268. Spanish colonialism was now preparing to grant independence of a neo-colonialist type with the collaboration of indigenous traitors who were simply protecting the interests of the Spaniards in Equatorial Guinea and acquiescing in the colonial exploitation of the Territory's resources. The statements made to the Sub-Committee by certain leaders of the Territory, particularly the President of the Governing Council and the President of the General Assembly ran counter to the aspirations of the people of Equatorial Guinea who desired complete and immediate independence.

269. Nevertheless, Spain deserved gratitude for changing its former attitude and for its new willingness to grant independence to Equatorial Guinea. In these circumstances Spain should carry out the following measures as an indispensable condition for the granting of independence to the Territory at the earliest possible date: a general and unconditional amnesty for all political prisoners and exiles; the dissolution of the sham autonomous Government; recognition of IPGE and MUNGE and the organization of free elections under United Nations auspices on the basis of universal adult suffrage; a constitutional conference under United Nations supervision; the formation of a government on the basis of the results of the elections and the proclamation of independence; and lastly, the immediate withdrawal of Spanish military forces from the country.

270. In conclusion, Mr. Ovono expressed the hope that Spain and Equatorial Guinea would continue to maintain good relations both diplomatic and commercial in the future, on a footing of equality, and that Spain would comply as soon as possible with the desire of the people of the Territory for complete, immediate and sovereign independence.

F. Meetings with other groups and individuals

271. On 20 August 1966, the Sub-Committee held a meeting with a group of nineteen Bubis led by Mr. Augustín Santiago Sota Esele who stated that they were representing all the Bubis of Fernando Póo. Mr. Santiago Sota Esele informed the Sub-Committee that on 10 July 1966 a meeting of all the representatives of the Village Councils of Fernando Póo had been held in Rebola and had adopted a number of resolutions which were contained in a communication he had presented to the Sub-Committee. These resolutions contained a demand for the reconciliation and unification of all the villages in Fernando Póo and an endorsement of a recommendation stated to have been made by the Fernando Póo Provincial Council on 9 March 1965 for the abolition of all political parties. The resolutions also included a demand for the total separation of Fernando Póo and Río Muni and a request that the governmental organs of the Territory should take the necessary steps towards this end.

272. Mr. Santiago Sota Esele also informed the Sub-Committee that when its impending arrival became known, all the Bubis of Fernando Póo resident in Santa Isabel, San Fernando, San Carlos and forty-two villages, as well as in isolated farming communities held a meeting in Rebola on 18 August 1966. The proceedings of this meeting were contained in a communication bearing thirty-eight signatures which he had submitted to the Sub-Committee. In this communication the authors expressed support for the motion for separation submitted by the Bubi councillors, Mr. Aurelio Nicolas Itoha, Mr. Luis Maho Sicacha, Mr. Román Borico Toichoa and Mr. Gustavo Watson Bueco, at a meeting of the Governing Council held on 12 and 13 August 1966. They claimed that since the members from Río Muni constituted a majority in the General Assembly, the views of the members from Fernando Póo had been consistently disregarded. Further, the majority of projects for public works and improvements were carried out in Río Muni; while Fernando Póo contributed 81 per cent of the revenue, Río Muni accounted for 83 per cent of the expenditure.

273. The authors of the communication also reiterated a resolution adopted by them at a meeting in Santiago de Baney on 27 August 1964 in which they called for the complete separation of Fernando Póo and Río Muni. In support of this demand, they stated that unrestricted immigration to Fernando Póo by outsiders would lead to over-population, scarcity of land and unemployment. Recalling that Pope John XXIII, in his encyclical Pacem in Terris, had urged that ethnic minorities should be respected and their values encouraged, they asserted that unrestricted immigration would also result in a repression of the vitality and development of the Bubis. They claimed that their demand was in accordance with Article 73 e of the United Nations Charter, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Charter of the Organization of African Unity (OAU).

274. They also recalled that there were a number of countries, including Luxembourg, Andorra, Liechtenstein and Monaco, which were smaller in area than Fernando Póo but which were nevertheless sovereign independent States. If their demand for the complete separation of Fernando Póo and Río Muni were granted, each of the resulting entities would be ruled by its own autonomous administration, without prejudice to any assistance that they may wish to extend to each other. In conclusion, the authors of the communication stated that as soon as Fernando Póo had been separated from Río Muni, a commission appointed by the people of Fernando Póo should be established for the purpose of determining, in negotiation with Spain, the date of its independence. Subsequently, the State of Fernando Póo would proceed to conclude the necessary treaties of friendship with Spain in view of the close ties between the two countries and in gratitude for the work carried out by Spain.

275. Mr. Santiago Sota Esele also stated that the Bubis were in full support of the memorandum submitted by Mr. Nicolas Itoha, Councillor for Labour, on 20 August 1966. In response to questions, Mr. Santiago Sota Esele stressed that the Bubis desired independence, but not before the economic and administrative separation of Fernando Póo and Río Muni. Otherwise, serious difficulties might arise similar to those prevailing in other parts of Africa. Furthermore, the five members of the Governing Council from Río Muni, including the President, were in a position to outvote the four Bubi members from Fernando Póo on all questions. There was a real danger that the 200,000 people of Río Muni would increasingly disregard the interests of the 18,000 Bubis of Fernando Póo. Providence itself had segregated mankind into ethnic groups and man could not be presumed to know better. The Bubis wanted to be able to protect their families and property and their livelihood when independence was attained. They were disappointed with the autonomous administration for devoting a disproportionate amount of attention and expenditure to Río Muni.

276. On 1 August 1966, the Sub-Committee held a further meeting at Moka with a group of thirteen Bubis, also led by Mr. Santiago Sota Esele, who stated that they represented all the Bubis in the Moka area, including San Carlos and surrounding villages. He felt bound to emphasize, in view of allegations that had been made about them, that the Bubis were indeed the indigenous people of Fernando Póo and that their interests should be paramount in all matters relating to their country.

277. Mr. Juan Balboa Boneke informed the Sub-Committee that the views of the Bubis were contained in the documents presented to the Sub-Committee the previous day. It was the wish of the Bubis that the internal problems of the Territory be solved before independence was attained. The solution to these problems lay in the separation of Fernando Póo and Río Muni. If this solution were not arrived at, there would be conflict and bloodshed. For the Bubis it was a question of preserving their integrity. After separation they would negotiate the question of independence with Spain.

278. Mr. Domisio Sila stated that it was for the indigenous people of Fernando Póo to determine their own future. It was the Spanish Government which had imposed a false unity on the two parts of the Territory. The Bubis thought it essential that independence should be attained in conditions of peace and prosperity but there was a danger of conflict at the present time inasmuch as they were being pushed into an inferior position by people who had come to Fernando Póo as their guests. They were in favour of negotiations with Spain regarding independence but he shared the view that the internal problems of the Territory should be settled first.

279. On 21 August 1966 the Sub-Committee received a communication from Mr. Primo Mbomio Nso which contained a complaint that racial discrimination was rampant in the Territory. According to him, Spanish people had come to Equatorial Guinea to avail themselves of the wealth of the Territory and had used the people as tools for the attainment of their ambition and desires without regard to the economic situation or well-being of the people. In the communication Mr. Mbomio Nso also stated that the indigenous worker who had served a firm for some five to eight years earned a smaller wage than a recently arrived Spanish worker even though the former did more work than the latter. Moreover, there were two rates of pay throughout the Territory, one for the Spanish worker and one for the indigenous worker. The Spanish community had done nothing for the Territory in the sense of industrial development. The indigenous people were housed in miserable dwellings while the Spanish residents lived in comfortable houses. In conclusion, he stated that the Spanish people had done great harm to the people of Equatorial Guinea.

280. On 21 August 1966 the Sub-Committee received a further communication from a group of indigenous workers. In this communication they complained that the Spanish worker received a wage of 10,000 pesetas with entitlements to housing, furniture, etc., while the indigenous worker was paid only 1,700 pesetas without any extras. Indigenous workers were not even given the opportunity to complain about their conditions of work. After 188 years of Spanish rule the Spanish Government had done nothing which could serve as an example to be emulated should the Territory become independent. Soon after the establishment of the autonomous régime, the Spanish Government had made all kinds of promises which remained unfulfilled, and many indigenous persons who opposed the Spanish authorities ran the risk of execution. The Spanish authorities had treated the people as slaves in their own country. This situation was clearly intended to make it impossible for them to achieve independence.

281. On 21 August 1966, a further communication bearing thirty signatures was presented to the Sub-Committee on behalf of the Fang residents in the district of San Carlos. In this communication, the authors stated that in 1915, indigenous workers from Río Muni were exported to Fernando Póo to supply the labour necessary for the exploitation of the latter. From that time onwards mutual co-operation of all kinds had developed among the inhabitants of the two parts of the Territory. Their acceptance of the unity of Fernando Póo and Río Muni had been embodied in the present Basic Law. The authors were therefore greatly surprised that the Councillors for Health and Welfare, Information and Tourism, Labour, and Industry and Mining should have submitted a motion in favour of the economic and administrative separation of the two parts of the Territory even before the end of the term of the present administration and without having any idea of the consequences of such a measure.

282. The Fangs resident in Fernando Póo were there in order to serve the country. It was to be noted that there were hundreds of workers and residents from other parts as well. They felt themselves to be at home and were therefore entitled to freedom of residence. According to the authors, the country was on the brink of economic chaos and this was the reason for recent disturbances. If the Bubis of Fernando Póo really had the interests of the country at heart they should be asking the Sub-Committee to arrange for the provision of economic assistance since it was for lack of financial and technical means that the resources of the country had not been developed. In conclusion, the authors stated that far from helping the country, the separation of Fernando Póo and Río Muni would contribute to its ruination.

G. Meeting with members of Río Muni Provincial Council

283. At a meeting held with members of the Río Muni Provincial Council on 22 August 1966, the President read a prepared statement on behalf of the members of that Council. In the statement, the members of the Provincial Council declared their desire for independence, with economic and military assistance from Spain. Only thus could the peace and security of the Territory be guaranteed. The experience of the past two years had taught them, first, that it was difficult for a small nation to live in isolation, secondly, that it would be preferable to have a greater degree of self-determination and thirdly, that the Spanish Government, in their belief, was most willing to entertain their proposals. For these reasons they thought the time had come to negotiate with Spain the terms of independence for Equatorial Guinea.

284. In response to questions at a later meeting on 23 August 1966, they recalled that the General Assembly had previously adopted a motion calling for changes in the autonomous system and that the President of that body was expected to appoint a study group to examine and submit a report on the implications of that motion. One of the reasons for their desire for independence was that it would enable the Territory to avail itself of assistance from the United Nations and other international bodies. Further, this desire was independent of the willingness or otherwise of the Spanish Government to continue extending economic assistance. The present time was propitious for the beginning of negotiations for independence. They envisaged that following these negotiations, a plebiscite would be held on an independence constitution, the votes of which should be counted for the Territory as a whole, rather than for its component parts.

285. Referring to conditions in the Territory, they mentioned that there were only six indigenous doctors in the whole Territory, four of whom were in Río Muni. As regards the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, some of them had knowledge of it from their compatriots in Gabon and Cameroon; others were not aware of it and would wish that copies be made available to them.

IV. CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

A. Conclusions

286. In accordance with its terms of reference and having ascertained the conditions in the Territory with a view to speeding up the implementation of General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960 and 2067 (XX) of 16 December 1965, the Sub-Committee on Equatorial Guinea has reached the following conclusions.

287. The Government of Spain has stated on several occasions that independence would be granted to the Territory when the people ask for it. These statements have given rise to an understanding among the people that the present régime of autonomy represents the last stage of constitutional development towards complete independence.

288. However, the expectations of the people that at this stage they would participate effectively in the control and management of their own affairs have not been fulfilled. This autonomous régime is also unsatisfactory to some members of the Governing Council. Most of the powers are still vested in and exercised by the Commissioner-General and the Spanish Government. Neither the Governing Council nor the General Assembly wields effective power even within the scope of its competence.

289. The electoral system which is not only indirect, but is based mainly on selective corporative representation and to a lesser extent on the vote of heads of families through municipal councils, limits participation to only a small minority of the adult population in the election of representatives to governmental organs. For this reason these organs are highly unrepresentative of the people as a whole and are not a reflection of their freely expressed will and desire. In this connexion, the Sub-Committee notes that there is strong support among the people for a system of direct elections on the basis of universal adult suffrage.

290. Although people were able to appear before the Sub-Committee as petitioners, evidence indicates that freedom of political activity is curtailed. Political parties are not accorded official recognition. There was also evidence that persons expressing political opinions unwelcome to the administering Power were liable to harassment. Some petitioners complained that the presence of Spanish military forces in the Territory has an intimidating effect on the people. Further evidence was presented that justice and, in particular, criminal laws were unequally applied to the detriment of the Africans.

291. There are some tendencies favouring the separation of Fernando Póo and Río Muni with regard to certain budgetary and administrative matters. However, these views are held only by a small minority among the Bubis of Fernando Póo and by certain vested interests. They are not shared by the vast majority of the people nor by any of the major political parties. Further, it is the wish of the majority of the people that the Territory should accede to independence as one unit.

292. From the consultations held by the Sub-Committee with the people, it is clear that there is unanimity among all sections of the population in favour of the attainment of independence without delay. This view is shared by the various political parties and by most members of the Governing Council, including its President. There is also a unanimous desire that the negotiations with the Spanish Government should begin immediately for the transfer of all powers to the people of the Territory.

293. Recalling that the Spanish Government has undertaken to grant independence to the Territory when the people ask for it, the bodies, groups and individuals with whom the Sub-Committee held consultations made a variety of suggestions as to the date on which the Territory should accede to independence. These suggestions ranged from independence with immediate effect, to independence by the end of the term of the present Governing Council in July 1968.

294. On the basis of the foregoing, it is clear that the desire of the vast majority of the people of the Territory is for independence not later than July 1968. The fixing of a definite date, however, would seem to depend on the outcome of a conference between the administering Power and the various political parties of the Territory and all sections of the population. It is also clear from the evidence received by the Sub-Committee that the wish of the majority of the people is for United Nations participation in the processes leading to the independence of the Territory.

295. As regards economic conditions, the Sub-Committee noted that the economy of the Territory is basically dependent on cacao and coffee and is characterized by a lack of diversification. It is now admitted by the Spanish Government that this situation is unsatisfactory. The Sub-Committee noted that most of the commerce of the Territory is in foreign hands.

296. Although the Spanish Government has in recent years extended more aid to Equatorial Guinea through support of its main export products, its contributions to the budget and the maintenance of economic and social programmes in the area and the steps taken by it in the field of economic development have been slow and inadequate particularly in the continental part of the Territory. The Sub-Committee also noted that at no time has the administering Power undertaken effective measures to reduce the economic dependence of the Territory on Spain and to enable it to achieve rapid and balanced economic development. Further, the Sub-Committee took note with satisfaction of the statement by the Spanish Government that it would continue to grant assistance to Equatorial Guinea even after the Territory attains independence.

297. A number of petitions and petitioners expressed the need for a change in the land tenure system obtaining in the Territory. They stated that the present system was not only unfair to the indigenous people but also tended to encourage ownership of land by expatriate Spanish nationals and companies. The present system of auctions, which are held in Madrid, favours the wealthier land purchasers to the detriment of the indigenous population. Furthermore, in many cases the legal provisions limiting the permissible acquisition of property by one person or corporation have been successfully circumvented.

298. With regard to labour conditions, the present legislation favours expatriate Spanish nationals in preference to the African workers. There is gross disparity in the wages and other conditions of service granted to the Spanish and the African workers. Most of the positions of authority and responsibility in public administration as well as in the private sector are filled by expatriate Spanish nationals. The formation of trade unions representing the workers vis-à-vis the employers is not permitted.

299. As regards educational conditions, the Sub-Committee noted that in spite of steps recently taken by the administering Power, there is a shortage of educational institutions and particularly institutions of secondary education and higher learning, as well as of teaching staff. Consequently, educational opportunities in the Territory are limited. At the same time, the number of students sent from the Territory to acquire higher knowledge or special skills abroad is inadequate to the needs of the Territory.

B. Recommendations

300. In the light of the discussions held with the administering Power and the autonomous authorities, the evidence received, and the conclusions reached above, the Sub-Committee considers that the Special Committee should make the following recommendations.

301. That the administering Power should immediately convene a conference, in which the various political parties of the Territory and all sections of the population would be fully represented, in order to establish the modalities for the transfer of all powers to the people without delay, and to fix a date for independence which, in response to the wishes of the people, should be not later than July 1968.

302. That in the meantime, the administering Power should undertake the speedy transfer of effective governmental powers to the representatives of the Territory.

303. That the administering Power should remove all restrictions on political activities and establish full democratic freedoms.

304. That the administering Power should replace the present electoral system by a system based on universal adult suffrage, and that elections should be held on this basis before independence.

305. That the administering Power should establish in law and in practice full equality of political, economic, social and other rights and should in particular:

(a) Reform the legislation and practice relating to land tenure bearing in mind the principle that the interests of the people of the Territory are paramount;

(b) Reform the legislation and practice relating to labour conditions in order to promote the interests of the African worker and ensure respect for the principle of equal pay for equal work;

(c) Permit the formation of representative trade unions which would defend and promote the interests of the workers;

(d) Ensure the equal application of justice without regard to race, creed or colour.

306. That the administering Power should intensify its assistance to the Territory and take effective measures for balanced economic diversification and rapid economic development of the Territory.

307. That a study be undertaken by the Special Committee in consultation with the administering Power and representatives of Equatorial Guinea on the best ways of securing the assistance of the specialized agencies, especially as regards economic diversification, education and health.

308. That the administering Power should establish institutions of secondary education and higher learning in the Territory and accelerate training programmes adequate to the urgent needs of Equatorial Guinea, including the training of Africans in various fields of administration and positions of high responsibility.

309. That the administering Power should continue to co-operate with the United Nations by ensuring United Nations participation in the processes leading to the independence of the Territory.

310. That the administering Power should undertake a full-scale circulation of the present report on Equatorial Guinea and the dissemination in the Territory of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples (General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV)) as well as the relevant documentation on the work of the Special Committee.

V. ADOPTION OF THE REPORT

CHAPTER X*

IFNI AND SPANISH SAHARA

A. ACTION PREVIOUSLY TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE AND THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

1. In 1964, the Special Committee considered Ifni and Spanish Sahara and adopted a resolution which is contained in the Special Committee's report to the General Assembly at its nineteenth session (A/5800/Rev.1,¹ chap. IX, para. 112). At its meetings in 1965, the Special Committee did not consider these Territories, but included information on them in its report to the General Assembly at its twentieth session (A/6000/Rev.1,² chap. X).

2. At its twentieth session, the General Assembly adopted resolution 2072 (XX) of 16 December 1965. The resolution reads as follows:

"The General Assembly,

"Having considered the chapters of the reports of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples relating to Ifni and Spanish Sahara,

"Recalling the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples contained in its resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960,

"Bearing in mind that the Declaration is inspired by the strong desire of the international community to put an end to colonialism wherever and in whatever form it may occur,

"1. Approves the provisions of the resolution concerning Ifni and Spanish Sahara adopted on 16 October 1964 by the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples;

"2. Urgently requests the Government of Spain, as the administering Power, to take immediately all necessary measures for the liberation of the Territories of Ifni and Spanish Sahara from colonial domination and, to this end, to enter into negotiations on the problems relating to sovereignty presented by these two Territories;

* Previously issued under the symbol A/6300/Add.7.

² Ibid., Twentieth Session, Annexes, addendum to agenda item 23.

"3. Requests the Special Committee to report on the implementation of the present resolution to the General Assembly at its twenty-first session;

"4. Requests the Secretary-General to transmit this resolution to the administering Power."

3. The Secretary-General transmitted this resolution to the administering Power on 10 January 1966.

B. INFORMATION ON THE TERRITORIES³

1. Ifni

General

4. The Moslem inhabitants of the Territory are governed by their own civil laws, the Sharia courts having jurisdiction in civil and labour matters with the status of Territorial Courts. Moslems are exempt from military service, but they may enlist voluntarily in the Army or the Police and may hold officers' commissions.

5. The indigenous inhabitants of the Territory have access to the municipal administrative organs on a footing of equality with their European neighbours. Three of the present Council members are Moslems.

6. In the matter of wages, there is no discrimination on the basis of ethnic origin or social class. The labour laws provide that indigenous workers are to be paid the wages appropriate to their respective occupations and labour categories and that they are entitled to dependency and cost-of-living allowances, paid vacations, sickness and accident insurance, and other social security benefits.

Public health and welfare

7. Public health services consist of a network of dispensaries staffed by doctors, auxiliaries and assistants and a hospital (at present equipped with 200 beds) which provides, inter alia, the following services: general medicine, general surgery, traumatology, gynaecology, child health and paediatrics. The hospital is to be enlarged this year; a new surgical complex with two operating rooms will be built and the number of beds increased.

8. A total of 12 million⁴ pesetas was spent on public health services during 1965.

9. The maternity services of the hospital are being used by a growing number of Moslem women who come to the hospital for their deliveries.

10. In the provincial hospital, patients of both religions share the same accommodations and no distinction is made between them except as regards diet, in which the Koranic precepts are observed for Moslems.

11. In the matter of preventive medicine, there are periodic vaccination campaigns and campaigns to promote sanitation in homes and meeting places.

12. The "Gobernador Artalejo" Residence, opened at the beginning of the year, provides a home and medical care for those who, because of age, lack of a family or physical disability, voluntarily choose to enter it. This institution, which now accommodates forty residents and is to be expanded, was built at a cost of 2.5 million pesetas.

⁴ The local currency is the Spanish peseta, which is equal to $US0.0168.

13. Another welfare development is the establishment of the Organization for the Blind, which provides a decent livelihood for blind persons who in the past were unable to earn their living by other means.

14. In the field of social welfare in Ifni, it is noted that more than 5.5 million pesetas in retirement and widows' pensions were paid during 1965.

Education

15. In addition to the primary schools for both sexes, there are numerous Koranic schools which are subsidized by the local administration and attended by children whose parents wish them to have this type of education. During the 1966-1967 academic year two new school units, which have already been completed and can accommodate 180 pupils each, will go into operation and a new pre-school unit with five classes will probably be opened.

16. At these educational centres, each pupil receives a glass of milk as a diet supplement and many of them are given their noonday meal.

17. Secondary education is provided by the National Institute, established in 1963 to take the place of the Secondary Education Centre which has been operating in the Territory for the previous twenty years. It is attended by pupils who hope ultimately to study at the university level.

18. For those pupils who do not wish to go on to the university, there is a vocational school, which has a current enrolment of 156. The construction in 1962 of the new building in which this school is housed cost 3.5 million pesetas.

19. Studies above the secondary level are pursued outside the Territory, and scholarships are offered for this purpose. Seventy-four persons at present are studying with the aid of scholarships.

20. There is also a Preparatory School of Agriculture at which pupils nearing the end of their studies are introduced to the theoretical and practical fundamentals of this occupation.

Public works

21. The subsidy for public works to the local budget during the last financial year was 29 million pesetas.

22. A new pier was built at State expense despite the natural difficulties presented by the coastline. A port-island, linked to the mainland by a cable railway, was constructed for the purpose. The cost of the project was 210 million pesetas.

Economy

23. The budget of the Territory, which in 1964 amounted to 65 million pesetas, rose to 85 million for the year under review. This figure does not include supplementary and special credits.

24. Efforts are being made to improve agriculture and make it more productive. As a result, fruit is now being grown on land which until recently produced only barley. This programme, which is being carried out at State expense, calls for the consolidation of land holdings with the consent of the owners and the establishment of farmers' associations to work the land under a co-operative system.

25. Attention has also been given to housing construction. A development consisting of 464 houses was recently completed at a total cost of 160 million pesetas.

The Territory contributed 13.5 million pesetas to cover the cost of roads linking the development to the urban centre, the purchase of lots and the provision of electric power and drinking water. Another development is under construction at Id U Faqueh; twelve houses and the mosque have already been completed.

Communications

26. Air transport between the Territory and other countries is provided by Iberia Air Lines and maritime transport is provided under an agreement with a shipping company. The road network affords access to all rural localities.

2. Spanish Sahara

27. The Spanish Sahara has a population of 25,000, consisting for the most part of nomadic herdsmen. The administering Power reports that the most significant effort made in the Territory has been "the gradual stabilization and settlement of the population and the establishment of the basic prerequisites for a census and for the development of the first organs of administration and government on these initial foundations".

Political and social conditions

28. The Governor-General, who has a civilian status, is the highest administrative authority and the departments of education, health, public works, architecture, telecommunications, mining, finance and labour are the executive organs.

29. Organs of local administration are the cabildo (territorial council), currently headed by Seila Uld Abeida Uld Sid Ahmed, the municipal councils of El Aaiún and Villa Cisneros where the mayor is Suilem Uld Abdelahé Uld Ahmed Brahim, and smaller local units at Smara and Güera. There are also "nomadic sections", which are of a special nature in that they embrace those Saharans who, because they are herdsmen, cannot participate in the municipal organs.

30. The members of these bodies are selected either directly by the population or through the corporations, industry, commerce and the professions. The Christian community is represented in all of them with the exception of the nomadic sections, but proportionately much less than the Moslem community because it accounts for a considerably smaller percentage of the population. Matters arising among Moslems are settled quite independently by Sharia justice whose written and customary laws are applied in full.

31. There is religious freedom. Mosques have been built at the expense of the Spanish State, which also pays the salaries of the fakirs and professors of the Koran. Each year, the Administration sponsors the Saharan Moslems' pilgrimage to Mecca.

32. In the social field, mention should be made of the child-care dispensaries and kindergartens which have been established; according to the information received, the high infant mortality, which was impeding the growth of the nomadic population, has virtually disappeared. Primary education is provided as part of the State educational system, which extends throughout the desert. There are also secondary educational establishments, and higher education is provided by means of scholarships. The social security system in force in Spain is applied in the Sahara; it guarantees a minimum wage, unemployment benefits, health care and old-age and disability pensions. These benefits are provided on an equal basis for Christians and Moslems.

33. Nomadism is giving way to a settled mode of life, as the development of the Territory creates urban centres and, with them, employment opportunities. The Territory now has towns, such as El Aaiún and Villa Cisneros, in which 1,447 modern dwellings have been built recently. Urban centres have been appearing in the desert; there are some larger ones, such as Smara, Auserd, in the middle of the desert, and Güera, the port in the southern region, and other smaller centres. All have electric light, water, schools, dispensaries, etc.

34. An Advisory Council was recently established whose aim was to implement a plan for the development of the Territory. It is composed of representatives of the authorities, the technical departments of the Administration and the nomadic population. The latter is represented by its traditional chiefs.

Public health and welfare

35. There are maternity clinics, headed by qualified specialists, in the hospitals at El Aaiún and Villa Cisneros. In the inland villages, these services are provided by general practitioners, and patients can be evacuated in Health Department ambulances or in aircraft if specialized treatment is required.

36. These two towns also have child-care dispensaries which are under the direction of child-care specialists. In addition, children from the inland villages who cannot be treated with normal resources and skills are referred to these centres. For this purpose, examinations are conducted regularly in all schools.

37. For adult patients, there is a general hospital in El Aaiún which provides the normal hospital services (radiology, clinical analysis, surgery, internal medicine, dentistry, otorhinolaryngology, ophthalmology, etc.). There is a district hospital at Villa Cisneros, which provides the same services but has fewer beds.

38. In the villages of Smara, Auserd and Güera, health services are provided at nursing dispensaries under the direction of qualified doctors. These dispensaries have twenty beds each and serve as the first reference echelon for the rural dispensaries. The smaller villages have mobile dispensaries which are also staffed by doctors.

39. The Health Department of the Territory has a fleet of ambulances, and, for very urgent cases, aircraft which transport patients to the first echelon (the nursing dispensaries at Smara, Auserd and Güera) and the second (the hospitals at El Aaiún and Villa Cisneros).

40. Spanish Sahara has the following medical centres: one provincial hospital at El Aaiún (150 beds), one district hospital at Villa Cisneros (50 beds) and one hospital at Güera; 2 child-care dispensaries (at El Aaiún and Villa Cisneros); 2 mobile dispensaries; 2 maternity clinics; and a nursing dispensary at Smara and one at Auserd, each with 20 beds. In addition there is a dispensary in each of the villages of Hausa, Echdeiria, Mahbes, Hagunia, Bojador, Guelta Zemmur, Bu Craa, Tichla and Bir N'Zarán and a health post in each of the villages of Edchera, El Farsia, Agracha and Aguenit.

41. The Head of the Health Department is a doctor as are the directors of the hospitals at El Aaiún and Villa Cisneros. The centres are staffed by the following personnel: 10 specialists for the hospital; 2 pharmacists for the hospitals; 15 doctors for the urban and rural mobile dispensaries; 40 auxiliary health technicians from the National Health Corps; 50 qualified health workers; 20 nursing sisters; and subordinate and cleaning staff.

42. As regards public welfare, unemployment benefits are paid to all Saharans who have no paid employment (at present, there are not more than 200 unemployed). Elderly persons, invalids and destitute children receive a monthly food ration which provides them with a minimum diet. Planning and financial arrangements have been made for the establishment of homes for these needy persons, who will receive complete care on a residential basis.

Education

43. Children aged two to six are admitted to the children's homes (hogares de la infancia) at El Aaiún and Villa Cisneros, on a semi-residential basis. The children are fed and clothed. In 1965 there were 300 pupils and ten teachers.

44. Primary education is given in school groups and multi-grade schools. These schools are constructed in localities where there are at least thirty pupils. So that no Saharan child will be denied an opportunity to obtain an education, portable schools have been introduced, which follow the groups of nomads in their search for pastures for their livestock. All the pupils are clothed, shod and fed at school wardrobes and dining-rooms. In 1965, there were ten school groups, twelve multi-grade schools and six mobile schools. There were fifty-seven national teachers, twenty-nine teachers of Hassania and the Koran. The total enrolment in primary schools was 2,200.

45. Secondary education is provided at the Institutes of Secondary Education at El Aaiún and Villa Cisneros, which are State-run centres. There are thirty-two teachers at these institutes and 466 pupils. For higher education, pupils are given scholarships, with no limitation on the number awarded.

46. Saharan students who are not qualified for other types of instruction are given vocational training. Until now, this training has been provided either in the Territory itself, through courses for health workers, driver-mechanics and construction workers, or at special vocational training schools in Spain, which give intensive training to sixty pupils a year. Because of this activity, it was thought advisable to establish vocational schools in the Territory itself, and plans have been drawn up and funds provided for centres at El Aaiún and Villa Cisneros.

Public works

Urban development

47. The towns of El Aaiún and Villa Cisneros and the villages of Smara and Güera have asphalt roads, water mains and sewer systems. The other villages also have water supply systems and small electric power stations.

Roads

48. Primary roads exist between El Aaiún and Playa (25 km.), Villa Cisneros and Aargub (20 km.), Güera and the Mauritanian frontier (4 km.). There are tertiary roads from El Aaiún to Daora (45 km.), El Aaiún to Edchera (30 km.), El Aaiún to Smara (180 km.), Smara to Hausa (20 km.), Hausa to Edchera (10 km.), El Aaiún to Cabo Bojador (80 km.) and along the detour to Guelta Zemmur (26 km.). These roads enable traffic to cross the desert and reach all important centres. They are four metres wide and asphalted.

Ports

49. The port of Villa Cisneros is equipped with all services for maritime traffic; other facilities include wharves at El Aaiún and Güera and a wharf for unloading minerals.

Airports

50. The Territory's facilities include an airport at El Aaiún with asphalt runways which can be used by Caravelle jets, a similar airport at Villa Cisneros and several landing fields.

Economy

51. The Territory's budgetary deficit, representing 80 per cent of total expenditure, is met by the Spanish State. What little revenue there is comes mainly from civil servants. The indigenous inhabitants pay no taxes.

52. The report transmitted by the administering Power states that the desert character of the Territory is the reason for its poverty. The sparse population provides little opportunity for trade; the lack of raw materials accounts for the absence of industry; the soil, for the most part rocky and sandy, is not suitable for agriculture or for cattle-raising, and in addition, the climate is harsh and water scarce; there are indications that the sub-soil contains minerals, but it is doubtful that they can be profitably exploited since the deposits are at such a great distance from possible embarkation points; finally, the coastline is very steep and has not natural harbours suitable for the construction of ports, so that possibilities for trade and the establishment of fishing fleets are extremely limited.

53. Nevertheless, efforts are being made to exploit all available resources with a view to developing the Sahara. A brief outline of these efforts is set out below.

Agriculture

54. In the last few years, farming trials have been conducted in the areas where the existence of both topsoil and water gives some hope for agricultural viability. There is an experimental centre at Villa Cisneros, which supplies excellent green vegetables of all kinds for local consumption. However, the large-scale work is being done in the Aargub District, where 150 hectares are currently being prepared for farming trials, particularly the cultivation of cereals, forage crops and vegetables. This was made possible by the discovery of a large sheet of underground water, which rises under its own pressure from a depth of 450 metres. If, as is hoped, the experiment is successful, as much as 5,000 hectares can be farmed in the southern region of the Territory alone. According to the information received, it is not claimed that agriculture will save the economy, but it will help to meet local needs and, above all, produce forage which can be used to feed livestock in periods of prolonged drought when natural forage dries up. In addition, market gardens are being planted in the Northern District in places which have water; they are expected to help hundreds of families, who will consume part of the produce and sell the surplus in the urban centres. This work is being done by the Government at its own expense; once the market gardens are ready, they will be turned over to the Saharan families, who will cultivate them with technical assistance from the Department of Agriculture.

Cattle-raising

55. This is dependent upon agriculture, and the administering Power reports that no attempt is being made to turn the desert into a cattle-raising centre. Unfavourable geographical conditions preclude the adaptation of species of the right number and quality for export. The aim is rather to keep the camel herds in good condition and also the sheep and goat herds, which adapt so well to this terrain. An attempt will also be made to introduce zebus, whose meat is prized more highly than that of the camel. In this way, and through the agricultural development described above, the nomadic population is being ensured a livelihood at low cost.

Industry

56. The almost complete absence of industry is explained by the fact that until now there have been no raw materials to be processed. However, an attempt is being made to develop this branch of the economy by taking advantage of the opportunities afforded by fishing. Since the port of Villa Cisneros has been completed and there is an abundant supply of drinking water in the area, it is hoped that fishing industries will be established. Two factories producing by-products are already in operation at Güera, and it is planned to install industrial freezers at Villa Cisneros so that the large catch can be frozen and then exported to consumer markets.

Trade

57. Small-scale trade is the only kind to be found in the Territory.

Transport

58. The population centres of the Territory are linked by roads or tracks that are easily accessible to vehicles, which have replaced camels as a means of transport. These routes, which are described in paragraph 45 above, are sometimes asphalt roads, like the El Aaiún-Smara road, which is 180 kilometres long. Others, however, are tracks running over the land itself, which is good enough for normal vehicular traffic; actual roads are built only in stretches of rocky or sandy soil where normal traffic would be difficult.

59. For maritime traffic there are regular lines stopping at El Aaiún, Villa Cisneros and Güera. In addition, specially chartered vessels provide irregular service in bringing supplies into the Territory.

60. Air travel, which is the most frequent form of travel between the Territory and Spain—either directly or via the Canary Islands—is provided by two airline companies which have three flights a day between them, both to the Canary Islands and to Spain. In addition, there are several flights a day by another company during the tourist season in the Canary Islands.

Telecommunications

61. The telecommunication services functioning in the Sahara are:

(a) A radio network which enables El Aaiún, Villa Cisneros and the most important inland villages to communicate with the rest of the world and provides services for radiograms, long-distance calls and the transfer of money;

(b) A 5-kilowatt radio transmitter which gives clear reception throughout the Territory, in the Canary Islands, in southern Morocco and at the Mauritanian border;

(c) A television relay station which transmits programmes from the Canary Islands.

C. CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Introduction

62. The Special Committee considered the questions of Ifni and Spanish Sahara at its 435th and 436th meetings held in Addis Ababa on 7 June 1966.

63. By letters dated 31 May, 4 June and 5 June 1966 (A/AC.109/174, A/AC.109/175 and A/AC.109/176) the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Mauritania, the Permanent Representative of Morocco and the Ambassador of Spain in Ethiopia asked that delegations of their respective Governments be permitted to participate in the discussions of the Special Committee on the questions of Ifni and Spanish Sahara.

64. At the 435th meeting, the Special Committee decided without objection to accede to these requests.

65. By a letter dated 7 June 1966 (A/AC.109/176/Add.1), the Ambassador of Spain in Ethiopia stated that his delegation would not participate in the discussion of the question of Ifni and Spanish Sahara.

General statements

66. The representative of Morocco, speaking at the Chairman's invitation, said that ever since the Kingdom of Morocco had won back its freedom and independence and had become a Member of the United Nations, the constant concern of His Majesty the King had always been to regain the Moroccan Territories which remained under colonial domination and had been separated from the country under an arbitrary and annexionist policy carried out at its expense by the Powers which had placed it under the jurisdiction of their respective protectorates. That situation, which was a legacy of colonialism and was completely unjust and contrary to the international agreements and treaties guaranteeing the Kingdom of Morocco's territorial integrity, had inevitably given rise to growing and persistent opposition from the whole Moroccan people, including those living in the regions separated from Morocco.

67. The Moroccan Government firmly believed in negotiated and peaceful solutions and based its policy on the threefold principle of law, justice and respect for commitments. Thus, in the very first days of its independence it had initiated diplomatic action to open negotiations for the return of those Territories to the mother country, Morocco. That had led to the belief that the colonial chapter of Morocco's history had finally been ended and that Morocco and its former colonizer had embarked on the path of fruitful co-operation—fruitful because it was based on sincere friendship and mutual respect. Over the last ten years, the Moroccan Government, through its representatives in the competent bodies of the General Assembly, had consistently and regularly placed on record its legitimate claims to the Territories which had been taken from it. Thus, the Moroccan representatives in the Fourth Committee, the General Assembly and later, since its establishment, the Special Committee had always stated in one form or another their most express reservations and had recalled Morocco's inalienable right of sovereignty over those Territories.

68. On 16 October 1964, the Special Committee had adopted a resolution on so-called Spanish Sahara and Ifni, urgently requesting the administering Power to take the necessary steps to free those Territories from colonial domination. That unanimous decision had been the start of positive action which, the Committee's members had felt, should logically lead those Moroccan Territories to full emancipation—in other words, to their freedom from colonial domination in accordance with the provisions of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

69. Unfortunately, the General Assembly's Committees had been unable to function at its nineteenth session, and it had therefore been impossible for the Assembly to proceed to a consideration of the Special Committee's report in 1964. Only at the end of 1965, at the twentieth session, had that report been adopted by the General Assembly. At that same session, General Assembly resolution 2072 (XX) had been adopted unanimously except for two votes, those of Spain and Portugal. In operative paragraph 2 of that resolution, the General Assembly urgently requested the Government of Spain, as the administering Power, "to take immediately all necessary measures for the liberation of the Territories of Ifni and Spanish Sahara from colonial domination and, to this end, to enter into negotiations on the problems relating to sovereignty presented by those two Territories".

70. Although Morocco had not been a co-sponsor of that resolution, it had supported it in its entirety and voted for it. During the drafting stage of the resolution, the Moroccan delegation had been consistently guided by a spirit of conciliation and compromise. Moreover, its wish had been to rely on the wisdom and perception of the Fourth Committee's members. For that reason, although the problem was a fundamental one of very direct interest to it, it had accepted certain amendments which had not exactly reflected its position.

71. In so doing, the constant concern of the Moroccan Government had been precisely to work, as it had always done, in the most vigorous way to ensure that colonialism in all its forms of domination and exploitation should finally disappear from Africa, Asia and Latin America, and give way at last to a new order in which all people would be able to live in genuine freedom and dignity and freely enjoy their national heritage, both cultural and material. Expressed in that great African capital, those ideas were bound to find a deeper response than anywhere else. That was all the more true as the peoples of the eastern part of the African continent, like the Moroccan people, had also suffered the violation of their national independence and territorial integrity through colonial aggression.

72. The principal basis upon which the Special Committee was considering, at its present session, the problem of the future and liberation of Ifni and so-called Spanish Sahara was resolution 2072 (XX) relating to those Territories. That important resolution had been adopted by the General Assembly at its 1398th plenary meeting on 16 December 1965. More than five months had elapsed since that time, and so far the administering Power's reactions, as reflected both in its official statements and in the new measures adopted in the Territories, including demonstrations of force, indicated that the colonial policy with respect to those Territories had in no way been influenced by the spirit of that resolution. Quite the contrary, there had been an incomprehensible stiffening of the administering Power's attitude towards the local population. While the imposition of European colonization was becoming more and more marked, the civilian and military authorities were intensifying their policy of division and pressure on the indigenous population by using a wide variety of tactics. In addition, attempts, fraught with far-reaching consequences, were being made to exploit certain mineral deposits with the help of foreign capital. Those illegal activities showed how little store the administering Power set by the political and legal aspects of the problem. Moreover, a campaign of systematic virulence had been started by certain official press organs at Madrid, which had asserted with unusual vehemence that those Territories were and remained Spanish provinces, in the same way as León, Castile and Asturias.

73. Coming from a friendly country, such behaviour had rather surprised the Moroccan Government, which had always placed great hopes in the possibilities of broad co-operation between the two countries. But that co-operation must, of course, be based on the emergence of a new state of mind congenial to the requirements of decolonization in Africa and throughout the world. Therefore, the Moroccan Government, which had always attached particular importance to those requirements, with regard both to the territorial dispute pending with Spain and to the colonial problem as a whole, could not remain indifferent to the disturbing trend taken by Spain's colonial policy since the General Assembly vote on resolution 2072 (XX) the previous December. That was why the Moroccan Government, which was anxious to give greater weight to the means available to the Special Committee, had felt that the Moroccan Territories still under Spanish domination must, whatever the circumstances, be liberated. Since their liberation through negotiations based on the premise that they would be returned directly to the Kingdom of Morocco did not seem, for the time being, to meet with the agreement of the Madrid Government, the Moroccan Government proposed that they should as soon as possible be granted their independence.

74. But although the Moroccan Government, increasingly disturbed at the continuation, for an indeterminate period, of the aftermath of Spanish colonialism in that part of its national territory, had deemed it necessary to propose that methods in order to put an end to an anachronistic situation, the conclusion must not be drawn that Morocco was abandoning its rights of sovereignty. It was also important that that independence should not be a façade, aimed solely at deceiving international opinion and concealing a still more virulent and aggressive colonialism. It must be a genuine independence, enabling the people of those Territories to exercise all the responsibilities of power themselves, without any colonialist presence, pressure or interference of a military, political or economic nature. That solution had the merit both of being in harmony with the objectives of the Special Committee and of meeting the need to find a way out of the present impasse, which was of benefit only to colonialist and foreign interests. In taking that stand, his country intended to continue its peaceful efforts and to forestall the arguments being put forward by the administering Power in an attempt to evade its obligations to the international community and, in particular, to circumvent the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

75. The Moroccan Government was convinced that the liberation and independence of the Moroccan people of so-called Spanish Sahara, whose patriotism and national honour had withstood all trials, would enable them to choose the path most appropriate to their interests and hopes. Once they had become masters of their own fate, the inhabitants of those Territories would be able to carry out their duties as conscientious and dignified citizens in full freedom, and would, in the very nature of things, pursue a policy in accord with the national objectives of their people within the general framework of African unity. In the conviction that unity could be achieved only through liberation and independence, Morocco could not indefinitely tolerate a situation in which Moroccans were deprived of their freedom and were subjected to a colonial régime whose policy of domination and exploitation merely became increasingly harsh. On the other hand, it was to be hoped that Spain, the administering Power, which through the voice of its leaders and of its representatives in the United Nations had already given its support to the work of decolonization going on in various parts of the world, would find it possible to probe its conscience and take into account the inalienable rights of the people involved, namely, their right to freedom and to moral and material well-being.

76. He wished on that occasion to reaffirm, on behalf of the Moroccan Government, that the stand taken by Morocco must not in any way be understood to mean that it had abandoned, in any form, its rights to the Sahara at present under Spanish domination. Those sovereign rights remained indefeasible. That national sovereignty had been established from the very earliest times of Moroccan history and had only recently been interrupted by a de facto colonial occupation.

77. By proposing to the Special Committee that its Saharan Territories should be granted independence, the Moroccan Government wished again to facilitate the Special Committee's work and enable it to carry out its task of decolonization. It also wished to eliminate what had so far been taken as a pretext to perpetuate colonial domination in an area where it had already endured too long. He hoped that the members of the Special Committee would take cognizance of Morocco's efforts to make a positive contribution to their work in the search for a final solution to that grave problem. The Moroccan Government believed that its present position should enable the Committee to measure the extent of its own responsibilities, which it would unquestionably be able to assume to the fullest degree.

78. In conclusion, he expressed the hope that the Special Committee, in conformity with the noble task entrusted to it, would accede to the Moroccan request by adopting a resolution and taking appropriate steps for the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in that part of Moroccan national territory which was occupied by Spain, as the administering Power.

79. The representative of Mauritania, speaking at the Chairman's invitation, said that he would not at that stage of the debate discuss Ifni but intended to deal at some length with the question of Spanish Sahara.

80. He recalled that under the colonial régime, Mauritania had been occupied by France and Spain. The French part had regained its independence by virtue of the loi-cadre.

81. The Spanish part, known as "Spanish Sahara", was made up of Río de Oro and Saguia el Hamra. It covered an area of 280,000 square kilometres situated between 9° and 17° west longitude and between 21° and 27° north latitude, and thus formed the north-west region of independent Mauritania, which was itself situated between 5° and 17° west longitude and between 15° and 27° north latitude. Geographical limits were not, however, the only factors which confirmed that Spanish Sahara was an integral part of the Islamic Republic of Mauritania. In fact, the same tribes, the same Moslem religion, the same language and the same traditions were to be found on both sides of the frontier.

82. It had only been with the advent of colonization that the country had been divided along arbitrary and, moreover, very roughly defined frontiers.

83. In 1884, Spain, basing its action on the Berlin Act, according to which any "free" territory could be occupied, had notified the other Powers that it was establishing a protectorate over the western coast of Africa in the area situated between 20° and 27° north latitude. Not until the Conventions of 27 June 1900, 3 October 1904 and 27 November 1912 had the frontiers between the French and Spanish possessions been determined, and even then with somewhat less than strict exactitude.

84. The Rabat régime had tried to insinuate that Mauritanian claims to Spanish Sahara were merely a diplomatic manoeuvre to gain recognition of the Islamic Republic of Mauritania by the Kingdom of Morocco. In actual fact, since the dawn of its independence, the Islamic Republic of Mauritania, while opposing any bargaining over its sovereignty, had consistently pressed its point of view on the problem of Spanish Sahara. It had done so repeatedly through the most authoritative voice of all, that of its Head of State, and through its representatives at the United Nations in the Special Committee, the Fourth Committee and the General Assembly. In that connexion, the historical facts recalled by the Islamic Republic of Mauritania were irrefutable. Of particular significance was the Peace Treaty of 1767 between the Sovereign of Spain and the Sultan Moulay Mohammed of Morocco. Article 18 of that Treaty stated:

"His Imperial Majesty refrains from discussing the establishment which His Catholic Majesty wishes to found south of Rio Nun, since he cannot be responsible for the accidents and ills which might arise there, as his sovereignty does not extend as far as that place, and the vagrant and ferocious tribes inhabiting that country have always done harm to the inhabitants of the Canary Islands and reduced them to slavery."

85. That document of two centuries ago demonstrated well the worth of Moroccan assertions that Morocco's sovereignty over the territories forming Spanish Sahara had been exercised for more than a thousand years. If new facts had arisen since the Treaty, they had never had the significance attributed to them by Morocco. Those new facts were not further treaties but attempted incursions carried out with the aim of invading the Sahara, something which the local tribes had never accepted. In 1863, during his own father's lifetime, Prince Moulay Hassen had launched the first expedition, which had met failure at Agadir. In 1882, the same Moulay Hassen, by then crowned Sultan, had seized his only chance of reaching Cape Nun but had been unable to maintain his position there long enough to give the impression that the local tribes had been subdued. In 1883, in a final attempt, Moulay Hassen had tried in vain to go beyond the parallel of Agadir. Thus, the gates of the Sahara had never yielded to Moroccan invasions. On the other hand, the "Blue Sultan", as if in imitation of the glorious epoch of the Almoravides, had had little difficulty in occupying Marrakesh.

86. It had therefore only been through French intervention that the establishment of a new Mauritanian dynasty in the Maghreb had been prevented. Since that time it had been clear to what extent the term "protectorate" (the relations established between France and Morocco) had corresponded to a deep reality, in the sense that it had been a real protection of certain special Moroccan interests. It was therefore in full knowledge of the facts that the Moroccan leaders had, until recently, recognized that Spanish Sahara was an integral part of Mauritania. The Rabat régime, in an official document which had since become famous—the White Paper given widespread circulation in 1960 by His Sherifian Majesty's Ministry of Foreign Affairs—had stated in particular:

"Mauritania is a vast territory embracing the southern provinces of the Kingdom of Morocco, which lies between the regions of Tindouf and Seguia el-Hamra, the Algerian Sahara to the east, the Atlantic coast to the west and the Senegal River to the south.

"In order better to dissociate Mauritania from the rest of the Moroccan Kingdom, Spain recently substituted the expression 'Spanish Sahara' for that of 'Spanish Mauritania'.

"The capital strategic importance of Mauritania, due to its geographical location, has determined the extent of Franco-Spanish penetration since the beginning of the twentieth century."

87. The legend of the map attached to the White Paper read: "The problem of Mauritania—a simplified map showing the portion of Mauritanian territory under French domination and that under Spanish domination. Morocco includes all the territory between Tangier and Saint-Louis of Senegal."

88. The Government of His Sherifian Majesty had not countered those facts and documents, whose authenticity could easily be verified, with any convincing arguments. Having been left with no further ammunition, Morocco had had to boast of its friendship with Spain.

89. There again, it must be wondered whether the Rabat régime had not met with obstacles similar to those which had always prevented Sherifian sovereigns from occupying the Sahara. Indeed, on 16 December 1965, Mr. Manuel Aznar, the Spanish representative, had stated at the 1398th plenary meeting of the General Assembly that Ifni and the Sahara were two quite different geographical entities, that having been an unambiguous way of inviting the representative of Morocco to limit his Government's claims solely to the Territory of Ifni.

90. Despite that warning—which by its discretion has been a friendly one—the Moroccan representative had set out to show, through quotations and words taken from the statement of the Spanish representative before the Special Committee, that Madrid and Rabat had agreed to open negotiations on Spanish Sahara. The deputy representative of Spain, Mr. Jaime de Piniés, had given an unequivocal denial in reply by stating that one could not quote one part of one or several statements and omit another part, for they all constituted a harmonious whole; the part to which the representative of Morocco had referred and which he had described as an agreement reached in 1963 had not in fact been such.

91. Since, moreover, Morocco took such pride in its good relations with Spain, it should be reminded of what had been written in 1961 in the Madrid periodical ABC by Salvador López de la Torre, a specialist in Saharan questions:

"In fact, a change becomes progressively apparent from a point further north, the basin of the Sous River, in the region of Agadir. It is from there that one begins to find two ways of life superimposed: the semi-nomads become gradually less numerous and give way to the great nomads, independent and proud shepherds, with whom the Moroccan Kingdoms have never had friendly relations throughout the course of history. Different ways of life first appear in the Sous basin and then become considerably more marked as one travels south in the Assaka River basin. The final frontier is in the Draa River basin. Although desert people with ties of kinship to families in the foot-hills of the Anti-Atlas may still be found in the Draa region, it is impossible, south of the Draa River, to find any trace of a link between that region and the northern region."

92. The same journalist had added:

"We have no reason to contradict the good Sultan, Moulay Mohammed, who signed the Treaty of Peace and Commerce of 1767, during the reign of Charles III, when he made this confession, which may well be recalled now:

"His Islamic Majesty refrains from discussing the establishment which His Catholic Majesty wishes to found south of Rio Nun, since he cannot be responsible for the accidents and ills which might arise there, as his sovereignty does not extend as far as that place."

"His Islamic Majesty knew what he was talking about. South of Rio Nun, that is, the present Draa River, lay the region where anarchy reigned: Bled es Siba, as the Moroccans called it, simply because it was a region to which the Sultan's sovereignty, as he himself said, did not extend. It is there, in fact, that an entirely different world begins.

"That is why we believe that the Sultan's expeditions never went beyond the Sous River, which is the first frontier of the Sahara, and that only once, taking advantage of the flight of the local tribes, who had allowed the Royal Caravan to pass in order to avoid any fighting, did he briefly reach Rio Nun, today known as Rio Draa, and then only for a few hours.

"One need only determine from a map the distance separating Rio Nun or Draa from genuinely Saharan territory to realize the full justification for the view that Morocco is the 'Jazzirat al Maghrib', the island of the west, the island of the Maghreb, between two different kinds of sea. The history of the desert and what might be called its 'philosophy' can only be understood if the southern frontier of Morocco is regarded as a real shore-line, the border between two different worlds.

"The inevitable historical frictions between those two heterogeneous worlds have always proceeded in one direction. The confrontation of the Saharan people and the Moroccan people has consisted of invasion of the north by the south, without any counterpart in the form of a movement from the north to the south. In the conflict between these two adjacent but distinct worlds, there has always been but a single victor: the south, that is, the desert. The north, in other words, Morocco, has always been the loser. The epic story of the Almoravides, setting out from what is today Mauritanian territory, swept over Morocco and continued on to the Iberian peninsula.

"The first great victory of the Sahara against the Maghreb, moving from south to north, blazed the trail which was to become that of future wars in that part of Africa. The brief adventurous episode of Pasha Djuder against Tombouctou was to be the only exception in this one-way movement.

"Almost a thousand years after the Almoravid expedition, the "Blue Sultan" (a Mauritanian) invaded southern Morocco and occupied Marrakesh. It was a repetition, a thousand years later, of that movement of conquest which has been, as it were, a constant feature of the Sahara and fully explains the hostility of the nomads living in those territories towards the foreign threat represented by Morocco. As Montagne said: 'The Nun River, which we call the Draa, represents the line of demarcation between two different systems of social and political organization; it is the southern shore of the island of Maghreb'."

93. In the eyes of Mauritania, the Moroccan dreams represented nothing more than the vestiges of claims which President Moktar Ould Daddah had called as ridiculous as those which England might now make against France on the pretext that at the time of Joan of Arc, Paris and a large part of France had been occupied by the English.

94. The Islamic Republic of Mauritania, too, could invoke its friendship with Spain, but not in the Moroccan terms according to which good relations were a convincing argument, or at least a sufficient reason, for Madrid to cede its colonial possessions to Rabat. As the Mauritanian Government saw it, the friendship between Spain and Mauritania was based on mutual understanding and a common desire for honest co-operation. The Mauritanian Government had asked Spain to enter into a frank and sincere dialogue, in the spirit of the special ties uniting the two countries, in order to find a solution to the problem. It would never, however, ask Spain to cede Ifni, or even Tarfaya which Spain had nevertheless graciously ceded to Morocco. President Moktar Ould Daddah had made that point clear in his report of 28 November 1965 on the state of the nation:

"We know that, as part of this fruitful co-operation, it will be possible to find a satisfactory solution which will validate the integration of Spanish Sahara into our national territory and thus make possible the total reunification of our country. The progressive attitude of the Spanish Government towards the problems of decolonization gives good reason to have confidence in the future."

95. That confidence had become manifest two months previously, when the Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs had paid a visit to Mauritania from 7 to 9 March 1966. The joint communiqué issued at the end of that visit had stated:

"During these talks, the two delegations considered, in an atmosphere of complete cordiality and mutual understanding, all the political and economic problems affecting the two countries. The two delegations, greatly desiring to maintain and constantly improve the excellent relations between Spain and Mauritania, expressed their firm desire to strengthen and diversify their co-operation in every sphere.

"The two delegations reviewed the progress made in the direction of this co-operation and decided to take all steps necessary to ensure that jointly agreed plans would be carried out."

96. Encouraged by that manifestation of friendship and sincere desire to enter into a frank and honest dialogue, the Mauritanian Government had decided to inform the Spanish Government that it was prepared to engage in negotiations on the problem of Spanish Sahara, having due regard for General Assembly resolution 2072 (XX) of 16 December 1965.

97. That attitude of the Mauritanian Government must not, however, be interpreted either as a retreat or as a refusal to allow the peoples of the Sahara to become independent. There could be no question of allowing a single plot of African territory to remain under foreign domination. The day when the Special Committee went beyond the resolution adopted by the General Assembly, the Mauritanian Government would not have the slightest objection to the liberation of Spanish Sahara.

98. The representative of Morocco said that the statement which he had just heard certainly excused him from continuing the debate. He had fulfilled his task of making a positive statement on behalf of his Government. The Mauritanian spokesman had been at pains to affirm the rights of Spain over that part of Moroccan territory, rather than attempting to prevail upon the Special Committee to take a stand on decolonization. His statement had consisted mainly of press extracts, including an article by a Spanish journalist described as "a specialist in Saharan questions". The point of view advanced by the spokesman of Mauritania was not an African point of view. That spokesman had become the champion of a purely colonialist argument, the defence of which by an African was for the Moroccan delegation a matter for regret.

99. The representative of Mauritania said that there was no question of the Mauritanian Government coming to the defence of colonialism, especially in Río de Oro or Spanish Sahara. As to the matter of quoting an extract from an article by a Spanish journalist, there was in the circumstances nothing out of the ordinary in making use of quotations. He fully agreed with the Moroccan representative regarding Spanish Sahara's right to freedom. That Territory should be completely independent of Spain, but also, of course, of Morocco.

100. The representative of Tunisia said that the Tunisian Government would examine the statements by the representatives of Morocco and Mauritania with the greatest interest and would use all the means at its disposal to satisfy their legitimate and justified claims. He was convinced that the Special Committee would give due weight to those two statements when the time came for it to seek the ways and means that might lead to a peaceful solution of the thorny problem under consideration.

101. The Tunisian delegation had spoken on all the items on the Special Committee's agenda. It would be failing in its duty if it did not state its position on Ifni and so-called Spanish Sahara, especially since they were neighbouring Territories to whose liberation the Tunisian Government attached the highest importance. The status of those two Territories was certainly difficult to settle because certain Member States disputed their right to sovereignty. But in that respect, too, the attitude of the Tunisian Government had always been clear and precise because it was dictated by reason and justice.

102. The Tunisian delegation believed that in order to settle disputes of that kind fairly, prime consideration must be given to historical and geographical factors. For example, in the cases of Gibraltar and the Falkland Islands (Malvinas), his delegation had always opposed the unjustified claims of the United Kingdom and favoured the restitution of the two Territories to Spain and Argentina, respectively, since it seemed unreasonable that a foreign Power should be able to retain a Territory which historically and geographically belonged to another country. That was a question of justice and security.

103. In the case of Ifni and so-called Spanish Sahara, the Tunisian delegation had a right to expect a similar attitude from Spain, particularly as friendly relations of very long-standing had created a bond between Spain and North Africa. Moreover, the people of those countries, who had many points in common, were bound by economic and cultural ties which were becoming still closer.

104. It was unfortunately apparent that the administering Power was thus far continuing to claim sovereignty over those Territories. The Tunisian delegation refused to accept those claims because it could no longer condone domination by foreign Powers, whoever they might be, on the African continent. It was, moreover, merely agreeing with the opinion expressed the previous day by the Administrative Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity, who had said that the African peoples would not be fully satisfied until the last square inch of African soil had been withdrawn from non-African authority.

105. With that principle established, and in view of the high esteem in which Spain was held by the Arab and African countries, the Tunisian delegation appealed to the administering Power voluntarily to renounce the sovereignty which it exercised over those Territories as soon as possible instead of stiffening its position by dividing and oppressing the indigenous inhabitants. It should also declare its willingness to enter into negotiations for the prompt transfer of powers to the indigenous inhabitants of those Territories. In doing so, it would merely be complying with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 2072 (XX), which had been adopted unanimously except for two votes—those of Spain and Portugal. By acting in that way, Spain could not but rise in the estimation of the African and Arab countries, which would not fail to accord it more lasting and appreciable benefits.

106. His delegation would certainly make its contribution to the Special Committee's work when the time came to consider ways and means which might lead to a peaceful solution of the problem. It would, in addition, support any action conforming to the principles which he had set out in his statement.

107. The representative of Chile said that the statements made by the representatives of Mauritania and Morocco would be taken into account by the Special Committee in its consideration of the question of Ifni and Spanish Sahara. However, its task was complicated by the claims of two sister African States to sovereignty in respect of those Territories. He therefore appealed to Spain to assist the Committee in its task of eradicating colonialism by complying with the terms of operative paragraph 2 of General Assembly resolution 2072 (XX).

108. The representative of Iraq supported the Tunisian representative's appeal to Spain to implement the terms of General Assembly resolution 2072 (XX). The views expressed by the Tunisian representative would undoubtedly be shared by many other members of the Special Committee.

109. The representative of Mali said that his delegation would study the statements of the representatives of Morocco and Mauritania with all the attention which they merited. He associated himself with the position of the Tunisian representative and drew the Committee's attention to operative paragraph 3 of General Assembly resolution 2072 (XX) of 16 December 1965, in which the Special Committee was requested "to report on the implementation of the present resolution to the General Assembly at its twenty-first session". He also asked the Spanish delegation, if present, to inform the Special Committee of its views on the status of Ifni and Spanish Sahara, having due regard for the resolution adopted in that matter by the Fourth Committee.

110. The representative of Venezuela said that his delegation was convinced of Spain's readiness to decolonize the remaining Territories under its control and to comply with the terms of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), as repeatedly stated by its representatives both before the Special Committee and before the General Assembly. However, in the specific case of Ifni and the Spanish Sahara, the problem was complicated by the fact that claims to sovereignty over those Territories had been advanced by two or more countries and that, to date, neither the Committee nor the General Assembly had indicated with which Power Spain should negotiate. It was therefore the opinion of the Venezuelan delegation that the Committee should postpone further action on the matter until, in accordance with the terms of resolution 2072 (XX), Spain had reported to the twenty-first session of the General Assembly.

111. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said he was convinced that the points of view expressed by the representatives of Morocco and Mauritania would be taken into consideration by all members of the Special Committee. The Soviet delegation attached the greatest importance to them. It believed that in considering the question of Ifni and Spanish Sahara, the Committee should bear in mind the very moving address given by Mr. Diallo Telli, the Administrative Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity, who had said that "OAU was as concerned about the fate of those small Territories as it was about the fate of the big colonies, for a question of principle was involved. The decolonization to which OAU aspired and for which it was working should cover all the African territories, large or small, rich or poor. The African peoples would not be fully satisfied on that score until the last square inch of African soil had been withdrawn from non-African authority".

112. Five years had elapsed since the adoption of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. His delegation held it to be a matter of principle, firstly, that that Declaration applied to the two Territories under consideration and, secondly, that Spain must immediately leave those Territories in order to free them from its rule. The General Assembly had most recently considered that question at its twentieth session and had at that time requested the Government of Spain to take immediately all necessary measures for the liberation of Ifni and Spanish Sahara. Unfortunately, it was only too apparent that Spain was ignoring that stand. It was engaging in diplomatic manoeuvres intended to show that it was changing its policy and paving the way for the independence of the Territories under its administration, but that was purely a diplomatic diversion. In fact, Spain was using those Territories as trump cards and as a means of exerting pressure in order to gain time and continue to exercise its domination over land which was not its own. It was in the same spirit that it was attracting foreign capital to the Territories. It was well known that half the arable land had been leased to foreign monopolies. The only conclusion to be drawn was that Spain was continuing to sell things which did not belong to it. The Soviet delegation therefore called for the immediate implementation of the provisions of General Assembly resolution 2072 (XX) of 16 December 1965.

113. The representative of Syria said that his delegation regretted that the administering Power had gone back on its original intention to accelerate the process towards self-determination and independence of Ifni and the Spanish Sahara. In view of the terms of General Assembly resolution 2072 (XX), the Special Committee was fully justified in asking what measures had been taken by Spain for the liberation of those Territories. Furthermore, it should be possible to reach a solution regarding the conflicting claims advanced in that respect by initiating negotiations on the questions of sovereignty, as required under operative paragraph 2 of the resolution. It was to be hoped that Mauritania and Morocco would soon compose their differences so that the cause of emancipation from foreign rule would prevail and that Spain would embark upon a policy of decolonization.

114. The representative of Ethiopia considered that, before the Special Committee reached any decision on Ifni and the Spanish Sahara, a thorough study should be made on the question, at which time his delegation would make its views known. He suggested that the Secretariat should prepare a detailed working paper on the matter, taking into account the statements made by the representatives of Mauritania and Morocco.

115. The representative of Iran supported those speakers who had appealed to the Spanish Government to implement the terms of General Assembly resolution 2072 (XX) and reiterated his delegation's firm conviction that colonial issues involving sovereign rights should be settled through negotiation in accordance with United Nations practice.

D. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Consensus adopted by the Special Committee

116. At its 436th meeting held on 7 June 1966, the Special Committee decided, on the proposal of the Chairman, to adopt the following consensus on the question of Ifni and Spanish Sahara:

"The Special Committee requests the Secretary-General to convey the views expressed at the present meeting concerning Ifni and Spanish Sahara to the Government of Spain and to obtain from that Government as soon as possible information concerning the measures taken by it in implementation of operative paragraph 2 of General Assembly resolution 2072 (XX) of 16 December 1965. Having regard to paragraph 3 of the same resolution, the Special Committee will resume its consideration of these Territories on receipt of the information requested."

E. FURTHER CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE⁵

Introduction

117. The Special Committee further considered Ifni and the Spanish Sahara at its 472nd, 474th, 478th, 479th and 481st meetings, held at Headquarters between 12 October and 17 November 1966. The Committee had before it a letter dated 8 September 1966 (A/AC.109/202) from the Permanent Representative of Spain in which, following the adoption by the Special Committee at its 436th meeting of the consensus concerning Ifni and the Spanish Sahara, the Government of Spain informed the Special Committee of its attitude and intentions regarding the implementation of General Assembly resolution 2072 (XX) of 16 December 1965. This letter is annexed to the present chapter.

118. In a letter dated 22 September 1966 (A/AC.109/207) and two letters dated 10 October 1966 (A/AC.109/208, A/AC.109/209), the Permanent Representatives of Mauritania, Morocco and Spain requested that delegations of their respective Governments be permitted to participate in the discussion of this item. At its 472nd meeting, the Special Committee decided without objection to accede to these requests.

119. In a letter dated 4 November 1966 (A/AC.109/211), the Permanent Representative of Algeria requested permission to participate in the proceedings of the Special Committee during its consideration of Ifni and the Spanish Sahara. At its 474th meeting, the Special Committee decided without objection to grant this request.

⁵ See also chapter II (paras. 595-619) for an account of the discussions on the resolution adopted by the Special Committee at its 455th meeting on 22 June 1966 concerning the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) with regard to Territories considered by the Committee during its meetings in Africa.

Written petitions and hearings

120. The Special Committee circulated the following written petitions concerning Ifni and Spanish Sahara:

Petitioner	Document No.
Ifni
Messrs. Mohammed Bey, Lahoussine Bey and Youssef	A/AC.109/PET.532
Spanish Sahara
Mr. El Abadila Ould Sheikh Mohamed Laghdaf and others	A/AC.109/PET.562
Messrs. Ould Sheikh Malainine and Mohamed Ould Haidala	A/AC.109/PET.563
Mr. Seila Uld Abeida and five others on behalf of "La Comisión elegida por el pueblo del Sáhara"	A/AC.109/PET.572

121. The three petitions concerning Spanish Sahara contained requests for hearings which were granted by the Special Committee.

122. At its 478th and 479th meetings, the Special Committee heard statements by Messrs. El Abadila Ould Sheikh Mohamed Laghdaf, Braika Ould Ahmed Lahcen and Hamdi Ould Salek Ould Ba Ali. The petitioners were accompanied by Messrs. Brahim Ould Hassena Douihi, Abdallah Ould El Khattat and Habouha Ould Abeida.

123. At the 479th meeting, the Chairman stated that Messrs. Sidi Mohamed Ould Haidala, Dahi Ould Nagem, Slama Ould Sidi Ould Oumar and Sheikh Ould Mouhamed Saleh, whose request for a hearing had been granted, had informed him that because of language difficulties they would not make a statement but would present their petition in writing. The Special Committee decided to incorporate the statement submitted by the petitioners in the records of the Committee.

124. At the 479th meeting, the Chairman informed the Special Committee that Mr. Ould Sheikh Malainine, who had originally requested a hearing with the preceding group, had requested to be heard separately. The Committee agreed to this request and Mr. Malainine made a statement at that meeting.

125. Mr. El Abadila Ould Sheikh Mohamed Laghdaf stated that the Saharan people confidently awaited a decision of the United Nations to free them from oppression.

126. Río de Oro and Seguí el Hamra were situated in north-west Africa and covered approximately 280,000 square kilometres. The coastline of the region lay between 27° 40' N. 20° 47' N. Those imaginary and superficial frontiers had been created by colonialism in order to dismember the African continent and divide its peoples.

127. The population of the region was over 250,000, notwithstanding the colonial Power's statement that it did not exceed 25,000. The colonial Power was trying to minimize the importance of the region so that the United Nations would take no interest in it. The chief towns of the Sahara were El Aaiún, Smara, Güera and Addakhla, which had later been named Villa Cisneros. The inhabitants belonged to the following tribes: R'zueibat, Isarguén, Ulad Delim, Ulad Tidrarin, Ait Lahsen, Filala, Ahl Cheikh aa El Ainaine and El Arosien. They were tribes of Arab origin, whose religion was Islam and whose language was Arabic. From time immemorial they had all been part of the Moroccan nation. Furthermore, the dynasty of the Almoravides, which had ruled in Morocco for two centuries and constituted a great empire, had been founded by the Lemtouna tribe, which came from the Sahara. The Territory had depended on Morocco during the reign of the Sa'adians and the Alaouits. The Governors of the Sahara had been appointed directly by the Sultans from the time of Mulay Ismail and Mulay Mohamed Ben Abdallah in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries until the reign of Sultan Mulay Hafid, when Morocco had been reduced to a Protectorate.

128. Originally the idea of conquering the Sahara had been advocated by private Spanish companies such as the Sociedad de Pesquerías Canario-Africanas and the Sociedad de Africanistas y Colonistas. On 15 October 1884 the ships of those companies had arrived at Río de Oro and at Cabo Blanco and, under the leadership of Emilio Bonelli, the Spaniards had built wooden huts and hoisted the Spanish flag. On 3 November 1884 they had carried out the same operation in Addakhla, which since then had been called Villa Cisneros. The Spanish Government had notified the European Powers that Spain was placing the whole north-west African coastline between Cabo Bojador and Cabo Blanco under its protectorate. In that way Spain had endeavoured to make its occupation appear legal. That act had aroused French opposition and after negotiations the two Powers had signed the treaty of Muni on 27 June 1900.

129. The State and people of Morocco had reacted more energetically. The Ouled Dlim tribe had attacked the Spanish installations and driven out the invaders. Popular resistance had prevented the Spaniards from extending their occupation beyond the ports of Villa Cisneros and Cabo Blanco, set up by Mr. Bonelli. Spain had been unable to complete the occupation of Río de Oro and of Saguia el Hamra until 1934, in which year France had occupied the Anti-Atlas and the Sous region.

130. With regard to the region of Seguí el Hamra, France in a secret agreement signed on 8 October 1904 had recognized Spain's full freedom of action in the area between 26° N. and 27° 40' N. Before 1934, however, Spanish occupation had been confined to the town of Tarfaya, to the centre of Villa Cisneros and, from 1920, to the centre of Güera. After completing its occupation of the Sahara, Spain had set up military bases in El Aaiún and had fortified the existing bases in Villa Cisneros and Güera.

131. Spain had first divided the Sahara into three regions, whose names had changed according to the circumstances. The change of name had been intended to deprive the regions of their Moroccan character so that, when Morocco had become independent, it would not be able to claim them, and Spain would thus be able to perpetuate its domination. The Tarfaya region had been named the Southern Zone of the Spanish Protectorate, the Seguí el Hamra region had been named the Zone of Free Occupation and the Río de Oro region had been named the Southern Sahara. Subsequently, after all outward signs of the Moroccan character of the regions had been removed, Spain had again changed their names and Tarfaya had been named the Northern Sahara Zone, Seguí el Hamra the Central Sahara Zone and Río de Oro the Southern Sahara Zone.

132. Spain had believed it could keep the authentic Tarfaya area under its rule and for that reason had not transferred it to Morocco after that country had become independent, as it had done with the zone it occupied in the north of Morocco. Spain's intention had been to incorporate the Tarfaya area in what it had later called, and was still calling, its overseas provinces. Nevertheless, the inhabitants had obliged Spain to recognize protectorate status for that area, which obviously went beyond the Wad Draa. Spain had returned only part of Tarfaya to Morocco and had arbitrarily fixed 27° 40' N. as the southern border of its protectorate in Southern Morocco.

133. There was no logical justification for that artificial division of Tarfaya since there was no frontier between Tarfaya and Saguia el Hamra. Geographers recognized Saguia el Hamra as one of the most important areas of the Moroccan southern Sahara. The same nomadic tribes roamed Saguia el Hamra and Tarfaya. Moreover, the representative of the Grand Vizir for the Spanish protectorate in south Morocco, Sheikh Mohamed Laghdaf, had not only been appointed by the Caliph of the Sultan in Tetuán, but had been a native of Spanish Sahara and had lived in what was now Saguia el Hamra. His father, Sheikh Ma Al Aymin, had built the city of Smara, eight kilometres south of the Seguia el Hamra River in 1898. He had been the Caliph of the Sultan in Spanish Sahara and had been appointed by a royal decree, which at the time had been called a "dahir" of the Cherif. Other "dahirs" stipulated that the authority of the Caliph extended from Tarfaya to Cabo Bojador and Cabo Blanco.

134. Those were incontestable historical, geographic and social facts. There was no dividing line between southern Morocco and Tarfaya, Seguia el Hamra and Río de Oro so far as population, topography, history, religion and customs were concerned. The people of Spanish Sahara were valiant people with an illustrious past, a culture and a civilization.

135. That did not mean that the petitioners were demanding that Spanish Sahara should become part of Morocco, for the people alone should determine the future they wanted. The situation in Spanish Sahara was serious, indeed explosive, and a solution was urgent. There was no difference between Spanish colonialism in the Sahara and Portuguese colonialism in Angola or so-called Portuguese Guinea. Both sought to foist the European element on the indigenous population for purposes of exploiting the latter. Since the end of the Spanish Civil War, Spain had been trying to make Spanish Sahara part of its own territory and had repeatedly reorganized its administrative system. Thus, in 1940, the Political Military Government of Ifni and Spanish Sahara had been established, and the Spanish High Commissioner in northern Morocco had been appointed Governor-General for those Territories. That action demonstrated, moreover, that the political, social and geographical conditions in Spanish Sahara were identical with those in the rest of Morocco. In June 1958, namely, after Morocco had become independent, Spain had again changed the status of the Territories, which had become two Spanish provinces, designated as Ifni and Spanish Sahara. Subsequently, in April 1961, it had been decided that all Spanish laws would apply in the province of Spanish Sahara and that imports from Spain would be free of duty. Thus, Spain had completed the process of assimilating Spanish Sahara both legally and administratively.

136. Spain had endeavoured to assimilate the Territory politically by such means as the following: by promoting the large-scale immigration of Spaniards into Spanish Sahara and providing them with the means and privileges necessary to ensure their supremacy over the indigenous inhabitants and their possession of the country's wealth; by oppressing the indigenous population and expelling them in order to expedite immigration from Spain; by destroying the traditions and the moral and cultural values of the indigenous population; by stationing in the Territory a large army of occupation double the number of civilian inhabitants in order to enforce its policy; and by granting extensive privileges to certain lackeys of colonialism in order to induce them to sing the praises of Spanish rule.

137. That process had been intensified when Spain had discovered mineral deposits in Saguia el Hamra, specifically phosphate and iron. Spain had then attempted to persuade large world corporations to invest in Spanish Sahara. Therein lay the danger, for the colonial interests which Spain was promoting would jeopardize the future of the Territory and stand in the way of its emancipation in conformity with the principle of human rights and the resolutions of the United Nations. The appetite of adventurous capitalism knew no bounds.

138. The Saharan nationalists were fighting that policy of Spain and suffering severe repression. The Spanish Army was bombing the villages and raping women and children. The petitioners had specific information on those atrocities which they were making available to the Special Committee.

139. At the same time as it was oppressing the people, Spain was trying to compel them as well as the sheikhs and the tribal chiefs, to sign petitions supporting integration with Spain. The Spanish authorities had recently adopted a decision under which the saharais could not acquire land or property unless they accepted Spanish nationality by signing a special document. Thus, expropriation of their property, annihilation of their personality and expulsion from their country represented the future which Spain planned for the people of Spanish Sahara, while paying lip service to their right of self-determination. Spain sought to convince world public opinion that it was a liberal colonial Power; yet, in Saguia el Hamra and Río de Oro, it was pursuing a policy of oppression and attempting to impose the kind of racism which prevailed in South Africa and Rhodesia.

140. There were only two courses open to the people of Spanish Sahara in fighting that colonialism: either to denounce it before the United Nations or to take up arms and fight for freedom. The saharais had no civil liberties which they could exercise to defend their rights and express their legitimate grievances peacefully. There was no freedom of the Press, speech or assembly in Spanish Sahara; actually, the Territory was under military occupation. The military forces were lords and masters over persons and property.

141. The people of Spanish Sahara wanted full and immediate independence for their country. Consequently, they called upon the United Nations to demand the withdrawal of foreign troops and an end to Spanish immigration into the Territory. They further called on the United Nations to supervise the process leading to independence so that they would be guaranteed the equitable implementation of their right to self-determination in good faith. The people of Spanish Sahara had no confidence in the Spanish colonial administration; they relied entirely on the United Nations.

142. At it was essential for all the saharawis to take part in elections to be organized by the United Nations, the refugees who had been expelled from the country or had fled from the Spanish authorities should be allowed to return. No Spanish citizen, regardless of his circumstances, should be entitled to take part in deciding the future of Spanish Sahara.

143. The people of Spanish Sahara were confident that the United Nations would protect them as it had always protected other colonial peoples and would take appropriate measures to put an end to the colonial rule and to help them fulfil their legitimate aspirations to freedom and dignity.

144. Mr. Braika Ould Ahmed Lahcen said that the situation in Spanish Sahara was explosive and crucial. It was urgent for the United Nations to take strong and effective action to protect the people of Spanish Sahara in their tragic plight and deliver them from their suffering before the situation degenerated into a conflict with unpredictable consequences. There must be an end to the oppression and the reign of terror prevailing in the Territory.

145. The people of Spanish Sahara had a right to freedom and independence and had put all their hopes in the United Nations as the instrument of their deliverance. They also called upon the Spanish Government to renounce its anti-African policy of European supremacy and persecution of the indigenous population.

146. The Spanish authorities of the Territory had recently forced the inhabitants, both men and women, to sign false documents with which Spain sought to prove that the people of Spanish Sahara preferred to live under Spanish colonial rule indefinitely. That colonialist manoeuvre had resulted in the dismissal of two chiefs who had refused to sign and in an uprising by 500 men who were hiding out in the mountains.

147. By means of such illegal tactics, the Spanish Government was seeking to go on exploiting the economic resources of the Territory and to establish a European majority in Spanish Sahara as the bulwark of a white-dominated régime such as that of Ian Smith. Its policy was to divide and rule and to keep the people in poverty and ignorance. Schooling remained at a very low level and was reserved for the children of prominent families. The Spanish authorities did not hesitate to use force against the nationalists or to torture and murder innocent men, women and children. Many saharawis were imprisoned and sent to the concentration camp at Fuerteventura in the Canary Islands. That was the policy by which Spain was endeavouring to bring the saharawis up to the level of the free, civilized world.

148. Spain believed that it could convert Spanish Sahara into an overseas Spain, but the saharawis, as Africans, Arabs and Moslems, were very far from being Spanish.

149. The Front de libération du Sahara sous domination coloniale espagnole, the organization which the petitioners represented, had fought and would go on fighting against Spanish colonialism until it won full and unconditional independence for the Territory. The nationalists were a mere handful against the colonial Power, but their loyalty to the national cause and to justice and their confidence in the United Nations would serve as powerful weapons for the conquest of colonialism, the enemy of the free world.

150. Mr. Hamdi Ould Salek Ould Ba Ali said that the petitioners had come to the United Nations to state their objectives, namely, to ensure respect for the principle of self-determination in Spanish Sahara. Colonialism was weighing very heavily on the lives of the saharawis.

151. The people of Spanish Sahara could not accept the survival of colonialism in their Territory, and they therefore requested the administering Power to recognize their freedom and independence under the supervision of the United Nations. The petitioners regarded the other petitioners who had requested the United Nations for a hearing as their brothers, provided that they too came to seek the independence and freedom of Spanish Sahara. If, however, they requested something different, they would be regarded as collaborationists and friends of colonialism.

152. Messrs. Sidi Mohamed Ould Haidala, Dahi Ould Nagem, Slama Ould Sidi Ould Oumar and Sheikh Ould Mouhamed Saleh said in their written statement that the so-called Spanish Sahara was a region which on a geographical and ethnic basis was hard to differentiate from Mauritania, from which it was separated by a theoretical and imaginary line in the south. Together with the neighbouring provinces of Tiris Zemmour and Baie du Lévrier, it constituted a single region which there was no justification for subdividing. The tribes occupying the Territory numbered some 25,000 to 28,000 people. The petitioners included representatives of the various districts. The nomads who inhabited Spanish Sahara and Mauritania belonged to the same tribes and had the same customs, religious practices and language. Only colonial occupation had led to a frontier being drawn between western and eastern Tiris, two parts of the same province of Zemmour, and to the subdivision of other regions.

153. In 1884, Spain, on the basis of the Berlin declaration to the effect that any so-called free territory could be occupied, had informed the other Powers that it was assuming the protectorate of the west coast of Africa between the twentieth and twenty-seventh parallels. The frontier between French and Spanish "possessions", however, had not been fixed until the convocations of 27 June 1900, 3 October 1904 and 27 November 1912, and than only very approximately. At present, the 280,000 square kilometres making up the Spanish Sahara were treated as an African province of Spain and were administered by a department of the Spanish Government responsible for the African provinces. The Saharans, however, were a freedom-loving people with an innate desire for independence. Just as they believed in friendship, so they rejected and condemned the injustice inherent in the domination of one people by another. They therefore regarded the exercise of their right of self-determination, an inalienable right recognized by the United Nations and accepted by the Spanish Government, as the best means by which they could decide upon their future in friendship with Spain.

154. The Saharans, although distant from Morocco both geographically and in their way of life, had great respect for that country, even if they had not always appreciated its expansionist ambitions. The ties binding them to Mauritania, on the other hand, were so obvious that they scarcely needed to be mentioned. There was no difference in appearance, in dress, or in any other respect between the Saharans and Mauritians and the similarity was reinforced by their common outlook and way of life, in addition to the many ties of blood between them. The people of Spanish Sahara were prepared, however, to refrain from mentioning those fundamental truths for some time and would gladly agree to the application of the principle of self-determination. They would urge those who showed themselves most eager for the liberation of the Spanish Sahara to refrain from using the Saharans for other ends which had nothing to do with the desire for freedom, independence and peace. The Saharans were proud and vigilant and knew where their interests lay. They would prefer not to be subjected to propaganda or involved in the political affairs of Morocco. They wanted to choose their own destiny, while preserving the many solid ties between Spain and themselves, and they believed that their future was profoundly linked with that of Mauritania. Despite their ardent opposition to colonialism, they wished to make their choice in peace and order, without bloodshed and free from interference by false friends.

155. Mr. Ould Sheikh Malainine said that the people of the so-called Spanish Sahara had resisted Spanish colonization ever since Spain had sought to gain a foothold on the coast of Africa. They had waged many battles, in which many heroes had fallen. They had held the conquerors at bay until 1934, when Spain had officially occupied the country. Their resistance had never ceased despite the fact that the Spanish colonial authorities had done everything possible to tame them, destroying villages, plundering property and raping, torturing, exiling and massacring the people. The Spanish were seeking to erase the African and Arab personality of the people and to establish a system based on the alleged superiority of the European, which in fact meant racial discrimination and persecution of the indigenous people. While the true inhabitants were driven into exile, the authorities encouraged mass immigration of Spaniards, who plundered the wealth of the Territory. The people were unanimous in rejecting the destiny thus imposed on them and in their determination to drive out the colonialists and gain independence under the ægis of the United Nations. There was no disagreement among the population, who formed one front against colonialism. He therefore appealed to the Special Committee to ensure that steps were taken to enable them to live in freedom and dignity. Such steps might include the withdrawal of foreign troops, the halting of immigration, the release of political prisoners and the return of political refugees, to be followed by the exercise of the right of self-determination in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

156. Referring to the statements of Mr. El Abadila Ould Sheikh Mohamed Laghdaf and the other petitioners of his group, the representative of Spain said that the petitioners' statements had been a tissue of lies and exaggerations. When asked about their origins and background, they had been evasive. He would simply point out that Ould Sheikh Malainine was a legal adviser at Rabat, Morocco, Hamid Ould Salek Ould Ba Ali was a caliph in the Moroccan service in the area of the frontier with Algeria, and Brahim Ould Hassena Douihi was a caliph at Tetuán, Morocco. It was therefore quite clear where they came from.

157. He categorically rejected the petitioners' allegation of ill-treatment of women and children. The extensive information which had been made available to the United Nations with regard to Spanish rule in those Territories showed how untrue such charges were.

158. The figures which the petitioners had given in regard to the number of inhabitants and the size of the Spanish forces in the Sahara were all false. The population of the Spanish Sahara was approximately 25,000. A census was being conducted and definitive figures would be available soon. A recent issue of Jeune Afrique referred to a population of 30,000; that was certainly the highest possible estimate. There were 9,500 peninsular Spaniards in Spanish Sahara and a Spanish military force of 10,000 men, which because of the vast extent of the Territory—280,000 square kilometres—was required to fulfil Spain's obligations under Article 73 of the Charter.

159. The petitioners knew that in fact there had been no mass immigration into the Spanish Sahara from Spain or any expulsion of Saharans. They could not cite a single statute in support of their charges. Their references to a war of liberation were equally meaningless, for the Territory was tranquil and was going to exercise the right of self-determination. The petitioners had said that Spaniards alone had privileges, but all the inhabitants of the Territory were Spaniards and had equal rights. Discrimination against the indigenous inhabitants would be contrary to the spirit of the Spanish nation as well as to the principles of the United Nations. It had been clearly established, in the information submitted by Spain under Article 73 e of the Charter, that the term "province" had no discriminatory implications. The petitioners had also made outrageous charges that the study of the Arabic language was suppressed. Spain took pride in its Arabic cultural institutions. Disputes among Moslems were settled by Sharia justice, whose written and customary laws were applied in full. He referred members to the working paper prepared by the Secretariat (see paras. 1-61 above) for further information on conditions in Spanish Sahara. The petitioners' allegation that Spain practised racial discrimination was an intolerable insult. They had spoken of Spain's anti-African policy, but Spain, which had suffered colonial domination for many years, took pride in the enrichment of its culture by Arab civilization and had never practised racial discrimination.

160. In a letter dated 8 September 1966 (see annex), his delegation had formally stated its position on the decolonization of Spanish Sahara. Regardless of all the machinations of the petitioners and their supporters, it was ready to affirm once more its willingness to grant self-determination to the people of the Territory. Sinister efforts were being made through such persons as the petitioners to obtain by intervention what they knew could not be secured if the people of the Territory were permitted to express their will freely.

161. The representative of Morocco said that the Spanish representative had denied that the petitioners really represented Spanish Sahara. There was, however, an official Spanish source which proved the contrary: Estudios Saharianos, by Julio Caro Baroja, sponsored by the Higher Council of Scientific Research and published in 1955 by the Institute of African Studies in Madrid. In his introduction to the work, the author had said that special thanks were due to his excellent interpreter, Braika Ould Ali Moulud Ould

Ahmed Lahcen, who had assisted him greatly in his journey and who was a fine example of the new generation of young men educated under the Spanish occupation.

162. The Spanish representative had asserted that Ould Sheikh Malainine was not entitled to represent Spanish Sahara because he had served as an official legal adviser in Rabat. That allegation was easy to refute, for he had in his possession documents issued by the Rabat Court of Appeals, dated 10 March 1966, certifying that the petitioner in question had been admitted to the practice of law in Marrakesh after taking the prescribed oath on 18 February 1966 but had subsequently resigned from his position. That meant that the petitioner was a lawyer, practising a liberal profession. The Spanish representative had insinuated that the fact that the petitioner had resided in Rabat, Casablanca and Marrakesh was a crime. Morocco, however, was proud of the fact that it afforded asylum to freedom fighters from all parts of Africa, including refugees from Spanish Sahara. The petitioners had made only statements of fact, which could be verified. No matter in what guise colonialism might present itself, it was the same thing all over the world, the oppression of man by man, the domination of one people by another.

163. Mr. Braïka Ould Ahmed Lahcen, speaking on behalf of all the petitioners in his group, said that, contrary to what the Spanish representative had alleged, all the petitioners were sons of the Spanish Sahara and were well known in that country. He himself had been born in El Aaiún in 1930 and had studied at Ifni, El Aaiún and for some time in Tetuán. He had begun to work as an interpreter in 1946 at El Aaiún, where he was well known by everybody, including the colonialist Spaniards. Because of his activities in the liberation movement, he had been forced to flee from El Aaiún in 1957, abandoning all his property and taking with him only one small portfolio of confidential documents. He and his fellow petitioners had subsequently fought against the Spaniards, but he himself had been arrested in December 1957 and imprisoned in El Aaiún together with hundreds of others. He had not benefited by an amnesty and had subsequently been transferred to the San Francisco gaol in the Canary Islands. After some time in various prisons, he had finally been released on the mainland, but had had to walk seventeen kilometres, without shoes and without food, to the Moroccan border, where he had been well received. He had been employed at Agadir as a lawyer, but not as a government official. None of the petitioners were Moroccan government officials but all were saharawi nationalists, who made it a rule to devote half their earnings to the cause of freedom. It was true that they travelled with Moroccan passports and had come to New York via Dakar, but that was merely because they had no other passports and had of necessity been obliged to avoid Madrid. They were present in New York as the only genuine representatives of their country, for whose independence they were all prepared to die.

164. The Spanish representative had said that his Government was officially sponsoring the study of the Arabic language in Spanish Sahara. He challenged that representative to find a single person among the indigenous population who held a primary school certificate of aptitude in Arabic. It was true that Hassania, a local dialect, was taught in the Spanish schools but it was not pure Arabic, which was the mother tongue of his people. The Spanish representative had also claimed that his Government observed the principles of justice in Spanish Sahara; true justice, however, did not exist in that country and not one case in the courts was judged in accordance with legal principles, by either a European or a Moslem judge, the latter being mere legal advisers to the former. He asked whether it could be called justice when a Spanish army had come to the holy city of Smara and had burned an ancient library containing the literary treasures of centuries. The mosque of that city was now used as a barracks for Spanish legionaries, while the local inhabitants had to pray at home or in the open air.

General statements

165. The representative of Spain said that the position of Spain on Ifni and the Spanish Sahara had been clearly stated in the letter which its Permanent Representative had sent to the Chairman of the Special Committee on 8 September 1966 (see annex). It was his delegation's fervent hope that the decolonization of Sahara would proceed at a rapid pace; with regard to Ifni, despite the peculiarities of the Territory, the contacts established with Morocco should make it possible to find a satisfactory solution for the interests involved and provide the inhabitants with the necessary guarantees regarding their future. As was stated in the document in question, Spain was firmly resolved to implement the provisions of General Assembly resolution 2072 (XX).

166. The representative of Mauritania pointed out that Mauritania had been divided into two parts under French and Spanish colonial rule and that only the part colonized by France had been able to accede to independence, the north-western part of the country being still a Spanish colony—Spanish Sahara. That was an abnormal situation, since Mauritania, as its President had pointed out, had a mission to fulfil in the Sahara; there was no doubt that geographically, ethnically and economically, so-called Spanish Sahara was an integral part of Mauritania. In a statement to the Special Committee in 1963, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Mauritania had said that so-called Spanish Sahara was populated solely by Moorish tribes, mostly nomads, which in language, culture, race, religion, or customs differed in no way from the other tribes which lived in the north-west of the Islamic Republic of Mauritania. Furthermore, it was clear from an official document published in 1960 by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Moroccan Kingdom that the territory of Mauritania included the southern provinces of Morocco between the regions of Tindouf and Segouia el Hamra in the north, the Atlantic in the west, and the Senegal River in the south, and that Spain had substituted the expression "Spanish Sahara" for "Spanish Mauritania". A White Paper on Mauritania issued by the Moroccan Government maintained that Río de Oro was a Moroccan region simply because it was an integral part of Mauritania and that so-called Spanish Sahara and Ifni were two distinct regions which should be treated separately. Mauritania argued that Spanish Sahara was part of its territory and that the Treaty of Peace and Trade, signed at Marrakesh in 1767 between the Sovereigns of Spain and Morocco also corroborated that view.

167. Thus, Mauritania's position on that very important question was quite clear; it wished to contribute to stability and to the maintenance of peace in the world, in particular in its own geographical region; and it believed in the virtue of discussion and in the need for peaceful settlement of international disputes. Morocco's position had not always been so clear. Its policy in that regard had varied, and after subduing the tone of its claims on the independent part of Mauritania, it had emphasized the claims concerning the other part, namely so-called Spanish Sahara.

168. A recent communiqué from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Islamic Republic of Mauritania had stated that all possible confusion must be avoided between two very clearly defined questions: on the one hand, that of Ceuta, Melilla and Ifni, settlement of which lay with Spain and Morocco, and on the other hand, that of Spanish Sahara, which should be the subject of negotiations, not between Spain and Morocco, a country which had never exercised sovereignty over that area, but between Spain and Mauritania, of which so-called Spanish Sahara was an integral part. The excellent relationships existing between the Mauritanian Government and the Spanish Government gave reason to hope for a satisfactory settlement of the question. Moreover, the conversations which had taken place in March 1966 during the visit of the Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs to Mauritania had been encouraging, and Mauritania hoped for a solution that would make possible the integration of that region into its national territory; nevertheless, if the administering Power decided to apply the principle of self-determination to the people of Spanish Sahara, Mauritania would not oppose such a step. However, in that event, the inhabitants of Río de Oro and Saguia el Hamra must first be given freedom of expression once again, under the supervision of international observers, with a view to giving the application of the principle of self-determination its full meaning. In such circumstances, the Government and the people of Mauritania were certain what would be the choice made by the inhabitants of the north-western part of Mauritania, known under the name of Spanish Sahara.

169. The representative of Morocco recalled that the Moroccan delegation had stated its position on the agenda item under consideration at the 436th meeting of the Special Committee held at Addis Ababa on 7 June 1966, and had on that occasion made some suggestions regarding a final settlement of the problem.

170. Since its accession to independence, Morocco had never failed to make reservations, in the various United Nations bodies, and in particular in the Trusteeship Council, on the Non-Self-Governing Territories of Ifni and Spanish Sahara. At the same time, it had established contact with Spain, the administering Power, with a view to finding a formula for restoring to Morocco the Territories which had been taken away from it when it was itself under the French and Spanish protectorates. After ten years of patience and in a spirit of co-operation within the United Nations, the Moroccan Government had decided to submit the question to the Special Committee, in the conviction that that body would take appropriate measures to hasten the granting of independence to those Territories, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). That was the gist of the statement which Morocco had made on 7 June 1966 at Addis Ababa. In the opinion of Morocco, as of any other truly independent African country, the indigenous populations must be in a position to decide freely as to their future, either by remaining independent or by becoming integrated in a neighbouring country at the political, economic or constitutional level. However, if the Special Committee preferred the formula of self-determination, Morocco would not object, provided that the administering Power withdrew its military forces, which were at present as numerous as the population; that it discontinued the organized immigration of Spaniards, who were in fact and in law foreigners to the Territory and constituted a threat to the indigenous population because of their dynamism and technical superiority; and that all the refugees who had fled repression were authorized to return and to express their views freely, without fear of reprisals.

171. Furthermore, whatever formula might be decided upon by the Special Committee and the General Assembly concerning the future of the Territory, Morocco stressed that it should actively participate in arrangements for implementing self-determination. He shared the Mauritanian representative's view that international supervision was necessary if the process of decolonization was to proceed in an atmosphere of calm and good faith. In order to accomplish that, the Spanish administration would have to withdraw and leave it to the competent United Nations bodies themselves to ensure the application of any resolution that the Special Committee might adopt.

172. As he had already stated on 7 June 1966, at Addis Ababa, he hoped that the Special Committee would at the appropriate time adopt a resolution on the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in that part of the national territory of Morocco and that all its members would endorse his desire to see the Committee's discussions brought to a successful conclusion.

173. The representative of Tunisia said that despite the reservations they contained, the statements of Spain, Morocco and Mauritania had in them much that was constructive and likely to prove helpful in promoting an early solution to the problem. In order to avoid wasting time, he therefore suggested that the members of the Committee should hold informal talks with a view to drafting a resolution likely to be approved by the Special Committee as a whole.

174. The representative of Spain said that he would like to know whether the Moroccan representative's remarks on self-determination applied only to the Spanish Sahara or to Non-Self-Governing Territories in general. The Spanish delegation stood by what was said in its letter of 8 September 1966 to the Chairman of the Special Committee (see annex), namely, that the Spanish Government was in favour of the application of General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) and 2072 (XX) to the Territory of Spanish Sahara. It should be pointed out that Spain had fewer than 30,000 men stationed in the Territory; nor were repressive measures employed against the indigenous populations.

175. Ifni was an enclave and therefore raised special problems, but the Spanish Government was willing to consider any suggestions which Morocco might make, its sole concern being to protect the interests of the population. The Spanish delegation wished to stress the special conditions obtaining in the Territory of Ifni, in particular the fact that Spain was not in control of the entire Territory. It drew attention to the proposals it had set out in document A/AC.109/202 (see annex). It rested with Morocco, therefore, to give its views on those proposals.

176. The representative of Morocco said that in the opinion of his delegation, Ifni and the Spanish Sahara together constituted a single problem. It was a colonial problem, created by the presence of a colonial Power. The two Territories in question shared a common destiny, just as they shared a common past and just as they had been subjected to the same colonial rule. In the view of Morocco, those Territories were Moroccan, and if there were a mission to be accomplished, it was for Morocco to accomplish it. As for the function of the administering Power, article 5 of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples stated clearly that immediate steps should be taken in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or all other Territories which had not yet attained independence to transfer all powers to the peoples of those Territories without any conditions or reservations.

177. Spain had repeatedly proclaimed its intention of implementing the Declaration and could therefore reasonably be expected to apply it in full, particularly in the matter of the transfer of powers, which should take place, in the words of the Declaration, without any conditions or reservations.

178. The Spanish representative, after stating that the question of Spanish Sahara was distinct from that of Ifni, had said that his Government looked to Morocco to put forward suggestions concerning the latter Territory. If that invitation implied the recognition by Spain of Moroccan rights over Ifni, Morocco would not fail to respond to it. On the other hand, if no Moroccan rights over Ifni were recognized, it should be left to the Special Committee to take action. As things were, Morocco could offer only one suggestion—that the Territory should be liberated from colonial rule.

179. The representative of Mauritania, referring to the conditions which the Moroccan delegation had laid down for the self-determination of Ifni and Spanish Sahara, said that in the Mauritanian view there were two distinct problems. One involved questions of principle; the other, the question of confidence in the talks between Mauritania and Spain of whose sincerity Mauritania was convinced.

180. He recalled that during the Special Committee's meetings at Addis Ababa, Morocco had demanded independence for Spanish Sahara. However, the Moroccan representative had declared that it formed an integral part of Moroccan territory. The question therefore was what precisely the Moroccan Government meant by the word "independence". Indeed, the ambiguity of the Moroccan Government's statements could not fail to cause disquiet. There was a contradiction in the attitude of Morocco which it would be in the common interest to resolve.

181. The representative of Morocco said that his country's policy had always been that outstanding problems should be dealt with through direct contacts with Spain; and it would continue to act on that principle. The fact that the whole of Ifni was not under Spanish control was no fault of the Moroccan Government, which, in any event, had taken steps to maintain tranquillity in the region.

182. There was no inconsistency in saying, on the one hand, that the Territories were really Moroccan and should become Moroccan once more and, on the other hand, that they ought to be independent. Morocco was advocating independence in the conviction that once Ifni and Spanish Sahara were free they would choose the path that best suited them.

183. The representative of Syria said that his country unreservedly supported the liberation of Ifni and Spanish Sahara. Like the Tunisian representative, he welcomed the fact that the interested parties were not only prepared for an exchange of views but actually advocated it, and that the administering Power itself was in favour of the early and unqualified application of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. As the Moroccan and Mauritanian delegations had stressed, it was important that the indigenous populations should be able to express their aspirations freely and that the administering Power should help to bring about the necessary conditions by withdrawing its troops, by putting an end to Spanish immigration, and by refraining from intervention in the process of self-determination. Such behaviour could only enhance the administering Power's prestige.

184. The representative of Uruguay pointed out that the Spanish representative's letter of 8 September 1966 (see annex) began with a reference to General Assembly resolution 2072 (XX), the terms of which Spain accepted. There could therefore be no doubt that Spain was prepared to carry out the provisions of paragraph 2 of that resolution, in which the Spanish Government was urgently requested "to take immediately all necessary measures for the liberation of the Territories of Ifni and Spanish Sahara". However, decolonization could come about in different ways, according to the nature of the Territories concerned. In his opinion there was no doubt that the case of Spanish Sahara was quite different from that of Ifni. The fact that Ifni was an enclave was of the greatest importance. His delegation approved the proposal of the Tunisian representative, to the effect that the parties concerned should be left to settle the matter, and that the Special Committee should confine itself to adopting a draft resolution affirming the principles on which agreement already existed.

185. The representative of Iran thought that the points of agreement were much more numerous than the points of disagreement. All three parties felt that an end should be put to the colonial status of the Territories in question. That being so, his delegation considered that different methods might, if necessary, be adopted in each case.

186. He supported the Tunisian representative's proposal that, since the parties were in agreement on certain principles, it was desirable to draft a resolution setting them forth clearly. The Special Committee should examine the Tunisian proposal without delay.

187. The representative of Mali said that the statements made by Spain in its letter of 8 September 1966 (see annex) represented some approach to the application of General Assembly resolution 2072 (XX). Since there were a number of principles which no one disputed, the fact should be placed on record in a resolution, as the Tunisian representative had proposed.

188. The representative of Venezuela expressed his satisfaction at the fact that there were points of agreement between the parties, and associated himself with the Tunisian proposal.

189. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that six years after the adoption of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), Spain was still defying its provisions. The characteristic feature of Spanish colonial policy in Africa was delaying tactics, which could not be concealed by general declarations of principle. For Spain, the Territories it dominated constituted as it were a medium of exchange. Similarly, the immigration policy applied in the Spanish Territories was designed to facilitate the worst kind of exploitation. Spain had ceded some of the resources of the Territories to Western monopolies, which were pillaging them without the slightest restraint. The Special Committee should act to prevent the Territories still administered by Spain from being sold to the highest bidder, and to that end it should demand the immediate application of General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) and 2072 (XX).

190. The representative of Spain said the Soviet representative was clearly ignorant of Spain's entire policy and position in colonial matters. Spain relied on no one's support, and was acting solely on rational principle. The policy referred to by the Soviet representative was entirely foreign to Spain.

191. The Representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that his delegation's purpose had been to throw light on a number of specific facts relating to Spanish colonization in Ifni and the Sahara. Such facts were always the essential basis of efforts to liberate the colonial Territories from the domination of foreign Powers.

F. FURTHER ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

192. At the 474th meeting, the representative of Tunisia introduced a joint draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.351) finally co-sponsored by Afghanistan, Iran, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Sierra Leone, Tunisia and the United Republic of Tanzania.

193. At the 478th meeting the co-sponsors submitted a revised text of the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.351/Rev.1). Further revisions were introduced orally at the 478th and 479th meetings.

194. In introducing the draft resolution, the representative of Tunisia said that the text was the result of long and difficult negotiations, during which the representatives of Morocco and Mauritania had both made a number of concessions and had shown great co-operation. The draft resolution dealt with the two Territories separately. Operative paragraph 1 concerned Ifni; the Organization of African Unity (OAU) had adopted a resolution in similar terms. Operative paragraph 2 requested the administering Power to prepare the indigenous population of Spanish Sahara for self-determination and independence and operative paragraph 3 invited the administering Power to consult with Mauritania and Morocco and the population of the Sahara concerning arrangements for a referendum in the Territory to determine the wishes of the population, while operative paragraph 4 asked Mauritania, Morocco and any other party concerned to assist in implementing operative paragraph 3. Algeria and Mali, for instance, might also be able to help. He hoped that a speedy solution would be found to the problems of the two Territories and that the draft resolution would be adopted with the greatest possible majority.

195. The representative of Sierra Leone, speaking as a sponsor of the draft resolution, said that it was not perfect, but the delegations mainly concerned had had to make great sacrifices in order to agree on a text. It was important to ensure that the inhabitants of the two Territories were able to exercise their right to self-determination and independence as early as possible.

196. The representative of the Ivory Coast expressed his delegation's gratitude to the delegations of Mauritania and Morocco for their constant co-operation during the consultations concerning the text. He welcomed the fact that the administering Power had decided to apply the provisions of General Assembly resolution 2072 (XX) in their entirety, as noted in the last pre-ambular paragraph. With reference to operative paragraph 1, he wished to make it clear that it was the understanding of the sponsors that the transfer of powers to Ifni should be carried out in accordance with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), especially operative paragraph 5 of that resolution, which stated that all powers should be transferred to the peoples of the Territories, without any conditions or reservations, in accordance with their freely expressed will and desire, in order to enable them to enjoy complete independence and freedom. He reaffirmed that principle and was sure that all the members of the Special Committee would share his views.

197. The representative of Mali said that, as a sponsor of the draft resolution, he supported the statements of the previous speakers and recommended the text for adoption by the Special Committee. It was important to stress the fact that the administering Power was taking steps to discharge its obligations and to implement General Assembly resolution 2072 (XX). He was convinced that the administering Power, in consultation with Morocco, Mauritania and all other parties concerned, would find the right solution for the problem of Spanish Sahara, but it was important that the people of the Territory should be in a position to exercise their right to self-determination in all freedom.

198. The representative of Tunisia had referred to Mali as one of the countries which might be particularly interested in the question of Spanish Sahara. He would point out that what interested Mali was the end of colonialism in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). He referred to the statement made by the President of Mali to the OAU in 1963, in which he had invited all the African Heads of State to stand by the territorial boundaries as they had been established at the time the colonialists had left their countries. Mali had no intention of annexing any other territory but wished only for peace and security in Africa and throughout the world.

199. The representative of Spain considered that since the Fourth Committee would later be discussing the agenda item under consideration, he felt that the Special Committee should not engage in a lengthy debate at the present stage and that it would be difficult to take an important decision without such a debate.

200. Since Spain had repeatedly expressed its willingness to grant independence to Spanish Sahara, he felt that the language of operative paragraph 2 was somewhat peremptory.

201. He pointed out that in operative paragraph 3 of the draft resolution, Spain was invited to consult with Mauritania and Morocco as well as the population of the Sahara concerning arrangements for a referendum. The last-named should have been mentioned first, since they were entitled to have the first and last word on what happened to their Territory.

202. The representative of Algeria said that the disappearance of colonialism in Africa would help to eliminate potential sources of conflict in that continent and was a prerequisite for peace and prosperity throughout the world. His country had waged relentless struggle against colonialism in order to attain independence and it therefore supported the demands of all peoples for freedom and independence. That was especially true in the case of the so-called Spanish Sahara, with whose inhabitants his country had close ties of blood, tradition and culture. In fact, the Regueibat tribes were nomads and had for centuries been wandering in search of pasture throughout the area made up of the south of the Algerian Sahara, Morocco, Mauritania and the region known as the Spanish Sahara. It was natural that Algeria should take particular interest in the future of a country with which it had common borders and in which there were tribes that spent several months of the year in Algerian territory, for it would to a great degree affect the security of the whole area and hence of that part of his country's national territory. Algeria had fought for many years to regain its territorial integrity and to achieve independence, and its sole concern was to develop good relations and friendship with all States, particularly those with which it had common frontiers. That was one of the fundamental principles of the United Nations Charter and of the OAU.

203. Since its establishment, the Special Committee had been working tirelessly to achieve decolonization and to persuade the colonial Powers to implement General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). His delegation endorsed the views expressed by the Moroccan and Mauritanian delegations at Addis Ababa on the future of Spanish Sahara. It considered that Spain should conform to the new realities of Africa and should establish the necessary conditions to enable the indigenous inhabitants to exercise their sacred right of self-determination and independence. That was the only course which would enable all the parties concerned to reach a final solution to the problem of the Territory's future. His delegation hoped that the Territory would be a factor of harmony and peace, which Africa sorely needed.

204. The representative of Morocco expressed his delegation's gratitude to the African members of the Special Committee for the sustained efforts which they had made to produce a draft resolution that would be acceptable to all the parties concerned. He also wished to commend the parties concerned for their spirit of understanding.

205. Morocco had already made known its position with regard to the problem. At the 436th meeting of the Special Committee, his delegation had said that in keeping with the spirit of decolonization members should put aside national considerations and concentrate their efforts on liberating the so-called Spanish Sahara. Morocco had close ties with the people of the Territory and since its accession to independence it had tried to promote a settlement of the question both in the United Nations and on a bilateral basis with Spain. After ten years of efforts, it had put aside national considerations and was acting within the framework of decolonization as defined by the United Nations. Since June 1966, Morocco had urged that the people of the Territory should be allowed to exercise their right to independence and self-determination. His delegation had noted that the administering Power had expressed its intention of implementing General Assembly resolution 2072 (XX).

206. Although the joint draft resolution did not include all the arguments advanced by his delegation, he thought that it would enable the inhabitants of the Territory to exercise their right to self-determination. He wished to draw attention to a major concession which his country had made in agreeing that the Territory of Ifni should be considered apart from the question of Spanish Sahara. Morocco had considerable legal and historical reasons for its claim, since the two Territories were Moroccan.

207. His delegation considered that the Territory of Ifni did not present any insurmountable problems, since Spain had always shown itself to be in favour of settling the situation in that Territory. His Government had taken note of the good intentions of the Spanish Government and hoped that Spain would adopt a decisive attitude that would make a final settlement possible.

208. His delegation therefore found the draft resolution acceptable and hoped that all members of the Special Committee would support it.

209. The representative of Mauritania regretted that, in introducing the draft resolution, the Tunisian representative had not made it clear that the Mauritanian delegation had qualified its acceptance of the text. Since, however, a number of delegations had been in favour of the draft resolution, his delegation had not insisted on its reservations.

210. The Mauritanian delegation was happy to note the decision that the two questions should be considered separately. He pointed out that that did not represent a concession on the part of Morocco to reality but a concession to history.

211. The administering Power had emphasized the need to respect the principle of self-determination. In his delegation's view, the administering Power should decide on way and means of putting that principle into effect in the Territory, taking into account the way of life of the indigenous inhabitants.

212. The representative of Syria congratulated the sponsors of the draft resolution on their efforts to bring the parties together, and paid a tribute to the co-operative spirit of the delegations of Tunisia, Spain, Morocco and Mauritania. His delegation considered that the Special Committee should now concentrate its efforts on accelerating the application of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) to the people of the Territories.

213. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania welcomed the Spanish representative's statement that his Government was willing to implement General Assembly resolution 2072 (XX). It was thanks to the encouraging Spanish attitude that the sponsors had been able to produce the draft resolution.

214. No interested party could agree entirely with the terms of the draft resolution and his delegation could fully understand that there should be reservations. Nevertheless it was encouraging that there had been concessions from several parties involved. The important thing was that the draft resolution should be implemented and the long overdue process of decolonization in Africa completed. The Special Committee and the parties concerned should take account of the interests of the inhabitants of the Territory.

215. The representative of Algeria said that the point at issue was that the people of the Territory should be able freely to exercise their right to self-determination and attain full independence. The long and difficult negotiations that had preceded the production of the draft resolution were evidence of the complexity of the problem. Apart from its position on decolonization, his Government adhered to the principle of good neighbourly relations to which Members of the United Nations had subscribed in signing the United Nations Charter. The prime objective of his delegation was that the people of the Territory should attain freedom and independence.

216. The representative of Uruguay said that it had always been the deeply rooted conviction of his Government that colonial Territories everywhere in the world should be liberated. The self-determination of the people of the Spanish Sahara was a matter for serious consideration by the countries whose territory bordered the area, in view of the extensive and frequent nomadic movements of the inhabitants. The Territory should not only be decolonized; its inhabitants should be enabled to live in peace with their neighbours.

217. The representative of Italy paid a tribute to the efforts made by various delegations to agree on a draft resolution acceptable to all parties. It was perhaps regrettable that the consultations which had preceded the introduction of the draft resolution had not included the administering Power, with which the main responsibility for the decolonization of Ifni and Spanish Sahara rested, and his delegation hoped that the Spanish delegation would find it possible to extend its support to the text.

218. Reservations had been voiced about the advisability of the Special Committee adopting a resolution on the subject when the General Assembly had been in session for almost two months and when a debate on the two Territories had already begun in the Fourth Committee. In view of the considerable effort made by the Special Committee to come to a decision, it would perhaps not be unwise to adopt the draft resolution. He regretted, however, that the Special Committee had not waited to hear the other petitioners, who would be in New York shortly.

219. The Spanish delegation had been correct in asserting that the Special Committee had a special mandate to report on the implementation of General Assembly resolution 2072 (XX). If the second preambular paragraph of the draft resolution had been divided into two paragraphs, the first reading "Having heard the statements concerning these two Territories made by the representatives of the administering Power and taking note of the letter dated 8 September 1966 from the Permanent Representative of Spain to the United Nations" and the second reading "Having heard the statements by the representatives of Mauritania, Morocco and Algeria", the text would have been more in keeping with General Assembly resolution 2072 (XX) and would have made it easier for the Spanish delegation to accept the draft resolution.

220. In discussing problems of decolonization, the Special Committee was always faced with the conflicting demands of realism and of adherence to principle. In the present case realism had prevailed, in that the draft resolution took note of the fact that there were a number of Member States directly concerned in the future of the Territories, a future which, according to principle, should be shaped only by the will of their indigenous inhabitants. Although his delegation had always stressed the need for realism in the search for solutions to political problems, he wondered whether it would not have been advisable, for the sake of principle, for the draft resolution to place more emphasis on the necessity of ascertaining the views and safeguarding the interests of the indigenous inhabitants of the Territories. The demands of realism could have been satisfied by asking for the co-operation of the neighbouring States, which would be indispensable in consulting the nomad inhabitants of the Territories.

221. His delegation wondered also whether, in view of the fact that the Territories might be considered to come within the category of small Territories in terms of population, a reference to General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV) would not have been appropriate.

222. His delegation also had some doubts concerning operative paragraph 3, for it thought that the administering Power might have difficulty in determining who were the "other parties concerned".

223. Despite the doubts which he had expressed, his delegation would vote in favour of the draft resolution and it hoped that the decolonization process in the two Territories would promote peace and stability in the area.

224. The representative of Spain recalled that his delegation had pointed out certain defects in the draft resolution at earlier meetings. His delegation would prefer to have the two Territories treated in separate resolutions and hoped that the Fourth Committee would follow its previous decision on that point.

225. He pointed out that the new preambular paragraph added by the sponsors of the draft resolution applied only to the petitioners from Spanish Sahara.

226. In previous resolutions dealing with the transfer of powers to the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories, it had been customary to invite the administering Power and the Government of the Territory to consult, taking into account the interests of the population. In departing from that tradition in operative paragraph 1 of the draft resolution, the Special Committee was going beyond its powers. The reference in operative paragraph 3 to other countries was also quite unprecedented. The sacred trust which Spain had accepted under Article 73 of the Charter obliged it to promote the well-being of the inhabitants of the Territories, whereas operative paragraph 3 would compromise the interests of those inhabitants. His Government was prepared to grant the inhabitants of the Territories the right of self-determination, but it did not think that the exercise of that right should be influenced by foreign intervention.

227. The representative of Chile said that his delegation approved the draft resolution in general and would vote in favour of it. It had doubts, however, about the reference in operative paragraph 3 to countries which were to be consulted in connexion with the arrangements for a referendum. His delegation was aware of the important and legitimate interests of those countries but thought that they should come into play only when the population of Spanish Sahara was independent. He therefore asked for a separate vote on operative paragraph 3; his delegation would abstain in the vote on that paragraph.

228. The representative of Australia said that his delegation would have preferred to have more time to consider the statements of the petitioners. It would therefore abstain in the vote on the draft resolution, without prejudice to its future position on the matter in the light of closer consideration.

229. The representative of Uruguay said that it was highly regrettable that the Special Committee had decided to put the draft resolution to the vote when all the necessary information was not yet available. Fortunately, delegations could take a position later in the Fourth Committee, when they were in full possession of the facts.

230. His delegation shared the Italian delegation's view concerning the principle of the administering Power's exclusive responsibility and the advisability of dividing the second preambular paragraph into two paragraphs. In operative paragraph 1 there was no reference to the necessity of taking into account the interests of the population—which was the very essence of decolonization. Moreover, the reference to the Government of Morocco in paragraph 1 should be in a separate paragraph, since the basic responsibility for arranging for the transfer of powers rested with Spain. His delegation could support operative paragraph 2 whole-heartedly, but it had some reservations concerning operative paragraph 3. A complex of interests was established in that paragraph, and it was not clear which was to prevail. To invite the administering Power to consult with the Governments of Mauritania and Morocco concerning the arrangements for the referendum was unfair not only to the administering Power but also to the indigenous population of Spanish Sahara. Moreover, such consultations would further delay the exercise by the people of their right of self-determination. Accordingly, his delegation would abstain in the vote on the draft resolution.

231. The representative of Venezuela said that his delegation had always regarded the principle of self-determination as the right of a people to determine its own political future and considered that the interests of the people concerned took precedence over every other interest in the decolonization process. His delegation had therefore been amazed that neither operative paragraph 1 nor operative paragraph 3 of the draft resolution included a reference to the interests of the people of the Territory. His delegation would vote in favour of the draft resolution, on the understanding that its reservations would be recorded.

232. At the 479th meeting, the Special Committee voted on the draft resolution. A separate vote was taken on operative paragraph 3 which was adopted by 16 votes to none, with 6 abstentions. The draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.351/Rev.1) as a whole, as orally revised was adopted by a vote of 19 to none, with 3 abstentions.

233. In explanation of vote, the representative of Denmark said that his delegation was fully in agreement with the substance of the draft resolution, and had therefore voted in favour of it. He noted that operative paragraph 2 of that resolution affirmed the right of the indigenous population of Spanish Sahara to self-determination and independence. His delegation had reservations, however, concerning operative paragraph 3, for the invitation to the administering Power to consult specific States might prejudice the future status of the Territory.

234. The representative of the United States of America said that his delegation believed firmly in the right of the people of Spanish Sahara to self-determination. It had abstained in the vote on the draft resolution, for if that resolution was to have any chance of success it would have to satisfy the aspirations of the indigenous population and win the support of all the parties concerned, including the nations with legitimate interests in the fate of the Territories.

235. The representative of the United Kingdom said that his delegation had voted in favour of the draft resolution, although it had some reservations concerning operative paragraph 1 in view of the absence of a reference to the interests of the people—which were paramount under the Charter—and the inclusion of a reference to resolution 1514 (XV) which was not entirely clear. The text also dealt with matters which were the primary concern of the administering Power. He regretted that the discussion had been closed before all petitioners had been heard.

236. The representative of Mauritania commended the Special Committee for its adoption of the draft resolution. In his delegation's view, Morocco, while it was interested in the Territory of Ifni, had no interest in so-called Spanish Sahara.

237. The representative of Morocco said that the fact that the resolution had been approved unanimously was a demonstration of the solidarity of the nations of Europe, Africa, Asia and Latin America with the peoples of Africa desirous of achieving freedom, and a token of their united will to see that justice, law and the principles of the Charter prevail.

238. Morocco would play its part in a spirit of friendship and co-operation in the active application of the resolution so as to ensure that the decolonization of the Territories under consideration proceeded in an orderly, peaceful and harmonious manner in keeping with the legitimate wishes of the people, who aspired to dignity, progress and well-being, without detriment to the legitimate rights of anyone. Like all the countries engaged in the struggle against colonialism, Morocco considered that decolonization could only serve the cause of peace in the context of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

239. With regard to operative paragraph 1 of the resolution adopted by the Special Committee, Morocco considered that the decolonization of Ifni should be brought into line with operative paragraph 6 of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). With regard to operative paragraph 3, his delegation considered that the question of Sahara under Spanish administration, in so far as it concerned a party other than the population of the Territory itself, was exclusively the concern of Morocco, which did not recognize the validity of any rights claimed circumstantially by other parties.

240. He hoped that note would be taken of the fact that the spirit of compromise reflected in the Committee's resolution did not affect the conviction that the Territory, which had been an integral part of Morocco from time immemorial, had a right to enjoy its right to freedom and independence without let or hindrance, with the assistance of the United Nations. Subject to that reservation, his delegation had accepted the compromise text. Morocco was prepared to co-operate with the administering Power in compliance with the resolution so that that Territories of Saguia el Hamra, Río de Oro and Ifni would become independent on that basis, in the interests of the indigenous population.

241. The representative of Mauritania said he had already expressed his views on the resolution adopted by the Special Committee, and what the Moroccan representative had just said did not surprise him, since of course Morocco laid claim to so-called Spanish Sahara just as previously it had laid claim to Mauritanian territory, as was proved by an official document given world-wide distribution by the Moroccan Government in 1960.

242. He would like to put on record the fact that Ifni was a Territory entirely separate and distinct from Spanish Sahara and had nothing to do with it; and he hoped that the Committee would take due note of that. Mauritania trusted that the people of those Territories would be granted the exercise of their right to self-determination, and noted that the administering Power had undertaken to grant it. He urged that no obstacle should be put in the way of the exercise of that right by confusing the issue with problems alien to the wishes of the people, and that by agreement with the administering Power, the people should be allowed to decide freely as to their future.

243. The text of the resolution (A/AC.109/214) adopted by the Special Committee at its 479th meeting on 16 November 1966 reads as follows:

"The Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

"Having considered the item on its agenda relating to Ifni and Spanish Sahara,

"Having heard the statements concerning these two Territories made by the representatives of the administering Power, Mauritania, Morocco and Algeria,

"Having heard the petitioners,

"Recalling the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960,

"Bearing in mind the provisions of resolution 2072 (XX) adopted by the General Assembly on 16 December 1965,

"Noting the decision of the administering Power to apply the provisions of resolution 2072 (XX) in their entirety,

"1. Invites the administering Power to expedite the process of decolonization of the Territory of Ifni and, in collaboration with the Government of Morocco, to make arrangements for the transfer of powers in accordance with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV);

"2. Requests the administering Power to establish without delay appropriate conditions which will ensure that the indigenous population of Spanish Sahara is able to exercise its rights to self-determination and independence;

"3. Invites the administering Power to make arrangements, in consultation with the population of Sahara, the Governments of Mauritania, Morocco and any other parties concerned, for a referendum which will be held under United Nations auspices to enable the indigenous population of the Territory freely to exercise its right to self-determination, and to report thereon to the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples before the referendum is held;

"4. Requests the Secretary-General to follow the progress of the implementation of this resolution and to report thereon to the Special Committee."

ANNEX

[A/AC.109/202]

Letter dated 8 September 1966 from the Permanent Representative of Spain to the United Nations addressed to the Chairman of the Special Committee

1. In the letter dated 28 June 1966 which I sent to the Secretary-General with the request that he forward it to the Officer in Charge of the Department of Trusteeship and Non-Self-Governing Territories, I stated, in reply to the letter dated 9 June 1966^a which Mr. M. E. Chacko sent me from Addis Ababa, that the Spanish Government would inform the Special Committee in due course of its attitude and intentions regarding the implementation of General Assembly resolution 2072 (XX) of 16 December 1965 concerning Ifni and Spanish Sahara. I now have the honour of submitting this information to you.

SPANISH SAHARA

2. As the Special Committee knows, the Spanish Government has shown itself to be in favour of applying the principle of self-determination in the territory of Spanish Sahara, as stated in the official letter sent by me on 30 April 1964 to the then Chairman of the Special Committee, Ambassador Sori Coulibaly, Permanent Representative of Mali. We have consequently noted with satisfaction that at the 436th meeting of the Special Committee, held on 7 June 1966 in the capital of Ethiopia, some other countries which had hitherto opposed the application of this principle in the territory of Spanish Sahara stated that they were now in favour of it. It will thus be possible to implement General Assembly resolution 2072 (XX) by means of the free self-determination of the saharais, as the Spanish Government has proposed in the past.

3. To this end, my Government is in contact with the population of the Sahara and is actively making the necessary preparations for them to express their will without any form of pressure. These preparations have taken some time because of the nomadic nature of the inhabitants of the desert and the special features of the territory.

IFNI

4. As regards Ifni, the Spanish Government, inspired as always by the spirit of international co-operation and true to the cause of decolonization, must needs draw the Special Committee's attention to the abnormal situation obtaining in this enclave, in some parts of which Spain is having difficulty in exercising its authority, despite the Treaties in which Spain's rights are clearly set out. The reasons for this are well known to all and the Spanish Government is not responsible for them. All the same, because of the special features of this problem it might be advisable to establish contact with Morocco with the primary objective of restoring a lawful state of affairs as a necessary preliminary to seeking an arrangement which would satisfy the interests involved and permit the inhabitants of Ifni to obtain firm and duly guaranteed assurances regarding both their future in general and their individual destiny.

5. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the above will show the Special Committee how clear and firm is Spain's determination to implement General Assembly resolution 2072 (XX).

^a The letter of 9 June 1966 transmitted the text of the consensus concerning Ifni and Spanish Sahara adopted by the Special Committee at its 436th meeting on 7 June 1966.

CHAPTER XI*

GIBRALTAR

A. ACTION PREVIOUSLY TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE AND THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

1. Following its consideration of Gibraltar at its meetings in 1964, the Special Committee, on 16 October 1964, adopted a consensus as contained in its report to the General Assembly at its nineteenth session (A/5800/Rev.1,¹ chap. X, para. 209). At its meetings in 1965, the Special Committee included relevant information on the Territory in its report to the General Assembly at its twentieth session (A/6000/Rev.1,² chap. XI).

2. On 16 December 1965, the General Assembly adopted resolution 2070 (XX) which, in its operative paragraphs, reads as follows:

[The General Assembly]

"1. Invites the Governments of Spain and of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to begin without delay the talks envisaged under the terms of the consensus adopted on 16 October 1964 by the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples;

"2. Requests the two Governments to inform the Special Committee and the General Assembly, at its twenty-first session, of the outcome of their negotiations."

B. INFORMATION ON THE TERRITORY

3. Information on the Territory is contained in the reports of the Special Committee to the General Assembly at its eighteenth, nineteenth and twentieth sessions.³ Supplementary information is set out below.⁴

General

4. The civilian population of Gibraltar numbered 24,485 at the end of 1964, composed as follows: Gibraltarians, 18,615; other British, 4,153; and aliens, 1,717.

Political and constitutional developments

5. Following the elections to the eleven-member Legislative Council in 1964, a Council of Ministers consisting of a Chief Minister and five other ministers was formed. In July 1965, the Chief Minister agreed to form a coalition with the independent Opposition. The leader of the Opposition became Minister without Portfolio and Deputy to the Chief Minister.

⁴ This information has been derived from published sources and from the information transmitted to the Secretary-General by the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland under Article 73 e of the Charter, on 2 December 1965, for the year ending 31 December 1964.

Correspondence between Spain and the United Kingdom

6. On 17 January 1966, the Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs addressed a note to the British Ambassador in Madrid⁵ in which he stated that the Spanish Government was prepared to begin without delay negotiations with the Government of the United Kingdom in accordance with the terms set forth in the General Assembly resolution of 16 December 1965, with a view to seeking a definitive solution to the problem of Gibraltar.

7. In a note verbale dated 14 February 1966,⁶ the British Embassy at Madrid informed the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Spain that the United Kingdom Government was also ready to initiate such talks. The Embassy was instructed to propose that the talks should commence in London on a mutually convenient date in April 1966.

8. In a note verbale dated 23 February 1966,⁷ the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Spain informed the British Embassy at Madrid that the Spanish Government accepted the United Kingdom Government's proposal that the negotiations should take place in London at the earliest date convenient to both Governments. The Ministry held itself at the disposal of the British Embassy at Madrid for the purpose of fixing this date by mutual agreement.

Economic conditions

9. The economy of Gibraltar is largely dependent on the tourist industry, re-exports and the work provided by the dockyard, the departments of the Armed Services, the Government and the City Council. The territory has no agriculture or other primary resources. Local industry is mainly confined to a fruit and fish canning factory, tobacco processing, coffee blending and garment manufacture.

10. The value of imports during 1964 amounted to £14,928,148 of which £2,894,419 were food-stuffs. Dutiable re-exports during the same year totalled £4,710,478. Exports of goods of local origin is negligible.

11. The main sources of government revenue are customs duties, licences and excise duties, court fees, rents of government property and government lotteries. Income tax accounts for some 14 per cent of revenue. In 1964, total revenue amounted to £2,086,556 and expenditure to £2,407,298, of which £1,913,298 was recurrent expenditure. The City Council has its separate finances; in 1963 revenue and expenditure amounted to approximately £1 million.

12. In July 1965, it was announced that £1 million would be made available in Colonial Development and

Welfare grants for development in Gibraltar over the next three years and a further £200,000 in Exchequer loans, should they be required. In addition, £100,000 would be made available as a special grant-in-aid for the Gibraltar budget for 1965.

Social conditions

Labour

13. Manpower statistics relate only to persons engaged in manual labour and to other workers whose remuneration does not exceed £500 a year. At the end of 1964 there were 5,641 workers of British nationality and 9,600 alien workers; most of the latter lived in Spain and entered Gibraltar daily. Some 43 per cent of the total labour force is employed by the Government of Gibraltar, the departments of the Armed Services, the Ministry of Public Buildings and Works and the City Council. The other main sources of employment are the building industry, the wholesale and retail distributive trades, the hotel and catering trades, shipping services and private domestic service.

14. In 1964, there were twelve employers' associations with a total membership of 364. The number of trade unions was sixteen with an aggregate membership of 3,734. This represents approximately 60 per cent of the resident employed population.

Public health

15. The Board of Management for the Medical and Health Services is responsible for the administration of all government medical and health services. The Board consists of three ex officio members and six appointed by the Governor and is presided over by the Minister for Medical Services.

16. The Government operates four hospitals. Other medical and health services administered by the Government include out-patient medical treatment, child welfare, school health services and the port and airport health service.

17. In 1964, recurrent expenditure on public health by the Government amounted to £267,266 and by the City Council to £34,330.

Educational conditions

18. The Minister of Education is responsible for initiating policy for the general progress of education in the Territory. He is advised by the Chief Education Officer who has general executive control over the Department under the Gibraltar Education Ordinance of 1953.

19. Education between the ages of 5 years and 15 years is compulsory, and it is free in government schools.

20. In 1964, primary education was provided in twelve government schools and three private schools. With the exception of a few pupils in two private schools, secondary education is provided exclusively by the Government. There were two grammar schools, a technical school for boys, a commercial school for girls and four secondary schools. The two grammar schools prepare pupils for the General Certificate of Education at Ordinary and Advanced Levels.

21. At the end of 1964, the school enrolment was: 3,014 (1,553 boys and 1,461 girls) in primary education; 1,621 (787 boys and 834 girls) in secondary education; and 153 (105 boys and 48 girls) in technical and vocational education.

22. In 1964 recurrent government expenditure on education amounted to £198,822.

C. CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

23. The Special Committee considered Gibraltar at its 475th and 480th meetings held at Headquarters on 11 and 17 November 1966.

24. The Special Committee had before it the following written petitions concerning Gibraltar:

Petitioner	Document No.
Mr. Edward O. Recagno	A/AC.109/PET.531
Messrs. Mohammed Bey, Lahoussine Bey and Youssel	A/AC.109/PET.532

25. By a letter dated 8 September 1966 (A/AC.109/210), the Permanent Representative of Spain to the United Nations requested that his delegation be allowed to participate in meetings of the Special Committee at which Gibraltar would be discussed. The Committee decided without objection to accede to that request.

26. The representative of Spain said, that on 17 January 1966, after receiving the text of General Assembly resolution 2070 (XX), the Spanish Government had again proposed to the Government of the United Kingdom that negotiations should be initiated concerning Gibraltar. The latter Government had agreed to that proposal on 14 February, and on 18 May the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Spain and the Secretary of the Foreign Office had met in London. An offer, of which the Special Committee was aware, had been made by the Spanish Minister regarding the decolonization of Gibraltar; the Government of the United Kingdom had not yet replied to that offer. In order that the offer might be given proper study, it had been decided that the high-level negotiations would continue. Meetings had been held in June, July, September and October, and a further meeting was planned.

27. It had been decided that the negotiations would be confidential, without prejudice to the obligation of informing the Special Committee and the General Assembly. The United Kingdom Government had however broken that agreement and had announced the publication of a White Paper in which, apparently, it would reproduce the documents exchanged at the meetings. Spain, in the light of what would be said in the White Paper, reserved the right to bring relevant information to the notice of the Special Committee and the United Nations.

28. Something else had occurred which might have serious consequences. On 12 July the Government of the United Kingdom had formally notified the Spanish Government, for the first time in history, that the United Kingdom had sovereign authority over the section of Spanish territory next to Gibraltar where the aerodrome was situated. That area had been declared in the past to be a neutral zone and had been demilitarized by Spain. Spanish sovereignty over that territory had never been denied by the United Kingdom until that year at the time when negotiations under resolution 2070 (XX) had been initiated. That was a very serious act of aggression by the United Kingdom against Spain, and the Spanish Government had asked the United Kingdom to reconsider its claim to a piece of territory which had not been ceded under the Treaty of Utrecht. The United Kingdom Government had reaffirmed its claim to sovereignty, had denied the neutral character of the territory in question, was using it for military purposes and was authorizing the aircraft of its air force to fly over the air space of Spain contiguous to Gibraltar.

29. Despite everything, Spain was continuing to negotiate and had urged the United Kingdom to reconsider its declaration of sovereignty over the territory in question and to refrain from using it for military purposes so that Spain would not be obliged to take further measures in the face of aggression.

30. Spain was studying the latest United Kingdom proposal in the light of resolutions 1514 (XV) and 2070 (XX) and expected to reply to them in a short time.

31. The representative of the United Kingdom said that in pursuance of General Assembly resolution 2070 (XX) his Government had been holding talks with the Spanish Government in an effort to find a satisfactory solution to the problems between them. Those talks had revealed a number of legal issues.

32. Gibraltar was British by right; but the United Kingdom regarded it as its duty to settle all disputes by peaceful means, and was therefore proposing to the Spanish Government that the legal issues in dispute over Gibraltar should be referred to the International Court of Justice. At the same time, however, the United Kingdom was bound under the Charter to safeguard the interests of the people of Gibraltar, as the Special Committee had recognized in its consensus of 16 October 1964. If the interests of the people of Gibraltar were not overlooked, a solution could be found, and as much of the disagreement hinged on legal issues, the matter should be referred to the International Court of Justice.

33. The representative of Spain had omitted in his statement to refer to the restrictions imposed by his country at several stages over the last few months at the border with Gibraltar. The United Kingdom wished to settle the matter in a spirit of conciliation and friendship, but those actions by Spain—which in October had announced still further restrictions on freedom of movement between its territory and Gibraltar, although it had been agreed that such restrictions should not be increased—were not helping to improve the atmosphere. Such measures appeared to be designed to exert pressure which would increase the difficulty of the talks; that was a factor which should be borne in mind.

34. The Spanish representative had described the British assertion of sovereignty over the southern part of the isthmus, in which the airfield was situated, as a new fact which could have serious consequences. For more than 250 years the United Kingdom had been using the southern part of the isthmus; and in 1838, to mark the extent of its jurisdiction, it had established a line of sentries, which had been replaced in 1909 by a fence in order to control smuggling. Sixty years ago the United Kingdom had made clear that it had no doubt as to its sovereignty over the southern half of the isthmus, and thirty years ago it had constructed, to the south of the line he had referred to, an airfield which it had used for military purposes during the Second World War, without any protest from Spain despite its neutrality. It could hardly be contended now that that was an act of aggression. There had been no changes in the zone for a considerable time, and there was no justification for Spain's recent restrictions and border measures.

35. It was a fact that the airfield was being used by British aircraft for military purposes and that the Spanish Government had complained of violations of its air space; but investigations had revealed only one overflight, for which the United Kingdom Government had expressed its regrets.

36. The United Kingdom had not failed to reply to the Spanish proposals. It had made lengthy counter-proposals which were still awaiting a reply, and it considered that the talks should continue. It hoped that Spain was of the same mind, for given good faith it would be possible to find a peaceful solution which paid due regard to the interests of the people of Gibraltar. The United Kingdom had decided to publish the documents of the talks because much information had already been leaked to the Press—a fact for which Spain was not entirely innocent of responsibility—and the Spanish Government was warned of this decision in advance.

37. The representative of Spain replied that in a note verbale dated 29 September 1966 the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Spain had pointed out to the United Kingdom Embassy at Madrid that on 12 July 1966 the United Kingdom Government had informed the Spanish Government, for the first time in history and without adducing any valid grounds for its claim, that in addition to being sovereign over the Rock it was also vested with sovereignty over the part of the isthmus situated between the old walls of Gibraltar and the fence erected in 1909 by the British authorities. That territory had been unjustifiably occupied by the United Kingdom since the nineteenth century, and had been physically separated from the rest of Spanish territory by the fence in question. British occupation of the territory owed its origin to certain ad hoc privileges granted for humanitarian reasons by the Spanish Government on the occasion of a number of epidemics which had necessitated the construction on the isthmus of hospital encampments, later converted by the United Kingdom into permanent installations which it refused to evacuate. That part of the isthmus had been neutralized by the Spanish Government in the eighteenth century, in deference to British wishes. Since the last century the Spanish Government had made repeated protests to the Government of the United Kingdom both against the unjustifiable British presence in the part of the isthmus concerned and against the erection of the fence. The United Kingdom had never discussed the repeated statements of Spanish sovereignty over the territory. The Spanish Government regarded the recent unilateral United Kingdom declaration of sovereignty as an act of aggression against the territorial integrity of Spain, and had demanded that the United Kingdom Government should continue to recognize Spanish sovereignty over the area. The Spanish Government had reminded the United Kingdom Government that the waters and air space pertaining to the part of the isthmus in question were also under Spanish sovereignty, and that the neutrality of the zone must be respected by both countries. The United Kingdom Government had repeated its claim to sovereignty over the zone, and had stated that it was entitled to use the air space over the isthmus for defensive purposes. The Spanish Government had again reminded the United Kingdom of its rights over the isthmus and had protested against a series of violations committed by British military aircraft in Spanish air space adjacent to Gibraltar, submitting documents in which those violations were described. The United Kingdom Government had repeated its claim to sovereignty over the section of Spanish territory adjacent to Gibraltar and had without any explanation annulled the neutrality of the territory, thus arrogating to itself the right to convert a state of occupation backed by no legal title into an outright usurpation backed by force alone. What was more, it asserted that the pilots of British military aircraft had instructions to use well-established approach lanes which did not involve any violation of Spanish rights. Pending the United Kingdom Government's explanation of what it meant by "approach lanes", the Spanish Government's position was that any British military aircraft which flew over Spanish territory or waters was committing a violation of Spanish air space. Despite the Spanish protest, British military aircraft had again violated Spanish air space. That policy of force and faits accomplis pursued by the United Kingdom Government obliged the Spanish Government to take steps to protect its sovereignty, raised new difficulties in relations between the two countries and confirmed the Spanish Government in its belief that the sole adequate solution would be the success of the talks in progress with a view to the decolonization of Gibraltar.

38. He read out a further note verbale sent on 21 October 1966 by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Spain to the United Kingdom Embassy at Madrid, in which the Spanish Government expressed regret that it was unable to regard as a final reply of the United Kingdom Government a note from the United Kingdom Embassy which merely made excuses for a violation of Spanish air space, questioned the genuineness of two other violations and affirmed that the other nine violations out of the total of twelve enumerated by the Spanish Government had not taken place. The competent Spanish authorities insisted that those twelve violations which had been confirmed by technical methods of observation leaving no room for doubt, had taken place. Still more, the Spanish Government protested emphatically against the United Kingdom Government's declaration of sovereignty over the part of Spanish territory situated between the 1909 fence and the walls of Gibraltar, and against the military utilization of that territory and the violations of Spanish air space committed. As to the last point, the Spanish note verbale had been accompanied by graphic descriptions of fifteen additional violations. In a statement to the General Assembly at its eighteenth session,⁸ the Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs had asserted that in dealing with the problem of Gibraltar Spain had barred itself only one road: that of violence. However, the Spanish Government was concerned to see that Her Britannic Majesty's Government appeared to interpret that solemn declaration by Spain as a blank check permitting it to repeat its violations and its attacks on Spanish sovereignty, backed by force. The Spanish Government was avoiding any resort to more drastic measures, and called upon the United Kingdom Government to reconsider its declaration of sovereignty over the isthmus and to cease utilizing the Gibraltar airfield for military purposes.

39. The representative of the United Kingdom said that in relation to the alleged flights over Spanish territory by British military aircraft, his Government had replied on 15 October 1966 that the investigations carried out by the United Kingdom authorities had revealed a single case in which a British military aircraft had inadvertently flown over the territory of La Línea; his Government had regretted the incident and had stated that it had taken steps to minimize the possibility of a repetition of it. These steps included using new radar equipment to introduce new circuit procedure. The remaining accusations were either unfounded or of doubtful validity. His Government had subsequently received another note from the Spanish Government and was investigating the facts with the same care.

40. It was obvious that the question of the sovereignty of the isthmus was a very good example of the type of case to be dealt with by the International Court of Justice. His Government was also prepared to continue peaceful negotiations with the Spanish authorities.

41. He referred to a statement made in the House of Commons the previous day by the United Kingdom Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in which it was emphasized that the real problem lay in the fact that the matter affected human beings, whose interests should come before all else, as was laid down in the Charter of the United Nations. There were 20,000 people in Gibraltar and their opinion was a very important factor. Although Spain felt that the wishes of the inhabitants of Gibraltar had nothing to do with the international solution of the problem, the United Kingdom considered them of the greatest importance. The talks between the two Governments showed clearly that there were juridical problems which would have to be elucidated if any progress was to be made. Those juridical points should be submitted to the International Court of Justice.

42. The representative of Syria thought it desirable that the negotiations between the Government of Spain and the Government of the United Kingdom should continue and he appealed to the United Kingdom representative to ask his Government not to place obstacles in the way of the negotiations, such as the publication of the White Paper, flights over Spanish territory, and the assertion of sovereignty over the isthmus. The fact of having occupied an area for a time or of having carried out construction work there could not provide any basis for claiming possession of a territory. The United Kingdom referred to the use of the aerodrome during the Second World War as if that precedent justified its use for military purposes at the present time, when it was not at war with anybody; if the Spanish Government, which at that time had been neutral, had not protested against it, it was not logical to make such an answer now in return for that hospitality.

43. The representative of Uruguay disagreed with the position taken by the United Kingdom Government. The Rock of Gibraltar was Spanish soil which should return to Spain, and the United Kingdom was not showing any goodwill in that respect.

44. When the Treaty of Utrecht had been signed in 1713, Spain had ceded the Rock to the United Kingdom but not the isthmus. The United Kingdom had no sovereignty over the isthmus because it had not lawfully acquired it in accordance with the rules of international law. For the humanitarian reasons which the representative of Spain had stated, the Spanish Government had permitted the United Kingdom to use that territory. Spain was now asking for the return of the territory, and by refusing to return it the Government of the United Kingdom was committing what could be described juridically as an act of usurpation. That was the reason for the incidents which had been denounced by Spain and which, incidentally, were more a matter for the Security Council than for the Special Committee or the Fourth Committee.

⁸ Official Records of the General Assembly, Eighteenth Session, Plenary Meetings, 1213th meeting.

45. The United Kingdom and Spain should stop discussing the problem in the United Nations and should enter into negotiations in London and Madrid. On the day when both finally declared that there were no longer any colonial territories in Europe, the British flag, after being lowered in Gibraltar, would be saluted by the whole world.

46. The representative of Tunisia expressed satisfaction that both parties had accepted the terms of General Assembly resolution 2070 (XX) and had shown themselves ready to continue negotiations. In the case of Gibraltar, it was a question of ensuring the full implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). The time had come for the United Kingdom to recognize the legitimacy of Spain's claims in asking for the return of a territory which belonged to it. His delegation would do everything in its power to help the parties to reach an agreement, the result of which could only be the recognition of Spain's rights over Gibraltar.

47. He joined the representative of Syria in asking the United Kingdom not to do anything which might obstruct negotiations and to take steps to prevent a repetition of the incidents caused by the presence of a British military base in Spanish territory.

48. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania pointed out that the problem of Gibraltar was a problem of decolonization. General Assembly resolution 2070 (XX) invited the Governments of Spain and of the United Kingdom to begin without delay the talks envisaged under the terms of the consensus adopted on 16 October 1964 by the Special Committee. The two Governments, however, were also requested to inform the Special Committee and the General Assembly, at its twenty-first session, of the outcome of their negotiations. Spain and the United Kingdom were now talking about the difficulties which they were encountering and they were not reporting any concrete results. It was therefore necessary to find some way of making progress in the negotiations. It might perhaps be possible for other States which were not directly concerned in the problem to intervene in the talks with a view to expediting them, since the United Kingdom and Spain seemed to be finding it very difficult to reach an agreement by themselves. Those delays had been harmful to the process of decolonization.

49. He added that if the parties to the present dispute wished to have recourse to the International Court of Justice, it was their own affair, but his country would not support any resolution which proposed the submission of a colonial problem to the Court.

50. The representative of Iran recalled that in resolution 2070 (XX) the General Assembly had taken into account the historical relationship of Gibraltar with Spain and, rather than merely referring to the wishes of the population, had adopted a particular procedure which was appropriate in cases where the original act of colonial annexation had entailed the separation of a portion of territory from the mother country—namely, that of recommending negotiations between the parties concerned. His delegation found it curious that, in the particular case of Gibraltar, the United Kingdom delegation should show such unusual concern for the wishes of the inhabitants. Although recourse to negotiations was the right course of action, the General Assembly still had a duty to keep a watch on the situation and, if the negotiations were unduly protracted, it should be ready to take steps to ensure the speedy implementation of resolution 1514 (XV).

51. The representative of Australia said that, in his delegation's view, the Committee must take into account not only the conflicting claims of two States to sovereignty over the Territory but also the fate of the 24,000 Gibraltarians.

52. The representative of Venezuela said that his delegation considered that the question of Gibraltar was a colonial problem and that General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) was applicable; nevertheless, decolonization must not be used as a pretext for acts disrupting the territorial integrity of any country. There had been unfortunate incidents such as the violation of Spanish air space and the United Kingdom was still hampering the negotiations. The Committee should stress the need for negotiations to continue and for decolonization to take place as speedily as possible. He would like those points to be covered in any resolution.

53. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that the United Kingdom had seized Gibraltar and turned it into a military base to buttress its policies in the Middle and Far East and other areas. Moreover, Gibraltar had recently become not merely a United Kingdom base but a foothold for the aggressive policies of the NATO military bloc and its united nuclear forces. The Spanish Government was not beyond condoning that development. A Reuters dispatch in July 1966 had said that the possibility of turning Gibraltar into a combined military base for NATO had been mooted during the negotiations on the Territory between the United Kingdom and Spain. The claims and counter-claims of sovereignty over the neutral strip and the use of the Gibraltar air base for military purposes were indicative of an agreement between colonialist Powers which menaced the peace and security of the whole area. The fact that the United Kingdom was exposing Gibraltar to an influx of military weapons constituted a threat not only to the people of Gibraltar but to other peoples in the region.

54. It was a matter for concern that, in statements on the progress of negotiations between Spain and the United Kingdom, there was hardly ever an indication that the liquidation of the military base in Gibraltar had been discussed. Spain talked about decolonization and the United Kingdom talked about the rights of the Gibraltarians to self-determination, but it was evident that the bargaining between the two Powers was contrary to the interests of the inhabitants. It was plain that neither side was making constructive proposals for a peaceful solution. His delegation favoured the demilitarization of the zone and the liquidation of the base. That was the only solution in keeping with the interests of the Spanish and other peoples in the area. It would also clear the way for the ending of the colonial status of Gibraltar on an equitable and constructive basis.

D. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

55. At the 480th meeting, the representative of Tunisia introduced a joint draft resolution on the question of Gibraltar (A/AC.109/L.356) on behalf of Chile, Iran, Iraq, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, the United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay and Venezuela.

56. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that his delegation had co-sponsored the draft resolution in a spirit of co-operation and compromise, but had some reservations about it. Firstly, Spain and the United Kingdom had not supplied sufficient details of their negotiations on the future of the Territory. His delegation would press for the fullest details of the progress of those negotiations when next the Committee took up the question, for it wanted to establish whether the positions of the two parties could be reconciled. He strongly supported operative paragraph 3, which called on Spain and the United Kingdom to report to the Special Committee as soon as possible. The Committee must have time to discuss the question in full and not hurriedly, as in the present instance.

57. His delegation would also have preferred the reference to certain acts in the final preambular paragraph of the draft resolution to be more specific. It was to be hoped, however, that Spain and the United Kingdom realized what acts were meant and would refrain from them and begin serious negotiations.

58. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated that since the draft resolution mentioned neither the need for the denuclearization of Gibraltar, nor the demilitarization of the zone, his delegation was unable to vote in favour of it.

59. The representative of Bulgaria said that his delegation, while sharing the desire of other delegations that agreement should be reached on the draft resolution, had some reservations on the substance of the problem. It was astonishing that neither the Spanish nor the United Kingdom representative had referred to the essence of the problem, which was the existence of a military base in Gibraltar. The base and its future could not be considered separately from the desire of the people of Gibraltar for self-determination. It was for that reason, and in deference to the right of the people of Gibraltar to self-determination, that his delegation would abstain in the vote on the draft resolution and would speak further on the question in the Fourth Committee.

60. The Special Committee then adopted the joint draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.356) by 16 votes to none, with six abstentions.

61. The representative of Australia, speaking in explanation of his vote, said that his delegation would have preferred adoption by consensus because, although it appreciated the efforts made by the sponsors of the draft resolution, it felt that a consensus would have allowed a number of delegations to reserve their position at the present stage and to state their views in the Fourth Committee, where the question would undoubtedly be discussed once again. Since that had not been the case, his delegation would abstain in the vote, without prejudice to any future position that it might adopt.

62. The representative of Poland said that since the draft resolution did not cover all the vital aspects of the problem, however, his delegation had been obliged to abstain, without prejudice to the position that it might take on the question in the Fourth Committee.

63. The representative of the United Kingdom said that his delegation had abstained because not all points in the resolution were acceptable and because he had had no time to obtain instructions from its Government.

64. With regard to the remarks of the representative of the Soviet Union, he pointed out that Gibraltar was not a NATO base.

65. The representative of the United States of America said that his delegation had abstained not because of the substance of the draft resolution but because it had not had time to consult its Government.

66. The text of the resolution (A/AC.109/216) adopted by the Special Committee at its 480th meeting on 17 November 1966 reads as follows:

"The Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

"Having examined the question of Gibraltar,

"Having heard the statements of the administering Power and the representative of Spain,

"Recalling General Assembly resolution 2070 (XX) of 16 December 1965 and the consensus adopted by the Special Committee on 16 October 1964 (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. X, para. 209),

"Recalling further General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960,

"Taking into account the noted willingness of the administering Power and of the Government of Spain to continue the present negotiations,

"Regretting the occurrence of certain acts which have prejudiced the smooth progress of these negotiations,

"1. Calls upon the two parties to refrain from any acts which will hamper the success of these negotiations;

"2. Regrets the delay in the process of decolonization and in the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) with regard to this Territory;

"3. Calls upon the two parties to continue their negotiations in a constructive way and to report to the Special Committee as soon as possible, and in any case, before the twenty-second session of the General Assembly;

"4. Requests the Secretary-General to assist in the implementation of the present resolution."

CHAPTER XII*

FRENCH SOMALILAND

A. INFORMATION ON THE TERRITORY

GENERAL

1. French Somaliland (Côte française des Somalis) on the eastern coast of Africa, lies round the Gulf of

*Previously issued under the symbol A/6300/Add.8.

Tadjourah, at the head of the Gulf of Aden, just outside the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb. It has an area of approximately 8,900 square miles (23,000 square kilometres) most of which is desert. The Territory has common frontiers with Ethiopia on the north, west and south-west and with the Republic of Somalia on the south-east. The coast line is about 800 kilometres in length, from Ras Doumeirah on the north to Loyada on the south.

2. The total population of the Territory was estimated at 81,000 in 1961 compared with 64,000 in 1955 and 53,000 in 1950.

3. In 1961 the population included three major groups—Danakils or Afars who numbered 30,000; Somalis, 24,000; and Arabs, 6,000. There was a French population of about 3,000 and also a population of foreign origin. Those from Aden, India, Madagascar, Greece and Italy numbered 5,000 approximately. A floating population accounted for the remainder.

4. Djibouti, the capital, had a population of about 41,000. It was composed of Arabs, Danakils, and Somalis of various groups, Frenchmen and foreigners. A few other population centres had a total of about 4,300 inhabitants. The remaining population was nomadic. It comprised Danakils inhabiting the north and west of the Territory and Issa Somalis who inhabit the south.

GOVERNMENT

Status

5. The first treaty between France and the Danakil chiefs was signed in Paris on 4 March 1862. By this treaty the Sultans of Tadjourah, Raheita and Gobaad ceded the territory of Obock to France. Several French companies were established during the following years. On 24 June 1884 the first French colonial administrator of the Territory of Obock was appointed.

6. On 21 September 1884, the Sultan of Tadjourah concluded a treaty with France for the cession of the territory of Tadjourah. Cessions of territory on the Gulf of Tadjourah were also made by the Sultan of Gobaad on 14 December 1884 and 2 January 1885.

7. On 26 March 1885, a French Protectorate over the region of Djibouti was established by a treaty concluded between France and the Issa chiefs of the region.

8. Djibouti became the capital and seat of government in 1892. By a decree of the French Government of 20 May 1896, the Territory was officially named "Côte française des Somalis et dépendances". It was administered by a Governor assisted by a Conseil d'administration.

Political and constitutional developments since the Second World War

9. A Conseil représentatif was introduced in 1945. The Council was composed of twelve elected and eight appointed members. Six members were elected by French citizens and six others by the Arab, Danakil and Somali electoral colleges which each elected two councillors.

10. The French Constitution of 1946 contained provisions to the effect that the Overseas Territories of the Republic would have elective territorial assemblies and would send representatives to the French Parliament and to the Assembly of the French Union.¹ French Somaliland was included among the Overseas Territories enumerated in the Law of 27 October 1946 which made provision for the constitution and election of the Assembly of the French Union.

¹ French citizenship, recognized by the Constitution, had been extended to the inhabitants of the Overseas Territories by the law of 7 May 1946.

11. An elective Conseil représentatif was established in French Somaliland in 1950. It was composed of twenty-five members of whom twelve were elected by citizens of French civil status and thirteen by citizens who had retained their personal civil status.²

12. The Loi-cadre of 23 June 1956, adopted by the French Legislature after consultation with the Assembly of the French Union, provided for the introduction of reforms in the Overseas Territories, including the granting of broadened deliberative powers to the territorial assemblies and the establishment of government councils. The Loi-cadre also established the electoral system based on universal suffrage of adults, irrespective of their personal status, and the single electoral college.

13. By the Law of 17 April 1957, the Territorial Assembly of French Somaliland was reorganized on the basis of universal suffrage; and elections were held for the new Assembly on 23 June 1957. The provisions of the Loi-cadre with regard to the establishment of a Government Council and the broadening of the powers of the Territorial Assembly were implemented by the Decree of 22 July 1957. Mr. Mahmoud Harbi was elected by the Assembly as the first Vice-President of the Government Council.

14. On 28 September 1958, the new French Constitution was the subject of a referendum in which the electorates of both Metropolitan France and the Overseas Territories participated. The constitutional text provided for the institution of the French Community. Overseas Territories which rejected the Constitution would become independent forthwith.

15. The Constitution provides that the Overseas Territories are territorial units of and an integral part of the French Republic. The Constitution also provides that the Overseas Territories may retain their status or may decide to become départements of the Republic or member States of the French Community. The decision was to be taken by the territorial assembly concerned within four months after the promulgation of the Constitution.

16. Mr. Harbi advised the electorate of French Somaliland to reject the Constitution. The results of the referendum, however, were 8,662 in favour (75.2 per cent of the votes cast), to 2,851 against. The French authorities suspended Mr. Harbi from his duties on 6 October 1958. On 9 October, two other ministers were suspended for taking part in banned demonstrations. The Territorial Assembly was dissolved and Mr. Harbi and his followers were defeated in new elections on 23 November. The newly elected Assembly determined on 11 December, by twenty-seven votes to four, to maintain French Somaliland as an Overseas Territory.

17. France first transmitted information on French Somaliland to the Secretary-General under Article 73 e of the Charter in 1946 and ceased to do so as from 1957 for reasons set forth in a letter dated 23 March 1959, transmitted to the Secretary-General by the Permanent Representative of France (see annex I).

Present political structure

18. The present political structure of the Territory was established by decrees issued in implementation of the Loi-cadre, in particular the Decree of 3 December 1956 (as amended by the Decree of 4 April 1957) and the Decree of 22 July 1957. Its main features are described below.

(a) Governor

(i) The Governor is the head of the Territory and the representative of the French Republic. He is appointed by the French Government. He is directly responsible for the administration of "State Services" (services d'Etat).

(ii) The list of State services may be summarized as follows: (1) services which represent the central power; (2) external affairs services; (3) general military and economic security services; (4) institutions and services ensuring respect for public freedoms, which include courts of French law, judicial police, labour inspectorate; (5) services maintaining and supervising external communications; and (6) services and establishments ensuring the solidarity of the constituent elements of the Republic, its economic, social and cultural expansion and its monetary and financial regulations (including Treasury services, financial control, planning services, higher education, broadcasting stations).

(b) Government Council

(i) The Government Council is composed of six to eight members who have the title of Minister and are elected by the Territorial Assembly from within or outside its membership. The senior minister has the title of Vice-President of the Government Council. However, the Council itself is normally presided over by the Governor. The ministers are assigned to their offices and may be removed therefrom on the proposal of the Vice-President of the Government Council. The Government Council may resign if it feels it no longer has the confidence of the Territorial Assembly. It may not be dissolved except by decree of the French Government after consultation with the Territorial Assembly. Normally it remains in office until a new Territorial Assembly is elected.

(ii) The Government Council, under the high authority of the Governor, is responsible for the administration of territorial interests. It draws up all matters to be submitted to the Territorial Assembly and adopts all orders to be issued by the Governor on territorial matters, including the organization of the territorial public services. However, if the Governor considers that a decision of the Government Council exceeds its powers or is likely to prejudice national defence, public order or the maintenance of security or public freedoms, he refers it to the French Government, which may annul it by decree. Decisions may also be appealed to the French Council of State, ruling as an administrative disputes court.

(iii) Each Minister is responsible to the Government Council for the territorial public services entrusted to his care.

(c) Territorial Assembly

(i) The Territorial Assembly consists of thirty-two members who are elected from seven multi-member electoral constituencies. In each constituency the vote, based on universal adult suffrage, is for a list of candidates and there is no proportional representation; nor is there a run-off if no list wins an absolute majority in the first election.

(ii) The Territorial Assembly holds two regular sessions annually, the second of which is a budget session. Under the Decree of 22 July 1957 the Assembly is empowered to take decisions in the form of territorial regulations on a long list of matters which include: the general organization of the territorial services; customary law; the public lands; internal trade; agriculture, forests, animal husbandry and fishing; methods of applying the regulations governing mineral resources; savings banks; public health; liquor control; tourism; town planning and housing; education (except higher education) not including study programmes and examinations; scholarships; sports; welfare and assistance; and the prison system. Decisions on such matters may be taken notwithstanding existing acts of the French Parliament and decrees to the contrary, except for a few specified laws and subject to the provisions of international conventions. The Assembly also takes decisions concerning the local section of programmes for implementing the Development Plan for the Overseas Territories. The Assembly has the power to determine taxes, duties and contributions of all kinds in aid of the Territorial budget.

(iii) Within a time-limit of thirty days following the receipt of a decision of the Territorial Assembly, the Chief Administrator of the Territory may request a second reading or he may request the French Government to annul it on the grounds of illegality. Decisions may also be annulled by the French Council of State if they are beyond the field of competence of the Assembly.

(iv) The Decree of 22 July 1957 did not modify the budgetary powers granted to the Territorial Assemblies by previous legislation, under which they vote the appropriations for the territorial services and the taxes necessary to defray them. Decisions in fiscal matters are subject to the same control on the grounds of illegality as other decisions. In addition, if a balanced budget has not been voted by the beginning of the year, the Governor is to establish the budget provisionally and, if necessary, definitively on the basis of the previous year's budget. A number of expenses are still obligatory, though the list was considerably reduced by the Decree of 4 April 1957. The customs tariff is also fixed by the Territorial Assembly. However, its decisions in the field of customs are submitted to the French Government for approval and may be annulled by decree, which must be subsequently confirmed by a law enacted by the French Parliament.

(d) Permanent Commission

(i) The Permanent Commission is composed of five to seven members of the Territorial Assembly and meets between the sessions of the Territorial Assembly in order to conduct the business delegated to it by that body.

(e) Representation in central organs of the French Republic

(i) French Somaliland is represented in the French Parliament by a Deputy and a Senator. It has also one representative on the French Economic and Social Council.

Elections

19. The Territory is divided into seven electoral constituencies. The last elections to the Territorial Assembly were held on 17 November 1963. Seventy-six per cent of the 21,408 registered voters went to the polls.

20. On 3 December 1963, the Territorial Assembly re-elected Mr. Ali Aref Bourhan as Vice-President of the Government Council by 27 votes out of 32; the remaining five ballots were considered invalid.

21. The Government Council is composed as follows:

Vice-President and Minister of Public Works and the Port ...Mr. Ali Aref Bourhan
Minister of FinanceMr. Raymond Pecoul
Minister of Internal Affairs ...Mr. Idriss Farah Abane Minister in charge of the Civil ServiceMr. Kamil Ali Mohamed
Minister of Public Health and Social AffairsMr. Hassan Mohamed Moyale
Minister of EducationMr. Hassan Gouled Abtidon
Minister of LabourMr. Abdi Ahmed Warsama Minister of Economic Affairs and the Development PlanMr. Abdoukadar Moussa Ali

22. At the election of the President of the French Republic held on 19 December 1965, the number of registered voters in French Somaliland was 30,385 of whom 26,363 (or 86.7 per cent) went to the polls. General de Gaulle, whose candidature was reportedly advocated by the Vice-President of the Government Council and the President of the Territorial Assembly, received 25,178 votes (or 95.6 per cent of the votes cast), and Mr. Mitterrand received 1,185 votes (or 4.4 per cent of the votes cast).³

Political parties

23. The main political organizations of the Territory are the following:

(a) Union démocratique Afar, of which Mr. Ali Aref Bourhan (Vice-President of the Government Council since 1960) and Mr. Orbisso Gaddito are prominent members;

(b) Union démocratique Issa, led by Mr. Hassan Gouled Abtidon, who is at present Minister of Education;

(c) Mouvement populaire, led by Mr. Obsieh Beuh.

24. On 20 September 1963, seven political leaders from the Territory, belonging to the three organizations, referred to above, were reported to have issued a statement in Paris in which they referred to "the weakness of the economic potential of the Territory and the great disproportion between its 80,000 inhabitants and the population of neighbouring States". They declared that French Somaliland was and should remain an integral part of the French Republic. They expressed their confidence in the Republic and the Chief of State, General de Gaulle "who would take all measures likely to promote the personality of the Territory". Finally, they rejected "with indignation the annexationist ambitions and territorial claims of foreign countries".

25. Five members of the Territorial Assembly, as well as a former President and a former Secretary, resigned from the Mouvement populaire in September 1964. They were said to be opposed to a statement issued by the political leaders in April 1964, in favour of maintaining the status quo in French Somaliland.

26. A fact-finding mission of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) visited the neighbouring States of Somalia and Ethiopia at the beginning of 1965 and heard refugees from French Somaliland including representatives of a movement known as the Front de libération de la Côte des Somalis (FLCS) (Somali Coast Liberation Front). No information is available on the outcome of the mission.

27. In addition to the FLCS, which has its headquarters in Mogadiscio, a second liberation movement called the Mouvement de libération de Djibouti (MLD) (Liberation Movement of Djibouti), is centred at Dire-Dawa in Ethiopia.

Judiciary

28. The judiciary is headed by the French Procureur de la République who is assisted by a deputy residing at Djibouti. In criminal matters, all inhabitants of the Territory are subject to the single jurisdiction of the High Court of Appeal, acting in its capacity as the sole criminal court. In civil and commercial matters, certain cases between indigenous parties are brought before the judges of Sharia law, the cadis.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

29. The economic activity of French Somaliland is chiefly commercial. Djibouti is an important centre for trade, mainly transit and entrepôt trade, as well as a refuelling station for ships passing through the Red Sea.

30. The economy of the Territory is dependent to a great extent on the Djibouti-Addis Ababa railway, construction of which was started in terms of a Treaty between Ethiopia and France in 1896 and completed in 1917. The total length of the line is 486 miles (784 kilometres) of which 60 miles (98 kilometres) are in French Somaliland. The Franco-Ethiopian Treaty of 12 November 1959, fixed the present ownership and administration of the railway. The main provisions of the Treaty are as follows:

(a) The Company to acquire Ethiopian nationality, with headquarters in Addis Ababa.

(b) The Company's capital, fixed at 4,325,000 Ethiopian dollars, to be apportioned equally between French and Ethiopian shareholders.

(c) The Company to be formed for a fixed period, terminating on 31 December 2016.

(d) The Company to be administered by a council of twelve members, nominated by a general meeting of shareholders.

(e) The general meeting to be composed of two groups of shareholders, the one French and the other Ethiopian.

(f) Each group to nominate six administrators, approved by their respective Governments.

31. The total share issue of the company is fixed at 34,600 shares. Of the Ethiopian holding, 15,570 shares are held by the Government of Ethiopia and 1,730 shares by the Commercial Bank; of the French shares, 9,483 are held by the Government of France and 7,817 by private enterprise.

32. Customs duties were abolished in 1949 and French Somaliland was declared a "free" Territory. In that year, the Territory was given a currency of its own, the Djibouti franc, which is tied to the United

States dollar; the note issue is 100 per cent covered by a reserve fund in United States dollars. The Djibouti franc is freely convertible in foreign currency.⁴

33. In 1964, 2,567 vessels of an aggregate tonnage of 12 million entered Djibouti, in comparison with 2,091 vessels of 8 million tons in 1960 and 1,415 vessels of 5 million tons in 1955.

34. When considering the volume of goods handled at Djibouti in the past, a distinction should be made between supplies for shipping, transit traffic to and from Ethiopia and the trade of the Territory itself. Re-exports of petroleum products and other fuels for supply to ships amounted to 1.5 million tons in 1964, compared with 899,000 tons in 1960 and 595,000 tons in 1955. The traffic of merchandise amounted to 281,000 tons in 1964, compared to 313,000 tons in 1963, 216,000 tons in 1960 and 205,000 tons in 1955. Transit traffic to and from Ethiopia represented about 85 per cent of the total traffic of merchandise in 1964.

35. It has been reported that the Vice-President of the Government Council met with the President of the French Republic as well as the French Prime Minister in Paris in January 1966. With the latter, he discussed the need for accelerated completion of additional fuelling berths at Djibouti to relieve overflow traffic from Aden, and additional water wells to overcome the effects of prolonged drought on nomads in the hinterland.

36. Agriculture in the Territory is very limited, owing to insufficient rainfall. Cultivable land has been estimated at not more than 6,500 hectares and irrigation cannot be practised on a wide scale. The nomadic population, which was estimated at about 35,000 in 1961 is occupied in raising livestock in scattered and shifting pastures.

37. Most consumer goods are imported from France, Ethiopia, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the Netherlands, Italy, the United States of America and Asian countries. Imports were valued at 2,877 million Djibouti francs in 1960. Services and tourism were the major items of revenue which, with special trade exports, mainly hides and cattle, amounted to 1,431 million Djibouti francs in the same year.

38. Transit trade to and from Ethiopia totalled 26,000 million Djibouti francs in 1964.

39. The Territorial Assembly, at its budget session from 9 December 1965 to 4 January 1966, adopted the territorial budgets projects for 1966. The ordinary budget amounts to 1,912 million Djibouti francs and the extraordinary budget amounts to 196 million Djibouti francs. The territorial budget for 1961 amounted to 1,134 million Djibouti francs. The Territory receives French aid through the Fonds d'Investissement pour le Développement Economique et Social (FIDES). Under the Development Plan being implemented, 1,800 million Djibouti francs have recently been allocated by France for the development of the port of Djibouti.

SOCIAL CONDITIONS

Labour

40. Labour legislation is contained in the Labour Code of 15 December 1952⁵ and the ordinances of 31 December 1953. The Inspectorate of Labour and Social Legislation was established in 1952, the Labour Tribunal was set up in 1953 and the Manpower Bureau in 1954.

41. Labour disputes are first dealt with by the conciliation machinery of the Labour Inspectorate. If this fails, the dispute is taken before a conseil d'arbitrage.

42. In 1965, there were four employers' organizations and seven labour unions. In 1956 the labour force was distributed as follows: 12,570 were employed in the money economy and some 12,000 were engaged in traditional agriculture. Those in the money economy included 8,784 wage earners, of whom 2,340 were in the public sector and 6,444 in the private sector. Out of the 6,444 persons employed by the private sector, 2,000 were foreigners.

Public health

43. Public health services are under the authority of the Minister of Health and Social Welfare. The main hospital at Djibouti was completed with the aid of FIDES credits. The hospital has 600 beds and provides general medical and surgical services as well as specialized services. It has radiological and bacteriological laboratories and a pharmacy. There are also two urban polyclinical dispensaries and an anti-tuberculosis dispensary. In the interior of the Territory four multi-purpose dispensaries extend medical care to the inhabitants of the main localities. A mobile unit provides medical care to the nomadic population.

EDUCATIONAL CONDITIONS

44. Public primary education is financed from the territorial budget and private education is subsidized. The Metropolitan Government has assumed financial responsibility for secondary and technical education. Subventions for building of schools are granted by FIDES. There are schools in Djibouti and in the principal towns of the administrative circonscriptions. Education is free but not compulsory. The school enrolment ratio was reported to be 40 per cent in 1964, compared with 33 per cent in 1963. Figures for the school-age population are not available. The curriculum is that of metropolitan schools adapted to local conditions.

45. In 1964, primary education was provided at fourteen public and six private schools; secondary education was provided at two public and two private schools; and technical education was given at two public and five private schools.

46. In 1964, the school enrolment was: 4,014 pupils in primary education; 446 in secondary education; and 337 in technical education.

RECENT EVENTS

Incidents of 25 and 26 August 1966

47. Serious disturbances are reported to have occurred during the visit of President de Gaulle to Djibouti on 25 and 26 August. Large numbers of demonstrators waving banners and chanting "Independence" were said to have been present at the airport and in the streets. Subsequently violent clashes broke out between demonstrators and the security forces. President de Gaulle cancelled a planned open-air speech.

48. Speaking before the Territorial Assembly of the Territory, President de Gaulle said: "The banners we have seen and the agitation of those who were carrying them are not sufficient to express the democratic will of this French Territory. It is possible that one day, by democratic means, the Territory will express a different opinion from that which it has expressed up to now... If therefore one day—everything is conceivable—by regular and democratic means the Territory were to express a different opinion as regards its destiny, France would take note of it...”

49. It was reported that the Ministers of Labour, Education and Internal Affairs of the Territory, had announced their resignations.

Events following the incidents of 25 and 26 August 1966

50. The incidents resulted in casualties estimated by Mr. Pierre Billotte, French Minister of State for Overseas Departments and Territories as four dead and seventy wounded (half of the latter among the security forces). Mr. Billotte, speaking over the Djibouti radio on 29 August, stated that foreign elements had played on the feelings of discontent of those who felt that the local Council of Government was acting only in the interests of a part of the population. There was need to assure a better equilibrium between ethnic groups.

51. Mr. Billotte went on to say that feelings must be calmed down but that there was no question of repression. The balance in the Government Council must be restored. The Territory's status could evolve by peaceful means. The French Government could be led to realize that there was a change among the people. France would certainly not stay by force in French Somaliland, but France would recognize the will of the people only as manifested by legal means.

52. On 31 August it was announced that Mr. Ali Aref Bourhan, Vice-President of the Council of Government, would leave for Paris. Mr. Bourhan left on 2 September ostensibly to attend a meeting of the French Economic and Social Council. On his departure, his post was taken over in an acting capacity by Mr. Hassan Gouled Abtidon, a Minister of Somali origin, who had resigned on 29 August, but who had been persuaded to remain in office.

53. On 9 September it was announced that Mr. René Tirant had been replaced as Governor of French Somaliland by Mr. Louis Saget.

Incident of 14 September and subsequent security measures

54. Further serious incidents were reported to have broken out in Djibouti on 14 September. Four police stations were sacked and set on fire by mobs. The police intervened using grenades. A curfew was imposed. At least one death was said to have occurred.

55. On 17 September, it was reported that, according to official sources, the recent disturbances had caused five deaths. The demonstrators claimed, on the contrary, that there had been twenty-one deaths.

56. Following the renewed disturbances, the forces of order were said to have carried out many verifications of identity and to have expelled to the Somali Republic foreigners whose situation was irregular. Some 800 persons were reported to have been deported, while 18 suspects had been brought before the courts, charged mainly with looting and 726 persons had been held. Military vehicles were patrolling the streets, but the situation was said to be calmer.

57. The opposition parties were reported to be protesting to the new Governor against the brutal methods used by the forces of order.

58. On 20 September, the Governor announced that the length of the curfew had been reduced. The verification of papers was proceeding and a further 164 people had been expelled, while 308 others had left voluntarily.

59. On 23 September, the Djibouti radio announced that the curfew had been lifted and that the scrutinizing of papers had ceased.

60. On 28 September it was reported that troops had been withdrawn from the city and that the situation had eased perceptibly.

Statement by President de Gaulle and announcement of a referendum

61. On 15 September, President de Gaulle, meeting with his ministers following his return to France, was reported by a spokesman as having said: “The population must know what it wants and then say so by democratic means; France will know what conclusions to draw. We lived without Djibouti for a long time. We have obligations towards our compatriots and we are ready to assume them and to continue to play our part. But if the people want to separate from us, France will not place any obstacles in their way”.

62. On 21 September following a meeting of the French Council of Ministers it was announced that in view of the internal and external situation of French Somaliland and having regard to the provisions which could be made by law with regard to its status and destiny in relation to the general interest of the Republic, in application of title 2 of the Constitution the Government had decided that the people of the Territory would be directly consulted on that subject by means of a referendum before 1 July 1967. The draft law concerning that consultation would be laid before Parliament.

63. Mr. Billotte, Minister for Overseas Departments and Territories, meeting with the Press after the announcement, said that if French Somaliland chose to build its future with France, some changes could be made in its present status of an Overseas Territory. If, on the other hand, it chose independence, the population must understand that that would be the end of co-operation with France and that there would be no more military, economic or financial aid from France. The Minister explained that the terms of the referendum would not be finally decided upon until the representatives of the people had been consulted. The Government Council would have its say, but it would first have to be recognized and include representatives of all parties.

64. On hearing of the announcement, Mr. Hassan Goulet Abtidon, Acting Vice-President of the Council of Government, declared that he was not surprised by the President's proposal, but would have preferred that the National Assembly in Paris and the Territorial Assembly in Djibouti should have discussed it and consulted with each other about it before the French Council of Ministers accepted it. Mr. Hassan Gouled added that every man was duty bound to consider the proposal carefully.

65. Mr. Sahatdjian, President of the Territorial Assembly, while maintaining that the demonstrations did not reflect the aims of the majority of the people, said that a referendum was the only democratic road by which the country could make clear what it wanted.

66. Mr. Moussa Ahmad Idriss, the Opposition Leader, stated that the Opposition parties were greatly pleased by Mr. Billotte's statement. If asked in the referendum whether they wanted to be French or be independent, they would choose independence and take the consequences.

B. CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE⁶ INTRODUCTION

67. The Special Committee considered French Somaliland at its 429th and 430th meetings held in Mogadiscio and its 438th meeting held in Addis Ababa between 2 and 8 June 1966.

68. During its consideration of this item, the Special Committee had before it, in addition to the petitions listed below, two memoranda on French Somaliland, addressed to the Special Committee by the Government of Somalia (annex II) and the Government of Ethiopia (annex III) on 25 May 1965 and 8 June 1965 respectively.

Participation by the representative of Somalia in the work of the Special Committee

69. In a letter dated 1 June 1966 (A/AC.109/172), the Chef de Cabinet in the Office of the Prime Minister of Somalia requested permission for a Somali delegation to participate in the Special Committee's consideration of French Somaliland during its meetings in Mogadiscio. At its 429th meeting, the Special Committee decided, without objection, to accede to this request.

70. Participation by a Somali delegation in the Special Committee's consideration of this item during its meetings in Addis Ababa was requested in a letter dated 4 June 1966 (A/AC.109/172/Add.1), addressed to the Chairman of the Special Committee by the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Somalia. At its 438th meeting the Special Committee decided, without objection, to grant this request.

WRITTEN PETITIONS AND HEARINGS

71. The Special Committee circulated the following petitions concerning French Somaliland:

A/AC.109/PET.485

72. At its 429th and 430th meetings, held at Mogadiscio on 2 and 3 June 1966 respectively, the Special Committee heard Messrs. Abdillahi Ardeye Abane, Djama Mahamoud Sultan, Omar Ahmed Youssouf, Osman Aden Youssouf, Abdillahi Waber Kalif, Ibrahim Taher and Djama Farah Abdi, representatives, Front de libération de la Côte des Somalis (FLCS).

73. Mr. Djama Mahamoud Sultan (FLCS) said that for thousands of years his country had been free, sovereign and united, but in the nineteenth century it had been occupied by force. The invasion of Somaliland by France had been followed by a series of treaties concluded with certain corrupt sultans and tribal chiefs. In 1862 the first treaties signed with representatives of the Sultan of Raheita and Tadjoura had given France the right to use the anchorage at Obock and the coast between Ras Doumeira and Ras Ali. In 1884, under the threat of armed intervention, the Sultan of Tadjoura had been obliged to sign a deed making over the territories of Ras Ali, Saguello and Goubet-el-Kharab to France. Another treaty transforming the Convention of Friendship and Trade of 9 April 1884 into a gift of land had been extracted from the Sultan of Gobad on 2 January 1885. In March 1885, the Chiefs of the confederation of Issa tribes, misled by seductive promises, had signed a treaty of friendship, as a result of which French troops had occupied Ras Djibouti.

74. French Somaliland provided access to the Near and Far East, Europe and Africa. Its economy was based mainly on stock-breeding, the traffic of its port, which was one of the most modern on the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean, rail traffic and traffic through the international aerodrome of Djibouti. The country was rich in minerals, although they were not being exploited. The greater part of the population lived by raising livestock (camels, goats, sheep and cattle). The policy of the French Government was to keep the indigenous inhabitants out of the economic life of the country. The entire economy was in the hands of large French companies. Small business was reserved for foreigners who had settled in the country; the indigenous population provided cheap labour.

75. In order to keep the people dependent, the colonialist French Government had refused to take any interest in cultural development. There was no institution of higher education in the country, and secondary education was almost non-existent. Less than 1 per cent of the population went to school. Children were not entitled to continue their studies after the age of twelve. Only 1 per cent of the indigenous candidates were allowed to sit for examinations, because the colonial Administration wanted to limit the number of indigenous graduates. It was worth noting that during more than a century of domination, only some twenty indigenous students had been able to continue their education in France. There was still only one Somali in the country with a higher education degree. The number of those with a secondary education diploma was not more than thirty.

76. As far as public health was concerned, French Somaliland had only one hospital. The chief town in each region had one dispensary. The hospital had two quite different classes of accommodation. The first was a de luxe class provided with all the necessary equipment; it was reserved for settlers and rich foreigners who had established themselves in the country. The second consisted of a few ten-bed wards, which represented the so-called free social services. Infectious and contagious patients, including those with tuberculosis, were not isolated from the others. Patients in the second-class section, when they did not die, often left the hospital with infectious diseases because of the insanitary condition of the wards and the lack of care and food. At that very moment, hundreds of Somali citizens were dying in an epidemic of smallpox which was spreading through the country, particularly among the nomads, who had no medical care. In order to allow the epidemic to spread, the colonial Administration, instead of putting the nomads in quarantine, expelled those who went to the towns to seek treatment.

77. Tuberculosis was ravaging the population of French Somaliland. At that time, the incidence of tuberculosis was 10 per cent among the urban population, who were underfed and lived in deplorable conditions. The poverty and the ravages of the disease were such that it was by no means rare to see adults weighing slightly more than sixty pounds. The families of the sick generally lived in the utmost destitution, and many children in French Somaliland had been abandoned and were hungry because their fathers could not find work. According to the French Government's official statistics, 30 per cent of the children up to the age of six years and 80 per cent up to the age of sixteen years had a positive reaction on skin tests. French Somaliland had the highest tuberculosis rate in the world, with 16 per cent of the population suffering from the disease.

78. As regards judicial matters, there were sixteen prisons in French Somaliland, not to mention the concentration camps in which thousands of prisoners were kept permanently. It was noteworthy that none of the prisoners were of European origin. Since the beginning of French colonization, and although the Europeans committed all kinds of crimes daily, none of them had ever appeared on the lists of those committed to jail.

79. In the political sphere, the colonialist French Government followed a dictatorial and military policy, a policy of extermination, oppression and inequality, which kept the population in poverty and ignorance. It refused to give work to the élite, passed arbitrary sentences on politicians and trade-union and religious leaders, ordered mass expulsions of citizens and organized raids to find people for the concentration camps. On the other hand, foreign immigrants, particularly from Europe, were encouraged. They were offered employment and were even given civil rights so that they would maintain the French presence in French Somaliland. The result was that over 20,000 former inhabitants of French Somaliland had taken refuge in other countries, where they lived in wretched conditions and were dying from lack of food and medical care. That had been confirmed by the OAU Commission which had been set up in January 1965 to investigate the situation of French Somaliland refugees.

80. At the present time French Somaliland was in a state of siege. All nationalist organizations, whether political, trade-union or even youth organizations, were banned and their active members were harassed and persecuted. Mr. Obsieh Beuh, the President of the Parti du Mouvement populaire, and five members of his Committee had been sentenced to ten years on a prison farm. The entire population lived under the threat of the forces of the gendarmerie and the Foreign Legion. There was in every district a station of the gendarmerie, which had full power to imprison citizens and carry out searches without a warrant. Nomads, who often came into town to visit relatives or make purchases, were arrested and, after serving their sentences, expelled. Somali citizens had a great deal of difficulty in getting identity cards or residence permits, whereas foreigners could obtain them easily.

81. France had transformed the country into a vast military base with a concentration of more than 40,000 soldiers (Foreign Legion, marines, airmen) who had been driven out of Algeria and other former French colonies. The base was not only a great danger for French Somaliland but also a threat to the whole of Africa and to world peace. Recently, some twenty citizens had died after touching electrified barbed wire at the gates of the capital.

82. French Somaliland had a puppet Territorial Assembly and Governing Council. The Governing Council was presided over by the French Governor, a direct representative of the Minister for Overseas France, while the President of the Territorial Assembly was a naturalized Frenchman of Armenian descent. Contrary to the claims made by France, the members of the Assembly and the Governing Council had no power except to execute orders issued by the colonial Administration.

83. In the 1958 referendum, the Basic Law (Loi-cadre) of 1956, which now governed certain French colonies, had been imposed on French Somaliland by means of a formidable radio and press campaign and through corruption and intimidation and the falsification of the elections. Upon learning of the high percentage of "no's" (the highest after Guinea), despite all the effort deployed to get "yes's", the colonialist Government had dissolved the Territorial Assembly—which had maintained its confidence in Mr. Mahamoud Harbi, the Vice-President of the Governing Council, who had campaigned for "no", i.e., for independence—and had imprisoned all those on the "no" side, who had included government ministers, councillors and trade-union leaders.

84. There were no real elections in French Somaliland, but merely appointments. The opposition parties and any persons who showed so-called "anti-French" sentiments were not permitted to stand as candidates. The elections, moreover, took place under the shadow of bayonets and automatics.

85. On the occasion of the most recent elections, in November 1963, the French Government had dispatched 5,000 sailors to French Somaliland on board a squadron consisting of the anti-aircraft cruiser Grasse, as flagship, the aircraft carrier Foch, the flotilla leader Cassard, the rapid escort vessels Picard, Gascon and Provençal, the squadron escorts Bourdannaïs, Kersaint and Vauquelin, the supply tanker La Saine, the logistic support vessel Le Rhin and the submarine Daphné. In addition, two escort gunboats, the Commandant Bory and the Doudart de Lagrée, which had not been part of the squadron, had joined it at Djibouti. The colonialist Government, however, had dared to announce that the people of French Somaliland had themselves chosen in 1958 to remain tied to France! General de Gaulle, on the other hand, during an official visit to Djibouti on 3 July 1959, had stated: "France, whatever happens, will never part with French Somaliland, because of its strategic and commercial importance".

86. The FLCS, a revolutionary and popular organization fighting for the freedom and independence of French Somaliland, wished to take the opportunity afforded it to tell the Committee how anxious the people of French Somaliland were to free themselves completely from the colonial régime. In the meanwhile, it called upon France to respect General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and the right of peoples to self-determination.

87. The FLCS was convinced that the barbarous methods used by the French Government could not thwart the just struggle of the Somali people for recognition of their lawful rights as set forth in the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. It accordingly appealed to all States to recognize the lawfulness of its struggle, to give it the moral and material aid it needed and to condemn the colonial policy of France and its persistent refusal to apply resolution 1514 (XV). It also asked the Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees and the specialized agencies of the United Nations to give assistance to refugees from French Somaliland and requested the Committee to invite the United Nations to set up a commission to inquire into the situation in French Somaliland. The Committee might also bring pressure to bear on the French Government to grant French Somaliland full independence immediately, to respect the territorial integrity of the country, to evacuate its military bases, to free all wrongfully imprisoned political, trade-union and religious leaders, to amnesty all politicians and refugees in exile and permit them to return to the country and to restore democratic freedoms so that national organizations could freely pursue their activities.

88. In answer to questions from members of the Special Committee, Mr. Djama Mahamoud Sultan said that Europeans represented approximately 10 per cent of the total population and that the percentage was increasing steadily. The European population included Greeks, Italians and Armenians, but was predominantly French. Most of the French were military personnel. There were also officials and some new settlers who were "pieds noirs" expelled from Algeria. The French Government encouraged foreign immigration. Somalis, on the other hand, were continually being expelled from the Territory. There was a total of 40,000 foreign military personnel and 10,000 foreign civilians in the country.

89. All political parties and trade-union groups had been prohibited. FLCS was forced to operate from abroad, but it had the full support of the population. Moreover, it had been recognized by the Liberation Committee of the Organization of African Unity (OAU). The Front de libération de la Côte des Somalis was founded in June 1963 at Mogadiscio. It was composed of former members of the Territorial Assembly, trade unionists, members of the dissolved political parties and refugees. At the time of the 1958 referendum, almost all of them had been expelled from the Territory for having campaigned in favour of the reply "No" in that referendum.

90. Concerning the existence of movements other than FLCS, seeking to bring about a change in the Territory's status, the petitioner said that all political parties and all trade-union organizations had been banned in French Somaliland. The leaders of the Parti du Mouvement populaire, which had formerly been the only opposition party, had been imprisoned. At the time of the visit to Djibouti by the Minister for Overseas France in 1961, the Mouvement populaire had organized a large demonstration and submitted petitions to the Minister. It had, moreover, sent representatives to France to ask the French authorities for independence for French Somaliland. Thus, the French Government was well aware of the aims of the Mouvement, and that was why the latter had been banned.

91. The petitioner said that it was impossible to determine the composition of the electoral lists in French Somaliland. Although it was contended that the elections were held by universal suffrage, they were in fact rigged, since any Frenchman passing through French Somaliland could vote there, whereas everything possible was done to prevent the indigenous population from voting. In the elections of 17 November 1963, for example, the French Government had sent 5,000 sailors to Djibouti to take part. The Territory was divided into four constituencies: Djibouti, with fourteen Council members; Ali Sabieh, with two; Dikil, with five, and Tadjoura Obock, with eleven. Each constituency was subdivided into districts; the Djibouti constituency, for example, had four districts: a European district (with four members), two districts for the native quarter (one with three members and one with four) and a suburban district (with two members).

92. With reference to his previous statement that there was a state of siege in French Somaliland, the petitioner said that all the frontiers were closed. The indigenous population could neither enter nor leave. Screening procedures and road-blocks were set up by the Army and the police, who even had the right to make searches without a warrant.

93. Referring to the concentration camps mentioned above, the petitioner said that in each district or cercle of French Somaliland there were concentration camps called "penitentiary camps". The ill-treatment to which the prisoners were subjected was strangely reminiscent of Nazi practices. French Somaliland had six such camps, guarded by the Foreign Legion. The prisoners worked from dawn till dusk and were subjected to the most degrading harassment. It went without saying that the food was quite inadequate. Many prisoners died every week from the brutality to which they were subjected and from the lack of care.

94. Referring to the labour situation, the petitioner said that the best-paid indigenous workers did not receive for the same work even 20 per cent of the wages of a European worker. For example, a white mechanic was paid 90,000 Djibouti francs a month, whereas his Somali counterpart was paid only 15,000. Where a skilled white worker was paid 200,000 Djibouti francs, a Somali received only 20,000 francs for the same work. Somalis had quite menial occupations, such as those of road-sweeper or barman. In Djibouti, they were dockers. Their working conditions were regulated by a so-called collective agreement, but in reality the employers themselves fixed wage levels, since the trade-union leaders were all in prison.

95. Concerning education, the petitioner said that although France had done nothing to educate the Somali people, the latter had an Arabic culture, and the number of illiterates was relatively small. UNESCO had never undertaken any literacy work in the country.

96. In reply to questions from the Committee members, Mr. Abdillahi Ardeye Abane said that, as was stated in the document submitted by FLCS, the Basic Law had come into force in 1956. It had been a reform affecting all French overseas territories and had therefore not been imposed. The 1958 referendum, on the other hand, had been a product of the Gaullist régime and the result of a gigantic campaign of intimidation and trickery. Two days before the elections, French vessels had put in at Djibouti under the pretext of holding manoeuvres in the Red Sea, so that the votes of their crews would distort the results. During the election campaign, moreover, whenever a political leader who favoured voting "no" had held a meeting, the Administration had had aircraft fly overhead or sent armoured cars in order to drown out his words. When the population had learned that such despicable methods were being used, it had organized a large demonstration, after which Mahmoud Harbi, Vice-President of the Governing Council, three ministers and a member of the Council had been imprisoned.

97. The status of French Somaliland, he added, was comparable to that of Angola and Mozambique; the administration was entirely in the hands of the French, supported by a powerful army which oppressed and tortured the Somalis. It was thus a colonial administration in the full sense of the word.

98. As to the colonial Administration's education policy, there were one or two primary schools in each cercle. In addition, at Djibouti there were several primary schools and one secondary school which had been set up in 1963. Only 2,000 Somalis, or less than 1 per cent, attended school. The Colonial Administration took care not to train personnel, in order to limit the number of Somali teachers and leave room for the French. In addition, it paid Somali teachers very badly, so as not to encourage recruitment.

99. Regarding the economy of the Territory, the petitioner said that Djibouti was a very important town from the economic and social standpoint because of its geographical situation. It was a port of transit to the Middle East, with modern facilities, and its docks had the highest reputation in the world for their work. Some 350 vessels put in there every month. Unfortunately, the people did not benefit in any way from that economic activity, as the commercial companies, banks and even small businesses were in foreign hands. The two big French banks at Djibouti, for example, did not extend any credit to the people of the Territory but did everything possible to help immigrants, both Frenchmen and others.

100. Mr. Omar Ahmed Youssouf, in answer to questions from members of the Committee, said that there was no plan for the settlement of nomads. The Administration tried, on the contrary, to get rid of them by expelling them from the Territory. As they had no identity papers, they were considered aliens and arrested as soon as they entered the towns. In addition, the Foreign Legion denied the nomads access to wells, thus forcing them to move elsewhere in search of other sources of water.

101. At its 438th meeting, held at Addis Ababa on 8 June, the Special Committee heard Mr. Ahmed

Bourhan, Secretary-General of the Mouvement de libération de Djibouti (MLD), and other members of this organization.

102. Mr. Ahmed Bourhan recalled that the MLD had already submitted a petition and a memorandum to the Special Committee at its preceding session and indicated that the situation in Djibouti had changed little since. The people of Djibouti, who suffered under the colonial yoke, yearned for freedom, but had not yet taken up arms because they still hoped that, in view of the pressure which the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity could bring to bear on France, the question of Djibouti would be solved by peaceful means through the exercise of self-determination by the people of the Territory. He urged the Special Committee to try one last approach to France, which was a Member of the United Nations, and to take an unequivocal decision on the Djibouti question.

103. In reply to the question from members of the Special Committee Mr. Ahmed Bourhan said that after the 1958 referendum, all the French colonies that had voted "yes" had been able freely to exercise their right to self-determination and had now become independent States. That had not been the case with Djibouti.

104. The 1958 referendum had unquestionably been dishonest. However, even supposing that it had not been and that the people had really answered "yes", Djibouti should have been able thereafter to exercise its right to self-determination, like the other African countries which, with the exception of Guinea, had all voted "yes". He did not know the exact number of voters. In the 1958 referendum, there had been approximately 6,500 "yes" votes and 2,500 "no" votes. The French soldiers and their families had indeed voted in Djibouti in 1958 and had taken part in all the following elections.

105. The MLD had been established in 1964. Its headquarters was at Dire Dawa, in Ethiopia, near the frontier of the Territory of Djibouti, which facilitated contacts with the people of the Territory. The MLD was fighting for independence, had already obtained some results, and intended to continue its struggle until that objective was accomplished.

106. Referring to conditions in the Territory, the petitioner said that the French were sending more and more troops to Djibouti and were attempting to paralyse the people completely. Every day Africans were thrown into prison, discharged from their jobs or expelled from the Territory, either under a court decision or simply on the initiative of the police or the gendarmes. Almost all the people who were genuinely indigenous to the Territory were nomads and lived in the bush with their flocks. The French Government did nothing for them; it had not built a dam or developed any water resources. The new hospitals in Djibouti were situated at the town of Djibouti itself or in the chief towns of the cercles and were intended not for the local population but for Europeans. The situation with respect to schools was similar. All the indigenous inhabitants were Moslems and were sent to the Moslem religious school from the age of six onwards. At about nine or ten years of age, they entered the French school, which they were compelled to leave when they reached twelve or fourteen years of age on the pretext that they were too old. The indigenous population of Djibouti, thus deprived of any secondary education, was forced into unemployment. Up to the present, only one indigenous inhabitant had succeeded in obtaining a secondary school education. In addition, the French Government did everything in its power to undermine the Moslem religion and religious education.

GENERAL STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

107. The representative of Somalia said that the Government of the Somali Republic had taken the initiative in requesting that the question of French Somaliland should be placed on the Special Committee's agenda, since it was fully satisfied that it was a Non-Self-Governing Territory to which General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960 applied and since, as a Member of the United Nations, the Somali Republic had a special responsibility to ensure that the resolution was applied to Territories inhabited by Somali people under colonialist rule. The Somali Government was not alone in that view. The Declaration adopted by the Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries at Cairo in October 1964, called upon the French Government "to take the necessary steps to enable French Somaliland to become free and independent in accordance with paragraph 5 of resolution 1514 (XV) of the United Nations".

108. The Somali Government's memorandum (annex II) briefly described the present constitutional status of the Territory in order to show, beyond any doubt, that it was non-self-governing. Its position, in short, was that of a colony. Such autonomy as had been conferred upon it was limited to internal territorial services and did not comprise any of the essential aspects of self-government such as defence, foreign relations, the judiciary, public safety and security, finance and higher education. Moreover, even that very limited internal autonomy was in the hands of political organs under French control.

109. The referendum taken in 1958 admittedly resulted in an affirmative vote, as a result of which French Somaliland acquired the status of an Overseas Territory; but to call that an expression of self-determination was ludicrous. Out of a population of 70,000 to 80,000 in 1958, the electoral register listed only 15,833, 8,661 of whom had voted in the affirmative. The French Army alone could muster more than 5,000 votes, not counting wives; therefore, it should not be assumed that the vote represented the wishes of the people. In 1958, the French Government had promised that the affirmative vote would not be a barrier to future political freedom. The Deputies of French Somaliland had asked in the French National Assembly, not once but many times, that the Territory be granted self-government. On each occasion the French Government had taken no action at all. Members of the Special Committee could, if they so wished, be provided with full particulars on the facts he had mentioned.

110. If the Special Committee was satisfied—and he was confident that it would be—that French Somaliland fell within its jurisdiction, then the only conclusion to be drawn was that the Territory would have to be liberated from French control. However, there were obviously two different questions to be faced.

111. The first related to the means by which the Territory could be liberated. His Government urged the Special Committee to utilize every available moral and material resource and it formally pledged its full support towards that end.

112. It was his view that the Special Committee could also count upon the co-operation of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) and, in particular, of the Liberation Committee. Somalia was a member of that Committee and its assistance and influence there could be fully pledged. All OAU members would surely agree that the Liberation Committee was a valuable instrument for assisting the Special Committee in any policies which it might establish. Similarly, no OAU member would wish to see the Special Committee in any way renounce its responsibility for French Somaliland because it was on the Liberation Committee's agenda. That had not been done in the case of other African Territories and, he trusted, would not be done in the case of French Somaliland. There were very practical reasons for that. In the first place, the OAU's capacity to influence France—a non-member—was necessarily more limited than that of the United Nations, of which France was a Member. Furthermore, there was a second practical difficulty facing the Liberation Committee arising from the status, policies and activities of the long-established Front de libération de la Côte des Somalis (FLCS) and a newly founded liberation front which had recently appeared in Ethiopia.

113. Since the Special Committee was to hear evidence from the two organizations and would require every assistance in weighing the evidence, he would comment upon the origins of both.

114. The FLCS, created in June 1963, operated from Mogadiscio in complete independence of the Somali Government. It had regular publications and frequent contacts with the people of French Somaliland, and had been represented both at the OAU conference and at that of the non-aligned countries; it had submitted memoranda to both the Liberation Committee and to the Special Committee itself. It might be recalled that, during the Special Committee's African session in 1965, a cable had been received from Mr. Obsieh Beuh, the leader of the Mouvement populaire, in which he had informed the Committee that the FLCS was the only lawful representative of the people of French Somaliland outside the country. That cable had been smuggled out of a French prison—where Mr. Beuh now enjoyed, for the second time, the dubious hospitality of the French authorities as a result of his political activities. His party, the Mouvement populaire, had been banned by the French Government and 105 of its members had been arrested. Members of the Special Committee might have read of those matters in a communiqué issued by the FLCS on 5 June 1965. The FLCS was therefore a well-established, effectively functioning movement, which was recognized as the only liberation front for French Somaliland and received assistance in that capacity from the Liberation Committee. That had been the position until the eve of the visit of an OAU fact-finding commission to Ethiopia in January 1965, at which time a new "Liberation Front" suddenly materialized, called the Mouvement de libération de Djibouti (MLD), of which no one had previously heard, with its headquarters in Addis Ababa. He regretted to have to say that the Somali Government regarded that as an organization set up by the Ethiopian Government for the precise purpose of destroying the effectiveness of FLCS.

115. The members of the Special Committee might ask how the Ethiopian Government, as a member of the Liberation Committee, pledged both to the recognition of FLCS and to the principle of one front, could reconcile its obligations in that capacity with the establishment of a second front in Addis Ababa. That was a question which was still being asked by the Somali Government. However, while the morality was obscure, the reasons were obvious. It could be seen from the communiqué and memoranda of FLCS that it disagreed emphatically with the policy and claims of the Ethiopian Government. The Ethiopian Government was not really interested in the liberation of French Somaliland but only in maintaining the status quo or in annexing that Territory outright. For that reason, Ethiopia was prepared to destroy the FLCS, the only representative and effective liberation movement.

116. The second, and more difficult question to be faced related to the future of the Territory after its liberation. Obviously, nobody wanted to see it turned into a problem area, torn by internal strife or caught between the rivalries of Somalia and Ethiopia. In his Government's view, that could be avoided only by ensuring that the political future of the Territory emerged from the free choice of its people.

117. In his opinion, the Ethiopian Government did not share that view; he drew attention to the memorandum dated 8 June 1965 (annex III), which had been submitted by the Ethiopian delegation to the Committee in Dar es Salaam in 1965. That memorandum was tantamount to a claim that French Somaliland was actually Ethiopian territory. In paragraph 24, mention was made of the principle of self-determination but, as would be seen from paragraph 25, Ethiopia was only prepared to support those measures which took account of the factors listed in paragraph 23. That was a rather curious position for a member of the Special Committee to take, i.e., to state that it would support self-determination provided it resulted in its own annexation of the territory.

118. The following were the "sober facts" upon which the Ethiopian Government relied: The first "fact" was that French Somaliland had, from time immemorial, formed part of Ethiopia. The extraordinary account of the history upon which that claim was based was to be found in paragraphs 6 to 10 of the memorandum (annex III). It was not his intention to enter into a lengthy discussion of the history of the area, but certain claims in the Ethiopian memorandum had to be refuted and misrepresentations of fact corrected.

119. It was not true that the people of the French Somali coast traditionally acknowledged the sovereign rights of Ethiopia over their territory. As far as the Afar were concerned, the historical situation was as follows: while, prior to the nineteenth century, some of the northern tribes (in Eritrea) had fallen under the nominal authority of the rulers of Tigre, those in the centre and south with whom the Shoan kings had had to remain on good terms in order to ensure the safety of their caravans to the coast, had always maintained a practical independence. The most influential Afar Sultanate, that of Aussa on the Awash River, had remained independent until the reign of Menelik when, in 1895, on the pretext that the Sultan had become an ally of the Italians (then thrusting inwards from the Eritrean coast), a Shoan army had been sent against him and had forced him to pay tribute. With the incorporation of that part of Bankalia in Ethiopia after the liberation of Ethiopia, an Ethiopian army had reached Aussa in 1944, captured the Sultan and brought him back to Addis Ababa where he had died in captivity. Thereafter, the Aussa Sultans had continued to pay tribute to the Ethiopians. It was important to note, however, that the Aussa Sultan was not the acknowledged Paramount Chief of all the Afar, but merely the head of one of the largest and most important of a group of small independent Afar chiefdoms.

120. As far as the Issa were concerned, there was no evidence that they owed traditional allegiance to the Ethiopian rulers. In fact, they had only become subject to Ethiopian pressure after Menelik's conquest of the independent Muslim state of Harrar in 1887. It was from that base that Ras Makonnen's forces had begun foraging among the Issa, as well as among other Somali tribes. Moreover, the traditional centre, at which the Issa clan-heads had in the past regularly been installed, lay near Zeila, which fell at that time within the British sphere. The Issa Somalis of French Somaliland had never evinced any kind of traditional dependence upon the Ethiopian kings.

121. It was certainly not true, as the Ethiopian memorandum claimed, that up to one hundred years earlier, the ports along the Red Sea and Indian Ocean coasts had been Ethiopian. There had, of course, been long-standing trade through them with various kingdoms in the Ethiopian hinterland over the centuries but no Ethiopian jurisdiction had ever been exercised over them. Indeed, in the period of colonial participation, it had apparently been the deliberate policy of Menelik to encourage rival European powers to settle on the coast, leaving the hinterland free to him as an area in which he could consolidate his authority. Thus, it would be true to say that Ethiopian independence had been maintained at the expense of the colonization of the coast by European powers.

122. It was not true, as the Ethiopians had alleged, that in 1897 Ethiopia had been compelled to conclude a frontier treaty regarding French Somaliland. The truth was rather that France had been compelled, by its desire to secure Ethiopian support for its ambitions on the Upper Nile, to conclude that treaty with Ethiopia. The compulsion had been on the French side, and Ethiopia had gained new Somali and Afar territory as a result of the treaty; that was exactly what had occurred in the Anglo-Ethiopian treaty of the same year. Both France and Britain had competed for Ethiopian goodwill and support in their conflicting Nile interests, and Ethiopia had played them off against each other very successfully gaining, in each case, new Somali territory. It had also been part of the agreement reached that a Franco-Ethiopian railway would be built from Djibouti to Ethiopia.

123. The reference in the Ethiopia statement alleging that Ethiopia had resisted the attempts of Ottoman Sultan Selim I to impose Turkish sovereignty over the French Somali coast was a very garbled version of history: in the sixteenth century, when the Portuguese were holding the Christian Ethiopian kingdoms, the Muslims, for example, Ahmad Gran, had been aided by the Turks. Although the Muslim victories had ultimately been reversed, the Turks had continued to hold the ports of Massawa, Suakin and Arkiko, in Eritrea. Djibouti, at that time, had no real significance until the French developed it. On the basis of the continued Turkish coastal interest in Eritrea, Egypt had in 1866 advanced its claims to the Eritrean and Somali coast, leading to the Egyptian occupation (1870-1884), which had extended inland as far as Harrar in the Somali area.

124. With regard to the statement in the Ethiopian memorandum that France coerced local chiefs to sign a series of treaties between 1862 and 1885, it was important to consider the events of that period in perspective. The French colony had started with the cession of the port of Obock to the French by the local Afar in 1859, and it had been bought outright in 1862. After the withdrawal of the Egyptians from the port of Tajura, the French had, in 1883, claimed that their dominion extended beyond Tajura close to Djibouti and, by 1885, having concluded treaties of perpetual friendship with the Issa of Ambad and Djibouti, they had also laid claim to that small port. As a result, a dispute had ensued with Britain which at the time wished to extend the British Somaliland Protectorate westwards. The 1888 Anglo-French agreement had defined the boundary between the two protectorates as lying between Zeila and Djibouti—thus dividing the Issa tribes. It had not so much been a question of French coercion as of French protection, which was rendered attractive by the fears of Ethiopian conquest. Coercion would more accurately apply to the methods used by Menelik in the nineteenth century in securing recognition of his authority in Aussa, among some of the Issa, the Gadabursi and the Ogaden, as well as over many Galla groups.

125. He agreed, however, with the statement made in the Ethiopian memorandum to the effect that French Somaliland was an artificial colonial creation. As an entity, it had not existed prior to French colonization. But that did not mean that it had been a part of Ethiopia. There was no evidence that it had ever constituted a part of the Ethiopian Empire, even at the height of its expansion under Menelik. The French had not detached it from Ethiopia but had in fact added to Ethiopian dominions by the treaty of 1897 which ceded part of the French Somali Coast to Ethiopia. When the French had arrived, they had not found a series of Ethiopian vassal chiefs but a collection of small independent chiefdoms and sultanates which had only trading relations with Ethiopia.

126. A map had been circulated to the Special Committee showing the various claims of Ethiopia to the Horn of Africa. It would be seen that, even in Menelik's communication to the European Powers in 1891 at the height of his power, the Ethiopian claims had not included French Somaliland. Indeed, the claims of Menelik had been regarded as nonsense by both European and African Powers. Neither the Danakil nor the Somali chiefs of that territory ever acknowledged any Ethiopian sovereignty; nor did they need to, since they never saw any Ethiopians. It would be noted that the Ethiopian memorandum was somewhat embarrassed by the need to reconcile the claim to sovereignty with the fact that those chiefs had ceded the territory to France and by the fact that, under a treaty between Ethiopia and France in 1897, the French had actually reduced the area of their Protectorate over French Somaliland to its existing limits. The only explanation of that in the memorandum was that it was due to human frailty.

127. He would not enter into further details on that aspect of the question. What was of paramount importance was the wishes of the people in the Territory in 1966. The dreams of the Amhara colonizers of the nineteenth century were, or at least should be, totally irrelevant. But, in 1954, the Ethiopian Government had secured, by treaty with France, the cession of a part of that Territory, against the bitter opposition of the Territory's deputies within the French Parliament. That should not be allowed to happen again.

128. The second "sober fact" produced in the Ethiopian memorandum was that, viewed geographically, French Somaliland formed an integral part of the Ethiopian land mass. In fact, there could scarcely be a greater contrast than that between the high, well-watered, mountainous plateau of Ethiopia and the arid, desert-like coast of French Somaliland.

129. The third "sober fact" produced in the Ethiopian memorandum was that the port of Djibouti was dependent on the transit trade with Addis Ababa along the railway which, by Treaty of 1959, came under increased Ethiopian control without any reference to the Territorial Assembly of French Somaliland. On that matter too, the Deputy for the Territory had made protests in the French National Assembly. Such economic dependence should not be overstated: there were other assets in the Territory and, for the nomadic tribes, the railway was irrelevant. The Somali Government was convinced that there were other ways in which Ethiopian interests in the railway and the port facilities could be safeguarded and protected, regardless of the solution adopted for the political future of the Territory. In other words, the principle of self-determination could not be rejected merely to suit the economic interests of a foreign State. Those interests should, of course, be protected by treaty of guarantee, by international supervision, or some other means, but there was no need to regard Ethiopia as entitled to seize that Territory in defiance of the wishes of the peoples, because of such economic interests. It was his understanding that the Swiss, for example, traded quite successfully down the Rhine and through the Dutch ports without seizing Rotterdam.

130. It would also be noted that, in order to reinforce their claim that French Somaliland was really part of Ethiopia, the Ethiopians refused to call the Territory anything but Djibouti—the name of the port alone. They also refused to call the people living in the Territory Somalis but used the names of tribes. While that was perhaps a rather trivial matter in one sense, it was nevertheless an important indication of the motives underlying Ethiopian policy. There was also a deliberate attempt to falsify the nature of the peoples living in the Territory, which was much more serious. The picture of the two major tribes, the Danakils, sometimes called Afars, and the Somalis, as being part of much larger Ethiopian tribes living in Ethiopia was quite false.

131. As recently as 19 July 1965, the Ethiopian Ambassador in Paris had been reported in a French weekly, L'Observateur, as saying that, when France had withdrawn from French Somaliland, the best solution would be for those tribes to rejoin their motherland, Ethiopia. There had never been such a thing as an Ethiopian motherland for those people. The Somali Government had tried to give an accurate picture, on the basis of a French census, in its memorandum dated 25 May 1965 (annex II). The basic position was that the Somalis predominated in the south, including the port of Djibouti, and were linked with the people of the Somali Republic by ties of kinship, culture, tradition, language and religion. The Danakils inhabited the northern parts adjoining Ethiopia and Eritrea. But it was not the wish of his Government to accentuate those differences; they were all people of French Somaliland and had the right to self-determination. Indeed, the Somali Government sincerely hoped and believed that, free from foreign interference, the people of French Somaliland would develop and demonstrate a unity of purpose which would be the foundation of their political future and liberation from colonial rule. All his Government asked was that liberation should not be long delayed, for the present policy of both the Ethiopian and French Governments was to evict the Somalis from the Territory and introduce Danakils from Ethiopia proper; it was believed that 12,000 to 18,000 Somalis had already been evicted. That policy had already been condemned in General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX) and his delegation would welcome the specific application of that general condemnation to French policies in the Territory.

132. In the Somali Government's memorandum to the Special Committee in 1965, the United Nations was urged to take certain lines of action. It was a matter of great satisfaction to the Somali Government to note that two of its proposals had already been followed: first, with the affirmation by the United Nations that French Somaliland was a Non-Self-Governing Territory to which General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) applied; and, secondly, with the inclusion of the question of French Somaliland on the agenda of the Special Committee and the United Nations affirmation of the right of the people of that Territory to self-determination, in accordance with their freely expressed wishes.

133. It was appropriate to reiterate at that point the remaining lines of action which the Somali Government had recommended for the Special Committee's consideration: the United Nations should call upon France to grant immediate independence to the Territory, within the spirit of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and the United Nations Charter, and to withdraw its armed forces, officials and all other instrumentalities of control over the people of French Somaliland; secondly, it should call upon all other States to abstain from all forms of pressure, direct and indirect, calculated to distort the free expression of the right of self-determination of the people; thirdly, it should, immediately, upon the granting of independence to the Territory, assume the administration of the Territory for a period of two years so as to allow the formation of a political consensus within the Territory as to its future; and fourthly, it should, during the period of administration, permit the return to the Territory of all those Somalis who, during the past ten years, had been expelled or exiled by the French, subject to a proper United Nations scrutiny of their association with the Territory.

134. It might be asked why the Somali Government did not ask that full independence be granted to the Territory immediately. His Government's concern was to ensure that the people secured real, and not a fictitious, independence. It would be extremely apprehensive about the Territory's future if a choice were thrust upon its people, either with the French still in possession or immediately after their withdrawal. The French had prevented the formation of truly representative political parties and the people of the Territory therefore needed time to establish a political programme and to understand the issues to be faced. As recently as 1963, the Deputy for the Territory in the French National Assembly had been reported in Le Monde as saying:

"The people there are incapable of distinguishing between independence, self-government or the status of an overseas territory. The lack of political maturity necessitates the maintenance of the status quo."

135. The Somali Government did not wish to maintain the status quo but wanted the people to be provided with proper guarantees for their self-determination, free from French, Ethiopian or any other outside pressure. If the Special Committee could envisage ways of guaranteeing the people that free choice and of protecting them from outside interference, then the Somali Government would certainly consider them as a possible and suitable alternative to a period of two years under United Nations administration.

136. The representative of Ethiopia said that his delegation took pride in Ethiopia's record with regard to the liberation of colonial Territories, irrespective of their situation, size or stage of development. It was no secret that Ethiopia had a vital interest in the Territory of Djibouti. Though it could not, however, offer a ready-made solution to the problem, his Government would, in co-operation with the Special Committee, endeavour to find the best means of implementing the 1960 Declaration in a manner consonant with the social and economic interests of Djibouti. The nineteenth century colonial conquest—a ruthless and inhuman adventure conducted by certain European Powers—had everywhere followed the same pattern of brutal oppression, atrocities and exploitation. All over Africa, and indeed throughout the world, colonialism had made disastrous inroads into the lives of peace-loving peoples. Colonialism had wrought incalculable damage, shattering the bonds between peoples and cutting mercilessly across their cultural and ethnic homogeneity. Djibouti was a typical example of the decisive and destructive consequences bequeathed by such a system to the colonized.

137. With regard to the name of the Territory, he wished to point out that, some months previously, the Committee had decided, after considering the two names "Falkland Islands" and "Malvinas Islands", to use both, the latter in brackets. In the heyday of European colonialism, many names had been coined, such as the Gold Coast (Ghana), Northern Rhodesia (Zambia), Nyasaland (Malawi) and Southern Rhodesia (Zimbabwe). The Territory of Djibouti, illegally severed from the East African hinterland, had also been renamed. Ethiopia, which continued to call the area the "Territory of Djibouti", trusted that the Committee would consider the application of the proper name to that colony.

138. The Territory of Djibouti, which was an important strategic area situated to the east of Ethiopia, covered an area of approximately 23,000 square kilometres, inhabited by a population of about 80,000, half of whom lived in the capital. Most of the Territory bordered on Ethiopia and, apart from the Great Rift Valley, formed a single physical unit with that country. For the most part, it was arid, so that its people could not profitably engage in agriculture.

139. In the opinion of his delegation, it would be helpful if the Committee could undertake a thorough study of the Territory's past history—a study which should also take account of the history of the larger unit of which, socially, economically and historically, it formed a part.

140. For centuries, Ethiopia had exercised full and unquestioned sovereignty over the Horn of Africa. During that time, the strategic and commercial ports along the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean had also fallen within Ethiopia's jurisdiction, serving as outlets to the hinterland and until a century or so earlier the Territory of Djibouti had been among such strategic areas under Ethiopia's sovereignty.

141. The first unsuccessful attempt to violate Ethiopia's sovereign rights had been made during the sixteenth century, when the Ottoman Sultan Selim I had issued a decree proclaiming the Red Sea coastal area to be under Turkish influence. Ethiopia had repelled the aggressor and had restored its sovereign rights. A more significant feature of the abortive Turkish invasion was the fact that the de jure dependence of the local chiefs, in the Territory of Djibouti, on the authority of the Ethiopian sovereign, had remained unchanged.

142. Some two centuries after the attempted Turkish invasion, a more critical confrontation had taken place between the African people and certain European colonizers. The Horn of Africa had been invaded by the United Kingdom, France and Italy, as a result of which Ethiopia became, in effect, an island in a sea of colonialism. At the same time, the Territory of Djibouti had been transformed into a French peninsula and had, for the first time, acquired separate status.

143. France had embarked upon the conquest of the Territory of Djibouti for a variety of reasons. In 1858, in anticipation of the opening of the Suez Canal, the French Government had sought a port at the entrance to the Red Sea. The French consular agent in Aden, Henri Lambert, had therefore been dispatched to the Gulf of Tadjoura. His murder, in 1859, had temporarily halted negotiations but they had been resumed by Captain Fleuriot de Langle who had concluded a treaty on 11 March 1862, under which France had received the port of Obock and a small strip of territory for the sum of 10,000 Maria Theresa thalers. Between 1862 and 1885, by coercing local chiefs to sign a series of agreements, France had also acquired certain land in and around the Gulf of Tadjoura. Finally, in 1885, the French Government had decreed the establishment of the "Côte française des Somalis et dépendances".

144. In 1882, Italy had occupied Assab by force and Ethiopia, by then completely encircled, had no choice but, as a matter of self-defence, to take arms against the rapid colonial thrust from the north. At great sacrifices, the nation had in 1896 repelled the aggressor at Adowa. Its resources had been exhausted by yet another mortal combat against a foreign Power on the eastern shores of the Kingdom and it had therefore only been able to save a part of its land. Thus, the Territory of Djibouti had been established on the south-eastern shore of Ethiopia, which had had to live with that, and other, injustices.

145. The great majority of the population in the Territory of Djibouti inhabited two areas, the more densely populated being circumscribed by the Red Sea and the Ethiopian highlands. The other area was bounded by the Franco-Ethiopian railway to the south and the Buri peninsula to the north. Two major ethnic groups were concerned: the Afar and the Issas. Out of a total population of 200,000 Afars, 160,000 inhabited the Ethiopian provinces of Harrar, Wollo and Eritrea, while the remaining 40,000, representing over 50 per cent of the total population, inhabited the Territory of Djibouti. The Issa group consisted of about 150,000 people; approximately 20,000 lived in the Territory of Djibouti and 100,000 in Ethiopia. Out of the Territory's total land frontier, extending for some 500 kilometres, 400 kilometres bordered on Ethiopian territory.

146. Djibouti, which was divided into four administrative areas, had the status of a French overseas territory. Under the 1956 law, it had obtained a small measure of autonomy pertaining exclusively to local matters and, following the 1958 referendum, it had retained that status. Thus, France had full responsibility for external relations and defence, as well as for certain local matters.

147. Of the three major political parties, the largest was the Afar Democratic Union. There was also the Issa Democratic Union and the Mouvement populaire. A Territorial Assembly, composed of thirty-two members, had power with regard to selected local matters. One deputy and one senator were elected to the French National Assembly and Senate in Paris. An Executive Council, consisting of eight members, elected by the Territorial Assembly and presided over by the French Governor, directed Djibouti's administrative affairs and were empowered to enact legislation for the Territory.

148. Turning to the economic and commercial situation in the Territory of Djibouti, he said that the area had little land suitable for agriculture. Of a total area of 23,000 square kilometres, only 65 hectares were cultivated. There was little or no local industry and the economic activity was limited almost exclusively to exporting salt and fishing for shark and mother-of-pearl. On a smaller scale, dates were cultivated. The Territory's principal source of revenue was derived from the services rendered by its port—the terminus of the 496-mile railway from Addis Ababa, which also handled a considerable portion of Ethiopia's trade with the outside world. It was estimated that about 750,000 tons of food passed through the port every year and a considerable amount of food and drinking water was transported by rail for consumption in the Territory. An example of the significant export-import flow via the Territory was the fact that, in 1961-1962, the ratio of freight trans-shipped through Djibouti and Assab was roughly 3:2. It was evident, therefore, that, without significant imports from Ethiopia, there would be little justification for the existence of the Territory as a separate entity.

149. Towards the end of the nineteenth century, the Government of Ethiopia had been approached by private French interests with regard to a possible joint enterprise for the construction of a Djibouti/Addis Ababa railway. The negotiations had resulted in the 1894 concessions, granted by Emperor Menelik II. Although initiated privately, the railway had later been taken over by the French Government. The 500-mile track had been completed in 1918, since which time it had served as a major link between Ethiopia and the outside world. In 1959, a treaty, to which the Territorial Assembly had given its full approval, had been concluded between Ethiopia and France providing for equal ownership and control of the railway. It also included provision for Ethiopian customs officials to be stationed in Djibouti. Thus, shipments to Ethiopia was sealed and handled by the same officials before trans-shipment to their final destination. Furthermore, in accordance with the Treaty, Ethiopia was also entitled to use certain port facilities in Djibouti. For example, the Ethiopian Government could, if it so desired, build or purchase processing and manufacturing facilities within the port area and move and store its goods free of all local taxes with the exception of port fees.

150. As he had mentioned earlier, local industry in the Territory of Djibouti was minimal. The head offices of the major companies operating there were located in Addis Ababa. Moreover, the Commercial Bank of Ethiopia's branch in the Territory was mainly engaged in financing Ethiopian trade in transit through Djibouti, while the Djibouti branches of the Banque de l'Indochine, which had representatives in Addis Ababa, financed coffee exports. For almost half a century, the railway line linking the Ethiopian highlands with Djibouti had played a vital role in the economy of both territories, and in view of the increasing economic interdependence among the nations of the world, the wider use of the port facilities would have to be explored. Djibouti was Ethiopia's major gateway to all regions and, as such, it constituted an important corridor through which the nation's principal raw materials passed to the world market. The future of both Ethiopia and Djibouti therefore depended upon closer collaboration between the two territories.

151. His delegation had endeavoured to help the Committee to make a realistic appraisal of the situation by providing an outline of Djibouti's historical development. In that connexion three basic points had to be stressed: first, Djibouti's coastal territory had, for many centuries, been an integral part of Ethiopia. Its so-called separate status had been achieved only eighty years before, during European colonial rule. Secondly, from the geographical point of view, the Territory of Djibouti formed an integral part of the great Ethiopian land mass; and, thirdly, the Territory of Djibouti was economically dependent upon Ethiopia.

152. His delegation would unreservedly support any measures to resolve the problems regarding Djibouti's future. He reserved the right to comment further upon the matter.

153. As far as the memorandum submitted by the Somali delegation was concerned, he considered that it might have contained more constructive proposals. With regard to the Somali view that the liberation movement in Addis Ababa might destroy that in Mogadiscio, the people of Djibouti surely had every right to establish any movement which they considered would lead to independence. Moreover, Mogadiscio, unlike Eastern Ethiopia, was some 1,500 miles from Djibouti: the most logical way to fight for independence was to establish the liberation movement as near as possible to the people concerned. Ethiopia could not object to a movement which the people wished to create to fight for their independence.

154. As far as the fight against colonialism was concerned, Somalia had achieved independence only six years earlier. Ethiopia had been independent for thousands of years and had fought to remain so. The fact that Ethiopia was composed of different ethnic groups was a source of pride to his countrymen. It was regrettable that it had now been accused of establishing a liberation movement merely to destroy another elsewhere.

155. The representative of Somalia stated that his delegation considered that the Somali memorandum contained impartial and realistic proposals for the solution of the problem of French Somaliland. His Government's initiative in requesting that the question should be placed on the Committee's agenda had been motivated solely by the conviction that the status of French Somaliland represented a typical example of colonialism. His delegation was firmly convinced that the matter fell within the scope of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and categorically rejected the contention that, as a result of the 1958 referendum, French Somaliland was an integral part of metropolitan France. The Territory's cultural heritage, as well as its geographical position and the feelings of its people, proved that it was in every way an integral part of the Somali Peninsula. Despite that irrefutable fact, his Government's initiative had not been motivated by any plan to incorporate the Territory into the Somali Republic but only by its wish to ensure that the people were granted their inalienable right to freedom through self-determination, without any undue external pressure, as had been the case with former French colonies elsewhere.

156. His delegation regretted that the Ethiopian Government, instead of co-operating with Somalia in its struggle for the liberation of French Somaliland, had, in its desire for expansion, advanced unfounded claims to the Territory. Such claims did not differ from those of France, which maintained that French Somaliland was a part of the metropolitan country.

157. As to the name of the Territory, he wished to point out with all due respect to the Ethiopian Minister for Foreign Affairs that Djibouti was the name of a town. As Addis Ababa was the capital of Ethiopia, so was Djibouti the capital of French Somaliland. With regard to ethnic groups, he fully agreed that they should not play any significant role in the modern concept of a State. However, his delegation did not agree that the Issa were distinct from the Somalis. He further wished to assure the Ethiopian Minister for Foreign Affairs that his delegation in no way intended to give any lesson regarding freedom and independence to Ethiopia; indeed, the Somali people were proud that Ethiopia had preserved its freedom and independence throughout the centuries.

158. The representative of Ethiopia reiterated his view that the Issa were a different ethnic group from the Somalis and said that the question could perhaps best be decided by the experts. As far as the name of the Territory was concerned, he pointed out that the State and the city of Kuwait bore the same name.

C. FURTHER CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

INTRODUCTION

159. The Special Committee further discussed the question of French Somaliland at its 470th and 471st meetings, held in New York on 6 and 10 October 1966, respectively.

Participation by the representatives of Somalia in the work of the Special Committee

160. At its 470th meeting, the Special Committee decided, without objection, to grant the request of the Permanent Representative of Somalia that his delegation should be invited to be present as an observer at the Special Committee's meetings devoted to the hearing of petitioners concerning French Somaliland.

161. At its 471st meeting, the Special Committee decided without objection to accede to the request of the representative of Somalia to make a statement concerning French Somaliland.

WRITTEN PETITIONS AND HEARINGS

162. The Special Committee circulated the following additional petitions concerning French Somaliland:

Petitioner	Document No.
Two petitions from Messrs. Abdillahi Ardeye, Secretary-General, Jama Mohamed Sultan and Abdulrahman Ahmed Gabot, members, Front de libération de la Côte des Somalis (FLCS)	A/AC.109/PET.464/Add.1
Petition from the Front de libération de la Côte des Somalis (FLCS) ..	A/AC.109/PET.464/Add.2
Petition from Mr. Ahmed Bourhan, Secretary-General, Mouvement de libération de Djibouti (MLD)	A/AC.109/PET.465/Add.2
Petition from Messrs. Ali Ahmed Udun, Mohamed Dahan, Ibrahim Dahir Egeh and Omar Aboubakar, Front de libération de la Côte des Somalis (FLCS), and Abdulrahman Ahmed Hassan, former member of the Territorial Assembly of French Somaliland	A/AC.109/PET.551
Two petitions from Mr. Osman Aden Youssouf, Secretary for International Relations, Front de libération de la Côte des Somalis (FLCS) ..	A/AC.109/PET.552
Mr. Jassin Abucar, Somali Students Union in Czechoslovakia	A/AC.109/PET.5607

163. At its 470th and 471st meetings, held in New York on 6 and 10 October 1966 respectively, the Special Committee heard Mr. Ali Ahmed Udun, Mr. Mohamed Dahan, Mr. Ibrahim Dahir Egeh and Mr. Omar Aboubakar, representatives of the Front de libération de la Côte des Somalis (FLCS) and Mr. Abdurahman Ahmed Hassan.

164. Mr. Hassan said that France had taken nominal possession of the territory which was now French Somaliland in 1884, though it had not subjugated the whole area until several years later. The border with British Somaliland had been fixed in 1888 and that with Ethiopia in 1897. At the present time the Territory was divided administratively into one circonscription—Djibouti—and four cercles—Ali Sabiet, Dikil, Tadjourah and Obock. There was a Territorial Assembly of thirty-two members elected by universal suffrage, with limited powers fixed by the loi-cadre of 1956. The Council of Government consisted of eight members elected by the Territorial Assembly and was presided over by the Governor.

165. Nationalism had deep roots in French Somaliland; Islam had been an important factor in unifying the people and creating a national consciousness. In addition, nationalism had developed within such institutions as trade unions and youth and women's organizations. The experience of those associations had led to the creation of the political party known as the Rassemblement démocratique somali (RDS), which had won all thirty seats in the single-list elections of 1957.

166. In the 1958 referendum Mahamoud Harbi, the leader of RDS, had campaigned for a negative vote, i.e. for secession. All male Somalis had been able to participate in the referendum and, contrary to the spirit of the loi-cadre, the Europeans, the armed forces and an unknown number of persons on board French ships at sea had been allowed to take part. While the Europeans had been asked to choose between the Fourth Republic and the Fifth Republic, the indigenous people had had to choose between the status quo and secession. The armed forces, numbering some 3,000 Europeans, had had strict orders to vote. Following the vote, the Governor of French Somaliland had announced that a majority had expressed themselves in favour of de Gaulle and the maintenance of the status quo. There was considerable dispute about the accuracy of the figures published. Those figures showed that, out of a population of 200,000, the number of registered voters had been 15,833.

167. Mr. Mahamoud Harbi, who was the leader of the Government and the deputy for French Somaliland in the French National Assembly, had protested about the conduct of the referendum.

168. Thereupon, six members of the Council of Government had refused, at the instigation of the Governor, to take their seats with Mr. Harbi, though they had retracted that position some days later. A motion to dissolve the Council as soon as it was convened and to call new elections had been rejected by 15 votes to 10. The local French authorities had then tried another manoeuvre; the Governor had dissolved the Territorial Assembly by decree and called new elections. He had resurrected the pro-French parties, taking advantage of personal rivalries, the general conservatism and the self-interest of bourgeois elements. He had allowed the new parties to hold political meetings and publicize their programme, and had imprisoned many of the nationalists. He had also altered the electoral system, introducing a proportional system in place of the single list, and redistributing the seats. The party entitled Défense des intérêts économiques et sociaux du Territoire (DIEST) had won eleven seats, and five had gone to RDS, which, further weakened by the exile of several of its leaders, including Mahamoud Harbi, had lost all its effectiveness.

169. The policy followed by Mr. Compain, the Governor, was "divide and rule". He had deliberately upset the balance between the tribes in favour of the Afars by withholding identity cards from the nomad Issas and by propagating the myth that the Issas wished to see the creation of a greater Somalia in which the Afars would be swallowed up. At that point, however, the Parti du mouvement populaire, representing not only the youth of the country but also the different trends, had come into being. Its aim was the non-violent creation of a new order through political liberation and the abolition of economic exploitation and the barriers resulting from the stratification of society. The party advocated the mobilization of all the country's energies to achieve self-government and independence. It sought to encourage a national consciousness and to build up the political structures necessary for the achievement of national objectives. Its specific goals were to develop and strengthen the popular movement, to develop unity among the indigenous people, to promote secondary and higher education, to further the training of cadres, to work for the independence of French Somaliland, to promote the social and cultural evolution of Somali women, to encourage the creation of trade unions and youth and women's organizations, to procure means of self-defence for the people and to extirpate French tyranny once and for all.

170. The party had won increasing support among the population, and in the 1962 legislative elections to the French National Assembly its candidate had easily defeated the government candidate. Hassan Gouled, of DIEST, had received a very small vote. The low poll had revealed a lack of interest in the elections on the part of the local authorities.

171. To combat the nationalists, the French authorities had created a political police force, which had infiltrated the ranks of PMP. The party's activities had been hampered by arrests and intimidation, and members of the party who were nationals of French Somaliland had been expelled from the country on false pretexts.

172. The French authorities had refused to enroll women on the electoral lists, and had issued identity cards to a certain category of nationals only. The seats had been redistributed once again, the number of seats allotted to Djibouti, which accounted for half of the population of the Territory, being reduced. In the elections of 1963, PMP had obtained four out of fourteen seats in Djibouti and the two seats of Ali Sabiet. Its vote would have been higher but for the votes cast by the crews of the ships in the port, giving the Europeans an extra four seats.

173. The French authorities had continued to use all means of pressure at their disposal to weaken still further the position of the nationalists. It was to be noted that, in French Somaliland, it was possible for a civil servant to be elected to the Assembly without forfeiting his post in the Administration; that provided an effective means of pressure, especially as it was hard for anyone who had brought upon himself the wrath of the Government to obtain employment. The party was thus virtually silenced, although all it had wanted was self-government within the framework of the 1958 Constitution, in order to abolish colonial economic structures, to develop food production and reduce dependence on Ethiopia, to exploit the Territory's mineral resources, to build a dam on Lake Assal and establish a chemical industry and industries based on fisheries and animal husbandry, to improve livestock and to develop port facilities.

174. France's policies in the region represented a striking contrast with the principles which it professed; that could be explained by the fact that France regarded French Somaliland as important both strategically and as a relay point for the new nuclear testing installations in the Pacific Ocean. Measures had been introduced under which the indigenous people were liable to imprisonment without trial and extradition if accused of jeopardizing the territorial integrity of the country. Detainees were treated as common criminals and deprived of their rights of citizenship. It was interesting that no European had ever been detained in French Somaliland either as a political prisoner or under the penal law. It was clear that the judicial system in the Territory was dependent on the arbitrary whim of the Governor. In 1958 the Minister for the Interior had been arrested for authorizing a political meeting legally requested by the Somaliland Deputy in the National Assembly. The Procureur de la République had protested but had been obliged to carry out the instructions of the Government.

175. Indigenous people were arrested for non-possession of identity cards and condemned to forced labour in the interior. That policy had the twofold aim of providing cheap labour for the construction of roads and strategic installations, and of weakening the ranks of the nationalists. Many had died as a result of the conditions.

176. The pastoral nomads were subjected to increasing restrictions; they were confined to a restricted area of French Somaliland on pain of losing their citizenship. The motive for such measures was to encourage the nationalistic nomads to leave the Territory. The problem could have been solved by a population census, the issue of identity cards and co-operation between district administrators and tribal chiefs in the identification of individuals. The concern of France was clearly to ensure that a plebiscite in favour of independence would not obtain the required majority.

177. In 1959, the French Government had concluded a treaty with Ethiopia, transferring the headquarters of the Compagnie Franco-Ethiopienne to Addis Ababa, granting the company numerous privileges in the Territory and establishing an Ethiopian customs office in the port of Djibouti. The Territorial Assembly, which had not been consulted, had condemned France's action unanimously. It had been by a similar treaty, concluded in 1954, that part of the territory of French Somaliland had been ceded to Ethiopia.

178. With regard to education, the rate of school attendance appeared to be high but the fact was that education had felt the influence of the "Compain policy" of creating social barriers between groups. The policy of integration between whites and indigenous inhabitants had been undermined, and the situation had been aggravated by the influx of uneducated Frenchmen from other former French colonies. European and indigenous children were now taught in separate classes. Education was geared to literacy and no more. Only a few were allowed to receive secondary education, and most of those were not permitted to attain the level of the baccalaureate. There was thus no intellectual élite; only two inhabitants of the Territory had university degrees.

179. The army was made up almost entirely of people from metropolitan France. The appointment of indigenous officers was systematically avoided, non-commissioned Somali officers with fifteen years of service being forced to return to civilian life.

180. As a result of the recent events, the population no longer sought self-government but now called for independence. There was a movement towards national reconciliation, and PMP was now co-operating closely with the Union démocratique Afar, a dynamic new party which had joined the opposition. That factor greatly strengthened the nationalist movement and weakened the position of the present régime. It was probable that further integration of various groups would follow. The reconciliation of the major indigenous groupings would have a favourable effect on relations with neighbouring countries.

181. The recent events in French Somaliland had been no surprise to informed observers. One cause of discontent for a long time had been the absolute power of the Governor, who had been a virtual monarch, despite the existence of a deliberative assembly and a Council of Government. His arbitrary measures had brought upon him the hatred of the population, which had been awaiting the arrival of General de Gaulle in order to act, for upon his assumption of power General de Gaulle had championed the right of peoples to self-determination. Yet following the recent street fighting, more than 3,000 people had been arrested and nearly a thousand expelled to the Republic of Somalia, whose Government had been obliged to intern them in a neutral area where they lived in complete destitution.

182. General de Gaulle had informed the Territorial Assembly that, should the Territory express a new attitude regarding its future, through democratic processes, France would take note of that fact. The French Government had, however, opposed the convening of a special session of the Assembly. The fact was that French presence in the Territory was regarded as indispensable in order to keep the southern shore of the Bab el Mandeb in the hands of the West to ensure the survival of Ethiopia, a Christian bastion in a sea of Islam, and to retain Djibouti as a place of refuge for France in case of a conflict.

183. The reply of the nationalists was that the wishes of the people could not be expressed as long as the repressive measures of the French authorities continued. The people wished to be allowed to exercise their inalienable right to self-determination and they placed no hope in negotiations with France.

184. The French Government had recently announced that a referendum would be held in French Somaliland before 1 July 1967. According to reports, the population would be asked to choose between independence and the status of an overseas territory with considerable internal autonomy. Unfortunately, the experience of popular consultations under the colonial régime was not encouraging. The good faith of General de Gaulle was not in question, but the gulf which could exist between a metropolitan government and the colonial administration was well known. It was important that in any such referendum, the voting should be limited to the indigenous inhabitants. All repressive laws and measures should be repealed, such as restrictions on political parties, trade unions and the Press. The political prisoners, numbering more than 3,000 should be released and exiles allowed to return to the Territory. Finally, the government should be placed in the hands of political leaders who had the support of the people. The people of French Somaliland could not forget the masquerade of the 1958 referendum. Verbal declarations would not be enough; international guarantees in the form of a United Nations presence to organize and supervise the referendum and the general elections to follow it were essential. In the light of the threats and unfounded claims which had been made, the United Nations must also guarantee the integrity of the Territory and its sovereignty should the people of French Somaliland decide in favour of independence.

185. In line with General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), he wished to submit to the Committee the following requests: complete and immediate independence for the Territory; respect for its territorial integrity; the restoration of democratic freedoms, the release of political, trade-union, and religious prisoners; an amnesty for political refugees and their return to their homeland; non-interference in the internal affairs of the country and no direct or indirect pressure to be exerted by other nations; the immediate cessation of expulsion measures; assistance to be given to refugees by the Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees and the specialized agencies.

186. In reply to questions from members of the Special Committee, Mr. Hassan said that the recent events, in which there had been a number of casualties, had indeed resulted from the demands of the people for independence. He could supply documents giving details on what had happened. The administering Power had suggested that outside elements had been involved, but that was a fabrication.

187. In connexion with President de Gaulle's declaration that the people of French Somaliland could have independence if they so desired, the petitioner said that conditions surrounding the 1958 referendum in French Somaliland had apparently been different from those in former French Territories. The leader of the indigenous party at that time had campaigned for a negative vote, but the administering Power had interfered with the referendum and claimed a majority of affirmative votes. The fact was that the electoral system had been deliberately altered in order to ensure that the nationalists were in the minority in the Territorial Assembly. He wished to reaffirm that the people did not doubt the good faith of the French Government or of President de Gaulle, but were concerned about the local implementation of the French Government's policies. The loi-cadre, for example, had never been effectively implemented in the Territory.

188. It was vital that United Nations representatives should be present to ensure that the indigenous people were able to participate in the proposed referendum. That was impossible while they were being imprisoned and expelled in great numbers. Prior to any referendum, political prisoners must be released and parties allowed to exercise their activities freely and to inform the people of the facts. A referendum under present conditions would have no meaning.

189. With regard to economic matters, he wished to point out that, under present arrangements, the Territory derived practically no revenue from the railway, since the Ethiopians paid practically nothing for transit facilities.

190. Mr. Dahan (FLCS) said that the political prisoners included some who had been in prison since 1958. Mr. Hassan had been arrested in 1959 and had been in prison until he had escaped in 1965. He himself, too, had spent some time in prison. The greatest wave of arrests, however, had occurred following the events of August 1966, at the time of President de Gaulle's visit to the Territory. On that occasion, the people had wished to demonstrate their desire for independence, in view of the claim that the 1958 referendum had proved the desire of the people to remain under French rule. The demonstrations were still continuing. He could not give the exact number of political prisoners but it exceeded 3,000. The number of those expelled to the Republic of Somalia was 3,486. Some twenty-five people had been injured in the disturbances and about twenty had died.

191. It had sometimes happened that efforts had been made to split up newly independent countries, and the people wished to ensure that the integrity of the Territory was respected.

192. The United Nations could help to ensure democratic freedom in the Territory; at present, the situation was similar to that in Angola and Mozambique, where there were no effective trade unions and no freedom of action for political parties, youth organizations and women's organizations. A number of complaints regarding violations of international labour conventions had been addressed to the International Labour Organisation.

193. The United Nations could also supervise the preparation of the voters' lists prior to the referendum; under the colonial administration there was no guarantee that those lists were correct. It was important to ensure that members of the French armed forces and their wives did not participate in the referendum.

194. Elections could be held six to eight months after the referendum. It was essential that all political refugees should be allowed to return to the country and that all political parties should take part in the elections. There were two nationalist parties in the Territory—the Parti du Mouvement populaire and the Union démocratique Afar—and they both pursued the same goal of independence for French Somaliland. When General de Gaulle had arrived in the Territory, those parties had set up a co-ordinating committee. His own party, too, which was in exile, had the same objectives.

GENERAL STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

195. The representative of Ethiopia stated that it was true that the frontiers of the Territory of Djibouti and Ethiopia were artificial. For example, of the four Afar Sultanates of Rahayto, Aoussa, Gobaad and Tadjourah only the latter was entirely within the Territory of Djibouti, all the others extending into Ethiopia, where 80 per cent of the Afars lived. The same was true with regard to the Isaas, 75 per cent of whom lived in Ethiopia. The frontiers were therefore artificial, having been imposed upon the people of the Territory and of Ethiopia by colonialism. The petitioner had referred to the 1959 Treaty which governed the railway linking Djibouti to Addis Ababa. It should be noted that of 784 kilometres of rail only 98 kilometres were in the territory of Djibouti. The total traffic carried by the railway consisted of Ethiopian imports and exports and constituted 85 per cent of the merchandise shipped through the port. It was not surprising, therefore, that the port and the railway should serve both the Territory and Ethiopia. The petitioner had also mentioned the 1954 Treaty delimiting the frontier. That delimitation had been ratified by the competent authorities. The petitioner claimed that the Treaty had had the effect of depriving the Territory of a zone that would be a virtual granary. According to a study on French Somaliland, out of 23,000 square kilometres only 65 hectares were arable and 2.2 million hectares were unsuitable for cultivation. Both before and after 1954 the Territory had derived its wealth from the railway and port complex.

196. The representative of Somalia said that it had been only a few years since his country had emerged as a sovereign nation, thanks to the application of United Nations principles. His Government wished to devote all its efforts to the peaceful development of the country and was animated by a sincere desire to live in peace and friendship with all nations.

197. The serious situation which had arisen in French Somaliland was a source of grave concern to his country. His Government was convinced that the faithful application of United Nations principles could and must bring about a settlement of the question of French Somaliland, in the interest not only of the people of that Territory but of world peace.

198. The demonstrations that had taken place in French Somaliland during the recent visit of President de Gaulle had shown the true feelings of the inhabitants. His delegation was convinced that those demonstrations had been directed, not against the person of that great statesman, but against the short-sighted and anachronistic policies of the colonial administration. The oppressive and unjust measures that the administration in the Territory had adopted in response to those demonstrations could only serve to aggravate the situation. It was the duty of the Special Committee to seek a peaceful and constructive solution to the problem of French Somaliland and to point the way for the proper application to the Territory of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

199. The petitioners who had appeared before the Committee had painted a true picture of the situation in the Territory. His Government was gratified by President de Gaulle's statement that a referendum would be held in the Territory not later than July 1967, but the harsh policies pursued by the French colonial administration in punishing the people of the Territory for expressing a legitimate wish for independence revealed a very different spirit. Nor could the improper manner in which the 1958 plebiscite in the Territory had been conducted be forgotten.

200. The Special Committee should bear in mind the fact that French Somaliland had a relatively small population. The smaller the number of voters called upon to decide an issue, the greater was the weight of each vote and the easier it was to falsify the outcome. It was therefore essential to have reliable safeguards for the proper conduct of the referendum: bona fide citizens of the Territory must not be deprived of their right to vote, persons other than bona fide citizens must not be allowed to vote, and there must be no intimidation, coercion or exercise of improper influence. The 1958 plebiscite had shown the most serious shortcomings in all those respects. His Government did not expect France to repeat those mistakes, but it felt that the Special Committee should recommend measures that would remove any doubt about the following three points: that the people of French Somaliland would be able to exercise their inalienable right of self-determination at a specified date and not later than July 1967; that prior to the referendum conditions would be created which would enable the people of French Somaliland to make full use of that right, which would include the right to form and belong to political organizations of their own choosing and the right of all exiled citizens to return to the Territory without fear of reprisals; and that the referendum itself would be conducted with absolute fairness.

201. The Ethiopian representative had suggested that without Ethiopian trade the Territory would not be able to maintain an independent economic existence. The question of the Territory's economy, however, was not relevant to the matter of self-determination. The United Nations had long established the principle that inadequacy of economic preparedness should never serve as a pretext for delaying independence. Since that point was constantly mentioned by Ethiopia, however, he considered it necessary to give his delegation's views on the matter, so that Ethiopia's two principal trade links with the Territory—the railway and the port—could be placed in their true perspective.

202. The Franco-Ethiopian railway was used exclusively for transporting Ethiopian merchandise to and from the port of Djibouti. Viewed within the context of the national income of the Territory, the railway played a much smaller part in the economy than was generally known. The majority of the population of French Somaliland were nomads, to whom the railway was completely irrelevant. It had not changed their standard of living or way of life. As had been stated in the official explanation given to the French Parliament, the Franco-Ethiopian Treaty of 1959 had been prompted by the following situation. As a result of General Assembly resolution 390 (V) of 2 December 1960, which had reattached Eritrea to Ethiopia, Ethiopia had become possessed of a coastline of 800 kilometres and two ports on the Red Sea. The modernization of the Addis Ababa-Assab route and the port of Assab had caused Djibouti and the Franco-Ethiopian railway to lose the monopoly they had enjoyed since 1909. Consequently, Djibouti and the railway had begun to show an increasing deficit and France had not wished to bear the entire financial responsibility any longer. The main purpose of the 1959 Treaty had been to make Ethiopia carry an equal share of the deficit. Before 1959, all the profits earned by the railway had gone to the shareholders, all of whom had been French. Under the 1959 Treaty, half of the shares had gone to Ethiopia, which therefore received half of the profits. Thus from the point of view of the economy of French Somaliland there had been no change: the profits still went outside the Territory. The most significant thing about the railway was not the exemption of its profits from local taxation or the fact that not a single local inhabitant served on its Board of Directors, but the way in which its importance to the Territory had been exaggerated. At its peak eighteen years earlier, the entire labour force had numbered no more than 5,000 persons. That figure had declined to 2,500 in 1965. As Djibouti had a population of 40,000 and the labour force of 2,500 covered the entire line and included Ethiopians and Europeans, the railway hardly seemed to constitute a vast source of employment.

203. The financial benefits to French Somaliland of the Ethiopian traffic at the port of Djibouti consisted only of harbour dues charged on goods in transit. Those dues were 15 per cent lower than the rates charged at Aden, on the opposite side of the Gulf. The trade benefited Ethiopia rather than French Somaliland; that was borne out by the fact that while the quantity of Ethiopia's transit trade through the port had doubled since 1959 the corresponding increase in the Territory's budget had been trivial. Ethiopia had been developing the ports of Massawa and Assab at a rapid pace and the latter was beginning to rival Djibouti.

204. The port of Djibouti had an economic potential completely separate from, and potentially at least as profitable as, the Ethiopian transit trade. As a result of improvements, it had become a bunkering station whose international traffic had more than quadrupled during the past ten years. Greater attention should be given to other aspects of the country's economic potential. The fallacy that the Territory depended solely on the railway and the port had caused the French administration to neglect other possibilities of development, such as the fishing, mother-of-pearl, salt and skins industries. The prospects for the development of other small industries should be investigated with United Nations assistance and the mineral resources of the country should be thoroughly surveyed. The present economic links of French Somaliland with France and Ethiopia should be retained and increased, but the relationship should be one of co-operation for the mutual benefit of both countries. Valuable links had been forged between the peoples of France and the Territory and there was a great deal of goodwill towards metropolitan France in spite of the shortcomings of the local colonial administration.

205. In the case of Ethiopia, his delegation was sure that the people of an independent French Somaliland would wish to develop their economic relations with Ethiopia and with other African countries. That would be in keeping with the present trend in Africa towards regional economic co-operation, one of the principal objectives of the Organization of African Unity. In recent months his country and Ethiopia, together with eight other States of eastern Africa, had formed an association to promote regional economic co-operation.

206. There was no reason for Ethiopia to oppose the demand of the people of the Territory for independence or to assume that independence for French Somaliland would pose a threat to Ethiopia's economic interests. Those interests could be protected, for example, by a treaty of guarantee or some similar instrument acceptable to the people of the Territory.

207. It was relevant to stress the principle that had emerged from the deliberations of the Special Committee, namely that the freely expressed wishes of a people for independence must never be subordinated to the political or economic interests of the colonial Power or of any other State. That principle had been supported by the Ethiopian delegation in the Special Committee during discussions on the future of Non-Self-Governing Territories and by the Ethiopian representative during the debate on Aden at the eighteenth session of the General Assembly.

208. Although there was no dispute between his country and Ethiopia or between his country and France, as Somalia and neighbours of both French Somaliland and Ethiopia his people were deeply perturbed by the Ethiopian suggestion that the right of the people of French Somaliland to self-determination was in some way dependent upon, or must be limited by, alleged historical claims by Ethiopia on that Territory. Ethiopia had no such historical claims and, even if it had, they would be irrelevant. If previous history were allowed to stand in the way of self-determination, then self-determination would clearly be impossible. It would be disastrous to world peace if any country could, on the basis of old maps or historical events, claim the right to dismember or annex other countries.

209. It was not clear at what period in history the Territory was alleged to have come under Ethiopian control. It had certainly not been in biblical times, or in mediaeval times when the Ethiopian mountain plateau had been surrounded and isolated by the forces of Islam. An Arab sultanate had been established at Zeila in the seventh century and by the thirteenth century it had developed into the powerful Adel Empire. The traditional enmity between the people of the plateau and the people of the coast had resulted, in the sixteenth century, in an attack on Ethiopia by the Somalis and Afars, aided by the Turks. Only after forty years had they been turned back, with the help of Portuguese arms and soldiers. Thereafter an uneasy balance of power had been maintained with the coastal rulers until the European nations had arrived on the scene in the second half of the nineteenth century.

210. In every respect, the people of the coast and the people of the plateau had developed along different lines; there had been differences in religion, language, customs and climate, and, politically, nothing could have been more dissimilar than the autocratic monarchies of Ethiopia and the coastal sultanates, whose rulers were merely primus inter pares. The whole history of the area was one of a clash between two different cultures in which, despite temporary advantages, neither had been able to establish permanent control over the other.

211. Until about 1880, it would be roughly true to regard the area for about a hundred miles round Addis Ababa as the southernmost extent of Ethiopian power. When, in the 1860's, the French had arrived on the coast of what was now French Somaliland, the Territory had consisted of a conglomeration of precariously independent chiefdoms and sultanates, over which the Ottoman Empire had exercised nominal overlordship through its Egyptian representative. That overlordship had been so tenuous that European powers had been able to establish thinly veiled protectorates in the area. None of the sultanates or chiefdoms, however, had been under the direct or indirect rule of Ethiopia, then called the Kingdom of Choa, which had regarded the Moslems living near its borders as enemies. Between 1862 and 1890 France had concluded a series of treaties with the chiefdoms and sultanates which had given it control not only over the coastal strip of French Somaliland but also over large portions of the hinterland.

212. During that period, Menelik had succeeded to the Ethiopian throne and had managed to unite the warring Amhara principalities. With the help of several European countries, he had extended his empire to the south by military conquest, not on the basis of any historical claims but simply in the interests of territorial aggrandizement. As Arnold Toynbee has said, the Amharas had been the only African people to join in the scramble for Africa, and today about half the population of the expanded Ethiopia was neither Amhara in nationality nor Christian in religion. It had been Menelik's acquisition of Harar which had enabled him to secure control over the lowland areas. In the 1890s, for the first time in their history, parts of the Danakil and Somali population had been brought under Ethiopian rule. At that time both Britain and France had been anxious to obtain Menelik's co-operation against the Dervishes and, as a result of treaties concluded in 1897 with both those countries, Ethiopia had acquired further Afar and Somali territory. There had been no question of its being a restitution of lost territory; at the time, Ethiopia had not claimed former sovereignty over the land occupied by the French, although about the same time Menelik had made other claims for territories as far north as Khartoum and Lake Nyanza.

213. After 1897 the frontiers of French Somaliland had remained unchanged until 1954 when France, despite the bitter protests of the Somali delegate in the French Parliament, had ceded another piece of the Territory to Ethiopia. The Franco-Ethiopian Railway Treaty of 1959 had also granted certain rights to Ethiopia in French Somaliland which greatly affected the Territory's inhabitants, but the Treaty specifically excluded extra-territorial rights at the port of Djibouti. If the people of French Somaliland gained independence, however, arrangements undoubtedly could and would be made to protect the legitimate interests of Ethiopia.

214. His country did not blame Ethiopia for its former policies, but the era of territorial aggrandizement had gone for ever. No claims could be made now on the basis of previous annexations. In earlier times, annexations and cessions of territory and the establishment of protectorates and spheres of interest had been carried out in complete disregard for the wishes and welfare of the people concerned.

215. The suggestion that any alleged historical claims by another country might condition, or even nullify, the right of the people of French Somaliland to self-determination contradicted the letter and spirit of the United Nations Charter, of the Charter of the Organization of African Unity and of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

216. The representative of Ethiopia stated that, having regard to the Chairman's statement to the effect that the substance of the question of the Territory was not on the agenda for the meeting, his delegation would reserve its right to speak when the item was taken up by the Fourth Committee during the twenty-first session.

217. His country had been accused by the representative of Somalia of harbouring the desire to annex the Territory of Djibouti. What irony this was!

218. He repeated that his delegation's position was based on well-known facts concerning the interdependence of Djibouti and Ethiopia. His delegation believed that the indigenous population of the Territory had the right to exercise genuine self-determination without any outside interference.

D. DECISION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

219. At its 471st meeting held on 10 October 1966, the Special Committee, by approving the recommendation contained in paragraph 3 of the twenty-fifth report of the Working Group (A/AC.109/L.338), decided to transmit to the General Assembly the information contained in the relevant working paper prepared by the Secretariat, together with the statements made on the item by representatives and by petitioners. It also decided to inform the Assembly that, subject to any decision that the Assembly at its twenty-first session might take, it would consider French Somaliland during its meetings in 1967.

Letter from the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs dated 23 March 1959, addressed to the Secretary-General and transmitted to him by the Permanent Representative of France^a larly each year from 1946 to 1957 the information provided for in Article 73. On each such occasion, it pointed out that it was for the administering State alone to determine which were the Territories whose peoples had not yet attained a full measure of self-government under the terms of the Charter.

2. The French Government, as it duly notified the Secretariat, therefore ceased to transmit information on the following Territories as they reached the requisite stage of development: in 1947, on Guadeloupe, Martinique, French Guiana, Réunion, New Caledonia, the French Establishments in Oceania; and St. Pierre and Miquelon; in 1948, on the Associated States of Indo-China and the French Establishments in India; in 1956, on Tunisia and Morocco.

3. Information continued to be furnished on French West Africa, French Equatorial Africa, Madagascar, the Comoro Archipelago, French Somaliland and New Hebrides.

4. Except with regard to New Hebrides, where the existence of the condominium created a special situation, the French Government decided to stop transmitting this information as from 1957. Under the Loi-cadre of 23 June 1956 and the decrees issued in application thereof, a series of reforms were instituted which had the effect of granting these Territories internal autonomy. This autonomy and the liberal trend of the revolutionary process marked by the enactment of the Loi-cadre were strengthened in 1958 by the establishment of the Community.

5. Attached are documents relating to the status of the various Territories on which information is no longer being transmitted.^b

ANNEX II

[A/AC.109/121]

Memorandum dated 25 May 1965 from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Somalia addressed to the Special Committee

I. THE HISTORY OF FRENCH CONTROL

1. In 1862, at a time when British and Italian interest in the Horn of Africa was fast developing, the French determined that they, too, must have a hold in East Africa, and by treaty with the Danakil Chief purchased for 50,500 francs the harbour of Obok with the adjacent plain. In 1880, the French published a notice defining the limits of the French possessions, but in 1884 the Sultan of Tajurah entered into a Treaty of Protection with France, and in 1885 similar Treaties were entered into between France and the Chief of the Issa Somalis and the Sultan of Gobad, further extending these possessions. The extent of these French Protectorates was later agreed by Treaties with Great Britain in 1888 and Ethiopia in 1897, and confirmed in the tripartite French/Italian/British Treaty of 1906.

2. Thus, according to the pattern common to the "scramble for Africa", unequal treaties were forced on the people of these areas, a French "Protectorate" was assumed, and the precise boundaries were worked out between the four States—France, Great Britain, Italy and Ethiopia—engaged in this competition for territory which belonged to none of them. These are the undistinguished origins of the present French control.

II. THE PRESENT CONSTITUTIONAL STATUS OF THE TERRITORY

3. The present status of French Somaliland is an "Overseas Territory within the French Community".

4. Prior to the 1958 French Constitution, the overseas Territories were those former colonies which had not been assimilated and which therefore had a status quite different from that of France. The "basic-law" of 23 June 1956 gave to such territories a degree of autonomy, and the 1958 Constitution offered the choice between retaining their status, becoming an overseas department, or becoming a member State of the Community. French Somaliland chose to retain its status, so that this, on the whole, remains as it was under the law of 23 June 1956.^a

5. The autonomy of the Territory is, however, strictly limited: one French writer has described it thus:

"But the competence of the autonomous territorial organs (Territorial Assembly and Government Council) applies only to the territorial services. A fundamental distinction is made by the law of 23 June 1956 between the territorial and the state public services. The list of the latter is rather long, and was extended by the law of 1956 to offset the autonomy granted in the management of the territorial services. The State services are: foreign relations; national defence; the judiciary, inspection of work, services assuring public safety and respect for the freedom of the citizens, exterior communications (air services, radio broadcasting), the treasury, credit, and foreign exchange; high education, mixed economy companies."^b

6. Therefore, the status of this Territory remains essentially the same as that of a British colony granted limited powers of self-government: clearly, the entirety of matters of foreign relations, defence, and many strictly "internal" matters are entirely in the control of France, and not the political institutions of the Territory itself. It is, in a word, "non-self-governing".

7. It will be recalled that when on 30 March 1964 the Chairman of the Special Committee of Twenty-Four wrote to the Permanent Representative of France requesting information on the Territories under French control to which General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960 applies, the French reply dated 24 June 1964 was that:

"The communication in question obviously relates to the France/U.K. Condominium of the New Hebrides, the only territory in respect of which the provisions of the Charter regarding non-self-governing territories still concern France." (A/AC.109/71/Add.4)

8. This view the Somali Government denies. French Somaliland is most certainly covered by the General Assembly's resolution, and it was for this reason that the Somali Government requested that French Somaliland be placed on the agenda of the Special Committee of Twenty-Four. The Somali Government calls upon the Committee to apply all its resources to the end of ensuring for this Territory the right of self-determination.

III. THE POLITICAL STRUCTURE OF THE TERRITORY

A. Political organs of the Territory

9. These consist of the following:

- (i) Governor, Head of the Territory and President of the Council of Government: a Frenchman, appointed by President de Gaulle.
- (ii) Council of Government: eight Ministers, elected by the Territorial Assembly on a system of proportional representation (4 Afars, 3 Issa, 1 Metropolitan). This Council meets under the chairmanship of the Governor, who represents the President of the French Republic. Its powers are limited to such matters as are within the autonomy granted by the basic-law of 1956.
- (iii) Territorial Assembly: thirty-two members, elected by "universal" suffrage (16 Afars, 11 Somalis, 4 Metropolitans, 1 Arab).
- (iv) Permanent Commission: Meets between the two sessions of the Assembly and conducts affairs within the limits of powers delegated by the Assembly. In addition to the above, the Territory sends one Deputy and one Senator to represent it in the French Parliament. Some reference must be made to the marked dominance of the Afars in these organs. The Afars are the party most favoured by France and through which the French Government operates the boundaries of the seven electoral districts which are purposely defined so as to ensure Afar preponderance. The French newspaper Le Monde, on 22 April 1964, writing of the Afar leaders said:

"It is true that their movement enjoys the quasi-official support of the administrative authorities and that the new electoral districts, skilfully carved out before the territorial elections of November 1963, have virtually ensured the admission of Afar candidates to the Assembly and the Government."

B. Political parties of the Territory

10. The three main parties are the Afar Democratic Union, which as stated above, enjoys semi-official support, the Issa Democratic Union and the Popular Movement (Mouvement populaire). The reason for French support of the Afar Democratic Union is that, as presently led, this party favours retention of the status quo. Of the two parties in opposition, the Mouvement populaire is the more radical and actively seeks independence from the French. Its General-Secretary, Mr. Obsieh Beuh, elected in August 1964, had only recently prior to his election served one year's imprisonment for subversive acts, having advocated freedom from French rule.

11. The French authorities oppose any attempt to form a nationalist party which cuts across tribal loyalties: on the contrary, they favour a diversity of parties based on tribal differences and seek to promote disagreement between Afars and the Issa Somalis. As Le Monde has said, "The Administration considers—with some reason—that these rivalries constitute a certain guarantee of stability" (22 April 1964).

12. This principle will be familiar to all members of the Special Committee of Twenty-Four as the old, colonialist principle "divide and rule". In fact, the Afars (or Danakils) and the Somalis—of whom the Issa Somalis are only a part—fundamentally have much in common. They practise a common religion, the Muslim religion, they have a common culture and they intermarry. They have no difficulty in language communication, except for the Danakils in the extreme north who have recently been introduced into the Territory. It is the French and Ethiopians who are trying to create differences and animosity between the Afars and the Somalis and to introduce greater numbers of Afars whilst expelling thousands of Somalis.

C. Electoral system

13. This is based, ostensibly, on universal suffrage. The total population numbers approximately 80,000, having steadily increased since 1948 when it numbered only 41,000. A French study in 1961^c gave the indigenous population figures in the four main areas thus:

Races	Djibouti	Ali Sabieh	Dikhil	Tadjourah	Total
Danakil (Afar)	2,240	—	7,760	20,560	30,560
Somalis (Issa)	14,950	6,000	3,000	—	23,950
Arabs	3,000	—	—	—	3,000
Foreigners	16,000	140	270	200	16,610
TOTAL	36,190	6,140	11,030	20,760	74,120

14. These figures do not include thousands of Somalis who, for lack of identification papers, are treated as "foreigners". The irony of granting a vote to a Frenchman as soon as he steps off the boat in Djibouti, but refusing it to Somalis whose fathers even were born there needs no comment. Thus it can be seen that the Somalis predominate in Djibouti itself and in the areas in the South, adjoining the Somali Republic, whereas the Danakil (or Afars) predominate in the areas adjoining Ethiopia to the west and Eritrea to the north.

^c"La Côte française des Somalis", Notes et études documentaires, No. 2714 (April 1961).

15. It may be asked how, with universal suffrage, can this totally disproportionate representation occur? The answers are several:

(a) The vote is also given to the non-indigenous French population which, in Djibouti alone, numbers almost 6,000.

(b) The vote is also given to the French Army stationed in the Territory, numbering 5,000 men.

(c) The vote is denied to thousands of Somalis by alleging that they are "foreigners", not born in the Territory. The existence of documentary proof of place of birth is very rare in these areas of the world, so that it becomes virtually impossible for the Somalis to counter this allegation. Where they do produce written, documentary proof the French authorities will usually dismiss it as a forgery and tear it up.

(d) The French authorities, again on the pretext that the Somalis are "foreigners", are pursuing a persistent and calculated policy of expulsion of Somalis. It is estimated that between 12,000 to 18,000 Somalis have been expelled in this way.

(e) The redistribution of seats resulting from the electoral reform of 1963 was designed purposely to reduce the Somali representation.

(f) The French do not hesitate to resort to coercion, threats of deprivation of the jobs of the Somalis and outright bribery. This is what is meant by the phrase "L'administration fait les élections".

16. It is for all these reasons that the Somali Government urges the Special Committee of Twenty-Four to bring pressure to bear on France so as to ensure that elections, and the expression of views by elected representatives, are free and fair. As things stand, the Somali Government believes that the expression of views emanating from the Council of Government or the Territorial Assembly cannot be taken as the expression of the views of the people of the Territory. Free expression could only take place if all French and Ethiopian pressure were removed, preferably by conducting a plebiscite under United Nations auspices. This must be done soon, for the French techniques of coercion, perfected in Algeria, are now being used against the Somalis. The liberation front, the FLCS appealed to the United Nations in June 1963, to investigate the concentration camps established at Obok, Tadjourah, Dikhil and Lake Assai. The Secretary-General of the Arab Workers' Union in October 1964 appealed to the Trade Unions Freedom Committee of the ILO to investigate "the atrocities being committed by the imperialist French authorities against the trade union movement and workers in the French Somali Coast". The FLCS appealed to the Refugees Committee of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) in January 1965 asking for aid for the thousands of Somali refugees from French persecution. Recent estimates give the number of "registered" refugees, that is to say those who formally registered for assistance (and excluding those who sought refuge with their own families, etc.) as 6,850; the non-registered refugees are estimated at nearly twice that number.

IV. ECONOMIC STRUCTURE OF THE TERRITORY

17. The entire Territory covers an area of only 5,800 square miles, or 23,000 square kilometres. Of this area, no more than 3,000 hectares are under cultivation. Almost 90 per cent of the land is desert and the remaining 10 per cent is given over to the nomadic Afars and Somalis with their flocks of cattle, sheep, goats and camels. The products of the Territory are confined to hides, oil seed, musk, pearl, fish, some coffee, cereals and the production of salt.

18. The present economy of the Territory thus rests upon two things: the French Army and the Port of Djibouti. The budget of the Territory has shown little increase: the official French figures show an increase from 1,074 million Djibouti francs in 1959 to 1,095 in 1961.^d The French Army's budget in the Territory in 1961 was 1,866 million Djibouti francs—greater than the budget for the entire Territory. The Territory faces a growing deficit in its balance of payments, which increased from 1,474 million Djibouti francs in 1959 to 1,970 million in 1961.^a Nor are there any real signs that the French authorities are disposed to develop the economic capacity of the Territory so as to decrease its dependence on the occupying Army.

19. This growing deficit in the balance of payments stands in marked contrast to the growing volume of goods in transit through the port of Djibouti. The tonnage of merchandise unloaded for Ethiopia rose from 151,000 tons in 1938 to 1.14 million tons in 1959 and has since doubled again.^f This transit trade certainly creates employment in Djibouti, but it is apparent that it is not the intention of either France or Ethiopia to allow any import or transit taxes which would directly assist the budget of the Territory.

20. The Port of Djibouti is linked by railway to Addis Ababa. Built in 1917, this railway passed into joint French/Ethiopian control in 1959 and its head office was moved from Paris to Addis Ababa. More recently France has extended 55 million French francs credit to Ethiopia so as to finance the construction of a railway line to Sidamo. It is upon these economic ties between Ethiopia and France that Ethiopia rests her present policy towards the Territory. This is, in brief, to allow the very profitable (for Ethiopia) status quo to continue.

21. The French Institut national de la statistique et des études économiques has summarized the position thus:

"This analysis brings out the artificial nature of the economy of French Somaliland, which is to a great extent conditioned by the number of troops stationed in the Territory and for the rest is closely dependent upon the activity of the railway port. Thus the impulsion of this economic life seems to be completely the work of centres of decision outside the Territory."^g

V. EDUCATIONAL AND SOCIAL SYSTEM OF THE TERRITORY

22. This can only be described as background. The official French figures on education for 1963^h are the following:

Schools	Public	Private	Pupils
First degree (elementary)	13	6	3,445
Second degree (secondary)	2	3	353
Technical	2	3	231

23. The UNESCO Statistical Yearbook for the same year does not give figures which coincide with the above figures, and it has no entry in the tables dealing with compulsory education, illiteracy or libraries. It does disclose that, in 1960, the amount spent on recurring educational expenditure was 89 million Djibouti francs (approximately $400,000) and the amount on capital expenditure was nil. An over-all total of about 4,000 pupils receiving education in a population of 80,000 is not impressive and the absence of facilities for higher education is striking. Moreover, it must be remembered that these figures are largely figures showing the French and other foreign children at school. The French authorities are not disposed to provide too much education for the indigenous population, particularly the Somalis.

24. On the more general social level, there is one large hospital (but no free medical treatment), no permanent theatre, and the daily Press (Le Réveil de Djibouti) is government-controlled. It is not the policy of the French authorities to promote social integration or understanding between the Afars and Somalis, and even less between them and the French residents.

VI. FRENCH INTENTIONS IN RELATION TO THE TERRITORY

25. These are clear. They are to remain in the Territory and to defy all attempts by the OAU or the United Nations to bring about the liberation of the Territory in accordance with the right of self-determination of the peoples of the Territory.

26. In September 1964 and January 1965, the French authorities refused to allow an OAU Fact-Finding Mission to enter the Territory.

27. Le Figaro, on 22 March, reported that Mr. Messmer had reviewed a military parade of French troops in Djibouti and declared that "France possesses all the military potentialities to beat off any attack whatever and wherever it comes from and will stay in this country as long as she wants to."

28. Le Monde, on 24 March, reported that Mr. Messmer visited Addis Ababa at the invitation of the Emperor and talked with Haile Selassie. At the conclusion of their talk Mr. Messmer is reported to have said that "I conveyed to Emperor Haile Selassie that France has decided to stay in Djibouti and with that purpose in mind reinforced her military potentialities. The Sovereign did not object and our interview went on cordially."

29. The French will use every conceivable technique to encourage rivalry between Ethiopia and the Somali Republic, between Afars and Somalis within the Territory, and to alarm the foreign residents as to what will happen if France withdraws, so as to prolong her colonialist and oppressive hold. France will not hesitate to use expulsion, imprisonment and brutality in any form to put down any dissident elements within the Territory.

VII. ETHIOPIAN INTENTIONS IN RELATION TO THE TERRITORY

30. These are regarded by the Somali Government with utmost suspicion. Ethiopia sits on the Special Committee of Twenty-Four and the OAU Committee of Nine, yet in relation to French Somaliland it is clear that she has no wish to support the liberation of his Territory. All her interest is in the retention of the status quo with the profitable free transit through Djibouti and economic aid from France. Above all, Ethiopia is determined that French Somaliland shall not revert to the Somali peoples.

31. On 21 December 1963 the Ethiopian Foreign Minister was reported by AFP as having said:

"We cannot permit any attempt by Somalia to gain possession of Djibouti, for this port and its railroad are the very lungs of Ethiopia. Any such attempt by Somalis will be considered by us as a cause for war. Good sense demands the maintenance of the status quo in Djibouti" (translation from French).

32. In March 1964, in an interview with the Paris newspaper Le Figaro, the Ethiopian Ambassador said: "The French are our friends. We want them to stay in Djibouti..." It appears that, during the recent visit of the French Defence Minister to Addis Ababa in March 1965 the Emperor gave the same assurance.

33. However, Ethiopia's double game is transparent within the OAU. After the visit of the OAU Fact-Finding Commission to Ethiopia in January 1965 the Ethiopian newspapersⁱ were full of statements about Djibouti being Ethiopian.

34. Indeed, the Ethiopian Government carefully organized a "rally" at the airport at Dire Dawa on 20 January, in which crowds of people, purporting to come from French Somaliland, clamoured that "Djibouti is Ethiopia". As the Special Committee of Twenty-Four will doubtless realize, the Ethiopian authorities took good care to ensure that no Somalis were able to leave French Somaliland in order to meet the OAU Fact-Finding Mission whilst it was on Ethiopian territory.

35. It was during this same visit that a new "liberation front", called the Djibouti Liberation Movement, was created at Dire Dawa. It was created on the eve of the arrival of the OAU Fact-Finding Mission in Dire Dawa, a creature of the ⁱ See Ethiopian Herald, 22 and 23 January 1965, and Voice of Ethiopia, 22 January.

Ethiopian Government of which no one had ever heard previously. It is to be hoped that neither the OAU Mission, nor the Special Committee of Twenty-Four will be impressed by this somewhat naive manoeuvre.

36. In so far as Ethiopia's concern is to safeguard her economic interests in Djibouti and the railway, the Somali Government is not unsympathetic to this concern. It will help no one to cut off this outlet for Ethiopia. However, unless it be the wish of the people that Ethiopia assume sovereignty over the Territory (and the Somali Government is convinced it is not), there is no reason why these economic interests should not be guaranteed, under fair conditions, by a treaty negotiated under United Nations auspices and, in some sense, guaranteed by the United Nations. The Somali Republic would certainly be agreeable to a solution of this kind.

VIII. THE SOMALI REPUBLIC'S INTENTIONS TOWARDS THE TERRITORY

37. The Somali Republic's intentions are the reintegration of all territory inhabited by the Somali peoples into one nation-State, the Somali Republic, on the basis of the right of self-determination of the people of the Territory.

38. However, the Somali Republic firmly believes in the need to ensure that the expression of opinion of the people of the Territory should be a free and genuine one. Hence, it will be necessary for the United Nations to guarantee this right by a plebiscite, conducted by the United Nations within the Territory, and free from all outside pressure in whatever form.

39. The Somali Republic, mindful of the precedent of the United Nations Temporary Executive Authority over West Irian, believes that a United Nations administration for a period of time after French withdrawal will be essential in order to allow the people to form political parties, to canvass their ideas freely and to negotiate with each other without fear of oppression. This has never been possible under French rule, and the people of the Territory will need this little time to enable a true expression of their political will to emerge. A plebiscite immediately upon independence will only produce a highly artificial opinion which will show all the fruits of French and other foreign corruption and bribery. It is for this reason that the Somali Republic regards it as essential for the United Nations to guarantee to the people of the Territory complete freedom from all external pressures.

40. Therefore, on behalf of the oppressed peoples of French Somaliland, who remain under French colonial rule in flagrant denial of their right of self-determination and of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960, the Somali Government would urge the following action as a matter of urgency:

(1) The United Nations should affirm that French Somaliland is a Non-Self-Governing Territory to which resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960 applies.

(2) The United Nations should affirm the right of the people of French Somaliland to self-determination, in accordance with their freely expressed wishes.

(3) The United Nations should call upon France to grant immediate independence to the Territory, within the spirit of the resolution of the General Assembly and the United Nations Charter, and to withdraw its armed forces, officials and all other instrumentalities of control over the people of French Somaliland.

(4) The United Nations should call upon all other States to abstain from all forms of pressure direct and indirect, calculated to distort the free expression of the right of self-determination of the people.

(5) The United Nations should, immediately upon the grant of independence to the Territory, assume the administration of the Territory for a period of two years so as to allow the formation of a political consensus within the Territory as to its future.

(6) The United Nations should, during the period of administration, permit the return to the Territory of all those people who, during the past ten years, have been expelled or exiled from the Territory by the French, subject to a proper United Nations scrutiny of their genuine association with the Territory.

ANNEX III

[A/AC.109/122]

Memorandum dated 8 June 1965 from the Permanent Mission of Ethiopia to the United Nations addressed to the Special Committee

1. Despite the widely representative character of the membership of the Special Committee of Twenty-Four, we have always felt an inner pride in the dedicated spirit with which our membership has always sought to discharge its sacred mandates. Oblivious to the remoteness, size or stage of progress of any Territory under discussion, we believe we all have, in our various roles, exerted no small effort in the performance of our functions, effort no less dedicated than it would be were each one of us to defend the vital interests of his particular nation. That is, of course, as it should be—and herein, we think, lies the real importance of our tasks.

2. Yet, there are also occasions when one or more members of this Committee have to exercise greater initiative and vigour in the discussion concerning any given territory, not because of any lack of interest on the part of the other members, but rather because, due to the vagaries of history, the accidents of geographic proximity, and the many other chain effects of the historical process, some neighbouring countries are so closely involved with the subject matter that they feel an even greater responsibility in reaching expeditious and just solutions to problems taken up in this Committee. The Territory of Djibouti is such a one and has, therefore, particular significance for our country.

3. The Ethiopian delegation finds it sufficiently important to establish, at the outset, the question of designation of this Territory under review. We do not think the members of the Committee need to be reminded of the fact that one of the most effective instruments whereby the dismemberment of the vast number of countries in Africa was achieved during the heyday of European colonialism was precisely the invention of new names to denote artificially created territorial entities. Thus it was that the term "French Somaliland" came to be coined and subsequently perpetuated as a proper name for a Territory which we in Ethiopia more correctly call Djibouti. In so far as the Ethiopian delegation is concerned, the present discussions pertain solely to the Territory of Djibouti. Once this important point has been made clear, it remains for us to proceed to the substance of the matter.

4. The Territory of Djibouti, with an area of about 23,000 square kilometres and located in the eastern region of Ethiopia, is bounded on the east by the western shore of the Red Sea and on the west and north by Ethiopia. It has a short frontier with the Republic of Somalia to the south-east. Out of a total land frontier of about 500 kilometres, no less than 400 kilometres constitutes the frontier length between Ethiopia and Djibouti. Physically, Djibouti is part of the Great Rift Valley, which stretches from the Red Sea and runs through Ethiopia and all the way to Tanzania. The Valley forms a single physical unit. Djibouti itself is situated at the extremity of the Awash Valley. An arid land, Djibouti has very little or no rainfall, which makes it impossible for any sort of agriculture or cultivation to flourish. Its climate is one of the hottest in the world. To complete the physical and demographic description of the Territory, we need only add that the total population of Djibouti is less than 80,000, approximately half of which resides in the major town which carries the name of the Territory itself.

5. History attests to the fact that for several millennia the entire area known as the Horn of Africa formed part of and was within the jurisdiction of Ethiopia. The tribes which inhabited the coastal areas of Djibouti, no less than others in the vast land area were under the Ethiopian sovereignty, acknowledged the sovereign rights of Ethiopia over Djibouti and regularly paid tribute to the Ethiopian Crown. Nor can it be disputed that up to about a century ago, the several strategic and commercial ports along the coasts of the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean were Ethiopian ports serving the enormous hinterlands.

6. While Ethiopian sovereignty was acknowledged over those territories, including, of course, Djibouti, there were, nevertheless, periodic foreign attempts at their occupation. One such instance was the unsuccessful attempt, during the seventeenth century and in the subsequent period, by the Ottoman Sultan, Selim I, to impose Turkish sovereignty over the Djibouti coastal area. The Sultan's Decree, proclaiming the Red Sea coastal territory as Turkish proved, however, to be of little practical effect, and the Turkish influence was never permanently consolidated in that part of Africa. Naturally, Ethiopia never ceased, over the decades, to assert her rights over her territories on the coast, and on many occasions was compelled to resort to force of arms to oust the invading army illegally stationed on her soil. This period has a further significance in that the de jure dependence on the authority of the Ethiopian sovereign of the local chiefs of Djibouti remained intact—a situation which called forth a positive reaction from, and tacit acceptance by, more than one European power in the nineteenth century. From the point of view of the present discussion, however, the most interesting period in the history of the Territory is the latter half of the nineteenth century, a period which has subsequently been dubbed by historians as the "scramble for Africa". It was during this period that the Territory of Djibouti acquired the status of a separate, although ill-defined, territory for the first time in its entire history.

7. The interest manifested by France vis-à-vis Djibouti stemmed from the construction of the Suez Canal, which transformed the Red Sea from a torrid cul de sac into an international waterway. In order to effectively control military and other traffic and to seize important economic areas in the interior of the African continent, it became imperative for France and other European powers to acquire quickly as much land as possible on both sides of the Red Sea. In these undertakings, described by some historians as "pirating the coastal lands of the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean", at least three European powers were involved, of whom France had her eyes on Djibouti. Between 1862 and 1885, France coerced local chiefs to sign a series of agreements by which several small units of land in and around the Gulf of Tadjourah were acquired. In 1885, the French Government announced by decree the establishment of the "Côte française des Somalis et dépendances".

8. It may be asked at this point why and how local chiefs could "sell" land that was under the sovereignty of a legitimate Government and its people. The answer is as simple as it is tragic; it is human frailty, which rests at the bottom of Africa's history during that unfortunate period. Distances were great and communications difficult; the colonial powers were armed to the teeth, and the African nationalists were unable to stop their unwarranted assault. Taking advantage of the adverse circumstances of the African Governments and peoples, colonial agents tempted weaker chiefs, through gifts and intimidation to sign treaties, the provisions and implications of which they did not understand. Nevertheless, it is obviously one thing to "sell" or "cede" a territory in theory, without any legal competence whatsoever; quite another matter to effectively dispose of and lawfully transfer possession of land to a third party. But we need not for the present dwell on this particular point.

9. A brief glance at the history of the last decade of the nineteenth century reveals that the period was one of the most trying in the entire history of Ethiopia. The three-pronged move against the Ethiopian hinterland, already being unremittingly pursued by the colonial powers had, by 1896, reached alarming proportions, so much so that Ethiopia, fighting for survival, had no option except to rise up in arms against the colonial advance from the north. Although the victory of Adowa gave Ethiopia a brief respite, the Ethiopian people, exhausted as they were from repelling the assaults from separate directions, were hardly in a position to wage yet another battle within a year. Thus, forced by circumstances and anxious to retain as much of her ancient land as was possible, Ethiopia was compelled, in 1897, to conclude with France a frontier treaty regarding the newly created Territory of Djibouti.

10. While that painful colonialist era is almost past history, there is, of course, some unfinished business in the disposal of which we are privileged to participate. It is the duty of the Special Committee, indeed its raison d'être, to make speedy and concrete recommendations regarding the form and manner by which the remaining colonial Territories shall be effectively emancipated. The Ethiopian Government will, as always, give its full support and co-operation in carrying out the speedy and full implementation of the colonial Territories. It is with this in mind and in the hope of setting out the accurate historical development of the Territory of Djibouti that the Ethiopian delegation has taken the opportunity of presenting this short Memorandum.

11. Census authorities estimate a total population of not more than 80,000 in the Territory of Djibouti. Virtually all the inhabitants of the Territory reside in two areas: the first has a line of the Franco-Ethiopian Railway as its southern boundary and the peninsula of Buri as its northern limit. The second area in which a good portion of the people live is circumscribed by the Red Sea and the upthrust of the Ethiopian highlands. Djibouti's inhabitants comprise, besides French administrators and businessmen who form a very small segment of the population, two basically different racial groups: the Danakils and the Issas. Census authorities report further that the total number of the Danakils is approximately 200,000, of whom 40,000 inhabit Djibouti, forming over half the population of that Territory. The balance of 160,000 Danakils are inhabitants of Ethiopia, with highest concentration in the provinces of Harrar, Wollo and Eritrea. The total Issa population is estimated at 150,000, of whom 20,000 live in the Territory of Djibouti, and of the balance, more than 100,000 Issas reside in Ethiopia. The Issas in Djibouti are concentrated in an area far smaller than that occupied by the Afars. We wish to add here that the paramount chiefs of the Afars and Issas, who are so acknowledged by the tribesmen of Djibouti, live in Ethiopia. The principal language spoken in Djibouti is Danakil. French and Arabic are also spoken.

12. What we have outlined so far refers mainly to the demography and the inhabitants of Djibouti. But it is no less significant to the Territory to note that the economic and commercial activities as exist in the Territory are, by and large, the result of the establishment within Djibouti of the port facilities as is reflected in the report of the Liberation Committee of the Organization of African Unity (OAU). Prior to that period, the region itself was so sparsely populated as to discourage any economic and commercial enterprise.

13. The driving force for the construction of a seaport at Djibouti to serve as a major coaling station for French warships bound for the Far East was, of course, imperial strategy. Nevertheless, it was the construction of this seaport which gave birth to the town of Djibouti. Circumstances have, however, changed so drastically in the interval that today Djibouti owes its sustenance almost entirely to its position as the terminus of the Franco-Ethiopian Railway which connects the interior of Ethiopia with the coast. In considering the Territory of Djibouti, it is therefore important to bear this basic fact in mind.

14. We believe a brief exposé of the history of the Franco-Ethiopian Railway at this juncture will contribute to a better understanding of the subject under discussion.

15. The Franco-Ethiopian Railway was built under a concession granted by the Emperor Menelik in 1894 to private French interest. The concession was subsequently taken over and the railway built by the French Government itself. Completion of the line between Djibouti and Addis Ababa was effected in 1918, and from that time until the present day this rail line has served as the principal link between the Ethiopian highlands and the Red Sea. A treaty which was concluded between Ethiopia and France in 1959 provided for the ownership and control of the railway to be divided equally between the two nations. Although formally concluded between the Ethiopian and the French Governments, the 1959 treaty has received the approval of the Territorial Assembly in Djibouti.

16. Note must be made of the fact that a significant portion of Ethiopia's total imports and exports today flows through Djibouti. (In 1961-1962, for example, the ratio of freight trans-shipped through Djibouti to Assab, Djibouti's natural competitor for shipments to the Ethiopian highlands, was roughly 2:3.) It is clear, however, that were shipments emanating from or intended for Ethiopia destination directed through other ports, the raison d'être for Djibouti's existence as a separate economic entity would largely disappear. Djibouti's other principal activity today is as a fuelling stop for vessels passing through the Red Sea, but eliminate the cargo of Ethiopian origin or destination which today brings freighters to Djibouti, and fuelling could equally well be carried on elsewhere.

17. Under the Franco-Ethiopian Railway Treaty, concluded in 1959, Ethiopian customs officials are stationed in Djibouti, and shipments to Ethiopia are sealed there for trans-shipment to their ultimate destination. In order to equalize prices on goods trans-shipped through Djibouti and Ethiopian ports, customs duties are assessed on the landed Djibouti value. The agreement also provides for relatively unrestricted use by Ethiopia of Djibouti port facilities: for example, the Ethiopian Government may build or purchase processing and manufacturing facilities within the port area and move and store its goods free of all local taxes except port fees.

18. The facts we have briefly mentioned make it clear that the Territory's economic activity is linked exclusively with Ethiopia. Even the water drunk in Djibouti is carried from Ethiopia in tank cars. While the Djibouti branches of the Banque de l'Indochine and the Banque Nationale pour le Commerce et l'Industrie maintain representatives at Addis Ababa, their principal function has been to finance coffee exports; they do not accept deposits. Similarly, the branch of the Commercial Bank of Ethiopia in Djibouti is engaged principally in financing Ethiopian trade passing through the port. Local industry in Djibouti itself is minimal. The major companies which operate in Djibouti maintain only branches there, while their main offices are located in Addis Ababa.

19. Today, Djibouti constitutes one terminus of the rail line linking the coast with the Ethiopian highlands. As such, it has played and could continue to play a vital role in Ethiopia's economy and her future development. Djibouti is the gateway providing access to the eastern, the southern and central regions of Ethiopia, and this constitutes a vital avenue to the peaceful growth of these portions of the Ethiopian nation. The future of the areas thus opened to the sea is to a considerable extent dependent upon free access to the great lines of world trade.

20. This exposition is intended only to indicate the principal lines of inquiry, which, it is suggested, must be pursued if an accurate and complete picture of the present and future of Djibouti is to be drawn. It is clear that such inquiry must take full account of both ancient and the more recent history of Djibouti; of the geographic characteristics of the Territory; and of the economic prospects for the Territory, considered apart from existing French interests there.

21. It is pertinent to observe that the diverse names which are haphazardly applied to the Territory are misnomers. Obviously, the land belongs to those who have historically inhabited it, and there can be no dispute on that point. But the term "Djibouti" has, at least, the virtue of being precise without leading the reader or the listener into those misunderstandings which can only create confusion and uncertainty when clarity and precision are essential.

22. Some of the conclusions to be drawn from the sober facts we have presented are self-evident—so much so as to require no repetition. Suffice it that we mention only three:

(1) Djibouti from time immemorial has formed part of Ethiopia. Not until the partitioning of Africa in the heyday of European colonialism did Djibouti achieve its so-called separate status.

(2) Viewed geographically, Djibouti forms an integral part of the Ethiopian land mass.

(3) Economically, Djibouti's life is completely dependent upon Ethiopia and has no existence apart from the Ethiopian economy.

23. These are the clear conclusions that, in our opinion, must be arrived at after a dispassionate consideration of all the facts pertaining to the Territory of Djibouti. Our chief purpose in so doing is to give as factual a picture as possible of the situation obtaining in that area in order to assist the Committee in forming an objective view of the matter, which should lead to a fruitful and effective discussion. We need hardly add that it is not, and never has been, the intention of the Ethiopian delegation to derogate, in any way, the principle of self-determination, which is the clear mandate of this Committee to apply. Our sole purpose, we repeat, is a full presentation of facts in order to facilitate the work of the Committee.

24. In conclusion, we would like to assure the Special Committee that Ethiopia stands ready to support unreservedly any measures which take into full account, inter alia, the geographic, historical and economic factors, and the realities which must, ultimately, determine the future of the Territory of Djibouti. The Ethiopian Government is confident that the decision of this Committee will contribute to peace in that area and to the increase in happiness and prosperity of the inhabitants of the Territory of Djibouti.

CHAPTER XIII*

OMAN

A. PREVIOUS CONSIDERATION AND ACTION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

1. The question of Oman was included in the agenda of the General Assembly at its fifteenth, sixteenth and seventeenth sessions and was referred to the Special Political Committee for consideration. At the fifteenth session, the Special Political Committee considered the question but decided, because of lack of time, to postpone further consideration of the question until the sixteenth session. At the sixteenth and seventeenth sessions, the Special Political Committee approved draft resolutions¹ whereby the General Assembly, recalling its resolutions 1514 (XV), would recognize the right of the people of Oman to self-determination and independence, call for the withdrawal of foreign forces from Oman, and invite the parties concerned to settle peacefully their differences with a view to restoring normal conditions in Oman. The General Assembly, however, did not adopt these draft resolutions at its plenary meetings because they failed to receive the necessary two-thirds majority.

2. At the 1191st plenary meeting of the General Assembly at its seventeenth session, the representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, on behalf of the Sultan of Muscat and Oman, extended an invitation to a representative of the Secretary-General of the United Nations to visit the Sultanate on a personal basis to obtain first-hand information on the situation there. Subsequently, the Secretary-General appointed Mr. Herbert de Ribbing, Swedish Ambassador to Spain, as his Special Representative to undertake that task. Mr. de Ribbing visited Oman in June 1963 and submitted a report which was made available to the General Assembly at its eighteenth session.²

3. At the eighteenth session, the question of Oman was again included in the agenda of the General Assembly and referred to the Fourth Committee for consideration. A draft resolution recommended by the Fourth Committee was adopted by the General Assembly on 11 December 1963, as resolution 1948 (XVIII). By this resolution, the Assembly took note of the report of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and decided to establish an Ad Hoc Committee to examine the question of Oman and to report to it at its nineteenth session.

4. The Ad Hoc Committee on Oman was composed of Afghanistan, Costa Rica, Nepal, Nigeria and Senegal. It held twenty-five meetings at Headquarters and visited Cairo in the United Arab Republic, Dammam in Saudi Arabia and Kuwait where it interviewed petitioners from the Territory, as well as the Imam of Oman. The Chairman of the Committee also had talks with the Sultan of Muscat and Oman in London. The Ad Hoc Committee submitted its report to the General Assembly on 8 January 1965.³

5. The question of Oman was one of the many items included in the provisional agenda of the General Assembly, which it was unable to consider at its nineteenth session. At the twentieth session, the item was referred to the Fourth Committee for consideration. A draft resolution recommended by the Fourth Committee was adopted by the General Assembly at its 1399th plenary meeting on 17 December 1965 as resolution 2073 (XX). The resolution reads as follows:

"The General Assembly,

"Having considered the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Oman,³

"Recalling its resolutions 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960 and 1948 (XVIII) of 11 December 1963,

"Having heard the statements by the representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and by the petitioners,

"Deeply concerned at the serious situation arising from colonial policies and foreign intervention by the United Kingdom in the Territory,

"1. Takes note of the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Oman and expresses appreciation to the Committee for its efforts;

"2. Deplores the attitude of the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the authorities in the Territory for refusing to co-operate with the Ad Hoc Committee on Oman and for not facilitating its visit to the Territory;

"3. Recognizes the inalienable right of the people of the Territory as a whole to self-determination and independence in accordance with their freely expressed wishes;

"4. Considers that the colonial presence of the United Kingdom in its various forms prevents the people of the Territory from exercising their rights to self-determination and independence;

"5. Calls upon the Government of the United Kingdom to effect immediately the implementation in the Territory of the following measures:

"(a) Cessation of all repressive actions against the people of the Territory;

"(b) Withdrawal of British troops;

"(c) Release of political prisoners and political detainees and return of political exiles to the Territory;

"(d) Elimination of British domination in any form;

"6. Invites the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples to examine the situation in the Territory;

"7. Requests the Secretary-General to take, in consultation with the Special Committee, appropriate measures for the implementation of the present resolution and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its twenty-first session."

B. INFORMATION ON OMAN

Introduction

6. It has been noted in both the report of the Secretary-General's Special Representative and the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Oman, that the term "Oman" had been used in different ways in the past. In a general sense it has meant the whole area from Dhofar, east of the Aden Protectorate in the south of Arabia, to Qatar in the north, "with the sea and the desert as ultimate frontiers". In more recent history, it has been applied to a loosely defined political entity comprising the interior of what now constitutes the Sultanate of Muscat and Oman. At times, however, both "Oman" and "Muscat" have been interchangeably used to describe the whole extent of the area ruled from Muscat by the Sultan.

7. In the course of the debate on Oman which took place in the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly at its twentieth session, the view was expressed by some delegations that the territory of Oman comprised the Trucial Sheikdoms as well as the Sultanate of Muscat and Oman. The representative of the United Kingdom, on the other hand, affirmed that the item before the Fourth Committee solely concerned the territory of the Sultanate and that other territories mentioned in the debate, such as Sharjah and Abu Dhabi were located outside the Sultanate. During the consideration of the draft resolution which was subsequently adopted by the General Assembly, a question was put to the co-sponsors as to whether the expression "Territory as a whole" in the text of the resolution was meant to include Muscat and the Trucial States. In reply it was stated that the Territory of Oman should comprise the whole geographical area referred to above, and should include the Trucial Sheikdoms as well as the Sultanate of Muscat and Oman. Accordingly, information is given below under two main headings: the Sultanate of Muscat and Oman and the Trucial Sheikdoms.

1. Sultanate of Muscat and Oman

General

8. The Sultanate of Muscat and Oman lies at the extreme south-east of the Arabian Peninsula, east of the Rub-al-Khali desert. Its sea coast extends for some 1,000 miles (1,600 kilometres) and its total area is approximately 82,000 square miles (212,000 square kilometres). Physically, the Territory consists of three main geographical divisions: a coastal plain, the Batinah; the Hajar mountain range stretching from north-west to south-east and broken by a stream-bed, the Wadi Samail; and a barren plateau with an average height of 1,000 feet (300 metres) extending to the edge of the desert. The north-western section of the plateau is called the Dhahirah and the south-eastern section the Sharqiyah. In the far south, and separated from Oman by the desert, lie the fertile plains of Dhofar. In addition the Sultanate includes the northern tip of Cape Musandam known as Ru'us-al-Jibal.

9. The total population of Muscat and Oman is estimated at over 750,000; it is concentrated in the Jabal al Akhdar (Green Mountain) area in the western Hajar, in Batinah and in Dhofar. Muscat, the capital, has an estimated population of about 6,200 and nearby Matrah about 14,000. Nearly all the people are Moslem Arabs. With the exception of those living in the main towns, the people are organized into tribes. There are said to be over 200 distinguishable tribes.

10. Muscat and Oman has, in the past, been under two different political régimes. From the eighth century onwards it was an independent State ruled by an Imam who exercised both spiritual and temporal authority. About 1875, with the death of Imam Ahmed bin Said, the first Sultanate was established in Muscat on the coast. Early in the nineteenth century the predominant institution was the Sultanate, but the Imamate was revived in the interior of the country once in 1868 and again in 1913. According to the Ad Hoc Committee on Oman, the interior of Oman was an autonomous political entity under two successive Imams, Salim bin Rashid al-Kharusi and Mohamed bin Abdullah al-Khalili, from 1913 until 1955 when it was occupied by the Sultan's forces with British assistance. Although the boundaries of the Imamate were not clearly defined, it included the Jabal al Akhdar, the Dhahirah, the Sharqiyah and the Ja'lan. The Imamate seemed to have had the normal attributes of a State, with a Head of State, a Higher Council, an Assembly and its own system of administration.

11. The Ad Hoc Committee stated that the Imam was considered by his followers as the Head of State and was elected by "the leaders, elders and notables of the people from various levels and tribes" in consultation with religious figures. The Imam's authority was exercised in all fields—religious, political and judicial—in accordance with Islamic law. He was bound to consult the Higher Council in all major problems. The Assembly was composed of the members of the Higher Council, walis and tribal leaders and met whenever the Imam decided to convene it.

12. The present Imam, Ghalib bin Ali, was elected in 1954. He lives in exile in Saudi Arabia. He has a Higher Council which includes several Sheikhs from the leading tribes in the area, and a Revolutionary Council whose aims are "to direct the struggle of the people to regain their independence, and to educate and train them, both inside and outside the country."⁴

The Revolutionary Council has a Military Committee, a Financial Committee, a Cultural Committee and a Secretariat. It has appointed representatives to the Arab League and to several Arab States.

13. The present Sultan has maintained that all the people of Oman are his subjects and that there have never been two States. His family had been in power in Muscat and Oman for over 220 years and it was difficult for him to give information on other historical points.

Relationship with the United Kingdom

Treaties and agreements

14. British association with Muscat dates back to 1798, when a treaty was signed between Muscat and the East India Company, in which the former promised to exclude the French from its territory for the duration of the war which was then going on between France and England. Several other treaties and agreements were concluded in subsequent years between the United Kingdom and the Sultans, including the Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation of 1891, the Agreement regarding the Cession of Territory by the Sultan of Oman of 1891, the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation of 1939, the Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation and Exchange of Letters of 1951 and the Exchange of Letters concerning the Sultan's Armed Forces, Civil Aviation, Royal Air Force Facilities and Economic Development in Muscat and Oman of 1958. A detailed analysis of these instruments was set forth by the Ad Hoc Committee on Oman in its report. The written instruments on which the present relationship between the Sultanate and the United Kingdom is based, namely, the Treaty and Exchange of Letters of 1951 and the Exchange of Letters of 1958, are reproduced in full in annex I of this chapter.

United Kingdom representation in the Sultanate

15. The United Kingdom has had an official representative in Muscat since 1861. His title was first Political Agent. In 1867 it was changed to Political Agent and Consul. In 1951 the term Political Agent was dropped. At the present time the United Kingdom representative in Muscat has the rank of Consul-General. In the memorandum submitted by the United Kingdom to the Ad Hoc Committee on Oman,⁵ it was stated that British interests in Eastern Arabia had been the responsibility of the Government of India prior to 1947; British diplomatic relations with Governments in the area, including those with the Sultanate of Muscat and Oman had been conducted by members of the Indian Political Service who had employed styles and titles used by that Service.

16. Since 1861 the British Consul-General has been responsible to the British Political Resident in the Persian Gulf, whose headquarters is in Bahrain. The latter is responsible to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in London. In addition to the administration of justice described below (paras. 18-24), the Political Resident is responsible for certain other functions relating to the Territory. He has an over-all responsibility for the postal services and telegraphic communications in the Sultanate and in other States in the area. These services are administered by a Postal Superintendent of the United Kingdom General Post Office which defrays the costs and receives the revenue from postage. These roughly balance. Telegraphic communications are conducted by Cable and Wireless Ltd., under an agreement with the Sultan's Government. The Ad Hoc Committee on Oman noted that the Sultanate had no stamps of its own and used over-printed United Kingdom stamps. The Political Resident also controls exchange transactions effected through the banks.

17. The administration of airfields which have been established in the Territory under the 1934 Civil Air Agreement fall within the jurisdiction of the Political Resident. By this Agreement the United Kingdom received permission to establish airfields in the Sultanate. The United Kingdom acts as the agent of the Sultan in all aviation matters. While the airfield at Masirah Island is used for staging purposes, Salalah airfield is considered as an international airport for civil airlines and is managed by the United Kingdom on behalf of the Sultan according to international rules and regulations. Use of the airfields by the Royal Air Force is governed by a separate agreement between the Sultan and the United Kingdom.

Extraterritorial rights

18. The United Kingdom has enjoyed extraterritorial jurisdiction over British subjects and protected persons in the Territory since 1891. In its memorandum to the Ad Hoc Committee on Oman, the United Kingdom stated that the extent of the jurisdiction allowed in the 1891 and 1939 commercial treaties had been greatly reduced by successive changes, both in and since the Treaty of 1951. The agreement providing for this limited degree of extraterritorial jurisdiction is due to expire on 31 December 1966.

19. The Muscat Order, 1955,⁶ which repealed the previous Muscat Order in Council of 1949, defined the powers of the United Kingdom Government in the field of "jurisdiction within the territories of the Sultan of Muscat and Oman". The Order was first amended in 1958, mainly to give effect to an agreement concluded between the United Kingdom and the Sultan, transferring to him jurisdiction over Indian nationals. By a second amendment issued in 1959 the Political Resident in the Persian Gulf who had hitherto himself been the Judge of the Chief Court for the Persian Gulf, was relieved of his judicial functions and provision was made for the appointment of professional magistrates to exercise the jurisdiction of the Court.

20. Cases heard by the British courts apply to: (a) citizens of the United Kingdom, its colonies and Southern Rhodesia who are not Moslems; (b) British protected persons who are not Moslems; (c) members of British naval, military and air forces, as well as of any "levy or police force raised by or under the authority of Her Majesty in any territory under Her protection". Civil suits arising from acts committed not on duty are excepted unless the person is subject to British jurisdiction under another provision of the Order; (d) corporations incorporated in the United Kingdom or in any Territory under the sovereignty, protection or trusteeship of the United Kingdom (with the exception of certain British protected areas in the Persian Gulf and Aden); (e) Commonwealth citizens, whether Moslem or not, with the exception of those from India, Pakistan and Zanzibar (if the Sultan's Government or a Muscat subject is involved, British jurisdiction is excluded); (f) British ships and aircraft.

21. The Muscat Order makes provision for a Full Court, a Chief Court and a Consular Court. The first two Courts usually sit in Bahrain, and have a wider jurisdiction comprising Bahrain, Qatar and the Trucial States. Ordinarily they are concerned with appeals from the Consular Court. The final court of appeal is the Privy Council although sentences are subject to confirmation by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Certain civil actions may be assigned by the Consul to the Registrar. The Political Resident may appoint a Crown Prosecutor who would discharge the duties ordinarily performed by the Attorney General.

22. The laws applied in the Courts were formerly those of British India, but a special Penal Code based on the old British Code used in Palestine and simpler rules of criminal procedure have been introduced. The Court has powers of prohibition or deportation against persons subject to the Order who are dangerous to peace and order or endeavour to excite enmity or intrigue between the people of Muscat and Her Majesty or the Sultan. If a person subject to the Order is considered undesirable by the Sultan, the Court, on application by the Consul, has to order his or her expulsion from the Sultanate.

23. Mixed cases are dealt with as follows: a person not subject to the Muscat Order may institute a complaint against a person subject to it to the Consular Court provided he satisfies certain deposit requirements. In civil matters, the case may also be referred to arbitration with the consent of all the parties. If a person to whom the Order applies has instituted a complaint against a person in a Shari'a (Islamic law) court and wishes to appeal against the decision of this court, he may apply to the Consul who in turn may request the Sultan or his representative to refer the case to a Shari'a court of appeal.

24. The Political Resident is empowered to issue "Queen's Regulations" to cover matters not specifically provided for in the Order or in the legislation applied by it, and to repeal or amend such regulations. These regulations apply to persons under British jurisdiction only. Furthermore, laws issued by the Sultan on such matters as customs duties, imports and exports, alcoholic liquor, drug traffic, air navigation and the acquisition of land are made applicable to persons subject to British jurisdiction by means of these regulations.

Government

The Sultan

25. The Sultan is a traditional ruler who exercises supreme authority over his subjects. His authority is based on customs and understandings which have their origin in the tribal system prevailing in most of the country. There is no constitution or elected representative institution. The sheikhs or tribal heads are responsible for a wide range of problems affecting the tribes, but the Sultan can remove a sheikh for misbehaviour and appoint another.

26. The present Sultan, Said bin Taimur, has ruled Muscat and Oman since the abdication of his father in 1932. The dynasty, the Al Bu Said, dates back to the second half of the eighteenth century and has exercised control in varying degrees over the territories of the old Imamate of Oman. At certain periods of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, the Sultanate was unable to rule the interior of Oman which reverted to the election of an Imam and attempted to unseat the Sultan residing in Muscat.

27. The capital of the Sultanate is Muscat, although the Sultan's normal residence is at Salalah in Dhofar. The administration of the provinces and main centres of population is in the hands of walis (governors) who are responsible to the Sultan through the Minister of the Interior. However, wherever a particular tribe is in a dominating position, the sheikhs retain their authority. On the whole, the walis have to act as much as possible through the sheikhs. In case of a dispute between a wali and an important seikh, the Sultan himself intervenes. In his report, the Special Representative of the Secretary-General stated that since 1957 the Sultan had made increasing use of walis to implement his decisions. Power was gradually being transferred to the central Government.

28. The functions of the walis include the collection of taxes on produce (zakat) and the settlement of minor disputes. In 1963 the number of walis was over thirty.

29. In 1965 the administration of the Sultan included the Personal Adviser, Major F. C. L. Chauncy, the Minister of the Interior, Syaid Ahmed bin Ibrahim, the Military Secretary, Brigadier Waterfield, and the Secretary for External Affairs, Khan Bahadur Maqbul Husain (acting).

30. There is a Municipal Committee for the two coastal towns of Muscat and Matrah. Its members are appointed and its chairman is the wali of Matrah.

Judiciary

31. The local courts of Muscat and Oman are Sahri'a courts applying Islamic law. They exist in nearly all the districts. The judges or cadis are appointed by the Sultan and handle cases between Moslems. Proceedings against non-Moslems or citizens of the United Kingdom and some other Commonwealth countries are subject to the extraterritorial jurisdiction of the British Consul-General described in paragraphs 18 to 24 above. At Muscat there is a bench of cadis and a Chief Court which settles appeals.

Armed forces

32. The Special Representative of the Secretary-General stated in his report that the troops present in Oman in 1963 were formally and technically the Sultan's armed forces with British officers in senior positions. Their strength amounted to 2,333 men, of whom 304 belonged to the gendarmerie engaged mainly in anti-smuggling activities. Plans were to raise the strength to 2,480 men. There were twenty-six seconded British army officers and sixteen local officers, the highest in rank among them being second lieutenant. There were also thirty-five officers on contract, of whom thirty were British and five Pakistani. In addition there were six foreign non-commissioned officers, mostly British. The Sultan's air force consisted of eight planes and ten seconded Royal Air Force personnel.

Economy

33. The economy is mainly pastoral and agricultural. The areas where cultivation is possible are Dhofar in the south, the district around Nazwa in Central Oman and the Batinah coastal plain. The chief products are dates, fish and cereals (the latter being grown for local consumption), as well as limes and other fruit. Breeding of livestock, particularly camels, is widely practised.

34. The chief exports of Muscat and Oman are dates, dried limes, dried fish, tobacco leaf, hides, goat hair and vegetables. Imports include rice, wheat, flour, sugar, cement, vehicles and accessories, cotton piece goods and other consumer goods. A part of these imports is financed by the oil companies from their exploration and other operations. In 1963, the value of total imports was around £2.7 million, excluding duty-free imports for government use which were estimated at £500,000. Trade is mainly with the United Kingdom, India, Pakistan, neighbouring territories and Australia.

35. In 1964, exports to the United Kingdom amounted to £30,569, as against £2,235 in 1963. Imports from the United Kingdom were valued at £1,575,300, as against £1,239,296 in 1963, and re-exports from the United Kingdom at £41,558 as against £15,534 in 1963.

Oil

36. The first oil concession was obtained by a foreign company in 1937, when a subsidiary of the Iraq Petroleum Company, Petroleum Development (Oman) Ltd., was granted a 75-year concession extending over the whole area except Dhofar. In 1953, a concession covering Dhofar was granted to Dhofar Cities Service Petroleum Corporation for a period of twenty-five years from the date of commercial production. In 1960, Petroleum Development (Oman) Ltd., was acquired by Royal Dutch Shell and Partex.

37. No oil has yet been produced in commercial quantities, although active exploration has been going on for years. However, in 1964, Petroleum Development (Oman) Ltd., announced that drilling had proved the existence of sufficient reserves to go into commercial production. Export of crude oil was expected to start in the second half of 1967 at a rate of about six or seven million tons a year. A pipeline was to be built through Wadi Sumail to an oil loading terminal at Saih-al-Malih, a few miles to the west of Muscat town.

38. The revenue of the Sultanate is derived mainly from customs receipts and annual payments by the oil companies. According to the latest figures annual revenue amounts to about £1,128,000. In addition, subsidies are paid by the United Kingdom Government towards development. Under the Agreement concluded between the Sultan and the United Kingdom in 1958, the latter agreed to assist in carrying out "a civil development programme which will include the improvement of roads, medical and educational facilities and an agricultural research programme" (see annex I). According to the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, financial assistance has greatly increased since August 1960; in 1963-1964 it amounted to approximately £190,000, chiefly from United Kingdom funds.

39. The Development Department which was established in 1959 has set up two agricultural experimental stations, one at Nazwa and one at Suhar; research is carried out on irrigation and fertilization techniques and on the cultivation under local conditions of improved varieties of wheat, sorghum, fruit, vegetables, pulses and cotton. Approximately 46 per cent of the Department's budget in 1963 was allocated to health services, 15 per cent to the maintenance of tracks and about 15 per cent to agriculture.

2. THE TRUCIAL SHEIKDOMS

General

40. The Trucial Sheikhdoms lie north of the Rub-al-Khali, between the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia and the Sultanate of Muscat and Oman; the area, also known as Trucial Oman or the Trucial Coast, extends for nearly 400 miles from the south-eastern end of the peninsula of Qatar along the southern coast of the Persian Gulf to the Gulf of Oman. The boundaries of the Trucial Coast have not been clearly demarcated and in several places have been the subject of disputes with neighbouring countries. The total area is estimated roughly at 32,000 square miles (83,000 square kilometres).

41. No census has ever been taken of the population: the estimated total is 110,000, of whom about one tenth are nomads. Dubai, the largest town, has a population of about 55,000 and serves as a commercial centre for the whole area. The majority of the population are Moslem Arabs with some Indians, Pakistanis, Iranians and Europeans in the main towns.

42. There are seven separate political entities each headed by a Sheikh or Ruler. The Sheikhdoms are the following (from west to east): Abu Dhabi, Dubai, Ajman, Sharjah, Umm al Qaiwain, Ras al Khaimah and Fujairah. When the general Treaty of Peace was signed in 1820, there were only five Sheikhdoms. In 1866, on the death of the Sheikh of Sharjah (of the Qasimi tribe) his domains were divided among his four sons, the separate branches of the family being established at Sharjah, Ras al Khaimah, and two towns on the east coast of Cape Musandam, namely Dibah and Kalba. The British recognized Ras al Khaimah as an independent Sheikhdom in 1921; Kalba was recognized as independent in 1936, Dibah then being regarded as part of it. In 1951, the Sheikh of Kalba was assassinated; since he had no direct male line, Kalba was reincorporated in Sharjah in 1952. In the same year, Fujairah was recognized as independent when its Ruler undertook to accept all the treaties and agreements in force between the other Rulers and the United Kingdom Government.

Relationship with the United KingdomTreaties and agreements

43. Contacts between the East India Company and the rulers of the Sheikhdoms date back to the seventeenth century, but it was not until 1806 that the first Agreement was signed with the Sheikh of the Qasimi (Jasimi) tribe. In 1820, following hostilities between a British naval expedition and local Sheikhs at Ras al Khaimah and other points of the Oman coast a general "Treaty of Peace" was concluded between the Sheikhs and the British Government. In 1835 a "Maritime Truce" was signed by the Sheikhs providing for a temporary cessation of hostilities between them. The Truce was renewed several times in subsequent years until in 1853 a "Treaty of Peace in Perpetuity" was concluded, whereby the United Kingdom acquired the right to watch over the maintenance of the peace and to take steps to enforce the treaty at all times.

44. In 1892, the Sheikhs signed identical "Exclusive Agreements" with the Political Resident in the Persian Gulf, whereby they undertook "not to cede, sell, lease, mortgage or otherwise give for occupation" any part of their territory except to the British Government. The United Kingdom was also to become responsible for the conduct of their foreign relations. These agreements constitute the basis of the present relationship between the United Kingdom and the Trucial Sheikhdoms. In 1911 and 1922, further Agreements were concluded (see annex II), whereby the granting of pearling and oil concessions respectively became subject to the approval of the United Kingdom Government. The Rulers have also undertaken to recognize the right of the United Kingdom to fix their State boundaries and to settle disputes between them.

United Kingdom representation in the Trucial Sheikhdoms

45. There is a British Political Agent in Dubai and another in Abu Dhabi; both are responsible to the Political Resident in Bahrain. The Political Agents maintain relations with the Trucial Sheikhdoms according to the various agreements, undertakings and understandings reached with them over the years.

46. In addition to the conduct of the Trucial Sheikhdoms' foreign relations, the functions of the Political Resident include over-all supervision in certain administrative fields with international aspects or matters chiefly affecting foreigners and the implementation of international conventions such as the Sanitary Convention and the Dangerous Drugs Convention. These fields are mainly postal services, telegraphic communications,⁷ exchange transactions, control of immigration, imports of arms and narcotics and civil aviation.

47. Advice is given to the Rulers in the administration and development of their Sheikhdoms by the Political Agents. Relations between the oil companies and the Rulers are usually conducted through, or with the knowledge of the United Kingdom authorities. Company officials are required to keep the British Political Agents or officers informed of important developments in their dealings with the Rulers.

48. On the military side, the Political Resident is the chairman of a Defence Committee consisting of senior officers from the Royal Navy, the Royal Air Force and the British Army who are stationed in Bahrain and Sharjah. The Committee is responsible for the conduct of operations in the Persian Gulf States under the control of British Forces Headquarters in Aden. The Political Resident also commands the Trucial Oman Scouts established in the Territory in 1952.

Extraterritorial jurisdiction

49. Until 1959, the extraterritorial jurisdiction of the United Kingdom Government had been exercised directly by the Political Agent, sitting as a District Court, and the Political Resident in Bahrain, sitting as a Chief Court for the Persian Gulf. The Political Resident was relieved of his judicial functions by the Trucial States Order, 1959. However, the Political Agents have continued to perform their judicial functions in addition to their executive duties. Furthermore, the Registrars of these courts are empowered to hear and determine civil actions and certain criminal cases within specified limits. The provisions of the Trucial States Order are similar to those of the Muscat Order relating to the Sultanate (see paras. 19 ff. above). However, United Kingdom jurisdiction as provided for under the former has a broader application than that stipulated in the latter.

50. The jurisdiction of British Courts extends to: (a) all persons except Trucial States subjects and corporations which are incorporated under a law enacted by one of the Sheikhs; (b) members of any levy force established by the Political Resident under the authority of Her Majesty; (c) any person whom the Political Agent at his discretion registers as being in the regular service of Her Majesty's Government or of a representative of Her Majesty; (d) British ships and aircraft and all acts committed on board these ships and aircraft. The Trucial States Order makes provision for Joint Courts to try mixed cases, i.e., cases in which both persons not subject to the Order and persons subject to it are involved. The Joint Court is composed of either a Judge or the Registrar of the British Court and one of the Trucial Sheikhs or any official appointed by him. However, with the concurrence of the Political Resident, a mixed case may be tried by the British Court that has general jurisdiction over the accused or defendant.

51. By an amendment to the Order issued in 1963, it was possible to return jurisdiction to a Trucial Sheikh in such matters as might be agreed upon between him and the Political Resident. Such a change would be subject to the approval of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Recently, jurisdiction over traffic matters was transferred to the local court of Abu Dhabi in pursuance of this amendment.

52. The powers of the Political Resident to make "Queen's Regulations" applying to persons under British jurisdiction in the Trucial Sheikdoms are similar to those relating to the Sultanate of Muscat and Oman and described in paragraph 24 above.

Armed Forces

53. In 1952, the United Kingdom established a joint Arab Force in the Sheikdoms—the Trucial Oman Levies—now called the Trucial Oman Scouts. In 1953, the Scouts were expanded from 100 to 500 men, and in 1958 to 1,000 men; there are about thirty-nine British officers and ninety non-commissioned officers in the Scouts. The headquarters of the Trucial Oman Scouts is at Sharjah, although squadrons are stationed at various points inland and along the coast. The Scouts are under the control and direction of the Political Resident in the Persian Gulf and their costs are borne by the United Kingdom Government. Their duties include the maintenance of peace and good order in the Trucial States, the providing of escorts for British Political Representatives and the execution of warrants, orders and judgements issued by the British courts. A special wing of the Scouts has been formed to carry out police duties.

Government

The Rulers

54. Each of the Sheikdoms is headed by a Sheikh (or Ruler) who is essentially a tribal leader and a descendant of a ruling family which has had the ascendancy among the tribes for several generations.

On the death of a Sheikh, succession is decided according to custom by a meeting of the Senior members of the ruling family. In recent times the tendency has been to allow succession to pass from father to son. The Political Resident usually extends the recognition of the United Kingdom Government to the new Ruler at a formal ceremony.

55. The Rulers exercise authority over their subjects in conformity with local customs and traditions. Their rule is entirely personal and there are no constitutions or elected representatives of the people.

56. There is virtually no administrative machinery in any of the Sheikdoms except Dubai. Dubai has a Department of Customs and a Police Force, and in 1957 a Municipal Committee was formed in the main town. In Abu Dhabi, the Ruler employs a tax collector and a Chief of Police, and some members of his family have been appointed to the main centres to rule in his name. British advisers are also employed by the Rulers "to promote efficient and up-to-date methods of Government".⁸

57. In 1965 the Rulers of the Trucial Sheikdoms were as follows:

Abu Dhabi	Sheikh Shakhbut bin Sultan (since 1928)
Dubai	Sheikh Rashid bin Said (since 1958)
Sharjah	Sheikh Khalid bin Mohammed (since 1965) ⁹
Ajman	Sheikh Rashed bin Humaid (since 1928)
Umm al Qaiwain	..	Sheikh Ahmad bin Rashed (since 1929)
Ras al Khaimah	...	Sheikh Saqr bin Muhammad (since 1948)
Fujairah	Sheikh Muhammad bin Hamad (recognized in 1952)

Council of Rulers

58. In 1952, the United Kingdom sponsored the establishment of a Council of Trucial Rulers to co-ordinate action on matters of common concern to the Sheikdoms. The Council includes all seven Rulers and is headed by the Political Agent at Dubai. It has met once or twice a year since 1952. Matters discussed by the Council have included nationality and labour laws, anti-locust measures, regulations for motor traffic, travel documents, etc. It is reportedly envisaged that a new "deliberative" council might be set up, with each of the Rulers appointing one or two representatives to it.

Judiciary

59. The local courts apply the traditional system of justice based on Shari'a and customary tribal law. Often the Ruler himself acts as a cadi, although in the larger Sheikdoms the local cadis handle most cases. In commercial cases involving Trucial Sheikdom subjects two or three merchants act as a tribunal, and if they cannot settle the case, it is referred to the Ruler.

Economy

60. Owing to the harsh climatic condition and general dryness of the area, economic activity has, in the past, been confined to ocean trade, offshore fishing, pearl diving and the growing of date palms in the few oases. Stock-breeding is virtually limited to camels and there is little cultivation. Since 1930, the pearl industry has lost its importance because of foreign competition; at the same time, however, the search for and exploitation of oil resources have gradually become the leading concern and most important economic activity in the Trucial Sheikhdoms.

Oil

61. Exploratory concessions in large areas of the Trucial coast have been held by oil companies for many years. In 1958, Abu Dhabi Marine Areas Ltd.—owned jointly by British Petroleum and Compagnie française des pétroles—struck oil at Umm Shaif about twenty miles from Das Island off the coast of Abu Dhabi, and, in 1962, production began in commercial quantities. A submarine pipeline carries the crude petroleum from the oilfield to Das Island where an export terminal has been constructed. Production in 1963 totalled 2 to 3 million tons and since then has risen to 4 to 5 million tons a year.

62. The land concession in Abu Dhabi is held by the Abu Dhabi Petroleum Co., a wholly owned subsidiary of the Iraq Petroleum Co.¹⁰ The company started producing and shipping crude oil from an oilfield at Murban in December 1963. A tanker terminal has been built at Djebel Dhana on the coast. It is reported that the production of both the Umm Shaif and the Murban fields reached 17 million tons in 1965. Processing facilities are being constructed on these sites.

63. In the remaining Sheikhdoms, the exploration concessions are held by several other companies, mainly from the United States.

64. The chief exports of the Trucial coast are dates, vegetables, hides and fish products (including pearls). The port of Dubai is a commercial centre serving both the Trucial Sheikhdoms and the northern part of the Sultanate of Muscat and Oman. It has a relatively large entrepôt trade, particularly with Iran and other neighbouring areas. Total imports amounted to £12 million in 1964, mainly from the United Kingdom, Japan and India. A substantial portion of these imports consisted of machinery and construction materials for the oil companies. Exports to the United Kingdom from Abu Dhabi totalled £17.3 million, compared with £8.2 million in 1963; imports from the United Kingdom were worth £2.3 million, against £2.9 million the previous year. Re-exports from the United Kingdom amounted to £14,154 as against £4,189 in 1963. United Kingdom trade with the rest of the Sheikhdoms was as follows (in pounds sterling):

Imports to the United Kingdom	98,500	288,189
Exports from the United Kingdom	3,721,293	3,218,289
Re-exports from the United Kingdom	20,701	49,445

65. Before the granting of oil concessions, the Sheikhdoms' revenue was derived from customs duties and taxes on produce. In 1958, annual payments made to the Sheikhs by the oil companies totalled approximately £600,000. Abu Dhabi received nearly £3 million in oil royalties in 1963 and £8 million in 1965. The Ruler of Sharjah also receives rent for the RAF airfield in his Sheikhdom.

¹⁰ Iraq Petroleum Co. is owned jointly by British, Dutch, French and United States interests.

66. Since 1956, annual grants for development have been made by the United Kingdom under the "Trucial States Development Scheme". The amount of the contribution was increased from £100,000 to £200,000 in 1964. Projects financed under the scheme have included the building of several elementary-intermediate schools and two trade schools and the establishment of a teacher-training programme; several dispensaries have been opened and anti-malarial spraying has been carried out. An agricultural school and experimental station which was opened at Bas al Khaimah in 1955 is maintained under the scheme. A number of projects in public works and communications have been and are still being carried out, including harbour improvements at Dubai, Abu Dhabi, Sharjah and Ras al Khaimah; airport improvement, installation of automatic telephones and electricity and bridge construction at Dubai; installation of telephones, water pipelines and a water distillation plant at Abu Dhabi; electricity and water distribution in Sharjah; survey of water resources and locust control. There is one hospital at Dubai to which all the Sheikhdoms contribute; a new hospital and an electric power station were due for completion at Abu Dhabi in 1964.

67. In January 1965, the League of Arab States announced the setting up of a Technical Co-operation Programme for the Trucial Sheikhdoms (Emirates) and of an Arab Fund to finance it. The programme was to include the construction of a road linking the Sheikhdoms, the installation of power stations, irrigation projects, provision of farming equipment and the building of hospitals. A committee within the League was formed to supervise the implementation of the programme.

68. On 1 March 1965, a meeting of the Trucial States Council resolved to establish a Trucial States Development Fund for the area. The Council agreed to welcome unconditional aid from any source. A Development Office was also set up to administer the fund and carry out development programmes under the control of the Council. Contributions totalling £390,000 have been made to the Fund by the Rulers of Bahrain, Qatar and Abu Dhabi (the latter's being £100,000). The British Ministry of Overseas Development announced that it would contribute £1 million in addition to its annual payments. According to press reports, the projects approved by the Council in July 1965 would cost nearly £2.5 million.

69. On 24 June 1965, the Ruler of Sharjah, Sheikh Saqr bin Sultan Al-Qasimi, was deposed and his cousin, Sheikh Khalid bin Muhammad Al-Qasimi was appointed in his place. Sheikh Saqr later stated in Cairo and Baghdad that he had been deposed and forcefully deported by the British authorities because he had accepted the Arab League plan of economic assistance to his Sheikhdom. According to British sources, Sheikh Saqr was deposed by his family council for gross neglect and mismanagement of the Sheikhdom's affairs.

70. On 20 July 1965, "The Committee of Personal Representatives of the Arab Kings and Heads of State for the Arab Gulf Emirates" adopted a resolution reaffirming its intention to provide direct assistance to the Emirates of the Arab Gulf and its refusal to contribute to the British Development Fund imposed upon the area.

C. CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE¹¹*Introduction*

71. The Special Committee considered the question of Oman at its 446th and 447th meetings held at Cairo on 15 June 1966, and at its 481st meeting held in New York on 17 November 1966.

Written petitions and hearings

72. The Special Committee had before it the following written petitions concerning Oman:

Petitioner	Document No.
Mr. Yussef Eloui, representative of the Front for the Liberation of Dhofar ..	A/AC.109/PET.495
Mr. Saqr bin Sultan Al-Qasimi	A/AC.109/PET.501
Imam Ghalib bin Ali	A/AC.109/PET.502
President and members of the Council of the Trucial States	A/AC.109/PET.503

73. At its 446th and 447th meetings the Special Committee heard Imam Ghalib bin Ali (who was accompanied by Sheikh Suleiman bin Himyar, Sheikh Mohammed bin Hamad and Sheikh Faisal bin Ali), Mr. Saqr bin Sultan Al-Qasimi and Mr. Yussef Eloui.

74. Imam Ghalib bin Ali expressed appreciation of the effective role played by the United Nations with respect to the question of Oman. Having sought justice for their case since 1957, the people of Oman had tried, with the support of those delegations which valued justice and equity, to promote the adoption of a resolution embodying their legitimate rights. In all those years, however, they had been confronted with a highly concentrated effort involving the distortion of facts, deception, and the exercise of pressure by the United Kingdom, which had resulted in the United Nations inability to adopt a resolution. Thanks to the Ad Hoc Committee on Oman, which had defeated British manoeuvres by revealing all relevant data, a just resolution had been adopted during the twentieth session of the General Assembly.

75. Historical facts had proved that Oman's existence as an independent State, with full sovereignty, went back to the eighth century, when it had been called the Imamate of Oman. The choice of its rulers, known as Imams, had been through free and direct election by the people, whose love of freedom led them to reject absolutism and tyranny.

76. The Omani case was a vivid example of a colonialist design to subjugate a people and exploit its resources by means of armed intervention and suppression. The United Kingdom's intervention in the affairs of Oman had begun with the conclusion of the 1807 Treaty with Said bin Sultan. Subsequent treaties had consolidated British domination and had extended it over other parts of the Territory. With the occupation of Nazwa, the capital, in 1954, the entire country had come under United Kingdom rule. Nevertheless, despite the difference in military strength between the United Kingdom and the defenceless Omani people, foreign Powers could never gain their allegiance, but tended rather to stir up a natural resistance. Based not on a defence of humanity or of a State's rights, but rather on self-interest, the United Kingdom's intervention had violated the will of a people and the Charter and resolutions of the United Nations. The Ad Hoc Committee had prepared a comprehensive report¹² on Oman's painful history, including a full exposé of colonialism's role from the beginning. The Ad Hoc Committee had stated the Committee believes the Omani issue is one of paramount importance which requires special attention on the part of the General Assembly. The report had so stirred the General Assembly that the question had been referred to the Special Committee of Twenty-Four.

77. Resolution 2073 (XX), adopted by the General Assembly at its twentieth session, upheld the right of the Omani people to self-determination and independence and called for the termination of all arbitrary measures against the Omani people, the withdrawal of the British forces, the release of prisoners and the return of exiles, and the termination of United Kingdom domination of Oman.

78. However, the United Kingdom, although a Member of the United Nations, had disregarded the resolution, boycotted the Committee, and refused to help it carry out its task.

79. The resolution on Oman was an attempt to put an end to the United Kingdom's acts of suppression and violence and to reach a just solution in harmony with the people's demands. Although from the outset appeals had been made through the United Nations, the United Kingdom's rejection of the Omani requests had led to a strong opposition to the foreign intruders and to an untiring struggle for the rights and dignity of the entire population.

80. The United Kingdom's answer to the General Assembly resolution had been acts of violence, torture and expulsion, the imprisonment of innocent persons, the searching of houses, the besieging of villages, the establishing of curfews and the restricting of freedom of movement in several Omani regions. It had also resorted to a traditional "divide and rule" policy, hiring outside agents to sow seeds of dissension and to divert attention from the demand for freedom to quarrels and bloodshed. Furthermore, the United Kingdom had amassed armaments and reinforced its military strategy in the country, even to the extent of bringing in highly destructive weapons to be used against a dedicated, freedom-loving people. While talking about withdrawing from the Aden base, Britain had continued to strengthen its bases and posts in the hinterland and along the coast. A significant move in the new strategy had been the reinforcement of the large base on Masirah Island. The potential of the Masirah base was no less than that of the base at Aden, the only difference having been that the latter was known to the outside world, whereas the former was veiled in secrecy and sealed off from view. The recent enlargement of the British military base in Bahrain was proof of a continued threat to peace in the area. The transfer of troops from one Arab country to another was not going to bring security to the region as a whole, nor was it going to help end the conflict. The only reasonable course for the United Kingdom to follow was to call back its forces to its own country, where they belonged.

81. The United Kingdom was concealing much of what was taking place in Oman, thereby seeking to avoid world censure and the condemnation of the United Nations. Yet the world was learning much about the Omani people's heroic struggle, about the increased intensity and scope of its armed resistance and its undying hope that the United Nations would help further the cause of freedom. Significant of the people's spirit had been the attack on the life of the so-called Sultan, Said bin Taimur, by his own body-guard.

82. Examples of inhuman acts perpetrated by the foreign intruders included heavy fines, amounting to three times the value of the losses sustained, which were imposed on the people of any region near which incidents took place between the revolutionaries and the occupation forces; wholesale arrests made without charges and without trial; imprisonment in overcrowded cells with but one window, with inadequate food, contaminated water, no change of clothing, no medical attention, and no gifts or communication from the outside; and, in the case of recurrent incidents, the indiscriminate shelling of homes and places of worship by means of airborne rockets. Villagers and prisoners alike had lost their homes, their health, their eyesight, and even their lives, as a result of those tactics. British officers at Beit El Falg and at Suhar Prison tortured prisoners in front of other inmates in order to evoke fear and terror. Among the methods used were the cutting off of limbs, the forcing of victims to sit in flames, dipping their hands into boiling oil, and pressing their bones between bars of wood. When Mr. de Ribbing had come to Muscat and requested permission to see the prison for himself, he had not been allowed inside.

83. Such inhuman measures had resulted in fatigue, poverty, anxiety and mass migrations to the safety of other Arab countries. Some people, who had been forced out of their homes and driven into barbed-wire enclosures while British officers searched, sacked, or destroyed them, remained exposed to the elements in summer and winter alike, and endured hunger and thirst for as long as twenty-four hours at a time.

84. The Omani issue had gone beyond the stage of resolutions and had entered the stage of execution. For that reason, the people of Oman called upon the United Nations and upon the Special Committee to take effective action to implement those resolutions, and wished them success in their noble tasks undertaken in the service of human freedom and dignity.

85. In reply to questions, the petitioner said that the treaty of Sib of 1920 had been signed after a protracted war, and after the United Kingdom had threatened the Sultan and the people of Oman. In that connexion, he quoted from a letter of 16 May 1919 from the United Kingdom Government, which stated: "We have 500,000 armed men in Iraq, but soon we shall no longer need them there. We shall need only a handful of men, to occupy Oman." At first, the British forces only occupied the Omani Coast. Later, they had penetrated deeper into the Territory, and the Sultan had concluded an agreement with the United Kingdom in order to halt the invasion. The people had respected that treaty when the United Kingdom had begun its acts of aggression and completely occupied the Territory.

Commenting on the United Kingdom's repeated claims that there were no British forces in Muscat and Oman, the petitioner said that the United Kingdom had been challenged on many occasions to allow United Nations representatives to examine the situation in Oman. The fact that it had repeatedly refused was sufficient proof of the falsity of its denials. The British claim that there were no political prisoners was also not true. Of about 500 prisoners in the Territory, 150 were in fact political prisoners. When Mr. de Ribbing had gone to Oman to look into allegations of torture in the prisons he had not been allowed to move freely in the country, but had been taken only to the quiet areas and given false information. United Kingdom officers not only supervised tortures, but tortured prisoners themselves.

87. The petitioner said that many of the agents to whom he had referred in his statement were United Kingdom nationals dressed in Omani costumes and trained to speak Arabic in the Omani dialect; others were from other areas under United Kingdom influence. The British agents did not hesitate to resort to any measures to divide the people in order to maintain the United Kingdom's position in the country.

88. The claim by the United Kingdom that sovereignty belonged to the Sultan was made merely to cover up its intervention in Oman. All of the administrative power in Muscat and Oman, in both internal and foreign affairs, including defence and security, was in fact in the hands of the British. The Sultan's Government included British civil servants and other officials under their authority. The Sultanate's Army included officers from the United Kingdom and from countries under United Kingdom influence; the same was true of the lower ranks.

89. With regard to the curfew and restrictions on movement which had been imposed on the population, the petitioner said that its purpose was to keep the people apart and prevent them from forming mass rallies in their attempt to free themselves from United Kingdom rule. It was the action always resorted to by the colonialists against people struggling for their freedom.

90. Concerning the base at Al Masirah, the petitioner said that it had been established since the Second World War. It was under military occupation by the British, who were continually enlarging and fortifying it, digging trenches and stockpiling enormous quantities of weapons. Furthermore, the troops stationed at the base were being added to daily.

91. The Omani people hoped that the Special Committee would bring pressure to bear upon the United Kingdom to implement to the full the United Nations resolutions concerning their Territory, and to co-operate with the Committee in helping them towards self-determination. They also hoped that the Special Committee would set up a sub-committee to examine the Omani case.

92. Mr. Saqr bin Sultan Al-Qasimi said that both he and his country had suffered under the oppression and aggression of British colonialism. He had been evicted from his country by sheer force. He would not, however, confine his remarks to his country, but would also speak of the heinous crimes committed by British imperialism in the Occupied South, Oman and the Arabian Gulf. That imperialism, which illegally dominated that area, was playing havoc with its destiny, and planning to end Arab presence forever in the Omani Coast and the Gulf.

93. The Special Committee should pay attention to the emerging tragedy, which might prove to be a repetition of the events that had taken place in Palestine. Jewish immigrants had taken over Palestine and their action was at present being matched by the migration of aliens to his own country, which was purely Arab, carried out by the same methods used in Palestine.

94. The imperialists were at present at the pre-1948 stage of the Palestine affair. In order to promote immigration into the Omani Coast, they were buying land and setting up camps. They were even exploiting Israeli experience in that field to organize and finance immigration operations. Those were grave dangers for the whole coast of Oman, which called for the utmost caution.

95. He could not conceal his country's lack of progress nor its dire need of aid in all fields. It also needed public awareness of its situation, for only immediate and effective action would enable it to foil the Zionist and British colonialist schemes to dissect it, and to make it an easy prey for alien occupation, in flagrant violation of the principles of the United Nations.

96. The history of British presence in the area dated back to the seventeenth century. Portuguese and English pirates had met with intense resistance from the Emirs and Sheikhs, which served to neutralize imperialism at that time. In spite of the military operations carried out for more than a century, imperialism had been unable to attain a decisive victory. Only the massacres tipped the scales in favour of the imperialists. The Arabs eventually surrendered to English pirates in 1820.

97. It would require whole books to speak of the heroism of the Arabs in resisting the usurpers, who were escorted, on their last campaign, by a force composed of 876 naval vessels and 800 small boats: the only means by which they could force themselves on the Arab Coast. After that a so-called treaty was signed by the Sheikhs of the area at bayonet point in 1820. The colonialists took great pains to ratify that so-called treaty in 1906. But it was meaningless according to international law. British presence in the area was devoid of any international support; it was unjustified because it had been secured by force of arms in an age totally different from the present one.

98. British presence was not in accordance with the wishes of the people of the Omani Coast. Incontestable evidence was provided by the protracted struggle of that people and the fact that only after 180 years were they forced to sign a treaty. An age which had seen the signing of the United Nations Charter was bound to regard such a treaty as null and void.

99. He had warned Mr. Thompson, the United Kingdom Minister of State, in May 1965 when he paid a visit to Sharjah, a month before he had been kidnapped, that he would never recognize the treaty as legal support for British presence in the area, and had asked Mr. Thompson to convey his views to his Government. Earlier he had refused to accede to semi-official requests submitted by Mr. Shepherd, the British Air Force Commander in Sharjah, aiming at extorting a promise to renew the British lease of the military base in Sharjah. He reaffirmed that the Sharjah Emirate was an integral part of the Arab homeland, extending from the Ocean to the Gulf.

100. The question of his kidnapping was a matter which, although it seemed personal, was in reality linked to the cause of the whole coastal area. An illegal ruler of Sharjah had been appointed in his place so as to intimidate other rulers and subject them to foreign domination. A few days after he had been kidnapped and the illegal ruler appointed, the United Kingdom Government through the intervention of that ruler, was able to renew the agreement on the Air Force base in Sharjah.

101. Some free rulers had stood firm against the United Kingdom in the matter of aid from the League of Arab States. First they had accepted that aid and signified their ratification of it to the League's Assistant Secretary-General; they were, however, intimidated by the United Kingdom and quickly changed their minds. The United Kingdom had mobilized its forces, including tanks and machine-guns, and surrounded those rulers in their capitals. Similarly worded cables were sent a few days later by the rulers to the Arab League. Those cables had been dictated by the British High Commissioner. They all urged supervision of the British Development Council over the Arab League's aid and the allocation of funds according to the desires of British officers. The League of Arab States could submit these cables for the Committee's inspection.

102. The only effective solution of the coastal issue was for the Special Committee to work for the eradication of imperialism in all its forms and for the liberation of the Omani coast in an effort to integrate it with other Arab States in order to form one entity from the Ocean to the Gulf.

103. The United Kingdom had attempted to strengthen its position on the coast of Oman, by transferring its military base from the Arab South to the coast of the Gulf, Bahrain and Sharjah. The transfer of that base would only aggravate the problem. It showed that the United Kingdom was still imperialist minded, and that it still had evil intentions with regard to the coast. Its action would create a state of tension in the area, with unforeseeable consequences. The United Kingdom forces were committing atrocities in the coastal emirates, arresting free men, torturing them, and perpetuating a state of terror and menace for all those who expressed their feelings or demanded independence and the eradication of colonialism in order to lead a life of dignity and freedom in their own country.

104. The United Kingdom had banished many Arabs and terrorized the rest so as to ensure their silence. It did not hesitate to threaten the rulers of the area, and to try to raise them against each other by coaxing, promises and threats.

105. There was no justification in the action of the United Kingdom in maintaining its base, forces and influence in a land whose people would accept nothing but independence.

106. The free militants struggling for the liquidation of colonialism had a mission to carry out: the eradication of all the remnants of colonialism all over the world. The Arab land of Oman and the Gulf had suffered various forms of oppression and terror because of colonialism. The time had come for it to achieve freedom and independence to enjoy the human rights set out in the Universal Declaration adopted by the United Nations, which was supported by every free and honourable nation in the world.

107. The coast of Oman expected such action of the Special Committee and was confident that its expectations would be fulfilled.

108. In reply to questions, the petitioner said that at first the United Kingdom had paid no rent for the base at Sharah but that later a nominal fee of £2,000 a year had been agreed upon. Other bases also existed in the Territory. There were between 15,000 and 16,000 United Kingdom troops stationed throughout the Omani coast. He was of the opinion that the United Kingdom would not transfer its Sharjah base without bloodshed.

109. He did not recognize that any treaty with the United Kingdom was in existence. When he had informed the British of this he had been deposed.

110. Up to 1953 the United Kingdom had provided no education facilities. In that year he had applied to the Government of Kuwait which had provided one teacher. Since then, Iraq, Kuwait, Syria, and the United Arab Republic had sent a total of 550 teachers; the United Kingdom, however, had sent none at all, and in fact the British High Commissioner had advised him not to expand educational facilities in his country. In 1966 two graduates would be available as teachers, one from the University of Moscow and the other from Cairo. Concerning health services, he said that the United Kingdom had set up one hospital and one pharmacy. Before the United Kingdom had invaded the area, a large fishing fleet and pearl-diving industry had existed. The United Kingdom forces had burnt the fleet, which represented the country's basic economic resource. Only the pearl-diving industry remained, and that was diminishing. There was good agricultural land in the Territory but only a small part was being cultivated, and that by very primitive methods. The fishing grounds were also not fully exploited. Oil had recently been discovered in the area, but he believed it would represent a curse rather than a blessing, for because of it the United Kingdom would certainly wish to retain its hold on the Territory.

111. Mr. Yussef Eloui (Front for the Liberation of Dhofar) said that he was honoured to have the opportunity to place before the Special Committee the justified claims of his people, who had been invaded by force, subjugated by foreign imperialists, and denied their inalienable human rights.

112. What the United Kingdom called the Sultanate of Muscat consisted of three regions: the Muscat and Dathina as one group, Inner Oman as a second, and Dhofar as a third. The United Kingdom had started by colonizing Muscat and its littoral, then invaded Dhofar in 1887, and Oman in 1957 through an armed invasion. Despite the United Kingdom's attempts to mislead public opinion and conceal the evidence of its suppressive acts, there was growing knowledge abroad of its disregard for United Nations resolutions and of the people's revolutionary protest.

113. It was essential to note certain outstanding facts that illustrated the administering Power's tendency to impede the progress and development of the community under its domination. Those were: a military blockade imposed for strategic military purposes, with the aim of defending the United Kingdom's interests in the Arabian Gulf area against so-called communist infiltrations; strategic land, naval and air bases (with underground storehouses for nuclear weapons) linking the United Kingdom's Mediterranean and South-East Asia forces; air fleets brought in day and night, constantly in touch by radio with other overseas fleets; and the evacuation of local inhabitants from base areas in order to establish freedom of movement for military operations, which were often the means for suppressing the people.

114. In its effort to build up military power, the United Kingdom had neglected the economic and social development of the area under its control. Ignorance and disease were rampant in localities where no schools or medical care were to be found. In a world that was launching campaigns against hunger, the United Kingdom was conspicuous for importing famine into its Territories, and furthermore of depriving a whole population of minimum social benefits, in order to promote its own colonialist aims. A reaction had finally taken shape, and on 9 June 1965 the armed revolution had broken out, in order that the people might eradicate the United Kingdom's colonial rule in all economic, military and administrative forms, including the dismantling of all bases; win freedom and self-government for the entire population; achieve economic independence and social equality by regaining control of the country's material resources and internal structures; and ensure human dignity, through adequate educational, medical, agricultural and industrial services.

115. In the interest of democracy and human rights, the people of Oman called upon the Committee to join forces with them, in supporting their just and legitimate demands by ensuring the people's achievement of self-determination; declaring the United Kingdom's colonial rule to be illegitimate, and diametrically opposed to the people's will; and calling upon the United Kingdom to withdraw its air, land and naval bases from the region, put an end to its repressive methods, release all political internees and put an end to the martial law in operation under the emergency regulations.

Statements by members

116. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that the United Kingdom's attitude towards Oman demonstrated once again that the United Kingdom was prepared to resort to force to oppose the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. That attitude was motivated by the desire to protect the interests of United Kingdom oil monopolies, and to maintain major military bases. At the twentieth session of the General Assembly the USSR delegation had supported Oman's request for independence and had spoken in favour of the withdrawal of the armed forces stationed in the Territory. The presence of those forces, which were illegally occupying Oman and the other areas and oppressing the local inhabitants, was a major obstacle to the Territory's independence and self-determination. The Special Committee should therefore condemn forthwith the existence and the full implementation of the General Assembly resolutions on Oman.

117. The representative of the United States of America explained briefly her Government's position with regard to Oman. The United States had had treaty relations with the Sultans of Muscat for 133 years, or since 1833; those relations had been renewed in 1938. Based on the concept of sovereign equality, her country's negotiations had always been carried out directly with the Sultan, and not through an intermediary. It was therefore clear that the United States authorities had never questioned the sovereignty of the Sultanate. For that reason her delegation would not participate in the Special Committee's discussion of the question of Oman.

D. ACTION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

118. At its 481st meeting on 17 November 1966, the Special Committee, on the proposal of the Chairman, decided that it would report to the General Assembly that owing to lack of time, it was not able to complete its consideration of the question of Oman, and that, subject to any further directives the General Assembly might wish to give during its twenty-first session, the Special Committee would consider the question at its meetings in 1967 with a view to the implementation of Assembly resolution 2073 (XX).

ANNEX I

A. TREATY OF FRIENDSHIP, COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION BETWEEN HIS MAJESTY AND THE SULTAN OF MUSCAT AND OMAN

Muscat, 20 December 1961

His Majesty The King of Great Britain, Ireland and the British Dominions beyond the Seas, and Sultan Said bin Taimur bin Faisal, Sultan of Muscat and Oman and Dependencies, Desiring to confirm and strengthen the friendly relations which now subsist between them and to promote and extend their commercial relations by the conclusion of a new treaty to replace the Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation signed at Muscat on 5 February 1939,

Have accordingly appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

His Majesty The King of Great Britain, Ireland and the British Dominions beyond the Seas (hereinafter referred to as His Majesty):

For the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland:

Lieutenant-Colonel Sir William Rupert Hay, K.C.I.E., C.S.I.,

His Majesty's Political Resident in the Persian Gulf;

The Sultan of Muscat and Oman and Dependencies (hereinafter referred to as the Sultan), in person;

Who have agreed as follows:

Article 1

For the purpose of the present Treaty:

(1) The term "territories of His Majesty" or references to territories of a High Contracting Party in relation to His Majesty mean the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland (hereinafter referred to as the United Kingdom) and any territories to which the present treaty applies by reason of extensions under article 15, and the term "territories of the Sultan", or references to the territories of a High Contracting Party in relation to the Sultan mean Oman and its Dependencies.

(2) The term "nationals of His Majesty" or references to nationals of a High Contracting Party in relation to His Majesty mean all citizens of the United Kingdom and Colonies, all Southern Rhodesian citizens and all British protected persons, except nationals of Kuwait, Bahrain, Qatar, Abu Dhabi, Dubai, Sharjah, Ajman, Umm-al-Qaiwain, Ras-al-Khaimah and Kalba, and the term "nationals of the Sultan" or references of nationals of a High Contracting Party in relation to the Sultan mean all the Sultan's subjects, wherever domiciled. For the purposes of articles 3, 5, 6 and 7, the term "nationals" shall be deemed to include corporate bodies created under the law of the territories of a High Contracting Party.

(3) The term "British vessels" or references to vessels of a High Contracting Party in relation to His Majesty mean all ships registered at a port in the United Kingdom or in any territory to which the present Treaty applies by reason of extension under article 15; and the term "Omani vessels" or references to vessels of a High Contracting Party in relation to the Sultan mean all ships registered under the law of the Sultan's Government.

(4) The term "British aircraft" or references to aircraft of a High Contracting Party in relation to His Majesty mean all aircraft registered under the law of the United Kingdom or of any territory to which the present Treaty applies by reason of extension under article 15; and the term "Omani aircraft" or references to aircraft of a High Contracting Party in relation to the Sultan mean all aircraft registered under the law of the Sultan's Government.

The term "foreign country" means:

(a) In relation to His Majesty any country or territory other than:

- (i) The United Kingdom;
- (ii) Canada;
- (iii) The Commonwealth of Australia;
- (iv) New Zealand;
- (v) The Union of South Africa;
- (vi) India;
- (vii) Pakistan;
- (viii) Ceylon;
- (ix) Any Territory for the international relations of which His Majesty is responsible through any of His Governments at the date of signature of the present Treaty;
- (x) The Irish Republic, and
- (xi) For the purpose of article 6, Burma; and

(b) In relation to the Sultan, any country or territory not being a part of Oman or its dependencies.

Article 2

There shall be perfect freedom of commerce and navigation between the territories of the High Contracting Parties. Each High Contracting Party shall allow the nationals of the other to enter all ports, creeks and rivers with their vessels and cargoes, also to enter, travel, reside and pursue commerce and trade, whether wholesale or retail, in any of His territories, and to depart therefrom, provided that they satisfy and observe the conditions and regulations which are in force or may be applied therein relating to the entry, travel, residence and departure of all foreigners.

(1) Nationals of each High Contracting Party shall enjoy throughout the territories of the other with respect to commerce, shipping and the exercise of trade all the rights, privileges, immunities, advantages and protection, of whatsoever nature, which are or may be enjoyed by the nationals of the other High Contracting Party or the nationals of any other foreign country. In particular each High Contracting Party shall allow in His territories the nationals of the other, to bargain for, buy, barter, sell, import and export all kinds of goods on the same conditions as are or may be applicable to His own nationals or to the nationals of any other foreign country.

(2) Nationals of each High Contracting Party shall not be liable in any territory of the other to taxes, duties, imposts, restrictions or obligations of any description whatever, other or more onerous than those to which the nationals of the other High Contracting Party or the nationals of any other foreign country are or may be subjected; provided however that nothing in this Article shall be construed in relation to any territory of either High Contracting Party as obliging that High Contracting Party to grant to nationals of the other, who are not resident for tax purposes in that territory, the same personal allowances, reliefs and reductions for tax purposes as are granted to His own nationals.

(1) In all that relates to navigation and the treatment of shipping each High Contracting Party undertakes to treat in any of His territories the vessels of the other (including the passengers and cargoes carried therein) not less favourably in any respect than His own vessels or the vessels of any other foreign country (including the passengers and cargoes carried in such vessels as aforesaid).

(2) The provisions of this Article shall not apply to the coasting trade or to inland navigation.

Article 5

Nationals of His Majesty shall be permitted in the territories of the Sultan to hire and to acquire in any legal manner, property of every description, to possess the same, and to dispose thereof in any legal manner, as regards immovable property on the same conditions as are in force or may be established with regard to the nationals of the most favoured foreign country, and as regards movable property on the same conditions as are in force or may be established with regard to the nationals of the Sultan or the nationals of the most favoured foreign country.

Article 6

(1) Goods grown, produced or manufactured in the territories of one High Contracting Party imported into the territories of the other from whatever place arriving, shall not be subjected to customs duties or charges other or more onerous than those paid on the like goods grown, produced or manufactured in any other foreign country.

(2) Goods to be exported to the territories of one High Contracting Party shall not be subjected in the territories of the other to customs duties or charges other or more onerous than those paid on the exportation of like goods to any other foreign country.

(3) The customs duties leviable in the territories of the Sultan on goods grown, produced or manufactured in the territories of His Majesty and on goods imported by nationals of His Majesty shall be paid at the port or other place in the Sultan's territories where the goods are first imported, and on payment being duly made such goods shall thereafter be exempt from all other customs duties.

(4) In the territories of the Sultan goods grown, produced or manufactured in the territories of His Majesty or imported by nationals of His Majesty shall be exempted from customs duties in the following cases, namely:

(a) Goods which, being destined and manifested for a foreign country, are transhipped from one vessel or aircraft to another in any of the ports or airports of the Sultan or which have been for this purpose provisionally landed and deposited in any of the Sultan's custom-houses to await arrival of a vessel or aircraft in which to be reshipped abroad; but goods so landed shall only be exempted if the consignee or his agent shall have, on the arrival of the vessel or aircraft, handed over the said goods to be kept under custom seal, and declared them as landed for transshipment, designating at the same time the foreign place of destination, and if within a period not exceeding three months after their first landing the said goods are actually shipped for the said foreign country as originally declared and without having in the interval changed owners, and if all customs charges are paid before they are reshipped.

(b) Goods which, not being destined and manifested for the territories of the Sultan, have been inadvertently landed, provided that such goods are left in the custody of the customs authorities and are reshipped for a destination abroad within two months of being so landed, and that all customs charges are paid before the goods are reshipped.

(c) Coal, fuel and oil, Naval and Air Force provisions and stores and fittings, the property of His Majesty, landed in the territories of the Sultan for the use of the ships of His Majesty's Naval Forces and the aircraft of His Air Forces; duty shall, however, be payable if any of the goods thus exempted are sold or otherwise disposed of in the local markets.

(d) Goods transhipped or landed pending the repair of damage caused to the vessel or aircraft by stress of weather or disaster at sea or in the air, provided the cargo so discharged will be left in the custody of the customs authorities and be reshipped abroad within a period of three months from the date of the original landing and that all customs charges have been paid.

(5) In the cases referred to in paragraph (4) of this article customs formalities in respect of landing, examination, clearance and shipment of goods shall be observed.

(6) All goods remaining uncleared in the Sultan's custom-houses after four months from the date of their original landing may be disposed of by the Sultan's customs authorities by a public auction after notifying the steamer or aircraft agents concerned. The proceeds of the sale of such goods, after payment of the auctioneering fees, customs duties and charges, shall be kept as deposit for a period of one year and refunded to the owner if he establishes his claim to them during this period, after which no claim shall be entertained.

(7) In this Article the words "customs charges" shall mean charges other than customs duties and shall include landing, transit, weighing, wharfage or ground rent, supervision and overtime fees.

Article 7

(1) All customs duties leviable in the territories of the Sultan shall be paid in cash and not in kind.

(2) The value of the goods on which customs duty is to be levied shall be fixed according to their market price following the normal usage of trade in Muscat.

(3) Any dispute arising between a national of His Majesty and the Omani customs authorities regarding the value of any goods, shall be determined by reference to two experts (each party nominating one) whose decisions as to the value shall be binding upon both parties. Should these experts not be able to agree, they shall choose an umpire, whose decision shall be final.

Article 8

Internal taxes and internal charges of any kind levied within the territories of one High Contracting Party for the benefit of the State, or of organs of local or municipal government, on or in connexion with goods grown, produced or manufactured in the territories of the other High Contracting Party, shall not be other or greater than those levied in similar circumstances on or in connexion with like goods grown, produced or manufactured in the territories of the former High Contracting Party or in any other foreign country.

Article 9

(1) No prohibition or restriction shall be imposed or maintained on the importation into the territories of the Sultan of any goods, from whatever place arriving, grown, produced or manufactured in the territories of His Majesty which shall not equally extend to the importation of the like goods grown, produced or manufactured in any other foreign country.

(2) No prohibition or restriction shall be imposed or maintained on the exportation of any goods from the territories of the Sultan to the territories of His Majesty which shall not equally extend to the exportation of the like goods to any other foreign country.

(3) Exceptions to the general rules laid down in the foregoing paragraphs of this Article may be made only in the case of:

(a) Prohibitions or restrictions imposed in the interests of public security;

(b) Prohibitions or restrictions regarding traffic in arms, ammunition and implements of war, or in exceptional circumstances, all other military supplies;

(c) Prohibitions or restrictions imposed for the protection of public health;

(d) Prohibitions or restrictions imposed for the protection of animals or plants, including protection against diseases, degeneration or extinction, as well as measures taken against harmful seeds, plants and animals.

Article 10

The Sultan engages by the present Treaty to provide that the movement of goods in transit shall not be obstructed or delayed by unnecessary customs formalities and regulations, and that every facility will be given for their transport.

Article 11

(1) Either of the two High Contracting Parties may appoint Consuls to reside in the territories of the other, subject to the consent and approval of the other as regards the persons so appointed and the place at which they reside. Each High Contracting Party further agrees to permit His own nationals to be appointed to consular offices by the other High Contracting Party, provided always that any person so appointed shall not begin to act without the previous approbation of the High Contracting Party whose national he may be.

(2) Such Consuls shall be permitted to perform such consular functions and shall enjoy such privileges and immunities as are in accordance with international law or practice relating to Consuls as recognized in the territories in which they reside.

(1) British vessels and aircraft coming to the territories of the Sultan, in distress, shall receive from the local authorities all possible necessary aid to enable them to revictual, refuel and refit so as to proceed on their voyage or flight.

(2) Should a British vessel run aground or be wrecked on or near the coast of the Sultan's territories, or a British aircraft be wrecked or make a forced landing in the Sultan's territories, the authorities of the Sultan shall render all possible assistance to save the vessel or aircraft, its cargo and those on board; they shall also give all possible aid and protection to persons saved, and shall assist them in reaching the nearest British Consulate; they shall further take every possible care that such vessels or aircraft and the cargo, stores, equipment and fittings, and articles carried by or forming part of the vessel or aircraft, or the proceeds thereof, if sold, as well as all papers found on board such vessel or aircraft, shall be given up to their owners or to their agents when claimed by them, or to the British Consul.

(3) The Sultan's authorities shall further see that the British Consulate is as soon as possible informed of any such event as is mentioned in the preceding paragraph of this Article having occurred.

(4) Likewise should an Omani vessel come to His Majesty's territories in distress, or run aground or be wrecked on or near the coast of His Majesty's territories, or should an Omani aircraft be wrecked or make a forced landing in His Majesty's territories, the like help and assistance shall be rendered by the authorities of those territories.

Nationals of the one High Contracting Party shall, within the territories of the other, enjoy freedom of conscience and religious toleration and the free and public exercise of all forms of religion, provided that such exercise does not wound or outrage the religious susceptibilities of the country in which it is proposed to be practised, but shall not build edifices for religious worship except in places specified for the purpose by the local authorities and after approval and permission has been obtained. Nothing shall be done by either High Contracting Party that may disturb existing places of worship belonging to nationals of the other.

All the provisions of the present Treaty providing for the grant of the treatment accorded to the most favoured foreign country shall be interpreted as meaning that such treatment shall be accorded immediately and unconditionally.

(1) His Majesty may, at the time of exchange of ratifications or at any time thereafter, through His Consular Officer at Muscat give notice of His desire that the present Treaty shall extend to any territory for the international relations of which He is responsible through His Government in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, except Kuwait, Bahrain, Qatar, Abu Dhabi, Dubai, Sharjah, Ajman, Umm-al-Qaiwain, Ras-al-Khaimah and Kalba, and the Treaty shall extend to any territory specified in such notice from the date of receipt thereof by the Sultan.

(2) At any time after the expiry of a period of two years from the definitive entry into force of the present Treaty either High Contracting Party may by giving twelve months' notice terminate the application of the present Treaty to any territory to which it has been extended under the provisions of the preceding paragraph.

Article 16

(1) The present Treaty shall be subject to ratification by each High Contracting Party and instruments of ratification shall be exchanged at Muscat as soon as possible.

(2) The present Treaty shall enter into force provisionally on 1 January 1952, and definitively on the exchange of instruments of ratification.

(3) If five months after the date of signature instruments of ratification have not been exchanged the provisional application of this Treaty shall then cease.

Article 17

(1) The present Treaty shall remain in force for a period of fifteen years from the date of its definitive entry into force as provided for in article 16 (2). Unless one of the High Contracting Parties shall have given to the other notice of termination one year before the expiry of the said period of fifteen years, this Treaty shall remain in force until the expiry of one year from the date on which such notice shall have been given.

(2) A notice given under paragraph (1) of this article shall apply to any territory in respect of which notification of extension has been given under Article 15.

IN WITNESS whereof Lieutenant-Colonel Sir William Rupert Hay, K.C.I.E., C.S.I., on behalf of His Majesty The King of Great Britain, Ireland and the British Dominions beyond the Seas, and Sultan Said bin Taimur bin Faisal, Sul'an of Muscat and Oman and Dependencies, on his own behalf, have signed the present Treaty and have affixed thereto their respective seals.

DONE in duplicate at Muscat this twentieth day of December 1951, corresponding to the twentieth of Rabi'al Awwal of the year 1371, in English and Arabic, the English text to prevail in cases of doubt.

EXCHANGE OF LETTERS

No. 1

His Majesty's Political Resident in the Persian Gulf of the Sultan of Muscat and Oman

British Consulate, Muscat
20 December 1951

My honoured and valued Friend,

With reference to our discussions and the negotiations for the new Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation to replace the Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation between His Majesty The King of Great Britain, Ireland and the British Dominions beyond the Seas and the Sultan of Muscat and Oman and Dependencies signed at Muscat on 5 February 1939, I understand that you are prepared to vest in His Majesty The King of Great Britain, Ireland and the British Dominions beyond the Seas for a period of ten years from 1 January 1952, extra-territorial jurisdiction in your territory over the persons and in the manner indicated below.

(1) The Consular authorities of His Majesty shall exercise jurisdiction over the following persons who shall, for this purpose, be referred to as "Nationals of His Majesty".

(a) Citizens of the United Kingdom and Colonies;

(b) Southern Rhodesian Citizens; and

(c) British Protected Persons.

This paragraph shall not apply to any of the above persons who are Moslems.

(2) In the exercise of their powers under paragraph (1) above the Consular authorities of His Majesty may, subject to any right of appeal which His Majesty may provide, hear and determine:

- (i) All criminal charges against nationals of His Majesty;
 - (ii) All civil suits in which nationals of his Majesty are defendants;
 - (iii) All bankruptcy cases in which the bankrupt or person whom it is sought to make bankrupt is a national of His Majesty;
 - (iv) All proceedings connected with the administration of the estate of a deceased national of His Majesty;
 - (v) All questions of personal status where the person whose status is in question is a national of His Majesty.
- (3) Over all other nationals of any country of the British Commonwealth (whether they are Moslems or otherwise), except the nationals of the Union of South Africa, of Pakistan, of the British Protected Sheikdoms in the Persian Gulf, of Zanzibar and of the States of the Aden Protectorate, the Consular authorities of His Majesty shall have a like jurisdiction save that they shall not hear and determine:
- (i) Criminal cases and civil suits, including those which arise in connexion with laws and regulations made by the Sultan, in which the complainant or plaintiff is the Sultan's Government or a national of the Sultan; and
 - (ii) Bankruptcy proceedings which the Sultan decides shall be heard and determined by his Courts.
- (4) If any decision is given against a national of His Majesty, as defined in paragraph (1) above, by a Sultanate Court, the Sultan will, if the Consul of His Majesty so requests, refer the case to a Shara Court of Appeals which shall be appointed by the Sultan for that purpose.
- (5) A national of His Majesty, as defined in paragraph (1) above, shall not be arrested nor his property seized nor his house, office, warehouse or other premises occupied by him entered and searched by an officer of the Sultanate save in case of necessity for the prevention of a breach of the peace or a breach of the Sultanate laws or regulations or in the case of a fugitive offender attempting to take refuge with a national of His Majesty, and in this event the proceedings shall be reported and the national of His Majesty so arrested and the property seized handed over to the Consul of His Majesty for trial or disposal.
- (6) All laws and regulations made by the Sultan which are or shall be applicable to nationals of the Sultan and to foreign nationals shall, unless the Sultan decides otherwise, automatically apply to nationals of His Majesty, as defined in paragraph (1), and to other nationals of any country of the British Commonwealth in cases heard by the Consular authorities of His Majesty in accordance with paragraph (3), save that in the exercise of His jurisdiction for Consular authorities of His Majesty shall follow the procedure laid down in their own law.
- (7) At the personal request of the Sultan the Consul of His Majesty shall without undue delay arrange the departure from the Sultan's territories of any person considered by the Sultan to be undesirable who is a national of His Majesty, as defined in paragraph (1) provided that nothing in this paragraph shall prevent His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom from making representations to the Sultan on behalf of any such person.
- (8) All fines imposed by the Consular authorities of His Majesty in regard to offences under the Sultanate Customs, Municipal or Passport Regulations shall be paid over to the Sultanate Treasury.
- (9) For the purposes of these arrangements corporate bodies shall be deemed to be citizens or nationals of the territory under whose laws they are created.

I shall be grateful if you will kindly confirm that I have understood correctly, so that I may inform His Majesty accordingly.

I desire to express the high consideration which I entertain for Your Highness and subscribe myself.

Your Highness's sincere friend,
(Signed) W. R. HAY

C. EXCHANGE OF LETTERS BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENTS OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND AND THE SULTAN OF MUSCAT AND OMAN CONCERNING THE SULTAN'S ARMED FORCES, CIVIL AVIATION, ROYAL AIR FORCE FACILITIES AND ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT IN MUSCAT AND OMAN

LONDON, 25 JULY 1958

No. 1

The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the Sultan of Muscat and Oman

Foreign Office, S.W.1

25 July 1958

My honoured and valued Friend,

With reference to the discussions which I have had the pleasure of holding with your Highness in London, and following upon those which took place in Muscat between your Highness and Mr. Julian Amery in January 1958, I have the honour to set out below my understanding of the agreement which has been reached between us.

In pursuance of the common interest of Your Highness and Her Majesty's Government in furthering the progress of the Sultanate of Muscat and Oman, Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom have agreed to extend assistance towards the strengthening of Your Highness's Army. Her Majesty's Government will also, at Your Highness's request, make available Regular officers on secondment from the British Army, who will, while serving in the Sultanate, form an integral part of Your Highness's Armed Forces. The terms and conditions of service of these seconded British officers have been agreed with Your Highness. Her Majesty's Government will also provide training facilities for members of Your Highness's Armed Forces and will make advice available on training and other matters as may be required by Your Highness.

Her Majesty's Government will also assist Your Highness in the establishment of an Air Force as an integral part of Your Highness's Armed Forces, and they will make available personnel to this Air Force.

Your Highness has approved the conclusion of an agreement for the extension of the present arrangements regarding civil aviation and the use by the Royal Air Force of the airfields at Salalah and Masirah.

We also discussed the economic and development problems of the Sultanate and Her Majesty's Government agreed to assist Your Highness in carrying out a civil development programme which will include the improvement of roads, medical and educational facilities and an agricultural research programme.

If Your Highness agrees that the foregoing correctly sets out the agreement reached between us I have the honour to suggest that this letter and Your Highness's reply should be regarded as constituting an Agreement between Your Highness and my Government.

I have the honour to be, with your highest consideration,

Your Highness's sincere friend,
(Signed) Selwyn LLOYD

Agreements between the Trucial Sheikhdoms and the United Kingdom

EXCLUSIVE AGREEMENT OF THE CHIEF OF ABU DHABI WITH THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT, DATED 6 MARCH 1892

I, Zaeed bin Khalifah, Chief of Abu Dhabi, in the presence of Lieutenant Colonel A. C. Talbot, C.I.E., Political Resident in the Persian Gulf, do hereby solemnly bind myself and agree, on behalf of myself, my heirs and successors to the following conditions, viz.:

1. That I will on no account enter into any agreement or correspondence with any Power other than the British Government.

2. That without the assent of the British Government I will not consent to the residence within my territory of the agent of any other Government.

3. That I will on no account cede, sell, mortgage or otherwise give for occupation any part of my territory, save to the British Government.

Dated Abu Dhabi, 6 March 1892, corresponding to 5th Shaaban 1309 Hijri.

Signature of Zaeed bin KHALIFAH,
Chief of Abu Dhabi

A. C. TALBOT, Lieut. Col.
Resident in the Persian Gulf

LANSDOWNE,
Viceroy and Governor-General of India

Ratified by His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor-General of India at Simla on the twelfth day of May 1892.

UNDERTAKING BY THE SHAIKH OF SHARGAH, REGARDING OIL—1922

Letter from Shaikh Khaled ben Ahmed, Chief of Shargah, to the Honourable Lieutenant Colonel A. P. Trevor, C.S.I., C.I.E., Political Resident, Persian Gulf, Bushire, dated 18th Jamadi-os-Sani, 1340 (17th February 1922)

After compliments—

My object in writing this letter of friendship is to convey my compliments to you and to inquire after your health.

Secondly, let it not be hidden from you that I write this letter with my free will and give undertaking to your Honour that if it is hoped that an oil mine will be found in my territory I will not give a concession for it to foreigners except to the person appointed by the High British Government.

This is what was necessary to be stated.

Note. A similar undertaking was given by the Chief of Ras-al-Khaima, on the 22nd February 1922.

UNDERTAKING BY THE SHAIKH OF DIBAI, REGARDING OIL—1922

Letter from Saikh Saeed ben Maktoom, Chief of Debai, to Lieutenant Colonel A. P. Trevor, C.S.I., C.I.E., Political Resident, Persian Gulf, dated 4th Ramazan 1340 (2nd May 1922)

After compliments—

Let it not be hidden from you that we agree, if oil is expected to be found in our territory, not to grant any concession in this connexion to any one except to the person appointed by the High British Government.

Note. Undertakings similar in substance to the above were given by the following shaikhs on the dates mentioned:

Shaikh of Abu Dhabi 3rd May 1922

Shaikh of Ajman 4th May 1922

Shaikh of Umm-al-Qaiwain 8th May 1922

chap. XIV, paras. 154-159). The Special Committee included relevant information on the Territories in its report to the Assembly at its twentieth session (A/6000/Rev. 1,² chap. XIII).

2. The General Assembly, at its twentieth session, adopted two resolutions, one concerning Mauritius (resolution 2066 (XX) of 16 December 1965) and the other concerning a number of smaller Territories, including the Seychelles and St. Helena (resolution 2069 (XX) of 16 December 1965).

3. The operative paragraphs of resolution 2066 (XX) on Mauritius read as follows:

["The General Assembly]

"1. Approves the chapters of the reports of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples relating to the Territory of Mauritius, and endorses the conclusions and recommendations of the Special Committee contained therein;

"2. Reaffirms the inalienable right of the people of the Territory of Mauritius to freedom and independence in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV);

"3. Invites the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to take effective measures with a view to the immediate and full implementation of resolution 1514 (XV);

"4. Invites the administering Power to take no action which would dismember the Territory of Mauritius and violate its territorial integrity;

"5. Further invites the administering Power to report to the Special Committee and to the General Assembly on the implementation of the present resolution;

"6. Requests the Special Committee to keep the question of the Territory of Mauritius under review and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its twenty-first session."

4. The operative paragraphs of resolution 2069 (XX) on the Seychelles and St. Helena, among other Territories, read as follows:

["The General Assembly]

"1. Approves the chapters of the reports of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples relating to these Territories, and endorses the conclusions and recommendations contained therein;

"2. Calls upon the administering Powers to implement without delay the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly;

"3. Requests the administering Powers to allow United Nations visiting missions to visit the Territories, and to extend to them full co-operation and assistance;

"4. Reaffirms the inalienable right of the people of these Territories to decide their constitutional status in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and with the provisions of resolution 1514 (XV) and other relevant General Assembly resolutions;

"5. Decides that the United Nations should render all help to the people of these Territories in their efforts freely to decide their future status;

"6. Requests the Special Committee to examine the situation in these Territories and to report on the implementation of the present resolution to the General Assembly at its twenty-first session;

"7. Requests the Secretary-General to give all assistance in the implementation of this resolution."

B. INFORMATION ON THE TERRITORIES³

5. Information on Mauritius, the Seychelles and St. Helena is contained in the reports of the Special Committee to the General Assembly at its nineteenth and twentieth sessions (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. XIV; and A/6000/Rev.1, chap. XIII). Supplementary information is set out below.

1. Mauritius

General

6. Up to 8 November 1965, the Territory of Mauritius consisted of the island of Mauritius and its dependencies, Rodriguez, the Chagos Archipelago, Agalega and the Cargados Carajos. As from that date, the Chagos Archipelago forms part of a new Territory, created by the United Kingdom Government, which is known as the British Indian Ocean Territory (see paras. 41-53 below).

7. The total population of Mauritius at the end of 1965, excluding the dependencies, was estimated at 751,421. Racially the population is divided into the general population (Europeans (mainly French), Africans and persons of mixed origin), 220,093; Indo-Mauritians (made up of immigrants from the Indian subcontinent and their descendants), 506,552 (of whom 383,542 were Hindus and 123,010 Muslims); and Chinese (consisting of immigrants from China and their descendants), 24,776.

8. With an average of over 1,000 people to the square mile, Mauritius is already one of the most densely populated agricultural areas in the world, and a continuing high birth-rate and falling death-rate are resulting in an increase of some thirty per 1,000 annually. The growth of population has led to a reduction of living standards among certain sections of the people, and to growing unemployment.

Political and constitutional developments

Constitutional Conference of 1965

9. The decision that Mauritius should become an independent State probably by the end of 1966, after a period of six months' full internal self-government, was announced by Mr. Anthony Greenwood, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, at the end of a Constitutional Conference held in London from 7 to 24 September 1965.

10. The Conference was attended by representatives of all political parties in the Mauritius Legislature, namely: the Mauritius Labour Party (MLP) led by the Prime Minister, Sir Seenoosagur Ramgoolam; the Parti Mauricien Social Démocrate (PMSD) led by Mr. J. Koenig; the Independent Forward Bloc (IFB) led by Mr. S. Bissoondoyal; the Muslim Committee of Action (MCA) led by Mr. A. R. Mohamed; two independent members of the Legislature, Messrs. J. M. Paturau and J. Ah Chuen.

11. The MLP, the party of the working class which in the October 1963 general election won nineteen out of the forty elected seats in the Legislature, represents mainly the Indo-Mauritian and Creole (Afro-European) communities. Most of the Indo-Mauritians supporting this party are Hindus, though it also has the support of some Muslims. The majority of Muslims, however, belong to the MCA which at the last election won four seats and stood as the ally of the MLP. The PMSD, which won eight seats, traditionally represents the Franco-Mauritian landowning class and the Creole middle class. To the left of the MLP is the IFB, a rural Indo-Mauritian party, which won seven seats.

12. According to reports, the PMSD withdrew from the Conference on 23 September 1965 and did not attend the final plenary meeting. Its leader, Mr. J. Koenig, said that Mr. Greenwood had been informed that the party would not return to the Conference until he had made his decision on two vital points on which the party had insisted throughout. These points were that the United Kingdom Government must agree to, first, the right of the Mauritians to a referendum on whether they desired independence or a form of free association with the United Kingdom, and secondly, some form of proportional representation to ensure the representation of the minorities in the Legislature in approximate proportion to their numbers.

13. In the absence of unanimous agreement among the Mauritian parties, the United Kingdom Government's decisions on the future of the Territory were announced at the final plenary meeting by Mr. Greenwood. These decisions were recorded in a report on the Conference,⁴ a summary of which follows.

Future status

14. The main debate at the Conference was between the advocates of independence and of continuing association with the United Kingdom, as the ultimate status for Mauritius. A considerable time was also devoted to the question of whether advance to this ultimate status should be preceded by consultation with the people and, if so, in what form. All the parties saw the future of Mauritius as being within the Commonwealth, with the Queen as Head of State. But as between independence and some form of continuing association with the United Kingdom, they maintained their opposing views.

15. The MLP and the IFB advocated independence, and the MCA was also prepared to support independence, subject to certain electoral safeguards for the Muslim community. On the other hand, the PMSD advocated a continuing link with the United Kingdom (although not ruling out eventual independence as a possibility) and called for a referendum to allow the people to choose between independence and association. Other points of view, put forward by representatives of independents in the Legislature, included the argument that Mauritius was too small, isolated and economically vulnerable to survive as a viable unit.

16. The report on the Conference stated that the United Kingdom Government, faced with these conflicting views, had to take a decision without the benefit of unanimous advice from the parties at the Conference. After careful study of all the issues, the Secretary of State held that "it was right that Mauritius should be independent and take her place among the sovereign nations of the world". He rejected the proposal for a referendum on the ground that the main effect would be "to prolong the current uncertainty and political controversy in a way which could only harden and deepen communal divisions and rivalries". He felt confident that "it would be possible to produce a constitution which would command the support and respect of all parties and of all sections of the population".

17. Announcing these views to the Conference, the Secretary of State said that when the electoral commission (see below) had reported, a date would be fixed for a general election under the new system, and a new government would be formed. In consultation with this government, the United Kingdom would be prepared to fix a date and take the necessary steps to declare Mauritius independent, after a period of six months' full internal self-government if a resolution asking for this was passed by a simple majority of the new Assembly. The United Kingdom Government would expect that these processes could be completed before the end of 1966.

Framework constitution

18. During the discussions, the Conference recognized that there were a number of matters which would have to be provided for in the constitution of Mauritius which would not be affected by the decision on final status. On most of these matters a large measure of agreement was reached and a framework constitution embodying the points of agreement was circulated to delegates.

19. Among subjects covered in the framework constitution are: provisions for the preservation of fundamental human rights; for securing the continued impartiality of the judicial system and of the commissions concerned with the Public Service, the judicial and legal service and the police service; and for dealing with criminal prosecutions and the exercise of the prerogative of mercy. A further safeguard against any possibility of the abuse of power is contained in the provision for the appointment of an Ombudsman, who will have a wide jurisdiction to investigate complaints against specified public bodies and officers.

20. The framework constitution also sets out provisions for the appointment of a Queen's representative who, in the exercise of his functions, will generally act on the advice of a Council of Ministers, consisting of a Chief Minister and not more than fourteen other ministers collectively responsible to a wholly elected Legislative Assembly.

21. Alterations to the constitution will require the support of not less than two thirds of all the members of the Legislative Assembly or, in the case of entrenched provisions, not less than three fourths of the members.

Electoral commission

22. A further point on which it proved impossible to reach agreement at the Conference was the electoral system to be adopted under the self-government constitution. The Secretary of State said that he was reluctant to determine such an important matter without further consultation, and therefore proposed to appoint an electoral commission to make recommendations on the most appropriate method of allocating seats in the Mauritius Legislature and on the boundaries of electoral constituencies.

23. In making its recommendations, the commission would be asked to accept certain principles: the system recommended should be based primarily on multi-member constituencies; there should be a common electoral roll, with provision, by the reservation of seats if necessary, for fair representation of the main sections of the population; no encouragement should be given to the multiplication of small parties; there should be no nominated members in the Legislature; and provision should be made for the representation of Rodriguez. The Commission, which consisted of a Chairman (Sir Harold Banwell) and two other members (Professor Colin Leys and Mr. T. G. Randall), visited Mauritius during January 1966.

24. In its report,⁵ which was submitted to the Secretary of State for consideration on 22 February 1966, the Commission stated that in formulating its proposals for the electoral system, it had taken into account the views presented by individuals and organizations, including the four main political parties, and the principles laid down for its guidance in the report of the Mauritius Constitutional Conference of 1965.

25. Under the proposed system, sixty members would be returned for the island of Mauritius by block voting (each elector being obliged to cast his full three votes) in twenty three-member constituencies, and two members returned for Rodriguez (the principal dependency of Mauritius) by block voting in a single constituency. The members elected for Rodriguez would also represent the interests of the two lesser dependencies, namely, Cargados Carajos and Agalega.

26. There would be a constant corrective consisting of five additional seats to be filled in turn from the runners-up among the losing candidates who were least well represented after the poll. A party would gain a seat by means of this corrective, only if it secured the return of one member by direct election and 10 per cent of the total vote cast.

27. Provision would be made for the establishment of a variable corrective system. Under this system, any party which received more than 25 per cent of the vote but less than 25 per cent of the seats would have its representation correspondingly augmented.

28. The Commission also recommended the sending of independent observers from Commonwealth countries to Mauritius during the preparation of the next register of electors and the subsequent elections, and the formation of an independent electoral commission of three members.

29. In a dispatch of 28 May 1966 addressed to the Governor of Mauritius, the Secretary of State for the Colonies stated that after carefully considering the recommendations made in the report of the Banwell Commission, he had reached the conclusion that the electoral arrangements proposed, taken as a whole, fully conformed with the relevant principles set forth in the report of the Mauritius Constitutional Conference of 1965, and that these arrangements were "as fair and satisfactory as it is possible to devise in the particular situation of Mauritius". He had accordingly decided to accept the Commission's recommendations in full, and very much hoped that all political parties would in the best interests of Mauritius willingly accept the arrangements proposed and co-operate in implementing them so that planning might go ahead on the arrangements that would be required for the elections to be held later in 1966.

30. The Secretary of State also stated that in the circumstances of Mauritius, a team of observers from Commonwealth countries was clearly appropriate as recommended by the Commission, and that he was taking urgent steps to select suitably qualified persons to undertake this task. Finally, he requested the Governor to arrange for the Commission's report and his dispatch to be published in Mauritius at an early date.

31. In the course of nearly four weeks following its issuance, the Commission's report became the centre of controversy in Mauritius, notably between the three parties participating in the present Government (i.e., MLP, IFB and MCA) and their opponents the PMSD. According to reports, the former organized the Pro-Independence Front under the leadership of the Prime Minister in protest against the Commission's proposals for the electoral arrangements. The main points of protest were reported to be that these proposals did not provide for majority rule or for direct adequate representation of the Muslim and Chinese communities. On the other hand, the PMSD was reported to be in favour of the system proposed by the Commission, mainly because it felt that this system was very much like one of proportional representation and was based on non-communalism. Both sides made charges and counter-charges and organized mass political meetings, at which resolutions were adopted, pledging support for their respective stands.

32. On 16 June 1966, a motion introduced by the Prime Minister was adopted by an overwhelming majority in the Legislative Assembly, asking for further consideration of the proposals contained in the Banwell report. An opposition amendment accepting that report was rejected by a large majority. On 27 June 1966, Mr. John Stonehouse, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary for the Colonies, began an eight-day visit to Mauritius for discussions with the four main parties concerning the Banwell proposals. As a result, full agreement was reached on certain variations of these proposals.

33. These variations, which were later approved by the Secretary of State, include the following.

34. While the system proposed by the Banwell Commission for constituency elections will be retained in full, changes have been made in the correctives recommended by the Commission. The variable corrective will be dropped. The constant corrective will be replaced by provision for eight "best loser" seats. Parties or party alliances will be permitted to qualify for these seats if registered with the Electoral Commissioner before nomination day. The requirement that a party should secure certain minimum results in the constituency elections in order to qualify for constant corrective seats will be dropped and no corresponding provision will be made for the "best loser" seats.

35. The first four "best loser" seats will be reserved for communities under-represented in the Legislative Assembly after the constituency elections. These four seats will be allocated irrespective of party. The remaining four "best loser" seats will be allocated on the basis of party and community.

36. The general effect of the application of the eight "best loser" seats as a whole will thus be to help any community to obtain a fair share of seats in the Legislative Assembly by the allocation of extra seats reserved for the purpose, and to maintain the position of the party or party alliance which led after the constituency elections.

⁵ Mauritius: Report of the Banwell Commission on the Electoral System, Colonial No. 362 (London, Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1966).

37. On 4 July 1966, before his departure for London, Mr. Stonehouse was reported to have said that the general elections based on the revised proposals of the Banwell Commission must be held as soon as possible, but that the date at which Mauritius would assume full internal self-government could not be fixed at the present stage.

Commonwealth membership

38. On the question of Commonwealth membership, the Secretary of State made it plain that it was a matter not for the United Kingdom Government alone but for the members of the Commonwealth as a whole to decide. He indicated, however, that his Government would be happy, if the desire for membership of the Commonwealth were confirmed by a resolution of the Mauritius Legislature elected before independence, to transmit such a request to other Commonwealth Governments.

39. The Secretary of State believed that the achievement of independence by the Territory would strengthen the close and friendly relations which had existed between Mauritius and the United Kingdom for over 150 years. Mauritius would continue to be eligible for economic assistance from the United Kingdom in the same way as other formerly dependent Territories and would still benefit from the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement.

Defence

40. At the final plenary meeting of the Conference, the Secretary of State indicated that his Government had given careful consideration to the views expressed concerning the desirability of a defence agreement being entered into between the Governments of Mauritius and the United Kingdom. He announced that his Government was willing in principle to negotiate the terms of a defence agreement with the Mauritius Government before independence, which would be signed and come into effect immediately after independence. The United Kingdom Government envisaged that such an agreement might provide that, in the event of an external threat to either country, the two Governments would consult together to decide what action was necessary for mutual defence. There would also be joint consultation on any request from the Mauritius Government in the event of a threat to the internal security of Mauritius. The agreement would contain provisions under which, on the one hand, the United Kingdom Government would undertake to assist in the provision of training for, and the secondment of trained personnel to, the Mauritius police and security forces; and on the other hand, the Mauritius Government would agree to the continued enjoyment by the United Kingdom of existing rights and facilities in HMS Mauritius (a wireless-telegraphy station) and at Plaisance Airfield.

British Indian Ocean Territory

41. On 10 November 1965, the Secretary of State for the Colonies stated in a written answer to a question in the United Kingdom House of Commons that:

"With the agreement of the Governments of Mauritius and Seychelles new arrangements for the administration of certain islands in the Indian Ocean were introduced by Order-in-Council made on 8 November (The British Indian Ocean Territory Order 1965, Statutory Instruments 1965, No. 1920). The islands are the Chagos Archipelago, some 1,200 miles north-east of Mauritius, and Aldabra, Farquhar and Desroches in the Western Indian Ocean. Their populations are approximately 1,000, 100, 172 and 112 respectively. The Chagos Archipelago was formerly administered by the Government of Mauritius and the other three islands by that of Seychelles. The islands will be called the British Indian Ocean Territory and will be administered by a Commissioner. It is intended that the islands will be available for the construction of defence facilities by the British and United States Governments, but no firm plans have yet been made by either Government. Appropriate compensation will be paid."

42. Subsequently, it was announced that the first Commissioner of the Territory would be Lord Oxford and Asquith, Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Seychelles, and that the new appointment would be additional to that of Governor of the Seychelles.

43. According to reports, the new Territory could become the strategic base for a new Anglo-American security system east of Suez. Although there were no firm plans, the intention was to use Diego García, the largest island in the Chagos Archipelago, thirteen miles long and four miles wide, with a population of about 500, as a communications centre and refuelling base, upon the completion of the necessary preparations. The island could be expanded into a staging post, though that was not now planned. The other islands were included in view of possible future requirements.

44. Certain other countries were reported to have been kept informed. These included Australia and New Zealand, which were believed to have an interest in alternative staging posts for air and sea transport across the Indian Ocean between the Red Sea and the Cocos (Keeling) Islands (now administered by Australia).

45. The compensation to be paid to the Government of Mauritius was reported to be about £3 million in the case of the Chagos Archipelago.

46. In Mauritius, all three Ministers of the PMSD resigned from the Government on 12 November 1965 in protest against the United Kingdom Government's scheme to detach the Chagos Archipelago from Mauritius for the purpose of setting up an Anglo-American military base. The ministers concerned, whose respective portfolios were subsequently taken by three other persons (one from the IFB and two from the MCA), were Mr. J. Koenig, the Attorney General, the party leader; Mr. G. Duval, Minister of Housing, Lands and Town and Country Planning, deputy leader; and Mr. R. Devienne, Minister of State (Development), party chairman. One of them (Mr. Duval) was said to have cabled the Indian Prime Minister, thanking him for India's opposition to the planned base. According to information provided by the administering Power, the three ministers announced at a press conference in November 1965 that they were not opposed to the detachment of the Chagos Archipelago from Mauritius for Western defence purposes but only to the terms and conditions of that detachment.

47. The discontent among the Mauritians over the above-mentioned scheme was said to be growing. On 16 November 1965, a Remembrance Day ceremony held in Curepipe was disturbed by opponents of this scheme. Several thousands of them brandishing French, Indian and Pakistani flags attended a meeting at Port Louis on 5 December 1965, during which a resolution was adopted, denouncing the United Kingdom.

48. On 2 February 1966, the scheme in question formed the subject of discussion in the United Kingdom House of Commons. In the course of this discussion, the Secretary of State for Defence stated that his Government did not propose to make any modification of this scheme following the adoption by the General Assembly of resolution 2066 (XX) on 16 December 1965.

49. He was asked whether the establishment of military bases anywhere outside the islands referred to in the resolution was liable to run into political difficulties and whether alternatives should therefore be studied. He replied: "We did not think that the resolution dealt with the problem realistically . . . We have taken certain action here that we think is wise bearing in mind that we cannot foresee what the future defence needs in the area might be."

50. With regard to the nature, purpose and cost of the defence facilities to be constructed in the British Indian Ocean Territory, he said:

"Neither Her Majesty's Government nor, I understand, the United States Government have at present any specific plans for constructing military facilities on any of these islands. There are, of course, a number of military uses to which the islands might be put in due course, as and when specific requirements arise, and this was the justification for the establishment of the British Indian Ocean Territory."

51. On the question of the proportion in which the cost of any defence facilities in the Territory would be shared between the United Kingdom and the United States, the Secretary of State said that each country would pay for the facilities in which it had the prime interest and that all facilities would be available for use by both countries without charge.

52. He was also asked to describe the extent to which this sharing of defence facilities and costs in the Far East meant an integration of the defence policy of the United Kingdom with that of the United States as well as to give an assurance that it was not the United Kingdom Government's policy to put down revolutions in other countries. Replying, he asserted that: "We have had very long and very successful experience of this sort of military co-operation with the United States".

53. At the meeting of the British Parliamentary Labour Party held on 15 June 1966, a motion presented by the Prime Minister's critics calling for a decisive reduction in the United Kingdom military commitments east of Suez by 1969-1970 was rejected by 225 votes to 54. Mr. Wilson attacked the motion on the grounds that "if we believe in peace-keeping through the United Nations and in making our contribution to it, we have to be there or capable of getting there", and that the United Kingdom could not disregard the wish of its partners that it should be able to assert influence in Asia and Africa "to neutralize the trouble spots and potential trouble spots". Mr. Wilson said that "What we want to get away from where we can is the system of great bases in populated areas. What we need more is staging posts such as those available to us in the Indian Ocean, with virtually no local population, but which will enable us speedily to get to where we are needed at minimum cost".

Economic conditions

54. Mauritius is primarily an agricultural country. In 1960, it suffered a severe economic setback brought about by two cyclones. Since then the economy has made substantial progress.

55. The gross national product in 1963 was estimated at Rs.926 million (£69 million), the highest since the Rs.542 million for 1960. In 1964 (the last year for which national income statistics are available), the total production of the agricultural and manufacturing industries declined. These industries contributed 24 per cent and 15 per cent of the gross national product respectively, with the remainder being made up by the other smaller sectors. The gross national product in 1964 was estimated at Rs.767 million, or Rs.161 million less than in 1963. During this period, the per capita income fell from Rs.1,300 to Rs.1,020.

56. In 1963, farming and manufacturing contributed 33 and 19 per cent of the gross national product respectively, with the remainder from the other smaller sectors.

57. The relative prosperity which Mauritius enjoys is due almost entirely to the continuing expansion of the sugar industry and guaranteed prices under the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement, which runs until 1971.

58. In 1963 and 1964, the arable land under cane continued to expand, from 213,000 acres to 215,800 acres, representing 90 per cent of the total area under cultivation. Sugar production varies according to weather conditions; in this period, it experienced a considerable decline, from 685,300 to 519,600 metric tons. But sugar exports showed a slight increase from 574,300 to 575,662 metric tons, accounting for 90 and 94 per cent of the Territory's export respectively.

59. In 1965, some progress was made in the diversification of agriculture and the expansion of the secondary industry. The arable land under crops other than sugar-cane rose by 2,400 acres to 17,600 acres, while that under cane remained at 215,800 acres. A notable example was the emergence of tea as a major cash crop following an increase in its acreage by 800 to 6,600. A total of twenty-five new industries was set up, compared with eleven in 1964 and eight in 1963. Loans granted by the Development Bank of Mauritius for agricultural purposes and industrial projects totalled about Rs.1 million at the end of 1964 and Rs.8 million at the end of 1965.

60. Capital expenditure by the mill-owning sugar companies was estimated at Rs.165.5 million for the period 1964-1969 for a target production of 800,000 metric tons of sugar.

61. The bulk of sugar-cane is produced on plantation scale. The larger plantations, with factories and modern equipment, owned by twenty-three Franco-Mauritian sugar millers, produce about 60 per cent of the total crop. The remainder is produced by some 26,000 peasants, mainly Indo-Mauritian owners. They cultivate about 20 per cent of the land under cane, and depend on the twenty-three sugar mills for the extraction of the sugar from their cane. According to reports, managerial, supervisory and technical jobs on the Franco-Mauritian plantations are a close preserve of their own community.

62. Nevertheless, the general economic situation continued to deteriorate in 1965, when the total external trade amounted to about Rs.680.1 million, down from Rs.755.8 million in the previous year. Imports were valued at Rs.388.9 million in 1964 and Rs.367.3 million in 1965, compared with exports totalling Rs.366.9 million and Rs.312.8 million respectively. During 1965, the Territory's unfavourable balance of trade was thus widened.

63. Some important changes occurred in the structure of this trade. Sugar still dominated the export sector of the economy, but its exports decreased from Rs.344.2 million in 1964 to Rs.289.7 million in 1965. It was followed by tea (exports worth Rs.4.4 million in 1964 and Rs.5.9 million in 1965), which replaced molasses (exports worth Rs.8.8 million in 1964 and Rs.5.0 million in 1965) as the second most important export product. The changes in the structure of imports showed less favourable aspects. During these two years, imports of food and edible oils and fats increased from Rs.117.2 million to Rs.122.9 million, while those of capital goods, particularly machinery and transport equipment, decreased from Rs.133.7 million to Rs.121.1 million. As in the past, trade was conducted mainly with the United Kingdom, which received 76.2 per cent of the Territory's exports and supplied 26.7 per cent of its imports in 1965.

64. The recent poor performance of the economy has weakened the financial position of the Territory. During 1965, recurrent revenue decreased by Rs.10 million to Rs.205 million, while recurrent expenditure increased by Rs.18 million to Rs.210 million. Capital revenue amounted to Rs.38 million and capital expenditure to Rs.52 million, compared with Rs.61 and Rs.56 million respectively in 1964. Thus, there was a total budgetary deficit of about Rs.20 million. The public debt in the fourth quarter of 1965 stood at Rs.264 million, or Rs.18 million more than in the corresponding quarter of 1964.

65. The principal economic problems confronting the Territory are its economy's heavy dependence on sugar and the urgent need to widen employment opportunities for the fast-rising population.

66. The two main political parties—the MLP and the PMSD—are very much alive to these problems. The PMSD's policy of association with the United Kingdom is said to be partly inspired by the fear that independence will lead to nationalization of the sugar industry and possibly job discrimination in favour of Indo-Mauritians. In order to dispel this fear, the leader of the MLP is reported to have said that his party favoured constitutional safeguards for minorities and was opposed to nationalization.

67. The Government has made efforts to promote diversification of agriculture, but a factor hampering realization of this objective is that the guaranteed marketing conditions make it more profitable for people to grow sugar.

68. Manufacturing industries in Mauritius are still in their early stages. With a relatively small home market and no raw materials except for sugar and its by-products, aloe and some timber, the development of manufacturing industries has been confined in the main to those directly concerned with the processing of these raw materials.

69. Measures taken by the Government for stimulating the growth of secondary industries include import duty concessions or exemptions on machinery, plant and raw materials for manufacture in Mauritius and income tax incentives. These incentives have already resulted in the production locally of a variety of goods, including car batteries, carbon dioxide, bituminous paints, nails, fibre glass manufactures, steel furniture, etc., and in the establishment of a modern sawmill, a brewery and a factory for processing milk.

70. According to reports, the leader of the MLP has said, in explaining his party's policy of independence within the Commonwealth, that Mauritius is economically more viable than other colonies that have been granted their independence; that it has never needed a grant-in-aid to balance its budget; and that it has financed the greater part of its development from its own resources.

71. The diversification of the Territory's economy and the reduction of its dependence on sugar are the basic objects of a reconstruction and development programme, which originally covered the period 1960-1965. In 1964, it was decided to increase the ceiling of the programme to Rs.400 million and to extend the period to mid 1966. The United Kingdom is contributing about one third of the total cost of the revised programme.

72. On 1 March 1964, the Development Bank of Mauritius was established to provide loans for agricultural purposes and industrial enterprises. The total amount of loans granted by the Bank up to the end of the year was some Rs.966,000.

73. More recently, the Government has expressed great concern over an increasing level of unemployment caused chiefly by the slowdown in the economy and the rapid growth in population. The population of working age was 190,000 in 1963 and is estimated to reach 250,000 in 1970. In 1965, the Government published for the first time more detailed statistics for 1964 on employment provided by various concerns engaged in construction, electricity, mining and quarrying, manufacture and repairs, and transport. The total number of persons engaged in the above-mentioned undertakings was about 22,000. In addition, the twenty-three Franco-Mauritian sugar millers' estates had some 49,000 employees in 1964. However, no data are available for total unemployment in that year.

74. In his speech to the legislative Assembly on 16 March 1966, the Governor proposed a series of measures designed to achieve full employment by 1970 mainly through the acceleration of economic growth and the reduction of the birth-rate. Subsequently, despite the opposition from the PMSD, the Assembly was reported to have adopted a motion expressing support for these measures, which are summarized below.

75. Under a new development programme covering the period from July 1966 to June 1970, all projects will be carried out in "as labour-intensive a manner as possible", and a higher proportion of funds will be devoted to directly productive development. The Government intends to nearly double the rate of expansion of tea plantations for small-holders and discuss shortly with the International Development Association (IDA) the financing of two irrigation schemes.

76. The Government will continue to strive to create favourable conditions for private investment by such means as the strengthening of the public finance system, the establishment of a Standards Bureau and a Trade Training Centre (the cost of which will be mainly financed by the United Nations Development Programme), the maintenance of good industrial relations and stability in the basic cost of living, and the further expansion and improvement of health, housing, transportation and urban facilities and services. The Government will also continue to make funds available to entrepreneurs through the Development Bank of Mauritius. Three large industrial projects, among others, in the private sector are under study, namely, in fertilizers, textiles and edible oils.

77. The Government has agreed that Mauritius should participate in the negotiations for an Economic Community of Eastern Africa, and it will take every step to promote further economic development within the Community.

78. With the assistance offered by the United Kingdom Ministry of Overseas Development and other overseas agencies, the Government is determined to check the rate of population growth through a sustained campaign of education in family planning. Where opportunities for employment of Mauritians abroad are found, those wishing to take advantage of them will be helped to do so. Improvement will be effected in the administration of public assistance to those for whom no work can be found.

79. As shown in the draft capital budget, revenue and expenditure for the first year of 1966-1970 Development Programme are estimated at Rs.65.9 and Rs.93.2 million respectively. The budget has three main sources of revenue: transfer from the current budget, Rs.12.0 million; Colonial Development and Welfare Fund, Rs.14.8 million; and loans, Rs.32.6 million. However, by the addition of the unspeared development funds amounting to some Rs.48.3 million at the end of June 1966, the total estimated capital revenue is brought to Rs.114.2 million.

80. In July 1966, the Government decided to increase both direct and indirect taxes in order to distribute the burden among those with the ability to pay and to meet the budgetary deficit of Rs.25 million for the period ending on 30 June 1966. It also decided to strengthen the monetary system by the formation in 1966 of a central bank to be known as the Bank of Mauritius with an authorized capital of Rs.10 million.

Social conditions

Labour

81. The average rate of increase of population in recent years has been some 20,000 persons a year. The estimated annual increase in the working age population (15 to 64 years) up to 1972 is about 7,500. Steps have been taken to accelerate economic growth, but thus far the economy has not expanded fast enough to provide employment for all work-seekers, and it is considered likely that the current trend will continue unless the birth-rate is reduced. More recently, the problem of unemployment has been aggravated by the continued political uncertainty and adverse weather conditions. As a result, there has been an increasing demand for emigration to the United Kingdom, but the number of applications granted has been small.

82. Measures have been taken by the Government for easing the unemployment situation. These have included a territory-wide registration of unemployed agricultural workers, the implementation of schemes for relief works and for the growing of food crops, the provision of public assistance to those for whom no work could be found, and the undertaking of a programme of family planning.

83. The largest single employer of labour in the Territory is the sugar industry, which provided employment for 40,822 and 48,635 in March and September 1964 respectively. During the year, there were seventy-eight (seven more than in 1963) associations of employees, with a membership of 48,229 (6,113 more than in 1963). There were twenty-five trade disputes involving 7,302 workers (of whom 5,447 were employed by the sugar industry) and resulting in a loss of 11,053 man-days. The cause of those disputes involving the sugar industry was dissatisfaction with rates of pay, which remained unchanged between 1963 and 1964.

Public health

84. Government expenditure on medical and health services in the financial year 1963-1964 was Rs.19,205,094 (an increase of Rs.949,888 over the previous year), or about 11 per cent of the Territory's total expenditure.

85. During 1964, the medical and health facilities were expanded by the addition of one government dispensary, one maternity ward in a government hospital and nine maternity, child welfare and social welfare centres. The number of beds available for in-patients in the Territory totalled 3,324 (an increase of 100 over the previous year). This total included 2,121 general beds, equivalent to one general bed per 345 persons. There were 118 government and sixty-five private physicians (compared with 122 and sixty respectively in the previous year). There was, thus, one physician for every 4,008 persons.

86. The main disease found among the people in Mauritius today is anaemia, which may affect as many as 50 per cent or more of certain groups of the population. This and other allied nutritional disorders lead to poor physique, intermittent sickness and general apathy.

Educational conditions

87. Actual recurrent expenditure for the financial year 1963-1964 amounted to Rs.24.9 million (compared with Rs.22.8 million in the previous year), or roughly 13.8 per cent of the Territory's total recurrent expenditure. Capital expenditure on education was Rs.3.4 million (compared with Rs.2.8 million in the previous year).

88. Enrolment in primary, secondary, teacher-training and vocational training schools in 1964 was as follows:

	Schools	Enrolment	Teachers
Primary education	297 ^a	132,074 ^b	3,750
Secondary education	119 ^c	31,797	1,348
Teacher training	1 ^d	496	23
Vocational training	3 ^d	301	28

^a Comprising 153 government, 56 aided and 88 private schools.

^b Representing over 88 per cent of all children of primary school age (5-6 to 11-12 years).

^c Comprising 4 government, 13 aided and 102 private schools.

^d Government schools.

89. Free primary education is provided by the Government and aided schools, but not by the private schools. One of the main objects of the Government has been to expand facilities for such education as rapidly as possible to include all children of primary school age. The Government is now faced with a great problem of primary schools overcrowding, which has been aggravated by the damage to the school buildings caused by cyclones in 1960. Ten new primary schools were completed in 1964 and an extensive school-building programme was formulated for the next year.

90. Another important problem is the need to expand the facilities for further education. At present, the majority of Mauritian students seeking such education have to go abroad. In 1964, over 1,100 students were taking full-time courses in institutions of higher education overseas, most of whom were in the United Kingdom. Forty-three scholarships and bursaries and one cadetship were awarded to Mauritian students by certain Commonwealth countries and Member States of the United Nations, and six scholarships by the Mauritius Government for students to attend universities or other institutions of the United Kingdom and other countries.

91. During the year, a request was made to the United Nations Special Fund for technical assistance in expanding the Mauritius Technical Institute. Arrangements are now being made for the establishment of a university in the Territory, which will be financed by a grant of Rs.3 million from Colonial Development and Welfare funds. The university will consist of a faculty of agricultural sciences, a faculty of development services and an institute of education. It will also run extra-mural courses.

2. Seychelles

General

92. On 10 November 1965, the Secretary of State for the Colonies announced that as from 8 November 1965, three out of ninety-two islands, of which the colony of Seychelles consisted—Aldabra, Farquhar and Desrochas, together with the Chagos Archipelago, formerly administered by the Government of Mauritius, would form a new colony, created by the United Kingdom Government, which would be known as the British Indian Ocean Territory. The population of the above-mentioned islands is approximately 100,172 and 112 respectively.

93. According to reports, the purpose of this change is to enable the United Kingdom and the United States to use the new colony as the strategic military base east of Suez (see para. 43 above). Details of the administrative, legal and financial arrangements applicable to the new territory are under consideration, as are details of what compensation should be paid to the commercial and private interests involved. In so far as the Government of Seychelles is concerned, the United Kingdom Government has indicated that it is prepared to meet the cost of constructing a civil airfield in the Seychelles to provide a link with the Indian and African mainlands.

94. On 30 June 1964, the population of the Seychelles was estimated at 46,472 in comparison with 45,089 on 30 June 1963. Seychelles, like Mauritius, is facing a great increase in population. The growth of population in the last four years was greater than had been expected and if this trend continues, may lead to an estimated total population of 57,000 by 1970.

Political and constitutional developments

95. By the end of 1964 two parties—the Seychelles People's United Party (SPUP) and the Seychelles Democratic Party (SDP)—dominated the political scene in the Territory. The major issues between them have been as follows:

(a) The question of the Territory's future status. The SPUP has been in favour of speedy political progress and independence for the Seychelles. The SDP is opposed to independence.

(b) The presence of the United States satellite tracking station on Mahé. The SPUP has declared that it conflicts with their policy of non-alignment while the SDP has hailed it as a major factor in absorbing labour.

96. Coupled with the political developments of 1963 and 1964 was a rapid growth in the trade union movement, most of the unions being associated with one or another of the two main parties. For the first time in the history of the Seychelles, organized strike action was resorted to in support of pay claims and changed working conditions. There were thirteen unions on 31 December 1964.

97. The main issue between the SDP and the SPUP—the question of the Territory's future status—produced repercussions in the Legislative Council where, in February 1964, a motion was passed calling on the Government to ascertain the United Kingdom Government's reaction "to the idea of Seychelles remaining British, and/or integrating with the United Kingdom". A reply from the Secretary of State to the effect that the United Kingdom Government had no wish to take the initiative in suggesting any change in the relationship between Britain and the Seychelles was welcomed unanimously by the Legislative Council (on 23 October 1964).

98. On 18 November 1965, in replying to a dispatch of 3 November 1964 from the Governor of the Seychelles concerning the future status of the Territory, the Secretary of State for the Colonies stated, in particular, that:

(a) In considering those matters he had throughout been "very conscious of the view expressed by the Unofficial Members of the Legislative Council as to the desirability of maintaining unchanged the present relationship between Britain and Seychelles", and that it was not his intention "to call this in question in any way".

(b) He had been "struck by the fact that although, under the existing law, the franchise is fairly wide, relatively small numbers of people in fact vote at general elections" and that it seemed to him "an unhealthy situation". Therefore he considered that "a move to universal adult suffrage should now be made".

(c) "Even if universal adult suffrage were introduced forthwith it could have little political effect until the next general election. To take this step now might well however, as I have indicated, contribute towards the political education of the people. It is also for consideration whether, in the interval between now and the next general election, certain more positive steps in this direction may not be possible."

(d) "Bearing in mind that the majority of important posts in government service in Seychelles are already held by Seychellois officers, ... unofficial members of Executive Council might now be invited to assume some responsibility for the conduct of the business of Government departments."

(e) "Consideration should now be given also to longer-term and further-reaching questions concerning the Colony's constitutional arrangements and eventual future status" ... "In other territories it has been found valuable for a constitutional expert to visit the Territory and prepare a report, in the light of the views expressed to him locally by the Government, political parties and individuals, indicating the various possible courses which may be open and the arguments for and against each."

If the suggestion was acceptable, he would "arrange for a suitable person to visit Seychelles in the relatively near future to draw up a report".

(f) "If a visit on these lines were arranged, I would suggest that, subject to any comments you may have, the constitutional expert's terms of reference might be:

"Having regard to the terms of Lord Lansdowne's despatch No. 177 of 17th August 1964, and of Lord Oxford's despatch No. 226 of 3rd November 1964, and to current economic, social and political developments in Seychelles, to examine the various paths of constitutional evolution open to the territory, taking account of the wishes of the people and the realities of the local situation; in conducting this examination to consult with the Government of Seychelles, the Members of the Legislative and Executive Councils, the political parties, and interested organisations and members of the public; and to report."

99. On 3 February 1966, it was announced that Sir Colville Deverell, former Governor of the Windward Islands (from 1955 to 1959) and Mauritius (from 1959 to 1962), had accepted an invitation from the Secretary of State to visit Seychelles as constitutional adviser. Sir Colville arrived in the Seychelles on 10 February 1966 for a visit of about one month. The Secretary of State has recently received Sir Colville's recommendations, and these have been under consideration.

100. During a visit to London in April 1966, Mr. F. A. René, a member of the Legislative Council and leader of the Seychelles People's Unity Party (SPUP), one of the two majority parties of the Territory, was reported to have demanded that the Seychelles be granted internal self-government with the enlargement of the franchise to one of universal adult suffrage during October or November 1966 and that the Territory become independent during late 1969 or early 1970. Mr. René also said that despite his party's opposition to the purchase by the United Kingdom Government of three islands of the Territory for use as military bases, it was now too late to continue discussing that matter.

Economic conditions

101. The economy of Seychelles is dependent on its agriculture. It is a single-crop economy, most of the cultivated land being planted with coconut palms. The price of copra, the principal export, representing 60 to 70 per cent of all domestic exports, is the most important economic factor governing the life of the Territory.

102. The total area planted under coconuts is in the region of 23,000 acres and the number of palms is estimated at 1,750,000. Cinnamon occupies about 14,000 acres and vanilla 700 acres. The production of copra, cinnamon and vanilla were as follows:

	Quantity (tons)		Value (rupees)
	1963	1964	1963	1964
Copra	5,703	7,034	5,178,561	6,567,430
Cinnamon bark ..	1,007	1,174	725,089	834,296
Leaf oil	66	75.5	595,839	707,711
Quills	9	6	33,186	39,118
Vanilla	2.05	1.44	85,917	51,226

103. The average price per ton received for copra was Rs.786.05 in 1962; Rs.908.04. in 1963; and Rs.933.67 in 1964. No subsidies were paid in 1963 and 1964 by the Copra Stabilization Fund which has in recent years ensured a minimum return of Rs.800 per ton to planters.

104. The main industries in the Seychelles are the preparation of copra and vanilla pods, as well as the extraction of essential oils for export. Coconut oil for cooking and its by-product (coconut cake) for stock feeding, soap and coir rope are produced in small quantities for local consumption.

105. In the latter part of 1964, a coir factory was established. It aims to process about 1,000 tons of coir a year for export which should add about Rs.500,000 to the value of the Territory's exports.

106. There are some guano deposits on certain of the outlying islands. Between 1901 and 1960 some 687,500 tons of guano valued at over 17 million rupees were exported from these islands with the result that supplies were exhausted on many of them. Considerable deposits still remain on three islands, and it has been suggested that guano in the Amirantes should be reserved for the Territory's needs, while that from St. Pierre should continue to be sent to Mauritius. The private firm which has the lease to work the deposits on Assumption concentrated on installing equipment, extracting and crushing during 1963-1964. The company is permitted to extract up to 10,000 tons a year, subject to the payment of royalties (Rs.4 a ton) and export duty, and it expected to sell considerable quantities of guano on the world market during 1965.

107. In the absence of raw materials, the Territory has to look to the sea for new sources of wealth. However, it has not yet been found possible to attract the considerable capital necessary to provide ships, cold storage and a canning plant to handle the rich harvest of fish believed to exist in this part of the Indian Ocean. At present there is only a limited export of salted fish, valued in 1963 at about 40,000 rupees.

108. The main crops in the Territory are still coconuts, cinnamon, patchouli and vanilla, but it is hoped to introduce tea as a subsidiary crop especially on small holdings, now that the Seychelles Tea Company is established. The company has planted 100 acres of Crown land and is now engaged in planting another 200 acres. It is hoped that more planting will be undertaken on small holdings and private estates.

109. Under the Land Settlement Scheme, the Government provides land to small-holders for cultivation. By the end of 1964 there were 150 such holdings, mainly five acres in size, compared with 100 at the end of 1963.

110. Following a campaign by the Department of Agriculture, planters are showing an interest in cattle raising, which is being encouraged as a valuable aid to fertilizing the plantations, while increasing the Territory's supply of meat and milk. The Department maintains herds of creole cattle and Sindhi-Friesian cross-breeds from which young animals are supplied to the public.

111. Progress was reported in the field of co-operative development with planters' processing and marketing societies showing increases in membership and productivity. Several new societies were registered during 1964. Both Mahé and Praslin now have a chain of copra manufacturing societies so that all planters on these two islands may participate in large-scale production of copra through membership in a primary co-operative; and in the export of copra through a union of primaries which was registered in 1964. There is also a cinnamon producers' society, a poultry farmers' co-operative, and a property construction co-operative which undertakes building contracts and the manufacture of cement blocks and pipes. By the end of 1964 there were twelve societies operating which handled produce valued at £88,400 during the year. There is an Agricultural Bank which has been granting loans to planters for debt settlement as well as development.

112. In 1964, exports totalled £649,578, compared with £515,045 in 1963. Imports amounted to £1,179,336, compared with £1,095,058 in 1963.

113. The main export items in 1964 were copra (£497,099) and cinnamon oil and bark (£160,243). The main import items were food-stuffs (rice, maize, flour, sugar, etc.), (£407,611); kerosene, petrol and diesoline (£112,527); and cotton piece goods (£77,699).

114. The whole of the import and export trade of Seychelles, except for some shipment of guano from the outer islands to Africa, passes through the Port of Victoria. Exports of copra are handled by the Seychelles Copra Association, an association of shippers and producers. The import of rice, the staple food of the islanders, is arranged by the Government of Seychelles under an agreement with the Government of Burma. The rest of the trade and commerce of the Territory is conducted by a number of agency houses and merchants.

115. Total public revenue was estimated at Rs.10,536,122 of which Rs.7,084,000 were from local sources, the remainder being from United Kingdom funds. Total expenditure was Rs.11,116,838, of which expenditure on Colonial Development and Welfare schemes amounted to Rs.2,930,356.

116. In 1964 the Seychelles Government offered its second loan to the public in the amount of Rs.267,000 to finance development of the Territory's electricity system. The loan was fully subscribed and brought the total public debt of the Territory on 31 December 1964 to Rs.1,071,000.

117. In spite of efforts to keep down the cost of living by the occasional imposition of price control on certain essential commodities, prices have continued to rise steadily. No precise figures have been published for the years under review.

118. There are neither airfields nor railways in Seychelles, but a small fleet of diesel buses operates over the main routes on Mahé. There are forty miles of tarmac-surfaced roads on Mahé and a further thirty-four miles of motorable earth roads. Praslin has thirty miles of earth roads, half of which are motorable, and La Digue has eight miles of earth roads.

119. The five-year development plan, largely financed by Colonial Development and Welfare funds, came to an end on 31 March 1964. It was calculated that about £550,000 from Colonial Development and Welfare funds would be available for the two-year period starting 1 April 1964. Expenditure was apportioned as follows: natural resources, 35.6 per cent; works and communications, 28.4 per cent; social services, 28.9 per cent; tourism and information, 2.8 per cent; miscellaneous projects, 1.6 per cent; and uncommitted balance, 2.7 per cent.

120. A new development plan for the three-year period starting 1 April 1966 has been worked out and is now under consideration by the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

121. In his statement on 18 November 1965, the Secretary of State for the Colonies said that he hoped to be able to allocate more Colonial Development and Welfare funds to the Territory to make possible substantial economic and social development. In this connexion, he stressed the need to expand and improve agriculture, and in particular, to press on as vigorously as possible with the land settlement programme in order to enable the increasing population to secure an adequate livelihood.

122. Bearing in mind the inevitable bias towards agriculture, he was convinced that steps had to be taken to ensure the full utilization of the Territory's limited land resources. While aware that many large estates in the Seychelles were well managed and highly productive and that the Agricultural Department continued to promote improved husbandry, he nevertheless believed that neglected or unused lands inevitably constituted a heavy burden for the Territory to carry. Therefore, he felt it necessary to consider, in the context of the next development plan, what further encouragement could reasonably be given to promote good husbandry and increase land productivity, and also what sanctions (such as compulsory takeover or management in certain circumstances) might reasonably be written into the law to ensure the putting of neglected or unused lands to full use.

123. The Secretary of State also suggested that measures to ensure the maximum use of local financial resources should be examined. He thought it worth while to consider the establishment of a development corporation for the Seychelles; exploring the possibility of using the investment income of the Copra Price Stabilization Fund in such a way as to increase the pace of agricultural development; and examining whether such development could be stimulated by changes of fiscal policy. He also thought that consideration might be given to the desirability of taking measures to ensure that some part of any unusual appreciation in the capital value of land in Seychelles, particularly if it resulted from the development of an airfield, should accrue to the benefit of the community as a whole.

124. The Secretary of State said that he was aware that the peoples of Seychelles desired that progress should be made in certain other sectors of the economy, notably air communications and deep-sea fishery. Besides drawing attention to a recent announcement that an airfield was to be constructed, he pointed out that a substantial fisheries group had offered to make a survey with a view to investigating the possibility of operating from the Seychelles, and that the Government of Seychelles was conducting negotiations with that group concerning its investment in the Territory.

Social conditions

Labour

125. Compared with 1963, no significant changes have been reported in the employment situation. The number of Seychellois who benefited from the services of the Labour Office in obtaining employment abroad was 385.

126. A low-cost housing project to provide houses for 188 families was started in 1964. It is financed partly from loan funds and partly from a Colonial Development and Welfare grant. On the land settlement plots, the Government has recently been building houses at the rate of approximately fifteen a year; so far 189 cottages have been completed. Subsidies of up to £100 are offered to planters who are prepared to build labourers' houses on their estates; in 1964 provision was made for 100 such subsidies.

127. In his statement of 18 November 1965, the Secretary of State for the Colonies said that the normal level of agricultural wages in the Seychelles remained extremely low. Any programme for economic and social development should aim to promote the well-being of the poorer members of the community. While noting with satisfaction that the level of wages paid to agricultural labourers had recently been appreciably increased he nevertheless hoped that it would in due course be possible to make efforts towards the general adoption of a 45-hour week. He considered that attempts should also be made to improve the living standard of other workers earning very low wages, and suggested that the present level of wages paid to government labourers might be a reasonable target. He was thus pleased to learn that early consideration was being given to raising the minimum legal wage for all categories of workers.

128. According to reports, a strike involving some 3,250 workers employed mainly by the Government occurred at Victoria on 13 June 1966 in support of higher wages for labourers paid by the month. They union representatives and the Government blamed each other for breaking off negotiations. The former rejected the provisional pay increase from Rs.72 to Rs. 80 a month as inadequate, pointing to the latest estimate of a government organ which showed that the cost of living for these labourers had risen by 100 per cent. The Government stated that its policy was to defer a final wage award to its unskilled workers until there was time to see what effect price controls already initiated might have in keeping down the cost of living.

129. On 16 June 1966, when the strike was extended to include the coir factory and Seychelles Tea Company workers, the Seychelles Workers' Union called on the United Nations to intercede to help end the dispute. Tension remained high until after Mr. F. A. René, the union's legal adviser, who, as stated above, is also a member of the Legislative Council and leader of the SPUP, had urged the workers to avoid violence.

130. The following day, when a landing party from the British destroyer Carysfort arrived at Victoria to give assistance to the police, the strikers dispersed peacefully. They returned to work on 20 June 1966, one day after the British frigate Gurkha with 250 officers and men had sailed from Aden for the Seychelles as an additional precautionary security move. The Government stated that it found it necessary to take measures to preserve public security after certain union members had resorted to intimidation in order to prevent others from working. The Government was prepared to reopen negotiations with the union concerned when it was satisfied that the security situation had returned to normal.

131. On 7 July 1966, the Secretary of State for the Colonies stated in reply to a question raised in the United Kingdom House of Commons that the situation in the Seychelles had now returned to normal.

132. Expenditure on medical services for the Territory in 1964 was estimated at Rs.1,235,640, or 15.09 per cent of its total budget, compared with Rs.1,141,277 in 1963 exclusive of Colonial Development and Welfare funds.

133. The Territory was practically free of epidemics in 1964. However, there has been a high incidence of venereal diseases in recent years. Under the United Nations Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance (EPTA), the Seychelles will receive assistance in a campaign against venereal diseases in 1965-1966.

134. The main islands of the Territory have four hospitals (208 beds), two clinics and a tuberculosis sanatorium that can accommodate ninety-two patients. The ratios of medical officers and hospital beds to the population are 1 to 3,006 and 1 to 213 persons, respectively.

Education conditions

135. In 1964 government expenditure on education was Rs.1,393,973, or 16.5 per cent of the total expenditure, compared with Rs.1,283,632, or 15.7 per cent, in 1963.

136. There were 8,516 children (4,146 boys and 4,370 girls) in all schools in 1964, compared with 8,156 children in 1963. The number of children in primary schools was 5,472. There were 2,916 students in secondary schools, thirty-one students at the Teachers Training College, forty-five students at the technical school, thirty students attending the special teachers' courses and twenty-two girls attending the nurses courses.

137. The educational system was modified in 1965. The primary course will take six years instead of four and will be available to all children. Primary school will be followed by junior secondary school (two years) and secondary school (three years) on a competitive basis.

3. St. Helena

General

138. The estimated population of St. Helena was 4,676 at the end of 1964, in comparison with 4,613 in 1963. The estimated population of Tristan da Cunha was 278. No recent figures are available on the population of Ascension Island, another dependency of St. Helena.

Political and constitutional developments

139. No changes have been reported in the political and constitutional fields since the Special Committee considered St. Helena in 1964.

Economic conditions

140. The area of St. Helena is forty-seven square miles, of which about 640 acres is arable land. Some five square miles is under flax, seven square miles are pasture, and some three square miles are established forest. Progress has been reported in better land usage. Some 95 per cent of the pasture areas has been fenced and subdivided and brought under a system of grazing control. A programme for continuing the development of natural resources and water supplies is being financed with Colonial Development and Welfare funds. An expenditure of some £18,000 was involved in 1964, and a further expenditure of some £19,600 a year until 1965 is planned.

141. The estimated area and production of each crop in 1964, in comparison with 1963, are shown below:

Crop	Area (acres)		Production (tons)
	1963	1964	1963	1964
Flax (fibre and tow)...	3,350	3,350	1,016	1,411
Potatoes	100	100	200	200
Sweet potatoes	60	60	60	120
Vegetables	200	230	400	500
Cereals	50	50	20	50
Fodder (green)	200	200	600	600

142. The production of fibre, tow and rope in 1964, compared with that of 1963, was as follows:

	Tons		Value in pounds
	1963	1964	1963	1964
Fibre	780	953	62,114	76,425
Tow	195	455	8,142	15,990
Rope and twine	41	2	4,500	221

143. In 1964, total public revenue was estimated at £277,771 (compared with £313,205 in 1963). Estimated expenditure was £277,771.

144. The value of the Island's exports in 1964 was £105,374 (£88,019 in 1963), all of which went to six countries: the United Kingdom (49.84 per cent), South Africa (39.17 per cent), France (6.83 per cent), Denmark (2.43 per cent), Sweden (1.33 per cent), Italy (0.35 per cent). The principal export commodities were fibre (£76,425) and tow (£15,990). Imports amounted to £309,974 (£279,678 in 1963), mainly from the United Kingdom (59.53 per cent) and South Africa (21.66 per cent).

145. A small harbour at Tristan da Cunha, a dependency of St. Helena, is being built from Colonial Development and Welfare funds. The total cost of the project is of the order of £80,000. When completed, it will enable shore-based fishing to be resumed. It is then expected that the fishing company will re-establish a freezing factory on the Island, which it is hoped will give employment to some Islanders.

Social conditions

Labour

146. At the end of 1964 there was a total of 145 men on unemployment relief (compared with ninety-eight men in 1963). An institution is maintained from the proceeds of a public rate in which the aged, destitute and infirm are cared for. In 1964, 113 necessitous persons were in receipt of outdoor relief in the form of food tickets and cash payments varying from 5/- to 8/- per week.

147. At the end of 1964, 150 men from St. Helena were employed at Ascension Island by Cable and Wireless Limited. One hundred fifteen men were also employed there by United States construction companies and fifty-eight by the Ministry of Public Buildings and Works.

148. According to information received from the United Kingdom Government, the labour situation has vastly changed since 1964, with the implementation of a salaries revision granting increases of 90 per cent per week to government labourers, with effect from July 1965. In consequence, the flax industry collapsed (its survival depended on low wages and a government subsidy), but this did not lead to unemployment in view of increased opportunities for work on communications and tracking projects (British Government Cable and Wireless, Ltd., United States Government and National Aeronautics and Space Administration) on St. Helena and Ascension.

Public health

149. No significant changes have been reported. Estimated expenditure for public health in 1964 was £27,762, or 10 per cent of the total budget of the Territory. There was a mild epidemic of chicken pox.

Educational conditions

150. Comprising approximately 26 per cent of the Island population, the average number of children attending school during 1964 was 1,184.

151. There were 58 full-time and three part-time teachers. A Colonial Development and Welfare scheme provides for five pupil-teacher scholarships which are awarded annually. These students undergo a year's training locally before they are appointed as pupil-teachers. After two further years' teaching in the schools, selection is made with a view to suitable candidates being sent on a three-year overseas course leading to the United Kingdom's Ministry of Education Teacher's certificate. In 1964, two pupil-teachers selected for overseas training under this policy left the Island for Stranmillis College, Northern Ireland. The Government also sends senior teachers on short courses in the United Kingdom from time to time. One head teacher left in 1964 for a year's course.

152. Estimated educational expenditure during 1964 was £22,895, or 8.4 per cent of the total government expenditure.

C. CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Introduction

153. The Special Committee considered Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena at its 396th and 470th meetings on 16 March and 6 October 1966. At its 470th meeting, the Special Committee had before it the report of Sub-Committee I concerning these Territories, which is annexed hereto.

Written petitions and hearing

154. The Special Committee had before it the following written petitions concerning Mauritius and Seychelles:

Petitioner	Document No.
Mauritius
Mr. M. Ayaperoumall, President, Central Committee, Communist Party of Mauritius (CPM)	A/AC.109/PET.433
Mr. A. Bhunnoo	A/AC.109/PET.448 and Add.1
Mr. T. Sibsurun, Secretary-General, Mauritius People's Progressive Party	A/AC.109/PET.449 and Add.1 and 2
Mr. S. Ramgoolam, Premier of Mauritius and twelve others ..	A/AC.109/PET.479
Seychelles
Seychelles Transport and General Workers Union, Seychelles Building and Construction Workers Union, and Seychelles People's United Party	A/AC.109/PET.533

155. The Special Committee heard the following petitioner concerning Mauritius:

Petitioner	Meeting
Mr. T. Sibsurun, Secretary-General, Mauritius People's Progressive Party	396th

156. Mr. Teekaram Sibsorum (Mauritius People's Progressive Party) read out the text of a petition which his party had submitted to the Special Committee on 30 August 1965 concerning the establishment of military bases in Mauritius (A/AC.109/PET.378/Add.1). He said that the population of Mauritius was opposed to the idea of bases, as had been shown by the protest demonstration staged by 100,000 inhabitants in December 1965. In September 1965, the Government of Mauritius had signed an agreement with the United Kingdom Government on the subject of the military base which the United States and the United Kingdom wanted to establish in Diego Garcia. The Government of Mauritius had never told the public about the agreement with the United Kingdom Government and the establishment of a nuclear base in the country. After the collapse of the coalition Government, the Parti Mauricien had disclosed the agreement to the people. His own party, the Mauritius People's Progressive Party, had been formed in 1963, when the rumours about the installation of a military base had started to circulate.

157. In addition, he said that there was widespread unemployment in Mauritius: out of a population of 750,000, 100,000 were unemployed. The white settlers owned all the best land and all the sugar-cane factories. Workers could not earn enough to support their families; because of a law forbidding them to work more than four days a week, they could earn only twenty rupees a week. In addition, there was an unemployment crisis, which the Government was unable to overcome.

158. Racial discrimination was found everywhere. In 1953, the United Kingdom Government had agreed at the constitutional talks that the Muslim Party would have six reserved seats, whether or not they were elected. In keeping with the United Kingdom policy of "divide and rule", there were various political parties which concerned themselves with individual racial groups.

159. The Mauritius People's Progressive Party made the following appeals: firstly, that Mauritius should be granted immediate and unconditional independence; secondly, that no military or nuclear defence bases should be established on their Territory; and thirdly, that the general elections to be held in June 1966 should be supervised by the United Nations in order to prevent bribery and corruption.

160. In answer to a question, he stated that general elections had been held in 1963. None of the four parties had won a majority and a coalition Government had therefore been imposed by the United Kingdom. There were fifty-two seats—forty-two elected and ten nominated by the Government. The Parti Mauricien had seven seats, the Independent Forward Bloc nine, the Muslim Party six and the Labour Party twenty.

161. In answer to a further question, he said that his party had asked the Governor of Mauritius for permission to participate in the Constitutional Conference held in London in September 1965. They had been told that they were not entitled to do so and that only ministers who were members of the Government and the Legislative Council would be allowed to participate. The requests of other parties for permission to attend as observers had also been denied.

Statements by members

162. The representative of the United Kingdom said that his delegation's comments would deal with the conclusions and recommendations in the report and would be essentially factual.

163. The conclusions and recommendations fell into three main categories: firstly, the constitutional and political progress of the Territories of Mauritius, the Seychelles and St. Helena; secondly, the detachment from Mauritius and the Seychelles of the British Indian Ocean Territory; and thirdly, the economic situation in the Territories.

164. With regard to the constitutional questions, his delegation had informed the Sub-Committee of major steps taken in each of the three Territories. In Mauritius, it had been decided after the Constitutional Conference in November 1965 that, if the newly elected Legislative Assembly requested independence, the United Kingdom Government would accept that request and independence would be achieved after a six-month period of full internal self-government following the new elections. Following the recommendations of an independent electoral commissioner and a subsequent visit to the Territory by a United Kingdom Minister to discuss these recommendations, full agreement among all political parties in Mauritius had been reached on a new electoral system. Registration had begun, with a team of Commonwealth observers present, and the elections would be held early in 1967. If the party favouring independence won the elections and asked for independence, independence could thus come about by the middle of 1967.

165. In the Seychelles, the elected Legislative Council had asked the United Kingdom Government to express a view on the Council's desire that there should be no change in the relationship between the United Kingdom and the Territory. In his reply, the United Kingdom Secretary of State for the Colonies had acknowledged that desire and had suggested that the time had come for further constitutional advance, including a move to abolish the minor property and literacy qualifications for the franchise and thus move to full universal adult suffrage. A Constitutional Commissioner had visited the Territory for extensive consultations with all shades of opinion and his recommendations on the various paths of constitutional evolution open to the Seychelles were being examined.

166. In St. Helena, the Governor had undertaken extensive consultations with all sections of the community and had reached virtually unanimous agreement on a set of constitutional proposals which would represent a considerable transfer of powers and responsibility to local hands. His Government was now studying those proposals.

167. None of that progress, however, had found a place in the Sub-Committee's conclusions and recommendations. There was no mention of the prospect of independence for Mauritius within a few months. There was no mention of the consultative processes leading to fresh constitutional proposals for the Seychelles and St. Helena. There was not even any recognition that the Legislatures of Mauritius and St. Helena were already elected by universal adult suffrage and that the United Kingdom Government itself had proposed a move to universal suffrage for the Seychelles. Indeed, the report asserted that the Seychelles people were "deprived" of universal suffrage and it characterized the political development in the Territories as "slow". It blindly recommended that elections on the basis of universal adult suffrage should be held as soon as possible, thus completely ignoring the facts and the decisions that had been taken.

168. With regard to the conclusions and recommendations relating to the detachment of certain small atolls in the Indian Ocean from Mauritius and the Seychelles, his delegation had already explained the matter in its statement to the Fourth Committee at its 1558th meeting on 16 November 1965. It had made it clear that the new arrangements represented an administrative readjustment which had been fully agreed after consultations with the elected Governments of Mauritius and the Seychelles. The atolls did not form any geographical, political or ethnic union with those Territories and had previously been administered as part of Mauritius and the Seychelles purely as a matter of administrative convenience. The interests of their few inhabitants, almost all migrant labourers from Mauritius and the Seychelles, were fully protected under the new arrangements. No decisions had yet been reached about the construction of any facilities in the British Indian Ocean Territory. The suggestion (see para. 46 above) that the resignation of three Ministers from the Mauritius Government had been in protest at the principle or objectives involved in the detachment of the atolls was inaccurate, as had been shown by the public statements of the Ministers at the time. In view of the fact that the two elected Governments had agreed to the detachment, his delegation could not accept the suggestions in the Sub-Committee's report that the new arrangements violated the territorial integrity of the Territories. Furthermore, his delegation knew of no supporting evidence for the assertions (see annex, para. 55) alleging anxiety about reports that military bases in Mauritius or the Seychelles were envisaged, since there were no such bases in either Territory and, to the best of his delegation's knowledge, no plans for any such bases. There were certain minor facilities which were not bases; there were the naval wireless station in Mauritius and an airfield which was used occasionally by the Royal Air Force but primarily by the Mauritius Government for purely civilian purposes. His delegation knew of no evidence that those minor facilities had caused anxiety to anyone in the Territories concerned.

169. With regard to paragraph 63 of the recommendations of Sub-Committee I (see annex), the clear legal position was, had been and remained that until independence the administering Power alone had the authority to enter into international commitments or agreements affecting its dependent Territories. His delegation could not, therefore, accept that recommendation. He would point out, however, that in recent times the United Kingdom Government had certainly not concluded any agreements with other countries affecting the basic interests of United Kingdom colonial Territories without the fullest consultation beforehand with the representatives of the Territory concerned.

170. Finally, his delegation regretted that paragraph 57 of the conclusions and paragraph 64 of the recommendations paid no regard to the information supplied by his delegation to the Sub-Committee about the economies of the Territories and about United Kingdom Government aid to them. His delegation had made it clear that 1963 had been an exceptional year for sugar prices and that that had a marked effect on the economy of Mauritius; in interpreting the annual statistics it could not be deduced from a comparison of the 1963 and 1964 figures that there was a significant economic decline. He knew of no evidence to support the allegation in paragraph 57 that foreign companies were exploiting or otherwise acting contrary to the interests of the Territories. It was difficult to attach any meaning to the reference to "indigenous inhabitants" in paragraph 64, since the islands had been uninhabited when they had first been discovered, and no section of their inhabitants was more "indigenous" than any other.

171. On all three counts, therefore, the conclusions and recommendations seemed either to ignore or to misrepresent the basic and significant facts of the situation in the three Territories concerned. His delegation could not accept the conclusions or recommendations and he reserved his Government's position on them.

172. The representative of Italy said that during the twentieth session of the General Assembly his delegation had abstained in the vote of resolution 2066 (XX) on Mauritius and had voted against the paragraph of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX) that dealt with the so-called problem of military bases in colonial Territories. He therefore reserved his delegation's position on the report under consideration.

173. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that, as a member of Sub-Committee I, he had not been surprised to hear the United Kingdom representative disagree with the contents of the report, which was aimed at correcting the many wrongs committed by the United Kingdom Government against the people of the Territories concerned.

174. The United Kingdom representative had spoken about the revised electoral system. The Tanzanian representative in Sub-Committee I had studied the statement issued by the United Kingdom delegation and had found that system to be very complicated. Indeed, the United Kingdom representative had been obliged to explain the system in detail to the Sub-Committee.

175. With regard to the slow pace of political development referred to in paragraph 64 of the report, since the Territories had been under United Kingdom control for about 150 years, it was clear that they should have made far more progress. The Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples had been proclaimed in 1960; it is now six years later and the United Kingdom has not implemented it. The Sub-Committee had therefore been justified in noting the slow pace of political development. The people of the Territories were demanding their inalienable and sovereign rights and the United Kingdom Government was withholding those rights. The conclusions and recommendations were therefore in keeping with the facts.

176. The United Kingdom representative had said that the British Indian Ocean Territory was not part of Mauritius and the Seychelles. The Tanzanian delegation rejected that argument, since the United Kingdom Government would not have agreed to pay compensation to the inhabitants of the islands concerned if those islands were not an integral part of Mauritius and the Seychelles.

177. The United Kingdom representative had said that he disagreed with the Sub-Committee's conclusion relating to the establishment of military bases in Mauritius and the Seychelles. The Tanzanian delegation would like to hear a formal denial from that representative; it might even propose that a visiting mission should be dispatched to the Territories to ascertain the facts.

178. In keeping with its traditional opposition to colonialism and neo-colonialism, his delegation fully supported paragraph 63 (see annex), which dealt with agreements concluded between the administering Powers affecting the sovereignty and fundamental rights of the Territories.

179. The representative of Australia said that, on the basis of the facts just presented by the United Kingdom representative, his delegation considered that the conclusions and recommendations in the report were unfounded. It therefore reserved its position on the report.

180. The representative of Denmark said that the reservations expressed by his delegation at the 32nd meeting of Sub-Committee I were still valid.

181. The representative of the United States of America said that his delegation did not support all the conclusions and recommendations in the report. In particular, it endorsed the reservations made by the Danish representative at the 30th meeting of the Sub-Committee.

182. The United States delegation considered the emphasis on military facilities entirely unwarranted, especially in the light of the remarks of the United Kingdom representative.

183. With regard to the reference to paragraph 12 of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX), members would recall that at the time of the adoption of the resolution the United States had pointed out that certain paragraphs were null and void because they had not been adopted in accordance with the provisions of the Charter.

184. Lastly, the report did not take sufficient account of the efforts of the administering Power and the people of the Territories which were leading to self-determination, and nothing about the possibility that Mauritius might become independent by the middle of 1967.

185. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics disagreed with the representative of Australia that, on the basis of the facts which had just been presented by the United Kingdom representative, the conclusions and recommendations in the Sub-Committee's report was unfounded. When the question of Mauritius, the Seychelles and St. Helena had been studied thoroughly by Sub-Committee I, the Special Committee and the General Assembly in 1964, the United Kingdom representative had painted a rosy picture of the situation, but the dismal truth had nevertheless emerged. At the current meeting, the United Kingdom representative had objected that the report made no reference to political and economic progress in the Territories and that the recommendations, especially those concerning military bases, were incorrect. He agreed with the representative of Tanzania that, as six years had elapsed since the adoption of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples progress had indeed been slow, since the Declaration had still not been implemented in the Territories.

186. As for the economic situation, foreign monopolies were depriving the local inhabitants of the opportunity to participate in the economic life of the Territories. All the land in Mauritius which did not belong to the Crown was owned by foreign companies and big landowners, and two thirds of all the arable land in the Seychelles belonged to a small group of planters. The colonial structure of the economy of the Territories, which was based mainly on the cultivation of a single crop, made them entirely dependent on the metropolitan country.

187. The United Kingdom representative had said that the progress achieved had not been taken into account. Yet even the working paper prepared by the Secretariat, which, it must be agreed, was objective, had stated that in 1964 the total production of the agricultural and manufacturing industries had declined and that in 1965 the general economic situation had continued to deteriorate (see paras. 15 and 59 above). According to the Christian Science Monitor of 6 June 1965, out of a total population of more than 750,000 in Mauritius, less than 100,000 were employed, and most of those on seasonal work. The Secretariat working paper had also referred to the increasing level of unemployment. In protest against the desperate economic situation, the inhabitants had organized strikes. In May 1965, serious disturbances had broken out in Mauritius and, according to the Christian Science Monitor, had been suppressed by British troops. In June 1966, a strike called in the Seychelles had been ended by the colonial Power with the help of military units from Aden and United Kingdom naval vessels. The United Kingdom representative had omitted to mention those incidents, which were yet another example of the criminal use of military bases against a people struggling for freedom and independence and a better standard of living; instead, he had reserved his delegation's position on the question of military bases and had claimed that military bases did not impede the development of the population.

188. The Secretariat working paper (see para. 148 above) referred to the use of St. Helena and Ascension Island by the United Kingdom and United States for special communications and tracking projects and The Times (London) of 14 February 1965 had stated that Ascension Island might be used as a base for F.111 bombers. The Secretariat working paper quoted the United Kingdom Secretary of State for the Colonies concerning the establishment of the British Indian Ocean Territory and the plans for the construction of defence facilities there (see para. 41 above), yet the United Kingdom representative had claimed that there were no such plans. Both the United Kingdom newspaper The Scotsman and the United States magazine Time had reported that the Territory could be used as a base for atomic submarines and bomber aircraft, and might even be used as a platform for rocket launchings. A petition from the President of the Seychelles People's United Party (A/AC.109/PET.321) had protested about the prospect of an Anglo-American military base in the Territory, and the Secretariat working paper described the discontent among the Mauritians over the scheme (see para. 47 above). The Governments and peoples of many independent countries were strongly opposed to the construction of such bases, which represented an attempt to perpetuate the colonial system and constituted a threat to the independence of countries and to the peace and security of peoples.

189. The Secretariat working paper (see para. 48 above) quoted the United Kingdom Secretary of State for Defence as saying that his Government did not propose to make any modification of the scheme to establish the British Indian Ocean Territory as an Anglo-American military base following the adoption by the General Assembly of resolution 2066 (XX). The United Kingdom Government, therefore, had not only failed to implement the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, but had violated the territorial integrity of the Territories in question. The United Kingdom's policy was fully supported by the United States, which was exerting pressure on the United Kingdom to maintain a presence east of Suez.

190. The United Kingdom Government was reported to be prepared to pay compensation for the part of the British Indian Ocean Territory which had belonged to Mauritius. The right of a people to self-determination could not be the subject of bargaining and the United Kingdom's transaction should be condemned, particularly since it was aimed at transforming a Territory into a base for aggression against the people of Asia and Africa.

191. The recommendations of Sub-Committee I had been dictated by conditions in the Territories. Only their unconditional implementation would enable the people of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena to exercise their right to self-determination and to express their wishes freely concerning the future status of the Territories. The conclusions and recommendations submitted by Sub-Committee I had been fully confirmed by the facts available and were the very minimum acceptable to the Special Committee.

192. The representative of Syria asked the United Kingdom representative why Mauritius was still not independent when the Prime Minister of the Territory had stated unequivocally that it would be ready for independence by the middle of 1964. The United Kingdom representative had said that independence would be granted by the middle of 1967, but this statement was clothed with so many conditions that it had failed to convince the Sub-Committee. He would like to know whether the United Kingdom representative was in a position to say that the administering Power was ready to grant independence without conditions.

193. On the question of constitutional progress, he could not see the advantages of the complex electoral system introduced by the administering Power. Such constitutional arrangements should be left for the people themselves to decide after independence.

194. As for military bases, the fear had been strengthened by the United Kingdom representative's statement that negotiations with the United States concerned only certain facilities. The negotiations were apparently secret and the people's consent had consequently not been obtained. The United Kingdom representative had been asked which representatives of the people of Mauritius had taken part in the negotiations, but he had not replied.

195. The pace of progress should be considered in the light of 156 years of colonial rule. In that light, progress had indeed been slow.

196. As a general remark, he asked what the reservations of certain Powers meant concerning United Nations recommendations which were based on fact. Those Powers which had an opportunity to do so did nothing to alleviate the sufferings of the colonial peoples involved and that made it impossible to ensure that United Nations resolutions were respected.

197. The representative of the United Kingdom, replying to the representative of Syria, repeated his statement that if the party favouring independence won the elections and asked for independence, independence could come about by the middle of 1967. There was therefore only one condition for independence by that date, namely a decision by the people, through their newly elected representatives, to ask for it.

198. The representative of the USSR had stated that his delegation had omitted to mention the strike in the Seychelles. Far from suppressing such information, his delegation had drawn the Sub-Committee's attention to terms on which the strike in the Seychelles had been settled (see annex, para. 24). He had also understood the USSR representative to say that the strike in Mauritius had been suppressed by British troops. The facts were that when some British sailors had gone ashore, a crowd of local inhabitants had cheered the party and had been relieved to see them, that football matches had subsequently been arranged and that the visit had been entirely cordial.

199. The USSR representative had said a great deal about the British Indian Ocean Territory. He had nothing to add to his delegation's various statements on the subject and he asked the members of the Special Committee to pay attention to those statements rather than to speculate on reports mentioned by the Soviet representative.

200. As for the remarks concerning the slow pace of progress in the Territories, in the opinion of his delegation the only valid yardstick for the speed of political progress was the wishes of the people of the Territories themselves. By that yardstick, progress had most certainly not been slow. The Tanzanian representative was at liberty to disagree with the people of the Territories about their wishes, but the administering Power was equally at liberty to base itself on the wishes of the inhabitants rather than on the views expressed by the representatives of Tanzania, the USSR and Syria.

201. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that he did not claim to speak for the people of the Territories but that the United Kingdom had no right to do so either. His country would always speak in support of the rights of all peoples to control their own national territory and to exercise their sovereign rights; it considered it its duty to oppose all those who committed aggression or annexed other territories.

202. The representative of Poland thanked the members of Sub-Committee I for their illuminating report. He was particularly pleased that the Sub-Committee had focused its attention on the implementation, or rather non-implementation of General Assembly resolution 2066 (XX). He fully shared the view expressed by the representative of Syria in the Sub-Committee that the motives of the United Kingdom Government were twofold, namely to assure the permanence of the privileges of the minority of settlers and to use the Territories for strategic purposes against the wishes of the people of the Islands. It was immaterial whether they were called bases or "minor facilities"; the fact was that military installations did exist there and that there were plans to expand them, as had been reported in the United Kingdom and United States Press and in the Secretariat working paper. He would be glad to hear a clear statement from the United Kingdom representative that such information was false and that there were not and would not be any military installations in the Territories.

203. At its twentieth session the General Assembly had adopted resolution 2066 (XX), which included specific provisions to be implemented by the United Kingdom to enable the people of the Territories to exercise their right to self-determination in accordance with resolution 1514 (XV). The conclusions and recommendations in paragraphs 53 to 64 of the Sub-Committee's report elaborated the steps which should have been taken and were only the logical consequence of the Sub-Committee's findings. A resolution should be submitted to the General Assembly in those terms. His delegation fully supported the recommendations, especially those calling upon the administering Power to respect the territorial integrity of Mauritius and Seychelles and to refrain from establishing military bases there.

D. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON THE REPORT OF SUB-COMMITTEE I

204. At its 470th meeting on 6 October 1966, the Special Committee adopted without objection the report of Sub-Committee I on Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena, and endorsed the conclusions and recommendations therein (see annex, paras. 53-64), it being understood that the reservations expressed by some members would be reflected in the records.

INTRODUCTION

1. The Sub-Committee considered Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena at its 28th, 29th, 30th and 32nd meetings held on 12 August, 9, 12 and 19 September 1966.

2. The Sub-Committee had before it the working papers prepared by the Secretariat (see paras. 1-152 of chapter XIV).

3. In accordance with the procedure agreed upon by the Special Committee, the Chairman invited the representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to participate in the consideration of the three Territories. Accordingly, the representative of the United Kingdom participated in the 29th, 30th and 32nd meetings of the Sub-Committee.

CONSIDERATION BY THE SUB-COMMITTEE

A. Statements by members

4. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics recalled that the situation in Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena had been studied very thoroughly by the Sub-Committee, the Special Committee and the General Assembly in 1964. That study had revealed the true situation in those Territories and had shown that the administering Power had not applied to them the provisions of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples but, on the contrary, had done everything possible to retard their attainment of independence.

5. The economic and social status of the inhabitants of the islands was deplorable. The administering Power had deprived them of the wealth which was theirs by right and, by granting concessions to foreign monopolies, had made it impossible for them to progress economically. In Mauritius and Seychelles, for example, two thirds of the arable land had been turned over to groups of planters. Without land, the inhabitants were forced to seek work on the plantations at starvation wages or else rent land. The economy was still very largely based on a single crop, which made the Territories entirely dependent on the metropolitan country. The inhabitants' standard of living was declining. The population was reduced to despair, and discontent was growing daily. In May 1965, serious disturbances had broken out in Mauritius, where the economic situation was steadily deteriorating, and the administering Power had used the Army to suppress the protests. In June 1966, a strike had been called in the Seychelles and the United Kingdom Government had brought in military units from Aden to disperse the strikers and prevent them from expressing their discontent. It was thus apparent that the administering Power was ignoring the recommendations of the General Assembly and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. The Special Committee and the General Assembly should therefore continue to study the question and formulate recommendations calling upon the United Kingdom to take prompt action to enable the Territories to attain independence immediately in accordance with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

6. The negative attitude of the administering Power was based on strategic considerations. The establishment of the new British Indian Ocean Territory, which would form the basis of a United Kingdom-United States security system, was a threat directed against the new countries of Africa and Asia, and it fully justified the fears expressed by the non-aligned countries at the Cairo Conference. The inhabitants were opposed to the idea of transforming the Territories into defensive bastions intended not only for the suppression of the nationalist movements in the islands themselves but also for use by the colonialists against those who were fighting for freedom in that part of the world. A petition (A/AC.109/PET.321) from the President of the Seychelles People's United Party protested against the construction of a military base, and demonstrations had been held in Mauritius for the same purpose (see para. 47 of chap. XIV). According to The Times of London of 14 February 1966, an air base was to be built on Ascension Island; an article published in the American magazine Time on 19 December 1965 had stated that certain nearby atolls might be used as a base for submarines equipped with Polaris missiles. The Indian people, among others, were aroused at the prospect that new hotbeds of aggression would be created in the Indian Ocean, for those plans threatened not only the independence of certain peoples but also world peace. The United Kingdom Government did not propose to modify its scheme to convert the islands into a military base (see para. 48 of chap. XIV). The United Kingdom was thus in effect hurling a challenge at the United Nations, for it was not only doing nothing to apply the Declaration embodied in resolution 1514 (XV) but also failing to respect the territorial integrity of the islands and defying the provisions of the resolution calling for the dismantling of military bases. One had only to read the Press to see that the United Kingdom was being encouraged by the United States and other imperialist Powers; during the Washington talks held earlier in the year between the United Kingdom Foreign Secretary and the United States Secretary of State concerning the development of military bases, the Australian Government had announced that large sums were to be allocated for military construction in Papua and New Guinea.

7. In order to eliminate colonialism as quickly as possible from Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena, his delegation suggested that the Sub-Committee should recommend the Special Committee to take decisions to the effect that: (1) the right to self-determination and independence of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena and their dependencies should be reaffirmed; (2) elections should be held on the basis of universal adult suffrage; (3) following such elections, representative bodies exercising full powers should be established; (4) all land should be restored to the indigenous inhabitants; (5) the right of the indigenous inhabitants to dispose of all the natural resources of their Territories should be preserved; (6) military bases should be removed; (7) all agreements imposed on the Territories which limited the sovereignty and fundamental rights of the peoples concerned should be abrogated; (8) enterprises of the metropolitan country should refrain from any actions prejudicial to the integrity of the Territories; (9) any use of military bases should be condemned.

8. His delegation would support any recommendations which the Special Committee might adopt with a view to attaining those ends.

9. The representative of Syria noted that, despite the clear and straightforward recommendations made by the Sub-Committee in 1965 and subsequently adopted by the Special Committee, the question of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena had to be taken up once again, because the administering Power, notwithstanding its disclaimers, was not yet willing to transfer full powers to the democratically elected representatives of the inhabitants. He did not believe that the reason for the delay was a desire for a better preparation for independence and self-determination. In fact, the administering Power had made but small contribution to accelerating the process of emancipation; it surrounded the idea of independence with all sorts of conditions which cast doubt on its good faith. The reforms which had been introduced in recent years were due entirely to the initiative and toil of the indigenous Government. In reality, during 156 years of British rule, nothing significant had been done to provide for the welfare of the masses of the people, who were exposed to extremely unfavourable meteorological conditions, to spread education or to prepare in the Territories cadres sufficiently enlightened to assume the responsibilities of government, development and industrialization.

10. He submitted that the United Kingdom Government's motives were twofold: to assure the permanence of the privileges of the tiny minority of settlers, and to use the Territories for strategic purposes against the wishes of the people of those islands and of the surrounding areas. Syria regarded the information given by the USSR representative on the Anglo-American plan to establish military bases in the Garcia Islands as extremely serious; the Special Committee should thoroughly investigate the matter and weigh its gravity.

11. Why, after all, did the administering Power wish to maintain the obsolete institution of the Governor, who was foreign to the country and foreign to its culture, its outlook and its aspirations, who appointed and dismissed unbound by the advice of the Public Service Commission who robbed the indigenous representatives of their legitimate right to care for their own internal security and external affairs and who, while he was supposed to act in accordance with the advice of the Executive Council, was nevertheless authorized to act against its advice?

12. Why should more than one quarter of the national representatives be nominated by the Governor, and not elected by the people, and why should the Governor, and not the representatives themselves, select the Speaker of their Assembly? Why should he have the last say on expenditure, when the island needed large funds for development? Why should bills require his assent and, worse still, why could a bill rejected by the Legislative Council be put into effect by him if he considered it expedient?

13. Of course, the administering Power had a ready answer to those questions: the country was not yet independent, it was only in the experimental stages of internal self-government. Naturally, the administering Power, invoking apparently plausible reasons of balance, objectivity and reason, wanted it to be believed that the Territories were not ready for independence and self-determination. The Special Committee was very sceptical about the alleged pace of preparation undertaken by the administering Power; moreover, it firmly believed that the problems of poverty, under-development, illiteracy, cleavage between rich and poor and social injustice could not be solved by the administering Power, but would be overcome by the inhabitants themselves when they were independent and could freely decide their own future, their own form of government and the best way of meeting their own needs and when they would receive assistance from the community of nations in equality, equity and dignity. Credence should be given to the Chief Minister, Mr. Ramgoolam, when he asserted that the country should have achieved independence by the middle of 1964, and not to the administering Power, which invoked the need for a process of constitutional progress as a pretext for the continued denial of legitimate rights to the peoples in question.

14. The representative of Mali stated that the situation in Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena was a subject of serious concern to his Government. In Mauritius, there was a racial problem which the administering Power had kept alive with a view to perpetuating its domination, in accordance with the principle "divide and rule". It was in obedience to that principle that the United Kingdom Government had appointed the Banwell Commission to make recommendations on the electoral system.

15. Mali believed that the constitution of a country and all related questions were essentially matters for that country's people to decide. The administering Power had no right to make self-government and independence for the Territory conditional on full agreement among the political parties concerning a constitution which did not meet the legitimate aspirations of the indigenous inhabitants. In his view, the setting up of the Banwell Commission was simply a manoeuvre designed to perpetuate the United Kingdom presence in the Territory simply in order the better to exploit its wealth and its people; for while the attention of the Mauritians was centred on constitutional problems, the British companies were continuing to pillage the country, whose economy was in a catastrophic condition. Mauritius could not be considered in isolation in that connexion; attention must also be given to conditions in Seychelles and St. Helena, whose climate, owing to their geographical position, was ideal for diversified cultivation. Yet sugar plantations covered a total of 215,800 acres and tea plantations 6,600 acres, leaving only 17,600 acres for other food crops, and the Mauritians, and for that matter the inhabitants of Seychelles and St. Helena also, were forced to import foodstuffs from the United Kingdom and elsewhere. Thus, the decline of the Mauritian economy noted in the working paper was not surprising. In the fourth quarter of 1965, the public debt had amounted to 264 million rupees, or 18 million rupees more than in the corresponding quarter of 1964. That loss to the Territories swelled the excessive profits of the British companies, and that was why the administering Power was refusing to allow self-government and independence for the Territories. Sugar exports had fallen from 334.2 million rupees in 1964 to 289.7 million rupees in 1965, while the profits of the British companies were on the increase. Meanwhile there was heavy unemployment in the island and the Government was advising the indigenous inhabitants to go abroad to work, so that it could make greater military use of the island. He remembered the statement made by the petitioner concerning the intention of the United Kingdom and the United States to turn the island into a military base for aggression. It was interesting to recall the United Kingdom Prime Minister's recent statement that any Power called upon to participate in United Nations peace-keeping operations would have to be on the spot or in a position to go there, and that the United Kingdom could not ignore the fact that its partners wanted it to be able to exert enough influence in Asia and Africa to neutralize existing or potential centres of infection. According to the Prime Minister's own words, the United Kingdom Government had sought to abandon the system of large military bases in populated areas and to establish itself in areas which were virtually devoid of indigenous inhabitants and from which its forces would be able to move to the theatre of operations rapidly and at minimum expense. That statement, especially if it was recalled what had happened in Ascension Island two years previously, needed no comment.

16. Mali was opposed to military bases which were meant for aggression and which prevented the peace-loving peoples of the Territories, notably Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena, from enjoying their right to self-determination and independence. Consequently, his delegation again appealed to the administering Power to fulfil its obligations by enabling the indigenous people to attain independence, in accordance with their freely expressed desire, in the best conditions. The constitutional problem should not prevent the granting of self-government in the near future, since the Territory must attain independence as soon as possible. The establishment of the military base in the area was an unlawful act. The United Kingdom should dismantle the base and replace it with hospitals and schools, which the people certainly needed much more.

17. The representative of the United Kingdom said he assumed that the statement made by the Soviet Union representative at the 28th meeting of the Sub-Committee on 12 August, as it appeared in the provisional summary record, would be extensively rewritten. The new arrangements for the administration of certain small islands represented an administrative readjustment freely worked out with the Governments and elected representatives of the Territories concerned. No decisions had yet been reached by either the United Kingdom Government or the United States Government on the construction of any facilities anywhere in the British Indian Ocean Territory.

18. Since the representative of the Soviet Union had suggested that the Sub-Committee should recommend the Special Committee to take steps to ensure that all land was restored to the indigenous inhabitants of those Territories and that the rights of those inhabitants to dispose of the natural resources of the islands were preserved, he recalled that the United Kingdom delegation had already pointed out that the first human inhabitants of Mauritius and the Seychelles had come from France and those of St. Helena from the United Kingdom. He wondered whether the indigenous inhabitants to whom the representative of the Soviet Union was referring were the dodos and tortoises—the sole occupants of the islands before the Europeans had arrived.

19. At the twentieth session of the General Assembly, the Fourth Committee had discussed the question of Mauritius. The Electoral Commission, established in December 1965, under the chairmanship of Sir Harold Banwell, had recommended in February 1966 that there should be twenty three-member constituencies for Mauritius and one two-member constituency for Rodriguez, giving a total of sixty-two seats to be filled by direct suffrage. Five additional "corrective" seats would be filled, to be allocated, one at a time, to the party which had the highest average number of votes per seat won; a "good loser" candidate of that party, belonging to the community least well represented, would then be declared elected. These "corrective" seats, however, would be awarded only to parties which had secured 10 per cent of the total poll and had won at least one constituency seat. Also, under a "variable corrective", any party with 25 per cent of the votes should have its seats increased up to 25 per cent if necessary by the appointment to the Legislature of the requisite number of "good losers". The United Kingdom Government had accepted the Banwell Commission's recommendations in full, but the three parties forming the Coalition Government had protested. Only the leader of the Opposition party, the Parti Mauricien Social Démocrate, had welcomed the report. Most of the opposition had been directed towards the "correctives", i.e., the measures designed to provide assurances to minorities on the island that they would be adequately represented in Parliament and therefore that the main clauses of the Constitution should not be amended without their agreement.

20. In the course of a visit to Mauritius by a British Minister, full agreement among all political parties had been reached on a system of seventy seats in twenty three-member constituencies; sixty members would be elected by block voting (each voter being obliged to cast his full three votes). Two members would be elected for Rodriguez by block voting. In addition, there would be eight "best loser" seats. The first four such seats would be reserved, irrespective of party, for communities under-represented in the Legislative Assembly after the constituency elections. The remaining four "best loser" seats would be allocated on the basis of party, without any qualifying requirement for a minimum number of seats or votes. That system would guarantee the fair distribution of seats among the various communities, on the one hand, and the different parties, on the other. Registration was due to begin on 5 September, but because of Ramadan the elections could not be held before February 1967. If a majority of the new Legislature favoured independence, Mauritius would therefore be able to achieve independence after six months of internal self-government, i.e., during the summer of 1967.

21. Pursuant to the Banwell Commission's recommendations, a team of observers from Commonwealth countries had been established under the chairmanship of Sir Colin McGregor, formerly Chief Justice of Jamaica. Some of them would be present in Mauritius from the outset of the registration of electors.

22. The establishment of the Banwell Commission had not been in any sense a delaying manoeuvre, as the representative of Mali had implied, because agreement had finally been reached and independence was conditional upon the outcome of the elections. That had been the most appropriate procedure, because of the divisions of opinion concerning the ultimate status of the Territory. The United Kingdom Government continued to regard independence as the right solution and would take all possible steps to ensure that Mauritius became independent as soon as possible.

23. He pointed out in connexion with the economic conditions in Mauritius referred to in the working paper, that 1963 had been in some respects an exceptional year with a record production of sugar and very high exports because of the international sugar shortage during that year. In fact, the receipts from sugar exports in 1964, although lower than those in 1963, had still been well above those in 1961 and 1962. Again, sugar production in 1965 had shown an increase compared with 1964. The Mauritius and United Kingdom Governments had taken measures to maintain the pace of economic development in Mauritius. In addition to receiving grant funds ($US6.7 million allocated for development for 1965-1968 and nearly $13 million in further grants and loans for cyclone reconstruction), it should be remembered that Mauritius enjoyed an outlet at guaranteed preferential prices under the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement (currently more than £47 a ton compared with the world price of about £17); the preferential price applied to an estimated 75 per cent of Mauritius sugar exports.

24. With regard to the Seychelles, he drew attention to the main developments since July 1964 and in particular to the exchange of dispatches between the Colonial Secretary and the Governor, a useful summary of which was to be found in the working paper (see para. 98 of chap. XIV). The Legislative Council had asked the United Kingdom Government for a response to its proposal that the Territory should remain British or be integrated with Britain. The Colonial Secretary had replied acknowledging the Council's desire for no change in the present relationship and suggesting that the Territory should now drop the minor qualifications for voting and move to universal suffrage. He also suggested apportioning departmental responsibilities to non-official members of the Executive Council and the appointment of a Constitutional Commissioner who would visit the Seychelles and consult all shades of opinion, including parties and individuals, before reporting on the future constitutional evolution of the Territory. The Commissioner had accordingly been appointed and had visited the Seychelles and submitted his report, which was under consideration. A strike had taken place in the Seychelles, but the strikers had returned to work, having accepted an interim wage award equivalent to an 11.1 per cent increase. His delegation thought that that information should answer the Syrian representative's questions concerning low wages in the Seychelles.

25. The Seychelles were receiving under the Colonial Development and Welfare Acts increased assistance in grants, part of which had been allocated towards development schemes ($3.36 million for 1966-1968) and the remainder towards the Seychelles budget.

26. There had been a number of major economic and social developments in St. Helena since 1964, which were briefly described in the working paper. Government labourers had received a pay increase of 90 per cent with effect from July 1965. That had caused the collapse of the flax industry but had not caused unemployment, owing to the other employment opportunities available.

27. The Governor of St. Helena had transmitted to the Colonial Secretary a dispatch in which he had referred to consultations which had taken place with a representative cross-section of the community in regard to possible further constitutional advance. The Advisory Council had adopted a resolution welcoming the proposed revisions of the Constitution and asking the United Kingdom Government for approval. Under the proposals, which had been almost unanimously agreed among the inhabitants of the Territory, the Advisory Council would be replaced by a Legislative Council which would include four additional elected members, bringing the total number of these to twelve. The Council would also have six nominated non-officials and two nominated officials. The Council would enact legislation, the Governor possessing certain reserve powers for use in exceptional circumstances. He would appoint committees of the Council as appropriate and delegate powers and departmental responsibilities to them. Those committees would include special experts as necessary and a majority of members drawn from the Legislative Council. The Executive Council would consist of two officials and the chairman of the Legislative Council committees. The Public Service would remain the responsibility of the Governor. The Governor had expressed his belief that those changes would enable the people of the Territory to take a much more effective and responsible part in the regulation of their own affairs.

28. The Territory already had universal adult suffrage and elections had been held in 1963. Significant and progressive developments had thus taken place in the political and constitutional evolution of the three groups of islands, in each case with the full participation and in consultation with the peoples of the Territories themselves and their democratically elected representatives.

29. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that the United Kingdom representative's statement was intended only to confuse and to keep the United Kingdom Government from having to say what it intended to do to carry out the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Special Committee. The United Kingdom representative had spoken at length about the constitutional changes, the establishment of an electoral system and appropriate legislation, as though such matters were central to United Kingdom policy. The USSR delegation wished to state categorically that the changes in the Constitution were a matter for the people alone to decide and to ask the United Kingdom to cease manoeuvring to prolong colonial domination and to remove all obstacles to its termination, for it was time to grant the peoples the independence to which they were undeniably entitled.

30. The United Kingdom representative had tried to refute the USSR delegation's remarks by saying that no agreement had been signed between the United Kingdom and the United States regarding the financing of the base in the Chagos Archipelago, but he had been careful to say nothing about the fact that work had already started on the base. The USSR delegation had not invented those facts; the information mentioned in the Special Committee and the Subcommittee had been published in the United Kingdom and United States Press and could easily be checked. Indeed, the Press had revealed that the United States was bringing pressure to bear on their partners to remain east of Suez and carry out their obligations there. Those "obligations" were to police that part of the world. There had been reports in the United States and the United Kingdom Press that talks had taken place between the United States and the United Kingdom and an agreement had been signed giving responsibility for most of the bases east of Suez to the United States, which undertook to pay for the installation of the base in the Chagos Archipelago. It was difficult to see why the Press of the two great Western Powers should publish the information if no such agreement had been signed. If the United Kingdom persisted in its denials, it would be easy to demonstrate the truth by sending a mission of inquiry to the spot, as the Syrian representative had proposed; but the USSR delegation feared that the news was well founded and that all information about the base was correct.

31. As to the original inhabitants of Mauritius, the turtles and the dodos, the United Kingdom had not told USSR representatives anything they had not known and they had replied to its comments. As the United Kingdom delegation had brought up the subject of ornithology, however, he would remind it that other birds than dodos, birds with a larger wing-span, now swept over the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and were used by the colonialists to terrorize the subject peoples. There had been talk quite recently about those that had flown over Ascension Island. The United Kingdom representative had apparently been instructed to repeat the specious arguments that had been advanced the previous year, but there was certainly much more to be said about those modern birds, a species which was neither extinct nor becoming extinct; the 1965 and 1966 summary records were very instructive on the subject.

32. The representative of Mali said that although the electoral system described by the United Kingdom representative, which the administering Power wished to introduce into Mauritius, was very complex—he himself had difficulty in understanding it properly—he welcomed the fact that the report of the Banwell Commission had been approved by all the political parties and that the elections would enable the Territory to attain independence beginning in the summer of 1967.

33. The representative of Syria agreed with the representatives of the USSR and Mali that the fundamental question was how the United Kingdom intended to apply General Assembly resolution 2069 (XX).

34. The possibility of the United Kingdom and the United States installing military bases caused concern in Africa and the Middle East, particularly as bases of that kind had recently been the starting point for acts of aggression that had been condemned by the United Nations. The representative of the administering Power had stated that there was no agreement between the two countries at present, but negotiations were apparently under way; he would like to know whether the indigenous population was represented in the negotiations, and if so by whom.

35. Constitutional development must be freely decided on by the inhabitants. The representative of the administering Power had said that when representatives had been elected by the electoral system it had proposed, they would decide the question of independence. He would like to know when the Legislative Assembly which was to be elected would meet and take such a decision. He also wondered how the problem of the different ethnic groups was to be overcome by the proposed electoral system.

36. As he had pointed out earlier, Mauritius was subject to economic difficulties because of its bad climate; and the local housing was not sufficient protection from the elements.

37. The representative of Tunisia wondered what might be the advantages of such a complicated, not to say peculiar, electoral system as the one proposed for Mauritius and described by the United Kingdom representative. Would national unity really be possible under such a system? Would not elections on the basis of universal suffrage be preferable?

38. The representative of the United Kingdom said that it had been decided not to set aside special seats for particular minorities or communities, but that the new electoral system had been framed so as to ensure their fair representation. The new system was less complicated than might appear and above all it commanded general agreement among all the Mauritius political parties. Replying to the Syrian representative's question, he said that he had already stated in his report that the Legislative Assembly would meet immediately after the elections, or about February 1967; Mauritius would then be able to ask for independence if it so wished.

39. The representative of Syria asked whether the eight "best loser" seats would be filled by representatives of the island's Chinese and Muslim population.

40. The representative of Tunisia recalled that the question of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena had already been considered by the Special Committee and had also been the subject of General Assembly resolutions 2066 (XX) and 2069 (XX). Those resolutions reaffirmed the inalienable right of the people of those Territories to freedom and independence and invited the administering Power to take effective measures with a view to the immediate and full implementation of resolution 1514 (XV).

41. Recalling that the United Kingdom representative had outlined the future of the islands at the previous meeting, he expressed the hope that the proposed electoral system would not have the effect of accentuating racial differences in the Territories but might, on the contrary, promote the interests of the various sectors of the population. Nevertheless, a serious economic and social problem remained. The main features of the economy of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena, which was rudimentary and colonial in nature, were a heavy loss of revenue, the impossibility of increasing employment and the impossibility of bringing payments into balance, because exports were less than imports. The situation was so unsatisfactory that 3,250 workers had gone on strike in the Seychelles on 13 June 1966, and the administering Power had had to use troops to break the strike.

42. In addition, while resolution 2066 (XX) invited the administering Power to take no action which would dismember the Territory of Mauritius and violate its territorial integrity, it was clear that such dismemberment had already taken place. On 10 November 1965, the Secretary of State for the Colonies had stated that new arrangements had been made, with the agreement of the Governments of Mauritius and Seychelles, for the administration of the Chagos Archipelago and of Aldabra, Farquhar and Desroches. Those Territories, which had formerly been administered by the Governments of Mauritius and Seychelles respectively, were now called the British Indian Ocean Territory, and the United Kingdom and United States Governments would be able to construct defence facilities there. The administering Power had therefore dismembered Mauritius and Seychelles in order to set up a military base on the islands. The establishment of such bases in countries which were still colonized was reprehensible in every respect, and he recalled that his own country had experienced the same problem with the base of Bizerta. The Sub-Committee should therefore recommend to the Special Committee that it should invite the administering Power to take steps to implement resolution 1514 (XV), to lead the populations of the islands to independence, to abandon the plan to dismember Mauritius and Seychelles and to install military bases there, and to permit and encourage the sending of United Nations visiting missions to the Territories.

43. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that the United Kingdom representative's statement at the previous meeting seemed to mean that, because they had been uninhabited when the French and the English had arrived, Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena belonged to nobody. Without going into detail on that matter, he believed that the inhabitants of the islands, whatever their origin, were none the less subjected to colonial domination. It was precisely that domination, depriving them as it did of the right to choose their own form of government, which the Government of the United Republic of Tanzania condemned. There had been nothing new in the statement of the United Kingdom representative: he had merely avoided the main issue, the obligation to allow the populations of those Territories to exercise their right of self-determination. There could be no possible doubt on that matter: that obligation was one of those laid upon the administering Power both by resolution 2066 (XX) on Mauritius and by resolution 2069 (XX) on, inter alia, the Seychelles and St. Helena. So far as the latter Territories were concerned, resolution 2069 (XX) also requested the administering Power to allow United Nations visiting missions to visit the Territories, and to extend to them full co-operation and assistance. Those were perfectly natural requests and there should be no difficulty in implementing those resolutions if the administering Power were to honour its obligations and respect the decisions which the General Assembly had taken in accordance with the Charter. But what had happened since the adoption of those resolutions? The Chagos Archipelago had become part of the new British Indian Ocean Territory. That decision had been taken scarcely a month before the adoption of General Assembly resolution 2066 (XX), which invited the administering Power to take no action which would dismember the Territory of Mauritius and violate its territorial integrity. The present situation therefore made it highly unlikely that Mauritius would accede to independence in 1966, as had been envisaged. Instead of implementing the General Assembly resolutions, the United Kingdom Government had endeavoured to delay the important steps which it should have taken by forming an electoral commission, which had produced what might be called a scientific constitution. The strong opposition to that strange constitution was therefore quite natural, and indeed it was most unlikely that the United Kingdom Government had ever expected the Mauritians to accept it. In that connexion, the agreement which had been reached between the Under-Secretary of State for Colonies and opposition representatives in Mauritius was of no significance because there was no evidence that the discussions had been held freely. The United Kingdom Government should remember, however, that every time it had endeavoured to draw up the constitution of one of its former colonies without taking due regard of the interests of the population, those constitutions had always come to nought and had been replaced by genuinely democratic instruments.

44. The manner in which the British Indian Ocean Territory had been set up and the haste with which it had been done could not but engender suspicion. His delegation had reason to believe that the Territory was to become a military base. Apart from the threat posed by such bases to neighbouring countries in the event of war, the example of Ascension Island, which had been used by mercenaries as a base for attacking the Congolese freedom fighters, could not be forgotten. The Special Committee should therefore aim at guaranteeing the territorial integrity of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena, and ensuring that they would not be used for military purposes.

45. The economic situation of those Territories was scarcely satisfactory at the moment. There had been a considerable decline in both agriculture and industry, which in 1964 had represented 24 and 15 per cent, respectively, of the gross national product of Mauritius, while unemployment was increasing rapidly. Monoculture should therefore be abandoned on Mauritius, as well as on Seychelles and St. Helena, if special disturbances were to be avoided. While it was doing nothing to stop the Southern Rhodesian Government from depriving 4 million Africans of the right to rule their own country, the United Kingdom Government had seen fit to send two warships to the Seychelles to compel strikers to resume work.

46. In conclusion, he hoped that reason would prevail and that the administering Power would eventually leave the peoples of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena to rule their country as they wished.

47. The representative of Yugoslavia recalled General Assembly resolution 2066 (XX) on the question of Mauritius, in which the Assembly had, in particular, invited the administering Power to take no action which would violate the integrity of the Territory; the Assembly had likewise adopted resolution 2069 (XX) concerning a number of small Territories, including Seychelles and St. Helena. It seemed that, in spite of the provisions of those resolutions, the administering Power had not only failed to take effective measures for ensuring the independence of those Territories, in accordance with the provisions of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, but it had even undertaken some measures contrary to those provided for in the Declaration.

48. His delegation considered that the development of those Territories was still very slow, because of the interests which the administering Power hoped to preserve there as long as possible. As early as 1964, the Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held in Cairo, had condemned the intentions expressed by imperialist Powers of establishing military bases in the Indian Ocean, holding that such bases would constitute a threat to the new Afro-Asian countries and impede the process of decolonization. The course of events had shown that the Conference had been right, for in November 1965 the United Kingdom had decided to establish the new British Indian Ocean Territory as the site of defence bases for the United Kingdom and the United States of America. In spite of the resignation of three Ministers of the Mauritius Social Democratic Party and the protests raised in Mauritius following that decision, the administering Power had not changed its position on the establishment of those bases, as was evident from the statement of the United Kingdom Defence Secretary contained in the Secretariat working paper (see para. 48 of chap. XIV).

49. As it had already stated, his delegation held that the United Kingdom was not entitled to dismember the Territory of Mauritius for the purpose of military installations. It considered that the Sub-Committee was duty bound to recommend to the Special Committee that the peoples of the Territories in question should accede without delay to independence, in accordance with their freely expressed wishes and with the provisions of the Declaration contained in resolution 1514 (XV). It further thought that the problem of the establishment of military bases through the dismemberment of Mauritius should be given particular attention, in accordance with the provisions of resolution 2066 (XX).

50. The representative of Denmark expressed his satisfaction that the Territory of Mauritius was to accede to independence the following year, in accordance with the agreement established at the Constitutional Conference in London in September 1965. Following negotiations between the administering Power and the island's three main political parties, the electoral provisions made in the original draft Constitution, which had aroused some criticism by the parties, had been modified and subsequently approved by all concerned. In that connexion, the electoral system drawn up for Mauritius might seem at first to be unduly elaborate, but a similar and equally elaborate system had been functioning in Denmark for a long time, to everyone's satisfaction. Experience had shown that the system fulfilled its purpose perfectly, which was to assure fair and equal representation of all voters. The elections which were to take place on Mauritius would ensure the establishment of an autonomous Government and subsequently, after an interval of six months, accession to independence. The economic and social situation in the Territory seemed satisfactory, thanks to the determined efforts made by the authorities and the people to overcome the severe difficulties due to the losses caused a few years ago by two cyclones. Moreover, the authorities had been trying for some years to diversify the island's economy, which, at present, depended largely on its sugar production. The Danish Government thought, therefore, that the Territory of Mauritius could advance confidently towards independence, and it was looking forward to maintaining the best of relations with the new State.

51. With regard to Seychelles and St. Helena, his delegation considered, as it had often stated, that it was for the people of those Territories, and for them alone, to determine their constitutional future. The size, population and economy of those Territories might justify the adoption of special constitutional arrangements, which should not be ruled out, provided they met with the support of the population.

52. His delegation thought that in its report to the Special Committee, the Sub-Committee should express its satisfaction with the considerable progress made by the Territory of Mauritius on the path towards independence and should express the hope that the forthcoming elections would be another proof of the population's desire to accede to independence. With regard to Seychelles and St. Helena, the Sub-Committee's recommendations should take account of the special circumstances prevailing in those Territories and should, therefore, not contain any proposals which might be incompatible with those circumstances and perhaps with the wishes of the population concerned.

B. Conclusions

53. The study of the situation in Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena shows that the administering Power has so far not only failed to implement the provisions of resolution 1514 (XV) in these Territories, but has also violated the territorial integrity of two of them by creating a new territory, the British Indian Ocean Territory, composed of islands detached from Mauritius and Seychelles, in direct contravention to resolution 2066 (XX) of the General Assembly.

54. The Sub-Committee notes with regret the slow pace of political development in the Territories, particularly in Seychelles and St. Helena. This has delayed the transfer of powers to democratically elected representatives of the people and the attainment of independence. Key positions of responsibility in the administration of the Territories seem to be still in the hands of United Kingdom personnel.

55. The Sub-Committee notes with deep concern the reports pointing to the activation of a plan purporting among other things to establish military bases in Mauritius and Seychelles as well as an air base on Ascension Island, a plan which is causing anxiety in the Territories concerned and among people in Africa and Asia and which runs contrary to the provisions of resolution 2105 (XX) of the General Assembly.

56. The electoral arrangements devised for Mauritius apart from being complex in themselves seem to have been the subject of great controversy between the various groups and political parties. Regarding the Seychelles, the Sub-Committee regrets that people are still deprived of the right of universal suffrage.

57. The economy of the Territories, particularly Mauritius, is characterized by diminishing revenue, increasing unemployment and consequently a declining standard of living. Foreign companies continue to exploit the Territories without regard to the true interests of the inhabitants.

C. Recommendations

58. The Sub-Committee recommends that the Special Committee reaffirm the inalienable right of the peoples of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena to self-determination and independence in accordance with the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. The administering Power should therefore be urged again to allow the populations of the three Territories to exercise without delay their right of self-determination.

59. Any constitutional changes should be left to the people of the Territories themselves, who alone have the right to decide on the form of government they wish to adopt.

60. Free elections on the basis of universal adult suffrage should be conducted in the Territories as soon as possible. The elections should lead to the establishment of representative organs which would choose responsible governments to which all powers could be transferred.

61. The administering Power should be called upon to respect the territorial integrity of Mauritius and Seychelles and to insure that they would not be used for military purposes.

62. In fulfilment of the provisions of paragraph 12 of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX), the administering Power should be called upon to refrain from establishing military bases in the Territories.

63. The Special Committee should recommend to the General Assembly to state categorically that any bilateral agreements concluded between the administering Power and other Powers affecting the sovereignty and fundamental rights of the Territories should not be recognized as valid.

64. The administering Power should be called upon to preserve the right of the indigenous inhabitants to dispose of all the wealth and natural resources of their countries. It should be urged to undertake effective measures in order to diversify the economy of the Territories.

D. Adoption of the report

65. This report was adopted by the Sub-Committee at its 32nd meeting on 19 September 1966. The representative of Denmark stated that certain parts of the conclusions and the recommendations of the report did not conform with his delegation's opinion as expressed in the Sub-Committee's meeting on 12 September 1966 (see paras. 50-52 above). His delegation therefore could not support all the conclusions and recommendations of the report.

CHAPTER XV*

GILBERT AND ELLICE ISLANDS, PITCAIRN AND THE SOLOMON ISLANDS

A. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE IN 1964 AND BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS TWENTIETH SESSION

1. After considering the Gilbert and Ellice Islands, Pitcairn and the Solomon Islands in November 1964, the Special Committee recommended, inter alia, that the administering Power should take urgent measures for the speedy implementation of the Declaration contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). It considered that the people of the Territories should be enabled to express their wishes in accordance with that resolution through well-established democratic processes based on the principle of universal adult suffrage. It felt that the administering Power should undertake steps to accelerate the social and economic advancement of the Territories. It also felt that a visiting mission would be useful in assessing the political climate and aspirations of the peoples, and that steps might be taken to arrange such a visit in consultation with the administering Power (A/5800/Rev.1,¹ chap. XX, paras. 92-96).

2. At its twentieth session, the General Assembly, after considering the parts of the reports of the Special Committee concerning these Territories (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. XX; and A/6000/Rev.1,² chap. XIX), adopted resolution 2069 (XX) of 16 December 1965, endorsing the conclusions and recommendations contained therein and calling upon the administering Power to implement without delay the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly. It requested the administering Power to allow visiting missions to visit the Territories and to extend to them full co-operation and assistance. Finally, it requested the Special Committee to examine the situation in the Territories and to report on the implementation of the resolution to the Assembly at its twenty-first session.

B. INFORMATION ON THE TERRITORIES

Introduction

3. Information on the Gilbert and Ellice Islands, Pitcairn and the Solomon Islands is already contained in the reports of the Special Committee to the General Assembly at its nineteenth and twentieth sessions (ibid.). Supplementary information on recent developments is set out below.³

* Previously issued under the symbol A/6300/Add.9.

³ The information presented here has been derived from published reports and from information transmitted to the Secretary-General by the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland under Article 73 e of the Charter on 7 and 14 June and 2 September 1965, for the year ended 31 December 1964.

1. Gilbert and Ellice Islands

General

4. The census taken 30 April 1963 showed a total population of 49,879. By the end of 1964 it was estimated that the population had risen to over 50,000.

Political and constitutional developments

5. The Territory has no Legislative Council. It has an Advisory Council, presided over by the Resident Commissioner, with eleven non-official and five official members appointed by him. He is required to inform or consult the Council about such matters as the High Commissioner of the Western Pacific may direct to be set before it. It may ask for information or give advice on any matter affecting the Territory, but the Resident Commissioner is not required to give such information or accept this advice.

6. In October 1965, the first political party in the Territory, the Gilbertese National Party (GNP) was formed. Its aim, inter alia, is reported to be "to speed up the present rate of constitutional development, aiming at a more representative and democratic form of government". Membership ordinarily is reported to be limited to Gilbertese. However, exceptions to this rule may be made in favour of part or non-Gilbertese who have spent much of their lives in the Gilbert Islands. About 85 per cent of the inhabitants of the Territory are Gilbertese and the remaining 15 per cent are Ellice Islanders. A second political party, the Christian Democratic Party (CDP), was formed at Tarawa in November 1965. No account is taken of religion or race for membership in the party which includes Gilbertese, Ellice Islanders and part-Gilbertese. Its aims are reported to be to ensure more involvement in territorial affairs; to further the welfare of and promote harmony between the people of the Territory; to improve copra production; to improve education; and to examine land tenure to ensure individual rights and increase production.

Economic conditions

7. There was no substantial change in 1964 in the general economic situation of the Territory. Its economy is based on the extraction of phosphate on Ocean Island and the production of copra on the other islands.

8. Exports and imports in 1964 were valued at £A1,201,296 and £A1,623,863 respectively, compared with £A1,276,122 and £A1,416,092 the previous year. Ninety-nine per cent of the value of all exports consists of phosphate and copra. The chief imports are food-stuffs and manufactured goods.

9. During 1964, ordinary revenue amounted to £A814,338, an increase of £A58,689 over the previous year. The chief source of revenue is a tax on phosphate, which the British Phosphate Commissioners pay on all phosphate exported from Ocean Island, and customs duties. Expenditure, excluding grants, amounted to £A867,520, an increase of £A60,798 over the previous year. An additional £A95,960 were expended on Colonial Development and Welfare schemes.

Social conditions

10. In 1964, there were no substantial changes in labour, the conditions of employment, and the number of persons employed. Expenditures on public health totalled £A82,740 and amounted to about 10 per cent of all expenditure.

Educational conditions

11. In 1964, there was no substantial change in educational conditions. There were 11,659 primary school pupils, most of whom were attending mission schools. Four secondary schools had 326 pupils, and three teacher-training colleges had eighty-six trainees. Sixteen students were studying under scholarships at secondary schools in Australia and New Zealand, and one was attending a university. Thirty-eight others were abroad taking professional and technical training courses. Expenditure on education, including grants from Colonial Development and Welfare schemes, amounted to approximately 10 per cent of the total budget of the Territory.

2. Pitcairn

General

12. The population of Pitcairn was seventy-nine persons in 1964. The Governor of Fiji is ex officio Governor of Pitcairn and legislates for it. Island affairs are administered by an Island Council, consisting of three local inhabitants elected on the basis of universal adult suffrage. No information on political developments in 1964 is available.

Economic conditions

13. No information is available on the value of exports or imports. Exports consist of fruits and handicrafts which are sold mainly to passing ships. Imports consist mainly of food, fuel and clothing. Revenue in 1964-1965 totalled £41,934 of which £32,000 was realized from stamp sales to collectors and £7,684 was a grant from Colonial Development and Welfare funds. Expenditure during the same period amounted to £34,904.

3. Solomon Islands

General

14. The population of the Territory at the end of 1964 was estimated at 136,750, consisting of 128,200 Melanesians, 6,900 Polynesians and Micronesians, and 1,660 others. In recent years, immigrants from the overpopulated Gilbert and Ellice Islands have been settled in under-populated areas of the Territory.

Government

15. The Solomon Islands Legislative Council consists of eleven official and ten non-official members. Eight of the latter are elected, seven by electoral colleges composed of elected members of the local authorities, and one by direct election on the basis of universal adult suffrage. The other thirteen members are appointed by the High Commissioner.

16. Under the new Local Government Ordinance enacted in 1963, seventeen local councils had been established by the end of 1964, the membership of which is elected by universal adult suffrage. Formerly, the High Commissioner appointed the members of local councils.

Political parties

17. In June 1965, the eight elected members of the British Solomon Islands Legislative Council announced that they had formed a political party to be known as the Democratic Party of the British Solomon Islands. The main aims of the party are reported to be self-determination for the Territory within the Commonwealth; free education for all; improved industrial relations and improved machinery for the settlement of disputes; unification of all peoples of the Solomons and greater participation by women in territorial affairs.

Economic conditions

18. The economy of the territory is at present based mainly on subsistence agriculture and on the production of copra for export. However, cocoa is being developed rapidly as a second cash crop, and in 1964, field trials in rice, soya beans and oil palms were also being made, which, it was hoped, would lead to the mechanized cultivation of rice and soya beans on a large scale by 1966. Large-scale lumbering operations have also begun and timber exports are expected to reach 10 million cubic feet in the next few years, or more than ten times the amount exported in 1964. There is no large-scale mining, but small amounts of gold are extracted. A few limited industries are directed to meeting some local needs.

19. Cash crops are confined almost entirely to the coastal areas, river valleys and foothills of the larger islands. Food crops are grown generally on the basis of shifting cultivation, and principally in forested areas. There is practically no permanent arable or mixed farming, largely because of the dense afforestation of areas not planted with coconuts and cocoa.

20. The value of all exports in 1964 totalled £A1.99 million, as compared with £A1.82 million in 1963. Copra accounted for 88 per cent and timber for 8 per cent of all exports. Imports were valued at £A2.73 million, compared with £A2.31 million in 1963. The United Kingdom, Japan and Australia received 98 per cent of all exports; 70 per cent of all imports came from Australia and the United Kingdom.

21. Revenue, including grants-in-aid and transfers from special funds, totalled £A2.74 million, compared with £A2.35 million in 1963. Total expenditures amounted to £A2.61 million, compared with £A2.23 million in 1963.

22. A third development plan was drawn up for the period 1 January 1963 to 31 March 1966. Total development expenditure available for projects for this period from all sources amounted to £A3,015,800. During 1962-1964, policy papers were approved by the Legislative Council for education, medicine and public health, and agriculture and fisheries, to give direction to the various fields of development. In addition to increasing production and introducing new crops, particular attention was being given to a geological survey and to the development of forests, fisheries and co-operatives.

23. In 1965, the administering Power and the United Nations Special Fund signed an agreement for a mineral survey of the Territory designed to aid in efforts to diversify its economy. The project is to extend over three and a half years at a cost of $US1,565,100 furnished by the Fund and the Government of the Territory. Since the dense jungle cover in the Territory makes the identification of minerals by conventional methods difficult, aerial surveys and other new techniques, including photo-geological interpretation, will be used. The survey will be carried out in four phases. Airborne geophysical surveys will be made by magnetic, electromagnetic and radiometric methods. Photo-geological studies will then be made, followed by ground surveys using geological, geophysical and geochemical techniques. Finally, drillings will be made in selected areas to supplement the findings of the earlier stages of the survey.

24. Limited surveys carried out in the past indicate that mineral exploitation may have an important bearing on the Territory's over-all economic future, and the present project is intended to provide additional specific information.

Social conditions Labour

25. The total labour force of the Territory in 1964 was estimated at 9,000 of whom about two thirds were unskilled workers. The majority of all workers were engaged in agricultural work or employed by the Government. There were two registered trade unions with a total membership of 4,850 in 1964, showing an increase of 10 per cent over the previous year.

Public health

26. There has been no significant change during 1964 in the staff and organization of the Government Medical Services and those maintained by religious missions. Government medical expenditures, including subsidies to missions, totalled £A255,872 in 1964, as compared with £A214,686 the previous year, and amounted to 9 per cent of all government expenditures.

27. Malaria and tuberculosis are the two most important health problems in the Territory. At present, the concentration of resources and attention to the eradication of malaria precludes any major attack on tuberculosis. The success of the Malarial Eradication Pilot Project with the guidance and active assistance of the World Health Organization (WHO), has been the outstanding achievement in public health in the past two years. In conjunction with the latter, the Government had planned to proceed in 1965 to a pre-eradication programme, and a major allocation of funds had been approved for the purpose.

Educational conditions

28. Education is largely in the hands of religious missions. The Government maintains five primary, one secondary and one teacher-training school. It assists the churches and local councils in providing primary education. In 1964 there were 402 registered primary schools and an additional ninety schools, exempt from registration for a period of two years. The total enrolment of these schools was 20,846. The five secondary schools had 240 students and the two teacher-training schools had fifty-six students.

29. Both the Government and churches provide scholarships for secondary and higher education overseas; scholarships from other countries are sometimes available. At the end of 1964, nineteen students were receiving government scholarships for secondary education overseas and 111 students had church scholarships.

30. In 1964, recurrent and capital expenditure on education totalled £A131,861 and £A89,637, compared with £A105,270 and £A18,796 in 1963. The total recurrent expenditure by the Department of Education has been approximately 3.8 per cent of all recurrent expenditures for the years 1962-1964. Expenditures by churches and local authorities in 1964 amounted to £A210,406.

C. CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

31. At its 468th meeting on 19 September 1966, the Special Committee considered the report of Sub-Committee II on the Gilbert and Ellice Islands, Pitcairn and the Solomon Islands, which appears as an annex to this chapter.

32. The representative of the United Kingdom recorded his delegation's reservations concerning the report. He stated that his delegation had made clear its position during the meetings of Sub-Committee II, and he drew the attention of the members of the Special Committee to the summary records of those meetings. His delegation regretted that the conclusions and recommendations on those Territories did not adequately reflect the progress achieved and did not take sufficiently into account the special circumstances in the Territories.

D. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON THE REPORT OF SUB-COMMITTEE II

33. At its 486th meeting on 19 September 1966, the Special Committee adopted the conclusions and recommendations of Sub-Committee II concerning the Gilbert and Ellice Islands, Pitcairn and the Solomon Islands. These are as follows.

Conclusions

34. (a) The Special Committee feels that, though the administering Power had introduced, or is planning to introduce, some constitutional changes in these Territories, the progress towards the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, as contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), is not significant and must be speeded up.

(b) It is of the opinion that the political institutions and executive machinery are not yet fully representative of the people of these Territories. The recommendations of the Special Committee in 1964 and of General Assembly resolution 2069 (XX) have not been adequately implemented.

(c) It feels that the economic base of these Territories needs to be strengthened.

(d) It is aware of the peculiar problems of these small and isolated islands.

Recommendations

35. The Special Committee reiterates to the administering Power the recommendations it made concerning these Territories in 1964. It is of the opinion that a visit by Sub-Committee II is necessary and would be most useful in assessing the political climate, the economic requirements and other aspirations of the peoples. Steps may be taken to arrange such a visit in consultation with the administering Power.

ANNEX

Report of Sub-Committee II

GILBERT AND ELLICE ISLANDS, PITCAIRN AND THE SOLOMON ISLANDS*Consideration by the Sub-Committee*

1. The Sub-Committee considered the Gilbert and Ellice Islands, Pitcairn and the Solomon Islands at its 44th, 46th, 47th, 49th and 53rd meetings held on 12 May, 2, 8, 12 and 29 August 1966.

2. The Sub-Committee had before it the working paper prepared by the Secretariat (see paras. 1-39, chapter XV).

3. In accordance with the procedure agreed upon by the Special Committee, the Chairman invited the representative of the United Kingdom to participate in the consideration of the three Territories.

4. In his statement to the Sub-Committee, the representative of the United Kingdom noted that detailed information on the Solomon Islands, the Gilbert and Ellice Islands and Pitcairn had been transmitted to the Sub-Committee in late 1964 and that the Secretariat working papers incorporated in the Committee's report to the General Assembly in 1965 and those recently issued gave an account of the main events in the Territories in recent months.

5. So far as the Solomon Islands were concerned, the existing Legislative Council was to be dissolved in April 1967 and, as the United Kingdom delegation had informed the Special Committee on 16 March 1966, proposals for the next stage of constitutional advance were likely to be discussed during 1966. In June 1965 the Acting Chief Secretary had said that, at the next stage of constitutional progress, the Opposition Bench would undoubtedly be fully elected and that the electoral college system had been purely transitional, since direct elections could not have been introduced in all districts simultaneously. The next general election would probably be by direct elections under universal adult suffrage in all constituencies and there would ultimately be an elected majority in the Council. The first political party in the Territory—the Solomon Islands Democratic Party—had been formed in June 1965 and included all the elected members of the Legislative Council. New constitutional proposals were about to be published in the Territory and when these were known his delegation would inform the Sub-Committee of them.

6. Thus in the Solomon Islands, since 1965, eight of the ten non-official members of the Legislative Council were elected and each represented one constituency; in seven of the constituencies, they were chosen by an electoral college composed of elected representatives of the local authorities in the constituency, which were themselves elected by universal adult suffrage. In the constituency of Honiara, the capital, election was direct. Those new proposals were, however, only one stage in the evolution towards the final goal of a wholly elected legislature. In addition, all members of the local government councils had been elected by universal adult suffrage since 1963. Similar progress had been made in other Territories; under the 1965 Constitution of the Gilbert and Ellice Islands, the Executive Council of that Territory had four non-official members and the Advisory Council had eleven non-official members—a majority.

7. In the Gilbert and Ellice Islands, the next stage of constitutional advance was under consideration; the Resident Commissioner had told the Advisory Council at the end of 1964 that the Advisory Council and the Executive Council established not long before had proved their value. That had been only a beginning but some people had already felt that the rate of constitutional advance was too rapid; the Commissioner had assured the Council that the United Kingdom Government would in any case not try to move faster than the population wished, although all should appreciate the wisdom of keeping a little ahead of public opinion. The Advisory Council had endorsed proposals for reorganizing local government, which was particularly important in such a scattered Territory. There had been progress in the educational field and the United Kingdom had promised to continue to provide financial assistance for economic development. As the United Kingdom representative had told the Special Committee on 16 March, proposals to modify the existing system of representation would probably be discussed in the Territory during 1966. At the moment, five out of eight members of the Executive Council and eleven out of sixteen members of the Advisory Council were indigenous Solomon Islanders.

8. Pitcairn now had eighty-eight inhabitants. The Island Council, whose composition had been changed after the December 1964 elections, was composed of the Island Magistrate (elected for three years), three members elected annually, the Island Secretary ex officio, one member appointed by the Governor (who was also Governor of Fiji), two members chosen by the elected members and two non-voting advisory members, one chosen by the Governor and one by the rest of the Council. The Commissioner for Pitcairn had visited the Island in March 1965 and held discussions with the inhabitants. He had recommended wider participation by women in public affairs, and improvement in agriculture, the modernization of the land tenure system and the development of co-operative farming; he had also recommended the introduction of a housing scheme, a local broadcasting service, a programme of scholarships to Fiji and a revision of the wage structure. He had suggested discarding the idea of evacuating Pitcairn as a justifiable policy. The recommendations had been accepted but some might take some time to implement.

9. In a subsequent statement to the Sub-Committee he noted that the proposals concerning constitutional advances in the Solomon Islands had been published and were to be submitted to the Legislative Council of the Solomon Islands in December 1966, and that the effect of the main proposals would be to increase the number of elected members from eight to fourteen and, in so far as it was administratively possible, to have all fourteen members elected by direct election in their constituencies. In certain remote constituencies, scattered over a large area of sea, it would, however, be impracticable to arrange direct elections, at least for the time being. The White Paper also contained proposals for enlarging the Legislative Council, for defining the High Commissioner's legislative and other powers, and for the establishment of a Public Service Commission. Those proposals showed that very rapid progress was being made towards self-government in full consultation with the leaders and people of the Solomon Islands.

10. Similar proposals for constitutional advance had recently been published by the Government of the Gilbert and Ellice Islands. It was proposed to replace the existing Advisory Council by a House of Representatives consisting of seven official appointed members and twenty-three members elected by adult suffrage from all parts of the Territory. The existing Executive Council would be replaced by a Governing Council, which would exercise both executive and legislative powers; the Council would have five official members and five elected members chosen by the House of Representatives, which would advise it on major policy and proposed legislation. Both bodies would be presided over by the resident Commissioner, who would be required to consult the Council on virtually all policy and legislative matters.

11. In both Territories the new constitutional proposals had been widely publicized through the Press and broadcasting services and there was widespread interest in constitutional development and in United Nations activities, although the United Nations was primarily associated with the technical assistance activities from which the islanders benefited. The population of the Territories had no reason to fear that progress towards self-government would entail the withdrawal of United Kingdom assistance: the 1965-1968 development plan for the Solomon Islands provided for expenditure of £5 million, as compared with £1.2 million allocated under Colonial Development and Welfare provisions for 1963-1966; similarly, the 1965-1968 development plan for the Gilbert and Ellice Islands envisaged expenditure of £1.1 million, as compared with £300,000 for 1963-1966.

12. The representative of Chile said that the problems of the islands were typical of those affecting all the Pacific Territories. They were scattered over a wide area of sea, with poor communications, had small populations and few natural resources; it was therefore not surprising that their economic, social and political progress should be extremely difficult and that the feeling of national cohesion should have been slow to develop. In those circumstances, his delegation considered that the new constitutional proposals for the Solomon Islands and the establishment of the first political party in that Territory represented a considerable advance towards self-government.

13. The proposals for the establishment of a preponderantly elective House of Representatives in the Gilbert and Ellice Islands and for a more representative body to replace the Executive Council were also encouraging. Nevertheless, such progress would be valueless if the resident Commissioner retained unlimited veto powers or if important decisions were outside the competence of the House of Representatives.

14. The extreme remoteness of Pitcairn Islands, its tiny population and almost complete lack of natural resources placed upon the administering Power a special responsibility for the social progress of its inhabitants and for ensuring that they exercised their right to self-determination as soon as was practicable.

15. His delegation believed that, despite the significant progress that had been made, much still remained to be done to improve the economic and social position of the Territories and to prepare them for self-determination and independence. It was accordingly most important that the Sub-Committee should be given fuller and more detailed information on the economic and social position of the people of the Territories and on their views about their political future.

16. The representative of Poland said that, while the geographical position and economic structure of the Territories under discussion made progress very difficult, his delegation considered that during its long administration the United Kingdom had done little to prepare them for full constitutional development. Recently however, new proposals for constitutional advance in the Solomon Islands had been made and the increase in the elected membership of the Legislative Council was a sign of progress, although it fell far short of complete fulfilment of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). Without a sound economy, the Territory could not achieve true political freedom and his delegation would urge the administering Power to accelerate the development of its agricultural and mineral resources.

17. Similar action was required in the Gilbert and Ellice Islands, whose economy was based on the export of copra and phosphates. The economy of the islands would develop satisfactorily only when the people were in full control of their natural resources and received more financial assistance from the administering Power.

18. In conclusion, he wished to reaffirm his delegation's conviction that the people of the Gilbert and Ellice Islands, Pitcairn and the Solomon Islands should not be excluded from the universal privilege of self-government and independence.

19. The representative of India noted that although there had recently been several encouraging constitutional developments in the Territories, much more could have been done to help their peoples to prepare for exercising their right of self-determination. The proposed House of Representatives in the Gilbert and Ellice Islands, for instance, would not have full legislative powers and, in the absence of popularly elected bodies with full authority to speak on behalf of the people, there appeared no justification for the administering Power's impression that the islanders considered the pace of constitutional advance too rapid. The dependency of the Territory on a single economic resource—phosphates—was disquieting and the administering Power should do its utmost to develop alternative sources of revenue for the islands.

20. Although the proposals for expanded elected membership of the Legislative Council of the Solomon Islands were gratifying, the composition and powers of that body were still not entirely satisfactory. The extent and effect of the changes, in fact, fell far short of the provisions of the Declaration. It was understandable that the islanders in all three Territories should associate the United Nations primarily with the technical assistance activities in which they were involved, but the administering Power should make every effort to ensure that they were properly informed of their right to determine their own future freely. Visiting missions from the United Nations would be of immense help in that respect and it was to be hoped that the administering Power would co-operate with the United Nations in implementing the process of decolonization as expeditiously and effectively as possible.

21. The representative of Sierra Leone observed that although educational standards, economic and social conditions and constitutional development varied considerably in the very small islands under discussion, they shared an overriding desire for self-determination and independence. The task of the Special Committee was to ensure that they would be free to choose the form of independence they desired.

22. Since the economic well-being of the Gilbert and Ellice Islands depended almost exclusively on revenue from phosphates, the administering Power should consider how the economy could be diversified. It should also try to improve labour conditions, expand social and health services and adapt the educational system to the requirements of rapid development. Finally, the powers of the Advisory Council appointed by the resident Commissioner should be strengthened and new impetus should be given to the constitutional development of the Territory. Similar measures to diversify the economy, improve economic, social and educational conditions and accelerate constitutional development should be taken in the Solomon Islands.

23. The United Kingdom, with its long experience of colonial rule and its general willingness to co-operate with the Special Committee, should have done much more for the material welfare and political growth of the islands. He hoped that it would intensify its efforts to make the inhabitants aware of their right to self-government and independence and of the alternatives open to them in seeking those goals. As recommended in numerous General Assembly resolutions, and most recently in resolution 2069 (XX), the inhabitants of the islands should be enabled to choose the political future they desired without coercion.

Conclusions of the Sub-Committee

24. (a) The Sub-Committee feels that, though the administering Power and introduced, or is planning to introduce, some constitutional changes in these Territories, the progress towards the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, as contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), is not significant and must be speeded up.

(b) The Sub-Committee is of the opinion that the political institutions and executive machinery are not yet fully representative of the people of these Territories. The recommendations of the Special Committee in 1964 and of General Assembly resolution 2069 (XX) have not been adequately implemented.

(c) The Sub-Committee feels that the economic base of these Territories needs to be strengthened.

(d) The Sub-Committee is aware of the peculiar problems of these small and isolated islands.

Recommendations of the Sub-Committee

25. The Sub-Committee recommends to the Special Committee that it reiterate to the administering Power the recommendations it made concerning these Territories in 1964. The Sub-Committee is of the opinion that a visit by the Sub-Committee is necessary and would be most useful in assessing the political climate, the economic requirements and other aspirations of the peoples. Steps may be taken to arrange such a visit in consultation with the administering Power.

CHAPTER XVI*

NIUE AND TOKELAU ISLANDS

A. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE IN 1964 AND BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS TWENTIETH SESSION

1. In 1964 the Special Committee considered Niue and the Tokelau Islands together with the Cook Islands. The Committee was of the view that the questions of size, isolation and limited resources should not in any way delay application to these Territories of the Declaration contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). It recommended, inter alia, that their people should be enabled to express their wishes in accordance with the provisions of the resolution through well-established democratic processes under United Nations supervision; that the administering Power should have regard to the nature of the assistance the United Nations could render and make this known to the people; that the administering Power should further enlarge the training of administrative personnel from among the indigenous people; and that further and immediate measures be taken to develop and strengthen the economic structure of the Territories (A/5800/Rev.1,¹ chap. XV, paras. 111-115).

2. At its twentieth session, the General Assembly, after considering the chapters of the reports of the Special Committee concerning the Territory of Niue and Tokelau Islands (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. XV; and A/6000/Rev.1,² chap. XIV), adopted resolution 2069 (XX) on 16 December 1965, endorsing the conclusions and recommendations contained therein and calling upon the administering Power to implement without delay the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly. It requested the administering Power to allow visiting missions to visit the Territories and to extend to them full co-operation and assistance. Finally, it requested the Special Committee to examine the situation in the Territories and to report on the implementation of the resolution to the Assembly at its twenty-first session.

B. INFORMATION ON THE TERRITORIES

3. Information on Niue and the Tokelau Islands is already contained in the Special Committee's report to the General Assembly at its nineteenth and twentieth sessions (ibid.). Supplementary information is set out below.³

1. Niue

General

4. At 31 March 1965, the population of Niue was estimated at 5,124. Each year from 300 to 400 Niueans leave Niue. In 1964, the deficit between those leaving and returning was 150.

² Ibid., Twentieth Session, Annexes, addendum to agenda item 23.

³ The information on the Niue and Tokelau Islands has been derived from published reports and from information transmitted to the Secretary-General by New Zealand under Article 73 e of the Charter, on 14 October 1965, for the year ending 31 March 1965.

Political and constitutional developments

General

5. The Niue Island Legislative Assembly consists of fourteen elected members and the Resident Commissioner. Ordinances require the assent of the latter and must not be contradictory to any statute or regulation in force in Niue. An Executive Committee, consisting of three members elected by the Legislative Assembly with the Resident Commissioner as Chairman, was set up in 1962. It may report and make recommendations on any matter referred to it by the Resident Commissioner or the Legislative Assembly.

6. In January 1965, the Secretary of Island Territories, accompanied by a constitutional adviser, visited Niue to consult the Niue Island Assembly and the people on the question of constitutional development, and to ascertain their wishes concerning future constitutional changes and the programming of such changes. The Niueans during the discussion expressed the wish to progress gradually towards some system of internal self-government, while at the same time retaining the closest possible links with New Zealand. The complete proceedings of the meetings were recorded and broadcast in the evenings over Radio Niue and are reported to have been well received in all the villages on the island.

7. In January 1966, the Minister of Island Territories visited Niue to hold discussions concerning future developments. No information is available concerning the discussions.

Village councils

8. Village government has been largely in the hands of the local Assembly member, the pastor and the constable in each village. The Assembly has agreed in principle to the formation of village councils to be responsible for village affairs. A senior officer of the Niue Government was to undertake a study tour of the Territory of Papua and New Guinea in 1965 under the sponsorship of the South Pacific Commission to study village and district government in that Territory.

Economic conditions

9. Niue's economy is based on subsistence fishing and agriculture, as well as the production of a few cash crops, chiefly copra and bananas, and handicraft articles for export. The rocky nature of much of the island makes it unsuitable for agriculture or animal husbandry. Exports in 1964 amounted to £77,935, compared with £51,185 in 1963. Imports amounted to £228,210, compared with £163,443 the previous year. Approximately 74 per cent of all imports came from New Zealand which received 89 per cent of the island's exports. In 1964-1965, revenue and expenditures were £235,043 and £523,981 respectively, compared with £194,175 and £382,436 the previous year. Niue's revenue from exports and taxes is insufficient to balance its budget, and New Zealand makes annual grants for general and capital purposes and for meeting budgetary deficits. In 1964-1965 the subsidy amounted to £301,300, compared with £285,000 the previous year.

Social conditionsLabour

10. The basic wage rates in March 1965 were 1s.11d per hour for unskilled labour, 2s.1d for stevedores and a varying scale for skilled labour. No labour unions have been registered but a committee exists to determine special allowances for stevedoring, and workers have a voice on this committee.

Public health

11. Medical services are provided by the Government Health Department under the control of a chief medical officer. There are no private medical or dental practitioners. In March 1965, the staff of thirty-nine persons consisted of Niueans with the exception of the chief medical officer and four nurses recruited from New Zealand. Expenditures on health services for the year ending March 1965 were £53,111. All medical and dental treatment is free of charge.

Educational conditions

12. Education is free and compulsory between the ages of six and fourteen years and most children remain at school until they reach sixteen. Post-primary education is available to all, and most students who leave primary school attend high school. At 31 March 1965, twenty-eight students were attending New Zealand secondary schools under the New Zealand Government Training Scheme and six were taking a three-year course at the agricultural college in Western Samoa. Educational expenditures totalled £100,060, compared with £70,090 in 1963-1964.

2. Tokelau IslandsGeneral

13. The population of the three Tokelau Islands totalled 1,835 at 25 September 1964.

Political development

14. At a meeting of Tokelauan leaders in December 1964, they are reported to have decided that they wanted to remain under New Zealand administration. They rejected proposals that they should merge with independent Western Samoa or with the Cook Islands. These decisions are reported to have been made after Tokelauan leaders had visited both Apia and Paratonga to study their administrative organizations. In January 1965, the Minister of Island Territories visited the Territory for discussions concerning its constitutional development. No information is available concerning these discussions. In January 1966 the Minister of Island Territories again visited the Territory for discussions on constitutional development. These are reported to have included a proposal by the Minister for the resettlement of part of the population in New Zealand over the next five years.

Economic conditions

15. The economy of the Tokelau Islands is based on subsistence crops, fishing and the production of copra for export. Revenue is derived chiefly from export and import duties, trading profits and the sale of postage stamps. The annual deficit between local revenue and expenditure is met by subsidies from the New Zealand Government. Expenditures in 1964 totalled £29,931. Information is not available on local revenue.

Social conditions

16. The Government of Western Samoa assists with the medical services of the Territory and regular visits are made by its medical staff. Two Samoan medical officers are stationed on Tokelau. At present, a Tokelauan is training at the Suva Medical School in Fiji.

Educational conditions

17. School attendance in the Territory is reported to be very close to 100 per cent. The Tokelau Administration awards scholarships to enable children and public servants to receive secondary education in Western Samoa. The New Zealand Government assists students and public servants under the New Zealand Government Training Scheme. At 31 March 1965, there were thirteen long-term trainees from the Territory in New Zealand. Twenty-nine additional Tokelauans were being trained in Western Samoa and Fiji.

C. CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

18. At its 468th meeting on 19 September 1966, the Special Committee considered the report of Sub-Committee II on Niue and the Tokelau Islands, which appears as an annex to this chapter.

D. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON THE REPORT OF SUB-COMMITTEE II

19. The representative of the United Kingdom reserved his Government's position on the Sub-Committee's report.

20. At its 468th meeting on 19 September 1966, the Special Committee adopted the conclusions and recommendations contained in the report of Sub-Committee II. These are set out below.

Conclusions

21. (a) The Special Committee reiterates its conclusions adopted in 1964.

(b) The Special Committee welcomes the statement of the administering Power that the Declaration contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) continues to express the objectives of its policy towards these islands.

(c) The Special Committee notes with satisfaction the willingness of the administering Power to receive a visiting mission to these Territories were such a visit to form part of a wider tour of the area.

(d) The Special Committee is of the opinion that the peculiar problems of size, isolation and limited resources, though important in themselves, should not delay the implementation of resolution 1514 (XV) in these Territories.

Recommendations

22. (a) The Special Committee reiterates its recommendations adopted in 1964.

(b) The Special Committee reaffirms the inalienable right of the people of the Territories to self-determination and independence in conformity with the Declaration contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

(c) The people of these islands should be enabled to express their wishes with regard to provisions of resolution 1514 (XV) through well-established democratic processes.

(d) Further and immediate measures should be taken to develop and strengthen the economic structure of these Territories in co-operation with the United Nations and the specialized agencies.

(e) A visit to the Territories by Sub-Committee II is necessary and would be useful in gathering all information, and also in familiarizing the people with the assistance which can be rendered by the United Nations in regard to the free expression of their wishes pursuant to the Declaration contained in resolution 1514 (XV). In this respect, steps may be taken to arrange a visit in consultation with the administering Power.

Report of Sub-Committee II

NIUE AND THE TOKELAU ISLANDS

Consideration by the Sub-Committee

1. The Sub-Committee considered Niue and the Tokelau Islands at its 47th, 49th and 54th meetings held on 8, 12 August and 2 September 1966.

2. The Sub-Committee had before it the working paper prepared by the Secretariat (see paras. 1-17 of chapter XVI).

3. In accordance with the procedure agreed upon by the Special Committee, the Chairman invited the representative of New Zealand to participate in the consideration of the two Territories.

4. In his statement to the Sub-Committee, the representative of New Zealand said that the right of the people of Niue and the Tokelau Islands freely to decide their future was not denied, that the possibilities open to them were kept constantly before them, that the text of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) had been widely distributed in their languages, and that for several years the New Zealand Government had made it clear to them that the colonial relationship with New Zealand must terminate. Yet they appeared at present to wish to remain linked in some direct way with New Zealand indefinitely.

5. Niue was the largest of the four islands with an area of about 100 square miles and a population of about 5,000, situated midway between Tonga and the Cook Islands.

6. In 1962, it had been suggested to the Niueans that there were four possibilities open to them for the future: complete independence, integration with an independent State, membership of a (hypothetical) Polynesian federation, or self-government and free association with some other State. The Niue Island Assembly had unanimously rejected the first three possibilities, requested that the people of Niue should be able to retain their New Zealand citizenship, and proposed that any future constitutional change should be directed towards some form of self-government but that the close links with New Zealand should be retained. That decision was not an act of self-determination but merely a preliminary indication of the Niueans' views.

7. A paper had been drawn up by the New Zealand authorities suggesting a time-table for progress towards self-government and drawing attention to operative paragraph 5 of resolution 1514 (XV). The speed of the proposed changes, amounting virtually to full cabinet government by 1966, had raised considerable apprehensions in the Niue Assembly, which had asked for a team of constitutional experts to visit the island and draw up a new series of recommendations based on the views of the islanders. It might be pointed out that, in the case of Niue, it was the New Zealand Government which was pressing for political progress. There had been little pressure from the Niueans themselves.

8. Dr. C. C. Aikman, a professor of constitutional history, and Mr. J. M. McEwen, Secretary of Island Territories and an eminent authority on Polynesia, had visited the island, talked with members of the Assembly and of the public, and four that opinion was divided on the speed with which self-government should be achieved. The reasons for the cautious attitude of the Niueans were apparently a basic lack of confidence in their capacity to run their own affairs and a fear that the New Zealand subsidy, which in recent years had represented 50 to 70 per cent of total government expenditure on the island, might be withdrawn or reduced as a result of political advance. The constitutional advisers had told them that they could not know whether or not they were capable of running their own affairs until they had tried to do so and that, whatever decision they took concerning their future, it would not affect the financial assistance given by New Zealand. Their fears on that score, however, had not been stilled.

9. The constitutional advisers had therefore recommended in their report that a complete programme for the attainment of self-government should not be drawn up, but that the next steps in the process should be outlined. In particular, early steps should be taken to create a member system under which elected representatives on the Executive Committee would be responsible before the Assembly for a particular government department or departments. One of the elected members of the Executive Committee was to be appointed Leader of Government Business and would speak in the Assembly for the Executive Committee as a whole. It was envisaged that as a result of those developments the role of the Resident Commissioner in day-to-day administration would progressively diminish.

10. In January 1966, the Niue Island Assembly had supported the recommendations in the report but had decided that further consideration of it should be postponed until after the general elections of 10 April 1966 in which it was one of the issues before the electorate. The elections had resulted in four changes in the membership of the Assembly, which had been decided to proceed with the adoption of the member system. A new Executive Committee had been elected and Mr. R. Rex had been elected Leader of Government Business.

11. Niue had therefore advanced a considerable way towards full self-government, having an elective Assembly, which since 1962 had controlled both the revenue raised locally and the entire New Zealand subsidy, and an Executive Committee which would soon represent more closely the embryonic Cabinet it was intended to be.

12. The insecurity which the Niueans obviously felt about the future was probably based in considerable measure on "the special circumstances of geographical isolation and economic conditions" mentioned in the final preambular paragraph of General Assembly resolution 2069 (XX). As a result of their geographic and consequent cultural isolation, the Niueans appeared to feel a close sentimental link with the main body of Polynesians in New Zealand, a link which had been strengthened by sixty years of contact with New Zealand administrators, teachers and pastors, and by migration to New Zealand.

13. The Niueans realized that the possibilities for further development of the island were limited. Raising the level of agricultural production—the only significant way of earning foreign exchange and of expanding much further the proportion of the budget raised locally—was slow and skilled work. The Niueans' desire not to jeopardize direct access to the New Zealand Treasury, which provided over half their present level of government expenditure, as well as the means for capital investment and development, was therefore understandable. But New Zealand did not regard economic conditions as necessarily restricting the Niueans' progress toward self-determination. They were free to decide on further steps as they wished.

14. The three barely habitable atolls of the Tokelau group, 300 miles north of Samoa, presented a basically different set of circumstances. Their total area was four square miles and none of the islets making up the atolls was more than a couple of hundred yards wide. They were subject to occasional hurricanes and the coral-based soil was thin and infertile; rainfall was heavy but inconsistent. Many Tokelauans had left the islands—over 300 had migrated to New Zealand—and the remaining 1,800 led lives cramped by the environment.

15. In the last few years the New Zealand Government had endeavoured to place the possibilities for the political future before the Tokelauans fairly, making it clear that the decision lay with the islanders themselves. The Tokelauans' first reaction, in 1963, had been to retain the existing relationship with New Zealand, which showed, incidentally, that an immediate exercise in such a Territory of self-determination as envisaged in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) could produce a different result from that expected, the decision being made prematurely. The New Zealand Government had not been prepared to see the colonial relationship perpetuated and had suggested that the more logical choice for the Tokelauans was for them to avail themselves of the resources and trained manpower of a neighbouring Polynesian community by joining with the independent State of Western Samoa or the self-governing Cook Islands. New Zealand had offered to bear the costs of administering the group for many years by handing over the annual grants to whatever community it joined, and had arranged for representatives of the Tokelauan people to visit Western Samoa and the Cook Islands. Association with the Cook Islands would mean retention of New Zealand citizenship and the right to unrestricted entry and resettlement in New Zealand, while association with Western Samoa would be logical in terms of the existing cultural and religious ties between the two territories. Faced with such a decision, the Tokelauans had, at a general fono, held in December 1964, chosen neither course, desiring, naturally enough, to try to get the best of all possible worlds by remaining linked with New Zealand. In January 1966, the New Zealand Minister for Island Territories had visited the Tokelauans and obtained confirmation of this desire to remain linked in some way with New Zealand and to retain the right to migrate to New Zealand. The New Zealand Cabinet had subsequently agreed that a move towards fuller self-government should be undertaken by giving the fonos—councils of elders and heads of families—formal consultative status in the determining of priorities of government work and in the preparation of the annual budget, while a pilot scheme speeding up the existing assisted migration projects would be set in motion. At the same time, the education system was to be improved and an extensive public works programme would be undertaken; the cost of the public works for the next four years would be about $270,000 over and above the normal operating budget, which was about $120,000 for 1966. Moreover, during the next two years the Government would be working out the future status of the islands more fully with the Tokelauan people. In June 1966 a joint fono of Tokelauan representatives had formally reconfirmed that the islanders wished to remain linked with New Zealand and had expressed support for the pilot migration scheme and the measures planned to improve facilities on the atolls.

16. Thus, after some initial reluctance, New Zealand had agreed to work towards a continued association with the islands, as desired by the people. A greater measure of self-government would be promoted and it was hoped that the problems stemming from chronic overcrowding would be relieved through greater migration to New Zealand, where the Tokelauans were expected to settle easily—as had thousands of Polynesians from other island groups and the Tokelaus themselves—into New Zealand's integrated society. But the final decisions on the future had not yet been taken. It was envisaged that in the relatively near future the people of the Tokelaus, having considered what had been achieved in the intervening period and the situation as it then appeared, would exercise their right to self-determination. It would be up to the Tokelauans to decide when that should be done. New Zealand for its part would ensure that the intervening period was used to place the people in the best possible position to take their decision knowingly and freely.

17. The last two New Zealand Territories were thus advancing, not perhaps towards the classical solution of sovereign independence, but towards a future in which they could lead a full and secure life. To avoid any misunderstanding Mr. Corner would observe that Niue and the Tokelaus had no strategic or commercial significance for New Zealand. It was impossible to build harbours on any of the islands or to construct an airport in the Tokelaus; there was no airport on Niue, although it was hoped that one might eventually be built to reduce the island's isolation and perhaps to encourage tourism. As to commercial relations, New Zealand could buy what little produce it got from the islands as cheaply, and in some cases more cheaply, from other sources. Indeed, the islands had been costing New Zealand dear for forty years in the case of the Tokelaus and over sixty years in the case of Niue. Leaving aside the question why New Zealand had taken over responsibility for the islands in the first place, the basic reason for its remaining was the obligation felt towards two branches of a race which made up a large and increasing proportion of New Zealand's own population. Should the time come when the islanders did not want the link to be continued, they were free to break it.

18. The representative of Chile said that the statement of the representative of New Zealand in the Sub-Committee had once again demonstrated the good will with which the administering Power was endeavouring to achieve an equitable solution which would enable the inhabitants of the islands to exercise their right to self-determination.

19. The New Zealand representative had reported that in 1962 when his Government had suggested four possible means by which the people of Niue could decide their political future, the island's Assembly had rejected the first three alternatives and expressed a desire to retain New Zealand citizenship. It had proposed constitutional reforms enabling the islanders to institute a system of self-government under which they could maintain close ties with New Zealand. It had also approved an on-the-spot inquiry by a team of constitutional experts which was to draw up a series of recommendations after consultation with the Assembly.

20. According to the report, the Territory of Niue had made substantial progress towards self-government: not only was it managing its own budget, but it was also administering the aid funds provided by New Zealand. Indeed, its Executive Committee was increasingly assuming the character of a cabinet. It should be borne in mind, however, that Niue and the Tokelau Islands were geographically isolated and that their isolation would inevitably be a major obstacle in establishing relations with the rest of the world. Moreover, in view of their small size, the administering Power would have to exert special efforts to ensure that their inhabitants enjoyed full rights within the world community.

21. The representative of Sierra Leone pointed out that the majority of the population of Niue and the Tokelau Islands appeared to desire close association with New Zealand and more than half wanted to emigrate to the mainland, despite the fact that the New Zealand Government had informed them of their right to self-government and independence under General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). Indeed, it was difficult to conceive how such small and virtually isolated communities, with meagre natural resources, could be self-sufficient and exercise the functions of an independent state. In the circumstances, the administering Power should have extended education above the primary level and encouraged the inhabitants to learn English. New Zealand teachers of English should have been sent to the islands at a much earlier date.

22. The representative of India said that the detailed statement made by the New Zealand representative at the Sub-Committee's 47th meeting clearly showed that the administering Power was sincere in its attempts to help the people of Niue and the Tokelau Islands, particularly in economic matters. He hoped that the administering Power would do everything it could to improve still further the living standards of the people and the educational and social conditions in the Territories. He was not entirely happy, however, about the information concerning political and constitutional progress. The New Zealand representative's statement implied that constitutional progress in the Territories was slow because of the reluctance of the islanders, which acted as a brake on the enthusiasm of the administering Power. It was understandable that at the present stage the Niueans should favour self-government and the closest possible links with New Zealand, on which country they depended for economic and other assistance; but they might at a later stage decide in favour of complete independence, a fact which the New Zealand representative himself had recognized. It was important to note, however, that the Niue Island Assembly had rejected the idea of integration with New Zealand, which meant that there was a possibility that Niue might emerge as a separate independent State later on. He hoped that the administering Power would bear that in mind and encourage the economic growth of the island in order to make it possible. Continued dependence on New Zealand was not good for the self-esteem and dignity of the people. The administering Power should assure the islanders that they would be free to change their status any time they wished, and that the economic assistance which it provided would not be affected by any decision they might take. There was one point which he would like the New Zealand representative to clarify: in 1963, the Niue Island Assembly had resolved that the people of the Territory should be asked by secret ballot to say whether they approved of the draft constitutional programme or whether they considered it too rapid, and it had been decided to ask the New Zealand Government's advice on framing the questions in the ballot. It appeared that no such ballot had taken place so far and he would be grateful to know whether that was indeed so.

23. The representative of New Zealand, in reply to questions, said that the substance of the remarks which had been made during the meeting would be conveyed to the New Zealand Government and the Territories. The representative of Sierra Leone had commented on the lack of secondary education in the Territories. The New Zealand teachers whom it was intended to send to each atoll in the Tokelau Islands would help to raise the educational level as well as the knowledge of English. Hitherto, the children in the Territory who had reached secondary level had been sent to schools in New Zealand. In Niue, on the other hand, there was compulsory education up to the age of fourteen and most children remained at school until the age of sixteen. In addition, in March 1966 there had been thirty-two children from Niue in secondary schools in New Zealand. Both Niuean and Tokelauan students attended regional institutions such as the Fiji School of Medicine and Avel Agricultural College and the Teachers Training College in Western Samoa; one student from Niue and one from the Tokelau Islands were studying at universities in New Zealand and in-service training in Western Samoa or New Zealand was arranged for public servants from the Territories.

24. In reply to the representative of India, he reaffirmed that the issue of the future status of the Territories was not yet finally settled and that there had not yet been any formal act of self-determination. It was his understanding that no ballot on the rate of constitutional development had taken place following the decision of the Niue Assembly in 1963 because it was considered that the decision had been superseded by the later decision of the Assembly to call in a team of constitutional advisers to draw up a new programme. The whole question had been put before the electorate in the elections held on 10 April 1966 and the new Assembly had made clear its views on the rate of future progress.

25. His Government had already given an undertaking that it would continue its economic assistance to Niue whatever decision the islanders might take concerning their future, but he would draw the Indian representative's comment to its attention.

Conclusions and recommendations of the Sub-Committee

26. The Sub-Committee, while reiterating the Special Committee's conclusions and recommendations arrived at in 1964, has reached the following conclusions and recommendations:

Conclusions

(a) The Sub-Committee welcomes the statement of the administering Power that the Declaration contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) continues to express the objectives of its policy towards these islands.

(b) The Sub-Committee notes with satisfaction the willingness of the administering Power to receive a visiting mission to these Territories were such a visit to form part of a wider tour of the area.

(c) The Sub-Committee is of the opinion that the peculiar problems of size, isolation and limited resources, though important in themselves, should not delay the implementation of resolution 1514 (XV) in these Territories.

Recommendation

(a) The Sub-Committee reaffirms the inalienable right of the people of the Territories to self-determination and independence in conformity with the Declaration contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

(b) The people of these islands should be enabled to express their wishes with regard to provisions of resolution 1514 (XV) through well-established democratic processes.

(c) Further and immediate measures should be taken to develop and strengthen the economic structure of these Territories in co-operation with the United Nations and the specialized agencies.

(d) A visit to the Territories by the Sub-Committee is necessary and would be useful in gathering all information, and also in familiarizing the people with the assistance which can be rendered by the United Nations in regard to the free expression of their wishes pursuant to the Declaration contained in resolution 1514 (XV). In this respect, steps may be taken to arrange a visit in consultation with the administering Power.

CHAPTER XVII*

NEW HEBRIDES

A. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE IN 1964 AND BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS TWENTIETH SESSION

1. After considering the New Hebrides in November 1964, the Special Committee recommended, inter alia, that the administering Powers should take urgent measures for the speedy implementation of the Declaration contained in resolution 1514 (XV). It considered that the people of the Territory should be enabled to express their wishes in accordance with that resolution through well-established democratic processes based on the principle of universal adult suffrage. It felt that the administering Powers should undertake steps to accelerate the social and economic advancement of the Territory. It also felt that a visiting mission would be useful in assessing the political climate and aspirations of the people and that steps might be taken to arrange such a visit in consultation with the administering Powers (A/5800/Rev.1,¹ chap. XX, paras. 92-96).

2. At its twentieth session, the General Assembly, after considering the chapters of the reports of the Special Committee concerning this Territory (A/5800/

* Previously issued under the symbol A/6300/Add.9.

Rev.1, chap. XX; and A/6000/Rev.1,² chap. XIX), adopted resolution 2069 (XX) on 16 December 1965, endorsing the conclusions and recommendations contained therein and calling upon the administering Powers to implement without delay the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly. It requested the administering Powers to allow visiting missions to visit the Territory and to extend to them full co-operation and assistance. Finally, it requested the Special Committee to examine the situation in the Territory and to report on the implementation of the resolution to the Assembly at its twenty-first session.

B. INFORMATION ON THE TERRITORY

Introduction

3. Information on the New Hebrides is already contained in the reports of the Special Committee to the General Assembly at its nineteenth and twentieth sessions (ibid.). Supplementary information on recent developments is set out below.³

4. In 1962, the population of the Territory was estimated to total 61,500 of which 55,000 were Melanesians. The remaining 6,000 were chiefly European, Chinese and Polynesian.

Government

5. Under the Anglo-French protocol of 1914, the New Hebrides was constituted a region of joint influence, in which the subjects and citizens of the Powers enjoy equal rights of residence, personal protection and trade. Each Power has sovereignty over its own nationals, but there is no territorial sovereignty and the indigenous people bear no allegiance to either Power.

6. There are three different administrations. The British and French national administrations are headed by resident commissioners acting on behalf of the British and French High Commissioners for the Western Pacific who reside in Honiara (Solomon Islands) and Nouméa (New Caledonia) respectively. The Government of the Condominium, the Joint Administration, consists of the two Resident Commissioners acting jointly, and is responsible for the joint services, which include post and telegraphs, public works, ports and harbours, public health, customs and inland revenue.

7. The Territory has no legislative council. Since 1951 it has had an Advisory Council presided over by the Resident Commissioners. It consists of six official members and twenty unofficial members. Since June 1964, eight of the latter have been elected: four are New Hebridean, two are British and two are French. The other unofficial members are nominated: six are New Hebridean, three are British and three are French.

Political and constitutional developments

8. In July 1965, the Secretary of State for the Colonies held discussions in Paris with other senior British and French officials concerning the New Hebrides. The talks are reported to have concerned administrative problems and included labour legislation, land tenure and the co-ordination of French and British development plans in the Condominium. Further talks were to be held in London early in 1966 with the French Minister for Overseas Territories and other officials.

9. At the opening in September 1965 of the tenth session of the Advisory Council, in a joint speech, the Resident Commissioners stated that changes in the administration of the New Hebrides were being contemplated. They said that as a result of the discussions held in Paris in July, they had been asked to study various aspects of administration and the possibilities of various constitutional, judicial and land reforms. A motion was then moved asking the British and French Governments to make a statement of their policy on the future of the Territory.

Economic conditions

10. Most of the New Hebrides is mountainous and heavily forested and large areas of the interior are uninhabited. Its economy is based mainly on subsistence gardening and the production of copra. Other cash crops include cocoa and coffee. The economy has recently become more diversified with the production of manganese ore for export (since 1962) and the growth of the frozen fish industry (since 1957). The only other industries are a few small factories and indigenous arts and crafts.

11. Copra, manganese and fish made up approximately 94 per cent of all exports in 1964, the value of which totalled £3,238,970,⁴ an increase of approximately 40 per cent over the previous year. Imports, valued at £2,422,157, increased about 1 per cent. Most exports went to France and Japan and most imports came from Australia and France.

12. The budget of the Joint Administration finances the services that are operated jointly and contributes to the cost of medical and educational services operated separately by the British and French national administrations which have separate budgets.

13. Taxation is levied by the Joint Administration to provide revenue from which the joint public services of the New Hebrides are financed and subventions for some national services are paid. Approximately 70 per cent of the total revenue comes from import and export duties; there is no income tax for indigenous persons. The main heads of expenditure are public works, medical and education services and the post office.

14. Revenue and expenditure of the Joint Government in 1964 totalled £966,357 and £924,179 respectively. Estimated local revenue and expenditure of the British National Administration in 1964-1965 amounted to £A94,578 and £A475,511 respectively. The deficit was met by Britain. No information is available on the revenue and expenditure of the French National Administration in 1964.

Social conditions

Labour

15. Most of the indigenous population is mainly engaged in producing subsistence and cash crops. Most employed labour works on copra plantations, on trading ships, in stores or government service. There is generally a shortage of skilled and semi-skilled labour. No information is available on the total number of persons working for wages. Wages vary according to the type of labour and whether or not rations are included. The work week averages 44 hours. There are no trade unions, although provisions exist for them.

Public health

16. In addition to the medical facilities provided separately by the British and French national administrations, British and French medical officers run a condominium medical service providing preventive measures against malaria and epidemics, quarantine control, medical inspection of plantation and other labour, and free medical attention to the indigenous population.

17. In 1964-1965 expenditure on public health by the Joint Administration totalled £62,987, approximately 8 per cent of its total expenditure. Excluding grants, expenditure for the same period by the British National Administration was estimated to be £A59,457, approximately 16 per cent of its total expenditure.

Educational conditions

18. The great majority of all pupils attend mission schools. In addition to these, the French National Administration operates seventeen primary schools, and, in 1964, the British National Administration established a teachers' training college. The Condominium Government itself has no education service but makes an annual subsidy (at present £30,000) to the national administrations, which in turn give assistance to the mission schools.

19. It is estimated that 65 to 70 per cent of the children of school age receive primary education. Secondary education in the Territory is in its developmental stage and children are sent to secondary schools in neighbouring territories. In 1965 a grant of £126,000 was approved by the British National Administration for the construction of a post-primary school to accommodate 150 students.

C. CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

20. At its 468th meeting on 19 September 1966, the Special Committee considered the report of Sub-Committee II on the New Hebrides which appears as an annex to this chapter.

21. The representative of the United Kingdom recorded his delegation's reservations concerning the report.

D. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON THE REPORT OF SUB-COMMITTEE II

22. At its 468th meeting on 19 September 1966, the Special Committee adopted the conclusions and recommendations of Sub-Committee II concerning the New Hebrides. These are as follows.

Conclusions

23. (a) The Special Committee feels that very little progress has been made towards the implementation of the recommendations on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960.

(b) It is of the opinion that the political institutions and the executive machinery are not representative of the people of the Territory.

(c) It is aware of the peculiar problems of the Territory by virtue of its being a Condominium.

Recommendations

24. (a) The Special Committee reaffirms the inalienable right of the people of the Territory to self-determination and independence in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

(b) The people of the Territory should be provided an early opportunity to express their wishes with regard to the provisions of resolution 1514 (XV) through well-established democratic processes based on the principle of universal adult suffrage.

(c) Urgent measures should be taken for the implementation of resolution 1514 (XV).

(d) The economic and social advancement of the Territory should be accelerated.

(e) The administering Powers should expedite the finalization of reforms in the administration of the Condominium.

(f) A visit by Sub-Committee II is necessary and would be useful in assessing the political climate and aspirations of the people. Steps may be taken to arrange such a visit in consultation with the administering Powers.

ANNEX

Report of Sub-Committee II

NEW HEBRIDES

Consideration by the Sub-Committee

1. The Sub-Committee considered the New Hebrides at its 47th, 49th, 50th and 54th meetings held on 8, 12 and 17 August and 2 September 1966.

2. The Sub-Committee had before it the working paper prepared by the Secretariat (see paras. 1-19 of chapter XVII).

3. In accordance with the procedure agreed upon by the Special Committee, the Chairman invited the representative of the United Kingdom to participate in the consideration of the Territory.

4. In his statement to the Sub-Committee the representative of the United Kingdom said that he would speak only about the United Kingdom Government and its responsibilities in the Condominium of the New Hebrides. The most significant event since the last account given by his delegation on 24 September 1964 (A/AC.109/102, annex, pp. 20-22) had been the holding of United Kingdom-French ministerial talks on the New Hebrides. The first round had taken place at Paris in July 1965, when the British Colonial Secretary and the French Minister of State for Overseas Territories had reviewed various administrative problems of common interest concerning the Condominium. The British Colonial Secretary had subsequently stated that if the Territory's progress was not to be impeded, several aspects of the arrangements for its internal administration would have to be revised and brought up to date, and it had been agreed to hold further detailed talks, both locally and at the metropolitan level, on such matters as labour legislation, land tenure and the co-ordination of French and United Kingdom development plans in the Condominium. A further round of ministerial talks had taken place in London on 11 July 1966, at which time the present British Colonial Secretary and the Minister of State for French Overseas Departments and Overseas Territories had met and exchanged views on matters connected with the administration of the Condominium.

5. Among other developments was the decision at the tenth session of the Advisory Council in the New Hebrides, in September 1965, that the composition of the Standing Committee of the Council should be broadened by the addition of two further New Hebridean members, so that the Committee then consisted of two French, two British and four New Hebridean.

6. A grant of £73,100 from British Colonial Development and Welfare funds had been approved in August 1965 for the reconstruction of the hospital at Tanna, and subsequently £104,000 had been appropriated for a new secondary school at Vila and £59,000 for resurfacing Baverfield aerodrome. A total allocation of £900,000 had been made by the United Kingdom Government under the Overseas Development and Service Act of 1965 for development during the period ending in March 1968, and a new development plan for that period had been drawn up.

7. The representative of Sierra Leone, noting the information furnished the Sub-Committee, stated that it was regrettable that the Government of France, the other administering Power of the Condominium, had not found it possible to provide information for the period since 1964.

8. He considered that, so far, political and social development in the Territory had been unduly slow. There was no legislative council, and half of the twenty unofficial members of the Advisory Council were Europeans, which was inequitable, considering that of the total population of over 60,000, only some 5,000 were Europeans. Moreover, the presence of six official members on the Advisory Council and the fact that its recommendations were not necessarily accepted by the Joint Administration indicated that it was in no sense a representative body. The administering Powers should make every effort to organize a governing body composed of members elected by universal suffrage and should ensure that the people of the Territory were fully consulted about their future political status.

9. The confusing tripartite system of administration had inevitably impeded progress in the New Hebrides. Little appeared to have been done to encourage integration of the various language groups; there was no organized labour movement and conditions of employment were poor; and the provision for secondary education, at least in so far as the United Kingdom administration was concerned, was inadequate. The obvious need of the Territory was for a common government and common social educational facilities, and it should not have to suffer in any way in its progress towards self-determination because of the different systems of administration of the Powers which controlled it.

10. The representative of Poland said that, although the Territory was still in the early stages of development, it did, however, possess valuable economic assets—a fertile soil and some mineral deposits—which, with proper guidance and assistance from the administering Powers, could provide an adequate basis for self-sufficiency. The United Kingdom administration had so far done little to improve that part of the educational system for which it was responsible and it was therefore not surprising that political development had been so slow. It was the responsibility of the administering Powers to ensure that the people of the Territory were receiving an education which would prepare them for exercising their right to self-determination as soon as possible. Moreover, in view of the status currently enjoyed by Europeans, it was particularly important that the indigenous population should be made aware that, on achieving independence, all special rights for citizens of the administering Powers could be abolished.

11. The representative of India observed that there had been very little constitutional progress in the New Hebrides since the Sub-Committee had last discussed the Territory in 1964. There had been no change in the functions and competence of the Advisory Council since 1951; it was still a predominantly nominated body with unduly high European representation and no legislative powers. The recent discussions between the Governments of the administering Powers revealed the obvious need for improvement in the administration of the islands. Moreover, the fact that in 1965 the Advisory Council had passed a motion asking the French and United Kingdom Governments for a statement of their policy on the future of the Territory raised serious doubts as to whether the population was fully aware of its right to self-determination and independence.

12. The representative of the United Kingdom said that the motion referred to by the representative of India had been accepted by the Resident Commissioners for reference to the metropolitan Governments. A reply would be given to the Advisory Council in due course.

Conclusions of the Sub-Committee

13. The Sub-Committee feels that very little progress has been made towards the implementation of the recommendations on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960.

14. The Sub-Committee is of the opinion that the political institutions and the executive machinery are not representative of the people of the Territory.

15. The Sub-Committee is aware of the peculiar problems of the Territory by virtue of its being a Condominium.

Recommendations of the Sub-Committee

16. The Sub-Committee reaffirms the inalienable right of the people of the Territory to self-determination and independence in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

17. The people of the Territory should be provided an early opportunity to express their wishes with regard to the provisions of resolution 1514 (XV) through well-established democratic processes based on the principle of universal adult suffrage.

18. Urgent measures should be taken for the implementation of resolution 1514 (XV).

19. The economic and social advancement of the Territory should be accelerated.

20. The administering Powers should expedite the finalization of reforms in the administration of the Condominium.

21. A visit by the Sub-Committee is necessary and would be useful in assessing the political climate and aspirations of the people. Steps may be taken to arrange such a visit in consultation with the administering Powers.

CHAPTER XVIII*

AMERICAN SAMOA, GUAM AND THE TRUST TERRITORY OF THE PACIFIC ISLANDS

A. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE IN 1964 AND BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS TWENTIETH SESSION

1. After considering American Samoa, Guam and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands in November 1964, the Special Committee adopted conclusions and recommendations concerning American Samoa, in which it, inter alia, requested the administering Power to undertake immediate steps for the implementation of the provisions of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). It stated that the people should be given the earliest possible opportunity to express fully their wishes regarding their future status, and that the assistance of the United Nations could be made available in this regard, if required. It considered that a visiting mission would be useful for obtaining first-hand information and that steps might be taken to arrange such a visit in consultation with the administering Power (A/5800/Rev.1,¹ chap. XVI, paras. 69-71).

2. Concerning Guam, the Special Committee adopted conclusions and recommendations in which it, inter alia, requested the administering Power to take urgent and adequate measures for the application of the Declaration contained in resolution 1514 (XV) to the Territory of Guam. It stated that the assistance of the United Nations could be made available to the people of Guam and the administering Power for this purpose if required, and that a visiting mission would be useful and steps might be taken to arrange such a visit in consultation with the administering Power. It requested the administering Power to provide further educational and training facilities for the people of the Territory, and to implement as speedily as possible its plans for the diversification of the economy and the establishment of new industries, thus giving a firmer basis to the economic structure of Guam (ibid., chap. XVII, paras. 99-102).

3. Concerning the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, the Special Committee recommended, inter alia, to the Administering Authority that the Congress of Micronesia should be provided with all the powers necessary to pave the way for the speedy implementation of resolution 1514 (XV). It considered that the people of the Territory should be enabled to express their wishes in accordance with that resolution through well-established democratic processes and under United Nations supervision. It also considered that steps should be taken with a view to the early elimination of disparities in the wage structure, the establishment of an institution of higher education, and the assumption of the highest positions of responsibility by the people of the Territory. It requested the Administering Authority to set up urgently an over-all economic plan in order to develop and strengthen the economy and increase production. It considered that a visiting mission to the Territory would be useful and that steps might be taken to arrange such a visit, in consultation with the Administering Authority (ibid., chap. XVIII, paras. 61-66).

4. At its twentieth session, the General Assembly, after considering the chapters of the reports of the Special Committee concerning American Samoa and Guam (A/5800/Rev.1, chaps. XVI and XVII; and A/6000/Rev.1,² chaps. XV and XVI), adopted resolution 2069 (XX) on 16 December 1965, endorsing the conclusions and recommendations contained therein, and calling upon the administering Power to implement without delay the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly. It requested the administering Power to allow visiting missions to visit the Territories and to extend to them full co-operation and assistance. Finally, it requested the Special Committee to examine the situation in the Territories and to report on the implementation of the resolution to the Assembly at its twenty-first session.

B. INFORMATION ON THE TERRITORIES

1. American Samoa

Introduction

5. Information on American Samoa is already contained in the Special Committee's reports to the General Assembly at its nineteenth and twentieth sessions (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. XVI; and A/6000/Rev.1, chap. XV). Supplementary information is set out below.³

6. The 1960 census showed a population of 20,051; in July 1965, the population was estimated at 26,000.

Political and constitutional developments

7. The present Constitution of American Samoa, which came into effect on 17 October 1960, provided for its automatic revision or amendment at the end of five years. No information is available concerning the hearings on proposals for the revision of certain sections of the Constitution, which were held by a Constitutional Committee appointed to review the Constitution in 1965.

Economic conditions

8. Grants by the United States Congress and direct appropriations totalled some $12 million in the fiscal year 1964 as compared with $13 million received in 1963. Local revenue aggregated $2,478,330, an increase of $793,121 over the previous year.

9. Exports showed a decline from $12,707,373 in the previous fiscal year to $10,529,649 in the fiscal year 1964. The decline was reported to be due to the lower value of canned tuna shipments which comprise more than 90 per cent by value of all exports. Copra exports showed a slight decline in tonnage but an increase in value over the previous fiscal year: 720 tons valued at $124,350 in 1964, compared with 770 tons valued at $121,035 in 1963.

10. The economy of the Territory was considerably strengthened in 1964 when a new tuna cannery and can factory began operations. The new cannery along with the existing tuna plant now provide employment for almost 700 local men and women, more than double the number of jobs formerly available in this industry. The economy was further strengthened in December 1965 when the Hotel Pago Pago Intercontinental was opened. The hotel is owned by the American Samoan Development Corporation, whose shareholders are, by law, Samoans. It is expected that the new hotel, along with the new jet air terminal, will cause an increase in the number of tourists visiting the Territory.

Social conditions

Labour

11. There is a shortage of agricultural labour to work on the plantations. An increasing number of migrants are entering the Territory to seek work and immigration restrictions are being imposed. The Government is the largest employer of labour. The fish canning companies, shipping and transport companies, petroleum marketing companies and merchants rank next in importance. These employers engaged 3,972 workers in 1964, compared with 3,594 workers in 1963.

12. Total expenditures for medical services increased from $818,891 in 1963 to $1,000,726 in 1964. The number of hospital beds rose from 194 to 198. The number of medical doctors increased from five to seven in 1964.

13. A family-planning service, available to all married women who seek it voluntarily, was inaugurated in July 1965 to combat the high population growth. In the opinion of the Governor, unless the birth-rate is arrested, the Territory's natural resources will not be sufficient to meet future needs.

Educational conditions

14. Educational television was introduced in October 1964, when a three-channel television station came into operation. The television station provides educational programmes for Samoan children in thirty-one new class-rooms at five schools. It is expected that adult literacy programmes and other programmes dealing with modern agricultural methods, public health, village sanitation and local self-government will be also introduced on the television networks. Two million dollars was authorized for the replacement of the forty-four existing elementary village schools by twenty-six consolidated village schools. Construction has already begun on eight of the new schools, which will incorporate eight rather than six grades. It is expected that the school consolidation programme and the use of television will make it possible for a small cadre of qualified teachers to reach a maximum number of pupils as well as ensure a co-ordinated school system with uniform standards.

15. The Government made thirty-one scholarship grants during the academic year 1962/63, and the same number during 1963/64. The number of students receiving continuing scholarship grants rose from twenty-nine in 1962-1963 to fifty-six in 1963-1964. Approximately fifty American Samoans attended colleges without government assistance, an increase of approximately 20 per cent over the previous academic year of 1962-1963.

16. At 30 June 1964, 8,132 Samoan pupils were enrolled in elementary, secondary and post-secondary schools, an increase of 348 students. The number of students in public schools increased from 6,316 to 6,659, while the number of students in private schools rose from 1,408 to 1,473.

2. Guam

Introduction

17. Information on Guam is contained in the Special Committee's reports to the General Assembly at its nineteenth and twentieth sessions (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. XVII; and A/6000/Rev.1, chap. XVI). Supplementary information is set out below.⁴

18. The population of Guam (excluding transients residing on military reservations) at April 1964 comprised: 38,360 Guamanians; 1,573 "statesiders"; 612 Hawaiians; 2,839 Filipinos; and 1,799 others. The total population of 44,892 represented an increase of 584 over the previous year.

Political and constitutional developments

19. The Governor of Guam, the Chief Executive and Administrator of the affairs of the Government of Guam, is appointed by the President of the United States of America.

20. In February 1966 the Speaker of the Guam Legislature is reported to have stated that Guam wished to elect its own governor, to be represented in the United States Congress by a non-voting delegate and to be able to vote for the President and Vice-President of the United States. It is also reported that late in March the Speaker and a group of legislators attended congressional hearings on an Administration bill introduced by the Department of the Interior to institute an elected governor of Guam who could be removed by the President "for cause".

Elections

21. Guam has a unicameral Legislature of twenty-one members elected by universal adult suffrage. General elections are held every two years. The most recent election was held in November 1964, when thirteen seats were won by members of the Territorial Party and eight seats were won by the Democratic Party, which is affiliated with the Democratic Party of the United States.

Economic conditions

22. Military installations on Guam are an important source of income for its civilians, and practically the entire economy of the Territory is based directly or indirectly upon these wages. Agriculture is the other principal element in the economy, but its development is handicapped by the ready employment offered by the military installations and the civil government at relatively good wages.

23. As a part of the recovery programme, aimed at overcoming the effect of the typhoons of 1962 and 1963, the United States Congress appropriated $19.5 million to be spent during the fiscal year 1965. Scheduled for immediate construction were several schools, a new air terminal, other government buildings and a new commercial port. A project to encourage tourism has been started with the establishment of a Guam Tourist Commission and the hiring of a full-time consultant. Within the Department of Commerce, an Industrial Development Division was recently created to accelerate the Territory's economic progress, in order to promote the rehabilitation and expansion of business and to stimulate the flow of capital to the Territory.

Social conditions

Labour

24. Programmes to alleviate the persistent shortages of skilled resident labour were being implemented in 1964. It was expected that additional trainees would be accepted under the Manpower Development and Training Act. The apprenticeship training programme, sponsored jointly by the Government of Guam and the Guam Contractors' Association, was scheduled to begin in September 1964.

⁴ The information presented here has been derived from published reports and from information transmitted to the Secretary-General by the United States of America under Article 73 e of the Charter on 31 August 1965, for the year ended 30 June 1964.

25. The economy has continued to absorb almost all of the available workers in the labour market. During the fiscal year ending June 1964, the Guam Employment Service, an affiliate of the United States Employment Service of the Department of Labour, reported that the majority of job openings were for skilled workers with reconstruction projects which usually are filled by alien workers. All private businesses and government agencies wishing to import or extend alien contract workers are required to file job requests with the Service. It is the policy of the Service to screen qualified United States citizens before clearance certificates are issued by the United States Immigration Service to the firms and agencies seeking alien labour. Of the 8,628 job openings from government and private industries processed by the Service, during the year under review, 6,736 were filed by employers seeking alien contract workers.

26. The total budget of the Department of Education for the fiscal year 1964 was $4,277,088, of which $3,130,286 was raised from local appropriations and $1,146,802 was contributed by United States federal assistance programmes.

27. At the end of the 1964 academic term 14,920 students were enrolled at the elementary and secondary school levels. In addition, the Guam Trade and Technical School enrolled 209 students for vocational training in the following trades: automotive, drafting, electrical and refrigeration. The Trade School also conducted an adult evening programme in vocational courses for approximately 400 adults during the 1963-1964 school year. The total student body at the College of Guam at May-June 1964 numbered 2,721, of whom 943 were enrolled for college credit courses off-campus at Anderson Air Force Base and at Agat Extension.

3. Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands

Introduction

28. Information on the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands is already contained in the Special Committee's reports to the General Assembly at its nineteenth and twentieth sessions (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. XVIII; and A/6000/Rev.1, chap. XVII). Supplementary information is set out below.⁵

29. At 30 June 1965 the population of the Territory was 90,596, compared with 88,215 in June 1964.

Constitutional development

30. The Congress of Micronesia, a bicameral legislature consisting of a General Assembly and a House of Delegates, held its first session in July and August 1965. The organization and powers of the Congress were described in the previous report of the Special Committee to the General Assembly. Members are chosen in biennial elections by secret ballot of residents of the Territory who are citizens of the Territory and eighteen years of age or over.

31. Order No. 2882 of the Secretary of the Interior established the Congress on 28 September 1964, and provided for its legislative powers. These provide, inter alia, that no legislation may be inconsistent with the following: (a) treaties or international agreements of the United States; (b) laws of the United States applicable to the Trust Territory; (c) Executive Orders of the President of the United States and orders of the Secretary of the Interior; or (d) sections 1 through 12 (Bill of Rights) of the code of the Trust Territory, which constitute the basic laws and regulations governing all residents of the Territory. The Congress has powers to levy taxes, to participate in the preparation of the annual budget of the Trust Territory, and to refer legislation twice vetoed by the High Commissioner to the Secretary of the Interior for further action.

32. Money bills enacted by the Congress of Micronesia shall not provide for the appropriation of funds in excess of such amounts as are available from revenues raised pursuant to the tax laws and other revenue laws of the Trust Territory. The Congress has no power to appropriate funds in excess of internal revenue, but it has the authority to review the preliminary budget plan of the High Commissioner before his final submission of the budget to the Secretary of the Interior for Federal funds. With respect to such portions of the preliminary budget plan, the High Commissioner shall adopt such recommendations of the Congress as he may deem appropriate, but he shall transmit to the Secretary of the Interior all recommendations he has not adopted.

33. The Congress may recommend amendments of Secretarial Order No. 2882, during any regular session, by a two-thirds majority vote of the membership of each house.

Public Service

34. On 30 June 1965, Micronesian employees in senior, professional and executive positions totalled 128, an increase of twenty over the previous year. During the same period Micronesians in professional, administrative and protective posts increased from 1,250 to 1,980. Non-indigenous employees over the same period decreased from 319 to 318.

35. In its current annual report (see para. 42 below), the Administering Authority stated that three senior administrative positions were filled by Micronesians, and one Micronesian Assistant District Administrator was awarded a Parvin Graduate Scholarship in Public Administration for advanced academic graduate and internship training at Princeton University. In September 1965, a Micronesian was appointed District Administrator of the Marshall Islands District, the first Micronesian to receive such an appointment.

36. In March 1966, pursuant to the Congress of Micronesia's joint resolution requesting the High Commissioner to develop proposals for civil service regulations for Micronesian employees of the Trust Territory Government, a task force was established to develop proposals for a Civil Service Act. At present, Micronesians are employed in accordance with policy and procedure established by the High Commissioner.

Economic conditions

37. The economy of the Territory is based primarily on subsistence agriculture and fishing and the production of one cash crop, copra. In 1964/65 the value of copra exports amounted to $2,525,117, as compared with $2,215,448 the previous year.

⁵ The information presented here has been derived from published reports and from information transmitted by the United States of America to the United Nations, pursuant to Article 88 of the Charter, on 25 May 1966 for the year ending 30 June 1965.

38. In its annual report the Administering Authority states that the major event regarding economic development during the year was the signing of a contract with a leading economic development consulting firm to undertake a two-year economic development programme for Micronesia. This firm will prepare an inventory of assets, liabilities, and opportunities of Micronesia which will be used in preparing a long-range integrated economic development programme for the Territory. Formulation of the development programme will be carried out concurrently with actual implementation.

39. At its thirty-third session the Trusteeship Council was informed that the firm had submitted a preliminary report identifying the areas it considered most promising and would subsequently submit specific recommendations for economic development.

40. The Trust Territory depends largely on United States grants to balance its budget. In 1962, legislation was enacted by the United States Congress to raise the statutory limitation on appropriations for the Trust Territory from $7.5 million to $17.5 million. For the fiscal years 1963, 1964 and 1965 a total of $47.5 million was appropriated by the United States Congress for the administration of the Trust Territory, and since 1963 its deficits have amounted to over $15 million annually. During the fiscal year ending 30 June 1965, total expenditures increased by $1,419,967 to $23.5 million, of which only $2 million was financed from local revenue. The budget proposal for the fiscal year 1966 amounting to $17,344,000 has been approved.

41. At its thirty-third session the Trusteeship Council was informed that the United States Congress had before it a legislative proposal to authorize the appropriation of $172 million for capital expenditure in the Trust Territory over the next five years, in addition to an expanded operating budget totalling $152 million for the five-year period. The proposed legislation also called for removal of the present ceiling of $17.5 million a year for civil government operations.

Report of the Trusteeship Council in 1966

42. The Trusteeship Council at its thirty-third session in June and July 1966 completed its examination of the annual report of the Administering Authority for the period 1 July 1964 to 30 June 1965.⁶

43. By a letter dated 25 July 1966 (A/AC.109/191), the President of the Trusteeship Council informed the Chairman of the Special Committee that the Council had adopted a report on the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands for submission to the Security Council.⁷ The report contains, in addition to the Trusteeship Council's conclusions and recommendations and the observations of its individual members, detailed information on political, economic, social and educational conditions.

C. CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

44. At its 469th meeting on 29 September 1966, the Special Committee considered the report of Subcommittee II on American Samoa, Guam and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, which appears as an annex to this chapter.

45. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that the situation in the Territories covered by the report under discussion showed that the administering Power had not yet taken all the necessary steps to enable the people of the Territories to exercise their right to self-determination and independence, nor had it taken steps to implement General Assembly resolution 2069 (XX). In spite of that resolution, the United States had refused to co-operate with the United Nations by permitting a visiting mission to visit Guam and Eastern Samoa. Such an attitude on the part of an administering Power deserved censure.

46. With regard to the political, economic and social development of the Territories, United States policy was guided not by the interests of the people but by the aim of making the Territories an economic and strategic appendage of the metropolitan country. In the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, the Administering Authority had not yet taken steps to enable the people to develop legislative and executive organs in preparation for self-determination and independence. It was often alleged that the Micronesians were not ready to manage their own affairs, but that view had been questioned, for example, by the Vice-Chancellor of the East-West Centre, where inhabitants of the Territory received training.

47. The administering Power was making no attempt to diversify the economy of the Territories but confined itself to developing those branches in which the United States was interested. According to the United States Press, the economic position of the Pacific Islands was worse than it had been under the Japanese, and the people of Eastern Samoa, too, had criticized the neglect by the United States of the island's development. The low level of the economy was to a large extent due to the part played by foreign monopolies. The two fish canneries in Eastern Samoa were owned by American companies. In the Pacific Islands, fishing was controlled by Van Camp Sea Food Company of Long Beach, California. The company Jones and Guerrero played an important part in the economic life of Guam, and the United States granted tax incentives to companies operating in the Territory.

48. Another serious matter was the use of the Territories for military purposes. The economy of Guam and of Eastern Samoa was to a great extent dependent on United States military bases. The Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands had been used for the testing of rocketry and of intercontinental ballistic missiles, and there were military radio stations and satellite tracking stations on the islands. The base of Guam was of particular importance for United States activities in South-East Asia and was used for the storage of B-52 nuclear bombers, while submarines carrying Polaris missiles with nuclear warheads were stationed at the naval base on the island. It was openly admitted that the United States had no intention of giving independence to the Pacific Islands, which were considered to be of strategic importance. The attempt to transform the Territories under United States rule into military bases was a violation of the Charter, of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX); it should be condemned by the Committee.

49. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that his delegation had no objection to the report but would like to bring out certain points that were not fully reflected in it. The dependence of the economy of Guam on the military and other activities of the United States Government was mentioned in the Sub-Committee's conclusions. As all members of the Committee knew, however, Guam was being used as the spearhead for United States military activities in South-East Asia; and particularly Viet-Nam, and that aspect of the matter was not reflected in the Sub-Committee's recommendations. His country was opposed to the use of foreign countries, and especially of colonial Territories, as military bases, particularly as bases in an active war. His delegation would therefore like to have seen a reference to that matter in the recommendations. The use of Guam as a military base jeopardized the lives of the people of Guam, who were under colonial bondage and had no say in the running of their own affairs.

50. The representative of the United States of America said that it was quite inaccurate to state that the people of Guam were in colonial bondage and had no say in the running of their affairs. The Guam legislature was popularly elected on the basis of universal adult suffrage and it had adopted several unanimous resolutions supporting the United States military effort in the Pacific, an effort which the people of Guam realized was in their defence as well as in defence of the whole area.

51. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that United States military activities were another subject, which could be discussed in another forum. Guam, however, was a Non-Self-Governing Territory and until it attained independence his delegation would regard it as being under colonial bondage.

52. The representative of Bulgaria said that he too was surprised that such an important question as that of the military base in Guam was not mentioned in the Sub-Committee's recommendations. The dangers inherent in the continued presence of military bases in dependent Territories had been stressed in earlier resolutions of the Special Committee and of the General Assembly. Moreover, the question of foreign military bases and their use in combating liberation movements was one which had received particular attention at the present session of the General Assembly. It would therefore seem all the more appropriate to mention the problem of the Guam base, which was being used by United States forces in operations against other peoples and countries in the region.

53. The representative of the United States of America said that the base offered no threat to the people of Guam and represented no obstacle to their progress; it had a long history in the defence of the United States and of freedom. History showed that the United States had no aggressive designs: it had annexed no territory following the Second World War and had helped the Philippines to achieve nationhood. The United States would welcome the day when all such military installations were unnecessary, but meanwhile must continue to take steps it deemed appropriate to safeguard its security and fulfil its commitments. The military facilities in Guam had little connexion with the Committee's mandate.

54. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that he could not agree with the United States delegation's arguments that the base in Guam represented no obstacle to the progress of the people of the Territory. The United States author Julius Pratt had described the dependence of the peoples of Eastern Samoa and Guam on military bases, pointing out that the bases had drawn many of the young people away from agricultural employment and made the Territories more dependent on imports for food and clothing. There was much evidence to show that the people of Guam had not benefited from the United States bases there. The indigenous people of Guam were recruited into the United States Army and sent to fight in Viet-Nam. The United States Press had reported that a number of people from Guam had been killed in that war. His delegation was not surprised by the United States assertion that the bases were being used in the defence of "freedom", but that was hardly a correct description of the United States intervention in Viet-Nam.

D. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON THE REPORT OF SUB-COMMITTEE II

55. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated that his delegation supported the conclusions and recommendations in the Sub-Committee's report but considered that they could be supplemented by other recommendations. For example, the administering Power could be requested to return to the people all land alienated for military purposes, dismantle all bases and establish no new bases. The use of the bases for operations against peoples in South-East Asia should be condemned. The right of the people to utilize their own natural resources should be upheld and all laws granting privileges to foreign companies abolished. Plans for merging the Territories with the metropolitan country should also be condemned. Only thus could the rights of the people to self-determination and to control of their own future be guaranteed.

56. The representative of Australia said that Australia, as a member of Sub-Committee II, would not oppose the adoption of the Sub-Committee's report, but wished to state that its fears remained essentially as stated in the Sub-Committee's discussions.

57. The representative of the United States of America wished to say, firstly, that her delegation did not regard the recommendations and conclusions in the Sub-Committee's report as applicable to the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands. That Trust Territory had been designated a strategic area and under Article 83 of the Charter all functions of the United Nations relating to strategic areas were to be exercised by the Security Council; it was to the Security Council and not to the General Assembly that the Trusteeship Council reported on developments in such Territories.

58. With regard to American Samoa, she noted that the conclusions included a reference to "positive steps", but she did not think that due importance had been given to recent developments. A full review of the Constitution had been carried out by a committee appointed upon the request of the Samoan legislature. In Guam, steps had been taken towards instituting an elective chief executive. Another fact which had been ignored by the Soviet Union representative was that the people of Guam had the full rights of American citizenship, and the people of Samoa had the rights of American nationals. Among the inhabitants of those Territories, as she herself had discovered on a recent visit, there was a universal desire for continuing close association with the United States.

59. During the Sub-Committee's discussions, her delegation had urged that a reference should be made in the recommendations to General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV), since it was essential that the range of possibilities which had been set out by the Assembly for such Territories should be reflected. Her delegation still considered that the report would be incomplete without such a reference.

60. With regard to the question of visiting missions, the United States felt that it would be hard to justify such missions to Territories which constituted free, open societies and where there was a high level of general development.

61. She would like those views to be recorded in connexion with the Committee's decision on the Sub-Committee's report.

62. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that his delegation would not favour a mention of General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV) in the recommendations; it had always been apprehensive about references to that resolution. General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) was extremely broad in scope and the reference to that resolution seemed sufficient.

63. The representative of the United Kingdom reserved his Government's position on the Sub-Committee's report.

64. At the 469th meeting, on 29 September 1966, the Special Committee approved the report of Sub-Committee II concerning American Samoa, Guam and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands and adopted its conclusions and recommendations. These are as follows.

Conclusions

65. (a) The Special Committee feels that, though the administering Power had taken some positive steps, the progress towards full self-determination and self-government is not adequate.

(b) The administering Power still retains considerable powers of control in the executive and legislative spheres, thus restricting the exercise of self-government by the people of the Territories. The political institutions and executive machinery are not fully representative of the people.

(c) It notes the various plans announced by the administering Power to strengthen the economies of the Territories. It feels that the administering Power should further intensify its efforts to exploit and develop the indigenous resources in the Territories. It is particularly aware of the dependence of the economy of Guam on the military and other activities of the Government of the United States.

(d) It notes that the legislation providing for direct election of the Governor of Guam is expected to be enacted by the Congress of the United States in the near future. It also noted that a constitutional convention is to be convened in American Samoa in October 1966 to draft a new constitution for the Territory. Notwithstanding these developments, the Special Committee notes that there is no time-table of effective measures for a speedy implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

Recommendations

66. (a) The Special Committee reaffirms the inalienable right of the people of American Samoa, Guam and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands to self-government and independence in conformity with the Declaration contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

(b) The administering Power should accelerate the further political development of the Territories by expanding the functions and powers of legislature and by vesting executive authority in the hands of the indigenous population.

(c) The Special Committee urges the administering Power to expedite further the economic growth of the Territories by fully developing their agricultural and industrial potential and, particularly in the case of Guam, to implement as speedily as possible its plans for the diversification of the economy. In this regard, the assistance of the United Nations and its specialized agencies could be utilized most effectively.

(d) The administering Power is requested to increase the educational and training facilities for the people of the Territories.

(e) A visit to the Territories by the Special Committee is necessary and would be most useful, for, in addition to familiarizing the Member States with the needs and aspirations of the people, it would also increase the people's awareness of their rights which have been guaranteed to them by the United Nations.

ANNEX

[A/AC.109/L.318/Add.4]

Report of Sub-Committee II

AMERICAN SAMOA, GUAM AND THE TRUST TERRITORY OF THE PACIFIC ISLANDS

Consideration by the Sub-Committee

1. The Sub-Committee considered American Samoa, Guam and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands at its 48th, 49th, 50th, 51st, 52nd, 53rd and 55th meetings held on 9, 12, 17, 23, 25 and 29 August and 7 September 1966.

2. The Sub-Committee had before it the working papers prepared by the Secretariat (see paras. 1-43 of chap. XVIII).

3. The representative of the United States of America stated that, since the Sub-Committee last discussed American Samoa and Guam, there had been steady economic, social and political progress. In American Samoa continued efforts had been made to provide the Territory with a sound economic base. The construction of a new jet airport and a new hotel had built up the island's tourist facilities, while a new tuna cannery and coconut processing plant had opened up additional work opportunities. In education, the complete overhaul of the school system, the construction of new schools and the use of the most advanced teaching techniques, including educational television, now provided all the children of school age with expert instruction and the best educational facilities. In the political field, the automatic review of the 1960 Constitution of American Samoa to be made after five years had been entrusted to a Constitutional Review Committee empowered either to submit amendments or to prepare a revised draft. The Committee had concluded its work and its proposals were to be submitted to a Constitutional Convention which would be convened in October 1966. The draft of a new constitution which might emanate from the Convention would be submitted to the electorate for ratification in November.

4. In Guam political progress was continuing. The people had long enjoyed self-government through the unicameral Legislature which had wide authority, particularly in matters of taxation and appropriations for the operation of the local government. The Governor of Guam was still appointed by the President of the United States, but the United States House of Representatives had now passed and sent to the Senate legislation providing for the popular election of the Governor. Guam was advancing economically, and since the enactment of the Guam Rehabilitation Act the federal and local governments had co-operated to improve public services and had initiated a system of economic development planning. Through the fiscal year ending June 1967, the sum of $29.3 million of the anticipated $45 million to be made available under the Guam Rehabilitation Act had already been appropriated and by 3 June 1966 $13.7 million had been spent, including $6.5 million for educational facilities; the remainder had been used for additions to power and water systems, the building of a new air terminal and the beginning of a new commercial port. The Act had also financed a special economic study of Guam which had stressed the need for continuing effort by the local and federal governments if accelerated economic development was to be achieved. To that end the Guam Legislature had established an Economic Development Agency which had extensive powers to develop commerce, agriculture, industry and tourism. The Agency was a public corporation which was to supervise an integrated programme for the economic development of Guam and serve as a catalyst to private enterprises. It had the power to conduct research, form and operate its own industry, make loans, sell bonds, hire its own staff and fix their salaries, and build and operate plants and facilities in various economic areas; it was offering tax incentives to eligible new business enterprises. Like many tropical islands with very few natural resources, Guam looked to tourism as the most promising source of income. Two tourist-style hotels were planned, with target completion dates in two years, and tourist promotion was being stepped up. It was hoped that with the new facilities, tourism would play an important part in developing the economy of Guam.

5. Turning to the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, he referred members to the statements made by his delegation during the recent session of the Trusteeship Council. Those statements described in detail the efforts being made by the United States Government to promote the economic, social and political well-being of the people of the Trust Territory.

6. The representative of India stated that the efforts of the administering Power in American Samoa and Guam fell far short of implementing the demands of the Special Committee. The Sub-Committee had been informed that the next step in internal self-government in Guam would be the direct election of the Governor. That step had been promised during the discussion of the Territory by the Special Committee in 1964 and it was to be hoped that the United States Senate would not take an unduly long time in endorsing the necessary legislation which had already been passed by the House of Representatives. The powers of the Guam Legislature continued to be restricted and the Governor and the Congress of the United States still retained the power to veto all laws enacted by it. He would welcome more information on that aspect of the question. During the discussion of the Territory in 1964, many members of the Special Committee had expressed serious concern at the dependence of Guam's economy on the United States military installations in the Territory. His delegation had noted with satisfaction the efforts of the administering Power to give a firmer basis to Guam's economic structure, particularly the establishment of the Economic Development Agency, but it would have welcomed statistics to give some idea of the progress made. It was essential for the administering Power to implement, at an early date, the provisions of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) as well as the recommendations made by the Special Committee in 1964.

7. Regarding American Samoa, his delegation would have welcomed more details concerning the proposals of the Constitutional Review Committee which were to be submitted to a Constitutional Convention in October 1966. Without any detailed information, it was impossible to judge the progress so far made towards self-government, but from the information available it appeared that little had been done towards increasing the powers of the local legislature. Executive power was vested solely in the hands of the Governor and the other personnel appointed by the United States Secretary of the Interior. It would have been useful if the United States delegation had made available copies of the latest annual report of the Governor of American Samoa.

8. The representative of Poland said that the United States representative, in his statement at the 48th meeting, had claimed that his Government was trying to create a sound economy in both American Samoa and Guam and had given several minor examples of political and social progress in those Territories. He had not mentioned, however, that the former agricultural economy of Guam had been transformed into an auxiliary service for the military base, which was the principal reason for the United States Government's interest in the island. It might, in fact, be argued that the subordination of economic activities to militaristic goals had left the economy in a worse state than it had been originally. Recent history showed that such bases tended to be used against peoples fighting for their freedom; that had been the case in the Congo and was the case in Viet-Nam.

9. To complete the process of decolonization all Member States must observe the obligations laid down in the United Nations Charter and nothing should impede discussion of infringements of a nation's sovereignty.

10. The representative of the United States of America stated that the Polish representative, by introducing a reference to Viet-Nam, had digressed seriously from the subject of the Territories under United States administration. The United States had tried to arrange a Security Council debate on Viet-Nam and was prepared to discuss the question at any time, but the United States delegation wondered if the Sub-Committee would wish to debate it at the present meeting.

11. He said that the United States was not the aggressor in Viet-Nam, and that for several decades the military base on Guam had been used for the defence of the United States and of neighbouring countries and for no other purpose. Furthermore, his delegation was surprised that such developments as the introduction of a bill providing for the election of a Governor of Guam by the people of the island and the convening of a Constitutional Convention on American Samoa should be considered as minor examples of constitutional advance.

12. The representative of Iraq referred to the conference of the United States and Territorial Governments held a few weeks previously at which the Governors had supported the United States policy in Viet-Nam. He wondered whether it was within the rights or responsibilities of the Administrators of the United States Trust Territories to support United States policy in Viet-Nam, inasmuch as they had been appointed by the United States Government and could not speak for the people of the Territories.

13. The representative of Poland in his right of reply observed that though the United States representative had protested on his reference to Viet-Nam, there is no way else to be blamed but the United States for the very fact that military bases are operating on this Territory. The connexion between Guam and Viet-Nam war seemed very clear in the opinion of the Polish delegation.

14. The representative of the United States of America said he did not consider the position attributed to the Governor of Guam surprising, and that he presumably felt free to express his views on the matters before the Conference.

15. The representative of Chile asked whether the United States representative could give further information about the new draft Constitution for American Samoa, the composition of the Constitutional Convention which would meet at the end of 1966 to approve it and the role played by the indigenous inhabitants in the political development of the Territory. Such information would be of fundamental importance as it would enable the Sub-Committee to judge the political maturity achieved by the islanders and the degree of self-government to be granted them by the administering Power.

16. He asked the United States representative to explain what actual power the Governor of Guam would exercise in the future constitutional framework, if, as now proposed, he were elected by the people of the Territory. The Subcommittee would be interested to receive more specific information about the participation of the people of Guam in political and administrative affairs. It was important that the indigenous people, who constituted more than three-quarters of the population, should exercise their rights to full self-determination and independence in accordance with the relevant resolutions of the United Nations.

17. He expressed his appreciation for the information which the United States representative had already given about the economic, social and political progress in American Samoa and Guam. In the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, while there were still enormous difficulties to be overcome, there was a growing sense of national identity and unity among the people and their representatives in the Congress of Micronesia. He had no doubt that the people of Micronesia would continue to make progress toward full self-determination and independence.

18. The representative of Poland said that the steps taken by the United States as the Administering Authority for the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands to ensure the rapid constitutional, economic and social development of Micronesia had been inadequate: the Territory was advancing towards self-government so slowly as to cast serious doubts on the sincerity of United States efforts to fulfil its obligations under the Trusteeship System. Even in the field of education, for example, where the Administering Authority had recently intensified its efforts, improvement had been relatively limited and slow. Moreover, although the political and social structure of the Territory had been strengthened, the powers of self-government of the newly established organs were minimal. The United States High Commissioner still exercised too much executive and administrative authority as compared with the Congress of Micronesia, which did not even control the territorial budget. In the circumstances, Micronesia appeared doomed to political dependence for years to come.

19. He strongly urged the Administering Authority to accelerate the process of transferring power to the Territory in accordance with resolution 1514 (XV) and to overcome its apparent reluctance to provide sufficient financial and technical assistance to prepare the inhabitants for self-determination and full sovereignty. It should be guided by the paramount interests of the population rather than the strategic value of the islands.

20. The representative of Australia emphasized that the problem of the economic and social development of all the Pacific Islands, with the exception of New Guinea, was different from that of other dependent Territories because the islands constituted tiny isolated land masses scattered throughout a vast area of some 3 million square miles of ocean. The last United Nations Visiting Mission to the Pacific Islands had recognized that fundamental reality and it should be borne in mind in considering the forms of independence to be granted to the inhabitants.

21. The most important political development in the Trust Territory had been the election by universal suffrage of a genuinely representative Congress of Micronesia. Although the powers of that body remained to be worked out between the Administering Authority and the people of the Territory, the soundness of that move was beyond all question. Similarly, the Administering Authority was to be commended for its efforts to accelerate economic and educational advancement: the United States Congress was considering a grant of $300 million to the Territory for capital development and a five-year operational programme as well as the possibility of utilizing the Peace Corps to relieve the shortage of teachers and fill other gaps in the educational programme.

22. The positive measures taken by the administering Power in Guam also reflected a sound approach to its responsibility for leading the Territory towards full self-government. The bill introduced in the United States Congress providing for the direct election of the Governor by the people of Guam had been passed by the House of Representatives and sent to the Senate for final approval. On the proposal of the Constitutional Review Committee, a Constitutional Convention was to be convened in October 1966 to discuss the Committee's recommendations for changes in the political and legislative structure. For purposes of economic development, $29.3 million of an anticipated $45 million had already been appropriated under the Guam Rehabilitation Act and extensive powers had been given to the Economic Development Agency. In view of those significant steps to promote the balanced development of the island, the Australian delegation looked forward to further rapid progress in Guam.

23. In American Samoa, there were no special problems likely to cause undue concern on the part of the United Nations. Indeed, as The New York Times had reported on 24 August, "prospering Samoa" was emerging as a "showcase of the South Seas". The people of the Territory were satisfied with the prevailing situation and there was no movement for union with independent Western Samoa. It would be recalled, moreover, that it had taken the United States Congress some twenty-five years to ratify the voluntary cession of the island to the United States by the erstwhile indigenous chiefs, indicating that possession of Guam had not resulted from any "mad grab" of territory. Since the Samoan Legislature had ratified the 1960 Constitution, American Samoa had a two-chamber Congress which gave full scope to the traditional chieftaincy or matai system while at the same time introducing modern, democratic concepts of government. The people of the island were successfully combining the best of both worlds and clearly knew what they wanted. In the circumstances, it would be unwise to force the pace of their political advancement.

24. The representative of Sierra Leone concurred in the view that the geographical situation of the islands under discussion and their small size set them apart from most other dependent Territories, and that the economic viability presented a very complex problem. Moreover, inasmuch as the Guamanians were United States citizens eligible to vote at eighteen years of age, the Samoan nationals of the United States were eligible to vote at twenty and the inhabitants of the Pacific Islands wards of the United States with no established voting age, there seemed to be no uniform pattern of United States administration. He would welcome some clarification on that subject. Similarly, while Guam had at least two political parties, one of which was associated with the major political party in the United States and sought to bring Guam into the Union as a fifty-first state, the Committee had no information concerning the organization of political parties in American Samoa or the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands. Although the efforts of the administering Power to stimulate the Guamanian economy by developing tourism might be beneficial, the island was still overwhelmingly dependent on the economic advantages derived from its use as a military base. He hoped that the administering Power would reorient its efforts toward the development of Guam's agricultural and industrial resources. The United States should also endeavour to ensure the training of the skilled technical, administrative and economic personnel required for development in the three Territories.

25. Despite unmistakable signs of economic and social progress, the Territories under United States administration were advancing only very slowly towards self-government and independence. Although the local government councils and the Congress of Micronesia were representative bodies, they did not exercise efficient control over legislation: the United States, through the Governor or Administration, retained the power of veto. He therefore urged the United States to accelerate the political and constitutional development of the islands so that they could rapidly attain the goals established in resolution 1514 (XV). The United Nations Visiting Mission which was to go to the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands in February 1967 should increase the people's awareness of their right to self-determination and independence, inform them of the various political alternatives open to them, including continued association with the former Administering Authority, and provide Member States with specific information enabling them to assess the needs of the islanders more accurately.

26. The representative of the United States of America referred the Sub-Committee to the Administering Authority's recent report to the Trusteeship Council for a detailed account of economic and political developments in the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands. The comprehensive economic survey of the Territory which had recently been completed was expected to establish realistic guidelines for future economic development and the United States administration had substantially increased its 1966 budgetary request. The two-year-old Micronesian Congress was functioning well, and would undoubtedly play an important role in charting the Territory's future development.

27. The economic report on Guam recently prepared under the aegis of a joint Federal-Territorial Commission and submitted to the United States Congress in March 1966 had recommended the development of certain major areas to strengthen and diversify Guam's economy: the establishment of industry for the export of locally produced or assembled high-tariff goods to the United States, the substitution of locally produced goods for imported goods on the domestic market, especially agricultural products, and the development of tourism. Steps had already been taken in all those fields: in 1965 Guam's first watch-assembly plant had been established, farm production figures had doubled and the first 1,300-passenger cruise ship had visited Guam in the fiscal year 1965. In addition, a large slaughter-house was planned to reduce the level of meat imports and the Economic Development Authority recently created by the Guam legislature was currently discussing with outside investors the construction of a wheat processing plant to promote United States wheat sales in the Far East. Other plans were being implemented for the completion of a $1 million air terminal and a possible new commercial port and priority consideration was being given to increasing hotel capacity on the island. While Guam lacked local industrial resources, its potentialities as a processing and servicing centre were considerable.

28. The bill now before the United States Senate for the direct election of the Governor of Guam represented a significant step towards self-government for the island. A popularly elected Governor of Guam would serve as the chief executive of the Territory with full executive powers, and would be responsible for the execution of the laws of Guam and United States laws applicable in Guam. Moreover, the increasing participation of Guamanians in the administration of the island had been confirmed by the Governor's report for the fiscal year 1965-1966 stating that 2,227 of the 2,669 regular employees of the executive staff of the Government of Guam were Guamanians. Of the remainder, 224 were United States citizens from outside Guam. The Governor himself was a Guamanian.

29. The Constitutional Review Committee of American Samoa had proposed, inter alia, that the powers of the Legislature in the budgetary field be broadened. It had further suggested that the qualifications of the members of the Legislature be changed to render it more fully representative, that the maximum length of the annual legislative session should be extended and the number of days allowed to the Governor for taking action on legislative bills reduced. It had recommended deletion of the constitutional provision empowering the Governor to promulgate laws he had designated as "urgent" when the Legislature failed to act, as well as the provision limiting the number of executive departments in the Samoan Government and prohibiting the establishment of new instrumentalities without prior approval of the Secretary of the Interior. No action had as yet been taken concerning the composition of the Constitutional Convention which was to study those proposals in October, but the Convention would probably include the Legislature as well as local representatives.

Conclusions of the Sub-Committee

30. (a) The Sub-Committee feels that, though the administering Power has taken some positive steps, the progress towards full self-determination and self-government is not adequate.

(b) The administering Power still retains considerable powers of control in the executive and legislative spheres, thus restricting the exercise of self-government by the people of the Territories. The political institutions and executive machinery are not fully representative of the people.

(c) The Sub-Committee notes the various plans announced by the administering Power to strengthen the economies of the Territories. The Sub-Committee feels that the administering Power should further intensify its efforts to exploit and develop the indigenous resources in the Territories. The Sub-Committee is particularly aware of the dependence of the economy of Guam on the military and other activities of the Government of the United States.

(d) The Sub-Committee notes that the legislation providing for direct election of the Governor of Guam is expected to be enacted by the Congress of the United States in the near future. The Committee also notes that a constitutional convention is to be convened in American Samoa in October 1966 to draft a new constitution for the Territory. Notwithstanding these developments, the Sub-Committee notes that there is no time-table of effective measures for a speedy implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

Recommendations of the Sub-Committee

31. (a) The Sub-Committee reaffirms the inalienable right of the people of American Samoa, Guam and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands to self-government and independence in conformity with the Declaration contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

(b) The administering Power should accelerate the further political development of the Territories by expanding the functions and powers of legislature and by vesting executive authority in the hands of indigenous population.

(c) The Sub-Committee urges the administering Power to expedite further the economic growth of the Territories by fully developing their agricultural and industrial potential and, particularly in the case of Guam, to implement as speedily as possible its plans for the diversification of the economy. In this regard, the assistance of the United Nations and its specialized agencies could be utilized most effectively.

(d) The administering Power is requested to increase the educational and training facilities for the people of the Territories.

(e) A visit to the Territories by the Special Committee is necessary and would be most useful, for, in addition to familiarizing the Member States with the needs and aspirations of the people, it would also increase the peoples' awareness of their rights which have been guaranteed to them by the United Nations.

CHAPTER XIX*

TRUST TERRITORY OF NAURU, PAPUA AND THE TRUST TERRITORY OF NEW GUINEA, AND COCOS (KEELING) ISLANDSA. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE IN 1964 AND BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS TWENTIETH SESSION

1. After considering the Trust Territory of Nauru, Papua and the Trust Territory of New Guinea and the Cocos (Keeling) Islands in November 1964, the Special Committee recommended that the peoples of these Territories should be enabled to express their wishes in accordance with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) through well-established democratic processes under United Nations supervision. It further recommended that a visiting mission would be useful in order to assess the political climate and the aspirations of the peoples, and that steps might be taken to arrange such a visit in consultation with the administering Power (A/5800/Rev.1,¹ chap. XIX, paras. 144-155).

2. It recommended concerning Nauru that the implementation of resolution 1514 (XV) and the resettlement of the Nauruans, being distinct questions, should be settled independently, with precedence given to the first, as desired by the Nauruans. It requested the Administering Authority to assist fully in the future resettlement of the Nauruans according to their wishes. It recommended that they should be given full control over their natural economic resources and that the Administering Authority should continue to pursue negotiations to this end.

3. Regarding Papua and the Trust Territory of New Guinea, the Special Committee requested the administering Power to take urgent steps to implement the provisions of resolution 1514 (XV), and, in consultation with the House of Assembly, to take further constitutional steps aimed at the abolition of special and reserved seats in the latter and at the implementation of resolution 1514 (XV). It recommended that existing disparities in the wages of the indigenous people should receive immediate attention with a view to their elimination. It recommended that local government councils should be strengthened in order to give the population the possibility of exercising self-government in municipal matters. It felt that efforts in the economic field and the field of education should continue at an accelerated pace.

4. At its twentieth session, the General Assembly, after considering the chapters of the reports of the Special Committee concerning Nauru (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. XIX; and A/6000/Rev.1,² chap. XVIII) and the report of the Trusteeship Council,³ adopted resolution 2111 (XX) of 21 December 1965. By this resolution, the Assembly endorsed the conclusions and recommendations of the Special Committee, and called upon the Administering Authority to take immediate steps to implement the proposal of the representatives of the Nauruan people for the establishment of a Legislative Council by 31 January 1966. It requested the Administering Authority to fix the earliest possible date, but one not later than 31 January 1968, for the independence of the Nauruans in accordance with their wishes. It further requested that immediate steps be taken by the Administering Authority towards restoring the island of Nauru for habitation by its people as a sovereign nation. It called upon the Administering Authority to report to the Trusteeship Council at its thirty-third session on the implementation of the resolution.

5. At the same session the General Assembly, after considering the chapters of the reports of the Special Committee concerning Papua and the Trust Territory of New Guinea (ibid.) and the report of the Trusteeship Council,³ adopted resolution 2112 (XX) of 21 December 1965. By this resolution, the Assembly endorsed the recommendations and conclusions of the Special Committee, and called upon the Administering Authority to implement fully General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and, to this end, to fix an early date for independence in accordance with the freely expressed wishes of the people. It requested the Administering Authority to report to the Trusteeship Council at its thirty-third session and to the Special Committee on the implementation of the resolution. It further requested the Trusteeship Council and the Special Committee to report to the Assembly at its twenty-first session.

6. At the same session, the General Assembly, after considering the chapters of the reports of the Special Committee concerning the Cocos (Keeling) Islands (ibid.), adopted resolution 2069 (XX) on 16 December 1965, endorsing the conclusions and recommendations contained therein, and calling upon the administering Power to implement without delay the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly. It requested the administering Power to allow visiting missions to visit the Territory and to extend to them full co-operation and assistance. Finally, it requested the Special Committee to examine the situation in the Territory and to report on the implementation of the resolution to the Assembly at its twenty-first session.

B. INFORMATION ON THE TERRITORIES

7. Information on the Trust Territory of Nauru, Papua and the Trust Territory of New Guinea is already contained in the reports of the Special Committee to the General Assembly at its nineteenth and twentieth sessions (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. XIX; and A/6000/Rev.1, chap. XVIII). Supplementary information is set out below.⁴

⁴ The information on the Trust Territories of Nauru and New Guinea presented here is derived from information before the Trusteeship Council at its thirty-third session, in particular the reports of the Administering Authority for the period 1 July 1964 to 30 June 1965 (A/6363 and A/6364). The information on Papua has been derived from published reports and from the information transmitted to the Secretary-General by Australia under Article 73 e of the Charter on 5 August 1966, for the year ending 30 June 1965. The information on the Cocos (Keeling) Islands was transmitted by Australia on 2 February 1965, for the year ending 30 June 1964.

1. Trust Territory of Nauru

General

8. The total population of Nauru at 30 June 1965 was 5,561, comprising 2,734 Nauruans, 1,481 other Pacific Islanders, 900 Chinese and 446 Europeans.

Future of the Nauruan community

9. The question of the future of the Nauruan community has been of special concern for some time because the phosphate deposits on the Territory will be exhausted in approximately thirty years. Investigations have been made of Curtis Island which has been proposed as a future home for the Nauruans. In its report for 1964-1965, the Administering Authority states that it has complied with the requests of the Nauruans: not to proceed with the proposal to acquire Curtis Island for a future home; and to establish an independent technical committee to examine what would be involved in and the practicability of the rehabilitation of the worked-out phosphate lands. The Committee convened in January 1966, and on 8 June submitted its report to the Minister for Territories and to the Legislative Council of Nauru. The report has not yet been made public.

Political and constitutional developments

10. Formerly Nauru had no executive or legislative council. Pursuant to an agreement reached in discussions with representatives of the Nauruans in June 1965, provision was made in the Nauru Act of 1965 for the establishment of an Executive and a Legislative Council.⁵ The Legislative Council with an elected Nauruan majority was inaugurated in January 1966. In addition to the nine elected Nauruan members, the Council has five appointed official members. At its second meeting, the Legislative Council appointed a Select Committee, consisting of five of its elected members, "to inquire into and report upon the most suitable means by which the people of Nauru can achieve complete independence by January 1968".

11. At the thirty-third session of the Trusteeship Council the Administering Authority expressed the view that talks on further political progress should be held within two or three years after the establishment of the Legislative and Executive Councils. At the same session, the Head Chief of Nauru informed the Trusteeship Council that he did not believe there would be any difficulty in arranging for talks to be held in 1967.

Economic conditions

12. Phosphate is the sole export of the Territory. The British Phosphate Commissioners are responsible for the direction and management of the phosphate industry, including the extraction and export of phosphate.

13. In its report for 1964-1965 (A/6363), the Administering Authority stated that the tonnage of phosphate delivered for the year ending 30 June 1965 amounted to 1,688,998 tons, compared with 1,653,090 tons in 1963-1964; its value for the year ending 30 June 1965 amounted to £4,771,419 compared with £4,422,016 in 1963-1964. The report also stated that it is expected that at a rate of extraction of about

2 million tons per year, the life of the deposits will be approximately thirty years.

14. The total imports, chiefly from Australia, amounted to £2,297,899 in 1964-1965 compared with £5504,100 in 1963-1964.

15. Public revenue for the year 1964-1965 totalled £650,444, of which the British Phosphate Commissioners provided £607,594. The total expenditure was £770,095.

16. In its report for 1964-1965 the Administering Authority stated that the Nauruans and the Administering Authority had agreed to discuss future arrangements for the operation of the mining industry in the first half of 1966. During its thirty-third session the Trusteeship Council was informed that discussions began in June, and after an exchange of views, were adjourned until October or November 1966. The Council was informed by the Head Chief of Nauru that the Nauruans were seeking ownership of the industry and could not accept a fifty-fifty share in a partnership arrangement on the rest of the life of the phosphate industry on Nauru. They considered that the British Phosphate Commissioners should remain as managing agents on the islands and that they would pay them a fair fee. The Nauruans were prepared to buy the equipment the British Phosphate Commissioners had on Nauru and they would compensate them for it. These questions would be discussed in more detail at a conference in Canberra.

17. He also stated that the Nauruan people disputed the point of view of the Administering Authority that the deposits were owned by the British Phosphate Commissioners, and insisted that they were the owners of the phosphates and did not recognize the right of the British Phosphate Commissioners.

Report of the Trusteeship Council in 1966

18. The Trusteeship Council, at its thirty-third session in July 1966, completed its examination of the annual report of the Administering Authority on Nauru for the period 1 July 1964 to 30 June 1965 (A/6363).

19. By a letter dated 25 July 1966 (A/AC.109/191), the President of the Trusteeship Council informed the Chairman of the Special Committee that the Council had adopted a report on the Trust Territory of Nauru for submission to the General Assembly (see A/6304). The report contains, in addition to the Trusteeship Council's conclusions and recommendations, and the observations of its individual members, detailed information on political, economic, social and educational conditions.

2. Papua and the Trust Territory of New Guinea

General

20. The combined Territories, at 30 June 1965, had an enumerated indigenous population of 2,092,807 and an additional estimated one of 25,110. The non-indigenous population was estimated to total 31,486.

Political and constitutional developments

21. Papua and the Trust Territory are administered jointly with administrative headquarters at Port Moresby. The legislature for the two Territories, the House of Assembly, consists of fifty-four members elected on a common roll by adult suffrage, and ten nominated official members. Forty-four elective seats are open to candidates of all races and ten are special seats reserved for non-indigenous inhabitants.

22. The Select Committee of the House of Assembly presented interim reports in November 1965 and June 1966. The Committee was appointed in 1965 "to draft for the consideration of the House of Assembly a set of constitutional proposals to serve as a guide for future constitutional development in the Territory". At its thirty-third session the Trusteeship Council was informed that the Committee, the Chairman of which is an elected indigenous member, had travelled extensively in the Territory obtaining the opinions of a large cross-section of the community, and that the Committee's terms of reference were wide and its inquiries encompassed not only the composition of the House of Assembly but also proposals for the future constitutional development of the Territory. It was also informed that in order to meet any contingent need for possible amendments to the Papua and New Guinea Act, it would be necessary for the Committee's report on the composition of the House of Assembly to be presented to the House by August 1966.

23. The Administering Authority states that the extension of the system of local government councils has significantly increased since July 1965, and that with the introduction of the Local Government Ordinance in January 1966 provision was made for wider powers and functions for local government councils. The exercise of central government control by field officers was removed and instead invested in a Commissioner for Local Government. Council budgets are not now subject to approval, but merely to certification that the expenditure proposed is likely to be met from revenue.

Economic conditions

24. Primary production is the basis of the economy of both Papua and the Trust Territory of New Guinea. Agriculture is the chief activity, and in 1964-1965 agricultural exports comprised 90 per cent of the total exports of Papua and approximately 86 per cent of the Trust Territory's exports.

25. The principal agricultural exports of Papua are copra and rubber; those of the Trust Territory are copra, cocoa and coffee. An important timber industry based on the Trust Territory's extensive forest resources is being developed. Gold mining, although now declining, is still an important activity. A cattle industry is being developed. Manufacturing industries are of minor though growing significance.

26. Although subsistence agriculture is still the predominant activity of the indigenous population, increasing numbers of Papuans and New Guineans are growing export crops or cash crops for local sale. During 1964-1965, indigenous growers produced approximately one half of the copra and three quarters of the coffee grown in Papua, while their plantings of cocoa trees now total approximately 947,500. Indigenous growers now produce just over one quarter of the copra, about one quarter of the cocoa and just under half the coffee produced in New Guinea.

27. The following table shows the public finances of the Territories:

	1963-1964			1964-1965
	Papua	New Guinea	Total	Papua	New Guinea	Total
(Million Australian pounds)
Internal revenue	5.24	6.13	11.37	6.51	7.45	13.96
Australian grant	10.01	15.23	25.24	11.00	16.93	27.99
Total revenue	15.25	21.36	36.61	17.57	24.38	41.95
Total expenditure	15.89	22.43	38.52	18.69	26.34	45.03

28. The Administering Authority provided a grant of $A68,820,000⁶ towards the cost of the 1965-1966 combined territorial budget. Expenditure on economic activity rose from approximately 25 per cent in 1963-1964 to approximately 33 per cent in the 1965-1966 budget. The total revenue for 1965-1966 was estimated at $A102,340,000, of which the sums of $A34,200,000 and $A6,140,000 were expected to be raised respectively by internal revenue allocations and from territory loan subscriptions. For the period 1 July 1965 to 31 March 1966 internal receipts within Papua and the Trust Territory amounted to $A23,113,000. The total expenditure for 1965-1966 was estimated at approximately $A102,340,000, and total works expenditure during 1965-1966 amounted to $A27.6 million, representing an increase of $A4.7 million over the previous year.

29. Companies active in Papua and the Trust Territory paid some £4.6 million in dividends and £1.5 million in taxes during 1964-1965 on taxable incomes of £10.4 million derived in 1963-1964. Corresponding figures for the previous year were £2.5 million, £1.1 million and £6.9 million respectively.

30. Following the recommendation made by the mission of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (IBRD) which visited the Territories in 1963, an economic adviser was appointed in October 1965.

31. In November 1965, the House of Assembly passed a bill to establish a Development Bank, the main purpose of which would be to stimulate development in primary production and in industrial or commercial undertakings, on more generous terms and conditions than would be available through banking channels. The Bank will be controlled and managed by a Board of Directors, and the twelve members of the Board will include representatives of indigenous producers.

Social conditions in Papua

Labour

32. Although there have been steady increases in the numbers of indigenous people engaged in wage employment in recent years, the proportion of wage-earners to the estimated adult male indigenous population is still relatively small (approximately 13 per cent). While large numbers of the Territory's labour force are still engaged in unskilled work on plantations or in the towns, there is emerging a body of more highly skilled and experienced workers who are capable to a much greater extent than previously of negotiating their own wages and conditions of employment.

33. At 31 March 1965 there were 29,234 indigenous people in paid employment (including 1,159 members of the police force but excluding members of the defence forces) compared with 25,147 at 31 March 1964. Private industry employed 19,124, of whom 9,839 were general plantation workers, compared with 16,270 of whom 6,301 were general plantation workers in 1964.

Public health

34. Expenditure on health services totalled £1,498,355 for the period 1964-1965; expenditure on works and services of a capital nature and on the improvement and maintenance of hospital facilities and equipment amounted to £709,700. The cost of hospital and medical equipment amounted to £40,865. The corresponding figures for the period 1963-1964 were £1,344,924 and £694,242. Local government councils reported an expenditure on health services of £22,059 to 31 December 1964 compared with £13,928 in 1963.

35. The missions are assisted by the Administration through a system of grants-in-aid and by the supply of drugs, dressings and equipment. The grants-in-aid and monetary value of supplies totalled £47,349 for the period 1964-1965 and grants-in-aid for the construction of mission hospitals amounted to £15,610, compared with £85,270 and £18,458 for the period 1963-1964. The ascertainable expenditure by missions from their own funds on medical services was £45,006 for 1964-1965, compared with £75,744 for 1963-1964.

Educational conditions in Papua

36. At 30 June 1965 there were 171 administration schools and 668 mission schools, compared with 169 and 733 in the previous year. The decrease in the number of mission schools was due to the raising educational standards. The number of pupils also decreased during the same period from 73,523 to 71,506. The following table gives the number of pupils in the various schools in 1965.

School	Indigenous pupils	Non-indigenous pupils
Primary	62,822	1,547
High	2,825	195
Technical	984	—
Teacher-training	367	38
Correspondence	2,728	—
TOTAL	69,726	1,780

37. In addition to pupils in Papua in 1965, fifty-four indigenous and 584 non-indigenous students were receiving educational assistance at Australian secondary schools. Nine Papuan students were undertaking higher education in Australia: six at university in faculties of law, agricultural science, social studies and arts; one at an agricultural college, and two at a technical college.

38. The commission appointed by the Australian Government in 1963 to report on higher education recommended the establishment at an early date of a university and an institute of higher technical education. The University of Papua and New Guinea Ordinance and the Institute of Higher Technical Education Ordinance were passed in 1965 and a number of appointments have been made to the University and the Institute. The first degree courses in arts and law will commence at the University in 1967. A preliminary year of studies for students of the University began in February 1966 with fifty-eight students. Courses at the Institute of Higher Education will begin in 1967.

39. Departmental expenditure on education rose from £1,504,000 in 1963-1964 to £1,926,000 in 1964-1965, or 10 per cent of total government expenditure. These figures include grants-in-aid of £134,000 and £171,000 respectively to missions to assist in their educational work. In addition, the expenditure of other departments on education and training increased from £312,000 to £492,000, while building construction and equipment expenditures declined from £646,000 to £324,000. Expenditure by missions from their own funds increased from £177,000 in 1963-1964 to £261,000 in 1964-1965.

Report of the Trusteeship Council in 1966 on New Guinea

40. The Trusteeship Council, at its thirty-third session in July 1966, completed its examination of the annual report of the Administering Authority on the Trust Territory of New Guinea for the period 1 July 1964 to 30 June 1965 (A/6364).

41. By a letter dated 25 July 1966 (A/AC.109/191), the President of the Trusteeship Council informed the Chairman of the Special Committee that the Council had adopted a report on the Trust Territory of New Guinea for submission to the General Assembly (see A/6304). The report contains, in addition to the Council's recommendations and conclusions, and the observations of its individual members, detailed information on political, economic, social and educational conditions in the Trust Territory and on institutions common to the two Territories.

3. Cocos (Keeling) Islands

General

42. The Cocos (Keeling) Islands are a group of small coral islands situated in the Indian Ocean with a total land area of five square miles. In 1964, three were inhabited and the total population consisted of 463 Cocos Islanders and 200 Europeans. The Cocos Islanders live on Horne Island and the Europeans live on West Island and Direction Island.

Political development

43. There have been no significant recent changes in the administration of the Territory. An Official Representative, appointed by the Australian Minister of State for Territories, continues to exercise and perform such powers and functions in the Territory as are delegated to him by the Minister or conferred upon him by the Cocos (Keeling) Act, 1955-1963. Under present arrangements he is responsible for general administration, including health and education. There are no elected offices in the Territory.

Economic conditions

44. The economy of the Territory is based on an international airport, a cable station and other facilities maintained by the Commonwealth Government and commercial organizations; and on the production and export of copra produced on the plantation of the Clunies-Ross Estate. Under the indenture granted in 1886, all land in the Territory above the high water mark is held in perpetuity by the Clunies-Ross family. The grant is subject to conditions allowing Her Majesty to resume any of the land for specified purposes. Small quantities of vegetables are grown on one island, but because of limitations of soil and water on the other two inhabited islands, all supplies of fruit and vegetables are imported.

45. Expenditure on administration and on capital works and services is financed from funds appropriated by the Commonwealth Government. Some revenue is derived locally from nursing and from other sources such as hospital fees, which in 1963-1964 amounted to £A3,624. Expenditures for this period totalled £A41,787.

Social conditions

46. Cocos Islanders are employed by the Clunies-Ross Estate mainly in the production of copra and in maintaining community services. The Estate also undertakes construction, maintenance and repair work for government authorities and private organizations. Social services comprise pensions in excess of 50 per cent of wages for workers who have reached 65 years of age, and free health services and education.

47. A medical officer, two nurses and a four-bed hospital provide medical services in the Territory. Europeans are charged for medical services. Charges for services to Cocos Islanders are met by the Clunies-Ross Estate.

Educational conditions

48. Elementary education provided by the Clunies-Ross Estate on Horne Island for the children of its employees comprises two to three years' schooling in the vernacular (Malay). On West Island, the Administration maintains a primary school for European children which follows the West Australian syllabus. It had an enrolment of thirty-two pupils in 1964.

C. CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

49. At its 469th meeting on 29 September 1966, the Special Committee considered the report of Sub-Committee II on the Trust Territory of Nauru, Papua and the Trust Territory of New Guinea, and the Cocos (Keeling) Islands, which appears as an annex to this chapter.

50. The representative of Australia said that the whole concept of independence and the essential ingredients of independence were being discussed with the representatives of the Nauruan people. The question was a complex one, in view of the small population of Nauru and its dependence on a single product, namely phosphates. The island community had reached a high level of prosperity, but the population was increasing rapidly and the question of the possibility of continued economic existence on the island was of much concern to the Nauruans and to the Australian Government. Attempts to reach agreement on an alternative homeland for the Nauruans had so far been unsuccessful, but the possibility of resettlement in a new homeland was not dead. A Legislative Council had only recently been established. It was in the light of all those factors that Australia was continuing to discuss the question of independence with the Nauruan leaders.

51. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that an examination of the situation in the Trust Territories administered by Australia showed that the Administering Authority had done practically nothing to implement the resolutions which the General Assembly had adopted at its twentieth session and which made specific recommendations regarding the advance of the people of those Territories to self-determination and independence. As could be seen from the report of Sub-Committee II (see annex) and the Secretariat working papers (see paras. 7-48 above), there had been little progress in the political field since the Special Committee had last examined conditions in the Territories. His delegation shared the conclusion of the Sub-Committee that progress towards the implementation of the Declaration in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) had been slow. The Soviet Union delegation therefore supported the Tanzanian amendment to paragraph 29 (f) of the Sub-Committee's report.

52. In the other Territories administered by Australia, too, the progress towards self-determination had been minimal and Australia was refusing to establish a definite time-table for the granting of independence to those countries. Indeed, the Australian Minister for Territories had stated earlier that year that Australia did not intend to leave Papua and New Guinea. The Soviet Union delegation shared the opinion expressed by the representative of Sierra Leone that the administering Power appeared to be making no attempt to prepare the Cocos Islands for self-determination and possible independence.

53. The situation in the economic field was equally discouraging. Only the activities that returned huge profits on foreign capital were being developed, namely, copra, cocoa, coffee, timber and phosphates. As a result, the Territories were compelled to import the basic necessities of life. Foreign monopolies occupied a dominant position in the Territories and were ruthlessly exploiting their human and natural resources.

54. The representative of Australia had informed the Special Committee that the economy of Nauru was highly dependent on the mining of the phosphate deposits and that the deposits were gradually being worked out. He had not said, however, that those resources were being plundered by foreign Powers and primarily by the British Phosphate Commissioners, who paid the Nauruan people $A2 per ton, whereas the enriched phosphate was sold on the world market for $40 per ton. It was known that in 1964-65 companies operating in the Territories of Papua and New Guinea alone had received an income of £10.4 million.

55. Australian representatives in various bodies of the United Nations cited impressive figures as proof of the efforts that Australia was making to develop the Territories under its administration. An analysis showed, however, that in the Territory of New Guinea, the per capita amount devoted to the development of the Territory was only $15.

56. The information given in the report indicated that the Administering Authority was not making sufficient efforts to provide the people of the Territories with education, particularly higher technical training. It was known that there was racial discrimination in the Territories, particularly in New Guinea and Papua. The Administering Authority claimed that it was doing everything possible to eradicate such discrimination, but the laws in force in New Guinea and Papua testified to the fact that the Administering Authority itself was to a certain extent responsible for the existence of racial discrimination in those countries. It was sufficient to recall that the Act of 1964 concerning civil servants had established a salary scale under which Australians received a higher salary than the indigenous inhabitants.

57. The Soviet Union delegation considered it necessary to draw attention to the fact that Australia was using the Trust Territories under its administration to build military bases, in violation of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX). In New Guinea there were several airfields which served as bases for bombers of the Australian Air Force. According to press reports, the General Headquarters of the Papua and New Guinea division of the Australian naval forces was situated on the island of Manus. The same newspaper article had mentioned the possibility that the base was being used also by the United States of America. The Soviet Union delegation had already drawn attention to the fact that certain bases established by Australia on Trust Territories were used as transit points for troops that were being sent to Viet-Nam to crush the national liberation movement in South-East Asia.

58. The representative of Australia, speaking in exercise of the right of reply, said that there were no military bases in the Trust Territories under his Government's administration. There were, however, certain defence installations which his country had set up partly as a result of his country's experience in the Second World War, in which it had suffered 15,000 casualties in action in Papua and New Guinea. Moreover, under the Trusteeship Agreement, Australia was responsible for the protection of the inhabitants of the Territories under its administration. He stressed that none of the airfields in New Guinea had ever been used to support Australian operations in Viet-Nam.

59. With regard to the USSR representative's remark that progress towards self-determination had been minimal, he would point out that there was a Parliament in New Guinea elected on the basis of a "common roll", one man one vote (with no regard to race, creed or colour), and having a substantial indigenous majority so elected. Even as it went upon its parliamentary business, this very representative House of Assembly was revising its own form and strengthening its own powers through the operation of its own Committee of Constitutional Review on which the elected indigenous majority was strongly represented. This Committee was in the process of making recommendations for the next great constitutional advance (to follow a series of earlier constitutional advances made in accordance with the Australian Government's theory of orderly, progressive and constitutional development). He hoped to be able to inform the appropriate bodies of the United Nations shortly (and possibly before the end of the current General Assembly session) of the recommendations of that Committee as they then stood and of the action which was proposed by the Australian Government in relation to them. But that Parliament, elected on the basis of a universal franchise, and with its indigenous majority, was merely the pinnacle of a political development which had its roots deep in the soil and among the people through the vast network of local government councils that spread over the Territory. There were 123 of those councils in the Territory of Papua and New Guinea, representative of approximately 1.5 million people, who elected the council members on the basis of adult suffrage. Those councils had substantial and increasing powers of local government and, moreover, many of them were representative of all races in the community; the representatives of those races were legislating at the local level together, on the basis of complete equality, for matters affecting all races in the community. Thus approximately three-quarters of the entire population of the Territory were covered by local government council activity, a result which even the most optimistic forecast could scarcely have predicted as recently as one year ago, and certainly could not have predicted two years ago.

60. The situation in the economic field was certainly not discouraging. In accordance with the recommendations of the United Nations, the Australian Government had arranged for a mission of the IBRD to visit the Territory in 1963 and was following the lines of development suggested by that mission.

61. The Soviet Union representative had suggested that Australia was fostering only such activities in Papua and New Guinea as would not compete with Australian industries. He would point out that Australia was building up the industries most suited to the Territories, in accordance with the recommendations of the International Bank. One of the industries which offered great potential for success was the cattle industry; it was common knowledge that cattle-breeding was one of Australia's most important industries. Timber production (which was second only to copra as a territory product and as an export earner) was another industry which Australia was vigorously promoting in the Territory, yet it was well known that his country was a large producer of timber from its own extensive forest areas.

62. The annual income of the Territories came under two headings: interest-free and non-repayable grants made by the Australian Government, and revenue produced in the Territories themselves. Over the past ten years, that grant had risen from $US20 million to about $US80 million. In addition, the Australian budget carried substantial sums in respect of Australian Government departments operating in the Territories. In all, Australia had provided about $US100 million for development in Papua and New Guinea. In addition, he would point out that, in the 1966-1967 budget, the internal revenue of the Territory had reached a record high figure of approximately $US48 million. As was well known, every cent of this locally raised revenue was spent by Australia directly in and for the Territory.

63. Lastly, with regard to Nauru, he would point out that the representative of the Soviet Union had given a misleading picture in comparing the royalty figure payable to the Nauruans with a market price for super-phosphate in Australia of some $40 odd per ton. A more correct figure would be of the order of $24 to $25 per ton (depending on local factors, point of delivery, etc.).

64. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics considered that, since Australia had been administering the Territories for several decades, the political development of the Territories of New Guinea and Papua should have made far more progress. The fact was that little had been done to prepare the indigenous inhabitants for self-determination and independence.

65. Since six of the ten members of the constitutional review committee were Australians, including three highly placed colonial officers, it was not surprising that the committee had been unable to work out specific measures for bringing the Territories to self-government or to recommend a specific date for the granting of independence.

66. With regard to the Australian representative's statement that the Territories were not used as transit points for troops being sent to Viet-Nam, he would point out that the Soviet Union delegation had already presented evidence on that point. Moreover, according to an article in the South Pacific Post of 2 June 1965, Australian aircraft had provided air cover for an Australian military transport carrying troops to Viet-Nam and an airfield on New Guinea and other strong points had been used as transit bases.

D. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON THE REPORT OF SUB-COMMITTEE II

67. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania thought that the recommendation in paragraph 29 (f) of the Sub-Committee's report (see annex) did not go far enough in merely asking the administering Power to "do its utmost to fulfil the desire of the people of Nauru to become independent by January 1968". According to paragraph 8 of the report, a decision on the matter "would largely depend on the experience gained by the Nauruans through the recently established Legislative Council". That position seemed to reveal a paternalistic assumption that the Nauruans were not capable of thinking for themselves. He suggested that paragraph 29 (f) should be amended to read: "The administering Power should take concrete measures in conformity with the provisions of resolution 1514 (XV) to fulfil the desire of the people...".

68. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that although the recommendations and conclusions in the report of Sub-Committee II were generally positive, his delegation did not think that they went far enough. They should also condemn the use of the Trust Territories as transit points for troops being sent to South-East Asia for purposes of aggression.

69. The representative of the United States of America reserved her delegation's position on the Sub-Committee's report, particularly with regard to the recommendation for the dispatch of a visiting mission. She pointed out that visiting missions were regularly sent to the various Territories by the Trusteeship Council.

70. The representative of Australia reserved his delegation's position on the Sub-Committee's report, partly because he felt that certain facts and developments may not have been as clearly represented as they should have been, partly because, as the representative of the Administering Authority, it was not for him to make recommendations to his own Government.

71. The representative of the United Kingdom reserved his Government's position on the Sub-Committee's report.

72. At its 469th meeting on 29 September 1966, the Special Committee approved without objection the report of Sub-Committee II on the Trust Territory of Nauru, Papua and the Trust Territory of New Guinea, and Cocos (Keeling) Islands (see annex), and endorsed the conclusions and recommendations therein, as amended by the substitution of the words "take concrete measures in conformity with the provisions of resolution 1514 (XV)" for the words "do its utmost" in paragraph 29 (f).

73. The conclusions and recommendations adopted by the Special Committee are as follows.

Conclusions

General

(a) The Special Committee notes with satisfaction the declaration of the administering Power that its policy is to work for the social, educational, economic and political advancement of the people of these Territories.

(b) It considers that the progress towards the implementation of the Declaration contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) has been slow.

Trust Territory of Nauru

(c) The Special Committee notes that the Nauruan people have expressed their desire to achieve independence by 31 January 1968.

(d) It is aware of the serious problems relating to the resettlement of the people of Nauru.

(e) It notes with satisfaction that a Legislative Council has been set up in Nauru. It feels, however, that the powers of the Legislative Council are restricted.

(f) It notes that talks are to be held shortly between the people of the Territory and the representatives of the Administering Authority regarding the ownership of and control over the operations of the phosphate industry.

Papua and the Trust Territory of New Guinea

(g) The Special Committee takes note of the political and constitutional changes in the Territories, particularly the establishment of the House of Assembly and the increase in the number of local government councils. It urges the administering Power to take further immediate measures whereby the House of Assembly can function as a fully representative and effective body.

(h) It takes into account the efforts of the Australian Government for the economic and social development of the Territory, particularly the establishment of the University of Papua-New Guinea.

Cocos (Keeling) Islands

(i) The Cocos Islands have special problems of size and economic viability, but that should not preclude the administering Power from complying with the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

Recommendations

General

(a) The Special Committee reaffirms the inalienable rights of all the peoples in these Territories to self-determination and independence in conformity with the Declaration contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

(b) The peoples of these Territories should be enabled to express their wishes in accordance with the provisions of resolution 1514 (XV) through well-established democratic processes under United Nations supervision.

(c) A visiting mission is necessary and would be most useful in assessing the political climate and aspirations of the peoples. Steps may be taken to arrange such a visit in consultation with the administering Power.

Trust Territory of Nauru

(d) The implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and the resettlement of Nauruans are two distinct questions and should be settled independently, precedence being given to the first, as desired by Nauruans themselves.

(e) Nauruans should be given full control over their natural economic resources. The Special Committee hopes that the forthcoming discussions between the people of Nauru and the Administering Authority will resolve all outstanding questions in this regard.

(f) The Administering Authority should take concrete measures in conformity with the provisions of resolution 1514 (XV) to fulfil the desire of the people of Nauru to become independent by January 1968.

Papua and the Trust Territory of New Guinea

(g) Steps should be taken in the constitutional field to abolish the special and reserved seats in the House of Assembly and to speedily implement General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

(h) The local government councils should be further strengthened in order to give the population the possibility of exercising self-government in municipal affairs.

(i) The Special Committee feels that the efforts in the economic and educational fields should continue at an accelerated pace.

Cocos (Keeling) Islands

(j) The Special Committee requests that the people of the Territory should be given an opportunity to express their wishes with regard to their future status and the assistance which the United Nations could extend in this regard.

ANNEX

[A/AC.109/L.318/Add.5]

Report of Sub-Committee II

THE TRUST TERRITORY OF NAURU, PAPUA AND THE TRUST TERRITORY OF NEW GUINEA, AND COCOS (KEELING) ISLANDS

Rapporteur: Mr. C. R. Gharekhan (India)

Consideration by the Sub-Committee

1. The Sub-Committee considered the Trust Territory of Nauru, Papua and the Trust Territory of New Guinea, and the Cocos (Keeling) Islands at its 51st, 52nd, 53rd and 55th meetings held on 23, 25 and 29 August and 7 September 1966.

2. The Sub-Committee had before it the working papers prepared by the Secretariat (see paras. 1-48 of chap. XIX).

3. The representative of Australia said that, since the Australian Government's last report to the Sub-Committee and the Special Committee in 1964 on developments in the Territories, more up-to-date information had been submitted to the Trusteeship Council at its thirty-third session in June and July 1966. The latest information on the Territories would be circulated to the members of the Sub-Committee.

4. The Cocos (Keeling) Islands had a population of about 470 persons, excluding European transients. They were descended from Malays who had been transplanted in 1827. Since 1948, the precarious conditions of life on the small coral islands had led to substantial emigration to Borneo and to Malaysia. The cable station, which had been in operation for fifty years, was about to close down and, apart from the civil airport and the public service, the cultivation of coconuts was the economic mainstay of the Territory. The islanders exercised their right of self-government in accordance with their local customs, traditions and religion. Health services were excellent and an atmosphere of untroubled peace reigned in the Territory which, because of its small size, was dependent on the continued support of a larger country.

5. Nauru had a population of between 2,700 and 2,800 indigenous people who were increasing rapidly. The islanders enjoyed a high standard of living thanks to the substantial royalties paid by the British Phosphate Commissioners for processing the phosphate rock mined in Nauru. The per capita income was about $US3,000. In thirty years' time, however, the phosphate rock would be completely worked out.

6. Nauru was infertile and lacked fresh water. With the agreement of the Nauruan leaders, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) had sent a team of experts to consider the problems arising from the progressive exhaustion of the phosphate rock. They had submitted a report which was under active consideration by the Nauruan leaders and the Australian Government. His delegation would, in due course, place the report before the Sub-Committee and the Special Committee.

7. Consideration was also being given, at the Nauruans' request, to the question of an alternative homeland. The Australian Government had offered full citizenship and every assistance to all Nauruans who wished to migrate to Australia. It had also offered them a fertile island off the Australian coast. Nevertheless, for a variety of reasons, the Nauruans had not seen their way clear to accept these offers. But it would be wrong to consider the possibility of resettlement in some form or other as dead. The matter was closely linked with the result of the investigations by the team of experts into the possibility of restoring the worked-out phosphate land.

8. A Legislative Council had been established recently and all its members were elected by universal adult suffrage. The Nauruan leaders had asked the Administering Authority for independence by 1968. Discussions on that request were in progress but a decision would largely depend on the experience gained by the Nauruans through the recently established Legislative Council.

9. The Non-Self-Governing Territory of Papua and the Trust Territory of New Guinea were being administered jointly by Australia within the framework of an administrative union established with the consent of the United Nations. They had a single Parliament, one judicial system, and a single Public Service. In 1964, after an intensive campaign to identify the voting population even in the most remote and rugged areas, elections had been held on a common roll by universal adult suffrage. As a result, a new Legislature for the two Territories, the House of Assembly, now replaced the former thirty-seven-member Legislative Council. The new House consisted of fifty-four elected members, thirty-eight of them indigenous inhabitants, and ten nominated members. In addition, seven of the elected members served on an eleven-member Administrative Council which advised the House on administrative matters. In 1965, the House of Assembly had created a constitutional review committee with strong indigenous representation to submit proposals for the future constitutional development of the Territories. The Committee had now submitted its report to the House of Assembly. After the House had taken its decision on the report, the whole matter would be considered by the Australian Parliament to determine what the next step should be.

10. The rapid political development of the Territories had been on the basis of a grass-roots development of local government councils. So vigorously had the development of these councils been pushed ahead that their numbers now exceeded the most optimistic forecast which had been made here even within the last year or two. There were now 123 councils in Papua-New Guinea representative of approximately 1.5 million people who elected the council members on the basis of adult suffrage. Thirty-five of these Councils were multiracial—a most significant development in itself. At the same time, the number of local officers in the second division of the Public Service had increased from twenty-two in 1964 to 234, while local public servants in the third division (167 in 1964) now numbered 9,268. Expatriate public officers were being given short-term contracts so that they could be replaced by indigenous civil servants as rapidly as possible.

11. Basic to the development of the Territories was the moneys made available by the Australian Government. The largest single item in the territorial budget was the Australian grant which had increased annually over the years so that in the financial year 1965-1966 it stood at $US68.82 million. This grant was interest-free and non-repayable. It had risen over the past ten years from $US19.84 million in 1955-1956 to the present figure of $US68.82 million. A further increase might be expected in the budget for 1966-1967. In addition, substantial sums for territorial development were carried on the Australian budget in respect of Australian Government departments operating in the Territory (e.g., civil aviation). In all, the figure provided by the Australian Government for development in Papua-New Guinea would be of the order of $US100 million. In the economic field the Australian Government was following the lines of development suggested by a mission of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (IBRD) which (in accordance with the basic planning of the Australian Government and at its invitation, and in accordance also, with recommendations made by the United Nations) had visited the Territory in 1963. In 1965 it had appointed an economic adviser. In recent years, there had been an expansion of the health services without parallel for Territories with similar topographical and social conditions, as well as intensive effort to develop education. The University of Papua-New Guinea had now been established with an enrolment of some fifty indigenous students for the first year. Its physical plant was being enlarged rapidly. An administrative staff college had been built to train the indigenous population in advanced administrative techniques. There was also a higher technical training institute.

12. Papua-New Guinea was not yet independent; its political future depended entirely on the freely expressed wishes of the people; it was they who would set the date for self-determination, self-government or independence. There was rapid advancement in all fields and tremendous strides towards racial harmony. The Special Committee might well consider how advisable it was to press for greater speed in implementing the absolute objectives laid down in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). In the opinion of the Australian Government, the hasty achievement of those goals was less important than the guarantees of human rights and fundamental freedoms which the population of the Territories already enjoyed in contrast to other Territories being considered by the Special Committee, where the main problem was the denial of human rights and freedoms. The Australian Government was not prepared to abandon judgement on all subjects except speed. The end of a journey was not only a matter of going faster but also of arriving safely.

13. In considering Nauru and the Cocos (Keeling) Islands, the Special Committee should bear in mind that the solution for small and isolated Territories was not necessarily applicable to larger, more populated areas. While it was essential for all peoples to secure their fundamental rights and freedoms and realize their aspirations, the political forms by which those objectives could be attained should and must be different.

14. The representative of the United States of America said that while Papua-New Guinea had made considerable progress towards self-determination, the economic viability which must accompany political independence had not yet been achieved. However, the Australian Government was attacking that problem sensibly and vigorously and he hoped that the IBRD recommendations would provide guide-lines for the establishment of a viable economy.

15. The establishment of a Legislative Council and an Executive Council on Nauru represented a significant political development. While the Nauruans' desire to remain an independent national entity had been demonstrated on many occasions, they should not reject out of hand the possibility of relocating the population, if they were to avoid an economic dilemma. He hoped that the findings of the FAO team at present engaged in a survey of the Territory's natural resources potential would help them to make a wise decision.

16. The Cocos (Keeling) Islands presented a particularly difficult problem owing to their small population and meagre economic resources, but he agreed with the Australian representative that they deserved the same opportunity as other peoples for economic and social progress and political fulfilment.

17. The representative of Sierra Leone said that he was grateful to the Australian Government for its co-operation and the information which it had supplied to the Sub-Committee. The political situation in Cocos (Keeling) Islands was rather different from that of other Territories considered by the Sub-Committee but the administering Power appeared to be making no attempt to prepare them for self-determination and possible independence. Admittedly, self-sufficiency might be difficult to achieve, but a more broadly based and unified educational system should be established and the islanders should be helped to develop institutions through which to elect their representatives and express their views concerning their future. He hoped that the Australian Government would take steps to bring about suitable changes in the indenture granted in 1886 to the Clunies-Ross family, and to offer the islanders the possibility of union with others in the area.

18. The Nauruans were anxious to preserve their sovereignty and national identity and therefore reluctant to leave their homeland and undertake a mass migration either to Australia or to Curtis Island. Furthermore, they claimed to be the rightful owners of the Territory's phosphate deposits and wished to exercise control over that one source of wealth bestowed upon them by nature. It was to be hoped that an equitable solution would be found by agreement between the Nauruans, the Administering Authority and the British Phosphate Commissioners, enabling the Nauruans to build their economic future on a sound basis. The Sub-Committee should be informed of the reactions of the Administering Authority and the Nauruan leaders to the recommendations of the joint commission on the rehabilitation of the island in which FAO had participated. He appealed to the Australian Government to do its utmost to fulfil the Nauruans' desire for complete independence by January 1968.

19. The percentage of the potential labour force at present employed in New Guinea and Papua was somewhat low and it was to be hoped that the development of new industries would lead to a rapid increase in employment. On the other hand, it was encouraging to learn that the new University of Papua-New Guinea was expanding, since an increase in the number of trained people was essential to economic growth. He hoped that the Australian Government would help the peoples of New Guinea and Papua to make more rapid progress towards self-determination and independence.

20. The representative of India stated that the people of Nauru obviously had a strong sense of national identity and separate nationhood which explained why they had refused to leave their homeland despite the prospect of the early depletion of their phosphate reserves. Although he welcomed the steps taken by the Australian Government to implement General Assembly resolution 2111 (XX), he regretted that the recently established Legislative Council was not a fully elected body and that its powers were restricted. Despite the expressed desire of the Nauruans for independence by January 1968 and the General Assembly's recommendation to that effect, the Australian Government had suggested that talks on further political progress should be deferred for another two or three years to enable the Legislative Council to gain experience and to allow time for the establishment of an Executive Council. The spokesman for the Nauruan people in the Trusteeship Council, however, had pressed for further constitutional talks in 1967 with a view to complete independence for the island by January 1968. He urged the Australian Government to co-operate with the United Nations by taking the necessary steps to grant that request.

21. In view of the rapid depletion of the phosphate deposits, the proposed talks between the Nauruan leaders and the Australian Government were of crucial importance for the Territory's economic future. The Head Chief of Nauru had told the Trusteeship Council that Nauru claimed ownership of the phosphate deposits and was prepared to retain the British Phosphate Commissioners as managing agents for a fair fee and to purchase their equipment. Nauru should have full control over its phosphate resources, and since they were likely to be exhausted in thirty years' time, it was essential to grant the Territory independence without delay to enable the Nauruans to diversify their economy and establish other industries. In that connexion, he asked the Australian representative to explain why there had been such a large reduction in Nauru's imports from Australia.

22. It was gratifying to note the important constitutional developments which had taken place in Papua-New Guinea, but the general rate of progress seemed unduly slow. The United Nations Visiting Mission to the Trust Territories of Nauru and New Guinea, 1962, had recommended the establishment of a fully elected parliament of 100 members. Yet three years later Papua and New Guinea had a House of Assembly consisting of only sixty-four members, forty-four of whom had been directly elected by the indigenous peoples. Moreover, since 1964, the powers of the Legislature had not been expanded and the indigenous inhabitants had not been given executive powers, as suggested by the Visiting Mission. In the circumstances, he hoped that the Australian Government would give favourable consideration to the recommendations of the Select Committee of the House of Assembly. He also hoped that the powers of the local government councils to review their budgets would no longer be restricted.

23. He welcomed the appointment of an economic adviser and the enactment of legislation to establish a Development Bank. Nevertheless, he was concerned at the continued heavy reliance of Papua-New Guinea on grants from the Australian Government. The administering Power had an obligation to reduce the economic dependence of the Territories and, to that end, to promote the development of local manufacturing industries and employ a larger proportion of the adult male indigenous population. The establishment of the new university and the Institute of Higher Technical Education in Papua and New Guinea would undoubtedly make an important contribution to the training of indigenous personnel.

24. The only effective means of evaluating the constitutional progress of Papua-New Guinea and the desire of the indigenous inhabitants for freedom and independence was to send a visiting mission to the Territories. He hoped that the Australian Government would co-operate with the United Nations in assisting the peoples of Papua-New Guinea to exercise their right of self-determination.

25. The representative of Chile expressed gratification concerning the progress reported in each of the Territories. In the Cocos (Keeling) Islands, the small size of the population was the main obstacle to political and economic independence, but he hoped that a solution would be found that would permit the Cocos islanders to exercise their right to self-determination. Educational facilities should be expanded in order to prepare them for that eventuality.

26. The impending depletion of Nauru's phosphate reserves was a subject of deep concern because phosphate royalties accounted for the high level of per capita income in the island. The Administering Authority should make every effort to find a solution to the problem. The FAO survey of Nauru's agricultural resources might provide useful guidelines for increasing the island's cultivable area. In view of the Nauruans' strongly expressed desire to retain their identity and to attain independence by 1968, the powers exercised by the Legislative Council were still too limited to provide the necessary political experience and should be expanded.

27. In New Guinea and Papua the establishment of the House of Assembly, with fifty-four elected members out of a total of sixty-four, the creation of a constitutional review committee and the extension of the system of universally elected local government councils were signs that those Territories were rapidly advancing towards self-government and independence. Although the University of Papua-New Guinea would help to provide the high level of technical training needed for self-government, the pace of education should be stepped up still further. Considerable progress had also been made in strengthening the economy of the Territories and the Australian Government had made efforts to implement the recommendations of IBRD. However, the economic dependence of the Territories was still an obstacle to their future independence. Notwithstanding the problems of geography, climate, communication and language differences, he was confident that the inhabitants would develop a sense of national identity and achieve the goals of self-determination and independence.

Conclusions of the Sub-Committee

General

28. (a) The Sub-Committee notes with satisfaction the declaration of the administering Power that its policy is to work for the social, educational, economic and political advancement of the people of these Territories.

(b) The Sub-Committee considers that the progress towards the implementation of the Declaration contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) has been slow.

Trust Territory of Nauru

(c) The Sub-Committee notes that the Nauruan people have expressed their desire to achieve independence by 31 January 1968.

(d) The Sub-Committee is aware of the serious problems relating to the resettlement of the people of Nauru.

(e) The Sub-Committee notes with satisfaction that a Legislative Council has been set up in Nauru. The Sub-Committee feels, however, that the powers of the Legislative Council are restricted.

(f) The Sub-Committee notes that talks are to be held shortly between the people of the Territory and the representatives of the administering Power regarding the ownership of and control over the operations of the phosphate industry.

Papua and the Trust Territory of New Guinea

(g) The Sub-Committee takes note of the political and constitutional changes in the Territories, particularly the establishment of the House of Assembly and the increase in the number of local government councils. The Sub-Committee urges the administering Power to take further immediate measures whereby the House of Assembly can function as a fully representative and effective body.

(h) The Sub-Committee takes into account the efforts of the Australian Government for the economic and social development of the Territory, particularly the establishment of the University of Papua-New Guinea.

Cocos (Keeling) Islands

(i) The Cocos Islands have special problems of size and economic viability, but that should not preclude the administering Power from complying with the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

Recommendations of the Sub-Committee

General

29. (a) The Sub-Committee reaffirms the inalienable rights of all the peoples in these Territories to self-determination and independence in conformity with the Declaration contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

(b) The peoples of these Territories should be enabled to express their wishes in accordance with the provisions of resolution 1514 (XV) through well-established democratic processes under United Nations supervision.

(c) A visiting mission is necessary and would be most useful in assessing the political climate and aspirations of the peoples. Steps may be taken to arrange such a visit in consultation with the administering Power.

Trust Territory of Nauru

(d) The implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and the resettlement of Nauruans are two distinct questions and should be settled independently, precedence being given to the first, as desired by Nauruans themselves.

(e) Nauruans should be given full control over their natural economic resources. The Sub-Committee hopes that the forthcoming discussions between the people of Nauru and the Administering Authority will resolve all outstanding questions in this regard.

(f) The Administering Authority should do its utmost to fulfil the desire of the people of Nauru to become independent by January 1968.

Papua and the Trust Territory of New Guinea

(g) Steps should be taken in the constitutional field to abolish the special and reserved seats in the House of Assembly and to speedily implement General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

(h) The local government councils should be further strengthened in order to give the population the possibility of exercising self-government in municipal affairs.

(i) The Sub-Committee feels that the efforts in the economic and educational fields should continue at an accelerated pace.

Cocos (Keeling) Islands

(j) The Sub-Committee requests that the people of the Territory should be given an opportunity to express with regard to their future status and the assistance which the United Nations could extend in this regard.

CHAPTER XX*

BRUNEI

INFORMATION ON THE TERRITORY

Introduction

1. Information on Brunei is already contained in the reports of the Special Committee to the General Assembly at its nineteenth and twentieth sessions (A/5800/Rev.1,¹ chap. XXI; and A/6000/Rev.1,² chap. XX). Supplementary information on recent developments is set out below.³

2. The population of Brunei at the end of 1963 totalled 98,438, an increase of 7.9 per cent over the previous year.

Political and constitutional developments

3. As noted in previous reports to the General Assembly, the Executive Council and the Legislative Council, which were established in 1963, consisted entirely of official and nominated unofficial members until 20 March 1965 when elections were held. At that time ten members (the other eleven members are appointed) were elected to the new Legislative Council. The voters also chose fifty-five members of the four district councils in Brunei. More than 80 per cent of Brunei's 19,000 voters cast their vote in the election.

4. No information is available on the decision to introduce a ministerial system which was announced after talks in May 1965 between the Sultan and British Ministers in London. However, it is reported that the Executive Council has been changed to a Ministerial Council in which inexperienced legislators will have a chance to serve as assistant ministers. The Sultan is reported to be planning to hold a constitutional conference at some future time, and then to move to a fully elected Legislature with a Ministerial Council composed entirely of elected legislators, but no time-table has been announced concerning these steps.

5. Supreme executive authority continues to be vested in the Sultan and his assent is required for all bills passed by the Legislative Council.

Political parties

6. In the elections in 1965, nine of the elected candidates were independents. The tenth represented the Brunei People's Alliance Party (BPAP). This party, which was formed in 1963, was then reported as favouring Brunei's entry into the Federation of Malaysia, and subsequently it has advocated full independence for Brunei within the Commonwealth.

7. In December 1965, the formation of a new political party, provisionally named the Brunei People's Front (BPF), was announced. It is reported to have the support of a number of elected members in the Legislative Council and the district councils. Its president is quoted as having said that Brunei needs a party which will help the people raise their standard of living and work hard for independence.

Economic conditions

8. Brunei's economy continues to be based mainly on the oil industry. Approximately 94 per cent of the value of all exports in 1964 consisted of oil exports. Mining rents, royalties and taxes imposed on the oil industry form a large part of the total revenue of the Territory, and after the Government, it is the most important employer of labour. Other sectors of the economy include rubber, subsistence agriculture, fishing, the collection of forest products and some small-scale industries.

9. The only other export of importance, besides oil, is rubber. The chief imports are food-stuffs, manufactured goods, machinery and transportation equipment. Specific information is not available concerning imports and exports in 1964. The total value of exports was $M187,383,007⁴ an increase of $M4,474,130 over 1963. Imports were valued at $M102,181,131, compared with $M66,013,300 in 1963.

10. Brunei's annual revenue is far above its expenditure and this has resulted in a large invested surplus which in 1964 totalled $M930,417,373. Revenue is derived mainly from taxes, royalties, rents, interest and currency. At the end of 1963, a new oil agreement between the Government of Brunei and the Brunei Shell

Petroleum Company was signed which provides for the taxation of the oil company on the basis of equal division of profits. There is no personal income tax at present, but an income tax of 30 per cent is imposed on the profits of companies operating in Brunei. Revenue and expenditure for the past two years are as follows: in 1964, the territorial revenue amounted to $M134 million and expenditure totalled $M63 million. The corresponding figures for 1963 were $M114 million and $M64 million.

Social conditions

Labour

11. No significant changes in problems and general policy were reported by the administering Power concerning labour wages and conditions of employment, or in the administrative organization responsible for governmental activities relating to labour. The total labour force increased from 6,826 in 1963 to 7,094 in 1964. The great majority of these were employed by the Government or the Brunei Shell Petroleum Company.

Public health

12. Brunei has two government hospitals and one company hospital which have a total of 343 beds. These have a medical staff which includes eighteen registered physicians, forty-six medical assistants and twenty-eight trained or certified nurses. The Territory has no private medical practitioners. Approximately 7.61 per cent of all government expenditures in 1964 consisted of recurrent and capital expenditure on public health.

Educational conditions

13. In 1964, there were eighty-six primary and kindergarten public schools with 15,222 pupils, compared with seventy-seven schools with 13,577 pupils in the previous year. Seven secondary schools had an enrolment of 1,658, compared with 1,274 in the previous year. Independent primary schools had 7,060 pupils, compared with 6,506 in 1963 and secondary schools had 1,409 pupils, compared with 1,219 in 1963. The public teacher-training school had 249 pupils, compared with 178 in 1963. The staff of public schools increased from 663 to 766 and that of independent schools from 280 to 325 in 1964.

14. Recurrent expenditure on education in 1964 amounted to $M7,958,110, an increase of $M1,088,102 over 1963. Capital expenditure for these two years was $M230,798 and $M748,194 respectively.

CHAPTER XXI*

HONG KONG

INFORMATION ON THE TERRITORY

Introduction

1. Information on Hong Kong is already contained in the Special Committee's reports to the General Assembly at its nineteenth and twentieth sessions (A/5800/Rev.1,¹ chap. XXII; and A/6000/Rev.1,² chap. XXI). Supplementary information on recent developments is set out below.³

2. The population was estimated to be 3,739,000 at the end of 1964, an increase of 974,000 over 1963. Of this increase, 6,994 represented the estimated net balance of migration.

Political developments

3. No additional information on political and constitutional developments is available.

Economic conditions

4. The industrial economy of the Territory is based on exports rather than on its domestic market. In general, while heavy industry such as ship-building and ship-breaking continues to be important, the Territory relies primarily on the products of its light industries.

The textile industry dominates the economy, accounting for 52 per cent of all domestic exports and employing 42 per cent of its industrial labour force; it is also a significant factor in international trade in textiles. In all sectors, the manufacture and processing of cotton goods predominates. The manufacture of garments remains the largest sector within the industry, employing 59,000 workers. From a total of $HK682 million⁴ in 1961, the value of exports of clothing has risen to $HK1,169 million in 1964, produced by some 1,070 factories.

5. The manufacture of plastic articles ranks next in importance. The industry manufactured exports worth approximately $HK613 million in 1964. Various other light industries have continued to expand. These include the manufacture of air-conditioners, aluminium ware, clocks and watches, cordage, electrical appliances and equipment, enamel ware, food and beverages, footwear, light metal products, optical equipment, paint, vacuum flasks and furniture and furnishings. There has been a marked growth in the electronics industry. The manufacture or assembly of transistor radios began in 1959, and since then exports of transistor radios have doubled in volume each year to reach a total of 3.9 million sets worth $HK95 million in 1964. The industry exports to sixty-seven countries but its principal markets are the United Kingdom and the United States.

6. The Territory is one of the world's leading centres for ship-breaking. Much of the scrap is used in rolling mills, which produce an estimated 17,000 long tons a month of metal products used in building construction; this represents a large part of the requirements of the building industry. In addition a considerable quantity of rods and bars is shipped abroad, principally to South-East Asian countries.

7. With regard to imports, China was the principal supplier during 1964, providing 22.6 per cent by value of all imports and 52 per cent of the Territory's food imports. Imports from China also included textile yarn and fabrics. The value of goods imported from China increased by 32 per cent compared with 1963. Imports from Japan, the second largest supplier, increased to 17 per cent. Textile goods represented 38 per cent of imports from Japan; other goods included machinery, base metals, chemicals and many manufactured articles. Imports from the United States increased over the previous year, while those from the United Kingdom showed a decline. The principal imports from the United States were textile fibres, raw cotton, tobacco, machinery, plastic materials and fruits. The imports from the United Kingdom consisted mainly of machinery, wool textiles and motor vehicles.

8. During 1964, 49 per cent of all domestic exports went to two markets, the United States and the United Kingdom. The United States remains the largest market, importing 27 per cent by value during 1964, and thus increasing its purchases by $HK254 million, or 26 per cent over the previous year. The value of goods sent to the United Kingdom was $HK968 million (22 per cent of all domestic exports), an increase of $HK105 million or 12 per cent. Malaysia remained, however, the third largest market for Hong Kong, taking goods valued at $HK330 million in 1964. Other important markets were Japan, Canada, Australia and the Federal Republic of Germany.

9. Tourism has become one of the Territory's major industries. In the area of the Pacific and the Far East (excluding Hawaii) Hong Kong was the second largest tourist attraction after Japan. A 1962 survey estimated that tourists were spending over $HK2,000 per person in the Territory. Although Hong Kong has been an attraction to travellers for a number of years; the decision to develop the tourist industry was made in 1958. There were approximately 43,500 visitors to the Territory in 1957 and by 1963 this figure had risen to 315,665. The 1964 figure is expected to be about 25 per cent over 1963, or approximately 370,000.

10. In connexion with primary industries, the 1961 census showed just under 90,000 people employed in farming and fishing, and another 10,000 in mining and quarrying. Somewhat more than 5 per cent of the area of Hong Kong is classified as urban. Land is scarce and almost all of the cultivated land in Hong Kong is situated in the New Territories. More than 80 per cent of the total area of the Territory is marginal land; the arable land and fresh ponds already exploited comprise only 13.1 per cent of the total area. The expanding urban areas (the remaining 5.5 per cent) tend to encroach more directly on arable rather than on marginal land.

11. Rice was formerly the most important agricultural crop but there has been a steady increase in market gardening, and pig and poultry production. The area of land under permanent vegetable cultivation increased from 2,254 acres in 1954 to 8,240 acres in 1964. Six to eight crops of vegetables are harvested annually from intensively cultivated land.

12. Marine fish is one of Hong Kong's main primary products and the fishing fleet is the largest of any port in the Commonwealth. The number of fishermen at the 1961 census was over 40,000 and there is a fleet of nearly 10,000 vessels. One hundred and eighty-nine tons of fresh oyster meat, valued at approximately $HK789,000, were produced, some of which was processed into dried meat or oyster juice and exported to markets overseas.

13. There is some mining in Hong Kong, but with the exception of iron ore at Ma On Shan, these are relatively small-scale operations. Wolframite and graphite are mined underground while kaolin, feldspar and quartz are mined by opencast methods. The total annual mineral production is about $HK800,000. All the feldspar and quartz and some of the kaolin is used in local industry.

14. The total value of Hong Kong's external trade in 1964, including imports, domestic exports and re-exports, amounted to $HK14,647 million, representing an increase of $HK2,244 million or 18 per cent over the preceding year. Imports in 1964 were valued at $HK8,706 million, an increase of 17 per cent. The value of domestic exports increased by 15.6 per cent and totalled $HK4,428 million; the textile and plastic industries comprise 52 per cent and 13.8 per cent respectively of the value of the goods exported.

15. Hong Kong continued to be financially self-supporting during the year 1963-1964. In 1963-1964, its revenue totalled $HK1,394 million, $HK197 million more than the original estimate. Expenditure for the year was $HK1,295 million, which was $HK65 million less than originally estimated. In view of a programme of capital expenditure for schools, medical facilities, and road and land development schemes, $HK114 million deficit is estimated for the year 1964-1965.

Social conditions

Labour

16. Is it estimated that more than one third of the million and a half people employed in Hong Kong, are engaged in the manufacturing industries. The 1964 returns to the Labour Department indicate that the number of registered and recorded factories showed a slight decline from 8,348 in 1963 to 8,215 in 1964. The number of persons employed in such factories totalled 350,174, a decrease of 4,220 from the previous year. The returns from the Labour Department are voluntary and do not include out-workers or people employed in cottage industries, the construction industries, or agriculture and fishing. The textile industry, which employs 148,264 persons, remained the largest employer of labour. The plastics industry, in which a large number of out-workers are known to be employed, continued its expansion as the second largest employer of labour.

17. Wages and salaries continued to rise. It is estimated that industrial wages have risen by 50 per cent during the years 1960-1965. Government officers received in 1964, as an interim award, a 5 per cent increase in salary, along with an allowance for dependants; a Salaries Commission was scheduled to be appointed to review salaries in the light of the 1965 consumer price index. Minor and unskilled government staff who had received increases of between 11 and 14 per cent in 1963 received further increases equivalent to 15 per cent of their existing wages. The Armed Services awarded a wage increase ranging from 10 to 29 per cent to their industrial employees; these increases were aimed at making the wage level of the locally engaged industrial staff of the services departments comparable to workers of utility companies who received increases in 1963.

18. The number of available hospital beds rose from 11,719 in 1963 to 11,989 in 1964. The latter figure includes maternity and nursing homes but does not cover institutions maintained by the Armed Forces. Of these beds, 10,037 were in government hospitals and institutions and in government-assisted hospitals, while the remaining 1,952 were provided by private agencies. Apart from beds assigned to the care of the mentally ill and the treatment of tuberculosis and infectious diseases, there were 8,440 beds available for all general purposes, including maternity cases. The number of government medical officers rose from 474 in 1963 to 515 in 1964. Government dental surgeons totalled forty-eight, an increase of two over the previous year.

19. Live births, which numbered 115,263 in the year 1963, declined to 108,518 in 1964; the live birth-rate fell from 32.1 in 1963 to 29.4 per thousand of population. The infant mortality rate dropped from 32.9 to 26.4 per thousand live births in 1964. The estimated expenditure of the Medical and Health Department for the financial year 1964-1965 was $HK93,400,300. An estimated $HK32,418,400 in medical subsidies was paid to private organizations. The combined estimated expenditure of the Medical and Health Department represented 8.41 per cent of the Territory's total estimated expenditure of $HK1,496,032,510.

Educational conditions

20. The school enrolment in Hong Kong at 30 September 1964 was as follows: kindergarten, 39,642; primary, 596,971; secondary, 177,680; post secondary, 5,926; adult education, 32,969; and special education, 1,011. There were 854,279 pupils enrolled at all schools, colleges and education centres, 43,647 more than in 1963.

21. In 1964, there were 24,329 full-time and part-time teachers employed in registered day schools, of whom 6,685 were university graduates and 10,425 were trained non-graduates. Another 4,588 teachers were engaged in tutorial, evening and special afternoon classes and 100 were in special schools. At the end of the 1963-1964 school year, the ratio of pupils to teachers in all types of schools was 28:1, the same ratio which existed in the 1962-1963 school year.

22. There were 750 Hong Kong students pursuing further studies in the United Kingdom in September 1964. The number of such students has almost doubled since 1960.

23. The expenditure on education for the year ending 31 July 1964 was $HK189,718,778, an increase of nearly $HK25 million over the previous year.

UNITED STATES VIRGIN ISLANDS, BRITISH VIRGIN ISLANDS, ANTIGUA, DOMINICA, GRENADA, MONTSERRAT, ST. KITTS-NEVIS-ANGUILLA, ST. LUCIA, ST. VINCENT, BARBADOS, BERMUDA, BAHAMAS, TURKS AND CAICOS ISLANDS, CAYMAN ISLANDS, FALKLAND ISLANDS (MALVINAS) AND BRITISH HONDURAS

A. Action taken by the Special Committee in 1964 and by the General Assembly at its twentieth session

1. UNITED STATES VIRGIN ISLANDS, BRITISH VIRGIN ISLANDS, ANTIGUA, DOMINICA, GRENADA, MONTSERRAT, ST. KITTS-NEVIS-ANGUILLA, ST. LUCIA, ST. VINCENT, BARBADOS, BERMUDA BAHAMAS, TURKS AND CAICOS ISLANDS AND CAYMAN ISLANDS

1. The conclusions and recommendations reached by the Special Committee in 1964 regarding the United States Virgin Islands are contained in its report to the General Assembly at its nineteenth session (A/5800/Rev1,¹ chap. XXV, paras. 313-321). The Committee, inter alia, having taken note of the statements of the representative of the administering Power concerning a constitutional convention to be convened on 7 December 1964, invited the administering Power to ensure that the people of the Territory be enabled, in complete freedom and without any restrictions, to express their wishes concerning the future political status of the Territory. The Committee also expressed the hope that the administering Power would provide it with all the relevant information concerning steps it had taken in pursuance of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). The Committee also invited the administering Power to transmit to the General Assembly information concerning the elections, the Constitutional Convention and the resulting recommendations and developments, so as to enable the Assembly to take suitable decisions. To this end, the Special Committee recommended the sending of a visiting mission to the Territory, in consultation with the administering Power.

2. The conclusions reached and recommendations made by the Special Committee in 1964 concerning the British Virgin Islands, Antigua, Dominica, Grenada, Montserrat, St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla, St. Lucia, St. Vincent and Barbados are also set forth in the Committee's report to the General Assembly at its nineteenth session (ibid., paras. 322-333). The Committee noted that these islands seemed to possess sufficient features in common, politically, economically and socially, to make some form of union possible among some, if not all of them. The Committee stated that there appeared to be general agreement among the "little seven" (Antigua, Dominica, Montserrat, St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla, St. Lucia, St. Vincent and Barbados) concerning immediate independence and the formation of some sort of federation. It pointed out, however, that a more thorough investigation particularly of the opinions of the Territories' leaders was still needed and that the whole question of the amount of assistance required after independence and the various external sources that might provide it deserved a more thorough study.

* Previously issued under the symbol A/6300/Add.10.

3. With regard to Grenada, the Special Committee noted that negotiations were in progress between this island and Trinidad and Tobago with a view to a possible association between the two.

4. Concerning the British Virgin Islands, there seemed to be movements favouring remaining outside the federation of the "little seven" and investigating, instead, the possibility of an association with other neighbouring Territories.

5. In all cases, the Special Committee invited the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to take steps which would accelerate the constitutional process within the framework of the Declaration contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

6. The conclusions and recommendations adopted by the Special Committee in 1964 concerning Bermuda, the Bahamas, the Turks and Caicos Islands and the Cayman Islands are set forth in the Committee's report to the General Assembly at its nineteenth session (ibid., chap. XXIV, paras. 133 and 134). The Special Committee, inter alia, noted that the administering Power had not mentioned any concrete measures which it had taken or intended to take in the Territories with a view to implementing the Declaration embodied in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), and invited the administering Power to take such measures without delay and, more particularly, to accelerate the process of self-determination in the Turks and Caicos Islands and the Cayman Islands by setting up representative bodies there. With a view to obtaining additional information, the Special Committee considered the possibility of sending a visiting mission to these Territories.

7. At its twentieth session, the General Assembly having examined the chapters of the reports of the Special Committee concerning these Territories (A/5800/Rev.1, chaps. XXIV and XXV; and A/6000/Rev.1,² chaps. XXIII and XXIV), adopted resolution 2069 (XX) of 16 December 1965 whereby, inter alia, it requested the administering Powers to allow United Nations visiting missions to visit the Territories and to extend to them full co-operation and assistance; decided that the United Nations should render all help to the people of these Territories in their efforts freely to decide their future status; and requested the Special Committee to examine the situation in these Territories and to report on the implementation of this resolution to the General Assembly at its twenty-first session.

2. FALKLAND ISLANDS (MALVINAS)

8. Following its consideration of the Falkland Islands (Malvinas) at its meetings in 1964, the Special Committee adopted conclusions and recommendations as contained in its report to the General Assembly at its nineteenth session (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. XXIII, para. 59).

9. On 16 December 1965, the General Assembly adopted resolution 2065 (XX) on the Falkland Islands (Malvinas). This resolution read as follows:

"The General Assembly,

"Having examined the question of the Falkland Islands (Malvinas),

² Ibid., Twentieth Session, Annexes, addendum to agenda item 23.

"Taking into account the chapters of the reports of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples relating to the Falkland Islands (Malvinas), and in particular the conclusions and recommendations adopted by the Committee with reference to that Territory,

"Considering that its resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960 was prompted by the cherished aim of bringing to an end everywhere colonialism in all its forms, one of which covers the case of the Falkland Islands (Malvinas),

"Noting the existence of a dispute between the Governments of Argentina and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland concerning sovereignty over the said Islands,

"1. Invites the Governments of Argentina and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to proceed without delay with the negotiations recommended by the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples with a view to finding a peaceful solution to the problem, bearing in mind the provisions and objectives of the Charter of the United Nations and of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and the interests of the population of the Falkland Islands (Malvinas);

"2. Requests the two Governments to report to the Special Committee and to the General Assembly at its twenty-first session on the results of the negotiations."

B. Information on the Territories³

1. UNITED STATES VIRGIN ISLANDS⁴

General

10. At 30 June 1965, the population was estimated at 41,913, compared with 35,000 in 1963.

Constitutional convention

11. The first Virgin Islands Constitutional Convention was convened at Charlotte Amalie on 7 December 1964. It completed its work on 26 February 1965 when it adopted a draft of a new Organic Act for the Territory.

12. In accordance with Virgin Islands legislation, the Convention was composed as follows: twenty-two delegates elected at a general election held on 4 November 1964 (four delegates each from St. Croix and St. Thomas and two from St. John with twelve delegates at large), and the eleven existing Senators of the Virgin Islands.

13. The Convention organized a number of standing committees to facilitate its work and had the benefit of the advice and counsel of a number of political scientists, attorneys and legislators. The Convention held public hearings in three of the main centres.

14. The Convention unanimously adopted the draft of a new Organic Act for the Territory. The major proposals for revision are indicated below:

Proposals	Present law
(i) Elective Governor; 4-year term	Governor appointed by President with Senate approval. Term at the pleasure of the President.
(ii) Elective Lieutenant Governor; 4-year term	Government Secretary appointed by President, without Senate approval. Term at the pleasure of the President
(iii) Unicameral Legislature of 11 Senators (3 from St. Croix District; 3 from St. Thomas District; 1 from St. John District; and 4 at large). Term 2 years. No limitation on voting for members at large	Unicameral Legislature of 11 Senators (2 from St. Croix District; 2 from St. Thomas District; 1 from St. John District; and 6 at large). Electorate limited in voting for 2 at large and 2 from each District. St. John Electorate limited in voting for 2 at large and 1 from the District. Term 2 years
(iv) Resident Commissioner or Delegate or Delegate to U. S. House of Representatives	No provision
(v) Right to vote for U. S. President and Vice-President in national elections	No provision
(vi) Franchise vested in residents 18 years of age or over	21 years of age or over
(vii) Veto of local laws by U. S. President abolished	Veto of local laws by U.S. President
(viii) Comptroller appointed by Governor with consent of legislature. Term 10 years.	Comptroller appointed by U. S. Secretary of Interior. Term 10 years
(ix) Proposal of Organic Act Amendment by legislature, or to legislature by popular initiative, or by Constitutional Convention	No provision

15. The Convention also adopted a resolution on the status of the Territory, which reads as follows:

"Be it resolved that:

"1. The People of the Virgin Islands are unalterably opposed to annexation of the Virgin Islands by any State of the Union as a county, city, or precinct, or by any Commonwealth or other territory under the jurisdiction of the United States;

"2. The People of the Virgin Islands are unalterably opposed to independence from the United States of America;

"3. The People of the Virgin Islands desire to have the Virgin Islands remain an unincorporated territory under the constitutional system of the United States with the fullest measure of internal self-government and in the closest association with the United States of America, and that hereafter the Virgin Islands be designated an 'autonomous territory'

"4. The necessary constitutional arrangements to be made to entitle the people of the Virgin Islands to vote for the President and Vice-President of the United States in the national elections."

Legislation

16. It is reported that bills relating to proposals made by the Constitutional Convention have been introduced into the United States Congress. In May 1966, the House of Representatives passed two bills, one providing for an elected Governor and Lieutenant Governor, the other making provision for reapportionment and enlarging the Virgin Islands legislature from eleven to fifteen members. The reapportionment bill provides for five Senators each from St. Croix and St. Thomas, one from St. John and four Senators-at-large. Hearings on this bill were held by the Senate's Subcommittee on Interior and Insular Affairs during June 1966.

17. On 27 July 1966, the United States Senate passed the Virgin Islands Reapportionment Bill with no dissenting votes. A spokesman said that the bill passed included a committee amendment by which the reapportionment legislation would take effect in time for the elections on 8 November 1966. The House of Representatives' bill set the effective date as 1 January 1967. Because of this difference the legislation was returned to the House of representatives for conference.

18. Objectors to the implementation of the reapportionment measure in 1966 have contended that there will not be sufficient time to work out details of the election satisfactorily. They have pointed out that the Governor of the islands must call a special session of the legislature to consider the measure before the primary elections, which are set for 13 September 1966. They have also criticized the Governor for pressing for the earlier date.

19. On 5 August 1966, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives named five House members to represent the House in a conference with the Senate on the bill. On 10 August 1966, the conference of members of the Senate and the House voted to make the reapportionment effective this year.

20. A special session of the Virgin Island Legislature was called for 13 August 1966, in order to change the date of the primary from 13 September to 4 October 1966.

21. The United States Senate has not yet taken action on the bill to provide for an elective Governor.

Economic conditions

22. In 1964 the tourist industry reached a volume of $48 million, compared with $41 million in 1963 and $35 million in 1962. New industries catering to the export trade were licensed, including watch assembling, the manufacture of fibre-glass, pharmaceuticals, resort sports wear, power equipment and costume jewellery.

Three industries catering to local trade also were established.

23. A severe and prolonged drought affected agriculture during the first six months of 1964. In spite of the drought, some sectors of agriculture showed appreciable gains. In St. Croix, a record sugar crop was achieved due to excellent rainfall. A total of 15,540 tons of raw sugar was produced, as compared with 15,354 in 1963.

24. Per capita income was estimated at $1,761 in 1964, compared with $1,543 in 1963. The present figure is nearly double that of 1959, when per capita income was $986.

25. Imports into the Virgin Islands from the United States mainland and abroad reached a peak of $76 million in 1963, compared with $61.8 million in 1962. Exports of Virgin Islands products to the United States mainland and foreign countries reached a total of $22.6 million in 1963, compared with some $20 million in 1962.

26. Combined local revenues and matching funds in 1964 amounted to $25.6 million for capital and operating requirements, compared with $19.7 million in 1963. The internal revenue matching fund reached $8.4 million compared with $7.6 million in 1963.

Social conditions

Labour

27. Non-agricultural placement in 1964 numbered 1,402. The comparative distribution by major occupational groups and certification of foreign nationals for non-agricultural job openings for 1963 and 1964 are given below:

	Placements		Foreign nationals
	1963	1964	1963	1964
Occupational groups:
Professional and clerical	325	317	140	269
Service	448	466	5,300	6,644
Skilled and semi-skilled	363	382	2,687	3,369
Unskilled and other	314	237	5,222	5,734
TOTAL	1,450	1,402	13,349	16,016

28. The state of health of the population continued to be excellent in 1964. There were no epidemics, and mass immunization programmes were continued to forestall the outbreak of preventable diseases. In 1963, a total of 1,513 live births was noted, compared with 1,375 in 1962, while the death-rate was up at the rate of 10 per thousand, compared with 9 per thousand in 1962.

29. In 1964, the Department of Health took the first concrete step in the programme for creating multi-million-dollar health centres on both St. Croix and St. Thomas. This first step included preliminary design that would be sufficient to develop accurate budgeting and scheduling for the entire programme. The scope of the project included two general hospitals of 250 beds each, two long-term hospitals of 60 to 75 beds each, two public health clinics, one school of nursing, and one student nurses' residence.

Educational conditions

30. In 1964, the number of pupils in the public schools was 8,671 compared with 8,201 in 1963. The need for more rooms was met partially through the addition of 20 elementary classrooms and 14 high school classrooms. In addition, a new gymnasium, a new music suite and four vocational shops were put into use of Charlotte Amalie High School, and similar instruction facilities were under construction in St. Croix.

31. The College of the Virgin Islands successfully completed its first academic year in 1964. It appeared that the student body would double in size with a projected enrolment of up to 100 full-time students and more than 400 part-time students during its second year.

Political and constitutional developments

Report of the Constitutional Commissioner, 1965

33. A new constitution which would allow the British Virgin Islands to move gradually towards self-government was recommended in the report of the Constitutional Commissioner, which was published on 12 August 1965. The report was prepared by Dr. Mary Proudfoot, Fellow of Somerville College, Oxford. It contains some critical comments concerning present arrangements, which involve an administrator presiding over the Executive Council and Legislative Council, without a ministerial system. "Government at all levels seems to be little aware that the object of the whole operation was to serve the people", Dr. Proudfoot writes. "The fact that the Government is largely out of touch with the people is, I believe, one of the main reasons for the present discontent."

34. The report recommended a ministerial group of three to be formed from the seven elected members of the Legislative Council. There would be a First Minister whom the elected members would choose from among their members. He would then co-opt two others. The three ministers would be responsible for running the Government, apart from those matters which would still be the responsibility of the Administrator. In particular, the Administrator would still retain responsibility for economic and financial affairs.

⁵ The information presented in this section has been derived from published reports and from the information transmitted to the Secretary-General by the United Kingdom under Article 73 e of the Charter on 25 August 1965, for the year ending 31 December 1964.

35. This scheme would, it has been suggested, permit the steady growth of self-government, with the First Minister and his two colleagues assuming more and more responsibility, and Administrator and the officials receding further into the background. The matter of a new constitution is apparently still under discussion.

36. The report of the Constitutional Commissioner was debated by the Legislative Council in October 1965. At the conclusion of the debate, the Council unanimously adopted the following resolution:

"That the Council takes note of the report by the Constitutional Commissioner (Mrs. Proudfoot) and requests the Secretary of State for the Colonies to receive a delegation from this Council with a view to drawing up a new constitution for the territory based on that report, subject to certain modifications which will be set out in detail by the delegation."

37. Subsequently the United Kingdom proposed that a constitutional conference be held in London beginning on 3 October 1966. In May, the Virgin Islands Government agreed to this proposal.

Public Service

38. The Community Development Officer resumed duty after a one-year course at the Institute of Education at an overseas university and an administrative secretary was granted study leave abroad. In 1964, there were six overseas officers in the Public Service and twelve local officers who filled posts of a status and grade comparable to posts held by overseas officers.

Economic conditions

39. Government revenue and expenditure during the period 1962-1964 were as follows:

Year	Revenue (Value in United States dollars)	Expenditure
1962	343,617	899,011
1963	574,212	947,347
1964	613,262	873,581

40. Statistics of crops, forest products, livestock, fisheries for 1964 are not available owing to severe drought conditions.

Social conditions

Public health

41. The two medical posts were filled in 1964 but recruitment for nursing posts remained a problem. The medical staff in 1964 included two registered physicians, five nurses of senior training, thirteen certified nurses, nine partially trained nurses (including student nurses), four midwives of senior training, five certified midwives, eight partially trained midwives (including students at hospital), one sanitary inspector, one laboratory and X-ray technician, one assistant laboratory technician and one pharmacist.

42. Government expenditure on medical and health services in 1964 was $96,358, compared with $79,187 in 1963.

Educational conditions

43. Government expenditure on education, including subventions to institutions outside the Territory, amounted to $152,103 in 1964, compared with $155,265 in 1963.

GENERAL

Constitutional proposals

44. On 12 November 1965, the Colonial Secretary was asked in the House of Commons if he would make a statement about the constitutional future of the islands in the eastern Caribbean. The Colonial Secretary replied that in recent months most of the Governments in the Leeward and Windward Islands had submitted requests for constitutional changes. These had been carefully considered by the United Kingdom Government and, as a result, he had put certain suggestions to the Governments which they were now considering. He had also asked Sir Stephen Luke, who was to be accompanied by a legal adviser, to visit the Territories on his behalf for private discussions with the Governments, and hoped to make a fuller statement on this subject after his visit.

45. Sir Stephen Luke and Mr. de Winton, legal adviser, first visited Antigua in the Leeward Islands, followed by St. Kitts, Montserrat, Dominica, St. Lucia and St. Vincent. The visit took place at the end of 1965.

46. A new constitutional status for six islands and groups of islands in the east Caribbean to be known as "States in Association with Britain" was proposed in a White Paper published by the Colonial Office on 30 December 1965.

47. The new association dealt only with the four Windward Islands: St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Dominica and Grenada, and two of the Leeward Islands, Antigua and St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla. It was decided that constitutional changes for the much smaller Territory of Montserrat would be considered separately.

48. Under the constitutional arrangements, each Territory would become a State in association with the United Kingdom, with control of its internal affairs and with the right to amend its own constitution, including the power to end this association and to declare itself independent. Such constitutional amendments would require a two-thirds majority in the legislature and a two-thirds majority of the votes cast in a referendum.

49. So long as the Territories remained States in association with the United Kingdom, that Government would accept responsibility for their external affairs and defence, and the United Kingdom Parliament and the Queen-in-Council would have legislative power for the discharge of their responsibility. Apart from these powers and responsibilities, and powers concerned with the application in the Territories of the British Nationality Acts, the United Kingdom Government would have no power to legislate for the Territories without their consent and no responsibility for the conduct of their affairs.

50. The head of the executive government would be the Queen's Representative appointed for a term of five years by the Queen on the advice of the Secretary of State for the Colonies who would be guided by the Chief Minister (or Premier) concerned. A United Kingdom Government representative in the area would be responsible for the conduct of relations between the United Kingdom and the Territories.

51. Safeguards for the preservation of democratic forms of government and for the protection of fundamental rights would be entrenched in the constitutions of the Territories. A superior court would be established for all the Territories whose functions would include securing the observances and interpretations of the constitutions. The President of the Court would be appointed by the Lord Chancellor. Citizenship would continue to be governed by the British Nationality Acts unless a Territory established a separate citizenship.

52. The Territories would continue to be eligible to receive British aid, including budgetary assistance. These arrangements, if accepted, would provide the basis from which fresh forms of regional co-operation either among themselves or with neighbouring islands could be considered.

53. Subsequently, the Colonial Secretary was asked in the House of Commons on 27 January 1966 what reaction the Government had received from the Governments of the Eastern Caribbean Islands to the proposals for association with the United Kingdom which had been put to them. A spokesman for the Colonial Secretary replied that it was understood that the proposals were generally acceptable as a basis for discussion and that so far an official reply has been received only from the Government of Antigua.

54. On 31 January 1966, the Chief Minister of St. Vincent declared on his return from the Chief Ministers' meeting in St. Lucia that all the Chief Ministers were united in their demands in connexion with the constitutional proposals for the Windward and Leeward Islands. He said they would present a united front to the Colonial Office when the conference was convened in London in the near future.

Constitutional conferences

55. A series of constitutional conferences on six of these Territories (constitutional change in Montserrat is to be considered separately) took place in London between 28 February 1966 and 26 May 1966 as follows:

Antigua, 28 February 1966-25 March 1966

Dominica, Grenada, St. Lucia and St. Vincent, 18 April 1966-6 May 1966

St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla, 12 May 1966-26 May 1966.

56. It is reported that agreement was reached on the new constitutional status of association with the United Kingdom outlined in the constitutional proposals published in December 1965.

57. Speaking at the conclusion of the last conference, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Mr. Frederick Lee was reported as saying that he hoped the new constitutional arrangements would go into effect "about the turn of the year".

58. Comments reported to have been made by some of the leading participants at each of the conferences are set out below. These are followed by a brief summary of the principal agreements reached.

Comments on the conferences

Antigua Conference

59. Antigua was the first of the Eastern Caribbean Islands to discuss the proposed new relationship with Britain as an "associated state" (see paras. 46-54 above). A Constitutional Conference opened in London on 28 February 1966 under the chairmanship of Lord Longford, the Secretary of State for Colonial Affairs. The Antigua delegation was headed by the Island's Chief Minister, Mr. V. C. Bird. It was announced that the other members of the Conference would include the Administrator, Mr. David Rose, as well as other high-ranking officials in government, industry and labour in the Territory.

60. At the opening of the Conference, the Secretary of State for Colonial Affairs said that some of Britain's overseas Territories, though capable of the normal domestic functions of government, had not at present the resources of men and money to manage their own defence and external affairs. In these circumstances, Britain was prepared to consider to continue to handle defence and external affairs, provided it was satisfied that it would have adequate powers and could be sure that the Territory would try to observe at all times a similar standard of constitutional government and rule of law to those enjoyed in Britain.

61. At the close of the Conference the then Secretary of State for the Colonies, Lord Longford, was reported as saying:

"We had to devise a new relationship between Britain and Antigua. These are two countries geographically very far apart and very different in size and responsibilities, but nevertheless with close ties forged by 300 years of history. We wanted to devise a non-colonial relationship in which Antigua would enjoy full internal autonomy while Britain dealt with external affairs and defence. The arrangements for this relationship had to be such as would do justice to both parties. It had to be one which the people of Antigua could enter with dignity and cordiality while at the same time they undertook tasks commensurate with their size and the scale of their resources. It also had to be one in which Britain could adequately discharge the responsibilities it was going to shoulder. Our common institutions—the respect for the rule of law, the freedom of the individual and the institutions of parliamentary democracy—have been the foundations upon which the new arrangement itself has been built. There is no reason why, if such be the wish of the people and Government of Antigua, the relationship itself should not last as long as these foundations survive. For its successful operation it will of course require mutual understanding and mutual goodwill which, I am sure, will be forthcoming from both sides."

62. Mr. V. C. Bird, Chief Minister of Antigua, was reported to have said:

"We have been considering this new relationship between the United Kingdom and ourselves where there will be a free association and, after months of giving consideration to the form that this new relationship should take, we have worked out what I feel will be a satisfactory constitution. This new constitution will give to our people the right to run their own affairs locally, agreeing for Britain to look after the affairs of external matters and defence, but at the back of it all is the right of freedom for the people, because the people of Antigua themselves will have the right to declare their independence whenever they so desire. I think with that right of abrogation we can say truthfully to anybody in the world, and to our people at home, that we are satisfied with the solution that has been found. The new constitution should enable our people to feel that they are free and they have got the reins of their destinies into their own hands."

Dominica, Grenada, St. Lucia and St. Vincent Conference

63. At the opening of the Conference, Mr. H. Blaize, the Chief Minister of Grenada was reported to have stated that he expected to discuss economics and trade as well as constitutional matters. He added that the proposed associated Territories would not thrive and grow on a constitutional exercise alone.

64. On 29 April, it was reported that the talks seemed to be "bogged down" as the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Mr. Frederick Lee, had not shown willingness to meet immigration and trade guarantees. Grenada's Chief Minister, Mr. H. Blaize, had urged the establishment in the United Kingdom of a council to promote investment in the islands. Sir Garnet Gordon of St. Lucia, Mr. Keith Alleyne of Dominica and Mr. Ebenezer Joshua had all emphasized the need for the creation of light industries to help their Territories meet growing social and economic strains.

65. A number of delegates were reported to have been disappointed at their failure to secure any substantial financial assistance from the United Kingdom. The Secretary of State for the Colonies was reported to have promised to look into the matter of greater economic assistance for the islands at some future date.

66. During the Conference, separate meetings were held with each delegation to discuss internal constitutional proposals made by the territorial Governments. The main features of each constitution are described in the paragraphs below.

St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla Conference

67. The Chief Minister of St. Kitts, Mr. Paul Southwell, was reported to have said at the opening of the Conference that his delegation wanted the new status of association reviewed every four years. He also urged the United Kingdom to do more to boost the colony's living standards and economic development. He suggested the establishment of an economic sub-committee to work side by side with the constitutional conference.

68. At the conclusion of the Conference, the Chief Minister was reported to have said the agreement was the best that could have been extracted under the circumstances. But, he continued, the accord does not "give complete cause for joy". The islands had accepted it "without undue alacrity because we have been and still are inclined toward a full-scale West Indian nation in the Caribbean".

Main features of the new arrangements

General

69. By the terms of the new arrangements agreed upon at the constitutional conferences, each Territory will have full control over internal matters while the United Kingdom will retain powers relating to external affairs and defence. Each Territory will have full power to amend its constitution including the power to end the association with the United Kingdom and declare itself independent. A summary of the arrangements is set out below.

External affairs and defence

70. It was agreed by all the Governments that the United Kingdom Government was to act in close collaboration with the Governments of the associated States in matters which affect their territories concerning defence and foreign affairs and that the United Kingdom Government may confer authority upon the Government of an associate State to deal with specific foreign affairs and defence matters. It was further agreed that the Governments of the Territories would provide such defence facilities as were required by the United Kingdom; would not, without the consent of Britain, grant access to any other Government to their territories; and would not use the United Kingdom forces in the aid of civil power.

71. With respect to external affairs, the United Kingdom and the Governments of Antigua, St. Vincent, Grenada and Dominica agreed that the United Kingdom would consult with the respective Governments before entering into international obligations concerning them, that the three Territories would pass the necessary legislation, and that the fullest consultation would take place between the Governments. All the Governments agreed that authority would be granted by the United Kingdom to each Territory, provided that it did not conflict with the responsibilities of the United Kingdom Government, to apply for membership of the United Nations specialized agencies; to sign agreements of local concern with other Commonwealth States in the Caribbean; to agree to financial and technical assistance from the Commonwealth, the United States of America or international organizations of which the United Kingdom was a member; and to make migration agreements with other countries.

Termination of association

72. The procedure for termination of the association, which both the United Kingdom and the Territories would be free to do at any time, requires the approval of a two-thirds majority in the lower house of Parliament and a two-thirds majority of the votes cast in a referendum. However, in the event that the association is terminated for the purpose of joining with an independent Commonwealth country in the Caribbean, either in union, federation or association, no referendum would be required. The delegates to the Dominica, Grenada, St. Lucia and St. Vincent Conference, who had expressed apprehension at the possibility of arbitrary use by the United Kingdom of the power to terminate the association, received assurances that the United Kingdom would give six months' notice of intent to end the association, would seek the approval of the United Kingdom Parliament before doing so, and would also be prepared to hold a conference to discuss ending the association.

Constitutional arrangements

73. Separate constitutions for each Territory were drawn up at the Conference. They provide for parliaments which in the case of Dominica, St. Lucia and St. Vincent will consist of one house (with ten, eleven and thirteen elected members respectively, three nominated and one ex officio member) and, in the cases of Antigua and Grenada, an upper and lower house. Amendment of the constitution can only take place in the Territory concerned and will require either approval by two thirds of the members of parliament or two thirds of the electorate in the cases of basic clauses of the constitution such as fundamental freedoms or the structure of parliament. Each parliament will have a life of five years.

Judiciary

74. The Governments are to participate in a Supreme Court of Judicature whose jurisdiction could be extended to other interested Territories in the region. The court will have jurisdiction over the following matters, among others: fundamental rights and freedoms, membership of the parliaments, and conflicts between parts of the constitution of each state. The jurisdiction of the High Court will be prescribed by the parliaments of the respective Territories.

Citizenship

75. Citizenship of the respective Territories will, as in the past, continue to be held in common with the United Kingdom and colonies. However, should the association be terminated, separate citizenship for each Territory, provision for which is inscribed in each constitution, will become operative and will apply to persons born in the Territory, those whose father is a citizen of the Territory, and women married to citizens of the Territory.

Economic aid

76. At the Antigua Conference it was agreed that after the new constitutional arrangements came into force Antigua would continue to be eligible for British aid. Colonial Development and Welfare grants and loans and research grants from 1946 to 1965 to Antigua amounted to £2.4 million, in addition to which Antigua received technical assistance, Exchequer loans and Commonwealth Development Corporation funds.

77. Early in the Conference on Dominica, Grenada, St. Lucia and St. Vincent, all the delegates pressed the United Kingdom delegation for assurances that the new status would not result in a less favourable position for the islands in respect of trade, aid and immigration. The United Kingdom delegation stated that, in view of other commitments, and as aid had been recently increased to the four islands, resulting in roughly £6 per head of population annually being made available, financial assistance could not be increased, but efforts would be made to spend it more effectively. Aid undertakings already given would be carried out in full and budgetary aid would be provided if necessary. (In 1965, of the four islands, only St. Lucia did not require budgetary aid.) With regard to trade and immigration the United Kingdom delegation explained that the new constitutional arrangement would not alter present trading arrangements, and that the United Kingdom Government could not offer specially favourable treatment to immigrants from the associated states over other Commonwealth immigrants.

Regional co-operation

78. In accordance with the proposal of the White Paper of December 1965, the Governments expressed their willingness to discuss the question of future regional co-operation among themselves and other Territories in the area later in 1966.

Entry into force

79. The new arrangements agreed to at the conferences are subject to the approval of each of the territorial legislatures and to the necessary legislation being enacted by the United Kingdom Parliament. In this connexion, it may be noted that elections for the territorial legislatures were held in Grenada in September 1962, in St. Lucia in June 1965, in Antigua in November 1965, and in Dominica in January 1966. Elections were held in St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla on 25 July 1966 as a result of which the government party was returned. Elections are due to be held in St. Vincent by August 1966.

ANTIGUA⁶

General

80. In 1963 the estimated population was 61,664.

Political and constitutional developments

Elections

81. Antiguan went to the polls on 29 November 1965 to elect ten candidates out of a field of twenty-five. The two main parties contesting the election were the Antigua Labour Party (ALP), led by Chief Minister Mr. Vere Bird, which controlled all ten seats in the last House, and the Antigua-Barbuda Democratic Movement (ABDM), led by an estate owner, Mr. Robert Hall. There were also five independents in the contest. The Antigua Labour Party was returned to power after capturing all seven of the constituencies contested in the general election. During the heated campaigning the victorious party placed emphasis on "Independence for Antigua along the lines of the Cook Islands".

Public Service

82. An in-service training course for senior officers was held during 1964 on aspects of public administration. There were 10 expatriate officers serving at the close of 1964 (5 pensionable and 5 on contract) as against 50 senior local officers. The total number of local officers of all grades (excluding daily paid staff) numbered 1,468.

Economic conditions

83. The economy of the country continued to be based on agriculture, with sugar and cotton as the principal exports. Tourism is of increasing importance.

84. During the period 1962-64, the total trade of Antigua, St. Kitts and Montserrat with the United Kingdom (British Board of Trade returns in £ sterling), was as follows:

	1962	1963	1964 ^a
Imports to the United Kingdom	1,247,320	3,635,925	2,866,717
Exports from the United Kingdom	2,245,393	2,049,415	2,439,222
Re-exports from the United Kingdom	33,043	17,165	22,478

^a Includes the British Virgin Islands.

85. In 1964, estimated local revenue, derived mainly from customs duties and internal revenue taxes, amounted to $WI 10,231,191. In addition, the Territory received $WI 24,168 from the Overseas Service Aid Scheme, $WI 94,897 from Colonial Development and Welfare Scheme and $WI 89,740 from other sources, bringing the total estimated revenue to $WI 10,439,996, compared with $WI 11.6 million in 1963.⁷ Total estimated expenditure in 1964 was $WI 9,746,681, compared with $WI 9.7 million in 1963.

ember 1965 by the Premiers of Barbados and British Guiana, Mr. Errol Barrow and Mr. Forbes Burnham, and by the Chief Minister of Antigua, Mr. V. C. Bird. The most important of the Convention's thirty-seven articles removes all import duties from goods deemed to have been manufactured in the participating Territories. The Convention must be implemented by the legislatures concerned. It may then be submitted for registration with the United Nations and the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT). It is hoped that more Territories will become party to the agreement.

Social conditions

Public health

87. The Government Medical Services in 1964 consisted of 15 registered physicians, 6 senior nurses, 4 senior midwives, 64 certified midwives, 20 sanitary inspectors, 3 laboratory and X-ray technicians and 7 pharmacists. There was one general hospital with 180 beds, a cottage hospital with 150 beds, and a mental hospital with 200 beds.

88. In 1964, recurrent expenditure spent by the Health and Medical Departments amounted to $WI 1,334,095.

Educational conditions

89. In 1964, the number of children receiving primary education was 11,614, compared with 13,450 in 1963.

90. The first priority in the improvement of primary education would be a rebuilding programme to replace the present inadequate school accommodations in rural areas. It was hoped to replace the school buildings in eight villages in the near future.

91. To improve the pupil/teacher ratio, the Antigua Government plans to increase the recruitment of primary school teachers and to expand the existing teacher/training programme.

DOMINICA⁸

General

92. In 1963 the estimated population was 63,609, compared with 59,916 in 1960.

Political and constitutional developments

93. At elections held on 8 January 1966 the Labour Party was returned to power, losing only one seat out of eleven to the Dominica United People's Party. Mr. Edward O. Leblanc was reappointed as Chief Minister. The Labour Party now has the right to propose two members to the Legislative Council, giving it twelve seats to one in the Council.

Economic conditions

94. During 1964, there was a gradual recuperation of the agricultural sector which had been ravaged by hurricane winds towards the close of 1963. Some increase in acreages under cultivation was noted, involving both more extensive cultivation on private holdings and acquisition of new lands by purchase from the Crown.

95. Bananas continued to be the mainstay of the economy and the main export crop, followed by citrus fruits and by-products, and by coconut-copra.

96. In 1963, imports were valued at $WI 11,991,464 and exports at $WI 7,752,709, compared with $WI 10.6 million and $WI 7.2 million respectively in 1961.

97. Public revenue, derived mainly from customs and excise duties, amounted to $WI 4,733,477 in 1964, an increase of $WI 610,898 over the 1963 figure. In addition, the sum of $WI 824,853 was received from Colonial Development and Welfare funds, $WI 34,722 under the Overseas Service Aid Scheme and $WI 1,305,454 in respect of an Administration grant-in-aid, making a total revenue of $WI 6,898,507.

98. Total expenditure in 1964 amounted to $WI 6,502,243, including $WI 311,414 on development schemes, compared with $WI 6,026,466 in 1963.

Social conditions

Labour

99. A newly formed Seamen and Waterfront Workers' Trade Union was registered on 23 December 1964, with a membership of 369. Six hundred and fifty-two workers emigrated to the United Kingdom, whilst 518 returned. In 1963, 180 workers emigrated to the United Kingdom.

Public health

100. During 1964, there was a great reduction in deaths in children under 2 years of age from gastro-enteritis and malnutrition which had been the major causes of death among children in previous years. The infant mortality rate for 1964 was 52.9 per 1,000 live births, which is the lowest recorded in the Territory. This improvement was due to the educational programmes given at the Nutrition and Child Health Centres and to services at crèches.

101. An immunization programme against poliomyelitis was started during 1964. All children between the ages of 4 months and 4 years were vaccinated at child health centres.

102. Ordinary public health expenditure amounted to $WI 740,178 in 1964, compared with $WI 609,573 in 1963. In addition $WI 43,040 was spent from Colonial Development and Welfare funds.

Educational conditions

103. Two new school buildings, one at Concord for 33 pupils and the other at Wotton Waven for 45 pupils, were opened during 1964 to relieve pupils in those areas where they had to walk long distances to school. The Canadian Government, through its Technical Aid Programme, has donated a school, which, when completed, will accommodate 1,000 pupils. Construction of the school was started towards the end of 1964.

GRENADA⁹

Political and constitutional developments

104. In the Speech from the Throne delivered in October 1965, the Administrator said that the Grenada Government was seeking a more advanced constitution to help it achieve unitary statehood with Trinidad and Tobago. He said that on 27 July 1965 his Government had asked the Colonial Secretary to consider full internal self-government for Grenada or at least to let it return to the 1960 Constitution.¹⁰ It will be recalled that by the terms of the Grenada (Constitution) Order in Council 1962,¹¹ which came into operation in June 1962, certain limitations were imposed on the Legislative and Executive Councils of the Territory.

105. In November 1965, talks aimed at the full restoration of the 1960 Constitution began. This was achieved on 1 February 1966 when a new Order in Council¹² revoked the 1962 Order in Council and restored the 1960 Constitution in its original form.

106. On 30 December 1965 the Colonial Office published a White Paper containing constitutional proposals for the East Caribbean Territories (see paras. 44-54 above), and arrangements were made for discussions to be held in London in March-April 1966 with representatives of the Grenada Legislature. The proposals provide for the Territory to become a State with full internal self-government, in association with the United Kingdom.

107. A special meeting of the Grenada Legislative Council was summoned on 17 January 1966 in connexion with the Secretary of State's Outline Constitution for Grenada which was issued at the same time as the publication of the White Paper. The only item on the agenda was a motion presented by the Chief Minister of Grenada, which called upon the Council to approve the Outline Constitution as a basis for negotiation and appoint a select committee to examine the Outline Constitution and make recommendations prior to submission of proposals to the Secretary of State. Part of this motion read: "... this new status will enable Grenada to work towards the goal of a Caribbean Economic Community of which union with Trinidad and Tobago is a part". The Chief Minister's motion was adopted.

108. The Opposition United Labour Party did not participate in the debate on the Chief Minister's motion. The reason for this absence as stated by Mr. Eric Gairy,¹³ the Opposition leader, in a press release was that:

"... the proposed new Constitution has nothing to do with the unitary state and we would not be caught debating a motion on the proposed constitution with unitary entanglement.

"If it were a motion simply to debate the Constitutional proposals and appoint a Select Committee to study the proposals and suggest amendments we would have been delighted to participate. ..."

109. Speaking in the Legislative Council on 24 February 1966, the Chief Minister, Mr. Herbert Blaize, said that he was still pursuing his goal of unitary statehood with Trinidad and Tobago. The idea of Grenada standing alone was nonsense and federation was dead. Achieving self-government was moving Grenada closer to its eventual position in a Caribbean economic community. The Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Eric Gairy, said that unitary statehood was dead and that it was time the Government dropped the idea.

Economic conditions

110. In 1964, there were no major changes in the economic conditions of the Territory. At the end of the year, it was announced that all marketing organization retail outlets would be closed as from 31 January 1965. The marketing officer and the two produce inspectors in his division would continue to inspect all produce for export and assist with collecting and recording production statistics. With the establishment of the Grenada Cocoa Industry Association, the marketing division was assisting with the initial registration of cocoa producers and dealers. These officers would also devote considerable efforts to bring local producers, middlemen and consumers together.

111. During 1964, food-stuffs, manufactured goods, clothing and leather footwear continued to be the major part of the imports which were valued at an estimated $WI 17,677,625 in 1964, as compared with $WI 15,023,636 in 1963. Exports were valued at an estimated $WI 7,233,805 in 1964, as compared with $WI 7,854,832 in 1963. The principal exports were cocoa beans ($WI 2,162,219), nutmegs ($WI 1,952,009) and bananas ($WI 1,845,325). Trade was mainly with the United Kingdom, Canada and the United States of America.

112. Total revenue, including Colonial Development and Welfare grants of $WI 419,000 and a United Kingdom grant-in-aid of $WI 1,365,000, amounted to approximately $WI 8,377,000 in 1964 compared with $WI 8,389,000 in 1963. Apart from the grants, the main sources of revenue in 1964 were customs and excise duties, totalling $WI 3,534,000, and taxes, amounting to $WI 1,410,000. Total estimated expenditure in 1964 amounted to $WI 8,362,000, compared with $WI 8,389,000 in 1963. The main heads of expenditure were education ($WI 1,273,000), medical services ($WI 1,243,000), public works ($WI 1,055,000), and the central road authority ($WI 603,000).

113. In November 1965, the Colonial Office endorsed proposals for the expenditure of $WI 2 million for development. This sum, as it was disclosed by Grenada's Chief Minister, was to be used, inter alia, for the continuation of his Government's water and road schemes, and for the fertilizer subsidy for 1966.

Social conditions

Labour

114. Agriculture provides the main source of employment in Grenada. The wages of agricultural workers were increased on 1 October 1963, to $WI 2.00 and $WI 1.70 for male and female workers respectively with effect from 1 February 1963. The increases resulted from voluntary collective bargaining between the employers and workers unions after a Commission of Inquiry had laid the basis for such increases.

115. It was announced in December 1965 that government civil servants would receive back-pay totalling $WI 783,000. This is retroactive to January 1965, in accordance with recommendations of the Gardner-Browne review of civil service salaries.

116. There were seventeen trade unions in the Territory in 1964.

¹⁰ Statutory Instrument No. 2200 of 1959, the Grenada (Constitution) Order in Council 1959, which came into operation on 1 January 1960.

¹¹ Statutory Instrument No. 1244 of 1962.

¹² Statutory Instrument No. 2162 of 1965.

¹³ Mr. Gairy requested a hearing by the Special Committee (see A/AC.109/PET.466), and was heard at the 463rd meeting on 7 September 1966 (see paras. 328-355 of this chapter).

Educational conditions

117. Construction was started on six new elementary school buildings in 1964, one of which was completed and occupied. Five of the buildings will rehouse existing schools and one will be used for a new girls' school. Twenty primary schools are still housed in old single-room structures and it may be some time before the physical problems which beset education may be resolved. At 31 December 1964, there were 56 primary schools (government and grant-aided) with 26,684 pupils and six secondary schools with 2,050 pupils. There is also a local teacher-training college which was attended by thirty-three students in 1964.

MONTSERRAT¹⁴*General*

118. In 1963 the population was 13,569, compared with 12,167 in 1960.

Political and constitutional developments

119. There is no information available other than that contained in paragraph 47 above and in the reports of the Special Committee to the General Assembly at its ninth and twentieth sessions (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. XXV, paras. 132-138; and A/6000/Rev.1, chap. XXIV, paras. 30-52).

Economic conditions

120. Economic conditions continued to improve in 1964. Real estate development and a more positive approach to the promotion of tourism were the two main factors responsible for this. A small furniture-making factory began operations towards the end of 1964.

121. Cotton continued to be the principal source of revenue for the peasant farmer but only 912 acres (1,152 acres in 1963) were planted for 1964/1965. The 1963/1964 crop yielded 375 bales of clean lint, compared with 333 bales in 1962-1963. Owing to the damage caused to plantations by hurricane "Cleo", the total production of bananas was not as good as had been expected and amounted to 16,480 stems valued at $WI 19,666. Exports of fruit and vegetables outside the Leeward Islands, of all sorts other than bananas and syrup, were valued at $WI 36,941. Lime juice and tomatoes accounted for 8 per cent of this figure, whilst exports within the Leeward Islands group were estimated at some 500 tons valued at $WI 150,000. The sugar cane industry suffered some reverses during 1964. Work was not completed on a new mill under construction and there was an unfortunate breakdown in the machinery at the existing Parson's mill. As a result, only 8,496 gallons of syrup were exported to Dominica, valued at $WI 5,947. The value of the main exports for 1964 was $WI 232,957. In 1963, total exports were valued at $WI 340,397. The Territory imports various food-stuffs, including flour, sugar, dried fish and rice. Other main imports include manufactured goods such as motor cars, electrical equipment, boots and shoes, as well as cotton and rayon piece goods, cement and medicine and drugs. The value of the main imports during 1964 was $WI 1,149,966.

In 1963, the value of the total imports was $WI 2,743,934.

122. In 1964, the total territorial revenue was $WI 1,240,603, derived mainly from customs duties ($WI 482,495) and from excise taxes and internal revenue ($WI 393,367). In addition, the Territory received grants-in-aid from the United Kingdom totalling $WI 1,477,280, bringing the total revenue to $WI 2,717,883. Total expenditure was $WI 2,740,523. In 1963, territorial revenue amounted to $WI 999,792 and the grant-in-aid to $WI 1,086,027. Total expenditure was $WI 1,992,786.

Social conditionsLabour

123. Owing to the real estate development during 1964, employment opportunities increased considerably. Forty agricultural workers were engaged under contract for work in the United States Virgin Islands.

124. The three trade unions registered under the Trade Union Act had a membership of 620. Prevailing wage rates for men ranged from $WI 2.60 per day for unskilled agricultural labour to $WI 5.50 per day for foremen in government employ. In industry, unskilled workers received $WI 2.50 to $WI 3.25 per day and skilled workers received $WI 5.00 to $WI 8.00 per day.

Public health

125. In 1964, there were two registered physicians, three senior nurses, twenty-four certified nurses, seven partially trained nurses, three senior midwives, twenty-two certified midwives, three sanitary inspectors, one laboratory and X-ray technician and two pharmacists.

126. The mean mid-year population was estimated at 13,885. The birth-rate was 24.6 per thousand and the death-rate 7.7 per thousand. A considerable reduction in infant mortality continued as a result of the WHO/UNICEF health programmes.

127. In 1964, expenditure on medical and health services amounted to $WI 247,200, compared with $WI 240,793 in 1963.

128. There were 3,203 children enrolled in the schools during 1964, including 2,938 in primary schools and 265 in the secondary school. In 1963, 3,066 pupils attended primary school and 217 attended secondary school.

129. Recurrent expenditure on primary education in 1964 was $WI 239,949, while that on secondary education was $WI 56,292. There was no capital expenditure. School fees at these secondary schools amounted to $WI 5,541. Expenditure on education was 13.22 per cent of the total recurrent expenditure for the Territory. In 1963, recurrent expenditure for primary education was $WI 209,427 and that for secondary education was $WI 62,685, representing 14.23 per cent of the total recurrent expenditure for the Territory.

ST. KITTS-NEVIS-ANGUILLA¹⁵*Political and constitutional developments*

Special Committee's reports to the General Assembly at its nineteenth and twentieth sessions (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. XXV, paras. 149-155; and A/6000/Rev.1, chap. XXIV, paras. 30-52).

Economic conditions

131. The total value of imports for the islands in 1964 was $WI 13.6 million, compared with $WI 12.2 million in 1963. The main imports during 1964 were food-stuffs such as flour ($WI 810,983), meat ($WI 635,258), fish ($WI 427,242), gasoline and kerosene ($WI 329,699), wood and timber ($WI 447,289), fertilizers ($WI 386,005), apparel ($WI 219,648), and motor cars ($WI 241,338). The imported goods came mainly from the United Kingdom ($WI 3.6 million), Canada ($WI 2.5 million) and the United States ($WI 1.9 million).

132. The total value of the exports from the Territory in 1964 was $WI 9.9 million, compared with $WI 8.3 million in 1963. The main exports continued to be sugar ($WI 8.8 million), molasses ($WI 346,000), cotton lint ($WI 116,000) and salt ($WI 89,926). Of the exports, $WI 7.3 million went to the United Kingdom and $WI 1.06 million to Canada.

133. In 1964, local revenue, which continued to be derived mainly from import duties ($WI 1.7 million) and income tax ($WI 1.3 million) amounted to $WI 5.1 million, compared with $WI 4.8 million in 1963.

Social conditions

134. There was an over-all increase of two cents per hour for all government non-establishment workers, with effect from 1 July 1964. The St. Kitts-Nevis Trade and Labour Union successfully negotiated a special increase in bonus payable to sugar factory workers.

Educational conditions

135. In 1966, the number of children receiving primary education in St. Kitts, including those attending senior schools, was 10,072. During the next five years the Government hopes to provide additional accommodation for about 5,000 children in St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla. Arrangements are in hand to improve the training of teachers, the programme for in-service training is to be increased, and, in addition, it is hoped to arrange for a further ten teachers a year to attend an external teacher-training college. Increased provision is to be made for textbooks and other teaching material.

136. The number of children receiving primary education in Nevis was 3,954, and in Anguilla, 1,744. Nevis has a common Education Department with St. Kitts and Anguilla, and the proposals for the improvement of education in St. Kitts apply also to Nevis.

ST. LUCIA¹⁶

137. The population at the end of 1963 was estimated to be 99,084.

¹⁶ The information on St. Lucia has been derived from published reports and from information transmitted to the Secretary-General by the United Kingdom under Article 73 of the Charter on 2 September 1965, for the year ending 31 December 1964.

Political and constitutional developments

138. In August 1965, St. Lucia's legislative Council, by a vote of 9 to 2, gave its Government approval to seek full internal self-government for the Territory by 1 January 1966. The action was opposed by the St. Lucia Labour Party which petitioned the United Kingdom Government to inquire into the governing of the Territory by the United Workers' Party. The United Workers' Party won eight of the ten elective seats in the Legislative Council following the elections held in June 1964. Previously the Labour Party had been in power for thirteen years.

Economic conditions

139. During 1964, St. Lucia benefited from financial assistance for economic development from the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada. The St. Lucia Government's projection for development is based on the expectation that such assistance will not only continue but will be increased during the next few years. The production of bananas, the Territory's chief crop, continued to show steady progress. In 1964, 5,142,000 stems valued at $WI 8,189,516 were exported to the United Kingdom, compared with 4,400,000 stems valued at $WI 6,191,000 in 1963. The other principal crops for export are copra, cocoa and coconut oil. The production of copra was 5,275,300 pounds valued at $WI 789,225; cocoa was 233,774 pounds valued at $WI 103,952 and coconut oil (refined and unrefined) 200,378 gallons valued at $WI 474,255. There has been an over-all production increase due chiefly to the application of fertilizers.

140. Total domestic exports and re-exports from the Territory in 1964 were valued at $WI 9,827,276. Total imports were valued at $WI 20,408,831. Detailed statistics on imports for 1964 are not available.

141. The principal heads of revenue in 1963 continued to be derived from customs and excise duties ($WI 3,666,969) and from income tax ($WI 1,278,474 in 1964). Estimated revenue for 1964 was $WI 7,561,706. In addition, the Territory received an Overseas Service Aid grant of $WI 64,104, and a Colonial Development and Welfare grant of $WI 625,920, bringing the total estimated revenue to $WI 8,251,730. The Territory was withdrawn from grant-in-aid of administration for the first time in sixteen years.

142. In an attempt to increase tourism, the Commonwealth Development Corporation, through Caribach Hotels, has built the island's first luxury hotel, and a major housing estate is being laid out at Cap Estate, which consists of 2,000 acres in the northern part of the island. Construction costs on the latter will total about £2.5 million.

Social conditions

Labour

143. The major problems in the field of labour and employment conditions continued to be a lack of adequate up-to-date information relating to all aspects of the labour market (employment, unemployment, composition, distribution, mobility etc.) and a dearth of labour statistics, particularly those on average earnings and actual hours worked in major employment. A request was made to the UNTAB for technical assistance under the 1964-1966 programme in the field of labour statistics collection and compilation. There were seven stoppages of work during the year, none of which exceeded two days, and fewer than 100 workers were directly involved.

Public health

144. No changes were reported in the number of hospitals or medical and health personnel. The birth-rate in 1963 was 40.2 per thousand and the death-rate was 10.8 per thousand compared with 12.4 in 1964. The principal causes of death were diseases of early infancy (11.06 per 100,000), gastro-enteritis and colitis, except diarrhoea of the new-born (99.92 per 100,000), pneumonia (99.92 per 100,000) and others. During 1964 approved estimated recurrent expenditure on public health (including Colonial Development and Welfare grants) was $WI 991,126.

Educational conditions

145. At the end of 1964, there were fifty-eight primary schools with 23,120 pupils and 651 teachers (of whom 117 were trained) and three secondary schools with 939 pupils and fifty-three masters (of whom twenty-two were graduates), an increase of seven over 1963. During 1963-1964, three schools designed as replacements for a total of 1,080 school places were completed, while construction of a fourth school to provide 550 places was started. The construction and replacement of schools were followed by a sharp increase in school attendance which aggravated the already serious shortage of trained teachers. Recurrent expenditure on education in 1964 was $WI 1,269,489, compared with $WI 1,056,152 in 1963. In addition, capital expenditure amounted to $WI 15,940, compared with $WI 55,313 in 1963; Colonial Development and Welfare grants totalled $WI 176,232.

ST. VINCENT¹⁷

General

146. The total population of St. Vincent at 31 December 1964 was estimated at 87,000.

Political and constitutional developments

147. There is no information available other than that contained in paragraphs 44 to 79 above and in the Special Committee's reports to the General Assembly at its nineteenth and twentieth sessions. (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. XXV, paras. 186-193; and A/6000/Rev.1, chap. XXIV, paras. 30-52).

Economic conditions

148. As in the previous year, bananas and arrowroot continued to be the main crops produced for export. Banana production remained at about the same level—28,057 short tons ($WI 3,372,700) were exported, against 28,217 short tons ($WI 3,006,935) in 1963. The acreage remained at about 8,500. Windstorms again did considerable damage. Arrowroot production reached an all-time peak in 1964: 58,000 barrels against 50,317 barrels the previous crop. Owing to poor market prospects it was expected that the 1964/1965 crop would be down to about 35,000 barrels. Further severe cuts in acreage to about 2,000 acres were considered necessary to avoid disastrously large carry-over stocks.

149. The area planted with cotton was increased to 966 acres (635 acres in 1963). The world price for cocoa has seriously affected efforts to promote this crop. Fortunately the local price was still attractive and this enabled small growers to put in a further 80 acres in 1964. Nutmeg prices were still fair and growers were shifting their interest to this tree crop. Modest plantings of Robusta coffee were made. Copra production remained steady at about 3,000 tons. Exports remained about 2,404 long tons, against 2,409 long tons in 1963. Exports of dry coconuts rose from 433,615 nuts to 678,715 nuts in 1964.

150. A new fisheries scheme has been proposed but has not yet been approved. The Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) was to begin investigational and training operations in this part of the Caribbean where one of their five modern deep-sea trawlers would be based. Local fisheries departments hoped to obtain much needed help from them in training local staff and mapping fishing grounds.

151. The main export items continued to be bananas and arrowroot. Total exports in 1964 were valued at $WI 5,989,084. Imports included food-stuffs, footwear, fabrics, timber etc. The total value of imports amounted to $WI 16,064,114 in 1964. Trade is mainly with the United Kingdom, other United Kingdom Territories, Canada and the United States.

152. Total revenue amounted to $WI 6,950,293 in 1964, compared with $WI 5,416,774 in 1963. Ordinary revenue, of which over half was derived from customs, excise and other duties, amounted to $WI 4,739,913 in 1964, compared with $WI 4,194,416 in 1963. In addition, the Territory received a United Kingdom grant-in-aid ($WI 1,134,907), Colonial Development and Welfare funds ($WI 60,227) and Overseas Service Aid ($WI 13,680) totalling $WI 1,208,814, compared with $WI 1,302,358 in 1963. Budgeting expenditure amounted to $WI 5,594,141 in 1964, compared with $WI 5,530,399 in 1963. Colonial Development and Welfare expenditure was $WI 503,737.

Social conditions

Labour

153. At 31 December 1964, the working population was estimated at 31,000. By working population is meant the number of persons between 15 and 65 years of age who work for pay or gain or who offer themselves for such work. The working population is being constantly replenished by young entrants at the rate of some 1,000 per annum and the problem of finding employment for the labour force is at present engaging the attention of the Government. The activities of the Public Works Department are undertaken, as far as possible, during the slack period—June to November—at the time when very little work is available in agriculture, as St. Vincent is an agricultural community and employment is seasonal. Responsibility for the administration of labour rests with the Department of Labour.

154. There were no changes in the number of registered organizations. In 1964, 185 recruited workers returned from the United States and St. Croix, United States Virgin Islands. Two hundred and thirty-five workers were recruited during the year.

¹⁷ The information on St. Vincent has been derived from published reports and from information transmitted to the Secretary-General by the United Kingdom under Article 73 e of the Charter on 30 August 1965, for the year ending 31 December 1964.

Public health

155. The organization of the Medical Department remained unchanged. The vacant posts of senior medical officer and three district medical officers were filled in 1964. Increases in the medical facilities included one out-patient dispensary. In 1964, there were 11 government and 2 private registered physicians, 8 government nurses of senior training, 54 certified government nurses and 23 private, and 4 government midwives of senior training. In 1964, the birth-rate was 42.7 per thousand compared with 43.1 per thousand in 1963; and the death-rate was 9.5 and 11.9 per thousand respectively. The morbidity and mortality patterns continued to show the same trends observed during the previous year, except for an increase in the number of typhoid cases notified (from 15 to 29) as the result of a minor outbreak. The high mortality rate in young children remained a public health problem, the risk of death being greatest between the ages of 6 months and 2 years, the dominating causes being malnutrition and gastro-enteritis.

Educational conditions

156. There was no significant change in the educational conditions in the Territory. The construction of the Health and Welfare Training Centre (Youth Trust Fund) and the Boy's Grammar School (to accommodate 500 pupils) was completed in 1964. Primary schools are still badly overcrowded and school building has not yet caught up with the need for additional accommodation.

4. BARBADOS¹⁸*General*

157. The population of the Territory at the end of 1964 was 241,925, giving a density of 1,481 persons per square mile.

Political and constitutional developments

158. On 12 August 1965, the Barbados Government laid before the legislature a White Paper entitled "The Federal Negotiations, 1962-65 and Constitutional Proposals for Barbados" in which it was stated that the House of Assembly would be asked to agree to a resolution requesting the Secretary of State for the Colonies to fix an early date for a conference on independence; and if agreed to, the Senate would be invited to concur therein.

159. On 14 August, the Premier of Barbados, Mr. Errol Barrow, stated at a press conference that his Government had had three years of discussions with the other islands in the Windwards and Leewards on an eastern Caribbean federation and there was still no basic idea as to the formation of a federation. He asserted, however, that the White Paper and the decisions it contained had not closed the door to federation.

160. The Democratic Labour Party (DLP), the ruling party in Barbados, endorsed at its annual meeting on 21 September 1965 the proposal contained in the White Paper for independence alone, and defeated a resolution for independence within a federation.

161. Since the White Paper's release, the official Opposition, the Barbados National Party (BNP), the Barbados Labour Party (BLP) and a new group described as the "Under Forties", have publicly aired their views against independence for Barbados alone. The Barbados Labour Party charged that the White Paper contained a large number of distortions and that the material in it had been presented in a manner to deceive the public on the cost of independence. The Party's spokesman said: "The Party decided that it will sponsor a series of meetings to mobilize public opinion, and would use every means at its disposal to expose the misrepresentations and distortions contained in the White Paper and to obtain support for its view that the future of Barbados lies in an independent Eastern Caribbean Federation."

162. On 24 November 1965, the Secretary of the Barbados Labour Party presented a resolution to the Governor for transmission to the Secretary of State for the Colonies calling for a general election to decide the issue of whether Barbados should seek independence alone or as part of an eastern Caribbean federation. The resolution said also that the Government had no mandate from the people to seek independence for Barbados alone.

163. On the other hand, the Barbados Workers' Union has pledged its fullest support to the Barbados Government's plan to seek independence. This pledge was embodied in a resolution passed at the Union's twenty-fourth annual delegates' conference on 28 August 1965.

164. On 8 January 1966, the Barbados House of Assembly, after a five-day debate, passed a resolution, by 14 votes to 9, requesting independence for Barbados in isolation. Opposition Barbados Labour Party members spoke in favour of federation.

165. On 24 January, the twenty-one-member Senate passed by 17 votes to 3 a resolution authorizing the Government to take Barbados into independence alone. The Senate rejected an amendment which called for a general election to let the people decide whether they wanted to go alone or within a federation of the eastern Caribbean.

166. On the same day, the Premier of Barbados said that he expected the Territory would adjust to full independence with no disruption of parliamentary government and declared that Barbados would remain in the Commonwealth.

167. On 3 February 1966, it was announced in the House of Commons that the United Kingdom had agreed to the request of Barbados to arrange a conference on independence at a mutually convenient time. In reply to a question whether a pledge would be given before the conference that elections would be held in the island before independence was finally given, the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies replied that "of course it is a desire of Her Majesty's Government that before independence is agreed we should have an assurance that the majority of the people in any Territory desire that independence".

168. The constitutional conference on Barbados took place in London between 20 June and 5 July 1966. Representing Barbados were the Premier and members of his party (Democratic Labour Party), the leader of the Opposition and members of his party (Barbados National Party) and representatives of the Barbados Labour Party.

169. The conference had before it the draft independence constitution prepared by the Barbados Government which had been approved by both houses of the Barbados Parliament.

170. Agreement was reached at the conference that Barbados should become independent on 30 November 1966. There were, however, a number of differences between the government party and the opposition parties over particular provisions of the draft constitution. Some of these were resolved in discussion, but on others unanimous agreement could not be reached.

171. The Secretary of State for the Colonies summed up the proceedings in a statement to the conference on 1 July as follows:

"This Constitutional Conference has now completed the major part of its business.

"We have examined the draft constitution produced by the Government of Barbados and I am happy to say that, on much of it, all parties represented round this table have reached agreement. This will be recorded in the report of the Conference where the main features of the constitution will be described. There are certain matters on which, unfortunately, it was not possible for the Government and the two Opposition parties to agree, and I appreciate the importance of some of them to the parties in Barbados. They are all matters on which it is understandable that there might be differences of view between the various groups in a democratic society framing a constitution for independence. These disagreements will also have to be set out and recorded in the Conference report.

"The Legislature of Barbados in requesting me to call this Conference proposed that as a result of it Barbados should proceed to separate independence in 1966.

"On this question of separate independence for Barbados I have as you all know had separate discussions with all the parties represented round this table. I understand that, although some of the Barbadian representatives would have preferred their country to seek independence in an association with their neighbours in the Caribbean, all parties are agreed that for the time being this aim is not attainable and therefore they concur in the proposal that Barbados should proceed to separate independence.

"In the meetings which I had with the parties separately to discuss this question I made it plain that, having heard their views, I would consult my colleagues and let them have the United Kingdom Government's decision. I am now in a position to inform the Conference that these consultations have taken place and that, subject to the passage of the necessary legislation by the United Kingdom Parliament, Her Majesty's Government agree that Barbados should become independent on 30 November 1966.

"The question of the date of the next elections in Barbados is one for the Government of Barbados to determine, bearing in mind that a Dissolution is in any case due not later than 19 December 1966. They will doubtless be announcing their decision in due course."

172. The main provisions of the new Constitution for Barbados are set out below. The provisions with which the Opposition parties disagreed are also indicated.

173. Executive authority will be exercised by a Governor-General. The general direction and control of the Government of Barbados will rest with the Cabinet consisting of the Prime Minister and other Ministers. The Governor-General will appoint as Prime Minister the person who appears to him best able to command the confidence of the majority of the members of the Assembly. He will appoint the other Ministers on the advice of the Prime Minister.

174. The Constitution will provide for a legislature that will consist of a Senate of twenty-one members and a House of Assembly of twenty-four members. All members of the Senate will be appointed by the Governor-General; twelve on the advice of the Prime Minister, two on the advice of the Leader of the Opposition and seven in the Governor-General's discretion to represent religious, economic or social interests. Provisions will be included in the Constitution to restrict the powers of the Senate along the lines of the existing provisions. The Opposition parties proposed that the Senate should be so composed that the Government would be unable to secure the required two-thirds majority for an amendment of an entrenched provision of the Constitution without the support of at least part of the Opposition. This proposal was not accepted.

175. The House of Assembly is to consist of not less than twenty-four members. The Constitution will lay down certain principles concerning the electoral arrangements and will set out the qualifications for membership of the Assembly. All other matters concerning elections are to be dealt with by laws passed by the Legislature. The Opposition parties proposed that the Constitution should lay down the qualifications for electors as well as those for membership and that both should be entrenched provisions. They also proposed that the Constitution make provision for an impartial commission to supervise the registration of electors and the conduct of the elections; for single member constituencies; and for a boundaries commission to review constituency boundaries. These proposals were not accepted.

176. The Constitution will also make provision for safeguarding fundamental rights and freedoms, irrespective of race, place of origin, political opinion, colour, creed or sex, subject to respect for the rights and freedoms of others and for the public interest. Subject to safeguards, derogation from certain of these fundamental rights and freedoms will be permitted in time of war, public emergency, or when democratic institutions are threatened by subversion. The Opposition parties proposed an alternative draft designed to avoid the use of the word "subversion". The Chairman considered that there was no difference in substance between the two drafts and ruled against the Opposition draft.

177. The Constitution will also provide for the manner in which the Constitution may be amended by the Legislature. Certain provisions may not be altered without the support of two thirds of members of both Houses. These entrenched provisions include those relating to: citizenship; fundamental rights and freedoms; the appointment of members of the Senate, including qualifications for membership; and the composition of the House of Assembly. The requirement of a two-thirds majority will not apply to an amendment to give constitutional effect to arrangements under which Barbados is to join with any other country or territory within the Commonwealth.

178. Citizens of the United Kingdom and Colonies born in Barbados, or whose father was born in Barbados, will automatically become citizens of Barbados. Commonwealth citizens or their wives who fulfil certain residence qualifications may register as citizens of Barbados. The Opposition parties did not agree that such registration should be subject to exceptions prescribed by law in the interests of national security and public policy.

179. The Constitution will also provide for such matters as the life of the Parliament, the Judicature, the Public Service and the Service Commissions.

Economic conditions

180. The production of sugar and its by-products, rum and molasses, continued in 1964 to dominate the island's economy. There were 50,848 acres under sugar cane in 1964. The total production of sugar and fancy molasses was 161,497 tons. The fishing industry landed 4.6 million pounds of fish and 1.48 million pounds of shrimp in 1964.

181. Industrial gas production for 1964 amounted to 117.6 million cubic feet which was used for domestic, industrial and commercial purposes. Applications from companies for licences to explore for oil were under consideration, and it was announced on 10 July 1965 that the Cabinet, under the authority of section 4 of the Petroleum Act, 1950, had granted a prospecting licence for a period of two years.

182. The tourist industry continued to expand steadily. A total of 57,598 tourists visited the island in 1964. In addition, ninety-five cruise ships called with 41,671 passengers. The gross hard currency earnings from this industry were estimated at $WI 23 million.

183. Imports for 1964 amounted to $WI 109,019,973, compared with $WI 98,871,434 in 1963. The increase of $WI 10,148,539 occurred mainly in items of food, chemicals, machinery and transport and manufactured goods. Imported goods come mainly from the United Kingdom ($WI 32,566,394 in 1964), the United States ($WI 17,590,670), Canada ($WI 12,920,046) and other Commonwealth countries.

184. The total value of exports, excluding in-transit trade, was $WI 60,468,621 in 1964, compared with $WI 69,788,185 in 1963. The principal items of domestic exports continue to be sugar (140,744 tons valued at $WI 30,893,233); molasses (10,567,427 gallons valued at $WI 6,247,607); rum (765,403 gallons valued at $WI 2,242,183—provisional figures); soap; margarine; edible oil; and lard.

185. An agreement for a free trade area linking Barbados, Antigua and British Guiana was signed on 15 December 1965 (see para. 86 above). The most important of the thirty-seven articles provide for free trade for locally made goods.

186. Revenue continued to be derived mainly from customs and excise duties and from taxation. The total revenue in 1964-1965 amounted to an estimated $WI 37,398,803. Capital expenditure for 1964-1965 totalled $WI 8,201,356, compared with $WI 9,553,178 in 1963-1964. The total expenditure for 1964-1965 was estimated at $WI 33,038,009. At 31 March 1965, the public debt had risen to $WI 43,235,000 compared with $WI 35,106,000 in 1964.

Social conditions

187. The index of retail prices in 1964 (June 1953 = 100) rose from 115.9 in January to 117.1 in October, and declined to 116.7 in December. According to provisional estimates for 1964, the national income was $WI 147.1 million.

Labour

188. The majority of the gainfully occupied population is engaged in the cultivation and harvesting of sugar cane, and the processing of the cane into sugar and fancy molasses. Approximately 22,264 workers were employed during the peak of the reaping season (January-June) and 15,943 during the out-of-crop period (July-December). There are no available up-to-date statistics relating to unemployment or under-employment.

189. The emigration of Barbadian agricultural workers for short-term contracts with private employers in other countries followed the pattern of previous years. At the beginning of 1963, there were 1,960 workers under contract. During the year, 1,052 workers were repatriated while 1,925 were engaged. At the end of the year, the number still under contract in the United States of America was 1,634. During 1964, 2,507 persons left for employment in the United Kingdom. Of these, 972 were under government sponsorship. Thirty-three workers were recruited for employment with the British Ministry of Public Works in the construction of the BBC Overseas Station.

Public health

190. There was no indication as to a change in the number of medical facilities in 1964. There were 43 government and 42 private registered physicians (25 of the private physicians are employed on a part-time basis by central and local government), 53 nurses of senior training, 20 certified midwives; and 20 partially trained midwives.

191. The birth-rate in 1964 was 26.6 per thousand and the death-rate 8.7 per thousand. Infant mortality was 52 per thousand births. Recurrent and capital expenditure on medical services for the year 1963-1964 amounted to $WI 3,479,599 and $WI 3,412,555 respectively.

Educational conditions

192. The following table shows the number of schools, pupils and teachers in the Territory for 1963-1964:

	Schools	Teachers	Pupils
Primary	118	801	41,322
Secondary comprehensive ...	6	193	6,479
Secondary grammar	10	210	4,716
Technical and vocational ..	2	19	572
Teacher training	1	10	141
Reformatory	2	24	80

193. Estimated expenditure on education amounted to $WI 6,946,074 and capital expenditure to $WI 736,324 in 1964-1965. The corresponding figures for 1963 were $WI 6,092,434 and $WI 1,052,234.

5. BERMUDA¹⁹

General

194. At June 1964, the estimated total resident civil population was 47,612 compared with 46,783 a year earlier. About two thirds of the population is of African or mixed descent and the remainder is of European origin.

Political and constitutional developments

195. As noted in the Special Committee's report to the General Assembly at its twentieth session (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. XXIII, para. 9), a Joint Select Committee of both Houses was established in 1963 to consider constitutional changes. The present Constitution provides for a nominated Executive Council which advises the Government, a bicameral legislature consisting of a nominated Legislative Council and a House of Assembly elected by all Bermudians and resident British subjects over 25 years of age. Certain freehold property owners have a second vote.

196. The report which the Joint Select Committee submitted to the House of Assembly on 12 November 1965 consisted of a majority report and four separate minority reports.

197. The Committee noted that it had submitted an interim report dealing with proposed amendments to the Parliamentary Franchise Act which would have abolished the second or plus vote on real estate and reduced the voting age from 25 to 21 years. It also noted that a bill which was introduced to give effect to these proposals had been passed by the House of Assembly by a vote of 24 to 2 but had been defeated in the Legislative Council. The Committee also pointed out that the Legislative Council had been prepared to agree to the abolition of the plus vote on real estate, but not to the reduction of the voting age.

198. The majority report, which was signed by five members, concluded that it would be in the best interests of the Territory to introduce "full responsible government". To achieve this, the majority recommended a ministerial system and a cabinet. They did not recommend the use of these terms, because they believed this nomenclature would be misleading as it suggested full-time, professional politicians. They preferred to retain the terms "member" and "Executive Council" thereby continuing the system of part-time public service which was "best suited to the needs of Bermuda".

199. The majority recommended that the Governor should select from among the members of the House of Assembly the person whom he believed best able to command a majority in the Assembly. He would be referred to as the Government Leader and would be the Governor's chief political adviser. On the recommendation of the Leader, the Governor would appoint from six to nine other members of the Executive Council and would distribute portfolios among them on the advice of the Leader. There would be no ex officio members. At least one and not more than two members should be from the Legislative Council. The Governor would be obliged to act on the advice of the Executive Council in all matters except defence, external relations, internal security, and matters relating to the administration of the police force, these being matters on which the Governor would retain reserve powers.

200. The bicameral legislature would be retained. The Legislative Council would consist of eleven members nominated by the Governor, four on the recommendation of the Leader, two on the recommendation of the Leader of the Opposition and five at his discretion "to represent a broad range of interests in the community". There should be no ex officio members, but the Colonial Secretary and the Attorney-General should be eligible for appointment with the approval of the Leader. The Legislative Council would have delaying powers similar to those enjoyed by the House of Lords in the United Kingdom, it being able to delay a money bill for three months and a public bill for two years.

201. The majority again recommended that the voting age be lowered to 21 years and that the second vote be abolished. They also recommended the establishment of a boundaries commission whose function would be to make recommendations to the legislature from time to time on the necessity for any changes in the electoral boundaries. Other recommendations included bringing the government boards under the control of members of the Executive Council and the entrenchment in the Constitution of the independence of the judiciary and of a bill of rights.

202. The main minority report, signed by three members, concurred in all the recommendations of the majority except those concerning the lowering of the voting age and the abolition of the second vote. The member who signed the second minority report agreed with the goal of responsible government but not that the time had arrived to introduce it. The third minority report suggested an alternative method of appointing members of the Legislative Council, the abolition of the government boards and modifications concerning the proposed boundaries commission. The fourth minority report rejected the basic recommendation to introduce full responsible government and most of the consequential recommendations.

203. In December 1965, the House of Assembly and the Legislative Council adopted the majority report of the Joint Select Committee. The Legislative Council adopted the report by a vote of five to four. In January 1966, the House of Assembly approved a message to be sent to the Governor asking him to discuss constitutional changes.

204. On 12 January 1966, an amendment to the Parliamentary Franchise Act seeking to lower the voting age from 25 to 21 years and abolishing an additional vote for property owners, having already been passed by the Assembly, was passed in the Legislative Council by one vote. Later, the Governor assented to the amendment.

205. The final terms and provisions of a new written constitution for the Territory will be negotiated with the United Kingdom Government in London by delegates appointed by the Governor.

206. The Central Committee of the Progressive Labour Party (PLP) claims that the views of labour are not effectively represented in the report. In a press release, it declared that the Legislative Council should be abolished; night meetings should be held in the House of Assembly instead of afternoon sessions, to enable the working man to attend; a Bermudian should be appointed Governor; government boards should be abolished; and the right of non-Bermudians to vote after being resident for three years should be withdrawn.

207. Five parliamentary members of the PLP who disagreed with the views of the Central Committee were suspended in September 1965 and later resigned their membership, leaving the sixth labour member as sole party representative in the Assembly. The former party leader, Mr. Arnold Francis, has intimated that he may form another party, but that in the meantime he and his five colleagues intend to serve in the Assembly as independent members.

208. It was announced on 11 July 1966 that a constitutional conference on Bermuda would be held in London on 8 November 1966. The membership of the Bermuda delegation was named by the Governor a few days later. In his announcement, the Governor stated that, on the instruction of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, the membership of the delegation had to be confined to members of the legislature.

209. The conference will consider the report of the Select Committee which was adopted by both houses of the legislature in December 1965. The Bermuda delegation will be assisted by a legal adviser, Sir Ralph Hone, who arrived in Bermuda for talks in July.

210. The Progressive Labour Party (PLP) is reported to have stated that it will demand independence at the conference.

Economic conditions

211. The economy continues to depend on the tourist industry. In spite of a 25 per cent increase in the number of tourists in 1965, the percentage increase in the Territory's dollar receipts has been smaller.

212. Bananas, citrus fruits, vegetables, milk, eggs and meat are produced for local consumption. The continued increase in population and the corresponding increase in housing and playing fields has further encroached on land available for agriculture, reducing it from 1,037 acres in 1963 to 1,020 acres in 1964.

213. There is a small fishing industry in Bermuda. It is estimated that 1,350,000 pounds of fish and 140,000 pounds of spiny lobster are landed annually, at a total value of about £250,000.

214. A retail price index was established in January 1961 and is computed quarterly. Taking January 1961 as 100, by October 1964, it stood at 103.4.

215. In 1964, imports into the Territory were valued at £30,885,509, including those into the free port of Ireland Island compared with £29,645,286 in 1963. Domestic exports were valued at £726,928 in 1964 compared with £831,429 in 1963, and total recorded re-exports at £12,488,645, against £12,908,796. Revenue from invisible items such as investment and the tourist industry resulted in an over-all favourable balance of payments.

216. Revenue and expenditure for the years 1962, 1963 and 1964 were as follows:

	1962	1963	1964
	(Thousand pounds)
Revenue	5,602	5,711	6,554
Expenditure	5,691	6,342	6,385

217. Bermuda, which has no income tax, attracts the registration of many international companies and considerable banking and financial activity takes place on the islands.

Social conditions

Labour

218. In 1964, manual labourers in the Territory working a 44-50 hour week earned between 6/- per hour (female domestic servant) and 13/- per hour (dockworkers and electricians). Non-manual workers working a 34-42 hour week earned between 7/11 per hour (messenger) and 29/7 per hour (senior accountant).

219. In 1964, there were six unions registered under the Trade Union and Trade Disputes Act, 1946, the Bermuda Union of Teachers and the Teachers' Association of Bermuda having amalgamated on 29 March 1964. There is also a Civil Service Association.

220. There were four labour disputes in 1964 affecting 322 workers and resulting in 285 man-days lost. Agreements were signed by the stevedores and Bermuda Dockworkers' Union, effective 1 January 1964 for three years, and by the Passenger Transportation Board and the Bermuda Industrial Union, effective until 31 December 1965, with pay increases retroactive to 1 January 1964. A revision of the salaries and a regarding of posts was undertaken in the Civil Service, effective retroactively to 1 January 1963.

221. In October 1964, the Government, after consulting the Labour Relations Advisory Committee, issued a statement recognizing trade unions in government employment, where a "substantial" number of employees concerned wished to be represented by it and where it commanded the support of a majority of the employees.

Public health

222. In 1964, the death-rate was 7.69 per thousand, against 7.31 per thousand in the previous year. The infant mortality rate was 33.04 per thousand live births.

223. Recurrent expenditure on health amounted to £895,793 in 1964 compared with £712,732 the previous year. There are four hospitals as well as a number of baby and women's clinics which are supported by the Department of Medical and Health Services.

Educational conditions

224. The principle of providing free education at all schools for children within the compulsory age limits was adopted in July 1965. Public schools are classified as "vested" or "non-vested". The former are managed by local committees, the latter are directly administered by the Board of Education. Previously education was free and, in accordance with the Education Act of 1954, compulsory for all children over 7 and under 13 years of age. This provision has led to a further division of free schools and schools in which fees continue to be charged. Under authority of the Act, the Board fixed special age limits of "over five, and the end of the term in which the child reaches the age of 16", between which children attending a free school might receive free primary education. In schools in which fees are still charged the rates vary according to the type of school, and, in some instances, according to the position of the pupil in the school. The higher fee is about £195 per annum, exclusive of the cost of books and stationery, in the top form of one of the private secondary schools.

225. The free schools include four vested and eighteen non-vested schools, and the fee-paying schools, excluding the private schools, consist of eight vested schools that provide secondary education (five of these also provide primary education), three non-vested secondary schools and one vested primary school. There are also two vested schools which provide free education in their primary departments, and fee-paying education in the secondary departments. Seven schools administered by the Board of Education and three others provide secondary education up to School Certificate or "O" level G.C.E. examinations. At four of these schools, pupils are prepared for the Higher School Certificate, or "A" level G.C.E. examinations. Commercial courses are provided at nine schools and hotel training at one school.

226. The Technical Institute provides a four-year general secondary course followed by a two-year pre-apprenticeship course. Fees are payable at these schools, the present rates being £6 per term at the secondary practical and £9 a term at the Technical Institute.

Report of the Joint Select Committee on Education

227. The majority report of the Joint Select Committee on Education was adopted in the House of Assembly on 8 July 1966 by 19 votes to 7.

228. As noted above in paragraph 224, the principle of free education for children within the compulsory age limits was adopted in July 1965. It is reported that the effect of the adoption of the majority report will be that education will be free to all children in all government schools with the exception of the "B" streams in the three secondary academic schools. This limitation was opposed in the legislature by members of the Progressive Labour Party.

229. In June 1966, the Amalgamated Bermuda Union of Teachers issued a statement setting forth its views on education in Bermuda. The Union recalled that in 1961 and 1962 figures had been released indicating low achievement in IQ tests by children in "the non-vested schools, that is coloured schools", and that it had concluded that this unusually poor performance was a result of environmental factors and not innate ability. The Union had made representations and recommendations to the Board of Education and the Joint Select Committee to convince the members that a greater effort would have to be made by the Government to make up for these children's disadvantages. It was shocked that the Administration had "chosen to follow a policy enforced on poverty-stricken countries rather than the policy open to an affluent country such as ours". As a result of this policy, the educational gap between the middle class and the lower social groups would increase and political unrest "would not come as a surprise". The Union was preparing further recommendations, "in the hope that public concern will now make them more effective than in the past".

230. The enrolment figures for 1963 and 1964 are as follows:

	Total enrolment	Boys	Girls	Under 7 years	Over 13 years
1964	12,161	5,923	6,238	2,493	2,926
1963	11,671	5,649	6,022	2,284	2,493

231. In addition, the Friendship Vale School catered for seventy-five physically handicapped children and three special schools accommodated 175 children in special categories.

232. There is no university in Bermuda. There is an agreement with Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario, Canada, which sends lecturers to Bermuda every summer to give courses to teachers and prospective teachers who wish to qualify for a university degree.

233. In 1964, the total government expenditure on education was £1,054,126, compared with £1,081,789 the previous year.

6. BAHAMAS²⁰

General

234. The last census was taken on 15 November 1963. The estimated population of the Territory at the end of 1964 was 138,500, of which 83,837 were estimated to be in New Providence.

Political and constitutional developments

235. The Constitution which was introduced in January 1964 remained in effect during the period under review. Under the Constitution, the Governor exercises discretionary reserve powers with respect to external affairs, defence, internal security and the control of the police. In other matters the Governor acts on the advice of the Cabinet which is led by the Premier. The legislature consists of an appointed Senate which has limited powers of delaying legislation and an elected House of Assembly. The next elections for the House of Assembly are due before December 1967 and will be held on the basis of universal adult suffrage.

236. In April 1965, the seven members of the Progressive Liberal Party (PLP), led by Mr. Lynden O. Pindling, boycotted the meetings of the Assembly in protest against the report of the Constituencies Commission. Mr. Pindling addressed petitions on the subject to the Special Committee in April 1965 (A/AC.109/PET.377 and Add.1) and appeared before the Committee as a petitioner at its 376th and 377th meetings in August 1965 (see A/6000/Rev.1, chap. XXIII, paras. 86-111).

237. On 2 September 1965, three members of the PLP ended their boycott of the Assembly. In a letter of that date addressed to the Speaker, the leader of the group, Mr. P. L. Adderley, explained that the group did not believe that it was in the best interests of the Bahamian people to refuse to represent them in the capacity in which they were elected. He also restated the group's opposition to the Government as "the instrument of protection for the rich and privileged". On 4 October, these three members were suspended from the PLP and on 13 October they announced that they had formed a new party, the National Democratic Party (NDP).

238. The Secretary of State for the Colonies, Mr. Anthony Greenwood, visited the Territory in October 1965 and had discussions with members of the Government and with the three opposition parties, the PLP, the NDP, and the Labour Party, each of which made their demands public.

239. The six "principal demands" of the PLP were as follows: "(1) that the Constitution's and Boundaries Order be revoked, that the Speaker resign all his party political affiliation, that future Orders be made subject to scrutiny by the Courts; (2) that there be established the proper machinery for the detection and examination of conflict of interest among the cabinet members and the prevention of their doing government business with themselves; (3) that the Hawksbill Creek Grand Bahama (Deep Water Harbour and Industrial Area) Act be renegotiated with a view to ensuring that the Government is paramount in the Port Area, that it governs there as it does in other parts of the

Bahamas, that it guarantees freedom of expression and assembly for Freeport's inhabitants in general and its trade unions in particular, and that a government labour exchange be established in the area; (4) that the Trade Union and Industrial Conciliation Act be repealed and re-enacted to provide for full freedom of assembly, automatic recognition of legally constituted trade unions, full freedom to negotiate, voluntary check-off and the union shop; (5) that a new constitutional conference be held which will guarantee majority rule, representation according to population, full implementation of all human rights provisions, and single-member constitutions; (6) that a Royal Commission be appointed to investigate the internal workings of the Government and the situation in general in the Bahamas, or that the United Nations Committee of Twenty-Four be given permission to send an investigating team to the Territory."

240. The NDP called for constitutional reforms "which will ensure the establishment of a truly democratic base upon which this country may develop". It advocated the inclusion in the Constitution of fundamental rights provisions which would apply retroactively to all laws adopted since the introduction of the new Constitution. In this way, amendments would become necessary for such acts as the Trade Union and Industrial Conciliation Act, and the Hawksbill Creek Grand Bahama (Deep Water Harbour and Industrial Area) Act. The party also proposed the attainment of full internal self-government as the immediate goal. But before further constitutional development took place, they called for an equitable distribution of seats based on the distribution of population in the whole of the Bahamas, for single-member constituencies, for a complete revision of the electoral laws to provide a "more efficient and less cumbersome system of registration and voting and to provide for absolute secrecy of the ballot", and for a system of voting by the use of symbols.

241. The Labour Party stressed four basic "needs" which should be met before the Bahamas could enjoy the "full fruits of internal self-government". These were: (a) the cessation of conflict of interest in parliamentary duties by paying Cabinet Ministers and House Members and by establishing "guidelines as to parliamentary conduct in respect to their investments, business activities and their membership in non-parliamentary and commercial and business enterprise"; (b) the introduction of symbols on all ballot papers; (c) economic and social development; and (d) the repeal of Trade Union and Industrial Conciliation Act and their replacement by more "modern" legislation. The Labour Party also believed that the next general election should be supervised by the United Nations.

242. On his return to the United Kingdom, the Secretary of State for the Colonies stated in the House of Commons on 3 November that during his visit he had had discussions with members of the Government, Opposition leaders and other representatives of public opinion. He said that the Constitution introduced in January 1964 was working well and that he was glad to see the expansion of tourism on which the economy of the Territory was heavily dependent.

243. On 29 October 1965, the NDP issued a statement of policy by which the party would be guided. In addition to the reforms called for in the discussions with the Colonial Secretary, the NDP's platform calls for "full internal self-government together with a guarantee in the Constitution of consultation by the British Government in all matters of external affairs". It also advocated the extension of the franchise to all persons at the age of 18 instead of 21 years.

244. On 5 February 1966, the four members of the PLP in the House of Assembly had decided to end their nine-month boycott and return to the legislature when it reconvened on 10 February. In a statement, Mr. Pindling said that his party had been encouraged by the "magnificent response" of the United Nations to his presentation before the Special Committee in 1965 and would return to the legislature "even more determined to continue the struggle for democratic government". He said his party had a legislative programme designed to challenge the United Bahamian Party Government to bring about the changes he had called for before the United Nations.

245. In June 1966 Mr. L. O. Pindling (PLP) introduced a bill to amend the House of Assembly Elections Act. He said the amendments would serve the purpose of "plugging up the loop-holes in the Act", and would "show the country and all observers that it is our intention to hold clean and honest elections". The amendments would serve several purposes, including helping the illiterate voter, allowing an extension on voting hours where necessary, and preventing corruption by "unscrupulous would-be candidates". During the debate, Opposition speakers spoke of the need for a law to deal with persons who give or lend money to any voter to encourage that voter to vote or refrain from voting and to prevent voters' cards from being used as "negotiable instruments".

246. Mr. P. L. Adderley (NDP) agreed that the whole system of voter registration needed to be corrected. He also offered several suggestions including an extension to the time a non-Bahamian British subject should live in the Bahamas before he is allowed to vote. He made reference to the large number of British subjects, not Bahamian-born, who were entitled to vote after being in the Territory six months. He said that they should be required to live in the Bahamas for at least five years before they could register to vote.

247. The Premier, Sir Roland Symonette (UBP), denied that corruption existed during elections. He defended the existence of the voters' cards and said that the Government was perfectly happy with the Elections Act and that he saw nothing wrong with the present law. The Opposition bill was defeated.

248. The debate in the House of Assembly on the Governor's speech from the throne, which took place during March and April 1966, was the occasion for an attack by Opposition members on conditions at Freeport and on the Hawksbill Creek, Grand Bahama (Deep Water Harbour and Industrial Area) Act.

249. Mr. Adderley (NDP) said it was regretted that the Government had not made enough money out of the gambling project at Grand Bahama to make financial provision for expansion of the police force, which he said was necessitated by gambling on that island. He added that it was pathetic that people in the Out Islands were being asked to pay for police protection for Grand Bahama when operators there, making millions of pounds, did not pay similar taxes. Mr. Adderley wondered why gangsters were permitted to come into the colony to make money while local residents were heavily fined for conducting numbers rackets. He agreed that Freeport had brought financial benefit to some people, but it had been done in such a way that the Government had "abdicated its responsibility and relinquished its sovereign rights over a part of the country to a private company". He warned that the Government would soon have no control at Freeport. For this reason, he advocated that the Government immediately enter into negotiations for a new agreement with the Port Authority Company which controlled Freeport. Mr. Adderley also deplored the Government's immigration policy, which had resulted, he said, in dissatisfaction generally and, further, in failure to establish adequate immigration controls at Freeport.

250. Mr. Pindling (PLP) asked that a Royal Commission investigate the condition of gambling at Freeport. He said that the arrangement with the operators at Grand Bahama by which they were to pay £100,000 to the Bahamas Government was made only on condition that their books "not be audited locally". Mr. Pindling stated that the Minister for Finance had negotiated for that amount rather than a percentage. He said also that three of the men connected with the gambling at Freeport were wanted in the United States but were being protected by the Bahamas Government. Mr. Pindling also called upon the Government to renegotiate the Hawksbill Agreement with the Port Authority Company. Attacking the Government's immigration policy, he said that as jobs opened up, there were two things against Bahamians—a lack of education and a lack of experience. He urged the Government to set aside what he called "a national Trust Fund" of half a million pounds "to educate our people".

251. On 28 April 1966, Mr. Adderley proposed a resolution in the House of Assembly which would introduce legislation establishing a Casino Control Commission to exercise control over organized gambling in the Bahamas. This motion was defeated after a lengthy debate. The Premier stated that the Government already had sufficient control over the gambling situation.

Economic conditions

252. The economy of the Territory continued to depend on the development of the tourist industry. The results of the Ministry of Tourism's energetic publicity in the United States and Canada are shown by an increase in the number of visitors to the Islands in 1964—namely 605,171, as against totals of 546,404, 444,870 and 368,211 for the three previous years.

253. The expenditure on new buildings and public works during the year under review amounted to £34,701,645, compared with £24,303,908 for the previous year. Tourist expenditure in 1964 in the approved estimates was £1,239,023, compared with £1,109,107 for 1963.

254. In addition to the small industries mentioned in last year's report (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. XXIII, para. 48), there is also a straw-working industry, which exported £9,055 worth of baskets, hats, mats, handbags, etc., during the year under review. Furthermore, it is estimated that goods valued at £300,000 were purchased by visiting tourists.

255. The main domestic exports from the Bahamas were valued at £2,616,070 in 1964, compared with £1,634,960 in 1963. Lumber continued to be the most valuable export. Principal buyers of the Territory's exports were the United Kingdom, Canada, the United States of America and the British West Indian islands. The value of imports during 1964 amounted to £35,939,239, chiefly supplied by the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, the United States and Aruba, compared with £28,264,936 in 1963.

256. Because there is no income tax, nominal excise duties and liberal company taxation laws, considerable foreign investment has been attracted to the Bahamas. Much of it has found its way into Freeport, on Grand Bahama Island which occupies 210 square miles and includes modern port and bunkering facilities, an international holiday resort and a residential community. This foreign capital and the considerable invisible receipts that accrue from the tourist industry give the Bahamas a favourable over-all balance of payments.

257. The total revenue of the Territory continued to rise in 1964 to £12.16 million, compared with £9.6 million in 1963 and £8.69 million in 1962. Expenditure amounted to £11.8 million in 1964. Customs duties (£6.875 million in 1964) and receipts from fees and public utilities continue to be the main sources of revenue.

258. The Bahamas Government announced that in an effort "to encourage thrift, and to build up national savings", it planned to put forward proposals later in 1966 for the issue of government savings bonds.

259. On 14 April 1966, the Atlantic Underwater Test and Evaluation Centre (AUTEC) at Andros was formally opened. The base, which is a joint Anglo-United States project, has been under construction for the past two years and has so far cost $17 million. It is expected to become fully operational later this year. It has been described as a "multi-purpose underwater range complex" and as the "Cape Kennedy of the oceans". The AUTEC complex will consist of three ranges: a weapons range, an acoustics range and a sonar range. It will be the final testing ground for all new detection systems. While most of the work done at AUTEC will be directed to anti-submarine warfare, it has been pointed out that the devices tested will not carry warheads. This was one of the provisions of the agreement signed on 11 October 1963 between the United Kingdom and the Bahamas and the United States. The 420-acre base will be staffed with about 400 Navy and civilian personnel.

260. The Government's decision to incur a public debt to the extent of $62 million to finance the expansion of the harbour and the extension of the telecommunications and water distribution systems has been criticized in the House of Assembly. In March, the Minister of Finance was asked to explain how he proposed to service the debt without prompting a resultant increase in the cost of living, retrenchment in the Public Service, or the enforcement of more stringent indirect taxation on the poor of the country. The Finance Minister defended his policies saying that he hoped to effect savings without reducing the efficiency of the Government and without drastic taxation.

261. The House of Assembly was called into special session on 12 May 1966 for the purpose of introducing a bill that provides for the raising of a loan of $14 million by the Bahamas Government (Bahamas Development Loan Act). It was explained that the bill had to be passed before 31 May, or the Government would have to pay a fee of 1 per cent. The loan, which was negotiated privately by the Government in the United States, carries interest at 7 per cent and is repayable over a period of fifteen years. The money will be used for the development of Nassau harbour. The signing of an $18.84 million contract for this purpose with a New York corporation was announced on 14 march.

262. It was announced during May 1966 that a $5 million chemical plant would be built at Freeport. The plant, which is expected to be completed in August 1967, will employ fewer than 100 persons at first but this number will be increased as operations are expanded.

263. It was also announced in May 1966 that the Bahamas' first airline, a $50 million project, had been granted a licence. The airline plans to begin services between Nassau and Luxembourg on 1 December 1966. It was reported that the initial financing had been arranged by a consortium of international bankers.

264. In April 1966, the Premier announced that "agreement has been reached between the Government and Owens-Illinois regarding their proposal to grow sugar cane and produce refined sugar on the island of Abaco". The Premier stated that the Government was sure that the Agreement would be to the great advantage of the people of Abaco and the Bahama Islands as a whole, as the introduction of a new agricultural industry with all its attendant demands would encourage the general development of Abaco.

265. The Bahamas Minister of Finance was reported to have said on 6 May 1966 that, in his opinion, it would be extremely difficult for any company to make a success of producing sugar in the Bahamas. He believed that if the Abaco sugar operation was to have any chance of competing with the cheap-labour sugar-producing areas of the world, it had to be highly mechanized. Under those conditions, the Minister did not feel that more than 500 people would be employed in the entire sugar production and sugar refining phases of this undertaking. "Therefore, while it is a very favourable contribution to the economy of Abaco, we cannot, in my view, look for any large-scale employment from this new industry", he added.

266. On 9 June 1966, the Premier introduced a bill seeking authorization for the Government to sign the Sugar Agreement with the firm of Owens-Illinois of the Bahamas. Under the Agreement, Owens-Illinois would produce 50,000 tons of raw sugar annually, plus a smaller quantity of refined sugar by 1969. The Agreement provides for Owens-Illinois to establish a 20,000-acre sugar plantation on Great Abaco, on Crown land, which it presently holds under a long-term timber-cutting lease, but which will now be granted to the company in fee simple. An option to take up a maximum of 25,000 acres more on a yearly renewable lease for twenty-five years is included in the Agreement: this will allow Owens-Illinois to double its production in the future.

267. During the discussion of the bill in the House of Assembly, Mr. Hanna (PLP) declared he did not see that the bill afforded any protection for Bahamian workmen since, under the bill, Owens-Illinois had a right to import personnel without consultation with the Government. Another Opposition speaker took exception to any dealings with Owens-Illinois, charging that this firm had been responsible for the death of over 300 Bahamians and Turks Islanders through unfair labour practices in the Bahamas. He added that the wage scale forced on employees was not only less than the equivalent of a living wage, but less than a subsistence wage.

268. On 25 May 1966, the Bahamas adopted a decimal currency, changing from pounds to dollars. The dollar is valued at 7 shillings sterling or $US 0.98.

Social conditions

269. Prices in general tend to be high as local production is extremely limited. All classes and races of workers are included in the "cost-of-living" figures on which local statistics are based. Based on the cost of living in 1949, the index figure on 30 September 1964 was 174, compared with 169 in the previous year.

270. On 16 June 1966, the House of Assembly agreed to the appointment of a select committee to consider a resolution calling for the Government to "take immediate steps to control the rise in prices, to curb profiteering and to preserve the purchasing power of the working man". The resolution, moved by Mr. Pindling (PLP), also called upon the House to deplore "the fact that the Government has taken no effective steps to control the rise in prices and to maintain the standard of real wages". Moving the resolution, Mr. Pindling quoted items on which there had been "a substantial increase". Mr. Adderley (NDP), who seconded Mr. Pindling's resolution, said that the rising cost of living presented a situation where people lived under constant pressure of trying to exist.

271. The Minister of Finance said that the Government could not introduce price control and that, in any case, a proper investigation had to be made. Therefore a select committee was the proper body to deal with the resolution.

272. On 1 July 1966, the Bahamas Trade Union Congress (BTUC) published a retail price index it had prepared. According to the index, rents in the Bahamas have risen 126.23 per cent within the past three years while clothing has risen 29.26 per cent. Other increases include a 54.22 per cent rise in miscellaneous items covering movie theatre admission, cigarettes and haircuts, a 36.16 per cent rise in food costs, and a 33.19 per cent increase in fuel charges (kerosene and electricity). The BTUC claims that, since 1963, the cost of living in the Bahamas has risen 71 per cent. The index has been sent to the Minister of Labour and cited as justification for a general wage increase.

273. In a letter which has also been sent to the Minister of Labour, the Bahamas Trade Union Congress stated: "It is not enough that we as Bahamian workers are told that the Islands are enjoying a greater measure of prosperity than other workers of the other Caribbean Islands. As intelligent citizens, we should also understand how and to what extent, we, the workers of these Islands, through mental effort and muscular energy have greatly contributed to the present development of these Islands, and also to the stability of our economy." For the words "prosperity or wealth" to be meaningful, the letter continued, the Government and employers should seek to have a "living wage" distributed among workers in such a way as to enable them to purchase at least the basic necessities, in order that a worker will be able to satisfy his many wants. First among these wants are the amounts of food, shelter and clothing needed to maintain life and to go a step further, his educational, social, cultural development and medical and health care. "The Bahamas Trade Union Congress", the letter continued, "in expressing the opinion of the workers, is presenting to the Government and employers of the Bahamas a Retail Price Index measuring the fluctuation in the general level of prices as at September 1963 and June 1966." In view of the facts indicated by its price index, the Bahamas Trade Union Congress urged the Government and employers to grant a general wage increase as soon as possible.

274. On 15 July 1966, the Bahamas Minister of Labour and Housing was reported to have replied to the BTUC letter, pointed out a number of errors in the methods used in calculating the price index and concluding by saying: "I trust that you will now advise your members that your claim that there has been a rise in prices of 71 per cent since 1963 is based on wrong calculations and that no credence can be given to it."

Labour

275. In 1964 there were sixteen registered trade unions, a decrease of one from the previous year, and four employers' associations. There were two work stoppages covering a total period of thirteen days. The estimated labour force in 1963 was 60,000, of whom the majority were occupied in the tourist industry; 3,500 people were engaged in fishing. Migrant Bahamian labour in the United States, which in 1963 netted $US1,799,836 in remittances, was halted by the United States in 1965.

Public health

276. Medical and health services are the responsibility of the Ministry of Health. There are three main government hospitals with a total of 800 beds. A new periatrics and spastics hospital of 125 beds, stressing rehabilitation, was to be opened in early 1965.

277. In 1964, the death-rate in the Territory was 7.23 per thousand, and the birth-rate 33.8. The infant mortality rate was 42.7 per thousand live births. The principal diseases are tuberculosis, respiratory complaints, general abdominal complaints, hypertension and malnutrition. Alcoholism is causing considerable disease and there is alarm at its increase.

278. Medical and health staff in 1964 included 84 registered physicians (36 private), 1 private licensed physician, 6 other medical officers (private) 295 nurses (99 private), 53 partially trained nurses (6 private), 269 midwives (95 private), 85 partially trained midwives (63 private), 4 government sanitary inspectors, 16 laboratory and X-ray technicians (2 private) and 89 pharmacists (80 private).

279. Capital and recurrent expenditure by the Government on health services amounted to £1,226,424 during 1964, compared with £1,126,358 in 1963.

Educational conditions

280. Education is administered under the Education Act, 1962, and is the responsibility of the Ministry for Education. It is compulsory between the ages of 5 and 14.

281. The number of schools in the Territory at July 1964 was as follows:

	Primary	Secondary and post-primary	Post-secondary
Government	151 ^a	5	2
Aided	—	—	4
Unaided	42	8	6
	193	13 ^b	12

^a Includes 115 all-age schools.

^b Four of these have their own primary departments.

282. Primary school enrolment in 1964 numbered 27,099 compared with 27,435 in the previous year.

Some 7,034 pupils were enrolled in secondary schools, compared with 5,192 pupils in 1963 in secondary or post-primary schools.

283. No local provision is made for higher education. For Bahamians who wish to pursue their education at this level, a special relationship has been established with the University of the West Indies. Others seek admission to appropriate institutions overseas. The Bahamas Government makes provision for scholarships and bursaries at universities and colleges abroad. Precise figures of those studying abroad are not available, but some 234 students were studying abroad in 1964, in the United Kingdom (124), Canada (10) and the United States (100).

284. Government expenditure on education in 1964 amounted to £1,501,084, compared with £1,044,400 in 1963.

7. TURKS AND CAICOS ISLANDS²¹

Political and constitutional developments

285. It was noted in the report of the Special Committee to the General Assembly at its twentieth session (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. XXIII) that the Bahamas Government had stated that it could not for the time being agree to a merger as had been suggested by the Government of the Turks and Caicos Islands. It had been agreed, however, that the possibility of a looser form of association would be studied by the Governments concerned.

286. An Order-in-Council which came into effect on 5 November 1965 contained an amendment to the Constitution, by virtue of which the Governor of the Bahama Islands also became the Governor of the Turks and Caicos Islands. A further amendment provided that appeals from the courts of the Turks and Caicos Islands would lie to the Court of Appeal for the Bahama Islands instead of to the Court of Appeal for Jamaica.

287. The appointment of the Governor of the Bahamas as Governor of the Turks and Caicos Islands has been described in the Bahamas Press as purely administrative and is reported to have been welcomed in the Territory.

288. Apart from these changes, the constitutional arrangements outlined in the Special Committee's report to the General Assembly at its nineteenth session (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. XXIV, paras. 59-63) remain in force.

Economic conditions

289. In 1964, imports were valued at £300,768 and exports at £47,173, compared with £300,000 and £73,000 in the previous year. The principal items of import are food, drink, tobacco and manufactured articles. The principal exports are salt, valued at £12,603 in 1964 (£37,000 in 1963); crawfish, £75,778 (£28,000 in 1963); sisal £3,530; conches and conch shells. The total grant-in-aid in 1964 was £159,116, compared with £139,483 in 1963.

Social conditions

290. The prices of basic food-stuff remained reasonably high but all others, particularly imported tinned goods, are disproportionately expensive. In addition, because of the acute shortage of housing on Grand Turk and the increased demand brought about by establishment of the United States bases in the Islands, rents have remained high and are tending to rise.

Labour

291. The Turks Islands Salt Company, Ltd., was the biggest employer of labour in the islands until December 1964, when salt operations were closed down at South Caicos and Grand Turk. The redundant labourers have either found alternative employment or have been absorbed into government works programmes. The salt operation was kept going at Salt Bay where approximately forty-five men are regularly employed. Other sources of employment are provided by the two United States bases on Grand Turk and by the crawfish and conch fishing industry. Approximately eighty men were employed by a United States shipping company—National Bulk Carriers, Inc.—aboard its vessels at the end of 1964. Large numbers of islanders have continued to find employment in the Bahamas and their remittances are a regular source of income for their families.

292. There is only one registered trade union in the Turks and Caicos Islands, the St. George's Union in Cockburn Harbour.

Public health

293. There are two government medical officers, one stationed in Grand Turk, the other in South Caicos.

294. The average death-rate in the islands is approximately 5.1 per thousand, the highest percentage being found among infants under one year of age. Government recurrent expenditure on medical and public health (including the cost of staff) amounted to £22,321 in 1964 (11.3 per cent of total government expenditure) compared with £27,409 in 1963 (9.5 per cent of total government expenditure).

Educational conditions

295. Education is both free and compulsory for all children between the ages of 7 and 14 years. In 1964, there were thirteen elementary schools, one of which had a secondary section. Recurrent expenditure on education was £22,027 in 1964 (11.2 per cent of total government expenditure) compared with £21,604 in 1963 (7.5 per cent of total government expenditure). In addition, Colonial Development and Welfare funds provide for the training of teachers in Jamaica.

8. CAYMAN ISLANDS

Political and constitutional developments

296. The constitutional arrangements described in the Special Committee's report to the General Assembly at its nineteenth session (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. XXIV, paras. 80-84) remain in force.

297. A general election was held on 16 November 1965. The results of the election are set out below:

Party	Sets in last Assembly	Sets in new Assembly	Net loss or gain
Christian Democrats	5	4	1 loss
National Democrats	6	1	5 losses
Independents	1	7	6 gains

298. Press reports state that the question as to whether the Territory was ready for internal self-government was raised during the election campaign. No information is available on the positions taken by the political parties during the election campaign.

Economic conditions

299. The economy of the Territory continues to depend mainly on wages earned by Cayman Islands seamen. Tourism is expanding. An estimated 3,319 tourists visited the islands in 1964, compared with 2,553 in the previous year. Other industries include the manufacture of thatch rope and turtle and shark fishing.

300. The value of imports amounted to £958,120 in 1964, compared with £838,886 in 1963 and the value of exports amounted to £39,900 in 1964, compared with £34,490 in 1963. Approximately two thirds of the trade of the islands is with the United States of America, and most imports are from this source. Sugar, coffee, cement, liquor, kerosene and condensed milk are imported almost exclusively from Jamaica.

301. In 1964, revenue was £299,856 and expenditure £296,606, compared with £258,375 and £242,503 in 1963.

Social conditions

302. In 1963, the index of retail prices in George Town, Grand Cayman, was 116, taking the figure for 1959 as 100. A limited range of various standard commodities was used for the comparison.

Labour

303. One trade union is registered in the Cayman Islands. Membership is not restricted to Cayman Islands seamen, but almost all Caymanians serving on United States-owned ships are members. Total membership is some 6,099, of whom about one third are Cayman Islanders.

304. The average death-rate in the islands is 7.6 per thousand. The principal cause of death are hypertension, respiratory diseases, senility and diseases of early infancy. The highest death-rate (25.9 per thousand live births) is found in infants one year of age and under. Expenditure on public health amounted to £38,637 in 1964, representing 13.0 per cent of total government expenditure, compared with £34,473 in 1963 (nine-month period April to December), representing 14.4 per cent of total government expenditure.

Educational conditions

305. Primary education is free and compulsory for all children between the ages of 7 and 14 years. During the year under review there were eleven government primary schools, one secondary modern and one secondary grammar in operation, as well as a number of church-sponsored schools. In 1964, the Government took over the Cayman High School, which had previously been operated by the Scottish Presbyterian Church with a government subsidy. Recurrent expenditure on education was £42,354 in 1964 (14.3 per cent of recurrent government expenditure), compared with £33,833 in 1963 (14.7 per cent of recurrent government expenditure).

gentina and of the United Kingdom transmitted to the Secretary-General the pertinent part of a joint communiqué issued in Buenos Aires on 14 January 1966 by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of the United Kingdom, and the Minister of Foreign Affairs and Worship of Argentina. In the communiqué, it was stated that both Ministers had agreed that the discussions recommended by General Assembly resolution 2065 (XX) should be pursued without delay through diplomatic channels, or such other means as might be decided, for the purpose of finding a peaceful solution to the problem.

307. In letters dated 22 August 1966 (A/6261/Add.1 and A/6262/Add.1), the Permanent Representatives of Argentina and the United Kingdom transmitted to the Secretary-General the text of a further joint communiqué, issued on 20 July 1966. In the communiqué, it was stated that meetings on the problem had been held on 19 and 20 July 1966. The talks had been conducted in a cordial atmosphere and it was agreed that they should be continued.

10. BRITISH HONDURAS²³

Status

308. The Government of Guatemala has continued to maintain that sovereignty over British Honduras (Belize) belongs exclusively to Guatemala and that the Territory is an integral part of Guatemala. This was reiterated by the representative of Guatemala at the nineteenth session of the General Assembly.²⁴ The representative of the United Kingdom, at the same meeting, stated formally that his Government had no doubts as to its sovereignty over the Territory and fully reserved its position on the subject.

309. On 18 November 1965, it was announced that a New York lawyer, Mr. Bethuel Matthew Webster, had been appointed Ambassador by the President of the United States to mediate the long-standing dispute. On 24 February 1966 the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs informed the British House of Commons that Mr. Webster had called one plenary meeting of the three Governments concerned and had visited both Guatemala and British Honduras. He was continuing with further consultations.

Political and constitutional developments

310. There is no information available other than that submitted by the Special Committee in its reports to the General Assembly at its nineteenth and twentieth sessions (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. XXVI; and A/6000/Rev.1, chap. XXV).

Economic conditions

311. The citrus industry continued to expand during 1964. Nearly 2 million boxes of oranges and grapefruit were produced in 1964, compared with 1 million boxes in 1963. The value of timber products accounted for $BH3.1 million, or about $BH500,000 more than in previous years.²⁵ A new sugar factory was to come into operation early in 1966, and this expansion was expected to increase the total output of sugar to about 150,000 tons. Sugar production of 33,591 tons during 1964 exceeded the record output of 27,840 tons during 1963 by some 5,750 tons.

312. The total trade figures for 1962-1964 are as follows:

Year	Imports	Domestic exports (British Honduras dollars)	Re-exports
1962	31,202,647	8,251,986	2,912,765
1963	26,500,000	15,400,000	3,000,000
1964	27,553,446	15,430,016	3,140,978

313. The locally derived revenue and expenditure of the Territory for the period 1962-1964 have been as follows:

	Revenue (British Honduras dollars)	Expenditure
1962 (actual)	9,217,702	11,958,069
1963 (actual)	9,344,248	17,219,056
1964 (estimated)	8,348,075	15,262,888

314. The grant-in-aid given by the United Kingdom Government in 1964 amounted to about $BH700,000. In addition, the United Kingdom Government provided some $BH995,000 for Commonwealth Development and Welfare schemes.

315. Of the 1964 estimated expenditures, $BH-8,855,039 were classified as recurrent and $BH-6,407,494 as on capital account.

316. The Finance Minister of British Honduras presented in December 1965 a budget to the House of Representatives which was designed to stimulate economic development, lower the cost of living and allow the Government to assume fuller responsibilities befitting a country which would shortly be independent. He introduced new taxes which would hit luxury goods such as cigarettes, alcohol, perfume, refrigerators, cars and radios, and declared that no self-respecting country relished a situation in which it was dependent on external aid to meet current expenses.

317. The Belize Chevron Oil Company, a subsidiary of the Standard Oil Company of the United States, was granted a licence for oil exploration covering practically the whole of the northern part of the Territory.

318. In the House of Representatives a bill was approved to raise a loan of $BH 1,200,000 at home and abroad. This loan is to be used to improve the electricity supply in distant towns, to build a bridge at Tower Hill and to continue the assistance in loans and grants in the construction of secondary schools. These projects are part of the seven-year development plan.

319. The United States Department of State, in a press release dated 14 January 1966, announced that Great Britain, Canada and the United States would jointly sponsor an economic survey of British Honduras. The survey will analyse the economy and its growth potential and suggest guidelines for development over the next five years. The members of the team will be drawn from the three participating countries. The survey was scheduled to begin in the spring of 1966.

Social conditions

Labour

320. At the end of 1964 there were ten labour unions with a membership of 3,657, compared with nine unions and a membership of 3,507 at the end of

1963. Twelve collective agreements were signed in 1964 affecting the working conditions of 2,874 workers. The new Government Workers Rules, governing the conditions of employment of government manual workers, were put into operation in May and took effect from 1 January 1964.

Public health

321. The Government Medical Services in 1964 consisted of 19 registered physicians, 15 senior nurses, 61 certified nurses, 15 partially trained nurses, 5 senior midwives, 15 partially trained midwives, 14 public health inspectors, 3 laboratory and X-ray technicians, 12 pharmacists, 2 radiographers, 1 hospital administrator and 1 dental surgeon. There were six general hospitals with 257 beds, 3 cottage hospitals with 59 beds and 17 dispensaries.

322. In 1964 expenditure for the health and medical departments amounted to $BH15,262,888.

323. In 1964, there were 26,322 pupils attending primary schools, compared with 26,449 in 1963; 2,113 attending secondary schools (2,186 in 1963); and 118 attending a vocational school (85 in 1963).

324. In April 1964, at the invitation of the Government, two members of the Institute of Education of the West Indies carried out an assessment of the work of the two teacher-training colleges. As a result of this co-operation, the two training colleges have been brought into close contact, not only with the Institute, but also with training colleges throughout the Caribbean area.

C. Consideration by the Special Committee

INTRODUCTION

325. The Special Committee considered these Territories at its 463rd, 466th, 467th, and 476th to 478th meetings on 7, 14 and 15 September and 14 to 16 November 1966. At the 476th meeting the Rapporteur of Sub-Committee III introduced the report of that Sub-Committee dealing with these Territories. The Sub-Committee's report appears as an annex to this chapter.

WRITTEN PETITIONS AND HEARINGS

326. The Special Committee circulated the following written petitions:

Hearing concerning Grenada

328. Mr. Gairy, Leader of the Opposition in Grenada, said that Grenada had a population of about 90,000, mostly of African descent. Its area was about 133 square miles, and it was one of the four islands forming the Windward Islands group in the eastern Caribbean.

329. About the middle of 1950, he had simultaneously founded two separate organizations, a trade union known as the Grenada Manual and Mental Workers' Union and a political party known as the Grenada United Labour Party. The agricultural workers, numbering about 14,000, had been the largest category in the membership of the union, which had totalled about 27,000 by the beginning of 1951. In January of that year, the union had called upon the agricultural employers for recognition as the bargaining instrument for the farm workers, whose rates of pay had been 54 cents per day for men and 44 cents per day for women and who had been required to work for eleven or twelve hours a day under the most deplorable conditions. The employers had threatened to have legislation enacted to suppress the activities of union officials. That had culminated in a general strike on 19 February 1951. The Government of Grenada and the employers had requested help from the United Kingdom, which had sent two warships and landed troops in the Territory. Large police groups had come from Jamaica, Trinidad, St. Lucia and Barbados, and a large number of fusiliers had come from British Honduras. The workers had converged upon the city. On 20 February 1951, some union officials had been arrested and detained without charge. He himself had been arrested and taken to Carriscou, where he had been kept for two weeks and where attempts had been made to have him sign documents acknowledging responsibility for the riots and acts of violence which had taken place after his arrest. Despite threats, he had refused to sign. He had been sent back to Grenada, where he had been allowed to begin discussions with the agricultural employers. The employers had been found by a three-man arbitration tribunal to be in the wrong, and wages had been increased to one dollar for men and 72 cents for women. Working conditions had also been improved.

330. In 1951, the United Kingdom Government had granted full adult franchise to Grenada and the other Windward and Leeward Islands; elections had been held in Grenada, in which his party, the Grenada United Labour Party, had won six out of eight seats. For two years and three months he had been under constant surveillance by the police wherever he went. Despite that provocative behaviour, which had been initiated by the United Kingdom Colonial Office, his party had won seven out of eight seats in the 1954 elections.

331. In 1955, he had taken a course in the United Kingdom in parliamentary procedure and had been made a Fellow of the Royal Society of Arts; during that time, he had continued his activities to defend freedom, remove injustice and raise the social and economic level of the people of Grenada.

332. At the same time, the Colonial Office had continued its attempts to suppress his activities and in the 1957 general elections, although he had been one of the successful candidates of his party, he had been charged with following a steel band which had passed along a street where an opposing candidate had been holding a political meeting. He had been fined $80, and had had to give up his seat in the Legislative Council and had lost his franchise. For five years he had been unable to vote or to stand for election.

333. In February 1961, his party had won eight out of ten seats, but he himself had still been deprived of his political rights. However, his party, knowing his political experience and remembering his participation in the conference on West Indian federation, had appointed him special adviser to a conference on an Eastern Caribbean Federation in London, where he had been able to argue regarding his political rights, which had then been restored in June 1961. Soon after, in September 1961, he had become Chief Minister.

334. In February 1962, the Colonial Office had called for an audit of expenditures for the four months in 1961 when he had headed the Government, although the audit report for 1960 had not yet been presented to the Legislative Council. In fact, the 1960 report had never been submitted to the Legislative Council, as prescribed by law, and thus far the United Kingdom Colonial Office had done nothing about it.

335. An inquiry into the expenditures of his Government, lasting about seven weeks, had been conducted by jurists and by an ex-judge who, it was alleged, had been promised a job if he was able to recommend the overthrow of the Government. The inquiry had not revealed any fraud. However, the commission of inquiry had questioned his Government's "policy" and had accused it of "squandermania". The Commission of inquiry had also felt that he had not sought the consent of the Federal Government to spend money which belonged to Grenada on the construction of roads. He had also been accused of furnishing his residence in too sumptuous a manner. As a result of that report, the Colonial Office had dissolved his Government in June 1962. The judge who had been chairman of the commission of inquiry had been appointed Chief Justice of the Windward and Leeward Islands.

336. A few weeks before the dissolution of his Government, the British colonies in the eastern Caribbean had formed an Eastern Caribbean Federation, with its capital in Barbados.

337. Three months later, on 13 September 1962, new general elections had been held in Grenada, during which 17,000 names had been removed from the 1961 electoral list of 41,000 voters and 10,000 fictitious names had been added. Nothing had been done about the matter. It was clear from that account that the Colonial Office had spared no efforts to suppress his activities and those of his party, even at the expense of the people of Grenada.

338. At the time of the last general elections in 1962, the party in power had made a pledge to unite Grenada with Trinidad and Tobago within one year. During the first few months following the election of that party, it had done all in its power to impress upon the people the sincerity of that pledge. Five committees had been set up by the Government of Trinidad and Tobago, and they had made several visits to Grenada to convince the people that they were carrying out their pledge. A pamphlet entitled Keeping Faith, a record of progress towards the union of Grenada with Trinidad and Tobago, had been published by the Office of the Chief Minister in Grenada. He read out passages from the pamphlet, which he would make available to members of the Committee. In order further to impress upon the people that the task of uniting Grenada with Trinidad and Tobago was the Government's first obligation to the country, the Chief Minister had refused all invitations to his Government to participate in any conference with the other eastern Caribbean islands. The Government had stood fast on the mandate it had received from the voters to establish unitary statehood with Trinidad and Tobago; and any other form of association had been out of the question.

339. As a result of the Government's failure to implement its pledge, the people of Grenada had demonstrated in numbers ranging from 20,000 to 25,000, calling for general elections. Petitions, resolutions and memoranda had been signed by thousands of citizens of Grenada calling upon the United Kingdom Government for general elections because the party in power had failed to implement its mandate. Those requests had always been rejected.

340. When in December 1965 a dispatch had been sent to Grenada and the other Windward and Leeward Islands recommending a new constitution, 21,000 people in Grenada had attached their signatures to a document protesting against the right of the present Government to negotiate a new constitution over the heads of the people. The people of Grenada felt that the present Government had a mandate to take Grenada into unitary statehood with Trinidad and Tobago. It did not have the right to discuss on behalf of the people a constitution of the kind offered to Grenada.

341. The idea of unitary statehood meant that Grenada would give up whatever measure of autonomy it enjoyed and would be absorbed into the Government of Trinidad and Tobago. That was different from an association of States or a federation. Furthermore, the new constitution, as proposed, not only allowed Grenada to retain its measure of autonomy but also for the first time gave it full control of all its internal affairs. Again the United Kingdom shut its eyes to the wishes of the 21,000 people of Grenada, who called for general elections. The Grenada Trade Union Council comprised five very powerful trade unions. They had all adopted a resolution, a copy of which they had sent to the Administrator, to the effect that general elections should be held before the implementation of the new constitution. The Youth Movement, which comprised the young people of the country, and the Grenada Manual and Mental Workers' Union had followed suit, but nothing had been done.

342. On 18 April 1966, a conference had been convened in London to discuss the new constitution for Grenada and the Eastern Caribbean. Representatives of the Government and the opposition party had participated. As could be seen from the report of the Windward Islands Constitutional Conference, far-reaching changes had been made in the constitution of Grenada.

343. The people of Grenada were deeply disturbed. To permit the implementation of a new constitution with such basic changes merely by the stroke of a pen was not only an insult to democracy and to the people of Grenada but also a violation by the administering Power of Articles 73 and 74 of the United Nations Charter.

344. He urged the Special Committee to recommend the holding of general elections in Grenada under the supervision of the United Nations. He appealed to the Committee to put an end to the explosive situation which could only degenerate into a catastrophe unless immediate steps were taken. The United Nations had made a reputation for itself because of the assistance it gave to colonial peoples and because of its desire to maintain world peace. It was therefore incumbent upon it to save the Eastern Caribbean from the dangerous situation in which it found itself.

345. He was convinced that his humble attempt to present an objective picture of the situation was sufficient to warrant the Committee's attention and some modicum of action, because the opposition had signed a report of the London Constitutional Conference with reservations and because, as a result of the attempt by the authorities to deny the peace-loving citizens of Grenada their rights under the United Nations Charter, his people's suspicion of democracy would assume astronomical proportions. Democracy must not be mutilated to suit the selfish convenience of one party or another. There could be no compromising of democratic principles without defeating those principles themselves.

346. Finally, he stressed that any attempt to implement the new Constitution without general elections, at a time when so much was being said about freedom and democracy, would be an iniquitous miscarriage of justice.

347. In reply to a question concerning the reasons for the lack of progress made with respect to the Eastern Caribbean Federation, the petitioner said that there were several reasons and that it would take a long time to present them all. When the representatives of the eight Territories—Barbados, the three Leeward Islands and the four Windward Islands—had met in London in 1962, one of the contentious points had been the amount of assistance that the United Kingdom Government was going to provide. That Government had, in fact, refused to quote a figure and some of the leaders had felt rather disappointed. Furthermore, after the 1962 elections in Grenada, the United Kingdom Government had authorized the party in power to start negotiations with Trinidad and Tobago on a unitary State and that had excluded Grenada from the proposed federation. Of the ten Territories that were to constitute the original federation there remained only seven, since Jamaica, Trinidad and Tobago and Grenada had pulled out in succession. Then Barbados had thought that it could have its independence. St. Lucia had felt that the original agreement was not being adhered to and Antigua had wanted a better constitution with independence. One of the main reasons was that the United Kingdom Government had not stated in 1962 what assistance it would provide, and the representatives of the Territories had not wanted to commit themselves to a poor federation. The negotiations between the Governments of Grenada and of Trinidad and Tobago concerning a unitary State had set off the process of disintegration of the federal idea.

348. Asked whether any constitutional progress had been made towards the formation of a federation after Grenada had pulled out, he replied that, at the Constitutional Conference in London in 1962, a draft constitution for the eight Territories had been discussed. A White Paper had later been drafted by the Government of Barbados. The representatives of the Territories had been quite willing to accept some compromise and to make concessions in order to achieve a federation.

349. In reply to a question concerning the reasons or obstacles which had prevented the Chief Minister from carrying out his electoral pledge concerning the projected plan for associating Grenada with Trinidad and Tobago, he recalled that the United Kingdom Government had rightly refused to give the grant of $61 million requested by the Prime Minister of Trinidad and Tobago in order to take in Grenada. The people of Grenada had then said that they could make good use of the money and that it should not be given to Trinidad and Tobago. The people of Trinidad and Tobago were not in favour of adopting Grenada. Unitary statehood was not merely the signing of documents but the association of peoples. After the first year the association appeared to be impracticable and undesirable. At the London Conference in April 1966, the Chief Minister of Grenada had found himself in a tight situation and had failed to make any mention of unitary statehood between Grenada and Trinidad and Tobago. The people of Grenada felt very strongly that the Government of Grenada and the Government of the United Kingdom were obligated by convention to go to the country before a new constitution was introduced.

350. Replying to a question concerning the reservations he had formulated for the new constitutional proposals agreed to in London, the petitioner said that his party had reservations, as regards all the paragraphs and articles dealing with the transitional process, before the new Constitution went into effect. It also had reservations with regard to the size of the two houses which would comprise the legislature. A parliament comprising ten elected members and a senate comprising nine appointed members had been proposed. The United Labour Party felt that the people should be consulted first. A body should then be set up that would determine the powers of the two houses, the number of seats in the elected house and the number of constituencies. The number of members in the elected house should have some bearing on the number in the senate.

351. In reply to questions concerning political parties and their policies, he replied that there were now two political organizations in Grenada—the Grenada National Party (GNP), which was in power, and his own party, the United Labour Party (ULP). The latter tried to pursue a socialist democratic ideology, while bearing in mind that those ideas must be adapted to certain structures in the smaller Territories. It was against the old colonial dogma and principles, and also against subversive principles. It was difficult to say what policy the party in power followed. It worked for the big businessmen, the big planters and the commercial community. It had no set policy. His own party stood for a federation, which it saw as the only way of solving the economic problems of the Caribbean Territories. He himself had been advocating that a small federation, of the eight Territories he had mentioned earlier, should be started as a nucleus, which would almost inevitably be joined later by Trinidad and Tobago and Jamaica. He visualized an even larger scheme of things which included other areas such as the Netherlands Antilles—Aruba, Curaçao, St. Martin, Bonaire, etc.—the French Islands such as Martinique and Guadeloupe, and even Puerto Rico. If the West Indies were to be saved, such a federation must be set up as a starting point. The idea of a unitary State, however, with one country giving up its autonomy entirely to be merged into another country, seemed to him unworkable. It would not be fair for the people of one country to adopt a smaller nation. Trinidad and Tobago was not a wealthy country and had its own political and economic problems. The constitution about to be promulgated provided for association with the United Kingdom, but did not preclude the Territories forming some sort of federation or association. He personally preferred a federation with a strong centre, and so did his party. One of the reasons why the Federation of the West Indies had failed was that it had not been defended by its best champions. Also, the constitution of the Federation had been too weak. For that reason, his party and he himself still advocated a strong federal centre.

352. Explaining the reasons for his removal as Chief Minister in 1962, the petitioner said that when his party had come into power, the planters, the commercial community and a certain fraternal organization which had previously controlled the country's affairs had joined forces in an attempt to impress on the Administrator that the Government could not last long. His Government had had to increase some taxes and institute new ones, to the displeasure of the abomentioned groups, which had complained to the Administrator and the United Kingdom Government. Moreover, a number of big business firms which had been in arrears on their income tax (in such amounts as $12,000, $17,000 and $33,000) had been buying up houses for a song from poor people who had been forced to sell because of inability to pay their own taxes. He had obtained a list of the largest debtors to the State and had instructed the Attorney-General to collect the sums owed. The Attorney-General, himself a member of the fraternity mentioned earlier, had informed his friends, and some businessmen had made overtures to the petitioner to have their names taken off the list. Since the Attorney-General had failed to take action, the Government had employed an outside lawyer, and within a period of six weeks had collected about $200,000 in arrears.

353. Under pressure from the above-mentioned groups, the Administrator had set up an inquiry into the actions of the Government. The commission of inquiry whose summons to attend the petitioner had not heeded, had recommended to the Colonial Office the dissolution of the Grenada Government. One of the grounds given had been the purchase of a piano for $3,500. The commission's report, which had referred only to the period when he had been in power, had revealed that a sum of $34,000 had been spent without the proper authority as he had mentioned earlier. It was for such reasons that it had been dissolved, but the Government in power in 1960 had been unable to account for a sum of $803,945, and nothing had been done about it. His own Government had been dissolved because it had not been working in the interests of the business community, the big planters and the aristocrats, who brought pressure to bear through the Grenada Agricultural Society and the chambers of commerce.

354. Asked whether the people had been consulted in any way concerning the new Constitution, the petitioner replied that the Constitution now in force granted only limited powers to the elected representatives. Grenada now had a Chief Minister but the new Constitution provided for a Premier with added powers. It was in fact the Administrator, the representative of the Queen, who, thanks to his many reserved powers, possessed the authority. Under the new Constitution, the Administrator would become a "Governor" who would be merely a figurehead and the elected head of the people would be the practical head of the country. The people had been consulted and welcomed the new Constitution as a step towards freedom, but they had asked to be given an opportunity to determine which party should govern them. However, the United Kingdom Government had ignored that request.

355. Regarding the future possibilities for a federation, the petitioner said that, after talking to the various Chief Ministers and opposition leaders to the islands, he had gained the impression that the idea of federation was not dead. Some of the leaders, however, had felt that the new Constitution should give the local authorities greater autonomy so that they could discuss among themselves the type of federation they wanted. Undoubtedly, the federation would have greater chances of durable success if the people themselves were allowed to work out their own formula. Moreover, he had reason to believe that other foreign Governments would be more sympathetic to them if the islands could be united into a single State.

356. The representative of the United Kingdom, commenting on the petitioner's statement, said that there was little disagreement between the petitioner and his delegation, especially on the present situation and the future of Grenada. He would not comment on some of the matters raised by Mr. Gairy which were wholly domestic and within the jurisdiction of the Government of Grenada, which was elected by universal adult suffrage, and was answerable to the electorate. He wished to recall that the action taken in 1962 had followed a full and impartial inquiry, conducted by a West Indian judge, which had found that there had been extensive financial irregularities and improprieties.

357. Since his delegation would be dealing at length with constitutional matters in Sub-Committee III, he would confine himself to three points. Firstly, the general elections had been held in 1962 and, according to the Constitution, the term of the Legislature was to run until October or November 1967. Although the petitioner, as the leader of the opposition, favoured earlier elections, this was constitutionally a matter for the Chief Minister; there was no special circumstances to justify intervention in the annual processes. Secondly, the petitioner and the Chief Minister, i.e., the leaders of both parties in the Legislature, had both signed the Constitutional Conference Report and were in full agreement on the principles of the new constitutional proposals. There was therefore no basic difference between the political parties that would justify an appeal to the electorate in this connexion. Thirdly, the petitioner had recently voted in favour of a resolution approving the constitutional proposals. The reservations he had expressed mainly concerned the date of the elections.

358. In his delegation's view the main reason for the failure so far to reach agreement on a new federation of the Leeward and Windward Islands was the difference of opinion among the various island Governments about the powers of the central federal Government and its relationship with the territorial units which would go to make up the federation.

359. The United Kingdom Government had always recognized that a new federation would need external aid and had promised to continue to give aid to a new federation at at least the same rate as to the individual islands. It had agreed to discuss financial aid at the conference proposed for 1965 but this conference had not taken place because the various Territories had been unable to agree on the constitutional problems. As to Grenada's future relations with other countries, it was for the people and their elected Government to settle that question themselves and there was nothing in the recent constitutional proposals to prevent them from doing so.

360. In conclusion, he pointed out that there was no question of a constitution being forced upon the people of Grenada, since the new proposals under discussion were being worked out in full agreement at every stage with the elected representatives of the people.

361. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics replied that, contrary to what the United Kingdom representative had asserted, the Constitution was not based upon the will of the people, a fact which had been clearly stated by the petitioner. In the last resort, it was the people themselves who had to decide upon their own future.

Hearing concerning the Bahamas

362. Mr. Pindling, Leader of the Opposition and of the Progressive Liberal Party (PLP), reminded the Special Committee of his petition of 23 and 24 August (A/AC.109/PET.377), in which he had spoken of the economic and social situation in the islands. Because that situation was daily becoming worse and was more and more being taken out of the hands of the people of the Bahamas, he had come to ask for help and support.

363. Since the island's revenue was derived mainly from customs duties, the cost of living was extremely high. Basic commodities were very expensive, while luxuries such as tobacco, alcohol and perfume were cheap. That state of affairs, combined with a lack of adequate social services, made the situation alarming. One of the main subjects of concern was the agreement between the Government of the Bahamas and certain foreign interests, such as the casinos. Despite the United Kingdom's denials, he could cite specific cases in which there were scandalous conflicts of interest. The Miami Herald had published a series of articles to that effect between 12 and 15 December 1965, and so had the Sunday Telegraph of London on 9 January 1966. In February, in the House of Assembly, he had charged the Government with having "sold out" the people of the Bahamas to the gangsters and gamblers. He had referred in particular to the Minister for Finance and Tourism, charging that he had received money on several occasions for services rendered. He had asked the Government a series of questions on gambling, and the replies he had received were an admission that the Government was involved in a wicked deal.

364. A statement by the United Kingdom representative in Sub-Committee III (A/AC.109/SC.4/SR.51) showed that he was ill-informed and did not appreciate the gravity of the situation in the islands. He had said that elections would suffice to put an end to abuses, if they became really excessive, since the people had the right to select their own leaders by universal suffrage. However, the principle of majority rule did not exist in the Bahamas and had not yet been demanded by the United Kingdom; thus, elections would not affect the situation.

365. The recent economic difficulties which had led to a substantial rise in the cost of living, particularly over the last few months, highlighted the weaknesses and instability of an economy based solely on tourism and, consequently, the need to develop other industries in order to restore the balance. At present, the average weekly family income was approximately £9-5-0, which was far from adequate, inasmuch as a survey made for the United Kingdom Ministry of Overseas Development had calculated the necessary minimum income for one family for one week at £20. No effort was being made to develop industries other than tourism. More than 90 per cent of the food consumed in the islands was imported, while large quantities of foodstuffs were being exported by foreign farming enterprises, thus proving that production could be developed for local consumption. Fishing could also provide an important source of income. While hoping that the progress already made would be maintained and that the process of development in the islands would be speeded up, he wished to make it clear that it was necessary to act without undue haste and to avoid rushing into economic expansion without competent advice. He therefore hoped that the Committee would make the following recommendations: (a) that immediate technical assistance should be offered to the Bahama Islands for the development of agriculture and fisheries with the assistance of all the specialized agencies; (b) that funds should be made available by the Special Fund component of the United Nations Development Programme; (c) that pre-investment surveys should be conducted under the auspices of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO); (d) that upon the completion of those surveys, and on the assumption that the reports showed definite economic potential, funds should be made available for the implementation of the organization's report.

366. Lastly, he renewed his request that the Committee should visit the islands to make an on-the-spot investigation. He thanked the Committee for the opportunity to testify and said that he was prepared to answer any questions which might be put to him.

367. In reply to a request to give some details concerning recent constitutional developments in the Bahamas, in clarification of his reference to the absence of majority rule in the Territory, the petitioner said that the only two questions on the subject of the Constitution had been raised by his party in the House of Assembly in the form of bills. The first had been aimed at amending the House of Assembly Elections Act and the second at redefining the status of "belonger", which was very close to citizenship. The first bill was of great significance constitutionally, in that it would amend the electoral system for the House of Assembly by first abolishing the voter's card and then trying to simplify the legislative system. In addition, it would extend the voting hours in certain densely populated areas and make bribery a crime per se, inasmuch as the present law stated that it must first be proved that any gift or contribution offered during an election had been offered with the intention of corrupting the voter. In fact, the bill introduced by the opposition had aimed at restoring the original law, which had been amended by the present Government for obvious reasons. The voter's card did not appear to be necessary, since there were some much larger countries, particularly the United Kingdom, which had no such cards. Moreover, owing to the fact that except in New Providence the card did not bear the photograph of the voter, there was evidence to show that the poor often sold their cards, which deprived them of the opportunity to vote. If, however, the voter's card was to be retained, the opposition would ask that the law should be amended so that the card would serve only for purposes of identification and no one could be prevented from voting, as was the case at present, on the ground that he was unable to produce it. Moreover, registration procedure was very cumbersome and was designed to discourage voters. He informed the Committee that the bill had been defeated and none of his amendments had been adopted.

368. Asked whether there was any movement in favour of independence in the Territory, he replied that there was. During the preceding week, a member of the Assembly, representing the Labour Party, had asked that the question of independence should be considered by a committee. The motion had, of course, been denied and the committee had not been set up. The view of the Progressive Liberal Party regarding independence was that independence today would be comparable with independence in Southern Rhodesia in that it would vest power in the hands of a privileged oligarchic minority. The descendants of the original English settlers, constituting some 15 per cent of the population, had effective political and economic control of the islands, even under the Constitution which had come into effect in 1964. Independence would mean placing power in the hands of that minority. His party would welcome independence provided that the electoral system was democratized. One of the main reasons given by the Government for not permitting the motion to go to committee related to the expense involved in maintaining missions abroad. At that time, his party had joined forces with the mover of the motion and deplored the Government's short-sightedness, since independence was a matter of attaining national sovereignty and not a matter of maintaining missions.

369. Asked whether any political parties in the islands were making an active attempt to promote the independence of the Bahamas, and also whether there were any parties which advocated the federation of the Bahamas with other islands in the area, Mr. Pindling replied that, so far as he was aware, there was at present no political party in the Bahamas which advocated federation with other Caribbean Territories. With respect to the first question, he said that, with the exception of the attempt made during the preceding week by the Labour representatives, no party had as yet made any move to propose independence, although it was greatly desired. Since the system of majority rule had not yet been adopted, it was impossible for the Bahamas to become independent at the present time without prior preparation, for that would mean the domination of the majority by the minority and would very probably lead to open rebellion and violent insurrection; the Bahamas did not, however, want neo-colonialism; it wanted to live as a free country, and the people of the islands would be very happy if the administering Power began to take steps to prepare them for independence.

370. In reply to a question concerning the gangsters and gamblers he had referred to in his statement, the petitioner said that he would be interested to know who was behind them. He knew that some of the people involved were Americans and he understood that an investigation was being made in two states of the United States and in the United Kingdom concerning money which was passing through the Bahamas to the United Kingdom for the financing of casinos there.

371. Replying to a question concerning the role trade unions played in the Bahamas, he said that existing legislation did not permit the organization of workers into trade unions of their choice. Workers of different industries could not combine and form a single union; the result was that, for a working force of about 40,000, there were already some sixteen trade unions registered. The law also prohibited workers in one industry from giving any support to workers involved in a dispute in another industry. Through that policy of "divide and rule", the trade-union movement in the Bahamas was effectively suppressed. The problems facing trade-union leaders were increased by the communications difficulties in a group of islands separated by large expanses of water. The trade union leaders were doing their best to work within the system, but they were also trying to have it changed.

372. Elaborating on his reference to the selling of voters' cards, the petitioner explained that a would-be candidate might by some means obtain the card of a voter prior to election day, thus making him unable to vote despite his being a duly registered voter. With regard to the proportion of eligible voters who had actually voted in the last elections, he said that, as far as he recalled, the poll had been over 82 per cent in the outer islands and just over 70 per cent in New Providence. In some constituencies in New Providence, the proportion of registered voters who had not voted had been as high as 35 per cent.

373. Mr. Fawkes, member of the Bahamas House of Assembly and the President of the Federation of Labour of the Bahamas, said that the purpose of his appearance before the Special Committee was to ask the United Nations to encourage and assist the people of the Bahamas in their efforts to prepare themselves for independence, for it was their conviction that colonialism was preventing the development of co-operation between their country and the international community and impeding its social, economic and cultural advancement.

374. On 5 September 1966 he had submitted a motion calling for the appointment of a select committee to consider the advisability of inviting the United Kingdom Government to convene a constitutional conference with a view to the granting of independence to the Bahamas. Before the Speaker of the House of Assembly had reached the agenda item calling for the appointment of select committees, the Premier had read out a statement to the effect that as a result of the 1963 Constitutional Conference the Bahamas now had a Constitution which gave the people virtually full control of their internal governmental affairs and that the country could not afford the financial burden of responsibility for security, defence and external affairs which the granting of complete independence would impose. The maintenance of embassies and high commissions abroad, and of defence forces, he had said, would require the expenditure of funds which would be better spent to promote the development of the Bahamas for the good of all its inhabitants. For those reasons, he had concluded, the Government could not support proposals for a constitutional conference at that time. When the motion for the appointment of a select committee had subsequently been put to the vote, it had been defeated by a vote of thirteen to seven. The United Bahamian Party had opposed the motion, but no member of the party had participated in the debate.

375. The Premier's statement was fallacious, for the Bahamas Government, which he had said could not afford the cost of maintaining embassies and high commissions abroad, was now operating expensive tourist agencies in different parts of the world—agencies which, it should be noted, employed almost no Bahamian personnel. Less than 1 per cent of the personnel of the tourist agencies consisted of Bahamians, the rest being British, German, American or other nationalities. They were recruited by the Ministry of Tourism, sometimes through advertisements in foreign newspapers which did not come to the attention of Bahamians.

376. According to the United Kingdom the people of the Bahamas were not Africans, yet "Bahamians" was not a legal term under the Constitution and no one could say that they were British. They studied English history and culture but were taught nothing about their own past. Because of their colonial status their economy was tied to that of the western hemisphere and they paid a penalty, in the form of a high customs duty, when they traded with countries outside the Commonwealth. Similarly, the value of the Bahamian dollar was dependent on that of the British pound.

377. It had been argued that the Bahamas had a democratic Constitution based on universal suffrage, but the fact was that, since members of the House of Assembly were not paid, only the wealthy could afford to stand for election. As a result, the membership consisted mainly of merchants and people in the professions, while the working class had only very limited representation. Only two or three times in the past 200 years had the Out-Islands been represented by a person who resided there, a situation aggravated by the fact that there was no local government in those islands at all. At the top level of government, administrative duties were performed not by the personnel of the Ministries, as might be expected, but by British permanent secretaries. Without more education and greater participation in government, the people would not be prepared to assume the responsibilities of independence. He therefore requested that the United Nations should take swift action to persuade the United Kingdom to set a time-table for the eventual granting of independence to the Bahamas. In the meantime a commission of United Nations experts should be appointed to make a survey of political, economic and social conditions with a view to introducing measures which would prepare the Bahamian people to become masters in their own house.

378. In reply to a question as to the conditions he thought the United Kingdom should create to enable the inhabitants to express their views freely with regard to their future status, Mr. Fawkes replied that radical changes were needed in the electoral law. Of the thirty-three members of the House of Assembly, only one resided in the district which he represented. All the other districts were represented by merchants in the capital, whose problems were in no way similar to those of the people they professed to serve and who won election thanks to their great wealth and to the purchase of voters' cards. He would therefore make the following suggestions: firstly, the electoral law should be modernized so as to prevent corruption; secondly, the members of the House of Assembly should be paid and guidelines should be laid down by which it would be possible to recognize whether the House was discussing public affairs or the private affairs of a minister's company; thirdly, a longer period of residence should be required before a candidate could stand for election.

379. With regard to educational conditions in the Bahamas, he explained that the training of Bahamians which had been introduced since the general strike of 1958 equipped them only for inferior positions and compared unfavourably with that provided for the inhabitants of the other West Indian islands. There was, for example, no training which would equip Bahamians for positions as permanent secretaries. The trade unions were not strong enough to agitate successfully for better education for the working people, because the existing trade-union law did not permit the establishment of what might be called a blanket trade union but provided only for small craft unions. As a result there were at least twenty-one trade unions in the Bahamas, the majority of which could not even afford to maintain an office.

380. In reply to a question concerning the ratio of the labour force to the population of the Territory and how many representatives the petitioner thought the labour force should have in the House of Assembly, Mr. Fawkes replied that the labour force constituted between 30 and 70 per cent of the population. He himself, however, was the only labour representative in the House of Assembly. Other labour candidates intended to stand in the next election, but in view of the financial handicaps confronting them it could be said that representation in the House of Assembly was a luxury which the working people could not afford.

381. Giving further information about the debate on his motion for a select committee, he said that not a single member of the United Bahamian Party had spoken; in fact, the Premier and some other members of that party had walked out when the motion had been introduced, returning only at the end of the debate in order to participate in the vote. Those who had supported the motion had the impression that the issue had been decided elsewhere, before the matter had come to the floor of the House. Indeed, that was the traditional procedure in the Bahamas: major questions of policy and finance were decided elsewhere and the members of the United Bahamian Party seldom participated in debates even on motions introduced by one of their own number.

382. Further to what Mr. Pindling had had to say about voters' cards, the petitioner explained that people were paid to surrender their voters' cards, so that when election day came they would not be able to vote and the size of the electoral turn-out would thus be considerably reduced.

383. The representative of the United Kingdom said that he would like to comment on two matters discussed by the petitioners which he thought were of particular importance, and then go on to points of detail. Firstly, he would like to remind the Special Committee of the present constitutional position of the Bahamas. They were self-governing, with an elected legislature and Government, and the next elections were to be held on the basis of universal adult suffrage. The present Constitution had been agreed to at the 1963 Constitutional Conference by all the parties represented in the elected legislature, except for three individual points on which two delegations had expressed reservations. The last elections, held before the 1963 Conference, had been conducted under a different system so it could not be said that any alleged defects in the earlier system would automatically be present in the forthcoming elections. The apportionment of constituencies under the 1963 agreement was the task of a fully independent Constituencies Commission, whose decisions, once endorsed by the House of Assembly, could not under the Constitution be reversed by the intervention of the Governor or of the United Kingdom Government. Electoral procedures such as registration were regulated by local Bahamian law as enacted by the elected Bahamian legislature.

384. Mr. Pindling had asserted that the electoral system in the Bahamas did not constitute majority rule, presumably because the proportion of votes cast might not be precisely reflected in the proportion of seats won. That was, of course, an inevitable feature of any constituency election system, such as existed in the United Kingdom and many other democratic countries. Even if it was possible to have precisely equal constituencies, a party with large majorities in a few constituencies could gain an over-all majority of the votes cast and still fail to win an over-all majority of the seats. It should also be remembered that under the electoral system established at the 1963 Conference the Constituencies Commission was required to observe the principle that constituencies should be as nearly equal as possible. His delegation therefore could not agree that majority rule did not prevail in the Bahamas. If Mr. Pindling's party could convince the electorate of the merits of his proposals and thus win the forthcoming elections, he would no doubt be in a position to put them into effect, but it was to the Bahamas electorate, not the Committee, that he should address his efforts.

385. Secondly, he was sure that the Special Committee would not wish to say or do anything which might imply that it was taking sides in matters of purely domestic political concern. Yet the Committee had just heard an opposition leader make a long statement concerning points of disagreement between his party and the party in power. It had heard serious allegations made, with little or no supporting evidence, against elected ministers who had no opportunity to defend themselves or state their side of the case. It had heard complaints about occasions on which the minority parties had been out-voted by the elected majority party. Finally, it had heard certain of its own members actually declare their sympathy with and support for the opposition party against the duly elected Government. His delegation doubted whether such proceedings advanced the purposes of the Committee.

386. Finally, Mr. Pindling had mentioned two points made by the United Kingdom representative in Sub-Committee III; if the Committee would read carefully what the United Kingdom representative had said in the Sub-Committee and the petitioner's remarks on that score, it would recognize that nothing the petitioner had said substantiated in any way the charge that the information given by the United Kingdom representative to the Sub-Committee was misleading, still less inaccurate.

387. Some of the other matters raised by the petitioners would be dealt with by his delegation in Sub-Committee III. He would like, however, to refer to a few points raised by Mr. Fawkes with regard to matters other than the main issue of independence. As far as the proportion of non-Bahamians to Bahamian civil servants was concerned, he would point out that, as stated in the Special Committee's own report for 1964, at the end of 1962 there had been 142 overseas officers in the Public Service as against a total of 2,418 local civil servants in all departments, and appointments were made by an independent Public Service Commission. As for Mr. Fawkes' statement that more education was needed to prepare the people for independence the fact was that in the Bahamas education was compulsory and free between the ages of 5 and 14. Lastly, the Syrian representative's question concerning the extent to which "workers" were represented in the House of Assembly was not one which he thought could have any real meaning in the context of the problem of constitutional development, which was the main object of the Committee's concern.

388. The Chairman said that in fairness to the petitioners he thought he should point out that they had not stated that there were no Bahamians in the civil service. What they had said was that all important positions were held by overseas civil servants.

389. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania noted that the United Kingdom representative had said, in effect, that he thought the Special Committee would not want to impose anything on the people of the Bahamas, who should be free to decide on all matters which were purely their own concern. The Tanzanian delegation shared that sentiment and precisely for that reason it was opposed to the colonial bondage imposed by the United Kingdom Government on the people of the Bahamas, in whom national sovereignty should and must be vested.

390. The representative of Syria assured the United Kingdom representative that the question of who represented the workers had not been put by the Syrian delegation or, to the best of his recollection, by any other member of the Special Committee. In view of the petitioners' statement to the effect that the labour force was under-represented in Parliament, it had been the duty of the Committee to assess the number and proportion of that labour force in order to see whether or not the Parliament was representative. The petitioner himself had asserted that majority rule in the Bahamas was a fiction, and it had been the duty of the Committee to have further light on the situation. It would have been fairer if the United Kingdom representative had put some questions to the petitioners before their withdrawal, so that members could have benefited from their answers.

391. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that the United Kingdom representative had implied that it was not for the Special Committee to deal with the question of who was a worker and of who was or was not represented in the House of Assembly. It was the Committee's duty, however, to make a careful study of all the constitutional changes that were taking place in the Territory. He considered that the matter raised by the Syrian representative was a completely legitimate one, for the answer to that question would give the Committee an idea of how democratic the Constitution really was and how effectively it reflected the interests of the entire population of the Territory.

392. The statements of the United Kingdom representative and the information furnished by the petitioners had demonstrated that the legislative organs of the Territory did not represent all the different classes of the population. There were various requirements which prevented the masses from becoming members of the legislative bodies. The answer which the petitioner had given to the question put by the Syrian representative showed that only the rich classes—the landowners and the merchants—were represented in the Parliament and that the administering Power was acting directly in the interests of that minority, which represented only 15 per cent of the population. As that group consisted of the descendants of the original English settlers in the Territory, all power was in fact concentrated in the hands of the white minority. It was therefore no accident that the petitioner had drawn an analogy between the situation in his country and that in Southern Rhodesia.

393. In his view, all those matters were extremely important and should be examined by the Committee, since they showed to what extent the Constitution in any given colonial Territory reflected the interests of the people of that Territory.

394. The representative of Bulgaria said that the United Kingdom representative had seen fit to give certain directives to members of the Special Committee. He had reprimanded some members who had put questions to the petitioners and who, according to him, had expressed sympathy for them. According to the United Kingdom representative, those members should not have done so, since the petitioners represented the opposition.

395. The Bulgarian delegation had great sympathy for the petitioners and had always sympathized with the cause of the true representatives of the colonial peoples and with those who aspired to independence, whether they belonged to the government party or to the opposition.

396. Furthermore, the United Kingdom representative apparently objected to the petitioners being asked questions relating to the economic, social and cultural fields. Those questions were necessary, since they had been raised in the light of the information which the United Kingdom had to furnish under Article 73 e of the Charter. Since that information represented only the point of view of the administering Power, it was of the utmost importance that members should put questions to the petitioners.

397. The representative of the United Kingdom, replying to the Bulgarian representative's remarks, said that he could recollect nothing which had either directly or indirectly given the impression that he had not wished members of the Special Committee to put questions to the petitioners relating to the social, cultural and economic fields. He assured the Bulgarian representative that he had no such objection.

398. The representative of Mali recalled that at the beginning of the Special Committee's work that year the United Kingdom representative had assured members of his full co-operation. The Committee had adopted a resolution recommending that administering Powers should facilitate visits of sub-committees to Non-Self-Governing Territories so that they might ascertain the actual conditions in which the subject peoples lived. The attitude of the administering Powers on that point was well known.

399. The Special Committee now had before it petitioners who alone could enlighten the Committee and enable it to take decisions and adopt recommendations without having to rely solely on the statements of the administering Power. The administering Power, however, had refuted all that the petitioners had said and had even denied members of the Committee the right to ask certain questions. He therefore wondered what the United Kingdom delegation understood by co-operation with the Special Committee.

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

400. The representative of Iran, speaking as Rapporteur of Sub-Committee III, introduced the Sub-Committee's report on its work during 1966 (see annex). He pointed out that the Sub-Committee's recommendations on the question of visiting missions had been adopted by the Special Committee at its 413th meeting. The Sub-Committee's conclusions and recommendations on the Territories it had considered appeared in paragraphs 74, 177, 211 and 212 of the report. It would be noted that the Sub-Committee had not considered British Honduras and that it had been unable to give some Territories the consideration they warranted; it hoped that they would be considered in detail at an early stage of the Special Committee's work the following year.

401. The representative of the United Kingdom said that his delegation reserved its position on the conclusions and recommendations in all the sections of the report. If the report was adopted, he requested that his delegation's reservations be recorded in the Special Committee's report.

402. On two points, the report had been overtaken by events. The promised Constitutional Conference on the British Virgin Islands mentioned in paragraph 177 (9), had taken place in October and the Constitutional Commissioner's recommendations had been fully discussed. Full agreement had been reached on new constitutional arrangements, largely on the lines of the Constitutional Commissioner's recommendations. His delegation would provide detailed information in that regard at the next session of the Special Committee, but felt that paragraph 177 (9) and (10) did not take into account recent developments; in particular, the "urgent steps" called for in sub-paragraph (9) had now been taken.

403. With regard to Barbados, the representative of Bulgaria, as recorded in paragraph 96 of the report, had expressed the view that the Government of Barbados would probably not arrange elections until after independence; that opinion was perhaps reflected in the conclusions appearing in paragraph 177 (a). In fact, however, elections had been held on 3 November in accordance with the decision of the Premier of Barbados whose responsibility it was to decide on the timing of elections, and the people had thus an opportunity to express their wishes before the Territory's achievement of independence, to take place on 30 November 1966.

404. The Committee might also wish to note that a Constitutional Conference on Bermuda had begun on 8 November.

405. The representative of Bulgaria said that, during the Sub-Committee's discussions, he had been unable to elicit from the United Kingdom representative any information on whether elections were to be held prior to or following independence and had therefore reached the conclusion that there was no certainty that there would be elections before independence—a matter of great importance if the population was to be able to exercise genuine self-determination.

406. He regretted that the Sub-Committee had not had time to give due consideration to several Territories and hoped that, in future, the work of the Special Committee and the sub-committees could be organized in such a way as to allow all the sub-committees to complete their work.

407. His delegation had not been fully satisfied with the conclusions and recommendations adopted in all cases, but in general it had associated itself with the consensus in Sub-Committee III. The Bulgarian delegation had expressed reservations on paragraph 74 (7), relating to the American Virgin Islands, and on paragraph 177 (13), relating to the British Virgin Islands. It had been unable to subscribe fully to a statement that a United Nations presence during the procedures for the exercise of the right of self-determination was indispensable; it had felt that such a presence might compromise the position of the United Nations, since at the time when the Sub-Committee had discussed the matter conditions conducive to the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) had not existed in the Territories concerned. In his delegation's view, a United Nations presence should take the form of a visiting mission; following that, the question of considering some other form of presence might arise.

408. His delegation was opposed to the present wording of paragraphs 74 (6) and 177 (12), and particularly to the phrase "without precluding the possibilities contained in General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV)". For the Special Committee, the basic document was General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), which in operative paragraph 2, upheld the right of self-determination and the freedom of peoples to determine their political status. It did not seem appropriate for a committee established to ensure the implementation of resolution 1514 (XV) to suggest to a people "alternatives" which were set forth in a different resolution. The purpose of resolution 1541 (XV) differed from that of resolution 1514 (XV); its aim was to provide guidance regarding the applicability of the Charter provision concerning the transmission of information, and any attempt to read it as complementary to General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) was artificial. There was no basis for extracting certain principles from resolution 1541 (XV) and representing them as possible ways of implementing resolution 1514 (XV). It was significant that resolution 1541 (XV) was not referred to in any of the General Assembly's resolutions dealing with the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, even in resolution 2063 (XX), which dealt specifically with the question of small Territories. Nor was reference made to resolution 1541 (XV) in the reports of Sub-Committees I and II in any sections of the present report other than the two to which he had referred. For all those reasons, he could not support paragraphs 74 (6) and 177 (12) in their present form.

409. The representative of Mali agreed with the Bulgarian representative that the present wording of paragraphs 74 (6) and 177 (12) was difficult to accept, particularly the reference to General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV) alongside resolution 1514 (XV). Resolution 1514 (XV) was the Committee's "charter" and the Committee should base its work on that resolution. He regretted that the administering Powers had been unwilling to consent to visiting missions to the various Territories. Small Territories posed difficult problems, but a visiting mission would assist administering Powers in fulfilling their obligations to the peoples, and he would like to appeal to the Powers concerned to show greater co-operation in that regard. There were signs of co-operation from some administering Powers. Spain had already facilitated the visit of a mission to Equatorial Guinea and the question of a mission to Aden was under discussion. His delegation therefore endorsed, in particular, the statements in paragraph 74 (8).

410. Small Territories had problems which were not easy to solve. In any solution it might propose the Committee must bear in mind that its purpose was the correct implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), particularly operative paragraph 2 on self-determination. His delegation had expressed its reservations about the Cook Islands. In the relevant report it was stated that the people had freely chosen to maintain their links with the administering Power and the reference to resolution 1541 (XV) should be interpreted in that spirit. Small islands were not viable as independent units and it might be to their advantage to form an association among themselves or with the administering Power or to be integrated with the latter, but it was essential that the decision should remain with the people. The Committee could not authorize administering Powers to decide the future of Territories by themselves.

411. The representative of India said that he could approve the Sub-Committee's report in its entirety, including the conclusions and recommendations. He was grateful to the United Kingdom delegation for the additional information it had supplied and was happy to note that elections had been held prior to independence in Barbados. He hoped that that practice would be followed in other Territories. With regard to the point raised by the Bulgarian representative, his delegation fully endorsed the provisions of General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV); indeed, the Indian delegation had played an active part in the drafting of that resolution. At the same time, he felt that the reference to resolution 1541 (XV) was not entirely relevant or necessary in the conclusions and recommendations concerning the United States Virgin Islands and the British Virgin Islands. The Special Committee's task was to recommend all necessary measures to speed the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). Resolution 1541 (XV) dealt with the question of the existence of an obligation to transmit information under Article 73 of the Charter, and in the cases in question the administering Powers concerned had accepted that obligation. Resolution 1541 (XV) could also be relevant if there was a problem of determining whether or not a Territory was a Non-Self-Governing Territory and whether resolution 1514 (XV) was applicable to it. He would add that, should a people freely decide to integrate with the metropolitan Power, his delegation would accept their decision without any reservations. The reference seemed particularly superfluous since the rest of the paragraph already alluded indirectly to resolution 1541 (XV).

412. The representative of Denmark said that opposition to a reference to resolution 1541 (XV) seemed to be based either on the argument there was no connexion between the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and the principles set out in resolution 1541 (XV), or on the argument that a specific reference was unnecessary since the text already drew attention to the various alternatives open to the people. He was not convinced by those arguments. Both resolution 1514 (XV) and resolution 1541 (XV) dealt with Non-Self-Governing Territories and they must therefore be regarded as related. The representative of India seemed to be admitting the existence of such a relationship when he said that resolution 1541 (XV) could be used in deciding whether resolution 1514 (XV) was applicable to a particular Territory. His delegation considered it important that the peoples of all Non-Self-Governing Territories should be made aware of their right to self-determination and of the alternatives which they could choose in exercise of that right. Naturally, resolution 1514 (XV) was of paramount importance for the Special Committee, but resolution 1541 (XV) was also important, particularly with regard to Territories such as those referred to in Sub-Committee III. Many delegations, including delegations of African and Asian countries, had drawn attention in the past to the special problems faced by small Territories and the various alternative arrangements open to them—always provided that such arrangements were in accordance with the wishes of the population. It therefore supported the decision of the Sub-Committee to include a reference to resolution 1541 (XV), and saw no reason to delete it. If such a reference had not been made in other cases where it might have been justified, that was not a reason to omit it in the present case.

413. The representative of Poland said that he was opposed to the inclusion of a reference to General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV) in the recommendations concerning the United States Virgin Islands and the British Virgin Islands. The question was important, since attempts were often made by colonial Powers to invoke principle VI of resolution 1541 (XV) as defining the means by which the people of some dependent Territories might achieve independence. That principle, being taken out of context, could thus serve as a smoke-screen for the annexation of Territories. If that was not the intention, it was hard to see why certain colonial Powers should wish to introduce references to resolution 1541 (XV) where it was irrelevant.

414. According to the Sub-Committee's report, some members of the Sub-Committee apparently considered that resolutions 1514 (XV) and 1541 (XV) were somehow complementary. There was no evidence in resolution 1541 (XV) of any intention on the part of the General Assembly to regard it as complementary to resolution 1514 (XV). It would be recalled that resolution 1541 (XV) had been adopted because the factors for determining whether a Territory was a Non-Self-Governing Territory, as listed in resolution 742 (VIII), had proved inadequate and because certain colonial Powers had refused to submit information in accordance with the Charter. Thus the resolution had been designed to deal with that particular situation and not to replace or supplement resolution 1514 (XV), which had been adopted on the previous day as the basic document to guide the process of decolonization.

415. The principles set forth in resolution 1541 (XV) had been used by the Assembly in order to appraise the situation in Territories under Portuguese administration, but had not been regarded as suggesting means for the liberation of those Territories. The principles had also been used in considering the question of Southern Rhodesia; once the situation had been clarified, however, no further reference had been made to resolution 1541 (XV). That was an indication of the General Assembly's interpretation of the scope of resolution 1541 (XV).

416. All the General Assembly's resolutions of direct relevance to the Special Committee, such as resolutions 1810 (XVII), 1956 (XVIII) and 2105 (XX), directed attention to the principles set forth in resolutions 1514 (XV) and not to resolution 1541 (XV). They certainly stressed the right of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories to decide their future freely, and it was true that that right must not be restricted and that the peoples must be aware of the various alternatives open to them, but it was only after political emancipation had been achieved, in accordance with the terms of resolution 1514 (XV), that the provisions of resolution 1541 (XV) could be applied in order to determine whether the transmission of information could cease. In the case of the Territories under discussion, it was clear that the stage had not been reached where the people could be said to have exercised their right to self-determination and where international supervision could therefore end.

417. For the reasons he had given, his delegation would be unable to support the report if the phrase "without precluding the possibilities contained in General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV)" in paragraphs 74 (6) and 177 (12) was not deleted.

418. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that a careful study of the report of Sub-Committee III and all the relevant documents showed that the administering Powers for the colonial Territories in the Caribbean had not only failed to implement the provisions of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in respect of the Territories but were seeking to preserve their control in those Territories or to annex them. It was clear from the report that United Kingdom policy with regard to the Territories in the Caribbean had led to the dissolution of the Federation of the West Indies. The United Kingdom was now endeavouring under various pretexts to bring about the association of some of the Territories with the metropolitan country. While the United Kingdom Government was trying to cover up its machinations, the United States Government was not even attempting to conceal its annexationist aims. It was easy to see that the conditions in the United States Virgin Islands were not such as to enable the people freely to exercise their right of self-determination. For example, Act No. 2082 of the Virgin Islands Legislature clearly indicated that the people of the Territory had no choice other than association or integration with the metropolitan Power. It was clear that policies of the United Kingdom and the United States with regard to the Territories under their administration in the Caribbean were completely in contradiction to the provisions of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

419. Generally speaking, his delegation agreed with the Sub-Committee's conclusions and recommendations concerning the Territories in the Caribbean, but it could not accept the parts of paragraph 74 (6), relating to the United States Virgin Islands, and of paragraph 177 (12), relating to the British Virgin Islands, which referred to General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV). The Special Committee's mandate was based on resolution 1514 (XV) and the consequent resolutions adopted at later sessions of the General Assembly namely resolutions 1654 (XVI), 1810 (XVII), 1956 (XVIII) and 2105 (XX). In none of those resolutions was there any reference whatever to General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV). That was understandable, since that resolution dealt with an entirely different matter, namely the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter. The Special Committee's task, as set out in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), was to help dependent peoples to exercise freely their right to self-determination and complete independence. The Western Powers, however, were trying to force the Special Committee to follow another course by seeking to make use of General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV). What the Western Powers found so attractive in that resolution was not the provisions relating to the rights of the colonial peoples to self-determination and independence, but those which concerned association, such as that existing between the United States and Puerto Rico, and integration which under the circumstances meant integration of colonial Territories with the metropolitan country itself, a step which was tantamount to annexation.

420. Some representatives had referred to the statement in paragraph 310 of chapter XXV of the 1964 report of the Special Committee (A/5800/Rev.1), relating to the United States Virgin Islands, that in a world characterized by the integrationist movement, it might be desirable for the peoples of small Territories to bear in mind the forms mentioned in resolution 1541 (XV) in their achievement of the objectives of resolution 1514 (XV). Such references were invalid, since the General Assembly did not authorize the Special Committee to use resolution 1541 (XV) as a means of interpreting resolution 1514 (XV). It should also be recalled that a number of delegations had voted against that wording and that most of the members of the Special Committee had abstained. The wording had been adopted simply because the Committee had not had sufficient time to examine the full significance of that statement. In his delegation's view, that had been a mistake and the Committee should not repeat it.

421. Although paragraph 74 (7) did not make specific mention of resolution 1541 (XV), a reference to that resolution was implicit in its wording. That was also true with regard to paragraph 177 (4) and (13) and paragraph 211 (6). His delegation was unable to support the paragraphs in which reference was made to resolution 1541 (XV) either explicitly or implicitly, because that could be interpreted as supporting the annexationist policies of the administering Powers in question. In addition, it had reservations regarding the recommendation in paragraph 74 (7) for a United Nations presence during the procedures for the exercise of the right of self-determination in the United States Virgin Islands, since it considered that in the present conditions in that Territory such a presence would not serve any useful purpose and might well impair the prestige of the United Nations. The United Nations would merely be endorsing Act No. 2082 of the Virgin Islands Legislature, under which the only course open to the people of the Territory was association or integration with the United States. His delegation considered that before any decision was taken with regard to the future status of the United States Virgin Islands and the British Virgin Islands, the Special Committee should send a visiting mission to those Territories in order to ascertain the views of the people.

422. The representative of Uruguay said that Uruguay was not a colonialist Power but a small democratic country which firmly believed in an international community based on respect for the law.

423. General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV) unquestionably complemented resolution 1514 (XV). General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) laid down general principles and resolution 1541 (XV) had been adopted to take into account the special case of small Territories. It was the Special Committee's essential duty to facilitate and safeguard the accession to independence of all colonial Territories. In the case of the smaller Territories, the economic aspect was of great importance.

424. With regard to the Territory of Barbados, an attempt had been made to place the responsibility for the failure of the negotiations concerning federation on the administering Power. While his delegation considered that some form of association offered the best prospects for the economic viability of the Caribbean Territories, the people of Barbados had exercised their right of self-determination and had decided to seek separate independence. As he had said in Sub-Committee III, his delegation had no intention of telling the peoples concerned what road they should follow and its observations belonged exclusively to the realm of principle (see annex, para. 68). It was for the people of the Territories to decide their future status; the United Nations should indicate the alternatives open to them but should not try to impose any particular form of government on them. The USSR representative considered that resolution 1541 (XV) was concerned solely with the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter. That resolution, however, laid down criteria by which a Non-Self-Governing Territory could be considered to have reached a full measure of self-government.

425. He was not defending any colonial Power; he was acting in defence of legal principles and was merely trying to ensure that decolonization was achieved in accordance with instruments which the international community had itself devised. In his view, resolution 1541 (XV), which had been adopted for the specific purpose of complementing resolution 1514 (XV), was not an obstacle to the self-determination of peoples and there was no reason why it should not be mentioned. His delegation would therefore support the reference to resolution 1541 (XV) in the paragraphs in question.

426. The representative of Syria said that General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV) concerned specifically the applicability of the obligation of an administering Power to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter. If the question of such information had been mentioned in paragraph 74 (6) and 177 (12) of the Sub-Committee's report, then the reference to resolution 1541 (XV) would have been relevant. As it was the reference added nothing to the text and should be deleted. If the intention of the authors had been to emphasize the right of peoples to self-determination, that right was in fact the substance of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), and resolution 1541 (XV) did not interpret resolution 1514 (XV). The fact that the two resolutions had been adopted within such a short space of time showed that they dealt with two different subjects; otherwise their provisions would have been included in a single resolution. The representatives of Bulgaria, Mali and India had only said that the reference to resolution 1541 (XV) was out of place in the context; they had not said that it should not be mentioned at all. If resolutions 1514 (XV) and 1541 (XV) were considered interdependent, the latter would have to be mentioned every time there was a reference to the former, without regard to its relevancy in the context. The difficulties faced by small Territories could be solved under resolution 1514 (XV); it was hard to see how a resolution dealing with the submission of information could help to solve them.

427. The representative of Yugoslavia said that his delegation agreed in general with the conclusions and recommendations in the Sub-Committee's report. With reference to paragraphs 74 (6) and 177 (12), bearing in mind that General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) was the charter of the Special Committee and in view of the statements made by previous speakers, he considered that it would be sufficient, in the context, to refer only to resolution 1514 (XV). With reference to paragraphs 74 (7) and 177 (13), he considered that the United Nations should play a definite role in decolonization and should be actively associated with any procedures by which the people of the Territories expressed their wishes concerning independence, in order to ascertain their real wishes with regard to their future status. For that reason it was important for visiting missions to visit the Territories to report on the situation there. If they were not able to do so, the only information available would be that provided by the administering Power.

428. The representative of Italy said that, since his delegation was a member of Sub-Committee III, its views were already set forth in the Sub-Committee's report. With regard to the Bulgarian representative's reservation concerning paragraphs 74 (7) and 177 (13), he thought that it might give the unfortunate impression that he wished to limit the role of the United Nations and to bar any United Nations presence in the supervision of self-determination; he hoped that that had not been the intention of the Bulgarian representative.

429. With regard to the suggestion made by the Bulgarian representative and supported by other speakers that the reference to General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV) should be deleted in paragraphs 74 (6) and 177 (12), he considered that resolution 1514 (XV) was fully applicable to the Territories concerned but that there were special circumstances on account of their limited size and population. His delegation had often stressed the necessity to study the question of small Territories in depth and to work out criteria to govern their decolonization and future status. The General Assembly, in operative paragraph 8 of resolution 2105 (XX), had asked the Special Committee to pay particular attention to the small Territories. No study of the special circumstances surrounding the small Territories had yet been initiated, however, and no criteria worked out. He hoped that the Special Committee would take up that question at its next session and that the General Assembly would include a specific provision to that effect in its resolution concerning the Special Committee's report. Italy, together with most other members of Sub-Committee III, had thought it necessary to indicate that the special features of the Territories under consideration made both resolutions 1514 (XV) and 1541 (XV) applicable. It would be misleading to state that the Territories should become independent on the basis of resolution 1514 (XV) alone, since the debate in Sub-Committee III had dwelt on the need for them to merge into larger associations in order to gain greater political and economic strength and to remain free from outside interference.

430. With reference to the USSR representative's statement, resolution 1541 (XV) did not speak of association or integration with the administering Power but with independent States in general. There were already several independent States in the Caribbean area with which the Territories under consideration might associate or integrate. Since no criteria had yet been worked out governing the future status of small Territories, and since the Sub-Committee had not considered it appropriate to make specific recommendations concerning an association between any given Territories or concerning a federation, it had thought to carry out its mandate best by including general references to resolution 1541 (XV). Those references should be retained. Their deletion would weaken the scope of the report's conclusions and recommendations.

431. The representative of the United States of America, replying to the USSR representative's allegations concerning the supposed suppression of the right to self-determination in the United States Virgin Islands, said that during the past year important progress had been made towards self-determination. The people already had a Legislature elected on the basis of universal suffrage, and progress had been made towards providing them with a popularly elected chief executive and towards eliminating the presidential veto. There had also been measures to perfect the representative nature of the Legislature. It could hardly be argued that the Convention felt inhibited because of its terms of reference concerning the investigation of the Islands' relationship with the United States, since the final report of the Convention did go into that very question. The Constitutional Convention had been established in 1964, on the broadest possible basis of legislation with participation by the various Virgin Islands' political parties. Those attending the Convention had included twenty-two delegates, elected in November 1964 by all the islanders, as also the eleven members of the Legislature. It was therefore difficult to argue that the Convention's views were not those of the majority of the people. The Convention's recommendation concerning reapportionment of the Legislature had already been made law by the United States Congress. The recommendations concerning the election of a Governor and the abolition of the presidential veto had already been passed by both Houses of Congress. Only a few minor difficulties, such as the date upon which they would take effect, remained to be settled at the time Congress adjourned. The Administration had actively supported that measure and would press again for its adoption in the forthcoming session of Congress.

432. It had been suggested that General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) expressed general principles which should guide the Special Committee, while General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV) related to a side issue, namely, the transmission of information by the administering Powers. That was not a realistic interpretation. As the representative of Uruguay had said, they were complementary resolutions. Resolution 1541 (XV) was particularly applicable to the question of self-determination in the smaller Territories; it set forth the various ways in which such Territories could achieve self-determination. That had been the question before the Sub-Committee and there was no reason why the references to resolution 1541 (XV) should not be included in the report. To refuse to admit its existence would seem to be unrealistic and unnecessarily restrictive. There was ample precedent for retaining the references, since, in the Special Committee's report to the nineteenth session of the General Assembly concerning the Territories considered by Sub-Committee III (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. XXV), reference had been made to resolution 1541 (XV) in the general conclusions.

433. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that he wished to draw the attention of the administering Powers to the second sentence in paragraphs 74 (7) and 177 (13). He hoped that during the procedures for the exercise of the right to self-determination the United Nations would be invited to ascertain that the process was genuine. He shared the regrets expressed in paragraphs 74 (8) and 177 (14). General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV) concerned the transmission of information and had nothing whatsoever to do with the process of decolonization. General Assembly resolution 1542 (XV), which referred to resolution 1541 (XV), made that absolutely clear. The Special Committee was not trying to decide whether the Virgin Islands were self-governing; it was considering them as dependent Territories, and the reference to resolution 1541 (XV) was therefore irrelevant. The only guiding principle should be General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and his delegation would oppose the inclusion of the reference to resolution 1541 (XV) if the matter came to a vote. Only after the question of the smaller Territories had been discussed in detail would it be possible to decide whether, in the process of decolonization, the other forms of self-government mentioned in principle VI of the annex to resolution 1541 (XV) could be taken into consideration.

434. The representative of Sierra Leone said that his delegation considered that the inclusion of a reference to General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV) in the report was somewhat premature. As had been pointed out, that resolution had been adopted shortly after General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and the aims of both resolutions were quite clear. Resolution 1514 (XV) was a categorical statement of the principles which should guide the Special Committee in its consideration of problems of decolonization, whereas resolution 1541 (XV) set out the principles which should guide the General Assembly in determining whether or not an obligation existed to transmit the information called for in Article 73 e of the Charter. The important thing was that the people of the Territories should be enabled to decide on their future status in full freedom. The Sub-Committee had decided not to refer to resolution 1541 (XV) because its work had been based on resolution 1514 (XV) and any reference to resolution 1541 (XV) would be premature. The latter resolution could not be considered before a Territory had reached a degree of independence as defined in principle VI of the annex to that resolution, i.e. before it had emerged as a sovereign independent State, decided on free association with an independent State, or on integration with an independent State.

435. He wished to make it clear that his delegation was not suggesting that every Territory must emerge as a sovereign independent State, but that the people of the Territory concerned must be free to decide on their future status without restraint or restrictions.

436. His delegation therefore agreed with the representatives who had said at the previous meeting that the references to resolution 1541 (XV) in the report should be deleted.

437. The representative of Venezuela said that his delegation maintained its position that General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) was the fundamental instrument of decolonization and should be applied to all parts of the world where the vestiges of colonialism still existed.

438. Venezuela was traditionally a defender of the principle of self-determination and supported the attainment of independence by countries and peoples under colonial rule. Independence without economic viability would place many small Territories in a situation in which they would be dependent on the former administering Power or another powerful country. His delegation therefore considered that General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV) was a necessary complement to resolution 1514 (XV), since it listed ways in which a Territory could attain a full measure of self-government other than those referred to in resolution 1514 (XV) and was intended to ensure that the decision taken by a people in the free exercise of their right of self-determination and by means of a popular referendum was the one most in keeping with their interests.

439. Several delegations had placed the responsibility for the failure to bring about a federation in the Caribbean on the administering Power. The United Nations could not decide what form of independence a particular Territory should adopt. All it could do was to ensure that the colonial peoples concerned were able to exercise their right of self-determination in absolute freedom.

440. With regard to the Syrian representative's remark at the previous meeting that the reference to resolution 1541 (XV) added nothing to the text, it might also be asked what harm it would do, since, without the explicit reference to the resolution, the idea of that resolution would still be implicit in the paragraph.

441. His delegation supported the wording of paragraphs 74 (6) and (7) and 177 (12) of the report.

442. The representative of Tunisia thought that the objection raised to the inclusion in the report of General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV) were quite valid. As had been pointed out, the Special Committee was guided in its work by General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), which declared that dependent peoples should be enabled freely to exercise their right to complete independence. His delegation considered it essential that the people should be able to make their choice in complete freedom by means of a popular consultation and that the results of such a referendum should be binding on the international community. He pointed out that resolution 1514 (XV) did not limit the forms of political status open to the people. It was the Committee's task to ensure that the people made their choice freely and that no pressure was brought to bear upon them. It was for that reason that paragraph 74 (6) of the Sub-Committee's report invited the administering Power to ensure that the people of the Territory were fully aware of the various alternatives open to them. His delegation therefore saw no need for including a reference to resolution 1541 (XV), especially since the Special Committee was divided on the issue. He appealed to the representatives who wished to maintain the reference to resolution 1541 (XV) not to press their point.

443. The representative of Australia said that his delegation, which was not a member of Sub-Committee III, simply wished to reserve its position on certain aspects of the conclusions and recommendations of the Sub-Committee, in particular with regard to the role which the United Nations might properly play in the Territories under consideration in the particular circumstances of those Territories.

444. His delegation agreed with the general position stated by the representatives of Denmark and Uruguay with regard to the inclusion in the report of references to General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV). In his delegation's view, reference to that resolution did not create any danger in relation to the general objectives which all members were seeking in respect of the islands in question, but, on the contrary, provided safeguards in the circumstances which were peculiar to such islands. Such reference did not detract from the validity of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), but, as the Venezuelan representative had said, complemented it. The problems of such islands were indeed different from those of other Territories with which the Committee had been concerned, and the solutions to those problems must reflect their different nature.

445. The representative of Iran said that two points had been the subject of controversy during the debate in Sub-Committee III. The first had concerned the reference to General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV) and the second had related to the idea of a United Nations presence in Territories during the exercise of the right of self-determination.

446. With regard to the first point, the majority of members had thought that while the basis of the Special Committee's work was General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), reference should be made to resolution 1541 (XV), so that the people of the Territories would have some idea of the various forms of political status open to them. Accordingly, the majority had decided to adopt the wording which the Special Committee had used in paragraph 310 of the general conclusions concerning the United States Virgin Islands in its 1964 report (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. XXV). Since, however, a minority of members had still maintained their reservations regarding the reference to resolution 1541 (XV) and since the Sub-Committee had wanted to achieve a consensus, members had agreed on a compromise formula, which was now before the Special Committee in paragraphs 74 (6) and 177 (12). As could be seen, it did not link resolution 1541 (XV) with resolution 1514 (XV) but merely said "without precluding the possibilities contained in General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV)". In other words, it referred to the various forms of political status. So long as there was agreement that the people should be informed of the various forms of political status open to them and should be enabled to express themselves freely, it was irrelevant whether the Committee decided to exclude or include reference to resolution 1541 (XV).

447. With regard to a United Nations presence during the exercise of self-determination, the majority of the members of the Sub-Committee had considered that such a presence was essential. A minority had said that it would not be appropriate to make such a recommendation at that stage. In the view of the majority, the best means of expediting the process of decolonization was to ensure that the people of the Territory concerned were enabled to exercise their right of self-determination in freedom and without restrictions. Only through a United Nations presence would it be possible to ascertain whether or not the people's decision corresponded with their freely expressed wishes.

448. The representative of Uruguay said that he could not agree with the view expressed at the previous meeting by the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania that General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV) had nothing to do with the process of decolonization. He adhered to his position that General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) and 1541 (XV) were complementary, a position which had been supported at the present meeting by the representatives of Venezuela and Iran. The Tanzanian representative had referred to resolution 1542 (XV), but in his view that resolution supported his own thesis. It was concerned with the question of the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter; it simply applied resolution 1541 (XV) to the particular case of certain Territories under Portuguese administration and set forth the conclusion that Portugal had an obligation to transmit information on those Territories. Nothing in resolution 1542 (XV) could be construed as derogating from or repealing, either explicitly or implicitly, resolution 1541 (XV). It was quite clear from principle VI in the annex to resolution 1541 (XV)—and, in the light of operative paragraph 2, the principles in the annex had the same force as the resolution itself—that a Non-Self-Governing Territory could reach a full measure of self-government by emergence as a sovereign independent State, or by free association with an independent State, or by integration with an independent State. In the absence of any subsequent decision by the Assembly repealing or superseding resolution 1541 (XV), that principle remained in force.

449. With regard to the appeal addressed to members by the representative of Tunisia, he was afraid that he must maintain his position, which was based on principle. His delegation had no political interest to defend in the matter but held that that cause of decolonization should be pursued in accordance with law. It would be dangerous to introduce political factors in the interpretation of legal principles. The Sub-Committee had decided, by a majority vote, that a reference to resolution 1541 (XV) in the two cases under discussion was appropriate and he did not think that that position could be prejudicial to the cause of decolonization. He considered that the text should remain as it stood.

D. Action taken by the Special Committee

450. At the 478th meeting, the Special Committee considered the conclusions and recommendations proposed by Sub-Committee III concerning the United States Virgin Islands, as contained in paragraph 74 of its report (see annex).

451. The representative of Mali proposed the deletion of the phrase "without precluding the possibilities contained in General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV)", in paragraph 74 (6).

452. The amendment by Mali to delete this phrase was adopted by 11 votes to 6, with 3 abstentions.

453. The Special Committee then adopted the conclusions and recommendations proposed by Sub-Committee III, as amended, without objection, it being understood that the reservations expressed by members would be recorded (see paras. 401-450 above and 454-457 below).

454. The representative of India, explaining his vote, said that he had abstained because, although his delegation supported General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV), reference to it was unnecessary in the present case. However, he could not vote in favour of the amendment lest it should be interpreted as a vote against General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV), contrary to the position of his delegation as stated at an earlier meeting of the Committee. His delegation wished its views to be stated in the record.

455. The representative of Madagascar said that he would have wished the deleted phrase had been retained and an attempt made to reach a consensus to that effect because the options offered in General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV) did not affect the provision on self-determination in Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

456. The representative of Iran said that small Territories were more vulnerable than others to external pressures and they should be assured of an opportunity to exercise their right of self-determination. For that reason, the Sub-Committee had recommended the presence of the United Nations, which, for its part, must respect the freely expressed wishes of the people. The people must be made aware of the possibilities General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV) offered to it. His delegation supported that resolution, but he had abstained in the vote because reference to it in the present instance was not essential.

457. The representative of the United States of America said that he wished to place on record his delegation's general reservations on the chapter under consideration and on the decision the Special Committee had just taken.

458. The conclusions and recommendations adopted by the Special Committee concerning the United States Virgin Islands are set out in paragraph 469 (a) below.

459. At the same meeting, the Special Committee considered the conclusions and recommendations proposed by Sub-Committee III concerning the British Virgin Islands, Barbados, Antigua, Dominica, Grenada, Montserrat, St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla, St. Lucia and St. Vincent, as contained in paragraph 177 of its report.

460. The Chairman suggested that in accordance with the Special Committee's decision on paragraph 74 (6), he took it that the Committee wished to vote on the deletion of the phrase "without precluding the possibilities contained in General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV)" in paragraph 177 (12).

461. The amendment to delete this phrase was adopted by 12 votes to 6 with 3 abstentions.

462. The Special Committee then adopted the conclusions and recommendations proposed by Sub-Committee III, as amended, without objection, it being understood that the reservations expressed by members would be recorded (see paras. 401-450 and 454-457 above and 463 below).

463. The representative of Madagascar formally stated that he would have opposed the deletion if an attempt had been made to reach a consensus. However, in view of the result of the vote, he considered that the reference to resolution 1514 (XV) would sufficiently safeguard the people's rights.

464. The conclusions and recommendations adopted by the Special Committee concerning these Territories are set out in paragraph 469 (b) below.

465. At the same meeting, the Special Committee considered the conclusions and recommendations proposed by Sub-Committee III concerning Bermuda, Bahamas, Turks and Caicos Islands and Cayman Islands, as contained in paragraph 211 of its report.

466. The Sub-Committee adopted the conclusions and recommendations proposed by Sub-Committee III without objection, it being understood that the reservations expressed by members would be recorded (see paras. 401-450 above).

467. The conclusions and recommendations adopted by the Special Committee concerning Bermuda, Bahamas, Turks and Caicos Islands and Cayman Islands are set out in paragraph 469 (c) below.

468. At the same meeting the Special Committee adopted the statement concerning the Falkland Islands (Malvinas) proposed by Sub-Committee III as contained in paragraph 212 of its report.

469. The conclusions and recommendations adopted concerning the United States Virgin Islands, British Virgin Islands, Antigua, Dominica, Grenada, Montserrat, St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla, St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Barbados, Bermuda, Bahamas, Turks and Caicos Islands and Cayman Islands, and the statement concerning the Falkland Islands (Malvinas) which the Special Committee adopted at its 478th meeting on 16 November read as follows:

(a) UNITED STATES VIRGIN ISLANDS

(1) The Special Committee recalls its conclusions and recommendations concerning the Territory which it adopted in 1964 and which were endorsed by the General Assembly at its twentieth session.

(2) It reaffirms that the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples applies fully to the Territory.

(3) It notes the information provided by the administering Power concerning the Constitutional Convention which met between December 1964 and February 1965 and which proposed a new Organic Act for the Territory providing for a greater degree of autonomy.

(4) It also notes that, so far, the administering Power has taken final action on only one of the proposals made by the Convention and that the proposal for an elected Governor has not yet been passed into law.

(5) It regrets that despite some measure of advancement in the political field the administering Power has not yet implemented the Declaration with respect to the Territory and urges it to do so without delay.

(6) It reaffirms the right of the people to exercise their right of self-determination in complete freedom and reiterates its previous recommendation inviting the administering Power to ensure that the people of the Territory be enabled, in complete freedom and without any restrictions, to express their wishes concerning the future political status of the Territory. It also invites the administering Power to ensure that the people of the Territory are fully aware of the various alternatives open to them, in their achievement of the objectives of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

(7) It reiterates its belief that the United Nations must be assured that the exercise of the right of self-determination is undertaken in complete freedom and in full knowledge of the available choices. It therefore considers that a United Nations presence during the procedures for the exercise of the right of self-determination is indispensable.

(8) The Special Committee regrets that the administering Power has not agreed to a visiting mission from the Special Committee to the Territory and affirms that a visit to this Territory is both useful and necessary. Accordingly, it invites the co-operation of the administering Power to enable the United Nations to send a visiting mission to the Territory, in order to obtain first-hand information concerning the Territory and to ascertain the views of the people and the extent to which they are aware of the options open to them, with regard to their future political status.

(b) BRITISH VIRGIN ISLANDS, ANTIGUA, DOMINICA, GRENADA, MONTserrat, St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla, St. Lucia, St. Vincent and Barbados

General

(1) The Special Committee recalls its conclusions and recommendations concerning these Territories which it adopted in 1964 and which were endorsed by the General Assembly at its twentieth session.

(2) The Special Committee reaffirms that the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples applies fully to these Territories. At the same time, it recognizes that the small size and population of these Territories, and the nature of their economies, present peculiar problems which demand special attention.

(3) The Special Committee reaffirms that it is for the people of the Territories, and for them alone, to express themselves freely on the form of political status they wish to adopt in order to achieve the objectives of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

(4) The Special Committee reaffirms the right of the people of these Territories to exercise their right of self-determination in complete freedom and in full knowledge of the various forms of political status open to them. It also expresses its belief that, particularly in the case of small Territories, the United Nations should take appropriate steps to ensure that the people of these Territories are enabled to express themselves freely on their future status and in full knowledge of the options available to them.

(5) The Special Committee reiterates its previous recommendation concerning the need for visiting missions to these Territories and, to this end, urges the administering Power to enable the Special Committee to send visiting missions to the Territories.

(6) The Special Committee recalls its belief expressed in 1964 that it should be possible for these Territories to join with others in the area to form an economically and administratively viable State. It also recalls that, at that time, negotiations were being carried on between almost all of these Territories with a view to establishing a federation. The Special Committee regrets that these negotiations were not successful and that, as a consequence, each Territory has been obliged to seek a separate solution. It expresses the hope that the administering Power will do everything possible to facilitate the kind of solution desired by the people.

British Virgin Islands

(7) The Special Committee recalls its conclusions and recommendations concerning the Territory which it adopted in 1964 and which were endorsed by the General Assembly at its twentieth session.

(8) It reaffirms that the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples applies fully to the Territory.

(9) It notes that a Constitutional Commissioner visited the Territory in 1965 and that, on the basis of the Commissioner's report, a Constitutional Conference will be held during October 1966. It notes with concern the observations by the Constitutional Commissioner that there was discontent in the Territory and that one of the main reasons for this was the fact that the Government was largely out of touch with the people. The Special Committee trusts that the administering Power will take urgent steps to remedy this situation.

(10) The Special Committee regrets that, despite a certain measure of advancement in the constitutional field, the administering Power has not yet implemented the Declaration with respect to the Territory and urges it to do so without delay.

(11) It reaffirms the right of the people to exercise their right of self-determination in complete freedom.

(12) The Special Committee reiterates its belief expressed in 1964 that it should be possible for the Territory to join with others in the area to form an economically and administratively viable State. It regrets that since 1947 no effective steps have been taken to consult the people of the Territory on their future status. It therefore invites the administering Power to take the necessary steps to ensure that the people of the Territory are fully aware of the various forms of political status open to them, in their achievement of the objectives of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). The Special Committee also invites the administering Power to ensure that the people of the Territory be enabled, in complete freedom and without any restrictions, to express their wishes concerning the future political status of the Territory.

(13) It reiterates its belief that the United Nations must be assured that the exercise of the right of self-determination in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) is undertaken in complete freedom and in full knowledge of the available choices. It therefore considers that a United Nations presence during the procedures for the exercise of the right of self-determination will be essential.

(14) The Special Committee regrets that the administering Power has not agreed to a visiting mission from the Special Committee to the Territory, and affirms that a visit to the Territory is both useful and necessary. Accordingly, it invites the co-operation of the administering Power to enable the United Nations to send a visiting mission to the Territory, in order to obtain first-hand information concerning the Territory and to ascertain the views of the people.

Barbados

(15) The Special Committee recalls that, when it last considered the Territory, Barbados was actively engaged in negotiations for federation or association with neighbouring Territories.

(16) It notes that, due to the failure of these negotiations, the Barbados Legislature decided to request separate independence for the Territory.

(17) The Special Committee welcomes the fixing of 30 November 1966, as the date on which Barbados will become independent.

(18) The Special Committee notes that it is still possible for Barbados to become part of a federation, should the people of Barbados express such a wish through their elected representatives.

Antigua, Dominica, Grenada, Montserrat, St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla, St. Lucia and St. Vincent

(19) The Special Committee, having heard the statement of the administering Power and the statement by the petitioner from Grenada, did not find it possible to give the question of these Territories the detailed consideration it required. It therefore decides to postpone its consideration of this question and, subject to any decisions which the Assembly may take at its twenty-first session, to examine the situation in these Territories in detail at an early date during its meetings in 1967.

(c) BERMUDA, BAHAMAS, TURKS AND CAICOS ISLANDS AND CAYMAN ISLANDS

(1) The Special Committee recalls its conclusions and recommendations on Bermuda, Bahamas, Turks and Caicos Islands and Cayman Islands, which it adopted in 1964 and which were endorsed by the General Assembly at its twentieth session.

(2) The Special Committee reaffirms that the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples applies fully to these Territories.

(3) The Special Committee regrets that the administering Power has not yet implemented the Declaration in these Territories and urges it to do so without delay.

(4) The Special Committee considers that in view of the lack of sufficient information on these Territories, and, in the case of the Territory of the Bahamas, of conflicting statements concerning conditions by the representative of the administering Power and by the petitioners, the administering Power should enable the Special Committee to dispatch visiting missions to the Territories as soon as possible.

(5) The Special Committee considers that the administering Power should take immediate measures in order to transfer all powers to the peoples of these Territories, without any conditions or reservations, in accordance with their freely expressed will and desire, in order to enable them to enjoy complete independence and freedom.

(6) It also expresses its belief that, particularly in the case of small Territories, the United Nations should take appropriate steps to ensure that the people of these Territories are enabled to express themselves freely on their future status and in full knowledge of the options available to them.

(7) The Special Committee, having heard the statement of the administering Power and the statements by the petitioners from the Bahamas, did not find it possible to give the question of these Territories the detailed consideration it required. It therefore decides to postpone its consideration of this question and, subject to any decisions which the Assembly may take at its twenty-first session, to examine the situation in these Territories in detail at an early date during its meetings in 1967.

(d) FALKLAND ISLANDS (MALVINAS)

The Special Committee recalls the provisions of General Assembly resolution 2065 (XX) of 16 December 1965, by which the Assembly: (i) invited the Governments of Argentina and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to proceed without delay with the negotiations recommended by the Special Committee, with a view to finding a peaceful solution to the problem, bearing in mind the provisions and objectives of the Charter of the United Nations and of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and the interests of the population of the Falkland Islands (Malvinas); (ii) requested the two Governments to report to the Special Committee and to the General Assembly at its twenty-first session on the results of the negotiations. The Special Committee takes note of the information provided by the Governments of Argentina and the United Kingdom (A/AC.109/145 and Add.1, A/AC.109/146 and Add.1) that meetings were held on the problem on 19 and 20 July 1966 and that they would be continued.

INTRODUCTION

1. At its 400th meeting on 4 April 1966, the Special Committee decided to continue Sub-Committee III with the same membership as in 1965.^a

2. At its 41st meeting held on 28 April 1966, Sub-Committee III elected Mr. Leonardo Díaz González (Venezuela) as Chairman and Mr. Mohsen Sadigh Esfandiary (Iran) as Rapporteur. At the 45th meeting on 9 August 1966, following the transfer of Mr. Leonard Díaz González, Mr. Mohsen Sadigh Esfandiary assumed the duties of Chairman of the Sub-Committee.

3. At its 42nd meeting held on 5 May, the Sub-Committee decided that it would consider the questions referred to it in the following order:

- (1) Implementation of General Assembly resolution 2069 (XX) of 16 December 1965, including the question of visiting missions.
- (2) (a) Bermuda, Bahamas, Turks and Caicos Islands, Cayman Islands;
- (b) United States Virgin Islands, British Virgin Islands, Antigua, Dominica, Grenada, Montserrat, St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla, St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Barbados.
- (3) Falkland Islands (Malvinas) and British Honduras.

4. In accordance with the usual practice, the representatives of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America, as administering Powers, participated in the work of the Sub-Committee during its consideration of the Territories for which they were responsible.

5. The Sub-Committee held a total of nineteen meetings between 28 April and 11 October 1966. Owing to lack of time, the Sub-Committee was unable to consider the Territory of British Honduras. An account of the Sub-Committee's consideration of the remaining items referred to it, together with its conclusions and recommendations on them, which the Sub-Committee recommends to the Special Committee for adoption, are set out below.

^a The members of the Sub-Committee are: Bulgaria, Iran, Italy, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Uruguay and Venezuela.

I. IMPLEMENTATION OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION 2069 (XX), INCLUDING THE QUESTION OF VISITING MISSIONS

Consideration by the Sub-Committee

6. The Sub-Committee considered this question at its 42nd to 44th meetings held on 5, 11 and 12 May.

7. At its 42nd meeting the Sub-Committee authorized the Chairman to get in touch with the representatives of the United Kingdom and the United States to ascertain the views of their Governments concerning the request of the General Assembly contained in operative paragraph 3 of resolution 2069 (XX).

8. At the 43rd meeting, the Chairman informed members of the Sub-Committee of the replies he had received from the representatives of the United Kingdom and the United States.

9. The representative of the United Kingdom had said that the question of visiting missions raised difficult problems of principle for his Government and that he could not say anything that might encourage the Sub-Committee to expect any changes in his Government's previously expressed attitude. His delegation would be prepared to transmit to the United Kingdom Government any specific request or suggestion from the Committee for a visit to a particular Territory, but that action could not be taken to imply any commitment that the United Kingdom Government would be able to respond to such a request.

10. The representative of the United States had said that he was not in a position to give a reply to the question of visiting missions in general. Any specific proposal from the Sub-Committee for a visit to a Territory for which the United States was responsible would be transmitted to his Government but he could not offer any encouragement that his Government would change its position.

11. After considering these replies, the Sub-Committee, at its 44th meeting, adopted by consensus a recommendation to the Special Committee. The representative of Italy expressed reservations concerning the usefulness of the recommendation.

12. The recommendation adopted by the Sub-Committee read as follows:

"The Sub-Committee recommends to the Special Committee that, in agreement with the position adopted on the question of visiting missions by the General Assembly at its twentieth session, as set out in paragraph 3 of resolution 2069 (XX) of 16 December 1965 and in the pertinent part of paragraph 7 of resolution 2105 (XX) of 20 December 1965, it invites the administering Powers, in cases where the special Committee may decide to send out visiting missions to any of the Territories being considered by Sub-Committee III, to make it possible for such visits to take place and to extend to them their co-operation. The relevant paragraphs of these resolutions read as follows:

"3. Requests the administering Powers to allow United Nations visiting missions to visit the Territories, and to extend to them full co-operation and assistance;" (resolution 2069 (XX))."

"7. Approves the programme of work envisaged by the Special Committee during 1966, including the possibility of holding a series of meetings in Africa and the sending of visiting groups to Territories, particularly in the Atlantic, Indian and Pacific Ocean areas;" (resolution 2105 (XX))."

13. This recommendation, which was presented to the Special Committee in an oral report by the Rapporteur, was adopted by the Special Committee at its 413th meeting on 13 May 1966.

II. UNITED STATES VIRGIN ISLANDS

A. Consideration by the Sub-Committee

Introduction

14. The Sub-Committee considered the Territory of the United States Virgin Islands at its 47th, 50th to 52nd and 55th to 57th meetings between 18 August and 16 September 1966.

15. The Sub-Committee had before it the working papers prepared by the Secretariat (see paras. 10-31 of chap. XXII).

16. In accordance with the procedure agreed upon by the Special Committee, the representative of the United States of America, as administering Power, participated in the work of the Sub-Committee at the invitation of the Chairman.

General statements

17. The representative of the United States of America said that the previous two years had been years of social and economic growth in the United States Virgin Islands. Although the Territory had a population of only about 50,000, local government revenues had increased from about $25 million in the 1964 fiscal year to almost $29 million in the 1965 fiscal year, and were still increasing. The per capita income of $2,000 was the highest in the Caribbean and bank assets were up 35 per cent to over $90 million. Wage scales continued to rise, and the volume of the tourist industry had increased to $54 million in 1965. Construction had been almost completed on a large aluminium plant, to be operated in a complex with a petroleum refinery; the new plant would contribute towards the diversification of the economy. In addition, the Government of the Virgin Islands had purchased the water and power facilities of the Virgin Islands Corporation, a Federal Government agency which had been set up in the 1930's to help to stabilize the Territory's economy. The Corporation now retained only a small portion of its once impressive operations.

18. The number of pupils in the public schools had risen by 8 per cent in the previous year to more than 10,000, ninety-two new classrooms and twenty-six special facilities had been constructed during the previous four years and an additional 113 classrooms would be ready by the autumn of 1966. Pre-school training, adult education and apprenticeship training programmes had been instituted, and the first class of the College of the Virgin Islands had graduated in 1965. Public health programmes had continued to expand and hospital facilities had improved. A new youth care centre and a day care centre for pre-school children had been opened and federal funds had been used to institute, inter alia, a neighbourhood youth programme, an unskilled workers' training programme and a pre-school training programme (Operation Headstart). Housing under construction included low-income as well as middle-income rental units. With the help of funds provided by federally supported programmes, more than 1,000 housing units per year would be built to replace sub-standard housing.

19. The budget of the Government of the Virgin Islands for 1966 was more than $42 million, an increase of more than $6 million, most of which would be spent mainly on education, public works, health and public safety. Revenues for 1966 consisted of $29.5 million from local sources, $500,000 from the federal Medicare programme and federal matching funds of $11,750,000, of which $5 million was to be spent on educational improvements.

20. A Constitutional Convention had been convened in November 1964, at the request of the Virgin Islands Legislature, to review the Revised Organic Act of 1954 by which the Territory was governed. Those attending the Convention had included twenty-two delegates elected in November 1964 and the eleven members of the Legislature. Recommendations in the form of a proposed Second Revised Organic Act of the Virgin Islands had been transmitted to the President of the United States and to the United States Congress in July 1965. The Constitutional Convention had not recommended any drastic changes in the relationship of the Virgin Islands to the Federal Government, but it had suggested amendments to the Organic Act to give the people of the Territory greater control over local, political and fiscal affairs. The most significant recommendations provided for a popularly elected Governor and Lieutenant-Governor, responsible only to the electorate and removable only by impeachment, and for the revocation of the power of the President of the United States to veto local legislation. Draft legislation to give effect to the recommendations had been passed by the House of Representatives and was currently being considered by the Senate. The Constitutional Convention had also recommended re-apportionment of the Virgin Islands Legislature to provide for the election of senators on the basis of equal representation, and legislation giving effect to the recommendation had already been passed by both houses of Congress. Other recommendations were being carefully considered by the United States Government. Some of them would require amendments to the Federal Constitution, such as a proposal to eliminate the power of Congress to annul acts of the Virgin Islands Legislature (a power which had in fact never been exercised since the Revised Organic Act of 1954 had taken effect) and proposals to provide a Virgin Islands representative in the United States House of Representatives and to permit Virgin Islanders to vote in United States national elections. The progress already made clearly showed the strong interest of the United States Government in ensuring self-determination for the people of the Virgin Islands.

21. The representative of Bulgaria said that very little information on the general political development of the United States Virgin Islands had been provided by the administering Power in the two years since the Territory had last been discussed in the Sub-Committee and the Special Committee. The Sub-Committee had not heard any petitioners, nor had it received any information on the Territory other than that provided by the administering Power. It should draw the attention of the Special Committee and the General Assembly to that abnormal situation, and every effort should be made to obtain further information from other sources, such as the international Press.

22. The provisions of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) had still not been applied to the United States Virgin Islands. The Constitutional Convention of 1964, which had proposed certain changes aimed at giving the population greater control over local affairs, had in no way changed the basic relationship between the Territory and the administering Power. Although the United States had tried to present the Convention as a means of implementing resolution 1514 (XV), it had in fact been given a narrow mandate which excluded any possibility of discussing the question of independence. It had been convened under Act No. 2082 of the Virgin Islands Legislature, which had been approved by the Governor in April 1964. Section 2 of that Act stated that the Convention could prepare and agree to amendments to the Revised Organic Act so as to give the people greater control of their own affairs. Clearly, the Act had not only precluded discussion of independence or another solution such as federation, but had actually pointed the way towards integration with the United States. It was significant that the first preambular paragraph of the Act referred to the examples of Alaska, Hawaii and Puerto Rico.

23. The United States representative had stated that some of the Convention's proposals were being studied by the United States Government, while others would require amendments to the Federal Constitution: in other words, action on all the main proposals had been deferred. Recent developments in the Territory had revealed a failure to carry out the Special Committee's recommendation that the provisions of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples should be fully applied to the Virgin Islands of the United States. That recommendation, together with the other conclusions and recommendations adopted by the Special Committee in 1964, was still valid and should be reaffirmed by the Sub-Committee.

24. The representative of the United States of America said that the members of the Constitutional Convention had been elected on the broadest possible basis, and it had been under no obligation to uphold the Territory's relationship with the administering Power. Far-reaching recommendations for local self-government had been made, but the Convention had been opposed to independence from the United States. That seemed to him a clear indication of the population's present views. However, the proposals did not preclude further constitutional advance for the Territory.

25. The Convention had not been precluded from making any recommendations on the Territory's relationship with the administering Power. The Act providing for the Convention had been passed by the Virgin Islands Legislature itself, and there had been no external pressure. The results of the Convention were a significant step in the Territory's constitutional development and a clear expression of the population's wishes for its future.

26. The representative of Iran agreed that it would be useful for the Sub-Committee to have additional information from sources other than the administering Power. If the information provided by the administering Power were insufficient, the Sub-Committee could perhaps recommend that the Special Committee repeat its suggestion for a visiting mission to the Territory.

27. The representative of Bulgaria pointed out that, under the Revised Organic Act of 31 December 1960, the Act which made provision for the Constitutional Convention had been, like all other Bills of the Virgin Islands Legislature, subject to the sanction and approval of the Governor appointed by the United States authorities, and was therefore, in effect, a United States Act. It might well be that the stipulations contained in the Act concerning the matters to be discussed by the Convention had been influenced by that fact. The effect of those stipulations was to allow decisions to be made on local administration only, without reference to the possibility of changing the dependent status of the Territory.

28. The representative of Madagascar said that economic and social conditions in the Territory were obviously satisfactory; there was a considerable degree of industrialization and per capita income was high. The recruitment of so many foreign non-agricultural workers, however, was a potential source of tension and he wondered why it was necessary. He agreed with previous speakers about the inadequacy of the information available to the Committee.

29. The representative of Iran asked the United States representative how many political parties had participated in the election of delegates to the Constitutional Convention and what the platforms of the various individuals had been. Had any proposals been made advocating independence for the Territory or some form of association or federation with other Territories in the region? What steps had the administering Power taken to inform the people of their rights under General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) and 1541 (XV)? And could a United States citizen be elected Governor of the Territory under the proposed legislation?

30. The representative of the Ivory Coast asked whether it would be possible to produce a list of complaints that might have been made by parties in the Territory. It was important for the Sub-Committee to know the political climate in the Territory and the aspirations of the people in order to gain a clearer picture of the situation.

31. The representative of Uruguay said that the position of the Bulgarian representative and that of the representative of Iran were complementary. The Bulgarian representative had pointed out that all the information available to the Sub-Committee had come from the administering Power. The representative of Iran had expressed the view that it would be useful to have information from sources other than the administering Power. The information from the administering Power had not been challenged or questioned. If members thought it necessary to secure information from other sources in order to take an objective decision, it might be a good idea to postpone the debate on the United States Virgin Islands until such information had been made available.

32. The representative of the United States of America said that, although the Act providing for the Convention had been sanctioned and approved by the Governor, that did not alter the fact that it had been enacted by the legal representatives of the people of the Territory, the Governor's approval being merely a normal part of the legislative process.

33. In reply to the representative of Madagascar, he explained that the reason why so many foreigners were recruited for non-agricultural work in the Territory was that at the height of the tourist season the supply of local labour was inadequate to meet the demand.

34. The representative of Bulgaria said the requirement that the Governor should approve all bills passed by the Virgin Islands Legislature was no mere formality; under the Revised Organic Act of 31 December 1960 the Executive Power of the Virgin Islands was "vested in an executive officer whose official title shall be the Governor of the Virgin Islands" and was to be exercised under the supervision of the United States Government. Moreover, the Governor held office "at the pleasure of the President" and might "veto any legislation as provided in this Act". The final approval of legislation was, therefore, in the hands of the administering Power.

35. The representative of Uruguay said that, when the Act convening the Constitutional Convention had been adopted, the United States, through the Executive's veto power, had clearly possessed a means of bringing pressure to bear on the Legislature of the Virgin Islands. His delegation feared that the people's right to express their views freely on their future status might be limited. He asked the United States representative whether, if free elections in the Territory revealed an overwhelming desire for unconditional independence, that decision would require an Act of the United States Congress to make it effective.

36. The representative of Bulgaria observed that the delegates to the Convention had proposed, not only that the Governor should be an elected official, but that his power to veto local legislation should be abolished. That was an indication that the population of the Territory objected to existing restrictions on its Legislature's freedom of action.

37. The representative of the United States of America said that his delegation hoped that the proposals for changing the Governor's status would be approved by the United States Congress in the near future. They had already been passed by the House of Representatives and were awaiting Senate approval.

38. The representative of Uruguay said that his delegation was gratified to know that one of the Territory's essential requirements for self-government was on the way to fulfilment. He hoped that the United States representative would include in the additional information he was to supply to the Sub-Committee an indication of when Senate approval for the measure in question might be expected.

39. The representative of Italy said that his delegation had found the questions put to the representative of the administering Power at the previous meeting by the representatives of Iran, Uruguay and Madagascar particularly useful as an indication of the kind of information the Sub-Committee needed for its work. The existing constitutional status of the Territory gave grounds for concern and it was to be hoped that the proposals made by the constitutional convention of 1965 concerning the election of the Governor would shortly be passed by the United States Congress. The abolition of the Governor's veto power would be a particularly important advance.

40. The interest shown by members of the Sub-Committee in current political developments in the United States Virgin Islands was an indication that they realized that their main task lay not in discussing the past history of colonial territories but in endeavouring to provide a better future for them. The Sub-Committee should accordingly encourage the administering Power to continue its current line of action, which was bound to culminate in self-determination for the people of the Territory.

41. The representative of Venezuela said that, although there was little information on the Territory, his delegation appreciated the efforts of the United States representative to fill in the gaps and to present a report on general developments.

42. He reviewed the most important proposals put forward by the 1964 Constitutional Convention and expressed the hope that they would be carried out by the administering Power without undue delay, thus fulfilling the freely expressed aspirations of the islanders. The Sub-Committee should be informed concerning the various stages in the process of implementation.

43. The data made available to the Sub-Committee indicated that the people of the United States Virgin Islands were enjoying the benefits of an expanding economy; per capita income amounted to $2,000. He was confident that the Territory's economic health, together with the increased participation of the islanders in political life, would rapidly prepare them to make a sound choice of their future political status.

44. The representative of the United States of America expressed his delegation's full agreement with the premise that the process of self-determination required that the population of a Territory should be informed regarding the options available to it in deciding its future political status and should be enabled to express its choice freely through reliable channels. Under the 1954 Revised Organic Act, the Legislature of the United States Virgin Islands had full powers to deal with all subjects of local application not inconsistent with the Act itself or with United States laws applicable to the Territory. It was precluded from enacting any law which might impair United States treaty rights and from taxing the property of non-residents at a higher rate than the property of residents of the Islands. It enjoyed full autonomy with regard to the raising, control and disposition of funds, with the sole exception of taxes collected in the United States on rum imported from the Islands, and although the United States Government had never exercised its right in that respect the 1964 Constitutional Convention had proposed that it should formally waive it. The Organic Act, which was the present "Constitution" of the Virgin Islands, had been legislated by the United States Congress after full consultation of the population, including hearings and a referendum. The fact that proposals to amend the Act were subject to approval by the United States Congress merely indicated that the political evolution of the Territory towards self-determination was to be worked out between the islanders and the Federal Government, as had been the case in other former colonial territories, with the notable exception of the illegal Smith régime in Southern Rhodesia. The report of the Constitutional Convention was actually a complete redraft of the Organic Act; it called for a significant increase in internal self-government.

45. It had been suggested in the Sub-Committee that the Governor of the Islands, as an appointed official of the United States Government and by virtue of his power to veto legislation, served as an instrument of the Federal Government to inhibit genuine local initiatives. The experience of the islanders, however, and the report of the Governor himself appeared to refute that suggestion. The Governor, who had been born and brought up in the Islands, gave priority to the paramount interests of the inhabitants in the exercise of his powers. He had described the Constitutional Convention's proposals for increased local autonomy as a sensible and practical document which should serve as the basic law of the Territory and had urged the United States Congress to approve it as a means of granting measures of home rule to the Islands. He had taken the lead in recommending that the Convention's proposal for a popularly elected Governor should be approved by the Federal Government, and indeed that recommendation had the full support of the United States. Any United States citizen—and the Virgin Islanders were all United States citizens—with five years' residence in the Territory would be eligible to stand as candidate for Governor.

46. The Constitutional Convention which had produced the proposals for drastic changes in the Territory's political and constitutional structure had been the result of an initiative freely taken by the Legislature, and the elected representatives had themselves established the scope of the Convention's debates. The enabling legislation had not precluded discussion of changes in the relationship between the Islands and the United States and the resolution adopted by the Convention on political status showed that the Convention had not regarded that problem as beyond its competence. On the other hand, it had focused its attention on political steps which would strengthen its constitutional development towards self-determination rather than on drastic changes in that relationship. It had sought to perfect the Legislature as a channel through which to express the people's final views concerning their future status, but it had in no way forfeited the opportunity to suggest changes in that status.

47. The Constitutional Convention had consisted of thirty-three members, twenty-two elected from the population at large and eleven were the legislators. Any islander who obtained twenty-five signatures of registered voters had been eligible for nomination. Three political parties had campaigned actively in the elections. The Democratic Party had elected sixteen members, the Republican Party had elected one at-large member and the Virgin Islands Party had elected one at-large member, and two members from St. Croix. Two members had been elected on an independent basis without party affiliation. Of the legislators elected, six represented the "mortar and pestle" faction of the Democratic Party, while five represented the opposing "donkey" faction. Independence from the United States had not been an important campaign issue because there appeared to be little or no agitation in that direction. There was no reason, however, why independence could not become an issue at any time; the islanders were entirely free to campaign for it, particularly since they had been made fully aware of the options suggested in General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) and 1541 (XV). Though direct and frequent communication with residents of the other Caribbean islands and with thousands of tourists, they were in an excellent position to develop political sophistication.

48. The importation of migrant labour was necessary to meet employment demands during the peak tourist season. Under United States law, however, employers of migrant labour had to justify their requests by proving to the local authorities that suitable workers were not available in the Islands themselves.

49. Important political steps were being taken by the Virgin Islands to accelerate their evolution towards self-determination. Specific evidence of that steady progress was to be found in the announcement on 31 August 1966 that the President of the United States had signed into law a bill for the reappointment of the Legislature with a view to rendering it more representative. That proposal had been one of the major recommendations of the Constitutional Convention.

50. The representative of Venezuela asked what further measures had been taken by the United States Government to give effect to the proposals of the Constitutional Convention.

51. The representative of the United States of America replied that the Executive Branch of the United States Government had submitted to the Congress draft bills providing for a popularly elected Governor and Lieutenant Governor for the Islands and for the elimination of the President's power to veto local legislation. The House of Representatives had already passed those bills; they were now being considered by the Senate. The Congress also had before it legislation which would liberalize the authority of the Virgin Islands Legislature to raise funds by means of a bond issue. The proposals to provide a Virgin Islands representative in the United States House of Representatives, to allow the Virgin Islanders to vote in United States elections and to eliminate the unused power of the United States Congress to veto decisions of the Virgin Islands Legislature were still pending. They would require amendment of the United States Constitution.

52. The representative of Bulgaria asked how the national income of the Virgin Islands was distributed among the professional, employee, worker, farmer and business groups of the population. He also wished to know whether the ownership of property was open to all on an equal basis, who owned the various tourist organizations and the degree of participation in ownership and management of United States personnel and indigenous Virgin Islanders respectively. Finally, he would welcome information concerning the number of indigenous inhabitants enrolled in primary and secondary schools and in institutions of higher education.

53. The representative of the United States of America said that he would try to obtain the detailed information sought by members of the Sub-Committee; he did not know, however, whether such information as statistics of income distribution by occupation was available. The figure of per capita income in the United States Virgin Islands had been intended to indicate the general income level of the Territory and his delegation realized that it did not give a complete picture of income levels within different classes of occupation. On the subject of public funds spent on education, housing and other social fields, his delegation considered that the statistics given in his introductory statement on the Territory were convincing proof that an impressive part of the wealth generated in the Islands was being used by the Government for the broad benefit of the islanders.

54. The representative of Iran said that the political developments in the Territory were even more important than the significant economic, social and educational progress that had been made. The changes proposed by the Constitutional Convention would, if accepted in their entirety by the United States Government, give the islanders a greater measure of self-government; the procedures used in the election of delegates to that Convention were not, however, altogether satisfactory. It was not clear whether the people had been informed of the various forms of political status open to them such as integration, free association, federation and independence. Even in the case of Barbados, which had decided to become independent, the possibility of federation had been discussed at some length in the Sub-Committee. The Sub-Committee was also aware that, in the case of the British Virgin Islands, there had once been a desire to join with the United States Virgin Islands. Moreover, the General Assembly, by endorsing the Special Committee's conclusions of 1964, had drawn attention to this matter when it had stated that the people of the small Caribbean Territories might wish to avail themselves of one of the forms mentioned in General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV) in pursuit of the aims of resolution 1514 (XV). There would have been no such doubt if the administering Power had permitted some degree of international supervision of the procedure for ascertaining the wishes of the people, as the New Zealand authorities had done in the case of the elections in the Cook Islands. It was to be hoped that the administering Power would bear those considerations in mind in the future and provide an opportunity for the people of the Territory to obtain the constitutional status most suitable for their needs.

55. The representative of the Ivory Coast said that his delegation was surprised at the vehemence of the resolution on the status of the Territory adopted by the Convention (see para. 15 of chap. XXII) and wondered why the delegates had considered it necessary to be so emphatic. It might be helpful to the Sub-Committee to hear the views of the administering Power on the prospect of independence for the Territory.

56. The representative of the United States of America said that his Government believed in the right of the Virgin Islands to independence or any other solution the islanders might wish. Indeed, the purpose of the changes in the existing form of government was to provide the population with the fullest possible opportunity of expressing its wishes in that respect. His delegation was convinced that, at the time of the election of delegates to the Convention, the people of the Territory had been well aware of all the alternative forms of constitutional status which might be chosen.

57. The representative of Bulgaria said that the policy of the administering Power barred the possibility of any other choice than the integration of the Territory with the United States. His delegation still believed that the administering Power's potential veto on legislation had had the effect of limiting the subjects to be discussed at the Convention.

58. The representative of Uruguay observed that the principle of decolonization implied consideration of the concept of self-determination, which in the case of small Territories could be any of the forms defined in General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV). In the Sub-Committee's study of such Territories, requests for detailed information on such matters as the distribution of income were therefore justified in so far as they were intended to establish the Territory's economic viability, but not if they were intended to determine the political form which the future nation was likely to adopt. It was sufficient for the purposes of the Sub-Committee to establish whether the existing political, economic and social system provided the people with a reasonable standard of living and adequate means of political expression. The arrangements described by the United States representative for the election of delegates to the Constitutional Convention appeared to his delegation to have been such as to insure a genuinely representative assembly and the form of autonomy described in the resolution passed by the Convention seemed to be what the Virgin Islanders genuinely desired; however hybrid members of the Sub-Committee might consider it, it was not inconsistent with the principles laid down in resolution 1541 (XV) which the Sub-Committee had a duty to interpret in conjunction with resolution 1514 (XV) in the case of Territories to which both resolutions were applicable.

59. The representative of Bulgaria said that the basic document in matters of decolonization was General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and his delegation had always been opposed to any attempt to accord the same importance to resolution 1541 (XV), which had a limited objective. The right of peoples to self-determination and independence was sacred and a territory which was not independent could not enjoy the full exercise of its rights in accordance with resolution 1514 (XV).

60. The question of the distribution of wealth in the Territory was an important one, because per capita income figures might be insufficient to give a general idea of earnings in Territories with small populations. He pointed out that under Article 73 of the Charter administering Powers had the obligation to provide information on economic and social advancement in Territories under their administration, and members had the right, and even the duty, to elicit as much information as possible.

61. The representative of Iran held that the Sub-Committee's work must be based on General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and that the right of peoples to self-determination and independence was inalienable. The Sub-Committee had two principal tasks: to ensure that peoples regained their sovereignty and to verify, if possible by some impartial international presence, that genuine sovereignty had indeed been regained. Once that had been done, small Territories with small populations, where economic and geographic conditions might warrant a status such as federation or association, should be free to choose the future best suited to them. General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV) provided a guide for such forms of status and the Sub-Committee had itself stated in 1964 (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. XXV, annex, para. 102) that it might be desirable for the peoples of a number of Caribbean Territories to bear in mind the forms mentioned in resolution 1541 (XV) in their achievement of the objectives of resolution 1514 (XV).

62. The representative of Italy said that the further information provided by the United States representative strengthened his delegation's view that important political developments were taking place in the United States Virgin Islands and that the Sub-Committee should encourage the administering Power to continue its current line of action.

B. Adoption of the report

Voting

63. The Sub-Committee considered its conclusions and recommendations on the Territory (see para. 74 below) at its 55th and 57th meetings on 15 and 16 September 1966.

64. Sub-paragraphs (1) to (5) and (8) of the conclusions and recommendations were adopted by consensus, while sub-paragraphs (6) and (7) were adopted by voting, as follows:

(a) In sub-paragraph (6), the words "without precluding the possibilities contained in General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV)" were voted on separately at the request of the repre-representative of Bulgaria. The Sub-Committee adopted these words by 6 votes to 1.

(b) In sub-paragraph (7), the two sentences were voted upon separately by roll-call at the request of the representative of Bulgaria. The Sub-Committee adopted the first sentence by a roll-call vote of 7 to none, as follows:

In favour: Bulgaria, Iran, Italy, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Uruguay, Venezuela.

Against: None.

(c) The Sub-Committee adopted the second sentence by a roll-call vote of 6 to 1, as follows:

In favour: Iran, Italy, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Uruguay, Venezuela.

Against: Bulgaria

(d) The Sub-Committee adopted sub-paragraph (7), as a whole, by 6 votes to 1.

65. The Sub-Committee adopted its conclusions and recommendations, as a whole, by 6 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

Statements by members on sub-paragraph (6)

66. The representative of Bulgaria stated that he was firmly opposed to the inclusion of any reference to General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV). This resolution related only to the transmission of information by the administering Power. The task of the Special Committee was quite different, since it involved helping peoples to exercise their right to self-determination and independence in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). These two resolutions were in no sense complementary and they had never been interpreted in conjunction with one another. Resolution 1514 (XV) provided full guarantees that the people could choose their future in freedom.

67. The representative of Italy said that it was not quite accurate to say that the two resolutions in question had never been linked. He would draw the Sub-Committee's attention to the 1964 report of the Special Committee (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. XXV, para. 310) in which the latter pointed out, in the general conclusions concerning the United States Virgin Islands, that "in a world characterized by the integrationist movement, it might be desirable for the peoples of these [i.e., small] Territories to bear in mind the forms mentioned in resolution 1541 (XV) in their achievement of the objectives of resolution 1514 (XV)". The problem of the small Territories had begun to arise two years before, and a certain procedure for dealing with them had grown up and could not now be abandoned, even supposing that it had not been the General Assembly's intention, in adopting resolution 1541, to regard that text as one which interpreted resolution 1514.

68. The representative of Uruguay said that it was of great importance that General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV) should be mentioned in sub-paragraph 6 as well as resolution 1514 (XV). Even if those two texts were seemingly contradictory, it would be necessary to make every effort to give them as harmonious an interpretation as possible. The fact was, however, that the two resolutions were quite reconcilable—which was not at all surprising since they had been adopted by the Assembly in the space of two days. Resolution 1514 (XV) stated general principles, while in resolution 1541 (XV) an effort had been made to take into account the special case of the small Territories and to describe the ways in which such Territories could become associated with other countries without any detriment to the principle of independence. He recalled that, in practice, in the case of other small Territories, the idea of federation, far from being opposed, had been advocated and that the administering Power concerned had even been asked to encourage the creation of a federation. That being said, the Uruguayan delegation had no intention of telling the peoples concerned what road they should follow. Its observations belonged exclusively to the realm of principle.

69. The representative of Madagascar thought that a reference to resolution 1541 (XV) might restrict the choices open to the inhabitants of the United States Virgin Islands and that the alternative enumerated in it were already provided for in resolution 1514 (XV). However, in a spirit of compromise, he was willing to support the proposal that had been made to the Sub-Committee.

Statements by members on sub-paragraph (7)

70. The representative of Bulgaria said that while the idea of a United Nations presence during the exercise of the right of self-determination, as mentioned in the second sentence of sub-paragraph (7), was acceptable in principle, the present situation in the Territory was such that the inhabitants were not in a position to decide their future political status in complete freedom. Ever since the United States had assumed power in the Virgin Islands, the economic, political and military organization of the Territory had been planned with a view to association with the administering Power or annexation. In those circumstances there was every reason to fear that United Nations participation in the holding of a plebiscite might commit it to giving its sanction to a ready-made solution prepared by the administering Power. Only when the report of a visiting mission was available would it be possible to determine whether fresh measures were required in accordance with the relevant decisions of the United Nations.

71. The representative of Iran said that the Special Committee must bear in mind that its task was to bring about speedy implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) with respect to all colonies, including small Territories. The small Territories, however, because of their peculiar circumstances, such as the smallness of their size and population and the nature of their economies, were most vulnerable to outside pressure, in particular, that applied by the administering Power. Under those circumstances, a United Nations presence was indispensable to ensure that the people of the Territory concerned were enabled to exercise their right of self-determination in freedom and without restrictions. A United Nations presence would be the only possible course of action to ascertain whether or not the people's decision corresponded with their freely expressed wishes.

72. He could not agree that in the case of the United States Virgin Islands, a United Nations presence would serve merely as a rubber stamp device. He had greater confidence in the integrity of the members. Nor could he agree that the people were so dependent on the United States that they would, under any circumstances, vote in exactly the same manner as desired by the United States. While the United Nations was not in a position to influence people's subconscious behaviour or motivation, what it could do and must do, however, was to provide the necessary conditions conducive to an atmosphere under which the people would be enabled to decide on their future status in freedom and without restrictions. This could be done only if an impartial, international body was in a position to supervise and guarantee that the referendum or the exercise of the right of self-determination was carried out in full freedom and without any restrictions. This proposal was not new since the Special Committee had already decided on the need for a United Nations presence in other Territories, such as Aden and South West Africa.

73. The representative of Uruguay said that the remarks of the Bulgarian representative were tinged with pessimism. They seemed to question the authority of the United Nations and to imply that the material, economic and political power of the United States would outweigh the legal prestige and authority of the United Nations. He reaffirmed his faith in the United Nations and would continue to fight for the application of United Nations procedures. Explaining his vote on sub-paragraph (7), the representative of Uruguay said that if the suggestion of the representative of Bulgaria to delete the second sentence had had the unanimous support of the Sub-Committee, he would have preferred that solution; however, since that had not been the case, he had been obliged to vote on the two parts of the sub-paragraph in question in the manner he had.

C. Conclusions and recommendations

74. The Sub-Committee recommends to the Special Committee that it adopt the following conclusions and recommendations:

(1) The Special Committee recalls its conclusions and recommendations concerning the Territory which it adopted in 1964 and which were endorsed by the General Assembly at its twentieth session.

(2) It reaffirms that the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples applies fully to the Territory.

(3) It notes the information provided by the administering Power concerning the Constitutional Convention which met between December 1964 and February 1965 and which proposed a new Organic Act for the Territory providing for a greater degree of autonomy.

(4) It also notes that, so far, the administering Power has taken final action on only one of the proposals made by the Convention and that the proposal for an elected Governor has not yet been passed into law.

(5) It regrets that despite some measure of advancement in the political field the administering Power has not yet implemented the Declaration with respect to the Territory and urges it to do so without delay.

(6) It reaffirms the right of the people to exercise their right of self-determination in complete freedom and reiterates its previous recommendation inviting the administering Power to ensure that the people of the Territory be enabled, in complete freedom and without any restrictions, to express their wishes concerning the future political status of the Territory. It also invites the administering Power to ensure that the people of the Territory are fully aware of the various alternatives open to them, without precluding the possibilities contained in General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV), in their achievement of the objectives of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

(7) It reiterates its belief that the United Nations must be assured that the exercise of the right of self-determination is undertaken in complete freedom and in full knowledge of the available choices. It therefore considers that a United Nations presence during the procedures for the exercise of the right of self-determination is indispensable.

(8) The Special Committee regrets that the administering Power has not agreed to a visiting mission from the Special Committee to the Territory and affirms that a visit to this Territory is both useful and necessary. Accordingly, it invites the co-operation of the administering Power to enable the United Nations to send a visiting mission to the Territory, in order to obtain first-hand information concerning the Territory and to ascertain the views of the people and the extent to which they are aware of the options open to them, with regard to their future political status.

III. BRITISH VIRGIN ISLANDS, BARBADOS, ANTIGUA, DOMINICA, GRENADA, MONTSEERRAT, ST. KITTS-NEVIS-ANGUILLA, ST. LUCIA AND ST. VINCENT

A. Consideration by the Sub-Committee

Introduction

75. The Sub-Committee considered these Territories at the meetings indicated below:

Territory	Meetings
Barbados	46th-49th, 59th
Montserrat and the British Virgin Islands	48th, 51st, 52nd, 57th-59th
Antigua, Dominica, Grenada, St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla, St. Lucia and St. Vincent	53rd, 59th

76. The Sub-Committee had before it working papers prepared by the Secretariat (see paras. 32-193 of chapter XXII). Members of the Sub-Committee also heard the statement by the petitioner from Grenada, Mr. Gairy, Leader of the Opposition, made at the 463rd meeting of the Special Committee on 7 September 1966.

77. In accordance with the procedure agreed upon by the Special Committee, the representative of the United Kingdom, as administering Power, participated in the work of the Sub-Committee on these Territories, at the invitation of the Chairman.

General statements

(a) Barbados

78. The representative of the United Kingdom said that Barbados was the largest and most populous of the eight Caribbean island Territories which had been dealt with together by the Sub-Committee in 1964. At that time, the United Kingdom representative had given a full description of the historical, economic and political background to the situation in Barbados and of the efforts then in progress to see whether a basis for agreement could be found on a new federation between the eight Territories—Barbados and the Windward and Leeward Islands. It had been and still was the view of his Government that closer association between those Territories offered the best future prospect for the area. The matter was, however, one which had to be decided by the Territories themselves and it had become clear, after long and intricate negotiations, that no basis for agreement on a federation or other form of association could for the time being be found. In August 1965 the Barbados Government had issued a White Paper announcing that, in those circumstances, it intended to seek separate independence.

79. The developments which had led to the holding of the recent Constitutional Conference in London were described in a Secretariat working paper (see paras. 158-167 of chap. XXII). The most important decision of that Conference was contained in the Colonial Secretary's statement on 1 July 1966 announcing the agreement of the United Kingdom Government that Barbados should become independent on 30 November 1966.

80. The Barbados delegation to the Conference had included representatives of the government party—the Democratic Labour Party—and of the two opposition parties represented in the Legislature. All three parties were agreed that Barbados should secure separate independence and should become a full member of the Commonwealth.

81. The Conference had been faced with the unusual task of constructing a written independence constitution for a Territory which, in its long history of democratic government, with a legislature dating back to 1627, had developed a Constitution largely based on convention, like that of the parent country. It was therefore inevitable that there should have been differences of opinion between the Barbados political parties about the inclusion or omission of individual provisions, on some of which it had proved impossible to achieve unanimity. The new Constitution, however, followed very closely the draft submitted by the Barbados Government and was similar to those of other former United Kingdom Territories which had become independent.

82. The Constitution would include provisions governing citizenship, fundamental human rights, the appointment and functions of a Governor-General to represent the Queen, who would be the Head of State, Parliament, the Executive, the judicature, the Public Service and the service commissions, and finance. Many of the basic provisions, including those relating to the alteration of the Constitution itself, would be entrenched—in other words, special procedures would be laid down for their amendment. The main points on which the opposition parties had recorded their disagreement were the composition of the Senate (the non-elected Upper House), the non-entrenchment of the provisions governing the qualifications and disqualifications for membership of the House of Assembly (the fully elective Lower House) and the absence of any provision for constituency arrangements and elections and boundary commissions.

83. A matter of special interest in relation to the agreed date of independence was that, under the terms of the Constitution, the life of a Legislature would continue to be limited to five years and writs for a new election would be returnable within ninety days. The dissolution of the existing Legislature, which dated from 19 December 1961, would therefore be due not later than 19 December 1966.

84. Barbados would thus become, after Jamaica and Trinidad, the third of the ten islands which had earlier formed The Federation of the West Indies to achieve separate independence. The Government of the Territory did not, however, intend that independence should prevent association with the remaining islands of the Federation in the future. It had, in fact, already entered into a free trade area with Guyana and Antigua.

85. Despite its small size and population, Barbados had a comparatively thriving economy and was proud of never having had to rely on external support of its budget. Its people had made a valuable contribution to the development of the many countries in which they had settled, while retaining a justifiable pride in their homeland. The Sub-Committee would undoubtedly wish to associate itself with his delegation's good wishes to Barbados for its future as a full member of the international community.

86. The representative of Uruguay said that although his delegation believed that the best future prospects for the Caribbean Territories lay in some form of federation or association, the failure of the prolonged negotiations between Barbados and the Windward and Leeward Islands to produce a basis for agreement indicated that hopes of establishing such a federation would have to be abandoned, at least for the time being. The decision of the Barbados Government to seek separate independence had the support of the opposition parties in the Legislature and, in any event, the independence Constitution contained provisions for constitutional amendments to permit Barbados to enter into an association with other members of the Commonwealth at some future date, if it so desired. His delegation believed, however, that those provisions should have been made subject to a two-thirds majority vote, rather than to a simple majority.

87. One of the things the members of the Special Committee had learned from their work was that the accession to independence of a Territory was no longer a purely political issue; a Territory's prospects of achieving economic self-sufficiency within a reasonable period after independence were at least as important as its desire for liberty, since every newly independent nation had to be in a position to resist both the political and the economic pressures of stronger Powers. Barbados was clearly in a satisfactory position in that respect: its economy was soundly based and the Sub-Committee should have no hesitation in approving its elected representatives' decision to seek separate independence.

88. The representative of Venezuela remarked that Venezuela, as a close neighbour of Barbados, was particularly gratified that the island was shortly to become independent. He was confident that Barbados would continue, after independence, to consolidate its democratic institutions. The achievement of independence by yet another Caribbean island was a further step towards the complete elimination of colonialism from the Western Hemisphere.

89. The wide measure of political agreement among the people of the Territory offered the best possible prospect for its future political, economic and social progress and he was certain that those responsible for its future destinies would do their utmost to smooth out such differences as existed.

90. His delegation congratulated the Government and people of Barbados on their achievement and the United Kingdom on its contribution towards such a historic event.

91. The representative of Italy said that his delegation was gratified at recent developments in Barbados and at the administering Power's agreement to grant it independence. He shared the view that independence in association with neighbouring Territories might have offered better prospects for the area as a whole and hoped that what has proved not to be possible now will become a reality in the future. In this connexion he noted that the requirement of a two-thirds majority provided by the Constitution for altering some basic provisions does not apply to amendments giving constitutional effect to arrangements under which Barbados is to join with any other country or territory within the Commonwealth.

92. He expressed his delegation's good wishes to the people of Barbados and said he would look forward with interest to the elections which were to be held in the island shortly before or after the date of independence.

93. The representative of Bulgaria said that, as in 1964, the only information available on the Caribbean Territories under United Kingdom administration had come from the administering Power. The Special Committee and the Sub-Committee could not carry out their task successfully unless they could send visiting missions to those Territories.

94. The United Kingdom representative had stated that, in his Government's view, closer association between Barbados and the Windward and Leeward Islands offered the best future prospect for the area. He had then passed on to the question of Barbados alone without explaining why the idea of federation had been abandoned, at least for the time being. The question could not be set aside so easily. According to the information provided by the Secretariat, a series of constitutional conferences had been held for each Territory separately. The Governments of six of the Territories had concluded separate agreements with the administering Power resulting, in most cases, in increased local control of internal affairs while the United Kingdom continued to be responsible for foreign affairs and defence. The United Kingdom had agreed to grant independence to Barbados on 30 November 1966. In 1964, the Special Committee had stated that there appeared to be general agreement on the granting of immediate independence to the Windward and Leeward Islands and Barbados and the formation of a federation. It had also pointed out that the peoples of the British West Indies were of the same ethnic origin and had a common language and culture (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. XXV, paras. 327 and 323). It had been clear in 1964 that the only obstacle to the creation of independent States or an independent federation was the precarious economic situation of the Territories, whose budgets were subsidized by the administering Power. It was the administering Power which was responsible for that economic situation and the Territories could not become genuinely independent States unless the United Kingdom repaid, at least in part, what it had taken out of them during centuries of colonial occupation. As the representative of Trinidad and Tobago had said at the Sub-Committee's 9th meeting, if the only financial assistance to be received was that being considered by the administering Power which was responsible for that economic no solution in sight (ibid., chap. XXV, annex, para. 68). That was why years of negotiations had only resulted in constitutional arrangements which prolonged the dependence of the Territories. The Chief Minister of St. Kitts had perhaps expressed the feelings of other participants in the constitutional conferences when he had said that the agreements concluded had been the best that could be achieved in the circumstances but that they were not entirely satisfactory since the real aim was the formation of a single Caribbean nation.

95. The main conclusions and recommendations which the Special Committee had formulated in 1964 remained valid, in particular that contained in chapter XXV, paragraph 322 of its report (A/5800/Rev.1), namely, that the provisions of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) should be applied in the Territories in accordance with the fully expressed will of the population. In the light of operative paragraphs 2 and 5 of that resolution, he did not think that constitutional conferences were the best way of ascertaining the people's wishes. The popular consultation envisaged in resolution 1514 (XV) was not a mere formality, but was the first sovereign act of a people enjoying its inalienable right of self-determination. It was for the people to appoint representatives to draw up the constitution of a new, independent and sovereign State for the people's approval. In some cases opposition parties had left constitutional conferences convened by the United Kingdom, which had then concluded arrangements with a minority government; in other cases, either the opposition or both the opposition and the Government had been forced to accept conditions imposed by the administering Power. All the new arrangements for the Caribbean Territories had been agreed upon at constitutional conferences.

96. The people of Barbados had lived with the idea of a federation, but the island was to be granted independence as a separate State since it was the only one capable of balancing its budget without help from the administering Power. His delegation would do everything possible to assist the people of the Windward and Leeward Islands, as well as Barbados, to achieve genuine independence. There was considerable division of opinion in Barbados on the question of independence without federation; the opposition party and a large body of public opinion had asked for general elections so that the people could express their views on their future status. Instead of arranging for the election of a representative Assembly to draft a new constitution, the United Kingdom had convened a Constitutional Conference to discuss a draft constitution drawn up without the participation of the opposition, which had nevertheless felt obliged to take part in the Conference. The Chairman of the Conference, who was a representative of the administering Power, had not accepted any of the opposition's proposals concerning important questions such as amendments to the constitution. Thus, the administering Power was imposing on the people of Barbados a constitution drawn up under its influence. In addition, there was every reason to believe that the Government would organize elections after independence, rather than before, with the result that the new Assembly would be bound by constitutional arrangements concluded under the colonial régime. In view of those circumstances, his delegation felt a certain apprehension over the conditions on which the administering Power was preparing to grant independence to Barbados.

97. The representative of Madagascar fully endorsed the detailed and well-documented comments made by the representative of Bulgaria. The decision of the people of Barbados to accede to separate independence was in line with the principles expressed in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), since it appeared that the majority of the people of the Territory were in favour of the new Constitution. As the representative of Bulgaria had rightly pointed out, the Caribbean Territories had a common culture and heritage, and while agreement on federation was not possible at the moment, it was to be hoped that separate independence for Barbados would represent only a transitory stage towards some kind of association. He would, however, welcome further information from the United Kingdom representative regarding the decision by Barbados to seek separate independence and the likelihood that some form of federation or association with the other Caribbean Territories would eventually be possible. He would also welcome information concerning the kind of links that independent Barbados would have with the Commonwealth after it acceded to independence.

98. The Sub-Committee should devote more of its attention to the economic and financial implications of independence. It seemed that, even after independence, Barbados would still remain economically dependent to some extent on the United Kingdom since, unlike the United States Virgin Islands, whose economy was based on light industries, some of which catered to the export trade, the economy of Barbados was dominated by a single crop, accounting for the major portion of its exports. The question of the industrial development of Barbados should therefore be given careful consideration by the Sub-Committee. Furthermore, some kind of economic association among the Territories in question, perhaps an economic and customs union, might well do much to consolidate the political independence of the country.

99. The representative of Iran welcomed the fact that Barbados would accede to independence on 30 November 1966 in accordance with the principles of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). Independence for Barbados would mark another step forward towards the complete elimination of colonialism in the western hemisphere. The United Kingdom representative had pointed out that, despite its small size and population, Barbados had a thriving economy and had therefore never had to rely on external support of its budget. He himself felt, however, that when considering those small Territories which were not economically viable or which were too small to accede to separate independence, the United Nations should act with extreme caution and ensure that the administering Power had done all that was necessary to inform the peoples of the various Territories concerning the types of independent status to which they could accede. Furthermore, the United Nations should ensure that any decision on the future of any Territory should be made by the people of that Territory in accordance with its freely expressed wishes.

100. He himself would have preferred Barbados to join in a federation with the Windward and Leeward Islands. However, the representative of the administering Power had stated that agreement on a federation was not possible for the moment. He would like to know whether the peoples of the Caribbean Territories had been properly consulted on the matter and to what extent they had been informed of the advantages or disadvantages of independence. It was fortunate that in Barbados separate independence had been chosen by representatives of all shades of opinion.

101. He would welcome further information on the apparently vast area of authority which was reserved for the Governor-General. Under the new Constitution, the appointment and dismissal of the Governor-General was within the power and authority of the British Crown. He would like to know the extent to which that relationship derogated from the sovereignty and independence of the people of Barbados.

102. In conclusion, he expressed his best wishes to the Government and people of Barbados for a prosperous and successful future. He was confident that independence would enable them to develop the country to the fullest extent possible.

103. The representative of the United Kingdom, replying to the representative of Bulgaria, said that he would answer many of the points raised concerning the Windward and Leeward Islands when he dealt with those Territories. The representative of Bulgaria had been highly selective in many of his remarks about the statements made by the representative of Trinidad and Tobago at the Sub-Committee's ninth meeting, for he had ignored the United Kingdom representative's comments on the questions raised by the representative of Trinidad, in the United Kingdom's statement of 15 May 1964 in the Sub-Committee.

104. He would repeat what he had said concerning the timing of elections in Barbados, namely, that it was for the duly elected Government of Barbados and not the administering Power to decide on the date of elections. As for the question of separate independence or federation, as the Colonial Secretary had said on 1 July 1966, all parties at the Constitutional Conference were in agreement that, for the time being, association was not feasible and they had therefore concurred in the proposal that Barbados should proceed to separate independence.

105. In reply to questions put by the representatives of Venezuela and Madagascar, he said that a series of consultations on the possibility of a federation had been held between the Governments of the Territories concerned, some of which had been attended by representatives of the United Kingdom Government. In April 1965, when it had still been hoped that federation was possible, the representative of Antigua had announced that his Government would take no further part in the discussions. That announcement had changed the situation and subsequently the Barbados Government had announced that it intended to seek separate independence, a decision which had been endorsed in a resolution by the Barbados legislature.

106. The Territories themselves had come to the conclusion that a basis for agreement between them on some form of federation or association could not be found. That view had been accepted with reluctance by his Government, without prejudice to the possible formation of a new federation at a later date. He added that the question of an eventual federation between Barbados and the Windward and Leeward Islands was far from being closed but any decision on it would have to be made by the Government and the peoples of the Territories concerned. Both the Government and the opposition party in Barbados had made it quite clear that separate independence would be without prejudice to the possibility of federation with the Windward and Leeward Islands in the future.

107. The Barbados delegations to the Constitutional Conference had unanimously expressed the wish that, on gaining independence, Barbados should become a member of the Commonwealth. The United Kingdom Government had promised to convey their application to the other members of the Commonwealth, who would no doubt welcome it.

108. In reply to the representative of Iran, he pointed out that after independence the Governor-General would be appointed by Her Majesty the Queen, acting in her capacity as Queen of Barbados, on the advice of Barbados Ministers. The Governor-General, on behalf of the Queen of Barbados, would act on the advice of Barbados Ministers, except in the exercise of his discretionary powers such as the dissolution of the House of Assembly and the appointment of the Prime Minister. These constitutional provisions were quite standard in independent countries in which the Queen was Head of State.

109. The representative of Bulgaria denied that his remarks had been selective. It had been agreed that it was for the Government of Barbados to decide whether elections should be held before or after independence. If they were held before independence, it could be assumed that the people would have an opportunity to express their views on the draft constitution. If they were held after independence, the new Assembly would be bound by arrangements already agreed upon, and there was every reason to believe that that was what would happen.

110. The representative of Uruguay said that the essential duty of the Special Committee and its Sub-Committees was to facilitate and safeguard the accession to independence of all colonial Territories. Independence, however, should not be achieved at the cost of abandoning the constituent elements of genuine freedom. The Sub-Committee should ensure that the independence granted to a country was genuine, and not purely formal. With regard to the statement made by the representative of Bulgaria, he would not be able to accept the idea of separate independence of Barbados unless he was sure that it was to be a first step towards the achievement of all the objectives outlined in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). He still believed that the best future prospects for the Caribbean Territories lay in some form of federation or association, even if that took the form of some kind of economic or customs union. Integration was a force to be reckoned with in the modern world and even the countries of Latin America, which had levels of development far higher than many of the colonial Territories awaiting independence, were working towards the economic integration of their continent.

111. He himself could find no reason to oppose the accession to separate independence of Barbados, although the Sub-Committee should at least suggest that some form of federation or association would be the most rational solution to the problems of the Caribbean Territories as a whole. The Sub-Committee should, however, view the facts objectively. Unlike the case of Basutoland, in which various petitioners had presented sometimes conflicting versions of the true situation in their Territory, and had lodged various complaints against the administering Power, no such complaints or petitions had been received from Barbados. Admittedly, the minority opposition party was not fully in agreement with the Barbados Government, but that in itself showed that conditions of genuine democracy prevailed in the island. Since there was nothing to refute the statements made by the administering Power, the duty of the Sub-Committee, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), was to ensure that Barbados acceded to independence without delay. Furthermore, an independent Barbados might well lead the Caribbean Territories into the kind of federation which would seem to be the best solution for the future of those Territories. Nevertheless, he continued to believe, as he had already stated, that the provisions regarding any association with other members of the Commonwealth should have been made subject to a two-thirds majority vote.

112. The representative of Iran said that in questions involving small Territories the United Nations should proceed with the utmost caution. It should ensure that the peoples concerned had exercised their right of self-determination in full freedom and, if possible, under United Nations supervision. If the United Kingdom had accepted the idea which had been expressed in the Sub-Committee and the Special Committee in favour of a visiting mission, members would have been in a better position to see whether the people of the Territory really wanted separate independence or federation. As the representative of Bulgaria had pointed out, all the information on the Territory came from one source, namely, the administering Power. If information from other sources had been made available, members would have been able to gain a much clearer idea of the situation. However, once independence was chosen by the elected representatives of the Territory, it would be difficult to deny such independence, since that was the Special Committee's major objective under General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

113. The representative of Bulgaria associated himself with the remarks made by the representative of Iran. If the administering Power had wished to assist the Sub-Committee in its task, it would have accepted the idea of a visiting mission which had been expressed in various resolutions. It was quite abnormal that the Special Committee and the Sub-Committee, in their consideration of conditions in the Territory, should be obliged to refer only to information supplied by the administering Power. His delegation had therefore felt that the statement made by the representative of Trinidad and Tobago would be useful, particularly since that country was in the same region as Barbados and had been a member of the regional Federation of the West Indies. In addition, the statement of the representative of Trinidad and Tobago represented a source of information other than the administering Power.

114. His delegation could not agree to rejecting the idea of a federation; for several small islands it was the most logical solution. In the light of the new developments in the Territory, his delegation would like to have more information on the matter. His delegation was not seeking to delay the independence of the Territory. It was merely trying to shed some light on an unclear aspect of the question. All documents available to the Sub-Committee showed that the opposition party had expressly called for the holding of a general election so that the people could give their views on the idea of federation. Even in the government party the major trend was towards federation. Furthermore, the results of the vote on the issue had been 14 to 9, which was not even a two-thirds majority. In most constitutions a two-thirds majority vote was necessary even for an amendment. The Sub-Committee could not disregard those facts.

115. The representative of Venezuela said that his delegation shared the concern felt by others regarding the extent of the sovereignty of the Government of Barbados. There were two fundamental aspects of self-determination. According to Professor Rousseau, at the international level, self-determination was distinguished by the processes set out in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). At the domestic level, self-determination was characterized by the right of the people freely to decide their political, economic and social destiny. His delegation thought that Barbados would exercise its right of self-determination at the international level but, if anything derogated from its right to self-determination at the domestic level, that right would not be properly exercised. It was clear from statements made by the representatives of the Territory that they wished to be granted independence as soon as possible. His delegation would always welcome any step aimed at bringing about the elimination of the colonial system in any part of the world.

116. The representative of the Ivory Coast said that a detailed examination of the documents relating to Barbados led to the conclusion that both the administering Power and the Barbadians themselves had striven to reorganize the political, economic and social structure of the Territory in preparation for its independence on 30 November 1966. It was beyond question that the political situation in Barbados had made steady progress towards the achievement of the objectives of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

117. The Ivory Coast was in favour of self-determination of peoples and of the progressive and orderly transfer of all the attributes of sovereignty to the genuine representatives of the countries still under foreign domination. He welcomed the fact that those principles had been respected by the administering Power in the case of Barbados and that the Territory would soon accede to independence. He thought, however, that Barbados was an isolated case in view of its favourable economic situation as compared with that of the other United Kingdom Territories in the region. He hoped that the decolonization process would gather strength and that it would be applied without exception to all the United Kingdom islands in the Caribbean area.

118. His delegation was in favour of the democratization of the legislative and executive bodies of all those Territories so that the people would be able freely to choose their political status and to decide on the type of relations that they wished to maintain with the administering Power. They must also be given the possibility of choosing between self-government and some form of association with other territories of the region, for ties favouring the establishment of a viable State certainly existed between those islands. However, no steps had been taken to achieve that objective.

119. He shared the view of those representatives who thought that an association with neighbouring islands would be in keeping with the freely expressed wishes of the people for political development and would offer the most favourable prospects for the region.

120. In conclusion, his delegation extended its sincere congratulations to the administering Power and to Barbados on the successful outcome of the negotiations which would result in early independence for the Territory.

(b) Montserrat and the British Virgin Islands

121. The representative of the United Kingdom said that Montserrat was the smallest of the British Eastern Caribbean Islands, with an area of 32.5 square miles and a population of some 13,500. A ministerial system of government had been introduced under the 1959 Constitution; there was an Executive Council, consisting of the Administrator, the Chief Minister, two Ministers from among the elected members of the Council, a nominated member and two officials. The Legislative Council was composed of seven elected members, two officials and one nominated member. The two main political parties were the Montserrat Labour Party and the United Workers' Movement.

122. The economy of the Territory was mainly agricultural, with sea island cotton as a main feature. There was also a small sugar-cane crop and a growing tourist industry. United Kingdom Government aid to the Territory in the past two years had amounted to almost $1.6 million.

123. The British Virgin Islands was also a small Territory, with an area of about 59 square miles consisting of some 40 islands, 11 of which were inhabited. The population was approximately 8,500. The Territory, which had been under United Kingdom control since 1672, had had constitutional government with a fully elected House of Assembly and a Legislative Council with a majority of elected members since 1773. The present Constitution provided for an Executive Council and a Legislative Council.

124. The people of the Virgin Islands had made it clear in 1947 that they did not wish to become part of the proposed federation of the Leeward and Windward Islands. Montserrat, on the other hand, had been a member of the Federation throughout its existence and representatives of the Montserrat Government had taken part in discussions, after the dissolution of the Federation in May 1962, on the possibility of forming a new federation between the islands which had belonged to the previous Federation and had not subsequently decided to opt for separate independence. These discussions had reached the turning point in April 1965 when the Chief Minister of Antigua had announced at a meeting of Territorial representatives held to consider the latest position about the possibility of federation that his Government intended to take no further part in such discussions. Under those circumstances, Barbados had also decided to reconsider its position and had ultimately opted for separate independence. It was generally agreed, both in the Territories and by the United Kingdom Government, that some form of association or federation still held out the best hope for the future of the Territories, but that there was no prospect of achieving sufficient agreement on that question for the time being. The United Kingdom Government had accordingly decided to examine the possibility of devising new constitutional arrangements for the individual Territories. It had put forward proposals for the six Territories of Antigua, St. Kitts, Dominica, Grenada, St. Lucia and St. Vincent. Constitutional changes for the much smaller Territory of Montserrat would be discussed with the Montserrat Government at a later date.

125. A general election had been held in Montserrat on 31 March 1966, at which the Labour Party had been returned to power with an unchanged majority. The question of constitutional advance had not been an issue at the elections, and the party manifestos had concentrated on measures for economic and social development.

126. The progress of the British Virgin Islands had been quite separate from development in the other islands of the Eastern Caribbean. The main event in the constitutional field had been the appointment of 1 January 1965 by the United Kingdom Secretary of State for the Colonies of a Constitutional Commissioner with the task of recommending any desirable constitutional changes, including changes in the electoral system, taking into account local opinion and the limited resources and population of the Territory. The Commissioner appointed had been Mrs. Mary Proudfoot, a Fellow of Somerville College, Oxford. She had visited the Territory early in 1965 and had presented her report in April 1965. The report, which was summarized in a Secretariat working paper (see paras. 33-35 of chapter XXII), was critical of certain aspects of the present constitutional arrangements in the Territory, although Mrs. Proudfoot had concluded that the membership system worked well. The main criticism was that there was insufficient contact between public opinion and the Legislative Council or Executive Council. The Commissioner's recommendations were therefore partly directed towards improving the relationship between the Government and the people. The report accordingly recommended that the existing basis of universal adult suffrage should remain unchanged; that the number of districts (constituencies) should be increased from six to seven; that there should be a Boundary Commission to review the districts on Tortola; that the Legislative Council should comprise two officials, one nominated member selected after consultation with the First Minister, and the seven elected members, with a Speaker elected from outside the Council; and that the Executive Council should consist of two officials and three of the seven elected members who would be called ministers and who would be responsible for those areas of government not reserved to the Administrator. Under Mrs. Proudfoot's proposals, the seven elected members would elect a "First Minister" from among themselves. The First Minister would then form a ministerial group by selecting the other two Ministers. The Ministers would be responsible to the Legislative Council and would resign if the Council passed a vote of no confidence in them. The special responsibilities of the Administrator would be external affairs, defence, internal security, the civil service, finance, economic planning, and certain legal and judicial matters.

127. The report had been presented to the Legislative Council in July 1965 and debated in October 1965. The Council had adopted a resolution taking note of the report and had requested the Secretary of State for the Colonies to receive a delegation from the Council with a view to drawing up a new constitution for the Territory based on the report. The United Kingdom Colonial Secretary had subsequently proposed that a constitutional conference should be held in London in October 1966 and the British Virgin Islands Government had accepted that suggestion. Mrs. Proudfoot's report and the modifications put forward in the Legislative Council's debates would undoubtedly be discussed fully at the conference.

128. The economy of the British Virgin Islands was based on the production of livestock and on fishing. Recent rapid economic expansion in the neighbouring United States Virgin Islands had somewhat affected the economy, chiefly by tending to draw away skilled labour. An economic survey issued in 1962 had recommended concentration on tourist development and improvements in communications. In 1965 United Kingdom grants and technical aid to the Territory had amounted to $1.17 million compared with $454,000 in 1964. His Government had made an allocation for the period 1965-1968 of Colonial Development and Welfare Grant funds amounting to more than $1 million and those funds were being applied to various development works. In addition, approval in principle had recently been given to a major electrical power extension scheme to be financed by a loan of $1 million.

129. The representative of Bulgaria said that, although the position of the British Virgin Islands had much in common with that of the other British Territories in the Caribbean, the pace of constitutional development had been much slower there than elsewhere. The Territory's history since it had become a British possession in 1672 fell into two major phases: the periods before and after the emancipation of the slaves in 1874. As the Constitutional Commissioner who had visited the Territory in 1965 had pointed out, the limited representative system which had been established by the 1773 Constitution had developed no further after the departure of the white ruling classes following the emancipation; the power to govern was, in fact, still largely in the hands of the Administrator, who presided in both the Executive and the legislative Councils. The Constitutional Commissioner's report had described the dissatisfaction of the people of the Territory with the existing constitutional system; it was perhaps significant that that dissatisfaction had not been brought to the attention of the Special Committee previously. The Commissioner had made recommendations which, if accepted, would end a situation in which the Administration was so out of touch with the people that both the Executive and the Legislative Councils were considered mere instruments of government, if not actively antagonistic to the people's interests. The economic and financial position of the Territory, however, was similar to that of other Caribbean Territories in that its budget could not be balanced without substantial grants from the United Kingdom; the Commission had therefore recommended that financial control should remain the responsibility of the Administrator until the colony became solvent. In this connexion, the Bulgarian delegation wished, once again, to reiterate the point of view it had already expressed. The colonial Power, which had exploited the Territory for centuries, must give back what it had taken from the Territory so that the people could exercise self-determination and choose the political and social system which best suited them. His delegation considered that the Special Committee's request to the United Kingdom to take steps which would accelerate the constitutional process within the framework of the Declaration contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) was still applicable.

130. The representative of the Ivory Coast observed that his delegation was convinced that all the information provided to the Sub-Committee on the British Virgin Islands and Montserrat showed that their economic structure was complementary and that some form of association agreed to by the population offered the best prospects for their economic viability. The efforts to establish a federation of the Leeward and Windward Islands in 1947 had broken down but his delegation would like to know whether public opinion in all the islands had changed since that time and whether it might not be worth while to make renewed efforts to achieve some form of association between them. The fragmentation of the region through the granting of independence to so many separate Territories was regrettable and in view of the admitted fact that in at least one of them, the British Virgin Islands, there was little contact between the people and their representatives in the Administration, it might be prudent to sound out public opinion again on the question of federation.

131. The representative of Iran said that the problems of the British Virgin Islands, a Territory with a population of only 8,500, were characteristic of the smaller Territories with which the Sub-Committee had to deal. In such cases, solutions other than separate independence for each Territory had to be taken into account. There were a number of points that his delegation wished to ask the representative of the United Kingdom to clarify in connexion with the breakdown of the negotiations on federation in 1947. It was not clear, for instance, whether the delegates at the talks had been really aware of the views of the people of the Territories, or whether steps had been taken to ascertain their views on their future status, either at that time or more recently. It was conceivable that delegates who had no specific mandate in this regard acted on their own initiative. It was conceivable also that the people of the Territory were kept uninformed as to their rights, in particular their right to self-determination and the various alternatives open to them.

132. He pointed out that a colonial Territory, even if it enjoyed a measure of representative government, was still a colonial Territory and therefore not sovereign. Under the colonial system, the wishes of the inhabitants could be expressed in a number of ways. In larger Territories, the people could form political parties and other organizations in order to express their views. In smaller Territories where that was not always the case, the United Nations should be satisfied that the people had been given an opportunity to exercise their right of self-determination in full freedom and in full knowledge of their prerogatives.

133. With regard to the British Virgin Islands, the administering Power should take care to ensure that the colonial system was terminated in accordance with the wishes of the peoples concerned. The United Kingdom representative had said that in 1947 the people of the British Virgin Islands had made it clear that they did not wish to join the proposed federation. Twenty years had elapsed since then and members were justified in asking whether the people of the Territory had been consulted again. Many important changes had taken place and the people should be informed of the various rights available to them. It would be for them to decide on their status, but the United Nations should ensure that their choice was freely made.

134. The representative of Uruguay said that the process of liberation in Latin America had been essentially political in nature and economic factors had not played a great part. In the case of some of the smaller Territories with which the Sub-Committee was concerned, however, the economic aspect was of great importance. It was necessary to ensure the economic viability of the Territory concerned so that the people would be able to satisfy their spiritual, cultural and physical needs.

135. He understood that when the Sub-Committee took up the question of Antigua the United Kingdom representative would give some of the reasons why the people of that Territory had rejected the idea of a federation. Subject to the information that the United Kingdom representative would make available at that stage regarding the possibility of a new federation, he wished to make the following comments. If it was found that the majority of the inhabitants of the Leeward and Windward Islands were in favour of federation, the Sub-Committee would welcome that development. If, on the other hand, the people rejected federation, then the Sub-Committee should suggest that there should be some form of loose association. In any event, the Sub-Committee should report to the Special Committee that in its view some form of association would represent the best solution for the future development of the Territories concerned. If the people still desired separate independence, the Special Committee would have to accept their decision as an expression of their will in accordance with the principle of self-determination.

136. The representative of the United Kingdom said that his delegation would make some comments on the negotiations on a proposed federation of the Leeward and Windward Islands in the course of a statement on those Territories at a later meeting. Since several members had referred to the need for consultation of the people on questions affecting their future constitutional status, he wished to point out that under the British system of representative government there was not usually any provision for direct consultation of the people on specific questions by such means as a referendum. Under that system, consultation was a continuous process, operating through the election of parliamentary candidates representing political parties, parliamentary debate, the information media and, in the case of the Territories in question, contact through the Governor or Administrator with the United Kingdom Government in London. He could not anticipate the forthcoming Conference by commenting on the Constitutional Commissioner's recommendations, but the fact that the United Kingdom Government had invited representatives of the British Virgin Islands to a conference indicated its willingness to consider constitutional changes.

137. His delegation would comment at the appropriate time on some of the contributory causes to the breakdown of the negotiations on federation, although the main point was that these negotiations had for the moment broken down; it would be for historians to identify the reasons. A large majority of those concerned had clearly wished to achieve agreement on federation but that had proved impossible. They had therefore decided to pursue the separate development of the Territories without prejudice to the possibility of forming a new federation subsequently.

138. With regard to the British Virgin Islands, the inhabitants of the Territory had expressed no interest in joining any federation with the other Leeward and Windward Islands. There had been speculation in the past about possible integration with the neighbouring United States Virgin Islands. His Government's view here as elsewhere was that it would be guided by the wishes of the people concerned. The immediate future of the Territory would be discussed at the constitutional conference shortly to be held in London.

(c) Antigua, Dominica, Grenada, St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla, St. Lucia and St. Vincent.

139. The representative of the United Kingdom recalled that on 29 April 1964 his delegation has made a full introductory statement on Barbados and the Windward and Leeward Islands (A/AC.109/102) and had outlined the history of the Federation of the West Indies from its establishment in 1958 until its dissolution in May 1962. It had gone on to describe the continuing efforts to form a new federation of the remaining Territories after Jamaica and Trinidad had opted to proceed to separate independence.

140. The United Kingdom delegation had kept the Special Committee informed of progress in the search for a formula that would enable the Territories to come together once again in a new grouping, for it had long been clear to his Government that those small islands stood little chance of obtaining economic self-sufficiency or international status as individual States, nor could they remain colonies of the United Kingdom indefinitely. Throughout the lengthy discussions which had been held to discuss the possibility of establishing a federation between the Territories of Barbados, Antigua, St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla, Dominica, Grenada, St. Lucia, St. Vincent and Montserrat, the United Kingdom had made clear that in its view the most hopeful way forward for them lay in some form of regional co-operation which seemed to offer the best prospects for their future political and economic development. It had also been made clear at the outset that the United Kingdom Government stood ready to enter into discussions concerning independence for a federation of those Territories once it had been established.

141. In May 1962 a conference held in London had reached provisional agreement on a federal constitution. In each of the Legislatures of the eight participating Territories except that of Grenada, the proposals agreed in London had been approved as a basis for further discussion. The Grenada Government which had taken office in September 1962 had however, declared its intention to seek association with Trinidad and Tobago in a unitary State. In December 1962 the Colonial Secretary had held discussions in Barbados with the ministers of the other seven Territories and a joint statement had been issued in which the ministers had reaffirmed their conviction that federation offered the best prospects for the future of their Territories.

142. In May 1963, ministers from the seven Territories had had talks in Barbados with a United Kingdom minister to discuss arrangements for a further conference to be held in London in June. The talks had revealed significant divergences of opinion between the representatives of the seven Territories and it had been decided to defer to proposed conference. Over the next year and a half local discussions had continued and in December 1964 ministers from the seven Territories had approved a new draft federal constitution, subject to various reservations. The reservations expressed by a number of Territories had shown that there had still been serious disagreement on a number of fundamental matters and in particular on the powers which the central authority should have. Some Governments had favoured a strong central authority; others had favoured a wide degree of local autonomy. Those differences had expressed themselves most sharply over the questions of federal power of taxation and the extent to which the federal authority should establish executive departments. One Government had not been prepared to agree to a customs union between the Territories unless the federal authority had the right to levy income tax, while other Governments had been opposed to its having that power. There had also been marked differences of view concerning the division of other powers and functions between the federal and unit governments that indicated that there was no firm basis of agreement about the foundations on which federal institutions should be established.

143. Following a visit to each of the Territories in early 1965, the Colonial Secretary had published the views of the United Kingdom Government in a dispatch addressed to the seven Governments. The dispatch had made it clear that the United Kingdom Government still considered that a federation brought about on satisfactory terms offered the best prospect to a solution of the constitutional problems for the area. It had also recorded the willingness of the United Kingdom Government to discuss arrangements for the federation's independence, once a federal scheme had been agreed upon.

144. Before a further meeting of territorial representatives in April 1965, the Chief Minister of Antigua had announced that his Government intended to take no further part in the discussions on the federal scheme. In those circumstances, the Barbados Government had asked for time to consider the consequences and shortly afterwards it had proposed that Barbados should proceed to separate independence before considering any further steps towards federation. Members of the Sub-Committee would recall that it had been finally decided at the conference held in June and July of the current year that Barbados should become independent on 30 November 1966.

145. The failure to establish a new federation had been a severe disappointment to the United Kingdom Government. Ever since the end of the Second World War his Government had thrown its full support behind local endeavours to establish a federation between the United Kingdom Caribbean Territories to lead to independence in political unity, but those efforts had proved unsuccessful. The Federation of The West Indies had had only a brief life and had been dissolved in the same month which had been agreed for its independence. The United Kingdom Government had encouraged the efforts of the remaining eight Territories to reach agreement on a new federation which could follow Jamaica and Trinidad and Tobago into independence. That was not to be, however, and Barbados was now moving towards separate independence. While still believing that closer association between the Territories offered the most hopeful prospects for their future, the United Kingdom Government recognized that that must be a matter for local decision. By autumn 1965 it had become clear that the time had come to review the need for constitutional change in the Territories on an individual basis.

146. In considering the constitutional arrangements for the remaining six Territories of Antigua, St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla, Dominica, Grenada, St. Lucia and St. Vincent, the United Kingdom Government had had to take account of the serious economic difficulties facing the islands. The Territories had one of the highest rates of population increase in the world. They had no rich natural resources and were heavily dependent on their exports, which were preponderantly agricultural, to meet the cost of imports.

147. With United Kingdom financial aid, the islands were working to diversify their economies and progress was being made, especially with tourism, but there was only limited scope for manufacturing industries. Communications facilities were being improved. Under the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement, the islands received a higher price than the world sugar price and they benefited from access to the United Kingdom market for all their exports, over half of which went to the United Kingdom.

148. In addition to those indirect forms of aid, direct aid from the United Kingdom had also been crucial. In the past ten years the Territories had received over $28 million in Commonwealth Development and Welfare grants. In the current three-year period 1965-1968 the Territories had been allocated $13.58 million, a sharp increase over the development aid hitherto available to them. Several of the Territories were unable to balance their budget and received annual grants towards budgetary expenditure: in 1966 St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla, Dominica, St. Vincent and Grenada would receive about $3.65 million in budgetary support. Financial assistance had also been given to a number of regional schemes of great benefit to the Territories, such as the University of the West Indies.

149. The United Kingdom Government had also established a Development Division in the Caribbean to help the Governments to make the best possible use of the development funds available to them. At the same time the Governments of the United Kingdom, Canada and the United States had during the current year mounted a major economic survey of the United Kingdom Territories in the Caribbean to examine their development problems on a regional scale. The report of the survey put forward imaginative proposals for the co-ordination and acceleration of development in the Territories. The three Governments had indicated to the islands their willingness to discuss the report with them as soon as they had been able to study it.

150. Reverting to the question of the islands' constitutional future following the efforts to form a new federation, he said that several of the island Governments had asked for greater control over their internal affairs although none of them had proposed separate independence. The Territories had long-standing cultural and sentimental links with the United Kingdom, which they were anxious to preserve. The United Kingdom Government recognized that those requests for further constitutional advance could not be met merely by the devolution of additional powers upon the local governments in a colonial context and had set out to devise a new relationship that would be consistent with the political maturity of the Territories but would enable them to continue voluntarily such links with the United Kingdom as they wished.

151. Accordingly, in autumn 1965 his Government had sent the Governments of Antigua St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla, Dominica, St. Lucia, St. Vincent and Grenada new and comprehensive proposals, which were described in some detail in a Secretariat working paper (see paras. 44-54 of chap. XXII). The United Kingdom Government had proposed that each Territory should become a State in association with the United Kingdom, with control of its internal affairs and with the right to amend its own constitution including the power to end the association with the United Kingdom and declare itself independent. The proposals had indicated the United Kingdom willingness to accept responsibility for the defence and external affairs of the States so long as the association continued. A salient feature had been the entrenchment in the constitutions of the States of safeguards for the preservation of democratic forms of government, the protection of fundamental rights and the maintenance of the constitutions themselves. It had also been proposed that a regional Superior Court should be created to serve all six States. It had been made clear that the States would continue to be eligible to receive aid from the United Kingdom under that Government's aid programme.

152. In November 1965 a special representative of the Secretary of State had visited the Territories to discuss those proposals with the Governments and had met with acceptance of them as a basis for negotiations. The arrangements had throughout been worked out in consultation with the Governments of the Territories concerned. The United Kingdom Government proposals, modified to take account of the views expressed to the special representative, had been published in December 1965 and the United Kingdom had proposed that discussions should be held in London in spring 1966 with the Governments of the Territories and representatives of the opposition parties in each Legislature. All the territorial Governments had accepted the invitation to the series of conferences as had the representatives of the opposition parties. The Government of the United Kingdom invited the territorial Governments to prepare detailed proposals for the new internal constitutions in readiness for the Conference.

153. At the first Conference, with Antigua held between 26 February and 26 March 1966, it had been agreed that while the United Kingdom Government would have the ultimate responsibility in defence and external affairs, it would proceed throughout in consultation with the Antigua Government and that if after consultation there was failure to reach agreement in a matter that required legislation, the United Kingdom Government would, before going forward in that way, so far as practicable give the Government of Antigua the opportunity of considering whether it would wish to take steps to terminate the association. The United Kingdom Government had also undertaken to delegate to the Antigua Government a substantial measure of authority with respect to Antigua's external relations.

154. That Conference had also worked out a detailed outline of the new constitution for Antigua, including provisions for its amendment or replacement by the Parliament of Antigua. The constitution would be a fully democratic one with full safeguards for fundamental rights. There would be a Governor who as the representative of Her Majesty The Queen would exercise the powers of a constitutional Head of State acting on the advice of his Ministers; he would not be a representative of the United Kingdom Government or subject to its instructions. The House of Representatives would, like the present Legislative Council be elected by universal suffrage and the executive authority would rest with a Cabinet under a Premier who commanded a majority in the House. There would be a Senate with limited delaying powers, seven of whose ten members would be appointed on the Premier's advice the remaining three being appointed after consultation with the Premier. There would be the usual safeguards for the independence of the judiciary. Those and other important clauses of the constitution would be entrenched; any bill to amend the constitution would require the support of a two-thirds majority in each of the Legislative Houses and subsequent approval by a two-thirds majority in a referendum. In the event of a deadlock between the Senate and the House of Representatives, a bill to amend the constitution that had been rejected by the Senate in two successive sessions could be submitted to a referendum.

155. Antigua would be free to terminate the association with the United Kingdom at any time by means of the same procedure as that required for amendment of the entrenched clauses of the constitution. No referendum would be required to give effect to constitutional arrangements for Antigua to join—either separately or together with other Territories—with an independent Commonwealth country in the Caribbean whether in a unitary State, a federation or some other form of constitutional association under which the independent country would be responsible for the defence and external affairs of Antigua.

156. The Conference had agreed in principle that there should be a regional Supreme Court of Judicature. Subject to the agreement of the other Territories which would be served by the Court, the Conference had agreed that it should consist of a High Court of Justice and a Court of Appeal. Agreement had also been reached on the constitution of the Court and on its jurisdiction in constitutional questions and questions of fundamental rights and freedoms. An important matter that still remained to be settled was the practical arrangements for the establishment of the Court, including the choice of headquarters and the distribution of costs, which were not appropriate for discussion by the Conference. It was planned to discuss those questions further at an inter-governmental conference to be held shortly in the Caribbean.

157. The second Conference with representatives from the four Windward Islands Territories (Dominica, Grenada, St. Lucia and St. Vincent) had been held between 18 April and 6 May. At the opening of the Conference, the delegates from the Windward Islands had expressed the view that the United Kingdom Government's constitutional proposals ought to have been accompanied by proposals for a closer economic relationship between the United Kingdom and the Territories which would help to raise the living standards of their peoples. No one who had studied the Islands' economic difficulties could fail to sympathize with those hopes, but the United Kingdom delegation had been obliged to tell the delegates that those problems lay outside the scope of the Conference. Its members had pointed out that for many years the United Kingdom Government had been doing everything in its power to promote the economic development of the Territories, not only by direct aid but by providing direct and favourable access to the United Kingdom market as an outlet for the Islands' export products. They had said that in view of its many commitments the United Kingdom Government could not contemplate any increase in aid for those Territories above the allocations already made, but they had drawn attention to the recent establishment of the Development Division in the Caribbean which should help to ensure that that aid was put to the best possible use. They had added that the constitutional changes would not themselves alter existing trading arrangements, but that the United Kingdom Government could not offer the inhabitants of those countries specially favourable terms compared with other Commonwealth immigrants into the United Kingdom.

158. After full discussion the Windward Islands delegates had accepted that position. Although matters of common concern to all four Territories had been discussed in full conference, separate discussions had been held with each of the delegations about the arrangements for their Islands. The arrangements agreed upon were not identical in regard either to external affairs and defence or to the internal constitution, but the differences were minor ones dictated by local circumstances and preferences.

159. Essentially, the pattern previously worked out for Antigua had been closely followed, but there had been one important departure. Several of the Windward Islands delegations had pressed for assurance that the United Kingdom's power to terminate the association unilaterally would not be exercised arbitrarily. They had received an undertaking—which would apply also to Antigua and St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla—that the United Kingdom would not terminate the association without giving six months' notice of intention to do so and that in such circumstances the United Kingdom would be prepared to hold a conference with the Territory concerned, at which the political and economic implications of the termination could be discussed. They had also been assured that the specific approval of the United Kingdom Parliament would in such circumstances be sought for the termination of the association.

160. The proposals for a regional Supreme Court, agreed upon at the Conference with Antigua, had been considered by all four Territories at the Windward Islands Conference. The Territories had agreed on proposals which would be acceptable to them if acceptable to the other two Territories concerned. Those proposals had not differed fundamentally from those accepted by Antigua. The Conference had agreed that there were administrative questions remaining which were not suitable for decision by the Conference itself and should be left for subsequent inter-governmental discussion.

161. The third Conference, with representatives of St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla, had been held between 12 and 26 May. Like the delegations from the Windward Islands, the St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla delegation had laid stress on the economic problems of the Territory. The United Kingdom Government had been able to make some suggestions for various feasibility studies in connexion with the points raised and, subject to the outcome of those studies, for the necessary financial assistance.

162. Full agreement had been reached concerning the proposed arrangements for the conduct of external affairs and defence, the internal constitution and the termination of the association. With regard to development aid, the United Kingdom Government had explained that the new arrangements would not themselves affect the position and had undertaken to consider further a proposal about the administration of budgetary aid put forward by the St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla Government. Discussions on that question had not yet been completed.

163. The arrangements for a regional Supreme Court which had been found acceptable at the previous two conferences had been considered by the St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla Conference and found acceptable subject to consideration of some further changes. The Conference had agreed that practical arrangements for the establishment of the Court should be discussed at a subsequent inter-governmental conference.

164. The arrangements agreed upon at the three conferences had been subject to the approval of the Legislatures concerned. So far, the Legislatures of Antigua, Dominica, St. Lucia and Grenada had completed their consideration of the proposals and had passed resolutions approving them. No dates had yet been set in St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla where a general election had been held on 25 July, or in St. Vincent, where a general election had been held on 22 August.

165. An Act of Parliament in the United Kingdom would be necessary to provide for the new relationship of association. The drafting in detail of the constitution of each of the Territories in accordance with the arrangements agreed with them and the settlement of the details of the constitutions in consultation with each Territory was a substantial task which would necessarily take some months to complete.

166. The agreement reached on a regional Supreme Court of Judicature at the earlier conferences had necessarily been subject to review in the light of the conclusions reached at any later conference in the series of three. Proposals had been made for a Caribbean regional conference in September, at which the differences which had resulted from the procedure would be reconciled and agreement reached on other related questions which it had not been possible to discuss at the individual conferences. It was hoped that it would be possible to settle the draft legislation for the establishment of the Court at that conference.

167. A detailed programme covering all those processes had been worked out. Subject to the approval of the Legislatures which had not yet considered the proposals agreed at the conferences, and to the enactment of the necessary legislation in the United Kingdom, it was intended that the new arrangements should be brought into effect early in 1967.

168. It would be seen that the complex and exhaustive processes of formulating new arrangements for each of the six Territories had been and were being carried forward in a hopeful and constructive manner. The essence of those processes had been close and continuous consultation at every stage between the United Kingdom Government and the island Government and political leaders, including the opposition leaders; many of the essential proposals had originated in the Territories themselves and many others, at least in their initial forms, in London. Those processes were not yet complete. Moreover, there were many other detailed provisions, for example, regarding the future internal constitutions of the individual Territories, which he would not attempt to describe in full but which the Sub-Committee would no doubt wish to study. His delegation was therefore circulating to members of the Sub-Committee the relevant conference reports, which contained full details on those points as well as a fuller account of the matters with which he had already dealt.

169. His statement was, therefore, in a real sense a progress report. The Sub-Committee would no doubt recognize that the progress made so far had been real and substantial. Much remained to be done and it was of course too early to attempt to reach any final judgement or conclusions about the eventual outcome; only when the current processes were considerably further advanced would it be possible to view the new arrangements as a coherent whole and to set them against the historical and economic background of the area.

B. Adoption of the report

170. The Sub-Committee considered its conclusions and recommendations on these Territories (see para. 177 below) at its 57th to 59th meetings between 16 September and 11 October 1966.

171. The Sub-Committee's general conclusions and recommendations and those relating to Barbados and to Antigua, Dominica, Grenada, Montserrat, St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla, St. Lucia and St. Vincent were adopted by consensus.

172. With regard to the conclusions and recommendations relating to the British Virgin Islands, sub-paragraphs (7) to (11) and (14) were also adopted by consensus while sub-paragraphs (12) and (13) were adopted by voting as follows:

(a) In sub-paragraph (12), the third sentence was voted upon separately at the request of the representative of Bulgaria. The sentence was adopted by 6 votes to 1. The sub-paragraph as a whole was adopted by 6 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

(b) In sub-paragraph 13, the representative of Bulgaria proposed that the second sentence be deleted. The proposal was rejected by 4 votes to 2, with 1 abstention. The sub-paragraph as a whole was adopted by 5 votes to 1, with 1 abstention.

173. In connexion with the conclusions and recommendations on the British Virgin Islands, the representative of Bulgaria expressed reservations with regard to the words "despite a certain measure of advancement in the constitutional field", in sub-paragraph (10), and the words "and in full knowledge of the available choices", in the first sentence of sub-paragraph (13).

174. The representative of Bulgaria said that his delegation had agreed to the adoption of the remainder of the draft conclusions and recommendations by consensus in view of the fact that time was late and it was essential for the Sub-Committee to submit a report to the Special Committee. The position of his delegation was that the Special Committee should reaffirm that the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples applied fully to the Territories and that the administering Power must implement that Declaration. It felt strongly about the need for visiting missions to be sent to the Territories in order to enable the Special Committee to fulfil its task. Since the general conclusions and recommendations just adopted were in keeping with that position, his delegation had agreed to them.

175. With regard to the conclusions and recommendations relating to Barbados, his delegation reserved its position concerning the failure of negotiations for federation, since it considered that the failure was largely due to a lack of co-operation on the part of the administering Power. The procedure adopted by the administering Power for the granting of independence was unsatisfactory and his delegation had reservations concerning the way in which the administering Power thought it was carrying out its task under General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). He regretted that the Sub-Committee had not been able to agree to include a reference to the failure of the administering Power to enable the Special Committee to send a visiting mission to Barbados. A visiting mission could have advised the Special Committee concerning the implementation of resolution 1514 (XV).

176. With regard to the final section of the conclusions and recommendations, he regretted that the Sub-Committee had not had time to give these Territories the detailed consideration required. Such a situation should be avoided in future.

C. Conclusions and recommendations

177. The Sub-Committee recommends to the Special Committee that it adopt the following conclusions and recommendations:

(a) General

(1) The Special Committee recalls its conclusions and recommendations concerning these Territories which it adopted in 1964 and which were endorsed by the General Assembly at its twentieth session.

(2) The Special Committee reaffirms that the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples applies fully to these Territories. At the same time, it recognizes that the small size and population of these Territories, and the nature of their economies, present peculiar problems which demand special attention.

(3) The Special Committee reaffirms that it is for the people of the Territories, and for them alone, to express themselves freely on the form of political status they wish to adopt in order to achieve the objectives of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

(4) The Special Committee reaffirms the right of the people of these Territories to exercise their right of self-determination in complete freedom and in full knowledge of the various forms of political status open to them. It also expresses its belief that, particularly in the case of small Territories, the United Nations should take appropriate steps to ensure that the people of these Territories are enabled to express themselves freely on their future status and in full knowledge of the options available to them.

(5) The Special Committee reiterates its previous recommendation concerning the need for visiting missions to these Territories and, to this end, urges the administering Power to enable the Special Committee to send visiting missions to the Territories.

(6) The Special Committee recalls its belief expressed in 1964 that it should be possible for these Territories to join with others in the area to form an economically and administratively viable State. It also recalls that, at that time, negotiations were being carried on between almost all of these Territories with a view to establishing a federation. The Special Committee regrets that these negotiations were not successful and that, as a consequence, each Territory has been obliged to seek a separate solution. It expresses the hope that the administering Power will do everything possible to facilitate the kind of solution desired by the people.

(b) British Virgin Islands

(7) The Special Committee recalls its conclusions and recommendations concerning the Territory which it adopted in 1964 and which were endorsed by the General Assembly at its twentieth session.

(8) It reaffirms that the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples applies fully to the Territory.

(9) It notes that a Constitutional Commissioner visited the Territory in 1965 and that, on the basis of the Commissioner's report, a Constitutional Conference will be held during October 1966. It notes with concern the observations by the Constitutional Commissioner that there was discontent in the Territory and that one of the main reasons for this was the fact that the Government was largely out of touch with the people. The Special Committee trusts that the administering Power will take urgent steps to remedy this situation.

(10) The Special Committee regrets that, despite a certain measure of advancement in the constitutional field, the administering Power has not yet implemented the Declaration with respect to the Territory and urges it to do so without delay.

(11) It reaffirms the right of the people to exercise their right of self-determination in complete freedom.

(12) The Special Committee reiterates its belief expressed in 1964 that it should be possible for the Territory to join with others in the area to form an economically and administratively viable State. It regrets that since 1947 no effective steps have been taken to consult the people of the Territory on their future status. It therefore invites the administering Power to take the necessary steps to ensure that the people of the Territory are fully aware of the various forms of political status open to them, without precluding the possibilities contained in General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV), in their achievement of the objectives of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). The Special Committee also invites the administering Power to ensure that the people of the Territory be enabled, in complete freedom and without any restrictions, to express their wishes concerning the future political status of the Territory.

(13) It reiterates its belief that the United Nations must be assured that the exercise of the right of self-determination in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) is undertaken in complete freedom and in full knowledge of the available choices. It therefore considers that a United Nations presence during the procedures for the exercise of the right of self-determination will be essential.

(14) The Special Committee regrets that the administering Power has not agreed to a visiting mission from the Special Committee to the Territory, and affirms that a visit to the Territory is both useful and necessary. Accordingly, it invites the co-operation of the administering Power to enable the United Nations to send a visiting mission to the Territory, in order to obtain first-hand information concerning the Territory and to ascertain the views of the people.

(c) Barbados

(15) The Special Committee recalls that, when it last considered the Territory, Barbados was actively engaged in negotiations for federation or association with neighbouring Territories.

(16) It notes that, due to the failure of these negotiations, the Barbados Legislature decided to request separate independence for the Territory.

(17) The Special Committee welcomes the fixing of 30 November 1966, as the date on which Barbados will become independent.

(18) The Special Committee notes that it is still possible for Barbados to become part of a federation, should the people of Barbados express such a wish through their elected representatives.

(d) Antigua, Dominica, Grenada, Montserrat, St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla, St. Lucia and St. Vincent

(19) The Special Committee, having heard the statement of the administering Power and the statement by the petitioner from Grenada, did not find it possible to give the question of these Territories the detailed consideration it required. It therefore decides to postpone its consideration of this question and, subject to any decisions which the Assembly may take at its twenty-first session, to examine the situation in these Territories in detail at an early date during its meetings in 1967.

IV. BERMUDA, BAHAMAS, TURKS AND CAICOS ISLANDS AND CAYMAN ISLANDS

A. Consideration by the Sub-Committee

Introduction

178. The Sub-Committee considered these Territories at its 51st, 54th and 59th meetings between 31 August and 11 October 1966.

179. The Sub-Committee had before it the working papers prepared by the Secretariat (see paras. 194-305 of chap. XXII). Members of the Sub-Committee also heard statements by the petitioners from the Bahamas, Mr. Lynden O. Pindling, Leader of the Opposition, and Mr. Randol F. Fawkes, Member of the House of Assembly, made at the 466th and 467th meetings of the Special Committee on 14 and 15 September 1966.

180. In accordance with the procedure agreed upon by the Special Committee, the representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, as administering Power, participated in the work of the Sub-Committee on these Territories, at the invitation of the Chairman.

General statements

181. The representative of the United Kingdom said that the four Territories of the Bahamas, Bermuda, Turks and Caicos Islands and the Cayman Islands had been grouped together for practical purposes, although they did not form a homogeneous, geographical or political group.

182. The most recent discussion of the Bahamas in the Special Committee had been on 23 and 24 August 1965, at the 376th and 377th meetings, when the Committee had heard a petitioner and a full statement by the United Kingdom delegation covering a wide range of constitutional and other questions raised by the petitioner. Other information on the Bahamas was available to the Sub-Committee in two Secretariat working papers (see paras. 234-284 of chap. XXII).

183. The Sub-Committee might wish to take note of a new development relating to possible conflicts of interest between the official responsibility and the private interests of ministers in the Bahamas. In a small community such as the Bahamas, many private individuals with business and other interests were active in political life, but the separation of ministerial responsibility and private activities that was normal in larger countries was not regarded as practicable or even necessarily desirable in the Territory. Naturally, the ultimate sanction against any abuse of that system lay in the electoral system and the democratic right of the people to select their own leaders, on the basis of universal suffrage. In addition to that safeguard, however, the Government of the Bahamas had recently issued a new Code of Conduct governing the question of ministerial interests. The Code, published in the Bahamas on 29 July 1966, amplified and formalized the principles set out in the parliamentary statement by the Premier in April 1964, which the United Kingdom representative had quoted in full at the 377th meeting of the Special Committee. It stipulated as an immutable principle that no minister could permit his private interest to influence his discharge of his public duties. Ministers were also required to ensure so far as practicable not only that they avoided an actual conflict of interest but also that their conduct created no ground for criticism or suspicion in that respect. Where actual conflict unavoidably arose, the minister concerned was required to disclose his interest and withdraw from all official functions in relation to the matter in question and from all Cabinet proceedings in which the question was considered. If there was any borderline case or doubt about whether a true conflict of interests had arisen, a minister was required to act as if a conflict had arisen: thus the public interest had the benefit of the doubt. Finally, the Code stipulated that no minister could use for his own personal advantage any information to which he had had access by virtue of his official ministerial capacity.

184. Some points in the working papers called for comment. It was correctly stated that education in the Bahamas was compulsory between the ages of 5 and 14 years (see para. 280 of chap. XXII), but it should also be pointed out that education was free. It was stated that the next elections would be held on the basis of universal adult suffrage (ibid., para. 235); the Sub-Committee might wish to bear in mind that the Territory had in fact enjoyed universal adult suffrage since 1962, when the franchise had been extended to women, and that under the new Constitution the second vote based on a property qualification had been abolished. The reference in the same paragraph to the Governor's exercise of discretionary reserve powers required slight elaboration. Under the Constitution, the Governor, acting in his discretion, was responsible for external affairs, defence, internal security and all matters relating to the police force, but he was required to keep the Cabinet informed of any matters relating to external affairs or defence which might involve the economic or financial interests of the Territory or the enactment of laws by its Legislature.

185. It was stated that the National Democratic Party (NDP) had advocated the inclusion in the Constitution of retroactive fundamental rights provisions (ibid., para. 240). In fact, full fundamental rights provisions were included in sections 2 to 13 of the Constitution which had come into effect on 7 January 1964. A Commissioner had been specially appointed to consider what previous legislation might be regarded as inconsistent with those human rights provisions. The Commissioner had not reported on the laws mentioned in paragraph 44 as being inconsistent with the human rights provisions, and the laws in question had therefore not been excepted from those provisions. All legislation passed since January 1964 was in any case subject to those fundamental rights provisions.

186. The statement that the average wage continued to be £5 per week was incorrect and apparently based on a misunderstanding of the information for 1964 supplied by the administering Power under Article 73 e of the Charter, which had stated that the cost-of-living index had been computed on the basis of an average wage of £5 per week. That basis, which had been adopted in 1949, had remained unchanged for some years and had become unreal; expert assistance in constructing a new index had therefore been sought in April 1965 from the United Kingdom Ministry of Overseas Development. The new index had been based on a wage of £20 per week and the first figures had been issued for June quarter 1966, with March quarter as the new base. No computation or estimate of the average wage had been made since 1959, when it had been calculated at £9.50 per week; since then there had been a number of wage increases.

187. The figure given as net remittances from Bahamian labour in the United States was actually the figure of gross earnings for 1964. The known figure of remittances through government channels had been $413,855.96, but total remittances to the Bahamas had of course been higher, since sums had been remitted privately by many workers. Recruitment of agricultural workers for the United States had now ceased.

188. In reference to the demand of the Progressive Liberal Party (PLP) for freedom of expression and assembly for the trade unions at Freeport (ibid., para. 239), there was, in fact, no restriction on union activities at Freeport and the local of the Hotel and Catering Workers Union had obtained recognition from one of the principal hotels in Freeport.

189. There were also extensive references to conditions at Freeport (see paras. 248-251 of chap. XXII). He would deal at some length with a number of points, since they had been given wide publicity. Many of the allegations reported had been fully dealt with in a statement published in June 1966 by the president of the two companies owning and operating casinos in Freeport and Nassau, in which it was pointed out that both casinos were operated under certificates granted by the Government. Those certificates required that the registered companies should retain full control over the casinos. The Bahamas Government had imposed a system of controls on their operation, giving the maximum security against malpractices, and a system of police clearances had been introduced to help with the checking of the staff of the casinos. There were various procedures under which a regular and continuous check was imposed on the identity and suitability of the staffs. The daily accounts of those enterprises were subject to local audit by internationally known chartered accountants, whose recent reports showed that they were satisfied with those accounts. Moreover, the taxation system ensured that the community as a whole benefited from the operation of those organizations. For example, taxes totalling $280,000 had been imposed on each casino for 1966 and substantial annual taxes ranging from $280 to $840 were imposed on gambling machines. Total government revenues from those organizations had been estimated at over $600,000 in 1966. Furthermore, the firm concerned was committed by contract to plough back a large part of its annual income in hotel development, which would bring benefits to the whole Territory. The Freeport casino alone had paid about $315,000 in taxes to the Government in 1965 and a further $317,000 had been contributed to a non-profit-making civic organization created to assist in the promotion of tourism. The president of the companies had also pointed out that allegations of increased crime in Freeport owing to the casinos were not supported by police statistics. Finally, he had pointed out that some 5,000 Bahamians were estimated to be employed in Freeport in the tourist industry and related occupations—a solid benefit to the Bahamas community.

190. With regard to the Opposition's electoral revision bill (ibid., paras. 245-247), he gave detailed information about the objectives of that bill and outlined the basis on which the Bahamas Government had defended the system of voter's cards—which was represented by the opposition as a factor of corruption inasmuch as in a country where confusions were difficult to avoid (many names being identical) it was difficult to dispense with it.

191. The borrowing plans for the public works programme contemplated by the Government (ibid., paras. 260 and 261)—the expansion of Nassau harbour and development of the telecommunications and water distribution systems—did not amount to the figure of $62 million mentioned. Addition of the various loans contemplated (a loan of $14 million for the expansion of Nassau harbour, to be negotiated in the United States, a loan of $13.8 million negotiated with the Export-Import Bank for the same purpose, a loan of $9.4 million for the development of telecommunications, to be negotiated in the United States, and a loan of $3.5 million, to be negotiated in Canada) gave a total of $40.7 million, which was considerably lower than the figure quoted. The initial estimate for the total cost of the expansion of the harbour and the development of the telecommunications and water distribution systems was $37 million, but no final costings could be made at this stage. The programme would not necessarily involve an increase in taxes and dues for the payment of the loans, and, consequently, a rise in the cost of living. In fact, the expansion of the harbour, which would allow access to large cruising vessels, would stimulate tourism and business. It would very quickly become a source of revenue. The same was true of the extended telecommunications system. Only the servicing of the loan for the water supply scheme would need to be met wholly from government revenues.

192. With regard to the introduction of new industries to the Bahamas, and in comment on the allegations reported in the working paper, he said that the interests of Bahamian nationals would be protected, since, under the terms of the agreement concluded between Owens-Illinois and the Government of the Bahamas, the company undertook to employ indigenous workers as far as possible (clause 1 (5)) and to train them (clause 1 (7)). The company could import personnel when necessary from the United States, provided they were subsequently repatriated. It had, moreover, already recruited a considerable labour force in the Territory.

193. The rise in prices in the Bahamas (see paras. 270-274 of chap. XXII) was due mainly to the substantial imports from the United Kingdom and the United States, where prices were on the rise. Possibly, the adoption of the decimal currency, with the dollar as the monetary unit, had enabled some tradesmen to increase their prices, on the pretext of rounding them off. The Chamber of Commerce had intervened to prevent abuses. In the main stores, prices had been converted accurately and notices to that effect had been posted to inform customers. In 1965 the Government, after consulting the trade unions, had proposed the adoption of a new price index, as the old index, chosen in 1949, was no longer realistic. The Trade Union Congress had proposed an index according to which prices had risen by 71 per cent between September 1963 and June 1966 but, as the Minister of Labour and Housing had said, the index was not very meaningful, because erroneous methods of calculation had been employed and account had been taken mainly of articles the prices of which had risen appreciably. The Special Committee set up to consider the question of prices and the cost of living, in pursuance of the resolutions submitted by Mr. Pindling (PLP), had so far received only three complaints of abuses in price conversion, one of which was anonymous; all three dealt with questions of minor importance.

194. The working paper on Bermuda (see paras. 194-233 of chap. XXII), also required some comment. Paragraph 28 of that document (ibid., para. 221) referred to the question of government recognition of trade unions which had been dealt with extensively by a petitioner in the Special Committee. The policy of the Bermuda Government was that government boards or departments could recognize trade unions representing a substantial number of employees in the department concerned and should grant recognition where they were satisfied that the union represented a majority of the employees. In January 1966 the Bermuda Government had formally adopted a guide to the conduct of labour relations, setting out certain fundamental principles governing good labour relations; he would be glad to make a copy available to any members of the Sub-Committee who might wish to read it. The first paragraph of section I declared that "the principles embodied in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the United Nations Organization are acceptable as a statement of desirable aims". The guide went on to state that the right of workers, if they wished to be organized into trade unions and to bargain collectively, was to be fully recognized and that there was to be no intimidation or coercion in the exercise of those rights. It was recommended that where a union could show, by secret ballot, that the majority of employees within an undertaking wished a particular bargaining unit to represent them, that unit should be recognized for collective bargaining purposes. The guide had been recommended to the Government by the Labour Relations Advisory Committee, consisting of representatives nominated in equal numbers by employers' and workers' organizations.

195. The question of education had been raised by petitioners in the Special Committee and had aroused considerable interest. The information given in the working paper was now very much out of date (see paras. 224 and 225 of chap. XXII). As a result of legislation passed in 1965 and 1966, important changes had been made in educational organizations and conditions. Enrolment in accordance with the new compulsory school ages of 5 to 14 years had been effected in autumn 1965. The upper limit of the statutory school age would be raised to 15 in 1967 and to 16 in 1969. The new legislation had replaced the terms "vested", "non-vested" and "free" with the terms "aided" and "maintained". Previously vested schools located in government buildings were now classified as maintained, while those located in buildings owned by the trustees of the school were classified as aided. There were twenty-five primary schools (twenty maintained and five aided), five special schools, ten secondary institutes (five aided and five maintained), one vocational school and two places of further education (after-school classes in day schools already indicated). Education for those of school age was free at all aided and maintained schools, except for those in the fee-paying "B" streams of secondary academic schools. Thus fees were confined to "B" stream students at such schools whose parents chose to pay fees for those places at particular schools, and to those educated at wholly private schools. The highest school fees still payable were £195 a year at a private school. From September 1967, students at aided and maintained schools preparing for the "A" level examinations would receive instruction at a new Academic Sixth Form Centre. Finally, legislation had been adopted to ensure that race would cease to be a criterion for admission to aided and maintained schools. That new information had a considerable bearing on some of the complaints reported (ibid., para. 229).

196. The main development in Bermuda since the Sub-Committee's last discussion of the Territory had been the announcement on 11 July 1966 that the Colonial Secretary had invited through the Government a representative delegation from the Bermuda Legislature to a constitutional conference in London, to open on 8 November. The working paper perhaps gave a slightly misleading impression of the nature of the Bermuda delegation to that conference. In fact, it would be widely representative of all points of view in the Legislature of Bermuda and would consist of three representatives of the Legislative Council and fifteen members of the House of Assembly. The members from the House of Assembly would consist of eight members of the United Bermuda Party (UBP), all three members of the Progressive Labour Party (PLP) and four independent members, including the former parliamentary leader of the PLP. The conference would consider the report of the Select Committee of the Bermuda Legislature appointed to consider constitutional changes. That Committee had produced an interim report in July 1965 and a full report in November 1965. The interim report had recommended that the voting age should be reduced to 21 and that the second vote to which certain classes of property owners had been entitled should be abolished. Legislation to give effect to those recommendations had been passed in January 1966. The Select Committee's other proposals were summarized in the working paper (see paras. 195-203 of chap. XXII).

197. There was little to add to the information on the Turks and Caicos Islands given in the working paper on that Territory (ibid., paras. 285-295). As the Sub-Committee would recall, a working party which had met in Nassau in 1964 to consider the possibility of a merger of the Turks and Caicos Islands with the Bahamas had recommended ways in which the Bahamas might be able to help the Turks and Caicos Islands through the provision of staff, technical advice and in other ways. As a result, legislation had been enacted in November 1965 under which the Governor of the Bahamas had become the Governor of the Turks and Caicos Islands too. One of the reasons for that change had been the desire of the people of the Turks and Caicos Islands to have an administrative link with some outside authority, and it had therefore been welcomed in the Territory. The Government and Constitution of the Bahamas were not affected. Other legislation had transferred Turks and Caicos Islands judicial appeals from the Jamaican Court of Appeal to the Bahamas Court.

198. With regard to the Cayman Islands, the main recent development had been the general election held in November 1965. The election, at which the main issue had been the pace of constitutional advance, had been contested by the National Democratic Party (NDP), the Christian Democratic Party (CDP) and twelve independent candidates. The NDP, which had advocated that the Territory should move swiftly towards internal self-government, had secured one seat in the Legislative Assembly, as against six in the previous Assembly. The CDP, which had recommended that the pace of progress towards self-government should be more slow and sure, had gained four seats, as against five in the previous Assembly. Of the independent candidates, most of whom had been in favour of slower constitutional change, seven had been elected, as against one in the previous Assembly. Fifty-eight and four tenths per cent of the electorate had voted.

199. On 23 June 1966 the United Kingdom Colonial Secretary, answering a question about future administrative arrangements for the Cayman Islands, had told the House of Commons that the United Kingdom Government would be guided by local opinion in the Cayman Islands and had stated that he was awaiting a report on constitutional changes by a committee of the newly elected Legislative Assembly.

200. United Kingdom aid to the Turks and Caicos Islands from 1955-1956 to 1964-1965 had amounted to $1,870,000, and aid to the Cayman Islands in the same period to $344,000. In both cases the aid had been almost entirely in the form of grants and technical assistance. The provisional figures for 1965-1966 were $571,000 for the Turks and Caicos Islands and $176,000 for the Cayman Islands. Calculated on a per capita basis, the aid was considerable, since the Turks and Caicos Islands had a population of some 6,000 only and the Caymans just under 9,000. One particular project worthy of special mention was the improvement of the airport on Grand Cayman, for which a contract had been signed in November 1965. The project would cost $1,280,000, to be financed by a grant of $560,000 and a United Kingdom Government loan of $720,000.

201. Once again, the Sub-Committee would note that the processes of democratic activity were vigorously at work in all four of the Territories. The next significant events in the constitutional field would be the report of the Cayman Islands Legislative Assembly Committee on possible constitutional changes; the elections in the Bahamas, which were due to be held not later than the end of 1967 under the new electoral system; and the Bermuda Constitutional Conference on the recommendations of the Bermuda Parliamentary Select Committee.

202. The representative of Bulgaria said that the representative of the administering Power had not mentioned any specific measures taken by the United Kingdom Government to implement the principles of the Declaration contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and to conform to the recommendations of the Special Committee. As the administering Power had refused to allow a visiting mission of inspection to go to the Bahamas, the Special Committee had at its disposal only the limited information contained in the working papers of the Secretariat and the data provided by the United Kingdom delegation. Little progress appeared to have been made since 1964. In the Bahamas especially, colonial rule persisted, the Governor still had discretionary powers and the electoral law had not been altered. The electoral system was such that at the last elections the Progressive Liberal Party, which had obtained 44 per cent of the votes, had won only 24.3 per cent of the seats, while the United Bahamian Party, with 36.6 per cent of the votes, had been allotted 57.6 per cent of the seats. The working papers prepared by the Secretariat showed that certain reforms proposed by the Progressive Liberal Party with a view to making the elections more democratic had been rejected by the party in power. Voting cards continued to be regarded as "negotiable assets". He drew the attention of the Sub-Committee to the part played by the casinos and gaming establishments. Most of them were controlled by United States capital, which enjoyed a privileged tax position. Apparently, the management of some of those establishments had undertaken to pay a sum of money to the Governor on condition that their books were not subjected to local audit. Many United Kingdom nationals were able to take part in elections, since they became entitled to vote after staying six months in the Bahamas.

203. He thought that the 1967 elections would probably take place in the same conditions as the previous ones. The representative of the administering Power had also ignored the question of the Atlantic Underwater Test and Evaluation Centre (AUTECH), which was, however, extremely important. The establishment of a military base on foreign soil constituted a serious threat to the peace and security of the population immediately concerned and indeed of the entire world. One thousand three hundred United States sailors and civilians would be stationed at that base which was 210 hectares in area and situated in a sensitive area of the globe. That new development was certainly not in the interests of the population of the Bahamas, which had been in no way consulted. The procedure employed by the administering Power, which enjoyed discretionary powers, to direct the foreign policy and defence of the Bahamas, was certainly contrary to the spirit and letter of the Declaration contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

204. The representative of the United Kingdom referred the Bulgarian representative to summary records of the 1965 meetings of the Special Committee and stated that the working papers also provided details of the changes which had taken place in regard to the Bahamas as a result of the Bahamas Constitutional Conference held in London in May 1963. The electoral system attacked by the Bulgarian representative was no longer in force; in particular, the second vote in respect of property had been abolished.

205. With regard to the Freeport and Nassau casinos, he reminded the Sub-Committee that he had already refuted these allegations.

206. As to AUTECH, he referred the Sub-Committee to the Secretariat working paper (see para. 259 of chap. XXII), which mentioned that the Bahamas had concurred in the agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States. It would therefore be incorrect to speak of an agreement having been concluded over the heads of the population concerned.

207. The representative of Bulgaria said that although the 1963 Constitutional Conference had proposed certain changes in the electoral system and, according to the United Kingdom representative, those changes had been made, the situation still seemed unsatisfactory, since the petitioners heard by the Special Committee during the previous session had stated that the last elections did not take place under democratic conditions.

208. As for the casinos and other gaming establishments, the United States Press had published much information on that subject, and the Bulgarian delegation had based its remarks on the data given in the official documents prepared by the Secretariat. He referred the Sub-Committee to the working paper (ibid.), which stated: "On 14 April 1966, the Atlantic Underwater Test and Evaluation Centre (AUTECH) at Andros was formally opened. The base, which is a joint Anglo-United States project, has been under construction for the past two years and has so far cost $17 million." Since the foreign policy and defence of the Bahamas were controlled by the administering Power, that Power alone was responsible for the negotiations which had taken place without the population being consulted.

B. Adoption of the report

209. The Sub-Committee adopted its conclusions and recommendations on these Territories (see para. 211 below) by consensus at its 59th meeting on 11 October 1966.

210. The representative of Bulgaria reserved the position of his delegation.

C. Conclusions and recommendations

211. The Sub-Committee recommends to the Special Committee that it adopt the following conclusions and recommendations:

General

(1) The Special Committee recalls its conclusions and recommendations on Bermuda, Bahamas, Turks and Caicos Islands and Cayman Islands, which it adopted in 1964 and which were endorsed by the General Assembly at its twentieth session.

(2) The Special Committee reaffirms that the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples applies fully to these Territories.

(3) The Special Committee regrets that the administering Power has not yet implemented the Declaration in these Territories and urges it to do so without delay.

(4) The Special Committee considers that in view of the lack of sufficient information on these Territories, and, in the case of the Territory of the Bahamas, of conflicting statements concerning conditions by the representative of the administering Power and by the petitioners, the administering Power should enable the Special Committee to dispatch a visiting mission to the Territory as soon as possible.

(5) The Special Committee considers that the administering Power should take immediate measures in order to transfer all powers to the peoples of these Territories, without any conditions or reservations, in accordance with their freely expressed will and desire, in order to enable them to enjoy complete independence and freedom.

(6) It also expresses its belief that, particularly in the case of small Territories, the United Nations should take appropriate steps to ensure that the people of these Territories are enabled to express themselves freely on their future status and in full knowledge of the options available to them.

(7) The Special Committee, having heard the statement of the administering Power and the statements by the petitioners from the Bahamas, did not find it possible to give the question of these Territories the detailed consideration it required. It therefore decides to postpone its consideration of this question and, subject to any decisions which the Assembly may take at its twenty-first session, to examine the situation in these Territories in detail at an early date during its meetings in 1967.

V. FALKLAND ISLANDS (MALVINAS)

212. At its 59th meeting, the Sub-Committee adopted the following statement concerning the Territory of the Falkland Islands (Malvinas) which it recommends for adoption by the Special Committee:

"The Special Committee recalls the provisions of General Assembly resolution 2065 (XX) of 16 December 1965, by which the Assembly: (i) invited the Governments of Argentina and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to proceed without delay with the negotiations recommended by the Special Committee, with a view to finding a peaceful solution to the problem, bearing in mind the provisions and objectives of the Charter of the United Nations and of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and the interests of the population of the Falkland Islands (Malvinas); (ii) requested the two Governments to report to the Special Committee and to the General Assembly at its twenty-first session on the results of the negotiations. The Special Committee takes note of the information provided by the Governments of Argentina and the United Kingdom (A/AC.109/145 and Add.1, A/AC.109/146 and Add.1) that meetings were held on the problem on 19 and 20 July 1966 and that they would be continued."

CHAPTER XXIII*

INFORMATION ON NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES TRANSMITTED UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER OF THE UNITED NATIONS AND RELATED QUESTIONS

1. By its resolution 1970 (XVIII) of 16 December 1963, the General Assembly dissolved the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and, inter alia, requested the Special Committee to study the information transmitted to the Secretary-General in accordance with Article 73 e of the Charter and to take it fully into account in examining the situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

2. It will be recalled that in order to discharge its functions under the above resolution, the Special Committee, at its 315th meeting on 17 November 1964, approved certain procedures which had been suggested by the Secretary-General (A/5800/Rev.1,¹ chap. II, appendix I). These procedures were later also approved by the General Assembly in its resolution 2109 (XX).

3. In compliance with operative paragraph 5 of General Assembly resolution 1970 (XVIII) and in accordance with the procedures approved by the General Assembly, the latest information transmitted by Administering Members was used in preparation of the working paper by the Secretariat on most of the Territories for the Special Committee. This information was taken into account by the Committee in its consideration of the Territories concerned and is reflected in the chapter of the Special Committee's report dealing with each of these Territories.

4. In its resolution 2109 (XX), adopted on 21 December 1965, the General Assembly, besides approving the procedures referred to above and requesting the Special Committee to continue to discharge the functions entrusted to it in accordance with those procedures, addressed itself to Administering Members as follows:

"2. Expresses its regret that not all Member States having responsibilities for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories have seen fit to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations;

"3. Once again urges all Member States which have or which assume responsibilities for the administration of Territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government to transmit, or continue to transmit, to the Secretary-General information as prescribed under Article 73 e of the Charter, as well as the fullest possible information on political and constitutional development".

5. In accordance with the procedures referred to above, the Special Committee, at its 472nd and 473rd meetings, held on 12 and 19 October 1966, considered a report by the Secretary-General (see appendix) on the information which had been transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter up to 18 October 1966 and on the action which had been taken in implementation of General Assembly resolution 1970 (XVIII).

6. At the 472nd meeting, the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that the Special Committee was once again obliged to note the fact that the fascist Government of Portugal had transmitted no information on the Territories under its administration. No condemnation could be too strong for a Government which constantly made mock of the rules recognized by the entire international community. It was common knowledge that the Portuguese Government was engaged in carrying out a policy of extermination in the Territories under its administration. The atrocities committed in those Territories were now beyond number, and members of the Committee had been able to see for themselves their full horror in the films exhibited for their benefit during their stay at Algiers. The ultimate goal of the war being waged in the Territories in question was to enable Portugal to exploit all their resources to the point of exhaustion, if necessary; and in that process of exploitation Portugal was calling on the services of foreign companies and financial groups. In that intolerable situation it was more than ever necessary that the General Assembly should be presented with information on the Territories administered by Portugal—information which the administering Power was anxious at all costs to conceal from the eyes of the world. At a moment when the machinations of the monopolies were more than ever being concealed behind the cloak of Portuguese policy, it was important that they should be exposed.

7. The report by the Secretary-General also showed that other administering Powers had failed to communicate to the United Nations all the information expected of them. For example, New Zealand had provided no information for the year ended March 1966, and the Special Committee should therefore request it to carry out its obligations as promptly as possible. The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland had transmitted no information on Southern Rhodesia; doubtless it proposed to provide no clarification of the situation in that Territory. The United Kingdom's entire attitude in the Southern Rhodesian question, in any event, confirmed that its sole purpose was to mislead world opinion, for while proclaiming its intention to take action against the Ian Smith régime it was in fact carrying on discussions with the representatives of that régime as between equals. That attitude of defiance, which had long since become intolerable, called for energetic action, and the Committee should insist on the United Kingdom Government's transmitting information on Southern Rhodesia.

* Previously issued under the symbol A/6300/Add.10.

8. The information transmitted by the United States of America related solely to the year 1964. Yet it had been reported in the Press in late September 1966 that one of the United States Samoan Islands was to be transformed into a "tourist paradise". From the reports published in the Press, the truth seemed to be that the planned improvements served the interests of the tourists alone, and in no way those of the indigenous inhabitants.

9. Generally speaking, the information on the Non-Self-Governing Territories was most unsatisfactory, being either fragmentary or insufficiently complete. The delegation of the United Republic of Tanzania therefore considered that an effort should be made without delay to improve its quality.

10. At the 473rd meeting, the Chairman drew attention to a letter dated 18 October 1966 addressed to him by the Permanent Representative of New Zealand to the United Nations, copies of which had been made available to members. In the letter, the Permanent Representative of New Zealand stated that his Government took most seriously the obligation to provide full information on the Territories under its administration, and expressed regret that a member of the Special Committee had been moved to express criticism of his Government's execution of that important obligation. The Permanent Representative of New Zealand also stated that advance copies of the reports for the year ended 31 March 1966 had been formally transmitted to the Secretary-General a few days earlier. As the detailed information required by General Assembly resolution 551 (VI) took months to gather, it was difficult for an administering Power to furnish such information any earlier than his Government had done. Furthermore, his delegation had previously made available directly to Sub-Committee II comprehensive information on the Territories under New Zealand administration, which, in his view was more directly useful to the Committee than the statistical material called for under resolution 551 (VI).

11. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania, supported by the representative of Syria, said that some administering Powers had transmitted information so late that the effect was as though they had not supplied the information, since the delay prevented the Special Committee from studying it and using it for its report. One administering Power, for example, had transmitted its information on 14 October. If the information was not submitted at the proper time, the Committee could hardly give it more than routine consideration, which did not further the cause of decolonization.

12. The representative of India noted that paragraph 3 of the Secretary-General's report pointed out that two Powers had not complied with Article 73 e of the Charter or with the relevant General Assembly resolutions; no information had been transmitted on the Territories under Portuguese administration or on Southern Rhodesia.

13. Portugal's attitude, in holding that those Territories were a part of the metropolitan country, despite their distance from that country and despite General Assembly resolution 1542 (XV), which established that they were Non-Self-Governing Territories, should be condemned.

14. The United Kingdom's position on Southern Rhodesia was regrettable; however plausible it might seem to affirm that the Territory had been self-governing since 1923, that position was not acceptable to India or to the majority in the United Nations. General Assembly resolution 1747 (XVI) specified that Southern Rhodesia was a Non-Self-Governing Territory and that information on it should be transmitted in accordance with the Charter. The argument that the United Kingdom could not intervene in that Territory was indefensible since the unilateral declaration of independence; the United Kingdom itself had declared that the régime in Southern Rhodesia was in a state of rebellion against the United Kingdom Government and that the Territory could not be regarded as independent. In 1965 the United Kingdom had claimed that the question of Southern Rhodesia was exclusively within its jurisdiction and now, whether it wished to or not, it was obliged to take action. It could at least comply with Article 73 e of the Charter.

15. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics supported the representatives of the United Republic of Tanzania and India with regard to the transmission of information by Portugal and the United Kingdom. Moreover, the information transmitted by the administering Power was not sufficient to throw light on the actual situation in colonial territories. He repeated a request made the previous year by his delegation to the effect that the Secretariat should obtain from other sources information which the administering Powers failed to supply, in order to provide a more complete picture which would permit more thorough consideration and make it possible to prepare specific statements on the situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration.

16. The representative of Mali considered that Portugal should be condemned for not sending information on the Territories under its administration. Although such information as it might supply would be of only relative value, since its days as an administering Power were numbered, it should nevertheless comply with the Charter.

17. The United Kingdom Prime Minister did not recognize the unilaterally proclaimed independence of Southern Rhodesia and properly termed it illegal. That being the case, Article 73 of the Charter continued to be applicable, but the United Kingdom did not transmit information. The United Kingdom must decide whether Southern Rhodesia was a colony or whether, on the contrary, its régime was legal, as it seemed to admit by conducting secret negotiations with it.

18. The representative of Bulgaria said that the majority in the Special Committee shared the Tanzanian representative's view regarding the delay in the transmission of information. That situation was inadmissible, particularly since the information was also frequently incomplete, as the representative of the USSR had pointed out.

19. It was surprising that no information was supplied on Southern Rhodesia, which not only the Committee but also the General Assembly regarded as a matter of serious concern.

20. Information on American Samoa for 1964 had been transmitted only on 4 February 1966, so that the Committee did not have complete and timely data to assist it in its deliberations. It was to be hoped that the Committee would take a stronger stand in the future so that the administering Powers might be induced to heed its views.

21. The representative of the United States of America, referring to the efforts of the Tanzanian delegate at the preceding meeting to suggest that there was something sinister in reported plans to develop tourism in American Samoa by establishing a park and constructing a tourist hotel, said that some of these allegations were too far-fetched to call for a response. The development of tourism was a significant aspect of economic policy in many areas of the world today, both non-self-governing and independent. The inference made at the preceding meeting was probably as puzzling to other members of the Special Committee as it was to his delegation.

22. The series of articles from which an excerpt was quoted was interesting and informative, and he commended it to the attention of anyone interested in American Samoa. With respect to the allegation that the projected investments in tourism would not benefit the indigenous inhabitants, he quoted from an article from the same series which stated that the United States policy of keeping American Samoa for the Samoans barred land ownership or settlement by mainland Americans and any business activity by outsiders in which Samoans would not have major participation. The Tanzanian delegate's analysis of this series of articles was quite incomplete and this aspect of United States policy seemed to have escaped his notice.

23. With regard to the providing of up-to-date information, he said that the current report on American Samoa was in preparation but that much of the substance had already been conveyed to the Committee in the detailed statements in Sub-Committee II. There was no intention, as the delegate from Tanzania seemed to be suggesting, to withhold information. Such a policy would be impossible, since American Samoa was wide open to regular factual reporting by the Press.

24. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania, referring to a letter from the Permanent Representative of New Zealand to the United Nations which had been made available informally to the members of the Committee, said that it was absolutely essential for information on Non-Self-Governing Territories to reach the United Nations early enough for it to be used in discussion on the respective items. The explanation New Zealand gave in the letter in question was unacceptable and inappropriate. The tone of the United States representative's comments was inappropriate; the information on American Samoa for 1964 had not arrived until February 1966, and the information for 1965 had still not arrived. That was no way to co-operate with the United Nations, and he hoped that the matter would be brought to the General Assembly's attention.

25. The Chairman agreed with the representative of Tanzania about the statements in the letter and added that, contrary to the implication contained in the New Zealand representative's letter, it was not for the administering Power to decide what kind of information was most useful.

26. The representatives of Syria and Iraq shared the Tanzanian representative's views concerning the attitude expressed in the New Zealand representative's letter. In their opinion it should not be allowed to pass without criticism.

27. The representative of Australia said that New Zealand should be invited to take part in the discussion, if it desired to do so.

28. The Chairman stated that, according to its procedure, the Special Committee could not comply with that suggestion, since it had not received any request from New Zealand.

29. The representative of Chile pointed out that delays in transmitting information made the Secretariat's work more difficult. It was regrettable that Portugal was not transmitting any information at all and that, in addition, the United Kingdom was not transmitting information on Southern Rhodesia, which was undoubtedly still a colony.

30. The Chairman suggested that, if there were no objections, the Special Committee should take note of the Secretary-General's report and include it in its report to the General Assembly.

31. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania thought that mention should be made of some of the fears which had been expressed about the lateness or incompleteness of information.

32. The representative of Tunisia, supported by the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, said that his delegation's primary concern was that the Special Committee should receive information as to the date when the administering Power intended to carry out the transfer of powers requested in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), paragraph 5. He was in general agreement with those who had already spoken of the lack of co-operation on the part of the administering Powers and he supported the Chairman's suggestion, with the addition proposed by the representative of Tanzania. He asked the Chairman to suggest a text which would command a consensus in the Committee.

33. The Chairman suggested a text whereby the Special Committee would take note of the report of the Secretary-General and also of the fact that some administering Powers have transmitted information under Article 73 e. At the same time it would deplore the fact that other administering Powers had not done so or had done so insufficiently or too late.

34. The representatives of Mali and the United Republic of Tanzania suggested that the lack of co-operation on the part of certain administering Powers should be brought to the General Assembly's attention and that the administering Powers should be asked to say when they intended to grant independence to their colonies.

35. The representative of Uruguay, supported by the representative of India, agreed with the text the Chairman had suggested. He also agreed with the representatives of Mali and Tanzania, but said that the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) was much too important a question to be confused with the question of the transmission of information.

36. The representative of the United Kingdom said that his delegation could not support that text since it could not be divorced from the preceding discussion and the United Kingdom was one of the administering Powers to which it might appear to refer. Moreover, he could not agree with many statements made during the debate, especially some of the references to the New Zealand letter. In addition, it was for the administering Power to decide when and how much information on Non-Self-Governing Territories was to be transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter. It was not the case that the United Kingdom Government had failed to transmit information or that the information was inadequate or late.

37. The representative of the United States of America reserved his delegation's position on the text the Chairman had suggested.

38. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics pointed out that the consensus indicated in the Chairman's suggested text did not in fact exist among the members of the Special Committee, since some delegations had expressed differing views and others had entered reservations. Therefore, if the Committee wished to reach a consensus, it should pursue its examination of the question further.

39. The representative of Tunisia observed that the reservations made the consensus text quite valueless.

40. The representative of Mali thought it astonishing that some administering Powers were refusing to comply with the provisions of Article 73 e of the Charter, which they themselves had helped to draft.

41. The representative of Australia agreed with the United Kingdom representative that it was for the administering Powers to decide when they were to send the information requested.

42. At its 473rd meeting, on 19 October 1966, the Special Committee decided without objection to adopt the text suggested by the Chairman as representing the consensus in the Committee, it being understood that the comments made by representatives would be included in the record of the meeting. The text adopted by the Committee reads as follows:

"The Special Committee takes note of the report of the Secretary-General. The Special Committee also takes note of the fact that some administering Powers have transmitted information under Article 73 e of the Charter, and deplores the fact that other administering Powers have not done so, or have done so insufficiently or too late."

43. The Committee further decided to include the report of the Secretary-General in its report to the General Assembly. This document appears as an appendix to the present chapter.

44. At the same meeting, the Special Committee decided, without objection, to transmit to the General Assembly the information contained in the working papers prepared by the Secretariat on the Territories which it might be unable to consider before the closing of its meetings in 1966. This information is included in separate chapters of the present report.

APPENDIX

[A/AC.109/203 and Add.1]

Information on non-self-governing Territories transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations: report of the Secretary-General

TRANSMISSION OF INFORMATION UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER

1. The Secretary-General's previous report on this subject (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. XXVI, appendix), listed the dates on which information was transmitted to the Secretary-General under Article 73 e of the Charter up to 7 September 1965. The table at the end of the present report shows the dates on which such information was transmitted in respect of the years 1964 and 1965.

2. The information transmitted under Article 73 e follows in general the standard form approved by the General Assembly and includes information on geography, history, population, economic, social and educational conditions. In the case of Territories under the administration of Australia, New Zealand and the United States of America, the annual reports of the matters, were transmitted. Additional information on political and constitutional developments in Territories under their administration was also given by the representatives of Australia, New Zealand, Spain, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America during meetings of the Special Committee.

3. No information has been transmitted to the Secretary-General concerning Territories under Portuguese administration, which, by resolution 1542 (XV) of 15 December 1960, the General Assembly considered were Non-Self-Governing Territories within the meaning of Chapter XI of the Charter. Nor has the Secretary-General received information concerning Southern Rhodesia which, the Assembly affirmed by resolution 1747 (XVI) of 28 June 1962, was a Non-Self-Governing Territory within the meaning of Chapter XI of the Charter.

STUDY OF INFORMATION TRANSMITTED UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER

4. In compliance with the provisions of operative paragraph 5 of General Assembly resolution 1970 (XVIII) of 16 December 1963 and operative paragraph 4 of resolution 2109 (XX) of 21 December 1965, which requested the Special Committee to study the information transmitted under Article 73 e, and in accordance with the procedure approved by the Special Committee in 1964, the Secretariat has continued to use the information transmitted in the preparation of working papers on each Territory for the Special Committee.
