unholy alliance between the forces of colonialism and racism in southern Africa, where the dictatorial régimes of South Africa, Southern Rhodesia and the Portuguese Territories were acting in concert to perpetuate white supremacy in that part of the world. The rulers in those Territories fully realized that their strength lay in unity. The readiness with which the authorities of Portugal and South Africa had gone to the rescue of the racist régime in Southern Rhodesia was clear evidence of collusion among the three bastions of colonialism, which had to be dealt with as an entity.

600. The second reason was the direct and indirect help which Portugal continued to receive from its allies and friends. Without such assistance, it would never have been able to maintain the massive military operations which it had to mount in order to keep its colonies in check. A study made by Sub-Committee I of the Special Committee had clearly brought out the close relationship between colonial rule and economic exploitation by foreign interests. Several countries apart from Portugal had joined in the bid for substantial but unjust returns. It had been asserted in certain quarters that the economic activities of those foreign interests only contributed to the well-being of the indigenous inhabitants. Those who proffered such flimsy justification certainly counted on the ingenuousness of others. There had been great reluctance on the part of those friends and allies of Portugal to co-operate with the United Nations in practical measures. They clearly satisfied themselves with mere pious expressions of high principles.

601. The dictator of Portugal had frequently made it clear that he would never relinquish the stranglehold over its Territories. The ruling National Union had declared that, whatever the price, Portugal would never abandon the legitimate defence of its national territory against outside aggression. The Portuguese dictator had said in an interview on 4 August 1965 that "the position is, however, that as a result of the integration, which has been a principle of Portuguese overseas policy for centuries, these Territories as a whole already form a nation and a sovereign state. . . . While the problem may be relevant to dependent territories or colonies desiring to achieve independence and define their relations with the State which exercises rights of sovereignty over them, it is not relevant in the case of Portugal". The reasons for that desperate clinging to its overseas colonies were clear. The African war had proved a blessing to Portugal as its industries were growing in response to military orders ranging from ammunition to food and textiles, and remittances from troops overseas were injecting new money into the Portuguese economy.

602. General Assembly resolution 2107 (XX) had condemned Portugal's violation of the economic and political rights of the indigenous population through the large-scale settlement of foreign immigrants in the Territories and the transfer of workers to South Africa. European settlement had been the cornerstone of Portugal's colonial policy. The Portuguese authorities believed, and would have the world believe, that increased white immigration would help to accelerate the social and cultural progress of the "less evolved" indigenous inhabitants by bringing them in closer contact with "more civilized" peoples. The pressure in the Portuguese National Assembly on the authorities to increase the flow of settlers to the overseas Territories, in conjunction with the military effort, had increased. A deputy from Mozambique had proposed that the Government should encourage soldier settlements in the Territories. In 1965, the Mozambique authorities had offered 5,000-hectare farms in the Tete district to farmers from drought-stricken areas in South Africa. It had been reported in November 1965 that eighty South African farmers had already signed contracts. All that was in open defiance of General Assembly resolution 2107 (XX). Therefore Portugal should once more be strongly condemned on that score.

603. There was poverty and misery among Africans in the Portuguese Territories, where forced labour continued to be used. Starvation and famine were rife, and educational opportunities for Africans were virtually non-existent. In Mozambique, for example, only .35 per cent of the African population was enrolled in primary schools, and only .05 per cent of the population had been admitted to secondary schools. The evident policy of the colonial Power was to keep African people in economic and social servitude.

604. An excuse frequently put forward by some Governments which had refused to implement United Nations resolutions on Portuguese Territories had been that sanctions would hurt the Africans more than anyone else. That argument was just an attempt to evade the issue; for the people of Portuguese Territories had constantly declared their readiness to suffer any hardships in order to attain independence. If the allies of Portugal were sincere in their professed concern for the interests of the indigenous people in Portuguese Territories, they should implement the General Assembly resolution fully and promptly so that the oppressive rule of Portugal might be ended without delay. The history of colonialism and the experience of the newly independent countries showed political independence to be a prerequisite for economic progress.

605. His delegation had warned the Special Committee several years previously that if the people of the Portuguese Territories were not granted their right to freedom, they would have no alternative but to resort to violence. It was unfortunate that the only language which Portugal understood was that of force. In Angola, the nationalists had declared an open revolt in March 1961; in Mozambique the nationalist fighters had opened their armed struggle in September 1964; and in so-called Portuguese Guinea the forces of freedom and progress had made substantial gains in their fight against the colonial authorities. The Portuguese authorities themselves admitted the presence of some 50,000 Portuguese troops, including army forces, mobile police and militia, in Mozambique alone. Those troops, fully trained and equipped with the most modern weapons, were combating ill-fed and ill-equipped people. Yet those imperialist forces were unable to make much headway against freedom fighters with justice and truth on their side.

606. His delegation had supported and co-sponsored all the resolutions on the problem of Territories under Portuguese administration in the past and would continue to do so because it believed that a peaceful solution to the problem could be found if the entire international community joined forces against that stubborn and ruthless dictatorial régime. The Security Council had an important role to play, having already established, in its resolution 218 (1965) of 23 November 1965, that the attitude of Portugal towards the African populations of its Territories and the neighbouring States constituted a threat to international peace and security. It therefore had to follow up its earlier decision and to take such measures as mandatory economic sanctions against Portugal. His delegation would like to see such a provision included in the draft resolution to be submitted to the Committee.

607. India condemned the brutal methods of repression used by the Portuguese authorities and recognized the legitimacy of the independence struggle of the brave people in the Portuguese Territories. It had offered its full co-operation to the Organization of African Unity (OAU) in ending Portuguese colonialism, and would dutifully do all in its power to help those valiant soldiers of freedom. The Foreign Minister of India had said "We have, in a very persistent and consistent manner, always worked for ending these last vestiges of colonialism, and we think that having ourselves attained independence from colonial rule, it is also our duty—and we would not consider any sacrifice too great—to discharge our responsibilities and our obligations to those brethren who are still groaning under foreign domination."

608. The representative of Bulgaria said that the evidence from the petitioners of Mozambique, Angola and so-called Portuguese Guinea had clearly shown the imperative need for the Special Committee to hold sessions in Africa regularly.

609. The Bulgarian delegation had been greatly impressed by the new impetus in the struggle of the peoples still subjected to foreign domination. He had been touched by the conviction and determination with which the freedom fighters, not content with carrying on a courageous armed struggle, were starting to build the basis of their future independent State. It was inspiring to hear the petitioners speak of the efforts which they were making in the parts of the Territory already liberated to fight illiteracy and disease and to build, on the foundations of the ancient cultural values of their people, a new civilization and society based on democracy, justice and social progress.

610. The representatives of the Territories under Portuguese domination had movingly expressed their thanks to the Governments and peoples who were helping them. The Bulgarian delegation had greatly appreciated the thanks of Mr. Cabral, the Secretary-General of the Partido Africano da Independência da Guiné e Cabo Verde (PAIGC), who, speaking of the assistance given by the socialist countries, had said that the solidarity of those countries with the peoples fighting against Portuguese domination gave a new dimension to the concept of solidarity between peoples. He thanked the petitioners for the feelings which they had expressed concerning Bulgaria's assistance to them and assured them of the sympathy and unconditional support of the entire Bulgarian people.

611. It was only the assistance which Salazar received from the United States, the United Kingdom, the Federal Republic of Germany and other Western countries, including, of course, the members of NATO, that enabled him to continue his criminal fascist activities. The indignation of the oppressed peoples was all the more justified in that those countries made hypocritical statements of sympathy towards them and nevertheless continued actively to aid the colonialist régime of Salazar. It was impossible to over-emphasize the abominable role played by the Federal Republic of Germany, which had apparently not learned the lesson of the Second World War, as the world had been entitled to hope it would. Fortunately, there was another Germany, the German Democratic Republic, a peaceful democratic State which could be proud to count itself among the most faithful friends of the peoples fighting against colonialism and imperialism.

612. The petitioners' suggestion about the role of the United Nations seemed to him particularly important. The petitioners appeared to realize the importance of resolution 2107 (XX) but they had been disappointed by the practical results of the adoption of that resolution. The petitioners were unfortunately correct: colonialism was being unleashed anew; it had allies and openly declared that it did not intend to comply with a single provision of resolution 2107 (XX), especially operative paragraphs 7 and 8. It was therefore quite clear that the Security Council's appeals were no longer enough.

613. The representative of Yugoslavia said that the situation in the Portuguese Territories remained unchanged, despite exhortations from the United Nations in the form of resolutions and concrete demands on Portugal. The most regrettable fact was that the people continued to be denied their fundamental rights to freedom and independence. In Dar es Salaam petitioners had said that in a short space of time the number of Portuguese troops in Mozambique alone had increased from about 35,000 to 50,000 and that the figure was likely to reach 75,000 by the end of 1966. Likewise, Portuguese troops in Guinea were using new and better weapons. The additional troops, new weapons and intensified repression showed Portugal's intention to hold on to its Territories. Indeed, it had declared that it would never abandon the defence of its legitimate Territories against outside aggression.

614. However, to maintain its military operations Portugal relied on its friends and allies, who flouted United Nations exhortations by continuing to help Portugal in order, principally, to maximize their own investment yields. It was therefore in their interest to maintain the status quo.

615. All Portugal's efforts to crush the steady progress of the nationalist forces had failed. It was the responsibility of all, and especially of Portugal's allies, to make it change its short-sighted policy; and it was the duty of the Special Committee to recommend measures to the General Assembly and the Security Council. The draft resolution reflected Yugoslavia's views and deserved the unanimous support of the Committee.

616. The representative of Syria said he would not dwell upon the atrocities which Dr. Salazar's reactionary régime was committing against the innocent peoples of Mozambique, Angola and Guinea. The evidence given by the petitioners, the objectively thorough working papers of the United Nations Secretariat and the testimony of African and European, including Portuguese, personalities whose consciences rebelled against injustice, made it clear that Portuguese colonialism was growing in its ruthlessness, its defiance of world opinion, and its anti-African, inhuman fanaticism. Portugal cynically claimed that Mozambicans, Guineans and Angolans had become—by decree no doubt—Portuguese. By what miracle could people with their own history, their own geography, their own society and their own traditions and culture be transformed into another? That colonization of human souls flouted the essential principles embodied in the United Nations Charter. A perverted régime was shamelessly professing to speak on behalf of civilization; yet on behalf of civilization it was dropping napalm bombs from the most modern military aircraft on innocent African villages. On behalf of civilization it kept 99.7 per cent of Guinean Africans illiterate, and on behalf of civilization it installed Portuguese settlers to usurp African lands and property. The strongest condemnation of those acts was naturally a primary duty to which no member of the Committee could logically object.

617. In the life-and-death struggle of those brave African peoples, there could be only one fundamental choice: to be a friend or a foe of Africa. Those who befriended Portugal could not possibly be friends of Africa. Once that axiom was translated into action, a satisfactory solution would be brought nearer. Only then would the declared or tacit supporters of Portugal know that their alliance necessarily entailed losing the friendship of Africa. The Salazar régime would then either be isolated, in which case its days would be numbered, or it would retain the staunch support of many loyal friends. In either case, the demarcation lines of that legitimate struggle would become crystal clear.

618. The representative of Tunisia said that the Tunisian Government had compiled a voluminous dossier on the Territories under Portuguese domination since 1963, when the Tunisian Minister for Foreign Affairs, together with his counterparts from Liberia, Madagascar and Sierra Leone, had been duly entrusted by the Conference of Heads of African States and Governments with the task of following closely the question of the Territories under Portuguese domination.

619. The Tunisian Government, faithful to the resolutions adopted by the Organization of African Unity and the United Nations, had also used its influence with the countries diplomatically accredited to Tunisia to draw their attention to the explosive nature of the situation in those Territories. Finally, both through its deep conviction and in order to implement the various resolutions adopted on the question, Tunisia had never hesitated to provide substantial and unconditional assistance to all the liberation movements which appealed to it, and it was prepared to go on doing so.

620. During the Special Committee's third series of meetings in Africa, the Tunisian delegation had been particularly struck by the seriousness, clarity and moderation of the petitioners. It wished to express to them the deep solidarity of the Tunisian Government and people and to assure them of its full support. In their replies to the questions put to them by members of the Special Committee, the petitioners had shown themselves to be worthy people, devoid of any bitterness or hatred. They had given further proof of the maturity of the genuine representatives of the African people fighting for independence. Mr. Mondlane, for Mozambique, and Mr. Cabral, for so-called Portuguese Guinea, were living examples of the dignity to which he was referring.

621. The colonial problem of so-called Portuguese Guinea was of a very special nature. The Special Committee should therefore find special means to combat the morbid stubbornness of the Portuguese Government, which continued to reject any peaceful solution calculated to lead the people of those Territories to independence. The Tunisian delegation was convinced that the draft resolution before the Special Committee included some particularly constructive elements for safeguarding the interests of the African inhabitants of the Territories under Portuguese domination. There was not a single delegation which could deny the truths set forth in the draft resolution. If those truths appeared bitter to some delegations, that was unfortunate, but if it was to be faithful to itself and to the task which had been entrusted to it the Special Committee could not pass over them in silence, for in so doing it would be failing in its duty and disappointing the millions of human beings who had placed all their hopes in the United Nations.

622. Tunisia would continue to demand specific and realistic steps to give effective assistance to the oppressed African inhabitants. It had always acted in that spirit and would continue to do so as long as Portugal persisted in opposing the complete implementation of the United Nations resolutions and as long as a single piece of African territory remained under foreign domination.

623. The representative of Iran said that the situation in the Portuguese Territories had gone from bad to worse. Oppression, poverty and exploitation were increasing daily, and Portuguese financiers thrived on African misery. Famine was widespread, and health measures virtually non-existent; and an atmosphere of tension and insecurity prevailed.

624. Portugal was trying to perpetuate subjugation in concert with South Africa and Southern Rhodesia. Only through repression was Portugal able to refuse the right of Africans to independence; otherwise, it would be voted out of the Territories. However, as Africans did not have the use of the ballot box, they had to resort to arms in order to defend their dignity and reassert their identity. The majority of the Portuguese people were opposed to their Government's policies, and the opposition party had advocated the principle of majority rule in the overseas Territories. At any event, Portugal's days in Africa were numbered.

625. He concluded by suggesting the provision of aid to all nationalist movements from such specialized agencies as UNESCO and WHO.

626. The representative of Venezuela said that his country did not accept the contention that the Portuguese Territories in Africa were overseas provinces of Portugal and an integral part of its Territory. General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) was entirely applicable to those Territories. Venezuela condemned Portugal's colonial policy, its intransigent attitude, its obstinate refusal to implement the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council, its indefensible position in denying the inalienable rights of the people to self-determination, and its colonial war, which had already been responsible for thousands of deaths. It unreservedly supported the aspirations of the people still under that country's colonial domination, and would continue to give its support to any action directed towards the ending of the anachronistic situation prevailing in the Territories. Conversely, it would oppose any action that would limit the Special Committee's mandate or the powers of other competent organs, or that was not in accordance with the terms of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

627. Commenting on the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.313), he said that his delegation was in full agreement with most of its paragraphs. It could accept only with reservation the sixth paragraph of the preamble and operative paragraphs 4 and 5, and would be unable to vote in favour of operative paragraphs 6, 7 and 8. His delegation's position in that respect had been explained on previous occasions, particularly in connexion with the vote on General Assembly resolution 2107 (XX) of 21 December 1965. He would accordingly appreciate it if those three operative paragraphs could be voted upon separately, to enable his delegation to support the remainder of the draft resolution. He also requested a roll-call vote.

628. The representative of Italy said that one wondered, when considering the problem of the Portuguese Territories, how in 1966 there could still exist a European Government and a European public opinion which believed it possible to maintain a colonial relationship between a metropolitan country and Territories geographically, ethnically, economically and politically so remote from it.

629. The policy in question was an outmoded one which could only have negative consequences and entail countless sufferings for all concerned, whether for the colonial peoples forced to take up arms in defence of their rights or for the families in the European country whose sons were sent to Africa to fight an unpopular, unjust and hopeless war. It was for that reason that whenever the question of the Portuguese Territories had been considered in the United Nations his delegation had protested against the Portuguese Government's colonial policy. It was for that reason also that the Italian Government had informed the Portuguese Government that it was very concerned at developments in the Portuguese Territories and deplored its refusal to co-operate with the United Nations in the matter.

630. In addition, the Italian Government had prohibited any exports of arms to Portugal and it was refusing any form of economic or technical assistance to that country. He wished to state, in that connexion, that any arms of Italian origin which might have been found in the Territories under Portuguese domination had arrived there without the consent of the Italian Government and, indeed, in violation of the prohibition which it had imposed.

631. There were some who advocated such radical measures as the expulsion of Portugal from the specialized agencies, the application of economic and military sanctions and the breaking-off of all relations with Portugal within NATO and outside it. While he appreciated the motives and shared the views of those who advocated such measures against Portugal, he felt obliged to express reservations with respect to measures which would contravene the provisions of the United Nations Charter; for, in his view, the Organization was not yet sufficiently developed to put an end to injustice wherever it prevailed or to re-establish law and order where it had ceased to exist.

632. He would give an example to clarify his meaning. In 1965, at the twentieth session of the General Assembly, a resolution on the Portuguese Territories had been adopted although only 58 votes had been cast in its favour and there had been almost as many negative votes or abstentions. The countries which had voted against the resolution or had abstained had included Argentina, Mexico, Austria, Chile, Finland, Jamaica, Norway and Sweden, which no one could say were joined to Portugal by an alliance or by bonds of sympathy. As a result of the adoption of that resolution, the impression had been created that the Portuguese Government received support from certain Western and Latin American Powers, which was far from the truth. In fact, Portugal, despite its membership of NATO, to which it represented a considerable burden, was isolated in the world, and its only real allies were South Africa and Southern Rhodesia.

633. What could the Special Committee do to facilitate the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) in the Territories under Portuguese administration? Firstly, it should continue to draw the attention of world public opinion to the problem which the maintenance of an outdated colonial system in Africa constituted. Secondly, the United Nations should not only supply the peoples of the Portuguese Territories with material aid in the form of medicines, food and clothing, but should also help them to train the personnel who would lead them after the Territories became independent. Thirdly, those countries which, for historical or geographical reasons, still maintained relations with Portugal must be urged to express to the Portuguese Government once more their serious concern at conditions in its Territories. Fourthly, those same countries should be urged to adopt effective measures to prevent the armaments supplied to Portugal within the framework of NATO and for defensive purposes in Western Europe from being used to repress nationalist liberation movements in the Portuguese colonies.

634. Before concluding, he wished to make some comments concerning the role which NATO, according to some speakers, was playing in the Portuguese problem. The attacks which had been made on NATO at the current session of the Special Committee were simply the result of a propaganda campaign designed to discredit an alliance that had played an essential role in the maintenance of international peace. He hoped that the African members of the Special Committee would be able to draw a distinction between the condemnation of Portuguese colonialism which was on the Committee's agenda and the petty polemics against the Atlantic alliance. He deplored the fact that some speakers had seen fit to make use of such a forum and of the debate on so serious a subject as conditions in the Portuguese Territories to raise problems which were related to the military and political balance in Europe and had nothing to do with the matter currently under discussion.

635. The representative of Australia said that his Government's attitude was one of rejection of Portugal's present policies and of support for the principle of self-determination. It was concerned about Portugal's failure to meet its obligations under the Charter and its refusal to submit information to the United Nations on the Territories under its control. His Government had not hesitated to express to the Portuguese Government its concern and disagreement. Australia did not supply arms or military equipment to that country. It was implacably opposed to forced labour, restriction of civil liberties and limitation of franchise, as perpetuated by Portugal.

636. During the Special Committee's meetings in Dar es Salaam and Algiers, he had put certain political questions to the petitioners, and had been impressed by the answers, the import of which had been substantially the same in both places. He had been left with the feeling and the hope that there was much fertile ground that the Portuguese Government could cultivate for the happiness and prosperity of the countries and people concerned.

637. The representative of the United States of America recalled that in Dar es Salaam, when the Special Committee had last discussed the question of the Territories under Portuguese administration, she had summarized the major elements of United States policy on the question. That policy had been fully and frankly stated in the General Assembly, the Security Council and the Committee, and in Washington and Lisbon directly to the Portuguese Government.

638. Her Government had made it clear that it did not agree with Portugal's policy towards its Territories. It upheld the view that the Territories were clearly non-self-governing and were subject to the provisions of Chapter XI of the United Nations Charter. The United States of America had repeatedly urged Portugal to fulfil its obligations as an administering Power in respect both of the territorial administration and of the submission of information to the Secretary-General of the United Nations. It supported the right of the people of the Territories to full and genuine self-determination: they should be free to choose the kind of institutions and forms of government under which they wished to live. It did not believe that self-determination meant the agreement and consent of the population only to a particular political or administrative structure, or to a certain type of State, and it had urged Portugal to accept the principle of self-determination and give it practical effect. There was no conceivable step that would contribute more than that to the peaceful solution of the problem: it would break a stalemate that was fraught with danger, and that would indeed be broken, if not by consent, then by violence. It was the Committee's task to explore realistic means whereby that process could take place peacefully.

639. One step that the Security Council had recognized as desirable was to prevent the export of arms to the administering Power for use in its African Territories, and the question had been subject to extensive discussion in the Committee. Since Portugal was a member of NATO, the discussion had provided a convenient opportunity for some members who, for reasons unconnected with the well-being of the peoples of the Territories, wished to attack that organization. So far as her Government was concerned, she could state unequivocally that NATO as an organization did not supply arms to Portugal for use in the Territories. She also stated that the United States, in accordance with operative paragraph 6 of the Security Council resolution of 31 July 1963, neither supplied nor permitted the export of arms or military equipment to that country for use in the Territories. It had for many years forbidden such provision without the specific assurance that the material would not be so used. That was the firm and publicly stated policy to which her country would continue to adhere.

640. A number of petitioners had cited Portugal's use of military equipment allegedly of United States manufacture. She had made it clear in Dar es Salaam that the weapons concerned were of Second World War vintage, available all over the world, and had been part of existing arms stocks in a number of countries for many years. She repeated that they were not available in the United States for use in the Territories.

641. Her delegation deplored the resort by Portugal to violence in the area, and particularly its bombing of defenceless villages and people. She pointed out, however, that the period of time cited by the former Portuguese pilot—21 July 1961 to 10 February 1963—had been prior to the adoption of the Security Council's resolution on the subject. She also pointed out that, despite the attempt by some delegations to persuade that petitioner to indict certain countries as having co-operated with Portugal in its colonialist policy, he had failed to do so.

642. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania, commenting on the statements made by the Italian and other delegations with regard to the question of financial interests, said that for Africans the question was not one of ideological differences: they were interested only in being Africans and in independence. The reference to financial interests had been made because the petitioners had stated repeatedly that those interests contributed towards the war and provided the Portuguese with the necessary funds to buy weapons. It was regrettable that an attempt had been made by certain delegations to inject ideological arguments. He would have preferred to hear them deny that American and West European companies were contributing to the war that was responsible for the massacre of the African people. Evidence had been given, even by the Portuguese themselves, regarding the activities of such financial monopolies.

643. The representative of Italy had stated that the NATO alliance had played an important part in keeping the peace of the world. He pointed out that there had been no conflict in any part of the world since the Second World War in which NATO had stepped in to defend world peace. As long as there was evidence that NATO arms were being used against the African people they would continue to raise objections. The petitioner who had appeared before the Special Committee the previous day had given evidence that NATO arms had been supplied to Portugal at a nominal charge, and as he had himself been serving at that time in the Portuguese army, there was every reason to believe that what he said was true.

644. The reassertion by the representative of the United States that her Government agreed with the principle of self-determination was not enough: what was wanted now was implementation of that principle. The African people considered it a contradiction to claim to agree to that principle while at the same time helping the Power concerned to undermine it.

645. He quoted from an Indian newspaper a passage under the headline "Military Weapons to Salazar", which stated that at the beginning of May 1966 the United States customs authorities had discovered a large quantity of arms illegally destined for Portugal, and had arrested the pilot of the aircraft on which they were to have been carried, who had defended himself by saying that he was acting not for individual but for national interest. He had declared in court that he was an agent of the CIA charged with the carriage of arms to Angola and Mozambique, and that he had also delivered to Portugal seven B-52 bombers and other equipment.

646. What his delegation was interested in was not the declaration of an arms embargo but of actual effective control of arms to Portugal. The representative of the United States had stated that the arms her Government supplied to Portugal were only for the defence of Europe. After a lapse of twenty years since the Second World War there was no threat of war in Europe, yet it was being said that Portugal was being given arms for its defence.

647. His delegation would have been glad to hear NATO members in the Committee state categorically that NATO arms would never be used by Portugal against the African people.

648. The representative of the United States of America, commenting on the statement made by the representative of Tanzania, said that he himself had shown that measures had been taken by the United States of America to prevent the export of arms to the Portuguese Territories. The fact that the persons concerned had had to resort to illegal acts showed that her Government did enforce its declared policy and that any violation of it was subject to prosecution in its courts. Regarding the claim that United States agencies had collaborated with the pilot of the aircraft concerned, she was authorized by her Government categorically to deny that allegation.

D. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE²⁹

649. At the 452nd meeting, Afghanistan, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, United Republic of Tanzania and Yugoslavia, submitted a draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.313).

650. Introducing the draft resolution on behalf of the sponsors, the representative of India said that operative paragraph 4 reflected the viewpoint expressed by a large majority of members of the Special Committee and by the petitioners who had appeared before it. It was well known that the assistance Portugal received from such financial interests was one of the main props for its obduracy, and the drafters of the resolution had considered it necessary to express strong disapproval of them.

651. The other new idea was that contained in operative paragraph 6 which recommended that the Security Council should make it obligatory for all States to implement the measures contained in General Assembly resolution 2107 (XX) of 21 December 1965, and in particular, those in paragraph 7 of that resolution, which he read out to the Committee. The enforcement of those measures on a voluntary basis had been urged for a long time, but the response of some Member States had been bitterly disappointing. The Security Council must now assume the vital role with which it had been entrusted under the United Nations Charter. If it made such measures obligatory, the excuse of Portugal's friends and allies that they could not compel action by their nationals would be removed.

²⁹ Action taken by the Special Committee on the question of Territories under Portuguese administration in connexion with General Assembly resolutions 2105 (XX) and 2107 (XX) is contained in chapter I of this report. See also chapter II (paras. 595-619) for an account of the discussions on the resolution adopted by the Special Committee at its 455th meeting on 22 June 1966 concerning the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) with regard to Territories considered by the Committee during its meetings in Africa.

652. Some delegations might have misgivings about the sixth preambular paragraph. He would point out, however, that the threat to international peace and security as a result of Portugal's policy had already been confirmed by the Security Council, and the reference to aggravation of the situation as a result of the racist rebellion in Southern Rhodesia was merely a recognition of the facts.

653. It had been argued by some delegations that it was unrealistic for the Special Committee to recommend measures that were unlikely to be accepted and implemented by everyone. The co-sponsors believed, however, that the Committee should not be discouraged by the obstacles put in the way of implementing effective measures against Portugal, and that it was its duty to continue its attempt to induce those who had not so far found it possible to support the measures envisaged to realize their mistakes and fall into line. With regard to the suggestion that those measures would encroach upon the Security Council's authority, he pointed out that the Special Committee was merely recommending the enforcement of mandatory sanctions in regard to the threat to international peace and security already confirmed by the Security Council in its resolution 218 (1965).

654. The situation in the Territories under Portuguese rule was a grave and deteriorating one. The brave people suffering under it were carrying on their fight against heavy odds, but Portugal was bound to lose in the end. The co-sponsors hoped that it would realize that fact and mend the situation before too much blood had been shed, and it was in that spirit that they had presented the draft resolution. He hoped all members of the Committee would find it possible to support it and to implement it fully and promptly. The sponsors would welcome any suggestions for improving the draft, but must reject any that would be likely to weaken the text.

655. The representative of Madagascar, speaking on behalf of the Afro-Asian sponsors and Yugoslavia, said that the draft resolution endeavoured to sum up, in a few words, what the African countries thought they were entitled to expect from the international community in order to confront the danger threatening the Territories administered by Portugal, and hence threatening Africa and the whole world. The sponsors had wanted to demonstrate once again their uneasiness and concern about the situation in those Territories. They considered the situation "critical" and "explosive", for they were convinced that if it went on it could constitute a serious threat to peace and security, which were the objectives and the raison d'être of the United Nations. The Special Committee had been able to hear evidence about what was happening in the Territories under Portuguese domination: those Territories were the daily scene of military operations and repressive measures, which claimed many victims among the civilian population. Portugal had acquired the habit of repeating constantly that there was no war in the Territories it occupied. In so doing, it not only denied the truth but encouraged bloodshed, and no one could remain indifferent in face of the ever-increasing number of victims shot down by Portuguese bullets. The draft resolution also expressed the sponsors' concern about the presence of certain financial interests which were operating in the Territories under Portuguese domination, to the sole advantage of Portugal and not of the African population.

656. It was not as a matter of routine that the sponsors of the draft resolution had wished to reaffirm the inalienable right of those people to self-determination and independence. The Committee knew what definition of the term "self-determination" Portugal sought to impose. That question had been the subject of lengthy debates both in the Security Council and in other United Nations bodies. He need merely recall that the States Members of the United Nations were unanimous in recognizing that Portugal's thesis was characterized by the bad faith that prompted it.

657. In view of Portugal's persistent refusal to conform to reason and good sense, the sponsors of the draft resolution had made a point of reaffirming their position on the legitimacy of the struggle which the inhabitants of those Territories were being forced to wage, solely with a view to recovering their sovereignty and independence. It went without saying that the sponsors of the draft resolution did not thereby intend to give the green light for violence and bloodshed, but merely to point out that the peoples of those Territories had been compelled to resort to force to face a war that Portugal had imposed on them. Before taking up arms, their representatives had tried every means of finding a basis for agreement with Portugal. Not only had Portugal met them with total intransigence but it had launched military and repressive operations against the local population. In that connexion, and in view of the intensification of the attacks on the civilian population, the sponsors of the draft resolution had been led to express their concern over the assistance and arms which Portugal was receiving from its allies and was using against the people of the Territories under its domination. That was why they were appealing once more to Portugal's allies to reconsider their attitude and to take the steps set forth in paragraph 7 of the draft resolution. Moreover, practically all the petitioners whom the members of the Committee had heard in the course of the present session had confirmed that Portugal was indeed using the arms and war material it received from its allies.

658. Similarly, the sponsors of the draft resolution had not wished to pass over in silence the occupying Power's odious policy of encouraging foreign immigration into those Territories for equally reprehensible ends. That settlement policy showed clearly that Portugal was firmly resolved to maintain its hold over the Territories under its domination, to perpetuate its policy of atrocities and to continue to persecute innocent people who had committed no crime but that of demanding freedom and independence.

659. In the light of the Indian representative's comments and the observations he himself had made on behalf of the members of the Afro-Asian group and Yugoslavia, he considered the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.313) fully justified. He hoped that all the members of the Committee who were against war and bloodshed, who professed tolerance and valued freedom and sought to promote understanding and brotherhood among peoples, would be willing to make their contribution to the joint effort by isolating Portugal from the rest of the world until such time as the Government of that country renounced its contemptible colonial policy.

660. The representative of Iraq said that in co-sponsoring the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.313) on the Portuguese Territories which was before the Committee, it was the hope of his delegation that it would be adopted unanimously. The Committee's moral support for the cause of the African people in those Territories would contribute to the liberation of millions who had long suffered from inhuman treatment and countless indignities.

661. The representative of Denmark said that, to its great regret, the Danish delegation could not vote in favour of the draft resolution. It found several paragraphs unacceptable. In particular, operative paragraph 6 was not acceptable, because paragraph 7 of resolution 2107 went far beyond the General Assembly's competence. Furthermore, the situation did not seem to justify such radical measures. Finally, the seventh preambular paragraph and operative paragraph 4 exaggerated the role played by foreign interests.

662. In conclusion, he doubted whether measures as radical as those recommended in the draft resolution could effectively assist the indigenous peoples.

663. The representative of Bulgaria said that his delegation had often expressed the opinion that only if compulsory sanctions were adopted against Members of the United Nations which contravened United Nations resolutions would it be possible to put Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter into effect. He was glad that the draft resolution reflected that urgent necessity. Operative paragraph 6 in particular was a notable example because it stressed the obligation of all States, whether or not they were Members of the United Nations—he had in mind the Federal Republic of Germany in particular—to implement the measures set forth in paragraph 7 of resolution 2107 (XX), which provided among other things for the rupture of diplomatic and consular relations and the boycott of all trade with Portugal.

664. All the petitioners had stressed the fact that the United Nations, and more particularly the specialized agencies, could give them effective assistance. The Special Committee had therefore been justified in asking those agencies how they had complied with the General Assembly resolutions.

665. In the draft resolution before the Committee, the specialized agencies, and in particular the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund, were asked to refrain from granting Portugal any financial, economic or technical assistance. The specialized agencies were also asked to increase their assistance to the refugees and to the victims of military operations. He was glad that the draft resolution included such provisions, for some of the specialized agencies were showing little enthusiasm for the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. For that reason, it might perhaps be useful to prepare a still more explicit text.

666. He considered that the draft resolution would represent a step forward and would make it possible to give those who were fighting against Portuguese colonialism more effective aid. The Bulgarian delegation thanked the sponsors for their efforts and would whole-heartedly support the draft resolution.

667. The representative of Syria said that because it was not enough to condemn Portugal the draft resolution rightly recommended to the Security Council to make the implementation of measures provided for in paragraph 7 of General Assembly resolution 2107 (XX) mandatory on all Member States. Equally crucial was paragraph 7 of the draft resolution requesting all States, and particularly the military allies of Portugal, not to supply the régime with arms, not to provide it with material designed to facilitate its own production of arms, and not to assist it in any other way. The grounds for that request had been the clear evidence given that Portugal did receive, directly or indirectly, arms and equipment from certain States which, however, publicly condemned the régime. That contradiction was at the heart of the tragedy, which was further aggravated by the enthusiastic support tendered to the régime by financial concerns in a bid for quick and illicit profits.

668. The representative of Italy said that in the light of considerations he had stated previously and in view of the instructions which he had just received from his Government, he would be unable to support the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.313). He had already expressed his views of foreign economic interests, and he was obliged to make very serious reservations concerning operative paragraphs 6 and 7. Paragraph 6 referred to a General Assembly resolution which many Members of the United Nations considered unconstitutional. Moreover, he did not believe that the General Assembly or any of its committees could recommend definite measures to the Security Council. The wording of paragraph 7 was tantamount to the imposition of sanctions, and any such decision was the sole prerogative of the Security Council.

669. The representative of Australia said that his delegation was unable to support the draft resolution in its entirety. The last three paragraphs of the preamble did not give an adequate and sufficiently balanced description of the facts to sustain the operative paragraphs that followed. Operative paragraph 4 had the same defects to which he had referred in Addis Ababa concerning the resolution on South West Africa, in that it made no attempt to differentiate between those commercial interests that exploited the people and those that did not.

670. Operative paragraph 6 contained a new element with regard to the Portuguese Territories, but one with which the Committee had become familiar in other contexts. His delegation was bound to oppose its form of words, which usurped the Security Council's authority and would give rise to a set of circumstances to which Australia was strongly opposed.

671. The same remarks applied to operative paragraph 7, which was perhaps even more important, since there were far-reaching implications hidden in it that went beyond the tragedy of the Portuguese Territories. His delegation would therefore abstain from voting on the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.313).

672. The representative of the United States of America said that her delegation did not believe that the language used or the measures called for in the seventh paragraph of the preamble and in operative paragraph 6 of the draft resolution were justified even in the serious situation existing in the Portuguese Territories. Nor could it agree with the generalized and doctrinaire statements in regard to foreign investment in the eight paragraph of the preamble and in operative paragraph 4. Her delegation would be unable to support the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.313).

673. The representative of Chile said that the position of Chile had not changed. For years Chile had condemned the colonial policy of Portugal and unconditionally supported the nationalist movements whose object was to establish decent government in the Territories under Portuguese domination. The Chilean delegation did not object to the sixth preambular paragraph, although it had some reservations about the wording. It would abstain in the votes on operative paragraphs 6, 7 and 8 for reasons which had already been stated many times in the General Assembly and in the Special Committee.

674. At its 455th meeting the Special Committee voted on the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.331) as follows:

(a) Operative paragraph 2 of the draft resolution was adopted by a roll-call vote of 20 to none, and no abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Australia, Bulgaria, Chile, Denmark, Ethiopia, India, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Republic of Tanzania, United States of America, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Against: None.

(b) Operative paragraph 6 of the draft resolution was adopted by 15 votes to 3, with 2 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Ethiopia, India, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Republic of Tanzania, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Denmark, United States of America.

Abstaining: Chile, Venezuela.

(c) Operative paragraph 7 was adopted by a roll-call vote of 16 to 2, with 3 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Republic of Tanzania, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, United States of America.

Abstaining: Chile, Denmark, Venezuela.

(d) Operative paragraph 8 of the draft resolution was adopted by a roll-call vote of 16 to none, with 5 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Republic of Tanzania, Yugoslavia.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Australia, Chile, Denmark, United States of America, Venezuela.

(e) The draft resolution as a whole (A/AC.109/L.313) was adopted by a roll-call vote of 18 to 1, with 3 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Chile, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Republic of Tanzania, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Against: United States of America.

Abstaining: Australia, Denmark, Italy.

675. The text of the resolution on the question of Territories under Portuguese administration (A/AC.109/187) adopted by the Special Committee at its 455th meeting on 22 June 1966, reads as follows:

"The Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

"Having examined again the question relating to Angola, Mozambique, so-called Portuguese Guinea and other Territories under Portuguese domination,

"Having heard the statements of the petitioners,

"Recalling General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960 containing the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

"Recalling also Security Council resolutions 163 (1961) of 9 June 1961, 180 (1963) of 31 July 1963, 183 (1963) of 11 December 1963 and 218 (1965) of 23 November 1965,

"Recalling further General Assembly resolutions 1807 (XVII) of 14 December 1962, 1819 (XVII) of 18 December 1962, 1913 (XVIII) of 3 December 1963 and 2107 (XX) of 21 December 1965,

"Deeply concerned at the critical and explosive situation which is threatening peace and security arising from the intensification of the measures of repression and military operations against the African people of these Territories, which is further aggravated by the racist minority rebellion in Southern Rhodesia,

"Noting with deep concern that the activities of the foreign financial interests in these Territories which impede the African people in the realization of their aspirations to freedom and independence continue undiminished,

"Further noting with deep concern that Portugal continues to use the aid and weapons that it receives from its military allies against the populations of these Territories,

"1. Reaffirms the inalienable right of the peoples of the African Territories under Portuguese domination to freedom and independence in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and recognizes the legitimacy of their struggle to achieve this right;

"2. Condemns the colonial policy of Portugal and its persistent refusal to carry out the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council;

"3. Condemns the policy of the Government of Portugal which violates the economic and political rights of the indigenous population by the settlement on a large scale of foreign immigrants in the Territories and by the exporting of workers to South Africa;

"4. Condemns the activities of the financial interests operating in the Territories under Portuguese domination which exploit the human and material resources and impede the progress of the people of the Territories towards freedom and independence;

"5. Appeals to all States to give the people of the Territories under Portuguese domination the moral and material support necessary for the restoration of their inalienable rights and to prevent their nationals from co-operating with the Portuguese authorities, especially in the field of foreign investment;

"6. Recommends to the Security Council to make it obligatory for all States to implement the measures contained in General Assembly resolution 2107 (XX), in particular those mentioned in paragraph 7 thereof;

"7. Requests all States and, in particular, the military allies of Portugal within the framework of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, to take the following steps:

"(a) To desist forthwith from giving the Government of Portugal any assistance which would enable it to continue its repression of the African people in the Territories under its domination;

"(b) To take all the necessary measures to prevent the sale or supply of arms and military equipment to the Government of Portugal;

"(c) To stop the sale or shipment to the Government of Portugal of equipment and materials for the manufacture or maintenance of arms and ammunition;

"8. Appeals once again to all the specialized agencies, in particular to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund, to refrain from granting Portugal any financial, economic or technical assistance so long as the Government of Portugal fails to implement General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV);

"9. Requests the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the specialized agencies concerned and other international relief organizations to increase their assistance to the refugees from the Territories under Portuguese domination and to the people who have suffered and are still suffering from military operations;

"10. Decides to maintain the question of the Territories under Portuguese domination on its agenda."

676. The text of the resolution was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 1 July 1966.³⁰

PART II*

E. STUDY OF THE ACTIVITIES OF FOREIGN ECONOMIC AND OTHER INTERESTS WHICH ARE IMPEDING THE IMPLEMENTATION OF THE DECLARATION ON THE GRANTING OF INDEPENDENCE TO COLONIAL COUNTRIES AND PEOPLES IN THE TERRITORIES UNDER PORTUGUESE ADMINISTRATION

Introduction

677. At its 277th meeting, on 3 July 1964, the Special Committee adopted a resolution on Territories under Portuguese administration (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. V, para. 352). In operative paragraph 7 of this resolution it requested "Sub-Committee I of the Special Committee, with the assistance of the Secretary-General, to study the activities of foreign economic and other interests, which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence in the Territories under Portuguese administration".

678. Sub-Committee I considered this question in November 1964 and at meetings held between 19 August and 12 October 1965. On the basis of information available to it, which included two working papers prepared by the Secretariat (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annexes I and II), the Sub-Committee drew up conclusions and recommendations which were subsequently adopted by the Special Committee and included in chapter V of its report to the General Assembly at its twentieth session.

679. Sub-Committee I continued its consideration of this question at meetings held in August and September 1966, when it had before it additional working papers prepared by the Secretariat (see annex, appendices I to V). On 14 September 1966, the Sub-Committee adopted a supplementary report concerning this item which is annexed hereto.

680. At its 470th meeting, on 10 October 1966, the Special Committee considered the report of Sub-Committee I.

Consideration by the Special Committee of the supplementary report of Sub-Committee I

681. At the 470th meeting of the Special Committee, the representative of Syria, Rapporteur of Sub-Committee I, introduced the supplementary report of the Sub-Committee.

682. The representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland noted that the Sub-Committee confirmed all the recommendations which it had made in its main report on the question (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, appendix, para. 280). His delegation had reserved its position on that report when it had been discussed the previous year and did so once more.

683. The representative of Italy recalled the views expressed by his delegation regarding the main report (ibid., chap. V, paras 454-459). He reserved his delegation's position on the recommendations in paragraphs 89 and 90 of the supplementary report. On the understanding that those reservations would be recorded, his delegation would not oppose the adoption of the report.

684. The representative of the United States of America reserved his delegation's position on the report, for the reasons it had already stated in the earlier debate on the subject.

685. The representative of Australia recalled that his delegation had informed the Special Committee that his Government had been in unilateral touch with the Government of Portugal and that it did not agree with the Portuguese Government's theory regarding the question of self-determination and allied matters. As his delegation had explained its attitude on previous occasions, he reserved its position on the report.

686. The representative of Denmark drew attention to his delegation's position as stated at the thirty-first meeting of the Sub-Committee (see annex, paragraph 91) and said that those reservations were still valid.

Action taken by the Special Committee on the supplementary report of Sub-Committee I

687. At its 470th meeting, on 10 October 1966, the Special Committee adopted the supplementary report of Sub-Committee I (see annex), it being understood that the reservations expressed by members would be reflected in the records.

688. In so doing, the Special Committee reaffirmed all the recommendations contained in the main report on this subject which it had submitted to the General Assembly in 1965 (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, sect. D) and decided to recommend to the General Assembly that it inscribe on the agenda of its twenty-first session as a matter of urgency the following item:

³⁰ Official Records of the Security Council, Twenty-first Year, Supplement for July, August and September 1966, document S/7394.

* Previously issued under the symbol A/6300/Add.3 (part II).

"The activities of foreign economic and other interests which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, the Territories under Portuguese administration and other colonial territories".

ANNEX

[A/AC.109/L.334 and Add.1]

Supplementary report of Sub-Committee I

The activities of foreign economic and other interests which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in the Territories under Portuguese administration

Rapporteur: Mr. Rafic JOUÉJATI (Syria)

CONTENTS

	Paragraphs
INTRODUCTION	1-3
CONSIDERATION BY THE SUB-COMMITTEE
A. Statements by members	4-68
B. Conclusions	69-88
C. Recommendations	89-90
D. Adoption of report	91
Appendices
	Page
I. Agriculture and processing industries in Angola and Mozambique: organization and government policy	378
II. Agriculture and processing industries in Angola ..	391
III. Agriculture and processing industries in Mozambique	411
IV. Foreign-owned railways in Angola and Mozambique	435
V. Mozambique's economic relations with South Africa and Southern Rhodesia	446

INTRODUCTION

1. On 3 July 1964, the Special Committee adopted a resolution on Territories under Portuguese administration (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. V, para. 352) whereby in paragraph 7 it requested "Sub-Committee I of the Special Committee" with the assistance of the Secretary-General, to study the activities of foreign economic and other interests, which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the granting of independence in the Territories under Portuguese administration".

2. The Sub-Committee first considered this question in November 1964 and further at meetings held between 19 August and 12 October 1965. It had before it two working papers prepared by the Secretariat, one concerning mining in Angola and Mozambique and the other concerning the concession, occupation and settlement of land in Angola and Mozambique (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annexes I and II). In addition, the Sub-Committee also had before it excerpts of statements made and communications submitted by petitioners from Territories under Portuguese administration during the Special Committee's visit to Africa in 1965. On the basis of the information available the Sub-Committee drew up conclusions and recommendations which were subsequently adopted by the Special Committee and included in chapter V of its report to the General Assembly at its twentieth session.

3. The Sub-Committee continued its consideration of this question at its 27th, 28th and 31st meetings held on 5 and 12 August, and 14 September 1966. The Sub-Committee had before it a series of working papers prepared by the Secretariat, in compliance with the request contained in its previous report (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, appendix, para. 278), on agriculture and processing industries in Angola and Mozambique, on foreign-owned railways in those two Territories, and on the economic relations of Mozambique with South Africa and Southern Rhodesia. These working papers appear as appendices I to V of the present annex.

* The Sub-Committee is composed of the following members: Denmark, Ethiopia, Mali, Syria (Rapporteur), Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Republic of Tanzania (Chairman) and Yugoslavia.

CONSIDERATION BY THE SUB-COMMITTEE

A. Statements by members

4. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that Portugal was a primitive and uncivilized colonial Power which was engaged in robbing the peoples of Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea. It was a small, under-developed country, the poorest in Europe, with a population of 8 million people; yet, with the help of its allies, it was oppressing and impoverishing the African countries which, by an accident of history, were under its administration, using methods of which any other nation would have been ashamed. Other colonial Powers—for instance, the United Kingdom, France, and, to a lesser extent, Belgium—had been able to conceal their exploitation of subject peoples by establishing economic systems which, on the surface, had appeared to be for the benefit of the people. They had encouraged the development of a small but significant African middle class which had helped them to keep control of the African peasants and workers. Portugal, however, had failed to develop any such economic system to camouflage its interests, despite the highly publicized Portuguese theory of Luso-tropicalism, which was a system intended to help the Portuguese to fuse with all races, cultures and religion to form one nation. The Portuguese claim that a class of assimilados had been established, with sufficient Portuguese culture to be indistinguishable from the European settlers, was a myth.

5. Portugal's colonial economic policy was centred on the production of high-priced cash crops for export. Assistance was given mainly to European or so-called civilized producers, although the Africans were responsible for most of the agricultural production, either as cheap labour or as the principal growers of cotton, rice, maize and cashew nuts. Africans interested in making a living through cash agriculture were governed by a whole series of restrictive legal measures. For example, all able-bodied Africans were obliged to work on public projects unless they could prove that they had hired themselves out as farm hands for six months (in Angola, for nine months) a year, that they qualified as independent native farmers, or that they kept a minimum number of cattle. Such restrictions had made the Africans virtually slaves of the European and Asian entrepreneurs and farmers and, with the system of concessions granted to certain monopolies for the marketing of agricultural produce, had eliminated any economic advantages which might have resulted from the abundance of arable land still accessible to the African peasant. The less able-bodied members of his family were left to look after his farm during the time he was forced to work elsewhere.

6. In both Angola and Mozambique an African had no right to any piece of farmland unless he kept it permanently cleared and cultivated. He could be expelled from his land if he went away and did not take care of his plot for more than a total of four months in a year, if after three years he did not show that he was increasing the value of his cultivated areas and livestock, or if he did not build a brick house on or near his plot within five years. Since the Africans spent most of their time on forced labour and were only free to look after their own land during the dry season, it was impossible for them to maintain their status as independent farmers by fulfilling all the Portuguese requirements. Consequently, the ownership and use of arable land in the Territories was a privilege enjoyed by Europeans, Asians and a very small proportion of the so-called civilized Africans. The reason for such a discriminatory agricultural system was clearly to enable the Portuguese settlers, the Portuguese colonial industries and foreign interests to exploit both the land resources and the cheap African labour. The fact that none of the laws regulating agriculture and labour in Angola and Mozambique mentioned African participation in business enterprises was evidence that no Africans were expected to engage in them except as cheap labourers. They were only allowed to engage in barter amongst the indigenous community or at occasional markets set up under government supervision to sell primary products to European or Asian middlemen or to concessionary companies.

7. Investment in the agricultural and processing industries in Angola and Mozambique also favoured Europeans and Asians. In 1960, out of a total of 2,423 agricultural enterprises in Mozambique, 2,246 were Portuguese, 45 Asian, 34 German, 26 Greek and 14 British. In Angola most of the important export crops were controlled by European investors, although nearly all the production on European farm estates and plantations was by African labour.

8. One of the most distinctive features of Portuguese colonialism was the system of concessionary companies. Large European monopolies were licensed by the Government to control the purchase, export and distribution of certain export and cash crops which were mainly produced by the Africans. The Africans had no alternative but to sell their produce to the monopolies, and were forced to accept the low prices offered, while the Portuguese tax collectors waited at the buying centres to collect taxes after the farmers had sold their produce. As a result, the farmers often returned home empty-handed.

9. The production of coffee in Angola was so profitable that between 1955 and 1961 the number of European coffee-growers had increased from 600 to more than 2,000 and the total area under cultivation on European-owned farms had more than doubled. Because of intense competition for land in the coffee-producing areas, land on which Africans had been growing coffee for many years was often expropriated and given to new European settlers.

10. The processing industries in Mozambique and Angola were controlled by Europeans and other non-Africans, while the Africans were employed as cheap labour. European workers were much better paid than the Africans. In 1960, for example, the Colonial Cotton Development Company of Mozambique paid an average of $1,460 a year to European workers and an average of only $87 a year to African workers. Even allowing for the differences in skill between European and African workers, it was a very discriminatory system.

11. The bulk of the cotton output from Mozambique had to be exported to Portugal under the compulsory quota system for which export prices were officially fixed at about 60 per cent below international quotations. In order to limit the development of textile industries in Mozambique and Angola and thereby keep the Territories as steady markets for Portuguese processed goods, the Portuguese Government restricted the local production of textiles. If imports of textile goods from Portugal were to be replaced by goods produced locally, Mozambique might be able to reduce its trade deficit with Portugal and make its economy more self-sufficient. That, however, would be contrary to Portuguese economic interests.

12. It was obvious that Portugal's desire to stay in Africa as a colonial Power was directly related to its economic interests. When the African peoples of Mozambique and Angola began to organize themselves to fight for their independence in the early 1960s, Portugal started to invite foreign capital investments. The recent increase in the taxes paid by the large concessionary companies was clearly being used to buy weapons and equipment and to maintain a large European army.

13. Various sources had reported on Portugal's labour policy in its Territories. In 1947, Mr. Henrique Galvão, a member of the Portuguese National Assembly and an ardent supporter of Salazar, was sent to inspect the Portuguese Territories in Africa and, on his return, drew up a report which was never officially published, although it subsequently came to light in other countries. Mr. Galvão, who was subsequently dismissed, described the situation of the African workers as worse than slavery. Secondly, according to an article by a United States reporter in the New York Herald Tribune of 15 February 1948, when an Angolan plantation owner required labour, he notified the Government, which passed the demand to the village chiefs who had to supply fixed quotas of labourers. If the required number was not forthcoming, police were sent to round them up. Thirdly, a British expert on African questions, Basil Davidson, visited the Portuguese Territories in 1954 and in his book The African Awakening (1965) described the system of forced labour practised there. According to him, country roads were built and maintained by compulsory and unpaid African workers, forced labour was practised in the European plantations, and the Africans in Lunda Province, who had no other means of earning money to pay taxes, were forced to work for the Diamond Company of Angola.

14. The Portuguese Administration had also arranged with foreign countries to supply African labour. For example, the Mozambique Convention of 1928 (modified in 1934 and 1940) provided for the recruitment of up to 100,000 workers a year from Mozambique to the mines of the Transvaal. This was an important source of income for the Portuguese authorities which charged fees for the issue of passports and the registration of contracts and which also received 2s.9d. per man per month from the Transvaal mines. Under the 1928 Convention, South Africa had agreed to send through the port of Lourenço Marques 47 per cent of the traffic to and from the district of Johannesburg. There was a similar agreement with Southern Rhodesia, dated 1934.

15. Portugal's ability to control her African Territories in spite of United Nations resolutions and military uprisings was due to the support of several major Western Powers; those Powers must be persuaded to change their attitude. The United Nations must implement its decisions against Portugal before any more resolutions were passed, and positive steps must be taken to provide financial, technical and educational support for the people of the Territories who were struggling for their independence. Those countries which could afford it should be encouraged to give direct material support to the nationalist forces.

16. The aim of the Sub-Committee's work, whatever the wording of its terms of reference, was to help African peoples to achieve independence and to analyse the economic factors which impeded their progress towards independence. In spite of the diligent study of the subject carried out by the Sub-Committee the previous year, not enough attention had been paid to it by the Fourth Committee and the General Assembly during the twentieth session. He therefore suggested that the General Assembly might be asked to consider it as a separate item at the twenty-first session. He would be interested to hear the views of other members of the Sub-Committee concerning his suggestion.

17. His delegation was aware that colonialism would not be eliminated from Africa by mere resolutions, but by the united action of the African peoples and all the peace-loving countries and peoples of the world. He hoped that the study on which the Sub-Committee was engaged would help to defeat colonialism and bring freedom and peace to Africa. The whole continent of Africa would inevitably one day be free. France and the United Kingdom had been forced to leave Africa, and Portugal should realize that it, too, would suffer the same fate.

18. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that, pursuant to a decision of the Special Committee, the Sub-Committee was currently engaged in a study of agriculture, the processing industry and railway transport in Portugal's colonies. Having commented generally on the question at an earlier stage, his delegation would confine itself to the new Secretariat working papers on the subject.

19. In 1965 the Sub-Committee and the Special Committee had reached the conclusion that the activities of international monopolies in Portugal's colonies were a major obstacle to the achievement of freedom and independence by the colonial peoples and a serious impediment to the implementation of the Declaration in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).^b It had been found that Portugal had granted vast concessions to foreign investors without the consent of the African inhabitants. By giving those investors privileges and guarantees of every sort, Portugal had fostered their ruthless exploitation—a joint endeavour with the Portuguese colonialists—of the Territories' natural and human resources. The monopolies made vast profits and repaid Portugal not only through taxes but also through loans, expenditure on the maintenance of "peace and order" and other services. That assistance was used by Portugal to stifle resistance and keep colonialism alive in Africa. The partnership between the Portuguese colonialists and the international monopolies had a twofold aim—to exploit the colonies and to ensure the permanence of the system. The monopolies shared with Portugal responsibility for the African's suffering and for the non-application of the aforesaid Declaration to the Territories.

^b The conclusions and recommendations of the Sub-Committee appear in document A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, appendix, paras. 260-280.

20. It had also been determined that the monopolies active in the Portuguese colonies originated in the States which gave Portugal its greatest support. They brought influence to bear on the Governments of their countries to help Portugal maintain its colonial standing, and thus they encouraged the continued non-compliance with the Charter and General Assembly resolutions. It had also been found that the monopolies were fostering the one-sided development of the Territories' economy. Their aim, like that of Portugal, was profit and not the satisfaction of the people's needs. Indeed, the people lived in the direst poverty and had virtually the status of slaves. It had been further noted that the interests of the monopolies and Portuguese colonialists were interwoven with the military and strategic interests of the NATO bloc, which for its own purposes fostered the union of Portugal with South Africa and Southern Rhodesia.

21. The new documents prepared by the Secretariat confirmed these earlier findings. Under Portugal's economic policy, the colonies were totally dependent on the metropolitan country. They were used as a source of raw materials and cheap labour and as a profitable field of investment for international capital. As stated in the working paper entitled "Agriculture and processing industries in Angola and Mozambique: organization and Government policy" (appendix I, para. 16), the Portuguese Constitution itself established the colonies' dependence on the metropolitan country. Salazar had openly stated that the colonies were "to produce raw materials to sell to the mother country in exchange for manufactured goods" (appendix I, para. 17). To that end, Portugal had established extensive regulations and controls over the production, processing and marketing of agricultural products needed for Portugal's domestic market or to earn foreign exchange, and the Territories had been prohibited from establishing industries which would compete with those of Portugal (appendix I, para. 18). To obtain additional support, Portugal had taken various steps to increase the flow of foreign capital into the colonies (appendix I, para. 23). Thus the international monopolies were growing increasingly powerful and tightening their grip on the resources of the Territories.

22. In the Portuguese colonies, the colour bar was absolute. Government legislation recognized only Europeans as producers to be registered with the colonial export boards, and the main concern of the authorities was to secure adequate African labour for European-owned enterprises (appendix I, paras. 42-43).

23. The study on agricultural and processing industries in Mozambique referred to Sena Sugar Estates, Ltd., the largest sugar company in Mozambique, with 90 per cent of its shares held by British capital (see appendix III, para. 56); net profit in 1963 had totalled $1.5 million (appendix III, para. 63). The working paper on foreign-owned railways in Angola and Mozambique revealed that the Trans-Zambezia Railway Company in Mozambique, which was British, had had a net revenue of £226,691 in 1964 (appendix IV, para. 91). The Benguela Railway in Angola belonged almost entirely to the Tanganyika Concessions Company, in which a leading role was played by United States capital, including the Rockefeller group, and the net revenue of the railway from 1960 to 1963 had been approximately 1,000 million escudos (appendix IV, para. 30); over the same period the Portuguese Government had received some 120 million escudos from the railway's operation (appendix IV, para. 32); in 1963 it had obtained from the Company a loan of 60 million escudos at an annual interest rate of 1 per cent (appendix IV, para. 34). Their contributions to the support of police and gendarmerie alone were an example of how a railway could impede the granting of independence to a colonial Territory, since those forces were specifically concerned with the repression of national liberation movements.

24. In agriculture, Portugal sacrificed the interests and freedom of the Africans to enrich the colonialists and monopolies. The working paper on government policy and organization of agriculture and processing in Angola and Mozambique stated that by 1960 about 87 per cent of Portugal's cotton imports were from its colonies (appendix I, para. 76), saving Portugal an enormous amount of foreign exchange which it used to build up the metropolitan textile industry. By fixing cotton prices below international market levels, Portugal gained additional advantage (appendix I, para. 120). The same price-fixing technique was applied to coffee. The result for the African inhabitants, however, was a life of near starvation. In recent years, various United Nations bodies had gathered evidence showing the exceptionally harsh living conditions of the indigenous people in the Portuguese colonies. The Special Committee had gathered fresh information during its session in Africa, and the Secretariat's new material shed further light on the situation. The working paper indicated that the average per capita income of African cotton growers was 634 escudos a year, and in some areas less than 200 escudos, or $7 (appendix I, paras. 71 and 127). The material on agriculture presented to the Sub-Committee allowed a new conclusion to be added to those the Sub-Committee had reached the previous year concerning forced labour and transfers of workers "under contract" to South Africa and Southern Rhodesia. A horrible plight was reserved for the vast number of Africans engaged in agriculture. An African woman in agriculture had to work without remuneration for her white master. Agricultural assistance was virtually non-existent. A systematic policy of impoverishment was enforced through severe taxation and the obligation to cultivate prescribed crops for which the grower received a mere pittance. To pay their taxes, the Africans often had to work for white farmers, at a rate of pay that allowed them to do no more than meet their tax debt. Thus, in fact, they worked without earning. To keep them from starving, the authorities allowed them to grow enough food to subsist on. The important conclusion to be drawn was that agriculture in the Portuguese colonies was divided into two antagonistic sectors—European and African—the first ruthlessly exploiting the second.

25. Another important new conclusion that followed from the material presented to the Sub-Committee was that the exploitation of the colonies had helped Portugal to accumulate foreign exchange which it used to finance various branches of the metropolitan country's economy and particularly its textile industry, the leading economic sector. Thus the wealth of the colonies, mercilessly exploited to the detriment of the indigenous people, was used to strengthen the economy of the colonial Power.

26. His delegation supported the opinion expressed in the Sub-Committee that the Special Committee should recommend to the General Assembly that it should give special consideration to the implications of the activities of international monopolies in southern and central Africa and should act to put a stop to those activities in order to pave the way for the implementation of the Declaration in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). He also whole-heartedly supported the suggestion just made by the Tanzanian representative. The Special Committee should be asked also to recommend the General Assembly to include those questions in its agenda and consider them as matters of priority.

27. The representative of Syria said that the effects of the activities of foreign economic interests which were impeding the implementation of the Declaration in the Territories under Portuguese administration had been the subject of lengthy study during the previous session of the Sub-Committee. The working papers recently prepared by the Secretariat reinforced the opinion then expressed by the majority that foreign interests and monopolies were pursuing a course which obstructed any attempt by the African population to gain independence, inasmuch as they collaborated with the colonial Power in the exploitation of African human and natural resources. Even such apparent improvements as permanent housing for plantation workers or the bonus system were merely an excuse for more intensive exploitation of African workers and the nominal abandonment of compulsory recruitment was worthless, since those workers had no option but to seek employment with foreign concessionary companies.

28. A typical instance of the exploitation of African labour by foreign enterprises was that of the predominantly British-owned Sena Sugar Estates in Mozambique. The total average cost to that company of an African worker was approximately $US5.43 per month in 1952, for wages, food and medical care—which was probably generous in comparison to the expenditure on an African worker on the sisal and cotton plantations. Nevertheless, in 1960 that company had made profits, before taxation, which far exceeded its total expenditure on African labour. The benefit to the Portuguese economy took the form, not only of tax revenue from the company, but of purchasing sugar well below world market prices and without any loss of hard currency.

29. Similar examples could be given of the activities of foreign interests in almost every sphere of economic activity. All of them, however, shared the common characteristic of exploiting African human and natural resources and of ensuring a continuous flow of profits by keeping Africans in a state of subservience and thus impeding their progress towards independence. The Governments which bore such a heavy responsibility and which pleaded that they had no jurisdiction over the activities of private enterprise would not long remain passive if the African population of the Territories resorted, in desperation, to violent methods.

30. His delegation supported the suggestion of the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania. The time had come for a full debate in the General Assembly and for all Member States to be given an opportunity to state their attitude to the tragic exploitation of the Portuguese Territories.

31. The representative of Denmark, referring to the working papers prepared by the Secretariat (see appendices to this annex), said that his delegation was doubtful to what extent the material showed that there were any interests which met the requirements of the Sub-Committee's terms of reference. It was required to study the activities of foreign interests which impeded the implementation of the Declaration.

32. The working paper on agriculture and the processing industries, for instance, showed that, with one important exception, almost all the economic interests in those sectors were Portuguese. There was, however, certain foreign investment in the railways in Angola and Mozambique, but it was difficult to see how a railway could be said to impede progress towards independence.

33. His delegation was, of course, firmly opposed to exploitation of any people by a colonial Power and it confirmed that there was a high degree of economic collusion between the diehard colonialists in southern Africa. Although his delegation was not convinced that the subject came within the terms of reference of the Sub-Committee, he would not oppose a reference in the Sub-Committee's report to economic relations between the Territories under Portuguese administration and South Africa and Southern Rhodesia.

34. His delegation could not agree with the Soviet representative's view that the economic activities of foreign interests in the Territories under discussion were the chief obstacle to their achieving independence. The political line followed by the colonial Power concerned was a far more significant factor, since it was that which allowed exploitation and impeded national liberation movements, and it was that kind of colonial policy which should be brought to an end.

35. His delegation agreed that there was exploitation of Africans in the Portuguese Territories and condemned it. He believed, however, that the facts of the situation did not warrant the conclusion that the activities of foreign—as distinct from Portuguese—economic interests constituted the main obstacle to the granting of independence to those Territories. His delegation was therefore unable to support the suggestion made by the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania that the Sub-Committee should recommend that the subject under discussion should be included in the agenda for the forthcoming General Assembly as a separate item.

36. However, should the Sub-Committee decide to ask the Special Committee to recommend the General Assembly to include in its agenda the question of the activities of foreign interests in the African Territories, it would be better for it to appear as a single item so as to facilitate the task of the General Assembly and the Fourth Committee, which already had a very heavy agenda.

37. The representative of Ethiopia thought that, by considering the activities of foreign monopolies and other foreign interests in the Territories under Portuguese administration as a separate item on the agenda, the General Assembly would be treating the question with the urgency and importance which it deserved and would bring out the factors which were hampering the struggle of the African peoples for independence.

38. Despite the many meetings devoted to the Portuguese Territories, the resolutions adopted and the appeals addressed by the United Nations to the Portuguese Government, Mr. Salazar continued to turn a deaf ear to all the appeals of the United Nations and of the Organization of African Unity (OAU).

39. Portugal's refusal to abandon its anachronistic policy was easily explained by the profits which it derived from those Territories. It was well known that Portugal was neither rich nor militarily powerful. There was no need to ask what forces were helping it to continue its hopeless struggle against the irresistible forces of African nationalism. It was clear that the activities of foreign economic and other interests were impeding the implementation of resolution 1514 (XV). Portugal's policy had always been inspired by a determination to exploit the abundant resources of its colonial Territories to the detriment of the indigenous population.

40. Angola was a very rich country, both in agriculture and minerals. Since 1950, agriculture had been mainly concerned with the production of coffee and sisal. In 1950, coffee had accounted for more than 30 per cent of the Territory's total exports; by 1964 that figure had risen to 50 per cent. Angola had thus become the third largest producer of coffee in the world, with a production of 180,000 tons.

41. Sisal production had likewise doubled and in 1965 had reached 62,000 tons, which, again, had made Angola the world's third largest producer of that fibre. The country was also rich in diamonds, iron ore, crude petroleum, etc.

42. Mozambique, too, was a country rich in natural resources, as was clear from the working papers submitted to the Sub-Committee. It produced considerable quantities of cotton, sugar and cashew nuts for export. Most of the cotton was exported to Portugal under the compulsory quota system, at prices 60 per cent below world prices.

43. Portugal's policy of land ownership was appalling. In a book entitled Angola and Mozambique, Anders Ehnmark and Per Wästberg had pointed out that in districts where the Africans were allowed to cultivate the soil, they rarely owned it. Even if they did, their farms could be confiscated "in the public interest", which was a most elastic concept, and often they were reduced to the status of agricultural workers on their own land. Those who left were sent to less fertile regions which were unsuitable for farming.

44. On the other hand, generous concessions were granted to foreigners, whether companies or individuals. The situation was continuing to deteriorate. On 1 July 1966, the Government had introduced a new tax of 7 per cent on a wide range of goods to help finance its military operations and to increase the salaries of State officials.

45. The main economic groups operating in the Territories were the Belgian company, Petrofina, the Union Minière du Haut-Katanga, the Wankie Colliery Company, a company founded in Southern Rhodesia and financed by British capital, the British company Tanganyika Concessions, the American Oil Company, the Standard Oil Company, the Gulf Oil Company, the Sena Sugar Estate, the Petrangol Company and the South African company Mynbu. Naturally, those companies exported their profits to Portugal and other Western countries, which meant that the amount left over for the development of the Territories and for improving the conditions of the Africans was shamefully low.

46. Portugal was attempting to maintain the status quo by exploiting as much as possible the wealth of its African colonies, while strengthening its army to subjugate the nationalists who were struggling for their freedom. It could hardly be denied that the foreign companies, which abided by the laws and regulations of the colonial Power, as they must, were operating against the political and economic interests of the African population.

47. Her delegation did not object to foreign investment as such, quite the contrary, but it could not tolerate a situation in which enterprises financed by foreign capital helped to perpetuate a political climate which was contrary to the legitimate aspirations of the population. Despite the views expressed by some Western countries, her country maintained that such foreign investment was the very instrument by which the colonial Powers, such as Portugal, perpetuated their oppression. Accordingly, those companies should be told by their countries of origin to consider the welfare of the population, in accordance with United Nations principles.

48. Portugal and its supporters should have realized long before that the immigration of Europeans into the African Territories and the adoption of repressive measures against the indigenous population could not solve the problem. On the other hand, respect for the Charter and for world public opinion would yield fruitful results without loss of human lives.

49. In view of those considerations, her delegation reaffirmed its support for the proposal of the delegation of the United Republic of Tanzania and, when the question came before the General Assembly, would make a fuller statement of its views on such an urgent and vital problem.

50. The representative of Tunisia said that the leading role played by foreign interests in establishing and maintaining the colonial system, especially in the Territories under Portuguese administration, and the relentlessness with which those interests fought against the national movements in order to preserve their excessive privileges could not be emphasized too strongly. Consequently, it was hard to understand how certain representatives could be surprised that the newly independent countries, while appealing for foreign capital to promote their economic and social development, had no hesitation in criticizing and even condemning the activities of foreign monopolies in the countries which were still suffering under the colonial yoke. In fact, in the newly independent countries, foreign capital, freely negotiated and freely accepted, contributed towards progress and prosperity, since it operated within the framework of national development plans and remained under the control of responsible nationals. But, in countries which were not autonomous, foreign monopolies ignored the needs of the people and only sought the financial gain which the colonial system offered. Thus, instead of helping the people to advance, foreign capital exploited and enslaved them. That was the case in the Territories under Portuguese administration, where the situation was perhaps more scandalous than anywhere else.

51. He had a few observations to make about the economic and social situation as well as the activities of foreign monopolies. In the first place, the economy of the Portuguese Territories was essentially colonial. Those Territories represented a vast market for foreign manufactures as well as an abundant source of raw materials. According to the policy defined by Mr. Salazar, the Prime Minister of Portugal, in 1936, the colonies produced raw materials and sold them to the mother country in exchange for manufactured goods, a policy which involved serious losses for the indigenous population and made any economic and social development impossible. Secondly, the economy of the Territories under Portuguese administration was closely linked to that of Portugal and was designed mainly to suit the needs and interests of the mother country. Thus, the Government had forbidden the Territories to establish industries which could compete with those of Portugal and had adopted a special system which ensured that the Portuguese cotton industry was supplied with raw cotton at prices far lower than those prevailing on the world market. Thirdly, most of the companies involved in exploiting the resources of the Territories were based in foreign countries and the profits were necessarily channelled abroad. It should be noted, moreover, that the foreign monopolies controlled the whole economy of the Territories. Only the Europeans had the right to be listed as producers with the colonial export boards, which enabled them to add to their privileges, to control all the wheels of administration and to play a leading political role. Thanks to social legislation which turned the Africans into a vast pool of cheap labour, the foreign monopolies found in those Territories further means of swelling their profits. It was unthinkable, in the circumstances, that the monopolies should agree to the emancipation of the enslaved peoples. Consequently, the Special Committee must consider the activities of foreign interests in the Territories under Portuguese administration as a serious obstacle to the emancipation of the people and to the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples (resolution 1514 (XV)). The monopolies had numerous ramifications in Southern Rhodesia and South Africa and formed a common front in that part of the continent. The failure of economic sanctions against Southern Rhodesia was proof of their power. Accordingly, his delegation supported the proposal that the question should be included on the General Assembly's agenda as a separate item.

52. It would be a good idea to follow the same procedure for the activities of foreign monopolies in Southern Rhodesia, in view of their role in recent events. Such a study would be an important contribution in the search for really effective means of implementing resolution 1514 (XV) and of realizing the aspirations of the African countries. He agreed with the Soviet representative that it would be better for the question of foreign monopolies to be included in the General Assembly's agenda as a single item but suggested that each Territory should be discussed separately.

53. The representative of Yugoslavia observed that, according to the Portuguese Government, the principle of integration which had been a feature of Portugal's overseas policy for centuries had made the Territories as a whole a nation and a sovereign State, and the only question which arose was to determine whether the law conferred the same political rights on the citizens of the Territories as on those of the metropolitan country—rights which would enable them to influence the character of organs of State.

54. In order to illustrate what the essential rights of the indigenous population really were, some examples must be given of the way in which natural and human resources in the Territories (particularly in Angola and Mozambique) were exploited by Portugal.

55. The economy of Mozambique, Angola and so-called Portuguese Guinea was based essentially on agriculture, which accounted for 60 per cent of Angola's exports and 80 per cent of Mozambique's. That fact alone showed that Portugal was using its colonies exclusively as sources of raw materials and appendages to its industry.

56. In spite of the vastness of the Territories, only 2 to 3 per cent of the total arable land was tilled, which clearly indicated the lamentable state of affairs. The means of production were under-developed, agriculture was primitive and the economy functioned only because of the use of cheap labour.

57. Considering that agricultural products were responsible for 60 per cent of exports and that coffee represented 50 per cent of the total value of exports, obviously, the remaining agricultural products accounted for only 10 per cent. Thus Angola had become virtually a single-crop country, in which all the profits went to the small minority of European settlers, while the Angolans were reduced to the status of cheap labour. In 1964 the European farmers, whose holdings ranged from 100 to 300 hectares, made an average profit of $280 per hectare, or $28,000 profit on 100 hectares, whereas the Africans who generally owned only one or two hectares, for the most part made only $170 annually. All evidence showed that the natural and human resources of the Territories were exploited unscrupulously and that Portuguese policy benefited only the foreign settlers and the metropolitan economy. Little thought was given to the producers themselves, the indigenous population. According to data for 1961, the non-African population of Mozambique owned approximately 1.7 million hectares, of which 85 per cent of the arable land was in private hands. Of a total of 2,432 agricultural enterprises, 2,246 were owned by Portuguese and 177 by other non-Africans. In Mozambique over 93 per cent of the employed population worked in agriculture, and agricultural produce represented 81 per cent of the value of exports. The sugar industry was in the hands of British, Portuguese and South African capitalists. Moreover, the conditions in which an African owned and worked his land were highly unfavourable. Expropriation was possible if certain conditions were not fulfilled and African farmers were obliged to work on the land or enterprises of Portuguese settlers. It was difficult for them to register officially as farmers and, instead of exporting their products themselves, they had to rely on the services of settlers, who gave them low prices.

58. As a result of the policy of exploiting the Territories as sources of raw materials, the Portuguese textile industry had boomed. In 1960 Portugal had been ranked twelfth among European producers of cotton, thread and cloth, with 419 factories and a total output valued at approximately 4,000 million escudos. In 1963 Portugal had made a profit of 1,500 million escudos on its cotton exports, which was about one eighth of the total value of its visible exports. Mention should also be made of the profits reaped by the Portuguese from exports of coffee, cashew nuts and other agricultural products and from the production of various sectors of the economy, particularly the sugar industry, which were poured into the coffers of Portuguese and foreign companies.

59. He would dwell briefly on the economic relations between Mozambique—which meant Portugal—and South Africa and Southern Rhodesia.

60. Economic relations with South Africa were governed by the Mozambique Convention, concluded in 1928, which contained provisions on the recruitment of labour, transit traffic and trade between South Africa and Mozambique. In 1964 it had been amended to ensure closer economic co-operation, particularly in planning and investment. The Convention included a most-favoured-nation clause and granted reciprocal concessions for a list of commodities sold by the exporters—non-African, of course—of Mozambique. In 1963, 150,000 Mozambicans had been working in South Africa for extremely low wages. South Africa obviously derived substantial profits from the exploitation of that cheap labour. The Portuguese authorities in Mozambique also profited from it through the collection of various taxes (34.6 million escudos in 1963) and the foreign exchange earnings (108.4 million escudos in 1963) they obtained from the system of compulsory deferment pay. Under the Mozambique Convention, 50 per cent of the imports of certain areas of South Africa passed through the port of Lourenço Marques. In 1963 the total volume of goods imported through Lourenço Marques was 600,000 tons and that of goods in transit to or from South Africa through that port was 3.9 million tons. In the same year the profit made by the railway was 210 million escudos.

61. South African capital, of course, represented a large share of investments in Mozambique.

62. Similar relations existed between Mozambique and Southern Rhodesia with regard both to labour and to trade. Since the adoption of Security Council resolution 217 (1965), oil products from South Africa had been transported by railway from Lourenço Marques to Rhodesia. The supply of oil through the Beira-Umtali pipelines had also continued. The trade of the port of Beira alone had reached the record figure of 511,537 tons in August 1965, some time before the unilateral declaration of independence.

63. There was no need to specify to whom the profits of those activities were going. Undoubtedly, they were not going to the indigenous population, which barely earned enough to live, and part of them were used to finance the war against liberation movements and the population of the colonies, in order to maintain the status quo and the policy of exploitation. The economic relations between Portugal, South Africa and Southern Rhodesia, however, were only one link in the chain of efforts to preserve the supremacy of the racist system in the southern part of Africa.

64. The United Nations was bound to take measures to put an end to that state of affairs and to help the peoples of the Portuguese colonies. The Yugoslav delegation therefore supported the proposal that the question should be put on the General Assembly agenda as a separate item.

65. The representative of Mali recalled that after examining the Secretariat reports on the activities of foreign economic and other interests in the Territories under Portuguese administration and the information collected on the subject, the Sub-Committee had concluded that, without the assistance of its Western allies and of foreign economic interests, Portugal would have been unable to oppose the wishes of the peoples of Angola, Mozambique and Guinea (Bissau) for any length of time and prevent them from exercising their right to self-determination and independence. By supporting the Salazar régime, those interests were encouraging Portugal to persist in its refusal to implement the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

66. The most recent report prepared by the Secretariat clearly showed that Portugal's policy had reduced its African colonies to mere producers of raw materials for the industries of the metropolitan country, the other countries of Western Europe and the United States. Furthermore, Portugal had adopted discriminatory legislation with a view to curtailing the role which agriculture might have played in the development of the Territories. Article 1 of the Statute of National Labour proclaimed that the Portuguese nation constituted a moral, political and economic entity whose goals and interests took precedence over those of the individuals and groups comprising it. The economic organization of the overseas Territories was to be integrated into that of the Portuguese nation and thus contribute to the development of the metropolitan country, which was the sole concern of the Portuguese colonialists. As early as 1936, Mr. Salazar had stated that the role of the colonies was to produce raw materials for sale to the mother country in exchange for manufactured goods. That was the whole philosophy of colonialism. Once the structural foundation of the Territories' economy had been laid, Portugal had started by promoting industrial crops at the expense of food crops. Then it has encouraged Europeans to settle in the Territories by offering them every possible facility, while the Africans had been deprived of their land, expelled from their villages or even made liable to forced labour up to the age of 55 or 60. In order to reduce the cost of transporting the products of its colonies, Portugal, with the aid of British, South African and Belgian capital, had built the Mozambique and Angola railways, which served only the industrial centres and the export ports. The Secretariat's report on foreign-owned railways in Angola and Mozambique clearly showed the close links between Belgian, British and Southern Rhodesian interests and Portugal (appendix IV, para. 28). All those foreign interests contributed a share of the profits earned from the exploitation of the African peoples to Portugal, which used them to increase its war effort in Angola, Mozambique and Guinea (Bissau).

67. Since there was no doubt that the activities of foreign interests served as a brake on the progressive development of the African Territories under Portuguese administration towards freedom and independence, Mali would fully support the Tanzanian proposal that the question of the activities of foreign economic and other interests in those Territories should be included in the agenda of the twenty-first session of the General Assembly as a separate item. His delegation also supported the Tunisian proposal that the General Assembly should be requested to examine the activities of foreign interests in Southern Rhodesia as well.

68. The Chairman, summarizing the discussion, said that the Sub-Committee had decided to ask the Special Committee to recommend the General Assembly to include in its agenda as a single item the question of the activities of foreign economic and other interests in the Territories under Portuguese administration, Southern Rhodesia and South West Africa; he asked the Rapporteur to record that decision in his report together with the reservation made by the representative of Denmark.

B. Conclusions

69. The Sub-Committee finds that the conclusions it drew up in 1965 that the Portuguese colonial system and foreign economic interests are impeding the independence of the Territories under Portuguese administration are confirmed by new information provided to it in 1966 by petitioners from the Territories and the Secretariat working papers on agriculture and agricultural processing industries, foreign-owned railways and relations of Mozambique with South Africa and Southern Rhodesia.

70. The situation obtaining in agriculture and agricultural processing industries in Angola and Mozambique affords a classic example of the effect of Portugal's colonial policy under which the colonies produced raw materials to sell to the metropolitan country in exchange for its manufactured goods. In the implementation of this policy extensive regulations favouring Europeans and highly capitalized or monopolistic enterprises have controlled the granting of land concessions, production, processing and marketing of agricultural products needed by Portugal. At the same time other legislation has restricted Africans from owning land and engaging in agricultural and trading activities on the same basis as Europeans with the result that Africans have only an insignificant share in the wealth derived from the natural resources and the efforts of their own labour.

71. The information before the Sub-Committee shows that all the important cash crops are controlled by non-African interests. In Angola, for instance, most of the coffee and sisal plantations are owned by settlers from Portugal, while in both Angola and Mozambique cotton and sugar remain controlled mainly by a few large monopolistic shareholder companies. The concentration on the production of European controlled cash crops for export, either under fixed quotas to Portugal, as in the case of cotton and sugar, or for the purpose of earning foreign exchange, as in the case of coffee, has seriously affected the economic and social life of the African inhabitants of the Territories.

72. Apart from the practice of compulsory labour under the Native Statute and Native Labour Code of 1928, nothing more exemplified Portugal's traditional colonial policy than the régime under which cotton was produced and marketed in Mozambique and Angola. To supply Portugal with the raw material for one of its key industries, hundreds of thousands of Africans were once involved in forced cultivation of cotton and monopolistic concessions were established over vast areas with the support of administrative measures. In 1961, for instance, there were 520,000 Africans engaged in cotton-growing in Mozambique and 47,000 in Angola. Of the large cotton concessionary companies the most important are the Companhia Geral dos Algodões de Angola, commonly known as COTONANG, which in 1960 controlled two thirds of the cotton growers in Angola, and the Companhia dos Algodões de Moçambique with concessions covering half the district of Zambézia and Moçambique. By setting controlled prices for raw cotton below the world level and by compulsory quotas for the supply of cotton to Portugal, the Portuguese textile industry was able to gain a competitive advantage in world markets and a monopoly of the markets of the overseas territories where textile production was limited by law. Thus by 1960, with Angola and Mozambique together supplying 87 per cent of its raw cotton imports, Portugal, with 70,000 workers employed in its textile industry, ranked twelfth among European producers of cotton thread and cloth, and its textile exports accounted for one eighth of the country's visible exports by value.

73. The cost of the cotton régime in terms of African labour is well known. Africans living in areas designated as cotton zones had little choice but to grow a specified area as required, and evidence shows that strong pressure was brought to bear on Africans to grow cotton even on marginally suitable land at the expense of food crops and barely providing any income for a year's work. In 1959-1960, for instance, the average annual income to African growers in northern Mozambique was 634 escudos (approximately $US20) and individual incomes ranged from 129 escudos upwards.

74. In Angola, more than any other development since the end of the Second World War, coffee as a new source of wealth has attracted increasing numbers of Portuguese settlers to the Territory. From 1950 to 1960, the European population in Angola more than doubled, with an increase of over 100,000, and large areas of land suitable for coffee farming were conceded to European farmers. By 1961, some 2,000 European owners had coffee farms and plantations totalling over 420,000 hectares. Coffee growing by Africans, however, remains subject to strict controls and supervision and those who are permitted to grow coffee generally average only between 1 and 2 hectares per family. In 1965 it was estimated that as compared with 175,000 Africans employed in agriculture, including over 120,000 employed on coffee farms, only 60,000 Africans were able to grow coffee on their own account.

75. With government measures providing financial and technical support, coffee has become Angola's leading export crop; in the 1963-1964 seasons, production averaged 180,000 metric tons and coffee accounted for almost 50 per cent of the total value of the Territory's visible exports. As the United States of America is the principal customer (it purchased about 53 per cent of Angola's coffee exports in 1964) followed by the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the Federal Republic of Germany, Angolan coffee has become an important source of foreign exchange for Portugal.

76. In both Angola and Mozambique sugar production is the monopoly of a few large companies. In Mozambique, the largest is the British-owned Sena Sugar Estates Ltd, with 90 per cent of its ordinary stock held in the United Kingdom. In recent years there has been renewed interest in the sugar industry in Mozambique where it is coming to be regarded as one of the great economic resources of the Territory and as an effective means of colonizing areas with Portuguese settlers, including ex-soldiers. Of the three new sugar companies formed since 1963, the potentially largest is being developed by a subsidiary of the Anglo-American Corporation of South Africa. Another will be partially financed by the Industrial Development Corporation of South Africa. South African interests have also entered cashew production, one of the Territory's newest industries.

77. Copra, which is one of Mozambique's six leading export crops, is also mainly controlled by three large European companies: Companhia do Boror, which was at one time primarily German-owned and which is one of the largest sisal producers, Sociedade Agrícola do Madal, primarily Norwegian-controlled, and the Companhia da Zambézia, of which the Portuguese Government has a controlling share and the remaining shares are owned by South African, French, German and British interests.

78. The information before the Sub-Committee shows that while exports of cash crops controlled by European interests have increased to the profit of Portugal, Portuguese settlers, British, South African and other interests, production by the traditional sector had been left to decline. Though millions of escudos have been spent on European settlement schemes, hardly any assistance has been provided to African farmers. As a result of past neglect, inequitable taxes, and government-fixed prices which provided no incentive, in Angola for instance, exports of maize, beans, rice and peanuts have not increased in the last fifteen years.

79. In spite of recent government concern with the serious decline in food crop production, the Transitional Development Plan for 1965-1968 makes no specific provisions for investment in African agriculture. In Angola, where a total investment of 7,210 million escudos is to be made over the three-year period, instead of allocating funds to improve African farming, the Government's policy is to encourage increased production by improving prices to African growers and reducing taxes and levies.

80. The study shows that the agriculture of the Territories under Portuguese administration is divided by the colonizers into two antagonistic sectors—European and African, the latter being unmercifully exploited by the former.

81. In both Angola and Mozambique foreign-owned railways have served mainly to open up the Territories to increased European settlement and to evacuate from the Territory valuable minerals and other resources. In Angola, the Benguela Railway, which is controlled by British, Belgian, American and South African interests, as the only railway that operates with a profit, also contributes to the revenue of the Territorial government. In Mozambique the earnings of the railways are an important source of foreign exchange.

82. Partly because of its strategic location, Mozambique has close and special relations with both South Africa and Southern Rhodesia. Economic relations between Mozambique and South Africa have for many years been governed by the Mozambique Convention of 1928, which provided for the recruitment of workers from Mozambique for the South African gold mines and under which the Mozambique treasury received annual payments in the form of fees and taxes and benefited from the foreign exchange from deferred wages. In return for the right to recruit workers, South Africa guaranteed the transport through Lourenço Marques of a fixed percentage of its seaborne imports into the Transvaal area. Although revised in 1964, the basic provisions of the Mozambique Convention remain substantially the same, though the area in which recruitment may be undertaken has now been extended to include the Orange Free State as well as the Transvaal.

83. The already close and interdependent relationship between Mozambique and South Africa has been further strengthened by a noticeable movement of South African investment capital to Mozambique, some examples of which are noted above. Also the economic agreement between Portugal and South Africa of 13 October 1964 provides, among other things, for special consideration to be given to any application for South African financing of road building and any other enterprise of particular interest to the Portuguese Government in Mozambique and Angola.

84. Mozambique has been traditionally closely linked with Southern Rhodesia both by transit trade and a source of migrant labour. Until 1960 about 20 per cent of the African workers in Southern Rhodesia came from Mozambique, some recruited under contract as in the case of those of the Transvaal mines. Although the numbers have decreased, there are still over 100,000 migrant workers from Mozambique in Southern Rhodesia.

85. As reported in the Secretariat working paper on Mozambique's economic relations with South Africa and Southern Rhodesia (appendix V, para. 46), co-operation in the economic field between Mozambique and Southern Rhodesia has received a strong impulse from the political situation preceding and surrounding the unilateral declaration of independence by the Southern Rhodesia régime. Under a trade agreement signed between Portugal and Southern Rhodesia the two parties accord each other "most-favoured-nation treatment" on goods traded between Southern Rhodesia on the one hand and Mozambique and Angola on the other, and complete exemption from import duty in respect of certain goods. Another important development affecting the economic relationship of Mozambique with Southern Rhodesia has been the construction of the Beira-Umtali pipeline with 62.5 per cent British capital and 37.5 per cent Portuguese capital.

86. The study proves that the exploitation of the natural and human resources of the Territories under Portuguese administration, the contractual sale of manpower, the exploitation of the African sector by the European sector, and the supply of cheap raw material to Portugal from Mozambique and Angola contributed to the growth of currency reserves of Portugal to finance various branches of its economy, particularly the textile industry which is dominant in the Portuguese economy. Thus, with the help of the wealth received from its colonies at the price of exploitation of their indigenous population, Portugal, like other colonial Powers, developed its own economy.

87. The Sub-Committee finds that the new information available to it confirms that foreign economic interests are directly and indirectly supporting Portuguese colonial policy which results in the exploitation of the natural resources of the Territories for their own profit and also in the neglect of the welfare of the African inhabitants. Through a relationship of mutual dependence and mutual profit with Portuguese colonialism, foreign economic and other interests are seriously impeding the implementation of the Declaration in the Territories under Portuguese administration.

88. As the foreign interests in Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa and the Territories under Portuguese administration are closely linked, their effects in one Territory have implications in the others. For these reasons the Sub-Committee believes that it is necessary to consider as one problem the activities of economic and other interests in all these Territories.

C. Recommendations

89. The Sub-Committee confirms all its recommendations contained in its main report on the activities of foreign economic and other interests which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration in the Territories under Portuguese administration (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, appendix).

90. The Sub-Committee further considers that the Special Committee should recommend to the General Assembly that it inscribe on the agenda of its twenty-first session as a matter of urgency the following item:

"The activities of foreign economic and other interests which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, the Territories under Portuguese administration and other colonial territories".

D. Adoption of report

91. This report was adopted by the Sub-Committee at its 31st meeting on 14 September 1966. The representative of Denmark stated that the reservations of his delegation on the subject, as reproduced in paragraphs 281 to 283 of the report of the Special Committee to the General Assembly at its twentieth session covering its work during 1965 (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, appendix) were still valid. Further, his delegation could not support the recommendation contained in paragraph 90 above.

Appendix I

Agriculture and processing industries in Angola and Mozambique : organization and government policy

Working paper prepared by the Secretariat

CONTENTS

	Paragraphs
Introduction	1-5
PART ONE. GENERAL PRINCIPLES AND POLICY
I. Principles of economic organization in the Portuguese Corporative State	6-19
A. General	6-15
B. The Overseas Territories	16-19
II. Regulation and control of agricultural activities in the Overseas Territories	20-41
A. General	20-36
B. Crops developed under special concessions ..	37-41
III. The role of Africans in agriculture	42-69
A. General	42-43
B. Legal restrictions on African agricultural activities before 1961	44-63
C. Developments after 1961	64-69
PART TWO. COTTON IN THE OVERSEAS TERRITORIES
I. General	70-78
II. Regulation and control of raw cotton, 1926-1961 ..	79-96
III. Regulation and control of raw cotton after 1961 ..	97-109
IV. Cotton textiles in Angola and Mozambique	110-116
V. Implications of the cotton régime	117-128
A. Economic importance to metropolitan Portugal	117-122
B. Economic and social importance to the Overseas Territories	123-128

Tables

	Page
1. Metropolitan Portugal: Imports of raw cotton	390
2. Mozambique: Official prices of seed cotton	390

INTRODUCTION

1. Although much attention has been given to the role of mining in Angola and to the revenue derived by Mozambique from its important transit trade, the fact nevertheless remains that the domestic companies of both Territories are essentially agricultural and the overwhelming majority of the inhabitants derive their livelihood from agriculture and related activities. No data is available to indicate the contribution of this sector to the gross domestic product of either Territory but its importance is shown by the statistics of visible exports. Vegetable products account for over 80 per cent of Mozambique's total exports by value and 60 per cent in the case of Angola.

2. The present study outlines the general principles and policies applied by Portugal in regard to this important sector, including the policies in respect of foreign investment. As the study reveals, these policies have changed since 1961. Before that year Portugal tended to regard the Overseas Territories primarily as suppliers of raw materials and as markets for manufactured products from the metropolis, any surplus earnings of foreign exchange being used to strengthen Portugal's balance of payments.

3. Since 1961, however, Portugal has intensified measures for the economic integration of the Overseas Territories with the Peninsula. As a result, government policy now gives greater emphasis to the economic development of the individual Territories (parcelas) within what is called the Portuguese realm (espaço português) and some of the restrictive controls are being abandoned. Of particular importance is the relaxation in 1965 of restrictions on the establishment of industrial capacity, including especially cotton textiles.

4. Part One of this study contains information on the economic structure of the Corporative State, in so far as it concerns the Overseas Territories, and the policies and legislation governing African and non-African agriculture. Part Two contains a more detailed review of the so-called cotton régime which illustrates several aspects of Portuguese policy and which constitutes an important segment of the economies of both Territories.

5. This study is supplemented by separate studies describing in greater detail agricultural and processing activities in each of the two Territories (appendices II and III).

PART ONE. GENERAL PRINCIPLES AND POLICY

I. PRINCIPLES OF ECONOMIC ORGANIZATION IN THE PORTUGUESE CORPORATIVE STATE

A. General

6. The general principles underlying the economic organization of the Portuguese corporative system are contained in the Political Constitution and the basic laws governing the corporative organization of the State, including, in particular, the Charter of National Labour (Decree Law 23,048, 23 September 1933).^a

7. Article 29 of the Political Constitution^b states that "The economic organization of the Nation must provide the maximum production of wealth for the benefit of society and shall create a collective existence from which shall flow power to the State and justice to its citizens." While private enterprise is recognized as "the most prolific instrument of progress and of the economy of the Nation" the State has the responsibility for the higher (over-all) co-ordination and regulation of the economic and social life, and for setting the economic and social goals. The State may not undertake trading or establish industries except, however, when it considers that such activities will result in "social benefits superior to those otherwise obtainable".^c

8. Article 1 of the Statute of National Labour lays down the principle that the Portuguese nation constitutes a moral, political and economic unity and the interest of the nation dominates that of individuals, or groups of which it is constituted. In order to ensure that economic activities are in the higher interest of the nation, the State has the right and duty to establish the balance of production, professions, employment, capital and labour, and to protect the national economy from agricultural, industrial or commercial undertakings of a parasitical character or which are incompatible with the higher interests of human life.^d

9. Under the corporative system it is the responsibility of the State to secure the harmonious co-operation of all elements of production, and to promote the corporative organization of the economy in which each element may achieve its own legitimate goals and those of society. This economic organization must however avoid conflicts of interest (as for instance between capital and labour) and undesirable competition (as for instance between the same industries).

10. In principle, the corporative system seeks to secure what has been called "the self-government of each branch of production"^e through the organized co-operation of the "factors of production". Under the Constitution (article 16), it is the duty of the State to authorize the establishment of "all corporative, collective, intellectual or economic bodies, and to promote and assist their formation". The primary or elementary corporative bodies are the grêmios^f of producers, employers, or self-employed persons such as farmers and fishermen, and syndicates of industrial office workers and professionals. Grêmios are usually organized on a geographical basis corresponding to the area of an administrative unit called the concelho with sub-units known as casas at the parish level. The grêmios representing farmers or producers of agricultural products are known as Grêmios de Lavoura. These grêmios are usually concerned with all agricultural products in the area of their competence; exceptionally, however, a grémio may be established for a particular product or crop. Grêmios may be established voluntarily with the permission of the Government,^g or may be established by government order. Once formed, the grémio is considered to represent all the producers of the area, even though some may not be members.

11. Among their other functions, the grêmios are responsible for developing the spirit of co-operation and solidarity of all elements of production, capital, technology (or management) and labour, for the realization of the maximum good of the community. They are to contribute, by the means at their disposal, to the economic development and the technical improvement of agricultural production, with a view to improving economic and social conditions; they are to enforce regulations emanating from higher corporative bodies or economic co-ordinating bodies; and to provide services to their members as necessary including services to help them sell their products and to help them purchase collectively goods and machinery needed.

12. Within each branch of production, there may also be regional associations of the grêmios and syndicates. At the national level each major branch of production is organized into a "corporation" comprising the producers (both capital and labour), processors or manufacturers, and traders. A government representative participates in the administration and decision-making of each of the corporations.

13. In addition to the "corporations" which are expected to regulate the activities of their particular sector of production in the interest of the nation, the Government exercises co-ordinating functions through especially established bodies. Under Decree Law 26,757, 8 July 1936, three types of co-ordinating bodies were envisaged as part of the corporative structure: regulatory commissions (comissões regularadoras) for the purpose of controlling imports, prices and distribution in accordance with the needs of production in Portugal and the Overseas Territories; national boards (juntas nacionais) for the purpose of improving production and commerce of national products with a view to stimulating exports; and institutes (institutos) for the purpose of co-ordinating all activities in relation to those commodities which are mainly for export, which already have fully developed corporatively organized production and commerce sectors, but which, because of their importance, require official guarantees as to quality and type of product.

14. The corporative bodies representing factors of production are essential elements of the Corporative State. They take part

^a The other basic laws are: Decree Law 23,049 on compulsory grêmios; Decree Law 23,050 on National Syndicates; Decree Law 24,715 on voluntary grêmios; and Decree Law 26,757 on economic co-ordinating bodies.

^b Quotations in this study of the Constitution are from the English text of the Political Constitution of the Portuguese Republic, SNI, Lisbon 1957.

^c Article 7 of the Statute of National Labour.

^d Ibid., sub-para. 1 and 2.

^e Marcello Caetano, in the Preface to Economic Planning in Corporative Portugal by Cotta Freppal, London, 1937.

^f Often translated as guilds. As these bodies, however, are not free associations but are essential elements of the Corporative State, the original term is retained to underline the distinction.

^g Voluntary grêmios may be established whenever at least 50 per cent of the individual or collective producers of a branch of production in a given area together represent at least 50 per cent of the average value of the transactions in that area.

in the election of Municipal Commissions and Councils, and through the Corporative Chamber participate in the formulation of government policy. In principle, they constitute the basic structure for the self-regulation and control of the different branches of production. As such, the grêmios differ both in purpose and in structure from what are generally known as employers or producers associations, producers or consumers co-operatives, or workers trade unions, which are concerned primarily with the welfare of their own members and have no regulatory functions outside their own membership. The difference between a corporative body such as the grémio and a producers co-operative is further underlined by the fact that under Portuguese law, the co-operative society is regulated as a special form of commercial society under a separate section of the Commercial Code.¹

15. From the foregoing, it is clear that under the corporative system the economic goal is the higher interest of the nation, and as it is the responsibility of the Government to interpret and to determine this interest, the Government has the right to intervene in private economic activities, to set quotas and to control production, prices and the distribution of wealth.

B. The Overseas Territories

16. The economic relationship of the Overseas Territories with Portugal is defined in articles 158-164 of the Constitution. These provide that "The economic organization of the Portuguese Overseas Territories shall form part of the general economic organization of the Portuguese Nation and shall thereby take its place in the world economy"; the economic system of the Territories "shall be established in harmony with the needs of their development and the well-being of their population, with fair reciprocity between them and the neighbouring countries, and with rights and legitimate advantages of the Portuguese Nation"; furthermore, it is "for Metropolitan Portugal to secure, through measures taken by the competent bodies, a proper balance in the interests which . . . should be considered as a whole, in the economic systems of the Overseas Territories".

17. Although the general economic organization of the Overseas Territories has not followed the corporative pattern¹ outlined in the foregoing section, the application of the principles of the Corporative State to the Overseas Territories has in the past ensured an integration of the economies of the Territories which in effect orientated their development in the interests of Portugal. Explaining the role to be played by the Overseas Territories (which were then still known as colonies) in 1936, at the inaugural session of the Economic Conference of the Portuguese Colonial Empire, Prime Minister Salazar said that it was a logical solution to Portugal's problem of overpopulation, to settle Portuguese nationals in the colonies, and "for the colonies to produce raw materials to sell to the mother country in exchange for manufactured goods".²

18. In the implementation of this policy, in the period up to 1961, the Government established extensive regulations and controls over production, processing and marketing of agricultural products needed for Portugal's domestic market or to earn foreign exchange. A special cotton régime was introduced to guarantee an economic supply of raw cotton to Portugal's textile industry, and the Territories were prohibited from establishing industries which would compete with those of Portugal. While these measures secured an increase in agricultural production for export (especially of cotton, coffee, sugar and sisal), output of the subsistence sector remained stagnant in the 1950's, partly due to the lack of assistance to African agriculture, and partly due to the restrictions on African activities imposed by the Native Statute³ and the labour regulations.

¹ Nevertheless, some of the grêmios in the Overseas Territories are, in fact, more like producers co-operatives. See footnote 1 below.

² Vicente Loff, Estudo de base sobre o ordenamento e coordenação dos serviços e organismos executivos da política económica nacional de âmbito ultramarino (Lisbon, 1960), p. 11. The only grêmios of agricultural products were: (a) in Angola, a grémio of maize exporters, a grémio of tobacco producers in Malanje district, a grémio of fruit and vegetable producers in Malanje, and a grémio of rice millers in Bié, Mexico and Lunda; (b) in Mozambique, a grémio of cereal producers in Beira, a grémio of vegetable oil processing industries, a grémio of tea growers in Zambézia and a grémio of tobacco growers in North Mozambique (pp. 14-15). Some of these grêmios, however, are in practice more in the nature of a commercial society in the form of a producer's co-operative (such as those of tea and tobacco producers) and with primarily financial interests (such as the grémio of fruit and vegetable producers), pp. 68-69.

³ António de Oliveira Salazar, Doctrine and Action, International and Foreign Policy of the New Portugal 1928-1939, translated by Robert E. Broughton (London, 1939), pp. 300-304, quoted in document A/AC.108/L.7, para. 30.

19. As reported in chapter V, part I, since the repeal of the Native Statute in 1961, Portugal has aimed at securing the closer political and economic integration of the Overseas Territories in a single entity, and changes have been introduced to provide for a measure of participation of local interests in the economic and social life of their respective Territories. Since 1965, it has become Portugal's declared policy that economic development of the Overseas Territories is to be accelerated "to increase the wealth of the Portuguese realm collectively" (chap. V, para. 33). Regulations on foreign investments have been eased, banking and credit facilities have been expanded, the establishment of industries of local interest is no longer restricted, and settlement from Portugal will be intensified to provide additional manpower. When fully implemented, these measures are intended to bring about fundamental changes in the role of the Territories as defined by Prime Minister Salazar in 1936 (see para. 17 above). The following section outlines briefly the way in which the former policy and subsequent changes are reflected in government measures for the regulation and control of agricultural activities in the Overseas Territories. The role of the African in agriculture is described in a separate section.

II. REGULATION AND CONTROL OF AGRICULTURAL ACTIVITIES IN THE OVERSEAS TERRITORIES

A. General

Control over foreign investments

20. Under the Nationalization of Capital Law (Law 1,994, 13 April 1943), it was the general rule that half the capital of any incorporated company had to be Portuguese. Foreign investments were excluded from certain specified activities, including public services and activities of vital importance for the defence of the State or the national economy.¹ This Law, however, did not apply to the Overseas Territories, where the regulations governing foreign investments were much more liberal.

21. Nevertheless, as reported previously in the study on mining in Angola and Mozambique (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex I), the Government usually required participation of Portuguese capital in foreign owned companies, the registration of the companies under Portuguese law, and the appointment of Portuguese nationals on the boards of directors. Usually, however, less than half of the capital had to be Portuguese.

22. The only sector in which 51 per cent Portuguese ownership of capital applied was in the use and exploitation of land concessions, but this provision was only made applicable to the Overseas Territories in Africa in 1947 (by Decree 36,330, 6 June 1947). In Angola and Mozambique nearly all the non-Portuguese companies with large land holdings came into existence long before this date, and the extent of Portuguese participation is unknown. Provisions have always existed, however, whereby the Minister for Overseas Territories could, in special cases, waive the requirement of a majority of Portuguese capital.

23. As already reported in paragraph 58 of chapter V, in April 1965 restrictions on foreign investments were eased, and the new regulations now apply equally to the whole Portuguese realm (espaço português). Enterprises entirely or largely foreign-owned by residents in Portuguese Territory or persons domiciled overseas may be established in various sectors with the same rights as national enterprises to enjoy duty and tax exemptions. As in the past, foreign capital may not be invested in public services, in activities relating to the public domain, or in activities of special importance to national defence. Foreign companies may not acquire real rights in land in the Territories under Portuguese administration except with the authorization of the Overseas Minister. The new regulations guarantee the transfer of all legally imported capital and earnings from such capital or from other activities. The scheduled activities for which authority will always be granted for the participation of foreign capital (either through direct investment, or through the purchase of shares or granting of loans) include, in particular, agricultural improvements, land preparation and irrigation projects, livestock and cattle raising, and the processing of agricultural products.

¹ Decree Law 39,666 of 20 May 1954 on the Status of Indigenous Persons of Portuguese Nationality in the Provinces of Guinea, Angola and Mozambique (Estatuto dos Indígenas Portugueses das Províncias do Guiné, Angola e Moçambique).

² Only "national" companies were permitted to own and operate enterprises in these sectors and, for the purpose of the Law, only companies constituted under Portuguese law, with their head offices in Portugal, and the absolute majority of whose capital was Portuguese were deemed to be national.

Land concessions

24. Conditions relating to the granting of land concessions for agricultural and other activities are described in the study on land concession and settlement in Angola and Mozambique (see A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex II). In general large concessions, over 5,000 hectares, in the case of aforamento concessions, may be granted only by the Overseas Minister. Smaller concessions may be granted by the Territorial authorities usually by aforamento under which ultimate ownership of the land is conditional on its effective utilization and the payment of a quit rent over a number of years.

Establishment of industries

25. Until 1965 the installation of industries in the Overseas Territories was regulated by Decree 26,509 of 11 April 1936. Under this decree authorization for the establishment of industries was to be granted in the following order of priority: (a) industries using raw materials of local origin and whose products are consumed in the Territory; (b) industries using materials of local origin whose products have an assured market in other Portuguese Territories or in foreign countries; (c) industries using imported raw materials producing goods which have an assured local market; and (d) industries using raw materials and whose production exceeds the local consumption needs. The establishment in the Overseas Territories of any industries using imported raw materials had to be approved by the Overseas Minister; all other cases required the approval of the Governor General. However, due consideration was to be given to the needs of metropolitan Portugal for raw materials it did not possess, as for instance cotton, and the competitive price of the goods to be produced as compared with similar imports. Presumably because of these considerations, textile factories were not established in Angola and Mozambique until after 1944 (see part two below).

26. Furthermore, Decree 985 of 28 October 1914 provided that where new industries were established, or plants employing new productive processes, the industrialist could, under certain conditions, be granted an exclusive right to manufacture his product or employ his process either within the Territory or a region thereof. Such an exclusive right was limited normally to a period of ten years but in the case of a new industry requiring substantial capital investment it could be extended to twenty years. The industrialist could also be exempted for a limited time from import duties on capital equipment and raw materials not produced in the Territory as well as from direct taxes levied on his industrial operations and land. Examples of such exclusive concessions were the textile industries in Mozambique and Angola and the jute industry in Mozambique.

27. As reported in paragraphs 65-68 of chapter V, many of the previous restrictions have been removed, and the Territories may now freely establish industries which are mainly of local interest, and which do not affect the economy of the whole Portuguese realm. In particular, the Territories will no longer be restricted as regards the establishment of cotton textile factories.

Economic co-ordinating bodies affecting agricultural activities in the Overseas Territories

28. In 1937, the legislation setting up economic co-ordinating bodies within the corporative system was extended to the Overseas Territories (Decree 27,552, 25 March 1937). The Minister for the Colonies was authorized to establish in each Territory import regulatory commissions, export boards and institutes to co-ordinate and regulate the economic and social activities directly related to products imported and exported. Such co-ordinating bodies could serve a single Territory, or a group of Territories or the whole national Territory. When functioning in respect of a single Territory the co-ordinating body was to have its headquarters in the capital of the Territory and act under the authority of the Governor; in the two other cases, it was to be located in Lisbon and acted under the authority of the Minister for the Colonies.

29. Following the pattern in Portugal, co-ordinating machinery to regulate the trade of the Overseas Territories was created in the form of separate bodies to regulate imports (comissões reguladoras de importações) and exports (juntas de exportações).²² Since these bodies were concerned only with external trade and had no special functions in relation to agricultural production they are not discussed in this study. In addition, special bodies were established to promote and regulate exports of certain crops, which because of their importance to the national economy required special government action. Colonial Export Boards with their headquarters in Portugal were set up to regulate cotton, coffee and cereals (wheat and maize). These Boards were composed entirely of members appointed by the Minister for the Colonies (later Minister for the Overseas Territories) with representatives from the Ministry of Agriculture, and representatives of producers (European) and traders (importers in Portugal), as well as exporters of the overseas products. The main functions were (a) to regulate exports from the Territories by registering exporters and European producers; establishing export quotas and prices, and where necessary, directly undertaking purchases and exporting, and by regulating the internal markets in the Territories; and also (b) to ensure supplies to Portugal, in consultation with the appropriate metropolitan authority, through the establishment of quotas and differential prices for imports from the Territories and from other foreign sources.

30. Because the production of cotton, coffee and cereals in the Overseas Territories was not corporatively organized, the Colonial Export Boards were also made responsible for promoting production through the distribution of selected seed, the provision of financial and technical assistance and services to producers in selling their products (including the establishment of grading services, warehouses and transportation) functions which, as described above, are, in principle, attributed to grêmios of producers. However, as will be seen below, the Colonial Cotton and Coffee Export Boards mainly represented Portugal's interests and not those of the Territories producing these crops, even though the Boards had branches in the Territories through which some services to growers were provided.

31. Although the main objectives of the three colonial export boards were similar, the way in which they discharged their functions varied, on the one hand, according to Portugal's economic interest in and need for the particular crop, and on the other, according to the degree of organization of related interests in Portugal (the importers, distributors, processors and manufacturers). In general, the greater the importance of the product to Portugal's domestic economy, the more extensive was the regulation and control over its marketing, distribution and use. As Portugal has always had to import all the raw cotton needed for its textile industry, which is one of the key sectors of its economy, in addition to the Colonial Cotton Export Board, there existed also a separate

²² According to a Portuguese study by Vicente Loff (Estudo de base sobre o ordenamento e coordenação dos serviços e organismos executivos da política económica nacional de âmbito ultramarino, Junta de Investigações do Ultramar, Lisbon, 1960, pp. 51-52), these bodies were in effect part of the public services of the Territories.

Regulatory Commission for Trade in Raw Cotton^a whose functions were to regulate imports, prices and contribution of raw cotton to processors and manufacturers. As will be seen in part II below, the Colonial Cotton Export Board therefore was concerned mainly with the promotion of production in the Overseas Territories to meet Portugal's needs for cheap cotton.

32. In contrast, as coffee is important to Portugal mainly as an export crop earning foreign exchange and the Overseas Territories have no difficulty in supplying the consumption needs of Portugal's domestic market for coffee, and furthermore there are no industries in Portugal dependent on coffee, the Colonial Coffee Export Board's main activities in the early years were concentrated on promoting increased production and on helping producers to sell their coffee to foreign markets.

33. The role of the Colonial Cereals Export Board differed from both the Cotton and Coffee Boards because Portugal itself produces cereals and it was necessary to co-ordinate imports and import prices, especially of maize, from the Overseas Territories with domestic production and consumption.

34. In 1961, following the uprising in Angola, as part of the general policy of administrative decentralization, the Colonial Export Boards in Lisbon were abolished and replaced by Cotton and Cereals Institutes in both Angola and Mozambique and a Coffee Institute in Angola. As described above (para. 13), in principle an institute is for the purpose of co-ordinating all activities in relation to commodities which are mainly for export and which have corporatively organized production and commerce sectors, but which because of their economic importance require official guarantees as regards quality and type. In Angola and Mozambique the production of cotton, coffee and cereals is not yet organized corporatively^b and the respective Institutes are as yet essentially government bodies (executive power is in the hands of the Director who is appointed by the Overseas Minister) in which the interests of local producers and exporters are represented.

35. The establishment of the Cotton, Coffee and Cereals Institutes in Angola and Mozambique is intended to enable the Territories themselves to have more responsibility for regulating and controlling the production, distribution, prices and export of these crops. In particular, greater emphasis is placed on the duty of the Institutes to help the small producer, especially through the provision of financial and technical help. The Institutes are also to promote the formation of producers' co-operatives in order to facilitate the sale of the products of the small farmer and to provide a channel through which investments in farm machinery and irrigation projects can be made.

36. The activity of the Colonial Cotton Export Board and the new Institute are described in greater detail in part two below.

B. Crops developed under special concessions

37. As mentioned above, where a specific crop is important to Portugal's own economy or where it is important to satisfy the needs of the Territory concerned, it has been the practice to establish detailed governmental regulation and control over all aspects of marketing, distribution and use. These controls have extended to the fixing of official prices both to producers and exporters and to the setting of compulsory quotas for supplies to Portugal and to the domestic market. In the case of three crops grown mainly by Africans, these measures have in the past been supplemented by the grant of purchasing monopolies to private concessionary companies. Such monopolies were, however, established only in respect of African produce and did not extend to the same crops when produced on European farms.

^a As noted above, regulatory commissions are economic co-ordinating bodies and are therefore part of the basic corporative structure. In Portugal, regulatory commissions have been established also for certain essential commodities which it has to or in the past has had to import, including coarse flour and rice.

^b The organization of the agricultural sector of production on a corporative basis is however envisaged and measures to this end were introduced in Angola in 1963 (Legislative Instrument 3,386, 6 July 1963, provides for the establishment of grêmios and casas da lavoura).

38. The outstanding example of the use of exclusive purchasing concessions supported by administrative measures as a means of developing a specific crop is the so-called "cotton régime" which was in force in Mozambique and Angola between 1926 and 1961 and which is described in detail in part two below. Under this system the areas considered suitable for cotton growing were divided into concessions within each of which a single processing company was given the exclusive right and obligation to purchase and gin all African-grown cotton. The concessionaires supervised the African growers and were supported by the local administrative officials. Within the area of each concession Africans not otherwise employed were expected to cultivate cotton, the area to be cultivated depending on the age, sex and marital status of the individual. In Angola, specific legislation existed making it obligatory for Africans in designated zones to grow cotton. Though no similar legislation was enacted in Mozambique, the obligation nonetheless existed, deriving presumably from the general provisions relating to African labour and farming (see paras. 45-48 and 54-57 below).

39. The system of exclusive purchasing concessions was also applied in 1944 to castor seeds (Decree 33,925) and, in the case of Mozambique, to rice (Legislative Instrument 754, 16 June 1941) in order to satisfy the Territory's consumption needs. Since, however, neither Mozambique nor Angola are important producers of castor seeds, which are mainly collected from uncultivated plants, no exclusive purchasing concessions were granted for this purpose in Mozambique and only one in Angola, in the Bié area, which was granted in the early 1950's and revoked some ten years later because of insufficient production. As regards the rice concessions, in Mozambique, the régime affected fewer Africans than did the cotton régime which involved over one half million growers in both Territories and moreover concerned what was already a staple food crop of the subsistence farmer.

40. The cotton régime was the object of severe criticism, especially abroad, mainly because of the element of forced cultivation and the use of the administrative machinery to support private enterprise but also because efforts to extend the cultivation of cotton led to its being grown in marginal areas resulting in hardships to growers, who in some cases earned less than 200 escudos per year from cotton, and the disruption of other activities. Other criticisms related to the accumulation of concessions over vast areas by a few companies and to the generally low level of prices.

41. In 1961, following the outbreak of disturbances in Angola, cotton growing was declared to be no longer obligatory and steps began to be taken to abolish the exclusive concessions. Legislation was enacted in 1961 abolishing exclusive concessions for rice and castor seeds and for cotton in 1963. Although the latter decree does not become fully effective until 31 August 1966 it appears that many companies have already surrendered their concessions, some however not without protest. The new system, which is described in part two below, continues to provide for an exclusive right to purchase cotton in any given market which, however, is granted annually on competitive bid to the dealer or processing company which undertakes to pay the highest prices.

III. THE ROLE OF AFRICANS IN AGRICULTURE

A. General

42. As a result of Portugal's economic policy, agricultural production in the Overseas Territories has traditionally concentrated on the higher priced cash crops (culturas ricas) for export and most government measures to assist production have been directed mainly to European producers. As the foregoing section has shown, government legislation recognized only Europeans as producers to be registered with the Colonial Export Boards, even though in practice Africans were responsible for the major share of the production, either in terms of labour provided through paid employment on plantations or as the principal growers of such crops as cotton and maize, and were responsible for the largest share of cashew production.

43. Studies published by Portuguese authors relating to the period before 1961 show that apart from the distribution of improved seed to African growers, which however had to repaid in kind, very little government assistance was provided to the subsistence sector which was virtually neglected, except to ensure that Africans produced enough food-stuffs to feed themselves. Government policy as reflected in the Constitution, the Overseas Organic Law of 1953, the Native Statute and the Native Labour Code of 1928, was concerned above all with securing adequate African labour which in Angola and Mozambique mainly meant labour for European owned and operated agricultural activities.

B. Legal restrictions on African agricultural activities before 1961

44. In Angola and Mozambique, until the repeal of the Native Statute in 1961, the role of Africans in the economic life of the Territory in general, and in agricultural activities in particular, was prescribed by various legal restrictions deriving from the Statute and the concepts on which it was based.

The obligation to work

45. In the section entitled "Special guarantees to Natives" the Political Constitution of Portugal lays down the following principles concerning African labour: payment for all contract labour performed for public authorities, prohibition of forced labour for the benefit of private employers, the limitation of forced labour for specified purposes, freedom of choice of employment, and public encouragement for Africans to improve their condition through work. Article 146 provides that "The State may only compel natives to work on public works of general interest to the community, on tasks of which the finished product will belong to them, in the execution of judicial sentences of a penal character or the discharge of fiscal liabilities".

46. Article 32 of the Native Statute underlined the traditional Portuguese attitude to the necessity for Africans to work by providing that "The State shall endeavour to teach the natives that work is an indispensable element of progress, but the authorities may not impose labour except in cases explicitly prescribed by law". The principle of what has been called "the freedom of work" was defined in the Native Labour Code of 1928 as follows:

"The Government of the Republic shall ensure the natives of its colonies full liberty to choose the work which suits them best, whether on their own account on their land, or on the land which the Government assigns to them for this purpose or under contract to serve another if they prefer this, provided that the Government shall reserve to itself the right to encourage them to work on their own account to a reasonable extent in order to improve their means of subsistence and conditions of life, and to exercise benevolent supervision and tutelage in respect of their work under contracts of employment."

47. As pointed out by some Portuguese writers, although the 1928 Labour Code did not specifically refer to a legal obligation to work, this nevertheless seems to have been admitted by the law since the State continued to enforce the fulfilment of the "duty to work." Furthermore, the freedom of choice of work did not include the legal right to choose to work or not to work, because the second alternative contradicted the principle of the moral obligation to work.^a

48. As a result of the right of the State to impose forced labour for public purposes and the implied requirement of Africans to work, while in theory Africans could freely engage in agricultural activities of their own choice, in fact, they could only do so under specified conditions which are outlined below.

^a J.M. da Silva Cunha, "A Reforma do Código de Trabalho dos Indígenas" contained in Questões Ultramarinas e Internacionais, Lisbon n.d., vol. I, p. 74.

^a António dos Santos Labisa, "Interpenetração das economias", Colóquios de política ultramarina internacionalmente relevante, E.C.P.S. 1958, pp. 125-126; also José Carlos Ney Ferreira and Vasco Soares de Veiga, Estatuto dos Indígenas Portugueses das Províncias da Guiné, Angola e Moçambique, Anotado, Lisbon 1957, p. 63, note 3A; and p. 65, note 4B, which comments on the moral obligation to work, makes the point that the freedom to work cannot be confounded with the freedom to be idle.

Conditions under which Africans could engage in agricultural activities

(a) Agricultural worker

49. The conditions under which an African could obtain exemption from the liability to work for public purposes were regulated by Territorial legislation in Angola and Mozambique. In both Territories he could fulfil the requirements either by hiring himself out as an agricultural worker for a specified period, or if he qualified as a native farmer, or if under specified conditions he cultivated a certain area of land, or kept a minimum number of cattle. In Angola, according to the Indigenous Labour Regulations of 1956, a non-specialized worker had to work for an employer for at least nine months of the year, and "workers in specialized services", living near enterprises and working for these enterprises had to do so for at least a minimum of 180 days.

50. In Mozambique, every able-bodied male indigenous person between 18 and 55 was required to prove that he lived by his own work. Among others this requirement could be met by anyone who worked for at least six months in each year as a day labourer in the services of the State, administrative bodies or private persons.

(b) African farmer

51. As reported previously by the Sub-Committee on the Situation in Angola,^a before 1961 under the Native Statute and land concession legislation, Africans living in the rural areas in a traditional way of life were not Portuguese citizens and could not acquire individual title to land on the same basis as Europeans. Article 35 of the Native Statute established the basic principle of land ownership for Africans living in tribal societies: they were assured the joint use in accordance with customary law of the land necessary for their settlement and for growing of their crops and grazing of their cattle.

52. This provision enabled Africans in the rural areas to engage in subsistence farming. In Angola, however, subsistence farming alone did not exempt adult male Africans from the liability to public recruitment, and in Mozambique it was not accepted as adequate proof that he was living "by his own work" (see paras. 47 and 48 above). In both Territories, therefore, the able-bodied men were generally absent from their villages for 180-270 days a year in recruited employment, and during this time other members tended the family plot.

53. An African could engage in full-time farming only if he qualified as a registered farmer in his own right, or if he formed part of a government settlement or production scheme.

54. In Angola under an Order (No. 88) of 30 April 1927, an African indígena's land rights were recognized only if (i) the land had been cultivated with permanent crops; (ii) the land was kept permanently cleared, and the person holding the title continued the cultivation and gathered all fruits on the land; and (iii) the owner progressively transformed spontaneous growths into systematically cultivated crops by replanting with proper spacing. The size of the area to which an African could obtain title under this regulation was always limited to that actually cultivated by the title-holder and his family (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex II, para. 44).

55. Once an African had obtained authority to cultivate a plot of land with individual rights, he could retain his plot only if he met the various conditions laid down by the Department of Agriculture. In Angola under the Indigenous Labour Regulations of 1956, to qualify as an African farmer he had to:

(a) Maintain his permanent residence for more than three years in an improved dwelling on or alongside the land he cultivated or in a nearby village;

(b) Cultivate the minimum area prescribed for him by the agricultural services;

(c) Maintain in good condition for more than three years the perennial plants which he had been instructed to cultivate;

(d) Keep cattle, where possible, for breeding and work, caring for them in the manner prescribed by the veterinary services;

^a Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixteenth Session, Supplement No. 16 (A/4978), paras. 319-342.

(e) Protect the soil from erosion and follow the other essential technical instructions relating to the cultivation, preparation and presentation of the produce."

56. In Mozambique on the other hand, to be registered as an African farmer under article 42 of the 1944 statute (Legislative Instrument 919), an African was required to:

(a) Cultivate permanently one or more plots which must conform with the requirements for land cultivation;

(b) Be the main and permanent worker of the various activities in connexion with his holding in which he may have the help of his relatives and paid employees or exchange services with other workers;

(c) Reside with his family on one of his plots or nearby;

(d) Have paid all taxes;

(e) Maintain his activities in accordance with the instructions of the Governor General.

57. He could be expelled if, among other things (a) he was away and not taking care of his plots for more than a total of four months in a year; or (b) after three years, he did not show that he was "achieving the agricultural development as evident from the growth and increased value of his cultivated areas and livestock"; or (c) did not build, within five years, a masonry house on his plots or close to them.

(c) Other

58. As mentioned above, Africans could also engage in full-time agricultural activities if they formed part of a government agricultural settlement or production scheme. For a description of the African settlement schemes introduced before 1961, reference should be made to the study on the concession, occupation and settlement of land in Angola and Mozambique (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex II).

59. Among the special agricultural production schemes, the most important was the cotton régime which is described in greater detail in part two below.

Processing and marketing of agricultural products

60. The Native Statute was silent on the ownership and operation of business enterprises by Africans of indigena status. Regulations on independent home industries and other legislation on processing and transforming industries only applied to Portuguese citizens and Africans who had opted to be governed by Portuguese civil law. Nevertheless, it may be assumed that Africans living in traditional societies could process agricultural products for their own use. The marketing of agricultural products in whatever form was, however, subject to restrictions.

61. Article 49 of the Native Statute provided that "the sale to non-indigenous persons of agricultural produce grown by indigenous persons may be made subject to conditions, or be limited, or prohibited by the administrative authorities" in the following cases:

"1. Whenever the sale of such produce may result in a local food shortage;

"2. Whenever the product offered is far below the usual standard for the type concerned on the market because of untimely harvesting, deficient preparation, poor state of conservation or any other reason conducive to deterioration;

"3. Whenever such action is required in order to comply with the law providing for a special purchasing régime for the direct benefit of the grower, or in order to improve production or to promote the general interest of the economy."

62. The same article also provided that:

"When circumstances make it advisable to do so, indigenous products may be authorized for sale to non-indigenous persons only at periodic fairs or at markets under the supervision of the authorities and at prices controlled by them in order to safeguard the interests of the growers." (Quoted in A/AC.108/L.6, para. 100.)

63. The law left free the trading by Africans among themselves, but whereas under certain conditions they could sell their products to European middlemen, they could not export cotton, coffee or maize since Africans were not recognized as "producers" of these crops for purposes of registration with the Colonial Export Boards. It appears that as a general rule, government price fixing did not affect African producers except for those crops (such as cotton and, in the case of Mozambique, rice) for which a special purchasing régime was in force or for crops sold at periodic markets held under government supervision.

C. Developments after 1961

64. Since the repeal of the Native Statute in 1961 various other changes have been introduced which affect, or which can increasingly influence, the role of Africans in agriculture in Angola and Mozambique. Among the most important measures are (a) the new Rural Labour Code of 1962; (b) the measures taken for the closer integration of the Territories with Portugal; (c) the changes in African land rights, the increase in European settlement, and the new schemes for rural reorganization which are described in the study on the concession, occupation and settlement of land in Angola and Mozambique (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex II); and (d) the revision of the cotton régime which is described in part two below.

65. It may be pointed out, however, that as previous studies and reports have shown, many of the new laws introduce changes which are more apparent than real.

66. The Rural Labour Code of 1962,^{*} for instance, applies to "all workers whatever the ethnical or cultural group to which they belong". But as the term "rural worker" is defined in the Code as "any manual worker of unspecified trade, engaged in activities connected with the sowing of land and harvesting of produce or in activities designed to make such farming possible or to ensure that it is done", in effect, since there are very few Europeans in this category, it is mainly Africans who are affected by its application, especially since the Code also provides under article 150 that "It shall be the duty of the State to ensure socially balanced evolution of the subsistence and market economies". Furthermore, although the Rural Labour Code contains no reference to the obligation to work, there has been no change in the Government's position that all citizens must earn their livelihood by their own efforts and that vagabondage and idleness must be suppressed.

67. Similarly, the land concession legislation retains provisions previously contained in the Native Statute and, as reported in the study on the concession, occupation and settlement of land in Angola and Mozambique (ibid., paras. 47-57), continues to distinguish between land rights of Africans who have chosen to be governed by Portuguese civil law and those who live in traditional societies.

68. Thus it is apparent that whether or not the measures introduced since 1961 will bring about a change in the role of Africans in agriculture in Angola and Mozambique will depend to a great extent on how the laws are interpreted and applied.

69. Recent government measures to assist African agriculture in these Territories include the provision of farm credit, storage and transport facilities, and the establishment of a system of regular supervised rural markets. These developments will be described in the separate studies on the role of agriculture in Angola and Mozambique, which show the pattern of production, processing and marketing of the major crops, including available information on the capital investment in these activities, government regulations and controls and the economic significance of each crop to the Territory and its inhabitants.

PART TWO. COTTON IN THE OVERSEAS TERRITORIES

I. GENERAL

70. Apart from the practice of compulsory labour under the Native Statute nothing more exemplified Portuguese policy towards the Overseas Territories and their indigenous inhabitants prior to 1961 or was more widely criticized abroad than the régime under which cotton was produced and marketed in

* Ibid., p. 27, foot-note 60. According to an Order of the Governor General, an African who cultivated more than one hectare of coffee or 3,000 plants was also entitled to receive the African Farmer's certificate known as a título.

* Decree 44,309, 27 April 1962; English text quoted is from ILO Legislative Series 1962, Por.1.

Mozambique and Angola. Introduced specifically to develop within the shortest possible time an assured supply of raw material to one of Portugal's key industries, it involved the forced cultivation of cotton by hundreds of thousands of Africans, the application of most detailed governmental regulation and control and the establishment of monopolistic concessions over vast areas.

71. By 1961, when cotton growing by Africans was made no longer obligatory, there were 520,000 registered African cotton growers in Mozambique and nearly 47,000 in Angola, earning an average per capita income from their output of less than 1,000 escudos per year and in some areas less than 200 escudos.^a

72. The development of cotton production in the two Territories took place within the thirty-five years beginning in 1926. Although cotton had long been grown as an African crop and sporadic attempts to develop it commercially had been made, especially in Angola, during the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, it was the disruption of world supplies during World War I which provided the first major impetus to organized production. In Mozambique, particularly, European investors turned to cotton as a plantation crop. The stimulus was, however, of short duration; after the war, the normalization of world markets and high costs resulting from the need to concentrate labour on the plantations, induced European farmers to abandon cotton for more profitable forms of investment.

73. As explained in part one above, Portugal, prior to 1961, regarded the Overseas Territories primarily as producers of raw materials for the metropolis. In the case of cotton, however, Portugal's textile industry had relied traditionally on supplies from the United States and Brazil. Consequently, except for the brief interlude during the war, there was until the mid-1920s no systematic effort by government to develop cotton production in the Overseas Territories. In the changed world economic situation after the war, this heavy reliance on foreign sources of supply, together with the growing volume of cotton imports and rising world prices, added substantially to Portugal's balance-of-payments difficulties. In 1925, it was officially estimated that Portugal's annual requirement of raw cotton was approximately 17,000 tons of which only 800 tons came from Mozambique and Angola. The need to purchase the bulk of its cotton from sources outside the escudo area involved for Portugal a yearly outflow of foreign exchange in the region of 150 million escudos.

74. In order to eliminate this drain of foreign exchange and bearing in mind the experience in other colonial territories where cotton had been successfully established as an African peasant crop, the Portuguese Government in 1926 instituted a régime of forced cultivation in Mozambique and Angola with the declared intention of achieving within the shortest possible time self-sufficiency of the escudo area in regard to cotton supplies. The basic features of the régime were, on the one hand, the grant of purchasing monopolies to concessionary companies who, in return for their exclusive rights, were made responsible for developing cotton growing by Africans in their concessions and for acquiring and processing all cotton so produced, and on the other hand the establishment of detailed government regulation and control over all activities relating to the production, processing and disposal of cotton, including the fixing of prices both to exporters and growers.

75. In broad outline, the principles underlying the legislation pertaining to cotton in the Overseas Territories from 1926 to 1961 are illustrative of Portuguese economic policy at that time. Since cotton was an essential raw material for an important metropolitan export industry, it became an obligatory crop for Africans living in areas designated as cotton producing and the local administration officials were required to co-operate with the concessionaires in inducing Africans to produce it. At the same time, through controlled prices and compulsory quotas for the supply of cotton to Portugal and by limiting the production of textiles in the Overseas Territories, Portuguese policy was aimed both at providing an assured supply of cotton to the metropolitan industry at prices which gave it a competitive advantage in world markets and at retaining most of the market in the Overseas Territories for Portuguese textiles.

76. Although the régime achieved its principal objective, namely that by 1960 about 87 per cent of Portugal's raw cotton imports were supplied by the Overseas Territories, it was the object of widespread criticism, especially outside Portugal. Among the reasons for this criticism were the pressures imposed on Africans to grow cotton, the use of the local administrative machineries to support private industrialists, the privileged position of the cotton concessionaires several of whom acquired exclusive rights over enormous areas, and the compulsory supply of cotton under quota to Portugal at prices below those prevailing in world markets. It may be noted that after 1956, the price advantage to Portugal diminished owing to an easing of the world supply of cotton and subsidization of cotton exports by the United States.

77. From 1961 to 1965, Portugal completely revised the legislation governing cotton in the Overseas Territories by a succession of decrees. These replaced the previous régime by a more liberal one in which cotton growing by Africans is no longer obligatory, the concessions are abolished and the export of cotton will eventually be freed of quota restrictions and price controls. The new régime reflects Portugal's changed policy towards the economic development of the Overseas Territories which is inherent in the movement towards integration of the escudo zone and also in the relaxation of restrictions on capital investment and establishment of certain industries, including textiles, in the Territories. The new régime, although transitional in that it retains the compulsory quota system for the supply of raw cotton to Portugal as well as other controls for a further period of five years, opens the way towards the greater industrialization of cotton in the Overseas Territories and their eventual access on a competitive basis to world markets for cotton products.

78. The following sections describe the evolution of the cotton régime and its implications both for the Territories concerned and for Portugal.

II. REGULATION AND CONTROL OF RAW COTTON, 1926-1961

79. Starting in 1926 a succession of decrees and legislative instruments were enacted regulating the production, trade and processing of African-grown cotton in the Overseas Territories. In order to promote the establishment of cotton ginneries and processing plants, Decree 11,994 (28 July 1926) restricted all purchases of African-grown cotton to licensed buyers (European and assimilados) who, to obtain a licence, were required to possess equipment and storage facilities sufficient to process the amount of cotton which they were authorized to buy. Where ginning and processing plants satisfied specified standards of capacity and efficiency, they were termed "cotton factories" and for each factory the licensee was given the exclusive right to purchase all African-grown cotton within a concessionary zone not exceeding 50 km², which limit was increased in 1932 (Decree 20,881, 13 February) to 120 km². There was no restriction on the number of factories and concessionary zones held by one company and in Angola and Mozambique certain large companies acquired a number of concessions (see separate studies on Angola and Mozambique). As a further incentive, license holders were exempted from import duties on equipment and supplies, were exempted from all but a nominal statistical tax (0.01 per cent ad valorem) on cotton entering Portugal, and were charged minimum rates for rail transport and port handling in the Territories.

80. In order to supply these ginneries, Africans were forbidden to sell their cotton except to licensed buyers and at supervised markets. In concessionary zones they could sell only to the concessionary factory or its agents. Under article 19 of Decree 11,994 the prices to be paid for African cotton in each region were fixed annually by the Governor of the Territory concerned "taking into account conditions of labour" as well as transport and other charges "so that the cotton should sell on European markets at prices not higher than cotton produced in the neighbouring colonies".

81. The success of the régime depended primarily on inducing Africans to grow cotton. Decree 11,994 provided (article 13) for concerted action on the part of the territorial authorities, including local administrators and chiefs in cotton-producing regions, to promote the cultivation of this crop among Africans by propaganda, distribution of seeds, technical assistance and supervision and "by such other means as may be appropriate". In concessionary zones this work was to be undertaken by the agents of the factories, who held official status, with the collaboration of the local administrations. In fact, since the principal cotton-growing areas soon came under concession, it was the agents of the concessionary companies, including technicians and promoters (propagandistas), who had the principal role of determining what land should be devoted to cotton and how it should be cultivated, the local administrators and chiefs having responsibility to supervise the growers in carrying out the various phases of the annual cotton campaigns drawn up by the concessionaires, observe compliance with regulations and ensure that the official prices were paid to growers, oversee the marketing of cotton, hear complaints and carry out other related duties, such as seeing that service roads were constructed and maintained by local labour.

^a One escudo = 3.5 cents; $US1 = 28.5 escudos.

82. As the above implies, the object of the régime was to develop cotton growing as the principal African activity in the selected regions through the efforts of commercial entrepreneurs assisted and supported by the territorial administrations. However, partly owing to the effects of the world economic depression and the consequent drop in cotton prices, the new régime did not produce the expected increase in output and after a brief initial upsurge the supply of cotton to Portugal's textile industry declined again until by 1931 it had returned to about the same level as in 1925. In the light of this situation further measures were introduced to stimulate increased production. Thus, in 1932, Decree 21,226 (10 May 1932) instituted an export bounty payable to exporters of all colonial cotton shipped to Portugal on Portuguese ships. The decree also (article 14) prohibited the recruitment of Africans in cotton concessionary zones for work outside those zones, which prohibition was later reiterated in Decree 35,844 (31 August 1946). Both decrees required the administrative authorities in the cotton-growing regions to "devote persistent efforts" with the object of achieving the maximum development of cotton cultivation. Although the metropolitan legislation did not contain any specific mention of compulsion,^{} local enactments in Angola did in fact require Africans in specified areas to grow cotton according to rules which set forth the minimum areas to be cultivated depending on the age, sex and marital status of the individual, the observance of these rules to be supervised by the agents of the concession holders, who were to report any non-compliance to the administrative authorities for appropriate action.^{} In Mozambique, no such legislation was enacted but cotton growing was none the less obligatory in concessionary zones since (a) Africans had a duty to work and pay taxes, and (b) the land was officially designated for cotton growing.

83. A third measure introduced in 1932 (Decrees 20,935 and 21,226) was the creation of a fund to be used for the improvement of African production. The revenue of this fund was derived from a 15 per cent surtax on all cotton yarn and cloth imported into Mozambique and Angola from countries other than Portugal.

84. Between 1932 and 1937 supplies of cotton to Portugal from Mozambique and Angola increased nearly sixfold, accounting in the latter year for 36.6 per cent of Portugal's cotton imports even though these had nearly doubled over the corresponding period. With production and trade now having reached substantial proportions, steps were taken to complete the economic organization of the industry by establishing regulatory bodies in accordance with the general principles of the Corporative State (see part I above).

^{*} The only reference to this is article 6 (b) of Decree 40,405 (4 November 1955), which reads "The improvement of methods of production continues to be an essential obligation of all entities concerned with cultivation, it being now permissible to establish obligatory programmes".

^{*} Angola, Legislative Instruments 638, 24 September 1927; 5, 6 September 1928; 242, 13 January 1930; and Order 6,619, 5 January 1949. Under the last-mentioned Order, Africans were divided into cotton farmers (i.e. able-bodied men from 18 to 55 years of age) and cotton cultivators (men from 56 to 60 years of age, spinsters, widows and divorced women). Depending on their classification, Africans were required to cultivate from 0.25 to one hectare as directed by the agents of the concession holder.

85. The first body to be established (by Decree 27,702, 15 May 1937) was the Regulatory Commission for Trade in Raw Cotton (Comissão Reguladora do Comércio de Algodão em Rama) whose function was to control the import of cotton into Portugal and to ensure that all cotton from the Overseas Territories was marketed, if necessary by compulsory distribution to importers on a quota basis^{*} and at prices fixed by the Commission. As constituted in 1937, the Commission was composed of a president and vice-president designated by the Minister of Commerce and Industry and three members, one representing the cotton importers, one representing the cotton textile industry and, from 1938, one representing the Cotton Export Board (see below). The revenue of the Commission was derived from a tax of 7 centavos per kilogramme of cotton imported into Portugal from the Overseas Territories and 10 centavos per kilogramme imported from other foreign countries. Under Decree Law 28,699 of 1938 the Commission, in agreement with the Cotton Export Board, was required to fix minimum c.i.f. prices, established biennially, to be paid to exporters of cotton produced in each of the Overseas Territories taking into account the different costs of production and transportation and other charges. The correspondence between these prices and the actual market prices of Overseas cotton, which were also fixed officially, was maintained by a stabilization fund derived from a special levy of 50 centavos per kilogramme on cotton imported from other countries.

86. In 1938, Decree 28,697 (25 May) established the Colonial Cotton Export Board (Junta de Exportação do Algodão Colonial) with headquarters in Lisbon to (a) co-ordinate activities related to the production and distribution of cotton in the Overseas Territories; (b) supervise the production and marketing of cotton and ensure that purchases from African growers were made in accordance with legal requirements and at the officially fixed prices; and (c) promote improvements in the quality and quantity of the cotton produced. Its specific responsibilities included: advising the governors of each Territory with regard to the official purchase prices for African cotton and the issuance of licences and concessions; designating regions for cotton growing; making loans to producers and traders; grading; and issuing export permits. In addition, it acted itself as a purchaser and exporter thereby ensuring that all available cotton was exported.

87. The Board was under the authority of the Minister for the Colonies and consisted of a president, vice-president and three members representing the metropolitan dealers in overseas cotton and the producers (concessionary companies and non-African farmers) in each of the two Territories; all were appointed by the Minister. In Mozambique and Angola it was represented by "delegations" with inspectors and other technical staff. In principle the agents of the Board were required to supervise the work of the concessionaires and approve their annual cotton campaigns, particularly as regards the selection of land for cotton growing. According to one source,^{*} however, which describes the situation in northern Mozambique, the Board did not always have sufficient staff to supervise the campaigns in all concessions and "in practice the selection of land for cotton growing was more likely to be done by the agents of the concessionaires".

88. Under the decree of 1938, the Board's revenues were derived from: (a) a special tax of 3 centavos per kilogramme on all cotton imported into Portugal from the Overseas Territories; (b) an equal amount deducted from the tax on cotton imports into Portugal from other countries (see para. 85 above); (c) special allocations for cotton development; (d) licence fees, fines and interest on capital; and (e) special taxes imposed by the Board with authorization from the territorial governments. In 1946 the Board's revenues were increased by the imposition of a tax of 50 escudos per ton of cotton purchased from Africans payable by all concessionaires and traders (Decree 35,844, article 38).

^{*} These quotas were established by the grémio of cotton importers (see part one above).

^{*} Nelson Saraiva Bravo, "A Cultura Algodoeira na Economia do Norte de Moçambique", Junta de Investigações do Ultramar, Estudos de Ciências Políticas e Sociais, No. 66 (Lisbon 1963), pp. 112-122.

89. Between 1937 and 1946, cotton production in Mozambique and Angola more than doubled, but owing to a progressive increase in consumption, it still accounted for only 65 per cent of Portugal's cotton imports. In the meantime, however, the pressure on Africans to grow cotton led to neglect of other crops with the result that in 1942 and later serious food shortages occurred in Mozambique, especially in the north where cotton was most extensively cultivated. Furthermore, the cultivation of cotton had been extended to areas relatively unsuitable to the crop at the expense of other productive activities.

90. In order to remedy these defects and at the same time to foster increased output, Portugal revised the basic cotton legislation in 1946. The new decree (Decree 35,844, 31 August 1946) reorganized the cotton concessions to correspond with administrative divisions (concelhos or circunscrições) which henceforth became known as "cotton zones", the significance of this change being that it enabled the Cotton Export Board to assume a more direct supervisory role over agricultural activities within the zones by requiring the local administrative authorities to carry out its instructions. Under the new decree the Board was given the functions of selecting cotton zones and eliminating areas which it considered unsuitable for cotton growing, determining what areas within the zones should be devoted to cotton and directly supervising the work of the concessionaires. In addition to drawing up standard instructions (bases) which concessionaires were required to follow, the Board also approved the annual work programme of each concessionaire, which had to include plans not only for the cultivation of cotton by Africans but also for the supervised growing of food crops in rotation with cotton. Moreover, in drawing up their work programmes, concessionaires were required to concentrate areas of cotton cultivation so as to permit, among other things, the communal use by the growers of equipment supplied by the concessionaire, and also to promote the stabilization of the African population in rural settlements (aldeamentos).

91. The 1946 decree also extended the responsibilities of the concessionaires in regard to the processing of cotton. Whereas previously their obligation had been limited to the purchase and ginning of African-grown cotton, they were henceforth additionally required to gin cotton on behalf of autonomous (mostly European) farmers and dealers in their zones in return for a fixed commission and to undertake the processing of all surplus cotton seeds either for export or for local sale.

92. Finally, the decree imposed two additional taxes on cotton purchased from Africans: (a) a tax of 50 escudos per ton to be used to defray the increased expenditures by the Board, and (b) a tax of 10 escudos per ton to finance a Cotton Fund to be used for the provision of health, educational and welfare services in the cotton zones. Both taxes were technically payable by the concessionaires and dealers, but in practice they were discounted from the increase in cotton prices passed on to the growers.

93. The decree of 1946 extended the duration of the cotton concessions for a period of ten years and they were accordingly due to expire in 1956. By 1953, the combined production of Mozambique and Angola already exceeded Portugal's requirements of those grades of cotton which the Territories produced* and by 1955 it was approximately 60 per cent more than in 1946. The surpluses were either exported to other foreign countries or were absorbed by small textile industries in the Territories, the development of which was however restricted by legislation apparently designed to protect the interests of the metropolitan mills (see section IV below).

94. In 1955 the basic legislation governing the cotton régime was again revised (Decree 40,405, 24 November 1955). Among the changes, the new decree provided for the establishment of compulsory quotas, to be determined annually in the light of the requirements of the metropolitan textile industry, which each Territory was required to supply to Portugal before any exports to other countries could be made; the Portuguese importers none the less having a right of option on any cotton exported in excess of the quotas. For cotton exported under the quotas, the export prices were officially fixed taking into account "a just remuneration for the producers and industrialists, the degree of reorganization attained in the national (textile) industry" and the shipping costs. Cotton exported elsewhere was sold at free market rates and was subject to higher export duties, which were likewise levied on cotton supplied to local textile manufacturers in the Territory.

95. A second change made in 1955 was the expansion of the Cotton Fund created in 1946 into a development fund for the cotton zones. As redefined the fund's purposes included (a) provision of medical and welfare services for the African cotton growers; (b) rural development; (c) financial relief to cotton growers in bad crop years; (d) cotton research and the supply of farming equipment; (e) clearing of land for settlements; and (f) financing part of the operations of African co-operatives (see below). To enable the Fund to fulfil these increased functions, in addition to the surtax on imports of foreign textiles (see para. 83 above), the tax paid per ton of cotton purchased from Africans was raised from 10 to 20 escudos and a new levy, equal to the export duty, was imposed on all cotton exported to countries other than Portugal. This additional levy was also imposed on cotton used for local textile manufacture, thereby increasing the price differential between these two categories of cotton on the one hand and cotton supplied to Portugal under quota.

96. A third innovation was the inclusion of a provision in the 1955 decree permitting the establishment of co-operative societies of African cotton growers (Decree 40,405, articles 34-36), subject to the limitation that they could engage in cotton ginning only if they were outside cotton zones, where processing was a monopoly of the concessionaires. Since most areas of any size considered suitable for cotton had been designated as cotton zones and were therefore under concession, this in effect restricted the field open to African co-operatives to the actual growing of cotton and the group ownership of farming equipment. A significant advantage arose, however, from the fact that the co-operatives could sell their produce, as could autonomous (European and equiparado) farmers, at free market rates which, according to one source, averaged in Mozambique about 20 per cent higher than the officially fixed prices paid to African growers.^{aa}

III. REGULATION AND CONTROL OF RAW COTTON AFTER 1961

97. The purpose of the cotton legislation described above had been to mobilize all available resources to bring about the maximum development of cotton production within the shortest possible time. In 1960 this goal seemed to have been attained for during that year the output of raw cotton in the Overseas Territories reached a peak of about 160,000 tons (140,000 tons in Mozambique and 20,000 tons in Angola). In 1961 and 1963, changes were made in the cotton régime, paving the way for the elimination of the concessionary system and its replacement by a system described as "controlled competition" (concorrência equilibrada).

98. The first major change was introduced by Decree 43,639 (2 May 1961) which (a) put an end to all intervention by administrative authorities in the production and trade of cotton, and (b) declared that within cotton zones, the cultivation of cotton was voluntary (livremente praticada) subject only to technical guidance by the Cotton Export Board.

99. Later the same year Decree Laws 43,874 and 43,875 (24 August 1961) abolished the Cotton Export Board and replaced it by separate Cotton Institutes in Mozambique and Angola. This change, which coincided with similar action in respect of the export boards for coffee and maize (see part one) was in conformity with the policy established in 1937 (Decree 26,757) whereby regulatory boards for important export commodities should eventually be replaced by corporative institutes.

* In 1953 Portugal derived 97 per cent of its cotton imports from the Overseas Territories, the increased volume being about forty-seven times the quantity supplied in 1925.

^{aa} Bravo, op. cit.

100. One result of this change was that it provided greater control at the territorial level, for though ultimate authority remains with the Overseas Minister, each institute is immediately responsible to the Governor-General of the Territory who appoints its council, consisting of a director, assistant director and three members, representing local producers, exporters and the government services. Only in regard to the fixing of prices do the councils report automatically to the Minister, since this involves co-ordination between the Territories.

101. In general the functions entrusted to the institutes in 1961 were the same as those of the Board. Decree Law 43,875 specifies, however, that one of their objectives is to "develop corporative organization and solidarity" among the various sectors of the industry, and they are required to "defend the interests of small producers by ensuring the observance of legal requirements and prices and by promoting organizations through which the economic and social well-being of those small producers may be realized". Furthermore, whereas only European producers were required to register with the Board, the new decree law requires that in Angola all producers whose farms (lavouras) exceed a specified area must register.

102. With the establishment of the Cotton Institutes, the Cotton Development Fund, derived mainly from taxes discounted from the amounts paid to Africans for their cotton, was abolished. In its stead separate cotton development funds were set up in each Territory, the revenues of which were derived under the 1961 legislation principally from: (a) taxes paid by the concessionaires and calculated on the basis of the C.I.F. price of cotton imported into Portugal; (b) increments in the price of raw cotton in Portugal; (c) a tax of 35 per cent of the export value of cotton seed or of its wholesale value when supplied to local industry; and (d) certain receipts of the institutes. In each Territory the taxes are fixed annually by the Governor-General.

103. The new cotton development funds were given broader functions than their predecessors. Under article 35 of Decree Law 43,875 they are used for: (a) subsidization of official bodies engaged in technical and social assistance to cotton producers; (b) the grant of subsidies and loans to cotton co-operatives; (c) development of agriculture and livestock in the cotton regions; (d) technical research; (e) maintenance of official prices and financing of the trading activities of the Institutes; (f) the grant of subsidies to cotton producers in case of crop failures; and (g) the clearing of land for cotton farming.

104. The creation of separate cotton institutes and development funds did not alter the basic features of the cotton régime, but it paved the way for more radical changes introduced in 1963.

105. Decree Law 45,179 (5 August 1963) and the regulations for its application (Decree 45,550, 30 January 1964) provide a complete revision of the cotton régime. Under it the cotton concessions are being progressively eliminated and will be suppressed on 31 August 1966. Where concessions cease to exist, purchases of raw cotton may be made by registered dealers (individuals or companies) and the Cotton Institutes themselves; to obtain registration with one of the Institutes a dealer must possess the necessary funds, organization and technical capacity to carry out operations and pay an annual membership fee of 10,000 escudos.

106. The new system requires that each year the Cotton Institutes fix minimum purchase prices for seed cotton, based on the export prices of raw cotton (lint). Once these prices have been fixed, dealers are invited to bid for the right to buy seed cotton at each authorized market, the dealer who offers the highest prices obtaining the sole right to purchase cotton at the specified market together with the obligation to buy all cotton offered at the prices which he has contracted to pay.

107. A licence to gin cotton may be obtained by any individual or company which possesses one or more ginneries and is a registered member of the Institute, paying an annual membership fee of 10,000 escudos per ginnery. Ginneries are required to process cotton on behalf of dealers, producers or the Institute, on payment of a commission fixed by the Governor-General of the Territory. There is, of course, nothing to prevent a single individual or company from being registered both as a dealer and as a ginner.

108. Under the new system, the Cotton Institutes have become the sole regulating agency in their respective Territories, taking over the field staff of the former concessionaires and their functions vis-à-vis the cotton growers as each concession is eliminated. The Institutes derive their revenue from (a) licence fees; (b) the proceeds of their own commercial operations; (c) participation in the receipts of the Cotton Development Funds which derive their revenue from: (i) a tax on the price of each kilogramme of seed cotton purchased; (ii) a tax on exports of raw cotton, which may vary between 3 and 5 per cent of the c.i.f. price; (iii) a tax of 35 per cent of the export value of cotton seed, or the warehouse price if it is consumed locally. The first two taxes are determined annually by the government of each Territory.

109. As regards export controls, the new system retains the earlier provisions relating to the establishment of territorial quotas for the supply of raw cotton to Portugal, these quotas being determined annually by the Overseas Minister and the Minister of Economy on the advice of the Regulatory Commission. The supply of cotton to local industry and exports to other foreign countries are regulated by the respective Institute. In this respect the new system is a transitional one, for article 18 of Decree Law 45,179 provides that "within a maximum period of five years, the trade in overseas cotton shall be carried out according to norms similar to those practiced in the international market".

IV. COTTON TEXTILES IN ANGOLA AND MOZAMBIQUE

110. A description of the cotton régime would not be complete without reference to the legislation governing the development of textile industries in the Overseas Territories. Since the purpose of the régime was originally to furnish a supply of raw cotton to the metropolitan mills which were important contributors to the export sector of Portugal's economy, no authorizations for local manufacture of textiles were made during the early years of the régime. As explained in the introduction to a decree (No. 26,569) of 1936, Portuguese official policy, which has changed since 1961, was to regard the Overseas Territories mainly as suppliers of raw materials to metropolitan industries on the grounds that they were at a comparative disadvantage in respect of the availability of skilled manpower. According to that decree, local manufacturers should be restricted to products which utilized local raw materials and for which there was either a guaranteed local market or which could be produced for export at less cost than in Portugal.

111. In 1944, with cotton production rapidly increasing and already accounting for about 60 per cent of the industrial needs of the metropolis, the Portuguese Government enacted Decree Law 33,924 which authorized the manufacture of cotton textiles in the Overseas Territories subject to restrictions on output designed to protect the metropolitan industry. The decree law provided that the output of cotton textiles for consumption in each Territory should not exceed the difference in weight between that Territory's average annual import of cotton textiles during the three years 1936-1938 and the same average plus 20 per cent of cotton textiles imported from Portugal.

112. The decree law contained two exceptions to this limitation: (a) the limit should not apply to textiles produced for export to non-Portuguese countries; and (b) each Territory could supply the other Overseas Territories in so far as the latter did not fill their own production quotas. In effect, however, these provisions were nullified in the following year by Decree Law 34,643 (1 June 1945) which prohibited the authorization of new cotton textile factories in any Overseas Territory which had already reached its allotted capacity.

113. One of the considerations mentioned in connexion with the 1944 legislation was that it would assist the modernization of the metropolitan industry by permitting the transfer of existing equipment to the Overseas Territories. Indeed, the decree law required that existing textile companies in Portugal should be given preference in the granting of authorizations to operate in the Overseas Territories. If they did not exercise this privilege, they had the right to purchase 40 per cent of the registered stock of any new company at the nominal price. The new industries were to enjoy exemption from local taxes and import duties on equipment and supplies for an initial period but, in order to protect metropolitan producers, the local price of raw cotton was to be the same as that paid in Portugal. To this end cotton sold to local industries was subject to the same taxes as were levied on exported cotton.^{bb}

114. Since 1944 several cotton textile factories have been established in Mozambique and Angola. Only two of these are large, however, one in each Territory, and both are operated by the same company, the Sociedade Algodreira de Fomento Colonial, which has its headquarters in Lisbon and is owned jointly by the Portuguese State and by metropolitan textile interests (details of the textile industries are given in the separate studies on agriculture and processing in each Territory).

115. In both Territories cotton textiles still remain the second most important import by value. In 1964, imports of cotton textiles accounted for 370 million escudos (8.0 per cent of imports) in the case of Angola and 334 million escudos (7.4 per cent of imports) in the case of Mozambique. Owing to protective duties the majority of these imports came from Portugal. At present, only Mozambique exports cotton textiles and the value of these exports amounted to only 1.5 million escudos in 1962.

116. With the new policy in regard to economic development within the escudo zone, which is described in part one above, Portugal's official attitude towards the regulation of the cotton textile industry in the Overseas Territories has undergone a fundamental change. In November 1965, a decree law was enacted which revoked the previous legislation of 1944 and 1945 and provided that henceforth the authorization of additional cotton textile manufacturing capacity should be the responsibility of the authorities in each of the Overseas Territories to be determined solely on the basis of that Territory's development needs.

V. IMPLICATIONS OF THE COTTON RÉGIME

A. Economic importance to metropolitan Portugal

117. In 1960, Portugal ranked twelfth among European producers of cotton thread and cloth. Its cotton textile industry encompassed 419 factories employing over 70,000 workers, and the value of its output was about 4 billion escudos. Cotton thread and cloth are Portugal's leading export. In 1963 it produced an export revenue of 1,500 million escudos, or approximately one eighth of the country's visible exports by value.

118. The rapid growth of the industry after the Second World War can be seen from the increasing volume of raw cotton imported (see table 1). During the years 1929-1931, the average consumption of cotton was only 17,000 tons; in 1942-1945 it averaged 24,000 tons but by 1964 it had increased to nearly 77,000 tons. In 1963 the raw cotton imported by Portugal cost 1,328 million escudos, or more than 6 per cent of Portugal's imports by value.

119. Access to supplies from Mozambique and Angola has helped the growth of the metropolitan industry in two ways. First, it reduced the demand for foreign exchange, especially during and after World War II when cotton was in short supply on world markets and prices were consequently high. Thus, during the decade 1946-1955, an average of 87 per cent of Portugal's cotton requirements was supplied by the two Territories under the compulsory export quota system. After 1956, when world supplies increased and prices declined sharply, Portugal was able to expand its consumption by turning to foreign sources. From 1956-1963 the percentage of total cotton imports supplied by the Overseas Territories averaged only 70 per cent and in 1964 it was only 41 per cent.

120. Second, by fixing the official quota prices below those obtaining for cotton imported from other countries, Portugal was enabled to reorganize and re-equip her textile industry during the post-war period during most of which the world prices of cotton were high. That cotton supplied by the Overseas Territories was cheaper than cotton imported from other countries can be seen by comparing columns 9 and 10 of table 1. It must be pointed out, however, that whereas a large part of the shipments from the Overseas Territories consist of low-quality fibres, cotton obtained from other countries is composed largely of higher grades. A more accurate picture can be obtained by comparing similar grades. According to data published by the Regulatory Commission for Trade in Raw Cotton, the average price c.i.f. Portugal of cotton imported from Mozambique during the crop years 1947-48/1954-55 was 14.08 escudos per kilo, whereas the same cotton if sold on the basis of international quotations would have fetched an average price of 27.12 escudos.^{cc} According to one source^{dd} the cotton supplied to Portugal from the Overseas Territories in 1955 would, if sold at international quotations, have fetched an additional 400 million escudos or 68 per cent more than it fetched under the official quota prices.

121. After 1956, when the United States began to subsidize exports of high grade fibre, world prices, especially of lower grade cotton, dropped sharply. In the crop years 1955-1956 the average c.i.f. price of Mozambique cotton was 16.06 escudos compared with 18.84 escudos for comparable foreign cotton and in the calendar year 1960 the average prices were respectively 17.78 and 18.50 escudos. Although the quota prices of higher grade cotton (grades 1-3) from the Overseas Territories remained slightly below international quotations between 1956 and 1960, the quota prices of inferior cotton were significantly higher. In mid-1958 for example the c.i.f. import prices of grades 5 and 6 under the quota were 14.60 and 13.60 escudos respectively, whereas the corresponding prices for United States cotton f.o.b. Houston, Texas, were between 8.50 and 10 escudos.

122. The following table showing Portugal's imports of raw cotton by quantity and value is based on data published under the auspices of the official Junta de Investigações do Ultramar.

B. Economic and social importance to the Overseas Territories

123. Prior to 1961, when compulsory cultivation was abolished, cotton was grown in Angola and Mozambique under a system which amounted to forced cultivation. In Angola, local legislation enacted from 1908 to 1949 required Africans living in certain areas and not otherwise employed, to grow cotton. The most comprehensive enactment was an Order of the Governor-General, dated 5 January 1949, which provided that within cotton zones the minimum areas to be grown with cotton and with food crops should be fixed each year by the Governor-General, on the proposal of the Cotton Export Board, and that all Africans of working age (i.e., between the ages of 18 and 60) should cultivate cotton and food crops as directed.^{ee} The Order further provided that cultivation should be in accordance with the rules prescribed by the Cotton Export Board, the observance of these rules to be supervised by the agents of the concessionary companies who were to report any non-compliance

^{cc} Portugal: Comissão Reguladora do Comércio de Algodão em Rama, Boletim, 1948-1960.

^{dd} Bravo, op. cit.

^{ee} For the crop year 1948-1949 the minimum areas to be cultivated varied from 0.25 hectare to one hectare of cotton and an equal area of food crops depending on the age, sex and marital status of the individual.

^{bb} Official policy in this respect appears to have varied. Thus, Decree Law 35,844 (article 59) of 1946 provided that the special tax on cotton exports should also be levied on cotton supplied to local industries; Decree Law 37,523 (article 10) of 1949 exempted the latter from all export duties; and Decree 40,403 (article 59) of 1955 reimposed the tax.

TABLE 1. METROPOLITAN PORTUGAL: IMPORTS OF RAW COTTON

Year	From Angola		From Mozambique		From other countries		Total imports		Percentage from Overseas Territories
	Thousand tons	Million escudos	Thousand tons	Million escudos	Thousand tons	Million escudos	Thousand tons	Million escudos	Volume	Value
	(1)	(2)	(3)	(4)	(5)	(6)	(7)	(8)	(9)	(10)
1946-1950 ^a	5.4	65.9	24.4	280.1	3.8	88.7	34.0	436.5	88.6	80.0
1951-1955 ^a	5.4	84.0	30.7	469.3	6.5	209.6	42.6	762.9	84.7	73.2
1956	5.5	89.7	21.1	339.2	13.2	290.3	39.8	719.1	66.8	59.6
1957	7.1	127.6	22.1	379.8	17.9	377.7	47.2	885.0	62.0	57.3
1958	6.1	109.8	35.4	619.2	6.5	140.6	48.0	869.6	86.5	83.8
1959	5.7	102.7	29.2	510.1	14.2	267.8	49.1	880.5	71.1	69.6
1960	8.8	155.4	37.7	706.0	9.0	179.1	57.5	1,040.5	84.3	82.8
1961	4.9	87.5	42.1	755.3	20.2	407.8	67.3	1,252.9	69.9	67.3
1962	3.9	71.1	29.1	523.8	32.2	631.5	65.3	1,226.4	50.6	48.5
1963	5.7	106.1	36.3	648.5	30.0	573.5	72.0	1,328.1	58.4	56.8
1964	3.1	54.0	28.5	525.8	45.2	846.7	76.8	1,426.4	41.2	40.7

SOURCE: Data up to and including 1961 from N. S. Bravo, op. cit. Data for 1962 to 1964 from Portugal, Comércio Externo.

^a Yearly average.

to the administrative authorities for appropriate action.^{ff} In Mozambique no legislation of this nature was enacted, but Africans in cotton zones were none the less obliged to grow cotton since under the Native Statute they had an obligation to work and pay taxes and within these zones cotton was the prescribed cash crop. Furthermore, under the Native Farmers' Statute an African farmer could be deprived of his land if he failed to cultivate it as required by the Government. The evidence shows that strong pressure was brought to bear on Africans to grow cotton even on marginally suitable land, with the result that income to the grower was sometimes exceedingly low (see below) and that it became necessary to supervise the rotational growing of food crops in order to prevent food shortages. Although the metropolitan legislation did not specifically authorize compulsion, the exercise of strong official pressure on the African grower may be inferred from the obligation placed on local administrative authorities to devote persistent efforts to develop cotton growing, to supervise its cultivation by Africans (Decree 21,226) and to assist the concessionaires by propaganda (Decrees 35,844 and 40,405). Moreover, the prohibition of recruitment of Africans in cotton zones for work outside their zones (Decrees 21,226 and 35,844) although not affecting the right of voluntary migration, made it difficult for Africans to find alternative means of gainful employment in order, among other things, to pay their taxes. These matters were subject to detailed examination by a commission of the International Labour Organisation, 1961-1962, and reference is made to its report.^{gg} As previously stated, the Native Statute and all legislation providing for the compulsory cotton growing, or for intervention by administrative officials was revoked in 1961.

124. In economic terms, the importance of cotton for Mozambique and Angola derives not only from its prominence as an export commodity, particularly in the case of Mozambique, but also from the fact that it is the main cash crop of a very large number of African producers. In 1961, the value of African seed cotton produced in Mozambique was 379.9 million escudos and the number of growers was approximately 520,000. Hence the average per capita value was about 720 escudos. In Angola the average per capita value was 950 escudos for a total of 46,676 growers.

125. Until 1963 the prices of ginned cotton and the prices paid to African growers for seed cotton were fixed officially. In 1963 as a first step towards the eventual removal of price controls,^{hh} it was decreed that only minimum prices should be fixed for seed cotton, so as to permit competitive bidding. In 1964, however, about 40 per cent of the Mozambique cotton crop was purchased by the Cotton Institute at the official minimum prices owing to the absence of competitive bidding by dealers.

126. The official prices paid to African growers for seed cotton are determined by deducting transportation, processing and other costs from the export price, and vary according to grade and locality. The following table shows the official prices effective in different years in the north of Mozambique.

by the Government of Ghana concerning the observance by the Government of Portugal of the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), Geneva, 1962.

^{hh} The decree of 1963 envisaged that the controlled export prices would be eliminated after a five-year transitional period. Thereafter cotton would be exported at free market quotations.

TABLE 2. MOZAMBIQUE: OFFICIAL PRICES OF SEED COTTON

(Escudos per kg.)

Year	Maximum		Average		Minimum
	1st grade	2nd grade	1st grade	2nd grade	1st grade	2nd grade
1947-1948	1.60	1.20	1.50	1.10	1.40	1.00
1949-1950	1.90	1.50	1.80	1.40	1.70	1.30
1951-1955	2.80	2.10	2.70	2.00	2.60	1.90
1956-1960	3.10	2.40	3.00	2.30	2.90	2.20
1961	3.70	2.30	3.60	2.20	3.50	2.10

SOURCE: Bravo, op. cit.

127. Prior to 1961, taxes on behalf of the Cotton Fund were discounted from the prices paid to African growers. These taxes amounted in 1960 to 0.20 escudos per kilogramme of first quality seed cotton and 0.30 escudos per kilogramme of second quality. With the abolition of the Cotton Fund in 1961, these discounts were eliminated. In 1962, there were only two official prices for African-grown cotton applicable throughout Mozambique, namely 3.70 escudos for first quality and 2.30 escudos for second quality seed cotton. Co-operatives and European farmers, who were not subject to controls, received an average of 20 per cent more than African producers. According to one source,¹¹ the average yearly income from cotton of African growers in northern Mozambique was 634 escudos in 1960.¹²

128. Cotton contributes to the public revenue of the Territories through a number of taxes and export duties. In 1963 these various charges were reported to amount to a total of 0.77 escudos per kilogramme of seed cotton produced in Mozambique, or about 92.4 million escudos. Most of these taxes and duties derive from metropolitan legislation and therefore apply also to Angola although the level of the taxes may differ. The majority, including in the case of Mozambique a tax of 20 escudos per ton on purchases of seed cotton, a tax of 0.80 escudos per kg. of ginned cotton produced, together with various export duties and other charges, are used to finance the cotton development funds in each Territory. The proceeds of these funds may be used for general development purposes in any cotton-growing region, which in Mozambique means about half the area of the Territory. It is worthy of note that between 1955 and 1961 when it was replaced by separate cotton development funds in each Territory, the Cotton Fund, which was used for the same purpose, received a total of over 156 million escudos from Mozambique alone.

Appendix II

Agriculture and processing industries in Angola

Working paper prepared by the Secretariat

CONTENTS

	Paragraphs
I. GENERAL OUTLINE
A. Role of agriculture in the economy of the Territory	1-9
B. Pattern of production	10-21
II. PRODUCTION, PROCESSING AND MARKETING OF MAJOR CROPS
A. Coffee	22-72
B. Sisal	73-90
C. Sugar	91-113
D. Cotton	114-154
E. Maize	155-181

Tables

	Page
1. Regions of principal crops and estimated areas cultivated	392
2. Angola: coffee production	398
3. Angola: growth of coffee production in main districts, 1955 and 1960	398
4. Angola—coffee: exports and principal destinations, 1955-1964	398
5. Angola—sisal: exports and principal destinations, 1955-1964	400
6. Angola sugar companies: Area, factory capacity and output, 1960	402

¹¹ Bravo, op. cit.

¹² The average conceals wide variations. Thus in 1959-1960 income per grower ranged from 129 to over 3,300 escudos in northern Mozambique.

	Page
7. Angola's sugar quota for export to Portugal, by factory	402
8. Angola: sugar production, consumption and exports	402
9. Angola—sugar: local consumption, exports and principal destinations, 1955-1964	403
10. Angola: seed cotton output by regions	404
11. Angola: African production of seed cotton	404
12. Angola: African cotton growers, area and production under the supervision of the Cotton Institute, 1961-1964	406
13. Angola: local production and import of cotton textiles and other cotton products	407
14. Angola: export of cotton seed oil and other by-products	407
15. Angola: cotton lint output and exports	408
16. Angola: maize exports and destination of exports	410
17. Angola: agricultural exports, 1955-1964	410
18. Angola: agricultural exports percentage of value of total exports, 1955-1964	410

I. GENERAL OUTLINE

A. Role of agriculture in the economy of the Territory

1. The economy of Angola remains basically agricultural despite the increased mineral production of recent years. During the period 1956-1964 agricultural commodities accounted on an average for more than 60 per cent of the total value of visible exports. In 1964 mineral exports represented only 20 per cent of the total and included diamonds, which accounted for 12.7 per cent, iron ore 4.0 per cent, and crude petroleum and petroleum products 3.4 per cent. Next in importance are fish products.

2. Since the early 1950s coffee and sisal have dominated the agricultural sector in Angola. Coffee, which is now the Territory's leading export crop, accounted for almost 50 per cent of the total value of exports in 1964, as compared with 30 per cent in 1950. With an annual production of some 180,000 metric tons in the 1963 and 1964 seasons, Angola has become the third largest world coffee producer after Brazil and Colombia, its output representing about 5.7 per cent of the world's supplies.

3. As a result of favourable prices sisal production doubled during the period 1950-55, and by 1965 with an annual output of some 62,000 tons, Angola became the third largest sisal producer in the world, after Tanzania and Brazil.

4. The Territory's third export crop is maize, which for many years was the most important export in terms both of value and of the volume exported. In 1964, however, it accounted for less than 3 per cent of the total value of the Territory's visible exports.

5. In contrast to Mozambique, sugar and cotton no longer play an important role in the Territory's export trade, and increased output is mostly absorbed by local consumption. Other agricultural exports include manioc (crueira), manioc flour, palm-oil, coco nuts, beans, peanuts and tobacco. Since the mid-1950s, however, these crops have accounted for less than 8 per cent of exports by value.

6. The principal markets for Angola's coffee are the United States of America, the United Kingdom, Netherlands, France and the Federal Republic of Germany. Portugal is the main customer for sisal and most of the other crops, some of which are supplied to it exclusively (cotton and sugar) or partially under fixed quotas.

7. As described in the previous working paper (appendix I), the Government fixes the export of most agricultural products, and supervises and controls their grading and marketing. Export duties and special taxes levied on agricultural products leaving Angola ports, contribute a substantial share to the public revenue of the Territory. In addition to the normal export duties there were, in 1962 for instance, special levies consisting of a 1.5 per cent ad valorem tax and a 10 centavos per kilogramme surtax on coffee exported; 3 escudos per ton for maize, 10 centavos per kilogramme for sugar; and 25 centavos per kilogramme for cotton.^a There is also an additional tax (imposto de sobrevalorização) on coffee which is assessed on the difference between the actual export price and that prevailing in 1949.^b In 1962 when export tariffs on all products amounted to 241 million escudos and contributed about one tenth of the total ordinary revenue, the additional special levies on agricultural products amounted to 45.5 million escudos, of which 41.9 million was from coffee, 3.9 million from sugar and the rest from maize, beeswax and cotton.

8. While part of the funds collected as export and other taxes on coffee, cotton and maize are allocated to the respective commodity institutes to finance their activities, including research and extension work, most of the foreign exchange earned by Angola's exports has to be handed into the common Foreign Exchange Fund, and in this way Angola's dollar and sterling earnings help to reduce Portugal's own balance of payments deficit.

9. There is no recent information on the proportion of the population engaged in agriculture. According to statistics compiled by the Angola Labour Institute and published in 1964, wage earners make up 24 per cent of the labour force and "independent" workers 86 per cent; by sector, 95.3 per cent are engaged in the primary sector, which includes some 30,000 persons employed in the extractive industries, and 58,000 in other industries; 2.4 per cent are in the secondary sector and 2.3 per cent in the tertiary sector. The statistics gathered concerning labour migrating within the Territory showed that 78.9 per cent were engaged in agriculture and 6.6 per cent in livestock.

B. Pattern of production

10. Angola, with an area of 1,241,700 square kilometres (481,226 square miles), is about fourteen times the size of Portugal. It has a varied rainfall and topography and is suitable for growing both tropical and temperate crops. It is estimated that about 2 to 3 per cent of the land is under cultivation.

11. The pattern of agriculture varies from the north to the south. Cabinda, which is 727,000 square kilometres in area, forms a distinct region not only because it is geographically separated from the rest of Angola, but because of its predominant importance in timber production which accounts for about 65 per cent of the value of its local exports. Coffee, palm products and other tropical crops make up the remaining 35 per cent.

^a Agricultural products subject to a special export régime included, in 1956, cotton, coffee, manioc, flour, beans, maize, palm and palm kernels oil, sisal, sisal tow, leaf tobacco, manufactured tobacco, wheat and wheat flour. In contrast, minerals exported from the following companies were exempt from export duty: the Angola Diamond Company, the Companhia dos Betuminosos de Angola, the Companhia de Combustíveis do Lobito, the Empresa do Cobre de Angola, the Sociedade Mineira de Lombige and the Companhia Mineira de Lobito (see A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex I).

^b In 1957 and 1958, when coffee prices were at their peak, receipts from this tax amounted to about 5 per cent of the Territory's ordinary revenue (see para. 62 of this appendix).

12. The northern region of Angola, from the border of the Republic of Congo (Leopoldville) to the Cuanza valley, is the main coffee producing region. It also produces almost all the cotton and about half of the sugar exported. This region consists of a relatively undeveloped low coastal plain from which the land rises to the east to form a sub-plateau of 1,300-3,000 feet, with a gradual ascent to highlands in the interior with elevation between 3,000 and 5,000 feet. Coffee is grown mainly on the Uíge plateau and around Gabela, inland from Porto Amboim. The two main cotton growing areas are located in the coastal plain south of Luanda, with Icolo and Bengo as the centre, and along the Luanda Railway, principally in the Catete and Malanje concelhos. Kenaf and abroma fibre are grown inland from the coast and the Portuguese-owned Companhia União Fabril has a 75,000 hectare plantation in the M'Bridge River basin area where these are the main crops. The Cuanza and Bengo river valleys (as reported in A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex II, paras. 136-140) and the area round Malanje are being developed to supply fruits, vegetables and other crops to the Luanda market and for export. Around Malanje some tobacco is grown by both Europeans and Africans. This region, which is responsible for the main share of agricultural exports, also produces small quantities of palm, cassava and other tropical produce mainly as African subsistence food crops.

13. In the central region of Angola, the main producing area is the Benguela-Bié plateau which lies inland from the port of Lobito. Sisal is the major export crop. About 95 per cent of the export maize and most of the manioc also come from this region. Some wheat, tobacco, peanuts and beans and other subsistence crops are also grown here. Sugar, the only other important export crop from this region is produced along the lower reaches of the Catumbela and Coporola rivers. Some Arabica coffee is produced around Ganda and Bié.

14. The southern region is mainly suitable for cattle raising. It is estimated that there are already more than one and a quarter million head of cattle in this area, most of which are African owned. In recent years government measures have been introduced to build up a livestock industry. A refrigerated packing plant has been established at Moçamedes, veterinary services and research have been expanded, concessions of land for cattle ranching are being encouraged through provision of government loans. It is reported that a German-owned firm has established a ranch to raise cattle for corned beef.

15. Due to the arid conditions there is little agricultural activity in the extreme southern part of Angola which borders on South West Africa. However, since 1953 the Government has been engaged in developing the Cunene River valley and under an agreement concluded with South West Africa in 1964 the generating and storage capacity at the Matala Dam is being increased and will be used for irrigation purposes (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, paras. 66-68 and ibid., annex II, paras. 124-135).

16. The following table shows the principal crops by districts and the estimated areas of production.

TABLE 1. REGIONS OF PRINCIPAL CROPS AND ESTIMATED AREAS CULTIVATED

	Main districts ^a	Estimated area (hectares)
Cotton	Malanje, Luanda; Cuanza South	36,400 (1963)
Coffee	Uíge, Zaire, Cuanza North, Cuanza South, Cabinda	327,000 (1965)
Sugar cane	Luanda, Malanje, Benguela	10,500 (1964)
Sisal	Cuanza North, Benguela Bié	125,000 (1964)
Wheat	Benguela, Bié, Huambo	17,000 (1942)
Maize	Congo, Luanda, Huambo, Bié, Huíla	560,000 (1942)
Manioc	Congo, Malanje, Benguela, Bié	125,000 (1955)
Coco-nut and palms	Cabinda, Cuanza South, Benguela, Congo	30,000 (1955)
Beans	Malanje, Benguela, Bié, Huíla	100,000 (1955)
Peanuts	Congo, Malanje, Benguela, Bié	6,000 (1955)
Rice	Congo, Malanje	14,000 (1955)

^a The Congo district was divided into Uíge and Zaire in 1961.

17. Most of the important export crops are controlled by European capital, with a predominance of individual settlers or private companies in sisal and coffee and large shareholder companies in cotton and sugar. However, as there is little mechanization in Angola, nearly all the production on European estates and plantations is by African labour. Latest estimates (1965) show that there are probably some 175,000 African wage earners employed in agriculture, including 123,000 in coffee, 25,000 in sisal and 15,000 in sugar. In addition, to producing almost all the traditional food crops, maize, manioc, sweet potatoes, oil palm, beans and peanuts, some 36,000 Africans grow almost all the cotton, and 60,000 Africans produce on their own account about one quarter of the coffee exported.

18. There are no accurate production figures available for export crops or food crops. However, the relatively small quantities of the export crops retained in the Territory are either fixed by quota (cotton and sugar) or are relatively insignificant (coffee, and sisal up to 1965). For African-produced food crops, on the other hand, exports generally represent surpluses purchased, but usually only from areas accessible to transportation lines. Nevertheless, these are the only data available on the activities in the African subsistence sector.

19. Since the end of World War II the pattern of production has been characterized by a sharp increase in export crops, especially of coffee and sisal (see table 17). While this change was stimulated in the 1950's by favourable world prices, it has always been the Government's policy to encourage production and export of high unit-price crops, and as reported previously (A/6000/Rev.1 chap. V, annex II), to increase European settlement. This change in the pattern of production has had two important results. First, the major part of Angola's export trade is now oriented towards foreign markets. (In 1964, for instance, over half of the Territory's coffee exports and about one quarter of the total exports by value went to the United States of America). Second, because of the low unit price on the world market of traditionally African-grown food crops, these crops have lost their importance both in the Territory's external trade (see table 18) and as a source of Territorial revenue, so that African agriculture has been almost neglected in government planning.

20. Available statistics show, for instance, that between 1944 and 1960, the average annual volume of exports of six traditionally African-grown food crops (peanuts, rice, manioc, palm products, maize and beans) increased by some 50 per cent, from 135,000 tons to 208,000 tons, but exports of cash crops (comprising sugar, cotton lint, coffee, coconut and sisal) doubled, rising from an annual average of 98,000 tons to 206,000 tons. On the other hand, whereas in 1944 the value of the food crops exported was approximately two fifths that of the cash crops (147 million and 241 million escudos respectively), by 1960 the former was only one fifth of the latter. This trend has become even more marked since 1960. By 1964, the value of the exports of the six food crops was only about one tenth of the value of the five cash crops (364 million compared with 3,527 million).

21. Since the introduction of the Transitional Development Plan 1965-1967, greater emphasis is being given to stimulating increased African production by reducing export tariffs and by raising the prices paid to producers who are now required to sell their crops in government supervised rural markets (see paras. 153 and 178 below).

II. PRODUCTION, PROCESSING AND MARKETING OF MAJOR CROPS

A. Coffee

General

22. Coffee growing in Angola dates back to the last century and the first exports were made around 1830. After the First World War government protective measures were introduced and production rose steadily. Except for the period of the 1930s when the world coffee market was generally affected by price fluctuations, coffee exports from Angola have continued to increase. In 1963-1964, with an annual production of some 180,000 tons, Angola became the third largest coffee producer after Brazil and Colombia accounting for 5.7 per cent of the world's coffee exports.

23. The earliest coffee plantations were in Ambriz, Massango and Ambaca. The main coffee growing areas lie in the north-western quadrant of the Territory and about 100 km. inland from the coast in a band varying from 50 to 200 km. in width and between 400 and 1,200 metres above sea level. As seen in table 2, the districts of Uíge, Cuanza North and Cuanza South produce almost all the coffee and in 1960 accounted for over 92 per cent of the total production.

24. Almost all the coffee grown in Angola is of the Robusta type. Arabica coffees make up less than 1 per cent of the total and are mostly grown along the Benguela Railway at heights of about 1,200 to 1,400 metres with Ganda and Bié as the most important centres.

Organization of production

25. Coffee is grown on European-owned plantations with African labour and by individuals, both European and African. From 1955 to 1961 the number of European growers increased from about 600 to over 2,000, the total area under cultivation on European-owned farms increased from 198,000 to 420,003 hectares, and total production (Europeans and Africans) from 69,000 to 169,000 tons (see table 2).

26. In 1963 almost three quarters of the European-owned coffee farms were 100 hectares or more in size, 43 per cent of the coffee farms were more than 300 hectares in area, 30 per cent were between 100 and 300 hectares and 27 per cent were under 100 hectares. The African coffee farms averaged between one and two hectares. In 1964, the area under coffee was reported to be 500,000 hectares, including 130,000 hectares reported to be under African cultivation.

27. As reported previously (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex II, paras. 68-80), between 1956 and 1961 European land holdings in the main coffee-growing districts increased by almost one half million hectares, and the area under coffee by 150,000 hectares. With the influx of new settlers, land especially suitable for coffee became so valuable it was often occupied by force, leading to complicated litigation, not only between parties claiming the land and marking their own boundaries, but also disputes involving land rights of Africans. Land on which Africans had grown coffee was sometimes expropriated, creating grievances which the Sub-Committee on the Situation in Angola considered had contributed to the 1961 uprising.^c

28. There is no recent data on the total investment in coffee in Angola by Portuguese and other foreign interests. Data for 1945 showed that of the 206 million angolars^d then invested, about two thirds was Portuguese owned, with an average investment of 326 angolars per hectare. Investments by non-Portuguese foreign interests averaged 1,152 angolars per hectare. In 1957 it was estimated that for each hectare of coffee on European farms the capital needed was 2,830 escudos. Based on this figure, the capital investment in 1957 would have been approximately three quarters of a billion escudos ($US24 million).

29. At present the largest coffee-producing company is the Companhia Angolana de Agricultura, commonly known as CADA.^e (See para. 67 below.) According to information published in 1963, the company had a registered capital of 225 million escudos; it owned eighteen coffee plantations including Boa Estrada, which has an area of about 60,000 hectares and employed 280 Europeans and 11,580 Africans. In 1964 the company was reported to have raised its capital to provide for the participation of foreign interests concerned with the manufacture of soluble coffees. In that year the company produced 11,000 tons of coffee. CADA also owns palm and coconut plantations.

^c Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixteenth Session, Supplement No. 16 (A/4978), paras. 336-342.

^d The angolar was the local currency at that time and was officially equal to one escudo in value.

^e According to Kavalam Madhu Panikkar (in Angola in Flames, London 1962, p. 59), the Companhia Angolana de Agricultura was originally a British controlled firm which occupied 17,000 square kilometres and which was taken over under the nationalization law of 1948.

30. There is no detailed information on the ownership of the coffee plantations and processing plants in Angola. Most of the large plantations also produce other export crops. According to the Angola Industrial Guide of 1961, coffee factories and processing and decortication plants in Angola included:

Name of company or owner	District	Other information
Companhia da Africa Occidental Portuguesa (C.A.O.P.)	Cuanza North	Capital: 50 million escudos
Companhia de Cabinda	Cabinda	Capital: 40 million escudos
Sociedade Agrícola do Lucala	Cuanza North	Capital: 18 million escudos. It has 4,500 hectares of coffee and other plantations. The company is part of a group known as Organizações Chibera, which is also owner of sugar plantations at Bom Jesus
Companhia do Ambriz S.A.R.L.		Capital: 11.5 million. This company was also a cotton concessionaire
Sociedade Cafeicultora Soual	Luanda	Capital: 10 million escudos
Sociedade Agrícola do Encoge-Micula Mário Cunha	Luanda	Capital: 10 million escudos. The company has 1.5 million coffee trees which were reported to produce 500-600 tons of coffee annually. It also owns palm and banana plantations. Total operations in 1960 amounted to 21.5 million escudos
Mário Cunha	Novo Redondo	Capital: 10 million escudos
Sociedade Algodoeira de Fomento Colonial (Textang)	Cuanza North	(See section D). The Sociedade Algodoeira de Fomento Colonial owns a controlling interest of 10 million escudos in the Cooperativa dos Produtores e Exportadores de Café
Sociedade Comercial e Agrícola Rimaga	Uíge	Capital: 4 million escudos. In 1960 the company's operations amounted to 67.9 million escudos, with 859,000 escudos profits; in 1961 its operations amounted to 66.7 million escudos and profits were 739,000 escudos. In 1963 operations dropped to 55.8 million escudos and the company reported a loss of 3.2 million escudos
Empresa Agro-Industrial de Angola (Emangola)	Cuanza North	Owns coffee and sisal plantations and cotton concessions

31. The Colonial Coffee Export Board (Junta de Exportação do Café Colonial)¹ reported that in 1941, out of a total of 23,742,262 kg. of coffee produced, African production accounted for 6,646,000 kg. or approximately 39 per cent of the total. Subsequently, with assistance, European production increased by 70 per cent in the next four years, and in 1945 amounted to 29,232,000 tons. In the same period African production increased only 27 per cent, and in 1945 accounted for only 28.5 per cent of the total. From 1945 to 1961, the proportion of African production remained between 25 and 30 per cent.

32. To encourage African coffee growers, the Governor-General in January 1956 issued an order which an African indígena who owned more than 3,000 coffee plants² was considered to be a coffee grower and was exempt from the labour requirement. The Coffee Export Board was made responsible for registered indigenous growers who either had more than 3,000 plants, or who had a coffee farm of more than one hectare in area. Africans meeting these conditions received what was known as a "título M/J". If, because of the quantity and value of the crop he produced, an African became liable to pay the tax on agricultural enterprises (imposto sobre explorações),³ he was then exempt from the annual personal tax levied on Africans. There are no statistics showing how many Africans were officially recognized as coffee growers as a result of those procedures. The number of Africans employed on coffee farms increased from 45,000 in 1954 to almost 90,000 in 1959. In 1965 it was reported that there were 130,000 Africans employed in coffee and 60,000 growers, each with an average of about 2 hectares.

¹ Ramos De Sousa, Angola, Junta de Exportação do Café Colonial em Angola, Cinco Anos de Actividade (Luanda, 1954).

² African growers usually plant some 1,500 coffee trees per hectare, as compared with approximately 1,000 trees per hectare on European plantations.

³ Also levied on livestock, forestry and fishing enterprises.

5 in Luanda, 1 in Cabinda, 50 in the Congo district (which has since been divided into Uíge and Zaire districts), 74 in Cuanza North, and 14 in Cuanza South. Apart from CADA the large companies growing coffee are the following:

Government regulation and controls

33. As reported in the previous paper on organization and controls, coffee as a major export crop earning foreign currency was also subject until 1961 to detailed government regulation and control through the Colonial Coffee Export Board (Junta de Exportação do Café Colonial (JEC)) which was set up in 1940 with headquarters in Lisbon (Decree 30,714, 29 August 1940). Under the authority of the Ministry for the Colonies as regards activities in the Territories and under the Ministry of Commerce and Industry as regards its activities in Portugal, the Board was responsible for: (a) production of coffee in all the Overseas Territories; (b) co-ordination and production and marketing through the regulation of prices and control over import and export quotas; (c) supplies for Portugal's domestic market; and (d) Portugal's external coffee policy.

34. In the Territories, the Board had the authority to promote or to restrict the production of coffee; to fix the price of purchase from indigenous growers and other prices relating to the various stages of marketing and exporting of coffee; and to regulate the quantities and quality of coffee exported to Portugal, the other Overseas Territories and foreign countries. It was responsible for grading coffee, for improving the quality produced, and for providing financial assistance to growers either directly or through private banks. In Territories where no special bodies had been established the Board was responsible for the regulation of coffee imports.

35. The Colonial Coffee Export Board was composed of a president and vice-president designated by the Minister for the Colonies, and three members, one representing colonial coffee exporters, one representing coffee importers in Portugal (designated by the Grémio dos Armazenistas e Retalhistas de Mercadorias) and one representing the Corporative Technical Council of Commerce and Industry. The Junta had its headquarters in Lisbon, but its main activities were in Angola where its local "delegation" (delegação) had a staff of over 150 persons in 1960. It also had local "delegations" in São Tomé and Cape Verde. The Colonial Coffee Export Board derived its revenue from: special taxes on exported coffee; import duties consisting of 6 centavos per/kg. on Robusta coffee, 25 centavos per/kg. and Arabica coffees and 25 centavos on foreign coffees; export duties; special allocations for coffee development; and fines and interest on initial capital. In 1959, the last year for which such data are available, the Coffee Export Board's receipts from levies on coffee in Angola was over 16 million escudos, and it received another 10 million escudos for the Coffee Propagation Fund. Its total operating budget was more than 58 million escudos.¹

36. The Board's functions in Portugal corresponded to those of an import regulatory commission (described in the paper on organization and Government policy). It was responsible for establishing the annual quotas of coffee to be supplied to Portugal from the Overseas Territories and from foreign sources; authorizing the export of coffee from Portugal; fixing consumer prices for all coffee (according to grade and type) in all national Territory, and regulating the coffee prices in industry and commerce in co-operation with the Grémio dos Armazenistas e de Retalhistas de Mercadorias (Grémio of Warehouse Owners and Retail Grocers).

37. In Portugal, coffee imported from the Overseas Territories had to be sold on the commodity market in Lisbon in accordance with the regulations and minimum prices set by the Board. Only those members of the Grémio of Warehouse Owners and Retail Grocers who dealt in coffee were permitted to buy coffee from the market and retail it. However, if there was any coffee left over on the commodity market, it was allocated among the grocers, who had to take up amounts in the same proportion as their annual estimated sales quotas.

38. Almost all of the coffee consumed in Portugal is imported from the Overseas Territories, with Angola supplying more than 90 per cent of the total. The quota of coffee that Angola exporters must ship to Portugal is set each year. In the 1940s exporters had to reserve 25 per cent of their coffee exports for Portugal, of which 50 per cent had to consist of first class coffee, 30 per cent of second class and 20 per cent of third class coffee. Since 1955, in order to increase exports of first class coffees to foreign destinations, Portugal's quota has been limited mainly to second and third class coffees. In 1958, for instance, exporters had to deliver to Portugal 5 per cent of their quota in the form of first class coffees, 15 per cent of the second class, and 25 per cent of the third class.

39. As with other agricultural products of the Overseas Territories (e.g. cotton), the price of Angolan coffee for Portugal was fixed for many years at a level considerably below world market prices and often also below the Angolan F.O.B. prices for exports to other countries. In 1954-1955, for instance, when international coffee prices were at an all-time high, the price quoted on foreign markets for first class Ambriz coffee being 475 escudos per 15 kg., the price in Lisbon was only 300 escudos, which was 10 per cent lower than the f.o.b. price in Angola, and 37 per cent lower than the foreign market price. In recent years, however, coffee for domestic consumption in Portugal has been sold on the Lisbon market subject only to a maximum price.

40. Under the regulations promulgated in 1941 (Decree 31,221, 16 April) all European coffee producers in the Overseas Territories and traders (exporters, re-exporters and consigners) of Portuguese or colonial coffees, as well as all enterprises concerned with import, wholesale and distribution of coffee had to register with the Coffee Export Board. Registration fees were 1,000 escudos for exporters; 2,500 escudos for producer-exporters; 250 escudos for producers who were not exporters and 100 escudos for all others in retail activities. In addition to the Board itself, only registered European producers and traders were permitted to export coffee from the Territories or import coffee into Portugal. The Board could however, with the approval of the two Ministries concerned (see para. 33 above), temporarily suspend all exports by private concerns and become the sole agent for such activities (Decree Law 30,715, article 5).

41. One of the special tasks of the Coffee Export Board was to determine officially the areas to be recognized as African coffee lands and register Africans who qualified as African coffee growers (see para. 32 above). In the 1940s special teams or brigadas cafeícolas were established by the Board which went from village to village to count the number of coffee trees and register the African growers who either cultivated a minimum area or grew a minimum number of coffee plants. As a general rule the Board did not recognize as coffee growers those who merely grew some coffee on widely separated plots, an African coffee grower being defined as one to whom the Board assigned, under an agreement, a piece of land of a certain size on which he had to grow coffee and other approved crops so that the land provided a living. A recognized coffee grower was given a card certifying him as such; this exempted him from recruitment and guaranteed his remaining on the land and also entitled him to technical and financial assistance from the Board.

42. Among its other powers, the Board was authorized to occupy any State lands when necessary for carrying out its functions, or for the purpose of establishing demonstration farms. It also raised and distributed coffee plants, distributed insecticides and fertilizers and provided technical advisory services to coffee growers.

43. Although the actual production and trading of coffee remained in the hands of private enterprise, in effect, through the Colonial Coffee Export Board, the Government controlled all coffee trading activities in the Territories. Each year the Board fixed the minimum export prices (both f.o.b. Angola and c.i.f. Lisbon) for different grades of coffee, taking into account domestic and foreign production, internal consumption needs and conditions of the world market.

44. As a general rule, the Coffee Export Board only fixed the minimum prices, and exporters were allowed to sell to foreign countries at whatever price they could obtain, provided it was not below the minimum. In practice, since the fixed export prices of coffee supplied to Portugal were usually set at a discount, exporters usually had to obtain a better price than the minimum set by the Board for their foreign exports in order to cover the difference.

45. Apart from its regulatory functions the Colonial Coffee Export Board also assumed the functions of a marketing board in order to help producers. In 1960, when world coffee prices dropped to a new low, the Board instituted a system of warrants under which growers, while retaining title to the coffee, were paid up to 70 per cent of the export value of coffee they delivered for storage in special warehouses (Decree 42,693, 2 December 1959, and Angola, Order 11,305, 3 August 1960). For this purpose the Board contracted a loan of 50 million escudos from the Bank of Angola (Legislative Instrument 3,057, 17 August 1960). In 1961, following the uprising in northern Angola which affected almost the entire coffee growing region, in order to provide coffee growers with ready cash and to ensure continued exports, the Board borrowed 150 million escudos from the Bank of Angola to make direct purchases of coffee (Ministerial Legislative Instrument No. 1, 1 April 1961). To prevent exporters from selling below the official minimum, heavy fines were imposed for such violations. Temporary measures were introduced whereby exporters who failed to fill their export quotas for two successive months could be removed from the register, and if they did not deliver their foreign earnings to the Exchange Board they could lose their export quotas. A special consultative group of local exporters and producers was established to advise the Board on these matters and the annual registration of new exporters was limited to half the vacancies resulting from withdrawals.

46. In August 1961, the Colonial Coffee Export Board was replaced by the Coffee Institute, with headquarters in Angola (Decree 43,874 and 43,877, 24 August). The Coffee Institute, like that for cotton, is purely a territorial body and it has no functions concerning the import and sales of coffee in Portugal where an inter-ministerial committee has been established to co-ordinate general policy, to assume responsibility for general controls and over matters pertaining to the International Coffee Agreement. This committee comprises one member representing the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, two members representing the Secretary of State for Commerce, and one member representing the Overseas Investigations Board (Junta de Investigações do Ultramar). It is responsible for deciding on the amount of coffee to be supplied to Portugal each year, for fixing the consumer prices of overseas coffee in Portugal, as well as the prices to industry and the trade.

¹ Nunes Barata, "Localização da Sede dos Organismos de Coordenação Económica no Ultramar", Estudos de Ciências Políticas e Sociais, No. 54 (Lisbon 1961), pp. 70-73.

47. The Institute is in charge of a director and a deputy director, appointed by the Minister of the Overseas Territories. They must have received higher education in fields related to the work of the Institute. The Institute also has a general council, which comprises, the director and deputy director, and three other members representing interests of the producing and export sectors and the economic services of the Territory.

48. As an economic co-ordinating body, the Institute is required to supervise coffee production, with a view to improving the quality and regulating production so as to meet the needs for economic development and equilibrium. It is responsible for: (a) regulating coffee trade and prices within the Territory to ensure a fair share of profits to producers and traders and to maintain the Territory's "economic equilibrium"; (b) protecting and advancing the economic and social welfare of small producers and promoting organizations such as producers co-operatives; (c) grading coffee for export, fixing export prices and assigning quotas for different grades of coffee to each exporter; and (d) providing improved seeds, insecticides, tools and other services to producers to increase the level of productivity.

49. Whereas previously only European producers were registered with the Coffee Export Board under the regulations of the Coffee Institute (Angola, Order 13,112, 1 February 1964), all producers whose farms (lavouras) exceed one hectare now have to register. Registration fees for coffee growers have been lowered. For growers with one to five hectares no fee is charged; for those with six to ten hectares the fee is 25 escudos; from eleven to twenty hectares, 50 escudos and above twenty hectares it is 250 escudos. Each year all growers must report their production to the Institute.

50. All exporters and traders are required to register with the Institute and to revalidate their status annually. The registration fee is 1,000 escudos. In addition to the Institute itself only registered traders and exporters may engage in such activities. Under a new provision, co-operative societies of producers, or other types of associations of producers, are exempt from payment of the registration fee.

51. In order to ensure uniform quality, all coffee destined for export has to pass through the Institute's warehouses where it is examined, its grading is checked and a certificate is then issued for export. As before, minimum export prices of different grades of coffee are established by the Governor-General on the advice of the Institute and published from time to time.

52. Exporters must comply with regulations and other measures established by the Institute and infractions are subject to penalties. Traders who export coffee below the established minimum prices are fined not less than half the value of the total transaction. The amount of the fine depends on the gravity of the infraction and the effect on the internal and external markets; the volume of the transaction and whether the act was to the benefit of foreign interests or detrimental to the economy of the Territory.

Production, exports and destination of exports

53. Coffee production in Angola has increased steadily over the past twenty-five years. Since 1955, however, Angola's production has increased more rapidly than the world output, and as a result, Angola's share in world production rose from 2.61 per cent in the period 1955-1959 to 4.54 per cent in 1963.

54. Traditionally most of the coffee produced in Angola has been exported. The volume of annual exports has increased with production, rising from an average of 22,463 tons in the period 1941-1945 to 78,546 tons in the period 1956-1960. Since then exports have almost doubled, reaching 136,000 tons in 1963.

55. Since the early 1950's the United States of America has been the principal buyer of Angolan coffee. Over the past ten years, average annual purchases by the United States have accounted for more than half of the total exports, and in 1964 were valued at more than $US50 million. The Netherlands accounts for an average ranging between 7 and 12 per cent. In 1964, the United Kingdom, the Federal Republic of Germany and Belgium with Luxembourg together account for about 12 per cent (table 4).

The economic role of coffee

56. Before the Second World War, over 40 per cent of Angola's visible exports (by value) went to Portugal which in turn supplied the same proportion of the Territory's visible imports. At that time, sugar, nearly all of which went to Portugal (see section C below) held the first place in value of the Territory's exports. In the post-war period, coffee has far outstripped all other exports in importance, accounting for an average of 35-40 per cent of the combined value of exports in the period 1956-1961 and almost 50 per cent in 1964 (see table 18).

57. The growing importance of coffee as its major export has changed the pattern of the Territory's external trade by orienting it more towards the United States of America and European countries other than Portugal. In 1963, for instance, by value 22.3 per cent of Angola's exports went to Portugal, 47.4 per cent to Western European countries and 19.5 per cent to the United States. This has made Angola an important source of foreign exchange. As most of the foreign exchange is retained in Portugal through the exchange control regulation in force, Angola's coffee makes a substantial contribution to Portugal's balance of payments outside the escudo zone.

58. Initially in 1931 (Decree 19,773) when the Exchange Fund was first established, 75 per cent of the value of goods exported to foreign countries had to be paid into the Fund. The same regulations applied to goods exported to Portugal since the local currency of Angola, theoretically on par with the metropolitan escudo, was not (and is not now) freely convertible. In 1932 (Decree 20,694) the proportion was raised to 90 per cent. Although there are no details as to the exact foreign currency earnings from coffee, data published in 1960 showed that between 1948 and 1957 Angola's exports amounted to 27 million contos, of which the equivalent of 18.3 million contos ($US600 million) were paid into the Exchange Fund.¹

59. Apart from the ordinary export duties,² coffee has also been subject to various taxes from time to time. Since 1936 (Decree 27,294, 30 November) there has been a 1.5 per cent ad valorem duty on coffee for the Angola Development Fund, and after 1952 coffee became subject to a tax (imposto de sobrevalorização) based on the increase in value over the 1949 level. This tax is set each month by the Customs Technical Council and varies with the world prices; it also varies according to destination. In July 1960, for instance, for first class Arabica coffee the special tax (imposto de sobrevalorização) on 15 kg. was 36 escudos when exported to foreign countries, 54.70 for exports to other Territories and 34.5 to Portugal. For Robusta coffee from Cazengo it was 8.8 escudos, 20.60 escudos and 6.5 escudos respectively.

60. In 1957 (Order 16,396, 2 September 1957) the surtaxes on exports of coffee were altered to encourage more exports of first quality coffees. The new rates established were 9.5 per cent ad valorem for first class coffee; 11.5 per cent for second class coffee; and 15.5 per cent for third class coffee and coffees for industrial use. In addition there was a surtax of 10 centavos per kilogramme levied on all coffees which went into a special Coffee Propagation Fund.

¹ "A Questão Cambial", Actividade Económica de Angola, Jan./Aug. 1961, p. 85.

² In 1956, the normal export tariff was 1 per cent ad valorem plus 11.5 per cent ad valorem surtax for coffee exported to foreign ports; for coffee exported to Portugal the normal duty was 8 per cent ad valorem.

61. Following the establishment of the Coffee Institute, the Coffee Propagation Fund was renamed the Coffee Development and Propagation Fund and placed under the Institute to provide the Fund with more revenue, the customs paid it 20 centavos per each kilogramme of third class coffee exported (Order 18,729, 15 September 1961).

62. In 1962 (Legislative Instrument 3,326, 31 December 1962) a further 25 centavos per kilogramme tax was levied on coffee to provide revenue for the Civil Defence and Volunteer Corp. Because of the continued drop in coffee prices, in 1963 (Legislative Instrument 3,334, 26 January 1963), all coffee below first and second qualities was exempted from the surtax as well as from the 1.5 per cent Development Fund tax and the 10 centavos Coffee Propagation Fund tax. Nevertheless, for 1963, revenue from the special taxes on coffee (excluding the normal export duty) totalled more than 100 million escudos ($US2.5 million), which included 14 million escudos from the 10 centavos surtax, 27 million escudos from the special 1.5 per cent ad valorem tax, 21.4 million escudos from the sobrevalorização tax, and over 39 million escudos from the 25 centavos tax for the Civil Defence and Volunteer Corp. When coffee prices were at their peak in the mid 1950s, the territorial revenue from the sobrevalorização tax alone averaged some 80 million escudos annually.

63. Part of the revenue derived from coffee is used for the ordinary operating expenses of the regulatory body. In 1965, the Coffee Institute of Angola had a total budget of 635 million escudos. Of this amount, its ordinary revenue was 52.4 million escudos, comprising 4.4 million from the previous budgetary year, 1 million escudos from the customs refund of 20 centavos per kilogramme third class coffee and 12 million escudos from other statutory levies on coffee. Extraordinary receipts totalling 583 million escudos include 300 million escudos from sales of coffee, a loan of 200 million escudos and coffee warrants valued at 80 million escudos.

64. More than any other single development coffee, as a new source of wealth, has attracted increasing numbers of Portuguese settlers to Angola. Census figures show that during the ten-year period 1950-1960, the European population increased by over 100,000. In Uíge district it increased by 569 per cent, in Cuanza North by 230 per cent, in Cuanza South by 211 per cent and in Benguela by 119 per cent. From 1956 to 1962 the number of coffee farmers increased from 638 to over 2,000. More significantly, as described previously (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex II), in this period large areas of land were conceded to non-African interests in the major coffee growing regions: 157,000 hectares in Cuanza North, 113,000 in Cuanza South and 146,000 in the former Congo district. In addition, over 100,000 hectares of concessions were granted in the district of Luanda. Some of the government sponsored new settlements are based on coffee as the major cash crop. These include settlements at Loge Valley, Banga (with settlers from Cape Verde) and Balongongo. As will be seen below, coffee has made it possible for Portuguese settlers in Angola to earn a much higher income than the average farmer in Portugal. Coffee has also contributed to the earnings of absentee estate owners and shareholders in coffee companies. Coffee profits are reported to have contributed, for instance, to real estate development in Lisbon, including much of the construction along the Avenida de Roma, one of the modern arteries of the city.¹

65. There are various estimates of the average income from coffee. In 1957, the net income per acre under normal conditions of coffee growing in the north was $US30 per acre or $US75 per hectare at 1957 prices.² A Portuguese study published in 1957³ cited two different calculations of the cost of production per kilogramme of coffee. Assuming a capital cost of 2,830 escudos per hectare, with an annual average production of 300 kg., the cost per/kg. was found to be 10.32 escudos comprised as follows: 4 escudos for labour, 32 centavos for hulling and preparation of coffee, 30 centavos for packaging and labelling, 4.85 escudos for salaries of European personnel, and 85 centavos representing interest on capital. In this calculation 80 per cent of the cost is for labour and presumably part of this is for the European farm owner himself. The other calculation arrived at an ex-farm cost of 8.4 escudos per kilogramme based on an assumption of an annual operation cost of 2,778 escudos per hectare.

66. In order to calculate the return to the producer and/or exporter, it is necessary to add the additional costs prior to export. Taking the lower estimate of costs ex-farm as a basis and adding the transportation cost of 60 centavos per/kg., the export tariff of 15.04 per cent ad valorem on market value and additional levies totalling 60 centavos per/kg., the f.o.b. Angola cost per/kg. became 15 escudos. At the 1957 average f.o.b. price of 19.7 escudos per/kg. the net profit would have been 5 escudos per/kg. or 2,000 escudos per hectare. For the average European farm owner with at least 100 hectares, the net income was 200,000 escudos, or approximately $US7,000.

67. In 1964, the average export price per ton of coffee was 20,600 escudos, so that on European farms producing an average of 400 kg. per hectare, the gross income per hectare was 8,000 escudos or approximately $US280. An average European farmer with 100 hectares of coffee under cultivation would therefore have an annual gross income of $US28,000. As already noted above, in 1963 almost three quarters of the European coffee farms had 100 hectares or more under cultivation. At the average export price of 20,600 escudos, for a company such as CADA exporting 10,000 tons, its gross income from coffee alone would amount to over 200 million escudos or about $US65 million. CADA's net profits in 1964 from all operations was 39.6 million escudos and dividends paid out amounted to 28.5 million escudos.

68. According to figures published in 1965, at Loge Valley the settler families each received an income of 40,000 escudos from coffee alone and at Balongongo, 20,000 escudos.⁴

69. For Africans coffee has opened up a new, though not unlimited, source of income since even under the new land concession legislation (see A/6000/Rev.1, chap V, annex II) Africans living in the regedorias cannot own land on the same basis as Europeans, and moreover, they generally cannot export their produce themselves⁵ but have to sell to trader-exporters in supervised rural markets. According to a Portuguese source, in 1965 African coffee growers received an average gross return of 5,000 escudos per hectare when the price paid was 10 escudos per kilogramme.⁶ This figure seems high as most Portuguese writers estimate that Africans produce an average of 350 kg of coffee per hectare, and the price Africans receive for their coffee depends on the quality, size and grade of the coffee beans they market, and on the price paid by the trade-exporters.

Recent developments

70. Since 1958 Portugal has been a party to the International Coffee Agreement which includes thirty-two exporter countries covering 95 per cent of the world Robusta coffee output, and twenty-two importers covering 94 per cent of world consumption. The basic total world quota is fixed at 45,898,183 sacks⁷ (2.85 million tons) and Angola's basic quota is 4.77 per cent, i.e., 2,188,648 sacks. As a developing country, Angola's quota since 1962 has increased slightly each year, rising from 1,904,678 sacks in 1961-1962 to 2,045,213 sacks in 1964-1965 and to 2,064,127 in 1965-1966. With the

¹ Irene S. Donegan, "Coffee Trade, Coffee regions and Coffee ports in Angola", Economic Geography, vol. 37, No. 4 (October 1961), p. 36.

² Ibid. Information provided by the head of the Colonial Coffee Export Board's Experimental Station at Carmona.

³ "Aspectos económicos da cafeicultura angolana", Revista Portuguesa do Café, No. 13 (March 1957), quoted in Alfredo de Sousa: "Ensaio de análise económica do café", Estudos de Ciências Políticas e Sociais, No. 17 (1960).

⁴ Actualidade Económica de Angola, 7 October 1965.

⁵ This is because Africans usually cannot meet the requirements to register as exporters. Most of them, also do not produce more than one ton of coffee whereas in the 1965-1966 season, for instance, the Coffee Institute decided to issue export quotas only to those whose deliveries were expected to total more than 150 tons or 2,500 sacks.

⁶ Boletim Geral do Ultramar, June 1965, p. 219.

⁷ 60 kg. each.

exception of the last year, Angola's exports to traditional markets have exceeded its quota and at the same time additional amounts have been sold in "new" markets, i.e., markets not covered by the Agreement, which still hold potential for expansion. In 1965, for instance, Portugal concluded an agreement with South Africa increasing Angolan coffee exports from 300 to 3,500 tons annually to replace the Robusta coffees which South Africa had formerly imported from Uganda.

71. According to recent information, Angola's 1966-1967 production is expected to reach 3,100,000 sacks. As its quota is 2,214,000 sacks, after deducting its own consumption (50,000 sacks), its exports to Portugal (300,00 sacks) and exports to the other Overseas Territories (10,000 sacks),^a it will have a surplus of 526,000 sacks. Because of this anticipated surplus, in January 1966 the Government introduced measures (Legislative Instrument 3,606) granting tariff rebates in respect of second quality and unspecified coffee exported to new markets. The still increasing output has also given further impetus to the establishment of a soluble coffee industry. The Sociedade Comercial e Agrícola Maria Celeste which was authorized in 1963 to establish a soluble coffee factory capable of processing 10,000 tons of green coffee annually (equivalent to a production of 2,740 tons of soluble coffee), was reported in 1965 to be seeking investment from United States coffee interests.

^a Because Portugal is party to the International Coffee Agreement, its own consumption and exports to the other Territories under Portuguese administration are not charged against Angola's quota.

72. While coffee has brought increased prosperity to the Territory, it has also created problems. One of the most serious results due to the over concentration on coffee has been the decline in production of important food crops, traditionally grown by Africans. Some measures were introduced in 1965 with a view to stimulating increased production from the traditional sector; and early in 1966 (Legislative Instrument 3,623, 7 February) the Government decided to prohibit the planting of new areas with Robusta coffee.

TABLE 2. ANGOLA: COFFEE PRODUCTION

Year	Number of European growers	Number of indigenous employed by Europeans	Total area cultivated	Output
				Quantity (tons)			Distribution
				Total	Europeans	African	Percentage European	Percentage Africans
1954	418	44,773	258,047	44,723	30,971	13,752	69.25	30.75
1955	597	54,583	197,517	68,565	49,640	18,925	72.40	27.60
1956	638	85,467	251,671	84,893	63,200	21,693	74.45	25.55
1957	1,490	90,883	255,646	78,016	58,080	19,936	74.45	25.55
1958	1,679	86,360	257,962	87,993	65,772	22,221	74.45	25.55
1959	2,012	89,545	266,185	97,307
1960	90,000	378,050	168,552
1961	90,000	420,003	168,558

SOURCE: Angola, Anuário Estatístico, 1954-1962. The 1962 volume repeats the data for 1959.

TABLE 3. ANGOLA: GROWTH OF COFFEE PRODUCTION IN MAIN DISTRICTS, 1955 AND 1960

	1955				1960
	Area		Yield		Area		Yield
	Hectares	Per cent	Tons	Per cent	Hectares	Per cent	Tons	Per cent
Territory total	197,517	100	68,565	100	378,050	100	160,000	100
Uige ^a	57,143	29	20,000	29	93,682	25	30,800	19
Cuanza North	91,428	46	32,000	47	128,148	34	50,100	31
Cuanza South	40,043	20	14,000	20	125,272	33	74,600	47
TOTAL OF THREE DISTRICTS	188,614	95	66,000	96	347,122	92	155,500	97

^a The data for 1955 are for the Congo district, which then comprised the present Uige and Zaire districts.

TABLE 4. ANGOLA—COFFEE: EXPORTS AND PRINCIPAL DESTINATIONS, 1955-1964

Year	Total exports			Destinations
	Value			Portugal		United States	Netherlands	Fed. Rep. of Germany	Belgium-Luxembourg	United Kingdom
	Quantity (thousand tons)	Million escudos	Percentage of total exports	Tons	Per cent	(per cent)	(per cent)	(per cent)	(per cent)	(per cent)
	(1)	(2)	(3)	(4)	(5)	(6)	(7)	(8)	(9)	(10)
1955	37.0	856	30.50	3,282	8.88	67.07	14.56	1.43	1.13	1.31
1956	66.5	1,243	37.78	4,452	6.69	45.92	20.42	1.69	2.94	0.40
1957	72.2	1,421	42.24	7,164	9.92	58.95	17.85	1.51	2.48	0.54
1958	77.3	1,506	40.82	13,073	16.91	52.55	20.23	0.97	2.22	1.57
1959	89.0	1,388	38.68	9,710	10.91	59.66	20.24	1.65	1.98	0.90
1960	87.2	1,264	35.45	12,200	13.99	52.19	21.16	2.09	1.71	0.82
1961	118.1	1,399	36.10	13,882	11.75	55.54	23.35	2.69	1.75	0.30
1962	156.9	1,864	43.71	11,997	7.65	54.67	20.45	3.68	3.06	1.65
1963	136.4	1,895	40.45	14,485	10.62	44.33	25.66	4.71	4.75	1.07
1964	138.7	2,859	48.73	8,682	6.62	52.97	21.53	3.45	2.51	6.06

SOURCE: All data for 1955-1963 except column (3): Angola: Comércio Externo. Column (3) and 1964: Banco de Angola: Relatório e Contas (1961 and 1964).

B. Sisal

General

73. Sisal is one of Angola's two most valuable export crops. It first gained importance around 1929 when exports totalled 569 tons. Production increased through the 1930's and by the early 1940's annual exports were around 4,000 tons. Since 1944 there has been a sharp rise in production and sisal, which once ranked below maize, sugar, coffee and beans, now holds second place among the Territory's export crops. In 1963 Angola was the fourth producer of world sisal with exports of some 62,000 tons valued at 476 million escudos or about 12 per cent of the Territory's total visible exports. In 1965 Angola ranked third among world producers after Tanzania and Brazil.

74. The main sisal growing areas are on the Benguela plateau, and especially at Ganda and Cubal along the Benguela railway. Sisal is also grown near the lower reaches of the Catumbela River, in the Bocóio concelho, at Quibala and Gabela and also at Libolo and Calulo in Cuanza South district. Between 65-75 per cent of all production is from the Benguela district.

75. The average life of the sisal plant agave sisalana peruviana is about eight years. In some years the area harvested has reached about 80 per cent of that cultivated, but it is usually less. The sisal plant produces about fifty leaves weighing about 1 kilo each, with a 3 per cent fibre content. The fibre yield in main producing countries is about 1 ton per hectare, but in Angola the average has been until recently less than half a ton per hectare due to insufficient replanting. In addition to the fibre the other products are sisal tow and sisal residues all of which are exported.

Organization of production

76. In Angola, sisal is grown exclusively on European-owned plantations, which require substantial investments in equipment, including transport of the sisal to the factory. From 1930 onwards, British and German interests were mainly responsible for developing the sisal industry. During the period 1949-1953, when world prices were high, sisal growers enjoyed a measure of prosperity and were able to pay off previous debts and invest their profits in new equipment and further expansion. By 1957, however, as sisal prices had dropped to 4.09 escudos per kilogramme from the 1951 high of 14.51 escudos per kilogramme, most of the sisal plantations were again operating at a loss.

77. In 1960 there were some 170 growers, with 100,500 hectares of sisal plantations of which 51,307 hectares were in production. Total investment in the plantations and decorticating plants was estimated to be over 1,000 million escudos (Order 10,058, Angola Boletim Oficial, 2 January 1958) with about half of this in the Benguela district alone. About 47 per cent of the sisal growers are located in the Ganda concelho and have 57 per cent of the total area under cultivation. Of the rest of the sisal producers, eleven are in the Huíla district, twelve in Bié, eight in Zaire and Uíge (former Congo district) and ten in Malanje, and the plantations vary from 100 to 2,000 hectares in size. In 1965 there were 200 growers with 125,000 hectares of sisal plantations, employing some 25,000 workers.

78. Little is known of the various sisal producing companies. Among the large agricultural companies which also have sisal plantations are (a) Sociedade Agrícola do Cassequele with about 7,500 hectares; (b) Companhia do Açúcar de Angola S.A.R.L. (CAA) with 7,000 hectares; and (c) Empresa Agro-Industrial de Angola (EMANGOLA).

79. Up to 1965 the only sisal processing in the Territory consisted of drying and decortication. In Angola, an area of 500 hectares is generally considered to be the smallest economic unit for such purposes and most plantations have factories. Producers who do not own factories sell their sisal to others for processing. The number of decorticating factories increased from 69 in 1955 to 115 in 1961, and the amount of capital invested in these factories from 71.9 million to 150.6

million escudos. About 70 per cent of the factories are located in the Benguela district. In 1959 there were four in Luanda, five in Cuanza North, eleven in Cuanza South, three in Malanje, seventy in Benguela, four in Huíla and one each in Bié, Moxico and Huambo. There are no details on the nationality of ownership, however.

80. The processing factories vary in size; most are in the capacity range of 300 kg to four tons per eight hours. The larger plants generally employ between 50 and 100 Africans with several European personnel. The registered capital of these companies varies from 500,000 to 3 or 4 million escudos.

Government regulation and controls

81. Except for regulating f.o.b. prices, export duties and other taxes, in the past there have been no special measures for the control of sisal production and export. Although officially fixed f.o.b. export prices have generally followed the world market trends, no stabilization measures have been introduced.

82. Exports of sisal are subject to: (a) a normal 1 per cent ad valorem export duty; (b) a 5 per cent ad valorem surtax under the 1948 provisions (Decree 37,214, December); and (c) a special tax of 5 centavos per kilogramme for the development fund established in 1936 (Decree 24,294, 30 November 1936). Unlike the larger mining companies which enjoy tax privileges, sisal plantations and factories also pay the imposto sobre explorações^{*} and a complementary tax on income (imposto complementar).

83. The combined effect of the three levies on exports resulted in a tax burden on sisal producers that was in inverse proportion to the export price: it amounted to 7 per cent at a price of 5 escudos/kg., 6.7 per cent at 7 escudos/kg. and 6.5 per cent at 10 escudos/kg. In normal times this system was intended to encourage production for export of the better grades (as in the case of the revised coffee tariffs described above). However, the system is complicated by the fact that export levies on sisal are based on an official customs value (valores aduaneiros) fixed each month by the customs authorities, while the actual f.o.b. prices are set by the External Trade Board and revised every few days to keep pace with world market conditions. When f.o.b. prices drop below the monthly fixed export values, the export levies become higher than the market prices warrant; on the other hand, when the f.o.b. prices rise above the export values, it is the exporters who benefit. Thus the whole system penalizes the producer in a falling market instead of helping him.

84. With the fluctuation of world sisal prices the Government has on different occasions adjusted the export levies on sisal to provide relief to producers and exporters. In 1953, for instance, the various levies on sisal were adjusted in such a way as to provide the greatest relief for sisal exported at a price below 5 escudos/kg. by making it exempt from all levies whatsoever (Decree 39,409, 30 October). At this price the tax relief amounted to 350 escudos per ton. For sisal prices between 5 and 6 escudos exporters were exempted from the special development tax of 5 centavos per kilogramme. Thus at a price of 6 escudos/kg., an exporter paid only the 1 per cent ad valorem export duty. At prices over 6 but not exceeding 7 escudos the exporter paid the 1 per cent ad valorem, the 5 centavo tax, and the ad valorem surtax on a sliding scale. The effect of this was that at 7 escudos/kg. an exporter received a tax reduction of 70 escudos from the total of 470 escudos per ton which he would otherwise have had to pay.

85. By 1955 these measures were inadequate and all export levies on sisal in both Angola and Mozambique were suspended until prices improved (Decree 40,104, 24 March). Then in 1958, as a special measure in Angola the imposto sobre explorações and the complementary tax on sisal income was reduced by 75 per cent.

^{*} See foot-note h above.

SISAL: AVERAGE F.O.B. PRICES OF EXPORTS

Year	Price	Year	Price
1950	8.96	1958	4.13
1951	14.51	1959	5.40
1952	10.87	1960	6.48
1953	5.83	1961	5.36
1954	5.36	1962	5.91
1955	4.79	1963	9.21
1956	4.90	1964	8.32
1957	4.09	1965	5.0-5.25

86. In 1961 (Decree 43,566, 28 March) sisal levies were again revised; the 5 centavo development fund tax was suspended, various exemptions were provided for prices under 7.40 escudos, and as before sisal exported at less than 5 escudos/kg. was exempt from all duties and taxes. However, in 1962 (Legislative Instrument 3,326, 31 December 1962) a special tax of 15 centavos per kilogramme was placed on sisal exports to provide revenue for the newly created Civil Defence and Volunteer Corp. It has been calculated that on 100 tons of third quality sisal exported at 5.15 escudos/kg., export duties were 5,900 escudos and the defence tax was 15,000 escudos. At the 1965 prices, a sisal producer exporting 1,500 tons had to pay 225,000 escudos in defence tax for the Civil Defence and Volunteer Corp and, if his profits exceeded 1 million escudos, he had to pay a further 32,000 escudos under the excess profits defence tax on companies (see chap. V, para. 104). With an average yield of 400 kg. per hectare, net returns of sisal were estimated to vary between 15 and 30 per cent of costs, or an average of some 660 escudos ($US23.00) per ton, after paying all taxes and duties. Net income per ton to producers paying the excess profits tax was 20 escudos less.

87. In November 1965 the 15 centavo defence tax on sisal was abolished and further adjustments made in the export levies following the same pattern as the 1953 measures described above; furthermore, the price at which sisal became exempt from all export levies was raised to 6 escudos.

Production, exports and local consumption

88. Between 1940 and 1950 sisal exports increased from 4,358 tons to 20,644 tons. In the next five years exports doubled and by 1960 were almost 58,000 tons, representing 15.4 per cent of the sisal output of Africa, and 7.4 per cent of the world output. In 1962 exports reached 69,000 tons but have since declined and were only 58,000 tons in 1964 (see table 5).

89. Until very recently almost all the sisal fibre, tow and waste was exported. In the 1940's the United States, France and Belgium were the main clients, but since the mid 1950s Portugal has replaced them. In 1964 it accounted for almost 29,000 tons of sisal or about half of the total exported. The next most important client in 1964 was the Netherlands, accounting for 13.4 per cent (see table 5).

90. Since 1964 there has been an increased demand for sisal as a result of new uses including packing hay in bundles instead of storing it in bulk. In 1965 a sisal rope factory COFIANG (Companhia de Fiação e Cordoaria de Angola, S.A.R.L.) was established in the Benguela district, through the initiative of fifteen sisal producers. The company has an initial registered capital of 30 million escudos and is authorized to increase this to 60 million escudos. The company is expected to employ some 500 persons and have an output of various types of industrial ropes to a total of 3 million contos. The sisal rope section is expected to absorb 30 per cent of the district's sisal production and up to 50 per cent after two years.

TABLE 5. ANGOLA—SISAL: EXPORTS AND PRINCIPAL DESTINATIONS 1955-1964

Year	Exports			Main destinations
	Thousand tons	Million escudos	Percentage of total export value	Portugal		Federal Republic of Germany (per cent)	Belgium-Luxembourg (per cent)	United States (per cent)	France (per cent)	Netherlands (per cent)
	(1)	(2)	(3)	Tons	Per cent	(6)	(7)	(8)	(9)	(10)
1955	40.7	195.2	6.96	3,712	9.12	16.01	7.92	4.16	27.57	9.50
1956	37.3	182.6	5.55	6,677	17.90	7.82	4.95	1.46	37.14	7.56
1957	46.4	190.0	5.65	7,917	17.06	10.31	2.91	7.54	35.56	3.51
1958	51.9	214.0	5.80	10,927	21.05	11.82	2.40	4.25	38.04	3.85
1959	53.5	289.6	8.07	13,186	24.65	8.91	2.65	8.50	22.48	4.01
1960	57.9	375.5	10.53	21,000	36.27	6.76	1.86	1.32	13.71	5.16
1961	58.9	316.1	8.16	21,122	35.86	4.67	1.57	7.88	6.90	6.28
1962	68.9	408.3	9.58	37,249	54.06	3.04	1.23	2.00	4.36	5.81
1963	62.0	577.5	12.33	25,526	41.17	...	3.46	...	9.97	15.27
1964	57.2	479.1	8.17	28,660	50.11	...	4.57	...	4.80	13.62

SOURCES: Figures for 1963 and 1964 are from Banco de Angola: Relatório e Contas, 1964. All other data Angola: Anuário Estatístico, 1962.

C. SugarGeneral

91. Sugar was introduced into Angola in the sixteenth century from Iran and China, and until the end of the nineteenth century was grown in the Territory mainly to produce alcohol. New investments in sugar plantations from Portuguese and foreign sources were made in Angola at the beginning of the twentieth century after sugar from the Overseas Territories was given preferential treatment and a guaranteed market in Portugal.

92. From 1930 onwards Angola's sugar production increased more rapidly, rising from 11,000 tons to 52,000 tons by 1945. During this period Angola supplied about 50 per cent of Portugal's sugar consumption and sugar ranked as one of the Territory's main exports, accounting for about one eighth of their total value. Between 1945 and 1955, Angola's sugar production remained at some 50,000 tons annually, but has gradually increased in recent years. However, sugar is no longer an important export. In 1963 it accounted for less than 2 per cent of the total value of visible exports; out of 68,000 tons of sugar produced in Angola, 42,000 tons were retained for domestic consumption, and only 18,000 tons went to Portugal, accounting for approximately 20 per cent of that country's sugar consumption.

93. Most of the sugar cane grown in Angola is a hybrid type of the Java variety. The main sugar plantations are located along the banks of the Dande River near Caixito, the Cuanza River near Catete, the Quissol region in southern Malanje the Catumbela e Cavaco and the Coporola Rivers in Benguela.

Organization of production

94. In Angola, sugar is produced only on factory owned plantations. Because of the large capital required, production has remained principally in the hands of three European owned multi-activity companies, the Companhia do Açúcar de Angola, the Sociedade Agrícola de Cassequel and the Sociedade de Comércio e Construções. There is also a small sugar factory with its own plantations at Quissol. In 1958 a licence was granted for the establishment of another sugar factory and plantation in Cuanza Sul which, however, never came into operation.

95. The area of sugar plantations, which was just under 11,000 hectares in 1953, (of which 8,700 hectares were fully producing), has not increased in the last decade. Lack of capital and manpower are reported to have restricted expansion, so that, instead, the companies have concentrated on increasing yields. In 1960-1961 the average sugar production was about 85 tons of cane per hectare, with a 5.8 tons/ha. yield of sugar. These yields are considered to be low compared with Java's average production of 120 tons of cane per hectare some years ago. Some Angolan authorities consider that higher yields cannot be obtained in Angola under the existing system of spaced plantations and without the use of fertilizers.^u

96. In 1962 investment in sugar factories and plantations was reported to be 500 million escudos,^v of which about 290 million was in the five sugar factories and a new refinery built in 1958. The sugar companies employed 15,000 Africans and 370 Europeans in 1962.

(a) Companhia do Açúcar de Angola, S.A.R.L. (CAA)

97. The company as it is presently known dates back to 1920 when several smaller plantations were merged under the control of Antonio de Sousa Carneiro Lara (known as Sousa Lara) with an initial capital of 10 million escudos. By 1939 the company had a registered capital of 22.5 million escudos. In addition to 3,500 hectares of sugar plantations it also owned oil palm, sisal and cotton plantations and factories for processing oil seeds and sugar. In 1939 the company's operations yielded 8 million escudos in profits of which 5.6 million were distributed as dividends.

98. The company has its headquarters in Luanda. In 1960 its registered capital was 337.5 million escudos. It had 4,709 hectares of sugar plantations of which 2,410 hectares were at Dombe Grande in the Benguela district, and 2,299 hectares at Tentativa, Dande in the Malange district. The company produces about two fifths of the Territory's total output of sugar; in 1965 it produced 29,075 tons. The company also has 7,000 hectares of sisal plantations and 250,000 oil palms. To irrigate its plantations the company has built a large dam on the Dande River and another on the Coporolo. There are 65 major canals, 2,180 km. of secondary canals and 68 km. of drainage works. There are also 165 km. of plantation rail tracks, 15 locomotives and 980 wagons.

99. In 1960 the company employed 8,500 indigenous workers and 450 Europeans. It had four chapels, three hospitals and maternity clinics.

(b) Sociedade Agrícola do Cassequel

100. The Sociedade Agrícola do Cassequel, commonly known as Cassequel, has its headquarters and sugar factory near Catumbela, on the Benguela Railway line, thirteen miles from the port of Lobito. In 1960 the company had a registered capital of 175 million escudos. In addition to its Cassequel sugar plantations of 9,723 hectares, the company has plantations at Chimbóia in the Ganda concelho (10,730 hectares of sisal and coffee), Loge, in Ambriz concelho (8,778 hectares of oil palms), and in the Cavaca Valley (1,100 hectares of sugar.) It has a concession of 50,000 hectares at Chaimbambo in the Ganda concelho which is used for timber and cattle ranching. The company produces about 40,000 tons of sugar and 3 million litres of alcohol annually. It is the only concern licensed to produce alcohol.

101. Cassequel, as it now exists, was established in 1927 as a result of a merger of the Sociedade Agrícola de Ganda and the British financed Loge Sugar Company. When it first started, it had a factory with an annual capacity of 12,000 tons of sugar. By 1929 Cassequel had a capital of £270,000 (21.6 million escudos) half of which was Portuguese owned and the other half owned by a Briton, Harry Winton, known as the sugar king of Madeira. The company's machinery was also British manufactured. It had 6,000 indigenous workers and had 5,000 hectares under production. According to a report of that period, sugar which would have taken two years to mature in Madeira only took eleven months in Angola.

102. The company has built a large dam at Catumbela to irrigate the plantations, on which most of the work is done mechanically. In 1962 it had 108 km. of plantation rail lines, servicing 1,302 wagonettes, 72 high-powered tractors and 59 ploughs, bulldozers, etc.

(c) Sociedade de Comércio e Construções, S.A.R.L.

103. This company has its headquarters at Bom Jesus in the Luanda district, where its sugar plantations and factory are located. The company is part of the Organizações Chibera, which comprises also the Sociedade Agrícola do Lucala (see above) and the Companhia de Benguela. Little is known of the ownership and history of the Sociedade de Comércio e Construções. The Bom Jesus sugar plantations, located on the banks of the Cuanza River, date back to the early part of this century and up to 1930 were part of the Companhia Angolana de Cazengo. In the mid-1950's new investments amounting to 25 million escudos were made to renew equipment. By 1956 the company had a registered capital of 60 million escudos which it was authorized to raise to 80 million escudos.

104. The Bom Jesus sugar plantations cover an area of 1,400 hectares. The factory capacity is 600 tons per 24 hours and its annual sugar output is around 300 tons.

(d) Quissol

105. The Quissol plantations are located about 15 miles from the town of Malanje in the Maianje district. The plantations also date back to the early part of the century and became the Fábrica Açucareira do Quissol in 1936 under the ownership of António do Couto Pinto. In 1954, the Fábrica became the Sociedade Agrícola do Quissol, S.A.R.L., by which name it is now known, with a registered capital of 15 million escudos. There appear to have been some changes in its organization and registered capital, which in 1961 was 18 million escudos.

Government regulation and controls^w

106. Under the legislation regulating sugar, Angola and Mozambique are guaranteed an equal share of Portugal's domestic market for sugar and each year are allocated quotas based on Portugal's requirements and the anticipated production. Up to 1945 Angola supplied an average of about 50 per cent of the sugar consumed in Portugal. Angola's yearly exports to Portugal, which averaged around 33,000 tons in the recent decade, have not kept pace with Portugal's rising consumption. The share supplied by Angola has dropped from 36 per cent in 1950 to 26 per cent in 1960, 20 per cent in 1963 and 14 per cent in 1964.

107. The Territory's quota is divided between the three larger companies taking into account their anticipated production. Each company is allowed to supply one third of its share in white sugar, with the balance in raw sugar.

108. Local wholesale and retail prices are officially fixed in harmony with the established c.i.f. Lisbon base price. From 1952 to 1963 when the c.i.f. Lisbon prices for white and raw sugar were fixed at 3.75 escudos and 2.85 escudos per kilo, retail prices in Luanda were 3.70 escudos and 3.00 escudos respectively. Following the increase in the c.i.f. Lisbon prices to 4.40 escudos per kilo for white sugar and 3.35 escudos for raw sugar, the Luanda retail prices were also adjusted upwards to 4.35 escudos and 3.50 escudos respectively which maintained the same margin of difference in the local and the c.i.f. Lisbon prices.

^w Government regulation and control of sugar is described in greater detail in the paper on Mozambique (appendix III).

^u Alberto Diogo, "Rumo à industrialização do Angola", Junta de Desenvolvimento Industrial (Luanda, 1963).

^v Angola, Serviços de Economia. "Regime Açucareiro", Actividade Económica de Angola, Nos. 61-63 (Angola, 1962), p. 182.

TABLE 6. ANGOLA SUGAR COMPANIES: AREA, FACTORY CAPACITY AND OUTPUT, 1960

Name	Location	Registered capital (million escudos) ^a	Area (ha.)	Cane output		Factory capacity ^b (daily m/tons)	Raw sugar output
				Thousand tons	Tons/ha.		Thousand tons	Yield ^c
Companhia do Açúcar de Angola	Dambe Grande (Benguela)	337.5	2,400	105	61	800	11.4	6.7
	Tentative (Luanda)		2,299	165	74.7	1,500	15.5	6.7
Sociedade Agrícola de Cassequel	Catumbela (Benguela)	175.0	4,200	316	85	2,400	29.8	10.5
Sociedade de Comércio e Construções	Bom Jesus (Luanda)	60-80	1,400	56	39.8	600	5.9	10.6
Quissol	Quissol (Malanje)	30 ^d	230	40	715	100	0.7	—
TOTAL		603-623	10,529	682		5,400	63.3

^a Registered capital of the company and not only of the sugar factory and plantation.

^b Except for Bom Jesus all factories produce white sugar for consumption or raw sugar for export.

^c Number of tons of cane to produce one ton of sugar.

^d Capital in 1958 reported to be 20-30 million escudos but also reported to have increased from 18 to 28 million in 1961.

TABLE 7. ANGOLA'S SUGAR QUOTA FOR EXPORT TO PORTUGAL, BY FACTORY
(Thousand tons)

	Territorial total	CAA	Cassequel	SCC	Actual exports to Portugal
1954/55	32,767	13,000	16,000	3,767	29,488
1955/56	25,500	6,000	17,000	2,500	25,526
1956/57	33,500	16,000	15,000	2,500	31,023
1957/58	36,202	11,194	21,864	3,144	39,262
1958/59	34,379	11,956	19,521	2,902	34,341
1959/60	35,412	16,106	15,500	3,806	35,294
1960/61	33,489	12,000	18,000	3,489	33,603
1961/62	33,064	15,000	14,000	4,064	33,064

109. Sugar exported to foreign destinations is subject to a surcharge of 16 per cent on its fiscal value. There is also a surtax on sugar exported to Portugal, which varies according to the polarimetric reading. In 1960 territorial revenue from sugar amounted to 2.6 million escudos from the export duty and 4.5 million escudos from the domestic consumption tax.

Production, exports and local consumption

110. Traditionally sugar production in Angola has been protected and subsidized in order to meet the needs of Portugal's domestic consumption. Between 1935 and 1939 annual production increased by more than 40 per cent from 28,200 to 40,300 tons. But by 1944, production levelled off and in the next decade the yearly average was less than 50,000 tons. Although between 1955 and 1964 output increased by 50 per cent, this rate was much slower than that of Mozambique. In this period consumption in Angola more than doubled and white sugar production tripled. By 1964 two thirds of the output of the factories consisted of white sugar (table 8).

TABLE 8. ANGOLA: SUGAR PRODUCTION, CONSUMPTION AND EXPORTS
(Thousand tons)

Crop year	Production ^a				Consumption	Exports
	Total	Raw	White	Other
	(1)	(2)	(3)	(4)	(5)	(6)
1955/56	46.0	24.9	14.2	7.2	20.0	30.5
1956/57	58.6	35.4	12.1	11.2	20.0	31.8
1957/58	60.4	34.3	16.0	10.2	20.0	40.8
1958/59	50.3	30.5	17.0	9.6	21.5	34.0
1959/60	65.0	36.2	16.6	14.7	25.0	29.9
1960/61	62.6	38.2	22.6	4.9	26.0	46.4
1961/62	62.1	32.4	38.6	—	27.6	36.6
1962/63	73.2	29.0	35.6	—	29.7	36.5
1963/64	68.2	23.6	41.8	—	42.0 ^b	23.8
1964/65	—	...	24.6

SOURCES: Columns (1) and (5); Decree Law 45,691, 28 April 1964. Columns (2), (3), (4) and (6): Reports of the Bank of Angola for the respective years.

^a Because of the different sources used there are discrepancies between the totals from columns (2), (3) and (4) and the figures in column (1).

^b Of which 15,000 tons raw sugar and 27,000 tons white.

111. Between 1935 and 1942 sugar accounted for about 12 per cent of Angola's total exports by value but by 1950 this was less than 5 per cent. With the increase in exports of other higher priced crops, especially of sisal and coffee, sugar has gradually lost importance in Angola's external trade, and in 1963 accounted for less than 2 per cent of the total exports by value, ranking seventh place among agricultural exports.

112. For many years more than 90 per cent of Angola's sugar exports went to Portugal with the remainder going to other Territories, namely Cape Verde, Portuguese Guinea and São Tomé and Príncipe. Since 1955 Angola's export to other Overseas Territories has steadily increased; in 1964, 22 per cent of the sugar exports went to these Territories and 78 per cent to Portugal (table 9). The sugar companies are free to export any surpluses in excess of the amounts to be supplied to the local market, to Portugal and to the other Territories. Under the International Sugar Agreement, Portugal has an allowance of 20,000 tons annually which was originally assigned to Mozambique but now may be used by any sugar producer in the Portuguese space. In recent years Angola has not had any surpluses for such exports.

Recent developments

113. In August 1960 the Government authorized the establishment of a new sugar company, the Companhia Açucareira do Cuanza. The company was to have an initial registered capital of 80 million escudos, which could be increased to 200 million escudos. Portuguese and Angolan interests were to have equal shares in the capital with government and private interests at a ratio of 5 to 3 and the Government of Angola's investment was to be 25 million escudos. Foreign interests were expected to provide a loan of 200 million escudos for the purchase of equipment and the Development Bank of Portugal was authorized to guarantee the loan. A provisional concession of 15,000 hectares was set aside in the Muxima region. The objective was to double Angola's annual sugar production. In 1962, however, the concession was cancelled and the Government was reported to be planning to use the area to establish settlements based on sugar. There is no recent information on these settlements.

TABLE 9. ANGOLA—SUGAR: LOCAL CONSUMPTION, EXPORTS AND PRINCIPAL DESTINATIONS, 1955-1964

Year	Local consumption (thousand tons)	Exports			Main destinations
		Thousand tons	Million escudos	Percentage of total export value	Portugal (percentage)	Cape Verde (percentage)	Portuguese Guinea (percentage)	São Tomé and Príncipe (percentage)
	(1)	(2)	(3)	(4)	(5)	(6)	(7)	(8)
1955	20.0	30.6	83.1	2.96	92.52	4.19	1.10	2.05
1956	20.0	31.8	84.5	2.57	91.10	5.38	1.37	2.03
1957	20.0	40.7	104.1	3.10	92.60	3.90	1.66	1.79
1958	20.0	34.0	87.6	2.38	88.95	6.99	1.86	1.97
1959	21.5	29.9	77.8	2.17	89.52	5.56	1.60	3.19
1960	25.0	46.4	124.0	3.48	88.74	8.13	1.33	1.76
1961	26.0	36.6	98.3	2.54	87.23	8.52	1.93	2.31
1962	27.6	37.5	99.9	2.34	87.10	6.42	2.28	1.46
1963	29.7	23.9	60.0	1.28	79.20	12.95	3.54	3.32
1964	42.0	24.7	72.4	1.23	76.62	13.51	5.49	2.96

SOURCES: Data for years 1955-1962 are as follows: column (1)—Portugal: Decree-Law No. 45,691 of 28 April 1964; columns (2), (3), (5), (6), (7) and (8)—Angola: Anuário Estatístico, 1962; column (4)—Calculated from Angola: Comércio Externo, 1963.

Data for 1963 and 1964 are from Banco de Angola: Relatório e Contas, 1964. These figures do not include molasses.

D. Cotton

General

114. Although cotton was grown and used in Angola before the arrival of the Portuguese and its production was the object of many government measures for more than half of this century, it has never had as important a role in the Territory's economy as it has had, and still has in Mozambique. Throughout the period 1940-1955 Angola's average annual exports of raw cotton remained around 6,000 tons. In 1960, the peak year, Angola exported 8,894 tons of raw cotton (compared with 44,398 tons from Mozambique), accounting for just over 10 per cent of Portugal's cotton imports from the Overseas Territories and about 4 per cent of the value of the Territory's visible exports. As an export crop cotton has continued to lose ground, and in 1964 only 4,286 tons of raw cotton were exported which by value represented less than 1 per cent of the visible exports.

115. Cotton is grown in the districts of Zaire (which with Uíge formerly constituted the Congo district), Luanda, Malanje, Cuanza North, Cuanza South and Lunda. The most important areas are Cambo, Bondo and Bangala in the Baixa do Cassange area of the Malanje district,^{*} and Catete (formerly known as Sunginge) Icolo e Bengo in the Luanda district.

^{*}The Baixa do Cassange cotton zone includes also part of the Luanda district.

In 1963, these two districts accounted for approximately 92 per cent of the total output, of which 75 per cent was from Malanje and 17 per cent from Luanda (table 10).

116. Most of the cotton grown is of the medium staple variety with some long-staple cotton grown along the coastal areas. Though efforts have been made to extend the cultivation of long-staple cotton, production of this variety has not increased partly because it requires special care, including artificial irrigation, and partly because the prices set heretofore have been insufficient to stimulate interest.

Organization of production

117. As described previously (see appendix I, part two), until recently cotton was grown mainly by Africans under a special régime on small plots of land of an average size of one half of two hectares per family. (In 1952 there were only forty-nine European cotton growers with 521 hectares; they produced 349 tons of seed cotton.) In Angola this special régime was based on legally enforced compulsory cultivation and the division of the cotton growing areas into "cotton zones" in which exclusive rights to purchase cotton was granted to licensed European or assimilado traders with ginning factories. In practice, most of the concessions were held by companies.

[†]Walter Marques, Problemas do Desenvolvimento Económico de Angola (Luanda, 1964), p. 202.

TABLE 10. ANGOLA: SEED COTTON OUTPUT BY REGIONS^a
(Metric tons)

Year	Territorial total (tons)	Malanje (and Lunda)		Luanda (and Cuanza North)		Cuanza South		Congo (Zaire) ^b
		Tons	Percentage of total	Tons	Percentage of total	Tons	Percentage of total	Tons	Percentage of total
1958	21,762	19,107	87.80	1,581	7.27	1,069	4.91	5	0.02
1959	23,717	13,570	57.98	7,467	31.48	2,194	9.25	486	2.05
1960	19,139	9,612	50.22	6,220	32.50	2,894	15.12	413	2.16
1961	13,099	8,080	61.68	3,019	23.05	1,865	14.24	135	1.03
1962	22,500	15,200	67.56	3,650	16.22	3,000	13.33	650	2.89
1963	13,697	10,479	76.51	2,587 ^c	18.89 ^c	631	4.61
1964	13,609	12,878	94.63	530	3.90	200 ^d	1.47	2	0.02
1965 ^e	19,070	11,854	62.16	4,144	21.73	3,010 ^d	15.78	61	0.32

SOURCE: Banco de Angola, Boletim Trimestral and Relatório e Contas.

^a The principal cotton companies active in these regions are:

Malanje and Lunda ..Cotonang
LuandaCompanhia do Ambriz
Lagos e Irmão
Rocha e Coelho

Cuanza SouthAlgodoeira Colonial Agrícola
Zaire (Congo)Sociedade Agrícola do Cassequel

^b Data for 1958-1960 refer to Congo (Ambrizete) district. Data for 1961 onwards refer to Zaire district. Congo district was divided into two districts: Zaire and Uíge.

^c The figure for Luanda-Cuanza North includes Zaire output.

^d This figure includes Benguela district output.

^e Estimate.

118. In Angola, compulsory cultivation of cotton dates back to 1908 (Order of 21 November) when inhabitants of Icolo e Bengo concelho were required to cultivate 2,500 plants per hut (cubata). Then in 1927 (Legislative Instrument 638, 24 September) this requirement was extended to inhabitants of Luanda, Ambriz, Quiçama, Porto Amboim and Novo Redondo. In 1931 (Legislative Instrument 239, 4 June) women and minors over 14 years of age were required to cultivate at least one hectare of cotton.

119. In 1930 (Legislative Instrument 242, 18 January) a special Cotton Supervision Office was established in the Malanje district, in parts of which compulsory cotton growing was in force. As the number of taxpayers had dropped from 11,490 to 5,660 in the two previous years, the Cotton Supervision Office was to promote the increase of the number of growers and improve cotton production by "persuasive propaganda" and by bringing about the permanent settlement of Africans in greater numbers living under improved conditions. The authority of the Cotton Supervision Office was extended in the following year (Legislative Instrument 276, 5 November 1931) to other adjacent areas and a system of bonuses was established payable to government officials, based on the value of the cotton produced in the area of their authority, the chefe de posto receiving 4 centavos per kilogramme and the administrator 2 centavos.* In 1947 (Governor-General's Dispatch, 28 May) cotton concessionary companies were authorized to recruit workers through the help of government officials.

120. In 1949 (Order 6,619, 5 January) the regulations governing the area of cotton which each African had to cultivate were revised. The new provisions divided African indígenas into cotton farmers (able-bodied men from 18 to 55 years of age) and cotton cultivators (men from 56 to 60 years of age, widows, unmarried and divorced women).

121. Each year the concessionary companies were required to fix the minimum area for the head of family and his first wife, for each subsequent wife, and for each son of working age; areas for cotton cultivators were to be similarly fixed individually. For the 1948-1949 season, cotton farmers were required to cultivate 0.85 to one hectare of cotton and one hectare of food crops; cotton cultivators had to cultivate from 0.25 to 0.35 hectares of cotton and equal areas of food crops (Governor-General's Order of 5 January 1949).

122. Although in Mozambique close to 1 million persons were at one time engaged in cotton growing, in Angola, according to official statistics no more than 75,000 persons were ever involved. In 1955 at the height of the system, there were just under 60,000 growers and 54,000 hectares under cotton.

* In 1957-1959, for instance, the bonuses paid to administrative authorities for helping to promote cotton production amounted to over 300,000 escudos annually. Nunes Barata, Localização da Sede dos Organismos de Coordenação Económica do Ultramar (Lisbon, 1961), p. 43.

As the average area per cotton grower was 0.90 hectares it appears obvious that many probably cultivated between 1.5 and 2 hectares (see table 11).

123. The provisions described above remained in force until 1961 when cotton growing was declared free (Decree 43,639, 2 May 1961). The Report of the ILO Commission of 1962 appointed to examine the observance by the Government of Portugal of the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105)^{aa} shows that the representative of the Bank of Angola and the representatives of the largest concessionaire, COTONANG (see below), admitted freely that cotton cultivation had been compulsory, but that after May 1961 it had become free, and Africans could grow cotton or not as they liked.^{bb} The COTONANG representatives, however, stated the view that while cotton cultivation was no longer compulsory, Africans were obliged to engage in some form of approved activity as "they were not allowed to remain idle".

^{aa} International Labour Office, Report of the Commission appointed under Article 26 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation to examine the complaint filed by the Government of Ghana concerning the observance by the Government of Portugal of the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), Geneva, 1962.

^{bb} Ibid., paras. 408 and 431.

TABLE 11. ANGOLA: AFRICAN PRODUCTION OF SEED COTTON

Year	Volume (tons)	Value (thousand escudos)	Production
			Number of growers	Area cultivated (hectares)
1954	17,292	45,892	57,435	53,708
1955	20,438	55,274	57,763	54,087
1956	21,005	65,959	55,479	52,372
1957	19,581	59,950	56,552	53,526
1958	21,762	67,482	56,724	52,795
1959	23,718	72,054	54,852	51,190
1960	19,139	59,199	54,842	50,515
1961	13,099	44,690	46,673	38,654
1962	20,567	72,645	45,480	36,365
1963 ^a	13,700	46,458	46,790	36,691
1964 ^b	11,955	47,041	41,526	30,196

^a Angola: Anuário Estatístico.

^b Governo Geral de Angola, Secretaria Provincial de Fomento Rural: Síntese da Actividade dos Organismos e Serviços, 1963-1964.

124. In 1960, there were ten cotton concessionary companies. In 1954 these companies owned twenty-three ginning factories. The following table lists the concessionary companies, the location of their concessions and information on their other activities.

ANGOLA: COTTON CONCESSIONARY COMPANIES, 1960

(Ginning factories as reported in 1955)

Company	Location		Details
	Concession district	Ginning factories (concelho or circunscrição)
Algodoeira Colonial Agricola	Cuanza South	Porto Amboim and Seles (at Hote)
Companhia do Ambriz	Luanda	Ambriz (at Tabi)	Headquarters: Tabi. Capital (as of 1962): 11 million escudos. Main activity: coffee. Other activities: cotton, palm oil, coconut and salt
Companhia Geral dos Algodões de Angola, SARL (COTONANG)	Malanje	Ten ginning factories which are all in the Malanje district.	Largest concessionaire. Headquarters: Lisbon. Capital (as of 1962): 42 million escudos
Empresa dos Tabacos de Angola	Luanda	Dande (at Icau)	Owned by same group as Empresa Agro-Industrial de Angola (Emangola)
Lagos and Irmão	Luanda	Icolo e Bengo (at Catete)	Concession cancelled by Portaria (Angola) No. 12,923 of 28 September 1963
Marques Seixas and Ca. Lda.	Cuanza South	Novo Redondo	Other production: rice
Rocha and Coelho	Luanda and Cuanza South	Quiçama	Concession cancelled by Portaria (Angola) No. 12,862 of 10 August 1963
Sociedade Agricola do Cassequel, SARL	Zaire (3 zones)	Ambrizete (at Loge)	Established in 1927. Headquarters: Catumbela (Lobito); registered capital: 175 million escudos. Main activity: sugar. Other activities: cotton, vegetable oils, sisal, ramie, alcohol and fishing
Sociedade Comercial do Ambriz, Lda.	Zaire Cuanza North (4 zones)	Ambrizete Cambambe	Headquarters: Lisbon
Mota and Irmão	Luanda	Dande	In 1960 the ginning factory was listed as Sociedade Comercial Motas, Limitada (SO-COMOL). In 1955 Mota was also engaged in cotton processing in Congo district and vegetable oil in Luanda district

125. The largest cotton concessionaire is Companhia Geral dos Algodões de Angola, SARL-COTONANG. It was established in 1926 by the Companhia Fomento Geral de Angola, and its activities include cotton growing, industrial processing and marketing. COTONANG is registered as a Portuguese company and up to 1962 had its headquarters in Lisbon; it also had a permanent committee in Brussels the members of which were chosen by the board of directors. In 1926 its initial capital was 6 million escudos divided in 100 escudos shares. Members of the first board of directors were: Messrs. Arno S. Pearse, Baltasar Freire Cabral, Conde Jean de Hemp-time, Ernesto de Vilhena, João Henrique Ulbrich, José de Melo Breyner, José Alard, Pierre Clynans, Robert Mees, Tomás de Aquino de Almeida Garret. Each member of the board of directors held at least 100 shares of the company's capital.

126. The Company's capital was raised to 40 million escudos, and in 1962 it was reported to be unchanged.

127. COTONANG held the cotton concessions in the Baixa do Cassange region, which is the most important cotton producing area. In 1960 it had 33,000 cotton growers cultivating 30,000 hectares in the company's concession area. In 1961 it had 30,000 growers cultivating 23,000 hectares, and the company anticipated that the number of growers might drop further to 25,000. In the period 1954-1960, annual production of seed cotton within its concession averaged approximately 12,000 tons, for which, according to its annual reports, it paid 40 million escudos to the growers.

128. In 1955, COTONANG owned cotton ginneries at Cuale (Duque de Bragança concelho), Milando (Cambo circunscrição), Massango (Forte República circunscrição), Caombo (Combo circunscrição), Quelo (Bondo e Bângala circun- scrição), Xandel (Bondo e Bângala circunscrição), Quinta (Songo circunscrição), Marimba, Jonga and X. Muteba.

129. COTONANG also operates in other fields such as vegetable oils, carpentry and metal-working. All its factories are located in Malanje district. The oil mill for the industrial processing of oil, cake and linters was built in 1954, at a cost of 20 million escudos; its daily capacity is 40 tons of cotton seed.

130. After cotton growing became free and the government-fixed purchase price of seed cotton was raised, COTONANG decided to grow its own cotton instead of purchasing cotton from African growers. In 1962 it began mechanized cotton growing on 400 hectares. It plans to cultivate 10,000 hectares at an investment of 50 million escudos. However, until harvesting of cotton is mechanized, the company will still be dependent on African labour.

131. Lagos and Irmão received its concession in Catete in 1936. Its annual production of seed cotton is approximately 5,000 tons for which it paid growers 15 million escudos annually. The company owns shares in Companhia do Manganês de Angola and in the cement factory known as Secil and also produces coffee.

132. As already described in appendix I, part two, the 1928 Labour Code and the labour regulations (including the obligation to work) were repealed in 1962. The special legislation of 1961 and 1963, put an end to compulsory cultivation and to all intervention by government officials in cotton growing; it provided for the abolition of cotton concessions by 31 August 1966, and established a Cotton Institute of Angola to supervise the cultivation and purchase of cotton from growers. (For details on the Cotton Institute, see appendix I, part two).

133. By 1964 only four cotton companies still held concessions. These four companies were the Sociedade Colonial Algodoeira de Angola (SCAL), Cassequel, Companhia do Ambriz and Mota e Irmão, but as seen from the table below, together they held only 1,198 hectares, and were responsible for the supervision of 1,706 African growers. All other cotton-growing areas were under the direct supervision of the Cotton Institute.^{cc}

TABLE 12. ANGOLA: AFRICAN COTTON GROWERS, AREA AND PRODUCTION UNDER THE SUPERVISION OF THE COTTON INSTITUTE, 1961-1964

Year	Total			Cotton Institute
	African growers	Area cultivated (hectares)	Seed cotton production (tons)	African growers	Area cultivated (hectares)	Seed cotton production (tons)
1961	46,673	38,654	13,099	—	—	—
1962 ^a	45,480	36,365	20,950	8,467	7,455	3,993
1963	46,790	36,690	13,726	7,199	5,188	1,127
1964	41,596	30,193	11,955	39,890	28,988	11,764

^a In 1962 the Catete cotton zone was under the direct supervision of the Cotton Institute but reverted to the concessionary company in 1963.

134. The total number of cotton growers in Angola dropped by 15 per cent from 54,842 in 1960 to 46,673 in 1961 and 41,596 in 1964. The area cultivated decreased by 22 per cent between 1960 and 1961, from 50,515 hectares to 38,654. According to the report of the Angola Provincial Secretariat for Rural Development,^{dd} between 1963 and 1964 the total area cultivated dropped from 43,000 to 39,000 hectares and production of seed cotton from 16,711 tons to 13,609 tons. In 1963 Africans accounted for 85 per cent of the area cultivated (37,000 hectares) and 82 per cent of the production.

135. It may be recalled that the legislation of 1955 (Decree 40,405), which has been described in the previous appendix, provided for the establishment of co-operatives of African cotton growers outside concessioned areas. The regulations provided that such a co-operative could be established upon the request of at least 100 growers and approved by the Territorial Government. Each co-operative is administered by a three-member council with a representative of the Cotton Institute.

136. In 1961 there were five co-operatives of cotton growers: four in the Luanda district with a total area of 900 hectares, and one in Cuanza South, with 120 hectares. In 1962 three more were established, of which two were in the Catete region, and one at Jimba in Cuanza South with 300 members and an area of 300 hectares.

137. In addition to African growers, in 1963 there were 112 registered cotton producers. Of these only 61 actually grew cotton cultivating 6,364 hectares and producing nearly 3,000 tons. The average production in kilogrammes per hectare by these independent growers was 383 in Luanda district, 160 in Cuanza North, 499 in Cuanza South and 520 in Malanje. Among the independent growers in the Luanda district are the special government-sponsored cotton settlements. In 1964 there were 66 independent producers, cultivating 8,757 hectares; however, their production totalled only 1,654 tons due to a poor season.

Cotton textile industry

138. Portuguese policy regulating the establishment of industries in the Overseas Territories and the legislation providing for textile industries in Angola and Mozambique have been described in the previous study. It may be recalled that (under Decree 33,924, 5 September 1944) in order to prevent competition with Portuguese interests, the textile factories in Portugal were given priority rights to establish local textile industries in the Territories or in acquiring shares; the price of cotton to the local industries was fixed at the same level

^{cc} The Cotton Institute's estimated total budget for 1965 was 52 million escudos, including 14.5 million escudos of the Cotton Development Fund. Estimated cost of purchasing seed cotton, transportation and storage was 23,760,000 escudos for which it expected to receive 28.5 million escudos (Angola: Boletim Oficial, Series I, No. 13, 27 March 1965).

^{dd} Angola, Secretaria Provincial de Fomento Rural, Síntese da Actividade dos Organismos e Serviços, 1963-1964 (Luanda, 1965), p. 79.

as that to Portuguese industries; and the annual local textile output in each Territory was carefully limited to 20 per cent of its own average imports of such products from Portugal over the three years prior to 1939.

139. Under the authorization of the above-mentioned legislation, the Sociedade Algodoeira de Portugal was formed soon after with Portuguese capital to operate in Mozambique, and the Companhia de Fomento Colonial in Angola which had previously been engaged in agriculture in the Territory began to make cotton textiles its main activity.

140. The Luanda textile factory began production in 1946. In 1950 (Decree Law 37,847, 3 June) the Government approved the merger of the existing textile companies in the Overseas Territories, and as a result, the Sociedade Algodoeira de Portugal which was in financial difficulties and had not yet started producing textiles in Mozambique, joined with the Companhia de Fomento Colonial and became the Sociedade Algodoeira de Fomento Colonial, now the major textile producer both in Mozambique and in Angola where it is known as Textang.

141. The Sociedade Algodoeira de Fomento Colonial is jointly owned by the State (which was authorized by Decree 37,847, 3 June 1950, to invest up to 40 million escudos) and Portuguese textile interests. In 1963, this company had a registered capital of 200 million escudos, but the total capital actually invested by the end of 1964 was 514 million escudos.

142. In 1964, the company reported a surplus of more than 12 million escudos from its operations in Mozambique, more than 5 million escudos from Angola, and a deficit amounting to 322,000 escudos in Lisbon where it has its headquarters. The company produces about 18 million metres of textiles annually valued at 150 million escudos but with a capacity to raise this to 200 million escudos. According to the Chairman of the Board of Directors, the Company's operations in 1964 were affected by the higher prices it had had to pay for cotton, limited markets in Angola and Mozambique, and difficulties of competing in the international market. The activities of this company are described in greater detail in the study on Mozambique (see appendix III).

143. Textang had a registered capital of 50 million escudos in 1955 and employed 600 workers. Its production has increased in recent years. In 1962, its capacity was reported to be 1,200 tons per annum but it had not reached that maximum.

144. The only other cotton textile factory in Angola is owned by Fábrica Imperial de Borracha Limitada (FIB). It was set up in 1957 with a registered capital of 3.3 million escudos. In 1962 this factory had a capacity of 1,250 metres of textiles per day.

145. Both textile factories also produce cotton blankets and socks. In addition, in 1963 there were two factories producing absorbent cotton which had a combined capital of 2.6 million, their output being valued at 1.6 million escudos. There are also four factories producing cotton woven goods which have a total capital of 1.2 million escudos.

146. The total output of cotton textiles and other cotton products is shown in the following table together with the volume of cotton textile imports from Portugal.

TABLE 13. ANGOLA: LOCAL PRODUCTION AND IMPORT OF COTTON TEXTILES AND OTHER COTTON PRODUCTS

	Local production		Imports ^b
	Volume (metres) ^a	Value (thousand escudos)	Volume (tons)	Value (thousand escudos)
1955	4,219	258,756
1956	3,121	...	5,404	319,649
1957	3,403	...	5,910	349,318
1958	3,299	40,812	6,075	345,365
1959	3,112	39,562	5,903	317,018
1960	3,251	38,500	5,020	276,513
1961	3,842	48,100	2,999	176,775
1962	4,394	61,000	4,210	268,941
1963	6,871	66,772	5,434	383,498
1964	...	71,031	5,708	403,854

SOURCES: Imports, Angola: Anuário Estatístico, Comercial especial por classes e secções.

Local output and data for 1963 and 1964: Banco de Angola, Relatório e Contas.

^a All cotton products, including blankets which usually amount to more than 10 per cent of the total value of the production.

^b Cotton textiles and cotton yarn.

Other cotton by-products

147. Until 1952, there was no factory producing cotton seed oil. In 1954 COTONANG established an oil seed factory in the Malanje district. There are two other oil seed factories, Induve and Comgeral.

148. Cotton seed oil production was 1,241 tons (10.2 million escudos in 1960); 916 tons (7.7 million escudos) in 1961 and 933 tons (8.3 million escudos) in 1962. In 1961, 220 tons of cotton seed oil were exported which was 487 tons less than in 1960. In 1962 none was exported.

TABLE 14. ANGOLA: EXPORT OF COTTON SEED OIL AND OTHER BY-PRODUCTS

	Cotton seed		Cotton oil		Bagacos
	Value (tons)	Value (thousand escudos)	Volume (tons)	Value (thousand escudos)	Volume (tons)	Value (thousand escudos)
1960	607
1961	220
1962
1963 ^a	1,599	22,016	330	1,877	3,991	8,114
1964 ^a	909	1,182	2	16	1,651	3,300

^a SOURCE for 1963 and 1964: Angola Secretaria Provincial de Fomento Rural: Síntese da Actividade dos Organismos e Serviços 1963-1964 (Luanda 1965), p. 78.

The economic role of cotton

149. Throughout the period from 1926 until 1961, cotton was grown in Angola under forced cultivation to meet the needs of the Portuguese textile industry so as to save the foreign exchange that would have been needed to purchase cotton from other sources. Nevertheless, cotton growing never became widespread in Angola, and annual production of seed cotton during the mid-1950s averaged only about 20,000 tons. Since cultivation became free in May 1962, cotton growing has declined, and in 1964, production was only 60 per cent of the average annual output during the 1950s.

150. Although cotton has never accounted for a significant part of Angola's visible export trade, it has been subject to heavy taxes.^{ee} On the other hand, the forced cultivation system and the low purchase price fixed by the Government created hardships for the African growers,^{ff} and as reported by the Sub-Committee on the Situation in Angola,^{gg} led to many complaints.

^{ee} In 1965, for instance, taxes and duties on raw cotton amounted to 3 escudos per kilogramme when the average f.o.b. price was 17.3 escudos (Legislative Instrument 3,569, 31 July 1965).

151. It may be recalled that the ILO Commission reported that in 1961, cotton growers in the Cambo region received an average of 1,230 escudos.^{hh} As this was gross income before paying the personal tax which then averaged around 100-150 escudos, the average net monthly income after tax would have been less than 100 escudos, or approximately $US3.50. In contrast, the gross income per hectare of coffee was probably between 3-5,000 escudos per hectare per year (see para. 69 above.)

152. Under the system prevailing before 1961, Angola exported to Portugal almost all the raw cotton produced, and up to 1960, the local textile industry's production was less than 10 per cent of the value of the Territory's cotton imports from Portugal (see table 13). Local output of cotton textiles which remained around 3.2 million metres between 1956 and 1961, increased in 1962 to 4.4 million metres. In 1964, Angola's textile imports from Portugal including cotton yarn totalled 5,709 tons valued at 404 million escudos, or just over $US14 million, and were the second largest import by value after wine.

153. According to a 1965 report (see foot-note ^{ff}), owing to the drop in cotton production in Angola and to a lesser extent in Mozambique, during the period 1963-64, Portugal had to import a total of about 75,000 tons of raw cotton from foreign sources at a cost of about 1,520 million escudos. In order to make cotton production more attractive, in July 1965, (Order 13,858, 31 July) the Government of Angola increased the minimum purchase price of seed cotton sold by Africans in rural markets outside concessionary areas, and suspended the tax that had been levied since 1963 on seed cotton for the revenue of the Cotton Development Fund (see appendix I, para. 108).

154. Under the new industrial control legislation, conditions for the establishment of industries in the Overseas Territories have been liberalized and in the future new textile factories may be established in Angola so long as they do not compete with those established in Portugal or other Overseas Territories. However, since import duties on goods from Portugal and other parts of the Portuguese realm have been abolished, as reported previously (see chap. V, para. 129) it is expected that it may be a few years before Angola's own industries will be developed sufficiently to meet the Territory's needs.

E. Maize

General

155. Maize is the principal food crop of the plateau and coastal regions of Angola; in the other areas the main staple is manioc. From the beginning of this century until before World War II, maize was the Territory's principal export both in volume and in value. During the period 1936-40 for instance, average annual exports of maize were over 110,000 tons and represented almost 57 per cent of the value of total visible exports. As already indicated above (paras. 2-3), since the 1950s coffee especially and to a lesser degree sisal have dominated Angola's exports and as a result the volume of maize exports has remained almost stationary, with 104,000 tons exported in 1964. Although by value maize still ranks third among the Territory's agricultural exports in 1964 it accounted for less than 3 per cent of the value of the total visible exports.

156. The most important areas of production are: (a) the Benguela plateau and especially along the Benguela railway, between Ganda and the Cuanza River, and extending to about ^{ff} In fact as one article has recently described it, the producer was the one who received the least profits when there were any and he bore all the losses. ("Novos rumos para a cultura algodoeira", Actualidade Económica, Luanda, 9 September 1965, p. 9).

^{gg} Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixteenth Session, Supplement No. 16 (A/4978), paras. 266-271.

^{hh} International Labour Office, op. cit., p. 267, foot-note 2.

100 kilometres on each side of the railway; (b) the Huambo-Bié plateau where it is produced mainly by European settlers; (c) the Malanje plateau; and (d) the concelho of Icolo e Bengo near Luanda. Some maize is also grown in the interior but there are no production statistics. The only statistics available are the quantities purchased annually which do not necessarily bear a direct relation to annual production, but which are more often influenced by the purchase price set by the Government for reasons explained below.

TABLE 15. ANGOLA: COTTON LINT OUTPUT AND EXPORTS

Year	Output volume (metric tons)	Exports		Percentage total exports value
		Volume (metric tons)	Value (thousand escudos)
1950	5,202	7,028	81,393	3.75
1951	4,996	4,058	56,765	1.78
1952	7,098	6,186	92,183	2.89
1953	6,064	5,473	82,037	2.32
1954	6,001	5,871	89,415	3.02
1955	7,073	6,266	93,039	3.32
1956	7,302	5,908	94,070	2.86
1957	6,823	7,363	124,385	3.70
1958	7,503	5,033	85,000	2.30
1959	8,268	6,356	104,662	2.92
1960	6,636	8,894	146,376	4.11
1961	4,980	4,120	69,033	1.78
1962	7,205	5,712	99,018	2.32
1963	5,592	4,286	79,604	1.68
1964	4,553	3,194	52,919	0.90

SOURCES: Cotton lint output: Diário de Lisboa, Portugal 1964, p. 197, table "Output of cotton-fibre". The figures for 1962 and 1963 are reported to be subject to revision.

Exports: Angola, Anuário Estatístico (tables: "Exportação Agrícola" and "Evolução do Movimento Comercial").

For years 1963 and 1964 all data from Banco de Angola, Relatório e Contas.

Organization of production

157. Most of the maize is produced by Africans on small plots of about one hectare per family. Some maize is also grown on European farms and on the government sponsored African settlements. In 1942 there were an estimated 563,444 hectares under maize; the average annual output in the 1940s and 1950s was estimated to be 300,000-400,000 tons. The average yield on African plots is between 300 and 400 kilogrammes per hectare, which is about half of that produced on European farms in Angola, and about one third of the average output in the leading maize producing countries. The low yield and fluctuating output are officially attributed to the fact that African farming is still based on simple traditional methods and the harvest is entirely dependent on the weather.

158. As described in the previous study on the concession, occupation and settlement of land in Angola and Mozambique (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex II), although after 1950 the Government began to organize permanent African settlements with a view to improving traditional farming techniques, these settlements involved only an insignificant proportion of the total population and up to 1964 had not contributed to raising exports of maize and other traditionally grown African food crops.

Government regulation and controls

159. As maize was one of the earliest crops exported from Angola it has been the object of various government measures since 1914 aimed at improving the quality and increasing exports. Up to 1961, as described in the previous study on the organization of agriculture and government policy, the labour regulations and the native tax, as it was then known, were used to induce Africans to higher productivity. In Angola, however, these measures were reinforced by legally instituted compulsory cultivation of cotton (see section D above) and, for certain periods, also of food crops, as is explained below.

160. In 1931 (Angola, Legislative Instrument 239, 26 May) forced cultivation of food and other crops was introduced. All able-bodied Africans indigenas were required to cultivate at least one hectare of ordinary food crops (such as maize, beans and wheat) or plantation crops (such as palms and coffee) or annual crops (such as cotton, castor oil plant (ricino) and manioc). Polygamous Africans were required to cultivate an extra half hectare, or the equivalent for each additional wife. Able-bodied boys, 14-16 years of age, were required to cultivate not less than one quarter of a hectare.

161. The administrative officials were to exert "all legal means" to make Africans comply with this order, and they were to provide Africans with seeds when necessary, which had to be repaid at harvest time with the best quality available and increased by 5 per cent over the original amount. Africans who failed to cultivate the area and crops required were subject to a maximum punishment of ninety days of correctional labour.

162. It is not clear how long these measures for compulsory cultivation by the entire population were in force. It may be noted, however, that officially compulsory cultivation could only be imposed to guarantee food supplies. From this time onwards, however, average annual exports of maize increased from 67,000 tons in the period 1931-1935 to 133,000 tons in the period 1936-1940.

163. One of the main difficulties in increasing maize production in Angola has always been the low prices fixed by the Government. In 1930, for instance, according to an article in African World,¹¹ the purchase price was 400 escudos per ton along the railway line, and the actual purchase price to Africans about 1.5 angolars per 15 kilogrammes. At this price, an African growing one hectare of maize, with an average yield of not more than 600 kilogrammes per hectare, could not meet his tax obligations (which in some regions was 104 angolars) even if he sold his entire maize crop.

164. In order to concentrate maize trading and regulating activities under one authority, the Grémio of Portuguese Colonial Maize (Grémio do Milho Colonial Português) was set up in Lisbon in 1933, comprising maize exporters from the colonies and importers in Portugal. The Grémio was given responsibility for the sale of all maize produced in the colonies and placed at its disposal. It was to: (a) organize the marketing (distribution) of maize in such a way that it did not exceed the normal requirements of the market in Portugal; (b) control prices by stabilizing the amount paid to indigenous growers and by controlling transport costs from the place of production to the place of consumption; (c) fix the sale price of maize in Portugal and in any other areas under its authority; (d) help raise the quality of the maize exported from the colonies by distributing selected seed to growers, setting up immunization chambers, organizing maize processing and standardization and providing loans to members of the Grémio.

165. The legislation also provided that in fixing the purchase price to be paid to African growers, the Grémio was to be guided by the rule that the net profit to the trader should not exceed 5 per cent of the actual expenses from purchase to sale.¹²

166. The governing board of the Grémio, comprising a president, vice-president and three members, had to include at least three members chosen from among the eight largest importers of maize over the two previous years. A representative of the Ministry of Colonies, whose salary was paid by the Grémio, sat on the board. This representative had the right to suspend, and the Minister for the Colonies had the right to annul, any decisions taken by the board.

167. In practice, the main responsibility of the Grémio was first, to see that Portugal received an adequate supply of maize from the colonies and second to make arrangements for exporting the remainder to the other Territories and foreign countries. Since maize prices were higher in Portugal than than on the world market, profits earned from the sales to Portugal were used to subsidize exports to other countries. To finance these operations, in 1934 (Decree 24,653, 15 November) a special reserve stabilization fund was created from a percentage levy on the profits from maize sales.

¹¹ African World, 19 July 1930, p. 537.

¹² As pointed out by Marcelo Caetano in O Problema do Nativo, by setting it this way the price paid to African growers did not take into account the exchange value of maize in the local economy.

168. By 1936, however, the Grémio's reserve fund was exhausted, and because of disagreement with the government representative, the members of the governing board resigned. As a result the board's functions were taken over by a special government-appointed committee.

169. The apparent need for closer government co-ordination and control of maize trading activities led to the establishment of the Colonial Cereals Export Board in August 1938 (Decree Law 28,899, 5 August). This Board was set up along the same lines as the other economic co-ordinating bodies for cotton and coffee and had its headquarters also in Lisbon. Although it was intended to have authority eventually over other cereals, its initial competence was limited to maize and wheat (and flour) produced in the colonies. Its main functions were to: protect cereals producers; supervise the production and trade of maize and wheat; regulate exports to Portugal and foreign destinations in such a way that the production in the Overseas Territories was complementary to that of Portugal; guarantee the supply of these cereals to the colonial and metropolitan markets; fix the sale price of cereals in Portugal except when otherwise fixed by law, taking into account the interests of the inhabitants in Portugal and in the colonies. The Board also was made responsible for standardizing maize and furnishing to European and indigenous producers seeds, insecticides, fertilizers and other assistance to improve the quality of maize exports. Furthermore, it was authorized to purchase maize at a fair price from European producers or exporters who were not producers.

170. With the establishment of the Colonial Maize Export Board, half of the Grémio's former export stabilization funds were assigned to the Board as capital to acquire machinery, warehouses, materials and equipment, and the Grémio was again allowed to elect its own governing board (Decree Law 28,900, 5 August 1938). As a result of the changes, the Grémio which retained its headquarters in Lisbon, became mainly a trading association for purchasing maize from Overseas Territories and exporting it under the supervision of the Colonial Cereals Export Board.

171. Although both the Grémio and the Colonial Cereals Export Board established in 1938 were intended to function in all the Overseas Territories, their main activities were in Angola. Therefore, in 1961 (Decree Law 43,640, 2 May 1961) when the Grémio was re-organized into a "voluntary grémio" retaining its purchasing functions, its headquarters were transferred to Angola. Later in the year (Decree 43,876, 24 August 1961), the Colonial Cereals Export Board was abolished, and in Angola it was replaced by a newly established Cereals Institute.

172. The Angola Cereals Institute was made responsible initially for maize, wheat and rice, to which beans, peanuts and castor seed have since been added. All cereal exporters and importers have to be registered with the Institute, and all cereal producers, traders and processors come under its authority, even though they are not required to register with the Institute. In addition to the functions of the former Colonial Cereals Export Board, the Institute is also responsible for protecting small producers. Whereas previously the Board could only purchase cereals from European producers, this restriction has been removed, and the Institute is authorized to purchase cereals offered by producers and traders who are not exporters, after establishing a price stabilization fund. In 1965 the Institute had an estimated budget of 125 million escudos.

173. The quantity of maize to be supplied to Portugal each year is determined by the Committee for Economic Co-ordination and the Overseas Ministry on the advice of the National Institute of Bread and the National Federation of Wheat Producers, taking into account Portugal's own production and that of the Overseas Territories (Order 18,930, 29 December 1961).

174. When import and export quota restrictions were abolished in the Portuguese realm in November 1961 (Decree Law No. 44,016, 8 November), quotas were retained on a limited number of commodities, including maize and maize flour, peanuts and peanut oil, and manufactured tobacco. For Portugal the annual quota of maize imports from the Overseas Territories (i.e., mainly from Angola) was provisionally set at 25,000 tons (Decree Law 44,507, 14 August 1962). That amount has since been established as the annual minimum and additional requirements above it are to be determined each year (Order 20,112, 12 October 1963).

Production, consumption and exports

175. There are no reliable data on the total local maize production, which is estimated to be around 400,000 tons, but exports are usually between one third and one quarter this amount.

176. As described above, Angola's maize can only be exported to foreign destinations after the requirements of Portugal and the other Overseas Territories have been met. Although the minimum annual quota of maize to be supplied to Portugal from Angola was fixed at 25,000 tons in 1961, in recent years supplies have usually been closer to double this amount or more, amounting to 49,000 tons (or 30 per cent) in 1961, 56,000 tons (48 per cent) in 1962, 79,000 tons (92 per cent) in 1963 and 71,000 tons (68 per cent) in 1964.

177. Maize exports to the other Overseas Territories also depend on their needs and fluctuate from year to year. From 1957 to 1960 Mozambique received an average of 10 per cent of Angola's maize exports, Cape Verde 5 per cent and São Tomé and Príncipe approximately 2 per cent (table 16).

Recent developments

178. The stagnation of the traditional agricultural sector was brought to a focus in the Transitional Development Plan 1965-1967. In particular, statistics showed that in the period since 1950 exports of traditionally grown African crops had generally declined. For maize, as noted above, exports reached a peak of 190,000 tons in 1950; for beans the maximum was 28,000 tons in 1950; for rice, 8,000 tons in 1952; and peanuts, 4,000 tons in 1949. The report on the Transitional Development Plan contained the opinion that while this decline in exports of traditional crops was due in part to increased local consumption and processing (as in the case of peanuts), nevertheless, to a great extent, it reflected the disinterest of the producers because of various factors, the most important of which was the low purchase price. To stimulate exports it was proposed that (a) the price paid to growers should be increased; (b) the taxes and duties on maize and other African grown crops should be reduced; and (c) better storage facilities should be made available to reduce losses.^{kk}

179. According to official information, the total levies on maize leaving Angola amounted, in 1965, to 17 centavos out of each escudo paid to the producer (Legislative Instrument 3,569, 31 July 1965).^{ll} In 1964, the Grémio purchased 153,000 tons and exported 104,500 tons valued at 172.2 million escudos. Assuming a purchase price of one escudo per kilogramme, the total levies, at 17 centavos in the escudo, would have amounted to 17.8 million escudos.

180. In July 1965, anticipating reduced revenue resulting from the revision of export levies on maize and other traditionally grown African crops in general, the Government of Angola decided to compensate the loss by increasing various consumption taxes on luxury goods and imposing special levies on exports of lumber, palm oil, coffee and sisal. However, because of special difficulties involved, in September the consumption taxes were revised and the special taxes on other agricultural exports were repealed (Legislative Instrument 3,580, 30 September).

^{kk} Portugal. Presidência do Conselho, Projecto de Plano Intercalar de Fomento para 1965-1967, vol. II (Lisbon, 1964), p. 161.

^{ll} A dispatch of the Department of Commerce in Lisbon dated 6 April 1965 (Diário do Governo, Series I, No. 78) reduced levies on maize from Angola to those that had existed before the establishment of the Cereals Institute, amounting to 15 centavos per kilogramme exported.

181. In May 1966, in order to ensure that maize producers receive a better return, the Government further raised the c.i.f. Lisbon price, bringing the total increase to 200 escudos per ton since 1964. (Currently type-three maize, for instance, is quoted at 1,450 escudos per ton.) At the same time the previous levies on maize have been reduced to a single 5 per cent duty on the customs value of the maize exported, and maize prices were raised by 10 centavos per kilo for various grades.

TABLE 16. ANGOLA: MAIZE EXPORTS AND DESTINATION OF EXPORTS

Year	Exports			Main descriptions (percentage of export volume)
	Thousand tons	Million escudos	Percentage of total export value	Portugal	Other Overseas Territories	Federal Republic of Germany	Belgium-Luxembourg	Netherlands
1955	53.5	86.9	3.09	39.29	9.19	16.59	24.88	0.62
1956	130.7	191.9	5.83	19.97	4.66	15.58	34.95	24.33
1957	31.0	42.6	1.27	64.29	25.92	0.32	0.32	0.32
1958	167.8	218.4	5.92	15.20	13.41	21.43	10.70	3.30
1959	149.2	215.0	5.99	25.21	18.20	15.58	2.04	3.51
1960	117.1	165.0	4.63	17.42	27.30	30.02
1961	161.6	224.8	5.80	30.32	6.62	3.09	0.86	...
1962	116.7	151.7	3.56	47.72	8.90	0.19	2.03	...
1963	86.2	124.5	2.66	91.91	6.41
1964	104.5	172.2	2.93	67.73	16.14	—	—	—

Maize: percentage of total exports to other Overseas Territories

Year	Cape Verde	São Tomé and Príncipe	Mozambique	Year	Cape Verde	São Tomé and Príncipe	Mozambique
1955	1.65	6.69	0.85	1960	15.32	3.22	8.76
1956	2.12	2.54	...	1961	4.76	1.58	0.28
1957	6.37	10.00	9.55	1962	7.11	1.79	...
1958	1.18	1.70	10.54	1963	4.76	1.64	0.01
1959	4.78	2.26	11.16	1964	6.16	1.36	8.61

SOURCES: All data except column 3 and 1964 Angola: Comércio Externo. Column 3 calculated with figures from Angola: Comércio Externo. Data for 1964 from Banco de Angola: Relatório e Contas.

TABLE 17. ANGOLA: AGRICULTURAL EXPORTS, 1955-1964
(Metric tons)

Year	Coffee	Sisal	Sugar	Cotton lint	Maize	Manioc (cruzeira)	Beans	Coconut	Palm oil	Tobacco ^a
1955	36,948	40,716	30,567	6,266	53,533	24,845	12,311	10,307	8,294	517
1956	66,543	37,283	31,789	5,908	130,721	34,275	17,796	9,384	8,790	628
1957	72,225	46,414	40,696	7,363	30,964	24,397	12,554	12,615	9,128	591
1958	77,318	51,870	33,998	5,033	167,821	35,710	8,864	13,736	9,041	259
1959	88,999	53,539	29,872	6,356	149,184	35,702	10,806	7,523	8,747	488
1960	87,217	57,941	46,899	8,894	117,112	58,421	11,789	5,181	13,004	1,010
1961	118,122	58,900	36,615	4,120	161,585	57,365	9,492	10,214	12,582	1,065
1962	156,887	68,856	36,491	5,712	116,681	58,041	10,162	11,610	12,595	947
1963	136,437	61,947	23,849	4,286	86,189	24,378	11,009	18,001	14,877	1,468
1964	138,700	57,228	24,609	3,194	104,475	47,435	4,026	16,693	17,809 ^b	1,850

SOURCES: 1955-1963: Angola, Comércio Externo; 1964: Angola, Boletim Mensal, December 1964.

^a Includes manufactured and unmanufactured tobacco.

^b Includes refined palm oil.

TABLE 18. ANGOLA: AGRICULTURAL EXPORTS PERCENTAGE OF VALUE OF TOTAL EXPORTS, 1955-1964

Year	Total exports (thousand escudos)	Coffee (per cent)	Sisal (per cent)	Sugar (per cent)	Cotton lint (per cent)	Maize (per cent)	Manioc (cruzeira) (per cent)	Beans (per cent)	Coconut (per cent)	Palm oil (per cent)	Tobacco ^a (per cent)
1955	2,804,665	30.50	6.96	2.96	3.32	3.10	1.45	1.08	1.21	1.52	0.25
1956	3,289,026	37.78	5.55	2.57	2.86	5.83	1.75	1.05	0.94	1.41	0.23
1957	3,362,763	42.24	5.65	3.10	3.70	1.27	1.24	0.73	1.22	1.46	0.26
1958	3,688,516	40.82	5.80	2.38	2.30	5.92	1.48	0.62	1.27	1.35	0.19
1959	3,587,418	38.68	8.07	2.17	2.92	5.83	1.55	0.94	0.82	1.36	0.26
1960	3,565,492	35.45	10.53	3.48	4.11	4.63	2.18	0.94	0.62	2.00	0.45
1961	3,874,116	35.86	8.16	2.54	1.78	5.80	2.32	0.74	0.85	1.78	0.43
1962	4,264,294	43.71	9.58	2.34	2.32	3.56	2.58	0.69	0.84	1.40	0.38
1963	4,683,873	40.45	12.33	1.28	1.64	2.66	0.91	0.71	1.34	1.61	0.59
1964	5,867,713	48.73	8.17	1.23	0.92	2.93	1.32	0.21	1.06	1.39 ^b	0.55

SOURCES: 1955-1963: Angola, Comércio Externo; 1964: Angola, Boletim Mensal, December 1964.

^a Includes manufactured and unmanufactured tobacco.

^b Includes refined palm oil.

Appendix III

Agriculture and processing industries in MozambiqueWorking paper prepared by the Secretariat

CONTENTS

	Paragraphs
I. GENERAL OUTLINE
A. Role of agriculture in the economy of the Territory	1-8
B. Pattern of production	9-17
II. PRODUCTION, PROCESSING AND MARKETING OF MAJOR CROPS
A. Cotton	18-45
B. Sugar	46-91
C. Cashew	92-132
D. Copra	133-169
E. Sisal	170-198
F. Tea	199-234

Tables

	Page
1. Mozambique: non-African agricultural holdings in 1960-1961	412
2. Mozambique: production of cash crops, 1950-1951 and 1960-1961	413
3. Mozambique: African production of seed cotton ..	416
4. Mozambique: production, local consumption and exports of cotton lint	416
5. Mozambique: local production and import of cotton textiles	417
6. Mozambique sugar companies: area, factory capacity and output, 1960-1961	419
7. Mozambique: sugar quotas for export to Portugal by company	419
8. Mozambique: sugar production	420
9. Mozambique—sugar: local consumption, exports and principal destinations, 1955-1964	420
10. Influence of industrialization on the value of cashew exports	422
11. Mozambique: production of shelled cashew and cashew liquor	424
12. Mozambique: exports of shelled cashew nuts and shell liquor	424
13. Mozambique—cashew: exports and principal destinations, 1955-1964	425
14. Copra production	428
15. Mozambique—copra and copra oil: exports and principal destinations, 1955-1964	428
16. Sisal: average f.o.b. prices of exports	430
17. Mozambique—sisal: exports and principal destinations, 1955-1964	431
18. Mozambique: tea companies, their location and production, 1962	432
19. Mozambique—tea: exports and principal destinations, 1955-1964	434
20. Mozambique: agricultural exports, 1955-1964	434
21. Mozambique: agricultural exports percentage of value of total exports, 1955-1964	435

I. GENERAL OUTLINE

A. Role of agriculture in the economy of the Territory

1. Mozambique depends heavily on its geographical location with respect to the highly productive regions of the hinterland for which it provides the principal access to the sea. Consequently, an important branch of economic activity consists in the provision of port, railway and related services for the transit traffic of neighbouring countries. From this, it derives about one fourth of its foreign exchange earnings and a substantial part of its public revenue. Other invisible receipts come in the form of remittances and fees in respect of migrant workers in South Africa and Southern Rhodesia and from the growing tourist industry.

2. These invisible receipts help to counterbalance a chronic deficit in the Territory's balance of trade which reflects the present weakness of its domestic economy. With comparatively little mineral production or manufacturing, though both these segments are growing, the economy is predominantly based on agriculture and the production for export of agricultural commodities in a raw or semi-processed state. Vegetable products account for over 80 per cent of total exports by value and about 93 per cent of all actively engaged Africans are agricultural workers or farmers, mainly in the subsistence sector. Likewise, about 60 per cent of private industrial investment is in processing industries based on agricultural products. As explained in the previous study dealing with economic organization and policy, the development of manufacturing has been restricted partly by government policy and partly, though to a lesser degree, by the smallness of the domestic market and lack of available finance.

3. The most important export crops grown in Mozambique are cotton, sugar and cashew. Until recently cotton and sugar were the two leading exports, both of them oriented towards supplying Portugal's needs, but since 1957 exports of cashew have nearly trebled in value making this the Territory's principal export crop. In 1964, raw cotton and cashew together accounted for more than one third of Mozambique's visible exports by value while sugar had fallen temporarily to fourth place, contributing only 8.1 per cent of export revenue, a situation which may soon change when current projects for increased sugar production (see section II B below) are completed. Of lesser importance are sisal, accounting in 1964 for 9 per cent of exports by value, copra which accounted for 6.9 per cent, and tea, accounting for 5.4 per cent. Apart from these six crops which together made up 68 per cent of the Territory's export earnings, other agricultural products, which together represent about 7 per cent of exports by value, are vegetable oils and cakes, fruit, tobacco, rice, coffee and horticultural products.

4. Except for cashew, of which Mozambique has in the past few years become the leading producer, accounting for almost half the total world exports of unshelled cashew, the Territory is not a major world producer of any other crop. It ranks fifth among African countries in the production of cotton and although it possesses the largest copra plantation in the world, its output of copra represents only 1 per cent of the world's supply and it produces only 0.6 per cent of the combined world output of sugar.

5. About one third of the agricultural exports go to Portugal or other Territories under Portuguese administration, including practically all the cotton, sugar and vegetable oils, which are exported under compulsory quotas and at fixed prices. The other major crops are exported mainly to foreign countries, the principal destinations being, for cashew India and the United States of America, for sisal France and the United States of America, for copra Spain, Norway, Israel and Denmark, and for tea the United Kingdom.

6. Mozambique's agricultural exports are all subject to various forms of government control. In the case of cotton and sugar government policy has been to direct practically all exports to Portugal at officially regulated prices, the object being to ease the burden on Portugal's balance of payments and, as concerns cotton, to provide an assured supply of raw material to the metropolitan textile mills at prices which, for many years, were below those prevailing in world markets. Similar controls apply to oil seeds although in most cases priority is given to the oil mills in the Territory. Other crops are subject to different forms of regulation and all are subject to exchange control.

7. Export tariffs and special taxes on agricultural products contribute to the general revenue of the Territory and to the financing of agricultural and allied forms of development. Thus, for cotton, special taxes, varying from 3 to 5 per cent ad valorem on exported raw cotton and 35 per cent on all cotton seed produced, are used to defray the expenditure of the Cotton Institute on the development and regulation of the cotton industry and also for general agricultural development, including settlement, in cotton growing areas. In the case of sugar there is, in addition to the standard export tax of 1 per cent ad valorem, a surtax of 10 centavos per kilogramme. Crops which are exported to foreign countries usually pay a surtax and, where appropriate, an additional tax, imposto de sobrevalorização, calculated on the basis of the increase in price over that prevailing in 1949. For unshelled cashew, the special export taxes in July 1965 were a 2.5 per cent ad valorem surtax and a sobrevalorização tax varying from 479 escudos to 551 escudos per ton depending on the district of origin. For copra and sisal, tax rates have varied, depending largely on the conditions of the export market. At present, sisal is subject only to the standard duty of 1 per cent ad valorem, plus a surtax of 5 per cent.

8. Mozambique's main source of public revenue remains, however, its ports and railways which, together with other autonomous services, yielded 1,897 million escudos in 1965. In contrast, export duties yielded only 68.4 million, the imposto de sobrevalorização 11.8 million, and cotton taxes 33.7 million.

B. Pattern of production

9. Possessing a land area approximately seven times the size of Portugal with wide variations of climate and topography which make it possible to grow both tropical and temperate zone crops, Mozambique's agricultural potential still remains largely untapped. Though some areas, specifically the inland country between the Limpopo and Save rivers, the southern part of the Tete district and parts of Niassa district, suffer from aridity and poor soils, it is estimated that approximately one third of the total land area is suitable for tillage agriculture. Of this, less than 3 per cent is actually cultivated.

10. The exact extent of the area under cultivation is difficult to assess, mainly because much of African agriculture is still based on shifting cultivation. According to rough calculations it is believed that Africans cultivate an average of about 500,000 hectares, nearly half of which is devoted to subsistence food crops such as sorghum, maize, millet, manioc, beans and a variety of vegetables. Among cash crops, African farmers grow almost the entire cotton crop, most of rice, sesame and ground-nuts. They also produce, mainly from uncultivated trees and plants, about half the cashew crops, about 29 per cent of the Territory's copra, as well as castor seeds, mafurra and mangrove bark. These cash crops are sold to dealers at controlled markets and, in some cases, at officially fixed prices.

11. Most of the important export crops are, in fact, controlled by non-African capital since they are produced on European-owned farms and plantations or are purchased by non-Africans who control the processing factories. Certain cash crops, specifically sugar, sisal, jute, copra, tea, tobacco, maize, citrus fruit and bananas are solely or mainly grown on organized plantations and farms by Europeans using African labour. Likewise, cashew and rice are also being cultivated increasingly on European holdings. In 1961, the latest year for which such information is available, there were 2,707 non-African holdings totalling 1.7 million hectares of which, however, only 365,249 hectares were actually under cultivation. About 85 per cent of the holdings were owned by individual farmers in addition to which there were some thirteen large companies, mainly concerned with plantation-type crops such as sugar, sisal, copra, jute and tea, which require substantial capital investment. Table 1 shows the number and distribution of non-African agricultural holdings by districts in 1961, information on more recent developments being contained in the separate sections on the major cash crops.

TABLE 1. MOZAMBIQUE: NON-AFRICAN AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS IN 1960-1961

District	Number of farms	Holdings		Area under cultivation (hectares)	Total labour force
		Total area (hectares)	Average area (hectares)
Lourenço Marques	404	201,440	499	34,061	17,000
Gaza	830	171,282	206	18,046	8,300
Inhambane	165	112,829	684	15,567	1,652
Manica e Sofala	340	526,919	1,550	56,265	25,268
Tete	31	7,446	240	1,721	758
Zambézia	314	315,210	1,004	110,425	57,980
Moçambique	480	303,949	633	113,225	23,222
Cabo Delgado	103	47,449	4,607	23,897	4,374
Niassa	40	17,199	430	1,038	927
TOTAL	2,707	1,703,723	630	374,246	139,481

SOURCE: Mozambique, Estatística Agrícola, 1961.

12. Compared with ten years previously, this represents an increase of about 30 per cent in the total area of holdings; the proportion under cultivation remaining fairly constant at about 22 per cent. The largest relative increases were in the districts of Manica e Sofala, Lourenço Marques and Niassa where the area of holdings more than doubled.

13. It may be noted that out of a total of 2,423 agricultural enterprises existing in 1960, 2,246 were Portuguese owned. Of the remainder, 45 were owned by Indians, 32 by Germans, including several sisal estates, 26 by Greeks and 14 by British interests, including the largest sugar company.

14. The principal region of agricultural production is the area north of the Zambezi River and including most of the districts of Zambézia, Moçambique and Cabo Delgado. Long under-developed except for sisal and copra plantations along the coast, it now produces about three quarters of the Territory's cotton, four fifths of the cashew and peanut sales, most of the copra and sisal, much of the rice and tobacco and all the tea, in addition to a variety of other crops, including bananas, jute and vegetables. The principal zones of cultivation consist of (a) a low-lying coastal belt which is the main producing area for copra, sisal and cotton; (b) the interior highlands, particularly around Milange, Tacuane, Gurue and Malema where are located the principal tea and tobacco estates; and

(c) the interior of Cabo Delgado district which, in addition to the coastal belt, is the main cashew producing area. Elsewhere, particularly in the district of Niassa, there are large areas of untapped land, partly due to lack of communications and partly to poor soils and aridity. The district of Tete also remains relatively undeveloped, except near the border of Southern Rhodesia and on the highlands of the Angónia plateau in the north, which is predominantly a cattle-ranching area.*

15. In the central region, comprising the district of Manica e Sofala, agricultural development is mainly centred in the rich alluvial soils of the river valleys, and the interior highlands of the Chimoio concelho, adjacent to the Beira-Salisbury railway. The Zambezi and Buzi river valleys are the present centre of sugar production, while kenaf is grown industrially in the Púnguê river valley which is also the site of a proposed sugar development. In addition, the Zambezi, Púnguê and Revué valleys and the Chimoio uplands around Vila Pery are the scene of colonization schemes based on maize, tobacco, cotton and rice. Elsewhere the Manica e Sofala district is sparsely populated and little developed despite the availability of an estimated 6 million hectares suitable for agriculture..

* Although the national herd numbers about 1.1 million head of cattle, production is almost entirely for the domestic market. Cattle ranching is restricted to tsetse free areas and, except for the Angónia region, is mainly undertaken by big agricultural enterprises to feed their own workers.

16. In southern Mozambique, which comprises the area south of the Save River, the most fertile agricultural zones are found in the valleys of the Limpopo, Incomati, Umbeluzi and Maputo rivers. Dairying, market gardening, rice and cotton cultivation are carried on near Lourenço Marques and the Incomati Valley produces sugar and bananas. The European and African settlement schemes in the Limpopo Valley (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex II) are important producers of food crops and the area is also notable for cattle raising and cashew production.

17. Complete production statistics are available only in respect of "organized" crops produced on non-African holdings. For African production, data are available only in respect of the quantities sold to traders or in licenced markets and do not include subsistence production. Since, however, sales of most crops to non-Africans must be made in licenced markets, this is probably a fair representation of the volume of cash crops grown by Africans. Table 2 A, below, shows the output on non-African holdings for the years 1950-1951 and 1960-1961, from which it can be seen that the value of output nearly doubled over the decade and that the largest proportional increases were in sugar, rice and cotton. Table 2 B, giving comparable data for crops purchased from Africans, shows an increase in value of only about 20 per cent.

TABLE 2. PRODUCTION OF CASH CROPS, 1950-1951 AND 1960-1961

A. Crops grown on non-African holdings
Crop	Area under cultivation (hectares)		Production (metric tons)		Value (thousand escudos)
	1950/51	1960/61	1950/51	1960/61	1950/51	1960/61
Cane Sugar	24,900	38,578	84,884	165,134	160,414	482,065
Tea	10,729	14,795	2,970	8,099	45,193	149,140
Sisal (fibre)	53,701	56,973	18,888	28,252	150,804	138,438
Copra	69,037	82,622	25,803	32,806	85,924	87,816
Rice	2,036	16,435	1,789	32,261	3,313	70,386
Tobacco	1,606	3,979	908	2,100	12,433	31,268
Fruits	8,747	10,705	31,843	31,080	25,726	29,310
Maize	38,687	29,379	23,871	23,447	34,061	28,859
Potatoes	1,010	2,570	4,201	10,040	8,895	24,679
Horticulture	1,065	1,924	8,545	10,570	9,158	13,158
Cashew (nuts) ...	37,026	59,937	3,320	5,829	7,811	12,232
Cotton (seed cotton)	830	3,286	190	1,110	216	3,450
Others	43,500	53,060	24,694	77,163
TOTAL	292,874	374,243	568,642	1,147,937

B. Crops purchased from Africans
Crop	Production (metric tons)		Value (thousand escudos)
	1951	1961	1951	1961
Rice	12,896	18,654	12,298	25,276
Sorghum	7,072	4,129	7,182	4,712
Maize	31,001	42,731	31,723	40,890
Wheat	535	4,231	1,072	10,577
Peanuts	15,157	17,111	21,699	31,374
Cashew nuts	38,313	34,563	81,879	59,951
Copra	13,696	9,958	62,626	26,587
Seed cotton	89,316	110,651	236,886	379,960
Manioc	30,722	12,341	24,198	8,658
Others	11,645	8,110	24,117	14,761
TOTAL	250,353	262,479	503,680	602,746

SOURCE: Mozambique, Estatística Agrícola, 1951 and 1961.

II. PRODUCTION, PROCESSING AND MARKETING OF MAJOR CROPS

A. Cotton

General

18. Cotton is probably one of the oldest exchange crops in Mozambique, having been introduced by Arab traders long before the colonial era. For various reasons, however, the Territory did not become an important producer of cotton until after the First World War when Portugal, faced with a need to conserve foreign exchange, introduced the special régime described in the preceding study for the purpose of supplying its textile industry. Between 1926 and 1932, the rate of development was slow partly because of the effects of the world economic depression and partly because the Territory lacked skilled agricultural technicians, but from about 1936 onwards production increased rapidly and by 1942 Mozambique had already established itself as Portugal's principal source of supply. In 1961, the Territory furnished over 62 per cent of Portugal's cotton imports by volume, accounting for about 3.7 per cent of the total value of all Portugal's imports.

19. Compared with major producing countries such as the United States of America or India, Mozambique's output is small. During the triennium 1960/61 to 1962/63 its share in world production amounted to only 0.3 to 0.4 per cent, and it accounted for less than 5.4 per cent of the combined output of Africa. In terms of Mozambique's own economy, however, cotton plays a major role. For the twenty years up to 1964, when for the first time it was surpassed by cashew exports, it was the Territory's leading export commodity, contributing in recent years about 30 per cent of the value of all visible exports and engaging an average of over 500,000 African growers.

20. Cotton is cultivated throughout most of Mozambique, except in the interior highlands and the coastal marshes. The main productive region lies north of the Zambezi River, in the districts of Cabo Delgado, Niassa, Moçambique, and Zambézia which together produce more than two thirds of the total crop. Other important areas are the Limpopo and Umbeluzi river valleys in the south, the coastal area from the Limpopo northward to Vilanculos, and, in Manica e Sofala, the high land of the Gorongosa plateau.

21. The cotton cultivated is a long-fibre variety producing fibres of 28-34 millimetres. The crop is mainly exported as raw (ginned) cotton, predominantly to Portugal, although a small part (about 4 per cent in 1960) is used for the local manufacture of cotton thread and textiles. Cotton by-products such as oil and seeds are also processed locally and exported.

Organization of production

22. Cotton is predominantly an African crop grown on small plots of one or more hectares depending on the size of the family. Production by Europeans and others on a larger scale is relatively unimportant. In 1960/61, the last year for which detailed statistics are available, there were only 95 non-African farms with a combined area under cotton of 2,649 hectares producing only 1,010 tons of seed cotton, or less than 1 per cent of the Territory's output. A limited quantity of high-grade cotton is grown under irrigation by European settlers in the Limpopo Valley settlement and it is proposed to make irrigated cotton one of the basic crops of the 120,000 hectares settlement scheme in the Zambezi Valley which was included in the Transitional Development Plan for 1965-1967 (see A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex II). The overwhelming bulk of cotton is produced, however, by Africans without irrigation.

23. The special régime for African-grown cotton has been described in a previous study. Prior to 1961 this involved directed cultivation supervised by the agents of concessionary companies with the support of the local administrative services and under the over-all guidance of the Cotton Export Board. The Board designated the areas where cotton was to be grown and determined the amount of land which Africans in the cotton zones were expected to cultivate. According to general instructions (Bases para a Campanha Algodoeira) drawn up by the Board and approved by the Governor-General in 1948, able-bodied African males between the ages of 18 and 55 were designated as cotton farmers (agricultores) and were each expected to cultivate one hectare of cotton, increased by one-half hectare for each wife after the first, plus an equal area of food crops. Single women, if able-bodied and between 18 and 45 years of age, and men between 56 and 60 years, were called cotton cultivators and were expected to cultivate one half hectare each of cotton and food crops.

24. As explained in the previous study, the African growers were under the supervision of the agents of the concession holders, who also distributed seeds and furnished tools. Within the cotton zones, the concessionary companies allocated the land to be devoted to cotton cultivation, subject to approval by the Board, and were required by legislation to group these areas into concentrations to permit the communal use of machinery and the balanced cultivation of food crops in conjunction with cotton. According to one report, however, efforts to bring about the regrouping of producers led to complaints from the African growers and in many cases were abandoned.^b growing areas in the north. Consequently, from the early 1940s onwards efforts were made to eliminate marginal areas and to concentrate on increased yields while, under the legislation of 1946, concessionaires were given the additional responsibility of supervising the growing of food crops in their concessions. As a result the number of growers diminished until by 1949 it attained relative stability at approximately 520,000. In 1960, a year of peak production, there were 529,000 African growers cultivating an area of 297,000 hectares, or only 37,000 hectares more than in 1944. Their combined output of 139,740 tons was, however, more than double the earlier figure.

25. The number of Africans registered as cotton growers reached a peak figure in 1944 of 791,000,^c cultivating an area of 267,000 hectares and producing approximately 64,000 tons of seed cotton during the year. The rapid extension of cotton growing, however, added to other factors, had already given rise to serious food shortages in the cotton zones, amounting on occasion to famine proportions in some of the main cotton-

26. With the expansion of cotton production, the area controlled by some concessionary companies grew to immense proportions, one of them, for example (see below) holding twenty-three concessions covering about half of two administrative districts. According to one report,^d the possession of monopoly rights in such vast areas gave rise to many complaints that, despite the legal safeguards, concessionary companies were able to exercise pressure on Africans to grow cotton and to pay prices below the officially fixed minima.

27. The legislation of 1961 and 1963 put an end to compulsory cultivation and to all intervention by administrative officials in the growing of cotton. It also provided for the progressive abolition of the exclusive concessions, to be completed by 31 August 1966. The decree of 1963 which provided for the abolition of the concessions in effect separated the three functions which the concessionaires previously performed, namely (a) supervision of cultivation; (b) purchase of cotton from the growers; and (c) ginning and processing. The first function, including the selection of land, supervision of growers and distribution of seeds and tools became the sole responsibility of the Institute while the right to purchase cotton in any given market was to be allocated by competitive bidding to the licenced dealer who undertook to pay the highest prices above the official minima; where no dealer came forward, the Institute itself would purchase the cotton at the official prices. The former concessionary companies would continue to gin and process cotton, but would do so on behalf of dealers or the Institute on payment of an officially fixed commission. There was nothing, of course, to prevent a company owning a ginning factory from also being a licenced dealer.

28. During the present transitional period before the complete abolition of all concessions on 31 August 1966, it is not known which concessions are still extant and which have been abandoned. It appears, however, that many concessions were surrendered after 1963 which, on account of drought, was an unusually bad year for cotton production. Thus, one concessionaire, the Companhia da Zambézia, abandoned its concession in the district of Tete after reporting that it had incurred a net operating loss of over 4 million escudos in 1962/63 due to the fact that its cotton output had dropped from 1,249 tons in 1960 to only 340 tons in 1963.

29. Another indication of the extent of the changeover is a recent report that in 1964 the Cotton Institute purchased 40 per cent of the total cotton crop. It may be noted that the Institute was obliged to do this because of the absence of competition from licenced buyers in many markets. According to one source, the failure of licenced buyers to bid for the 1964 crop was due to resistance on the part of the former concessionaires to the new system.

30. Following the revision of the cotton régime, attention appears to be directed now towards more intensive cotton farming, either with irrigation, as in the Limpopo and Zambezi Valley Settlement Schemes, or in organized settlements for dry-land cultivation. Since 1963 the Cotton Institute has begun the organization of colonatos in the district of Moçambique, using the Cotton Development Fund, derived from taxes, licence fees and other revenue of the Institute, to provide housing, cleared land, transportation and communal depots of farm machinery. By the end of 1965, however, only two such colonatos had as yet been established, at Muíte and Cabo Antonio (circunscrição of Imala).

31. As stated above, the present position in regard to the concessionary companies is not clear. In 1960, however, there were 12 concessionary companies owning 17 ginning

^b Nelson Saraiva Bravo, "A Cultura Algodoeira na Economia do Norte de Moçambique", Junta de Investigações do Ultramar, Estudos de Ciências Políticas e Sociais, No. 66 (Lisbon, 1963).

^c This figure relates only to registered growers and may well understate the total number of Africans, including children, who were involved.

^d Bravo, op. cit.

factories and nine subsidiary ginneries with a total of 5,385 industrial employees. The largest of these companies, Companhia dos Algodões de Moçambique, with a registered capital of 150 million escudos, held a purchasing monopoly in 23 zones covering about half the area of the districts of Zambézia and Moçambique. In 1960 it purchased nearly one third of the total African crop. The second largest, Sociedade Agrícola Algodoeira, with a registered capital of thirty million escudos, controlled nine cotton zones, including the whole district of Cabo Delgado, while the Algodoeira do Sul do Save, Lda. controlled most of the output in the districts of Inhambane and Gaza. Other companies held much fewer concessions and some, such as Sena Sugar Estates, Ltd. and the Companhia do Buzi (see section B) were primarily engaged in other activities. A list of concession holders registered in 1960 appears below.

MOZAMBIQUE: COTTON CONCESSIONARY COMPANIES IN 1960

Company	District
Algodoeira do Sul do Save, Lda.	Gaza and Inhambane
Companhia do Buzi, S.A.R.L.	Manica e Sofala (one zone)
Companhia Nacional Algodoeira	Manica e Sofala
Companhia da Zambézia, S.A.R.L.	Tete (one zone)
Sociedade Algodoeira de Tete, Lda.	Tete
Companhia Agrícola e Comercial Lopes e Irmãos	Zambézia (one zone)
Sena Sugar Estates, Ltd.	Zambézia (two zones)
Monteiro e Giro, Lda.	Zambézia (two zones)
Companhia dos Algodões de Moçambique	Moçambique, Cabo Delgado and Zambézia (23 zones)
Companhia Agrícola e Comercial João Ferreira dos Santos	Moçambique (6 zones)
Sociedade Algodoeira do Niassa	Niassa and Moçambique (5 zones)
Sociedade Agrícola Algodoeira (SAGAL)	Cabo Delgado and Niassa (10 zones)

Cotton textile industry

32. Legislation regulating cotton textile manufacture in the Overseas Territories is described in part two of appendix I above. It may be recalled that until June 1965 the establishment of cotton textile factories was governed by decrees of 1944 and 1945 limiting the amount of cotton textiles which each Territory could produce.

33. In 1963 there were five cotton textile factories in Moçambique, of which three were small producers of cotton goods for local consumption and a fourth, the Companhia Industrial Algodoeira, which produces only cotton-wool and bandages, was only slightly larger. The combined output of these four companies was valued at only 2.3 million escudos in 1960.

34. By far the largest cotton textile producer in both Moçambique and Angola is the Sociedade Algodoeira de Fomento Colonial (SAFC) which was formed in 1950 (Decree Law 37,847, 3 June) as the result of a merger of two textile companies, the Sociedade Algodoeira de Portugal in Moçambique, and the Companhia de Fomento Colonial in Angola. The present company has its headquarters in Portugal and has a factory in Moçambique (Textafrika) and one in Angola (Textang). The company is owned jointly by the Portuguese State and by metropolitan textile interests. Its board of directors, all Portuguese, consists of A. Magalhaes (chairman), J. Sobral Meireles, J. R. Machado Pinto, A. Pimental and J. C. Barbosa. The company's registered capital is 200 million escudos, but actual capital investment was reported to be 514.4 million escudos on 31 December 1964. In addition to its cotton textile factories, the company holds controlling interests in: the Sociedade Hidro-Eléctrica do Révúê which furnishes electric power to its Moçambique factory (19.5 million escudos); the Empresa Moçambicana de Malhas, a knitted goods factory in Moçambique (6.8 million escudos); the Companhia de Seguros Ourique, an insurance company (0.974 million); and the Cooperativa dos Produtores e Exportadores de Café of Angola (10 million).

35. The company's output of cotton textiles has been expanding rapidly in recent years, as is indicated by the growing value of its sales which, for both factories combined, rose from 22.5 million escudos in 1955 to 73 million escudos in 1960 and more than doubled between 1960 and 1964. The company's combined net profit amounted to 12 million escudos in 1961 and 16.1 million in 1964. The latter figure was made up of profits of 12.2 million and 5.2 million escudos in respect of its operations in Moçambique and Angola respectively, less a deficit of 375,000 escudos incurred in Portugal where it has its headquarters. In 1964, it distributed 10 million escudos to shareholders in the form of a dividend at 5 per cent.

36. The company's results for 1964 show that it was producing 18 million metres of textiles annually valued at 150 million escudos. The largest share of production, about three quarters of the company's total output comes from the Moçambique factory (Textafrika) located at Vila Pery in Manica e Sofala district. This factory was reported in 1961 to be equipped with 460 automatic looms and 14,460 spindles and to consume an average of 2,000 tons of cotton lint each year (representing about 5 per cent of the volume exported). The factory produces between 40 and 50 per cent of the cotton textiles consumed in Moçambique (see table 5). According to the chairman of the board of directors, reporting on activities in 1964, the company's operations had been affected by, among other things, the high prices which it had to pay to acquire cotton (owing to the export quotas and because cotton sold to local industry is subject to the same taxes as that exported to Portugal) and the limited markets in Angola and Moçambique. In 1960, the company's labour force at both factories consisted of 172 Europeans and 1,845 Africans whose wages totalled respectively 7.5 million escudos and 4.8 million escudos, the Africans receiving food and lodging in addition to their wages. By 1965 the total labour force had increased to 3,000.

37. Exports of cotton textiles amounted to only 29 million escudos in 1962, going almost entirely to Angola. The insignificant volume of cotton exported was apparently due to the production limit which was rescinded by the decree of June 1965. During the same year, the Territory imported, mainly from Portugal, 3,379 tons of textiles valued at 227.1 million escudos.

Other cotton by-products

38. Before the Second World War, cotton seed which was not required for replanting was destroyed. During the late 1940s, however, rising world prices justified the cost of export and cotton seed began to be exported, reaching a peak in 1949 of 26,470 tons, valued at 36.6 million escudos. Thereafter, exports of unprocessed seed rapidly declined as local oil mills began to be established. Under local legislation enacted in 1954 (Despatch of 31 May 1954) no exports of cotton seed are allowed until the quotas for the local oil mills are filled.

39. The vegetable oil industry includes three factories which manufacture cotton seed oil besides other oils. Two of these belong to the Companhia Industrial do Manapo, a subsidiary of the Companhia Industrial Portuguesa, and the third to the Moçambique Industrial, S.A.R.L. which has a registered capital of 21 million escudos. Most of the cotton seed oil produced, amounting to 6,571 tons (valued at 57.5 million escudos) in 1960, is consumed in the Territory and only an insignificant surplus is exported. The residue from oil milling likewise has a value as fodder for livestock. Most of this produce is exported to countries in northern Europe. In 1962 it produced an export revenue of 43 million escudos.

The economic role of cotton

40. Since 1926 cotton production in Mozambique has been closely regulated in order to meet the needs of Portugal's textile industry. Supplied to Portugal under compulsory quota and produced until 1961 by forced cultivation, cotton has for the past twenty-five years been Mozambique's principal export product and the foremost economic activity of its inhabitants, engaging over one half million producers.

41. The main period of production increase dates from 1941. Prior to 1936 African production of seed cotton rarely exceeded 4,000 tons in any year and from 1936 to 1940 the average yearly output was under 20,000 tons. In 1941, however, it increased sharply to 51,000 tons and thereafter continued to increase, except for occasional bad crop years, as follows:

TABLE 3. MOZAMBIQUE: AFRICAN PRODUCTION OF SEED COTTON

Year	Production		Area cultivated (thousand ha.)	Number of growers (thousands)
	Volume (thousand tons)	Value (million escudos)
1941-1950* ..	64.6	89.3	261	613
1950-1955* ..	99.6	262.8	266	504
1956	65.2	182.6	293	518
1957	108.2	309.5	300	513
1958	91.5	260.2	301	516
1959	134.9	393.6	312	536
1960	139.7	405.2	297	529
1961	110.1	379.9
1962	120.0

SOURCE: Cotton Export Board to 1960, thereafter Estatística Agrícola.

* Yearly average.

42. As may be seen from the above table, output remained fairly stable during the period 1941-1950, but showed sharp increases during the next quinquennium and again during the period 1957-1960, each increase being accompanied by a marked rise in the official prices (much of which was not however passed on to the grower since it was discounted to pay higher taxes). It is also noteworthy that the area under cultivation increased only slightly while the number of growers actually declined.

43. Between 1953 and 1962 raw cotton accounted for between 20 and 33 per cent of Mozambique's visible exports by value. Since 1960, however, its relative importance has declined rapidly to only about 18 per cent in 1963 and 1964 due partly to a falling off in production and prices but mainly to the rapid increase in exports of other commodities, particularly cashew. About 89 per cent of all the raw cotton produced in Mozambique is exported to Portugal and about 5 per cent is consumed in the local manufacture of textiles. Exports to other countries are insignificant, the largest foreign buyer in 1960 being Japan which received only 4 per cent of exports. Table 4 below shows the production and export of cotton lint.

44. It may be noted that the bulk of Mozambique's output of cotton lint is still exported to Portugal under the compulsory quota system for which export prices, c.i.f. Lisbon, are officially fixed although the decree of 1963 provided that this system should be terminated within a maximum time-limit of five years. As has already been pointed out in the previous study, these prices were until about 1956 substantially below international quotations for comparable grades of cotton. According to one source,^o the cotton exported to Portugal from Mozambique in respect of the crop years 1947-1955 would, if sold freely on the world market, have fetched about 6.9 billion escudos, or 60 per cent more than the 4.1 billion escudos paid by Portugal.

45. The same policy is reflected in the legislation relating to cotton textile manufactures, which was however revoked in June 1965. Under the legislation prior to that date, the local production of textiles was restricted by a maximum supply

TABLE 4. MOZAMBIQUE: PRODUCTION, LOCAL CONSUMPTION AND EXPORTS OF COTTON LINT

Year	Production (thousand tons)	Local consumption (thousand tons)	Portugal (thousand tons)	Exports		Percentage of total exports
				Total
				Thousand tons	Million escudos
	(1)	(2)	(3)	(4)	(5)	(6)
1955 ...	32.4	0.8	31.0	32.7	430.9	28.0
1956 ...	21.6	1.0	21.2	22.7	308.8	20.1
1957 ...	34.9	0.9	30.0	31.6	477.1	25.1
1958 ...	31.8	1.8	34.8	36.0	549.1	27.5
1959 ...	38.7	1.8	32.8	35.0	540.6	28.5
1960 ...	47.8	1.9	39.2	44.4	681.5	32.5
1961 ...	37.1	2.1	38.9	42.6	696.0	27.1
1962 ...	41.4	1.9	34.7	36.3	612.9	23.2
1963	31.6	33.0	527.8	18.0
1964	33.4	33.6	568.2	18.5

SOURCES: Columns (1) and (2): Mozambique, Estatística Industrial, 1955-1962; columns (3) to (6): Mozambique, Comércio Externo, 1955-1962 and Economia de Moçambique, October 1965.

quota and by the requirement that raw cotton be sold to local manufacturers at the prices obtaining in Portugal. As is shown in table 5 below, imports of cotton textiles, mainly from Portugal, represent about 7.4 per cent of the total value of visible imports. It has been estimated by one source in Mozambique,² that were these imports to have been replaced by December 1964. Columns (3) to (5): Portugal, Anuário local production, it might have resulted in a reduction of the trade deficit and a corresponding increase in domestic product of about 251 million escudos in 1964, or about 1,361 million escudos over the years 1958 to 1964 inclusive.

^o Bravo, op. cit.

² Economia de Moçambique, Lourenço Marques, October 1965.

B. Sugar

General

46. The growing and processing of sugar cane constitutes one of the largest agro-industrial activities in Mozambique. Among the oldest crops cultivated in the Territory, its commercial exploitation began only at the end of the nineteenth century when the first big sugar enterprises were established under sub-concessions granted by the Moçambique and Zambézia companies. With a limited local market, sugar has been produced mainly to supply the needs of metropolitan Portugal and has been the object of government regulation and protective measures since 1901.

47. Approximately 65 per cent of the sugar produced in Mozambique goes to Portugal under quota, about 5.5 per cent to other Portuguese Territories and about 29.6 per cent is consumed locally. Very little has been exported elsewhere. Mozambique supplied about 75 per cent of Portugal's sugar imports up to 1963, mostly in the form of raw sugar, and accounts for around two thirds of all sugar produced in Portuguese Territories. In 1964, however, Portugal imported 34 per cent of its requirements from foreign countries.

TABLE 5. MOZAMBIQUE: LOCAL PRODUCTION AND IMPORT OF COTTON TEXTILES

Year	Local production		Imports ^a		From Portugal (million escudos)
	Thousand tons	Million escudos	Total
			Thousand tons	Million escudos
	(1)	(2)	(3)	(4)	(5)
1955	1.1	37.3	5.7	362.3	294.9
1956	1.5	47.9	5.1	339.8	271.6
1957	1.3	41.8	5.0	335.9	263.6
1958	1.4	59.9	5.0	324.2	248.0
1959	3.1	70.7	5.3	330.5	241.5
1960	3.6	70.4	5.5	361.0	267.1
1961	4.1	109.3	3.4	210.4	161.8
1962	3.7	131.8
1963	3.2	147.6
1964	3.9	131.9	5.3	360.7	...

SOURCES: Columns (1) and (2): Mozambique, Estatística Industrial, 1955-1962 and, for 1963 and 1964, Boletim Mensal, December 1964. Columns (3) to (5): Portugal, Anuário Estatístico do Ultramar, 1955-1963.

^a Includes cotton thread and cotton cloth.

48. Production has increased rapidly in recent years, particularly during the second half of the 1950's when average output was 66 per cent higher than in the preceding five years and double the pre-war average. Until 1961, when for the first time it was surpassed by rapidly growing cashew exports, sugar was Mozambique's second most valuable export crop equal to about half the export value of cotton. During the last decade it has contributed between 8 and 16.8 per cent of the total value of the Territory's exports.

49. In 1963-1964, Mozambique produced 181,775 tons of sugar. This represented about 0.6 per cent of world production and slightly more than 6 per cent of all sugar produced in Africa. Current development programmes, which are described in the following sections, will however greatly increase the Territory's output within the next few years.

50. Sugar is grown exclusively in the southern part of Mozambique in the river valleys where the alluvial soils and moist climate are reported to be capable of producing high yields. The cane is mostly a hybrid variety, producing in 1960-1961 an average yield of 6.1 tons of sugar per hectare. The crop is capital-intensive, grown mainly under irrigation and at present on factory-owned estates although recent developments indicate a trend towards a system of outgrowers. Up to 1961 all production was in the hands of three old-established companies, with estates in the valleys of the Zambezi, Incomati and Buzi rivers. The total area under cultivation at that time was 38,578 hectares. Since then, however, three new companies have entered the field, with plans which, if fully realized, will increase the area by an additional 121,000 hectares (see paras. 83-91).

Organization of production

51. At the present time, sugar production is in the hands of three companies: the Sena Sugar Estates, Ltd., which produces sugar on two factory estates at Luabo and Marromeu, in the delta of the Zambezi River; the Companhia do Buzi, S.A.R.L., which operates at Vila Guilherme in the Buzi Valley, south of Beira; and the Sociedade Agrícola do Incomati, with its estate at Xinavane, in the Incomati Valley, north of Lourenço Marques. In addition, three new companies have recently been established, but have not yet begun production. These are described separately below.

52. The Sena and Buzi companies have their origin in sub-concessions granted by the Moçambique and Zambézia chartered companies at the end of the nineteenth century. The Incomati Company was formed in 1914. Of the three, Sena is by far the largest sugar producer, accounting for about 62 per cent of the Territory's sugar output, while the Incomati and Buzi companies produce respectively about 19 and 13 per cent.

53. The processing of sugar cane takes place in company-owned factories located near the plantations. The sugar is processed only to the extent of producing white sugar for local consumption and raw sugar (ramas amarelas) for export, since Portugal's import regulations have required that at least two thirds of the quotas supplied by the Overseas Territories take this form. Little use is made of the by-products of sugar because of the high cost of transportation. In 1961 about 28,000 tons of molasses were produced mainly for yeast factories in the Territory, while the Incomati Company produced 2 million litres of alcohol.

54. The area of sugar plantations was 38,577 hectares in 1960-1961, of which about 26,500 hectares were harvested during the year. This represents an increase of nearly 50 per cent over 1950-1951. During the same decade sugar production nearly doubled, rising from 89,000 tons to 165,000 tons, the difference being mainly due to higher yields per hectare which rose from an average of 4.9 tons of sugar per hectare to 6.2 tons in 1960-1961. With the introduction of improved systems of irrigation, it is expected to increase present yields, which compare unfavourably, for instance, with yields in Indonesia (8.5 tons per hectare).

55. In 1962, industrial investments by the three companies referred to above amounted to over 1,000 million escudos, 800 million of which was invested in plant and equipment and 133 million in housing for their personnel. Their combined registered capital was 488 million escudos.

(a) Sena Sugar Estates, Ltd.

56. A predominantly British-owned company, Sena Sugar Estates, Ltd. is the most highly capitalized agricultural enterprise in Mozambique. Its issued share capital on 31 December 1964 was £3,521,250 (about 300 million escudos), of which £3,071,250 consisted of ordinary stock, 90 per cent of which was held in the United Kingdom. Its total assets amounted to £5,277,205.

57. The company, in its present form, dates from 1920 and results from an amalgamation of properties the most important of which was the former Sena Sugar Factory founded at the beginning of this century. It has its headquarters in London and its board of directors, all British, is under the chairmanship of Lt. Col. J. D. Hornung, a relative of the original founder. The company has a wholly owned subsidiary, Sociedade Industrial do Ultramar, S.A.R.L., which operates the largest sugar refinery in Portugal, processing all Portuguese imports of the parent company, together with sugar manufactured by other producers.

58. The company's properties in Mozambique include 72,200 hectares of freehold land, about one fourth of which is used for sugar cultivation. Sugar is grown on two estates, one at Luabo on the northern bank of the Zambezi River in the district of Zambézia, and the other at Marromeu, on the southern bank of the river, in the district of Manica e Sofala. In 1958-1959, 10,865 and 9,762 hectares were under cultivation previously used for sugar growing, was converted into a cotton concession in 1936.

59. Like the other sugar estates, the company processes its own cane, owning two of the four sugar factories in Mozambique. These are located near the plantations at Marromeu and in the two estates respectively. A third estate, at Mopeia Chinde (Luabo). In 1963, the factories were reported to have a daily cane processing capacity of 3,200 and 2,900 metric tons respectively, representing 57.5 per cent of the total processing capacity in the Territory. During the past ten years, the production of sugar has fluctuated between about 91,000 tons and 126,000 tons, the peak year being 1962 when 126,486 tons of sugar were manufactured. In 1964, total production was 96,794 tons, of which about 56,000 tons were produced at Marromeu and about 40,000 tons at Luabo. In January 1965, the company announced the commencement of a major development programme, details of which are given separately below (see paras. 83-91 below).

60. The existing installations owned by Sena Sugar Estates, Ltd. include 350 km. of small gauge railway linking the estates to the factories and an 88 km. extension from Marromeu joining the Trans-Zambézia Railway at Caia. In addition, the company operates a small river fleet on which it transports sugar to the port of Chinde where the company has its own loading installations.

61. Apart from its sugar producing activities, Sena until 1962 held a cotton concession centred on its Mopeia estate, where it operates a cotton processing factory. It also owns a small copra plantation near Chinde, where some 100,000 palms yield about 600 tons of copra annually, forestry concessions and a cattle ranch near Luabo. Industrial and commercial activities of the company include cement manufacture, the processing of timber for export, and operation as a shipping agency.

62. In 1952-1953, the last year for which such information is available, the company employed 21,000 Africans and 397 Europeans. According to its own estimates, the company's total contribution to the Mozambique economy in the form of wages, taxes and local expenditures during the period 1932-1952 amounted to nearly 661 million escudos. In 1952, it expended 20.4 million escudos on African wages, plus 18 million escudos on the feeding of African workers and 2.7 million escudos on medical services.

63. Earnings from the various enterprises controlled by Sena cannot be deduced separately from the annual financial statements. The profits, tax provision and dividends paid annually over a four-year period are set out below:

	1960 £	1961 £	1962 £	1963 £
Net profit before taxes (including SIDUL)	654,169	244,466	637,117	540,429
Tax provision	278,295	159,986	288,716	264,271
Liquid profit	361,402	84,474	348,401	276,658
Dividend	199,632	122,850	122,850	122,850

(b) Sociedade Agrícola do Incomati, S.A.R.L.

64. The company was formed in 1914 under the name of Incomati Sugar Estates. Originally British-owned, it changed its name in the early 1950's when it apparently became wholly Portuguese. The company has its headquarters and sugar factory at Xinavane, near Lourenço Marques. In 1964, its authorized capital was 100 million escudos, of which 90 million escudos were paid up. It is the second largest sugar producer in Mozambique. In 1960-1961 it had 8,821 hectares under sugar cultivation from which it produced nearly 38,000 tons of sugar. Its output in 1962 amounted to 30,400 tons of sugar (consisting of 15,800 tons of white sugar and 14,600 tons of raw sugar) and 8,200 tons of molasses.

65. The only other known activity of the company is cattle-ranching which is carried out around Xinavane.

(c) Companhia do Buzi, S.A.R.L.

66. Constituted in 1898 to exploit a sub-concession granted by the Companhia do Moçambique, the company has its headquarters in the Territory and in 1964 had a registered capital of 110 million escudos. It is a multi-activity company and has been described as "the most important and most complete of all the agricultural and industrial organizations of Portuguese nationality in Mozambique." The original land concession, which expired in 1942 when the Companhia do Moçambique ceased to exist, covered 312,500 hectares. Although it is not known how much land is held at the present time, it is probably in excess of 150,000 hectares.

67. Engaged primarily in sugar production, the company is the smallest of the three sugar producers in Mozambique. In 1960-1961 it had 7,982 hectares under sugar cultivation from which it produced 33,200 tons of sugar (including 19,000 tons of white sugar), 10,900 tons of molasses and 2 million litres of alcohol. The company began large-scale sugar production in 1920 when it purchased the former British-owned Illovo Sugar Estates. Its alcohol distillery was installed in 1934.

68. The Buzi company was the first company in Mozambique to introduce sugar cultivation by outgrowers. In 1955 it allocated a portion of the land under its control to ten settler farmers who sell their sugar crop to the company in return for payment of a fixed percentage of the factory price. By 1964 these farmers were responsible for about half the company's sugar cane crop of nearly 209,000 tons. In 1965 it was reported that the company planned to install an additional twenty settlers.

69. In addition to sugar, the Companhia do Buzi formerly held a cotton concession which it relinquished in 1962 and is engaged in forestry, cattle-ranching, the manufacture of ceramic tiles and the operation of flour mills, mainly producing maize flour for its own African employees.

70. In 1964 it was reported that the company's sugar factory, at Nova Lusitânia, was being remodelled by a British contractor at a cost of £300,000 (24 million escudos).

Government regulation and control

(a) Historical survey

71. Sugar is produced in the Overseas Territories mainly in order to supply Portugal's requirements and thereby save foreign exchange. For this reason since 1870, and more particularly since 1901, sugar from the Overseas Territories has been admitted to the Portuguese market under a heavily protective tariff and with quantitative guarantees. In 1930 when world prices slumped, it was decreed (Decree 18,021, March 1930) that all of Portugal's sugar imports should be reserved for the Overseas Territories, in so far as they were able to supply it, and a grémio of overseas sugar producers was created to determine Portugal's annual requirements and to allocate them among its members. There were no penalties attached to failure to meet quotas, which, combined with stabilized prices, were primarily intended to offer producers enough security to expand their production. As a result of this protection, the Overseas Territories were able to supply nearly all of Portugal's sugar imports from 1930 to 1945.

72. After the Second World War, however, sugar consumption in Portugal increased sharply and as this increase was not accompanied by an equivalent rise in the output of the Overseas Territories, Portugal was again forced to import from other sources, this time at prices far in excess of those paid to producers in the Overseas Territories. To remedy this situation, Portugal in 1949 (Decree 37,456, 24 June 1949) established fixed prices for overseas sugar and introduced penalties for producers who failed to meet their quotas. This policy was continued in Decree 38,701 (28 March 1952) which remains in force until 1967 and constitutes the legislative basis of the present régime described below. In 1965 a commission was established to study and make proposals concerning the new régime which will come into effect on 1 May 1967.

(b) Present situation

73. According to Decree 38,701, Mozambique and Angola are each guaranteed until 1967 the right to supply 50 per cent of the sugar consumed in Portugal. The actual amounts to be imported from each Territory, which may be more or less than half the total, are determined in advance for each crop year. These allocations and also any revision of the fixed prices, c.i.f. Lisbon, are decided by the Portuguese Government on the advice of the grémio of overseas sugar producers, taking into account the anticipated production, the needs of

* Mozambique, Documentário Trimestral, No. 32, December 1942.

TABLE 6. MOZAMBIQUE SUGAR COMPANIES: AREA, FACTORY CAPACITY AND OUTPUT, 1960-1961

Location	Registered capital (million escudos) ^a	Area (hectares)	Cane output		Factory capacity ^b (daily m/tons)	Sugar output
			Thousand tons	Tons/ (hectares)		Thousand tons	Yield ^c
Sena Sugar Estates, Ltd.
Marromeu (Manica e Sofala)	288 ^a	11,286	472	53.8	3,200	46.4	10.2
Luabo (Zambézia)		10,460	453	59.7	2,900	47.8	9.5
Sociedade Agrícola do Incomati	100	8,821	316	37.5	2,400	37.7	8.5
Xinavane (Lourenço Marques)
Companhia do Buzi ..	110	7,982	287	43.2	2,100	33.2	8.6
Vila Guilherme (Manica e Sofala)
	498	28,549	1,528		10,600	165.1

^a Registered capital of the company and not only of the sugar factories and plantations.

^b All factories produce white sugar for consumption and raw sugar for export.

^c Number of tons of cane to produce one ton of sugar.

^d Authorized capital.

local consumption and the requirements of other Overseas Territories. Once these global amounts have been determined, the grémio allocates a quota to each of its member companies, the quotas being fixed on the basis of the amounts supplied by each company during the preceding two years. Companies are permitted to export to Portugal in excess of their quotas, but if they fail to fill their quotas because they have sold their sugar on the world market, they are liable to penalties; there is no penalty when the failure to meet the quota is due to unforeseeable circumstances. Provided that quotas are filled, producers may export any surpluses freely to other countries.

74. Mozambique in fact supplies about 75 per cent of Portugal's sugar imports. Over the past decade (1954-1955 to 1964-1965) its global allocation has increased from under 58,000 tons to nearly 132,000 tons. Table 7 below shows the quota distribution by companies in each of eight crop years. Information is not available for the two subsequent years, but in 1964-65 Mozambique's global quota was 131,547 tons, distributed among the three companies as follows: Sena Sugar Estates, Ltd., 82,861 tons; Sociedade Agrícola do Incomati, 24,914 tons; Companhia do Buzi, 23,773 tons.

75. Producers in the Overseas Territories may supply up to one third of their quotas in the form of white sugar, the remainder being raw sugar (ramas amarelas) for refining in Portugal. Producers have not, in fact, taken full advantage of this concession and normally supply about four fifths in the form of raw sugar.

76. The import prices, c.i.f. Lisbon, are fixed by the Portuguese Government under the terms of Decree 38,701 which provides for the revision of prices if the grémio can show that

TABLE 7. MOZAMBIQUE: SUGAR QUOTAS FOR EXPORT TO PORTUGAL BY COMPANY
(Thousand tons)

	Territorial total	Sena	Incomati	Buzi	Actual exports to Portugal
1954-1955	57,880	41,880	8,000	8,000	46,529
1955-1956	82,850	53,650	15,800	13,400	82,707
1956-1957	82,900	53,877	14,002	15,021	84,950
1957-1958	93,030	62,804	15,626	14,600	93,028
1958-1959	100,621	65,369	18,066	17,186	100,221
1959-1960	106,588	70,253	19,281	17,054	106,518
1960-1961	105,784	64,500	22,941	18,343	105,710
1961-1962	101,976	57,000	23,961	21,015	98,594

costs of production, transportation charges, etc. have increased. In 1952 these prices were fixed at 2.85 escudos per kilogramme for raw sugar and 3.75 escudos per kilogramme for white refined sugar. These prices remained in effect until 1964 when (by Decree 45,691, 29 April 1964), the prices were raised to 3.35 escudos and 4.40 escudos respectively.

77. Sugar from the Overseas Territories is subject to an import tax in Portugal of 1.16 escudos per kilogramme for raw sugar and 1.45 escudos per kilogramme for white refined sugar (Decree 45,555, 8 February 1964). In addition a "national salvation tax" of 0.04 escudos per kilogramme is levied. This tax was originally introduced in 1928 during the world economic depression (Decree 15,814) and was essentially a luxury tax to increase public revenue. Its continuance to the present day is a cause of major grievance to sugar producers.

Production, exports and local consumption

78. The regulation and protection by Portugal of the sugar industry in the Overseas Territories has undoubtedly benefited the producers, particularly during the long period of depression lasting from 1929 until the outbreak of the Second World War. On the other hand, it is claimed by some industrialists that, by gearing the development of the industry to Portuguese demand, it tended to inhibit expansion after the war when world prices were higher than those paid by Portugal.

79. In fact, Mozambique's sugar output has corresponded roughly with the growth of the Portuguese market. Between 1935 and 1939 average annual production amounted to 74,000 tons and thereafter it rose slowly to 76,000 tons in 1945-1946 and 89,000 tons in 1950-1951. During the next five years it remained fairly static because, despite a sharp rise in Portugal's consumption, production capacity, having been depleted during the pre-war and wartime years, was unable to meet the demands. By 1955-1956, however, the industry had been re-equipped and over the next eight years output more than doubled as is shown in the following table.

TABLE 8. MOZAMBIQUE: SUGAR PRODUCTION
(Thousand tons)

Crop year	Sugar production ^a			Molasses
	Total	Raw	White
1955/56	124.1	66.0	58.1	26.8
1956/57	139.4	79.7	59.8	28.0
1957/58	164.0	89.2	74.8	31.8
1958/59	153.2	84.8	68.5	30.4
1959/60	165.7	82.2	82.8	33.3
1960/61	165.0	78.2	87.0	33.0
1961/62	165.1	78.2	87.0	33.0
1962/63	186.3	103.3	82.9	19.8
1963/64	181.8

SOURCES: Column (1)—Decree Law 45,691, 28 April 1964; columns (2), (3) and (4)—Mozambique, Estatística Industrial, 1956-1963.

^a Because of the different sources used there are discrepancies between the totals from columns (2) and (3) and the figures in column (1).

80. Although per capita sugar consumption in Mozambique is still low (7.9 kilogrammes in 1961) compared with many other countries, the amount of sugar consumed in the Territory has increased at a faster rate than production and exports during the past thirty years. In 1934-1938 the yearly average of local consumption was 5,400 tons. This increased to 27,677 tons for the period 1951-1955 and 40,318 tons for the period 1956-1960. In 1961 the amount of sugar retained for the local market was 50,801 tons, or 30.8 per cent of total production.

81. Between 1946 and 1955 sugar accounted on an average for slightly less than 12 per cent of Mozambique's total domestic exports by value. In 1957 it reached a peak of 16.8 per cent, thereafter declining in relative importance despite a continuing increase in exports, to only 7.1 per cent in 1962. This relative decline is, of course, attributable to the more rapid increase in the export value of other products. In 1964, sugar ranked fourth among agricultural exports, after cashew, raw cotton and sisal. As the following section shows, this relative importance will probably change when current development projects come to fruition.

82. In the past about 86 per cent of Mozambique's sugar exports went to Portugal. Of the remainder, between 3 and 8 per cent were exported to India, about 9.5 per cent to the former Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland and small quantities to other Territories, including Timor and occasionally Macau. Since 1958, largely owing to the increased consumption in Mozambique, exports of sugar to non-Portuguese Territories in Africa have ceased, except for small quantities of molasses (8,000 tons in 1962). Under the International Sugar Agreement, Portugal has an allowance of 20,000 tons annually which may be used by any sugar producer in the Portuguese space. Up to 1962 Mozambique has not had any surpluses for such exports. The following table shows the amounts consumed locally and exported since 1955.

TABLE 9. MOZAMBIQUE—SUGAR: LOCAL CONSUMPTION, EXPORTS AND PRINCIPAL DESTINATIONS, 1955-1964

Year	Local consumption (thousand tons)	Exports ^a			Main destinations ^a
		Thousand tons	Million escudos	Percentage of total export value	Portugal		Goa	Rhodesia and Nyasaland
					Tons	Percentage	(percentage)	(percentage)
	(1)	(2)	(3)	(4)	(5)	(6)	(7)	(8)
1955 ...	30.0	85.8	213.6	13.98	76,254	88.87	1.45	9.52
1956 ...	35.0	98.2	248.5	16.40	84,704	86.26	3.69	9.75
1957 ...	35.0	122.3	316.0	16.88	100,138	81.88	7.57	9.45
1958 ...	35.0	132.4	337.2	16.62	108,338	81.83	6.66	11.31
1959 ...	44.0	114.1	289.6	15.21	105,048	92.07	5.76	—
1960 ...	45.0	111.3	278.2	13.25	103,862	93.32	6.53	—
1961 ...	50.0	113.8	324.9	12.75	105,219	92.46	7.21	—
1962 ...	55.0	129.9	345.1	13.19	128,690	99.07	—	—
1963 ...	60.0	...	327.5 ^b	11.3 ^b
1964 ...	66.0	...	245.7 ^b	8.1 ^b

SOURCES: All data except column (1): Mozambique, Comércio Externo; column (1): Portugal: Decree Law No. 45,691 of 28 April 1964.

^a These figures do not include molasses.

^b Data derived from Marchés Tropicaux, 1 January 1966.

Recent developments

83. During the past five years there have been reports of considerable expansion in the sugar industry, which is coming to be regarded as one of the great economic resources of the Territory and as an effective means of colonizing previously unsettled areas of the country. Apart from the development programmes of the existing companies (see below), three new companies have been, or are in process of being established.

84. The first of these is the Açucareira de Moçambique, S.A.R.L. which was formed in 1964 and received a provisional concession of 15,000 hectares on the Púnguê River, about 35 km. from Beira, as well as authorization to construct a sugar factory with an annual capacity of 30,000 tons of sugar. The company had an initial registered capital of 8.5 million escudos, which was increased to 100 million escudos in March 1966 when it had completed its financial structure. According to information received in mid-1965 the company was endeavouring to obtain up to 70 per cent of its capital by local subscription in Mozambique, its shares being offered at prices accessible to small investors. The remainder of its share capital was to be made available to foreign financial interests which would furnish technical support. The French firm Compagnie pour l'étude et le développement des échanges commerciaux (COMPADEC) was reported in 1965 to have expressed interest in subscribing a minority holding.

85. The company plans to allocate its entire land concession among 150 settlers with preference going to Mozambique residents already experienced in sugar growing and to young ex-soldiers from Portugal. Each family will receive sufficient land to produce 3,000 tons of sugar cane annually; the cost of land preparation, installation, buildings and equipment will be financed by the company to be repaid by the settler from the sale of his crops. Once repayment has been made the settlers will have freehold ownership of their farms. The plan provides for the formation of a growers' co-operative. It was estimated in early 1965 that the company's total investments would amount to 570 million escudos, of which 365 million would be for industrial equipment, and 206 million for the production of sugar cane.

86. The second company is the Marracuane Agrícola Açucareira, S.A.R.L. (Maragra) which was formed in 1963 by the Marracuane Agrícola e Comercial, Lda. with the aid of a loan of 220 million escudos from the Banco de Fomento Nacional and the Industrial Development Corporation of South Africa.^h The new company is entirely Portuguese-owned and has a registered capital of 130 million escudos. Shares worth 30 million escudos were reserved for subscription in the Territory. The company estimated that total investments would amount to 430 million escudos.

87. The company received a land concession of 6,000 hectares at Manhica in the Incomati Valley. Part of the estate (2,800 hectares) will be managed directly by the company and the remainder (3,200 hectares) will be cultivated by settlers who will be assisted by the company and will sell their cane to it in return for a percentage (55 per cent) of the factory price. The Provincial Settlement Board is in charge of developing the settlement and of selecting and installing the settlers, chosen from among persons already in Mozambique. The settlers will be grouped in villages and the whole settlement will be provided with schools, hospital and recreational facilities. During the first phase of development, 100 European families and 3,200 African workers will be settled in the area.

88. The company has been authorized to construct a sugar factory which when fully developed will have an annual capacity of 60,000 tons of sugar. In addition, it has been authorized to establish a sugar refinery capable of fully refining up to 60 per cent of the sugar produced, one third of the output to be exported to Portugal, the remainder destined for local consumption.

89. The third new enterprise, potentially the largest sugar producer in any Territory under Portuguese administration, is being developed by the Portuguese Development Corporation, a subsidiary of the Anglo-American Corporation of South Africa. In 1964, the Corporation received from the Government of Portugal a land concession of 100,000 hectares located in the lower Zambezi Valley within a triangle bounded by Quelimane, Chinde and Vila Fontes. According to reports the investment capital is of South African and Australian origin. Half the concession will be exploited by the Corporation itself, the remaining 50,000 hectares to be allocated among 500 settlers, each receiving 100 hectares. The land to be distributed to the settlers will be prepared by the Corporation which will also render technical assistance to the growers. The irrigation system is being constructed under contract by a Japanese firm. Sugar production is expected to begin in 1966 or 1967. The Corporation has announced that its ultimate long-range target is an annual output of one million tons of sugar cane.

90. Finally, in January 1965, the Sena Sugar Estates, Ltd. announced the commencement of a major development programme on its existing estates, involving total investments of approximately 360 million escudos. The project includes the construction of a new irrigation system intended to increase the sucrose yield of the existing plantations and a corresponding improvement in factory capacity to bring the company's total output of sugar to about 160,000 tons in 1969 and to an ultimate target of over 200,000 tons by 1970. Of the estimated total investment, 136 million escudos (£1.7 million) will be spent on the installation of an overhead sprinkler irrigation system to be constructed over a period of three years and covering approximately 11,600 hectares of the existing plantations. The funds for this capital investment were being raised mainly in London and the contract for the irrigation work was awarded in January 1965 to a British firm, Wright Rain, Ltd.

91. In 1960-61 the total area devoted to sugar cultivation in Mozambique was 38,577 hectares which produced 1.5 million tons of sugar cane. It is evident therefore that the new developments described above will revolutionize sugar production in the Territory if all plans are fully realized.

C. Cashew

General

92. The cashew tree, indigenous to Brazil, was introduced into Africa and the Indian subcontinent during the sixteenth century. In Mozambique, where conditions are especially suited to its growth, it became widely disseminated by spontaneous reproduction and has long been utilized by the indigenous population as a food and for the manufacture of a fermented drink.^k Its commercial exploitation did not begin, however, until after the First World War when India, which had a virtual monopoly on the processing and export of cashew nuts, began importing unshelled nuts from Mozambique for processing and re-export.

93. During the 1920s and early 1930s, exports to India were small, ranging from 1,000 tons to about 7,000 tons. In 1935, however, India's purchases of cashew from Mozambique rose sharply and, except during the Second World War, continued to increase until 1958 when exports reached a peak of over 97,000 tons valued at 278 million escudos, making cashew one of Mozambique's four major export crops.

94. India's rapidly growing purchases of cashew from Mozambique, which were accompanied by a threefold increase of prices between 1945 and 1958, was due to the opening up of a large world market which Indian production alone could not supply. Even today, the market, especially in the United States of America, is continuing to expand and Mozambique's exports, both in volume and unit value, have grown, the total receipts from cashew exports more than doubling between 1962 and 1964.

95. At the present time Mozambique produces about 150,000 tons of unshelled cashew yearly and accounts for almost half the total of world exports.^j In 1964, Mozambique's exports of cashew amounted to nearly 128,000 tons, valued at 608.4 million escudos and, together with cashew nut shell liquor (11 million escudos), accounted for 20.4 per cent of the Territory's visible exports by value. In 1964, for the first time, the value of cashew exports exceeded that of cotton by nearly 55 million escudos.

96. Although intensive efforts have been made, especially since 1959, to develop industrial processing of cashew in Mozambique, about 97 per cent of the exports in 1964 still consisted of raw cashew sent to India for processing and re-export. The reason for this is that the Indian industry is highly organized and is able to operate large-scale manual decortication at substantially lower cost than elsewhere. In Mozambique, where large concentrations of workers are not readily available and production costs are higher, attention has concentrated on a search for suitable mechanical equipment, both to decorticate the nut and utilize the by-products. A number of techniques have been developed and factories are being rapidly equipped. Though these are still partly experimental, the amount of capital involved suggests that technical problems are being finally overcome. If world consumption continues to increase, cashew may become an outstanding source of wealth and foreign currency for Mozambique. It is estimated that at market prices, the cashew exported in 1964 would, if fully processed, have earned more than 900 million escudos.

97. The cashew tree grows spontaneously over large areas of Mozambique, particularly in light sandy soils in the coastal regions, the heavy clay soils of the Zambezi River delta being the only coastal region where it is not found. It is especially prolific in the Moçambique and Cabo Delgado districts where trees not uncommonly reach a height of up to forty feet, with a spread of over fifty feet. In 1961, the last year for which such information is available, about 60 per cent of the output came from Moçambique district, the most important producing area being around Nampula. The district of Cabo Delgado, although rich in cashew trees, produced only about 20 per cent of the total output owing mainly to difficulties of transportation. The regions next in importance are the districts of Inhambane and Gaza with 18 per cent of total production in 1961. The district of Manica e Sofala, although well-suited to cashew, at present produces only a little because of measures taken at the beginning of this century to reduce the number of trees in order to restrict the manufacture of alcoholic liquor from cashew (see foot-note j above).

^j In 1909 a tax on cashew trees was imposed in Manica e Sofala district in order to limit the number of trees and thereby the amount of alcoholic drink consumed. A former governor, Antonio Enes, writing in 1893 described the cashew as a "tree of vice and ruin", which it would be well to eradicate.

^k Statistics of world production are not available. India, which is the next largest producer, exported 80,000 tons in 1964.

^h In 1966 it received additional loans, totalling 50 million escudos from the Banco Nacional Ultramarino and the Banco de Fomento Nacional.

98. The cashew tree requires about five to six years of growth before it begins to produce fully and it attains its maximum productivity at about twelve years. The tree produces a fruit, commonly known as the "pear", to which the nut is attached. The fruit, which has an astringent taste and is rich in vitamin C and glucose, is commonly eaten or used to produce a fruit juice and an alcohol; in some countries, especially Brazil, these have been developed commercially. The kernel of the nut, which is the main product, can also be used for the extraction of cashew oil. From the husk can be extracted cashew nut shell liquor, which has many industrial uses as a varnish or lacquer or in the manufacture of synthetic rubber and insecticides,^k and in some countries the wood of the tree and the resins extracted therefrom are also used commercially. In Mozambique, so far the only by-product being developed commercially is cashew nut shell liquor.

Organization of production

99. Cashew is predominantly an African crop, more than 87 per cent of the total output coming from sales by Africans. Most of this is obtained from uncultivated trees although, as prices rise, Africans are increasingly growing cashew in combination with other crops and plans have recently been made for settlements based on cashew in the districts of Moçambique and Gaza (see para. 130 below). The African produce is sold to traders, who export the unshelled cashew directly to the processing companies in India with which they have connexions. Until 1964, when the Government began to fix minimum prices to be paid to producers in various areas, the prices depended solely on the available supply and the import prices set in Bombay. The traders being usually also the purveyors of consumer goods to African trading posts, storekeepers offer credit against supplies of cashew. According to a Portuguese source,^l prices are usually high at the beginning of the harvesting season, thereafter dropping as the supply continues. In 1961-1962 for example, in the area of Antonio Enes, the initial price was 2 escudos per kilogramme, falling to 1.5 escudos, thereafter increasing briefly to 2.50 escudos as the supply decreased and then dropping to one escudo per kilogramme. Prices vary according to the quality and size of the nuts, those coming from the northern regions, especially in the area of Nampula, being larger and more valuable, and also according to transportation costs.^m It may be noted that the average export price of the unshelled nut was 3.6 escudos per kilogramme in 1960 and 3.7 escudos in 1961.ⁿ Since the establishment of new processing factories in the Territory, Africans have been able to sell some of their produce directly to the factories at officially fixed prices.

100. The actual number of Africans engaged in the growing or collection of cashew nuts varies from year to year. In the agricultural census of 1962, it was estimated that in the district of Moçambique, which accounted for nearly two thirds of African production, some 279,114 Africans were engaged in collecting nuts from about 10.6 million trees. In Cabo Delgado district, 96,332 Africans were reportedly collecting from over 3 million trees and in the district of Niassa, it was reported, 4,535 Africans were involved in collecting from about 26,500 trees. If the first two districts are taken as the standard it may be seen that the average number of trees per producer was 35 which, at an estimated yield of 20 kilogrammes per tree, would have yielded an average income of 700-1,400 escudos at the prevailing prices.^o

101. Cashew grown on non-African holdings is sold at approximately the same or slightly higher prices depending on quality. Until the mid-1930s very little cashew was produced on non-African farms and it is only recently, with the rise in prices and the establishment of processing factories that it has begun to increase significantly. As late as 1960-61, production on non-African farms amounted to only 6,718 tons, or about 8.3 per cent of the total output. Nevertheless, in that year 59,963 hectares, or one sixth of the cultivated land controlled by non-Africans was planted with cashew, the number of trees being estimated at about 5 million, of which 3 million were in production. Most of this area, 50,610 hectares, was located in the district of Moçambique.

102. Although most large agricultural companies grow some cashew, non-African production is mainly on small or medium-sized farms, where the trees are interspersed with other crops. In 1960-1961 there were 199 farms producing cashew, 191 of which were reported to be owned by Portuguese or companies of Portuguese registration. Two of the large multi-agricultural companies, José Ferreira dos Santos and the Companhia Agrícola de Angoche have recently established their own processing factories (see following section).

Processing industry

103. In 1964 about 97 per cent by weight of all cashew exported from Mozambique consisted of unshelled nuts, nearly all of it going to India for decortication and re-export. The reason for this virtual monopoly by India of cashew processing is the availability in that country of an abundant and experienced labour force which makes it possible for Indian producers to operate large-scale manual decorticating factories at a cost per kilogramme of output about one third of that in Mozambique.^p Besides higher costs of production, Mozambique industrialists also have difficulty in recruiting in any given area the large number of workers which such a factory requires, since the population is dispersed and there are relatively fewer African women compared with men seeking employment.

104. Nevertheless, the local processing of cashew before export offers clear economic advantages to Mozambique, partly because it would reduce the Territory's dependence on India, which is also its principal competitor, but more especially because the export value of the shelled nuts and the liquor contained in the shell is roughly 50 per cent higher, depending on price changes, than that of the unshelled nuts. The following table, based on data prepared under Government auspices,^q shows the difference between the actual value of the unshelled cashew exported and the value which the shelled nut and liquor content would have had if the crop had been processed before export.

TABLE 10. INFLUENCE OF INDUSTRIALIZATION ON THE VALUE OF CASHEW EXPORTS

Year	Actual exports of unshelled cashew		Estimated export value of shelled nut and liquor content ^a (million escudos)	Difference (million escudos)
	Tons	Million escudos
1951 ..	44,100	88.7	179.1	90.4
1952 ..	47,350	134.1	196.6	62.5
1953 ..	55,843	176.6	218.6	42.0
1954 ..	58,892	145.4	186.6	41.2
1955 ..	49,060	127.4	194.6	67.2
1956 ..	37,974	126.4	227.4	101.0
1957 ..	68,231	223.3	389.7	166.4
1958 ..	95,973	253.3	485.6	232.3
1959 ..	61,903	177.0	311.3	134.3
1960 ..	55,848	199.9	339.3	139.4
1961 ..	84,582	315.0	489.9	174.9
1962 ..	80,748	230.9	462.6	231.7

^a Estimated value at prevailing market prices.

105. From 1932 onwards efforts were made to discover effective techniques for the mechanical processing of cashew which would offset the competitive advantage enjoyed by the Indian industry. The most difficult technical problem, although

^p In 1961-1962 it was estimated that in Goa skilled female workers could produce more than twice the output of unskilled workers in Mozambique.

^q A. Ramalho Correia, "A industrialização da castanha de Caju", Direcção dos Serviços de Economia e Estatística Geral (Mozambique, 1963).

^k In the United States it is classified as being of strategic importance.

^l J. do Amparo Baptista, O cajueiro em Moçambique (Lourenço Marques, 1959).

^m In 1963 the average price to the grower fell to only 1.5 escudos per kilogramme. Since then it has averaged 3 escudos.

ⁿ In 1964 the average export price of unshelled cashew rose to over 4.5 escudos per kilogramme.

^o At the present price of 3 escudos per kilogramme, average income would be 2,100 escudos.

not the only one, was to devise a machine for removing the shell without too frequent damage to the kernel. Between 1932 and 1954, the Government received thirty-two requests to establish experimental decorticating plants, but most of these were rejected as impractical or failed after a brief experience. During World War II, when exports to India were interrupted, there was a limited amount of manual decortication, mainly to supply the South African market. In 1954 the Government adopted a policy of authorizing only small decorticating plants in scattered locations for experimental purposes so that the field should be kept open for new inventions and so that the overseas market should not be adversely affected by the premature export of inferior produce.

106. By 1959, except for a small cottage industry based on manual decortication in northern Mozambique, only two companies were actually operating, although more than thirty applications were pending. The two companies, both at Lourenço Marques, were Caju Industrial de Moçambique, S.A.R.L. established in 1950 and the Industrial Nacional de Caju e Derivados, S.A.R.L. later known as the Sociedade Cajueira Moçambicana, S.A.R.L. Both were originally founded by a Portuguese settler, Colonel Baldini Vissenjou. These two companies were small, producing between them a maximum of 1,900 tons of shelled cashew yearly by manual decortication and both were primarily concerned with the development of mechanical processing.

107. In 1959, because of the failure to perfect mechanical processing, the Government changed its policy and decided to grant all applications on an experimental basis. Between 1959 and 1962, a total of twenty-nine new companies received licences authorizing them to process yearly from 3,000 tons to 100,000 tons of cashew each.

108. Of the companies authorized up to 1962 few are still operating and only one on the scale originally intended, the exception being Caju Industrial de Moçambique, which absorbed several other companies during the 1950s. In 1962 there were five separate companies in operation, three of them mechanized to some degree, the other two engaged in manual decortication on a small scale. Of these five companies, the largest employed about 4,000 women and the next largest employed 500 and 200 respectively. The combined output was only about 2,000 tons of shelled nuts and 1,340 tons of cashew nut shell liquor.

109. After 1962, with the world market for cashew expanding rapidly and prices generally rising, efforts to develop local processing were intensified. A final breakthrough in the technological field appears to have been accomplished within the past two years and it is now reported that several mechanical processes, Italian, South African and Portuguese, have been developed which are considered to be satisfactory. One of these, a Portuguese invention announced in 1965, is said to be able to process 90 to 100 kilogrammes of unshelled cashew per hour, its output during a twenty-four-hour period being equivalent to that of seventy-two manual operators. The proportion of unbroken kernels is said to average 65 per cent. These new inventions pave the way for a substantial development of the industry which is now taking place (see paras. 128-132 below).

110. In July 1965 there were eleven companies holding licences to process cashew, their combined authorized capacity amounting to 260,000 tons of raw nuts annually, or nearly double the actual output. In fact, however, only five were in operation. These are described below.

(a) Caju Industrial de Moçambique

111. This is the oldest cashew processing company in the Territory, having been formed in 1950 by the partners Baldini Vissenjou and Jiwa Jamal Tharani to exploit a mechanical process invented by the former. During the first ten years of its existence the company pursued an ambitious programme of expansion, absorbing several of its competitors when they became insolvent, with the result that it also encountered financial difficulties. It was able to continue, however, by obtaining the financial support of the Banco Nacional Ultramarino, which is now its principal shareholder and has a controlling interest in its administration.

112. The company has its headquarters and main factory at Lourenço Marques. In addition, because of a shortage of female workers in the urban area, it operates seven satellite factories engaged in shelling cashew both manually and mechanically in the vicinity of Lourenço Marques, and nearby at Manhiça and Marracuene. Caju Industrial also controls three other small companies in the Lourenço Marques area which, although not owned outright by Caju Industrial, sell all their output to it at fixed prices. These are the Fomento Industrial de Caju Lda., the Sociedade Cajueira Moçambique, S.A.R.L. and Fábrica Nacional de Caju, Lda. These three companies are in effect subsidiaries of Caju Industrial, having entered into their agreements with it because of financial difficulties.

113. In 1961 Caju Industrial had total fixed assets worth 26 million escudos. Its authorized maximum capacity is 15,000 tons of unshelled nuts,^{*} which was already nearly reached in 1964 when it processed more than 14,500 tons. It is reported to employ a total of 4,000 manual workers and eighty technicians and to have paid 18 million escudos in salaries and wages during 1963. The wage rate paid to women manual workers in the satellite factories was 345 escudos per month, out of which 15 escudos ($US.50) was deducted every six months for the purchase of overalls.

(b) Sociedade Industrial de Caju e Derivados (CAJUCA)

114. This company was established in 1962 to exploit machinery invented in Italy. The company was organized by Italian interests and has a registered capital of 15 million escudos. At present it has three factories located at Machava (near Lourenço Marques), Antonio Enes (Moçambique) and Mocimboa da Praia (Gabo Delgado). The three factories have a combined authorized capacity of 45,000 tons of unshelled cashew but in 1963 it was reported that the company's actual consumption was only about 6,000 tons. It has recently requested a licence to establish another factory at Machava, near Lourenço Marques.

(c) Companhia Agrícola e Comercial João Ferreira dos Santos

115. This company, which is one of the largest agro-industrial companies in Mozambique (see para. 183) obtained a licence in 1960 to operate a manual decorticating factory at Mossuril (district of Moçambique) with a capital investment of 3.5 million escudos. In February 1966 it was reported in the Press that the company, in partnership with other Portuguese interests, had obtained a licence to establish four factories for mechanical processing with a combined capacity of 100,000 tons in the north of the Territory (see para. 131 below).

(d) Companhia de Culturas de Angoche, S.A.R.L.

116. Also one of the major sisal producers (see paras. 180-182 below), the company in 1960 requested licences to establish two factories at António Enes and Moma (Moçambique district). The company was authorized to process up to a maximum of 10,000 tons of unshelled cashew at each of these factories. Production is at least partly mechanized, the equipment used being the same Italian machinery introduced by CAJUCA. There is no available data concerning output, which consists of both shelled cashew and cashew nut shell liquor.

(e) Spence and Pierce, Lda.

117. This company, which received its licence in 1962, is largely owned by a British firm, Pierce Leslie and Co., Ltd., which has cashew factories in India. The company had a registered capital of 3.2 million escudos in 1962 and had one factory located in the suburbs of Inhambane with a maximum authorized capacity of 2,000 tons of unshelled nuts. In 1963 it was reported to have invested about 1.5 million escudos and to be employing 600 workers. Its authorized capacity has since been increased to 25,000 tons and in 1964 it planned to open another factory at Maxixe, near Inhambane.

118. Apart from the above, nine other licences to operate cashew factories were extant in 1963 but there is no information to indicate that they have since begun operations or, in some cases, that the companies have even been formed.

^{*} Recently increased to 25,000 tons.

119. It may be noted that up to August 1965 when important new projects for cashew development were announced (see paras. 128-132 below) none of the existing companies, except for Caju Industrial, was operating at a level sufficient to fill its authorized quota. The following table shows the output and value of shelled nuts and shell liquor.

TABLE 11. MOZAMBIQUE: PRODUCTION OF SHELLED CASHEW AND CASHEW LIQUOR

Year	Production (tons)		Value (million escudos)
	Shelled nuts	Shell liquor	Shelled nuts	Shell liquor
1955	980
1956	1,043	366	22.2	2.0
1957	1,221	783	26.7	4.3
1958	1,215	614	23.5	3.4
1959	1,249	488	29.9	1.7
1960	1,566	441	38.0	2.3
1961	1,442	1,064	34.4	5.4
1962	1,937	1,341	43.9	3.0
1963
1964	2,988	...	84.7	...

SOURCE: Mozambique. Estatística Industrial, 1956-1963, and Boletim Mensal de Estatística, 1964.

Government regulation and controls

120. Government regulation has aimed primarily at fostering the infant processing industry. On the one hand it was the policy of the Government up to 1959 to limit the durations of licences for cashew processing as well as the volume which each company could process so as to keep the field open for new mechanical discoveries. On the other hand, the Government took steps to ensure that the processing companies received a sufficient supply of raw cashew at controlled prices.

121. Between 1951 and 1961 it was the practice to require each exporter to reserve a percentage of his exports to be made available to the existing companies according to fixed quotas.* The Government established a maximum price to local industry, providing that if the export price was lower, the price to the industry should be the f.o.b. export price, less all expenses and duties connected with exportation. The maximum price was in some years below the average export price and in 1956 it was decided that the maximum should be the fiscal export value (which is less than the real export price), thus giving a marginal price advantage to local industry.

122. In 1961, the system was modified by giving local industry the right of option to buy any cashew from exporters if it could be shown that the net price offered by local processors was not less than the net export price. This was to enable the processing companies to select higher quality cashew and to purchase at times when export prices were low.

123. Finally, in 1964 it was decided that all unshelled cashew was in principle reserved to local industry and that exports would be authorized only if local processors had not declared within a time-limit of twenty-four hours, their intention to acquire it at the option price, which was fixed at 20 centavos per kilogramme above the net export price.

124. Until February 1955 the local processing industry enjoyed no special tariff protection. Under a decree of 1950 (Decree 38,146, 30 December) both shelled and unshelled cashew were subject to the same export levies, consisting of a 1 per cent ad valorem duty and an 8.5 per cent surtax. In 1955 the surtax on shelled nuts was reduced to 6 per cent ad valorem while the surtax on unshelled nuts was increased to 10 per cent (Order 15,272, 12 March 1955). In 1960 (Decree 43,081, 19 July) shelled cashew was exempted from all export taxes while unshelled cashew remains subject to a 2.5 per cent surtax and the sobrevalorização tax imposed on the difference between current prices and those in 1949. In July 1965, the sobrevalorização tax ranged from 479 to 551 escudos per ton according to the prices at the ports of embarkation.

Exports and destinations

125. The total value of cashew exports has increased from only 41 million escudos in 1946 to over 608 million escudos in 1964. This represents an increase in value over twenty-eight years of 1,383 per cent while volume increased by 245 per cent, the difference being accounted for by an approximately fourfold rise in prices. As is shown in table 13, the sharpest increase both in value and tonnage occurred after 1962 and has brought cashew to first place among Mozambique's exports by value. Among the reasons for this remarkable growth is the expansion of the market in the United States and the successful efforts by India to diversify her exports by developing markets in other countries.

126. As yet, local industrialization is only beginning and processed products constitute only a small proportion (10.6 per cent in 1964) of the total value of cashew exports. On the basis of prices prevailing in 1963, however, it is anticipated that by processing the entire crop before export it would be possible to increase its export value by 30 to 50 per cent. Recent developments suggest that the proportion of processed cashew exported may increase substantially in the years to come. To what extent this will affect prices depends on the elasticity of supply in other countries and the growth potential of the world market, neither of which can at present be accurately predicted.

127. Table 13 shows the combined exports of shelled and unshelled cashew in recent years and the main countries of destination. Table 12 contains data on the exports of shelled nuts and cashew nut shell liquor. It may be noted that over 90 per cent of the processed products are exported to the United States.

TABLE 12. MOZAMBIQUE: EXPORTS OF SHELLED CASHEW NUTS AND SHELL LIQUOR

Year	Export volume (tons)		Export volume (million escudos)		Percentage of total exports
	Shelled nuts	Liquor	Shelled nuts	Liquor
1955	996	304	16.1	1.0	8.5
1956	1,029	377	25.3	1.6	10.1
1957	1,127	639	26.1	3.0	13.5
1958	1,227	230	24.9	1.1	13.8
1959	1,130	485	22.8	2.4	10.6
1960	1,355	990	33.5	4.7	11.3
1961	1,058	963	24.8	4.9	13.5
1962	1,900	1,405	43.4	8.4	10.8
1963	2,685	1,022	61.3	6.5	14.5
1964	3,193	1,263	83.2	11.1	15.5

SOURCES: Mozambique. Comércio Externo, 1956-1963, and Boletim Mensal, 1964.

Recent developments

128. Until 1965, the cashew processing industry was still in an experimental phase and, apart from the three leading producers, Caju Industrial, Spence and Pierce and the Companhia de Angoche, was mainly concerned with the development of machinery which would permit large-scale production at a later stage.

129. News reports in 1965 appear to indicate that this phase is coming to an end. Several mechanical techniques are reported to have been evolved which are said to be suitable for large-scale processing and new factories are being built to exploit them.

130. In August 1965, a new company, Indústrias de Caju Mocitas, was constituted with an initial registered capital of 20 million escudos, which may be increased to 85 million escudos. The controlling interest is held by the Anglo-American Corporation of South Africa, which subscribed 11 million escudos of the initial capital, and subsidiary interests by Tiger Oats and National Milling Co., Ltd. of South Africa (5 million escudos) and Indústria Prodotti Alimentari da Bologna (4 million escudos). The company is building a

* Circular of 27 October 1951 issued under the general authority of Order 10,077, 24 April 1947. The percentages, quotas and prices were adjusted from time to time by subsequent orders.

TABLE 13. MOZAMBIQUE—CASHEW: EXPORTS AND PRINCIPAL DESTINATIONS, 1955-1964
(Shelled and unshelled nuts)

Year	Exports			Main destinations (percentage of export volume)
	Thousand tons	Million escudos	Percentage of total export value	India	United States	South Africa	Portugal
1955	50.1	143.4	8.46	98.00	1.81	0.13	—
1956	39.0	151.6	8.74	97.26	2.21	0.31	0.02
1957	69.1	249.4	12.29	97.93	1.35	0.18	—
1958	97.2	278.2	13.71	98.73	1.09	0.13	0.01
1959	63.0	199.7	10.49	94.34	1.47	0.27	0.02
1960	57.2	233.4	11.12	93.71	1.92	—	0.01
1961	85.6	339.7	13.33	97.54	0.99	0.21	0.01
1962	82.4	274.3	10.49	97.59	1.93	0.25	0.01
1963	121.9	465.4	16.07
1964	127.8	608.4	19.99	95.50	1.88	0.19	1.39

SOURCE: 1955-1963: Mozambique, Comércio Externo; 1964: Mozambique, Boletim Mensal, December 1964.

factory at Vila de João Belo (Gaza district) with an initial capacity of 15,000 tons to be increased to 30,000 tons. The factory will be entirely mechanized, using Italian machinery, and it is reported that the total investment will amount to 85 million escudos during the first phase of development and ultimately to 170 million escudos. According to press statements the company is weighing the possibility of participation by the Agricultural Association of Gaza. The latter has prepared a plan, based on the new factory, to develop 30,000 hectares of cashew plantations in the Gaza region. One third of this would be distributed among European members of the Association, who would receive 100 hectares each and would be required to develop it at their individual expense. A further 10,000 hectares would be distributed among soldier-settlers, who would receive 50 hectares each, and an equal area would be reserved for African settlement in lots of 25 hectares per settler. Both soldier-settlers and Africans would receive a monthly financial allocation until production commenced. All cashew produced would be sold to the Mocita factory and on the basis of one ton per hectare, it is estimated that the crop would be worth 3,000-escudos per hectare and that the African settlers would each earn 75,000 escudos yearly. The plan also provides for the building of medical centres, churches and primary schools. A similar plan has been proposed, centred in the district of Moçambique, which calls for the allocation of 20-hectare plots among Africans, preference being given to those already living in the region. In this second project, African settlers would receive technical guidance in the planting and cultivation of cashew and would be assisted to form co-operatives and acquire tools.

131. It was also reported in February 1966 that the Companhia Agrícola João Ferreira dos Santos had entered into partnership with the Companhia Têxtil do Púnguê, a subsidiary of the Companhia União Fabril of Portugal, and the Companhia de Seguros Império, a Portuguese insurance company, to extend its present operations. The company is reported to have received a new quota of up to 100,000 tons and to be establishing factories at Porto Amelia (Cabo Delgado district), Nampula and Nacala (Moçambique district), and also at another location in Cabo Delgado.

132. Finally, the Indústria e Laboração de Produtos Agrícolas (ILPA), a Portuguese company with Italian participation, has established a processing factory in Portugal, which will have an ultimate capacity of 20,000 tons. In September 1965 the company announced its intention of establishing a similar factory in Mozambique.

D. Copra

General

133. Sugar and coconuts are the two oldest plantation crops in Mozambique having been introduced during the time of the large chartered companies. Copra has been exported since the 1880's and oil extraction from copra was one of the first industries established in the Territory. Cultivated both on European plantations and by Africans, who produce about one third of the copra output, coconut plantations account for over 25 per cent of the total area of non-African land holdings under cultivation and until the development of cashew were the most important permanent African cash crop. The Territory is estimated to have 12 million coconut palms, valued at 1,500 million escudos. Apart from an unknown quantity of coconuts which are retained by Africans for their own consumption, the main product is copra, part of which is reserved for the local oil mills and soap factories, the rest being all exported, principally to western Europe. There is also a very limited production of coir fibre for the local market.

134. Because statistics of sales by Africans are reported by calendar year and production on non-African holdings by crop year, it is difficult to calculate the total output of the Territory. If the volume of exports plus the amount sold to local industry is taken to represent production, then Mozambique in 1962 ranked seventh among copra-producing countries, although its share in world production and exports amounted to only 1 per cent and 4.3 per cent respectively. In the 1940s copra was Mozambique's third most valuable export crop. It now ranks fifth owing both to the recent growth of cashew and sisal and to the continuous decline in world copra prices since 1959. In 1964 copra exports accounted for 208.3 million escudos, or 6.9 per cent of the Territory's visible exports. The value of copra oil exported increased from 16 million escudos in 1960 to 62 million escudos in 1961, the declining market for raw copra having led to an increase in the export of oil.

135. Coconut palms are grown along the coast to a depth of 15 to 20 km inland from Inhambane northwards almost to the frontier of Tanzania. The most important producing area lies between the mouth of the Zambezi River and António Enes in the district of Cabo Delgado, with some of the largest plantations in the world being found around Quelimane and in the circunscrições of Namacurra, Maganja da Costa and Pebane. Over half the area of plantations owned by Europeans and other non-Africans is located in the district of Zambézia, the remainder being mostly in the districts of Moçambique and Cabo Delgado. Most of the palms owned by Africans are in the district of Zambézia.

Organization of production

(a) General

136. The coconut palm is grown on both European and African holdings, the former producing at present about 70 per cent of the copra and the latter about 30 per cent. These proportions have varied in the past because production on European holdings has followed more closely the broad trends of the world market. Thus, owing to the world economic depression, European plantations decreased from 67,152 hectares in 1929-1930 to 56,066 hectares in 1939-1940 and during that period aging palms were not renewed. After 1940, when prices regained, planting began anew and the area under cultivation increased to 69,035 hectares in 1950-51 and 82,622 hectares a decade later. In 1958-1959 European production of copra was only 25,735 tons. By 1960-1961, however, it had increased to 32,806 tons.

137. African production of copra appears to be less influenced by prices than by the alternative demand for coconuts as a food crop. During the 1930s, African planting and harvesting is reported to have continued despite the fall in prices and to have increased steadily until the mid-1950s. At present, Europeans are reported to own close to 8 million palms and Africans between 5 and 5.5 million, representing an increase over 1930 of about 2 million trees for Europeans and 1,500,000 trees for Africans. In 1950, it was estimated that European and African holdings together covered some 120,000-130,000 hectares.

(b) Production on European holdings

138. Of the 8 million palms on European holdings, about 1 million are on medium-size farms and the rest are owned by large companies. About 86 per cent of the area under coconut cultivation in the district of Zambézia, or close to half the total area planted by Europeans, is reported to belong to three major companies, the Companhia do Boror, S.A.R.L. with approximately 2.1 million palms in production; the Sociedade Agrícola do Madal, S.A.R.L. with 1.3 million palms and the Companhia da Zambézia with approximately 800,000 palms.

139. The ownership of these companies is mixed, including French, German and Norwegian capital as well as Portuguese.

140. Plantations are generally large because of the considerable distance needed between trees. The copra is dried on the plantations either in hot-air kilns or in the sun and is classified as either "extra fair middling" or "hot air dried" (H.A.D.), being well-dried, with low percentage of humidity, without impurities, and of consistent quality. An increasingly large number of cattle are employed on plantations for purposes of fertilization, keeping the land between trees cleared (important in preventing brush fires), transportation within the plantations and ploughing. To a large extent the superior quality of European plantation-grown coconuts is attributed to this fertilization and clearing by cattle. While in 1944 there were only 22,000 head of cattle registered in the region between Chinde and Pebane, by 1960 the Companhia do Boror alone was reported to own 22,000 head, the Sociedade Agrícola do Madal, 13,000 and the Companhia da Zambézia, 6,500.

(i) Companhia do Boror, S.A.R.L.

141. There is no information concerning either the present capital or ownership of the Companhia do Boror, although at least until the end of the Second World War the ownership was primarily German.

142. Among the oldest agricultural companies in Mozambique, the Companhia do Boror is the largest producer of both copra and sisal (see section E below), and has 27,000 hectares of palm plantations. Recently its production has averaged approximately 11,000 tons of copra annually, approximately one third of the total production on European holdings. In addition, the company is the largest cattle rancher in Mozambique and until recently the sole producer of coir fibre, of which it manufactures a small amount sold locally, principally for use in the production of mattresses.

143. The seat of the company is in Macuse (Zambézia) and its plantations are in Namacurra, Maganja da Costa, Pebane, Quelimane (all in the district of Zambézia), Moma and António Enes (district of Moçambique).

144. The company received its original concession in 1898 from the Companhia da Zambézia. The size of the original grant, comprising the former prazos of Boror, Tirre, Name-duro, Macuse and Lecungo, is unknown. At present, in addition to its coconut plantations, one of which is the largest in the world, the company has 11,000 hectares devoted to sisal. In 1948 the company employed 5,000 Africans out of the 20,000 living on its concessions.

(ii) Sociedade Agrícola do Madal, S.A.R.L.

145. The Sociedade Agrícola do Madal with a registered capital of 85 million escudos, primarily Norwegian-controlled, is the second largest producer of copra in Mozambique. Founded in 1904 by Portuguese and French investors, the company received a 280,000 hectare concession in the Zambézia region consisting of the former prazos of Madal, Tangalane, Cherengeme and Mahendo. Between 1912 and 1946 the company underwent several changes of ownership and in 1946 was reorganized and converted into a stock company under its present designation.

146. In 1940 the company was reported to have holdings of 21,078 hectares in the district of Zambézia, of which only a portion is devoted to coconut palms. [In 1948 it was reported that the companies of Madal and Zambézia (see below) jointly had 13,000 hectares of coconut plantations.] Its 1.3 million coconut palms are distributed among twenty-eight plantations in Quelimane, Chinde and Maganja da Costa. In 1962 two new concessions, totalling 3,400 hectares were granted in Chinde. The company employs 5,000 Africans and 200 Europeans.

(iii) Companhia da Zambézia

147. The Companhia da Zambézia, successor to the chartered company established in 1892, was reconstituted into a limited stock company primarily dedicated to agriculture in 1940 and presently has a registered capital of 60 million escudos. The Portuguese Government, controlling 135,000 shares, is the largest single stockholder; the remaining shares are thought to be owned by South African, French, German and British interests. In addition, the company produces tea (see section F) and salt, owns 6,500 head of cattle and until 1963 had a cotton purchasing concession in the district of Tete (see paragraph 28 above).

148. At present, the company is thought to be the third largest producer of copra in Mozambique. In 1965 it was reported to have plantations totalling 4,500 hectares. Its copra output was 3,014 tons in 1960, 3,081 tons in 1962, 3,388 tons in 1963 and 3,355 tons in 1964.

149. The company operates coconut plantations in Angoase and Andone (500,000 palms) and in Bajone (210,000 palms), the latter being the newest and becoming more profitable. In 1962 and 1963 profits from the Angoase and Andone plantations (including salt and cattle) amounted to 1,975,051 escudos and 1,863,513 escudos respectively; profits on the Bajone plantation in these two years came to 136,369 escudos and 1,153,274 escudos.

150. Despite profits from its production of copra and tea, the company sustained a working loss on its combined operations in Africa in 1962 and 1963 due primarily to losses incurred by its cotton concession. In 1964 after the cotton concession had been surrendered, the company reported an over-all net profit of only 959,000 escudos. The results of its copra operations in 1964 are not specified.

151. Total labour costs for the Zambézia company's plantations (including tea) amounted to 12,979,175 escudos in 1962 and to 13,033,005 in 1963. The company operates its own twelve-room hospital and pharmacy and provides free medical services for its employees and their families.

(c) African production

152. According to one writer, African interest in coconut palm growing is an off-shoot of the European industry and dates from the establishment of the big plantations. In the early days of development, the areas chosen by Europeans for growing coconut palms were lands previously uncultivated and scantily populated. To encourage African settlement in areas bordering the plantations and thus to obtain an adequate supply of labour, the European enterprises offered young coconut palms to the indigenous population for them to transplant on their own. It appears that the practice still continues, with Africans receiving saplings furnished by the companies from nurseries especially maintained for this purpose. The copra produced by Africans is normally sun-dried and sold to traders, though a certain amount may be sold to the plantations before drying.

153. In 1965 it was reported that 300,000 Africans were engaged in copra production, producing on their own about one third of the export crop. Since 1950, African production of copra has averaged about 12,000 tons yearly, ranging from 16,000 tons in 1956 to 10,227 tons in 1963. These figures relate only to documented sales and, according to an article in the Revista do Centro de Estudos Económicos of Mozambique, published in 1958, may understate the actual volume of African copra production.[†]

154. The number of coconut palms owned by Africans increased steadily until the 1950s. According to the 1929-30 agricultural census Africans owned 3,676,372 palms; in 1939-40 their holdings were estimated at 4,771,588 palms; and by the mid-1950s they were reported to own between 5 and 5.5 million, which is roughly the figure estimated today.

155. A halt to new planting was anticipated as far back as 1940 when it was officially reported that the "choice regions for the easy planting of the palm are already in use or more or less occupied". It was also observed that the density of the African population in the coastal zone north of the Zambezi River was constantly increasing and had attained a higher index than non-copra-producing regions. In 1958 it was again reported that the number of palms owned by Africans was limited only by the shortage of suitable land, since in Zambézia Africans were always attempting to increase the number of their trees by planting whenever they had available land.[‡] To provide more room for palm plantations it was proposed in 1940 to drain vast areas of marsh along the coast of the Zambézia district, a project considered to be easy and not too expensive. The land thus salvaged could be parcelled out for Africans to occupy and plant. In 1959 drainage of these areas was included in the budget of the Second Development Plan along with drainage of areas in Gaza and Inhambane, a total of 100 million escudos being allocated for work in all three areas.

156. African methods of cultivation are reported to be less scientific than those of the large European-owned plantations. In contrast to the holdings of the large companies where palms are widely spaced and aligned and cattle are grazed for fertilizer and to keep down undergrowth, African holdings are often planted closely and at random, making upkeep of the area difficult; the number of cattle grazed is insignificant and fires, starting in the undergrowth, are not uncommon.

157. Most of the copra produced by Africans is dried either in the sun or directly over fire. Such copra is classified as fair middling (F.M.), "selecionada", or second grade, and is said to contain a higher degree of humidity and more impurities than copra produced on the large company-owned plantations, losing weight through evaporation and being subject to moulding. In 1944 it was reported that traders buying copra from Africans sometimes redried the copra in their own drying ovens.

158. Tables 14 A and B show the production of copra on European holdings and documented sales of African-produced copra in so far as this separate information is available.

Copra oil and coir fibre

159. In 1962 there were fifteen companies engaged in the extraction of vegetable oils with a combined capital investment of 80,358,000 escudos. These companies extract oil from various oilseeds, mainly cotton seeds and peanuts, and produce both edible and non-edible oils and oil cake. The companies are organized in a corporative body, the Grémio dos Industriais de Óleos Vegetais created in 1949.

160. The amount of copra which is used for oil manufacture in Mozambique has varied significantly with the export price of raw copra, the volume of copra oil produced ranging from 10,200 tons in 1957 to only 3,100 tons in 1960. The copra used consists mostly of F.M. grade which is mainly produced by Africans and normally represents about half the total amount purchased from Africans (8,000 tons of raw copra produce 5,000 tons of copra oil). Almost all the oil is exported, a small amount being reserved for local use and sale to soap manufacturers.

161. As explained in the following section, from 1954 to 1961, higher export taxes were levied on F.M. grade copra than on other grades in order to ensure its supply to the oil milling industry. In practice, however, less oil is produced from copra than from other oilseeds. In 1964, 8,400 tons of copra oil, valued at slightly more than 62 million escudos, were exported (see table 15 B).

162. There is also a very limited production of coir fibre, which is mainly used in the manufacture of mattresses for the local market. Until recently the only producer was the Companhia do Boror but in 1965 it was announced that a factory was to be established in Inhambane and would be followed by three more at other locations. The first factory is being financed partly from South Africa and South African interests have guaranteed to purchase half of its output.

Government regulation and controls

163. Government regulation of copra exports has been intended mainly to guarantee an adequate supply of raw copra to the local and metropolitan oil milling industries. Prior to 1954 all exporters were required to sell a percentage of their foreign exports by quota to local and Portuguese oil mills at officially fixed prices which were below international quotations. This system proved satisfactory to the local oil industry until 1949 when oil mills in Europe having recovered from the effects of World War II, Mozambique oil exporters began to be confronted with a decrease in demand. To sustain itself the Mozambique oil industry called for greater price benefits on the purchase of copra locally. This led to the tax differential introduced in 1954 which is described below.

164. Under legislation of 1950 and 1953 (Decree 38,146, 30 December 1950; Decree 39,265 and Order 14,447, 6 July 1953), all copra exports were subject to a standard export duty of 1 per cent ad valorem, a surtax of 7 per cent, and an imposto de sobrevalorização of 25 per cent of the excess of actual prices over those prevailing in 1949. Copra oil exports were subject to the standard duty of 1 per cent ad valorem, plus a surtax of 4.5 per cent.

165. New legislation in 1954 (Order 14,892, 31 May) introduced the régime which remained in force for six years, namely of levying higher taxes on exports of F.M. copra, mainly produced by Africans, than on the other grades produced on European plantations, thereby ensuring that F.M. copra would be used almost exclusively to satisfy the requirements of the local oil mills. Under this legislation all F.M. copra was exempted from the imposto de sobrevalorização, but the surtax was increased to 10 per cent ad valorem, or 3 per cent more than that paid on other grades of copra. In 1960, when surtaxes on copra exports to Portugal were suspended (Order 7,797, 6 July), the surtax on F.M. copra going to foreign countries was increased to 11.3 per cent ad valorem.

166. The export tax differential between F.M. and other grades of copra was finally abolished in 1961. The legislation effecting this (Order 18,203, 28 January 1961) specified that the surtax on exports of F.M. copra should be reduced to the extent necessary to ensure that the sum of export levies on F.M. copra should not exceed the sum of levies, including the imposto de sobrevalorização, on other grades of copra.

167. In 1965 (Ministerial Order 2, 11 December), copra was excluded from payment of the imposto de sobrevalorização.

Production and exports

168. As explained above, the copra industry has been affected adversely over the years by the instability of world markets, especially since the coconut palm is slow maturing and production cannot respond rapidly to price changes. During the 1930s when world prices tumbled, production and replanting on European plantations was severely curtailed. Between 1940 and 1963, the price of H.A.D. copra more than doubled and the industry again expanded only to find prices

[†] The article points out that between 1953 and 1955, annual exports of copra were about 6,174 tons more than combined European production and reported sales by Africans would allow, while average exports between 1941 and 1953 were 3,949 tons more. The writer attributes this to undocumented sales by African growers. If this is true, then the value of copra sold by Africans in 1951, for instance, would have been 90,858,000 escudos, instead of the 62,626,000 escudos actually reported.

[‡] Revista do Centro de Estudos Económicos (Loureço Marques, 1958).

fluctuating severely. Reflecting these changes, the pattern of production and exports has been irregular. Reaching 46,874 tons in 1949, exports of copra dropped to 36,554 tons in 1954, rising again in 1957 to 45,507 tons and, after a further slump, to 60,070 tons in 1960. After 1959, international quotations again dropped and exports decreased to only 43,812 tons in 1964. Tables 14 A and B below show the pattern of copra production in recent years both for European-owned plantations and for copra purchased from Africans. Information is so far available only for certain years up to 1960-1961.

TABLE 14. COPRA PRODUCTION

A. Production on European holdings
Crop year	Area cultivated (hectares)	Number of palms	Production (tons)	Value (million escudos)
1955/56	77,341	7,347,309	28,742	79.4
1956/57	79,848	7,605,298	28,691	79.1
1957/58	26,966	...
1958/59	82,362	7,693,189	25,735	69.4
1959/60	83,288	7,603,641	28,943	78.8
1960/61	82,622	7,804,639	32,961	88.2

B. Documented sales by Africans
	1955	1956	1957	1958	1959	1960	1961
Tons	16,362	16,395	14,078	10,556	10,413	9,958
Value (million escudos)	47.8	47.2	...	44.3	36.3	26.6

SOURCE: Mozambique, Estatística Agrícola, 1955-1963.

169. Only a fraction of exports of copra and copra oil normally go to Portugal, the year 1960, when Portugal bought 25 per cent of copra exports, being a great exception. Chief markets for copra in recent years have been Norway, Israel, France, Spain and West Germany. In 1961, for example, when 60,070 tons were exported, 13,445 went to Denmark, 12,095 to Norway, 8,113 to Israel and 5,736 to Italy. Oil is purchased primarily by South Africa, West Germany and Southern Rhodesia. Residues from oil extraction (bagaços) are also exported in small quantity, about 2,000 tons annually, primarily to northern European countries where they are used for cattle fodder. Information on exports and destinations is contained in table 15 A and B below.

TABLE 15. MOZAMBIQUE—COPRA AND COPRA OIL: EXPORTS AND PRINCIPAL DESTINATIONS, 1955-1964

A. Copra
Year	Exports			Main destinations (percentage of export volume)
	Thousand tons	Million escudos	Percentage of total export value	Norway	France	Portugal	Denmark	Spain	Federal Republic of Germany	Israel
1955	34.8	140.2	8.26	19.56	39.24	16.47	—	8.61	8.40	—
1956	41.4	166.3	9.58	30.69	23.03	11.98	—	13.67	12.41	—
1957	45.5	172.8	8.51	31.31	25.48	16.83	4.06	5.00	7.39	—
1958	44.4	189.3	9.33	33.32	10.58	3.40	1.79	7.55	16.04	5.45
1959	37.6	211.0	11.08	27.86	8.77	8.66	11.30	3.30	6.10	3.99
1960	40.7	194.3	9.26	24.78	7.62	25.94	5.31	4.11	2.54	13.74
1961	60.1	266.9	10.47	20.13	6.80	5.32	22.40	8.18	3.50	13.51
1962	52.8	204.5	7.82	20.38	10.47	4.93	21.35	11.66	8.30	8.33
1963	46.4	204.0	7.04
1964	43.8	208.3	6.84	13.69	12.10	15.65	14.38	17.84	3.29	14.83

B. Copra oil ^a
Year	Exports			Main destinations (percentage of export volume)
	Thousand tons	Million escudos	Percentage of total export value	South Africa	Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland	Portugal	Netherlands	Malawi
1961	3.2	22.9	0.90	33.82	15.32	10.12	7.78	—	—
1962	3.2	21.1	0.81	65.40	32.31	2.16	—	—	—
1963	7	63.9	2.21
1964	8.4	62.1	2.04	35.99	12.75 ^b	1.19	—	—	0.71

SOURCES: 1955-1963: Mozambique, Comércio Externo and Anuário Estatístico; 1964: Mozambique, Boletim Mensal, December 1964.

^a Data available only for 1961 onwards.

^b This figure refers only to Southern Rhodesia.

E. Sisal

General

170. Sisal was introduced into Mozambique from Tanganyika at the beginning of the twentieth century. Though 34 tons were exported in 1910, the industry did not really get under way until the 1920s. By 1938, exports had increased to 24,000 tons, representing 7.8 per cent of world output and making Mozambique the fourth largest producer. During the Second World War, sisal was in strong demand but, despite this, Mozambique's exports in 1942 were at only half their pre-war level because seven of the largest plantations, being German owned, were refused shipping certificates by the allied Powers. Though the Export Board (Junta de Exportação) succeeded in arranging a contract with the United States Commercial Company effective from 1943 to 1945 for the purchase of sisal from the plantations previously unable to obtain "navicerts", Mozambique was thereafter unable to regain her prominent position. Angola and Brazil, formerly smaller producers, had both moved permanently ahead of Mozambique in production during this time, pushing Mozambique back to sixth place among producing countries, the position she holds at present. Production did not surpass its pre-war level until 1955 when output totalled 27,103 tons, and has not expanded much since then, sisal being a crop subject to great price fluctuations on the world market, especially because of competition from other hard fibres.

171. At present Mozambique produces about 30,000 tons of sisal yearly, less than half the output of Angola and about one tenth of the sisal produced in Africa. So far, except for a very small quantity reserved for local rope manufacture (79 tons in 1962), almost all the sisal is exported, going mostly to markets outside the escudo zone. In 1965, however, a new company was formed for the large-scale industrialization of sisal, the long-term objective being to supply the Territory's requirements of rope and to export only the manufactured product. In 1964 sisal exports, amounting to 31,581 tons, were valued at 274 million escudos or 9 per cent of the combined value of the Territory's visible exports.

172. Except for one isolated plantation located inland near Vila Pery (district of Manica e Sofala), sisal is cultivated within a low-lying belt along the coast. Though most of the plantations are in the district of Moçambique (between António Enes and Moma) and Zambézia (between Namacurra and Macuba), they are found as far north as Cabo Delgado (mainly between Porto Amélia and Mocimboa da Praia) and as far south as Inhambane. The total area under cultivation in 1961-1962 was 56,403 hectares, of which 50 per cent was in the district of Moçambique, 28 per cent in the district of Zambézia and 13 per cent in the district of Cabo Delgado.

Organization of production

173. Owing to the heavy capital investment required, sisal has so far been grown exclusively on non-African holdings, consisting of large-scale plantations. The area under sisal in 1961-1962 (see above) represented 15 per cent of the total area of cultivated land on non-African agricultural holdings. Eighteen companies are reported to be in operation, the largest being the Companhia do Boror, the Companhia de Culturas de Angoche, S.A.R.L. and the Companhia Agrícola João Ferreira dos Santos. All three companies are also engaged in other forms of agriculture, the first being the largest producer of copra and the other two being also engaged in cashew production; these activities are described in the appropriate sections of the present study. The eighteen sisal companies operated in 1962 a total of nineteen decortivating plants, located on the plantations for converting the leaf into sisal fibre and exportable by-products (such as tow and waste). In 1959 it was estimated that 400 million escudos were invested in decortivating plants.

^v Large plantations are necessary for the economic production of sisal, each leaf producing only 3 to 6 per cent of fibre by weight. To produce 2,000 tons of sisal, for example, requires a plantation of some 2,000 hectares, while plantations under 1,000 hectares are considered to be uneconomical. In 1957 it was estimated that the investment required per plantation of 2,500 hectares before production was 38 million escudos. The greatest expenses are the internal transportation system, a large labour force (1,400-1,500 workers), warehouses, and the decortivating plant. In addition, because of the short lifespan of the sisal plant, about eight years, approximately one tenth of the area under cultivation must be replanted annually in order to maintain a constant level of production. (According to the 1939 sisal regulations, only growers who produced more than twenty-five tons could be licenced exporters.)

174. The real ownership of these companies cannot be readily ascertained. Originally a large proportion of the capital was held by German, Swiss and British interests, but this situation has partly changed since the Second World War. In 1960-1961, 76 per cent of the plantations were reported to belong to Portuguese nationals or to companies registered in Portugal but not necessarily with all their capital in Portuguese hands. This represented an increase in nominal Portuguese ownership of 3 per cent over the previous year and seems to confirm reports that at least since the 1950's there has been a movement to introduce more Portuguese ownership into the sisal industry. Thus, according to a press report, a Legislative Instrument was enacted in 1965 authorizing the Governor-General to guarantee loans to small Portuguese sisal growers (sisaleiros nacionais) recently installed in the district of Moçambique in an attempt to "take the sisal monopoly away from big companies, mainly foreign or having foreign capital".

175. In 1951 it was reported that 29,285 Africans were employed on sisal plantations, about 6,000 less than the number required. One of the difficulties said to impede the recruitment of an adequate labour force is the arduous nature of some aspects of the work, among them the cutting of the leaf and the manual transportation of large bundles of leaf to transportation facilities. Unlike Angola and Tanganyika where contracts range from twelve to eighteen months, in Mozambique contracts are only for six months, presenting an additional problem in maintaining an adequate supply of labour.

176. In an attempt to stabilize the labour force and to provide an incentive for workers to exceed their daily or weekly quotas various arrangements have been instituted, including the provision of permanent housing for Africans and their families on the plantations. In 1961 it was reported that all workers received some kind of housing and that workers who chose to settle permanently on a plantation received a house worth 24,000 escudos, together with two hectares of land for their own use, and free seed. The six months of the year not worked under contract are left completely free for private farming.

177. Another feature of the sisal industry is the bonus system under which Africans receive cash bonuses if they produce more than their task requires.

178. Apart from the labour force employed on the plantations, 4,737 Africans were employed in decortivating plants during 1962 and earned a total of 15,591,309 escudos in wages.

(a) Companhia do Boror, S.A.R.L.

179. The organization of this company is described in section D above (paras. 141-144). In addition to its extensive palm plantations, the company has 11,000 hectares planted with sisal, probably only a portion of which are in production, since its annual output of sisal is about 3,000 tons. In terms of the area devoted to sisal, the company is the largest in the country, occupying about 35 per cent of the total area planted with the crop. The plantations are located in the district of Zambézia, primarily at Naciaia where, in 1961, 10,500 hectares were under cultivation.

(b) Companhia de Culturas de Angoche, S.A.R.L.

180. A leading producer of sisal, the Companhia de Culturas Angoche, S.A.R.L. is one of the more important companies in the district of Moçambique. Its plantations, located in the areas of António Enes, Moma, and Monapo, are known to cover at least 68,700 hectares (18,700 hectares at Angoche and 50,000 at Moma), of which some 7,800 hectares were planted in sisal in 1957-1958. The company also operates cashew deshelling factories (see section C above). In 1956 the company employed 5,000 Africans on its Netiri, Sawara and Mecuco plantations. Total production is unknown. The Mecuco plantation, opened in 1948 at a cost of 50 million escudos, produces about 3,800 tons annually.

181. Originally known as the Companhia Colonial de Angoche, Lda., the company was transformed into a limited-liability stock company with capital of 50 million escudos in 1962, the parent company retaining shares valued at 48,745,000 escudos. It is reported that the company is mainly Swiss owned.

182. The profits of the company in 1962 amounted to 2,794,071 escudos, of which 2,500,000 was distributed to shareholders in the form of a dividend at the rate of 5 per cent.

(c) Companhia Agrícola João Ferreira dos Santos

183. The third largest sisal producer in the country, the Companhia Agrícola João Ferreira dos Santos was founded in 1897 by the dos Santos family which still controls it. The company is entirely Portuguese and based in Mozambique. Until 1965, the João Ferreira dos Santos organization was known as the Companhia Agrícola e Comercial João Ferreira dos Santos and had a registered capital of 100 million escudos. It was a multi-purpose company, combining agriculture with the processing of agricultural products (sisal, cotton and rice factories) and general trading. In 1965, however, the organization was divided into three parts, the Companhia Comercial João Ferreira dos Santos, with a registered capital of 100 million escudos, taking over the trading activities, the Companhia Agrícola João Ferreira dos Santos with a registered capital of 10 million escudos, dedicated primarily to sisal, and the Companhia Industrial João Ferreira dos Santos, with a registered capital of 7.5 million escudos, dealing mostly with cotton ginning and shelling of rice. No other information is available concerning its finances.

184. The headquarters of the company are in the district of Moçambique and its sisal plantations are located in Muchelina and Geba.

(d) Other sisal companies

185. Other sisal companies registered in 1961 were:

Name	Locality (and district)
Rodrigues Pestana	António Enes (Moçambique)
Vuervia Baptista e Cia.	Mocimboa da Praia (Cabo Delgado)
Sisal Aktiengesellschaft	Porto Amélia (Cabo Delgado)
Cia. Colonial de Nangororo, Lda.	Porto Amélia (Cabo Delgado)
Rufigya Pflanzungs Gesellschaft	Porto Amélia (Cabo Delgado)
António Moreira Longo	Porto Amélia (Cabo Delgado)
Empresa Agrícola de Monapo, Lda.	Moçambique (Moçambique)
Empresa Agrícola de Meserepane	Meserepane (Moçambique)
Namagoa Plantations	Quelimane (Zambézia)
Sisal Sul do Save	Inhambane (Inhambane)
Zemba Plantations	Chimoio (Manica e Sofala)

186. No other information is available concerning any of these companies.

Government regulation and controls

187. There is no special régime governing the production and export of sisal in Mozambique. Exports of sisal are subject to a standard export duty of 1 per cent ad valorem and an ad valorem surtax, the rate of which has varied (Decree 38,146, 30 December 1950). Sisal producers are also subject to the usual levies on large-scale agricultural enterprises, namely the imposto sobre explorações (a tax on agricultural, livestock, forestry and fishing companies), and the imposto complementar (a complementary tax on income).

188. The export taxes have been adjusted from time to time because of the instability of sisal prices. In 1950 (Decree 38,146) the surtax was set at a rate of 2.5 per cent ad valorem. In 1954 legislation enacted in Angola to mitigate the effect of falling world prices (Decree 39,408, 30 October 1952) was extended to Mozambique (Order 15,042, 2 October 1954). Under this legislation sisal was exempted from all export levies when the f.o.b. price was below 5 escudos per kilogramme; when the f.o.b. price was between 5 and 6 escudos only standard export duty of 1 per cent ad valorem was paid; and when the price was between 6 and 7 escudos, an additional surtax was imposed, adjusted upwards on a sliding scale from 1 to 4 per cent ad valorem.

189. All export taxes were suspended between 1955 and 1960 because of the collapse of sisal prices. In 1961 (Decree 43,566, 27 March), the duty and surtax were restored.

Production and exports

190. As explained above, the sisal industry has suffered from the instability of world markets due to competition from other hard fibres and underwent a long period of crisis from 1955 to 1961. Because of this and the experience of the Second World War production increased only a little between 1938 and 1955 (from 23,000 to 27,000 tons). After 1955 the increase was somewhat more rapid, reaching a peak in 1958.

This increase was primarily due to improved yields (which rose from 703 kg. to 956 kg. per hectare). In fact, world prices remained very low during this period and there is no increase in the area under cultivation.

TABLE 16. SISAL: AVERAGE F.O.B. PRICES OF EXPORTS^a

Year	Price	Year	Price
1955	4.52	1960	6.36
1956	4.52	1961	5.70
1957	3.94	1962	5.62
1958	4.49	1963	8.82
1959	5.18	1964	8.67
		1965 ^b	5.67

^a Prices derived by comparing volume and value of exports.

^b First eight months only.

191. In 1958 sisal ranked sixth by value among the Territory's major export crops. Although in 1959 prices began to improve, production decreased until 1963 and 1964 when a sharp advance of prices accompanied by increased output brought the value of sisal exports to fourth and then third place among export crops. During the first eight months of 1965, however, exports were only 18,057 tons, worth 102.4 millions escudos, representing a 10 per cent drop in volume and a 50 per cent loss in value compared with the corresponding period in 1964.

192. Until now, except for a small amount of fibre reserved for local rope manufacture (79 tons in 1962), the entire sisal output of Mozambique has been exported, the principal markets being the United States of America, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Portugal and the Netherlands. In 1962, the United States purchased over 10,000 tons of sisal, or about 33 per cent of the Territory's export; Portugal, in contrast, purchased only 1,300 tons. It is reported that between 1950 and 1952 sisal was responsible for 82 per cent of Mozambique's dollar earnings; in 1959 it accounted for 40 per cent by value of the Territory's total exports to the United States.

193. Portugal, for several reasons, is a small purchaser of Mozambique sisal. Except for the period 1957-1959, when about 20 per cent of the volume exported went to Portugal, annual exports were no more than 10 per cent. After 1960, Portuguese imports of sisal from Mozambique were even smaller while imports from Angola increased, mainly because of the difference in freight costs. Between May 1958 and October 1959 there was a 40 per cent preferential difference in costs to the Portuguese rope manufacturing industry. This benefit having expired in 1959, Portugal's imports of sisal from Mozambique fell about 50 per cent, the normal freight cost from Angola being about 200 escudos less per ton.

194. Another reason is that Mozambique sisal is reportedly of higher quality than that required by the Portuguese rope industry, which prefers to buy cheaper fibre from Angola, Brazil and Mexico. Between 1952 and 1960, 66.4 per cent of Mozambique sisal was first quality and only 26.4 per cent second quality. On the other hand, Portuguese imports of first-quality fibre amounted to only 49.4 per cent of its total imports of sisal.

195. The following table shows Mozambique's exports of sisal from 1955 to 1964, by quantity and value and by country of destination.

TABLE 17. MOZAMBIQUE—SISAL: EXPORTS AND PRINCIPAL DESTINATIONS, 1955-1964

Year	Exports			Main destinations (percentage of export volume)
	Thousand tons	Million escudos	Percentage of total export value	United States	France	Portugal	Netherlands	Federal Republic of Germany	South Africa	Belgium-Luxembourg
1955	26.9	121.4	7.16	30.82	15.20	7.80	10.91	6.76	3.97	8.55
1956	27.9	127.0	7.31	22.47	14.77	12.54	7.52	2.25	6.57	5.24
1957	32.4	127.6	7.29	22.95	23.87	15.89	9.89	4.19	6.64	4.05
1958	32.4	131.4	7.48	22.35	13.17	24.31	9.35	4.68	5.20	4.23
1959	30.6	158.4	7.32	24.92	15.87	24.76	7.44	5.73	2.25	2.84
1960	27.9	177.9	8.47	30.60	11.97	10.90	6.71	11.16	2.84	4.69
1961	28.4	162.1	6.36	35.90	13.55	8.93	9.26	10.16	4.82	2.06
1962	25.6	166.7	6.37	36.13	10.95	6.21	4.93	13.40	2.68	2.26
1963	29.7	261.6	9.03
1964	31.6	274.4	9.02	7.37	17.27	8.48	11.52	13.77	12.18	6.31

SOURCES: 1955-1963: Mozambique, Comércio Externo and Anuário Estatístico; 1964: Mozambique, Boletim Mensal, December 1964.

Recent developments

196. As mentioned above, a new company was established in 1965 for the large-scale manufacture of rope and other sisal products. The new company, known as the Companhia Industrial de Cordoarias de Moçambique, has a registered capital of 10 million escudos, which may be raised to 20 million escudos. The largest stockholder is the Companhia União Fabril of Portugal, which will control a total of 45 per cent of the shares, 33 per cent in the name of the Companhia Têxtil do Púnguê, 10 per cent in the name of the Companhia de Seguros Império and 2 per cent through its Lourenço Marques agency, Bryner and Worth. Other stockholders are the Companhia Agrícola e Comercial João Ferreira dos Santos (11 per cent); the Companhia do Boror (10.5 per cent, plus an additional 0.5 per cent in the name of its administrator, Dr. Elisio da Costa Vilaça); the Empresa Agrícola do Monapo (11 per cent); the Companhia Agrícola do Nangororo (11 per cent); and José Rodrigues Pestana (11 per cent).

197. It is reported that the company, to be located in Nacala, will transform 80 per cent of the sisal into rope for binding grain bags; the rest will be all-purpose cord, sisal cloth and mooring ropes. As of May 1965 the production of the first three months was already sold, although the factory was not to begin full-scale production until the beginning of 1966.

198. According to a newspaper report, the factory's production will be mainly for export, there being little demand for sisal cord in Mozambique.

F. Tea

General

199. Tea is the youngest of the six major export crops of Mozambique and, except for cashew, has developed most rapidly in recent years. Predominantly an integrated plantation crop, it was first planted by European farmers on an experimental basis in 1919 in the Milange area, in the highlands of Zambézia district. The first plantation and factory were established in 1925 and 1929 respectively. By 1939-1940 almost 3,000 hectares were under cultivation. Favoured by the Second World War, when traditional supplies from Asia were interrupted, the area under cultivation increased to 9,706 hectares by 1949-1950 and 1962-1963 it had further increased to 15,227 hectares.

200. The production of tea similarly doubled in successive five-year periods between 1924 and 1961 when it reached a peak of 10,000 tons, of which exports amounted to 9,900 tons, valued at 235.7 million escudos. Between 1961 and 1963 only an additional 250 hectares were planted, while exports fell to 8,400 tons. This is reportedly attributable to falling prices which began to recover in 1964, exports in that year rising again to 9,000 tons, valued at 163.9 million escudos. It is reported that production is increasing steadily because of increasing yields per hectare.

201. Since the mid-1950's tea has ranked variously as fifth or sixth of Mozambique's major export crops by value, depending on the fluctuations of world prices. In 1964 it accounted for 5.4 per cent of the total value of visible exports. In terms of world output, Mozambique ranks twelfth among producing countries, accounting for only 0.8 per cent of world production. Among African producing countries it ranks third, after Kenya and Malawi.

202. The tea produced is a standard quality Indian-type, similar to that grown elsewhere in East Africa and is classified primarily as "filler" and used for blending with the more expensive teas from India and Ceylon because of its non-distinctive taste. It is grown exclusively in the interior highlands of the Zambézia district, the principal areas of cultivation being the regions of Guruê, Milange, Sacone and Tacuane. Guruê is the most important producing area, comprising about 62 per cent of the land under tea cultivation and producing in 1962 about 64 per cent of the total output. In 1962-63, out of a total of 15,227 hectares planted with tea, 9,475 hectares were in the Guruê concelho, 2,658 hectares in Milange circunscrição, 1,175 hectares in the area around Socone (Ile circunscrição), and 1,919 hectares near Tacuane (Lugela circunscrição). It is estimated that about 150,000 hectares in the Territory are suitable for tea growing.

Organization of production

203. Owing to the large amount of capital investment needed to establish a tea plantation, which does not begin to show returns until after the seven to ten years it takes the tea plants to mature and which normally require the establishment of a factory in the vicinity, tea is primarily a company-owned plantation crop, about 90 per cent of the output being so produced. In 1961-62 there were 36 tea plantations in existence; 17 of these were between 400 hectares and 1,700 hectares in size, 9 were between 100 and 399 hectares, and 10 were under 100 hectares. The farms under 100 hectares formed part of a government-sponsored settlement scheme (described in paras. 214-216 below); it may be noted that the 10 settler farmers had increased to 28 in 1965.

204. The green leaf is almost all converted into black tea in company-owned factories, the only exception being the tea produced by small settlers which accounts for only 10 per cent of the harvest and which is processed at a factory set upon the Guruê concelho by the Government as an aid to small farmers. Recent information is lacking concerning the total capital investment in the tea industry, but it may be noted that in 1955 the capital invested in processing factories was reported to be 242 million escudos and the capital invested in plantations was reported to be 1,000 million escudos. Since then the area planted in tea has increased by 26 per cent and production by 74 per cent from which it is possible to deduce a substantial increase of capital invested. There is similar difficulty in ascertaining the number of workers and their wages. According to one source,^w it was estimated in 1963 that about 36,000 workers, including non-Africans, were employed on tea plantations and factories and that their total wages and salaries amounted to between 60 million and 65 million escudos. Official data give the number of administrative, technical and clerical workers in tea factories as being 206 in 1961 and the number of manual workers as 3,512. Their total earnings were reported to be 14.4 million escudos and 8.2 million escudos respectively, not including allowances for food, clothing and medical services.

(a) Tea companies

205. In 1961-1962 more than 80 per cent of the land under tea and about 89 per cent of the green tea produced was controlled by seventeen companies. Because green tea deteriorates if transported long distances, each of these companies has its own factory located near the plantations. The following table shows the companies operating in 1962, indicating for each its location, the area under cultivation and the volume of black tea produced.

^w Domingos José Soares Rebelo, "O Chá na economia de Moçambique", Sociedade de Estudos da Província de Moçambique, Boletim, Vol. 32, No. 137 (October-December 1963).

TABLE 18. MOZAMBIQUE: TEA COMPANIES, THEIR LOCATION AND PRODUCTION, 1962

Company	Location	Area under cultivation 1961-1962 (hectares)	Production 1962 (tons)
Chá Moçambique, Lda.	Guruê	1,660	1,551
Plantações M. Saraiva Junqueiro, S.A.R.L.	Guruê	1,222	847
Cia. da Zambézia, S.A.R.L.	Guruê	992	676
Chá Guruê, Lda.	Guruê	907	713
Sociedade Chá Oriental, S.A.R.L.	Milange	810	1,037
Chá Montemuli, Lda.	Socone	652	401
Sociedade Agrícola do Madal, S.A.R.L.	Tacuane	638	622
Empresa Agrícola do Mococha, Lda.	Guruê	616	434
Chá Montebranco, Lda.	Guruê	606	382
Sociedade Agrícola do Napeia, Lda.	Socone	603	21
Chá Montualasse, Lda.	Socone	553	735
Duarte e Nunes, Lda.	Guruê	550	394
Empresa Colonial de Chá, Lda.	Guruê	540	331
Quinta Montessocone	Socone	531
Metilile Agrícola, Lda.	Guruê	531	221
Empresa Agrícola de Chá, Lda.	Guruê	440	299
Liazi Agrícola, Lda.	Milange	400	396
Chá Tacuane, Lda.	Tacuane	...	195
Chá Luso, Lda.	Guruê	...	129

206. As can be seen by comparing the areas under cultivation with the production figures for each company, the yields per hectare vary considerably. The average yield per hectare increased from 422 kg. per hectare in 1956-1957 to 618 kg. per hectare in 1961-62 which is still only half that attained in some other parts of Africa. According to one source this is mainly due to the youth of the plantations.^x

207. Little is known about the individual companies themselves. Some, like the Companhia da Zambézia and the Sociedade Agrícola do Madal, are large agricultural companies which produce primarily copra and sisal. (These have already been described in preceding sections.) Others, such as Chá Moçambique, the largest producer, are apparently exclusively dedicated to tea. Some miscellaneous information about the large companies is as follows:

(i) Companhia da Zambézia (see also paras. 147-151 above).

208. Among the three largest tea producers in Mozambique, the Zambézia Company's output of black tea was 800 tons in 1965 while the area under cultivation was 1,061 hectares. About 4,800 African workers are employed, receiving, in addition to their salaries, food, clothing and lodging. A modern hospital has recently been built staffed by several nurses and a doctor. The capacity of the factory is 40 tons per day.

209. The company's profits from tea amounted to 3,790 contos and 2,147 contos respectively in 1962 and 1963. In 1964 it was reported that although production was superior to the previous year, profits were smaller, among other things because of a 37 per cent increase in African labour costs; a corresponding increase in the cost of rations, and a decrease in the export price of tea.

(ii) Chá Moçambique, Lda.

210. Although this is the largest producer of tea in Mozambique, with an output of 1,551 tons in 1962, very little is known about it since it is a private company and as such is not required by law to publish its reports. It is apparently expanding, having received an additional concession of 4,800 hectares in the Angónia circunscrição, Tete district, in 1962.

^x Rebelo, op. cit.

(iii) Sociedade Chá Oriental, Lda. and Sociedade Agrícola do Milange

211. The Sociedade Chá Oriental, Lda. is the oldest existing tea producer in Mozambique and the second largest in terms of factory output. Originally known as the Empresa Agrícola do Lugela, it was founded in 1919 by the Gusmão family which introduced tea growing in the Territory. Its present board of directors, all Portuguese, consists of António Corrêa de Sá (chairman), João de Castro Pereira and António José Lucas. The company is in partnership with the Sociedade Agrícola do Milange and is represented on the board of directors of the latter, which is entirely Portuguese, consisting of D. Cacano de Lancastre (chairman) and Abel Daniel da Costa Dias, in addition to Mr. de Castro Pereira representing Chá Oriental.

212. The Sociedade Agrícola do Milange has an issued share capital of 20 million escudos and the results of its operations in 1963 amounted to 385,761 escudos, compared with 655,383 escudos in 1960. The Sociedade Chá Oriental has an issued share capital of 5 million escudos and fixed assets of 16.5 million escudos. Its gross profits in 1960 were 93,660 and in 1963 it incurred a loss of 23,839 escudos. Both companies were apparently adversely affected by bad crops in 1963.

(iv) Plantações Manuel Saraiva Junqueiro

213. The second largest producer of leaf in Mozambique, the company has a capital of 10 million escudos and is still controlled by the original founder, M. S. Junqueiro. Profits in 1964 amounted to 20,826 escudos.

(b) Small growers and settlements

214. Since the 1920s the Portuguese authorities have regarded tea as a good basis for the settlement of small-scale European farmers, both because it is a highly profitable crop and because it grows best in healthy highland regions.

215. The first settlement plan was conceived in 1927 when the charters of prazos in the region of Gurue expired. Under the proposed plan the area would be divided into small properties for distribution to settlers who would work them with the help of the State. The State would construct factories at its own expense and the factories would eventually be bought by the settlers, organized in co-operatives independent of the large companies.

216. In 1931 the circunscrição of Milange, excluding Molumbo and the circunscrição of Gurue, excluding Lioma, were reserved for Portuguese settlement (Legislative Instrument 304, 9 May 1931). The maximum size for a concession was set at 1,000 hectares, confirmation of the concession being conditional on developing one third of the area within five years. In mid-1938 concessions in these regions were discontinued after a report by the Survey Department that 1,000 hectare concessions were too large to be handled by small farmers. It was suggested that 60-80 hectares would be the ideal size for a small farm.

217. In 1939 a survey of Gurue showed that 8,000 hectares of good tea land were occupied by five companies. The successful settlement of Gurue by small independent farmers was therefore considered to be threatened by competition from the larger farms which held the best land and the colonization plan was abandoned. By the end of 1944 there were thirty-seven farms in the area, all but twelve devoted to tea. At that time it was believed that the development of the tea industry by large farmers was preferable to small-scale colonization.

218. In 1954 under the First Development Plan, interest in tea colonization was reawakened and a committee was established to investigate suitable areas for settlement (Mozambique Order 14,763, February 1954).

219. According to an unofficial source the committee in 1957 recommended the following:

It processes the leaf produced by the Sociedade Agrícola do Milange in addition to its own leaf.

(1) Demarcation of suitable lands for settlement schemes in the district of Zambézia and in the Mossurize region of Manica e Sofala;

(2) Establishment of co-operatives in such areas;

(3) Suitable financing facilities to be made available to all planters and factories wherever necessary;

(4) Establishment of a governmental experimental station to conduct experiments in tea cultivation and advise all planters in their work.

220. In 1959, 75 million escudos were allocated under the Second Development Plan for the demarcation of suitable areas and for the development of a settlement scheme. Expenditures amounted to 14 million escudos by the end of 1962 and an additional 5 million escudos were appropriated for 1963.

221. By 1961 an experimental project had been set up at Vila Junqueiro Gurue, comprising nine European families and one African (see A/6000/Rev.I, chap. V, annex II, paras. 309 and 310). Eight of the Europeans were soldier-settlers; the African family was installed largely to attract other Africans, who had previously shown reluctance to participate in tea growing because of the seven years waiting period between planting and the first harvest.

222. Each European family received 50 hectares, of which twenty were for tea and the rest for food crops, pasture and forests. The African farmer was to develop four hectares of tea with the technical and financial assistance of the Brigada de Chá. Under the guidance of the Brigada, these small producers have been formed into a co-operative which uses joint funds to provide housing, agricultural equipment and other needs. It was reported that the project was already producing 980 tons of green leaf by 1961.

223. A factory with an initial processing capacity of 1,000 tons, capable of being increased to 2,000 tons was put up by the Government during the 1960's, partly financed by a 2 million escudos loan from the Banco Nacional Ultramarino. Tea was first processed in the factory in 1965. The factory is being acquired by the growers' co-operative on a long-term loan.

224. According to original estimates, it was expected that eventually the European farmers would each earn 70,000 escudos annually.

225. Later reports from the Brigada de Chá have apparently discouraged further governmental involvement with tea settlements. According to one source the cost of setting up the minimum size tea farm of 15 hectares is about 600,000 escudos, on which no return can be expected for at least the seven-year period it takes the plants to mature. Government money, it was suggested, could be more profitably employed in the form of financial aid to larger companies. While at one time plans envisaged the setting up of similar colonization projects in Milange and Tacuane, no progress seems to have been made in this respect.

226. According to one source,* 5,928 hectares in Gurue were occupied by settlers in 1961, of which 800 hectares were under cultivation. An additional 1,670 hectares was to be opened up shortly. In 1965 it was reported that the number of small planters in Gurue had risen to twenty-eight and was rapidly increasing.

Government regulation and controls

227. Apart from the measures to assist the development of tea production described above, the industry is not subject to any special government regulation or control. Since tea is exported mainly to destinations outside the escudo zone, it is an important foreign exchange earner and, under the exchange control regulations in force, makes a valuable contribution to Portugal's balance of payments position.

228. Tea exports are subject to a standard export duty of 1 per cent ad valorem, plus an ad valorem surtax of 3 per cent. In the case of exports to Portugal it is subject to a special reduction of 25 per cent of the total tax.

* C. F. Spence, Mozambique (Cape Town, 1963).

Exports and destinations

229. Except for a small amount reserved for home consumption, amounting to only 330 tons in 1961, all tea produced in Mozambique is exported. Traditional markets for Mozambique tea are the United Kingdom, South Africa and Portugal, which absorbed respectively 60.52 per cent, 8.25 per cent and 5.53 per cent of Mozambique's total exports of tea between 1925 and 1962. The United States and the Netherlands, although they accounted for 12.05 per cent and 6.26 per cent of sales during this period, are not considered completely reliable markets. The United States has not been a big purchaser since 1950. The Netherlands has bought Mozambique tea only since 1950.

230. The United Kingdom being the major buyer of Mozambique tea, producers are subject to the British marketing system which, according to one source^{aa} has certain disadvantages for the producers. Under this system tea is auctioned at a central exchange which handles 80 per cent of the total of world transactions. The day that tea arrives from Mozambique the producer is informed of what price he would receive if it were marketed on that day. Generally, however, since two or three months elapse between the time of the original quotation and the time the tea is marketed, producers have no way of knowing or controlling the actual sale price. In the meantime the producer has to bear the entire expense of production and shipping and should the price have dropped cannot afford to postpone his marketing to a future date. To improve this condition, the Banco Nacional Ultramarino, in collaboration with the Anglo-Portuguese bank, instituted a special system whereby the producer could ship his tea in care of the bank which would give him in advance a percentage of the anticipated market price. The sale itself would be made by the Anglo-Portuguese bank which would wait for an appropriate time to sell.

^{aa} Banco Nacional Ultramarino, Boletim Trimestral, No. 43, 30 September 1960.

231. Despite this help offered by the Banco Nacional Ultramarino, Mozambique is still in an unfavourable position in the United Kingdom market. Because the tea is generally classified as "filler" it receives only about one half to one third of the price of better quality teas, and usually receives the lowest price of all African teas.

232. In addition, Mozambique producers are obliged to pay an import duty, generally higher than 1.4 escudos per/kg., levied on tea imported from non-commonwealth countries.

233. During the early 1960s Mozambique producers attempted to find a market at the Nairobi auction. In 1961, 222 cases of tea were sold in this way, increasing to 1,326 cases in 1962. By 1963, however, sales fell to 420 cases and in that year it was reported that Mozambique would no longer participate in these auctions.

234. Current export prices of Mozambique tea are not known. In recent years, the highest price was offered in 1959 (23 escudos per/kg.) after which it declined in 1960 and 1961. Since 1962 it has been reported that prices are again improving. The average price in 1962 was 20 escudos per kilogramme.

TABLE 19. MOZAMBIQUE—TEA: EXPORTS AND PRINCIPAL DESTINATIONS, 1955-1964

Year	Exports			Main destinations (percentage of export volume)
	Thousand tons	Million escudos	Percentage of total export value	United Kingdom	United States	Netherlands	Portugal	Federal Republic of Germany	Australia
1955	5.5	155.1	9.15	66.14	11.82	8.63	2.04	1.57	—
1956	6.3	120.5	6.94	83.27	2.82	7.79	2.71	0.94	0.03
1957	5.9	118.2	5.83	83.28	3.24	6.76	2.28	1.24	0.12
1958	6.9	145.6	7.18	81.55	2.36	9.53	2.48	0.54	0.74
1959	8.0	154.5	8.11	72.07	5.81	10.57	1.94	1.73	2.14
1960	8.1	176.4	8.40	79.33	5.36	3.19	1.98	3.67	1.86
1961	9.9	235.7	9.25	72.67	8.95	1.69	1.60	3.36	1.28
1962	9.0	179.6	6.87	80.52	5.26	2.94	2.07	1.96	0.44
1963	8.4	155.4	5.37
1964	9.0	163.9	5.39	53.48	8.62	9.44	2.16	1.53	6.42

SOURCES: 1955-1962: Mozambique, Comércio Externo; 1964: Mozambique, Boletim Mensal, December 1964.

TABLE 20. MOZAMBIQUE: AGRICULTURAL EXPORTS, 1955-1964
(Metric tons)

Year	Cotton-lint	Cashew ^a	Sugar	Copra	Sisal	Tea	Vegetable oils	Fruits ^b	Tobacco ^c
1955	32,687	50,056	85,820	34,823	26,896	5,540	13,346	12,235	379
1956	22,677	39,003	98,176	41,377	27,940	6,276	13,828	16,283	96
1957	31,578	69,358	122,321	45,507	32,374	5,869	15,793	24,906	410
1958	35,974	97,200	132,387	44,368	32,450	6,904	11,976	17,341	540
1959	35,051	63,033	114,108	37,639	30,596	7,987	8,422	16,342	454
1960	44,406	57,203	111,249	40,753	27,950	8,066	6,385	23,012	514
1961	42,631	85,641	113,843	60,070	28,427	9,905	9,588	17,170	1,147
1962	36,301	82,378	129,931	52,794	29,643	8,989	7,919	23,215	1,210
1963	31,564	121,895	124,896	46,433	29,680	8,438	14,963	25,550	1,017
1964	32,445	127,796	83,347	43,812	31,581	9,017	17,893	27,217	696

SOURCES: 1955-1962: Mozambique, Comércio Externo; 1963: Mozambique, Anuário Estatístico; 1964: Mozambique, Boletim Mensal, December 1964.

^a Includes husked and unhusked nuts.

^b Includes bananas and citrus.

^c Includes manufactured and unmanufactured tobacco.

TABLE 21. MOZAMBIQUE: AGRICULTURAL EXPORTS PERCENTAGE OF VALUE OF TOTAL EXPORTS, 1955-1964

Year	Total exports (thousand escudos)	Cotton (per cent)	Cashew ^a (per cent)	Sugar (per cent)	Copra (per cent)	Sisal (per cent)	Tea (per cent)	Vegetable oils (per cent)	Fruits ^b (per cent)	Tobacco ^c (per cent)
1955	1,695,766	25.41	8.46	12.60	8.26	7.16	9.15	5.27	0.34	0.37
1956	1,735,674	17.79	8.74	14.32	9.58	7.31	6.94	6.28	0.42	0.13
1957	2,029,294	23.51	12.29	15.57	8.51	6.29	5.83	6.03	0.53	0.37
1958	2,028,566	27.07	13.71	16.62	9.33	6.48	7.18	4.43	0.43	0.63
1959	1,903,988	28.39	10.49	15.21	11.08	8.32	8.11	3.97	0.42	0.73
1960	2,099,250	32.47	11.12	13.25	9.26	8.47	8.40	2.43	0.52	0.65
1961	2,548,126	27.31	13.33	12.75	10.47	6.36	9.25	2.83	0.77	1.10
1962	2,615,832	23.43	10.49	13.19	7.82	6.37	6.87	2.24	1.27	1.24
1963	2,896,355	18.06	16.07	11.31	7.04	9.03	5.37	3.96	1.23	1.21
1964	3,042,973	18.56	19.99	8.07	6.84	9.02	5.39	4.92	1.15	0.95

SOURCES: 1955-1962: Mozambique, Comércio Externo; 1963: Mozambique, Anuário Estatístico; 1964: Mozambique, Boletim Mensal, December 1964.

^a Includes husked and unhusked nuts.

^b Includes bananas and citrus.

^c Includes manufactured and unmanufactured tobacco.

Appendix IV

Foreign-owned railways in Angola and Mozambique

Working paper prepared by the Secretariat

CONTENTS

	Paragraphs
INTRODUCTION	1-2
I. ANGOLA: THE BENGUELA RAILWAY
A. The railway system of Angola	3-15
B. History of the Benguela Railway	16-19
C. Terms of concession	20-25
D. Organization and finances of the Company	26-35
E. Operations of the Railway and its economic role	36-61
II. MOZAMBIQUE: THE TRANS-ZAMBEZIA RAILWAY
A. The railway systems of Mozambique	62-71
B. History of the Trans-Zambezia Railway	72-79
C. Terms of the concession	80-87
D. Organization and finances of the Company	88-92
E. Operations of the Railway and its economic role	93-97

Tables

	Page
1. Benguela Railway: goods and service traffic, 1954-1963	439
2. Benguela Railway: domestic and transit traffic by principal commodities, 1961-1963	440

ANNEXES

I. Angola: railway facilities	445
II. Mozambique: railway facilities	446

INTRODUCTION

1. Railways represent an important branch of economic activity throughout southern Africa and have played a major role in the development of industries and of European settlement. Mozambique particularly, because of its geographical location vis-à-vis the rich mining and industrial regions of the interior, depends heavily on its railways as a source of invisible foreign exchange earnings which until recently more than offset the substantial deficit in its balance of external trade. In Angola, where only one railway connects with those of neighbouring countries, this factor is of relatively lesser importance and the railways may be said to have played a comparatively greater part in opening up the country to European settlement and industries.

2. This paper contains an outline of the railway systems of both Territories and describes their economic role. It deals primarily however with the two foreign-owned railways, giving details of their history, ownership and operations. Of the two, the Benguela Railway is by far the most important, in terms of its economic significance and its earnings, as well as the revenue which the Government derives from it. The two railways illustrate yet another facet of the role played by foreign economic interests in the Territories under Portuguese administration.

I. ANGOLA: THE BENGUELA RAILWAY

A. The railway systems of Angola

3. Compared with those of Mozambique (which are described in section II below), Angola's railway facilities are less developed and do not play as important a role in the economy of the Territory. Although in area Angola is half a million square kilometres larger than Mozambique, it has almost the same total length of railways, resulting in a railway density of 2.4 kilometres of track per thousand square kilometres compared with 4.2 in Mozambique.

4. Angola's rail facilities consist of three unconnected main lines which run almost parallel to each other inland from the ports of Luanda, Lobito and Moçâmedes. One of these, the Benguela Railway, which is the only non-Portuguese-owned line, traverses the whole Territory and links with international lines, while the other two railways, which are State-owned, reach only about half-way between the coast and the Territory's eastern frontier with Zambia. In addition, there is a small privately owned line of 129 kilometres between Amboim and Gabela.

5. Though limited, Angola's rail facilities have nevertheless continuously operated below capacity. Despite substantial increases on all three lines after the Second World War, Angola's traffic in 1959, expressed in terms of ton-kilometres per kilometre of route, was less than one tenth of that of Mozambique. In recent years the expansion of the network of roads serving inland points has further diverted domestic traffic away from the two internal railways, and in 1963 estimated receipts of the autonomous Roads Board were almost 10 per cent higher than those of the Direcção de Portos e Caminhos de Ferro which administers the State-owned railways.

6. The northern part of Angola is served by the Luanda Railway which is the oldest in the Territory. It was originally built, mainly with British capital, by the Royal Trans-Africa Railway Company (Companhia Real dos Caminhos de Ferro Através de Africa) under a ninety-nine-year concession granted to it by the Portuguese Government in 1885. The first section of this railway, then known as the Luanda-Ambaca line, was opened in 1889, but construction of the remaining section was slow and only reached Ambaca, the provisional terminus 276 kilometres from the coast, in 1901. The final stretch of 140 kilometres to Malanje was completed in 1909 by the Government.* Because of recurring difficulties between the company and the Government, the latter in 1914 exercised the right to redeem the entire line and in 1918 took possession of it (Decree 4,600, 13 June 1918).^b

7. The Luanda Railway now comprises a total length of 615 kilometres. In addition to the main line of 516 kilometres, between Luanda and Malanje, there are two branch lines, one of 55 kilometres to Dondo and another of 33 kilometres to Golungo Alto. A further branch line, known as the Congo district line, is under construction. Serving the Luanda, Cuanza North and Malanje districts, the Luanda Railway has increased in importance with the growing European settlement and development in this region. As reported previously (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex II, table 2), the European population in these three districts has more than doubled since 1950, and in 1960 was more than one third of the total European population of the Territory. The principal products of the region include palm oil, coffee, cotton, sugar, some sisal, manganese, asphalt and mica, which are exported through the port of Luanda. Although the Luanda line has for many years operated at half capacity, it is potentially of great importance to the future development of the Territory as it serves an area which already contains some of the most important industrial activities in the Territory and is continuing to attract new industries.

8. Enterprises served by the Luanda line in 1964 included the Bom Jesus sugar plantation and factory, PETRANGOL, COTONANG, and the major cement plant of the Territory, SECIL, which in 1963 had an annual production of 290,000 tons. As the main manganese deposits lie between Galungo Alto and Pungo Andongo the Luanda line was the main line of evacuation of manganese ore in the 1950s (ibid., annex I, paras. 67-69). At present coffee comprises a large part of the Luanda railway's outward traffic, especially along the Galungo Alto branch, which serves the area of Dembos. Most of the inward traffic consists of consumer and durable goods, including machinery and equipment for the European enterprises and plantations. The Congo district line, which is being extended into the heart of the coffee-producing region in the Uíge plateau, is expected to greatly increase the value of the Luanda Railway by opening up the northern part of the Territory to more intensive development (ibid., annex II, para. 70). When completed, the Congo district line is expected to carry 600,000 tons annually serving points as far north as S. Salvador, Quicoxe, Vale do M'Bridge and Quimba where the Companhia União Fabril has its main fibre plantations.

9. Since the mid-1950s the Luanda Railway has carried an average of about one quarter of the Territory's total passenger traffic. Reflecting the development of the region served goods traffic on the line has increased by more than 50 per cent since 1960. In 1964 the Luanda Railway accounted for about 25 per cent by weight of the total goods traffic of the Territory.

10. The southern third of the Territory is served by the State-owned Moçâmedes Railway which runs almost parallel to the border with South West Africa. The original concession was granted in 1886 to the Moçâmedes Company. As Portugal at that time was engaged in colonizing southern Angola and increasing its influence in that region^d the railway was built to facilitate troop movements into the Huila plateau and the settlement of Portuguese nationals there (ibid., para. 93). The terms of concession, therefore, required the Company's management, the majority of the employees and the major share of the capital to be Portuguese. The line is now State-owned.

11. Begun in 1905 the first section of 249 kilometres to Sá da Bandeira on the Huila plateau was not completed until 1923. Although at various times plans were proposed for extending the railway to the southern border to serve South West Africa and to the eastern border to provide a second westward outlet for what is now Zambia, Sá da Bandeira remained the southern railway's terminal point for the next twenty years.

12. The Moçâmedes Railway was built before the hinterland was sufficiently developed to provide enough paying traffic, so that during most of its existence this railway operated at a sizable deficit. Between 1942 and 1950 the annual deficits fluctuated between 25 and almost 70 per cent. Although the volume of both goods and passenger traffic increased after 1950, and the railway's revenues rose from 5.4 million escudos in 1952 to 31.2 million escudos in 1962, the financial situation of the railway improved only slightly, the ratio of operating expenses to revenues having fallen from 1.6 to 1.3 in this period.

13. As in the case of the Luanda Railway, the Moçâmedes Railway has become increasingly important in recent years due to the growth of Portuguese settlement especially in the Cunene Valley, the development of cattle ranching and, more particularly, the opening up of the Cassinga iron mines to which a new rail link is being built (see below and A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex I, paras. 210 and 211). This new link was expected to make it possible to export 1 million tons of ore annually by 1965 and 3 million tons annually by 1967^e to the port of Moçâmedes where the Government is building a new mineral wharf.

14. The Benguela Railway which starts from the port of Lobito about half way down the coast between Luanda and Moçâmedes serves the central area of Angola and extends to the eastern frontier where it connects with the railway system of Katanga. Although originally built for the purpose of carrying ore from the Katanga mines to the coast, as will be seen below, the Benguela Railway became and has remained an important factor in the settlement of the Benguela and Bié plateaux and in evacuating agricultural products from these areas and the hinterland. It is also the only railway in Angola that has operated with a profit and contributed to the revenue of the Territorial Government.

15. The history, operations and economic role of the Benguela Railway which are described below illustrate another facet of the part played by foreign economic interests in the Territory.

B. History of the Benguela Railway

16. The Benguela Railway runs from Lobito Bay down to Benguela about 35 kilometres south and then across Angola to Vila Teixeira de Sousa (Dilolo) where it connects with the Congo-Bas Katanga Railway (generally known as the BCK Railway). The length of the railway from Lobito to the eastern frontier is 1,348 kilometres and there are 182 kilometres of spurs, sidings and yards.

17. The idea of building a railway from Lobito across Angola dates back to 1825 when a special commission was appointed to survey the area between Lobito and the Cubango River up to Caconda, then an important settlement centre (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex II, para. 147). A railway of 23 kilometres was subsequently built from Lobito to Catumbela, midway to the town of Benguela, by the Companhia Portuguesa do Caminho de Ferro Africano. In August 1899 the Portuguese Government authorized the building of a railway towards the frontier of what is now the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and in the following year set up a Benguela Railway Administrative Board (Junta Administrativa do Caminho de Ferro de Benguela) (statutes approved 23 June 1900) composed of government staff and representatives of banking, commercial and industrial interests in

* Some Portuguese writers attribute the slow rate of construction to the liberal terms of the concession contract which gave the company a guaranteed annual income of 6 per cent on its capital invested calculated on the basis of 999 réis per kilometre.

^b During one period the line was placed under a Portuguese company called the Ambaca Company which was finally dissolved in 1938.

^c The zone served by the railway is generally considered to extend about 150 kilometres on each side of the line.

^d After the Berlin Conference of 1885 a secret Anglo-German agreement had been signed designating the south of Angola Benguela and Lobito as a German sphere of influence (José D'Almeida, A historical outline of the Benguela Railway, London, 1954, pp. 24 and 32).

^e Actualidade Económica de Angola, 2 September 1965.

Portugal and of commercial and agricultural interests in Angola. It was intended that the railway would be financed with the help of customs surtaxes, certain additional taxes, receipts from operations of the railway during construction and revenue from the produce of the hinterland served by the railway. However, in 1902, the Government decided to grant the concession to build the railway to Robert Williams on behalf of the Tanganyika Concessions Company (established in London in 1899) which having obtained extensive copper mining concessions in Katanga and Rhodesia, was a leading promoter of railways to serve these areas. The Benguela Railroad Company was established on 26 May 1903 and the railway concession was transferred to it. A British firm, S. Pauling and Company, was engaged to build the railway.

18. As originally conceived, the Benguela Railway was to traverse Angola with a major part running parallel to the frontier with the Congo where it would connect with the Congolese railway system. Agreement was reached between the Benguela and the Congolese railway companies (the BCK and the Katanga Railway Companies) for the construction of a branch from the Katanga mines to link up with the Benguela Railway when it reached the frontier. Receipts from the traffic carried were to be divided between the three companies in proportion to the length of their respective lines.

19. Because of the difficulties of the terrain, involving steep gradients of 2.5 per cent in the climb from the coast to the Benguela plateau, work on the railway proceeded slowly. The first section of 197 kilometres from Lobito to Cubal was opened in 1908, the second section to Cuma in 1910, and the third section to Chinguar, a total distance of about 517 kilometres from Lobito, was opened in 1913. Work on the railway ceased during World War I because of difficulty in obtaining materials. As the BCK had in the meantime built an internal line from the Katanga to Port Francqui, after the war the previous agreement with the Congo railway companies had to be revised.¹ In 1928, following a revision of the border between Angola and the Congo the Benguela Railway had to be extended 104 kilometres beyond the original plan and it became necessary for the Benguela Railway Company to raise additional capital.² After the First World War, the Tanganyika Concessions, which then held five sixths of the shares in the Benguela Railway Company, received a British loan of £1,250,000 and the railway was completed to Dilolo on the Angola border in 1929.³ The link of 520 kilometres from Tenke in the Congo to Dilolo was finally completed in 1931.

C. Terms of the concession

20. The concession for the Benguela Railway was granted to Robert Williams by an agreement dated 28 November 1902. This agreement together with subsequent modifications granted by the Portuguese Government constitute the legal basis for the Benguela Railway Company's operations.

21. Under the terms of the contract, the concession is for a period of ninety-nine years (terminating in 2001 A.D.), and as in the case of the Trans-Zambezia Railway described below, on expiration of this term, the railway, with all its permanent way and rolling stock, buildings and accessories will revert to the State without payment. However, the contract also provides that, once twenty-five years had elapsed from the date on which the railway reached the frontier, that is to say from 1954 onwards, the Government may redeem the railway with its equipment after giving six months notice to that effect. If it does so, the Government must make an annual payment to the Company during the remaining period of the concession of an amount equal to the average net revenue of the railway during the previous five years, which, according to the contract, was not to be less than

¹ Lionel Werner, Les chemins de fer coloniaux (Brussels, 1930), pp. 154 and 155.

² Because of the secret convention referred to above (see foot-note d), it had at one time been thought that Germany might share in financing the railway (Hailey, An African Survey, Oxford, 1945 edition, p. 1595).

³ Hailey, op. cit.

700 réis per kilometre (article 56). In the event of total or partial interruption of work the Government may take over the operation of the railway and after three months, if the Company is still unable to continue the working, it ipso facto incurs the penalty of rescission.

22. The contract granted Robert Williams and his Company (then yet to be formed) the right to construct and work a railway from Lobito Bay to the eastern frontier, approaching at the terminal point the twelfth parallel south latitude. The Company was given the right, during the first ten years of the concession, to prospect for minerals within an area of state land 120 kilometres on either side of the railway line; its right to work such mines was subject to the mining law of 1898. It was also granted the use of timber in the same areas for the duration of the concession as might be necessary for construction and working of the railway; the right to build a pier in Lobito Bay as an extension and integral part of the railroad for its own use in connexion with its railway operations; and the right (subsequently amended) to construct hotels, restaurants and stores along the railway.

23. During the period of the concession the Company was exempted from "any taxation, whether general or municipal", relating to the working of the railway. It was exempted from duty on ores transported by the railway, including ore mined alongside the railway or coming from adjoining countries; such ores were, however, subject to export duty as specified in the mining legislation. It was also exempt from import duties on specific goods needed, including coal or other fuel for the railway.

24. The Government undertook not to construct or grant concessions for the construction of any other parallel railway within 50 kilometres on each side of the railway; but it reserved the right to grant concessions for the construction of railways or other means of communications crossing or joining the railway.

25. The concession contract provided that the railway's tariffs had to be approved by the Government and were not to exceed a fixed maximum. The tariff schedule divided goods into different classes with the maximum tariffs on high-priced agricultural products such as sugar, and coffee set at 20 per cent higher than those for cereals (including wheat, maize and flour), cotton wool, palm oil, pig-iron and copper, lead and other raw metals.

D. Organization and finances of the Company

26. The Benguela Railway Company was required under the original contract to have a capital of not less than £2 million sterling. In 1926 (Decree 11,732, 29 May), this was increased to £3 million, equivalent to 13.5 million gold escudos. To provide additional working capital the Company was later authorized to issue under Portuguese law debentures of a face value equivalent to three times the amount of share capital already realized (article 15 of the Statutes as amended by: Decree 11,732, 29 May 1926; Law No. 1,011, 18 July 1920; and Law of 23 June 1913). The Company had to be registered under and subject to Portuguese law, and its Board of Directors had to include three members freely appointed by the Portuguese Government but paid by the Company. In addition, a Government Commissioner, also paid by the Company, sat on the Board.

27. In 1963 the Board of Directors was composed of: Dr. Alexandre Pinto Basto, President; Dr. Ruy Ennes Ulrich, Vice-President; Colonel Arthur Mendes de Magalhães, Government Director; Vice-Admiral José Augusto Guerreiro de Brito, Government Director; Dr. Manuel António Fernandes, Managing Director; D. António de Almeida Correa de Sá, Assistant Managing Director; Dr. Luís Supico Pinto; A. V. A. de Spirlet; Rt. Hon. Lord Clitheroe, P.C.; M. T. W. Easby, F.C.A.; S. G. Watts.

28. The Benguela Railway Company is closely associated with Tanganyika Concessions Ltd. which holds 90 per cent of its share capital and since 1933 all the debenture capital. In 1964 Tanganyika Concessions Ltd. had a total authorized capital of £10 million. In addition to its controlling interest in the Benguela Railway Company, it also held a 14 per cent interest (179,760 shares valued at £15,176,880) in the Union Minière du Haut Katanga; 50 per cent of the capital (£40,000) of Tanganyika Holdings; all of the capital of Tanganyika Properties (Rhodesia) Ltd; and 60 per cent of the capital (£2,250,000) of the Commonwealth Timber Industries. In November 1964 Tanganyika Concessions Ltd. moved its headquarters from Southern Rhodesia to the Bahamas. Stockholders in Tanganyika Concessions include Rhodesia Anglo-American, which in 1952-53 was reported to have acquired a 7 per cent interest, and an American group, including Rockefeller interests, which since 1950 have been reported to control about 600,000 shares.¹ The Comité Spécial du Katanga was originally a shareholder receiving 30,000 shares. Harry F. Oppenheimer, the Chairman of the Anglo-American Corporation, is a member of the Board of Directors.

¹ T. Gregory, Ernest Oppenheimer (Cape Town, 1962), p. 457; W. A. Hunton, Decision in Africa (New York, 1957), p. 147.

29. At 31 December 1963, the Benguela Railway Company's total assets amount to 3,049 million escudos including 2,500 million escudos in fixed assets. The company's registered share capital was 660 million escudos divided into 3 million shares at 220 escudos each. Total reserves amounted to 1,436 million escudos, of which 81.7 million was legal reserves, 548 million was general reserves and 21.6 million was dividend equalization reserve.²

30. The Company's results for the years 1960-1964, the latest years for which information is available, were as follows:

² Tanganyika Concessions Ltd., Report and Accounts, 31 July 1964, pp. 26 and 27; Benguela Railway Company, amalgamated balance-sheet.

	1960	1961	1962	1963	1964
	(Million escudos)
Gross receipts	596.5	599.9	596.5	551.0	563.8
Working expenses	304.9	337.3	344.9	336.7	354.7
Net revenue of railway	287.3	260.8	250.7	214.3	207.0
Net revenue for distribution	246.1	220.5	207.6	171.6	170.8
Dividends	82.5	82.5	66.0	66.0	66.0
Share of Portuguese Government ...	26.7	22.9	23.5	17.1	17.1
Legal reserve	9.4	8.3	8.4	6.7	6.7
Debentures: redemption and interest	108.6	79.4	30.1	30.6	30.2
Share of Board of Directors and Staff ^a	18.9	16.5	16.9	20.1	20.1

^a The Board of Directors and Board auditors together receive 5 per cent of net revenue after deduction of values destined to redemption of and interest on debentures and part of the Portuguese Government share. The staff profit-sharing participation used to be an equal value, but, in 1963, it was raised to 10 per cent on net revenue after the same deductions indicated above.

31. Under the original concession, the Government received 10 per cent of the total shares fully paid up. In addition to dividends on its shares, the Government was to receive 5 per cent of the net receipts.

32. In 1926 (Decree 11,732, 29 May), when the capital of the company was raised from £2 to £3 million, the Government's financial participation was also increased. In addition to the shares already held the amended provisions entitled the Government to 15 per cent of any new shares issued and 7.5 per cent of all dividends paid on share capital in excess of 5 per cent. A subsequent amendment again increased the Government's participation by giving it another 5 per cent of all dividends above 2.5 per cent. The Government now holds 300,000 shares (10 per cent of 3 million shares issued) at a nominal value of 220 escudos each. The amounts received by it, in the form both of dividends and participation in net receipts, are shown below.

GOVERNMENT SHARE IN PROCEEDS OF THE BENGUELA RAILWAY COMPANY, 1960-1964
(Million escudos)

	1960	1961	1962	1963	1964
A. Dividends on shares held (300,000 shares)	8.2	8.2	6.6	6.6	6.6
B. Participation in net receipts
1. 5 per cent of net receipts	9.9	8.7	8.9	7.0	7.0
2. 7.5 per cent of all dividends paid on share capital in excess of 5 per cent	9.6	8.0	8.3	5.6	5.5
3. 5 per cent of all dividends above 2.5 per cent	7.2	6.2	6.3	4.5	4.5
Sub-total	26.7	22.9	23.5	17.1	17.0
GRAND TOTAL	34.9	31.1	30.1	23.7	23.6

33. Over the ten-year period from 1955-1964, excluding dividends, the Government received more than 200 million escudos (about $US7 million). From the Company's point of view, however, since all installations will revert to the Government when the concession expires, all investments made are a contribution to "the patrimony of the nation".

34. As in the case of the Angolan Diamond Company, the Benguela Railway Company has also helped the Portuguese Government by providing low interest funds for development (see A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex I, paras. 84-166). In 1963 (Decree 45,062, 5 June 1963) it contracted a loan of 60 million escudos ($US2 million) to the Portuguese Government for the implementation of the Angolan section of the Second National Development Plan. The interest rate is at 1 per cent and the Government plans to repay the loan from its share of the railway profits, supplemented if necessary from the Territory's ordinary revenue. It is not clear to what extent the Benguela Railway Company earns foreign exchange for the Territory but the reports of accounts show each year an exchange loss, which amounted to over 470,000 escudos in 1960; over 763,000 escudos in 1961; 1,059,608 escudos in 1962; and 680,736 escudos in 1963.

35. Although under the terms of its concession the Benguela Railway Company is exempt from any taxation, "whether general or municipal" (see para. 23 above), the Company was assessed £200,000 in 1965 for the special graduated income tax levied by the Angolan Government (see chap. V, above, para. 106). The Company has appealed against this assessment. There are no details as to what other taxes are paid by the railway to the Government.

E. Operation of the Railway and its economic role

36. Up to the end of 1965 the Benguela was still a single-track line. It had over 100 steam locomotives, four diesel engines and more than 1,500 four-axle wagons. Most of the locomotives are wood-burning and to supply them the company has developed eucalyptus groves along both sides of the railway with more than 93 million trees. Coal is used mainly on short stretches where the gradient is steep. Although in terms of weight, the railway's service traffic, which is non-revenue producing, annually accounts for about half of the total, in terms of tons per kilometre; however, service traffic amounts to less than 10 per cent.

37. Built with the intention of evacuating copper ore from the Katanga mines, the Benguela Railway provides the shortest route to Europe from railhead ports in the southern part of Africa. It is 3,000 miles shorter than the sea route from Beira and 2,353 miles shorter than the Cape Town route. Nevertheless, for various reasons, among them stiff competition from other lines (see paras. 51-54 below), the Benguela Railway has never been used to full capacity for transit traffic and for many years domestic traffic in Angola was the main source of the railway's revenue.

38. According to the original financial estimates the railway would have to carry 40,000 tons of copper per year from Katanga to enable it to show a profit on the capital invested. When the Benguela Railway was finally completed in 1929, it was anticipated that the line would carry annually an average of more than a quarter of a million tons (260,000 tons) of traffic comprising 100,000 tons of Katanga exports, 70,000 tons of Katanga imports, 60,000 tons of Angola exports and 30,000 tons of Angola imports. In 1938, after almost ten years of working, the total revenue-earning traffic amounted to 324,000 tons, but transit traffic accounted for less than a quarter of the total traffic.

39. Total paying goods traffic carried by the railway almost doubled between 1938 and 1948, rising from 324,000 to 692,000 tons, and again doubled by 1958. In this twenty-year period, transit traffic increased eightfold, rising from 76,000 tons to 569,000 tons, and in terms of percentage of the total from 23 per cent to over 40 per cent. The growth of transit traffic and domestic paying goods traffic over the period 1954-1963 is shown in table 1 below.

TABLE 1. BENGUELA RAILWAY: GOODS AND SERVICE TRAFFIC, 1954-1963

A. By weight
	Domestic		Transit		Service ^a	Total (including service traffic)
	Tons	Percentage of total	Tons	Percentage of total	Tons
1954	534,308	25.28	593,202	28.07	(986,083)	2,113,593
1955	579,613	25.53	630,394	27.77	(1,060,018)	2,270,025
1956	703,170	27.55	720,942	28.25	(1,127,623)	2,551,735
1957	737,939	26.44	652,763	23.39	(1,400,584)	2,791,286
1958	797,627	28.30	569,021	20.19	(1,451,962)	2,818,610
1959	852,007	31.12	622,662	22.74	(1,263,146)	2,727,815
1960	1,067,593	29.56	754,962	20.90	(1,789,237)	3,611,792
1961	1,063,836	30.33	763,695	21.77	(1,679,594)	3,507,125
1962	883,852	27.35	754,937	23.36	(1,592,547)	3,231,336
1963	999,330	35.75	670,538	23.99	(1,125,211)	2,795,079

B. By ton/kilometres
	Domestic		Transit		Service ^a	Total (including service traffic)
	Tons/km.	Percentage of total	Tons/km.	Percentage of total	Tons/km.
1954	184,900,420	17.11	799,635,953	74.00	(96,007,689)	1,080,544,062
1955	217,607,538	18.68	849,771,323	72.97	(97,238,342)	1,164,617,203
1956	254,309,675	19.22	971,830,660	73.43	(97,240,634)	1,323,380,969
1957	248,532,483	19.97	879,924,577	70.72	(115,853,667)	1,244,310,727
1958	327,704,649	26.71	767,041,138	62.51	(132,258,892)	1,227,004,679
1959	364,838,921	28.07	839,348,693	64.58	(89,467,328)	1,299,654,942
1960	469,806,501	29.38	1,017,689,733	63.65	(111,429,321)	1,598,925,555
1961	488,890,581	29.70	1,029,460,878	62.55	(127,443,167)	1,645,794,626
1962	416,356,994	26.86	1,017,654,566	65.64	(116,291,702)	1,550,303,262
1963	476,774,893	32.57	903,885,186	61.74	(83,280,223)	1,463,940,302

SOURCE: Eduardo Gomes de Albuquerque e Castro, Angola, Portos e Transportes, Luanda 1964 (not paginated).

^a Non-revenue earning.

40. The factors affecting the Benguela Railway's domestic and transit traffic are discussed in the following sections.

Domestic traffic

41. Within Angola the Benguela Railway traverses the districts of Benguela, Bié, Huambo and Moxico, and it has played an important role in their settlement and development. It has also been responsible for the increased activity of the port of Lobito. When the railway was begun, there were few settlements in the hinterland of Lobito. By 1960, there were more than 45,000 Europeans settled in the Benguela and Huambo districts, with important European centres at Ganda, Nova Lisboa and Silva Porto which are on the railway line.

42. As described in the study on agriculture and processing industries in Angola (see appendix II), the Benguela-Bié plateau is at present the principal centre for growing sisal, exports of which account for more than 8 per cent of the Territory's total exports by value. Also about 95 per cent of the maize, the Territory's leading export by tonnage, and most of the manioc are also produced in this region. The existence of the railway has stimulated African production of maize and manioc on both sides of the line. From 1920 to the early 1940's maize accounted for 30 to 50 per cent of the total goods traffic on the Benguela Railway.^k This proportion has decreased substantially in recent years as seen in the following table.

TABLE 2. BENGUELA RAILWAY: DOMESTIC AND TRANSIT TRAFFIC BY PRINCIPAL COMMODITIES, 1961-1963

	1961 (metric tons)	1962 (metric tons)	1963 (metric tons)
Minerals	1,002,491	843,278	794,374
Maize	156,390	77,919	97,921
Timber (madeiras em bruto)	18,690	40,216	75,116
Fuel oil	43,137	46,292	47,430
Cement	25,216	30,450	41,545
Fibre (mainly sisal)	40,456	43,258	40,754
Petroleum	41,040	40,492	40,568
Stones and gravel	17,564	26,197	30,095
Wine and beer	16,573	18,243	24,162
Salt	16,048	14,872	18,463
Sugar	22,574	20,469	17,742
Fertilizer and chemicals..	19,293	11,945	13,053

SOURCE: Eduardo Gomes de Albuquerque e Castro, Angola, Portos e Transportes, Luanda 1964 (not paginated).

43. Imports up the line include a wide range of consumer durable and non-durable goods for communities along the railway and as far distant as Dondo in the Lunda district where the Angola Diamond Company is engaged in mining (see A/6000/Rev.1, chap V, annex I, para. 105). Although there are no detailed figures on the nature of the inbound traffic carried by the railway some indication can be obtained from the breakdown of the Lobito Port imports. As might be expected, in 1954 for instance, imports consisted mainly of petroleum products (21 per cent), coal (15 per cent, but mostly retained at port), cement (13 per cent), alcoholic beverages (13.7 per cent), and construction materials and machinery (7.14 per cent and 3 per cent respectively).¹

44. Although maize and other agricultural products continue to account for a substantial part of the Benguela Railway's outbound domestic traffic, mineral ore has become a new feature since the opening, in 1957, of the Cuíma iron mines of the Companhia Mineira do Lobito, which have been described in a previous study (ibid., paras. 200-211).

45. As the Cuíma mines are located only forty-one miles from the Robert Williams Station on the Benguela Railway, the iron ore was for several years transported by trucks to this point. In 1961 formal agreements were signed with the Companhia Mineira do Lobito (22 March 1961)^m and the Portuguese Government (Decree 43,601, 14 April) for the construction of a new rail link from the Cuíma mines to the Benguela railway.

46. Under the terms of that contract with the Government, the Benguela Railway Company received the right to construct and operate a link between Robert Williams and Cuíma and to extend the line to new mineral deposits as they were opened. The line was to be constructed within fifteen months and was to be considered an integral part of the original concession of 1962 redeemable by the Government under the same conditions.

47. The new link was a part of an over-all plan for the development of the Cassinga and Cuíma iron mines formalized by an agreement between the Portuguese Government and the two mining companies, Companhia Mineira do Lobito and the Sociedade Mineira do Lombige.ⁿ The main purpose of this agreement was to secure the construction by the two companies involved of rail links from their mines to the Moçâmedes railway and provide the rolling stock to transport 1.5 million tons of ore annually (or about 5,000 tons daily). The investment by the companies was to be repaid by the Government on the basis of 60 escudos per ton of ore transported, until the entire sum had been completely amortized. Since the Moçâmedes line is State owned, the Government undertook to give iron ore priority on that railway at an agreed tariff. The Benguela Railway was authorized to transport up to 500,000 tons of ore annually with a guarantee of a minimum of 250,000 tons^o provided that the Cuíma traffic on the Moçâmedes line did not fall below 700,000 tons annually.

48. The Benguela-Cuíma link which cost 30.4 million escudos was opened to traffic on 9 August 1962. Ore traffic from Cuíma carried on the Benguela since 1957 is as follows: 88,357 tons in 1957; 197,110 tons in 1958; 245,728 tons in 1959; 439,887 tons in 1960; 380,627 tons in 1961; 231,847 tons in 1962; 288,931 tons in 1963 and 310,198 tons in 1964.^p

49. Originally it had been envisaged that ore from the Cuíma mines would account for two thirds of the mineral traffic guaranteed to the Moçâmedes and Benguela Railways but by the end of 1965 the development of the Cassinga mines was expected to lead to the eventual abandonment of the Cuíma mines^q where the total iron ore reserves are probably less than one tenth of the almost 300 million tons estimated to exist at Cassinga (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex I, para. 59).

Transit Traffic

(a) Factors affecting transit traffic

50. Originally built with a view to providing a direct route for the evacuation of ore from the Katanga mines, through its connexion with the BCK Railway, the Benguela Railway subsequently became part of the only trans-Africa system providing a westward exit for the mines on the Copperbelt. For various reasons, however, the Benguela Railway has never been used to full capacity for transit traffic from either the Katanga or the Copperbelt despite the advantages it offers as the shortest route to European ports.

51. Before the Benguela Railway was completed, it had been intended that through rates would be established with the BCK Railway link to the Angolan frontier and in 1927 an agreement was signed between the Belgian and Portuguese Governments to this effect.^r However, partly because of the Belgian Congo Government's policy to divert traffic to its own railways and partly because of opposition by the Rhodesian Railways, through rates were not adopted except for two brief periods between 1931 and 1939.

52. According to the report of the Central and Southern Africa Transport Conference held in Johannesburg in 1950^s on the two occasions when through rates were introduced on the BCK and Benguela Railways in 1931 and 1936, the ⁿ Ibid., 26 November 1958.

^o Boletim Geral, August 1962, p. 253.

^p Figures for 1957-1960 and 1964 are from the Boletim Geral; 1962 and 1963 figures are from the Benguela Company's 1963 report.

^q Boletim Geral do Ultramar, December 1965, p. 196.

^r League of Nations, Treaty Series, vol. LXXI, 1928, p. 439.

^s CCTA, Central and Southern Africa Transport Conference, Final act and related documents (Johannesburg, 1950), p. 130.

^k Portugal, Instituto Nacional de Estatística, I Congresso dos Economistas Portugueses, V Secção-Utilização do Solo (Lisbon 1945), p. 98.

^l Hance and Van Donegan, "Port of Lobito and the Benguela Railway", Geographical Review, Vol. 46, 1956, p. 477.

^m Diário do Governo, Series II, 22 March 1961.

Rhodesian Railways, as the customary carrier of the Copperbelt traffic, petitioned and secured the withdrawal of through rates on the Benguela Railway. In 1938, the Rhodesian Railways concluded an agreement with the four major producers to safeguard its share of the traffic from the Copperbelt.[†] Under this agreement which remained in effect until 1956, the producers agreed to consign all copper exports and all imports via the Rhodesian Railways in exchange for a reduction of 12s. 6d. per ton of copper exported via Beira, and they agreed to use coal from the Wankie Collieries in Southern Rhodesia at a specially reduced rate. As a result, except for a few emergency supplies of coal imported via Lobito, no Copperbelt traffic was carried by the Benguela Railway during the period of the agreement.[‡]

53. After the expiration of the above-mentioned agreement, tariffs on the Benguela and the BCK Railways were brought to approximate parity, taking into account the greater cost of shipping via Matadi. Although these rates were still higher than those of the Rhodesian Railways, an agreement was reached between the three railways concerned permitting a maximum of 20 per cent of exportable copper from the Copperbelt to be transported by the Benguela Railway.[¶] This agreement which was valid for four years from 1 January 1957 also removed limitations on imports to the Copperbelt via Lobito and restrictions on other exports by this route. Inward rates from Lobito for all goods except coal were to be the same as those from Beira and outward rates on all goods, except for copper, were to be the normal non-through rates composed of three separate tariffs. The outward rates on copper were to be through rates, and not less than those from the Copperbelt to Beira or Lourenço Marques.

54. In 1960, the Government of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland partly abrogated the Tripartite agreement, and although it permitted the mining companies to export up to 36,000 short tons via the Benguela Railway, rates on the Rhodesian Railways were reduced by £4 per ton (from £18 to £14) with the result that shipments from the Copperbelt via Lobito dropped from 81,000 tons in 1959 to 63,000 tons in 1960 and to 20,000 tons in 1961 after which outward shipments practically ceased though inward traffic to the Copperbelt continued at some 12,000 tons annually.

(b) Pattern of transit traffic

55. As the foregoing paragraphs have shown, transit traffic on the Benguela Railway from the Congo and Rhodesian mines has not been allowed to develop freely, but it has been limited mainly by inter-line competition. Before 1960 the Benguela Railway appears to have carried all the manganese ore and about 20 per cent of the annual copper output of some 300,000 tons from the Katanga mines with the copper rates to Lobito and Matadi at an artificial parity. (In this period the Rhodesian Railways carried 30 per cent of the Katanga copper and charged low rates.) Between 1960 and 1963, owing to transportation difficulties in the Congo Republic, the Benguela Railway carried 65 per cent of the Katanga copper at more or less the same rates as those on the Rhodesian Railways which carried the remaining 35 per cent. The Benguela Railway's share of the traffic of the Copperbelt was substantially less. It carried none during the period 1938-57. From 1957 to 1960 it was authorized to carry up to 20 per cent, but in fact never exceeded 14 per cent of the total, and from 1961 until the end of 1965 it carried only a very small share. An important factor which contributed to the diversion of Copperbelt traffic away from the Benguela Railway was the higher rates fixed by the shipping conference for sea freight from Lobito to European ports compared with rates from Lourenço Marques, despite the fact that shipment by the latter route took 30 to 35 days longer.[¶]

56. Transit traffic carried during the period 1955-1959 fluctuated around an average of about 650,000 tons annually. Most of this consisted of mineral traffic from Katanga. In 1959, for instance, of the 622,662 tons carried, 449,249 tons were from Katanga, comprising 59,511 tons of copper, 34,426 tons of zinc, 12,507 tons of cobalt, 331,402 tons of manganese and other minerals, and 6,117 tons of cotton. Imports consisted of 33,916 tons of fuel, 13,562 tons of iron and steel, and 9,475 tons of heavy equipment.[¶]

57. Events since 1960 further illustrate the way in which the international role of the Benguela Railway is affected by the outside factors. From 1960-1962 when as a result of the disturbances in the Democratic Republic of the Congo a greater part of Katanga traffic was diverted to the Benguela Railway, the company's net revenue reached an all-time high (see para. 30 above). In 1963, following the reopening of the Congolese lines, transit traffic on the Benguela line dropped by 85,000 tons and with it the Company's revenue decreased by more than 15 per cent.

(c) Recent developments

58. As a result of the deterioration of Zambia's relations with Southern Rhodesia following the latter's unilateral declaration of independence, greater use has been made of the Benguela Railway by the mines on the Copperbelt. Early in 1966 these copper shipments were reported to be at the rate of 5,000 tons a month and were expected to rise to 10,000 tons a month by mid-year. The Company's receipts for the first quarter of 1966 showed a 40 per cent increase over 1965.

59. As already reported in paragraph 123 of chapter V, early in 1966 the Benguela Railway announced its decision to double the line's present 1.5 million tons capacity (in one direction) by constructing a new link between Lobito and Cubal at a cost of about £5 million including additional rolling stock. According to some reports the Company considers that its investment would be repaid during the remaining period of its contract only if the Benguela Railway were guaranteed 20 per cent of the Zambian copper traffic amounting to about 120,000 to 140,000 tons annually.

60. The new link is expected to take two years to complete. In the meantime, as Zambia wishes to divert its copper exports from the Rhodesian Railways, the entire rail capacity from the Copperbelt to various exit ports is being reviewed. In June the Government of the Democratic Republic of Congo announced its intention of re-routing all Katanga traffic to its own railways so as to free the Benguela Railway for Zambian copper shipments. It was hoped that, with additional rolling stock made available from the Congolese railways, the Benguela Railway could begin to carry 20,000 tons of copper a month increasing to 38,000 tons, which would have provided exit for over half a million tons of Zambian copper.

61. In July, the Government of the Congo announced, however, that Katanga traffic would continue to use the Benguela Railway, the reason being that the Congolese railways did not have sufficient rolling stock to handle the additional burden. Nevertheless, it is evident that at its present rate of operations the Benguela Railway has surplus capacity available for transit traffic. The extent to which this capacity will be used in the future will depend on the outcome of the negotiations among Governments and mining interests to find alternative routes for Zambian copper, as well as on the level of the agreed railway tariffs and any adjustments which may be made in the conference freight rates from Lobito to western European ports.

[¶] For copper, these rates to European ports were one third higher from Lobito as compared to those from Lourenço Marques.

[¶] Belgium, Ministère des affaires africaines, La situation économique du Congo belge et Ruanda Urundi, 1959.

[†] Rhokana Corporation, Roan Antelope Copper Mines, Ltd., Mufulira Copper Mines, Ltd., and N'Changa Copper Mines, Ltd.

[‡] Although the expansion of traffic in the post-war period and the resulting congestion of some of the southern African ports led to recommendations by the 1950 Johannesburg Transport Conference for rerouting of some traffic over the Benguela Railway, these recommendations were not adopted.

[¶] Tripartite Agreement between the Companhia do Caminho de Ferro do Benguela, the Compagnie du Chemin de Fer Bas-Congo au Katanga and the Rhodesian Railways relating to the passage of goods traffic between Lobito and the Rhodesian Railways, 1956.

II. MOZAMBIQUE: THE TRANS-ZAMBIAN RAILWAY

A. The railway systems of Mozambique

62. As stated elsewhere (see appendix I above), Mozambique derives substantial economic benefit from its geographical location vis-à-vis the landlocked regions of the interior. With a coastline of 2,795 kilometres and some of the finest natural harbours in southern Africa, it constitutes logically the only gateway to the sea for Southern Rhodesia and Malawi, and for Zambia, the Transvaal and Swaziland it provides the shortest of alternative routes. Because of this natural advantage, a large part of the capital invested in economic infrastructure has gone into railways and port installations. At present, Mozambique obtains about one fourth of its foreign exchange earnings from the transit trade of its neighbours, a vital factor for a Territory which is chronically deficit in its balance of visible trade.⁷ In addition, the autonomous Harbours, Railways and Transport Administration, with an annual budget of 1,009 million escudos in 1965 is a major employer and contributor of both ordinary and extraordinary public revenue. Apart from this, the port cities of Lourenço Marques and Beira owe much of their economic activity to the transit trade.

63. While much capital has gone into the development of rail and port facilities handling transit traffic, less has been done to develop internal communications, partly because early development was mainly near the coast and in view of the length and narrowness of much of the Territory, a good deal of the transportation needs were filled by coastal and river shipping. Though there are seven separate railway systems or lines, none is as yet inter-connected.

64. The two most important systems are those which radiate from the ports of Lourenço Marques and Beira and link up with the railways of South Africa, Southern Rhodesia and Malawi. The Lourenço Marques system, which handles the largest part of the transit trade, consists of two major international lines, the first running directly from Lourenço Marques to the Transvaal border at Ressano-Garcia, a distance of only about 91 kilometres, where it connects with the South African railway. This line was constructed by the Portuguese Government in the late 1890s at the instance of the Transvaal and, under the terms of the Mozambique Convention, is guaranteed 40 per cent of the sea-borne goods traffic to and from a specified area which includes the mining and industrial heart of the Transvaal.⁸ Another major international line branches off to the north-west through the Limpopo Valley, a distance of 530 kilometres, to Malvernia on the Southern Rhodesian border where it connects with the Rhodesian Railways. This line was constructed in 1955 to relieve congestion at Beira by providing an alternative route for the transit traffic of Southern Rhodesia and Zambia. The line is in fact an extension of an earlier branch line to Guijá in the Limpopo Valley which was built to facilitate the opening up of the rich agricultural land in the Valley for European farming. The Limpopo Valley is the site of the largest settlement scheme in Mozambique and produces food crops, cashew, cotton and rice (see A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex II, paras. 275-285). Apart from these two main lines, the Lourenço Marques system includes a branch line to Goba, on the Swaziland border, which connects with a recently constructed single track line in Swaziland and is used particularly for the outward transit of Swaziland iron ore, asbestos and sugar and for Swaziland imports, mainly consumer goods and petroleum products from Lourenço Marques. Finally, a branch line to Manhica and Magade serves the Incomati Valley which is an important banana and sugar producing area and was until 1955 intended to become the scene of a large-scale European settlement scheme (ibid., para. 267). The line serves the Incomati sugar company and will also serve the recently formed Marracuene sugar company which is currently developing 6,000 hectares for sugar production by European settlers (see appendix I above).

65. The second major railway system, radiating from Beira, originated with a trunk line to Southern Rhodesia completed in 1900 under an agreement between Portugal and the United Kingdom and originally constructed by British interests which owned and operated it until 1949. This line extends directly from the port of Beira to Umtali, on the Southern Rhodesian border, where it connects with the Rhodesian Railway. Until 1955 it constituted the only eastern gateway to Southern Rhodesia and, because of favourable tariff rates and shipping agreements, carried nearly all the mineral exports of Zambia (including about 700,000 tons of copper yearly) as well as part of the copper exported from south-east Katanga. With the construction of the Limpopo line, which reduced the haulage distance from the Zambian Copperbelt by about 16 kilometres, plus the congested conditions at the port of Beira, it was expected that much of the Zambian and Katanga trade would be diverted through Lourenço Marques. In fact, the advantages have been offset by higher charges at the latter port^{9a} and until very recently about 80 per cent of the copper exported yearly from the Copperbelt continued to pass through Beira. In late May 1966, however, following a dispute with the illegal régime in Southern Rhodesia concerning railway transit, the Zambian Government announced its intention of re-routing its mineral exports through Lobito in Angola to avoid payment to the illegal régime under an arrangement whereby it was hoped to divert Katanga traffic through Matadi. Difficulties have arisen in this connexion, however, and in July 1966 negotiations were taking place to agree upon an alternative route (see para. 61 above).

66. From Dondo, on the Beira-Umtali line, another railway line extends northwards crossing the Zambezi River at Sena and connecting with the Malawi railway. At present, this line provides the only rail access to the sea for Malawi's foreign trade. Between Dondo and Sena the line, built between 1919 and 1922, is owned and operated by the Trans-Zambezia Railway Company, with headquarters in London. From Sena a short stretch, entering Mozambique to a depth of about 38 kilometres, which is operated by a subsidiary of Malawi Railways, connects with the main Malawi line at Port Herald. North of Sena a branch, completed in 1949 and operated by the Mozambique Railway Administration, runs to Tete and is at present used mainly for hauling coal from the Moatize fields to Beira.

67. Although constructed originally to meet the transit needs of neighbouring territories, the Beira system also serves an important domestic hinterland, especially the Chimoio uplands centred on Vila Pery (on the Beira-Umtali line), which owes its development largely to the existence of the line. It is the centre of the tobacco industry, kenaf production (Companhia Têxtil do Púnguê), and cotton textile manufacture (Sociedade Algodoeira de Fomento Colonial), as well as the site of a major European settlement scheme in the Revué Valley (see A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex II, paras. 286-292). Maize is the leading crop of small and medium-sized European farms which occupy a total of 211,000 hectares in the Chimoio circunscrição, but sizable quantities of oilseeds, fruit, vegetables and sisal are also shipped. The Trans-Zambezia line on the other hand passes through sparsely inhabited country devoted mainly to forestry and timber concessions. The 100 kilometre Tete branch (originally built to transport coal from Moatize) was intended to open up the regions of Angónia, Macanga and Maravia for European farm settlement, but except for the Angónia plateau and the highlands near the border of Southern Rhodesia; the district of Tete still remains relatively undeveloped.

⁷ For 1965, Mozambique's trade balance showed a deficit of 1,242 million escudos. This was largely offset by surpluses of 1,125 million escudos in transport earnings derived essentially from transit receipts and of 917 million escudos in invisible transfers, mainly by enterprises involved in the transit trade.

⁸ Convention of 1928 as amended by Agreements of 17 November 1934 and 13 October 1964. Article XXXII provides that the Government of South Africa undertakes to secure to the port of Lourenço Marques not less than 40 per cent of the total tonnage of commercial sea-borne traffic imported into the "competitive area". This area is defined as the area bounded by lines drawn between the goods traffic depots serving Pretoria Springs, Vereeniging, Klerksdorp, Verveldiend, Krugersdorp and Pretoria.

^{9a} Port handling charges at Lourenço Marques are tied by the Mozambique Convention to port charges at South African terminals and are ad valorem rates whereas rates at Beira vary according to commodity and in some cases have been fixed by agreements.

68. The third major railway system consists of a line from the seaport of Nacala extending westward some 720 kilometres to Catur in the district of Niassa; it is currently being extended through Vila Cabral to the shores of Lake Nyassa and will provide an alternative route for Malawi's transit traffic, thereby reducing congestion at the port of Beira. This line, which was begun in 1924, is potentially one of the most important for Mozambique's domestic economy. It was built for the purpose of facilitating the evacuation of cotton, sisal, maize, tobacco and tea from the interior and to attract further European settlement, mining and ranching in the region around Lake Nyassa and up to Vila Cabral.

69. Besides the three main railway systems, there are three small railways for the evacuation of agricultural products. The largest of these extends inland from the seaport of Quelimane to Namacurra and Mocuba, a distance of some 145 kilometres, and serves to transport the cotton, sisal and other products of that region, as well as the tea from Milange, Tacuane and Gurue. The area between Namacurra and Mocuba contains about 28 per cent of the area under sisal plantations (about 15,800 hectares), while nearly all the European tea plantations (in 1962-1963 there were 17 companies with 15,227 hectares) are located in the vicinity of Gurue, Milange and Tacuane. In the south there are two isolated lines, the first from the seaport of Inhambane, extending southwards to Inharrime, a distance of 99 kilometres, and the second from Vila de João Belo, on the north bank of the Limpopo River, to Chicomo, a distance of 140 kilometres. These two lines, built originally to serve sisal estates and cotton concessions before the development of adequate road transportation, are nowadays more relics of the past than efficient units of a modern transportation network.

70. Except for two lines of the Beira system, all the railways were constructed by the Portuguese authorities and are owned and operated by the Mozambique Harbours, Railways and Transport Administration, an autonomous body. That part of the Beira system south of the Zambezi River, namely the Beira-Umtali line and the Trans-Zambezia railway, however, were built by British companies, sub-concessionnaires of the Moçambique Company which held the charter for all the territory between the Zambezi and Save Rivers, including the port of Beira.^{bb} In 1949, after the charter of the Moçambique Company had expired, the Portuguese Government purchased the Beira-Umtali line from the concessionaire, the Beira and Mashonaland Railway Company, for £4 million sterling. Although it is now operated by the Mozambique Railway Administration, ownership resides with the Ministry of Finance of Portugal, the Mozambique Government receiving only a share of profits. No steps were taken to purchase the Trans-Zambezia Railway, probably because it is not a very profitable line. Except for the brief stretch from Sena to the Malawi border, which is operated by a subsidiary of Malawi Railways, this is the only foreign-owned railway in Mozambique.^{cc}

71. It may be noted that of the seven railway systems only those carrying transit traffic for neighbouring States show a net profit. In the case of the Trans-Zambezia line this profit is almost entirely absorbed in the payment of interest and amortization of loan capital (see below). The most profitable systems are those of Lourenço Marques and Beira, which serve South Africa and Southern Rhodesia. These two systems subsidize the other state-owned railways which operate at a substantial loss.

MOZAMBIQUE RAILWAYS: RESULTS OF OPERATIONS, 1963

	Gross receipts (million escudos)	Working expenses (million escudos)	Coefficient of operations (2 as per- centage of 1)
	(1)	(2)	(3)
A. State-owned railways
Lourenço Marques	561.9	248.6	44.25
Beira ^a	375.5	196.2	52.32
Moçambique	39.3	61.1	155.63
Tete	21.7	30.8	141.77
Quelimane	14.0	26.9	191.96
Gaza	10.2	14.5	142.55
Inhambane	5.5	12.8	243.20
B. Privately owned railways
Trans-Zambezia	97.3	85.1	87.49

SOURCE: Mozambique, Administração dos Serviços dos Portos, Caminhos de Ferro e Transportes, Relatório, 1963.

^a Owned by Ministry of Finance, Portugal.

B. History of the Trans-Zambezia Railway

72. As explained above, the Trans-Zambezia Railway extends from Dondo, approximately 29 kilometres west of Beira, to Sena on the south bank of the Zambezi River, a distance of 289 kilometres. In the north it connects with the Central Africa Railway which operates a short stretch (69 kilometres) between Sena and Port Herald in Malawi where the line joins the Malawi Railway. In the south, at Dondo, the Trans-Zambezia Railway connects with the Beira Railway which links Beira with Umtali in Southern Rhodesia.

73. Intended primarily to evacuate traffic from Nyasaland, now Malawi, the concession for the railway was first granted by the Moçambique Company in 1898 to a Belgian, M. L. A. H. Porcheron, who immediately transferred his rights to the Compagnie du Chemin de Fer de Beira au Zambéze, a company formed for the purpose with British, French and Belgian capital, and registered in Brussels. However, although surveys were made in 1905 and 1906, the building of the railroad was delayed pending the construction of a connecting railroad in Nyasaland. The guarantee of transit traffic was considered essential since the area in Mozambique traversed by the proposed route, being then as now occupied primarily by forestry concessions, was not sufficiently developed to sustain a railroad.

74. By 1912 the Shire Highlands Railway (now Malawi Railways) had been built from Blantyre to Port Herald in Nyasaland and in that year contracts were concluded between the two Governments and the British Central Africa Co., Ltd., for the construction of an extension from Port Herald to Chindio on the north bank of the Zambezi River.^{dd} With this problem resolved, attention again turned to the building of the Trans-Zambezia line, and, on 11 October 1912, a new concession contract was signed between the Mozambique Company^{ee} and the existing concessionaire, which replaced the contract of 1898 and provided for the transfer of all rights to a new company of the same name to be formed with a capital of 21 million Belgian francs. The new company was to have the right to build and exploit the line for a period of 99 years and was to receive certain concessions of land and mineral rights (see following section).

^{dd} For the 38 kilometre stretch running through Mozambique, a concession was granted (Diário do Governo, 15 August 1912) valid for 99 years after which time the railroad and its equipment will revert without payment to the Portuguese Government. The concession also included the right to build and operate a bridge over the Zambezi River. The Central African Railway, which operates the line, is now a wholly owned subsidiary of Malawi Railways.

^{ee} The contract with certain modifications was approved by Decree 240, 26 November 1913.

^{bb} One of the provisions of the East African Convention of 1891 between Portugal and the United Kingdom was that Portugal should construct a railway linking Mashonaland, then controlled by the British South Africa Company, with the bay of Púnguê (where Beira is now located). The obligation to build the railway was passed on to the Moçambique Company when, in the following year, the latter received a charter from the Portuguese Government granting it concessionary rights in what is now the district of Manica e Sofala.

^{cc} The Sena Sugar Estates, Ltd., owns an 88 kilometre small gauge line from its factory at Marrromeu to the Trans-Zambezia Railway at Caia. This is solely for the company's own use and is not a commercial railroad in the proper sense of the term.

75. By 1913 a syndicate had been formed consisting of two Belgian financiers, M. C. Morresseaux and General Thuys, who together subscribed 14 million francs, the remainder being subscribed by the Banque d'Outremer, the Crédit Liégeois and a British group linked with the Beira railways. The outbreak of World War I prevented any work from beginning, however, and General Thuys having died in 1915, the control of the company passed into British hands.

76. After the First World War, pressure to build the railway was revived. By then the funds available to the company were no longer sufficient to finance the capital cost and, the Moçambique Company having refused to participate beyond guaranteeing a 3 per cent dividend in case the company's profits were insufficient, as well as the financing of repairs once the railway was built, the company had to seek other assistance in raising the necessary initial capital. Accordingly, in 1919, the Belgian minority shareholders transferred their rights with permission of the Portuguese authorities (Order 2,039, 4 November 1919) to the Nyasaland Government in return for the latter's guarantee of interest payments and amortization of a bond issue of £1.2 million to finance the construction of the railway. One month later, the Trans-Zambezia Railway Company was formed. Work began on the railroad the following year and was completed in 1922.

77. By 1922 the Trans-Zambezia Railroad had established its northern terminal at Sena, on the southern bank of the Zambezi River, and traffic was transported across by boat to join the Central African Railroad at Chindio on the northern bank. The company had in the preceding year entered into a further agreement with the Nyasaland Government to guarantee a fresh issue of bonds for the purchase of a river fleet, in return for which the Nyasaland Government, Central Africa Railways and Shire Highland Railways obtained the right to nominate half the directors on the Board of the Trans-Zambezia Company.

78. Additional Nyasaland Government support was required for the construction of the Zambezi Bridge and for the southern abutment. Built between 1930 and 1935, the bridge is 4.5 kilometres long and crosses the Zambezi between Sena and Chindio. Since none of the three railway companies was able to finance the construction, the Shire Highlands Railway went into voluntary liquidation, its stock, as well as a controlling share of the Central Africa Railway Company stock, being taken over by the newly formed Nyasaland Railways. Work on the bridge was undertaken in the name of the Central African Railway supported by Nyasaland Railways which received a £3 million loan from the Nyasaland Government in return for a controlling interest. For the construction of the southern abutment, the Trans-Zambezia Company received an advance of £399,000 (31.9 million escudos) in exchange for income bonds secured on the earnings of the railway approach.

79. Present ownership and finances of the company are discussed in greater detail below. It is sufficient to note that until 1964, 25 per cent of the issued shares and nearly all the loan capital were held successively by the Nyasaland Government and the High Commissioner of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. Following the dissolution of the Federation, these were transferred to Four Milbank Nominees, Ltd., a British holding company.

C. Terms of the concession

80. The original concession of 17 May 1897, together with the contract of 11 October 1912 as amended by an agreement of 7 November 1913 and approved by Decree 240 (Diário do Governo, 26 November 1913), constitute the legal basis for the Trans-Zambezia Railway Company's operations. The concession and contract, which name the company's predecessors, were amended to apply to the latter when the new company was formed in 1918 (Agreement dated 10-26 April 1918). The contract was further amended by Order 2,039 of 4 November 1919 which incorporated modifications necessitated by the conditional contract of 6 August 1919 between the Nyasaland Government and the promoters of the Railway (see para. 76 above).

81. The concession and contract, as well as the subsequent agreements, were all signed by the Moçambique Company by virtue of the exclusive rights granted to it under its Royal Charter. On the expiration of the Charter in July 1942, the Portuguese Government succeeded the Moçambique Company as grantor.

82. Under the terms of the contract of 1912, the concession is for a period of ninety-nine years (ending in the year 2018 A.D.) after which time the railroad and all fixed and movable equipment will revert to the grantor without payment. Moreover, at any time after the first twenty years from the date of the contract, the grantor may terminate the concession by redeeming the railroad and its equipment for a price calculated on the basis of the liquid profits of the company over the previous seven years. In the event of services being wholly or partially interrupted, the grantor may take over the operation of the railroad and if, after three months have elapsed, the company is still unable to resume its responsibilities, may terminate the concession.

83. The contract granted to the Trans-Zambezia Railway Company the right to construct and operate the existing line and all necessary installations, together with the use of strips of land fifty metres wide on either side of the line. It also granted the right of first refusal for the construction of a branch line to Tete, a right which the company did not exercise, the Tete line being eventually built by the Government. The contract contained a guarantee that during the term of the concession no other railroad would be constructed within 100 km of the Trans-Zambezia line.

84. In addition, the contract granted to the company the use of blocks of land of 2,500 hectares each to be located alternately on either side of the railroad at intervals of twenty kilometres. The company was given the right to establish plantations, industrial enterprises or lumber companies and to prospect for minerals thereon. In the event that minerals were discovered, the company could retain mining rights over 10 per cent of the surface, ceding the remaining 90 per cent to the grantor. In fact, apart from cutting timber for its own use, the company does not appear to have taken advantage of these privileges.

85. Both the original concession and the contract of 1912 forbade the establishment of differential freight rates. The contract contained a schedule of the rates to be charged and required the company to obtain the approval of the grantor for any modifications thereof.

86. The financial provisions of the contract provided that the grantor should receive 30 per cent of the annual liquid profits¹² and should have the right to nominate its own representatives on the Board of Directors (see below). The grantor undertook to guarantee payment of a 3 per cent dividend on the company's shares and also the amortization of bonds issued to finance repairs on the railroad required by force majeure. Financing of the actual construction of the railway was to be the sole responsibility of the company.

87. The Trans-Zambezia Company's concession extends only to the Zambezi River and does not include either the bridge completed in 1935 or the thirty-eight kilometre stretch from the Zambezi to the Nyasaland frontier, which lay outside the territory of the Moçambique Company. The concession of 15 August 1912 granted to the Central Africa Railway Company in respect of this stretch is similar to that of the Trans-Zambezia Company except that: (a) the railroad and bridge will revert to the Portuguese Government in the year 2011 A.D.; (b) it includes no land or mining rights except in respect of the line and a strip of fifty metres on each side of the line; and (c) rates charged within Mozambique territory may not exceed similar rates charged in Nyasaland (now Malawi).

D. Organization and finances of the Company

88. The Trans-Zambezia Railway Company is a British company with headquarters in London and operating under

¹² Liquid profits are net profits, i.e., after deduction of working expenses, general expenses (encargos sociais), taxes and amortization of bonds.

Portuguese law. The issued share capital is £600,000 in 600,000 shares of £1 each, fully paid. Shareholders are the Government of Portugal, 200,000 shares; Apcob Nominees, Ltd. (London), representing the founders of the company, 200,000 shares; Four Milbank Nominees, Ltd. (London), 150,000 shares; and the Companhia de Moçambique, 100 shares. Prior to 1964, the shares now owned by Four Milbank, Ltd. which, like Apcob, Ltd. is a holding company, were held successively by the Nyasaland Government and the High Commissioner of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. They were transferred to British ownership following the dissolution of the Federation.

89. Under the terms of the company's Statutes of 3 March 1921, as later amended, out of ten directors four are nominated by the Portuguese, three by Malawi and one by Malawi Railways. In 1965, the Board of Directors consisted of V. L. Oury (Chairman), A. H. Ball, J. F. Harrod, I. R. Hayward, J. R. Pike, P. A. Clarke Vincent, and the following Portuguese members: J. B. Correa da Silva, M. da Cruz Alvura, A. R. Portier and J. B. Schiappa de Azevedo. The company has a working agreement with Malawi Railways and its subsidiary, Central Africa Railways, and until 1964 the three companies had a common management.

90. The construction costs of the railroad were largely financed by bonds guaranteed by the Nyasaland authorities and a loan from the Nyasaland Railways. In 1965, the outstanding loan capital consisted of £2.8 million in debenture stock and income bonds, all held by Four Milbank Nominees, Ltd. Fixed assets, at cost, amounted to slightly more than £5 million, of which the railroad and related installations accounted for approximately £3 million, the southern approach to the Zambezi bridge for £401,600 and rolling stock for £1.6 million. In 1964, the company began a programme of reorganization, including the progressive transfer from steam to diesel locomotives. The first step in this direction consisted in the purchase in 1964 of three diesel electric locomotives at a cost of £34,913.

91. The company's results for the years 1962 to 1964 were as follows:

	1962	1963	1964
	£	£	£
Gross receipts	1,358,523	1,216,394	1,237,113
Working expenses	1,061,464	1,064,189	1,010,422
Net revenue	297,059	152,205	226,691
Other costs ^a	46,681	58,860	53,648
Mozambique income tax and defence taxes	119,437	53,802	77,423
Interest on bonds and debentures	65,463	61,180	62,034
Surplus to reserve	79,851	—	43,946

^a Includes interest on the hire purchase of rolling stock and on a temporary advance of £285,476 from the Government of Malawi.

92. As can be seen from the above, the railroad has not been a highly profitable enterprise, its net receipts being barely sufficient in most years to cover the interest payments on its capital loans. In 1963 it suspended payment of interest on part of its income bonds and in 1964 its accrued disposable surplus was only £90,480. This is partly due to lack of agricultural or other development in the region which it traverses, and partly to the high ratio of working expenses to gross receipts (81.68 per cent in 1964) and to a tariff structure which was reported in 1963 to be among the highest in southern Africa and which encouraged competition from road haulers. In 1965 the company negotiated a revision of its earlier working agreement with Malawi and Central Africa Railways, providing for a change in the pattern of rates and fares to improve its competitive position.

E. Operations of the Railway and its economic role

93. The domestic hinterland served by the Trans-Zambezia Railway, consisting of the region between Dondo and Sena, and the area served by the branch line to Tete is sparsely populated and comparatively under-developed. Apart from the Moatize coal-field near Tete, the principle economic activities are those of the Sena Sugar Estates (which, however, exports much of its produce by river to the port of Chinde), lumber mills, cotton production and on the Angónia plateau, a nucleus of European farmers and ranchers. The railway therefore depends heavily on transit of goods and passengers to and from Malawi. Plans for large-scale development of the mineral and agricultural potential of the Zambezi Valley, which have been under study since the early 1950s may eventually reduce this dependence (see A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex II, paras. 293-295).

94. High operating costs as well as the burden of interest payments and amortization of loan capital, especially for the Zambezi bridge, make it necessary for the three companies operating the line to charge rates which are reported to be the highest in southern Africa. Consequently, freight is mainly restricted to low-bulk, high-value goods. Traffic to Beira is composed primarily of coal from Moatize, and agricultural exports, mainly sugar, groundnuts, tobacco, tea and timber: in addition, since 1954, limestone has been carried from Malawi to the cement factory at Dondo. Inward traffic consists mainly of imports of general merchandise, neither Malawi nor the interior of Manica e Sofala being sufficiently developed to import sizable quantities of heavy equipment or construction materials. The total tonnage of goods carried yearly increased from slightly under 100,000 tons before the Second World War to an average of 750,000 tons during the 1950s, reaching a peak of 873,483 tons in 1962, the down traffic being approximately double the volume of inward traffic. In 1964, the latest year for which such information is available, it amounted to 801,906 tons, the chief export items being tobacco (15,372 tons), tea (14,272 tons), groundnuts (22,751 tons) and maize (20,508 tons) from Malawi, and timber products (84,649 tons), sugar (17,304 tons), cotton lint (7,493 tons) and unginned cotton (7,112 tons) from Mozambique. Major imports consisted of general merchandise (100,530 tons), petrol and paraffin (32,977 tons), cement (3,775 tons), and fertilizer (18,090 tons). The railway also carried 53,584 tons of limestone and 120,936 tons of coal and ooze from Moatize.^{ss}

95. As explained previously, the branch line to Tete was built in 1949 primarily for the purpose of enabling the newly formed Companhia Carbonífera de Moçambique to undertake large-scale exploitation of the rich coal deposits at Moatize. In fact, as with low-value agricultural products, the high cost of transportation has hampered both the export of coal and its sale to the Lourenço Marques area where it is unable to compete with cheaper coal from the Transvaal. Until the recent introduction of diesel locomotives, the coal was used mainly as fuel for the Beira and Trans-Zambezia railways, the provision of free fuel to the Beira line being a condition of the mining concession (see A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex I, paras. 261 and 262).

96. The high level of fares, together with competition from cheap air transport has also diverted much of the potential passenger traffic away from the railroad. As a result, the number of passengers carried dropped from 190,300 in 1954 to 153,614 two years later and by 1964 only slightly exceeded the level attained ten years earlier.

97. Information concerning labour conditions on the railway is lacking. It may be noted, however, that the company operates both an apprenticeship programme and a three-year training scheme for the promotion of Africans to responsible positions as engineers, mechanics and assistant station-masters.

^{ss} As a result of Zambia's decision to divert its traffic from the Rhodesian Railways, a part of Zambia's imports and exports is now carried by the Trans-Zambezia Railway. Statistics are not yet available, however.

ANNEX I

ANGOLA: RAILWAY FACILITIES

Kilometres

A. State-owned railways

Luanda Railway:

Luanda to Malanje 516

615

	Kilometres
Dondo link (Zenza do Itombe to Dondo)	55
Golungo-Alto link (Canhoca to Golungo-Alto)	33
Congo District line, under construction
Port and station	11
Moçâmedes Railway:	924
Moçâmedes to Sá da Bandeira ..	276
Sá da Bandeira-Vila Serpa Pinto	518
Chibia link (Sá da Bandeira to Chiange)	130
TOTAL, State owned	1,539
B. Privately owned railways	1,588
Benguela Railway
Lobito to the Eastern frontier ..	1,348
Spurs, sidings and yards	182
Amboim Railway:	129
Amboim to Gabela	129
TOTAL, privately owned	1,717
GRAND TOTAL	3,256

SOURCE: Angola, Anuário Estatístico, 1963, p. 233.

ANNEX II

MOZAMBIQUE: RAILWAY FACILITIES

(Excluding small gauge)

Kilometres

A. State-owned railways	1,119
Lourenço Marques Railway:
Lourenço Marques to Ressano Garcia	98
Lourenço Marques to Goba	58
Moamba to Malvéria	527
Lourenço Marques to Xinavane ..	94
Branch lines	27
Spurs, sidings and service roads ..	315
Beira Railway:	497
Beira to Machipanda	318
Spurs, sidings and service roads	179
Tete Railway:	281
Dona Ana to Moatize	255
Spurs, sidings and service roads	26
Quelimane Railway:	159
Quelimane to Mocuba	145
Spurs, sidings and service roads	14
Moçambique Railway:	734
Nacala to Nova Freixo	646
Monapo to Lumbo branch	43
Spurs, siding and service roads	45
Inhambane Railway:	108
Inhambane to Inharrime	92
Branch roads	7
Spurs, sidings and service roads	9
TOTAL, State owned	2,898
B. Privately owned railways	360
Trans-Zambezia Railway:
Dondo to Sena	333
Spurs, sidings and service roads	27

ANNEX II (continued)

	Kilometres
Central Africa Railway:	43
Sena to frontier of Malawi	43
TOTAL, privately owned	403
GRAND TOTAL	3,301

SOURCE: Mozambique, Anuário Estatístico, 1963, p. 509.

Appendix V

Mozambique's economic relations with South Africa and Southern Rhodesia

Working paper prepared by the Secretariat

CONTENTS

	Paragraphs
INTRODUCTION	1-2
I. MOZAMBIQUE'S ECONOMIC RELATIONS WITH SOUTH AFRICA
A. General	3-6
B. The Mozambique Convention	7-13
C. Supply of labour to South Africa	14-22
D. Trade relations with South Africa	23-33
E. South African investment in Mozambique	34-41
II. MOZAMBIQUE'S ECONOMIC RELATIONS WITH SOUTHERN RHODESIA
A. General	42-52
B. Trade relations with Southern Rhodesia ..	53-70
C. Migrant labour	71-79

Tables

	Page
1. Mozambique: special trade with neighbouring countries (by value and percentage)	454
2. Mozambique: value of special trade with South Africa by principal commodities	455
3. Mozambique: value of special trade with Southern Rhodesia by principal commodities	455
4. Transit trade of South Africa through Mozambique by principal commodities	456
5. Transit trade of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland through Mozambique by principal commodities	456

INTRODUCTION

1. Recent political developments in southern Africa have focused attention on the relationships between South Africa, Southern Rhodesia and Portugal. In 1964, the Prime Minister of South Africa, Mr. Verwoerd, was reported to have called for positive co-operation between South Africa and its neighbours to the north and to have suggested a plan for economic aid and possibly the eventual creation of a free trade area. This suggestion, which was followed by reports of an alliance between South Africa, Portugal and Southern Rhodesia, has been reiterated on a number of occasions by politicians and in newspaper articles, especially in Southern Rhodesia and South Africa.

2. The present paper seeks to document the nature and evolution of the economic relationships between Mozambique and its neighbours. The paper shows the importance of the transit trade on which Mozambique depends for nearly one fourth of its foreign exchange receipts. It also shows other forms of economic co-operation, in particular the recent growth of South African investment in Mozambique.

I. MOZAMBIQUE'S ECONOMIC RELATIONS WITH SOUTH AFRICA

A. General

3. Mozambique's economic relationship with the Republic of South Africa hinges on its proximity to the Transvaal which is the most important industrial region of the Republic. The area of Witwatersrand, together with that of Pretoria and the southern Transvaal, is the Republic's main producer of base minerals, gold and coal, and accounts for about half the industrial output of South Africa. It contains about 40 per cent of the European population of the Republic and about 45 per cent of workers engaged in industry. The Transvaal is also an important producer of maize, wheat, tobacco and citrus, and there is extensive ranching near the Southern Rhodesian border.

4. For this highly productive region, the adjacent area of Mozambique, far less developed economically, serves both as a reservoir of unskilled labour (see section C) and as a natural gateway to the sea. Lourenço Marques, which is acknowledged to possess the finest natural harbour on the east coast of Africa, is 100 miles closer to Johannesburg than the nearest major South African port,^a is connected directly by rail, and the longer sea route to European ports is partly offset by lower shipping rates set by international shipping conference agreements. Under the terms of the Mozambique Convention (described below), the port of Lourenço Marques is guaranteed not less than 40 per cent of the commercial sea-borne goods traffic imported into a specified area of the Transvaal, known as the "competitive area", which includes the industrial heartland of the region. As a result, Lourenço Marques ranks high among the major ports serving the Republic. It currently handles about 12 per cent by volume of total tonnage handled at ports serving South Africa.

5. In terms of direct trade, South Africa ranks second after metropolitan Portugal among Mozambique's trading partners. The volume is however comparatively small, amounting in 1964 to only 11.42 per cent by value of the Territory's total external trade, the balance being markedly in favour of South Africa (see table 1). This is partly due to protective policies traditionally pursued by both Governments; Portugal, for example, imposed quantitative controls, tariffs and other devices to give preference in Mozambique to trade with the metropolitan country and other territories within the escudo zone. It is also indicative of the much higher level of industrialization and diversification of South Africa's economy which is largely self-sufficient in most of the agricultural products which Mozambique exports.

6. In October 1964, the two Governments signed agreements^b ending the Mozambique Convention and providing for closer economic co-operation between them, particularly in regard to planning and investment. These agreements resulted, inter alia, in steps being taken in both countries to stimulate the investment of South African capital in Mozambique, the results of which are already apparent in a number of large undertakings described in section E below. At the same time, Portugal has invested heavily in the new SONAREP petroleum refinery at Lourenço Marques, part of the produce of which is intended for sale in South Africa. Apart from these developments, there was up to the end of 1965 little change in the volume of trade between the two countries as reported in official statistics; this trade has been increasing steadily over the past five years.

B. The Mozambique Convention

7. Mozambique's economic relations with South Africa are based mainly on the provisions of the Mozambique Convention of 1928 which was revised and extended in 1934, 1936, 1939, 1940, 1952 and 1964. The Convention is in three parts dealing respectively with the recruitment of labour for the mines in the Transvaal, transit traffic, and trade between the two countries. The 1928 Convention was preceded by agreements dating back to 1875, the most important being a convention of 1 April 1909 between Portugal and the Transvaal Republic, which was the precursor of the Mozambique Convention.

^a Distances by rail of the major ports from Johannesburg are as follows: Lourenço Marques, 395 miles; Durban, 494 miles; Port Elizabeth, 714 miles; and Cape Town, 956 miles.

^b Agreements of 13 October 1964 between the Government of the Republic of South Africa and the Government of Portugal. Republic of South Africa Treaty Series, Nos. 8, 10 and 11. 1964.

8. The earliest agreements between the Transvaal and Portugal concerned trade and the construction of the railway to Lourenço Marques (then Delagoa Bay), the purpose of the Transvaal government being to avoid dependence on the British colonies to the south. It was not until after the discovery of gold on the Witwatersrand in 1886 that the need for imported African labour arose. Thereafter, as demand for workers increased, the supply of labour from what is now Mozambique became a bargaining point used by Portugal to obtain concessions for its railway line in the face of intense competition from the railways of the Cape and Natal. Between 1903 and 1910, which was a period of reconstruction following the Boer War, up to nearly 89 per cent of African workers employed by the mines came from Portuguese East Africa. It was because the mines depended on Mozambique for cheap labour that Portugal was able to negotiate the convention of 1909 with the Transvaal, the terms of which were so favourable to Portugal that their revelation nearly disrupted the Convention of South African States then meeting to found the Union. Under the convention, Portugal, in return for permitting the recruitment of Africans in Mozambique, obtained a ten-year guarantee that 50 per cent of the Transvaal's overseas trade would pass through Lourenço Marques, plus an undertaking establishing unrestricted freedom of trade between the two partners. Until this agreement was denounced by South Africa in 1922, approximately 29 per cent by value of Mozambique's exports went to the Transvaal free of duty.

9. Among the considerations which probably influenced South Africa to terminate the agreement was the lessening dependence of the Transvaal mines on Mozambique labour as recruits became available from other sources. By 1922 Mozambicans accounted for only 40 per cent of the labour force employed by the mines and by 1958 the figure had dropped to about 26 per cent.

10. The termination of the agreement became effective in 1923, and thereafter ensued several years of intensive negotiations between the two Governments culminating in 1927 when Portugal brought the matter to a head by severely restricting the emigration of Mozambique labourers to the mines (Decree 13,657, 21 May 1927). A year later, on 11 September 1928, the Mozambique Convention was signed. Although less favourable to Portugal than the 1909 agreement as regards trade between Mozambique and South Africa, it none the less included a "most-favoured-nation" clause and reciprocal concessions in respect of a list of commodities, which was more advantageous to Mozambique exporters than the terms which South Africa had previously offered.

11. The 1928 Convention established the framework for the future economic relations between the two countries. Part I of the Convention fixed the maximum number of Africans from Mozambique to be employed in the Transvaal mines, stipulated working conditions and provided that recruitment, allotments and repatriation should be entrusted to an organization approved by both Governments. Part II dealt with railway traffic and rates, guaranteeing the passage through Lourenço Marques of a fixed percentage of commercial sea-borne goods imported into a defined area of the Transvaal. Part III dealt with customs and commercial intercourse.

12. Subsequent agreements, for the most part, merely modified the details of this Convention. Thus the maximum number of workers who could be recruited, which was fixed at 80,000 in 1928, was raised to 100,000 in 1940 when the South African Government agreed to export 340,000 cases of citrus fruits each year through Lourenço Marques. Likewise the guaranteed percentage of sea-borne imports into the "competitive area" of the Transvaal (see para. 23) which must pass through Lourenço Marques varied from 50 per cent in 1928 to its current level of 40 per cent.

13. Details of the Convention and related agreements are given in the following sections.

C. Supply of labour to South Africa

14. The recruitment of Mozambique workers for the gold and coal mines of the Transvaal began as long ago as 1896 under the auspices of the Transvaal Chamber of Mines. Regulations to control the migration of workers were first enacted in Mozambique in 1897 and were followed by further legislation and agreements leading to the Convention of 1 April 1909 referred to above. In 1913 (Order 757, 27 May), recruitment was restricted to the area south of latitude 22° South, namely the area south of the Save River. From 1928 until 1965, when it was replaced by a new agreement (see below), recruitment was regulated by part I of the Mozambique Convention, the provisions of which remained basically unchanged throughout. Since 1903, all recruitment of mine workers from Mozambique has been the monopoly of the Witwatersrand Native Labour Association (WNLA), a co-operative association of the Transvaal mines which was established in 1901 to eliminate competition for labour among the several mines. The Association describes itself as a non-profit organization which, besides recruiting workers, arranges contracts, provides medical examinations and transportation, and handles wages and deferred pay.

15. The Convention of 1928 provided, in effect, that Africans could legally go from Mozambique to work in South Africa only for the purpose of working in the Transvaal mines and only if recruited on contract by WNLA under prescribed conditions.^c The Convention, in its original form, limited the number who could be so employed to 80,000,^d a figure which was raised to 90,000 in 1936 and to 100,000 in 1940 (see para. 12). Contracts were for an initial period of twelve months, with possible re-engagement for a further six months, after which the worker had to be returned to Mozambique for not less than six months before he could be re-engaged. Mozambique Africans working in South Africa otherwise than under WNLA contracts, as well as those who overstayed the period of their engagement, were to be returned to Mozambique as prohibited immigrants. Only in very special cases were African women to be given passports to visit South Africa and those found there without valid passports were to be immediately repatriated.

16. Recruitment in Mozambique was undertaken by salaried representatives of WNLA who were licensed by the Mozambique authorities. The recruits were medically examined and provided with free transportation to their place of employment. On completion of their contract, the recruiting organization repatriated them to the Mozambique frontier, the return fare having been deducted in advance from their wages. The recruiting organization could allot them to any mine for which it was recruiting, except that the Government of Mozambique could, under certain circumstances, prohibit recruitment for a mine which failed to comply with the requirements of the Convention. There being no provision to the contrary, contract workers were subject to the laws of South Africa which include penal sanctions for breach of contract.

17. The Convention also provided for the office of Curator of Portuguese Natives in Johannesburg, staffed by Mozambique officials (later, representatives of the Mozambique Institute of Labour) whose task was, inter alia, to register the contract workers, issue passports, inspect conditions in the mines and cantonments, look after the interests and welfare of the workers and generally perform the functions of a consular official in regard to them. The employers were required to pay registration and monthly fees to the Curator in respect of each contract worker. Fees for passports, also payable to the Curator, were deducted from wages.

^c Under certain circumstances, the Government of Mozambique could authorize the emigration of Africans to work in the mines without the intervention of WNLA.

^d In 1928, the number working in the mines was 106,000. The Convention provided for a progressive reduction to 80,000 over a period of five years. The agreement of 1934, while retaining the maximum of 80,000 also guaranteed a minimum of 65,000 workers.

18. A feature of the 1928 Convention was the provision that after the first nine months of the contract, half of the workers' wages were withheld to be paid to them upon their return to Mozambique. This money was paid to the Mozambique authorities (initially in gold and later in South African currency) through the Curator, and together with voluntary remittances, fees and other payments made a significant contribution to Mozambique's foreign exchange earnings.

19. The agreement of 13 October 1964, which replaced part I of the Convention with effect from 1 January 1965, extended the area for which recruitment was to be undertaken to include gold and coal mines in the Orange Free State as well as the Transvaal, and provided that the number of workers from Mozambique to be employed in the mines should be mutually agreed upon between the two Governments. The office of Curator was replaced by both the Consul-General of Portugal and the delegate of the Mozambique Institute of Labour in Johannesburg, assisted by Portuguese personnel stationed in all areas where there are Mozambique workers. In addition to the functions previously performed by the Curator, the delegate is required to act as adviser to the workers in civil cases if they so request. The new agreement contains more detailed provisions in regard to recruitment and conditions of service. In particular, the contracts, which must be written in the vernacular as well as Portuguese, must clearly indicate the place of employment, nature of work, minimum guaranteed salary and other conditions, and must be attested by an agent of the Institute of Labour at the recruitment centre. The agreement further specified that, notwithstanding the provisions of their contracts, the recruits shall not be treated less favourably than South African workers.

20. The provisions of the Mozambique Convention concerning the supply of workers to the South African mines have been widely criticized both as a barter of African workers in return for economic concessions and as a form of compulsory labour. These complaints were examined both by the United Nations Ad Hoc Committee on Forced Labour in 1953^e and by an investigatory commission of the ILO in 1961-1962,^f and reference is made to the reports of these bodies.

21. In 1963, the latest year for which such information is available, there were reported to be 151,933 migrant workers from Mozambique registered with the Curator in Johannesburg, of which 80,469 were employed in the gold and coal mines of Witwatersrand. The difference between these figures is accounted for by the fact that despite the provisions of the Convention a large number of Africans from Mozambique entered South Africa clandestinely in search of employment. Although sporadic efforts were made after 1928 to repatriate them as prohibited immigrants, it was later decided to permit them to work on contract in the mines and in rural areas provided that they register with the Curator and fulfil the other conditions. The following table shows the number of migrant workers registered on 31 December of the respective years:

MOZAMBIQUE WORKERS REGISTERED WITH THE CURATOR IN THE TRANSVAAL

Year	Total number registered	New WNLA recruits	Re-engaged	Clandestine ^a
1963	151,933	74,011	17,285	95,207
1962	166,144	83,867	17,632	64,645
1961	178,539	96,074	19,743	62,722
1960	173,976	89,243	21,298	63,435
1959	175,064	93,451	26,484	66,967

SOURCE: Mozambique, Anuário Estatístico, 1959-1963.

^a Includes only clandestine migrants known to the authorities. About half are employed under contract outside the mines.

^e E/2815/Add.5.

^f International Labour Office, Report of the Commission appointed under Article 26 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation to examine the complaint filed by the Government of Ghana concerning the observance by the Government of Portugal of the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), Geneva, 1962.

22. In respect of these migrant contract workers, the Mozambique treasury receives annual payments in the form of passport fees, registration fees, emigration and other taxes. In addition, it earns foreign exchange from voluntary remittances by migrants and from the compulsory deferment of pay. The following table shows the amounts of taxes, fees and other official receipts, transfers of wages and pay received by workers in South Africa:

PAYMENTS IN RESPECT OF MIGRANT WORKERS REGISTERED IN THE TRANSVAAL

(Million escudos)

Year	Taxes, fees, etc.	Wages			Paid in South Africa
		Total	Deferred	Remittances
1963 ..	34.6	130.6	108.4	3.3	18.9
1962 ..	57.6	137.1	107.1	3.1	26.9
1961 ..	56.7	130.4	101.3	3.2	25.9
1960 ..	58.6	143.5	114.9	5.7	22.9
1959 ..	57.2	114.3	105.7	1.6	12.0

SOURCE: Mozambique, Anuário Estatístico, 1959-1963.

D. Trade relations with South Africa

Transit trade

23. It is part II of the Mozambique Convention from which Mozambique derives most economic advantage. Though Lourenço Marques is the most natural outlet to the sea for the Transvaal, it faces competition from the ports and railways of South Africa. Under part II of the Convention, however, Lourenço Marques is guaranteed a percentage of the total tonnage of commercial seaborne imports into what is referred to as the "competitive area",^{*} namely the industrial heart of the Transvaal. In 1928 the guaranteed percentage was between 50 and 55 per cent, but it was subsequently reduced to 47.5 per cent in 1934 and 40 per cent in 1964. In the event that the actual percentage imported via Lourenço Marques and the Lourenço Marques Railway should fall below this guaranteed minimum, the South African Government undertook to compensate the loss of railway revenue according to an agreed formula. This has happened in only three years since 1928.

24. As a corollary to this agreement, the Convention provides (a) that Mozambique may not tax goods in transit at rates higher than the duties which would be paid in South Africa; and (b) that port and harbour dues and charges must be levied in the same form and, unless otherwise agreed, must not exceed similar charges at South African ports. Finally, rail freight rates between Lourenço Marques and the "competitive area" are slightly lower than for other ports (e.g., Durban) and are calculated on a throughout basis, the receipts being divided between the two railways in an agreed proportion. A working agreement between the two railway administrations provides for joint use of rolling stock and personnel.

25. Transit traffic (imports) to the "competitive area" averaged a little more than 383,000 tons during the years 1932-1945 and 654,000 tons from 1946 to 1963, representing an average of 52.3 per cent of total seaborne imports to the area over the whole period. It may be noted, however, that the guarantee relates to tonnage and not to value. In fact, a large proportion of the imports consists of low-value goods, for which the disadvantages of a long sea-haul are offset by the lower cost of railage. Since 1934, the proportion of high-value imports has progressively decreased and in 1963 only 2.4 per cent of goods in class 1 of the tariff (i.e., those paying the highest freight rate) imported to the "competitive area" passed through Lourenço Marques.

* The "competitive area" is defined as the area bounded by a line drawn between Pretoria Springs, Vereeniging, Klerksdorp, Verveldiend, Krugersdorp and Pretoria.

26. The following table shows the tonnage of commercial seaborne imports to the "competitive area" by main ports of entry:

Port of entry	1963 (tons)	1962 (tons)	1961 (tons)
Lourenço Marques	596,139	579,132	627,438
Durban	502,032	461,256	487,922
East London	60,210	60,024	65,293
Port Elizabeth	70,116	70,116	68,490
Cape Town	7,574	5,484	5,732
TOTAL	1,236,071	1,176,012	1,254,875

Percentage through Lourenço Marques..	43.19	51.08	51.08
--	-------	-------	-------

SOURCE: Mozambique, Direcção dos Serviços dos Portos, Caminhos de Ferro e Transportes, Relatório, 1963, p. 40.

27. In recent years, imports under the Mozambique Convention have constituted only a minor part of the total transit traffic of South Africa which passes through Lourenço Marques. In 1963, for instance, it amounted to only about two thirds of the inward traffic and one sixth of the total transit in both directions.

28. The total transit trade of South Africa passing through Lourenço Marques increased from 2.8 million tons in 1955 (including direct and indirect transit) to 3.7 million tons in 1963. Nearly three fourths of this (2.7 million tons) consisted of exports, the principal commodities being base minerals, coal, maize, sugar, fresh fruit (mainly citrus), semi-processed metal products and chemical products. Exports of base minerals totalled 1,225,415 tons in 1963,^h or nearly half the tonnage exported and consisted mainly of the following: chrome (756,648 tons); manganese (109,945 tons); vermiculite (84,745 tons); iron ore (73,402 tons); and asbestos (61,347 tons). Exports of coal totalled 320,248 tons, maize 219,791 tons,ⁱ sugar 35,000 tons and fruit 30,209 tons, the last-named destined mainly to Rotterdam and Trieste.

29. Imports of South Africa via Lourenço Marques railway totalled 998,539 tons in 1963, consisting predominantly of gasoline and other petroleum products and railway materials. Data on transit traffic by commodities are given in table 4.

30. Separate data for earnings derived by the Railways and Ports Administration from this transit traffic are not available. It may be noted, however, that the receipts of the Lourenço Marques-Ressano Garcia railway line, which carries all the transit traffic of South Africa, representing 90 per cent of the total freight, amounted to over 211 million escudos in 1963. This does not include port receipts at Lourenço Marques.

Trade between Mozambique and South Africa

31. Part III of the Convention of 1928 provided for reciprocal "most-favoured-nation" treatment in respect of trade between Mozambique and South Africa subject to certain reservations. Besides the usual reservation concerning dumping duties to protect domestic industries against unfair competition, exceptions were made in regard to (a) special rates or rebates accorded by South Africa to products of the United Kingdom, its dominions, colonies or possessions or under customs and other agreements with neighbouring British-administered Territories; and (b) customs privileges accorded by Mozambique to products of Portugal and Portuguese-administered Territories. In addition, certain specified commodities were to be admitted free of duty. In the case of goods produced in South Africa and imported by Mozambique, these included coal, vegetables, fruits, fish and dairy products. In the case of Mozambique products imported into South Africa, they included vegetable oils, timber, sisal, copra and fruits. This last-mentioned provision was, however, deleted from the Convention in 1934 and was replaced by an undertaking on the part of both Governments not to impede the mutual trade between them. The agreement of 13 October 1964 did little to change the existing situation, merely providing for certain measures to promote trade in bananas, maize, railway sleepers, and butane gas manufactured in Mozambique.

^h Data obtained from statistics of railway traffic.

ⁱ Calculated by deducting Mozambique imports from total volume carried by railway.

32. Although South Africa ranks second after Portugal among Mozambique's trading partners, the volume of trade remains quite small, accounting for less than 12 per cent of Mozambique's external trade. As can be seen from table 1, the balance is heavily in favour of South Africa, from whence Mozambique obtains certain essential products, particularly for the Lourenço Marques area, which is the main urban and industrial centre of Mozambique. Important among these are semi-processed iron and steel products, including containers, valued at 69 million escudos in 1964, coal valued at 36 million escudos, and food-stuffs, including maize (46 million) and fresh vegetables (14 million). Coal is imported from South Africa because of the high cost of shipping coal to Lourenço Marques from the mines at Moatize, in the district of Tete. South Africa's purchases from Mozambique consist mainly of petroleum products from the SONAREP refinery at Lourenço Marques which began production in 1962 (90 million escudos in 1964), timber products, especially mining pit props and railway sleepers (107 million escudos), and vegetable oils (13 million escudos). Mozambique's exports of bananas and citrus, whether sold in South Africa or not, are marketed on consignment by the respective South African marketing organizations. It may be noted that the value of Mozambique's exports to South Africa will probably increase, apart from other reasons, as a result of the expansion of production by the SONAREP refinery which is currently engaged on a 130 million escudos investment programme aimed at increasing its total capacity to 800,000 tons of crude petroleum. In June 1965, it was reported that the company was establishing a network of retail outlets in South Africa.

33. The value of goods exchanged between South Africa and Mozambique is shown in table 2 below.

E. South African investment in Mozambique

34. Possibly stimulated by South Africa's policy or closer economic co-operation with immediate neighbours, there has in very recent years been a noticeable movement of South African investment capital into Mozambique.

35. The economic agreement between Portugal and South Africa of 13 October 1964¹ provided for (a) the supply by South Africa to Portugal of economic information which may be of interest for planning purposes in Portuguese Territories; (b) sympathetic treatment by the South African authorities of all applications for the investment of capital as well as for any financing arrangements; and (c) special consideration to be given to any application for South African financing of roadbuilding and any enterprises of particular interest to the Portuguese Government in Mozambique and Angola.

36. It had already been announced in 1963 that the Anglo-American Corporation of South Africa, through a newly formed subsidiary, Mozambique Development Corporation, with assets of R2 million, had acquired the share capital of Mozambique's only sizeable fishing enterprise, Indústrias de Peixe Nossa Senhora de Fátima (INOS). This enterprise, which had a capital of 3.4 million escudos, operated a small factory at Inhassoro and specialized in the fishing and commercialization of shrimp. The plans of Anglo-American are to develop large-scale commercial fishing for export, but at present the company is still engaged in scientific study of the off-shore resources and has not yet begun any large development. In May 1966, the company received authorization to postpone its original plans for establishment of a fishmeal factory at Porto Amélia and to reduce the factory's eventual capacity from 30,000 tons to 5,000 tons yearly.

37. In 1964 the Anglo-American Corporation, through another subsidiary, obtained a 100,000 hectare land concession in the lower Zambezi Valley near Quelimane to be used for sugar production. The project involves a capital investment in the region of 500 million escudos and is financed jointly by the Anglo-American Corporation and Australian interests. The plan is for half the concession to be developed by the company and half to be allocated among settlers, each receiving 100 hectares. The Corporation has announced that its long-term target is a yearly output of 1 million tons of sugar cane. The Anglo-American Corporation is also involved, together with Tiger Oats and National Milling Co., Ltd. of South Africa, in the development of a cashew factory at João Belo in the Gaza district. This company, in which Anglo-American holds a majority interest, was established in August 1965 with an initial capital of 20 million escudos, which may be increased to 85 million. The company, which is described in detail in paragraph 130 of the study on agriculture and processing industries in Mozambique, is eventually expected to process 30,000 tons of raw cashew annually.

38. Apart from these investments, Anglo-American is reported to be engaged in a diamond-prospecting operation for which an extensive concession in the area of Pafuri near the border of Southern Rhodesia was granted in 1964 (see A/6000/Rev.1, chap V, annex I, paras. 284-290). It is also participating financially in the construction of loading and storage facilities for sugar exports at the port of Lourenço Marques, the cost of which is estimated at 66 million escudos.

39. A second South African firm recently investing in Mozambique is the Industrial Development Corporation of South Africa which is reported to have made a capital loan to the Marracuene Agrícola Açucareira which was formed in 1963 and is potentially the largest Portuguese-owned sugar producer in Mozambique. This company, which is described in appendix III above (paras. 86-88), envisages an eventual investment of 430 million escudos, to be derived mostly from Portuguese sources, and an ultimate production capacity of 60,000 tons of sugar yearly.

40. In November 1965, the South African Central Mining and Finance Corporation joined with three Portuguese banks (Banco de Angola, Banco Comercial de Angola and Banco Nacional Ultramarino) in founding the Bank of Lisbon and South Africa, Ltd., with offices in Johannesburg and an initial capital of R2,000 million. The purpose of the bank, in which General Mining and Finance Corporation holds a 25 per cent interest with an option to increase its holdings, is to foster closer economic relations between South Africa and Mozambique and Angola.

41. More recently there have been newspaper reports that South African capital might be made available for the development of the Zambezi River basin which is the largest single multi-purpose development project in Mozambique, involving some 34,000 square kilometres and estimated to cost eventually 5,350 million escudos (see A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex II, paras. 293-295). There have also been reports of the settlement of South African farmers in the Angónia region of the Tete district on land made available by the Mozambique authorities.

II. MOZAMBIQUE'S ECONOMIC RELATIONS WITH SOUTHERN RHODESIA

A. General

42. A glance at the map of southern Africa is sufficient to reveal Mozambique's vital economic importance to Southern Rhodesia. Its geographical location makes it the natural outlet for most of Southern Rhodesia's overseas trade, the only alternative routes being the railway line through Bechuanaland to Cape Town and Durban, both ports approximately four times as distant by rail from Salisbury as Beira and roughly twice as far as Lourenço Marques, and the railway to Lobito which, besides being distant, passes through Zambia and is now denied to Rhodesian trade.

43. The traditional outlet for Southern Rhodesia, as for the two other former members of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, is Beira, which is only 602 kilometres from Salisbury. Until 1948-1949 when they were expropriated by Portugal, the port and railway of Beira were controlled by British interests, the railway being under joint management with the Rhodesian Railways. In 1955 a railway link to

¹ Republic of South Africa Treaty Series, No. 8, 1964.

Lourenço Marques was built by Portugal to cope with the rapidly growing volume of transit trade. Special agreements exempt goods in transit from payment of duties and shipping conference rates are adjusted to offset the long sea haul from Beira to European ports.

44. Whereas this transit trade is vital to Southern Rhodesia, its importance to Mozambique cannot be underestimated. In 1963 goods in transit from the Federation accounted for 49 per cent by volume and 78 per cent by value of all goods in transit through Mozambique ports. It was thus the main contributor to Mozambique's invisible foreign exchange earnings from transit trade, which in turn accounted for about one quarter of its total foreign exchange earnings.

45. In addition, it furnished over one half of the revenue of the Territory's railways and ports, amounting in 1965 to 1,009 million escudos, and is a major source of commercial activity at both Beira and Lourenço Marques. Although statistics are not available which show what proportion of this trade was attributable to Southern Rhodesia, it may be noted that under the terms of a long-standing convention only a small percentage of Southern Rhodesia's overseas trade, which was valued at over £200 million in 1965, was carried through South Africa.

46. Apart from this important transit trade, Mozambique has been traditionally linked with Southern Rhodesia both as a trading partner and as a source of migrant labour. Until the 1960s about 20 per cent of the Africans employed in Southern Rhodesia came from Mozambique, some of them recruited under contract as in the case of those recruited for the Transvaal mines. Although the number has been substantially reduced in recent years, there are still over 100,000 migrant workers from Mozambique in Southern Rhodesia, mainly on farms and in the industrial centre of Umtali, close to the Mozambique border. Direct trade between the two Territories was never large, accounting for only 2.4 per cent by value of Mozambique's visible external trade in 1964, but if trade within the escudo zone is excluded, it will be seen to amount to nearly 5 per cent of Mozambique's trade with non-Portuguese countries. Other economic links are the oil pipeline between the Feruka refinery and Beira, in which the Portuguese Government has a joint interest (see below) and the arrangements whereby electricity produced by the Sociedade Hidroeléctrica do Revuê, a largely government-owned enterprise, is furnished to Umtali. When the agreement was recently extended to run from 1967 to 1971, it was stated that the expected revenue to Mozambique would amount to 120 million escudos over the four-year period. Finally, in 1964 a proposal was made in the Southern Rhodesian legislature that Southern Rhodesia should participate in the 5,350 million escudos plan for the over-all development of the Zambezi River basin which has been under study by Portugal since 1957, and on which work began in April 1966. The project involves the construction of a major dam at Cahora Bassa and the opening up of some 34,000 square kilometres to agricultural settlement (see A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex II, paras. 293-295). Southern Rhodesia's interest lies mainly in the possibility of improved navigation on the Zambezi River. So far, however, there have been no reports of any formal agreement or negotiations with a view to Southern Rhodesian participation.

47. Co-operation between the two Territories in the economic field has received a strong impulse from the political situation preceding and surrounding the unilateral declaration of independence by the Southern Rhodesian régime. The political influence was already evident in February 1964 when a trade agreement was signed between Portugal and Southern Rhodesia whereby the two parties agreed to accord "most favoured-nation-treatment" to each other to goods traded between Southern Rhodesia on the one hand and Mozambique and Angola on the other and complete exemption from import duty in respect of certain goods. This agreement, which was intended to increase the trade between the two parties, was accompanied by discussions on possibilities of closer economic co-operation between them. Reporting on these discussions, which took place in Salisbury in December 1964, a Southern Rhodesian spokesman stated that the discussions had been cordial and that complete agreement had been reached and the ground prepared for further negotiations. The intention was expressed to convene a conference to examine in detail the various fields of activities where both countries would benefit from a sharing of technical facilities and expertise.

48. Since that time there have been a number of bilateral conferences in the economic field between the two Governments. Thus in February 1965, a mission, described as a trade and technical mission, comprised of Portuguese representatives from Lisbon, Mozambique and Angola, held a ten-day conference in Salisbury to discuss co-operation in regard to transport, the common use of rivers, agriculture, veterinary problems and tourism. Since then there have been visits by individual officials, including a visit to Salisbury of the Governor-General of Mozambique in August 1965.

49. During 1965, proposals were made in Salisbury for an economic alliance to include Mozambique, Angola, South Africa and Southern Rhodesia in line with the suggestion originally made by Mr. Verwoerd. This proposal was first made by the South African Minister of Agriculture, Economics and Marketing in a statement in Salisbury in June 1965 when he urged the building of an "enduring economic commonwealth in these southern parts of Africa". It was subsequently taken up in newspaper articles and by a number of individuals in public life. Nevertheless, although it has been advocated in Portuguese newspapers, Portuguese authorities have refrained from official comment, referring only to Portugal's "sincere wish to maintain the best relations with its neighbours" in Africa.

50. Following the adoption of Security Council resolution 217 (1965) of 20 November 1965, charges were levelled to the effect that the Lourenço Marques Railway had been used to deliver petroleum products from South Africa to Southern Rhodesia. The Portuguese Government, while officially denying this charge, made clear its position that it would not take part in sanctions against Southern Rhodesia and would not "interfere with private transport to and from land-locked countries". The same position was taken in regard to the transport of petroleum through the Beira-Umtali pipeline. On several occasions, the Portuguese Government has described its position as one of "neutrality", emphasizing that while it would not take exceptional measures to assist the Southern Rhodesian régime, it would not interfere with normal economic intercourse.

51. Nevertheless the refusal of other States to maintain economic relations with the Southern Rhodesian régime has greatly affected the transit trade through Mozambique ports. Most important has been the interruption of the transit trade from Zambia, especially exports of copper which in 1964 averaged over 62,000 tons monthly. (In July 1966 it was reported that an agreement had been reached to transport 12,000 tons monthly via Malawi to Beira and a subsequent newspaper report stated that Zambia would resume the export of limited quantities through Southern Rhodesia.) In June 1966 it was also reported in the Press that during the two preceding months the volume of tobacco, Southern Rhodesia's most valuable export which passed through Beira was 80 per cent below the normal quantity.

52. The following sections contain further details concerning Mozambique's economic relations with Southern Rhodesia in so far as data are available.

B. Trade relations with Southern Rhodesia

Transit trade

53. Southern Rhodesia's dependence on Beira as its main outlet to the sea has its origins in the East Africa Convention of 1891 which stipulated the construction by Portugal of a railway from the bay of Púnguê to the border of what is now Southern Rhodesia. Completed in 1896, the Beira Railway as well as the port of Beira and the linking Beira Junction Railway, were owned and operated until 1948 and 1949 by British companies in which the former British South Africa Company had a majority interest. In 1948 Portugal expropriated the port and in 1949 it purchased the Beira Railway for £4 million.

54. Until 1949 the Beira Railway was under joint management with the Rhodesian Railway. Following its expropriation, an agreement was entered into between the British and Portuguese Governments (Beira Convention of 17 June 1950) which provided inter alia for (i) the establishment and maintenance of preferential railway rates in favour of Beira over the ports of South Africa, (ii) exemption from transit dues on goods exported or imported by what were then Northern and Southern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, (iii) establishment of a working agreement between the two railways, and (iv) creation of a free zone in the port of Beira. This agreement, which remains in effect until 1970, in fact merely continued the situation which had existed when the port and railway were British-controlled; indeed, transit dues, restricted to 3 per cent ad valorem under the 1891 convention, had not been imposed by Mozambique after 1920.

55. In addition, preferential shipping rates between Beira and European ports largely offset the long sea-haul. Until September 1965, outward shipping rates from the United Kingdom to Beira were actually lower than those to Lobito, despite the much greater distance (3,000 miles). It was mainly because of those preferential rates that nearly all Zambia's overseas trade and part of Katanga's (amounting to 195,803 tons, worth 1.6 million escudos in 1963) were secured to the Rhodesian Railway as well as to the railways and ports of Mozambique.

56. By 1955 the volume of transit trade passing through Beira became so great that, in order to avoid over-saturation of the port, an alternative railway outlet was constructed from Bannockburn in Southern Rhodesia joining the Lourenço Marques line at Guijá. In 1964 a further branch was constructed inside Southern Rhodesia to permit the export through Lourenço Marques of sugar produced in the Hippo Valley and "Triangle" area of Southern Rhodesia.

57. The following table shows the volume and value of the transit trade (direct and indirect) of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland which passed through Mozambique in comparison with that of South Africa.

TRANSIT TRADE THROUGH MOZAMBIQUE PORTS BY VOLUME AND VALUE

Year	South Africa		Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland
	Tons	Thousand escudos	Tons	Thousand escudos
1963	3,227,025	4,557,024	3,116,189	23,491,008
1962	3,424,376	4,095,585	3,302,329	22,896,171
1961	3,240,001	3,889,347	3,042,049	23,085,711
1960	3,756,197	3,907,754	2,766,677	22,025,628
1959	3,125,887	3,917,539	2,678,363	20,312,381

58. The above table, which does not include transit trade of the Democratic Republic of the Congo passing through Beira via the Rhodesia Railway (see above), shows that though the volume of the Federation's trade was roughly equal to that of South Africa, it was nearly five times as valuable. Since higher priced goods generally pay higher freight rates, the significance of this can be seen. It may be noted that in 1962, the latest year for which this information is available, out of 2.7 million tons of freight carried on the Beira Railway, 2 million consisted of traffic to or from the Federation, and that of the total operating receipts of the Railway, amounting to 332 million escudos, 319 million came from the transit traffic. The proportion is even higher for the Limpopo branch of the Lourenço Marques Railway which, in 1962 earned receipts totalling 293 million escudos of which 283 million was derived from transit traffic. In 1963, it was reported that after only eight years of existence, the earnings of the Limpopo branch between Guijá and the frontier, a distance of 320 kilometres, had been sufficient to repay the construction cost of 800 million escudos, leaving a surplus profit of 300 million escudos.

59. In the absence of statistical data for the years after 1963, it is difficult to determine what proportion of the transit trade was attributable to Southern Rhodesia, nor is it possible to glean much information concerning recent developments. In 1964, however, Southern Rhodesia's external trade was valued at £247 million, of which £7 million consisted of gold exports and £84 million was trade with neighbouring countries. Assuming that not more than one quarter of overseas goods went through South African ports, it may be guessed that the value of Southern Rhodesian transit trade through Mozambique was about £117 million, or 9,360 million escudos. Malawi's overseas trade, practically all of which passes through Mozambique, was valued at £16.9 million, or 1,352 million escudos. The proportion of Zambia's trade which passed through Mozambique in 1964 is more difficult to estimate but it may be noted that Zambia's exports of copper, most of which went via Beira, amounted to 681,700 tons, valued at £148.4 million, or 11,872 million escudos.

60. Apart from the overseas transit trade through the ports of Beira and Lourenço Marques, it should also be noted that much of Southern Rhodesia's trade with Malawi was transported by the Beira and Trans-Zambezia railways. In 1964 this trade between the two countries, excluding re-exports, amounted to £7.2 million, or 576 million escudos.

61. Between 1960 and 1965, the volume of cargo handled at the ports of Lourenço Marques and Beira increased by nearly 48.8 per cent, while between 1964 and 1965 the total for all Mozambique ports increased by 18.4 per cent, the tonnage handled at Beira alone reaching an all-time peak of 511,537 tons in August 1965. Because of this rapid and impressive increase, due largely to transit traffic, the Portuguese Government has spent large sums for the development of port and railway facilities, including 140 million escudos spent in 1965 on the port of Beira (see chap. V, above, para. 162). Over one fifth (1,771 million escudos) of the expenditure under the Transitional Development Plan, 1965-1967, was earmarked for the transportation sector.

62. The effect of the unilateral declaration of independence by the Southern Rhodesian régime and the action taken by other countries under Security Council resolution 217 (1965) has been to reduce this transit trade substantially as has already been noted in paragraph 51 above.

The Beira-Umtali pipeline

63. An important development affecting the transit trade was the construction of a petroleum pipeline from the port of Beira to Southern Rhodesia's only refinery at Feruka, Umtali. Because of the prominent attention which it has received in recent months, details concerning this installation are already well known and it will be dealt with briefly.

64. Opened on 21 December 1964, the pipeline covers a distance of 184 miles, of which 169 are in Mozambique. It is owned by the Companhia do Pipeline Moçambique-Rodésia which is registered under Portuguese law and is an indirect subsidiary of Lonhro Ltd., the authorized capital (10 million escudos) being 62.5 per cent British and 37.5 per cent Portuguese. The pipeline, which cost some £4 million, was built under contract by Hume Pipe Company (South Africa) Ltd., in association with Costain and Press (Overseas Services) Ltd., and Morris-Knudson of Africa Ltd. The principal contractor advanced the majority of the construction costs, which are to be repaid over a six-year period, beginning in September 1965. The pipeline was constructed with an initial capacity of 600,000 metric tons of crude petroleum, which it is planned to increase to 835,000 metric tons by 1970.

65. Under the terms of its contract (Decree 44,769, 5 December 1962) the company holds a twenty-five-year concession to own and operate the pipeline, renewable for two additional twenty-five-year periods after which the pipeline and all concessions revert without payment to the Portuguese Government. The latter may, however, expropriate it after fifteen years have elapsed, provided it gives the company twelve months' notice and pays compensation. The company is exempted from all taxation for the first ten years of operation and has a guarantee from the Government that during the first twenty-five years no competing pipeline may be built from Beira to Feruka. The contract further provides that the company shall compensate the Beira Railway for the loss of revenue resulting from its operations.

66. Although the majority of the capital is British, in accordance with Portuguese law, five of the nine members of the board of directors are Portuguese, one of them being officially appointed by the Government of Portugal. In accordance with the action taken by the United Kingdom and other Member States to stop supplies of petroleum to Southern Rhodesia after the illegal régime in that territory had unilaterally declared independence, the minority of directors proposed suspension of operations; the Portuguese majority, however, took the position that since their Government was not a party to the embargo, normal commercial relations should be maintained.

67. As reported in chapter III, the supply of petroleum to the pipeline has been interrupted since December 1965. From May 1966, the United Kingdom Government has been paying a monthly sum of £54,000 to the company, part of which is in turn paid to the Government of Mozambique in respect of lost revenues.

Trade between Mozambique and Southern Rhodesia

68. Separate statistics relating to trade between Mozambique and Southern Rhodesia are not available for the years 1954 to 1963 when Southern Rhodesia formed part of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. As can be seen from table 3, the pattern of trade between the two has changed considerably since 1950 when the total value of their trade was only 44.4 million escudos. By 1964 it had increased to 180.9 million escudos and, although it still represented only 2.4 per cent of Mozambique's total external trade, Southern Rhodesia was nevertheless second in importance among Mozambique's African trading partners, after South Africa. As can be seen, the balance of trade was heavily favourable to Mozambique, the principal export items being wood and wood products (£417,705), electricity supplied by the Revue hydro-electric station to Umtali (£293,928) and feedstuffs for livestock (£240,014). Imports from Southern Rhodesia consisted mainly of tobacco (£105,984) and a variety of manufactured goods.

69. During 1964, trade between the two Territories continued to be governed by a trade agreement between the Federation and Portugal concluded in 1958. On 24 February 1964, however, the Governments of Southern Rhodesia and Portugal concluded a new agreement which came into force on 1 April 1965 and which is designed to expand trade between their respective territories. As did its predecessor, the agreement provides for "most-favoured-nation" treatment subject to certain exceptions: (i) that Southern Rhodesian goods should not enjoy the special preferential treatment accorded by Mozambique to goods produced in other Portuguese territories, or under any special agreements, to goods produced in Spain or Brazil; (ii) that Portuguese goods should not enjoy preferential treatment accorded by Southern Rhodesia to certain countries within the framework of the GATT; and (iii) that neither party should be entitled to benefit from privileges granted by the other under any agreement constituting a customs union or free trade area. In addition, there was provision for reciprocal duty-free admission of a wide variety of commodities including livestock, fish and vegetable products. More important, however, the agreement provided for the establishment of a permanent joint trade and economic liaison committee with the task of examining ways and means of increasing trade between Southern Rhodesia, on the one hand, and Portugal and Portuguese-administered territories, on the other.

70. It is still somewhat too early to determine what effect this new co-operation will have. Although the volume of trade did not increase, except for a few months, during 1965, the signing of the agreement was followed by renewed contacts between officials of the two Governments and interest in closer co-operation has certainly been evident in Salisbury. Recent unconfirmed newspaper reports have suggested that there has been an expansion in the re-export by Mozambique of goods from Southern Rhodesia, but this is too recent to be confirmed or denied by official statistical data.

C. Migrant labour

71. Although not as closely regulated or as well documented as in the case of South Africa, there has been over the years a greater flow of African migrant workers from Mozambique to Southern Rhodesia. From 1946 to 1958, when the Rhodesian authorities began to restrict immigration, Mozambique workers were the largest immigrant group, representing, according to Rhodesian statistics, 20 per cent of the total labour force. According to Mozambique statistics, which are based on the number of migrant workers registered with the delegation of the Mozambique Institute of Labour in Salisbury, the number of migrant workers in Southern Rhodesia reached a peak of 218,577 at the end of 1959.^k By December 1963 the number had dropped to 119,871, or about 30,000 less than those registered in the Transvaal.

72. The majority are clandestine migrants, mainly from the districts of Tete and Manica e Sofala, who legalize their status by obtaining Portuguese passports and registering with the delegation in Salisbury after they have entered the country and obtained work. Only a small proportion, 6,387 in 1963, are employed in mining, the majority being engaged in agriculture, industry and private service. Because most are clandestine migrants, the sums flowing to Mozambique in the form of passport fees and foreign exchange (resulting from deferred pay) is much less than for contract workers going to the Transvaal.

73. Until 1961, there were two organized channels by which workers went to Southern Rhodesia, apart from the purely illicit and unorganized movement across frontiers: recruitment on contract at recruiting centres in Mozambique and a free transportation service furnished by the Rhodesian Migrant Labour Service (known as ULERE). The latter provided free transportation with food and accommodation for the workers and their families from the frontier to Wankie and Umtali where they were registered and allowed to proceed to the employers of their choice. After completing at least one year of employment, they were entitled to free return transportation. In 1956, a total of 78,279 migrants from Mozambique and Zambia chose the services of ULERE and only about 18,000 were recruited in their home countries.

74. Of the two organized channels, recruitment in Mozambique was the only one not technically regarded as "clandestine" by the Mozambique authorities. This was regulated by successive agreements between the Governments from 1913 to 1961. Under these agreements, known collectively as the Tete Agreement,¹ the terms of which were similar to part I of the Mozambique Convention, the Government of Mozambique authorized the recruitment of up to 15,000 contract workers in the district of Tete, without restriction as to the type or duration of employment. Recruiting was done by licensed representatives of approved recruiting organizations at fixed recruiting centres. Each contract was subject to approval by an official of the Mozambique Institute of Labour. The recruiting organization was required to pay the fee (£1) for the worker's passport and to provide transportation to and from the place of employment. The agreement provided for an office of Curator of Portuguese Natives in Salisbury with functions similar to that in Johannesburg. An amount equivalent to the whole of the native tax (£1 annually) collected from Mozambique Africans in Salisbury and half the tax collected from those elsewhere,^m was to be paid to the Curator who was also to act as agent for remittances and transmittal of deferred pay.

^k There are substantial discrepancies between the figures published by the Southern Rhodesia Labour Bureau and the Mozambique Institute of Labour. Thus, in 1951, Rhodesian statistics show 101,618 migrants whereas the number registered with the delegation of the Institute of Labour in Salisbury was 148,935.

¹ In particular, agreements of 31 July 1925 and 19 October 1934 (cf. Southern Rhodesia: Government Notices 340 of 1925 and 620 of 1934).

75. From 1948 onwards, recruitment was handled by two organizations: the Rhodesian Native Supply Commission, an official body established in 1946 (Act No. 36 of 1946), and the Agricultural Native Labour Limited, a service agency similar to WNLA, which was licensed in 1948.

76. In fact, however, very few workers were recruited by the above method, the yearly average during the 1950s being under 4,000 for the Commission and under 400 for the Agricultural Native Labour Limited. A somewhat larger number made use of the facilities provided by ULERE but even these were apparently exceeded by the number of clandestine migrants travelling by their own means.

77. In 1958 the Southern Rhodesian authorities began to restrict the immigration of foreign labour. Under the Foreign Migratory Labour Act, 1958, the Minister of Labour, Social Welfare and Housing was empowered, when satisfied that the supply of local labour in an area exceeded demand, to declare that area closed to migrants seeking employment. In March 1959 both Salisbury and Bulawayo were declared closed areas and in the following months the Act was extended to other urban areas until by the end of 1959 Umtali, where nearly half the African workers were from Mozambique, was the only municipality remaining open to immigrant workers. It was reported that these measures resulted in a 34 per cent decrease in the number of immigrants entering Southern Rhodesia from outside the Federation. By 1960 the free transportation service furnished by ULERE was discontinued and in 1961 the Tete Agreement ceased to be operative, the Southern Rhodesian authorities having given notice of its termination in July 1960. To further discourage immigration, the Employment Tax Act, 1961, imposed a tax of £1 per month payable by employers in respect of each foreign employee. This Act was, however, repealed one year after it came into effect.

^m The 1925 agreement provided that if the total of fees and tax paid to the Curator was less than £4,500 annually, the difference should be paid by the Southern Rhodesian Government. This provision was dropped from the 1934 agreement.

78. One of the effects of these measures was to reduce the revenue, never very large, derived by Mozambique from passport fees and taxes in respect of migrant workers. From a total of 6.5 million escudos in 1957, these receipts dropped to 269,400 escudos in 1963, derived exclusively from passport fees.

79. At the same time, the number of Mozambique workers registered in Southern Rhodesia decreased substantially, as can be seen from the following table. This may, of course, be partly due to fewer clandestine migrants acknowledging their Mozambique origin.

MOZAMBIQUE WORKERS REGISTERED IN SOUTHERN RHODESIA

Year	Registered total	Mines	Other occupation	New registration
				Recruited in Mozambique	Others
1963	119,871	6,387	113,484	—	5,142
1962	202,863	6,873	195,990	—	12,379
1961	199,191	8,532	190,659	—	9,984
1960	193,578	1,787	191,791	402	44,404
1959	218,577	2,876	215,701	751	33,998

SOURCE: Mozambique, Anuário Estatístico, 1959-1963.

TABLE 1. MOZAMBIQUE: SPECIAL TRADE WITH NEIGHBOURING COUNTRIES
(By value and percentage)

Year	South Africa		Southern Rhodesia ^a		Zambia ^a		Malawi ^a		Congo (Léopoldville)
	Thousand escudos	Percentage of total	Thousand escudos	Percentage of total	Thousand escudos	Percentage of total	Thousand escudos	Percentage of total	Thousand escudos	Percentage of total
A. Imports
1950	230,625	13.1	18,935	1.1	99	0	1,824	0.1	2	0
1960	439,281	12.0	—	—
1961	399,666	10.7	—	—
1962	481,241	12.3	—	—
1963	492,325	12.1	—	—
1964	571,203	12.7	77,035	1.7	309	0	24,170	0.6	—	—
1965 ^b	414,062	10.4	75,362	1.9	1,528	0	2,028	0	—	—
B. Exports
1950	222,120	18.2	25,479	2.1	29	0	12,455	1.0	1,014	0.1
1960	61,614	2.9	—	—
1961	93,772	3.7	1,145	0
1962	230,672	8.8	7,612	0.3
1963	303,961	10.5	2,598	0.1
1964	324,351	10.7	103,820	3.4	32,697	1.1	8,224	0.3	—	—
1965 ^b	281,904	11.2	78,361	3.1	14,251	0.6	11,561	0.4	1,499	0.1
C. Balance
Year	South Africa (thousand escudos)		Southern Rhodesia ^a (thousand escudos)		Zambia ^a (thousand escudos)		Malawi ^a (thousand escudos)		Congo (Léopoldville) (thousand escudos)
1950	—	8,505	+	6,544	—	70	+	10,631	+	1,012
1960	—	377,667	—	—
1961	—	305,894	+	1,145
1962	—	250,569	+	7,612
1963	—	188,364	+	2,598
1964	—	246,852	+	26,785	+	32,388	—	15,946	—	—
1965 ^b	—	132,158	+	2,999	+	12,723	+	9,533	+	1,499

SOURCE: Mozambique, Comércio Externo and Boletim Mensal.

^a Malawi, Rhodesia and Zambia constituted the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland from 1954 to 1963. Trade between

Foot-note a (continued)

Mozambique and the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland in the period 1960-1963 was as follows:

Year	Imports		Exports		Balance
	Thousand escudos	Percentage of total imports	Thousand escudos	Percentage of total exports	Thousand escudos
1960	69,496	1.9	80,470	3.8	+10,974
1961	77,149	2.1	121,436	4.8	+44,287
1962	136,401	3.5	135,702	5.2	-699
1963	92,469	2.3	115,062	4.0	+22,593

^b January through October only.TABLE 2. MOZAMBIQUE: VALUE OF SPECIAL TRADE WITH SOUTH AFRICA BY PRINCIPAL COMMODITIES
(Million escudos)

	1950	1960	1961	1962	1963	1964	1965 ^a
A. IMPORTS
Iron and steel ^b	6.9	64.7	64.5	87.8	94.5	69.4	48.8
Coal	23.5	27.5	29.9	33.0	31.3	36.5	34.6
Maize	—	—	0.1	12.7	30.2	45.9	33.0
Fresh vegetables	10.1	6.9	12.7	21.0	20.0	14.0	15.5
Disinfectants, insecticides, fungicides, etc.	1.3	7.9	6.8	9.6	11.3	9.8	10.1
Dairy products ^c	3.1	12.7	16.2	19.3	9.8	10.9	9.8
Lubricants	0.4	18.3	21.7	20.3	15.7	11.0	7.3
Agricultural machinery and tools	1.0	5.6	3.0	3.0	4.1	4.0	5.6
Fish ^d	1.4	3.5	3.8	4.5	4.8	6.3	4.5
Medicines	1.4	2.8	2.4	3.1	3.5	3.5	3.8
Cotton textiles	4.6	8.9	3.3	4.0	4.1	3.8	1.1
Vehicle parts ^e	5.2	8.0	3.5	8.2	8.0	4.2	3.7
Fruits	5.2	12.6	11.8	14.4	14.2
B. EXPORTS
Bananas	1.7	4.0	8.8	15.1	15.6	...	9.0
Tea	6.0	2.1	1.4	0.9	0.7	2.9	9.3
Copra oil	12.6	9.3	7.6	13.9	14.3	24.2	13.2
Shelled cashew nuts	—	5.8	4.9	5.5	5.9	7.6	10.0
Gasolene	—	—	—	66.7	75.6	60.1	54.6
Gas oil and diesel oil	—	—	—	53.3	60.7	30.4	46.5
Timber ^f	20.9	13.7	38.5	54.9	87.4	118.1	107.5
Sisal	2.1	5.3	7.7	4.7	13.6	30.1	12.8

SOURCE: Mozambique, Comércio Externo, 1950 and 1960-1963; Boletim Mensal, 1964 and 1965.^a January through October.^b Includes iron and steel ingots, profiles, sheets, wire and tubes, and containers.^c Includes milk, butter and cheese.^d Includes fresh and preserved fish.^e Parts of automobiles, motor bicycles and bicycles, etc.^f Includes sawn timber, railway sleepers and flooring.TABLE 3. MOZAMBIQUE: VALUE OF SPECIAL TRADE WITH SOUTHERN RHODESIA BY PRINCIPAL COMMODITIES
(Thousand escudos)

A. Imports
Year	Maize	Coal	Copper	Iron ^a	Tractors	Vehicle parts ^b	Fertilisers
1950	—	4,416	9	124	5	41	510
1964	2,130	3,075	4,205	1,623	5,481	1,854	2,337
1965 ^c	14,245	3,168	3,830	3,731	1,867	1,326	1,088
B. Exports
Year	Timber ^d	Cotton-seed bagasse	Gasolene	Copra oil	Banana	Gas-oil and diesel oil	Cotton-seed oil	Ground-nut oil
1950	2,483	—	—	—	893	—	—	113
1964	33,261	18,315	8,121	8,735	...	9,125	...	—
1965 ^c	20,174	10,022	2,421	5,143	5,095	2,006	9,805	5,610

SOURCE: Mozambique, Comércio Externo and Boletim Mensal.^a Includes iron and steel ingots, profiles, sheets, wire tubes and containers; and railway supplies.^b Parts of automobiles, motor bicycles, bicycles, etc.^c January through October.^d Includes sawn timber, railway sleepers and flooring.

TABLE 4. TRANSIT TRADE OF SOUTH AFRICA THROUGH MOZAMBIQUE BY PRINCIPAL COMMODITIES^a

Commodity (metric tons)	1959	1960	1961	1962	1963
A. Outgoing
Base metals	513,201	1,207,966	1,071,608	1,032,009	763,139
Coal	488,009	413,816	440,665	592,598	448,561
Maize	—	10	30,484	227,702	294,688
Asbestos	90,490	98,049	108,165	106,398	108,793
Fresh and preserved fruits and fruit juices	32,415	44,196	37,642	38,188	43,125
Timber and wood products	12,776	12,222	8,785	25,072	67,832
Unworked and worked iron or steel	2,366	3,374	27,297	13,166	80,650
Chemical products (inorganic)	14,906	34,919	19,656	14,028	21,111
Unworked copper	13,163	12,283	13,054	9,029	16,565
Other	598,363	119,424	299,041	328,818	367,680
TOTAL, outgoing metric tons	1,765,689	2,026,259	2,056,397	2,387,008	2,212,144
Million escudos	1,727.2	1,816.3	1,906.5	2,173.8	2,675.7
B. Ingoing
Gasolene	410,837	414,432	424,377	381,603	342,890
Combustible oils	180,908	199,184	230,189	205,906	202,687
Petroleum	113,426	129,755	86,779	143,153	134,284
Timber and wood products	83,187	80,685	73,992	59,004	74,099
Paper	31,828	41,299	29,605	13,801	14,229
Chemical products	35,852	22,596	20,090	19,948	20,314
Lubricating oils	15,922	14,822	15,826	14,402	12,929
Agricultural and industrial ma- chinery	8,496	4,430	5,262	5,042	4,757
Other	544,621	279,574	340,681	238,354	247,120
TOTAL, ingoing metric tons	1,425,077	1,186,777	1,226,801	1,081,213	1,053,309
Million escudos	2,409.4	2,295.7	2,164.0	2,079.7	2,028.2

SOURCE: Mozambique, Comércio Externo, 1959-1963.

^a This table includes direct and indirect transit trade listed in the source. Because of technical difficulties, no distinction is made for re-imports or re-exports. Data are based on the Standard International Trade Classification only since 1961.

TABLE 5. TRANSIT TRADE OF THE FEDERATION OF RHODESIA AND NYASALAND THROUGH MOZAMBIQUE BY PRINCIPAL COMMODITIES^a

Commodity (metric tons)	1959	1960	1961	1962	1963
A. Outgoing
Basic metal	626,491	671,312	504,373	624,265	636,024
Unworked copper	468,692	514,998	524,187	537,826	561,141
Maize	106,976	32,078	240,898	389,887	99,829
Asbestos	93,818	113,051	123,821	106,314	124,767
Unworked and worked iron or steel	85,407	32,872	147,302	138,126	150,852
Tobacco	84,911	96,433	99,136	106,468	99,163
Copra and oil seeds	20,152	25,022	27,684	48,460	66,568
Tea	11,530	13,415	14,969	14,405	13,699
Unworked zinc	11,520	4,680	6,432	17,557	14,619
Sugar	—	—	—	1,260	47,265
Leather and skins	8,688	6,666	8,651	8,609	8,421
Preserved meat	3,873	2,959	4,547	6,782	7,448
Cotton lint	2,806	4,629	3,140	2,695	4,162
Others	135,794	147,576	190,354	214,937	156,731
TOTAL, outgoing metric tons	1,660,658	1,664,691	1,895,494	2,217,591	1,990,689
Million escudos	14,763.5	15,941.2	16,927.6	17,365.4	17,935.9
B. Ingoing
Gasolene	243,821	252,046	264,180	247,359	224,054
Fertilizers	164,903	181,709	206,098	176,704	157,689
Combustible oils	151,196	168,232	179,162	180,055	189,041
Petroleum	53,293	62,688	69,170	73,831	73,159
Timber and wood products	64,059	71,483	48,900	47,185	41,344
Sugar	38,619	30,650	36,899	32,633	8,824
Paper	17,155	22,093	25,255	22,377	20,783
Lubricating oils	17,073	17,615	12,000	12,490	10,256
Others	480,865	538,882	506,194	493,201	568,587
TOTAL, ingoing metric tons	1,230,984	1,345,398	1,347,858	1,285,835	1,293,737
Million escudos	6,135.8	6,888.5	6,907.1	6,210.1	6,140.8

SOURCE: Mozambique, Comércio Externo, 1959-1963.

^a This table includes direct and indirect transit trade listed in the source. Because of technical difficulties, no distinction is made for re-imports or re-exports. Data are based on the Standard International Classification only since 1961.

CHAPTER VI*

ADEN

A. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE IN 1965 AND BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS TWENTIETH SESSION

1. The Special Committee considered the question of Aden at its meetings in 1965. The Sub-Committee on Aden submitted two reports to the Special Committee, one in April 1965 and the other in September 1965 (A/6000/Rev.1,¹ chap. VI, appendices I and II). Following its consideration of the first report, the Special Committee adopted, on 17 May 1965 (ibid., chap. VI, para. 300), a resolution by which, inter alia, it deplored the refusal of the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to implement General Assembly resolution 1949 (XVIII) of 11 December 1963, and the recommendations of the Special Committee, and noted with deep concern that military operations against the people of the Territory were still being carried out by the administering Power. It reiterated previous recommendations and called upon the United Kingdom to convene immediately a conference of representatives of all sectors of public opinion of the whole Territory, with a view to deciding on the necessary constitutional measures for the holding of immediate general elections on the basis of universal adult suffrage and with full respect for fundamental human rights, to be followed by the establishment of representative organs and government for the whole of the Territory and for the granting of immediate independence; it requested the Secretary-General to arrange for an effective United Nations presence before and during those elections. It also drew the attention of the Security Council to the grave situation prevailing in the Territory.

2. On 16 September, the Special Committee endorsed the conclusions in the second report of the Sub-Committee and decided that the Sub-Committee should keep the question of Aden under constant review and report to it as necessary.

3. At its twentieth session, the General Assembly considered the reports of the Special Committee covering its work in 1964 (A/5800/Rev.1,² chap. VI) and in 1965 (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. VI) and adopted resolution 2023 (XX) of 5 November 1965, the operative paragraphs of which read as follows:

[The General Assembly]

"1. Approves the chapters of the reports of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples relating to the Territory of Aden and endorses the conclusions and recommendations of the Sub-Committee on Aden;

"2. Endorses the resolutions adopted by the Special Committee on 9 April 1964, 11 May 1964 and 17 May 1965;

"3. Deplores the refusal of the administering Power to implement the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Special Committee;

"4. Further deplores the attempts of the administering Power to set up an unrepresentative régime in the Territory, with a view to granting it independence contrary to General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) and 1949 (XVIII), and appeals to all States not to recognize any independence which is not based on the wishes of the people of the Territory freely expressed through elections held under universal adult suffrage;

"5. Reaffirms the inalienable right of the people of the Territory to self-determination and to freedom from colonial rule and recognizes the legitimacy of their efforts to achieve the rights laid down in the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples;

"6. Considers that the maintenance of the military bases in the Territory constitutes a major obstacle to the liberation of the people of the Territory from colonial domination and is prejudicial to the peace and security of the region, and that the immediate and complete removal of these bases is therefore essential;

"7. Notes with deep concern that military operations against the people of the Territory are still being carried out by the administering Power;

"8. Urges the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland immediately to:

"(a) Abolish the state of emergency;

"(b) Repeal all laws restricting public freedom;

"(c) Cease all repressive actions against the people of the Territory, in particular military operations;

"(d) Release all political detainees and allow the return of those people who have been exiled or forbidden to reside in the Territory because of political activities;

"9. Reaffirms paragraphs 6 to 11 of resolution 1949 (XVIII) and urges the administering Power to implement them immediately;

"10. Appeals to all Member States to render all possible assistance to the people of the Territory in their efforts to attain freedom and independence;

"11. Draws the attention of the Security Council to the dangerous situation prevailing in the area as a result of British military action against the people of the Territory;

"12. Requests the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the specialized agencies and the international relief organizations to offer all possible assistance to the people who are suffering as a result of the military operations in the Territory;

"13. Requests the Secretary-General to take such action as he may deem expedient to ensure the implementation of the present resolution, and to report thereon to the Special Committee;

"14. Requests the Special Committee to examine again the situation in the Territory and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its twenty-first session;

"15. Decides to maintain this item on its agenda."

* Previously issued under the symbol A/6300/Add.4.

¹ Official Records of the General Assembly, Twentieth Session, Annexes, addendum to agenda item 23.

² Ibid., Nineteenth Session, annex No. 8 (part I).

B. INFORMATION ON THE TERRITORY³*Introduction*

4. Information on the Territory is already contained in the previous reports of the Special Committee to the General Assembly (A/5800/Rev.1 and A/6000/Rev.1). Supplementary information on recent political and constitutional developments and on economic, social and educational conditions is set out below.

Political and constitutional developmentsSuspension of the Aden Constitution

5. On 25 September 1965, the United Kingdom Government issued an Order-in-Council⁴ which suspended the operation of the provisions of the Aden Constitution relating to the Council of Ministers and the Legislative Council. The Order empowered the British High Commissioner to make laws for Aden and provided for the establishment of an Advisory Council to be appointed by him. However, it did not affect the Constitutions of the Federation of South Arabia or of the other States in South Arabia.

6. The effect of the Order was to dismiss the Government headed by Mr. A. Q. Mackawee. In explaining the reasons for its action, the United Kingdom Government stated that it had been necessitated by the rapid deterioration in the security situation in Aden. In a statement issued by the British High Commissioner in Aden, it was pointed out that although the High Commissioner remained the ultimate source of authority, that authority had been exercised through, and with the advice of, the Council of Ministers; that advice he was required in most cases to accept. But Aden was still a British Colony, and if the British Government felt that the responsibilities entrusted to ministers were being improperly used it still had the power to take matters out of the ministers' hands. The High Commissioner accused the Aden ministers of conducting a campaign of obstruction, culminating in their open endorsement in the Legislative Council of terrorism as an instrument of policy. The Aden Government, he added, "had expressed sympathy with the use of the bazooka, the bomb and the assassin's bullet as a method by which the future constitutional position of South Arabia should be decided".

7. At the twentieth session of the General Assembly, Mr. Mackawee stated in the Fourth Committee that he and his ministers had met with obstruction from the United Kingdom High Commissioner from the time they had taken office. The statement of the High Commissioner that they were responsible for the deterioration of security in Aden was misleading, since security was the responsibility of the High Commissioner and the police and military were under his control. The new emergency regulations introduced by the High Commissioner in June 1965 had only made the situation worse.

8. A general strike was organized by the Aden Trades Union Congress on 2 October 1965 in protest against the suspension of the Aden Constitution. Riots broke out on 2 and 3 October, being particularly violent in the Crater District of Aden. A curfew was imposed and British troops were called in to help restore order. More than 760 persons were reportedly arrested and around 300 Yemenis expelled during the rioting. Among those arrested was Mr. Muhammad Saleh Aulaqi, Secretary-General of the Aden Trades Union Congress and seven other trade union leaders.

³ The information presented in this section has been derived from published reports and from the information transmitted to the Secretary-General by the United Kingdom under Article 73 e of the Charter, on 31 August 1965, for the year 1964.

⁴ The Aden (Temporary Provisions) Order, 1965.

Constitutional proposals for South Arabia

9. In September 1965, the Government of the Federation of South Arabia requested two British constitutional advisers, Sir Ralph Hone and Sir Gawain Bell "to consider and recommend suitable amendments to the Federal Constitution bearing in mind that the amended Constitution should:

"A. Be appropriate to the whole of South Arabia;

"B. As a result of consultation with all major interests in South Arabia, prove acceptable as far as possible to those interests and satisfy their aspirations;

"C. Assume that British sovereignty over Aden is withdrawn."

10. The report of the constitutional advisers was submitted to the Chairman of the Supreme Council of the Federation on 28 January 1966.⁵

11. In a note to the Secretary-General dated 25 February 1966 (A/6274), the Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom, on behalf of the Government of the Federation of South Arabia, transmitted copies of a letter addressed to the Secretary-General by Mr. Mohamed Farid, Minister of External Affairs in the Government of South Arabia, and a statement by the Supreme Council of the Federation concerning the report of the constitutional advisers. In its statement, the federal Government pointed out that it had agreed to the immediate publication of the report so that everyone in South Arabia might be aware of its contents. It emphasized that the changes proposed in the report were only suggestions and reserved judgement upon it until it had been fully considered.

12. The United Kingdom representative, also on behalf of the Government of the Federation of South Arabia, requested the transmission of the report of the constitutional advisers to all permanent missions to the United Nations. This was done on 9 March 1966.

Changes in the federal Government

13. The Supreme Council of the Federation was reportedly expanded on 14 February 1966. Two new ministers from Aden were appointed to the Council, thus raising its membership from ten to twelve. The new ministers are Mr. Abdul-Rahman Girgrah, who took over as Minister of National Guidance and Information, and Mr. Husain Ali Bayoomi, who became Minister of Civil Aviation. The two ministers are respectively the President and Secretary-General of the United National Party.

14. It is also reported that the British High Commissioner has appointed five new members from Aden to the Federal Council (the Legislature), including the two ministers referred to above. Since the resignation in July 1965 of the Aden members of the Federal Council, their seats have remained vacant. Under the existing Constitution, Aden is entitled to twenty-four seats in the Federal Council.

⁵ Federation of South Arabia, Constitutional Proposals for South Arabia, 1966.

Nationalist organizations

15. On 14 January 1966, leaders of the National Front for the Liberation of Occupied South Yemen and the Organization for the Liberation of the Occupied South (OLOS), Messrs. Aly al-Salamy and Abdullah al-Asnag respectively, issued a communiqué stating that their two organizations had agreed to merge into "one revolutionary, national organization called the Front for the Liberation of Occupied South Yemen" (FLOSY). The new organization proclaimed its adherence to the measures advocated in General Assembly resolution 2023 (XX) as the "only basis for ending the bloody engagements between the people and the imperialist British authorities", and vowed to continue the struggle against British colonialism until victory. A statement issued by the Assistant Secretary General of the League of Arab States pointed out that the merger was in response to the call made by Arab kings and heads of state and government to get all the national forces in the south combined into one effective organization.

16. The General Secretary of FLOSY, Mr. A. Q. Mackawee, announced on 4 March that a revolutionary council would be established: it would consist of twenty members, of whom eight would be "representatives of battle fronts". Furthermore, a national council representing freedom fighters and civilian sectors in all areas of the South would be formed within two months. A committee of the revolutionary council had been set up to draft a charter of national action.

17. In a memorandum addressed to the conference of Arab Premiers on 16 March 1966, the Front for the Liberation of Occupied South Yemen (FLOSY) stated that the constitutional proposals prepared by the two United Kingdom experts would, if implemented, strengthen the imperialist domination of the South "after disguising the rotten conditions in the area with formal independence". The memorandum continued, "FLOSY will fight against any independence granted to the area which does not include the transfer of authority directly to the people of the South and the implementation of all the measures mentioned in the United Nations resolution adopted last November".

18. The Revolutionary Council of FLOSY was formed in March and held its first meeting at its headquarters in Taiz, Yemen, on 16 April 1966. The Revolutionary Council decided to form four committees: the first to draw up a plan of action; the second to draw up a charter; the third to prepare for elections to a National Council; and the fourth for military affairs. Mr. A. Q. Mackawee, stated that the Front wanted a government for the entire South with its eastern and western protectorates and its towns, and that the scattered areas of the South should be transformed into big provinces. This would lead to the frustration of the imperialist plan to divide the South. The constitution should be drafted by an elected council representing the people and not by the British Colonial Office.

19. A new organization was reported to have been formed early in April 1966 following a conference held in Asmara, Ethiopia, between leaders of the South Arabian League, a number of independent politicians and some members of the former Organization for the Liberation of the Occupied South (OLOS). The group was called the Command of Nationalist Forces in South Arabia (CONFISA). It criticized the policy of FLOSY and described it as "sham and unrepresentative". The aims of the new organization were listed as follows: unity of South Arabia; independence; transfer of power to the people; recognition and safeguarding of human rights; an independent judiciary; and general elections under neutral supervision. It called for direct talks between the United Kingdom and representatives of South Arabia. It also called upon all nationalist forces to draft a constitution incorporating the peoples' demands and stated that only a constituent assembly elected prior to independence had the right to ratify a constitution.

20. Two members of FLOSY, Mr. Ahmed A. Al-Fadhli and Mr. Jaabal bin Hussein al Audhali, were expelled from the Front for holding talks in Beirut with Ministers of the South Arabian Federation Government. The two ex-members are the brothers, respectively, of the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Internal Security. Mr. Muhammed Ali Al-Gifri, President of the South Arabian League, and other leaders of CONFISA also met with the Federal Ministers in Beirut on 3 April 1966. The ministerial delegation was composed of Sultan Saleh bin Husain al-Audhali, Minister of Internal Security, Sultan Nasser bin Abdullah al-Fadhli, Minister of Justice, Mr. Abdul-Rahman Girgrah, Minister of National Guidance and Information, and Mr. Ahmed Abdul-Illah al-Darwish, Minister of Commerce. In a statement following the talks, the Ministers said that they had exchanged views with the other side "in an atmosphere of understanding and comprehension of the true nature of the stage through which South Arabia was passing".

Incidents in Aden and military operations

21. Reports have continued to be published in the Press about incidents and disturbances in Aden. On 1 September 1965, Sir Arthur Charles, the Speaker of the Aden Legislative Council, was assassinated. On 11 January 1966, an assistant political officer at the British High Commission's office, Mr. Husain M. Al-Wazir, was shot dead. On 17 January, another member of the British Administration, Mr. Robin H. Thorne, was injured when a parcel he had received through the mail exploded in his hands. Several grenade explosions and shooting incidents were reported in February and March. A large number of persons were reported to have been arrested for questioning by the security authorities. Strong protests against these arrests were made by various organizations, including former ministers of the Aden Government, the Graduates' Congress and the Civil Service Association of South Arabia (see A/AC.109/PET.443-445). A curfew was imposed on sections of Aden on 21 March, following the shooting of a British civil servant and the wounding of a British soldier. The curfew was lifted three days later.

22. Demonstrations and strikes have also been reported, particularly in December and January, chiefly by workers in oil companies and military establishments. One of the strikes was in protest against the dismissal by an oil company of eighty-five workers in a reduction of its operations. On 27 February, a general strike was held in Aden in protest against the assassination of the President of the Aden Trades Union Congress, Mr. Ali H. al-Qadhi. A reward of £1,000 was reportedly offered by the Aden police for information leading to the conviction of the person or persons responsible for the assassination. Anti-British student demonstrations broke out between 26 February and 6

March; a large number of demonstrators were reportedly arrested.

23. On 14 April a one-day general strike was called by the Trades Union Congress in protest against "the entry of British soldiers into a mosque in Aden suburbs, the violation of human dignity, the torturing of prisoners, and the closing down of schools in Aden". The British High Commissioner promised an investigation of the incident and stated that British security forces were under strict orders to accord the highest respect to Islamic holy places and customs.

24. Since June 1965, further emergency measures have been decreed by the British High Commissioner in Aden; they include road checks and searches, the fencing off of areas and access roads surrounding the quarters of British Forces' families and the supply of small arms to government officers when so recommended by the Commissioner of Police. Additional guards have been provided at certain key points, government offices and individual quarters of British troops.

25. The Front for the Liberation of Occupied South Yemen has continued to issue communiqués on military operations in the Territory. The areas in which the operations are reported to be taking place include West Radfan, Yafei, Fadhli, Beihan, Lahej, Subbaihah, Dhala-Shu'aib, Eastern Haushabi and Audhali. There have been reports of armed attacks on British military camps, army convoys and patrols, mine explosions and various other acts of sabotage.

Return of exiles

26. On 1 March 1966, the Government of the Federation of South Arabia recommended to the British High Commissioner that the ban on the return of all persons who had been exiled or deported for political reasons be lifted. The British High Commissioner has already rescinded the Order prohibiting the return to Aden of certain political leaders, including leaders of the South Arabian League and three deposed Sultans.

Other developments

27. On 22 February 1966, the United Kingdom Government announced in its White Paper on the general review of British defence policy that British troops would be withdrawn from the Aden base when South Arabia becomes independent not later than 1968.

28. According to press reports, the decision to close the Aden base was conveyed to the South Arabian Federal Government by the British Under-Secretary of State for Colonial Affairs during a visit to the Territory prior to the announcement. Ministers of the federal Government were reported to have expressed anxiety over the decision of the United Kingdom Government to terminate the treaty obligations with the Federation at the same time as the base was closed and the British troops withdrawn. A mission was to be sent to London to seek British assistance in strengthening the armed forces of the Federation. The Under-Secretary of State reportedly informed the federal Government that the United Kingdom would be ready to continue economic aid to South Arabia after independence (see para. 48 below).

Economic conditions

Agriculture

29. Owing to better irrigation in 1964, the total cotton acreage increased from 51,000 to 68,000 acres. The total yield of cotton lint was estimated at 42,000 bales, as against 37,700 bales in 1963; cotton seed production amounted to 16,000 tons, as against 11,000 tons during the previous year. Total sales of fruit and vegetables went up to nearly £755,000, an increase of nearly £255,000 over 1963.

30. Government expenditure on agriculture, irrigation and veterinary services in the Federation of South Arabia was approximately £215,800. New irrigation works were reported to have started in Ahwar, Nisab and Beihan, while improvements were being made in Abyan and Lahej. Funds available to the Agricultural Loan Board were increased by £120,000 to £165,000.

Trade

31. The value of goods imported through the port of Aden in 1963 rose from £86,113,692 to £96,980,000, while the value of exports and re-exports rose from £68,770,480 to £69,660,000. The value of entrepôt trade in hides, skins, tobacco, gums, grain, coffee, textiles and cotton amounted to £15,758,464, as against £16,530,000 in 1962. In 1964, the value of petroleum products accounted for over 40 per cent of import values, and with ship bunkers for over 75 per cent of export values. The total value of Aden trade rose more than 15 per cent over the previous year.

Public finance

32. On 1 April 1965, a new currency, the dinar, was introduced in the Federation of South Arabia. The dinar is equivalent to £1 sterling and is divided into 1,000 fils. The new currency, which is convertible into sterling at a fixed rate, is issued by the South Arabian Currency Authority. Under the provisions of the Federal Currency Law, 1964, the South Arabian Currency Authority is required to maintain a reserve of external assets consisting of gold or sterling to an amount of not less than 75 per cent of the value of the Authority's notes and coins in circulation and other demand liabilities; this minimum reserve may be reduced only with the approval of the Supreme Council of the Federation on a unanimous recommendation of the Authority's Board. For an initial period both the East African shilling and the new South Arabian dinar will be valid in the Federation. The dinar will also be used in the Qu'aiti and Kathiri States of the Eastern Aden Protectorate, which will have one representative on the Currency Board, as well as in the Kamaran and Perim Islands.

33. Revenue from customs and excise duties amounted to nearly £2 million in 1964. This was supplemented by income tax levied on federal ministers and officials, licence fees and fines, contributions from member States and by grants from the United Kingdom. Federal revenue from 1 April 1964 to the end of February 1965 amounted to £9,041,988, which included a United Kingdom grant of £5,499,000, £71,057 from direct taxes and £2,017,945 from indirect taxes. Expenditure for the same period amounted to £7,305,364, including £1,604,967 for the Federal Regular Army, £1,172,471 for Federal Guards, £962,802 for rural and urban education and £847,948 for health.

34. The revenue of Aden State for the period 1 April 1964 to 28 February 1965 amounted to £3,355,966, of which £1,714,443 was derived from direct taxes. Expenditure for the same period was £3,315,496 of which £750,000 was allocated to the Development Plan (see para. 43 below).

35. The revenue and expenditure of other States in the Federation for the year 1964-1965, including grants from the United Kingdom, are set out below:

State ^a	Total revenue	United Kingdom grants and subsidies (pounds sterling)	Expenditures
Amirate of Beihan ..	84,109	76,500	47,734
Upper Aulaqi Sheikhdom	83,725	76,400	49,156
Audhali Sultanate	128,951	75,900	96,836
Amirate of Dhala	102,616	76,000	61,160
Lower Yafai Sultanate	135,610	72,000	111,493
Fadhli Sultanate	242,577	72,000	225,699
Abdali Sultanate	314,260	72,000	...
Aqrabi Sheikhdom ..	15,235	4,000	12,047
Lower Aulaqi Sultanate	114,425	62,200	49,265
Dathina State	104,476	75,800	54,446
Wahidi Sultanate	120,253	73,164	76,685
Shaibi Sheikhdom ...	33,455	26,000	43,885

^a The States listed do not include the Sultanate of Haushabi and the three States which joined the Federation in 1965, namely Alawi, Mufiahi and Upper Aulaqi.

36. Outside the Federation, budget figures are available for Qu'aiti and Kathiri. Estimated revenue for Qu'aiti for the year 1964-1965 amounted to £869,213, of which £455,700 was raised from customs duties. Estimated expenditure for the same year amounted to £854,235, including £177,306 for education, £129,229 for the military, £108,982 for the Armed Constabulary, £62,112 for public health and £58,741 for public works.

37. The estimated revenue in Kathiri for the year 1964-1965 amounted to £76,962, including £37,800 from customs duties and £15,964 from United Kingdom grants and loans. Estimated expenditure for the same year amounted to £72,548, including £13,164 for the Armed Constabulary, £9,990 for education and £8,566 for public health.

Development plans

38. According to its current development plan (1963-1966) the Federal Government is planning to spend £9.75 million on economic development.

39. The financial provisions of the plan are summarized as follows:

	Recurrent (Pounds sterling)	Capital
(a) Economic
Agriculture and fisheries	266,383	813,608
Commerce and industry	—	41,470
(b) Social
Education	584,516	502,560
Health	195,630	245,000
National guidance and information	34,823	60,250
(c) Infrastructure
Civil aviation and shipping	17,500	450,000
Interior	271,045	5,668,135
Posts and telecommunications	13,000	300,000
TOTAL	1,382,897	8,081,023
Reserve		286,080
GRAND TOTAL		9,750,000

40. Allocations from Colonial Development and Welfare funds towards the plan amounted to £3,670,000 as at 31 March 1965. The breakdown of these allocations for approved or projected commitments was as follows:

	Recurrent (Thousand pounds sterling)	Capital
(a) Economic
Agriculture and irrigation	128	521
Fisheries	45	91
Co-operative and marketing ..	55	44
	228	656
(b) Social
Education	620	557
Health	300	223
Information	7	1
	927	781
(c) Infrastructure
Roads	15	641
Public works	121	255
Civil aviation	—	14
	136	910
Administration	32
TOTAL	1,323	2,347

41. As at 31 March 1965, approximately £1 million of this allocation had been spent.

42. Certain individual member States of the Federation have their own development plans. A total sum of £1.5 million has been allocated to member States of the Federation from Colonial Development and Welfare funds for the period 1963-1966.

43. The development programme started in Aden in 1960 was completed in 1965: total outlays amounted to almost £6 million. A new five-year plan (1965-1970) has been planned roughly as follows:

	Thousand pounds sterling
Industrial and economic development	1,100
Education	1,640
Health	695
Social welfare	135
Municipal/township/village development	588
Sports stadium	150
Roads, land and housing	2,655
New airport and terminal building	700
Public utilities	4,690
Government buildings	475
	12,828

44. In the Eastern Protectorate, allocations for development in 1964-1965 were distributed as follows: 47.2 per cent for education, 14 per cent for health, 13 per cent for agriculture, 7.2 per cent for roads, 6.5 per cent for fisheries, 5.2 per cent for co-operatives and marketing and 5.2 per cent for water supply.

45. In Qu'aiti, allocations from State funds for development amounted to £100,000 in 1964-1965. Expenditure was allocated as follows: 39 per cent for water supply, 23.9 per cent for education, 15.3 per cent for health, 13.3 per cent for roads, 5 per cent for electricity supply and 3.5 per cent for fisheries. At the end of March 1965, the unspent balance in the Qu'aiti Development Fund was £193,046. Qu'aiti State Special Funds for Harbour Development and Coastal Works totalled £300,000 in 1964-1965. Expenditure under the Fund was £50,000 in the same year.

46. Some projects in Qu'aiti are financed jointly from United Kingdom and local sources. In Kathiri no local resources are available for development.

47. Under the United Nations Development Programme (Expanded Programme sector) (EPTA), the Territory will receive advisory services amounting to £20,500 in 1965-1966. In the previous year, UNICEF provided aid totalling approximately £22,400 for educational services and £24,000 for medical supplies and stipends. The United Nations Special Fund has approved a four-year scheme for an investigation into the fisheries potential of the Territory; the scheme which was due to begin in 1965 will cost £250,000.

48. In a statement issued in London following talks with Ministers of the Federation, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations gave an assurance that United Kingdom aid to the Territory would not end on independence. The form and extent of that aid would be decided nearer the time of independence.

Social conditions

49. The total labour force in Aden State was estimated at 80,404 in December 1964, distributed as follows:

Port workers	7,550
Building and construction	12,629
Industrial undertakings	13,296
Retail and wholesale trades	10,694
Government police force and other services	17,860
Domestic servants	17,000
Miscellaneous	1,375
	80,404

50. The Employment Exchange of the Ministry of Labour recorded 4,616 placements in 1964. At the end of the same year the registered unemployment figure was 3,668, approximately the same as in 1963. There were eighteen registered trade unions and four employers' organizations, with an approximate membership of 21,869 and 29 respectively.

51. In September 1963, an Aden Joint Advisory Council was set up to advise the Government on labour policies, labour legislation and all matters of common interest. The Council includes representatives of the trade union movement. It has recommended that both employers and trade unions should endorse and subscribe to a National Industrial Relations Code, setting out, inter alia, the agreed responsibilities of management and unions in industrial relations matters, and methods of settling trade disputes.

Public health

52. No developments have been reported in the field of public health.

Educational conditions

53. In 1964, within the Federation there were 152 government primary schools (22,181 pupils) 12 government-aided and 5 private primary schools (4,732 pupils). Intermediate education was provided at 20 government (5,555 pupils), 10 grant-aided and 5 private schools (2,709). There were 6 government (1,617 pupils) and 8 grant-aided and non-aided secondary schools (975 pupils).

54. Estimates of expenditure by the Federation on Education for the year 1964-1965 were: recurrent, £1,297,991 and capital, £37,872. Approximately 13 per cent of expenditure on all forms of education was met by the United Kingdom Government. Implementation of the two educational development plans which were prepared by the Federal Ministry of Education for Aden State (1963-1969) and for the rural states (1963-1966) was delayed owing to the unavailability of funds. However, some building progress from previous development plans was achieved.

55. The policy of the Ministry of Education is to provide intermediate school places for 50 per cent of the primary school leavers; only some 25 per cent of those leaving intermediate schools, however, gain entry to secondary schools. In Aden State formal secondary education is provided for about 60 per cent of the boys and 20 per cent of the girls.

56. In 1964 there were seventy scholarships awarded for study overseas. Of these, fifty-two were for study in the United Kingdom.

57. During 1964-1965, there were approximately 15,935 children in primary schools in the non-federated states, an increase of approximately 20 per cent over 1963-1964. In one large area of Mahri there is virtually no public education yet. Owing to increased building activities and the subsequent shortage of labour, the construction of four new day schools for Bedouin children had to be postponed. Allocations for scholarships by the United Kingdom to Eastern Aden Protectorate students for intermediate and secondary schools amounted to £12,837 in 1962-1963; £17,106 in 1963-1964 and £36,254 in 1964-1965. During this last school year there were fourteen Eastern Aden Protectorate students abroad on government scholarships, ten of whom were studying in the United Kingdom. Twelve were from Qu'aiti and ten from Kathiri. The number of schools, teachers and pupils in these two States is set out below:

PRIMARY

			Pupils
	Female	Male	Schools	Total	Teachers
Government:
Qu'aiti	74	8,968	1,904	10,872	218
Kathiri	4	878	168	1,046	26
Government-aided:
Qu'aiti	5	765	58	823	17
Kathiri	22	2,216	260	2,476	68
Private:
Qu'aiti	—	—	—	—	—
Kathiri	9	695	—	695	19
	114	13,522	2,390	15,912	348

INTERMEDIATE

	Schools	Pupils		Total	Teachers
		Male	Female
Government:
Qu'aiti	10	1,847	92	1,939	104
Kathiri	4	335	—	335	16
Government-aided:
Qu'aiti	—	—	—	—	—
Kathiri	1	51	—	51	3
Religious	5	218	—	218	9
	20	2,451	92	2,543	132

58. There was a secondary school for boys in Qu'aiti with 133 pupils on the rolls.

C. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON CERTAIN PETITIONS

59. At the 397th meeting of the Special Committee on 18 March 1966, the representative of Iraq, speaking on a point of order, referred to a number of telegrams from government officials in Aden (A/AC.109/PET. 443-445), who had been detained and imprisoned and whose homes had been invaded at night, which called for immediate action, even for the dispatch of a commission of inquiry. His delegation had consulted other delegations on the question of what interim action could be taken and had prepared a draft resolution relating to the urgent matters mentioned in the communications. In his statement at the 396th meeting, the United Kingdom representative had said that his delegation would continue to co-operate with the Special Committee and to provide information concerning its policies. The three petitions under consideration gave some indication of the way in which the United Kingdom was carrying out its objectives.

60. He read out the text of a joint draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.263) submitted by his delegation, together with the delegations of Mali, Syria, Tunisia and the United Republic of Tanzania. The draft resolution, which did not enter into the substance of the question of Aden, deplored the action of the administering Power in effecting mass arrests of the Adeni people and requested the Secretary-General to convey to the administering Power the grave concern of the Special Committee. The least which the Special Committee could do at that juncture was to adopt that draft resolution.

61. The representative of Syria said that the petitions proved that the United Kingdom had not complied with the provisions of paragraph 8 of General Assembly resolution 2023 (XX) by ceasing all repressive actions against the people of Aden. The evidence before the Special Committee showed that there had been midnight arrests and physical and mental torture. The draft resolution, which should be adopted immediately, was in full harmony with resolution 2023 (XX). If there was any doubt about the facts described in the petitions, a United Nations presence should be established in Aden to ascertain whether the facts were true. His delegation was sure that they were true and that an urgent situation existed, which required immediate action on the part of the Special Committee. The least that Committee could do was to request the administering Power to desist from its acts.

62. Speaking at the 398th meeting, the representative of Afghanistan suggested the deletion of the words "physical and mental torture" in the first preambular paragraph of the draft resolution and the addition at the end of operative paragraph 2 of the phrase "and cease all repressive actions against the people of the Territory". If those amendments were accepted, Afghanistan, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Sierra Leone and Yugoslavia would become co-sponsors.

63. The representative of Tunisia accepted the amendments on behalf of the sponsors of the draft resolution.

64. The representative of Ethiopia supported the draft resolution, as amended, because its adoption would be an interim measure until such time as the question of Aden could be discussed appropriately. Although the draft resolution did not formally request him to do so, the Secretary-General would no doubt report to the Committee on the measures taken for its implementation.

65. The representative of the United Kingdom said that on four occasions, from 24 February to 14 March, a total of thirty-eight persons of various occupations had been arrested by the security authorities in Aden and questioned under section 3 (1) of the Federal Emergency Decree. Three had been released.

66. Contrary to the allegations made in the petitions before the Special Committee, the security authorities made arrests only when they had evidence of complicity or intended complicity in acts of violence on the part of the persons arrested; nobody was arrested and held because of his political views. An impartial tribunal met regularly to review all cases and recommended releases whenever possible. The questioning was conducted under internationally recognized procedures; since it had provided considerable new information concerning plans for criminal violence in Aden and had led to the discovery of a considerable quantity of arms and ammunition, it was clear that the persons interrogated had been involved in acts or plans of terrorism. There had been no arbitrary arrests but only arrests based on positive information and made in the interests of the safety of the population as a whole. A small number of those arrested were civil servants and students but such persons, if found to be implicated in violence, could not expect different treatment from others.

67. With regard to the allegations of torture, he recalled that similar allegations had been heard at the last session of the Fourth Committee. His delegation had rejected them, pointing out that an investigation had been made and that no evidence of torture had been found. He again categorically stated that the detainees were neither tortured nor ill-treated and that the allegations which the Special Committee was examining were completely unsupported. Indeed, a representative of the International Red Cross was just then visiting the Aden detention centre; such a visit would hardly be permitted if the allegations of ill-treatment were true.

68. He recalled the efforts made by his Government to stop the acts of violence and terrorism which had been common in Aden for the past two or three years and which were hindering the Territory's progress towards independence. His delegation had given the Special Committee evidence that violence was inspired and organized from outside South Arabia. On 2 September 1965, his delegation had quoted in the Committee a statement by the Colonial Secretary affirming that the Secretary would gladly consider any proposals concerning the state of emergency which were consistent with the safety of the population and of the Aden military base. On 19 October 1965, it had stated in the Fourth Committee that the United Kingdom Government would lift the emergency measures which it had had to take in order to preserve order in the Territory as soon as the acts of terrorism ceased, and it had also demonstrated that allegations of mass arrests had been greatly exaggerated, since there were at that time fewer than ninety persons in prison in Aden and the rest of the Federation. On 14 March 1966, seventy-five persons had been under detention in Aden and fifteen elsewhere in the Federation. On 5 November 1965, at the 1368th meeting of the General Assembly, Lord Caradon had stated that the United Kingdom Government's purposes of self-determination and independence were delayed and prevented by the campaign of violence; and that the measures taken to deal with violence would readily be lifted when that violence ceased. Recently, on 3 February 1966, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary in the Colonial Office had reaffirmed in the House of Commons that the emergency measures would be lifted immediately; this could be done without prejudicing the safety of law-abiding citizens.

69. Contrary to what had been said by certain delegations which condemned the security measures taken by the United Kingdom Government, the acts of violence were in no way helping South Arabia to obtain earlier independence; on the contrary, they were hindering the constitutional processes of consultation and discussion which must precede independence. Moreover, the majority of the victims were Arab civilians who had nothing to do with the United Kingdom administration: for example, since Christmas 1965, three times as many Arabs as Europeans had been killed and injured by terrorists. In fact the violence had no conceivable purpose. The United Kingdom Government, far from resisting independence, had set the deadline of 1968 for it.

70. There had been encouraging developments in recent weeks, which gave hope of a new climate in which all shades of opinion could meet and settle their differences, so that a united country could be put on the road to independence. Firstly, the Federal Government had recommended that the exiles should be allowed to return to Aden. Secondly, the constitutional proposals drawn up by two experts commissioned by the Government of the Federation had been published in February 1966 and circulated to all Members of the United Nations at the Federal Government's request; those proposals, although no one was committed to accept them in whole or in part, could serve as a basis for constructive discussion and action. Thirdly, the United Kingdom had announced in its White Paper on its defence policy that it intended to withdraw its troops from the Aden base when South Arabia became independent, not later than 1968. He hoped that the Special Committee would address itself to those constructive features of the situation and would not be distracted by the fact that the authorities in Aden had been obliged to arrest thirty-eight persons in the process of trying to stop the violence which hindered consideration of the constitutional issues.

71. Finally, he wished to comment on draft resolution A/AC.109/L.263/Rev.1 in the light of the facts he had just described. He welcomed the deletion from the first preambular paragraph of the reference to physical and mental torture, since that allegation was completely unfounded and unsubstantiated. He drew attention to the fact that General Assembly resolution 2023 (XX), mentioned in the second preambular paragraph, had proved unacceptable to twenty-one delegations even though its sponsors had agreed to a Latin American request, and in order to take account of facts set out by the United Kingdom delegation, to delete from the text certain words which were tantamount to an incitement to violence.

72. In operative paragraph 1, the sponsors claimed that there had been mass arrests in Aden—a charge which he had shown to be factually wrong—but omitted to refer to the reasons for the arrests which had been made as a result of a series of attacks and murders, one of the victims of which had been Mr. Ali Hussein Quadi, the President of the Aden Trades Union Conference, who, although a supporter of the liberation movement, had been opposed to violence. An Arab who was a former prison warder, a British garage superintendent and a West German businessman had also been murdered in recent weeks. The Special Committee could hardly condone these murders and yet the draft resolution appeared to do so by condemning the measures taken to deal with violence without referring to the violence that made them necessary.

73. Operative paragraph 2, as amended, was unacceptable because it implied that the measures taken by the United Kingdom Government and the Federation and Aden Governments were directed against the people of the Territory. He had already shown that, on the contrary, those measures were aimed at protecting the population against the campaign of violence in the Territory, and represented the action which it was the duty of any government to take in such a situation.

74. The United Kingdom delegation therefore considered the draft resolution unacceptable, even in its amended version. The Special Committee's right course, in the cause of decolonization was to use its influence to persuade all those who sponsored violence, whether inside or outside Aden, to abandon pointless brutality and to join those who were seeking a peaceful and rapid transition to independence by 1968. His delegation invited the sponsors to withdraw their draft resolution; if it was put to the vote, his delegation would oppose it. He observed that the information and explanations he had given to the Special Committee showed that it paid to hear both sides of the case rather than to take ill-considered and precipitate action.

75. The representative of Iraq noted that the United Kingdom representative had counseled the Special Committee not to take any hasty measures in respect of the situation in Aden, although repression was continuing in the Territory, and people were being arrested, detained and tortured. The Iraqi delegation had agreed to delete the words "physical and mental torture" from the text of the draft resolution only in order to make it possible for a larger number of delegations to support it.

76. The information which the United Kingdom representative had given concerning the number of persons detained—about forty—was not very convincing. If the administering Power had not resorted to mass arrests or torture, why did it not agree to have a commission go to Aden, as requested by some of the petitioners? The United Kingdom had always refused United Nations intervention, saying that it alone was responsible for the maintenance of order in the Territory and that it was attending to the task of pacification. The Iraqi delegation, which had doubts concerning the nature of that pacification, had always insisted that measures should be taken against any administering Power that ignored the resolutions of the United Nations and the Declaration of Human Rights and did not take the wishes of the people concerned into account.

77. The Special Committee had been informed that the administering Power was at present engaged in consultations on constitutional amendments. But the solution proposed by the United Nations recommended that the Territory should first be evacuated so that the people could then decide on their own Constitution. He noted, in paragraph 16 of the document which had been circulated by the United Kingdom delegation and which concerned constitutional proposals for South Arabia, that the consultations had been limited to two meetings with the High Commissioner and to discussions with seven members of the community, seventeen officials, three diplomatic representatives and a number of well-known personalities.

78. In view of the urgency of the situation, he appealed to the Special Committee to adopt the draft resolution and drew attention to the fact that the Secretary-General was also being asked to inform the Special Committee of the measures taken by the administering Power to implement the resolution.

79. The representative of the United States of America noted that during the past several years South Arabia had moved steadily towards self-determination and independence. The United Kingdom had clearly indicated its intention to grant independence by 1968 at the latest; all members of the Special Committee hoped that independence would be achieved in peace and tranquillity. It did not seem, however, that draft resolution A/AC.109/L.263/Rev.1 would contribute to peaceful progress and the United States delegation would therefore vote against it. The draft had been originally submitted on 18 March 1966 and an attempt had been made at that time to have it put to the vote without giving the representative of the administering Power an opportunity to consult his Government concerning the facts alleged in the text. Fortunately, wisdom had prevailed and the Special Committee had just heard the United Kingdom representative explain that an upsurge of terrorism had led the administering Power to arrest a number of individuals suspected of complicity in the acts of violence.

80. In explaining its negative vote on resolution 2023 (XX) at the twentieth session of the General Assembly, the United States delegation had pointed specifically to the fact that the resolution had ignored the question of terrorism and failed to take into account the efforts made by the United Kingdom to solve the problem. The present draft resolution suffered from the same defects. Instead of being constructive, it was more likely to encourage the disorders which would inevitably retard the orderly processes by which the Territory should achieve independence.

81. As the date of that event was drawing near, the Special Committee owed it to South Arabia to contribute effectively to that end, in a spirit of goodwill and understanding, by offering practical and constructive counsel for those who were genuinely seeking the welfare of the people and the peace of the area.

82. The representative of Syria said that the procedure followed at the preceding meeting had been made necessary by the suddenness of the repressive measures taken by the colonial Power. It was, moreover, not the first time that such a procedure had been followed in the United Nations.

83. In explaining his Government's position, the United Kingdom representative had given the impression that legality was on his side, but many United Nations Members which had seen their countries devastated and their peoples uprooted know on which side legality lay. Moreover, resolution 2023 (XX) left no doubt whatsoever in that regard and reaffirmed, in operative paragraph 5, the inalienable right of the people of the Territory to self-determination and to freedom from colonial rule, and recognized the legitimacy of their efforts to achieve the rights laid down in the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. Did legality consist in militarily and forcibly occupying the Territory? The representative of the United Kingdom had also referred to the Federal Government of South Arabia. He would merely remind the United Kingdom representative that paragraph 4 of the same General Assembly resolution deplored the attempts of the administering Power to set up an unrepresentative régime in the Territory, with a view to granting it independence contrary to General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and 1949 (XVIII), and appealed to all States not to recognize any independence not based on the wishes of the people of the Territory freely expressed through elections held under universal adult suffrage.

84. With regard to the draft resolution, of which Syria was a sponsor, it was clear from the statement of the United Kingdom representative that people had been imprisoned because they were conducting a liberation movement, which was fully legitimate. Indeed, with the existence of a military base on its territory, it was the entire population of Aden that was in prison. The text before the Special Committee was therefore a very moderate one.

85. The representative of Poland stated that the Polish delegation had supported General Assembly resolution 2023 (XX), which had explicitly requested the administering Power to abolish the state of emergency and to cease all repressive actions against the people of the Territory. However, only five months after the adoption of that resolution, communications received from Aden and the Press in the United Kingdom had reported new arrests which left no doubt whatever regarding the gravity of the situation in the Territory. The Polish delegation considered that the Special Committee should express its concern over the recent developments in Aden and that draft resolution A/AC.109/L.263/Rev.1 should be adopted as a matter of urgency. His delegation fully supported and would vote in favour of the draft resolution.

86. The representative of Italy expressed reservations regarding a procedure which had interrupted the orderly course of the Special Committee's work and brought about a debate on the draft resolution concerning Aden, the more so as, three months after the conclusion of the previous session of the General Assembly, the Special Committee had still not been able to organize its session or agree on its methods of work. In his opinion, the atmosphere of violence that prevailed in Aden seemed amply to justify full and urgent consideration of the matter as a whole, even before a decision was reached on the Committee's visit to Africa.

87. In considering draft resolution A/AC.109/L.263/Rev.1, the Committee should make sure of two facts, namely, that mass arrests had been carried out by the administering Power, and that they were not justified either by the situation or by the circumstances and were therefore illegal and contrary to the resolutions of the General Assembly. The revised version of the draft resolution was, admittedly, an improvement, but it broadened the scope of the problem so far as its substance was concerned by mentioning "all repressive actions against the people of the Territory", which no longer referred simply to the events which had given rise to the submission of the draft resolution, but to the situation in Aden as a whole, and that had not been the sponsors' intention. He was afraid that the Special Committee might be setting itself up as a court, when it had neither the authority nor the facilities to give an independent and impartial judgement.

88. As long as a country was responsible for a Territory as its administering Power, it had the right and also the duty to take whatever action was necessary to maintain order and protect the population. The facts which had been brought to the Special Committee's attention did not prove conclusively that the administering Power had overstepped its rights in maintaining order in Aden. Finally, his delegation did not think that the draft resolution was likely to further the common aim of the administering Power and Special Committee, namely to explore all the ways and means of leading the Territory to self-determination and independence by 1968 at the latest. For all those reasons, his delegation would not support draft resolution A/AC.109/L.263/Rev.1.

89. The representative of Bulgaria said that it was clear from the United Kingdom representative's statement that it was necessary for the Special Committee to adopt a draft resolution of the kind before it. That representative had not refuted the facts mentioned in the petitions and had not denied that those petitions had come from various sectors of the population or that the administering Power had taken repressive measures. It was regrettable that the administering Power considered that it had acted legally and that it was for the colonial authority to decide on the date and methods of granting independence to the Territories under its administration. In the case of Aden, the United Kingdom representative had stated that the granting of independence to the Territory had been delayed because the population, instead of co-operating with the administering Power, was fighting against it and trying to impose its own conditions. The population of the Territory was subjected to repressive measures by the United Kingdom, and had a very clear idea of the régime and the Constitution which it wished to adopt; the situation would therefore be improved if the United Kingdom were to give the population an opportunity to express its views. For all those reasons, he supported the very moderate revised draft resolution which had been submitted.

90. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that the United Kingdom representative had added nothing to what the Committee already knew. He had not refuted any of the facts mentioned in the cables, but had simply tried to justify the arrests.

91. The USSR delegation categorically rejected the United Kingdom representative's statement that the action taken by the United Kingdom had been directed against acts of terrorism allegedly committed by people encouraged and assisted from outside the Territory and but for which great progress would have been made towards the independence of Aden. The representatives of the United States and Italy had asked the Special Committee not to come to a hasty decision, claiming that the best way to help the population of Aden was to leave the matter to the United Kingdom. He pointed out that every time the United Kingdom Government had wanted to take certain action in the Territory of Aden it had carried out arrests and repressive measures: that had happened when the Federation of South Arabia had been created, when the Aden Constitution had been introduced, and when elections had subsequently been held. Once again the United Kingdom representative had confirmed that certain people in South Arabia did not approve of the steps which had been taken towards the constitutional development of the Territory and had asked for the implementation of United Nations decisions; once again, there was repression and a wave of arrests. That could not be a coincidence, and he was convinced that there was a definite policy behind the recent events. The Committee should act resolutely and adopt the draft resolution before it. There was nothing in the draft resolution which could give rise to objections; by adopting it, the Committee would prove that it could resist the pressure of the colonial Powers and was still a militant body of the United Nations, and it would be a warning to those Powers that the United Nations would not remain passive when confronted with unlawful situations.

92. The representative of Denmark said that his delegation wished to stress that in the present instance, as on previous occasions, the United Kingdom had proved its willingness to co-operate with the Special Committee in providing information about the Territories under its administration. The Committee should appreciate the fact that the United Kingdom Government had made an urgent and thorough investigation of the recent arrests in Aden.

93. His country strongly supported the right to self-determination in Asia, Europe or anywhere else in the world and therefore supported the people of South Arabia in their efforts to obtain independence. His delegation did not, however, see how the draft resolution under consideration could further the process of decolonization in that Territory; on the one hand, it did not take into consideration all the factors connected with the arrests, and on the other hand it touched upon the broader political issues involved in the question of Aden on which there had been no real debate. His delegation would therefore abstain when the draft resolution was put to the vote.

94. The representative of India said that whereas the United Kingdom representative had stated that only thirty-eight persons had been arrested in Aden since 24 February 1966, according to information which his delegation had received, considerably more than that number had been arrested in Aden during the previous week or ten days alone and most of the arrests had been made at night. Moreover, he understood that the situation in Aden was at present very tense indeed.

95. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that the United Kingdom representative's statement only confirmed where the crux of the matter lay. The cables referred to arrests and torture. Most of the members of the Special Committee had at one time lived under a colonial régime; they knew what it involved and spoke from experience. Any suspicions which they might have had had been confirmed by the United Kingdom representative. In fact, his own delegation would have been the last to expect anything else from the United Kingdom representative's reply. The latter had, moreover, not denied that the petitioners were reliable people and had all occupied high posts in the Aden Government.

96. The United Kingdom representative had merely stated that his Government acted as it did in Aden because it had a responsibility and, as his own delegation knew, that responsibility was to maintain a colonial system in the Territory. Secondly, the United Kingdom representative had tried to minimize the problem by saying that his Government had already set a date for the independence of Aden; his own delegation felt strongly that Aden should have been given independence long since. Thirdly, the United Kingdom representative had said that his Government was interested in negotiations and a peaceful settlement but that its efforts were being hampered by acts of violence; those so-called acts of violence, as those who had lived under colonial rule knew, were in fact only an expression of the struggle of the people for independence. The United Kingdom representative had failed to mention its own bombing of defenceless villages in Aden. The strength of the freedom movement in Aden could be judged from the fact that senior civil servants and employees of the air line, which was not an independent organization, had been among those arrested.

97. His delegation fully supported the draft resolution, although it would have preferred to retain the original wording and include a reference to the physical and mental torture to which those who had been arrested in Aden were undoubtedly being subjected. His delegation had nevertheless accepted the amendments which had been introduced by the representative of Afghanistan, since they had made it possible for other delegations to support the draft resolution. He hoped that it would be adopted unanimously. Compared with previous resolutions which the Special Committee had adopted on the question of Aden, it represented the minimum demands that the Committee could make. He hoped that delegations which tended to support the administering Power simply for the sake of doing so would reflect and realize that they should always take into account the interests of the people for whose protection the Committee had been established, including the defenceless people of Aden who were suffering under colonialism.

98. The Special Committee then voted on the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.263/Rev.1) at its 399th meeting on 22 March 1966. The draft resolution was adopted by 19 votes to 3, with 2 abstentions.

99. The resolution adopted by the Special Committee (A/AC.109/153) read as follows:

"The Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

"Having received and examined the petitions (A/AC.109/PET.443-445) concerning the detention and imprisonment carried out by the administering Power against the population of Aden,

"Recalling General Assembly resolution 2023 (XX) of 5 November 1965,

"1. Deplores the action of the administering Power in affecting mass arrests of the Adeni people;

"2. Calls upon the administering Power to desist from these acts and cease all repressive actions against the people of the Territory;

"3. Requests the Secretary-General to convey to the administering Power the grave concern of the Special Committee regarding the deteriorating situation in the Territory."

D. PRELIMINARY ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

100. At the 414th meeting of the Special Committee, on 16 May 1966, the Chairman drew attention to a report submitted by the Secretary-General in accordance with General Assembly resolution 2023 (XX) on the question of Aden, which is reproduced as annex I to this chapter. At the 415th meeting, on 18 May, the representative of Yugoslavia, speaking as Chairman of the Sub-Committee on Aden,⁶ introduced a report of the Sub-Committee which is reproduced as annex II to this chapter.

101. The representative of the United Kingdom said that, in a statement made in the House of Commons on 16 May, the United Kingdom Foreign Secretary had referred to the announcement made on 13 May 1966 by the Government of the Federation of South Arabia to the effect that it accepted the United Nations resolutions and intended to convene a conference of all Governments and political groups in South Arabia to consider ways and means of implementing those resolutions. The Foreign Secretary had stated that his Government had always made it clear that it would accept any solution of the constitutional problem in South Arabia which was capable of achieving a wide measure of agreement in the Territory. It accordingly welcomed the Federal Government's intention to hold a representative conference and shared the hope that all South Arabians with the interests of their country at heart would find it possible to participate. The Foreign Secretary had added that, since other political groups had also called for acceptance of the United Nations resolutions, there was a wide measure of agreement about future objectives; all should be able to co-operate in working out the practical implications of their policies. The Foreign Secretary had stated that the United Nations recommendations relating to the Aden base were already met by the announcement that United Kingdom troops would be withdrawn from the base not later than 1968, by which time South Arabia would have achieved independence. The United Kingdom would be prepared to implement the recommendations concerning the state of emergency and the release of detainees, provided there was satisfactory evidence that terrorism in Aden had ended. The Foreign Secretary had announced that the Federal Government had handed the High Commissioner in Aden, for transmission to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, a letter inviting him to appoint a United Nations observer to attend the proposed conference. Lastly, the Foreign Secretary had told the House of Commons that he had requested the United Kingdom Permanent Representative to inform the United Nations of the Federal Government's announcement and to discuss the whole matter with the Secretary-General.

⁶ At the 401st meeting the Special Committee decided, without objection, to appoint Afghanistan to the vacancy created in the Sub-Committee by the withdrawal of Cambodia.

102. That new development, which was an initiative of major consequence, should be welcome to the Special Committee. It held out a real hope for general agreement among all sectors of opinion in South Arabia, so that the Territory could advance towards full independence in an atmosphere of peaceful negotiation. Many problems, including the problem of timing, remained to be considered. The Federal Government had made it clear that the purpose of the conference was to reach agreement on a programme for the implementation of the United Nations resolutions. The Special Committee itself had long recognized that a conference would be needed as a first step; that had been made clear in paragraph 78 of the report of the Sub-Committee on Aden approved by the Committee in September 1965 (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. VI, appendix II).

103. The United Nations had advocated various stages in the solution of the difficulties facing South Arabia: a general conference attended by all the people of South Arabia who wished to participate; free elections to establish a representative body and a provisional government; and a United Nations presence before and during the elections. As a result of the initiative taken by the Federal Government, those three requirements could be accepted by everyone. Certainly, time would be needed to work out exactly how the programme should be executed and the conference would have a heavy task. The purposes, however, were clear. The United Kingdom Government welcomed the decision to convene a conference on the basis of the Federal Government's acceptance of the United Nations resolutions. So far as the constitutional aspects of the resolutions were concerned, the United Kingdom Government supported the provisions calling for elections to a representative organ and the establishment of a provisional government for the whole of South Arabia. The decision to withdraw from the base and to allow exiles to return removed other obstacles to the implementation of the resolutions. The recent developments, however, were of far-reaching consequence; they called for an effort on the part of all concerned to reach a full agreement which would lead to the happiness and freedom of the people concerned.

104. The representative of Iraq pointed out that the announcement by the federal Government, which was reproduced in paragraph 6 of the Secretary-General's report (see annex I), referred to "the unification of our beloved homeland" and described the foundation of the Federation and the accession to it of further States as vital and practical steps towards the establishment of one central Government. The Federal Government had endorsed the principles of self-determination and independence underlying the United Nations resolutions. The United Nations resolutions, however, referred not to the Federation nor the Federal Government but to three parties: the people of the Territory, the administering Power and the United Nations. So far as the United Nations was concerned, independence meant something very different from the existing Government. What mattered was whether the United Kingdom, as the administering Power of a Non-Self-Governing Territory, accepted the implementation of the United Nations resolutions.

105. The Federal Government had asked for a United Nations observer to attend the proposed conference. What the General Assembly wanted, however, was a United Nations presence in the Territory. Such a presence could be established by a visit to the Territory by the Sub-Committee on Aden before, during or after the discussions. The representative of the United Kingdom should say whether his Government would agree to such a visit.

106. Certain requirements had been mentioned by the United Kingdom representative. The only requirements were those laid down in the resolutions of the United Nations: the release of detainees, freedom of expression for the people and the removal of the military base. Those prerequisites should be fulfilled before the negotiations mentioned by the United Kingdom delegation could profitably be held.

107. The representative of the United Kingdom said that the position of the Federal Government had been made extremely clear; it had stated that it had decided to accept the United Nations resolutions relating to South Arabia. So far as the attitude of the United Kingdom Government was concerned, shortly after the announcement by the Federal Government it had made declarations which were of maximum importance and paved the way for the advance which all desired. In connexion with the question of United Nations participation, all hoped that the Organization would play an effective role in the difficult task of bringing a number of States to full independence in unity. The United Kingdom Government welcomed the fact that the Federal Government had proposed that a United Nations observer should be appointed at the initial stage. That in no way precluded the presence of United Nations observers during and after the elections or other arrangements to associate the United Nations with the advance of the Territory. The United Kingdom Government would welcome the presence of United Nations observers at the elections, in accordance with paragraph 9 of General Assembly resolution 1949 (XVIII). He looked forward to holding further consultations on that matter with the Secretary-General.

108. The representative of Iraq said that his delegation considered that the administering Power was the party concerned in the question, whereas the United Kingdom spoke always of the Federation and the Federal Government. There was no mention of the Federation or the Federal Government in any United Nations resolution. It was not for the United Kingdom Government to welcome the plans of the Federal Government; the United Kingdom itself was responsible.

109. The representative of Yugoslavia drew attention to the recommendations contained in paragraph 17 of the report of the Sub-Committee (see annex II), and expressed the hope that the Special Committee would find it possible to take a decision on the report at that same meeting.

110. The representative of Denmark commended the Sub-Committee on its work. The apparently complete lack of contact on the most vital issues between the parties concerned with the future of South Arabia had hitherto been the most serious obstacle to any real progress towards the creation of an independent State based on the principle of self-determination. His delegation therefore welcomed the announcement by the Government of the Federation of South Arabia that it accepted the United Nations resolutions concerning the Territory, in the hope that it might create a basis for the establishment of contacts between all concerned. With regard to the convening of a conference on the constitutional issues, his delegation supposed that what was envisaged was a truly representative conference in which all political factions of any significance would be represented.

111. His delegation supported the proposal that there should be a United Nations presence, in the form of a representative of the Secretary-General, from the very outset of the renewed efforts to build a unified, independent State. His delegation appreciated the fact that the United Kingdom supported the convening of the constitutional conference and the principle of a United Nations presence.

112. He hoped that the initiative now taken marked the end of the long-standing political stalemate in South Arabia. In that situation the efforts of all concerned, including the Special Committee, should be aimed at ensuring that the new initiative led to progress towards the creation of an independent State in South Arabia based on democratic principles and in accordance with the wishes of the entire population. With these considerations in mind, he would support the adoption of the Sub-Committee's report.

113. The representative of Iraq welcomed the report of the Sub-Committee on Aden. His own delegation's attitude to recent developments in the Territory remained unchanged. The so-called Government of the Federation of South Arabia did not exist as far as the United Nations was concerned. There were only three parties concerned in the implementation of the pertinent resolutions: the people of Aden, the United Nations and the administering Power. The Special Committee could not accept the administering Power's statement that the so-called Federal Government accepted the resolutions of the United Nations. The truth was that the United Kingdom was using the archaic tribal institutions of South Arabia to impede the development of Aden and to perpetuate its influence in the area. The United Kingdom Press itself had stated as much. The United Kingdom was the administering Power and it alone was responsible for carrying out the resolutions of the United Nations. There was only one question of importance: was the United Kingdom prepared to implement those resolutions?

114. The hollowness of the so-called Federal Government's claim to represent the people of the Territory was further revealed by cables received recently from the Front for the Liberation of Occupied South Yemen (FLOSY), members of the Aden Municipal Council, and others, calling for the liquidation of all institutions set up by the colonial Power, including the so-called Federal Government, and the immediate implementation of the United Nations resolutions.

115. The Sub-Committee had recommended that the United Kingdom Government should again be urged to make it possible for the Sub-Committee to visit the Territory, in accordance with its mandate. He would like to know whether the United Kingdom Government would now agree to that.

116. The Sub-Committee had also recommended that the Secretary-General should be asked to ascertain what action the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the specialized agencies and the international relief organizations proposed to take in response to the request in paragraph 12 of resolution 2023 (XX). According to the report of the Secretary-General (see annex I), the most that any of those organizations had so far done was to "take note" of the resolution. It was clear that something more was needed. For example, many of those who had suffered under the emergency measure were workers; the International Labour Organisation (ILO) should accordingly see to it that they received assistance. The matter could perhaps be raised at the forthcoming International Labour Conference.

117. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that the Iraqi representative was fully justified in once again questioning the willingness of the administering Power to implement the resolutions of the United Nations. Neither the United Kingdom Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs nor that country's representative in the Special Committee had clearly stated that the United Kingdom Government, as the administering Power, accepted those resolutions and was prepared to apply them without reservation to Aden and South Arabia as a whole. The United Kingdom representative had side-stepped the question at the previous meeting, taking refuge in the familiar formula that his Government would accept any solution of the constitutional problem which was capable of achieving a wide measure of agreement in the Territory. To conceal its true position with regard to Aden, the United Kingdom put forward the so-called Government of the Federation of South Arabia as representative of the people, inviting all other groups to endorse whatever it chose to do.

118. The United Kingdom representative had spoken at length of the so-called Federal Government but had said not a word about whether the administering Power accepted the resolutions of the United Nations, or intended to abolish the state of emergency, release the political detainees and thus establish the proper atmosphere in which the resolutions could be implemented. Instead, he had posed a series of conditions, among them the cessation of "terrorism". It was clear that those whom the United Kingdom accused of terrorism were none other than those fighting for the freedom and independence of their homeland. The conditions posed by the United Kingdom Government did not correspond to the resolutions of the United Nations, which constituted the only basis for a just solution. The United Kingdom representative should give a clear answer to the Iraqi representative's question whether his Government intended to implement those resolutions.

119. Since it was clear from recent developments that the administering Power was seeking to undermine the resolutions of the General Assembly on the question of Aden, the Special Committee must follow events in the Territory with redoubled vigilance. The report of the Sub-Committee on Aden reflected the views frequently expressed by the Special Committee and its recommendations should be approved at the present meeting as provisional measures pending more detailed consideration of the question in Africa.

120. His delegation attached particular importance to the recommendation that the Secretary-General should be requested to ascertain from the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the specialized agencies and the international relief organizations what action they proposed to take in response to the request made to them in paragraph 12 of resolution 2023 (XX). As yet, the Special Committee had received no information on what steps the specialized agencies intended to take to implement the resolution. It was inadmissible that the agencies should merely inform the Secretary-General that they had "taken note" of the resolutions.

121. The representative of Syria said that, not only had the administering Power not taken the steps outlined in paragraph 78 of the report submitted by the Sub-Committee on Aden in September 1965 (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. VI, appendix II), but the situation had actually deteriorated since that time. Recent statements by the administering Power showed that it was not implementing General Assembly resolution 2023 (XX), which had deplored its attitude. Nor was the so-called Federal Government following the wishes of the General Assembly. The United Kingdom had reached an understanding with that phantom Government and was strengthening its hold on the Territory behind the façade.

122. At the preceding meeting, the United Kingdom representative had said that there was a wide measure of agreement in South Arabia about future objectives; responsible former leaders of the Territory were, however, in exile or in prison and unable to express their views. In an emergency resolution adopted on 22 March 1966 (A/AC.109/153), the Special Committee had deplored the mass arrests of the Adeni people and called upon the administering Power to desist from those acts and cease all repressive action against the people of the Territory. The administering Power, however, was continuing its repressive actions aimed against the struggle of the people of the Territory, whose legitimacy had been recognized in paragraph 5 of the General Assembly resolution 2023 (XX). It was the administering Power that was responsible for the terrorism in the area. Because of the importance of the United Kingdom military base and the oil interests in the area, it was being claimed that there was an improvement in the situation.

123. The specialized agencies had an obligation to take steps to implement resolution 2023 (XX) and their failure to act was a cause for concern. The authority of the United Nations to enforce its resolutions was at stake. It was to be hoped that in time all the Powers concerned would implement the resolutions freely and not under duress.

124. The representative of the United States of America welcomed the acceptance by the Federal Government of the United Nations resolutions relating to South Arabia. The United States sympathized with the aspirations of the peoples of South Arabia for self-determination and independence. The recent announcement by the Federal Government showed that there was clear and steady movement in the right direction.

125. It was to be hoped that the United Nations would be able to play a valuable role in that movement. The proposed conference should lead to progress, and the request for a United Nations observer at the conference should be welcomed by all sides. In a spirit of moderation and compromise, all should unite their efforts to seek a basis for unity in South Arabia and advance towards national independence with the full support of the United Nations. The terrorism in the area was regrettable and its cessation was an essential step in the orderly movement towards independence, which should be accomplished in a spirit of harmony and goodwill and without violence. In the task of nation-building, it was important to have an atmosphere based on trust, confidence and stability. The United Nations should do everything possible to help create such an atmosphere.

126. The representative of Tunisia said that the resolutions of the United Nations were addressed primarily to the administering Power and not to the so-called Federal Government. Only the United Kingdom had the power to implement those resolutions and it could not be replaced by the Government of the Federation. His delegation supported the Sub-Committee's report and hoped that the United Kingdom would implement the resolutions of the United Nations and allow a visit to Aden. The Secretary-General should continue to take such action as he might deem expedient to ensure the implementation of resolution 2023 (XX) and arrange for an effective United Nations presence in Aden.

127. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that the recent announcement by the Federal Government, which the United Kingdom had hailed as an important initiative, was in fact a futile exercise. Only the United Kingdom Government had authority to speak on the question of Aden in the United Nations. That Government had made no clear statement on whether it accepted and was implementing the resolutions of the Organization. United Kingdom soldiers remained in Aden and the Front for the Liberation of Occupied South Yemen (FLOSY), which represented the people of the Territory, was still banned. The proposed constitutional conference would therefore not be fully representative. Mention had been made of certain prerequisites for progress; those prerequisites would not be fulfilled while repressive measures continued against the people of the Territory. His delegation agreed that a United Nations presence was needed; the United Kingdom should allow the Sub-Committee on Aden to visit the Territory.

128. The Sub-Committee had noted with concern the lack of response by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. He supported the Soviet Union proposal on that subject.

129. The report of the Sub-Committee, which should be endorsed by all those who wanted real progress in Aden, should be adopted as an interim measure.

130. The representative of Ethiopia said that the Special Committee should at once adopt the report of the Sub-Committee. The proposal of the Soviet Union representative was perhaps covered by the recommendation in paragraph 17, sub-paragraph (v), of the report.

131. The representative of Bulgaria endorsed the conclusions and recommendations of the Sub-Committee. The Federal Government's acceptance of the United Nations resolutions was of no significance, since those resolutions were addressed to the administering Power and opposed the existence of the Federation. It was odd that the United Kingdom Government should be expressing its views through the mouthpiece of a puppet Government of its own creation. The statement by the United Kingdom gave no clear answer to the question whether it was prepared to implement the relevant resolutions of the United Nations. Because of the dangerous events in Aden and the relevant response of the United Kingdom, the Special Committee should reiterate the relevant provisions of the United Nations resolutions and stress that the United Kingdom Government was responsible for their implementation and for leading the Territory to independence in accordance with the freely and democratically expressed wishes of the people.

132. It was not enough for the specialized agencies to note the appeals addressed to them; they should give a clear account of what they were doing in response to those appeals.

133. The representative of India supported the recommendations in paragraph 17 of the Sub-Committee's report, which should be adopted at once. The recommendation in sub-paragraph (v) was particularly important.

134. The representative of Australia said that there were three important factors in the situation under consideration: the oft-repeated intention of the United Kingdom to leave Aden and the base by 1968; the announcement by the Federal Government of its acceptance of the United Nations resolutions relating to South Arabia and the attitude of the United Kingdom towards that announcement. The situation, which was becoming less a colonial situation and more a question of adjusting differences between various Arab groups, should be approached warily.

135. New and hopeful signs had appeared in the still troubled situation. Progress should not be jeopardized by hasty and unconsidered action and the recent statements should be carefully weighed. His delegation was therefore not in a position to take a far-reaching decision on the question of Aden. With these reservations, it would support the adoption of the Sub-Committee's report.

136. The representative of Madagascar said that she could support the recommendations made in the report, which was a necessary complement to the report of the Secretary-General (annex I) and the statements made by the United Kingdom delegation.

137. The representative of Poland said that the report raised no controversial issues. The administering Power should have no doubt about the views of the Special Committee on the status of the Government of the Territory, where events were following a similar course to that followed in Southern Rhodesia. The only proper course was that outlined in the United Nations resolutions, which were addressed solely to the United Kingdom. There could be no progress towards independence in the Territory until the United Kingdom accepted its responsibilities and implemented the resolutions of the United Nations. The steps to be taken were enumerated in paragraph 17 of the Sub-Committee's report, which the Committee should adopt.

138. He supported the Soviet Union representative's remarks about the response of the specialized agencies.

139. The representative of the United Kingdom said that in commenting on the Sub-Committee's report (annex II), he would cover many of the points raised by previous speakers but would not seek to deal with their statements in detail. His delegation regretted the apparent inability of some speakers to rise to the opportunities provided by recent developments and their tendency to take refuge in old, discredited accusations which bore no relation to present realities and reflected their unwillingness to move with the times.

140. Some members of the Committee seemed to feel that the Federal Government's decision to accept the United Nations resolutions as a basis for a general settlement leading to independence was irrelevant and that the only matter of concern was whether the United Kingdom Government itself was prepared to accept and implement those resolutions. His Government was, of course, an important party to all the major discussions and decisions affecting South Arabia and, as the administering Power, it was responsible for such questions as the timing of independence and the way in which it should be achieved. It could not, however, take unilateral decisions and impose them on the whole of South Arabia. It was a basic principle of United Kingdom colonial policy, which was generally accepted in the United Nations, that the transfer of power was a gradual process; legal authority and real political power were first shared and then transferred and, by the time independence was near, the main decisions affecting the future of the territory concerned were in the hands of the local government and people. That was a basic feature of the principle of self-determination. Issues such as whether a particular government or group was or was not fully representative should not now arise since everyone agreed that the main decisions affecting South Arabia must be taken by all the parties, groups and governments in the country in a fully representative conference leading to nation-wide elections.

141. That was consistent not only with the principle of self-determination and United Kingdom policy, but also with the legal and constitutional position. The United Kingdom Government's direct authority in the South Arabian Protectorate outside Aden was limited to matters of defence, external affairs and public service. Consequently, in legal terms also, the decisions and intentions of the Federal Government, which wielded the real authority over many issues, were crucially important. Aden was part of the Federation and everyone in the Territory and in the United Nations agreed that Aden's future was bound up with the future of South Arabia. In any case, under the Federal Constitution many of the most important aspects of the administration of Aden, including internal security, were the responsibility of the Federal Government. Consequently, his delegation could not agree that implementation of the United Nations resolutions was a matter to be settled between the United Nations and the United Kingdom alone, or that (as the Sub-Committee's report asserted) the Federal Government had no standing in the matter. The Special Committee would remember the statement made at the 1535th meeting of the Fourth Committee on 22 October 1965 by the former representative of Iraq, who had said that those questions could not be decided from afar by the administering Power but must be decided locally on the basis of proper consultative procedures, and had called for the convening of a conference representing all shades of opinion in the territory.

142. The acceptance of the United Nations resolutions by virtually all shades of opinion in South Arabia called for action of various kinds by a number of different parties and authorities. The statements made on 16 May by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and by the United Kingdom Permanent Representative at the previous meeting (see paras. 101-103 above) had shown that his Government's attitude to those aspects of the resolutions was a wholly positive one. Such reservations as it had concerned the timing of implementation rather than the principle, but timing was an important factor and implementation in some respects inevitably depended on the cessation of terrorism and subversion, which were completely pointless and self-defeating.

143. The United Kingdom Permanent Representative had made it clear that his Government accepted any solution of the constitutional problem capable of achieving wide agreement in the Territory and favoured the United Nations recommendations for elections to a representative organ and the establishment of a provisional government for the whole of South Arabia. Other forms of practical acceptance of the United Nations resolutions by the United Kingdom Government were represented by its decisions concerning withdrawal from the base and the return of exiles. Furthermore, the United Kingdom had repeatedly expressed its readiness to implement the provisions relating to the emergency and the detainees as soon as there was satisfactory evidence of the end of terrorism. The United Kingdom welcomed the Federal Government's proposal that a United Nations observer should attend the conference, as also the proposal for a United Nations presence before and during the elections. Before the conference (which was to begin on 1 August) the United Kingdom Permanent Representative would confer with the Secretary-General to determine whether there were other ways in which he could take action to ensure the implementation of the General Assembly resolutions, as requested by the resolution itself.

144. The Federal Government's announcement represented a genuine effort to move forward on the lines advocated by the United Nations and as such should be welcomed. It was now important that all those in South Arabia with a genuine interest in a solution reached within the constitutional framework of the United Nations resolutions should consult together on how this should be achieved. The proposed conference was clearly designed to serve that purpose and his Government earnestly hoped that all parties concerned would take part in it.

145. With regard to the Sub-Committee's visit to Aden, that was a separate issue which if pressed at the present stage would not help in the smooth working out of the implications of the new situation created by the Federal Government's decision. The whole question of such a visit was in any case one aspect of the larger questions that would no doubt be considered at the proposed conference.

146. His delegation would raise no formal objection to the adoption of the Sub-Committee's report if that was the wish of the rest of the Special Committee. Since much of the report involved recommendations addressed to his Government on which he had no opportunity to seek instructions, he would transmit them to his Government if they were approved. Meanwhile, he must reserve his Government's position on the report.

147. The representative of Iraq, speaking in exercise of the right of reply, said that, in the statement to which the United Kingdom representative had referred, the Iraqi representative had indeed advocated the convening of a conference, but his delegation and the United Nations had intended that the conference should be organized, not by the Federal Government, but by the United Nations itself, with the United Kingdom assuming special responsibility as the administering Power.

148. The United Kingdom representative had said that the United Kingdom Government's direct authority in the South Arabian Protectorate outside Aden was limited to defence and external affairs and that the internal security of Aden itself was the responsibility of the Federal Government; that was inconsistent with his assertion that his Government would be willing to end the emergency and release detainees when satisfactory evidence was forthcoming that terrorism had ended.

149. The United Kingdom representative had said that independence must be achieved gradually. All opponents of colonialism knew what that formula really meant; moreover, in resolution 2023 (XX) the General Assembly had urged the United Kingdom to take certain important steps "immediately". The Australian representative had said that the problem was basically one of adjusting differences between various Arab groups, but in fact all Arabs agreed that independence must be achieved immediately, and not in 1968. He welcomed the United Kingdom representative's remarks concerning the Permanent Representative's consultations with the Secretary-General and concerning the United Nations presence at the conference and before and during the elections, but the United Kingdom delegation should not forget that the Special Committee and the Sub-Committee on Aden also had a role to play. He supported the USSR and Ethiopian proposals.

150. The representative of Iran reaffirmed that in his delegation's view the administering Power should take the steps called for in General Assembly resolutions 1949 (XVIII) and 2023 (XX), with a view to the holding of elections leading to the establishment of a truly representative government which would enjoy the confidence and support of all the peoples of the Territory. He would support the adoption of the Sub-Committee's report on the understanding that the substantive issues would be fully discussed at a subsequent meeting.

151. The representative of the United States of America did not oppose adoption of the report which had just been received but expressed his delegation's reservation.

152. The representative of Italy said that his delegation had not had time to study the report, but would support its adoption on the understanding that it reserved the right to comment on it at the appropriate time. He agreed with the Danish representative that the latest developments in Aden, especially the acceptance of a United Nations presence and the convening of a constitutional conference, augured well for the future.

153. The Special Committee decided without objection to approve the report of the Sub-Committee (annex II) and endorsed the recommendations appearing in paragraph 17 thereof, on the understanding that the reservations expressed by members would appear in the record of the meeting.

E. CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Introduction

154. The Special Committee considered the question of Aden at its 431st, 436th and 441st to 447th meetings held in Africa between 3 and 15 June 1966.

155. In accordance with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 2023 (XX), the Secretary-General submitted a further report to the Special Committee on the question of Aden, on 9 June 1966 (see annex III). The Special Committee had also before it a letter dated 17 May 1966 from the Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland transmitting the text of a statement on South Arabia made by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in the House of Commons (see annex IV).

156. At its 441st meeting, held in Cairo, the Special Committee received a letter dated 11 June 1966 from the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of the United Arab Republic (A/AC.109/181) in which he asked to participate in the discussions of the Committee on Aden and South Arabia. The Special Committee decided without objection to accede to that request. The discussions on this item in Cairo were also attended by Mr. Omar A. H. Adeel, special representative of the Secretary-General on the question of Aden (see annex III).

Written petitions and hearings

157. The Special Committee had before it the following written petitions concerning Aden:

Petitioner	Document No.
Nineteen Arab students at the University of Oklahoma	A/AC.109/PET.426
Nine Aden "Ministers of Government suspended by British authorities"	A/AC.109/PET.443
Mr. Hasson I. K. Khan and others	A/AC.109/PET/443/Add.1
"Ex-Ministers and Legislative Council Members" ...	A/AC.109/PET.443/Add.2
Managing Committee of the Civil Service Association of South Arabia	A/AC.109/PET.444
Graduates Congress	A/AC.109/PET.445
Mr. A. M. Nasser, President, Aden Graduates Congress	A/AC.109/PET.445/Add.1
Mr. Mohamed Awad Bin Ladin and others "on behalf of the sons of people of Hadramout residing in Saudi Arabia"	A/AC.109/PET.454
Mr. Faisal El-Haji, President, National Union of Kuwaiti Students	A/AC.109/PET.466
"Families of Detainees"	A/AC.109/PET.467
The Students Union, Aden	A/AC.109/PET.468
Mr. Abdul Qawi Mackawee, General Secretary, Front for the Liberation of Occupied South Yemen (FLOSY)	A/AC.109/PET.469 and Add.1
President and members of Aden Municipal Council..	A/AC.109/PET.470
Two petitions from the Occupied South Arabian Community in Somalia	A/AC.109/PET.478
South Arabian League (SAL)	A/AC.109/PET.480
Mr. Muhammed Ali Al-Gifri, President, South Arabian League (SAL)	A/AC.109/PET.480/Add.1
"Sons of the Arab South at Giamama", Somalia	A/AC.109/PET.482
Mr. O. A. Barnahsoon, Secretary, South Arabian Students Organization (SASO)	A/AC.109/PET.486
Mr. Mohamed Almed Nesf El-Leil, Vice-President, Bihan Youth	A/AC.109/PET.487
Mr. Hussein Omar Ben Sahl, President, South Arabia Youth Organization	A/AC.109/PET.488
Mr. Elwi Omar Ahmed, Representative of the Youth of Dathina in South Arabia	A/AC.109/PET.489
Mr. Ahmed Abdel Hamid on behalf of the Youth Club of the Sultanate of Lahej in South Arabia ..	A/AC.109/PET.490
Mr. Abu Bakr Mohamed Farid Al-Aulaqi, Secretary, Al Awaleq Youth Union in Cairo	A/AC.109/PET.491
Mr. Abdel Wahab Wali, representative of the Sub-beiha Association	A/AC.109/PET.492
Mr. El Sayed Ali Mohamed El Saqqaf, President, Arab Arts Association	A/AC.109/PET.493

Petitioner	Document No.
Mr. Abdullah Abd Rabbo Al-Aulaqi, representative of the Sons of South Arabia in Kuwait	A/AC.109/PET.494
Mr. Awad Abdulla Arashani on behalf of the Southern Yemen Students in Cairo	A/AC.109/PET.496
Mr. Mohamed Abdullah Ogeil, President, Salvation Organization in Aden	A/AC.109/PET.497
Mr. Said Bin Issa Al-Amoudi, representative of the Sons of the Arab South in Hyderabad, India	A/AC.109/PET.498
Mr. Ali A. R. Aswadi, Vice-President, Aden Trades Union Congress (ATUC)	A/AC.109/PET.499
Mr. Abdulla Bakerman, representative of the Arab Socialist Party of Hadramout	A/AC.109/PET.504
Graduates Congress, the Association of Arab Women, the Arab Merchants and the Arab Pioneers Organization	A/AC.109/PET.505
Students League, Belgrade	A/AC.109/PET.506
Movement of Socialist Pioneers	A/AC.109/PET.507
Association of Arab Women	A/AC.109/PET.508

158. The Special Committee heard the following petitioners concerning Aden:

Petitioner	Meeting
Mr. Yislam S. Naashir of the Occupied South Arabian Community in Somalia, accompanied by Mr. Addaini, Mr. Alyafa, Mr. Bamakhramah and Mr. Bin-Gidnan	431st
Mr. Mohamed S. Bawazir of the South Arabian League (SAL), accompanied by Mr. Jamil Y. Abdul-Galil	436th
Mr. Abdul Qawi Mackawee, General Secretary, Front for the Liberation of Occupied South Yemen (FLOSY), accompanied by Mr. Salami, Mr. Magli and Mr. Urregi	441st and 442nd
Mr. Muhammed Ali Al-Gifri, President, South Arabian League (SAL)	442nd and 443rd
Mr. Ali A. R. Aswadi, Vice-President, Aden Trades Union Congress (ATUC)	444th
Mr. Abdullah A. R. Al-Aulaqi, representative of the South Arabian Community in Kuwait	444th
Mr. Mohamed A. Ogeil, President, Salvation Organization in the South of Yemen and Aden Protectorate	444th
Mr. Hussein Omar Ben Sahl, President, South Arabia Youth Organization	444th

159. Mr. Naashir said that the Occupied South Arabian Community in Somalia (OSACS), numbering some 25,000 persons, were determined to continue their struggle, by all means, for the sake of the freedom and independence of their country. They were convinced of their right to live a free and honourable life shaped by themselves, to collaborate with their brothers still under the yoke of British imperialism in South Arabia, and to adhere to the lofty principles embodied in the United Nations Charter.

160. In accordance with those objectives, the Community had adopted a resolution on 27 May 1966. That resolution merited favourable consideration, as it concerned the destiny of a whole people, and a problem whose solution would render a great service to the promotion of peace, security and stability in South Arabia.

161. The resolution declared the Community's adherence to General Assembly resolution 2023 (XX) of 5 November 1965 concerning occupied South Arabia, and appealed to all free Member States to take the necessary measures to implement it; emphasized the imperative need for immediate evacuation of the British forces in Aden base and the complete expulsion of the imperialists from South Arabia; strongly rejected the constitutional proposals presented by the British authorities and opposed the idea of a South Arabian Republic based on them; condemned the imperialistic attempts to disintegrate their homeland by severing the Eastern Protectorates (Qu'aiti, Kathiri and Mahra) from South Arabia and confirmed that they were people belonging to an indivisible nation; denounced imperialistic attempts to terrorize the inhabitants of the Eastern Protectorates by disbanding the nomadic army; appealed to world conscience to do its best to remove political suppression and military terrorism prevalent in occupied South Arabia and to thwart the imperialistic plans to maintain that zone under British domination; declared that there was only one front representing all South Arabian citizens, namely the Occupied South Arabian Liberation Front, which had won the confidence and absolute support of those citizens, and declared that any agreement concluded with any other political body was invalid; confirmed their determination not to recognize any agreement concluded between the governing authorities in the zone and the British authorities, or between either side and alleged dignitaries of the country or so-called chiefs of tribes; strongly opposed any political talks between the heads of nomads or the chiefs of tribes and any reactionary government or opportunists; demanded the right of self-determination; and fully supported the Somali Republic in its just demands for the return of the occupied Territories, and for the right of self-determination of its people who were under foreign rule.

162. In reply to questions, he said that although the Government of the Federation had declared its acceptance of the United Nations resolutions on South Arabia, nothing had been done to implement them, in spite of the wishes of the people of the country. Political repression existed all over South Arabia but in Aden the population was particularly exposed to danger from the United Kingdom authorities since the town was directly governed by that country. The freedom fighters operated mainly in the mountains.

163. The Aden base was used not only against the people of Aden but also to terrorize other neighbouring Arab countries. In accordance with the principle of "divide and rule", the administering Power was trying to disrupt the unity of the South Arabian people in order to prevent them from attaining their just rights. Citizens of the Territory were forbidden to visit certain areas, where it was believed that bases were being established. In order to stay as long as possible the administering Power was trying to strengthen the position of the puppets of imperialism so as to make them appear as the real rulers of the country.

164. There was only one South Arabian liberation front, representing all the people of the Territory, in which that people had placed its confidence. That was his own party. All parties had combined in the Occupied South Arabian Community in Somalia.

165. Mr. Bawazir said that the South Arabian League (SAL), the leading political party in South Arabia, wished to record its gratitude to the United Nations and its Special Committee for their interest and efforts, as well as to the Government and people of Ethiopia for their hospitality.

166. The representatives of SAL had already presented their views on the situation in South Arabia to the Special Committee and to the General Assembly, both of which had adopted a number of resolutions calling for the independence and complete unity of South Arabia and for the transfer of power to the people of that Territory through a freely elected and representative assembly. It was to be regretted that, despite the resolution adopted by the General Assembly on South Arabia on 5 November 1965, the situation in that Territory remained unchanged. The United Kingdom Government—which alone was empowered to implement the resolution under United Nations supervision—had failed to do so, although the resolution had received general acceptance from all other parties concerned. The Federal Government had issued invitations for a conference to be held in August 1966 to study ways of implementing the resolution. However, the United Nations had requested the United Kingdom Government, and not the Federal Government, to implement that resolution. In the name of the South Arabian people, he therefore demanded that the United Kingdom Government accept and implement the terms of the resolution and requested that the United Nations should exercise continuous pressure on the United Kingdom Government to that end. Delay would only result in a bloody conflict, the victims of which would be the South Arabian people. That situation would in turn affect the peace of the world, and the United Nations would be faced with another crisis which might well require the Security Council's intervention.

167. The state of emergency, imposed in South Arabia on 10 December 1963, still existed. The prisons were full of political detainees and thousands of South Arabians were in exile. Aden, many sections of which had been made restricted areas, had been turned into a military camp for the British Army. South Arabians were living in a state of war, and there was no trace of either democracy or freedom. The United Kingdom had done nothing to create truly representative institutions or to lead South Arabia towards independence. It had kept South Arabia divided, on every plane. For example, the South Arabian army was weak and divided under separate commands. The United Kingdom, as the ruling authority, had even refused to allow qualified military graduates from colleges in Arab countries to serve in it.

168. Expressing the view that a United Nations presence would be essential in South Arabia, both before and during elections, he appealed to the Special Committee to maintain its support for the people of South Arabia in their quest for unity and independence.

169. In reply to questions, he stated that both his party and the Front stood for the same aims and sought the implementation of General Assembly resolution 2023 (XX). All the groups concerned in South Arabia stood for independence.

170. There was unemployment throughout South Arabia. There was mass unemployment in the hinterland of the Protectorates, and a few thousand were jobless in Aden owing to the lack of factories and commercial firms. Although the United Kingdom had held Aden for 125 years, it had not built up a network of schools and colleges to provide graduates for the civil service. Aden would look forward to United Nations help.

171. Since 10 December 1963 British troops had been carrying out arrests and checks among the local population and interning people in prison camps. There had also been air raids on the Amirate of Dhala.

172. Mr. Bawazir affirmed that practically the whole population of the Protectorates consisted either of members or of supporters of SAL. In Aden there were over 20,000 members, most of whom were government employees unable to engage in political activities under the present regulations.

173. The Federal Government had been imposed in 1959 and was unpopular. However, the Federal Government had accepted the United Nations resolutions. The United Kingdom should announce its acceptance of the resolutions first, since it was more directly concerned than the Federal Government. His organization considered the United Kingdom Government to be responsible for the South Arabian problem. The Federal Government, which represented only one quarter of the Territory, had sent out invitations to attend a conference starting on 1 August 1966, but it had ignored three quarters of the Territory. Qu'aiti State and the Mahra Sultanate had maintained that the United Kingdom was the only party concerned with the United Nations resolutions and that if the United Kingdom sent them invitations they would send representatives to the conference.

174. Mr. Mackawee, speaking on behalf of the Front for the Liberation of Occupied South Yemen (FLOSY), expressed appreciation of all efforts undertaken by the Special Committee to assist the people struggling for their liberty in South Arabia, in Aden, in the Eastern and Western Protectorates and in the islands of Perim, Kuria Muria, Kamaran and other coastal islands. The geographical boundaries of the Territory, as defined under the United Nations resolution of November 1965, had been of concern to the United Nations since 1952.

175. His people's struggle against foreign domination and against the puppet government backed by the United Kingdom Government in collusion with the sultans and sheikhs, known as the Federation of South Arabia, had the support of local inhabitants, and had forced the régime in power to alter its tactics. FLOSY represented the people of the area, and therefore sought to draw the Special Committee's attention to developments in their situation which had recurred after the adoption of the United Nations resolutions.

176. Emergency rules had been in effect since 10 December 1963, and had been marked by detentions, searches and pillaging. United Kingdom army forces had surrounded whole districts more than ten times in the past year, and had imprisoned people for as long as three months without a trial. Air raids and bombings had left 130,000 women, children and aged men homeless. The children of Rafdan, Dhala, Yafei and Haushabi were deprived of education and medical care. Proof of that tragic situation had been furnished by an eyewitness report after the visit of Algerian, Jordanian and Arab Red Crescent workers.

177. Repressive laws, such as the Industrial Relations Law of 1960, were still in effect, and penalties had been doubled, with dire effects on workers and students. Newspapers had been threatened with the withdrawal of their licences if they published articles showing the sultans or the Federation in an unfavourable light.

178. The National Liberation Front (NLF), the Organization for the Liberation of the Occupied South (OLOS) and many independents, united under the banner of the National Liberation Front with the support of the Arab League, appealed to the Special Committee to take note of the administering Power's incomplete application of the United Nations resolutions, and to use forceful means to procure their implementation. The United Kingdom had only promoted the Federation's acceptance of the resolutions after pressure had been created by the escalation of nationalist activities, after moves had been made by FLOSY to set up a provisional nationalist government, and after widespread support had become known. The Federation's acceptance had been rejected by the Special Committee on the grounds that the United Kingdom was responsible for implementing the United Nations resolutions. In 1965, FLOSY announced its support of all United Nations resolutions and requested that they should be implemented immediately. Evidence to justify that request had been provided by Mr. Harold Wilson before he had become the United Kingdom Prime Minister, by the representative of the Soviet Union (A/AC.109/SR.333), and by the representative of the United Kingdom (A/AC.109/SR.335). The United Kingdom had not announced its unconditional acceptance of the United Nations resolutions, and had not empowered the Special Committee to choose the best measures for implementing them, but had rather insisted upon conducting negotiations with the puppet Federal Government, which was a means of by-passing the resolutions. The sultans who expressed their adherence to the resolutions thereby manifested their alignment with the administering Power, which sought recognition for them as a de facto government.

179. The Minister for Information and Education in the so-called Federal Government had stated in Beirut on his way to London to attend the conference there that he would not discuss any matters concerning defence. On his arrival, however, he had said that he was authorized to state that the true attitude of the Federal Government was that expressed in a letter from Sultan Saleh to Lord Beswick. He read out some extracts from that letter, in which it was stated that it had been agreed that the United Kingdom Government would assist the Federation in its defence. It went on to request that as soon as practicable the United Kingdom Government should convene a conference to fix a date for independence and conclude a defence agreement under which the United Kingdom would retain its military base in Aden.

180. FLOSY urged that the United Kingdom should declare its full adherence to the United Nations resolutions and start implementing them, and that the emergency laws should be cancelled, political detainees released and exiles allowed to return; that the United Kingdom should begin immediate negotiations with the Liberation Front and plan to hold elections under United Nations supervision in the whole area on the basis of direct universal suffrage, in order to form a truly representative provisional government; and that the United Kingdom should negotiate with the forthcoming provisional government and parliament on the eve of their formation in order to surrender its powers to the people.

181. FLOSY requested the Special Committee to condemn the London talks as unfaithful to the will of the people and to the provisions of the United Nations resolutions; to oppose any meeting such as the August 1966 conference which the United Kingdom and the Federal Government aimed to convene under the cover of the United Nations resolutions; to emphasize its condemnation of the existing Constitution which had been imposed in 1959 against the will of the people, and which had been rendered invalid by last November's resolution calling for the abolition of any institutions running counter to the people's free will; to condemn the draft constitution prepared by United Kingdom experts Bell and Hone, whereas the independence constitution should be drawn by true representatives of the people. In that connexion, the speaker referred to the speech of the representative of Iraq before the Fourth Committee at its 1535th meeting on 22 October 1965, and to the United Kingdom experts' report, which stated (in paragraph 18 of the Arabic text) that the existing Constitution did not provide for a representative government. The Liberation Front pledged its respect for and continued adherence to the United Nations resolutions, and considered their application and implementation to be a sound basis for safeguarding the real interests of the people of Aden. It further requested the Special Committee to release a provisional statement condemning the London talks, the proposed August conference, the existing Constitution and the British constitutional proposals.

182. In reply to questions, Mr. Mackawee stated that only 400 out of 1,200 eligible students in Aden had been enrolled in secondary schools in 1965. Medical facilities were confined to one government hospital in Aden State, which was inadequate for the needs of the whole community. Physicians from other Arab countries had been refused entry permits, for no understandable reason. In the hinterland disease was rampant, and many deaths could be attributed to the lack of proper care. Over 50,000 British military personnel occupied 50 per cent of the area's arable land, without paying for it, and the country's loss was the United Kingdom's gain. The expenditures which might have contributed to Aden's economy went into imported products, depriving local tradesmen of possible profits. The administering Power had not developed local industry or commerce during its 150 years of occupation: the area's natural mineral wealth and harbour facilities had not been exploited for the benefit of the population.

183. He requested that a United Nations mission, not just an observer, be sent immediately to Aden to ensure the implementation of the United Nations resolutions before, during and after popular elections. If a conference was held, it should make preparations for the elections and not merely seek ways and means of implementing the resolutions of the Special Committee or of the United Nations.

184. The acceptance by the Federal Government of the United Nations resolution of 5 November 1965 was in fact a mere dilution of it. There were three parties to the question: the people, represented by the Front for the Liberation of Occupied South Yemen (FLOSY), the United Nations, and the United Kingdom Government as the administering Power. The present so-called Government represented nobody but itself, having no mandate from the people to speak on their behalf. The idea of an observer representing the Secretary-General would be a complete violation of the United Nations resolution, which called clearly for a United Nations mission in the area. He did not see the need for a conference at the present stage, though it might arise later when the administering Power had fully accepted the United Nations resolution, discontinued its repressive actions and released all political detainees. The settling of constitutional questions and the handing over of sovereignty to the people could not be done until after the holding of elections under the supervision of the United Nations mission. The question of studying ways and means of implementing the United Nations resolution was not a matter for the Federal Government but for discussion between the United Nations and the real representatives of the people.

185. The United Kingdom Government, by favouring a conference, wanted to make sure that their friends, with whom they shared mutual interests, entered office. To that end, the participants in the conference had already been "bought" by the United Kingdom Government. It further wished the conference to sanction the constitutional proposals made by the two United Kingdom experts. If that was done, elections would only be held in the State of Aden and not in the hinterland, where indirect elections, through the tribal chiefs, would be held. The result would be that approximately two thirds of those elected would be sultans representing the interests of the United Kingdom Government. Furthermore, a sultan would be appointed as Head of the Republic and would have the right to appoint a Prime Minister of his choice. However, such a conference, even if imposed by the United Kingdom Government, would never meet with success. If sovereignty was transferred to the sultans in the area, there would be much bloodshed. The aim of the nationalist forces in the period 1966-1968 was to dissolve the existing Federal Government, in accordance with the provisions of the United Nations resolution adopted in November 1965. Thereafter, an interim government would be appointed with the approval of the people, until the United Nations mission entered the area and elections were held. The United Kingdom Government's intention was, of course, to guarantee its own interests and those of its traditional friends.

186. The situation had deteriorated since the United Nations resolution of 5 November 1965. About 150,000 United Kingdom troops were scattered all over the country, terrorizing the people, arresting them without reason in the middle of the night, using pressure of all kinds, and in general, creating chaos. The provocations had widened the gap between the United Kingdom and the people of the Territory. The situation could hardly improve unless the General Assembly or, even better, the Security Council, took steps to implement their resolutions. In the State of Aden alone, 159 people had been arrested since 27 August 1964. In the whole area, however, thousands had been detained. In that connexion, he would place at the Special Committee's disposal two documents referring, respectively, to the people concerned and to the treatment meted out to them during their detention.⁷ The number of refugees on the borders between occupied South Arabia and Yemen amounted to 50,000, all of whom were assisted by FLOSY, with the material and financial aid of the United Arab Republic. Assistance was also being sought from other Arab countries and would undoubtedly be forthcoming in the near future.

187. The Industrial Ordinance was still in force and the United Kingdom had so far refused to abolish it. That Ordinance deprived workers of the right to strike, and also of the right to free negotiation with employers. The United Kingdom was attempting to set up splinter movements so as to bring about dissension in the labour movement.

188. Before elections could be held in the Territory, the present puppet régimes must be dissolved. The United Kingdom would then have to accept the United Nations resolutions freely and unconditionally. In that connexion, he drew attention to a statement by the so-called Minister of External Affairs on 14 May, announcing that he and his colleagues would continue in office and would not give up their positions until a fully elected central government came into power. That statement was in flagrant violation of the United Nations resolutions. The Front could not agree to elections taking place under an unrepresentative government. In the past, people had been made to vote under duress and inducements to vote had been offered by United Kingdom officials. The Front insisted that any elections should be carried out under the supervision of the United Nations, not of a representative of the Secretariat, but of a mission from the Special Committee.

189. The question of a truce between the nationalists and the United Kingdom did not arise at that juncture. The people of South Arabia were fighting in self-defence and any advice on ceasing terrorism should therefore be addressed to the United Kingdom; the people of South Arabia could hardly be expected not to defend themselves. If the United Kingdom was serious in its desire to reach an amicable solution, the Front would be very willing to co-operate, but for the time being the ill intentions of the United Kingdom were manifest. The struggle of the people could not end until the people's aspirations were fulfilled. The Front desired a peaceful solution, but nothing could be done until the United Kingdom implemented the resolutions of the United Nations.

⁷ The above documents have been placed in the files of the Secretariat and are available to members on request.

190. The Federal Government was a complete farce. The Eastern Protectorate had preferred to remain outside the Federation, had refused to attend a Conference called by the Federal Government to be held in August 1966 and had sent a letter saying that they considered it to be unrepresentative. The United Kingdom Government was interested in oil and wished to maintain its interests after independence, and was therefore trying to keep the various parts of the Territory where oil was found outside the Federation. The United Kingdom also wished to keep Aden apart from the rest of the Federation. It might be forced to give independence to Aden, thus splitting the Territory into three, whereas the Front considered it should be unified.

191. The Liberation Front refused compromise solutions. The United Kingdom Government knew that the Front had certain socialist trends which were unacceptable to it, that the Front was progressive, that it would only negotiate on equal terms, and unconditionally, and that it would not accept any future political economic treaties with the United Kingdom. The Front wished for genuine independence and not false independence such as the kind the United Kingdom Government was trying to impose. The Front would continue its fight, and believed the United Nations would help it, because its cause was just.

192. With reference to operative paragraph 12 of resolution 2023 (XX), no assistance had been given by international agencies to the victims of British assaults in the area. It was necessary to have a report submitted in order to know of any progress in the matter, which was so urgent that there should be a resolution including a request for immediate action. He regretted to say that the United Nations shared responsibility for the situation, but was sure that his words would be taken in the right spirit.

193. As to the meaning of "effective presence" of the United Nations in the Territory, he was sure that the Special Committee would help to decide on the details, but the United Nations resolutions called for an effective presence before, during and after the formation of a provisional government. The Federal Government should be abolished before any serious discussion of effective presence. United Nations representatives should effectively take part in all significant occurrences through a transitional period to complete independence in order to obviate any manoeuvres by the United Kingdom Government. Observers alone would not suffice; only an effective presence could foster the free and favourable climate.

194. Mr. Al-Gifri, speaking on behalf of the South Arabian League (SAL), welcomed the Special Committee as a body in which oppressed peoples could voice their grievances and relate the story of colonialism in their lands. Those peoples had found in the Committee and in the United Nations General Assembly international support for their just struggle.

195. The historic Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples had been a turning point in the struggle to eliminate the effects of colonialism and build a better world in which mankind might enjoy freedom, equality, stability and prosperity.

196. It was a source of gratification to him to address the Special Committee again, having done so in Cairo in 1963 and 1964. The Secretary-General of SAL had also addressed the Committee in New York at its session of April-May 1963 and had explained the cause of the Arab South, the true objectives of its people and the history of the liberation struggle of all sectors of the population. The petitioner had also headed the SAL delegation when the case of the Arabian South had been debated during the 1965 session of the General Assembly; and one of his colleagues, Shaikhan Alhabshi, had spoken on behalf of the League before the Fourth Committee, together with representatives of other nationalist movements in the Arab South. At that session the latest resolutions on the Arab South had been adopted by the Fourth Committee, on 3 November 1965, and by the General Assembly with an overwhelming majority, on 5 November 1965.

197. The people of the Arab South were grateful to the Special Committee and the Sub-Committee entrusted with studying the case. The Sub-Committee had presented the case ably and clarified a number of vague points. Its reports, recommendations and suggestions submitted to the Committee had left nothing to be desired from the standpoints of accuracy and sound judgement.

198. The South Arabian League had found great satisfaction in being the first body in that part of the world to have recognized the importance of the United Nations. It had continued its contacts and sent delegations to the United Nations Headquarters since 1959. Moreover, the memorandum submitted to the Special Committee in May 1962 had been the first to be prepared on the case. The League was also gratified that the relevant resolutions adopted by the Committee and the General Assembly had been in perfect accord with the demands of the League.

199. The resolutions adopted by the United Nations approved the aspirations of the South Arabian people to independence, territorial integrity, the transfer of sovereignty and government to the people, and the evacuation of the British base in Aden; and they included a series of steps to be taken to ensure attainment of those objectives.

200. The United Kingdom had adopted a number of measures which the League welcomed as conducive to a satisfactory solution to the problem of the Arab South. Those steps had been the declaration of its intention to grant independence to the Arab South by 1968; annulment of the previous decisions to deport South Arabian nationals; and its declared agreement to the full evacuation of the British military base and the immediate withdrawal of British forces on the proclamation of independence.

201. The people of the Arab South had insisted upon the latter step, since maintenance of the base would prove a stumbling block in the way of an acceptable settlement. However, the United Kingdom had adopted a vague attitude towards the two essential aims of the liberation struggle.

202. The first of those aims was the territorial integrity of the Arab South with full guarantees against any possibility of dismemberment or partition. The Arab South should therefore consist of Aden, the Eastern and Western Protectorates, and the islands. At present, however, the Arab South was divided into five zones, and the League suspected that the United Kingdom had a hand in the attempts being made in some zones to obstruct South Arabian unification. If the United Kingdom Government had nothing to do with those developments, there remained the undeniable fact that some British officers with direct influence in the area were engaged in activities clearly aimed at obstructing the cherished unity of the Arab South. As long as its actual goal was not dismemberment, the United Kingdom Government should act in such a manner as to dispel any fears that it might be relinquishing moral and international obligations with regard to the unification of the Arab South. The League was afraid that the United Kingdom Government might be aiming to establish a federation of the South Arabian regions in order to maintain the sultanates and sheikhdoms, or a federation consisting of three member states—Aden, the Western Protectorate and the Eastern Protectorate.

203. The second of those aims was that the people should gain sovereignty and the right to hold the reigns of government. The United Nations resolutions had laid down the necessary measures to be taken to attain that. However, the United Kingdom was holding fast to what it called the traditional powers or methods concerning elections, which lent weight to the view that the real objective of the administering Power was to aid its supporters and allies in the Arab South in order to ensure control over the government and the destiny of the country.

204. The United Kingdom's attitude towards those two principal aims was suspicious; and its delay over approving United Nations resolutions was due to its reserve regarding those two important points, as well as its hesitation over the proclamation of full public liberties. The League was inspired with the unshakable faith that the only satisfactory solution in the interests of the South Arabian people was adherence by the United Kingdom to the United Nations resolutions. While considerable progress towards a solution had been made over the previous six months, the decisive factor remained, the question of whether or not the United Kingdom would recognize the United Nations resolutions and its obligation to put them into effect.

205. In March 1965 the petitioner had visited Yemen, which was the centre of the principal commands and sectors of the armed struggle in the Arab South, and a series of small conferences had been held in which those commands had taken part.

206. The outcome of the conferences had been that a popular and democratic basis. There was also unanimous support for the South Arabian League with regard to its political objectives and its plans for bringing the national struggle to a successful issue. The League's political aim was the establishment of a liberated and united South Arabian Republic on a popular and democratic basis. There was also unanimous support for the United Nations resolutions.

207. The commands engaged in the struggle in Rolfan, Dhala, Subbeilha, Upper Yafai and the Sheikdom of Muflahi and Dathina had joined the League and proclaimed their decision in a statement to the Press. It was also noteworthy that the armed commands in Upper Aulaqi, Lower Aulaqi and Lahej had previously joined the League, while large groups of volunteers had joined in May 1965 from the regions of Dathina, Wahidi and Eastern Radfan. To that could be added the armed command, in the Sultanates of Fadhli and Audhali. It could be said that all the main political and armed commands engaged in the struggle in the Western Protectorate had proclaimed their allegiance to the League.

208. The main item on the agenda of the Asmara conference, which had been attended by most of the organizations invited, had been the cause of the Arab South with reference to the measures to be taken to enable it to attain independence. The conference had also discussed the transition period and had resolved to recognize the United Nations resolutions. The Asmara conference had marked a new and constructive stage in the struggle of the South Arabian people.

209. In March 1965 the representatives of the Government of the South Arabian Federation had consulted with the leaders of the League Party and those of the Front in the border area between the sultanate of Lahej and the Republic of Yemen, the purpose of the Federation Government having been to gain the consent of the League and the Front to the principle of informal meetings in Beirut. The representatives of the League Party and of the Front had agreed to the proposal, but the Front had gone back on its agreement shortly before the date fixed for the conference.

210. The League Party had been in favour of holding such talks for a number of reasons:

(a) The League Party had invariably pursued a positive policy and attacked any negative attitude.

(b) The League Party considered the struggle not as an end in itself but rather as a means of achieving the objectives for which the struggle had been undertaken.

(c) Although the so-called South Arabian Federation consisted of people whose self-attributed status the League did not recognize, it nevertheless represented tribal elements that could not be completely ignored in the quest for a solution to the South Arabian problem.

(d) The task of the League, which was in the vanguard of the people's struggle and was seeking every possible way in which it might succeed in convincing those who had gone astray, or had been misled by others, should induce it to adopt a positive attitude so that, even if it failed to win them all over to its side, it might at any rate convince some of them of the validity of its standpoint.

(e) The League Party, while consenting to hold talks with the so-called South Arabian Federation, had declared in several statements that its consent did not imply recognition, since at that stage the talks were of an informal nature, and also since the United Kingdom, and not the Federation, represented the real force opposed to the nationalist movement in the region.

211. The meetings had continued for a few days with extremely satisfactory results, and agreement had been reached between the League Party and two representatives of the Liberation Front over the need to insist upon full implementation of the United Nations resolutions. At the same time the two Parties had agreed to the principle of further meetings after consultation with the organizations they represented. The League was then able to induce the Government of the South Arabian Federation to declare its agreement to the United Nations resolutions adopted on 5 November 1965, and a statement to that effect was issued on 12 May 1966.

212. At the second Beirut talks the League had warmly welcomed the agreement of the Federal Government to recognize the United Nations resolutions. The only section of South Arabian nationals to oppose them had been the members of the South Arabian Federation Government. With their subsequent agreement, unanimity had been reached and the way to a satisfactory solution was open. The League naturally attached no importance to intentions or motives, but rather to legal rights and to opinions publicly expressed, which were therefore binding.

213. Further meetings and consultations had taken place, and the representatives of the South Arabian Federation had given their formal agreement to a number of points:

(a) The decision taken by the Federation Government corresponded to the unanimous wishes of all sectors of the South Arabian population.

(b) Every effort should be made by all parties to impose upon the United Kingdom its obligation to recognize and implement the United Nations resolutions.

(c) What was said about any vacuum likely to result from the British evacuation of the region was completely groundless, since any such vacuum would be filled by the people of the Arab South themselves.

(d) The matter of signing a defence pact with the United Kingdom did not fall within the jurisdiction of the Federation Government and was a matter to be decided by the national government appointed by the elected constituent assembly. A statement to that effect had been issued by the Federation Information Minister during the talks in Beirut. As representative of the nationalist movement in the Arab South, the League had declared its objection to the idea of having any such pact signed with the United Kingdom.

214. The first and second Beirut talks had secured important gains for the nationalist movement. Those talks, in addition to the Asmara and subsequent Taiz conferences, had constituted a decisive turning point in the cause of the Arab South and the attainment of its nationalist aspirations.

215. The League Party warmly welcomed the decision taken by the United Nations Secretary-General to appoint a personal representative to advise him on matters concerning the Arab South, and fully approved of the appointment of Mr. Adeel. That was a further step in favour of the cause of the Arab South and paved the way for a United Nations presence before and during the forthcoming elections. At the same time, it showed the intention to provide an essential guarantee of the proper implementation of the United Nations resolutions. Furthermore, the choice of Mr. Adeel was a wise one, since he was a national of a sister Arab country; Sudan had deep insight into the cause of the Arab South and was not involved in any of the dissension prevalent there. There were also similarities between Sudan's struggle for independence and the present situation in the Arab South.

216. The League Party represented the nationalist movement in the region and had been in existence for seventeen years. It had been the first body to call for the independence and unification of the Arab South on a popular and democratic basis. It had organized the people's struggle to attain those objectives, and colonialism had been bringing most of the weight of its attacks against it since 1956 in the form of deportation and oppression.

217. The second nationalist party to be established—the United Nationalist Front—had been founded in 1955 and dissolved in 1957. The third party had been the Aden People's Socialist Party, founded in 1962 and dissolved in 1965. The fourth party had been the National Liberation Front, founded in 1964 and dissolved in 1966. The Front for the Liberation of Occupied South Yemen (FLOS Y) had been founded three months previously by the group represented by Mr. Mackawee.

218. The League Party had passed through most difficult periods in its long life but had invariably emerged firm and strong. It currently represented the most effective force in the Territory. Mr. Mackawee's assertion that FLOS Y was the sole body representing the cause of the Arab South was groundless. The body to represent the Arab South had obviously to be chosen by the people through elections, and it was certainly unwise to make any such premature statement. A previous speaker had said that the Arab League Council and the Arab South Committee of the Arab League had recognized the new Liberation Front as the sole representative of the people of the Arab South. That assertion had been re-echoed by Mr. Mackawee. However, there was no truth in the allegation that the Arab Summit Conferences, the Arab League Council or the Arab South Committee of the Arab League had recognized the new Front as the sole representative of the South Arabian people. As for the reported welcome by the Arab League Committee to FLOS Y, it should be borne in mind that the Arab League naturally welcomed any new participant in the nationalist struggle. Such praise was one thing and recognition of a specific group as the only representative of the people was certainly another.

219. As the Arab South was passing through the decisive pre-independence period, it was incumbent upon the United Kingdom to lend true support to the cause of the Arab South and to avert the danger of civil war by putting the United Nations resolutions into effect. Any attempt to ignore them would meet with the strongest opposition on the part of the League Party.

220. In reply to questions put to him by Members, Mr. Al-Gifri added that the real conflict was between the people of South Arabia and the United Kingdom Government, which should itself convene the conference. The United Nations resolutions were directed against the United Kingdom and not the Federation Government. The SAL believed in unity and had set out its views in a memorandum to the Special Committee in May 1962. Colonialism should be opposed by one front, and any differences should be set aside until later. FLOS Y had been created only a short time previously and had not consulted SAL. SAL opposed the name of "Liberation Front for South Yemen", and held that it was necessary to set up a South Arabian Republic. It did not reject future union with Yemen, but the most important aim was independence. Unification would come later. With regard to the choice between the names of "Arab South" and "South Yemen", FLOS Y had rejected the SAL appellation of "Occupied South", though that name would be acceptable as a temporary compromise solution. A FLOS Y condition for the setting up of a common front had been the dissolution of political parties. However, those parties had not been set up haphazardly and their abolition would entail a unified ideology. Therefore SAL could not agree to the dissolution of the parties. What was needed was a unified front retaining the parties, and he thought that agreement could be reached before long.

221. He said that he had studied the constitutional proposals submitted by the two British experts. Although skilfully drafted, many of them were not in accordance with the wishes of the South Arabian people. He reiterated that the constitution should only be drawn up by the people's elected representatives.

222. Britain had to declare its acceptance of, and to implement, the United Nations resolution adopted in November 1965. Secondly, an interim government should be appointed for the ensuing transitional period to deal with administrative matters; a provisional constitution would be drawn up for the purpose. Thirdly, the United Nations should play an effective role: a start had already been made with the appointment of Mr. Adeel as the Secretary-General's Special Representative on the Aden question, but the League would like the United Nations to send observers to the Territory to supervise the elections. Lastly, both the police and the armed forces should be represented in the interim government. The League was opposed to any military base or defence agreement and the Federation's representative in Beirut had been informed to that effect. The League had had nothing whatever to do with the London talks, which it considered the Federation Government should not have undertaken.

223. He said that no leadership had been set up in Asmara; steps had been taken to co-ordinate the leadership of nationalist forces in the South, and a group of organizations, which did not in itself constitute an organization, had been formed.

224. The appointment of a United Nations supervisor would ensure a more effective United Nations presence. A further proposal, to be agreed upon by the parties concerned, would be a transition period with a neutral or a coalition government, whose functions would be defined by a provisional constitution. The United Nations presence would guarantee freedom of expression and correct electoral procedures. The final South Arabian constitution should be a progressive, appropriate instrument for a republic; the elections should be direct and general; and the executive, legislative and judicial powers should be clearly defined, as in any democratic and progressive country. As it was not the time for working out details, it sufficed to say that, in general, the constitution should be based on the will of the people. The United Kingdom claimed that there could be no direct elections in the tribal South because the people were illiterate. That, however, was not true. The nationalists opposed the elections based on tribal traditions, and insisted that they should be based on universal suffrage. They would never allow the United Kingdom to succeed in its plans.

225. The League had sent a great number of students to the universities of various Arab countries, which had taken on their training. The League had, in particular, awarded around 500 scholarships to enable students to attend military academies in Cairo and Iraq, whereas the administering Power, in 130 years, had done almost nothing to help students and had enabled scarcely more than fifty of them to obtain diplomas. He hoped that the country's economic activity would not suffer a slump. Every country which acceded to independence had to face economic problems, and South Arabia would be no exception to the general rule. The main thing for the League was to prepare solutions, and it was attending to that. There was in Aden a committee of university graduates and economists which was already engaged in working out the necessary measures. Aden port should remain a free port in the interest of the country's economy. Incidentally, the Territory derived no revenues from the United Kingdom military base in Aden.

226. The South Arabian League was distributing to the population pamphlets on the economic problems, which brought out the fact that the United Kingdom had done nothing to change the current situation. The south of the country could probably be self-sufficient. The whole of the Territory and the Protectorates would still, however, need the assistance of United Nations experts and technicians. The Organization had already promised its assistance in developing the local fisheries, a step which the League welcomed. Again, the League planned to develop the activity of the port and the long-fibre cotton industry. The country would thus be able to face its immediate economic problems upon its accession to independence.

227. Mr. Aswadi stated that the Aden Trades Union Congress (ATUC) had 30,000 members, on whose behalf he expressed gratitude for the Special Committee's efforts to end imperialism and to bring independence to the people of South Arabia. He begged the Committee to continue its efforts and to see that the United Nations resolutions were implemented in letter and spirit. The working classes in Southern Arabia were suffering from oppression; the United Kingdom was trying to deprive them of the means of self-expression, and they were not allowed the right to strike. In addition, the United Kingdom was trying to sow dissension among the workers and, indeed, to create a new Palestine.

228. Replying to questions, the petitioner stated that the Aden Trades Union Congress comprised eight unions, representing communications, including naval and air personnel, light industry, shipbuilding, public utilities, central and local government workers, workers at British bases, teachers, bank officials and employees, and workers in the petroleum industry. Since its foundation, the Congress had led the struggle for the liberation of Aden because it had been the only group sufficiently powerful to do so. The Congress had done much in the region to oppose all forms of colonialism. It had foiled conspiracies, held public meetings and demonstrations, and had brought certain problems to the attention of the appropriate authorities. It had certainly not confined its activities to Aden but had been active throughout the Territory. Under the leadership of the Congress, the working class had relentlessly continued its struggle. The Congress had joined the National Liberation Front after the Front had merged with other movements.

229. The administering Power had attempted to launch fictitious trade unions, but had not been successful and those phantom trade unions had not been able to show that they really existed. The Congress was the only representative and responsible trade union organization in the Territory; its influence extended not only to the working class but also to other social classes and its influence was increasing, despite the machinations of the administering Power and the atmosphere of terror created by that Power. The most powerful trade union movement was in Aden.

230. As soon as circumstances allowed, the Trade Union Congress intended to set up co-operatives and to that end it had sought the advice of a number of experts, mostly from Sweden. It hoped to benefit from United Nations technical assistance. Aden had already been visited by technical assistance specialists. The Congress also wished to establish chemical industries and some Arab and socialist countries had promised that they would help it to do so. In addition the Congress intended to conduct a land survey to determine which areas were suitable for cultivation and could be farmed under a co-operative system. However, although ATUC had already prepared many plans to promote the best interests of the population, it was still waiting for the country to be freed from foreign domination before putting them into effect.

231. The aims of the ATUC and FLOSY were identical: in expressing views of a political nature, always consulted its colleagues in FLOSY; its stand had always been the same as that of FLOSY.

232. Mr. Al-Aulaqi said that he represented 10,000 South Arabians in Kuwait, who awaited with interest the Special Committee's recommendations concerning the implementation of the United Nations resolutions. His own organization supported the South Arabian League, which it considered was dealing with its cause wisely and justly. The League was inspired by three principles: liberation of South Arabia from the United Kingdom; unity; and government by the people.

233. Mr. Ogeil, speaking for the Salvation Organization in the South of Yemen and Aden Protectorate, thanked the Special Committee for its efforts on behalf of still-colonized peoples. He recalled that, when the United Kingdom had realized that the people of occupied South Yemen were prepared to fight for their rights, it had intimated that it would implement the resolutions of the United Nations. It had not in fact done so.

234. He appealed to the Special Committee to ensure the complete evacuation of the area by imperialists and the dismantling of all military bases, to abolish puppet régimes and colonial structures imposed on the people against their will; to release political prisoners; to abrogate emergency laws; and to express its condemnation of conferences between the Federation Government and the United Kingdom.

235. He had at one time been a member of the South Arabian League, but had resigned from it when that organization began to support puppet governments. Since then he had given his full support to FLOSY.

236. Mr. Hussein Omar Ben Sahl, speaking on behalf of the South Arabia Youth Organization wished merely to point out that the protracted struggle of past years could in the future turn into violence. Despite its announcement that independence would be granted in 1968, the administering Power had continued to use repressive methods in South Arabia. It had bypassed part of the United Nations resolutions, which should have served not only as preparation for independence, but also as a solution to the many problems facing the area. The students in South Arabia therefore protested against the Federation Government as a puppet of the United Kingdom. It was not representative of the people, nor was it a real party in the conflict, but rather a tool. The students of South Arabia believed the area's true representative to be the South Arabian League, which upheld their struggle to promote the independence and peaceful development of all South Arabia.

General statements

237. The representative of the United Arab Republic congratulated the Special Committee on the serious and effective manner in which its deliberations were proceeding. He had been greatly impressed by the penetrating questions and intelligent answers which he had heard. His delegation had listened very carefully to the petitioners, all of whom had shown that they wished for an immediate end to United Kingdom rule in the region and for the implementation of General Assembly resolutions 1949 (XVIII) and 2023 (XX). They were aware that the United Kingdom was trying to perpetuate its rule through those elements to which it gave its support in return for services to British interests, and they wished to put an end to those manoeuvres. The petitioners had his delegation's full support, together, he was sure, with that of the Committee and of the United Nations.

238. It had long been obvious to his Government that the administering Power was not only hesitant to co-operate but was actively working to defeat the resolutions on the subject and to perpetuate its domination of the region, for the reasons so clearly given in the statement by the observer for the Arab League.

239. He particularly wished to bring to the Special Committee's attention an item that had appeared in that day's newspapers, according to which the United Kingdom Government had announced in the House of Commons on the previous day a five-year programme of military assistance to the so-called Federation Government in South Arabia. That announcement was the result of conversations concluded the day before with the so-called Federation Government. According to the Press, the British would pay in kind to that Government the equivalent of a sum of $US50 million over a period of five years. The announcement, made while the Special Committee was studying the question of the occupied South, was not only a challenge to the Committee, but also shed great light on the United Kingdom's plans in the area. It was, of course, necessary for the Special Committee to have first-hand information, and not merely press reports.

240. His delegation considered that the United Kingdom Government, as administering Power, should without delay announce its acceptance of the United Nations resolutions concerning the question of the occupied South, and its willingness to co-operate with United Nations organs in implementing them. That could not be done by welcoming their acceptance by the so-called Federation Government, or by encouraging it to hold a conference in August at which a representative of the Secretary-General of the United Nations would be present. The United Nations resolutions did not recognize the Federation Government, but demanded the establishment of a government on the basis of free and general elections. That meant that the present arrangement imposed by Britain in the area should be dissolved to enable the people to lay down a solid foundation for independence and development. The administering Power should desist from trying to force on the region a restrictive agreement such as the so-called defence agreement.

241. The question of the effective presence of the United Nations had been raised during the Special Committee's meetings. It was his delegation's opinion that such effective presence implied United Nations participation in all the steps necessary for the attainment of independence and the transfer of power to the real representatives of the people. It was up to the Committee to determine the freedom of the people, the release of political prisoners, the return of exiles, the ending of the state of emergency, the preparation of voters' lists and the supervision of elections for a temporary government. The United Nations role should also extend to the following up of developments in the region until a government truly representative of the people had been established and all powers had been transferred to it. That was the minimum required to show the United Kingdom's goodwill in dealing with the question. If the United Nations resolutions appeared unclear, the Special Committee could no doubt clarify them by adopting new resolutions.

242. Since the establishment of the effective presence of the United Nations required contacts and discussions with the administering Power, perhaps it would be useful for a sub-committee to undertake such contacts, taking into consideration the views of the nationalists as representatives of the people of the region. For an understanding to be reached, the United Kingdom must announce its unconditional acceptance of the United Nations resolutions and its willingness to co-operate in their implementation. If such an agreement were reached, then concrete proposals for an effective United Nations presence could be drafted; to be effective, that must be done before the next General Assembly.

243. The representative of Iraq stated that the Special Committee had often been presented as one of the brightest examples of the success of international effort in the cause of freedom, and its visit to Africa had demonstrated that truth very clearly. Its achievements would perhaps be particularly remembered in connexion with the question of Aden. When it had first been brought before the United Nations three years before, very little had been known about the conditions prevailing in the Territory, the aspirations of its peoples and the hope they placed in the United Nations to deliver them from colonial rule. The Committee had risen to the task, and had been able in a very short time to prove the efficacy of United Nations work in the cause of freedom. A sub-committee had been established to gather sufficient information about the Territory to enable the necessary decisions to be taken. Although it had not been allowed to go to the Territory itself, it had travelled extensively in neighbouring countries and met hundreds of petitioners. The results of its deliberations had been conveyed to the General Assembly in its report and recommendations, which had led to the adoption of General Assembly resolution 1949 (XVIII)—the corner-stone of United Nations action on the problem. It had not confined itself to a mere enunciation of principles regarding the Territory, but had established a system of priorities and dealt with specific questions and details of how the Territory should proceed on the road to independence.

244. That resolution had been reaffirmed and further clarified in General Assembly resolution 2023 (XX) of 5 November 1965; the two resolutions were unique in the annals of the United Nations as a means of providing a rallying cry for the fighters for freedom. They had been unanimously accepted by all sections of the population of the Territory—a fact that did honour to the Committee and provided proof of its far-sightedness in dealing with the problem.

245. In all such questions, however, the attitude of the administering Power was of paramount importance, and unhappily the attitude of the United Kingdom Government had been less than helpful to the Special Committee. It had prevented the Sub-Committee on Aden from going to examine the situation at first hand, and had resolutely refused to declare unequivocally its acceptance of the United Nations resolutions and its readiness to implement them loyally as a Member of the United Nations. It had not lifted the state of emergency enforced since 1963, it had not abolished the repressive laws and practices that had been condemned repeatedly by the United Nations, and had continued its military actions with great loss of life and property. The Committee's first duty should therefore be to call once again on the administering Power to declare in a clear-cut and straightforward manner its unqualified acceptance of the United Nations resolutions and its readiness to co-operate loyally in implementing them to the full. It was useless to say that the fictitious régime it had set up had now accepted them. As far as the United Nations was concerned, the United Kingdom Government was alone responsible and alone accountable to the international community for its stewardship of the Territory.

246. The United Kingdom Government had stated that it was its policy to grant independence by a certain date, but the problem was what type of independence it would be, and under what conditions it would be granted: would the colonial Power leave behind it a government made up of its friends, who would be at its beck and call and execute its policy, or would it hand over independence to genuine representatives, whose interests were those of the people and not of the colonial Power?

247. Now that the people of the Territory had signified their acceptance of the United Nations resolutions, it was the Special Committee's solemn duty to see that they were fully and properly implemented, and that the independence to be given as a result of them would be a genuine one in which the people of the Territory could enjoy unfettered freedom. It was not enough merely to reaffirm the right of the people to independence and freedom, but it was necessary to find practical measures to ensure that independence was achieved in the best possible circumstances. That could best be done under the terms of the original resolution, which had stipulated that the holding of general elections under United Nations supervision should be preceded by the immediate lifting of the state of emergency, the abolition of the various repressive laws and regulations, the halting of the military operations against the people of the Territory and the abolition of the present constitutional institutions, with a view to establishing a provisional government during the transitional period.

248. Referring to the reported defence agreement mentioned by the representative of the United Arab Republic, between the United Kingdom Government and the Government of the South Arabia Federation, he said that the question was a very serious one that merited the Special Committee's attention, since there was a danger that the liquidation of the military base in Aden might be nullified by the linking of the newly independent State to the United Kingdom in defence matters, thus perpetuating British influence in the Territory. It was important for the Committee to follow the matter closely, since it might have the most serious consequences on the future of the Territory.

249. The representative of Tunisia stated that by reason of its history, its intensity and its effects, the problem of Aden and the South Arabian Protectorates was a purely colonial problem. In deciding to give all its moral and material aid to peoples struggling to obtain independence, Tunisia, which had itself suffered under colonialism at one time, had no ulterior motives of ambition or expansion. It was merely carrying out what it held to be the urgent duty of every State worthy of the name.

250. Furthermore, the Tunisian delegation had always maintained that it was in the interest of the administering Powers themselves to promote decolonization. Everyone knew that no Power could maintain a government, however strong, for long, if that government was not supported by the mass of the people.

251. To most people, the mere mention of Aden brought to mind the presence of the United Kingdom military base. A military base implied a situation of force, with all the repression, destitution and total lack of progress which that involved. For that reason, he wished to thank the Iraqi Minister for Foreign Affairs for his important statement and to assure the population of Aden of Tunisia's fraternal support.

252. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that once again the Special Committee was called upon to deliberate on the question of the very serious and dangerous situation existing in Aden, or rather South Arabia. The very fact that it was discussing the problem again spoke volumes for itself, as it revealed the belligerent and persistent manner in which British colonialism was trying to cling to the land of the Arab people. Hence, while the pertinent facts of the situation in South Arabia would be taken into full perspective, it was necessary to proceed with deep analysis of the situation in its entirety.

253. The question of colonialism was a classic question. The problem of the specific question before the Special Committee, that of British colonialism in South Arabia was thus no less classic than in all other parts of the world, and it must therefore be approached from all the angles.

254. The question of colonialism was a classic one because of the many manoeuvres it tried to adopt. Those, however, could be seen in South Arabia in the form of dividing the anti-colonial forces. Thus the British colonial forces were trying to exploit the feudal forces so as to remove the feudal rulers from the legitimate desires of the masses of the people, and found it convenient to align themselves with their people, who were fighting for the legitimate independence of their Territory.

255. But in order to attract those feudal forces, the colonial authorities had tried to create fictitious enemies for them. By doing so the colonial authority sought to isolate the people of South Arabia from the rest of Arab nationalism. That had been tried in Africa, and it was still going on. But he wished to assure the people of Aden that their future hopes and security would definitely lie in their co-operation with the rest of the Arab world. For while his delegation admitted that colonialism was nothing but a passing phase, it could not see how South Arabia would remain a water-tight enclave in a sea of Arab nationalism. It wished to reaffirm that history had not provided examples of that nature; on the other hand, however, there were several examples to show how necessary it was for the people of South Arabia to be in line with the rest of the Arab world. For example, in Africa that necessity had been shown by the creation of the Organization of African Unity (OAU). Thus, any attempt to isolate an African country from the OAU would be almost the same as an attempt to isolate South Arabia from the rest of the Arab world. Both of those attempts are doomed to failure. The desire for regional unity was prevalent in many parts of the world. It was seen in Africa, in the form of OAU, in Latin America, and in Europe. It would therefore be folly on the part of the South Arabian people if they allowed themselves to be isolated from the rest of the pan-Arab world.

256. From the evidence at hand, it was clear that the situation in South Arabia since the adoption of General Assembly resolution 1949 (XVIII) had been deteriorating at a very rapid pace. That was, of course, factually so despite the declarations by the United Kingdom Government that South Arabia would gain its independence not later than 1968. It was hence imperative to analyse why, despite such sweet-sounding declarations, the United Kingdom Government had been continuing its repressive colonial policies.

257. The Washington Post, on 1 January 1964, had stated that British policy in Arabia was based on two interrelated factors—those of oil and so-called defence. That was the crux of the question. As his delegation always maintained, colonialism and the subjugation of lands did not arise on the adventurist whim of some person. Colonization of lands arose out of calculated economic aims. The Middle East was one of the richest oil-producing areas in the world. It was perhaps in their lust for that important product that the British forces had committed aggression and colonized South Arabia to use it as a vantage point.

258. With regard to the aspect of so-called defence, the United Kingdom had found in Aden a strategic point. Due to the heroic stand of the people of the United Arab Republic, the British had been forced out of Suez and had retreated to the colony of Aden. It was also because of the gallant struggle of the people of Iraq that the British had been forced to move out of that area. And again they had retreated to their colony of Aden. In both cases the freedom and peace-loving peoples of those lands, pursuing their correct and legitimate desire for peace and the continuation of their liberty, had refused to allow the British to use their sovereign lands as staging areas and consequently to place their own freedom and peace in jeopardy.

259. He had drawn that illustration to afford better appreciation of the legitimate struggle of the heroic people of South Arabia to defeat the forces of British colonialism in their motherland. The struggle that that gallant people was waging was a necessary struggle, fully in keeping with the gigantic efforts of the freedom-loving people of the world to achieve freedom and peace with dignity. The evidence at hand showed that increasingly the United Kingdom, while making sweet-sounding declarations regarding the future of the Territory, was at the same time taking further suppressive measures against the nationalists of South Arabia.

260. By the adoption of resolution 1949 (XVIII), and later of resolution 2023 (XX), the General Assembly, correctly considering that the maintenance of the military bases in that Territory was a major obstacle to the liberation of South Arabia and prejudicial to the peace of the area, had called upon the United Kingdom Government to effect their immediate removal. His delegation had supported General Assembly resolution 1949 (XVIII) which, among other things, had called for the removal of the military bases in Aden. Its support for that resolution stemmed from a basic fundamental principle—that in the world today the installation of military bases in other people's lands was not only outmoded, but indeed created a danger to the very people among which such a base was installed; and above all it created a danger to the neighbouring States. For that reason, his delegation, both in the OAU and in the United Nations, had opposed the creation of a military base in the Indian Ocean adjacent to the coast of East Africa.

261. That was the principle that guided his delegation on the question of military bases. It had welcomed the declaration by the United Kingdom Government of the removal of the military base in Aden, and had seen in it a great amount of wisdom on the part of the United Kingdom Government, although of course, it would have liked to see the implementation of it much earlier than 1968. It was, however, dismayed to learn that the removal of the base in Aden would indicate a transfer of it to another part of the Arab world within the region of South Arabia. It could not see the reasoning for the removal of a base in Aden followed by its installation within that same region. To put it in simple language, it was like taking the number plate of a car from the front and installing it at the back. He appealed to the United Kingdom Government to listen to world public opinion. His delegation sincerely believed that the same reasons that had made it remove the Aden base should be those that should prevent it from restoring such a base within that area. It further strongly believed that the sooner the British realized that fact the better would be their relations with the pan-Arab world. The whole basis of the United Nations Charter was for the people of the world to live in peace and friendliness with one another, with mutual respect and understanding.

262. There were, however, those who argued on the economic importance of the base to the area. To those he would simply say that it was the end that justified the means and not the means that justified the end. After all, it could not be denied that that base had been responsible for many military operations, as stated by the petitioners, resulting in the death of many innocent citizens. Furthermore, if the people of South Arabia had been able to live before that base had been installed, they would certainly do so with even better prospects after its removal.

263. It was true that the United Kingdom Government had stated that South Arabia would achieve independence by 1968. His delegation was strongly in favour of the independence of South Arabia, and strongly opposed to the criminal subjugation of a people by any colonial Power. His country knew full well how cruelly it hurt. From its own experience as well as from the experience of the gallant people of South Arabia, it was still wary despite such declarations. It must be realized that the best disposed to call for independence of South Arabia were the true people of that country, who had very eloquently stated their position: independence without delay.

264. Analysing the actions of the United Kingdom since it had made that declaration on the future of South Arabia, he said that the working paper prepared by the Secretariat (see paras. 4-58 above) showed that on 25 September 1965 the United Kingdom Government had wanted only to suspend the Constitution of Aden, and had vested virtually omnipotent powers in the colonial Governor. That meant that the United Kingdom Government, while declaring itself to be preparing to leave South Arabia, was at the same time seeking all possible means to create the conditions for controlling the Territory in the future.

265. That fact has been clearly recognized by the majority of Members of the United Nations, as shown by the adoption of General Assembly resolution 2023 (XX). Operative paragraph 4 of that resolution was a clear-cut expression that needed no explanation, and it led to the very important question of what was to happen to Aden or South Arabia after independence. All repeated that the future of South Arabia inevitably lay in the unity of the people freely expressed within the meaning of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). Thus, any attempt to divide the people of Aden through the use of feudal and traditional rulers would certainly lead to future troubles. Therefore, independence under a régime that did not fully recognize the resolutions of the United Nations was bound to lead to future instability in the area.

266. That brought him to the question of the attempt on the part of the United Kingdom Government to deceive world opinion. The United Kingdom Government had publicized a so-called declaration of intention (see annex IV) by the local unrepresentative régime to adhere to the various United Nations resolutions on South Arabia. That was the height of hypocrisy and cynicism on the part of the United Kingdom Government. So far as the United Nations and the United Republic of Tanzania were concerned, the United Nations resolutions on South Arabia were to be respected and implemented by the United Kingdom Government as the administering Power, and not by a régime installed by the administering Power through the suppression of the genuine representatives of the masses of the people struggling for independence.

267. His delegation had been very surprised to see that the Aden authorities had made themselves the laughing-stock of world public opinion. The resolution did not in any way or in any paragraph indicate either directly or indirectly its recognition of the Aden authority, so that while that authority might be the transitional authority the fact remained that only the United Kingdom was responsible for the implementation of the United Nations resolutions. He failed to see the motives behind such ill advice from the administering Power to the authorities in Aden on such a simple and obvious matter. It was therefore equally unfortunate that the authorities in Aden should have fallen victims of the obvious.

268. His delegation would be quite happy to welcome a declaration showing that the United Kingdom Government was fully and faithfully implementing the provisions of General Assembly resolutions 1949 (XVIII) and 2023 (XX), which contained the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. It was his delegation's strong belief that it was by the faithful implementation of those resolutions that favourable conditions would be created for the achievement of genuine and unfettered independence of South Arabia.

269. There were today two major ways in which colonialism could be eradicated from the world: first, the road of persuasion and of world public opinion, which was the road that the United Nations had chosen to follow. That road had led to the establishment of the Fourth Committee and the Special Committee. Thus, the colonial Powers were daily urged to give up their colonies and to lay down a programme for their independence, subject to the conditions laid down in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). That was what was needed for the people of South Arabia. The second road was that of a bitter struggle—a struggle whose history had to be written with the blood of the freedom fighters. Those were the two ways open to the cause of decolonization. He was sure many peace-loving people of the world would prefer the Special Committee's work accomplished by the first method. But the United Kingdom seemed not to see reason, and forced the people of Southern Arabia to resort to an armed struggle. The accumulated frustration of the colonized people left no alternative but to fight to the bitter end. That had happened in Algeria, Kenya and many other parts of the world. It was happening now in Aden because of non-cooperation of the United Kingdom Government.

270. He gave solemn warning to the colonial Powers to listen to reason and thus avert the shedding of blood. But it was his belief that there was no price that the people of Aden would not pay to free their country from colonialism. He was sure that he would be expressing the sentiments not only of the United Republic of Tanzania but also of the peace-loving peoples of the world in saying that they would be free; the colonial Powers could not change the course of history. History was on the side of the people of Aden and victory would be theirs.

271. He would like the freedom fighters who had appeared before the Committee to know how strongly the Special Committee supported their struggle as a moral and legitimate one entitled to moral and material support. Colonialism was a dying horse and it had to kick hard. It must be faced by the united force of the masses of the people of South Arabia. The adage "divided we fall, united we stand" was a universal one, and very common among the Arab people. They were a common people, with a common and legitimate goal, the complete liberation of South Arabia. The Special Committee would do its part, and was certain they would do theirs. Because the struggle they were waging was a just struggle, it would be crowned with victory, in which would be achieved the elimination of the system of exploitation of man by man, for the progress of the nation in unity, liberty and peace.

272. He reaffirmed to the petitioners that whatever resolutions the Special Committee might adopt, it would be guided by the wishes of the people of South Arabia expressed through their leaders who had appeared as petitioners. He wished the people of South Arabia God-speed in their struggle towards independence.

273. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated that the USSR steadfastly maintained its position of support for the colonial peoples' struggle for liberation. Proceeding from that position of principle, the Soviet Union supported the just claims of the population of Aden and South Arabia to freedom and independence and also their right to decide for themselves the question of their future governmental structure. The Soviet Union delegation had supported General Assembly resolutions 1949 (XVIII) and 2023 (XX), both of which set forth specific ways of leading to independence the peoples of South Arabia, who were now under colonial oppression.

274. It was quite clear that the interests of the administering Power and those of the inhabitants were diametrically opposed: while the United Kingdom was concerning itself with the interests of imperialistic international monopolies and was also pursuing its own strategic military aims, the people of Aden were suffering cruel oppression. They were fighting for independence under the direction of the Liberation Front, which had been recognized by a great many national and international organizations. While the Liberation Front was fighting for the interests of the people of Aden and the entire Arabian Peninsula, the so-called Federal Government was selling out the people's interests and trying to arrange an agreement with the United Kingdom colonialists. The disgraceful spectacle performed in Aden had been written in London. The so-called Federal Government, which now asserted its intention of accepting United Nations resolutions had been silent for two and a half years. It was not for that Government, which represented nobody, but for the administering Power, to accept the resolutions of the United Nations.

275. According to the information provided in the statements of the Acting Secretary-General of the League of Arab States and in the statement made by the Chairman of the Liberation Front on 11 June, the Federal Government was committing new crimes and had entered into secret negotiations with the United Kingdom Government in order to protect itself through the assistance of the United Kingdom against the wrath of the people and, in return, to help the United Kingdom retain its influence in Aden and the Protectorates.

276. In resolution 2023 (XX), the General Assembly had deplored the attempts of the administering Power to set up an unrepresentative régime—the Federal Government. The methods used by the United Kingdom colonialists in Aden could be compared to those which they were using in Southern Rhodesia. The United Kingdom Government was trying to impose a government of puppets in Aden and South Arabia, as it had done in Southern Rhodesia.

277. The constitutional conference which was to take place in Aden at the beginning of August was simply a further manoeuvre through which the United Kingdom hoped to evade its responsibilities and obstruct the implementation of the United Nations resolutions. How could that conference take any decisions in the interests of the population of Aden when all those taking part were lackeys and henchmen of the United Kingdom? The Special Committee should vigorously express its opposition to that conference and declare that it ran counter to paragraph 4 of the General Assembly resolution on Aden. It should demand that the administering Power should suspend the state of emergency in the Territory, evacuate the military bases at Aden and in other parts of South Arabian territory, release the detainees and give the people the opportunity to express themselves freely concerning their future governmental structure.

278. The United Kingdom representative had stated on 16 May 1966 in New York that the abolition of the state of emergency depended on the disappearance of what he called "subversion" within the Territory. How could the just activities of patriots fighting to defend the interests of the entire people be described as "subversion"? Their actions were lawful, while the actions of the United Kingdom violated the Charter of the United Nations and international law. United Kingdom policy in the area was based on a desire to safeguard the United Kingdom's economic interests, particularly the interests of the petroleum monopolies, and to retain control of Aden, which was a strategic base of the highest importance. The facts made it clear that the United Kingdom's assertion that it would evacuate the base of Aden after granting what it called "independence" to the Territory in 1968 was insincere and that the United Kingdom was sure of being able to sign the necessary agreements with the puppet Government to enable it to retain its influence in the area.

279. The Special Committee should request the General Assembly to include in its agenda and give serious consideration to the question of military bases, which the colonialists were using practically all over the world in order to continue their imperialistic policies and to oppress the peoples that opposed their imperialistic actions.

280. The representative of Mali said that the question of Aden and the Protectorates was one of the most serious of the colonial problems which had been before the Special Committee for several years. He thanked the Government of the United Arab Republic for having enabled the Special Committee to enter into contact with the true sons of Aden and the Protectorates and he pointed out that, if the administering Power had been more co-operative and had not prevented the implementation of the resolutions of the Special Committee and of the General Assembly, the Special Committee would in fact have met in Aden.

281. The Government of Mali regarded Aden and its Protectorates as a colony and remained convinced that the responsibilities of the United Kingdom Government to the people of the Territory were those set forth in Chapter XI of the United Nations Charter.

282. That primary responsibility of the United Kingdom Government had been demonstrated with specific examples by the petitioners who had appeared before the Special Committee from the Liberation Front and the South Arabian League. Their statements had shown the negative aspects of traditional colonialism with all its consequences, which were creating continuous tension in the area of South Arabia. The foreign presence in Aden represented a danger to the neighbouring States, and in particular to the sovereign State of Yemen. He wondered how the United Kingdom could justify the maintenance of its military base in Aden other than as a means of aggression against the Arab States.

283. Every time the Special Committee considered the situation in a territory under United Kingdom domination, it encountered the same difficulties: the maintenance of aggressive military bases against the will of the population of the territory, the frenzied exploitation of the country's natural resources and often, as in Southern Rhodesia and Aden, the setting up of a police régime backed by puppets representing only United Kingdom interests.

284. Instead of co-operating with the United Nations and complying with General Assembly resolutions 1949 (XVIII) and 2023 (XX), which urged in particular the dismantling of the military base at Aden, the administering Power was establishing illiterate feudalists, sheikhs and sultans, who did not even know how to sign their names, in the Territory.

285. He shared the view of most members of the Special Committee that resolution 1514 (XV), which set forth the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, should be implemented forthwith in Aden and the Protectorates. The people of Aden had a right to the support of the Special Committee, whose duty it was to reaffirm their inalienable right to self-determination and independence.

286. He supported the petitioners' demands regarding the steps which the administering Power should take to restore the situation in the Territory to normal. Those steps were: to abolish the state of emergency, to repeal the laws providing for exceptional measures and all laws restricting public freedom, to cease all oppressive actions against the people of the Territory, to end the bombings, to release all political detainees and to allow the return of political exiles. Those steps were the minimum required to restore normal conditions in the Territory. In addition, the United Kingdom as the administering Power should hold free elections under United Nations supervision. It would then rest with the representatives of the people, elected by universal suffrage, to choose and draw up a constitution. He was opposed to the convening of the constitutional conference that was scheduled for August, since the preparation of a constitution for the people of Aden was not a matter for United Kingdom experts, and such a conference would not serve the interests of the population.

287. The petitioners had stressed the need to abolish the micro-States known as "sheikhdoms" and had asked for the establishment of a genuinely unitary modern and democratic State. He supported that idea and considered that the United Kingdom should be invited to change the present political system in Aden and to grant immediate independence to the Territory. It should also abolish the micro-States and dissolve the Federal Government, which consisted of sultans, since that Government represented nothing.

288. The representative of Bulgaria, summing up the situation, said that, firstly, the United Kingdom had not responded positively to General Assembly resolution 2023 (XX) and was trying to impose a puppet government in Aden and the Aden Protectorates in order to maintain its influence in the area. Secondly, the nationalist and patriotic forces fighting for the independence of their country had closed their ranks and were carrying on a stubborn struggle against colonialist oppression. Thirdly, the petitioners of the Liberation Front had stressed the importance which they attached to an effective United Nations presence during the period of the elections, so that the elections would take place in an atmosphere of freedom and would lead to the transfer of power to the representatives of the people, elected by universal suffrage. Fourthly, the petitioners had drawn attention to the danger which the existence of military bases in Aden and in the territory of South Arabia represented to international peace and security, a danger to which the Special Committee should draw the attention of the Security Council.

289. He had been impressed by the wise statement of the representative of the United Arab Republic, who had given a remarkable analysis of the dangerous situation in the Aden area and had made some realistic and extremely sensible suggestions to the Special Committee. He agreed with the representative of the United Arab Republic that the United Kingdom's attitude to the United Nations resolutions was a challenge to the Organization and that the Special Committee should ask the United Kingdom to comply with those resolutions at once and to co-operate in the restoration of the legitimate rights of the people of Aden. Furthermore, the Special Committee should give close consideration to the detailed and specific proposals put forward by the representative of the United Arab Republic, for they could serve as a basis for the organization of an effective United Nations presence before, during and after the elections and until power had been transferred to a representative government elected by the people of Aden.

290. The representative of Sierra Leone recalled that in August 1965 the United Kingdom had pledged independence for Aden by 1968 and dismantlement of the military base. However, it was important to know what sort of independence was contemplated; for the petitioners had pointed out that nothing was being done to implement General Assembly resolutions 1949 (XVIII) and 2023 (XX) calling for the abolition of the emergency regulations and consequent restrictions and repression, as well as for the release of political prisoners and the return of exiles. The petitioners had also spoken of the need for a United Nations presence, which should be brought out in any resolution drafted by the Special Committee on the question of Aden. Observers should be sent to ensure that no puppet régime usurped the right of the people to choose their political course in freedom. The Committee had to remind the administering Power of its duty to the inhabitants and to the United Nations. The United Kingdom should, if it had no manoeuvres to conceal and nothing to fear, declare its acceptance of the relevant United Nations resolutions in accordance with the wishes of the people. Since the administering Power was signing agreements which would set a virtual stranglehold on the political and economic life of the area after "independence", the time for action had come.

291. The representative of Denmark said that the main problem was that of securing for the people the exercise of self-determination, which in nearly all cases would be a natural adjunct of independence. The situation in Aden and South Arabia was, however, an atypical one; for all those concerned, including the administering Power, had agreed that South Arabia would be independent. However, the petitioners and many representatives on the Special Committee had expressed fears that it might be an independence without self-determination and under a régime not enjoying the confidence of the majority of the people. His delegation held that South Arabia should be independent and, anxious to see genuine independence, was in full agreement on the essential points with the representatives of the nationalist movements, and, he was sure, with all members of the Special Committee.

292. The representative of Poland said that, although the question of Aden had been dealt with on a number of occasions by the General Assembly and the Special Committee, the situation in the Territory had deteriorated considerably and continued to be a source of tension throughout the region. That was due to the policy of the administering Power, which consistently disregarded the aspirations of the people of Aden and the South Arabian Peninsula for genuine independence, and failed to co-operate with the United Nations and the Special Committee in the faithful implementation of the General Assembly resolutions on Aden. The United Nations wished to put the relevant resolutions into effect and enable the people of Aden to decide upon their country's future.

293. The members of the Special Committee were aware that General Assembly resolutions 1949 (XVIII) and 2023 (XX) not only set forth the principle of self-determination and independence in accordance with the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, but also outlined the procedure to be followed. Moreover, it was apparent from the statements of the petitioners who had appeared before the Committee in Mogadiscio, Addis Ababa and Cairo, that the United Kingdom was refusing to comply with the decisions of the United Nations. In fact, the state of emergency was still in force, public liberties had been virtually abolished and the number of political prisoners had increased, as had repressive action, military expeditions, the bombing of villages and the killing of innocent inhabitants. Furthermore, in committing all those brutal acts against the legitimate owners of the land, the United Kingdom was trying to present the national liberation movement in the Territory as a terrorist group. There was nothing new about that; for the history of colonialism had shown that repressive measures adopted against nationalist movements or democratically elected governments were always self-defeating and that the colonial Powers tried to represent all genuine freedom fighters as terrorists. Many of the present leaders of newly independent countries had once been considered terrorists by the United Kingdom and had even served prison sentences. The Polish people had no doubts about the ultimate victory of the liberation struggle being carried on in Aden and the South Arabian Peninsula, and wished to express their solidarity with the aims of the Front for the Liberation of Occupied South Yemen (FLOSY) and to congratulate its members on their achievements in uniting all the patriotic forces of the Territory genuinely interested in the freedom and independence of their motherland.

294. Mr. Mackawee had described the threat to politicians who refused to collaborate with the administering Power and obey instructions running counter to the interests of the people. The petitioner had also explained how the United Kingdom, in refusing to allow general elections, intended to rely on its traditional servants—the sheikhs and sultans, to ensure its hold over the country after the ostensible granting of independence.

295. The policy of the administering Power could not deceive anyone. The United Kingdom was trying to maintain its colonial rule in the face of United Nations resolutions, since it considered the area to be of vital importance to its selfish economic, political and strategic interests. It was particularly anxious to protect the large oil refinery in Aden and to keep control over the existing and potential resources of the Territory, and particularly to prospect for oil in the eastern Protectorate. It was in order to safeguard those interests that the administering Power used force to suppress national resistance and resorted to such other manoeuvres as the imposition of the so-called Federation of South Arabia, which was, of course, a puppet régime.

296. In declaring that the Federal Government accepted the United Nations resolutions on Aden, the administering Power wished to point to the existence of a government representative of the country as a whole. However, his delegation fully shared the opinion already expressed in the Special Committee that, so far as the United Nations was concerned, the Government of the so-called Federation of South Arabia was not a proper constitutional government. Indeed, General Assembly resolution 2023 (XX) rejected that Government in deploring, in operative paragraph 4, the attempts of the administering Power to set up an unrepresentative régime in the Territory with a view to granting it independence contrary to General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) and 1949 (XVIII), and appealed to all States not to recognize any form of independence not based on the wishes of the people of the Territory freely expressed through elections based on universal adult suffrage. In fact, the resolutions of the General Assembly and the activity of the Special Committee were directed precisely against the existence of the Federation. It was the duty of the Special Committee to denounce the convening of a conference by the Federal Government ostensibly to study the United Nations resolutions and agree upon the best means of putting them into effect. It was for the United Kingdom to accept those resolutions and implement them without further delay. It was also incumbent on the United Nations and the Special Committee to ensure that sovereignty was transferred to the people and the unity of the Territory preserved after 1968. Furthermore, independence should be preceded by general elections under universal adult suffrage and conditions of freedom, which could best be ensured by a United Nations presence before, during and after the elections.

297. The representative of Iran welcomed the Special Representative of the Secretary-General on the question of Aden, Mr. Adeel, whose appointment was the first essential step towards the establishment of an effective United Nations presence in the Territory of Aden. His delegation wished to express its appreciation to the Secretary-General for taking that important step in implementing General Assembly resolution 2023 (XX) of 5 November 1965.

298. It appeared that imperialism had once again succeeded in driving a wedge between various nationalist movements in South Arabia. It was regrettable that the many elements which, until a few months previously, had appeared before the Fourth Committee at the twentieth session of the General Assembly as a united front, should subsequently have become divided into various splinter groups. The fight against colonialism required all the strength that a nation could muster, and division despite unity of purpose and despite the approach of independence was a sorry reflection of the deteriorating situation in Aden since the revocation of the Constitution in September 1965. Iran had been a co-sponsor of General Assembly resolution 2023 (XX), which had deplored the attempts of the administering Power to set up an unrepresentative régime in the Territory with a view to granting it independence contrary to General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) and 1949 (XVIII). However, the United Kingdom had gone a step further in consolidating the position of a régime which did not enjoy the support and confidence of the people.

299. His delegation maintained that the full realization of the inalienable right of the people of South Arabia to freedom and independence could be attained only through the establishment of a truly representative government and firmly believed that it should be left to the people in the Territory to decide freely who should represent them. Therefore, a United Nations presence to supervise the elections was of the utmost importance

If the people were to express themselves freely, it was essential that conditions favourable to a peaceful transition should be established in the Territory long before the holding of elections. The United Kingdom should take immediate steps to abolish the state of emergency, repeal all laws restricting public freedom, cease all repressive action against the inhabitants of the Territory, release all political detainees and allow the return of political exiles. Only under such conditions could the various political parties attempt to enlist public support. Without the freely expressed wishes of the population, no group, party or front could claim to be the sole representative of the people. While it was the responsibility of the administering Power to create the conditions necessary for all political parties to enjoy freedom of expression, it was also the duty of the responsible Adeni leaders and parties to inform the public of their views, plans and objectives.

300. He wished to associate his delegation with the plea for unity made to the petitioners and freedom-fighters by the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania, and to reassure the people of South Arabia of the full support and sympathy of the Iranian Government for their just cause. He concluded by wishing them every success in the establishment of a truly representative government capable of securing and guaranteeing the independence and freedom of the people of South Arabia.

301. The representative of Venezuela said that, during its first visit to Cairo four years earlier, the Sub-Committee on Aden had heard an impressive number of petitioners. It might have been thought at that time that the administering Power would have bowed to the facts and implemented the United Nations resolutions. Four years later, the situation in Aden had not improved; it might even be said to have deteriorated. That situation was characterized by what might be called a dialogue of the deaf: on the one hand, the United Nations made recommendations relating to the implementation of resolution 1514 (XV), and, on the other, the administering Power continued to carry out measures which were in direct contradiction with those recommendations. Contrary to the unanimous wish of the people and despite the recommendations of the General Assembly, the administering Power had set up a so-called Federal Government which excluded most of the territories dominated by it. It had refused to hold free elections and was concerned only with its own interest. In response to the appeals made to it to restore calm, the administering Power merely intensified its military operations and continued to imprison citizens of Aden. The Special Committee was therefore forced to conclude that the administering Power took no account whatever of the General Assembly's resolutions.

302. In a letter of 25 May 1966 addressed to the Secretary-General, the so-called Federal Government stated its intention of accepting the United Nations resolutions relating to South Arabia. In his view, the only purpose of that letter was to delude the United Nations and world public opinion into believing in the legitimacy of that Government. To accept that letter would be to give implicit recognition to that Government and to divest the United Kingdom of its responsibilities. The General Assembly, however, had always addressed itself expressly to the United Kingdom and not to that Federal Government.

303. Like all other peoples who were or had been subjected to colonial domination, the people of Aden and the Protectorate had a right to self-determination.

They must not, however, be granted a spurious independence through the transfer of power to a Government which was merely a creature of the administering Power. That Government in no way represented the interests of South Arabia. In order to determine who were the legitimate representatives of that Territory, numerous consultations would have to be held between the representatives of all shades of public opinion and the Special Committee.

304. He was convinced that the General Assembly and the Special Committee could not change their attitude at the present stage. The United Nations must call upon the United Kingdom to discharge its obligations and to protect the people of the Territories under its administration, in accordance with resolution 1514 (XV).

305. The representative of India said his delegation had hoped that after so many United Nations resolutions the United Kingdom would have paid attention to international opinion. He had been disappointed in his expectation that after the general election in the United Kingdom the situation might have changed for the better. The British styled themselves as champions of democracy, but the absence of the United Kingdom representative revealed the true worth of that assertion.

306. He was naturally gratified that Aden was to receive its independence, but that gladness was tempered by his fear of manoeuvres on the part of the administering Power and by his awareness of the ruse of puppet régimes. The Arabs had not had justice over Palestine, and the situation in Aden was a fresh setback. If the administering Power had nothing to conceal, there could surely be no objection to letting the United Nations make an on-the-spot investigation.

307. The representative of Syria said it was clear that the administering Power was not only ignoring United Nations resolutions on Aden but was, in many instances, acting contrary to them. It had not set the immediate date for independence requested by the United Nations, but the date that suited its sinister purpose of further sowing division in the country, and further consolidating its grip over its vital interests through a totally unrepresentative, subservient, so-called Federal Government that was a government only in name.

308. It was not releasing political prisoners but increasing their number, and the modest figures given by the United Kingdom representative in New York had been belied by the concrete testimony of the petitioners. It was not lifting the state of the emergency, but aggravating its aspects. The arrest of nationalists, ex-ministers, dignitaries, and of other innocent patriotic people, during the night, the ruthless manner in which their homes were searched, and their families treated, were by now legend.

309. It had been convenient for the administering Power to justify its repression by what it called terrorism and violence. The conquest of the Territory, subjection of its people, plundering of its resources, the sinister policy of keeping the population poor and ignorant, all this is not violence in the eyes of the administering Power, but a civilizing mission. But when patriots struggled to attain their freedom, questioned the imposed foreign rule, or denounced puppet tribal oddities collaborating with the invaders, they became gangsters and terrorists.

310. He did not consider that the conduct of the United Kingdom was an isolated instance, or motivated by special circumstances. Rather, it was a long-standing, deliberate policy not applicable to Aden alone, but to the whole Arab world. For long ago, and this has not changed through the years, the United Kingdom had inflicted disaster upon disaster on the Arabs, freely disposing of sacred portions of their lands, impeding their renaissance, obstructing their unity, strengthening, as in South Arabia, certain outdated tribal dispositions to keep them in complete ignorance and subjection. The United Kingdom made the permanence of its imperialist interests and the guaranteed control of the Arab resources conditional upon keeping the Arabs in an inferior status—ignorant, confused and divided.

311. As to the promise of independence in 1968, the official spokesman of the administering Power made it conditional upon a return to normal conditions. Slogans such as "normal conditions" and "public safety", so often reiterated by representatives of the administering Power mean only that the Arabs of South Arabia should forget about foreign intrusion into their area, acquiesce to the dictates of the British Governor, declare their allegiance to the local Government he chooses, not the one they choose, accept foreign exclusive monopolies of resources and prospection for resources, collaborate in the maintenance of military bases in their area, serving purposes contrary to their vocation for peace and brotherhood, and if such bases are dismantled, acquiesce in the construction of new bases at their proximity, in the land of their brothers and cousins. If they fulfil all this, they would be independent by 1968. If such were the conditions of independence, the South Arabians had better gain their independence by their struggle than accept it as charity from suspicious hands. His own country was not deceived by the promise of independence for Aden by 1968, which it considered would be colonialism in yet another disguise. It was resolved to resist the setting up of further basis in Arab lands, which was contrary to the spirit of the United Nations Charter.

312. The representative of Yugoslavia recalled that the question of Aden had been on the agenda of the General Assembly and of the Special Committee for several years and that both bodies had adopted a number of resolutions requesting the administering Power to implement General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). That Power had over a year before been requested by the Special Committee to convene a conference of representatives of all sections of public opinion to decide on the necessary constitutional measures for holding elections by universal adult suffrage. The General Assembly, in resolution 2023 (XX), had deplored the administering Power's refusal to implement its previous resolutions and its attempts to set up an unrepresentative government in the Territory.

313. The evidence of the petitioners showed that the situation in the Territory was still explosive: the state of emergency was still in force, the population continued to be repressed, discriminatory laws were still practised and the number of persons arrested and detained was increasing.

314. It was true that the administering Power had declared its intention of granting independence by 1968 and of dismantling its military bases. However, such declarations, if unaccompanied by concrete measures to set up a representative government, were in vain; and no evidence of such measures was forthcoming. On the contrary, the administering Power was encouraging the so-called Federal Government to convene a conference, and it had been reported that it was also signing a defence agreement with the Federation. Such a step could only lead to further tension in the area.

315. In the opinion of his delegation, the United Kingdom Government was alone responsible for implementing the United Nations resolutions. As the latest report of the Sub-Committee on Aden had pointed out, the so-called Federal Government had no standing in the matter. If the United Kingdom sincerely wished for a solution of the problem, it should convene a conference of representative sections of the population to decide upon methods of transferring the power to the people. However, before that could be done the necessary climate must be created by ending the state of emergency, releasing political prisoners and repealing discriminatory laws.

316. The representative of Chile said that his delegation had, as always, followed the discussion on the question of Aden with the greatest interest. The Chilean position regarding the desire of the people to liberate themselves from the colonial yoke and to form a government representing the majority was well known.

317. He noted that in questioning the petitioners, the Special Committee had been primarily concerned with finding new means of ensuring the prompt implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). There had been no recent progress in the situation in Aden and the Protectorate; on the contrary, all indications were that if the administering Power did not attempt to give effect to that resolution, the situation in the Territory would inevitably deteriorate further.

318. By announcing that it would grant the Territory independence by 1968, the administering Power had, on the whole, complicated the problem for the Special Committee, which found itself obliged to redouble its efforts in order to prevent an imminent catastrophe. The members of the Committee would all recognize that it was impossible to grant independence to the Territory in its present situation. There was no question of putting off the date of independence, but it was important to ensure that everyone had an opportunity of taking part in elections based on universal suffrage, concerning the Territory's future. General Assembly resolution 1949 (XVIII) specified the role that the administering Power should play in that respect, but the latter had not been as co-operative as it would have to be if the impasse was to be resolved.

319. He assured the petitioners and, through them, the people of South Arabia as a whole, that his country continued to be interested in their cause and that it hoped the plan of action decided upon by the Special Committee would produce the desired results.

320. The representative of Ethiopia stated that the real interest of the people of Aden could only be ensured if the United Nations moved to avert the disaster of British colonialism. The era of colonialism was past, and the United Kingdom should make preparations for speedy withdrawal.

321. Ethiopia had many links with that area, for the Gulf of Aden had been a point of confluence for migrants for thousands of years. For that reason the question of Aden was of particular concern to his delegation, and it had listened with interest to the petitioners' statements. However, individuals, prominent though they might be, were no substitute for a nation, and he wished to emphasize that it was not the Special Committee's function to choose leaders; that would be the prerogative of the people of Aden in free elections. Victory could only be achieved by a co-operative effort, and he hoped that victory could be attained without further bloodshed.

322. The representative of Australia said that, although his delegation had tried to isolate the facts of the Aden situation, it remained confused not only with regard to the situation but even with regard to the area involved, which seemed to vary according to the person talking about it. He therefore wished to make it clear that he was talking of the area of the Federation itself, including Aden, and those Protectorates or smaller units that had not joined the Federation.

323. The elements of the situation seemed to be the presence of the United Kingdom, principalities and powers of varying sizes, conflicting claims by Arab elements in the Territory; violence; a unified State said to be sought by all the parties concerned; an understandable desire on the part of the Arabs for cohesion with the larger Arab world; and a firm pledge by the United Kingdom to grant independence by 1968. To those elements should be added the announcement by the Federal Ministers of their acceptance of the Special Committee's resolutions; an admittedly not unequivocal declaration by the United Kingdom in that connexion; and recent reports of a defence agreement between the United Kingdom and the Federation.

324. General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) had emphasized self-determination or independence in accordance with the freely expressed wishes of the people. It was not the Special Committee's task either to seek to perpetuate the rule of the various sovereigns or to try to end it; that was a matter for the people concerned. His delegation accepted the United Kingdom's assurance of independence by 1968 and viewed the interim task as one of preparation for that independence. However, factions with differing objectives had emerged, and his delegation could not at that stage decide which of those factions was representative of the wishes of the majority of the people in the area. It could not reject the recent declaration by the Ministers of the Federation that they wished to implement the resolutions of the United Nations. It also accepted the reality of the Federation, whose Ministers were not, it considered, the faceless men that some of the petitioners had suggested.

325. The representative of the Ivory Coast recalled that the question of Aden had been on the Special Committee's agenda for several years and that the General Assembly had adopted several resolutions on the subject. He deplored the fact that the administering Power had paid so little attention to the resolutions calling for the abolition of the state of emergency, the repeal of repressive legislation, the cessation of military operations against the people of the Territory and the return of political exiles. Instead of holding elections based on the principle of universal suffrage, which would have made possible a restoration of law and order, the administering Power was supporting a régime spurned by the population as a whole, as had been pointed out by the petitioners.

326. His country could not lend its support to a régime that was hostile to the people. His delegation therefore reaffirmed the right of the people of Aden and the Protectorate to self-determination and independence, and urged the administering Power to give effect as speedily as possible to the General Assembly resolutions, which all sections of the population had approved. It also appealed to all the nationalists of Aden to unite in the struggle against the common enemy and thus ensure the triumph of justice and freedom.

327. The representative of the United States of America expressed her Government's sympathy for the legitimate aspirations of the people of South Arabia to govern themselves, and wished them success in the difficult task of building their future.

328. The last statement made to the Special Committee left little room for optimism, as terrorism and violence, instead of constructive preparations for independence, prevailed in the area. However, there were now some prospects for solving the differences and achieving a greater degree of unity. All the petitioners had stressed the imperative necessity for political unity, without which independence would be meaningless. However, that unity could not be imposed by any outside government or by the United Nations but had to be achieved by the people themselves.

329. The United Nations could facilitate progress towards that goal, and it was encouraging to learn that the Secretary-General had appointed a special representative on the question of Aden to assist him in carrying out that task.

330. The discussions on the question of Aden had provided further evidence of the serious political and economic problems to be solved, and the United States welcomed the fact that the people would soon be able to tackle those problems themselves—a development for which a large measure of credit was due to the administering Power. The responsibility of the United Nations was, first, to help the people achieve political unity in a democratic and representative framework and, secondly, to seek ways and means of ending the violence and bloodshed. The United States had no preconceived notions of how these objectives should be arrived at; its primary concern was that the solution should reflect the interests of all the people in the area.

331. In conclusion, with the date of independence for South Arabia approaching, its Government believed that all should work to bring about the birth of the new State in peace and tranquillity. The Special Committee could make an important contribution towards that goal by maintaining a fair and objective view of the situation and offering practical and constructive counsel to those who were seeking the welfare of the people and peace in the area.

332. The representative of Italy stated that his delegation had been led, by the experience it had acquired through its long association with the Special Committee, to conclude that the problems of decolonization could be divided into three categories: first, cases where the methods and objectives of the administering Power differed from those set out in the United Nations Charter and in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), and which consequently conflicted with the practices of the Special Committee—as in the case of South West Africa; secondly, cases where the administering Power agreed with the Special Committee on the long-term objectives but differed on the short-term objectives and the best means to achieve them—as in the case of Southern Rhodesia; and, thirdly, cases where the administering Power and the United Nations shared the same long-term and short-term objectives, but differed on the practical measures to implement them. In his delegation's view, Aden fell into the third category.

333. All were aware of the decision reached by the United Kingdom to grant independence to the Territory by 1968, and of its intention to dismantle the military bases, although the removal of the bases was not an indispensable factor in the process of decolonization.

334. The situation in Aden, so far as the constitutional development was concerned, did not appear as dark as some speakers had depicted it. All were agreed that the elections before independence would have to be free and organized in such a way as to reflect the main trends of opinion, and that a United Nations presence would be necessary to act as a stabilizing influence in order to avoid any outbreak of violence and assure genuine independence. Extensive consultations and negotiations would be necessary so that all sections of the population might agree on their future constitution. Finally, the country would also need economic and technical assistance from the United Nations. There was very little disagreement on those points.

335. The representative of Syria, in exercise of the right of reply, said that the United States representative had alluded to the great problems and complexities surrounding the Aden question and had gone so far as to give credit to the administering Power, despite the fact that no solution had been reached and that there had been no general elections to set the country on the path of democracy. A high tribune of wisdom and moderation was of no avail without action.

336. The representative of Iran, speaking in exercise of the right of reply, said that in the course of the Special Committee's proceedings on the question of Aden reference had been made to Bahrein as being an Arab land. In the interest of the smooth conduct of the Committee's proceedings he had, with great difficulty, refrained from availing himself of his right of reply. Since the Special Committee had then reached the end of its work, he wished to reserve his delegation's right with respect to both the future status of the Territory and to the right of reply which his delegation would use in due course. For the moment he wished merely to say that such claims on Bahrein, which happened to be an integral part of Iran, had no basis in international law, history, or the ethnic origin of the inhabitants of the Territory.

F. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

337. At the 445th meeting, the representative of Iraq introduced a draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.309), co-sponsored by Afghanistan, Ethiopia, India, Iraq, Mali, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, the United Republic of Tanzania and Yugoslavia.

338. In introducing the draft resolution, he drew particular attention to operative paragraph 11 as the key point of the resolution.

339. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that the best way in which the Special Committee could express its sentiments was to formulate them in a resolution like the one before it.

340. The present authorities in Aden did not represent the opinion of the people, and his delegation supported the opposition expressed in the draft resolution to any move by the administering Power to support a non-representative Government.

341. Operative paragraph 1 of the draft resolution sought to reaffirm the inalienable right to freedom and independence. To fortify that paragraph his delegation also strongly supported operative paragraph 8. Operative paragraphs 4 and 5 made it clear that the Special Committee would be opposed to anything the United Kingdom Government might do to circumvent the United Nations resolutions. So far as his delegation was concerned, the conference proposed to be held in Aden in August 1966 would be null and void, because the authorities there were incompetent to implement the resolutions. With regard to operative paragraph 11, his delegation expressed its gratitude to the Secretary-General for having appointed a special representative on the question of Aden, and hoped that on his return he would convey to the Secretary-General the Special Committee's view that the action envisaged in operative paragraph 11 should be taken with all the urgency it deserved. He hoped it would be possible to report to the General Assembly at its twenty-first session with regard to the Special Committee's recommendations.

342. The representative of Bulgaria stated that the draft resolution would have the support of his delegation, since it openly condemned the constitutional conference scheduled for August. In particular, he supported paragraph 11, which was an important step towards defining the part which the United Nations would be called upon to play in the Territory.

343. At the 446th meeting, an addendum to the draft resolution was circulated on behalf of the co-sponsors (A/AC.109/L.309/Add.1).

344. The representative of Denmark stated that his delegation was not convinced that the approach recommended in the draft resolution was the best, nor was even appropriate. He disagreed with the description of the situation given in the fifth paragraph of the preamble and in operative paragraph 10. The situation was not so serious, as far as its implications for the peace of the area were concerned, as to justify the call upon the Security Council. Operative paragraphs 2 and 6 gave a somewhat one-sided picture of the situation. He did not see what was to be gained by such a procedure. His delegation could not support the appeal made in operative paragraph 9, since it might apply to assistance in acts of violence. The struggle for freedom and independence in South Arabia could still be carried on round the conference table, rather than in the street or in the mountains. Therefore, his delegation could not agree with operative paragraph 5.

345. Operative paragraph 12 had to be considered in conjunction with operative paragraph 8 of General Assembly resolution 1949 (XVIII) and operative paragraph 13 of resolution 2023 (XX). In the first resolution, the Secretary-General was requested to arrange, in consultation with the Special Committee and the administering Power, for an effective United Nations presence before and during elections; but in the second, the Secretary-General was requested to take such action as he might deem expedient to ensure implementation of the resolution. The General Assembly had thereby laid the main responsibility on the Secretary-General, whose first step had been to appoint Mr. Omar Adeel as his Special Representative on the question of Aden. His delegation welcomed the choice of Mr. Adeel. Furthermore, the Secretary-General, in his report (see annex III), had stated that in the light of the report which his Special Representative would submit on the Special Committee's present discussions, he would consider the further steps to be taken in consultation with the Special Committee and the administering Power, all in accordance with the General Assembly resolutions. His delegation was therefore of the firm opinion that the Special Committee neither could nor should try to anticipate and influence the further measures to be taken and thereby bind the hands of the Secretary-General. The directives given to the Secretary-General in operative paragraph 12 could also be taken to imply a lack of confidence in him. That certainly could not have been the intention of any of the co-sponsors of the draft. In view of all those considerations his delegation would be unable to support the draft resolution.

346. However, it fully associated itself with the appeal for unity among the nationalist movements in South Arabia made by the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania on the previous day. That appeal was far more responsible than the expressions of support for one political faction given by a few delegations. It could never be to the advantage of the people of South Arabia to play up differences, which should be ironed out as soon as possible.

347. Although his delegation would have preferred the Special Committee to have made a more positive and imaginative approach than the draft represented, Denmark still had faith in the effective role which the United Nations could play in the attainment of genuine independence by South Arabia. Provided that there was goodwill on all sides, the United Nations could, through co-operation between the Secretary-General, the Special Committee and the administering Power, work out arrangements which would lead to the attainment of genuine independence by South Arabia in an orderly and peaceful manner. His delegation would do its utmost towards that end.

348. The representative of Poland said that his delegation welcomed the inclusion in the ten-Power draft resolution of operative paragraph 11, and attached particular importance to the steps to be taken by the administering Power as set out in operative paragraph 7. The military base should be dismantled in order to foster a climate of freedom and do away with that springboard for aggression against the Territory and other countries. The announcement by the United Kingdom Government that it would dismantle the Aden base was inconsistent with the new so-called defence arrangements that the administering Power contemplated, or had already concluded, with the unrepresentative régime. His delegation strongly opposed any such arrangements and could only consider them as a serious impediment to the free exercise of sovereignty in liberty. It would therefore welcome the inclusion in the draft resolution of a new paragraph dealing with that particular aspect of the problem. His delegation agreed with the aims of the draft resolution and would vote in favour of it.

349. The representative of Iran said that his delegation would have been glad to sponsor the draft resolution before the Special Committee. Indeed, it had been a sponsor of the original draft distributed on the previous day. Although it had some reservations about operative paragraphs 5 and 11, it had refrained from taking a strong stand because it wished to give priority to the views of the Arab representatives. However, since his delegation felt that operative paragraph 5 reflected the views of only one set of petitioners at the expense of the other major group, it could not adhere to it.

350. He wished to submit formally two amendments to operative paragraph 11: to insert the words "and such personalities as he may deem fit" after the words "... special mission to Aden composed of member States of the Special Committee ..."; and to amend the last phrase to read "and to report back to him as soon as possible". Those amendments would bring the resolution into line with General Assembly resolutions 1949 (XVIII) and 2023 (XX). Otherwise, his delegation fully supported all the provisions contained in the draft resolution.

351. The representative of India was puzzled that some people had said that the draft resolution contained nothing positive. For one thing, it appealed to all States to render all assistance to people of the Territory in their efforts to attain freedom and independence. One delegation had opposed the principle of aid by all States; yet it raised no particular objection to the assistance afforded Southern Rhodesia.

352. The conference mentioned in operative paragraph 5 certainly was not that contemplated in the United Nations resolution. However, the manoeuvres of the United Kingdom would not succeed. The Special Committee had confidence in the Secretary-General, and meanwhile the only possible measure was to adopt the resolution. He hoped that the petitioners would therefore be patient and not resort to other means.

353. The representative of Afghanistan said that Aden was a purely colonial issue and the administering Power was solely responsible for unconditional implementation of the United Nations resolutions and for guaranteeing the Territory's progress towards self-determination. It must cease military operations and ensure democratic elections; those elections could, he thought, best be supervised by the United Nations, as called for in paragraph 11 of the draft resolution.

354. The representative of Yugoslavia stated that his delegation considered that the Special Committee's duty was to suggest appropriate measures to find a peaceful solution to the difficult problem of Aden, and for that reason it had co-sponsored the draft resolution.

355. The representative of Chile stated that his delegation had carefully examined the draft resolution, particularly paragraph 11. A United Nations presence in the Territory, as requested by all the petitioners, was the only means, as everyone recognized, of inducing the administering Power to take measures consistent with the genuine participation of the people in the electoral consultation recommended by the United Nations. The other elements of the draft resolution were not new; all of them had already been included in previous resolutions on the question and expressed the Special Committee's concern at the administering Power's failure to respond to the resolutions already adopted by the United Nations. Therefore, prompted by a sincere desire for an end to the colonization of the Territory, the Chilean delegation would support the draft resolution.

356. The representative of Australia said that his delegation considered the words "... arising from the policies pursued by the administering Power of the Territory" in the fifth preambular paragraph of the draft resolution to be at the least an over-simplification. While admitting that United Kingdom statements on the question of Aden following the recent declarations of the Federal Ministers were not unequivocal, it felt that the sixth preambular paragraph, which read as follows: "Deploing the refusal of the administering Power to implement the resolutions of the General Assembly concerning the Territory of Aden and Aden Protectorates", was premature at that time.

357. Concerning operative paragraph 2, his delegation could not agree with the statement that the administering Power had set up an unrepresentative régime with a view to granting it independence contrary to the provisions of the General Assembly resolutions, and reiterated its belief in the paramountcy of the wishes of the people as freely expressed through elections held under universal adult suffrage. It was also in disagreement with operative paragraph 5, and considered operative paragraphs 6, 7, 8 and 9 to be an over-simplification of a complicated matter. It was deeply interested in operative paragraph 11, while doubting whether it was rightly worded.

358. At the 447th meeting, the representative of Iraq introduced a revised text of the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.309/Rev.1), which contained two changes. After operative paragraph 5, a new paragraph had been inserted which began, "Deplores any defence arrangement that the United Kingdom Government might enter into ...". That paragraph would prove useful in stipulating that such arrangements should be entered into only by sovereign States, and not by an administering Power and unrepresentative Governments. It would have served no purpose to bind the Territory to a Power that had ruled it for nearly 130 years.

359. The second change appeared in operative paragraph 12 (formerly paragraph 11). The revised text did not specify the composition of the special mission to Aden, as it had been felt that the Secretary-General should not be limited to the States members of the Special Committee in determining the membership of the mission but should be given greater latitude. The change had been made on the basis of the provisions of General Assembly resolution 2023 (XX) which, inter alia, urged the Secretary-General "to take such action as he may deem expedient to ensure the implementation of the present resolution and report thereon to the Special Committee"; and had also taken into account the intentions of the Secretary-General as expressed in paragraphs 6 and 7 of his report (see annex III). In carrying out the mandate given to him under the relevant resolutions, however, it was felt that it would be useful for the Secretary-General to be given some guidance by the Special Committee in the new task he was to undertake.

360. It was also essential, in order to assure the success of the special mission envisaged in operative paragraph 12, that before it started its work in the Territory, the United Kingdom Government should comply with the provisions contained in operative paragraph 3, and co-operate with the United Nations in the implementation of the relevant General Assembly resolutions. In that connexion, it was hoped that the Secretary-General would underline the imperative necessity for the administering Power to pave the way for the special mission by declaring its acceptance of the relevant resolutions and its willingness to implement their provisions. The mission's work would otherwise be seriously hindered and hampered.

361. In appointing the special mission, it was hoped that the Secretary-General would consult the Special Committee and convey its views and observations to the special mission, as the future of the Territory would depend upon the success of the work achieved. It was also hoped that the Secretary-General, in appointing the members of the special mission, would include members of the Special Committee, whose experience would be invaluable. In discharging its task the special mission should not limit its consultations to the administering Power but should attempt to consult as wide a cross-section of the population as possible, choose the best ways and means for undertaking such discussions, and extend these consultations outside the Territory wherever possible. It was hoped that when the special mission had accomplished its task and submitted its report, the Secretary-General would include his own observations and recommendations in transmitting it to the Special Committee. The special mission should be set up as soon as possible and proceed to the Territory without delay. In spite of the little time available, it was hoped that the report would be made available before the forthcoming session of the General Assembly, while it was, of course, left to the special mission to determine when and how it could submit its report.

362. Finally, the Sub-Committee on Aden would maintain its status quo, since no decision had been taken to dissolve it; its terms of reference would remain unchanged. The special mission's task was very different and of a particular nature, with a well defined mandate to determine United Nations participation in the forthcoming elections in the Territory. The Sub-Committee on Aden would continue to provide the Special Committee with information concerning any new developments in the Territory.

363. The representative of Madagascar said he regretted not having been in a position to co-sponsor the draft resolution, which had been submitted by ten members of the Committee, particularly since the text was broadly in accordance with his delegation's position on the question of Aden. His delegation had always warned the United Kingdom against holding elections which would not bring into power a government reflecting the popular will. It had appealed to the United Kingdom to implement resolution 1514 (XV), and it favoured the transfer of power to a government elected by the people. For all those reasons, it fully endorsed the provisions of paragraph 8 and the text of the draft resolution as a whole, although it had some reservations regarding paragraph 5. That paragraph took a position on a matter which could be regarded as purely private. The Special Committee should consider whether the conference referred to in paragraph 5 was at odds with the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly. Presumably it was not, except that the invitation was not issued by the administering Power. The Special Committee could protest to the United Kingdom Government and stress that it was not acting in accordance with United Nations resolutions, but it could not take a position favouring private groups. His delegation found the other provisions of the draft resolution satisfactory.

364. The representative of the United States of America stated that in the past her delegation had been unable to support a number of resolutions because it had considered that they lacked balance and failed to reflect the true situation. Those resolutions had condemned the United Kingdom for taking measures to suppress the acts of terrorism and violence without condemning the acts themselves. Also, they had called for immediate independence but had not mentioned the progress made towards that goal.

365. Her delegation was unable to support the present draft resolution for similar reasons. It appealed to the United Kingdom to end the military and civil measures but failed to deplore the acts of terrorism and violence which caused the United Kingdom to take such action. There was no mention of the progress already made towards independence nor recognition of steps taken by the Secretary-General in carrying out the mandate with which he had been entrusted.

366. Her Government welcomed the efforts made by the United Kingdom and the Federation Government and their willingness to accept the United Nations resolutions. It did not accept the argument that all those who disagreed with a certain course of action should be defined as true patriots and those who agreed as mere puppets, and it therefore could not dismiss as "mere British manoeuvres" actions aimed at the peaceful and democratic settlement of differences.

367. The representative of Italy considered that in the draft resolution the situation had been assessed through a certain perspective, with which his delegation was unable to agree. The United Kingdom had been shown as violating the United Nations resolutions, engaging in terrorism in the area and endangering world peace. It was not the Special Committee's task to apportion right or wrong, to establish who was responsible for the situation of unrest, to determine whether the United Kingdom had exceeded its lawful powers in maintaining law and order in the Territory, or to decide on the status of the wars of national liberation within the framework of the United Nations Charter, the essence of which was the solution of political differences by peaceful means. Those were highly controversial issues on which it would be difficult to arrive at a generally acceptable solution. However, his delegation felt that the draft resolution did not reflect the realities of the situation and would reserve its position.

368. Secondly, his delegation did not think that the Special Committee was empowered to or that it ought to take sides on matters of detail, for example, by recommending that a specific course of action should be followed in the implementation of the General Assembly resolutions or that certain consultations take place. In the past the Special Committee had often heard that the independence to be granted to a certain territory was not "genuine". The Special Committee had not interfered in the internal affairs of those Non-Self-Governing Territories and would be well advised to adhere to that practice in considering the question of Aden.

369. His delegation could not support operative paragraph 5, which ran contrary to the necessity to secure a large measure of agreement by all sections of the population. They had to be satisfied with the fact that the general elections would be held under United Nations guarantee and it should be left to the members of the National Assembly to prepare a new constitution without insisting on prerequisites and preconditions.

370. Thirdly, his delegation believed that it would be necessary for the United Nations, through the Secretary-General, to play a vital role in the peaceful attainment of independence by South Arabia. It did not think, however, that operative paragraph 11, even in its proposed revised form, would facilitate that task. He very much doubted the Special Committee's competence to give guidance to the Secretary-General and to indicate specific ways and means of implementing the task assigned to him by the General Assembly. He also feared that the paragraph might be interpreted as intended to limit the scope of action by the Secretary-General, and as an implied lack of confidence in his judgement.

371. Although there was a remarkable measure of agreement concerning the merits of the matter under consideration, his delegation regretted that it would be unable to support the draft resolution for the reasons he had given.

372. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania felt duty-bound as one of the co-sponsors of the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.309/Rev.1) to explain his delegation's position. Neither of the two representatives who had opposed it had been able to support any other resolution dealing with the independence of Territories under foreign administration. Strong words had been exchanged: certain delegations had condemned the refusal of others to support the draft, and two representatives had in turn found fault with the resolution, and hence with its co-sponsors, for aspects that they had deemed inappropriate. Firstly, they had regretted the lack of a paragraph thanking the Secretary-General. That had been an unfair criticism, as every member of the Special Committee had expressed appreciation of the Secretary-General's action and had welcomed Mr. Adeel to the Committee room. It had been impossible, however, to incorporate that appreciation and that welcome into the resolution, because the Secretary-General's Special Representative was there only to hear the Committee's deliberations and to report back to the Secretary-General. His presence was for the moment but a partial measure, and for that reason any recognition or thanks would have to be given when the measure undertaken was completed. It was sufficient recognition for the Committee to request further action on the part of the Secretary-General, which reflected their confidence in him. That request and that confidence could be shown in the Special Representative's report.

373. It had also been pointed out by the delegations opposing the resolution that the term "puppet government" was excessively strong. He had expected at that juncture that someone would attempt to show that the Government in question had really been elected by the people. It had been proven, however, that the sultans of South Arabia had been appointed by the Governor, who was so powerful that a stroke of his pen could wipe out or reinstate an official like Mr. Mackawee. When such a pen was wielded by a colonial Power, the Government concerned was obviously a puppet régime. The speakers who had opposed the resolution represented countries with a long tradition of democracy, and should understand that a régime thus established without free elections by the people was indeed a puppet government.

374. It had been suggested by the representative of Italy that a request for specific action was not within the Special Committee's terms of reference, whereas it had in fact been stipulated in the General Assembly's resolution, in operative paragraph 6 regarding the Special Committee, that the Committee should continue to perform its task and seek the best measures for implementing the relevant resolutions. Operative paragraph 6 had further authorized the Committee to continue to give particular attention to small Territories. The Special Committee was therefore acting within its terms of reference in recommending that the Secretary-General take certain actions, i.e., appoint a special mission whose report would be submitted through the Committee to the General Assembly.

375. One of the resolution's opponents had objected to giving status to wars of liberation. There had been widespread disagreement with him, in that Aden's revolution constituted a justified reaction against colonialism, which was itself a form of aggression.

376. Lastly, the delegations opposing the resolution had spoken of their past inability to support resolutions on Aden. Had the co-sponsors heard from the petitioners that the Special Committee's proposed action was not in the best interests of Aden, or had all the rest of the Committee not accepted the resolution in toto, there might have been some doubt as to its justification. The unqualified support of the petitioners and the rest of the Committee, however, had given the Committee a moral victory—in other words, complete assurance that it was doing the right thing.

377. In addition, the willingness shown by the puppet régime to seek means through a conference to implement the United Nations resolutions, was substantial proof of the general acceptance of the measures proposed. It was inconceivable that when even the puppet régime and the administering Power were seeking ways to implement the United Nations resolutions, countries with no colonial interests at stake should oppose the draft resolution.

378. If the same delegations thought that the United Nations was going too far, the co-sponsors would have to reply that they had not proposed drawing up a constitution for Aden, an initiative which belonged solely to the people of that Territory. The United Nations sought merely to set up circumstances which would be conducive to proper elections for a government by the people, an effort that had been successfully undertaken in the past, for example in Ruanda-Urundi.

379. It would have been preferable for non-supporters to avoid using words like "wise", which denoted an ill-founded value judgement. Had not democratic principles left it to the majority to decide what and who was wise? The United Republic of Tanzania, a country which certainly could not be called a "big Power", preferred to take its stand as one among many active supporters of the inalienable rights of man. As such, it had upheld the right and recognized the ability of Aden's people to govern themselves, even before the year 1968.

380. The representative of the Secretary-General said it would be noted that the request to appoint immediately a special mission to Aden, addressed to the Secretary-General in operative paragraph 12 of the revised draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.309/Rev.1) involved financial and other implications. However, in the absence of precise information such as the number of members to be included in the special mission, the Secretary-General was not in a position to submit a statement of financial implications as required under regulation 13.1 of the Financial Regulations of the United Nations. At the present stage he wished to inform the Special Committee that the Secretary-General would give consideration to the request addressed to him in operative paragraph 12, having regard to the responsibilities entrusted to him in General Assembly resolutions 1949 (XVIII) and 2023 (XX), and would bring to the attention of the Special Committee at the appropriate time any matters that might arise in that connexion.

381. The Special Committee then adopted the joint draft resolution, as revised (A/AC.109/L.309/Rev.1), by a roll-call vote of 18 to 2, with 2 abstentions as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Chile, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Republic of Tanzania, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, United States of America.

Abstaining: Denmark, Italy.

382. The text of the resolution (A/AC.109/179/Rev.1) adopted by the Special Committee at its 447th meeting on 15 June 1966 reads as follows:

"The Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

"Having considered the question of Aden,

"Having heard the petitioners,

"Recalling General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960 containing the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

"Recalling further General Assembly resolutions 1949 (XVIII) of 11 December 1963 and 2023 (XX) of 5 November 1965.

"Deeply concerned at the critical and explosive situation which is threatening peace and security in Aden and Aden Protectorates, arising from the policies pursued by the administering Power in the Territory,

"Deploing the refusal of the administering Power to implement the resolutions of the General Assembly concerning the Territory of Aden and Aden Protectorates,

"Recalling the various statements and declarations made by the administering Power concerning the Territory,

"1. Reaffirms the inalienable right of the people of the Territory to freedom and independence in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV);

"2. Deplores the setting up by the administering Power of an unrepresentative régime in the Territory, with a view to granting it independence contrary to General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) and 1949 (XVIII) and appeals to all States not to recognize such independence as is not based on the wishes of the people of the Territory freely expressed through elections held under universal adult suffrage;

"3. Calls upon the administering Power to declare unequivocally its acceptance of the relevant General Assembly resolutions and its readiness to co-operate with the United Nations in their implementation without delay;

"4. Reaffirms the view that the responsibilities which devolve on the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland as the administering Power cannot be shifted or circumvented through any action by an unrepresentative régime referred to in paragraph 2 above;

"5. Declares, consequently, that the conference envisaged in document A/AC.109/161/Add.1/Rev.1 or any other conference of a similar nature is not in accordance with the terms of the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly;

"6. Deplores any defence arrangement that the United Kingdom Government might enter into with the unrepresentative régime in the Territory and considers such arrangements as inconsistent with the objectives of the relevant General Assembly resolutions and a serious hindrance to the future free exercise of the right to freedom and sovereignty by the people of the Territory;

"7. Notes with deep concern that military operations against the people of the Territory are still being carried out by the administering Power;

"8. Urges the administering Power immediately to:

"(a) Abolish the state of emergency;

"(b) Repeal all laws restricting public freedom;

"(c) Cease all repressive actions against the people of the Territory, in particular, military operations;

"(d) Release all political detainees and allow the return of those people who have been exiled or deported for political reasons;

"9. Appeals to all States to render all assistance to the people of the Territory in their efforts to attain freedom and independence;

"10. Draws the attention of the Security Council to the dangerous situation prevailing in the area as a result of British military action against the people of the Territory;

"11. Again invites the Secretary-General to enter into consultation with the specialized agencies and other international organizations with a view to providing assistance to the refugees from the Territory of Aden and Aden Protectorates;

"12. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Special Committee and the administering Power, to appoint immediately a special mission to Aden for the purpose of recommending practical steps necessary for the full implementation of the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly, and in particular for determining the extent of United Nations participation in the preparation and supervision of elections and of making a report to him as soon as possible for transmission to the Special Committee;

"13. Decides to maintain the question of Aden on its agenda."

383. The text of the resolution was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 15 June 1966.⁸

G. FURTHER CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE⁹

Introduction

384. The Special Committee further discussed the question of Aden at its 462nd and 473rd meetings on 16 August and 19 October 1966. It had before it the report of the Secretary-General dated 5 August 1966, which is appended to this chapter as annex V, relating to the appointment of a special mission under the terms of operative paragraph 12 of the resolution adopted by the Committee at its 447th meeting on 15 June 1966 (see para. 382 above). During the course of these discussions, the Chairman of the Sub-Committee on Aden, the representative of Yugoslavia, submitted an oral report containing the views of that Sub-Committee on the report of the Secretary-General.

⁸ Official Records of the Security Council, Twenty-first Year, Supplement for April, May and June 1966, document S/7372.

⁹ See also chapter II (paras. 595-619) for an account of the discussions on the resolution adopted by the Special Committee at its 455th meeting on 22 June 1966 concerning the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) with regard to Territories considered by the Committee in Africa.

Written petitions

385. The Special Committee had before it the following additional written petitions concerning the Territory:¹⁰

¹⁰ The following petitions were circulated after the Special Committee had further considered the question of Aden at its 462nd and 473rd meetings: A/AC.109/PET.470/Add.1; A/AC.109/PET.564-566.

Petitioner	Document No.
Mr. Awadh Abdulla Arashani on behalf of students in Occupied South Arabia	A/AC.109/PET.496/Add.1
Mr. Abdulla Bakerman, Administrative Secretary, Arab Socialist Party of Hadhramaut	A/AC.109/PET.504/Add.1
Mr. Awad Bin Saleh, Sultan of the Qu'aiti State of the Hadhramaut	A/AC.109/PET.518
The Office of the President, Conference of the Tribes of the Western Region, Hadhramaut	A/AC.109/PET.519
Mr. Dagobert Krause on behalf of the Trade Unions International of Public Employees, Frankfurt	A/AC.109/PET.520
Mr. Khaled Aljundi, Chairman, Conference of Solidarity and Support for the People and Workers of Aden, Damascus	A/AC.109/PET.521
Two petitions from the Front for the Liberation of Occupied South Yemen (FLOSY)	A/AC.109/PET.469/Add.2
Mr. Abdul Qawi Mackawee, General Secretary, FLOSY	A/AC.109/PET.469/Add.3
President and members, Aden Municipal Council	A/AC.109/PET.470/Add.1
Mr. S. A. Alhabshi, Secretary-General, South Arabian League (SAL)	A/AC.109/PET.480/Add.2
Mr. Salim Alsafi, Vice-President, SAL	A/AC.109/PET.480/Add.3
South Arabian League (SAL)	A/AC.109/PET.480/Add.4
Sheikh Hussein Mansour, President and Ruler of Dathina State	A/AC.109/PET.522
Mr. Ahmed Fadhli Saidi and others "on behalf of Dathina Citizens in Aden"	A/AC.109/PET.523
Messrs. Ahmad Abdulla Alfadhli and Jebel Hussein Alaudali	A/AC.109/PET.524 and Add.1
"People of South Arabia in Riyadh"	A/AC.109/PET.564
"Spearhead of Farmers in Abyan"	A/AC.109/PET.565
"People of Dhala Emirate"	A/AC.109/PET.566

General statements by members

386. The representative of Iraq observed that the resolution which the Special Committee had adopted on 15 June 1966 (see para. 382 above) contained three important points. First, operative paragraphs 2 and 4 noted that the existing régime in the Territory was unrepresentative, and therefore could not be recognized as valid by the Special Committee or the United Nations. Secondly, operative paragraph 3 called upon the administering Power to declare unequivocally its acceptance of the relevant General Assembly resolutions and its readiness to co-operate with the United Nations in their implementation without delay. Thirdly, operative paragraph 12 requested the Secretary-General to appoint a special mission for the purpose of recommending practical steps for the full implementation of those resolutions.

387. The letter addressed to the Secretary-General by the United Kingdom delegation (see annex V, para. 6) had welcomed the assistance and participation of the United Nations in achieving its declared policy of bringing South Arabia to independence; in other words, the United Kingdom still intended to grant independence to the unrepresentative régime at present in power. The letter stated that the United Kingdom had no power to impose changes in the Federal Constitution, something which he himself could not accept. The letter spoke of treaties which, as the Special Committee well knew, were nothing but treaties between the conqueror and the conquered and could not be considered as international obligations; moreover, Article 103 of the Charter made it clear that, in the event of a conflict between obligations under the Charter and obligations under any other agreement, the former would prevail. In its letter the United Kingdom Government claimed that its responsibilities were restricted to external affairs, defence and the "public service", a term which could have a very wide range of meaning. Under Article 73 of the Charter, however, the United Kingdom Government had an obligation to transmit information to the Secretary-General relating to economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories for which it was responsible; it could therefore hardly argue that its responsibilities were confined to external affairs and defence.

388. The final paragraph of the letter obviously sought confirmation that the mission appointed would operate subject to the conditions set forth previously and could hardly be termed unequivocal acceptance of the relevant General Assembly resolutions, as called for in operative paragraph 3 of the latest resolution adopted by the Special Committee (see para. 382 above). That resolution had qualified the existing régime in the Territory as unrepresentative and yet the United Kingdom Government was now insisting that any mission would have to co-operate with that régime. In addition, the United Kingdom letter referred only to the operative paragraphs of General Assembly resolutions 1949 (XVIII) and 2023 (XX) and failed to mention resolution 1514 (XV), presumably because acceptance of that resolution would interfere with their own ideas about granting independence to the people of Aden.

389. Some members of the Special Committee might think that the Committee should agree to appoint a special mission without further delay but the mission would be useless if the conditions laid down by the United Kingdom were accepted. All the relevant texts had referred to the full implementation of United Nations resolutions and of the unequivocal acceptance by the United Kingdom of those resolutions; it would therefore be pointless to appoint a mission until the United Kingdom was prepared, first, to accept unequivocally the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and the Special Committee and, secondly, to agree to the full implementation of those resolutions without preconditions.

390. The representative of Denmark said that the paramount question before the Special Committee was whether it would prove possible for the Secretary-General to send a United Nations mission to South Arabia. So far, the Secretary-General had held private and informal consultations with the members of the Special Committee and with the United Kingdom. It was clear from the United Kingdom letter that important advances had been made on two essential points. The United Kingdom had now accepted the operative parts of two General Assembly resolutions, thereby meeting the demands made by several delegations; admittedly it had accepted with reservations, but it was not certain that those reservations would in fact stand in the way of the mission. Furthermore, it had, possibly for the first time, welcomed the sending of a United Nations mission to one of its dependent Territories other than a Trust Territory. His own delegation welcomed the United Kingdom initiative and hoped that all members of the Committee would do likewise. He also hoped that such a promising development would not be nipped in the bud; public discussion of the question, in which no concessions were likely to be made, was hardly likely to lead to a fruitful conclusion. He was therefore firmly convinced that the matter would best be discussed through informal consultations between the Secretary-General, the United Kingdom and the Chairman of the Special Committee.

391. The Special Committee should, however, make clear, perhaps through a statement by the Chairman, that its primary objective was to ensure that a United Nations mission was sent to Aden in order to assist in the processes leading to independence and that it hoped all the parties concerned would co-operate towards that end. His delegation would also appeal to all members to support the view that further consultations should be held in private, until it was established that agreement was possible on the question of sending a mission to Aden; only then would public debate on the subject be appropriate.

392. The representative of Yugoslavia, speaking as Chairman of the Sub-Committee on Aden, said that the Sub-Committee had met and reviewed the situation in the Territory in the light of the latest developments. It had taken note of the readiness of the United Kingdom to co-operate with the special mission to Aden. However, it considered that the reservations of the United Kingdom, as they appeared in paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 of its letter to the Secretary-General (see annex V) were not in accordance with the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Special Committee. The United Kingdom's attitude was not acceptable as a basis on which a special mission to Aden could be appointed or could operate. The special mission must be formed and must operate only under the terms of the relevant General Assembly resolutions as well as the resolution adopted by the Special Committee at Cairo on 15 June 1966, and after the unequivocal acceptance by the United Kingdom of those resolutions.

393. The representative of Bulgaria opposed the United Kingdom view that the question before the Special Committee should only be discussed in private consultations. The United Kingdom delegation itself had addressed a letter to the Secretary-General which was now before the Committee; moreover, it had raised the question of Aden in the Security Council, in the form of a rather vaguely worded complaint, and had made a similar request for the appointment of a special mission, in the hope that its own position would be confirmed. It could hardly contend, therefore, that the matter should not be discussed publicly. If the Special Committee agreed only to discuss questions when it was convenient to the United Kingdom, it might well solve the United Kingdom's problems but it would hardly solve the problems of the peoples concerned. The Chairman had therefore been right in allowing the discussion to proceed.

394. The first paragraph of the United Kingdom letter (see annex V, para. 6) stated that the United Kingdom Government welcomed the assistance and participation of the United Nations in achieving its declared policy of bringing South Arabia to independence. However, if the implication was that the United Nations accepted the policies of the United Kingdom in the matter, he would point out that all the relevant resolutions adopted by the Special Committee itself and by the General Assembly indicated disagreement with those policies. It would be rather excessive to assume that the Committee was offering to assist the United Kingdom in carrying out a policy which had been unequivocally rejected by the General Assembly.

395. Furthermore, the letter stated that the United Kingdom Government was bound by existing treaties with the Federation of South Arabia; that was clearly contrary to the statement that the United Kingdom accepted the operative clauses of General Assembly resolution 1949 (XVIII) and, in particular, resolution 2023 (XX) which had deplored the attempts made by the administering Power to establish an unrepresentative régime in the Territory. The United Kingdom Government was therefore asking the Special Committee and the General Assembly to repudiate its own resolutions, and its avowed policy of decolonization. It was asking the United Nations not only to accept the existence of an unrepresentative régime but also to endorse all the military and other treaties which it had concluded with its puppet Government.

in South Arabia in order to perpetuate its domination of that country. It was quite obvious that neither the General Assembly nor the Special Committee could accept that request.

396. The United Kingdom Government, however, went even further, and declared that it was constitutionally unable to give directions to the Federal Government except in matters of external affairs, defence and the Public Service, and had no power to impose changes in the Federal Constitution. That statement implied that acceptance of the Federation and its régime was a pre-condition for United Kingdom co-operation. The reservations expressed by the United Kingdom were not acceptable since they would constitute an abandonment of the most important provisions of the relevant General Assembly resolutions, and its offer to co-operate with a United Nations mission should be viewed merely as a manoeuvre.

397. The terms of reference of the special mission had to be clearly defined since it had a definite purpose, namely, to ensure the full implementation of United Nations resolutions. If the United Kingdom really wished to co-operate with a United Nations mission to Aden, it should accept unconditionally and unreservedly the relevant General Assembly resolutions and the resolutions of the Special Committee. Only if that were done could the mission operate adequately; if no such acceptance was forthcoming, a mission to Aden would be pointless.

398. The representative of Syria pointed out that the terms of reference of the proposed mission to Aden were clearly defined in operative paragraph 12 of the Special Committee's resolution (see para. 382 above). The mission was to recommend the practical steps necessary for the full implementation of the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly, to determine the extent of United Nations participation in the preparation and supervision of elections and to make a report to the Secretary-General as soon as possible for transmission to the Special Committee. Those terms of reference could not be subject to any conditions or reservations which would limit their scope or restrict their field of action.

399. The consultations mentioned in the same operative paragraph should be concerned solely with the question of appointment of the special mission, as was made clear in paragraph 5 of the Secretary-General's report (see annex V). The administering Power was entitled to be consulted on the membership of the mission, but it should not issue any conditions or reservations which would limit the terms of reference of the mission.

400. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that the fact that the question of Aden was still on the Special Committee's agenda demonstrated the failure of private diplomacy to settle it. Moreover, in an Organization with 117 Members and in a Committee with twenty-four members, private diplomacy could not begin until the views of all had been heard. Public debate had led the United Kingdom to accept the idea of a mission, and he hoped that more such debate would induce it to accept all the Committee's conditions. His delegation fully endorsed the Iraqi representative's analysis of the letter from the United Kingdom Government and supported the views expressed by the representatives of Yugoslavia, Bulgaria and Syria.

401. The Special Committee, in operative paragraph 12 of its resolution of 15 June 1966 had clearly stated the purpose of the proposed special mission to Aden. He welcomed the statement by the United Kingdom Government that it would be glad to co-operate with such a mission, but he wondered why it had found it necessary to specify, in the second paragraph of its letter, that its "responsibilities for security cannot be limited or abandoned". It was not the Committee's intention to limit those responsibilities or to ask the United Kingdom Government to abandon them. His delegation did not question the United Kingdom's responsibility to maintain security until such time as the colony of Aden attained its independence; all it asked was that the United Kingdom Government should not misuse that responsibility by killing the people of Aden. Secondly, the United Kingdom Government stated that it was "bound by . . . existing treaties with the Federation of South Arabia". However, since Aden was a colony, such treaties did not qualify for recognition by the United Nations, and any reference to them was irrelevant to the purpose of the Special Committee's resolution.

402. The United Kingdom Government's references to "external affairs" and "defence" were equally irrelevant. The United Republic of Tanzania refused to recognize the local Government of Aden on the grounds that it was unrepresentative. Moreover, the division of power between that Government and the United Kingdom Government was none of the Special Committee's concern except that, if it meant that the United Nations mission would have to deal with more than one authority in the Territory, its work might well prove fruitless. It should be clearly understood that when the mission went to Aden it was to deal with one Power alone, namely the administering Power.

403. The United Kingdom Government spoke of agreement on the composition of the mission. The reference in operative paragraph 12 of the resolution to consultation with the administering Power should cover that point; it was to be hoped that the United Kingdom Government would not insist that its consent must be secured for the appointment of each and every member of the mission by the Secretary-General. The United Kingdom Government also said that it had "no power to impose changes in the Federal Constitution". It was not the purpose of the proposed special mission to engage in constitutional talks; the constitution was a matter for the people of Aden to decide with the United Kingdom Government, and the role of the United Nations could only be that of a peace-maker.

404. His delegation appealed to the United Kingdom Government to refrain from pressing those minor points, so that the special mission could go to Aden and the Special Committee could proceed with its work, the aim of which was to secure the goodwill of the people of Aden and to help them to gain independence under the best possible conditions. Since all parties in Aden now accepted the role of the United Nations and did so unconditionally, it was to be hoped that the United Kingdom would not insist on conditions which would prevent the Organization from carrying out that role.

405. The representative of India said that since the views of the administering Power had been published officially, his delegation was in favour of public and formal discussion of the Secretary-General's report. His delegation agreed with the Sub-Committee's findings that the reservations of the administering Power were not in accordance with the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Special Committee and that the attitude of the British could not be acceptable as a basis for the formation of a visiting mission. However, the willingness of the administering Power to co-operate with the United Nations, although qualified by certain conditions, was an important point of departure, and every possible effort should be made to ensure that a mission was sent to Aden. The situation in the Territory was developing rapidly and it would be most useful to have a first-hand account of the state of affairs obtaining there. At the same time his delegation agreed with the representative of Iraq and the Sub-Committee on Aden that such a mission could not function if its authority was fettered in advance by unacceptable conditions. India therefore shared the Tanzanian representative's hope that the United Kingdom Government would not insist on the reservations mentioned in its letter. It was to be hoped that the Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom would return to New York with new instructions which would make it possible for a visiting mission to be appointed on terms acceptable to the Secretary-General, the Special Committee and the administering Power alike.

406. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics considered that it was the Committee's duty to follow developments connected with the problem of liquidating the colonial régime in Aden and South Arabia, and hence to hold a public discussion of the Secretary-General's report. His delegation was grateful to the Secretary-General for the efforts he was making to implement the General Assembly resolutions on Aden and the Special Committee resolution of 15 June 1966.

407. His delegation, too, endorsed the Iraqi representative's analysis of the United Kingdom Government's letter, from which it was clear that the United Kingdom still refused to accept the decisions of the United Nations on Aden and was striving to keep its puppet régime in power and to deprive the people of Aden and South Arabia of their right to genuine independence in accordance with the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

408. Among the reservations expressed by the United Kingdom Government on the question of co-operation with a United Nations mission was one amounting to a demand for recognition of the United Kingdom's existing treaty with the so-called Federation of South Arabia and certain other sultanates. The tactical aim of United Kingdom diplomacy at the present stage was to secure United Nations recognition for the puppet "Federal Government", which it had forced on the people of the Territory but which did not represent anyone. That was why the United Kingdom spoke in its letter only of the General Assembly resolutions and was completely silent concerning the Special Committee's resolution, which deplored the setting up of an unrepresentative régime in the Territory and reaffirmed the view that the responsibilities of the United Kingdom as the administering Power could not be transferred or circumvented through any action of an unrepresentative régime. The same resolution also deplored any defence arrangement entered into with the unrepresentative régime as a serious hindrance to the free exercise by the people of Aden of the right to freedom and independence.

409. The United Kingdom Government further stated that it was unable to give directions to the Federal Government except in matters of external affairs, defence and the Public Service and had no power to impose changes in the Federal Constitution. In other words, it sought to disclaim any responsibility for the future development of the Territory's internal affairs and illegally to confer on the Federal Government broad powers, obviously including powers to organize and hold elections in the colony. At the same time, it claimed that it could make no change, without the consent of the Federal Government, in the unjust constitution it had forced on the people. That assertion could not be taken seriously, since the United Kingdom, as the administering Power, was responsible for the Territory. The reservation concerning the United Kingdom's responsibilities for security, like the rest, was designed to keep the puppet régime in power and to suppress the national liberation movement in the Territory.

410. The general purport of the reservations was plainly incompatible with the requirements of the United Nations resolutions on Aden. The United Kingdom had the duty to fulfil, without conditions or reservations, the requirements of General Assembly resolutions 1949 (XVIII) and 2023 (XX) and thus discharge its obligations to the people of Aden. The inference was that the United Kingdom's new "initiative" was nothing but a manoeuvre calculated to lull world public opinion and to gain the time it needed in order to impose a false independence on the people of South Arabia as a means of preserving its economic and strategic interests in that important part of the world.

411. The United Nations should take part in the process of decolonizing South Arabia only on the basis of strict compliance with its resolutions. If the United Kingdom was really prepared to co-operate with the United Nations, it should withdraw its reservations and unequivocally state that it fully accepted the United Nations decisions on Aden and was ready to apply them. If it did not do so, the sending of a special mission to the Territory would not achieve the declared goal of the United Nations in respect of Aden, namely, the accession of the people of Aden to genuine independence.

412. The representative of Australia said that, in his delegation's view, the United Kingdom Government was sincere in attempting to give South Arabia independence as a united, sovereign State by 1968, but the atmosphere in the Territory was such that the British Government had been unable to take the steps necessary for the establishment of such a State. Australia therefore welcomed the United Kingdom Government's agreement to accept a visiting mission, subject to certain entirely reasonable conditions. The Special Committee would be doing the United Nations a disservice if it failed to accept the United Kingdom's offer; it should seize that opportunity as an important step towards the end of violence, fear and assassination and towards the creation of a new, independent Arab State.

413. In his view, private discussion was usually more rewarding than public debate in which emotions could become inflamed and the interests of the people—the party most concerned—might be overlooked.

414. The representative of Iran expressed his Government's belief that the problem of Aden could be solved only on the basis of the Special Committee resolution of 15 June 1966 and the General Assembly resolutions which had preceded it; that the provisions of those resolutions could not be changed by any Power; and that a representative government was the only proper authority to which power should be transferred on the attainment of independence. His delegation noted with appreciation the steps taken by the Secretary-General to discharge his task under paragraph 12 of the Special Committee resolution. In its opinion, the Secretary-General would do well to extend his consultations to those members of the Special Committee whom he had not yet consulted, and in particular those from countries in the same area as Aden.

415. Although the United Kingdom's position represented some progress, its reservations were not in keeping with the resolutions he had mentioned, and his delegation too endorsed the Iraqi representative's analysis of the United Kingdom Government's letter. Iran could not accept any reservations which would impede the establishment of a representative government.

416. In his opinion, the Secretary-General could make his task easier by seeking clarification of the United Kingdom reservations. If, as a result, it became clear that they would indeed prevent him from carrying out his appointed task, the Secretary-General should then inform the Special Committee accordingly. If, on the other hand, those reservations represented merely a preliminary position and the United Kingdom did not attach such importance to them as to preclude the successful dispatch of a mission to the Territory, then every effort should be made to achieve a solution. In short, although the reservations were not acceptable, no opportunity should be lost to establish a United Nations presence in Aden. He joined the representative of Tanzania in appealing to the United Kingdom delegation not to insist on its reservations.

417. The representative of Italy noted that the report of the Secretary-General was only an interim one and that the letter from the Deputy Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom represented a considerable advance. Every effort should be made to reach an agreement acceptable to all parties and his delegation had full confidence in the Secretary-General to carry out the necessary negotiations. If a United Nations mission was sent to Aden it would be the first such mission to a non-autonomous Territory and that would be a useful precedent. The best course would be to continue informal consultations, since public discussions were sometimes likely to jeopardize negotiations. The Chairman was already in a position to convey the views of the Special Committee to the Secretary-General. Although there had been differences of opinion, there had also been a unanimous feeling in favour of making possible the sending of a mission to Aden. It would be better to await the outcome of further negotiations before the Committee came to a conclusion.

418. The representative of Mali said that he could not help wondering what the United Kingdom's real intentions were. On 2 August 1966, the United Kingdom Government had asked the Security Council to investigate certain incidents in South Arabia. Yet, on 1 August 1966 it had sent a letter to the Secretary-General placing unacceptable conditions on the sending of a special mission to the Territory, conditions which constituted a veiled rejection of United Nations resolutions. He hoped that the United Kingdom Government had not closed the door on negotiations and that the Sub-Committee on Aden would continue its efforts so that an agreement could be reached. It should be left to the Chairman of the Special Committee and to the Secretary-General to decide on the method of approach.

419. The representative of the United States of America said his delegation had always expressed interest in self-determination for the people of South Arabia and gratification over the steps taken by the United Kingdom towards that end. The Special Committee, which was concerned with implementing the principles of self-determination, could not fail to welcome the decision to grant independence to South Arabia by 1968. It was important that independence should be brought about in conditions of peace and with the agreement of all groups in South Arabia and should not be imposed from outside. The United Kingdom Government had accepted the operative clause of the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly, subject to recognition of its continuing legal responsibilities in the area, and was ready to co-operate with a mission sent to recommend steps to implement those General Assembly resolutions and to make suggestions concerning the role of the United Nations in the election process. His Government welcomed, in particular, the prospect of the United Nations playing a role in South Arabia. He was confident that the Secretary-General would work out, with the United Kingdom Government, appropriate conditions for sending such a mission.

420. The representative of Tunisia said that the mandate given to the Secretary-General in operative paragraph 12 of the resolution adopted by the Special Committee at its 447th meeting (see para. 382 above) was clear and he thanked the Secretary-General for the efforts he had made to carry it out. The letter dated 1 August 1966 from the Deputy Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom to the Secretary-General was the first instance of the United Kingdom agreeing in principle to the sending of a United Nations mission to a Territory under its administration. He deplored the reservations expressed by the United Kingdom in that letter, but hoped that they were no stronger than those usually expressed by the United Kingdom whenever the Special Committee discussed the question of Aden and that they were not intended to render a United Nations mission ineffective. He therefore urged the Secretary-General to continue negotiations with the United Kingdom in order to find a way to implement the Special Committee's resolution. The sending of a mission would afford a opportunity for useful co-operation between the administering Power and the United Nations and would facilitate the realization of the aspirations of the people of the Territory. He supported the appeal made by the Tanzanian representative to the United Kingdom and hoped that the United Kingdom would give the mission all the help it needed to fulfil its mandate.

421. The representative of Uruguay thought that the reservations expressed by the Deputy Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom in his letter to the Secretary-General did not affect the basic position either of the Uruguayan delegation or of the Special Committee. It was highly desirable that a mission should be sent to Aden and that it should be given complete freedom of action and an opportunity to secure all the information it needed and to reach its own conclusions. That should be borne in mind when the members of the mission were being appointed. Negotiations concerning the sending of a mission should continue. It was not necessary for the United Kingdom first to accept all United Nations resolutions in toto. The sending of a mission to Aden might be an important contribution to the Special Committee's efforts to secure full independence for the Territory.

422. The representative of Venezuela shared the concern of other members of the Special Committee regarding the letter from the Deputy Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom to the Secretary-General. It was necessary for the well-being of the people of Aden that a mission should be sent and he hoped that the United Kingdom would agree that the work of such a mission would not be objective if its mandate was restricted. He hoped that a reasonable agreement would be reached so that it would be possible to send a mission to Aden.

423. The Chairman stated that he would convey the views expressed by members at the meeting to the Secretary-General.

424. On the same day, the Chairman informed the Secretary-General of the views expressed by members of the Special Committee at its 462nd meeting.

425. At the 473rd meeting, the representative of Iraq recalled that several delegations had found unacceptable the conditions laid down by the United Kingdom Government concerning the implementation of the General Assembly resolutions on Aden and in particular the sending of a special mission there. The Sub-Committee on Aden, along with many delegations, had considered that no mission should be appointed until the United Kingdom had accepted the relevant resolutions without any conditions or reservations. He wondered whether the Secretary-General or his representative could inform the Special Committee about the latest developments on this question.

426. The representative of Iraq expressed the hope that nothing would be done about the appointment of the special mission before the United Kingdom Government had withdrawn its reservations in a clear and written declaration.

427. The Chairman said that he had already brought the views of the members of the Special Committee to the attention of the Secretary-General and had had conversations with him concerning the implementation of the Special Committee's resolution. Those conversations were still going on.

428. The representative of the Secretary-General, in response to the statement of the representative of Iraq, informed the Special Committee that the Secretary-General was continuing his consultations concerning the request addressed to him in operative paragraph 12 of the resolution on the question of Aden adopted by the Special Committee on 15 June 1966.

429. In so doing, the Secretary-General had taken fully into account the views expressed by the Chairman of the Sub-Committee on Aden, on behalf of that Sub-Committee, and by the members of the Special Committee at its 462nd meeting, on the letter dated 1 August 1966 from the United Kingdom Government (see annex V), and in particular on the reservations stated in that letter. The Secretary-General had had several consultations on the subject with all concerned, particularly with the Chairman of the Special Committee and the representative of the administering Power.

430. The Secretary-General would report on the outcome of his consultations as soon as possible.

ANNEX I

[A/AC.109/161]

Question of Aden

Report of the Secretary-General (16 May 1966)

INTRODUCTION

1. In resolution 2023 (XX) on the question of Aden, which the General Assembly adopted on 5 November 1965, the Secretary-General was requested "to take such action as he may deem expedient to ensure the implementation of the present resolution, and to report thereon to the Special Committee".

2. The Secretary-General transmitted the text of the resolution to the Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to the United Nations by letter dated 10 November 1965. The text of the resolution was also transmitted to all States and to the following specialized agencies and international relief organizations; the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the International Labour Organisation, the World Health Organization, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the League of Red Cross Societies and the International Committee of the Red Cross.

3. The present report contains a brief account of the Secretary-General's consultations with the United Kingdom as well as the replies received from Governments, specialized agencies and international relief organizations.

I. CONSULTATIONS WITH THE UNITED KINGDOM

4. In response to a request made in the Special Committee, the representative of the Secretary-General informed the Committee, at its 401st meeting, on 6 April 1966, that the Secretary-General had been in communication with the representative of the United Kingdom in connexion with the implementation of the resolution. He stated that the Secretary-General would be holding consultations with the representative of the United Kingdom regarding the various matters covered by General Assembly resolution 2023 (XX) and that he would report to the Special Committee as soon as possible.

5. Since that date, the Secretary-General has had further discussions with the representative of the United Kingdom.

6. On 13 May 1966, the United Kingdom Permanent Representative and Minister of State for Foreign Affairs informed the Secretary-General that the Government of the Federation of South Arabia had announced, on that day, its acceptance of the United Nations resolutions relating to South Arabia and its intention to arrange as soon as possible a conference representative of all States in South Arabia, together with political groups and others to consider the ways and means whereby the United Nations resolutions could be implemented. The full text of the Federal Government's announcement is reproduced below:

"The Federal Government has been considering in the light of recent developments what further action is required in pursuance of its policy to realize the unification and independence of South Arabia. As is well known the Federal Government has repeatedly and consistently pressed both publicly and in private for the unification of our beloved homeland. The foundation of the Federation and the accession to it of further States, until it now embraces seventeen States, were vital and practical steps towards the bringing of all South Arabia under one strong, central Government. At the 1964 Conference the Federal Government obtained a promise that South Arabia would be granted independence not later than 1968 and an invitation was then issued to the States remaining outside the Federation to join us. At the 1965 Conference the Federal Government stated that it considered it of the utmost importance that all States in South Arabia should participate in all future discussions of constitutional matters, and endorsed the principles of self-determination and independence underlying the United Nations resolutions. More recently there has been a number of new developments. The Federal Government brought about the removal of the legal obstacles to the return of South Arabian political exiles and has had useful unofficial discussions in Beirut and elsewhere with representatives of the South Arabian League and other political personalities. The Federal Government appointed constitutional advisers to study the practical problems involved in a constitution for the whole of South Arabia and their report has been made available to the public. In the light of all these developments and in response to the wishes of the people of South Arabia, the Federal Government has decided to accept the United Nations resolution relating to South Arabia. The Federal Government has accordingly decided to arrange as soon as possible a conference representative of all States in the Federation of South Arabia, the Qu'aiti, Kathiri, Mahr and Upper Yafa'i States, the political groups and others who care for their homeland, to consider the ways and means whereby the United Nations resolutions can be implemented and to create an atmosphere conducive to bringing about constitutional changes which will unify South Arabia in preparation for the time when it will take its place as a sovereign independent Arab State."

7. On 16 May 1966, the Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom further informed the Secretary-General that the United Kingdom Government had welcomed the Federal Government's decision to invite the States, political groups and others to consult together about their future. He also informed the Secretary-General that in a statement made on 16 May in the House of Commons in London, the United Kingdom Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had made it clear that the United Kingdom Government welcomed the decision of the Federal Government in connexion with the United Nations resolutions and had referred to the intention of the Federal Government to communicate to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, through the United Kingdom Government, a request for the appointment of a United Nations Observer at the conference which it is intended to convene for the purpose of agreement on laying down a programme according to which the United Nations resolutions could be implemented.

8. The Secretary-General understands that the Federal Government's request may be expected to reach him shortly.

II. REPLIES FROM GOVERNMENTS

Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic

[The reply, dated 27 December 1965, from the Permanent Mission of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic to the United Nations is reproduced in document A/6317.]

India

[Original text: English]
[7 January 1966]

The Government of India has taken note of resolution 2023 (XX) of 5 November 1965 concerning the question of Aden which had been co-sponsored by the delegation of India in the Fourth Committee.

Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic

[The reply, dated 2 March 1966, from the Permanent Representative of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic to the United Nations is reproduced in document A/6276.]

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics

[The reply, dated 14 December 1965, from the Permanent Representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to the United Nations is reproduced in document A/6179.]

III. REPLIES FROM SPECIALIZED AGENCIES AND INTERNATIONAL RELIEF ORGANIZATIONS

International Labour Organisation

[Original text: English]
[23 November 1965]

I have the honour to inform you that the request addressed in that resolution to the specialized agencies, to which you have drawn our attention, has been duly noted.

International Committee of the Red Cross

[Original text: English]
[2 December 1965]

We have duly taken note of resolution 2023 (XX) adopted by the General Assembly at its 1368th plenary meeting on 5 November 1965.

League of Red Cross Societies

[Original text: English]
[7 December 1965]

We have taken particular note of the request formulated in the resolution under reference, that the international relief organizations offer all possible assistance to the people who are suffering as a result of the military operations in the Territory of Aden.

ANNEX II

[A/AC.109/L.289]

18 May 1966

Report of the Sub-Committee on Aden

Chairman: Mr. Danilo LEKIĆ (Yugoslavia)

1. The Sub-Committee on Aden was established by a resolution adopted by the Special Committee on 9 April 1964 (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. VI, para. 166). The Sub-Committee's terms of reference, as set out in that resolution, are as follows:

"(a) Study and keep under constant review the situation in the Territory and to report thereon to the Special Committee;

"(b) Establish contacts with the administering Power at such time and place as may be agreed upon, with a view to implementing resolutions 1514 (XV) and 1949 (XVIII);

"(c) Arrange in consultation with the administering Power, for visits to the Territory;

"(d) Make such other visits as may be deemed necessary".

2. The Sub-Committee has already presented three reports to the Special Committee. The first (ibid., chap. VI, annex) was submitted in November 1964, the second (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. VI, appendix I) in April 1965 and the third (ibid., appendix II) in September 1965.

3. Following the submission of the last report of the Sub-Committee, the Special Committee decided at its 386th meeting on 16 September 1965 to take note of the Sub-Committee's report, endorse the conclusions in that report and transmit it to the General Assembly together with the report already prepared for 1965 on the question of Aden (ibid., chap. VI, sections A-C). The Special Committee also decided that the Sub-Committee on Aden would, in accordance with operative paragraph 12 of the resolution adopted by the Special Committee on 17 May 1965 (ibid., chap. VI, para. 300), keep the question of Aden under constant review and report to the Special Committee as necessary.

4. At the 401st meeting of the Special Committee, on 6 April 1966, the Chairman of the Special Committee announced that Afghanistan would fill the vacancy on the Sub-Committee on Aden created by the withdrawal of Cambodia from membership of the Special Committee. Accordingly, the Sub-Committee on Aden is composed of Afghanistan, Iraq, the Ivory Coast, Venezuela and Yugoslavia.

5. The Sub-Committee has held four meetings in 1966, on 10, 16, 17 and 18 May.

6. At its first meeting, on 10 May, the Sub-Committee unanimously elected Mr. Danilo Lekić (Yugoslavia) as Chairman.

7. Following the meeting of the Sub-Committee on 16 May, the Chairman, on the same day, introduced an oral report to the Special Committee at its 414th meeting. The text of the report was as follows:

"At its meeting of 16 May 1966, the Sub-Committee on Aden considered the question of the implementation of General Assembly resolution 2023 (XX). The Sub-Committee noted that among the recommendations and requests made by the General Assembly was a request to the Secretary-General:

"... to take such action as he may deem expedient to ensure the implementation of the present resolution, and to report thereon to the Special Committee."

"At today's meeting of the Sub-Committee on Aden, I reported that I had seen the Secretary-General, who had informed me that, as a result of his consultations with the representative of the United Kingdom, he expected to be able to present a report to the Special Committee this afternoon. As already mentioned, copies of that report in English have been made available to the Special Committee. The Sub-Committee decided to request the Chairman of the Special Committee to hold another meeting of the Special Committee before it leaves for Africa in order that it may continue its consideration of the Secretary-General's report."

8. At the same meeting, the Special Committee decided to hold another meeting on the question of Aden before its departure for Africa, it being understood that, if the Sub-Committee considered it necessary, it would submit a further report to the Special Committee.

9. At its meeting on 17 May 1966, the Sub-Committee considered the report of the Secretary-General presented in accordance with paragraph 13 of resolution 2023 (XX) (see annex I), the statement made by the Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom at the 414th meeting of the Special Committee on 16 May, and the statement made by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in the House of Commons on 16 May to which the Permanent Representative referred (see annex IV).

10. In making the following comments on these statements, the Sub-Committee wishes to make it clear that the points it has raised are in the nature of preliminary observations and should not be considered as exhaustive.

11. At the outset, the Sub-Committee would point out that in making its comments on these statements, it has based itself on the resolutions of the General Assembly on the question of Aden, namely, resolutions 1949 (XVIII) of 11 December 1963, 1972 (XVIII) of 16 December 1963 and 2023 (XX) of 5 November 1965, which have been adopted in the context of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples contained in resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960.

12. The Sub-Committee notes that, in the statements made on behalf of the Government of the United Kingdom, there are references to the attitude of the so-called Government of the Federation of South Arabia to the United Nations resolutions on Aden. The Sub-Committee would draw attention to the fact that these resolutions and the requests contained in them are directed to the Government of the United Kingdom, which, in its capacity as administering Power, the United Nations holds responsible for implementing the resolutions in the Territory. Accordingly, it is the attitude of the Government of the United Kingdom which is of concern to the United Nations. The so-called Government of the Federation which, as the Sub-Committee has previously shown, does not represent the people of South Arabia, has no standing in the matter.

13. With regard to the attitude of the Government of the United Kingdom, the Sub-Committee has been unable to find in the statements made by the Permanent Representative and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs any clear acceptance of the United Nations resolutions. On such important matters as the ending of the state of emergency and the release of political prisoners, which are among the measures called for by the United Nations, these statements indicate only a qualified acceptance. Furthermore, they fail to show that the Government of the United Kingdom has agreed to take the steps outlined in the United Nations resolutions and in the sequence set out therein. These steps and the sequence to be followed were clearly outlined in the report of the Sub-Committee on Aden presented to the Special Committee in September 1965, as follows:

"78. The Sub-Committee is convinced that the administering Power's immediate objective should be the holding of general elections throughout the Territory and that it should direct all its efforts towards arranging for them without delay. The immediate steps should be those outlined in General Assembly resolution 1949 (XVIII) and in the resolutions of the Special Committee, namely, the holding of a conference for the purpose of deciding on the necessary constitutional measures for holding such elections and the establishment of the proper atmosphere in which elections could be held through the abolition of the state of emergency, as well as the repeal of all laws restricting public freedom, the cessation of all repressive actions against the people of the Territory, the release of political detainees and the return of exiles. At the same time, the steps outlined in resolution 1949 (XVIII) should be taken to arrange for an effective United Nations presence before and during these elections. After elections have been held and a representative government has been formed conversations should be opened without delay with that Government for the purpose of fixing the date for the granting of independence and making the arrangements for the transfer of power." (A/6009/Rev.1, chap. VI, appendix II).

14. The Sub-Committee wishes to emphasize the importance of an effective United Nations presence in the Territory once these steps are taken. It would also recall that the General Assembly, in paragraph 9 of resolution 1949 (XVIII), requested the Secretary-General to arrange for an effective United Nations presence "in consultation with the Special Committee and the administering Power".

15. The Sub-Committee is convinced that the conference to which reference is made in the statements, should have been called by the administering Power in accordance with the conditions set out in General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV), 1949 (XVIII) and 2023 (XX).

16. On the broader aspects of the implementation of resolution 2023 (XX), the Sub-Committee notes with concern from the Secretary-General's report (see annex I) the lack of response by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the specialized agencies and the international relief organizations to the General Assembly's request that they offer all possible assistance to the people who are suffering as a result of the military operations in the Territory.

17. While the Sub-Committee is aware that the Special Committee will be giving the question of Aden full consideration in Cairo in the course of its meetings in Africa, it recommends to the Special Committee that, as preliminary action on the question of Aden, it:

- (i) Emphasize that it is the Government of the United Kingdom as administering Power, which the United Nations regards as the authority responsible for implementing the United Nations resolutions in the Territory;
- (ii) Urge the Government of the United Kingdom to implement immediately the steps outlined in the United Nations resolutions on the Territory so that the people of the Territory may accede to independence in accordance with their freely expressed wishes and without further delay;
- (iii) Further urge the Government of the United Kingdom to make it possible for the Sub-Committee to visit the Territory in accordance with its mandate;
- (iv) Express its appreciation to the Secretary-General and request him to continue to take whatever action he may deem expedient to ensure the implementation of General Assembly resolution 2023 (XX), bearing in mind, in particular, the request to him to arrange for an effective United Nations presence as set out in paragraph 9 of resolution 1949 (XVIII);
- (v) Request the Secretary-General to ascertain from the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the specialized agencies and the international relief organizations what action they propose to take in response to the request made to them in paragraph 12 of resolution 2023 (XX);
- (vi) Further request the Secretary-General to report to the Special Committee during its current session on the matters referred to in sub-paragraphs (iv) and (v) above.

ANNEX III

[A/AC.109/161/Add.1/Rev.1]

Question of Aden

Report of the Secretary-General (9 June 1966)

1. In his last report to the Special Committee (see annex I) of 16 May 1966, the Secretary-General stated that the Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland had informed him that the Government of the Federation of South Arabia intended to request the Secretary-General to appoint a United Nations Observer to the conference which it intended to convene. The Secretary-General also stated that he understood that the Federal Government's request might be expected to reach him shortly.

2. In a letter dated 25 May the Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom transmitted a letter dated 15 May from the Minister of External Affairs of the Government of the Federation of South Arabia to the Secretary-General.

3. The letter from the Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom reads as follows:

"I have the honour to transmit to you a letter from the Minister of External Affairs of the Federation of Southern Arabia to Your Excellency, enclosing the Federal Government's statement of 13 May and requesting Your Excellency to appoint an observer to the conference being convened on 1 August to consider ways and means whereby the United Nations resolutions on South Arabia can be implemented.

"The United Kingdom Government endorses this request and hopes that Your Excellency will feel able to agree to it."

4. The letter from the Minister of External Affairs of the Government of the Federation reads as follows:

"You will have heard of the statement made on 13 May 1966 in which my Government announced its acceptance of the United Nations resolutions relating to South Arabia, and of its decision to arrange as soon as possible a conference representative of all South Arabian States and political groups to consider ways and means whereby the United Nations resolutions can be implemented. A copy of the statement is attached.^a

"Invitations to attend the Conference at the federal capital, Al Ittihad, starting on Monday, 1 August 1966, are now being issued. My Government, being fully aware of the heavy responsibility it bears to the people of South Arabia to take every possible step to ensure a successful outcome to the Conference, has instructed me to approach Your Excellency with the earnest request that a United Nations Observer be appointed to attend the Conference. The Observer, whom we feel should be an Arab, will assist us in our discussions, and report to Your Excellency on their outcome.

"My Government is very hopeful that Your Excellency will find it possible to accede to its request for the appointment of an Observer, whose presence at the forthcoming Conference will not only do much to ensure the success of the Conference but will associate the United Nations with the drawing up of detailed proposals giving effect to its own resolutions and which are likely to have far-reaching effects for the future of the people of South Arabia."

5. It will be recalled that the General Assembly, in paragraph 9 of its resolution 1949 (XVIII) of 11 December 1963, requested the Secretary-General "in consultation with the Special Committee and the administering Power, to arrange for an effective United Nations presence before and during the elections referred to in paragraph 8 above". Further, the General Assembly, in paragraph 13 of its resolution 2023 (XX) of 5 November 1965, requested the Secretary-General "to take such action as he may deem expedient to ensure the implementation of the present resolution, and to report thereon to the Special Committee". The Secretary-General has had discussions with the Special Committee's Sub-Committee on Aden and with the Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom in connexion with the carrying out of these tasks.

6. In order to assist him in the discharge of the responsibility entrusted to him by the above-mentioned resolutions, the Secretary-General has decided to appoint Mr. Omar A. H. Adeel as his Special Representative for the question of Aden. The Secretary-General's Special Representative will attend the meetings of the Special Committee during its forthcoming consideration of the question of Aden.

7. Following the Special Committee's consideration of the question, and in the light of the report of his Special Representative, the Secretary-General will consider the further steps to be taken in consultation with the Sub-Committee on Aden, the Special Committee and the administering Power, in the carrying out of his tasks.

ANNEX IV

[A/AC.109/163]

Letter dated 17 May 1966 from the Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to the United Nations addressed to the Chairman of the Special Committee

In accordance with my undertaking at the 414th meeting of the Special Committee on 16 May 1966, I have the honour to transmit the text of the statement made on the same day in the House of Commons by the Right Honourable Michael Stewart, M.P., United Kingdom Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, on South Arabia.

The full text of the announcement by the Government of the Federation of South Arabia on 13 May, to which the Foreign Secretary referred, is included in paragraph 6 of the report of the Secretary-General to the Special Committee circulated as document A/AC.109/161.^a

I should be grateful if Your Excellency would arrange for the text of this letter and its enclosure to be circulated as a document of the Special Committee.

(Signed) CARADON

FEDERATION OF SOUTH ARABIA

Text of a statement by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the Rt. Hon. Michael Stewart, M.P., in the House of Commons on 16 May 1966

With permission, Mr. Speaker, and that of the House, I wish to make a statement on South Arabia.

Hon. Members will have seen reports of the statement made by the Government of the Federation of South Arabia on the 13th of May that they have decided to accept the United Nations resolutions on South Arabia and intend to convene a conference, open to all state governments and political groups in South Arabia, to consider the ways and means whereby the United Nations resolutions can be implemented. I have now received the full texts of the Federal Government's statement and I am arranging for a copy to be placed in the Library of the House.

Her Majesty's Government have always made it clear that they will accept any solution of the constitutional problem in South Arabia which is capable of achieving a wide measure of agreement in the territory. We accordingly warmly welcome the Federal Government's intention to hold a representative conference and we share their hope that all South Arabians who have the interests of their country at heart will find it possible to participate.

Other political groups in South Arabia have also called for acceptance of the United Nations resolutions. There thus now exists a wide area of common ground between them and the Federal Government about their future objectives. This should enable them to co-operate in working out the practical implications of their policy.

Some of the recommendations in the United Nations resolutions raise problems of timing which will call for careful consideration. Those relating to the Aden base are already covered by Her Majesty's Government's announcement in the Defence White Paper that British troops will be withdrawn from the base when South Arabia achieves its independence not later than 1968. There are others, such as the requirements that the emergency should be brought to an end and that all detainees should be released, which we should be prepared to implement provided that satisfactory evidence was forthcoming that terrorism in Aden had ended.

^a See annex I, para. 6

^a See annex I.

I have today learned that the Federal Government have handed to the High Commissioner, for transmission to the United Nations Secretary-General, a letter inviting him to appoint a United Nations observer to attend the proposed conference. I am asking my noble Friend, Lord Caradon, to inform the United Nations of the Federal Government's announcement and invitation and to take an early opportunity to discuss these generally welcome developments with the Secretary-General.

ANNEX V

[A/AC.109/101/Add.2 and Corr.1]

Question of Aden

Report of the Secretary-General (5 August 1966)

1. In his last report to the Special Committee on the question of Aden (see annex III), submitted in accordance with operative paragraph 13 of General Assembly resolution 2023 (XX) of 5 November 1965, the Secretary-General informed the Committee that his Special Representative for Aden, Mr. Omar A. H. Adeel, would attend the meetings of the Special Committee in Cairo during its consideration of the question of Aden. The Secretary-General also stated that, following the Special Committee's consideration of the question, and in the light of the report of his Special Representative, he would consider the further steps to be taken in carrying out his tasks in consultation with the Sub-Committee on Aden, the Special Committee and the administering Power.

2. At its 447th meeting, held in Cairo on 15 June 1966, the Special Committee adopted a resolution on the question of Aden (see para. 382 of chapter VI). In operative paragraph 12 of the resolution the Special Committee requested the Secretary-General, "in consultation with the Special Committee and the administering Power, to appoint immediately a special mission to Aden for the purpose of recommending practical steps necessary for the full implementation of the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly, and in particular for determining the extent of United Nations participation in the preparation and supervision of elections and of making a report to him as soon as possible for transmission to the Special Committee".

3. The Secretary-General transmitted the text of the resolution to the Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to the United Nations by letter dated 20 June 1966.

4. At the conclusion of the Special Committee's consideration of the question at its meetings in Cairo, the Secretary-General's Special Representative immediately returned to Headquarters and submitted a report to the Secretary-General. In his report, the Special Representative informed the Secretary-General of the discussions in the Special Committee leading to the adoption of its resolution.

5. In the light of the Special Representative's report and on the basis of the resolution adopted by the Special Committee, the Secretary-General, assisted by his Special Representative, began consultations on the appointment of the special mission. In the course of these consultations, the Secretary-General met and discussed the question with the Chairman of the Special Committee, the members of the Sub-Committee on Aden, and with the representative of the United Kingdom.

6. On 1 August 1966 the Deputy Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom addressed the following letter^a to the Secretary-General:

'Her Majesty's Government welcome the assistance and participation of the United Nations in achieving Her Majesty's Government's declared policy of bringing South Arabia to independence as a united sovereign state by 1968.

"Her Majesty's Government accept the operative clauses of General Assembly resolutions 1949 (XVIII) of December 1963 and 2023 (XX) of November 1965, subject to its being recognized, first, that Her Majesty's Government responsibilities for security cannot be limited or abandoned; and secondly, that Her Majesty's Government are bound by their existing treaties with the Federation of South Arabia and the unfederated South Arabian States until these treaties terminate. In particular, Her Majesty's Government are constitutionally unable to give directions to the Federal Government except in matters of external affairs, defence and the public service, and have no power to impose changes in the Federal Constitution.

"Her Majesty's Government will be glad to co-operate with a mission appointed by the Secretary-General, subject to agreement on its composition, for the purpose of recommending practical steps necessary for the full implementation of the above-mentioned resolutions of the General Assembly and, in particular, for determining the extent of United Nations participation in the preparation and supervision of elections, subject only to the two reservations noted in the preceding paragraph.

"I should be grateful for your confirmation that any mission appointed will operate on the above basis."

7. The reply of the Secretary-General,^a dated 5 August 1966, reads as follows:

"I have the honour to refer to your letter dated 1 August 1966 concerning the Question of Aden.

"I am pleased to note that your Government welcomes the assistance and participation of the United Nations in bringing South Arabia to independence as a united sovereign state by 1968, and that, subject to the reservations stated, it accepts the operative paragraphs of General Assembly resolutions 1949 (XVIII) of 11 December 1963 and 2023 (XX) of 5 November 1965.

"I also note with appreciation that your Government would be glad to co-operate with a mission appointed by the Secretary-General, subject to agreement on its composition, for the purpose of recommending practical steps necessary for the full implementation of the above-mentioned resolutions of the General Assembly and in particular for determining the extent of United Nations participation in the preparation and supervision of elections subject only to the reservations stated in your letter.

"As you are aware, this matter was the subject of operative paragraph 12 of the resolution adopted by the Special Committee at its 447th meeting on 15 June 1966, which requested the Secretary-General to appoint a special mission, for the purpose stated in that paragraph, in consultation with the Special Committee and the administering Power. I am accordingly in a position to inform you that the appointment of the special mission under the terms of the above-mentioned resolution will be made in consultation with your Government.

"When I undertake the necessary consultations with the Special Committee in this connexion, I shall bring to its attention the reservations recorded by your Government."

8. The Secretary-General is continuing his consultations in accordance with the Special Committee's resolution and will submit further reports as necessary.

^a Circulated in document A/6374.

CHAPTER VII*

BASUTOLAND, BECHUANALAND AND SWAZILAND

A. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE IN 1964 AND 1965 AND BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS TWENTIETH SESSION

1. Following its consideration of the question of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland at its meetings in 1964, the Special Committee adopted a resolution (A/5800/Rev.1,¹ chap. VIII, para. 365) setting forth recommendations concerning these Territories. Among these recommendations was a request to the Secretary-General to undertake, in consultation with the administering Power, a study as to the ways and means of ensuring the economic independence of these Territories vis-à-vis the Republic of South Africa and to submit a report to the Special Committee and the General Assembly.

2. In compliance with this request, the Secretary-General submitted a report concerning these Territories to the Special Committee and to the General Assembly.² Annexed to the Secretary-General's report was the report of an economic and technical assistance mission which visited the Territories in May and June 1965. This mission, which was established after consultation between the Secretary-General and the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, consisted of three members: the Chairman and one member nominated by the Secretary-General, and one member nominated by the United Kingdom Government.

3. The Special Committee again considered the question of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland at its meetings in 1965. After discussion, the Special Committee adopted two resolutions (A/6000/Rev.1,³ chap. VII, paras. 292 and 364) on this question.

4. On the recommendation of the Fourth Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 2063 (XX) on 16 December 1965, the operative paragraphs of which read as follows:

["The General Assembly"]

"1. Approves the chapters of the reports of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples relating to the Territories of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, and endorses the conclusions and recommendations contained therein;

"2. Reaffirms the inalienable right of the peoples of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland to freedom and independence;

"3. Once again invites the administering Power to take urgent steps to implement fully General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV), 1817 (XVII) and 1954 (XVIII) in conformity with the freely expressed wishes of the peoples of the three Territories;

"4. Renews its request that the administering Power should take immediate steps to return to the indigenous inhabitants all the land taken from them, whatever the form of or pretext for such alienation;

* Previously issued under the symbol A/6300/Add.5.

¹ Official Records of the General Assembly, Nineteenth Session, Annexes, annex No. 8 (part I).

² Ibid., Twentieth Session, Annexes, agenda item 23, document A/5958.

³ Ibid., Annexes, addendum to agenda item 23.

"5. Requests the Special Committee to consider, in co-operation with the Secretary-General, what measures are necessary for securing the territorial integrity and sovereignty of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, and to report to the General Assembly at its twenty-first session;

"6. Expresses its satisfaction to the Secretary-General for his efforts and endorses the recommendations contained in his report;

"7. Decides to establish a Fund for the Economic Development of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, to be made up of voluntary contributions and to be administered by the Secretary-General in close consultation with the Governments of the three Territories and with the co-operation and assistance of the Special Fund, the Technical Assistance Board, the Economic Commission for Africa and the specialized agencies concerned;

"8. Considers that the efforts to provide economic, financial and technical assistance, through United Nations programmes of technical co-operation and the specialized agencies, should continue in order to remedy the deplorable economic and social situation of the three Territories;

"9. Requests the Secretary-General to appoint resident representatives in the three Territories, as recommended in paragraph 22 of his report, and to report to the General Assembly at its twenty-first session on the operation of the Fund established under paragraph 7 above."

B. INFORMATION ON THE TERRITORIES⁴

5. Information on Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland is contained in the reports of the Special Committee to the General Assembly at its seventeenth, eighteenth, nineteenth and twentieth sessions⁵ and in the reports of the Secretary-General to the Special Committee in 1964 (A/AC.109/98) and 1965.² Supplementary information on recent political developments concerning the Territories and economic, social and educational conditions is set out below.

1. Problems common to the three Territories

Political developments

6. An indication of South Africa's policy with regard to future relations with the Territories was given in the Special Committee's report to the General Assembly at its twentieth session (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. VII, para. 5). On 5 June 1965, after taking into account the recent statements of the three Governments regarding the future of the respective Territories,

⁴ This section is based on information collected by the Secretariat from published sources. Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter by the United Kingdom (for the year ending 31 December 1964) on 1 June 1965 for Bechuanaland, on 1 October 1965 for Swaziland, and on 5 November 1965 for Basutoland has also been taken into account.

⁵ Official Records of the General Assembly, Seventeenth Session, Annexes, addendum to agenda item 25, document A/5238, chap. V; ibid., Eighteenth Session, Annexes, addendum to agenda item 23, document A/5446/Rev.1, chap. IX; ibid., Nineteenth Session, Annexes, annex No. 8 (part I), document A/5800/Rev.1, chap. VIII; and ibid., Twentieth Session Annexes, addendum to agenda item 23, document A/6000/Rev.1, chap. VII.

South Africa's Foreign Affairs Minister, Hillgard Muller, was reported to have said that his Government welcomed the forthcoming independence of these Territories, and would continue to co-operate with them in the economic and technical fields without interference in their internal affairs or political system.

7. A communiqué, issued at the close of the Commonwealth Prime Ministers Meeting which took place in London between 17 and 25 June 1965, welcomed the assurance of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom that it remained the objective of his Government to lead to independence, on the basis of democratic government and the principle of universal adult suffrage, such of the British dependencies as desired it and could sustain it. The communiqué also recorded the view expressed during the meeting that such economic assistance and guarantees of territorial integrity as were necessary to maintain the Territories of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland as independent States should be forthcoming.

8. At a joint meeting of the Royal African Society and the Royal Commonwealth Society in London on 1 July 1965, Mrs. Eirene White, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, said in the course of her address that constitutional development in these Territories was proceeding with some rapidity. But, she added, none of them was economically independent, or likely to be for some time. For their professional and technical services they depended at present to a very substantial degree upon expatriate public servants from the Republic. She wondered, therefore, whether political independence combined with economic and administrative dependence would not lead to "a very severe headache" in the future.

9. Politically, Mrs. White observed, time was getting very short. This meant that it was a very great challenge to the United Kingdom and the people in the three Territories themselves, as well as to other well-wishing people in the world, to try to help make good some of those deficiencies which otherwise would make the political future of these Territories extraordinarily difficult and put a tremendous burden on their political leaders.

10. In discussing the position of the three Territories vis-à-vis South Africa, Mrs. White stated that this fact had to be recognized and that the people of these Territories had to work out for themselves some scheme of coexistence.

11. She further stated that the philosophy of Bantustan was not one which appealed to her Government or the Governments of the Territories. The United Kingdom would look with very great interest on the relationship to be worked out. She considered it incumbent upon her Government to see that in the intervening period remaining before independence, and also after independence, the people of the Territories had a fair chance to work out their own future.

12. Addressing a National Party meeting at Upington in South Africa on 30 September 1965, Mr. Verwoerd was reported to have said that the three Territories were of great importance to South Africa because of their proximity. That there should be peace, prosperity and progress in them was in South Africa's interest and the Republic was prepared to assist in bringing this about.

13. During the second session of the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) held in Accra, Ghana, from 21 to 25 October 1965, the question of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland was discussed. A resolution was then adopted (see appendix III, annex, resolution AHG/RES.36), in which the Assembly expressed its desire to prevent the absorption of these Territories by South Africa and re-emphasized the importance of securing the application of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and a guarantee by the United Nations for the territorial integrity, independence and sovereignty of these Territories.

14. On 7 February 1966, South Africa's Deputy Minister of Bantu Administration and Development, Mr. M. C. Botha, was reported to have confirmed in the House of Assembly that his Government was contemplating land dealings with the three Territories. He stated that his Government would be prepared to help these Territories to regain by purchase or exchange land currently occupied by Europeans, but that it was dependent on South Africa being able to play a part in guiding the future political and economic development of these Territories.

Economic conditions

15. As stated in paragraph 2 above, an economic and technical assistance mission visited the Territories during May and June 1965, the report of which was subsequently submitted to the Special Committee and the General Assembly.

16. A further economic mission from the United Kingdom Ministry of Overseas Development visited Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland between October and December 1965 with the agreement of the Governments of the three Territories. The terms of reference of the mission were:

"To examine, in consultation with the Governments of Basutoland, the Bechuanaland Protectorate and Swaziland, the measures required for the development of their economies, and for the reduction of their dependence on external aid for recurrent expenditure, and to estimate the extent and phasing of external assistance needed to achieve these ends."

The report has not yet been made available.

17. According to the information supplied by the United Nations Technical Assistance Board, projects for the three Territories approved under the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance indicate a substantial increase between 1963-1964 and 1965-1966, from $437,874 to $848,948 (including contingency allocations of $52,900 which have been authorized since 1 January 1965). The current projects continue to cover a broad range of development activities.

18. An office of the United Nations Development Programme, covering the three Territories, has been set up in Gaborone, Bechuanaland. This office is headed by an Assistant Resident Representative who is directly responsible to the Representative for Central and Southern Africa.

Educational conditions

19. In the course of the speech given by Mrs. Eirene White in July 1965 (see paras. 8-11 above), she expressed concern over the great gaps in the educational provision of these Territories. She said that there was no denying that there was the most tremendous lack of adequate educational facilities in each Territory. It was very difficult to see how in the short run this lack could be made good.

University of Basutoland, Bechuanaland Protectorate and Swaziland

20. In March 1965, the University of Basutoland, Bechuanaland Protectorate and Swaziland (UBBS), established eight "schools of study" to take the place of orthodox faculties. Among the subjects covered by these schools are African studies, biological and earth sciences, economics and administration, education, history, language and literature, law, mathematics and physics. As part of its expansion programme, the University created new lectureships in education, chemistry, physics, law and administration.

21. Following its establishment, the School of Education took an important step towards attracting recruits to the teaching profession. Instead of spending an extra year at the University studying education, students can now continue this subject with their four-year course leading to a bachelor's degree. Courses are also arranged for practising teachers, who are now allowed to register as part-time students for the post-graduate certificate in education, and to pursue their studies without interrupting their teaching jobs.

22. In July 1965, the Carnegie Corporation of New York announced that it would give a grant of some £34,000 to the School of Education to further its teacher education programme in all three Territories.

23. In October 1965, the Dulverton and Leverhulme Trusts of the United Kingdom made a grant of £43,000 to the Extension Department of UBBS to finance its development programme for the three years 1965-1968.

24. At the close of a meeting of the UBBS Council held in Swaziland during October 1965, it was disclosed that a University Grants Committee had been formed to deal with grants from different Governments and foundations. The University had secured some support from foundations in the United States and the United Kingdom, but it would require much greater support from both governmental and private sources in implementing its capital programme of £1.5 million for the period 1966-1970.

25. It was also disclosed that the Swaziland College of Agriculture was to be opened very shortly. The University had agreed to establish an organic link with the College, so that a one-year course for a diploma in agriculture, offered by the University, might be instituted in 1967. Certificate-trained candidates from the three Territories would be eligible for selection for this diploma course. Other matters discussed included the University's plans for increasing its contributions to teacher training, training for the legal profession, government officer training, co-operative institutes and general education throughout the three Territories.

26. In January 1966, the University decided to launch an urgent building project designed to increase student enrolment to 300 by 1967. The project, costing £150,000, would be financed by the United Kingdom Ministry of Overseas Development and the Inter-University Council for Higher Education Overseas.

27. In March 1966, it was reported that if the aim of this project were achieved, the University would probably face a financial deficit of about £600,000 in 1967. Financial support for the University had already been approved by the United Kingdom Government and other sources.

2. Basutoland

Political and constitutional developments

By-election on 1 July 1965

28. Chief Leabua Jonathan, leader of the ruling Basutoland National Party (BNP), who was defeated in the general election held on 29 April 1965, won a by-election at Mpharane on 1 July 1965. The sitting member, Mr. John Mulupe Mothepa, resigned to give Chief Jonathan a chance to lead his party in the National Assembly. Chief Jonathan received 2,873 votes and Mr. Philip Lebona of the Basutoland Congress Party (BCP), 1,055 votes.

29. On 5 July, Chief Jonathan was sworn in as Prime Minister. Immediately afterwards, Chief Sekhonyana Maseribane, who had resigned as Prime Minister, was appointed Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Internal and External Affairs.

Relations with South Africa

30. On 4 May 1965, immediately after the general election, Chief Leabua Jonathan stated that, while emphatically rejecting any idea of Basutoland's incorporation in South Africa and condemning apartheid, Basutoland would like to establish diplomatic relations with the Republic and would negotiate with it to obtain all material benefits for the Basotho.

31. The following day it was reported that the South African Government welcomed the election victory in Basutoland by Chief Jonathan's party and that it expected to start preparing the ground for future relations with that Territory. In view of Chief Jonathan's slender majority, the South African Government was said to have considered it important to bolster his authority with economic aid.

32. The Basutoland Government's policy of co-operation and friendly relations with South Africa was the main issue debated during the first session of the new National Assembly on 19 May 1965. According to reports, this policy was vigorously attacked by the BCP. Chief Sekhonyana Maseribane, the then Prime Minister, was reported to have said at the close of the debate that Basutoland had always co-operated with South Africa and that there were no other neighbours with whom matters of common interest could be worked out.

33. On 20 May 1965, after rejecting a no confidence motion proposed by Mr. Ntsu Mukhehle leader of the BCP and of the Opposition, the National Assembly approved a motion of confidence in the Government.

34. On 26 May 1965, Chief Maseribane said that his Government was prepared to hold discussions with South Africa and the United Kingdom on the utilization of the mountain rivers of Basutoland, the Territory's main economic asset. He was interested in the proposal made recently by the Chamber of Commerce of the Orange Free State that the South African Government should consult Basutoland on the Ox-Bow hydroelectric scheme, the biggest single project under consideration in the Territory, the development of which would depend on the sale of power and water to the Republic.

35. On 9 June 1965, Mr. Verwoerd announced that the South African Government was sending 100,000 bags of grain (a bag contains 200 pounds), worth about £160,000 to Chief Leabua Jonathan in response to the latter's urgent appeal for assistance in relieving starvation in Basutoland. According to reports, no approaches had been made to the United Kingdom in respect of famine relief.

36. In the three and a half months following Mr. Verwoerd's announcement, the gift became the centre of controversy in Basutoland. The Opposition BCP accused the Prime Minister of trying to win the by-election, held on 1 July 1965, by means of a "cheap trick", and expressed the fear that the gift might be used as a lure to "incorporate the Territory into the Republic".

37. On 23 July 1965, Chief Jonathan was reported to have said in the National Assembly that the gift was a generous gesture in a time of serious drought and that, as leader of the BNP, he was giving the grain to the Government for distribution to needy and destitute people regardless of their political affiliation.

38. The Opposition then tabled a motion asking that the National Assembly should dissociate itself from the gift and that the Government should not handle the grain in any way.

39. The debate was interrupted when the Assembly was abruptly adjourned on 28 July 1965, after the High Court of Basutoland had unseated two members of the BNP, following the submission by the BCP of petitions alleging irregularities in the last general election. The effect of the Court's decision was to reduce the BNP over-all majority to nil.

40. On 18 August 1965, a Government spokesman was reported to have said that it was hoped soon to accelerate distribution of South Africa's gift of grain.

41. According to reports, Chief Jonathan issued a policy statement on 27 August 1965, announcing that he was formally seeking early discussions with Mr. Verwoerd on such matters as the Ox-Bow hydroelectric scheme and the improvement of conditions for Basotho employed in South Africa. He reiterated that his Government desired to live on good neighbourly terms with other States, including South Africa with whose economic future Basutoland's was necessarily intertwined.

42. Ten Basotho, who were all members of the BCP, were stranded in London during August 1965 as a result of the South African Government's refusal to grant them transit visas to return to Basutoland. A statement by South Africa's Foreign Affairs Minister alleged that the men left Basutoland to train as saboteurs and guerrillas, an allegation which was denied by the BCP. The Minister stated that his Government would reconsider its decision if it was given conclusive proof that the men were bona fide students.

43. The Colonial Office expressed the view that "people who live in Basutoland should be able to go freely into and out of the country". This matter formed one of the subjects of discussion between the Secretary of State for the Colonies and Chief Jonathan, during the latter's visit to London at the end of August 1965. Chief Jonathan was reported to have said that he did not concede South Africa's right to deny access of nationals to their homeland or to grant it only on conditions.

44. Early in September 1965, it was reported that the Colonial Office had authorized the Basutoland Government to open discussions with South Africa on matters of common interest, and that the extent of and the timing for such discussions would be worked out between the Governments of Basutoland and the United Kingdom in further talks.

45. In the same month, the South African Government was said to have imposed restrictions on the dispatch of certain printed materials to Basutoland. Two London magazines complained that issues disappeared before reaching the Territory, and the South African police at a border post seized 2,000 copies of a Basutoland document from the car of Mr. B. M. Khaketla, a member of the Paramount Chief's Privy Council, who was also a leading member of the Marema-Tlou Freedom Party (MTFP).

46. Following talks with the Basutoland delegation between 22 November and 1 December 1965, the Colonial Office was reported to have agreed that, provided that the United Kingdom Government was kept informed, Basutoland might open negotiations with South Africa on access, extradition, cultural matters, diplomatic representation after independence, labour and employment, the Ox-Bow hydroelectric scheme, and commercial matters, with the exception of the revision of the customs union agreement. There was, however, no indication that the talks covered the question raised early in November 1965 in the Basutoland National Assembly by the BCP, namely, that of the reincorporation into Basutoland of an area of South Africa in the Orange Free State, Natal and Eastern Cape Province.

47. With regard to this question, government spokesmen in the Assembly said that it would be given top, but not immediate, priority. The Government felt it necessary to wait until it had assumed full powers so that it could negotiate with South Africa directly, while the BCP demanded that negotiations be held with the Republic through the United Kingdom Government.

The question of independence

The question of independence

48. As noted in the last report of the Special Committee, the state of the political parties in the National Assembly as a result of the general election held on 29 April 1965 was: the Basutoland National Party (BNP), thirty-one seats; the Basutoland Congress Party (BCP), twenty-five; and the Marema-Tlou Freedom Party (MTFP), four.

49. Immediately after the general election, Chief Leabua Jonathan, leader of the BNP, said that he would claim independence at the earliest date permitted under the present Constitution, which was based on the agreement reached at the 1964 Constitutional Conference, namely that the United Kingdom Government would grant independence to Basutoland a year after the general election, provided it received a request from the Basutoland Legislature to that effect.

50. On 19 July 1965, Mr. Ntsu Mokhehle, the BCP leader, said that his party would ask for postponement of independence for Basutoland unless a new election was held before 29 April 1966. On 19 August 1965, he requested the Paramount Chief to dissolve the Basutoland Legislature and appoint a caretaker government until new elections could be held. He claimed that the BNP had lost its majority in the Legislature as a result of the recent decision of the Basutoland High Court to void the election results in two constituencies.

51. The BNP was subsequently reported to have recaptured these two constituencies in by-elections. With the pledged support of a member of the MTFP, the BNP thus had a majority of four in the National Assembly. It was also reported that the governing party was assured of a working majority in the Senate as twenty-one of the twenty-two principal chiefs, who formed the majority of the thirty-three-member Senate, now pledged their support to the Government. Before the general election, eighteen of these chiefs had favoured the MTFP. Three of the remaining eleven senators belong to the BNP.

52. Early in September 1965, after discussions with the Secretary of State for the Colonies on the question of independence, Chief Jonathan issued a statement in which he said that the United Kingdom Government had unreservedly agreed to take steps forthwith to enable his Government to start solving the problems which it shared with South Africa, as well as to get on with day-to-day administration. The statement added that the talks had covered a wide range, including the delegation of powers within the field of external affairs and internal security, the granting of executive powers to the Civil Service Commission, and the Africanization of the Civil Service.

53. During his second round of constitutional talks with the United Kingdom Government in November/December 1965, Chief Jonathan confirmed that his Government would ask for independence immediately after 29 April 1966. For the United Kingdom Government, Mrs. Eirene White, accepted Chief Jonathan's statement of intention and "his assurance that the stipulated conditions were likely to be fulfilled".

54. In February 1966, the opposition parties in the Basutoland Legislature were reported to be against the independence of the Territory under Chief Jonathan's administration, contending that his party's majority was too slender to give him a sufficient hold on power to lead Basutoland to independence.

Economic conditions

55. The natural resources of Basutoland are limited, the principal ones being its agricultural land, water and manpower. The economy is primarily a subsistence one, with exports consisting chiefly of wool and mohair. The main effort of the Basutoland Government has been directed towards improvement in farming, but the Territory is not yet self-sufficient in agricultural produce. During recent years drought and famine have been experienced in parts of the Territory. On 7 January 1966, the United Kingdom, Australia and Canada agreed to an emergency plan to send grain to drought-stricken areas of central and southern Africa, including Basutoland. This plan, however, ran into difficulties and was not implemented.

56. In October 1965, the Basutoland Government was reported to have started a crash programme aimed at making the Territory agriculturally viable within three to ten years by means of progressive farming schemes and land tenure reforms.

Land

57. On 3 August 1965, Basutoland's Prime Minister, Chief Jonathan, was reported to have said that ownership of land in Basutoland would continue to remain the common property of the Basuto Nation. However, the Government had agreed in principle that limited leases could be granted through a government-sponsored development agency. He added that the Government did not contemplate such a serious departure from the traditional land tenure system as the granting of unconditional private ownership rights to any occupier, African or European.

United Nations assistance to the Territory

58. Details of projects approved for 1965-1966 under the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance (EPTA), including contingency allocations, are as follows:

Approved category I Programme	Cost ($US)	Experts		Fellowships
		No. Months		No. Months
UNTA statistics	19,200	1	12
UNTA economic programming and projections	31,000	1	19
ILO co-operation and small-scale industries	19,200	1	12
FAO nutrition	12,800	1	8
FAO rural institutions and services	24,600	2	16
FAO animal production and health	19,200	1	12
UNESCO science teaching ...	38,400	1	24
WHO tuberculosis control	99,612	6	96
Sub-total, category I	264,012
Contingency projects	Cost ($US)	Experts		Fellowships
		No. Months		No. Months
UNTA public administration..	2,500			1	2
UNTA natural resources development and power	6,400	2	4
Sub-total, contingencies	8,900
TOTAL	272,912

59. A statistical expert, appointed on 1 March 1964 under the Regular Programme of Technical Assistance, was transferred to EPTA on 1 January 1965; he completed his assignment in Basutoland at the end of February. Another expert was also sent to the Territory early in August 1965 for one year to assist in the implementation of a community development programme.

60. In its programme for 1967-1968, UNESCO proposes to send to Basutoland one expert in educational planning for eight months, one expert in teacher-training (science) for twenty-four months, and one expert in teacher-training (education) for sixteen months. During 1965, it awarded six fellowships to persons from the Territory, five for a period of three and a half months in adult education and literacy teaching, and one for a period of nine months in home economics. It also proposes to award in 1968 a one-year fellowship to a Basotho for the study of educational planning. Travel grants were given to a member of the Basutoland Homemakers Association, who started a study programme in Canada during July 1965, as well as to a Basotho member of the World University Service for training abroad in student welfare techniques during 1965-1966.

61. In the past six years (1960-1965), UNICEF has allocated a total of $503,700 for three projects in Basutoland, namely, maternal and child health, tuberculosis control and applied nutrition.

62. During 1965, WHO provided two fellowships for study abroad, in laboratory technology and radiology. It has set aside $18,000 for its 1966 fellowship programme in medical education and training.

Social conditionsLabour

63. The latest information available on the subject of Basotho workers in the Republic of South Africa is contained in the Secretary-General's report to the General Assembly at its twentieth session.⁶

64. During 1964, 1,253 persons (1,779 in 1963) were registered at the employment exchange in Maseru of whom 247 were placed in employment. The drop in registration during the year did not necessarily indicate a reduction of unemployment; many persons were believed to have failed to patronize the employment exchange after learning that registration was not synonymous with obtaining employment.

65. The total number of trade unions in the Territory was eight in 1964, an increase of one over the previous year. Their main activities centred around negotiations with individual employers over dismissals. There were no trade disputes of any significance.

66. The minimum wage for unskilled workers of either sex in government employment was raised to 6s. per day in April 1964. No important changes occurred in the wages of labour privately employed; employers concluded no formal collective agreements concerning wages with any trade union.

67. Among the labour legislation passed in 1964 was a new employment bill. One of its requirements is the imposition of a similar minimum wage, applicable to private undertakings. The bill received sharp criticism from the employers' organizations.

3. BechuanalandPolitical and constitutional developmentsRelations with South Africa

68. After his visit to Zambia in April 1965, Bechuanaland Prime Minister Seretse Khama said that he had discussed with the President of Zambia closer co-operation between the two countries as well as the improvement of communications. Bechuanaland was trying to reduce its heavy economic dependence on South Africa by expanding trade with Zambia and other African States, but his country's main cash product, beef, worth £5 million annually, would continue to be exported to South Africa and would not be diverted to Zambia.

69. On 6 July 1965, Mr. Khama stated that drought and famine would cause great hardship in Bechuanaland during 1965, but that with the assistance of the World Food Programme (WFP), jointly established by the United Nations and the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), the Government could meet the challenge. However, although famine conditions were becoming critical, the first shipment of the WFP food did not arrive until September 1965. Meanwhile the United Kingdom Government authorized the Bechuanaland Government to spend up to £35,000 per month on emergency supplies. Orders for such supplies were placed in South Africa.

70. In his recent address to a National Party meeting at Upington, South Africa, Mr. Verwoerd stated that although Bechuanaland had not asked for food, it had asked that the transport of supplies from other countries via South Africa be expedited and had also asked for concessions in respect of import duties. Mr.

Verwoerd stated that the Republic had met both these requests.

The question of independence

71. On 9 July 1965, Mr. Phillip Matante, leader of the Opposition Bechuanaland Peoples Party (BPP), which holds three of the thirty-one seats in the Legislative Assembly, introduced a motion of no confidence. The motion, which was later rejected, criticized the Government for failing to deal adequately with the drought position and alleged that the general election held on 1 March 1965 was won unfairly. He was reported to have said that he would ask the United Kingdom Government to call a referendum if the motion was defeated.

72. On 15 July 1965, Mr. David Morgan, Bechuanaland Minister of Works and Communications, was reported to have stated that the sooner Bechuanaland achieved independence, the sooner it could start seeking desperately needed development capital. He added that the United Kingdom Government was slow in providing financial assistance to Bechuanaland, which was faced with its worst drought in thirty years.

73. During the week ending 17 July 1965, the Prime Minister informed the Legislative Assembly that his Government was holding talks with the United Kingdom on the date for independence. In reply to a question, he said that he had "a mandate from the people of Bechuanaland" to take the Territory into independence without another general election.

74. On 13 October 1965, the Colonial Office announced that the United Kingdom had agreed in principle to independence for Bechuanaland by 30 September 1966. Proposals for the independence Constitution would be worked out in Bechuanaland; thereafter there would be a constitutional conference in London in the first half of 1966 to work out the actual Constitution.

75. On 13 December 1965, Mr. Khama addressed the Legislative Assembly in regard to constitutional proposals which the Government had completed. Under these proposals the Territory would adopt a republic form of government while remaining within the British Commonwealth as the new State of Botswana.

76. The Prime Minister in office would automatically become the Republic's first President with full executive power and command of the armed forces. The Legislative Assembly would be renamed the National Assembly which, with the President, would constitute Parliament.

77. The life of the Assembly would be limited to periods of up to five years. All adult citizens would have the right to vote. The future election of the President would be associated with the election of members of the Assembly whose majority support would be necessary to enable him to retain office. He would not be a member of the Assembly and would have the power to summon, prorogue or dissolve it at any time.

78. Provision would be made for the appointment of the Chief Justice by the President and of puisne judges and magistrates by a Judicial Service Commission.

79. The decision that Bechuanaland should become the independent Republic of Botswana on 30 September 1966 was announced by the Secretary of State for the Colonies at the end of a Constitutional Conference held in London from 14-20 February 1966 and attended by representatives of the political parties in the Bechuanaland Legislature. The Secretary of State said that the Constitution which had been agreed on was substantially drawn up in Bechuanaland and that it had been endorsed by the Legislature of the Territory before the opening of the Conference. According to reports, the Opposition representative, Mr. Phillip Mante, refused to attend the last two meetings because he maintained that the Conference should have been postponed until further consultations had taken place.

⁶ Ibid., Twentieth Session, Annexes, agenda item 23, document A/5958, annex, chap. IV, paras. 8 and 9.

Economic conditions

80. The cattle industry is the mainstay of Bechuanaland's economy and the majority of the people subsist on their own crops. The Territory suffered a serious economic setback in 1965 which was brought about by the country's worst drought in several decades. On 8 April 1965, the Bechuanaland Government declared the Territory drought-stricken and introduced schemes to combat drought and famine. On 6 July 1965 it stated that food crops had been completely devastated, that the number of destitute people was increasing and that cattle mortality would be heavy.

81. According to reports, imports of maize were expected to reach 350,000 bags in 1965, compared with an average of 56,000 for the past ten years. During the same period the Territory had exported an average of 51,000 bags of sorghum; 100,000 bags would have to be imported during 1965. Cattle losses could reach 250,000 in the east of the Territory alone, i.e., half the total cattle population in that area.

82. In May 1965 the World Food Programme (WFP) agreed to provide the Territory with emergency aid at a cost of $420,000. This agreement was revised to furnish additional aid totalling $1.3 million in July and some $2.8 million in October. Food supplies from the WFP were distributed to more than 100,000 people.

83. On 7 January 1966, the United Kingdom, Canada and Australia agreed on an emergency plan to send grain to Bechuanaland to mitigate the effect of its prolonged drought. This plan, however, ran into difficulties and was not implemented.

84. Mrs. Eirene White (see paras. 8-11 above) stated recently that despite a series of disastrous droughts, Bechuanaland could achieve considerable economic progress. She did not believe, however, that for the immediate future the Territory would be able to sustain itself without substantial assistance from external sources. A similar view was subsequently expressed by the Prime Minister who stressed that there was a great need for development funds for improving agriculture, education and social services in the Territory.

Agriculture and livestock

85. Among the drought relief schemes introduced in 1965 were the drilling of new boreholes in emergency grazing areas and the improvement of borehole maintenance; the use of the Odiakwe veterinary camp for grazing, and the supply of vitamin A and phosphorous to enhance the chances of cattle recovering after the drought. The Government also promoted self-help among African farmers and supplied them with selected corn seeds at subsidized prices.

86. Furthermore, the Government gave every encouragement to farmers to expand cotton production. The Agricultural Department introduced dry-land cotton for most regions and irrigable cotton for flood areas in Ngamiland. Nearly 1,000 bales were produced and exported to South Africa during the 1964/65 season; expectations for the 1965/66 season were in the region of 3,000 bales. It was hoped to produce enough to justify the establishment of a ginnery in the Territory. The Department found that African farmers showed great enthusiasm for cotton, and expressed the opinion that Bechuanaland might become an important producer within ten years. It stated that the problem was to prevent farmers from putting too much land under cotton, which would reduce essential food crops and make reaping difficult. Finally, it advocated a large number of very efficient small units.

Mining

87. In November 1965, the Bechuanaland Government was reported to have approved an application by Messrs. W. J. Engelbrecht and G. van den Brink to prospect for diamonds in an area covering about 4,460 square miles south-west of Maun in the Batawana Tribal Territory.

Communications

88. The railway line from Cape Town to Bulawayo passes through the length of the eastern region of Bechuanaland. The section within the Territory, upon which the cattle industry is wholly dependent, forms part of the undertakings of the Rhodesia Railways, which is a statutory body. The Rhodesia Railways are at present operated jointly by Southern Rhodesia and Zambia. By the terms of an agreement concluded in 1959 between the Rhodesia Railways and South African Railways each system operates approximately half the length of the 394-mile-long track within the Territory. In February 1965, it was announced that South African Railways had given six months' notice of a decision to end the agreement, a step which means that Rhodesia Railways would take over the whole route.

United Nations assistance to the Territory

89. Reference has already been made to the emergency relief aid given to the Territory by the World Food Programme. Details of projects approved for 1965-1966 under the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance (EPTA) including contingency allocations, are as follows in the table on page 515.

90. The 1964 Regular Programme of Technical Assistance provided for the award to persons from the Territory of seven fellowships (six for four months each and one for ten months) in the field of community development. Arrangements were also made to enable an official of the Bechuanaland Government to participate in the Group Training Programme in Technical Assistance. Under the 1965 Regular Programme, an expert was sent to the Territory, on an initial assignment of one year, to advise the Government concerning community development.

91. UNESCO's 1965-1966 programme provides for the services of two experts in infant methods-teaching, two in arts and crafts teaching, and two in mathematics teaching, each for a period of twelve months. In its 1967-1968 programme it proposes to provide one expert in educational planning for eight months and three experts in teacher training for seventy-two months. It also proposes to award one fellowship in educational planning for 1967 and another in teacher training for 1967-1968. Travel grants were made to the Boy Scouts Association to enable a Scout from Bechuanaland to

Approved category I Programme	Cost ($US)	Experts		Fellowships		Equipment and supplies ($US)
		No.	Months	No.	Months
ILO manpower organization	4,800	1	3
ILO co-operation and small-scale industries	24,000	2	15
FAO animal production and health ..	51,000	1	24	3	18	1,800
UNESCO teacher training	115,200	3	72
WHO midwifery education	24,000	1	24
WHO trypanosomiasis control	45,000	2	48			1,000
Sub-total, category I	264,000
Contingency projects
WMO meteorology	15,400	1	9
UNTA statistics	8,100	1	4	1	6
UNTA economic programming and projections	10,000	1	4	1	6
Sub-total, contingencies	33,500
TOTAL	297,500

receive training abroad during 1965-1966. On his return, he will be employed at the Youth Training Centre in Gaberones.

92. In 1965, UNICEF made an allocation of $65,000 towards educational development in Bechuanaland and WHO awarded a fellowship in malaria eradication to a person from the Territory. It also proposes an expenditure of $18,000 in the fellowship programme for 1966.

Social conditions

Labour

93. In 1964 the number of persons employed in the Territory, apart from those engaged in cattle-raising and agriculture, was approximately 13,850 (compared with 8,950 in the previous year), with the Government as the most important employer. A further 35,000 Botswana worked in South Africa.

94. The minimum rates for pay per hour for government manual workers were 7d. for unskilled, 1/- for semi-skilled and 1/7 for tradesmen.

95. The trade union movement is still at an early stage of development. A provisional programme for future labour legislation has been drawn up with the object of bringing existing laws up to date and introducing certain new measures.

96. The emergency measures which were taken early in 1965 to alleviate the famine conditions prevailing in the Territory included the acceleration and expansion of public works programmes to make available 950,000 days of work for which wages would total £210,000 and the recruitment of Botswana for work both within the Territory and abroad.

Public health

97. After famine struck the Territory in 1965, there was a steady rise in the number of deaths related to malnutrition. In order to remedy this situation, the Government decided to supply vitamin-rich food to an estimated 10,000 pregnant women, 15,000 nursing mothers, 110,000 children from one to seven years of age and 71,000 school children.

4. Swaziland

Political and constitutional developments Relations with South Africa

98. In February 1965, it was reported that despite representations made by the Swaziland Government, South Africa had prohibited Mr. Allen Nxumalo, Chairman of the Swaziland Democratic Party, from passing through the Republic to Tanzania.

99. On 30 March 1965, South Africa's Minister of Agricultural Technical Services said that, with the approval of the Swaziland authorities, inspectors and veterinarians were being sent to the Territory to help combat foot-and-mouth disease, adding that the outbreak was a serious threat to the Republic.

100. On 11 June 1965, the Ngwenyama was reported to have sent a mission to the heads of all the major African countries. He instructed the mission to establish the friendliest possible relations with African States and to impress on them that Swaziland wanted to work with them to ensure real independence. He gave African States an assurance of total rejection of apartheid and his opposition to any South African interference in Swaziland's affairs. The mission also was instructed to explain that Swaziland's geographical position in regard to South Africa and Mozambique made it economically dependent on these neighbours.

101. On 4 November 1965, a Swaziland police spokesman was reported to have stated that two South African policemen had crossed the border into the Territory and had taken an African prisoner from a Swaziland police station to stand trial in the Republic; neither the commanding officer nor the Swaziland Government had sanctioned this action.

Question of independence

102. At a Public Meeting of the Swazis held on 22 July 1965, the Ngwenyama stated that his Government had asked the Colonial Office for early talks on the question of independence for Swaziland. In a statement issued on the same day, Prince Makhosini Dlamini, leader of the Imbokodvo Party, criticized the "delaying tactics" of the United Kingdom Government and emphasized that Swaziland was ready for independence and wanted to end foreign supremacy and colonialism "once and for all".

103. Towards the end of August 1965, a local committee was appointed to review the present Constitution of Swaziland and to make detailed recommendations to the Secretary of State for the Colonies on a new constitution. The Committee was composed of Her Majesty's Commissioner (Chairman), two official members (the Chief Secretary and the Attorney-General) and twelve unofficial members (eight from the Imbokodvo Party and four from the United Swaziland Association) of the Legislative Council. In a statement to the Legislative Council, the Chief Secretary said that political parties and groups not represented in the Council would be given an appropriate opportunity to present their views to the Committee.

104. In March 1966, the proposals for a new constitution which the Committee had completed were submitted to the Secretary of State for consideration and were tabled in the Swaziland Legislature for discussion. Under the proposed new constitution, Swaziland will assume internal self-government some time in 1966 on the British monarchical pattern under United Kingdom protection. The Paramount Chief will be recognized as King and Head of State by all the inhabitants, both African and European. There will be a bicameral Parliament. The Lower House, or the House of Assembly, will consist of a Speaker, twenty-four members elected by universal adult suffrage, six other members (nominated by the King) and the Attorney-General. The Upper House will have a Speaker and twelve members, half chosen by the House of Assembly and the other half appointed by the King. Subject to the acceptance by the United Kingdom Government of these constitutional proposals, it is believed that Swaziland will become an independent kingdom within the Commonwealth by 1970.

105. Following the establishment of the Constitutional Committee, several political leaders, including Mr. O. M. Mabuza, Chairman of the Joint Council of Swaziland Political Parties, protested against the exclusion of representatives of opposition nationalist parties from that committee. The Joint Council had previously submitted a memorandum to the Colonial Office calling for the holding of a fully representative conference in London as soon as possible to make constitutional arrangements for independence on the basis of universal adult suffrage and the full integration of the Swazis into the Territory's administrative and economic systems. The Joint Council also deplored the infiltration of South African policies into the major spheres of the life of the Territory.

Localization of the Civil Service

106. In his speech to the Legislative Council on 12 October 1965, Her Majesty's Commissioner stated that the problem of localization of the Public Service would be investigated by a commission, whose report should be ready early in 1966. (The Commission, consisting of a Chairman (Mr. T. C. Luke of Sierra Leone) and two Swazi members, was appointed in October 1965.) He stated further that considerable progress had already been made in the sphere of training for the Public Service with the opening recently of the Staff Training Institute at Mbanane and the Police Training College at Matsapa. He felt that while well-organized public service training could go far to expedite localization, the basic solution to the problem lay in the development of the educational system to provide an adequate flow of well-educated candidates.

Economic conditions

107. In recent years progress has been achieved by European-owned and managed industries, principally irrigation farming, forestry and mining, the Territory's main foreign exchange earners. An important investor in these industries is the Commonwealth Development Corporation, whose total commitment rose by some £3 million to about £23 million in 1964. The total value of exports in the same year increased by some £250,000 to £11,165,000. The growth of modern economy has so far had little effect on the traditional economy.

108. In a statement made on 22 July 1965, the leader of the Imbokodvo Party is reported to have said that the colonial Powers had accentuated the disequilibrium between the living standard of the Europeans and the colonized Swazis, and that the problem was the reluctance of those in power to give opportunities to the Swazi.

109. Her Majesty's Commissioner stated in his speech to the Legislative Council on 12 October 1965 that the Government proposed to concentrate in the Development Plan for 1966-1968 on raising living standards, particularly for the rural Swazi population, and on reducing the gap between the Government's annual expenditure and revenue. A corollary to these objectives would be to train an increasing number of Swazi so that they might play an increasingly responsible role in both the public and private sectors of the Territory's economy. The Government was fully confident that Swaziland had the potential human and physical resources to enable it to become a contented, economically viable, self-governing country. The Government was conscious, however, that the Territory did not at present have sufficient capital or technical skills to develop that potential. It must accordingly continue to look outside for assistance.

110. Her Majesty's Commissioner also said that the United Kingdom Government was likely to make a grant to Swaziland to meet development expenditure for the three-year period beginning 1 April 1965, which would be larger than the Territory had received in the past. (On 8 February 1966, it was announced that Colonial Development and Welfare allocations totalling £3,900,000 had been made for 1965-1968, representing an increase of £1,238,000 over the previous three years.) He hoped that financial and technical aid for development would also be made available from sources other than the United Kingdom during this period. He pointed out that an economic mission from the Ministry of Overseas Development was to visit the Territory at the end of November 1965 and hoped that, on the basis of its findings, the United Kingdom Government would provide additional capital assistance. He added that the Government was giving consideration to ways in which internal revenue could be increased.

Agriculture and livestock

111. Agricultural commodities accounted for 75 per cent of Swaziland's visible export trade during 1964, most of which was produced on irrigated land under European ownership. Plans were made by European farmers for rapid expansion in the production of certain irrigated crops, notably sugar and citrus.

112. The Territory is not entirely self-sufficient in foods-stuffs such as maize, the staple diet of the Swazi. The Agricultural Department accordingly embarked during April 1965 on a campaign to encourage farmers to adopt the improved method of growing maize developed by the Malkerns Research Station.

113. On the subject of the development of agriculture and livestock, Her Majesty's Commissioner said in his recent speech to the Legislative Council that:

"The Government looks primarily to its agricultural policy to raise living standards, particularly of the rural population. The aim will be to stimulate Swazi production, and to develop it as far as practicable from a subsistence to a cash economy basis. Efforts will be concentrated in selected areas through sound land use planning for rural development projects.

"The possibilities will be explored of introducing pilot settlement schemes on individual leasehold tenure for the production of higher value cash crops and improved livestock.

"The establishment of the Swaziland Credit and Savings Bank providing farmers with supervised credit will be a vitally important complement to that policy. Private enterprise development, for example, the new meat works and cotton ginnery, will also play a major part.

"Agricultural development has been handicapped by the lack of adequate instructional facilities for the smaller farmers, but the opening next year of the Agricultural College at Malkerns will go far to overcome that problem, both in the training of self-employed farmers and of extension staff for the Department of Agriculture.

"The proper utilization of our water resources will be an important feature in any economic development in Swaziland. The United Nations is providing us with technical assistance to enable us to apply to the United Nations Special Fund for the financing of a comprehensive survey of the Usutu basin . . . The Water Laws Commission . . . is now engaged on drafting its report and proposals for new legislation. . . .

" . . . After a period of basic preparation for a co-operative movement, eight producers' societies are expected to have been formed by the end of the year."

Industry

114. In the course of his speech Her Majesty's Commissioner stated that mining continued satisfactorily and that there was hope of expansion in coal mining. Progress had been made on the Matsapa industrial estate. Certain undertakings, including the Territory's first cotton ginnery and meat works, had recently been opened and sites sold for further secondary industries.

Communications

115. The United Kingdom Government has approved a grant of £50,000 for construction of an access road from Sidvokodvo to Grand Valley to open up a hitherto largely inaccessible part of the Territory. Within the limitations of available finance it is the Government's intention to expand its roads programme.

United Nations assistance to the Territory

116. Details of projects approved for 1965-1966 under EPTA, including contingency allocations, are as follows:

Approved category I Programme	Cost ($US)	Experts		Fellowships		Equipment and supplies ($US)
		No.	Months	No.	Months
UNTA statistics project	38,400	1	24
UNTA economic programming and projections	25,900	1	16
ILO manpower organization	4,800	1	3
FAO rural institutions and services	33,100	1	11
WHO tuberculosis control	148,236	6	144			1,000
Sub-total, category I	268,036
Contingency projects
UNTA public administration	2,500			1	2
FAO land and water development	8,000	2	4
Sub-total, contingencies	10,500
TOTAL	278,536

117. Under the 1965 Regular Programme of Technical Assistance an expert has been recruited, on a one-year appointment, to advise the Swaziland Government on community development organization and training.

118. In June 1965, the Special Fund provided $462,900 to meet part of the cost of the aerial geophysical survey of the Territory.

119. During 1965, FAO awarded fellowships for one year to two persons from the Territory, in the fields of agricultural extension and horticulture.

120. UNESCO awarded a fellowship in 1965 in the field of educational planning. It also proposes to recruit one expert and award one fellowship in the same field during 1967-1968. A member of the Swaziland Trade Union Congress received a travel grant to enable him to undertake a study programme in Uganda from February to May 1964.

121. During the period 1961-1965, UNICEF made an allocation of $186,900, which was used to establish projects concerning basic health services and applied nutrition.

122. WHO awarded a fellowship in malaria eradication in 1965. It proposes an expenditure of $16,000 on fellowships under the education training programme for 1966.

Social conditions Labour

123. In 1964, 25,470 Africans (including 5,680 foreign Africans) were employed, representing 17 per cent of the working-age population (15-64 years). According to the Labour Commissioner, the main problem confronting his Department is the need to find 2,100 new jobs annually, rising to 2,500 by 1970, to accommodate the expected increase in the working-age population. Allied to this is the urgent need for vocational and industrial training to fit the local population for full participation in existing and future employment.

124. Measures already taken or contemplated to combat this problem have included the establishment of employment exchanges, stricter control of immigration, training and the institution of a manpower planning unit to keep detailed statistics and to advise development planners of employment needs and manpower resources.

125. The average monthly wages of African workers continued to rise, but were still much lower than those of European workers. The total number of registered trade unions was fifteen during 1964 (an increase of seven over the previous year). Thirteen new agreements were negotiated covering 5,000 workers.

126. The National Joint Consultative Council, composed of employer, employee and Labour Department representatives, held its inaugural meeting in July 1964. The Council's principal function is to promote effective co-operation between both sides of industry. In the following month, Swaziland's first wages council (the Wholesale and Retail Distributive Trades Wages Council) was established.

127. There were nine trade disputes involving 572 workers and resulting in a loss of 4,130 man-days. Among recently enacted legislation governing industrial relations was the Industrial Conciliation and Settlement (Amendment) Proclamation, 1964. It amends the principal law so as to make compulsory the registration of negotiated industrial agreements on wages and working conditions.

Public health

128. In his recent speech to the Legislative Council, Her Majesty's Commissioner stated that the Medical Department was experiencing considerable difficulty in recruiting medical officers, thus hindering its efforts to meet the increasing calls on the medical services. It was intended soon to improve the hospital services by additions to Hlatikulu Hospital and by building new clinics. The work of the WHO/UNICEF-assisted Tuberculosis Control Project would continue its efforts towards finding the most effective methods of dealing with Swaziland's main health problem.

Educational conditions

129. The new Education Proclamation which was promulgated on 8 May 1964 repealed the African Coloured and European School Proclamations and created the non-racial Central Education Advisory Board and four non-racial District Education Advisory Committees.

130. Public expenditure on education amounted to £721,572 in 1963/64, an increase of £42,772 over the previous year. Grants for education from the Colonial Development and Welfare Fund totalled £148,595 and expenditure by missions £148,000.

131. Enrolment in primary, secondary, teacher-training and technical and vocational training schools in 1964 was as follows:

	Schools	Enrolment	Teachers
Primary education ^a	342	47,894	1,487
Secondary education ^b	32	2,783	168
Teacher training ^c	3	131	19
Technical and vocational training ^c	3	96	10

^a Including 325 African schools with 46,038 students and 1,402 teachers.

^b Including 25 African schools with 2,247 students and 119 teachers.

^c For Africans only.

132. During 1964 the age of first entry into primary schools was lowered to nine years and admission to such schools was confined to children of parents resident in Swaziland. Strict limitation was placed on the entry of non-Swazilanders into post-primary schools and colleges.

133. The policy of integration of the various races at primary level continued, and over fifty children of other races were enrolled in the English-medium schools. The introduction of a common syllabus for all races reached third-year level (Standard I). The "English Scheme" was operating in over thirty African schools. There was a demand for general introduction of this scheme throughout the primary system, but this has not yet proved possible owing to the lack of suitable teachers and finance.

134. Examination results obtained by students in the primary, secondary and teacher-training schools in 1964 were as follows:

	Entries	Passes
Standard VI	2,074	1,024
Form I	436	289
Junior Certificate	463	292
UBBS entry standard or South African Matriculation	109	46
Primary Lower Certificate	26	19
Primary Higher Certificate	30	8
Domestic Science Teachers' Certificate ...	6	5

135. With regard to educational development, Her Majesty's Commissioner stated in his recent speech to the Legislative Council that:

"The ultimate aims are to ensure that primary education in suitable accommodation is available to every child seeking that education; that the secondary school system, receiving the best possible entry from the primary schools, meets the needs of the individual child and the country; that sufficient qualified teachers are produced; and that there are enough opportunities for higher post-secondary education or training to meet the territory's needs.

"The long-term aims of educational policy have, however, to be considered in the light of our financial and physical resources, and concentration for the next year or two will, we feel, best be focused on secondary education, teacher training and technical training.

"... The Department of Education now faces a very serious staff shortage. Ways and means of overcoming this will be sought as a matter of urgent importance."

C. CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Introduction

136. The Special Committee considered Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland at its 421st to 423rd, 437th to 439th, 450th and 455th meetings held in Africa between 26 May and 22 June 1966.

Written petitions and hearings

137. The Special Committee had before it the following written petitions:

Petitioner	Document No.
Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland
Mr. P. Raboroko, Secretary for Education, Pan-Africanist Congress of South Africa (PAC)	A/AC.109/PET.461
Basutoland
Mr. Ntsu Mokhehle, President of the Basutoland Congress Party (BCP) and Mr. Seth Makotoko, President of the Marema-Tlou Freedom Party (MTFP)	A/AC.109/PET.515
Swaziland
Mr. J. J. Nquku, President, and Mr. A. W. M. Nxumalo, Secretary-General, Swaziland Progressive Party (SPP) ...	A/AC.109/PET.442 and Add.1 and 2
Mr. S. J. Zwane, External Representative, Ngwane National Liberatory Congress of Swaziland (NNLC) External Office, Dar es Salaam	A/AC.109/PET.462

138. The Special Committee heard the following petitioners:

Petitioner	Meeting
Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland
Mr. P. Raboroko, Secretary for Education, and two other members (Messrs. P. K. Leballo and A. B. Ngcobo), Pan-Africanist Congress of South Africa (PAC) (A/AC.109/PET.461)	421st-423rd
Swaziland
Mr. S. J. Zwane, External Representative, Ngwane National Liberatory Congress of Swaziland (NNLC) External Office, Dar es Salaam (A/AC.109/PET.462)	423rd

139. Mr. Raboroko, speaking on behalf of the Pan-Africanist Congress of South Africa (PAC), said that it was a liberation organization of the African people of South Africa, committed to the liberation of South Africa in particular and of the rest of colonial Africa in general. The South Africa Act of 1909, enacted by the United Kingdom Government, laid down the constitutional basis of what was currently known as the Republic of South Africa. Section 151 of that Act envisaged the incorporation of the former High Commission Territories of Basutoland (Lesotho), Bechuanaland (Botswana) and Swaziland (Ngwane) into the political framework of South Africa. The PAC and the African people of South Africa were accordingly interested parties in the constitutional development of these Territories. The South Africa Act gave expression to the economic alliance of Boer feudal, and British mining and financial interests.

140. Reinforced by the myth of racial superiority and the attendant imperialist myth of cultural superiority, those alien vested interests had turned South Africa into the world's major looting ground and the majority of the South African population into the world's most oppressed, exploited and degraded people. That phenomenon went by the name of apartheid. More correctly, however, it should be termed fascist colonialism.

141. The Pan-Africanist Congress and the African people of South Africa held that the Territories would only become genuinely independent when the so-called Republic of South Africa was. For that to be accomplished, the prevailing fascist colonialist society of South Africa would have to be changed into a non-racial socialist democracy.

142. It was his intention to demonstrate the collusion between British imperialism and South African fascist colonialism designed to ensure the subjugation of the people of South Africa and the Territories.

143. The Territories were colossal reservoirs of cheap labour for the vested foreign interests operating in South Africa. It was mainly for that reason that the United Kingdom Government, which was the political representative of British imperialism, colluded with the South African authorities—the political representatives of the local feudo-capitalists—with a view to the incorporation of those Territories.

144. The Transvaal and the Orange Free State gold mines employed 380,000 African mine workers, 20 per cent of whom came from these colonies. South Africa recruited those workers through the Native Recruiting Corporation. All were termed indentured labourers. The indentured labour system was the twentieth century's form of slavery. The workers had to pay their own return fares out of their accumulated wages and at the mines they lived under wretched conditions. Each compound had about 200 single rooms, twenty feet by thirty feet in area. Each house accommodated at least sixteen workers who, for the most part, used cement bunks for beds.

145. The average pay of African mine workers, which was 3/- a day in 1896, had only increased by 4d. a day in 1964, sixty-eight years later. During that time, the mine owners had reaped huge dividends from their labour. Between 1886 and 1932, gold-mining companies had invested £200 million in sterling, receiving dividends of £255 million. By 1945, after sixty years of gold mining, the share-holders had received dividends of £479 million. In 1964, the "gold producers" committee had increased the pay of mine workers by only 10 per cent. Even then, the African mine worker in the Zambian copper belt earned more than six times his African counterpart in South Africa. The African mine workers were virtually denied the right of collective bargaining.

146. The forces of British imperialism and South African fascist colonialism had also emasculated the economy and social life of the Territories. The United Kingdom Government had allowed many South Africans to buy landed property, to engage in commercial and industrial undertakings and to serve in the civil service of the Territories, against the interests of the indigenous inhabitants. As a part of the same trend a new role was being carved out for the traditional chiefs. Under colonialism, their function was that of agents whose task it was to collect taxes, recruit labour and generally assist in the oppression of the people. The surging tide of the forces of African nationalism had forced the British imperialists and South African colonialists to adapt the role and function of the chiefs to new and changing circumstances. They were now encouraged to stand for election with the support of the régime. The attitude of the new authorities towards political fugitives was similar to that of the Bantustan chiefs. The practice of rigging elections was prevalent in the Territories. The chiefs had been held to reflect consent for South Africa's incorporation of these Territories without any consultation of the people themselves, who abhorred apartheid.

147. It was taken for granted that, in addition to the 12.5 per cent of land allotted to African use in South Africa, the Government would be able before long to declare to the world that its generosity had given the African people of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland an area equivalent to that of the rest of the Republic. He would welcome an on-the-spot investigation in those Territories by the Committee to determine the people's attitude towards the neo-apartheid policies of the régime there.

148. The Pan-Africanist Congress and the African people of South Africa recommended that the Special Committee should recognize the basic unity and indivisibility of freedom and independence for the peoples of these three Territories and of the settler Republic of South Africa. The territorial integrity of these colonies should also be guaranteed and the South African racists should be debarred from controlling the right of entry and exit in respect of the Territories. All persons in transit to and from the Territories should be guaranteed immunity from apartheid laws. The Territories should be guaranteed political freedom and economic development without interference from the forces of reaction in the Republic of South Africa. Resolute support should be given to the cause of freedom, genuine independence and democracy in South Africa as a prelude to the solution of the colonial problems in the Territories.

149. In reply to questions, Mr. Raboroko and Mr. Ngcobo said that the situation of the three Territories in relation to South Africa was such that they would find it very difficult to survive economically; they were in a position of economic, political and social servitude.

150. This situation, they stated, was aggravated by South Africa's intensified efforts to control the electorate. They cited many instances to show that the recent elections in these Territories had been rigged, and stated that the present régimes were not representative. The outcome of the elections had also been influenced by British troop movements and police intimidation. Therefore, they urged the Special Committee to do everything within its power to have these elections declared null and void. Fresh elections should be held without propaganda radio broadcasts from South Africa and under reliable supervision. The PAC did not want independence to be delayed, but wanted genuine elections to be held first.

151. The grave implications of South Africa's interference in Basutoland affairs could be seen from a letter written by Chief Leabua Jonathan to Papenfus, the Verwoerd régime's Bantustan administrative agent in the Orange Free State, on 18 November 1964; the letter stated:

"... You have promised that if we become the Government of Basutoland after the elections with the assistance of your Government, and also if we subscribe to your policies, your Government will give us back Witzieshoek, Mataliele, Herschel and part of the Orange Free State bordering on Basutoland, from Fouriesburg to Wepener, so that we should form a greater Basutoland and enable your Government to put right past wrongs... and to show our thanks for this generous offer we shall place this country and its people under the wise guidance of the Government of the Republic of South Africa economically, politically and socially, so that you can lead us to true independence.

"You said you did not like the support which the Catholic Church is giving me, because you said it is strongly opposing the good education policy of your Government for the Bantu people. You even told me that it had worked wonders in the Transkei. I repeat that you must not fear anything from me. When I control the Government after the elections we shall find a good way of dealing with this Roman Catholic danger, but at present it is wise to use them to get the overwhelming support of the Catholics in this country."

The Catholic Church was regarded as a danger, however, not so much because of political considerations as because of the fear that Basutoland might become less economically dependent on South Africa.

152. The petitioners said that South Africa violated normal international etiquette concerning transit to landlocked countries. People were blacklisted, and persecuted, while aeroplanes using South African air space had to land for inspection. There was an urgent need for legislation to secure unhampered transit.

153. The alliance between South Africa, Portugal and Southern Rhodesia made conditions very difficult in the three Territories. For example, the people of Bechuanaland, after they had been debarred from passing through South Africa, had become accustomed to crossing to Zambia by way of Southern Rhodesia. Now that that had also been forbidden, they had to use the Caprivi Strip, which was infested with wild animals and without communications. The removal of the Smith régime in Southern Rhodesia and of the Salazar régime in Mozambique would give Bechuanaland and Swaziland access to the north.

154. The three Territories were subjected to the economic system of South Africa. The inability of the African population in these Territories to stand on its feet economically was due to long years of colonist exploitation.

155. The undertakings registered in South Africa but operating in the three Territories were Anglo-American firms. A sinister role was being played by Mr. Carl Todd, who was associated with the Chamber of Mines in South Africa and who controlled mining interests, cattle ranches and sugar plantations in Swaziland. He was now also associated in a new British venture with the firm of Yarrow (Africa) Ltd., which normally engaged in ship-building and engineering but which intended to build an apartheid navy and to manufacture arms in South Africa. That would of course nullify the effect of the steps taken to prevent armaments reaching that country. Colonel Jack Scott, the head of a South African mining house, also had diamond mining interests in Basutoland. The Machine Company, a South African concern, mined asbestos and manganese in the Bangwaketse Region in Botswana. The de Beers Anglo-American group (Oppenheimer's) prospected for diamonds throughout Botswana. The Vacuum Oil Company of South Africa, which originally prospected for oil in Botswana, had now transferred that operation to Mobiloil. Swaziland's railway line, which ran through Mozambique, had been established with South African capital. The Swaziland Iron Ore Development Company, which was a joint venture of the Anglo-American Corporation and the British industrial firm of Guest, Keen and Nettlefolds, had a twelve-year contract to supply iron ore to the Yawata and Fuji iron and steel group, a Japanese concern.

156. Some of the international companies in South Africa which practised apartheid were financed by local capital. However, those which engaged most intensively in such exploitation were financed by international capital from the United Kingdom and the United States of America. A case in point was Engelhard, a citizen of the United States of America and a patron of the Democratic Party, who had vast controlling interests in South Africa, particularly in the mining field. Both the First National City Bank of New York and the Chase Manhattan Bank, whose Chairman was David Rockefeller, had increased their own investments in South Africa. Furthermore, when in 1960, following the Sharpeville massacres, the South African economy was on the verge of collapse, it was those two banks which had lent the money to re-establish it on a sound basis. The British firm of Imperial Chemical Industries, which employed a large number of people throughout South Africa, had of late embarked upon a venture extremely dangerous for Africans, namely the manufacture of explosives and other materials of war. Although there was an embargo upon the import of arms from the United Kingdom and the United States, they were in fact being manufactured locally. Apartheid was reinforced by the international combines which were certain to render ineffective the resolutions of the United Nations and of the Organization of African Unity regarding the export of arms to South Africa. General Norstad, formerly of NATO, had recently arrived in South Africa to set up another company which would also manufacture arms and ammunition.

157. In Swaziland, 55 per cent of the land—the most fertile in the country—was owned by Whites, mainly South Africans. However, a plan had been set up in 1955 to collect funds so that the African people could buy their own land. In Bechuanaland, which had some of the best grazing areas, it was the same; large combines operating in South Africa had bought vast tracts of land and now controlled the market. The position in Basutoland was different because all land was nationalized and belonged to the Basuto nation. No foreign combine was therefore allowed to buy land. The system of land tenure in the Territories was similar to that obtaining in South Africa, where the poorest 12.5 per cent of the land was allocated for African use. Paragraph 17 (e) of the report of the Swaziland Constitutional Committee guaranteed "protection from deprivation of property". Foreign interests would thereby maintain their hold under a paper independence. The Special Committee should urge the United Nations to send observers and ensure that the land was returned to the people as a prelude to independence.

158. Large numbers of workers entered South Africa in search of work both because there were not sufficient employment opportunities in the Territories and because wages were very low. These workers were recruited by South African firms, one of whose practices was to withhold the wages of an employee until the end of his contract, without interest. Such migrant workers were subjected to all the indignities of the apartheid system.

159. The health conditions in the three Territories were deplorable; medical services were inadequate. Educational establishments existed. However, the percentage of the population able to benefit from these institutions was very low. Furthermore, most of the teaching staff came from South Africa and they brought with them the attitude and mentality prevailing in South Africa. The situation was deplorable and the standard of education extremely low. The question of education was a vicious circle. It was necessary first to gain political power and independence, without which a proper system of education was impossible.

160. Thus far, no action had been taken to safeguard the territorial integrity and sovereignty of the three Territories. Whether or not there was a United Nations resident representative in each Territory, the Special Committee should urge the General Assembly to see to it that independence was not granted without prior genuine elections and settlement of the land problem. There should also be international provision to guarantee the transit right.

161. The Territories would join the Organization of African Unity upon independence. It was therefore vitally important that nationalist elements should gain power to prevent a puppet government from enjoying immunity.

162. Mr. Zwane, speaking on behalf of the Ngwane National Liberatory Congress (NNLC), said that his party had charged him to appear before the Special Committee and present the plight of the African masses of Swaziland.

163. The NNLC was a liberation organization of the African people of Swaziland, the policy and programme of which was, inter alia, to work unceasingly for the immediate achievement of independence for the people of Swaziland; to work for the complete emancipation of the Swazi people from political, social and economic enslavement; and to fight for the overthrow of white domination and for the implementation of the right of self-determination.

164. The NNLC and the African people of Swaziland held that British imperialism and the South African fascist colonialists had plotted to keep Swaziland as their colony in perpetuity. For instance, the Swaziland Constitutional Committee which had drafted the latest proposals for constitutional advancement had been appointed by a colonial officer, Her Majesty's High Commissioner, who had also presided over it. The Committee had included two other members of the colonial administration: the Chief Secretary and the Attorney General. The remaining members had been picked from the self-styled traditionalists, the Imbokodvo National Movement, all members of the Swazi National Council and advisers to the King—and from the racist United Swaziland Association, a white political party that did not accept members of other races.

165. In their recommendations, the Swaziland Constitutional Committee had submitted the undemocratic proposals that: (a) Swaziland should be divided into eight constituencies, each returning three members to the House of Assembly (paragraph 37 of its report); (b) the King should appoint six members to the House of Assembly (paragraph 27); six members of the Senate were also to be appointed by the King and six elected by the House of Assembly (paragraph 32); and (c) the land should be vested in the Ngwenyama's (the King's) trust for the Swazi Nation and the King should retain the right to make grants, leases or other dispositions in respect of minerals and mineral oils vested in him (paragraphs 68 and 69).

166. The NNLC and the people of Swaziland were of the firm opinion that such proposals, if accepted by the United Kingdom Government as a basis for granting self-government to Swaziland, would only serve the interests of the white settlers and their imperialist bosses. The reason why Imbokodvo and the United Swaziland Association feared the democratic principle of accepting the return of one member of Parliament from each constituency was that they knew that they would be faced with hopeless defeat; and NNLC insisted on adopting the practice that had been followed all over Africa in former British colonies and in Britain itself: one constituency, one member, on the basis of one man, one vote. It also maintained that just as Queen Elizabeth II had no right to fill the House of Lords and the House of Commons with her own nominees, the King of Swaziland had no right to fill the Houses of Parliament in Swaziland with nominees numbering about a third of a joint session of the Houses.

167. NNLC and the people of Swaziland were aware that only the settlers and their imperialist bosses stood to gain if their land was to be put in the trust of the King, whose dealings with the apartheid-oriented United Swaziland Association were dubious. NNLC had in its possession copies of correspondence between C. F. Todd, Chairman of the elected members of the European Advisory Council of Swaziland, and the King which it was prepared to circulate upon request. It also had background material on Mr. Todd and his apartheid background in South Africa.

168. The Swaziland people maintained that the struggle for emancipation was based on land, which together with minerals, should be collectively owned, as in the past, by the people, with the government elected by them as trustee.

169. The Imbokodvo had so far proved itself to be a tool of the settlers, who in turn were the agents of world imperialism. Should their schemes materialize Swaziland would become a neo-colonial State and the present tranquillity between races would disappear with the rights of the African people.

170. Having realized that the 1966 report of the Swaziland Constitutional Committee proposed pseudo-independence—indepenence with strings—NNLC had asked the Government of the United Kingdom to summon a duly representative constitutional conference in which the long-term interests of the African people of Swaziland would be recognized and safeguarded. He appealed to the United Nations to exert pressure on the United Kingdom Government and to stress the importance of convening such a conference in the interests of a peaceful transition to independence.

171. The Imbokodvo could not be trusted to represent the African people because it was clearly a puppet organization serving interests other than those of the Swazis. Willie Meyer, leader of the whites-only United Swaziland Association, had revealed to the Rand Daily Mail, a Johannesburg newspaper, that his party had actually helped Imbokodvo to its feet and that when Imbokodvo had recently tried to exercise some independent policy, Meyer had said that it appeared as if the child wanted to become father of the man. Meyer had told the reporter: "I want fifty-fifty parliamentary representation for whites for the next five to ten years. I won't settle for less." That was the man who was an ally of an organization that purported to be representing the Swazi people.

172. His party also wished to bring to the attention of the Special Committee the victimization its members and other Swazis suffered at the hands of the Verwoerd régime, which employed desperate methods in an attempt to jeopardize the interests of the people and imposed such hardships as refusing transit visas to African nationalists from Swaziland wishing to travel to other parts of the world. The Acting Secretary-General of NNLC had been denied such a visa for the past year, and the President of the party, Mr. Ambrose Zwane, had been arrested and charged in South Africa on trumped-up charges of wrongful entry. A sizable number of Africans from Swaziland were working in the South African gold mines, where they were denied the elementary right of forming trade unions and the right to bargain collectively. NNLC could not abandon those workers without abandoning the reason for its own existence.

173. Against that background, NNLC requested the Special Committee to help the people of Ngwane to get immediate independence, to help the forces of African nationalism to safeguard the vital interests of the African people of Swaziland, to ensure that the administration of Mr. Verwoerd and his National Party ceased meddling in the affairs of Swaziland, to prevent that administration from taking unfair advantage of the land-locked position of Swaziland in any way, and to force the United Kingdom Government to allow a genuine non-racial constitution for Swaziland.

174. In reply to questions, Mr. Zwane said that when he had asked a member of Imbokodvo in the Legislative Council why it was working with South Africa, the latter had warned him that he must be very careful, it was dangerous to ask such questions. When members of NNLC had been painting slogans demanding higher wages for the workers, they had been stopped by South African security forces and threatened with arrest. He recalled the case of a South African refugee, Mrs. Wentzel, who had been taken by the South African security forces; yet the authorities had denied their presence. The South African police sent shorthand writers to take notes at meetings of his party, and their security men had authority to arrest people and send them to Mozambique. All the inhabitants of South African origin, numbering about 8,000, had dual nationality. In spite of all these facts, the Secretary of State for the Colonies had denied that there was collusion with the South African police. Although NNLC had asked for an investigation nothing had been done. During the election of the Legislative Council, the South African Government had sent a member of Parliament to supervise the Imbokodvo.

NNLC had protested to the British Administration, but had heard nothing.

175. The United Kingdom Government had not granted the NNLC's request for holding a constitutional conference, and therefore he asked the Special Committee to exert pressure on that Government to call such a conference. He also asked the United Nations to send observers to Swaziland when elections were held. He agreed that genuine independence for Basutoland and Bechuanaland would have a beneficial effect on developments in Swaziland.

176. He said that in the Territory 45 per cent of the land was occupied by Africans and 55 per cent by Europeans. The Swazi National Council had introduced a scheme to buy back from the settlers land that had been allocated to them by the Paramount Chief. Swaziland produced asbestos, gold, iron ore, sugar and wood pulp. Most of the products were processed outside the Territory, a practice which was followed to prevent Africans from learning how such processing was done.

General statements by members

177. The representative of the United States of America said that the United States was in full agreement with what it believed to be the basic political objectives of the people of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland: the right of the people freely to express their wishes and govern themselves.

178. As she had stated at the beginning of the meetings in Dar es Salaam, the Special Committee's aim should be the reasoned consideration of the complex problems before it. In her opinion some of the statements which had been heard tended to result from hasty generalization and to imply guilt by association. For example, a private American citizen, General Norstad, had expressed an opinion some time ago which had been referred to by a petitioner. That opinion had already been quoted extensively during the Special Committee's last visit to Africa. As had been stated by the United States representative at that time, Mr. Norstad was a private citizen entitled to express his own views, which should in no way be associated with those of the United States Government. The United States Government rigidly enforced the policy forbidding the sale of arms and military equipment to South Africa, in accordance with the Security Council resolution of December 1963, as well as the export to South Africa of any machinery or equipment for their manufacture.

179. The United States Government was cognizant of the relationship existing between the Territories and South Africa and was also fully aware of the effect of the abhorrent apartheid policy of the South African Government on those Territories. It had always condemned the racist, brutal and inhumane policies practised within South Africa and the effect of those policies on neighbouring countries. Nevertheless, the people of those Territories would shortly be guiding their own destiny in spite of the geographic and economic restraints. Bechuanaland would become independent on 30 September 1966, with Basutoland following shortly, and it was hoped that in the near future Swaziland would also attain independence. As Governments based on universal adult suffrage and racial equality, all three Territories would stand in sharp contrast to the racist policies of South Africa and perhaps provide a new demonstration of the fact that it was possible for racial groups to live in harmony provided that men and women were treated equally and justly. The United States Government looked forward to those political developments.

180. The United States had extended a programme of assistance to the Territories in the form of scholarships and grants and it hoped to contribute to their future leadership resources. The United States had for each of the past two years granted $100,000 to the University of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland. In addition, there were twenty-five full scholarship territorial students in United States schools and universities. Another seventeen had received partial maintenance at United States universities. It also supplied funds for a chair at the University. Finally, the United States had granted over $2 million worth of food to Bechuanaland since mid-1965, under the United Nations World Food Programme, to help meet the famine caused by drought.

181. However, serious problems still faced those Territories. The economic difficulties should not be minimized, and the United States Government looked forward to continuing to help the people of the Territories to overcome them.

182. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that the aggressive threats facing the Territories of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, which might mean the continuation of colonialism, called for definitive action by the Special Committee. Those Territories were geographically placed within the grasp of the South African apartheid régime, and worse still, they continued to be victimized by the continuing collaboration between the Government of South Africa and the administering Power, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland six years after the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples (resolution 1514 (XV)). During the meetings in Dar es Salaam, petitioners had given the Special Committee specific evidence of daily incursions into those Territories by the police of South Africa, which were carried out with the knowledge of the administering Power and aimed at intimidating the nationalists who were justly opposing plunder and exploitation.

183. Although some form of constitutional progress had been made, a need persisted for proper machinery to enable those peoples freely to found their own government. Some type of supervisory body was required in all three Territories, in order that the provisions of resolution 1514 (XV) might be faithfully implemented. The necessity of such a measure was heightened by the grave situation created by the rebellion of the racist minority group in Southern Rhodesia. Africans knew that if the exploitation of those countries' resources by foreign companies, chiefly those from South Africa, should continue, the colonial forces could revert to the use of the discredited indabas. It had been shown in the working paper (para. 87 above) that the administering Power had granted the Engelbrecht and G. van den Brink firms rights to exploit the diamond potential of Bechuanaland, in an area covering some 4,460 square miles.

184. Land, as the chief means of production and existence of the African people, was of the utmost importance. Despite the General Assembly's renewed request (resolution 2063 (XX)) that the United Kingdom take immediate measures to return the land that had been taken away from the African people, petitioners had informed the Committee in Dar es Salaam that those people continued to be dispossessed of their natural property. A typical example was Swaziland, where white settlers comprising less than 4 per cent of the population controlled more than 55 per cent of the arable land. Such forms of exploitation had forced the Africans to go as slave labour into the gold and diamond mines of apartheid South Africa.

185. The United Republic of Tanzania, considering freedom to be indivisible, supported the proposals presented for the establishment of measures to ensure the territorial integrity and economic development of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland. Their concern deepened as aggressive threats by the South African régime increased. One alarming case had been South Africa's shipment of maize to designated members of one political party in Basutoland in order to influence elections in that Territory, and the kidnapping of several candidates. In view of such evidence, the United Nations had the obligation to provide for elections free of any manipulation or intimidation.

186. The representative of Ethiopia said that the territorial integrity and future political and economic independence of the three Territories were endangered by their geographical position. Bechuanaland was hemmed in on three sides by South West Africa, South Africa and Southern Rhodesia, while Swaziland was between the Portuguese-held Territories and South Africa. Basutoland was in an even more perilous position, being completely encircled by Territories in which the apartheid policy was applied. It was that obvious threat that had led the General Assembly to adopt resolution 2063 (XX) of 16 December 1965, operative paragraph 2 of which reaffirmed the inalienable rights of the peoples of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland to freedom and independence. Verwoerd was reported to have said at the end of September 1965 that the three Territories were of great importance to South Africa because of their proximity; left to itself no doubt South Africa would find the whole continent important to it for the same reason. Botha, the South African Deputy Minister of Administration and Development, was reported to have said that the return to the Africans of land at present occupied by Europeans would be dependent upon South Africa's being able to play a part in guiding the future political and economic development of the Territories. A glance at the miserable conditions in South West Africa would suffice to show how well the South African Government would discharge such responsibilities. A number of economic agreements had been concluded in October 1965 between South Africa and Portugal, and in November between South Africa and Southern Rhodesia.

187. European politicians in the Territories were doing all they could to make them economically so dependent on South Africa that political domination by it would inevitably follow. Mrs. Eirene White, the British Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, had pointed out in July 1965 that there was a tremendous lack of educational facilities in the Territories. They were in fact so inadequate that the Territories had to depend for their professional and technical services on expatriates from the Republic of South Africa. One of the major factors hampering industrial development was the lack of trained personnel.

188. In June 1965, South Africa had sent Basutoland 165,000 pounds sterling worth of grain to relieve starvation. It might be asked why it had not been the administering Power that had come to the rescue. The Opposition Party had presented a motion asking the Basutoland Assembly to decline the gift. Even though the Territory was under the so-called protection of the United Kingdom Government, students returning home from their studies abroad had been stranded in London because they had been unable to obtain South African transit visas. The South African Government had also taken upon itself to censor communications destined for the Territories.

189. He was deeply concerned about the Territories' heavy economic dependence on South Africa. The mainstay of Bechuanaland's economy was beef, 5 million pounds sterling worth of which was exported annually to South Africa.

190. Since the racist Government had made no attempt to conceal its policy towards neighbouring Territories, it was the responsibility of the administering Power to ensure that the granting of independence did not mean the handing over of the Territories by the old colonialists to ruthless new imperialism. It was virtually necessary that United Nations representatives should be present to see that South Africa did not once again defy United Nations recommendations by a fait accompli.

191. None of these three Territories was economically self-sufficient. Although the United Nations and other international organizations had tried to alleviate human misery, much more would have to be done.

192. The representative of Denmark said that the Government in Basutoland and Bechuanaland were determined to proceed to independence without further delay, while the opposition parties desired certain changes to be made first. Some delegations had expressed concern that the independence might not be a genuine one, and his delegation fully agreed with the importance of ensuring that it was genuine and free from foreign interference. He emphasized, however, that independence was the main point in colonial issues, and that that concept had been well expressed in paragraph 3 of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, which stated that inadequacy of political, economic, social or educational preparedness should never serve as a pretext for delaying independence. He was convinced that, once the Territories had obtained their independence, they would, like other free African countries, be capable of facing their own internal problems.

193. The situation was somewhat different in Swaziland, where progress towards independence had been less speedy. Arrangements had been made to begin to establish self-government during 1966, but the Territory was not expected to become fully independent before 1970. His delegation had noted that there was strong pressure for independence before that time on the basis of a more democratic constitution than the one that had been drawn up.

194. A gloom was cast over the picture by the difficulties the three Territories, because of their geographical position, would face vis-à-vis South Africa when they became independent. It was therefore most important that they should be made economically viable to an extent that would enable them to resist pressure from that country. The United Kingdom Government was giving them extensive economic assistance, and might be expected to continue to do so after independence. The United Nations had decided to establish a fund for their economic development, and his Government had given a pledge that it would contribute when it seemed likely that the Fund would become large enough to be workable. An overwhelming number of Member States had emphasized the need for such assistance on a large scale, and his delegation was disappointed that only three countries had so far pledged contributions.

195. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that the General Assembly and the Special Committee had discussed on various occasions the situation in Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland and the measures which the United Kingdom ought to have taken to guarantee the peoples of those Territories true freedom and independence based on the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. The General Assembly had recommended, among other things, that democratic elections should be organized to that end. The constitutional development of the Territories showed clearly, however, that in its desire to protect the interests of United Kingdom capitals in South Africa, which amounted to more than £1,000 million, the United Kingdom had done everything possible to delay such elections. To quote an article which had appeared in an African newspaper, the latest elections had proved that the methods of economic pressure, intrigue and corruption had triumphed.

196. On 29 April 1965, elections had been held in Basutoland. The conclusion drawn by the Rand Daily Mail in its issue of 20 November had been that the National Party had come first with Chief Jonathan, having won thirty-one seats out of sixty, thanks to considerable financial aid from the Republic of South Africa and the Federal Republic of Germany. Thus, although it itself had used and encouraged others to use underhand methods during the elections, the administering Power had been unable to assure the party it favoured of more than an insignificant majority.

197. The constitutional development of Swaziland was taking place in the same undemocratic atmosphere. The United Kingdom had set up a committee to review the Constitution before giving the Protectorate its independence. Many political parties had not been allowed access to it. On the other hand, Europeans who declared themselves openly hostile to the principle of "one man, one vote" played a leading role in it. In the light of those facts, it was easy to see why the petitioners heard by the Special Committee had asked that all political parties should be represented in the constitutional committee and that elections should be held on the basis of universal suffrage and supervised by the Organization of African Unity (OAU).

198. It would thus be vain to try to hide the fact that the administering Power had taken no account of the General Assembly's recommendations and that instead of preparing for the people of its Protectorates to achieve independence, it was perpetuating the existing situation. The three Territories it administered were economically dependent upon the Republic of South Africa and were victims of pernicious activity by foreign monopolies. Another example could be cited of the United Kingdom's contempt for the General Assembly's resolutions. The Assembly had recommended the administering Power to take steps to ensure that the land stolen from the people was restored to them. Four years had passed since the General Assembly's decision on that matter, but the situation remained unchanged: in Bechuanaland, 62 per cent of the land belonged to the Crown and to Europeans, while in Swaziland the white population had more than 50 per cent of the land. As a result of the administering Power's policy, the economic situation of the three Protectorates was such that it was impossible to improve the level of living of the people and to create the necessary conditions to ensure the economic development of the Territories once they had gained independence.

199. His delegation considered that the Special Committee should ask the administering Power to apply the General Assembly resolutions concerning the constitutional development of the Protectorates, in order to ensure democratic representation of the population based on universal suffrage and on the principle of "one man, one vote". The Committee should also recommend the administering Power to withdraw its troops immediately from the Protectorates, since their presence prevented the organization of truly democratic elections. Finally, the Committee should adopt a resolution calling for the restitution to the indigenous population of the land belonging to it.

200. In addition, regarding the fund provided for in General Assembly resolution 2063 (XX), he considered that in the conditions of the colonial administration and the activity of foreign monopolies it is unlikely for this fund to play any part in providing the economical independence of the three Territories. Only the political independence based on the democratic election, the restitution of the land to its rightful owners and the redistribution of the means of production among the people could create favourable conditions for economic independence of the three Territories.

201. The representative of India said that he had listened with the greatest attention to all the views expressed on the question of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland and agreed that had the United Kingdom been represented at the meeting, the land issue could have been cleared up then and there. It would have been unfair to criticize the United Kingdom Government in the absence of its delegation, and yet it was essential that proper conditions be provided for achieving and maintaining the independence and development of the three Territories under discussion. Although constitutional and other problems lay ahead, elections should not be delayed. It was to be regretted that nothing had been done for Swaziland in that connexion; and if the administering Power did nothing the Special Committee should take prompt action.

202. So long as the three Territories were under pressure from their neighbours, their pattern of life would resemble that of Southern Rhodesia and South Africa: the supremacy of a white minority and the exploitation of the African population. Although independence was in sight, the Special Committee and other organizations had to continue efforts to put an end to white domination, a problem that would persist so long as the policies of Portugal, Southern Rhodesia and South Africa remained unchanged.

203. His delegation was discouraged by the lack of adequate response among members to contribute to the Economic Development Fund. Only two, Cyprus and Liberia, had announced their contributions, and Denmark had stated its intention to contribute once the Fund became operational. The importance of the Fund, stressed by the Chacko Commission's excellent report, had led his delegation to pledge an appropriate contribution, payable in the Fund's operational stage. He hoped that other members would give generous support to that measure, which would safeguard the territorial integrity of those Territories by making them less dependent economically on neighbouring States.

204. The representative of Poland said that his delegation supported General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and wished to see the three Territories attain genuine independence under majority rule. Poland was aware of the manoeuvres of the administering Power and South Africa, and the petitioners had cited many instances proving interference with elections. It was evident that the United Kingdom would endeavour to continue its control behind a façade of independence.

205. The administering Power had done very little, since it went on the assumption that the destiny of the three Territories was incorporation in South Africa, which was indicated by the fact that they came under the Commonwealth Relations Office, which dealt with South Africa. The United Kingdom had therefore neglected its obligation to grant independence under the best possible conditions. That had increased the dependence of the three Territories on South Africa, and in fact they were in a position of economic servitude. All responsible posts in the Civil Service were held by whites, and especially South Africans. In particular, the administering Power had failed to implement General Assembly resolutions urging the United Kingdom to return all land to its rightful indigenous owners.

206. The representative of Australia said that the question of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, to which the Special Committee had often given careful and anxious attention, assumed even greater importance because in four months' time Bechuanaland would become the independent Republic of Botswana, and because new talks were taking place between the administering Power and the delegation of Basutoland about the timing of the Territory's accession to independence under the name of Lesotho, in accordance with the decisions of its popularly elected Parliament. Both Bechuanaland and Basutoland had their own Governments, elected by full universal suffrage, i.e., one-man-one-vote, while Swaziland was on the road towards sovereign independence.

207. His delegation had voted in favour of the resolutions on those Territories adopted in 1965 by the Special Committee and later by the General Assembly, and had watched with satisfaction the efforts undertaken to bring the Territories to independence. With the independence of two of them imminent, it was time for the Committee to make a further assessment of the realities of the social, political and economic situation in which those countries found themselves. He recalled the statement made by the representative of Australia at the 1549th meeting of the Fourth Committee on 8 November 1965: "... experience has made us wary of the establishment of special and separate funds for special purposes in special and particular areas ..." (which) "... in an age of many-sided developmental enterprises being carried out through such organizations as the United Nations, has obvious disadvantages. Furthermore, it is difficult to say, in a world which is beset by so many problems, marked by want in a hundred thousand forms ... that one particular small part of one particular group of people should be accorded some sort of preferential selection for the purpose of relief and development. Nevertheless, my delegation has a very sincere appreciation of the humanitarian motives underlying the proposals now before us".

208. In connexion with the question of constitutional development, he cited the statement made to the Special Committee by the Australian Ambassador on 2 November 1964:

"So far as the problem of constitutional advancement is concerned, my delegation would like to record that the Administering Authority, bearing in mind the hard realities of the situation, seems to us to be going about the discharge of its responsibilities in a sensible way. . . . Constitutional development . . . is not a simple problem . . . all of us are aware of the problems which the British Government, as Administering Authority, has had to face. It is trying to move peacefully forward by reconciling interests, and that commends itself to my delegation. I believe that results are already beginning to flow."

209. He reiterated his delegation's rejection of apartheid and its application in the Republic of South Africa. In order that its influence be prevented from extending to other countries, the latter needed help from the United Nations to strengthen their internal structures. However, the inescapable facts of their geographical situation could not be ignored. As Basutoland was an enclave within South Africa, its whole existence was tied up with South Africa's; and its resources were so limited that a large proportion of its population would be unable to live if they could not work in South Africa.

210. Bechuanaland's economy was dependent at most important points upon that of South Africa and Southern Rhodesia. Its only railroad was administered from those countries, without whose trade and assistance it could not continue to operate. Swaziland, although economically stronger, was also land-locked.

211. The basic problem facing the United Nations was how to express in a realistic way its willingness to assist in setting up relations between independent sovereign States. Any consideration of the problem should begin from the firm basis of a well-established precedent. That matter had recently been the subject of codification at an important conference with which the United Nations had been associated. Such long-standing rules could give certain rights to a land-locked State and its neighbours, rights which if they were to be fully exercised had to depend upon mutual self-restraint and respect by each side for the independence and integrity of the other.

212. The representative of Bulgaria noted that the situation in Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland remained unchanged. The petitioners had demonstrated that the people of the three Territories continued to be afflicted by the repugnant policy of apartheid. Their situation was scarcely different from that of their brothers in South Africa and South West Africa. The responsibility for that state of affairs lay undoubtedly with the United Kingdom, which had left the racist régime of South Africa a free hand. The peasants had been deprived of their lands, and the workers were toiling under very harsh conditions. There again, the great international monopolies had connived in a system of shameful exploitation. The names cited by the petitioners were sadly familiar to the members of the Special Committee: Rockefeller, the Chase Manhattan Bank, and the First National City Bank of New York were names that recurred frequently in any discussion of South Africa or the three Protectorates.

213. He then said that genuine independence was acquired at the political level. Free elections must be organized in the Territories in question.

D. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

214. At the 437th meeting, the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania introduced a draft resolution on the three Territories (A/AC.109/L.303) co-sponsored by Afghanistan, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, the Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, the United Republic of Tanzania and Yugoslavia.

215. He pointed out that the new factor presented in paragraphs 4 and 6 was the need for United Nations assistance in following up the progress towards independence in each of the three Territories. Recalling that a constitutional conference on Basutoland was currently in progress in London, he hoped that fair elections might be held before independence, under the supervision of a United Nations representative.

216. With regard to paragraph 3, it would be remembered that paragraph 5 of General Assembly resolution 2063 (XX) had requested the Committee in co-operation with the Secretary-General to consider what measures were necessary for securing the territorial integrity and sovereignty of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, and to report to the General Assembly as its twenty-first session.

217. Paragraph 2 dealt with the important question of land to which attention had been drawn earlier.

218. He assured the Special Committee, on behalf of the co-sponsors of the resolution, that its contents reflected their deep concern, and that they would welcome not only the Committee's full support but also any amendments or additions which might strengthen the resolution.

219. The representative of Sierra Leone drew attention to three main concerns reflected in the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.303): firstly, the question of land distribution, which should be stressed more strongly than it had been in resolution 1514 (XV); secondly, the problem of transit to and from those land-locked Territories; and thirdly, the poor social and economic conditions existing in the three Territories.

220. Paragraphs 1 and 2 of the operative part reflected the co-sponsors' concern about the conditions under which independence would be granted; paragraphs 3 and 6 their concern about the influence, interference and ambitions of South Africa; and paragraphs 4, 5 and 6 their concern about the social and economic plight of those Territories.

221. The representative of Denmark said that, with regard to operative paragraph 2 of the draft resolution, the Special Committee did not have at its disposal all the information necessary to enable it to express an opinion on the land problem. With regard to operative paragraph 3, he considered that a reference should be made to the co-operation between the Special Committee and the Secretary-General envisaged in operative paragraph 5 of resolution 2063 (XX). However, he would not insist on those points, and would be prepared to support the draft resolution at it stood.

222. The representative of Poland stressed the importance of truly democratic elections, which was the spirit behind operative paragraph 2. His delegation welcomed paragraph 3 and, aware of the threat of South African expansion, endorsed the idea embodied in paragraph 4.

223. He firmly believed that United Nations representation in the three Territories would establish permanent links and enable the United Nations to keep a close watch on the political situation. Only under genuine independence would the Territories be able to make up for cumulative neglect on the part of the United Kingdom and stand on their feet politically and economically. His delegation would therefore vote in favour of the resolution.

224. The representative of Australia observed that the fourth and sixth preambular paragraphs did not fairly reflect the facts. Operative paragraph 3 could not be applied without reversing the trend of events towards the independence of Basutoland and Bechuanaland, in respect of which the administering Power had surrendered its power to the Parliaments of these countries. Those legislative bodies could themselves take any necessary action to arrange the return of land owned by Europeans, subject to the need for economic development.

225. Operative paragraph 4 reflected the need for a deep and sympathetic understanding of the problems raised by the coming to independence of the three Territories. He had no objection to the setting up of a sub-committee for that purpose, but shared the apprehension of the representatives of Denmark and Italy about the standing of that sub-committee and about the continuation of its work in any Territory after independence. Decisions taken in 1965 concerning the rapid completion of that work should be reviewed. He suggested that the Committee might consider the precedent of the help which the Secretariat had been able to offer in its mission to the Territories in 1965.

226. As he had asked earlier, did such a small part of one people merit particular attention, as provided for in operative paragraph 6? Although the Australian delegation appreciated the purpose of the proposal, it could not pledge a contribution to the Fund, and would therefore support the resolution as a whole, but would maintain reservations concerning operative paragraph 5. It also understood that the action envisaged in operative paragraph 7 would be taken in the closest consultation with the administering Power.

227. The representative of Italy feared that the day of independence would come without the Special Committee's having adopted a firm stand on the serious problems confronting the three Territories.

228. Despite the discouraging lack of results in the past, he supported the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.303), though he would state two specific reservations: firstly, paragraph 2 reflected the Special Committee's discussion during its 1965 session, which meant that no solution had been found for the land problem. There was no reason why the Parliaments themselves should not have their own legislation concerning land. Action by the Committee might be considered as interference. In that connexion, he referred to the summary record of the 372nd meeting held on 17 June 1965 (A/AC.109/SR.372). Secondly, he shared the opinion of the representative of Denmark concerning the need to clarify the meaning and the scope of paragraph 3. He was not sure whether the Committee should continue to apply the measures referred to after the establishment of independence in the three Territories. Also, in some part of the resolution, mention should be made of Bechuanaland's forthcoming independence. He suggested inserting a new operative paragraph for that purpose, which might read "Welcomes the fixing of a firm date for Bechuanaland's accession to independence". He subsequently submitted to the Committee a formal draft in writing (A/AC.109/L.306).

229. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics suggested the insertion of the phrase "in consultation with the Special Committee" between the words "appoint" and "United Nations special representatives".

230. At the 438th meeting, the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania, introducing a revised text of the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.303/Rev.1), said that both requests for amendments made by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and by Italy had been met. He wished to thank them for their co-operation. The Italian amendment improved the text, as it was important to take cognizance of a fixed date for independence whatever one's opinion of the sincerity behind it.

231. The representative of Italy thanked the co-sponsors for accepting the substance of his amendment. He would therefore not press it to a vote. However, since there was some uncertainty as to whether or not a date had recently been fixed for the independence of Basutoland, it was preferable merely to indicate the Special Committee's regret that no date had been fixed by the administering Power for the independence of Swaziland.

232. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that his delegation had given serious consideration to the information concerning Basutoland contained in the working paper (see para. 53 above), and had noted that for the United Kingdom Government, Mrs. Eirene White had accepted Chief Jonathan's statement of intention and "his assurance that the stipulated conditions were likely to be fulfilled". Use of the word "likely" made the assurance worthless. On the radio in the morning of 8 June 1966 he had heard that representatives of Basutoland were in London for constitutional talks; but at present the Special Committee had no definite dates for the independence of Basutoland and Swaziland. He regretted the absence of the United Kingdom representative, who might have been able to throw some light on the matter.

233. The representative of Italy said that there was a difference of opinion over the interpretation of the paragraph cited. His point was that the Special Committee did not know whether any requests had been made between 29 April and 8 June 1966. Therefore there was factual doubt, but his delegation would not insist in the matter.

234. The representative of Bulgaria welcomed the fact that the sponsors of the draft resolution had accepted the suggestion of the USSR delegation that the Secretary-General should be requested to consult the Special Committee before appointing a special representative in each Territory.

235. The representative of the United States of America said that although the Territories were beset by difficulties, they had made great progress. Her Government would have liked the resolution to contain broader acknowledgement of such progress. Her second major exception lay in the appeal for contributions to a voluntary fund. At the time of its establishment, her Government had stated that it considered aid through existing multilateral programmes preferable, except in special circumstances. That did not, however, mean that the United States wished to discourage other countries from contributing. She again drew attention to the United States assistance to the Territories referred to above. She also expressed reservations concerning the requirement that the United Nations special representatives should be appointed in consultation with the Special Committee. Her delegation would prefer to leave the matter to the Secretary-General's discretion. Finally, she emphasized that her Government shared the concern embodied in the resolution for the future political and economic development of the Territories, beset as they were with the problems inherent in their proximity to South Africa.

236. At the 439th meeting, the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.303/Rev.1) was adopted by 20 votes to none, with 1 abstention. The representative of Chile regretted that he had been unable to participate in the vote on the draft resolution; his delegation would have voted in favour of the draft. It fully approved of all the provisions of that text and hoped that they would be implemented in every detail.

237. The text of the resolution on Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland (A/AC.109/178) adopted by the Special Committee at its 439th meeting on 9 June 1966 reads as follows:

"The Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

"Having heard the petitioners,

"Recalling General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960 containing the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

"Recalling further General Assembly resolutions 1654 (XVI) of 27 November 1961, 1817 (XVII) of 18 December 1962, 1954 (XVIII) of 11 December 1963 and 2063 (XX) of 16 December 1965 concerning the situation in Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland,

"Noting with concern the growing interference by the racist Government of the Republic of South Africa in the economic, financial and military fields in the three Territories and the assistance received by that Government from certain countries,

"Deeply concerned at the economic and social situation prevailing in the three Territories and their urgent need for United Nations assistance,

"Gravely concerned at the serious threat to the territorial integrity and economic stability of these Territories created by the racist régime of the Republic of South Africa,

"Having regard to the various declarations made by the administering Power regarding the independence of these Territories,

"Considering that the presence of United Nations special representatives in each of these Territories is necessary for the purpose of following up their progress towards independence,

"1. Takes note with satisfaction of the date for the independence of Bechuanaland and regrets that no dates have so far been fixed by the administering Power for the independence of the other two Territories;

"2. Calls upon the administering Power to ensure that the independence to be granted to Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland should be based on the free expression of all the people in fulfilment of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV);

"3. Renews its request that the administering Power take immediate steps to return to the indigenous inhabitants all the lands taken away from them;

"4. Decides to establish a sub-committee with a view to studying and suggesting all necessary measures for securing the territorial integrity and sovereignty of the three Territories as requested by the General Assembly in paragraph 5 of its resolution 2063 (XX);

"5. Appeals to all States to contribute to the Fund established by the General Assembly in paragraph 7 of its resolution 2063 (XX);

"6. Considers that the efforts to provide economic, financial and technical assistance through United Nations programmes of technical co-operation and the specialized agencies should continue in order to remedy the economic and social situation of the three Territories;

"7. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Special Committee, to appoint United Nations special representatives in each of the three Territories for the purpose of following up the progress towards independence and to report to the General Assembly as soon as possible;

"8. Decides to keep the question of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland under constant review."

238. On the proposal of the Chairman, the Special Committee, at its 455th meeting on 22 June 1966, appointed Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Iran, Italy, Mali, Madagascar and Uruguay as members of the Sub-Committee established in accordance with paragraph 4 of the above-mentioned resolution.

E. SUPPLEMENTARY INFORMATION ON THE TERRITORIES

1. Problems common to the three Territories

Political developments

239. Speaking at a South African Nationalist Party election rally in Springs on 28 March 1966, Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd said that the United Kingdom and the United States were trying to gain influence in the former High Commission Territories, among other things, through the officials they appointed there to exclude and undermine the friendship with South Africa. He wished to ask the two countries whether for once they would not act wisely and, instead of the chaos they left behind elsewhere in Africa, they would not allow southern Africa to develop naturally.

240. Mr. Verwoerd also said that South Africa neither wanted to incorporate nor to dominate the three Territories, but was willing to grant them everything it wished for itself and to live with them as good neighbours. It desired good economic relations with them without outside interference.

Economic conditions

241. On 29 March 1966, the Swedish Government was reported to have allocated a total of £236,000 for projects in Basutoland and Bechuanaland. Although it would take a decision later on the form of aid, Sweden was expected to participate in such projects as the expansion of the agricultural training centre in Basutoland and the improvement of teacher-training facilities in Bechuanaland.

242. According to reports, hitherto, Swedish action in southern Africa has been mainly in the form of assistance to anti-apartheid organizations and help towards the education of refugees from South Africa and South West Africa. Now the emphasis is to be on aid programmes within the framework of Sweden's policy of neutralizing through the United Nations the effects of the policy of apartheid of the South African Government.

243. According to the information supplied by the United Nations Development Programme, the 1967-1968 programme of technical assistance for the three Territories is being prepared. Allocations for 1965-1966 amounted to $848,948, representing a substantial increase over the preceding two-year period. Steps are being taken with a view to the establishment of offices of the United Nations Development Programme in Basutoland and Swaziland, to be headed by Assistant Resident Representatives directly responsible to the Representative for Central and Southern Africa. These are additional to the office already established at Gaborone, Bechuanaland.

Educational conditions

244. Early in March 1966, Swaziland's Director of Agriculture, Mr. A. C. Venn, announced that the agricultural training complex at Malkerns, containing the nearly completed £300,000 agricultural college and short-course centre, was to be enlarged soon to accommodate the department of agricultural and other extension activities of the University of Basutoland, Bechuanaland Protectorate and Swaziland. The complex, to be renamed the Swaziland Agricultural College and University Centre (SACUC), would cater for 134 full-time students and up to thirty-two short-term students.

245. Mr. Venn also said that four full-time courses would be offered, three of them leading to the government certificate and the other, a three-year course for students from the three Territories, leading to the award by the University of a diploma in agriculture. The first two-year courses in general agriculture, forestry and home economics would start in June 1966, the first university diploma course in 1967.

246. It was reported that in August 1966 the University probably would begin to conduct an external diploma in law of two years' duration, designed primarily to meet the needs of public servants in the three Territories who required legal training, but not at degree level.

2. Basutoland

Political and constitutional developments

Relations with South Africa

247. On 11 February 1966, Chief Leabua Jonathan, Basutoland's Prime Minister, who is also the leader of the Basutoland National Party (BNP), was reported to have strongly denied opposition claims that he wanted to make his country a "Bantustan appendage of South Africa". He added that his Government stood for an independent Lesotho (the new name for Basutoland) and envisaged a future of friendly coexistence with South Africa.

248. Addressing the closing session of the annual conference of his party on 13 March 1966, Chief Jonathan said that on the question of apartheid and relations with South Africa, the attitude and policy of his Government were dictated by the geographical, eco-conomic and political realities of Basutoland's position in southern Africa. Repeating that he rejected the policy of apartheid as practised in the Republic, he said that he would like to meet Mr. Verwoerd in South Africa to thank him for his recent gift of grain and the provision of employment for Basotho, as well as to discuss peace and coexistence on the basis of two independent sovereign States. Finally he said that his Government would not tolerate any country giving subversive training to Basotho.

249. A major subject of the projected talks was expected to be the Ox-Bow hydroelectric scheme, the biggest single project under consideration in Basutoland, the development of which would depend upon whether an agreement could be reached concerning the sale of power and water to the Republic. Meanwhile, an international consortium showed a willingness to finance and build the scheme, estimated costs of which ranged from £12 million to £30 million, and a grant of £160,000 from the Commonwealth Development and Welfare Fund was made available to the Basutoland Government for an investigation, on which the final dam design would be based.

250. Another main subject for discussion between the Governments of Basutoland and South Africa was known to be transit rights for Basotho. Mr. Verwoerd was reported to have indicated that he might be willing to grant transit to all bona fide travellers from Basutoland. It was also reported that he might allow South African refugees in Basutoland to pass through the Republic provided that his Government did not want them for sabotage offences or planning subversion against the State.

251. On 25 March 1966, Mr. G. M. Kolisang, Secretary-General of the Basutoland Congress Party (BCP), was reported to have said that he had not been allowed to return to the Territory through South Africa and had been deported to Nairobi, mainly because he had refused to divulge the plans of African countries against the Republic and had made no promise that the BCP would be less critical of the policy of apartheid.

252. On 18 April 1966, when he introduced a motion dealing with the independence of Lesotho in the National Assembly, Chief Jonathan said that future treaties between South Africa and independent Lesotho must be concluded without any interference from the United Kingdom or any other third power. He maintained that in the past the United Kingdom and South Africa had entered into many treaties binding on Basutoland without adequate regard to the real wishes and interests of the Basotho. With respect to the contention that independence would bring the danger of Lesotho being swallowed up in the South African apartheid system, Chief Jonathan stated that so long as Lesotho was under colonial rule, that danger would be more possible.

253. The question of future relations with South Africa constituted a significant obstacle to the reaching of unanimous agreement on Basutoland's independence constitution at the constitutional conference held in June 1966. Soon after the conference, Chief Jonathan and Mr. Verwoerd were expected to meet for talks on this question.

Question of independence

254. As noted previously by the Special Committee, the last general election took place on 29 April 1965 under the constitution based on the agreement reached at the 1964 constitutional conference. The agreement stipulated that minimum changes might be made in the constitution for purposes of independence, but that the provisions relating to the status and functions of the Paramount Chief could not be altered except at the request of the Basutoland Parliament, expressed by a resolution of each House. The agreement also stipulated that if the people of Basutoland, not less than one year after the last general election, asked for independence by resolution of both Houses of Parliament, or by referendum if the two Houses differed, the United Kingdom Government would seek to give effect to their wishes as soon as possible, provided that conditions in Basutoland were such as to enable power to be transferred in peace and order. While the agreement was signed by all political leaders from Basutoland attending the conference, several of them, including Chief Leabua Jonathan of the BNP and Mr. Ntsu Mokhehle of the BCP, were reported to have expressed strong criticism regarding the powers to be reserved to the United Kingdom Government under the constitution.

255. As also noted previously by the Special Committee, in the course of the discussions between the Governments of Basutoland and the United Kingdom during November and December 1965, Mrs. Eirene White, Parliamentary Under-Secretary for the Colonies, accepted the Basutoland Prime Minister's statement that this Government would ask for independence immediately after 29 April 1966, as well as his assurance that the stipulated conditions were likely to be fulfilled.

256. Early in February 1966, just before the opening of the pre-independence session of the National Assembly, it was reported in the Press of South Africa that Basutoland was "almost in a state of siege". According to the reports, units of the Mobile Security Force were carrying out daily exercises and members of the Basutoland Mounted Police patrolled the streets day and night. Many men and women were said to have been detained under the Police Offences Act. The accounts in the Press stated that the extra security measures had been taken because there was a strong rumour that some members of the opposition parties were plotting the massacre of members of the Cabinet in order to thwart independence under the Basutoland National Party Government.

257. A Government spokesman said that a company of the Gloucestershire Regiment would arrive in Basutoland from Swaziland on 15 February 1966 and would stay till 4 March to carry out training, principally on a platoon basis in the districts of Basutoland.

258. A later press report stated that on 21 February 1966, when the pre-independence session of the National Assembly was opened, police stood guard in the Assembly Chamber and searched several Members of Parliament as they entered the building. Two days afterwards a motion was introduced by a member from the Basutoland Congress Party (BCP), Mr. S. R. Mokhehle, condemning the police intervention as "a grave infringement of the privileges of this House and its members".

259. Subsequently, the BCP representative in Cairo, Mr. R. Tsinyane, was reported to have protested against the sending of troops to Basutoland by the United Kingdom and mass arrests which took place immediately after their arrival. He demanded the immediate withdrawal of these troops and the release of all the people arrested. He also condemned the United Kingdom, the United States, South Africa and West Germany for their manoeuvres in Basutoland and demanded that the people of Basutoland be left alone to determine their destiny.

260. On 7 March 1966, Mrs. Eirene White stated in reply to a question in the United Kingdom House of Commons that if a request for independence backed by resolution of both Houses of the Basutoland Parliament was received, a constitutional conference would be held during May, at which, she expected, a date for independence would be fixed, probably in the autumn.

261. During the week ending 12 March 1966, the Government White Paper containing the proposals for Basutoland's independence constitution was published. Under the proposed constitution, the Paramount Chief would become the Head of State. The constitution would also contain entrenched provisions concerning the position of the Paramount Chief, the land of Lesotho, the franchise, the position and powers of the National Assembly and the Senate, and the bill of human rights. According to the White Paper, the Basutoland Government would negotiate with the United Kingdom Government to resolve various financial matters, treaty rights and obligations inherited from the United Kingdom Government, and membership of the Commonwealth and of international organizations.

262. On 18 April 1966, Chief Jonathan introduced a motion in the National Assembly calling on the United Kingdom Government to grant Basutoland independence in terms of the agreement reached at the 1964 constitutional conference and the Government White Paper referred to above. When the motion was seconded, the entire Opposition left the Assembly Chamber. The following day, Mr. Ntsu Mokhehle, the leader of the Opposition, who is also the leader of the BCP, challenged the Government to show a two-thirds majority support in the Assembly for its constitutional proposals. An amendment to this effect proposed by Mr. Mokhehle was not adopted, however, and after nearly four weeks of debate, the Assembly on 11 May 1966 approved the Government's motion by 32 votes to 28.

263. The Senate was reported to have begun its discussions of the Prime Minister's independence motion on 19 April 1966. According to the Press, police with tear gas grenades stood by during the Senate's meeting on 2 May 1966, which was adjourned in an uproar. This incident was reported to have been the sequel to the serving earlier in the day on Mr. S. P. Makotoko, the Senate president, who is also the leader of the Opposition Marema-Tlou Freedom Party (MTFP), of an urgent interdict restraining him from carrying out a directive from the Paramount Chief to depose five pro-Government senators. The Paramount Chief nominated in their place five supporters of the MTFP, an action which he took under the terms of the constitution empowering him to appoint eleven of the thirty-three senators. The interdict, issued by the Basutoland High Court, however, allowed the five dismissed senators to retain their seats until 12 May 1966, when the Court would give judgement.

264. Their dismissal by the Paramount Chief occurred on 29 April 1966 after they had voted against Opposition amendments. The amendments were to the effect that the Paramount Chief should assume control over the Army, police and security forces and have veto powers over any important constitutional changes or national legislation.

265. On 5 May 1966, the Senate with a temporary president in the Chair, after its president had walked out, approved the independence motion. Of the 33 senators, 22 voted for the motion, 8 voted against and one abstained. The Senate's vote was made valid by the Court on 12 May 1966 when it reinstated the five dismissed senators. The Court found that the Paramount Chief was empowered to appoint senators in his sole discretion, but that the constitution did not specify that he could dismiss them.

266. On 17 May 1966, the Senate deposed its president and deputy president by 23 votes to 9. In introducing the motion for the removal of the president, Mr. Charles Molopo, Minister of Economic Development and one of the five senators who had been dismissed by the Paramount Chief but reinstated as a result of the Court's ruling, said that the president had conducted the business of the Senate in a "disgraceful" manner during the independence motion debate. After adopting the motion, the Senate elected Senator N. I. Qhobela as president and Chief S. S. Matete as deputy president.

The constitutional conference of 1966

267. A constitutional conference was held in London from 8 to 17 June 1966 with a view to making constitutional arrangements for granting independence to Basutoland. It was attended by the Paramount Chief and delegates of all the political parties in the Basutoland National Assembly, namely, the BNP led by Chief Leabua Jonathan, the Prime Minister; the BCP, led by Mr. Ntsu Mokhehle; and the MTFP, led by Mr. S. P. Makotoko. The BNP, which now holds thirty-two out of the sixty seats in the Assembly, gained 42 per cent of the votes in the 1965 election, as against 56 per cent for the two Opposition parties.

268. During the debate at the conference, Chief Jonathan said that all the conditions laid down in the agreement reached at the 1964 constitutional conference for granting independence to Basutoland had been fulfilled in the spirit and letter. Nothing remained but for the United Kingdom to grant independence not later than 4 October 1966. The position of the Paramount Chief was settled. These views were firmly supported by the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

269. On the other hand, the two Opposition parties rebutted Chief Jonathan's contention that the conditions for independence had been fulfilled. They pointed out that at the 1964 constitutional conference, the then Secretary of State for the Colonies, Mr. Duncan Sandys, had refused to discuss the fate of the reserved powers of the United Kingdom Government and had given a firm assurance that this matter would be considered at a final independence conference. They proposed that the reserved powers should not be given to the present Basutoland Government; that a measure of discretion in certain matters, notably relations with South Africa, should be left to the Paramount Chief; and that any final constitution should be placed before the people of Basutoland, by means of a new general election, before independence.

270. Following the rejection by the Secretary of State of these proposals, the leaders of the two parties issued two joint statements on 14 and 15 June 1966 respectively. In the first statement, they warned of "the very unhappy consequences as in Zanzibar" if the United Kingdom gave independence under a Government "not representative of the majority of the electorate". (For further details, see appendix I.) The second statement, made after the two parties had withdrawn in protest from the conference, contained a warning that "in the name of the majority of the Sotho people, we announce that we are unwilling to accept as binding on us any constitution for the independence of Basutoland which is signed between the British Government and Chief Leabua Jonathan's minority Government". (For further details, see appendix II.)

271. At the final session of the conference on 17 June 1966, the report⁷ containing the agreement on Basutoland's independence constitution concluded between the United Kingdom and the Basutoland Government delegation was completed. The Opposition delegation did not attend that session and did not sign the report. The Paramount Chief attended but did not sign the report. Earlier, he had given a warning against independence for the Basotho "as a divided nation, in conditions of incipient or actual violence, and unable to defend their proper interests against foreign interference". He said that he was alarmed by "the manner in which Basutoland is being hustled into independence and the apparent unconcern about the principles needed to provide modern Lesotho with a constitution that fits its needs".

272. Chief Jonathan, at the final session, stated that his Government's policy would be based on pan-Africanism and the Organization of African Unity, and would give asylum to refugees, but would not be a base against South Africa, with which it hoped to have an agreement for mutual respect of sovereign rights.

273. Immediately after the conference, the two Opposition parties appealed to the United Nations, the Commonwealth and the Organization of African Unity to have the above-mentioned Basutoland's independence constitution abrogated.

Independence constitution

274. Under the independence constitution, Basutoland will become independent within the Commonwealth on 4 October 1966 under the name of Lesotho. The Paramount Chief will be the Head of State and a constitutional monarch. The powers at present reserved to the United Kingdom (external affairs, defence, internal security and public service) will be transferred to the Basutoland Government, not to the Paramount Chief for delegation to his ministers. According to the report completed at the final session of the conference, "the form of the constitution agrees with the agreement reached in 1964, signed by all parties and leaders, and the expressed desire of the Basutoland Parliament".

275. The report also recorded the view of the United Kingdom Government that "there is little widespread dissent in Basutoland to the relatively minor changes now made in the constitution for purposes of independence", and that "if law and order, which is now well maintained, is disturbed, those who simply seek personal power will be responsible".

276. The independence constitution will also provide for a court-enforced bill of human rights, with features affording an exceptionally strong safeguard for individual liberties. However, it will not include the precise terms of an extradition treaty with South Africa as proposed by the Opposition.

Economic conditions

277. On 4 February 1966, the International Development Association (IDA) approved a credit of £1.5 million to Basutoland, which will be used for the improvement of a seventy-six-mile section of the main north-south road and of a seventeen-mile connecting feeder road. The project will be aimed at reducing transport and road maintenance costs, and improving economic conditions in the Territory by converting subsistence agriculture to a cash basis. Its cost is estimated to be about £1.9 million, of which £1.5 million will come from the IDA and the remainder will be provided by the Basutoland Government.

278. On 22 February 1966, the Basutoland Government declared "a state of drought emergency" to combat the effects of the worst drought in the Territory for more than thirty years. Chief Leabua Jonathan said that he foresaw a shortage of food during the winter and spring, and had created a drought emergency department to co-ordinate relief. An assessment of the situation was being made in all districts. Negotiations had been opened with the United Kingdom Government and international organizations for food, money and transport.

279. On 1 March 1966, Finance Minister Benedict Leseteli announced in the National Assembly that the Government's Economic Planning Unit and the National Economic Planning Board, which had been formed during the preceding month, would consider his proposals for new taxation designed to reduce Basutoland's unfavourable balance of payments. Under these proposals, special levies would be imposed on petrol, diesel fuel, spirits, wines and beer. There would also be an increase in fees for trading and drivers' licences, and motor vehicle registration.

280. Mr. Leseteli also announced that the Territory's public revenue and expenditure for 1966-1967 had been put at £2.17 and £4.92 million respectively and that the United Kingdom had agreed to grant £2.75 million to enable Basutoland to balance its budget for the year.

281. In June 1966, at the Basutoland constitutional conference, Chief Jonathan made an unsuccessful attempt to have future financial assistance discussed before the completion of the agreement on the independence constitution.

3. Bechuanaland

Political and constitutional developments

Relations with South Africa

282. Early in February 1966, an agreement was reported to have been concluded on the operation of an air service between Bechuanaland and South Africa, by the Government-subsidized Bechuanaland National Airways, established in November 1965. The airline also has flights to Salisbury, Southern Rhodesia, and Livingstone, Zambia.

⁷ Report of the Basutoland Independence Conference, 1966, Cmnd 3038 (London, Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1966).

283. On 22 February 1966, after the close of the constitutional conference on Bechuanaland's independence, Mr. Seretse Khama, the Prime Minister, said that he did not think it likely that South Africa would want to exchange diplomatic representatives with Botswana (the new name for the Territory), indicating that Botswana's affairs would continue to be handled by the representative of the United Kingdom in South Africa. He also said that Botswana would not be overstrict in applying passport regulations to those entering the country, especially refugees from South Africa.

284. In April 1966, the annual conference of the Bechuanaland Democratic Party (BDP), of which Mr. Khama is the leader, was held at Mochudi. The conference confirmed Mr. Khama's plan to join the Commonwealth, the Organization of African Unity and the United Nations, and to maintain friendly relations with Basutoland and Swaziland. The conference stressed the importance of maintaining the Government's policies of non-interference in the internal affairs of other States, and of good neighbourliness with border countries. The conference nevertheless made it clear that non-interference and good neighbourliness did not mean that Bechuanaland would not condemn "in the strongest possible terms any inhuman policies which may obtain in such States".

285. In May 1966, after the Public Service Commission, formerly an advisory body, had assumed executive powers, Mr. Khama stated that localization of the public service would continue, but not at the expense of efficiency, and that he wanted all expatriate public servants to stay on for as long as the country needed them. Earlier, the Government had denied that there was discrimination against South Africans in the public service.

Other developments

286. Despite reported opposition from Mr. Khama and several other political leaders, including Mr. Motsamai Mpho of the Botswana Independence Party (BIP), the United Kingdom Government, following the unilateral declaration of independence in Southern Rhodesia, built a radio station at Francistown to relay news and programmes to Southern Rhodesia and elsewhere, and has sent about 120 British soldiers to help protect the station.

287. The BDP won an overwhelming victory in Bechuanaland's first local government elections held on 14 June 1966. With returns reported for 139 out of the 165 seats on three new townships and nine new district councils declared, the party was reported to have won 117 seats against 22 secured by the combined opposition parties.

288. On 23 June 1966, it was announced that Mr. J. S. Gandee would be the first British High Commissioner to Botswana, upon Bechuanaland's accession to independence under the name of Botswana on 30 September 1966.

Economic conditions

289. Following five years of low rainfall, Territory-wide famine conditions have existed in Bechuanaland since early 1965. By the end of the year, some 105,000 destitute persons were being given food supplies by the World Food Programme (WFP). On 1 February 1966, Mrs. Eirene White, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, stated in a written answer to a question in the United Kingdom House of Commons that the Bechuanaland emergency food programme was being expanded to cover over 300,000 people during 1966 and that a request for supplementary assistance had been made to the WFP. The United Kingdom Government, she added, had provided £350,000 for the relief programme during the financial year 1965-1966 and had approved an expenditure of £250,000 from the Colonial Development and Welfare Fund on projects designed to mitigate the effects of the famine. On 11 February 1966, it was announced that another £200,000 would be allocated towards these projects.

290. At the opening of the constitutional conference on Bechuanaland's independence on 14 February 1966, the Secretary of State for the Colonies said that the famine situation in the Territory would continue through 1966 and into 1967. A tremendous effort would clearly be needed to broaden the economy, develop agriculture, water and other resources, and promote education. The United Kingdom Government would be ready to consider what it could do to help the Territory's development. Earlier, it had been announced that Bechuanaland would receive development grants of £1.3 million for each of the two financial years 1965-1966 and 1966-1967, compared with an average of £1.3 million a year for the previous five financial years.

291. According to a spokesman for the Department of Agriculture, more rain fell in the Territory during February and March 1966 than had fallen in the previous two years. Grazing had improved considerably and emaciated stock were fast putting on weight, thus brightening their prospect of lasting through the 1966 winter. Cattle deaths, estimated earlier this year at more than 400,000 out of a national herd of 1.3 million, had virtually stopped in nearly all areas. The rain had also given farmers the opportunity to plant fast germinating crops for human and animal consumption. Nevertheless this would have little impact on the accumulated food shortage resulting from five years of drought, which had been severely aggravated by the almost complete failure of the 1966 crop.

292. On 21 April 1966, after having increased its famine relief commitment to some $3.3 million two months previously the World Food Programme approved Bechuanaland's request for aid totalling $13 million to help reconstruct its agrarian economy. The World Food Programme agreed to assist in carrying out three projects relating to feeding livestock, community development and a five-year supplementary feeding programme for children, expectant and nursing mothers.

4. Swaziland

Political and constitutional developments

Report of the Swaziland Constitutional Committee

293. As previously noted, the proposals for a new constitution contained in the *Report of the Swaziland Constitutional Committee*⁸ were submitted to the Secretary of State for consideration and were tabled in the Legislative Council for discussion in March 1966.

294. In its report, the Committee stated that its proposals had been made after careful examination of constitutional practice in many other territories and of memoranda and suggestions submitted by members of the public and interested bodies. These bodies included the Joint Council of Swaziland Political Parties, the Ngwane National Liberatory Congress (NNLC) and the Swaziland Progressive Party (SPP).

⁸ Swaziland Printing and Publishing Company, Limited, Mbabane, Swaziland, 24 March 1966.

295. At an early stage in its deliberations, the Committee had represented to the Secretary of State that the new constitution should be based on a monarchical form of government with the Ngwenyama recognized as King of Swaziland and that Swaziland should move from the status of a Protectorate to that of a Protected State as a transitional stage before independence.

296. In his reply the Secretary of State had said that Her Majesty's Government proposed to grant Swaziland internal self-government in 1966, and that if it were so desired Her Majesty's Government would be willing to arrange for the conclusion of an agreement with the Ngwenyama which would have the effect of turning Swaziland into a Protected State, with certain powers, notably in regard to external relations, defence and other matters specified in the constitution reserved to Her Majesty's Government. Her Majesty would also retain the power to amend or replace the constitution. All powers except those specified in the agreement would be renounced.

297. The non-official members of the Committee had repeatedly affirmed their desire for complete independence as soon as possible and the Secretary of State, in accepting the principle, had made it clear that this should not be later than the end of 1969. It was the Committee's belief and intention that the proposed constitution would in principle be the final constitution for an independent Swaziland, with only minor amendments required at the stage of complete independence within the Commonwealth.

298. Under the new constitutional proposals, the Ngwenyama would be recognized as King and Head of State. The succession would be governed by Swazi law and custom.

299. The King would appoint the Prime Minister and other ministers and would have the right to be informed and consulted by his ministers on all matters of government. He would act on ministerial advice except where the proposed constitution specifically provided otherwise. However, he would have the right to require the Prime Minister to reconsider in the Cabinet any matter submitted to him.

300. Provision would be made for the office of Her Majesty's Commissioner. Assisted by a deputy, Her Majesty's Commissioner would retain responsibility for external affairs, defence and internal security. He would be empowered, however, to delegate any part of these responsibilities to a minister designated by the Prime Minister; such delegation might be made subject to conditions and might be revoked.

301. Her Majesty's Commissioner would have certain powers of financial control, for the purpose of ensuring proper financial administration or securing compliance with a condition attached to a financial grant made by Her Majesty's Government to the Swaziland Government.

302. Her Majesty's Commissioner would also be empowered to require the Swaziland Government to introduce and secure the passage of legislation which he considered necessary or expedient in the discharge of the responsibilities reserved to him. If the Government should fail to do so, he might himself make an order which would have the force of law; in this event he might require the Government to take necessary executive action or, if it should fail to do so, he might himself exercise any lawful function of the Government for that purpose.

303. A consultative council, consisting of a limited number of local representatives of Her Majesty's Government and representatives of the Swaziland Government, would be established for the purpose of consultation between the two Governments on the exercise of the reserved powers by Her Majesty's Commissioner.

304. The Swaziland Parliament would have two Houses: a House of Assembly and a Senate. The House of Assembly would consist of a Speaker, twenty-four elected members, six nominated members, who would be appointed by the King to represent interests not otherwise adequately represented, and the Attorney-General, who would have no vote.

305. The Senate would consist of a Speaker and twelve members, half elected by the members of the House of Assembly and the other half appointed by the King to represent interests not otherwise adequately represented.

306. Swaziland would be divided into eight three-member constituencies, to be delimited and kept under review by a Delimitation Commission consisting of a judge of the High Court of Swaziland as Chairman and two other members appointed by the Judicial Service Commission.

307. Subject to certain exceptions concerning such persons as convicted criminals and the insane, all citizens of Swaziland, or citizens of the United Kingdom and Colonies satisfying a three-year residence qualification, who had attained the age of twenty-one years, or whose husband had attained that age, would be qualified to register as voters.

308. Subject to the provisions of the proposed constitution, the Parliament would have full power to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Swaziland, exercisable by bills passed through both Houses and assented to by the King.

309. The House of Assembly would have exclusive power to initiate legislation on taxation and financial matters and would generally be responsible for initiating legislation on other matters, but would have no power to legislate in respect of Swazi law and custom, unless authorized by the Swazi National Council. The Senate would have power to initiate legislation on matters other than taxation and finance, and Swazi law and custom.

310. Each House would be empowered to refer a bill back to the other House for further consideration, but the Senate would not be able to delay the passage of an appropriation bill. In the case of a "money bill" other than an appropriation bill, if the Senate should fail to pass the bill within thirty days from the date it left the House of Assembly, or pass it only with amendments unacceptable to the House of Assembly, the House of Assembly would be able to submit the bill to the King for his assent.

311. Each Parliament would last for five years, unless dissolved earlier. The power to prorogue or dissolve Parliament would be vested in the King who would normally act on ministerial advice, but who might act in his discretion if the House of Assembly passed a vote of no confidence in the Government or if, in the event of the office of Prime Minister falling vacant, there was no reasonable prospect of finding a person for appointment who could command a majority in the House of Assembly.

312. Subject to the powers conferred upon Her Majesty's Commissioner, executive authority would be vested in the King. There would be a Cabinet consisting of the Prime Minister, the Deputy Prime Minister and up to six other ministers. There would also be assistant ministers. The function of the Cabinet would be to advise the King in the Government of Swaziland, and it would be collectively responsible to Parliament for any advice given to him. The King would appoint as Prime Minister the leader of the political party, or the coalition of parties, enjoying the support of the majority of the members of the House of Assembly. The Deputy Prime Minister, other ministers and the assistant ministers would be appointed by the King in accordance with the advice of the Prime Minister.

313. The prerogative of mercy would be vested in the King acting in his discretion. There would, however, be a committee consisting of the Attorney-General and three ministers appointed by the King to advise him on the exercise of this prerogative.

314. The Swazi National Council would continue to advise the Ngwenyama on all matters regulated by Swazi law and custom, and connected with Swazi traditions and culture. Swazi Nation land and mineral rights would be vested in him on behalf of the Swazi Nation.

315. The Committee also proposed the establishment of separate commissions, with executive power, for the public and judicial services. An independent judiciary and an integrated judicial system for the Territory were also recommended.

316. The proposed constitution would contain a code of fundamental rights and freedoms, enforceable by the High Court.

317. Provisions relating to the position of the King, the code of fundamental rights, the judicature, the Public Service and Judicial Service Commissions and the procedure for amending the constitution would be entrenched and alterable only by a referendum supported by 75 per cent of all votes validly cast at the referendum.

318. Certain other important provisions would also be entrenched and could not be altered unless supported by 75 per cent of the members present and voting at a joint sitting of both Houses of the Parliament. These would include, inter alia, the composition and powers of the Parliament and the maintenance of the existing status and powers of the Swazi National Council.

319. Two of the twelve non-official members of the Committee, both representatives of the United Swaziland Party, expressed certain reservations, one of which was that there should be, for an interim period, two separate electoral rolls with equal representation for Europeans and Africans. This proposal was later defeated in the Legislative Council which, on 5 April 1966, voted unanimously for a motion by Prince Makhosini Dlamini, leader of the Imbokodvo Party, endorsing the majority recommendations of the Committee.

320. Subsequently, however, it was reported in the Press that the Ngwane National Liberatory Congress (NNLC) and the Swaziland Progressive Party (SPP) had rejected the Committee's proposals and had called for the holding of a "fully representative conference". Their main points of protest were reported to be that

(a) the mass of the people had not been consulted about the proposed constitution; (b) under Swazi law and custom, which the constitution would entrench, the King cannot be disputed or officially challenged; and (c) the introduction of three-member constituencies was designed to perpetuate the existing régime.

Economic conditions

321. Swaziland's economy in 1965 proved to be reasonably buoyant despite the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease and drought conditions. In the agricultural sector, production of canned fruit, citrus, cotton, forest products and sugar all exceeded the output of previous years. The 1965 cotton crop amounted to 6,518 short tons (an increase in value of 60 per cent over 1964), of which 19 per cent were produced by Swazi farmers. Sugar continued to be the Territory's most valuable export, with the production worth over £5 million. The development of the cattle industry received impetus from the establishment in the second half of 1965 of the Swaziland Meat Corporation. In January 1966, the Corporation was reported to have sent to the United Kingdom 1,750 cases of tinned products and 100 tons of frozen meat. Negotiations were being conducted with importers of certain other European countries.

322. The 1965 mineral output, valued at more than £5 million, was almost twice that of 1964. Iron ore production, totalling 1,124,310 short tons, worth over £2 million, accounted for most of the increase.

323. Mr. A. C. Venn, Director of Agriculture, said in mid-March that his Department had launched a massive programme for training farmers and departmental staff. Between March and the end of August, no fewer than 22 short courses, involving some 700 people, would be held. A similar programme for the remainder of the year had been planned.

324. In his budget speech to the Legislative Council on 25 March 1966, Mr. Frank Essex, Secretary for Finance and Development, stated that the agricultural sector of the economy had performed well in 1965 and that as a result of the campaign for a more concentrated effort instituted by the Agricultural Department, the Territory should be at least self-sufficient in maize during 1966. In regard to other sectors, he noted that the development of the Matsapa industrial estate had progressed encouragingly and he believed that the mining industry would play an even larger role in the economy as time went on.

325. Mr. Essex pointed out that the investment made by the various enterprises had not yet been fully reflected in government revenue. Revenue for the financial year beginning on 1 April 1966 was expected to be about £3 million, £1.2 million short of the estimated total expenditure; this deficit would be met by a grant-in-aid from the United Kingdom. Noting that urgent items of capital works had been cut from the expenditure programme, he considered that the Government should implement without further delay the proposal set forth in the 1965 budget for graded income tax.

326. In early 1966, the Swazi Air and Portuguese D.E.T.A. Airways inaugurated a joint service linking Matsapa and Lourenço Marques. Steps are also being taken to improve the railway line to Lourenço Marques with a view to increasing mineral exports.

F. FURTHER CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE⁹

Introduction

327. The Special Committee gave further consideration to the question of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland at its 456th to 458th meetings held in New York between 6 and 8 July 1966.

Written petitions and hearings¹⁰

Basutoland

Messrs. Chazi M. W. L. Mapefane and Ntsi C. A. Mohale, representatives of the Basutoland Congress Party (BCP) A/AC.109/PET.515/Add.1

Messrs. S. P. Makotoko and Edwin Leanya, Marema-Tlou Freedom Party (MTFP) and Messrs. G. M. Kolisang and G. Ramoreboli, Basutoland Congress Party (BCP) A/AC.109/PET.515/Add.2

Bechuanaland

Mr. Bobby Mack, Chief Representative at Cairo, Bechuanaland People's Party (BPP) A/AC.109/PET.526
Mrs. D. Henderson A/AC.109/PET.527 and Add.1

Swaziland

Mr. D. C. D. Nxumalo, representative at Cairo, Swaziland Progressive Party (SPP) A/AC.109/PET.442/Add.3

Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland

Mr. J. J. Nquku, President, Swaziland Progressive Party (SPP) A/AC.109/PET.525

Hearing of petitioners

328. At its 456th and 458th meetings, the Special Committee heard two petitioners concerning Basutoland, namely, Mr. Seth Makotoko, President of the Marema-Tlou Freedom Party (MTFP), and Mr. Kolisang, Secretary-General of the Basutoland Congress Party (BCP) (A/AC.109/PET.515).

329. Mr. Makotoko (MTFP) said that the BCP and MTFP had submitted to the Committee a petition (A/AC.109/PET.515) protesting against the attitude adopted by the United Kingdom Government, at the recent Constitutional Conference in London, concerning the terms on which Basutoland would attain its independence. To elucidate certain questions referred to in paragraphs 5 and 9 of that petition, a supplement had been prepared, but had not yet been circulated to Committee members. At the Conference, the question of the disposal at independence of the reserved powers of the United Kingdom Government, which covered foreign affairs, defence and internal security, and the position of the Paramount Chief had been considered. The representatives of Basutoland, who had taken a unanimous position at the 1964 Conference, had expressed divergent views at the Conference just held, because the United Kingdom Government was attempting to impose on the Basotho people a Constitution which they could not accept. According to the 1963 Basutoland Constitutional Commission's report,¹¹ all political parties had agreed that the executive authority would be vested in the Paramount Chief as Head of State, to be exercised not by him but by the responsible ministers. That had meant that the reserved powers would be vested in the Paramount Chief on the accession to independence. However, the United Kingdom Government now wished responsibility for foreign affairs, defence and internal security to be vested directly in the Prime Minister. That was contrary to the original position. In addition, the people of Basutoland wished the Paramount Chief to possess the power to refer to them, by referendum, any agreements which might endanger the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Basuto Nation.

330. Moreover, the people had not been given an opportunity to state their position concerning the change in the policy of the minority party now in power. If the Constitution did not contain a clause permitting the Head of State to consult the people on any agreement entered into with South Africa, Basutoland might be at the mercy of South Africa. He cited an article which had appeared in the Star, a South African newspaper, in January 1966 and in which South Africa's intention to annex Basutoland was reported.

331. To ascertain the views of the people on that question, the Paramount Chief had held a series of traditional assemblies or pitsos from 28 May to 5 June 1966, and he had been enjoined not to sign the Constitution unless it guaranteed the sovereignty and integrity of the Territory after independence. In his own view, the United Kingdom was endeavouring to abdicate its responsibilities on the eve of independence and was continuing to subordinate the interests of the people of Basutoland to those of the Republic of South Africa. Economically, the United Kingdom had done nothing to free Basutoland from dependence on South Africa and did not even seem prepared to help Basutoland financially, although it had utilized the revenue surpluses in Basutoland for the Development of other Territories, particularly Swaziland.

332. He quoted paragraph 15 of the White Paper¹² on the proposals of the Basutoland Government concerning the advent of independence, which forcefully illustrated that point. Whereas, in Ghana, the Gambia, Tanganyika and Zanzibar, the United Kingdom had insisted on the need for a broadly based Government, it continued to ignore the interests of the people of Basutoland by encouraging the division of the Territory. The parties, desiring to ensure national unity on the eve of independence, had attempted after the general elections in 1965 to bring about the formation of a national government, but the Government had refused. Similarly, a few weeks before the Constitutional Conference had been held in London, the Basutoland Government had

⁹ See also chapter II (paras. 595-619) for an account of the discussions on the resolution adopted by the Special Committee at its 455th meeting on 22 June 1966 concerning the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) regarding Territories considered by the Committee during its meetings in Africa.

¹⁰ The written petitions were circulated after the Special Committee had adopted a resolution concerning Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland (see para. 237 above) at its 439th meeting on 9 June 1966 and a consensus (see para. 390 below) at its 458th meeting on 8 July 1966.

¹¹ Basutoland Council, Report of the Basutoland Constitutional Commission (Maseru, 1963).

¹² See Annex B of the Report of the Basutoland Independence Conference, 1966, Cmdd 3038 (London, Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1966).

rejected the offer of the MTFP and the BCP to co-operate in drafting a Constitution to which all the people could agree.

333. He noted with concern that many government departments, particularly the police, were now controlled by South African white expatriates. The leaders of the opposition political parties were restricted in their movements in South Africa, while the members of the party now in power had free access to that country. Moreover, the South African Government and the mining companies facilitated the holding of political meetings by the latter for the Basotho who worked in South Africa.

334. The MTFP requested the United Nations to assist the people of Basutoland to obtain a Constitution which would guarantee the sovereignty and integrity of their territory; to that end, the United Nations might assist in organizing a referendum which would be supervised by international observers. The United Kingdom, which had not discharged all its responsibilities to the people of Basutoland under the United Nations Charter, should apply resolutions 1817 (XVII) and 2063 (XX), in particular.

335. He concluded by quoting excerpts from articles in South African newspapers from which the Committee, contrary to the assertions of the United Kingdom Government, could see that peace and quiet did not prevail in Basutoland. According to those articles, the people of Basutoland might be compelled to express their dissatisfaction in a more virulent manner, for the South African Government's annexationist designs were evident.

336. In reply to questions, Mr. Makotoko and Mr. Kolisang made the following statements.

337. An alternative contained in section 79 of the 1963 report of the Basutoland Constitutional Commission had been that sovereignty should be transferred in its entirety to the people of Lesotho, and that Motlotlehi (the Paramount Chief) should exercise the powers of Head of State in accordance with the Constitution. This alternative had been unanimously agreed on by the Basotho people; but at the 1964 Conference, the United Kingdom Government had not accepted it. Accordingly, discussion of the conditions in which the Paramount Chief should exercise executive powers, including the reserved powers, had had to be postponed to the final conference before independence.

338. At the 1966 Conference, all executive powers had been entrusted to the Prime Minister, without allowing a discussion. That position taken by the Basutoland Government and the United Kingdom Government represented a departure from the agreements of 1963 and 1964.

339. The dispute had centred on the transfer of the reserved powers. When it had become clear that there would be no discussion of this matter, the Opposition had walked out of the 1966 Conference, disappointed in its hopes.

340. The statement issued by his party in London had contained a warning to the United Kingdom because of its persistence in excluding the views of the representatives of the majority of the people from consideration. The Basotho people were unable to identify themselves with a Constitution which had been imposed upon them. The United Kingdom Government itself had more or less hinted that it expected trouble, and it was, in advance, placing the blame upon the opposition parties. That proved that the United Kingdom clearly realized that it had created a situation in Basutoland in which there could be no peace.

341. There was a great deal of demonstration by the people of Basutoland against the Constitution and the Prime Minister had called upon the Paramount Chief to resign. Thus, one consequence of imposing the Constitution was to create dissension among the people. During 1965, the BCP had lived in an undeclared state of emergency whereby the United Kingdom had barred the political parties belonging to the Opposition from meeting freely. An extension of that undeclared state of emergency could therefore be foreseen. A further consequence of imposing the Constitution would thus be the repression of the natural aspirations of the people.

342. To have elections or a referendum before independence would create certain difficulties. In any event, independence should not be delayed longer than was absolutely necessary to obtain the verdict of the Basuto Nation on what kind of independence it preferred. Such a delay would be worth while if it ensured the emergence into independence as a united nation and without the loop-holes by which that independence could eventually be destroyed.

343. The two opposition parties had made unsuccessful attempts to bring about unity between the leaders of Basotho public opinion. But it could never be too late to make further attempts of this kind. In forming an alliance these parties were not trying to set up a united front against the Basutoland National Party (BNP). If that alliance could be augmented so as to include the governing party, most of the dangers threatening Basutoland would have been defeated.

344. The position in Basutoland had always been that any negotiations with a foreign Power should be conducted by the Paramount Chief and the leading members of the nation together and that in such negotiations the Paramount Chief would occupy a leading position. No agreement had been made concerning the invitation of the Paramount Chief to the 1966 Conference solely as an observer. The Governments of Basutoland and the United Kingdom had sought to exclude him from that Conference completely. Only on the insistence of the opposition parties had it been possible for him to attend it as an observer.

345. At present certain Basotho who did not enjoy the approval of the South African Government were prevented from leaving Basutoland and returning there. Special attention was drawn to the cases involving the President of MTFP and ten Basotho students, all belonging to BCP. That Government was also refusing the nationals of independent countries the right of transit when it disapproved of them. Such actions were taken despite the United Nations resolutions expressly providing for this right. The leaders of the two opposition parties had been banned from South Africa without being given any reasons, and among some 200,000 Basotho who were working in South Africa, anyone who was known to be an active member of one of the two parties was immediately victimized and repatriated. It was, as a result, impossible for the two political parties to work among the Basotho in the Republic of South Africa, while a third party was given free rein and its meetings took place with the approval of the municipal authorities and mining companies.

346. As far as the last general elections were concerned, South Africa had sent large numbers of Basotho home to vote, telling them that it did not matter for which party they voted, but adding that if a certain party should lose the elections they must not come back to work in the Republic. The most notorious example of South Africa's interference had been when Mr. Verwoerd had made a personal gift of 100,000 bags of grain to the Prime Minister, then facing a by-election in Basutoland. Those 100,000 bags, which, if officially offered to the Government, would have served as a famine relief fund for the whole nation, had been given to the Prime Minister to use as he pleased, with the obvious purpose of ensuring him a majority in his constituency. Other examples had included the provision of £10,000 by the South African Government to bring the present Government of Basutoland to power and the participation of South Africa nationals in Basutoland elections.

347. About half of the original national territory had been handed over to South Africa by the United Kingdom about ninety years ago, and even now the Basotho still hoped that they would be able to recover the land so fraudulently taken away from them. In the remaining territory, there was no foreign ownership of land.

348. At the appropriate time the MTFP would submit to the Sub-Committee on Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland suggestions concerning safeguarding the sovereignty of Basutoland. It was emphasized, however, that any guarantee which the Special Committee could give the Basotho people for their territorial integrity and independence could be nullified by agreements entered into by a minority government, if a constitution was allowed to come into existence which did not correspond to the real interests of these people. The paramount need, therefore, was that the Special Committee should try to persuade the United Kingdom to formulate a constitution which would enable Basutoland to express its wishes with regard to any treaty concluded with a foreign country.

349. The Special Committee's attention was also drawn to the economic aspect of the question. The United Kingdom had allowed the economy of Basutoland to be geared completely to that of South Africa, with a consequent threat to the integrity of the country. If the United Nations could provide such financial aid as would make Basutoland less dependent on South Africa, the Basotho people would do a great deal by themselves to improve their economy.

350. Subsequently Mr. Kolisang submitted to the Special Committee some additional information on the situation in Basutoland. In its statement (see para. 362 below), the administering Power had claimed that the initiative in the direction of constitutional advance in Basutoland had been taken by the United Kingdom in 1956; in fact, it was the Basutoland National Council which, in 1955, in motion No. 90, had asked the United Kingdom to institute constitutional changes. As indicated in a memorandum submitted by the BCP circulated to members of the Fourth Committee in December 1962, the Secretary of State for the Colonies had replied in 1956 that the Basotho would not be granted a constitution empowering them to make laws applicable to the white population in Basutoland. Regarding the first four stages of constitutional development in the Territory, it was true that all parties had given their agreement, for they had been anxious to negotiate in a spirit of mutual understanding. However, no agreement was reached at the 1964 Constitutional Conference on the transfer to the Prime Minister of Basutoland, upon independence, of the reserved powers formerly exercised by the United Kingdom Government, since that question had not even been discussed.

351. Referring to sections 76 and 79 of the 1963 Basutoland Constitutional Commission's report, he drew the Committee's attention to the fact that the political parties had agreed to the transfer of the reserved powers inasmuch as they envisaged that, during the pre-independence period, Basutoland's status would be that of a protectorate linked to the United Kingdom by a treaty under which independence would be granted automatically. It should be recalled that, in 1962, when a Constitutional Commission had been appointed to draw up a report, all the political parties had agreed that the Paramount Chief should not be given absolute powers such as those exercised by the High Commissioner in Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland with regard to foreign affairs, defence and internal security. The framers of the Constitution confined themselves to indicating that the Paramount Chief would exercise only certain powers. Sections 30 and 62 of the 1963 report were explicit in that regard. The United Kingdom representative had quoted only the last two paragraphs of section 65 and had thus distorted its meaning.

352. Thirdly, the delegation of powers in the field of foreign affairs meant that Basutoland and the United Kingdom would share the responsibility during the pre-independence period in order to give the Territory the necessary experience. Such a sharing of powers did not mean that ultimate authority was transferred from the Head of State to the Prime Minister, as was clear from sections 54, 56, 91, 94 and 97 of the report.

353. To avoid any misunderstanding, he wished to make it clear that when he and Mr. Makotoko had referred to the minority Government they had not wished to dispute in any way the legality of that Government; the fact that they themselves represented the Opposition showed that they regarded the Government as the legal Government of Basutoland.

354. Lastly, since the question as to how the reserved powers would be disposed of at independence had never been made an election issue, it was essential that new elections should be held. As pointed out in section 13 of the petition which had been circulated, the unity of the Basuto Nation must be preserved, especially at a time when it was threatened by a neighbouring country. In section 16 of the same document, the petitioners appealed to the United Nations to persuade the United Kingdom to change its present policy and, in particular, to agree to the holding of immediate elections in the presence of international observers.

355. In conclusion, he quoted sections 76, 79, 54, 56, 91, 94, 97, 30 and 62 of the 1963 report. He stressed again the refusal of the United Kingdom Government, in 1964, to agree that, as the framers of the Constitution had envisaged, the powers relating to foreign affairs, defence and internal security exercised by the High Commissioner should be transferred to the Head of State of Basutoland in a modified form. If the United Kingdom Government had acceded at that time to the unanimous wishes of the people of the Territory, the existing difficulties in Basutoland would not have arisen.

356. In a further statement Mr. Makotoko said that he wished to comment on certain passages of a statement by the United Kingdom Secretary of State for the Colonies in which the latter had outlined the background to the present constitutional dispute in Basutoland. Firstly, there had indeed been five progressive stages of constitutional development in Basutoland, and certain principles had been established after consultation among all the leaders of Basotho public opinion. It was not until June 1966 that a departure had been made from those principles, and that was the only reason for the present unhappiness in the Territory; it was that situation which the petitioners were seeking to correct. The second point related to the pledge given by the Basotho leaders in 1964 that there would be minimum change at the time of independence. It was obvious that if residual powers concerning foreign affairs, internal security and defence were to remain in the hands of the United Kingdom Government, such a change, even if it was "minimum", was by no means minor. The interpretation that "minimum" meant "minor" could not be accepted. The term could not exclude the right of the Territory to dispose of the residual powers in a manner giving the nation maximum protection. Thirdly, all the leaders of Basotho public opinion had agreed on the framework of the pre-independence constitution in 1964. That agreement could not automatically be taken to cover the final form of the independence Constitution, in 1966, for certain very important national matters such as foreign affairs, defence and security had been left outstanding.

357. The Basuto Nation should be allowed to make known its views regarding the residual powers. It was true that there had been unanimity of opinion, but it was important to know to what the unanimity related. He hoped to submit to the members of the Committee verbatim quotations from statements of all the members of the present Government demanding the very conditions which the opposition parties were advocating and which had caused them to be accused of wishing to create trouble. When the elections had been held, the leaders of the Government and of the main opposition party had been in agreement that the residual powers should devolve upon the Paramount Chief.

358. It should also be made clear that the Constitutional Commission's report, known in Basutoland as the Green Book, had not in fact been the legal document on which the Commission and the United Kingdom had based their agreement in London. The book which had now been used as a basis for that agreement was a draft report of the Commission which had become the legal document only after it had been extensively amended in Parliament. The amendments had mainly related to the reserved powers and the position of the Paramount Chief. After the document had been legalized and amended, the United Kingdom officials in Basutoland had refrained from including the amendments in the book. Consequently, when the Secretary of State for the Colonies quoted from that document now, he could quote certain passages which gave incorrect information. Had the amendments been made it would have been clear that the Basotho people and their Parliament did not want the Paramount Chief to become an absolute monarch upon independence.

The amendments which had been made could not be called "slight", as they had been by the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and that fact was clear evidence of a manoeuvre directed against the Basotho people.

359. With regard to the question of the delegation of powers, the Basotho leaders had agreed that the United Kingdom's reserved powers should be transferred to the Ministers of the Basotho Government, subject to the supervision of the Paramount Chief whose responsibility it was to ensure that those powers were not exercised in such a manner as to undermine the sovereignty of the Territory. The United Kingdom Government today held that that agreement was tantamount to depriving the Paramount Chief of the right to inherit the United Kingdom Government's authority. That was another manoeuvre directed against the Basuto Nation. Furthermore, at the London Conference, the Basotho leaders had requested that the United Kingdom should be authorized to amend the Constitution but not the position of the Paramount Chief during the period preceding independence; that was a guarantee of security since, throughout the history of Basutoland, it was the Paramountcy which had saved the Nation from extreme disasters. Today, that request was apparently being interpreted as meaning that the Basotho leaders had intended that what the Nation had asked for should not be granted even at independence.

360. It should be pointed out, in conclusion, that the United Kingdom Government had pledged itself at the 1964 Conference to grant independence to Basutoland in conditions of peace and order. Furthermore, the Special Committee recently adopted at Addis Ababa a resolution to that effect. Basutoland wanted the United Kingdom Government to fulfil its promise and implement the resolution adopted by the Committee. The surest safeguard of peace lay in the implementation of that resolution which declared that the granting of independence should be in accord with the people's wishes. There was no peace today in Basutoland. The sending of a British regiment was no substitute for the surer way of maintaining peace, which was to allow the Basotho people to express their wishes by means of elections or by a referendum concerning the form of independence which they desired. Then there could be no reason for disagreement or disturbances. The verdict of the referendum would be fully respected.

General statements by members

361. The representative of the United Kingdom said that following the statements made by the two petitioners he would like to offer some clarifications regarding the constitutional matters raised in connexion with Basutoland.

362. In 1956, the United Kingdom Government had invited the Basutoland National Council to submit detailed recommendations for constitutional advance. In 1962-1963, at the request of the Council, the Paramount Chief had appointed a Constitutional Commission representing all the main political parties. In 1964, at the Constitutional Conference held in London, which had been attended by the Paramount Chief and the leaders of all the political parties in the Territory, the Constitutional Commission's report had been considered. Full agreement had been reached among all the political parties, including those represented by the present petitioners, on the proposed Constitution. Three points in the report of the Conference were noteworthy: first that it defined the position of the Paramount Chief as a constitutional Head of State; secondly that the Basutoland delegation had stated that it looked to the future with confidence in spite of present economic difficulties, that it was not asking the United Kingdom for an assurance of continued military protection of the Territory after independence, that it recognized the need to live at peace with South Africa and that it was confident that South Africa entertained the same sentiments towards Basutoland; lastly that the Secretary of State for the Colonies had undertaken that, if at a date not earlier than one year after new elections the people of Basutoland by resolutions of both Houses of their Parliament should ask for independence, the British Government would seek to give effect to their wishes. That undertaking had been given on the assumption that conditions in Basutoland would be such as to enable power to be transferred in peace and order. That procedure had been accepted by all concerned.

363. The elections of April 1965, whose validity had been questioned by some, had taken place on the basis of the new Constitution and of universal adult suffrage. At the opening of the 1966 Constitutional Conference the Basutoland National Party had thirty-one seats, the Marema-Tlou Party one seat, the Basutoland Congress Party twenty-five seats, and the Marema-Tlou Freedom Party three seats, thus giving thirty-two seats to government supporters and twenty-eight seats to the Opposition. Of the eleven persons appointed to the Senate by the Paramount Chief, eight were drawn from the opposition parties. Seeing that the elections had taken place and a year had passed since those elections, one of the conditions contained in the undertaking given by the Secretary of State for the Colonies had been fulfilled. The second condition had been that resolutions should be passed by both Houses of the Basutoland Parliament, or, in the event of disagreement between them, by a majority in a referendum. That condition too had been fulfilled. In consequence, the Basutoland Government had requested the United Kingdom Government to fix 4 October 1966 as the date for independence.

364. At the opening of the June 1966 Conference, attended by delegates of all the main political parties, the position had been as follows. The question of independence had been settled in principle in 1964, the essential framework of the Constitution had also been accepted in 1964, the role of the Paramount Chief had been defined and the date of the elections agreed upon. Lastly, the parties had agreed on the procedure to be followed after the elections.

365. Taking up one of the comments made by Mr. Kolisang which concerned the residual powers and was thus relevant to the position of the Paramount Chief, he said that paragraph 65 of the 1963 Constitutional Commission's report seemed to him more relevant than paragraph 79, which had been quoted by the petitioner. Under the recommendations made in that paragraph, which had been given effect in the 1965 Constitution, the Paramount Chief was the Queen's representative and exercised the powers of a constitutional monarch. It should be recalled that all parties had accepted that clause in the Constitution. As to the transfer of powers relating to the public service, foreign affairs, defence and internal security, paragraph 12 of the report of the 1964 Conference¹³ made it clear that the reserved powers were to be transferred to the Basutoland Government rather than to the Paramount Chief. Furthermore, in 1965, at the request of the Prime Minister of Basutoland, arrangements had been made to transfer to the Government of the Territory responsibility in the field of internal security and external affairs. It would surely be difficult to take away from the Basutoland Government powers which had been delegated to it already before independence. It was also stated in paragraph 11 of the report of the 1964 Constitutional Conference that the Paramount Chief was to be a constitutional Head of State.

366. He wished also to mention a speech made in the House of Lords on 21 June 1966 by Lord Beswick, in which the latter had referred to a letter from Mr. Mokobi, the leader of one of the opposition parties, expressing the view that it would be inconsistent with the views of the majority in Basutoland unless the constitutional Head of State had only restricted powers, and also to a message sent to the Secretary of State for the Colonies by seventeen of the twenty-two principal Basutoland chiefs saying that the Paramount Chief was the Head of State and ought to be constitutional ruler and the symbol of national unity. For the reasons set out in paragraph 15 of the 1966 report, the United Kingdom Government had felt unable to accept the Basutoland Opposition's proposals in view of their inconsistency with previous agreements and the danger that they would lead to a division of responsibility.

367. The question of relations between Basutoland and South Africa clearly gave rise to much anxiety and charges had been made regarding the intentions of the Basutoland Government. It was suggested that that Government might decide, for reasons which were not clear, to alienate territory to South Africa or to enter into some relationship with South Africa which would not be acceptable to the people of Basutoland. The Prime Minister of Basutoland had himself categorically refuted those charges, and declared himself to be bitterly hostile to apartheid. Moreover, the Constitution designed to come into force after independence would provide that no action which might derogate from the independence and sovereignty of the new State could be adopted without the support of a majority vote in a referendum. In other words, the Lesotho Government would be unable to convert the country into a "Bantustan" without the support of the majority of the people.

368. On the other hand, the Basutoland Government recognized realistically that coexistence with South Africa was a prerequisite for the economic viability of the country; that had been accepted by all parties and the necessity of coexistence had been reaffirmed in the report of the 1964 Conference, which had received the support of all concerned. It should be added that membership in the Commonwealth and in the United Nations constituted an important assurance of Basutoland's independence.

369. Finally, he did not see any justification for the holding of new elections, which the petitioners considered necessary; there was no evidence that circumstances had changed or that there had been a shift in public opinion since the earlier elections, and there was therefore no reason to suppose that new elections would give a different result. The elections had been properly held and, up to that time, all concerned had been agreed on the issues; it was only later that the leaders of the parties to which the petitioners belonged had changed their minds and reopened certain issues. The Basutoland Parliament had asked for independence and it had been decided that Basutoland should become independent under the name of Lesotho on 4 October; there was therefore no justification for further elections before independence.

¹³ Basutoland Constitutional Conference, Cmnd 2371 (London, Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1964).

370. It was to be hoped, as the Secretary of State for the Colonies had said in a recent broadcast after the Conference, that all those in Basutoland would now work together in the best interests of their country. He added that the Basutoland Government had not yet heard what had been said in this debate; no doubt there would be a future opportunity for them to be heard if necessary.

371. In a further statement, the representative of the United Kingdom said that in his statement the previous day his main contentions had been, first that the essential framework of the Constitution, designed to be carried over with a minimum of change into independence, was agreed by all at the 1964 Conference, and secondly that pre-independence elections had been held on a basis of universal adult suffrage, and held properly, on terms agreed by all. Referring to the petitioners' comments on the question of the reserved powers and their claim that no agreement had been reached on the question at the 1964 Conference, while the documents which had been quoted in that connexion referred to the pre-independence Constitution and not to the Constitution by which the country would be governed after independence, as he had already stated, the pre-independence Constitution, which had been approved by all the parties concerned, had been drawn up on the advice of the Basutoland Constitutional Commission as something which could be carried over as the independence Constitution with a minimum of change. Provision for the transfer of the reserved powers to a Basotho authority was made expressly in the pre-independence Constitution, under which as stated in the 1964 Constitutional Report the British Government representative, who would retain responsibility for external affairs, defence and internal security, would be empowered to delegate any part of those responsibilities to a minister of His Highness's Government designated by the Prime Minister; such delegation might be made subject to conditions and would be without prejudice to the British Government representative's power to revoke the delegation at any time.

372. Was it conceivable that, once those powers had been delegated, as some of them had been after the entry into force of the 1965 Constitution, it was intended that they should be transferred to the Paramountcy after independence? Had that been so, was it conceivable that there should not be the slightest mention of it in any of the documents which had been laid before the 1966 Conference? Had it been the intention of all concerned that those powers should go to the Paramountcy, it was inconceivable that it should not be mentioned in any of the documents.

373. With regard to the powers of the Paramount Chief as the Head of State, he drew the Committee's attention to chapter 3 of the 1963 Constitutional Commission's report, concerning specifically the Head of State. As the Commission itself had said, no aspect of its work had given it more anxiety than that of devising the appropriate status for the Paramount Chief, and it had come to the conclusion that his powers must be carefully defined. The full citation was to be found in the verbatim record of the 457th meeting of the Special Committee. It was doubtful whether the minutes of the 1964 London Conference would substantiate the general conclusions drawn by the petitioners. What was certain was that Mr. Ramoreboli, a distinguished member of the Basutoland Congress Party, explaining why the Paramount Chief had not been given powers other than those specified in the report, had argued that his powers must be in accord with the accepted principles of a constitutional monarchy. It had seemed natural to Mr. Ramoreboli that the definition of those powers should be based on the example of the United Kingdom whose monarchy went back a thousand years, and he had concluded that if a monarchy was to survive it should be isolated from political controversy and the king should reign as a constitutional monarch.

374. On the question of holding new elections, it must be pointed out that on 4 December 1963, when it had been a question of whether the Constitutional Commission's report should be referred back to the people of Basutoland for their approval, Mr. Khaketla, a member of the Basutoland Congress Party, and Mr. Kolisang had not questioned the validity of the views expressed in the report which they considered, as they had stated in writing, an acceptable basis for negotiations for the improvement of Basutoland's Constitution at that time. Mr. Khaketla had also stated that his constituents had passed a resolution declaring that the Basutoland Constitutional Commission's report truly reflected the views which they had expressed before the Commission when they had been consulted in 1962, that they accepted the report in its entirety and urged the Basutoland National Council to pass it without delay, and that they did not agree with those who had suggested that the report should be referred back to the people since they were satisfied that it expressed the true feelings of the Basotho. Moreover, as he himself had pointed out at the previous meeting, the Constitution which was to go into effect after independence derived almost exactly from the framework drawn up by the Constitutional Commission of 1962-1963 and approved by successive constitutional conferences, including that of 1964 in which the representatives of all political parties and the Paramount Chief of Basutoland had participated.

375. Furthermore, if the question whether the reserved powers should go, on independence, to the Paramount Chief or to ministers of the Basutoland Government had not been settled at the 1964 Conference, it was inconceivable that it would not have been an issue at the 1965 elections, and the petitioners themselves had said it had not been an issue at those elections. The electorate had been fully aware of the independence issue; there had been no disagreement about the question of reserved powers, since it had already been agreed that the position of the Paramount Chief should be that of a constitutional monarch. If the fate of the reserved powers had not been settled beforehand and agreed in principle at the 1964 Conference, it was inconceivable that it would not have been an issue at the elections. It had only been after the elections that those powers had been called into question by the two parties represented by the petitioners. Up to the time when the results of the election had been known, a carefully thought-out plan for bringing Basutoland to independence had been agreed to by all concerned.

376. The representative of Iraq drew attention to paragraph 2 of resolution A/AC.109/178, which the Special Committee had adopted on 9 June 1966 and in which the Committee called upon the administering Power to ensure that the independence to be granted to Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland should be based on the free expression of all the people in fulfilment of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). It could be argued that the Committee might have been thinking of new elections when it had used the words "free expression"; that was why, in his opinion, the petitioners had referred to that possibility. He wondered whether the United Kingdom representative perceived any contradiction between what the petitioners had said the day before and what the Special Committee had decided in the resolution to which he had just referred and which might be taken as a call for new elections.

377. The representative of Uruguay said that the information the United Kingdom representative had given the Committee showed that the independence shortly to be granted to Basutoland had been prepared properly and with the support of all the parties involved.

378. It could only be a source of satisfaction to learn that the Government which had emerged from the 1965 elections reflected the wishes of the majority—a majority which knew what it was doing. It was with great pleasure that the Committee had heard the United Kingdom representative confirm the announcement that Basutoland would accede to independence on 4 October; that country, which would not be born without pain, would soon take its place as a sovereign nation and play its part in the world.

379. It was particularly gratifying that Basutoland's forthcoming independence would be a truly constitutional independence. It was clear from the United Kingdom representative's statement that the three parties were agreed on the ways in which independence would be achieved and on the Constitution under which the new State would be governed.

380. With his republican convictions, he could not endorse the arrangements relating to the constitutional powers to be reserved to the Paramount Chief, but he realized that those arrangements reflected the choice made by the people in the exercise of their fundamental right to self-determination.

381. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania stated with regard to the statement just made by the Uruguayan representative, that the Latin American countries had given Africa many good examples, especially during their struggle for their independence. However, he did not believe that democracy was now coming to Africa. The history of that continent had always been marked by bloodshed and what was now taking place in Africa was a process of decolonization. It was therefore not really a question of democracy coming to Africa but a question of the restoration to the Africans of the rights of which they had been robbed by the colonial Powers. The fact that African petitioners were appearing before the Special Committee caused him sorrow because it showed how Africa today was still being oppressed and how human freedom was still being infringed in the world. The Africans were not so much interested in the idea of independence per se as in the kind of independence achieved. For example, Ian Smith had declared himself independent; however, that type of independence could not be recognized because it was inimical to African interests. The same applied to South Africa. Its independence was not true independence because it rested in the hands of a minority which exploited the rest of the people. His delegation was therefore mainly interested in the nature of independence; the evidence of the petitioners must therefore be taken into consideration, because, despite certain obvious contradictions, they represented the people and spoke on their behalf. Contradictions could also be found in the statements by the administering Powers; he might mention, for example, the position taken by the United Kingdom Government on Southern Rhodesia and the very different attitude it had taken in the case of Aden, even though the populations in question were similar. As far as the assurances given by the United Kingdom Government were concerned, he recalled that often such assurances had remained a dead letter.

382. Basutoland was a case where the administering Power was concerned and the petitioners had already pointed out what should be done. Thus, while the Committee should weigh the evidence given by the administering Power, it should also pay great heed to the statements of the petitioners, in the interest of the African people of Basutoland.

383. His delegation did not see how the question of the reserved powers could be said to have been disposed of when the Constitution of 1964 had left those powers in the hands of the representatives of the United Kingdom Government in the Territory. It was clear from the petitioners' statements that the majority of the people of Basutoland rejected the argument that that question had already been disposed of. After all, the powers relating to defence, external affairs and internal security were so important that they could not conceivably have been disposed of without serious consideration at the constitutional talks. Another important point was that even the Paramount Chief, who, it could be assumed, had always worked closely with the representatives of the United Kingdom Government in the Territory, should come to disagree with the United Kingdom on that matter. The best way of settling the matter would therefore be to consult the people of Basutoland. In the interests of peace and good government, the Basotho people should be given a chance to express their views on the question by way of elections.

384. Another point was the question of the delegation of powers. What the Basuto nation wanted was not for the Paramount Chief to become an absolute ruler but merely for him to have a say regarding the manner in which such powers would be exercised. The essence of the matter was that the Head of State should be able to delegate powers with regard to defence, internal security and external affairs in the same way that the United Kingdom representative in Basutoland had been given authority to do so in the 1965 Constitution. Because the Constitution was silent on that matter and because the Paramount Chief of Basutoland would on independence become the Head of State, the Tanzanian delegation would have assumed that those powers which had been exercised by the United Kingdom representative would have gone to the Head of State, who would, in turn, have delegated them to his ministers.

385. The Special Committee must not forget that the interests of the Basotho people were its main concern. It was in their interests that the Territory should be able to accede to independence in a peaceful and orderly manner. Therefore, if some of the decisions taken at the most recent Constitutional Conference seemed to bring some degree of instability, then the United Kingdom should hold new elections in order to give the Basuto Nation a chance to say in what ways they wished the reserved powers to be disposed of after independence.

386. He urged the Basotho people to come together so as to prove to the world that even though they were attaining independence under difficult circumstances, they were nevertheless capable of overcoming their difficulties.

387. The representative of Uruguay stressed that there was no difference of view between the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania and himself. The concept of democracy was different from the concept of independence. One thing was true: all peoples must pay a price for their freedom. In struggling against various forms of domination, Latin America had also suffered much bloodshed. Hence it understood the problems of Africa and Asia. The solidarity of the Latin American representatives with those of Africa and Asia in the Committee of Twenty-Four was to some extent a question of sympathy and all spoke the same language of democracy. The struggle which Africa was now waging evoked memories of Latin America's earlier struggle.

388. The representative of Mali expressed the view that the constitutional problem raised by the administering Power was less important than the relations that should exist between South Africa and Basutoland and the guarantee offered to the Territory in order to safeguard its integrity vis-à-vis South Africa. He would be happy to hear the United Kingdom representative's explanation of the measures his Government had taken or intended to take to safeguard Basutoland's independence. The representative of the administering Power had stated that the Prime Minister of the present Government in Basutoland was realistic because he intended to co-operate very closely with the Government of South Africa. Paragraph 43 of document A/AC.109/L.273 stated that "people who live in Basutoland should be able to go freely into and out of the country". Did that mean that Basutoland was in the power of the Government of South Africa, which could at will authorize or refuse to authorize persons to enter or leave its territory? Was it under those conditions that the United Kingdom Government wished to grant independence to Basutoland?

389. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that his delegation had carefully studied the petitions submitted to the Special Committee and had listened attentively to the submissions of the petitioners. They had particularly stressed the fact that the policy of the United Kingdom, as the administering Power, was incompatible with the genuine independence, unity and territorial integrity of Basutoland. Proof of the Basotho people's disagreement with the policy of the administering Power lay in the many mass rallies taking place all over the Territory in protest against United Kingdom policy. The United Kingdom representative, however, had tried to give the impression that the administering Power's policy was in keeping with the interests of Basutoland. If that was so, why were mass rallies being held? United Kingdom policy in Basutoland, as in other colonies, was guided only by the interests of the administering Power and the British monopolies. The administering Power had obliged Basutoland to contend with an extremely difficult economic and social situation. The United Kingdom representative had told the Committee that the elections of 29 April 1965 had been democratic in character. It was to be noted, however, that the Republic of South Africa had interfered directly in the conduct and results of the Basutoland elections. Thus, the petitioners had cited examples of direct financial assistance on the part of the Republic of South Africa and the Federal Republic of Germany. Moreover, South Africa had exerted economic pressures on the voters and had engaged in blackmail and threats. If it was borne in mind that such pressure and blackmail had affected 43 per cent of the country's working population—the number of Basothos working in the Republic of South Africa—the importance of such electoral blackmail was only too clear. In view of the illegal votes by persons living in the Republic of South Africa and the forging of ballot papers, the United Kingdom's attempt to represent the 1965 elections as democratic would not bear examination. Furthermore, the elections had not satisfied one of the principles of the Declaration on the granting of independence, namely the principle of "one man, one vote". Thus, the party which had obtained 41.6 per cent of the votes, thanks to undemocratic activities, had actually won 31 out of the 60 seats in Parliament, i.e. almost 52 per cent of the total seats. Such a disparity clearly showed that the elections had not been genuine and had been held in violation of the standards laid down by the United Nations for elections in colonial Territories. Could a situation in which those who had won a majority in the elections were not represented in the Government be regarded as democratic? It was obvious that the United Kingdom, despite the holding of elections, was stubbornly pursuing a policy which prevented the people of Basutoland from freely expressing their wishes and deciding their future. The United Kingdom Government was trying above all to safeguard the interests of the British capitalists in Southern Africa. The Special Committee should very carefully analyse the situation prevailing in Basutoland and take all necessary measures to ensure the observance of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. His delegation would support any decision taken by the Special Committee for that purpose.

G. FURTHER ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

390. At the 458th meeting on 8 July 1966, in compliance with the request from several delegations, the Chairman made the following statement, setting forth a consensus of the views expressed in the Special Committee:

"The members of the Special Committee had, in the course of the debate, expressed concern regarding the recent developments in Basutoland and had all expressed the desire that Basutoland should accede to independence without delay. Many members had expressed the hope that all the political parties in the Territory would unite in their efforts to achieve common objectives because it was only through a united approach that the problems of Basutoland could be solved. It was generally agreed that the independence of Basutoland should be based on the principles expressed in operative paragraph 2 of the resolution concerning Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland (A/AC.109/178), adopted by the Special Committee at its 439th meeting held at Addis Ababa on 9 June 1966. In addition, many delegations had expressed the hope that guarantees would be provided for the preservation of the territorial integrity of Basutoland."

391. This consensus was adopted, without objection, by the Special Committee at the same meeting.

392. The representative of the United Kingdom said he was glad that the Chairman had decided to proceed by consensus. As, however, he had not had time to seek any instructions from his Government on that point, he wished to enter a general reserve on the actual phraseology of that consensus. Furthermore, since, up to a point, the consensus touched on the internal affairs of Basutoland, the future independent State of Lesotho, he also wished to make a general reserve on behalf of the Basutoland Government.

393. With regard to the reference to operative paragraph 2 of the resolution A/AC.109/178, which provided that independence should be based on the free expression of all the people in fulfilment of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), it was the view of the United Kingdom that the elections that had been held in the Territory met that requirement.

394. With regard to the last sentence of the Chairman's consensus, which concerned the question of guarantees, he said that as it was not clear to him how or by whom such guarantees should be established, he could not commit his Government in respect of any details in that regard.

395. The representative of the United States of America said that her delegation was pleased that it had been possible for the Committee to arrive at a consensus. Her delegation wished, however, to register a reserve in connexion with that part of the Chairman's consensus relating to operative paragraph 2 of resolution A/AC.109/178, because it believed that the views of the people of Basutoland on that subject had already been expressed in the recent elections.

396. The representative of Mali said that his delegation was happy to endorse the consensus just stated by the Chairman. It could not, however, undersatnd the position taken by some delegations with regard to operative paragraph 2 of resolution A/AC.109/178 adopted at Addis Ababa. The petitioners had said that they had left the London Conference because no clear decision had been taken there regarding the fate of the so-called reserved powers. Thus, it was evident that, under the existing conditions, independence would not be based on the free expression of all the people.

397. As to guaranteeing the territorial integrity of Basutoland, there could be no doubt that the United Kingdom, as the administering Power, was responsible for guaranteeing the integrity of that Territory against the threat represented by South Africa.

398. The representative of Australia, recalling that his delegation had voted for resolution A/AC.109/178, said that his country's position with regard to operative paragraph 2 of the resolution was similar to that of the United States. It was his country's understanding that the independence shortly to come to Basutoland was in fact based on the free expression of the people within the meaning of the Australian interpretation of that paragraph.

H. CONSIDERATION OF THE REPORT OF THE SUB-COMMITTEE ON BASUTOLAND, BECHUANALAND AND SWAZILAND

399. At its 466th and 467th meetings, the Special Committee considered the report of the Sub-Committee on Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, established under the terms of operative paragraph 4 of the resolution adopted by the Committee at its 439th meeting on 9 June 1966.

400. During its consideration of the Sub-Committee's report the Special Committee also had before it a letter addressed to it by the Chairman of the Special Committee on the Policies of Apartheid of the Government of the Republic of South Africa (A/AC.109/204). The letter drew attention to a memorandum received from Mr. Matthew Nkoana, of the Pan-Africanist Congress of South Africa, concerning the arrest in Basutoland of Mr. John Nyati Pokela, a member of that party.

Statements by members of the Special Committee on the report of the Sub-Committee on Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland

401. The representative of Bulgaria (Rapporteur of the Sub-Committee), in introducing the report, explained that the members of the Sub-Committee were aware of the complexities and the unprecedented nature of the subject in the United Nations. At the same time, the members of the Sub-Committee realized that they did not have the necessary time to carry out a thorough study and that their recommendations had to be made as soon as possible. That is the reason why the Sub-Committee tried to suggest certain measures to the Special Committee which were in keeping with the urgency of the moment and which could be achieved immediately, in order to counter the overt aims of the South African régime which seeks to absorb these Territories and to interfere in their internal affairs.

402. Firstly, because of the precarious situation in which the three Territories found themselves at the time when two of them were about to accede to independence, the Sub-Committee had recommended that the Special Committee should take the necessary steps to ensure that they attained independence in the manner prescribed in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

403. Secondly, the Sub-Committee thought that the Special Committee should re-recommend that the General Assembly should again solemnly warn the Republic of South Africa that any attempt to encroach upon the territorial integrity and sovereignty of the three Territories should be considered as an act of aggression and a flagrant violation of the Charter, with all the attendant consequences, including recourse to the Security Council. The General Assembly should also draw the Security Council's attention to the matter. Furthermore, in view of the favorable attitude which certain Powers had shown to the South African apartheid régime and the help they had given it, the General Assembly should appeal to all Member States to refrain from any action which might encourage the designs of South Africa.

404. The Special Committee should consult the Organization of African Unity which had a special responsibility for African problems.

405. Finally, the Sub-Committee suggested that the General Assembly should give the matter priority in order to reach a decision before the imminent accession to independence of two of the three Territories.

406. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that Bechuanaland, Basutoland and Swaziland were in a difficult position because of the threatening presence of South Africa and the colonial attitude of the United Kingdom Government, which had merely maintained the three Territories as reservoirs of cheap labour for the gold mines and other enterprises of financial monopolies which carried on their activities in South Africa. At a time when the colonial system was about to disappear, the economic situation of the Territories gave rise to serious preoccupations. It was true that geography made them dependent on the South African economy, but the Committee must recognize that it was mainly the colonial practices of the United Kingdom which lay at the root of their economic weakness. The African people had been dispossessed of most of the arable land which now belonged to settlers and foreign enterprises.

407. The petitioners whom the Committee had heard during its visit to Africa had given evidence that the United Kingdom authorities had allowed the South Africans to become entrenched in the civil service of the Territories and it was a fact that some of the agents of apartheid played a dominant role in the police force. Those authorities had thus sought, in the face of the surging tide of African nationalism to keep hold on their possessions and lay the ground-work for neo-colonialism.

408. At the political level, the colonial authorities had collaborated with the South African racists to throttle national liberation movements and to interfere with elections. The petitioners whom the Committee had heard had stated that the South African régime had forced African workers to cross the frontier and vote for chosen candidates. Despite such manoeuvres, the opposition parties, which demanded real independence, had obtained the majority of the votes. Nevertheless they still formed the "opposition".

409. In various resolutions, including resolution 2063 (XX), the General Assembly had drawn attention to the dangers which the South African régime of apartheid signified for the economic life, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland. In resolution 1954 (XVIII), it had warned South Africa that "any attempt to annex or encroach upon the territorial integrity of these three Territories shall be considered an act of aggression". For its part, the Organization of African Unity had requested that steps should be taken to protect them.

410. Recently, the situation had merely become worse. The recommendations of the Sub-Committee were prompted by an awareness of the dangers which he had stressed. His delegation hoped that the report would be adopted unreservedly and that the recommendations it contained would serve as the basis for the full implementation of the historic Declaration contained in resolution 1514 (XV). The United Kingdom Government must co-operate with the United Nations to ensure that the provisions of that resolution were observed and that the people of the three Territories were not victims of racial hatred and the exploitation of man by man.

411. The Chairman of the Sub-Committee said that all members of the Sub-Committee had been in agreement on the substance of the question, namely, that the three Territories should enjoy sovereignty based on firm foundations and should not run the risk of being placed under the yoke of apartheid by their dangerous neighbours. Nevertheless, there had been differing views: some had thought, inter alia, that the Sub-Committee was not competent to formulate recommendations on the political conduct of the administering Power. However, the Sub-Committee had succeeded in achieving unanimity in condemning the racist system of apartheid and contemplating practical solutions which could be applied during the short period between the establishment of the Sub-Committee and the date on which it was to submit its report.

412. Two of the Territories were to accede very soon to independence, Bechuanaland on 30 September and Basutoland on 4 October. It was therefore impossible to invite the administering Power to take long-term measures. Nor was there any question of retarding the process of accession to independence to allow the administering Power to provide new guarantees.

413. The Sub-Committee's work, as reflected in the report, was perhaps imperfect but under the pressure of circumstances speed was vital.

414. The representative of the United Kingdom said he would not deal at that stage with the questions raised by the representative of Tanzania but, on behalf of his delegation, categorically rejected the assertions that representative had made.

415. Turning to the substance of the report, he had the most serious doubts about the wisdom of adopting it at the present juncture. He did not consider that the Sub-Committee had taken sufficient account of the facts of the situation or of what had been done. Nor did he consider that the procedures proposed were the most appropriate to the situation. In particular, nowhere in the report, apparently, was it proposed that the views of the Governments concerned should be sought before action was taken.

416. The economy of the Territories and that of South Africa were inevitably interdependent. Furthermore, the Governments of Basutoland and Bechuanaland were fully aware of the need to make a distinction between economic interdependence and political interdependence. To illustrate that point he quoted statements made by the Prime Ministers of both Territories. Speaking on 27 June the Prime Minister of Basutoland had said:

"Lesotho is intimately related to South Africa geographically, historically and economically. At the same time, we are very well aware that we are part of the new Africa... We will not interfere with South Africa and we do not expect South Africa to interfere with us, but no less important is our determination to ensure that Basutoland is not used as a pawn in the hands of those who have interests to secure other than the immediate interests of Basutoland. This is not parochialism; this is elementary common-sense."

After becoming the first Prime Minister of Bechuanaland on 3 March 1965, Dr. Seretse Khama said that his country would continue to trade with South Africa as long as this proved beneficial to Bechuanaland and that countries which differed politically could have good economic relations.

417. He noted that certain members of the Sub-Committee as reflected in paragraph 8 of the report had felt that the present Government of Basutoland did not enjoy the support of the majority of the people. In that connexion he recalled that elections based on universal adult suffrage had recently been held in Basutoland and Bechuanaland. The Committee had gone into that question exhaustively, so far as Basutoland was concerned, at its 457th meeting, as the record showed. Although the party in power had not obtained an over-all majority in the elections, it had gained more seats than the other two parties combined. That could happen in a democratic system and it should not be forgotten that during the elections agreement had been reached on the main issue, namely, that the country should ask for independence. Independence would be obtained on 4 October 1966.

418. As for Bechuanaland, elections under universal adult suffrage had been held in March 1965. The Bechuanaland People's Party had gained 80 per cent of the seats, and 75 per cent of the electorate had voted. Consequently, the Government of that Territory had the full support of the people.

419. The two Territories of Bechuanaland and Basutoland had Governments democratically elected by universal adult suffrage in accordance with the freely expressed will of the people. The Governments of those Territories had agreed on terms for independence with the United Kingdom, and no one could say that those terms had not been based on the will of the people. The same principles would apply to Swaziland.

420. Consequently, his delegation rejected the implications of paragraph 8 of the Sub-Committee's report and of the recommendations in paragraph 14 (a) (i) and (ii). In his delegation's view, those two recommendations were quite superfluous. The United Kingdom Government had carried out its responsibilities and had brought Bechuanaland and Basutoland to the threshold of independence.

421. Paragraph 14 (a) (iii) stated that the United Kingdom Government should protect the territorial integrity and sovereignty of the Territories against interference from South Africa. The position was quite clear: until independence, the territorial integrity and sovereignty of the Territories remained the concern of the United Kingdom Government and the Governments of the Territories in question. After independence, it would be for the Governments of the Territories themselves to see to that task; if at that stage they wanted assistance from the United Nations, they themselves would have to enter into the necessary negotiations to obtain it. The United Kingdom Government had not been requested to enter into any defence agreements with Basutoland and Bechuanaland after independence.

422. At the same time, however, United Kingdom economic aid would continue after independence. Such aid would be additional to that provided by the United Nations. During the period 1946-1966, the Territories had received about £42 million in budgetary grants and in Colonial Development Welfare Fund grants and loans. Since publication of the Morse Report in 1961, the figure was £33 million in five years. In addition, the Commonwealth Development Corporation had invested nearly £22 million in the Territories. There was no doubt that that aid had decreased the Territories' economic dependence on South Africa. That was the result which had been aimed at. For instance, more than one half of Bechuanaland's meat exports went northwards; Swaziland's iron ore was sold to Japan and its asbestos and wood-pulp to Europe, and its sugar was bought by the United Kingdom under the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement on terms which were very advantageous to the Territory. However, the extent to which it was wise to divert the products of the Territories away from a very prosperous market on their doorstep and towards other areas which were not so prosperous and were further away was questionable. As he had said, and as was recommended in the report, such economic interdependence would remain.

423. Turning to the recommendation contained in paragraph 14 (c), he emphasized that the Governments of the Territories should have full responsibility for participating in any consultations between the Special Committee and the Organization of African Unity (OAU).

424. The United Kingdom Government was anxious to ensure that the independence shortly to be attained by the Territories should be respected and that they should take their rightful place as States in the international community. Two of them would shortly be applying for membership in the United Nations, and the Commonwealth Conference had agreed to their becoming members of the Commonwealth.

425. In the view of his delegation, however, it was essential to work closely with the Governments, and it had serious reservations on the wisdom of the procedure proposed in paragraph 14 (d) of the report. It seemed doubtful whether it was wise to rush through business of that kind, which concerned the affairs of States soon to become independent, even before their Governments had had an opportunity to express their views.

426. If the report was adopted without a vote, his delegation would have to enter the strongest reservations in the terms of the statement he had just made. If the report was put to the vote, his delegation would abstain for the reasons it had already indicated.

427. The representative of Uruguay said he would like to point out that the report reflected the consensus of the Sub-Committee, although that did not mean that divergent views had not been expressed on secondary issues.

428. One of the points, with which the Sub-Committee had had to deal had been to find steps to ensure the independence of the three Territories in a part of southern Africa where non-African minorities were in power. The original draft recommendations had contained provisions which, in the view of some members, had exceeded the Sub-Committee's powers. Certainly, the Sub-Committee could not have dealt with questions not referred to it by the Committee which had appointed it.

429. The Sub-Committee had not neglected to study all the various questions including those which concern the responsibility of the administering Power both before and after independence. With respect to those parts of paragraph 14 which laid down norms for the administering Power, he believed that any statement concerning possible democratic measures relating to elections which had already been held and Governments which were preparing to take office within a few weeks would seem out of place and ineffective a few weeks before independence. The Committee must either recommend that the Territories should not become independent on the scheduled dates—which would cause disagreement concerning the powers of the administering Power over the constitution which was to enter into force in a few months—or agree that the subjugated peoples concerned should finally become members of the sovereign community of nations on the dates specified, leaving them to make the necessary changes in the systems which had existed in the past.

430. To his delegation, the choice was clear: there should never be any delay in the date of independence for a colonial people, which should be liberated as soon as possible from a system condemned by the whole world. That did not mean that an attempt should not be made to take as much action as possible at the international level in order to ensure the political stability and territorial integrity of the new independent nations.

431. As he had stated in the Sub-Committee, Bechuanaland and Basutoland had not asked the administering Power for military protection after independence, and the United Kingdom would withdraw its forces immediately at that time. Yet the two Territories could only enjoy guarantees if these guarantees could be implemented by their own freely elected Governments. Furthermore, as the United Kingdom had promised, the Territories would continue to receive economic aid from it after their independence.

432. He had also pointed out that economically the relations between the three Territories and South Africa gave the Territories considerable benefits, as could be seen from the figures contained in the information considered by the Sub-Committee (see appendix III, para. 5). The parties in all three Territories recognized that it was necessary to maintain those relations, despite the existing political differences.

433. Bechuanaland and Basutoland would be applying for membership in the United Nations. Once they had become independent, such membership would provide them with legal and political safeguards. When the new independent Governments requested specific safeguards, economic co-operation with South Africa might become even more difficult.

434. It was also possible that the Governments of the two countries would not wish to make recommendations to the United Nations and would leave it to others to take action relating to them in the United Nations as soon as they became sovereign States. It would be a mistake, if clear and simple formulae were to be found, to accept any plan which theoretically would assuage consciences but at the same time, in practice, would create greater difficulties that would have to be overcome, since the independence of the peoples of the three Territories should be the first concern of the members of the Committee.

435. Accordingly, his delegation wished to support all the conclusions in the report which referred to guarantees and to steps to protect the Territories which might be taken by the United Nations in the various spheres of its activities.

436. He felt that it was impossible to adopt any other solution, owing to lack of time and because a fait accompli, such as the dates scheduled for independence, had to be accepted.

437. The free exercise of self-government would give the expected results, and the protection provided by the United Nations to the new sovereign States would be effective if the Organization had the support of Member States and if the latter placed respect for law above political considerations.

438. Two factors had been involved—the firm intention of the Sub-Committee not to delay independence, and the geographical situation of the Territories which were surrounded by South Africa and would be unable to preserve their autonomy because they would not be economically self-sufficient.

439. For instance, one of Basutoland's main problems was the manpower which it supplied to South Africa. Without the administering Power's subsidy, more than 50 per cent of the Territory's income would depend on the supply of such manpower. Obviously, economic problems of that kind were not easy to resolve, and they could not be resolved simply by decisions taken in the United Nations. Strenuous efforts would be necessary because, as the United Kingdom representative had said, there were ethnic problems which would have to be taken into account and solved.

440. The members of the Sub-Committee had made concessions in the interests of unanimity, so that the Territories could become independent, while at the same time having an assurance that they would not be crushed by the enemy surrounding them.

441. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that the Soviet Union considered that the provisions of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples were fully applicable to the three Territories under consideration.

442. His delegation shared the view of those members of the Sub-Committee who had emphasized the United Kingdom's responsibility for the situation in which a constant threat existed to the territorial integrity and political independence of the three Territories. It also agreed that the United Kingdom should be called upon to fulfil its responsibilities under the Charter and General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) so as to ensure that the independence of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland was based on the free expression of all inhabitants of the Territories. It further agreed that the United Kingdom should take measures to ensure the establishment of governments fully representative of the wishes of the people, which would be in a better position to resist pressures from South Africa.

443. His delegation fully supported the Sub-Committee's recommendation that the Special Committee should recommend the General Assembly to convey a solemn warning to the Government of the Republic of South Africa that any attempt to encroach upon the territorial integrity and sovereignty of the three Territories following independence would be considered by the United Nations to be an act of aggression. It also supported the recommendation that the General Assembly should draw the Security Council's attention to the threat which South Africa's annexationist policy would pose to Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland upon their attainment of independence. Of particular importance was the recommendation that the General Assembly should appeal to all States to refrain from any action which might encourage the Government of the Republic of South Africa to encroach upon the territorial integrity and sovereignty of the three Territories or to interfere in their domestic affairs. His delegation also welcomed the recommendation calling for consultation between the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity on the problem of ensuring the territorial integrity, independence and sovereignty of the three Territories after they became independent.

444. In view of the foregoing, his delegation supported the Sub-Committee's conclusions and recommendations and would vote for their adoption.

445. The representative of the United States of America said that her delegation, which had carefully reviewed the Sub-Committee's report, regretted that it was unable to support many of the report's conclusions and recommendations. The United States was in agreement with the basic political objective that the people of the Territories should have the right to express their wishes freely and govern themselves without outside interference; it was also aware of the relationship which existed between the Territories and the Republic of South Africa as a result of their geographical position and of the effect which that relationship could have on their political status. However, it felt that the report failed to take account of certain important elements in the present situation. As the Committee was aware, two of the Territories would become independent in a few weeks' time, and they would have to seek a formula for maintaining their independence in the face of serious economic and political problems. As the Committee had already been informed, the United Kingdom would provide those Territories with substantial assistance when they became independent. However, it seemed to her delegation that once the Territories were fully independent States, with Governments elected on the basis of universal adult suffrage and racial equality, those Governments would have the right to obtain as much additional assistance as might be required from whatever source they chose. Accordingly, her delegation would have to reserve its position on the Sub-Committee's report.

446. The representative of Denmark said that, in the view of his delegation, some of the recommendations contained in paragraph 14 of the report, and particularly those contained in sub-paragraph (a), did not take sufficient account of the fact that Basutoland and Bechuanaland were to become independent States in a matter of weeks. His delegation was therefore obliged to reserve its position on the report; however, it did not object to adoption of the report by consensus.

447. The representative of Australia said that, in view of the geographical position of Basutoland and Bechuanaland in relation to South Africa, they would have to establish some sort of modus vivendi with the latter when they became independent in the near future. The United Kingdom representative had put the situation in very clear perspective at the previous meeting. Of particular importance was the information which he had again provided regarding the legislative majority held by the present Government of Basutoland despite the not unusual circumstance that it had polled fewer votes than the opposition, and regarding the situation in Bechuanaland, where the governing party had won 80 per cent of the seats. It should be noted that the elections which had produced those results had been conducted in accordance with the principle of "one man, one vote". His delegation therefore could not accept the implications contained in paragraph 14, sub-paragraph (a) (i) and (ii), of the report.

448. With regard to sub-paragraph (a) (iii), his delegation did not see what the United Kingdom could do in relation to the Territories in question beyond what it had already done and was planning to do.

449. With regard to sub-paragraph (c), he agreed with the United Kingdom representative that it would be unusual—and, indeed, perhaps improper—for the proposed action to be taken without reference to the Governments of the Territories.

450. In conclusion, he noted the Committee's agreement that, despite the anxiety felt with regard to the Territories, the time-table for independence should not be set back. Accordingly, it was his delegation's view that the Governments of the Territories should be given all appropriate assistance in developing their independent existence along whatever lines they themselves sought through democratic processes on the basis of racial equality.

451. His delegation therefore could not support the report as it stood.

Action taken by the Special Committee on the report of the Sub-Committee on Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland

452. At its 467th meeting, on 15 September 1966, the Special Committee adopted the report of the Sub-Committee on Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland¹⁴ by consensus, it being understood that the reservations expressed by members would be reflected in the records of the Special Committee's meetings.

453. In letters dated 20 September 1966, the Chairman of the Special Committee, having regard to section II, paragraph 14, sub-paragraphs (a) and (c) thereof, transmitted the report of the Sub-Committee on Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland to the Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland to the United Nations and to the Administrative Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity.

APPENDIX I

Joint statement issued on 14 June 1966 by the leaders of the Basutoland opposition parties

The joint statement included the following key passages:

"Our two parties which together represent the vast majority of Basotho are prepared to enter fresh elections in coalition to ensure the election of a Government having the confidence of the majority.

"By granting independence to an unpopular minority Government and on terms bitterly opposed by the vast majority of the people, the British Government will in fact be creating a ready-made trouble spot in the very heart of South Africa, a country which for many years has been waiting for that very opportunity.

"We can quite understand that Chief Leabua Jonathan cannot face any new election as his party will suffer inevitable defeat. But the attitude of the British officials is strange, to say the least. It seems the British Government with unwonted speed is determined to hand over the country to a minority Government."

The leaders also warned of "the very unhappy consequences as in Zanzibar" of Britain giving independence under a Government "not representative of the majority of the electorate", and contrasted this with Britain's introduction of proportional representation in British Guiana.

APPENDIX II

Joint statement issued on 15 June 1966 by the leaders of the Basutoland opposition parties

In this joint statement, the leaders gave the reasons for the withdrawal of their parties from the constitutional conference. They said:

"We were not prepared for a conference whose conclusions were agreed in advance between the minority party governing Basutoland and the Colonial officials backed by the Colonial Secretary.

"The role we have been allocated in this conference is that of puppets in a carefully rehearsed pantomime. We are therefore forced to protest in the only way open to us, by dissociating ourselves completely from this travesty.

¹⁴ The recommendations contained in this report appear in appendix III, para. 14.

"Today, in the name of the majority of the Sotho people, we announce that we are unwilling to accept as binding on us any constitution for the independence of Basutoland which is signed between the British Government and Chief Leabua Jonathan's minority Government.

"There can be no certainty that the Basotho will quietly submit to Government under a constitution which not only weakens our traditional institutions but entrenches power at the centre in the hands of a minority Government.

"Britain still has a chance—her last chance—of avoiding the internationalization of this issue, by insisting on the constitutional conference being adjourned, to enable it to be resumed in conditions that allow for the essential unifying process needed to produce a strong, independent nation to emerge and to survive in the cockpit of southern Africa."

APPENDIX III

[A/AC.109/L.326]

Report of the Sub-Committee on Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland

Rapporteur: Mr. Matey KARASIMEONOV (Bulgaria)

INTRODUCTION

1. The Sub-Committee on Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland was established by the Special Committee by the resolution adopted at its 439th meeting on 9 June 1966 (A/AC.109/178). In operative paragraph 2 of that resolution, the Special Committee decided "to establish a sub-committee with a view to studying and suggesting all necessary measures for securing the territorial integrity and sovereignty of the three Territories as requested by the General Assembly in paragraph 5 of its resolution 2063 (XX)".

2. The Chairman of the Special Committee appointed Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Iran, Italy, Mali, Madagascar and Uruguay as members of the Sub-Committee.

3. The Sub-Committee held six meetings between 27 July 1966 and 9 September 1966.

4. At its first meeting, held on 27 July 1966, the Sub-Committee elected Mr. Pedro P. Berro (Uruguay), as Chairman, and Mr. Matey Karasimeonov (Bulgaria), as Rapporteur.

I. CONSIDERATION BY THE SUB-COMMITTEE

5. In considering the question referred to it by the Special Committee, the Sub-Committee took into account the various political and economic factors relevant to the territorial integrity and sovereignty of the Territories, information regarding which is contained in the reports of the Special Committee to the General Assembly at its seventeenth to twentieth sessions^a and in the report of the Secretary-General to the General Assembly at its twentieth session.^b

6. The preliminary observations by members on this question showed that there was a wide area of agreement on the urgency of the problem and the grave necessity for measures to be taken as soon as possible for securing the territorial integrity and sovereignty of the three Territories.

7. All the members of the Sub-Committee shared the view that as Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland were either completely or largely surrounded by the Republic of South Africa there was a real danger that South Africa would in the near future attempt to annex them as it had long intended. Furthermore, past incursions by South African police forces into the Territories without the consent of the local governments had served to underline the ever-present threat to the territorial integrity of the three Territories. Nor was the danger to the three Territories, however, limited to direct annexation. A very serious danger lay in their vulnerability to economic pressures from South Africa which for instance could at any time unilaterally impose restrictions on the transit of persons and goods to and from the Territories.

8. Several members of the Sub-Committee pointed out that, as the administering Power, the United Kingdom was responsible for the economic development of the Territories and for ensuring their attainment of a real independence with governments which were genuinely representative of the will of the people. In the view of some members, the present Governments of the Territories did not enjoy the full confidence of the majority of the people and that these Governments were another factor increasing the Territories' vulnerability to pressures from South Africa. One delegation expressed the view that in its opinion, problems of a constitutional nature were outside the terms of reference of the Sub-Committee set forth in paragraph 4 of the Special Committee's resolution of 9 June 1966 (A/AC.109/178).

9. The majority of the Sub-Committee therefore considers that, in the first instance, it is necessary to reaffirm the United Kingdom's responsibility for the situation in which a constant threat exists to the territorial integrity and political independence of the three Territories. Secondly, as a matter of urgency, the United Nations should again call on the United Kingdom to fulfil its responsibilities under the Charter and General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) to ensure that the independence of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland should be based on the free expression of all inhabitants of the Territories. It was therefore suggested by some members that the United Kingdom should take measures to ensure the establishment of governments fully representative of the wishes of the people, which would be in a better position to resist pressures from South Africa.

10. In the course of its discussion, it became evident to the Sub-Committee that the problem before it had no historical precedent and that while there existed examples of various treaty provisions and declarations guaranteeing territorial integrity and political independence of States, none of these contained all the elements necessary to meet the needs of the three Territories. As two of these Territories will become independent within a few weeks—Basutoland on 4 October 1966 and Bechuanaland on 30 September 1966—the Sub-Committee considers it urgent that the United Nations take measures with a view to ensuring the territorial integrity and political independence of the Territories. Decisions by the General Assembly along those lines would be a logical sequel to the warning it issued in resolution 1817 (XVII) of 18 December 1962, and again in 1954 (XVIII) of 11 December 1963, that "any attempt to annex Basutoland, Bechuanaland or Swaziland, or to encroach on their territorial integrity in any way, will be regarded by the United Nations as an act of aggression violating the Charter of the United Nations".

11. The Sub-Committee also discussed the special problems of the three Territories, including the right of transit of persons and goods, which will affect the territorial integrity and sovereignty of the Territories after independence. It considered that if the Territories were to enjoy real independence it was necessary to ensure that after they had become sovereign States there would be no disruption in transit and trade arrangements. In the Sub-Committee's view, therefore, these should be a matter of concern to the General Assembly.

12. In this connexion, some members of the Sub-Committee recalled that in 1964 the Organization of African Unity (OAU) had also adopted resolutions on the question of the territorial integrity of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland (see annex) in which the Assembly of Heads of State had requested the member States of the OAU to consider the necessary steps to secure a guarantee by the United Nations for the territorial integrity, independence and sovereignty of these Territories. In addition, the Assembly of the Heads of State of the OAU had also authorized the African group at the United Nations to take the necessary measures to bring the question of a guarantee before the appropriate organs of the United Nations. In view of the interest of the OAU, it was suggested in the Sub-Committee that the Special Committee should consult that organization on the problem of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland.

^a Official Records of the General Assembly, Seventeenth Session, Annexes, addendum to agenda item 25, document A/5238, chap. V; ibid., Eighteenth Session, Annexes, addendum to agenda item 23, document A/5446/Rev.1, chap. IX; ibid., Nineteenth Session, Annexes, annex No. 8 (part I), document A/5800/Rev.1, chap. VIII; and ibid., Twentieth Session, Annexes, addendum to agenda item 23, document A/6000/Rev.1, chap. VII.

^b Ibid., Twentieth Session, Annexes, agenda item 23, document A/5958.

13. As to the measures to be taken by the General Assembly, the Sub-Committee considers that, as a first step, it is necessary to draw the attention of the Security Council to the threat to the territorial integrity and sovereignty posed by the policy of the Government of the Republic of South Africa and that an appeal should also be made to all Member States to refrain from any action which would encourage the Government of South Africa in furthering that policy.

II. RECOMMENDATIONS

14. The Sub-Committee recommends the following:

(a) The Sub-Committee makes the following recommendations to the Special Committee:

- i) That it should reaffirm the responsibility of the administering Power, which must take the necessary steps to ensure that the three Territories attain independence in the manner prescribed in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV);
- ii) That it should accordingly urge the administering Power to ensure that the peoples of the three Territories are able to express their desires freely and to choose their representatives and their government freely and democratically;
- (iii) That it should furthermore request the administering Power to take all appropriate action, before the Territories attain independence, to enable the three Territories to enjoy complete independence and to protect their territorial integrity and sovereignty in the face of the unconcealed intentions of the racist régime in the Republic of South Africa to continue interfering in their political, economic and social affairs.

(b) The Sub-Committee recommends that the Special Committee make the following recommendations to the General Assembly:

- (i) That it reiterate its resolutions 1817 (XVII) and 1954 (XVIII) and again solemnly warn the Government of the Republic of South Africa that any attempt to encroach upon the territorial integrity and sovereignty of the three Territories following independence shall be considered by the United Nations to be an act of aggression; and that any interference in their domestic affairs, including their economic affairs, and any hindrance of the movement in transit of persons and goods shall be considered a flagrant violation of the United Nations Charter, with all the attendant consequences;
- (ii) In that regard, that it draw the attention of the Security Council to the threat which the policy pursued by the racist régime of the Republic of South Africa poses to the independence, territorial integrity and sovereignty of the three States upon their attainment of independence;
- (iii) In addition, that it appeal to all States to refrain from any action which might encourage the Government of the Republic of South Africa to encroach upon the territorial integrity and sovereignty of the three States, or to interfere in their domestic affairs.

(c) The Sub-Committee recommends that the Special Committee, through its officers, should consult the Organization of African Unity on the problems of the three Territories, inasmuch as that organization adopted resolutions in 1964 and 1965 instructing African States and the African group in the United Nations to submit to the appropriate bodies of the United Nations the question of guarantees to ensure the territorial integrity, independence and sovereignty of the three States.

(d) Considering that Bechuanaland will attain independence on 30 September and Basutoland on 4 October, the Special Committee should recommend that the General Assembly consider as a matter of priority the item of its agenda relating to the three Territories, instructing the Fourth Committee to discuss the question at the opening of the twenty-first session.

III. ADOPTION OF THE REPORT

15. This report was unanimously adopted by the Sub-Committee at its sixth meeting on 9 September 1966.

Annex

RESOLUTIONS OF THE ORGANIZATION OF AFRICAN UNITY (OAU)

A. Resolution AHG/Res.12 (I). The Territorial Integrity of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland

The Assembly of Heads of State and Government in its first ordinary session in Cairo, United Arab Republic, from 17 July to 21 July 1964,

Having examined the likely situation that would face Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland on attainment of independence,

Noting that the Government of the United Kingdom has agreed to grant independence in the immediate future to these Territories,

Noting further resolution 1954 (XVIII) of the General Assembly of the United Nations solemnly warning the "Government of the Republic of South Africa that any attempt to annex or encroach upon the territorial integrity of these three Territories shall be considered an act of aggression",

1. Requests the Member States of the Organization of African Unity in consultation with the authorities of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland to take the necessary steps so as to secure a guarantee by the United Nations for the territorial integrity, independence and sovereignty of these Territories;

2. Authorises in particular the African group at the United Nations to take necessary measures, in consultation with the Committee of Liberation and the nationalist movements in these Territories, to bring the question of guarantee before the Security Council at the appropriate time.

B. Resolution AHG/Res.36. High Commission Territories, 25 October 1965

The Assembly of Heads of State and Government meeting in its second ordinary session in Accra, Ghana, from 21 to 25 October 1965,

Having examined the report of the Administrative Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity,

Being concerned that parties which have openly declared that they would closely co-operate with the Pretoria régime have assumed control of the governmental machineries in these Territories,

Being desirous to prevent the absorption of these Territories by the Pretoria Government,

1. Reaffirms the various decisions taken by the Organization of African Unity;

2. Takes note with satisfaction of the continuous efforts made by the African Members of the United Nations to secure the application of resolution 1514 (XV) concerning the granting of independence to colonial countries and to encourage them to continue their efforts until complete independence is attained;

3. Decides to continue to support those movements which have so far been supported by the Organization of African Unity;

4. Renews its request to the Member States of the Organization of African Unity to take the necessary steps to secure a guarantee by the United Nations for the territorial integrity, independence and sovereignty of these Territories;

5. Requests once again the African group at the United Nations to take the necessary steps to bring the question of such a guarantee before the appropriate organs of the United Nations.

CHAPTER VIII*

FIJI

A. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE IN 1964 AND BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS TWENTIETH SESSION

1. After considering Fiji at its meetings in October and November 1964, the Special Committee, at its 302nd meeting on 5 November 1964, adopted a resolution in which it requested the administering Power to implement without further delay the provisions of the General Assembly resolutions, and in particular operative paragraph 2 of resolution 1951 (XVIII) which invited the administering Power to work out, together with the representatives of the people of Fiji, a new constitution providing for free elections conducted on the principle of "one man, one vote" and the creation of representative institutions; to take immediate steps for the transfer of all power to the people of the Territory, in accordance with their freely expressed will and desire, without any conditions or reservations; to endeavour, with the co-operation of the people of Fiji, to achieve the political, economic and social integration of the various communities. (A/5800/Rev.1,¹ chap. XIII, para. 119).

2. At its twentieth session, the General Assembly, after considering the parts of the reports of the Special Committee concerning Fiji, adopted resolution 2068 (XX), of 16 December 1965, the text of which reads as follows:

"The General Assembly,

"...

"Recalling its resolutions 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960, 1654 (XVI) of 27 November 1961, 1810 (XVII) of 17 December 1962 and 1951 (XVIII) of 11 December 1963 and the resolution adopted by the Special Committee on 5 November 1964,

"Noting with regret that the administering Power has not yet taken effective measures to implement the resolutions of the General Assembly,

"Taking into account the fact that any further delay in the implementation of those resolutions would create further hardships for the people of the Territory,

"Considering that the constitutional changes contemplated by the administering Power would foment separatist tendencies and stand in the way of the political, economic and social integration of the people as a whole,

"1. Approves the chapters of the reports of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples relating to the Territory of Fiji, and endorses the conclusions and recommendations set forth therein;

"2. Reaffirms the inalienable right of the people of Fiji to freedom and independence in conformity with the provisions of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples

"3. Invites the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, as the administering Power, to implement immediately the resolutions of the General Assembly;

"4. Requests the administering Power to take, as a matter of urgency, measures to repeal all discriminatory laws and to establish an unqualified system of democratic representation based on the principle of 'one man, one vote';

"5. Further requests the administering Power to report to the Special Committee and to the General Assembly on the implementation of the present resolution;

"6. Invites the Special Committee to keep the question under consideration and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its twenty-first session;

"7. Decides to include the question of Fiji in the provisional agenda of its twenty-first session."

B. INFORMATION ON THE TERRITORY²*Introduction*

3. Information on Fiji is contained in reports to the General Assembly at its nineteenth and twentieth sessions (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. XIII; A/6000/Rev.1,³ chap. XII). Supplementary information on recent developments is set out below.

4. At the end of 1964, the total population was estimated to be 456,390, consisting of Fijians (41.5 per cent), Indians (50 per cent), and others (9.5 per cent).

Political and constitutional developmentsFiji's present Constitution

5. An Order-in-Council early in 1963 made provision for a new Constitution for Fiji, including an expanded Legislative Council and an extended franchise. The present Legislative Council consists of a Speaker, up to nineteen official members (the number has, in practice, been reduced to ten), and eighteen unofficial members (six Fijians, six Indians and six Europeans), most of whom are directly elected.

6. A change, not involving any amendment to the Constitution, was effected in July 1964 when a "membership" system of government was introduced. At that time the Executive Council was reconstituted, and it now consists of four official and six unofficial members (two Fijians, two Indians and two Europeans), of whom three are directly associated with the supervision of groups of government departments and with the formulation and presentation of government policy for particular subjects.

Fiji Constitutional Conference

7. As previously reported (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. XII, para. 4), a Constitutional Conference was due to take place in London early in 1965. In April 1965,

² The information presented in this section has been derived from published reports. The information transmitted to the Secretary-General by the United Kingdom under Article 73 e of the Charter, on 9 June 1965, was used in the preparation of the chapter on Fiji in the Special Committee's report to the General Assembly at its twentieth session (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. XII).

³ Official Records of the General Assembly, Twentieth Session, Annexes, addendum to agenda item 23.

* Previously issued under the symbol A/6300/Add.6.

¹ Official Records of the General Assembly, Nineteenth Session, Annexes, annex No. 8 (part 1).

the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies visited Fiji and held discussions with the representatives of the various communities in order to ascertain their views, especially those of the minorities who would not be directly represented at the Constitutional Conference, where participation was to be confined to the eighteen unofficial members of the Legislative Council.

8. In July 1965, the Secretary of State for the Colonies outlined the objectives of the Conference. He suggested that it would need, amongst other things, to consider the development of the membership system; a strengthening and broadening of the elected element in the Legislative Council; and matters affecting the franchise. It would also no doubt wish to consider the adoption of provisions concerning human rights, the Public Service and the judiciary.

9. Before the Conference opened, it was agreed that independence was not an issue to be discussed at the London Conference. It was also agreed that minority communities not at present enfranchised should be brought on the electoral rolls, the principal ones being the Rotumans, the Chinese and other Pacific Islanders.

10. The Fiji Constitutional Conference 1965 was held in London from 26 July to 9 August, and a report containing its recommendations was published on the latter date.

11. The Conference recommended, inter alia, that Fiji should have an elected majority in the Legislative Council; that the practice of having nominated unofficial members should be discontinued and the number of nominated official members should be reduced; that the minority groups in the population (mainly Chinese and immigrants from other Pacific Islands) should be enfranchised, thus achieving full adult suffrage; and that a ministerial system should be introduced.

12. The report noted that during the discussions there were certain matters on which the views of the delegation from Fiji were not unanimous. They were principally: the proposed method of election; the representation of the various communities on the Legislative Council; and the powers of the Executive Council.

13. The report stated that the Indian group wished to replace the existing system of elections on communal rolls with a straight common roll with neither communal qualifications for electors nor communal reservation of seats for candidates. The Fijian and European groups could not agree to the introduction of a system of elections on a common-roll basis at the present stage or in the foreseeable future, and no agreement was reached on when such a system should be introduced.

14. The United Kingdom Government considered that election on a straight common-roll basis was not practicable for Fiji until a greater degree of integration of its communities had been achieved. It considered it important, however, that a system be introduced whereby some members would be both elected by and responsible to voters drawn from all communities. To this end it put forward proposals for a cross-voting system whereby some members would be both elected by, and responsible to, voters drawn from all communities. These proposals were eventually accepted by the Fijian and European groups who emphasized that the proposals would be brought before the communities in Fiji affected by them, through a debate in the Legislative Council. The proposals were not accepted by the Indian group—except partially, by one Indian delegate, who would have preferred the adoption of elections on a common-roll basis, but was prepared to accept the proposals in so far as they related to the method of election. When it became clear that their proposal for full common-roll elections was not acceptable, the Indian group offered an alternative which would increase the number of members elected under the system of cross-voting. This was not accepted by the Fijian and European groups. The Indian group then indicated that in these circumstances they would wish to take their stand on full common-roll elections.

15. The Indian group unanimously rejected the proposal that there should be two more Fijian members than Indian members in the Legislative Council. They considered that, as the Indians constituted a majority of the population, they were entitled to at least parity of representation with the Fijian community.

16. In the discussions on the provisions of the Constitution dealing with executive powers, the Indian group, with one dissident, considered that the stage had been reached where full internal self-government should be introduced forthwith. The remainder of the Fiji delegation considered that it was still necessary for the Governor to retain a substantial measure of discretionary power.

Legislative Council

17. The Conference recommended that the Legislative Council should comprise thirty-six elected members together with not more than four official members nominated by the Governor. Non-official members would consist of the following: fourteen Fijians: nine elected on the Fijian communal roll, two elected by the Fijian Council of Chiefs, three elected according to a new cross-voting system; twelve Indians: nine elected on the Indian communal roll, three elected by the cross-voting system; ten Europeans: seven elected on a communal roll, three elected by the cross-voting system.

18. The communal roll for Fijians would also include Rotumans and other Pacific Islanders. Chinese and any other minority communities formerly not entitled to vote would be included on the communal roll with Europeans. For the election of the nine members by the cross-voting system, Fiji would be divided into three constituencies, each returning one Fijian (or Rotuman or other Pacific Islander), one Indian and one European (or Chinese or member of another minority group), each member being elected by persons of all communities. The Conference abolished some qualifications and disqualifications concerning candidates and electors. These included the requirements relating to property or income for candidates and the literacy tests for voters. A non-voting Speaker would be elected by the Legislative Council either from within the Council or from persons qualified to be elected to the Council. The Council would also be empowered to appoint a Deputy Speaker from among its members. The maximum life of the Council would be five years.

19. Subject to the restrictions imposed by the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, and by any provisions of the Constitution itself, such as a Bill of Rights, the Constitution would give the Legislative Council full power to make laws on any subject. There would be a provision to prevent bills from being introduced without the consent of the Governor if their effect would be to impose taxes or to increase expenditure or alter terms and conditions of service of public officers. The Governor would have power to refuse assent, to reserve legislation, and to ensure that bills were passed by certification. Certain subjects specified by reference to particular laws would be dealt with by special procedure in the Legislative Council. Under this procedure, bills affecting the laws concerned would require the support of more than two thirds of all the elected members of the Legislative Council. A similar requirement would apply to any resolution, the effect of which would be to recommend any change in the Constitution.

Executive Council

20. The Conference recommended that executive authority should remain formally vested in the Governor, who would continue to appoint the unofficial members of the Executive Council. These would be drawn from among the elected members of the Legislative Council, and the Governor would ensure appropriate representation of the various communities in Fiji. The Constitution would provide that at the appropriate time, the Governor might appoint members of the Executive Council to be ministers with executive powers, and at that time the Executive Council would become a Council of Ministers.

21. The Governor would be required to consult the Executive Council and, in general, to accept its advice, except when he considered it necessary to act against this in the interests of public order, public faith or good government. Certain subjects, including defence, external affairs, internal security and public service, would be reserved to the Governor.

22. Recommendations were also made for the establishment of a Supreme Court and a Court of Appeal; for the setting up of an advisory Judicial and Legal Service Commission, Public Service Commission and Police Service Commission; and for a Bill of Rights to be included in the Constitution.

Legislative action on constitutional proposals

23. On 16 December 1965, the proposals were approved by the Fiji Legislative Council by a vote of 12 to 5, with 7 abstentions. Official members did not take part in the debate and abstained in the vote. The new Constitution is expected to be brought into force during 1966.

Elections

24. A general election for the new Legislative Council (see para. 17 above) is to be held in Fiji in the fall of 1966. This will be on the basis of universal adult suffrage. It is estimated that about 182,500 persons will be eligible to enrol as voters. There were 94,000 persons registered in the 1963 election when women voted for the first time. The election will shorten the life of the current Legislative Council by two years, whose unofficial members were elected in 1963 for five-year terms.

Political parties

25. The Fijian community in Fiji has three political parties: the Fijian Association, the Fijian Democratic Party and the Fijian Advancement Party. The main party, the Fijian Association, was formed in the late 1950s. No information is available concerning the size of its membership. The Fijian Democratic Party is approximately three years old and claims to have about 4,000 "financial" members. The Fijian Advancement Party was formed in 1965, but no further information is available concerning it.

26. The Indian community in Fiji has a number of political parties or groupings which include the Federation Party, the National Congress Party, the Fijian Western Democratic Party, the Fiji Minority Party and the All-Fiji Muslim Political Front. The largest party is the Federation Party. Although information is not available concerning its present membership, its members held four seats in the Legislative Council in 1965. These were directed by the party in April 1965 not to hold any discussions on constitutional matters with other members of the Legislative Council in Fiji, but "to make all such representations and submissions which they may think fit and proper in their absolute discretion on all matters to be discussed" at the London Conference. The party, inter alia, advocates a common roll and is opposed to a communal roll in Fiji.

27. The National Congress Party was formed in 1964. It is reported to be in opposition to the Federation Party. In a memorandum issued in 1964, it declared that the United Kingdom Government should give Fiji internal self-government without delay. No information is available concerning the size of its membership.

28. The formation of the Fijian Western Democratic Party was noted in 1963.⁴ No recent information is available concerning it.

29. The Fiji Minority Party, in a memorandum to the United Kingdom Secretary of State for the Colonies, supported separate representation for Muslims in the Legislative Council and retention "for the time being" of communal electoral rolls. After the London Conference, the party is reported to have considered the latter a victory for reason and co-operation and to have urged Muslims to accept the new Constitution for Fiji and to give it their undivided loyalty and support. Information is not available concerning the membership of the party.

30. At the end of 1965, a new political party was formed calling itself the All-Fiji Muslim Political Front. Membership in the party is open to all Muslims in Fiji. The party is reported to be in opposition to the terms of the new Constitution which discontinues the practice whereby the Governor nominated a Muslim representative to the Legislature. In a resolution passed in December 1965, it called on Muslims generally to refrain from enrolling on the Indian communal roll and to protest to the United Kingdom Government through the Governor of Fiji on behalf of the Muslims of Fiji that their rights and interests be protected and recognized as distinct from that of the Indian community of Fiji, and that constitutional provision be made to entrench an electoral system guaranteeing Muslim representation in Fiji's Legislature.

C. CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE⁵

Introduction

31. The Special Committee considered the question of Fiji at its 410th, 412th, 413th, 461st, 462nd, 463rd, ⁴ Ibid., Eighteenth Session, Annexes, addendum to agenda item 23, document A/5446/Rev.1, chap. VII, para. 19.

⁵ The following petition was circulated after the Special Committee had adopted a resolution concerning Fiji (see para. 120 below) at its 463rd meeting on 7 September 1966: Mr. A. Razaak, Secretary, Fiji Muslim Political Organization (A/AC.109/PET.599).

469th and 483rd meetings between 6 May and 30 November 1966.

General statements by members

32. The representative of the United Kingdom said that there was not a great deal to add to his delegation's statements on Fiji in the Fourth Committee in November 1965.⁶ On that occasion, the United Kingdom delegation had described the decisions taken at the Constitutional Conference held in July and August 1965, which were briefly summarized in the Secretariat working paper (see paras. 7-16 above). The agreed objectives of the Conference had been to evolve a constitutional framework for Fiji which would preserve a continuing link with the United Kingdom and within which further progress could be made towards internal self-government. Under the new arrangements, there would be universal suffrage. Almost all members of the Legislative Council would be elected and there would be more elected representatives for each of the three main communities in Fiji. The Indian community would have the same proportion of the total membership as before. The Fijian community would have proportionately more seats than before, at the expense of the Europeans, to take account of new voters who would vote on the Fijian roll. A very important innovation from the point of view of Fiji's future political development was that an element of the membership of the Legislative Council would for the first time be elected by all three communities. The object was to encourage the emergence of political leaders appealing to all sectors of the population and not to any single community. Experience elsewhere had shown that such a system could be very effective in bridging divisions between different communities and promoting a single national loyalty. It was the declared purpose of the United Kingdom Government to help achieve that goal in Fiji. Lastly, the new constitution would include a bill of rights and provisions to make possible the introduction of a ministerial system.

33. Those new electoral measures went further than the Fijian and European representatives at the Conference would have wished and not as far as the Indian representatives had wanted. The Fijians and Europeans had recognized that elections with a straight common roll, as proposed by the Indian representatives, were a desirable long-term objective but had not been able to agree to the introduction of such a system at that stage or in the foreseeable future. In view of those conflicting attitudes, it should be clear that the decisions of the United Kingdom Government at the Conference, taken after the fullest discussion and most earnest thought, were steps in the direction advocated by the great majority in the United Nations and in the Special Committee. The decisions did not represent a victory for any one group of the Fijian people over any other. The constant aim of the United Kingdom had been to encourage co-operation and trust among all the people, whatever their ethnic origin. The decisions of the Conference were designed to help achieve that aim, while maintaining progress in the direction of internal self-government.

34. The necessary steps were being taken to implement the decisions of the Conference. The Order-in-Council to enable elections to be held had been promulgated at the end of November 1965 and the new electoral regulations had been published the following month. The registration of electors had taken place during the first four months of 1966 and about 84 per cent of the potential electorate had been registered. The provisional electoral rolls were being prepared on the basis of that registration and would be ready for publication later in the summer. There would then be a period for decisions on any objections which might be raised to the rolls, which would then be published in final form. The existing Legislative Council was to be dissolved towards the end of August 1966; 12 August would be the nomination day for candidates for the new Council; polling would take place from 26 September to 8 October and the new Legislature was due to meet early in the following month.

35. There was no disagreement in the Special Committee about aims and objectives. All recognized that the different communities in Fiji—which had separate cultures, different ways of life and a good deal of mutual mistrust—must be encouraged to co-operate in an atmosphere of trust and harmony. All agreed that the process of healing divisions must be carried forward with continued constitutional advance towards more representative and responsible government in Fiji. If there was disagreement, it was only over the best ways of achieving those goals. In the opinion of the United Kingdom Government, a moderate course was most likely to succeed: the permanence of divisions and safeguards should not be accepted but nor should the pace be forced to the point of arousing more fears. In September 1965, the then United Kingdom Colonial Secretary had declared that co-operation in the new constitution would lead to political integration and racial harmony and show that interracial voting did not adversely affect the interests of any race.

36. He hoped that, in the Committee's discussions, there would be a wide measure of agreement on the nature of the situation and the direction in which it should be encouraged to develop. If the Committee was to play the positive role for which it had been established and to serve the true interests of the people of Fiji, it should define the extent of common agreement and the common goals, and endorse the aims and directions he had just described.

37. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that, judging by the statement of the United Kingdom representative (see paras. 32-36 above), the situation in Fiji, as far as decolonization was concerned, remained virtually unchanged. The representative of the administering Power had claimed that steps could not be taken to implement General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) and 1591 (XVIII) until full integration of the various communities had been achieved. It was, however, the United Kingdom Government itself that was seeking to accentuate communal separation by the introduction of communal representation. If there was "mutual mistrust" among the people of Fiji, it was the administering Power that had brought it about. The United Kingdom representative should not, therefore, imagine that his views could command the collective endorsement of the Special Committee.

38. In General Assembly resolution 1951 (XVIII), the administering Power was invited "... to achieve the political, economic and social integration of the various communities". Yet the system of tripartite representation would encourage rather than diminish disunity, exemplifying the colonialist maxim of "divide and rule". The administering Power was seeking to accentuate the ethnic origin of the various sections of the population. Of the so-called Indian community, however, 92 per cent had been born in the Territory. They were thus as much indigenous inhabitants of Fiji as any other group. The purpose of such distinctions was to ensure that the European minority, comprising less than 9 per cent of the population, was enabled to continue its exploitation of the resources of Fiji. The example of Southern Rhodesia was still fresh in the Committee's mind.

⁶ Official Records of the General Assembly, Twentieth Session, Fourth Committee, 1558th and 1570th meetings.

39. The United Kingdom representative had suggested that the Special Committee should seek the highest common denominator. The highest common denominator among freedom-loving nations was to be found in the pertinent resolutions of the General Assembly. If the administering Power would apply the principles there enshrined, a free Fiji would arise.

40. The representative of India said that the statement of the representative of the United Kingdom did not add materially to the description of the situation in Fiji and had avoided altogether the responsibility of the administering Power to report on the implementation of the resolutions of the General Assembly. He quoted from a statement of the Secretary-General of the United Nations which, while praising the achievements of the United Kingdom in the field of decolonization, also pointed out the exceptions like Southern Rhodesia which dimmed this record. While agreeing generally with this assessment, his delegation considered that events in Fiji also were a disturbing element which tarnished the record of the administering Power. The lack of any constitutional progress in Fiji, and the apparent determination of the administering Power to avoid its responsibilities under the various resolutions of the General Assembly, constituted—like the situation in Southern Rhodesia—an unhappy exception to the otherwise commendable record of the United Kingdom in the field of decolonization. The recent statements by the United Kingdom representative in the Special Committee showed that the administering Power was unwilling and had failed to implement the provisions of Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV), 1951 (XVIII) and 2068 (XX). It was this essential and crucial failure which prevented the administering Power from making a full and complete statement on the situation in Fiji.

41. In resolution 1951 (XVIII), the administering Power had been invited to work out a new constitution providing for free elections conducted on the principle of "one man, one vote" and the creation of representative institutions. Instead, even after three years, the administering Power had introduced an electoral system which divided the people of Fiji on communal and racial lines and provided certain entrenched interests, particularly the Europeans, with greater voting powers than the rest of the population—a system reminiscent of that introduced in Southern Rhodesia, and which had enabled the white racist minority to seize power illegally, at the expense of the majority. Hitherto, the Europeans in Fiji had governed in the most absolutist manner. After the so-called electoral reforms, which purported to introduce limited internal self-government, the Europeans and their racial allies, who constituted about 4 per cent of the total population, would hold as many as 30 per cent of the elected seats in the Legislative Council, whereas more than 50 per cent of the population would hold just twelve seats. Again, the complicated cross-voting system was reminiscent of a similar feature in the 1961 Constitution of Southern Rhodesia. Thus the "reforms" were an all too familiar stratagem to perpetuate European minority rule through constitutional devices.

42. The representative of the administering Power had made much of the "conflicting attitudes" of the Fijian and Indian communities—from which the Europeans, as the master community, stood aloof. As the Tanzanian representative had pointed out, however, all the inhabitants of Fiji, irrespective of their racial origins, were Fijians. Thus, it was not proper to refer to the people of Indian origin living in Fiji as the "Indian community". They were Indian only in the sense that their ancestors had been brought to Fiji from the Indian subcontinent, to work there as indentured labour on the European-owned plantations. It was typical of colonial policy that Europeans settling in Rhodesia became Rhodesian, while persons of Indian origin going to Fiji remained Indians. Use of the term "Indian community" was designed to stir up communal hatred, which happily did not exist at the roots.

43. The General Assembly had also invited the administering Power to create representative institutions. The restricted internal self-government granted to a clearly unrepresentative and impotent Legislative Council could scarcely be considered "representative institutions" within the meaning of resolution 1514 (XV). Not only had the people of Fiji neither the shadow nor the substance of real democratic control; the administering Power had announced that there was no possibility of any such developments in the foreseeable future.

44. In the same resolution, the General Assembly had invited the administering Power to endeavour to achieve the political, economic and social integration of the various communities. The scanty information supplied by the administering Power showed that very little had been done in that all-important field. On the contrary, much had been done to divide the people of Fiji on communal and racial lines. That policy, which was nothing new in the history of British colonial administration, could be summed up by the maxim "divide and rule". Wherever the United Kingdom had reluctantly given up control, it had deliberately planted discord to create future difficulties for the newly independent States. It was no accident that, as the Secretary-General had pointed out, all the current peace-keeping operations pertained to problems arising from the process of British decolonization. Yet the administering Power, while applying those time-worn methods to the people of Fiji, wished the Special Committee to believe that the apparatus of division created in the Territory was designed to encourage co-operation and trust among all the people, whatever their ethnic origin, and that experience had shown that such a system could be very effective in bridging divisions between different communities and promoting the growth of national unity. The truth was that such communal differences as did exist had been artificially created and sustained by the administering Power, which was exploiting the tensions thus created in order to cling to its dominions. The history of British colonialism was littered with the experience of broken nations and artificially divided peoples. In Fiji also, the administering Power had created educational institutions and governmental organs based on communal and racial doctrines. In this connexion he referred to the statements of the representative of Chile in 1963 to the Special Committee and of the representative of Ceylon to the Fourth Committee at the twentieth session of the General Assembly.

45. The best way of ascertaining the facts would be for the Special Committee, or one of its subcommittees, to visit the Territory and hold conversations with the rulers and the ruled at all levels. If the administering Power was sincere in wishing the Committee to learn the facts, it should have no objection to such a visit. His delegation, for one, would abide by the findings of such a visiting mission.

46. The Special Committee's report to the General Assembly on the question of Fiji might perhaps be delayed until after the return of the visiting mission. The Committee might also accede to the request of the United Kingdom representative for longer notice of the Committee's intention to report to the General Assembly on the implementation of resolution 2068 (XX), so that the administering Power could arrange for people with special knowledge of the Territory to participate in the Committee's discussions; the Committee might accordingly take the matter up again after its return from Africa.

47. In conclusion, he stressed that there was no agreement between the Special Committee and the administering Power in the basic assessment of the situation in Fiji. If the Special Committee was indeed to "serve the true interests of the people", it should refuse to condone the administering Power's failure to implement the pertinent resolutions of the General Assembly or endorse the reactionary colonial policy, but should recommend measures for the speedy and complete implementation of resolution 1514 (XV).

48. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that his delegation's attitude towards the question of Fiji reflected its policy of universal support for peoples fighting for freedom and independence. An objective analysis of the situation in Fiji showed that the administering Power was resorting to all kinds of manoeuvres in order to thwart the implementation of the relevant United Nations resolutions.

49. Contrary to the assertions of the representative of the administering Power, an electoral system based on communal rolls and cross-voting did not guarantee equal suffrage or follow the democratic principle of "one man, one vote" and ignored the requests of the General Assembly in that regard. The Constitutional Conference, convened almost five years after the adoption of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, had completely disregarded the purposes and principles of that Declaration and the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly. As stated in the Secretariat working paper (see para. 9 above), it had been agreed "that independence was not an issue to be discussed at the London Conference". Since the aims of the Conference were limited, it could not yield any positive results.

50. The Conference had made the representation of the various communities even more unequal. For example, it had recommended that the Legislative Council should include twelve elected Indians and ten elected Europeans, although Fijians of Indian origin constituted 50 per cent of the population and Europeans only 9.5 per cent. It could thus be seen that the aim of the so-called "constitutional progress" was to give the European voter an advantage over other voters and help him to preserve the interests of the European minority in Fiji. The system of cross-voting, whereby an equal number of seats on the Legislative Council was allocated to communities of differing sizes; was also designed to protect the interests of the European minority. Such an inequitable system of suffrage and representation actually increased the political differences among the communities. The only possible conclusion to be drawn was that the Legislative Council was not elected on a democratic basis, as required by the United Nations resolutions on the question of Fiji.

51. The powers of the Legislative Council, as described in paragraph 19 above, were clearly inadequate and the United Kingdom Governor was all-powerful in legislative matters.

52. The Conference had recommended that executive authority should remain formally vested in the Governor, who would continue to appoint the unofficial members of the Executive Council. In addition, the Governor could refuse the advice of the Executive Council if such a refusal was "in the interests of public order, public faith or good government". Thus he also had unlimited executive power.

53. The administering Power was therefore quite wrong to ascribe any positive significance to the Constitutional Conference, which had done nothing to enable the people of the islands to exercise their right to freedom and independence in accordance with the provisions of the Declaration. It was no coincidence that in resolution 2068 (XX) the General Assembly had requested the administering Power to take, as a matter of urgency, measures to repeal all discriminatory laws and to establish an unqualified system of democratic representation based on the principle of "one man, one vote" and had invited it to implement immediately the resolutions of the General Assembly. By a bitter irony of fate, on 16 December 1965—the date of the adoption of that General Assembly resolution—the recommendations of the Constitutional Conference on Fiji had been approved.

54. The economy of Fiji was characterized by the dominance of foreign monopolies which, having seized key positions, were continuing to plunder the natural resources and mercilessly exploit the people of the Territory. It was the policies of those monopolies which had produced the one-sided agrarian economy of Fiji. All profit from the Territory's minerals went into the coffers of the foreign monopolies—mainly United Kingdom, United States of America, Australian and New Zealand companies. The large plantations were owned by United Kingdom and other companies, the most important of which were the Colonial Sugar Refinery, the Copra Board and the Banana Board. As a result, the population's level of living remained very low. Workers earned only £3 to £3.5s. a week, with a working day of ten to twelve hours. There was no system of social insurance in the colony and educational and health services were in a sorry state.

55. The system of land tenure had made the agrarian problem one of the most burning issues in Fiji and was acquiring increasing political overtones. Most of the land was in the hands either of landowners, who rented it at high prices, or of the powerful foreign companies. Those who worked directly on the land were forced to rent it on exceedingly unfavourable terms. As a result, less than 10 per cent of the land was being used for agriculture, although as much as 72 per cent of the land could be made arable. Since the European sector of the population and particularly the monopolies owned about 375,000 acres of land, the colonial authorities were doing nothing to solve the land problem or to allot land to those who worked it. Both the indigenous Fijians and the Fijians of Indian origin were interested in the speedy solution of that problem. By creating artificial obstacles to a solution, the administering Power was trying to cause new friction between the communities in order to maintain its supremacy in the archipelago. Only a just solution of the agrarian problem would enable the people of Fiji to develop the islands in the interest of the entire population and to fight against the influence of the foreign monopolies. Any delay in that respect would greatly harm the interests of the people of Fiji as a whole and the administering Power would have to bear the responsibility.

56. The colonial Powers had recently come to appreciate still more the value of the Territory. Fiji was of strategic significance, since it was situated at the cross-roads of the transport network in the southern part of the Pacific Ocean. It had well-equipped harbours and first-class airports, which were attracting the attention of the aggressors waging a bloody war against the national liberation movement in South-East Asia.

57. None of the measures recommended by the General Assembly had been implemented by the administering Power. The Special Committee should condemn the attitude of that Power as a violation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence and of subsequent decisions of the General Assembly on the question of Fiji. It should request the administering Power unconditionally to implement all the United Nations recommendations and thus enable the people of Fiji to exercise their inalienable right to freedom and independence.

58. The representative of Sierra Leone recalled that on 5 November 1964 the Special Committee had adopted a resolution on Fiji inviting the administering Power to implement, inter alia, General Assembly resolution 1951 (XVIII), which invited it to work out a new constitution providing for free elections on the principle of "one man, one vote" and the creation of representative institutions, to take immediate steps for the unconditional transfer of all power to the people of the Territory and to endeavour to achieve the political, economic and social integration of the various communities. General Assembly resolution 2068 (XX) had further requested the administering Power to take, as a matter of urgency, measures to repeal all discriminatory laws and to establish an unqualified system of democratic representation based on the principle of "one man, one vote". The administering Power had not stated whether all discriminatory laws had now been repealed.

59. Although the Constitutional Conference held in 1965 had accepted the principle of "one man, one vote", it was regrettable that it had been decided before the Conference that independence was not an issue to be discussed. The fact that all adults in Fiji, regardless of background, were to be enfranchised represented some progress, but that advance was diluted by the fact that there would still be official members nominated by the Governor in both the Legislative Council and the Executive Council. The Sierra Leone delegation would have liked the elections which were to take place later in the year to produce a completely representative Legislative Council, without the four official members nominated by the Governor, and the Council of Ministers, which was later to replace the Executive Council, to be chosen by the elected members themselves rather than by the Governor.

60. In his statement (see paras. 32-36 above), the United Kingdom representative had referred to the divisions between the different communities in Fiji, and had seemed to imply that the unification of the communities could proceed only at a snail's pace. He himself would have appreciated further information on the "racial disharmony" and "mutual mistrust" which allegedly prevailed in Fiji.

61. The objectives towards which the administering power should work were quite clear: namely, the speedy implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), with particular reference to the provisions of resolution 1951 (XVIII).

62. Three principles had guided the Special Committee's approach to colonial questions: the granting of universal adult suffrage, the affirmation of the indigenous peoples' rights and the adoption of all necessary measures to grant freedom and independence at an early date. Those same principles should guide the Special Committee in the question of Fiji and genuine efforts should be made to overcome any communal divisions and to speed up the process of independence, rather than hampering it by allowing the Governor to place men of his choice in the Legislative Council and the Executive Council. Every effort should be made to unify the population of the Territory, by political, social and educational means, and constitutional barriers to democratic representation should be removed.

63. The representative of the United Kingdom, replying to points raised during the debate, said that he had to reject the entirely false argument advanced by the representatives of Tanzania, India and the Soviet Union that the United Kingdom Government was encouraging communal differences in Fiji for various selfish motives. The truth was precisely the opposite: every endeavour of the United Kingdom Government was directed towards bringing the communities together on a sound basis and preparing a political and constitutional structure which would enable them to live and progress in harmony. The differences between the Indian and the indigenous Fijian communities were a feature of the situation which no administering Power could ignore in preparing the island for constitutional advance. If what he had said earlier about the racial disharmony was insufficient, the detailed information requested by the representative of Sierra Leone was to be found in the working papers for the present and previous years. The United Kingdom Government could not disregard the plain facts of the situation, nor should the Special Committee.

64. With regard to the constitutional position, he had already explained the new system of cross-voting for nine of the thirty-six seats in the Legislative Council. That innovation was an important step towards racial harmony and a unified electoral system and would not accentuate communal divisions, as had been suggested. On the contrary, nothing was more certain to exacerbate communal divisions than the immediate adoption of a single common roll, as had been proposed by the Indian and Tanzanian representatives. Any anomalies in the representation of the different communities did not result in the domination of any one community over the others. The United Kingdom's policy of working towards political integration by encouraging co-operation and trust between the communities was obviously the right one and his Government intended to pursue it. With the help of all those concerned in Fiji and the goodwill of all those outside Fiji, progress could be made; conversely, partisanship, obstruction and ill will could only be harmful.

65. The allegation that the administering Power was pursuing a policy of "divide and rule" in order to exploit the islands' resources was totally unfounded; on the contrary, its policy was to unite the communities and help them to live together in peace. As for the motives attributed to it, he could only say that the aid and assistance which it willingly provided to Fiji far outweighed any benefit which it might receive from trade or investment in the Territory. Far from exploiting Fiji, commercial firms performed an essential service and were welcomed by all the communities; indeed, it was difficult to imagine the economy of Fiji without them.

66. The representative of the Soviet Union had made the curious allegation that Fiji was of some sinister strategic significance to the United Kingdom Government. Certainly the island possessed a good airport and good harbours, of which the representative of the Soviet Union would surely not disapprove, but the United Kingdom had no troops, no naval ships, no military aircraft, bases or installations of any kind in Fiji. The Soviet Union representative had also reversed his usual line by suggesting that, by failing to develop mineral resources and by encouraging the development of agriculture, foreign interests had somehow exploited the people. The fact was that both agriculture and mining were being developed for the benefit of all the people of the islands and the gold exports were a valuable contribution to foreign exchange earnings.

67. He wished to assure the Indian representative that there was no ulterior motive of any sort behind the use of the term "Indian community" to describe that part of the population which was of Indian origin; unfortunately, there was no term which described an inhabitant of Fiji without at the same time describing his ethnic origin. The United Kingdom's objective was to promote political and constitutional progress as rapidly as possible, in order to diminish such emphasis on ethnic origin.

68. The Indian representative had been mistaken in stating that the administering Power had announced that there was no possibility of any "democratic control" in the foreseeable future; the United Kingdom Government's objective was the exact opposite of that. Nor had the United Kingdom announced that it did not intend to accelerate the process of granting freedom and independence to the people of Fiji, that interpretation of the United Kingdom Government's policies was quite unacceptable.

69. The Indian representative's use of the slogan "divide and rule" was completely inapplicable to present or past United Kingdom policies; there were many countries formerly under United Kingdom administration, of which India was one, which clearly demonstrated that different communities could and did live side by side in harmony. The United Nations, and in particular the Special Committee, should look to those as examples to emulate rather than to the few exceptions.

70. The United Kingdom Government's policy was clear, firm and consistent. It was a policy of encouraging co-operation and removing obstacles to trust between the different communities. It was incumbent on those who accused the United Kingdom of secretly pursuing the opposite policy to suggest some credible reason why that should be so. The United Kingdom's objectives in Fiji could not be achieved overnight, but they were clearly defined as progress in the direction of self-government, together with political integration and harmony.

71. The representative of India said that he was glad that the United Kingdom representative had admitted the existence of anomalies in the representation of the various communities; that was the crux of the whole problem. He therefore felt justified in stating that it was the United Kingdom policy to encourage communal differences where they had not existed and to magnify and exploit them where they did.

72. The United Kingdom representative's statement had placed an unfortunate emphasis on communal differences rather than on constitutional reform. The system of cross-voting, which supposedly encouraged communal harmony and would ultimately lead to a unified nation, was not new and had been introduced in other Territories under United Kingdom administration. The United Nations experience of that system in other Territories had not been happy and there was no indication that it would be any different in Fiji. Furthermore, he could not accept the United Kingdom representative's implication that it was wrong to advocate a single electoral roll, since the straightforward principle of "one man, one vote" was the demand, not merely of India alone, but of practically all Members of the United Nations.

73. Because of its appreciation of the commendable record of the United Kingdom in the field of decolonization, the Indian delegation had been reluctant to use the term "divide and rule", but unfortunately past history, including that of his own country, testified to the fact that the United Kingdom had followed a policy of encouraging and exploiting differences between communities in almost all its Territories. With regard to the terms used to describe the various communities in Fiji, he was aware of the unfortunate fact that there was no other way of describing them, but the United Kingdom representative must surely know who was responsible for that fact.

74. With regard to the United Kingdom representative's rejection of his statement that the United Kingdom Government had announced that there was no possibility of democratic control in the foreseeable future, he referred the Committee to the United Kingdom representative's first statement (paras. 32-36 above).

75. If the United Kingdom was really sincere in its belief that communal differences in Fiji had existed from time immemorial, that it was doing its best to promote communal harmony in the islands and that the introduction of an electoral system on the straightforward basis of "one man, one vote" would have disastrous consequences for the people, then it should agree to a United Nations visiting mission, which would consult representatives of all the communities in Fiji and report its findings to the United Nations. India would be prepared to accept the findings of such an impartial body and he hoped that the United Kingdom Government, too, would agree to do so, since that might be the only means of satisfying the United Nations that its policies were for the good of the people of Fiji. Unfortunately, there were indications that the United Kingdom Government would not agree to any visiting mission; that refusal spoke for itself.

76. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that his delegation continued to hold the views it had expressed at the previous meeting, since they were based on well-known facts which the United Kingdom representative had not even tried to deny in his statement at the present meeting.

77. His delegation could not regard the United Kingdom statement otherwise than as an attempt to distract the Committee's attention from the main question, namely, how the administering Power was implementing the General Assembly resolutions on the question of Fiji.

78. The United Kingdom representative had tried to give the impression that only he was right and all others who had spoken on the question of Fiji were wrong. It was clear, however, from the proceedings of the General Assembly at its twentieth session that other delegations considered that the administering Powers, particularly the United Kingdom, were resorting to various subterfuges to avoid implementing the Declaration on the Granting of Independence and other General Assembly resolutions on the question of Fiji.

79. If all was well in Fiji, he wondered why the United Kingdom representative did not invite the Committee to send a visiting mission to the Territory to see for itself the political, economic and social conditions prevailing there.

80. The representative of the United Kingdom said that the Indian representative's remarks seemed to be a mere repetition of the earlier Indian statement; a careful reading of the United Kingdom statement might convince the Indian representative that the two countries' objectives in the matter were identical. The Indian accusation that the United Kingdom Government was exploiting communal differences in Fiji to its own advantage was groundless, since the United Kingdom did not and could not derive any advantage from those differences.

81. As for the Soviet Union representative's remark that the United Kingdom seemed to say that it was right and everyone else was wrong, he had studied the three statements made at the 412th meeting of the Special Committee but had failed to find one fact that could support the arguments against the United Kingdom.

82. The United Kingdom was trying to move in a direction which fell within the points of view of two communities which themselves were not going in opposite directions. His Government's aim was to bring those two communities together in the same direction, and he was convinced that the Committee, on reflection, would consider that direction the right one.

83. The representative of Bulgaria expressed regret that the United Kingdom had not complied with General Assembly resolution 2068 (XX), particularly operative paragraph 4 requesting it to take measures to repeal all discriminatory laws and establish an unqualified system of democratic representation based on the principle of "one man, one vote". The Assembly had found it necessary to make that recommendation because the results of the Constitutional Conference held in the summer of 1965 had been diametrically opposed to all its resolutions on the subject and, in particular, operative paragraph 2 of resolution 1951

(XVIII). The question of the independence of the people of Fiji, as affirmed in operative paragraph 1 of resolution 1951 (XVIII), had been expressly excluded from the agenda of the Conference, and mention not only of independence but even of any idea of internal self-government had been prohibited. The purpose of the Conference and of the recommendations adopted by the participants had been, not to open the way to independence, but simply to make certain adjustments in the United Kingdom colonial system. The participants representing the people of Fiji had been designated on the basis of the old legislative system which favoured one community at the expense of the others and which it was the very purpose of the Conference to amend.

84. The electoral system worked out at the Conference, in violation of the General Assembly's recommendations, divided the population on the basis of community and race and gave the Europeans, who constituted 4 per cent of the population, 30 per cent of the elected seats in the Legislative Council, while the official members to be appointed by the administering Power would also be Europeans. As in Southern Rhodesia and elsewhere, the administering Power had but one goal: to perpetuate political and economic domination by the white minority. The experience of South Africa and Southern Rhodesia had demonstrated that in such cases the European minorities had the same interests as the metropolitan country and that the latter could use those minorities to exploit the wealth of the countries concerned for its own strategic and other purposes. His delegation could not accept the statement made by the United Kingdom representative at the 410th meeting to the effect that there was no disagreement between the administering Power and other members of the Committee about aims and objectives; the disagreement between them was very considerable and it would persist until the United Kingdom applied the relevant recommendations of the General Assembly, in particular that concerning the principle of "one man, one vote".

85. As the information which the Committee had received about the Territory so far had come almost entirely from the administering Power, he supported the suggestion made by the Indian representative that the possibility of sending a visiting mission to the Territory should be considered.

86. The representative of the Syrian Arab Republic observed that Fiji was one of those Territories on which the United Nations had taken an unequivocal stand in accordance with the provisions of that milestone in contemporary international relations, General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). Yet the administering Power arrogated to itself the right to administer the Territory as it saw fit, regardless of the wishes of the United Nations. The situation raised many fundamental issues, not the least of which was the question how far a Member State—particularly a great Power which had taken an active part in founding the United Nations, had adhered voluntarily to its principles and had pledged without reservation that it would fulfil its obligations—could go in ignoring decisions taken by the world body. Resolution 2068 (XX) had not appointed the administering Power to mediate alleged communal differences in Fiji but had called upon it to repeal all discriminatory laws and establish an unqualified system of democratic institutions based on the principle of "one man, one vote". An unqualified system of democratic representation was urgently needed, not the appointment of an omnipotent foreign Governor holding executive power, appointing members of the so-called Executive Council as he saw fit and having authority to dismiss that Council whenever, in his sole judgement, it acted against the interests of public order, public faith or good government. The Committee would recall that, in a case which was still before it, innocent people had been imprisoned in the name of a similar slogan, i.e., "public safety". In that context safety had clearly come to mean safety to perpetuate colonial rule and the privileges of foreigners. The representative of the administering Power claimed that his Government's policy in Fiji was aimed at enabling the communities to live and progress in harmony, but the cross-voting system and the division of the electorate on a communal basis might well produce the opposite result.

87. A further point of divergence between the administering Power and other members of the Committee was the possibility that port facilities in Fiji might be turned into military bases. The representative of the administering Power had given solemn assurances that they would not be used for military purposes, but other members of the Committee were justifiably anxious on that score.

88. In view of those divergencies, he supported the Indian representative's suggestion that a visiting mission should be sent to the Territory to ascertain what the situation really was. The kind of welcome given it by the administering Power would be the true test of the latter's intentions.

89. The representative of Uruguay said that, while he fully agreed with the position of principles taken by the representatives of Bulgaria and Syria and supported the provisions of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), it was essential for the Committee to agree on the facts of the situation in Fiji before it could proceed to debate the legal interpretation of those facts. More specifically, the Committee should base its further discussion on the fullest possible knowledge of the measures taken by the administering Power in pursuance of the resolution on Fiji adopted by the Committee on 5 November 1964 (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. XIII, para. 119). Only when the Committee had unmistakable evidence of the constitutional developments which had taken place in Fiji to prepare the people for self-determination and independence would it be in a position to assess the future prospects of the Territory. It should ensure that the independent status to be accorded Fiji under its constitution was not merely theoretical, as was the case in Cyprus, which was governed by a constitution imposed on the people as a result of a treaty signed by other Powers. The people of Fiji should be enabled to state in free elections what constitution they desired as the instrument of their self-determination. Since there appeared to be a difference of opinion between the representatives of Bulgaria and Syria and the representative of the administering Power concerning the constitution being proposed by the latter, the Committee would be well advised not to take hasty action and to clarify the facts of the situation.

90. The representative of Poland said that his country had always supported peoples struggling to liberate themselves from colonial domination. Despite the efforts of the General Assembly and of the Special Committee, the situation in Fiji had not changed much. The administering Power had not implemented General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) and 1951 (XVIII).

On the contrary, it was using many devices to delay Fiji's independence and to create a governmental structure which would safeguard British economic and military interests in the future.

91. The main issue at the London Constitutional Conference in 1965 had not been Fiji's independence but how to preserve the inequalities in the representation of the various communities in the Legislative Council. In Fiji, one European vote was equal to six non-European votes and the privileged position of the European minority was further strengthened by the cross-voting system and by the dominant position of the United Kingdom Governor in the Executive Council. The result would be racial antagonism rather than the "social integration of the various communities" recommended in operative paragraph 2 (c) of General Assembly resolution 1951 (XVIII). The United Kingdom representative had stated at the 413th meeting that the administering Power was "preparing the island for constitutional advance towards more representative and more responsible government" but it had shown no sign of implementing the provisions of operative paragraph 2 (b) of General Assembly resolution 1951 (XVIII).

92. He supported the Indian representative's suggestion that a visiting mission should be sent to Fiji to study the situation at first hand. He was prepared to support any other proposals which would speed up the process of decolonization in Fiji.

93. The representative of Chile noted that some progress had been achieved in Fiji, particularly with respect to the introduction of universal adult suffrage. There remained, however, obstacles to full democracy particularly in the form of official members appointed by the Governor both in the Legislative Council and in the Executive Council. Furthermore, there would be a large number of elected representatives in the main communities and one of the members of the Legislative Council would be elected for the first time by all three communities. The new Constitution contained a declaration of rights as well as provisions for the establishment of a ministerial system. However, it was to be regretted that a system of democratic representation based on the principle of "one man, one vote", had not been established in accordance with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 2068 (XX). The continued presence of official members appointed by the Governor both in the Legislative Council and in the Executive Council would impede progress towards democracy in Fiji.

94. His delegation hoped that the United Kingdom would fully implement General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) and 1951 (XVIII). Vigorous action was required to reconcile the existing differences between the various communities. A solution might be found in the establishment of an electoral system based on proportional representation in which all the inhabitants would elect their representatives on a common roll. That would tend to eliminate the differences and animosities and would create, in a more democratic way, a national conscience and a common purpose.

95. It was clear from the results of the Constitutional Conference of 1965 that the administering Power was trying to establish a constitutional framework to give the people of Fiji their internal self-government while at the same time maintaining their ties with the United Kingdom. He hoped that Fiji would achieve unification and integration into a single nation which could properly exercise its inalienable rights to self-determination and independence.

96. The representative of Madagascar said that Fiji had all the qualifications required for the attainment of independence. It was a distinct geographic entity with a population of about 455,000 people. Some countries in Europe, Asia and Africa with a population of like or even smaller size enjoyed their sovereignty, for example, Luxembourg, Iceland, the Maldives Islands and Gabon. Fiji also possessed the economic potential to enable its population to achieve a fair standard of living. Its highly developed administrative and political structure included a Legislative Council, largely elected by direct suffrage, and an Executive Council.

97. It was surprising therefore that the 1965 Constitutional Conference had discussed only minor aspects of the question of Fiji's attainment of independence. The administering Power seemed to be pursuing a status quo policy which was at variance with the fundamental provisions of the General Assembly resolutions on the Territory. The administering Power was inclined to stress the harm that might be done to various minorities if independence were granted. Thus, it claimed that special treatment should be given to certain minorities and that the multiplicity of political parties was a sign of internal disunity which would be aggravated by independence. It was said that in a memorandum published in 1964 the National Congress Party had agreed only to the granting of internal self-government to Fiji. Such manoeuvres on the part of minority groups were not unknown to the Special Committee whose concern was to identify a majority capable of governing the country in accordance with the rules of democracy and of securing the political, economic and social integration of the population.

98. He supported the Indian representative's suggestion that a visiting mission should be sent to Fiji to report on the situation there and on the obstacles which stood in the way of Fiji's independence.

D. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

99. At the 462nd meeting on 16 August 1966, the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania introduced a draft resolution on Fiji (A/AC.109/L.320) jointly sponsored by Afghanistan, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Madagascar, Mali, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, United Republic of Tanzania and Yugoslavia. It deplored the failure of the United Kingdom to implement the relevant General Assembly resolutions and called upon the United Kingdom Government to adopt certain measures, including the holding of general elections on the basis of one man, one vote, in accordance with the principle of universal adult suffrage for the purpose of forming a constituent assembly which would draw up a democratic constitution. Unless that was done, it would be very difficult for Fiji to achieve racial harmony at a time when the differences between the races were magnified by the administering Power. The United Kingdom Government was also requested to give Fiji a representative government, to fix an early date for its independence and to abolish all discriminatory measures. The draft resolution recommended the appointment of a sub-committee, as originally suggested by the Indian representative, to visit the Territory and report to the Special Committee as soon as possible. He hoped that the Secretariat would be able to provide all the necessary facilities for the sub-committee's visit to Fiji.

100. The draft resolution deserved unanimous support since its provisions represented the minimum which the Special Committee could expect to do for the people of Fiji.

101. The representative of India, speaking in support of the draft resolution, said that it embodied the consensus which seemed to prevail in the Special Committee. Some of its provisions were contained in earlier resolutions. It was time for the administering Power to fix an early date for the granting of independence to the people of Fiji so that they might attain their rightful place in the world of free nations. The administering Power claimed that the new constitutional arrangements were satisfactory but some members of the Special Committee had expressed their doubts. It was therefore necessary to send a visiting mission to study the situation at first hand and report back to the Special Committee.

102. The representative of Australia stressed his country's interest in the Fiji Islands because of their proximity to Australia and referred to Article 73 b of the Charter whereby the administering Powers undertook to help the peoples develop self-government and to take due account of their political aspirations. In Fiji the Special Committee was faced with a special problem because of the heterogeneity of the population. There were 176,000 Fijians of Melanesian origin, the original inhabitants of the islands, 206,000 people of Indian origin, and 36,000 belonging to other races. Between those various groups there were profound differences in race, culture and habits.

103. It was generally realized that in a similar situation the principle of majority rule, which Australia endorsed, was difficult to apply, much more difficult for example, than in New Guinea and Papua where the people, although divided into many tribes, were essentially of Melanesian origin.

104. The draft resolution tried to impose on the peoples of Fiji an oversimplified application of the principle of self-determination. Was the Committee certain that the text was in accord with the wishes and aspirations of the Fijians, as was required in Article 73 b of the Charter? There was nothing to show that the 175,000 Fijians of Melanesian origin wanted independence on the basis suggested in the draft resolution and many of the 205,000 Indians did not want it either.

105. The Committee should not force any Territory to pursue a course of political development which did not reflect its aspirations. He felt that the appeal made earlier by a petitioner from Grenada—"Let us decide"—was also relevant to Fiji.

106. The administering Power had no aim other than to fulfil its obligations in accordance with the provisions of the Charter; it had no reason for wishing to perpetuate colonial status. The allegations to the effect that fortifications had been built on Fiji were ill-intentioned and absurd. He noted that in operative paragraphs 2 and 3 the administering Power was accused of having prevented the Territory from attaining independence and that in operative paragraphs 4, 5 and 6 the sending of a visiting mission was recommended. In his opinion, the Committee should not seek to impose its views on the Government and people of Fiji. It was for them to make a choice in their own time and without outside pressure. His delegation therefore could not support the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.320).

107. The representative of Denmark said that his delegation, although prepared to vote for the draft resolution, wished to express certain reservations, particularly with regard to operative paragraph 3 (c). It was not realistic at the present time to fix an early date for the independence of Fiji; moreover, it was most regrettable that the text contained no reference to the wishes of the population. The people of Fiji unquestionably had an inalienable right to independence, as was stated in operative paragraph 1, but it should not be forgotten that a colonial Territory had a choice of various possibilities, as the relevant United Nations resolutions provided.

108. The representative of the United Kingdom recalled that in its statements of 6 and 13 May his delegation had set out the policy of the United Kingdom Government on Fiji. First of all, it had described the aims and objectives of that policy; secondly, it had shown that there was nothing in those aims and objectives with which any member of the Committee would disagree; thirdly, it had shown that the United Kingdom Government was proceeding towards those aims and objectives at the pace which was best suited to the Territory and to their achievement; and, fourthly, it had refuted the accusations that had been made, including those to the effect that the United Kingdom wished for reasons of its own self-interest, to perpetuate colonial rule in Fiji.

109. He wished, before dealing with the draft resolution, to inform the Committee of what the Colonial Secretary, Mr. Lee, had said to the people of Fiji during a recent visit to the Pacific Territories. Mr. Lee had declared that the Territory had achieved substantial progress towards full economic viability, and representative institutions to match. It was still too early to predict the ultimate constitutional solution for the Territory, but its progress should not be determined from outside. The United Kingdom's task, with its experience of centuries of parliamentary democracy, was to help the people of Fiji to forge their common destiny. For that purpose, it was essential to weld together the differing traditions of the peoples of Fiji so as to produce a sense of national identity, making the several communities a single nation. The Colonial Secretary had also stated that the new Constitution would be an efficient and democratic foundation for government during the next few years.

110. His delegation regretted that the draft resolution did not recognize the major steps taken by the United Kingdom Government and that its recommendations ran counter to the policy which alone was likely to achieve his Government's declared objectives. His delegation would therefore vote against the draft resolution.

111. The representative of India said he had found the Australian representative's observations useful; he had particularly appreciated the Australian representative's comment that the Indian community in Fiji regarded that Territory, and not India, as its home. It could not be denied that there were two separate communities in Fiji and that it was not the administering Power which had made them separate. In the Special Committee's opinion, however, the administering Power was doing nothing to weld the two communities together; indeed, it was preventing them from coming together.

112. The representative of Australia had said that in operative paragraphs 2 and 3 the Committee was passing judgement on the administering Power, but surely the Committee was merely doing its duty in passing judgement on situations existing in colonial Territories.

113. The Committee believed that the recommendations it was making were in accordance with the aspirations of the people. If, however, they should prove not to be, the Committee was prepared to revise its stand on the basis of the conclusions of a visiting mission to Fiji. The fact that the administering Power had refused to receive a visiting mission seemed to indicate that it had much to conceal from the Committee.

114. He wished to thank the representative of Denmark, who had said that his delegation was prepared to vote for the draft resolution even though it regretted that no mention had been made of self-determination for the people of Fiji. In reply to the United Kingdom representative, he would point out that it was precisely because the Committee did not approve of the administering Power's policy that it was making recommendations embodied in the draft resolution. As for Mr. Lee's statements, they had contained references which were not likely to be gratifying to the United Nations and the Special Committee.

115. In conclusion, he urged all members of the Committee to vote for the draft resolution.

116. At its 463rd meeting on 7 September 1966, the Special Committee adopted the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.320) by 20 votes to 3, with 1 abstention.

117. The representative of the United States of America, speaking in explanation of her vote, expressed regret that her delegation had been unable to vote for the draft resolution despite its approval of many of the resolution's aims. The objective of communal harmony and national unity in Fiji was supported by all members of the Committee. However, the resolution appeared to contain conclusions and recommendations which ignored the realities of the situation and the efforts being made to cope with them. It was grossly inaccurate to state that the administering Power had ignored the objectives set out in the United Nations resolutions on Fiji. The primary purpose of the 1965 Constitutional Conference had been to achieve those objectives, and the reforms adopted, which would culminate in the election of a new legislature in the autumn, represented progress in that direction. The Legislative Council would be composed of members elected by the three communities. Leaders could thus emerge who would represent the whole people rather than a single community. Important steps were being taken to eliminate divisions in Fiji. Those steps, and the prospects they opened up, should not be overlooked.

118. Since her delegation did not believe that the measures called for in the draft resolution, including the appointment of a visiting mission, were such as would overcome the Territory's difficulties, it had voted against the resolution.

119. The representative of Italy said that his delegation endorsed the general principles and ideas embodied in the resolution just adopted but had some reservations which had prompted it to abstain. First of all, the criticisms directed at the attitude of the administering Power, and particularly the statement that it had not implemented the General Assembly's resolutions, did not seem to reflect the realities of the situation. The United Kingdom might not have done as much as the Committee would have wished, but it was not correct to say that it was entirely opposed to the aims and purposes of the Special Committee. Secondly, it was important that the Territory's progress towards independence should be accompanied by measures designed to maintain peace and racial unity. The draft resolution, and especially operative paragraph 3, did not take that aspect of the problem sufficiently into account. Lastly, it should have been stated that the sending of a visiting mission would be decided upon in consultation with the administering Power.

120. The resolution (A/AC.109/201) thus adopted by the Special Committee on the question of Fiji at its 463rd meeting, on 7 September 1966, reads as follows:

"The Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

"Having considered the question of Fiji,

"Having heard the statements of the administering Power,

"Recalling General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960, 1951 (XVIII) of 11 December 1963, 2068 (XX) of 16 December 1965 and 2105 (XX) of 20 December 1965,

"Noting with regret that the administering Power continues to ignore the recommendations contained in the various General Assembly resolutions,

"1. Reaffirms the inalienable right of the people of Fiji to freedom and independence in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) containing the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples;

"2. Deeply regrets the failure of the administering Power to implement the various resolutions of the Special Committee and the General Assembly concerning Fiji;

"3. Calls upon the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, as the administering Power, to implement immediately the following:

"(a) The holding of general elections on the basis of one man, one vote, in accordance with the principle of universal adult suffrage for the purpose of forming a constituent assembly, which will be charged with the task of drawing up a democratic constitution;

"(b) The formation of a representative government and transfer of full powers to that government;

"(c) The fixing of an early date for the granting of independence to the people of Fiji;

"(d) The abolition of all discriminatory measures so as to foster communal harmony and national unity in the Territory;

"4. Decides to appoint a Sub-Committee to visit Fiji for the purpose of studying at first hand the situation in the Territory and to report to the Special Committee as soon as possible;

"5. Requests the Chairman to proceed with the appointment of the Sub-Committee as envisaged in paragraph 4 above;

"6. Requests the Secretary-General to provide all facilities for the visit of the Sub-Committee to the Territory of Fiji."

121. At the 483rd meeting, on 30 November 1966, the Chairman informed the Special Committee that he would proceed to the appointment of the Sub-Committee at an early date during the next session of the Committee.

CHAPTER IX*

EQUATORIAL GUINEA (FERNANDO PÓO AND RÍO MUNI)

A. ACTION PREVIOUSLY TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE AND THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

1. Following its consideration of Equatorial Guinea (Fernando Póo and Río Muni) at its meetings in 1964, the Special Committee adopted a resolution as contained in its report to the General Assembly at its nineteenth session (A/5800/Rev.1,¹ chap. IX, para. 111). At its meetings in 1965, the Special Committee did not specifically consider this Territory, but included relevant information in its report to the General Assembly at its twentieth session (A/6000/Rev.1,² chap. X).

2. At its twentieth session, the General Assembly adopted resolution 2067 (XX) of 16 December 1965. In the fifth preambular paragraph of the resolution, the Assembly noted that the Territories of Fernando Póo and Río Muni had been merged and named Equatorial Guinea.

* Previously issued under the symbol A/6300/Add.7.

¹ Official Records of the General Assembly, Nineteenth Session, Annexes, annex No. 8 (part I).

² Ibid., Twentieth Session, Annexes, addendum to agenda item 23.

3. In the operative paragraphs of this resolution, the General Assembly:

"1. Reaffirms the inalienable right of the people of Equatorial Guinea to self-determination and independence;

"2. Requests the administering Power to set the earliest possible date for independence after consulting the people on the basis of universal suffrage under the supervision of the United Nations;

"3. Invites the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples to follow the progress of the implementation of the present resolution and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its twenty-first session."

B. INFORMATION ON THE TERRITORY³

4. The policy of the administering Power, according to the information transmitted, has been to complete the various phases of the process of establishing the autonomous system in accordance with the fundamental laws introducing that régime. The persons who were to discharge the functions of government have been elected and appointed. The original composition of the different organs of government, it is reported, has not yet undergone any change, since these organs are continuing to function for the periods prescribed by the law. The formation of the Territory's leadership was completed during the period under review with the appointment of the delegate of the Autonomous Government in Madrid.

³ The information contained in this section has been taken from the information transmitted by Spain on 28 June 1966 under Article 73 e of the Charter.

5. In social affairs, it is reported that priority has been given to the co-operative movement, which the administering Power has promoted through long-term credits and housing construction. The work done by the National Housing Institute is reflected in the construction of 1,500 dwellings at a cost of 301 million pesetas.⁴

6. For appointment to the Labour Judicature and other bodies with competence in labour matters, eight officials who are indigenous inhabitants of the Territory have been selected for office and are at present in Madrid.

7. Educational activities during this period have consisted mainly in the establishment of new centres. As far as secondary education is concerned, the secondary schools of Fernando Póo and Río Muni have been established at Santa Isabel and Bata respectively. Teacher-training colleges and industrial apprenticeship schools have been established in the same cities. In the field of primary education, efforts have been concentrated on increasing the number of the teaching staff. As regards educational assistance in the form of scholarships, the policy has been to give preference to higher studies, which cannot be undertaken in Equatorial Guinea. Scholarships have been awarded up to a value of 3.5 million pesetas every year for study in Madrid, Barcelona and other university centres.

8. In the field of public works, it is reported that highways, water supply systems, ports, expressways to Santa Isabel Airport and other projects have been constructed at a total cost for the years 1964-1966 of 425 million pesetas.

9. In the health field, such endemic diseases as trypanosomiasis, leprosy and malaria have almost disappeared or are under control. A plan for the total eradication of malaria is being put into effect. A member of the Governing Council is responsible for the health services. He is assisted by a Director and a number of physicians.

10. As regards the training of indigenous persons for the public services, it may be noted that the Health Service has a number of indigenous physicians, including the Chief of the Service. Other organs also have indigenous personnel in their top posts. These include, for example, labour inspectors, chiefs of the Special Police Corps and other occupants of senior professional posts. Indigenous personnel, it is stated, represent almost the entire strength in other positions in the public administration.

Health services

11. In 1965, 109,730 medical consultations took place at the various health centres and 35,342 sick persons received treatment in hospitals. Of these 10,743 were treated at Santa Isabel Hospital, 5,877 at Bata Hospital and 7,519 at San Carlos Hospital. The surgical staff performed 2,966 operations at Santa Isabel and 1,237 at Bata. There was an increase in the number of operations on victims of accidents. Further assistance was provided by the dental, ophthalmological and child health services. As regards assistance in maternity clinics, the number of births at the Santa Isabel and Bata maternity homes was 2,660 and 906 respectively.

⁴ The local currency is the Spanish peseta, which is equal to $US0.0168.

12. The epidemiological picture finds malaria in first place, with 30,000 cases reported. This, it is stated, does not mean an increase in the incidence of the disease, rather in the assistance provided at clinics as a result of the eradication campaign. The number of cases of dysentery was 7,159. Trypanosomiasis control revealed 97 cases, of which almost half were at Puerto Iradier. A total of 393,451 blood tests were necessary to identify these cases. Among children's ailments there was an epidemic of measles this year, with 3,403 cases and a mortality of 1.2 per cent. There were also 2,317 cases of whooping cough, with one death. There were 512 cases of mumps.

13. In the field of preventive medicine, the Health Service organized and carried out a poliomyelitis vaccination campaign, which covered 44,029 persons, and a triple vaccination campaign (tetanus, diphtheria, whooping cough), which covered 86 per cent of the children. The use of an anti-measles vaccine was also begun.

14. The old and inadequate hospital at Concepción has been replaced by a new structure which can hold seventy beds and is provided with the necessary auxiliary services, including, in addition to the hospital building, a community house for the nuns who care for the sick and accommodations for the male nurses.

15. The hospital at Ebebiyín, which is approaching completion, will make it possible very soon to include another new structure in the programme for expanding and renovating the health services.

Primary education

16. There are thirty primary schools and 135 elementary schools. The School of Education continues to function. The enrolment at the end of the past year was 21,091 and 1,105 primary education certificates and 1,701 elementary educational certificates were awarded at the end of the course. During the period of autonomy, ten elementary schools have been established.

17. The manning table for substantive and auxiliary personnel in this Department is as follows: one director-inspector; one sub-inspector at Bata; eighteen national teachers; twenty-nine primary school teachers; and 350 assistant teachers.

18. The substantive and auxiliary manning table has been increased by thirty-five primary school teachers and forty-five assistant teachers. The present Director-Inspector of the Department is an indigenous inhabitant of Equatorial Guinea, as are the twenty-nine primary school teachers. The latter were trained at the Santa Isabel and Bata teacher-training colleges, which were established in this region. Twenty assistant teachers graduated from the School of Education and are now taking a practical course in the school groups.

19. The school meal and nutrition service is continuing its work, distributing powdered milk in schools as a diet supplement, and the school dining-rooms are still operating.

20. In December 1964 and January and February 1965, holiday camps were operated for the first time in the valley of Moka for four periods of twenty days each, during which school children from Fernando Póo enjoyed the pleasant climate of the valley. These camps were in operation again during the same months of the 1965-1966 school year. It is also planned that during the dry season in Río Muni, holiday camps should be maintained for students at schools in the mainland area at a high altitude.

21. In this first stage of autonomy, six education boards have been established in Río Muni in the school districts of Sevilla de Niefang, Valladolid de los Bimbiles, Mongomo, Nsoró de Guadalupe, Acurenam and Puerto Iradier, each being under the direction of a primary school teacher, an indigenous inhabitant of the Territory, who is responsible for co-ordinating the substantive and administrative work of the district's schools with the policies of the Director-Inspector of the Department.

22. During the current year, a primary education act adapted to the educational requirements of the region was drafted by the substantive personnel of the department.

Public Works Department

23. Since July 1964, when this department of the Governor-General's administration was transferred to the Autonomous Administration of Equatorial Guinea (more specifically, to the Office of Public Works, Housing and Town Planning), public works projects initiated by the former régime have been completed. These include the construction of the Santa Isabel water supply system, the expressway to the new airport and the Punta Santiago air-and-sea lighthouse. Other highway and water supply projects have been started.

24. Among the projects in progress is the highway round the eastern shore of the island. This new road is of great importance economically, since it passes through the richest cocoa-growing area of Fernando Póo, where there are a large number of small farms and where produce previously had to be transported under uneconomical conditions.

25. In Río Muni, action has been taken to strengthen the road-beds, whose peculiarities, rather than the traffic itself, make them vulnerable to the effects of tropical rains. The road network has been kept completely open to traffic and today traffic moves quite normally over the whole system.

26. Since the introduction of the autonomous system, the activities of the Housing and Town Planning Office have increased, the "new projects" budget rising from 20 million to 102,826,858.60 pesetas a year. The Office's main tasks are: (a) planning and direction of new projects; (b) maintenance of official buildings; (c) proceedings for the allocation and withdrawal of titles to land; (d) administration of official housing.

27. The sums appropriated are intended mainly for educational and health buildings, housing and offices.

28. In the field of education, a teacher-training college for 640 students and a national secondary school for 1,200 students have been built at Bata, and primary and secondary schools with student accommodation are to be built at Mongomo and Basacato del Oeste. The total sum invested in school construction was 30,193,499.56 pesetas.

29. The total sum invested in the construction of housing for civil servants was 27,344,820.75 pesetas.

30. Investment in the Health Service amounted to 14,946,385.35 pesetas. This includes completion of the Concepción and Evinayong Hospitals.

31. The sum of 2,002,586.29 pesetas, or 1.9 per cent of the budget, was allocated to equip offices for the Autonomous Administration, especially the new Health Department where the Governing Council is temporarily housed.

32. The Governing Council was allocated 28,012,688 pesetas for its permanent premises, including the Councillor's residence.

C. CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Introduction

33. The Special Committee considered Equatorial Guinea (Fernando Póo and Río Muni) at its 447th, 451st, 452nd, and 454th meetings held in Africa between 15 and 21 June 1966.

34. In a letter dated 16 June 1966 (A/AC.109/185), the Deputy Permanent Representative of Spain to the United Nations requested permission for a Spanish delegation to be represented at the Special Committee's meetings in Algiers in an observer capacity and to take part in the discussions on Equatorial Guinea. At its 451st meeting, the Special Committee decided, without objection, to accede to this request.

Written petition and hearing

35. The Special Committee circulated the following petition concerning Equatorial Guinea:

Petitioner	Document No.
Mr. Daniel G. Mbandemzo'o, representative in the United Arab Republic, Idea Popular de la Guinea Ecuatorial (IPGE), concerning Equatorial Guinea	A/AC.109/PET.500

36. At its 447th meeting held in Cairo on 15 June 1966, the Special Committee heard Mr. Mbandemzo'o (IPGE).

37. Mr. Mbandemzo'o said that the Spanish colonialists and their imperialist friends were spreading various myths about Equatorial Guinea. He felt it his duty to re-establish certain facts. Equatorial Guinea had been a Spanish colony for 188 years. Geographically, it was divided into two Territories of unequal size: Fernando Póo and Río Muni. Fernando Póo covered 2,000 square kilometres and had 55,000 inhabitants, 4,300 of whom were Europeans. Its capital was Santa Isabel, a port which included the small island of Anobón, with an area of seventeen square kilometres. Río Muni covered 26,000 square kilometres and had 300,000 inhabitants, 3,000 of whom were Spanish settlers. It was bounded on the west by the Atlantic Ocean, on the north by the Federal Republic of Cameroon, and on the east and south by the Republic of Gabon. Its principal town was the port of Bata. The small islands of Corisco and Elobeyes were part of its territory. Equatorial Guinea's natural products were timber, cocoa, coffee, palm oil, cabbage-palms, bananas and coconuts. There were also deposits of gold, petroleum, coal, tasmanite, iron, manganese, uranium and bauxite in the country.

38. In 1959, the inhabitants of Río Muni and Fernando Póo had decided to embark on a struggle against Spanish colonialism. The two secret freedom movements, the Idea Popular de la Guinea Ecuatorial (IPGE) and the Mouvement national de libération de la Guinée équatoriale (MNLGE), had been persecuted by the Spanish Government. A great many militant members had been interned; the island of Annobón had been transformed into a concentration camp. In January 1964, the Spanish Government had decided to grant the inhabitants of the country so-called "internal self-government", which had in fact left the former colonial status of Equatorial Guinea unchanged. A referendum on the so-called fundamental law had been used as a pretext for many acts of violence, the colonialist forces having sought to prevent the nationalist activists from speaking to the people. When the Guinean people had nevertheless unanimously voted against that law, the Spanish Government had proceeded to falsify the results. The Guinean nationalists had then demanded that the referendum should be annulled; the Spanish Government had riposted by arbitrarily establishing a supposedly "autonomous" Government, which naturally took its orders from the Spanish authorities. A party similar to the Spanish Falange was founded, the Movimiento de Unión Nacional de la Guinea Ecuatorial (MUNGE), which was in the service of the Western settlers and the petty bourgeoisie. In 1964, that party had been declared the only party in the country and had ordered the imprisonment of the IPGE nationalists on the excuse that the latter had held secret meetings.

39. During that period, assassinations, sentences of exile, expulsion, arbitrary sequestration and tortures had been the daily lot of the Guinean nationalists. The IPGE and the MNLGE had then decided to merge in order better to fight the bloodthirsty colonialists. That decision had been taken in October 1964, the intention being to call the new movement the Frente Nacional y Popular de Liberación de la Guinea Ecuatorial (FRENAPO). But in March 1965 the Spanish Government had decided to recognize MNLGE, thereby giving proof of collusion between that party and the administering Power. The IPGE, on the other hand, although far more numerous, had been banned and its followers relentlessly persecuted. That party was still proscribed. It had naturally withdrawn from FRENAPO, convinced that the leaders of FRENAPO were the tools of Spanish imperialist policy.

40. The Spanish Government today was harbouring fearsome designs against the Guinean people: 12,000 troops occupied the country and four warships were patrolling off Río Muni and Fernando Póo. The Spanish troops also had parachutist commandos and jet aircraft.

41. Worst of all, the Spanish Government was not only assisted by their NATO allies but were also receiving moral support from certain African countries, which were enabling the Spanish Government to prolong a disgraceful situation. Political refugees from Equatorial Guinea could no longer continue their political struggle against Spanish colonialism and the so-called autonomous government of Equatorial Guinea in some adjacent African countries. Thus, after the military coup d'état which had overthrown Dr. Nkrumah, African liberation movements had been driven out of Ghana by the new régime. At present, ten activists of the IPGE were in Accra prisons. The Ghanaian authorities had recently announced that those ten revolutionaries would be handed over to Spain.

42. Another Spanish manoeuvre had been to try to persuade the rest of the world that the IPGE was a communist movement which preached violence. The IPGE was not a communist party and did not favour violence; but it would use violence if need be to defend the rights, the freedom and the dignity of the people of Equatorial Guinea. It urgently requested the Special Committee to place the question of Equatorial Guinea on its agenda, to condemn Spanish colonialism in that country, to urge the Spanish Government to grant unconditional independence to the Territory, to appeal to the Ghanaian authorities to release the ten IPGE activists in prison at Accra, to use its influence to convince the African Governments who were members of the Organization of African Unity (OAU)—and more particularly the Governments of Cameroon, Gabon and Nigeria—to allow the IPGE full freedom of action in their countries, in accordance with the resolutions adopted by the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the OAU at Accra, and finally to appeal to independent African States and all peace-loving countries to give the IPGE the political, moral and material support it needed to bring about final and complete elimination of Spanish colonialism.

General statements

43. The representative of Spain said that it would be redundant to describe once again the situation in equatorial Guinea, its political development and its constitutional progress. The members of the Committee were aware that it had an autonomous Government. Members of his delegation included Mr. Ondó Edú, President of the Governing Council, and Mr. Gori Molubela, President of the General Assembly of Equatorial Guinea. Mr. Ondó Edú was a well-known figure in the United Nations: after being exiled from his country, he had appeared as a petitioner more than four years earlier. He had been repatriated when the Spanish Government had announced the referendum for the establishment of self-government and had conducted his electoral campaign in complete freedom. Since he knew his people well and could express himself easily in his native tongue "fang", he had soon captivated them and they had elected him without hesitation. Mr. Gori Molubela was a person with a profound knowledge of the realities of his country. Mr. Ondó Edú would make a statement at a later stage and he and Mr. Gori Molubela would be glad to explain any points concerning the item under discussion, should the members so request.

44. Spain had nothing to hide in Equatorial Guinea; in order to prove it and to enable the Committee to ascertain the true conditions in the Territory, the Spanish Government would be very pleased if the Committee or a representative group of members could visit Equatorial Guinea to see for themselves what those conditions were. If the Committee could not accept the invitation for the time being because such a visit had not been scheduled, he confidently hoped that it would be able to do so in the near future. The invitation had been extended; it was for the members to decide upon it. He had no doubt that they would realize the importance and significance of the offer.

45. Mr. Ondó Edú, speaking as a representative of Spain, reminded the Committee that in November 1965 he had been present at the meetings of the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly at the twentieth session and had made a statement in his capacity as President of the Governing Council of Equatorial Guinea.

46. He further recalled that years ago, too, he had taken part in the work of the Fourth Committee, but in very different circumstances. He had been a petitioner who was outside his country and had found it necessary, together with his compatriots, Mr. Atanasio N'Dong, Mr. Jesus Oyono and Mr. Itanguino, to arrest the attention not only of the Spanish Government, but of the United Nations in that way. All that was past history. The Spanish Government had finally yielded to the appeal that it should grant self-government to Equatorial Guinea. Once self-government had been granted, he had come to New York, to the twentieth session of the General Assembly, and had provided full information on the electoral procedures and on the setting up of the Government. All that information appeared in the records of the Fourth Committee and his statement at its 1550th meeting had been issued as a document.⁵

47. As head of the Government of Equatorial Guinea, he wished, through the Committee, to convey the most profound gratitude of his Government and people to the General Assembly for its adoption of resolution 2067 (XX). He had been informed of the contents of the resolution by the Spanish authorities. He considered it of particular importance that the United Nations had reaffirmed the right of the people of Equatorial Guinea to self-determination and independence, but he would be lacking in fairness if he failed to point out—in observance, as he had told the Fourth Committee on 9 November 1965, of that one very simple axiom he had learnt, inter alia, from his teachers, past and present, namely noblesse oblige—that a member of the Spanish Government had informed him, in his capacity as President of the Governing Council, that it was the stated, official intention of the Spanish Government that Equatorial Guinea should choose its own political course when it so desired, that is, total independence if it regarded that as the best solution for its problems.

48. It followed that, having accepted the principle of self-determination, there was nothing to prevent Equatorial Guinea from asking for independence if it so desired. In that connexion, he wished to inform the Committee that, while his people manifestly shared that aspiration, he still felt that, as he had said in November 1965, it was essential and advisable to go through a preparatory stage and it was to that end that he had asked the Committee to help and support them and to give them assistance. Equatorial Guinea needed technical and economic assistance; it needed the aid of the International Bank for its development. It was easy enough to promote independence but it was very difficult to survive once independence had been attained. It was inadmissible that such a noble aspiration should be exploited by demagogues.

49. The elected representatives of the people of Guinea had certain responsibilities towards the people; they were bound by those responsibilities and could not evade them.

50. Those responsibilities were basically concerned with the desire to consolidate independence and future development in Equatorial Guinea on the basis of sound social and economic realities. He did not want his country, once independence had been achieved, to be exposed to economic penetration by any foreign Power; that would be a real form of neo-colonialism as evil as political penetration and more difficult to control.

51. He reiterated that he wanted independence, even immediate independence, but it was necessary for Equatorial Guinea to go on preparing for it, so that when independence came it would be in a position to survive and to withstand situations likely to frustrate independence. That was what it wanted from Spain and what he hoped the General Assembly would consider at its twenty-first session.

52. There was no doubt that Guinea had certain problems, but responsibility for resolving them lay with those who had been freely elected by the people of Guinea. A compatriot who was still living outside the country had appeared before the Committee several times. Guinea was now a self-governing Territory which enjoyed freedom of action and there was nothing to prevent any Guinean from coming back to work for the future of his country. He, for his part, would like them to do so.

53. He was certainly not trying to hide anything from the United Nations or from the Committee which had been entrusted with the task of ensuring decolonization. Consequently, his Government had been particularly pleased about the invitation extended by the representative of Spain for the Committee to visit Equatorial Guinea, where it could see what the actual situation was and suggest what it regarded as the best solutions, which would be given careful study.

54. If the members of the Committee wanted any further particulars, the President of the Assembly, the representative parliament constituted by the people through elections which the United Nations had recognized as free and fair, was entirely at their disposal.

D. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

55. At the 452nd meeting the representative of Syria, introducing a draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.314), co-sponsored by Afghanistan, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, United Republic of Tanzania and Yugoslavia, said that the question of Equatorial Guinea fell within the scope of General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960 and 2067 (XX) of 16 December 1965. The Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, contained in the former resolution, was not only a progressive step in the history of the United Nations, but a turning point in human and international relations. By it the people of Equatorial Guinea had found recognition of their legitimate right to self-determination and independence and the acknowledgement of their irrevocable right to live freely and enjoy full sovereignty over their Territory and resources. In that light the administering Power had been requested to establish the earliest possible date for independence on the basis of universal suffrage, under United Nations supervision.

⁵ A/C.4/656.

56. The substance of the problem was to accelerate preparations for independence of the Territory so that its effective proclamation would not be delayed. Every effort must be deployed to overcome any problem arising in that regard, and it would appear that the administering Power had had that purpose in mind when it had taken the initiative of inviting the Special Committee to send representatives to visit the Territory and familiarize themselves with the preparations being made.

57. It was with those considerations in mind that the Afro-Asian group and Yugoslavia had submitted the draft resolution under consideration, which he presented to the Committee paragraph by paragraph. The co-sponsors hoped that all members of the Committee would support it.

58. The representative of Sierra Leone said that he was gratified by the Spanish offer for the Special Committee to visit Equatorial Guinea and examine conditions there. He was also glad to note that the invitation had come in the proper manner from the administering Power itself. That attitude was encouraging.

59. General Assembly resolution 2067 (XX) had specifically requested the administering Power to set the earliest possible date for independence after the holding of elections by universal suffrage under United Nations supervision. So far, however, the administering Power had not acceded to that request. The Committee had been told that the Territory was not ready for independence; but paragraph 3 of the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.314) gave the administering Power a little more time to meet the General Assembly's request. By the time the proposed sub-committee was ready to visit the Territory, it was hoped that the administering Power could give an indication of the date when independence could be expected. The Committee had been invited by the General Assembly to follow the progress made in the implementation of resolution 2067 (XX) and to report to the General Assembly as early as possible.

60. His delegation was honoured to be able to endorse the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.314). He hoped that the Committee could adopt it unanimously, for the proposals it contained represented an extension of resolution 2067 (XX), which had been adopted by 103 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

61. The representative of Chile expressed his appreciation of the statement by the representative of Spain. The Chilean delegation could only commend the work of the Spanish Government to promote the process of decolonization in the Territories still under its administration. In so many other cases administering Powers had constituted a barrier to the Committee's progress, and had blocked the road to independence. The co-operative attitude manifested by Spain had stemmed from its awareness that colonialism could not continue in the twentieth century and that, consequently, every remaining Territory must move rapidly towards independence. An autonomous Government had taken over in Equatorial Guinea once the way had been prepared by the administering Power. Such a favourable set of circumstances appeared unusual by contrast with the unco-operative policies adopted by other Governments. Spain had just invited the Special Committee to send a mission to visit Equatorial Guinea—an unprecedented and exemplary action which should be imitated by other administering Powers. The Committee should accept the invitation and profit from the occasion to elaborate and adopt specific plans of action.

62. Since the draft resolution prepared by the Afro-Asian group and Yugoslavia on Equatorial Guinea (A/AC.109/L.314) contained the acceptance of Spain's invitation and the decision to send a sub-committee to Equatorial Guinea as soon as practicable, he hoped that quick action would be taken to implement that decision.

63. Referring to operative paragraph 2, he called upon the Committee to bear in mind the statement by Mr. Ondó Edú, which had been greatly appreciated. Chile warmly supported the draft resolution.

64. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania expressed appreciation of the administering Power's attitude. He was convinced that if others followed its example, the Special Committee's work would be greatly facilitated.

65. Despite his pleasure at the progress made in Equatorial Guinea, he felt disappointed that its population had not yet been prepared for complete independence. In his view, their self-determination had been delayed too long. Nevertheless, he wished to assure the people of Equatorial Guinea that independence would not mark the end of the close co-operation between them and the people of his country, but rather a new beginning. It was therefore in the interest of every people, and in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) that the day of freedom should dawn as soon as possible.

66. While appreciative of the unprecedented invitation extended by the administering Power to the Special Committee, he considered it essential that certain preliminary steps should be taken to ascertain Spain's willingness to co-operate to the fullest extent. First, the Committee should call upon Spain to repatriate any political exiles or refugees who wished to return to Equatorial Guinea. Their presence would be of value not only to the Committee during its mission, but also to the young nation throughout its preparation for independence. Secondly, no obstacles should be allowed to prevent petitioners or political prisoners from testifying before the Committee during its stay. Lastly, the administering Power should do its utmost to promote the fullest implementation of the Committee's recommendations. If Spain accepted those conditions, it would facilitate the task to be performed and create new and stronger links between the administering Power and the Special Committee. The latter, for its part, would ensure that all possible measures would be sought to carry out decolonization in a peaceful, constructive manner. He reiterated his thanks to the Spanish Government for its co-operation, and expressed the hope that when the Committee's recommendations were approved, Spain would apply all the measures that had been adopted.

67. The representative of Ethiopia felt no need to reiterate his whole-hearted support of the resolution (A/AC.109/L.314) of which his delegation was a co-sponsor. Rather, he wished to mention the great interest with which he had listened to the statement of the Spanish Ambassador. He welcomed with satisfaction Spain's invitation to a sub-committee in order that it might discern at first hand the realities of the situation in Equatorial Guinea. Spain had acted wisely in taking that step, and must be encouraged to make a similar approach to every avenue of co-operation leading to the final goal of statehood for its Territories. For that reason the Ethiopian delegation was particularly pleased to note the Special Committee's unreserved acceptance of Spain's invitation, and hoped that it would be taken at face value with no hint of suspicion about the possible motives lying behind it. The important consideration would be to ensure that all necessary facilities were provided by the administering Power in order that the sub-committee's work might produce maximum results.

68. He voiced the hope that other administering Powers, especially Spain's neighbour, Portugal, would extend similar invitations. The situation resulting from the latter's refusal to co-operate with the Special Committee, the Secretary-General or the General Assembly, had given rise to a deplorable situation which seriously hampered the Committee's work. With the inhabitants of Portuguese Territories up in arms, the administering Power should at last consent to take the obvious and inevitable steps towards granting their independence.

69. The representative of the United States of America expressed appreciation of the statements made by members of the Spanish delegation. She was gratified to know that the people of Equatorial Guinea would have the opportunity to decide their own future, with a full range of choice, unlimited by predetermining arrangements made from outside. Her delegation welcomed and whole-heartedly supported the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.314).

70. The representative of Australia announced his delegation's support of the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.314). If he had found it necessary to note that the document was deficient in some respects, he had been prompted by objective considerations and not by the opposition on certain matters which he had vigorously stated to the Spanish Government in the past. Firstly, the draft resolution had failed to commend Spain for its new enlightened approach and for the reforms it had recently instigated with a view to giving the people a greater voice in the affairs of their country. It must be recognized that the administering Power had refused in the past—and to some extent still refused—to recognize the contribution of people like Mr. Ondó Edú who had protested against its former policies. Operative paragraph 3 implied prejudgement of a situation which should have been evaluated by on-the-spot observers who were capable of discovering what the people really wanted. Having simply wished to note those weak points, he associated himself with others in support of the resolution.

71. The representative of Venezuela said that he had been very pleased to see the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.314) on Equatorial Guinea. The President of the Government of Equatorial Guinea, Mr. Bonifacio Ondó Edú, had given the Committee an account of conditions in the Territory on the preceding day. Once again, Spain was coming before the Special Committee and stating its intention of implementing General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and all the other resolutions which had the same objective. In so doing, Spain was taking a further step along the course which the Committee had set itself. Spain hoped that the Special Committee would set up the sub-committee referred to in the draft resolution, and it was even inviting members of the Committee to make an on-the-spot inspection of conditions in the Territories. That attitude was in keeping with Spanish tradition and it did honour to Spain. He regretted, however, that operative paragraph

2 of the draft resolution did not mention the fact that the Committee had heard President Bonifacio Ondó Edú, in his capacity as a petitioner, tell them what he thought of conditions in Equatorial Guinea. Nevertheless, he would vote in favour of the text submitted to the Committee, and he earnestly hoped that the Special Committee would decide to set up a sub-committee, as soon as practicable, to visit Equatorial Guinea with a view to seeing how Spain was implementing resolution 1514 (XV) and the other pertinent resolutions of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

72. The representative of Iran welcomed Spain's invitation, which showed that it had nothing to hide from the Committee. He hoped that Spain's example would be followed by other administering Powers and that the enhanced co-operation between Spain and the Special Committee would effectively promote the conditions required for the people's self-determination. Any requests for aid from United Nations specialized agencies should be given full consideration by the visiting sub-committee.

73. The representative of Iraq wished to add his voice to others raised in approval and support of the draft resolution on Equatorial Guinea (A/AC.109/L.314). Spain's example should be followed by other administering Powers that had refused the visit of Special Committee missions despite numerous requests contained in resolutions and recommendations. The high esteem enjoyed by Spain in the Arab world and in Africa would certainly be underscored by the new step it had taken.

74. The representative of Afghanistan said that his delegation's views were reflected in the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.314), of which it was a co-sponsor. The importance of the draft resolution lay in the fact that it marked a significant trend away from the traditional unco-operative tactics of administering Powers. He hoped that the proposed visit would speed up the implementation of General Assembly resolutions 2067 (XX) and 1514 (XV), with regard to the granting of independence to Equatorial Guinea.

75. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that he did not share the enthusiasm of some delegations, who apparently considered that Spain had rendered a signal service to the Special Committee by inviting some of its members to visit Equatorial Guinea. General Assembly resolutions 2105 (XX) and 2067 (XX) concerning the date on which Territories under colonial domination should recover their independence had not yet been implemented. The same was true of the resolution on Ifni and "Spanish" Sahara. The fact was that Spain, with the collusion of other countries, was scheming to retard the implementation of the General Assembly resolutions which would lead to its quitting African soil.

76. He supported the statement made by the representative of Tanzania; all the petitioners who might wish to address the sub-committee must be allowed to do so. Political prisoners must be released and exiles must be allowed to return home. All of them must be allowed to express their views to the sub-committee and to the people, and to engage in political activities.

77. He emphasized the importance of operative paragraph 3 of the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.314) and recalled that Australia had regretted the restrictive definition of the powers of the sub-committee, which in fact should work to implement the resolutions of the General Assembly. In any event, if the sub-committee's work was to be of any value, representatives of countries which were in connivance with the colonialists must not be allowed to participate.

78. At its 454th meeting, on 21 June 1966, the Special Committee adopted the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.314) by a roll-call vote of 22 to none as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Australia, Bulgaria, Chile, Denmark, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Italy, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Republic of Tanzania, United States of America, Venezuela and Yugoslavia.

Against: None.

79. The text of the resolution (A/AC.109/186) on Equatorial Guinea (Fernando Póo and Río Muni) adopted by the Special Committee at its 454th meeting on 21 June 1966 reads as follows:

"The Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

"Having considered the question of Equatorial Guinea,

"Having heard the statements of the administering Power and of a petitioner,

"Recalling General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960,

"Recalling further General Assembly resolution 2067 (XX) of 16 December 1965,

"1. Notes with satisfaction the open invitation made to it by the administering Power to visit Equatorial Guinea;

"2. Reaffirms the inalienable right of the people of Equatorial Guinea to self-determination and independence;

"3. Decides to send to Equatorial Guinea, as soon as practicable, a sub-committee to ascertain the conditions in the Territory with a view to speeding up the implementation of General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) and 2067 (XX);

"4. Decides to maintain the question of Equatorial Guinea on its agenda."

80. After the vote was taken, the representative of Spain said that the Spanish Government appreciated the Special Committee's acceptance of its invitation, and had noted with special gratitude the interventions of the representatives of Chile, Ethiopia, Tanzania, the United States of America, Australia, Iran, Iraq, Afghanistan and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (who, although not completely in agreement with the formulation of the resolution, had emphasized the solidarity of his people with the people of Spain).

81. He had taken particular note of the request made by the representative of Tanzania for the repatriation of exiles to Equatorial Guinea. That request had reiterated the words of Mr. Ondó Edú who two days earlier had urged the Committee to ensure that petitioners and political prisoners be allowed to appear before the sub-committee during its mission. The Spanish representative had, however, to remind the Committee that there were no political prisoners. The awareness of that fact by members was not the fault of the Committee, but it could be remedied by first-hand acquaintance with the situation.

82. Regarding the circulation of information, he pointed out that the deadline of 15 June 1966 had been adhered to and that a report was being prepared by the administering Power, in compliance with Article 73 e of the Charter on Territories under Spanish administration.

83. Before commenting upon the resolution, he wished to express his satisfaction at the Special Committee's acceptance of the administering Power's open invitation to visit Equatorial Guinea.

84. Reference had been made in the preamble to the presence of a petitioner. His delegation pointed out that when it had learnt that the question of Equatorial Guinea had been placed on the agenda for the Algiers meeting, it had made plans to be present at the discussions. It had not known in Cairo that a petitioner would be appearing before the Committee. Although it did not attach major importance to the matter, it did feel compelled to state its reservations on the procedure that had been followed. It was known that according to Chapter XI of the Charter, petitioners from Non-Self-Governing Territories were not authorized to be present. If, however, the provisions of Chapters XII and XIII had been considered to supersede those of Chapter XI, by their reference to non-metropolitan Territories, the change might have merited being put to the vote. In the past, his delegation would in similar circumstances have asked that a vote be taken, and it might have done so once again, but would instead merely request that its reservations be placed in the record.

85. In connexion with operative paragraph 2, he recalled that his Government had recognized the right of its Territories to self-rule and independence long before the United Nations had made any recommendations to that effect. In view of his Government's known position and in view of the fact that an autonomous Government had been set up, he felt that the reaffirmation contained in paragraph 2 was unnecessary.

86. The reference in operative paragraph 3 to speeding up the implementation of General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) and 2067 (XX) prompted his delegation to remind the Special Committee that the administering Power had nothing to hide, a fact which was substantiated by its offer to receive an investigating sub-committee in that Territory. The invitation had not been extended with the sole purpose of speeding up the implementation of the relevant resolutions, but rather in order to enable the sub-committee effectively to evaluate the real situation. No conclusions could be reached or even outlined in advance: if they were, it would serve no useful purpose to visit the Territory.

87. Finally, his delegation knew perfectly well that when the President of the Governing Council of Equatorial Guinea had taken office, he had done so in the name of Spain but with authority vested in him by the people through universal suffrage. The same had been true for Mr. Gori Molubela, President of the Assembly. Provision for their election had been made in the Law of Self-Determination which had also conferred upon the Territory the name of Equatorial Guinea appearing in the resolution. Those facts furnished further proof of the United Nations acceptance of the Law of Self-Determination, in connexion with which the Fourth Committee had in November 1965, upon the request of Mr. Ondó Edú, ordered that the address of the President of the Council of Government of Equatorial Guinea be circulated as a document of the General Assembly. He thanked the Special Committee once again for the recognition it had given the work done by the administering Power, and requested that his statement be included in the Committee's records.

88. The Chairman said that it had always been the Special Committee's practice to hear petitioners from countries on its list anywhere, and that it had accordingly heard a petitioner on Equatorial Guinea in Cairo.

89. The representative of Poland said that he had listened with regret to the statement by the representative of Spain, and considered his attitude to be retrograde. It would be useless for the sub-committee to visit the Territory if it could not hear petitioners.

90. The representative of Spain said there was no question of the administering Power wishing to interfere in the sub-committee's work, but that it was his delegation's right, representing as it did a Member State of the United Nations, to state a reservation.

91. At its 460th meeting, the Special Committee, on the proposal of the Chairman, decided that the Sub-Committee on Equatorial Guinea should be composed of the representatives of Chile, Denmark, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria and the United Republic of Tanzania.

E. FURTHER CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE⁶

Introduction

92. The Special Committee further considered Equatorial Guinea (Fernando Póo and Río Muni) at its 482nd meeting held at Headquarters on 18 November 1966. The Committee had before it the report of the Sub-Committee on Equatorial Guinea (Fernando Póo and Río Muni), which is annexed hereto.

93. In letters dated 14 and 17 November 1966 (A/AC.109/213, A/AC.109/215), the Permanent Representatives of Cameroon and Spain requested permission for delegations of their respective countries to participate in the discussion of the question of Equatorial Guinea. At its 482nd meeting the Special Committee decided, without objection, to grant these requests.

Written petitions

94. The Special Committee circulated the following additional written petitions concerning Equatorial Guinea (Fernando Póo and Río Muni):

Petitioner	Document No.
Three petitions from Mr. Jesús Mba Ovono, Secretary-General, Idea Popular de la Guinea Ecuatorial (IPGE)	A/AC.109/PET.500/Add.1
Petition from IPGE	A/AC.109/PET.500/Add.2
Mr. Jesús Mba Ovono, Secretary-General, IPGE	A/AC.109/PET.500/Add.3
Two petitions from Mr. Pastor Torao Sikara, President General, and other members of the Movimiento Nacional de Liberación de la Guinea Ecuatorial (MNLGE)	A/AC.109/PET.529

⁶ See also chapter II (paras. 595-619) for an account of the discussions on the resolution adopted by the Special Committee at its 455th meeting on 22 June 1966 concerning the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) with regard to Territories considered by the Committee during its meetings in Africa.

Petitioner	Document No.
Petition from the Comité del Exterior, MNLGE	A/AC.109/PET.529/Add.1
Mr. Pastor Torao Sikara, President General, MNLGE	A/AC.109/PET.529/Add.2
Mr. J. W. Okori-Dougan	A/AC.109/PET.570

F. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON THE REPORT OF THE SUB-COMMITTEE ON EQUATORIAL GUINEA (FERNANDO PÓO AND RÍO MUNI)

95. At the 482nd meeting, the Chairman of the Special Committee, speaking as Chairman of the Sub-Committee on Equatorial Guinea, introduced the Sub-Committee's report (see annex). Pursuant to the resolution adopted by the Special Committee at its 454th meeting (see para. 79 above), the Sub-Committee had visited Madrid and Equatorial Guinea in August 1966, and had had an opportunity to talk both to Spanish Government officials and to a large number of bodies and individuals in Equatorial Guinea. Section I of the report gave information on the Territory, sections II and III an account of the discussions and consultations during the Sub-Committee's visits to Spain and to the Territory, and section IV the Sub-Committee's conclusions and recommendations. He was happy to report that, thanks to the spirit of compromise shown by all its members, the Sub-Committee had been able to adopt the report unanimously. He commended it to the Special Committee.

96. The representative of Spain said that the Territory of Equatorial Guinea, although remote from Spain geographically, was very close to Spain's heart, being the only area in Equatorial Africa where Spanish was spoken and Spanish customs were to be found. The people of the Territory were now preparing for a most important step in their history, but at the same time they did not wish to break their ties with Spain and were anxious to continue to receive Spanish assistance.

97. In inviting the Special Committee to visit the Territory, Spain had been aware that such an invitation represented a decisive step in the Committee's work. The appreciation expressed by the Sub-Committee for Spanish co-operation in the process of decolonization was gratifying, but Spain would have liked the Sub-Committee to give greater attention to Spain's achievements in the Territory.

98. He was not able to discuss the Sub-Committee's report in substance since his delegation had only just received the text and neither the Spanish Government nor the Autonomous Government of Equatorial Guinea had had an opportunity to study it. He would, however, make some preliminary comments. He wished first to pay a tribute to the Sub-Committee for its achievement in submitting such a detailed report as the result of such a brief visit. His delegation was not in agreement with the recommendation regarding the fixing of a date for independence, although it was true that paragraph 294 recognized that the fixing of a date must depend on the outcome of talks between representatives of the population and the Spanish authorities. Spain considered that it was for the population, in the exercise of self-determination, to fix the date for independence if it so wished.

99. Although he was surprised that greater importance had sometimes been given to unrepresentative groups and individuals than to the elected authorities, he had the impression that the Sub-Committee had been able to appreciate the qualities of those elected authorities. He was also surprised by suggestions that there was no freedom of political activity, since the members of the Sub-Committee had had an opportunity to verify the existence of political parties in the Territory.

100. He had read with interest the Sub-Committee's views concerning the maintenance of the unity of the Territory; it was because Spain favoured such unity that it had granted self-government to Equatorial Guinea as a single entity. He wondered, however, whether the report perhaps minimized some of the problems in that regard.

101. The importance attributed to the powers of the Commissioner-General and the suggestion that autonomy was fictitious were, in his view, refuted by the report itself. The members of the Sub-Committee had had an opportunity to verify that the supposed wide powers of the Commissioner-General did not exist in practice. He would also have liked to see a reference to the high level of economic, social and educational development in the Territory, considered in relation to that of the region in which it was situated.

102. With regard to criticisms which might be directed at constitutional arrangements in the Territory, he wished to point out that the terms of the Basic Law establishing the régime of autonomy had been worked out in agreement with representatives of the inhabitants and had been the subject of a referendum in which all adult inhabitants, male and female, had participated. The Basic Law allowed for amendment through established procedures. Above all, it enabled the inhabitants to exercise the right of self-determination and to decide upon their own future.

103. The representative of Mali considered that the conclusions and recommendations of the Sub-Committee were of great importance. His delegation also attached importance, however, to the fact that the Territories of Fernando Póo and Río Muni had been united under the Basic Law to form the Territory of Equatorial Guinea. Consequently, although he agreed with the recommendation in paragraph 301 of the report concerning the speedy transfer of all powers to the people, he thought that it should be made clear that, in accordance with the Basic Law, it was the united Territory of Equatorial Guinea which was to accede to independence.

104. The representative of Australia said that his delegation considered that the fact that the Sub-Committee had been invited by the Spanish Government to visit the Territory was to Spain's credit. He commended the Sub-Committee for its diligence and realism; in general, it would be hard to find fault with its conclusions and recommendations. His delegation attached particular importance to paragraph 304, in which the introduction of an electoral system based on universal adult suffrage was recommended. With regard to paragraph 301, he took it that the recommendation for the fixing of a date for independence not later than July 1968 was qualified by the words "in response to the wishes of the people". His delegation would hope that the date would be fixed by representatives of the people, elected on the basis of "one man, one vote", in consultation with the Spanish authorities. He would have preferred no time-limit to have been indicated in the paragraph and the matter to have been left entirely to the representatives of the people.

105. The representative of Iran said that the Sub-Committee was to be congratulated on the thorough study it had made of the question of Equatorial Guinea. In view of the fact that the Sub-Committee had adopted its report by unanimous vote, he proposed that the Special Committee should decide to adopt the report and to endorse the conclusions and recommendations on the understanding that the observations and reservations of delegations would be included in the record of the meeting.

106. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania welcomed the spirit of co-operation shown by the administering Power and the restraint with which the Spanish representative had expressed his views on the report. With regard to the Australian representative's remarks, he wished to make it clear that the question of fixing a date for independence had been raised by people interviewed by the Sub-Committee in the Territory; that was why the reference to "the wishes of the people" had been included in paragraph 301. He fully agreed that it was the wishes of the people of Equatorial Guinea which must be decisive; the people were naturally free to change their decision, though he certainly hoped that they would not decide that they did not want independence by July 1968. In view of the pressure of time, the details of the question could be left for discussion by the Fourth Committee, including the point raised by the representative of Mali. In the meantime he would support the proposal of the representative of Iran.

107. The representative of Denmark said that, as a member of the Sub-Committee he wished to express his appreciation of the co-operation that Spain had given the Sub-Committee. The recommendation concerning the date for independence had been the subject of protracted discussions in the Sub-Committee and his delegation had had some hesitation about it, but it had accepted the inclusion of the recommendation in view of the reference to the wishes of the people. The mention of a date had been made in response to wishes expressed by the inhabitants, for it had been the clear impression of the Sub-Committee that the overwhelming majority of the people wanted independence not later than July 1968.

108. The representative of the United Kingdom said that he did not object to the Iranian proposal. His delegation, not having had time to study the report, was not in a position to express views on it, but would not wish for that reason to hold up the Special Committee's decision.

109. The representative of the United States of America said that he too had no objection to the Iranian proposal. His delegation wished to express its appreciation of the hard work done by the Sub-Committee and of the co-operation given by the Spanish Government. He wished to record his delegation's reservation regarding paragraph 301, for similar reasons to those expressed by the Australian representative, and regarding paragraph 309.

110. The representative of Madagascar supported the views expressed by the representative of Mali and asked for the inclusion in paragraph 301 of a phrase to the effect that it was understood that independence would be granted to Equatorial Guinea as a single entity, in accordance with the Basic Law and the resolutions of the United Nations.

111. The representative of Venezuela said that he could accept the Iranian proposal but wished to state that his delegation had not had an opportunity to study the report and therefore reserved the right to raise points in connexion with it in the Fourth Committee.

112. The representative of Cameroon said there were many historical and traditional bonds between his country and Equatorial Guinea and many ethnic groups common to both. His delegation was therefore particularly grateful for the statements in favour of their emancipation.

113. The proposal by the representatives of Mali and Madagascar for an addition to paragraph 301 of the Sub-Committee's report (see annex) did not constitute an amendment to the report. The addition to that paragraph would lay stress on the contents of paragraph 291, which made it clear that only a small minority among the Bubis of Fernando Póo and certain vested interests tended to favour the separation of Fernando Póo and Río Muni. The majority of the population of Equatorial Guinea unquestionably wanted their country to become independent as a single State.

114. At the 482nd meeting on 18 November 1966, the Special Committee decided to adopt the proposal of the representative of Iran. By this decision, the Special Committee adopted the report of the Sub-Committee on Equatorial Guinea (see annex), and endorsed the conclusions and recommendations contained therein, it being understood that the observations and reservations made by members would appear in the record.

ANNEX

[A/AC.109/L.348]

Report of the Sub-Committee on Equatorial Guinea (Fernando Póo and Río Muni)

Rapporteur: Mr. Rafic JOUÉJATI (Syria)

CONTENTS

	Paragraphs
Introduction	1-13
I. Information on the Territory	14-77
II. Discussions with officials of the Spanish Government	78-120
III. Consultations with the people of the Territory	121-285
IV. Conclusions and recommendations	286-310
V. Adoption of the report	311

APPENDICES

I. Itinerary and programme of meetings	398
II. Representatives of corporative bodies and co-operatives elected to municipal councils	398
III. Representatives of heads of families elected to municipal councils	399
IV. Breakdown of electorate (heads of families) at municipal council level in 1964	399

INTRODUCTION

1. At its 454th meeting on 21 June 1966, the Special Committee adopted a resolution concerning Equatorial Guinea (see para. 79 of chapter IX), operative paragraphs 1 and 3 of which read as follows:

"1. Notes with satisfaction the open invitation made to it by the administering Power to visit Equatorial Guinea;

"...

"3. Decides to send to Equatorial Guinea, as soon as practicable, a sub-committee to ascertain the conditions in the Territory with a view to speeding up the implementation of General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) and 2067 (XX);".

2. At the 460th meeting on 5 August 1966, the Chairman informed the Special Committee that the Government of Spain would find it convenient to receive the Sub-Committee during the third week of August 1966, and would agree to a visit to the Territory during a period of approximately eight days thereafter.

3. At the same meeting the Special Committee, on the proposal of the Chairman, decided without objection that the Sub-Committee on Equatorial Guinea should consist of Chile, Denmark, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria and the United Republic of Tanzania. The Sub-Committee was composed of the following representatives:

Mr. Gershon B. O. Collier (Sierra Leone) (Chairman)

Mr. Hernán Sánchez (Chile)

Mr. Skjold G. Mellbin (Denmark)

Mr. Yaya Diakite (Mali)

Mr. Kazimierz Smiganowski (Poland)

Mr. Rafic Jouéjati (Syria)

Mr. John W. S. Malecela (United Republic of Tanzania)

4. Following consultations with the Spanish Government, the Sub-Committee visited Madrid from the morning of 17 August to the evening of 18 August 1966. During its stay in Madrid, the Sub-Committee held meetings with senior officials of the Spanish Government, an account of which is included in section II of this report.

5. The Sub-Committee then visited Equatorial Guinea (Fernando Póo and Río Muni) from 19 August to 24 August 1966. It was in Fernando Póo from 19 August to 21 August 1966 and in Río Muni from 22 August to 24 August 1966.

6. On the arrival of the Sub-Committee in the Territory, arrangements were made by the local authorities at its request for the public to be informed, through the Press and by radio, of the purpose of its visit to the Territory, its terms of reference, and its programme, as well as of its desire to receive oral and written evidence from all bodies, groups and individuals, wishing to consult with it.

7. While in the Territory the Sub-Committee held meetings and had discussions with the Commissioner-General and other officials, an account of which is included in section II. The Sub-Committee also held meetings with members of the governmental and legislative organs, and with a large number of bodies, groups and individuals, an account of which is contained in section III of this report. Members of the Sub-Committee also had informal contacts and conversations with a sizable number of personalities and individuals in the Territory.

8. The itinerary and programme of the Sub-Committee in Madrid and in Equatorial Guinea is attached to this report as appendix I. During its visit the Sub-Committee was accompanied by a secretariat composed of Mr. K. K. S. Dadzie (Principal Secretary), Mr. Richard W. Wathen (Political and Administrative Officer), Messrs. Pierre Dufour and Juan Rodríguez (Interpreters) and Mrs. Cecilia T. Bowles (Secretary).

9. The Sub-Committee reconvened at Headquarters on 30 September 1966. It held thirteen meetings between that date and 18 October 1966, when it adopted its report.

10. The information gathered by the Sub-Committee concerning conditions in the Territory is contained in section I of this report. Its conclusions and recommendations are set out in section IV.

11. The Sub-Committee expresses its appreciation to the Spanish Government for the invitation to visit Madrid and the Territory, for the welcome and hospitality extended to it, and for the facilities placed at its disposal by the Spanish officials concerned with the arrangements for its visit. The Sub-Committee is appreciative also of the assistance and co-operation made available to it by the Commissioner-General and his colleagues.

12. The Sub-Committee also acknowledges with gratitude the cordial welcome and the facilities extended to it by the Governing Council and the two Provincial Councils of the Territory. It wishes to pay tribute to the warmth of the reception, the generosity, and the co-operation accorded to it by all the various bodies, groups and individuals with whom it had contact.

13. The Sub-Committee's visit to Equatorial Guinea, as well as its brief stay in Madrid, was very useful in providing elucidation of the problems of the Territory. In particular the visit was of great assistance in enabling the Sub-Committee to ascertain conditions in the Territory and in acquainting it at first hand with the aspirations of the people of Equatorial Guinea.

I. INFORMATION ON THE TERRITORY

A. GENERAL

14. The Territory of Equatorial Guinea consists of the provinces of Fernando Póo and Río Muni, the former comprising the island of that name, adjacent islets and island of Annobón, while the latter comprises the continental area bordered on the north by Cameroon and on the south and east by Gabon, as well as the islands of Corisco, Elobey Grande, Elobey Chico and adjacent islets. The area of Fernando Póo is 2,034 square kilometres, and that of Río Muni 26,017. The capital of Fernando Póo is Santa Isabel and that of Río Muni is Bata.

15. The total population of the Territory today is estimated to be 260,000. According to the 1960 census, when the total population was 245,898 inhabitants, 62,612 lived in Fernando Póo and 183,377 in Río Muni. Of those living in Fernando Póo, 58,390 were Africans, including Nigerian workers and other non-indigenous groups, and 4,222 were Europeans, while the figures for Río Muni were 180,513 and 2,864 respectively. Population density was 31 per square kilometre and 7 per square kilometre respectively. The largest urban agglomeration is Santa Isabel which, in 1963, had an estimated population of approximately 28,000. The next largest town is Bata with an estimated population of 25,700 in 1963.

16. The indigenous population consists chiefly of two groups, the Bubis in Fernando Póo and the Fangs (also known as Pámues) in Río Muni. Other smaller groups in Río Muni are the Kombes, Bengas and Bujebas. Detailed figures are not available. There is a large non-indigenous African population, mainly from Nigeria, numbering approximately 32,000 in 1966, working in the Territory usually on fixed term contracts; this element of the population is most numerous in Fernando Póo. The non-African population is almost entirely Spanish.

B. GOVERNMENT

Constitution of 1963/1964

17. Fernando Póo and Río Muni, which in 1959 had been given the status of integral provinces of Spain, were accorded a new constitutional framework in 1963 under the designation of Equatorial Guinea. This framework was defined by Basic Law No. 191/1963 of 20 December (Ley de Bases) granting Equatorial Guinea, in the words of the law, "a régime of autonomy".^a

18. The new constitutional structure was initiated by a declaration of the Spanish Government following a decision taken in the Council of Ministers on 9 August 1963 regarding the granting of autonomy to the Territory. A commission of the Spanish Cortes, which included participants from the Territory, drew up a bill for a basic law providing for a new system of government. The bill was approved by the Cortes. Before being sanctioned by the Head of State of Spain, the Law was submitted to a plebiscite held on 15 December 1963 which was open to nationals, African and Spanish, duly registered over the age of 21 years. The non-indigenous African population did not, of course, qualify to vote under these conditions.

19. The number of registered voters in the plebiscite was 126,378, of whom 17,699 were in Fernando Póo and 108,679 in Río Muni. According to the administering Power the results of the plebiscite were as follows:

	Votes cast	In favour	Against
Fernando Póo	12,500	5,340	7,150
Río Muni	82,317	53,940	28,387
TOTAL	94,817	59,280	35,537

20. Following the plebiscite, the Basic Law was promulgated on 20 December 1963. During the first half of 1964, the various councils envisaged under the Basic Law came into being. The Governing Council was constituted on 15 May 1964 and on 27 May 1964 the President of the Governing Council was designated. The régime of autonomy came into effect on 16 July 1964.

21. A law providing an expanded text of the Basic Law of the autonomous régime was promulgated by Decree 1885/1964, of 3 July 1964. This law (Ley Articulada sobre régimen autónomo de la Guinea Ecuatorial) was drawn up in accordance with article 1 of the Final Clauses of the Basic Law whereby the Government of Spain was empowered to decree an expanded text of the Basic Law in consultation with the representatives of the autonomous régime comprising the Governing Council of Equatorial Guinea. The Ley Articulada contains the essential legislative basis of the present régime of autonomy.

22. The Basic Law stipulates that nationals born in Fernando Póo and Río Muni shall enjoy the same rights and shall be bound by the same duties as "other Spaniards" under the Fundamental Laws, and that "the right of representation in the Spanish Cortes shall continue to be guaranteed". Under these arrangements, Fernando Póo and Río Muni are represented in the Cortes on the same basis as other Spanish provinces, each province of the Territory providing three deputies. These are the mayors of Santa Isabel and Bata, one deputy each for Fernando Póo and Río Muni, respectively, representing the other municipal councils, and a representative of each of the two provincial councils, currently the Presidents.

Organs of government

23. The Basic Law states that the government and administration of Equatorial Guinea shall be representative in nature and shall be entrusted to a General Assembly and a Governing Council. As well as making provision for the establishment of these organs, the Law establishes the Office of the Commissioner-General, who represents the Government of Spain in the Territory and is appointed by decree of the Head of State of Spain.

24. The Governing Council is constituted by a President and eight Councillors, four from Fernando Póo and four from Río Muni. The Councillors are elected by the Assembly while the President is appointed by decree from a list of three candidates proposed by the Governing Council. They serve for a four-year term. The present President of the Governing Council is Mr. Bonifacio Ondó Edú.

25. The General Assembly consists of the Provincial Council (Diputaciones) of Fernando Póo and Río Muni meeting in joint session. It holds at least two sessions a year alternately at Santa Isabel and Bata. Within their spheres of competence, the two provincial councils are the organs of local government in their respective provinces. The Provincial Councils of Fernando Póo and Río Muni comprise eight and ten members respectively. Should any of these members be elected by the Assembly to the Governing Council, the resulting vacancies are filled in accordance with electoral procedures set out below (see paras. 40-42).

Powers and jurisdiction of the organs of government

26. According to the Basic Law of 1963, the Governing Council takes over the functions previously exercised by the Governor-General with the exception of those assigned to the

^a The text of the above-mentioned Basic Law is to be found in the annex of document A/AC.109/71.

Commissioner-General. Members of the Council are empowered to assume, on appointment by the President, supervisory functions over one or more of the departments of the Administration. According to the provisions of the Ley Articulada, these departments are under the direction of technical personnel appointed by the Spanish Government on the recommendation of the Commissioner-General who is advised by the President of the Governing Council. The Council's functions include submitting bills to the General Assembly, drawing up a draft budget pertaining to revenues and expenditures in the provinces (but not pertaining to subsidies from the Spanish Government) and implementing the decisions of the General Assembly within the sphere of its competence. It also puts forward a list of three candidates for President of the Governing Council, one of whom is then nominated by decree of the Spanish Government. It has the same functions with regard to the appointment of the Civil Governor for each province. The Governing Council is also empowered to appoint a delegate to Madrid to ensure on its behalf the better dispatch and co-ordination of affairs of the autonomous administration connected with the work of the various official bodies.

27. An important limitation to the above powers, however, are those assigned to the Commissioner-General who inter alia, as the representative of the Spanish Government:

(a) Co-ordinates the autonomous administration with the central administration;

(b) Advises the Governing Council in the performance of its duties;

(c) Is responsible for public law and order, having at his disposal for this purpose the Armed Forces, and may, to the extent that he thinks fit, delegate authority in this field to the Civil Governors who in these matters are responsible to him;

(d) Conducts relations with authorities outside Equatorial Guinea;

(e) May propose to the Spanish Government the suspension of the acts of the Governing Council in the following cases:

(i) When these acts concern matters outside the Council's jurisdiction,

(ii) When they constitute a criminal offence,

(iii) When they are contrary to law and order, and

(iv) When they constitute a manifest breach of the law.

The Commissioner-General may "if execution of such acts should incur a risk of serious harm" suspend such acts on his own initiative, reporting post facto to the Spanish Government. The Commissioner-General may also propose the dismissal of the President and Councillors of the Governing Council. He also has powers of intervention in such spheres as information and entertainments, post and telecommunications, and airports. Further, his competence extends to immigration and the police.

28. The functions of the General Assembly include the following:

(a) To propose legislation applicable to territorial affairs supplementing existing legislation. Such proposals, which require the approval of the Commissioner-General, may be returned by the latter to the Assembly for further consideration. Should the Assembly maintain its previous proposals, the final decision would rest with the Spanish Government.

(b) To approve the ordinary budget of Equatorial Guinea submitted by the Governing Council. The Basic Law provides, however, that so long as the Spanish State directly or indirectly subsidizes the economy of Equatorial Guinea, its budget must be approved finally by the Spanish Cortes.

(c) To request by a two-thirds majority, modifications in existing legislation which, together with the comments of the Commissioner-General, are referred for approval to the Spanish Government.

29. The General Assembly, which elects the eight members of the Governing Council, may also propose their dismissal as well as that of the President of the Council, by a two-thirds majority. The Commissioner-General, as noted above, may also put forward such a proposal. Final action in this regard rests with the Spanish Government.

30. In each province there is a Civil Governor, who is the representative of the Governing Council, although, as noted above, for the maintenance of law and order they are responsible to the Commissioner-General. According to the Ley Articulada, the Civil Governors must be indigenous inhabitants of the provinces to which they are appointed.

Electoral system

31. The autonomous régime of Equatorial Guinea is described in Base (or Statute) V of the Basic Law as being representative in character, and Base XII prescribes that the various councils shall be organized according to the principles of corporate representation. In Article 12 of the Ley Articulada, the régime is described as being "organically" representative. This is a reflection of the large part played by the "corporations", variously called corporative bodies or economic, cultural and professional entities together with the co-operatives, as the units representing the people, based upon the corporativist philosophy that man is best represented according to the function he plays in society.

32. Each of the provincial councils (diputaciones) which, when meeting in joint session, form the General Assembly of the Territory, is composed as follows: half its members are elected by the corporative bodies (i.e., economic, cultural and professional entities) and the co-operatives, and the other half by the municipal councils (ayuntamientos). A list of these bodies is given in paragraph 42 below.

33. As for the municipal councils, half their membership is elected also by corporative bodies and co-operatives and the other half by a vote of heads of families of the electoral unit. The number of councillors in each municipal council depends on the size of the population of the town in question. The mayors-chairmen of the municipal councils are appointed from among the councils concerned by the Civil Governor (see para. 30) from a list of three names proposed by these councils. In contrast, the Mayors-Chairmen of Santa Isabel and Bata, however, are appointed by the Spanish Government from a list of three candidates submitted by the respective councils. The number of municipal councils, as created by the Order of 24 May 1962, was four in Fernando Póe and eleven in Río Muni.

34. Within the jurisdiction of the municipal councils there are village councils (juntas vecinales) consisting of a chief and four members elected by heads of families. It should be noted, however, that these councils are concerned solely with local matters and play no part in the formation of the provincial councils, General Assembly and Governing Council. The number of village councils, as created by the Order of 24 May 1962, was forty-two in Fernando Póe and 146 in Río Muni.

35. In view of the important part played by the corporative bodies and co-operatives in the electoral process as introduced in Equatorial Guinea, it is necessary to describe them in more detail. As noted above, they account for half the membership of the provincial councils and half the membership of the municipal councils which themselves provide the other half of the members of the provincial councils. Moreover, as will be seen below, the specific corporative entities and co-operatives given the right to be represented are, in practice, substantially the same bodies at both the municipal council and provincial council levels.

36. At the municipal council level, the procedure for the election of representatives of the corporative bodies (economic, cultural and professional entities) and the co-operatives is outlined in the Instruction of 25 January 1964 issued by the former Governor-General. Each corporative body and co-operative was invited to name its delegate who, with his fellow delegates from the other corporative bodies and co-operatives in the area, proceeded to elect representatives to their respective municipal councils. These representatives were required to be residents over the age of twenty-three belonging to the bodies concerned. Their candidatures were put forward by these bodies at the same time as the latter named their delegates to act as electors in this process. The corporative bodies and co-operatives having the right to name their delegates and propose candidates for the election of representatives to their respective municipal councils were the following:

(1) Corporative bodies entitled to name delegates for elections to municipal councils

(a) Province of Fernando Póo
For San Carlos

- (i) Chamber of Agriculture, Commerce and Industry (Cámara oficial Agrícola de Comercio e Industria)
- (ii) Commission of Port Administration (Comisión Administrativa del Puerto)

For Santa Isabel

- (iii) Provincial Social Security Fund (Caja Provincial de Seguros Sociales)
- (iv) Chamber of Agriculture, Commerce and Industry (Cámara Oficial Agraria de Comercio e Industria)
- (v) Commission of Port Administration (Comisión Administrativa del Puerto)
- (vi) Teacher Training College (Escuela Normal del Magisterio)
- (vii) St. Thomas Aquinas School for Assistant Teachers (Escuela Superior Provincial de Santo Tomás de Aquino)
- (viii) Bar Association (Ilustre Colegio de Abogados)
- (ix) National Institute of Secondary Education (Instituto Nacional de Enseñanza Media)

(b) Province of Río Muni

For Bata

- (x) Chamber of Agriculture, Forestry, Commerce and Industry (Cámara Agrícola, Forestal, de Comercio e Industria)
- (xi) Commission of Port Administration (Comisión Administrativa del Puerto)
- (xii) School of Arts and Crafts (Escuela de Artes y Oficios)
- (xiii) Teacher Training College (Escuela Normal del Magisterio)
- (xiv) Bar Association (Ilustre Colegio de Abogados)
- (xv) National Institute of Secondary Education—Bata branch (Sección Delegada del Instituto Nacional de Enseñanza Media)

For Río Benito

- (xvi) Timber Syndicate (Sindicato Maderero)

(2) Co-operatives entitled to name delegates for election to municipal councils

(a) Province of Fernando Póo

For Annobón

- (i) Co-operative of San Antonio

For San Carlos

- (ii) — (xvii) Co-operatives of Claret de Batete, Bocatoricho, Balombe, San Luis de Bombe, Boloco, Bantabaré, Balachá-Maule, Baho Pequeño, Baho Grande, Bilelipa, Eburu-Ehoco, Moca, Musola, Mueri, Rilaja-Oloitia, Ruitche, Ureca.

For Santa Isabel

- (xviii) — (xxiv) Co-operatives of Baney, Basacato de la Sagrada Familia, Bariobé, Bacaque Pequeño, Bacaque Grande, San Luis de Cupapa, Santa Teresa de Bososo.
- (xxv) Provincial Union of Agricultural Co-operatives (Unión Provincial de Cooperativas del Campo)
- (xxvi) Provincial Co-operative of Light Transport (Co-operativa Provincial de Transportes Ligeros)

(b) Province of Río Muni

For Bata

- (xxvii) Provincial Union of Agricultural Co-operatives (Unión Provincial de Cooperativas del Campo)

For Ebebiyín

- (xxviii) Co-operative of San Juan Bautista de Río Nsie
- (xxix) Co-operative of San Jenaro de Ovang

For Micomeseng

- (xxx) Co-operative of Santiago de Ncomo

For Valladolid de los Bimbiles

- (xxxi) Co-operative of Medina del Bosque

37. These bodies elected a total of fifty-eight representatives to the municipal councils of Fernando Póo and Río Muni with between two and five representatives per municipality depending on its size.^b The heads of families, for their part, also provided a total of fifty-eight representatives distributed on a basis of between two and five representatives per municipality again depending on its size.^c

38. The number of other electors participating in elections to municipalities was 45,286.^d These were the heads of families voting for their half of the membership of the municipal councils. For electoral purposes, heads of families are those over the age of twenty-one years with dependants and those over the age of twenty-one without dependants who do not live in the family group. They must be residents duly registered on the electoral rolls established by the Department of Statistics of the Territory. They include Spanish residents ("other inhabitants") who, according to the Ley Articulada have the same rights and duties as the indigenous population so long as they are residents (avecindados), and duly registered as such.

39. Candidates standing for election to municipal councils representing heads of family must themselves be heads of family over the age of twenty-three, resident in the areas concerned, and may propose themselves directly to the Municipal Census Office or be proposed to the latter, in accordance with one of the following conditions:

- (a) If they have already served or have been currently serving as municipal councillors for at least one year in the council concerned;
- (b) If they are proposed by four other councillors or ex-councillors of the municipal council concerned, or three provincial councillors, or two deputies of the Cortes;
- (c) If they receive the endorsement of one twentieth of the registered electors of the area concerned;
- (d) If they own agricultural, industrial or commercial concerns within the limits of the area concerned.

Proposed candidates are disqualified from standing for election if they are in debt, have been sentenced to prison terms or have been judged incapable of holding public office, or are involved in litigation against the municipal council in question or the services under its jurisdiction. Other disqualifications relate to personnel in the employment of the municipal council in question, as well as entrepreneurs and their personnel who provide goods or services to the municipal council, and persons who hold concessions, or are bidding for contracts or subsidies involving public funds administered by the municipal council in question.

40. At the level of the provincial councils, as mentioned above, half their members are elected by the municipal councils and the other half by the corporative bodies and co-operatives.

^b In some municipalities, however, where there were as yet no corporative bodies or co-operatives in existence to elect candidates in the manner set out in paragraph 36 above, members were nominated directly by the authorities. In the municipal council elections in 1964, 38 out of 58 members representing the corporative bodies and co-operatives were so nominated.

^c For details, see appendices II and III.

^d For details, see appendix IV.

The procedure governing these elections is set out in an instruction issued by the former Acting Governor-General on 7 March 1964.

41. The members representing the municipal councils are elected by a group of delegates appointed for this purpose by the municipal councils. These elect their representatives to the provincial councils as follows: in Fernando Póo out of a total of four, one is elected directly by the Municipal Council of Santa Isabel, and the remaining three jointly by the delegates of the Councils of Annobón, San Carlos and San Fernando. In Río Muni, out of a group of five, one is elected directly by the Municipal Council of Bata and the remaining four jointly by the delegates of the Councils of Acurenam, Ebebiyín, Evinayong, Micomeseng, Mongomo de Guadalupe, N'sork, Puerto Iradier, Río Benito, Sevilla de Niefang and Valladolid de los Bimbiles.

42. The other half of membership of the provincial councils representing the corporative bodies and co-operatives is broken down as follows: for Fernando Póo: two representatives of corporative bodies, and two representatives of co-operatives. For Río Muni: three representatives of corporative bodies and two representatives of co-operatives. As in the case of the municipal councils, the corporative bodies and co-operatives concerned appoint delegates who proceed to the election of candidates (which they also propose) as their representatives to the provincial councils. The corporative bodies and co-operatives given the right to name delegates and propose candidates are the following:

(1) Corporative bodies entitled to name representatives to the provincial councils

(a) Province of Fernando Póo

- (i) Social Security Fund (Caja de Seguros Sociales)
- (ii) Chamber of Agriculture, Commerce and Industry (Cámara Oficial Agrícola de Comercio e Industria)
- (iii) Commission of Port Administration, San Carlos (Comisión Administrativa del Puerto de San Carlos)
- (iv) Commission of Port Administration, Santa Isabel (Comisión Administrativa del Puerto de Santa Isabel)
- (v) Teacher Training College (Escuela Normal del Magisterio)
- (vi) St. Thomas Aquinas School for Assistant Teachers (Escuela Superior Santo Tomás de Aquino)
- (vii) Bar Association (Ilustre Colegio de Abogados)
- (viii) National Institute of Secondary Education (Instituto Nacional de Enseñanza Media)

(b) Province of Río Muni

- (ix) Chamber of Agriculture, Forestry, Commerce and Industry (Cámara Oficial Agrícola Forestal de Comercio e Industria)
- (x) Commission of Port and Harbour Administration, Bata (Comisión Administrativa del Puerto de Bata y fondeaderos)
- (xi) School of Arts and Crafts (Escuela de Artes y Oficios)
- (xii) Teacher Training College (Escuela Normal del Magisterio)
- (xiii) Bar Association (Ilustre Colegio de Abogados)
- (xiv) National Institute of Secondary Education (Instituto Nacional de Enseñanza Media)
- (xv) Timber Syndicate (Sindicato Maderero)

(2) Co-operatives entitled to name representatives to the provincial councils

(a) Province of Fernando Póo

For Annobón

- (i) Co-operative of San Antonio

For San Carlos

- (ii) — (xvii) Co-operatives of Baho Grande, Baho Pequeño, Balachá-Maule, Balombe, Bantabaré, Claret de Batete, Bilelipa, Bocoricho, Boloco, San Luis de Bombe, Eburu-Ehoco, Musola, Mueri, Rilaja-Oloitia, Ruitche, Ureca.

For Santa Isabel

- (xviii) — (xxiv) Co-operatives of Baney, Basacato de la Sagrada Familia, Bariobé, Bacaque Pequeño, Bacaque Grande, San Luis de Cupapa, Santa Teresa de Bososo.
- (xxv) Provincial Union of Agricultural Co-operatives (Unión Provincial de Cooperativas del Campo)
- (xxvi) Provincial Co-operative of Light Transport (Cooperativa Provincial de Transportes Ligeros)

(b) Province of Río Muni

For Bata

- (xxvii) Provincial Union of Agricultural Co-operatives (Unión Provincial de Cooperativas del Campo)

For Ebebiyín

- (xxviii) Co-operative of San Juan Bautista del Río Nsie
- (xxix) Co-operative of San Jenaro de Oveng

For Micomeseng

- (xxx) Co-operative of Santiago de Ncomo

For Valladolid de los Bimbiles

- (xxxi) Co-operative of Medina del Bosque

Justice

43. The highest court in the Territory is the Supreme Court (Tribunal Superior) which has the jurisdiction attributed by law to the territorial courts (audiencias territoriales) and the Central Labour Court (Tribunal Central del Trabajo). Decisions of this court may be appealed to the Supreme Court of Spain. Judicial appointments are made by the President or the Spanish Government on the advice of the Spanish Ministry of Justice in the case of candidates from the metropolitan country. In the case of indigenous candidates, appointments are made by the Commissioner-General on the advice of the President of the Supreme Court of Equatorial Guinea. The Sub-Committee noted the need for the employment of Africans as judicial officers since at present, most of these judicial appointments are held by expatriates.

C. ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

General

44. Equatorial Guinea's economy is based predominantly upon agriculture and forestry: cacao in Fernando Póo and coffee and timber in Río Muni. Other crops that are cultivated both for home consumption and export include yucca, palm oil and kernels, coconuts and bananas. The development of fisheries, although slow at the start is reported to be going ahead rapidly.

45. Of the main crops, cacao is the most important. Exports are chiefly to the metropolitan country where preferential treatment is granted. The average output is approximately 30,000 tons a year. Coffee, which is granted similar preferential treatment, reaches an average annual output of 6,000 tons.

46. In 1964 there were thirty-eight companies engaged in timber production in Río Muni, chiefly around Bata, Río Benito and Cogo where they had been granted concessions amounting to approximately 170,000 hectares; another 13,000 hectares elsewhere in the region were exploited by smaller concerns. There are about 140 different species of timber in the region which is reported to hamper concentration on those most in demand in foreign markets. In 1963 the output was

315,581 tons and investment at the time in machinery and installations was approximately 750 million pesetas.^e

47. The production of bananas at one time reached 14,000 tons per annum, while yucca, which used to be an important export to Spain, now chiefly supplies the home market apart from about 6,000 tons still exported to Spain in 1963.

48. Local industry which is in the early stages of development is chiefly concerned with the processing of foods and agricultural products such as oil and soap, the processing of cacao and by-products, yucca and coffee. Seafood canning factories have also been established. Most of these new local industries are chiefly located in Fernando Póo.

Economic and Social Development Plan

49. The Economic and Social Development Plan which was conceived as a section of the over-all Spanish plan of economic and social development was drafted by a Special Commission created by an Order of the President of the Spanish Government on 5 May 1962 after extensive field surveys and consultations in the Territory itself. The period of the Plan is from 1964 to 1967 and covers both the public and private sectors although initially, at least, emphasis is being placed on the public sector where a detailed programme of expenditure on economic and social projects has been worked out.

50. At the end of the four-year period covered by the Plan, the objective is to achieve an annual cumulative growth rate in gross regional product of 7.56 per cent. The following table illustrates results anticipated under the Plan:

^e Statistics in the following sections on economic and social conditions relate, with few exceptions, to 1963 and 1964. Up-to-date figures were not available to the Sub-Committee.

	1962	1964	1967a
	(million (1962) pesetas)
Gross regional product	2,301	2,662	3,311
Imported goods and services	1,151	1,356	1,723
TOTAL RESOURCES AVAILABLE	3,452	4,018	5,034
Private consumption	1,450	1,709	2,185
Public consumption	235	291	371
Gross internal investment	369	525	761
Goods and services exported	1,398	1,493	1,717
TOTAL RESOURCES USED	3,452	4,018	5,034

^a 60 pesetas are equivalent to $US1.00.

51. It may be noted that the gross regional product was reckoned at 1,501.5 million pesetas in 1954 and that the mean annual cumulative growth rate between 1954 and 1962 reckoned in pesetas of constant value amounted to 5.5 per cent.

52. Expenditures under the Development Plan, comprising both public and private expenditure, is estimated at 2,579 million pesetas ($42,833,333) for the period of the Plan. Of this amount, public expenditure will account for 1,651 million pesetas ($27,366,667) while private expenditure is estimated at 928 million pesetas ($18,466,666). Total public and private expenditure planned for each year between 1964 and 1967 is as follows:

	Million (1962) pesetas
1964	547
1965	607
1966	664
1967	761
TOTAL	2,579

53. A summary of the programme of public expenditure for 1964-1967 by sector is as follows:

	1964	1965	1966	1967	Total
	(million (1962) pesetas)
Social expenditure
Education and vocational training	33	37	46	56	142
Health	40	52	61	76	229
Housing and urban development	47	50	53	56	206
Expenditure in productive sectors
Agriculture	1.7	4.3	4.3	60	11.3
Mining	7.3	6.3	—	—	13.6
Airports	117.1	108.9	5.4	4.8	236.2
Public works	80.6	100.7	214.4	267.2	662.9
State aid to local corporations	30	30	30	30	120.0
TOTAL PUBLIC EXPENDITURE	356.7	389.2	414.1	491.0	1,651.0

54. The financing of the Plan's public expenditure programme is reported to be as follows:

	1964	1965	1966	1967	Total
	(million (1962) pesetas)
Equatorial Guinea budget	159.6	200.3	225.7	265.2	850.8
Spanish State budget	197.1	188.9	188.4	225.8	800.2
TOTAL	356.7	389.2	414.1	491.0	1,651.0

55. Public expenditure undertaken under the Spanish State budget accordingly is 800.2 million pesetas, representing 48.47 per cent of the total expenditure planned for the four-year period 1964-1967.

56. Some of the predominant elements of the Plan are reported to include: (a) the training of indigenous technical and administrative personnel with considerable stress being given to various forms of technical or vocational training; (b) the modernization and diversification of agriculture involving better credit facilities and transport to ensure better prospects of facing competition on the international market, as well as developing the production of other crops; (c) the development of processing industries, in particular fisheries, where salting and canning factories offer good prospects for export; (d) the expansion of port and harbour facilities especially in Fernando Póo to cater inter alia for the above-mentioned fisheries; (e) research into the feasibility of refining oil from neighbouring zones as well as prospecting in this field; (f) the extension of the free port zones of Santa Isabel and San Carlos with the addition of factories and warehouses to serve the West African coast; (g) the development of tourism especially in Santa Isabel but also in Río Muni; and (h) the rapid expansion of transport and communications upon which much of the above-mentioned items to a large extent depend.

Budget

57. According to chapter IX of the Ley Articulada promulgated by Decree 1885/1964 of 3 July 1964, public expenditure is divided between the ordinary budget for Equatorial Guinea and the Budget of State Aid and Collaboration (Presupuesto de Ayuda y Colaboración del Estado a la Guinea Ecuatorial). The latter consists chiefly of subsidies, grants and direct or indirect aid from the Spanish State. It includes expenditure under the Development Plan and also on such items as administration of justice, armed forces, Commissariat-General and the maritime and air services.

58. Figures available for the 1964 financial year indicate expenditures as follows: 422,189,197 pesetas ($US7,036,485) under the Equatorial Guinea budget; and 826,413,308 pesetas ($US13,773,555) under the Spanish State budget. The total figure of public expenditure was 1,248,602,505 pesetas ($US20,810,040).

59. Estimates of public expenditure for 1965 made at the end of 1964 amounted to 1,053,355 million pesetas.

60. The price supplements on subsidies for cacao and coffee represent the largest single item of expenditure on the part of the Spanish Government. It is admitted that this is a basically unsatisfactory situation and the Plan therefore recognizes the need for modernization and rationalization of the production of coffee and cacao to make them more competitive in world markets.

61. Detailed information concerning the sources of internal revenue was not available. Import taxes on consumer goods appear to be generally low, with the exception of those on wine and liquor.

62. It should be noted that according to chapter IX of the Ley Articulada (and Base IV of the Basic Law) the entire budget of Equatorial Guinea must be approved by the Spanish Cortes so long as direct and indirect subsidies are received from the Spanish State. Thus the ordinary budget is drawn up by the Governing Council based upon a technical draft submitted by the Department of Finance in the Territory. It must be approved by the General Assembly before 1 October, after which it goes to the Presidency of the Spanish Government where any necessary adjustments are made to accord with the current subsidies on the advice of the Spanish Ministry of Finance. It must finally be submitted to the Spanish Cortes during the first two weeks of November. It should also be noted that legislation governing taxation in Equatorial Guinea is also approved by the Spanish Cortes.

Co-operatives

63. The development of co-operatives began in 1940 in the Moka Valley of Fernando Póo with the aim of organizing agriculture. Later they flourished primarily in the cacao growing areas of Fernando Póo where in 1964 approximately thirty co-operatives harvested 1,200 tons of cacao. The total production, however, was over 26,000 tons. In Río Muni co-operatives are less developed. Although some figures indicate a total of thirty-four co-operatives¹ with a total of 4,232 members, those listed as having the right of electing representatives, together with the corporative bodies, to municipal councils and provincial councils amount to twenty-six from Fernando Póo and five from Río Muni. Under the Development Plan it is intended to encourage the growth of co-operatives particularly in Río Muni where they are to be based on coffee as well as other products. Since 1964 long-term credit for the development of the co-operative system amounts to about 73 million pesetas.

Housing and public works

64. In 1965 the National Housing Institute constructed about 1,500 dwellings at a cost of 301 million pesetas. A programme of houses for teachers was also undertaken. A sum of 28,012,688 pesetas has been allocated to the Governing Council for the construction of dwellings for the officials of the new autonomous régime.

¹ Figures supplied by the Secretary-General of the Trades Union Centre in Madrid indicated that in Fernando Póo there were one industrial and twenty-nine agricultural co-operatives, while in Río Muni the figures were two and fourteen respectively.

65. Public works undertaken by the Office of Public Works, Housing and Town Planning of the autonomous administration includes the Santa Isabel water supply system, the expressway to the airport and the Punta Santiago air and sea lighthouse. Other water supply and highway projects have been started, including the construction of the highway round the eastern shore of the island which passes through the richest cacao-growing area of Fernando Póo.

D. SOCIAL AND EDUCATIONAL CONDITIONS

Public health

66. The main hospitals are those at Santa Isabel and Bata and there are also others at San Carlos, Puerto Iradier, Río Benito and new ones at Concepción and Evinayong. The first two have a capacity of 350 and 345 beds respectively. There is reported to be a total of about 1,500 beds. At Micomeseng in Río Muni, there is a leper hospital with 200 beds. It was observed by the Sub-Committee that patients are divided in hospitals by tribe and by race.

Labour

67. It has been noted that agriculture, particularly the production of cacao and coffee, is the mainstay of Equatorial Guinea's economy. Indigenous farmers have small holdings of about ten acres each which produce cacao and coffee for the market. These rely on the family group and do not hire labour. On the other hand, the European-style farms devoted to these crops rely principally on Nigerian labourers, usually on three-year contracts, whose number has been constantly increasing. Although the indigenous farmers have been organized to some extent in co-operatives, it will be recalled that these accounted for only 1,200 tons of cacao produced out of a total of 26,000 tons in 1964.

68. As at the end of 1963 the wage of the average plantation worker was reported to be 445 pesetas a month, plus an additional 225 pesetas a month paid in a lump sum at the end of the contract. Board, lodging and medical care are also provided.

69. In 1964, of the total labour force of 37,400 employed by private enterprise, 28,000 were Nigerians, 5,600 were indigenous Guineans, 800 came from other parts of Africa and 3,000 were Europeans. Thus, 85 per cent of the manpower employed in private enterprise were non-indigenous people.

70. A total of 3,500 were employed in public concerns and administration in 1964 of whom 13 per cent were European and 87 per cent were indigenous employees.

71. The labour legislation in force is contained principally in the Ordinance of 24 May 1962, which regulates contracts and conditions of employment. The Department of Labour was empowered to raise minimum wages within the limits of the law and a Central Labour Court was empowered to hear and settle disputes. This Court retained its powers under the new régime, its personnel, as that of other courts, being appointed in the case of those from the metropolitan country by the Presidency of the Spanish Government on the advice of the Spanish Ministry of Justice, and in the case of indigenous candidates by the Commissioner-General on the advice of the President of the Supreme Court.

Schools

72. Equatorial Guinea's educational system consists basically of three stages: (a) the elementary school period of five years, compulsory to all children living within five kilometres of a school up to the age 12, although these are allowed to stay on until the age of 14; this course leads to the elementary school certificate which enables them to continue to the primary schools; (b) the primary schools most of which are located in the larger municipalities and offer a two-year course for children from 13 to 14 years, although here again children are allowed to stay on until the ages of 15 and 16; and (c) secondary education leading to studies at the university level outside the Territory or technical or vocational training upon which the régime sets great store.

73. As at the end of 1965 there were 135 elementary schools and thirty primary schools administered by the educational authorities of the Territory, with a total enrolment of 21,091. At the end of 1963 there was a total of fifteen primary schools. At the end of 1965, 1,701 elementary education certificates and 1,105 primary education certificates were awarded. The above figures do not include non-official or private schools of these categories.

74. Elementary and primary school teachers are trained at the St. Thomas Aquinas Provincial School for Assistant Teachers and at the Teacher Training Colleges of Santa Isabel and Bata established in 1963.

75. In the field of vocational or technical education there is the "La Salle" Professional Centre, founded in Bata in 1959, maintained by the Provincial Council of Río Muni which awards certificates in agronomy and livestock as well as administration. There is also a School of Agricultural Training dependent on the Agricultural Department, a School of Sanitary Training for male and female nurses and the School of Arts and Crafts of the Catholic Mission in Santa Isabel, subsidized by the Government. The latter offers training in printing, tailoring, carpentry, building and mechanics. Schools of industrial apprenticeship have also been created in Santa Isabel and Bata.

76. As for higher education, scholarships up to a value of 3.5 million pesetas every year have been awarded for study chiefly in Spain. In 1962, 113 students under scholarships and 100 without scholarships were attending courses at universities or technical colleges in Spain. The Sub-Committee was informed by the Spanish authorities that there were 120 students from Equatorial Guinea in 1966 in Spain. According to information submitted by petitioners, however, the number did not exceed ninety-two, some of whom were on scholarships.

77. It should be noted that trained indigenous personnel in important posts of various services as at the end of 1965 included the following: the Chiefs of the Health and Education Departments; twenty-nine primary school teachers; personnel of the Sub-Department of Primary Education Inspection; eight labour inspectors; twelve chiefs of the Special Police Corps; and a housing and town planning supervisor.

II. DISCUSSIONS WITH OFFICIALS OF THE SPANISH GOVERNMENT

A. Meeting with Director-General of African Settlements and Provinces and other Spanish Government officials

78. The Sub-Committee called on General Díaz de Villegas, Director-General of African Settlements and Provinces (Plazas y Provincias Africanas) in the Office of the Presidency on 17 August 1966.

79. After an exchange of courtesies, the Director-General reviewed the record of the Spanish Government in relation to Equatorial Guinea. He stated inter alia that the Territory had no marketing problem as regards its cacao and coffee production, as almost all the produce was imported by Spain at prices considerably in excess of current world levels. Spain was buying the Territory's cacao at 42 pesetas per kilogramme as compared with the current world price of 17 pesetas, and coffee at 67 pesetas per kilogramme as compared with the average world price of 40 pesetas.

80. The cacao and coffee producers of Equatorial Guinea were free to sell on the international market, but in fact they exported their produce only to Spain, except when there were surpluses exceeding the demands of the Spanish market. It was desirable for these producers to develop trade with other markets but they had shown no interest. However, there was no long-term agreement covering exports of these commodities to Spain. No major increase in agricultural production was to be expected inasmuch as costs were higher in the Territory than elsewhere. There were new areas of economic activity being opened up, for which provision had been made in the Development Plan. This Plan had been prepared by the Spanish Government. In the event of Equatorial Guinea acceding to independence in the near future, he could not predict the extent to which the Spanish Government would continue to give economic assistance to the Territory.

81. In the field of education there were a number of elementary and vocational schools as well as two teacher-training institutions. Facilities for higher education were not available in the Territory but dozens of students were in universities in Barcelona, Pamplona and Madrid on scholarships. The total number of students from Equatorial Guinea in Spanish institutions was of the order of 120.

82. As regards the Government of the Territory, the Director-General stated that there was an autonomous legislative body. Further, the people of the Territory were exempt from military service and the police force was small and indigenous in its composition.

83. On the question of future constitutional development the Director-General stated in reply to questions that he would not indulge in prophecy; it was a matter for the people themselves. Contact between the Governing Council of the Territory and the Spanish Government was maintained through a representative of the Council in Madrid rather than through the Commissioner-General. The people of the Territory were at liberty to submit petitions directly to the Spanish Government or to the local authorities. If the majority of the people of the Territory asked for independence, the Spanish Government would accede to their wishes. Proposals affecting the constitutional status of the Territory required a two-thirds majority in the General Assembly, or a simple majority of the people voting in a referendum. The term of the present governmental bodies would expire in 1968 at which time their membership would have to be renewed. If the people expressed a preference for direct elections, the question would require to be submitted to a referendum.

B. Meeting with the Secretary-General of the Trade Unions Centre and other officials

84. On 17 August 1966, the Sub-Committee held a meeting with Mr. Arturo Espinosa Poveda, Secretary-General of the Trade Unions Centre, Mr. Fuentes Irurozqui, National Under-Secretary for Economic Co-ordination and other officials.

85. The Secretary-General informed the Sub-Committee that the Spanish trade union organization had undertaken the training of workers from Equatorial Guinea with the aim of enabling them to operate such labour institutions as might be set up in the future. Trade union activity in the Territory centred around the promotion of co-operatives. In Fernando Póo, there were one industrial and 29 agricultural co-operatives; in Río Muni, the numbers were 2 and 14 respectively. These co-operatives were concerned with the provision of assistance to small producers in the improvement of output, the sale of produce and the extension of credit. In Fernando Póo, 25 co-operatives with a total membership of 964 had at their disposal credit facilities amounting to 48 million pesetas, and in Río Muni 11 co-operatives with 2,781 members had 44 million pesetas. These credit facilities consisted of loans to these co-operatives extended by the Spanish trade union organization.

86. With the assistance of that organization, the co-operatives in the Territory were planning to extend their activities into other fields, including the introduction of training courses and seminars in trade union work, the constitution of joint employer and employee associations, the carrying out of studies of workers' problems and the censuses of workers and enterprises.

87. One of the problems of the Territory was the lack of skilled labour. Up to 1963 there was some discontent arising from the different treatment of local workers and those from Spain, owing to the fact that the local workers did not have the training necessary to use complicated machinery. The Spanish trade union organization had therefore concerned itself with the training of skilled workers, of which some seventy had already taken the necessary courses. The organization was also interested in assisting in such fields as collective bargaining, social security and the establishment of adequate levels of employment.

88. Its activities in relation to Equatorial Guinea had begun only in recent years but it was to be noted that although there had been several difficulties involving workers in 1962, there was no serious problem of labour unrest in the Territory. At the present time there were about 8,000 Nigerian workers in Río Muni, most of whom did not enjoy the benefit of trade union status, and over twice that figure in Fernando Póo. It should also be noted that the activities of the organization had to be related to the existing pattern of economic activity, and that the training of skilled workers was costing it 40,000 pesetas per worker.

89. In reply to questions, the Sub-Committee was informed that no indigenous engineers had been trained by the organization. There were several students taking professional and other courses in such institutions as the University of Barcelona but the figures were not immediately available. If technical assistance were to be extended to the Territory by the United Nations, the most appropriate field would be the training of skilled workers. Since most of the manpower needs of the Territory were filled by imported labour, especially from Nigeria, the problem would arise whether such training should be given to the imported workers on the spot, or to selected indigenous people at institutions abroad.

90. As regards land tenure, there was no difference in the terms extended to the Spanish and to the indigenous people. Farmers belonging to co-operatives were eligible for loans on the same terms as Spanish owners; the interest rate was of the order of 3½ per cent. Working conditions and wages were determined by standards set by the Government. Indeed these standards were such that there had been demands for the restriction of imported manpower, since the Nigerian workers in particular often expressed a wish to remain indefinitely in the Territory. The participation of the workers themselves in the determination of working conditions was limited, but efforts were being made to educate the workers so as to enable them to participate more effectively in this connexion, especially as regards collective bargaining.

C. Meetings with the Assistant Commissioner for the Economic and Social Development Plan and other Spanish officials

91. On 17 August 1966, the Sub-Committee held a meeting with Mr. Tomas Allende, Assistant Commissioner for the Economic and Social Development Plan, Mr. Juan Alvarez Corugedo, Secretary of the Commission for the Economic Development of Fernando Póo and Río Muni, and other officials.

92. The Sub-Committee was informed that the over-all Economic and Social Development Plan for 1964-1967 included a section relating to Equatorial Guinea. This part of the Plan was established by a commission which included participants from the Territory and had received the approval of the General Assembly of Equatorial Guinea. It provided for development both through public investment and expenditure, for which Spain and the Territory were jointly responsible, and by private enterprise. The governmental organs of the Territory were at liberty to develop their own plan for the future but for the time being economic policies were based on the present Plan. The purpose of the Plan was to enable the Territory to sustain international competition and determine its own economic future by the end of the period covered by the Plan.

93. The Plan envisaged an annual increase in the per capita income of 7.56 per cent in the Territory, as compared with 6 per cent for Spain. The achievement of this objective would imply an increase in the annual per capita income in Equatorial Guinea from $132 in 1963 to $170 by 1967. For this purpose, public investment of the order of 1,651 million pesetas over the period covered by the Plan would be required, in addition to private investment of 982 million pesetas. Of the required public investment, it was expected that 850 million pesetas, covering education, health and roads, would be derived from the Territory itself, and the remainder, including expenditure on the Santa Isabel airport and on town planning and construction, from the Spanish Government.

94. Actual performance as regards public investment by the Territory had fallen short of the target by 20 per cent, owing to increased public consumption. However, the rate of increase envisaged in the per capita income had been maintained. On the other hand, the investment arrangements envisaged by the Spanish Government in respect of the Santa Isabel airport had been slightly disrupted owing to a delay in the completion of construction plans.

95. In the private sector, it was to be noted that the Territory exported to Spain all its production of cacao and coffee, which together with timber were the most important products, at prices higher than those prevalent on the international market. The subsidy thus extended by Spain on coffee and cacao amounted to some 700 million pesetas annually. However, the Spanish market was incapable of absorbing quantities in excess of the present production of the Territory. For this reason producers of these commodities stood to lose if they sold any surpluses on the international market.

96. The Plan accordingly envisaged an increase in the cultivation of bananas, yuccas and pineapples instead of an expansion of cacao and coffee production. The Plan also recommended the development of cattle-raising, fishing, and industries based on agricultural products. The prospects for the development of heavy industry were limited, owing to the lack of mineral production, but geological studies were to be carried out. In order to encourage activity in the above-mentioned areas, the Plan contained provisions for tax exemption, and for the extension of credit at low interest rates.

97. As a result of these incentives, a banana plantation had been established, a fish processing factory was under construction, and a cacao processing plant was to be built in Fernando Póo. In Río Muni, a palm oil factory was expected to begin operations shortly, and a fish processing factory was also under construction.

98. In reply to questions, the officials stated that as Equatorial Guinea was not self-sufficient as regards trained manpower, provision for vocational training, which was a primary need of the Territory, had been included in the Plan. There were opportunities for training in agricultural and industrial schools from which about 100 people graduated every year. With regard to formal education, the officials stated that the school population, which was 34,000 in 1947, had increased to 40,000 in 1966. The Plan included specific targets in this sector, as well as in the field of health.

99. On the question of incentives to producers, the officials explained that the extension of tax concessions and easy credit were limited to those activities which were most useful to the Territory, to the exclusion of cacao and coffee for instance, which were subject to over-production and unfavourable world market conditions. The officials denied that this policy might encourage the formation of monopolistic enterprises, inasmuch as there were regulations aimed against the establishment of monopolies. Foreign companies were free to re-invest their profits in the Territory or to export them; however, it was the normal practice for these companies to re-invest their profits locally, and this practice was expected to continue.

100. The officials further stated that in order to ensure the future economic viability of the Territory, the Spanish Government was refraining from the encouragement of such economic activity as required to be subsidized. Nevertheless the Spanish Government would continue extending the subsidies it had been paying even after the Territory acceded to independence.

101. Explaining the figures they had given earlier, the officials stated that the per capita income was calculated on the basis of the whole population of the Territory. The income of the Spanish population raised no problems in this respect as the number of Spanish residents was small: There were only 4,000 of them in Fernando Póo and 2,500 in Río Muni. A large number of job opportunities for the indigenous people had come into being as a result of the development projects under way.

D. Meeting with the Under-Secretary of the Ministry of Labour and other officials

102. On 18 August 1966, the Sub-Committee held a meeting with Mr. Antonio Ibañez Freire, Under-Secretary of the Ministry of Labour and other officials. In their introductory remarks, they mentioned that the Spanish Government had taken important economic and social measures in Equatorial Guinea, resulting in great progress in such fields as health and education. Indeed, in the field of health, the ratio of doctors to the population, namely, one doctor to every 3,500 people in Fernando Póo and one to every 9,600 in Río Muni, was far in excess of the ratio in many other independent African countries.

103. As regards the activities of the Ministry of Labour relating to Equatorial Guinea, the officials stated that it was concerned with questions of labour and social security, and, in particular with the enforcement of labour regulations and the training of indigenous labour inspectors to supervise the application of these regulations. The second principal function of the Ministry was in the field of assistance to co-operatives in the Territory. The Spanish trade unions were in charge of the management of such assistance, while the Ministry was concerned with the provision of funds. Over the past two years, the Ministry had expended 90 million pesetas in this respect. The third main function of the Ministry was in the field of professional training for adult workers through on-the-job instruction and full time courses. In this connexion, they drew attention to the First School of Intensified Professional Training where, among others, workers from the Territory between the ages of 18 and 41 years were following six-month courses to qualify as metal or construction workers, mechanics and electricians. There were ten of these schools run by the trade unions in Spain. It was expected that the Ministry would extend its activities in this field to the Territory.

E. Meetings with the Commissioner-General and other officials

104. On 20 August 1966, the Sub-Committee called on the Commissioner-General of the Territory, Mr. Suances Díaz del Río, in Santa Isabel. The Commissioner-General assured the Sub-Committee that it was at liberty to interview whomever it wished and that he would extend his full co-operation to it. He would place himself at the disposal of the Sub-Committee in case the latter wished to hold discussions with him.

105. On 22 August 1966, the Sub-Committee held a further meeting in Bata with the Commissioner-General, Mr. Jaime de Piniés, the Deputy Permanent Representative of Spain to the United Nations, Mr. Gabriel Mañueco, the Director-General of African and Arab World Affairs in the Spanish Foreign Ministry, and other officials were also present.

106. At this meeting, the Commissioner-General informed the Sub-Committee that it was the intention of the Spanish Government to grant independence to Equatorial Guinea inasmuch as it accepted sovereign independence as the final stage in the contemporary evolution of dependent Territories. It was in this spirit that the Spanish Government had granted autonomy to the Territory as a preparatory step towards independence in conditions of stability and viability.

107. Spain had no economic interests in the Territory, as was demonstrated by the fact that it extended subsidies to and absorbed most of the export production of Equatorial Guinea. The only interest of Spain in the Territory at the present time was spiritual; historical circumstances had forged social, cultural and other links between the two countries and peoples. The Spanish Government was also concerned to protect the Territory against possible expansionist or neo-colonialist designs from outside as well as from the danger of exploitation by unscrupulous foreign economic interests. Bearing these considerations in mind, the Spanish Government was ready to grant independence to the Territory when the people so requested. The freedom with which the people had spoken to the Sub-Committee was itself testimony to the good faith of the Spanish Government in this regard.

108. In reply to questions the Commissioner-General stated that, having assumed his office only a few days ago, he had no recollection of a motion alleged to have been adopted by the General Assembly in which a formal request was made for independence. His information was that there had been some discussion on the subject but that no agreement had been reached. He undertook to investigate and transmit the required information. Referring to another recently adopted motion in which the General Assembly had expressed its lack of confidence in the Governing Council, the Commissioner-General stated that he had not forwarded it to the Spanish Government. Since, a short time previously, the same General Assembly had adopted another motion congratulating the Governing Council on its performance, he had thought it fit to request the Assembly to reconsider its motion of no confidence.

109. Outlining the recent constitutional development of the Territory, the Commissioner-General recalled that the referendum of December 1963 had put to the people the question whether or not they were in favour of autonomy. The referendum was open to all indigenous people of twenty-one years of age and over, as well as to Spanish people who had lived in the Territory for at least two years. Other non-indigenous people were not eligible to participate. Following the affirmative result of the referendum, elections had been held for the municipal councils and the provincial councils, and subsequently the Governing Council had been established.

110. In explanation of the electoral system, the officials accompanying the Commissioner-General stated that each municipal council was composed of an equal number of members elected by the heads of family resident in the area concerned, and members elected by local co-operatives and corporative bodies; corporative bodies consisted of various economic, cultural and professional groups including local chambers of commerce, and associations of doctors, pharmacists, lawyers, engineers and teachers. In areas where no corporative bodies were in existence, the vacancies reserved for these bodies in the municipal council were usually filled by nominees of the Civil Governor. In the recollection of the officials, some twenty-two vacancies in the municipal councils had been filled on this basis. The nominees were normally persons who had failed by a narrow margin to win one of the elective seats in the council concerned.

111. The officials recalled that the Provincial Council of Río Muni consisted of ten members and that of Fernando Póo of eight members. These provincial councils meeting in joint session constituted the General Assembly. Each of them consisted of an equal number of members elected by representatives of the municipal councils, and members elected by the corporative bodies and co-operatives. There were two Spanish members in the Río Muni Provincial Council and one in that of Fernando Póo.

112. As regards political parties, the Commissioner-General stated that before the establishment of the autonomous régime, there had been some restriction on political activity in the Territory. However, since that time, political parties had been free to carry out their activities, although there was no provision for their official recognition. The authorization of the Civil Governor, who was responsible to the Commissioner-General in this respect, was required for the holding of public political meetings; such authorization was as a rule granted. Apart from the Movimiento de Unificación Nacional de la Guinea Ecuatorial (MUNGE) and the Movimiento Nacional de Liberación de la Guinea Ecuatorial (MONALIGE), which were based in the Territory, there was the Idea Popular de la Guinea Ecuatorial (IPGE) which was handicapped by lack of organization and financial support and had recently decided to merge with MUNGE. Political activity had recently increased during the period preceding the Sub-Committee's visit.

113. As regards the suggestion advanced in some quarters for the separation of Fernando Póo and Río Muni, the Commissioner-General stated that the Spanish Government was giving the matter careful study. It was a recent development. On the question of independence, the Commissioner-General stated that the Territory would find it difficult to maintain itself economically, without support from Spain. Political independence was not impossible if such support were available. It would be difficult to predict, however, when the Territory would be ready for independence unless the people reached agreement among themselves on the question. With regard to the electoral system, his feeling was that there was a majority in favour of the future application of universal adult suffrage, but that there was no enthusiasm for its extension to women.

114. On the Sub-Committee's return to New York, it received a communication from the Permanent Representative of Spain to the United Nations in which he stated on behalf of the Commissioner-General and in response to the request previously made by the Sub-Committee to the latter that an examination of the records had revealed no information regarding the submission to the Spanish Government of a formal petition for independence by the autonomous administration. Although on one occasion a concrete proposal of this nature was discussed in the Governing Council, it obtained only one favourable vote and was therefore rejected.

F. Meeting with the Civil Governor of Río Muni

115. On 23 August 1966, the Sub-Committee held a meeting with the Civil Governor of Río Muni, Mr. Simon Ngomo Ndumu Asumu. At this meeting the Civil Governor informed the Sub-Committee that in his opinion independence should be granted to Equatorial Guinea but that in terms of the organizational requirements the Territory was not yet prepared for it. The reasons for this situation were the small size of the population and the division of the nationalist movement into three groups, namely MUNGE, MONALIGE and IPGE.

116. He himself had been associated with all these groups, beginning with MONALIGE, the original leaders of which were people from Río Muni, resident in Fernando Póo. Later he had been affiliated to IPGE which was originally based in Río Muni. However IPGE had adopted a platform which included a plan to merge the Territory with Cameroon; this plan had been unacceptable to him and to a large number of IPGE's supporters. The leaders of IPGE had subsequently gone into exile owing partly to restrictions imposed on their activity by the Government. In an effort to establish a single united political movement, MUNGE had been formed on 30 November 1963, following a conference in which representatives of all sections of the population including the various mayors participated. He was in sympathy with the objectives of this party, particularly those relating to the question of independence. The continued existence of the other political parties stemmed partly from their discontent with the distribution of official posts after the elections.

117. As to relative strength of the different parties, the Civil Governor said that from documentary evidence and taking account of the alliance between MUNGE and IPGE, MUNGE appeared to have the largest membership; his personal impression however, was that MONALIGE had a larger following among the people, especially in Río Muni. In Fernando Póo their relative strength was about the same. The alliance between IPGE and MUNGE had become operative in Río Muni but not in Fernando Póo where talks were still in progress. Neither MUNGE nor MONALIGE was completely satisfied with the performance of the present Governing Council, and wished to correct the defects in the present system.

118. With regard to the existing electoral system, the Civil Governor did not think it inadequate to the needs of the Territory after independence, considering that the structure of the government after independence would be different from that of the autonomous administration. In his official capacity he could not criticize the General Assembly, which consisted of the legitimate representatives of the people. In his personal capacity, he thought that a change could be made in the system in order to give the President of the Governing Council a greater say in the choice of members of the Council, with whom he had to work as a team.

119. Explaining his views on the question of independence, the Civil Governor stated that in referring to the organizational requirements for independence, he had in mind the importance of co-ordinating and harmonizing the ideas, objectives and efforts of the people in regard to independence. At the present time, there was an absence of dialogue between the political parties on the steps to be taken for the achievement of independence. Each of them desired independence but regarded itself as comprising the true and genuine leaders of the people.

120. On the method of appointment of Civil Governors, he stated that they were selected by the Spanish Government from a list of three candidates submitted to the Commissioner-General by the Governing Council. The Spanish Government's choice was usually dictated by the number of votes cast for each candidate in the Governing Council.

III. CONSULTATIONS WITH THE PEOPLE OF THE TERRITORY

A. Meeting with the President of the Assembly

121. On its arrival on 19 August 1966, the Sub-Committee called on the President of the General Assembly, Mr. Enrique Gori Molubela. Some other members of the Assembly were present.

122. In a statement of welcome, Mr. Gori Molubela informed the Sub-Committee that it was the desire of all the people of Equatorial Guinea that the Territory should accede to independence. The problem was how and when. For his part, he hoped there would be no undue delay. He then gave a brief historical account of the Territory, calling attention in particular to the fact that the original population of Fernando Póo consisted of the Bubis, who numbered 40,000 in 1900 but were now only 18,000 in number. The influx of settlers from Nigeria and Sierra Leone was a recent development; the Nigerians numbered some 32,000. He added that the original population of Río Muni comprised the Fangs who were also to be found in Cameroon and Gabon.

123. Referring to the growth of political activity in the Territory, Mr. Gori Molubela mentioned that he had played a part in the initiatives leading to the dialogue with the Spanish Government, which resulted in the granting of autonomous status to Equatorial Guinea. Thus it was that he had participated in the foundation of the Movimiento Nacional de Liberación de la Guinea Ecuatorial (MONALIGE) in 1961.

124. He also noted that the Idea Popular de la Guinea Ecuatorial (IPGE) was founded in 1963 by a Cameroonian. Based in Río Muni, IPGE in its manifesto had then called for autonomy and independence with a view to federation with Cameroon. He was apprehensive about the future of Fernando Póo if federation with Cameroon came about. It was therefore understandable that proposals for the separation of Fernando Póo from Río Muni were gaining ground. In this connexion, he recalled that on 29 April 1965, the General Assembly had unanimously adopted a motion calling for a revision of the relationship between the two parts of the Territory before the expiry of the term of the present administration. IPGE was at the present time rent by divisions but had not renounced its demands for federation with Cameroon. The present situation was that it was the desire of the Bubis that Fernando Póo should be separated from Río Muni.

125. Further, Mr. Gori Molubela drew attention to a document prepared by him in which, according to him, he had attempted to present for the Sub-Committee's information an objective picture of the political situation, consistent with his position as member of the Santa Isabel Municipal Council, President of the Fernando Póo Provincial Council and of the General Assembly. In this document, he asserted that the fundamental characteristics of the Territory were its small size, the economic, human and cultural diversity and individuality of each of the two provinces, their lack of geographical contiguity and the difference in their ethnic composition.

126. The document also claimed that the unitary system of government had created tensions between Fernando Póo and Río Muni, which had been increased by the dominant position of people from the latter in the Government. In the economic sector, the situation had led to diffidence on the part of private enterprise which regarded a transitional political system as risky for capital investment.

127. According to the document, the right of the people to self-determination was not exhausted by their acceptance of the autonomous system in December 1963. Evidence of this was to be found in the fact that the General Assembly and the Governing Council were considering two matters that presupposed the existence of this right. The first was the revision of the law governing the autonomous system, and the second was the separation of Fernando Póo and Río Muni.

128. Any consideration of the timing of independence should take into account a number of factors, including the small size and population of Equatorial Guinea, the fact that the Territory's economic situation was largely due to the preferential treatment that its products enjoyed on the Spanish market, and the possibility of annexation by neighbouring States with lower incomes.

129. Describing current political trends, the document submitted by Mr. Gori Molubela claimed that with individual exceptions, the people of Río Muni accepted the unitary system of government for the Territory as a whole, while the opposite position was held in varying degrees of intensity by the people of Fernando Póo. The people of Fernando Póo regarded unification as a fiction contrary to the true geographical human and cultural nature of the two parts of the Territory, which had no common history except for their experience of Spanish colonial rule. Further, the present system of government was in effect a restriction of the right to self-determination of the indigenous people of Fernando Póo. This system meant supremacy for Río Muni inasmuch as that province commanded a majority in the Assembly and the Governing Council. In addition, Río Muni absorbed two thirds of the Territory's budgetary expenditure while contributing only one third of the revenue.

130. As regards the movement for independence, the document stated that while part of the population of the Territory was in favour of independence, there was no consensus on the subject. There was popular support, particularly in Fernando Póo, for association with Spain after independence under agreements covering defence and economic and technical aid. In the north of Río Muni there was strong sentiment in favour of association with Cameroon, and in the southern part the people tended to favour association with Gabon. However, the degree of association desired ranged from the mere maintenance of relations to federation.

131. In addition, the document submitted by Mr. Gori Molubela noted that political parties made their appearance in the Territory during the period preceding the autonomous system, their aim being almost exclusively to end colonial rule. They were the Idea Popular de la Guinea Ecuatorial (IPGE) which inclined towards federation with Cameroon, the Movimiento Nacional de Liberación de la Guinea Ecuatorial (MONALIGE) and the Movimiento de Unificación de la Guinea Ecuatorial (MUNGE). According to the document the activities of these parties had been on the decline since the introduction of the present system, which had absorbed many of their activities. In another document listing members of the General Assembly, Mr. Gori Molubela informed the Sub-Committee that of the eighteen members of that body, seven had originally been elected to municipal councils by the heads of families and the remainder represented the corporative bodies and co-operatives.

132. In conclusion Mr. Gori Molubela called attention to a speech which he made on 3 January 1966 concerning the principle of self-determination for the people of Fernando Póo. In that speech he expressed the determination of the people not to permit interference by any country in their political status. The people knew that some countries were simply awaiting the withdrawal of the Spanish presence, so as to take over Fernando Póo. The wish of the people was that any change in their status, in exercise of their legitimate right of self-determination, should be carried out solely by means of direct dialogue between the Spanish Government and their true representatives. In this connexion he recalled the pledge recently given by the Head of State that Spain would defend the people's desire freely to decide for themselves, and to defend them against any outsiders who attempted to jeopardize their future.

B. Meetings with members of the Governing Council

133. On 19 August 1966, the Sub-Committee called on Mr. Bonifacio Ondó Edú, the President of the Governing Council and the following members of the Council: Mr. Francisco Macias Nguema, Vice-President, Mr. Aurelio Nicolas Itoha, Mr. Gustavo Watson Bueko, Mr. Luis Maho Sicacha, Mr. Román Borico Toichoa, Mr. Antonio Candido Nang, and Mr. Rafael Nsue Nchama. Following an exchange of courtesies there was a discussion which led to some revision of the programme proposed by the Governing Council for the Sub-Committee's visit.

134. On 20 August 1966, the Sub-Committee had a substantive meeting with the members of the Governing Council. Following is a summary of statements made by them, including their replies to questions put by members of the Sub-Committee.

135. Opening the discussion, Mr. Ondó Edú, member of MUNGE in 1964, observed that the people of Equatorial Guinea like the people of other dependent Territories looked forward to the attainment of independence. On the question of independence, he remarked that the Territory had been granted autonomous status without adequate preparation. In his view, a date should be set for the beginning of negotiations aimed at establishing the necessary preparatory arrangements for independence. He would elaborate on these views after his colleagues had expressed their opinions. He noted that elections would be held at the end of 1967 for the establishment of a new Governing Council after 15 July 1968, when the mandate of the present Council was due to expire.

136. Mr. Luis Maho Sicacha (Councillor for Information and Tourism), member of MONALIGE in 1964, stated that the performance of the present régime required improvement. The achievement of such improvement would itself constitute preparation for independence. The Territory was facing a number of pressing internal problems which called for solutions before the attainment of independence.

137. Mr. Aurelio Nicolas Itoha (Councillor for Labour), member of MUNGE in 1964, informed the Sub-Committee that during the conversations which led to the granting of autonomy, the participants from Equatorial Guinea had refrained from asking that the duration of the autonomous status be defined. They had agreed that a date for independence should be discussed only when the people of the Territory were ready for it. When that time came, the Government of the Territory would ask for independence, bearing in mind the assurances given by the Spanish Government that it would place no obstacles in the way of such a request. Consequently there was no need to fix a date at the present time.

138. Mr. Román Borico Toichoa (Councillor for Industry and Mines), member of MUNGE in 1964, associated himself with the views expressed by Mr. Nicolas Itoha. The fixing of a date for independence should be considered only when the Territory was ready for it. At the present time he did not consider that Equatorial Guinea had had adequate preparation.

139. Mr. Francisco Macias Nguema (Councillor for Public Works, Housing and Town Planning), member of MONALIGE in 1964, stated that the people of the Territory wanted to assume control over their own destiny. Lack of preparation could not and should not be a valid reason for the postponement of independence. In his opinion, a date for independence should be set immediately. This could be done through conversations with the Spanish Government. It was not the intention of the people that relations with Spain be severed at independence, rather, they looked forward to the maintenance of relations similar to those existing between Commonwealth countries and the United Kingdom. Independence, which should be achieved by peaceful means, would enable Equatorial Guinea to take its rightful place in the international community and in the Spanish-speaking world. While it could be said that the Territory was not sufficiently viable in economic terms, it should be recalled that no country had begun its independent existence in satisfactory economic conditions.

140. In conclusion Mr. Macias Nguema asked that a target date for independence should be set without delay, so that the experience of colonization might be brought to an end.

peacefully and without violence. His own suggestion was that 15 July 1967 would be a suitable date, inasmuch as that date would allow the time necessary for negotiations and for the drafting of a constitution consonant with the aspirations of the people, which in his opinion should be the subject of a plebiscite. Referring to demands that were being made by some sections of the population for the separation of Fernando Póo and Río Muni, he stated that the question was one for the people as a whole to decide. However, he recalled that the example of other countries had shown that the problem was capable of resolution; problems of this kind were liable to arise when the different regions of a country were at different stages of economic development. Perhaps some sort of federal relationship might be the solution.

141. Mr. Rafael Nsue Nchama (Councillor for Agriculture), member of MUNGE in 1964, stated that in his view an early date should be fixed for the independence of the Territory. This view was shared by the people he represented. He thought that the date should be 15 July 1968 when the term of the present Governing Council was due to expire.

142. Mr. Gustavo Watson Bueko (Councillor for Health and Welfare), member of MUNGE in 1964, observed that the Basic Law itself envisaged the Territory as composed of two different parts. The people of Fernando Póo had attained a higher level of economic, social and educational development than those of Río Muni. It was in recognition of these differences that on 12 August 1966, a motion calling for the economic and administrative separation of Fernando Póo and Río Muni had been tabled in the Governing Council by himself and Messrs. Maho Sicacha, Borico Toichoa, and Nicolas Itoha. On 13 August 1966, the Governing Council had agreed, after a vote, to refer the motion to the General Assembly for consideration. The Assembly had not yet considered the motion. As regards independence, he thought it would be inappropriate and premature to set a date at the present time. The question of a date should be a subject for negotiation, which should begin without delay. He urged the Sub-Committee to ascertain the real wishes of the majority of the people, not those of an imaginary majority who lived in the urban areas and whose views were unrepresentative.

143. Mr. Antonio Candido Nang (Councillor for Education) member of MONALIGE in 1964, recalled that the Spanish Government had undertaken to grant independence if and when the people should ask for it. It was on this understanding that the elections leading to the establishment of the autonomous Government had taken place. He observed that the demonstrations that had taken place the previous day were all in favour of early independence. It was the duty of members of the Governing Council to reflect the views of the electorate. The attainment of independence was a necessary prelude to the consolidation of the freedom of the people, and to the decisions which the people needed to take as to the form of Government best suited to their needs and aspirations.

144. In a further statement, Mr. Maho Sicacha recalled that he was among those who had begun the struggle for independence and had appeared before United Nations bodies to testify in that connexion. In his opinion, a date should be set by the Commissioner-General for the opening of negotiations which would look towards the economic and administrative separation of Fernando Póo from Río Muni and the possible establishment, subsequently, of a federal relationship. These negotiations should also cover the question of the timing of independence.

145. Concluding the discussion, Mr. Ondó Edú informed the Sub-Committee that during 1962 he had been in exile for the sake of the independence of his country, and that he had appeared before the United Nations to request the granting of autonomy and independence. He felt bound to say, however, that during the current period of autonomy, the political solutions to the problems of the Territory, which had to be found before the attainment of independence, had not yet been achieved. In view of the small size and population of the Territory, its unsatisfactory economic situation, and the demands being made in some quarters for separation, it was not surprising that differences of view existed on the question of independence. Indeed, the present situation could well lead to conflict and violence. For his part, he resented all the talk about separation; the Territory had been one unit for more than a century; the talk of separation had only begun now that the Territory had an autonomous régime. For instance, the people of Río Muni had given their life for the Territory as a whole. While he was by no means opposed to independence, he had his doubts whether subsequent developments would be in the best interests of the people, unless a solution was found to the problems to which he had referred.

146. At a further meeting the same day between the Sub-Committee and members of the Governing Council, Mr. Ondó Edú appealed to his colleagues not to allow their differences to become too obvious. If separation was unavoidable, it should take place only after independence. However, unity was essential both for the achievement and for the maintenance of independence. In his opinion many of the prerequisites for the existence of a nation, such as homogeneity of population, economic viability, availability of administrative and other cadres, did not yet exist in the Territory.

147. He noted with deep regret that under the present system, he as President of the Governing Council did not have the power to select his colleagues. It was therefore not surprising that no consensus existed among members of the Council on the timing of independence. Having regard to the problems of the country, it was his view that Spain had saddled the Council with a "broken dish". Neither he nor the Council had the necessary authority to initiate solutions to these problems.

148. He also said that he would welcome advice from the Sub-Committee on the question of independence. While there were some Spanish elements who would rather see the country destroyed than be denied the opportunity to exploit it, neither the Council nor the Spanish Government wanted this to happen. It was his hope that before the end of the term of the present Council, agreement would be reached on the changes necessary for the proper functioning of the autonomous régime as a preliminary to independence. In his opinion, negotiations with Spain should be initiated before the expiry of his Council's mandate, in order to establish constitutional, economic and other arrangements preparatory to independence. If the Spanish Government proved unwilling to co-operate in this respect, he would himself submit a petition to the United Nations.

149. As regards the electoral system, Mr. Ondó Edú saw no objection to the present arrangements for elections to the General Assembly, but the fact that he had no say in the choice of members of the Governing Council was deplorable. Regrettable also was the fact that he had no executive powers whatever. His position was, therefore, no more than nominal.

150. Mr. Nicolas Itoha explained that, in saying earlier that there was no need at the present time to set a date for independence, what he had in mind was not an indefinite postponement of a decision. His own thinking was that prior to any decisions regarding independence, the internal problems of the Territory should be resolved by the economic and administrative separation of Fernando Póo and Río Muni.

151. Mr. Borico Toichoa expressed agreement with the views of Mr. Nicolas Itoha. He added that independence would be an empty word if it meant that the Territory would continue to rely heavily on external assistance. In this connexion he observed that 90 per cent of the technicians in Equatorial Guinea came from Europe, the Territory lacked adequate roads, the army was maintained by Spain, and there was only a handful of indigenous lawyers, and no engineers. It would be some five years before these inadequacies were met to the extent necessary to justify accession to independence.

152. Mr. Candido Nang remarked that there was no educational programme in existence geared to the manpower needs of the Territory in anticipation of independence. This observation applied also to other fields. As Councillor responsible for education, he had no power to establish such a programme.

153. Replying to questions, Mr. Ondó Edú stated that the Commissioner-General played no part in the appointment of members of the Governing Council, and did not participate in the Council's meetings. Prior to the inauguration of the autonomous régime, political parties had to operate in a clandestine manner. Although political parties had not been accorded official recognition since that time, their existence was unofficially tolerated. They were required to obtain official authorization for the holding of public meetings. Mr. Macias Nguema intervened at this juncture to say that, in practice, MONALIGE was rarely granted such authorization for its meetings.

154. Continuing, Mr. Ondó Edú said that in response to a Spanish suggestion that existing political parties should merge into a single movement, a congress of local and foreign-based political groupings had been held in Bata shortly after the inauguration of the autonomous régime. The congress had failed to agree to a unified political movement. Another conference had taken place in Moka in early 1965, at which the political parties operating in Fernando Póo had agreed to a temporary halt in their activities. This was the reason for the reluctance of himself and his colleagues to be identified with any particular political grouping at the present time.

155. Mr. Nicolas Itoha drew attention to a written communication which he had submitted to the Governing Council jointly with Mr. Borico Toichoa, Mr. Watson Bueko, and Mr. Maho Sicacha, on 3 June 1966, and commended it to the serious attention of the Sub-Committee. In this communication, the authors contended that the political unity on which the autonomous régime was based was fictitious. This political unity presupposed the existence of a region which in reality was non-existent. Not only were Fernando Póo and Río Muni not geographically contiguous, but their people had no common ethnic origin, culture, history or language. Their hopes that this lack of a basis for unity might be remedied by experience had not been fulfilled.

156. According to the communication, there had been a clear-cut tendency on the part of the Río Muni group in the Governing Council to appropriate all benefits for that province; while Fernando Póo was responsible for 81 per cent of the budgetary income of the Territory, Río Muni accounted for 83 per cent of the expenditure. A contraband traffic in cacao and coffee had sprung up between Río Muni and neighbouring countries, which threatened Fernando Póo with economic collapse. According to the authors, there had been considerable emigration from Río Muni to Fernando Póo, resulting in profound changes in the population structure of the latter. Friction and tension existed among the Bubis, the principal ethnic group on the island, and the Pámues of Río Muni, which had been sharpened by the present régime.

157. In conclusion, the authors claimed that the right of self-determination did not belong exclusively to the aggregate of the people living in the Territory. To deny this right to the people of Fernando Póo, who constituted a homogeneous group, would be contrary to elementary international standards. In order to ensure to the people of Fernando Póo the exercise of this right, they called for the economic and administrative separation of the two parts of the Territory. Since the necessary legislative measures were within the competence of the Spanish Government, this demand did not require endorsement by a two-thirds majority of the General Assembly. The question should be put to a plebiscite in which the votes of the people would be valid only for their province of origin.

158. The Sub-Committee held another meeting with members of the Governing Council on 21 August 1966, at which the latter elaborated their views regarding the question of independence.

159. Mr. Nicolas Itoha stated that when independence was in sight, following the negotiations to which he had referred in an earlier statement, consideration could then be given to the role, if any, which the United Nations might play in the arrangements for independence. The United Nations would be approached if its assistance was required. On the general question of independence he had nothing to add to the views he had previously expressed.

160. Mr. Borico Toichoa saw no need for United Nations intervention in the electoral or other processes leading to independence. However, he would not oppose consideration being given to inviting the United Nations to be present in an observer capacity. United Nations intervention would be called for only if the Spanish Government withheld independence from the Territory when the people asked for it.

161. Mr. Macias Nguema and Mr. Nsue Nchama expressed the opinion that given the situation in the Territory, the effective presence of the United Nations was necessary during the holding of any plebiscite or election that might be held.

162. Mr. Watson Bueko remarked that there had been no United Nations observers during the plebiscite held in December 1963 on the Basic Law. The plebiscite was nevertheless free and properly conducted. It was immaterial to him whether or not the United Nations should be invited to send observers to a future plebiscite. However, care should be taken to ensure that such observers were completely impartial and honourable men, who would not seek to impose their own ideas, or intervene between the people and the Spanish Government. He envisaged a plebiscite at which people would indicate whether or not they desired independence, followed by negotiations and by elections. The function of United Nations observers, if any, should be limited to ascertaining whether or not the voting was free.

163. Mr. Candido Nang believed that United Nations participation in bringing the Territory to independence would ensure that the result was in keeping with the wishes of the people. He thought that the assistance of the United Nations in this connexion would be necessary.

164. Mr. Maho Sicacha saw no reason why the United Nations should not be invited to observe all the processes leading to independence. He believed that it would be useful to have United Nations assistance in this respect.

165. Mr. Ondó Edú stated that in order to dissipate any doubts about the genuineness of the processes leading to independence and about their outcome, the United Nations should be invited to send observers. In this way, the intentions and performance of Spain in relation to the Territory would be clearly vindicated.

166. As regards changes which should be made in the present electoral system, Mr. Macias Nguema and Mr. Nsue Nchama expressed themselves in favour of direct elections under a system of universal suffrage for all persons, including women, over 21 years of age. Mr. Macias Nguema noted that the women had complained against their ineligibility to vote. Mr. Candido Nang was in agreement, but stated that he would prefer the voting age to be reduced to 18; he saw no reason for withholding the vote from persons of 18 years and over, since that was adjudged to be the minimum age for the assumption of marital responsibilities.

167. In Mr. Watson Bueko's opinion, universal suffrage would result in democracy of the inorganic kind. It might work in highly developed countries, but not in Equatorial Guinea where in his view organic democracy was more appropriate. Under a system of organic democracy the different sectors of the national life were represented in governmental organs. He therefore preferred the continuance of the present system, with some adjustments to meet actual needs and circumstances. In view of the difficulty the people had in distinguishing political platforms, personalities and interests, it was more appropriate for them to be represented according to the interest groups and sectors to which they belonged.

168. Mr. Borico Toichoa had no comment to make on this question. Mr. Nicolas Itoha expressed himself in favour of the present system but said he was not irrevocably opposed to universal adult suffrage. Mr. Maho Sicacha and Mr. Ondó Edú favoured universal adult suffrage.

169. Referring to reports that only Africans were sent to gaol on conviction for criminal offences, Mr. Watson Bueko said that these allegations were true of the period before autonomy but did not apply to the present time. Spanish residents who were found guilty of minor offences were subject to expulsion from the Territory. Those who committed serious offences were sent to gaol outside the Territory, usually in Las Palmas. However, pending trial, such persons could be remanded in custody in the local gaols.

170. Mr. Macias Nguema asserted that the administration of justice in the Territory was discriminatory. He pointed out that all the Court judges were Spanish. It was the responsibility of the United Nations to secure the enjoyment by the people of equal rights. Mr. Candido Nang added that it was not the laws themselves that deserved condemnation but their discriminatory application. The African and the Spanish people were subject to the same laws, but the application of these laws as well as the punishments meted out for their infraction were different. Mr. Nsue Nchama said that he had yet to hear of a Spanish resident being gaoled in the Territory after conviction.

171. Mr. Borico Toichoa did not think that any useful purpose was being served by recalling incidents which had taken place in the distant past. He noted that the Territory was not yet independent. Mr. Maho Sicacha stated that, in his experience as a practising lawyer, the Spanish residents rarely committed criminal offences warranting their being sent to gaol. Those that did were sent to prisons outside the Territory which met the minimum conditions laid down in the Spanish penal code. There were no such prisons in Equatorial Guinea. Mr. Ondó Edú pointed out that the administration of justice was not within the competence of the Governing Council. He himself had had occasion to complain to the Commissioner-General about excessive leniency to offenders, including some Africans.

172. In response to a question, Mr. Nsue Nchama confirmed the statement made to the Sub-Committee by some petitioners that a law of 4 May 1948, which was still in force, limited land ownership by the African population to four hectares per person.

173. On the question of political prisoners, Mr. Macias Nguema said that though there had been several in the past, there were to his knowledge only three or four, who had come from outside the Territory, in gaol at the present time. Previously the number stood at six or seven, but one had been released as a result of representations made by him.

174. Mr. Nicolas Itoha denied that there were any political prisoners. Mr. Candido Nang observed that while there might not be persons in prison for political activity, it was not difficult to secure the imprisonment of persons expressing unwelcome political opinions by arranging their conviction on criminal charges. He knew of one such case.

175. In conclusion, the members of the Governing Council stated their views on the question of whether the people of Equatorial Guinea were ready for independence. Mr. Candido Nang believed that they were. Mr. Nsue Nchama agreed that they were but thought that independence should be granted not immediately, but by July 1968. Mr. Macias Nguema believed strongly that the Territory should accede to independence by July 1967. Mr. Maho Sicacha's preference was for the initiation of negotiations immediately with a view to independence in two years' time. Mr. Nicolas Itoha did not consider that the people were ready for independence; they could only be said to be ready if independence was regarded as a lottery in which the people would participate in the hope of fortuitous benefits. Mr. Watson Bueko felt that negotiations should begin in the very near future aimed at the fixing of a date for independence.

176. At the end of the meeting Mr. Macias Nguema submitted to the Committee a communication signed by himself, Mr. Candido Nang, and Mr. Nsue Nchama, on the question of independence for the Territory. In the communication the authors stated that nothing was of greater importance to the people than that the Territory should attain independence. According to them the governmental organs of the present régime did not possess the necessary powers to bring about the changes required to promote the spiritual and material welfare of the people. They recalled that in various letters they had addressed to the Spanish Government, they had requested Spain or, if necessary, the competent international organizations first to set a date for independence which should precede the expiry of the term of present administration, and secondly the establishment of representative committees to formulate, with outside, including United Nations, assistance, if required, the agreements which would form the basis of independence.

177. In a final statement addressed to the Sub-Committee on 24 August 1966, Mr. Ondó Edú said that the autonomous status should be terminated forthwith and that negotiations for independence should be initiated immediately, with a view to the Territory acceding to independence in two years. If the period of these negotiations, as proposed by the Governing Council, did not meet with a whole-hearted welcome from Spain, and if as a result the people of Equatorial Guinea should press for independence prematurely, he would not consider himself responsible for the consequences. The two-year period of negotiation which had been proposed would be a period of preparation and of experience in the assumption of greater responsibility and freedom of action. In conclusion, he emphasized that unity and indissolubility must govern the decisions of the people if a peaceful solution to the problems of the Territory was to be achieved.

C. Meetings with groups and individuals affiliated to MONALIGE

178. Before undertaking its visit to the Territory the Sub-Committee had before it a number of petitions from leaders of the Movimiento Nacional de Liberación de la Guinea Ecuatorial (MONALIGE) (A/AC.109/PET.529 and Add.1).

179. In these petitions, the leaders of MONALIGE declared that they regarded independence as the best means of solving the institutional as well as socio-economic problems of Equatorial Guinea. They also reiterated their previous demand that a date for the attainment of independence should be fixed before the end of the term of the present Administration. The fixing of a date for independence was, in their view, justified by the political maturity of the people of the Territory. Further, the economic position of the Territory, to which the Spanish Government had repeatedly drawn attention, gave it a more valid right to independence than many other countries which had acceded to independence in less favourable circumstances.

180. In this connexion they recalled that in a speech made on 31 December 1965, the Head of State of Spain spoke of his steadfast intention to proceed, without delay or hesitation, with efforts to promote the progress of the people of Equatorial Guinea so that they might be fully prepared to meet the future; in the same speech, he had declared that, in any event, Spain would defend their desire to make a free decision. Further, the petitioners recalled that in a statement made at Algiers on 20 June 1966, the President of the Governing Council had said that, according to his official information, it was the express and formal desire of the Spanish Government that "Equatorial Guinea, whenever it so desired, should choose its own political future, that is to say, complete independence".

181. The petitioners also deplored the manoeuvres, which according to them, had been carried out with the approval of certain members of the autonomous Government with a view to keeping the indigenous people of Equatorial Guinea in a position of political, economic and social subordination. They drew attention to the failure to evolve reasonable standards for the Africanization of the Administration and to gross discrimination between Spanish Europeans and Africans doing the same work in the public service, as regards grading, remuneration and other terms of service. These conditions were responsible for the strike by civil servants that took place from 20 to 25 April 1966.

182. Moreover, the petitioners complained that the activities of MONALIGE, which had the support of a sizable majority of the population of Equatorial Guinea, were being systematically hampered with the result that the will of the people was being stifled. For instance, a MONALIGE meeting scheduled for 19 December 1965 for the purpose of submitting a formal proposal for independence had been suspended by the Spanish authorities. Subsequently, in January 1966, the leadership of MONALIGE had addressed a letter to the Spanish Government requesting that Spanish military forces stationed in the Territory should cease all armed action or reprisal in respect of political activity relating to independence and that a date be set immediately for the early independence of the Territory through a plebiscite to be held under United Nations auspices. The letter also requested that MONALIGE be granted full freedom of action as well as permission to hold discussions with the Spanish Government regarding the timing and conditions of independence. Nothing but silence had greeted this letter.

183. According to the petitioners, an illustration of the Spanish Government's immobility was its failure to act upon a motion adopted by the General Assembly of the Territory on 29 April 1966 to suspend the Governing Council for its lack of authority and prestige among the people, for its indifferent administration and for squandering public funds. This motion had not even been officially forwarded to the Spanish Government by the Commissioner-General.

184. In addition, certain metropolitan institutions had been giving financial support to a pro-colonialist movement known as MUNGE which was in favour of the continued presence of Spain in the Territory. The neo-colonialist manoeuvres of the Spanish Government had resulted in an artificial micro-nationalism among the indigenous population of Fernando Póo aimed at separating that province from the territorial unit and keeping it aligned with Spanish interests. For this reason, MONALIGE solemnly affirmed the inviolable unity of Fernando Póo and Río Muni, which must attain independence as a single political unit.

185. The extent to which acts of the Governing Council were subject to prior censorship and dictation by the Spanish authorities was, according to the petitioners, shown by an incident that had taken place recently. During May 1966, the Governing Council had submitted to the Spanish Government a general report on the Territory, in which it noted, inter alia, that relations between itself and the General Assembly had not been harmonious and that no progress had been made in regard to several projects provided for in the current Development Plan. In the report the Governing Council also stressed the urgent need to annul existing legislation prohibiting the establishment of foreign companies and the influx of foreign capital. In early June 1966, the Director-General of African Settlements and Provinces of the Spanish Government had visited the Territory, held a meeting with the Governing Council, and obtained its assent to a revised version of the report which contained no reference to the above-mentioned matters.

186. In pressing its demand for independence at the earliest possible date, MONALIGE was ready to offer, by way of concessions, guarantees for the life and property of the Spanish population, freedom of entry to the Territory for Spanish immigrants, and the maintenance on a priority basis of political, economic, cultural and other relations with Spain.

187. On 19 August 1966, a group of nineteen petitioners affiliated to MONALIGE, led by Mr. Tomas Alfredo King, a lawyer, called on the Sub-Committee at Santa Isabel. Following a description of the ethnic composition of the Territory, the petitioners informed the Sub-Committee that MONALIGE, founded twenty years earlier, was representative of all the ethnic groups in the Territory, and was committed to the struggle for the freedom and welfare of the people. None of its present membership held official positions in the autonomous Government. There was in existence another political grouping known as MUNGE, the formation of which, according to them, had been inspired by divisive colonialist manoeuvres and by personal ambition. MUNGE consisted of persons who held or aspired to official positions and had received special favours. They recalled that Mr. Ondó Edú who was a leader of MUNGE used to be a member of MONALIGE. In conclusion, they informed the Sub-Committee that the people were unanimous in their support of MONALIGE's demand for immediate independence.

188. On 20 August 1966, the Sub-Committee had a meeting with the same group of petitioners. Mr. Alfredo King informed the Sub-Committee that MONALIGE had one clear aim, namely immediate independence. The people of the Territory were no more than fourth class citizens, who were deprived of the rights, legal protection and privileges extended to the Spanish residents.

189. He noted, for instance, that some 99 per cent of the arable land was under the control of the colonizers. The Spanish settlers were permitted to acquire land freely and without limitation but the indigenous people were limited to four hectares per person. If an indigenous person wished to acquire land beyond this limit, he could only do so in the name of another member of his family who was required to submit proof that he was cultivating the land himself. Evidence of these disabilities could be found in the relevant legislation and in the administration of this legislation as shown in the official gazette. He added that it was possible in theory for an indigenous person to acquire additional land under the public auction system. However, not merely were these auctions held only in Madrid, but they were open to all Spanish citizens, corporations and companies, with the result that an indigenous person was clearly at an overwhelming disadvantage. The public auction system had led to the existence of a large number of absentee landlords, and to the establishment of huge plantations such as ENASA which was Spanish owned, and controlled 10,000 hectares of land.

190. Commerce was almost entirely in the hands of the Spanish residents. Prospective African traders enjoyed no protection from the law and were, therefore, in no position to compete in this field. The situation had been aggravated by recent legislation which conferred on Spanish residents the same rights as the indigenous people. He noted in this connexion that the people of Equatorial Guinea did not enjoy the same rights in Spain as Spanish citizens. It was not surprising that there were no important African businessmen, even in cacao and coffee.

191. Referring to labour conditions, Mr. Alfredo King stated the labour structure was pyramidal in structure, with the Spanish residents at the top and the African workers at the base. The wage system was highly discriminatory, and the legislation in force tended to perpetuate this situation. Imported African workers, who usually were employed on two-year contracts, were paid miserable wages and were not permitted to transfer to other positions or to other parts of the Territory before the expiry of their contracts. The minimum wage set by the law, namely 900 pesetas per month for an eight-hour day, was grossly unsatisfactory. Further, imported African labourers in fact received only 50 per cent of their wages locally; the remainder was held in trust and paid to them only when they were about to leave the Territory. No provision existed for pensions or social security benefits for African workers. In contrast, Spanish residents working as agricultural foremen or supervisors received at least 5,100 pesetas per month.

192. African workers enjoyed only twenty-four days vacation every two years. Imported African workers were required to renew their contracts within ten days of its expiry; if not they had to be deported. Indigenous African workers were under the same obligation; if not they faced imprisonment under the vagrancy laws. All recruitment of African labour had to be carried out under government supervision. On the other hand, the Spanish workers who also came to the Territory on two-year contracts enjoyed not only fifteen days vacation every year, but they were granted six months' home leave, with passages paid for themselves and their families, at the end of their contracts.

193. Concerning the administration of justice, Mr. Alfredo King stated that only African people were sent to gaol on conviction of criminal offences. Conditions in these gaols were appalling. By contrast, Spanish residents guilty of these offences were never persecuted, or if they were, they were sentenced to small fines. It was only for serious offences like manslaughter that they were tried and, if convicted, sentenced to imprisonment; in such cases they were gaoled in Spain, not in Equatorial Guinea. If a Spanish resident were to be remanded in custody pending trial, he would be installed in a hotel and be provided with free meals.

194. In the field of political activity, MONALIGE was the only genuine movement. It had consistently struggled for independence. MONALIGE had formerly numbered Mr. Ondó Edú and Mr. Maho Sicacha among its membership but having assumed official positions, they had become conservative in their political outlook. MONALIGE desired Equatorial Guinea to accede to independence as one unit, or if this was impossible, as a federation with communications, transport, defence and foreign affairs controlled by a central government. MONALIGE wanted to see negotiations initiated without delay for the setting of a date for independence. The basis of future co-operation with Spain would be one of the subjects to be taken up during these negotiations. It was the wish of MONALIGE that independence be granted immediately, but since the negotiations it envisaged were, if begun forthwith, unlikely to be concluded before the end of 1966, they were prepared to wait until the beginning of 1967 for formal accession to independence.

195. The electoral system, according to the petitioners from MONALIGE, was undemocratic. In effect, two thirds of the members of the Territory's governmental organs were appointed by the Spanish Government and related interests. The much-vaunted affirmative vote of the people in the 1963 plebiscite was the result of manoeuvres by the Spanish authorities. The clergy had also yielded powerful influence. The concern of the Spanish Government to protect the Spanish residents against any manifestation of the legitimate grievances of the African people was reflected in the continued presence in the Territory of a large number of Spanish soldiers. There were three gun-boats in the territorial waters, full of marines. Apart from the police force, there were over 100 other military personnel, "civil guards", armed with modern weapons stationed in the Territory. These civil guards went about among the people making demonstrations of armed force, and interfered in the political and social life of the Territory as well as in many matters of civil administration. They had instructions to repress any kind of political demonstrations. Also based in the Territory was a squadron of military aircraft, which flew over the Territory every day.

196. The petitioners then submitted to the Sub-Committee, as an aide-mémoire, a communication signed by themselves and twenty-two others. In addition to the views orally conveyed by the petitioners, the communication contained the following information.

197. The most fervent wish of the people of Equatorial Guinea was for immediate independence, that is to say, before the end of 1966, to be achieved by means of a referendum. They regarded independence as a starting point for building the country's future in freedom and without harmful interference.

198. The dominance of the Spanish community in the economic life of the country was shown by the fact that the governing body of the Executive Board of the Chamber of Commerce, comprising fourteen members, included only two indigenous persons. In the cacao section of the Chamber, only two of the nine members were indigenous persons. All the members of the sections concerned with coffee, miscellaneous products, commerce and banking, and industries were Spanish.

199. Of the total exports of cacao from Fernando Póo amounting to 28,700,000 kilogrammes only 3,980,000 derived from indigenous farmers. All coffee exports came from Spanish producers, except for an insignificant amount which was sold locally to the Spanish people. All the banana production was similarly in the hands of the Spanish people. Of the 7,600 workers imported from Nigeria, all but 180 were in the employment of Spanish enterprises. Of the 32,000 hectares of land being worked in Fernando Póo, only 2,170 were farmed by indigenous persons. Of the sales made by the Chamber of Agriculture, amounting to some 200 million pesetas, only 4 million went to indigenous people. Out of 14,500,000 pesetas worth of goods exported, permits worth only 850,000 pesetas were granted to indigenous persons. Not a single permit covering the 17 million pesetas worth of imports was granted to an indigenous person.

200. Following the meeting, the Sub-Committee received a communication from a group of indigenous workers from Río Muni affiliated to MONALIGE, in which they protested the failure of the Spanish Government to promote the welfare of the people. According to this communication, there was grave disparity in the wages paid to indigenous and to Spanish workers. The Spanish worker received a monthly wage of 10,000 pesetas, and 12,000 if he was married, as well as the right to such benefits as a furnished house, and seven months' home leave with passages paid, while the indigenous worker was paid only 1,500 pesetas out of which he had to meet his bills for housing, furniture, etc. It was the impression of the authors, from speeches made by the President, that only petitioners who had appeared before the United Nations had the right even to complain about the wage system. Grievances over wages had led to two strikes during the first two years of the autonomous régime. The first involved civil servants and the second was against the Compañía de Telecomunicaciones, S.A. Two more strikes had been announced.

201. The Spanish Government had failed to keep its promise to grant freedom to the Territory, on the pretext that the people were not ready. Meanwhile it had done very little to foster economic development. They had suffered persecution because of their ardent desire for freedom; indeed a few days earlier, the civil guards had confiscated and destroyed the placards they intended to use in a welcoming demonstration for the Sub-Committee. In contrast, when a Minister of the Spanish Government was due to arrive, all workers were given a holiday.

202. In another communication submitted to the Sub-Committee at the same time the President of MONALIGE, Mr. Pastor B. Torao Sikara, in his own name and on behalf of MONALIGE, recalled that in speeches delivered in late 1964 and 1965, the Head of State of Spain had stated that Spain would not stand in the way of Equatorial Guinea, but would grant it independence when it so requested. He also referred to a subsequent statement by the representative of Spain in the United Nations in September 1965 that it was for the people of Equatorial Guinea to request and set a date for independence. In view of these statements, the Sub-Committee should use its influence to ensure that independence was granted to the Territory on 6 January 1967, and that negotiations with Spain be initiated forthwith.

203. The Sub-Committee held a further meeting with seventy-six representatives of MONALIGE, including twelve women, on 21 August 1966. At this meeting, Mr. Alfredo King explained that all land was owned by and could only be acquired from and through the Spanish Government. The public auction system for land acquisition was established by a law promulgated on 4 May 1948. Outside the public auction system the acquisition of land as previously indicated was limited to four hectares per indigenous person. However, another law promulgated on 23 December 1948 allowed the colonizers seventy-five hectares per person.

204. Referring to exploitation by the Spanish colonizers, the petitioners submitted documents which established that the vast majority of imported African labourers worked for Spanish employers or on Spanish-owned plantations. They also produced examples of contracts granted to African and Spanish workers which in their view showed the gross disparity in wages and other terms of service accorded to the two categories. The petitioners further stated that the forces of law and order were excessive for the needs of the Territory and that their numbers were obviously intended to intimidate the people and to discourage political activity aimed at independence. For instance, the Spanish civil guard consisted of 1 major (comandante), 3 captains (capitanes), 8 lieutenants (tenientes), 2 staff sergeants (brigadas), 4 non-commissioned officers (sub-oficiales), 19 sergeants (sargentos), 49 corporals (cabos), 8 privates first-class (guardias primeros), 8 buglers (cornetas), 20 telegraph operators (guardias telegrafistas) and 247 privates (guardias).

205. The petitioners further stated that they were opposed to the idea of separation of Fernando Póo from Río Muni advanced in certain quarters. It was their wish to continue relations with Spain, but this question was a matter for negotiations on a basis of equality with the Spanish Government after independence. These and other negotiations should be carried out by the genuine representatives of the people, elected through free elections, rather than persons representing Spanish interests. If there was any doubt about the aspirations to which MONALIGE was giving expression, they should be put to a plebiscite under United Nations supervision in the Territory as a whole, in the same conditions as the plebiscite on the Basic Law. In conclusion the petitioners urged that the present electoral system be scrapped in favour of a system based on the principle of one man one vote. Primary organs elected on this basis could, if necessary, elect representatives to organs at a higher level. The important factor, however, was the establishment of direct elections on the basis of universal adult suffrage for persons 21 years and over, with the electorate of both parts of the Territory voting together as one unit.

206. In illustration of the workings of the present electoral system, the petitioners stated that Mr. Pastor Torao and Mr. Abiléo Bibao, who had received the highest votes for election to the village and municipal councils, had for some unknown reason, been left out of the Government. On the other hand, several members of the General Assembly occupied their present positions by means other than elections, or alternatively, had secured very few votes in the elections. Indeed Mr. Rondó, one of the members of the Governing Council, who had recently died, had said clearly that he had not contested the elections, but had been nominated by the Spanish Government to occupy that position. For these reasons, MONALIGE tolerated, rather than recognized, the Governing Council and the General Assembly.

207. The petitioners also called attention to a provision of the Basic Law which requires that after two years, new elections should be held to replace one half of the members of the municipal councils, the General Assembly and the Governing Council. This provision had been waived, for fear that people hostile to the Spanish Government might succeed the present members of these bodies, who were personae gratae. In conclusion, they stated that there was no freedom of political activity in the Territory. The only newspaper was government-owned and did not publish any views except those in favour of the Government.

208. At this juncture, the women in the MONALIGE group asked to be permitted to submit a petition bearing twenty-five signatures. In presenting the petition, they stated that all the women of the Territory were concerned about the problems of the Territory but that their presence before the Sub-Committee in such small numbers was due to the fear of their husbands. The Sub-Committee should realize that it was their only hope and salvation.

209. In their petition, the women requested total, complete and immediate independence for Equatorial Guinea, and the establishment of a federal government in a democratic manner. They hoped that the Sub-Committee would give them its unconditional support in the United Nations. They were unhappy with the vague, ambiguous so-called autonomy imposed by the Spanish Government. They demanded the immediate initiation of negotiations with a view to the granting of independence not later than 6 January 1967.

210. At a meeting with other representatives of MONALIGE in Bata on 22 August 1966, a further petition was submitted to the Sub-Committee. In the petition, the authors stated that after 165 years of colonial rule, Spain had not trained even a hundred people to carry out technical and professional functions. It had failed to grant an adequate number of scholarships to indigenous students. There was a lack of social justice in the Territory; for example a Spanish national often without any professional training was better paid than an African trained for the same work. In spite of the granting of autonomy, no programme existed for the attainment of independence or for the training of the indigenous population for the tasks to be carried out after independence. Various leaders who had been campaigning for independence, including Mr. Acacio Mane Ela, Mr. Mongomayene, and Mr. Edjodjomo, had been arrested and shot by the civil guard without trial.

211. In addition, the authors of the petition rejected the idea of the separation of Fernando Póo from Río Muni. The unanimous desire of the people of the Territory was for complete and immediate independence and they accordingly requested the United Nations immediately to set a date for independence and the transfer of all powers to the people.

212. Further, the petitioners drew attention to a letter bearing 460 signatures and 165 thumb prints which the leaders of MONALIGE had addressed to the Head of the Spanish State on 15 August 1966. In this letter, MONALIGE, which claimed to represent more than 90 per cent of the population, recalled statements by various Spanish officials and representatives to the effect that Spain would never oppose self-determination for the people of Equatorial Guinea or their desire to change their present status, if the majority so wished. They also recalled statements made by the President of the Governing Council that it was for the people of the Territory to set a date for independence. In view of these statements, and bearing in mind the political maturity of the people, to which the Spanish Minister for Information and Tourism had recently attested, it was the wish of MONALIGE that the Territory should accede to independence by 1 January 1967. However, this wish did not imply a desire to break off relations with Spain.

213. In conclusion, MONALIGE demanded that a committee freely elected by the people should be set up to draft the necessary agreements on which independence would be based. These agreements would cover such matters as respect for Spanish investments, recognition of the rights of Spain in economic, commercial, social and other matters, and free entry for all Spanish people wishing to work in the Territory. Finally MONALIGE asked that the present rulers should take no repressive measures against anyone for political activity and that it should be accorded official recognition.

214. In another petition bearing 1,008 signatures submitted to the Sub-Committee on the same day, MONALIGE gave an historical account of Equatorial Guinea since its first contact with Spain in 1472. From that time onwards, the Territory had suffered annexation by conquest or by unequal treaties, colonialism of different kinds, and the repression of all political activity aimed at liberation. The authors of the petition stated that the indigenous inhabitants had no political or civil rights. The Spanish Government did not permit the formation of parties which were truly representative of the people, and if such parties were formed, it persecuted or imprisoned the leaders. Among these leaders were Messrs. Mariano Eyama, Pablo Nsue Edu, Martin Nvo Abaga, Enrique Nguema Ngono, Florentino Nculu Esono, Francisco Oyono Mico, Agapita Mangué, Miguel Elo, Mbiang Mba, and others. The forcible repression by Spain of protesting voices and of national liberation movements had forced large numbers of people into exile. In consequence of these policies, the indigenous people were not duly represented in the organs of government, which consisted of Europeans and a few Africans who could not reflect the aspirations of the people.

215. Commenting on the educational system, the authors claimed that after five centuries of Spanish rule, the illiteracy rate was the highest in the world. Primary education, which together with secondary education was subject to an age limit, did not fulfil its purpose. The number of indigenous people attending Spanish universities was so small that it was impossible to believe that Spain was seriously trying to educate the indigenous population. There was a lack of teachers and the shortage of universities and other educational institutions was felt everywhere. This lack of concern could be seen from the fact that there were only ninety-two persons from the Territory studying in Spain, fifty-seven of whom were paying students.

216. As regards health conditions, the population was afflicted by malaria, tuberculosis, parasitic diseases, malnutrition and a high infant mortality rate. There was an alarming shortage of doctors and auxiliary health staff. For a population of 300,000 there were only 72 physicians, 27 of whom were internes, and 163 indigenous medical assistants. There were only two first-class hospitals with a total of 741 beds and two second-class ones with 254 beds. In addition, there were eleven poorly equipped health centres, sometimes headed by a doctor.

217. Various forms of forced labour conditions were in existence. Penal sanctions were imposed on indigenous workers for failure to fulfil their employment contracts. The principle of equal pay for equal work was not respected. Indigenous workers were cruelly treated. The Spanish Government did not permit the formation of workers' organizations and trade unions so that the workers had no suitable ways of defending their interests. Racial discrimination was practised, inasmuch as a Spanish worker earned twenty times as much as the indigenous worker. Discrimination even manifested itself in the preference given to Spanish people in the provision of medical care.

218. The economic situation represented the most pernicious aspect of Spanish colonialism. The Territory had a primitive subsistence economy. Spain was the only market for the primary produce of Equatorial Guinea. The control of foreign exchange, of imports and exports, and of the prices paid to the primary producers was in the hands of Spain. The economy of the Territory was thus completely subordinated to that of Spain. Under an Act of 4 May 1948 which was still in force, the indigenous inhabitants could acquire only four hectares of land while a European could possess estates of up to 200,000 hectares. A subsequent act of 24 December 1948 made a free grant of thirty hectares to Europeans resident in the Territory for more than ten years. Furthermore, the Spanish Government did not shrink from conducting a propaganda campaign concerning its assistance to the Territory while refraining from revealing the origin of the subsidies which it claimed to be disinterestedly dispensing. It was the view of the authors that in the field of economic development, as in public health and education, the Spanish Government should seek wider co-operation with the competent international organizations for the benefit of the Territory.

219. In conclusion the authors demanded the right for the people to control their own affairs and the fixing of a date for independence. This date should be 15 November 1966, if possible, or otherwise 1 January 1967.

220. At a further meeting with a group of sixty-six representatives of MONALIGE on 23 August 1966, Mr. Angel Masie, Technical Secretary, said that it was MONALIGE's wish that Equatorial Guinea should accede to independence in the shortest possible time, in peace and understanding with Spain. In addition to the points raised in their petition, they wanted Spain to take measures to establish full equality of civil rights. Mr. Alfonso Oyono Oalogo, one of the leaders of the group, stated that in their view independence should be attained in conditions free of violence and racial discrimination.

221. Continuing, Mr. Masie said that MONALIGE comprised 90 per cent of the population of the Territory. It had some 195,000 registered members, with an additional 12,000 who had applied but were not yet registered. It included a women's section as well as a section for youth who became full members at the age of twenty-one. MUNGE, by contrast, was a minority party, favoured by the Spanish Government, and consisting mainly of government employees. It was riven by policy differences. IPGE, which had been formed abroad, was the mother organization of MONALIGE. Owing to disagreements within that movement, MONALIGE had been formed in 1962. In the event of a plebiscite being held on an independence constitution, the votes should be counted for the Territory as a whole, and not for its parts separately. The present electoral system was unsatisfactory and they were in favour of universal adult suffrage for all persons over twenty-one years of age. Furthermore they were opposed to the separation of Fernando Póo from Río Muni.

222. Mr. Henri Nkona Mdong, one of the petitioners, stated that if negotiations were initiated with Spain, the Territory should be represented by the President of MONALIGE, one member of the Governing Council, and other members elected by MONALIGE. Mr. Masie added that other political groups could also designate representatives. Mr. Oyono saw no objection to the General Assembly being represented by one member.

223. The autonomous régime, according to the petitioners, had proved very unsatisfactory. There was a vast difference, in their opinion, between rule by a small clique of colonizers and a popularly based government. During the elections preceding the inauguration of the autonomous régime, the activities of MONALIGE had been systematically hampered in favour of MUNGE, which enjoyed the support of the Spanish authorities, and claimed to be the only political party. MONALIGE was confident that in any future elections which were not supervised and manipulated by the colonial Government, it would win the majority of seats. It was for this reason that they requested that any such elections should be controlled and supervised by the United Nations.

224. Following its return to New York, the Sub-Committee received a communication from Mr. Atanasio Ndong Miyona, Secretary-General of MONALIGE, stating that the visit of the Sub-Committee to Equatorial Guinea represented ipso facto recognition by the Spanish Government of the right of the Territory to independence. Independence, however, would not mean a sharp break with Spain; it would be only a transformation of relations based on principles of co-operation and mutual respect. He accordingly requested that a date be set for the Territory's accession to independence.

225. In a further communication submitted shortly afterwards, Mr. Ndong informed the Sub-Committee that in order to be able to devote himself more directly to the preparatory work for the independence of Equatorial Guinea he had decided to terminate his political exile. Outlining the position of MONALIGE, Mr. Atanasio Ndong stated that a date for the independence of the Territory should be fixed during the forthcoming session of the General Assembly. The time-limit proposed by the people of Equatorial Guinea was 15 February 1968, and the year 1967 should be regarded as a transitional period for the discussion of constitutional arrangements and for the installation of a provisional government prior to general elections. The people of the Territory were firmly determined to accede to independence as a unitary state, while taking into account local and regional conditions. Further, it was the desire of the people that the United Nations should supervise the general elections shortly to be held in the Territory. In conclusion, he expressed appreciation to the Spanish Government for facilitating the work of the Sub-Committee and registered the belief that the Sub-Committee would help the people to build the country in unity and to safeguard their Hispano-African attachment within the African continent.

D. Meetings with groups and individuals affiliated to MUNGE

226. On 21 August 1966, the Sub-Committee received a group of fifteen representatives of the Movimiento de Unificación Nacional de la Guinea Ecuatorial (MUNGE), led by its President Mr. Agustín Eñeso Nñe.

227. In lieu of an oral statement, Mr. Eñeso Nñe presented, on behalf of MUNGE, a written communication to the Sub-Committee. In this communication, he recalled that the autonomous régime which was established by the Act of 20 December 1963, had, as its corollary, a recent statement by the Under-Secretary of the Spanish Presidency that should the inhabitants of Equatorial Guinea ever wish to change the present political structure, Spain would offer no opposition. That statement had encouraged them to expect co-operation and assistance from Spain. However, as a transitional stage, the autonomous régime had failed to meet their expectations. This failure was due to the fact that the Act of 1963 had many gaps and shortcomings which had led to serious divisions between the two parts of the Territory; these shortcomings had been compounded by human and technical errors. Although that Act prescribed modes of possible change, all efforts in that direction had proved fruitless.

228. Nationhood and independence had as their purpose the development and improvement of the people. Independence was meaningless if it was not intended to achieve this goal. At the same time, independence was a natural and noble right which could not be denied on the ground of impediments of a cultural, technical and economic nature. The specific historical circumstances of Equatorial Guinea indicated that it was capable of subsisting after independence with the help of the solidarity of the world community, as a member of the great Spanish family.

* MUNGE is variously known as Movimiento de Unión Nacional de la Guinea Ecuatorial, Movimiento de Unificación Nacional de la Guinea Ecuatorial and Movimiento de Unificación de la Guinea Ecuatorial.

229. It was the wish of the people of the Territory that Spain should grant them independence at the end of the term of the present administration on 15 July 1968, even though the errors to which the people were subject would persist for some time to come and the solution of new problems might be more difficult. They accordingly suggested the formation of a constituent commission comprising all sectors and groups, particularly economic interests, political parties and representatives of the existing Government, in order to give an opportunity to the various opinions current in the Territory to be heard. In view of the fundamental importance of the Act which would be drafted by this commission, a plebiscite should be held to determine the acceptability of that Act in April 1968. While believing themselves capable of solving their own problems, they would welcome disinterested advice and would therefore be happy if a member of the Special Committee were to be present during the holding of this plebiscite.

230. In response to questions, Mr. Eñeso Ñeñe said that it was and had been since 1963, the aim of MUNGE to unite all the people of the Territory in a single movement. His party had lost faith in the present Governing Council as it had failed to carry out the people's wishes. He was aware that the Council included members who were formerly affiliated to MUNGE. The Council had paid no attention to the views of the political parties. Nevertheless, in order to avoid civil disturbances MUNGE was prepared to tolerate its existence, pending the changes advocated above.

231. His party had given thorough consideration to the question of independence and had decided that the date for independence should be 16 July 1968. On the question of the separation of Fernando Póo and Río Muni, he recalled that the motto of MUNGE was "Unity, Peace and Work". While the party acknowledged the realities of history, as well as the small size of the Territory, it considered that Fernando Póo and Río Muni were themselves too small to subsist as separate entities. In any event the question of separation was an internal matter to be settled by the people themselves.

232. MUNGE had accepted the autonomous régime as a transitional stage but its operation had failed to satisfy the people's aspirations. In anticipation of independence on 16 July 1968, the intervening period should be devoted to negotiations with Madrid by commissions composed of representatives of political parties, the Governing Council, the economic sector and religious groups. A plebiscite should be held in April 1968 on the independence constitution. This plebiscite should be carried out not by Spain but by the people themselves in democratic conditions; everyone over the age of 21 should be allowed to participate in it. MUNGE would welcome a United Nations presence in this regard.

233. It was the expectation of MUNGE that after independence, the Territory would maintain economic relations with any other countries it thought fit. On social conditions, the belief of MUNGE was that while the Territory should be maintained as one unit, the interests and problems of minority groups should be taken into account. The membership of MUNGE comprised about 80 per cent of the population. Their strength was higher in Río Muni than in Fernando Póo which had a greater variety of cultural groups. Its membership included the Bubis, but recently the Bubis had been influenced by the separatist ideas of certain members of the governmental organs.

234. In conclusion Mr Eñeso Ñeñe informed the Sub-Committee that, recognizing their community of aims and objectives, the leadership of the Idea Popular de la Guinea Ecuatorial (IPGE) had recently decided to merge that party with MUNGE.

235. On 22 August 1966, the Sub-Committee held a meeting in Bata with representatives of the junta of MUNGE and IPGE, who submitted two communications in lieu of written statements.

236. The first communication signed by Mr. Justino Mba Nsue, Secretary-General of the junta, declared that the leadership desired full independence, without in any way hampering the cordial relations which through history and culture linked the Territory with Spain and the Spanish-speaking world.

It was also in favour of healthy international coexistence with African and other countries.

237. The second communication, bearing forty signatures, contained a historical account of the Territory, and a number of representations concerning conditions in Equatorial Guinea. In this connexion, the authors stated that the achievements of Spain deserved emphasis. According to them, the rate of population increase over the past sixteen years was 2 per cent as compared with a death rate of 7.8 per thousand. The hospital in Río Muni, regarded as one of the best in Africa had 1,400 beds, and the staff of the public health service consisted of 28 physicians, 5 surgeons, 5 pharmacists, assisted by a total of 50 nursing sisters, and 350 male nurses. There were various other hospitals and health centres. Extensive campaigns had been conducted against endemic diseases, including malaria. Trypanosomiasis and leprosy were on the decline. Infant mortality had been reduced by 40 per cent.

238. As regards educational conditions, they described the position as fairly satisfactory, although there were certain shortcomings as regards full-time education, owing to the shortage of boarding schools. Generally speaking there was an adequate number of primary schools which included 302 public schools with permanent buildings. The over-all rate of school enrolment was 90.7 per cent and instruction was provided by 350 indigenous and European teachers. The average number of pupils per class was about forty-one. School children amounted to 14 per cent of the population. Pupils undergoing secondary, technical and vocational education accounted for 1.2 per cent of the population. For higher education, students had to go to Spain on scholarships or at their own expense.

239. The authors also claimed that during 1962, the total regional income was 2,036.5 million pesetas, or 7,922 pesetas per inhabitant. The cumulative annual rate of growth was 5.5 per cent. The export index of the Territory was possibly the highest in Africa. Almost all of the Territory's output went to Spain, since it received higher prices there than on the international market. A certain amount was also exported to the United States, the United Kingdom, Belgium, and other countries. The main products of the Territory were cacao, coffee and timber. Although there had been a small increase in the production of coffee by indigenous people, owing to an increase in the area cultivated, the farms of indigenous people were not as efficiently operated as the plantations and much remained to be done to increase the output and improve the quality. As regards timber production, for which concessions were awarded by auction, the initial capital required precluded indigenous participation. There was the possibility of cultivating new crops such as hevea, sisal, etc. and of improving existing products. Further, there were hopeful prospects for mining; the sedimentary geology of the Territory seemed to offer a good chance of finding deposits of petroleum, lignite, and radio-active and iron ores.

240. As regards labour conditions, the petitioners stated that the per capita income per worker amounted to 59 per cent of the average income in Equatorial Guinea. Rural co-operatives in cacao, coffee and vegetables, the commercial and industrial co-operatives as well as the timber syndicate were making satisfactory progress.

241. On political developments, they remarked that the movement towards decolonization had not failed to have some repercussions in the Territory, where a number of true indigenous nationalists had sought the strict application of the principle of respect for the right of all people to choose their form of government and the restoration of sovereign rights and self-government to people forcibly deprived of them. Accordingly, the Government of Spain, in keeping with the relevant provisions of the United Nations Charter, had decreed the present autonomous system. Recalling that in 1965 the President of the Governing Council, Mr. Bonifacio Ondó Edú had told the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly that MUNGE had been formed in order to combine the activities of existing political parties and thus to command the support of all the people, the petitioners believed that the best prospect for the development of political coexistence lay in the establishment of a political council which would study the major political problems of the country and bring about understanding between the Spanish Government and the autonomous Government of the Territory.

242. They also recalled a declaration made in 1962 by Mr. Luis Carrero Blanco, Under-Secretary in the Office of the Presidency, that if one day the majority of the people of Equatorial Guinea wished to modify the present status of the Territory, Spain would see no objection to negotiating with it about its future. Mr. Carrero Blanco had also stated that no other country had more respect for self-determination than Spain. The people were therefore grateful for the efforts that Spain had made to promote the political, economic, social and cultural development of the Territory.

243. At the recent meetings of the Special Committee held in Algiers, Mr. Ondó Edú had stated that since the question of independence affected all the people directly, it would be advisable for all of them first to be given a thorough knowledge of the situation and then for them freely to express their opinions. This statement, as well as his support of the invitation extended by the Spanish delegation to the Special Committee represented a great occasion in the history of Equatorial Guinea. The leadership of MUNGE-IPGE was grateful for the Spanish gesture and requested the Sub-Committee to shoulder its responsibilities by studying the ways of meeting the aspirations of the people.

244. In conclusion, the petitioners observed that the expression of friendship and co-operation between Equatorial Guinea and Spain was in the interests of the peoples of both countries. It was the desire of the people of the Territory to develop this common interest. The Spanish Government had enabled Equatorial Guinea to reach a higher economic level than many developing countries. It had not only based its policies on the fundamental principles of human rights as recognized by the United Nations but had recognized the people of the Territory as being capable of self-government. They regarded the present autonomous system as a stage on the way to independence. At the same time, independence would not alienate them from Spain; rather it would enable them to appreciate their links and therefore to establish friendly relations on the basis of equality within the Hispanic community. Equatorial Guinea as an African country would never tolerate interference in its internal affairs and would respect the sovereignty of other countries, observing strict reciprocity in its relations with them.

245. For all the above reasons the leadership of MUNGE-IPGE was requesting that a date be set for the independence of Equatorial Guinea by means of cordial discussions between the Spanish Government and the political council of MUNGE-IPGE. The agreements resulting from these discussions should be registered with the United Nations.

246. On 22 August 1966, the Sub-Committee held a meeting with a group of thirty-two petitioners, representing the political junta of MUNGE-IPGE, led by Mr. Agustín Eñeso Ñeñe, the President of MUNGE, Mr. Justino Mba Nsue, Secretary-General of MUNGE, Mr. Antonino Eworo, President of IPGE, and Mr. Clemente Ateba, Secretary-General of IPGE.

247. Mr. Eñeso Ñeñe recalled that two weeks earlier MUNGE and IPGE had decided to form an alliance inasmuch as their aims and objectives were similar, Mr. Mba Nsue expressed appreciation of the initiative of the Spanish Government in inviting the Sub-Committee. This invitation was a reflection of the fact that the people of the Territory were beginning to assert their individuality and integrity. They were assuming positions of responsibility in increasing numbers. They desired independence as well as a broad measure of economic and social development, without jeopardizing their relations with Spain and the Hispanic world.

248. In response to questions, Mr. Mba Nsue explained that IPGE had been formed twelve years ago by exiles from the Territory in Cameroon, but that following the inauguration of the autonomous régime, MUNGE had been established with a view to combining all the political parties of the Territory in a single movement. Some time ago a number of exiles had returned from Cameroon, and two weeks earlier, as indicated by Mr. Eñeso Ñeñe, the leadership of the two movements had come to the conclusion that an amalgamation was necessary in order to prepare for the future of the Territory. It was their hope that this amalgamation would be extended to include MONALIGE, and some talks had already taken place in this connexion.

249. In their view, a date for the independence of Equatorial Guinea should be fixed through negotiations between the Spanish Government and a delegation from the Territory comprising representatives drawn from the General Assembly and the leadership of MUNGE and IPGE. Meanwhile they requested that modifications be made to the present system in order to make it more efficient and democratic. They envisaged an independence constitution under which the President would be directly elected by universal adult suffrage and the General Assembly by an electoral college comprised of members of municipal councils.

250. Mr. Eworo stated that while agreement had been reached for the amalgamation of MUNGE and IPGE, the relevant instruments had not yet been drawn up. His group was in favour of complete independence, if possible by the end of 1966 or early 1967, but felt that it was for the Spanish Government to set the date, after consultation with representatives of the people at a round-table conference. Continuing, he stated that it was important for the people to be fully informed as to the political, economic and social situation and prospects of the Territory. His party regarded the autonomous régime only as a transitional stage during which the people would acquire the discipline and make the preparations necessary for the attainment of independence in the best possible conditions.

251. Mr. Eñeso Ñeñe added that they envisaged that one half of the membership of the General Assembly would be elected through universal adult suffrage and the other half by corporative bodies and co-operatives. The President, who would be elected by universal adult suffrage, would be empowered to select his own cabinet. The present electoral system under which the President was not directly elected was unsatisfactory. Mr. Ateba stated that all the legislative bodies should be composed of members directly elected by the people on the basis of universal adult suffrage.

252. In conclusion, Mr. Eñeso Ñeñe said, on behalf of MUNGE, that independence should be granted to the Territory not later than 15 July 1968, with the intervening period being devoted to negotiations in which all political parties, religious faiths, as well as members of the General Assembly and Governing Council would participate.

253. In reply to a question, the leaders of the group stated that they were not familiar with the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. Responding to another question, the leaders of MUNGE stated that, after consultation with their counterparts from IPGE, they were prepared to support the request of the IPGE group for independence during 1967. The IPGE leaders claimed for their party a membership of 160,000 and the MUNGE leaders asserted that their following combined with the membership of IPGE comprised 80 per cent of the population of the Territory. According to the leaders of IPGE, MONALIGE had in the past criticized MUNGE for opposing independence simply on the ground that the latter had expressed itself in favour of the autonomous system. However, now that it was clear that MUNGE was for independence, the chances had improved of the MUNGE-IPGE alliance being extended to include MONALIGE.

E. Meetings with groups and individuals affiliated to IPGE

254. At the outset of its work, the Sub-Committee took account of the statement made to the Special Committee at its 447th meeting on 15 June 1966 by a petitioner representing the Idea Popular de la Guinea Ecuatorial (IPGE). In that statement, the petitioner informed the Committee that the Spanish Government had been persecuting members of his party and those of another freedom movement, the Movimiento Nacional de Liberación de la Guinea Ecuatorial (MONALIGE); a large number of them had been imprisoned in a concentration camp on the island of Annobón. The granting of so-called autonomy to the Territory had left the colonial status of the Territory unchanged. Indeed, the results of the referendum on the question of autonomy had been falsified by the Spanish authorities in order to permit the establishment of a supposedly autonomous Government which naturally took its orders from Spain.

255. In 1964, the Movimiento de Unificación Nacional de la Guinea Ecuatorial (MUNGE) which had been founded by members of the autonomous Government to serve the interests of the Spanish Europeans and the petty bourgeoisie, had been declared the only political party in the Territory. During that period, the people of Equatorial Guinea had been subjected to exile, expulsion, arbitrary sequestration, torture and assassination. An initiative taken by the leadership of IPGE and the MONALIGE to merge these parties in a new movement known as Frente Nacional y Popular de Liberación de la Guinea Ecuatorial (FRENAPO) had been frustrated by a decision of the Spanish authorities in March 1965 to recognize MONALIGE. This decision was followed by the proscription of IPGE and the relentless persecution of its members. In this connexion, the petitioner stated that the designs of the Spanish Government could be inferred from the presence of 12,000 troops in the country and of four warships as well as jet aircraft and parachutist commandos in the area.

256. In conclusion, the petitioner informed the Special Committee that IPGE was prepared to use violence if need be to defend the rights, freedom and dignity of the people of Equatorial Guinea. He requested, inter alia, that the Special Committee condemn Spanish colonialism in the Territory, urge the Spanish Government to grant unconditional independence to the Territory, and call on African Governments to extend to IPGE the necessary political, moral and material support.

257. Before undertaking its visit to Equatorial Guinea, the Sub-Committee also had before it a number of petitions from leaders of IPGE concerning the Territory (A/AC.109/PET.500/Add.1 and 2).

258. In these petitions, the leaders of IPGE complained of arrests, imprisonment, assassination and other acts of repression carried out against members of their party by the Spanish colonial authorities. According to them, the total number of Spanish soldiers stationed in the Territory had risen to 14,000 since 1959. The petitioners also protested against inequities and discriminatory practices which the African people of the Territory were suffering at the hands of the Spanish European element. They also asserted that the autonomous Government of the Territory was a puppet régime, in no way reflecting the aspirations of the people. They referred by way of illustration to a statement attributed to the President of the Governing Council in December 1965 to the effect that Equatorial Guinea was not yet ready for independence.

259. They called for the dissolution of the autonomous Government and for the taking of appropriate measures by the United Nations to avoid the disastrous results that had ensued in other colonial Territories where demands for independence remained unfulfilled.

260. Before its departure for the Territory, the Sub-Committee received a communication from Mr. Jesús Mba Ovono, Secretary-General of IPGE, in which he regretted his inability to appear before the Sub-Committee. He explained that he was in enforced exile in Brazzaville and that many other members of his party were in a similar situation in Algeria, Cameroon, Guinea and the United Arab Republic.

261. According to Mr. Mba Ovono, the problem confronting the Sub-Committee was simple. It was a question whether or not Equatorial Guinea should accede to independence in the shortest possible time. IPGE's reply to this question was in the affirmative, whereas the reply of the Spanish colonizers was in the negative. It was a problem which resided in the basic fact of the recognition by the United Nations and world opinion of the right of peoples to self-determination and independence.

262. He further observed that the extent of illiteracy and poverty in the Territory, which the Sub-Committee would appreciate during its visit, was itself a condemnation of Spanish colonialism and a reason why the people must be freed from Spanish domination at the earliest possible time. It would be a contradiction to use the backwardness of the Territory as a justification for the maintenance of colonial rule.

263. In conclusion, he urged the Sub-Committee to break down the barriers which would be placed in the way of the people in their attempts to make contact with it. He also suggested that the Sub-Committee should not hesitate in the exercise of its rights to enter into discussions with people other than the indoctrinated groups acting under police supervision who would be presented to it.

264. On 22 August 1966, a number of members of IPGE presented a communication bearing five signatures to the Sub-Committee. In this communication, the authors declared that the idea of merging IPGE and MUNGE without the holding of a proper public meeting was nothing but an ambitious personal project of Mr. Antonino Eworo Obama and Mr. Clemente Ateba Nso, who had never been real members of IPGE. IPGE had been founded in Sevilla de Niefang on 30 September 1959 by Mr. Enrique Nkuna Ndongo, Chairman, Mr. Salvador Nsamiyo Ensema, Vice-Chairman, and Mr. Crisanto Masié Esono, Secretary. The Chairman and Vice-Chairman were at present Chairmen of the local committees of MONALIGE in the districts of Sevilla de Niefang and Micomeseng, respectively. According to the authors, this showed that the members of IPGE now supported MONALIGE.

265. Following its return to New York, the Sub-Committee received another communication from Mr. Jesús Mba Ovono. In this communication, Mr. Mba Ovono noted that the agreement signed by Spain with King Bankoro of Corisco in March 1778 set up a protectorate for a period of fifty years for the sole purpose of allowing trade contacts. This agreement did not involve any concession of territory or of powers of government, and stipulated that after the fifty-year period, its extension would be a matter for fresh negotiation. It was therefore clear that Spain never had any right, except that of armed force, to impose its rule on Equatorial Guinea. For this reason, many people in Equatorial Guinea had been dissatisfied with Spain colonization, and ever since the assassination of their leader, Mr. Acacio Mane Ela, in November 1959 by the Spanish authorities, had been preparing to fight openly against Spanish colonial rule.

266. Subsequently, the Spanish authorities, faced with the development of the liberation movement in the Territory, had intensified their repressive measures and had arrested, imprisoned and assassinated the nationalist leaders, a number of whom had been obliged to take refuge in neighbouring countries, particularly in Cameroon and Gabon. Further, the Spanish Government had carried out an intensive propaganda campaign designed to persuade the people not to ask for independence but simply to rest content with autonomy. It had devoted all its efforts to this end and having failed, it was preparing to bring bloodshed to the Territory. There were more than 14,000 Spanish soldiers in Equatorial Guinea, four warships were patrolling the coast and nine jet aircraft and a group of parachutists were stationed in the Territory. The installation of a puppet autonomous administration had only made the situation worse.

267. In March 1964, the Bubis had held a meeting at Santa Isabel, under the presidency of the then Commissioner-General of the Territory, at which they signed a document requesting the separation of Fernando Póo and Río Muni. This document was the result of manoeuvring on the part of the Spanish capitalist landowner settlers, and it was to be noted that these demands had recently been repeated by the Bubis.

