CHAPTER I*

ESTABLISHMENT, ORGANIZATION AND ACTIVITIES OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

A. ESTABLISHMENT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

1. The General Assembly, at its fifteenth session, by resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960, adopted

* Previously issued under the symbol A/6300 (part I).

the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

2. At its sixteenth session, the General Assembly considered the situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and adopted resolution 1654 (XVI) of 27 November 1961, by which it established a Special Committee of seventeen members to examine the application of the Declaration, to make suggestions and recommendations on the progress and extent of the implementation of the Declaration, and to report to the General Assembly at its seventeenth session. The Special Committee was directed "to carry out its task by employment of all means which it will have at its disposal within the framework of the procedures and modalities which it shall adopt for the proper discharge of its functions".

3. At its seventeenth session the General Assembly, following its consideration of the report of the Special Committee,¹ adopted resolution 1810 (XVII) of 17 December 1962, by which it enlarged the Special Committee by the addition of seven new members. It invited the Special Committee "to continue to seek the most suitable ways and means for the speedy and total application of the Declaration to all territories which have not yet attained independence".

4. At the same session, the General Assembly, in its resolution 1805 (XVII) of 14 December 1962 on the question of South West Africa, requested the Special Committee to discharge, mutatis mutandis, the tasks assigned to the Special Committee for South West Africa by resolution 1702 (XVI). By resolution 1806 (XVII) of 14 December 1962, the General Assembly decided to dissolve the Special Committee for South West Africa.

5. The General Assembly, at its eighteenth session, following its consideration of the report of the Special Committee,² adopted resolution 1956 (XVIII) of 11 December 1963. In this resolution, it requested the Special Committee "to continue to seek the best ways and means for the immediate and total application of the Declaration to all territories which have not yet attained independence, and to report to the General Assembly not later than at its nineteenth session".

6. At the same session, the General Assembly, in its resolution 1899 (XVIII) of 13 November 1963 on the question of South West Africa, requested the Special Committee to continue its efforts with a view to discharging the tasks assigned to it by resolution 1805 (XVII.)

7. The General Assembly at the same session, by resolution 1970 (XVIII) of 16 December 1963, decided to dissolve the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and requested the Special Committee to study the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations. It also requested the Special Committee to take this information fully into account in examining the situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration in each of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and to undertake any special study and prepare any special report it might consider necessary.

8. At its nineteenth session, the General Assembly was unable to consider the report of the Special Committee on its work during 1964.³ The Special Committee, however, continued to discharge its mandate during 1965 in the context of the declaration made by the President at the 1330th plenary meeting of the General Assembly at its nineteenth session, on 18 February 1965, to the effect that the General Assembly should for its own official records note that reports relating, inter alia, to the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples had in fact been received and that those bodies which had continuing responsibilities such as the Special Committee should continue to function, subject to the agreed budgetary limits for 1965.

9. At its twentieth session, the General Assembly, following its consideration of the reports of the Special Committee for 1964 (A/5800/Rev.1)⁴ and 1965 (A/6000/Rev.1),⁵ adopted resolution 2105 (XX) of 20 December 1965. The text of this resolution is reproduced below:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, contained in its resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960, and its resolutions 1654 (XVI) of 27 November 1961, 1810 (XVII) of 17 December 1962 and 1956 (XVIII) of 11 December 1963,

"Recalling also its resolutions 1805 (XVII) of 14 December 1962 and 1899 (XVIII) of 13 November 1963 by which it assigned to the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples tasks relating to South West Africa, and its resolution 1970 (XVIII) of 16 December 1963 by which it entrusted to the Special Committee additional functions relating to information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations,

"Having considered the reports prepared by the Special Committee for the years 1964 (A/5800/Rev.1) and 1965 (A/6000/Rev.1),

"Noting with deep regret that five years after the adoption of the Declaration many Territories are still under colonial domination,

"Deploping the negative attitude of certain colonial Powers, and in particular the unacceptable attitude of the Governments of Portugal and South Africa, which refuse to recognize the right of colonial peoples to independence,

"Concerned about the policy of colonial Powers to circumvent the rights of colonial peoples through the promotion of the systematic influx of foreign immigrants and the dislocation, deportation and transfer of the indigenous inhabitants,

"Noting the action taken and envisaged by the Special Committee regarding the list of Territories to which the Declaration is applicable,

"Deploping further the attitude of certain States which, despite the resolutions of the General Assembly and of the Special Committee, continue to co-operate with the Governments of Portugal and South Africa and even to provide them with aid which is being used by the two Governments to intensify the repression of the oppressed African populations.

"Fully aware that the continuation of colonial rule and the practice of apartheid as well as all forms of racial discrimination threaten international peace and security and constitute a crime against humanity,

"Having adopted resolutions on specific Territories considered by the Special Committee,

"1. Reaffirms its resolutions 1514 (XV), 1654 (XVI), 1810 (XVII) and 1956 (XVIII);

"2. Notes with appreciation the work accomplished by the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and congratulates it on the efforts it has made to implement the Declaration;

"3. Approves the reports of the Special Committee and again invites the administering Powers to implement the recommendations contained therein;

"4. Deeply regrets the refusal of certain colonial Powers to co-operate with the Special Committee and their continued disregard of the resolutions of the General Assembly;

"5. Calls upon the colonial Powers to discontinue their policy of violating the rights of colonial peoples through the systematic influx of foreign immigrants and the dislocation, deportation and transfer of the indigenous inhabitants;

"6. Requests the Special Committee to continue to perform its task and to continue to seek the best means for the immediate and full application of resolution 1514 (XV) to all Territories which have not yet attained independence;

"7. Approves the programme of work envisaged by the Special Committee during 1966, including the possibility of holding a series of meetings in Africa and the sending of visiting groups to Territories, particularly in the Atlantic, Indian and Pacific Ocean areas;

"8. Requests the Special Committee to pay particular attention to the small Territories and to recommend to the General Assembly the most appropriate ways, as well as the steps to be taken, to enable the populations of the small Territories to exercise fully their right to self-determination and independence;

"9. Requests the Special Committee, whenever it considers it appropriate, to recommend a deadline for the accession to independence of each Territory in accordance with the wishes of the people;

"10. Recognizes the legitimacy of the struggle by the peoples under colonial rule to exercise their right to self-determination and independence and invites all States to provide material and moral assistance to the national liberation movements in colonial Territories;

"11. Requests all States and international institutions, including the United Nations specialized agencies, to withhold assistance of any kind to the Governments of Portugal and South Africa until they renounce their policy of colonial domination and racial discrimination;

"12. Requests the colonial Powers to dismantle the military bases installed in colonial Territories and to refrain from establishing new ones;

"13. Requests the Special Committee to apprise the Security Council of developments in any Territory examined by it which may threaten international peace and security and to make suggestions which might assist the Council in considering appropriate measures under the Charter of the United Nations;

"14. Requests the Secretary-General to take all necessary measures to promote the large-scale dissemination of the Declaration and of the work of the Special Committee, in order that world opinion may be sufficiently informed of the serious threat to peace posed by colonialism and apartheid, and calls upon all administering Powers to co-operate with the Secretary-General in his efforts;

"15. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to provide the Special Committee with all the facilities and personnel necessary for the implementation of its mandate."

10. At the same session, the General Assembly adopted a number of other resolutions assigning certain specific tasks to the Special Committee. Among these were the following resolutions concerning the items indicated:

B. OPENING OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE'S MEETINGS IN 1966

13. The first meeting of the Special Committee in 1966 (394th meeting), held on 8 March, was opened by the Secretary-General.

Opening statement by the Secretary-General

14. The Secretary-General welcomed the members of the Special Committee and particularly the newest member, the delegation of Afghanistan.

15. In the introduction to his last annual report on the work of the organization,⁷ he had observed that, while there had been a few positive developments, the major problems in the field of decolonization had remained without any positive movement towards peaceful solution. At the twentieth session of the General Assembly, the majority of delegations had expressed serious concern about the continued delay in the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. Accordingly, in resolution 2105 (XX), the General Assembly had requested the Special Committee to continue to seek the best means for the immediate and full application of the Declaration to all Territories which had not yet attained independence. Inspired by the same considerations, the Fourth Committee had for the first time given separate consideration not only to the more difficult colonial problems but to most of the Territories with which the Special Committee had been concerned. Consequently the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fourth Committee, had been able to adopt specific resolutions concerning individual Territories, which had outlined the particular direction, emphasis and action required in each case for the implementation of the Declaration.

16. In his note of 11 February 1966 (A/AC.109/L.260), he had drawn attention to the resolutions adopted by the Assembly at its twentieth session which concerned the work of the Special Committee. He had also made available a note (A/AC.109/L.261) drawing attention to specific points which members would wish to take into account in drawing up the programme of work for 1966.

17. The main problems before the Special Committee had not become more tractable. In particular, the situation in Southern Rhodesia was increasing the grave disquiet already felt by Member States. It might be appropriate to recall recent official statements by the United Kingdom Government to the effect that it would continue to seek a speedy end to the rebellion in the Territory and to help the people of Southern Rhodesia in making a fresh start towards majority rule and the establishment of a just society without discrimination. It was to be hoped that rapid progress would be registered in that regard and that, in conformity with the pertinent United Nations resolutions, the United Kingdom Government would without delay take the necessary measures to enable the people of Southern Rhodesia to determine their own future in accordance with the objectives of the Declaration.

18. With regard to the Territories under Portuguese administration, the Government of Portugal had maintained its disregard of the relevant United Nations resolutions. It had failed to give effect to the principle of self-determination as laid down in those resolutions and there was no sign of a reversal of its policy of political and economic integration of the Territories with Portugal. The situation in those Territories, which the Security Council had described as a serious disturbance of international peace and security, was one to which the Special Committee would probably wish to devote continued attention.

⁷ Ibid., Twentieth Session, Supplement No. 1 A.

19. The refusal of the South African Government to implement the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Special Committee concerning South West Africa were also a matter for serious concern. Far from discontinuing its policy of apartheid, the South African Government seemed to be taking various steps for the further implementation of that policy, including measures for the establishment of non-European "homelands". That grave situation would no doubt be the subject of consideration by the Special Committee in the light of current developments.

20. In resolution 2063 (XX), the General Assembly had requested the Special Committee to consider, in co-operation with the Secretary-General, what measures were necessary for securing the territorial integrity and sovereignty of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland. In transmitting the General Assembly resolution to Governments, he had requested information on the extent to which they would be prepared to make contributions towards the Fund for the economic development of those Territories. The Fund had been the subject of one of the recommendations which he had submitted in 1965 and which had been endorsed by the Special Committee and the General Assembly. A positive response from Governments would be a constructive step towards the achievement of the objectives sought by the Special Committee and the General Assembly.

21. The General Assembly had also requested the Special Committee to pay particular attention to the smaller Territories. Adequate information on the political, economic and social situation in those Territories and on the opinions, wishes and aspirations of the people would facilitate that task. In that connexion, the Special Committee's intention to use visiting groups, which had been endorsed by the General Assembly, was especially relevant.

22. The work of the Special Committee in 1966 would be unusually onerous and the programme of meetings correspondingly heavy. For that reason, he wished to draw attention to General Assembly resolution 2116 (XX) on the pattern of conferences and to express the hope that, in drawing up its programme of work, the Committee would appreciate the need for rational planning to facilitate the provision of the required technical and substantive support.

23. He offered good wishes for the success of the Committee's work and expressed his confidence that it would make a further constructive contribution to the implementation of the Declaration in conditions of peace and harmony. It was to be hoped that the Special Committee would receive all necessary co-operation from the administering Powers concerned.

Statement by members

24. The representative of Mali thanked the Secretary-General for having come in person to open the Committee's first meeting in 1966. His statement would be a source of inspiration to the members of the Committee, who saw in him an ardent defender of freedom and justice, tireless in his efforts to ensure respect for the rights of the oppressed peoples.

25. The Special Committee was beginning its meetings at a very troubled time. The international situation was marked by grave crises which might at any moment degenerate into a world conflict. The basic causes of those crises were the numerous violations of the right to self-determination and the numerous foreign interventions in the domestic affairs of other countries. While the people still under colonial domination were waging national liberation struggles against the colonial forces, the newly independent countries were subjected to an increasingly strenuous onslaught from imperialism and neo-colonialism. The determination of the colonial and neo-colonial Powers to preserve their political and economic domination was a serious violation of the United Nations Charter, which included important provisions on the right to self-determination. The Special Committee should work unrelentingly to ensure that colonial peoples could fully exercise their right to independence and self-determination and should unflinchingly denounce the abuses of the colonial Powers.

26. The representative of Afghanistan said that his country regarded membership of the Special Committee as a privilege and an honour. Afghanistan, which had shown whole-hearted support for the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, had always given full approval to the recommendations of the Special Committee. Its devotion to the cause of the abolition of colonialism in all its forms and manifestations was a matter of recorded history. Afghanistan had been the first country in Asia to oppose colonialism from the moment of its appearance. At the cost of untold sacrifices, it had waged a struggle against colonialism and had finally been able to stand among the peoples and nations of the world as a champion of the cause which was enshrined in the mind of man and the conscience of humanity and had been reflected in the Declaration. It was in that spirit that Afghanistan would co-operate fully in the Special Committee in efforts to achieve justice and equality among all nations and peoples. The foremost desire of Afghanistan was that all peoples and nations should achieve their goals and fulfil their aspirations through understanding and by peaceful means.

27. The representative of Ethiopia expressed his delegation's appreciation of the wise statement by the Secretary-General, which would help and guide the Committee in its work. His delegation was convinced that, although certain racist minorities were still bent on the futile course of trying to reverse the inexorable tide of history, the Committee would remain firm in the discharge of its duties until all the colonial peoples were emancipated and colonial domination had been replaced by freedom and independence.

28. The representative of Uruguay, speaking on behalf of the Latin American countries, which were represented on the Committee by his own delegation and those of Chile and Venezuela, said that the Latin American countries had not always been staunch advocates of law, democracy and freedom but had unswervingly supported the principles upheld by the Committee in its efforts to liberate the oppressed peoples and to eradicate colonialism, so that the rule of law and freedom might be the guiding principle of coexistence between men and nations.

29. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania thanked the Secretary-General for the wise words he had spoken and stated that the United Republic of Tanzania had always appreciated the value of the Committee, for it would not consider that its own independence had been totally achieved until every African in the continent could breathe the air of freedom. His country looked forward eagerly to the day when all those now under the colonial yoke would have achieved independence. Its policies with regard to the evils of colonialism were well defined and it would never deviate from them. His delegation would work untiringly in the cause of decolonization and would co-operate with all those who were striving to eradicate colonialism and thus to complete the task of the Committee at an early date.

30. The representative of the Ivory Coast said that, as the Secretary-General had stressed in his heartening words to the Committee, the task that the General Assembly had assigned to the Committee was one of great magnitude. He was sure that all the members of the Committee would approach that task with the same feelings with which they had always been animated and which had been so well understood by the outgoing officers, whose work had been highly appreciated by his delegation.

31. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics expressed his delegation's gratitude to the Secretary-General for the unflagging interest he had shown in the work of the Committee. The Secretary-General's statement at the present meeting and the support which he gave the Special Committee would undoubtedly be a source of inspiration to its members to do everything possible within the framework of the United Nations to implement the lofty ideals of the Charter of the United Nations and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. He welcomed the delegation of Afghanistan as a new member of the Committee and expressed the conviction that Afghanistan, a country whose untiring efforts in the struggle against the forces of colonialism were well known, would make a valuable contribution to the common efforts to bring about the rapid elimination of the remaining colonial régimes.

Election of officers

32. At its 394th meeting, on 8 March 1966, the Special Committee unanimously elected the following officers:

Chairmen: Mr. Gershon Collier (Sierra Leone)

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. José Piñera (Chile) and Mr. John Malecela (United Republic of Tanzania)

Rapporteur: Mr. Ala'uddin Aljubouri (Iraq)

Statement by the Chairman

33. The Chairman thanked the members of the Special Committee for the high honour conferred upon his country and his person. He hoped to be able to guide the work of the Committee into productive channels along the lines already laid down by his illustrious predecessor.

34. He also wished to express to the Secretary-General the Committee's gratitude for his having attended the meeting and having made a comprehensive statement on the work and problems of the Committee.

35. The Special Committee had made a remarkable contribution to the process of decolonization throughout the world. Its visit to Africa in 1965 had brought its work nearer to those peoples of Africa who were still suffering under colonial rule and had given publicity to its work. Since millions of people were still struggling for equality and dignity, the Committee should pursue its mandate with increased vigour. It should extend its activities outside New York to reach the victims of colonialism all over the world and particularly in Africa. Only if co-operation was displayed by all members would the Committee's work reflect a real consensus of United Nations thinking and demonstrate that the Organization was totally committed to the eradication of colonialism. The efforts of the Special Committee would do much to uphold the rule of law and would make a worthy contribution to the ennoblement of the United Nations as the real conscience of the international community.

Statement by the outgoing Chairman

36. Mr. Sori Coulibaly (Mali) speaking as the outgoing Chairman, stated that the progress of decolonization was slow, not because the Committee had spared any effort, but because there were men and Governments that did not believe in the equality of peoples and continued to violate the principles of the Charter. Governments, imperialist companies and men who lived by exploiting others preferred to ignore all humanitarian principles and derive super-profits at the price of the blood and sweat of the patriots of Angola, Mozambique, so-called Portuguese Guinea, South West Africa, Southern Rhodesia, South Africa and elsewhere. The Government of Portugal was murdering and torturing Africans in order to maintain the privileges which kept alive a backward metropolitan country incapable of adaptation. In South Africa and South West Africa, apartheid and a police régime were maintaining a white population in opulence while the Africans were herded into reservations on the soil of their ancestors. In Southern Rhodesia, a white racist minority had proclaimed the independence of the Territory in order to perpetuate its domination over almost 4½ million Africans.

37. The persistence of those anachronistic situations was a threat to international peace and security and a challenge to the United Nations and the Special Committee. The Committee would have an important place in the history of the struggle against injustice, exploitation and humiliation. Colonialism and apartheid should be liquidated as soon as possible, because they were a disgrace to mankind. At a time when man was liberating himself from the laws of gravity and walking in outer space, colonial domination and apartheid were paradoxical, unjust, humiliating and abhorrent. The colonial peoples, which suffered not only from exploitation but also from humiliation, placed great hopes in the Committee. The Committee should go to their countries, live their tragic life and tell the world about them. It should forcefully fight the colonial Powers and exert effective pressure on all States which gave assistance to those Powers as were responsible for the arbitrary activities of the racist minorities illegally in power in certain colonial or semi-colonial territories. The delegation of Afghanistan would no doubt make an important contribution to the work of the Committee.

38. He expressed gratitude to all his friends and colleagues for their confidence and understanding and to the Under-Secretary and the other members of the Secretariat for their assistance. The tributes paid to him by the members of the Committee had shown that the differences of opinion which had from time to time arisen had not affected the deep feelings of friendship and respect which bound them together.

C. ORGANIZATION OF WORK

39. The Special Committee discussed the organization of its work for the year at its 394th, 395th to 397th and 399th meetings, at which general statements were made by members.

Statements by members

40. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated that the Committee should adopt procedures that would enable it to move forward towards achieving the goal proclaimed in the Charter and in the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, namely that of guaranteeing to all peoples, large and small, the right to self-determination and independence. While a decisive part in the struggle for the definitive elimination of colonial régimes would, of course, be played by the peoples themselves, with the support given to them by many States which had adopted an anti-colonialist policy, the Government of the Soviet Union considered that the United Nations, which was the most comprehensive international forum, could and should play a useful role in that struggle.

41. The adoption in 1960 of the United Nations Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, the decisions of the twentieth session of the General Assembly recognizing the legality of the struggle of the peoples for freedom and independence, the appeal by the General Assembly to all States to provide moral and material assistance in that struggle, and the condemnation of colonialism in all its manifestations as a crime against humanity and a threat to peace and security had proved to be of substantial political support in the people's fight to throw off the colonial yoke.

42. The Special Committee had a special role to play in the anti-colonialist struggle by unmasking the colonialists and drawing attention to the situation in colonial territories. In his opinion, the Committee had been right the previous year to decide, on the initiative of the Afro-Asian and socialist States, to hold a series of meetings on African countries. Those meetings had produced positive results; they had enabled the Committee to enlist the participation in its work of many representatives of national liberation movements in African colonies, to work out and adopt more effective provisions which had formed the basis for the decisions of the twentieth session of the General Assembly, to establish contact with the Organization of African Unity and to strengthen the unity of those countries which supported the rapid elimination of the remaining colonial régimes. The experiment should certainly be continued and, in accordance with paragraph 7 of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX), the Committee should decide to hold a session in Africa in the current year.

43. His delegation had supported that resolution and continued to think that a further session in Africa was essential and would be of great value. At its meetings in Africa the Committee would be able to make a comprehensive examination of the progress made in the implementation of the decisions of the General Assembly, the Security Council and the Committee itself on such important questions as Southern Rhodesia, the Portuguese colonies, South West Africa and other matters connected with the elimination of colonial régimes in Africa. It would also be able to give its views on the action which should be taken by the General Assembly and the Security Council to compel the colonialists to comply with United Nations decisions on those issues.

44. The Soviet Union delegation welcomed the invitation extended to the Special Committee by the Government of Tanzania to visit Dar es Salaam in 1966 and to hold some of its meetings in Africa in close proximity to the places where Africans were waging a struggle for liberation from the colonialist yoke. His delegation would also like to express its support for the idea put forward by several delegations during the Committee's session in Africa that the Security Council should hold a session in Africa to consider the situation in Southern Rhodesia and the Portuguese colonies and to examine the policy of apartheid pursued by the Government of the Republic of South Africa in South Africa and in South West Africa. Such a session would enable the representatives of African countries and the leaders of the national liberation movements to participate in the work of the Council with a view to working out specific measures, in accordance with the Charter, to ensure the implementation of the decisions adopted by the Security Council and other United Nations organs. It would also make it possible to co-ordinate the work of the Security Council and the Organization of African Unity on those questions.

45. During the twentieth session of the General Assembly, the representatives of a number of national and patriotic organizations in South West Africa, as well as the overwhelming majority of the Members of the United Nations, had resolutely condemned the policy pursued by the racist Verwoerd régime in respect of South West Africa and had called for the unconditional implementation of United Nations resolutions concerning that Territory. In particular, many delegations had favoured the adoption by the United Nations of a decision to terminate South Africa's Mandate over South West Africa and to take specific steps to transfer power in the Territory to the legitimate representatives of the people. The Soviet Union delegation entirely shared the views of those delegations. The examination by the Special Committee and the General Assembly of the situation in South West Africa had shown that the Government of South Africa was using the Mandate to serve the interests of international monopolies and to further its annexationist policy in respect of that Territory.

46. In his opinion, the Special Committee would be perfectly justified in pronouncing itself unequivocally in favour of withdrawing the Mandate for South West Africa from the Republic of South Africa and recommending to the General Assembly and the Security Council the adoption of appropriate decisions on the subject. His delegation shared the view held by some Members of the United Nations that a special session of the General Assembly should be convened as soon as the International Court of Justice had completed its proceedings in the case of South West Africa, to consider the question of terminating South Africa's Mandate and of making appropriate recommendations to the Security Council so that the latter could take the necessary action.

47. It was well known that the colonial Powers had recourse to all kinds of manoeuvres to block the implementation of United Nations decisions, in order to preserve their rule in the Territories under their control. They resorted to various kinds of constitutional devices, bribery and conspiracy; they left people to rot in prison; they killed thousands of freedom-fighters and prohibited the activities of patriotic and nationalist parties and organizations. Where those methods of persecution and terror failed to produce the desired results, the colonialists resorted to overt forms of military oppression, using the most modern means of destruction, including napalm bombs and toxic substances. They interfered in the internal affairs of other States and imposed systems that protected the interests of the imperialist monopolies. It was obvious that, in the face of those colonialist intrigues, the United Nations and all States must take new and resolute steps to bring about the final elimination of the remnants of the colonial system.

48. His delegation therefore considered that at the present stage of the Committee's work primary attention should be given to ensuring the implementation by the colonial Powers of the decisions adopted by the General Assembly at its twentieth session by the Security Council in regard to the granting of independence to Southern Rhodesia, the Portuguese colonies of Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea, South West Africa, Aden and the entire southern part of the Arabian peninsula. His delegation shared the view expressed by a number of delegations at the twentieth session of the General Assembly that the Committee should seriously examine the question of setting specific dates for the granting of independence to colonial Territories in accordance with the wishes of the peoples. If the colonialists refused to carry out such decisions and failed to grant independence by the date specified, they should be declared aggressors and measures such as those provided in Chapter VII of the Charter should be enacted against them.

49. During the discussion of the report of the Special Committee at the twentieth session of the General Assembly, considerable attention had been devoted to the unsatisfactory situation regarding the implementation of the principles of the Declaration in respect of the smaller colonial Territories. It had been suggested that, in view of the inadequate information available regarding those Territories, visiting groups should be sent to them to establish direct contact with the people and their representatives. That legitimate request of the General Assembly should be fulfilled. If the colonial Powers were really in favour of the self-determination of peoples, they should abandon their position of refusing to allow representatives of the Special Committee to visit those Territories.

50. The General Assembly had adopted a number of important decisions on the consequences of the activities of foreign monopolies in colonial Territories, the liquidation of military bases in those Territories and the withholding of any economic, financial or technical assistance by the specialized agencies of the United Nations, particularly the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund, to the Governments of Portugal, the Republic of South Africa and the authorities of the white settler Government in Southern Rhodesia. The discussions in the Special Committee had shown clearly the harmful effects of the activities of the international monopolies and of the presence of military bases in those Territories and the danger which they represented for the cause of the liberation of peoples from colonial oppression. The Committee must do everything in its power to ensure that the decisions which the General Assembly had adopted on those questions were carried out and must call on the colonial Powers to provide it with all relevant information on the progress made in giving effect to those decisions.

51. The Committee should not be content to have submitted to the General Assembly its report on the implications of the activities of foreign monopolies in South West Africa and the Portuguese Territories; it should pursue, in co-operation with the Secretary-General, the study of that problem in respect of those Territories and in respect of Southern Rhodesia.

52. With regard to military bases in colonial Territories, the Committee in co-operation with the Secretary-General, should study the question of the harmful influence of such bases on the cause of the liberation of the peoples of those Territories from colonial oppression and should make recommendations to the General Assembly and the Security Council.

53. In addition, the Chairman or the officers of the Committee should establish direct contact with the specialized agencies and request them to submit information on the action taken or envisaged with a view to implementing the United Nations recommendations concerning the cessation of economic, financial and technical assistance to Portugal, the Republic of South Africa and the white settler Government in Southern Rhodesia.

54. The Special Committee might take the initiative in drawing the attention of other United Nations bodies, in particular the Social Commission and the Commission on the Status of Women, to aspects of the criminal policies of the colonialists which came within the competence of those bodies. He recalled that, on the initiative of the Special Committee, the question of the flagrant violation of human rights in colonial Territories had been included as an important and urgent matter in the provisional agenda of the twenty-second session of the Commission and he hoped that such co-operation among United Nations organs would be continued.

55. In the post-war period, the national liberation movement had dealt a crushing blow to the colonial system of imperialism, oppression and enslavement and dozens of newly independent countries had been built upon the ruins of the old colonialist world. The last vestiges of the colonial system were crumbling but the colonialists continued to offer stubborn resistance and to do everything possible to maintain their domination. It was the duty of the United Nations and of the Special Committee to help the peoples who were fighting for their liberation and to do their utmost to ensure the implementation of the principles of the Charter and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. The Soviet Union Government's position in that regard was in complete accord with the purposes and principles of the Declaration and his delegation was prepared to co-operate closely with all delegations which supported anti-colonialism.

56. In conclusion, he informed the Committee that the previous day the Soviet Union Government had become one of the first nine countries to sign the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination.

57. The representative of Italy stated that his delegation was facing the new session of the Special Committee in the firm conviction that the Committee was contributing to an important task, namely, the transformation of the society of nations from an old structure into a new order in which there would be freedom and equal opportunities for all nations, under the rule of law. Although that transformation had already been accomplished to a great extent, the Committee was still called upon to secure the disappearance from the face of the earth of the remnants of colonialism and to ensure that that change was brought about by peaceful means, through the process of self-determination. The General Assembly had requested the Committee to keep the problem of decolonization in the spotlight of world public opinion and at the same time to study all the details and complexities—political, economic, social, cultural—that had prevented the speedy attainment of independence by a considerable number of Territories still under consideration. He was referring in particular to the subject of small Territories, which was on the agenda and for which his delegation would suggest a high degree of priority.

58. His delegation firmly believed in the value of the methods of conversation, negotiation, conciliation and compromise—not as far as principles were concerned, but with regard to practical measures—and favoured calling the attention of what had been rightly defined as the “world conscience” to specific problems in order to exert all due moral pressure on reluctant parties. His delegation placed great reliance on the role that the Secretary-General could play in facilitating the solution of problems arising out of colonial situations. It hoped that the Special Committee would not be a prisoner of old formulas that were applicable to conventional decolonization but which might be less valid for the special cases on the agenda.

59. The three points to be considered in the organization of the Committee's work were the agenda, the priorities and the methods of work.

60. With regard to the agenda, the resolutions on the subject of decolonization adopted by the General Assembly at its twentieth session gave a clear picture of the work required of the Committee. The papers prepared by the Secretariat (A/AC.109/L.260 and L.261) were also useful and he suggested that document A/AC.109/L.261 could be regarded as the provisional agenda for 1966.

61. With regard to priorities, his delegation regarded all colonial problems as urgent and would accept any recommendation agreeable to the majority of members. He hoped that the Committee would give adequate priority to the problem of so-called small Territories, which were particularly complex and required special attention.

62. As far as methods of work were concerned, the Committee should take a preliminary position on a number of important questions. The first was whether in the weeks to come and in its report to the General Assembly the Committee should consider all or only some of the territories listed in document A/AC.109/L.261. His delegation favoured consideration of them all; whichever policy was adopted, however, it was essential to adhere to it and not change it in mid-session.

63. The second question was whether resolutions should be based on debates held in plenary meetings or on sub-committee discussions and reports to the full Committee. His delegation favoured the sub-committee method, which had proved successful in the preparation of a large part of the Committee's 1965 report.

64. Lastly, the question of a time-table was more urgent than usual, in view of the provisions of General Assembly resolution 2116 (XX) on the pattern of conferences.

65. His delegation appreciated the reasons which had prompted four Member States to invite the Committee to hold part of its 1966 session in their respective capitals, but it felt that a decision on the matter could be taken only after careful consideration of the organizational problems he had outlined. Preliminary consideration of those problems could be referred, as in the past, to an expanded working group consisting of the officers of the Committee and four other members, but it would be necessary to hear the views of as many Committee members as possible before the working group was actually convened.

66. The representative of Yugoslavia said that the problems before the Committee were as difficult as ever. Certain colonial Powers, supported by others with identical interests, were doing their utmost to retain their influence in the Territories under colonial rule, to suppress national liberation movements and to halt progressive processes on a wider scale. Such a situation was an evident danger to peace and security, as had been recognized by the great majority of the representatives who had spoken at the twentieth session of the General Assembly.

67. The Committee's session in Africa in 1965 had been of great value. Such visits and contacts with petitioners enabled the members of the Committee to study the situation in certain Territories, the attitudes of the administering Powers towards the problems of the Territories and the extent to which the provisions of certain resolutions had been implemented. A further session of the Special Committee in Africa would be in keeping with the spirit of General Assembly resolution 2011 (XX) on co-operation between the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity and his delegation hoped that such co-operation would become a constant feature of the Committee's activities.

68. He hoped that in preparing the Committee's programme the Working Group would consider the problem of the participation of foreign capital in the economies of colonial Territories, which was closely related to the protraction of the decolonizing process.

69. The problems of so-called small Territories also were significant; visiting missions of the Special Committee to such Territories would help towards the solution of the problem.

70. His delegation regarded the problems of colonialism and peace as interdependent. It was ready to support all measures that would guarantee faster and more effective action by the Committee in speeding the process of decolonization and the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

71. The representative of India said that in the planning of the calendar of work it should be borne in mind that the Committee was beginning its session three or four weeks later than in previous years. In spite of the reduced time available, however, the Committee must follow the specific instructions of the General Assembly to keep the various Territories under discussion and to report to the Assembly at its twenty-first session.

72. He hoped that a working group to discuss the Committee's programme would be announced at the next meeting or soon after. The working group could plan which Territories would be taken up during the next three months and make recommendations concerning a possible visit to Africa, which would require a good deal of advance preparation. His delegation had always considered that it was useful for the Committee to visit Africa, for such visits gave the members a more realistic picture of the situation in the Territories.

73. The Sub-Committee on Petitions should be appointed and start functioning soon, since there were a number of petitions awaiting action. Similarly, the Committee should decide whether the three Sub-Committees on the small Territories in the Caribbean and the Atlantic Ocean, in the Indian Ocean and in the Pacific Ocean should be revived or whether their composition should be changed.

74. Lastly, there were important questions relating to the Committee's report to the General Assembly. In the past the Committee's reports had run to almost 2,000 pages each year and few people, if any, were able to read them in their entirety. In view of the financial problems and the vast amount of work entailed in the preparation and translation of such voluminous reports, he hoped that the Committee would be able to consider, in the early weeks of the session, what could be done to reduce the size of the report while preserving the right of every delegation to make known its views.

75. The representative of the United Kingdom said that in its four years of work the Special Committee had virtually completed its examination of the colonial Territories on its agenda and a large number of resolutions had been adopted by the General Assembly on the basis of the Committee's recommendations. His Government had whole-heartedly supported some points in those resolutions, had partially agreed with others and had found others unacceptable. The disagreements in the Committee had been mainly concerned with methods, since in most recent cases there was general agreement on the Committee's objectives. It had been suggested that the Committee should concentrate on seeing that the provisions of all the Assembly resolutions were carried out. He did not think that that was necessarily the right, or the only, approach. It would be more productive to examine carefully the practical problems of the various Territories and the means for overcoming them. This required steady and detailed work, not necessarily by resolution but perhaps more by consensus. The special difficulties and characteristics of each Territory should be considered in greater depth, and perhaps in a more objective manner, than during the first general examination.

76. His Government bore the responsibility for the administration of United Kingdom Territories and for their progress to full self-government and self-determination, but it fully recognized the interest of the international community in those matters and had always willingly co-operated with the Committee in its work. That co-operation would be continued in the future, for the United Kingdom objectives were the same as those often endorsed by the Committee, namely, self-determination, decolonization at all practicable speed, and urgent help to the colonial peoples to enable them to take their place in the modern world with a status that they themselves had freely chosen and accepted.

77. If the Committee was to make a more truly objective study, however, it would have to go beyond those objectives and face the real and varied problem in the remaining colonial Territories. His Government's policies in the Territories it administered were naturally designed to help the people of those Territories to overcome their problems, which ranged from racial divisions and suspicions in some places to economic backwardness or a lack of any feeling of national unity and consciousness in others. His delegation was ready to provide the Committee with information on those policies and would welcome constructive proposals from the Committee. The United Kingdom Permanent Representative and Minister of State in New York would willingly take part in informal discussions of problems or proposals; moreover, the Colonial Secretary in London was prepared to consider any suggestion that representatives of the Committee should visit London to discuss particular cases of special importance or complexity.

78. The United Kingdom's contributions could be made more effective by some adjustments in the Committee's methods of work. First, in the light of General Assembly resolution 2116 (XX) and of the recommendations of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,⁸ the Committee should draw up within the next week or two its detailed programme for the entire year, with dates for discussions of particular Territories or subjects laid down from the outset. There might be some loss of flexibility, but that would be far outweighed by the improvement in the organization of the work. The administering Powers, including the United Kingdom, could then prepare more effectively for discussion of their own Territories and could provide the Committee with more information and, where appropriate, bring in specialists and experts from their own countries or possibly from the Territories themselves.

79. The second aspect of the more constructive elaboration he suggested would be increased consultation between the Working Group and the administering Power concerned. His delegation had no doubt whatsoever of the great usefulness of the Working Group and favoured its continuation.

80. Similarly, the preparation and drafting of reports and draft resolutions could be based on a broader cross-section of opinion in the Committee, taking the views of the administering Powers more fully into account; the Committee's work might then be more productive and more objective, and hence of more real value to the people of the colonial Territories themselves. The wishes and views of the colonial peoples, as publicly expressed through their democratically elected leaders and representatives, might be reflected more fully in the Committee's reports and recommendations. Resolutions frequently reflected only the point of view of the majority; the Committee might usefully proceed much more by balanced consensus or by reports which adequately covered all the points of view, even when they were in conflict.

81. The use of small groups or sub-committees within the Committee to deal with particular Territories or areas had obvious advantages: small groups could consider problems in greater depth and perhaps with less formality. In the past, however, some of the advantage had been lost by the subsequent full debates on the same subjects in the plenary Committee. To avoid duplication, the Committee might in appropriate cases refrain from full debates on the reports of small groups and, instead, incorporate those reports in its report to the General Assembly without necessarily endorsing or approving them.

82. While his delegation was grateful to the four African Governments which had extended invitations to the Committee, all he had said about the advantages of small groups and the undesirability of expanded debate by the full Committee applied with even greater force to the suggestion of another visit to Africa. The 1965 visit had already acquainted the Committee better with African problems and personalities; a second visit would not encourage the objective studies which he had suggested and the Committee had little time before the autumn session of the General Assembly to prepare its report. An elaborate and costly tour of several African countries could be justified only if it brought very considerable and tangible advantages unattainable by other means; his delegation did not believe that such justification existed in the present case and it would therefore regard a second African tour by the whole Committee as a waste of time and money.

83. He thought it would be useful to the Committee to have some information concerning his Government's programme for progress in constitutional development and decolonization in its remaining colonial Territories. He would deal first with the four Territories whose course to independence was now mapped out and set. British Guiana was due to become independent on 26 May, Bechuanaland on 30 September and Basutoland, subject to the submission of a formal request by the procedure laid down, later in 1966. It had been decided at the Mauritius Conference in September 1965 that the United Kingdom Government would be prepared to take the necessary steps to declare Mauritius independent if the new Legislative Assembly so requested. There would be six months of internal self-government after the elections which were due to take place after the report of the Electoral Commission had been dealt with.

84. In addition to those Territories, invitations had recently been sent to the parties represented in the Barbados Legislature to attend a conference in London in July 1966 for the purpose of discussing their Government's request for early independence. New constitutional proposals had been put forward and published recently for the Caribbean Territories of Antigua, Dominica, Grenada, St. Kitts, St. Lucia and St. Vincent and would be the subject of conferences in London in spring 1966.

85. As the Committee was aware, South Arabia was due to become independent by 1968. Recent developments affecting that Territory included the publication of the report of the constitutional advisers commissioned by the Federal Government to draw up proposals for a constitution for the whole of South Arabia. Secondly, there had been the announcement by the United Kingdom Government that, as part of its over-all defence review, it intended to withdraw its forces from the Aden base when South Arabia became independent. Thirdly, there had been the decision by the Federal Government to recommend that all orders which for political reasons required South Arabians to live outside their country should be lifted so that those people should be free to return. The United Kingdom Government hoped that all those developments would encourage consultations among all sections of opinion in South Arabia with a view to the reaching of agreement on the necessary constitutional measures for independence.

86. The Territories he had mentioned accounted for nearly 5 million out of the 9.5 million people in all the United Kingdom dependent Territories, not including Rhodesia.

87. In the remaining Territories, constitutional progress was continuing, in almost all cases at an accelerated rate. Most of them were small in area and population and their problems and requirements defied generalization. It was those problems, varied and different in each case, which his Government, in co-operation with the peoples of the Territories, was seeking to tackle in the last phases of the great historical movement towards decolonization. In the Seychelles a Constitutional Commissioner had been appointed to advise on future constitutional advance and had already begun his work. In Swaziland the Constitutional Committee had been considering the next stages of constitutional progress, and it was expected that final decisions on the form of an internal self-government constitution would be taken later in 1966. The next stage in the constitutional development of the Gilbert and Ellice Islands was now being considered. In Bermuda, the joint select committee of the two houses of the Legislature appointed to consider constitutional changes had recommended, inter alia, lowering the voting age from 25 to 21 and abolishing the second vote previously enjoyed by some Bermudians on a property basis. Those recommendations had been put into effect and Bermuda now had an electoral system of one man, one vote.

88. In addition, measures designed to achieve constitutional progress were likely to be taken in the near future with regard to Fiji, the British Virgin Islands, Montserrat, the Cayman Islands, the Falkland Islands and the Solomon Islands.

89. Lastly, there were certain Territories which were the subject of territorial claims by other countries. In the case of Gibraltar, the United Kingdom Government had agreed with the Government of Spain that, following General Assembly resolution 2070 (XX), talks should be held between the two Governments in London. The question of the frontier between Venezuela and British Guiana had been discussed in London and Geneva by the United Kingdom Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and the Foreign Minister of Venezuela, with the participation of the Prime Minister of British Guiana. He was sure that the resulting agreement, which had been signed in Geneva in February, would be welcomed in the Committee.

90. With regard to the Falkland Islands, the Governments of the United Kingdom and Argentina had informed the United Nations of the agreement reached between the United Kingdom Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and the Argentine Foreign Minister that discussions, as recommended in General Assembly resolution 2065 (XX), should be pursued without delay for the purpose of finding a peaceful solution.

91. This heavy programme of decolonization and constitutional progress for 1966 showed that the United Kingdom Government was making every effort to assist the people of its colonial Territories to achieve the objectives which all members sought. He hoped that his delegation's suggestions for making the Committee's work more effective would be fully discussed.

92. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania recalled that while the Committee had been in Addis Ababa the previous year the suggestion had been made that the Security Council should meet in Africa to consider some of the serious questions of colonialism, such as those of the Portuguese Territories. His delegation considered that a meeting in Africa by a body such as the Security Council would be of great value, since for many Africans Portuguese colonialism constituted a threat to the peace and security of the continent, as the Security Council itself had once observed. He therefore hoped that the Committee would do its utmost to make that suggestion become a reality.

93. His delegation felt that the Committee should make greater use of the sub-committee system it had followed the previous year. It should re-establish the sub-committees it had had the previous year, but the composition of those bodies could be left to the officers of the Committee to decide. The Sub-Committee on British Guiana could, however, be abolished, since that Territory was to become independent during the present year. It could be replaced by a sub-committee that would deal with the small islands to be considered at the present session. Once the sub-committees were re-established, they would be able to draw up their programmes of work and present them to the Committee for approval. The Committee would then be able to prepare a programme of work for the entire year.

94. With regard to the visit to Africa, his delegation had always held the view that the best meeting place for the Committee was the place nearest to areas where colonialism still existed. Since, unfortunately, there were still colonies in Africa, his delegation considered it necessary for the Committee to meet in that continent. It hoped that the Committee's experience in Africa the previous year would be sufficient justification for another visit. If the idea of holding a session in Africa was accepted, all questions concerning that continent should be taken up while the Committee was there. He hoped that the decision would be taken quickly, so that the host countries would have time to prepare for the Committee's visit.

95. While his delegation thought that the question of small Territories should be considered at the current session, it also felt that the Committee should send a group of three or four members to such places with a view to obtaining additional information. In making that suggestion, his delegation was not disregarding the reports of the administering Powers; it merely thought that a report from such a small group would supplement the information submitted by those Powers.

96. With regard to the questions of Aden and Oman, he suggested that it would be useful if the Committee took up those items in Cairo, where it would have an opportunity of hearing petitioners from those areas.

97. The representative of Syria said that, despite the optimism which had been expressed with regard to the imminent end of colonialism, there were indications of a recalcitrant attitude on the part of some colonial Powers and of a consolidation of reactionary power to suppress the identity of some indigenous peoples. In one place, it would be claimed that strategic interests were involved—a claim which made the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) conditional upon other factors; in another place, colonialism would disappear in name only and be replaced by economic ties. In South West Africa, the world was witnessing a gradual and deliberate, although disguised, conquest of an African land by a minority of foreign settlers.

98. The Committee should bring all its energies to bear on those problems, in the hope that it might help to alleviate the sufferings of subjugated peoples. In that spirit, his delegation strongly supported the suggestion that the Committee should visit the African capitals which had extended invitations. Experience had shown that the colonial Powers were often reluctant to furnish a complete picture of the conditions prevailing in the Territories under their administration and it had become a matter of course for them to reject requests for visits by United Nations missions. If the Committee could only convey the message that the majority of peoples followed with deep interest and supported, morally at least, the legitimate struggle of the peoples for independence, its visit would accomplish a great deal. An early decision by the Committee not only would be a matter of courtesy to the host Governments but would affect the Committee's time-table. If the visit were agreed upon, it would be logical to discuss questions concerning Africa in Africa; the questions of Aden and Oman could profitably be discussed in Cairo, a city which petitioners could reach easily. The Committee could then deal with the other questions on its agenda either before or after its visit to Africa.

99. Sub-committees might be established to assess the present situation in specific Territories, or, in the case of sub-committees dealing with new questions such as that of Oman, to make suggestions about the method of work on the item.

100. There would be no harm in the Committee omitting from its report certain parts that had been included in previous reports, but it should continue to exercise the authority vested in it by the General Assembly and to adopt clear and unambiguous resolutions. If previous resolutions had not been implemented, that was the fault of the colonial Powers and not of the language used in the resolutions. If the colonial Powers had left it to the United Nations to decide what was right and what was wrong, the work of the Committee would have been completed long since.

101. The representative of Mali said that, in organizing its work, the Committee should bear in mind the provisions of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX).

102. As in the past, the Committee should establish a working group which would draw up an order of priority for the various questions before the Committee. The consideration of those questions would require a debate by the Committee itself, but it should be remembered that the phase of denunciation of colonialism was past and that attention should be concentrated on proposing specific means for its eradication. The time had come to fulfil the hopes of millions of people for release from colonial domination. Sub-committees would be able to study more closely certain aspects of colonial exploitation, particularly the economic and military aspects connected with the operations of foreign monopolies and the establishment and maintenance of military bases. The small Territories, in particular, were being used as bases for aggression and his delegation supported the suggestion of the Tanzanian representative that visiting groups should be sent to such Territories. It was because of such economic and military considerations that it was difficult for those small Territories to achieve independence.

103. His delegation welcomed the forthcoming independence of Guiana and Bechuanaland. The Committee should study the Territories under Portuguese domination and propose a deadline for their attainment of independence. The withdrawal of South Africa's Mandate for South West Africa should also be proposed; the International Court of Justice would undoubtedly condemn the policies of apartheid pursued by the racist Government of South Africa against the population of South West Africa, in violation of the very spirit of the Mandate.

104. His delegation was grateful to the Governments of Algeria, Ethiopia, Somalia, the United Arab Republic and the United Republic of Tanzania for their kind invitations to the Special Committee. A visit to Africa would show members the scope of the struggle for liberation being waged by the peoples of Angola, Mozambique, Guinea-Bissau, Aden and South Arabia. The Committee would obtain information from petitioners and the peoples concerned would realize that the United Nations understood their problems.

105. The Committee's reports should deal only with new developments; for the past history, members could refer to earlier reports.

106. The representative of Poland said that the Committee's methods of work should reflect the aims and objectives of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and the specific tasks and obligations laid down in General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX). The latter resolution had requested the Committee to seek the best means for the immediate and full application of resolution 1514 (XV) to all Territories which had not yet attained independence. The Committee should therefore seek new methods and new approaches to the questions on its agenda, in order successfully to implement all the resolutions adopted on particular Territories. It should consider how the colonial Powers were implementing the decisions already taken by the General Assembly; certain Powers, particularly South Africa and Portugal, were continuing to defy the United Nations. The Polish delegation agreed that the Committee should recommend the withdrawal from South Africa of its Mandate for South West Africa. It therefore supported the idea of convening a special session of the General Assembly as soon as the International Court of Justice had concluded its consideration of the question. It also agreed that the Committee should pursue the idea of the Security Council meeting in Africa to consider the situation in South West Africa, Southern Rhodesia and the Portuguese colonies. The Committee was perfectly entitled to suggest such a procedure, since paragraph 13 of resolution 2105 (XX) authorized it "to make suggestions which might assist the Council in considering appropriate measures under the Charter of the United Nations".

107. Also in accordance with resolution 2105 (XX), the Committee should recommend a deadline for the accession to independence of each Territory in accordance with the wishes of the people. It was obvious that colonial Powers interested in preserving their rule in the Territories under their domination were resorting to all kinds of delaying tactics.

108. His delegation fully supported the idea of a visit to Africa and was grateful to the five Governments which had extended invitations to the Committee. It would be equally important to send visiting missions to certain Territories in order to establish direct contact with the population, ascertain their wishes and aspirations and determine the real situation. The colonial Powers, which called the legitimate struggle of the people for liberation an act of terrorism, could not be expected to take into account the views of the oppressed peoples. It was to be hoped that the administering Powers would abandon their earlier position of refusing to allow representatives of the Special Committee into their Territories.

109. The Committee should follow its established practice of appointing sub-committees. The advantages of such a practice outweighed the disadvantages; above all, it would save time and expedite the Committee's work.

110. With regard to the Committee's reports, it would be logical in future to omit the historical background material, which could be found in earlier reports.

111. The representative of Sierra Leone said that, under the resolutions adopted at the twentieth session of the General Assembly, the Committee was required to report to the twenty-first session of the Assembly on the Territories on its agenda; for some of the Territories, particularly the smaller ones, the Committee had to consider new ways of solving peculiar problems; lastly, it had to suggest deadlines for the independence of some Territories.

112. His delegation hoped that the Committee would visit Africa, because it thought that the gains which could result from such a visit would outweigh all other considerations. It was the Committee's duty to make every effort to liberate the Territories on that continent which were becoming "chronic" cases of colonialism. The working group should be established as soon as possible and should start by considering whether or not a visit should be made to Africa. Problems such as those of Southern Rhodesia, the Portuguese Territories, South West Africa, Aden and the Federation of South Arabia should be considered during the visit to Africa.

113. In planning its programme, the Committee should bear in mind the time and the resources at its disposal. Considerations of economy, however, should not obscure the primary aim of ensuring that all Territories still under colonial rule received independence. The time remaining before the visit to Africa could be used to consider the other Territories on the agenda and to establish the sub-committees. In addition, more background material could be prepared for the visit to Africa.

114. The United Kingdom representative had mentioned the possibility of a visit to London by representatives of the Committee. It was regrettable, however, that the United Kingdom would not allow visiting missions into the actual Territories concerned. That attitude left doubt about the sincerity of the United Kingdom. Visiting missions to individual Territories on the agenda, particularly the smaller islands, would allow the same kind of direct contact as had been made during the Committee's previous visit to Africa.

115. The task of the Secretariat would be facilitated if all background material were omitted from future reports of the Committee.

116. The representative of Bulgaria said that the statement made by the Secretary-General at the opening of the session (see paras. 14-23 above) had provided guidelines for the Committee's work, in the light of the discussions at the twentieth session of the General Assembly and at meetings of the Special Committee. As the Secretary-General had pointed out, the major problems in the field of decolonization had remained without any positive movement towards peaceful solution and the majority of delegations had expressed serious concern about the continued delay in the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence.

117. Although the majority of delegations agreed on the methods to be followed and thought that the Committee should do everything possible to obtain the implementation of the resolutions of the General Assembly, certain delegations had expressed a different view. The United Kingdom representative, for example, had said that it was not necessarily the right or the only approach to concentrate on seeing that the provisions of all the Assembly resolutions were carried out. If it was the policy of the United Kingdom Government not to implement the resolutions of the General Assembly, it was understandable that the views of the United Kingdom delegation on the subject of the Committee's methods of work differed from those of the majority of delegations. The United Kingdom representative had stated that his Government bore the responsibility for the administration of United Kingdom Territories and for their progress to full self-government and self-determination. That, however, did not absolve the United Kingdom from its obligations, since it claimed that there was no disagreement about general objectives.

118. Moreover, the United Kingdom representative had suggested that the Special Committee should not adopt resolutions but should endeavour to arrive at a consensus, for resolutions reflected only the opinion of the majority, whereas the consensus was the common denominator, namely, the maximum that the colonial Powers could give. It was therefore obvious that opinions differed considerably with regard to the policy which the United Nations had thus far followed in respect of decolonization.

119. The Bulgarian delegation agreed with the United Kingdom representative's statement that the Committee should be careful to organize its work in such a way as not to spend United Nations money unwisely. His delegation wished to emphasize, however, that the Committee should not seek to effect economies by leaving entire populations in Africa and other parts of the world to suffer under the colonial yoke. That was why his delegation considered that the Committee should not let the mere desire to save a few pennies prevent it from taking the necessary initiatives in organizing its work. The Committee should go ahead with the proposals made by various delegations for speeding up its work in connexion with the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples.

120. Some delegations, in particular that of the United Kingdom, had categorically opposed the proposal that the Committee should hold meetings in Africa. The Committee's last visit to Africa had been of great value. During that visit those who were fighting for freedom, independence and self-determination in the Territories under Portuguese domination, in Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa and other colonial Territories, had been able to appear before the Committee, and the members of the Committee had been able to live in the atmosphere in which the African peoples were waging their desperate struggle against a powerful enemy helped by all the imperialist and reactionary forces of the world. Direct contact with the representatives of those struggling peoples had had a positive influence on the anti-colonial decisions which the Committee had adopted in Africa. There was no doubt regarding the urgent need for the Committee to hold another session in Africa, for events in Southern Rhodesia and elsewhere were evidence of a new offensive by the forces of imperialism and neo-colonialism. A session of the Committee in Africa would enable the United Nations to bring its full weight to bear at that decisive stage in the fight against colonialism.

121. From time to time certain decisions adopted in the United Nations were not effectively implemented. That was why his delegation supported the idea of the Security Council meeting in Africa. At a time when the racists and colonialists were becoming more and more arrogant in their aggressive policy against the oppressed peoples and the young African States, the United Nations body entrusted with the primary responsibility for maintaining peace and security would be able to take the necessary decisions on the spot and to hear the representatives of the African peoples who were in such desperate straits.

122. His delegation therefore suggested that if the Committee did not adopt a resolution on that subject, the Chairman should get in touch with the President of the Security Council during the year in order to suggest a visit to Africa by the Council.

123. The situation in South West Africa had always been one of the most difficult problems. It was well known that the racist Verwoerd Government intended to annex the Territory of South West Africa. That Government had shown nothing but contempt for the decisions of the United Nations, which was primarily responsible for South West Africa. His delegation supported the idea of a special session of the General Assembly on the subject, to be convened as soon as the International Court of Justice had handed down its decision on the question of South West Africa. The Mandate for South West Africa should be withdrawn from South Africa.

124. The Special Committee should of course devote special attention to the question of Aden and the South Arabian peninsula, Oman and other colonial Territories. Attempts had recently been made by certain circles to deprive the peoples of those regions of the possibility of intensifying their struggle for independence. The Special Committee—and the Security Council, if it went to Africa—should endeavour to help those peoples in their efforts for liberation.

125. The colonial Powers should not be given the impression that the Committee was less interested in the so-called small colonial Territories. Manœuvres aimed at perpetuating colonial domination under new guises had recently been undertaken in some of those Territories and the Committee must be vigilant. The General Assembly resolutions on the Territories in the Caribbean, the Atlantic and the Pacific should be scrupulously implemented. He had in mind particularly the General Assembly decision that visiting missions should be sent to those Territories, a point which had been taken up by the representative of Tanzania in his proposal that groups should visit the small Territories. The States administering those Territories should realize that by receiving such missions they would be giving proof of their goodwill and their recognition of the rights of the peoples of the Territories to independence and self-determination.

126. During the past year the Special Committee had devoted much attention to the role of foreign monopolies in Africa. On the basis of studies made by the Committee and in its Sub-Committee I, the General Assembly had taken important decisions concerning the consequences of the activities of foreign monopolies in South West Africa and the Portuguese colonies. The study on the role of monopolies in Southern Rhodesia should be completed and the Committee should recommend to the Assembly practical action to be taken against the harmful influence of the most important imperialist and neo-colonialist bodies in Africa.

127. If the considerations he had set forth were taken into account and if the Committee followed the guidelines indicated in the resolutions of the General Assembly, in the Secretary-General's statement at the opening meeting and by most of the delegations which had spoken, it would be able to work constructively to make the current year one of co-operation in the field of decolonization.

128. The representative of Iraq recalled that, in his statement to the Committee, the Secretary-General had spoken of the unusually heavy programme with which the Committee was faced. The magnitude of the Committee's obligations and responsibilities was indeed in sharp contrast with some ideas which had been expressed regarding its work, especially the suggestion that its deliberations should be curtailed.

129. The Committee had been entrusted by the General Assembly with the task of helping the peoples still under colonial rule and oppression in their struggle for independence and emancipation. It had been given the responsibility of keeping under review the questions of Aden, Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, the Territories under Portuguese administration, Oman and all the other colonial Territories. As the Committee was in permanent session, it would always be entitled to take up any question that arose in connexion with United Nations resolutions and the refusal of colonial Powers to give effect to those resolutions. The Committee's prompt action with regard to the repressive measures recently carried out by the United Kingdom authorities against the people of Aden was an indication of the importance of its role and it should be careful not to abdicate its rights and responsibilities.

130. The Committee should of course organize its work in such a way as to make it possible for delegations and petitioners to participate as fully as possible, but it should not adopt rigid rules or set unchangeable dates for the consideration of items. His delegation would like to put forward the following suggestions.

131. First, the Committee might hold a general debate on the questions before it and try to evaluate the progress achieved thus far. It could discuss the items in detail when it met in Africa. His delegation thanked the Governments of Algeria, Somalia, the United Arab Republic, Ethiopia and the United Republic of Tanzania for their kind invitations, which it hoped the Committee would accept. He was convinced that a session in Africa would be of the utmost benefit.

132. Secondly, the Committee should give serious consideration to the question of setting immediate dates for the attainment of independence by various colonial Territories. His country had stressed the importance of that question at the second Conference of Non-Aligned Countries, held at Cairo, and it was glad to see that that idea had gained support.

133. Thirdly, the Committee should consider ways and means of making its work known throughout the world, particularly in the colonial Territories. The Office of Public Information might be requested to study the matter and to submit a report to the Committee on how the public could be better informed of the plight of the people suffering under the colonial yoke and of the efforts made by the Committee and the General Assembly.

134. Lastly, his delegation saw merit in the sub-committee system and was ready to continue to participate in the sub-committees. There should, however, be no delegation of powers from the Committee itself to its subsidiary bodies. His delegation also supported the suggestion that visiting groups should be sent to the small Territories.

135. The representative of Iran said that in discussing the organization of its work the Committee should bear certain basic factors in mind.

136. First, the Committee should organize its work in such a way as would best accelerate the attainment of the objectives set by the General Assembly. It would accomplish more if it spent most of the time available in helping to expedite the attainment of independence by a number of Territories than if it prepared a report covering all the Territories. His delegation fully supported the suggestion made by the Tanzanian representative that the question of the small Territories should be studied in greater detail. The Committee might send sub-committees to those areas or collect information through other means to supplement the data supplied by the administering Powers. It would then be able to take appropriate action on the question of those Territories.

137. Secondly, it must be borne in mind that the Committee had a heavy agenda and relatively little time available to it. It had been invited by five Member States to hold meetings in Africa. His delegation thanked those countries for their kind invitations and was fully in favour of holding a session in Africa. In organizing its work the Committee must first decide whether it would hold meetings in Africa and, if so, for how long. It must also determine which questions it would deal with during its session in Africa so that other items could be examined in the intervening period.

138. Thirdly, his delegation fully shared the view expressed by the representatives of Italy and Tanzania that greater use should be made of the sub-committee system. The present sub-committees should be re-considered; some might be dispensed with and new ones might be needed. In determining the composition of the sub-committees, care should be taken to maintain adequate geographical representation and to arrange that every member had an equal opportunity to serve in the various bodies.

Decisions

139. On the conclusion of the debate on organization of work, the Special Committee, at its 399th meeting, requested the Working Group to consider and submit recommendations regarding the Committee's programme of work for the current year, taking into account the two notes by the Secretary-General (A/AC.109/L.260 and L.261), and the invitations extended to the Committee by the Governments of the United Republic of Tanzania (A/AC.109/147), the United Arab Republic (A/AC.109/148), Ethiopia (A/AC.109/149), Somalia (A/AC.109/150) and Algeria (A/AC.109/152) to hold meetings at their respective capitals, as well as the views expressed by members during the debate.

140. On the basis of the recommendations contained in the 22nd, 23rd and 24th reports of the Working Group (A/AC.109/L.265/Rev.1, L.270 and L.275), the Special Committee, at its 400th and 409th meetings, took decisions regarding its programme of work for 1966 including the order of priorities for the consideration of the items before it. These decisions, as subsequently modified at the 410th, 462nd and 471st meetings, are reflected in section E of this chapter.

141. In addition, the Special Committee decided to hold a series of meetings in Africa and to accept the invitations from the five Governments to hold meetings at their respective capitals, beginning on 23 May 1966 in Dar es Salaam.

142. It further decided to maintain Sub-Committees I, II and III and requested them to begin their work without delay. In addition to their terms of reference, as laid down in General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XX) and 2105 (XX), the Special Committee requested the Sub-Committees to carry out the specific tasks which are mentioned in the Secretary-General's notes contained in A/AC.109/L.260 and L.261 concerning the items referred to them. It also authorized the Sub-Committees to submit recommendations regarding the sending of visiting groups to the Territories with which they were concerned.

143. In addition, the Special Committee at its 409th meeting, on 26 April 1966, decided to refer to Sub-Committee I for consideration and report the item relating to the activities of foreign economic and other interests in Southern Rhodesia and their mode of operation, pursuant to operative paragraph 9 of the resolution on the question of Southern Rhodesia, adopted at the 328th meeting of the Committee on 22 April 1965 (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. III, para. 292).

D. MEETINGS OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE AND ITS WORKING GROUP AND SUB-COMMITTEES

Special Committee

144. The Special Committee held ninety meetings during 1966, as follows:

First session:

394th to 415th meetings, 8 March to 18 May 1966, United Nations Headquarters

416th to 427th meetings, 23 to 31 May 1966, Dar es Salaam

428th to 432nd meetings, 2 to 4 June 1966, Mogadiscio

433rd to 439th meetings, 6 to 9 June 1966, Addis Ababa

440th to 447th meetings, 11 to 15 June 1966, Cairo

448th to 455th meetings, 17 to 22 June 1966, Algiers

Second session:

456th to 483rd meetings, 6 July to 30 November 1966, United Nations Headquarters

Working Group

145. At the 399th meeting, the Special Committee nominated Ethiopia and India to fill two vacancies in the membership of the Working Group arising from the change in the composition of the Bureau. The Working Group therefore consisted of the four officers of the Committee, namely, Mr. Gershon Collier (Sierra Leone), Chairman, Mr. José Piñera (Chile), and Mr. John Malecela (United Republic of Tanzania) Vice-Chairmen and Mr. Alk'uddin Aljubouri (Iraq), Rapporteur, and the representatives of Bulgaria, Ethiopia, India and Italy.

146. During the period covered by the present report, the Working Group held ten meetings and submitted one oral and four written reports.⁹

Sub-Committee on Petitions

147. The Special Committee, at its 399th meeting, decided to continue the Sub-Committee on Petitions with the same membership as in 1965, except for the replacement of Ethiopia by Syria. The Sub-Committee on Petitions therefore consisted of the following members:

Australia	Syria
India	Tunisia
Madagascar	Venezuela
Poland

148. The Sub-Committee on Petitions held 23 meetings and submitted 23 reports to the Special Committee.¹⁰ The Sub-Committee on Petitions considered, during the period, a total of 243 communications, including fifty-eight requests for hearings. The petitions circulated by the Sub-Committee are listed in the chapters of the present report dealing with the Territories to which they refer.

Sub-Committee I

149. At its 400th meeting, the Special Committee decided to maintain Sub-Committee I with the same membership as in 1965. The composition of Sub-Committee I therefore was as follows:

Denmark	Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
Ethiopia
Mali	United Republic of Tanzania
Syria
Tunisia	Yugoslavia

150. At its 23rd meeting on 27 April 1966, Sub-Committee I elected Mr. John Malecela (United Republic of Tanzania) Chairman and Mr. Rafic Jouéjati (Syria) Rapporteur.

180. Details of the Special Committee's consideration of the Territories listed above and its conclusions and recommendations thereon are given in chapters III to XIX and XXII of the present report.

181. The Special Committee took note of the accession to independence of British Guiana on 26 May 1966 (see A/AC.109/SR.421).

182. Owing to lack of time, Sub-Committee II was unable to consider Brunei and Hong Kong.¹⁴ Information concerning these two Territories is given in chapters XX and XXI of the present report.

183. Sub-Committee III was unable to consider British Honduras owing to lack of time. Information on this Territory is contained in chapter XXII of the present report.

F. QUESTION OF SENDING VISITING GROUPS TO TERRITORIES

184. In operative paragraph 7 of its resolution 2105 (XX) of 20 December 1965, the General Assembly approved "the programme of work envisaged by the Special Committee during 1966, including the possibility of holding a series of meetings in Africa and the sending of visiting groups to Territories, particularly in the Atlantic, Indian and Pacific Ocean areas".

185. In approving the twenty-second report of the working group (A/AC.109/L.265/Rev.1), the Special Committee, at its 400th meeting, on 4 April 1966, authorized its Sub-Committees I, II and III to submit, as appropriate, recommendations to the Special Committee regarding the sending of visiting groups in relation to Territories with which they are concerned.

Recommendation of Sub-Committee III

186. At the 413th meeting, the Special Committee considered an oral report submitted by the Rapporteur of Sub-Committee III concerning the question of sending visiting missions to the Territories referred to it. The recommendation made by Sub-Committee III in this regard, as reproduced below, as well as the statements made by members of the Sub-Committee, are incorporated in its report (A/AC.109/L.329), which is annexed to chapter XXII of the present report. Summaries of the statements made by members during the Special Committee's consideration of the report of the Sub-Committee are given below.

187. In making the report, Mr. Mohsen Sadigh Esfandiary (Iran), Rapporteur of Sub-Committee III, stated that at its meeting on 5 May 1966 the Sub-Committee had authorized its Chairman to contact the representatives of the United Kingdom and the United States in order to ascertain their views concerning the request made by the General Assembly in resolution 2069 (XX), operative paragraph 3, on the question of visiting missions.

188. The reply from the United Kingdom representative had been that the question of visiting missions raised difficult problems of principle for his Government and that he could not say anything that might encourage the Sub-Committee to expect any changes in his Government's previously expressed attitude. His delegation would be prepared to transmit to the United Kingdom Government any specific request or suggestion from the Committee for a visit to a particular Territory, but that action could not be taken to imply any commitment that the United Kingdom Government would be able to respond to such a request.

189. The representative of the United States had said that he was not in position to give a reply to the question of visiting missions in general. Any specific proposal from the Sub-Committee for a visit to a Territory for which the United States was responsible would be transmitted to his Government, but he could not offer any encouragement that his Government would change its position.

190. After considering the replies, the Sub-Committee had adopted by consensus the following recommendation:

"The Sub-Committee recommends to the Special Committee that, in agreement with the position adopted on the question of visiting missions by the General Assembly at its twentieth session, as set out in paragraph 3 of resolution 2069 (XX) of 16 December 1965 and in the pertinent part of paragraph 7 of resolution 2105 (XX) of 20 December 1965, it invite the administering Powers, in cases where the Special Committee may decide to send out visiting missions to any of the Territories being considered by Sub-Committee III, to make it possible for such visits to take place and to extend to them their co-operation."

191. The representative of the United States of America reserved the position of her Government in regard to the question of visiting missions. Any specific request for a visiting mission would be transmitted by her delegation to the United States Government, but she could not at present offer any encouragement that her Government's position on the matter would change.

192. The representative of Australia reserved his Government's position on the matter.

193. The representative of the United Kingdom confirmed that his delegation's position had been stated accurately by the Rapporteur of Sub-Committee III. If the Committee decided to approve the Sub-Committee's report, he wished to reserve his Government's position.

194. The representative of Bulgaria said that, in order to enable the Special Committee to have some idea of what was happening in the Territories under consideration and to make recommendations to the General Assembly at its twenty-first session, it was essential that visiting missions should be sent to those Territories to obtain information direct from the people. In view of the discouraging replies given by the representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom, Sub-Committee III had felt it necessary to recommend that the Special Committee should invite the administering Powers to make it possible for the visits decided upon by the Special Committee to take place and to co-operate with visiting missions. He would point out that the Sub-Committee's recommendation added nothing to what the Special Committee and the General Assembly had already asked.

195. The representative of India supported the interim report presented by the Rapporteur of Sub-Committee III.

196. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that on the basis of a cursory study his delegation felt that the report of Sub-Committee III was in complete conformity with the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly at its twentieth session, in particular resolutions 2069 (XX) and 2105 (XX). The General Assembly had specially instructed the Special Committee to consider the question of establishing dates for the independence of colonial ¹⁴ The representatives of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Bulgaria and Poland stated that since the question of Hong Kong was directly related to the People's Republic of China, the United Nations and its organs, including the Special Committee, could not consider this matter until the lawful rights of the People's Republic of China were restored in the United Nations.

Territories in accordance with the wishes of their peoples. It was essential to send visiting missions to colonial Territories in order to ascertain the views of the people concerning their future development and the status they desired for their Territory. The refusal of the colonial Powers to admit visiting missions, even after repeated requests by the General Assembly, must be regarded as a refusal to co-operate with the Committee and with the United Nations. The Committee should therefore adopt the report of Sub-Committee III and thus make clear the concern of its members for decisions of the General Assembly.

197. The representative of Mali said that his delegation supported the report of Sub-Committee III and was sure that the Special Committee would adopt it, especially as it included two important provisions from resolutions adopted by the General Assembly at its twentieth session. The sending of visiting missions to small Territories as well as to others, would provide the Special Committee and the General Assembly with information that would enable them to adopt adequate measures leading to the granting of independence to colonial Territories by the administering Powers in co-operation with the United Nations.

198. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that his delegation supported the report of Sub-Committee III, which reflected the decisions of the General Assembly. The adoption of the Sub-Committee's report would provide an opportunity for the colonial Powers to give the Committee the co-operation they had always promised it, by allowing visiting missions to go to the Territories.

199. The representative of Italy recalled that in the course of the debate in Sub-Committee III his delegation had expressed certain reservations, not about the principle of visiting missions, which it supported, but about the nature of the consensus reached. The Special Committee was only a small body and its pronouncements could not make the resolutions of the General Assembly any more important or more weighty. In addition, it was unrealistic to ask administering Powers to give a positive response to a hypothetical question: whether they would accept visiting missions which the Special Committee might decide to send to the Territories under their administration.

200. The representative of Venezuela said that Sub-Committee III was not merely reaffirming General Assembly resolutions but was making a specific recommendation on the basis of the relevant provisions of two Assembly resolutions. It was not asking for a response from the administering Powers; it was appealing for their support and co-operation in the event of the Special Committee's deciding to send visiting missions to their Territories. Venezuela fully supported the consensus and the report of the Sub-Committee.

201. The representative of Syria said that his delegation endorsed the report. There was no harm in emphasizing General Assembly resolutions which had still not been implemented.

202. The representative of Iran said that the reservations of the Italian delegation had been noted in the records of the Sub-Committee. The consensus had been reached after hearing those reservations and with the consent of the Italian representative.

203. The representative of Uruguay recalled that his delegation's views had been expressed during the discussion in Sub-Committee III. He associated himself with the remarks made by the representative of Venezuela and supported the consensus.

204. The representative of Tunisia said that the report should not give rise to lengthy discussion; it was based on decisions taken at the twentieth session of the General Assembly. His delegation supported the report and hoped that the administering Powers would give their full co-operation.

205. The representative of Sierra Leone expressed whole-hearted support for the report. Only through visiting missions would the Special Committee be able to gain a first-hand knowledge of the problems of the colonial Territories and to find a speedy solution to them.

206. The representatives of Ethiopia and the Ivory Coast expressed support for the Sub-Committee's report.

207. The representative of Afghanistan said that his delegation endorsed the report. It was not discouraged by the reservations expressed, particularly by the United Kingdom and United States delegations, and it hoped that, when they were requested to do so, the administering Powers would co-operate with the Special Committee for the benefit of the people of the dependent Territories.

208. At the same meeting, the Special Committee adopted the report of the Sub-Committee and approved the recommendation contained therein, on the understanding that the reservations expressed by members would be reflected in the record.

209. By letters dated 17 May 1966, the Chairman, on behalf of the Special Committee, transmitted to the Permanent Representatives of the United Kingdom and of the United States to the United Nations the text of the recommendation thus approved by the Special Committee concerning the question of sending visiting missions to Territories referred to that Sub-Committee (A/AC.109/170).

210. By letter dated 23 May 1966, the Permanent Representative of the United States acknowledged receipt of the Chairman's letter.

211. In a letter dated 26 May 1966 (A/AC.109/171), the Deputy Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom stated as follows in reply:

"... The question of visiting missions raises difficult problems of principle for the United Kingdom Government and I am unable therefore to say anything that might encourage the Special Committee to expect any change in my Government's previous attitude to the question as frequently explained to the Special Committee and its Sub-Committees. The United Kingdom delegation would naturally be prepared to transmit to the United Kingdom Government, and seek instructions on, any specific request or suggestion for a visit to a particular territory that the Committee might consider it appropriate to put forward. This cannot, however, be taken as implying any commitment that the United Kingdom Government would be able to respond to such a request."

Recommendation of Sub-Committee II

212. The Special Committee, at the 468th meeting, considered the section of the report of Sub-Committee II on the question of visiting missions to the Territories referred to it (A/AC.109/L.318), which is reproduced in annex II to the present chapter. Summaries of the statements made by members during the Special Committee's consideration of the report of Sub-Committee II concerning this question are given below.

213. Following the introduction of the report by the Rapporteur of the Sub-Committee the representative of the United Kingdom stated his delegation's reservations concerning the sending of visiting missions to Territories administered by the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom delegation had made clear its position on the question during the Sub-Committee's meetings and he drew the attention of the members of the Special Committee to the summary records of these meetings. With regard to visiting missions, he also drew attention to the comments of the United Kingdom delegation set forth in document A/AC.109/171.

214. The representative of the United States of America expressed the reservations of his delegation on the question of the desirability of visiting missions.

215. The representative of Australia said that the Australian position on the question of visiting missions was set forth in document A/AC.109/L.318; although in certain circumstances visiting missions could be of great value, it was doubtful whether they would be useful in the case of the Territories under Australian administration, to which the Trusteeship Council had already sent a number of visiting missions. Just as the administering Power had responsibilities, which it did not seek to deny, it also had the right to make decisions and could not agree in advance to any recommendation without having considered its financial implications, especially when there was a possibility of duplication of effort. The Australian delegation was, however, prepared to transmit to its Government any proposal that the Committee might make on the subject.

216. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics recalled that the majority of the members of Sub-Committee II had recommended, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX), the sending of visiting groups to Territories in the Atlantic, Indian and Pacific Ocean areas, since they considered that those missions would make it possible to obtain first-hand information on the situation in those Territories and on the best means of securing the implementation of the Declaration. Unfortunately it was clear from the summary records and the report of the Sub-Committee that the administering Powers did not share that view and were resorting to pretexts of all kinds in order to obstruct the sending of such missions. The arguments adduced by those Powers did not withstand scrutiny. The United Kingdom delegation said that it was prepared to transmit to its Government any recommendation relating to the sending of visiting missions, but at the same time it made it quite clear that such action did not imply any obligation on the part of the United Kingdom. What could be thought of a Government which sought to ignore the competence of the United Nations and was afraid of the consequences that the Organization's action might have in the economic and political fields? It would seem that the United Kingdom had something to conceal in those Territories. The United States representative, for his part, tried to assure the Committee that the situation in the Territories in the Pacific administered by his Government was so satisfactory that there was no point in sending a visiting mission there. The Special Committee had often heard the fine words of the United States delegation, but it was clear from the facts that the United States had so far done nothing to implement resolution 1514 (XV) in its Territories. Evidence of that was to be found in the report of the WHO Visiting Mission to the Territory of the Pacific Islands, which revealed the deplorable sanitary conditions in which the people of the Territory lived. Australia, too, had followed the example of its partners by stating that it had the right to refuse to receive visiting missions in the areas under its jurisdiction. The Australian Government seemed to forget that the Charter and the Declaration in resolution 1514 (XV) imposed certain obligations on it with respect to the peoples under its administration. By its refusal, Australia demonstrated its contempt for the right of peoples to self-determination, which had become one of the fundamental rules of international law, and for the will of the majority of the States Members of the United Nations. The attitude of New Zealand was scarcely more satisfactory, since the New Zealand Government stated that it did not object to the sending of visiting missions but would be able to receive such missions only as part of a broader survey of the situation in the region. In view of the negative attitude of the other administering Powers, New Zealand's reply was nothing but a disguised refusal. In fact, those four Powers were seeking primarily to conceal the actual situation in the bastions of colonialism which still existed in the Pacific and which they were using in their struggle against the national liberation movements in South-East Asia, and in particular against the people of Viet-Nam. It sufficed to look at a map to see that all those Territories were situated along the major Pacific Ocean routes and were of extreme importance for military communications. Moreover, before the Second World War, the imperialist Powers had already been vying with each other for possession of the most important bases. Twenty years after the cessation of hostilities, their armed forces were still there and by their presence were contributing to the unbridled exploitation of the Territories. After the collapse of the colonial system in the other parts of the world, the Pacific Islands had become an even greater target for the greed of the colonialist Powers. It was worth noting that since that time gold had been found in Fiji and silver and manganese in the Solomons, while Nauru's phosphates were a tempting prize for foreign monopolies. From the agricultural point of view, the Pacific Territories were no less attractive to the large commercial companies, for their perfect climate made them an ideal site for the cultivation of bananas, copra, citrus fruits, coffee, cocoa and medicinal herbs. Seeking to increase their profits still further, the colonial Powers had adopted a whole series of measures to strengthen their position in the extractive and sugar industries and in tropical agriculture. It was regrettable that the working papers prepared by the Secretariat gave very little information in that regard. That was not surprising, since those documents were based essentially on information made available by the administering Powers, which were seeking to keep world opinion in ignorance of the actual situation in those Territories with regard to public health, social security, land tenure, the conditions governing the engagement and dismissal of employees, and the very small part that the indigenous inhabitants played in the civil service.

217. All those facts prevented the Committee from determining what the true situation was and from ascertaining the wishes of the people with regard to their future political and social status. The Committee must gain a true picture of the real situation in the Territories as soon as possible. The only way of doing so was to visit the Territories and to have direct contact with the population. There was no justification for a refusal on the part of the administering Powers; any such refusal to comply with resolution 2105 (XX) and to facilitate the activities of such visiting missions would only confirm the fact that their assurances that they wished to co-operate were only empty words designed to deceive world opinion. If the United Kingdom representative was sincere in saying that the Secretariat reports did not adequately reflect the progress achieved in the Territories, why did he not admit that it was only by sending visiting missions there that the true situation could be ascertained?

218. The representative of the United States of America, replying to the Soviet representative, said that he would provide detailed information on the United States Territories in the Pacific when the Committee discussed the reports on that area. With regard to the question of United States bases, the Committee was well aware that the United States had been obliged to maintain its military presence precisely because of the attitude of certain Powers and because of the needs both of its own defence and of that of the region. When the situation in that part of the world had returned to normal, the United States Government would make it its duty to devote the resources at present being used for military purposes to other ends. In the present circumstances that was unfortunately out of the question.

219. The representative of Australia reserved the right to reply to the remarks of the Soviet representative at the appropriate time. It was well known that no Government was more faithful in discharging the obligations it had undertaken than the Government of Australia. Since the United Nations had been set up, six or seven visiting missions had been able to visit the Territories under Australian administration and their members had been made most welcome. He referred the Committee to the reports of those missions, which gave a detailed account of the situation obtaining in the Territories in question.

220. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that his delegation fully supported the conclusions and recommendations in the various parts of the report. At the present time, the essential thing was that the anachronism which the continued survival of colonialism in mid-twentieth century represented should be brought to an end as quickly as possible. The Tanzanian delegation hoped that the administering Powers would place no obstacles in the way of visiting missions and would give them their full co-operation.

221. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that he merely wished to point out that the United States representative's reply confirmed the fact that the Territories in question were being transformed into military bases instead of being developed economically, socially and politically, as laid down in the Charter.

222. As for the large number of visiting missions to which the Australian representative had alluded, most of them had been composed, for the most part, of representatives of administering Powers and their conclusions were therefore unreliable, since the opinion of the other members had not usually been reflected in their reports.

223. At the same meeting the Special Committee adopted the report of Sub-Committee II on this question and endorsed the recommendation contained therein, it being understood that the reservations expressed by members would be reflected in the record.

G. IMPLEMENTATION OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTIONS 2105 (XX) AND 2107 (XX) AND PERTINENT RESOLUTIONS OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE: REQUESTS TO INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTIONS AND SPECIALIZED AGENCIES

Introduction

224. At its 415th meeting, on 18 May 1966, the Special Committee requested the Secretary-General to communicate with the various international institutions in connexion with the appeals addressed to them by the General Assembly and by the Special Committee in their resolutions relating to the implementation of the Declaration and to the Territories under Portuguese administration and South West Africa. The Special Committee asked the Secretary-General to request these institutions to inform the Committee as a matter of urgency, first, whether the requests and appeals to them had been brought before their respective executive organs for decision, and secondly, what action they had taken or contemplated taking in response to those appeals and requests.

225. The paragraphs of the General Assembly resolutions containing requests and appeals to international institutions read as follows:

[Resolution 2105 (XX)]

"11. Requests all States and international institutions, including the specialized agencies of the United Nations, to withhold assistance of any kind to the Governments of Portugal and South Africa until they renounce their policy of colonial domination and racial discrimination;"

[Resolution 2107 (XX)]

"9. Appeals to all the specialized agencies, in particular to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund, to refrain from granting Portugal any financial, economic or technical assistance so long as the Government of Portugal fails to implement General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV);

"10. Requests the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the specialized agencies concerned and other international relief organizations to increase their assistance to the refugees from the Territories under Portuguese administration and to the people who have suffered from military operations".

226. The Secretary-General transmitted the Special Committee's requests to a number of international institutions including the specialized agencies by letters dated 6 June 1966.

Consideration by the Special Committee

Introduction

227. The Special Committee considered this item at its 464th to 467th meetings between 9 and 15 September 1966.

228. During its consideration of this question, the Special Committee had before it a note by the Secretariat (A/AC.109/194 and Add.1) containing the replies received by the Secretary-General from various international institutions, including the specialized agencies concerning the implementation of General Assembly resolutions 2105 (XX) and 2107 (XX) and pertinent resolutions of the Special Committee.

General statements by members

229. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that he was glad that, at the suggestion of the Working Group, the question of the implementation of General Assembly resolutions 2105 (XX) and 2107 (XX) had been placed on the agenda of the Special Committee.

230. It was the opinion of the USSR delegation—and the same opinion had been expressed many times by various other delegations—that the Special Committee should do its utmost to ensure that the resolutions directed towards the rapid elimination of the colonial régimes were put into effect. The Committee could make no claim to efficiency if it was content to set forth measures that were considered desirable and did not concern itself about the implementation of the United Nations decisions.

231. It was indeed the fundamental task of the Special Committee to keep a close watch on the implementation by the colonial Powers of the General Assembly decisions concerning the manifold aspects of decolonization. That task was all the more important in that those Powers stopped at nothing in their efforts to obstruct the implementation of those decisions; they did their utmost to maintain their domination over the colonial Territories, either directly or through puppet régimes, and even used force in their fight against the national liberation movements of Africa, Asia and Latin America.

232. In view of those manoeuvres on the part of the colonial Powers, it was even more urgently necessary to ascertain how the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Committee were being put into effect by all those concerned, and by the specialized agencies of the United Nations as well.

233. In that connexion, the USSR delegation was sorry to note that some agencies were disregarding the General Assembly resolutions, although they had been directly asked to take steps to put them into effect. The replies of the specialized agencies to the questions of the Secretary-General, who in accordance with a decision taken by the Committee on 18 May 1966 had asked them to inform him what they had done to comply with the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Committee, and in particular to comply with the provisions of paragraph 11 of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX), could not be considered satisfactory. While some specialized agencies had already considered the General Assembly's request and had taken, or were preparing to take, certain steps in that connexion—UNESCO, for example, was to be congratulated on its decision to place the question of the tasks that devolved upon it in the light of the resolutions on the liquidation of colonialism and racism adopted by the General Assembly at its twentieth session on the agenda of the fourteenth General Conference—some replies showed that a number of agencies were disregarding the decisions of the General Assembly. That was true in particular of the replies of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund. Those agencies had in fact evaded the question. They had not even deigned to state, in reply to the Secretary-General's request, what steps they proposed to take to comply with the General Assembly's decisions. Such an attitude was tantamount to a repudiation of the wishes of the overwhelming majority of Members of the United Nations. In the case of the International Bank, that fact was confirmed by the policy of that agency, which had just approved two loans, amounting to $30 million, for the expansion of the Portuguese electrical network. That decision was patently contrary to resolution 2107 (XX), and in particular paragraph 9 of that resolution. Moreover, the Bank had repeated that offence by approving a loan of $20 million to none other than the Government of South Africa, thus bringing the number of loans already granted to the South African Government by the Bank to eleven, with a total value of $241.8 million. The authorities of the Bank, which was dominated by United States capital, were certainly not unaware of the relevant General Assembly resolutions, which had been brought to their attention as early as March 1966. That action on the part of the Bank was in flagrant contradiction both with the United Nations policy of refusing all assistance to racists and colonialists and with the United Nations resolution asking for sanctions to be applied against the Portuguese and South African colonialists. By granting large loans to the Governments of Portugal and South Africa, the International Bank had simply given further proof of the criminal alliance of international capital and the colonialists, united in their efforts to combat the national liberation movements of the peoples of South West Africa, Mozambique and Angola and other colonial peoples.

234. He urged that the Committee should condemn the decision of the International Bank to grant loans to Portugal and South Africa and demand that the agreements already concluded should be cancelled. The Committee must ensure that the Bank respected the United Nations resolutions condemning colonialism in all its forms, such as racism and apartheid, as a crime against humanity.

235. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania expressed his delegation's appreciation of the replies received from certain international bodies and United Nations agencies on the subject of General Assembly resolutions 2105 (XX) and 2107 (XX). His delegation had noted with particular satisfaction that the WHO Regional Committee for Africa had adopted a resolution suspending Portugal's right to participation in the Committee and suspending any assistance to that country.

236. His delegation wished, however, to record its disapproval of the disregard and lack of co-operation shown by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. Although in its reply the Bank claimed to have brought the request before its Executive Directors, it was not only surprising but somewhat shocking to find that the Bank had recently granted the neo-fascist régime of South Africa a loan of $20 million. The Bank had also granted assistance to the Portuguese colonialist régime for various projects which might increase that régime's power to suppress the African people of Mozambique, Angola and so-called Portuguese Guinea. Since 1963, when the Bank had signed an agreement for a loan of some $5 million to the fascist Government of Portugal, that Government had stepped up its aggressive war against the people of those Territories. While his delegation acknowledged that the activities of the Bank were beneficial to some areas, it felt that the extension of any assistance that might in any way alleviate some of the self-created problems of the Portuguese colonialists and South African racists was contrary to the interests and legitimate aspirations of the peoples of Angola, Mozambique, so-called Portuguese Guinea and South West Africa. His delegation called upon all those who cherished freedom and independence to join in the universal struggle against colonialism and its crimes against humanity. There was ample evidence to show that the Portuguese colonialist régime could not continue its policies without the assistance it was receiving from its friends. Similarly, the South African régime was able to go on flouting world public opinion because it received encouragement and assistance from its hypocritical trading partners.

237. In his delegation's view, all international institutions and agencies should act in concert to ensure that the principles underlying the decisions of the General Assembly were respected. Such concerted action was of great importance both materially and morally to the masses of the African people in their struggle to overcome colonialist aggression and apartheid. Any action by an international body contrary to the decisions of the United Nations was a challenge to the Organization and a blow to national liberation movements. It was therefore his delegation's hope that the International Bank would reconsider its position and extend its full co-operation not only to the United Nations but to the heroic peoples of South West Africa and so-called Portuguese Guinea, who were waging a struggle against the forces condemned by civilized humanity.

238. In conclusion, his delegation hoped that all international institutions which had not yet done so would immediately take all the steps called for in resolutions 2105 (XX) and 2107 (XX).

239. The representative of Syria said that, when the Secretary-General had been requested to draw the attention of the specialized agencies to the provisions of the United Nations resolutions enjoining those agencies to refrain from extending to South Africa and Portugal assistance which would run counter to the objectives of the United Nations, it had been expected that those agencies would give a clear-cut undertaking that they would comply with the resolutions. Some agencies had done so, but others had given evasive answers, saying, for example, that they had referred the matter to their administrators. Perhaps, having made loans to both South Africa and Portugal, those agencies did not know how to reply or perhaps they considered their administrators above the United Nations. In either case, it was a serious matter. For the time being, however, the Committee might simply say that it expected more thorough replies where the commitment to put the United Nations resolutions into full effect was beyond question.

240. The representative of Bulgaria, referring to documents A/AC.109/194 and Add. 1, expressed regret that certain international institutions and specialized agencies forming part of the United Nations family had waited until the Committee's decision of 18 May 1966 and the sending of the Secretary-General's note before reacting to the General Assembly resolutions. That was particularly true of the International Bank and the International Monetary Fund, which were specifically mentioned in resolution 2107 (XX).

241. Those two bodies had once again submitted a purely formal reply—a procedure which did not reflect a very accommodating attitude towards the United Nations and had been the subject of expressions of disapproval by the General Assembly. It might be supposed that those replies indicated that the two organizations in question had been merely inactive with regard to the task of decolonization being undertaken by the United Nations. In fact, however, even after the decision adopted by the Special Committee on 18 May, the International Bank had approved two loans amounting to $30 million to enable Portugal to improve its electric supply system. The Bank had thus shown genuine contempt for the decisions of the United Nations, particularly resolution 2107 (XX), which appealed to the International Bank and the International Monetary Fund to refrain from granting Portugal any financial, economic or technical assistance so long as the Portuguese Government failed to implement General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). The loans granted to Portugal were not an isolated case; the recent $20 million loan to the Government of South Africa was further proof that it was part of the Bank's policy to co-operate with colonialist and racist régimes. It was to be noted that the Bank had already granted South Africa eleven loans totalling $241.8 million. The studies made by the Special Committee and by Sub-Committee I had thrown light on the pernicious part played by the international financial interests which were partners of the racist and colonialist régimes in exploiting the natural resources of the colonial countries. The Committee must not permit those interests to pursue their policy of assisting the Portuguese and South African régimes through two bodies which were affiliated with the United Nations.

242. His delegation was pleased to note that a number of international institutions and specialized agencies took a serious attitude towards General Assembly decisions and towards the appeals which the Assembly had addressed to them. Some, such as the International Labour Organisation and the World Health Organization, had not only taken account of United Nations resolutions on decolonization in their general work but had adopted specific measures to implement those resolutions. The World Health Organization and its nineteenth Assembly were to be commended for adopting a resolution which suspended Portugal's right to participate in the Regional Committee for Africa and in regional activities until its Government furnished proof of its willingness to conform to the injunctions of the United Nations and which also suspended technical assistance to Portugal in application of General Assembly resolution 2107 (XX).

243. The representative of India said that his delegation had given its full support to the efforts of the United Nations to induce the Governments of Portugal and South Africa to abandon their present policies; in that spirit, it had supported General Assembly resolutions 2105 (XX) and 2107 (XX), which appealed to the specialized agencies to refrain from granting assistance to Portugal and South Africa until they renounced their present policies. Since resolution 2107 (XX) mentioned in particular the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund, his delegation had been disappointed to hear of the recent granting of new loans to South Africa by the Bank. Any such help would only encourage the Governments of Portugal and South Africa in their shameful policies. At the same time, his delegation paid a tribute to the Bank and the Fund for their record in helping developing countries to achieve decent levels of living.

Action taken by the Special Committee

244. At the 466th meeting on 14 September 1966 the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania introduced a draft resolution concerning General Assembly resolutions 2105 (XX) and 2107 (XX): requests to international institutions including the specialized agencies (A/AC.109/L.330), jointly sponsored by Afghanistan, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, United Republic of Tanzania and Yugoslavia.

245. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania observed that the Committee had already examined the report of the Secretary-General based on the replies he had received to his request to international institutions not to give any assistance to South Africa and Portugal. The Afro-Asian group and Yugoslavia had considered the matter further and had agreed that the time had come for concrete action. They had therefore produced the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.330) requesting those international institutions which were enabling the Portuguese and South African régimes to continue their unjust treatment of innocent Africans to desist from that policy. He read out the text of the draft resolution.

246. The draft resolution asked for nothing more than justice, and the Committee should surely adopt it.

247. The representative of Iran stressed the need to deny South Africa and Portugal any assistance, financial or other, so long as they continued their policy of oppressing the African population, as indicated in operative paragraphs 2 and 3 of the draft resolution.

248. The request was addressed, in particular, to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund, which had done much to bridge the gap between rich and poor by helping developing countries but would be doing just the opposite by providing aid to South Africa and Portugal; for such aid would strengthen the régimes of those countries which pursued policies wholly detrimental to the welfare of the African population.

249. He hoped that all the specialized agencies, in particular the Bank and the Fund, would refrain from granting aid to South Africa and Portugal, and that the draft resolution would be adopted unanimously.

250. The representative of Tunisia said that he would have preferred the Committee take a decision on the draft resolution by consensus, since, in his view, it was couched in sufficiently moderate terms to gain the support of all members of the Committee.

251. He deplored the fact that the Bank and the Fund had continued to grant new loans to Portugal and South Africa although General Assembly resolutions 2105 (XX) and 2107 (XX) had been communicated to them. The draft resolution now submitted made a further appeal to them to co-operate in implementing resolutions of the General Assembly.

252. The representative of Bulgaria stated that his delegation welcomed draft resolution A/AC.109/L.330 because it felt that it was time for the Committee to take a clear, unequivocal stand on the activities of international institutions with regard to colonial problems and particularly with regard to the implementation of General Assembly resolutions. His delegation agreed with the sponsors of the draft resolution that the Committee should express appreciation to those international institutions and specialized agencies which were seriously trying to act on the Assembly's appeals and assist in the process of decolonization, and condemn those which, like the International Bank, were taking action contrary to the Assembly's decisions and continuing to aid the Portuguese and South African colonialists and racists. His delegation shared the view of those speakers who had called upon the International Bank to cancel the loans recently granted to Portugal and South Africa. Although no such provision appeared in the draft resolution, his delegation supported and would vote for the latter, since it expressed the ideas which it was the task of the United Nations to uphold.

253. The representative of Australia said that, as an expression of concern regarding important aspects of the present policies of South Africa and Portugal, draft resolution A/AC.109/L.330 was bound to evoke the Australian delegation's sympathy. Despite its opposition to those policies, however, the Australian delegation could not but express its anxiety when efforts were made to control or channel international aid for political purposes, particularly when the limiting of aid might in practice mean deprivation or the elimination of opportunity for innocent people. The observance of agreements was vital to the conduct of human relations. Under the terms of article IV of the Agreement between the United Nations and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, neither organization was to present formal recommendations to the other without reasonable prior consultation with regard thereto and the United Nations recognized that action taken by the Bank on loans should be determined by the independent exercise of the Bank's own judgement. The draft resolution before the Committee did not seem to be in accord with either the spirit or the letter of that Agreement. For those reasons, his delegation could not support the draft resolution as it stood.

254. The representative of the United Kingdom recalled that his delegation had reserved its position on the issue of the introduction of political controversy in the specialized agencies in a statement at the last session of the General Assembly.¹⁵ His delegation had accordingly reserved its position on the same matter at the 415th meeting of the Special Committee and wished now to reserve its position on draft resolution A/AC.109/L.330, on which it would abstain.

255. The representative of the United States of America reserved the position of her delegation on the draft resolution, in the light of the agreements between the United Nations and the Bank and the Fund; in that regard, she wished to associate her delegation with the reservations expressed by the Australian delegation.

¹⁵ Official Records of the General Assembly, Twentieth Session, Plenary Meetings, 1395th meeting.

256. The representative of Uruguay said that his delegation had voted in favour of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX) but not of resolution 2107 (XX); in view of that fact, and in the absence of instructions, his delegation would have to abstain on the draft resolution. That abstention did not affect the basic position of Uruguay in condemning the policies of South Africa and Portugal.

257. The representative of Denmark said that at the last session of the General Assembly his delegation had either reserved its position or abstained from voting on provisions similar to those in the present draft resolution. It must therefore reserve its position with respect to the present draft resolution also. Its attitude was approximately the same as that expressed by the Australian representative.

258. At its 467th meeting on 15 September 1966, the Chairman, before putting the draft resolution to the vote, informed the Special Committee that in operative paragraph 3 the words "from rendering any financial assistance" had been revised by the sponsors to read "from rendering any financial or other assistance".

259. At the same meeting, the Special Committee adopted the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.320) as orally revised, by 15 votes to none, with 7 abstentions.

260. The representative of Venezuela speaking in explanation of his vote, said that his delegation had been obliged to abstain in the vote, primarily because it had received no instructions. In conformity with the position taken by his delegation on the same matter at the last session of the General Assembly, its abstention should not be interpreted as a change in its position regarding the policies of Portugal and South Africa, a position which was well known to the Special Committee.

261. The resolution (A/AC.109/206) thus adopted by the Special Committee at its 467th meeting, on 15 September 1966, entitled "General Assembly resolutions 2105 (XX) and 2107 (XX): requests to international institutions, including the specialized agencies", reads as follows:

"The Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

"Having considered the replies (A/AC.109/194 and Add.1) received from international institutions and the specialized agencies on the implementation of paragraph 11 of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX) of 20 December 1965 and paragraphs 9 and 10 of resolution 2107 (XX) of 21 December 1965, containing requests and appeals addressed to them,

"Noting with appreciation that several international institutions and specialized agencies have undertaken or intend to undertake in the near future measures for the implementation of the above-mentioned resolutions,

"Regretting that the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund continue to grant substantial loans and credits to the Governments of Portugal and South Africa in disregard of the above-mentioned resolutions,

"1. Expresses its appreciation to those international institutions and specialized agencies which are co-operating with the United Nations in the implementation of General Assembly resolutions 2105 (XX) and 2107 (XX) and appeals to them to continue their efforts in this regard;

"2. Expresses its deep disappointment at the granting of new loans and the extension of credits to the Governments of South Africa and Portugal by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund;

"3. Urges the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund to co-operate in the implementation of General Assembly resolutions 2105 (XX) and 2107 (XX), by refraining from rendering any financial or other assistance to the Governments of Portugal and South Africa until they have renounced their policies of colonial domination and racial discrimination."

262. The text of this resolution was transmitted to international institutions and the specialized agencies by a letter dated 2 October 1966.

H. QUESTION OF THE LIST OF TERRITORIES TO WHICH THE DECLARATION ON THE GRANTING OF INDEPENDENCE TO COLONIAL COUNTRIES AND PEOPLES IS APPLICABLE

263. In its report to the General Assembly at its twentieth session, the Special Committee stated that "subject to any directives the General Assembly at its twentieth session may wish to give for the speedy implementation of the Declaration, the Special Committee intends to continue its consideration of the question of the list of Territories to which the Declaration is applicable" (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. I, para. 66).

264. In the seventh preambular paragraph of its resolution 2105 (XX) of 20 December 1965, the General Assembly noted "the action taken and envisaged by the Special Committee regarding the list of Territories to which the Declaration is applicable".

265. At its 471st meeting, the Special Committee considered a report submitted by the Working Group concerning this question, which is contained in paragraphs 6 to 10 of the latter's twenty-fifth report (A/AC.109/L.338). These paragraphs read as follows:

"6. The Working Group noted that in its report to the General Assembly at its twentieth session the Special Committee had stated as follows: 'Subject to any directives the General Assembly at its twentieth session may wish to give for the speedy implementation of the Declaration, the Special Committee intends to continue its consideration of the question of the list of Territories to which the Declaration is applicable' (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. I, para. 66).

"7. The Working Group was also aware that, in the seventh preambular paragraph of its resolution 2105 (XX) of 20 December 1965, the General Assembly noted 'the action taken and envisaged by the Special Committee regarding the list of Territories to which the Declaration is applicable'.

"8. In this connexion, members recalled that, as stated in its report to the General Assembly at its twentieth session (ibid., para. 65), the Special Committee at its last session had before it a letter from the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Cuba requesting the inclusion of the question of Puerto Rico on the agenda of the Special Committee but that, owing to lack of time, the Committee was unable to examine that request.

"9. Members also recalled that in his address at the opening meeting of the Special Committee in Addis Ababa on 6 June 1966 (A/AC.109/SR.433) the Administrative Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) drew attention to the omission of the Comoro Archipelago from the list of Territories to which the Declaration applies, and requested that the necessary corrections be made.

"10. Following an exchange of views on various suggestions, the Working Group agreed that the question of the inclusion of these Territories, namely, Puerto Rico and the Comoro Archipelago, required further detailed study and that, in view of the lack of time at this session, it should make such a study at an early date during the next session of the Special Committee. It further agreed that, at that time, it would also consider any other Territories which might be included in the list of 'all other Territories which have not yet attained independence'."

266. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics pointed out that the question of the inclusion of Puerto Rico on the agenda of the Special Committee had already been considered the previous year and it was clear from document A/6000/Rev.1, chapter I, paragraphs 65-66, that the Committee had decided to continue its consideration of the question at subsequent sessions. Since that time, many requests had been received to the same effect, stating that the inclusion of Puerto Rico on the Committee's agenda was fully justified. His delegation was therefore in favour of considering the question during the current session; it was a perfectly clear issue since the people of Puerto Rico had not been given an opportunity to express their wishes freely concerning the future status of their country.

267. The representative of Bulgaria said that his delegation would agree with the consensus that the question of the inclusion of Puerto Rico on the Committee's agenda should be discussed early in the next session. The Special Committee was quite competent to consider Puerto Rico as a dependent Territory to which resolution 1514 (XV) was fully applicable. The Declaration in that resolution was the raison d'être of the Committee and statements appearing in United Nations documents before that Declaration had been adopted could not be allowed to prevent the Special Committee from considering all dependent Territories. He had welcomed the request made by the Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries in 1964 that the Special Committee should consider the question of Puerto Rico in the light of resolution 1514 (XV).

268. The representative of the United States of America explained that the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico was fully self-governing and autonomous, a fact which had been confirmed by the General Assembly, and was therefore not subject to the jurisdiction of the Special Committee. Her delegation would view very seriously any attempt to discuss the matter since that would question Puerto Rico's self-governing status. That status had been established following an overwhelming vote by the people of Puerto Rico in 1952. In view of the adoption of resolution 748 (VIII) by the General Assembly in 1953, her delegation considered that the subject should not be included in the Special Committee's agenda.

269. At the same meeting, the Special Committee approved the proposals contained in paragraph 10 of the report of the Working Group, it being understood that the reservations expressed by members would be reflected in the records.

I. CONSIDERATION OF OTHER MATTERS

Implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) with regard to colonial Territories considered by the Special Committee during its meetings in Africa (1966)

270. At its 454th and 455th meetings, held in Algiers on 21 and 22 June 1966, the Special Committee considered a draft resolution relating to the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) with regard to colonial Territories considered by the Committee during its meetings in Africa (1966). The draft resolution was adopted by the Special Committee at its 455th meeting on 22 June 1966 (A/AC.109/188). Details of the Special Committee's consideration of this item are contained in chapter II of the present report.

Report of the delegation of the Special Committee to the international conference concerning South West Africa, Oxford (March 1966)

271. At the 396th meeting, the Special Committee decided to accept an invitation extended to it to send observers to an international conference concerning South West Africa to be held at Oxford, England, from 23 to 27 March 1966. At the 398th meeting, the Committee decided that the delegation of observers to attend the conference on behalf of the Special Committee should consist of Mr. Hans Tabor (Denmark) and Mr. Gershon Collier (Sierra Leone). The Special Committee took into consideration the report of the delegation to the conference (A/AC.109/L.290) in its examination of the question of South West Africa, an account of which is contained in chapter IV of the present report.

Co-operation with the Organization of African Unity and the League of Arab States

272. At the 403rd meeting, the Special Committee decided to accede to a request by cable from the Administrative Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) that the Organization be represented as an observer at the Special Committee's meetings. Accordingly, representatives of the Organization attended the Committee's meetings at United Nations Headquarters, in Dar es Salaam and Addis Ababa as observers.

273. At the 440th meeting, the Committee decided to accede to a request dated 11 June 1966 from the Acting Secretary-General of the League of Arab States (A/AC.109/182) that the League be represented as an observer at the Special Committee's meetings in Cairo. Accordingly, a representative of the League of Arab States attended the Committee's meetings in Cairo in an observer capacity.

274. In a letter dated 20 September 1966, the Chairman of the Special Committee, having regard to section II, paragraph 14, sub-paragraph (c) thereof, transmitted the report of the Sub-Committee on Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland to the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU.

Matters relating to Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland

(a) Appointment of United Nations Special Representatives

275. The Special Committee, in operative paragraph 7 of its resolution of 9 June 1966 on Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland (A/AC.109/178), requested the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Special Committee, to appoint United Nations Special Representatives in each of the Territories for the purpose of following up the progress towards independence and to report to the General Assembly as soon as possible. The report of the Secretary-General concerning this matter was made available to members of the Special Committee in document A/AC.109/199.

(b) Operation of the Fund for Economic Development of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland

276. In operative paragraph 9 of its resolution 2063 (XX) of 16 December 1965 on the question of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, the General Assembly requested the Secretary-General to appoint resident representatives in the three Territories and to report to the Assembly at its twenty-first session on the operation of the Fund established under paragraph 7 of the same resolution. In operative paragraph 5 of its resolution adopted on 9 June 1966 (A/AC.109/178) the Special Committee addressed a further appeal to all States to contribute to the above-mentioned Fund.

277. In his report to the General Assembly at its twenty-first session (A/6439), the Secretary-General expressed regret that, as the contributions pledged so far were insufficient, it had not been possible to bring the Fund into operation (ibid., para. 6). Specific pledges of contributions received up to that time to the Fund were: Cyprus, £100; Democratic Republic of Congo, $US2,500; and Liberia $US6,000. In addition, Denmark and India had indicated that their Governments would contribute to the Fund when it became operational. Since then a further pledge has been received from Kuwait for $US2,000.

278. As regards the appointment of resident representatives in the three Territories, the Secretary-General stated in his report (ibid., para. 7) that the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) had established separate offices headed by a Deputy Resident Representative in each of the Territories under the general supervision of the Regional Representative of the UNDP in Lusaka, Zambia.

Information on Non-Self-Governing Territories transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter

279. The General Assembly, by resolution 1970 (XVIII) of 16 December 1963, decided to dissolve the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and entrusted its functions to the Special Committee. The Special Committee accordingly considered, at its 472nd and 473rd meetings on 12 and 19 October 1966, an item on information on Non-Self-Governing Territories transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter. Details of the Special Committee's consideration of this item are contained in chapter XXIII of the present report.

Activities of foreign economic and other interests in Southern Rhodesia and their mode of operation

280. At its 328th meeting, on 22 April 1965, the Special Committee adopted a resolution on the question of Southern Rhodesia (A/6000/Rev. 1, chap. III, para. 292). In operative paragraph 9 of that resolution the Special Committee decided "to study in co-operation with the Secretary-General and the agencies of the United Nations the implications of the activities of foreign economic and other interests in Southern Rhodesia and their mode of operation in order to assess their economic and political influence".

281. At its 409th meeting, on 26 April 1966, the Special Committee decided, without objection, to refer to Sub-Committee I, for consideration, the item relating to the activities of foreign economic and other interests in Southern Rhodesia and their mode of operation.

282. Sub-Committee I submitted its report on this item to the Special Committee on 29 September 1966. Details of the Special Committee's consideration of the report are contained in chapter III of the present report.

Activities of foreign economic and other interests which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in the Territories under Portuguese administration

283. The Special Committee, in its resolution adopted at its 277th meeting, on 3 July 1964 (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. V, para. 352), requested "Sub-Committee I of the Special Committee, with the assistance of the Secretary-General, to study the activities of foreign economic and other interests, which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence in the Territories under Portuguese administration". On the basis of the study by Sub-Committee I, the Special Committee submitted a report on the matter to the General Assembly at its twentieth session (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V), in which it endorsed the conclusions and recommendations of the Sub-Committee. In its conclusions and recommendations, the Sub-Committee informed the Special Committee as follows:

"278.... In order to enable it to have a more comprehensive view of the effects of foreign economic and other activities in the other major sectors of the economic life of the Territories under Portuguese administration, the Sub-Committee has asked the Secretariat to prepare background papers on the agricultural and allied industries, foreign owned railways and the economic relations of Mozambique with South Africa and Southern Rhodesia. After the Sub-Committee has reviewed the additional information, it will report to the Special Committee and submit such further observations, conclusions and recommendations as may be necessary." (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, appendix, para. 278.)

284. Sub-Committee I continued its consideration of this question in 1966 and submitted a supplementary report to the Special Committee at the 470th meeting on 6 October 1966. An account of the Sub-Committee's consideration of this report is contained in chapter V of the present report.

Matters relating to the small Territories

285. In operative paragraph 8 of its resolution 2105 (XX) of 20 December 1965, the General Assembly requested "the Special Committee to pay particular attention to the small Territories and to recommend to the General Assembly the most appropriate ways, as well as the steps to be taken, to enable the populations of those Territories to exercise fully their right to self-determination and independence".

286. In requesting its Sub-Committees I, II and III to carry out the tasks assigned to them, the Special Committee called their attention to the above-mentioned provision of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX). Further, in arriving at its conclusions and recommendations concerning the small Territories, details of which are contained in the relevant chapters of the present report, the Special Committee took the same provision into consideration.

287. Subject to any directives that the General Assembly at its twenty-first session may wish to give for the speedy implementation of the Declaration in respect of these Territories, the Special Committee will continue to be guided by this and other provisions of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX).

Deadline for the accession of Territories to independence

288. In operative paragraph 9 of its resolution 2105 (XX), the General Assembly requested "the Special Committee, whenever it considers it appropriate, to recommend a deadline for the accession to independence of each Territory in accordance with the wishes of the people".

289. In requesting its Sub-Committees I, II and III to carry out the tasks assigned to them, the Special Committee called their attention to the above-mentioned provision of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX). Further in its consideration of specific territories, the Special Committee took the same provision into consideration.

290. Subject to any directives that the General Assembly at its twenty-first session may wish to give in this regard, the Special Committee intends to pursue its consideration of all Territories which have not yet attained independence, and in this connexion will continue to be guided by this and other provisions of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX).

Pattern of meetings and methods of work

291. In its resolution 2116 (XX) of 21 December 1965 concerning the pattern of conferences, the General Assembly decided, inter alia, "that a fixed pattern of conferences to govern the places and dates of the meetings of United Nations bodies shall come into force on 1 January 1966 for a further period of three years". It requested the Secretary-General "to submit to the General Assembly each year a basic programme of conferences for the following year, established in conformity with the present pattern and after consultation, as appropriate, with the organs concerned". It also urged "all organs of the United Nations... to review their working methods and also the frequency and length of sessions, in the light of the present resolution, the growing volume of meetings, the resulting strain on available resources and the difficulty of ensuring the effective participation of members".

292. By adopting the twenty-fifth report of the working group (A/AC.109/L.338), the Special Committee at its 471st meeting on 10 October 1966 decided to hold two sessions in 1967, the first from 20 February to 31 May, and the second from 17 July to 25 August. This will provide for fourteen working weeks during the first session, a recess of six weeks during June and July, and six working weeks during the second session.

293. It was the understanding of the Special Committee in taking this decision that the above meetings programme would not preclude the holding of extra-sessional meetings on an emergency basis if developments so warranted. Further, the decision was based on the expectation that the Special Committee would be able to complete the major part of its work by the end of its first session. Included in the first session would also be any meetings which the Special Committee may decide to hold outside Headquarters. In fixing the closing date indicated above, the Special Committee also took account of the annual Trusteeship Council session which normally begins at the end of May and lasts for about one month. The Special Committee envisaged that the second session which should conclude before the opening of the twenty-second session of the General Assembly would be devoted to the consideration of unfinished business as well as any developments after the close of the first session which the Special Committee may wish to bring to the attention of the Assembly.

294. The Special Committee further decided that any visiting groups it might be able to dispatch to Territories should time their visits so that their reports may be taken up by the Special Committee at the beginning of its second session.

295. Finally, the Special Committee decided that in order to ensure adherence to the programme outlined above, it would, first, decide its programme of work in some detail at the beginning of the first session, and secondly, decide upon the Territories to which it would send visiting groups, in order to allow sufficient time for the necessary negotiations, planning and administrative arrangements.

J. RELATIONS WITH OTHER UNITED NATIONS BODIES

Security Council

296. The General Assembly, in its resolution 1956 (XVIII) of 11 December 1963, invited the Special Committee to apprise the Security Council of any developments in any Territory examined by it which may threaten international peace and security.

297. In operative paragraph 6 of its resolution of 21 April 1966 (A/AC.109/158), the Special Committee recommended to the Security Council "to consider urgently the further measures envisaged under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations to put into effect its decisions concerning Southern Rhodesia". In operative paragraph 7 of the same resolution, the Special Committee recommended to the Security Council "that it request the Government of the United Kingdom to take measures provided for in Chapter VII of the Charter in order, by the use of air, sea or land forces, to prevent any supplies, including oil and petroleum products, from reaching Southern Rhodesia". 299. By operative paragraph 5 of its resolution of 9 June 1966 (A/AC.109/177), the Special Committee drew "the attention of the Security Council to the serious situation prevailing in South West Africa and its aggravation caused by the racist rebellion in Southern Rhodesia and its consequences for international peace and security". The Special Committee, in operative paragraph 6 of this resolution recommended to the Security Council "to make it obligatory for all States to implement the measures contained in General Assembly resolution 1899 (XVIII) of 13 November 1963 and in particular those mentioned in paragraph 7 thereof". mittee recommended to the Security Council "to make obligatory the measures provided for under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter against Portugal, South Africa and the racist minority régime in Southern Rhodesia". The text of this resolution was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 1 July 1966.²¹

Trusteeship Council

In accordance with paragraph 8 of General Assembly resolution 1654 (XVI) which requested the Trusteeship Council to assist the Special Committee in its work, the President of the Trusteeship Council, by letter dated 25 July 1966 (A/AC.109/191) addressed to the Chairman, informed the Special Committee that the Council at its thirty-third session examined conditions in the Trust Territories of the Pacific Islands, Nauru and New Guinea. The letter stated that the conclusions and recommendations of the Trusteeship Council, as well as the observations of the members of the Trusteeship Council, representing their individual opinions only, were contained in its report to the Security Council on the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands²² and in its report to the General Assembly on Nauru and New Guinea (A/6304).

Special Committee on the Policies of Apartheid of the Government of the Republic of South Africa

304. The Chairman of the Special Committee has maintained close contact with the Chairman of the Special Committee on the Policies of Apartheid of the Government of the Republic of South Africa as regards matters of common interest relating to the work of the two Committees.

305. By letter dated 14 September 1966 addressed to the Chairman of the Special Committee, the Chairman of the Special Committee on the Policies of Apartheid of the Government of South Africa drew attention to a memorandum received from Mr. Matthew Nkoana of the Pan-Africanist Congress of South Africa, concerning the arrest in Basutoland of Mr. John Myati Pokela, a member of that party (A/AC.109/204). The memorandum, reproduced in document A/AC.115/L.182, was made available to the members of the Special Committee.

K. REVIEW OF WORK²³

309. In resolution 2105 (XX), the General Assembly renewed the mandate of the Special Committee requesting it to continue to perform its task and to continue to seek the best means for the immediate and full application of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) to all Territories which have not yet attained independence. The Assembly also requested the Committee to pay particular attention to the small Territories; to recommend a deadline for the accession of each Territory to independence whenever it considered it appropriate; and to apprise the Security Council of developments in any Territory which may threaten international peace and security and to make suggestions which might assist the Council in considering appropriate measures under the Charter of the United Nations.

310. At the beginning of its work in 1966, many members of the Special Committee expressed the feeling that progress in the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples has fallen far short of the expectations aroused by its adoption nearly six years ago. It was noted that generally there had been no abatement in the persistent violation of the right of colonial countries and peoples to self-determination, and in repressive activities by the Powers concerned, in collusion with vested economic and other interests, against the struggle of national liberation movements. The belief was expressed that this anachronistic state of affairs represented one of the basic causes of the prevailing unfavourable international situation. In particular, many members were gravely concerned that, owing to the deliberate opposition or the continuing non-co-operation of the administering Powers concerned, a number of serious and difficult colonial problems had shown no perceptible movement towards peaceful solution within the context of the Declaration, and had attained alarmingly grave proportions, fraught with dangerous possibilities. It was in this context that the Committee approached its tasks at the beginning of 1966.

311. In the course of its work during 1966, the Special Committee continued to examine the implementation of the Declaration with respect to individual Territories. In the case of some Territories, because of new developments concerning them, it was necessary to consider them more than once. The Committee also completed studies on the activities of foreign economic and other interests in the Territories under Portuguese administration and in Southern Rhodesia, on the basis of which it made recommendations to the General Assembly (see chapters III and V of the present report). The Committee also continued to discharge the additional functions entrusted to it by the General Assembly concerning the question of South West Africa and of information on Non-Self-Governing Territories transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter.

312. This programme of work placed a great strain on the resources of the Special Committee which it attempted to meet by means of a heavy schedule of meetings both in plenary session and in its sub-committees. However despite the fact that the Committee met from March until November, except for one short break, it was not able to give adequate consideration to a few of the questions on its agenda.

313. During the period under review, the Special Committee noted the attainment of independence of three of the Territories which had been the subject of consideration by the General Assembly and by the Special Committee, namely, British Guiana (Guyana), Bechuanaland (Botswana), and Basutoland (Lesotho). It also noted the setting of 30 November 1966 as the date on which Barbados would become independent.

314. As foreshadowed in its last report to the General Assembly, the Special Committee held a further series of meetings in Africa in 1966. The Committee accepted invitations extended to it by the Governments of Algeria, Ethiopia, Somalia, the United Arab Republic and the United Republic of Tanzania and held a series of meetings in their respective capitals in May and June. The Committee wishes to lay particular stress on the important results achieved by these meetings, which not only underlined the increasing concern of the United Nations for the position of colonial peoples, but strengthened the Committee's own capacity to assist these peoples in their struggle for freedom and independence. Further, the Committee's visit facilitated the appearance before it of representatives of national liberation movements wishing to express their views regarding the future of their countries, who would otherwise have found it impossible to travel to New York.

315. The Special Committee devoted prolonged attention to the question of Southern Rhodesia, the situation regarding which was further aggravated by the illegal declaration of independence by the racist minority régime. The Committee was aware of statements by the United Kingdom Government that it would seek to end the rebellion without delay and to assist the people of the Territory towards majority rule and a society free of oppression and discrimination. The Committee nevertheless noted that the diplomatic and economic sanctions applied against Southern Rhodesia by that Government had not resulted in progress towards these aims. Further, the measures taken by the majority of Member States in response to the relevant United Nations resolutions had had no more than limited impact on the régime, owing mainly to the failure of the Governments of South Africa and Portugal to take corresponding action. In addition, the United Kingdom to the disapproval of the Committee undertook pourparlers with the régime without regard to the harmful consequences which these pourparlers might entail for the legitimate rights of the African people. It was therefore the considered view of the Committee that energetic action by the United Kingdom Government, including the use of force, was necessary, in order to pave the way for positive progress in the implementation of the Declaration to this Territory.

316. On the question of South West Africa, the continuing disregard of the pertinent United Nations resolutions by the Government of South Africa was further demonstrated by its introduction of further repressive legislation in application of its apartheid policies. It also proceeded with the establishment of the infrastructure considered necessary for the establishment of "homelands", in line with the recommendations of the (Odendaal) Commission of Enquiry into South West Africa Affairs, 1962-1963. Moreover, the Special Committee noted with disappointment that the long-awaited judgement of the International Court of Justice, delivered on 18 July 1966, refrained from pronouncing on the substantive legal issues placed before it for adjudication. While recognizing that the earlier advisory opinions as well as the 1962 judgement of the Court remained unimpaired, the Committee considered that it was the responsibility of the United Nations to achieve a political solution to the problem. In this regard, the Committee reaffirmed that the provisions of the Declaration continued to be applicable to South West Africa and reiterated the right of the people of the Territory to self-determination and independence. It also recommended that the mandate should be terminated and that the United Nations should concurrently assume responsibility for the direct administration of the Territory, with the view of making arrangements for the holding of elections on the basis of universal adult suffrage and the granting of full independence.

317. As regards the Territories under Portuguese administration, the administering Power, maintaining its insistence that they were overseas provinces, took additional measures for their political, economic and administrative integration with Portugal. Continuing to avail itself of assistance from some States, it further intensified its military operations against the African population of the Territories. It also extended its violation of the economic and political rights of the indigenous population by the large-scale settlement of foreign immigrants and by the export of African workers to South Africa. In view of these developments, the Special Committee recommended to the Security Council to make it obligatory for all States to implement the measures provided for in General Assembly resolution 2107 (XX). The Committee also remained of the opinion that the Security Council should take the steps necessary to implement its own resolutions concerning these Territories.

318. As a result of the special studies it undertook concerning Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, and the Territories under Portuguese administration, the Special Committee noted the prominent role played in the economic life of these Territories by international economic and financial interests. The Committee was concerned that these interests, in collaboration with one another, had been instrumental in denying the African people the means of effective participation in the economic life of their countries. The Committee therefore considered that the activities of these interests, which were impeding the implementation of the Declaration in these and other colonial Territories, should be urgently inscribed as an item on the agenda of the General Assembly.

319. Concerning Aden, the Special Committee regretted that the United Kingdom Government had not taken the necessary steps to establish normal conditions, including the abolition of the state of emergency, the repeal of laws restrictive of public freedom, the cessation of repressive activities, the release of political prisoners and the return of exiles. A new element in the already grave situation relating to mass arrests and the torturing of political prisoners was also brought to the attention of the Special Committee. The Committee was further concerned at the prospect of the United Kingdom transferring all powers to the unrepresentative régime in the Territory and in conditions which would not correspond to the provisions of the Declaration. It accordingly requested the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Special Committee and the administering Power, to appoint immediately a special mission to Aden for the purpose of recommending practical steps necessary for the full implementation of the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and, in particular, for determining the extent of United Nations participation in the preparation and supervision of elections. The Committee was disappointed that the United Kingdom Government, while expressing willingness to co-operate with a United Nations mission for the purpose indicated above, had recorded certain reservations in this connexion which created difficulties in the way of the appointment of the special mission. The Committee remained convinced that any hope of arresting the deteriorating situation in the Territory lay in the unqualified acceptance and implementation by the United Kingdom Government, in full co-operation with the United Nations, of the relevant United Nations resolutions.

320. Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, which had been of special concern to the Special Committee in previous years, were also the subject of extensive consideration. Disturbed, as previously, at their unsatisfactory economic and social situation, the Committee accordingly appealed to all States to contribute to the Fund established by the General Assembly for their economic development. In view of the imminent independence of Bechuanaland on 30 September and of Basutoland on 4 October, the Committee gave urgent attention to the measures necessary to enable them to enjoy complete independence and to secure their territorial integrity and sovereignty.

In addition to requesting the United Kingdom Government to take all appropriate action, the Committee recommended that the General Assembly address a strong warning to the South African Government against any encroachment upon the territorial integrity and sovereignty of the Territories and any hindrance to the movement of persons and goods. As regards Swaziland, the Committee maintained its view that steps should be taken by the administering Power to ensure its accession to independence in full compliance with the Declaration.

321. The Special Committee paid particular attention to the small Territories, regarding which there had also been regrettable delays in the implementation of the Declaration. On the question of Fiji, the Special Committee considered that general elections should be held on the basis of universal suffrage for the purpose of forming a constituent assembly which would be responsible for drawing up a democratic constitution. The Committee also urged the United Kingdom Government to ensure the formation of a representative Government, the transfer of full powers to that Government and the fixing of an early date for the independence of the Territory. In addition, it decided to appoint a sub-committee to visit Fiji for the purpose of studying at first hand the situation in the Territory. Regarding Equatorial Guinea, the Committee was appreciative of the co-operation extended by the Government of Spain in permitting a sub-committee to visit the Territory. On the basis of the findings of the sub-committee, the Committee decided to recommend that the Spanish Government should, inter alia, convene a conference, fully representative of the people of the Territory, to establish the modalities for the transfer of all powers to the people and to fix a date for independence, which, in response to their wishes, should be no later than July 1968.

322. With regard to the smaller Territories, the Special Committee recognized that their small size and population as well as their limited resources presented peculiar problems. At the same time, the Committee was firmly of the opinion that the provisions of the Declaration were fully applicable to them. Accordingly, it requested the administering Powers responsible for these Territories to ensure, without delay, that the people were enabled, in complete freedom and without any restrictions, to express their wishes concerning the future of their countries. In this connexion, the Committee expressed the belief in the desirability of a United Nations presence during the procedures for the exercise of the right of self-determination. The Committee also noted the urgent need for measures to strengthen the economic base of these Territories and to promote their social and economic development. In a few of these Territories, the Committee was deeply concerned by reports pointing to preparations for their use for military purposes and by the lack of respect shown for their territorial integrity by the administering Power.

323. Having regard to its mandate, the Special Committee once again laid special stress on the importance of sending visiting missions to the smaller Territories referred to above. In view of the inadequacy of the information available to it regarding conditions in these Territories and as to the views, wishes and aspirations of the people, the Committee reiterated its request to the administering Powers to extend their full co-operation by permitting access to the Territories under their administration. The Committee noted with regret that the responses of the administering Powers concerned to this request were either negative or qualified in character. The Committee, therefore, considered that the General Assembly should again urge them to reconsider their attitudes in view of the vital importance to its work of the sending of visiting missions.

324. The Committee also had before it for consideration a number of Territories which were the subject of either conflicting claims to sovereignty or of special interest to some Member States for geographical, historical, economic and other reasons. Included in this category were the Falkland Islands (Malvinas), French Somaliland, Gibraltar, and Ifni and Spanish Sahara. As noted in a previous report, the Committee was of the view that the provisions of the Declaration fully applied to such Territories and that such disputes or divergent interests as may exist with respect to them should be peacefully resolved through mutual accommodation and goodwill.

L. FUTURE WORK

325. It will be noted from the various chapters of the present report that there still remain a large number of colonial Territories which have not yet attained independence. The Special Committee believes that until the peoples of all of the remaining Territories are enabled to exercise their right to self-determination and independence in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), the Assembly would wish the Special Committee to continue to examine the situation in each of these Territories with a view to assisting in the earliest possible application of the Declaration.

326. Subject to any further directives that the General Assembly might give at its twenty-first session, the Special Committee intends in 1967 to continue to seek the best ways and means for the immediate and full application of the Declaration with regard to the Territories already examined. It also intends to take up for consideration those questions to which for lack of time it was not able to give adequate attention. As indicated in paragraphs 263 to 269 above, the Special Committee also intends to give further consideration to the question of the list of Territories to which the Declaration applies.

327. As already indicated in paragraphs 285 to 290 above, the Special Committee, in its examination of Territories, will continue to be guided by the requests contained in operative paragraphs 8 and 9 of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX). In these paragraphs, the General Assembly requested the Special Committee to pay particular attention to the small Territories and, when appropriate, to recommend a deadline for the accession to independence of each Territory in accordance with the wishes of the people.

328. In the section of this chapter concerning visiting missions (paragraphs 184 to 223 above) and in many of the chapters of the present report relating to specific Territories, the Special Committee has set out its recommendations with regard to visiting missions. It will be clear from these recommendations that the Special Committee continues to place great value on such visits as a means of collecting first-hand information on conditions in the Territories and the wishes of the people, thus assisting it in the implementation of the Declaration. It intends therefore to pursue its recommendations with the utmost vigour and to continue to seek the co-operation of the administering Powers to enable such visits to take place.

329. Further, considering the value and importance attaching to the series of meetings the Committee has held in past years in Africa, the Special Committee may hold another series of meetings in Africa.

330. In accordance with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 2116 (XX) concerning the pattern of conferences, the Special Committee has already approved a tentative time-table to enable it to carry out its programme of work in 1967. The tentative time-table and related decisions are set out in paragraphs 292-295 of this chapter.

331. In order to assist it in carrying out its tasks in 1967, the Special Committee wishes to offer the following recommendations which the General Assembly may wish to include among the matters it takes into consideration when it examines the question of the implementation of the Declaration.

332. The Special Committee considers that the General Assembly should renew its appeal to administering Powers to implement the Declaration on the Granting of Independence in the colonial Territories they are administering without further delay.

333. The Assembly should again appeal to the administering Powers to co-operate with the Special Committee by facilitating visits to Territories in accordance with the requests contained in resolutions and decisions already adopted by the Special Committee and with any other decisions in this regard that the Committee may find it appropriate to adopt in the future.

334. The Assembly should again request the administering Powers to co-operate with the Secretary-General in promoting large-scale dissemination of the Declaration and of information on the work of the United Nations and, in particular, of the Special Committee in implementation of the Declaration.

335. The Special Committee recommends that the Assembly approve the programme of work as outlined in this section and make adequate financial provision to cover the expenses of the activities of the Committee, including the cost of visiting groups. Further, within the context of operative paragraph 6 of General Assembly resolution 1654 (XVI), the Special Committee may decide to hold another series of meetings in Africa. The Special Committee considers that its activities in 1967 will give rise to expenditure of the order of $250,000.

336. The Special Committee considers that the Assembly should request the Secretary-General to continue to provide the Special Committee with all the facilities and personnel necessary for the implementation of its mandate.

M. APPROVAL OF THE REPORT

337. The Special Committee approved the present report, as a whole, at its 483rd meeting on 30 November 1966.

ANNEX II

[A/AC.109/L.318]

Report of Sub-Committee II

Rapporteur: Mr. C. R. GHAREKHAN (India)

INTRODUCTION

1. At its 400th meeting on 4 April 1966, the Special Committee decided to continue Sub-Committee II with the same membership, except for the replacement of Cambodia by Afghanistan.

2. At its 42nd meeting on 28 April 1966, Sub-Committee II elected Mr. Kadhim Khalaf (Iraq) as Chairman and Mr. C. R. Gharekhan (India) as Rapporteur.

3. At its 43rd meeting on 5 May, the Sub-Committee decided first to consider the question of visiting missions, the Territories referred to it, and then take the Territories up in the following order: Gilbert and Ellice Islands, Pitcairn, Solomon Islands, New Hebrides, American Samoa, Guam, Niue, Tokelau Islands, Cocos (Keeling) Islands, Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, Trust Territory of Nauru, Trust Territory of New Guinea (and the Territory of Papua), Brunei and Hong Kong.

VISITING MISSIONS

Consideration by the Sub-Committee

4. The Sub-Committee considered the question of sending visiting missions to the Territories referred to it at its 44th, 45th, 46th, 47th and 48th meetings held on 12 May, 19 July, 2, 8 and 9 August.

5. Regarding the views of administering Powers concerning the sending of visiting missions to their Territories, the Sub-Committee received the following information.

6. The representative of the United Kingdom said that the dispatch of visiting missions to the Territories administered by the United Kingdom raised difficult questions of principle and he could not encourage the Sub-Committee to expect that his Government's existing position would change. His delegation was, however, prepared to transmit to the United Kingdom Government any particular request concerning the sending of such a mission to a specific Territory, although this could not be regarded as implying any commitment that such a request would be accepted.

7. The representative of the United States of America said that, if the Sub-Committee proposed a visiting mission to Guam and American Samoa in 1966, the United States Government would probably not think that the situation warranted such a journey; the Territories administered by the United States were advancing rapidly towards self-government and should not present a pressing priority for the Special Committee in arranging its crowded work agenda for the year.

8. The representative of Australia stated that in certain circumstances visiting missions could be of value. He was doubtful, however, whether this applied to the Committee of Twenty-Four visiting missions to Australian Territories which had been the subject of intense scrutiny by the United Nations over a period of a good many years so that the United Nations had become very familiar with all aspects of development there. A part of this scrutiny had been by visiting missions from the Trusteeship Council.

9. Nevertheless, the attitude of his Government was conditioned in important part by the fact that, just as an Administering Authority had responsibilities in the territories for which it was responsible, so also it had rights—and among these was the right to accept or not to accept a visiting mission.

10. His Government could give no agreement in vacuo to accept a mission and would have to consider at any time in relation to any specific request such factors as the appropriateness of any particular time proposed, the convenience of the Australian Government, the convenience of the Territory Administration and the composition of any mission that might be proposed. These considerations, at any given time, would no doubt be conditioned also by particular views which his Government might have in relation, for example, to United Nations finances involved in any particular proposals and whether duplication and/or overlapping of United Nations effort was involved.

11. His Government could not therefore at this stage give any commitment that it would be able to respond to a request to receive a visiting mission, but his delegation would be prepared to transmit to its Government any specific request that might be put forward by the Committee or Sub-Committee at any particular time.

12. In a letter dated 1 August 1966, the representative of New Zealand stated that his Government had no objection to such a mission although it considered that any visit by a United Nations mission to Niue and Tokelau Islands should be undertaken only as part of a more comprehensive tour of the area.

13. The representative of France informed the Sub-Committee that his Government did not encourage the sending of a visiting mission to the New Hebrides.

14. The representatives of India, Chile, Iraq and Poland stated that they were in favour of recommending to the Special Committee that visiting missions should be sent to the Territories referred to the Sub-Committee.

15. The Sub-Committee, bearing in mind the remarks of some members, agreed to make a recommendation to the Special Committee concerning the sending of visiting missions to the Territories referred to it.

Recommendation of the Sub-Committee

16. The Sub-Committee recommends that the Special Committee should invite the administering Powers to receive visiting missions to the Territories referred to Sub-Committee II. The Sub-Committee's recommendations regarding the details of the Territories to be visited and the dates of the visits will be decided upon at a later stage.

CHAPTER II*

MEETINGS HELD IN AFRICA

INTRODUCTION

1. In its report to the General Assembly at its twentieth session, the Special Committee envisaged, as part of its programme for 1966, the possibility of holding another series of meetings in Africa during that year, in view of the great importance of the work that its previous visits to Africa had enabled it to carry out. This programme was approved by the General Assembly in operative paragraph 7 of resolution 2105 (XX). Within the context of the programme thus approved, the Governments of the United Republic of Tanzania, the United Arab Republic, Ethiopia, Somalia and Algeria extended invitations to the Special Committee (A/AC.109/147-150 and 152) to hold meetings at their respective capitals during 1966.

2. During the discussions on the organization of work which took place at its meetings held between 8 March and 6 May 1966, a wide measure of support was expressed by members of the Special Committee for the holding of a series of meetings in Africa. Several members expressed the view that the holding of such meetings would enable the members of the Committee to study closely the situation in certain Territories, the attitudes of the administering Powers concerned and the extent to which the provisions of previous resolutions had been implemented. It would, moreover, facilitate the appearance before the Committee of petitioners who would otherwise find it impossible to travel to New York.

3. At its 400th meeting on 4 April 1966, the Special Committee considered and, after discussion, approved, by 20 votes to none with 3 abstentions, a recommendation in this regard which was contained in the twenty-second report of the Working Group (A/AC.109/L.265/Rev.1). By approving this recommendation, the Committee decided to hold a series of meetings in Africa during 1966 and to travel to Africa for that purpose not later than the middle of May.

4. At its 408th and 409th meetings on 26 April, the Special Committee considered further recommendations on the subject which were contained in the twenty-third and twenty-fourth reports of the Working Group (A/AC.109/L.270 and 275). The Committee also had before it a report by the Secretary-General on the administrative and financial implications of the Working Group's recommendations (A/AC.109/L.271). The Committee at its 409th meeting decided to adopt the reports of the Working Group, on the understanding that the reservations expressed by some members would appear in the record. By adopting these reports, the Committee decided that it would accept the invitations extended to it by the five Governments, and that the duration of its meetings in Africa would be for a period not exceeding six weeks. The Committee decided at the same time that these meetings should begin at Dar es Salaam, United Republic of Tanzania, on 23 May 1966, and subject to the convenience of the Governments of Somalia, Ethiopia, the United Arab Republic and Algeria, it would hold meetings thereafter at Mogadiscio, Addis Ababa, Cairo and Algiers respectively. Reservations were expressed by some members regarding the duration of the visit and the number of capitals to be visited.

5. In reaching these decisions, the Special Committee took account of a statement made by the Chairman at the same meeting setting out the recommendations of the Working Group concerning the items to be taken up at the various capitals, subject to the agreement of the host Governments. These recommendations were as follows:

Dar es Salaam: Southern Rhodesia, Mozambique, Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland;

Mogadiscio: French Somaliland, Mauritius and the Seychelles;

Addis Ababa: South West Africa, Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, Ifni, Spanish Sahara and French Somaliland;

Cairo: Aden and Oman;

Algiers: Angola, Portuguese Guinea, São Tomé and Príncipe and dependencies, the Cape Verde Archipelago, Equatorial Guinea (Fernando Póo and Río Muni).

* Previously issued under the symbol A/6300 (part II).

The Chairman also informed the Committee that in making these recommendations, the Working Group envisaged that the hearing of petitioners would take precedence over the substantive consideration of the above-named items.

6. In a letter dated 7 May 1966 (A/AC.109/159), the Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom to the United Nations informed the Chairman of the Special Committee that the United Kingdom Government would not be able to be represented in the Committee at its meetings in Africa. Also contained in the letter was an invitation to members of the Committee to hold informal discussions in London with representatives of the United Kingdom Government, on their way to Dar es Salaam. After a discussion at the 411th meeting concerning the letter, the Chairman of the Special Committee addressed a reply on 13 May 1966 to the Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom expressing the regret of the majority of the members at the prospect of the United Kingdom not participating in the Committee's meetings in Africa, and appealing to it to reconsider its decision. The Chairman also informed the United Kingdom that the Committee's itinerary did not provide for travel by way of London and that consequently the opportunity for the proposed discussions in London would regrettably not occur (A/AC.109/160). In a reply dated 17 May 1966, the Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom informed the Chairman that the decision of the United Kingdom Government concerning its non-participation in the Special Committee's meetings in Africa had been taken only after the most serious consideration of all the issues involved and that, accordingly, the United Kingdom Government was unable to change that decision (A/AC.109/162).

7. In a telegram dated 3 June 1966, the Permanent Representative of Uruguay to the United Nations informed the Chairman of the Special Committee that his delegation was unable, for reasons beyond its control, to participate in the Special Committee's debates during its visit to Africa. He expressed support for the work of the Committee and gratitude to the various host Governments for their invitation (A/AC.109/173).

8. On 14 May 1966 the Chairman on behalf of the Special Committee issued a communiqué on the Committee's meetings in Africa which was widely disseminated in the five host countries. The text of this communiqué is appended to this chapter (annex I).

9. Members of the Special Committee,¹ accompanied by the representative of the Secretary-General and other members of the Secretariat, arrived at Dar es Salaam on 22 May 1966. The Special Committee met in Dar es Salaam from 23 to 31 May 1966 at the Msimbazi Community Centre; it arrived in Mogadiscio on 1 June, and met from 2 to 4 June 1966 at the Parliament Building; it arrived in Addis Ababa on 5 June and met from 6 to 9 June 1966 at Africa Hall; it arrived in Cairo on 10 June and met from 11 to 15 June 1966 at the headquarters of the League of Arab States; and it arrived in Algiers on 17 June and met from 17 to 22 June 1966 at the Club-des-Pins Conference Hall.

10. During its stay in Africa, the Special Committee held forty plenary meetings, and the Sub-Committee on Petitions twelve meetings. The Special Committee heard thirty-two groups of petitioners and circulated thirty-nine written petitions, excluding requests for hearings.

11. At the opening of its meetings in Dar es Salaam, Mogadiscio, Addis Ababa, Cairo and Algiers respectively, the Special Committee was addressed by H.E. Mr. Rashidi Kawawa, second Vice-President, on behalf of the President of the United Republic of Tanzania, by H.E. Hagi Hussein Abdirizak, Prime Minister, on behalf of the President of Somalia, by H.E. Mr. Ketema Yifru, Minister of Foreign Affairs, on behalf of His Imperial Majesty, the Emperor of Ethiopia, by H.E. Mr. Mahmoud Riad, Minister of Foreign Affairs, on behalf of the President of the United Arab Republic, and by H.E. Mr. Abdelaziz Bouteflika, Minister of Foreign Affairs, on behalf of the President of the Revolutionary Council and Head of the Government of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria. The Special Committee also had the honour of being received by the Head of State or Government at each of the five capitals.

12. In accordance with the decision taken by the Special Committee at its 403rd meeting, representatives of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) attended the Committee's meetings in Dar es Salaam and Addis Ababa as observers. On 17 May 1966, the Administrative Secretary-General of that organization addressed a letter to the Chairman in which he welcomed the Committee to Africa and offered it the co-operation and assistance of his organization (A/AC.109/165). Following another decision taken by the Committee at its 440th meeting on 11 June 1966, to grant a request addressed to the Chairman by the Acting Secretary-General of the League of Arab States (A/AC.109/182), a representative of that organization attended the Committee's meetings in Cairo in an observer capacity.

13. In accordance with a decision taken by the Special Committee at its 424th meeting on 30 May 1966, to grant a request addressed to the Chairman on behalf of the Government of Czechoslovakia (A/AC.109/164 and 166), a representative of that Government attended the meetings in Africa as an observer. Following other decisions taken by the Committee at its 428th and 433rd meetings on 2 June and 6 June 1966 concerning requests addressed to it on behalf of the Government of Somalia (A/AC.109/169 and Add.1), a delegation of that Government attended the meetings of the Special Committee in Mogadiscio and Addis Ababa in an observer capacity. Further, in accordance with a decision taken by the Committee at its 440th meeting on 11 June 1966, to grant a similar request from the Government of the United Arab Republic (A/AC.109/180), a representative of that Government attended the meetings in Cairo as an observer. Finally, representatives of the Governments of Algeria and of Spain attended the meetings in Algiers as observers following a decision taken by the Committee at its 448th meeting on 17 June 1966 to grant requests made to it by those Governments (A/AC.109/184 and 185).

14. At its 426th meeting, on 31 May 1966, the representative of Czechoslovakia with the consent of the Special Committee made a statement on the question of Southern Rhodesia. At the 428th and 430th meetings on 2 and 3 June 1966 the representative of Somalia in accordance with a decision taken by the Committee concerning a request submitted by his Government (A/AC.109/172), participated in its consideration of French Somaliland. At the 435th and 436th meetings on 7 June 1966, the representatives of Mauritania and Morocco, in accordance with decisions taken by the Committee to grant requests submitted on behalf of their respective Governments (A/AC.109/174 and 175) participated in the discussions on Ifni and Spanish Sahara. The representative of Spain, whose request for permission to participate in these discussions (A/AC.109/176) was granted by the Committee at the 435th meeting, subsequently submitted a letter withdrawing his request (A/AC.109/176/Add.1). At the 441st to 447th meetings held between 11 and 15 June 1966, the representative of the United Arab Republic following a decision taken by the Committee to grant a request made on behalf of his Government (A/AC.109/181) participated in the discussions on the questions of Aden and Oman. Finally, at the 451st, 452nd and 454th meetings held on 20 and 21 June 1966, the representative of Spain, in accordance with a decision taken by the Committee concerning a request submitted on behalf of his Government (A/AC.109/185) participated in the discussion on the question of Equatorial Guinea (Fernando Póo and Río Muni).

15. Following consideration of the relevant items, the Special Committee adopted resolutions on the questions of Southern Rhodesia (chapter III, paragraph 1097), South West Africa (chapter IV, paragraph 306), Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland (chapter VII, paragraph 237), Aden (chapter VI, paragraph 382), Equatorial Guinea (chapter IX, paragraph 79), and Territories under Portuguese administration (chapter V, paragraph 675), as well as a consensus concerning the question of Ifni and Spanish Sahara (chapter X, paragraph 116). An account of the Special Committee's consideration of these items is contained in chapters III, VII, IX and X of the present report.

16. With regard to the question of French Somaliland, the Special Committee decided at its 432nd meeting held on 4 June 1966 that following the hearing of petitioners and statements by representatives it would conclude consideration of the item upon the resumption of its meetings in New York. As regards Mauritius and the Seychelles, the Committee decided on the proposal of the Chairman at the 447th meeting on 15 June 1966 to defer consideration until the resumption of its meetings in New York. On the question of Oman, the Committee similarly decided at the same meeting, that following the hearing of petitioners it would defer consideration until the resumption of its meetings in New York.

17. In the light of its discussions on the above-mentioned items, the Special Committee also adopted a resolution concerning the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) with regard to colonial Territories considered by it in Africa in 1966 (see paragraph 619 below). It also adopted by acclamation a resolution expressing its appreciation to the host Governments (see paragraph 626 below).

A. MEETINGS HELD AT DAR ES SALAAM, UNITED REPUBLIC OF TANZANIA

Opening of Meetings

Address by the Second Vice-President on behalf of the President of the United Republic of Tanzania

18. The Second Vice-President of the United Republic of Tanzania greeted members on behalf of the President and Government of Tanzania and expressed his country's view that the work of the Special Committee was fundamental to the whole purpose of the United Nations. Some considered the Special Committee less important than other United Nations bodies directly concerned with the affairs of peace and war; but Tanzania fully recognized its significance in that it was dealing with colonialism and therefore with the principle of human equality in the world and subsequent threat to universal peace and order. Africans were convinced that peace among peoples based on the injustice of colonialism was impossible. No group of world citizens would agree for ever to be governed by other people. Therefore Africans would resort to arms, if necessary, to achieve their freedom. The role of the Special Committee was to endeavour to obviate the need to fight by fostering a situation in which the peoples of each nation governed themselves in accordance with their own wishes and needs. The members of the Special Committee should therefore be working themselves out of a job.

19. He expressed strong disagreement with the view that it was a waste of money for the Special Committee to travel in Africa when it could not visit the colonial Territories themselves.

20. The depth of African emotion over freedom from all interference was not understood in the sophisticated and developed countries of Europe and America. In Africa, however, the Special Committee could not fail to grasp the importance of its activity, for it would meet people who had to deal with the day-to-day results of colonialism and Tanzanians who were trying, with inadequate resources, to guard their frontier against the colonial forces of Portugal. The Special Committee would also meet many political refugees from colonialism and hear them in their own environment, which would make it easier to judge their conviction and sincerity. Although the Special Committee could not visit the colonial Territories themselves, Africa was so much one in its history and traditions that an understanding of conditions in newly independent Africa was a sound basis for a grasp of the reality of continuing colonialism.

21. Since the Special Committee's previous visit, there had been only limited progress away from colonialism in Africa, and there had been one overwhelming setback to the cause of justice and humanity. That situation could not be allowed to continue and words alone would not put matters right. The Special Committee had come to listen to petitioners; afterwards it would pass resolutions and report to its parent body. If nothing further happened no progress would have been made and the situation would have deteriorated with the passage of time. Action must result because colonialism was a festering sore which, as long as it remained, poisoned the whole body.

22. African States were recovering from a period in which their peoples had been humiliated and denied the most elementary rights to prepare themselves for the efficient service of their country. Africans were having to learn the arts of administration and economic development as they practised them, since before independence their destinies were decided for them and their training was designed to make them good Englishmen, good Frenchmen or good Belgians. Africans had to eliminate that poison from the body of their society at the same time as they demanded of the people a degree of activity beyond anything needed in the developed countries.

23. Africans did not wish to be obliged to resort to arms. They wanted freedom for Africa to enable it to live in friendship with the whole world, and an orderly transfer of power from the colonial authorities to the peoples of the States concerned.

24. Africans would be very patient, subject to formal recognition by the colonial Powers of the principle that all States under their jurisdiction would attain independence on the basis of majority rule. But if that principle was not conceded and if work did not begin on the transfer of power, Africans would be forced to prepare themselves for a war of liberation. They hoped that the work of the Special Committee would help to make it unnecessary for any African peoples to take up arms.

25. He welcomed the prospect that the British Territories of Bechuanaland and Basutoland would receive their independence during 1966. But he would like the Special Committee to examine the reality of that transfer of power. If the United Nations was satisfied with the situation, then Tanzanians would congratulate those peoples, and the Committee, on that new accession to freedom in Africa.

26. But those countries were almost completely surrounded by the Republic of South Africa. The Special Committee and the United Nations as a whole should therefore be vigilant in order to ensure that those countries maintained their sovereignty. Although the situation in South Africa was not the direct concern of the Special Committee, it was relevant to all discussion concerning the southern part of Africa. The course which South West Africa would take to freedom would be very much affected by the forthcoming judgement of the International Court of Justice and by the subsequent action taken by the Security Council. But no member of the Special Committee could doubt the reality of the oppression under which South West Africa was suffering, or that the situation would be brought to an end. The Special Committee had the responsibility of trying to make the transition to freedom a constructive rather than a destructive one.

27. The problem of the Portuguese Territories was of direct concern to the Special Committee, which had to make the world realize two things: that Portuguese colonialism continued only because of the support which Portugal received from her allies in Europe; and that therefore the whole relationship between Africa and Europe would be affected by developments in the freedom struggles of the Portuguese colonies.

28. In all the colonial Territories to which he had referred the situation was the same as when the Special Committee had visited Africa previously, or a little better.

29. But in Southern Rhodesia the situation was, of course, very much worse. Tanzania wanted Southern Rhodesia to be independent on no other basis than majority rule. It had called upon the United Kingdom Government to defeat the illegal régime and give a pledge that Southern Rhodesia would become independent only on the basis of majority rule. In view of the commitments of all members of the United Nations, Tanzania did not regard those demands as unreasonable. But they had not been fulfilled; nor was there any real evidence to suggest that they would be. Instead there had been a gradually increasing list of economic sanctions by the United Kingdom Government, coupled with appeals to the rest of the world not to trade with the illegal authorities. Only after five months had the United Nations been asked to authorize any real action—and that was only with regard to oil shipments to one particular port. Africans were assured only of intense diplomatic activity in which the racist Government of South Africa and the colonial Government of Portugal were asked to co-operate with the United Kingdom authorities. Their willingness to do so was attested by the fact that six months after the unilateral declaration of independence the Smith authorities were still in control. Another serious fact was that the only assurance received from the United Kingdom Government was that it would not grant independence on any other basis than majority rule.

30. He did not believe that Africans minded how the Smith régime was defeated, as indeed it would have been on 11 November 1965 had the United Kingdom Government sent troops to uphold its sovereign rule. But if the British refused to quell the rebellion, then surely the United Nations should act regardless of British wishes. Under Chapter VII of the Charter the Security Council could make economic sanctions mandatory on all Member States. And if some of those States refused to co-operate then the sanctions would be applied against them too. Africans could not agree to leaving four million people under the effective control of a racist and privileged white minority, and whatever the cost they would have to reject that extension of oppression in Africa.

31. In conclusion, he expressed the hope that the Special Committee would have an opportunity of seeing some of the difficulties faced in Tanzania and the great efforts which its people were making to overcome them. He also hoped that members would sense something of the excitement and challenge of developing in independence—for that excitement and that challenge had become part of daily life in Tanzania. He believed that an appreciation of those factors would help the Special Committee to understand the importance of its work, and perhaps to devise some way forward out of colonialism.

General statements

32. The Chairman thanked His Excellency Vice-President Kawawa for his very important address. The Special Committee was particularly grateful to the Vice-President for the warmth of his welcome, and had been extremely touched by the hospitality and friendship displayed since its arrival in Dar es Salaam. It was also grateful for the Vice-President's assurances of support in its work.

33. The beautiful city of Dar es Salaam, which had set a shining example in African liberation struggles, was a most fitting background to the beginning of the Special Committee's work in Africa. The achievements of Tanzania since independence had fired the imagination of all men of goodwill.

34. He renewed his thanks to the Vice-President for having taken time from his busy schedule to open the session, and expressed the hope that the efforts deployed would contribute significantly to the liquidation of the last bastions of colonialism—a problem with which both Africa and the United Nations were most deeply concerned.

35. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics expressed the thanks of the people, delegation and Government of the Soviet Union to the Government and people of Tanzania for their fraternal welcome. The United Republic of Tanzania was a young and courageous country and was situated close to the Territories where the vestiges of colonialism still prevailed. He expressed his appreciation for the important address made by Vice-President Kawawa and paid a tribute to the courage and dynamism of that young African nation which, together with other fraternal Governments, was struggling to liberate those who were still oppressed in South Africa, Southern Rhodesia, the Territories under Portuguese domination, and the United Kingdom Protectorates. The storm raised by the national liberation movement must continue, for there were unfortunately a number of African Territories where the vestiges of colonialism still existed. The monopolies established in southern Africa sought only to enrich themselves and therefore supported racism. The international monopolies which reaped the profits of such exploitation were therefore equally guilty, since they prolonged an inadmissible situation. The countries of NATO which supported Salazar by providing him with aircraft, weapons, instructors and industrial equipment were thus assisting the racist régimes. During the previous session of the General Assembly important decisions had been taken against colonialism and imperialism: the international monopolies which were hampering the freedom of still dependent Territories had been severely condemned. The Special Committee, which owed its existence to the desire of peoples to achieve freedom, should seek all ways and means capable of bringing about the independence of the oppressed peoples and take energetic decisions that could be rapidly applied. The procedures to be adopted by the Special Committee in order to apply those decisions would be determined by the nature of each particular problem. The Committee should concentrate on questions such as the immediate implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples; the provision of genuine assistance to peoples struggling for independence, and the participation of the United Nations specialized agencies in such efforts; the setting of target dates for the attainment of independence by colonial Territories, and so forth.

36. The Special Committee should emphasize the utilization of military bases by the colonial countries against the peoples, in particular the use of Ascension Island against the people of the Congo, the island of Guam against the Viet-Nameese people, and so forth. A productive and fruitful action should be undertaken in order to put an end to such aggression.

37. He opposed the view that the Special Committee could serve no useful purpose in Africa; on the contrary, he was convinced that the presence of the Special Committee in Africa would give new impetus to the struggle that had been undertaken. The Soviet Union, a socialist State, had eradicated the enslavement of man by man and abolished social classes; it would defend, as it had always done, those who were struggling for freedom and were the victims of the policies of the imperialists. The Soviet Union would support the freedom fighters by every means at its disposal; it insisted on independence for all countries under foreign domination and would stand by them in order to bring about the final liberation of the African continent.

38. The United Nations must adopt sanctions against South Africa and Southern Rhodesia in order to compel them to comply with the decisions of the General Assembly.

39. The representative of India expressed the gratitude and appreciation of his Government, his delegation and himself personally to the Government of the United Republic of Tanzania for its generous invitation to the Special Committee to hold some of its meetings in Dar es Salaam. Members had sensed the warmth and affection of the friendly people of Tanzania, and he extended to them the best wishes of his delegation for their continued well-being and prosperity.

40. Bordering on several Non-Self-Governing Territories, Tanzania occupied a unique position in the brave struggle against colonialism and had a major role to play in helping the freedom fighters of those territories. His delegation was extremely satisfied with the contribution Tanzania had made, and was making, to that worthy cause. The locating of the headquarters of the Liberation Committee of Eleven of the Organization of African Unity in Dar es Salaam was in itself recognition of Tanzania's special position. His delegation wished to pay a tribute to one of the most outstanding personalities of Africa, His Excellency Mwalimu Julius K. Nyerere, President of the Republic, and to his Government and people.

41. India enjoyed the most friendly relations with Tanzania and greatly esteemed Mr. Nyerere for his qualities of leadership, for his devoted efforts to raise the living standards of his people and for his success in building up a truly multiracial society. The signing of the Friendship and Scientific, Economic and Technical Co-operation Agreement between Tanzania and India was, in the words of Mr. A. M. Babu, Tanzanian Minister for Commerce and Co-operation, "not the beginning but the continuation of the age-old friendly relations between India and Tanzania". His country was proud of Mr. Babu's tribute that, through its co-operation, India was aiding not only Tanzania's economic development but also the economic emancipation of colonial Africa.

42. The Second Vice-President had reminded the Special Committee, in his inspiring address, of the continued urgency of the problem of colonialism. Mr. Kawawa's enlightening words would guide the Committee in its discussion. India's attitude towards colonialism had been consistent and forthright. India had always stood for the emancipation from subjection by alien powers of peoples who, for varying periods of history, had not known freedom. India would continue to display the same uncompromising forthrightness fearlessly and disinterestedly. His people's conscience and principles were not for sale.

43. His delegation deeply regretted the absence from the Special Committee of the representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. In view of the clear acceptance which the United Kingdom had already given to the principles underlying the purpose of the Special Committee, it would have been preferable if the United Kingdom representative had remained associated with its deliberations.

44. The representative of Mali thanked the Government and people of the United Republic of Tanzania for the very warm and very African welcome which they had given the Special Committee. He also thanked Vice-President Kawawa for his address and for his Government's interest in the work and objectives of the Special Committee. He recalled that General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), which had been adopted in 1960, had given rise to a new hope: the immediate liberation of millions of human beings who were still living under the yoke of colonialism and imperialism. With a view to the practical implementation of that resolution, the Special Committee had already made recommendations to the colonial Powers; but the time for statements of principle was past. The Special Committee should decide on the adoption of specific measures in order to hasten the accession of dependent Territories to freedom, in accordance with resolution 2105 (XX). Mali, for its part, suggested the following: (1) that the Committee should proceed to hear the petitioners from the national liberation movements, since in most cases they were unable to come to New York; (2) that working groups should be set up to consider the agenda items. The working groups would propose practical measures regarding the Territories in question; they might set a target date for the accession to independence of Territories still under foreign domination. That would be in keeping with the spirit of operative paragraph 9 of resolution 2105 (XX), which read as follows:

"Requests the Special Committee, whenever it considers it appropriate, to recommend a deadline for the accession to independence of each Territory in accordance with the wishes of the people".

He thanked the Tanzanian Government for the assistance it was giving to the African liberation movements. In addition, he requested the Secretariat to keep the Special Committee informed of the results of the Security Council debate on the question of Southern Rhodesia, in order to assist the Special Committee in its work.

45. The representative of Iran conveyed the greetings of the Iranian people and Government to the United Republic of Tanzania and expressed his country's gratitude to the President for enabling the Special Committee to hold meetings in Dar es Salaam, where it had a unique and important opportunity of meeting and conversing with the representatives of thousands of people who had taken refuge in Tanzania—a land of the free. The location was important because it would help the Special Committee to find ways and means of bringing about the rapid elimination of colonialism. Vice-President Kawawa had been quite right when he had said, in his inspiring statement, that peace was not possible if it was based on the injustices of colonialism. Peace and quiet would come to Africa only when colonialism was completely eradicated from the continent. Then the energies and efforts at present being spent on regaining independence would be released for improving conditions of life in Africa. For under colonialism Africans had been materially and spiritually deprived.

46. The progress made in Tanzania during the year since his previous visit was clear evidence of what a people could do when master of its own destiny. Under the dynamic and wise leadership of President Nyerere, great progress had been made in the economic, social, educational and political development of the country. Of particular significance was its great experience in democracy, which would serve as a guideline for the newly independent countries.

47. He pledged the full support of his delegation for all measures likely to promote the liberation of the Zimbabwe people, the inhabitants of South West Africa, people under Portuguese subjugation and all other peoples still languishing in colonial bondage.

48. The representative of Bulgaria expressed the sincere gratitude of the delegation of the People's Republic of Bulgaria to the Government and people of Tanzania for their invitation and for their contribution to the work of the Special Committee. The young Tanzanian people inspired admiration since they were in the front ranks of those who were struggling against colonialism and neo-colonialism. The address by Vice-President Kawawa was further proof of the Tanzanian contribution to the struggle for the elimination of the last vestiges of colonialism in Africa. The United Republic of Tanzania could rely upon the assistance and friendship of all those who were struggling against imperialism, including Bulgaria.

49. He whole-heartedly endorsed the Special Committee's visit to Africa and believed that the work which the Committee would do during its stay would be the most important of the year. The twentieth session of the General Assembly had adopted resolutions which represented a great step forward. The Special Committee should see to it that they were applied without delay, for the time had come to give full effect to resolution 1514 (XV). In the course of the visit to Africa members of the Committee would make contact with the representatives of the oppressed peoples; they should ask themselves how they could help them effectively. As far as Southern Rhodesia was concerned, for example, the recent debates of the Security Council had shown that the United Kingdom did not hesitate to enter into negotiations with Ian Smith and to work out a compromise with him. Bulgaria, for its part, had supported the draft resolution which had been submitted by the African members of the Council and which had called upon the United Kingdom to use force against the racist Smith régime and upon the Council to apply the measures provided for under Chapter VII of the Charter. The Special Committee should request that the United Kingdom should suspend the 1961 Constitution in order to restore the rights of the people of Zimbabwe, convene a constitutional conference, and set a date for the independence of Southern Rhodesia. As far as Portugal was concerned, Bulgaria had supported all the United Nations resolutions aimed at the application of sanctions against the colonial Salazar régime with a view to restoring the legitimate rights to independence of the peoples of Mozambique, Angola and so-called Portuguese Guinea. The representatives of the liberation movements could be certain of the assistance and co-operation of the Bulgarian people.

50. He thanked Vice-President Kawawa and assured him that the Bulgarian delegation was well aware of the special responsibilities of the United Nations towards South West Africa and the Territories of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland. Resolution 1514 (XV) should be implemented without delay. The Special Committee should be guided by the noble principles of the United Nations and by the desire to preserve world peace. However, the Bulgarian delegation unreservedly endorsed the wise words of Vice-President Kawawa that "peace among peoples based on the injustice of colonialism was impossible".

51. The representative of Yugoslavia expressed his thanks to the Government and people of Tanzania for inviting the Special Committee to Dar es Salaam. He emphasized the prominent role played by Tanzania in the struggle against colonialism and the policy of apartheid. He stressed that the remaining colonial problems were extremely serious, and more especially so as there were no changes for the better in the positions of the colonial Powers.

52. He expressed his delegation's opinion that the Special Committee's visit to Africa would enable the members to get closely acquainted with the problems, and expressed the belief that this would bring about more effective work by the Committee.

53. He extended the thanks of his delegation to the Vice-President, Mr. Kawawa, for his inspiring address, and expressed the best wishes of Yugoslavia to the Government and people of Tanzania.

54. The representative of Australia thanked the Special Committee's kind Tanzanian hosts for their welcome and hospitality. He expressed the respects of the Australian delegation to President Nyerere, vital teacher and leader of a vital people, thanked Vice-President Kawawa for his welcome and thanked Ambassador Malecela for all he had done and was doing.

55. There was a fellow feeling between Tanzanians and Australians as members of the Commonwealth, sharing many common inherited institutions and ideas. His country had also been a colonial Territory. It also had experienced the excitement of the period of transition to and after independence and had found that time was necessary to meet many of its problems. But it was exciting. Round him now in Tanzania he could feel the excitement of new development. Australians did not profess to know a great deal about Africa. But there were Africans in his country—not a great many, it was true, but among some 12,000 other students from developing countries (mainly Asian) they were bringing much that was good to Australia and, he believed, taking much that was good away. Through them Australia had become aware of the fact that the future of Africa was in good hands. As an individual he was conscious of a dream coming true on this his first visit to Africa south of the Sahara, and sensed an atmosphere of new hope in Africa.

56. The representative of Poland expressed the thanks and gratitude of his delegation to President Nyerere and the Government and people of Tanzania for the invitation extended to the Special Committee. Indeed, the welcome accorded to it was a token of the country's willingness to assist the United Nations in the struggle against colonialism and racism.

57. He had had the privilege of representing Poland in 1962 on the Committee of Seventeen, which had met in Dar es Salaam, and had again visited the capital in 1965 to serve on the same enlarged Committee. It was gratifying to see the progress achieved by Tanzania in all fields of national development since independence. The Polish Government and people welcomed the political, economic and social attainments of Tanzania and wished them every further success in their aspirations and a happy and prosperous future.

58. Vice-President Kawawa's address would inspire those wishing to hasten the end of colonialism and racism at a time when concern was deepening over open and disguised forms of oppression by colonial and neo-colonial forces. Poland had always given staunch support to national liberation movements in Africa and other parts of the world. The Special Committee had always sought to adopt recommendations for peaceful solutions to the problems posed by colonialism. Blame for the situation in Southern Rhodesia, in Territories under Portuguese domination, in South West Africa and in Aden, as well as in other dependent Territories, rested with the colonial Powers, which had consistently refused to comply with the decisions of the Special Committee, the General Assembly and the Security Council. The racial discrimination, oppressive measures and direct military action undertaken by Portugal, South Africa and the Smith régime, together with the assistance given them by the United States of America, the Federal Republic of Germany, the United Kingdom and other countries in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), showed that the colonial Powers were determined to preserve white domination in the parts of Africa in question and to further the interests of foreign companies and trusts exploiting the peoples of the whole region. That policy was fraught with tragic consequences and dangers to peace and security. The Polish delegation therefore believed that any decisions or recommendations adopted by the Special Committee with regard to the Territories in question should make concrete provision for early dates for eliminating colonial régimes and dismantling military bases. The time had come to fix, in consultation with the peoples of the dependent Territories, target dates for the granting of independence to every such Territory in line with the freely expressed views and aspirations of the inhabitants. The claim often advanced by defenders of the so-called "free world" that dependent peoples were immature and unready to assume self-government was discordant with the spirit of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), which recognized the right of all peoples to self-determination. Recent developments had made it clear that unless mandatory measures provided for under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter were taken, the existence of colonial régimes would lead to a further deterioration of the international situation and to armed conflict. Finally, he endorsed Vice-President Kawawa's statement that the sooner the United Nations acted, and acted effectively, the better for all concerned.

59. The representative of Iraq thanked the Government and people of Tanzania for the cordial and spontaneous welcome extended to the Special Committee.

60. Vice-President Kawawa had rightly emphasized the special position and esteem enjoyed by the Special Committee in Tanzania and in all other freedom-loving countries. In that connexion he quoted an extract from the Vice-President's address to the effect that sooner or later, in default of other ways of achieving their freedom, subjugated countries would fight for it; that it was the role of the Special Committee to obviate such fighting by fostering a situation in which the peoples of each nation governed themselves in accordance with their own wishes and needs; and that the members of the Special Committee should therefore be working themselves out of a job.

61. In the light of what the Vice-President had said, he regretted the absence of the United Kingdom delegate. Member States had an obligation to abide by resolutions of the various organs of the United Nations. That was especially true of the major Powers, which should continue to demonstrate their good faith to the rest of the world.

62. The struggle undertaken by Tanzanians for the cause of independence in Africa and all over the world had won the admiration of freedom fighters and peace-loving countries. He felt sure that the Special Committee's meetings would further the cause of freedom and hasten the process of decolonization. Nothing would delight his delegation more than the winding up of the Special Committee once the colonized peoples of the world had regained dignity and freedom for the benefit of all mankind.

63. The representative of Syria thanked the people and Government of Tanzania for their generous hospitality. In the field of international relations, Tanzania had distinguished itself, under the leadership of its President and the guidance of such able men as Ambassador Malecela, by its constant and vigilant stand against colonialism. Loyal to the principles and resolutions of the United Nations, it ever strove to translate the ideals of that organization into action. The Vice-President of Tanzania, in his address to the Special Committee that morning, had stated that the African continent sought justice above all since only by its attainment would the need to fight be removed. So long as justice had not been secured, the struggle of the freedom fighters was not only a right but a duty and should command the support of every nation professing belief in the principles of the United Nations and in the freedom of all mankind. The Republic of Tanzania was to be congratulated upon its admirable record in that connexion.

64. As the representative of Mali had said, the time had come for the Special Committee, and the United Nations as a whole, to pass from general principles to effective action. Those who still subjugated vast numbers of peoples in Africa and elsewhere, should be made to realize that a clear choice lay before them: either they had to recognize the cause of emancipation or they would be faced with a mortal fight which would ultimately lead to their defeat. The Vice-President of Tanzania, Mr. Kawawa, had rightly described as fundamental the important task of the Special Committee, faced as it was with the explosive situation existing in such areas as Southern Rhodesia, the Portuguese-dominated colonies, Aden and Oman. Those facts should now guide the Special Committee in its action.

65. The representative of the United States of America joined previous speakers in expressing her delegation's appreciation for the generous welcome extended to the Special Committee by the Vice-President of Tanzania, Mr. Kawawa, and for the hospitality offered by the Government and people of Tanzania. As he had stated, it was to be hoped that the time would come when the Special Committee would no longer need to meet, having secured the right to self-determination, through universal suffrage, for all the remaining dependent Territories.

66. The United States Government had frequently expressed the view, which she wished to take the opportunity of reiterating at that stage, that only by the expression of a free and informed choice could any people achieve the government it desired. No nation could rest content until the peoples of Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, the Portuguese Territories and dependent Territories elsewhere had all, in accordance with the United Nations Charter, freely selected the governments of their choice.

67. It was to be hoped that the Special Committee would take advantage of its proximity to the Territories referred to in its agenda to acquaint itself directly with the difficult and complex problems being experienced daily by the peoples concerned. In view of the unhappy lot of those peoples, the Special Committee should devote itself to reasoned consideration of their problems rather than to provocative accusations or sterile polemics.

68. As the Vice-President had said, the people of Tanzania, unlike those of Southern Rhodesia and other Non-Self-Governing Territories with which the Special Committee was concerned, were able to develop their own society and economic and political institutions. In view of the spirit of enthusiasm with which its people were pursuing those tasks and their pride of achievement, the United States delegation considered that the choice of Tanzania as the starting point for the Committee's African tour had been extremely fortunate.

69. In conclusion, she said that the Government and people of Tanzania were to be congratulated upon the remarkable progress achieved in developing a modern and active economy.

70. The representative of Tunisia recalled that whenever the Special Committee went to Africa, the Tanzanian Government always invited it to hold part of its session on the hospitable soil of Tanzania; in spite of all the problems of development faced by it, Tanzania did not lose sight of its duty and responsibility in respect of the liberation of the peoples still under the colonial yoke. He therefore thanked the Government and people of Tanzania for having been kind enough to offer their warm and fraternal hospitality once more to the Special Committee.

71. The Tunisian delegation's views of colonialism had been stated on several occasions in the Special Committee and in other international bodies. The Tunisian Government was in favour of the liberation of all countries still under foreign domination and would spare no effort to carry out the measures which would be adopted with a view to obtaining tangible results in that field.

72. The representative of Venezuela thanked the Government and people of Tanzania for the warm welcome which they had accorded the Special Committee. He hoped that the Committee would do constructive work and obtain satisfactory results.

73. The representative of Ethiopia associated his delegation with the expressions of appreciation extended by previous speakers to the Government and people of Tanzania. He also wished to pay tribute to the people of Tanzania for their sacrifices and achievements in the struggle against colonialism, both in Africa and elsewhere. It was with satisfaction that he could testify, as Ethiopian Ambassador in Tanzania, to the remarkable progress which that country had made under the able and dynamic leadership of President Nyerere.

74. In his opening address, the Vice-President of Tanzania, Mr. Kawawa, had clearly outlined the tasks which lay before the Special Committee. As he had said, until the septic sore of colonialism had been removed from Africa, there could be no security for the continent. It was the firm belief of the Ethiopian delegation that the Special Committee could, during its forthcoming tour, do much to bring the eradication of colonialism closer to realization. By helping and encouraging the freedom fighters, now locked in a mortal struggle with the ruthless forces of oppression, the Special Committee could, as the representatives of the moral conscience of all mankind, greatly advance the cause of justice and the rule of law, both of which were the hallmarks of international society.

75. The representative of Italy expressed his delegation's appreciation to the Government of Tanzania for their hospitality and thanked the Vice-President, Mr. Kawawa, for his kind words of welcome. The Special Committee, which had already had the privilege of meeting in the congenial atmosphere of Dar es Salaam in 1965, would benefit from its renewed contact with the realities of the African scene and would be enabled to make sure and genuine progress towards the goals on which all were agreed.

76. With regard to the substance of the Special Committee's work, the Italian delegation fully agreed with the Chairman that it should demonstrate the increasing concern of the United Nations with regard to the position of the peoples under colonial administration and strengthen its own capacity to help those peoples in their struggle for self-determination and independence. The statements to be made by the petitioners would be particularly valuable: the information they could furnish on the situation in their respective Territories, as well as their views with regard to the best methods of attaining the objectives set forth in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), would greatly assist the Special Committee in its deliberations and would, at the same time, provide the petitioners with further encouragement. In the light of those factors, the Italian delegation wished to pledge its full and loyal co-operation in the Special Committee's work which, it was confident, would be fruitful.

77. The representative of Denmark thanked the Vice-President of Tanzania for his cordial welcome and excellent analysis of his Government's views on the problems of colonialism. The Danish delegation was grateful to the Government of Tanzania for its generous invitation to the Committee to hold a part of its current session in Dar es Salaam. Those who had attended the Special Committee's previous session would remember the warm hospitality already extended to the Special Committee by the Government and people of Tanzania as well as the excellent arrangements which had been made in that connexion. The Danish delegation, which was well aware of the active role played by Tanzania in the fight against colonialism and of the energy and zeal with which it was dealing with the internal problems of a newly independent country, looked forward to learning of the progress made during the past year.

78. As far as the Special Committee's work in Africa was concerned, it was a source of concern to his delegation that little or no progress had been recorded with regard to the situation in Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa and the Portuguese colonies. However, it was to be hoped that the Special Committee, which would have the opportunity of discussing those serious problems in detail, would prove worthy of the confidence of the African peoples, in word and in deed. Both the Chairman and the representative of Italy had rightly observed that one of the Special Committee's most important tasks was to demonstrate the deep concern of the United Nations regarding the problem of colonialism. To do so, the Special Committee should agree not only upon the general principle, that colonialism should be brought to an end as soon as possible, but also upon the way in which that objective could be achieved. That would of course necessitate concessions on all sides but, in the opinion of the Danish delegation, it would serve the common cause, namely, the effective fight against colonialism.

79. Lastly, he expressed the hope that the Special Committee's session in Africa would be fruitful and that a spirit of co-operation would prevail between all delegations.

80. The representative of Madagascar said that the Malagasy Government was against colonialism; its views on the question had already been stated on several occasions and were well known. He would comment on the agenda items as they were considered.

81. He thanked the Tanzanian Government for having been kind enough once again to invite the Special Committee to hold part of its session in Tanzania.

82. The representative of Sierra Leone said that every delegation would certainly wish to study the important and thought-provoking statement made by the Vice-President of Tanzania in his opening address to the Special Committee.

83. The problems of colonialism still remained and every effort was being made to liberate the countries concerned, despite great odds. Sierra Leone had supported those efforts in all the organs of the United Nations and had maintained its stand unequivocally, both in the Organization of African Unity and in other international bodies. He would comment in detail upon his Government's policy as the Special Committee dealt with each Territory in turn. It was to be hoped that those freedom fighters who had had to flee their countries would find succour and that the Special Committee would, as a result of its deliberations, move nearer to a solution of the problem of colonialism.

84. Expressing his delegation's appreciation to the Government and people of Tanzania, he said that their hospitality was well known to the Special Committee which had met in Dar es Salaam the previous year. It was to be hoped that the Special Committee's current session would meet with greater success than it had in 1965.

85. The representative of the Ivory Coast expressed thanks to the Tanzanian Government for the kind invitation which it had extended to the Special Committee and for its warm welcome. He expressed his gratitude to the Vice-President of Tanzania for his wise observations, which the delegation of the Ivory Coast would not fail to take into account in the work that the Special Committee was to undertake.

86. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that his delegation was gratified that it had been possible for the Special Committee to hold its first meeting in Tanzania's capital city.

87. Since much of his Government's policy with regard to the problem of colonialism had already been outlined by the Vice-President of Tanzania, he merely wished at that stage to assure the Special Committee that their expressions of appreciation would be conveyed to those concerned. He also wished, on behalf of the Tanzanian delegation, to welcome all members of the Special Committee to Tanzania. Their presence in Dar es Salaam was a reminder of the work which remained to be done in the struggle to free the African continent. Once independence had been achieved, the talents and ability expended in that connexion—and as exemplified by the Special Committee itself—could be used in other fields of human progress, particularly in Africa which had for so long been exploited.

88. During their stay in Tanzania, members of the Special Committee might experience certain inconveniences. His Government would however make every effort to minimize such difficulties, in so far as the limited resources of a developing country allowed.

89. Lastly, he expressed the hope that all members of the Special Committee would enjoy their stay in the United Republic of Tanzania.

Anniversary of Africa Freedom Day celebrated on 25 May 1966

90. The representative of Venezuela speaking on the occasion of the anniversary of Africa Freedom Day, recalled that the previous year, at Lusaka, he had expressed the hope that there would be no need for the Special Committee to go back to Africa because Africa would celebrate Africa Unity Day a completely free continent; in other words, as President Kaunda had so eloquently expressed the hope, Africa would celebrate the unity of a continent entirely liberated from the colonial yoke. Africa Unity Day had come and that hope was far from being realized. President Kaunda could not yet dry his tears, for millions of his brothers were still suffering under foreign domination. But colonialism had been judged and condemned. Nothing and nobody could prevent the sentence being carried out. The course of history was irreversible. Colonialism must disappear and would disappear from all the places where it still persisted. The peoples of Africa who were still subject to a colonial régime had, like all the peoples of the earth, an inalienable right to self-determination and independence. The day was not far off when that right would be recognized. African unity, which had started so well, could not be completely achieved so long as there were still peoples on the African continent subject to foreign domination. The Latin American peoples, who had paid a very high price in human life and economic well-being for their independence, who were still fighting to eliminate the last vestiges of colonialism in the Americas, unconditionally supported their African brothers in the fight to recover their national dignity and their freedom. They hoped that in the very near future Africa Unity Day could be celebrated in a continent composed solely of free and independent States, where racial inequality had disappeared, where relations between men were founded on respect for human rights, and where harmony, the symbol of unity and prosperity, would prevail.

91. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, speaking on behalf of the Bulgarian, Polish and Soviet delegations, greeted the peoples of Africa who were today celebrating Africa Unity Day.

92. At their historic meeting at Addis Ababa in May 1963, the Heads of State and Government of the independent African countries had decided to celebrate, on 25 May each year, the anniversary of the liberation of Africa. It had been their intention to remind all the African peoples, whether they were already free or were still subject to the yoke of the oppressor, of the tasks which lay before them. It was for Africans to sweep the last vestiges of colonialism from Africa as soon as possible. For the members of the Conference at the Addis Ababa summit, it had been self-evident that no African people could be considered entirely free so long as any part of the African continent still groaned under the colonialist boot.

93. In the past few years Africa had undergone a radical transformation. Many African countries had acceded to independence. A number of names that the African people had learned to hate had been expunged from the map of Africa. It was now the turn of the countries situated in the south of the continent. It was through their territory that colonialism's last line of defence was drawn, and it was in their territory that colonialism was now digging its own grave. The ever more bitter struggle that the peoples of Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea were waging for their freedom showed the whole world that the fate of colonialism was sealed.

94. All men of good will rejoiced at the successes scored by the African peoples in their struggle against colonialism and imperialism. The peoples of the Soviet Union, Bulgaria and Poland, like those of the other socialist countries, had proved to the Africans the firmness of their friendship, and were more than ever ready to give them aid and assistance.

95. On that day when the peoples of Africa were celebrating the liberation of their continent, and when all those who were fighting for the freedom and independence of that continent shared their joy, the Soviet, Bulgarian and Polish delegations paid a tribute to the sacred struggle which the Africans had undertaken for the complete liberation of their ancestral land, part of which was still subject to foreign domination, and for the development of their country in peace, freedom and progress. Those delegations hoped that the African peoples and the Organization of African Unity would meet with further successes in their noble enterprise: the union of all the forces of the African continent in the fight against imperialism and colonialism to promote peace and social progress.

96. The representative of Iran said that that day—Africa Day—was the third anniversary of the founding of the Organization of African Unity, which was the instrument of African solidarity, and it was the second such occasion on which the Special Committee had had the good fortune to be present on African soil in pursuit of the same aims as the OAU.

97. Speaking on his own behalf and on that of the Asian countries represented on the Special Committee, he extended hearty congratulations to the OAU. During its very short existence it had done much to assist liberation movements everywhere in Africa, and had been instrumental in promoting inter-African co-operation. It was fast becoming a centre for co-ordinating the activities of African nations in solving economic, social, cultural or humanitarian problems, in accordance both with the charter of the OAU and with the letter and spirit of the United Nations Charter. The OAU, unlike many similar organizations, was more than a mere institution: it was a living concept and a reflection of strong African sentiments for a larger union transcending ethnic and national boundaries.

98. Speaking on his own behalf, he said that Africa, in its drive for unity, was much more advanced and forward-looking than the other continents, since an African, in addition to his loyalty to his own country, passionately regarded himself as an African. Such a sentiment was a vital ingredient for eventual unity on a continental scale, and it was that spirit that had brought the OAU into being. It was the same spirit that would help the organization to surmount the obstacles put in its path by those interested to see it discredited, and finally the same spirit that would in the end root out Smith and his kind, notwithstanding temporary setbacks, and bring about the freedom and independence of all Africans.

99. The representative of Iraq on behalf of his own delegation and that of the Syrian Arab Republic, said that he would be expressing the feelings of all Arabs in speaking on that auspicious day, which symbolized the hopes and aspirations of the people of the great African continent.

100. The Arab nation was bound to Africa by innumerable links, more than half the Arab world being in fact on African soil and the remainder geographically near it. Both Arabs and Africans had suffered—and indeed some were still suffering—from colonial domination. They were counting on all the help the United Nations could give to gain their freedom, dignity and independence. History, religion and culture had also brought Arabs and Africans together and moulded their common heritage and common interests.

101. The struggle of the African people in Southern Rhodesia, Mozambique, Angola and the rest of the colonies in Africa was being watched with great interest and admiration in the Arab world, with no less an interest, in fact, than in the liberation of the rest of the Arab world.

102. On that great occasion, he invoked the mood of the great American poet, Walt Whitman, whose belief in the brotherhood and common interests of man had inspired his poem that began with the lines:

“I celebrate myself
And sing myself,
And what I shall assume
You shall assume,
For every atom
Belonging to me
As good belongs to you”.

103. The celebration of Africa Day was not confined to the great continent of Africa, but was shared in by all freedom-loving nations and by humanity and large.

104. The representative of the United States of America speaking on behalf of her own delegation and the delegations of Australia, Denmark and Italy, extended the warmest congratulations to the Organization of African Unity and to independent African States. Africa Day was a fitting reminder of the phenomenal development of independent States during the past two decades.

105. It also gave pause to reflect that the right of self-determination and of people freely to express their wishes and govern themselves as they saw fit, had yet to be universally recognized. The Organization of African Unity could make an increasing contribution to such universal recognition wherever there was repression of those rights. Its role was of the greatest importance to the African countries and to those others, such as hers, which had a strong interest in Africa's future.

106. The African continent had great human and natural resources, and great potential for economic development, and her country, together with others, was privileged to be contributing technical and economic assistance and educational aid.

107. One important key to Africa's economic future lay in increased co-operation between nations, which the OAU was in a position to further. Co-operation in social and cultural affairs was also a significant area in which the OAU was able to make an important contribution.

108. She congratulated those members of the Special Committee who represented African countries, and conveyed to the people of Africa through them the warmest good wishes of all Americans and of all the delegations on whose behalf she was speaking.

109. The representative of Yugoslavia, speaking on behalf of his Government, people and delegation, warmly greeted the people of Africa on their historic anniversary.

110. He stressed the importance of the OAU and its international role which had been recognized by the resolution passed by the General Assembly on the subject in 1965. He expressed the hope that there would be a large measure of meaningful co-operation between the OAU and the United Nations. His delegation had supported the proposal for the Special Committee's visit to Africa, and had voiced its expectation that the visit would offer large possibilities for promotion of co-operation between the Special Committee and the OAU.

111. He emphasized that Yugoslavia had very friendly relations with African independent countries, and stood firmly in support of those that had not yet attained independence.

112. He conveyed warmest wishes for the further success of the OAU and for the prosperity and better future of Africa.

113. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that for the sons and daughters of Africa, Africa Day was a day on which to celebrate, meditate and resolve. It gave Africans cause to meditate on two aspects: the freedom that had been gained in the liberated States, and their championship of the cause of liberating from colonial subjection and apartheid those States still afflicted by it. Only a decade ago, colonial exploitation had been running roughshod over the continent. The African people had stood with courage, notwithstanding the overwhelming odds against them, to liberate their continent and enjoy their legitimate rights of freedom and independence. Many of their struggles against their well-armed oppressors had been crowned with success. Those countries that had won their independence were now working to consolidate it.

114. The second factor—the cause of liberation of the countries still under subjection—was brought sharply into focus by the Special Committee's presence in Africa. Millions of brother Africans were being oppressed by the racist minorities of Southern Rhodesia and South Africa, who would have been defeated but for the military and economic aid received from their allies in spite of the many resolutions that had been passed by the United Nations. Free Africans must therefore once again reiterate their unqualified support for the just struggle of their brothers in South Africa, South West Africa, Southern Rhodesia and other countries. The day should be one of rededication and renewed pledge of support for the charter of the Organization of African Unity to enable the final goal of a united Africa to be reached: a day to remind all the colonizers in Africa that their departure was long overdue and there was nothing the free African States could not do to get them out. It was however, the desire of all Africans to live in friendship with the rest of the world, so long as it could be based on freedom and equality.

115. The Chairman said that it was not a matter of accident that the Special Committee was meeting in Africa on Africa Day. It was symptomatic of the fact that Africa had arrived in the United Nations.

116. Speaking on his own behalf, as a proud and humble son of Africa, he expressed the hope that the future would be brighter than the past, and that the patience and resilience of the African people would be able to find full expression in the years ahead, enabling them to contribute towards fundamental human values.

Closing of meetings

117. The Chairman said that the Special Committee had come to the end of its deliberations in Dar es Salaam. New ideas and fresh information had been provided by the petitioners; the Committee had had the advantage of co-operation from the OAU, and it had adopted a resolution (A/AC.109/167) representing an important contribution to the solution of the problem of Southern Rhodesia. It had listened with interest to petitioners from Southern Rhodesia, Mozambique and South West Africa, whose testimony would no doubt be of assistance to the Special Committee in its task of hastening their advancement and independence.

118. On behalf of the Special Committee, he expressed his deep gratitude to the Government and people of the United Republic of Tanzania for their cordial hospitality and for their many personal acts of kindness.

119. The representative of the Secretary-General, on behalf of the Secretariat, expressed his deep gratitude to the Special Committee's hosts for their generous hospitality and for the many facilities provided. He was particularly thankful to Mr. Malecela, Mr. Fom and other members of the Tanzanian delegation who had gone out of their way to facilitate the Secretariat's work.

120. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania on behalf of the President, the Government and people of Tanzania, said how happy his country had been to play host to the Special Committee. Its action sprang from its sincere belief in the work of the United Nations and in the need for decolonization.

121. He hoped that the Special Committee's work in Dar es Salaam and elsewhere in Africa would prove fruitful and that the resolutions adopted would be implemented. His own country would do its utmost to carry out those decisions so that fellow Africans still under the yoke of colonialism could be freed and enabled to join the United Nations.

B. MEETINGS HELD AT MOGADISCIO, SOMALIA

Opening of meetings

Address by the Prime Minister on behalf of the President of Somalia

122. The Prime Minister of Somalia said that he had great pleasure in welcoming the Special Committee to Mogadiscio on behalf of His Excellency President Aden Abdulla Osman and the Government and people of the Somali Republic. The Somali people were especially honoured to be able to serve as the Committee's hosts. Somalia owed a debt of gratitude to the United Nations for, under its trusteeship, it had been able to follow a smooth and steady path from colonial subjection to sovereign independence. If Somalia could in any way assist the Committee in its task of implementing the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, it would have done something towards repaying that debt.

123. The Somali people felt honoured to be the Special Committee's hosts because they had a deep sense of the historic significance of its work in Africa—work which proved that the concept of colonialism had been condemned. Millions of people on the African continent, who had formerly been subjected to humiliation and indignity to serve the economic and political interests of the colonial Powers, were now free to work out their own destinies. As a people ruthlessly divided by the colonial Powers and a nation still suffering from that division, the Somalis were particularly conscious of the importance of the Special Committee's task. They were aware, too, that the struggle against the remaining enclaves of colonialism might prove to be the most bitter of all. The Somali people joined in the Committee's concern for the plight of those who still had to fight for freedom, and the Committee could rest assured of their complete support in its endeavour.

124. The Special Committee's visit and the presence in Mogadiscio of the petitioners reminded him of the days when he had himself addressed the United Nations Trusteeship Council as a petitioner. He had spoken on behalf of Somalia at a time when its course towards independence was still being chartered and he therefore knew full well the value of such hearings: they provided an opportunity for viewpoints to be presented personally; they gave encouragement to those who were struggling for their freedom and they stimulated world-wide interest in the cause of liberty. The fact that the Special Committee could hold some of its meetings in Africa had enhanced the value of the hearings. Through its findings, the Committee would be in a position to present to the United Nations General Assembly a more complete picture of the situation prevailing in each of the remaining colonial Territories. Furthermore, the extensive itinerary arranged for its visit enabled petitioners from the remotest areas to obtain a hearing.

125. Ideally, the Special Committee should visit the Territories themselves. The reason why that had not been possible, however, was well known: the Governments administering those Territories had much to hide, and a visit from the Committee would have finally disproved the false propaganda circulated about them. Throughout those areas, and particularly in those controlled by South Africa and Portugal, the colonial Powers would have the world believe that the indigenous people under their rule were satisfied with their lot and that economic betterment meant more to them than the attainment of political and social equality. Such claims were demonstrably false. A great and unjust gap existed between all African workers and white immigrant settlers—a gap which was maintained by the denial to Africans of their political and social rights.

126. Time and again, history had shown beyond doubt that the search for national identity through the process of self-determination was an inexorable trend followed by all people as part of their natural development. When that natural right was denied, social unrest and turmoil were the inevitable consequences. Unhappily, that unrest had already manifested itself in many colonial Territories and, in some, had led to grave and bloody conflicts.

127. In his opinion, the most important point was that the United Nations General Assembly stood committed, by a majority decision, to ensure the speedy progress towards self-government of all peoples under colonial rule. If Member States were allowed to flout that decision and if they were to be supported and encouraged by powerful industrialist countries, which placed economic interest above the principles of the United Nations Charter, then there would be justification for the charge that the United Nations had failed in its purpose—which would be sad indeed.

128. It was not his intention, however, to end on a pessimistic note. The United Nations had already achieved much for the liberation of the colonial peoples and the Special Committee was continuing to propose practical and far-sighted solutions to the pressing colonial problems of the age. It might take time, and it would certainly take determination on the Committee's part, before its recommendations were implemented. But the irresistible forces of freedom which had radically transformed the map of Africa over the past decade were by no means spent. He was confident that the Committee's presence in Africa would be an encouragement to those forces and would ensure that they would continue to operate with the same degree of intensity until all Africans were free.

129. The Chairman expressed appreciation to the Prime Minister and to the President, Government and people of Somalia for their generous invitation to the Special Committee to hold a part of its session in Mogadiscio.

130. The warm welcome extended to the Special Committee on its arrival at Mogadiscio, which was both a reflection of traditional African hospitality and an expression of the Somali people's uncompromising stand against colonialism, had made its members even more aware of the trust placed in them and in the United Nations.

131. It was gratifying to note the progress which Somalia had made in all fields since it had attained independence, and the Prime Minister had graciously referred to the assistance which the United Nations had rendered in that connexion. In turn the Government and people of Somalia could be assured that, in discharging its mandate, the Special Committee had derived inspiration from the United Nations contribution to Somalia's independence.

132. As the Prime Minister had rightly pointed out, ideally the Special Committee should visit colonial Territories themselves. Unfortunately, however, that had not been possible owing to lack of co-operation from the administering Powers, and the Committee was therefore holding its meetings in Africa as close as possible to the various centres of the colonial struggle. It hoped in that way to acquire more direct knowledge of the aspirations of the colonial people while at the same time demonstrating once again the Committee's solidarity with them and its determination to spare no effort in assisting their countries to attain independence.

133. It was in that spirit that he wished to inform all representatives of national liberation movements, as well as all African peoples suffering under the colonial yoke, that the Special Committee's visit to Mogadiscio was yet another expression of the United Nations firm determination to liquidate colonialism without delay. Admittedly, despite the efforts made, progress had been slow. However, in keeping with the principles of the Charter, the United Nations sought to achieve its objectives primarily by persuasion. Therefore, if the efforts of the United Nations had not been as fruitful as might be desired, it was the colonial Powers which were to blame, since they refused to co-operate with the Committee.

134. Lastly, reiterating his thanks to the Prime Minister, the President, the Government and the people of Somalia, he said that the Special Committee would make every endeavour to implement the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

135. The representative of Italy associated his delegation with the Chairman's expression of thanks to the Government and people of Somalia, which occupied a special place in the heart of all Italians. The common efforts of Somalia and Italy, during the years of trusteeship administration, had not been in vain, and the task of bringing Somalia to independence had been fulfilled to the satisfaction of the United Nations.

136. As the Chairman had said, the Special Committee had come to Africa to demonstrate the increasing concern of the United Nations for the position of the colonial peoples and to strengthen its own capacity to help them in their struggle for independence. While in Mogadiscio, it would consider the problem which was so important to the people of Somalia.

137. He had been impressed by the idealism and sense of responsibility underlying the words of the Prime Minister of Somalia, which would be borne in mind by the Special Committee when the time came for it to submit its recommendations to the General Assembly. The Committee could not always promise prompt solutions, since that was neither in the nature of the problems themselves nor of the United Nations, which sought to work through conciliation and mediation rather than through force. However, the Government and people of Somalia could rest assured that the Committee's deliberations would be guided by the sense of responsibility and justice which had always characterized its work. The results achieved would not betray the trust which the Somali people had placed in the United Nations.

138. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania thanked the Government and people of Somalia for their timely invitation to the Special Committee to meet in Mogadiscio and expressed appreciation to the Prime Minister for his words of welcome. The enthusiasm with which the Committee had been received upon its arrival in Mogadiscio had revealed that the spirit prevailing in Africa would ultimately lead to the annihilation of colonialism.

139. The position of Tanzania with regard to colonialism was well known: it was the duty of all Africans to secure the liberation of those Territories which were still being exploited and suppressed by the colonialists and as his delegation had repeatedly stated, there could be no real freedom for Africa until that was done. Tanzania supported the struggle for independence not only of Africans, but of all peoples who, during the course of history, had been subjugated by colonialists. The Committee's meetings in Mogadiscio was a page in the history of the fight against colonialism, just as the struggles in Algeria, Kenya and the Congo had been. Ultimately, the people of Africa would win; they would not only attain their own freedom but would also reinforce that of all men throughout the world, and strengthen the United Nations founded, as it was, upon the Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

140. It was of great value to the Special Committee in its work to be able to meet on African soil, where the immediacy of the problems was felt and for that reason Tanzania had offered to be host to the Committee for a part of its session in Africa.

141. Lastly, he expressed the conviction that the revolutionary spirit would further the interests of African liberation.

142. The representative of Iraq, expressing his delegation's appreciation to the Government and people of Somalia, said that from time immemorial, Arabs and Somalis had lived side by side, sharing the same ideals and aspirations. Great spiritual values linked them together and their characteristics had been shaped by a common heritage. In recent years, the struggle against colonialism had bound them even closer together in sympathy and understanding. The Iraqi delegation had been greatly impressed by the warmth with which the Special Committee had been received, by the hospitality and courtesy of the Somali people and by the atmosphere of cordial co-operation which prevailed. It was mindful of the positive role played by Somalia, in close co-operation with the Arab States as well as in the OAU and other bodies, in the decolonization and emancipation of all subjugated peoples.

143. The representative of Ethiopia expressed his delegation's thanks and appreciation for the welcome and hospitality extended by the Government and people of Somalia.

144. The people of Ethiopia regarded the people of Somalia as brothers and sisters and entertained the warmest feelings towards them. Consequently, they regarded the differences dividing the two countries as a temporary phase which would pass and be forgotten in time, for the bonds of brotherhood uniting the two peoples were as strong as they were varied.

145. Some six years earlier, he had the honour of attending Somalia's independence celebration as a member of the official Ethiopian delegation, and he remembered the joy which he had shared with the people on their attainment of freedom and independence in the beautiful city of Mogadiscio. The entire Ethiopian nation had shared in the Somali people's happiness, since their Independence Day on 1 July 1960 marked not only the successful culmination of the struggle waged by the peoples of the two countries for the eradication of colonialism in their part of Africa but also the beginning of a new era in the relations of Somalia and Ethiopia—an era of equal independent status as two neighbouring African States, with all the duties and responsibilities which that involved for the inhabitants of both countries towards each other as well as towards the international community as a whole. Ethiopia took legitimate pride in the humble role it had been able to play, both at the United Nations and in other international organizations, in bringing about that happy situation.

146. However, in all frankness, he felt bound to refer to the events of the previous day. Needless to say, his delegation had been pained and saddened by the demonstrations which had taken place.

147. First of all, he wished to refer to some pertinent parts of the Special Committee's terms of reference, since a certain amount of confusion and misunderstanding seemed to exist in the minds of certain people in Mogadiscio as to the purpose and objectives for which the Committee had been created. Its terms of reference, as contained in General Assembly resolution 1654 (XVI) of 27 November 1961, read inter alia as follows:

["The General Assembly]

"1. Solemnly reiterates and reaffirms the objectives and principles enshrined in the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples contained in its resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960;

"4. Requests the Special Committee to examine the application of the Declaration, ... and to report to the General Assembly ...;

"5. Directs the Special Committee to carry out its task by employment of all means which it will have at its disposal within the framework of the procedures and modalities which it shall adopt for the proper discharge of its functions."

148. It was evident therefore that the relations between two independent States, or the disputes that might exist between them, did not come within the purview of the Special Committee. All references and illusions made by the demonstrators to the existing border dispute between Ethiopia and Somalia, or between Somalia and Kenya, therefore, should be dismissed as irrelevant to, and without any bearing on, the work of the Committee.

149. The events at the airport and in the streets of Mogadiscio the previous day were only a small example of what misguided and ignorant people could do when they were actively incited. In his opinion, the demonstrations which had taken place had brought nothing but disgrace to the name of Africa. He said that more in sorrow than in anger. It was to the eternal shame of the leaders of Somalia that such great names as Haile Selassie and Jomo Kenyatta, two illustrious sons of Africa, revered and respected all over the world, had been defiled with impunity in the streets of Mogadiscio. It was also a measure of the distortion and misrepresentation inculcated in the minds of the demonstrators that they had shouted against the name of such a great and outstanding liberal European leader as General de Gaulle, while nothing had been said against Verwoerd, Salazar and Ian Smith, the real enemies and oppressors of the African people.

150. As for the oft-repeated declaration concerning the so-called division of the Somali people and the reference to the existence of people of Somali origin and the Somali ethnic group in Ethiopia and Kenya, his delegation wished to stress again that it had no intention of being dragged into irrelevant and pointless discussions of that kind.

151. Such worn-out phrases and clichés had become so threadbare that they could hardly disguise the real aim and objective of the Government of Somalia—namely, its desire for expansion and for territorial aggrandizement at the expense of neighbouring States.

152. High sounding words, lofty concepts and terms like “self-determination”, “unification”, “independence” and “freedom” were recklessly prostituted in Somalia to mean, in stark reality, territorial expansion and aggrandizement for the realization of which the Somali Government incited innocent nomads and shepherds in remote areas to murder, loot and plunder.

153. That policy of the Government of Somalia had been exposed and condemned by the entire body of African and international public opinion. Formal resolutions and declarations had been adopted by conferences of African Heads of State and by the conference of the Heads of State and Government of Non-Aligned Countries to the effect that all African States should respect the boundaries which they had acquired at the time of independence. His delegation saw no useful purpose, therefore, in bringing up a dead issue during the Special Committee’s visit to Mogadiscio.

154. Instead of obstinately clinging to a bankrupt and discredited policy, his delegation ventured to suggest to the host Government that it should muster enough courage to renounce once and for all its futile ambition for expansion and should clear the way for fruitful co-operation and friendly relations between the two neighbouring African States. He appealed to them from the hall of their own Parliament building which they had so kindly put at the Special Committee’s disposal, to awaken to reality.

155. In that connexion, the Ethiopian Government challenged the Government of Somalia to work as it did for the wider unity of pan-Africanism or even of East Africa, instead of harping on so-called “Somali unity”—a concept which was not only too narrow in scope to be of any use in the requirements of modern Africa, but also contained outmoded and dangerous elements of tribalism and racism.

156. The Ethiopian delegation believed that the two countries had much to gain from co-operative and friendly relations which would be conducive to peace and stability in the area. His Imperial Majesty, Haile Selassie I, had time and again brought that fact to the attention of the Somali leaders but so far to no avail. However, Ethiopians were a patient people and could wait. Time was on their side.

157. The question of Djibouti had been one of the preoccupations of the Somali News, the Government newspaper, and to a certain extent of the demonstrators. Since it was on the Special Committee’s agenda, and a matter in which his delegation was vitally interested, he intended to participate fully in the debate when it came up for discussion. The view of his Government on the matter was well known to the Committee and his delegation reserved the right to make a detailed statement on its stand at the appropriate time. At that stage, however, he only wished to make it clear that Ethiopia totally rejected any claim on that Territory by Somalia.

158. With regard to the question of Mauritius and the Seychelles, which were also on the Special Committee’s agenda for its meetings in Mogadiscio, the Ethiopian delegation would have concrete proposals to make when the time came to consider draft resolutions. Until that time, however, his delegation merely wished to welcome the coming independence of Mauritius and to express the hope that the people of Seychelles would be able to follow suit in the near future.

159. In conclusion, he reiterated his delegation’s appreciation to the Government and people of Somalia for their invitation to the Special Committee and for the kind consideration they had shown.

160. The Chairman said that he regretted that the representative of Ethiopia had insisted upon making a controversial statement upon matters outside the Special Committee’s purview. It would assist the Committee in its work if, in the future, representatives would confine themselves to questions on the agenda.

161. The representative of India thanked the President, Government and people of Somalia for their invitation to the Special Committee to hold some of its meetings in Mogadiscio.

162. India enjoyed most friendly relations with Somalia; both belonged to the group of economically developing countries in the vanguard of the fight against colonialism, and they were joined in the common endeavour to raise the living standards of their peoples. India had, within the limits of its resources, sent such trained technical personnel as doctors, engineers and teachers to help Somalia in its development. His Government’s contribution was a token of the genuine friendship existing between the two countries.

163. The Prime Minister’s fine address was an important contribution to the work of the Special Committee. Recalling Mr. Abdirizak’s personal appearance before the Trusteeship Council years ago as a petitioner, the representative of India stated that his appearance before the Special Committee as Prime Minister of his country showed the interest of the Somali Government in the struggle against colonialism.

164. In conclusion, he extended his delegation’s warm greetings to the people of Somalia and best wishes for their continued well-being and prosperity.

165. The representative of Afghanistan expressed his thanks to the Prime Minister for his inspiring address, and his gratitude to the Government and people of Somalia for their warm welcome and for enabling the Special Committee to hold some of its meetings in Mogadiscio.

166. The people of Afghanistan and Somalia were bound by common aspirations and strong spiritual ties, which made it all the more rewarding for his delegation to work in the young republic of great traditions.

167. The representative of Australia thanked the Government and people of Somalia for the memorable welcome extended to the Special Committee, and expressed his appreciation of the opening address of the Prime Minister, whose words would provide inspiration and guidance along the road to an Africa free of colonialism and united in human dignity.

168. The representative of Syria said that his delegation fully associated itself with the statement made by the Chairman in response to the Prime Minister’s opening address.

169. The first words of welcome the Special Committee had heard on its arrival in Mogadiscio, "As-salaam aleikum" (Peace be upon you!), were a symbol of faith in peace built upon justice, human brotherhood, and the eradication of all forms of colonialism and exploitation of man by man, faith in the imminence of absolute equality and justice everywhere, and especially in Africa, and faith in the true emancipation of man and of his assumption of the dignified role long denied him as an active builder of true progress and restorer of values and ideals.

170. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics expressed his sincere thanks to the President of the Republic of Somalia and to the Somali Government and people for the warm welcome which they had extended to the Special Committee.

171. The Somali Government had once again expressed a desire for the immediate implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in all countries still under the colonial yoke. Almost all the countries of Africa and Asia had been freed from colonial domination except for a few, particularly in Africa, where millions of human beings continued to be exploited and humiliated. That was why the Special Committee had decided to hold its session in Africa. He was convinced that the Special Committee's work in Somalia would constitute a further step towards the elimination of the last vestiges of colonialism in Africa. The Soviet Union was the friend of the peoples who were struggling for freedom and had always supported the courageous efforts of the African peoples to obtain their independence.

172. The representative of Tunisia thanked the President of the Republic of Somalia, the Prime Minister and the Somali people for having so cordially welcomed the Special Committee to Mogadiscio. Their touching hospitality was further proof of the trust which they had placed in the United Nations. He had been particularly impressed by the address of the Prime Minister of Somalia, who had so ably expressed his country's aspirations. The role that Somalia had played on various occasions in the United Nations, the Organization of African Unity and the specialized agencies was a particularly promising sign for its future.

173. The representative of Sierra Leone said that his delegation associated itself with the Chairman's expression of thanks to the Prime Minister.

174. Somalia itself had been under United Nations trusteeship and was therefore in a unique position to understand the feelings of oppressed peoples. The invitation to the Special Committee to come to Mogadiscio had been no mere accident, but a symbol of the Somali pledge to uproot colonialism and of the faith of the Somali people in the United Nations. Sierra Leone shared that faith and would continue to exert itself to the utmost in the task of wiping out all forms of oppression in Africa and elsewhere.

175. His delegation thanked the Government and people of Somalia for their invitation to the Special Committee. Awareness that Somalis placed their African above their national identity made his delegation feel at home with close friends with whom it could work steadfastly towards the goal of decolonization and peace in Africa.

176. The representative of Iran expressed his delegation's gratitude to the President, the Government and people of Somalia for their invitation to the Special Committee to hold a part of its session in Mogadiscio. The welcome extended to the Special Committee was an expression of the deep-seated confidence of the people of Somalia in the United Nations.

177. His delegation had been highly impressed by the wise and inspiring statement by the Prime Minister, which was a further indication of the confidence which the Government and people of Somalia placed in the United Nations. The hospitality extended to the Special Committee was symbolic of the high values for which Somalia had been known throughout history; for it was history that bound the peoples of Somalia and Iran in ties of friendship, religion and culture.

178. The representative of the United States of America, speaking on behalf of her country, thanked the people and Government of Somalia for their invitation to the Special Committee. The gratifying esteem of Somalia for the United Nations had been demonstrated by the Prime Minister's fine address of welcome and by the arrangements made for the Committee's work in Mogadiscio.

179. Somalia had a long and close association with the United Nations. As the Prime Minister had pointed out in his address, Somalia exemplified the assistance the international community could give towards the orderly transition of government to the people.

180. It was a source of pride that the United Nations was giving technical assistance for the social, economic and educational development of a proudly independent Somalia.

181. As a member of the United Nations Trusteeship Council, the United States was happy to be able to contribute to the development of Somalia's agriculture, port facilities, civilian security forces and—perhaps most important of all for the country's future—schools and teacher-training facilities.

182. In conclusion, she extended the congratulations and best wishes of the United States to the Government and people of Somalia for their further progress.

183. The representative of Venezuela endorsed the remarks which the Chairman of the Special Committee had made in response to the interesting address by the Prime Minister of Somalia. He thanked the Government and people of Somalia for the warm and unforgettable welcome they had given the members of the Special Committee. He paid a tribute to the courageous Somali people, who had succeeded in obtaining their independence and were now striving to maintain their position in the international community.

184. Venezuela was familiar with many of the problems that confronted Somalia today, some of them relating to sovereignty and to the inalienable rights of their two peoples. That was the legacy which had been left by the colonial era and which must disappear. The Venezuelan delegation had accordingly welcomed the Chairman's decision to allow members of the Somali delegation to participate as observers in the Special Committee's work. He was convinced that that delegation's participation would help the Special Committee to make progress toward its goal, viz., the final eradication of colonialism.

185. The representative of Bulgaria thanked the President of the Republic of Somalia and the Government and people of Somalia for the warm welcome they had extended to the Special Committee. He further expressed sincere thanks to the Prime Minister of Somalia for his warm words of welcome, which fully demonstrated the trust which the Somali Government placed in the Special Committee. Somalia was in the forefront of the African countries that were waging an effective struggle against colonialism and neo-colonialism. It was actively participating in the work of the United Nations and of the Special Committee, whose principal task was to ensure the full and immediate implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

186. Since its accession to independence, Somalia had made considerable progress and was endeavouring, despite numerous difficulties, to raise the level of living of its people. There was no need to recall that Bulgaria, as a socialist country, stood solidly behind the African countries in their struggle to eliminate the remaining bastions of colonialism in Africa. Very friendly relations already existed between Bulgaria and Somalia, which day by day were strengthening their economic, cultural and other ties in the interest of their two peoples. He wished the Government and people of the Republic of Somalia every success and thanked them for their active co-operation with the Special Committee as well as for the remarkable manner in which they had organized the Committee's activities at Mogadiscio.

187. The representative of Madagascar thanked the Somali Government for having invited the Special Committee to hold part of its session on the hospitable soil of Somalia. He was particularly proud to be able to convey to the Government and people of the Republic of Somalia the good wishes of his own Government, which had always resolutely defended the sacred principle of self-determination and would continue to do so.

188. He was convinced that the attempts being made to suppress the legitimate aspirations of the peoples still under the colonial yoke would boomerang against their authors instead, for the peoples already liberated would not permit their brothers to continue to be exploited indefinitely by foreign Powers. It was not enough to condemn colonialism; in addition, and above all, it must be eradicated from the African continent. Peace and co-operation among the members of the international community would be only empty words so long as the exploitation of one people by another had not completely ceased.

189. He was convinced that the African countries and all those who believed in the value of human dignity would continue to unite their efforts in order to eliminate colonialism completely and promote an era of fruitful co-operation based on equality and objectivity.

190. The representative of Mali thanked the Government and people of the Republic of Somalia for the very fraternal and very warm welcome they had given the Special Committee. The Republic of Somalia had confidently and vigorously tackled the difficult problems occasioned by development, and each step was a victory over imperialism and colonialism.

191. The invitation addressed to the Special Committee and the warmth of the welcome extended to it clearly demonstrated the desire of the entire Somali people to co-operate with the United Nations. Moreover, Somalia was endeavouring to hasten the liberation of the millions of Africans still subject to colonial domination and imperialism. Colonialism was already condemned; it must disappear from Africa so that all the peoples of that continent could unite their efforts in the fight against under-development.

192. The representative of the Ivory Coast wished to add his thanks to those of the speakers who had already expressed their gratitude to the Government and people of the Republic of Somalia for the kind invitation which they had extended to the Special Committee. In spite of all the problems of economic development with which it had to contend, the Republic of Somalia had not hesitated to invite the Special Committee to hold part of its session at Mogadiscio and had spared no effort to make its stay in that beautiful city as pleasant as possible.

193. Somalia thus demonstrated once again the importance which it attached to the United Nations in general and to the Special Committee in particular, and its sympathy with the peoples of the Territories still under colonial administration. For its part, the Ivory Coast was in favour of self-determination for those peoples and of the progressive and orderly transfer of power to their representatives. His country would spare no effort to make the noble ideals set forth in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) a reality.

194. The representative of Denmark associated himself with the Chairman's appreciation of the address by the Prime Minister and expressed his delegation's gratitude for the welcome and hospitality extended to the Special Committee. Indeed, that welcome was clear evidence of Somalia's interest and confidence in the United Nations. Smaller countries should recognize in the United Nations the only true prospect for peace and well-being. As the Prime Minister had said, by visiting Africa the Committee was better able to appraise the situation; and the experience would encourage the Committee in its determination to strive for rights and freedom everywhere.

195. The representative of Poland associated his delegation with the Chairman's reply to the opening address by the Prime Minister, and thanked the Government and people of Somalia for their invitation to the Special Committee to hold some of their meetings in yet another peace-loving independent African country. His delegation was also deeply touched by the warm welcome, hospitality and facilities extended to the Committee.

196. As Poland and Somalia were bound by ties of friendship and co-operation he was particularly happy to visit Mogadiscio. Somalia had been one of the co-sponsors of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples; and the Prime Minister's address was an expression of the noble aims enshrined in the United Nations Charter and of the firm determination of the people to continue to join in the efforts of the international community, and of the Special Committee in particular, in bringing colonialism to a rapid and unconditional end. Poland considered that the uprooting of colonialism in Africa and elsewhere was an act of historical justice. It had become increasingly clear that the existence of colonialism—which by its very nature was aggressive—and the stubborn persistence of the colonial powers in oppressing, exploiting and subjugating dependent peoples was a flagrant violation of the legitimate rights and aspirations of peoples to freedom and independence, an obstacle in the way of international co-operation and a threat to world peace. Poland had therefore lent consistent support to the just struggle of dependent Territories to throw off the fetters of foreign domination.

197. In conclusion he renewed his Government's thanks to the people of Somalia for their warm welcome and hospitality and extended to them his most cordial wishes for their well-being and prosperity.

198. The representative of Chile said that he wished to add his thanks to those which the Chairman had extended to the Government of the Republic of Somalia. He had been very impressed by the warm welcome which the Special Committee had received upon its arrival at Mogadiscio and by the interest which the Somali people took in the work of the United Nations in general and of the Special Committee in particular. The interesting speech made by the Prime Minister had been further proof of that.

199. The cordial invitation of the Government of Somalia had given the Special Committee an opportunity, on the one hand, to become acquainted with that country, which was striving to improve the living conditions of its inhabitants, and, on the other hand, to continue the Committee's task of decolonization on the occasion of its further visit to Africa. Chile, which at one time had also lived under the colonial system, attached particular importance to the struggle against colonialism and every form of oppression. The Chilean Government was following with interest the progress which Somalia had made since its accession to independence and offered it its best wishes for success.

200. The representative of Yugoslavia associated his delegation with the statement made by the Chairman in reply to the inspiring address by the Prime Minister. He also expressed his Government's gratitude to the President, Government and people of Somalia for their invitation to the Special Committee to hold some of its meetings in Mogadiscio.

201. The fact that Yugoslavia enjoyed friendly relations with Somalia enhanced his delegation's satisfaction at being in Mogadiscio. He believed that the Special Committee's work there would lead to further positive results in the process of decolonization in Africa and elsewhere, and that it would enable members of the Committee to become better acquainted with the people of Somalia and their efforts on behalf of economic and social reconstruction.

202. In conclusion, he expressed his country's best wishes to the Government and people of Somalia in the efforts they were making to build prosperity and a better future for their beautiful country.

203. The Minister of Foreign Affairs of Somalia, acknowledging the remarks made by members, welcomed the Special Committee as champions of freedom and friends of peace. The people and Government of the Somali Republic wished the Committee success in its search for the truth with regard to the great problem facing the Committee—a problem which in fact was facing the whole world. His Government was aware of the Committee's responsibility, and was fully prepared to assist in the serious task, particularly in the case of French Somaliland, in which it was easier for his Government to express its opinion in detail, since it was one of the three Somali Territories still under foreign domination.

204. The city of Mogadiscio was the capital of two former colonies—Italian Somaliland and British Somaliland. On 1 July 1960, the two Somalilands had achieved their independence and unification. The desire for unity of Somalis living in the two former colonies had been entirely spontaneous. Having fought for their freedom and unification against Britain and Italy, they had always supported and would continue to support men and women fighting for liberty and justice. It was their belief that unless justice prevailed, there would be no permanent peace for mankind. The causes of injustice must first be eliminated and a solid foundation laid—a foundation based on the principles of equity and self-determination—as a basis for world peace, which, without that basis, would be built on shifting sands. The Special Committee symbolized the dawn of the new era. Its work would contribute to the liberation of millions of human beings who remained under the shackles of colonial rule in Southern Rhodesia, South Africa, Mozambique, Angola, French Somaliland, Southern Arabia, South West Africa, Portuguese Guinea and other parts of the world. The facts of the recent history of the human struggle for freedom, and the events that had taken place in Africa, Asia and Latin America gave great hopes that the world was moving towards liberty and that colonialism in all its forms was doomed.

B. Closing of meetings

205. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania, speaking on behalf of the Afro-Asian group and Yugoslavia, thanked the Government and people of the Somali Republic for their warm hospitality and above all for having helped the Special Committee to further its aims—the eradication of colonialism and the liberation of man in Africa and elsewhere.

206. While resolution 1514 (XV), adopted by the General Assembly in 1960, had been a positive step forward, none had over-estimated it, and—in the Somali Prime Minister's words—the struggle against the remaining enclaves of colonialism might prove to be the bitterest of all.

207. The problem of colonialism had to be attacked from all angles, but always with a single aim: the defeat of colonialism and the elimination of the exploitation of man by man. The struggle for freedom and independence was also one for peace, for so long as colonialism existed there would be no real peace in the world.

208. The apartheid policy in South Africa and South West Africa, the annihilation policy of Portugal and the butchering of Africans in Southern Rhodesia were crimes against humanity. Yet it was common knowledge that, while the forces committing those atrocities were vile and criminal in themselves, they were the tools of imperialism, which would stop at nothing to plunder Africa's resources and exploit the African working people. The studies made by the Special Committee had shown that foreign financial monopolies were impeding the attainment of freedom and independence by the people of those Territories. It was therefore inevitable that the fight against colonialism should involve a clash of interests, with a resulting threat to peace.

209. The Afro-Asian group and Yugoslavia categorically condemned colonialism. They adhered to the principles of the United Nations Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and would continue their efforts to secure the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

210. There were two main ways by which colonialism could be eliminated. The first way was that of persuasion, which had been followed, for example, in the case of South West Africa. That had been the course which the United Nations had chosen to follow; it had led to the establishment of the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly, the Trusteeship Council and, finally, the Special Committee. By that method, the colonial Powers were daily urged to give up their colonies and to lay down a programme for their independence; but the conditions for their independence were laid down in resolution 1514 (XV). So far, the method of persuasion had not been very successful.

211. Then there was the second way: a bitter struggle, the history of which would be written in the blood of the freedom fighters.

212. He was sure that all peace-loving people would prefer to take the first course of action, but the colonial Powers would not see reason. Their lack of co-operation had already shaken the faith in the United Nations of many Africans. It would be indeed regrettable if the Special Committee, for example, came to be regarded as merely a resolution-passing body.

213. As experience had shown, the accumulation of frustration eventually left subjugated people with no alternative but to fight to the bitter end. That had happened in Algeria, Kenya and many other parts of the world, and was in fact happening in Mozambique, Angola and elsewhere in Africa at the present time.

214. He was sure that he was expressing the sentiments not only of the Afro-Asian members of the Special Committee and Yugoslavia but also of the peace-loving people of Somalia, when he warned the colonial Powers to recognize the inevitable and to avoid bloodshed. Africans were determined to free their brothers, whatever the cost; they would fight to the bitter end. The colonial Powers could not change the course of history.

215. He assured the freedom fighters who had appeared before the Special Committee of support in their legitimate struggle, and urged them to maintain their unity of purpose and action. As President Nyerere had said, "You, our brothers under the colonial yoke, must fight or else you will be cowards. And those of us who are independent must help you even if this means shedding blood. If we do not do so we will be cowards."

216. He called on the people of Somalia to remember that Africans could not rest until all Africa was free from colonialism. They were determined to defeat the forces of apartheid, wipe out Portuguese colonialism, crush the racist minority régime in Zimbabwe and eradicate French colonialism in French Somaliland. The freedom fighters should continue to wage their wars, and their friends would do everything possible to see that the United Nations helped them to gain their lost freedom. Freedom was indivisible and could not be isolated from peace.

217. In conclusion, on behalf of the Afro-Asian members of the Committee and Yugoslavia, he again thanked the President, the Government and the people of Somalia for their cordial hospitality. Their enthusiasm would serve to remind the colonial Powers how eager Africans were for their continent to be free.

218. The representative of Chile, speaking on behalf of the Venezuelan and Chilean delegations, thanked the Government of the Somali Republic for having invited the Special Committee to hold a part of its session at Mogadiscio. He assured it that Venezuela and Chile would spare no effort to ensure that the lofty ideals of the United Nations triumphed throughout the world.

219. He also thanked the President of the Somali Republic and the Somali people for having received the Special Committee with a friendliness and warmth which it would never forget.

220. The representative of Ethiopia joined the representatives of Tanzania and Chile in thanking the Government and people of Somalia for the hospitality extended to the Special Committee.

221. The words which had been exchanged between himself and the Foreign Minister of Somalia would not interfere with personal and official brotherly relations. Indeed those exchanges were but a demonstration of the open-mindedness with which Ethiopia and Somalia approached their common problems. The differences were only a temporary phase which would be forgotten; for the existing bonds of friendship were eternal. His delegation would take home happy memories of hospitality, new friendships and renewed acquaintances. He hoped that those acquaintances would bloom into a wider and greater friendship.

222. Finally, he expressed his delegation's gratitude to the Somali Government and voiced the hope that Ethiopia and Somalia would flourish in friendship and freedom for the sake of the whole of Africa.

223. The representative of Poland, speaking on behalf of the delegations of Poland, the USSR, Bulgaria and Czechoslovakia, thanked the Government and people of Somalia for their kindness and hospitality.

224. The meetings of the Special Committee had always been inspiring, and he felt that progress was being made towards the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. He had been struck by the determination of the African peoples, as borne out in the Prime Minister's stirring address, to strive towards freedom and independence. The stubbornness of the colonial Powers in opposing those just aspirations was fraught with danger. The Special Committee had the obligation to support the right of all peoples to self-determination, and the best way to reminding the imperialist forces of that commitment was to show a united front against colonialist oppression.

225. The representative of Italy, speaking on behalf of the delegations of Australia, Denmark and the United States, and also of his own delegation, expressed appreciation to the President, the Government and the people of Somalia for their hospitality and warm welcome. The members of the Special Committee had had the opportunity, during their brief but enjoyable stay in Mogadiscio, to admire the progress made by Somalia during its six years of independence and had also been able to make further progress in the important task entrusted to them by the United Nations, in accordance with the Charter and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. He extended to the Government and people of Somalia sincere wishes for their future happiness and prosperity.

226. The representative of the Secretary-General, speaking on behalf of all members of the Secretariat, expressed gratitude to the Government and people of Somalia for their generous hospitality and for all the facilities made available during the Special Committee's visit to Mogadiscio. The Ministers of the Government, the Chief of Cabinet in the Prime Minister's Office and the Somali Ambassadors who had attended the Committee's meetings in Mogadiscio, to name but a few, had been among those who had eased the Secretariat's task and made its stay in Mogadiscio so enjoyable.

227. The Chairman expressed gratitude, on behalf of all members of the Special Committee, to the President, the Government and the people of Somalia. The Committee's visit to Mogadiscio, which had been most constructive, had deepened its understanding of the significance of the colonial peoples' struggle to regain their independence and had demonstrated the concern, both of the United Nations and of the Special Committee, for those peoples. Possibly the most important aspect of the United Nations work, as evidenced by the Committee's visit to various African capitals, was its involvement in the question of decolonization. The warm welcome extended to the Committee by the Somali people was of special significance since, as the Prime Minister had so graciously observed, Somalia owed its independence largely to the work of the United Nations. Moreover, as a result of its visit to Mogadiscio, the Committee had been able to gain further information from the petitioners about the situation in French Somaliland and in Aden.

228. He joined previous speakers in expressing the earnest hope that the Special Committee would make a substantial contribution to the speedy attainment of independence by the colonized Territories.

Statement by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Somalia

229. The Minister for Foreign Affairs of Somalia, thanking the Chairman and members of the Special Committee for their kind words of appreciation, said that the Government and people of Somalia had been privileged to act as the Committee's host, albeit for only a brief period. During its meetings in Mogadiscio, the Committee had been able to learn of the aspirations of the peoples of French Somaliland and South Arabia, although it was to be regretted that the petitioners from the Seychelles and Mauritius had been unable to appear.

230. The Special Committee's arrival in Mogadiscio had been a cause of rejoicing since it had provided the people of French Somaliland with the opportunity to express their views without fear or favour. Furthermore, all Somalis had a special regard for the United Nations, under whose guidance their country had emerged from trusteeship administration to sovereign independence, and they were grateful for the assistance which that Organization continued to render. Somali people still under foreign rule were confident that their representations would receive full consideration by the Committee which, they believed, would not be influenced by outside pressure but would be motivated only by its awareness of the inalienable right of the people of French Somaliland to self-determination and independence. The Committee's arrival in Africa had been long awaited by the millions who still suffered under colonial domination, since it was a symbol of the freedom and dignity of mankind and represented the principles enshrined in the United Nations Charter.

231. Lastly, he thanked the Special Committee, on behalf of the people and Government of Somalia, for the patience and understanding shown during its deliberations in Somalia and wished it every success in its humane endeavours to liberate those still under foreign domination. He also expressed appreciation to the Chairman for allowing observers from Somalia to participate in the Committee's meetings in Mogadiscio and Addis Ababa. Somalia was anxious to contribute to the cause of freedom and would spare no effort to further the liberation of all subjugated peoples.

C. MEETINGS HELD AT ADDIS ABABA, ETHIOPIA

Opening of meetings

Address by the Minister for Foreign Affairs on behalf of His Imperial Majesty, the Emperor of Ethiopia

232. The Minister for Foreign Affairs of Ethiopia, welcoming the Committee to Addis Ababa, expressed the hope that its deliberations would prove fruitful and constitute a further step towards the liberation of the still-dependent peoples and territories.

233. He read out a message of the Special Committee from His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie I:

"On behalf of Ourselves, Our Government and the Ethiopian people, We are pleased to welcome once more distinguished members of the United Nations Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

"The importance of this Committee cannot be over-emphasized. Its intrinsic value lies in its attempt to foster the achievement by the United Nations of one of the fundamental human rights, which is to lead peoples and countries still under colonial yoke to freedom and independence. We are all cognizant of the fact that the struggle for freedom must and will always end in victory. Freedom being the aim of this Committee, it shall be achieved. There is no question as to whether freedom should be attained, but rather how best it should be reached. Thus, the main concern of this Committee becomes to suggest ways and means to achieve this end as best it could.

"It is in its choice of means that the Committee encounters monumental problems. We are conscious that there are opposing forces at work: on the one hand the forces which unceasingly search for freedom, and on the other, the forces of oppression which attempt to deter freedom. A typical example of such conflict of forces is the unlawful Government in Southern Rhodesia. Except for such proponents of injustice like South Africa and Portugal, all freedom-loving States have condemned this racist and minority Government. We trust that a majority rule will take over in Zimbabwe. But how and when? It is here that the Committee has to apply itself and suggest means. Since the measures that have been tried to force down the illegal Government seem to be ineffective, this Committee will have to consider other methods, methods that we can perhaps adopt in concert. No matter how hard the choice may be, We are confident that the members of this Committee will fulfil the noble task entrusted to them.

"We know that as long as there are men who believe that one race is superior to the other and that they can lead the destinies of other men by any means, there shall be no peace. As long as there is going to be groundless irredentism and interference in other States' internal affairs, there is still not going to be peace. It is only by adhering to the principles set out in the Charters of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity that we can achieve our aims, and that our unity will grow stronger. On Our part, We assure you that We will never tire in our endeavours to free our brethren who are still under the yoke of colonialism.

"We are aware that the job you are charged with is not easy, but We hope and pray that God will guide you during your deliberations."

234. Adding his own expression of appreciation for the Special Committee's work, he said that Ethiopia—a Member of the United Nations and of the Special Committee since their inception—had always done its utmost to contribute towards fruitful deliberations. Having itself had five years' experience of harsh colonial domination, it had never hesitated to give moral and material aid to peoples struggling for independence, and its delegation would continue to give effective support to the Committee's work.

Statement by the Administrative Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity

235. The Administrative Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity said that he was proud to be able to associate his organization with the many people, who, from Dar es Salaam, via Mogadiscio to Addis Ababa, had welcomed the Special Committee to Africa and expressed, in addition to their own pleasure, Africa's fervent hopes for the full success of its decolonizing mission.

236. At Addis Ababa, where the OAU had its headquarters, the staff of the Organization's Secretariat particularly welcomed the Special Committee's happy decision to make yet another pilgrimage to the source, which would enable it to grasp the extreme gravity of the situation created in Africa by the survival of colonial rule, and the imperative need to put an end to the colonial and racist adventures against which all African people and their leaders had been forced to rise in protest.

237. He wished to express to the United Nations, through the Special Committee, the faith and confidence of the OAU, but also the impatience and legitimate anxiety of the African peoples at the slowness with which the process of peaceful decolonization was taking place under the auspices of the international community. The OAU fully realized that for the United Nations, almost six years previously, the problem of decolonization had been solved in principle by the adoption of the historic Declaration of 14 December 1960 on the granting of unconditional independence to all territories and all peoples still living under foreign domination. The adoption of that Declaration, and the establishment in 1961 of a Special Committee to find the quickest and most effective ways and means of giving effect to the decolonization policy thus defined, had aroused throughout the world, and particularly in Africa, immense hopes and a special fervour which was obviously both sincere and profound.

238. The OAU, an instrument of concerted co-operation among the independent States of Africa, had been conceived and organized in the same spirit of confidence and fervour that typified Africa's feelings towards the United Nations, its Charter, its various agencies and, of course, the Special Committee. The African Heads of State and Government had given absolute priority to decolonization, for liberation was the prerequisite for the fulfilment of all the aspirations of the African Governments and peoples. That profound truth had been solemnly reaffirmed throughout the continent only a few days earlier, on African Liberation Day commemorating the third anniversary of its signing of the OAU charter.

239. Because the task of liberation was one of the OAU's fundamental objectives and constant concerns, and because co-operation between, on the one hand, the OAU and, on the other hand, the United Nations in general and the Special Committee in particular had functioned perfectly in the course of the past year, the OAU proposed to change the form of its contribution to the Addis Ababa deliberations in 1966.

240. He and his staff placed themselves at the Special Committee's disposal, not only for attendance as observers at the discussion that would take place on each agenda item, but also for participation in any other exchange of views that might be thought desirable on matters of common concern to the Special Committee and the OAU. His organization was ready to co-operate with the Special Committee as fully as possible in view of the close solidarity linking Africa to the international community in the task of decolonization, to which the OAU was devoting its best efforts.

241. He was glad that the Special Committee had decided to include in its agenda the question of the liberation of the small Territories that were still dependent, the colonial enclaves scattered all over the African continent. The OAU was as concerned about the fate of those small Territories as it was about the fate of the big colonies, for a question of principle was involved. The decolonization to which the OAU aspired and for which it was working should cover all the African Territories, large or small, rich or poor. The African peoples would not be fully satisfied on that score until the last square inch of African soil had been withdrawn from non-African authority.

242. In that connexion he considered it his duty to bring to the Special Committee's knowledge a fact that had just been pointed out to him by the secretariat of the OAU Liberation Committee at Dar es Salaam: the Comoro Islands had been omitted both from the list of small African Territories on which the Special Committee intended to concentrate its attention, and from the general list of dependent Territories drawn up by the Committee. The OAU was sure that, if such an omission had been made, it could only be the result of a clerical error or an unintentional oversight, and the organization would be grateful if the Special Committee would make the necessary correction. It was quite clear that the Comoros were among the off-shore islands of Africa and, under the Special Committee's terms of reference, its competence extended to all dependent Territories, whatever the legal ties which bound those Territories to the colonial Powers occupying them.

243. The salient feature of the current situation in Africa was the aggravation of the threat to international peace and security constituted by the survival of colonialism and by the strengthening, during the past year, of the alliance formed between Portugal, South Africa and the Rhodesian settlers in order to consolidate their hold over the entire southern part of the African continent and to ensure the perpetuation of colonial and racist domination there. It was a known fact that that unholy alliance of the most backward régimes of oppression—all three of which had been unanimously condemned, on several occasions, by the United Nations—nevertheless had its accomplices among the powerful. Those accomplices were the forces—individuals, companies or States—which had made investments in the south of the continent, which lived by the exploitation of African wealth in that region, and which thus bore a large share of responsibility for the deterioration of the situation and for the bloody tragedy besetting the peoples of South Africa, Southern Rhodesia and the Territories under Portuguese domination. The need now, so far as decolonization was concerned, was not for resolutions but for solutions.

244. The colonial wars forced on the African peoples, the many acts of oppression, the various forms of vexation and humiliation which almost everywhere, had driven their African victims to take up arms, all went to show how, in the current phase of decolonization, the threat presented by colonialism to international peace and security in Africa had worsened. The situation necessarily raised the question of the responsibility borne by the great Powers which under the United Nations Charter, were the guardians of world peace. The Special Committee should devote a considerable share of its efforts to stressing that responsibility on the part of the great Powers, in order to induce them to extinguish, before it was too late, the fires that colonialism and its allies were busily lighting all over Africa.

245. All the foregoing strengthened the OAU's conviction that the Security Council should act on its specific responsibilities in the drama which was unfolding in Africa, and which might well plunge the world into a blood-bath. It was generally known that the material interests which were directly or indirectly supporting the colonialist and racist régimes in Africa were also paralysing the Security Council and had so far prevented it from meeting the expectations of the oppressed African peoples. Nothing, however, not even the repeated disappointments caused by the recent Security Council debates on Southern Rhodesia, could altogether extinguish the hope of seeing the United Nations face up to its responsibilities in Africa.

246. It should be remembered that complicity and inaction in the face of aggression by fascist Italy against the African people of Ethiopia had started the League of Nations on the fatal down grade which was to bring it swiftly to an inglorious fall. The United Nations should ponder that example, and the Security Council should avoid bringing upon it the fate of the League of Nations.

247. The Special Committee could and should play a great role in that regard by insisting against all opposition that, in view of the scope and gravity of the problems presented by colonialism and racism, the Security Council should come and meet in Africa in order to understand more clearly, in contact with African realities, that it simply must act and act quickly. It was doubtful that academic debates in New York, whatever faith and courage were shown by the Africans and their friends, would make the Security Council change its attitude. Perhaps, however, a session of the Security Council in Africa might bring about the desired change before it was too late.

248. The Chairman expressed the Special Committee's deep appreciation for the encouraging address by the Minister for Foreign Affairs on behalf of His Imperial Majesty, the Emperor of Ethiopia. The long, bitter but successful struggle by His Imperial Majesty and the Government and people of Ethiopia to safeguard the independence of their country, as well as their devotion to the objectives of the United Nations Charter, would be a source of inspiration to the Committee.

249. He also expressed gratitude for the open-handed welcome and hospitality offered to the Special Committee. The history of such hospitality went back to biblical times, and it was truly African in its generosity. Many members had the privilege of visiting Ethiopia on previous occasions, of forming close fraternal ties with its people; their pleasure on the present occasion was shared by those who were visiting Ethiopia for the first time.

250. It had been with whole-hearted gratification that the Special Committee had accepted the invitation of the Government of Ethiopia to hold some of its meetings in Addis Ababa. That that was the third such invitation testified to the importance the Ethiopian Government attached to the Committee's work, while its presence for the third time in Addis Ababa was in its turn evidence of the esteem in which the Committee held the continuing contribution of the Ethiopian Government towards the total and speedy elimination of colonialism.

251. It was fitting that the Special Committee should be meeting in Africa Hall where, in May 1963, the charter of the OAU had been signed, and which had witnessed a large number of important and far-reaching OAU decisions aimed at the liberation of all Territories still under colonial rule in Africa. He was confident that the Committee would be stimulated by the example of the OAU and would in its turn make further effective contributions to the application of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

252. The work of the Special Committee in Africa had so far been constructive. Further testimony had been heard of the grave deterioration of the situation in Southern Rhodesia and of the reprehensible failure of the United Kingdom Government to take effective steps to end the rebellion of the racist minority régime and to establish democratic conditions on the basis of one man, one vote, with a view to the speedy granting of independence. An important resolution (A/AC.109/167) had been adopted which, if implemented, would lead to the liquidation of the colonial régime in Southern Rhodesia.

253. Further evidence had also been heard of the intolerable conditions under which the peoples of Angola and Mozambique were suffering, of the criminal acts being carried out by the Portuguese, and of their flagrant refusal to apply the principle of self-determination.

254. Valuable testimony had been given concerning Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, which emphasized the need to ensure that their progress towards independence should be unconditional and in accordance with the aspirations of the people.

255. Petitioners had also been heard concerning French Somaliland and had provided valuable information which should assist in objective consideration of the question.

256. He was confident that the Special Committee's deliberations at Addis Ababa concerning South West Airica, Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, Ifni and Spanish Sahara, and French Somaliland would yield positive and fruitful results.

257. The Chairman, replying to the statement by the Administrative Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity, recalled the Special Committee's resolution of 18 June 1965 (A/6000/Rev. 1,² chap. II, para. 463) expressing the hope that the co-operation between it and the Organization of African Unity would be intensified, and General Assembly resolution 2011 (XX) of 11 October 1965 adopted at its twentieth session on the same subject. In the light of those resolutions the Committee could be especially gratified by the presence of the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU, whose outlining of his organization's position regarding the various problems of decolonization in Africa had been very impressive. The Committee attached great importance to the collaboration with the OAU in the attainment of the common objective of the total and speedy elimination of colonialism.

258. The representative of Denmark expressed his delegation's gratitude to His Imperial Majesty and the Government of Ethiopia for having invited the Special Committee to Addis Ababa, the capital of a proud people with a long and glorious history, and centre of the activities of the OAU.

259. Although economic and political unity in Africa was still perhaps a remote goal, the Special Committee had had daily evidence that the free Africans were united in their fight for the freedom of their brothers under colonial rule. He expressed the hope that the long and hard struggle, like that of the world-famous Ethiopian marathon runner, would lead to a successful conclusion, and conveyed the best wishes of his Government for a bright future in peace and prosperity.

260. The representative of Iran associated his delegation with the thanks that had been expressed to His Imperial Majesty and the Government and people of Ethiopia. He was greatly impressed by the progress that had been made during the year since his last visit. New buildings and roads had been constructed and, new aerial routes opened up, while political, social and cultural evolution had continued apace. Ethiopia had carried on the struggle for the independence of subjugated peoples in other countries, and was bringing the fruits of liberty to its own people on the principle of justice and prosperity for all. The message of His Imperial Majesty would be a source of great inspiration to the Committee, as would the statement by the Secretary-General of the OAU.

261. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania expressed his delegation's thanks to His Imperial Majesty and to the Government and people of Ethiopia for the cordial invitation extended to the Special Committee, and for the wise inaugural statement.

262. Ethiopia's safeguarding and defence of its independence had been a source of inspiration to the United Republic of Tanzania. Strong bonds of friendship existed between the two countries, stemming from their desire for advancement in their own countries and from their hopes for the development of the continent. His delegation was happy to be in Africa Hall, the seat of the OAU. He expressed his delegation's appreciation of the statement by the Secretary-General of that organization, its confidence that his endeavours would meet with increasing success, and its strong support for his suggestion that the Comoro question be placed on the Committee's agenda.

263. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics thanked His Imperial Majesty the Emperor and the Government and people of Ethiopia for their kind invitation. The Special Committee had already met at Addis Ababa the previous year and had adopted some very important recommendations, which had served as a basis for the decisions taken by the General Assembly at its twentieth session. One of the most practical measures had been the establishment of direct contact with the OAU representatives who had participated in the work of the Special Committee. Such contact should be frequent, so that the existing links between the United Nations and the OAU might be tightened, the struggle against colonialism made more effective, and resolution 1514 (XV) applied.

264. He thanked Mr. Diallo Telli for his significant address. He, for his part, hoped that African unity would be strengthened still further in order to wage a more effective struggle against the remaining vestiges of colonialism.

265. The representative of Afghanistan associated himself with the thanks expressed by other members of the Committee of His Imperial Majesty and the Government of Ethiopia for their hospitality, and also to H.E. Mr. Diallo Telli for his inspiring address.

266. The representative of Venezuela thanked His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie I and the Ethiopian Government and people, who had once again enabled the Special Committee to get into touch with African realities and to return to Addis Ababa, that bastion of freedom and independence.

267. The representative of Mali thanked His Imperial Majesty the Emperor and the Ethiopian Government and people for their invitation and their warm welcome. His delegation was happy to be in Addis Ababa, that great capital and symbol of African unity, which had raised so many hopes. The message from His Imperial Majesty, which the Ethiopian Minister for Foreign Affairs had kindly read to the members of the Committee, would be a source of inspiration to all delegations.

268. He was also glad to have heard the indignant voice of Mr. Diallo Telli, the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU, who had spoken feelingly about the liberation of millions of Africans now languishing in poverty and oppression.

269. The representative of India expressed his gratitude to His Imperial Majesty the Emperor and to the Government of Ethiopia for their generous invitation, and recalled the unique position and significant contribution of Ethiopia in the struggle against colonialism, and the many ties and shared ideals it had with his own country.

270. The representative of Poland joined previous speakers in expressing appreciation to the Government and people of Ethiopia for their hospitality and warm welcome. The message delivered by the Ethiopian Foreign Minister, on behalf of His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie, would guide and encourage the Special Committee in its deliberations.

² Official Records of the General Assembly, Twentieth Session, Annexes, addendum to agenda item 23.

271. Poland and Ethiopia were bound by ties of friendship, as evidenced by the official visit in December 1965 of the Chairman of the Council of State in his country to Ethiopia. During that visit, the two nations had reiterated their support for the struggle for freedom of such countries as Angola, Mozambique and Portuguese Guinea. They had also condemned all racial discrimination and had urged the full implementation of the Security Council's resolutions on Southern Rhodesia.

272. He expressed appreciation for the address by the Secretary-General of the OAU and said that it had always been his delegation's firm conviction that the Committee's objectives could best be achieved if it joined its efforts with those of the OAU.

273. The representative of Tunisia thanked the Government and the people of Ethiopia for their hospitality and all their efforts to enable the Special Committee successfully to complete its decolonizing mission. He also expressed gratitude to the Minister for Foreign Affairs for his inaugural statement and for the message from His Imperial Majesty, Emperor Haile Selassie I, which he had been good enough to convey to the Special Committee and which would be a source of inspiration to the Committee throughout its deliberations.

274. In addition, he unreservedly supported the ideas expressed in the statement made by Mr. Diallo Telli, the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU, which reflected the profound aspirations of millions of Africans still groaning under the colonial yoke. The attitude of the Tunisian Government would be moulded by the principles of the United Nations Charter and would be based on the pertinent resolutions adopted on decolonization.

275. He agreed with the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU, and with other speakers, that it was very unfortunate that the question of the Comoro Islands had not been included in the Special Committee's agenda and he hoped that the omission would soon be remedied. He welcomed the fact that there was close co-operation between the United Nations and the OAU, since both pursued a common ideal, namely, liberation of peoples under colonial domination and improvement of their lot.

276. The representative of Bulgaria also thanked his Imperial Majesty, Emperor Haile Selassie I, and the Ethiopian people for their generous invitation to the Special Committee.

277. The Bulgarian Government, which unreservedly supported African peoples in their attempt to storm the last bastions of colonialism, attached very great importance to the Special Committee's current session in Africa. The fact that the peoples of Africa had chosen Addis Ababa, in which the United Nations had also set up several international organizations, as the site for the headquarters of the OAU, clearly demonstrated their gratitude to Ethiopia, a country which had continually fought to free the oppressed peoples of Africa.

278. He was particularly grateful to Mr. Diallo Telli, the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU, for his confidence in the Special Committee. He agreed with him that the burning colonial problems in Africa called not for resolutions but for solutions, and that effective measures must be taken against the racist, colonialist and minority régimes of South Africa, Portugal and Southern Rhodesia. He also approved of the Administrative Secretary-General's suggestion that meetings of the Security Council should be held in Africa with a view to settling the dangerous situation prevailing in Southern Rhodesia, South Africa, South West Africa and the Portuguese colonies, a situation which was a threat to peace in Africa and in the entire world.

279. The representative of Chile expressed his gratitude to His Imperial Majesty, Emperor Haile Selassie I, for having invited the Special Committee to hold a part of its session in Ethiopia.

280. Chile had welcomed the establishment of the OAU in 1963, and that organization had already achieved very satisfactory results. It was unfortunate that such an organization, which should devote itself solely to improving the economic, social and cultural conditions of the African peoples, had to concern itself with such problems as colonialism, which ought not even to exist in the contemporary world, since freedom belonged by right to all without distinction.

281. He had listened with interest to the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU, who had given a very comprehensive picture of the situation in his statement. He welcomed the close co-operation between the United Nations and the OAU, which enabled the OAU to participate in the work of the Special Committee. Despite many efforts, the results achieved to date had hardly been outstanding, owing to the resistance of certain Members of the United Nations which did not respect the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council.

282. The representative of the Ivory Coast thanked His Imperial Majesty, Emperor Haile Selassie I, for his wise message which the Minister for Foreign Affairs had transmitted to the Special Committee. That message was further proof of the persevering and conciliatory efforts which His Imperial Majesty had made, both at the United Nations and in the OAU, to foster peace between peoples. He also thanked the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU for a clear and precise statement which he would certainly bear in mind during the work of the Special Committee.

283. The representative of Syria paid a tribute to the Government and the people of Ethiopia for their contribution to the liberation and the unity of Africa, and expressed appreciation of their hospitality.

284. He supported the statement made in the preceding meeting by the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU and wished that organization success in its task of liberating oppressed peoples.

285. The representative of Yugoslavia expressed his delegation's gratitude to His Imperial Majesty the Emperor, to the Government and people of Ethiopia for their hospitality, and to Mr. Diallo Telli for his important statement.

286. The representative of Sierra Leone was gratified by the warm welcome extended by His Imperial Majesty the Emperor and by the Government and people of Ethiopia. Addis Ababa was the birth-place and headquarters of the Organization of African Unity and a source of inspiration in the struggle for freedom and independence.

287. The representative of Iraq, recalling the long-standing ties of Ethiopia with the Arab world, thanked His Imperial Majesty the Emperor and the Government of Ethiopia for their warm welcome and Mr. Diallo Telli for his statement.

288. The representative of Italy said that the presence of the Special Committee in Addis Ababa for the third time in five years constituted a tribute to the people of Ethiopia for their outstanding contribution to decolonization. He thanked His Imperial Majesty the Emperor, the Government and the people of Ethiopia for their generous hospitality.

289. The representative of the United States of America deemed it an honour and a privilege to be present in Addis Ababa, and recalled the long-standing ties between her own country and Ethiopia.

290. The representative of Australia wished first to offer to His Imperial Majesty, Haile Selassie I, and to the great and ancient land of Ethiopia, the homage of his delegation's deepest respects and its gratitude for the kindnesses extended to the Committee. It was most fitting that the revitalized heart of Africa should pulsate so strongly from a country which had not gone the way of many ancient civilizations, but was building firmly on a magnificent past. A beautiful symbol of that fresh vigour was Africa Hall itself. He had listened with the greatest respect to the message which His Imperial Majesty had graciously sent to the Committee, and had noted the words of the Foreign Minister of Ethiopia and the Secretary-General of the OAU. The Australian delegation would faithfully place all those communications before its Government.

291. Associating himself with those who had expressed appreciation of the statement by the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU, the representative of Ethiopia said that his delegation whole-heartedly shared his view on the need for speedy elimination of the remaining vestiges of colonialism in Africa, and deeply appreciated the tremendous efforts that the OAU was making. That organization and the Special Committee had common aims and objectives, and the forthright statement was an important contribution to the Committee's work.

292. Responding to the representatives' expressions of appreciation of the welcome they had received, he said that, as His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie I had said, they had only returned to their own home, and it was a great joy for the Ethiopian Government and people to welcome them again. As a country that had had to fight for its very existence against marauding foreign Powers through its long and chequered history, Ethiopia had an interest in seeing colonialism banished from the earth.

293. He hoped that the facilities put at the Special Committee's disposal by his Government would assist in its work.

294. The peoples of Mozambique, Angola, Zimbabwe, South West Africa and other oppressed Territories were awaiting the day of deliverance, and looked to the Special Committee with hope and expectation. The Committee could look back with pride at the successes it had achieved, but as long as colonialism and the exploitation of man continued, there was no room for complacency. His delegation was determined to continue the work with renewed vigour during the Committee's remaining sessions in Africa.

Closing of meetings

Statement by the representative of the Administrative Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity

295. The representative of the Organization of African Unity said that he would convey the encouraging words of the Chairman and members of the Special Committee to his organization's Administrative Secretary-General, who regretted that owing to unavoidable circumstances he was unable to be present at the closing meeting. He was gratified to hear of the Committee's desire for closer liaison with the OAU, whose representative in New York maintained close contact with it, as well as with the Special Committee on the Policies of Apartheid of the Government of the Republic of South Africa.

296. The one important aim of the OAU was the total liquidation of colonialism and racism from the continent—a sine qua non for the strengthening of African unity. The struggle would be pursued unrelentingly by Africans until the whole continent was free. History and experience had shown that nothing could hold back the march of freedom: the freedom fighters would overcome all obstacles and win the support of all decent men and women.

297. He regretted that the Committee had been unable to discuss the question of Comoro in accordance with the wishes of the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU, but hoped it would find it possible to do so during its later meetings. He expressed the hope that the Committee's discussion in the next two African capitals it was to visit would be as fruitful as those in Addis Ababa.

298. The Chairman, on behalf of all members of the Committee, expressed gratitude to his Imperial Majesty and the Government of Ethiopia for their kind invitation to the Special Committee; for all the facilities put at its disposal, which had contributed in such large measure to the success of its work; for their generous and gracious hospitality; and for the privilege of another opportunity to strengthen contacts and friendship with the people of Ethiopia. He also expressed gratification at the collaboration of the OAU through its Administrative Secretary-General, whose participation had been of great benefit.

299. It could be said with assurance that the misgivings of one or two members concerning the advisability of the Special Committee's meetings held in Africa had proved groundless. If evidence were needed, it was only necessary to examine the results so far achieved by the Committee and the resolutions adopted; that morning, for instance, it had adopted a highly important and constructive resolution on South West Africa recommending, inter alia, that the Security Council should make it obligatory for all States to implement the measures contained in General Assembly resolution 1899 (XVIII). In so doing it had discharged one of the tasks specifically assigned to it by the General Assembly in paragraph 5 of resolution 2105 (XX), which requested the Special Committee to apprise the Security Council of developments in any Territory examined by it which might threaten international peace and security, and to make suggestions that might assist the Council in considering appropriate measures under the United Nations Charter.

300. The Committee had also adopted that morning a resolution concerning Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland (see chap. VII, para. 237), aimed first at ensuring that the progress of the Territories towards independence should be based on the free expression of the people in conformity with resolution 1514 (XV); secondly, at securing territorial integrity and sover-eighty; and thirdly, at improving their economic situation. Those resolutions, together with the discussions that had taken place concerning Southern Rhodesia, Aden, Ifni and Spanish Sahara were adequate justification for the Committee's visit to Africa. He was confident that the meetings in Cairo and Algiers would yield similar fruitful and valuable results.

301. Members would leave Addis Ababa with very happy memories of their stay, and invigorated and inspired by the work being done both in the development of the great capital and by the OAU.

302. The representative of the Secretary-General, on behalf of all members of the Secretariat, expressed deep gratitude to His Imperial Majesty and the Government of Ethiopia for all the facilities placed at their disposal and for the generous hospitality extended to them. Special thanks were due to Mr. Mekasias, and his colleague Mr. Deressa, for their assistance and personal kindness, as well as to the officials of the OAU and the Economic Commission for Africa for their co-operation.

303. The representative of Ethiopia said that his Government was grateful to the Special Committee for having accepted its invitation, and strongly believed that its visit had greatly advanced the cause for which it had been established. The resolutions it had adopted had undoubtedly brought encouragement to the many people all over the world still struggling to win freedom and independence, and the petitioners had been left with no doubt as to where the sympathies of the Committee lay. Those were no mean achievements.

304. Colonialism was a scourge that continued to bedevil humanity, and Ethiopia deplored the situation that had made the creation of the Committee an urgent necessity. The fact that even in the latter half of the twentieth century—a period that had witnessed a high degree of practical human achievement—a large proportion of the family of man was suffering deprivation and indignity, was a sad commentary on civilization. His Government therefore looked forward to the day when the Committee's existence was no longer necessary, when the nations would enjoy equally the fruits of freedom and when the exploitation of man by man would be a thing of the past. The fact that the achievement of that aim might be a slow and frustrating process should serve as a challenge and spur the Committee into making ever greater efforts.

305. He hoped that members had enjoyed their stay in Addis Ababa, and wished them success in their work in Cairo and Algiers. It would be his delegation's pleasant duty to convey their expressions of appreciation to His Imperial Majesty and the Government of Ethiopia.

D. MEETINGS HELD AT CAIRO, UNITED ARAB REPUBLIC

Opening of meetings

Address by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the United Arab Republic

306. The Minister for Foreign Affairs of the United Arab Republic said that President Gamal Abdel Nasser had asked him to transmit his greetings to the Special Committee and welcome it to the United Arab Republic. The President also conveyed his best wishes for the fulfilment of the Committee's noble efforts to implement the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and to end colonialism in the world. The President was confident that members would continue their great mission with the persistence and determination they had always displayed. Meanwhile the President wished them a happy stay among the people of the United Arab Republic.

307. It was the Foreign Minister's privilege to welcome the Committee on behalf of the Government and people of the United Arab Republic. He expressed his country's gratitude for the decision to meet in Cairo and appreciation of the Committee's constructive new practice of holding meetings close to Territories still under colonialism in Africa and the Arabian Peninsula.

308. The ending of all forms of colonialism was vital to the maintenance of international peace. The United Arab Republic therefore appreciated the Committee's noble and essential efforts, which had helped to raise the morale of peoples subjected to colonialism and given them fresh hope of freedom amidst the continuing acts of oppression. Those efforts had also consolidated the struggle of oppressed peoples to attain their right to self-determination, develop their political systems and exploit their economic resources in order to reach a dignified standard of human prosperity in complete freedom from discrimination.

309. The Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples represented a landmark in the history of the international Organization and a most constructive step forward. Moreover, the efforts of the Committee had considerably contributed to forming a trend of world public opinion hostile to colonialism. That trend had reinforced the will to struggle and sharpened the awareness of peoples striving to recover their freedom. He wished to assure the Committee of the determination of the Government and people of the United Arab Republic to continue to support peoples struggling against all forms of colonialism.

310. His country had followed with great interest and appreciation the Committee's deliberations in Dar es Salaam, Mogadiscio and Addis Ababa, and had no doubt that the African peoples would attain their noble and legitimate objectives in Southern Rhodesia, Angola, Mozambique and other African Territories still under the yoke of colonialism. The United Arab Republic was equally convinced that the forces of colonialism and racialism would soon surrender in the face of the great African struggle and the values it represented. Meanwhile colonial powers had to recognize the force of the African national struggle and the value, accomplishments and role of the African man. They also had to reckon with the decisions of the Organization of African Unity, which represented both a framework and an instrument of the independent African States for the attainment of the honourable objectives of freedom and construction throughout the African continent.

311. The people of the United Arab Republic attached the greatest importance to the questions of Aden and Oman, which the Committee was to discuss. The question of Aden and the Aden Protectorates had already passed the stage of mere adoption of resolutions. The challenge lay rather in taking the necessary action to carry out the United Nations and Special Committee resolutions; and it was the duty of the United Kingdom Government to abide by and fully implement those resolutions, as well as to embark upon a policy of co-operation with the Special Committee for that purpose.

312. He was confident that the Committee fully realized the extent of the aggression and armed intervention to which the people of Oman had been subjected. The General Assembly had already taken positive steps at its twentieth session, when it had recognized the legitimate right of the people of Oman to self-determination and the withdrawal of foreign forces from their territory. He was also confident that the Committee, in fulfilling its United Nations mandate to examine the cause of the struggling people of Oman, would take the decisions and steps necessary for putting an end to armed aggression against the people of Oman and enabling them to recover true sovereignty and enjoy their inherent right to development and progress.

313. The people of the United Arab Republic stood with all Arab and African peoples in watching the work of the Special Committee with great hopes and expectations. Its meetings in Cairo and other African capitals would surely be crowned with success, thereby crystallizing its noble and vital task of ending colonialism.

Address by the Acting Secretary-General of the League of Arab States

314. The Acting Secretary-General of the League of Arab States welcomed the Special Committee to the Arab League's headquarters on behalf of the League of Arab States and thanked it for inviting the League to attend as an observer the meeting of that body, which reflected the noble aims of the United Nations for the liquidation of imperialism and the liberation of humanity from imperialistic aims and dangers.

315. That same aim was also the corner-stone on which the Arab League was founded and for the realization of which it had worked during the whole of its twenty-one years of existence. If the revival of unity was considered to be the ultimate goal of the Arab nation, then freedom could be regarded as the foundation of unity and at its core. That was why the League of Arab States, and its members had struggled for the cause of liberating the Arab nation. Victory for the cause of freedom in Libya, Tunisia, Morocco, Sudan, Kuwait and Algeria had eventually been achieved. Those countries had become full members of the League of Arab States and of the United Nations.

316. With great faith and purpose, the League and its members were now struggling against British imperialism in the Arabian Peninsula. British imperialism had imposed tyrannic rule over the Occupied South, Oman, Muscat and the Emirates of the Gulf, thus flagrantly disregarding the United Nations and violating its Charter and its principles and the resolutions of both the General Assembly and of the Special Committee.

317. Imperialism was still clinging to outdated measures reminiscent of the past two centuries and was resorting to suppression, intimidation and annihilation. In so doing, imperialism disregarded the sufferings, casualties and sacrifices of the people and ignored the fact that that area of the Arab nation embodied one of the oldest civilizations of the world. The Arab nation and the other free nations of the world would in no way agree to the presence of imperialism, which imposed its outrageous exploitation and tied the people to its yoke, thus leading to large-scale ignorance and poverty in the area. Imperialism also constituted a threat to the security of the region and to the peace of the world. It must be borne in mind, at the present juncture, that imperialism had been liquidated in all Asian countries and only remained in the Arab area. It was high time for imperialism to depart from other African States. Cloaked in new shapes, imperialism desperately tried to resume its former power, but its attempts were doomed to failure for they struck deep at the nature of the evolution of life and the maturity of the human conscience.

318. It might not be out of place, in that connexion, to recall what had been taking place in the Arab areas 140 years ago, when British imperialism aligned itself with backwardness against the Arab people; or to recall the protracted nationalist struggle throughout that dark age, which reached a decisive stage with the inception of the Liberation Front, its sacred war against imperialist aggression and the historic feats of heroism it achieved in the last four years; or of imperialist machinations to subvert those movements. The most outstanding example of such machinations had taken place in 1959, when the United Kingdom had embarked upon the foundation of the so-called "Federation of South Arabia", its puppet and the medium for exercising its imperialist powers in the Occupied South. That was exemplified again by the subversive conferences of the United Kingdom, which that country falsely called constitutional. The next conference of that kind would take place in August 1966 between the United Kingdom on the one hand and its puppet in the area on the other. In reality that will mean a conference between the United Kingdom and itself.

319. Attention should also be drawn to the acts of intimidation and tyranny in Muscat, Oman and the Gulf. Those acts had been exposed and publicized thanks to the Special Committee, which had upheld liberty and would continue to uphold it during the present discussion on the two questions.

320. However, he wished to stress the fact that British imperialist danger in the Arabian peninsula was of the same nature, though it took on different forms. It threatened not only the Arabian Peninsula, but also the whole Afro-Asian world. Imperialism would never be eradicated unless its bases were dismantled in the Arab area.

321. Only a week ago he had read the twenty-sixth pamphlet of the Adelphi Papers, entitled Sources of Conflict in the Middle East. There was nothing more significant and eloquent than that paper in revealing the United Kingdom's underlying objective of imperialism in the Arabian Peninsula and in focusing light upon the bases from which aggression was directed against the people.

322. That document needed no comment; it would suffice to quote a few paragraphs from it. For example:

"Britain has bases for land, sea and air forces at Aden and Bahrain, linked by a chain of four air stationing posts and supplemented by smaller landing strips in the South Arabian Federation and the Eastern Aden Protectorates. The bases support a mixed land force of infantry, armour and artillery, a small naval force of escorts, minesweepers and landing craft and an air element including interceptor-ground attack aircraft, reconnaissance bombers, transport aircraft and a few helicopters. Britain is formally bound to defend the South Arabian Federation (including Aden) as well as the Protectorates which remain outside the Federation. In the Persian Gulf area, Britain is also formally bound to defend Bahrain against attack from within the Gulf, to defend Qatar against attack by sea, to defend the Trucial State of Fujairah against any aggression. . . . In addition to these formal commitments, Britain considers itself, and is widely considered, to have a general moral commitment to defend all those States in the Gulf for whose international relations the British Government remains responsible. The main routes by which Britain communicates with and reinforces the bases in the area are by sea through the Suez Canal or by air over Turkey and Iran to Bahrain. Both routes are also important in sustaining the British military presence in the Indian Ocean area and South-East Asia."³

323. The document contained accounts indicating a rapprochement between the United States and the United Kingdom concerning that imperialist military plan. Reference was also made to the Western strategic belt, which aimed at the containment of the Soviet Union and the countries parties to the Warsaw Pact, thus forming a defensive-offensive force to face Soviet expansion. The document went on to say:

"British bases and commitments in southern Arabia and the Persian Gulf . . . [help to promote Western influence in the Middle East and to deter any local belligerence. . . . They] help to keep open a strategic route to British positions in the Indian Ocean and South-East Asia, and may thus be said to contribute to the containment of any advance by a communist Power into those areas. But their primary purpose is a more local one: to safeguard the flow of Middle East oil, to prevent or check conflict in their own immediate area and to provide a base for British military intervention in other areas close at hand."⁴

324. The document also mentioned the danger originating from Arab nationalism and its power, and uncovered imperialistic plots against the emerging Arab countries in the area. Imperialism feared that force, which constituted a threat to its aggressive aspirations.

325. The document then stated, in a manner reminiscent of the fossilized imperialist mentality, that Curzon's Declaration of 1903, which stipulated that "The peace of these waters must be maintained . . . and the influence of the British Government must remain supreme", still held good in 1966 so far as the Occupied South and the Gulf were concerned, thus completely disregarding twentieth century developments.

326. He begged indulgence for his lengthy quotations, for he regarded them as unequivocal evidence uncovering the latest British machinations directed against the liberation movement of the Occupied South, and evidence of the unyielding British attitude in Muscat, Oman and the Gulf Emirates. Those statements showed the far-reaching effects of the battle and revealed the truth sought after by the Committee.

327. He also wished to disclose three main parallel aspects of the same imperialist policy followed in South Arabia and to indicate the stand taken by the League of Arab States on those issues.

328. In the cause of the Occupied South, the Arab League, during its first seventeen years of existence, had resorted to every diplomatic means at its disposal to deal with British imperialism, but all its attempts had been in vain. The result was more aggression and repression on the part of imperialism. In 1962 the liberation movement of the Occupied South had initiated a new stage of action, both through an effective nationalist struggle and through the United Nations. During the last four years the Arab countries, through its organs—the League's Councils, Heads of Government and meetings of Heads of State—had pursued the following policies:

They had striven against British imperialism in the Arabian Peninsula by every means at their disposal in order to eradicate imperialism and to consolidate the liberation movement in the Occupied South and Oman. They had also given active aid to the Arabian Gulf to enable it to achieve liberation and advancement.

They had implemented the resolutions of the Special Committee and of the United Nations General Assembly, and in particular the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly on 5 November 1965, regarding the Occupied South, and on 17 December 1965 regarding Oman.

They had taken a firm stand against the British conferences and imperialist manoeuvres which, in a bid to safeguard continued imperialistic presence in a new form, sought to establish puppet régimes which were not the product of the free will of the people of the area. Those attempts and manoeuvres had been condemned by the United Nations.

They had united the efforts of the nationalists in one organization so as to close their ranks against imperialists, which tried to sow the seeds of discord among them.

329. The Nationalist Liberation Movement had recently gained impetus. On 3 March 1966, the Nationalist Front and the Liberation Organization were merged to form a single body: the Front for the Liberation of Occupied South Yemen (FLOSY). The agreement had been ratified on the same day by the Yemen Occupied South Commission of the Arab League and by the League's Council during the same month.

330. The League of Arab States staunchly believed that the Committee would condemn the current attempt by the United Kingdom to hold negotiations with the Federation Government, its tool. It was taking pains to involve the United Nations in its aggressive attempts and taking steps to hold a conference next August which would be a replica of former conferences, which were doomed to failure. It also refused to implement the United Nations resolutions. The United Kingdom should therefore be faced with a decisive confrontation. The nationalist struggle inside the Territory was escalating and becoming more ferocious.

331. But the United Kingdom was persisting in its negotiations and preparations, and was adamant in its insistence on more sacrifices and bloodshed. That was incontestable evidence that current British negotiations were far removed from the aspirations of the people of the area, whose belief in freedom was becoming stauncher and who were more determined to gain victory than ever before.

332. With regard to the Omani cause, on 17 December 1965 the United Nations General Assembly had upheld the natural right of the Omani people to liberation from British imperialists, and to independence and self-determination; it had further condemned the United Kingdom for refusing to co-operate with the Special Committee on Oman, and called for the withdrawal of British forces from Oman, and for the abolition of British supremacy in all its forms, without restrictions on liberties and with legal rights for the people.

333. But since 1955 the occupying forces of the United Kingdom persisted in defending their presence and were still defying the resolutions of the United Nations and the natural rights of the Arab people of Oman. The Arab League was confident that the Special Committee would uphold the Omani people's right to liberty and independence in a new and effective way.

334. The Gulf Emirates were also fettered by British imperialism, which impeded their progress and deprived them of prosperity. Imperialism further imposed its internal and external guardianship without any basis in international law. This, in fact, was the most heinous form of imperialism, whose liquidation was the primary aim of the Special Committee.

335. In compliance with the League's Pact, which called for "co-operation with the Arab countries non-members of the League's Council in a bid to achieve prosperity and safeguard their future", the League Council on 31 March 1964 had adopted a resolution in which it decided to send a mission headed by the Secretary-General of the League, and whose members were personal representatives of the Heads of Arab States which are immediate neighbours of the Gulf Emirates. The aim of that mission was to conclude an agreement with the Emirs on methods of achieving brotherly co-operation with that area, and to offer economic and technical aid.

336. The mission had departed in October 1964 and was followed by a mission of technicians. Agreements were concluded with the rulers of the Emirates concerning projects for paving roads, agriculture, water, electricity and hygiene, to be financed and implemented by the League. The League earmarked the necessary funds and transferred the balance to the Dobai banks before beginning the work.

337. Since 1964, the United Kingdom had been indifferent to the League's projects aiming to revive the area, but once it realized the effectiveness of Arab aid and the willingness of the rulers and people to accept it, that country had embarked upon a policy of pressure and conspiracy. It was then decided that the Secretary-General of the League should visit the Emirates to obtain ratification of the Arab projects from the rulers. A few hours after his arrival on 10 May 1965, he received the necessary documents. The rulers, especially those of Sharjah and Ras El Khaima, because of their prestige, were then intimidated and threatened with deposition, unless they withdrew their agreement to co-operate with the League. All of them refused to submit to such threats.

338. On 22 June 1965, a mission of Arab experts left for Dubai to begin work there. It was then that British imperialism revealed its odious and outdated methods. When the experts arrived in Doha, the capital of the Qatar Emirate, on 24 June 1965, they were prevented, by sheer force, from continuing their journey, and were obliged to return to Kuwait on the same day. There followed the detention of Sheikh Sakr Ibn Sultan, the ruler of Sharjah Emirate, and his banishment to Kuwait. Identical cables were sent to the Secretary-General of the League signed by the other rulers informing him that they had withdrawn from their previous agreements. That incident thus demonstrated one of the heinous methods of imperialist despotism.

339. These brief references to British imperialism in the Occupied South, Omani Imamate and the Gulf Emirates clearly demonstrated imperialist planning, which constituted a threat to the security of the whole area and showed the untruthfulness of recent declarations by the United Kingdom.

340. At that time, the United Kingdom had declared its willingness to put into effect projects for construction in the area, but after a year it was still indifferent to those projects. The Arabs, however, had learnt, in their protracted struggle for freedom, not to listen to any imperialist promises, for they were mere lies. Imperialism would presumably never allow progress, its deadly foe, to replace backwardness, its pliant ally.

341. The United Kingdom Government had announced its determination to evacuate the Occupied South by 1968, but had simultaneously engaged in negotiations under a non-constitutional system condemned by the United Nations, and was disregarding the true representatives of the people. It had just concluded a new secret agreement with the ruler of Bahrain. That agreement aimed at enlarging the military base in Bahrain and equipping it with large quantities of offensive arms. It had been further reported that the United Kingdom Foreign Office was taking the utmost pains to keep that agreement confidential, fearing as it did the pressure which the Arab nationalists might exert upon the Bahrain Government to annul its co-operation with the United Kingdom.

342. That situation aroused grave concern. One reason was that the United Kingdom was persisting in its outdated imperialist schemes, and paying no heed to the fact that it was in the second half of the twentieth century. Another reason was that the Occupied South revolutionaries were continuing their heroic struggle for the liberation of their country and the Omani people were engaging in hostilities. Nationalist resistance had spread from the Imamate of Oman to the internal areas of Muscat. The present situation indicated that an explosion was imminent especially after the deposition of Sharjah Emir, and the United Kingdom's persistence in rejecting the League's support for rehabilitation projects.

343. Intimidation activities had escalated in the area and an agreement concerning an aggressive military base in Bahrain had been concluded.

344. The Arab nation and free peoples everywhere looked to the Committee's historic meeting in Cairo, a city which had scored historic victories against the aggressive forces of colonialism and neo-colonialism; for Cairo was the bulwark of the struggle for freedom. Everybody remembered with gratitude its painstaking efforts to meet freedom fighters in their homelands. People would always remember the praiseworthy stands taken by the Committee on the causes of justice and liberty, and had unswerving faith that it would take a decisive stand in support of the Arab liberation causes.

General statements

345. The Chairman, speaking on behalf of the Special Committee, thanked the Foreign Minister of the United Arab Republic for his inspiring address and for the stirring and remarkable message he had communicated from President Gamal Abdel Nasser. The Foreign Minister had set out important elements which would assist the Committee in its work in Cairo.

346. The Committee's gratitude went out to the Government of the United Arab Republic for inviting it to hold some of its meetings in Cairo and for extending to it hospitality and fine facilities.

347. The position of the Government of the United Arab Republic in the vanguard of the struggle for the liberation of colonial peoples, its devotion to the cause of peace, its dedication to the aims embodied in the United Nations Charter, and its constructive contribution to the work of the Committee, represented an inspiration and a stimulus at the outset of the Committee's work in Cairo.

348. The Chairman also thanked the observer for the League of Arab States for his statement. The special relationship of the League with the United Nations and its contribution to the Special Committee's aims and aspirations made it of particular importance, and due attention would be given to the points raised in the Committee's deliberations in Cairo.

349. It was appropriate that the Committee should be taking up the matters of Aden and Oman while in Cairo. Developments concerning Aden had reached a crucial stage. Fully appreciating the importance attached to the matter by all Arab peoples, he gave an assurance that the Committee would spare no effort to make the contribution expected of it by those peoples and by all freedom-loving peoples everywhere. As the representative of a country which had suffered under colonial domination, he pledged the Committee's unflinching determination to secure the full and earliest possible application of the pertinent General Assembly and Special Committee resolutions. In that connexion, he extended a warm welcome to the Special Representative of the Secretary-General on Aden, Mr. Omar A. H. Adeel, who was present and would take his seat when the matter of Aden was considered.

350. With regard to the question of Oman the Committee would, with equal determination, endeavour to make an effective contribution towards ensuring for the people of Oman the exercise of their inalienable right to self-determination and independence in accordance with their freely expressed wishes. In that task the Committee would of course be guided by General Assembly resolution 2023 (XX) of 17 December 1965.

351. He concluded by renewing his thanks to the Foreign Minister for his address and, through him, to the Government of the United Arab Republic for enabling the Committee to meet in Cairo. He also wished, through the Foreign Minister, to reiterate his gratitude to President Gamal Abdel Nasser for the inspiring message he had that day communicated to the Committee.

352. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics thanked the Government of the United Arab Republic for its invitation to the Special Committee to hold some of its meetings in the capital of the new Arab State which was in the vanguard of the struggle against imperialism, colonialism and neo-colonialism and for the freedom and independence of all the oppressed peoples of Africa, Asia, Latin America and the rest of the world. On behalf of the USSR delegation, he expressed his deep appreciation to His Excellency Gamal Abdel Nasser, President of the United Arab Republic, and to the Government and people of that country, which had close ties of friendship with the Soviet people. Relations between the two countries and peoples were based on their common struggle for peace, social progress and socialism. The Government of the United Arab Republic had given the Special Committee an opportunity to make an on-the-spot inquiry into the fundamental problems of the peoples of Arabia fighting against colonial régimes and to hear the representatives of nationalist and patriotic organizations of Aden and Oman and of all those engaged in the struggle to liberate those territories. It had also provided an opportunity for the Committee to work out agreed solutions which would facilitate the rapid implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples as well as many other resolutions adopted by the General Assembly on the questions of Aden and Oman.

353. Although five years had passed since the adoption of the Declaration, millions of human beings, for the most part in Africa and East Arabia, were still held in chains under colonial rule, being brutally exploited, subjected to every kind of humiliation, deprived of their human dignity, persecuted and murdered, solely because they refused to remain slaves. The conscience of mankind could not ignore the crimes of the colonialists. Ways must be found to eradicate the last traces of colonialism and its aftermath, apartheid and racism. Although mortally wounded, colonialism refused to die. It was defending itself fiercely. For some time now, in some parts of the world, colonialist and imperialist forces had been attempting to organize counter-attacks against national liberation movements and to undermine the sovereignty of a number of newly independent young States.

354. The ruling circles in the United States were interfering in the internal affairs of other States and waging an aggressive war against the people of Vietnam. The British colonialists were sending punitive expeditions against the peoples of South Arabia, Aden and Oman. Their Portuguese henchmen were pouring fresh troops into Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea to exterminate the patriots in these Territories. The Verwoerd régime made no attempt to conceal its intention of annexing South West Africa. Ian Smith's unilateral declaration of independence was an act of defiance directed not only against 4 million inhabitants of Zimbabwe, but against all of peace-loving Africa.

355. The criminal plans of Ian Smith, Verwoerd and Salazar, aimed at keeping racist and colonialist régimes in power, could never have succeeded without the military, economic and political support of a number of States members of NATO, foremost among them the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany. The international situation made it imperative for all forces fighting imperialism, colonialism and neo-colonialism to unite. South Arabia was one of the last bulwarks of British and international imperialism.

It was being used as a major base, which threatened the peace and the security of the peoples of East Arabia.

356. The imperialist monopolies, particularly the United States and British monopolies, had taken possession of the principal resource of South Arabia, oil. The interests of the oil monopolies were carefully protected by land, sea and air forces which threatened the security not only of the people of the area but of the entire Arab world. During the Suez crisis, the Aden and Bahrain bases had served as a spring-board for the air attacks on Egypt. Now, by repeated military provocations, the same bases were threatening the young Arab States. They were being used to combat the national liberation movements in South Arabia and to punish the Arab peoples which had taken up arms to fight for freedom. British airplanes took off from those bases to bomb the villages of South Arabia. British soldiers launched what amounted to colonial expeditions against the patriots of the region and hunted down the Aden freedom fighters. The United Kingdom still had a network of military bases in the Near and Middle East. In the area of Aden and the Gulf, it maintained large contingents of troops which were used both to suppress national liberation movements in South Arabia and to exert pressure on the independent States of East Arabia.

357. On the subject of the importance attributed by imperialism to maintaining military bases in that part of the world, Mr. Julian Amery, former Minister for Air of the last British Conservative Government had recently written that the facts irrefutably proved that the military presence of the United Kingdom east of Suez had considerably helped and was still helping to protect its interests against the hostile local elements. The statement was wholly without guile: the "hostile local elements" were none other than the peoples of Asia and Africa and the peoples of South Arabia, which were resisting British rule and opposing any interference in their internal affairs. The "east of Suez" policy amounted to a sustained effort to protect imperialist interests. It was contrary to the interests of the peoples of Asia and Africa and aimed at strengthening the colonial rule of British imperialism in the southern part of the Arabian Peninsula.

358. However, the monstrous and barbarous methods used by imperialism and colonialism to stifle the legitimate aspirations of the peoples to freedom and independence were doomed to failure. Despite local frustrations and temporary defeats, the liberation forces were steadily increasing in number and their equipment was improving. The last vestiges of colonialism would be unable to withstand an attack by those forces: he could state that with certainty, because all States and peoples which loved freedom, peace and progress were giving increasingly active support to the freedom fighters.

359. The position of the Soviet Union on the question was well known: in order to help to liquidate colonial régimes as rapidly as possible, it had provided and would continue to provide assistance to the peoples which were waging a heroic struggle against colonial oppression.

360. During his recent visit to the United Arab Republic, Mr. Kosygin, Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the USSR, had said: "Our State and the whole Soviet people are providing decisive support for all those fighting for their freedom and independence. For many years, the Soviet Union has been pursuing a policy of active support for peoples fighting for their national independence, for the permanent liquidation of capitalism and for the strengthening of peace. You can be sure that we shall continue to pursue that policy."

361. The joint communiqué on the talks between the leaders of the Soviet Union and the United Arab Republic setting forth the position of the signatories on colonial questions stated that they condemned the policy of oppression of the colonial Power in Aden and South Arabia. They affirmed that they were prepared fully to support the heroic struggle of the Arab peoples for their freedom and genuine self-determination. They appealed to the United Kingdom Government to implement the decisions of the United Nations General Assembly and pledged their support to the people of Oman in its fight against colonialism.

362. The USSR delegation expressed confidence that during its meetings in Cairo, the Special Committee would adopt decisions aimed at supporting the liberation forces of South Arabia and expediting the liquidation of colonial régimes in that part of the world. The Organization of African Unity and the League of Arab States had an important part to play in the overthrow of these régimes in Africa and East Arabia. In previous years, the United Nations, the Organization of African Unity and the League of Arab States had managed to co-ordinate their activities more and more efficiently. His delegation welcomed that co-operation and expressed the hope that the representatives of the Arab League would work with the Special Committee in an effort to resolve the problems to be discussed in Cairo.

363. On behalf of his delegation, he extended to the people of the United Arab Republic his best wishes for their complete success in building a new life of happiness and prosperity.

364. The representative of Venezuela said that he was pleased to have an opportunity, for the first time in four years, to pay a tribute to the United Arab Republic for its co-operation with the Special Committee. At the previous session, he had conveyed his thanks to the United Arab Republic in his capacity as a member of the Sub-Committee on Aden. Now, it was on behalf of the delegations of Chile, Uruguay and Venezuela that he thanked the people and Government of the United Arab Republic for the kind invitation to the Special Committee to hold some of its African meetings in Cairo. The warm welcome the United Arab Republic had given the members of the Special Committee had once again demonstrated its readiness to fight against colonialism and showed that it had taken an unequivocal stand in favour of United Nations action in that struggle.

365. The Venezuelan delegation fully appreciated the valuable assistance given the Special Committee by the United Arab Republic and thanked its Government for having enabled the Committee members to have direct contact with the reality of colonialism in that part of the world. He was confident that the experience gained during the Cairo meetings would be very valuable and would help the Committee to complete its task successfully and thus to carry out the instructions of the General Assembly.

366. The representative of Iraq expressed his delegation's profound appreciation and gratitude for the invitation extended to the Special Committee by a sister Arab country to hold some of its meetings in Cairo. Coming to Cairo was, for Arabs and Africans alike, something in the nature of a long-cherished pilgrimage.

367. The same banks of the Nile had seen the flowering of a great Arab and Islamic civilization that had spread light and justice throughout that part of the world. Since the great revolution of 23 July 1952 the United Arab Republic had come to represent, for Arabs and Africans, the pulsating heart of Arab and African unity, the defiant stand against colonialism and its offshoot, international Zionism, the rallying point in the struggle against all foreign domination and oppression, and a refuge for freedom fighters from all over the world.

368. In 1954, President Nasser had written in his Philosophy of the Revolution that it was not in vain that his country lay to the south-west of Asia close to the Arab world, whose life was intermingled with that of the United Arab Republic; neither was it in vain that his country lay to the north-east of Africa, a position from which it overlooked the African continent, wherein was raging the most violent struggle between white colonizers and the black indigenous inhabitants for the possession of its inexhaustible resources.

369. Indeed, the United Arab Republic had played, and continued to play, a leading role in the struggle against Zionist colonialism and its forcible occupation of a very dear part of the Arab homeland as well as in the general fight against all forms of colonialism everywhere.

370. He felt confident that the Committee's deliberations in Cairo would be as successful, constructive and fruitful as those held previously in other African capitals.

371. The representative of Bulgaria also expressed his delegation's appreciation to His Excellency Gamal Abdel Nasser, President of the United Arab Republic, and to the people and Government of the United Arab Republic for inviting the Special Committee to meet in Cairo and for the warm welcome extended to the members. The results of the Committee's present session in Africa, since it was already possible to speak of results, had shown how much the Committee owed to the United Arab Republic and the other countries which had invited it to hold meetings in their respective capitals. The United Arab Republic's hospitality was not fortuitous. It was in line with the overall policy of the United Arab Republic on colonial questions. The United Arab Republic was in the forefront of the African countries and the States Members of the United Nations which consistently supported the struggle against colonialism and imperialism. Its contribution to the fight against imperialism and the help it gave to national liberation movements in Africa, the Near East, South Arabia and all other areas of the world where vestiges of colonialism still existed were of the greatest significance. The statement of His Excellency El Sayed Mahmoud Riad, Minister for Foreign Affairs of the United Arab Republic, was further evidence of that fact.

372. The Bulgarian delegation, which represented a people friendly to the United Arab Republic, was gratified to be able to see for itself that the United Arab Republic with its age-old culture and civilization, was forging ahead towards a free and independent existence. Indeed, the few hours spent in the beautiful capital of the United Arab Republic had already given the Committee members an idea of the enthusiasm and optimism with which the people of the United Arab Republic were building their State under the leadership of their Government. Their economic achievements and improved level of living were a source of inspiration and an example for all peoples which had severed the chains of colonialism. The Bulgarian delegation fully agreed with the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the United Arab Republic that the Committee's work would assume special importance during its stay in Cairo. The Committee was to define the ways and means of ensuring the speedy implementation of the provisions of resolution 1514 (XV) and the resolutions on Oman and the Aden Protectorates adopted by the General Assembly at its last session. Its further task was to frustrate the attempts of the United Kingdom to maintain its military bases in South Arabia with the help of reactionary and corrupt elements and puppet governments and prevent it from continuing to enslave the peoples of those territories.

373. Guided by the anti-imperialist policy of its Government, the Bulgarian delegation could assure the representatives of the Government of the United Arab Republic that it would assist the Special Committee in every way in its efforts to liberate the peoples of South Arabia. To the people of the United Arab Republic, with which the Bulgarian people had close ties of friendship and co-operation which had been reaffirmed by the recent visit of the Chairman of the Council of Bulgaria to Cairo, it extended its most sincere wishes for continued success in building its independent and sovereign republic.

374. The representative of Ethiopia wished to associate his delegation with the expressions of thanks and appreciation already voiced for the welcome and hospitality extended to the Special Committee by the Government and people of the United Arab Republic. His country had grown accustomed to that hospitality throughout the long history of common ties between the peoples of Egypt and Ethiopia. The historical, cultural and geographical links existing between the two sister countries were so strong as to reduce the physical distance between them to insignificance. The Ethiopian delegation therefore felt very much at home in the great and ancient city of Cairo.

375. It was fitting that the Special Committee should take up the question of Aden and Oman while in Cairo; for the people of the United Arab Republic had long suffered under ruthless colonialists and imperialists, and rightly expected from the Committee the support and assistance due to them as a people still struggling to win freedom, independence and human dignity.

376. As a neighbour of Aden and South Arabia as a whole, Ethiopia had been keeping a close and sympathetic watch on the struggle that the gallant people of those Territories were waging for freedom, democracy and social justice. He therefore wished to assure the people of Aden of the sympathy of his delegation and its full support for any measure designed to ensure the rapid transition of Aden from its present colonial status to complete freedom and unfettered independence.

377. History testified to the fact that Ethiopia had always stood by the side of the Arab world in times of difficulty. It was therefore only natural for the Ethiopian Government and people to support the aspirations of the struggling peoples in the remaining pockets of colonialism and imperialism in the Arab world. He warned the United Kingdom that it was high time for it to cease oppression and make the necessary preparations for a speedy and complete withdrawal from the area in question.

378. He concluded by extending his thanks to the President, Government and people of the United Arab Republic for inviting the Special Committee to their country and expressed the hope that its meetings in Cairo would contribute to the complete eradication of colonialism in the Arab world and elsewhere.

379. The representative of Iran expressed his delegation's gratitude to the President, Government and people of the United Arab Republic for their invitation to the Special Committee to hold some of its meetings in Cairo. It was a special pleasure for the Iranian delegation to be amongst a people with whom Iran shared immutable ties of friendship and common heritage. Those ties, dating back over two thousand years, had been reinforced by the present common aim to uproot colonialism.

380. His delegation had listened with great attention and interest to the highly important statement made by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the United Arab Republic. The Iranian representative was convinced that that statement would greatly assist the Special Committee in its task.

381. His delegation would do everything within its power to help all peoples languishing under colonial subjugation to regain their freedom and independence. The Special Committee, to a greater extent than any other United Nations body, had been instrumental in strengthening the confidence of those peoples in the United Nations and had been able to gain a direct acquaintance with their wishes and aspirations. He was convinced that the Committee would make a valuable contribution to implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), containing the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

382. He concluded by reiterating the thanks of his delegation for the friendly welcome and the warmth of feeling extended to the Committee.

383. The representative of Poland expressed the gratitude of the Polish delegation to the President, Government and people of the United Arab Republic for inviting the Special Committee to the capital of a country which had become a shining star in the firmament of liberation struggles in the Arab world, as well as playing a leading role in liberation struggles elsewhere. He trusted that the presence of the Special Committee in Cairo would give hope and encouragement to the freedom fighters of Aden and the adjacent Territories which were still suffering humiliation, exploitation and foreign domination under oppressive and abhorrent colonial régimes. The United Arab Republic was making a most important contribution towards the realization of the noble aims of progress, peace and justice, and its dedicated efforts in the cause of its own socialist development were admired by all its genuine friends. The economic, political and social changes in the United Arab Republic, set a visible example to the world. Poland had many ties of friendly co-operation with the United Arab Republic, and both countries had a common approach to world problems. Poland cherished those relations and vividly recalled the warm welcome extended to its Chairman of the Council of State, Mr. Edward Ochab, during his visit to the United Arab Republic in November 1965. The Polish representative wished to take the opportunity of conveying to the Government and people of the United Arab Republic Poland's warm wishes for further success in their noble endeavours in the cause of peace, progress and a bright and prosperous future. Thanks were also due to the Foreign Minister of the United Arab Republic for his important and inspiring address, which was but a further testimony of the determination of the host country to assist the United Nations in its efforts to uproot colonialism everywhere. He also wished to express his delegation's gratitude to the Arab League for the facilities extended to the Committee.

384. The Polish delegation supported the just and legitimate struggle of the people of Aden and of South Arabia as a whole, and, in expressing his deep appreciation to the Government and people of the United Arab Republic for their invitation, reiterated its most cordial wishes for peace, progress and social justice.

385. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania thanked the President, the Government and the people of the United Arab Republic for their welcome and expressed his appreciation of the statement made on behalf of President Nasser by the Foreign Minister. He assured Mr. Riad that the Committee would give full consideration to the President's words of wisdom.

386. Since the United Arab Republic had emerged as a free State in 1952, its people, under the leadership of President Nasser, had consistently defended human rights, and particularly the right to political independence in countries still under the yoke of colonialism. The spirit of the United Arab Republic had been shown in its acts and not by words alone. It was well known that the United Arab Republic supported the Liberation Committee of the OAU whose headquarters were in Dar es Salaam. It had striven, at great sacrifice, to free peoples exploited by foreign Powers. It had given up trading with South Africa, and had not hesitated to break off diplomatic relations with the United Kingdom because of the Southern Rhodesian question.

387. The work of the United Arab Republic for Africa was beyond praise, and he was happy that the Special Committee could hold some of its meetings in Cairo, for the United Arab Republic was extending the struggle against colonialism to the Middle East, and Aden was of particular concern to it. The United Kingdom had vested interests in those Territories and pretended that its presence enabled the indigenous peoples to make progress. It used that pretext to defy the United Nations resolutions. In that connexion he wished to pay a tribute to the many people who had lost their lives in the struggle for the independence of their country.

388. Tanzania, like the United Arab Republic with which it had long-standing ties of friendship, had always fought against colonialism. He assured it of his Government's strong support and of his conviction that with Committee's help the people of Aden would attain their freedom.

389. The representative of Yugoslavia thanked the Foreign Minister and the President for their messages of welcome. He was particularly happy to be in the United Arab Republic. Cairo was a most appropriate meeting place for the Committee. It was well known that the United Arab Republic had played an outstanding role in the process of decolonization and in freeing Africa, and had indeed served as an outstanding example to other countries.

390. His own country had many ties of friendship and co-operation with the United Arab Republic. Both were interested in maintaining international peace and security, in eradicating all forms of foreign domination and in the improvement of international relations on the basis of non-interference. Those ties had recently been reaffirmed by the seventeenth meeting between Presidents Tito and Nasser. His delegation was certain that the Committee's work in Cairo would be successful.

391. The representative of Syria felt that no expression of homage and thanks could do justice to the President, Government and valiant people of the United Arab Republic. Hospitality had deep roots in that country and was indeed a matter of everyday life. Colonialism had met with its most humiliating defeats in the United Arab Republic, whose stand against oppression was not a matter of politics but rather a profession of faith. Its defence of subjugated peoples was a sacred duty, not a mere question of choice. The United Arab Republic gave support to the cause of emancipation and justice regardless of race, and was determined to liquidate the last bastions of colonialism as well as the inhuman legacy left behind: under-development, poverty, disease, ignorance, division and degradation. As President Nasser himself had said, colonialism was a basic source of evil. If it were to be eradicated, the instruments that it used must also be eradicated.

392. The United Arab Republic had become an outstanding example of progress, and Cairo had become the meeting place of progressive forces in the Arab world and elsewhere, co-ordinated by the United Arab Republic.

393. The aims of the United Arab Republic were those of the Special Committee. President Nasser's message would be a source of inspiration to the Committee, as the Chairman had pointed out: the present age was too enlightened to be deceived by the puppet régimes erected by colonialism to perpetuate its exploitation of men and resources.

394. On behalf of the Syrian Arab Republic and its people and Government, he expressed his deep gratitude, solidarity and unity of purpose with the United Arab Republic, and wished that country every success in its noble endeavour in the cause of humanity, as well as his sincere thanks to the Arab League for the assistance given the Committee.

395. The representative of Mali thanked the people and Government of the United Arab Republic and President Nasser for the kind invitation and warm welcome extended to the Special Committee.

396. Since the sixth century, Mali and the United Arab Republic had been linked by ethnic, historical and cultural ties. Although they had been separated by colonialism for nearly three quarters of a century, after their liberation they had found themselves more united than ever in the final struggle against old and new colonialism and against imperialism.

397. Mali was observing with special attention the real pride the UAR's efforts to strengthen its independence and emerge from under-development. Every success of the Egyptian peoples was a victory for Mali, an African victory over the common enemies —colonialism and imperialism. Both phenomena were destined to disappear because all peoples would ultimately gain their freedom; as the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU had said, it was only a matter of time and methods.

398. The very fact that the United Arab Republic had invited the Special Committee to hold part of its session in Cairo indicated that country's interest in the problems of decolonization.

399. He was pleased to have an opportunity in Cairo to hear the true representatives of Aden and Oman speak on behalf of their peoples about the inhumane and intolerable conduct of the United Kingdom in those Territories. The United Kingdom Government must implement the relevant resolutions of the Special Committee and the General Assembly on Aden and the Aden Protectorates. The people of Oman, in particular, had the same right as others to exercise self-determination and achieve independence in circumstances of their own choosing.

400. In conclusion he expressed appreciation to the valiant people of the United Arab Republic for their efforts to combat the reactionary forces of colonialism and the reprehensible régimes of Verwoerd, Salazar and Ian Smith, and he extended to their leaders and to President Gamal Abdel Nasser his best wishes for their happiness.

401. The representative of Australia said that he had been doubly touched by the warmth of the reception given to the Special Committee in the historic city of Cairo. Civilization was based on the learning, art and culture which grew up in that city when the rest of the world was still at the barbarian stage. On behalf of his delegation he extended his sincerest thanks to the Government and people of the United Arab Republic and his deepest respects to the great Arab people who were playing such an important role in the modern world. His delegation appreciated the message of President Nasser and would faithfully convey it to the Australian Government; it would be grateful if the Foreign Minister could convey its respectful thanks to the President.

402. The representative of India said that his country was no stranger to the United Arab Republic. Links of many different kinds had existed between the two countries for thousands of years. He had been struck by the splendour of Cairo and thought it only fit that the Special Committee should be meeting there. It was indeed a privilege for the Committee to meet there, because of the noble aims of the United Arab Republic and also because of the friendly welcome of its citizens.

403. He recalled that, when the United Arab Republic had suffered the Suez attack, his own country had been one of the first to proffer support; when India had forced the Portuguese out of Goa, the United Arab Republic had given its help. His country had also been the first to establish diplomatic relations with the Arab League. He thanked the Government and people of the United Arab Republic for their hospitality and the President for his kind message.

404. The representative of Denmark joined previous speakers in thanking the Special Committee's hosts. His delegation had particular pleasure in meeting in Cairo, the cradle of a great civilization from which Europe had received so much inspiration. The illustrious history of the United Arab Republic was well known, but that history was also the background to the present work of the country. It was fitting that the Committee should be meeting in Cairo, for the United Arab Republic had for many years pursued a policy of anti-colonialism. In that connexion his delegation wished to thank President Nasser and Mr. Riad for their messages clearly outlining the problems to be discussed.

405. His own country had friendly relations with the United Arab Republic, and he hoped that country would continue to make progress towards a bright future of prosperity and peace.

406. The representative of Italy said that the visit to Cairo had special significance for his delegation not only because of the cordial relations of Italy with the United Arab Republic, but also because the two countries' history was so closely linked. The invitation of the United Arab Republic was a symbol of the confidence placed in the work of the Special Committee and in that of the United Nations by a country which was so bravely engaged in building its future. He was grateful to the Government and people of the United Arab Republic for that confidence, and expressed his delegation's admiration for the achievements of the United Arab Republic together with its best wishes for the future.

407. The representative of Madagascar wished to express his most sincere appreciation to President Gamal Abdel Nasser and to the Government and people of the United Arab Republic for inviting the Special Committee to hold part of its session in the magnificent capital city of Cairo.

408. He was confident that the Special Committee's stay in the United Arab Republic would help it to solve the problems on its agenda.

409. He paid a tribute to the Government of the United Arab Republic for the warm welcome it had given the members of the Special Committee and for its generous hospitality.

410. The representative of Tunisia thanked President Nasser and the Government and people of the United Arab Republic for their kind invitation to the Special Committee. He also paid a tribute to the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the United Arab Republic for his address, which would be a source of inspiration to the Special Committee in its efforts to frustrate the schemes of the colonial Powers.

411. It was not enough to condemn colonialism; some way had to be found to render it harmless. The Special Committee should draw the attention of world opinion to that evil of the modern world so that every means would be mobilized to eradicate it once and for all.

412. He would express his delegation's views concerning the situation in Aden and the Aden Protectorates at a later stage. For the time being, he would merely say that foreign influence in those Territories could not be tolerated and that he would spare no effort to see that the resolutions of the United Nations were fully implemented there.

413. The representative of Afghanistan associated himself with the thanks expressed by other members of the Special Committee to the Government of the United Arab Republic for its generous invitation to hold some of their meetings in the beautiful city of Cairo on the sources of the great Nile. That hospitality was not only in accordance with the country's fine traditions but also demonstrated a strong belief in the Committee's work.

414. He had been particularly gratified by the inspiring message received from President Nasser. He was sure that the Committee would give due consideration to the words of wisdom it contained.

415. It was a particular source of joy to his delegation to be in Cairo, for innumerable ties of friendship existed between Afghanistan and the United Arab Republic, which had a common policy of non-alignment as well as a common religion.

416. The representative of the Ivory Coast associated himself with previous speakers in thanking the Government and people of the United Arab Republic for their generous invitation to the Special Committee and for their warm and fraternal welcome.

417. The invitation was all the more significant as the United Arab Republic itself was engaged in a struggle to improve the lot of its people and cope with the disastrous effects of under-development. That country was thus demonstrating once again its interest in the Special Committee's work and the importance it attached to the total eradication of colonialism from the world in general and from the South Arabian peninsula in particular.

418. The position of the Government of the Ivory Coast on colonial problems was well known. He would only recall that it supported the self-determination of peoples and the gradual and orderly transfer of all the attributes of sovereignty to the true representatives of the countries still under foreign rule. Accordingly, he would spare no effort during the Special Committee's work in Cairo to seek, together with other delegations, ways and means enabling the Committee to carry out the task assigned to it by the General Assembly.

419. He concluded by extending to the Government and people of the United Arab Republic his best wishes for their happiness and prosperity.

420. The representative of Sierra Leone thought it particularly fitting that the Special Committee should be able to meet in the United Arab Republic, for that country represented a geographical and cultural bridge between the Arab world of Africa and of Asia.

421. It was particularly fitting that the Committee should discuss in Cairo problems of interest both to Africans and Asians, including the questions of Aden and Oman. Because of its own opposition to colonialism and neo-colonialism, his country shared the hope and determination of the United Arab Republic to free subjugated peoples from the yoke of colonialism. It would be the Committee's task to ensure that the United Kingdom implemented the United Nations resolutions on Aden and Oman.

422. He thanked the President of the United Arab Republic for his inspiring message. His delegation was convinced that the Committee's stay in Cairo would be both pleasant and fruitful.

423. The representative of the United States of America said that it was a particular pleasure for her delegation to visit Cairo in response to the generous invitation of the host country. The representative of Iraq had said that to come to Cairo was a spiritual privilege for Arabs; but it also was a privilege for all the peoples of the civilized world. All the members of the Special Committee were inspired by awe and respect for the continued accomplishments of the people of the Nile valley, which had begun before the dawn of recorded history.

424. The United Arab Republic had a glorious future now that the people of the country had taken their destiny into their own hands. Her own country had long-standing friendly relations with the United Arab Republic and was especially happy that the Committee could be meeting in Cairo.

425. She thanked the President and the Foreign Minister for their speeches of welcome and looked forward to the important deliberations of the Committee in the beautiful and historic city of Cairo. She was confident that the generosity of the Government and people of the United Arab Republic would contribute to the success of the Committee's meetings in that city.

426. The representative of the United Arab Republic wished to convey to the Chairman and members of the Special Committee the very sincere thanks of his Government for the generous and elegant way in which they had referred to his country. Those words were more than mere courtesy; they represented an encouragement to the Government of the United Arab Republic in its difficult path of non-alignment. His Government had reserved for itself the right to judge each world issue on its own merits, and that, he believed, was also the way of the United Nations. The encouraging speeches made that morning would serve to strengthen his country's purpose on its lonely and difficult path.

427. His Government was also happy that the Committee was meeting in Cairo. The United Nations represented the ideals and the dreams of mankind and the Committee's presence in Cairo made those aspirations more tangible.

428. The Committee was one of the most effective organs of the United Nations, and a great deal of hope was placed in its works; he felt sure that that hope would be justified.

429. His own country had worked patiently for solidarity to further the aims of the United Nations, for freedom, justice and lasting peace. It would give the Committee the fullest co-operation so that its work might be fruitful and its stay in Cairo a success.

430. He would ask for permission to address the Committee later on specific points of the agenda, and thanked members for having given him the opportunity of making a statement.

Closing of meetings

General statements

431. The representative of the Secretary-General expressed the Secretariat's deep gratitude to the Government of the United Arab Republic for its generous hospitality and for all the assistance it had given in connexion with the Special Committee's meetings in Cairo. The Secretariat was also deeply grateful to the Secretary-General of the League of Arab States and his colleagues for having placed at the Committee's disposal its beautiful conference room and its facilities.

432. The Chairman expressed the Special Committee's heartfelt thanks to the Government and people of the United Arab Republic for their generous hospitality during its short stay in Cairo. Their contribution to the cause of freedom and justice for all the oppressed peoples of the world was too well known to require elaboration. It would suffice to say that whether within the Organization of African Unity, the non-aligned world or the United Nations, the United Arab Republic, under the dynamic leadership of its indefatigable and able President, Mr. Gamal Abdel Nasser, had always been the torch-bearer of freedom in a world darkened by the forces of colonialism.

433. For that reason, the Special Committee considered it a special honour to have been invited by the Government of the United Arab Republic to hold its meetings there. That could also be considered as a special recognition of the work of the Committee, since Cairo had come to be considered as an important haven for all freedom-loving peoples the world over. In addition to the constructive contribution of the Government and people of the United Arab Republic to the work of the Committee, they had also found time to lavish on it hospitality in true African and Arab tradition, for which it was very grateful. On behalf of all the members of the Special Committee, he took special pride in extending their gratitude to the Government and people of the United Arab Republic for all the facilities they had offered.

434. He also thanked the League of Arab States for having put its hall at the Special Committee's disposal and for providing it with the necessary conference facilities. It was only proper that it should have discussed there the questions of Aden and Oman, since the League of Arab States was the champion of freedom and justice in the Arab world.

435. The Special Committee had taken significant steps forward with regard to the application of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples as it affected Aden and Oman. The resolution adopted that afternoon on the question of Aden (A/AC.109/179/Rev.1) contained important recommendations which should help in the solution of the problem. Members would recall that operative paragraph 12 of that resolution requested the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Special Committee and the administering Power, to appoint immediately a special mission to Aden for the purpose of recommending practical steps necessary for the full implementation of the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly, and in particular for determining the extent of United Nations participation in the preparation and supervision of elections and of making a report to him as soon as possible for transmission to the Special Committee. It was hoped that the implementation of that important operative paragraph would help the people of Aden to reach their goal of true independence and freedom.

436. Regarding the question of Oman, the petitioners had provided the Committee with very pertinent information which should help it in assessing the situation in the Territory and arriving at appropriate conclusions. General Assembly resolution 2073 (XX) recognized the inalienable right of the people of the Territory as a whole to self-determination and independence in accordance with their freely expressed wishes, and on behalf of the Special Committee he assured the petitioners that it would keep that constantly in mind when giving further consideration to the question of Oman in New York.

Statement by the Deputy Foreign Minister of the United Arab Republic

437. The Deputy Foreign Minister of the United Arab Republic on behalf of the people, the Government and the President of the United Arab Republic, expressed appreciation to the Special Committee and its secretariat for their work. The people still struggling to free themselves from colonialism had in the Committee able and articulate champions, and he was confident that its efforts would meet with continued success. He also expressed appreciation to the Secretary-General of the United Nations for having sent a special representative to attend the meetings in Cairo. His Government had unquestioned confidence in U Thant, and knew that he would spare no effort to implement the General Assembly's resolutions and thereby help the just cause for which the Committee was working. The nationalists in that part of the world were well aware that they could expect only moral support from the United Nations, but they were content with and grateful for it in their struggle for freedom and for a legitimate opportunity to achieve progress and happiness.

438. His Government was glad to know that the Special Committee was keeping the question of South Arabia on its agenda, but hoped that it would not have to remain there for too long.

Statement by the Acting Secretary-General of the League of Arab States

439. The Acting Secretary-General of the League of Arab States expressed deep appreciation to the Special Committee for its tireless work and valuable support to the cause of freedom. It had been a great privilege for the League of Arab States to receive the Committee and he hoped its work would meet with continued success.

E. MEETINGS HELD AT ALGIERS, ALGERIA

Opening of meetings

Message from the President of the Revolutionary Council and Head of Government of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria

440. At the request of the Chairman, a message of welcome from the President of the Revolutionary Council and Head of Government of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria was read to the Committee. The message read as follows:

"On the occasion of the opening of a new session of your Committee in Algiers, I take pleasure in welcoming you to our country and in expressing to you, on behalf of the Revolutionary Council and the Government, our satisfaction, as well as the great pride we feel, in receiving you in Algeria to carry out a task which is in the forefront of our thoughts.

"The struggle against colonial domination, in all its forms and on all continents, is one of the constant factors in our policy and actions. Your presence in Algiers to study the problems of decolonization therefore has symbolic significance for us, and we regard it as an event of the highest importance. You will find in Algeria the greatest sympathy for your work, among a people which feels linked in fraternity with all peoples fighting and suffering to win their freedom.

"We are also glad to be given the opportunity of reaffirming our support for the United Nations and expressing all the hopes we place in it for better understanding among men and sincere friendship among peoples. We are convinced of the importance of its role in maintaining and strengthening peace throughout the world, and we are confident that it will shoulder all the responsibilities of its lofty and noble mission.

"I wish you every success in your work and a pleasant stay in our country, which will strive to give you a worthy welcome, both as guests and as friends."

Address by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria

441. The Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria said that Algiers was the last stage in the Special Committee's journey through Africa. Its stay in various capitals of the African continent had enabled it to enter into direct contact with several liberation movements and it had thus been able to supplement its information on the problems of decolonization by placing them in their context and by seeing them as they actually were. In its African tour, the method thus applied by the Committee should be pondered, enriched and, if necessary, extended, in order to bring nearer all the solutions likely to rejuvenate, strengthen and consolidate the United Nations.

442. Algeria was happy to welcome the Committee and to help to make its mission a success. Algeria had itself placed great hopes in and had obtained much from the United Nations at the time when it had been engaged in its life and death struggle for its own liberation. It therefore felt duty-bound to give the Committee every support in the discharge of its task, to encourage its deliberations, and to share in the achievement of its objectives which were intimately linked with Algeria's convictions and actions.

443. His country, yesterday still colonized, today independent after a bitter and bloody struggle, endorsed the just and legitimate cause of peoples still fighting against colonial domination. Their liberation movements encountered a natural understanding and support in Algeria among a people who shared their desires and hopes and who sustained them in their efforts and their sacrifices.

444. The Committee would thus have an opportunity to enter into extensive contacts with the leaders of those movements and would find on a land still shuddering from its clash with colonialism a particularly appropriate background for the study of the problems it had to tackle.

445. He therefore welcomed the Committee, brought greetings from the Council of the Revolution, the National Liberation Front and the Government, and thanked the Committee for having chosen Algiers as one of its meeting-places in Africa.

446. As soon as the Second World War had ended, the elimination of colonial domination had become an international objective. The recognition of the right of peoples to self-determination, embodied in the United Nations Charter, had given rise to great hopes among the oppressed peoples and a new era was opening which was to be marked by the final abolition of colonialism.

447. While many countries had indeed recovered their independence during those last twenty years, their liberation had not always been easy and often they had only succeeded in shaking off the colonial yoke at the cost of immense sacrifices. The general upsurge of human brotherhood which had been apparent at the end of the war was gradually dying down, while imperialism, as soon as it was threatened, was recovering its vocation and striving to maintain and strengthen its domination. The very objective of the Committee's mission revealed the extent and difficulty of the task which remained to be accomplished of freeing peoples who were still under the colonial yoke and who were constrained to use violence and to wage an unequal war to establish their most elementary rights to freedom, justice and dignity. The struggle against colonialism continued, marked both by the determination of the imperialist Powers to perpetuate a régime of colonial exploitation and by the increasingly strong determination of the colonized peoples to break that stranglehold. The irreconcilable antagonism between oppressive force and faith in justice and freedom was reflected by successive outbursts of violence. In every place where a colonial régime persisted there was a hotbed of tension which gave rise to the courageous and often heroic action of liberation movements.

448. It was not by chance that the Special Committee had arranged the stages of its itinerary in Africa, for it was mainly in Africa that the fight against colonialism was taking place and that many countries continued to suffer from colonial domination. Whereas the other European Powers who had taken part in the colonization of Africa had, either voluntarily or under pressure from the African people, modified their attitude and their behaviour, Portugal persisted blindly in following its policy of colonial exploitation, completely disregarding the profound aspirations of peoples and flouting all the obligations of international society towards colonized peoples. As a result of that retrograde policy, immense areas of Africa were dominated by one of the last adherents of an anachronistic colonialism and their peoples were at the mercy of Portuguese exploiters. In Angola the Portuguese authorities were increasing their war effort in the face of an armed struggle for liberation which had been going on for more than five years. That had in no way undermined the determination of the Angolan patriots. In the end, Angola would inevitably triumph over the blindness of the colonial Power. The same was true of Guinea and the Cape Verde Islands. Although the armed struggle in Mozambique had been unleashed more recently, it was still no less atrocious and no less violent and could not leave international opinion indifferent.

449. The situation in Southern Rhodesia was the direct responsibility of the United Kingdom which, in spite of its commitments and promises, had paved the way for the advent of a racist régime. The unilateral proclamation of independence by Ian Smith, the logical conclusion of United Kingdom policy, constituted a challenge and a provocation to African opinion and international opinion. It had placed the people of Zimbabwe under the domination of a white minority, thus instituting a régime of racial segregation similar to that of South Africa. That was a serious blow to the freedom of an African people and an inadmissible affront to its dignity. The African conscience could not disregard that new aggression which it had already denounced before international opinion and against which it would be able to mobilize all the forces of Africa. The seriousness of the Rhodesian problem could not be emphasized enough. It brought dire threats to the African continent and with regard to it each member of the international Committee must consider his responsibilities.

450. In South Africa and Portugal the régime of Ian Smith found its natural allies, that double alliance being based both on racism and colonialism. The policy of apartheid applied in South Africa had been resolutely condemned in international institutions but it was clear now that the Government of Pretoria was maintaining its attitude with impunity and was frustrating the economic sanctions taken against it. That striking example showed how well founded was the scepticism felt by Africans concerning the efficacy of the economic measures taken by the United Kingdom Government against the Ian Smith régime. Nevertheless, the Head of the United Kingdom Government had promised faithfully to take all the necessary steps to restore the situation in Southern Rhodesia and had requested the African countries of the Commonwealth to allow him six months to prove to them that his policy of economic sanctions would be enough to attain the objective apparently sought. That had been at the beginning of 1966 and the time-limit granted to Mr. Wilson had now expired. It was difficult to say that the régime of Ian Smith was on the point of collapsing, a victim of the means of coercion dreamed up by Prime Minister Wilson. Indeed, negotiations were now taking place between the Salisbury racists and the representatives of the United Kingdom Government. Did the United Kingdom really believe that international opinion could be thus hoodwinked? The attitude of the Algerian Government remained clear and the delaying tactics of the United Kingdom could deceive no one. Only a resolute policy could put an end to the Ian Smith rebellion. The present shilly-shallyings were doing nothing to solve the problem; they were paving the way for a period of violence in which all Africans and free men everywhere would find themselves fighting at the side of the Zimbabwe people.

451. It was not only on the African continent that United Kingdom colonialism continued to manifest itself. In Southern Arabia, Aden and Oman peoples were fighting to free themselves from United Kingdom domination and their struggle took on the same character as in the colonized countries of Africa. There again the exploitation of the wealth of the country and the maintenance of strategic positions remained the basic aims of colonial domination. The selfish interests of the colonial Power were obstinately opposed to the fierce determination of the peoples for liberation and thus led to the same bloody clashes.

452. The problem of Palestine also had the same colonial character. By some strange justice, the Arab peoples of Palestine had been forced to pay for the Nazi crimes against the Jews and to abandon their own country and remain deprived of their fatherland. The Powers which had helped to create the artificial State of Israel had perhaps sought to solve a human problem which the sufferings of the Jewish people had certainly imposed on the international conscience. But the terrible situation in which they had plunged millions of Palestinians, who had been transformed into miserable refugees at the frontiers of their country, constituted no less a human tragedy the intensity and scale of which could not fail to trouble the international conscience. The voluntary contributions—which were becoming more and more modest—by certain great Powers for the Palestine refugees could not dissimulate their responsibility for a problem whose social and humanitarian aspects merely accentuate its political character.

453. For a country had been despoiled, a people had been driven out and dispossessed of their wealth. Therefore, that was indeed a colonial problem. The present situation offered the Palestinians no other hope but for the reconquest by arms of their fatherland. It was for that that they were preparing and it was that objective which the Palestine Liberation Organization had set itself. The United Nations could not much longer ignore the real nature of that problem which threatened the equilibrium of the Middle East and therefore represented a permanent danger for world peace. The injustice which had struck the people of Palestine must be remedied and it was in the general interest that all countries which proclaimed themselves in favour of equality of peoples and the free enjoyment of their inalienable rights should associate themselves in that task.

454. In reviewing the problems of colonial domination and the threats they brought to mankind it was impossible to disregard the war which was raging in Viet-Nam and whose gradual escalation and murderous character directly endangered the peace of the world. The motives for aggression in South Viet-Nam could in no way justify the sufferings of a people whose sacrifices were so great that their right to peace and freedom must be recognized. The warlike attitude of the United States extremists could not be equated with the attitude of the United States people who were deeply perturbed by a war imposed on a small country which was resisting heroically that imperialist adventure. Accordingly, he ventured to state that reason must triumph and that reason made it necessary to take account of facts. It was a fact that the people of South Viet-Nam would continue to fight without respite against the foreign intervention which was being imposed on it. It was another fact that the resistance of the people of South Viet-Nam was supported by the National Liberation Front (FNL) which was canalizing its energies and organizing its struggle and which consequently was alone able to speak for the future of that country. Any sincere search for a solution to a conflict which was condemned by all peoples and primarily by the United States people must necessarily consider the FNL as the only valid spokesman and the authentic representative of the South Viet-Nameese people. Any other approach to the problem was necessarily doomed to failure and could only constitute a delaying tactic or a diversionary operation. Algeria expressed that opinion quite calmly because it felt the suffering of the Viet-Nameese people and because it was convinced that the future of mankind was based primarily upon friendship between free and equal peoples.

455. The task of the Special Committee was certainly difficult and vast in scope. Decolonization remained a problem which weighed heavily over the modern world and its multiple and varied aspects concealed the basic consideration that peoples must have the right to enjoy their freedom and live a more worthy life. Colonial domination, the exploitation of man by man, the maintenance of part of mankind in a state of moral and intellectual degradation were a blot upon a world where science was daily achieving miracles which enlarged man's horizon and held out hopes of a promising future for peoples. The anachronistic survival of colonial régimes at a time when man was freeing himself from his earthly ties was becoming more and more an international responsibility, since it was obvious that world peace would always remain precarious so long as peoples continued to be deprived of their elementary rights.

456. Nevertheless, decolonization was not merely a political problem and the struggles for liberation to which it led were only one of its most tangible aspects. It was also and above all a state of mind, a new conception of relations between peoples. It must take hold in the minds and customs of men and replace the antagonisms between races and peoples with a feeling of human solidarity and an awareness of the need for real co-operation between human beings. Decolonization of minds must therefore precede and accompany the liberation of peoples.

457. Without that transformation, without that revolution in the rules of international morality, the work of decolonization would remain incomplete and would not succeed in eliminating all the problems it sought to solve. For, to decolonize a people did not mean only to rescue it from direct domination, which was all the more revolting because it was shameless and open. To decolonize a people was also and above all to free it from any foreign intervention, to allow it to manage its own affairs and to enable it to embark unrestrictedly along the path of progress. It was an undeniable fact, unfortunately proved by many examples, that no colonial Power had ever tried to prepare a colonized people for the exercise of its national responsibilities and that, on the contrary, its whole policy had been aimed at keeping the colony in a backward social and cultural state in order to continue its exploitation indefinitely. The difficulties experienced by the newly liberated peoples were thus the primary responsibility of the colonial Powers who often sought to profit from those difficulties by maintaining their political stranglehold and their economic privileges. The achievement of independence did not mark the end of colonial exploitation but rather caused it to reappear in new forms which were no less to be condemned.

458. Decolonization must therefore be applied equally to that kind of colonial domination which potentially had the same dangers as direct and brutal domination. To be complete, decolonization must maintain the patrimony of formerly colonized peoples and enable them to pursue their development without any foreign pressure.

459. Of course, it was primarily the responsibility of the newly independent countries themselves to take stock of their obligations and to ensure that their sovereignty was respected. By uniting their efforts and pooling their resources they could oppose manifestations of neo-colonialism. But the accession to independence of a colonized country must bring about new relationships with the former colonial Power whose responsibility towards it could not cease merely because the colonial régime was at an end. The establishment of those new relationships, if they were stripped of all vestiges of domination and if they were aimed at building a better future, based on solid and durable friendship, could facilitate the changes that must follow the disappearance of the colonial system and could provide a new and fruitful basis for friendship between peoples. In that way, Algeria without complexes and with an open mind had co-operated with France in a spirit of mutual respect for the essential interests and sovereignty of the two countries. That co-operation, which had developed in spite of difficulties of every kind and which had gradually adapted itself to the realities and aspirations of the two peoples, constituted an enlightening experience not only as regards relationships between a colonized and a colonial Power but also as regards relationships that it had instituted between an under-developed and a developed country. The efforts which were being made by each of the parties to improve that co-operation and triumph over the difficulties that might naturally arise were so many pledges of its success.

460. That experience showed that such co-operation, desirable in itself, became inspiring when friendship and mutual esteem characterized bilateral relations, when the real interests of both partners were judiciously assessed and when there was a common determination to eliminate and transcend all the vestiges of the past in order to consolidate the present and guarantee the future. Such an undertaking was the result of a truly historic view of events because it was inspired by a sincerely shared attachment to the freedom of peoples, to the fruitful relations which could exist between them and to the consolidation of peace and stability in the world. That was one of the most healthy manifestations of decolonization.

461. International opinion had become aware of the importance of the problem of decolonization and it was perfectly legitimate that international organizations had tackled that problem and continued to follow its development. The presence of the Special Committee in Algeria showed the increasing interest that the United Nations was taking in decolonization and the work of liberation movements.

462. While the maintenance of colonial domination was a flagrant and inadmissible violation of the rights of peoples inscribed in the United Nations Charter, that situation also had serious dangers for international equilibrium and for world peace.

463. Undoubtedly, the United Nations had been preoccupied since its establishment with problems of decolonization and with the problem of racial discrimination. At each session of the General Assembly those problems were discussed at length and gave rise to many resolutions. The Security Council had often dealt with those questions and special bodies had been set up to study them. The United Nations was thus clearly determined to help carry decolonization to its completion since colonial domination and racial discrimination were irrevocably condemned by Member States.

464. However, it was unfortunately impossible to assert that the results obtained were commensurate with the good intentions shown. Twenty years after the establishment of the United Nations, vast territories and numerous peoples remained under the colonial yoke. The régime of apartheid continued to be the scourge of South Africa and was now being extended to Southern Rhodesia. It was true that some countries had recovered their independence during that period and had come to take their place in the Organization. Their efforts had always been aimed at the strengthening of United Nations action in the field of decolonization and against régimes of racial segregation. In spite of that new source of strength for the Organization, few, if any, practical results had been achieved.

465. The only conclusion was that the United Nations must revise its basic organization and its methods of work, for in their present state they were responsible for its ineffectiveness and immobility. It was abnormal and inadmissible that a country, however big, should be able to defy the whole of the Organization and ignore its decisions. As it was now conceived, the Organization allowed such an anomaly which prejudiced its authority. The time had come to give the highest international institution a structure which was more in conformity with the modern world and which would enable it to assume its proper responsibility in the maintenance of good relations between all peoples. The newly independent countries must find their proper place and play their full role in it. Also, the powers and responsibilities of the General Assembly should be reviewed so as to establish a better balance between the Assembly and the Security Council. Finally, the Organization would remain imperfect so long as it failed to acquire the necessary universality. It was impossible much longer to keep outside of the United Nations a nation as important as the People's Republic of China whose population amounted to a quarter of mankind. It was also time that countries which might have had doubts about the value and effectiveness of the Organization should find again their legitimate place in it, for the deficiencies and imperfections which he had just pointed out in no way diminished the importance of the role of the United Nations in the maintenance of world peace and the strengthening of co-operation between peoples. The setbacks, the mistakes, the delays must not obscure all that the Organization had done and the dangers that it had been able to avert. Algeria wished to pay a tribute to the United Nations for its perseverance and would continue to support it in the continuation of those efforts. In that tribute it also included the Secretary-General who had been able to direct the activities of the United Nations with competence and authority. It did so with all the more sincerity and warmth because it could not forget the decisive role he had played as Chairman of the Committee of Solidarity with Algeria at the time when it was waging its struggle for national liberation. U Thant would certainly have been one of the men who had done most to give the United Nations a meaning, a vitality and a dynamism which could make it universally respected.

466. Finally, he wished the Committee every success and assured it that the Algerian Government would spare no effort to facilitate the Committee's task and help it in the accomplishment of its mission.

General statements

467. The Chairman expressed gratitude to the President of Algeria for his inspiring message, and to the Foreign Minister of Algeria for the important address which he had delivered on behalf of the President and the Government of Algeria. He requested the Foreign Minister to convey to the President and to the Government and people of Algeria the gratitude of the Special Committee for the honour they had accorded them by inviting the Committee to hold their deliberations in Algiers, the capital of a nation that was second to none in its dedication to the liquidation of colonialism and the attainment of true independence—objectives to which the Committee also was irrevocably committed.

468. The history of Algeria's gallant struggle for independence had been justly acclaimed as a classic and heroic example of the undying quest for freedom by all colonial countries and peoples. It was to the lasting credit of the Government and people of Algeria that in spite of the heavy sacrifices they had made to achieve their independence, they had not, in their moment of triumph, forgotten their brothers in Africa and in the Arab world who were still struggling to attain their legitimate rights and aspirations. The Government and people of Algeria, by deed as well as by example, had kept faith with all the freedom fighters the world over. It was for that reason that the Committee considered it a signal honour to meet in Algiers.

469. The presence of the United Nations in Africa, in the cause of decolonization, was ample evidence of the new emphasis in the work of the United Nations in the 1960s and of the ever growing involvement of the United Nations in the question of decolonization, in accordance with its responsibilities as laid down in the Charter and in response to the challenge of the world, in which, despite the pious pronouncements of many Members of the Organization, the evil cancer of colonialism was still existent.

470. During the course of its meetings in Africa, the Special Committee had held very fruitful discussions in the United Republic of Tanzania, Somalia, Ethiopia and the United Arab Republic. It had examined in detail the colonial situation in various parts of the African continent and the Arab world. In Algeria it would pursue its study of other colonial questions which were still plaguing that continent. The environment of the host country, at once congenial and anti-colonialist, coupled with the inspiration which it had given freedom-loving peoples everywhere, would give impetus to the Committee's deliberations and contribute to the effective and vigorous discharge of its task.

471. On behalf of all the Committee members and the United Nations Secretariat staff, he wished to thank the Government of Algeria for the splendid living and working arrangements which had been so generously made for them. He expressed appreciation of the warm hospitality which in the finest Arab and African traditions had been showered on the Committee and which without a doubt would contribute to the success of their work.

472. The representative of Mali, speaking on behalf of the people and Republic of Mali, the Sudanese Union (RDA) and the Government of Mali, expressed his sincere gratitude, to the fraternal people and Government of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria, and to the leaders of the National Liberation Front, the progressive party which had led that sister State ever since independence. When a Malian stood on Algerian soil for the first time, he was sincerely moved and proud, because he shared the feelings of the Algerian people about the struggle against colonialism and imperialism. The historical ties which had united the two peoples for several centuries had been made possible by the two-way flow of trade, culture and religion across the Sahara; that desert was not an obstacle but a link.

473. One could not speak of Algeria without evoking that people's glorious struggle to end colonial domination and promote a dynamic policy which met the genuine aspirations of the Algerian people. To be sure, Mali had gained its independence easily because of the courage and tenacity of its people, but also because of the courageous sacrifices of the valiant Algerians. He could not express the emotion he felt on remembering the thousands of Algerians who had died on the field of honour in order that Africa might one day recover its independence and dignity.

474. He was convinced that Africa, once freed of the colonial yoke, would conquer hunger and disease and would at last be able to play its rightful historic role. Unfortunately there were still trouble-spots in Africa, places where man exploited man and where apartheid, that baleful system which was no more than a relic of slavery, flourished. It was the Special Committee's duty to demonstrate the complicity of the great Powers, which, by helping the colonialist régimes, were impeding the implementation of resolution 1514 (VX).

475. His good friend, Mr. Bouteflika, the Foreign Minister of Algeria, had drawn attention at the previous meeting to the seriousness of the situation in Africa. The United Nations was morally obliged to support all national liberation movements, since their struggle was just and in conformity with the Charter. Moreover, everyone knew that Portugal, left to itself, could not continue its hateful war of conquest. He paid tribute to the freedom fighters and assured them of the unconditional support of the people of Mali.

476. Before concluding its meetings in Africa, the Special Committee should adopt a general resolution condemning the retrograde policy of the Salazar, Smith and Verwoerd Governments and the financial monopolies which were supporting them, and submitting firm recommendations to that effect to the General Assembly. It should also fix a deadline for the accession to independence of the Territories under Portuguese domination, in execution of its mandate under resolution 2105 (XX), and recommend the Security Council to make the economic sanctions taken against Portugal mandatory. It should also recommend the Security Council to require the administering Powers to apply United Nations resolutions and suspend the operations of their foreign military bases.

477. He was prepared to take part in any discussions for that purpose and reiterated his delegation's fraternal gratitude to the Government and people of Algeria.

478. The representative of Tunisia thanked Mr. Bouteflika for his inspiring address. He was sure that it would be a valuable source of encouragement to all the delegations and he associated himself with the Chairman's warm thanks to the Government and people of Algeria for their magnificent welcome. With deep emotion he recalled the ancestral ties which had always linked Algeria and Tunisia, in times of distress as in times of joy. It was a special pleasure for the Special Committee to be in Algeria, that sister country whose brave struggle against colonialism would for ever be an example and a symbol for all oppressed peoples. For eight years, the men, women and children of Algeria had suffered in silence and continued their long campaign of resistance under the guidance of the National Liberation Front. From the start, Tunisia had considered that struggle its own for, like

Algeria, it had promised never to deny its support to peoples sincerely inspired by the sacred desire for liberty. The inalienable right to independence was, of course, guaranteed by the United Nations Charter, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

479. At the neo-Destour Congress held at Sousse in 1959, President Bourguiba had suggested that the administering Powers should hold a conference at which they themselves would decide on arrangements for the liberation of the peoples they administered. That suggestion had not been accepted by the administering Powers but the United Nations had responded to it by adopting resolution 1514 (XV). He was glad of the opportunity to express his delegation's great satisfaction at the way in which the Special Committee had carried out its noble mission.

480. At the current meeting the members of the Special Committee were to take up the question of the Territories under Portuguese domination. In population and total area they represented almost a quarter of the African continent. It was quite natural that that grave problem should be dealt with in Algiers, a city which was an exemplar and in which freedom fighters found both encouragement and an unending source of inspiration.

481. Nothing could ever halt Africa's advance towards progress. The family of independent African countries was daily becoming larger and in the near future the whole of the African continent would be independent.

482. In conclusion, he again thanked the Government and fraternal people of Algeria for their warm welcome.

483. The representative of Iraq expressed his delegation's gratitude to the Government and people of Algeria for the welcome accorded to the Special Committee. Algeria, which had struggled so valiantly against colonialism, to the admiration of the whole world, was a fitting choice for the Committee's deliberations: the sacrifice made by its people to regain their freedom was an example to all those who still suffered under the yoke of foreign domination. Furthermore, Algeria played a leading role in the Organization of African Unity, in the League of Arab States and in the non-aligned world and had spared no efforts in the cause of peace, freedom and human dignity.

484. His delegation was confident that the Special Committee's meetings in Algiers would meet with the same success as in other African capitals. Important resolutions, aimed at the peaceful granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples, had been, and would be, adopted by the Committee. However, when the Committee's counsel passed unheeded by the forces of colonialism, the oppressed peoples, who looked to the Committee for moral support, had no alternative but to fight for their freedom. As a result of colonialism, many critical situations had arisen throughout the world—for example, in the Portuguese colonies, Southern Rhodesia, South Arabia and Oman. Moreover, as the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Algeria had rightly pointed out, there was also the tragedy of Palestine.

485. The co-operation rendered by the Algerian people and Government to the Special Committee during its meetings in Algiers would provide it with added impetus enabling it to justify the faith of millions of human beings in the United Nations.

486. The representative of Poland expressed appreciation to the President, the Government and people of Algeria for their invitation to the Special Committee to hold the final meetings of its African session in Algiers. His delegation had been profoundly moved by the welcome extended to the Committee on its arrival and was grateful for the inspiring message with which the President had honoured the Committee, and for the address which had been delivered by the Foreign Minister. Those messages, and the invitation to the Special Committee to meet in Algiers, were an expression of the importance which Algeria attached to the lofty principles of the United Nations Charter and to the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. The Committee was privileged to meet in a country which had become a symbol of the peoples' heroic struggle for freedom and independence. As a result of the Committee's visit to Algeria, he was at last able to realize a long-cherished dream and to pay a personal tribute to a courageous people who had fought, and given their lives, for the liberation of their land. The Algerian people's struggle, under the leadership of the National Liberation Front, had been admired throughout the world. The people of Poland had known that theirs was a just cause which had not only aimed at Algeria's liberation but had also paved the way to independence for many other African countries. The Algerian people and their leaders were also to be congratulated upon their remarkable achievements in other fields, for their untiring efforts in the cause of peace and progress and for their outstanding contribution to the eradication of colonialism in Africa and other parts of the world.

487. Conveying his own Government's best wishes to the Algerian people and their Government for the future, he said that his delegation was particularly happy to visit Algeria, with which Poland enjoyed fruitful co-operation.

488. The Special Committee had reached the last stage of its deliberations in Africa, and it was to be hoped that its discussions in Algiers would provide encouragement for the freedom fighters in Angola, Mozambique, Portuguese Guinea and the other Territories to be considered. At that stage, he wished to restate his delegation's stand regarding colonialism, for the benefit of the petitioners who would appear before the Committee. Assuring them of his Government's support for self-determination and independence for all countries still under colonial rule, he said that Poland, by virtue of its historical tradition and social structure, was utterly opposed to any form of national or racial oppression. It viewed the liberation of colonial peoples as an act of historic justice and considered that as long as colonialism existed, there could be no real peace throughout the world. His delegation had always condemned the brutalities committed by colonialists—brutalities which were in direct contradiction of the colonialists' avowed civilizing mission in the Territories concerned. In Southern Rhodesia and South West Africa crimes were being perpetrated against humanity and, as the testimony of the petitioners from Angola and Mozambique had revealed, Portugal was intensifying its war to exterminate the African people. Because it received eco-conomic, military and political aid from certain NATO Powers, Portugal was able to flout United Nations resolutions and those Powers were responsible for the events in the Portuguese Territories in Africa. They had deeply entrenched economic and financial interests there and were determined to arrest national liberation movements. The perpetuation of apartheid and colonial domination guaranteed huge profits, earned with cheap migrant labour, for the United Kingdom, the United States and West Germany. However, their defiant attitude would have to change radically. Poland, which had been the first victim of Nazism and its creed of the master race, considered that colonialism and racism were not only an affront to human dignity but also a threat to world peace. It would not cease to raise its voice, therefore, to support national liberation movements and it would continue to denounce colonialists as the enemies of peace and international co-operation. The time had come for the Special Committee to take action to remove a danger which would not spare any Power, great or small. For that reason, his Government whole-heartedly supported the total eradication of colonialism and racism.

489. The representative of India thanked the President, the people and the Government of Algeria for their hospitality. Algeria was a fitting choice as the venue for the Special Committee's last meeting in Africa, since the lives of over two millions of its people had been lost in its struggle against colonialism. The messages to the Committee of the President of the Revolutionary Council and the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Algeria, which had emphasized the urgent nature of the various problems and had drawn attention to the seriousness of the situation in such Territories as Southern Rhodesia and those under Portuguese administration, would make an important contribution to the Special Committee's work.

490. India's struggle against colonialism was well known throughout the world and the names of Gandhi and Nehru would remain for ever enshrined in the hearts of all who cherished freedom. It had always maintained that its own independence would be incomplete while other countries in Asia and Africa remained enslaved since freedom was one and indivisible for all peoples. India therefore joined with all those who fought against the hideous forces of colonialism in Africa.

491. Despite the fact that many of the most powerful countries had at last realized that colonialism could not endure, Portugal still clung to its inhuman domination of certain African Territories. It was living in an age that had since passed by and ruthlessly perpetuated its domination over the African people with the aid of its allies. It was to be deplored that, after hundreds of years of the so-called civilizing Christian mission, barely 3 to 4 per cent of the people in the Portuguese Territories were literate.

492. While the Special Committee could not physically prevent the Portuguese from their ruthless domination in the African Territories, it could speak forth and expose Portugal and its allies for their reprehensible action. His delegation would support all those who endeavoured to expose colonialism. Human dignity and freedom, to have any meaning, had to be one and indivisible for all mankind.

493. Lastly, his delegation extended to the Government and people of Algeria every best wish for their continued well-being and prosperity.

494. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania expressed the gratitude of his delegation to the Government and people of Algeria for their invitation to the Special Committee to hold some of its meetings in Algiers.

495. The warmth of the welcome extended to the Special Committee, despite the lateness of its arrival, was part of an inseparable tradition among Algerians. It was very touching that the Committee should be holding meetings in Algeria only four years after the country had disengaged itself from the claims of colonialism. Never in the twentieth century had a people paid such a price for freedom. Indeed, that should be a lesson to colonial Powers that the just cause always won. A further lesson was provided by Algeria's progress since independence. The country's attainments showed what could be done in an atmosphere of freedom and independence.

496. It was fitting that the Special Committee should discuss the question of Portuguese Territories in Africa. Portugal was refusing to learn from history, but the freedom fighters of those Territories should draw inspiration from what Algeria had achieved. Tanzania would always be on the side of the forces of freedom; for so long as the cancer of colonialism and apartheid subsisted, there could be no true freedom or lasting peace. The Committee was therefore not only performing a task but also carrying out its duty to eliminate colonialism.

497. He was grateful for the encouraging message from the President of the Revolutionary Council and for the inspiring address by the Foreign Minister. As the Committee's tour drew to a close, his delegation was more than ever convinced of the determination of Africans to uproot colonialism from their continent.

498. The representative of Yugoslavia associated himself with the Chairman's statement thanking the Government and people of Algeria for their warm welcome. His delegation was happy to be in Algeria, whose struggle for independence had been an inspiration to liberation movements elsewhere in Africa. Since the country continued to play an important role in that respect, various African liberation movements had set up their headquarters in Algeria.

499. The inspiring message from the President of the Revolutionary Council and the statement of the Foreign Minister would provide further impetus for the Special Committee's work. Co-operation and friendship between Algeria and Yugoslavia dated from the time of the Algerian struggle for independence and continued on the basis of non-alignment and peace.

500. He concluded by expressing his thanks for the hospitality extended to the Special Committee and the fine facilities and working arrangements provided, and wished the Algerian people all success, prosperity and progress.

501. The representative of Afghanistan associated himself with the Chairman's statement thanking the President of the Revolutionary Council for his inspiring message and the Foreign Minister for his important address and kind words of welcome. His gratitude also went to the Government and people of Algeria for inviting the Special Committee to hold some of its meetings in Algiers.

502. The warm welcome extended to the Special Committee was further testimony of the traditional hospitality of Algerians, in whose country colonialism had encountered one of its greatest setbacks. Having gained its independence, Algeria was playing a leading role in decolonization.

503. Afghanistan and Algeria were bound in common aspirations and spiritual ties. When the heroic efforts and sacrifices of Algeria had led to independence, the joy of Afghanistan had been immense. He expressed his country's heartfelt wishes to the Algerian people for their happiness, prosperity and progress.

504. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics expressed the sincere gratitude of the Soviet Union delegation to the President of the Revolutionary Council, the Government and the people of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria for their invitation and very cordial hospitality. The Special Committee's meetings in Algiers would undoubtedly be a source of inspiration to all those who desired the complete elimination of colonial régimes because the heroic struggle of the Algerian people against foreign oppression would always serve as an example to those who were fighting for their liberty.

505. The Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria was in the forefront of the fight against colonialism and imperialism; the struggle being waged by Algeria, in co-operation with sister States and the Organization of African Unity, for the final destruction of colonialism, deserved the admiration and gratitude of all peace-loving peoples.

506. He was particularly happy to be in Algeria, because the Soviet Union's relationship with that country had always been close. That relationship had begun as soon as the Algerian people had set out to resist oppression. On his arrival the previous day he had felt the effect of that friendship. The Soviet Union and Algeria had a common ideal: the building of socialism and of a new life.

507. The message which the President of the Revolutionary Council had addressed to the members of the Special Committee would be a source of inspiration to them, because it encouraged all those who were fighting for their independence. Mr. Bouteflika's address was also most valuable. He was gratified at the position adopted by the Algerian Government on problems of colonialism and on a number of international problems. He fully shared the views of the Algerian Government about the activities of United States imperialism in Viet-Nam.

508. The Soviet Union delegation would do everything in its power to ensure the implementation of resolution 1514 (XV). In due course it would give a detailed account of its position on the problems of putting an end to Portuguese and Spanish colonialism. For the moment, however, he would confine himself to assuring the peoples of those regions of the sympathy and fellow-feeling of the Soviet Union, which had helped and would in the future continue to help the independent States of Africa and the OAU in their noble struggle against colonialism and imperialism.

509. The colonial Powers would have to be compelled to respect the decisions of the General Assembly and the Security Council. That would be an arduous undertaking because those criminal régimes were being helped by the Western imperialist and colonialist Powers. Imperialism presented a united front. A coalition should be formed against those who wished to impede the irreversible process of the liberation of peoples. Peace-loving peoples too, would have to present a united front to them. The Special Committee should make use of the right conferred on it by the General Assembly at its twentieth session to report on any developments which might threaten international peace and security. It should recommend measures in conformity with Chapter VII of the Charter against Portugal, South Africa and Southern Rhodesia. Decisions had to be taken to justify the hopes of the oppressed peoples of Africa. In conclusion, he wished Algeria every success in the course upon which it had embarked.

510. The representative of the Ivory Coast said that he considered it an honour and a pleasant duty for his delegation to associate itself with the very sincere thanks which had been expressed to the Government and people of the Republic of Algeria for their friendly invitation and for the brotherly and warm welcome they had extended to the members of the Special Committee. The invitation to visit Algiers, the last stop on its information tour through Africa, would enable the Committee to make contact, as it had at Dar es Salaam, Mogadiscio, Addis Ababa and Cairo, with freedom fighters who were trying to liberate their territories from colonial domination, apartheid and shameful régimes, such as the rebel régime of Ian Smith. Peace was indivisible and the rights of all peoples were universal. He therefore deplored the fact that, nineteen years after the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, millions of human beings were still being deprived of their inalienable rights. Such a state of affairs created trouble-spots which represented a constant threat to international peace. He appealed once more to the intelligence and common sense of the men and régimes responsible for that anachronistic situation. The period of the exploitation of man by man had passed.

511. The Special Committee was responsible for the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. It had to take into account the international background to which the Foreign Minister of the Republic of Algeria had referred in his address at the previous meeting and to concentrate its efforts on the peoples it had been instructed to assist in gaining their independence. Its visit to Africa should be interpreted as a further sign of the links of solidarity between the United Nations and all African peoples still deprived of their inalienable right to freedom and independence and subjected to racial discrimination.

512. He sincerely thanked the President of the Revolutionary Council and Head of the Algerian Government, whose country had already done so much to help solve the problem of decolonization, for the very wise and understanding message he had addressed to the members of the Committee. He also thanked the Foreign Minister of the Republic of Algeria for his clear and most informative statement. Both those statesmen were well aware of the heavy burden their country had assumed by welcoming to its territory the liberation movements of countries under colonial domination. He also paid a well-deserved tribute to the valiant Algerian people, which had itself fought so hard for its independence and was gratified that an Algerian delegation was participating in the Special Committee's work during its visit to Algiers. The Committee would derive valuable inspiration from the message from the President of the Revolutionary Council and from the words of the Algerian Foreign Minister. He was happy to note that the Algerian people, despite its modest resources, had been able to make useful progress since independence. He wished the Algerian Government and people peace and prosperity.

513. The representative of Venezuela said that the Special Committee could have wished for no better place than Algiers in which to complete its work in Africa. Algeria was a living example of what a people filled with an ardent desire to win its independence and recover its sovereign liberty could do. The heroic struggle it had waged was reminiscent in many ways of that of the peoples of Latin America in general, and of Venezuela, in particular. Like the Venezuelan people, Algeria had not been content with obtaining its independence. Since regaining it, Algeria, as a member of the international community, had been pursuing a policy of capital importance within the United Nations, where it had adopted an attitude of unequivocal opposition to colonialism and of assistance to peoples fighting for their independence in Africa. He was certain that the Algerian people, which had not hesitated to sacrifice the lives of over a million of its sons in order to win its independence, would not consider its struggle ended until the millions of Africans suffering under the colonial yoke had regained, with their independence, their dignity as free peoples. The message which the President of the Revolutionary Council, Head of Government of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria, had addressed to the Special Committee that very morning was proof of that. In his interesting address, Mr. Abdelaziz Bouteflika, Foreign Minister of Algeria, had taken up the same theme. The Venezuelan delegation associated itself with the Chairman of the Special Committee in thanking them both; their words would be a source of inspiration to all members of the Committee. The people of Venezuela had followed every phase of the heroic struggle of the Algerian people and the Venezuelan delegation had made it its duty to defend that people in all circumstances in its statements and by its votes. He was happy and proud to be able to express, on Algerian soil, his admiration and respect for a people which had not only refused to be intimidated by the oppressor but had waged a relentless struggle to regain its liberty and independence.

514. 'It was no accident that the Special Committee was holding its meetings in Algeria at that time. Its journey through the African continent would have been incomplete if it had not included a visit to that sanctuary of anti-colonialism. Neither was it an accident that the Algerian Government had invited it. The Committee had a duty to see the country which had suffered so much and fought so hard against colonialism. That invitation had enabled it not only to come into contact with colonial reality in Africa but to become acquainted with the noble Algerian people which was, in its eyes, a living symbol of anti-colonialism in modern times.

515. Algeria was now free. It had begun a fresh struggle against ignorance and under-development. He had been struck by the country's youth. The streets were full of children and young people going to school or college. Algeria was making a determined stand against illiteracy in order to combat one of the most notable consequences of colonialism: ignorance. On behalf of his delegation, he thanked the Government and people of Algeria for their cordial invitation and generous hospitality. The work of the Committee could not be concluded in a more propitious atmosphere. He was certain that that work would bear fruit. He hoped that the admirable people of Algeria would find a better future and wished it every success in all its undertakings.

516. The representative of Syria said that the fact that the Special Committee's concluding meetings should be held in Algiers was evidence of Algeria's awareness of the paramount role it was destined to play in support of the cause of emancipation everywhere, and to its determination to lead it to full accomplishment.

517. In the defence of freedom, of the right to self-determination and of emancipation from colonialism, that country had sacrificed a million martyrs and had waged one of the most heroic struggles in human history. In the face of its opposition, the myth of colonial assimilation had crumbled, and from that land, with African solidarity, Asian support, and the co-operation of justice-loving nations, would be directed the coup de grâce against the remaining pockets of colonialism. It was therefore significant that the plight of Angola should form the main topic of the Special Committee's consideration in Algiers.

518. With total self-denial and universal dedication, Algeria had not stopped at its own achievement, but had gone on to play its part in the solution of international problems at large and in support of the cause of liberation. The brilliant statement by its Foreign Minister had clearly depicted the large perspective of its role in international affairs in general, and above all in the struggle against the remnants of colonialism, a flagrant example of which in a new form was thriving to the detriment and misery of the Arab people of Palestine.

519. The great Algerian revolution had not stopped at the eradication of the physical presence of colonialism. It had been a structural revolution aimed at restoring the value of man, developing his resources, placing his welfare at the centre of endeavour, reviving his true culture and enhancing his contribution to civilization, in human relations based on social justice and equality. Last but not least it had been aimed at stimulating the legitimate tendency of progressive forces towards solidarity, and community of interests, aims and aspirations. It had been a genuine revolution against the concept of master and slave, first and second class citizens, privileged and under-privileged. It had thus a most intimate connexion with the purposes of the Special Committee in helping to implement the granting of independence to innocent peoples who had for long suffered under colonial inhumanities, and with the United Nations objectives of international peace and justice.

520. The gallant people of Algeria were to their brother Arabs of Syria a source of inspiration, and the model they had offered was an embodiment of all that was noble for humanity. He expressed his country's sincere gratitude to them, to their Government and to the President of the Revolutionary Council.

521. The representative of Italy associated himself with the thanks expressed by the Chairman, on behalf of the Special Committee, to the President of the Revolutionary Council and to the Foreign Minister of Algeria. His delegation's gratitude went to the Government and people of Algeria for inviting the Committee to hold its final meetings in Algiers. So close were the ties and so short the distance that Italians did not feel themselves to be abroad when in Algeria. He was indeed most happy to be there and hoped that his visit would give him a closer acquaintance with the country's progress since independence.

522. The Special Committee had to reaffirm its pledge to foster the process of decolonization by peaceful means. All should adhere to that principle, both for moral reasons and because it was a prerequisite for international co-operation in accordance with the United Nations Charter. The invitation extended to the Committee was symbolic of Algeria's confidence in the United Nations, for which the Committee was grateful.

523. He expressed his delegation's deep admiration for Algeria's past and present achievements and extended his best wishes for the country's subsequent prosperity and well-being.

524. The representative of Madagascar expressed his delegation's thanks to the Algerian Government for inviting the Special Committee to hold the final part of its session in the wonderful city of Algiers.

525. The task which the Special Committee was performing on Algerian soil was, in his delegation's opinion, of special importance. History had willed that Algeria and Madagascar should have experience of the same master and the same tribulations. The colonial history of Madagascar was bound up with that of the Maghreb countries generally and particularly with that of Algeria; for instance, Mohamed V, Sultan of Morocco, had been exiled to Malagasy territory, and the Queen of Madagascar, Ranaivalona III, had ended her days in exile in Algiers.

526. Like so many other countries, Madagascar desired peace and sought co-operation at all times among the members of the international community, but its Government was convinced that concord among members of that community would be resting on a fragile and precarious foundation as long as any State cherished the ambition to exploit a foreign people, as long as any Government persisted in refusing a subject people the right to self-determination. The accession to independence of a large number of African countries and their awareness of their responsibilities to their brothers who were still oppressed should be a clear warning to those who still clung to the idea of domination and exploitation that they were trying to swim against the tide. The ideals of freedom and independence had gained such strength in Africa that those obstinate Governments would be forced to listen to the voice of reason and accept their defeat.

527. The case of the Algerian people had provided the annals of history with an illustration of the victory of those ideas over arms. An entire nation might be exterminated, but it had never been possible to stifle by force the genuine aspirations of a people, because there would always be others outside its frontiers who shared its ideals. Madagascar had recovered its sovereignty and was aware of its responsibility to peoples still subject to foreign domination. The Malagasy delegation was therefore deeply grateful to the Algerian Government for the generous hospitality it had offered to the Committee of Twenty-four, which would again enable the members of that Committee to meet men still living under the colonial yoke, to gather first-hand information on the situation in colonial territories seeking liberation, to draw practical conclusions from it and to produce better results.

528. The representative of the United States of America thanked the Government and people of Algeria for their hospitality and welcome.

529. She regretted to have to place it on record that her delegation took exception to certain remarks of the Foreign Minister of Algeria and the representative of the Soviet Union, both of whom had seen fit to interject and distort a subject which lay outside the purview of the Special Committee.

530. However, she was extremely happy to be in a country which, since the first settlements of Carthage, the sweep of Islam and the contact of Christianity, had played a prominent role in history. It was a pleasure for her to recall that Algeria and the United States had always maintained diplomatic or consular relations. Her delegation was gratified to see the emergence of a new Algeria confidently facing the future, and wished it every success in its difficult task.

531. The representative of Ethiopia joined in thanking the Government and people of Algeria for the hospitality and warm welcome extended to the Special Committee. The heroic struggle of the Algerian people against colonialism and imperialism would always remain a landmark in the annals of the Continent, and serve as an example and an inspiration to all those struggling to win freedom and independence.

532. The Special Committee's presence in the brave city of Algiers, whose very name had become synonymous with anti-colonialism, was of great significance. The question of the Territories under Portuguese domination had appropriately been reserved for discussion in that heroic place where the militant atmosphere and revolutionary enthusiasm would undoubtedly provide a suitable setting for consideration of such a burning question. The sacrifices of the people of Algeria in defence of freedom and independence would strengthen the determination of those now engaged in a life and death struggle against Portuguese oppression. They would continue the struggle to the bitter end, knowing that their efforts would be crowned with success and that their sacrifices would not be in vain. The trail of heroism and sacrifice blazed by Algeria had left its indelible mark on the struggling masses of Angola, Mozambique, Portuguese Guinea and other lands. The Committee was grateful to the Government and people of Algeria for having invited it, and for having made it possible for world attention to be focused on such a crucial issue.

533. So far as Ethiopia was concerned, the complete eradication of colonialism and imperialism from the earth was a commitment and a national objective. The fossilized attitude of Portugal in obstinately clinging to its colonies in Africa was not only an affront to world public opinion, but a shame to modern civilization. Ethiopia would not rest until that shame had been obliterated.

534. After a rule lasting for several centuries, the Portuguese colonialists had nothing to show in their favour. Forced labour, torture and oppression were the hallmarks of their civilizing mission in Africa. The inhabitants of Angola, Mozambique and Portuguese Guinea were left with no alternative but to resort to arms to regain their right to decent human existence. They had the full moral and material support of progressive humanity for their struggle, long and bitter though it might be. As the struggle intensified in the days to come, Portuguese obduracy was bound to collapse under its own weight of cruelty and oppression.

535. His delegation wished to thank the President and the Foreign Minister of Algeria very sincerely for their inspiring messages, and assured the Algerian people that in their efforts for advancing the great cause of freedom and independence they had in Ethiopia a strong and faithful ally, whose aims and objectives were identical. He also assured all the freedom fighters present that Ethiopia, together with all progressive mankind, would leave no stone unturned in seeing that the struggle for justice and democracy was finally crowned with success.

536. The representative of Chile expressed the Chilean delegation's very sincere gratitude to the Government of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria for the invitation it had extended to the Special Committee. Like the beauty of the Algerian landscape, the history of the Algerian people's bravery was a source of inspiration to all nations which loved peace and desired the victory of equality and justice throughout the world.

537. Algeria had provided the finest example of total elimination of colonialism. The whole world had followed, minute by minute, the fight waged by its people to emerge from the phase of oppression to that of free exercise of its rights. The Chilean people had always defended that cause. It had unremittingly opposed the colonial system. It had remained aware at all times of its obligations to the rest of the world. It had contributed in every way possible to the liberation of peoples and territories under colonial domination, in order to enable them to exercise as early as possible their basic right to self-determination and to decide their own future.

538. Chile had always greatly admired the Algerian nation and had always supported the liberation movement, through which, at the cost of so much suffering and bloodshed, it had achieved the independence of its territory and its people. It had felt the proclamation of Algeria's independence to be a personal triumph. Its relations with Algeria had always been close and cordial, as it had proved by concluding bilateral agreements with that country and acting in complete harmony with it in the community of nations.

539. The Chilean delegation had listened with great interest to the message from the President of the Revolutionary Council and to the excellent address that morning by the Foreign Minister of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria. It warmly congratulated both those distinguished figures on their brilliant exposition of their Government's point of view on the situation in Territories still under colonial domination.

540. Algeria, like the other States of the world community, well knew Chile's attitude to that type of domination. As a member of the Special Committee, Chile had been able to make an effective contribution to the fight being waged against colonialism in order to secure for men who were still aliens on their own territory the full exercise of their rights. If all States acted in the same way and applied the basic principles of the United Nations Charter, the problem could be solved and a long obsolete system defeated.

541. In conclusion, he reiterated his delegation's thanks to the Algerian Government and people for their cordial hospitality and the fraternal welcome they had extended to the members of the Committee of Twenty-Four.

542. The representative of Iran expressed his delegation's sincere thanks to the President of the Revolutionary Council, the Government and the people of Algeria for their kind invitation to the Special Committee to hold its concluding meetings in Algiers. Although it had come to the final stage of its journey, its task still remained to be accomplished. In the course of its meetings in Africa it had been greatly encouraged by the faith which people everywhere had placed in its work; among the heroic people of Algeria it would draw strength and reinforce its determination to liquidate imperialism.

543. It was through valour, unflagging determination and strength of character that the Algerian people had secured their great success against colonialism. Theirs had been the sweat, blood and toil, while the Special Committee's role was one of persuasion. It could, however, be safely said that in spite of the great odds the Special Committee had to face, it would succeed in the cause of freedom and independence if it always kept in mind the heroic example of Algeria. That country's championship of freedom and justice had not stopped at its own independence, but it had been a torch-bearer to all colonial peoples and had spared no effort to fight for the total liquidation of imperialism everywhere. Its independence had marked the beginning of a new era, from the first day of which its Government had embarked upon a bold policy for the betterment of the life of its people. Its efforts in the fields of education, the fight against illiteracy, industrialization and the mechanization of agriculture had been crowned with success, and would open up the possibility of a richer life for all. He paid homage to the Algerian martyrs, whose sacrifice had not been in vain. They had given their lives so that their brothers and sisters could live in freedom and justice.

544. The Special Committee would derive great benefit from the wise and inspiring words of the President of the Revolutionary Council and the Foreign Minister of Algeria. He expressed the thanks of his country, which had from time immemorial been linked to Algeria by spiritual and cultural ties, for the warm hospitality that had been extended, and its best wishes for the success and prosperity of the Algerian people.

545. The representative of Sierra Leone thanked the Foreign Minister of Algeria for his stimulating words on the Special Committee's responsibilities in regard to colonialism, and assured him that his delegation would do all in its power to contribute towards the quest for a just and speedy solution.

546. The questions of Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa and the Territories under Portuguese domination had been described as chronic cases of colonialism. The armed struggle in those Territories called to mind the struggle that had been waged by the heroic people of Algeria for so long, and he was convinced that it too would be successful. The Special Committee was fortunate to be in Algiers for its discussion on those Territories, which would bring new hope to the freedom fighters. Its deliberations and recommendations would rekindle the fire of independence that the colonial Powers had tried to smother.

547. The bondage of colonialism left behind it low economic standards which were a form of oppression that left a lasting wound. Algeria's example, however, would give strength to its kith and kin still awaiting liberation.

548. The Special Committee had received a warm welcome from the people of Algeria. He was convinced that its stay would be an enjoyable one, and that his country and Algeria would go from strength to strength in their quest for peace, justice and freedom in all parts of the world. His delegation was grateful to the President of the Revolutionary Council and the Government and people of Algeria for their gracious invitation and generous hospitality, and to the President and Foreign Minister for their thought-provoking statements. The Committee would leave no stone unturned in its task of fighting all forms of colonialism.

549. The representative of Bulgaria expressed his delegation's sincere thanks to Mr. Houari Boumedienne, President of the Revolutionary Council and Head of Government, the other members of the Government and the people of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria for the warm welcome they had extended to the Special Committee.

550. At that final stage of its discussions, the Committee was in a position to appreciate the true worth of Algeria's generous hospitality. Its work had not been fruitless and its results, good as they were, would be even better, thanks to the welcome it had received.

551. The Bulgarian delegation welcomed the presence at the meeting of the Algerian delegation. The members of the Committee, who had a special role to play in the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, would appreciate the real value of that delegation's co-operation. The active participation in the Committee's work of a country which was in the forefront of the fight against imperialism, colonialism and neo-colonialism was bound to give fresh impetus to the Committee's decolonization activities. The moving message from President Boumedienne and the excellent address by Mr. Bouteflika, Foreign Minister of Algeria, contained ideas and suggestions which would increase the effectiveness of the Committee's work and be a source of inspiration to all. The Bulgarian delegation associated itself with the Algerian Foreign Minister's moving expression of solidarity and sympathy with the people of South Viet-Nam. The Bulgarian delegation had always ardently desired to be on close terms with the revolutionary people of Algeria, which had been able to break its colonial shackles by its own efforts and had written in blood, at the cost of the lives of almost 2 million of its children, one of the most glorious pages in the history of the armed struggle against imperialism, colonialism and the oppression of man by man. He was profoundly moved at being on Algerian soil for the first time. The Committee's presence in the beautiful city of Algiers, the pearl of the Mediterranean, was deeply significant. He was sure that the Committee would be able to fulfil its task, that it would not disappoint the brave Algerian people which was so generously giving it hospitality, that it would be inspired by Algeria's victorious struggle against colonialism and would spare no effort to help, with the support of the United Nations, in the liberation of colonized peoples.

552. In pursuance of its anti-imperialist policy, characteristic of a socialist State, the People's Republic of Bulgaria unreservedly supported the fight against colonialism and national liberation movements in Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, South Africa, Mozambique, Angola, so-called Portuguese Guinea, Aden, Oman and elsewhere, in the same way as it had sided unconditionally with the Algerian people when it was carrying out its heroic fight for liberation. In that city, imbued as it was with a revolutionary and anti-colonialist spirit, the Bulgarian delegation wished to reaffirm the solidarity of the Bulgarian people with peoples still suffering under the colonial yoke. It asked the President to convey to the valiant Algerian people and to his Government the best wishes of the Bulgarian people for success in their task of building a new society founded on freedom and justice. It wished the people of Algeria, to which the Bulgarian people was linked by bonds of friendship and co-operation, further success in consolidating the power of the people and building a popular and democratic Algeria.

553. The representative of Denmark sincerely thanked the Government of the Algerian Republic for inviting the Special Committee to hold meetings in Algiers. He had been deeply impressed by the cordiality of the Algerians' welcome and by the traditional hospitality of the country and the people. It was quite natural that the Special Committee should meet in the capital of a country whose fight for independence was an example to other countries under colonial domination. The Danish delegation was convinced that the work of the Committee would be inspired by the spirit of freedom which had been the mainspring of that fight. The same spirit was evident in the message addressed by President Boumedienne to the Committee and in the statement on the colonial problem made by Mr. Abdelaziz Bouteflika, Algerian Foreign Minister. The Danish delegation had been most gratified to note the confidence which Algeria placed in the United Nations, since that Organization could and should play a very important part in the process of decolonization. It had been very happy to note Mr. Bouteflika's statement on the friendly relations which had developed since the liberation between Algeria and France and which proved that the relationship between the dominator and the dominated could be replaced by a more fruitful one based on the principles of sovereignty and equality.

554. The Danish delegation was gratified that its Government maintained excellent relations with the Government of the Algerian Republic. It wished to convey to the President of the Revolutionary Council, and to the Government and people of Algeria the best wishes of the Danish Government and people for their happiness and for progress in the course they had chosen.

555. The representative of Australia said that in coming to Algeria his delegation was very conscious of being among people who had suffered greatly, dared greatly and were achieving greatly. It was an honour to be among them, and it had been a particular pleasure to be greeted in their own country by former friends and colleagues of the Algerian Mission to the United Nations in New York. Their offices and his were adjacent, and apart from being good neighbours they had become firm friends.

556. His delegation offered its deepest respects to the President of the Revolutionary Council, and thanked him and the people of Algeria most sincerely for their hospitality. It would faithfully convey to its Government the message with which the President had honoured the Special Committee, together with that of the Foreign Minister.

557. On the last stage of its journey through Africa, the Special Committee had become more deeply conscious than ever of the importance of the people, who were the object of all its efforts. Their rights and their hopes could in the ultimate be realized and their fears overcome only by the common efforts and common understanding of humanity. For free people everywhere, the price of liberty was eternal vigilance to protect their rights and to recognize the changing and sinister forms of aggression against them, so that every man could remain or become the free man he would wish to be.

558. He expressed his delegation's warmest good wishes to the leaders and people of that free country for the future that they had bought so dearly.

559. The representative of Algeria said he knew that it was not customary for an observer to take part in the discussion but he wished to say a few words in reply to the friendly remarks made by all the delegations about his country. If, as he would have wished, the whole Algerian people had been able to hear the words of friendship, admiration, confidence and gratitude which had been addressed to his country, it would have found them to be the finest tribute paid to its courage and its heroic sacrifice, and would have discovered that all the members of the Committee were aware of the grandeur and repercussions of its struggle.

560. The statements by members of the Committee were too numerous to allow him to reply individually. The Algerian delegation would therefore thank the members of the Committee collectively, on behalf of the Revolutionary Council, the Government and the whole Algerian people, for their friendly remarks and the unanimous good wishes they had expressed.

561. At the end of a difficult struggle, Algeria was trying to rebuild all its ruins, the inevitable consequences of its desperate fight for liberty, in order to build a strong sovereign State, worthy of its thousand-year past and therefore capable of playing its full part within the community of nations. There was no incompatibility at all between that ambition and the principles by which the Committee was guided. True to the description "Algiers, sanctuary of anti-colonialism", which one of the speakers had used, Algeria was determined to oppose the after-effects of colonialism wherever they were still to be found.

562. The Algerian Government therefore had a binding duty to co-operate as effectively as possible with all forms of anti-colonial struggle, by giving direct and indirect help to liberation movements in their bitter fight. The logical consequence of that attitude was the invitation which had been extended to the Special Committee to hold part of its session in Algeria. He was very pleased that an opportunity was thus being provided to all his brothers-in-arms present in Algiers to obtain a hearing from the Committee, which would in that way be fully informed of the conditions under which they were fighting. He was also gratified to be able to welcome the members of the Committee to a country whose tradition of hospitality had so often been praised and to make available to it all the necessary working facilities and all the tourist resources of his young motherland. He again thanked the members of the Committee for the warm friendliness they had demonstrated towards Algeria.

563. The representative of Czechoslovakia said that he had enjoyed the opportunity to attend the Special Committee's session in Africa, if only as an observer. The Committee had accomplished much and had adopted a number of effective resolutions on the Territories it had considered. His Government would pay due attention to those resolutions and would support the Committee's recommendations during the deliberations at the General Assembly. It would, moreover, do its utmost for the cause of freedom and independence of colonial countries and peoples.

564. Certain delegations had expressed concern at the outset that the participation of observers in the Committee's discussions might delay its work. The majority of members would, however, agree with him that that had not proved to be the case and that any obstacles which had hampered the smooth running of the Committee's proceedings came from an entirely different source.

565. Lastly, he extended thanks to the Committee for allowing him to attend its session as an observer and to those Governments which had invited the Committee to meet in their capitals. He wished the Committee every success in its future work for the freedom and independence of colonial countries and peoples.

566. The representative of the Secretary-General expressed gratitude, on behalf of the Secretariat and in his own name, to the Algerian Government and people for their hospitality and for all the facilities they had made available and asked the Algerian delegation to convey his thanks to all concerned. The Secretary-General had also asked him to express deep appreciation to the Algerian Minister for Foreign Affairs for the kind words in his opening address to the Committee.

567. He also wished to record the gratitude of all members of the Secretariat for the many personal kindnesses extended to them by the Chairman, Vice-Chairman, Rapporteur and members of the Committee.

568. The Chairman, speaking on behalf of the Special Committee, expressed gratitude to the President and the Government of Algeria for enabling the Committee to hold its final meetings in Algiers, and to the Government and people for their warm welcome and hospitality. The facilities provided for the Committee's meetings had been particularly appreciated.

569. The Committee had been most happy to visit Algeria because of the opportunity to strengthen contacts, friendships and links with the brave Algerian people. Their struggle had indeed been a source of inspiration to the Committee and lent impetus to its work. Algeria had won a bitter, long drawn-out struggle for independence with but limited assistance from the United Nations, owing to the unfavourable balance of forces in its political organs. However, the very success of the struggle had given impetus to a process which had somewhat redressed that balance and led to the establishment of the Special Committee. The Committee had also been able to appreciate Algeria's whole-hearted dedication to the cause of the emancipation of all colonial countries and peoples, as attested by its position in the vanguard of countries extending, at great sacrifice, generous material and moral assistance to national liberation movements. It had also sensed the country's attachment to the cause of true freedom, the purging of all traces of colonialism from its system, and its progress in the consolidation of its hard-won independence.

570. The resolution on Equatorial Guinea (A/AC.109/186) adopted by the Committee in Algiers expressed gratification at the Spanish invitation, which was both a welcome indication of willingness to co-operate with the Committee and an example worthy of emulation by other colonial Powers. However, it should be stressed that those sentiments were based on the expectation that the invitation would lead to the complete and rapid implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). Only then would the Spanish gesture and the Committee's subsequent action deserve to be regarded as a constructive contribution. With regard to the resolution on Territories under Portuguese administration (A/AC.109/187), the Committee had heard several petitioners whose testimony amounted to a massive indictment of the Portuguese Government's violation of human rights. Members had been horrified and overwhelmed by the irrefutable evidence of the Portuguese atrocities committed against children and old people, in particular. However, the Committee had been heartened by news of the unrelenting struggle being waged by the nationalists in order to free themselves from the yoke of the oppressors, and had gained direct knowledge of their aspirations, needs and difficulties. On the basis of that evidence, the Committee had adopted an important and far-reaching resolution, which contained a number of new elements: concern at the further aggravation of the already critical situation by the racist minority rebellion in Southern Rhodesia; condemnation of the violation of the economic and political rights of the indigenous people by the settlement of foreign immigrants and the transfer of African labour to South Africa; condemnation of the activities of financial concerns in the Territories exploiting the human and material resources and impeding progress towards independence and freedom; an appeal to all States to prevent their nationals from co-operating with the Portuguese authorities, especially in the matter of foreign investment; and a firm recommendation to the Security Council to make the implementation of General Assembly resolution 2107 (XX) mandatory on all Member States.

571. The decision to undertake another African visit had been more than justified by the results achieved. The concern and active solidarity of the United Nations with colonial peoples generally had been further emphasized. Direct contact with peoples under colonial rule had put the Special Committee in a better position to understand and assist them in their legitimate struggle for freedom and independence. Petitioners had found it easier to appear before the Committee in order both to provide confirmation of the iniquitous nature of the colonial system, and to offer fresh ideas and suggestions—thereby adding to the capacity of the Committee to contribute to the rapid liquidation of colonialism. That was illustrated by the resolution adopted that morning concerning the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) (A/AC.109/188).

572. In that connexion, particular attention should be drawn to the recommendation to the Security Council to make the measures provided for under Chapter VII of the Charter against Portugal, South Africa and the minority régime in Southern Rhodesia, mandatory on all Member States. That was a worthy response to the request made by the General Assembly to the Committee in its resolution 2105 (XX) to make such suggestions as might assist the Council in its consideration of appropriate measures to counteract threats to international peace and security arising from developments in colonial Territories.

573. In addition to reiterating the legitimacy of the struggle of colonial peoples to exercise their right to self-determination and independence, the Committee had gone further than in previous resolutions by inviting all States to provide material and moral assistance to liberation movements in colonial Territories.

574. Another noteworthy development in the thinking of the Committee was its implied condemnation of military bases in colonial Territories and its request to colonial Powers to dismantle such bases and refrain from establishing new ones in their colonies.

575. Furthermore, the resolutions adopted by the Committee during its visit to Africa showed a renewed emphasis of the importance of economic factors in the implementation of the Declaration. Experience had shown that those factors, in the form of financial and economic interests operating in collusion with the colonial Powers, all too often obstructed progress towards the application of the Declaration.

576. The Committee's deliberations had also clearly demonstrated the need to ensure that independence was based on the freely expressed wishes of the people.

577. He expressed his deep appreciation to the Organization of African Unity and to the League of Arab States for their effective collaboration in the Committee's work and hoped that those links would be strengthened. He also extended the Committee's thanks to all host Governments for their warm welcome and kind co-operation.

578. The representative of Ethiopia said that throughout its visit to Africa the Special Committee had sensed the depth of African feeling and the desire to rid the continent of colonialism. The five capitals in which the Committee had held meetings represented a cross-section of Africa. The visit had therefore been very useful, in that it had afforded close contact and had strengthened the confidence of Africans in the Committee and in the United Nations as a whole. That had been attested by the warm and spontaneous welcome extended to the Committee.

579. The speeches delivered and resolutions adopted had given encouragement to all African freedom fighters. The Committee was of course only a moral force, and no panacea; but because of its tenacity of purpose it had gained stature in the eyes of the world.

580. The road to decolonization was long, but the right course had been engaged. Because of the noble, though necessarily modest, efforts of the Committee, colonialism was being driven to bay and would be vanquished if the pressure continued.

581. He wished to associate his delegation with the thanks expressed by the Chairman, on behalf of the Committee, to the President, Government and people of Algeria for their fraternal welcome. The great work of national reconstruction and development under way in Algeria was evidence of what a people could accomplish when master of its own destiny. He concluded by extending the best wishes of his Government for all further success on the road of progress, democracy and social justice.

Statement by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria

582. The Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria said that he was addressing the members of the Special Committee in order to tell them, on behalf of President Boumedienne, the Revolutionary Council, the National Liberation Front and the Algerian Government, how much they had all appreciated the goodwill that the members of the Committee had, with one accord, expressed towards Algeria, which had suffered so much during its long and murderous war of liberation. It was particularly encouraging to see that the enormous sacrifices made by the Algerian people on the altar of liberty not only had enabled Algeria to achieve independence but could also be a source of encouragement to the enslaved peoples who were still struggling against colonial domination. He offered his heartiest congratulations to the Committee, which had been unsparing in its efforts to accomplish the lofty mission entrusted to it and which, after fruitful discussion, had achieved such encouraging and positive results.

583. As the Chairman had pointed out, the presence in Africa of the Special Committee, dedicated as it was to the cause of decolonization, revealed the change of heart that had taken place at the United Nations. Indeed, the adoption of the historic Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples marked a decisive stage in the evolution of the United Nations. It was possible to assess the progress achieved and the distance travelled by recalling that not until 1961 had the Special Committee replaced the defunct and ridiculous Committee on Information, whose terms of reference had covered all the problems of the Non-Self-Governing Territories with the exception of the immediate, basic and essential problem of their political situation and their achievement of independence. It was therefore a source of great satisfaction to Algeria, which had struggled for so many years before it had been able to make the long-stifled voice of its revolution heard in various international bodies, that the Special Committee had been able to visit Africa in order to hear representatives of the liberation movements, to obtain first-hand information about the situation in the dependent territories and to establish closer contact with the realities of colonialism.

584. While, however, it thus gave credit to the United Nations for the great progress it had brought about in international opinion in the quest for a solution to the degrading problem of colonialism, Algeria could not fail to note with indignation and deep concern that resolution 1514 (XV) on the granting of independence had remained a dead letter, like so many other resolutions, as was clear from all the petitions which the Committee had heard. The colonial Powers, which were responsible for the future of the peoples placed under their administration, were refusing to co-operate with the Special Committee, defying the United Nations with impunity and displaying utter contempt for international opinion. He could not but deplore once again the negative attitude of the United Kingdom, which had absented itself from the meetings of the Committee but was present at Salisbury, where it was compromising itself with Ian Smith instead of responding to the appeal of the United Nations and committing itself honestly to a policy of decolonization.

585. That was why Algeria felt that the time for resolutions of which nothing ever came had passed and that immediate and effective measures should be put into effect to abolish colonialism and the exploitation of man by man. The time had come to transfer full powers to the dependent peoples in order to enable them to choose their political status freely, to organize the development of their countries and to pursue their progress in every field, in conformity with the United Nations Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Meanwhile Algeria, faithful to its revolution and to its martyrs who had fallen on the battlefield of freedom, would continue to furnish unstinted material and moral support to all liberation movements in the just and legitimate struggle which colonialism was forcing them to wage for the recovery of their dignity and of their inalienable right to self-determination. Algeria knew by experience that it was idle to hope that Lisbon, Pretoria or Salisbury would allow independence to be achieved by peaceful means.

586. Turning more specifically to the question of the Territories under Portuguese domination, which the Committee had just been studying at Algiers, he would like to compliment the Committee on the calm and serious atmosphere that had prevailed at its meetings and on the unflagging attention which it had given to the petitioners. The resolutions that the Committee had adopted in the light of the information which it had patiently amassed meant that there were still grounds for hoping that the United Nations, thus brought face to face with its responsibilities, would do its duty. By taking the important step of recommending to the Security Council that it should be made obligatory for all States to implement the measures provided for in General Assembly resolution 2107 (XX), the Committee had put its finger upon one of the provisions that was most likely to bring Portugal to its senses if that provision was adopted and consistently followed. Those results responded to the hopes which the liberation movements and the African peoples had reposed in the Committee. They did honour to the United Nations and added lustre to its reputation. The work of the Committee, after its African tour, was really only just beginning. It must be carried on tirelessly within the United Nations, in order to bring all States to a healthier appreciation of the realities of colonialism. Algeria's devotion to the universal principles of the United Nations, the enthusiasm with which it would support any measures calculated to strengthen the Organization, the faith and optimism which it felt with regard to the future of mankind, and, lastly, its passionate thirst for justice and freedom—all those factors showed how closely the aims of the Committee coincided with those of the country which had the honour to be its host.

587. On behalf of the Revolutionary Council and the Algerian Government, he congratulated the Committee most warmly on the hard work it had done both at Algiers and elsewhere, in other capitals of the African continent. That work had brought the Committee's arduous but inspiring task considerably nearer to fulfilment. That the result of the Committee's efforts was encouraging, to say the least, was undoubtedly due to a spirit of healthy rivalry, to the existence of such a widespread and concerted will to hasten the process of decolonization, and to the invaluable, indeed indispensable, assistance of valiant freedom fighters, full of forceful ideas, imbued with hope and faith, and determined to conquer and radically to transform the future of their peoples, whose subjugation ran counter to the spirit of the age. The Committee had proved, if proof were needed, that the vast majority of its States members, and particularly, in spite of their inevitable growing pains, those that had emerged in recent years, respected the struggle of the peoples who were still oppressed and encouraged their actions, thus putting into practice in the best possible way the principles which most clearly embodied the spirit of the United Nations. The Committee's reaffirmation and renewed demonstration of active solidarity undoubtedly marked a decisive step on the path towards decolonization and the consolidation of the independence of the young States. Algeria, which owed the progress and ultimate victory of its cause to the support it had received from so many quarters during its war of liberation, was today able to appreciate the true value of the Committee's work. Support for liberation movements all over the world was a sacred ethical principle by which the Algerian people and its Government were constantly guided. Algeria gave unconditional support to the peoples of Angola, Mozambique, Guinea (Bissau), Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, South Africa, Palestine, Oman, Aden and all Territories still under colonial rule in their heroic struggle to shake off the colonial yoke and to regain freedom. Algeria would continue its unstinted support until the day when those peoples were able to resume their rightful place among the family of independent States of the Third World and in the community of nations.

588. Apart from the action undertaken for the assistance of the countries under colonial domination, the Committee's solidarity reflected the efforts made by the recently constituted States to establish their independence on increasingly healthy foundations. Indeed, national independence only became genuine and acquired true meaning as a country gradually shaped and built up its own economic and social framework. Because of circumstances as complex as they were outdated—an inevitable consequence of struggles for influence between exclusively foreign interests—attempts were often made to oppose that type of consolidation.

589. The adoption of the resolution on the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, a resolution which recognized the legitimacy of the struggle—in all its forms, particularly the most effective ones—of the peoples under colonial rule and which invited all States to provide material and moral assistance to the national liberation movements in colonial Territories, constituted a welcome change in the methods of the United Nations. It had been inevitable, in view of the blind obstinacy of certain colonial Powers. The recognition of the legitimacy of the struggle of the peoples under colonial rule put an end to the age in which the efforts of those peoples—oppressed, humiliated and deprived of all their rights, even that of living in freedom—to regain their independence were regarded by colonialists and their natural allies as a violation of established laws. That the dignity of the struggle had today been stressed by one of the principal organs of the General Assembly was a source of considerable encouragement to all national liberation movements. Moreover, the Special Committee's appeal to all States to provide moral and material assistance to the oppressed peoples reduced the scope of all the tendentious and improper interpretations which the colonial Powers applied to the principle of non-interference in the domestic affairs of a State. By providing the sorely needed assistance for which they had been asked, countries that cared for justice, freedom and the preservation of world peace would be able to give effective support to the oppressed peoples in what had now become a world-wide struggle for the abolition of colonialism, which constituted an ever increasing threat to international security. Such a course would also preclude attempts at the use of force by certain States that dreamed of keeping their colonies for ever and by others that longed to recover their lost empires.

590. On behalf of his Government, he congratulated the Committee on having requested the specialized agencies of the United Nations and other relief organizations to increase, in co-operation with the liberation movements of all the Territories under colonial domination, their assistance to the refugees of those Territories. The petitioners who had appeared before the Committee had pointed out the social aspect of the sacred struggle they were waging against foreign occupation, a struggle of the first importance for all leaders of liberation movements throughout the world. The petitioners were aware that the future of their country after independence would depend essentially on the strength of its people and on the fresh sources of energy that would be released. By requesting the specialized agencies to increase their assistance to oppressed peoples and to do so in co-operation with the representatives of those peoples, the Committee was giving due recognition to the men who today were shaping the destiny of their country. The Algerian Government fully supported that decision.

591. Other decisions of equal importance had been taken by the Committee while it had been at Algiers. They marked the firm resolve of the member States to achieve rapid decolonization of the occupied territories. That laudable intention would achieve results equal to the hopes it inspired if it was backed up by the sincere co-operation of the Powers still administering the Territories. By inviting a delegation of the Special Committee to visit Equatorial Guinea, the Spanish Government had adopted a helpful initial attitude. That attitude would not really bear fruit until Equatorial Guinea became a free, independent and sovereign State, as was bound to happen.

592. The positions of other colonial Powers, however, had undergone no change. Portugal, among others, was persisting in its refusal to co-operate with the United Nations. That intransigence was due far more to the assistance given to Portugal by certain Western Powers than to the resources of its own which the Lisbon Government thought it possessed. It was clear that in helping the Portuguese armed forces to resist the legitimate claims of the oppressed peoples those Western States were seeking to safeguard economic and strategic interests of the first importance. And when the last bastions of colonialism had been conquered, those same Powers would want to replace that collusion by indirect action designed to prolong indefinitely the exploitation of the peoples of those Territories by hindering the consolidation of their newly won independence. That new form of colonialism was a potential source of real dangers, the existence of which it would be idle to deny; hence the work of decolonization, if it was not to remain incomplete, would have to be extended to neo-colonial situations. It was the direct responsibility of the Committee to carry out in full the task which had been entrusted to it. If complete and total independence was to be achieved, that aspect of the problem should not go unanalysed. If it did, decolonization would lose much of its meaning in the eyes of the peoples.

593. That danger loomed even larger when, as in the case of certain colonial Territories already on the road to independence, the administering Power was seen to be installing indigenous elements who represented the economic, and often also the political, interests of the colonialists themselves. That could only result in further exploitation of the peoples of those territories within the framework of the granting of independence. The Special Committee should not think that, once independence had thus been granted, its work was over. It would be useful if commissions representing the United Nations could visit territories about to become independent in order that their peoples might be free to choose genuine leaders under United Nations supervision. The idea of granting independence must be conceived in flexible terms allowing full play to the legitimate aspirations of the peoples concerned. Any restriction would limit the extent of that natural right and run counter to the aims both of the peoples themselves and of the United Nations.

594. In conclusion, he once again conveyed to the Committee the congratulations of the Algerian Government and people on the conclusive results which the Committee had achieved in Africa and wished it every success in the fulfilment of its task. He also thanked all the representatives who had spoken so warmly and kindly about Algeria and the Algerian people and assured them of the deep and sincere feelings of friendship and esteem which Algeria entertained towards all the peoples whom they represented. He asked the indulgence of members of the Committee for the inevitable defects in the organization of the Conference. Whatever efforts were made, they would never fully succeed in expressing the welcome of the Algerian people, who strove to be among the worthiest heirs to the splendid traditions of Arab-African hospitality. What really mattered was that each member of the Committee should have felt himself thoroughly at home during his brief stay and should now enjoy the pleasures of a well-earned rest.

F. ACTION ARISING FROM THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE'S VISIT TO AFRICA

Adoption of resolution concerning the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) with regard to colonial Territories considered by the Special Committee during its meetings in Africa (1966)

595. At the 454th meeting of the Special Committee on 21 June 1966, the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania introduced a draft resolution co-sponsored by Afghanistan, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, the United Republic of Tanzania and Yugoslavia (A/AC.109/L.315). In view of the interrelation of the colonial problems with which the Committee had dealt, the co-sponsors thought it advisable to supplement and summarize the various relevant resolutions in a general resolution.

596. The Chairman noted the following important aspects of the draft resolution: in the fifth preambular paragraph, the expression of the Special Committee's regret had been prompted by its awareness of the United Kingdom's obligation to attend the meetings in Africa, not only as a member of the Special Committee but also as an administering Power. In the sixth preambular paragraph it had been necessary to point out the negative attitude of certain colonial Powers, to which one petitioner after another had testified. Operative paragraph 3 had been a response to Portugal's and South Africa's and Southern Rhodesia's defiance of world opinion and of the international Organization's recommendations. It was based upon the position that had always been taken by the Special Committee and by the African group in the Security Council. Operative paragraph 4 reflected the Committee's concern about the foreign financial interests that not only collaborated with the administering Powers but also provided funds enabling them to continue their wars of oppression. Operative paragraph 5 reflected past statements, but also contained a slight departure from previous resolutions, in its request for material assistance for the national liberation movements. After seeing a documentary film on Portuguese Territories, the Committee had felt all the more strongly the urgent need for aid to be granted not only by the Special Committee but also by organizations the world over. Operative paragraph 7 was of vital importance, in view of the administering Powers' need of military installations in order to continue their oppressive measures. The existence of such bases constituted not only a menace to the population in the Territories but also a threat to neighbouring countries. The recommendation in operative paragraph 8 that assistance should be withheld from the Governments of Portugal and South Africa had been intended to cover only the duration of their colonial rule over the Territories in question. He asked for the entire Committee's support of that paragraph.

597. The representative of Ethiopia supported the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.315) on behalf of the Afro-Asian group and Yugoslavia, and commended the Chairman for his excellent introductory remarks. It could be seen that the document provided a summary of all that the Committee had done in Africa, giving a bird's-eye view of the salient points contained in its debates and resolutions.

598. The last preambular paragraph on colonialism's threat to international peace and security was vitally important but needed no explanation, as the facts were self-evident. In view of the many years that had passed since the adoption of resolution 1514 (XV) it was not out of place to reaffirm in operative paragraph 1 the inalienable rights of the peoples in colonial Territories to freedom and independence.

599. He associated himself with the Tanzanian representative in noting the importance of operative paragraph 5, which laid down a juridical basis for the support of national liberation movements in colonial Territories. Operative paragraph 8 would be instrumental in focusing the world's attention upon the grave threat to peace inherent in the continuation of colonialism. Peoples everywhere must be convinced of the evils rampant in colonial domination and of the urgent necessity to eradicate it. He announced his support of the draft resolution and strongly recommended it to the Committee.

600. At the 455th meeting, on 22 June, the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that two changes had been made as a result of consultations held by the sponsors of the draft resolution the previous evening. The first concerned operative paragraph 7, which had been amended to read:

"Requests the colonial Powers to dismantle the military bases installed in colonial Territories and to refrain from establishing new ones."

The second change related to the co-sponsors of the draft resolution: Iran, the Ivory Coast and Madagascar had indicated their wish to withdraw their names.

601. The representative of Poland said that the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (IBRD) and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) were the two agencies which provided most assistance to the colonial Powers. Only the previous day, the Special Committee had been informed that IBRD was to grant further assistance to Portugal. He therefore proposed that operative paragraph 8 should be amended to read:

"Requests all States and international institutions, including the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the International Monetary Fund and other specialized agencies of the United Nations, to withhold assistance of any kind to the Governments of Portugal and South Africa until they renounce their policy of colonial domination and racial discrimination;"

602. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that the Polish amendment was acceptable to the sponsors of the draft resolution and would be included in the revised text (A/AC.109/L.315/Rev.1).

603. The representative of Venezuela said that he would have preferred the draft resolution, as it appeared in document A/AC.109/L.315/Rev.1, not to have been submitted at that time. He thought that it would have been better to wait until the Special Committee returned to New York. The draft resolution embodied a number of ideas, principles and statements in regard to which his delegation had several times stated its position in detail, and that position had not changed. In order to vote on the draft resolution, his delegation was obliged to seek precise instructions from its Government. Since that could not be done from Algiers, the Venezuelan delegation was reluctantly compelled to take no part in the vote.

604. The representative of Australia, expressing agreement with the opening remarks of the representative of Venezuela, said that his delegation was opposed to resolutions of the kind before the Special Committee since they lacked precision on important points of principle. In the first place, the last preambular paragraph of the draft resolution was couched in language which was unacceptable to his delegation. He further wished to restate his opposition to the wording used in operative paragraph 3, in which connexion he had already voiced his delegation's views regarding the use of force in Southern Rhodesia. He wished to point out, however, that his Government had been among the first to refuse recognition of the illegal régime in Salisbury, recalling its representative and initiating far-reaching trade and financial measures to support those proposed by the United Kingdom Government and the Security Council. For those reasons his delegation would oppose the draft resolution before the Committee.

605. The representative of Chile repeated that a draft resolution of such importance could not be voted on hastily. He agreed with most of the ideas in the draft resolution, his reservations being all on points of drafting and terminology. Since, however, the draft resolution summarized the Committee's activities during its tour and defined future policy, it would not be possible for his delegation to take part in the vote without being able to receive instructions from its Government.

606. The representative of Italy stated that his delegation had been unable to obtain instructions from its Government and would not, therefore, take part in the vote.

607. The representative of the United States of America said that he shared the reservations expressed by previous speakers regarding the introduction at the last minute of a draft resolution which contained new and substantive provisions. His delegation supported many of the basic objectives set forth in the draft resolution but was of the opinion that the interests of the peoples of the Territories concerned, as well as of the administering Powers, would best be served by peaceful co-operation. Since, however, other paragraphs in the draft resolution obscured those objectives, his delegation would vote against it.

609. The representative of Madagascar said that his delegation would vote in favour of the draft resolution, which included a number of ideas and principles which it had always supported in the Committee. Nevertheless, he had serious reservations about operative paragraph 7. In his view the question of the military bases was not within the competence of the Special Committee. The Committee's task was to understand the aspirations of the inhabitants of the Territories under Portuguese domination, but it would be for the inhabitants themselves to decide the question of the bases once they were independent.

610. The representative of Denmark said that his delegation did not support operative paragraph 3 of the draft resolution. It could not agree to a recommendation to the Security Council couched in such general terms and based on principles the consequences of which were so hard to foresee. Nor did Denmark support the fifth and eighth preambular paragraphs or operative paragraphs 4, 7 and 8. In the absence of instructions from his Government he would go no further into the question of the draft resolution. The progressive position of Denmark on colonial problems was well known. For the reasons he had just stated, he would be obliged to abstain in the vote on the draft resolution as a whole and would vote against operative paragraphs 3 and 7 if they were put to the vote separately.

611. The representative of Iran, referring to operative paragraph 7 of the draft resolution, said that his Government was opposed to the establishment of any foreign military bases on its territory and had made its views in that connexion abundantly clear in many official statements. It was, by the same token, opposed to the establishment of foreign military bases in principle. However, since the Special Committee was concerned with decolonization, his delegation was of the opinion that the question of such bases could only be considered in the light of their effect upon the local population's aspirations for independence. Otherwise, the matter would not fall within the Committee's purview. For that reason, his delegation had not been able to accept the wording of operative paragraph 7 and had had to withdraw its name from the list of sponsors.

612. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania, replying to points raised on behalf of the sponsors of the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.315/Rev.1), said that certain delegations had expressed the opinion that the draft resolution had been introduced at short notice. It had, however, in fact been submitted to the Special Committee on the previous day and delegations had therefore had plenty of time in which to make suggestions if they so wished. In any event, the draft resolution contained only one new element, namely, a reference to the United Kingdom's failure to participate in the Committee's work—which had been commented upon by most members when the Committee had opened its session in Africa.

613. With regard to the view held by certain delegations that operative paragraph 7 of the draft resolution did not fall within the Committee's purview, he pointed out that its terms were very similar to those of operative paragraph 12 of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX), which had been supported by the majority of Afro-Asian members and which, moreover, provided the Committee with a further mandate to continue its work. Although no general reference to the question of military bases had been made in the draft resolution, the sponsors of course agreed that they should only be established with the consent of the people. But, as far as the colonial Territories were concerned, the presence of military bases after independence would, in effect, mean the continuation of colonialism.

614. As for operative paragraph 3, the views expressed in it had always been held by the African members of the United Nations.

615. The representative of the Ivory Coast, speaking in exercise of his right of reply, recalled that the General Assembly had indeed adopted a paragraph identical with paragraph 7 of the draft resolution, but it alone was entitled to do so. Moreover, that paragraph had aroused lively controversy even in the General Assembly, as was clear from the fact that it had been adopted by only 49 votes to 37, with 18 abstentions.

616. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated that his delegation would vote in favour of the draft resolution since it accorded with the position which the USSR had always maintained. It also corresponded to the interests of the African peoples.

617. With regard to foreign military bases in colonial Territories, it had always been the opinion of the Soviet Union delegation that they constituted a direct threat to the independence of the indigenous population and the sovereignty of States, as events in Aden, Guam and Ascension Island proved. The same was true of Libya. The Italian and Australian statements were unacceptable. The motives behind the statements of certain Powers were well known. If Italy allowed United States military bases to be established in its territory, that was its own affair. The colonial Territories, however, had never been consulted and foreign military bases were imposed upon them to prevent them from gaining independence.

618. The revised draft resolution was adopted by a roll-call vote of 16 to 2, with 1 abstention, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Republic of Tanzania, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, United States of America.

Abstaining: Denmark.

619. The text of the resolution (A/AC.109/188) adopted by the Special Committee at its 455th meeting on 22 June 1966 reads as follows:

"The Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

"Having held meetings from 23 May 1966 to 22 June 1966 successively at Dar es Salaam, United Republic of Tanzania, at Mogadiscio, Somalia, at Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, at Cairo, United Arab Republic, and at Algiers, Algeria, and having heard the spokesmen of the Governments of those countries,

"Regretting the failure of the United Kingdom Government to participate in the Special Committee's meetings in Africa,

"Deploring the negative attitude of certain colonial Powers, in particular the refusal of the Governments of Portugal and South Africa to recognize the right of colonial peoples to freedom and independence in accordance with resolution 1514 (XV),

"Deploring further the attitude of certain States which continue to co-operate with the Governments of Portugal and South Africa in the repression and exploitation of the indigenous people,

"Recognizing that the continuation of colonialism constitutes a threat to international peace and security and a crime against humanity,

"1. Reaffirms the inalienable rights of the peoples of colonial Territories to freedom and independence in accordance with resolution 1514 (XV);

"2. Deplores the refusal of certain colonial Powers to co-operate with the Special Committee and their continued disregard of the United Nations resolutions;

"3. Recommends to the Security Council to make obligatory the measures provided for under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter against Portugal, South Africa and the racist minority régime in Southern Rhodesia;

"4. Condemns the activities of the financial interests operating in these Territories which exploit the human and material resources and impede the progress of the people of the Territories towards freedom and independence;

"6. Requests the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the specialized agencies concerned and other international relief organizations to increase, in co-operation with the liberation movement of all the Territories under colonial domination, their assistance to the refugees of these Territories;

"7. Requests the colonial Powers to dismantle the military bases installed in colonial Territories and to refrain from establishing new ones;

"8. Requests all States and international institutions, including the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the International Monetary Fund and other specialized agencies of the United Nations, to withhold assistance of any kind to the Governments of Portugal and South Africa until they renounce their policy of colonial domination and racial discrimination;

"9. Requests the Secretary-General to take all measures necessary to publicize the work of the Special Committee as widely as possible, so that world opinion may be sufficiently informed concerning the grave threat to peace constituted by colonialism."

620. The text of the resolution was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 1 July 1966.⁵

Adoption of resolution expressing appreciation to host Governments

621. At the 455th meeting, the representative of Iran said that he was privileged to introduce, on behalf of twenty members of the Special Committee, a draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.316) expressing appreciation to the Governments which had invited the Committee to meet in their countries.

622. The Committee could be proud of its accomplishments in Africa; it had taken important decisions for the full implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and had done much to strengthen the confidence placed in the United Nations by those still under colonial domination. The Committee, which had everywhere received an enthusiastic welcome, was particularly indebted to the host countries which, by their invitation, had helped to accelerate independence for all countries. They had also made it possible for the United Nations to establish direct contact with the peoples concerned. In conclusion, he proposed that the draft resolution should be adopted by acclamation.

623. The representative of Mali said that after the admirable statement by his Iranian colleague he had little to add regarding the draft resolution which had just been submitted to the Committee. On behalf of all the sponsors he wished to tender sincere thanks to their brother States of Africa who had invited the Special Committee to hold part of its session in their wonderful countries, thus enabling the members to form an idea of how the struggle against colonialism in Africa was developing. They had found during their stay that, in cases where colonialism still clung to the countries under its domination, the economic factors to which all the petitioners and personalities who had appeared before the Committee, as also the majority of the members of the Committee, had drawn attention were of particular importance.

624. While the Committee was at Addis Ababa, Mr. Diallo Telli, Administrative Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity, had shed light on that aspect of the question when he had stated:

"The salient feature of the current situation in Africa is the aggravation of the threat to international peace and security constituted not only by the survival of colonialism but by the strengthening, during the past year, of the alliance formed between Portugal, South Africa and the Rhodesian settlers in order to consolidate their hold over the entire southern part of the African continent and to ensure the perpetuation of colonial and racist domination there. It is a known fact that that ungodly alliance of the most backward régimes of oppression—all three of which have been unanimously condemned, on several occasions, by the United Nations—nevertheless has its accomplices among the powerful. Those accomplices are the many forces—individuals, companies or States—which have made investments in the south of the continent, which live and prosper from the exploitation of African wealth in that region and which thus bear a large share of responsibility for the deterioration of the situation and for the bloody tragedy besetting the African peoples of South Africa, Southern Rhodesia and the Territories under Portuguese domination. As these accomplices are in large measure responsible for the paralysis which affects all peaceful attempts at decolonization, they are naturally the major obstacles in the way of the Committee's efforts. It is therefore important that you should find an adequate solution to a serious and specific situation, failing which your Committee and all those working for peaceful decolonization cannot hope to achieve any positive result. This is a most important point, for what is needed now in the matter of decolonization is not resolutions but solutions. The obstacles to the solutions are, firstly, the alliance between the régimes of Pretoria, Salisbury and Lisbon; and, secondly, the support which this alliance is receiving from its accomplices in Europe and the United States, especially by way of bilateral assistance or the aid provided by organizations such as NATO. That is the source of the great difficulties which are hampering the efforts to achieve decolonization in Africa. It is to this that the principal efforts of the Committee should be directed."

625. After hearing the petitioners and seeing the film which some of them had made, members of the ⁵ Official Records of the Security Council, Twenty-first Year, Supplement for July, August and September 1966, document S/7395.

Committee were surely more convinced than ever that colonialism was a disgrace to mankind and to the conscience of man, a view which had been eloquently expressed by the representative of Denmark. In conclusion, he thanked all the host Governments for welcoming the Committee and for the facilities with which they had provided it for the achievement of its task: they had all proved, if proof were needed, their sincere desire to co-operate with the United Nations. He therefore proposed that the Committee should adopt the twenty-Power draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.316) by acclamation.

626. At the same meeting the Special Committee adopted the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.316) by acclamation. The text of the resolution (A/AC.109/L.316) reads as follows:

"The Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

"Having held meetings from 23 May to 22 June 1966 successively at Dar es Salaam, United Republic of Tanzania, at Mogadiscio, Somalia, at Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, at Cairo, United Arab Republic, and at Algiers, Algeria, and having heard the spokesmen of the Governments of those countries,

"Expresses its profound gratitude to the Governments and people of the United Republic of Tanzania, Somalia, Ethiopia, the United Arab Republic and Algeria for inviting the Special Committee to hold meetings in their respective capitals, for providing the Committee with the necessary facilities for its meetings, and for their generous and kind hospitality."

ANNEX I

Communiqué issued on 14 May 1966 by the Chairman on behalf of the Special Committee

In response to invitations extended to it by the Governments of Algeria, Ethiopia, Somalia, the United Arab Republic and the United Republic of Tanzania, the Special Committee of Twenty-Four has decided to hold a series of meetings this year in Algiers, Addis Ababa, Mogadiscio, Cairo and Dar es Salaam.

This decision was taken in the context of operative paragraph 6 of General Assembly resolution 1654 (XVI) of 27 November 1961 which, in establishing the Special Committee, authorized it "to meet elsewhere than at United Nations Headquarters, whenever and wherever such meetings may be required for the effective discharge of its functions". The Special Committee was also aware that the General Assembly, by operative paragraph 7 of its resolution 2105 (XX) of 20 December 1965, had approved "the programme of work envisaged by the Special Committee during 1966, including the possibility of holding a series of meetings in Africa" and had authorized the necessary financial provision in the budget for 1966.

In deciding to hold another series of meetings in Africa this year, the Special Committee was particularly conscious of the positive results achieved by its visit to Africa last year. While the Special Committee was unable, owing to the non-co-operation of the administering Powers concerned, to visit the colonial Territories it considered in Africa last year, it was enabled, by reason of its proximity to these Territories, to establish closer contact with the realities of their situation and to obtain more direct knowledge than hitherto regarding the aspirations of their peoples. The experience of the Special Committee in Africa last year thus made possible the adoption of several important resolutions concerning these Territories, which formed the basis of the relevant decisions taken by the General Assembly at its twentieth session.

The work of the Special Committee in Africa last year also benefited from the co-operation it was able to establish with the Organization of African Unity through the participation of the Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa as well as of the Administrative Secretary-General of that organization.

The Special Committee notes with grave concern that the renewed hopes of freedom and independence without delay which were inspired in colonial peoples by the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples on its adoption over five years ago have, with but a few exceptions, not been realized. Indeed, owing to the negative attitude or non-co-operation of the administering Powers concerned, very little progress has been made in the implementation of the Declaration in most of the Territories, including the larger Territories in Africa, which engaged the attention of the Special Committee in previous years.

The Special Committee is convinced that its forthcoming visit to Africa will not merely demonstrate the increasing concern of the United Nations for the position of colonial peoples but strengthen its own capacity to assist these peoples in their struggle for independence. This consideration is of special significance in view of the General Assembly's request, contained in its resolution 2105 (XX) that the Special Committee in continuing to seek the best means for the immediate and full application of the Declaration, should, whenever it considers necessary, recommend a deadline for the accession to independence of each colonial Territory. Further, the Special Committee's visit to Africa will facilitate the appearance before it of representatives of nationalist movements wishing to express their views regarding the future of their countries, who would otherwise find it impossible to travel to New York.

The programme of the Committee's meetings in Africa is as follows:

Dar es Salaam, United Republic of Tanzania: between 22 and 30 May 1966;

Mogadiscio, Somalia: between 31 May and 3 June 1966;

Addis Ababa, Ethiopia: between 4 and 9 June 1966;

Cairo, United Arab Republic: between 9 and 16 June 1966;

Algiers, Algeria: between 16 and 22 June 1966.

The items on the agenda of the Special Committee for these meetings will include all the colonial Territories in Africa, Aden, Oman, Mauritius and Seychelles.

CHAPTER III

SOUTHERN RHODESIA

PART I*

A. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE, THE SECURITY COUNCIL AND THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY DURING 1965

1. On 22 April 1965, the Special Committee adopted a resolution (A/6000/Rev.1,¹ chap. III, para. 292) in which, in addition to addressing various recommendations to the administering Power, it drew the immediate attention of the Security Council to the grave situation in Southern Rhodesia.

2. At its 1194th, 1195th, 1197th, 1199th, 1201st and 1202nd meetings, between 30 April and 6 May 1965, the Security Council considered a letter dated 21 April 1965² from the representatives of thirty-five African States requesting the Council to examine the very serious situation existing in Southern Rhodesia.

3. At its 1202nd meeting, on 6 May 1965 the Security Council adopted resolution 202 (1965) by 7 votes to none, with 4 abstentions (France, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and United States of America). The operative part of the resolution reads as follows:

“[The Security Council]

“1. Notes the United Kingdom Government's statement of 27 October 1964 specifying the conditions under which Southern Rhodesia might attain independence;

“2. Notes further and approves the opinion of the majority of the population of Southern Rhodesia that the United Kingdom should convene a constitutional conference;

“3. Requests the United Kingdom Government and all States Members of the United Nations not to accept a unilateral declaration of independence for Southern Rhodesia by the minority Government;

“4. Requests the United Kingdom to take all necessary action to prevent a unilateral declaration of independence;

“5. Requests the United Kingdom Government not to transfer under any circumstances to its colony of Southern Rhodesia, as at present governed, any of the powers or attributes of sovereignty, but to promote the country's attainment of independence by a democratic system of government in accordance with the aspirations of the majority of the population;

“6. Further requests the United Kingdom Government to enter into consultations with all concerned with a view to convening a conference of all political parties in order to adopt new constitutional provisions acceptable to the majority of the people of Southern Rhodesia, so that the earliest possible date may be set for independence;

"7. Decides to keep the question of Southern Rhodesia on its agenda."

4. During its meetings in Africa the Special Committee adopted two further resolutions relating to Southern Rhodesia (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. III, paras. 471 and 513), as well as a general resolution on the question of the attainment of the objectives of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) in the Territories of southern Africa (ibid., chap. II, para. 463).

5. At its twentieth session, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fourth Committee, adopted three resolutions on the question of Southern Rhodesia.

6. On 12 October 1965, the General Assembly adopted resolution 2012 (XX), the operative paragraphs of which read as follows:

"[The General Assembly]

"1. Condemns any attempt on the part of the Rhodesian authorities to seize independence by illegal means in order to perpetuate minority rule in Southern Rhodesia;

"2. Declares that the perpetuation of such minority rule would be incompatible with the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples proclaimed in the Charter of the United Nations and in the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960;

"3. Requests the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and all Member States not to accept a declaration of independence for Southern Rhodesia by the present authorities, which would be in the sole interest of the minority, and not to recognize any authorities purporting to emerge therefrom;

"4. Calls upon the United Kingdom to take all possible measures to prevent a unilateral declaration of independence and, in the event of such a declaration, to take all steps necessary to put an immediate end to the rebellion, with a view to transferring power to a representative government in keeping with the aspirations of the majority of the people;

"5. Decides to keep the question of Southern Rhodesia under urgent and continuing review during the twentieth session and to consider what further steps may be necessary."

7. On 5 November 1965, the General Assembly adopted resolution 2022 (XX), the operative paragraphs of which read as follows:

"[The General Assembly]

"1. Approves the chapters of the reports of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples relating to Southern Rhodesia and endorses the conclusions and recommendations contained therein;

"2. Reaffirms the right of the people of Southern Rhodesia to freedom and independence and recognizes the legitimacy of their struggle for the enjoyment of their rights as set forth in the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV);

"3. Solemnly warns the present authorities in Southern Rhodesia and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, in its capacity as administering Power, that the United Nations will oppose any declaration of independence which is not based on universal adult suffrage;

"4. Condemns the policies of racial discrimination and segregation practised in Southern Rhodesia, which constitute a crime against humanity;

"5. Condemns any support or assistance rendered by any State to the minority régime in Southern Rhodesia;

"6. Calls upon all States to refrain from rendering any assistance whatsoever to the minority régime in Southern Rhodesia;

"7. Requests that the administering Power effect immediately:

"(a) The release of all political prisoners, political detainees and restrictees;

"(b) The repeal of all repressive and discriminatory legislation and, in particular, the Law and Order (Maintenance) Act and the Land Apportionment Act;

"(c) The removal of all restrictions on African political activity and the establishment of full democratic freedom and equality of political rights;

(XX) to States and drew their attention, in particular, to operative paragraphs 6, 9 and 10 of the resolution.

9. On 11 November 1965, immediately after the illegal declaration of independence, the General Assembly adopted resolution 2024 (XX), the operative paragraphs of which read as follows:

12. At its 1265th meeting on 20 November 1965, the Security Council adopted a further resolution, 217 (1965), by 10 votes to none, with 1 abstention (France). The operative part reads as follows:

"[The Security Council]

"8. Calls upon all States to refrain from any action which would assist and encourage the illegal régime and, in particular, to desist from providing it with arms, equipment and military material, and to do their utmost in order to break all economic relations with Southern Rhodesia, including an embargo on oil and petroleum products;

"9. Calls upon the Government of the United Kingdom to enforce urgently and with vigour all the measures it has announced, as well as those mentioned in paragraph 8 above;

"11. Decides to keep the question under review in order to examine what other measures it may deem it necessary to take."

13. In a note dated 29 November 1965, the Secretary-General transmitted the text of resolution 217 (1965) to States, drawing their attention, in particular, to operative paragraphs 6 and 8.

15. The replies received show a considerable degree of compliance with the resolutions on the question of Southern Rhodesia. All replies specifically stated that the States concerned did not recognize the illegal régime and would have no dealings with it. The replies also show that those States have explicitly or implicitly barred the export of arms, equipment and military material to Southern Rhodesia. The embargo on oil and petroleum products has also been specifically endorsed in replies from producing and exporting countries and has, directly or indirectly, been given general support in the replies from other States.

16. While a substantial number of the replies showed a complete break in all economic relations with Southern Rhodesia, a number of replies have shown a gradual phasing out of economic relations based on the barring of trade in specified products.

B. INFORMATION ON THE TERRITORY

GENERAL

17. Information concerning Southern Rhodesia, as well as an account of action taken in respect of the Territory, is already contained in the previous reports of the Special Committee to the General Assembly.⁴ Supplementary information on developments since then is set out below.

POLITICAL DEVELOPMENTS

Statement of the United Kingdom Government on talks with the Government of Southern Rhodesia

18. On 25 May 1965, the Commonwealth Relations Office issued a statement saying that now that the election in Southern Rhodesia was over, the United Kingdom Government intended to explore all possibilities of reaching a negotiated settlement on the constitutional questions at issue between Southern Rhodesia and the United Kingdom. The statement also said that the views of the United Kingdom Government on the negotiations were being communicated to Prime Minister Ian Smith through the United Kingdom High Commissioner in Salisbury.

Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference and Southern Rhodesia

19. A Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference was held in London from 17 to 25 June 1965. In the final communiqué of the Conference, the Heads of Government of the Commonwealth countries reaffirmed that they were irrevocably opposed to any unilateral declaration of independence by the Government of Southern Rhodesia and further reaffirmed their insistence on the principle of majority rule in relation to that country. According to the communiqué, the Prime Ministers also urged the United Kingdom Prime Minister to convene a constitutional conference at an early date, possibly within three months, which all political leaders in Southern Rhodesia should be free to attend, to seek agreement on the question of independence on the basis of majority rule. It was further urged that, should the Southern Rhodesian Government refuse to attend such a conference, and to release detainees, the United Kingdom Government should introduce legislation to suspend the 1961 Constitution and appoint an interim government, which should repeal oppressive and discriminatory laws and prepare the way for free elections.

20. The United Kingdom Government, according to the communiqué, informed the Conference that it was actively engaged in discussions with the Government of Southern Rhodesia and that in the process of seeking to reach agreement on Southern Rhodesia's advance to independence, a constitutional conference would, at the appropriate time, be a natural step.

21. On 28 June 1965, the Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia sent a message to the United Kingdom Prime Minister in which he stated that the constitutional conference recommended in the communiqué was unnecessary and out of the question, and that if such a conference were to be called the Southern Rhodesia Government would not attend, nor would anyone from the country. He also stated in his message that if the United Kingdom Government attempted to promote such a conference, his Government would interpret this as interference in the internal affairs of Southern Rhodesia.

Visit of the United Kingdom Minister of State for Commonwealth Relations to Southern Rhodesia

22. On 18 July 1965, the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations replied to an invitation from Prime Minister Smith to visit Southern Rhodesia for further talks. In his message, the Commonwealth Relations Secretary stated that he was anxious that these negotiations should be pursued without delay at the ministerial level. However, since he could not proceed to Salisbury as quickly as he would wish to, he proposed to send the Minister of State for Commonwealth Relations, Mr. Cledwyn Hughes, to Southern Rhodesia as his representative to explore further the possibilities of a settlement with Mr. Smith.

23. Mr. Cledwyn Hughes visited Southern Rhodesia for discussions with the Southern Rhodesian Government from 21 to 27 July 1965. On 25 July 1965, Mr. Ian Smith issued a public statement reassuring his followers that he was not departing from any principles in his negotiations with Mr. Hughes. The statement, which was issued through the Rhodesia Front Chairman, also said that whether independence came through negotiations or not, it would be without strings. On 30 July 1965, Mr. Smith described the talks as confidential although he was also quoted as saying that Southern Rhodesia had made specific proposals on the independence issue, and was awaiting the reaction of the United Kingdom Government to the talks. On 2 August 1965, Mr. Smith made a further comment on the visit of Mr. Hughes to Southern Rhodesia. In this report, he was quoted as saying that his Government was trying desperately to negotiate, but if it could not negotiate, there was only one other way to obtain independence and that was to take matters into its own hands.

24. On his return to the United Kingdom, Mr. Cledwyn Hughes gave the Commonwealth Relations Secretary, Mr. Arthur Bottomley, an invitation from

Mr. Ian Smith for him to pay another visit to Southern Rhodesia for further talks. In September 1965, Mr. Bottomley and Mr. Smith exchanged messages for continuing the talks on the question of independence.

Visit of Mr. Ian Smith to London

25. On 30 September 1965, Mr. Smith announced that he would visit the United Kingdom for negotiations with the United Kingdom Government on the independence issue. The announcement said that it had been made clear to the United Kingdom Government that in view of the fact that the independence negotiations had dragged on for more than two years, these talks had to be final and conclusive. On 1 October 1965, Mr. Smith stated that he had decided to go to the United Kingdom because even though Mr. Arthur Bottomley, the Commonwealth Relations Secretary, had agreed to come to Southern Rhodesia for talks, he could not come until the middle of October and that was too long to wait. Since any agreement between him and Mr. Bottomley would require the approval of the United Kingdom Prime Minister, he had decided to go to the United Kingdom instead so that if the negotiations failed he could make a personal appeal to the United Kingdom Prime Minister. Mr. Smith was also reported to have said that if he returned from the United Kingdom empty-handed he and his Government would have to face the question of declaring independence unilaterally. He further stated that no matter what the United Kingdom Government did, Southern Rhodesia would be independent by Christmas of 1965.

26. Mr. Ian Smith visited London from 4 to 11 October 1965 and held meetings with the Commonwealth Relations Secretary, Mr. Arthur Bottomley, and the United Kingdom Prime Minister, Mr. Harold Wilson, on the independence issue. On 8 October 1965 Mr. Smith told newsmen after his third meeting with the United Kingdom Prime Minister that he had made no concessions.

Statement by the Commonwealth Relations Office on 9 October 1965

27. The Commonwealth Relations Office issued a statement on 9 October 1965 on the discussions with Mr. Ian Smith. The statement reiterated the United Kingdom Government's position on Southern Rhodesian independence, as put forward to Mr. Smith, as follows:

1. The principle and intention of unimpeded progress to majority rule, already enshrined in the 1961 Constitution, would have to be maintained and guaranteed.
2. There would also have to be guarantees against retrogressive amendment of the Constitution.
3. There would have to be immediate improvement in the political status of the African population.
4. There would have to be progress towards ending racial discrimination.
5. The British Government would need to be satisfied that any basis proposed for independence was acceptable to the people of Southern Rhodesia as a whole. The statement also summarized the views of Mr. Smith on these five principles as follows:

- (i) The 1961 Constitution provided, in the qualifications governing the franchise, for an increasing number of Africans to be entitled to the vote and the question of guarantees against retrogression was essentially a matter of providing a suitable mechanism.

- (ii) The Government of Southern Rhodesia proposed the addition of a Senate (to be composed of twelve Chiefs elected by the Chiefs' Council) which would vote with the Assembly at third readings on any question affecting the revision of the entrenched clauses. This would replace the referendum procedure under the 1961 Constitution.
- (iii) The Government of Southern Rhodesia stated that their proposal for a Senate of twelve African Chiefs represented a major advance for Africans. The Southern Rhodesian Government could not contemplate any increased representation for Africans in the Assembly, while so many Africans refused the opportunities offered under the present Constitution but they were prepared to consider the extension of the B roll franchise, for example, by admitting all taxpayers.
- (iv) The Government of Southern Rhodesia stated that they wished to see an end to racial discrimination by an evolutionary process, but they could not agree to the repeal of the Land Apportionment Act.
- (v) The Government of Southern Rhodesia claimed that they had already demonstrated that the majority of the people of Southern Rhodesia desired independence on the basis of the 1961 Constitution. This had been shown by their consultation of tribal opinion and the referendum of the electorate.

28. According to the statement of the Commonwealth Relations Office, the United Kingdom Government did not consider that these proposals provided any positive advancement for Africans and had therefore come to the conclusion that no basis existed on which the United Kingdom Government would feel justified in granting independence to Southern Rhodesia. The statement also reiterated the United Kingdom Government warning of the grave consequences of a unilateral declaration of independence by the Government of Southern Rhodesia.

29. On 11 October 1965, Prime Minister Wilson held another meeting with Mr. Ian Smith in an attempt to break the deadlock on the issue of independence. Mr. Smith stated after their meeting that there had been no change in their respective positions on the independence issue.

Exchange of correspondence on resumption of talks

30. On 12 October 1965, Prime Minister Wilson sent a message to Mr. Smith in Southern Rhodesia in which he suggested sending to Southern Rhodesia a mission of senior Commonwealth Prime Ministers, headed by Mr. Robert Menzies, the former Prime Minister of Australia, to find ways and means of breaking the deadlock on the question of independence. On 18 October 1965, Mr. Smith rejected the suggestion for such a mission on the ground that the Commonwealth had no jurisdiction as far as Southern Rhodesia was concerned. On the same day, Mr. Wilson replied to Mr. Smith's message saying, among other things, that the United Kingdom Government was still open to any new ideas for seeking agreement between the two Governments.

31. On 20 October 1965, Mr. Smith responded to Mr. Wilson's request by suggesting that the United Kingdom Government could grant Southern Rhodesia independence and put the Government on trust to observe and abide by the principles of the 1961 Constitution. To this end he offered to abide by a treaty to guarantee those principles. He also stated that should such a treaty be broken, the United Kingdom Government could then take whatever steps it thought fit.

32. On the strength of the treaty proposal by Mr. Smith, Prime Minister Wilson offered on 21 October 1965 to fly to Southern Rhodesia for further talks on the independence issue.

Visit of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom to Southern Rhodesia

33. Prime Minister Wilson, accompanied by the Commonwealth Relations Secretary, Mr. Arthur Bottomley, visited Southern Rhodesia from 25 to 30 October 1965 for a fresh round of talks on the independence issue. They were later joined by the United Kingdom Attorney General, Sir Elwyn Jones.

34. While in Southern Rhodesia, Mr. Wilson held meetings with Mr. Smith and his advisers, also with Mr. Josiah Gondo, Leader of the Opposition, other members of the United Peoples Party, a delegation of the Provincial Council of Chiefs, independent members of Parliament, Mr. Garfield Todd (a former Prime Minister who is under restriction), and members of the Asian Community. He also held talks with Mr. Joshua Nkomo, leader of the banned Zimbabwe African Peoples Union (ZAPU) and the Rev. N. Sithole, leader of the banned Zimbabwe African National Union (ZANU), who were flown from their restriction areas for the talks. In all, it was estimated that Prime Minister Wilson talked with 126 leading and representative Southern Rhodesians.

Proposal for appointment of royal commission

35. In his discussions with members of the Southern Rhodesian Government, Prime Minister Wilson impressed upon them the dire consequences of an illegal seizure of power and also put to them two propositions. The first was that Mr. Smith's assertion that the Rhodesian people, including a majority of Africans, wanted independence on the basis of the 1961 Constitution should be tested by a referendum of the whole people, or of the present electorate plus all African taxpayers. The second was that a royal commission should be set up under the chairmanship of the Southern Rhodesian Chief Justice, to recommend amendments to the 1961 Constitution which would provide the basis on which Southern Rhodesia might become independent as quickly as possible, give effect to the five principles set out by the United Kingdom Government and which would be acceptable to the people of Southern Rhodesia as a whole.

36. The Southern Rhodesian Government accepted neither of these alternatives, and instead proposed that a royal commission, under the Chief Justice of Southern Rhodesia, with one other member nominated by the Southern Rhodesian Government and another by the United Kingdom Government, working on the basis of a unanimous report, should receive from the two Governments an agreed draft independence arrangement, based on the 1961 Constitution, with such amendments as might be considered necessary, and should then ascertain whether such a document was acceptable to the Rhodesian people as a whole.

37. Mr. Wilson agreed to this proposal, whilst reserving the right to return to the original concept of the commission's powers and duties, if the commission failed to agree. He also felt that the commission should produce an interim report on the methods it recommended for consulting Rhodesian opinion as a whole. On the question of which amendments should be made to the 1961 Constitution, important differences between the two Governments remained, however.

Statement by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom concerning his visit to Southern Rhodesia

38. In his report to Parliament on 1 November, after his return to London, Mr. Wilson said that the chiefs could not by the widest stretch of imagination be said to be capable of representing the African population as a whole, nor could the United Kingdom Government leave without safeguards a situation which would permit an independent Southern Rhodesia Parliament without check or constitutional hindrance to reduce the "B" roll seats or increase the "A" roll seats and thus postpone majority rule.

39. Regarding his talks in Salisbury with African leaders, Mr. Harold Wilson stated:

"... I should tell the House that in my talks with the African Nationalist leaders, and with African and other M.P.s elected on the "B" Roll, I made clear, with absolute frankness, three things. First, I regarded it as my duty to remove from their minds any idea of hope they might have that Rhodesia's constitutional problems were going to be solved by an assertion of military power on our part, whether for the purposes of suspending or amending the 1961 Constitution, of imposing majority rule tomorrow or any other time—or for that matter dealing with the situation that would follow, an illegal assertion of independence.

"... Secondly, I said that although successive British Governments are deeply and irrevocably committed to guaranteed and unimpeded progress to majority rule, the British Government, who alone, though the British Parliament have the legal power to grant independence, do not believe that in the present and tragic and divided condition of Rhodesia, that majority [rule] can or should come today, or tomorrow.

"... Thirdly, I urge them to unite the at present bitterly divided forces of African opinion, to work the Constitution of Rhodesia in a constitutional manner, to persuade their followers to register and to vote."

Offer to test acceptability of Southern Rhodesian proposals

40. On 3 November, Prime Minister Wilson informed Parliament that, despite further discussions between the Commonwealth Secretary and the Attorney General (who had delayed their departure from Salisbury) and the Southern Rhodesian Government, there was no prospect of agreement on the amendments to be made to the 1961 Constitution as a basis for use by a royal commission. In view of this, the present United Kingdom Government, whilst not moving from the position of its predecessors—in being ready to take account of any views which might be freely expressed by the population on the issues involved, but nevertheless reserving their position—agreed, subject to certain conditions, that the Rhodesian Government's proposals should be put to the test of acceptability to the Rhodesian people as a whole.

41. The conditions were that it must be known that the United Kingdom Government disagreed with those proposals, that before canvassing the views of the Southern Rhodesian people the royal commission should submit for approval by both Governments a unanimous report on how they would propose to determine acceptability, and that having ascertained the views of the Southern Rhodesian people the commission should submit a unanimous report. The United Kingdom Government could not commit themselves in advance to accept that report since the eventual decision must rest with the British Parliament.

42. As an alternative, the United Kingdom Government was still willing that the Rhodesian Government's proposals should be submitted to the test of a referendum of the whole Rhodesian people conducted without restriction on free political activity.

Reaction of the Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia to the United Kingdom Government proposals for a royal commission

43. On 6 November 1965 Mr. Smith sent a message to Mr. Wilson in which he stated that Southern Rhodesia could not accept the United Kingdom Government's proposals for a royal commission as outlined in the statement of Mr. Wilson in Parliament on 3 November 1965.

Internal developments in Southern Rhodesia

44. On 18 October 1965, the Southern Rhodesian Government issued a twelve months' restriction order against Mr. Garfield Todd, a former Southern Rhodesian Prime Minister, who is reported to be a supporter of African rights. Mr. Todd was restricted to his farm as he prepared to leave for the United Kingdom on 19 October 1965.

45. The restriction order stated that there was reason to believe that Mr. Todd was actively associated with the leaders of an unlawful organization—the banned Zimbabwe African Peoples Union (ZAPU) and that he had actively associated himself with activities prejudicial to the maintenance of law and order.

46. On 5 November 1965, the Southern Rhodesian Government declared a three-month state of emergency throughout the country. A statement by the Minister of Law and Order, Mr. Desmond Lardner-Burke, said that the state of emergency was necessary because there was a threat to security in Southern Rhodesia. By way of explanation, he referred to what he called the threats posed by numerous trained saboteurs sponsored by prescribed African nationalist organizations who, he claimed, had already returned to the country. He also claimed that many more were undergoing training in sabotage in countries hostile to Southern Rhodesia and that some of these saboteurs were already in countries north of Southern Rhodesia, awaiting directions and the opportunity to return to the country. He also claimed that statements by certain African countries indicated a threat to security and the maintenance of law and order.

47. On 3 November 1965, the Southern Rhodesian Minister of Finance, Mr. John Wrathall, announced the imposition of a control of all imports into Southern Rhodesia. An official statement said that the purpose of the import control was to stabilize the country's external reserves and to maintain a level of imports comparable to that of 1964.

48. These three acts of the Southern Rhodesian Government gave rise to general speculation that a unilateral declaration of independence by the Government of Southern Rhodesia was imminent. Prime Minister Smith had stated on his return from the United Kingdom on 12 October 1965, that it was an even bet that Southern Rhodesia would be independent by Christmas of 1965.

Further attempts at talks

49. On 7 November 1965, Prime Minister Wilson sent Mr. Smith a message asking to meet him in Malta for a further discussion of the Southern Rhodesia issue. He suggested in his letter that Sir Hugh Beadle (Chief Justice of Southern Rhodesia and Chairman designate of the proposed royal commission) visit London first to discuss the workings of the commission in the light of the newly declared state of emergency.

50. On 8 November 1965, Mr. Smith rejected the United Kingdom proposals for a royal commission. He informed Mr. Wilson that the United Kingdom and Southern Rhodesian views on independence were irreconcilable. He objected to a statement in Mr. Wilson's last letter that the United Kingdom Parliament alone could grant independence to Southern Rhodesia, although the commission's report would carry great weight. He also said that the United Kingdom had made it clear it would not permit the commission to submit a majority report and that it would not advocate its acceptance in Parliament.

51. Mr. Smith later announced that Sir Hugh Beadle, the Southern Rhodesian Chief Justice and Chairman designate of the proposed three-man royal commission, would go to London as suggested by Mr. Wilson. He made it clear, however, that Sir Hugh was going entirely at his own initiative. Sir Hugh arrived in London on 9 November 1965 to begin talks with Prime Minister Wilson and the Commonwealth Relations Secretary, Mr. Bottomley.

Final exchanges

52. Prime Minister Wilson, in a further message to Mr. Smith on 10 November 1965, asked the following: If the United Kingdom Government undertook to commend to Parliament a unanimous report by the royal commission to the effect that the 1961 Constitution was acceptable to the people of Southern Rhodesia as a whole as a basis for independence, would the Southern Rhodesian Government give a corresponding undertaking that if the 1961 Constitution was not so acceptable they would abandon their claim in this respect and agree that a royal commission should then devise an acceptable new constitution giving effect to the five principles?

53. In a statement to the House of Commons on 11 November, Mr. Wilson said that he had had a final telephone conversation with Mr. Smith several hours before the illegal declaration in which he had told him that there were no outstanding points remaining and that he was sending a senior minister to Salisbury to sign an agreed minute recording the basis on which the royal commission could be set up that week and start its work. Mr. Smith, however, had persisted in maintaining that the positions of the two Governments were irreconcilable.

Mr. Ian Smith declares independence unilaterally

54. On 11 November 1965, Mr. Ian Smith declared independence unilaterally. The announcement was contained in a proclamation (see appendix I) read by Mr. Smith in a broadcast to the people of Southern Rhodesia.

55. In a subsequent statement after reading the proclamation, Mr. Smith said that Southern Rhodesia would abide by the 1961 Constitution which now included the necessary amendments to adapt it to that of an independent country. Southern Rhodesia would continue in its loyalty to the Queen, the Union Jack would continue to fly in Southern Rhodesia, and the national anthem would continue to be sung. He also said that it was the intention of his new régime, in consultation with the Chiefs, to bring the Africans into the "Government" and "Administration", on a basis acceptable to them.

56. He ended his statement by saying that Southern Rhodesia had assumed its sovereign independence.

Statement by the United Kingdom Government on the illegal declaration of independence

57. On 11 November 1965, Prime Minister Wilson made a statement in the United Kingdom Parliament on the illegal declaration of independence in Southern Rhodesia.

58. He stated, inter alia, that the United Kingdom Government condemned the purported declaration of independence by the former Government of Southern Rhodesia as an illegal act and one which was ineffective in law. It was an act of rebellion against the Crown and against the Constitution as by law established, and any action taken to give effect to it would be treasonable. He also informed Parliament that the Governor, in pursuance of the authority vested in him by the Crown, had, on 11 November 1965, informed the Prime Minister and other Ministers of the Southern Rhodesian Government that they ceased to hold office. They were now private citizens in Southern Rhodesia and could exercise no legal authority. He further stated that the United Kingdom Government would have no dealing with the rebel régime. The United Kingdom High Commissioner was being withdrawn and the Southern Rhodesian High Commissioner in London had been asked to leave. (The Prime Minister also announced financial and economic sanctions against Southern Rhodesia which are dealt with in paragraphs 176-178 below.)

59. He went on to state that it was the duty of all British subjects in Southern Rhodesia including all citizens of Southern Rhodesia to remain loyal to the Crown and to recognize the continuing authority and responsibility for Southern Rhodesia of the Government of the United Kingdom.

60. Prime Minister Wilson also informed Parliament that the purpose of the United Kingdom Government's action against the illegal régime in Southern Rhodesia was not punitive but rather to restore constitutional Government in Southern Rhodesia. He further informed Parliament on 12 November 1965 that the only way this could be done was by bringing the rebel régime to an end by making that régime unworkable and creating a situation where, at the earliest possible moment, the people of Southern Rhodesia themselves would wish to see a lawful government in its place.

Southern Rhodesia Act, 1965

61. On 16 November 1965, the United Kingdom Parliament passed the Southern Rhodesia Act 1965 (see appendix II) which emphasizes United Kingdom jurisdiction over Southern Rhodesia and gives the Government powers for suspending, amending, revoking, or adding to any of the provisions of the Constitution of Southern Rhodesia, 1961. The Act also gives the United Kingdom Government powers to impose sanctions and take any other necessary action against the illegal régime in Southern Rhodesia. It also empowers the Government to declare invalid any laws made by the illegal régime since the unilateral declaration of independence. The Act further empowers the United Kingdom Government to make any Orders in Council which appear to be necessary or expedient in consequence of the illegal declaration of independence. The Act provides that these Orders take effect as soon as they are made, subject to their approval by Parliament which must be given within twenty-eight days of their date of issue.

62. Immediately after the passage of the Southern Rhodesia Act, 1965, the United Kingdom Government issued seven Orders in Council on Southern Rhodesia, among which were the following:

(a) Southern Rhodesia (Constitution) Order, 1965

63. Sections 2 and 3 of this Order in effect make illegal any orders issued by Mr. Ian Smith and the former Southern Rhodesian Government since the illegal declaration of independence and gives the United Kingdom Government general power to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Southern Rhodesia. Sections 4 to 6 of this Order also empower a Secretary of State to exercise executive authority in Southern Rhodesia currently with the Governor, in so far as the Governor is in a position to exercise it, or it is to be exercised directly through Orders emanating from the United Kingdom (see appendix III).

64. The executive authority of a Secretary of State under this Order in Council is vested in the Commonwealth Relations Secretary.

65. The United Kingdom Attorney General, Sir Elwyn Jones, stated in Parliament on 24 November 1965 that the Order invalidated in advance any laws which the Legislative Assembly in Southern Rhodesia might attempt to pass and any other business which it might transact. It also freed the Governor from his constitutional obligation to act in accordance with the advice of ministers and authorized the United Kingdom Government to exercise or control the exercise of various functions of officers and authorities of the Government of Southern Rhodesia. The Attorney General also stated that the Order declared invalid the constitution which Mr. Ian Smith and his colleagues purported to have granted to Southern Rhodesia. According to the Attorney General, the Order enabled the United Kingdom Government to keep under its own hand the necessary constitutional powers in Southern Rhodesia and thus enabled it to resist any attempt to set up an alternative government.

(b) Southern Rhodesia (Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881) Order, 1965

66. This Order prevents alleged fugitive offenders from being returned to Southern Rhodesia unless the Home Secretary considers their return expedient.

(c) Southern Rhodesia (British Nationality Act, 1948) Order, 1965

67. This Order makes it easier for loyal Southern Rhodesian citizens to be granted citizenship of the United Kingdom and colonies.

(d) Southern Rhodesia (Commonwealth Immigration Act, 1962) Order, 1965

68. This Order ensures that Southern Rhodesians to whom emergency United Kingdom passports are issued do not thereby become exempt from the provisions of the Commonwealth Immigrants Act.

(e) Southern Rhodesia (Property in Passports) Order, 1965

69. This Order enables immigration authorities to confiscate passports issued by the illegal authorities.

United Kingdom Government policy on the use of force

70. Prime Minister Wilson, following his statement on 11 November 1965 concerning the attitude to be taken towards the illegal régime in Southern Rhodesia and on the economic sanctions to be introduced, also informed Parliament that the solution of the Southern Rhodesian problem was not one to be dealt with by military intervention unless troops were asked for to avert a tragic action such as subversion, murder, etc. The United Kingdom Government did not contemplate any national action or international action to coerce even the illegal régime of Southern Rhodesia into a constitutional posture.

71. On 12 November 1965, the Prime Minister elaborated further on the policy of the United Kingdom Government concerning the use of force. He informed Parliament that if the legally constituted Government of Southern Rhodesia, that is the Governor, were to seek help in dealing with law and order, the United Kingdom Government would have to give it the fullest consideration.

Censorship imposed in Southern Rhodesia

72. On 10 November 1965, censorship was imposed on Southern Rhodesia by the Smith régime. The censorship powers, which came into force on 11 November 1965, include regulation, control, restriction and prohibition of printing, publishing, the posts and telegraphs and radio transmission and the entry into and exit from Southern Rhodesia of personnel. In addition, the regulations empower the régime to take over and operate newspapers and can compel newspaper staff to maintain and carry on the production of newspapers.

73. Under these censorship powers, the Rhodesia Herald was prevented from publishing a proposed special edition on 11 November 1965, on the Governor's proclamation dismissing Mr. Smith and his ministers from office.

74. On 8 February 1966, the Southern Rhodesian authorities introduced new emergency regulations by which it becomes an offence for newspapers to state expressly or to indicate by leaving blank spaces that they are subjected to censorship. The new regulations give censors powers to order that any material—including headlines—be altered or moved to another page. The issue of any publication which breaks the new regulations can be prohibited and any one who breaks them or obstructs a censor can be fined up to £500 or jailed for two years.

75. Both Southern Rhodesia's newspapers, the Rhodesia Herald and the Chronicle of Bulawayo had frequently appeared in the past with many blank spaces, indicating that their stories had been censored.

76. On 7 December 1965, Mr. Ian Smith's régime promulgated regulations to prevent people from listening to "subversive and seditious broadcasts" from countries bordering on Southern Rhodesia. Under these regulations any one who causes or permits to be heard in public one of these broadcasts is liable to a fine of £500 or two years' imprisonment, or both. It was reported that the immediate object of this move was to prevent people in Southern Rhodesia from listening to nationalist broadcasts from Zambia. It was further reported that the wording of the announcement of this regulation could well embrace broadcasts from the new British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) station in Bechuanaland.

United Kingdom radio station in Bechuanaland starts BBC broadcast to Southern Rhodesia

77. A new United Kingdom radio station in Bechuanaland was reported to have started beaming broadcasts to Southern Rhodesia on 22 December 1965.

78. The Commonwealth Relations Secretary, Mr. Arthur Bottomley, was reported to have announced on 29 December 1965, that the United Kingdom Government had built the transmitter in the Francistown area near the Southern Rhodesian border to contribute to its efforts to bring about the downfall of the Smith régime. The United Kingdom Government had decided to take this action after news censorship was instituted in Southern Rhodesia. Mr. Bottomley was further reported to have said that the transmitter had been relaying programmes intermittently for a fortnight and that it would relay appropriate programmes from the BBC.

Illegal régime assumes more powers

79. Under the Emergency Powers Act of Southern Rhodesia, the illegal régime, on 11 November 1965, assumed new powers to suspend chiefs, appoint new chiefs and to appoint additional district commissioners. It also assumed powers to requisition vehicles, equipment, buildings or premises and to take over radio stations.

80. The régime also took powers on 11 November 1965, to retain officers in the armed services or the Civil Service, to compel them to undertake any duties and suspend them from duty "notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in the conditions of service". Under the terms of these new powers, any employees who withdraw from their employment or refuse to carry out their duties are liable to two years' imprisonment, a fine of £500, or both.

81. On 10 December 1965, Prime Minister Wilson stated in Parliament that the illegal régime had introduced into Southern Rhodesia police state methods repugnant not only to the 1961 Constitution but also repugnant to all civilized standards.

Ian Smith "Constitution"

82. The so-called Constitution which was annexed to Mr. Smith's illegal declaration follows the general lines and terminology of the 1961 Constitution, with some important changes. The whole section on the Governor is replaced by arrangements for an "officer administering the Government" who is also the Commander-in-Chief. The powers of the "Officer Administering the Government" are the same as the Governor's, without, however, any powers to reserve bills for the assent of the Crown. He is to be either a Governor-General who may be appointed by the Crown on the advice only of the "Ministers" of the "Government of Rhodesia" or in the absence of such an appointment by the Crown within fourteen days, a Regent appointed by Members of the Executive Council presided over by the Prime Minister.

83. The Legislature, the franchise and the electoral provisions are generally the same as in the 1961 Constitution. The declaration of rights is unchanged except that the whole of the section providing for appeals to the Privy Council is abolished.

Position of the Governor in relation to the illegal régime

84. Immediately following the illegal declaration of independence, the Governor of Southern Rhodesia, Sir Humphrey Gibbs, issued a proclamation stating that Mr. Ian Smith and the other persons holding office as ministers of the Government of Southern Rhodesia or as deputy ministers ceased to hold office. He also called on all citizens of Southern Rhodesia to refrain from all acts which would further the objectives of the illegal régime. Subject to that, he stated that it was the duty of all citizens to maintain law and order in the country and to carry on with their normal tasks. This applied equally to the judiciary, the armed services, the police and the civil servants.

85. The Governor's statement was not given any publicity because of the censorship which had been imposed on Southern Rhodesia.

86. Mr. Ian Smith was quoted as saying on 12 November 1965 that any powers which the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom attributed to Sir Humphrey Gibbs, the Governor of Southern Rhodesia, were fictitious. He was further quoted as saying that the Governor had been advised that in view of the new Constitution which had been given to the people of Southern Rhodesia by the de facto Government in control, he no longer had any executive control in Southern Rhodesia.

87. On 14 November 1965 Sir Humphrey Gibbs issued a statement saying that he could not accept Mr. Smith's order that he no longer had any executive authority. He stated that he had been asked to continue in office by the United Kingdom Government and therefore remained the lawful Governor and the lawfully constituted authority. He also stated that he would not recognize the illegal régime or the new Constitution under which Mr. Smith was running the country.

88. On 17 November 1965, Mr. Smith announced the appointment of Mr. Clifford Dupont, former Deputy Prime Minister, as "Acting Officer Administering the Government" to assume the powers of a Governor under the so-called new Constitution. On 4 December 1965, it was reported that the Crown had refused a request from Mr. Smith to appoint Mr. Dupont as Governor-General of Southern Rhodesia.

89. Mr. Dupont was "sworn in" on 20 December 1965 as "Officer Administering the Government". By this action the illegal régime purported to have replaced the Governor, Sir Humphrey Gibbs.

90. Mr. Dupont was to have been made "Regent" under the Smith constitution but Mr. Smith announced on 16 December 1965 that he had decided to amend the original plan and appoint an "Officer Administering the Government" in deference to the British Royal family.

91. On 16 November 1965, an aide to Sir Humphrey Gibbs was reported to have said that the telephone to Government House, the official residence of the Governor, had been cut off. It was later reported that the Governor had been deprived of his official cars and most of his servants by the illegal régime. The Governor was also reported to have been deprived of all but two of the typewriters in his office.

92. On 18 November 1965, Prime Minister Wilson informed Parliament that the Governor of Southern Rhodesia, Sir Humphrey Gibbs, had been appointed by Queen Elizabeth II and could be removed only at her request. He also branded as an act of treason the move by Mr. Smith's régime to appoint Mr. Dupont as a replacement for the Governor.

93. On 26 November 1965, Sir Humphrey Gibbs stated that he intended to remain as the lawful Governor of Southern Rhodesia until such time that constitutional government was restored, which he hoped would be very soon. On 23 December 1965, the Governor also issued a Christmas message to the people of Southern Rhodesia in which he expressed the hope that the country would return to constitutional government.

94. However, none of these statements was communicated to the people of Southern Rhodesia because of the censorship which was imposed by the illegal régime.

95. On 10 December 1965, Prime Minister Wilson, speaking in Parliament, clarified the United Kingdom Government's attitude towards the Smith régime. He stated that the Government could not negotiate with the illegal régime which had perverted, distorted and misused the 1961 Constitution in a way not intended by its authors or by the United Kingdom Parliament.

96. He emphasized that it was for the Southern Rhodesian people, through the Governor, to make clear their desire for a return to their original allegiance and the rule of law. He also stated that Mr. Smith, like any other private individual in Southern Rhodesia, was free to make representations to the Governor and that if the Governor in his discretion forwarded any submissions to the United Kingdom Government, it would be considered. However, he further stated that the United Kingdom Government was not prepared to enter into negotiations with Mr. Smith on any basis which involved dealing with an illegal régime, or under any conditions other than procedural conditions, for a return to constitutional government.

97. On 21 December 1965, Prime Minister Wilson stated in Parliament that the Governor had standing authority to talk to anyone in Southern Rhodesia who could provide a means of returning to constitutional rule. The United Kingdom Government had authorized him to discuss even with the illegal régime the mechanism by which Southern Rhodesia could be returned to constitutional rule. He also stated that there were a number of detailed matters including the transfer of the armed forces and the police to the Governor's authority, and also several administrative matters which could be handled more smoothly if there were discussions.

Prerogative of the Crown challenged

98. On 20 and 21 January 1966, it was reported that the Crown had used its prerogative of mercy in favour of two Southern Rhodesian Africans who had been condemned to death under the mandatory death sentence of the Law and Order (Maintenance) Act, for attempted arson. It was also reported that since the Southern Rhodesian régime was illegal and the Governor unable to operate, the prerogative was exercised direct from the United Kingdom and that the Governor, the Southern Rhodesian Attorney General and the governor of the prison were informed direct of the Crown's wishes.

99. The Smith régime issued a statement on 21 January 1966, that it regarded the exercise of the royal prerogative in this case as an illegal act. The Commonwealth Relations Office said on 20 January 1966, that it would be an illegal act if the death sentence were carried out in defiance of the wishes of the Crown.

United People's Party and the illegal régime

100. It was reported on 18 November 1965 that Southern Rhodesia's all-African parliamentary opposition party had declared a boycott on any further discussions with Mr. Smith over his seizure of independence. Mr. Josiah Gondo, leader of the United Peoples Party, which has ten members in the Legislative Assembly, said in the statement that there could be no question of his party sitting down with Mr. Smith and his colleagues to discuss ways of furthering independence.

101. Mr. Smith had been previously reported to have stated on 17 November 1965, that he hoped to have discussions with African politicians on Southern Rhodesia's future under independence.

Southern Rhodesia Legislative Assembly

102. When the Southern Rhodesia Legislative Assembly met on 25 November 1965, an African Opposition Member, Mr. Chad Chipunza asked the Speaker for a ruling on whether Parliament was in fact constituted and whether he would read to the House the Southern Rhodesia (Constitution) Order in Council, 1965. Dr. Ahrn Palley, an independent member of Highfield electoral district, asked the Speaker to suspend the sitting because certain members of the House had issued a document purporting to be a new constitution for the country which had no legal validity and was in law an act of rebellion; those who accepted the document as a new constitution were acting illegally. The Speaker replied that the Chair itself was of that number and suggested that any member who found the United Kingdom enactment binding had only one proper course to pursue—to withdraw himself from the transactions of business by the House.

103. After making further attempts to interrogate the Speaker, Dr. Palley was suspended and was removed from the Chamber by the Sergeant-at-Arms. He was followed, it was reported, by nine of the fourteen other members representing the "B" roll electoral districts.

Mr. Smith's message to the armed forces, police and public servants on their loyalty to the illegal régime

104. On 15 November 1965, Mr. Smith sent a message to all government servants, including all officers and other ranks of the British South African police, the Army and the Royal Rhodesian Air Force and prison services, warning them to beware of the efforts of the United Kingdom Government to undermine their loyalty to his régime. Mr. Smith stated in his message that his Government was the Government of Southern Rhodesia and that they should disregard any claims that might be advanced by the Governor or persons purporting to speak in his name, or officials or members of the United Kingdom Government.

United Kingdom Government's view on the position of public servants in Southern Rhodesia

105. In his statement to Parliament on 11 November 1965, Prime Minister Wilson stated that it was the duty of all British subjects in Southern Rhodesia to remain loyal to the Crown and to continue to recognize the authority and responsibility for Southern Rhodesia of the Government of the United Kingdom.

106. In an interview on the BBC on 17 November 1965, Mr. Wilson was asked what answer he would give to Southern Rhodesian loyalists who wished to know what they should do in answering Mr. Smith's claims on their personal allegiance. The Prime Minister stated that the administering of an oath by the Smith régime was illegal and anyone who sought to administer it would be committing a further act of illegality. He added that it had to be a matter for the conscience of every public servant, that they should do nothing, and in view of their oath to the Crown, they could do nothing to further the purpose of the rebellion. Subject to that, it was the view of the Government that the public servants should continue the ordinary services and help to maintain law and order—particularly the judiciary—but if they were asked to take an illegal oath, this was a matter that they would have to decide against all the circumstances. It could well be that the loyal servants of the Crown, by staying at their posts, provided they were not asked to further the purposes of the rebellion, might be in a position to frustrate the purposes of the rebellion and speed the return of Southern Rhodesians to the rule of law and to their original allegiance. He also stated that those who might lose their positions because of their loyalty to the law were not going to lose their pensions and their accumulated rights.

107. The Prime Minister's statement was reported to have been beamed on the BBC to Southern Rhodesia. The statement was made a day after the African Workers' Postal Union, which has a membership of 4,000, had made an open appeal to the United Kingdom Government for guidance as to whether they should sign a pledge of loyalty to the Smith régime.

Southern Rhodesia High Court and the legality of the Ian Smith régime

108. On 13 January 1966, the legality of the Smith régime was challenged in the Southern Rhodesia High Court by the editor of the Central African Examiner. She contended that the censorship regulations order made on 10 November 1965 by the Southern Rhodesia Government had been revoked by an Order in Council made by the United Kingdom Government on 19 November 1965 and had ceased to have any force or effect from that date. The Judge was urgently asked to make a ruling on the validity of the censorship order in view of the severe limitation on the freedom of expression and the fact that the magazine wished to print in its February issue items which should have been in the Christmas issue but had been censored.

109. The editor of the Examiner further contended that the present Southern Rhodesia Government even if in fact in control of the country was not the lawful Government thereof. Alternatively, if it was the lawful Government, it was so by virtue of the 1961 Constitution.

110. The Southern Rhodesian régime contended that the "1965 Constitution" prevailed in Southern Rhodesia and a United Kingdom Act of Parliament and orders made under it were of no force or effect in Southern Rhodesia. It claimed further that it was beyond the jurisdiction of the High Court to entertain a challenge to the authority of the "1965 Constitution", and the present Government which was constituted and appointed under it.

111. The Smith régime also contended that the present Southern Rhodesian Government constituted and appointed in terms of the "1965 Constitution" was fully established as the lawful and effective Government of Southern Rhodesia and the continuance in office of the cabinet ministers was also lawful.

112. It was reported on 14 January 1966, that during the proceedings of the High Court the Attorney General of the illegal régime indicated, as being possible, the total closure of the Courts if they were drawn into a political and constitutional battle on the side of the United Kingdom.

113. On 27 January 1966, the Judge dismissed the case, reportedly saying that the direct question involved—the validity of the Smith régime's censorship regulations—was one that should be decided by a criminal court. At the same time, he was also reported to have stated that no question arose of the Court taking sides in a political struggle between the United Kingdom Government and the Southern Rhodesian Government.

Armed forces of Southern Rhodesia

114. It was reported on 12 November 1965, that the Southern Rhodesia Army had 3,400 men on active duty and 8,400 white reservists. The Army was said to comprise two regular army battalions, the all-white Rhodesian Light Infantry and the white-officered Rhodesian African Rifles. It was also reported that there were eight National Guard battalions, four of which were known to be active and the others believed to be in various stages of readiness.

115. The report further said that the Royal Rhodesian Air Force had 75 aircraft and 900 men which included one squadron of B-57 bombers, one of Hunter fighters, a reconnaissance squadron of armed Provosts, an Alouette Helicopter Squadron and a transport squadron of DC-38 and Canadian North Star aircraft.

116. The report also stated that Southern Rhodesia had a 6,000 strong regular police force—still named the British South Africa Police—of whom 2,000 were white. It further stated that the Reserve Police numbered 28,000 of whom 21,000 were white.

Political demonstrations against the illegal régime in Southern Rhodesia

117. It was reported on 12 November 1965 that 300,000 copies of a statement by the Smith régime were distributed on 11 November 1965 to the African population, warning them that the police and the army were ready to deal with any persons who caused trouble.

118. It was reported that on 15 November 1965, Southern Rhodesian policemen armed with shot-guns had broken up a strike by African workers in Bulawayo who were protesting against the illegal declaration of independence. On 22 November 1965, thousands of Africans in the cities of Bulawayo and Gwelo staged a strike in protest against the unilateral declaration of independence.

119. On 23 November 1965, one African was reported killed in Bulawayo when police opened fire to disperse an African demonstration. One African was shot in the leg when police opened fire to disperse demonstrators in the African township of Que Que. The police used tear-gas on 24 November 1965 to disband political demonstrators in Bulawayo. On 22 November 1965, the police opened fire to disband a crowd of political demonstrators in Salisbury.

Detainees and restrictees in Southern Rhodesia

120. It was reported on 18 January 1966 that there had been a sharp increase in the number of people under restriction in Southern Rhodesia in the past two months, but that the number in detention had dropped. A spokesman for the Southern Rhodesian régime was reported to have announced on 18 January that there were about 350 restrictees and 20 to 30 detainees in Southern Rhodesia.

121. On 25 November 1965, the "Minister of Justice, Law and Order", Mr. Lardner-Burke told the Legislative Assembly that there were 276 people in restriction and 47 under detention.

122. The latest details of the restriction orders, which were reported to have been listed in the Government Gazette, showed that twenty-two people were restricted between 14 and 24 December 1965. Of those, four—including a woman—were restricted for five years, seven for three years, five for two years and six for one year. The spokesman for the Southern Rhodesian authorities was reported to have said that the figure of 350 restrictees included a small number of people being held for two or three weeks only under the emergency regulations.

Population figures

123. It was reported on 21 January 1966 that according to the Government Monthly Statistical Report on Southern Rhodesia for January 1966, the population of Southern Rhodesia had reached an all-time high of 4,330,000. There were 4,080,000 Africans, an Asian community of 8,100 and another 13,000 Coloured (mixed race) people. According to the official figures, Southern Rhodesia's white population was 224,000 in December 1965. It was reported that this was the second time the number of Whites reached 224,000. The number of Whites was reported to have declined from this figure to 221,000 during 1963, at the break-up of the Central African Federation.

Relations between South Africa and Southern Rhodesia

124. On 11 November 1965, the Prime Minister of South Africa, Dr. H. Verwoerd, issued a statement on the unilateral declaration of independence by the Government of Southern Rhodesia. In his statement, the Prime Minister of South Africa said that the problems which had arisen between the United Kingdom and Southern Rhodesia were, and should remain, a dispute limited to those Governments alone. Such limitation was in the interest of world peace. The Government of South Africa had condemned and continuously condemned the fact that other States or organizations had found it necessary, and still found it necessary, to intervene in this domestic matter. The Government of South Africa would continue its policy of non-intervention. In accordance with this attitude, which it had adopted in the course of the dispute both prior and subsequent to Southern Rhodesia's declaration of independence, it would express no views on the arguments put forward by either the United Kingdom or Southern Rhodesia in this matter. The Government of South Africa would, however, continue to maintain the normal friendly relations with both countries.

125. He also stated that, unlike countries separated by great distances, it was of exceptional importance for the Republic of South Africa that normal intercourse with its Southern Rhodesian neighbours should continue as in the past. The measure and character of this course was such that its continuation was unavoidable, irrespective of who exercised effective authority in Southern Rhodesia. It therefore followed that South Africa could not participate in measures such as a boycott.

126. South Africa has continued to maintain relations with the illegal régime. Mr. John Gaunt, the former representative of Southern Rhodesia in South Africa, was reported to have stated on 23 November 1965, that there had been no change in his status since the "declaration of independence". He was also reported to have said that he was still Southern Rhodesia's "plenipotentiary diplomatic representative in the Republic".

Relations between Portugal and Southern Rhodesia

127. On 27 July 1965 the Government of Southern Rhodesia announced the appointment of "a diplomatic representative" in Portugal with effect from 1 August 1965. Mr. Harry Reedman, the representative designate arrived in Lisbon on 15 September 1965 and made a formal call on the Portuguese Minister of Foreign Affairs, on 20 September 1965. A spokesman for the Portuguese Foreign Ministry said that Mr. Reedman had presented "a letter of introduction" and that his status there would be that of "Chief of the Rhodesian Mission". The Foreign Ministry spokesman also stated that Mr. Reedman would deal directly with the Portuguese Ministry of Foreign Affairs concerning all matters of interest to Portugal and Southern Rhodesia.

128. The status of Mr. Reedman was disputed by the United Kingdom Government which has responsibility for the overseas affairs of Southern Rhodesia. The United Kingdom Government wished to have Mr. Reedman accredited to the United Kingdom Embassy.

129. On 1 October 1965, the Government of Portugal issued a statement on the question of Southern Rhodesia's representation in Lisbon. According to the statement the United Kingdom Government had issued a truncated text of a Portuguese note in reply to a United Kingdom Government note of 23 September 1965, asking Portugal to clarify its views on the status of Southern Rhodesia's representative in Lisbon. The Government of Portugal had not the slightest doubt that Southern Rhodesia was not a sovereign country and it was incumbent on the United Kingdom Government to conduct the external relations of Southern Rhodesia that might involve the ultimate responsibility of the United Kingdom Government. On the other hand, the neighbourhood between Portuguese territory and Southern Rhodesia, the long-standing tradition of relations between the two countries and their respective governments and the existence of numerous problems in common provided the justification for Southern Rhodesian representation in Lisbon on a basis corresponding with the status of the territory.

130. There has been no report of any change in the status of Mr. Reedman since the illegal declaration of independence.

131. At a press conference on 25 November 1965, the Foreign Minister of Portugal, Dr. Alberto Franco Nogueira dealt mainly with the position of his Government on the question of sanctions (see para. 268 below). He stated, however, that Portugal would continue to maintain normal relations with what he reportedly described as the "local government" of Southern Rhodesia.

Action taken by the Organization of African Unity (OAU)

132. The Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity, meeting in Accra, Ghana, from 21 to 25 October 1965, adopted two resolutions on Southern Rhodesia.

133. In the first resolution, the Heads of State and Government of the OAU called upon the United Nations to regard a unilateral declaration of independence by the European minority Government of Southern Rhodesia as constituting a threat to international peace, and to take any steps that such a situation required in accordance with the Charter and to help to establish a majority Government in Southern Rhodesia. The resolution also called upon all Governments and international bodies, in the event of a unilateral declaration of independence to withhold recognition of a European minority government and to apply sanctions.

134. The resolution further called upon the United Kingdom Government to take all necessary measures including the use of armed forces to take over the administration of Southern Rhodesia; to release the leaders of the nationalist movements, Mr. Joshua Nkomo, Rev. N. Sithole and all other political prisoners; to hold a constitutional conference with the participation of the representatives of the entire population of Southern Rhodesia with a view to adopting a new constitution guaranteeing universal adult suffrage, free elections and independence.

135. In the event of failure on the part of the United Kingdom Government to take the measures set forth above, all OAU member States were, inter alia, to use all possible means, including the use of force, with a view to opposing a unilateral declaration of independence; and give immediate and every necessary assistance to the people of Zimbabwe (Southern Rhodesia) with the view to establishing a majority government in that country.

136. The resolution also empowered the African Group at the United Nations to ensure that the request sent to the United Nations and the Security Council received due consideration.

137. In the second resolution, the Heads of State and Government of the OAU decided to set up a Committee of Five composed of the United Arab Republic, Kenya, the United Republic of Tanzania, Zambia and Nigeria to see to the effective implementation of the above resolution.

138. An extraordinary session of the OAU's Council of Ministers was held in Addis Ababa from 3 to 5 December 1965, to discuss OAU policy in response to the illegal declaration. The Council of Ministers adopted three resolutions on the question of Southern Rhodesia. In the first resolution they agreed, inter alia, to implement a total blockade of Rhodesia; suspend all economic relations; "freeze" Rhodesian accounts in African banks; deny all means of transport to and from Rhodesia, including the overflying of aircraft, ban all cable, telephone, telex and radio-telephone communications with Rhodesia; and to appeal to all countries to enforce an embargo on oil and fuel supplies to Rhodesia.

139. The Council of Ministers agreed to ask all African States to submit to the OAU copies of all legislation implementing the Council's decisions.

140. In a second resolution, the Council of Ministers, requested the Committee of Five to co-opt military experts of the States Members in order to study and make plans for the use of force with a view to assisting the people of Zimbabwe; requested all States Members to grant through the Committee of Five every kind of assistance to the people of Zimbabwe in their national fight against foreign domination; requested the Committee of Five to appeal to States Members to make a military contribution in order to face up to any emergency situation which might be created in the States Members adjacent to Southern Rhodesia without prejudice to the right of those States to appeal directly to any brother African State with a view to such assistance; requested the Committee of Five to see what contribution of military or other nature could be made by the States Members to face up to any emergency situation which might exist if one of the States Members of the OAU adjacent to Southern Rhodesia was in danger of being attacked; and addressed an urgent appeal to all States Members to facilitate in every way the task entrusted to the Committee of Five.

141. In a third resolution, the Council of Ministers instructed the African group at the United Nations to request the execution of the Security Council resolution 217 (1965) of 20 November 1965.

Action taken by other international organizations

142. The secretariat of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) stated on 19 November 1965, that it had severed all contacts with the Ian Smith régime and that it would have no further communications with it, although Southern Rhodesia as such remained a full member of GATT.

143. On 19 November 1965, the Governing Council of the International Labour Organisation (ILO) adopted a resolution on Southern Rhodesia.⁵ In this resolution, the Governing Council requested the Director-General to inform the Secretary-General of the United Nations that the ILO would do everything in its power to contribute in its own sphere to such action as might be decided upon by the Security Council; refrain from having any official or unofficial contact, direct or indirect, with the illegal régime in Southern Rhodesia; and keep abreast of developments in the situation and to report to the Governing Body at its next session.

144. On 17 November 1965, the United Kingdom Government informed the Director-General of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) that in present circumstances it did not wish to proceed with its application for associate membership for Southern Rhodesia. FAO took no action on the application for associate membership for Southern Rhodesia.

⁵ See Official Records of the Security Council, Twentieth Year, Supplement for October, November and December 1965, document S/6957.

145. On 29 November 1965, the Director-General of the World Health Organization (WHO) informed all members and associate members that all official communications between WHO and the Territory had been suspended with effect from 11 November 1965.

146. In the course of the last session of the Technical Assistance Committee the question of the application of the Security Council resolution of 20 November 1965 to assistance to Southern Rhodesia within the framework of the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance (EPTA) was raised. The report of the Committee to the Economic and Social Council recorded satisfaction over the Executive Chairman's statement that no further action was to be taken on contingency authorizations for Southern Rhodesia, and that, since the passage of the Security Council resolution, the participating organizations of EPTA and the executing agencies of the Special Fund had been requested to withdraw to Zambia all experts serving in Southern Rhodesia, pending clarification of the political situation in that country.

147. At the request of the United Kingdom Government, the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) has also made appropriate arrangements to suspend official communications with Southern Rhodesia.

Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Meeting in Lagos

148. A meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers was held in Lagos, Nigeria, from 11 to 12 January 1966, to discuss the question of Southern Rhodesia.

149. In the final communiqué of the Conference, the Prime Ministers agreed that the goal of future progress in Southern Rhodesia should be the establishment of a just society based on equality of opportunity to which all sections of the community could contribute their full potential and from which all could enjoy the benefits due them without discrimination or unjust impediment.

150. To this end, several principles were affirmed. The first was the determination of all present that the rebellion must be brought to an end. All those detained for purely political reasons should be released. Political activities should be constitutional and free from intimidation from any quarter. Repressive and discriminatory laws should be repealed. The Prime Ministers noted the statement of the United Kingdom Government that a period of direct rule would be needed, leading to the holding of a constitutional conference. This conference, representing all sections of the Southern Rhodesian people, would be for the purpose of recommending a constitution leading to majority rule on a basis acceptable to the people of Southern Rhodesia as a whole.

151. The Prime Ministers reviewed and noted the measures taken by Commonwealth and other countries against the illegal régime. Some expressed concern that the steps taken so far had not resulted in its removal. They called on all countries which had not already done so to act in accordance with the recommendations of the Security Council resolution of 20 November 1965, making at the same time necessary arrangements to provide for the repercussions of such further measures on the economy of Zambia.

152. The Prime Ministers discussed the question of the use of military force in Southern Rhodesia, and it was accepted that its use could not be precluded if this proved necessary to restore law and order.

153. In this connexion, the Prime Ministers noted the statement by the United Kingdom Prime Minister that, based on the expert advice available to him, the cumulative effects of the economic and financial sanctions might well bring the rebellion to an end within a matter of weeks rather than months. While some Prime Ministers had misgivings in this regard, all expressed the hope that these measures would result in the overthrow of the illegal régime in Southern Rhodesia within the period mentioned by the United Kingdom Prime Minister.

154. The Prime Ministers decided on the following measures of Commonwealth action, with immediate effect:

(1) To appoint two continuing committees composed of representatives of all Commonwealth countries to meet with the Secretary-General of the Commonwealth Secretariat in London. The first would review regularly the effect of sanctions and also the special needs which might from time to time arise in honouring the Commonwealth's undertaking to come to the support of Zambia as required. The second would co-ordinate a special Commonwealth programme of assistance in training Rhodesian Africans as set out below.

(2) The Sanctions Committee would recommend the reconvening of the Prime Ministers' meeting when they judge that this is necessary. In any case, the Prime Ministers agreed to meet again in July 1966 if the rebellion has not been ended before then.

(3) The Sanctions Committee would advise the Prime Ministers if it considered action by the United Nations was called for.

(4) Some Prime Ministers indicated that they reserved the right if need arose to propose mandatory United Nations action under Articles 41 or 42 of Chapter VII of the Charter. This statement was noted by the other Heads of Government.

155. The Prime Ministers were agreed that planned assistance to a lawfully constituted government of Southern Rhodesia should begin at once. They therefore approved the establishment of a special Commonwealth programme to help accelerate the training of Rhodesian Africans and directed the Secretary-General of the Commonwealth Secretariat to arrange as soon as possible a meeting of educational and technical assistance experts to consider detailed projects of aid by Commonwealth countries, including the early establishment of an administrative training centre in Southern Rhodesia.

Mr. Ian Smith's statement on resumption of talks with the United Kingdom

156. Mr. Ian Smith was reported to have stated on 17 January 1966 that he was willing to reopen negotiations with the United Kingdom Government. He was quoted as saying that he thought they should try to start negotiations for the sake of Anglo-Rhodesian relations and that if negotiations could resolve existing problems then the time was ripe to start them. It was also reported that Mr. Smith had refused to state his conditions for negotiations lest disclosure weaken his position, but that he would insist that Southern Rhodesia remained independent.

Visit of the Chief Justice of Southern Rhodesia to the United Kingdom

157. Sir Hugh Beadle, the Chief Justice of Southern Rhodesia, visited the United Kingdom from 18-24

January 1966, for talks with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the Commonwealth Relations Secretary. The visit of the Chief Justice of Southern Rhodesia to the United Kingdom was reported to be a substitute for the proposed visit of the Commonwealth Relations Secretary to Southern Rhodesia to see the Governor on 14 January 1966. The proposed visit was cancelled when Mr. Smith imposed conditions for the visit which amounted to a United Kingdom recognition of the illegal régime. Sir Hugh Beadle is still recognized as the Chief Justice of Southern Rhodesia by the United Kingdom Government. However, his position has not been challenged by the illegal régime.

158. Although Sir Hugh was reported to be on a private visit, the purpose of his trip was said to be to report to the United Kingdom Government on developments in Southern Rhodesia and to be briefed by the United Kingdom Prime Minister on further government plans on the Southern Rhodesian question.

159. It was reported that the main points which the United Kingdom Government wished to discuss with the Chief Justice included developments following the Lagos Commonwealth Conference on Southern Rhodesia and United Kingdom plans for development in Southern Rhodesia when constitutional rule was restored. It was also reported that the United Kingdom Government was eager to have Sir Hugh's assessment of the impact of economic sanctions on Southern Rhodesia. The Commonwealth Relations Office was reported to have stated on 18 January 1966, that Sir Hugh's visit had been arranged between the Governor of Southern Rhodesia, Sir Humphrey Gibbs, and the United Kingdom Government.

160. A United Kingdom Government spokesman was reported on 23 January 1966, to have emphasized that Sir Hugh would not carry a message to Mr. Ian Smith. No official statement was issued on the discussions between Sir Hugh and the United Kingdom Government. The Chief Justice returned to Southern Rhodesia on 25 January 1966, and was reported to have had talks lasting ninety minutes with Mr. Smith on 27 January 1966. Spokesmen for the illegal régime refused to confirm or to deny that the talks had taken place. Sir Hugh was believed to have reported separately to Mr. Ian Smith and to Sir Humphrey Gibbs, the Governor, on the United Kingdom Government's attitude towards the Southern Rhodesia crisis.

Statement by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom in Parliament on 25 January 1966

161. On 25 January 1966 Prime Minister Wilson made a statement in Parliament on the question of Southern Rhodesia.

162. In his statement, the Prime Minister said that the first aim of the United Kingdom Government was to bring the Southern Rhodesian rebellion to an end as quickly as possible, without lasting damage to the country. To this end, it would maintain and, as necessary, intensify economic measures with a view to a speedy settlement. It was equally the purpose of the United Kingdom Government to help the people of Southern Rhodesia in making a fresh start towards establishing a just society without discrimination. This fresh start must begin with an unqualified return to constitutional rule.

163. Southern Rhodesia's future course could not be negotiated with the régime which illegally claimed to govern the country, although the Governor was authorized to receive from the régime any proposals about the means by which the rebellion was to be brought to an end. But discussion of Southern Rhodesia's constitutional future must be with responsible persons representing all the people. The people of Southern Rhodesia obviously could not proceed at one step from rebellion to independence. The process towards majority rule must be renewed without delay or impediment but it could come only with time measured by African advancement and achievement.

164. Assuming that there was a speedy and peaceful return to constitutional rule, the best provision for the first stage after this return would appear to be for the Governor to form an Interim Government of Southern Rhodesians, responsible to him, comprising the widest possible spectrum of public opinion of all races in the country and constituting a representative government for reconstruction. During this time, the police and military forces would come under the direct responsibility of the Governor. The first responsibility of this Interim Government would be the maintenance of law and order. This would require not only the normal precautions against domestic disturbances and illegality but also guarantees to prevent a repetition of the rebellion and to protect human rights. The United Kingdom Government would need to be assured about the adequacy and effectiveness of these guarantees.

165. The United Kingdom Government would be ready to contribute to the economic needs of the country to restore the Southern Rhodesian economy and, in particular, to assist, in co-operation with other Commonwealth Governments, with schemes for the advancement, education and training of Africans so that they might as soon as possible play their full part in the development of the country's economic and political institutions.

166. Persons restricted or detained for purely political reasons would have to be released, provided they gave guarantees that their political activities would be conducted constitutionally.

167. How long this period of Interim Government might last could not immediately be foreseen; neither could the date on which parliamentary institutions could be restored. The Interim Government would last until conditions could be stabilized and the social and political wounds inflicted on the country could be healed. The views of the people of Southern Rhodesia would have to be sought on the amendments and changes necessary in the 1961 Constitution to secure a resumption of full constitutional government on the basis of the five principles of the United Kingdom Government. To these must now be added a sixth principle, namely, the need to ensure that, regardless of race, there was no oppression of majority by minority or of minority by majority.

168. The Prime Minister ended his statement by saying that it now rested with all responsible Southern Rhodesians who had the true welfare of the country at heart to bring the rebellion to an end before it was too late and to support the representative of the Crown in upholding constitutional law in Southern Rhodesia.

Changes in the illegal régime

169. On 31 December 1965, the Ian Smith régime announced a number of cabinet changes. Lord Graham, "Minister of Agriculture", was moved to the "Ministries of External Affairs and Defence". The two portfolios had been vacant since the appointment of Mr. Clifford Dupont as "Acting Officer Administering the Government". Mr. George Rudland, "Minister of Transport, Roads and Road Traffic" became "Minister of Agriculture" as well, shedding responsibility for roads and road traffic. Mr. Basil Musset, "Minister of Local Government and Housing", added Roads and Road Traffic to his portfolios.

State of emergency extended for a further three months

170. The "Legislative Assembly" of Southern Rhodesia met on 2 February 1966 and considered the extension of the three months' old state of emergency for a further three months. In introducing the motion to give effect to this, Mr. Lardner-Burke, the "Minister of Justice, Law and Order", informed the "Legislative Assembly" that the original declaration of the emergency on 5 November 1965 had been taken solely to maintain law and order and had nothing to do with the unilateral declaration of independence. The "Southern Rhodesian Government" considered it necessary to extend the present state of emergency for at least a further three months. He also informed the "Legislative Assembly" that it had come to his notice that certain misguided individuals in the country, some in high places who had held political rank or had represented the Government in various capacities, had formed what had been colloquially referred to as a "shadow cabinet". These individuals had met and discussed various matters and were trying to form themselves into a Government so that they could take over if requested by Sir Humphrey Gibbs or Prime Minister Harold Wilson. He stated that these people had been warned that if they continued with their endeavours to overthrow the "Government", it would have no hesitation in dealing with them in exactly the same way as it had dealt with anybody else who had endeavoured to cause bloodshed in the country.

171. On 3 February 1966, the "Legislative Assembly" voted 34 to 13, to extend the state of emergency for a further three months. An opposition amendment to limit the extension to one month was defeated by the same margin. The amendment was offered by an African member, Mr. C. Hlabangana of the United Peoples Party. He was reported to have told the "Legislative Assembly" that the emergency was a smoke-screen behind which the white minority government of Mr. Smith hid ugly things. He was also quoted as saying that without the emergency regulations there would be a civil war, adding that the emergency was a naked form of intimidation of the opposition.

Southern Rhodesia petitions to Privy Council

172. It was reported on 26 January 1966 that petitions had been lodged with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council by the Southern Rhodesian authorities seeking leave to withdraw appeals from two rulings of the High Court of Southern Rhodesia which had declared invalid restriction and detention orders made in 1964 against Mr. Joshua Nkomo, the African nationalist leader and sixteen other Africans (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. III, para. 57). Mr. Desmond William Lardner-Burke, as "Minister of Justice and Law and Order", had appealed to the Privy Council against that decision and also a finding that orders restricting Mr. Nkomo and 107 others to the Gonakudzinga or Wha Wha restriction areas could not stand.

Twenty-four Africans on trial

173. On 7 February 1966, twenty-three Africans were brought to trial in the High Court in Salisbury, accused of having undergone secret training as saboteurs and intelligence agents in the USSR and the People's Republic of China. A twenty-fourth man was charged with being one of the primary organizers of the training scheme. The prosecution alleged that they were trained on behalf of the banned Peoples' Caretaker Council and the Zimbabwe African Peoples Union (ZAPU).

174. The prosecution alleged that the twenty-three had been among fifty-two Southern Rhodesian Africans trained between March 1964 and October 1965, in guerrilla warfare, the use of explosives and arms, political science, map reading and radio communications. All twenty-four men pleaded not guilty.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENTS

General

175. It will be recalled that on 20 November 1965, the Security Council adopted resolution 217 (1965), which called upon the United Kingdom Government, among other things, to take all other appropriate measures which would prove effective in eliminating the authority of the usurpers and in bringing the minority régime in Southern Rhodesia to an immediate end. The resolution also called upon all States, inter alia, to do their utmost in order to break all economic relations with Southern Rhodesia, including an embargo on oil and petroleum products. The replies of Member States to this resolution have been already circulated as official documents of the United Nations (see paras. 12-16 above). Supplementary information on the major developments concerning the economic and financial sanctions, including the embargo on oil and petroleum products, is given below.

Economic and financial sanctions by the United Kingdom Government

176. In his statement to Parliament on 11 November 1965 on the purported declaration of independence by the former Government of Southern Rhodesia (see paras. 57-60 above), the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom also announced economic and financial sanctions against Southern Rhodesia.

177. The economic sanctions announced by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom covered a total ban on further purchases of tobacco from Southern Rhodesia. Plans to suspend the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement in its relation to Southern Rhodesia and to ban further purchases of Southern Rhodesian sugar were also announced. In addition to these measures, Southern Rhodesia was suspended with immediate effect from the Commonwealth Preference Area and its goods denied preferential treatment in the United Kingdom. The Ottawa Commonwealth Preference Agreements of 1932 governing the United Kingdom's trading relations with Southern Rhodesia were suspended. The export of arms, including spares, was also stopped.

178. Financial sanctions announced involved the cessation of all United Kingdom aid, the removal of Southern Rhodesia from the sterling area and a ban on the export of United Kingdom capital to Southern Rhodesia. Southern Rhodesia was denied access to the London capital market and special exchange control regulations were introduced against Southern Rhodesia.

The Export Guarantee Department also ceased to give cover to exports to Southern Rhodesia.

179. Following the passage of the Southern Rhodesia Act 1965, by the United Kingdom Parliament on 16 November 1965 (see para. 61 above), Orders in Council were published by the United Kingdom Government suspending the operation of the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement in relation to Southern Rhodesia and also removing Southern Rhodesia from the Commonwealth Preference Area. The other economic and financial measures against Southern Rhodesia did not require new Orders in Council as the Government had power to introduce them under previous legislation.

180. On 1 December 1965, Prime Minister Wilson informed Parliament of further economic measures which the Government had decided to introduce.

181. He stated that in addition to the embargoes on tobacco and sugar which represented 70 per cent of Southern Rhodesia's exports to the United Kingdom, the new embargoes covered the following Southern Rhodesian exports: asbestos, copper and copper products, iron and steel ores and concentrates of antimony, chromium, lithium and tantalum, maize, meat and edible meat products and a range of other food-stuffs. The new embargo items, in addition to those of sugar and tobacco which were announced on 11 November 1965, covered 95 per cent of Southern Rhodesia's exports to the United Kingdom.⁶ He further stated that the United Kingdom was reviewing certain items in its export trade to Southern Rhodesia where these were relevant to the objectives of securing a speedy return to constitutional rule in Southern Rhodesia and was also in touch with other countries about them.

182. Prime Minister Wilson also stated that pursuant to the United Kingdom's economic sanctions, the Government was in close touch with other countries that buy significant quantities of imported commodities from Southern Rhodesia. The object of these consultations was to deny Southern Rhodesia as far as possible the export outlets on which the finances of the illegal régime depended.

183. He also announced further financial measures against Southern Rhodesia. In general terms, by these financial measures, a stop was placed on practically all current payments by United Kingdom residents to residents of Southern Rhodesia, except for those arising out of the very limited trade in goods still permitted and on remittances. He went on to say that contractual obligations would not be repudiated, but that they could not be fulfilled in present circumstances. Money due to residents of Southern Rhodesia would be held back for the time being and would be released as soon as constitutional government was restored in Southern Rhodesia.

184. Orders made on 11 November under the Exchange Control Act, 1947, and directions given under the Emergency Laws (Re-enactments and Repeals) Act, 1964, had the effect of excluding Southern Rhodesia from the Scheduled Territories (Sterling Area) and of excluding residents of Southern Rhodesia and their accounts and securities from certain general exemptions and permissions which apply to residents of all other countries outside the Scheduled Territories. Central Banks were advised by the Bank of England of the details of the measures.

185. It was stated that certain current transactions between United Kingdom residents and residents of Southern Rhodesia (e.g. wages, salaries, pensions, interest, dividends) would continue to be allowed for the time being but that Southern Rhodesian accounts in London would be subject to control. Exports of United Kingdom capital to Southern Rhodesia would not be allowed, either in the form of direct investments or by the purchase of Southern Rhodesian securities with investment currency.

186. It was also stated that the proceeds of sale by Southern Rhodesian residents of sterling securities held by them in London could be credited only to a Southern Rhodesian security sterling account and used only for appropriate reinvestment subject to control or sold to other residents of Southern Rhodesia for such investment. Southern Rhodesian security sterling could not be sold for foreign currency on an overseas security market.

187. Further exchange control measures, intensifying the restrictions already applied, were announced on 1 December 1965, by which practically all current payments by United Kingdom residents to residents of Southern Rhodesia, except where these arose out of permitted trade in goods, were stopped.

188. Payments in sterling to and from Southern Rhodesia sterling accounts would continue to be allowed in respect of trade in goods, and freight and insurance connected therewith, directly between Southern Rhodesia and countries of the sterling area, to the extent that such trade was allowed by the Governments of the territories concerned. United Kingdom residents would not be allowed to merchant goods between Southern Rhodesia and any other territory.

189. In general, for current transactions no permission would be given for payments in regard to travel, wages and salaries, and contractual payments such as pensions, interest and dividends, by United Kingdom residents to residents of Southern Rhodesia, until constitutional government was restored in Southern Rhodesia. Money due to residents of Southern Rhodesia for pensions or interest on United Kingdom Government stocks would be held back for the time being and would be released as soon as normal relations could be resumed. British firms and others were advised to adopt a similar procedure. There was no question, the announcement said, of such obligations being repudiated, but they could not be fulfilled in present circumstances.

190. In general, no permission would be given for remittances by United Kingdom firms to subsidiaries or branches in Southern Rhodesia. No United Kingdom bank facilities would be allowed to, or in favour of, firms or individuals in Southern Rhodesia. No facilities for travel to Southern Rhodesia would be allowed except for approved official or business purposes. Gifts of cash from United Kingdom residents to individuals in Southern Rhodesia up to an aggregate of £50 would continue to be allowed until further notice.

191. On 14 December 1965, the United Kingdom Government revised a previous decision of 1 December 1965, and authorized the resumption of payments of United Kingdom pensions to services and civil service pensioners in Southern Rhodesia.

192. On 17 December 1965, the United Kingdom Government imposed further financial sanctions on Southern Rhodesia by insisting that all its purchases of United Kingdom goods and services should be paid for in hard currencies other than sterling and the South African rand. This replaced a previous regulation of 1 December 1965 which had allowed the use of Southern Rhodesian sterling accounts for a narrow range of payments for United Kingdom and other sterling exports to Southern Rhodesia. The sterling balances can be used only for pensions and other payments. It was reported that the United Kingdom Government had asked other sterling countries also to insist on such payments.

193. By the Reserve Bank of Rhodesia Order in Council, 1965, made on 3 December, the governor and other directors of the Reserve Bank of Rhodesia were suspended from office and deprived of all authority in relation to the Reserve Bank. In their place the Order appointed a new board of directors.

194. A Commonwealth Relations Office statement, issued on 3 December, said that Governments and central banks of other countries were being informed of the making of the Order and of its effects. The new governor of the Reserve Bank, Sir Sidney Caine, was giving appropriate instructions to those banks which hold accounts for the Reserve Bank as to the authority under which they should operate those accounts. The main purposes of the Order, the statement said, were to ensure that the assets of the Reserve Bank of Rhodesia held abroad were safeguarded in the interest of the people of Southern Rhodesia, and to help to achieve the United Kingdom Government's aim of bringing about a return to constitutional government in Southern Rhodesia.

195. It was stated on 9 December that the new board had established its authority over the assets of the Reserve Bank of Southern Rhodesia throughout the world by communicating with central banks. The new governor of the bank was reported to have said on 9 December that the authority of the new board had not been challenged by any central bank or government.

196. Under the Southern Rhodesia (Bank Assets) Order, 1965, which came into operation on 7 December, the Treasury was authorized to require any bank to supply information about any assets which it has held at any of its United Kingdom Offices, at any time since 11 November, on behalf of any Southern Rhodesian Office of any bank.

197. The assets of the Southern Rhodesia Reserve Bank were estimated at £23.5 million at the time of the illegal declaration of independence. Of this amount, it was reported that about £10 million was held in sterling balance in London. This amount is understood to have been effectively blocked in the United Kingdom. It was further reported that at least £3.5 million of the reserve assets were held in Southern Rhodesia at the time the United Kingdom froze the assets of the Southern Rhodesia Reserve Bank. The then governor of the Reserve Bank of Southern Rhodesia was reported to have stated on 17 November that not less than £12 million of the reserves were held outside the United Kingdom in a number of countries.

198. Mr. Ian Smith was reported to have stated on 11 December 1965 that although the United Kingdom had seized £9 million of Southern Rhodesia currency reserves held in London, there was little chance of the United Kingdom Government finding the remaining £13 million.

Oil embargo by the United Kingdom Government

199. The United Kingdom Government imposed a total oil embargo on Southern Rhodesia on 17 December 1965. By the Southern Rhodesia (Petroleum) Order, 1965, which came into operation on 17 December, the United Kingdom, in exercise of powers conferred upon it by the Southern Rhodesia Act, 1965, prohibited the import of oil and oil products into the Territory. It also prohibited United Kingdom nationals from supplying or carrying oil products for Southern Rhodesian use.

200. Prime Minister Wilson made a statement in Parliament on 20 December 1965 on the oil embargo against Southern Rhodesia. He stated, inter alia, that the oil embargo was aimed at getting Southern Rhodesia to return to constitutional rule. He said it would mean great inconvenience and hardship, but that it was essential to get a quick solution to the Southern Rhodesian crisis and to avoid the dangers of outside intervention.

Further economic and financial sanctions by the United Kingdom Government

201. On 20 January 1966, the United Kingdom Government assumed powers under the Southern Rhodesia (Prohibited Exports and Imports) Order, 1966, to embargo Southern Rhodesia's trade in any specified product. The Order prohibits the export from Southern Rhodesia or the import into Southern Rhodesia of products specified by the Order. The Commonwealth Relations Office confirmed that it was effective under the laws of both the United Kingdom and Southern Rhodesia and would apply to British exporters. The penalty clause states that any person guilty of an offence under the Order shall be liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for up to six months, or to a fine of up to £500, or both, and the higher penalties stated above are for conviction on indictment. Where a body corporate is guilty, and the offence is proved to have been committed with the consent or connivance, or is attributable to any neglect on the part of a director, manager, secretary or any other similar officer, then that person or persons would be liable to the punishment.

202. Except where authorized by the government regulations, no person is allowed to make or carry out any contract for the export from Southern Rhodesia or the import into Southern Rhodesia of any specified product; or make or carry out any contract for the sale of any specified product which he intends or has reason to believe that another person intends to export from or import into Southern Rhodesia. The Order would also make void any contract for export from or import into Southern Rhodesia of specified goods whether made before or after the commencement of the Order (20 January 1966), and any transfer of property or interest in products in pursuance of any such contract.

203. It was reported that the United Kingdom Government hoped that foreign Governments would recognize its legal authority (under the Southern Rhodesia (Prohibited Exports and Imports) Order, 1966), to impose this embargo—as they have done in the case of the oil embargo.

204. By an Order in Council made on 20 January 1966, the United Kingdom Government made the selling of Southern Rhodesian chrome illegal. A purchaser henceforth would be a party to an illegal act. It was reported that the reason for the immediate ban on chrome was that some difficulty had been found in preventing purchases by United States importers who buy most of Southern Rhodesia's £2 million worth of exports of chrome ore.

205. On 28 January 1966, the United States Department of State asked United States importers to stop buying Southern Rhodesia chromite. In announcing the request the Department said it was based on a recognition of the legal authority of the United Kingdom Government to prohibit the export of chromite from Southern Rhodesia.

206. On 30 January 1966, the United Kingdom Government imposed a total ban on exports to Southern Rhodesia with the exception of essential humanitarian needs, for the essential requirements of the Joint Central African Organizations and for goods on the quay-side already paid for. The ban on imports of goods from Southern Rhodesia into the United Kingdom was also extended (from the 95 per cent announced in 1 December 1965) to cover all imports from Southern Rhodesia.

207. In 1964, Southern Rhodesia's imports from the United Kingdom amounted to £33,379,446 (or 30.43 per cent of the total imports of Southern Rhodesia) and exports from Southern Rhodesia to the United Kingdom amounted to £31,164,268 (or 21.56 per cent of its total imports) of which tobacco and sugar exports alone amounted to £22 million.

208. On 30 January 1966, the United Kingdom Government issued a warning to people within Southern Rhodesia and to other Governments that it would not be responsible for any money lent to the Smith régime since it declared independence illegally on 11 November 1965. A statement by the United Kingdom Government Treasury said that any person who lent money or otherwise gave credit to the Smith régime did so entirely at his own risk. When constitutional government was restored in Southern Rhodesia, the lawful Government would not be bound to accept responsibility which the illegal régime might have purported to incur and it could not be assumed that it would meet them.

209. The warning appeared to be particularly directed at anyone who might be tempted to invest in the Southern Rhodesian "independence bonds" which the Smith régime issued on 1 February 1966. It was also reported that the warning was aimed at South Africa and some other nations and also any attempts by the illegal régime to raise money outside Southern Rhodesia.

210. On 7 February 1966, the United Kingdom Government made an Order which banned the export of tobacco from Southern Rhodesia and the sale of tobacco in Southern Rhodesia with a view to its being exported. Under the Order, it is now an offence under United Kingdom and Southern Rhodesian law for traders or speculators to buy Southern Rhodesian tobacco and stockpile it until the return of lawful government.

211. In an official statement issued on 7 February 1966, the Commonwealth Relations Office announced that the Order made it illegal for speculators or others to buy tobacco and hold it in Southern Rhodesia or elsewhere in the hope of selling it at a profit when legal government was restored. Purchasers of tobacco in contravention of the Order would have no legal right to it and would also not be able to get their money back. The statement added that from now on all transactions in Southern Rhodesia that were aimed at the export of tobacco were invalid, whether the export was to take place immediately or in the future.

212. Under the Order, once lawful government was restored, stocks of tobacco that had been illegally transacted would have to be re-auctioned before they could be exported. Only lawfully sold tobacco would be exported, under an export licence system; equally, only lawfully sold tobacco would be allowed into the United Kingdom.

213. It was reported that this Order was clearly intended to be a warning to any traders from third countries who might be planning to buy this year's crop.

Counter-measures taken by Southern Rhodesia

214. On 16 November 1965, the governor of the Reserve Bank of Rhodesia (recognized by the illegal régime) announced that the Bank would buy all the gold production of the country which before the announcement was sold in the United Kingdom. Gold exports in 1964 amounted to over £7 million. It was reported that the Reserve Bank has so far not sold any of its gold which is being used as a backing for the Southern Rhodesian pound.

215. On 30 November 1965, Southern Rhodesia announced the abolition of Commonwealth preferences on United Kingdom imports into Southern Rhodesia. The announcement stated that this would enable Southern Rhodesia to seek friendly trading arrangements with countries which until then had been excluded from participating in special arrangements because of Commonwealth preferences.

216. On 2 December 1965, Southern Rhodesia announced counter-financial sanctions against the United Kingdom. By these financial sanctions, Southern Rhodesia also blocked United Kingdom accounts in Southern Rhodesia. Under the financial restrictions, the payment of interest, rents, dividends, profit and other income as well as repayment of capital to United Kingdom residents would be made into blocked accounts until such time as normal financial relations were restored; payments for the maintenance of relatives in the United Kingdom would be reduced, the reduction depending on the hardship involved; exchange control authority would be required for debits and credits to United Kingdom residents' bank accounts; United Kingdom residents working in Southern Rhodesia on contract up to three years could no longer automatically remit their earnings abroad; and monetary gifts to United Kingdom residents would be limited to £50.

217. On 4 December 1965, Mr. Ian Smith declared that since the United Kingdom had seized Southern Rhodesia's London reserves, it would not be possible for Southern Rhodesia to meet its public debt obligations in London and to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (IBRD). On 8 December 1965, he contended that since the United Kingdom Government had seized Southern Rhodesia's London reserves it should also pay for Southern Rhodesia's external debts.

218. On 8 December 1965, the United Kingdom Treasury stated that the United Kingdom Government was not liable for Southern Rhodesia Government debts.

219. In a broadcast on 8 December 1966, Mr. Smith stated that imports from the United Kingdom, at present running at the rate of £35 million, would be reduced to a relatively insignificant amount and that this realignment would inevitably be of a long-standing nature. He further stated that Southern Rhodesia was developing payment arrangements to bypass the United Kingdom. He restated in his broadcast that payments of interest, rents, dividends, profits and capital from Southern Rhodesia to United Kingdom nationals had been blocked, causing a loss of "invisibles" of £26 million.

220. A Southern Rhodesian Treasury announcement on 8 December 1965, on exchange control measures, said that all payments to Southern Rhodesia for any purpose from residents of the sterling area excluding South Africa and the United Kingdom could no longer be settled in sterling but had to be made in United States or Canadian dollars or in a West European currency. Payments for Southern Rhodesian exports to Malawi and Zambia must be received in full in an approved currency before goods were dispatched. Exports to countries other than Malawi and Zambia would not be permitted to leave the country until the Southern Rhodesian customs were satisfied on an authorized dealer's certificate that payments had been made or would be made within six months, in an appropriate currency. A Treasury official of Southern Rhodesia was reported to have explained the new regulations by saying that payments made in sterling would only go to swell the accounts of Southern Rhodesia which have been effectively blocked by the United Kingdom Government.

221. On 28 January 1966, the "Ministry of Information" of Southern Rhodesia announced that the Southern Rhodesian pound would now be valued in terms of gold and not sterling as had been the case in the past. The statement said that the new par value of the Southern Rhodesian pound in relation to gold would remain the same as before and that there was no change in the value of the Southern Rhodesian pound to other currencies. The "Ministry" was further quoted as saying that the severance of the ties to sterling meant that the Southern Rhodesian pound was not obliged to follow any adjustments in the exchange parity of sterling.

Internal economic and financial measures introduced in Southern Rhodesia since the illegal declaration of independence

222. The economy of Southern Rhodesia has undergone some internal reorganization since the illegal declaration of independence. Statements made by officials of the illegal régime in Southern Rhodesia have confirmed that these changes have become necessary as a result of the international sanctions which have been imposed on Southern Rhodesia.

223. Intensified import and export controls were announced by the illegal régime on 11 November. It was stated that the immediate issues facing Southern Rhodesia were the securing of adequate supplies of essential commodities (such as wheat, medical and veterinary supplies, petrol, oil and lubricants), the ability to earn foreign currency to pay for the supplies and the ability to sustain economic activity. The purpose of export control was stated to be to safeguard essential supplies which were already in the country. Powers had been taken to introduce rationing if the necessity arose, holiday travel allowances were to be cut from £300 to £100 per annum, the sale of Post Office money orders for payment outside Southern Rhodesia was to be discontinued, and the purchase of foreign securities from non-residents by Southern Rhodesian residents was prohibited. Pension payments to pensioners abroad and other normal remittances abroad (including profits, rents, and the repatriation of capital) were allowed to continue.

224. Increases in excise and customs duty on cigarettes, tobacco, beer, wines and spirits were announced in Salisbury on 16 November. Further increases in taxation were reported to have been forecast on 6 December by Mr. Wrathall, the "Minister of Finance" of the illegal régime, who said that expenditure programmes were being reviewed with the object of creating employment to help cushion the effect of British sanctions.

225. On 18 November it was announced that Mr. Smith had established an organization, in which officials and representatives of business, farming and mining would take part, to contend with the sanctions being imposed on Southern Rhodesia and to assist in controlling the economy. The organization was to have three committees: commerce and industry, agriculture, and mining.

226. On 24 November 1965, the Governor of the Rhodesian Reserve Bank (recognized by the illegal régime) announced sweeping measures to restrict credit and at the same time to provide additional funds for the banking system. The statement of the Reserve Bank said that this should result in an immediate release of cash resources amounting to £2.76 million. The announcement said that this had been done because traditional resources available to the banks in Southern Rhodesia were no longer at their disposal.

227. According to the announcement, the banks were requested to follow a six-point advice aimed at reducing credit to the maximum extent to private persons. In no circumstances were they to make facilities available for the purchase of consumer goods. Credit should also be reduced to the distributive trades, but small traders should be given sympathetic consideration, to prevent closure. On the agricultural question, the Reserve Bank asked that the present credit level be maintained and, in the case of tobacco farmers, that continuing assistance be given to those who had already spent substantial amounts towards raising the 1966 crop. But they were to be asked to reduce their expenses to the lowest possible level and to be encouraged to switch to other crops where this was at all feasible. The statement added that credit facilities should be extended for the production of essential goods which would eliminate or reduce the demand for imported articles.

228. To counteract any adverse effects of sanctions, the "Minister of Commerce and Industry", Mr. G. W. Rudland, on 1 December 1965, announced moves to bolster the sugar industry. He announced a 20 per cent increase in the domestic price of sugar and stated that this measure was to enable Southern Rhodesia to continue with its planned production of 350,000 short tons. He stated that this measure would ensure that full employment was maintained in the sugar industry which employs 30,000 people directly and supports about 150,000.

229. On 16 November 1965, the "Minister of Agriculture", Lord Graham, advised the tobacco farmers that work on tobacco already started or on land irrevocably committed to tobacco, should be continued in the normal way but that where growers still had room to manœuvre they should consult with their local extension officers on the question of putting uncommitted acreage under alternative cultivation.

230. On 24 November 1965, Lord Graham in a further statement said that tobacco producers would be very unwise to disregard his advice to put their uncommitted land into alternative crops. He was commenting on reports that the Southern Rhodesian tobacco-buying companies were launching an intensive marketing drive to overcome tobacco sanctions. He strongly advised growers to hold back enough to reduce the tobacco crop from the original goal of 280 million pounds to 200 million pounds.

231. Emergency regulations published in Salisbury on 7 December 1965, declared the finance, commerce and industry of Southern Rhodesia to be essential services and provided for the control of corporations, including banking and insurance concerns, through a custodian who would be free to discharge or appoint directors or employees.

232. A statement by the illegal régime said that these powers would be permissive and that they were being taken to ensure that where any company operating in Southern Rhodesia, including a subsidiary or branch of an external company, came under undue pressure from external sources, it might be required to act only in the interest of Southern Rhodesia. It was reported on 29 January 1966, that the list of companies controlled under these emergency regulations numbered eight.

233. To meet the incidence of unemployment in Southern Rhodesia as a result of the international financial and economic sanctions, the "Minister of Finance", Mr. John Wrathall, announced on 6 December 1965, new measures to provide additional employment. He stated that the Roads Ministry was planning to substitute labour for machines as far as possible to create 1,500 new jobs. He also stated that building projects were being accelerated with high priority to projects with high employment factors and large local material content.

234. Mr. Ian Smith stated in his broadcast of 8 December 1965, that the various United Kingdom restrictions would inevitably cause unemployment problems among certain sections of the community. He stated that apart from measure, being taken for the direction of the economy, provision would be made for national service schemes to meet the possible unemployment situation. He further stated that workers who could not be absorbed in the national service schemes, and who became redundant as a result of the economic pressure from the United Kingdom would be diverted towards employment at present enjoyed by alien workers and the latter would be replaced and repatriated to their countries of origin.

235. On 17 December 1965, the "Southern Rhodesian Government" ordered the Rhodesia Reserve Bank (recognized by the illegal régime) to stop publishing weekly statements of assets and liabilities, showing the value of foreign assets. A statement from the Bank said they had been ordered to stop publishing them under the emergency regulations. On 22 December 1965, Southern Rhodesia clamped down on publication of details of how it was containing international sanctions. In a statement headed "Secrecy saves lives", the "Ministry of Information" said publication of such reports was detrimental to the national interest. Publicity would aid and encourage Southern Rhodesian opponents to take counter-measures and embarrass the country's friends. He stressed that silence might save the nation.

236. On 19 January 1966, the Rhodesia Tobacco Marketing Board announced new regulations for Southern Rhodesia's tobacco auction sales due to start in March 1966. A statement by the Tobacco Marketing Board said that all tobacco would be pre-classified and a reserve price fixed for each grade. Classification would be carried out by two independent classifiers who would be checked by a senior classifier. During classification the classifiers would be completely isolated. There would be no appeal by buyers or growers against the classification. There would be elaborate precautions to ensure that classifiers had no idea whose tobacco they were grading. Once graded, the tobacco would be vested in a tobacco corporation.

237. The leaf would then be offered on one or two tobacco auction floors at the reserve price or a price above it, and bales not bought would be taken by the corporation at the reserve price. The corporation would hold this in the pool and be responsible for its disposal. It would then be responsible for distributing the proceeds equitably among growers.

238. Even if a grower's leaf was sold above the reserve price, he would only be paid the reserve price in the first instance. The surplus would be credited to a pool and shared among growers. There would be a separate pool for flue-cured and burley tobacco.

239. On 29 January 1966, the "Ministry of Commerce and Industry" of the illegal régime announced that foreign currency available for the importation of goods during the second quota period from 31 April to 31 July 1966 would be increased by 20 per cent. The statement added that the Ministry had made strict preparations for the distribution of currency during this period. The first priority for imports would be given to the procurement of essential supplies. The second priority would be given to materials and supplies for industry, especially those which make the greatest earnings of foreign exchange with the manufacture of capital goods for export. The quota for industry generally, for the re-export trade, and for imports by merchants would be increased.

240. Following the extension of the state of emergency in Southern Rhodesia (see paras. 170-171 above), the Smith régime, on 5 February 1966, gazetted a new set of emergency regulations to strengthen its hold over most aspects of economic activity in Southern Rhodesia. The regulations cover the control of corporations, the investment of blocked funds, the publication of financial statements, control of manpower, control of goods and services, price maintenance, petroleum products distribution, local authority borrowing powers and transport and equipment requisitioning.

241. These regulations include the following:

(a) The Emergency Powers (Control of Corporations) 1966, which in addition to the "Minister's" powers to "designate" a corporation, also enables him to direct a corporation "to submit to him in such manner as he may specify any information relating to the conduct of the business of the corporation that he may consider necessary for determining whether or not the corporation should be designated". The Minister would appoint a "custodian", a senior Treasury official, to administer the power conferred on him by the regulations over a designated company. The regulations empower the custodian to adjust the capital structure of a designated corporation, control its labour and "make such order as he deems necessary or expedient relating to the conduct of the business of the corporation . . .”.

(b) The Emergency Powers (Control of Manpower) No. 2 Regulations give the “Minister”—in this case the “Minister of Labour”—extensive powers over the labour policy of a controlled industry.

(c) The Emergency Powers (Publication of Financial Statements) Regulations, 1966, give the “Minister of Finance” power to suspend the publication of the regular statements which are required from the Reserve Bank in terms of the Reserve Bank of Rhodesia Act, 1964.

242. On 11 February 1966, the illegal régime published orders extending the closed labour areas to all parts of Southern Rhodesia with the exception of five districts on the eastern border of Southern Rhodesia. These orders make it illegal for employers outside these five districts to engage alien Africans who enter Southern Rhodesia from 11 February 1966. According to an official statement, the purpose of these orders was to make job opportunities available to Southern Rhodesian Africans. The order did not affect foreign Africans who were already working in Southern Rhodesia. It is estimated that there are close to 200,000 foreign Africans, mainly from Malawi and Zambia, employed in Southern Rhodesia.

243. On 11 February 1966, the “Minister of Labour, Social Welfare and Health” made a statement on the employment situation in Southern Rhodesia since 11 November 1965, in which he stated that the over-all position was better than many people believed it would be.

244. He said that the purpose of the new manpower regulations was firstly to ensure that the industries concerned were able to continue to operate in the national interest, and that there was adequate manpower to maintain production at a proper level; and secondly to maintain as many people in employment for as long as possible.

245. Touching on the employment situation, the “Minister” said that it was of course true that there had been many changes in the employment pattern in various sectors of the economy since 11 November 1965. While it was obvious that commerce had suffered to some extent, there were on the other hand developments in industry which were creating new job opportunities. The status quo was being maintained whenever possible, and where it was not possible, the redeployment of the resources of manpower in these fields was being undertaken.

246. On 23 February 1966, the Southern Rhodesian régime took further action aimed at combating the effect of sanctions when the Emergency Powers (Industrial Relations) Act was gazetted. These give the “Minister of Labour” the right to suspend specific provisions of industrial agreements made under the Industrial Conciliation Act, at the request of the employers. It covers most aspects of commerce and industry, but excludes agriculture and railways. Employers may now request alterations in conditions concerning hours of work, short time, leave and remuneration laid down in present agreements. The object is to enable employers, for a temporary period, to alter these conditions of service as an alternative to dismissing workers.

Southern Rhodesia and the oil embargo

247. It will be recalled that Security Council resolution 217 (1965) of 20 November 1965, called on all States, inter alia, to do their utmost in order to break all economic relations with Southern Rhodesia including an embargo on oil and petroleum products (see paragraph 12 above). It will also be recalled that the United Kingdom imposed a total oil embargo on Southern Rhodesia on 17 December 1965 (see paragraph 19 above) by which it prohibited the import of oil and oil products into Southern Rhodesia.

248. The normal oil consumption of Southern Rhodesia is estimated at 400,000 tons a year, or approximately 300,000 gallons per day, which accounts for only 27 per cent of Southern Rhodesia’s energy requirements. Southern Rhodesian industry and agriculture are worked by coal (63 per cent) and electric power from the Kariba dam (10 per cent).

249. Through 1964, Southern Rhodesian oil requirements were met by product imports, largely from the Persian Gulf. Since then, Southern Rhodesian oil requirements (as also Zambian) have been met by the output of the Central African Petroleum Refineries Ltd. (CAPREF) refinery in Southern Rhodesia at Feruka, near Umtali. Crude oil for the refinery had been delivered for the account of CAPREF at the port of Beira, Mozambique by the several companies that are shareholders in CAPREF, and transported by pipeline from Beira to the refinery. CAPREF is entirely owned by external capital, as follows: 20.75 per cent, Shell Petroleum Co. Ltd. (United Kingdom and Netherlands); 20.75 per cent, British Petroleum Co. Ltd. (United Kingdom); 17.75 per cent, Mobil Petroleum Co. Ltd. (United States); 15.75 per cent, Caltex Ltd. (United States); 15 per cent, American Independent Oil Co. (United States); 5 per cent, Kuwait National Petroleum Co. (Kuwait); 5 per cent, Total Oil Products Rhodesia Pet. Ltd. (France).

250. The refinery’s operations are keyed to the circumstances of its shareholders, who are both marketers of petroleum products within Southern Rhodesia and crude producers in various other areas from which crude supplies for the Southern Rhodesian refinery would be drawn.⁷

251. Following upon the Security Council resolution, all the Governments of the shareholders of Central African Petroleum Refineries Company placed an oil embargo on Southern Rhodesia. Thus, all of the companies participating in normal oil supply operations for Southern Rhodesia are under constraint not to do so in contravention of the embargo—either directly by action or advice of their home Governments, or indirectly in appreciation of the attitude of their home Governments and Governments of oil-exporting countries as expressed through acts of embargo. Among other oil producing countries, Iran, the normal supplier of crude oil to CAPREF has also imposed an oil embargo on Southern Rhodesia.

252. To counteract any immediate adverse effects of the embargo on the refinery, the Smith régime on 21 December 1966, introduced emergency regulations which provided that no employee of the Central African Refining Company or distributive companies might be discharged or resign without the prior consent of the Minister of Labour.

253. It was reported that the last cargo of crude oil consigned to CAPREF arrived at Beira around mid-December 1965, prior to the United Kingdom embargo. Subsequent refinery operations were limited by the crude in storage at Beira (no crude has been pumped through the pipeline since 31 December), and the crude and unfinished oil in storage at the refinery. Accordingly, the refinery shut down its facilities around mid-January. (The exact date is uncertain since various facilities would be subject to separate operation depending on the internal flow of oil in process.) The start-up of operations would obviously depend on whether arrangements could be made for crude oil receipts from alternative sources of supply.

254. Control over oil distribution was initiated by the Southern Rhodesian régime on 19 December 1965, two days after the British Order embargoed further oil supplies. On that date, oil companies were requested to limit weekly supplies of gasoline and automotive diesel oil to garages and other retail outlets to the average weekly amount delivered over the previous three months.

255. Rationing began formally on 28 December. Private motorists were allowed 3 to 5 imperial gallons weekly per car, according to size of car. Commercial users were limited to between 5 and 20 gallons per week, according to the size of commercial vehicle; no limitation was imposed on automotive diesel oil consumption. Other users were not rationed, and other petroleum products were not then subject to controls.

256. On 4, 11, 18 and 25 January, successively more stringent rationing was imposed on oil consumers. Gasoline rations were sharply reduced; rationing was extended to automotive diesel oil and aviation fuels; and farmers were brought under rationing controls.

257. As of mid-January, it appeared that oil consumption had been slowed to around two thirds the normal rate, or perhaps slightly less. Restrictions on private motorists were most severe; restrictions were minimal or nil in essential end-uses. By late January, however, the impact of rationing was to become much more pronounced as new measures were imposed. Government railway, airways, broadcasting, and power systems are among the remaining exempt users.

258. On 17 January 1966, Mr. Ian Smith said in an interview that oil was still coming into Southern Rhodesia despite the embargo. He would not say how much oil was coming in or how his régime was beating the embargo. He also said that while his régime had been embarrassed for a while about the oil embargo, new plans had been made and he was satisfied that this problem would be resolved as would a number of others.

259. On 31 January 1966, a South African truck delivered 6,000 gallons of motor fuel to Southern Rhodesia. The delivery was described as a private business venture which might develop into a daily shuttle service. On 11 February 1966, it was again reported that gasoline from South Africa had been delivered to the Southern Rhodesian army and police. On 15 February 1966, a consignment of gift gasoline from South Africa was handed over to the "Minister of Defence and External Affairs," Lord Graham, in the City Centre in Salisbury. The gasoline which was estimated at 1,400 gallons was described as a gift from the townspeople and the Candour League of the South African town of Stellenbosch.

260. In a nation-wide broadcast on 10 February 1966, Mr. Smith stated that the flow of oil to Southern Rhodesia was increasing in spite of the United Kingdom embargo and that the target was to bring in more oil than was actually consumed in Southern Rhodesia. The significant thing was that the flow of oil was increasing not decreasing. He also stated that if all the various schemes which his régime was planning materialized, Southern Rhodesia would beat the United Kingdom embargo.

261. On 16 February 1966, it was reported from South Africa that Southern Rhodesia might be getting 70,000 gallons of fuel daily from South Africa and Mozambique and that more than 35,000 gallons of gasoline, oil and kerosene were passing daily from the Beit-Bridge road border point from South Africa into Southern Rhodesia. The report said that this information was the result of a three-day survey made at Beit-Bridge. The fuel was being taken to Beit-Bridge by South African road tankers, furniture trucks and heavy duty trucks, then transferred to Southern Rhodesian tankers. The report also said that Southern Rhodesia appeared to be getting an equal quantity of oil from Mozambique.

262. On 17 February 1966, a spokesman for the United Kingdom Government acknowledged that petrol was getting through to Southern Rhodesia from South Africa and that this was viewed with concern. But it was emphasized that press reports which had mentioned up to 70,000 gallons a day were greatly exaggerated.

263. Subsequent press reports estimated the inflow of oil from South Africa to Southern Rhodesia at between 35,000 to 40,000 gallons a day for the period from mid-February to the first week of March 1966.

264. An observer in Southern Rhodesia stated on 1 March 1966 that she had counted forty-four rail tankers in five days bringing some 308,000 gallons of gasoline up the railway line from Mozambique to Bulawayo. The observer, who said her watch only covered the daylight hours, estimated the capacity of the gasoline cars she saw at about 7,000 gallons each.

265. On 3 March 1965, the "Minister of Commerce and Industry" announced a relaxation of the petrol rationing to enable Southern Rhodesians to go on holiday. According to this announcement, persons who produced evidence of firm bookings for holidays outside the country of three weeks or more, would be given enough petrol to enable them to reach the border.

Portugal and the economic sanctions against Southern Rhodesia

266. Portugal has only very limited trade with Southern Rhodesia. However, Southern Rhodesia, which is a landlocked territory, depends wholly on Portugal for its rail connexion to the Mozambique seaports which handle most of its foreign trade. Moreover, the Beira-Umtali pipeline which supplies Southern Rhodesia with all its crude oil also passes wholly through the Portuguese territory of Mozambique.

267. The Mozambique railway connects with the Rhodesia railway at Umtali and extends through the Portuguese territory to the Mozambique seaport of Beira which handles the main bulk of the overseas trade of Zambia and Southern Rhodesia. The Rhodesia railway is also connected with the Mozambique seaport at Lourenço Marques in the south which handles a limited amount of Southern Rhodesia's foreign trade. The Mozambique line thus provides the main outlet to the sea of the Rhodesia Railways which owns the supply line through Southern Rhodesia and Zambia. The Mozambique line is entirely controlled by the Portuguese who do not therefore have to share the revenue or responsibility for the line. With Mozambique under Portuguese administration, both the railway and the seaport of Beira fall completely under the jurisdiction of the Government of Portugal.

268. The Foreign Minister of Portugal, Dr. Alberto Franco Nogueira, held a press conference on 25 November 1965, on the attitude of the Portuguese Government to the question of Southern Rhodesia. He was quoted as saying that to cut Southern Rhodesia's rail communications via Mozambique would be to harm Zambia more than Southern Rhodesia. To carry all Zambia's copper through Angola to Lobito would be to sacrifice Katanga's mineral exports, with serious consequences to the economy of the Democratic Republic of the Congo as the Benguela Railway had not the capacity for both. Portugal, he added, wished to continue her good neighbour policy towards Malawi, Zambia and the Democratic Republic of the Congo besides Southern Rhodesia. He was also quoted as saying that it was easy for some to advocate drastic, violent and theoretical measures. But Portugal must always act with a great sense of responsibility and in a spirit of collaboration with numerous countries without harming the just balance of the collective necessities.

269. Conversely, Portugal was reported on 5 December 1965, to have approved an emergency plan for shipping out the bulk of Zambia's copper through Angola if Southern Rhodesia cuts Zambia's rail link to the Indian Ocean. On the return journey the trains would have ample capacity to carry Zambia's imports. Portugal's approval of the plan was given in October 1965, privately to officials of the Benguela Railway which is controlled by Tanganyika Concessions Ltd., a British firm with many investments in Africa.

Portugal and the oil embargo

270. Southern Rhodesia receives its crude oil at Umtali, which is on the Southern Rhodesian border with Mozambique. The crude oil is pumped through the 184-mile pipeline from the seaport of Beira in Mozambique to Umtali. The Beira-Umtali oil pipeline was opened in late December 1964. The pipeline is owned and operated by Companhia do Pipeline Moçambique-Rodésia. Ownership of the pipeline is held by Lonrho Ltd., a British Company (62.5 per cent) and by Portuguese interests (37.5 per cent). A nine-man board, however, includes five Portuguese directors (of whom one is a Portuguese Government nominee) and four British directors.

271. The Board of Directors of the Mozambique-Rhodesia Pipeline (Companhia do Pipeline Moçambique-Rodésia) met in Lisbon on 5 December 1965, to discuss the question of the oil embargo imposed by the United Kingdom Government against Southern Rhodesia. At the Board meeting, the Portuguese directors (by the Chairman's casting vote), blocked a proposal of the Lonrho directors that the pipeline should stop operating until the United Kingdom Government lifted its oil embargo. But at the same time the directors of the Company unanimously rejected a request, received from the Smith régime, via the Central African Petroleum Refineries Company, that an estimated 14,000 tons of oil in the pipeline be pumped through to Feruka despite the lack of supplies to replace it. Pumping had been discontinued on 31 December 1965 when supplies at Beira were exhausted as a result of the embargo.

272. In the absence of a guarantee of indemnification for possible damage, the Southern Rhodesian request was rejected by the pipeline company because it was feared that if water or compressed air was used, the pipes would be damaged.

273. Since mid-January 1966, there have been persistent press reports that refined oil products were coming by road and rail from Mozambique into Southern Rhodesia. These press reports stated that the refined oil products were coming from Lourenço Marques in Mozambique where there is an oil refinery and a direct rail link with both South Africa and Southern Rhodesia. On 11 February 1966, the Foreign Minister of Portugal, commenting on press reports that oil was going from Lourenço Marques to Southern Rhodesia, stated that he knew nothing about oil going into Southern Rhodesia from Mozambique. On 13 February 1966, it was reported that seventeen tank cars, carrying about 140,000 gallons of petrol had arrived in Southern Rhodesia the previous week by way of the Mozambique port of Lourenço Marques. The petrol was said to have been shipped by rail from South Africa. A press report from South Africa dated 16 February 1966, estimated that Southern Rhodesia was receiving 35,000 gallons of oil daily from Mozambique.

274. It was reported on 4 March 1966, that the Smith régime was constructing on a high priority basis six prefabricated oil tanks at Beira, each capable of holding 3,000 tons of crude oil. The tanks are in the vicinity of the pipeline and are planned to link direct to the pipeline, bypassing the storage depots owned by the British and United States oil companies which, before the embargo, took delivery of the crude oil for CAPREF. It was reported that the tanks were being built in anticipation of private oil tankers arriving in the near future with crude oil for Southern Rhodesia.

275. On 2 March 1966, the United Kingdom Government expressed serious concern to the Government of Portugal about reports of the supply of oil products from Mozambique to Southern Rhodesia. The Foreign Secretary of the United Kingdom, Mr. Michael Stewart, made the representations personally to the Chargé d'Affaires of Portugal in London. Mr. Stewart also expressed concern over further reports about the construction of the storage tanks in Beira for Southern Rhodesia.

276. It was reported from Johannesburg on 9 March 1966, that thousands of gallons of gasoline have been secretly sent to Southern Rhodesia by South African railways, through Lourenço Marques, the capital of Mozambique. According to this report, in a secret operation, with Portuguese trains back tracking and using diversionary tactics, an estimated total of 155,000 gallons of petrol had been sent to Southern Rhodesia to counter the embargo imposed on oil shipments. The report stated that the Smith régime had been getting the bulk of its oil in this way.

277. On 7 March 1966, the Chargé d'Affaires of Portugal in London informed the Foreign Secretary of the United Kingdom, Mr. Michael Stewart, that reports that oil products were going by rail from Mozambique to Southern Rhodesia were incorrect. A United Kingdom Government spokesman was subsequently reported to have stated that Portugal had also informed the United Kingdom Government that the new oil storage tanks being built at Beira were for use within Mozambique and not for oil supplies to Southern Rhodesia.

South Africa and the economic and financial sanctions against Southern Rhodesia 278. South Africa is the third most important trade market for Southern Rhodesia after the United Kingdom and Zambia. In 1964, imports from South Africa to Southern Rhodesia amounted to £26,589,447 or 24.35 per cent of the total value of imports. Exports from Southern Rhodesia to South Africa amounted to £12,249,326 or 8.47 per cent of the total value of exports, including re-exports. The balance of trade for Southern Rhodesia was adverse by £14,340,121.

279. In his statement of 11 November 1965 on the illegal declaration of independence by the Government of Southern Rhodesia (see paras. 124-125 above), the Prime Minister of South Africa stated that his Government would continue to maintain normal friendly relations with both the United Kingdom and Southern Rhodesia. He further stated that the Government of South Africa could not participate in measures such as a boycott movement. Its declared policy had always been, whenever boycotts had been directed against it, that boycotts were in principle wrong and that retaliation by the institution of a counter-boycott would not even be considered. His Government could therefore not take part in any form of boycott. By acting thus, South Africa was not only pursuing its own policy, but also acting in accordance with the stand of principle against boycotts which had frequently and unambiguously been the subject of declarations by the world's most important States.

280. On 12 November 1965, the Republic of South Africa announced the suspension of all dealings in Southern Rhodesian currency until the position between the South African rand and the Southern Rhodesian pound was clarified. On 18 November 1965, the Reserve Bank of South Africa announced that financial transactions with Southern Rhodesia would return to normal immediately. A joint statement issued by the Reserve Bank of South Africa and the Central Bank of Southern Rhodesia on 18 November 1965, stated that negotiations had been concluded so that "permissible financial and trade transactions" between South Africa and Southern Rhodesia could be resumed immediately on the same basis as before 11 November 1965.

281. Following this announcement the Reserve Bank of South Africa stated on 18 November 1965 that financial and trade transactions with Southern Rhodesia were resumed forthwith. The rate quoted against the Southern Rhodesian pound was the same as that prior to the illegal declaration of independence. On 22 December 1965, it was reported that South Africa Reserve Bank had frozen Southern Rhodesia's foreign assets as a result of pressures from the United Kingdom Government. Both the Government and Reserve Bank of South Africa were quoted as having declined to comment on this report.

282. The Minister of Finance of the Republic of South Africa, Mr. Donges, was quoted as saying on 5 December 1965, that a statement on South Africa's financial relations with Southern Rhodesia would be made at the appropriate time if necessary. Since then there has been no further indication of when the statement can be expected.

283. It was reported that trade sources in Southern Rhodesia expected South Africa to be the first country to benefit from the cancellation of Commonwealth preferential tariffs on imports from the United Kingdom. The announcement of the illegal régime on 30 November 1965, abolishing Commonwealth preferences on United Kingdom imports, stated that this action would enable Southern Rhodesia to seek friendly trading arrangements with countries which had been hitherto excluded from participating in special arrangements (see para. 215 above). South African goods were in the past unable to compete on the Southern Rhodesian market with United Kingdom manufactured goods because of the preferential import rates enjoyed by the United Kingdom.

284. It was reported from Johannesburg on 4 December 1965 that South African exporters expected a very considerable increase in South Africa's exports to Southern Rhodesia as a result of these developments. The report further stated that increases in trade between the two countries was expected to be between 20 and 30 per cent, depending on a relaxation of import control restrictions imposed by Southern Rhodesia. The major increases were expected to be in goods essential to the Southern Rhodesian economy, such as machinery, particularly mining machinery, railway rolling stock and telephone equipment. The Southern Rhodesian "Trade Commissioner" in South Africa was reported on 22 November 1965 to have stated that trade between the two countries was already back to the pattern that existed before the illegal declaration of independence.

285. It was reported from Salisbury on 25 December 1965, that a Southern Rhodesian marketing centre was to be opened in Johannesburg on 1 February 1966 for an experimental period of three months. The centre was reported to be designed to push the sales of Southern Rhodesian light industries and to enable them to take full advantage of the quota granted under the 1965 Southern Rhodesian-South African trade agreement.

286. It was reported on 8 January 1966 that South Africa had decided to stop making a distinction between exports and re-exports in its trade figures. As a result of this it was stated that it had become a good deal harder for outsiders to discover whether or not South Africa was acting as a channel for embargoed Southern Rhodesian exports or supplying it with embargoed oil. It was also reported on 30 January 1966 that as a result of this, South African businessmen were left freer to channel what they could to Southern Rhodesia.

287. On 21 January 1966, the President of the Republic of South Africa, Mr. Charles Swart, stated in his speech at the opening of Parliament that South Africa would continue its policy of trying to maintain friendly relations with both the United Kingdom and Southern Rhodesia but would not participate in boycott or sanctions against any country.

288. On 17 February 1966, the "Minister of Transport and Power" for Southern Rhodesia, Brigadier Andrew Dunlop, stated in the "Legislative Assembly" that plans for railroad links between Southern Rhodesia and South Africa had been in existence for many months and could be implemented immediately to deal with any emergency which would arise should Southern Rhodesia be denied the use of the railway through Bechuanaland.

289. At present the only rail link with South Africa is through Bechuanaland and two possibilities exist for joining up the Southern Rhodesian and South African railway systems. One would be a hundred mile link from Rutenga, on the line to Lourenço Marques down to Beit-Bridge. The other, of similar length and costing approximately the same, would be from the existing Rhodesia Railway Terminal at West Nicholson to Beit-Bridge.

South Africa and the oil embargo

290. Soon after the oil embargo by the United Kingdom, a number of ostensibly private South African "petrol for Rhodesia" movements started, sending quantities of gift gasoline to Southern Rhodesia. An unknown number of private business groups and individuals were also reported to have started a shuttle service of refined oil and petroleum products to Southern Rhodesia.

291. On 17 January 1966, Mr. Smith publicly stated that oil and petroleum products were still coming into Southern Rhodesia despite the embargo (see para. 257 above). He followed this statement up on 27 January 1966, by broadcasting a message of thanks to the people of South Africa, in which he stated that the donations of fuel to Southern Rhodesia were a gesture typical of the traditional friendliness for which South Africans were noted throughout the world. Mr. Smith said in his broadcast that the gifts of oil would fortify his régime for the struggle ahead.

292. On 25 January 1966, the Prime Minister of the Republic of South Africa, Mr. Hendrik Verwoerd, stated in Parliament that his Government would not prevent South Africans from sending gifts of oil or gasoline to Southern Rhodesia. He stated that to ban gifts of any kind would be a form of participation in boycott measures against Southern Rhodesia. His Government, while declining to interfere in the Southern Rhodesian dispute, maintained its position that it would not join in any form of boycott, including an oil embargo against Southern Rhodesia. He was also quoted as saying that if gasoline companies or traders wanted to supply fuel to Southern Rhodesia, the Government would not stop them.

293. On 25 January 1966, the Department of Commerce and Industry in South Africa announced that it had established an inter-departmental committee to study the shipping of gasoline and petroleum products to Southern Rhodesia. The Committee was set up after a group of supporters for Southern Rhodesia in Johannesburg formed an organization to collect money from private individuals to buy gasoline for Southern Rhodesia. In reply to a question as to whether there was anything to stop South African citizens from privately sending a gift of gasoline to friends in Southern Rhodesia, an official of the Department of Commerce and Industry was reported as saying that gasoline and petroleum products were not at present under export control. He was further reported as saying that if people sent petrol to Southern Rhodesia without first approaching the Ministry they would not know about it but that since the matter was now under consideration the advice of the Ministry to people was to do nothing pending a statement by the Committee.

294. Following the statement of Prime Minister Verwoerd on 25 January 1966, the traffic in oil and petroleum products from South Africa to Southern Rhodesia was reported to have increased considerably, reaching their peak in mid-February.

295. On 27 January 1966, representatives of South African oil companies met in Cape Town to discuss the Prime Minister's statement that the Government would not interfere if private oil companies or individuals sent supplies to Southern Rhodesia. The companies decided to contact the Government on the implications of the Prime Minister's statement in Parliament in order to clarify the position. All the executives attending the meeting declined to comment on its outcome.

296. Later, the United States, the United Kingdom and French oil companies operating in South Africa announced that their head offices had issued instructions that fuel must not be sold to persons and organizations buying it for later transportation to Southern Rhodesia. It was reported on 12 February 1966 that the South African Government had warned the oil companies in the Republic that the conditional sale of oil would not be tolerated. The warning was reportedly made after the foreign oil companies told their depots near the Southern Rhodesian border not to sell oil to Southern Rhodesian buyers. The South African Financial Gazette was quoted as saying that the Government saw instructions from head offices to overseas oil companies in the Republic as a direct interference in South African affairs.

297. On 13 February 1966, the South African Oil Company which is locally owned announced that it was selling fuel without restriction but denied that it was under pressure to do so from the Government of the Republic.

298. According to estimates published in Pretoria on 16 February 1965, shipments of oil crossing the South African border to Beit-Bridge in Southern Rhodesia amounted to nearly half of Southern Rhodesia's daily requirements of gasoline and oil products under the rationing plan imposed as a result of the United Kingdom embargo. It was estimated that at least 35,000 gallons of petroleum products were crossing the border daily in a regular shuttle arrangement.

299. According to press reports, these shipments were clearly beyond the means of voluntary organizations in South Africa which had originally initiated the "petrol for Rhodesia" campaign. They were described as large scale commercial shipments of petroleum, organized through a Southern Rhodesian based organization, GENTA, which was sending road tankers to collect petrol in the Transvaal, ostensibly as voluntary gifts.

300. On 16 February 1966, the United Kingdom Ambassador called on the Foreign Minister of South Africa to express concern over the mounting shipment of oil to Southern Rhodesia. The Foreign Minister was reported to have replied that his Government was holding to its announced policy of not supporting boycotts but that it would look into the United Kingdom complaint.

301. On 19 February 1966, Prime Minister Wilson of the United Kingdom had talks with the South African Ambassador in London, Dr. Carel de Wet, on the breach in the oil embargo against the Smith régime. Mr. Wilson was reported to have made a strong protest to the South African Ambassador.

302. On 22 February 1966, the Commonwealth Relations Secretary, Mr. Arthur Bottomley, told Parliament that refined petroleum was reaching Southern Rhodesia from South Africa in quantities which were causing the United Kingdom Government concern. He also stated that representations on this matter were being made to the South African Government.

303. Subsequent press reports estimated the inflow of oil from South Africa to Southern Rhodesia at between 35,000 to 40,000 gallons a day for the period from mid-February to the first week of March 1966.

304. On 28 February 1966, Prime Minister Verwoerd reaffirmed in an electioneering campaign speech that his Government did not believe in sanctions. If any commodity available in South Africa including oil or petrol was traded with Southern Rhodesia, his Government would be participating in a boycott if it were to stop such trade. In what was considered a direct reference to the current increased volume in sales of oil and petroleum products to Southern Rhodesia, he stated that South Africa's policy of continuing "normal trade" with Southern Rhodesia did not imply continuing to sell the same commodities or quantities as before. "Normal trade" he said, meant that everybody involved in competition tried to sell what and as much as he could. It meant trade without inhibition and without breaks. It often happened that in the course of normal trade some individual gained an advantage over another and that in the course of it, he sold more than he used to. This did not make the trade abnormal.

Zambia, Malawi, and the economic and financial sanctions against Southern Rhodesia 305. Zambia and Malawi together in 1964 accounted for 25 per cent of Southern Rhodesia's exports, including re-exports, while their total exports to Southern Rhodesia amounted to only 5.5 per cent of Southern Rhodesia's imports. Zambia alone absorbed 28.28 per cent of Southern Rhodesia's exports, including re-exports, while accounting for only 4.92 per cent of Southern Rhodesia's imports. Malawi, on the other hand, absorbed 6.31 per cent of the total value of exports of Southern Rhodesia, including re-exports, while it accounted for only 1.45 per cent of Southern Rhodesia's imports. Southern Rhodesian sales to Zambia and Malawi were mainly of manufactured goods.

306. In 1964 the total value of exported goods including re-exports from Southern Rhodesia to Zambia amounted to £40,732,687, while imports amounted to £5,396,453; 39.41 per cent of the entire imports of Zambia in 1964 came from neighbouring Southern Rhodesia; the entire imports of Zambia amounted in 1964 to £78,219,201, of which £30,868,610 of domestic merchandise came from Southern Rhodesia. In particular, electric power and coal are the most vital items for Zambia's economy, since neighbouring Southern Rhodesia is the main supplier of electric power and the only economical supplier of coal to Zambia.

307. The figures of trade with Malawi show that Southern Rhodesia in 1964 had a favourable trade balance of £5,598,637. In 1964, exports amounted to £7,229,550 of the total value of exports, including re-exports, while the imports amounted only to £1,630,913 of the total value of imports; 39.1 per cent of the entire imports of Malawi in 1964 came from Southern Rhodesia.

308. Both Zambia and Malawi imposed trade restrictions on Southern Rhodesia when it declared independence illegally. Zambia removed Southern Rhodesia from the Commonwealth preference list on 14 November 1965 and Malawi also announced on 17 November 1965, that it had abrogated its preferential trade agreement with Southern Rhodesia with effect from 18 November 1965. Owing to difficulties in finding alternative suppliers and the geopolitics of Central and Southern Africa, both countries have in the meantime continued to trade with Southern Rhodesia in essential goods but have appealed to local importers to find alternative sources of supply.

309. On 8 December 1965, the Smith régime imposed trade restrictions on Zambia and Malawi. The new restrictions forbid Southern Rhodesian exporters to accept sterling in payment for goods sold to Zambia and Malawi. Under the new restrictions, goods shipped to Malawi and Zambia now have to be paid for in advance in United States or Canadian dollars or in a West European currency.

310. In a White Paper published on 26 April 1965, the former Government of Southern Rhodesia stated that if the Southern Rhodesian economy was to suffer as a result of sanctions by the United Kingdom Government, Southern Rhodesia would consider the repatriation of foreign workers and their families to Zambia and Malawi, to protect its indigenous labour force. It estimated that there were 500,000 such persons in Southern Rhodesia (see A/6000/Rev. 1, chap. III, appendix VI).

311. In an obvious reference to Zambia and Malawi, Mr. Smith stated in his broadcast on 8 December 1965, that workers who became redundant as a result of economic pressures from the United Kingdom would be directed towards employment at present held by alien workers and the latter would be replaced and repatriated to their countries of origin.

Other developments between Zambia and Southern Rhodesia

312. Prior to the United Kingdom oil embargo on Southern Rhodesia, the Central African Petroleum Refineries Company in Southern Rhodesia was the normal supplier of oil and petroleum products to Zambia. On 18 December 1965, Southern Rhodesia banned all shipment of oil and petroleum products to Zambia. The Southern Rhodesian "Minister of Commerce and Industry", Mr. George W. Rudland, described the retaliatory embargo on Zambia as temporary. He stated that it would be lifted when Southern Rhodesia had overcome the effects of the United Kingdom embargo. Following the Southern Rhodesia embargo, the United Kingdom, Canada and the United States Governments together, started a regular airlift of oil and petroleum products to Zambia to beat the embargo.

313. On 19 December 1965, Southern Rhodesia imposed additional royalties of £5 a ton on coal and an export tax of £8 a ton on coke exported to Zambia and the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

314. On 1 January 1966, Mr. Smith announced proposals to resume gasoline supplies to Zambia and cut the royalties charge on coal and the export tax on coke. On 2 January 1966 his offer was rejected by President Kaunda of Zambia, who described it as an empty gesture.

315. On 3 January 1966, the Southern Rhodesian "Ministry of Lands and Mines" announced that the additional royalties on coal and the export tax on coke exported to Zambia and the Democratic Republic of the Congo had been suspended as of midnight on 1 January 1966.

316. The copper industry of Zambia which accounts for over 90 per cent of its exports is heavily dependent on coal from Wankie in Southern Rhodesia which is shipped through the Rhodesia Railways. In 1964, Zambia imported 1,073,923 tons of coal from Southern Rhodesia for £1,204,449, which accounted for about 95 per cent of the total consumption of coal. The remaining 5 per cent, which amounted to 3,961 tons, was imported from South Africa for £11,013. In addition to this, 72,476 tons of coke and semi-coke of coal and their briquettes were also imported from Southern Rhodesia for £290,019.⁸

Zambia, Malawi, and the common services with Southern Rhodesia

317. Zambia shares three common services—the Central African Power Corporation (the Kariba Dam), Rhodesia Railways and Central Africa Airways—with Southern Rhodesia. Malawi is a third partner in the Central Africa Airways. These common services which were retained after the dissolution of the Central African Federation in 1963, are administered by higher authorities of the government members. The Kariba Dam and the Rhodesia Railway are each under a Zambia-Southern Rhodesia Higher Authority, with two members from each country, which can only make decisions unanimously. The Higher Authority of the Central Africa Airways differs from the others in having one member representing Malawi.

318. When the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland was dissolved on 31 December 1963, the Governments of Northern Rhodesia (now Zambia) and Southern Rhodesia agreed to assume jointly the ownership, control and responsibility for further development of the Kariba hydroelectric scheme. A Higher Authority for Power, composed of two Ministers from each of the two countries (whose decisions must be unanimous) was established to determine policy, and a statutory corporation, the Central African Power Corporation, in which the assets and liabilities of the Federal Power Board were vested, was set up to operate and develop electric power supplies.

319. The Kariba power station now produces the bulk of the electricity generated in Zambia and Southern Rhodesia, the output from thermal power stations having been substantially reduced. By 1963, the Copperbelt was drawing over half its requirements from Kariba, the balance coming from local thermal generators operated by the mining companies and from the Le Marinel hydroelectric power station in Katanga under an agreement which expires in the second half of 1966. The existing single transmission line of the grid—from Kariba to Kitwe on the Copperbelt—is already operating at full capacity and it is estimated that requirements in that area will exceed the capacity of the single line in the latter part of 1966.

320. Although the Kariba Dam site is on the frontier between the two countries the power station for generating the electricity is on the Southern Rhodesian side of the border of the two countries.

321. The Rhodesia Railway extends 3,000 miles from the region of Ndola in the Copperbelt of Zambia to Umtali on the Southern Rhodesian border with Mozambique, and through Bulawayo down into Bechuanaland. It has rail connexions through Southern Rhodesia to the Mozambique seaports of Beira and Lourenço Marques and through Bechuanaland to the South African seaports. The main bulk of the rail traffic goes to the Mozambique seaport of Beira for shipment overseas.

322. The rail connexions of the Rhodesia Railway in Southern Rhodesia to the seaports of Mozambique and South Africa, make landlocked Zambia dependent on transit rail facilities through Southern Rhodesia to the seaports. Zambia's annual copper exports of 750,000 tons are shipped through the Rhodesia Railways to Beira. Zambia also depends on the Rhodesian rail link for essential imports of food, machinery, coal, petroleum products, cars and trucks and medical supplies.

323. The two common services, jointly owned with Zambia, Kariba and Rhodesia Railways, are vital to the economy of Zambia. The Kariba provides over 66 per cent of the electrical energy needed to work the copper mines which account for over 90 per cent of Zambia's exports. The Rhodesia Railway also handles 99 per cent of all imports into Zambia, including oil. It also carries all the coal needed by the copper mines from Southern Rhodesia to Zambia. The denial of Kariba power and transit railway facilities by Southern Rhodesia would have a major effect on the copper industry of Zambia and also close the rail route to imports to Zambia, including coal from Wankie, Southern Rhodesia, for the copper mines.

324. President Kaunda of Zambia told a press conference on 17 November 1965, that he had asked the United Kingdom to send troops to help Zambian soldiers to defend the Kariba Dam. If the United Kingdom failed to send in troops after Southern Rhodesia cut off the power from the Kariba to Zambia, he would reserve the right to invite any Power to come and help to protect Kariba. He indicated that he would prefer troops to be sent to Kariba before anything happened. President Kaunda repeated his request for troops to the United Kingdom on 27 November 1965, after power from Kariba to Kitwe had been briefly interrupted by saboteurs in Zambia.

325. On 1 December Prime Minister Harold Wilson announced in Parliament that the United Kingdom was willing to send a military contingent to Zambia. He stated that the United Kingdom was willing to fly a squadron of Javelin jet fighters to Zambia with support from the members of an air force regiment. The jets were ready to go to the Zambian town of Ndola and the ground troops would go to Ndola, Lusaka and probably Livingstone. He also stated in Parliament on 1 December 1965, that he had given President Kaunda of Zambia an assurance that the United Kingdom Government would not stand idly by if Mr. Smith used his illegitimate control over the Kariba Dam to cut off power supplies to the Copperbelt in Zambia.

326. On 2 December 1965, Mr. Harold Wilson disclosed that he had received word from the President of Zambia, accepting the dispatch to Zambia of Royal Air Force planes. He said that talks about stationing United Kingdom ground forces in Zambia were continuing. The squadron of Javelin jet fighters and members of the air force regiment were reported to have arrived in Zambia on 3 December 1965.

327. The Commonwealth Relations Secretary, Mr. Arthur Bottomley, was reported on 5 December 1965 to have stated that the United Kingdom had reason to believe that explosives had been planted at the Kariba Dam. Mr. Smith was, however, reported to have said that his régime had no serious plans to blow up the dam. He said the concept existed only in remote contingency planning. The contention of Mr. Arthur Bottomley that the Kariba Dam had been mined was denied by both the Zambian Government and the Central African Power Corporation on 6 December 1965.

328. On 9 December 1965, President Kaunda was quoted as saying in the Zambian Parliament that if Southern Rhodesia interfered with any of the common services, it would be a declaration of war and that he would not hesitate to order his country into action. He was also reported to have said that the United Kingdom Government was using Zambia's dependence on Southern Rhodesia for electricity, coal and oil as an excuse for not tightening United Kingdom sanctions against Southern Rhodesia. He was also quoted as saying that Zambia should not be used as an excuse for United Kingdom inaction. It was also reported on 9 December 1965, that President Kaunda had issued a new and urgent appeal to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom for British troops to protect the Kariba Dam.

329. A United Kingdom military mission led by Major-General Willoughby, the General Officer Commanding United Kingdom Middle East Land Forces at Aden, visited Zambia from 19 to 24 January to consider with Government of Zambia future arrangements for United Kingdom forces in Zambia. During the visit the mission inspected the Zambian side of the Kariba Dam.

330. The "Deputy Minister of Information" of the illegal régime, Mr. Van der Byl, said in Salisbury on 26 January 1966, that Southern Rhodesia would not hesitate to carry out a "scorched" earth policy if the United Kingdom sent troops into Southern Rhodesia. He stated that once the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom knew of this, he would never send United Kingdom or other troops into Southern Rhodesia.

Drought in Southern Rhodesia

331. It was reported on 5 January 1966, that Southern Rhodesia was facing a severe farm crisis as a result of drought in nearly the whole of the south-west province of Matabeleland and part of the Midlands. It was reported that cattle were dying at the rate of 250 a day, much of the maize crop had been lost, dams and rivers were dry and even trees were dying. In an emergency removal scheme announced by the Southern Rhodesia régime cattle were being removed in northern areas where conditions were better.

332. On 8 January 1966, it was reported that a famine relief operation to get grain supplies to the drought-struck countries of Central Africa, including Southern Rhodesia, had been initiated on 7 January 1966 by the United Kingdom Government in collaboration with the Governments of Australia and Canada.

333. It was reported that in the case of Southern Rhodesia, the United Kingdom Government would work through Sir Humphrey Gibbs, the legal Governor of Southern Rhodesia, who would deal with the Smith régime in organizing the emergency supplies of grain to the stricken areas. The United Kingdom Government emphasized that the move on grain did not portend any relaxation of the embargo on oil or the trade and financial sanctions. The United Kingdom Government also stated that this was a humanitarian exercise and that it was not going to use starvation as a sanction. It could hardly help other countries all around and let thousands die in Southern Rhodesia.

334. On 13 January 1966, it was reported¹ that slow progress was being made with the relief operation scheme launched by the United Kingdom because no estimates had been received regarding the amount and type of grain required. In the case of Southern Rhodesia, it was reported that the previous plan whereby the Governor of Southern Rhodesia was to deal with the Smith régime in obtaining information on what was needed and in organizing emergency supplies to the stricken areas, had not been carried out. It was reported that the United Kingdom Government had now apparently asked the Governor to make his own estimate of what was required on the basis of such information that reached him. The report emphasized that so far there had been no dealing with the illegal régime.

335. On 20 January 1966, it was reported that the Governor had submitted a report on the drought situation to the United Kingdom Prime Minister. The report was said to have indicated that although the drought had been severe, the position was far short of famine. Additional help along the lines suggested by the United Kingdom Prime Minister would be welcomed, but it would not be needed on the scale that his original announcement suggested. The report was also said to have suggested that the urgent problem was water and some feed for animals with only some local need of emergency food for the people.

C. CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

General statements

340. The Chairman said that in view of the recent alarming developments concerning Southern Rhodesia, the main item on the agenda for that meeting, several delegations had urged him to make a statement from the Chair.

341. Many members of the Special Committee had expressed deepening concern at the fast deteriorating situation in Southern Rhodesia. That concern had in no way been alleviated by events of the past few days. Members were all no doubt fully aware of the incident of the Greek tanker Joanna V carrying oil, presumably destined for Southern Rhodesia, which had anchored off the harbour of Beira, Portuguese Mozambique. That, according to the news from London, had been in defiance of a United Kingdom frigate's instructions not to proceed to Beira and, according to the British, in issuing those instructions they had been anxious to enforce an oil embargo declared by the United Kingdom against Southern Rhodesia in keeping with United Nations Security Council resolution 217 (1965) of 20 November 1965.

342. That incident, it was generally believed, was far from being an isolated occurrence in the breach or attempted breach of the United Kingdom embargo on Southern Rhodesia. Many and convincing had been the reports of Portuguese and South African activities in getting oil to Rhodesia. What was of the gravest concern to the majority of members of the Committee was that those incidents had demonstrated convincingly the lamentable failure of the United Kingdom Government to bring down the illegal régime of Ian Smith in Southern Rhodesia by the imposition of sanctions.

343. The Committee had been entitled to expect the United Kingdom to restore constitutional legality in Southern Rhodesia, in view of the many statements it had made on the matter in the United Nations and elsewhere, as early in December 1965 and in January 1966, that the measures which it had been imposing by means of sanctions would bring down that illegal régime "in a matter of weeks rather than months". In the circumstances it was quite proper and fitting to hold the United Kingdom Government squarely responsible for the continuing and fast deteriorating situation in Southern Rhodesia. That Government had often made pious statements about its responsibilities in its territories to all sections of the community. And yet, in that crucial test where 200,000 Whites arrogantly and defiantly in the worst traditions of racism had imposed their rule on the 4 million black indigenous inhabitants of Southern Rhodesia in flagrant contempt of democracy and the much vaunted British ideas of justice and self-determination, the British had failed lamentably to honour their commitments and their responsibilities to the black Southern Rhodesians and had also failed to put into effect the United Nations resolutions.

344. It was therefore the duty of the Committee, with that vexed question of Southern Rhodesia on its agenda and in face of the continued existence of the illegal racist minority régime of Southern Rhodesia, to recognize that explosive situation as constituting a threat to international peace and security. The Committee urged all States not to recognize the illegal régime in Southern Rhodesia and not to entertain any diplomatic or other relations with that illegal authority and to desist in every way from aiding and abetting it by whatever means. It condemned the actions of all States which had not complied with the resolutions already adopted by the General Assembly and the Security Council, in particular Portugal and the racist régime of South Africa. In recognizing the inadequacy and the failure of the measures so far undertaken by the United Kingdom Government to bring to an end the Smith régime, the Committee drew the attention of the Secretary-General of the United Nations to the appalling state of affairs in Southern Rhodesia and asked the Secretary-General to alert the President of the Security Council, since the matter was already on the agenda of the Security Council, to take steps to bring it before the Council for the necessary action.

345. In the present circumstances, the Committee believed that the time had come for firm mandatory sanctions to be taken under Articles 41 and 42 of the United Nations Charter, since the measures already adopted had proved inadequate. The Committee solemnly called upon the United Kingdom Government once again to comply with Security Council resolution 217 (1965) of 20 November 1965, to honour its responsibilities to the 4 million black indigenous Southern Rhodesians and to bring to an immediate end the illegal racist régime of Ian Smith in Southern Rhodesia, indeed in keeping with its own undertaking.

346. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that the Chairman's statement accurately reflected the views and grave concern of the members of the Special Committee. The so-called sanctions had simply not worked and at the present rate they would continue to fail miserably.

347. The representatives of the United Kingdom had constantly reminded the Committee that the Southern Rhodesian question was the responsibility of the United Kingdom Government. That was quite true: the Southern Rhodesian question was only a continuation of colonialism and responsibility for it lay fully with the United Kingdom Government. The deteriorating situation demanded the application of mandatory sanctions and total economic blockade of southern Africa, including the use of military force to dislodge the illegal racist régime of Ian Smith.

348. From the day of the unilateral declaration of independence, the United Kingdom Government had been warned that mild economic sanctions would not work and that the only way to end the illegal régime was to use force and crush it. Considering that five months had passed since the declaration, it was time to resort to more forceful measures. The economic measures adopted so far had achieved nothing; everyone knew that the Smith régime was obtaining oil from Portugal and South Africa, to mention only two places. An oil tanker had just entered Beira harbour, and his delegation was not so naive as to believe that the ship would not deliver its cargo, despite British assurances. Another oil tanker was now approaching Beira; those ships, of course, were the only two that had been given such wide publicity.

349. South Africa and the Portuguese colonialists were doing all they could to keep the Smith régime supplied with everything it needed. It was no longer possible to consider the question of Southern Rhodesia, economically or otherwise, in isolation from the rest of southern Africa. The area was covered by a system of foreign financial oligarchies which provided an umbrella for the illegal Smith régime. Southern Rhodesia had been quietly but definitely selling its tobacco crop. It had been able to secure a large foreign investment in a milling and maize processing company. It had also been reported to have sold large amounts of iron ore and sugar to certain Japanese firms. An article in The New York Times of 5 April referred to the stationing of middlemen in neighbouring countries who purchased and sold for Rhodesian business men without being detected. The only way to stop that traffic was to police the borders of Southern Rhodesia by armed guards who would confiscate goods leaving and entering Southern Rhodesia. Unfortunately, agents of the Smith régime were allowed to carry out open publicity activities in the United States and other countries.

350. What his delegation held to be of paramount importance was the fate of the 4 million Africans and their right to rule their own land. The continued existence of the Smith régime meant a continued threat to international peace and security in the heart of Africa. An armed police State existed in Southern Rhodesia today; the African nationalists were detained, imprisoned, tortured, murdered. In those circumstances, his delegation felt that all the talk about economic sanctions was nothing but a ruse to divert attention from the suffering of the African people of Zimbabwe. It was generally accepted that the Smith régime was a threat to international peace and security, and it was high time that drastic and effective action was taken to bring that régime down and to return the land to its rightful owners. The only way that justice could be done in Southern Rhodesia was by the use of force. He hoped that the United Kingdom Government would shoulder its responsibilities. It had used force to impose its rule in other colonies and there was no reason why it should not use force to restore justice. That would be an exceptional action which would be well applauded. Even the Episcopal Church of Southern Rhodesia and the Primate of the Church of England had called for the use of force. Chapter VII and Article 42 of the United Nations Charter showed clearly what was to be done. Military force was the only means that could crush the Smith régime. It was the Committee's duty to recommend in clear terms to the Security Council that it should take the necessary action under Article 42 of the Charter. His country had always supported the struggle of the people of Zimbabwe against enslavement and colonialism and it considered that struggle part of its own fight for the total liberation of Africa and for development and peace. His delegation would therefore readily co-operate with all delegations which were ready to take action on those lines.

351. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics thanked the Chairman for his clear statement on the present situation in Southern Rhodesia. The Soviet Union, consistent with its position of principle, supported the right of the people of Zimbabwe to freedom and genuine independence. The Soviet Union Government had condemned the Smith régime and had branded the unilateral declaration of independence as a further crime of the colonialists against the suffering people of Zimbabwe. The governing circles of the United Kingdom pretended to oppose the Smith régime and to be working towards its downfall, but the facts showed the very opposite to be true. Through the 1961 Constitution, the United Kingdom had laid the foundation for the present racist régime; it had subsequently armed the Southern Rhodesian racists and encouraged a colonial union between Southern Rhodesia and South Africa and the Portuguese colonies. As a result, Southern Rhodesia had become a police State. The United Kingdom could never rid itself of responsibility for the national tragedy of the people of Zimbabwe.

352. It might be alleged that the present United Kingdom Government did not bear responsibility for past events. He would point out, however, that the Labour Government had taken no steps to abrogate the 1961 Constitution, nor had it declared itself willing to carry out United Nations decisions on the granting of genuine independence to the people of Zimbabwe; judging from various statements by Labour Party leaders, it did not intend to do so.

353. On 11 November 1965 the General Assembly in resolution 2024 (XX) had condemned the unilateral declaration of independence and invited the United Kingdom to implement the relevant United Nations resolutions in order to put an end to the rebellion. On the following day the Security Council in resolution 216 (1965) had called upon all States not to recognize the illegal régime in Southern Rhodesia and to refrain from rendering it any assistance. On 20 November 1965, the Security Council had adopted resolution 217 (1965) calling on the United Kingdom Government to quell the rebellion of the racist minority, to take all other appropriate measures which would prove effective in bringing the minority régime in Southern Rhodesia to an immediate end and to take immediate measures to allow the people of Southern Rhodesia to determine their own future consistent with the objectives of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

354. A significant number of States Members of the United Nations had already adopted the necessary effective measures for the implementation of the resolutions of the Security Council. In December 1965 the Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity had decided to implement a total economic blockade of Southern Rhodesia and to sever all communications with that country. Under that decision, aircraft travelling to Southern Rhodesia were denied the right to fly over the African countries concerned. The decisions of the General Assembly and the Security Council had been supported by the overwhelming majority of Member States. By 18 March, communications announcing the adoption of concerted measures against the Smith régime had been received from fifty-eight countries, and communications on that subject were continuing to arrive. The Soviet Union, which systematically supported the peoples struggling against colonial domination, had informed the Secretary-General¹⁰ of its willingness to implement the resolutions of the Security Council. The Soviet Union did not recognize the Smith régime; it had not provided that régime with arms, equipment or military matériel and maintained no economic relations with it. The Soviet Union had severed postal communications and telecommunications with the Salisbury régime. It was ready to co-operate with the African countries in extending all possible support to the Zimbabwe people in their struggle.

355. The United Kingdom—which, as the administering Power, was basically responsible for the tragic situation in Southern Rhodesia—had not implemented the decisions of the United Nations. Although it had claimed that the economic and financial sanctions would crush the rebellion within weeks, the ineffectiveness of those sanctions had been recognized by Mr. Smith himself, by the Press in the United Kingdom and the United States, by officials in the United Kingdom and by representatives of African countries. The sanctions had been adopted too late and the racist régime in Southern Rhodesia had been able to prepare for them. The United Kingdom had announced the oil embargo only on 17 December 1965—in other words, five weeks after the unilateral declaration of independence. The total ban on trade with Southern Rhodesia had been imposed by the United Kingdom only on 30 January 1966—two and a half months after the racist mutiny and the Security Council resolution. It was only on 18 March 1966 that the United States had officially imposed a ban on all exports to Southern Rhodesia. The sanctions allowed exceptions, which the United States, the United Kingdom and other Western Powers used in order to continue trade with Southern Rhodesia. Figures published by the United Kingdom Board of Trade showed that in February—after the United Kingdom had imposed a total embargo—the value of United Kingdom imports from Southern Rhodesia had amounted to £523,000 and its exports to Southern Rhodesia to £672,000. Tobacco exports from Southern Rhodesia to the United Kingdom had been to a value of £484,000, although officially imports of tobacco from Southern Rhodesia had been prohibited as from 11 November 1965. Those figures showed the “effectiveness” of the so-called economic sanctions.

356. The Smith régime was being assisted by its partners in the unholy alliance; Portugal and South Africa were undermining the economic sanctions. Mr. Swart, the President of the Republic of South Africa, had stated on 21 January 1966 that the South African Government would maintain normal relations with the régime in Southern Rhodesia and would not take part in any sanctions or boycotts. The Portuguese Minister for Foreign Affairs had announced on 25 November 1965 that Portugal would maintain normal relations with the Government of Southern Rhodesia. As could be seen from press reports and from the Secretariat working paper (paras. 1-335 above), Verwoerd and Salazar were helping their friend Ian Smith to overcome the oil embargo; supplies of petroleum products to Southern Rhodesia each month from South Africa and Mozambique were equal to the monthly consumption of such products in Southern Rhodesia under the current rationing system. The economic life of Southern Rhodesia was not hampered by any lack of petroleum; the railways were operating normally and, despite Portuguese denials, witnesses claimed that oil was going to Southern Rhodesia by rail from Lourenço Marques.

357. With the help of friends in Western countries, the Smith régime was also evading the financial sanctions. After the racist mutiny, the United Kingdom had blocked Southern Rhodesian currency reserves in London. The racist régime had, however, made its preparations; all reserves, with the exception of £9 million, had been removed from London and placed in banks in South Africa and Europe. As could be seen from paragraph 198 of the working paper, the reserves available to the Salisbury authorities were estimated at £14 million. Moreover, the Smith régime had solid gold reserves. The value of the annual gold production of Southern Rhodesia was £7 million.

358. The embargo on the sale of tobacco was equally ineffectual. On the eve of its declaration of independence, the Smith régime had succeeded in selling its 1965 tobacco harvest. The embargo was being violated not only by South Africa and Portugal but also by the United Kingdom, the United States and certain other Western Powers.

359. The sanctions were also being sabotaged by powerful international monopolies, which were openly helping the Southern Rhodesian racists to overcome the oil embargo. The petroleum products being supplied by South Africa to Southern Rhodesia were produced at installations under the control of the international petroleum monopolies, including Shell, British Petroleum, Mobil Oil and Caltex. They were then taken to Southern Rhodesia in tanks owned by British Petroleum, in which United Kingdom nationals owned 56 per cent of the shares. As stated in The New York Times of 26 February 1966, the branches of Mobil Oil and Caltex in Southern Rhodesia had complained to their parent offices that business was slipping away to the big United Kingdom companies, which were bringing oil clandestinely into the country. The oil monopolies in the United Kingdom and the United States were making no attempt to conceal their failure to co-operate in the oil embargo.

360. The subversive role of the monopolies was demonstrated by recent attempts to resume the pumping of oil through the Beira-Umtali pipeline. The pipeline was owned by Companhia do Pipeline Moçambique-Rodésia, whose capital was controlled by Lonrho Ltd., a British company (62.5 per cent) and by Portuguese interests (37.5 per cent). It had been explained that the decision to resume pumping had been carried through by the Portuguese, who were in the majority on the Board of Directors of the Companhia do Pipeline Moçambique-Rodésia. It was difficult to believe, however, that a company which owned two thirds of the shares in that concern had no say in the matter.

361. So far as sales of Southern Rhodesian tobacco were concerned, it was “business as usual” for the monopolies.

362. Although it was aware of those violations, the United Kingdom Government had taken no effective action to ensure the implementation of the sanctions. Despite its diplomatic exchanges with Greece and negotiations with Lisbon and despite constant supervision by United Kingdom armed forces, a tanker carrying oil for the Smith régime had succeeded in reaching the shores of Mozambique and anchoring two miles off Beira.

363. It was thus clear that responsibility for the situation in Southern Rhodesia lay primarily with the United Kingdom and those countries which, by direct or indirect means, were violating the Security Council resolution of 20 November 1965. The Soviet Union delegation agreed fully with the Afro-Asian delegations that the Special Committee should request the Security Council urgently to reconsider the question of Southern Rhodesia with a view to the adoption of measures under the Charter to ensure the implementation of the decisions of the United Nations, including the Security Council resolution of 20 November 1965.

364. The representative of Ethiopia supported the Chairman's statement. His delegation hoped that the statement would be adopted as a consensus of the Committee; otherwise, it would be compelled to introduce a draft resolution.

365. The United Kingdom Government had failed to crush the rebellion, primarily because it did not wish to do so. If it had so wished, it would have dispatched troops as it had done in many parts of Africa and Asia. Only force would crush the rebellion; the failure of the economic sanctions was obvious.

366. The representative of India congratulated the Chairman on his clear and concise statement, which reflected the sentiments of a large majority of the States Members of the United Nations. The statement constituted an effective interim pronouncement, which would focus the attention of the world community and of the Security Council on the explosive situation which the United Kingdom Government had allowed to develop in Southern Rhodesia.

367. The representative of Mali thanked the Chairman for his statement, which reflected the concern of the majority of the members of the Special Committee.

368. Mali considered Southern Rhodesia a colony and did not recognize the illegal and racist minority régime established at Salisbury. His delegation was convinced of the full responsibility of the United Kingdom Government for the situation in Southern Rhodesia. In Aden and British Guiana, the United Kingdom had not hesitated to suspend constitutions, revoke assemblies and governments elected by universal suffrage and arrest officials against the will of the people. In Southern Rhodesia, however, that same Government was showing complaisance and acting in complicity with a white settler minority which practised discrimination and cynically exploited the large majority of the African population, in violation of human rights and of the principles set forth in the United Nations Charter.

369. He would be glad to learn what the United Kingdom Government intended to do in order to ensure the implementation of the resolutions adopted by the United Nations and to crush the rebellion in Southern Rhodesia.

370. The representative of Bulgaria said that the Chairman's statement should, as an expression of the opinion of the Special Committee as a whole, be transmitted to all those who should take effective action to overthrow the racist régime of Southern Rhodesia.

371. The steps taken by the United Kingdom and other countries, which continued to be the mainstay of the racist minority régime in Southern Rhodesia, were deliberately ineffective. Racist régimes, such as that in South Africa, knew that they could count on the support of the United Kingdom and the United States Governments. Although six months had elapsed since the adoption of the General Assembly and Security Council resolutions on Southern Rhodesia, the unlawful Rhodesian régime continued to exist and to violate the most elementary rights of the overwhelming majority of the population. It was encouraging to note that a large number of Member States had responded promptly and positively to the appeals of the Security Council but the measures adopted by certain Governments—and particularly by the United Kingdom Government—had been ineffective.

372. The representative of Yugoslavia said that the Chairman's statement had shown the causes, implications and consequences of the current situation in Southern Rhodesia and the extent to which the United Kingdom Government bore responsibility for that situation. By asking for the application of Article 42 of the Charter, the Chairman had indicated a way out of the problem. For that reason, the Yugoslav delegation fully supported the statement. It was imperative for the Committee to take more vigorous action, if it was to fulfil its duties and continue to be an important and authoritative organ of the United Nations.

373. The representative of Iraq said that, when his delegation had referred at a recent meeting to the deteriorating situation in Aden, it had done so not only because the people who were being maltreated there were its kith and kin but also because the cause of freedom and independence was indivisible. If people were allowed to suffer in Aden, those responsible for that suffering would be encouraged to do the same thing in other parts of the world. His delegation therefore strongly condemned the events in Southern Rhodesia, the inactivity on the part of the United Kingdom and the support given to the minority Government of Southern Rhodesia by South Africa and Portugal. The United Kingdom should be pressed to carry out its duty fully and the Security Council should be called upon to consider the situation again.

374. Another reason why his delegation was so interested in the matter was that any discussion of the question of Southern Rhodesia reminded it of a similar case, that of Palestine. There, too, there had been a Mandatory Power, settlers and an embargo. He had warned the General Assembly, at its eighteenth session, that what had happened in Palestine would happen in Southern Rhodesia and his prediction was proving true: in Southern Rhodesia an administering Power was helping a minority to take over the country illegally and was doing its utmost to encourage the settlers and invaders, while 4 million people were suffering under the shackles of colonialism.

375. His delegation therefore supported the clear and strong statement made by the Chairman and would be prepared to support any draft resolution which would request the General Assembly or the Security Council to take stronger action to compel the administering Power to carry out its responsibilities under the United Nations Charter and to ensure that those who were ignoring the decisions and resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council were brought to reason.

376. The representative of Syria associated his delegation with those which had expressed support of the Chairman's statement, which reflected the grave concern felt by all members with respect to the problem of Southern Rhodesia.

377. The statements of the representative of the administering Power on the question of Aden and the question of Southern Rhodesia had given the impression that the problems would soon be solved, that independence would come and that the rebel régimes would collapse. Yet the truth of the matter was that colonialism continued to exist. After decisive arguments presented by the representatives of Tanzania and the Soviet Union concerning the United Kingdom Government and the steps that were being taken by the illegal régime in Southern Rhodesia, there was little left to say. The Committee was faced with a serious situation which showed a complete disregard for human rights and United Nations resolutions. No attempt should be made to minimize the Committee's responsibility as a body representing the consensus of the United Nations and there should be no question about the direction which the Committee's work should take.

378. His delegation supported the Chairman's suggestion that the matter should be referred to the Security Council so that Article 42 of the Charter could be invoked with respect to the question.

379. The representative of the United Kingdom said that he had been surprised to hear the actual terms of the Chairman's statement in that they appeared to suggest that they reflected a general view, although at that stage no views had been expressed by delegations or by the Committee as a whole. Nor could his delegation be expected to accept the comments which the Chairman and other representatives had made about the Government's actions and policies.

380. His delegation and his Government had of course never underestimated the seriousness of the situation created by the illegal declaration of independence in Southern Rhodesia or by recent events. That had been made quite clear in every statement which the United Kingdom delegation had made in the Security Council or in any other United Nations body.

381. At that very moment in London the United Kingdom Ministers were taking stock of the whole Rhodesian problem in the light of the latest developments. The Commonwealth Sanctions Committee, which had been set up at the Lagos Conference in January 1966, was also meeting in London. Furthermore, the United Kingdom Government was in touch at a high ministerial level with the Portuguese Government about recent developments.

382. He reserved his delegation's position with regard to the statements which had been made during the meeting.

383. The representative of the United States of America said that there were certain passages of the Chairman's statement with which his delegation could not associate itself. He consequently reserved his Government's position on the matter.

384. The representative of Denmark said that, while his delegation was in full agreement with much of the Chairman's statement, it reserved its position with regard to certain points in the statement until it had had time to study the text more closely.

385. The representative of Italy said that his delegation, like other delegations, found itself in agreement with much of the Chairman's statement. There were, however, certain points on which he was obliged to reserve his Government's position at the present time.

386. The representative of Australia said that he, too, would like to reserve his position regarding the Chairman's statement. His delegation was not prepared at the present stage to go into details about many of the things that had been said.

387. The representative of Uruguay said that his delegation had agreed with the idea that the Chairman should make a statement on the question of Southern Rhodesia because it had thought it necessary to stress the seriousness and urgency of the matter. His delegation generally supported the Chairman's statement, which was, however, one of considerable detail and, to some extent, a substitute for a resolution that would have been adopted after appropriate debate. He therefore reserved his delegation's right to comment on certain aspects of the statement at a later stage, when it had had time to examine the statement carefully and to receive appropriate instructions.

388. The representative of Chile said that his delegation's position with regard to the Chairman's statement coincided with that of the representative of Uruguay. While it was in general agreement with the statement, it was unable to commit its Government regarding certain points of detail without receiving instructions. His delegation therefore reserved the right to comment on the subject at a later meeting.

389. The representative of Venezuela said that his delegation agreed that the situation in Southern Rhodesia was serious and that effective action should be taken by the Special Committee and other appropriate United Nations organs to put an end to that illegal situation. His delegation had supported the idea that the Chairman should make a statement in order to emphasize the gravity and urgency of the matter. The statement had, however, been much broader than had been expected and there were a number of points which his delegation felt it must consider with great care. It could not take a position on the statement without consulting its Government and accordingly reserved its right to comment at a later stage.

390. The representative of Afghanistan said that his delegation was happy to note that there was a wide area of agreement among the members in the Committee regarding the gravity of the situation in Southern Rhodesia and the need for effective measures to remedy that situation. He had been glad to hear the United Kingdom representative say that his Government had never underestimated the gravity of the matter. That representative had also recognized the illegal nature of the actions of the authorities in Southern Rhodesia. The majority of the members, however, had given the clear impression that they did not consider the action being taken by the United Kingdom sufficiently effective.

391. His delegation expressed its appreciation of the Chairman's statement and saw no contradiction between the spirit of that statement and the unanimous concern felt by the members of the Committee. His delegation regarded certain points in the statement as mere recommendations, based on the consensus of members of the Committee that the attention of the Security Council should be drawn to the urgency and gravity of the question of Southern Rhodesia. His delegation therefore whole-heartedly supported the spirit of the Chairman's statement in the light of the discussion in the Committee.

392. The representative of Poland said that his delegation whole-heartedly supported the Chairman's statement, which fully reflected the concern felt by his delegation about the grave situation in Southern Rhodesia.

393. The representative of Tunisia associated his delegation with all those which had given the Chairman's statement full support. Like other delegations, his delegation had intended to present an interim draft resolution at the present meeting because it considered that the seriousness of the events in Southern Rhodesia and the fact that the administering Power had not taken any effective steps to put an end to the situation and to the illegal Southern Rhodesian régime required immediate action. It was, however, prepared to accept the Chairman's statement, which reflected its position and which it regarded as the consensus of the views of members.

394. His delegation felt that the problem was so serious as to demand urgent action on the part of the Security Council, which should be requested to adopt effective measures to put an end to the deplorable state of affairs in Southern Rhodesia. His delegation also felt that it would be well to express, on behalf of the United Nations and the Special Committee, the concern that was felt about the situation.

395. The United Kingdom representative's reservations had caused his delegation no surprise. The problem had, however, been debated on so many occasions in the United Nations that the astonishment shown by the United Kingdom representative seemed exaggerated. It was obvious that the situation could not last indefinitely and that the time had come to take further action.

396. The representative of Iran associated his delegation with those which had spoken in support of the Chairman's statement. The situation was grave and called for more effective action to implement the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council. As members were aware, Iran had been one of the first countries to impose a ban on the sale of oil to Southern Rhodesia and that ban had been scrupulously observed.

397. The representative of Madagascar expressed his delegation's support of the Chairman's statement, which fully reflected the gravity of the situation and the general concern felt by members of the Committee.

398. The representative of the Ivory Coast said that the various reservations that had been made were not likely to detract from the Chairman's statement, which reflected the views of the delegation of the Ivory Coast.

399. It was impossible to think of the Southern Rhodesian question without recalling that a few months previously Ian Smith had requested the United Kingdom to grant independence to Southern Rhodesia and had threatened to declare independence unilaterally should the administering Power not accede to that request. Ian Smith had indeed made good that threat. It seemed that reason no longer prevailed and that the Smith government felt that it had the right to keep 4 million black patriots in bondage, in spite of the appeals made to it and of its condemnation by world opinion.

400. The United Kingdom, which had come to the United Nations to explain the difficulties and to obtain assistance in order to put down the Rhodesian rebellion, had exhausted all means, while Ian Smith's régime stood fast and became stronger with every passing day. All that was in contradiction with the principles enshrined in the Charter. His delegation was surprised at the weakness of the measures which the United Kingdom delegation had allegedly taken to bring down the white minority régime in Southern Rhodesia. It was convinced that, faithful to the idea which had prompted it to bring the question before the Security Council a few months previously, the United Kingdom Government must immediately take further steps to crush the Rhodesian rebellion.

401. His delegation supported the Chairman's statement and hoped that the Security Council would soon have an opportunity to consider the Southern Rhodesian question in the light of recent events.

402. The representative of Ethiopia pointed out that the Special Committee had drawn the attention of the Security Council to the gravity of the situation in Southern Rhodesia as early as April 1965 and had called upon the United Kingdom Government to take urgent measures in that Territory. The Security Council had subsequently adopted resolution 202 (1965) concerning Southern Rhodesia and the provisions of that resolution had been endorsed by the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) on 25 October 1965. After the unilateral declaration of independence, the Security Council had adopted resolution 217 (1965), which called upon States to break all economic relations with Southern Rhodesia and to impose an embargo on oil and petroleum products. Notwithstanding all those efforts, there was a greater need than ever for action to restore the rights of the African population and it was a major part of the Committee's duty to use the United Nations forum to keep world opinion informed on the matter and to renew its appeal to the conscience of the United Kingdom Government.

403. Recent developments in Southern Rhodesia might be referred to as a farce, were it not for the human tragedy involved. The only possible conclusion from the sequence of events was that the administering Power had known from the beginning that there would be an illegal seizure of power by the Ian Smith government. That government had rejected the United Kingdom offer to set up a royal commission to amend the 1961 Constitution and its negotiations with the United Kingdom in October 1965 had been followed almost immediately by Mr. Smith's announcement that Southern Rhodesia would become independent by Christmas 1965. The preparations made by the Government in the ensuing weeks had obviously been a prelude to the unilateral declaration of independence on 11 November 1965 and to the assumption of full control by the illegal minority.

404. The United Kingdom Government, on the other hand, had been strikingly reluctant to display its wonted firmness in dealing with disorder and illegality. It had imposed some vague and ineffective sanctions, having already made it quite clear that force would not be used in the event of a unilateral declaration of independence. Mr. Wilson's announcement on 11 November 1965 that his Government did not contemplate any national or international action against the illegal régime of Southern Rhodesia had only helped that régime to entrench itself. It was therefore not surprising that the declaration of independence placed so much stress on "kith and kin". While Mr. Wilson had been telling the world that, if the legal Governor of Southern Rhodesia asked for help, the United Kingdom would fully consider the request, the Governor's proclamation dismissing Ian Smith and his Ministers had been barred from publication in Southern Rhodesia. Even when the Governor had been deprived of all signs of office, Mr. Wilson still had not thought there was enough provocation to justify action. Nor had the mass intimidation of the African population convinced the United Kingdom Government of the urgent need for action.

405. At the meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers at Lagos, Nigeria, in January 1966, Mr. Wilson had finally agreed that the use of force could not be precluded if it proved necessary to restore law and order. The need to use force to dislodge the illegal régime had been abundantly proved; any further delay would amount to deliberate support of Ian Smith and his fellow rebels. The use of force had been requested by the Organization of African Unity as early as 25 October 1965, by the Episcopal Church of Rhodesia and by the Archbishop of Canterbury.

406. The half-hearted manner in which economic sanctions were being implemented had fully justified Ethiopia's scepticism. Like the United Kingdom assurance that no force would be used, the progressive nature of the sanctions was designed to reduce the effect of each stage and further assist the rebels. The purchase of tobacco was declared illegal only if the tobacco was for sale abroad. Thanks to the embargo, Southern Rhodesia copper could be sold on the open market at higher prices, giving an extra profit of about £3 million a year. Large foreign concerns continued to supply Southern Rhodesia with spare parts and equipment free of charge.

407. The calculated leniency of the United Kingdom Government contrasted with the firm stand adopted by the retrograde Governments of South Africa and Portugal. Both before and after the unilateral declaration of independence, the Verwoerd Government had stated that it would maintain economic and other relations with Southern Rhodesia. Even before the unilateral declaration, Portugal had given the sovereignty of Southern Rhodesia de facto recognition by accepting a Mr. Reedman as "Chief of the Rhodesian Mission" to Lisbon.

408. The failure of the oil embargo was catastrophic. The flow of oil into Southern Rhodesia was increasing and not decreasing; 70,000 gallons of fuel were arriving daily from South Africa and Mozambique. Greek tankers had recently defied the United Kingdom and headed for Beira. The depraved Portuguese colonialists had made it clear that oil entering Territories under their subjugation would reach Southern Rhodesia. The reluctance of the United Kingdom to use force in that matter had been explained by a desire to avoid loss of life. The fact, however, that lives were being lost in the racist prisons of Southern Rhodesia and that lives had been lost in Kenya, British Guiana, India and Aden did not appear to cause the United Kingdom any concern. Since Southern Rhodesia depended on oil for only 27 per cent of its energy needs and had all the assistance it required in that regard, the only solution was to use direct, firm and unequivocal force. If economic sanctions were to be effective, the United Kingdom Government would have to use force against South Africa and Portugal, but since the United Kingdom Government had already declined to use force even against the settlers, it would obviously not do so against those two States.

409. The Special Committee should urgently recommend that the Security Council should decide upon enforcement measures under Chapter VII of the Charter to end the highly explosive situation in Southern Rhodesia. The Ethiopian delegation had recommended the adoption of such measures during the consideration of the question in the Security Council in November 1965. Together with many other delegations, it had not been satisfied with the manner in which the Security Council had recently handled the question of Southern Rhodesia. The draft resolution submitted by the United Kingdom and adopted by the Council on 9 April 1966 was limited and inadequate in many respects. The amendments submitted by the three African members of the Council with the aim of strengthening and broadening the text had unfortunately been rejected. The Special Committee should therefore request an urgent meeting of the Council to consider the question of Southern Rhodesia in the light of Chapter VII of the Charter.

410. The representative of Australia stated that there was a serious misunderstanding in some quarters about the Australian Government's policies and actions with regard to the situation in Southern Rhodesia. Yet his Government's position had been clearly explained in many statements and particularly in the note dated 28 January 1966 from the Permanent Representative of Australia addressed to the Secretary-General.¹¹ The Australian Government's economic sanctions against Southern Rhodesia were not merely declarations of principle in the absence of economic ties but actual discontinuance of trade, with consequent economic sacrifices. Although it had been necessary to go through certain parliamentary processes, the action of the Australian Government had been prompt and had been completed by 16 November 1965—in other words, before the Security Council resolution of 20 November 1965. The economic measures detailed in document S/7104 meant that Australia had placed an embargo upon 93 per cent of its imports from Southern Rhodesia.

411. On 29 December 1965, the Australian Prime Minister had stated that his Government regarded the unilateral declaration of independence as illegal and would not grant diplomatic recognition to the new régime. He had affirmed that a settlement of the problem should be achieved on the basis of steady progress towards majority rule and the elimination of racial discrimination. The need for an education programme to prepare for majority rule had been mentioned. The Prime Minister had said that Australia supported the United Kingdom sanctions and had imposed sanctions of its own. Australia believed that economic sanctions would induce a return to the conference table; it opposed proposals for the use of armed force in Southern Rhodesia. It supported the Security Council resolution of 9 April 1966.

412. The representative of Denmark said that since the Committee had last discussed the question of Southern Rhodesia the situation had taken a turn for the worse. The Smith régime had declared Southern Rhodesia independent, with the object of establishing yet another State based on racial discrimination in the southern part of Africa. It was continuing in its illegal course, in defiance of the lawful authorities in London and of various United Nations resolutions. In resolution 217 (1965) the Security Council had called upon the United Kingdom to quell the rebellion in Southern Rhodesia and upon all States not to recognize the illegal régime of Ian Smith and to do their utmost to break all economic relations with Southern Rhodesia. His delegation deplored the fact that some Governments did not appear to be willing to comply with that resolution, as had recently been demonstrated when the Security Council had had to call upon the United Kingdom to use force if necessary in order to prevent certain unconcealed breaches in the oil embargo against Southern Rhodesia.

413. In the circumstances, it was clear that the proper United Nations organ to deal with the matter was the Security Council. His delegation considered that, in adopting the resolutions of 20 November 1965 and 9 April 1966, the Council had proved its intention of bringing down the Smith régime with a view to establishing genuine independence with equal rights for all groups of the population in Southern Rhodesia. There seemed to be virtually unanimous agreement about that goal and it would be tragic if differences of opinion regarding the way in which it should be achieved could not be overcome.

414. His delegation would have considered it more suitable for the question to be followed up in the Security Council. The Security Council was the only United Nations organ which had the power to make recommendations or take decisions concerning the measures called for, and his delegation did not think that any other United Nations organ with a limited membership should spell out explicitly what decisions the Council ought to take. The Council's composition and position in the structure of the United Nations were such as to offer the best possible guarantees for a realistic and efficient approach to the problem and the effective implementation of its resolutions.

415. It was encouraging to note that the entire international community—with a few exceptions—had joined forces on the side of the United Kingdom Government in the trial of strength between that Government and the Salisbury régime. The outcome of the action initiated against the Smith régime would have far-reaching repercussions, affecting, inter alia, the situation throughout the southern part of Africa. For those reasons, and in accordance with its traditional positive policy vis-à-vis the United Nations, his country had strictly observed the provisions of Security Council resolution 217 (1965) and had informed the Secretary-General accordingly.¹² His Government considered any action contrary to that resolution to be reprehensible, immoral and irresponsible. It could not avert the fall of the Smith régime and the consequences of such behaviour would be grave perhaps not least for those who now played with fire. It had taken note of the repeated declarations of the United Kingdom Government to the effect that that Government would discharge its responsibility for resolving the Rhodesian constitutional problem. It had noted the steps already taken by the United Kingdom to achieve that end and was fully confident that the United Kingdom would take all the necessary action to fulfil its declared intention of bringing down the Smith régime. The fact that that régime had so far been able to remain in power showed that vigorous action was still needed and would only be effective if there was close co-operation between the United Kingdom and the other Members of the United Nations in carrying it out.

416. He suggested that upon the conclusion of its consideration of the question the Special Committee should transmit the official records of the debate to the Security Council.

417. The representative of India said that recent events had shown that urgent and effective action was essential if the rebellious Smith régime was to be brought down. It had become increasingly clear that to attempt to impose sanctions against Southern Rhodesia alone would not help to achieve the common objective of freeing the oppressed African majority in that Territory. As his delegation had pointed out in the Security Council on 12 November 1965, the question of Southern Rhodesia should not be viewed in isolation from other colonial and racial problems in Africa, since it was intimately and directly connected with the racist and colonial oppression in South West Africa, Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea. That fact had been demonstrated once again by the collusion between the three racist colonial Governments in southern Africa in perpetuating white supremacy there.

418. The representative of the United Kingdom Government had frequently told members that Southern Rhodesia was their Government's responsibility. His delegation was prepared to accept that statement in so far as it meant that the distressing state of affairs in Southern Rhodesia was the outcome of the policies of the United Kingdom Government. If, however, the implication was that the United Nations had no jurisdiction to discuss the issue and to recommend action, his delegation categorically rejected that contention. In fact, the United Kingdom Government itself had approached the Security Council in November 1965 for endorsement and support of the economic measures it was enacting to deal with the situation. It had been repeatedly affirmed in resolutions of the Special Committee and the General Assembly that Southern Rhodesia was a Non-Self-Governing Territory within the meaning of Chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations and that the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples was applicable to it. It was therefore the right and indeed the sacred duty of the United Nations to do all in its power to help the suffering African people of Zimbabwe to achieve their goal of political independence on the basis of universal adult suffrage.

419. The United Kingdom Government had from the outset failed to discharge its responsibilities towards the majority population of Southern Rhodesia. For more than forty years it had allowed itself to be threatened and subjected to pressure by a few hundred Whites in the Territory. While it was possible to explain away the mistakes made by the United Kingdom Government from 1923 to 1965 as inexperience or ignorance of the dishonest motives of the Whites in southern Africa, the same view could not be applied to the United Kingdom actions in 1965. The United Kingdom had been told time and time again by the racists in Rhodesia that their sole objective was complete independence from the United Kingdom on their own terms. The United Kingdom Government had always adopted a meek attitude in its negotiations with the illegal Salisbury régime and had encouraged the white settlers in their fraudulent aims by assuring them that force would not be used in any circumstances. After that assurance, nothing could prevent Ian Smith from pursuing his disastrous policy.

420. On 11 November 1965, a few hours after the illegal Government in Southern Rhodesia had seized power, the United Kingdom Prime Minister had informed Parliament that the United Kingdom Government did not contemplate any national or international use of force to coerce the illegal régime of Southern Rhodesia into a constitutional posture. Although the United Kingdom Government had declared the usurpation of power by the Smith régime a rebellion, it had taken no effective steps to quell that rebellion. The failure to restore constitutional rule in Southern Rhodesia would go down in history as the great betrayal by the United Kingdom Government of the trust placed in it by the African people.

421. The oil embargo which had been announced after a crucial delay of five weeks was doomed to failure. The Whites in Southern Rhodesia had not been greatly affected by the embargo and other economic sanctions, since they could rely on oil and other supplies from their racist and colonial neighbours of Portugal and South Africa. The South African Government had lost no time in stating that it would not participate in any economic sanctions against Southern Rhodesia. It was clear from the Secretariat working paper (paras. 1-335 above) that the South African Government had gone out of its way to help its fellow racists in Southern Rhodesia. By 22 November 1965, the Southern Rhodesian "Trade Commissioner" in South Africa had been able to report that trade between the two countries had returned to the level that had existed before the illegal declaration of independence. It was not possible to determine the exact amount of oil and other petroleum products being sent to Southern Rhodesia from South Africa, since the South African Government had stopped making a distinction between exports and re-exports in its trade figures. The estimates, however, ranged from 35,000 to 70,000 gallons of oil a day. In addition, there was a daily inflow of oil, estimated at about 35,000 to 40,000 gallons, from Mozambique. It had been hoped that the ban on tobacco exports would deal a disastrous blow to the Southern Rhodesian economy. The fact was, however, that the Smith government had been able to guarantee the white farmers the sale of their tobacco at the minimum prices fixed by them.

422. It was in that context that the affair of the two oil tankers must be viewed. While the additional supplies of oil from the two tankers would undoubtedly help the settler régime, the Southern Rhodesian economy depended on oil for only 27 per cent of its energy requirements. Moreover, Southern Rhodesia had already accumulated sufficient stocks of oil and Mozambique was not the only, or the most important, source of supply. To attach undue importance to the tankers was to magnify their role out of proportion and thus to divert attention from the most important supply source, namely, South Africa. If the United Kingdom and others sincerely wished to apply pressure on the white extremists in Southern Rhodesia, effective steps must be taken to close all sources from which the country obtained what it needed.

423. His Government's policy in the matter had been clear and consistent. India did not recognize the illegal Smith régime. It had repeatedly called upon the United Kingdom Government to abrogate the 1961 Constitution and to convene a constitutional conference attended by all sections of the population to draft a democratic constitution based on the principle of one man, one vote. It had severed all diplomatic and economic relations with Southern Rhodesia. It had co-operated fully with the United Nations, the Special Committee and the Organization of African Unity in their efforts to help the people of Zimbabwe to attain genuine independence. It was convinced that concrete and effective measures, including the use of force, must be adopted against the rebellious Smith régime.

424. The representative of Mali said that the problem of Southern Rhodesia was becoming increasingly disturbing and the need for action was obvious to all. His delegation deplored the persistent refusal of the United Kingdom to implement all the resolutions of the General Assembly, the Security Council and the Special Committee on that subject. The United Kingdom had recently come before the Security Council in order to give the world the impression that it was concerned and wanted intervention by the Council. It had sought approval of vague measures of dubious effectiveness. In reality, it had come to plead in favour of the security of Mr. Smith and to protect him from any armed intervention by the United Nations. The administering Power had tried to gain time so that Smith and his clique could strengthen their position. A great deal of fuss had been made about one ship, while tons of petroleum were reaching Southern Rhodesia via South Africa.

425. The United Kingdom Government had declared that it would not use troops in Southern Rhodesia; Smith had thus been assured that the United Kingdom would use its influence in the Security Council to prevent any recourse of force. Indeed, it was the United Kingdom Government which, on its own initiative, had under the 1961 Constitution handed over arms and military power to the racists, despite the warnings of the African States. It could not therefore claim that it was unable to disarm the illegal racist clique. If the United Kingdom had governmental authority in Southern Rhodesia, it should restore law and order there immediately, using force if necessary. A rebellion could not be handled with patience, in the hope that the rebels would capitulate. Smith and his clique had said that they would die rather than hand over power to the majority.

426. Months had elapsed since the Security Council resolution of 20 November 1965. The only result was that Smith had been given time to reorganize his economic structure and regain stability after the initial shock. The United Kingdom Government refused to use force, although it had not hesitated to imprison men like Gandhi, Nehru, Jagan, Nkrumah and Archbishop Makarios. It had not hesitated to use force in Nyasaland, Kenya and Aden to massacre defenceless citizens. Admittedly, in those cases the people had been coloured, while in Southern Rhodesia they were white settlers. The only explanation for the inaction of the United Kingdom Government was that it was guilty of racial prejudice and discrimination.

427. The reactionary forces of racism and fanaticism in Southern Rhodesia had long been supported and encouraged by powerful financial circles in the Western world. South Africa and Portugal, in particular, had given direct aid and encouragement; they were acting in concert with the Smith régime to perpetuate white supremacy and the economic exploitation of the Africans. The foreign monopolies rejoiced at the success of Smith and the complaisance of the United Kingdom because they had branches in Southern Rhodesia. By failing to take the necessary measures to crush the Smith régime, the United Kingdom bore a heavy responsibility for the consequences which might ensue. The United Kingdom was making Portugal a scapegoat and was refusing to act or allow any action against South Africa. As was stated in an article in The New York Times of 12 April 1966, the United Kingdom and South Africa were, in a sense, "economic hostages of each other" and there was doubt about how far the United Kingdom could support sanctions against South Africa. Such doubt was justified, since the United Kingdom had enormous economic interests in South Africa—its third most important customer.

428. The African countries shared the concern felt in certain United States circles about the need for vigorous action if the Smith régime was to be overthrown in the near future. His delegation would support any resolution requesting the application of Chapter VII of the Charter, particularly Articles 41 and 42, and the use of force to crush the white minority régime in Southern Rhodesia.

429. The representative of Tunisia said that unfortunately most of the resolutions on the question of Southern Rhodesia had remained dead letters, while the situation in that country had become increasingly disturbing. Southern Rhodesia was a colonized country, where a handful of settlers, taking advantage of the passivity of the administering Power, had usurped authority for their own benefit and imposed on the indigenous people an oppressive régime which was arousing world-wide indignation. Instead of co-operating with the United Nations, the administering Power had constantly repeated that the problems of Southern Rhodesia came within its own sole responsibility and competence. The deterioration of the situation, the insistence of the United Nations and the stand of the African countries had not persuaded the United Kingdom to admit that its policy was mistaken. Despite its numerous declarations of intention, the administering Power had not implemented the Security Council resolution of 20 November 1965. Contrary to the assertions of the United Kingdom Prime Minister, economic sanctions had not undermined the political strength of Ian Smith or hurt the economy of Southern Rhodesia.

430. The United Kingdom should have foreseen that the sanctions would be ineffective so long as the Smith régime could count on the complicity of South Africa and Portugal. All over the world serious doubts were being expressed about the effectiveness of the sanctions advocated by the United Kingdom Government and there was agreement that the time had come to seek more appropriate and more effective measures. From the outset, the African States had foreseen the ineffectiveness of economic sanctions and had tried to persuade the United Kingdom to use other means, particularly military intervention. Unfortunately that Government had stood by its policy and refused to use force. Only when two tankers had headed for Beira with petroleum for Southern Rhodesia had the United Kingdom asked the Security Council for authority to prevent the tankers from unloading their cargo. The outcome of the Rhodesian crisis did not, however, depend upon the delivery of oil through the Umtali pipeline. The oil embargo would be only partial, so long as Southern Rhodesia could obtain large amounts of petroleum via South Africa. It had so much oil that it had been able to relax the rationing of gasoline in Southern Rhodesia.

431. The United Kingdom was faced with the need to use more appropriate means. Whether it decided to send troops to Southern Rhodesia or to request new action through the United Nations, it was essential for it to show sincere determination to crush the Smith régime and enable the people of Southern Rhodesia to recover their rights and realize their national aspirations. The whole world, and particularly the United Kingdom itself, would gain if the administering Power decided to co-operate with the Organization. Tunisia considered that only armed intervention by the United Kingdom or the United Nations would put into effect the resolutions of the Security Council and the General Assembly and rid Africa of the Smith racist régime.

432. The representative of Sierra Leone said that although after years of manoeuvring to ensure the perpetuation of white rule in Southern Rhodesia the United Kingdom had finally heeded world opinion sufficiently to give some token recognition of the rights of the Africans in the Territory, it had made no attempt to map out a path to lead them to independence. In the present crisis it was behaving with lamentable weakness and its only response to Ian Smith's unilateral declaration of independence had been to call for sanctions. Its action in attempting to shift the blame and to avoid the central issue of independence amounted, in fact, to double dealing.

433. The urgency with which the United Kingdom delegation had called for a meeting of the Security Council was in sharp contrast to the rather tardy approach it had suggested the day previously in the Special Committee and raised serious doubts about the sincerity or the motives of the United Kingdom Government. On 6 April the United Kingdom delegation had reserved its right to comment on the consensus of most of the members of the Special Committee as given by the Chairman, in which it had been suggested that the time had come for the Security Council to consider action under Articles 41 and 42 of the Charter. Its reservations had suggested that the United Kingdom considered the issue to be its exclusive concern and not that of the Special Committee. On the next day, however, although the situation of the oil tankers off the Mozambique coast had not changed, the United Kingdom Government had decided that the issue was an urgent one and had requested a Security Council meeting, at which it had presented a draft resolution.

434. The draft resolution had attempted to shift the responsibility from the United Kingdom Government to the Portuguese Government and had been restricted to the subject of an oil embargo. It had requested the Security Council to give the United Kingdom a mandate—which the Council had clearly given it in operative paragraph 9 of resolution 217 (1965). That manoeuvre by the United Kingdom was an attempt to justify its delay of nearly four months in implementing the Security Council resolution. In addition, by putting the focus on oil, it sought to divert attention from the wider issues of majority rule and independence for Southern Rhodesia.

435. If, as the United Kingdom Government maintained, Southern Rhodesia was a colony, it seemed incredible that that Government would want the United Nations to recommend that it should take any action whatsoever against its own colony. In similar cases, such as the so-called riots in British Guiana and the freedom-fighters in Aden, the United Kingdom had used troops, but when it came to the question of Southern Rhodesia the United Kingdom was reluctant to send troops there. It was, however, encouraging to note that the United Kingdom Government had finally come round to the belief that the situation in Southern Rhodesia constituted a threat to peace and had called for mandatory sanctions against Southern Rhodesia under Chapter VII of the Charter. Since the unilateral declaration of independence on 11 November 1965, the greatest sanction imposed by the United Kingdom and other countries had been on oil. It was stated in a report prepared at the request of the Secretary-General, entitled The Economics and Logistics of an Embargo on Oil and Petroleum Pro- ducts of Rhodesia, that the economy could be significantly affected but that, if the question was one of survival, the availability of oil, in itself, would apparently not be the decisive consideration, that apparently little serious thought had been given to the reality of an oil embargo and that continued access to outside oil supplies seemed to have been a basic assumption.

436. That clearly implied that Mr. Smith and his régime had had prior understanding that they would receive oil. Oil accounted for only 27 per cent of Southern Rhodesia's energy requirements and was used primarily for lubrication and for highway transport, its industries and agriculture depending more on coal and on electric power from the Kariba Dam. Mr. Smith himself had said that the flow of oil to Southern Rhodesia was increasing rather than decreasing. It was reliably reported that Southern Rhodesia was receiving most of that oil via South Africa and Mozambique. According to the working paper prepared by the Secretariat (see paras. 1-335 above), South Africa had decided to stop making a distinction between exports and re-exports in its trade figures, so that it had become much more difficult to discover whether or not South Africa was acting as a channel for embargoed Southern Rhodesian exports or supplying it with embargoed oil. That was an attempt by the South African Government to conceal its nefarious dealings with Southern Rhodesia and to avoid the possibility of an embargo against itself.

437. His Government had always stated that sanctions alone would not topple the Ian Smith régime. There were too many loop-holes. For example, Portugal and South Africa had declared that they would not apply sanctions against Southern Rhodesia. Southern Rhodesia could also rely on assistance from some countries which claimed to be planning sanctions but which left loop-holes that made it possible for almost all supplies to be delivered.

438. The Prime Minister of Sierra Leone had stated at various international conferences that, unless the United Kingdom decided to use force in Southern Rhodesia, very little could be achieved. No credence could be placed in the United Kingdom argument that sanctions alone would bring down the Smith régime. Five months had elapsed since Smith had illegally declared independence. He was receiving supplies of oil, the tobacco crop had been sold and he could command foreign exchange through South Africa and other countries. There were business men in Panama, South Africa, London and the United States who were willing and able to circumvent the sanctions, since most of those countries had not made it mandatory upon their citizens to uphold them.

439. When the General Assembly had adopted resolution 2024 (XX) condemning the unilateral declaration of independence, what had mainly shocked Member States had been the fact that over 4 million Africans were under the domination of 220,000 Whites. The States in the best position to help to alleviate that intolerable situation had been the very ones which had tried by all possible means to assist the Smith régime. That was no doubt because they did not consider that situation to be a threat to their way of life.

440. During the debate in the Security Council, Mali, Nigeria and Uganda had submitted an amendment to the United Kingdom draft resolution which would call upon the Government of South Africa to take all measures necessary to prevent the supply of oil to Southern Rhodesia.¹³ The United States and United Kingdom delegations had found that they could not vote in favour of that amendment, although it would merely have extended the embargo to the only other known route for the supply of oil.

441. The only possible conclusion was that lip service was being paid to an embargo on oil; that the doors were wide open for the supply of oil; and that those Powers were not prepared to put pressure on South Africa and by their negligence were condoning what was happening in South Africa and Southern Rhodesia.

442. In resolution 1514 (XV) and succeeding resolutions the General Assembly had given the Special Committee a clear mandate to liberate all mankind still under colonial rule. The criteria to be used in determining when a country was free were laid down in other resolutions and the conditions obtaining in Southern Rhodesia were the very antithesis of those criteria.

443. It was the clear duty of the Committee to liberate the 4 million Southern Rhodesians and it should call on the United Kingdom to do so with the use of force. All States that were sincere would support any embargo and would assist the United Kingdom in solving the problem by supplying arms where appropriate. The United Kingdom had a duty to the people of Southern Rhodesia as a whole; it should not shirk that responsibility but should proceed with vigour and determination.

444. The 1961 Constitution, which had never been accepted by the majority of the population, should be revoked. The treason of Ian Smith and his régime should be punished and any uprising that might ensue, through the actions of the white Rhodesians, must be put down firmly. A return to the rule of law must be ensured within the next few weeks, if peace and stability were to prevail in the countries of southern Africa. The United Kingdom must immediately implement General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) in respect of the colony of Southern Rhodesia.

445. His delegation would support any draft resolution aimed at strengthening the United Kingdom's determination and at giving the Security Council a clear indication of the action it could take in Southern Rhodesia.

446. The representative of Syria emphasized the gravity of the problem of Southern Rhodesia, which was the consummation of the conquest of the African land of Zimbabwe by a European minority. The reactionary racist character of that situation had grave implications for international peace and security. The argument invoked to justify the subjection of 4 million Africans to oppression and racial discrimination was reminiscent of the darkest days of colonialism. The effectiveness of the United Nations would be completely jeopardized if the situation was allowed to continue. The continent of Africa would not submit to such tyranny; it had so far been patient in order to test the ability of the Organization to honour the principles of its Charter.

447. In the conduct of the administering Power, there were basic contradictions and a wide disparity between words and deeds. The administering Power claimed sole responsibility for Southern Rhodesia, but the measures it adopted to discharge that responsibility were timid, inadequate and half-hearted. The ban on the sale of Rhodesian tobacco and on deliveries of oil to Southern Rhodesia had been a failure. The United Kingdom had dramatized the case of two oil tankers and had asked the Security Council for a mandate to halt them, yet the regular and abundant supplies of oil from South Africa to the Smith régime evoked only subtle diplomatic remonstrances. The Verwoerd régime considered the whole problem of Southern Rhodesia to be a small domestic affair and cared little about the fate of 4 million innocent Africans. When the policies of apartheid had been discussed at the twentieth session of the General Assembly and sanctions against the Verwoerd régime had been envisaged, the United Kingdom had opposed such sanctions on the grounds that they would not work and had dissented from the overwhelming majority opinion. A boycott was useless so long as South Africa and Portugal continued with impunity to meet the vital needs of the Smith régime, while the administering Power shirked its responsibility on the pretext that it had no jurisdiction over the illegal acts of those two colonial Powers.

448. The measures designed to crush the Smith régime were in fact only hardening its resistance. The administering Power was refusing to use force against that régime, although it had made speedy, efficient and heavy use of force in other circumstances against freedom fighters struggling for liberation from the colonialist yoke. In the logic of the United Kingdom, the use of force was legal against just causes but illegal against unjust causes. When he had referred to the use of troops to avert a tragic action such as subversion or murder, the United Kingdom Prime Minister had presumably been thinking not of subversion by the minority against the majority—which did exist in Southern Rhodesia—but of efforts by the Africans to organize themselves into liberation movements.

449. It had been said that the aim of the sanctions was to induce Smith to negotiate. It was not customary, however, to negotiate with criminals. Negotiations, in the last analysis, meant compromise and there could be no compromise over the rights of 4 million Africans to life, self-determination, independence and dignity. The United Kingdom should be asked whether it intended to fulfil its sacred trust as an administering Power or whether it hoped that, as in other tragic cases, events would sanctify the primacy of force over right.

450. Syria adopted an unequivocal stand; it would support the strongest resolution reminding the administering Power of its duties before it was too late.

451. The representative of Algeria, speaking at the invitation of the Chairman, said that fortunately the United Kingdom had not been able to paralyse the activities of the Special Committee by opening an incomplete debate on the question of Southern Rhodesia in the Security Council, just as the Council resolution of 9 April 1966 had been unable to create a diversion in the search for a solution of the problem of Southern Rhodesia. The Security Council had dealt only with certain marginal aspects of the problem and the United Kingdom drew a distinction between different suppliers. In the case of an oil tanker off Mozambique, it was prepared to enforce the embargo but it maintained an embarrassed neutrality towards the road convoys dispatched by South Africa to Southern Rhodesia.

452. The United Kingdom had wanted to forestall any substantial discussion of the problem of Southern Rhodesia, because it was afraid that a lesson would be drawn from the past five months. Despite the embargo, Southern Rhodesia was receiving large supplies of oil by road and rail and, unless there was a general embargo against South Africa, it was difficult to see how it could have any difficulty in that regard. Southern Rhodesia was able to sell its tobacco through intermediaries who conveyed it to the usual markets. Despite the lack of results, it was still claimed that economic sanctions would bring about the downfall of the de facto régime of Salisbury and that graduated action was required. Such action was, however, impeded by a twofold limitation: the economic and financial pressure exerted by South Africa on the United Kingdom and Portugal's membership in the Atlantic Alliance.

453. If Algeria had been convinced that the recent action by the United Kingdom had been aimed at eradicating the root of the evil, it would have given complete and unreserved support to that action. Instead of dealing with the essential aspects of the problem, however, the United Kingdom had diverted international attention to a secondary element of the situation. By limiting action to the external aspects of the problem, the United Kingdom had sought an endorsement from the Security Council of its determination and goodwill in the question of Southern Rhodesia. By diverting attention to action of necessarily limited scope, that manoeuvre only aggravated the central problem.

454. If it had found that its action inside Southern Rhodesia was inadequate, the United Kingdom could have asked the international community for additional assistance in exerting pressure and imposing sanctions on the Salisbury authorities. The United Kingdom had, however, reversed the roles. Having evaded its responsibilities within Southern Rhodesia, it was seeking to shift the centre of its responsibilities outside that country by its recent request for United Nations authorization to take certain actions. That attitude showed that the United Kingdom itself did not believe in the overthrow of the Smith régime by peripheral action and that ultimately only action directed at the Salisbury authorities could be effective and decisive. The action should also be directed against the Pretoria and Lisbon régimes. Unless such action were taken, there would be a repetition in Southern Rhodesia of the tragedy of Palestine and a serious threat to peace and stability in Africa and the rest of the world.

455. The solution to the problem lay in the complete, faithful and immediate application of all the recommendations made by the General Assembly and the Special Committee. In addition, no Member State should have any relations with Southern Rhodesia, which should be completely sealed off from all supplies. An economic blockade was inconceivable except as a general blockade. Sanctions—including, if necessary, the use of armed force—should be applied to all who did not respect the measures decreed.

456. The United Nations should remind South Africa that its obligations under the Charter required it to respect and comply with the decisions of the Organization. After ensuring the survival of the Salisbury régime by meeting its every need, the South African authorities had declared their willingness to mediate between the United Kingdom Prime Minister and Ian Smith. The scene was set for South Africa officially to take its apartheid "techniques" to Southern Rhodesia. It was ironical that the Pretoria authorities should be offering their assistance in a situation imported from South Africa, which had caused them a cynical satisfaction. Far from giving assistance in abolishing the Smith régime, certain Powers were actually helping to maintain that régime, so that it could join them in a policy based on self-interest and domination.

457. In the opinion of Algeria, to hesitate to take action against Smith was to accept him as a de facto authority. Algeria therefore appealed to all the Members of the United Nations to denounce the complaisance of certain Powers towards the Salisbury régime. Members should realize the danger of the situation, which had been aggravated by recent manoeuvres and which might seriously undermine the Organization.

458. The representative of Ghana, speaking at the invitation of the Chairman, said that, although the problem which the United Kingdom had faced in Southern Rhodesia was not unprecedented in the history of its colonial administration, the United Kingdom had so mishandled the problem that it defied solution. In international forums such as the Organization of African Unity, the Conference of Commonwealth Prime Ministers and the United Nations, Ghana had constantly drawn attention to the delicate nature of the question and to the tragic repercussions that might be expected should the United Kingdom fail to handle the situation with firmness.

459. His country had spared no effort to place the question of Southern Rhodesia in its proper perspective. In searching for a solution to the problem, in consultation with other African States, Ghana had foreseen the intransigence of the minority settler régime in its efforts to defy world opinion and the principles of the United Nations Charter concerning human rights and the self-determination of peoples. It had drawn attention to the vast conspiracy to create in Southern Rhodesia oppressive conditions similar to those in South Africa and the neighbouring Portuguese colonies. The reason why the United Kingdom Government had failed to react swiftly to the acts of defiance of the Smith régime was that it had considerable interests in Southern Rhodesia and the people involved were its kith and kin. It had therefore hedged behind specious arguments and had not acted as it had in other colonial Territories such as British Guiana, Aden and Kenya. Such vacillation on the part of an administering Power could lead to nothing but the series of events which had culminated in the unilateral declaration of independence by Ian Smith in November 1965. The Smith régime had been confident that by taking advantage of the United Kingdom Government's manifestly docile and indecisive attitude towards its illegal actions it would finally induce that Government to accept and respect the independence and sovereignty which it had unilaterally assumed.

460. At the time of the unilateral declaration of independence, when the illegal régime had done everything possible to prevent the representatives of the Crown from carrying out their administrative functions, there had been only inconsequential statements of condemnation and threats of sanctions from the United Kingdom, which had originally been unwilling to agree to an oil embargo against the rebel régime.

461. Various General Assembly resolutions, as also Security Council resolutions 216 (1965) and 217 (1965), had called upon all States not to recognize the illegal régime, to break all economic relations with Southern Rhodesia and to impose an embargo on oil and petroleum products. The Government of Ghana and several other Member States had agreed to give the decision to impose sanctions a chance to prove itself. In pursuance of the resolutions, Ghana had refused to recognize the illegal régime in Southern Rhodesia and had broken off all economic relations with that country; it did not recognize travel documents issued or renewed by the illegal régime; all means of transport, including aircraft to and from Southern Rhodesia, were denied facilities, including the right to fly over Ghanaian territory; all communication channels with Southern Rhodesia had been cut off and Ghana did not provide the illegal régime with arms, equipment or military material.

462. His country had enforced the economic sanctions against the Smith régime, although like many countries it had had strong doubts about their effectiveness, especially since Portugal and South Africa had refused to agree to them. It had realized that the racist Southern Rhodesian régime could not be deterred by the adoption of resolutions, since Smith knew that the nations solemnly undertaking to implement those resolutions would not always do so in practice. Experience had shown that, if economic pressure was to be effective, it must be backed by a readiness and determination to enforce it. As the sanctions had been recommended in the face of abstentions by some and the secret or open hostility of others, it was clear that they had been doomed to failure.

463. Recent events had justified his country's fears. It was common knowledge that South Africa had been aiding the white minority régime in Southern Rhodesia in order to enable it to survive the limited embargo and that Southern Rhodesia's tobacco crop was being sold to certain major international concerns. The recent incidents involving the Greek tankers Manuela and Joanna V were but a few of the many examples that demonstrated the failure of the oil embargo recommended by the United Nations.

464. There appeared to be collusion among several countries to frustrate United Nations efforts to bring the Smith régime to respect the rights of the African majority. In two communiqués addressed to the Secretary-General on 7 and 8 April 1966, the Portuguese Government had pointed out that the United Kingdom aero-naval forces had had the means to stop the two tankers from proceeding on their course but had deliberately refrained from doing so. It had also reported that the banking operations for the purpose of payment had been effected through Dutch banks and that the companies involved in the affair were Greek, Panamanian and South African. In the light of those facts, the Portuguese Government had rejected any responsibility for a situation to which a number of foreign Governments had contributed and which could not have developed against the wishes of the United Kingdom.

465. It was clear that the responsibility for bringing down Smith's illegal régime rested with the United Kingdom. Yet, as the African members of the Security Council had said a few days earlier, that country was unwilling to examine the fundamentals of the problem in order to seek a fair, just and rapid solution.

466. His country had shared the sense of urgency with which the United Kingdom had requested a meeting of the Security Council on 9 April 1966 to ask for a mandate to strengthen its hand in restraining the tanker Joanna V from unloading its oil cargo at Beira. The Council should, however, have examined the root cause of the entire Southern Rhodesian problem, instead of merely adopting superficial and ad hoc decisions which were not sufficiently far-reaching. That was why the African members had proposed certain amendments to the United Kingdom draft resolution. It was significant that the United Kingdom had refused to have its draft resolution amended so as to call not only on Portugal but also on South Africa to enforce the sanctions, although it was common knowledge that South Africa had been undermining efforts at economic sanctions. Furthermore, the United Kingdom representative in the Security Council had been opposed to any discussion of the wider problems raised by the breaches of the oil embargo, although that had clearly been the most opportune moment to urge the Security Council to decide on mandatory sanctions.

467. His delegation wondered how long the United Nations would be told that the United Kingdom was holding consultations with Commonwealth Governments and that the United Kingdom was making gradual progress, while the situation in Southern Rhodesia continued to deteriorate and the illegal Smith régime was establishing itself. It was reliably reported that the Joanna V, which was in Beira, was secretly trying to unload part of its cargo and that the master of the Manuela planned to unload its oil in Lourenço Marques. It was now reported that two more tankers were steaming from Venezuela, carrying cargo destined for Southern Rhodesia. The United Nations could still take action to put an end to that state of affairs, and such action could come at the instance of the Special Committee, whose responsibility it was to ensure the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

468. Ghana called upon the Committee to be guided by the pertinent resolutions adopted by the Organization of African Unity and by the Final Statement issued by the recent eleven-nation African Summit Conference at Nairobi. It was clear that whatever methods the United Kingdom Government had relied upon to crush the illegal Smith régime had failed and that Government should be urged to resort to other measures. The Members of the United Nations must prove their ability to collaborate in a collective effort by agreeing to mandatory sanctions; otherwise the United Nations would fail in its efforts to maintain international peace and security.

469. The representative of Poland recalled that at the twentieth session of the General Assembly his delegation had stated that the policy of the United Kingdom Government towards Southern Rhodesia was and always had been inconsistent with the terms of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. Since then, the situation in Southern Rhodesia had deteriorated still further.

470. The United Kingdom delegation had repeatedly given assurances that developments in Southern Rhodesia were well under control and that patient negotiations would bring results. Events had proved, however, that that had simply given Ian Smith time to strengthen his position and prepare for the unilateral declaration of independence. The United Kingdom Government's policy of non-compliance with United Nations resolutions regarding Southern Rhodesia had therefore been instrumental in paving the way for Smith's usurpation of power. The United Kingdom Government had stated more than once that it was responsible for bringing Southern Rhodesia to independence and the Special Committee was entitled to ask the United Kingdom to fulfil its obligations towards the oppressed people of Zimbabwe.

471. Five months had elapsed since the adoption of General Assembly resolutions 2022 (XX) and 2024 (XX) and Security Council resolution 217 (1965), and it was the Special Committee's duty to review the situation. The working paper prepared by the Secretariat (paras. 1-335 above) enumerated various statements and several United Kingdom Government Orders-in-Council concerning Southern Rhodesia, but it did not provide any particular information about the results of those actions.

472. On 11 November 1965, Mr. Wilson, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, had declared that the Smith régime's unilateral declaration of independence was an illegal and treasonable act. He had, however, ruled out the possibility of United Kingdom military intervention in Southern Rhodesia, unless required for the maintenance of law and order, and had stated that the only way to bring down the Smith régime was to create a situation in which the people of Southern Rhodesia themselves would wish to see a lawful Government in its place. It seemed to the Polish delegation that there was no doubt at all about the wish of the vast majority of the Southern Rhodesian people to see a lawful Government in place of the Smith usurpers. The Secretariat working paper gave many examples of strikes and demonstrations by the African population against the Smith régime.

473. If the United Kingdom Government had really wanted to topple the rebellious Smith régime, it should not have hesitated to act vigorously in its capacity as the administering Power responsible for Southern Rhodesia. The truth was that it was not prepared to carry out its obligations under the United Nations resolutions. It had failed to intervene even in circumstances in which the Smith régime's attitude had been openly provocative to it, and Ian Smith had taken full advantage of its weakness. He had savagely oppressed the African population, changed the Constitution, challenged the British Crown's prerogative of mercy and deprived the Governor of all his powers, yet the United Kingdom Government still contended that there had been no breach of law and order to warrant military intervention.

474. On 1 December 1965 the United Kingdom Government had announced stringent financial restrictions and sanctions against Southern Rhodesia, and on the very next day the Smith régime had announced financial counter-sanctions against the United Kingdom. It might have been expected that Smith's action would cause a stern reaction on the part of the United Kingdom Government; it had indeed caused a reaction but not the reaction expected, for on 14 December 1965 the United Kingdom Government had revised its previous decisions and authorized the resumption of payments of United Kingdom pensions to services and civil service pensioners in Southern Rhodesia.

475. On 11 November 1965 the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom had announced a total ban on purchases of tobacco from Southern Rhodesia, on 1 December 1965 he had extended that ban to almost all Southern Rhodesia's other exports to the United Kingdom, and on 30 January 1966 he had imposed a total ban on United Kingdom exports to Southern Rhodesia, except for certain goods required for humanitarian purposes. Yet the January edition of the Barclays Bank Overseas Review showed that the value of United Kingdom imports from Southern Rhodesia in January 1966 had amounted to £3.814 million, as against a monthly average for 1965 of £2.3 million, and the London Times of 31 March 1966 had reported that the value of United Kingdom tobacco imports from Southern Rhodesia in February 1966 had amounted to £484,000, despite the so-called total ban on imports of tobacco from that country which had been in force since November 1965. United Kingdom exports to Southern Rhodesia had amounted to £453,000 in January 1966 and £672,000 in February. Foreign capital was flowing into Southern Rhodesia at an increasing rate, so much so that the Overseas Review had reported in March that conditions generally on the Rhodesian Stock Exchange had been quiet, with no market trends discernible.

476. Those facts made the ineffectiveness of the sanctions and restrictions imposed against Southern Rhodesia abundantly clear and gave the lie to the United Kingdom Prime Minister's assurance at the Lagos Conference of Commonwealth Prime Ministers that the cumulative effect of the sanctions might well bring the rebellion to an end within a matter of weeks. It was evident that the Smith régime had used the past five months of British inaction to strengthen its position and readjust its economy to the new circumstances. The Deputy Minister of Mines and Lands of the Smith Government had recently stated that new markets had been found for Rhodesian minerals to replace those lost as the result of trade embargoes. The Rhodesian tobacco crop had been sold and the ban on selling oil to Southern Rhodesia was faring no better than any of the other embargoes.

477. The United Kingdom Government must face its responsibilities and take final and decisive steps for the solution of the problem. Indeed, the need for stern, vigorous and broad measures to topple the illegal Smith régime was widely recognized in the United Kingdom Press.

478. Poland firmly supported the Security Council resolution of 20 November 1965 and the resolutions adopted at the twentieth session of the General Assembly on the question of Southern Rhodesia. Its position on the question was clearly stated in documents A/6235 and Add.1 and S/7087 and Add.1.¹⁴ It firmly supported the right of the Zimbabwe people to independence and self-determination in accordance with the principles set forth in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and it felt that the rights of those people could not be made a subject for bargaining. For that reason, it would support any resolution aimed at the speedy elimination of the racist Smith régime and the restoration of the rights of the 4 million Zimbabwe people to independence.

479. The representative of Madagascar said that reports in the world Press bore witness to the failure of the United Kingdom's economic sanctions to destroy the authority of the illegal Smith régime. Instead of bringing about an acceptable solution, time had made the situation of the 4 million Africans in Southern Rhodesia still more tragic. It was therefore essential that the Special Committee should discuss the new developments in Southern Rhodesia and make the necessary suggestions.

480. The many resolutions adopted by the Security Council and the General Assembly showed the seriousness of the situation in Southern Rhodesia and the reluctance of the administering Power to intervene in accordance with the wishes of the great majority of the nations. Ian Smith's illegal unilateral declaration of independence had been the logical result of the non-intervention of the United Kingdom in Southern Rhodesia, and it was only right that the United Kingdom should accept responsibility for the fate of the African inhabitants of Southern Rhodesia. The United Kingdom Government's statements of intention must now be translated into action.

481. Security Council resolution 217 (1965) had called upon the United Kingdom Government to take all appropriate measures to bring the minority régime in Southern Rhodesia to an immediate end and had called upon all States to break all economic relations with Southern Rhodesia and refrain from any action which would assist and encourage the illegal régime there. Various financial and economic sanctions had been imposed by the United Kingdom and other countries in implementation of that resolution but they had proved inadequate and Southern Rhodesia had succeeded in selling its tobacco crop and obtaining adequate supplies of oil. Southern Rhodesia's economy was now in a better state than ever, thanks to the criminal complicity of the South African Government. Recent developments had emphasized the role played by the Portuguese Government in undermining the oil embargo, but that role should have been foreseen from the outset for no nation could possibly have expected those two Governments to act in good faith in the matter. Nevertheless, their responsibility for undermining the effectiveness of the economic and financial sanctions did not diminish the responsibility of the administering Power, which had undertaken not only to put down the rebellion but to take steps to enable the people of Southern Rhodesia to decide their own fate on the basis of universal suffrage. So long as the illegal Smith government had nothing to fear from the United Kingdom Government except economic sanctions, it would have no difficulty in overcoming them with the complicity of the Governments of Portugal and South Africa. Indeed, it would even be able to make the Africans who had gone to Southern Rhodesia to work suffer the consequences of those sanctions and the people of Zimbabwe would thus lose all hope of winning their rights.

482. The delegation of Madagascar was convinced that partial measures such as those recently adopted by the Security Council were incapable of achieving a real solution of the problem. The administering Power must therefore consider going beyond such provisional measures and taking coercive action under Articles 41 and 42 of the Charter. The delegation of Madagascar would support any draft resolution along those lines.

483. The representative of Venezuela observed that once again the Special Committee was compelled to consider the abnormal situation prevailing in Southern Rhodesia. Venezuela, for its part, had supported and implemented the various recommendations regarding Southern Rhodesia made by the General Assembly, the Special Committee and the Security Council. It had refused to recognize the racist régime in Southern Rhodesia, had prohibited all acts which might assist or encourage the continued existence of that régime and had prohibited all relations, including economic relations, with it.

484. In particular, the Venezuelan Government had prohibited the supply of petroleum or its derivatives to Southern Rhodesia as long as the Smith régime remained in power. In that connexion, he denied categorically the implication made by the representative of Ghana (para. 467 above). Venezuela did not possess any oil tankers and in no circumstances would the Venezuelan Government permit the sale of petroleum or petroleum derivatives destined for Southern Rhodesia. There were, however, a number of foreign companies operating in Venezuela and obviously once those companies had taken petroleum out of Venezuela and beyond Venezuelan territorial waters the Venezuelan Government had no further control over it and could not be held responsible for sales made by those companies to any specific purchaser. As the members of the Committee were aware, the Geneva Conventions on the Law of the Sea laid down that traffic on the high seas was free, and no State was entitled to interfere with the movements of any ship on the high seas, regardless of its stated or suspected destination.

485. In its reply¹⁵ to the Secretary-General's note concerning the implementation of Security Council resolution 217 (1965), the Venezuelan Government had restated its support for the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council on the question of Southern Rhodesia and its recognition of the inalienable right of the people of Zimbabwe to self-determination and independence, and had formally declared that it would not engage in any action which would assist or encourage the illegal minority Government in Southern Rhodesia, would refuse to supply any military equipment to or maintain any economic relations with that Government and would refuse to supply any petroleum or petroleum derivatives destined for Southern Rhodesia so long as that Government remained in power.

486. Most of the States Members of the United Nations had promised to comply with the Security Council resolution. It was nevertheless perfectly clear that the measures envisaged in the resolution had proved inadequate and the United Nations should therefore consider applying, in accordance with the provisions of the Charter, more effective and appropriate measures.

487. In the opinion of the Venezuelan delegation, the Special Committee should not allow itself to be diverted from its true objective of ensuring the speedy application of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) to all colonial territories, including Southern Rhodesia. The Venezuelan delegation had always held that the United Kingdom, as the administering Power, was responsible for all matters concerning the people of Southern Rhodesia until such time as those people attained independence. Indeed, the United Kingdom delegation had itself categorically proclaimed its Government's exclusive responsibility in the matter. There were no grounds therefore, for trying to shift that responsibility to other States. It was inadmissible to try to reduce the complicated problem of Southern Rhodesia to a few events of marginal importance, when the administering Power could easily prevent those events from having any real effect.

488. It was the duty of the administering Power to bring all the people of Southern Rhodesia to freedom and independence without distinction as to race or colour, and to do its utmost to enable the people of Rhodesia to exercise their inalienable right to self-determination and independence. It was both the right and the duty of the United Nations to induce the United Kingdom to fulfil its obligations towards the Zimbabwe people. The Committee's objective could not be limited to the overthrow of a régime described as illegal by the administering Power, for that would be tantamount to recognizing the legality of the 1961 Constitution, which had been condemned not only by the 4 million Africans of Southern Rhodesia but also by the General Assembly. Legality lay in the will of the people of Rhodesia, who rightly aspired to regain their sovereignty.

489. The Venezuelan delegation considered that the best way of putting an end to the abnormal situation in Southern Rhodesia was the complete and prompt application of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). So long as the principles in that resolution were not put into effect in Southern Rhodesia, the situation of the Zimbabwe people would not change.

490. The representative of Yugoslavia recalled that the question of Southern Rhodesia had been on the agenda of the Special Committee for years but events there had taken a particularly dramatic turn during the twentieth session of the General Assembly, when the racist Smith régime had unilaterally declared independence. The General Assembly and Security Council had thereupon adopted several important resolutions imposing certain obligations upon the Governments of the United Kingdom and other States, but as in previous years the United Kingdom Government had ignored the provisions of those resolutions because of its special interests in Southern Rhodesia.

491. The United Kingdom Government had asserted that it was responsible for Southern Rhodesia and that the Smith régime could rapidly be overthrown, without the use of military force, by the application of economic sanctions and particularly of an oil embargo. Events had given the lie to the United Kingdom Government's claims, however, and the Yugoslav delegation saw no reason to believe that the rule of law could ever be restored in Southern Rhodesia by those means.

492. The economic sanctions and the oil embargo had proved a complete failure. The colonial Powers had striven to maintain the unity of the racist and colonial régimes in the south of Africa, for any real blow to the Smith régime would have repercussions on the colonialist and racist régimes in South Africa and the Portuguese Territories. Both the South African and Portuguese Governments had stated that they would continue to maintain normal relations with the Smith régime, and they were in fact co-operating closely with it. His delegation had doubted the readiness of the United Kingdom to bring down the Ian Smith régime by economic sanctions and it had proved to be right. Indeed, not only had the United Kingdom failed to put an end to the Smith régime, but its attitude had in fact strengthened that régime even further.

493. It was certain that the continued existence of the Smith régime did not depend on the cargoes of one or two oil tankers. Security Council resolution 221 (1966), which related to that problem, was far from covering the important aspects of the situation in Southern Rhodesia. The United Kingdom had requested and obtained from the Security Council authority to prevent tankers from docking at Beira, but it had not been willing to vote for the amendments proposed by Mali, Nigeria and Uganda,¹⁶ which would have given it even broader authority to prevent the flow of oil and other goods into Rhodesia. The very fact that the United Kingdom Government had had to request the use of force, albeit on a limited scale, indicated that it had recognized the untenable nature of its original stand against the use of force. The limited use of force, however, would not produce results: only the large-scale application of force could overthrow Smith's illegal racist régime.

494. Yugoslavia had followed the development of events in Southern Rhodesia with deep concern. Its position on the problem was stated in two Security Council documents.¹⁷ In keeping with that position, the Yugoslav delegation considered that more determined and broader measures, including the use of force, should be undertaken to put an end to the Smith régime, which was a constant threat to world peace and security.

495. The representative of Iraq said that in the past the United Kingdom had always resisted efforts to bring the question of Southern Rhodesia before the United Nations, on the grounds that the Territory was self-governing and that the United Nations had no jurisdiction in the matter. It had opposed the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly and had protected the minority régime in Southern Rhodesia. The fact that it had now turned to the United Nations was not to be interpreted as a change of policy. In calling for an urgent meeting of the Security Council, the United Kingdom had claimed that it wanted a legal international mandate to stop vessels carrying oil reasonably believed to be destined for Southern Rhodesia. It had already had such a mandate, however, by virtue of the various resolutions adopted, in particular Security Council resolution 217 (1965), which, among other things, had called upon the United Kingdom to enforce an embargo on oil. If the United Kingdom was sincere, it was difficult to understand why it had waited so long before coming to the Security Council, a delay that Mr. Smith had used to consolidate his régime. Such a lack of urgency had characterized United Kingdom policy from the beginning.

496. On May 1965 the Commonwealth Relations Office had issued a statement referring to the conclusion of the elections in Southern Rhodesia and the intention of the United Kingdom Government to explore all possibilities of reaching a negotiated settlement of the constitutional question. At a Commonwealth Prime Ministers Conference held in London in June 1965, the Prime Ministers had asked the United Kingdom to introduce legislation to suspend the 1961 Constitution and to appoint an interim government, which was to repeal oppressive and discriminatory laws. The United Kingdom Government had also been called upon to prepare the way for free elections, in the event of a refusal by Mr. Smith, and to introduce democratic rule. Mr. Smith had refused to co-operate. After various negotiations, he had warned the United Kingdom Government in October 1965, prior to another round of talks, that if the talks were not successful he would declare independence unilaterally. He had in fact done so on 11 November 1965.

497. In the face of such defiance, the actions of the United Kingdom Government had been hesitant and useless. The United Kingdom Prime Minister had given an assurance that force would not be used against the Southern Rhodesia régime. According to The New York Times of 17 April 1966, he had also promised that he would not blockade the ports of Mozambique and would not refer the Rhodesian issue to the United Nations. Thus Mr. Smith had been able to proceed with his plans unchallenged. The only response of the United Kingdom Government had been to adopt some economic and financial measures and to state that it would give the fullest consideration to any request for help from the Governor-General, a request which did not seem to have been forthcoming. The most the United Kingdom could point to was the fact that it had built a transmitter near the Southern Rhodesian border as part of its efforts to bring down the Smith régime.

498. On 20 November 1965 the Security Council had adopted resolution 217 (1965), which had called upon the United Kingdom Government to quell the rebellion and take immediate measures to enable the Southern Rhodesian people to determine their own future. Five months had elapsed and there was no sign that the rebellion had been quelled. When referring to the economic sanctions, the United Kingdom Prime Minister had said that a few weeks would be needed to bring Mr. Smith to his senses. The economic sanctions, however, had not worked, since they had been rejected by some Member States and ignored or interpreted at will by others. As far as Security Council resolution 221 (1966) concerning the oil tankers was concerned, it was reliably claimed that Southern Rhodesia could manage without oil from that source, owing mainly to the help of South Africa. The Governments of South Africa and Portugal had made it plain that they would not comply with the resolutions of the Security Council and the General Assembly. Both continued to maintain good relations with the minority régime in Southern Rhodesia.

499. In the circumstances, it was essential that new and drastic measures should be adopted to solve the problem once and for all. Force must now be used to overthrow Mr. Smith's régime and to bring self-determination and democracy to Southern Rhodesia. Effective steps should be taken to prevent South Africa, Portugal and others from assisting the régime. The Security Council should consider the question of Southern Rhodesia again, and in particular the question whether the time had come to invoke Chapter VII of the Charter on the use of force and mandatory sanctions. In his delegation's view, that Chapter should be invoked. Finally, the United Kingdom Government must be convinced that only strong measures, including the use of force, could deal properly with the situation. It had both the authority and the power to take such action and it no longer had any excuse for failing to do so. The General Assembly and the Security Council must demonstrate to the people of Southern Rhodesia that their confidence in the United Nations was justified.

500. The representative of Chile said that the grave situation in Southern Rhodesia deserved to be given the most serious attention by the United Nations. It had deteriorated steadily over the past three years, during which time the Committee and the General Assembly had adopted a number of resolutions warning the administering Power of the dangers inherent in the situation and calling upon it to abrogate the 1961 Constitution and other discriminatory laws and to implement the principle of "one man, one vote". The United Kingdom had refrained from complying with those resolutions on constitutional grounds. If it had made an effort to implement them, it would not now be faced with the rebellion of the Smith régime and the responsibility for putting an end to it. However that might be, once the rebellion had occurred, respect for the law could no longer be invoked as a justification for failing to ensure respect for justice and human rights. There was no longer any pretext for maintaining the discriminatory Constitution of 1961. Until it was abrogated, moreover, there would remain a danger that it would be introduced under some legalistic disguise and its application entrusted to an autonomous Southern Rhodesian Government.

501. It therefore seemed to his delegation that the five principles of the United Kingdom declaration of 9 October 1965, together with the sixth principle referred to in the Prime Minister's statement of 25 January 1966, did not adequately meet the desires of the United Nations, but rather restricted the extent of the changes that could be introduced in the Territory by an interim Government. The power to revoke or amend the 1961 Constitution had clearly been acquired by the United Kingdom Government under the Southern Rhodesia Act of 1965 and should now be exercised.

502. With regard to the action taken to put down the rebellion, his delegation wished to make the following points. Firstly, the Chilean Government supported Security Council resolutions 202 (1965), 216 (1965), 217 (1965) and 221 (1966) and General Assembly resolutions 2021 (XX) and 2022 (XX) and had taken the necessary administrative action to apply the measures adopted against the Smith régime. Secondly, it noted that the sanctions adopted by the United Kingdom had not so far achieved their aim of bringing down the régime. Thirdly, information from the Press and other sources indicated that some countries had refused to co-operate in the economic blockade, and particularly in the oil embargo. That made them accomplices of the racist minority in Southern Rhodesia and if they continued thus to defy the United Nations the results would be serious. Fourthly, the Chilean Government considered that the Security Council would be justified in applying Chapter VII of the Charter, since the situation had become a threat to international peace and security and voluntary measures had not produced results. The Council's resolution 221 (1966) on the oil takers was useful but limited. The machinery of Chapter VII must be set in motion so that general and compulsory measures could be decided on which would bring down the rebel régime. Such measures would also show which countries refused to co-operate with the United Nations in accordance with their legal obligations. In many respects, the outcome of the Southern Rhodesia issue would determine whether the United Nations was capable of establishing an international code of conduct or whether it would dwindle into impotence like the League of Nations after the failure of its sanctions against Ethiopia.

503. The representative of Afghanistan expressed his appreciation of the statements made by members of the Committee and of the interest taken by delegations such as those of Algeria and Ghana, which were not members of the Committee. He quoted passages from a recent issue of The Manchester Guardian Weekly to the effect that no one could be neutral on the Southern Rhodesia issue, that the United Kingdom had retained the right to act by itself and that the people of Africa expected it to do so. That was a reflection of public opinion in the United Kingdom. The Committee was also familiar with public opinion throughout the world, which held for the most part that the measures adopted so far by the United Kingdom were inadequate.

504. His delegation considered that more effective action was required and it regretted the fact that no proposals along those lines had been forthcoming from the United Kingdom. Under the Charter and General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), the people of Southern Rhodesia had an inalienable right to freedom and independence. The United Kingdom had taken no steps to guarantee that right and the situation constituted a threat to international peace and security. His delegation was therefore in favour of a recommendation by the Committee to the Security Council that it should consider the further measures envisaged under Chapter VII of the Charter and put into effect its decisions concerning Southern Rhodesia.

505. The representative of Saudi Arabia, speaking at the invitation of the Chairman, said that it was anomalous for the United Nations to be considering the situation in a country which was still a colony and for which the United Kingdom bore primary responsibility. He preferred to ascribe that situation to the difficulties confronting the United Kingdom in the Territory concerned rather than to the application by that Power of different standards to territories inhabited by white and by coloured races. The fact remained, however, that the United Kingdom was not taking effective action to end the situation in Southern Rhodesia.

506. The reluctance of the United Kingdom Government to use force in Southern Rhodesia was understandable; the British would not want their own kith and kin in that Territory to be subjected to force or the imposition of certain measures. The measures adopted by the United Kingdom so far took the form of a boycott. Yet a boycott could not possibly be effective, in view of the vast area covered by Southern Rhodesia, Mozambique and South Africa, even if a costly supervision machinery were established. There would always be smugglers to ensure that the banned goods reached their destination.

507. The adoption of resolutions that would not be implemented would serve no purpose; the time had come to enable the 4 million Africans in Southern Rhodesia to exercise their right to self-determination. It was said that the time was not ripe for action because there were no disturbances in Southern Rhodesia; but oppressed people could not create disturbances in a police State. If the United Kingdom did not want to act, it should ask the United Nations to make Southern Rhodesia a Trust Territory and take over responsibility for it. In addition, there were certain effective measures which could be taken.

508. There should be a collective operation whereby aircraft flying at a high altitude would bombard

Southern Rhodesia—not with bombs but with educational leaflets addressed to both the white and the coloured population. The leaflets would appeal to the conscience of the Whites, not all of whom were on the side of Mr. Smith, and urge the Africans to stand up for their rights. Various Governments would no doubt be prepared to contribute to such an operation. In addition, there could be regular radio broadcasts addressed to the population of Southern Rhodesia; the United Nations might earmark funds for that purpose. Another effective measure would be for all States Members of the United Nations to refuse to grant entry or transit visas to white citizens of Southern Rhodesia. Those citizens would then feel that they were imprisoned in their own country, which would have a great psychological impact.

509. Those peaceful means should be tried for six months or a year. If they failed, other practical and pragmatic measures would have to be adopted, as they had been in the Congo. The Soviet Union and the United States—as the two world Powers with the greatest authority and the most financial resources—should together, as part of the current rapprochement, play the principal roles. The Asian States, however, were equally concerned about the situation in Southern Rhodesia and had a responsibility towards all the inhabitants of that Territory.

510. The representative of Bulgaria referred to a cable from the German Democratic Republic, which the Chairman had made available to members. He stated that the cable contained an important communication, in which the Government of the German Democratic Republic had expressed its support of the struggle of the people of Southern Rhodesia for liberation. It was clear from the text of the cable that the German Democratic Republic's policy towards Southern Rhodesia was based on the relevant General Assembly and Security Council resolutions.

511. It was regrettable that the United Kingdom delegation had so far not told the Special Committee what action its Government intended to take to bring down the racist régime of Ian Smith. By that strange attitude, the United Kingdom delegation was perhaps trying to give the impression that any examination of the question of Rhodesia at the present juncture would be inappropriate and superfluous, and that it would be logical to await the results of the recent Security Council resolution. The Bulgarian delegation did not share that point of view. It considered, as did the majority of delegations, that the recent meeting of the Security Council, convened in great haste upon the initiative of the United Kingdom delegation, had contributed neither to an understanding nor to a solution of the problem of Southern Rhodesia. During the debates on the question in the Security Council in November 1965 and April 1966, the United Kingdom representatives had stressed that Southern Rhodesia was the responsibility of the United Kingdom and that it lay with that Government to take the necessary steps. The Bulgarian delegation was in full agreement with that statement. Indeed, the present situation in Southern Rhodesia had arisen as a result of the policy pursued by the United Kingdom. It was the United Kingdom which was responsible for the fact that the white minority in Southern Rhodesia had been able to set up a racist régime against the will of the people. His delegation also agreed that it lay with the United Kingdom

Government to take all the necessary action to put an end to that racist régime as soon as possible.

512. It was clear from the statements made in the Committee that the overwhelming majority of members were convinced that the measures adopted so far by the United Kingdom Government were ineffective and would not suffice to bring about the downfall of the racist Smith régime. There appeared to be general agreement that the United Kingdom Government's object in bringing the question before the Security Council in great haste, immediately after its victory in the general election, had been to give world opinion the impression that it had decided to take concrete action, whereas the fact was that the measures it had recommended in its draft resolution could in no way help to achieve the objective sought by earlier resolutions and by the large majority of Member States: namely, the removal once and for all of the racist minority régime and the establishment of a majority Government in Southern Rhodesia.

513. The representative of Uruguay said that there was general agreement that the unilateral declaration of independence and the minority régime in Southern Rhodesia should not be recognized and that the United Kingdom bore primary responsibility for the entire institutional progress of Southern Rhodesia. Uruguay could not agree, however, that the United Kingdom bore sole responsibility in the question. The administering Power was responsible to the United Nations for leading Southern Rhodesia to independence in accordance with Chapter XI of the Charter and General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), transferring all powers and attributes of sovereignty to a representative Government freely chosen by the population. Indeed, the competence of the United Nations and the responsibility of the United Kingdom had been clearly defined by the General Assembly when it had affirmed in resolution 1747 (XVI) that Southern Rhodesia was a Non-Self-Governing Territory. The Uruguayan delegation had expressed its views on that matter in the Fourth Committee at the eighteenth session of the General Assembly.¹⁸

514. The United Kingdom therefore had the power and the obligation to use every means at its disposal to lead the people of Southern Rhodesia to independence through a process of genuine self-determination. As a first step, it should crush the minority régime currently in power. In its resolution of 20 November 1965, the Security Council had called upon the Government of the United Kingdom to quell the rebellion and to take all other appropriate measures to that end. The United Kingdom had not, however, been given carte blanche and was not authorized to take a certain type of measure. Uruguay approved of the United Kingdom decision to request authorization from the Security Council to detain the oil tankers headed for Beira.

515. Because of the lack of success of the measures adopted so far and because of the responsibility of the United Nations in the question, many Member States had been led to assume responsibilities imposed upon them by the Charter and by international solidarity, in a situation for which they were in no way to blame. International action would succeed whenever the great Powers which had the strength and the necessary means were prepared to find an effective solution to the problem.

516. There was a large measure of agreement that the measures of a practical nature which the United Nations should take were within the purview of the Security Council; that fact had been brought out both in the recent resolutions of the General Assembly and in the draft resolution before the Committee. In paragraph 13 of resolution 2022 (XX), the General Assembly had stated that the situation in Southern Rhodesia threatened international peace and security. In resolution 217 of 20 November 1965, the Security Council, using an unusual wording, had stated that the situation was extremely grave and that its continuance in time constituted a threat to international peace and security. In resolution 221 of 9 April 1966 the Security Council had stated, in connexion with the very specific and limited case then under consideration, that the resulting situation constituted a threat to the peace. It was the determination by the Security Council that a situation constituted a threat to international peace and security which made Chapter VII of the Charter applicable and opened the way to enforcement measures. So far, the Security Council had not determined that the situation in Southern Rhodesia in general constituted a threat to international peace and security but it had taken two steps in that direction.

517. The Security Council would therefore have to determine the character of the question and decide on the consequences of that determination—the possible compulsory application of the measures envisaged in Articles 41 and 42 of the Charter. That would be a complex decision, even in so far as it referred to measures not requiring the use of force and particularly when the use of force was involved. Unfortunately, the machinery envisaged in Article 43 for the use of force had not been established, since the necessary forces had not been constituted. The application of measures of force depended on the provision of armed forces in each case by one or more States, so that the automatic, coercive and irresistible impact envisaged in the Charter was lost.

518. The representative of Iran said that, despite United Nations efforts, the situation in Southern Rhodesia had deteriorated to a point where it had assumed new dimensions. The Committee had at first treated the question of Southern Rhodesia like other colonial issues by condemning the continued subjugation of the Zimbabwe people under the oppressive yoke of the racist minority régime and by calling for constitutional conferences and other peaceful means to bring about the freedom and independence of those people. The situation had now changed. It was no longer merely a colonial issue but an actual threat to international peace and security, as had been determined by the Security Council. In view of that finding, the Committee had no choice but to set in motion proceedings for action under Chapter VII of the Charter. It could no longer afford to rely on the goodwill of any particular authority; it must take compulsory action, for the future of the United Nations itself was at stake.

519. More than five months had elapsed since Mr. Smith, in defiance of the United Kingdom, the United Nations and world opinion, had unilaterally declared independence with the avowed intention of perpetuating the white usurper régime and its domination over the Zimbabwe people. Three months had elapsed since the United Kingdom Prime Minister had said that economie sanctions would bring down the rebellious régime in a matter of weeks. It was now generally conceded that the sanctions had failed to achieve their objective.

520. Iran had been the first country to respond to the Security Council's call of 20 November 1965 by ordering a ban on the sale of oil to Southern Rhodesia. The importance of that action could be appreciated in the light of the fact that Iran was the largest exporter of oil to the Territory. Iran had not made a similar declaration with regard to a ban on arms shipments because it had never sent or contemplated sending any arms to Southern Rhodesia. Whatever economic relations it had had with the Territory had been curtailed. By that action Iran was not merely responding to the Security Council recommendations but was demonstrating its unflinching support for the independence and freedom of the Zimbabwe people.

521. The experience of the past few months had shown the need for effective action and for the Security Council to consider the further measures envisaged under Chapter VII of the Charter. Although the United Kingdom's action so far had been inadequate, it was to be hoped that it would now take the kind of action which was necessary in order to bring about the downfall of the Smith régime.

522. According to a news report, the Zimbabwe people were carrying out sporadic demonstrations against the Smith régime in various cities in Southern Rhodesia. Although they were at present armed only with stones, there would come a time when they would be organized and armed with bullets. His delegation earnestly hoped that the United Kingdom would respond positively to the Afro-Asian appeal for effective action before the entire Territory was engulfed in a blood bath.

523. The representative of Italy said that the debate in the Special Committee had been useful in that it had given a number of members which were not on the Security Council an opportunity to express their views with respect to the situation in Southern Rhodesia.

524. The Italian delegation had consistently condemned the attempt by Mr. Smith and his colleagues to establish in Southern Rhodesia a régime based on minority rule and racial discrimination. It was concerned about the fate of the millions of Africans in Southern Rhodesia who, despite the many resolutions of the United Nations, were still denied a voice in determining the future of their country.

525. His delegation felt that the United Nations should adopt a firm yet cautious approach to the question of Southern Rhodesia: firm in stating the principles and goals, and cautious in taking action through the application of the policies which had been adopted. By and large, the action taken so far by various United Nations bodies and more recently by the Security Council—on which the ultimate responsibility rested—had been in line with that approach.

526. The Italian Government had fully supported the decisions of the Security Council on Southern Rhodesia and had done its utmost to implement them. In addition to the measures described in documents S/7016 and S/7048,¹⁹ the Italian Government had recently decided to submit to licence all imports from Southern Rhodesia, a measure which supplemented the total ban previously adopted on all imports of sugar and tobacco from that country, and it had suspended and rescinded all forms of insurance provided by Government bodies in connexion with exports to Southern Rhodesia. As early as December 1965, it had imposed a total embargo on exports of oil and petroleum products to that Territory.

527. The Italian Government regretted that the relevant Security Council resolutions had not been fully implemented by all Members and hoped that the countries which had failed to do so would realize that it was in their best interest to co-operate with the United Nations in re-establishing the rule of law in Southern Rhodesia.

528. The central theme of the debate was whether the measures so far adopted by the Security Council were adequate to bring down the Smith régime. Although that régime was still in power, it had been reported that the sanctions imposed by the Security Council and implemented by the overwhelming majority of Member States had seriously weakened the Territory's economy. The day was perhaps not far off when the illegal authorities of Salisbury would be brought to reason. While his delegation shared the feelings of impatience that had been voiced, it felt that some time must elapse before a well-founded judgement could be made on the effectiveness of the measures so far adopted. Simple wisdom and the spirit of the Charter suggested that the objective universally sought should be achieved, in the first instance, by means which were the least destructive. In an increasingly interdependent world, no action should be taken in one area without the repercussions elsewhere having been considered.

529. The representative of the Ivory Coast said that since 1960 numbers of resolutions on the subject of Southern Rhodesia had been adopted by the Special Committee, the General Assembly and even the Security Council. There had been so many developments in the situation that there was apparently no longer any profound disagreement on the subject. He used the word "apparently" advisedly, for many delegations which banded together when it came to adopting important decisions against the present régime in Southern Rhodesia did not hesitate to recognize the legitimacy of the Zimbabwe people's struggle against the advocates of discrimination and the enemies of democracy.

530. So just were the claims of the unhappy Zimbabwe people that even the United Kingdom, in a praiseworthy effort of understanding, had twice taken the initiative in asking for a meeting of the Security Council to consider the question of Southern Rhodesia.

531. It was not simply the destiny of a distant African country that was at stake, but the future of the United Nations itself. It was perhaps for that reason, rather than out of compassion, that his delegation had struggled unceasingly to bring about the restoration of justice in Southern Rhodesia and unequivocally condemned all the countries which were trying to nullify the pressure that was being brought to bear on the illegal régime in Southern Rhodesia.

D. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Consensus adopted by the Special Committee concerning recent developments

532. At its 401st meeting, on 6 April 1966, the Special Committee agreed to adopt as its consensus the statement made by the Chairman at that meeting (see paras. 340-345 above), it being understood that the reservations expressed by some members would appear in the record of the meeting. In the statement, the Chairman drew the attention of the Secretary-General to the appalling state of affairs in Southern Rhodesia and asked him to alert the President of the Security Council to take steps to bring it before the Council for necessary action under Articles 41 and 42 of the Charter of the United Nations. Reservations concerning the Chairman's statement were expressed by the representatives of the United Kingdom, United States, Denmark, Italy, Australia, Uruguay, Chile and Venezuela (see paras. 379-389 above).

Adoption of resolution on the question of Southern Rhodesia

533. At its 405th meeting, Afghanistan, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, the United Republic of Tanzania, Venezuela and Yugoslavia submitted a draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.272 and Add.1). Subsequently Afghanistan, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, the United Republic of Tanzania, and Yugoslavia submitted a revised version of this draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.272/Rev.1).

534. Introducing the revised thirteen-Power draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.272/Rev.1), the representative of Syria said that the draft resolution reflected the three facts that had emerged from the general debate in the Committee.

535. Firstly, the situation remained grave and had far-reaching international consequences; the problem of Southern Rhodesia was a stubborn and dangerous one arousing the conscience of mankind. Secondly, the United Kingdom Government had failed to deal with the situation. Its recent ambiguous and dubious appeal to the Security Council for a partial mandate to enforce an oil embargo was further proof that a situation for which the United Kingdom bore sole responsibility had been wilfully mishandled. Thirdly, there was an urgent need for more efficient measures to deal with that deteriorating situation, with a view to upholding the principles of the Charter and implementing the resolutions of the United Nations.

536. Operative paragraph 1 of the draft resolution reflected a polarity in the problem of Southern Rhodesia: on the one hand, there was a majority of 4 million Africans with an inalienable right to freedom and independence and, on the other hand, a tyrannical minority of white European settlers completely disregarding that right. The paragraph therefore reaffirmed the inalienable rights of the people of Southern Rhodesia and recognized the legitimacy of their struggle for the enjoyment of those rights in accordance with the United Nations Charter. Operative paragraph 2 recalled resolution 2022 (XX), in which the General Assembly had condemned the policies of racial discrimination and segregation practised in Southern Rhodesia as a crime against humanity. Such a crime called for action. Operative paragraph 3 therefore condemned the failure of certain States to implement the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly, the Special Committee and the Security Council. Operative paragraph 4 called upon the administering Power to take all effective measures, including the use of force. That Power could not argue against the use of force, since it had used force in other circumstances, for example in Aden. Since, as stated in operative paragraph 5, the explosive situation in Southern Rhodesia continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security, adequate measures to remedy that situation should be sought and the Security Council should consider measures under Chapter VII of the Charter, as was recommended in operative paragraph 6.

537. Basically, the draft resolution was invoking the authority of the Charter to deal with a human situation. It was thus putting into practice the terms and provisions of the Charter, so that they became binding on Member States. By adopting the draft resolution, the Committee would be sharing with the people of Zimbabwe the burden of their tragedy and the suffering of their humiliation.

538. The representative of Sierra Leone said that the sponsors of the draft resolution felt that the time had come for the United Kingdom Government to take resolute action and for the United Nations to take a firm decision. The United Kingdom had come to realize that sanctions alone could not crush the rebellion and it had therefore asked the Security Council to authorize the use of force to stop the oil tankers. If the United Kingdom could use force to stop tankers unloading at Beira, it could use force to stop the supply of oil from other areas and to crush the actual rebellion in Southern Rhodesia. The economic blockade was known to be a total failure; the draft resolution condemned certain States, particularly South Africa and Portugal, which had failed to implement the relevant resolutions and had given support and assistance to the racist minority régime.

539. The aim of the draft resolution was to end the tragedy in Southern Rhodesia quickly. It therefore suggested that both the United Kingdom Government and the United Nations should take immediate action to end the policies of racial discrimination and segregation practised in that Territory, to establish the rule of law immediately and to allow the people of Southern Rhodesia to enjoy their rights. He was sure that all true friends of the majority of the people of Southern Rhodesia would support the draft resolution, which asked only that the racist minority should be ousted and that the country should be governed by the people who really constituted the majority.

540. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that the sanctions against the Salisbury régime had no real meaning for the African people who were being ruthlessly exploited by that régime. The draft resolution therefore emphasized the need for effective and concrete measures to overthrow the Smith régime. It could be seen from published figures that despite the sanctions trade between the United Kingdom and Southern Rhodesia was increasing and not decreasing. The United States was continuing its tobacco trade with Southern Rhodesia. Southern Rhodesia was receiving large supplies of oil from South Africa. The failure of the sanctions showed that the only way to crush the Smith régime was to use force. That fact was emphasized in the draft resolution, which he commended to the Committee.

541. The debate had brought to light many facts which revealed still further the ruthless nature of the colonial system. The question of Southern Rhodesia would present no great problem if the great Powers were disposed to act in an effective manner in favour of freedom and independence for that country. Time and again delegations had been told not to be impatient but to give the weaker measures time to work. In his delegation's opinion, time was the commodity much needed by the racist minority régime in Rhodesia to consolidate its illegal and criminal position. The African delegations called upon all their friends to support them in their effort to secure the adoption of effective measures—by which they meant the use of force—to remove the minority régime.

542. It was high time that force was used in order to effect justice and to give the people of Rhodesia their inalienable right to freedom and independence. It had been argued in the Committee that members should be cautious in speaking about the use of force. It was therefore ironical that in the Security Council it had been the United Kingdom which had brought up the question of using some force. He wondered why such half-hearted measures were advocated. It was the United Kingdom that had allowed the Smith régime to accumulate the modern arms which it was using against the African people. There had been reports in the Press of skirmishes with the Smith forces in Salisbury and of brutal acts committed against the African people. Five months had elapsed since Smith had taken power in Rhodesia. As Africans and as members of human society, the Tanzanian people could not agree to wait while human lives were being sacrificed. He had been glad to see that the draft resolution had received the support of one great Power and he hoped that others would follow.

543. The representative of Bulgaria said that the action taken so far by the United Kingdom Government had proved ineffective and inadequate was reflected in the moderate and well-balanced draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.272/Rev.1) which a number of countries had submitted and which merely asked the Security Council to consider further measures to put into effect its decisions concerning Southern Rhodesia. The very contents of the draft resolution indicated that the discussion of the question in the Special Committee was but one stage on the way to a more substantial discussion in the Security Council with a view to determining what action must be taken to overcome the serious situation in Southern Rhodesia.

544. The Bulgarian delegation considered that the Committee, and in particular the members which by reason of their geographic situation and fraternal ties with Southern Rhodesia felt themselves closer to the question, should pave the way for a careful examination of the problem in the Security Council, so that the Council could adopt measures to remove the racist white-minority régime in that country as soon as possible and to ensure the establishment of a majority Government.

545. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics expressed his delegation's satisfaction that the revised draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.272/Rev.1) reflected the views and proposals which had been expressed during the general discussion more accurately than had the original text. For example, operative paragraph 3 was not simply a general condemnation of States which supported and assisted the racist minority régime in Southern Rhodesia but it specifically condemned the South African racists and Portuguese colonialists who through their criminal actions were nullifying the efforts of the countries that were trying to implement the relevant United Nations decisions. The new wording of that paragraph was a considerable improvement and the Soviet Union delegation was prepared to support it, although it considered that the time was long overdue for the Committee to condemn openly and resolutely all those who, directly or indirectly, had hampered the implementation of the United Nations decisions on the question of Southern Rhodesia, in particular Security Council resolution 217 (1965).

546. The new operative paragraph 4, too, was a great improvement in that it stressed the fact that responsibility for liquidating the racist régime in Southern Rhodesia lay squarely with the administering Power and it implied that power was to be transferred to the people in accordance with the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and with the United Nations Charter.

547. Like many delegations, the Soviet Union delegation considered that the action of the United Kingdom in convening the Security Council had been simply an attempt to remove from the United Kingdom Government the responsibility for its failure to implement the United Nations resolutions and for the deteriorating situation in Southern Rhodesia. His delegation also considered the decision adopted by the Security Council on 9 April 1966 to be a manifestly inadequate measure because it did not provide for a proper solution of the Rhodesian problem.

548. His delegation favoured the adoption of decisions that would provide for the implementation of a broader series of measures designed to put into effect the Security Council resolutions on Southern Rhodesia, including the application of sanctions under Chapter VII of the Charter. Operative paragraph 6 of the draft resolution was therefore perfectly justifiable; it met the requirements of the situation and was in accordance with the wishes of the great majority of delegations. Although it considered some of the preambular paragraphs inadequate, his delegation would vote in favour of the draft resolution as a whole.

549. The Soviet Union Government had supported and continued to support the struggle of peoples for self-determination, freedom and independence. The Soviet Union stood solidly behind the people of Zimbabwe and was ready to co-operate with African countries in assisting those people in their struggle for independence.

550. The representative of Italy said that it was regrettable that the draft resolution before the Committee was worded in such a way as to make it impossible for his delegation to support it. His delegation also regretted that the original text, which might have met with a considerable measure of agreement in the Committee, had been replaced by a new draft which brought up the controversial issue of the use of force. It would be recalled that, during the debate on Southern Rhodesia at the twentieth session of the General Assembly, it had become clear that the Members of the United Nations were deeply divided on that issue. His delegation had reservations regarding the introduction of a paragraph requesting the use of force, although it recognized the great importance of the question of Southern Rhodesia and shared the objective of the African delegations. Its reasons for those reservations were twofold. Firstly, the use of force should be envisaged only as a last resort. Secondly, it found no provision in the Charter empowering the use of force under the terms suggested in the draft resolution. In his delegation's opinion, the introduction of such a dividing issue could only reduce the number of delegations that would support the draft resolution. In addition, the fourth preambular paragraph was misleading, since it did not take into account a number of circumstances and deeds, in particular the fact that the United Kingdom had taken measures and that those measures had been endorsed by the Security Council and implemented by the overwhelming majority of the Members of the United Nations. In his delegation's view the following formula would have been more appropriate: "Considering that the measures taken by the Government of the United Kingdom and endorsed by the Security Council have failed so far to bring down the régime of the racist minority in Southern Rhodesia".

551. Operative paragraphs 5 and 6 should have been worded in such a way as to avoid confusion between the responsibilities of the Security Council and those of the General Assembly. His delegation agreed, however, on the inner meaning of the two paragraphs, namely, that the situation in Southern Rhodesia was fraught with dangerous potentialities and that the Security Council was the appropriate body to consider the implications of the situation and to take whatever action might be necessary. It was for the Security Council, and not the Committee, to indicate whether such action was under Chapter VI or Chapter VII of the Charter. Moreover, it was not necessarily the legal context that ensured the effectiveness of a political action but rather the nature of the measures adopted and the political will to implement them.

552. In view of those considerations, the Italian delegation would abstain in the vote on the draft resolution. In conclusion, he stressed that the Italian delegation had always advocated and whole-heartedly supported the restoration of law and order in Southern Rhodesia and the recognition of equal rights to every inhabitant of that country. Any differences that might exist between his delegation and the majority of the members of the Committee concerned, not the objectives, but only the methods to follow in order to achieve those objectives.

553. The representative of Iraq said that the Italian representative had expressed the view that, had the original draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.272) come before the Committee, it would have commanded a much larger majority than would the revised text. The Iraqi delegation did not consider that the strength of a resolution lay in the amount of support it obtained; it was a well-known fact that in the matter of colonialism weak resolutions usually gained more or less unanimous acceptance, while strong ones did not. His delegation therefore preferred a strong resolution adopted by the majority to a weak resolution adopted unanimously.

554. Secondly, the Italian representative had spoken of the use of force as a last resort. He would point out that five months had already elapsed and he did not think that those who had voted in favour of the various resolutions on Southern Rhodesia had contemplated waiting for years before recommending the use of force. He agreed with the Italian representative that it was the prerogative of the Security Council to recommend the use of force. The reference in operative paragraph 4 of the draft resolution to the use of force was the natural outcome of Security Council resolution 217 (1965), which spoke of "quelling" Ian Smith's rebellion; those who had voted in favour of that resolution had undoubtedly had more in mind than an embargo on oil to "quell" the rebellion. Moreover, operative paragraph 6 of the draft resolution recommended that the Security Council should consider the further measures envisaged under Chapter VII of the Charter, and that Chapter dealt with the use of force.

555. With regard to the Italian representative's comment on the wording of operative paragraph 5, he pointed out that the Security Council had already, in resolution 221 (1966), referred to the situation in Southern Rhodesia as a threat to peace.

556. Although the points mentioned by the Italian representative might prevent that representative from voting in favour of the draft resolution, the Iraqi delegation was convinced that the draft resolution represented the very least that the Committee could adopt.

557. The representative of Italy, speaking in exercise of the right of reply, said that he had always been concerned about the use of the words "strong" or "weak" to describe a resolution: the important thing was that the resolution adopted should be consistent with the aims pursued by the Committee and with the context of the situation under discussion. He had certainly not said that he would have preferred the original draft resolution because it was a "weak" resolution; he had only said that it would meet with a considerable amount of agreement in the Committee and there was no denying that, the larger the majority by which a resolution was adopted, the more weight would it carry.

558. In referring to his remark that the use of force should be only a last resort, the representative of Iraq had spoken of the sad five months that had elapsed since the unilateral declaration of independence. He would remind him that Italy had struggled for a hundred years before achieving unity and independence. The situations were not, of course, comparable, but it was well to consider such matters in some kind of historical perspective. In any case, his main objection to the reference to the use of force in the revised draft resolution was that it did not appear in operative paragraph 6, in which action by the Security Council was contemplated, but in operative paragraph 4, in which the administering Power was called upon to use force. Such a request to the administering Power was contrary to the very spirit of the Charter and the Italian delegation could never agree to it.

559. The representative of the Ivory Coast said that his delegation, which was a sponsor of the draft resolution, was confident that it would be adopted unanimously. The measures recommended in the draft resolution were those which had already been adopted on other occasions; in calling upon the administering Power "to take all effective measures, including the use of force", the draft resolution was only echoing the Security Council, which twice already had taken similar decisions.

560. The representative of Mali said that his delegation hoped that all delegations would support the draft resolution, whose recommendations represented the minimum that the Zimbabwe people were entitled to expect. Operative paragraph 4 merely asked the administering Power to use all the means within its power, including armed force, to put an end to the racist minority régime in Southern Rhodesia. It was the duty of the United Kingdom to take action to safeguard the interests of the Zimbabwe people and to ensure their security. It was to assist the administering Power in exercising its prerogatives that the Malian delegation had co-sponsored the draft resolution.

561. The representatives of the United States of America said that, while his delegation disagreed with certain points in some of the statements that had been made during the debate, and with certain provisions of the draft resolution, it was in general agreement with the objectives sought: namely, democratic government and self-determination and independence for all the people of Southern Rhodesia on a basis acceptable to the people of the country as a whole.

562. The practical steps his country had taken in pursuit of those objectives had been described in detail in the Security Council. His delegation would like to see other countries take similar steps to assist the United Kingdom in discharging its responsibilities towards the people of Southern Rhodesia.

563. His delegation supported those parts of the draft resolution which affirmed the applicability of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) to the question of Rhodesia, attacked the policy of racial discrimination in that country and recognized the legitimacy of the aspirations of the people for the full enjoyment of their rights—rights which it took to include the right of self-determination.

564. On 9 April the Security Council had taken an important step in implementation of the programme of economic measures against Southern Rhodesia. The full impact of that step had yet to be felt and his delegation therefore considered that it was too early to decide as firmly as did the draft resolution what further steps might be necessary. It was therefore unable to concur in the draft resolution and would abstain in the vote.

565. Southern Rhodesia remained one of the most important problems before the Security Council and it was in that forum that the United States would prefer to express its views on policy and the further steps that might be appropriate. It felt that whatever contribution the United States might make to the solution of the problem could best be made there, at the proper time.

566. The representative of Venezuela said that it would be seen from his delegation's statement in the general debate that it had been in general agreement with the substance and form of draft resolution A/AC.109/L.272. It had therefore co-sponsored that draft. Following a decision by the Afro-Asian group in the Committee, however, substantial changes had been introduced in the text, which made it impossible for Venezuela to remain a sponsor. It had serious reservations about the changes made and the final wording of the draft resolution.

567. His delegation could not support operative paragraph 3 of the revised text, which went beyond the terms of reference of the Special Committee. Venezuela was not convinced that the Committee could use the word "condemns"; in the language of the Charter, that word had a precise meaning and entailed serious consequences, which could be decided only by the Security Council. In any case, it would be for the Council itself and not for the Special Committee to "condemn" a State for the non-implementation of its resolutions, with all the ensuing consequences. Indeed, the Council resolution only called upon Member States and did not require or oblige them to implement it. His delegation had on numerous occasions stated its views about the need strictly to respect the exclusive competence of each of the organs of the United Nations, in accordance with the provisions of the Charter.

568. With regard to operative paragraph 4, his delegation had already had occasion to explain that it could not accept the use of force. If some of the great Powers insisted on acceptance of the principle of the delimitation of the competence of United Nations organs, actually refusing to contribute to expenses resulting from decisions taken by an organ they did not consider competent, the small States—including Venezuela—had even more reason to do so. The rights of small States could be effectively defended only if the provisions of the Charter were strictly observed. So far force had been used to impose the will of the strong and take away the freedom of the weak. The Special Committee would not help the people of Southern Rhodesia by assuming the functions of the Security Council. The unilateral use of force would jeopardize the cause of the small States by setting a precedent for a type of action covered by specific provisions in Chapter VII of the Charter. The United Nations was based on the renunciation of the use of force, which was permitted only for individual or collective self-defence, in cases which were strictly specified in the Charter and were to be decided only by the Security Council. Venezuela therefore could not, by its vote, call upon or invite a State to use force unilaterally. It had serious reasons for feeling considerable misgivings about the use of force, even collectively, at the regional or international level. It had even more reason to feel misgivings about any attempt to legitimize the unilateral use of force by any Member State.

569. For those reasons, his delegation would be obliged to abstain in the vote on operative paragraphs 3 and 4 of the draft resolution and it asked for a separate vote on those paragraphs.

570. With regard to operative paragraph 5, for the reasons it had already given, his delegation considered that the Special Committee was not competent to describe any situation as a threat to peace and security. That was a matter within the exclusive purview of the Security Council, under Article 39 of the Charter. The Committee could bring a situation to the attention of the Security Council but it was for the Council to determine the nature of that situation. Venezuela would abstain in the vote on paragraph 5, as it had done in the General Assembly when a vote had been taken on resolution 2022 (XX), to whose paragraph 13 the paragraph in question related. It asked for a separate vote on paragraph 5.

571. His delegation would vote in favour of the draft resolution as a whole.

572. The representative of the United Kingdom recalled that his delegation had raised no objection to the discussion of the question of Southern Rhodesia as a matter of priority, because it understood and shared the Committee's deep concern about that question. The United Kingdom Government had never underestimated the seriousness—indeed, the great difficulties and dangers—of the situation.

573. Much that had been said in the Committee had been misleading and some comments, such as the accusations of complacency, lack of determination or collusion, had been wholly misconceived. In rejecting such misguided imputations, the United Kingdom remained convinced that no useful contribution would be made by pursuing any wrangle about facts or motives. As his delegation had stated recently in the Security Council, at its 1277th meeting, the United Kingdom was not seeking to provoke or to answer provocation. It was constantly concerned with the action needed to achieve purposes on which there was a wide measure of agreement.

574. The action already taken had been extensive and much more effective than many wished to admit. The United Kingdom was grateful to all those who had answered its call to match its own actions in accordance with the Security Council resolution of November 1965.

575. The determination of the United Kingdom Government to end the rebellion and work constantly for a settlement acceptable to the entire people of Southern Rhodesia had been clearly stated and repeatedly confirmed. His Government was persisting and would continue to persist until those declared aims had been achieved.

576. His delegation reserved its position on the substance of the draft resolution, on which it did not wish to comment. In connexion with operative paragraph 4, however, he reminded the Committee that his Government's views on the use of force had been stated on many occasions. With regard to operative paragraphs 5 and 6, its views on the appropriateness of the Committee's making determinations on peace and security were also well known.

577. The United Kingdom would abstain in the vote on the draft resolution as a whole and on any separate paragraphs.

578. The representative of Uruguay said that his delegation would vote in favour of the draft resolution as a whole, which was in conformity with basic principles supported by Uruguay in the question of Southern Rhodesia. However, his delegation would not participate in any separate vote on operative paragraphs 5 and 6, which dealt with attitudes to be adopted by the Security Council. His delegation would like that position to be recorded in the Committee's report.

579. Uruguay would abstain in the vote on operative paragraph 4, as it had done in the vote on operative paragraph 11 of General Assembly resolution 2022 (XX), which embodied the same concept of the use of force.

580. With regard to operative paragraph 3, it would have been preferable not to mention by name certain States which did not bear the principal responsibility in the matter concerned. In all cases of racial discrimination and colonization, Uruguay had no hesitation in condemning States which were directly responsible. In the case under consideration, however, it would have been preferable not to dilute the responsibility by referring to secondary responsibilities.

581. The representative of Denmark regretted that the revised text of the draft resolution went much further than the original version, particularly by referring to the use of force. His delegation would have been able to vote in favour of the original text with only a few reservations, but it did not think that the Committee should take such a drastic step as to recommend the use of force. In the existing delicate situation, all efforts should be concentrated on the adoption and implementation, by agreement between the United Kingdom and the overwhelming majority of Members of the United Nations, of the strongest possible measures designed to oust the Smith régime.

582. Consequently, although Denmark could support most of the paragraphs in the revised draft resolution, it would have to abstain when it was put to the vote. It was more important to see that resolutions obtained the desired goal by unified action than to qualify their wording as "weak" or "strong". The original text of the draft resolution had not been weak; it had been better and more realistic. As a result of the changes made, there would unfortunately be less votes cast in favour of it.

583. The representative of Chile said that his delegation could support most of the changes reflected in the revised text of the draft resolution but not the inclusion, in operative paragraph 4, of an appeal for the use of force by the administering Power. According to the Charter, the use of force was prohibited except under the authority of the Security Council or in cases of self-defence against armed attack. Although it would no doubt be decisive in crushing the rebellion in Southern Rhodesia, the use of force by the United Kingdom would set a dangerous precedent for other colonial cases. The United Nations should not call for the use of force, except by authorization of the Security Council. His delegation's views on that subject had been expressed in the General Assembly during the discussion of operative paragraph 11 of resolution 2022 (XX). It would abstain in the vote on operative paragraph 4 of the draft resolution.

584. Chile would vote in favour of the other paragraphs and of the draft resolution as a whole.

585. The representative of Iraq said that the difference between the original and the revised text was that the revised text condemned the failure of certain States, particularly South Africa and Portugal, to implement the resolutions of the United Nations and called for the use of force by the administering Power. Certain delegations which could not vote for the latter provision might be able to vote for the condemnation of certain States. There should therefore be separate votes on paragraphs 3 and 4.

586. At its 407th meeting, the Special Committee voted by roll-call on the joint draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.272/Rev.1) as follows:

Operative paragraph 3 was adopted by a roll-call vote of 20 to none, with 4 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Chile, Denmark, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Italy, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Yugoslavia.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Australia, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Venezuela.

Operative paragraph 4 was adopted by a roll-call vote of 16 votes to none, with 8 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Republic of Tanzania, Yugoslavia.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Australia, Chile, Denmark, Italy, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Uruguay, Venezuela.

Operative paragraph 5 was adopted by a roll-call vote of 18 to none, with 5 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Chile, Denmark, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Republic of Tanzania, Yugoslavia.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Australia, Italy, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Venezuela.

The draft resolution as a whole was adopted by a roll-call vote of 19 to none, with 5 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Chile, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Australia, Denmark, Italy, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America.

587. The text of the resolution on the question of Southern Rhodesia (A/AC.109/158), as adopted by the Special Committee at its 407th meeting on 21 April 1966, reads as follows:

"The Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

"Deeply concerned about the explosive situation in Southern Rhodesia,

"Recalling General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960,

"Recalling further the Security Council resolutions on Southern Rhodesia, including resolutions 217 (1965) of 20 November 1965 and 221 (1966) of 9 April 1966, the relevant General Assembly resolutions and in particular resolution 2022 (XX) of 5 November 1965, and the relevant resolutions of the Special Committee,

"Considering that the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland has failed to take the necessary and adequate measures to bring down the régime of the racist minority in Southern Rhodesia, and to implement the provisions of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV),

"Noting that some States, including States Members of the United Nations, actively encourage the racist minority régime of Southern Rhodesia by their refusal to implement the pertinent Security Council resolutions, including resolution 217 (1965),

"1. Reaffirms the inalienable rights of the people of Southern Rhodesia to freedom and independence in accordance with the Declaration contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), and recognizes the legitimacy of their struggle for the enjoyment of their rights as set forth in the Charter of the United Nations;

"2. Reaffirms in particular General Assembly resolution 2022 (XX) which condemns the policies of racial discrimination and segregation practised in Southern Rhodesia, which constitute a crime against humanity;

"6. Recommends to the Security Council to consider urgently the further measures envisaged under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations to put into effect its decisions concerning Southern Rhodesia;

"7. Decides to transmit to the Security Council the records of the discussions of the Special Committee on this question;

"8. Decides to keep the question of Southern Rhodesia on the agenda of the Special Committee and to review the situation whenever it considers it necessary."

588. The text of the resolution, together with the records of the debate on the question in the Special Committee, was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 21 April 1966.²⁰

E. SUPPLEMENTARY INFORMATION CONCERNING THE TERRITORY

ACTION TAKEN BY THE SECURITY COUNCIL IN 1966

589. At its 1276th and 1277th meetings on 9 April 1966, the Security Council resumed its consideration of the question of Southern Rhodesia on the basis of a letter dated 7 April 1966²¹ from the representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, requesting the President of the Council to convene an emergency meeting to consider the situation arising from the arrival in Beira of an oil tanker which might result in substantial supplies of oil reaching Southern Rhodesia in contravention of the oil embargo imposed by his Government in accordance with Council resolution 217 (1965) of 20 November 1965. At its 1277th meeting, the Security Council adopted resolution 221 (1966) by 10 votes (Argentina, China, Japan, Jordan, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nigeria, Uganda, United Kingdom, United States of America) to none, with 5 abstentions (Bulgaria, France, Mali, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Uruguay). The text of the resolution is as follows:

"The Security Council,

"Recalling its resolutions 216 (1965) of 12 November 1965 and 217 (1965) of 20 November 1965 and in particular its call to all States to do their utmost to break off economic relations with Southern Rhodesia, including an embargo on oil and petroleum products,

"Gravely concerned at reports that substantial supplies of oil may reach Southern Rhodesia as the result of an oil tanker having arrived at Beira and the approach of a further tanker which may lead to the resumption of pumping through the pipeline of the Companhia do Pipeline Moçambique-Rodésia with the acquiescence of the Portuguese authorities,

"Considering that such supplies will afford great assistance and encouragement to the illegal régime in Southern Rhodesia, thereby enabling it to remain longer in being,

"1. Determines that the resulting situation constitutes a threat to the peace;

"2. Calls upon the Portuguese Government not to permit oil to be pumped through the pipeline from Beira to Southern Rhodesia;

"3. Calls upon the Portuguese Government not to receive at Beira oil destined for Southern Rhodesia;

"4. Calls upon all States to ensure the diversion of any of their vessels reasonably believed to be carrying oil destined for Southern Rhodesia which may be en route for Beira;

"5. Calls upon the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to prevent, by the use of force if necessary, the arrival at Beira of vessels reasonably believed to be carrying oil destined for Southern Rhodesia, and empowers the United Kingdom to arrest and detain the tanker known as the Joanna V upon her departure from Beira in the event her oil cargo is discharged there."

590. The Security Council at its 1278th to 1285th meetings, between 17 and 23 May 1966, resumed its consideration of the question of Southern Rhodesia on the basis of a letter dated 10 May 1966²² by thirty-two African States which requested the President of the Security Council to convene an immediate meeting of the Council on the situation in Southern Rhodesia, in order to examine, under Chapter VII of the Charter, the necessary measures to establish majority rule in Southern Rhodesia in accordance with the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

591. On 11 May, Mali, Nigeria and Uganda submitted a draft resolution on this problem.²³ Under its operative part the Council would: (1) determine that the situation in Southern Rhodesia continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security; (2) call upon all States to apply measures with a view to the complete severance of economic relations and communications with Southern Rhodesia in accordance with Article 41 of the Charter; (3) invite the Portuguese and South African Governments, in particular, to take forthwith the necessary measures under Article 41 of the Charter to sever economic relations and communications with Southern Rhodesia; (4) call upon all States, and particularly the Portuguese and South African Governments, to take all necessary measures to prevent the supply of oil and petroleum products to Southern Rhodesia; (5) call upon the United Kingdom to take the measures provided for in Chapter VII of the Charter in order, by the use of air, sea or land forces, to prevent any supplies, including oil and petroleum products, from reaching Southern Rhodesia; (6) reaffirm the inalienable rights of the people of Southern Rhodesia to freedom and independence in accordance with the Declaration contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), and recognize the legitimacy of their struggle to secure the enjoyment of their rights as set forth in the Charter of the United Nations; (7) call upon the United Kingdom to hold consultations with the leaders of African political parties with a view to the establishment of a régime consistent with the aspirations of the people of Zimbabwe; (8) draw the attention of the United Kingdom to the harmful consequences which the present negotiations might entail for the establishment of a régime based on universal suffrage; and (9) call upon the United Kingdom Government to take all necessary measures, including the use of force, to abolish the racist minority régime in Southern Rhodesia and to ensure the immediate application of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

592. At its 1285th meeting, on 23 May 1966, the Security Council proceeded to vote on the draft resolution. In voting the draft resolution was not adopted. It failed to receive the required majority, receiving 6 votes in favour, 1 against, with 8 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Bulgaria, Jordan, Mali, Nigeria, Uganda, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Against: New Zealand.

Abstaining: Argentina, China, France, Japan, Netherlands, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Uruguay.

Population

593. It will be recalled that the Government Monthly Statistical Report on Southern Rhodesia for January 1966 stated that the population of Southern Rhodesia had reached an all-time high of 4,330,000, with a white population of 224,000 (see para. 123 above). According to the Central Office of Statistics figures released in Salisbury on 28 February 1966, Southern Rhodesia had a net gain of 4,463 white immigrants in 1965, compared with a net loss of 6,722 in 1964.

"Constitutional" developments

594. On 17 February 1966, the Southern Rhodesia "Legislative Assembly" passed the Constitutional Ratification Bill "to ratify the 1965 Constitution" by 48 votes in favour to 2 against. The thirteen-member official opposition, the all-African United Peoples Party, boycotted the vote. The Bill was signed on 18 February 1966 by Mr. Dupont, the "Officer Administering the Government".

595. In a broadcast on 27 March 1966, Mr. Ian Smith stated that he proposed to set up a commission to recommend to his "Government" new constitutional safeguards which would replace in the "1965 Constitution" the provisions governing the alterations to the entrenched clauses.

Emergency Powers Act

596. On 8 March 1966, the Southern Rhodesia "Legislative Assembly" passed the Emergency Powers Amendment Bill by 44 votes to 14. The Bill, which was subsequently signed by the "Officer Administering the Government" purports to widen the circumstances under which the "Officer Administering the Government" may proclaim an emergency, facilitate the issuing of regulations following a declaration of emergency and increase the range of subjects for which emergency regulations can be readily issued.

597. Under the present Act—the Emergency Powers Act of 1960—the Governor can proclaim a state of emergency if he feels there is a sufficient threat to public safety, public order or the maintenance of an essential service, inside Southern Rhodesia. The Ian Smith régime claims that with the declaration of independence these powers are now vested in the "Officer Administering the Government" in terms of the "1965 Constitution".

598. To these powers the amendment purports to add that the "Officer Administering the Government" can declare a state of emergency if "action has been taken or is immediately threatened by the Government of another country of such a nature as to be likely to interfere with the peace, order and good government of Southern Rhodesia".

599. Speaking in the debate in the "Legislative Assembly", the "Minister of Justice and Law and Order", Mr. Desmond Lardner-Burke, stated that Southern Rhodesia must leave no loopholes that its enemies could seize upon to attack and upset and interfere with good government during what he called this vital and crucial stage of its emergence as a sovereign independent State. He stated that the Bill did not introduce startling changes in the Emergency Powers Act of 1960. The "Government" merely wished to make it perfectly clear to all and sundry that every law, resolution of the House and subsidiary legislation passed and in force since 11 November 1965 in terms of the Emergency Powers Act, chapter 33, was valid and beyond a shadow of doubt the law of the land.

600. Referring to the proposals which would allow a state of emergency to be declared in Southern Rhodesia as a result of the actions of any government of another country, he stated that this was a new concept and an obvious one when the threats aimed at Southern Rhodesia from outside were considered.

601. Many of the new emergency regulations—about twenty different sets of regulations—adopted by the illegal régime since the unilateral declaration of independence have been incorporated into the statutory emergency powers under the Bill. These new regulations relate mainly to the control of manpower, censorship and the control of corporations.

Extension of National Service

602. On 25 March 1966, the Smith régime announced a compulsory scheme of registration for all Europeans, Asians and Coloured males in the country between the ages of 17 and 60. The announcement, which was made by Lord Graham, the "Minister of Defence and External Affairs" declared a doubling of the period of peace-time military training which Europeans, Asian and Coloured youth undertake in Southern Rhodesia from four and a half months to nine months. He stated that the compulsory registration was not a call-up but merely a registration of manpower to be used as and when required in the national interest. The extension of the National Service was designed to give Southern Rhodesia a much more efficient territorial force and to produce more young officers to replace a number nearing retirement.

United People's Party

603. On 25 March 1966, the all African Opposition United People's Party which has thirteen members in the Southern Rhodesian "Legislative Assembly" announced that Mr. Chad Chipunza had succeeded Mr. Josiah Gondo as a leader of the Party.

The University College and the illegal régime

604. Over 100 students, mostly Africans, from the University College of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, staged demonstrations on the college campus from 16 to 18 March 1966. The students were protesting against the illegal declaration of independence and the restriction of university students by the illegal régime. On 17 March 1966, the student demonstrators were supported by over thirty lecturers of the university who issued a statement reaffirming their opposition to the illegal régime and deploring the restrictions of the university students by the Southern Rhodesian régime. On 18 March 1966, the police in Salisbury placed a ban on all non-educational public meetings at the university.

605. The lecturers and about 300 African and Asian students also instituted a complete boycott of lectures at the university. It was reported on 25 March 1966 that both the students and lecturers involved in the demonstrations and boycott of lectures had returned to classes.

606. On 13 April 1966, Dr. Walter Adams, Principal of the University College, submitted his resignation to the college authorities after having defied police attempts to recapture an African student who had returned to classes after escaping from a restriction camp at Gonakudzingwa.

Censorship regulations and the Constitutional Council

607. On 12 April 1966, the Constitutional Council of Southern Rhodesia ruled that three Sections of the Emergency Powers (Control of Publications) Regulations, 1966 were inconsistent with the constitutionally entrenched Declaration of Rights. The sections of the Censorship Regulations which the Constitutional Council ruled as inconsistent with the Declaration of Rights and not alternatively covered by the provisions for emergencies in the Constitution deal with the leaving of blank spaces in publications to indicate where material has been censored; the power of the censor to alter headlines or the positioning of material in the publication; and the power of the Director of Information to prohibit an issue of a publication if these regulations have been breached.

608. It is the responsibility of the Constitutional Council under the 1961 Constitution, to test statutory instruments for violation of the Declaration of Rights. The so-called "1965 Constitution" grants the Constitutional Council the same powers as under the 1961 Constitution.

609. On 21 April 1966, the Southern Rhodesian régime announced that it would revoke the sections of the censorship regulations whose legality was questioned by the Constitutional Council. However, other sections of the censorship regulations would remain in force.

Demonstration in Salisbury against the illegal régime

610. On 19 April 1966, demonstrations against the illegal régime broke out in the African townships surrounding Salisbury. According to reports, cars and public buildings were stoned in Harare and in the townships of Highfield, Mufakose and Kambazuma. A gasoline bomb was reported to have been thrown through the window of a clinic in Mufakose.

611. The riot police were reported to have fired warning shots to disperse the demonstrators. On 20

April 1966, the police reported that all was quiet in the African townships. A police spokesman was reported to have stated that they had no reports of any injuries from the warning shots they fired to disperse the demonstrators. Some of the demonstrators were arrested but the police spokesman could not give the exact number.

State of emergency extended

612. On 21 April 1966, the "Legislative Assembly" of Southern Rhodesia, by 43 votes to 13, extended for a further three months the state of emergency which was proclaimed in Southern Rhodesia on 5 November 1965, by the Smith régime. The state of emergency had been extended for three months at the beginning of February 1966.

613. In introducing the motion for extension, Mr. Desmond Lardner-Burke, the "Minister of Justice, Law and Order" stated that by far the most serious threat confronting Southern Rhodesia at present was the further action the United Kingdom might institute to bring down the "Government". United Kingdom action might be instituted, he said, in the light of the fact, unpalatable to the United Kingdom, that economic sanctions and the oil embargo were unlikely to deliver the predicted coup de grâce in the foreseeable future.

Relations with the United Kingdom

614. Mr. N. D. Watson, an Assistant Under-Secretary in the United Kingdom Commonwealth Relations Office visited Southern Rhodesia (and briefly Zambia) from 16 to 28 March 1966. According to United Kingdom Government sources the purpose of the visit was to examine the present organizational structure at the residual office of the United Kingdom High Commission. On 22 March 1966, the Commonwealth Relations Office issued a statement that Mr. Watson was engaged in dealing with harrassments concerning the remaining officials of the United Kingdom High Commission in Salisbury. While in Southern Rhodesia, Mr. Watson held meetings with the "Department of External Affairs" to discuss the position of the United Kingdom High Commission. Mr. Watson also had a number of meetings with Sir Humphrey Gibbs, the Governor, to discuss the United Kingdom Government's policy in Southern Rhodesia and in particular the scope of possible talks with the Smith régime.

615. On 21 April 1966, Mr. Harold Wilson told the House of Commons that Mr. Duncan Watson, the Senior Commonwealth Relations Office Official, who had visited Salisbury in March, had been authorized to meet Mr. Smith to accept representations on his behalf. In spite of repeated inquiries, Mr. Wilson said there had been no response from the Smith régime. A second Commonwealth Relations Office Official, Mr. John Hennings, had since been sent to Salisbury with authority to follow up these moves. He was still there and open to approaches. The major condition laid down by the United Kingdom Government had been that any talks should not imply the recognition of the illegal régime. The United Kingdom, he said, was not prepared to legalize an act of rebellion against the Crown.

616. On 23 March 1966, the illegal régime of Southern Rhodesia announced that the head of the United Kingdom residual mission in Southern Rhodesia, Mr. Stanley Fingland, had been requested to leave the country. A statement issued by the "Minister of Foreign Affairs", Lord Graham, said that following the unilateral declaration of independence, the United Kingdom High Commissioner in Salisbury and the Southern Rhodesian High Commissioner in London were both withdrawn. According to the statement, the Deputy High Commissioners of both countries were to be withdrawn shortly afterwards. The Southern Rhodesian Deputy High Commissioner left the United Kingdom at the end of November 1965 but the United Kingdom Government changed its mind and wished to leave its Deputy High Commissioner, Mr. Fingland, in Salisbury for an indefinite period. The "Southern Rhodesian Government" was not prepared to allow the disparate representation to continue on this basis and had made a request for Mr. Fingland's departure as originally planned. Mr. Fingland left Salisbury on 13 April 1966 and was replaced by Mr. J. Hennings as head of the United Kingdom residual mission.

617. The Smith régime also requested Mr. N. A. I. French, a First Secretary in the United Kingdom High Commission, to leave the country on the grounds that he had taken part in espionage directed at undermining Southern Rhodesia in economic and security matters. These charges were later denied by the Commonwealth Relations Office. Mr. French left Southern Rhodesia on 24 March 1966.

618. On 16 April 1966, Mr. Smith announced in a broadcast that his "Government" had decided to close down Rhodesia House in London and recall the staff. It had also issued instructions for the "British Embassy" in Salisbury to be closed and for their staff to be repatriated. He stated that the action was being taken as a protest against the United Kingdom Government's action in invoking Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations in order to obtain authority to impose a blockade on Beira to prevent oil from reaching Southern Rhodesia. On 19 April 1966, Mr. Hennings stated that he had received written confirmation of the decision of the illegal régime to sever the remaining links with the United Kingdom Government.

619. On 26 April 1966, Mr. Smith informed the Southern Rhodesia "Legislative Assembly" that he was prepared to reopen negotiations with the United Kingdom in an effort to resolve their differences. He was ready for unconditional negotiations with the United Kingdom at any level, at any time and at any place.

620. He said that there was an erroneous belief that he had adopted an obstinate stand whereby he was not prepared to talk to the United Kingdom Prime Minister, Mr. Wilson, or any other representative of the United Kingdom Government. As far as his "Government" was concerned it had never closed the door and was always prepared to take part in constructive discussions with anybody.

621. On 28 April 1966, the "Ministry of External Affairs" of Southern Rhodesia announced that the United Kingdom and Southern Rhodesia had agreed to suspend the withdrawal of their Missions from each other's country for the time being. The announcement said that this move was being made because of the informal talks due to take place between officials of both countries.

Seven Africans reported killed

622. On 29 April 1966, the Southern Rhodesian police reported that they had killed seven African

"terrorists" in a running gun battle in the Sinoia area, about 85 miles from Salisbury. The spokesman of the police said that all seven were members of the Zimbabwe African National Union (ZANU), one of the two African Nationalist parties which had been banned in Southern Rhodesia. Air Force helicopters supported the police unit in its engagement. According to the statement, some arrests were made and those detained indicated they had undergone terrorist training in the People's Republic of China. The members of the band were said to have crossed into Southern Rhodesia from Zambia. The incident was reported to be the first known clash between nationalist guerrillas and Southern Rhodesian security forces since the illegal declaration of independence.

The Organization of African Unity (OAU) and the question of Southern Rhodesia

623. The Council of Ministers of the OAU met in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, from 28 February to 5 March 1966 to review the situation in Southern Rhodesia and examine the report of its Committee of Five. At the end of its meeting the Council of Ministers adopted a resolution in which it: (1) renewed its appeal to all Member States of the United Nations and all peace-loving nations of the world not to recognize the racist minority régime in Rhodesia; (2) called upon the Government of the United Kingdom to apply such effective measures, including the use of force, that would bring about the immediate downfall of Ian Smith's régime; (3) decided to establish a "Committee of Solidarity for Zambia" composed of five members whose task would be to seek appropriate measures of technical and economic assistance by Member States to Zambia; (4) recommended to the Organization of African Unity and interested Governments not to recognize any party and instead to give aid only to such groups of Zimbabwe fighters who were actively engaged within Rhodesia in the fight to liberate their country from the colonialist and racist yoke; (5) called upon all Member States of the United Nations, who had so far not taken any action, to implement the United Nations Security Council resolution of 20 November 1965 and to intensify their efforts for the adoption of other effective measures, including the release of all Zimbabwe leaders from the Nazi-type concentration camps; (6) decided to recommend to all African delegations to the United Nations to assist the Ministers of Algeria, Senegal and Zambia in their efforts to bear upon the Security Council to examine the situation in Rhodesia under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations.

Portugal and the question of Southern Rhodesia

624. On 13 April 1966, the Prime Minister of Portugal, Dr. Antonio de Oliveira Salazar, in a speech in Lisbon, stated that the Southern Rhodesian problem could set off a vast fire with risks even for those who were far afield. All could still be saved but all could also be lost if passions spoke louder than reason. The Southern Rhodesia case had covered the skies of Africa with the blackest clouds but it was not too late to solve it in agreement with the United Kingdom Government. He stated that the United Nations Security Council resolution of 9 April which had empowered the United Kingdom to use force to stop the tankers with oil for Southern Rhodesia from reaching Beira had internationalized an exclusively internal United Kingdom problem. One more false step in solving the Southern Rhodesian problem by the responsible powers could set off a vast fire with risks for all those who considered themselves immune because they were far from the field.

South Africa and the question of Southern Rhodesia

625. On 15 April 1966, the United Kingdom Ambassador to South Africa, Sir Hugh Stephenson, arrived in London for consultations with the United Kingdom Government on matters pertaining to relations between South Africa and the illegal régime.

626. On 16 April 1966, the South African Ambassador to the United Kingdom, Dr. Carel de Wet, called on the United Kingdom Prime Minister, Mr. Harold Wilson, to deliver a message from the Prime Minister of South Africa, Dr. Hendrik Verwoerd. No statement was issued after the meeting but it was reported that the meeting was on the question of Southern Rhodesia.

627. The United Kingdom Ambassador returned to South Africa with a message from Mr. Wilson to Dr. Verwoerd. On 21 April 1966, Sir Hugh Stephenson called on Dr. Verwoerd for talks. No statement was issued after the talks.

Prime Minister of the United Kingdom announces informal talks with Southern Rhodesia

628. On 27 April 1966, Prime Minister Wilson made a statement on Southern Rhodesia in the House of Commons. He informed the House that as the Government had repeatedly made it clear over the past five months, anyone in Southern Rhodesia was free to approach the Governor or the British representative in Salisbury with proposals as to the basis on which a solution of the problem could be reached. As a result of a recent report from the Governor, informal talks between officials had been arranged to examine whether such a basis existed.

629. Mr. Wilson said that he had received a report from the Governor in the previous week, at a time when his private secretary, Mr. Oliver Wright, had just left by air for Pretoria to assist the United Kingdom Ambassador in his talks with the South African Government. He was instructed to leave the aircraft at Salisbury for discussions with the Governor before going on to Pretoria. As a result of Mr. Wright's report on his talks with the Governor, Mr. Wright was instructed to return to Salisbury on 22 April. The Governor then arranged a meeting between Mr. Wright, Mr. Hennings, the representative of the United Kingdom Government in Salisbury, and Mr. Smith.

630. A further talk had been held leading to agreed arrangements for the informal talks which would now proceed. They were informal, directed only to see whether a basis for negotiations genuinely existed; and they were without commitment on either side.

631. In answers to questions after his statement, Mr. Wilson stated that the United Kingdom Government had always been willing to have talks. What had been decisive had been the oil sanctions and the action the United Kingdom had taken recently at Beira with the authority of the United Nations. It was these things which had created the situation in which the talks could now take place. The Governor had played a leading part in promoting the meeting which led to this situation. But he made it plain that these were not negotiations. The United Kingdom Government was not negotiating with the illegal régime.

These were informal talks to see whether there was a basis on which proper negotiations could take place. Regarding the principles that would be embodied in a final settlement, Mr. Wilson said that while there was quite a lot the United Kingdom was prepared to forget and forgive, it would not condone, or be prepared to accept, a settlement that condoned an illegal act, or which failed to satisfy the principles which had been laid down by the United Kingdom Government and which had been accepted by Mr. Smith himself in the negotiations last year. He thought the Commonwealth countries, particularly those who were represented in Lagos, would recognize, as he had said in Lagos, that the economic sanctions would work. Many doubts had been expressed then that they would not be effective. He would not want to prejudice the talks by saying how negotiations would be conducted, what kind of machinery might have to be established, either on a bilateral basis between the United Kingdom Government and representatives of Southern Rhodesia, possibly in the widest sense, or whether other machinery—some of the things discussed before the illegal declaration last year—might have to be incorporated. It would all be discussed in informal talks which were to be conducted away from the direct glare of publicity and away from pressures of all kinds.

632. In the course of the independence negotiations last year, the United Kingdom Government laid down "five principles" as a basis for the negotiations to which it added a sixth principle on 25 January 1966. These six principles are as follows:

(1) Unimpeded progress to majority rule would have to be maintained and guaranteed.

(2) There would have to be guarantees against retrogressive amendments of the Constitution.

(3) Also immediate improvement in the political status of the African population.

(4) Progress would have to be made toward ending racial discrimination.

(5) The British Government would have to be satisfied that any basis proposed for independence was acceptable to the people of Rhodesia as a whole.

(6) There was a need to ensure that regardless of race, there would be no oppression of majority by minority or minority by majority.

Statement by Mr. Smith on informal talks

633. On 29 April 1966, Mr. Smith, speaking at the opening of the Central African Trade Fair, in Bulawayo, stated that Southern Rhodesia would enter the informal talks "determined never to surrender". Southern Rhodesia could not, in fact, even lose. There was room for manoeuvre on both sides, without the surrender of basic principles. Southern Rhodesia was not giving up its independence, but neither was the United Kingdom recognizing the unilateral declaration of independence. Neither side was giving ground. The less said about the talks, the better, so as not to prejudice them before they started. He went on to declare that Southern Rhodesia had proved it could take sanctions.

Further developments on informal talks between the United Kingdom and Southern Rhodesia

634. On 5 May 1966, the United Kingdom Government announced that the informal talks with Southern Rhodesia would open in London in the second week of May 1966. The United Kingdom Government would be represented at the informal talks by Mr. Oliver Wright, private secretary to Prime Minister Wilson (now Ambassador-designate to Denmark) and Mr. Duncan Watson, Assistant Under-Secretary in the Commonwealth Relations Office, who had both been involved in the initial arrangements for the talks. On 5 May 1966, the Smith régime also announced the names of a three-man "delegation" to the informal talks. The "delegation" was to be headed by Sir Cornelius Greenfield, Principal Economic Adviser to Mr. Smith. The other members were to be Mr. Stanley Morris, Chairman of the "Public Service Board" and Mr. Gerald Clarke, Secretary to "the Rhodesian 'Cabinet'".

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENTS

General

635. In addition to the general censorship in force in Southern Rhodesia, the illegal régime has also imposed censorship on the publication of details on how it is containing international sanctions. By the last week of February 1966, the Central Statistical Office in Salisbury had ceased publishing most of its statistical bulletins on the various sectors of the economy. Included in the list of other specifically banned government publications were the regular bulletins on the state of the mining industry and statements which were required from the Reserve Bank of Rhodesia in terms of the Reserve Bank Act of 1964. Most of the normal and regular sources of information on the state of the Southern Rhodesian economy have not been available since the illegal declaration of independence.

636. It will be recalled that on 5 February 1966, the Ian Smith régime gazetted a new set of emergency regulations to strengthen its hold on most aspects of economic activity in Southern Rhodesia. On 8 March 1966, these new regulations, which relate to censorship, the control of manpower, and corporations were incorporated into the purported amendments to the Emergency Powers Act of 1960. In general terms, these regulations include:

(1) Regulation and control of persons employed or engaged in any trade, business, occupation, profession, calling or industry in Rhodesia.

(2) Taking possession or control on behalf of the Government of any property or undertaking.

(3) Regulation and control of persons or corporations carrying on business in Rhodesia.

(4) Acquisition on behalf of the Government of any property other than land.

(5) Entering and search of any premises.

(6) Payments of compensation and remuneration to persons affected by any regulation or order made under this section.

Provision is made for a maximum penalty of a £500 fine or two years imprisonment or both for breaches of these regulations.

Southern Rhodesia tobacco crop

637. United Kingdom trade figures show that the January 1966 imports of Southern Rhodesian tobacco into the United Kingdom totalled £2,460,000, compared with a monthly average of £1,266,000 for past years.

638. A United Kingdom Foreign Office spokesman was quoted on 3 March 1966 as saying that Southern Rhodesian tobacco imported into the United Kingdom in January was bought and fully paid for by United Kingdom importers before the illegal declaration of independence in November 1965.

639. According to the United Kingdom Overseas Trade Accounts for February 1966, British imports from Southern Rhodesia were worth £523,000, of which £484,000 was accounted for by tobacco imports. The tobacco was said to have been imported during January but the papers were processed only during February. This left £39,000 unaccounted for.

640. To counteract the United Kingdom Government's ban on the sale and purchase of Southern Rhodesian tobacco, the illegal régime, on 4 March 1966, brought the tobacco packing and buying sections of the industry under the Emergency Control of the Manpower Regulations. The Manpower Regulations purport to give the illegal régime powers to prevent companies from dismissing their employees and can stop employees from resigning and leaving the country without permission. The new regulations pertaining to the tobacco industry also prevent members of the industry from disclosing information relating to the tobacco sales which were scheduled to begin on 29 March 1966. Persons who break the regulations are liable to a fine of £500 or imprisonment for two years or both.

641. By the end of March 1966, all the major consumers of Southern Rhodesian tobacco, namely, the United Kingdom, the Federal Republic of Germany, Japan, Benelux, the Scandinavian countries, and Australia, had announced that they would not buy any more tobacco from Southern Rhodesia while the Smith régime remained in power. In terms of the 1964 trade figures, over 90 per cent of Southern Rhodesia's tobacco had already been placed under an embargo by exporting countries before the auction sales of the crop for 1966. The main outlet still openly left to tobacco exports is South Africa. In 1964, unmanufactured tobacco accounted for £39,221,735 or 32.83 per cent of the total value of domestic exports or 28.53 per cent of domestic exports and re-exports of Southern Rhodesia.

642. The tobacco crop for 1966 was estimated at 200 million to 240 million pounds in weight. The State Tobacco Corporation is handling the sale of tobacco this year. On 24 March 1966, the Ministry of Agriculture announced a list of reserve prices for different grades of tobacco. The crop would be classified into 273 grades for each of which a price ranging from 1d. to 48d. was fixed. The announcements emphasized that these prices were those on which payments to growers would be based and did not represent the figure which would be the purchase price to tobacco merchants (see paras. 236-238 above). On the average, the prices would fall around 26d (about 31 cents (US)) per pound. The average price of the Southern Rhodesia leaf last year was 33d. (about 39 cents) per pound. Tobacco not sold in the open market would be bought by the Corporation at the reserve price. Over-all, these prices were reported to be higher than was expected and were estimated to have assured the growing industry of between £20 million to £25 million, depending on the size of the crop. It was further reported that this sum should be sufficient to cover the working cost of producing the current crop over-all, although a number of growers were likely to lose in the season if they were paid no more than the support prices for their tobacco.

643. On 25 March 1966, the United Kingdom Government again warned the world's tobacco buyers against taking part in the tobacco auctions scheduled to begin in Salisbury on 29 March 1966. The warning was delivered by Mr. Arthur Bottomley, the Commonwealth Relations Secretary. Under an Order-in-Council made on 7 February 1966, the United Kingdom Government made the export of tobacco from Southern Rhodesia a criminal offence under both British and Southern Rhodesian Law. The Order prohibits not only the export of tobacco but also its sale inside Southern Rhodesia with a view to its being exported.

644. On 26 March 1966, the Chairman of the Tobacco Export and Promotion Council, Mr. John Graylin, stated that the United Kingdom Government had already lost the tobacco war. In an address before the Fourteenth Annual Congress of the Rhodesian Guild of Journalists, he stated that the United Kingdom's hopes of bringing Southern Rhodesia to its knees during the next few months had been scotched. He stated that in the short-term aspect, Southern Rhodesia had won the tobacco war by splitting the sales into internal and external aspects. The internal sales would benefit the farmers immediately but the external sales were a long-term prospect which might not be an easy joke. Mr. Graylin said that whether the auctions were a success or not, and the Tobacco Association had to buy the whole crop, farmers would be paid at least the production price of their crop.

645. The Southern Rhodesian tobacco sales opened in Salisbury on 29 March 1966. On 30 March 1966, sources within the tobacco industry were quoted as saying that for security reasons, it had been decided on the night of 29 March to replace the auction system with one of private bargains. The buyer would decide what grade of tobacco he wanted and then make an offer to the Tobacco Corporation. This was reported to be a further move to protect the identity of the foreign buyers. The President of the Rhodesia Tobacco Association, Mr. Carol Heurthley, said that the private treaty selling was strictly a matter of convenience and would not be adhered to throughout the season.

646. When the tobacco auction sales began on 29 March 1966, special guards and police threw a strict security screen around a huge building on the outskirts of Salisbury where the auction sales were being held. The buildings were declared protected places under the Emergency Regulations for the duration of the auction. Only buyers and authorized officials were allowed inside, and, consequently, no one except buyers and officials of the Tobacco Corporation knew how much tobacco, if any, was sold.

647. On 17 April 1966, the Rhodesia Tobacco Marketing Board announced that farmers could step up their weekly deliveries of tobacco for sale in the Salisbury auctions by 25 per cent. The quota increase was reported to have created considerable speculation that Southern Rhodesia was selling its 1966 crop despite the international sanctions. Other sources also suggested that this could mean that the tobacco crop had turned out to be greater than expected and that the "Government" was anxious to get to the farmers as quickly as possible the guaranteed support price payments for delivered tobacco, so that they in turn could wipe out some of their obligations to the banks and commerce.

648. On 19 April 1966, the Rhodesian Tobacco Marketing Board also announced reserve prices for burley tobacco. They ranged from 1d. to 47½d. a pound, covering a wide range of graded tobacco. The announcement emphasized that these prices were those on which payments to growers would be based and did not represent the figure which would be the purchase price to tobacco merchants.

649. As stated earlier, because of the security screen thrown around the tobacco sales, it was not possible for outsiders to know how much tobacco, if any, was being sold. However, it was reported that some merchants might try to export Southern Rhodesian tobacco from South Africa in the guise of South African leaf, although the two could be distinguished by experts. South Africa could, even without re-exporting Rhodesian tobacco, decide to import more of it for its own needs and in turn export more of its own crop.

650. South Africa normally imports only about 2 million pounds a year of Rhodesian tobacco. It was reported that the South African crop for this season was expected to yield a rather low figure of 59 million pounds which should in any case improve the prospect for imports from Southern Rhodesia. Stocks were also down to a low point (67 million pounds last August) so that there was also scope for restocking.

Southern Rhodesia's sugar crop for 1966

651. On 17 March 1966, the United Kingdom Government announced a ban on all exports of sugar from Southern Rhodesia. According to the Order which is effective under both United Kingdom and Southern Rhodesian law, it is now "illegal for speculators or others to buy Rhodesian sugar and hold it in Rhodesia or elsewhere in the hope of selling it at a profit when legal Government is restored". Those who now bought Rhodesian sugar would acquire no legal right to it and would also not be able to get their money back. Furthermore, all transactions that took place in Southern Rhodesia aimed at the export of sugar were invalid whether the export was to take place immediately or in the future.

652. Southern Rhodesia's sugar industry has expanded almost tenfold during the last six years. The 1965 crop before the illegal declaration of independence was estimated at 250,000 tons. It was expected to reach the 350,000 ton mark in 1966. The world price for sugar was quoted as around £20 per ton.

653. The main buyers of Southern Rhodesian sugar, namely the United States, Canada and the United Kingdom have already placed an embargo on sugar imports from Southern Rhodesia. United Kingdom authorities hoped that Zambia and Malawi which have been dependent on Southern Rhodesia for their sugar supplies would co-operate in this latest ban.

654. Eight Japanese trading houses are reported to have contracted to buy 50,000 tons of Southern Rhodesian sugar worth about £1 million. The Ministry of International Trade and Industry of Japan was reported to have stated on 21 March 1966 that this was the only exception to the ban on imports of sugar which was announced by Japan in late January 1966. The sugar was contracted for before the illegal declaration of independence and the existence of the contract had been known to the United Kingdom since December 1965. The Ministry of International Trade and Industry was reported to have stated that the shipment of the sugar due to take place in April might be postponed. However, the contract was still standing on 22 April 1966.

Mining industry

Chrome

655. On 25 February 1966, a spokesman for the United Kingdom Board of Trade confirmed that a licence had been granted to a United Kingdom firm for the importation of a "consignment" of chrome ore from Southern Rhodesia since the Order-in-Council of 20 January, which prohibited such exports. The spokesman explained that the consignment had been bought and paid for before the Order came into force and was already in a warehouse in Beira awaiting shipment. According to the Board of Trade, although some 9,000 tons of high grade metallurgical chrome ore had been sent to the United Kingdom since 20 January, the shipment was perfectly legal.

656. According to United Kingdom estimates, between 15,000 to 17,000 tons of chrome have been shipped to the United States since the illegal declaration of independence, but like the United Kingdom shipments, all of it was out of Southern Rhodesia before the ban started.

657. On 28 January the United States State Department issued an announcement that the United States Government had requested all United States importers of Southern Rhodesia chromite to comply with the United Kingdom Government's Order-in-Council prohibiting the export of chrome from Southern Rhodesia.

658. As regards the Federal Republic of Germany, chrome is not as yet included in the list of specified items of Southern Rhodesian exports for which import licences are not being granted.²⁴

Copper

659. On 3 March 1966, the "Deputy-Minister of Mines" of Southern Rhodesia, Mr. Dillon, stated in an interview that three new copper mines would probably be opening in the northern area of Southern Rhodesia within the next twelve months. Southern Rhodesia's copper production is about 24,000 tons a year. Mr. Dillon stated that the "Ministry of Mines" was aiming at 30,000 tons within the next two years. If that figure was reached then consideration would have to be given to the installation of a copper refinery. Consideration had already been given to a possible site for the refinery and it was hoped that this would lead to another industry producing copper piping, sheeting and other products.

660. Mr. Dillon also stated that sanctions would not affect Southern Rhodesian sales of copper. The current emphasis on copper mining in Southern Rhodesia was dictated simply by demand and value.

661. The Federal Republic of Germany's list of prohibited imports from Southern Rhodesia does not as yet include copper. The Federal Republic of Germany is reported to have spent £3.3 million on Southern Rhodesian copper in the first nine months of 1965.

Iron ore

662. The Japanese Government announced a ban on imports of Southern Rhodesian pig-iron towards the end of January.²⁵ These were worth £2.4 million in 1964 and represent nearly 85 per cent of the output of the Southern Rhodesian Iron and Steel Corporation (RISCO). RISCO has been declared a "designated industry" by the Southern Rhodesian régime to prevent it from being closed, and a manpower control order has been issued to prevent dismissals of employees. RISCO has shut down two of its three blast-furnaces and one of its two open-hearth steel furnaces and has abandoned a £7 million expansion and modernization scheme. It is reported that this has made about 400 workers, including 100 Europeans, redundant.

663. It was reported in Salisbury on 2 February that the Japanese steel company of Kobe, in which the Japanese Government holds 20 per cent of the shares, had given notice that its Southern Rhodesian iron ore mine was to be closed. The mine is reported to produce 350,000 tons of ore a year.

664. On 13 April 1966, the United Kingdom Government declared illegal the export of iron ore from Southern Rhodesia. A statutory instrument to that effect was made on 7 April and became operational on 13 April 1966. Under this statutory instrument, it is now a criminal offence under both United Kingdom and Southern Rhodesian law to engage in the export of Southern Rhodesian iron ore.

665. Although Japan imposed a ban on the import of pig-iron from Southern Rhodesia in late January 1966, licences were issued thereafter for the import of at least 84,000 tons of iron ore worth roughly £250,000. According to the Ministry of International Trade and Industry of Japan, these imports were being made under contracts concluded before the unilateral declaration of independence.

666. On 14 April 1966, the Japanese Ministry of International Trade and Industry held consultations with the representatives of the steel industry on the situation arising out of the United Kingdom ban on the export of Southern Rhodesian iron ore. It was reported that the steel mills had agreed to postpone the imports for the time being.

Asbestos

667. As of April 1966, manufacturers in the Federal Republic of Germany were reported to be still importing asbestos from Southern Rhodesia on the grounds that switching to other sources of the raw material would involve them in heavy extra costs.

668. Japan was also reported on 21 March 1966 to have outstanding licences for the import of asbestos from Southern Rhodesia. Asbestos is not included in the specified list of Southern Rhodesian exports which have been banned by Japan but fall under the general licencing system introduced for imports from Southern Rhodesia.

Gold

669. According to the Barclays Bank, D.C.O. Overseas Review for April 1966, the Anglo-American Corporation had sunk three new shafts at its mines on the Felixburg gold belt, near Umvuma. Another, at the Tchangwa mine, which was abandoned some years ago because of water difficulties, was being deepened and developed. It is presumed that Southern Rhodesia has no difficulty in disposing of its gold production, which in 1964 amounted to £7.2 million.

Other developments in commerce and industry

670. On 4 March 1966, the Director of the Salisbury Co-ordinating Centre for Commerce and Industry, Mr. W. Livesey, was reported by a South African newspaper to have stated that he had received requests from overseas countries for huge quantities of Southern Rhodesian goods. The list of requests included 3 million tons of soya beans; unlimited quantities of sunflower seed; 100,000 tons of sorghum; 100,000 tons of mealies; 50,000 tons of cotton seed; about 4 million yards of cotton sheeting; "and all we can produce in the way of bismuth, copper, silver, zinc, lead and other minerals". These requests had come from countries in Europe and America and the Middle and Far East. Some of the requests had come from countries supposed to be backing the trade ban.

671. Mr. Livesey was also reported to have said that some of the countries concerned were also prepared to invest in Southern Rhodesian industry. Most of the local firms in Southern Rhodesia ready to diversify and expand were subsidiaries of British companies.

672. On 18 March 1966, Mr. Ian Smith addressed the annual meeting of the Fort Victoria Chamber of Commerce. In his address, he stated that Southern Rhodesia had beaten the United Kingdom sanctions so far and that it was weathering the storm much better than had been anticipated. Southern Rhodesia could look forward to the future with optimism and confidence provided its affairs were handled wisely. He was aware of the heavy burdens being borne by the commercial sector of the economy. The business sector had been successful on the home front and if this was reflected by other sectors they would win the sanctions war and enjoy the fruits of victory. Southern Rhodesia had problems at the moment and no doubt would have more before the present issue was over.

673. It was reported on 15 March 1966 that, according to figures published by the Central Statistical Office in Salisbury (some of the few remaining statistics still being published), new passenger vehicle registrations in January 1966 were 38 per cent lower than in January 1965. The figure was reported to be the lowest monthly figure for at least four years.

674. In a statement made in Bulawayo on 17 March 1966, the "Minister of Commerce and Industry". Mr. B. Musset, appealed to local retailers to buy Southern Rhodesian goods wherever possible, saying he was disappointed that many concerns were placing orders with local industry on a very short-term basis, giving the impression that they were only too anxious to use imported supplies once again, when sanctions were removed.

675. Mr. Musset also stated that the local motor trade—which was reported to be one of the hardest hit by sanctions—would not overcome its problems until the rationing of petrol was ended. He expected too that many motor companies would have to retrench but said it was important to keep skilled workers in the country.

676. On 31 March 1966, the illegal régime extended the Manpower Regulations to cover four of the major motor vehicle assembly plants in Southern Rhodesia.

677. On 3 April 1966, the President of the Associated Chambers of Commerce of Rhodesia, Mr.

Hughes, stated in Johannesburg that sanctions against Southern Rhodesia were not breaking the country's economy but were helping to create a bigger domestic market for locally manufactured goods. Unemployment in Southern Rhodesia had not reached serious levels although there was a measure of unemployment and a shortage of skilled labour. He also said that Southern Rhodesian industrialists wished to expand their exports to South Africa to replace some of their lost trade with Zambia.

678. On 5 April 1966, Mr. Hughes made a further statement in Johannesburg in which he said that the success Southern Rhodesia had achieved in spite of sanctions was far in excess of the most optimistic hopes held by commerce in the country four months ago. The Southern Rhodesia currency remained strong; exports continued at a high level and new supplies were still coming in. Since "independence", vast new opportunities for investment and development had arisen and new business ventures continued to be established. The Southern Rhodesian economy might require eventual repairs but would not be crippled.

679. The Barclays Bank, D.C.O. Overseas Review for April 1966 included a report on Southern Rhodesia's economy. It stated that apart from the Fort Victoria district, retail trading conditions in Southern Rhodesia during February-March reflected buoyant tendencies, with the larger stores experiencing satisfactory turnovers in most departments. Wholesale trade, traditionally quiet at that time of the year, was satisfactory with a slight rise in activity in Bulawayo and turnovers generally comparing favourably with the corresponding period of 1965.

680. A number of small industrial developments to meet local consumer needs were also reported. The Barclays Bank, D.C.O. Overseas Review did not, however, refer to oil supplies or tobacco sales.

Employment situation

681. Although no official statistics are available, press reports indicate that the number of Europeans who have lost their jobs as a result of the economic and financial sanctions might run to over a thousand and that these were isolated cases. It was reported however that a large number of Africans had been laid off. In an address to the Fort Victoria Chamber of Commerce on 18 March 1966, Mr. Ian Smith stated that the United Kingdom and foreign sanctions had hit the Southern Rhodesian African hardest.

682. On 6 April 1966, the "Minister of Labour", Mr. McLean, stated that the "Government" was creating employment opportunities. He stated that since last December, 274 Europeans had been taken into government service. He also said that 1,200 school leavers and a further 300 European, Asian and Coloured school leavers had been found jobs in private enterprise. The "Minister" added that so far this year, the government labour exchange had found jobs for more than 8,000 people.

683. Unemployment to a considerable extent has been arrested temporarily at least by the extension of the Manpower Regulations to certain sectors of the economy. The Manpower Regulations empower the illegal régime to prevent companies from dismissing employees and can stop employees resigning and leaving the country without permission. By April 1966, the Manpower Regulations had been extended to cover all the oil companies at CAPREF, tin and iron and steel industries, the tobacco industry and most of the motor vehicle assembly plants in Southern Rhodesia. Also, the Emergency Powers (Industrial Relations) Act of 23 February 1966 gives the "Minister of Labour" the right to suspend specific provisions of industrial agreements made under the Industrial Conciliation Act, at the request of the employers. It covers most aspects of commerce and industry, but excludes agriculture and railways. Employers may now request alterations in conditions concerning hours of work, short time, leave and remuneration laid down in present agreements. The object is to enable employers, for a temporary period, to alter these conditions of service as an alternative to dismissing workers. It was reported that a number of industries have since cut down on their hours of work to save workers from retrenchment, but no estimates were available.

Related developments in finance and trade

684. The Southern Rhodesian Treasury and Reserve Bank are providing the estimated £20 million-£25 million to finance the purchasing of the tobacco crop by the Tobacco Corporation. The appropriation of this amount, in spite of the credit squeeze by the United Kingdom, has been partly made possible by the availability to Southern Rhodesia of an estimated £10 million-£13 million, in a full year, as the net result of the two-way blockade of interest, dividend and profit payments between the United Kingdom and Southern Rhodesia.

685. According to a statement issued by the "Ministry of Finance" on 15 March 1966, nearly £600,000 of the régime's "independence bonds" which were first issued on 2 February 1966, had been sold in the first six weeks of issue, breaking all previous savings certificate records. Also according to the statement, a medium-term loan of £5 million, which was floated by the "Government" on 28 February, had been fully subscribed by 15 March 1966.

686. It was reported that as a result of these developments, the credit squeeze which the United Kingdom's financial sanctions was expected to impose on the financing of the tobacco crop had not worked as quickly as expected although the commercial banks were still tightly stretched.

687. On 18 April 1966, the "Minister of Commerce and Industry", Mr. B. Musset, stated in Bulawayo that commerce should try to help agriculture in Southern Rhodesia by supplying farmers hit by sanctions or drought with credit over a difficult period. He also urged commerce not to give up franchise for United Kingdom supplied machinery and shipment or this might mean that agriculture would be deprived of vital spare parts. On 19 April 1966, Mr. John Hughes, the President of the Associated Chambers of Commerce of Rhodesia, replied that commerce itself was in no position to carry the agricultural community because it was also affected by the credit squeeze and by the national effort to retain employees in spite of reduced profits and turnover.

688. In his speech on 29 April 1966, at the opening of the Central African Trade Fair in Bulawayo, Mr. Smith stated that Southern Rhodesia had maintained a favourable trade balance since "independence" and the Rhodesian pound had not been devalued as predicted by the pessimists. Since "independence", the "Government" had provided industrialists with foreign currency for more than fifty projects.

689. He also gave economic information not published before. Mineral output last year, he said, was worth a record £32 million and trends in the first quarter of 1966 suggested that this would be bettered. Manufacturing exports amounted to £65 million in 1965—also a record. But he admitted that the index of manufacturing output had fallen 5 per cent in February 1966, because of sanctions. The building plans passed by the local authorities in January and February 1966, were £50,000 higher than in the same month last year. Sixty-five per cent of this was for residential homes.

Economic relations with South Africa

690. On 1 March 1966 the Johannesburg Star quoted the latest issue of the Journal of the South African Foreign Trade Organization which carried a report on South African exports to Southern Rhodesia. According to this report, South Africa could provide Southern Rhodesia with virtually everything it had been importing from the United Kingdom which in 1964 supplied 30 per cent of Southern Rhodesia's total imports. Payments by Southern Rhodesian importers for goods from South Africa presented a potential problem, however, particularly since almost 45 per cent of Southern Rhodesia's gross national product was accounted for by exports.

691. According to the report, there have been no reports of South African exporters experiencing trouble in obtaining payments for their products. Exports insurance for goods sold on credit to Southern Rhodesia was also no more expensive than it was before the unilateral declaration of independence. The article added that the extension of credit by South African exporters would, on the other hand, probably continue only for so long as it seemed likely that payments would be made within a reasonable period. This could be a crucial point in trading relations between South Africa and Southern Rhodesia during the next few months.

692. On 2 March 1966, the Cape Times reported that South African exporters had moved into the trade vacuum caused by the United Kingdom Government's ban on exports to Southern Rhodesia. South African exports of manufactured goods to Southern Rhodesia had risen sharply during the first two months of 1966 and the trend was expected to continue. A strict ban, however, had been placed by the Southern Rhodesia and South Africa Governments on the disclosure of information on the volume of trade and value of trade. According to the report, officials of the South African Department of Commerce and Industry and of the "Rhodesia Trade Commissioners" office in Johannesburg refused to comment on the growing trade. The authorities in Southern Rhodesia were reported to have stated that South African manufacturers were adequately filling the gap left by British manufacturers because of the boycott.

693. It was reported on 8 March 1966 that Southern Rhodesian manufacturers had formed an association to spearhead an export drive into South Africa. Manufacturers with a knowledge of South African conditions and requirements had agreed to pool information for the benefit of the Southern Rhodesian manufacturing industry as a whole.

694. Secretaries to the association, known as the Rhodesia Export Association, had been appointed in Salisbury, Bulawayo and Johannesburg and warehouse facilities had been established in Johannesburg, Cape Town, Durban, Port Elizabeth, East London and Pietersburg. The association would provide Southern Rhodesian manufacturers with information on market potential, transport depots, customs and tariff problems and would help to arrange marketing campaigns.

695. On 3 April 1966, a five-man delegation of Southern Rhodesian businessmen, led by the President of the Associated Chambers of Commerce of Rhodesia, Mr. Hughes, arrived in Johannesburg to attend the Republic Festival Show in Johannesburg. Mr. Hughes stated on arrival that Southern Rhodesian industrialists wished to expand their exports to South Africa to replace some of their lost trade with Zambia. On 5 April 1966, Mr. Hughes also stated in Johannesburg that South Africa and Southern Rhodesia were more economically interdependent now than ever before. He was speaking as leader of the Southern Rhodesian commercial mission which was visiting the Rand Easter Show. The purpose of the visit was to give South African businessmen and others factual information on the present economic situation in Southern Rhodesia and to correct any misconceptions there might be regarding opportunities for two-way trade.

Economic relations with Portugal

696. On 22 February 1966, it was reported from Salisbury that a Southern Rhodesian trade delegation had left secretly for Angola for talks with the Portuguese Government. The talks were said to be a follow-up to meetings held last year, following the signing of a trade agreement between Southern Rhodesia and Portugal. Under the trade agreement, which is to last for an initial period of five years, the signatories agreed to treat each other's products on a "most favoured nation" basis.

697. On 17 March 1966, it was reported from Lisbon that Portugal had taken delivery of a total shipment of 133 tons of Southern Rhodesian beef on trial basis and would decide if it wished to purchase more after gauging the success and the commercial utility of the Southern Rhodesian product.

698. On 6 and 8 April 1966, the Government of Portugal issued two press communiqués in which it reiterated its position of keeping transit facilities from Mozambique open to Zambia, Malawi and Southern Rhodesia. It stated in these communiqués that it would not interfere with goods destined to any of those countries (see paras. 715-716 below).

Southern Rhodesia and the international economic sanctions

699. According to United Kingdom Government estimates, by March/April 1966, Southern Rhodesian exports (on the basis of 1964 figures) had been reduced by 60 per cent by international sanctions. Most of Southern Rhodesia's normal major trading partners had banned all, or most of their imports from Southern Rhodesia. Southern Rhodesia's domestic exports for 1964 amounted to £119,465,000. The 60 per cent of Southern Rhodesian exports affected by sanctions included tobacco, sugar, asbestos, chrome, lithium, ferro-alloys, meat, hides and skins, pig-iron, steel and copper.

700. South Africa, which is not participating in sanctions, imported £9 million of domestic merchandise from Southern Rhodesia in 1964. Portugal which is also not participating in the sanctions imported £700,000 of domestic merchandise into Mozambique from Southern Rhodesia in 1964. It has been estimated that Angola and Portugal took domestic imports from Southern Rhodesia worth £225,000 and £380,000 respectively in 1964.

701. Zambia's imports of domestic merchandise from Southern Rhodesia were valued at £31 million in 1964, most of which were essential items to the national economy. As of April 1966, these imports had declined at an estimated rate of about 30 per cent (or £10 million per annum), following an appeal by the Government to local importers to find alternative supply sources. Malawi, which is in the same predicament as Zambia, since its imports of domestic merchandise from Southern Rhodesia are essential items, also imported £5.6 million worth of goods from Southern Rhodesia in 1964. The Malawi Government has also made an appeal to local importers to find alternative sources of supply (see paras. 305-330 above). There are no current estimates of the impact of this appeal on the trade between the two countries. The Democratic Republic of the Congo, which also imports essential items from Southern Rhodesia, was reported to be in a position similar to that of Zambia and Malawi, although on 1 February 1966 it announced its intention of suspending economic dealings with Southern Rhodesia. In 1964, Southern Rhodesian domestic exports to the Democratic Republic of the Congo were worth £1.5 million.

702. Bechuanaland, which is experiencing serious economic difficulty owing to a prolonged drought, imported £700,000 worth of domestic products from Southern Rhodesia in 1964. No estimates are available as to how far its trade has been affected by the sanctions.

703. Japan has imposed sanctions on about 75 per cent of its imports (by 1964 figures) from Southern Rhodesia. In 1964, Japan imported £5.5 million worth of domestic merchandise from Southern Rhodesia. On 3 December 1965, Japan informed the Secretary-General²⁶ that it was its policy not to import any more tobacco and sugar from Southern Rhodesia except for sugar committed prior to the unilateral declaration of independence. On 1 February 1966, Japan also informed the Secretary-General²⁷ that there would be no further imports of pig-iron from Southern Rhodesia and that hereafter, all imports from Southern Rhodesia would be subject to import licencing by the Japanese Government and that the necessary legal measures had been taken to this effect.

704. It is reported that, according to Japanese officials, the sanctions which were announced in late January 1966, do not cover sugar and iron ore contracts which were negotiated before the unilateral declaration of independence. Accordingly, since the ban was issued, Japan has awarded licences for the import of at least 84,000 tons of iron ore worth £250,000. Most of Southern Rhodesia's iron ore exports go to Japan. It is reported that these exports have continued at a high level since the unilateral declaration of independence. Similarly, Japan has an outstanding contract for 50,000 tons of Southern Rhodesian sugar worth about £1 million. Japan announced further economic sanctions against Southern Rhodesia in June and July of 1966.²⁸

705. Among other Japanese imports from Southern Rhodesia which fall under the licencing system but which have not been banned are copper, asbestos and chrome ore.

706. By December 1965, the Federal Republic of Germany had banned about 70 per cent of its imports from Southern Rhodesia. In 1964, the Federal Republic imported £7.9 million worth of domestic merchandise from Southern Rhodesia. In a note to the Secretary-General dated 4 March 1966,²⁹ it stated that import licences for tobacco and sugar were not being granted. On 24 February, it was reported that the Federal Republic of Germany had decided to extend its ban to include ferro-chrome and pig-iron. The report said that no import licences would be granted in respect of import contracts freshly concluded.

707. Included in the list of imports from Southern Rhodesia which have not been banned by the Federal Republic of Germany are copper, chrome and asbestos.

708. It is reported that the January 1966 import figures, the latest available, show that the Federal Republic of Germany bought Southern Rhodesian goods (including goods of Southern Rhodesian origin purchased from suppliers elsewhere) worth about £1.2 million. That was twice as much as the bill for January 1965. The breakdown for commodities is not available, but it is reported that there may have been a fair amount of stocking up against the possibility of further import bans.

709. It was reported on 22 April 1966, that the United Kingdom had made representations to the Federal Republic of Germany and Japan to tighten their sanctions against Southern Rhodesia.

OIL EMBARGO

Incident of the oil tankers

710. Towards the end of March 1966, a 13,000-ton tanker, the Joanna V, owned by the Varnna Corporation of Panama and flying the Greek flag, was sighted heading for Beira with a cargo of 18,000 tons of crude oil for Southern Rhodesia. The tanker was under charter to the South African Company of A.G. Morrisson of Cape Town. Following representations made by the United Kingdom Government, the Government of Greece, between 26 March and 2 April, sent four separate warning messages to the Greek Captain and owners of the tanker ordering them not to unload oil at Beira for Southern Rhodesia.

711. On the night of 4 April 1966, the United Kingdom frigate Plymouth intercepted the Joanna V off the coast of Mozambique and a United Kingdom officer boarded the ship. The frigate was reported to have been under instructions not to use force. The United Kingdom Foreign Office was quoted as saying that the Master of the tanker had refused a request from the United Kingdom officer that he change his plans to sail for Beira.

712. The Joanna V arrived at the Port of Beira on 5 April 1966. On 6 April the Greek Government cancelled the Greek registration of the tanker and deprived the Master of his licence as a Merchant Navy Master for life.

713. On 5 April 1966, as part of the attempt to prevent the tanker from landing its oil, the Foreign Secretary of the United Kingdom, Mr. Michael Stewart, met with the Chargé d'affaires of Portugal in London, and the United Kingdom Ambassador in Lisbon also called on the Foreign Minister of Portugal, Mr. Alberto Franco Nogueira. It was reported that at both interviews, the United Kingdom Government underlined the heavy responsibility that would fall on the Portuguese Government if the Greek-registered tanker unloaded its cargo at the Mozambique seaport of Beira.

714. On 5 April 1966, Lord Walston, Parliamentary Under-Secretary at the United Kingdom Foreign Office, arrived in Lisbon for talks with Mr. Nogueira on the question of the oil embargo. Lord Walston had three meetings with the Portuguese Foreign Minister before leaving Lisbon for London on 8 April 1966. He was reported to have stated that he was not altogether satisfied with the talks to get Portugal's backing for an oil ban on Southern Rhodesia.

715. On 6 April 1966, the Government of Portugal issued a press communiqué concerning the arrival at Beira of the Joanna V. In this communiqué the Government of Portugal reiterated its position that it had not taken any initiative tending to ensure the supply of oil to Southern Rhodesia; neither purchasing it in the name of that country, nor transporting it in Portuguese ships. In the second place, the Portuguese Government had given and continued to give the most formal guarantees that it would not permit any consignment of oil to be diverted to a country different from the one for which it was destined. Consignments of oil for Mozambique, Zambia and Malawi were arriving continually at the Port of Beira and the Portuguese Government felt that it ought to reaffirm its position of principle which consisted in guaranteeing that all merchandise coming from or destined for countries in the interior would not be stopped in transit or diverted. It could not take upon itself the responsibility of establishing the precedent of interfering with the free access to the sea of the countries in the interior, at the request of third parties and for the protection of the interests of the latter. This was a duty which was imposed upon it by the unassailable principles of international law, otherwise recognized expressly in conventions.

716. On 8 April 1966, the Government of Portugal issued a second press communiqué in which it reiterated its position on the freedom of private companies in Portuguese Territories and rejected responsibility for the docking of the Joanna V in Beira.

717. On 11 April 1966, the Joanna V pulled anchor into the Mozambique harbour of Beira and moved to the quayside. An official of the Foreign Ministry of Portugal was reported to have said that the Joanna V was authorized to dock in the harbour to facilitate the normal movement of the port.

718. On 12 April 1966, the Government of Panama revoked the provisional registry acquired by the Joanna V.

719. On 14 April 1966, a Portuguese Government official was reported to have announced that the Captain of Beira Port had boarded the Joanna V and taken control of the vessel on behalf of the Portuguese authorities.

720. On 5 April 1966, it was reported that another tanker, the Manuela, belonging to the same owners as the Joanna V, was heading for Beira with a consignment of 16,000 tons of crude oil for Southern Rhodesia. On 5 and 6 April 1966, the Government of Greece sent two warning cables to the Master of the 11,000-ton tanker Manuela warning him not to proceed to Beira.

721. It will be recalled that Security Council resolution 221 (1966) of 9 April 1966, inter alia, called upon the Government of the United Kingdom to prevent by the use of force if necessary the arrival at Beira of vessels reasonably believed to be carrying oil destined for Rhodesia.

722. Following the adoption of this resolution, the United Kingdom anti-submarine frigate, Berwick, on 10 April 1966, intercepted the Greek-registered tanker, Manuela, 150 miles east of Beira and put an armed party aboard. A United Kingdom Ministry of Defence spokesman stated that as a result of the action taken by the Berwick, the Manuela had now turned away from Beira and was on a southerly cruise.

723. On 12 April 1966, the Manuela arrived at the South African seaport of Durban and docked in the harbour. On 16 April 1966, the Manuela left Durban for an unknown destination.

Portugal and the oil embargo

724. According to a press report, oil and petroleum products have continued to reach Southern Rhodesia from South Africa by rail through Mozambique. The oil reaching Southern Rhodesia through Mozambique was estimated at about 100,000 gallons daily.

725. The board of directors of the Rhodesia-Mozambique Pipeline Company (CPMR) met in Lisbon on 10 March 1966 to consider a request from the local management of CAPREF in Southern Rhodesia to build a "slip" pipeline to connect the new dockside storage tanks, which were under construction in Beira, to the pipeline for a resumption of crude oil supplies to Southern Rhodesia.

726. At the meeting, the directors of Lonrho Ltd. (the United Kingdom Company that owns 62.5 per cent of the shares of CPMR) presented certain legal documents relating to resolutions passed by the board of directors of CAPREF in London. These resolutions stated that the local management of CAPREF was not in a position to issue instructions in respect of activities outside Southern Rhodesia.

727. According to press reports, the most significant result of the meeting of the board of directors of CPMR was the agreement that another board meeting would have to be held before any connexion could be made between the pipeline and the new storage tanks under construction at the dockside in Beira. The meeting was adjourned sine die on the understanding that it could be convened again at twenty-four hours notice.

728. On 31 March 1966, it was reported that work had been completed on two of the six 3,000-ton prefabricated storage tanks which were being built near the pumping station at Beira and that about twenty-four hours would be needed to connect the tanks to the pipeline.

729. On 6 April 1966, the board of CPMR resumed its meeting to decide whether the two 3,000-ton storage tanks just completed in Beira harbour should be connected to the pipeline so that oil from the tankers could be pumped through to Southern Rhodesia, as well as the 14,000 tons of crude oil that has been lying idle in the pipeline since the beginning of the year. The meeting ended on 7 April 1966, but no official statement was issued. The chairman of Lonrho Ltd., Mr. Alan Ball, was quoted as having said after the meeting that he was personally opposed to pumping oil through the pipeline to Southern Rhodesia, but that he could not forecast how the Portuguese, who are in the majority on the board, would decide.

730. On 14 April 1966, it was reported that the Smith régime had indicated to the representatives of CPMR and CAPREF that they expected facilities to be made ready soon for pumping and refining.

731. On 15 April 1966, it was reported that Portuguese parachute troops had been specially flown from Lourenço Marques to Beira to guard the Mozambique-Rhodesia pipeline. Both the pipeline and all its adjacent buildings are said to be under guard.

South Africa and the oil embargo

732. The Rhodesia Broadcasting Corporation made a series of announcements in the second half of March-April 1966 which show that oil and petroleum products have continued to arrive in Southern Rhodesia from South Africa.

733. The quantity of oil and petroleum products mentioned in these broadcasts as coming from South Africa varied from a few hundred gallons to 4,000 gallons per shipment by road. According to these broadcasts, some of the drivers who brought in shipments ranging between 2,000 to 4,000 gallons were officially received by the Mayors of Bulawayo and Salisbury at their respective City Halls.

734. On 18 April 1966, the Rand Daily Mail estimated the extent of the oil flow from South Africa to Southern Rhodesia as being between 140,000 and 160,000 gallons daily. This would be about double Southern Rhodesia's consumption under rationing. According to the Rand Daily Mail, the figure was based on a careful survey in the previous week at Beit Bridge and in Mozambique. The daily total was made up of about 45,000 gallons by road tankers via the Beit Bridge and about 100,000 gallons by rail.

735. The paper stated that while the road flow by Beit Bridge had decreased from a weekly peak of 450,000 gallons to some 300,000 gallons (see paragraphs 261-264 above) the loss had been offset by increased rail traffic. Fuelling from road tankers, mostly hauling from the Rand, cost the Smith régime an estimated 6/- per gallon. Rail traffic, mostly from the Rand via Komatipoort to Lourenço Marques and thence via Malvernia to Salisbury and Bulawayo was far cheaper. All the major oil suppliers were said to be participating in the traffic. According to the Rand Daily Mail, it was significant that road tanker drivers were reported as saying that storage space in Southern Rhodesia was becoming scarce—frequently they now had to drive from tank to tank looking for space.

Internal developments related to the oil embargo

736. On 14 April 1966, the "Minister of Commerce and Industry", Mr. B. H. Musset, announced that the present method of fuel rationing would end on 9 May 1966 and be replaced by a coupon system. Petrol ration identification cards which expired on 2 May 1966 would continue to be valid for one more week and the public would be able to draw petrol for the week of 3 May to 9 May as at present. He stated that under the new scheme a more equitable scale of rationing would be introduced. The new scale would be based on a greater number of vehicle weight classifications; consideration would also be given to distance from home to work.

737. In his broadcast of 16 April 1966, Mr. Smith announced that Southern Rhodesia had decided not to use the oil from the tanker Joanna V because it was not its intention to involve unnecessarily other countries and people. It had, however, been proved by the incident of the Joanna V that Southern Rhodesia could break the blockade and, if it wished, pump the oil to the refinery at Feruka. The fact that Southern Rhodesia would not obtain oil from the Joanna V did not concern his régime very much. He said that after all, as the people of Southern Rhodesia knew, the use of the pipeline to transport oil from the coast was a comparatively new development. Prior to that Southern Rhodesia had got on very well using other means, in the same way as many other countries in the world did. Southern Rhodesia would continue by using those other traditional lines of supply.

738. Mr. Smith also stated in his broadcast that his régime was not complacent over the present position. It was now experimenting with a charcoal gas plant for adaptation on diesel engines. He hoped that plans for this would be ready shortly and thereafter available throughout Southern Rhodesia for commercial production and sale to the public. Southern Rhodesia was also working on the development of oil from coal. This exercise continued and in addition a new prospect for oil, both more encouraging and more exciting, was under investigation. For security reasons, however, he was unable to give any further information about this.

F. FURTHER CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE³⁰

INTRODUCTION

739. The Special Committee gave further consideration to the question of Southern Rhodesia at its 411th meeting on 10 May 1966 and subsequently at its 418th, 423rd to 427th, 432nd and 447th meetings held in Africa between 24 May and 15 June 1966.

WRITTEN PETITIONS AND HEARINGS

740. The Special Committee also circulated the written petitions listed below concerning the Territory:³¹

741. The Special Committee heard the following petitioners concerning Southern Rhodesia:
Mr. T. G. Silundika, representative, Zimbabwe African Peoples Union (ZAPU) (A/AC.109/PET.458)	(423rd and 424th meetings)
Messrs. E. M. Pasipanodya, Chief representative in Tanzania and L. P. Chihota, Assistant representative in Zambia, Zimbabwe African National Union (ZANU) (A/AC.109/PET.463)	(424th meeting)
Mr. David Mpongo, Cairo Office of the Zimbabwe African Peoples Union (ZAPU) (A/AC.109/PET.458/Add.1) ³² ...	(447th meeting)

742. Mr. SILUNDIKA (ZAPU) said that since the Committee had held its session in Zambia in 1965, the political situation in Southern Rhodesia had deteriorated. The settler régime had intensified its repression of the African population. It had been pointed out at that time that the aim of the United Kingdom Government was independence for the settler minority régime. The now familiar unilateral declaration of independence by Ian Smith was just a stage in that Government's scheme eventually to create a sovereign settler minority régime in Southern Rhodesia. That view was supported by the fact that the United Kingdom had retained its legal presence in Southern Rhodesia through a Governor, through whom in fact talks had been resumed between London and Salisbury. There was no doubt, therefore, that the so-called unilateral declaration of independence was a probing action by the United Kingdom to test international reaction to the idea of an independent settler minority régime in Africa.

743. The unilateral declaration had two immediate purposes: to allow the settlers to consolidate their economy and their military and police forces, and to become so hardened to international condemnation as to be able to defy it to the same extent as the South African Boers. It must be crystal clear to anyone concerned with the Southern Rhodesian situation, as it was to ZAPU, that the United Kingdom had deliberately adopted a stand which prevented others from taking action to eliminate the oppressive colonialist régime while doing nothing itself to bring about order and justice.

744. The régime had continued its repressive activities against the Africans, more than 34,000 of whom were in prison and death cells, or under other restrictions. Scores of people were being arrested daily in nazi-style witch-hunts. Detention camps continued to be established in increasing numbers in the rural areas near the territory of some chiefs who had completely lost the confidence of their people. It was in those circumstances that the leader of the African masses of Zimbabwe, Joshua Nkomo, and other leaders continued to be detained. Conflict between Africans and the Whites continued to be widespread. Although the settlers were well armed and commanded a force of nearly 40,000 men, the Africans were determined not to accept anything less than the total surrender of their country and the total dissolution of the settler instruments of oppression. It followed, therefore, that the deterioration of the situation in Southern Rhodesia was ushering in a dangerous phase of armed resistance, with consequences that were bound to involve areas beyond the country's borders and that could mean nothing less than a threat to international peace. He feared that widespread resistance might develop unless prompt measures were taken to liquidate the Smith régime in the shortest possible time.

745. The United Kingdom had pretended to take steps to bring to an end the illegal régime of Ian Smith as if the question of legality or illegality were the central problem of the situation. It was well known that the United Kingdom had deliberately encouraged the minority régime to anchor itself by promising not to use force if it seized independence. Since the unilateral declaration of independence the United Kingdom had talked of economic sanctions as its measure of bringing the situation to order. Those had not only proved ineffective but, with the resumption of talks between Salisbury and London, had proved to be a sheer bluff. South Africa was supplying more than 100,000 gallons of petrol a day to Southern Rhodesia, whose daily consumption was 83,000 gallons. Japan, the Federal Republic of Germany, France and the United Kingdom continued a flourishing trade with Southern Rhodesia as did United States companies like the Union Carbide Corporation at Selukwe, and the United Kingdom, the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany still had diplomatic missions in Salisbury.

746. German exports to Southern Rhodesia in January and February 1966 had been to the value of £330,000 and £225,000 respectively, while its imports from Southern Rhodesia for December 1965 and January 1966 had been respectively £1,116,000 and £1,170,000.

747. A financial broker from Hamburg, director of a German-Southern Rhodesia trading group, Herr Joachim Seelmaecker, had told a Daily Express reporter in Johannesburg at the end of April that the Rhodesian situation called for business enterprise and he did not see why only the Japanese and French should take advantage of all the opportunities which British action had left open to others.

748. That illustrated that the economic sanctions to which Britain would like to limit the world in opposing the régime were too easily evaded, and therefore completely inadequate to meet challenge of the situation. Herr Strauss, the former German Minister of Defence, had made an effort to pour in more money.

749. While Governments had made pronouncement against trade with Southern Rhodesia, they had not been able to prevent trading by companies based in their countries. Moreover, it had been learnt that a Japanese company had recently sold tear-gas to the Smith régime for use against Africans and that Turkey had not only sold arms, but a Turkish guerrilla expert was training the settler forces in anti-guerrilla warfare. It could well be that companies and nationals involved in assisting the United Kingdom to entrench the settler régime were acting outside their Governments' policies, but the effect was that their countries were abetting an unwanted régime. He believed that the Special Committee had the capacity to investigate that information and, when its truth was established, the countries concerned must be asked why they were taking action in Africa that was against African interests.

750. The action of South Africa and Portugal, in openly assisting the settler dictatorship, was indicative not only of their economic alliance but also of their military alliance for oppressing international African populations and using the Zambezi as the protective line against free and independent Africa.

751. The United Kingdom had resumed talks with its agents in Southern Rhodesia, and was shamelessly telling the world that they were aimed at settling the Southern Rhodesian problem as if that problem was between it and its agents in Southern Rhodesia. Talks that were discriminatory in composition, scope and purpose could not be expected to produce non-discriminatory conditions or results. His organization rejected those talks without reservation. They were a blatant conspiracy to work out a formula for bulldozing the Africans. A peaceful solution of the Southern Rhodesia problem could only be gained by convening a genuine constitutional conference, attended by the representatives of the people, to frame a constitution that would transfer power directly to the African majority.

752. It was common knowledge that the United Kingdom was toying with the idea of a Royal Commission to test the views of the people in the country, with guarantees not to impede majority rule, as a basis for conferring sovereignty on the settler régime. The United Kingdom's so-called six principles for settling the Rhodesian problem had been made vague enough to permit the complete betrayal of the African people. Prime Minister Wilson had sold out South Africa before the unilateral declaration by promising never to use force, and on 27 April he had once again been recorded in Hansard as having made the assertion that it would take a very long time before majority rule in Southern Rhodesia could be justifiable. He clearly wanted to transfer to the settler régime the task of guaranteeing unimpeded progress towards majority rule for "that very long time", and that meant virtually destroying any chance of majority rule. The Special Committee should place on record the fact that ZAPU, on behalf of the struggling masses of Zimbabwe, would accept neither a constitutional device nor a régime other than one based on African majority rule.

753. It was evident that the United Kingdom was not only incapable of but totally opposed to the removal of its settler-dictatorship in Southern Rhodesia. It could not now be allowed to pretend to go along with those who were making efforts to find a just settlement. He therefore proposed to the Special Committee the following conditions for settling the Southern Rhodesian problem:

(a) The United Kingdom, as a colonialist country, should be expelled from the Special Committee as an impediment to the sincere decolonization efforts of the United Nations;

(b) The United Kingdom should be declared the real enemy of the African people in Zimbabwe and of the world's desire for peace in Africa;

(c) All Members of the United Nations should be bound not to recognize or assist in any way any régime in Zimbabwe established by the United Kingdom short of African majority rule;

(d) The United Kingdom should be condemned for conniving with the settler régime in its brutal murders of the African people, whose only endeavour was justice, freedom and the restoration of their country, Zimbabwe;

(e) In considering measures consistent with its role against the Southern Rhodesian régime, the United Nations should openly regard force as the only solution of the Southern Rhodesian problem;

(f) United Nations Members should, individually or severally, assist the African people of Zimbabwe, in every way possible, in their efforts to overthrow minority dictatorship in Southern Rhodesia;

(g) The continuation of activities of certain Members of the United Nations in trade and other relations with the settler minority régime should be prevented.

754. A peaceful settlement could only come about when all leaders and other political prisoners and detainees had been released unconditionally and when the African leaders had unrestricted political freedom to consult with their followers in moving towards a genuinely convened constitutional conference with the specific purpose of transferring power directly to the African majority.

755. In reply to questions, Mr. Silundika (ZAPU) said that the oil embargo had had no significant effect. There had been much talk about the import of oil through Beira but other routes remained open and over 100,000 gallons of fuel entered Southern Rhodesia from South Africa every day, quite apart from supplies received through Mozambique. The increase in the price of petrol was not due to the oil embargo but was merely a provisional arrangement made by the rebel régime. Furthermore, the two oil tankers Manuela and Joanna V, despite the considerable publicity given to their diversion, were still cruising off the shore of southern Africa and might well discharge their cargo at a South African port or elsewhere.

756. The oil refinery in Salisbury was being expanded, at a cost of £200,000 to receive crude oil arriving through South Africa and Mozambique. Measures had also been initiated for co-operation between Southern Rhodesia and South Africa with a view to ensuring safe and uninterrupted oil supply lines. Oil rationing had been introduced, but only in order to conserve stocks. As Smith himself had made abundantly clear, Southern Rhodesia had two years' supply of oil. Moreover, South Africa was endeavouring to make use of certain oil deposits within its territory and attempts were also being made with the assistance of the powerful Anglo-American Company to derive other forms of fuel from coal.

757. Mr. CHIHOTA (ZANU) said that he was speaking on behalf of the liberation movement which represented the people of Zimbabwe—or Southern Rhodesia, as it was called by the imperialists. That movement was leading the armed struggle to oust British colonialism from Zimbabwe.

758. He was grateful for the opportunity, on behalf of the 4 million exploited Africans of Zimbabwe, to expose the half-truths and lies uttered by British colonialists at the United Nations in an effort to perpetuate their subjugation of the Zimbabwe people. He expressed appreciation to the President, Government and people of Tanzania both for providing the facilities which had made it possible for the representatives of ZANU to appear before the Committee and for assuming a major role in the liberation struggle of the Zimbabwe people.

759. It was with great satisfaction that he noted the absence from the Special Committee of the representatives of the arch-colonial imperialist Power, the United Kingdom—an absence which it was to be hoped, would be permanent. As stated in ZANU's address to the Special Committee at its meeting in Lusaka in 1965, the United Kingdom was the culprit and Smith the agent in the Rhodesian situation. As a colonial Power it should be expelled from the Committee and, like Portugal and South Africa, it should not be allowed to participate in the Committee's work until it had renounced colonialism.

760. Since the representative of ZANU had appeared before the Committee in Lusaka, Zambia, in 1965, the position had worsened: ZANU's President Mr. Ndabaningi Sithole, and three quarters of the leading members were either under detention or restriction. The three most well-known concentration camps were Sikombela, Wha Wha and Gonakudzingwa where, together with over 20,000 of ZANU's supporters and freedom fighters, its leaders were confined, without trial, under deplorable conditions. The Smith régime had converted disused mines into special gaols to accommodate some of ZANU's leaders, all of whom were under detention for a minimum of five years. Their families and friends did not know where they were. The prison camps were deliberately designed to reduce their African inmates to the level of animals. Those opposed to British colonial rule in Zimbabwe were removed from their homes by night to prisons, where many had died. Only two weeks earlier many prominent Africans including two doctors, Dr. Silas Mundawarara and Dr. Mutasa, had been imprisoned, together with 500 Africans, following the bloody gun-battle at Sinoia between the forces of ZANU and the puppet régime. Thousands more were being arrested daily in various parts of the country. It would take too much of the Special Committee's time to recount the full extent of the atrocities suffered by the Zimbabwe people and he would therefore confine himself to two examples. In the first place, the Land Apportionment Act, dividing land between the British settlers and the indigenous Zimbabwe population, was being more rigorously enforced so that Africans were deprived of their livestock, farming areas and homes. Colour discrimination was as rigorously applied as in South Africa. Secondly, in the urban areas thousands of Africans were being evicted from their jobs and houses and were thus reduced to the level of beggars. That was being done so that the settlers would have even more and better jobs and a still higher standard of living when they already enjoyed the best in the world. To a great extent such evictions resulted from deliberate British colonial policy rather than from sanctions.

761. On 11 November 1965, the settler Government had declared independence unilaterally. The United Kingdom, which had created the political and economic conditions making that declaration possible, had thus sought to absolve itself of any responsibility for the further denials of the human rights of the Zimbabwe people by the British settler Government, and had been able to pretend to fight that Government through ineffective sanctions. As a result, the settlers had raised the forces of oppression to an unprecedented level. ZANU, which was fighting to regain the land of the Zimbabwe people, was also struggling for their human rights, for democracy and for justice. The unilateral declaration was merely another means used by the British, both in Southern Rhodesia and in Britain, to continue colonial exploitation.

762. From the outset, ZANU had opposed British sanctions which, as they had repeatedly warned would be the case, had failed dismally. They had only inconvenienced, but would never defeat, the British settlers. Since the United Kingdom—a colonial Power with enormous interests in southern Africa—had established itself as solely responsible for their implementation, it had been an error for the Security Council, which danced to the tune of British imperialism, to allow the United Kingdom to police its own evil deeds.

763. ZANU and the people of Zimbabwe had decided to launch an armed struggle which, they were convinced, was the only realistic and effective way of recovering their rights. Any other course would only result in continued colonial exploitation. ZANU had been forced to meet counter-revolutionary violence with revolutionary resistance and, as the Special Committee had been informed by its representatives in 1965, there would be a bloody racial war in Zimbabwe. For the first time since the early wars of liberation in 1890-1896, known in Zimbabwe as Chimurenga and Chindunduma, the masses, led by ZANU revolutionary forces, had fought with the settler security forces near Sinoia on 28 and 29 April 1966. On 16 and 17 May 1966, under the direction of ZANU forces, they had again fought with the settlers near Hartley. At Sinoia at least seven gallant heroes had lost their lives, and many Zimbabwean civilians had been killed by the British settlers. Those battles had breached what had hitherto appeared to be the impregnable security of the settlers.

764. The Rhodesian problem remained a threat to world peace. The battles being fought within the country, the involvement in British sanctions of such countries as Zambia, the threat of military invasion of Zambia and neighbouring territories by the settlers, the support provided by South Africa and Portugal to the settlers in Southern Rhodesia, were all factors contributing to the gravity of the situation and to the threat to peace in Africa and the world. The United Nations could help Zimbabweans to liberate themselves and could lessen the bloodshed which was bound to result as ZANU's armed struggle developed and intensified. It could help to defeat British colonialism more rapidly by taking the following measures: first, sanctions, to include South Africa, Mozambique and Angola, should be mandatory and should be placed under United Nations supervision. Secondly, all the borders of Zimbabwe should be sealed by a United Nations force. Thirdly, a force which should be composed of nationals from countries selected by the people of Zimbabwe and should operate under the auspices of the United Nations and OAU, would have to be used in Southern Rhodesia.

765. In conclusion, he strongly condemned the current negotiations on independence between the British in Southern Rhodesia and the British in the United Kingdom. The talks were a fraud and were aimed at creating another South Africa to work in close co-operation with Dr. Salazar and Dr. Verwoerd. The United Nations should make it clear, in a resolution, that it would never recognize the decisions reached at any consultations between the United Kingdom and Southern Rhodesia in which Zimbabwe's African representatives, presently under detention or restriction, had not participated.

766. The United Nations, like ZANU, should make it clear that there could be no half measure with regard to majority rule, which it demanded immediately. ZANU rejected outright the United Kingdom's five-point plan, under which the colonialists would determine the pace of African advance. If majority rule in Zimbabwe was not granted forthwith, the racial war would continue and ZANU would not lay down arms until that end had been achieved.

767. Mr. PASIPANODYA (ZANU) said that it was to be hoped that the Special Committee's condemnation of British colonialism, so often repeated, could be given practical effect. It was his organization's view that the United Kingdom would have to be expelled from all United Nations organs if colonialism was to be wiped from the face of Africa.

768. Mr. MPONGO (ZAPU), in the name of the oppressed people of Zimbabwe and all its leaders detained or imprisoned by the Rhodesian rebel régime, expressed his thanks to the Special Committee for having accorded him an opportunity, for the second time during its current tour of Africa, to present its case, which was one that occupied the minds of every freedom-loving nation.

769. In Zimbabwe, Africans were being denied all the rights of free citizens in the country of their birth and the settlers were ruling at gun-point. ZAPU felt that the Committee should keep a watchful eye on the Rhodesian situation, which represented a major threat not only to the security of southern Africa and to Southern Rhodesia's neighbours in the north—the African independent States—but to the security of the African continent as a whole and, indeed, to that of international peace and stability.

770. The colonial history of Southern Rhodesia was a sad one, characterized by illegality, unilateral action and racism. It was a history of illegality because colonialism itself was abhorrent and illegal. There was no contract in existence proving that the African people of Zimbabwe had given away their rights and country in exchange for British rule and settler domination. The absence of such a document was clear proof that British occupation and colonization were both illegal and unilateral. That was why ZAPU was fighting against colonial rule and its offspring, settlerism and fascism.

771. Southern Rhodesia's oppressive laws had resulted in a situation in which individual freedom was trampled underfoot by the settlers. It had become illegal for an African in Southern Rhodesia to demand his inalienable rights.

772. The laws that governed Southern Rhodesia were, inter alia, as follows: any statement imputing any improper motive to the legislature, Government, ministers, officers or any department of the Government was prima facie subversive; so was any statement likely (even if not intended) to incite dissatisfaction against the Government or induce any person or persons actively or passively to resist any such laws. Any organization or publication could be banned at the Government's pleasure; any person could be restricted to any area found suitable by the Government for periods up to five years. The police could without warrant enter any home in which they suspected that a subversive statement might be made. The courts of law were obliged to impose minimum sentences for a wide range of convictions: five to twenty years for throwing or threatening to throw an article at a car; two to seven years for boycotts; the death penalty for arson.

773. Under most laws the accused had to prove his innocence. Not satisfied with those laws, Ian Smith's illegal régime had repeatedly imposed emergency legislation which dispensed with the need for trial.

774. Looking back into the history of Zimbabwe, it could be seen that the United Kingdom had committed serious crimes against the African people. The United Kingdom had permitted systematic land robbery and discrimination against the African citizens, while sharing with its kith and kin, the white minority settlers, the proceeds of exploitation. The United Kingdom had never used its so-called reserve powers to stop discriminatory legislation in the periods 1923 to 1953 and 1953 to 1961.

775. Furthermore, the United Kingdom had rejected an eighty-one-nation appeal at the United Nations in 1962 for a "one man, one vote" franchise in Southern Rhodesia, and in 1965, together with the United States, had rejected a demand by the United Nations for the use of force against the unilateral declaration of independence by the Smith régime. However, it should be noted that there had been no hesitation in the use of force in British Guiana and Aden by the United Kingdom.

776. That country's half-heartedly implemented economic sanctions had proved ineffective and futile. The oppressed people of Zimbabwe and all the freedom-loving nations of the world were witnessing the birth of yet another South Africa. Incidentally, that nation had been set on its path by the United Kingdom in 1910.

777. The land and the wealth of Zimbabwe were unequally divided. The settler population of Southern Rhodesia had over 36 million acres of the best land, or 38 per cent of the total land, of which it was estimated they only used 3 per cent.

778. The 4 million Africans in Southern Rhodesia had only 40 million acres, and the average African farmer owned not more than six acres of generally inferior land. White farmers usually obtained better prices for their products, while the African got about 20 per cent of those prices. The average yearly income for a white citizen in Southern Rhodesia was not less than £1,400 while that of an African was £114.

779. The notorious Land Apportionment Act forbade an African to own land and conduct business in the commercial centres of towns. Africans were only permitted to live in those areas as servants. Skilled jobs were barred from African workers.

780. Educational opportunities for Africans were strictly limited, as in the South African Bantu education system. In the present educational system there was "European" education, "Asian" education, "Coloured" education and "African" education. The different types of educational systems were not only administered separately but were also separately budgeted for by the Government. In addition, a kind of apartheid was in practice whereby the different races were split up, preference being given to the European to the detriment of the majority of the inhabitants of the country. These and many other injustices proved beyond any doubt that the political future of Southern Rhodesia was grave.

781. The United Kingdom, supported by those nations which hated the idea of majority rule in Zimbabwe, intended to push ahead with its racist policy of supporting illegal minority rule at all costs. The African people of Zimbabwe still held the view that the United Kingdom could have prevented that tragic event if it had believed in the interest of the majority—the 4 million Africans. With clear knowledge of British imperialist conduct—characterized south of the Zambezi by the continued economic and military aid extended both to South Africa and Southern Rhodesia, the African people of Zimbabwe held no illusion whatsoever as to the tacit complicity of the United Kingdom in the crime committed by the racist minority régime against the indigenous people of Zimbabwe.

782. The past seventy-six years had seen ruthless exploitation of the African people by the settlers, murder, torture and complete denial of their rights. The United Kingdom was responsible for all those injustices and atrocities. The settlers were in fact mere custodians of British economic interests. It was also clear that all the perfidious constitutions which the United Kingdom had imposed upon Zimbabwe since 1923 had been undemocratic and based on the principle of racism and indefinite minority rule.

783. A few examples would show that the United Kingdom's behaviour in Southern Rhodesia was characterized by unilateral action and racialism. The British occupation in 1890 was made without the Africans' consultation or consent; the granting of self-governing status to British settlers in 1923 was done without African participation or consent; the introduction of apartheid under cover of the Land Apportionment Act in the early 1940's was carried out by the British settlers with the support and agreement of the United Kingdom and not of the Africans; the defunct Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland in 1953 was imposed without the consent of the Africans; the racial and undemocratic 1961 Constitution was imposed against the unanimous opposition of the Africans; the shameful white man to white man negotiation between 1961 and November 1965 had neither African participation nor consent. The unilateral declaration of independence had been imposed by the settlers in defiance of African demands and opposition, and the current Anglo-Rhodesian talks were also being carried out without African participation or consent. In fact the African leaders who should have represented the oppressed Africans were behind Smith's bars. There was no reason why the rightful representatives of the African people should not participate in those talks which concerned the future of their country and heritage, if they were intended to find a genuine and lasting solution to the Rhodesian crisis.

784. The United Kingdom's initiative at the United Nations to keep the Rhodesian question out of international control had resulted in the frustration of any endeavours towards a forceful approach by the United Nations. The recent rejection of a Security Council resolution on mandatory sanctions and the use of force under the circumstances had removed any international platform for the urging of the use of force on Rhodesia.

785. For the United Kingdom, therefore, the danger of international reaction through the United Nations to the independent minority régime in Rhodesia had been completely removed. It felt it could now proceed to give open legal recognition to the régime and enable its allies also to do so.

786. Calculating on that basis, the United Kingdom had resumed talks with the Southern Rhodesian régime to complete the final trick of giving legal status to the Smith régime's independence. A certain pattern of camouflage was being worked out, which must ensure that the territories around Rhodesia acknowledge and recognize the solution the United Kingdom would work out with its kith and kin in their present talks and that by their acknowledgement and recognition of such a solution the neighbouring territories would automatically insulate and secure Rhodesia territorially from any possible base of infiltration against the régime. While the real issue in Southern Rhodesia was majority rule for the population of Southern Rhodesia, that was no longer the issue as far as the United Kingdom was concerned. Its concern was now support of its arrangement for Southern Rhodesia by the majority of the States around Southern Rhodesia, which would mean securing at once international recognition and independence for the régime.

787. The arrangement must be tolerable to South Africa and Mozambique which practically meant majority territorial security for Southern Rhodesia's régime. Should the United Kingdom by that scheme secure a breakthrough to the impasse of recognizing the régime in Southern Rhodesia, it then hoped to handle Southern Rhodesia's neighbouring African States (who would like to see a rapid change to majority rule in Southern Rhodesia) by economic pressures, and in that way try to neutralize any possibility of those countries becoming sources of support of action against the Southern Rhodesian régime.

788. The constitutional camouflage might mean introducing a few Africans in the administration, increasing the seats in parliament for the Africans to a third, and widening the franchise to give privilege to a handful of a certain class of Africans. That would leave Ian Smith securely in power.

789. When Mr. Wilson had first become the opposition leader in the House of Commons, he had condemned the Tories for their failure to solve the Southern Rhodesian problem. In March 1963, he had told the Commons:

"We have said that the Constitution is indefensible which fails to allow the people of those territories the right to control their own destinies. We have bitterly attacked the Southern Rhodesian Constitution for that, and a Labour Government would therefore alter it. We have made that very, very plain."

790. After the United Nations General Assembly had called upon the United Kingdom to suspend the 1961 Constitution during one of its sessions in 1963, Mr. Harold Wilson had challenged the Conservative leader, Sir Alec Douglas Home, in the Commons as follows:

"Now we must ask the Prime Minister to be utterly unequivocal about this demand he has received. Although our good name has been besmirched by our handling of the Central African question, too much is at stake for Britain's stand in Africa, in the United Nations and in the world for him to evade this issue. Will he give a clear, specific assurance that Her Majesty's Government will not concede independence to Southern Rhodesia until a new constitution is in force which accepts what the present Constitution rejects, the principles of a democratic Government? In view of the inability of the Government to solve this problem... will he tell us that he will convene a Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference for the purpose of an agreed Commonwealth solution to this problem?"

791. But at the June 1965 Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference, Mr. Wilson had adamantly refused to heed the demand by the Commonwealth Prime Ministers that a constitutional conference be held within three months. Reporting in the House of Commons, on 29 June 1965, on his discussions with Mr. Smith, Mr. Wilson had declared:

"...if these discussions did not develop satisfactorily within a reasonably speedy time, the British Government would be ready to consider promoting a constitutional conference in order to ensure progress to independence on a basis acceptable to the people of Rhodesia as a whole." (That statement was contained in Hansard of 29 June 1965.)

792. Obviously the discussions had not been satisfactory, but Mr. Wilson had done nothing to see that a constitutional conference was convened. On the contrary, he had committed the United Kingdom Government to the acceptance of the 1961 Constitution as the basis for independence. In a letter to Ian Smith dated 29 March 1965, Mr. Wilson had said:

"What the British Government wish to see is a peaceful transition to majority rule, the principle of which is enshrined in the 1961 Constitution."

793. The claim by Mr. Wilson that the 1961 Constitution "enshrined" the principle of independence under majority rule was untrue because the majority of the Africans were not eligible to become electors, being able to get only fifteen seats against fifty seats of the white settlers.

794. Mr. Ian Smith, who had on several occasions expressed his opposition to majority rule before independence had once stated in a letter to Mr. Wilson that "Since it is our determination not to accept independence under majority rule, the conclusion should be obvious." That statement alone should have been a pointer to Mr. Wilson that Smith was on the brink of declaring Rhodesia independent unilaterally.

795. Instead of using British powers on Southern Rhodesia Mr. Wilson had flown to Salisbury for further talks with Mr. Smith during the course of which, according to the British Blue Book, he had reminded the Southern Rhodesia Cabinet that that was the first occasion in modern history on which the United Kingdom Government had been prepared to contemplate granting them independence on the basis of less than majority rule. That was a clear retreat on the part of Mr. Wilson. It was no longer majority rule before independence but "guaranteed and unimpeded progress to majority rule", as stated in his broadcast speech on 12 October 1965.

796. The foregoing facts should prove beyond any reasonable doubt that the United Kingdom Government had not the slightest intention of taking any effective steps to ensure African majority rule in Southern Rhodesia. The so-called economic sanctions against Southern Rhodesia had proved to be totally ineffective and the United Nations resolutions on Southern Rhodesia had also been ignored by the United Kingdom Government. In all his declarations, and also in his speeches issued during his talks with Mr. Smith, Mr. Wilson had over-emphasized the fact that "he fully shared Mr. Smith's desire to counter communist influence in Africa". All those and many other moves taken by the United Kingdom Government, which his organization had exposed, clearly showed how the British colonialist Government had given in to its kith and kin, the white settler minority dictatorship in Southern Rhodesia. Mr. Wilson had not only refused to press for the release of all political prisoners, but in defence of the Smith régime he had also categorically made the position clear that Smith would only be prepared to release the African nationalists provided they gave him an assurance that "... they would now resort to purely constitutional means of political activity". He would like to deal with the question of political detainees in detail. The conditions that Mr. Wilson had put forward for the release of the country's leaders were hollow and ineffective, because in the first place, in view of the illegality and unconstitutionality of the present Government administering the country, it automatically followed that the restriction of its leaders under that treasonable régime was immoral and unconstitutional.

797. The African people of Zimbabwe, having sufficient evidence and fears to believe that the continued detention of their leader, Mr. Joshua Nkomo, was illegal and invalid, and posed a danger to his life in the hands of the Rhodesian régime, requested the Committee to take all necessary and legal steps that could result in his being released from detention. Convinced that his continued detention and restriction, aimed at frustrating both his political activity and his personal life, deprived the African people of Zimbabwe of their rightful leader, they had strong reasons to entertain the fear that he might be murdered in the interests of those who considered him their political enemy. Further, international law decreed that nobody should be detained without trial. For that reason the matter should be taken up, and he should be released or brought to trial, thereby possibly establishing a test case for the fate of thousands of political detainees held illegally. It was also questionable whether the virtue of any order deriving from the 1961 Constitution still held, as that Constitution had been repealed and replaced by the 1965 Constitution of the illegal régime of Ian Smith.

798. ZAPU accused the undemocratic and illegal Smith régime, which should be indicted in the place of Mr. Joshua Nkomo and his colleagues. Its indictment of that régime was supported by millions of the African people in Zimbabwe, who were at present going through untold sufferings at its hands. Because of the illegality of the present régime in Rhodesia, his organization felt strongly that the matter should be raised with the proper authorities in Britain, whose Government bore full responsibility for the present situation in the country. The British Labour Government had stepped up its connivance with its kith and kin by the current historic talks, with a view to finding a basis for negotiation with the rebels. That crowned all the conspiracy, connivance and double dealing in the British venture in the Rhodesian crisis and left no doubt in anybody's mind that the United Kingdom was responsible not only for the unilateral declaration but for the continuity of illegal rule and the perpetration of torture of the African majority by its minority kith and kin.

GENERAL STATEMENTS

799. At the 411th meeting, before the Special Committee resumed consideration of the question of Southern Rhodesia in Africa, the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania made a statement on the question. He said that his delegation had noted with considerable anxiety the disposition of the United Kingdom Government to engage in so-called exploratory talks with the rebellious Southern Rhodesia régime of Ian Smith. Before the unilateral declaration of independence, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom had stated that such a declaration would be an open act of rebellion; when that declaration had nevertheless been made, the United Kingdom had argued that economic sanctions would be effective in bringing down the rebellion. Those sanctions had proved a failure and the recent manoeuvres for talks between the United Kingdom Government and the illegal Rhodesian régime raised a number of fundamental points concerning which world public opinion was entitled to an explanation from the United Kingdom.

800. Firstly, was the United Kingdom's contention that the unilateral declaration of independence was a rebellion against the Crown still to be believed? Secondly, in the eyes of the United Kingdom Government, was Smith's action still illegal or had it acquired respectability and legality with the passage of time? Thirdly, was the United Kingdom's stated intention to defeat the rebellion still to be believed? Fourthly, what would be the status of the proposed talks? It might have been supposed that they would be concerned with the rebels' surrender, but Ian Smith had told the world that the talks constituted a victory for him. Fifthly, could United Kingdom officials engage in talks with a rebellious régime without giving the world the impression that they were compounding a felony? Sixthly, was it possible for the Smith régime to negotiate itself out of power now that the sanctions had proved to be a total failure?

801. The United Kingdom Government had ignored not only the indigenous people of Southern Rhodesia but also world public opinion. It was particularly regrettable that it should embark on the dangerous course of arranging for talks with the rebels after it had been instrumental in defeating every move on the part of the African countries that would have ensured the early crushing of the rebellion, specifically their move for the full application of Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter. In 1910, in similar circumstances, the United Kingdom Government had granted independence to a minority group in South Africa, with a so-called safeguard for the South African majority; the sad results of that decision were to be seen today.

802. The major issue in Southern Rhodesia was that of independence under majority rule; by its current moves the United Kingdom Government was turning its back on that issue. Before assuming his present office, Lord Caradon, the Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom, had written in an article that European leaders in Africa had failed, when they had had the chance, to win the confidence of the Africans and that the chance of co-operation between Whites and Blacks in Southern Rhodesia had been thrown away by blindness and obstinacy at Salisbury and a lack of political courage in London. He had added that the drift had gone so far that it was difficult to see how it could be stopped short of violence.

803. If the United Kingdom Government had still not abandoned the principle of majority rule and the aim of bringing down the rebellion and returning the country to constitutionality, then his delegation felt obliged to state that the United Kingdom Government was failing to achieve its purpose. Blindness and obstinacy, as well as a lack of political courage, prevailed in London with regard to meeting the demands of Rhodesian Africans and of world opinion, and the drift towards violence was thereby being accelerated. The world was entitled to hear from the United Kingdom Government the nature and the legal status of the so-called talks now being held secretly in London.

804. The representative of the United Kingdom said that he wished to correct some of the statements made about the talks being held in London. As the United Kingdom Prime Minister had stated recently in Parliament, informal talks were being held to discover whether a basis for negotiation existed. He also commended to the attention of the members of the Committee the other points made by the United Kingdom Prime Minister in his recent statement (see paras. 628-632 above).

805. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania agreed with the United Kingdom representative about the need for honest and straightforward discussions. It was not honest, however, for the United Kingdom Government to hold talks with a régime which it had declared to be rebellious and treasonous. It was because the statements being made by the United Kingdom delegation did not correspond to the facts that he had raised certain questions, which should be answered in the Committee or elsewhere.

806. The United Kingdom Government, which had preached the gospel of racial co-operation for so long, was sacrificing justice to colour in Southern Rhodesia, where the oppressed majority was African. It was little consolation for the population of the United Kingdom dependent Territories to be told that millions of people in other Territories had been given independence.

807. The representatives of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Mali and Ethiopia expressed their support for the views expressed by the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania.

808. At its 418th meeting which was held in Dar es Salaam, the Chairman directed the Special Committee's attention to a cable from the United Nations Office of Public Information in New York on the latest developments in the Security Council's examination of the question of Southern Rhodesia, copies of which were before the representatives. According to that cable, the Security Council, by a vote of 6 in favour, 1 against and 8 abstentions, had failed to adopt the draft resolution submitted by Mali, Nigeria and Uganda.

809. The Chairman said that while the result was disappointing, it should nevertheless be regarded as a moral victory and should provide the Special Committee with the impetus to redouble its efforts in that connexion. The fact that as many as six members had voted for the draft resolution was a source of encouragement, as were the statements of those members who had stressed the need for measures to ensure the African population's right to self-determination and independence.

810. The futility of the measures adopted by the United Kingdom, which were merely an expedient to avoid dealing with the crux of the problem, had long been self-evident. Indeed, instead of undertaking negotiations with a view to implementing the provisions of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), it had engaged in "exploratory" talks with the rebel régime. That could only lead to the legalization of the existing situation and the maintenance of a status quo which was totally unacceptable to the majority of the Rhodesian population.

811. It was therefore the responsibility of the Special Committee, in accordance with its mandate and in pursuance of its own decision in that regard, to re-examine the Rhodesian question in the light of recent developments. Thus, it would contribute, in keeping with the expectations of both United Nations and of world opinion, to a solution of the problem.

812. The representative of India reviewed the events which had led up to the culminating injury: the United Kingdom Government, after a series of manoeuvres designed to mislead world opinion, had now initiated talks with the Smith régime—having resolutely avowed not to do so only a few months earlier. However, it was underestimating the intelligence of the whole world, and even of its own people.

813. Three salient facts had emerged: first, the sanctions had failed; secondly, the United Kingdom and its supporters did not intend, at least for the time being, to adopt stronger measures against Rhodesia; and, thirdly, the Smith régime was defying world opinion and consolidating its position. While he did not mean to suggest that the United Kingdom Government was deliberately prolonging a régime which had arrogantly ridiculed its authority, it was nevertheless influenced by concern for kith and kin—an attitude which, though understandable, was morally indefensible. The United Kingdom also argued that economic sanctions were preferable to the use of force; but sanctions were surely pointless if trade continued.

814. White Rhodesia's other two partners in the process of consolidation collaborated openly and aggressively. The South African and Portuguese Governments were in the forefront of every movement to reverse the course of history. They should be ostracized by the world for their unspeakable conduct; yet there were Governments which continued to associate with them. One major Power in Asia had even increased its trade with South Africa in recent years, despite its avowed concern for the exploited races of the world. Words of comfort from the United Kingdom would no longer suffice, and its pretence of sanctions could not be accepted. If Africa and the rest of the world were to be spared a bloody racial conflict, it would have to take effective action.

815. India's stand against racism was well known. Many years previously, it had taken the lead by forcing the Portuguese colonialists to leave Indian territory when persuasion had failed. As the first country to break off all relations with the Smith régime, it had given tangible proof of its support for the African people in Southern Rhodesia.

816. The Special Committee should call upon the United Kingdom, which was responsible for the situation in Southern Rhodesia, to take effective action. The Committee should also make it clear that its aversion to the use of force could not be used to shield a criminal régime which had to be suppressed, and that all Members of the United Nations should decide whether they wished to support Portugal and South Africa or to join with the vast group of nations which had respect for man and the rule of law.

817. In conclusion, he directed the Special Committee's attention to the six-point programme which the Indian delegation had presented to the Security Council on 17 May 1966.

818. The representative of Ethiopia deplored the recent Security Council vote on the Rhodesian question. His delegation had from the outset been greatly concerned at the attitude of the Western Powers, and particularly of the United Kingdom, with regard to Southern Rhodesia; Africans were tired of platitudes, and patience had been exhausted.

819. Time and again, the Ethiopian delegation had stated that a ruthless rebel régime, such as that installed in Salisbury, could only be overthrown by force. However, as Emperor Haile Selassie I had stated in his message on Africa Day, it appeared that no such action could now be expected from the United Kingdom. Under those circumstances, the African people of Zimbabwe had no alternative but to resort to arms in order to gain their freedom. In so doing they would have the support of the Africans and of all freedom-loving people throughout the world.

820. The Rhodesian crisis contained all the elements of a race conflict. Unless it was brought under control, not only Africa but the whole world might be endangered. The United Kingdom and its supporters should be warned that, by sacrificing principles to appease a minority in Southern Rhodesia, they ran the risk of losing the goodwill of the people in Africa, Asia and elsewhere. Time was running short, however, and a choice had to be made between Smith's racist minority and the rest of Africa.

821. His delegation was convinced that the African people of Zimbabwe would soon win their freedom, no matter how brutal the oppression or how hard the struggle which lay ahead. All progressive peoples would support Zimbabwe in the attainment of its objectives, and Ethiopia, like other independent countries in Africa, would not rest until Ian Smith's rebel régime had been overthrown and the people of Zimbabwe liberated.

822. Lastly, it was to be hoped that, in presenting its recommendations to the General Assembly, the Committee would reach unanimous agreement on effective measures for dealing with the Rhodesian situation.

823. The representative of Iraq said that the plight of the Zimbabwe people had a special significance for the Arab world, since it served as a firm reminder of the forceful occupation of Palestine by foreign settlers abetted by international Zionism and colonialism. The tragedy which had befallen the Palestinian Arabs had occurred despite the existence of the United Nations and the conscience of the so-called civilized world. The people of Southern Rhodesia should not be exposed to a similar fate.

824. The petitioners in their statements had revealed the alarming fact that more than 34,000 Zimbabwe people were detained in prisons or camps and that the settlers commanded an army of more than 40,000 men—which constituted a real threat to international peace and security.

825. Economic sanctions had failed dismally owing to the co-operation of such Powers as Portugal and South Africa with the Rhodesian racist régime. The oil embargo imposed by the administering Power had been circumvented by imports of oil from South Africa. The numerous consultations held between the settler régime and the administering Power, both before and after the unilateral declaration of independence, had yielded no positive results. Nevertheless, it had recently been learnt that further secret talks were being held in London which, according to press reports would be resumed in Salisbury during the week.

826. As a result of the manoeuvres of the administering Power and its supporters, a recent resolution submitted to the Security Council by the Afro-Asian members had not received the requisite number of votes. That resolution, which called upon the United Kingdom to act in accordance with the terms of Chapter VII of the Charter, would have assisted the Zimbabwe people in their struggle for freedom and independence.

827. As his delegation had pointed out on a number of occasions, and specifically at the twentieth session of the General Assembly shortly before the unilateral declaration of independence, the administering Power was solely responsible for Southern Rhodesia. Indeed, it had itself made repeated claims to that effect, as in October 1965 when it had been stated that the unilateral declaration was an act of rebellion.

828. The continuation of the abnormal situation in Southern Rhodesia was complicating Africa's political and economic relations with the rest of the world. For example, according to press reports, new regulations had been imposed by the Smith régime on Zambia's copper exports passing through Southern Rhodesia. Zambia had, however, rejected those regulations and an alternative route would have to be found. The racist régime had so far survived the effect of sanctions owing to a lack of firmness on the part of the administering Power. The situation would not, however, be allowed to continue indefinitely: the people of Africa would be forced to prepare for all eventualities, including a war of liberation.

829. The Vice-President of Tanzania had referred to two basic desiderata for solving the Rhodesian problem: the defeat of the illegal régime and a commitment that Southern Rhodesia would only become independent on the basis of majority rule. His delegation believed that the Special Committee, and the United Nations, should make every effort to achieve those objectives.

830. The representative of Mali said that the absence of any reply from the United Kingdom Government to the cable addressed to it by the Special Committee the previous Friday was further evidence of that Government's negative attitude to the Rhodesian question.

831. The situation in Southern Rhodesia had always been of concern to the African countries. Since the racist minority led by Mr. Smith had unilaterally proclaimed independence, the problem had assumed alarming proportions and was a serious threat to peace and security in Africa. It was true that the United Kingdom Government had made statements of intention. It had always claimed that it wished to limit the danger and to try to end a situation which did it no credit, but the fact was that that Government had itself created the Rhodesian crisis out of nothing and had deliberately complicated it in the hope of safeguarding British interests and the British presence in that part of Africa. The behaviour of the United Kingdom in Southern Rhodesia could be explained only by its refusal to evaluate the situation objectively. The administering Power would not be able to maintain its presence by aiding and abetting Mr. Smith in his present conduct towards the Zimbabwe people. The Wilson Government was doing nothing to restore law and order in the country, and was going so far as to finance the handful of white settlers that had usurped power in defiance of all human laws and of human rights. Nor could the administering Power safeguard its interests in Africa by appropriating the productive land of the Zimbabwe people or by introducing, through the settlers it had transplanted into the Territory, the hateful system of apartheid and ruthless exploitation of man by man.

832. There was no doubt that the Ian Smith clique could not have stayed in power against the will of 4.5 million Blacks if the United Kingdom had not used its veto in the Security Council to facilitate the transfer of the armed forces and police force to the white settler minority, thus giving the latter the means of attaining independence at the Zimbabwe people's expense. The Special Committee should examine that aspect of the question and ask itself why the United Kingdom was acting in that way, whereas in other territories formerly under its jurisdiction it had brought its military might to bear against leaders beloved by their people who had demanded independence for their countries. The only answer to that question was that the United Kingdom Government allowed itself to be guided by economic and military considerations. All the petitioners who had appeared before the Special Committee had stressed that aspect of the question. Southern Rhodesia possessed wealth, and the United Kingdom, doubtless feeling that it had not exploited the country enough, had found no other way to perpetuate the de facto situation than by granting its colony so-called self-government in 1923. That had been the cause of all the trouble. Who had benefited from that self-government? A mere 200,000 white settlers out of a population of nearly 5 million; it made one wonder what had become of law and justice. That policy was deplorable, and the United Kingdom should promptly restore the rule of law in the country. It was responsible, under Article 73 of the United Nations Charter, for maintaining the security and integrity of the Territory.

833. In a strange way, the case of Rhodesia was paving the way for another South Africa. Having set itself that goal, the United Kingdom was methodically working to attain it. It was a pity that the United Kingdom delegation was not taking part in the Special Committee's work, because it would have been interesting to hear it deny the allegation. Although the United Kingdom knew perfectly well that all States condemned that policy, it had allowed Mr. Smith to contract for Southern Rhodesia an unholy alliance with Portugal and South Africa. The support thus secured for Southern Rhodesia had enabled Mr. Smith to proclaim independence unilaterally on 11 November 1965.

834. The United Kingdom had contented itself with an appeal to the Security Council for an economic blockade of its colony. Since then, Mr. Smith, assured of support from South Africa and in British financial circles, had been able to consolidate his position. The Security Council had, it was true, adopted resolution 217 (1965) of 20 November 1965, calling upon all States to place an embargo on oil, but Rhodesia nevertheless continued to receive a daily supply of petrol from South Africa. According to the London Times of 28 February 1966, the Financial Times of 21 February 1966 and the Zambia Times of 3 March 1966, the GENTA Company was bringing between 30,000 and 40,000 gallons of petrol a day into Southern Rhodesia by road or rail from the northern Transvaal. What specific measures had the administering Power taken to put an end to such violation of the Rhodesian frontier? Furthermore, according to the Financial Times of 3 March 1966, the arrangements permitting the importation of Rhodesian tobacco into the United Kingdom under contracts signed on 31 January 1966 had enabled Southern Rhodesian exports to the United Kingdom to attain the record figure of £3.8 million in January 1966 as compared with £3.1 million in January 1965.

835. When Mr. Wilson had sent his emissaries to ask Mr. Smith to resume talks with him, and when Mr. Smith, in complying with the request, had stated that the question of Southern Rhodesia's independence, based on the 1961 Constitution, could not be reopened, the United Kingdom Government had betrayed the 4.5 million Zimbabweans once again. The Special Committee should join President Kaunda of Zambia in condemning the travesty of negotiations which was being enacted in London and which, according to press reports, was to be continued in Southern Rhodesia. The London Government's attitude remained essentially subjective; it was still dictated by anxiety to safeguard British financial interests in Southern Rhodesia and, above all, to perpetuate white supremacy in that part of Africa. There was no doubt that the United Kingdom Government had failed in its duty as administering Power to the Zimbabwe people, who were awaiting their liberation. Those oppressed people now had no choice but to resort to violence in order to free their country. Blood had flowed in Rhodesia, and would flow again unless the United Nations forced the administering Power to intervene and restore the rule of law there. Statements of intention were no longer enough; the struggling people now expected action.

836. It was unfortunate that the Security Council had rejected the resolution submitted by the African States, calling upon the United Kingdom to use force to abolish the iniquitous régime that had been set up in Salisbury. By its action the Security Council had incurred a very grave responsibility, for it was encouraging the establishment in Southern Rhodesia of a régime similar to that in South Africa.

837. Moreover, the United Kingdom Government's attitude was enabling Mr. Smith to harm the interests of a sovereign State—Zambia. According to press reports, Southern Rhodesian trusts were preventing Zambian copper from reaching the port of Beira via Southern Rhodesia. Keeping the Zambian people economically dependent on the monopolies operating in Southern Rhodesia was a further betrayal on the part of the United Kingdom Government. It was intolerable that Zambia should have to suffer the consequences of a retrograde policy which took no account of developments in the world of today. The United Kingdom Government, whose duty it was to maintain security in that part of Africa, should therefore lose no time in taking the necessary measures to restore the rule of law in the Territory.

838. The Special Committee, for its part, should first of all reaffirm the inalienable right of the Zimbabwe people to self-determination and independence, as proclaimed in the declaration made in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). It should then ask all States to render the Zimbabwe people material assistance in their sacred struggle for independence. It should further recommend the Secretary-General of the United Nations to convene a special session of the General Assembly in order to consider the serious situation which prevailed in the British and Portuguese colonies and which resulted from the régime of apartheid in force in South Africa and Southern Rhodesia.

839. In the meantime it was essential that the Security Council should find a means of compelling the United Kingdom to safeguard the interests of the Zimbabwe people and of the Zambian people. The Malian delegation would support any resolution to that effect.

840. The representative of Afghanistan said that the Security Council's rejection of the draft resolution submitted by three African countries had contributed to the deterioration of the situation in Southern Rhodesia. That draft resolution had been perfectly justified, as it had become clear that the recommendations of the General Assembly stood very little chance of being put into effect. Likewise, the oil embargo advocated by the Security Council had proved inadequate. The unilateral declaration of independence—which could have been prevented—put the Smith régime in an even stronger position to oppress the Zimbabwe people, and was incompatible with General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), the United Nations Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

841. The United Kingdom knew that the increasing collusion between South Africa, Portugal and the Smith régime prejudiced the future of the Zimbabwe people and the cause of majority rule. If the administering Power failed to come to grips with the crisis, the situation might suddenly be out of hand. His delegation was not opposed in principle to the current negotiations between the rebel régime and the United Kingdom, which had the legal responsibility and the necessary means to deal with the abnormal situation; the lack of progress had led to scepticism.

842. It was undeniable that the only solution was the removal of the rebel régime and the granting of independence by the United Kingdom under a democratic constitution guaranteeing majority rule. Anything short of that would be unworkable and incompatible with the right of the Zimbabwe people to self-determination.

843. His delegation hoped that common sense and understanding would prevail, and urged the Special Committee to draw the attention of the Security Council once again to the true state of affairs in Southern Rhodesia.

844. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that so long as the Smith régime held out, the Special Committee and the United Nations had to continue their efforts to reach a solution; otherwise the faith which the people of Zimbabwe and Africa placed in the United Nations was bound to waver. Indeed, it had already begun to diminish, and every further blow to it would increase reliance on bloodshed to liberate Africa. The Special Committee therefore bore a great responsibility towards the people of Zimbabwe to restore their faith in the United Nations and to ensure that the principles embodied in the Charter became reality for them.

845. The struggle in Southern Rhodesia was bound to be a bitter one, if only because of two main grievances of the African peoples: the extension of racial discrimination under the minority rule; and the perpetuation of colonialism by the refusal of the United Kingdom to crush the rebellion. The unilateral declaration of independence had in itself been a violation of the 1961 Constitution. The United Kingdom Government therefore had a vacuum to fill, but was shunning its responsibilities. Yet the irony of the matter was that the same Government had been proclaiming its sole responsibility for Southern Rhodesia.

846. The United Nations must act without delay. Such legislation as the Land Apportionment Act and the pass laws was a transplantation of the South African pattern of discrimination.

847. The connivance and acquiescence of the United Kingdom Government, which had gone out of its way to proclaim its sole responsibility for Southern Rhodesia, could not pass unchallenged.

848. Africans charged the United Kingdom with striking a compromise with the minority racialists in Southern Rhodesia and calling the declaration of independence "unilateral" in order to deceive the world and draw international attention away from the real issue, which was colonialism. If in British eyes Mr. Smith was a rebel, he should have been apprehended and put on trial for rebellion. But he had been to London and returned untouched despite the threatened declaration of independence. The United Kingdom claimed responsibility for Southern Rhodesia, yet allowed African nationalists to languish in prison for "terrorism" while Mr. Smith and his cohorts were merely unpunishable rebels. There were only two sides to the issue: the African people of Southern Rhodesia and the colonial Power and the racist settler minority serving foreign interests.

849. The United Kingdom had ignored African demands to crush rebellion, but had not failed to use the Security Council for its own ends. When the Federation had been breaking up in 1963, the African Members of the United Nations had submitted a resolution aimed at blocking the transfer of the air force to the Southern Rhodesian white minority; but the United Kingdom had used its veto. If Mr. Smith was consolidating his régime, it was because he had the backing of senior army, air force and police officers. Yet those officers had received, or were receiving, government pensions.

850. Even after the unilateral declaration of independence, the United Kingdom and its allies shamelessly blocked the application of mandatory sanctions and the use of force provided for under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter. Therefore the Smith régime was being allowed time to consolidate itself, and in so doing it had initiated a rule of terror and massacre.

851. Many well-meaning people had asked why the African people of Southern Rhodesia had not risen against the illegal régime. In fact there was brave opposition, but because of strict censorship scarcely any information reached the outside world. However, the Tanzanian delegation was able to quote a number of incidents confirming active resistance. It had to be remembered that five years and the efforts of hundreds of millions of people had been needed to crush the Hitler régime.

852. The evils of the situation extended beyond the confines of Southern Rhodesia. It was six months since the unilateral declaration of independence and evidence showed that South Africa and Portugal were doing all they could to maintain the régime. That alliance would continue to frustrate the efforts of the United Nations to impose optional or mandatory economic sanctions.

853. The illegal régime also had evil effects on other independent African States. It had tried to hold Zambia hostage, but had been bitterly disappointed by the courageous stand of Dr. Kaunda and his people. The rebel government had threatened to expel all Zambians from Southern Rhodesia; after the failure of that move, it had raised the price of coal and insisted on payment in hard currency; when that too had failed, it had turned to the railways and demanded that all freight charges be paid cash in advance. That too had been frustrated by the gallant stand of Dr. Kaunda. The representative of Tanzania appealed to the rest of Africa to aid Zambia; for he was sure that it was making its current sacrifices for the sake of the people of Zimbabwe and the dignity of Africa. The greatest help that Africans could render Zambia was to overthrow the illegal régime in Southern Rhodesia. As any other course would be but a half measure, his delegation would continue to insist on the use of force as the only means of ending the rebellion. Meanwhile, independent African States could help Zambia to find other outlets for its goods.

854. Africans had foreseen the failure of sanctions. The United Kingdom Government had made a considerable stir over the two tankers at Beira; yet it knew that large quantities of oil were supplied daily through Bechuanaland. If the United Kingdom and the Security Council had been sincere over the sanctions, they would have complied with the African suggestion to seal off the borders of Southern Rhodesia. Sanctions were failing because the British did not want them to succeed, and indeed subverted them by, for instance, importing Rhodesian tobacco via South Africa as a South African commodity.

855. The Zimbabwe people needed practical and sincere friends immediately. Africans had therefore been shocked at New Zealand's vote against the resolution they had submitted to the Security Council. He hoped New Zealand would never need African support.

856. It was the duty of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) to ensure the defeat of the Smith régime and to ensure that the régime did not obtain de facto recognition from the United Kingdom.

857. His delegation intended to submit a resolution to the Special Committee during its current session. It would urge:

- (1) The release of all political prisoners;
- (2) Recognition of the legitimacy of the struggle of the Zimbabwe people;
- (3) Suspension of the 1961 Constitution and the cessation of all discriminatory practices;
- (4) Condemnation of the support given to Southern Rhodesia by Portugal and South Africa;
- (5) The formation of a policing force to seal off the borders of Southern Rhodesia;
- (6) The organization by the United Kingdom of a general election on a majority basis, under United Nations supervision;
- (7) An appeal to all countries to aid Zambia;
- (8) Adoption by the United Kingdom of all necessary measures, including the use of force, to crush the racist régime.

858. The representative of the Ivory Coast said that there was no point in going over every item in the record of Southern Rhodesia; it was enough to note that Mr. Ian Smith's illegal régime was still in existence and indeed growing in strength. Rhodesia's rebellion had come as no surprise to Africans, who had foreseen it since the adoption of the racist Constitution in 1961 and the break-up of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland in 1963. At that time, of course, the African countries had drawn the United Kingdom's attention to the danger involved in handing over the armed forces, including the air force, to the racist minority in Southern Rhodesia. But the United Kingdom had disregarded those warnings, and for the first time in history a colonial Power had given a colony the means of providing its own defence, thus placing 4 million Rhodesians at the mercy of a handful of racist white settlers.

859. However, the African countries had continued to place their trust in the United Nations. Unfortunately all the efforts made by the United Nations and by friendly countries had remained without effect, and the course of the negotiations between the United Kingdom and Mr. Smith's régime was alarming. Never within the memory of the colonized had a metropolitan government been observed begging its subjects not to proclaim independence and bowing to their demands in such a way. That behaviour could only encourage Mr. Smith to carry on his hateful work. Once again the United Kingdom had deserted the Africans, leaving them defenceless in the hands of a group of fanatics who planned to keep them eternally enslaved in the name of Western civilization. For that reason the Africans who still remembered what had happened at Stanleyville in November 1964 were in duty bound to come to the aid of their brothers. The only reason why they had not yet done so was that they had wished to avoid hampering the action of the United Kingdom, which had undertaken to put down the rebellion promptly. The fact now had to be faced that it had failed, and that the only course left was to resort to the provisions of Chapter VII, Article 42, of the Charter—in other words, to force, which was apparently the only means of transferring the powers of colonial authorities in an orderly manner to the peoples of the territories concerned. The Archbishop of Canterbury himself had stated that the failure of economic sanctions justified the use of force to restore law and keep order, when that could clearly be achieved by such means.

860. The United Kingdom Government must act quickly if it wanted to avert a race war in Africa, for Mr. Smith's action was not an isolated case. It was part of a general plan for the oppression of Africa, to which the racist régimes of South Africa, Portugal and Southern Rhodesia were parties. The fact that the Security Council had rejected the proposal for the use of force showed that the process of recognizing the fascist régime in Southern Rhodesia had already begun, inasmuch as the United Kingdom had undertaken to negotiate with a private individual who in reality had no legal authority. It was hard to believe that the problem would ever be solved by negotiation. Neither the Zimbabwe people nor the independent African countries could agree to a compromise solution that would amount to de facto recognition of the racist régime in Southern Rhodesia.

861. The African countries therefore believed that all available means, including the use of force, should be used to bring down the rebel régime, and they appealed to all democratic and peace-loving peoples to call upon the United Kingdom to take the necessary steps to regain control of the situation in Southern Rhodesia and to prepare for the grant of independence to the Zimbabwe people. The time for statements of intention was past. Action was now necessary, for international peace and security were at stake.

862. The representative of Tunisia said that the question of Southern Rhodesia was a matter of concern to the United Nations and would continue to be so until the Organization found an effective means of helping the Zimbabwe people to regain their lawful right to freedom and independence. He drew attention to paragraph 5 of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), which had been adopted unanimously. The many resolutions which the General Assembly and the Security Council had subsequently adopted on the subject had never been implemented, even in part. The United Kingdom had repeatedly claimed all responsibility with regard to Southern Rhodesia; but it was now clear that that attitude had been merely a clever subterfuge for maintaining the status quo and encouraging the white settlers to persist in their criminal designs. The United Kingdom—which, it would be recalled, had taken a courageous attitude when power was to be transferred to the majority in other territories—advocated the use of such unsound means as negotiation and economic sanctions in the case of Southern Rhodesia.

863. Thus, in defiance of General Assembly and Security Council resolutions, in defiance of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and of the democratic principle of the majority, in defiance even of international public opinion, a minority was oppressing 4 million people whose only desire was to live in dignity and peace.

864. The United Nations and the Special Committee were in duty bound to ensure, as soon as possible, that that criminal régime was rendered incapable of further mischief, and to expose the devious machinations of those countries which, while professing friendship for peoples struggling for their freedom, were underhandedly delivering arms and ammunition to the retrograde Powers that sought to impose their rule on Africa.

865. But obviously no government, however strong, could stay in power without popular support. Tunisia therefore believed that, despite injustice and military and police oppression, the Zimbabwe people, strong in international backing, should rise up and take back what was rightfully theirs. Tunisia would support them in their struggle, for it knew that no colonialist régime would cease to behave like an absolute master until it felt its security threatened.

866. The States Members of the United Nations should bring pressure to bear on the United Kingdom in order to force it to act; the Special Committee should make specific proposals to the General Assembly, designed to draw public attention to that tragic problem and to help the United Nations out of the impasse. Tunisia would unreservedly support any constructive proposal designed to free the African majority from oppression by the minority and to safeguard peace and justice on the African continent.

867. The representative of Denmark expressed his regret that the rebellion in Southern Rhodesia had not been crushed. He well understood the growing impatience of Africans, but it was essential to act in harmony. There was general agreement over the need to halt apartheid in South Africa and remove the Smith régime in Southern Rhodesia. The matter of Southern Rhodesia should be dealt with first as that problem could more readily be resolved.

868. Denmark recognized the United Kingdom's responsibility for a solution to the problem, but the United Nations also bore responsibility since the affair had been internationalized when referred to that body. The immediate aim of the common effort must be to remove the reprehensible régime, but the ultimate purpose was an independent Zimbabwe on the basis of majority rule—probably best brought about by direct United Kingdom rule through a transitional period. Denmark deeply regretted the split in the Security Council over Southern Rhodesia. However, as force could not be a purpose in itself, and would undermine the United Nations, it should be used only as a last resort.

869. Sanctions had been ineffective to date, but it would be unwise to conclude that the instrument was insufficient. It was essential that all States Members of the United Nations apply the sanctions. South Africa would not co-operate unless it were made to realize that by undermining the sanctions it would be the eventual sufferer. As it was, South Africa had a direct interest in that form of sabotage.

870. He reminded the Special Committee that Denmark had voted in favour of General Assembly resolution 2022 (XX) of 5 November 1965, which noted that the increasing co-operation between the authorities of Southern Rhodesia, South Africa and Portugal was designed to perpetuate racist minority rule in southern Africa and constituted a threat to freedom, peace and security in Africa.

871. It was important to maintain confidence in economic sanctions, and the Special Committee should press the United Nations to persuade all Member States to discontinue their economic relations with Southern Rhodesia. If any were unwilling to co-operate, the United Nations might have to intervene to enforce that policy.

872. Finally, he felt it was the duty and wish of the Special Committee to stress that the aim must be rapid independence for the Zimbabwe people.

873. The representative of Syria said that the new dimensions reached by the Southern Rhodesian crisis constituted a grave threat to international peace. The principles for which the United Nations stood were being violated by a minority régime based on conquest, motivated by oppression and exploitation, and thriving on discrimination.

874. The administering Power had built up a private company to the status of a conquering leviathan. It had annexed most of the territory to the Crown, distributed the most fertile land to the foreign minority, isolated the African inhabitants from the rest of the world by confining them to the most arid areas, used them for cheap forced labour, denied them access to property by such shameful legislation as the Land Apportionment Act, and prevented them from acquiring skill by such measures as the so-called Labour Conciliation Act. It had continued the process by encouraging white immigration, arming the settlers, extending foreign monopolies over the country's resources, and, finally, proclaiming the colony to be autonomous. There had been one over-all purpose: to usurp permanently the rights of the people of Zimbabwe to their land, their freedom and their independence.

875. However, when the settlers had seen their benefactor compelled to recognize the evolution of human relations that had liberated most of Africa, they had rebelled and declared their independence. They claimed to be free from any restraint that would prevent them from keeping African people in Zimbabwe under constant subjection and denying them their most elementary rights.

876. The administering Power had taken a double stand: on the one hand it had claimed sole responsibility over its colony of Southern Rhodesia, and on the other it had abstained from taking any effective action to quell the rebellion. That flagrant contradiction between words and acts was the object of much comment and regret, particularly among members of the Special Committee. The contradiction was, however, more apparent than real. The claim to sole responsibility had been in order to prevent action by others, and had given an added measure of protection and assurance to the régime it had chosen to call "rebel" in order to appease world opinion. The measures it had taken were those that it had known in advance would be harmless. No embargo could succeed as long as South Africa was able to offer its help. The opposition to sanctions against South Africa by the United Kingdom representative at the last session of the General Assembly had placed the policy of the administering Power in its true perspective.

877. Referring to the statement made by the representative of Denmark at the previous meeting, he said that Verwoerd's régime was well aware that the slightest suggestion to apply Chapter VII of the Charter against South Africa would be met by vehement opposition on the part of the United Kingdom.

Given that advance guarantee of non-action, it would be futile to rely on persuasion. He could only wish that the well-intentioned ideas of the Danish representative could be put into practice.

878. He could speak from bitter experience. The Power that was the trustee of the land of Zimbabwe was the same Power that had been trustee of the Palestine Mandate and had promised alien elements a so-called national home in Palestine at the expense of the majority. Behind the tragedy of more than 1 million Arab refugees expelled from their land and homes were the same manoeuvres, intrigues and claims of sole responsibility, and the same juridical subtleties. An amazing similarity could be drawn. The conquerors might be using time to entrench themselves and another fait accompli might be in the making; they would not hesitate to embark on genocide to panic the African masses into fleeing their homeland. The colonial pattern had been thoroughly tested and found to be worth applying again. The conclusions that the petitioners had reached concerning the hopelessness of any measure taken by the administering Power were fully justified, and their appeal for international action stemmed from their sense of realism. That Power that had professed its indignation at Smith's illegal act was now meeting his representatives for negotiations, as though the rights of the Zimbabwe people could be an object of bargaining between essentially alien parties.

879. The record went on endlessly: angry statements, diplomatic contacts, dramatic rehearsals in the Security Council about the oil cargo of two ships while oil was being supplied abundantly by South Africa—negotiations, their suspension for reflection, and optimism succeeding pessimism and vice versa. Meanwhile innocent people were suffering, and another bastion of colonialism was being consolidated.

880. His delegation supported the stand made by the Organization of African Unity (OAU) and the struggle of the freedom fighters, and the proposals made by the representatives of Tanzania and Mali.

881. The representative of Yugoslavia said that the rejection of the African draft resolution at the recent Security Council meeting was a case for very serious concern. The United Kingdom's responsibility for the situation in Southern Rhodesia was a well-established fact; indeed it had been confirmed by the Foreign Secretary of the United Kingdom himself.

882. Since the unilateral declaration the United Kingdom Government had been urged to discharge that responsibility and take the necessary measures, including force, to liquidate the racist régime and grant independence to the people of Zimbabwe under majority rule. Instead of taking adequate action it had given assurances that it would end the régime by economic sanctions within a matter of weeks.

883. His delegation had stated on 19 April 1966 that those who had given credence to such promises had realized that they had been taken in, that the rule of law had not been re-established and that there was no reason to believe the present measures capable of doing so. Despite its promises not to recognize the Smith régime, the United Kingdom Government had now begun talks with it.

884. He emphasized that the situation in Southern Rhodesia was closely connected with that in the other colonies and that there was close interconnexion of interests of colonial Powers and racist régimes in the southern part of Africa. In the opinion of his delegation, each genuine blow to the Smith régime would have had a more negative effect on the economic and other interests of colonial and some other Powers. That was the reason for lack of adequate action against the Smith régime.

885. The Security Council's failure to act was a matter of grave concern. The way in which the United Kingdom Government was dealing with the Smith régime was not leading to majority rule but to further worsening a situation that already constituted a serious threat to peace.

886. He quoted from the report of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the Federal Assembly on 20 January 1966, that the attempt to set up a racist and colonialist stronghold in Central Africa might easily develop into a crisis whose effects might be felt outside the African continent, which reaffirmed the need to put an end to colonialism without delay.

887. He stressed that the situation in Southern Rhodesia since that time had worsened and had indeed become a threat to peace. The Special Committee should recommend appropriate measures to the Security Council. Broader and more determined action, including the use of force, was necessary.

888. He emphasized that Yugoslavia had no relations with Southern Rhodesia. The Yugoslav Government had most severely condemned the unilateral declaration of independence. The Yugoslav Government fully supported the past struggle of the people of Zimbabwe and in co-operation with African and other Members of the United Nations would continue to lend its support to all actions and measures aimed at enabling the people of Zimbabwe to decide freely and independently on their future.

889. The Yugoslav delegation would associate itself with any resolution that would lead to the downfall of the Smith régime and the establishment of majority rule.

890. The representative of Venezuela said that Southern Rhodesia, as well as South West Africa and the Portuguese colonies, were chronic cases which tested the international community's capacity for effective action. They were a challenge both to the United Nations and to the validity of the principles of the Charter. The unilateral declaration of independence by Southern Rhodesia was the logical outcome of a crisis which had been allowed to develop through indifference with, it seemed, the connivance and support of the administering Power.

891. Every time that the problem had made itself felt, that Power had adopted a contradictory position, claiming, on the one hand, that it had complete responsibility for everything to do with Southern Rhodesia, while on the other hand, saying that it could not act because of its agreement with the Rhodesian Government. However, the declaration of independence, which was contrary to the provisions both of that agreement and of the 1961 Constitution, by reason of its illegality placed the Government of Ian Smith in a state of rebellion against the British Crown and unilaterally terminated that agreement. Therefore, the United Kingdom Government no longer had any excuse not to intervene and take the necessary steps to restore the rights of the Zimbabwe people.

892. In his view, it was no longer a question of applying sanctions to Southern Rhodesia. The United Nations must urge the United Kingdom to fulfil its obligations since, by its own admission, it bore sole responsibility in the matter, and to act in accordance with the provisions of the Charter, instead of holding undercover negotiations with the present illegal Government with a view to restoring the 1961 Constitution; the United Kingdom must crush the rebellion; convene a constitutional conference in which all concerned, and above all the Zimbabwe people, should take part, draft a new constitution and hand over sovereign power to those who were entitled to it, namely, to 4 million Africans, the entire people of Southern Rhodesia and not one sector of it. In this connexion his delegation completely endorsed the statements made by the petitioners.

893. Venezuela had not recognized and would not recognize the Smith Government. As its representative had made clear in the note addressed to the Secretariat, the Venezuelan Government had prohibited all trade with Southern Rhodesia, particularly exports of oil and petroleum products to that country, until such time as the Zimbabwe people had been restored to its rights in accordance with the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council.

894. The Venezuelans, a freedom-loving people and peace-loving people, respected the rights of other peoples and were anti-colonialist by nature and tradition, and they would never consider that the problem was settled as long as the rights of an entire people were ignored and trampled underfoot and as long as the Zimbabwe people had not regained freedom and independence under a democratic system of universal adult suffrage.

895. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics remarked that the Special Committee was considering an issue which was of deep concern to all progressive men, to all States Members of the United Nations and above all, of course, to the peoples of Africa which were waging a heroic struggle to rid themselves of the colonialist and racist régimes still present on African soil. It was no accident that the future of the Zimbabwe people was being considered. There were only two possibilities: either the Zimbabwe people would obtain their freedom and independence or there would be a triumph of the racist clique which had taken over power at Salisbury with the help of the colonialist and imperialist Powers. Those Powers shrank from nothing to maintain their domination over Southern Rhodesia, or which they wished to make a base of colonialism and neo-colonialism. Supported by the racist régime of Verwoerd, allied to the fascist régime of Salazar and backed by the military and colonialist NATO bloc, Southern Rhodesia had become a bastion of racism and apartheid. All those régimes had a clear objective: they had developed a new colonialist strategy in Africa, the purpose of which was not only to serve imperialist interests in Central and Eastern Africa, but also to assemble a military potential in that region. The imperialist monopolies, the capitals of which were London, Washington and Brussels, to name but a few, were endeavoring to strangle the national liberation movements in South Africa and Southern Rhodesia as they were endeavouring to crush the freedom fighters in Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea. They wished to force the peoples of those countries to give up their right to independence so that none of the dependent peoples of Africa could achieve advances and free themselves from economic bondage. The imperialist and colonialist Powers were determined not to give up Africa; they still hoped to place it once again under their political, and in some cases economic, influence so as to recolonize certain African peoples. That the imperialist forces had a hand in the situation in Southern Rhodesia was obvious. The ruling classes in the United Kingdom were pretending to condemn the activities of the present Rhodesian régime, calling it rebellious and proclaiming that they wished to put an end to it. But the facts were clear: the United Kingdom Government, and also the United States Government, which fully supported it, were doing all they could to maintain the Ian Smith régime.

896. The members of the Special Committee were aware of the developments in the Rhodesian question, which they had considered on many occasions, as the General Assembly and the Security Council had also done. All three bodies had adopted many useful resolutions, but the United Kingdom, the United States, the Federal Republic of Germany, Portugal, South Africa and other colonialist countries had refused to take account of the wishes of the peoples as set forth in the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. Those Powers had refused to take account of the many United Nations resolutions condemning the activities of the racists in Southern Rhodesia and calling for the granting of genuine independence to the Zimbabwe people. Initially, the United Kingdom had affirmed the primacy of racist ideology by imposing on the Zimbabwe people—more than 4 million inhabitants of Southern Rhodesia—the racist 1961 Constitution, which had deprived that people of all its political rights. Subsequently, after the break-up of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, and despite the urging of the independent African States, it had allowed the Rhodesian racists to seize the instruments of power, namely, the armed forces and military equipment. The response of the United Kingdom Government to the manifold resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council demanding the abolition of the 1961 Constitution had always been negative. London and Washington alleged that the economic sanctions imposed on the Ian Smith régime were yielding the anticipated results. At the same time, the United Kingdom, the United States, the Federal Republic of Germany and Japan were trading with South Africa. The figures published by the Board of Trade in March 1966 for trade between the United Kingdom and Southern Rhodesia showed that even after the embargo set up by the United Kingdom, that country's imports from Southern Rhodesia had amounted to £523,000 for the month of February 1966, and its exports to Southern Rhodesia to £672,000.

897. The role of some NATO States and primarily that of the United States, in the matter of economic sanctions against the Ian Smith régime was also questionable. According to the 28 March 1966 issue of International Trade, the Secretary of Commerce of the United States had placed an almost total embargo on the major share of exports to South Africa. However, that decision dated only from 18 March 1966; moreover, the embargo had not been applied to a sufficient number of goods. It provided, for example, for the granting of export licences for agricultural equipment, many primary commodities, scientific equipment, textiles, etc. The authorization to export agricultural equipment and produce merely strengthened the position of the large stock-breeders and planters who were ruthlessly exploiting the Africans and were supporting the Ian Smith régime. Since agriculture played an extremely important part in the Rhodesian economy, such exports helped to neutralize the boycott of that basic economic sector.

898. Statistics for the months of January and February 1966 showed that United States trade with South Africa and Southern Rhodesia had not faltered. In addition, exports to Southern Rhodesia also included goods listed as strategic equipment, spare parts for electro-dynamic machinery and construction materials.

899. United States tobacco purchases from Rhodesia since 11 November, the date of the unilateral declaration of independence by Ian Smith, totalled £175,000, an amount equal to the annual average for United States tobacco purchases from Southern Rhodesia.

900. In January and February 1966, exports from the Federal Republic of Germany to Southern Rhodesia had amounted to £55,000, while its imports from Southern Rhodesia for the month of January alone had amounted to £1,170,000. In April 1966, Mr. Strauss, former Minister of Defence of the Federal Republic, had gone to Southern Rhodesia and to South Africa to begin trade negotiations with Ian Smith and with representatives of his régime and of certain Rhodesian trade circles. According to the German newspaper Die Welt a desire had been expressed during that visit to expand trade between the Ian Smith régime and the Federal Republic of Germany.

901. According to the Daily Express of 20 April 1966, a company was being formed for that purpose in the Federal Republic of Germany which already included five large industrial and export firms. Also according to the Daily Express, the management of that company had stated that the company, which had the powerful support of some Swiss banks, would assist German industrial enterprises to the greatest possible extent, despite the prevailing situation.

902. The embargo on petroleum and its derivatives had been a failure. It was an instrument designed to maintain the racist régime of Ian Smith in power. The United Kingdom and the United States kept stressing economic sanctions, which, according to them, should suffice to bring down the Ian Smith régime. Mr. Swart, President of the Republic of South Africa, had told Parliament on 21 January 1966 that his Government would maintain normal relations with the Ian Smith Government and would not apply the sanctions initiated against Southern Rhodesia. In that regard, the Lisbon colonialists echoed the Pretoria racists. Five days after the Security Council resolution calling upon States Members of the United Nations to break all economic relations with Southern Rhodesia, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Portugal had stated that his Government would maintain normal relations with the Ian Smith Government.

903. The Security Council had called on all Member States to cease exporting oil and petroleum products to Southern Rhodesia. However, oil continued to flow and was being delivered to Southern Rhodesia by the Republic of South Africa via Mozambique. At present, oil deliveries amounted to 100,000 gallons daily, while the weekly consumption of Southern Rhodesia was roughly 83,000 gallons. World public opinion agreed that the sanctions, as they were being applied, did not ensure a real embargo.

904. The same was true of the financial sanctions against the Ian Smith Government. On 3 March 1966, The Times of London had stated that for the moment, there was no reason to fear a collapse of the financial system of Southern Rhodesia. There too, the South African racists, together with the capitalist monopolies of the West, were coming to the aid of their bosom friends in Rhodesia. According to The Economist, monthly trade credits available to Southern Rhodesia in mid-April 1966 had amounted to $2.1 million.

905. It would take too long to list every case in which the resolutions aimed at doing away with the shameful Ian Smith régime had not been implemented. The responsibility lay with the Republic of South Africa and Portugal. The Lisbon and Pretoria racists had powerful protectors in the West, primarily among the members of the colonialist and militarist NATO bloc, namely, the United Kingdom, the United States, the Federal Republic of Germany and certain other Western Powers. Discussing the reasons for the policies of the Republic of South Africa and Southern Rhodesia as regards Mozambique and Angola, a New York Times journalist had stated that the United States, the United Kingdom and other Western States were increasing their investment in those four countries and that official sources considered that Western public opinion would not be able to react forcefully enough against the fallacious arguments of the financial groups. Thus, the failure of economic sanctions against the Ian Smith régime was to a large extent attributable to the fact that the United Kingdom and the United States had invested capital in Rhodesia and that their main objective was to defend those investments under the cloak of a few limited economic sanctions.

906. The United Kingdom and the United States had made considerable financial commitments in the Republic of South Africa, South West Africa, Mozambique, Angola and Southern Rhodesia, thus demonstrating their readiness to ignore the fact that the Salazar régime was supporting the racist régime of Southern Rhodesia. The ineffectiveness of the steps taken against the Ian Smith régime and its partners, Portugal, South Africa and other NATO Powers, had left the Rhodesian racists free to commit further crimes against the Zimbabwe people.

907. In Southern Rhodesia, anyone who dared to speak up against the criminal machinations of Salisbury was subject to reprisals and to constant persecution. Southern Rhodesia had become a police State, a land of prisons and concentration camps, and its African population lived in terror. There was but one conclusion to be drawn from his remarks: the responsibility for the failure of the sanctions and for the present situation lay primarily with the United Kingdom, as the administering Power, and with its accomplices, the United States, the Federal Republic of Germany, and the Pretoria and Lisbon régimes, as well as with the countries which in one way or another hindered the application of the sanctions adopted by the Security Council. London and Washington had shown their true attitude towards the police State of Ian Smith when they had voted on the draft resolution submitted by Mali, Nigeria and Uganda to the Security Council on 23 May 1966; by refusing to support the proposal of the African States, members of the Security Council, to apply really effective sanctions, to combat the sabotage of the Republic of South Africa and to take practical steps to abolish the racist régime in South Africa, the United States and the United Kingdom had demonstrated that they were the accomplices of the racist Salisbury régime.

908. By defending imperialist interests in Africa, London and Washington had adopted an untenable position on the question of Southern Rhodesia. In their statements the United Kingdom and the United States pretended to sympathize with the Zimbabwe people, spoke of the right of peoples to self-determination and of their freedom to appoint the government of their choice, but in actual fact they were extending a helping hand to the Salisbury racists. The negotiations initiated by the United Kingdom Government with the representative of the Ian Smith régime had been watched with as much attention as indignation. It was quite clear that the negotiations between London and Salisbury were nothing but a smoke-screen to conceal the plot being hatched against the Zimbabwe people. As recently as 10 December 1965, Mr. Harold Wilson, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, had stated in the British Parliament that his Government would never negotiate with the illegal Salisbury régime. But negotiations were now under way. On 25 January 1966, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom had repeated that the political future of Southern Rhodesia could not be discussed with a régime which illegally claimed to govern the country, and today, that same Prime Minister was sitting down at the same table with the representative of that régime. After having said that the future constitution of Southern Rhodesia would have to be discussed with the accredited representatives of the entire Zimbabwe people, he was now negotiating with the representatives of the régime which he had called illegitimate, illegal and rebellious, while the real representatives of the Zimbabwe people had been prevented from taking part in those negotiations.

909. The United Kingdom Government was negotiating with the Ian Smith régime because it wished to deal with the racists behind the backs of the African people. The colonialist Powers were thus trying to maintain imperialist domination in Africa. The Soviet Union had stated its position clearly and repeatedly in the various United Nations organs. That position was the expression of a firm and coherent policy of defending peoples struggling to free themselves from the colonialist yoke. As always, the Soviet Union defended the sacred right of peoples to govern themselves and freely to choose the methods of their own development.

910. The Government of the Soviet Union had steadfastly supported the struggle of the Zimbabwe people for genuine freedom and independence. It was ready to support any action undertaken by the African nations to guarantee that people's rights.

911. The Special Committee could not remain indifferent to the situation prevailing in Southern Rhodesia, since it constituted a threat to peace and security, not only in Africa, but in the rest of the world as well. Maintaining the white racists in power in Southern Rhodesia was merely helping the imperialist and racist forces which had conceived the criminal idea of setting up a kind of "sanitary cordon" to isolate the peoples of southern Africa, which were still dominated by white colonialists and racists, in the hope of preserving them from the influence of the free African peoples and thus preventing them from freeing themselves.

912. The Soviet Union, the only permanent member of the Security Council to have voted in favour of the draft resolution submitted by Mali, Nigeria and Uganda, supported the just claims of the African countries. It believed that emergency measures must be taken to solve the problem of Southern Rhodesia as soon as possible, in the interests both of the Zimbabwe people and of all African peoples. The claims of the African peoples were entirely clear. Power must be taken out of the hands of the racists, the racist 1961 Constitution must be abrogated, a final date for granting independence to the Zimbabwe people must be fixed, elections must be organized based on the principle of universal suffrage—"one man, one vote"—and power in Southern Rhodesia must be transferred immediately to a government reflecting the desire of the African majority to see implemented the Declaration of the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

913. The Special Committee had a duty to condemn the Portuguese colonialists and the South African racists as it had a duty to condemn all those who were assisting the Ian Smith régime in Southern Rhodesia and who, whether openly or covertly, refused to implement United Nations resolutions. It had a duty to issue a new appeal to all Member States to implement immediately and unreservedly the general resolutions relating to the problems of Southern Rhodesia adopted by the Security Council and the General Assembly.

914. The USSR Government advocated, as it had always done, that the most effective and comprehensive measures possible should be taken against the Rhodesian racists. More particularly, it demanded the application of the sanctions provided for in Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, as they alone could protect the interests of the Zimbabwe people and of all other African peoples.

915. The USSR delegation would support any draft resolution taking account of the considerations he had mentioned. It hoped that those conditions as well as the proposals submitted today by the representatives of Mali, Tanzania, India and other countries would be given careful attention and would be embodied in the decisions which the Special Committee would be called upon to take.

916. The representative of Sierra Leone said that since the Committee had discussed the question of Southern Rhodesia a year before, Smith had made his unilateral declaration of independence, and the United Kingdom Government had taken no serious action to bring down that rebellion.

917. The petitioners had told of increased oppression and of the imprisonment of over 34,000 people of Zimbabwe because they had dared to speak up for their inalienable political rights. The United Kingdom had said that it could not free them because it was an internal matter. His delegation had never agreed with that point of view. Since the United Kingdom had repeatedly stated that the Smith Government was illegal and that its Governor in Salisbury was the only legal representative, the fiction by which it had shielded itself had disappeared.

918. The United Kingdom had stated in the Lagos declaration that the Smith régime would be toppled by sanctions in a matter of weeks. Yet, after almost seven months that régime continued to exist. It was receiving all the oil it needed and it could fall back on electricity and coal if forced to do so. It was well known that oil supplies went in daily through South Africa and Mozambique. Trade had increased with Japan, the Federal Republic of Germany and France—a clear indication of the ineffectiveness of sanctions.

919. In April 1966, after the United Kingdom had tried to block action in the Special Committee, and had called the Security Council, which had passed its draft, four things had been clearly established: first, the so-called sanctions were not working. Secondly, there was a tacit agreement that sanctions alone could not work. Force was necessary. Thirdly, the resulting situation constituted a threat to peace; and fourthly, the Security Council resolution had called upon the United Kingdom to prevent by the use of force if necessary the arrival at Beira of vessels reasonably believed to be carrying oil destined for Southern Rhodesia, and had empowered the United Kingdom to arrest and detain the tanker known as the Joanna V upon her departure from Beira in the event of her oil cargo being discharged there.

920. By that resolution, the Security Council had authorized the use of force under Chapter VII of the Charter in respect of a single ship of uncertain nationality. By rejecting the African amendment, and the draft resolution of Mali, Nigeria and Uganda which had sought to extend the use of force to the more important issue of the swift removal of the Smith régime, the Council had shown its unwillingness to act in accordance with the wish of the majority of States.

921. Under Chapter VII of the Charter, force could and should be used without delay. Any hesitation or doubt strengthened the Smith régime, which had already begun efforts to strangle Zambia. Coal deliveries and communications had been disrupted; perhaps the next move would be to cut off power to Zambia from the Kariba Dam.

922. The Special Committee must not sit back and refuse to use force while a whole nation was being blackmailed. It must let the United Kingdom know that its non-intervention in Southern Rhodesia was a betrayal of the trust of the African people of Zimbabwe. It was a disgrace for the United Kingdom to have used the Africans in Southern Rhodesia and their brothers in West and East Africa to fight for it in two world wars, and to be now unwilling in turn to fight to liberate Africa. Thousands of Africans had been killed in Burma and hundreds had flown planes over Europe to help the United Kingdom and its allies to maintain their way of life. Yet they were the very people who were now doing everything in their power to prevent any serious action. The United Kingdom could not deny that it had used force in other areas to maintain constitutionality: it was doing so in Aden at that very moment.

923. Two conclusions could be drawn from that indifference to African opinion: first, that the United Kingdom and its allies were content with the status quo, their economic interests being best served by keeping the Africans as hewers of wood and drawers of water.

924. The second conclusion was that had there been 200,000 Blacks among 4 million Whites, strong action would long since have been taken if they had dared to usurp power. Yet when the small minority of whites had tyrannized the Africans in their own land, no effective action had been taken.

925. When the United States and United Kingdom Governments had felt that the lives of a comparatively small number of their citizens had been at stake in the Congo, they had promptly organized an air lift for what they had described as a humanitarian mission. At present, they had no regard for the feelings of the African people who were oppressed in Southern Rhodesia.

926. The goal of the African people was to establish majority rule in Zimbabwe, to which end Britain would have to use force to bring down Smith, and the Security Council must approve that course. The unjust 1961 Constitution must be revoked and the leaders immediately set free. A constitutional conference must then be called to determine the people's wishes. Force had been used in the small matter of one ship; it should now be used immediately to ensure majority rule in the territory and enable the people of Zimbabwe to move swiftly to freedom and independence. Any resolution that expressed those ideas, condemned the United Kingdom for its inaction, and Portugal and South Africa for their help, would find support from his delegation.

927. The representative of Poland endorsed the statement made at a previous meeting (A/AC.109/SR.418) by the Chairman concerning the Security Council's failure to adopt the resolution submitted by Mali, Nigeria and Uganda, and supported by Bulgaria, Jordan and the USSR.

928. The blame for that failure must be placed squarely upon the United Kingdom, the United States and their allies. By withholding support for the resolution they had demonstrated that they were prepared to help the racist white settlers when it came to a choice between that régime and the legitimate aspirations of the people of Zimbabwe.

929. The attitude of those Powers was a further encouragement for the Smith régime. The United Kingdom as administering Power of Southern Rhodesia, had consistently abetted the racial minority in that territory, before and after the usurpation of power by Mr. Ian Smith; indeed the fact that it had stated in advance that it would not use force had encouraged the white settlers in their action, and the continuation of such a policy after the unilateral declaration of independence was a mere smoke-screen to allow the illegal régime time to consolidate its position. The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom had predicted that the cumulative effect of economic and financial sanctions would bring down the Smith régime in weeks rather than months; but it was now plain that those sanctions had failed, for the régime had been in power for almost seven months in spite of the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council and of world opinion. The rebellion was continuing because it derived its strength from outside support.

930. It was becoming increasingly clear that the question of Southern Rhodesia could not be reviewed in isolation, and that it was directly connected with the racist oppression in the Republic of South Africa. That had been amply demonstrated by the evidence of the petitioners who had appeared before the Special Committee; their testimony had shed light on the true intentions of the United Kingdom, the United States, the Federal Republic of Germany and other members of NATO. Far from giving effective help in abolishing the racist minority régime, they were in fact contributing to its maintenance because of their many financial and economic links with Southern Rhodesia and its neighbours — South Africa and Portuguese Mozambique.

931. The working paper prepared by the Secretariat clearly showed that South Africa and Portugal were openly defying the Security Council's resolution by continuing to provide financial and other assistance to Southern Rhodesia, and that companies in the Federal Republic of Germany, Japan, the United Kingdom and the United States were still carrying on a flourishing trade with Southern Rhodesia. The oil embargo had also failed, for South Africa and Portugal had been able to send in supplies. Portugal was maintaining normal relations with Southern Rhodesia, and had even questioned the legality of a recent decision of the Security Council, even though the scope of that decision had been deliberately limited.

932. The true intentions of the United Kingdom, the United States and their allies had also been clearly shown by their abstention from voting on the proposals of the African members of the Security Council, in April and May 1966, which were designed to make the economic sanctions all-embracing and mandatory.

933. His Government sympathized with the concern and the bitterness of African nations in the face of the deliberate attempt to create yet another racist State in Africa, and was convinced that the United Kingdom did possess the means to do away with the Smith régime. Effective measures, including the use of force, must be taken to dislodge that régime. His delegation felt in duty bound to appeal to the Security Council to adopt mandatory sanctions within the framework of Chapter VII of the Charter, so as to enforce its own resolution 217 (1965), and by inviting the administering Power to use all means including force, the Security Council would pave the way for the granting of genuine independence.

934. Poland had always advocated the implementation by peaceful means of the Declaration contained in resolution 1514 (XV). While in favour of the principle of negotiation, it was deeply apprehensive of the secret talks going on between the United Kingdom and the rebel régime in Salisbury, for they implied de facto recognition of the régime and encouraged it even further. Instead of negotiating with the Zimbabwe people, the United Kingdom was trying to come to an arrangement behind their backs. A number of proposals had been made with which his delegation was in agreement, in particular those of the delegations of Mali and Tanzania. The statement by the representative of Denmark although well-intentioned and sincere had been worded so as not to mention Portuguese violation of the sanctions. He hoped that omission had been unintentional, and was unconnected with the fact that Portugal was a member of NATO. Adoption by the Special Committee of the method of action proposed by the representative of Denmark would mean a step backwards, for whereas Security Council resolution 217 (1965) of 20 November 1965 called upon all States to apply sanctions, the representative of Denmark had suggested that all United Nations Member States should do so, thus ruling out the Federal Republic of Germany, which was not a Member of the United Nations but continues her support of the racist régimes of Smith and Verwoerd.

935. The representative of Denmark had stressed the need for reason and patience in dealing with the Southern Rhodesia problem, and had tried to persuade the Special Committee not to recommend the use of force. The Polish delegation would be the first to agree with such a policy if a genuine desire existed to grant equal rights, freedom and independence to the people of Zimbabwe; but the United Kingdom was ignoring those rights and supporting a racist régime. The Special Committee could not condone such a policy. Although the Special Committee had been dealing with the matter for six years, the United Kingdom had consistently ignored its views as well as those of the great majority of Member States, including Denmark itself.

936. His own Government had implemented in full all the resolutions adopted by the Security Council and the General Assembly, had consistently supported the right of the Zimbabwe people to independence, and had repeatedly advised the United Kingdom to abrogate the 1961 Constitution. The Committee should set a target date for the transfer of powers, and the United Kingdom should be requested to conduct general elections in the territory and to set up a democratically elected government, which would abolish discriminatory laws, and the state of emergency and release political prisoners.

937. The Special Committee's immediate objective, however, should be to put down the rebellion. It should appeal to the Security Council to take appropriate steps to implement its own decision of 20 November 1965. His delegation would support any proposal on those lines.

938. The representative of Chile thanked the Tanzanian Government for once again extending its generous hospitality to the Special Committee, thus enabling the Committee to renew its contacts with the various liberation movements with headquarters at Dar es Salaam which were fighting for the independence of their respective countries.

939. Turning to the question of Southern Rhodesia, he deplored the fact that the administering Power had not endeavoured to prevent, by every means at its command, the unilateral declaration of independence. Now that Mr. Smith had defied the free world by proclaiming a fictitious independence, the United Nations must take the necessary steps to put an end to that minority régime, which refused to grant the just claims of the Zimbabwe people. The economic sanctions had failed because some countries had failed to co-operate and because South Africa and Portugal had ignored the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council. The Chilean Government, for its part, had applied to the latter General Assembly resolution 2022 (XX), as well as Security Council resolutions 216 (1965) and 217 (1965). If all other countries had done the same, the minority régime of Mr. Smith would certainly have been overthrown.

940. His delegation would firmly support any steps that might be taken, in accordance with the provisions of the Charter, to overthrow the Ian Smith régime and enable the people of Southern Rhodesia to attain their independence and form their own government.

941. The representative of Bulgaria said that the position of the Bulgarian delegation with regard to the problem of Southern Rhodesia was well known and had been recently reaffirmed at the last meeting of the Security Council. The Government and people of Bulgaria fully supported the relentless struggle of the Zimbabwe people to rid themselves of a double colonial domination—by the United Kingdom and by the white racist minority.

942. The most recent debates in the Security Council and the rejection of the draft resolution submitted by the African members of the Council had once again turned the spotlight on the policies of the United Kingdom, which was tolerating the criminal acts of the white racist minority bent on depriving the Zimbabwe people of their fundamental political rights and maintaining them in slavery. Succeeding United Kingdom Governments had systematically paved the way for Ian Smith, who had thus no difficulty in proclaiming independence unilaterally.

943. The secret negotiations which were now being held in London between Ian Smith and the United Kingdom Government and which, it appeared, were to continue at Salisbury, had rightly aroused the indignation of the African countries, since they were tantamount to de facto recognition of the illegal régime of Southern Rhodesia. The United Kingdom was more than ever reluctant to use force against that racist régime, while emphatically affirming that it alone was responsible for Southern Rhodesia. That ingenious policy enabled it both to maintain the racist minority régime in power and to hinder the implementation of all the measures adopted by the Security Council to overthrow that régime. The United States and the Western Powers, in particular the Federal Republic of Germany, had increased their co-operation with the Ian Smith régime, either directly or through South Africa. The régime was taking its inspiration from nazi ideas and Hitlerist practices in order to maintain its subjugation of the Zimbabwe people. There were camps in Southern Rhodesia in which prisoners were tortured and in which the anti-communist hysteria of fascism ran riot. Fortunately for the African peoples and for all peoples of the world, there was another German State, and it took the liberation of colonial peoples to heart. As would be recalled, on 20 April 1966, the Chairman of the Special Committee had received a telegram from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the German Democratic Republic in which the Minister stated unequivocally that his Government had refused to recognize the racist Ian Smith régime and that it had no relations with it.

944. He himself shared the view of the African representatives who had pointed out that the United States, the United Kingdom and the other Western Powers were always ready to use force against African freedom-fighters, but never against fascist criminals or white racists. The representative of the Ivory Coast had quite rightly recalled the armed intervention of Belgium at Stanleyville, with the co-operation of the United Kingdom and the United States, against the Congolese troops on the pretext that it was protecting a handful of white nationals. It was regrettable that Western humanitarianism did not extend far enough to protect the lives of human beings whose skin was not white.

945. In its resolution of 21 April 1966 (A/AC.109/158), the Special Committee had recommended that the administering Power should use force against the racist minority in Southern Rhodesia and that the Security Council should urgently apply the measures envisaged under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations so that its resolutions would be put into effect as soon as possible. It was time for the United Kingdom and its allies to stop sabotaging the work of the Security Council. The Special Committee, for its part, now that it was on African soil, should adopt a resolution providing for effective measures to remove the fascist Ian Smith régime and restore the sacred rights of the Zimbabwe people to freedom and self-determination.

946. The representative of the United States of America recalled that her country's views on the question of self-determination for the African peoples had been most recently set forth by President Johnson in an address on the occasion of the third anniversary of the Organization of African Unity (OAU). President Johnson had described the right of self-government through democratic institutions as a basic aspiration shared by the people of Africa and the people of the United States. He had promised that his Government would not support policies abroad based on minority rule or on the idea that men were unequal before the law.

947. The United States Government was therefore in complete agreement with the ideals of the people of Southern Rhodesia. It did, however, consider that the countries of the world must exhaust all the possibilities of achieving the desired objectives by peaceful means before risking bloodshed in Africa. For that reason it was supporting the current efforts of the United Kingdom and the United Nations. The latter was indeed required by its Charter to explore all avenues to a peaceful solution before resorting to others. It was true that the United Nations had not yet achieved its goal, but before the Special Committee concluded that its action had been ineffective an examination of the facts was necessary.

948. In November 1965 the Security Council had voted unanimously in resolution 217 for a stringent programme of measures designed to isolate Smith, politically and economically, and to end his régime. Since then, sixty-six States had volunteered information concerning steps taken to implement that programme.

949. The United Nations action had included a call on Member States not to recognize the Smith régime; and not one State had done so. It was regrettable that certain countries had publicly expressed their intention not to comply with the economic measures called for in resolution 217 (1965), though the majority had supported them. However, a considerable variety of response could be distinguished. Some States, in particular socialist countries with centrally directed foreign trade, had had no significant economic relations with Southern Rhodesia. For those countries, implementation of the resolution was largely a matter of form. But neighbouring countries, such as Zambia and Malawi had suffered acutely; others, including her own, had found the impact less direct but nevertheless substantial. The United States had previously had a wide variety of economic ties with Southern Rhodesia, and had had to take a correspondingly wide variety of steps. Applications for government loans and guarantees for Rhodesian trade had been suspended; effective measures had been taken to discourage the major imports; the 1965 and 1966 sugar quotas had been suspended and indeed the import of a sugar shipment already on its way had been blocked. Exports of military equipment and petroleum products to Southern Rhodesia had of course been embargoed. Almost the only items still being exported were of humanitarian importance, and of no significance to the economy of Southern Rhodesia.

950. Her country had also been able to help in the airlift of petroleum products to Zambia, and in maintaining the Great North Road.

951. The measures taken by various Member States in furtherance of the United Nations resolution were impressive when viewed as a whole, and the process was not yet over. Supplementary replies were still coming in. It was hardly suitable for countries that had had virtually no trade with Southern Rhodesia to belittle the considerable sacrifices of those which had, while emphasizing their own supposedly total embargoes. It was thus obvious that the accusations made against the United States at that meeting were untrue.

952. The working paper prepared by the Secretariat (see paras. 593 to 738 above) stated that by March/April 1966, Southern Rhodesia's exports had been reduced by 60 per cent as a result of international sanctions, and that all or most of Southern Rhodesia's normal trading partners had banned imports from that country.

953. Her Government had actively tried to make participation in the sanctions programme more complete. Those countries responsible for the important gaps in the programme should remember that in failing to co-operate they were aligning themselves against the majority.

954. The degree of unanimity attained on the present question was largely due to the fact that basic moral issues were at stake, to which no one could remain indifferent. As a Member of the United Nations her Government felt strongly that it had accepted an obligation to uphold important human rights, some of which were at stake in Southern Rhodesia. Remarkable progress had been made in Africa, and her Government pledged that that progress would not be denied to the people of Southern Rhodesia. It would continue to work within the United Nations to bring about majority rule and self-determination for all the Rhodesian people.

955. The representative of Australia recalled that in 1965, before the unilateral declaration of independence by Southern Rhodesia, the Australian Prime Minister had declared in Parliament that his Government had been in direct touch with the Government of Southern Rhodesia to try to make it see the inevitable end of its course. The Prime Minister had expressed his belief that:

"... an accelerated movement toward adult suffrage must be completed, or the alternative accepted, of mounting internal disorder, of hostility among neighbours, and of a result finally achieved in an atmosphere of hostility, not friendship, with racial hostilities unfavourable to the continuance of European settlement and out of harmony with those interracial relationships for which the new Commonwealth has come to stand."

Australia was one of the first Governments to take action immediately after the unilateral declaration well before the Security Council's decisions, in refusing to recognize the Smith régime—withdrawing representation, applying immediate embargoes on its limited trade with Southern Rhodesia, and taking the necessary measures concerning international finance.

956. The representative of Denmark had gone to the heart of the matter at the previous meeting in saying that there was no clear proof that sanctions had failed. Insufficient facts were available to support such an allegation. While it was clear that the measures had not been effective as quickly as it had been hoped there was still evidence that acute discomfort had been caused; and the talks in progress were perhaps evidence of that fact.

957. It was also, he thought, wrong not to recognize the far-reaching nature of the United Kingdom action. That country's naval action had certainly prevented a great deal of oil from being imported into Rhodesia, but even more important was the fact that that action, unprecedented as it was in United Nations history, must have shaken the confidence of the illegal régime.

958. The use of force alarmed and distressed the Australian Government; such a course would not only be hard to organize but would involve limitless suffering for the people of Africa; it advocated patience, though not passivity, to allow world isolation to take its effect. Time was a small price to pay for avoiding further suffering and perhaps widespread bloodshed in Africa.

959. The representative of Italy said his Government recognized the right of the peoples of Southern Rhodesia to self-determination, independence and majority rule under universal adult suffrage and deeply sympathized with their struggles. It considered the 1961 Constitution to be unsatisfactory in that, inter alia, it did not imply the possibility of evolution towards majority rule. Italy had condemned the unilateral declaration of independence, and had complied with the provisions of the various General Assembly and Security Council resolutions. It had also criticized the lack of action by the United Kingdom Government. By recognizing that Southern Rhodesia was the responsibility of the United Kingdom even when that view was not shared by all the Members of the United Nations, Italy had tried to encourage that country to take bolder and timelier measures, and regretted its failure to do so.

960. However, the Special Committee had been told by the petitioners that the Smith régime had 40,000 armed men at its disposal. That force was a reality, and it had to be taken into full account before further measures to deal with the problem could be adopted. The Italian Government had accepted the method of sanctions even though they involved considerable industrial, commercial and individual sacrifice. He mentioned that not to emphasize the part Italy had played in the sanctions programme but to show how concerned his country was at the accusations that the programme had been a failure and a fraud. The working paper prepared by the Secretariat listed the States which had complied with the measures decided upon by the Security Council; was it to be concluded that all those countries had been victims or accomplices in a fraud, or did the programme not rather represent an interesting example of international co-operation in an effort to reach a peaceful solution of a serious problem?

961. The Security Council's resolution had not been fully implemented by United Nations Members and as a result of that failure and of the limited scope of the sanctions themselves, the results expected had not been attained. However, was the Special Committee to decide that the system itself had failed and that different measures must be adopted? As his delegation had pointed out at a previous debate, the problem of Southern Rhodesia would be a test case for the United Nations; and the representative of Denmark had experienced concern for the future of the United Nations if a generally acceptable method of dealing with the problem could not be found. He had also made some interesting suggestions as to the best way to secure the effective implementation of sanctions, which should be given careful consideration by the Special Committee.

962. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania thought that further measures were needed, since the sanctions would only harm Zambia's economy, without bringing down the Smith régime. The very countries that said they were applying sanctions were in fact finding ingenious ways of avoiding them. A country such as the United States had a more important part to play than that of a mere supporter of the United Kingdom. The whole of Africa, including Zambia, was completely dissatisfied with the measures taken by the United Kingdom. It was therefore ironical that the United States should only support the United Kingdom, while professing to help Africans. His delegation hoped that the United States would associate itself more closely with the efforts to bring down the Smith régime.

963. The representative of Czechoslovakia, speaking at the invitation of the Chairman, and with the permission of the Chairman, thanked the Special Committee for the welcome he had received and for permission to take part in its session as an observer. He also expressed his gratitude to the Government of the United Republic of Tanzania for the hospitality extended to him as a participant.

964. The fact that Czechoslovakia attached great importance to the work of the Special Committee was borne out by the letter from the Czechoslovak Minister of Foreign Affairs, with which the Special Committee was already acquainted.

965. It was most shameful that at a time of unprecedented scientific progress, which held out the prospect of fair living standards for all, colonialism and racist régimes still controlled considerable parts of Africa and other continents and enslaved large sectors of their populations.

966. Colonial Powers and the racist régimes they supported had refused to comply with the provisions of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. Furthermore, they had engaged in feverish preparations to prolong their domination over the colonized peoples, and even intended to start a gradual process of recolonization. It was therefore no surprise that they were moving openly towards a vast colonialist entente, as the findings of the Special Committee and the declarations made by representatives and petitioners had confirmed.

967. It was indeed regrettable to perceive beyond that colonialist entente a more powerful alliance of the imperialist Powers shielding and sustaining world colonialism. Because of the negative attitude of those Powers, the Security Council had been unable to accept the just demand of African States that the Council should call upon the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to take all necessary measures, including the use of force, to abolish the racist minority régime in Southern Rhodesia. However, his Government was convinced that the Special Committee would adopt a resolution calling for effective measures to restore full constitutional and democratic rights to the people of Zimbabwe. Its competence to act and to set deadlines for an early end to colonialism was indicated in paragraph 5 of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

968. The representative of Iran recalled that at its 407th meeting on 20 April 1966, the Special Committee had recommended to the Security Council to consider urgently the further measures envisaged under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations to put into effect its decisions concerning Southern Rhodesia; but the Security Council had failed to act.

969. In its resolution 217 of 20 November 1965, the Security Council had called upon the Government of the United Kingdom to take appropriate measures to bring the minority régime to an immediate end. Yet six months later no progress had been made.

970. In its resolution 221 of 9 April 1966, the Security Council had determined that, as supplies of oil would afford great assistance and encouragement to the illegal régime, the resulting situation constituted a threat to the peace. Having once decided that, the Security Council was obliged to take follow-up action. Since oil reached Southern Rhodesia from South Africa as well as through the Port of Beira, the Security Council had no alternative but to act in order to prevent a breach of the peace.

971. Negotiation would only be effective if it resulted in the ending of the régime; but Mr. Smith could hardly be expected to negotiate his own downfall. Force was therefore the only solution.

G. FURTHER ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Appeal to the United Kingdom Government concerning Mr. Joshua Nkomo and Rev. N. Sithole

972. At its 423rd meeting, the representative of Mali stated that the Special Committee should go thoroughly into the question of Southern Rhodesia and formulate precise recommendations for submission to the General Assembly and the Security Council. He proposed that the Special Committee should request the United Kingdom Government to allow the acknowledged leaders of the Zimbabwe people to appear before the Special Committee.

973. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that he strongly supported the proposal of the representative of Mali, particularly in view of the United Kingdom's insistence that it alone was responsible for Southern Rhodesia.

974. The representative of Iran also supported the proposal made by the representative of Mali.

975. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics supported the Malian representative's proposal; the Special Committee should take a decision on the matter without delay.

976. The representative of Bulgaria said that he unreservedly supported the Malian representative's proposal that the United Kingdom Government be requested to release the imprisoned leaders of the liberation movements, in order that they might be able to appear before the Special Committee.

977. The representative of Iraq supported the proposal made by the representative of Mali. The presence of the nationalist leaders would greatly benefit the Special Committee's deliberations and would expedite its work for the liberation of Southern Rhodesia.

978. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that, following consultations which had taken place, the Afro-Asian members had decided to propose that the Special Committee should request the Chairman to call upon the United Kingdom Government to secure the release of Mr. Nkomo and Mr. Sithole so that they could testify before the Committee. While he was aware that certain members might consider such a move to be impractical, they should remember that the United Kingdom claimed sole responsibility for Southern Rhodesia. Moreover, it had given repeated assurances of its readiness to co-operate with the United Nations. It was in the light of those facts that the Special Committee should now make its request.

979. On a request by the representative of Yugoslavia, the Chairman said that Yugoslavia would be added to the list of countries making that request.

980. The representative of India, supporting the proposal of the representative of Mali and the action suggested by the representative of Tanzania, said that it would be extremely valuable for the Special Committee to hear such outstanding leaders of African public opinion as Mr. Nkomo and Mr. Sithole. It was to be regretted that the United Kingdom Government had not so far seen fit to hold consultations with them.

981. The representative of Venezuela said that, in his view, the Malian representative's proposal was fully justified and he would give it his unconditional support. It was important that the decision should be taken by the Special Committee as a whole rather than by a restricted group whose request would carry less weight with the United Kingdom than that of a United Nations committee.

982. The representative of Madagascar recalled that the previous year the Special Committee had sent a telegram along similar lines to the United Kingdom which, in rejecting the Committee's request, had invoked the constitutional convention with Southern Rhodesia and had claimed that it could not interfere in that country's domestic affairs. The situation, however, had completely changed now that Southern Rhodesia had unilaterally proclaimed its independence.

983. The representative of Australia said that, while his delegation would be most interested to hear Mr. Nkomo and Mr. Sithole, it nevertheless considered that at that time it was not within the power of the United Kingdom Government to secure their release; they were not prisoners of the United Kingdom but of an illegal régime in rebellion to it. The Australian delegation would therefore reserve its position on the practicability of the proposal.

984. The representative of the United States of America said that his delegation would have appreciated the opportunity to hear Mr. Nkomo and Mr. Sithole, had it not been for the fact that they were detained by the illegal régime of Southern Rhodesia. The question of the United Kingdom's right to interfere in Southern Rhodesia's internal affairs did not arise in that regard: the existing régime was in rebellion and presumably the United Kingdom would only have the power to bring Mr. Nkomo and Mr. Sithole before the Special Committee when that rebellion had ended. The United States delegation would therefore reserve its position on the matter, for the practical reason that the United Kingdom did not have control in Southern Rhodesia.

985. The representative of Poland whole-heartedly supported the proposal of the representative of Mali. As far as the views expressed by the representatives of Australia and the United States were concerned, he did not agree that the United Kingdom Government could not act in that connexion. In his opinion, the contrary was the case since there was now an illegal régime in Southern Rhodesia and, before the United Nations, only the United Kingdom was responsible for that country.

986. The representative of Mali pointed out that the United Kingdom had long since warned Southern Rhodesia that any unilateral declaration of independence would be considered as an act of rebellion against the Crown and that there was no question now of whether it was in a position to release Mr. Nkomo and Mr. Sithole. He regretted that the delegations which had raised that objection were the very ones which always rejected African proposals for the liberation of Southern Rhodesia and of the Zimbabwe people. The Special Committee must therefore address to the United Kingdom, as the administering Power for the British colony of Southern Rhodesia, a request for the release of Mr. Nkomo and Mr. Sithole in order that the Committee might grant them a hearing.

987. The Special Committee agreed to the Chairman's suggestion to address an appeal on behalf of the Special Committee to the United Kingdom Government, by cable, requesting the release of Mr. Nkomo and Mr. Sithole so that they could appear before the Special Committee during its meetings in Africa, it being understood that the reservations expressed by the representatives of Australia and the United States would appear in the records.

988. At its 432nd meeting on 4 June 1966, the Chairman informed the Special Committee that the United Kingdom Government, in reply to the appeal of the Special Committee to secure the release of Mr. Nkomo and Mr. Sithole in order that they might appear before the Committee as petitioners, had telegraphed that, as the Committee knew, they were held by the illegal régime in Southern Rhodesia.

Adoption of resolution on the question of Southern Rhodesia

989. At its 425th meeting Afghanistan, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, the Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, the United Republic of Tanzania and Yugoslavia submitted a draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.294) for the consideration of the Special Committee.

990. Introducing this draft resolution, the representative of Ethiopia said that the co-sponsors had taken into account the usual practice of allowing twenty-four hours for members to consult their Governments, but in view of the very short time available at Dar es Salaam he hoped that the submission of a draft resolution at that stage would meet with the Special Committee's approval. The draft resolution sought to incorporate the views of all members of the Special Committee in support of the aspirations of the Zimbabwe people. They would welcome any amendments calculated to improve the text, but none that might weaken its substance, for they considered the draft resolution to be the minimum action the Committee could take and would judge the sincerity of its members accordingly.

991. The representative of Mali said that the draft resolution reflected the opinions of all the members who had made their views known so far. The measures it proposed were the absolute minimum that the Special Committee could request of the administering Power and he hoped that all delegations would support it.

992. The representative of Madagascar said that his delegation had refrained from taking part in the general debate on the question of Southern Rhodesia, but that that attitude should not be interpreted as evidence of a lack of interest in the distressing problem of Southern Rhodesia. On the contrary, that question was of the greatest concern to his delegation, but it considered that, apart from a few recent events, the problem remained unchanged. Hence, the statements previously made by his delegation in setting forth its position in the Fourth Committee and the Special Committee continued to be applicable. At that stage, therefore, he would confine himself to a few brief remarks concerning some of the paragraphs of the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.294) before the Committee.

993. In the third preambular paragraph, the co-sponsors had considered it necessary to recall the terms of the Security Council resolutions recommending the breaking off of economic relations with Southern Rhodesia, and, in particular, an embargo on oil and petroleum products. As there were, in fact, States which had not complied with the recommendations made by the United Nations, the appeal being made to those States to reconsider their attitude appeared to be fully justified. The Malagasy Republic had, for its part, taken the necessary measures and had informed the Secretary-General of the United Nations about them in a note verbale.³³ Furthermore, by virtue of its geographical position in the Indian Ocean, his country had considered itself bound to grant certain facilities on Malagasy soil to the United Kingdom in order to enable it to carry out the aims of the Security Council concerning Southern Rhodesia.

994. In the sixth preambular paragraph of the draft resolution, the co-sponsors sought to emphasize their growing concern over the contacts which had been established between the United Kingdom Government and the Ian Smith régime. Although his delegation would like to state once again that it was in favour of discussions and negotiations to settle problems of any kind, it could not understand how negotiations could take place without the participation of the Zimbabwe people, whose interests the United Kingdom claimed to be safeguarding. By entering into negotiations with Mr. Ian Smith and refusing on the other hand to hold any discussions with the representative of the Zimbabwe people, the United Kingdom was displaying an equivocal attitude which led the Malagasy delegation to wonder about the real aim of the United Kingdom's policy concerning the fate of the Rhodesians.

995. As far as the operative paragraphs were concerned, he would merely point out that his delegation was in agreement in deploring the failure of the United Kingdom Government to bring down the Ian Smith régime. The Committee would recall the statement of the United Kingdom Government to the effect that it would undertake further measures against Southern Rhodesia if economic sanctions proved to be ineffective within a reasonable space of time. Six months had elapsed since Mr. Smith had unilaterally declared independence, but the United Kingdom did not even show any disposition to undertake the further measures of which it had spoken. It would seem that nothing more than a question of delaying tactics was involved.

996. With regard to operative paragraph 9, which called upon the United Kingdom Government to take the necessary measures, including the use of force, his delegation had doubts about the advisability of that recommendation; the result of the recent vote in the ³³ Official Records of the Security Council, Twenty-first Year, Supplement for January, February and March 1966, document S/7213.

Security Council had confirmed its scepticism. His delegation knew that the United Kingdom would never be prepared to use force to bring down the rebels, who were none other than its own kinsmen.

997. His delegation would have liked the possibilities of reaching a peaceful settlement of the problem of Southern Rhodesia to be further explored, but in view of the short time at the Special Committee's disposal at the present session, it would support the opinion of the majority.

998. The representative of Ethiopia proposed that, in the preamble, the second and seventh paragraphs should be deleted, and in the fourth paragraph the word "racist" should be substituted for "white".

999. Operative paragraph 5 should be supplemented to read: "Considers that the situation in Southern Rhodesia continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security, as has already been established by the Security Council in its resolution 221 (1966) of 9 April 1966;"

1000. Operative paragraph 6 should be modified to read: "Draws once again the attention of the Security Council to the grave situation prevailing in Southern Rhodesia with a view to recommending mandatory sanctions under Chapter VII of the Charter".

1001. The representative of Denmark said that operative paragraphs 7 and 9 were unacceptable to his delegation. There was agreement within the Special Committee that the common aim should be to bring down the Smith régime and ensure an independent Zimbabwe on the basis of majority rule. However, operative paragraphs 7 and 9 contained the controversial points concerning the use of force which a number of countries had opposed in the Security Council. The attitude of those countries would not have changed. He therefore considered that although the draft might satisfy emotions, it would not bring a solution any nearer. Furthermore, it constituted a negation of the instrument of sanctions. The Special Committee knew that the draft, as it stood, had no chance of bringing about the desired result; indeed, its only result would be to weaken that instrument and sap confidence in the United Nations. Denmark believed that economic sanctions could remove the Smith régime and eventually combat apartheid in South Africa. However, it was essential to ensure that sanctions were applied by all Member States and to leave the door open for United Nations intervention in cases of non-co-operation.

1002. Referring to the comment of the representative of Poland on his statement of the previous day, he said that he had not mentioned Portugal because it had been his understanding that the main problem was the arrival of oil from South Africa. It should be noted, however, that his delegation had supported mandatory sanctions, which were an innovation. His delegation had wanted to ask all countries to apply those sanctions in accordance with the United Nations Charter, the alternative being enforced compliance.

1003. As immediate action was needed, his Government proposed the deletion of operative paragraphs 7 and 9 and the insertion of the following two new paragraphs:

"7. Recommends to the Security Council to request all member countries to confirm without delay that they will apply the sanctions mentioned in paragraph 6 in accordance with their obligation under the Charter of the United Nations;

"8. Further recommends to the Security Council, in the event that any State does not comply with the decisions of the Council mentioned in paragraph 6, to consider appropriate measures by the United Nations in accordance with the provisions of Chapter VII of the Charter in order to secure the effective application of the sanctions with a view to the rapid abolishment of the racist régime in Southern Rhodesia;"

Operative paragraph 8 should then be renumbered as paragraph 9.

1004. He regretted the remark of the representative of Ethiopia that the Special Committee would be judged on its vote on the draft resolution. If he had wished to speak in the same vein he would have said that the African and Western countries would be judged on their action in connexion with the Danish amendment (A/AC.109/L.295).

1005. The representative of Chile proposed the following amendments (A/AC.109/L.296) to the draft resolution under consideration. After the final preambular paragraph, the following new preambular paragraph would be inserted:

"Taking into account the decisions of the Organization of African Unity in respect of the difficult situation facing Zambia as a consequence of the unilateral declaration of independence in Southern Rhodesia,"

After operative paragraph 3, the following new paragraph would be inserted:

"Calls upon all Member States to extend all necessary assistance to the people of Zambia to enable them to face the difficult situation arising as a consequence of the unilateral declaration of independence in Southern Rhodesia;"

1006. The representative of Venezuela said that his delegation was fully in agreement with the substance of the draft resolution, which contained a number of principles which it upheld. Since, however, the sponsors had clearly said that they would not agree to the draft resolution being amended, he would merely like to make a few comments.

1007. First of all, he supported the two amendments which the representative of Chile had just submitted (A/AC.109/L.296) and which did not call for any explanation. He asked that they should be put to a separate vote by roll-call.

1008. The Venezuelan delegation would like to make it clear that the fact that it honestly supported principles which it considered fundamental did not mean that its position with regard to colonialism had changed. Truth did not belong to a single man or to a single group of men. To say that "anyone who does not accept unconditionally what we decide is against us" was an over-simplification. Although his delegation approved of the substance of the draft resolution, it felt obliged to express certain reservations concerning the methods used to achieve the common goal and concerning the wording of certain paragraphs of the draft resolution.

1009. With regard to the fifth preambular paragraph, it was not for the Special Committee to recommend the use of force. That was a prerogative reserved to the Security Council in cases of extreme gravity. Although the situation in Southern Rhodesia was obviously serious, to resort to the unilateral use of force would create a dangerous precedent. Force should only be used collectively and under the supervision of the United Nations.

1010. That paragraph also appeared to give much more stress to the restoration of the 1961 Constitution than to the implementation of resolution 1514 (XV), which was in fact the item on the agenda. He referred in that connexion to the statement which he had made during the last general debate on the question in New York (A/AC.109/PV.405, pp. 7-12).

1011. His delegation would only be able to vote for that paragraph if the phrase "including the use of military force" was deleted. It could, however, agree to the insertion of the words "and more energetic" between the word "prompt" and the word "measures".

1012. With regard to operative paragraph 3, his delegation did not think that the Special Committee was competent to condemn the Government of Member States. Only the Security Council was empowered by the Charter to make such a condemnation, the logical consequence of which was the expulsion of the Member State concerned. Venezuela would only be able to vote in favour of that paragraph if the words "the policies of" were inserted between the word "Condemns" and the words "the Governments".

1013. Again, only the Security Council had the power to make a decision such as that mentioned in operative paragraph 7. The Venezuelan delegation could in no circumstances agree that a Member State should be authorized to use force unilaterally. That would create a precedent which would endanger the very existence of the international community. The experience of the Latin American countries of what the use of force by a State could be had been too long and too bitter for them to agree without protest to the Special Committee authorizing by a vote the use of force by a Member State on the basis, moreover, of arguments of doubtful worth. A great Power could always find some justification for its actions, and there was no need for the Committee to provide it with a precedent on which it could reply. That was why Venezuela supported the amendment (A/AC.109/L.295) submitted by the delegation of Denmark. It must also be borne in mind that in approving operative paragraph 7, the States which were members of the Special Committee would be renouncing any right to criticize the United Kingdom's desire to retain its military bases, since those bases would then be essential to it if it was to give effect to United Nations resolutions. Since the idea expressed in operative paragraph 7 was already contained in operative paragraph 6, his delegation asked that paragraph 7 should be deleted.

1014. He expressed the same reservations concerning the phrase "including the use of force" in operative paragraph 9 as he had concerning the fifth preambular paragraph. The expression "all necessary measures" seemed to him sufficient. If the administering Power considered it necessary to resort to force, it should do so on its own responsibility alone and not with the support of the United Nations. His delegation asked that the phrase in question should be deleted, and by the same token it supported the amendment proposed by Denmark.

1015. His delegation requested separate votes, by roll-call, on the fifth preambular paragraph and on operative paragraphs 3, 7 and 9, it being understood that a vote would not be necessary on operative paragraphs 7 and 9 if the Danish amendment was adopted.

1016. The Chairman, speaking as the representative of Sierra Leone, thanked the representative of Denmark for his contribution to the debate. Sierra Leone, like other African States, had always appreciated the efforts of the Scandinavian countries, and particularly of Denmark, to introduce a fresh approach to the problems of Africa.

1017. The representative of Denmark had stated that the draft resolution before the Special Committee (A/AC.109/L.294) contained the same controversial points as those in the draft resolution recently submitted to the Security Council.³⁴ That was so: they had been included again since they reflected the view not only of African countries but also of a number of others, that the time had come to use force. The representatives of Venezuela, the United States and Australia had all argued against such action, together with the representative of Denmark, who had warned Africans that it would undermine the United Nations instrument of sanctions. In fact, however, that instrument was already being undermined by the countries which, only a month before had supported a United Kingdom resolution before the Security Council invoking Chapter VII of the Charter and advocating the use of force to divert two oil tankers from Beira. Those same countries now refused to support the invocation of the same Chapter in the face of a situation which constituted a grave threat to the peace of the world. Furthermore, the very countries which had taken action in the Congo, without even consulting the Security Council, because they considered a small number of Europeans to be in danger, were now concerned about the use of force in Southern Rhodesia, where 4 million Africans lived in the most wretched conditions.

1018. The existing situation in Southern Rhodesia might well endanger the peace of the whole world. Zambia, for instance, was already affected by it and African States were not prepared to tolerate such a state of affairs any longer. The representative of Venezuela had spoken with considerable feeling of his experience in Latin America with regard to the use of force. While African States respected his views, no other course remained open to them if the illegal Smith régime was to be overthrown.

1019. The representative of Denmark had also considered that the use of force might weaken international confidence in the United Nations. Confidence in the United Nations had already been shaken in relation to several situations in Africa where it remained impotent and unwilling to take action. The representative of Denmark had further stated that the draft resolution before the Committee had no chance of being accepted if it were presented in the Security Council. African States were fully aware of, and realized that, certain countries were prepared to give practical effect to the statements made by their representatives on certain questions of principle. International confidence in the United Nations could not be maintained through debating manoeuvres, particularly on such a question as the Southern Rhodesia situation which, to many people, was a matter of life and death. The fact that many of the battles against colonialism had been won outside the United Nations did little to enhance its dignity and reputation.

1020. Lastly, he expressed the opinion that the question of Southern Rhodesia, which had been debated at length in many places throughout the world, would provide the supreme test of the United Nations and its principles. He appealed to all those who were genuinely interested in its future to examine the question in that light.

1021. The representative of Ethiopia said that the representative of Denmark had taken exception to his statement, at the Special Committee's previous meeting, that the sincerity of members and their support for the African people of Zimbabwe would be judged by their reaction to the draft resolution. He did not, however, intend to apologize for that remark. His delegation respected the manner in which the Danish representative expressed himself and expected the same respect in return.

1022. Moreover, the Danish representative had himself used a similar phrase, stating that he would judge the Special Committee by its reaction to the amendments proposed by his delegation (A/AC.109/L.295). But it was important to keep essentials in mind and, as the Chairman had said, Denmark's support on a number of issues affecting Africa, both in the Committee and in other organs of the United Nations, was highly valued. It was gratifying to note that the Danish delegation was prepared to support the draft resolution with the exception of two paragraphs. The Committee had so far conducted its deliberations in a dignified manner. He trusted that in future that high standard would not be lowered by interventions such as that made by the representative of Denmark.

1023. The representative of Denmark, referring to the remarks made by the representative of Sierra Leone, said that he did not contest the right of certain members to resubmit to the Security Council the same controversial points as those contained in the draft resolution recently rejected by that body. His only concern was to find a solution which would help the people of Zimbabwe. Since there was little likelihood of a change in the majority view within the Security Council, he had therefore sought another avenue of approach which would be acceptable to all and would result in the removal of the Smith régime.

1024. The representative of Sierra Leone had also referred to his statement that the use of force would undermine the United Nations instrument of sanctions. The Danish delegation agreed that the African States were not responsible for that. If, however, sanctions were replaced by the use of force, that might be taken as a sign that they had failed—an outcome which would only benefit South Africa. In his view, the most effective results would be achieved if the Special Committee recommended mandatory sanctions as proposed in the draft resolution. The Security Council should then be requested to consider intervention if any country failed to comply with such a decision.

1025. In a further point, the representative of Sierra Leone had rightly stated that the Security Council had already approved the use of force in authorizing the diversion by United Kingdom warships of two oil tankers bound for Beira. However, the countries which had voted in favour of that action at the Security Council had in all likelihood considered that it would involve no loss of life, whereas armed intervention, as proposed in the draft resolution, might start a war.

1026. He deeply regretted the remark of the representative of Sierra Leone that confidence in the United Nations in Africa had been shaken and it was considered to be an impotent Organization. The Danish Cabinet, which had met during the previous night to consider the matter, had agreed that mandatory sanctions would have to be applied and that the Security Council should authorize intervention as appropriate, if a decision to that effect were contravened. There could then be no excuse for any country which did not support a Security Council decision to intervene in such instances. That compromise solution, in his firm opinion, offered the best chance of securing agreement within the United Nations and, therefore, of helping the Zimbabwe population.

1027. The Chairman, speaking as the representative of Sierra Leone, explained that, in speaking of the impotence of the United Nations in Africa, he had been referring to its activities with regard to the situation in Southern Rhodesia.

1028. His delegation welcomed Denmark's initiative in supporting mandatory sanctions and hoped that it would be able to extend that support to those parts of the draft resolution which related to the use of force.

1029. The representative of Mali, speaking as a co-sponsor of the draft resolution submitted by the African-Asian group and Yugoslavia, said that he was very grateful to the representative of Denmark for having proposed an amendment to the draft resolution. He was only sorry that he did not have the French text of the amendment, as that would have enabled him to comment on it with a better knowledge of what was involved.

1030. As far as he could judge, the representative of Denmark appeared to consider that the United Kingdom Government was in no way responsible for the aggravation of the situation in South Africa and Southern Rhodesia. The Danish amendment concerned two essential paragraphs of the draft resolution. Denmark, however, could not approve of the actions of the Ian Smith government, which no country in the world had agreed to recognize, and could only attribute to the United Kingdom Government the full responsibility for the situation which had thus been created.

1031. The African-Asian group and the Yugoslav delegation had agreed that the administering Power should be asked to take all necessary measures to impose an embargo on petroleum and its products so as to prevent them from reaching Southern Rhodesia. They also called for the implementation of resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960 containing the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

1032. On the basis, however, of the Danish representative's logic, especially with regard to his amendment to operative paragraph 8 of the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.294/Rev.1), it would appear that it was the other States which had not wanted to implement the provisions of Security Council resolution 217 of 20 November 1965. If the amendment in question had been submitted at the session of the United Nations General Assembly, it would very likely have been applauded and accepted. The fact was, unfortunately, that the United Kingdom had appeared for the last six months to be siding with Southern Rhodesia. Hence, it was the capitalist monopolies and the Western countries which should change their position, since there appeared to be no reason for the other delegations to change theirs.

1033. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that although his delegation supported the substance of the draft resolution submitted by the African-Asian group and Yugoslavia (A/AC.109/L.294/Rev.1), it did have some reservations. In its opinion, the fifth preambular paragraph of the original draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.294), which was the fourth preambular paragraph of the revised version, was unnecessary; it was worded in such a way as to distort the situation, since the measures taken by the United Kingdom with regard to its other colonies were quite clearly unlawful. The fact none the less remained that that country had been led to use force against the peoples of its colonies. Consequently, if such a paragraph was to be included in the draft resolution, it should say that the United Kingdom had used force "unlawfully" in some of its colonies. The fourth preambular paragraph of the revised text should therefore speak of the "unlawful" use of military force.

1034. Secondly, a provision should be added to the draft resolution specifying a date for Southern Rhodesia's accession to independence. It was well known that the policy of the United Kingdom politicians towards Southern Rhodesia was based entirely on the racist Constitution of 1961, which barred the Zimbabwe people, or a total of 4.5 million persons, from participating in free elections. It was clear that in the prevailing situation the people of Zimbabwe would be unable under that Constitution to take part in free elections for forty-one years. His delegation therefore supported the Indian representative's proposal for setting a date by which the people of Zimbabwe could attain independence. The resolution would be more forceful if it specified what particular measures must be taken to organize free elections on a basis of universal suffrage, on the understanding that those elections would be held on a date fixed in advance and would be supervised by the United Nations or the Organization of African Unity.

1035. His delegation called for the immediate repeal of the legislation establishing racial discrimination in Southern Rhodesia and, in particular, for the granting to the people of Zimbabwe of the right to freedom of speech and opinion, to freedom of the Press and to political activity. Such a demand was all the more justified as the United Kingdom, having admitted that the Ian Smith régime was illegal, could not plead the principle of non-interference in the country's internal affairs.

1036. The United Kingdom was entirely responsible for the situation as it existed. Under the Security Council resolutions, it was bound to put an end to the Ian Smith régime and to transfer power to a duly elected majority within a clearly defined period of time.

1037. As the draft resolution before the special Committee would be greatly strengthened if it contained provisions to that effect, his delegation appealed to the sponsors of the draft resolution to consider the possibility of including them.

1038. As for sanctions, the members of the Special Committee were asked to wait until they proved their effectiveness against the Ian Smith régime. It was obvious, however, that the principle of sanctions had not produced the results expected. That was why his delegation hoped that more effective action would be taken and why it fully supported operative paragraph 3 of the revised draft resolution condemning the assistance which the Governments of Portugal and South Africa had continued to give to the racist minority régime of Ian Smith. His delegation reaffirmed its support for the other paragraphs of the draft resolution, although it considered that the adoption of the provisions which it had just proposed would strengthen the draft.

1039. His delegation also wished to give its views on the statement made the previous day by the representative of the United States. It could not but oppose that statement, for the United States representative had attempted to justify the failure of the sanctions applied by the United States Government by arguing that the United States held a very strong position in the economy of the Territories under consideration and that it had to take the views of businessmen into account. According to the United States representative, it was easy for the socialist countries to comply with the provisions concerning sanctions, since their economies were planned; the United States, however, was linked to Southern Rhodesia and South Africa by close economic ties.

1040. The fact was that the socialist countries had taken the side of the peoples fighting for their independence, whereas the aim of the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany was to crush the national liberation movements, to maintain their own positions and to continue to exploit the people of the Territories which they occupied. The United States representative had stated that his Government was not playing a double game, although that had not prevented him from adding that the United States took the side of the United Kingdom in its refusal to alter the 1961 Constitution. It might be asked whether that was not a perfect example of a double game.

1041. The representative of Denmark had stated that he was in favour of making the sanctions mandatory. As operative paragraph 6 of the new draft resolution already provided for that point, the amendment submitted by the representative of Denmark tended to postpone the application of the provisions of that paragraph. That amendment could only be to the advantage of those countries which considered that once sanctions had been applied, the problem would be solved.

1042. The representative of Tunisia said that the Chairman of the Special Committee, speaking as the representative of Sierra Leone, had already expressed with eloquence, clarity and precision the sentiments of millions of Africans who, because of the conditions of servitude in which they were kept, were unable to speak for themselves. He himself, therefore, would merely remind the Special Committee that all the petitioners had repeatedly affirmed their unshakable faith in the United Nations. Nevertheless, if the United Nations remained passive, it would forfeit its authority, not through the fault of the African peoples, but through that of certain Member States which, for reasons which would be sought in vain in the Charter, would be only too happy to undermine that authority.

1043. The Tunisian delegation would vote in favour of the African-Asian group's draft resolution and was convinced that the majority of the Special Committee would do likewise.

1044. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that he appreciated the spirit in which the representative of Denmark had urged the Committee to exercise restraint in the formulation of the draft resolution. However, his delegation had strong reservations about the motives behind the Danish amendments since it considered that they sought to excuse the actions of the United Kingdom Government. He appealed to the representative of Denmark to withdraw his amendments.

1045. The representative of Bulgaria said that during the present series of meetings of the Special Committee, the explosive situation in Southern Rhodesia had entered on a decisive phase. The majority of delegations represented on the Committee had been extremely disappointed by the vote on the resolution submitted to the Security Council.

1046. The Committee should therefore, at the least, draw up an effective draft resolution summarizing the main points of the resolution submitted to the Security Council, since the latter resolution had obtained a majority of the votes of all countries which sincerely desired freedom for the people of Zimbabwe.

1047. He supported the substance of the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.294/Rev.1), which reflected that majority opinion, and he expressed his admiration for the Chairman's moving statement. The struggling African peoples had reason perhaps to lose confidence in the United Nations. Other members of the Committee had expressed the view of their Governments that everything possible should be done to preserve that confidence. At the previous session of the General Assembly, Denmark had had the courage to vote in favour of the resolution against apartheid. While that stand was certainly heartening, he could not for that reason approve of the Danish amendment.

1048. The representative of Venezuela had expressed the point of view of the Latin American countries. It was clear that those countries were opposed to the use of force against popular movements, and they were doubtless thinking of the United States. The intervention of the United States in Latin America could not, however, be compared to the situation in Southern Rhodesia.

1049. The Bulgarian delegation supported the draft resolution. Furthermore, it hoped that consideration would be given to the Indian representative's suggestion that a time limit should be set for the independence of Southern Rhodesia and the downfall of the Ian Smith régime.

1050. The Soviet proposal concerning the fourth preambular paragraph of the new draft resolution submitted by the African-Asian group and Yugoslavia (A/AC.109/L.294/Rev.1) seemed very much to the point. The text of that paragraph did not in its present form seem to be sufficiently clear. His delegation could therefore only suggest to its African and Asian friends who were sponsoring the draft resolution that they should seek a formula which would eliminate the present ambiguity.

1051. He recalled that when the Special Committee had been hearing the statements of petitioners, and in particular those dealing with Southern Rhodesia, his delegation had asked that a report should be made to the Committee concerning the implementation of the resolutions, especially those relating to assistance to refugees and the victims of colonialism, adopted by the competent United Nations bodies. It would appear that the decisions thus adopted particularly concerned Southern Rhodesia and the Territories under Portuguese domination. The Special Committee was therefore within its rights in asking the bodies in question to assist the refugees and all the victims of colonialism. His delegation accordingly suggested to the sponsors of the draft resolution that they should insert, between operative paragraph 10 and operative paragraph 11, which would then become operative paragraph 12, a new paragraph 11, which might read somewhat as follows:

"Requests the international specialized agencies and other international assistance organizations to grant aid and assistance to the refugees from Southern Rhodesia and to those who are suffering from oppression by the racist régime in Southern Rhodesia."

1052. As it had been pressed for time, his delegation had only been able to submit its suggestion (A/AC.109/L.297) to some of the sponsors of the draft resolution, who had been kind enough to promise their support. He apologized to those whom he had not had time to consult and asked all the sponsors to take his proposal into consideration.

1053. The representative of the Ivory Coast said that he supported the comment concerning the draft resolution made at the previous meeting by the representative of Sierra Leone; he would merely add, as a co-sponsor of the draft resolution, that all members of the Special Committee were agreed in considering the situation in Southern Rhodesia to be extremely serious. That was confirmed by the fact that the United Kingdom had twice appealed to the United Nations to ratify the sanctions that had been applied and to authorize it to use force in applying them. The United Kingdom would not have been in that position if it had, in Lyautey's words, "demonstrated its strength in order not to have to use it" immediately after the unilateral declaration of independence in Rhodesia. Proposals were no longer being made for anything other than economic sanctions, and it was a matter of some surprise that the countries recommending them were the very ones that had declared them unworkable in the case of South Africa. In any event, economic sanctions could not produce any effect in less than two years and could not be applied in the absence of logistic and military support.

1054. The representative of Poland said that the draft resolution in its general terms accorded with his delegation's views. He hoped, however, that the co-sponsors would agree to include in the preamble a reference to the statements that had been made by petitioners. Paragraph 4 of the preamble should also be reworded to make it clear that the use of force by the United Kingdom Government in the instances referred to had been unjustified.

1055. With regard to operative paragraph 8, it was important not only to rid the country of the Smith régime but to see that the people were able to express their wishes at an early date by means of free elections, and the paragraph should take that into account. In that connexion, he quoted a passage from The Economist of 30 April, which recalled a statement by Prime Minister Wilson in November 1965 to the effect that it would take a very long time, based on achievement by African as well as European politicians, to secure the kind of free-working democracy needed in Southern Rhodesia. The Economist suggested that such a "realistic" time-table should be made an entrenched part of any constitutional settlement so that Africans themselves could act in defence of their rights through a "blocking third" of black African parliamentary representatives. His Government was against allowing the racist minority in South Africa, Southern Rhodesia and the Portuguese colonies to gain time to build up their strength and the draft resolution should insist on elections being held immediately after the collapse of the Smith régime.

1056. He was glad that the representative of Denmark had conceded that Portugal played an important role in rendering sanctions unsuccessful, and that the amendment he had submitted addressed itself to all States which would, of course, also include another NATO Power—the Federal Republic of Germany, which was supporting the colonial régimes in the area.

1057. He appreciated the sincere desire of the representative of Denmark to make sanctions mandatory, but considered that a country that did not wish to apply sanctions would not do so even in those conditions. The Security Council should therefore call upon the United Kingdom to use all the means in its power, including the use of force, if necessary, to bring down the Smith régime and enable the people of Zimbabwe to exercise their right to independence and freedom.

1058. The representative of Denmark, referring to the contention by the representative of the USSR that the Danish position was inconsistent, pointed out that the question of mandatory sanctions was dealt with in operative paragraph 6, on which he had made no comments. The Danish amendment (A/AC.109/L.295) referred to paragraphs 7 and 9, dealing with the use of force.

1059. In reply to the representative of Tanzania, who had said that Denmark was trying to avoid a strong resolution, he said that what his Government wished to avoid was a resolution that might not lead to practical results. Denmark had, in fact, applied sanctions, but wished them to be made mandatory because some other countries had not so far applied them. Replying to the representative of Poland, who had said that those countries would probably not apply them whether they were made mandatory or not, he said that in the case of mandatory sanctions there was a legal basis for United Nations intervention to see that they were observed.

1060. Speaking in French, he expressed surprise at the observation of the representative of the Ivory Coast about countries which had refused to apply mandatory sanctions to South Africa. That representative must know that Denmark had approved such sanctions. Since, however, no real decision had been made, no one was obliged to apply them. It was in order to compel Member States to withhold their support from the régime in Southern Rhodesia that Denmark had submitted its amendment.

1061. He had noted the questions raised by the representative of Mali; he considered them to be a tribute to the constructive efforts of the Danish delegation and would bring them to the notice of the Danish Government.

1063. The words "and to taking appropriate measures to secure the effective application of sanctions in the case of default by Member States" would be added at the end of operative paragraph 6, in accordance with the proposal made by the representative of Denmark.

1064. A new operative paragraph 11, in accordance with the Bulgarian proposed amendment (A/AC.109/L.297), would be inserted to read as follows:

"Requests the specialized agencies concerned and other international assistance organizations to aid and assist the refugees from Southern Rhodesia and those who are suffering from oppression by the racist minority régime of Southern Rhodesia." The existing paragraph 11 would then become paragraph 12.

1065. The word "unjust" would be inserted between the words "the" and "use" in the third line of the fourth preambular paragraph to take account of the suggestion made by the representatives of the USSR and Poland.

1066. In accordance with the Polish representative's further proposal, the words "a régime" in the third line of the eighth operative paragraph would be amended to read "an elected government", and the words "and to fix an early date for this purpose" would be added at the end of that paragraph.

1067. He asked the representatives of Venezuela and Chile whether they would agree to withdraw their amendment (A/AC.109/L.296), since the specific issue to be dealt with in the draft resolution was the defeat of the Smith régime, from which alleviation of Zambia's problems would naturally follow.

1068. The representative of Chile said that the Venezuelan and Chilean delegations, in submitting their amendment concerning Zambia, had considered it essential, in any reference to refugees, to mention also the people of Zambia, who were being oppressed by the Smith régime. He understood the attitude of the Tanzanian representative (A/AC.109/SR.424) and, in a spirit of compromise, proposed that, in the Bulgarian amendment (A/AC.109/L.297) the words, "the people of Zambia" should be added after the words "from Southern Rhodesia". That addition would not change the meaning of the amendment.

1069. The representative of Venezuela announced that, at the request of their African friends, the delegations of Chile and Venezuela were withdrawing their amendment (A/AC.109/L.296).

1070. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that the words "Member States" in the amendment to operative paragraph 6 should read "any State".

1071. The representative of Poland said that account had not been taken of his proposal to include in the preamble a reference to the statements made by the petitioners, which had been the practice ever since the establishment of the Committee of Seventeen.

1072. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania accepted the proposal on behalf of the co-sponsors.

1073. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that his delegation was very gratified to note that the representatives of the African-Asian countries had taken at least some of his country's recommendations into account. He would vote for the draft resolution.

1074. The representative of Bulgaria asked the Chilean representative not to press for modification of the amendment which had been submitted by the Bulgarian delegation and dealt specifically with the question of Southern Rhodesia. Since, as a result of the observations of the Tanzanian representative (A/AC.109/SR.424), the Chilean and Venezuelan delegations had agreed to withdraw their amendment, they could for the same reason withdraw their proposed modification of the Bulgarian amendment.

1075. He said that he would vote in favour of the draft resolution as just amended by the sponsors.

1076. The representative of Denmark thanked the authors of the draft resolution for having taken part of his proposed amendment into consideration. He had said earlier, however, that his delegation could not accept operative paragraphs 7 and 9. Since the co-sponsors were unable to accept his alternative proposals, he would withdraw his amendment but would be unable to vote in favour of the draft resolution.

1077. The Chairman read out the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.294/Rev.1) incorporating the amendments that had been accepted by the co-sponsors.

1078. The representative of Iran proposed the deletion of the word "assistance" between the words "international" and "organizations" in the new operative paragraph 11; and of the words in the same paragraph "those who are suffering from oppression by the racist minority régime of Southern Rhodesia", for similar reasons to those that had led to the withdrawal of the amendment proposed by the representatives of Chile and Venezuela.

1079. The representative of Ethiopia stated that the representative of Iran had agreed not to insist on the points he had raised concerning operative paragraph 11.

1080. The representative of Australia recalled his Government's positive and prompt action to implement the kind of measures recommended by the Security Council. His Government was far from sure that such measures had been ineffective; results had been achieved and more could be expected.

1081. His Government was opposed to the use of force and would continue to place its trust in negotiation; that attitude followed from its adherence to the line of action laid down in the Security Council resolution. It did not share the views expressed in the draft resolution concerning the likely outcome of the talks in progress between the United Kingdom Government and the Smith régime; those talks should not be prejudged, and should be supported, at least until their outcome was clear.

1082. His Government shared the view of the representative of Venezuela that the Special Committee should not usurp the functions of the Security Council; to adopt the draft resolution would be to do so, and he would therefore have to oppose it.

1083. The representative of Poland thought that "Reaffirming" in the second preambular paragraph of the revised draft resolution should read "Recalling".

1084. The representative of Ethiopia signified the co-sponsors' agreement to that change.

1085. The representative of the United States of America, explaining her vote after it had been taken, said that since the resolution did not differ greatly from the one rejected by the Security Council the previous week, her delegation, which had abstained from voting on that occasion, had similarly abstained on the present resolution.

1086. Without minimizing the critical nature of the situation in Southern Rhodesia, her Government did not feel that all the peaceful means of solving the problem had been exhausted. Her own delegation respected the viewpoints of others, and she regretted that some speakers in the debate had at times shown a tendency to view other delegations' positions in a dogmatic way, and that honest differences of opinion had been qualified as collusion.

1087. Her delegation had not requested votes on separate paragraphs; because of its reservations regarding the wording of much of the resolution it had preferred not to take part in them.

1088. The representative of Chile, speaking after the vote had been taken, said that the fact that his delegation had abstained on some specific points certainly did not mean that Chile was opposed to the recommended measures as a whole. On the contrary, it had supported all the measures intended to re-establish order in Southern Rhodesia. It was, of course, necessary to respect the principles of the United Nations Charter and at the same time to take care not to hamper the activities of other United Nations organs. It was for that reason that the Chilean delegation had abstained in the voting on the fifth preambular paragraph and operative paragraphs 3, 7 and 9.

1089. He believed that in the fifth preambular paragraph the reference to the use of force should have been deleted. Operative paragraph 3 would have been acceptable if the policies of the Governments of Portugal and South Africa had been condemned, and not the Governments themselves. Operative paragraph 7 was already covered by the previous paragraph and therefore seemed unnecessary. In operative paragraph 9, the phrase referring to the use of force should have been deleted.

1090. Despite those reservations, his delegation had voted in favour of the draft resolution as a whole because it was convinced that the rights of the valiant people of Zimbabwe should be restored.

1091. He added that when his delegation, together with that of Venezuela, had submitted a draft amendment, the intention had been to extend the scope of the draft resolution by mentioning Zambia, which had also been adversely affected by the existence of the Smith régime. Zambia would have to be helped if the Smith régime was really to be weakened. As over 60 per cent of Zambia's imports came from Southern Rhodesia, it was obvious that assistance to that young nation would gradually reduce and possibly eliminate its trade with Southern Rhodesia.

1092. The representative of Venezuela, also speaking after the vote, said that as he had explained his vote at the previous meeting, he merely wished to state that his delegation took operative paragraph 10 to mean that the States Members of the United Nations should assist the people of Zimbabwe in conformity with the Charter. Venezuela had, moreover, voted in favour of the draft resolution because action by the Special Committee to find a solution to the serious problem of Southern Rhodesia was imperative.

1093. The Venezuelan delegation nevertheless had some reservations concerning the wording of the draft resolution.

1094. The representative of Australia, explaining his vote after it had been taken, said that his Government still believed that there was hope in the measures taken by the United Kingdom Government, the significance of which had not been sufficiently appreciated. Actions such as the blocking of the oil supply to Beira indicated the determination of the United Kingdom Government to achieve its aim.

1095. He had voted against the resolution because of his sincere belief that better results would have been achieved by a more moderately worded text.

1096. At its 427th meeting, the Special Committee voted by roll-call on the joint draft resolution, as orally revised (A/AC.109/L.294/Rev.2), as follows:

(a) The fifth preambular paragraph was adopted by a roll-call vote of 16 to 1, with 4 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Bulgaria, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Republic of Tanzania, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia.

Abstaining: Chile, Denmark, Italy, Venezuela.

(b) Operative paragraph 3 was adopted by a roll-call vote of 17 to none, with 4 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Denmark, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Republic of Tanzania, Yugoslavia.

Abstaining: Australia, Chile, Italy, Venezuela.

(c) Operative paragraph 7 was adopted by a roll-call vote of 16 to 2, with 3 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Republic of Tanzania, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Denmark.

Abstaining: Chile, Italy, Venezuela.

(d) Operative paragraph 9 was adopted by a roll-call vote of 16 to 2, with 3 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Republic of Tanzania, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Denmark.

Abstaining: Chile, Italy, Venezuela.

(e) The draft resolution as a whole, as orally revised (A/AC.109/L.294/Rev.2) was adopted by a roll-call vote of 18 to 1, with 3 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Chile, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Republic of Tanzania, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia.

Abstaining: Denmark, Italy, United States of America.

1097. The text of the resolution on the question of Southern Rhodesia (A/AC.109/167) adopted by the Special Committee at its 427th meeting on 31 May 1966, reads as follows:

"The Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

"Having heard the petitioners during its consideration of the question of Southern Rhodesia,

"Recalling General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960, which contains the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

"Recalling the various resolutions of the Security Council and, in particular, resolution 217 (1965) of 20 November 1965 which, inter alia, called upon all States to do their utmost to break off all economic relations with Southern Rhodesia, including an embargo on oil and petroleum products,

"Recalling further that since the illegal declaration of independence by the racist minority régime in Southern Rhodesia, the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland has, on a number of occasions, declared the racist minority régime to be unlawful,

"Considering that the Government of the United Kingdom has in a number of instances taken prompt measures, including the unjust use of military force in other colonies, to restore or preserve so-called constitutionality as defined by the administering Power,

"Gravely concerned at the consequences which the negotiations between the representatives of the racist minority régime and the United Kingdom Government might entail for the rights of the African people of Zimbabwe to freedom and independence,

"Noting with regret that the administering Power has made no effort to open negotiations with the leaders of African political parties with a view to establishing in Southern Rhodesia a government consistent with the aspirations of the people of Zimbabwe,

"1. Deplores the failure of the United Kingdom Government to bring down the racist minority régime in Southern Rhodesia and to establish democratic rule in this colony in accordance with the various resolutions of the Security Council and the General Assembly;

"2. Expresses its total disapproval of the negotiations between the United Kingdom and the racist minority régime in Southern Rhodesia and draws the attention of the United Kingdom Government to the harmful consequences those negotiations might entail for the legitimate rights of the African people of Zimbabwe;

"3. Condemns the Governments of Portugal and South Africa for their continued support of the racist minority régime in Southern Rhodesia;

"4. Reaffirms the inalienable rights of the people of Zimbabwe to freedom and independence in accordance with the Declaration contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and recognizes the legitimacy of their struggle to achieve those rights;

"5. Considers that the situation in Southern Rhodesia continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security, as has already been established by the Security Council in its resolution 221 (1966) of 9 April 1966;

"6. Draws once again the attention of the Security Council to the grave situation prevailing in Southern Rhodesia with a view to recommending mandatory sanctions under Chapter VII of the Charter and to taking appropriate measures to secure the effective application of sanctions in case of default by any State;

"7. Recommends to the Security Council that it request the Government of the United Kingdom to take measures provided for in Chapter VII of the Charter in order, by the use of air, sea or land forces, to prevent any supplies, including oil and petroleum products, from reaching Southern Rhodesia;

"8. Calls upon the United Kingdom Government to hold consultations with the leaders of the African political parties with a view to the establishment of an elected government consistent with the aspirations of the people of Zimbabwe and to fix an early date for this purpose;

"9. Calls upon the United Kingdom Government to take all necessary measures, including the use of force, to abolish the racist minority régime in Southern Rhodesia and to ensure the immediate application of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV);

"10. Calls upon all States to render moral and material support to the people of Zimbabwe in furtherance of their struggle to achieve freedom and independence;

"11. Requests the specialized agencies concerned and other international assistance organizations to aid and assist the refugees from Southern Rhodesia and those who are suffering from oppression by the racist minority régime of Southern Rhodesia;

"12. Decides to maintain the question of Southern Rhodesia on its agenda and to keep it under urgent and constant review."

1098. The text of the resolution was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 14 June 1966.³⁵

APPENDIX I

Proclamation broadcast by Mr. Ian Smith on 11 November 1965

A PROCLAMATION

Whereas, in the course of human affairs, history has shown that it may become necessary for a people to dissolve the political affiliations which have connected them with another people and to assume among other nations the separate and equal status to which they are entitled, and

Whereas, in such event, a respect for the opinions of mankind requires them to declare to other nations the causes which impel them to assume full responsibility for their own affairs,

Now therefore, we the Government of Rhodesia, do hereby declare:

That it is an indisputable and accepted historic fact that since 1923 the Government of Rhodesia have exercised the powers of self-government and have been responsible for the progress, development and welfare of their people.

That the people of Rhodesia, having demonstrated their loyalty to the Crown and to their kith and kin in the United Kingdom and elsewhere throughout two world wars and having been prepared to shed their blood and give of their substance in what they believed to be a mutual interest of freedom-loving people, now see all that they have cherished about to be shattered on the rocks of expediency.

That the people of Rhodesia have witnessed a process which is destructive of those very precepts upon which civilization in a primitive country has been built; they have seen the principles of Western democracy and responsible government and moral standards crumble elsewhere; nevertheless they have remained steadfast.

That the people of Rhodesia fully support the request of their Government for sovereign independence and have witnessed the consistent refusal of the Government of the United Kingdom to accede to their entreaties.

That the Government of the United Kingdom have thus demonstrated that they are not prepared to grant sovereign independence to Rhodesia on terms acceptable to the people of Rhodesia, thereby persisting in maintaining an unwarrantable jurisdiction over Rhodesia, obstructing laws and treaties with other States in the conduct of affairs with other nations and refusal of assent to necessary laws for the public good, all this to the detriment of the future peace, prosperity and good government of Rhodesia.

That the Government of Rhodesia have for a long period patiently and in good faith negotiated with the Government of the United Kingdom for the removal of the remaining limitations placed upon them and for the grant of sovereign independence.

That in the belief that procrastination and delay strike at and injure the very life of the nation, the Government of Rhodesia consider it essential that Rhodesia should obtain without delay sovereign independence, the justice of which is beyond question.

Now therefore we, the Government of Rhodesia, in humble submission to Almighty God, who controls the destiny of nations, conscious that the people of Rhodesia have always shown unswerving loyalty and devotion to Her Majesty the Queen and earnestly praying that we the people of Rhodesia will not be hindered in our determination to continue exercising our undoubted right to demonstrate the same loyalty and devotion in seeking to promote the common good so that the dignity and freedom of all men may be assured, do by this proclamation adopt, enact and give to the people of Rhodesia the Constitution annexed hereto.

God save the Queen!

(3) This section applies to British ships registered in the United Kingdom or any other country or place to which this Act extends, and to aircraft so registered.

PART II*

H. STUDY OF THE ACTIVITIES OF FOREIGN ECONOMIC AND OTHER INTERESTS IN SOUTHERN RHODESIA AND THEIR MODE OF OPERATION

Introduction

1099. At its 328th meeting on 22 April 1965, the Special Committee adopted a resolution on the question of Southern Rhodesia (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. III, para. 292). In operative paragraph 9 of this resolution the Special Committee decided "to study in co-operation with the Secretary-General and the agencies of the United Nations the implications of the activities of foreign economic and other interests in Southern Rhodesia and their mode of operation in order to assess their economic and political influence".

1100. In its report to the General Assembly at its twentieth session, the Special Committee stated that it hoped to submit a report on this matter to the Assembly in 1966 (ibid., chap. I, para. 61).

1101. At its 409th meeting on 26 April 1966, the Special Committee decided, without objection, to refer to Sub-Committee I, for consideration, the item relating to the activities of foreign economic and other interests in Southern Rhodesia and their mode of operation. On 14 September 1966, Sub-Committee I adopted a report concerning this item which is annexed hereto.

1102. At its 469th meeting on 29 September 1966, the Special Committee considered the report of Sub-Committee I.

Consideration by the Special Committee of the Report of Sub-Committee I 1103. At the 469th meeting of the Special Committee, the representative of Syria, Rapporteur of Sub-Committee I, introducing the report of the Sub-Committee (see annex), said that an analysis of the implications of the activities of foreign economic and other interests in Southern Rhodesia and their mode of operation had led the Sub-Committee to conclude, inter alia, that foreign economic and related interests played a decisive role in the economic life of Southern Rhodesia and that the foreign enterprises operating there were closely linked with international economic and financial interests in other parts of southern Africa. In common with those interests, those enterprises had been instrumental, directly and indirectly, in denying the African peoples the means of effective participation in the economic life and the enjoyment of the resources of their country. He hoped that the report would be adopted unanimously.

1104. The representative of Australia said that he could not in general support the report since he disagreed with many of its aspects and was completely opposed to some, particularly, for example, paragraph 102 (see annex). In saying this, however, he wished his country's attitude towards the present situation in Southern Rhodesia to be clearly understood.

1105. In order to make clear his delegation's position on the question of Southern Rhodesia he recalled that, at the 402nd meeting of the Special Committee, the Australian representative had said that his Government's economic sanctions against Southern Rhodesia were not merely declarations of principle in the absence of economic ties, but meant a substantial actual discontinuance of trade with consequent economic sacrifices. His country not only had acted swiftly, and had been one of the first in the world to institute action through actual parliamentary processes (usually a lengthy and difficult procedure), but its action had been so prompt that these parliamentary processes had been completed by 16 November 1965, i.e., within a few days only of the actual illegal declaration of independence. Furthermore, his country supported the Security Council's resolution of 20 November 1965. He enumerated the substantial action which had been taken and recalled that the Australian Prime Minister had stated that his Government regarded the unilateral declaration of independence as illegal and would grant no diplomatic recognition to the new régime.

1106. The representative of the United Kingdom said that his Government's position on the political situation in Rhodesia since the illegal declaration of independence and on the question of economic sanctions had been made absolutely clear in many organs of the United Nations, including the Security Council. In particular, he rejected the recommendation in paragraph 102 (a) of the report (see annex). He reserved his delegation's position on those aspects of the report for the occasions when those matters would arise during the current session of the General Assembly.

1107. With regard to the more general question of the activities of foreign economic and other interests in southern Africa, his delegation's views were well known.

1108. If the report was to be adopted by consensus, he would have to reserve his Government's position and request that it should be so recorded.

* Previously issued under the symbol A/6300/Add.1 (part II) and Corr.1.

1109. The representative of the United States of America said that his delegation was opposed to the adoption of the report. The conclusions and recommendations of the report were unfounded and would not help to bring down the illegal régime of Ian Smith. In his delegation's view, the Special Committee should devote its time to seeking a peaceful solution to the problem of bringing about majority rule in Southern Rhodesia.

1110. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that, as a member of the Sub-Committee, his delegation supported all the recommendations and conclusions in the report. The aim of the report was not to topple the Smith régime but to publicize the fact that foreign monopolies were ruthlessly exploiting the human and natural resources of Southern Rhodesia. The Sub-Committee's study had shown that most of the foreign capital came from Western Europe and the United States and that the foreign monopolies were an integral part of an enmeshed oligarchy whose purpose was to exploit the vast resources of southern Africa. The responsibility for that situation lay with the administering Power, the United Kingdom, which had enabled legislation to be enacted paving the way to exploitation by foreign financial monopolies. As the Tanzanian representative had said in the Sub-Committee, colonialism had arisen from the accumulation of capital in the industrialized nations of Europe, coupled with the hunger for new sources of raw materials and new markets. It was thus economic interests that had prompted the colonization of Africa.

1111. The Sub-Committee had taken those facts into account in making its recommendations and they were applicable to all colonial countries.

1112. The representative of Italy said that the Sub-Committee had exceeded its terms of reference in passing political judgements. His delegation shared the reservations expressed by the Danish delegation, as reported in paragraph 103 of the Sub-Committee's report (see annex). In particular, his delegation did not think that paragraph 102 (a), condemning the colonial policy of the United Kingdom Government, was appropriate; this recommendation attempted to condense too much history, did not fit into the general context and served no useful purpose. Although he agreed that economic factors played an important role in the affairs of men, he could not share the view and the theories implicit in the report as a whole that the so-called "economic and financial interests of the international monopolies and all the forces of reaction" were the sole or deciding factor in political events in Southern Rhodesia. His delegation also had serious reservations concerning the recommendation in paragraph 102 (f), which included a reference to South West Africa, the Territories under Portuguese administration and other colonial Territories. Such a recommendation was outside the scope of the report and would divert attention from the essential problem, which was of a political nature. His delegation would not, however, oppose the adoption of the report.

1113. The representative of India congratulated the members of Sub-Committee I on the thorough study they had made. The report described vividly the complicated financial circles which were operating in the area and exploiting the indigenous population and resources. A cursory glance at the report and its appendices was sufficient to explain the reluctance of some to give up their vested economic interests in the Territory. His delegation supported the report together with its conclusions and recommendations. It was true, as the representative of Italy had said, that the Territories under Portuguese administration and South West Africa were not properly within the scope of the report, but Sub-Committee I's agenda had included a study of foreign economic interests in those Territories also, and it was his understanding that the recommendation in paragraph 102 (f) of the report would not be repeated in the Sub-Committee's reports on the other Territories.

1114. The representative of Bulgaria, referring to the conclusions in paragraphs 67 and 68 of the Sub-Committee's report, said that it was important to establish the role of foreign economic interests not only in the development of the situation in Southern Rhodesia prior to the usurpation of power by the white minority, but in particular in relation to the help given by those interests to the racist minority. The Sub-Committee's report proved that they had indeed played a part. There would be nothing new in the Special Committee condemning the United Kingdom's policy in Southern Rhodesia, as recommended in paragraph 102 (a) and it would also be appropriate to condemn the activities of the foreign economic interests in Southern Rhodesia which supported the minority régime in its defiance of world public opinion (para. 102 (d)). The recommendation in paragraph 102 (e) was logical; he agreed that the Special Committee should urge that the necessary steps should be taken by the Powers concerned to ensure that their nationals did not impede the attainment of independence by the people of Southern Rhodesia. Since the Special Committee, through Sub-Committee I, had already discussed the role of foreign economic interests in South West Africa and the Territories under Portuguese administration, it was only appropriate to include a reference to those Territories in paragraph 102 (f). His delegation supported the Sub-Committee's recommendations as a whole, especially the recommendation in paragraph 102 (f).

1115. The representative of Uruguay said that his delegation considered the Sub-Committee's report a valuable contribution to the study of the problem and a useful compilation of material which would assist members in forming judgements. His delegation had general reservations, similar to those which had been expressed by the representative of Italy. He agreed with all the recommendations in paragraph 102 of the report, with the exception of that in sub-paragraph (a), on which his delegation had definite reservations. It could not support an explicit condemnation of the colonial policy of the United Kingdom Government which stated that that policy had "resulted in the rise of the present racist minority régime . . .".

1116. The representative of Syria, speaking in exercise of the right of reply, said that the United States representative had suggested that a peaceful solution to the problem should be found. He wondered whether the United States would contribute towards this by exerting pressure on foreign enterprises in Southern Rhodesia to treat the Africans on an equal basis with the Europeans and to recognize the legitimate rights of the Africans.

1117. The representative of Denmark drew the Special Committee's attention to paragraph 103, which recorded the remarks made by his delegation at the 31st meeting of Sub-Committee I to the effect that it could not support the recommendations in paragraph 102 (a) and (f) of the Sub-Committee's report. The position of his delegation had not changed but, on the understanding that its reservations were recorded, it would not oppose the adoption of the report.

1118. The representative of Venezuela said that his delegation agreed in general with the recommendations of the Sub-Committee but had definite reservations concerning the wording of paragraph 102 (a).

1119. The representative of Chile said that the Sub-Committee's report underlined the economic factors which impeded the attainment of independence and self-determination by the people of the Territory. He was in favour of retaining the recommendation in paragraph 102 (f). There was nothing to prevent the Special Committee from mentioning South West Africa, the Territories under Portuguese administration and other colonial Territories in that context. His delegation agreed with the recommendations in paragraph 102 (b), (c) and (d) and endorsed the conclusions in the report.

1120. The representative of Mali said that his delegation fully supported the report. The recommendations were the minimum acceptable for the assistance of the people of Southern Rhodesia, who were suffering under a régime of racist aggression supported by foreign monopolies. The report showed clearly that Ian Smith's Government was protecting those monopolies.

Action taken by the Special Committee on the Report of Sub-Committee I 1121. At the 469th meeting of the Special Committee, the representative of India proposed that the words "Appeal to" in paragraph 102 (e) of the report of Sub-Committee I (see annex) should be replaced by the word "Urge".

1122. The proposal of the representative of India was supported by the representative of Syria.

1123. At the same meeting, the representative of the Ivory Coast suggested that the word "Condemn" in paragraph 102 (a) of the report of Sub-Committee I should be replaced by the word "Deplore".

1124. The suggestion of the representative of the Ivory Coast was supported by the representative of Madagascar.

1125. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that, although his delegation deplored the colonial policy of the United Kingdom Government in Southern Rhodesia, it also condemned it, as did all progressive people, and he was in favour of retaining the word "Condemn" in paragraph 102 (a).

1126. The representative of Chile said that he supported the Indian representative's proposal that the words "Appeal to" should be replaced by the word "Urge" in paragraph 102 (e). His delegation was ready to accept the majority view with regard to the wording of paragraph 102 (a), but preferred the use of the word "Deplore". He expressed a tentative reservation concerning the substance of paragraph 102 (a) and reserved the right to state his delegation's definitive views after he had consulted his Government.

1127. The representative of Uruguay said that the recommendation in paragraph 102 (a) was implicit and obvious, but his delegation's reservations concerning it were based on its opinion that such a recommendation was not related to the Special Committee's task as set out in the resolution adopted at the Special Committee's 328th meeting. It would have been better if the recommendations had started with one concerning the subject-matter of the report. If, however, it was agreed to use the word "Deplore" instead of the word "Condemn", his delegation would not object to the adoption of the recommendation.

1128. The representative of Venezuela said that if there was agreement on the use of the word "Deplore" in paragraph 102 (a), his delegation would withdraw its reservation.

1129. The representative of Denmark said, even with the proposed amendment, his delegation's reservations concerning paragraph 102 (a) would stand.

1130. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania and the representative of India said that, for the sake of unanimity, they would agree to the use of the word "Deplore" in paragraph 102 (a).

1131. The representative of Mali said that the policy of the United Kingdom Government in Southern Rhodesia should be condemned, but his delegation would accept the use of the word "Deplore" in paragraph 102 (a) in a spirit of compromise.

1132. At the same meeting the Special Committee decided to adopt the oral amendments proposed by the representatives of India and the Ivory Coast to the recommendations contained in the report of Sub-Committee I, without prejudice to the reservations expressed by some members on the report as a whole.

1133. The Special Committee then adopted the report of Sub-Committee I (see annex), and endorsed its conclusions and recommendations, as amended, it being understood that the reservations expressed by members would be reflected in the records.

1134. The recommendations thus adopted, with amendments by the Special Committee at its 469th meeting on 29 September 1966, read as follows:

The Special Committee recommends that the General Assembly:

(a) Deplore the colonial policy of the United Kingdom Government which resulted in the rise of the present racist minority régime based on the colonial exploitation of the natural and human resources of the Territory in a way detrimental to the rights and interests of the indigenous population of Southern Rhodesia.

(b) Condemn once again the illegal declaration of independence by the white settlers in Southern Rhodesia, who represent the economic and financial interests of the international monopolies and all the forces of reaction.

(c) Reaffirm the rights of the indigenous population of the Territory to self-determination and real independence, and the legitimacy of their struggle to achieve both economic and political liberation.

(d) Strongly condemn the activities and operating methods of foreign economic and other interests in Southern Rhodesia which support the racist minority régime in its suppression of the African population of the Territory and in the defiance of world public opinion.

(e) Urge the interested Powers to exert their influence on those of their nationals who own and operate enterprises in Southern Rhodesia to end their activities which impede the attainment of independence by the people of Southern Rhodesia, and to refrain from giving any support to the colonial policies which constitute a crime against humanity.

(f) Inscribe on the agenda of the General Assembly at its twenty-first session as a matter of urgency the following item:

"The activities of foreign economic and other interests which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, Territories under Portuguese administration and other colonial territories."

(g) Request the Secretary-General to give the widest possible publicity to the contents of this report and to the decisions of the United Nations on this question.

I. The economy of Southern Rhodesia, with particular reference to foreign interests	211
II. Recent developments concerning economic sanctions against Southern Rhodesia	255

INTRODUCTION

1. At its 328th meeting on 22 April 1965, the Special Committee adopted a resolution on the question of Southern Rhodesia (A/6000/Rev.I, chap. III, para. 292). In operative paragraph 9 of this resolution the Special Committee decided "to study in co-operation with the Secretary-General and the agencies of the United Nations the implications of the activities of foreign economic and other interests in Southern Rhodesia and their mode of operation in order to assess their economic and political influence".

2. The Secretariat, with a view to assisting the Special Committee in its study of this question, made available to members, on 21 December 1965, a working paper on the economy of Southern Rhodesia, with particular reference to foreign interests (see appendix I).

3. At its 409th meeting on 26 April 1966, the Special Committee decided, without objection, to refer to Sub-Committee I,^a for consideration, the item relating to the activities of foreign economic and other interests in Southern Rhodesia and their mode of operation.

4. The Sub-Committee considered this item at its 24th, 25th, 26th and 31st meeting held on 9 and 12 May, 25 July and 14 September 1966 respectively. The Sub-Committee had before it the above-mentioned working paper prepared by the Secretariat.

5. At its 25th meeting held on 12 May 1966, the Chairman of the Sub-Committee, on the suggestion of the representative of the Soviet Union, requested the Secretariat to prepare a supplementary working paper on the ways in which the activities of foreign monopolies rendered the economic sanctions against the Smith régime ineffective. Pursuant to that request the Secretariat made available to members on 21 July 1966 a further working paper on recent developments concerning economic sanctions against Southern Rhodesia (see appendix II). This working paper furnished information supplementary to that already contained in previous working papers on Southern Rhodesia prepared by the Secretariat for the Special Committee (A/AC.109/L.327).

CONSIDERATION BY THE SUB-COMMITTEE

A. Statements by members

6. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania thanked the Secretariat for compiling the extensive data in the in working paper, which would be most useful to the Sub-Committee.

7. It should be understood that, far from being a mere adventure, colonialism had arisen from the accumulation of capital in the industrialized nations of Europe, coupled with the hunger for new sources of raw materials and new markets. It was thus economic interests that had prompted the colonization of Africa.

8. Three factors were necessary for a clear understanding of the question under consideration. Firstly, the Sub-Committee's study of the activities of foreign monopolies in South West Africa and the Portuguese Territories had demonstrated that, whereas companies maintained various individual names, they were an integral part of an enmeshed oligarchy whose purpose was to exploit the vast resources of southern Africa; the study of Southern Rhodesia could be expected to provide further confirmation of that fact. The second factor was the establishment of "Crown lands" and white lands, resulting in the dispossession of the African people and the denial to them of their own sources of production, and the entrenchment of the colonialist settlers as the "superior" administrative force in Zimbabwe. Thirdly, the tight hold of the financial empires in southern Africa and the interrelationship of their various branches were an obstacle to effective economic sanctions. Sanctions applied to one branch would affect the others; at the same time, while an attempt might be made to curb the activities of branches operating in Southern Rhodesia, those in other sectors would automatically keep them fully and adequately supplied.

9. The question of land was fundamental. It was through the usurpation of land rights that the white settler minority had been maintained as the tool of colonialism and of the foreign monopolies, that the Africans of Zimbabwe had been denied their natural rights and that the very fabric of African life had been sacrificed at the altar of super-profits. There were twenty times as many Africans as Europeans, yet the distribution of land was such that there were about 168 acres for each European and only ten acres for each African. Furthermore, about 5 per cent of the African land was totally unproductive. Moreover, the larger estates in Rhodesia were owned by companies, above all Lonrho Ltd., a company jointly owned by British financial interests and some settler elements. European settlers were given the best land lying along railway lines and major roads. Although most of them arrived in Southern Rhodesia penniless, they were given land by the Government and directed to credit facilities where they could obtain sufficient capital to carry them through their first harvest. The African labour they employed worked for several months without pay, having to wait until the harvest was sold before receiving their pitifully low wages. Many children, too, from eight to eighteen years of age, were employed in those conditions, a practice both morally reprehensible and contrary to international conventions. Subjected thus to menial labour, the African children were prevented from obtaining education to better themselves and the future of their country. Since farm workers were not allowed to form trade unions, they had no way of safeguarding their interests. The foreign companies engaged in that sector of the economy were therefore actively curbing the rights of the Zimbabwe African workers.

10. The basic source of economic life and foreign exchange in Southern Rhodesia was agriculture. Hence, land was the most valuable asset of the people and the Africans of Southern

^a The Sub-Committee is composed of the following members: United Republic of Tanzania (Chairman), Denmark, Ethiopia, Mali, Syria, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Yugoslavia.

Rhodesia had a natural right to a fair share of the land. The lion's share, however, had been given to the foreign elements of exploitation and their local representatives, the racist settlers. That had been done by the British colonial administration, through the Land Apportionment Act. As far back as 1923, the so-called Legislative Council of Southern Rhodesia, under the direction of the United Kingdom Government, had enacted the necessary legislation in response to a resolution passed by the Agricultural Union Congress calling on the colonial administration to make it impossible for individual landowners "to sell land to Asiatics or Natives among a European community". The legislation, the height of arrogance, had paved the way to exploitation by foreign financial monopolies. Other legislation had followed: legislation giving legal substance to a policy of segregation; legislation (African Affairs Act) prohibiting an African from moving from one district to another; and legislation, under the notorious 1961 Constitution, authorizing the Governor yet further to dispossess the Africans of their land whenever it was required for the purpose of mineral development, defence, etc.

11. While Europeans enjoyed a monopoly of the best and most conveniently situated land—cultivating only about 3.5 per cent of it—they had free access to the so-called "Native Purchase Area", where they could acquire land under the pretext of mining or carrying out projects in the interest of "natives". It might be asked where the exploitation was to stop and what future was in store for the 4 million Africans. The legislation he had described had been so designed as to relegate the African people of Southern Rhodesia to the lowest levels of the economy while benefiting the foreign companies operating in that country.

12. The major agricultural produce of Southern Rhodesia was tobacco. Various companies, mainly British or of British origin, played a major role, both domestic and international, in the tobacco industry. The vast profits reaped by those companies did not of course accrue to the African people of Zimbabwe, but to the British shareholder. The same situation obtained in the sugar and textile industries. There were sharp differences in the wages paid to Africans and Europeans employed in those industries.

13. It was the mining industry, however, that offered the most glaring example of economic exploitation. The British South Africa Company had been established to exploit Southern Rhodesia's mineral wealth, not for the benefit of the indigenous Africans but to fill the coffers of its shareholders thousands of miles away. According to press reports, significant deposits of magnesite had been found in Southern Rhodesia; they were to be exploited by Cullinan Refractories Ltd. and Vereeniging Brick and Tile, both of which were South African companies. The Rhodesian pig-iron industry was virtually under the control of the Rhodesian Iron and Steel Corporation (RISCO), a giant consortium of Anglo-American concerns. Immediately after the announcement of sanctions against the Smith régime, the RISCO group had taken steps to transfer its enterprises and to trade through ISCOR (Iron and Steel Corporation), an institution owned by South Africa. It was obvious that the activities of that group of foreign companies were directed against the interests of the African people of Southern Rhodesia.

14. In the circumstances which had led to expropriation of the land by Europeans, the traditional generosity of the Africans had been exploited to their disadvantage. Chief Lubengula, the King of Matabele, had entered into an agreement with the British South Africa Company for mining rights in return for an agreed rent to be paid to the Africans as the owners of the land; the latter had risen against the Company in 1893 for its failure to honour the agreement, and it was not until 1897, after the settlers had sent for reinforcements, that they had been defeated. That had been taken as a pretext for seizing what was now known as Southern Rhodesia from its rightful owners. From that time forth, the Company had sold land to new settlers with impunity. The business had been so lucrative that the Company had created many subsidiaries registered in the United Kingdom, Southern Rhodesia, Canada and elsewhere. About two thirds of the directors were British subjects and resided in the United Kingdom, which explained why the United Kingdom Government had refused to put down the rebellious régime. The amount leaving the country every year was colossal: in 1961-1963 alone, about £426 million had been exported.

15. In 1962 a group of experts had studied the economic resources of Southern Rhodesia with particular reference to African agriculture. According to their report, in 1962 Europeans in wage employment had received an average of £1,173 per head, but Africans only £95. While the relatively high income of the European population in part reflected the original scarcity of skill, specialized knowledge and training which could be supplied only by Europeans, it was also in part due to contrived advantages. The lower earnings of the Africans, the report had said, were chiefly due to the restricted opportunities for increasing their productive powers, and the vast majority of the population was wastefully used on largely unskilled work. Such a reflection, coupled with the data in the working paper, testified eloquently to the ruthlessness with which the African was being exploited in Southern Rhodesia.

16. Land played a decisive role in the economic life of Southern Rhodesia. The extensive leases granted to foreign financial interests, and to the settlers, were maintained under the notorious Land Apportionment Act. The people of Southern Rhodesia had categorically denounced that Act as an integral part of the coercive machinery used by the forces of colonialism to deny them freedom. The foreign monopolies operating in Southern Rhodesia, which continued to exploit the human and natural resources of that country through the enforcement of the Act, were a direct impediment to the realization of the African people's legitimate aspirations. The monopolies were aiding and abetting the consolidation of colonial rule in Southern Rhodesia through the white settler minority.

17. The following conclusions could be drawn: the foreign companies operating in Southern Rhodesia were directly instrumental in denying the Africans the basic means of production, thereby subjecting them to outmoded forms of production and curbing their development; they were holding a position openly robbed from the legitimate sons of Rhodesia; they were actively broadening the coercive machinery of the colonial régime; while international opinion apparently supported sanctions against the rebel régime, those foreign companies were working in concert to undermine any such action. It followed that they were a direct hindrance to the attainment by the African people of their liberation. The Sub-Committee should therefore recommend that the nationals of the companies concerned should be restrained by their Governments from pursuing activities which were an impediment to the attainment of freedom and independence by the African people of Southern Rhodesia.

18. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that the Sub-Committee's previous study of the activities of imperialist monopolies in South West Africa and the African Territories under Portuguese administration had clearly shown that United Kingdom, United States, West German and other monopolies which held in their tenacles all of southern and central Africa were a major obstacle to the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. The work of the Sub-Committee and of the Special Committee itself had clearly established that those same international monopolies were operating in the dependent Territories of southern Africa, which they had turned into their private domain and were resolved to maintain as a sanctuary of colonialism in order to continue to receive enormous profits.

19. The decisive role played by international monopolies in suppressing the legitimate aspirations of the Zimbabwe people for genuine independence was apparent throughout the history of Southern Rhodesia, where 80 per cent of capital investment came from abroad. The British South Africa Company, founded in 1889 by Cecil Rhodes, had until 1923 enjoyed unlimited powers over the Territory, including the right to acquire and exploit the land. To install and maintain that clique as the overlords of the indigenous population, it had set up armed forces, units of which still existed. That company had played an important part in the conquest of the Territory by the United Kingdom, the looting of Zimbabwe, its settlement by white emigrants, the seizure of the best lands and the establishment of the present social and political structure of Southern Rhodesia.

20. Being the largest exploiters of the African continent, the British South Africa Company had long maintained close relations with the largest company in southern Africa, the Anglo-American Corporation. The boards of the two companies had merged in 1965 and the new company, Charter Consolidated, through its Rhodesian affiliate Anglo-American Corporation (Rhodesia) and associated companies, held a major interest in practically every sector of the Rhodesian economy, including mining, forestry, citrus fruit production, tobacco and sugar. The total capital investment of United Kingdom monopolies was estimated at £200 million and of United States companies at $56 million, the major part being invested in agriculture, mines and real estate. Total investments of South African companies were estimated at £75 million.

21. International monopolies held a particularly powerful position in mining, in which 90 per cent of all private capital was invested, while only 10 per cent went to manufacturing, processing and agricultural industries. The United Kingdom company Turner and Newall, Ltd., which had earned £12.7 million in 1962-1963, controlled 63 per cent of the production of asbestos, of which Southern Rhodesia was the world's largest producer. Chrome reserves were cynically exploited by such foreign monopolies as the London Chrome Company, Ltd. and the Vanadium Corporation of America, and production of lithium, copper, gold and coal were almost exclusively controlled by Bikita Minerals (Pvt.), Ltd., M.T.D. (Mangula), Ltd., companies of the Lonrho group, and Wankie Colliery Company, Ltd., respectively. It was clear that United States-owned companies were taking an increasing part in the exploitation of Rhodesian mineral resources.

22. In the field of ferrous metallurgy, which was largely controlled by Charter Consolidated through its affiliated company The Rhodesian Iron and Steel Company Ltd. (RISCO), there had been a recent increase in the penetration of Japanese capital and two large Japanese firms had been granted concessions for the exploitation of iron ore in the production of pig-iron and for the construction of a new blast-furnace for RISCO. The motor vehicle assembly plant in Salisbury belonged to the Ford Motor Company of Rhodesia, a subsidiary of Ford of Canada, and the Rhodesia Bata Shoe Company produced 90 per cent of all leather footwear.

23. The predominance of foreign monopolies, which owned vast areas of land in the Territory, was particularly striking in agricultural production. Tobacco was grown by European farmers and marketed by three large firms controlled by Imperial Tobacco, Gallaher, British American Tobacco Ltd. and Rothmans Tobacco. Among the monopolies with heavy investments in tobacco plantations was the South African Mutual Insurance Group. Sugar was entirely controlled by international monopolies through the firms of Triangle Ltd., and Hippo Valley Estates Ltd.

24. Those facts clearly demonstrated that the economy of Southern Rhodesia was wholly in the hands of foreign economic interests, which had been largely responsible for transforming the Territory into a colony of white settlers and had led to the division of the economy into distinct European and African sectors, the latter being subjected to ruthless colonialist exploitation by the former. The European sector, which accounted for almost 90 per cent of the national income, included the major foreign companies and the firms of the settler bourgeoisie. The domination of the Territory's economy by foreign monopoly with its mercenary interests brought hunger, misery and untold suffering to the millions of African toilers. They were forced to work in enterprises and farms owned by the Whites, barely keeping body and soul together. Europeans, on the other hand, enjoyed a high level of living and had every possible social advantage. All their children could receive not only primary and secondary, but higher education as well; in 1965 the per capita allocation of funds for education had been fifteen times higher for Europeans than for Africans. All those advantages lay at the root of the racial prejudice and ideology of apartheid which contaminated most of the European population, particularly those born in the Territory and immigrants from South Africa.

25. The white immigrant-colonists had always found land, work and cheap labour in Southern Rhodesia and had always enjoyed the political, social and economic support of the powerful monopolies in their position of dominance. It was therefore not surprising that the white settlers, carrying out the will of their masters—the international monopolies—had, in turn, created the most favourable conditions for continued capital investment by those monopolies. A clear example of economic segregation was the agricultural sector, in which the Europeans, who constituted only 5 per cent of the population, accounted for 45 per cent of agricultural estates, 75.5 per cent of the costs of production and 93.9 per cent of output. The average annual income of African farmers was between £11 and £14, while many Africans lived in the tribal reservations and received no income at all.

26. The merciless exploitation of the vast majority of the population by the foreign monopolies and the white settlers was further strengthened by the notorious Land Apportionment Act, which had led to a situation in which 23 per cent of the population was entirely at the mercy of foreign monopolies and European land-owners, which derived enormous profits by exploiting them and 59 per cent were forced to live in reservations. Thus, first the monopolies with the help of the settlers, and then the settlers with the help of the monopolies, had cleared half the territory of the country of the indigenous inhabitants, and seized the best land in the country, turning millions of Africans into a reservoir of cheap labour. Although trade unions were officially for white and African workers, the majority of trade unions were, in practice, segregated. Wages earned by Africans were much lower than those earned by white workers, since Africans were mostly employed in unskilled work, although as the working paper pointed out, even when the same or similar work was performed by both Africans and non-Africans, different wages were applicable. The vast gap between the earnings of Africans and Europeans was clear even from the official figures, which gave an average annual income in 1964 of £1,241 for Europeans and £121 for Africans. Africans had to work and live in terrible conditions, with no facilities or medical services.

27. The Rhodesian educational system was designed to increase the number of Africans with sufficient primary education to provide manpower for factories and farms and to reduce the number of Africans qualified to exercise effective political leadership. The slightest protests by Africans against the Smith régime were brutally repressed. Thousands of Africans were in custody for an unknown period. The police activities were frustrating attempts to express the discontents of the African population and all activities of that kind, particularly in trade unions, were banned.

28. The monopolies' programme to maintain their supremacy in Southern Rhodesia had been described in the issue of The Economist of 13 November 1965. The same issue had outlined a programme of diplomatic, political and economic measures to be enacted in order to maintain colonial control over the Territory. The United Kingdom Government had in fact adopted measures along the lines advocated in The Economist but the programme of sanctions had had little effect on the United Kingdom companies operating in Southern Rhodesia. Those companies had had time to prepare for the sanctions and had even increased their profits. The international monopolies were succeeding not only in circumventing but in undermining the economic sanctions. United Kingdom, United States, German and other monopolies were violating the ban on sales of Rhodesian tobacco and evading the oil embargo. South African and Rhodesian and international companies were uniting their efforts in a complex operation to keep Southern Rhodesia supplied with oil. The United Kingdom Prime Minister had mentioned the difficulty of forcing oil monopolies registered in South Africa to participate in the oil embargo but had failed to mention that in South Africa oil products were being produced at plants owned by United Kingdom and United States companies. It was significant that 52 per cent of the shares of British Petroleum were British-owned.

29. A number of United Kingdom politicians had close ties with the international companies. For example, fourteen Conservative Members of Parliament had capital invested in Southern Rhodesia. Mr. William Brown was a director of an office of the United States monopoly, Caltex. A Labour Member of Parliament had proposed an investigation of the ties between Conservative leaders and the Southern Rhodesian racists and said that many Conservatives had directorships in companies with interests in Southern Rhodesia.

30. The Salisbury racists encountered no difficulty in obtaining loans from the international monopolies. In December 1961 a group of Anglo-American companies had given the Government of Southern Rhodesia a loan of £51 million with a repayment period of thirteen years; in May 1962 The Standard Bank, New York, had given it a loan of £1 million; in May 1964 a consortium of firms representing banks in the Federal Republic of Germany, France, Italy and Japan had made a loan of $50 million "for development purposes". In 1964-65 the Rhodesian budget had been swelled by external loans amounting to £3.6 million, including £2.5 million from the South African Government. The 1964-65 budget had included an item for the repayment of loans of £2.3 million from the British South African Company and £1.1 million from the Rhodesia Anglo-American Company. There were close links between the Rhodesian government machinery and the monopolist groups. The brother of the deposed Governor was a vice-president of the largest United Kingdom colonial bank, Barclays Bank, DCO.

31. Ian Smith and his henchmen were doing everything possible to convince their masters that they were succeeding in creating stability for the further exploitation of the natural and human resources of Southern Rhodesia. That country was appealing to the United States to join it in an alliance against an alleged communist threat and to invest in the Territory. In return, Southern Rhodesia would expect from the United States a sympathetic understanding of the problems connected with what it described as the perpetuation of the values of Western culture—in other words, the maintenance of absolute domination by the racists—in southern Africa.

32. While outwardly maintaining a position of "neutrality" towards political events in Southern Rhodesia, the large monopolistic groupings had supported the racist upheaval there. Inspired by the powerful international monopolies, the unholy alliance had decided that Smith and his régime could guarantee the inviolability of their position in the south of Africa and therefore sought to transform Southern Rhodesia into a kind of sanitary cordon against the African peoples' independence movement. Smith and his followers could have done nothing without the support of the true masters of the country, who held all the key economic positions. The Southern Rhodesian racists were paying for the support of the large monopolies with a policy of cruel discrimination and repression against the majority of the indigenous population of the country. A comparison of the situation of the European and the indigenous population of Southern Rhodesia showed that Smith was in fact pursuing a policy of apartheid.

33. The dominance of foreign companies in all branches of the economy of Southern Rhodesia was therefore fraught with dangerous consequences for the people of Zimbabwe. The concentration of foreign capital was such that a small number of monopolies had become complete masters in the country. The leading role was played by capital from the United Kingdom, the United States and South Africa but companies from Japan, the Federal Republic of Germany and other capitalist countries were also active in Southern Rhodesia. Throughout the south of Africa, the international monopolies were relying on racist white minority régimes, whose policies were designed to establish the most favourable conditions for the cynical exploitation of the resources of the territories.

34. The international monopolies operating in Southern Rhodesia were closely linked with international financial circles in South Africa, Angola and Mozambique, South West Africa and other colonial Territories in southern and central Africa. Southern Rhodesia therefore had political, economic, military and other ties with South Africa and the Portuguese colonies. The international monopolies were creating a military and industrial complex designed to exploit the African peoples and suppress the movement for the final liberation of the African continent from colonialism. As they had done in South Africa, South West Africa and the Portuguese colonies, the imperialist monopolies had seized all the natural resources of Southern Rhodesia, so that the indigenous inhabitants could not enjoy the riches of their country or take part in industrial and financial activities. So far as agriculture was concerned, the dominance of the international monopolies had led to economic segregation and the division of the economy into European and African sectors. Foreign companies were the largest landowners and controlled the production and marketing of the major export crops—tobacco and sugar. The indigenous inhabitants were thus subjected to a twofold exploitation—by the foreign companies and by the white settlers.

35. The imperialist monopolies were exerting a decisive influence on the political development of Southern Rhodesia. They had placed the administration of the colony under their control and had connived at the illegal declaration of independence. For the benefit of the monopolies, the Smith régime and its predecessors were following a policy of monstrous racial discrimination in the economic and social fields. In order to prevent representatives of the indigenous population from participating in political life, the racist minority had established property and education requirements which deprived the Africans of the franchise.

36. The strong position of the international monopolies in Southern Rhodesia was enabling the Smith régime to evade the economic sanctions; the monopolies were therefore responsible for undermining those sanctions and preventing the application to Southern Rhodesia of the Declaration on the granting of independence. Until the Zimbabwe people were granted true independence, they would be unable to enjoy their inalienable right to dispose of their country's resources and develop them for the benefit of the majority of the population.

37. The activities of foreign monopolies in Southern Rhodesia were therefore the major obstacle to the implementation there of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. The General Assembly should take the action which the Special Committee had recommended in the case of the activities of foreign monopolies in South West Africa and the Portuguese colonies.

38. The representative of Denmark said that his delegation doubted whether it would be proper for the Sub-Committee to try to reach conclusions or make recommendations to the Special Committee within the very limited period of time at its disposal before the visit to Africa. The material was so voluminous and the problems so complex that careful consideration was necessary before the Sub-Committee expressed an opinion. In addition, the material available related to the situation before the unilateral declaration of independence. The situation had since changed considerably and the crucial point was the extent to which the sanctions imposed by the Security Council were being implemented. The Security Council had not given the Special Committee any mandate to investigate that question, nor had the Special Committee given the Sub-Committee any mandate in that respect. He wished, however, to recall that Denmark had severed all economic and trade relations with Southern Rhodesia.

39. The relevant question to be examined by the Sub-Committee was the extent to which the foreign interests in Southern Rhodesia could and in fact did contribute to violations of the sanctions. Further material would be necessary to clarify that matter, however, and it could probably not be provided by the Secretariat. On the basis of the material so far available, no safe conclusions could be reached on whether the foreign interests in themselves had exerted any important influence on political developments. In addition, there was the question whether the considerable United Kingdom investments in Southern Rhodesia could be described as "foreign", since the Territory was a United Kingdom colony and, according to the Special Committee, the United Kingdom was the administering Power. In the opinion of the Danish delegation, what could be concluded from the working paper was that discrimination against and suppression of the African population was also found in the economic sector. That was reprehensible but could hardly be a surprise to anyone. Notwithstanding the analysis given by the Tanzanian representative of the origin of colonialism, he thought that it was the policies of the ruling clique which had attracted the foreign capital and not the capital which had inspired the current policies of the minority régime. The Sub-Committee should not be side-tracked into concentrating on the alleged responsibilities of the foreign interests instead of on the essential task—to put an end to the existing régime in order to prepare for the establishment of a society based on self-determination and equal rights for all.

40. In view of those considerations and of the delicate situation in Southern Rhodesia, his delegation thought it would be neither possible nor appropriate for the Sub-Committee at that moment to discharge the task entrusted to it. It therefore suggested that the Sub-Committee should make a brief interim report to that effect to the Special Committee.

41. The representative of Syria said that distorted words and slogans should not mislead anyone into believing that the plight of over 4 million Africans in Southern Rhodesia had improved. Prosperity was being won for the few at the expense of the African masses; development was achieved by African labour but was not to its advantage; a favourable balance of payments resulted from profits accruing to foreign monopolies and investments that for the Africans meant only more deprivation. The best land had been allocated to the Whites by decree—first by an all-powerful company and then by the colonial Power claiming to bring civilization and democracy. Cattle as well as land had been confiscated from the indigenous people, who were compelled by taxation to seek work in the mines and on farms. The land which had not fallen into the hands of the British South Africa Company had been expropriated by the British Crown; the Crown owned 42 million acres, the minority settler group owned 32 million acres and only 23 million acres of hot and arid land were left for the remaining 94 per cent of the population. The Land Apportionment Act removed any possibility of Africans purchasing land.

42. Racial segregation had not been eliminated but consolidated by the colonial Power. The Industrial Conciliation Act barred Africans from access to skilled posts, while the wages of European workers were protected against any decline: the minority had divine immutable rights, while the Africans had a permanently inferior status. African labour had been responsible for the development of industries but African trade unions had no legal recognition. Denied the fruits of their labour, Africans remained in the increasingly inadequate native reserves. The foreign companies could make their huge profits only by paying the African worker an average annual wage of £121, half of which was spent on accommodation, compared with £1,241 for the European worker.

43. The emphasis on land stemmed from the fact that the land problem had been a fundamental one and that the dispossession of the legitimate owners had been a source of subsequent ills. Neither the settlers nor the colonial Power supporting them had any regard for the property rights or the human rights of the Africans. Discrimination was obvious in the legislation enacted and maintained by the colonial Power. The foreign intruders had come to consider their wealth dependent on the misery, suppression and gradual extinction of the Africans; the independence proclaimed by Smith and his clique was independence to oppress the Africans and impose on them a permanently inferior status. Indeed, Smith had only been continuing in the tradition of his masters. Although ostensibly it condemned the régime, it was the United Kingdom which had created the British South Africa Company and given it unprecedented powers. It was the same colonial Power which had annexed Zimbabwe as its colony and sanctioned the abominable practices of segregation and discrimination. It was not legal considerations or international scruples which prevented the colonial Power from using force against the illegal Smith régime but its close kinship to that régime, its close connexion with the monopolies and its huge vested interests in the Territory.

44. His delegation fully endorsed the conclusions reached by the representatives of the United Republic of Tanzania and the Soviet Union on the activities of foreign economic interests in Southern Rhodesia. Effective action was imperative in that essentially colonial problem.

45. The representative of Yugoslavia expressed his delegation's gratitude to the Secretariat for preparing the working paper, which had provided the Sub-Committee with valuable data.

46. It was well known that the basic objective of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples was to enable those people to exercise their right to self-determination and independence, and freely to determine their political status and pursue their economic, social and cultural development. The Declaration affirmed the right of all peoples freely to dispose of their natural resources and stated that inadequacy of political, economic and social preparedness should never serve as a pretext for delaying independence.

47. Resolutions adopted by the General Assembly and other United Nations organs called for the overthrow, by force if necessary, of the racist Smith régime and the establishment of a majority government on the basis of one man, one vote. Representatives of the United Kingdom Government had frequently stated that their Government was prepared to bring Rhodesia to independence under a majority government. There was, however, no indication that political and economic developments in Southern Rhodesia were leading in that direction. Indeed, the road to majority government and independence in the colonies of southern Africa was proving longer, harder and more complex than might have appeared at first, because the status of those Territories was closely bound up with the political, economic and other interests of the colonial Powers. The white minority, together with outside forces, had monopolized all rights in Southern Rhodesia, and the people of Zimbabwe were mere strangers in their own homeland, completely excluded from the political, economic and cultural life of the country. Although the African population outnumbered the white minority by twenty to one, Africans owned an average of only ten acres of land each, whereas Europeans owned an average of 170 acres each. Moreover, a much smaller proportion of the African-owned land than of the land owned by the white minority and foreign companies was suitable for cultivation. Discriminatory land legislation, too, ran counter to the interests of the African population.

48. Foreign economic interests played a decisive role in the production of tobacco, sugar and other agricultural products, from which they made large profits. Foreign, and particularly United Kingdom, tobacco companies had considerable investments in tobacco processing and exporting facilities in Southern Rhodesia, and in some cases in cigarette factories. Farms owned by Europeans had produced 1,432,000 tons of sugar. Among the companies controlling sugar production were Hippo Valley Estates, the Rhodesian Anglo-American Company and Tate and Lyle Ltd.; Rhodesian Sugar Refineries, an affiliate of Tate and Lyle Ltd., had two refineries in Southern Rhodesia.

49. The dominance of foreign capital and foreign exploitation of human and natural resources was particularly striking in the mining industry, where 75 per cent of mineral production was in the hands of large foreign firms. A prominent role in mining and quarrying was played by such firms as Charter Consolidated Ltd., The Rhodesian Iron and Steel Corporation (RISCO) and companies of the Lonrho Group.

50. According to the report of the Economic Commission for Africa entitled "Economic and Social Consequences of Racial Discriminatory Practices", in 1962 the African population had amounted to 92.2 per cent of the total but its share in personal income had been only 32.3 per cent. The working paper showed that in 1964 the average annual wage of the 86,000 non-Africans in employment had been £1,240, while that of the 662,000 employed Africans had been £121. Educational opportunities for Africans were limited and the amount spent on their education was only one tenth of the amount spent on the education of children of the white minority. In view of the education and income qualifications required for the franchise, the difficulties faced by Africans in attaining the right to vote in Southern Rhodesia were obvious.

51. It was clear that the economy of the country was entirely controlled by the white minority and the network of for-foreign companies. The people of Zimbabwe had been stripped of their rights and participated in the economic life of the country only as cheap labour bringing profits to others. Education, health and social benefits were beyond their reach and legislation was designed to prevent their benefiting from the political, economic and social development of the country. The Committee was often told that the African population was not ready for independence and must be prepared for constitutional government, but the present situation could scarcely be said to be leading in that direction.

52. The problem of the activities of foreign economic and other interests in Southern Rhodesia was extremely complex. The Special Committee would be discussing the question of Southern Rhodesia in general at its session in Africa. The Yugoslav delegation considered that while there the Committee should hear petitioners on all aspects of Rhodesian problems and thereby obtain a more complete picture of the grave situation in Southern Rhodesia. The new information thus obtained would be of great value in future consideration of the Southern Rhodesian problem. The Yugoslav delegation therefore considered that the Sub-Committee should not conclude its debate on the item before it.

53. The representative of Nigeria said that his delegation had been unable to study the working paper prepared by the Secretariat, because it had not yet been issued in French.

54. Surprise had been expressed in some quarters at the fact that the newly independent countries, while appealing for foreign capital for their economic and social development, did not hesitate to criticize the activities of foreign monopolies in countries still under colonial domination. There were, however, good reasons for that attitude. In independent countries, foreign capital could be a factor making for well-being and prosperity, because the companies concerned carried on their activities within the framework of national development plans and under the control of the national authorities. Their activities could thus be directed in such a way as to benefit the people. In countries still under colonial rule, however, foreign capital merely sought profit, to the detriment of the indigenous population. It served the colonial régime, which gave it protection and which in many cases it had helped to establish. To the people it merely brought impoverishment and servitude. That situation had been experienced by all former colonial peoples and was now to be found in Southern Rhodesia, where it was distinguished by even greater social injustice and more scandalous exploitation than elsewhere. The economic and social situation in the country and the activities of the main companies sharing its wealth had been discussed in detail by previous speakers. He would therefore confine himself to a few comments.

55. Firstly, it was to be noted that the whole of the Southern Rhodesian economy was in the hands of foreign monopolies, which were consequently able to control all the administrative machinery, too, and to play a leading role in political affairs. Taking advantage of social legislation which they had fashioned to suit themselves and which made the African population no more than a cheap labour force, they were able to multiply the profits they drew from land and mining concessions generally acquired on a "might is right" basis. It was inconceivable that they would voluntarily surrender their privileges and permit the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

56. Secondly, most of the companies concerned had their headquarters abroad. The result was that most of the wealth was drained away from Rhodesia and there remained in the country only what was necessary for the well-being of the white minority or for a further increase in the profits of the monopolies. The people did not benefit at all.

57. Thirdly, the foreign companies active in Southern Rhodesia were not restricted to that country. They had many affiliates and branches elsewhere, particularly in South Africa and the Territories under Portuguese administration. By acting through those subsidiaries, they could nullify the effect of any economic sanctions.

58. For those reasons, his delegation considered that the Sub-Committee should recommend the Special Committee to regard the activities of foreign monopolies in Southern Rhodesia as a serious obstacle to the liberation of the Southern Rhodesian people and to the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

59. In conclusion, he pointed out that the situation at present prevailing in Southern Rhodesia had nearly come about in Algeria. The settlers and those who drew their profits from foreign enterprises in Algeria had tried at one time to throw off the authority of Paris. France had not advocated vain economic sanctions, but had gone to the root of the matter and used force, with the result that fruitful negotiations with the Algerian nationalists had become possible. The United Kingdom could profitably have followed that example.

60. The representative of Mali said that previous speakers had analysed the nature of colonialism and shown its aim to be exploitation of the colonized. His delegation fully shared the views expressed by the delegations of Tanzania and the Soviet Union concerning the crimes committed by the capitalists of the United Kingdom and other countries. The activities of foreign interests in Southern Rhodesia could not be discussed without bearing in mind the role which the administering Power had sought to assign to the Territory. When European countries had built themselves colonial empires in the latter half of the nineteenth century, their aim had not been, as was sometimes claimed, to civilize the coloured peoples, but to create a market for their surplus industrial products, in return for which they would be able to buy cheap raw materials.

61. Southern Rhodesia possessed great natural resources and an ideal climate for Europeans. The United Kingdom had therefore decided from the beginning to colonize it. The indigenous people had been driven out and the land had been distributed to the United Kingdom settlers. As soon as the war of occupation was over, the colonial administration had passed an act placing the Blacks in reservations. The total area allocated to the Zimbabwe people had been 21 million acres whereas the few white settlers had been given 31 million acres. The rest of the Territory, amounting to some 42 million acres, had remained Crown property. In 1930, the United Kingdom Government had passed the first Land Apportionment Act, which introduced a strict system of land segregation. Over 50 per cent of the Territory had been assigned to the Europeans and the Africans had lost the right to acquire land except in a limited area of 7.5 million acres. The soil in that area was poor, and it was difficult to grow cereals without heavy expenditure on irrigation and fertilizers. Since the Africans had neither the capital nor the knowledge to develop the land, they were reduced to poverty. Meanwhile, the settlers were given all kinds of incentives to produce the crops required by United Kingdom industry. Instead of diversifying its food crops, Southern Rhodesia had become a supplier of tobacco and sugar.

62. In 1953, in order to facilitate its plunder of the country, the United Kingdom Government had established the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. Full responsibility for economic affairs had been vested in the federal authorities, representing the interests of the racist settlers and United Kingdom financiers. That showed the sinister intentions of the United Kingdom Government towards a people whom, according to the Charter, it was supposed to prepare for independence. The result of the United Kingdom's policy was that the settlers' standard of living had steadily risen while that of the Africans had stagnated or even declined. Thus between 1954 and 1964 the per capita domestic product of the white settlers had risen from £56.1 to £77.4 whereas that of the Africans had declined from £12 to £11. Unable to scratch a livelihood from the soil, the Africans were obliged to sell their labour to companies anxious to exploit them. Between 1954 and 1962, 470 companies operating in many different fields had established themselves in the Federation and their net profits in 1963 had amounted to £72.7 million. The profits were exported to the United Kingdom, thus helping to impoverish Rhodesia. All the sources of true economic wealth remained in the hands of the Whites, creating a disequilibrium which could not but lead to friction.

63. The United Kingdom was not alone in exploiting the natural wealth of Southern Rhodesia. Canadian, Japanese and United States capital was also invested in the Territory in different ways. The automobile industry was dominated by the Ford Motor Company of Rhodesia, a subsidiary of Ford of Canada. The Wankie Colliery Company mined Rhodesian coal in co-operation with other companies such as Rhodesian Anglo-American Limited, a subsidiary of the Anglo-American Corporation of South Africa. Electricity production was monopolized by the same interests. Rhodesia's great coal reserves and the Kariba Dam made it possible to develop heavy industry, using the country's large mineral deposits. The Rhodesian Iron and Steel Company already had a plant in operation, the profits from which all went to United Kingdom trusts. Precious metals were mined and exported to Europe and the United States, but the revenue thus earned did not benefit the Africans, who still lacked schools, hospitals and housing. Their working conditions were harsh and they were dependent on the goodwill of the administration and the settlers. They had no chance of being admitted to higher posts which would provide them with a decent livelihood. Those who did succeed in accumulating some capital found themselves harassed or evicted from their land with trivial compensation. Since the tripartite agreement between South Africa, Portugal and Southern Rhodesia, the settlers could get rid of such persons easily by turning them over to South African companies.

64. The country's transport system was similarly designed to facilitate exploitation, one result being that Zambia now found itself at the mercy of the white racists in Southern Rhodesia. Southern Rhodesia's principal trading partners, apart from the United Kingdom, were the United States, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Netherlands, Japan and Australia. Despite all the resolutions adopted by the United Nations, Portugal and South Africa continued to maintain normal relations with the Smith régime, to trade with it and to help it keep the power it had usurped.

65. The reason for the United Kingdom's attitude in the Rhodesian affair was thus clear. Its shilly-shallying was prompted solely by its desire to protect the interests of United Kingdom capital. Its claim that it was trying to bring down the Smith government by means of an economic embargo was not to be believed, since it was the great United Kingdom trusts that were behind Smith. The United Kingdom ought to realize that its present policy was not the best way of preserving its interests in Africa. It must restore the rights of the Zimbabwe people and only then discuss with them the terms on which investment might take place for the benefit of both sides. It must discharge its responsibilities under the United Nations Charter and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. By giving power to Smith and his clique it had violated both of those instruments. The only way open for the Africans to recover their country and their dignity was violence. It was evident from the recently published Rhodesian budget that the economic sanctions were far from having achieved the desired results. There was a persistent rumour concerning the conclusion of an agreement between the United Kingdom Government and the Smith régime. If that rumour proved correct, it would be a heinous betrayal of the Africans and a further demonstration of the community of interests between United Kingdom financial circles and the Rhodesian settlers.

B. Conclusions

66. Having studied the implications of the activities of foreign economic and other interests in Southern Rhodesia and their mode of operation, the Sub-Committee has come to the following conclusions regarding their economic and political influence.

67. Foreign economic and related interests play a decisive role in the economic life of Southern Rhodesia. The major sectors of production are controlled by foreign owned enterprises which between them account for more than 80 per cent of all capital investment in the Territory, and by settlers of European origin, mainly from the United Kingdom and South Africa. These interests hold a dominant position in the highly profitable primary export industries, notably in the mining industry and, with the collaboration of European settler elements, in the production of tobacco and sugar. They also wield a controlling influence in the field of banking and finance, and in the major manufacturing industries.

68. The foreign undertakings operating in Southern Rhodesia are closely linked with international economic and financial interests in other parts of southern Africa, and in common with those interests, have been instrumental, directly and indirectly, in denying the African peoples the means of effective participation in economic life and the enjoyment of the resources of their country. They have thus subjected the African people of the Territory to outmoded forms of production, hampered their economic, social and educational development, and erected serious obstacles in the way of the realization of their aspirations to freedom and independence.

69. The pattern for the relentless exploitation of the human and material resources of the Territory was set during the last decade of the nineteenth century by the British South Africa Company (BSAC). Armed with the monopoly right, conferred on it by the British Crown, to exploit the mineral wealth of the Territory, and enjoying wide powers of jurisdiction and government, this company employed coercion and physical force to eliminate African opposition to its claims and to expropriate land owned by the African population for the purpose of mineral concessions and for occupation by European settlers. From the exploitation of the land and mineral resources of the Territory, it gradually emerged as a financial trust, with holdings in railways and other undertakings and became a principal source of credit to small and medium-scale European entrepreneurs.

70. With the formal annexation of the Territory by the United Kingdom Government in 1923, political power was transferred from the Company to the European settlers under a system of "internal self-government" which effectively excluded participation by the African population. The new constitutional arrangements paved the way for the influx of other foreign economic and related interests. At the same time the European settlers who originally came to the Territory under the auspices of the BSAC were transformed into collaborators with the incoming enterprises in the exploitation of the land and people of the Territory.

71. In consequence, the interests of foreign undertakings operating in the Territory and those of the European settler elements are closely interlocked and interdependent. Foreign companies depend on the European settler elements to keep the African population in subjection, so as to preserve what they regard as a favourable climate for their investments. The settlers in turn rely on these foreign interests to provide the capital necessary for the exploitation of the natural wealth of the Territory.

72. Foreign interests are predominant in mining, in banking and finance, and in the major manufacturing industries. Though engaged to some extent in the secondary manufacturing industries, the European settlers are mainly preoccupied with the growing of tobacco, which is the principal cash crop and most important export. However, the financing of the tobacco crop in particular, and of agriculture in general, is made possible by capital provided by the foreign interests.

73. The dominance of foreign capital in the exploitation of the human and material resources of the Territory is particularly striking in the mining industry. The mining industry accounts for 90 per cent of all private capital investment in the Territory, and 75 per cent of total production in this sector is in the hands of large foreign undertakings.

74. The major mining and financial interests in Southern Rhodesia include the British South Africa Company which had assets exceeding £80 million in 1964, and the Anglo-American Corporation which is the largest mining financial interest in South Africa. These interests have been connected since 1937.

75. In 1963 the British South Africa Company held investment in Southern Rhodesia in such fields as forestry, ranching, citrus fruit production, flour-milling and baking, as well as iron and steel and ferro-chrome. The agricultural estates totalled 144,000 acres employing 120 Europeans and 3,000 Africans. Its assets in Southern Rhodesia formed, however, only a small proportion of its total assets. Its Rhodesian industrial and other investments were valued by it on 30 September 1963 at £6.7 million compared with its total investments throughout the world of £66.4 million.

76. The principal share register was kept in the United Kingdom; a Dominion register was kept in Salisbury and in Johannesburg. List of subsidiaries and interests of the Group in 1963 comprised a multiplicity of companies registered in the United Kingdom, Southern Rhodesia, Canada and Switzerland. Under the 1962 amendment to the Company's Charter, not less than two thirds of the Directors, including the President and Vice-President and the company's principal representative in Africa had the status of British subjects.

77. Separate financial accounts of the Company for its operations in Southern Rhodesia are not available. In 1963 the British South Africa Company declared profits of over £8 million, after taxation.

78. On 1 April 1965, the British South Africa Company merged with two other groups, the Central Mining and Investment Corporation and the Consolidated Mines Selection Company, which are linked with the Anglo-American Group, to form the new Charter Consolidated, Ltd. The new company holds assets in excess of £142 million. Consolidated Mines Selection represented an important part of the non-African interests of Anglo-American, and was based in London. Furthermore, both Chartered and Consolidated owned shares in Central Mining which was also a London interest. Under the new arrangement establishing Charter Consolidated, members of the Anglo-American Group are the largest single shareholders in Charter Consolidated (approximately 30 per cent of the capital). The interests of Charter Consolidated are spread as to 39 per cent Republic of South Africa, 16 per cent in the rest of Africa, 23 per cent in North America, and 22 per cent elsewhere. The Chairman of the new company is Mr. P. V. Emrys-Evans (United Kingdom) who was before the merger the president of the British South Africa Company.

79. Following the formation of Charter Consolidated, an agreement has been reached with Zambia-Anglo-American for the merging of their Rhodesian interests within the Amrho Company (AMRHO, Anglo-American Corporation (Rhodesia) Ltd. was formerly known as Rhosouth, Ltd.; it is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Zambia-Anglo-American, Ltd.). As a result of this merger Amrho is enlarged with net assets of some £19.6 million. The Company is held as to 47.7 per cent by Zambia-Anglo-American and 36.9 by Charter Consolidated.

80. Other mining groups include Lonrho, Ltd. which was formerly known as London and Rhodesia Mining and Land Company, Ltd. It changed its name in 1963. At the end of 1964, it had issued almost 5.75 million shares, 54 per cent of which were held by five groups: the British South Africa Company (now Charter Consolidated), the Drayton Group; the Anglo-American Group; Lonrho subsidiaries, and "Standard Bank Nominees". The identity of the last holding is unknown, although a major interest in view of Lonrho's ability to raise large cash sums for many of its purchases. The Company has extensive dealings in South America, Southern Rhodesia and Mozambique. The Company has also made a point of buying into areas of "political risk" in which bargains are to be found. The Company which once made all its profits from gold mining in Rhodesia, now covers many fields: plantations are the largest profit earner; motor trading, ranching, mining, "chibuku" breweries, newspapers, hotels, nail and dried ice factories, railroads (Malawi). The Company's land holdings in Southern Rhodesia exceed one million acres. In 1961, the Company's direct mining interest in Southern Rhodesia comprised 164 gold mining claims, some base metal claims, land holdings covering 873,362 acres and eighteen town stands. Some of the mining properties, such as the Muriel Mine, were tributed to other companies on a royalty basis. Lonrho, Ltd. is also the major shareholder of Companhia do Pipeline Moçambique-Rodésia.

81. The fixed assets of the Company were valued in 1963 at £7,142,000. Separate financial accounts of the Company for its operations in Southern Rhodesia are not available. Since June 1958, the consolidated balance sheet after deducting minority interests has grown from £1,650,236 to £3,657,007; revenues before depreciation, taxation and minority interests have increased from £128,000 to £1,308,011. The Lonrho group has very substantial minority interests but earning on the parent company's capital have risen from 7 and one half per cent to 29 and one quarter per cent, and the dividend from 5 per cent to 18 and one-third per cent.

82. Another group is the Selection Trust Limited which has interests in Southern and Central Africa over a wide range of mining activity. The most important single holding in the Company is owned by the American Metal Climax (AMAX). Its major interests include Roan Selection Trust, Ltd. which was formerly known as Rhodesian Selection Trust, Ltd. Separate financial accounts of the Company for its operations in Southern Rhodesia are not available. The gross revenue of the company for the year ending 31 March 1965 exceeded £5 million for the first time, being nearly £1 million higher than in the previous year. After expenses, taxation and minority interests, the net profit was £2,490,739 against £1,988,355 a year earlier.

83. There is also the United Kingdom Company Turner and Newhall, Ltd. which earned £12.7 million in 1962-1963, and controlled 63 per cent of the production of asbestos, of which Southern Rhodesia is the world's largest producer. Similarly the production of chrome is largely in the hands of a few foreign companies, including the London Chrome Company, Ltd. which is controlled by the United Kingdom and American interests, and the Vanadium Corporation of America. The Vanadium Corporation of America had a net profit of $2,494,446 in 1959. The mining of lithium, copper and coal are almost exclusively controlled by Bikita Minerals (Pvt.), Ltd., Messina (Transvaal) Development Company (Mangula), Ltd., and the Wankie Colliery Company, Ltd., respectively.

84. In the field of ferrous metallurgy, the most important concern is the Rhodesian Iron and Steel Company, Ltd., (RISCO). There are many shareholders in this company including the British companies of Lancashire Steel and Stewarts and Lloyds, and Anglo-American Corporation, Rhodesia Selection Trust, British South Africa Company, Messina (Transvaal) Development Company, and Tanganyika Concessions. RISCO reported a net profit for the first half of 1965 of about £450,000 almost as much as for the entire year of 1964. Other developments in ferrous metallurgy include a recent inflow of Japanese capital. Two large Japanese firms have been granted concessions for the exploitation of iron ore for the production of pig-iron and for the construction of a new blast-furnace for RISCO. However, in January 1966, one of the Japanese firms gave notice that its iron ore mine in Southern Rhodesia was to be closed. Significant deposits of magnesite are reported to have been found; they are to be exploited by Cullinan Refractories, Ltd. and Vereeniging Brick and Tile, both of which are South African companies.

85. Many of the above-named companies have branched out from mining into agriculture and the manufacturing industries and now hold a major interest in practically every sector of the economy, including tobacco, sugar, forestry, citrus fruit production, and real estate.

86. As indicated above, foreign economic interests, particularly of United Kingdom origin, play a prominent role with regard to tobacco, the most important export of the Territory. Except for a few plantations in which such firms as the South African Mutual Insurance Group have controlling interests, the cultivation of tobacco is mainly in the hands of the European settlers. However, foreign companies have considerable investment in tobacco processing, exporting and marketing facilities in the Territory and in some cases in cigarette factories. Chief among these are companies controlled by Imperial Tobacco, Gallaher, British American Tobacco Ltd., and Rothmans Tobacco.

87. Sugar production in the Territory is operated by large foreign investors who have established modern and efficient plantations with the co-operation of the Southern Rhodesia authorities which are constructing large dams to irrigate extensive areas for the purpose. Among the principal producers of sugar is Triangle Limited which is a wholly owned subsidiary of Sir J. L. Hulleys and Sons (Rhodesia), Ltd.; this company is in turn owned by Hulleys Sugar Corporation, Ltd., the largest sugar-producing firm in South Africa. Separate financial accounts for Triangle, Ltd. are not available. In 1963 the Huletts Group as a whole had net earnings after taxes of £2.6 million on a total sugar production of 584,000 tons. Another major producer is Hippo Valley Estates, Ltd., the major shareholders of which are the Rhodesian Anglo-American Company, and Tate and Lyle, Ltd., the large British sugar concern. The Company made profits of £146,284 in the year ended 31 March 1963 and £393,605 in the following year. Sugar production on the estate was 37,000 tons during 1964. Rhodesia Sugar Refineries, an affiliate of Tate and Lyle, Ltd., has two refineries in the Territory.

88. European settler elements hold a more important position in the secondary industries than they do in the mining and the major manufacturing industries. Nevertheless they enjoy the active collaboration of various subsidiaries of United Kingdom and South African firms, whose role in this field is not without significance. Apart from the enterprises to which reference is made above, the companies operating in this sector include the Ford Motor Company of Rhodesia, which is a subsidiary of Ford of Canada, the Premier Portland Cement Company (Rhodesia) Ltd., which incorporates an associate of the South African Pretoria Cement Company and the Rhodesian Cement Ltd., and the Rhodesia Bata Shoe Company which produces 90 per cent of all leather footwear in the Territory.

89. The merciless exploitation of the human and material resources of the Territory was reinforced by the Land Apportionment Act passed in 1930. This Act, inter alia, legalized the expropriation of African land which had been initiated by the BSAC. Under the Act as subsequently amended, 38 per cent of the total land area is allocated for the exclusive use of the European settler community, numbering about 240,000, and some 45 per cent, in theory, to the 4 million Africans of the Territory. The area allocated to the European settlers includes the best cultivable and conveniently located land. Further, these settlers who in practice have under cultivation only 3.5 per cent of the land allocated to them are eligible to acquire land in these portions of the African area known as native purchase area, on the pretext of carrying out projects in the interests of the "natives". As a result of the pressure on the native purchase area, there are over 7,000 Africans who have undergone training to farm on individually owned land but are unable to obtain plots.

90. The expropriation of 38 per cent of the land of the Territory to the exclusive use of the European settler community and foreign enterprises, on the basis of an apartheid system based on racial discrimination, has inflicted untold economic hardship on the Africans and has given rise to serious political problems in the Territory. By keeping the Africans in reserves and locations, the settlers' community is better able to control their movements and to preclude their enjoying social and welfare amenities, and to prevent their political advancement.

91. The Africans, deprived of their rightful share of the fruits of the land, have not benefited from educational or agricultural extension services which would enable them to make a really purposeful use of their land resources. For instance, between 1954 and 1964, the per capita domestic product of the Africans declined from £12 to £11, whereas that of the Europeans rose from £56.1 to £77.4. In 1962 the share of the African population in the total personal income was 32 per cent. Moreover, given their rapid population growth, the Africans are increasingly constricted and much of their land is subject to soil erosion. In consequence, they have been forced to move in increasing numbers from the rural areas to seek work in the European owned plantations and in the mining and manufacturing industries. The African population is thus available as a source of cheap labour for developing the European areas of the Territory.

92. Even in this capacity, the African population received pitifully low wages. The official figures give an average annual income in 1964 for Europeans of £1,214 and for Africans of £121, about half of which was spent on accommodation. The Industrial Conciliation Act in effect barred Africans from access to skilled posts while the wages of European workers were protected against decline. There is gross disparity between the wages payable to Africans and to Europeans for the same work. Moreover, the slackening of the economy in recent years has resulted in an actual decline of the labour force, giving rise to substantial unemployment among African workers. The majority of trade unions are in practice segregated, and with the exception of Rhodesia Railways African Employees association, African trade unions have no legal rights concerning collective bargaining.

93. Over the years, foreign economic interests have given direct and substantial financial assistance to the Southern Rhodesia authorities. In December 1961, a group of Anglo-American companies granted them a loan of £51 million repayable over a period of thirteen years. In May 1962, the Standard Bank of New York similarly gave them a loan of £1 million. Again in May 1964, the authorities of the Territory received loans amounting to $50 million "for development purposes" from a group of companies representing financial interests in the Federal Republic of Germany, France, Italy and Japan. Further, the Territory's budget for 1964-65 showed external loans amounting to £3.6 million, including £2.5 million from the South African Government, as well as an item covering the repayment of loans of £2.3 million from the BSAC and £1.1 million from the Anglo-American Company.

94. Since the illegal declaration of independence, the Ian Smith régime has reacted to the international financial and economic sanctions and the oil embargo by regulating the economy so as to enable it to withstand their impact. To this end, the régime has assumed various emergency powers to control the external and internal trade of the country, with the view of redeploying, where necessary, the economic resources of the country. The private sector of the economy representing agriculture, commerce and industry, and mining, which is almost entirely owned and operated by the European settlers and foreign companies, have put themselves on a war footing in support of the economic measures instituted by the régime.

95. Although, in early 1965, the principal business organizations in Southern Rhodesia, namely, the Association of Rhodesian Industries and the Association of Chambers of Commerce of Rhodesia had expressed concern about the economic consequences of a unilateral declaration of independence, they have since the declaration co-operated with the illegal régime to save the economy of the country from the full impact of sanctions. The manufacturing industries, with the co-operation of the Smith régime, have been engaged in diversifying their production to make Southern Rhodesia self-sufficient in commodities which were previously imported, thus assisting in the elimination of shortages and saving foreign currency for the régime. Consequently, sanctions have merely created a bigger local market for the local manufacturers who have been called upon to meet local consumer needs which cannot now be fully met from abroad. According to spokesmen of the régime, commerce has done so well that it has been in a position to extend credit to the agricultural sector of the economy.

96. While the United Kingdom has specifically declared illegal the export of chrome and iron ore and, subsequently, pig-iron and asbestos from the Territory, there are no indications that any of the companies concerned is anywhere near the breaking point. Copper, nickel, gold and some other metals have not as yet been declared prohibited exports to third countries by the United Kingdom. Consequently, subject to the laws of third countries, these commodities can still legally be exported from Southern Rhodesia. Despite sanctions, new mines are being opened and old ones developed in the Territory, particularly by the Anglo-American Corporation. Up to the middle of 1965, interests in the Federal Republic of Germany were reported to be importing copper and asbestos from the Territory. According to these reports, Japanese interests were also importing asbestos.

97. The economic and financial sanctions imposed by the United Kingdom were aimed, inter alia, at denying credit to the illegal régime for the financing of agricultural crops and denying the farmers access to the international markets on which the products depend. In spite of these sanctions, the illegal régime managed to finance the purchasing of the tobacco crop for this year with an estimated £25 million and to pay the farmers sufficient sums to cover the working cost of producing the current crop. The financing of the tobacco crop was largely made possible by the co-operation of finance capital in Southern Rhodesia as represented by the banking and finance houses in Southern Rhodesia. Accordingly, the indications are that the European settler agricultural community is in a position to survive another year of sanctions without serious consequences.

98. Foreign and local business concerns in South Africa, with the support of the Government of South Africa, have taken advantage of the embargo on Southern Rhodesia to increase their trade with the Territory. The evidence available indicates that South African business and commerce both on the local and international level have not only been trading with South Africa, but have also been providing transit facilities for the clandestine export of Southern Rhodesian commodities produced by their counterparts in the Territory. Further, a Southern Rhodesian confirming house, the Rhodesian Industrial Confirming (Private) Ltd., has established a branch in Johannesburg for the purpose of assisting Southern Rhodesian importers to secure credit and South African and other exporters to find markets in the Territory.

99. Portuguese interests, to a lesser extent, have also taken advantage of the sanctions to expand their trading relations with Southern Rhodesia, and Portugal continues to grant Southern Rhodesia transit rail and labour facilities for exports through Mozambique.

100. The embargo on oil and petroleum products to Southern Rhodesia has succeeded only to the extent that rationing has been introduced and the prices of these products have gone up. However, oil and petroleum products, in quantities far in excess of the needs of the Territory under the rationing system, continue to reach the Territory from Mozambique and South Africa. Since both South Africa and Mozambique are importers of oil and petroleum products and are dependent on international American, United Kingdom, Dutch and Belgian concerns for their supplies, it is difficult to exempt these concerns from responsibility for supplies reaching the Territory.

101. According to spokesmen for the illegal régime, commercial interests in Southern Rhodesia have been able, in addition to overt trade, to maintain covert trading relations with many foreign importers and exporters. Indeed they have claimed that Southern Rhodesia has increased its trade with many countries outside Africa. Considering the relative lack of impact of sanctions on the Southern Rhodesia economy, there is no reason to doubt this claim.

C. Recommendations

102. The Sub-Committee considers that the Special Committee should recommend that the General Assembly—

(a) Condemn the colonial policy of the United Kingdom Government which resulted in the rise of the present racist minority régime based on the colonial exploitation of the natural and human resources of the Territory in a way detrimental to the rights and interests of the indigenous population of Southern Rhodesia.

(b) Condemn once again the illegal declaration of independence by the white settlers in Southern Rhodesia, who represent the economic and financial interests of the international monopolies and all the forces of reaction.

(c) Reaffirm the rights of the indigenous population of the Territory to self-determination and real independence, and the legitimacy of their struggle to achieve both economic and political liberation.

(d) Strongly condemn the activities and operating methods of foreign economic and other interests in Southern Rhodesia which support the racist minority régime in its suppression of the African population of the Territory and in defiance of world public opinion.

(e) Appeal to the interested Powers to exert their influence on those of their nationals who own and operate enterprises in Southern Rhodesia to end their activities which impede the attainment of independence by the people of Southern Rhodesia, and to refrain from giving any support to the colonial policies which constitute a crime against humanity.

(f) Inscribe on the agenda of the General Assembly at its twenty-first session as a matter of urgency the following item:

"The activities of foreign economic and other interests which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, Territories under Portuguese administration and other colonial territories."

(g) Requests the Secretary-General to give the widest possible publicity to the contents of this report and to the decisions of the United Nations on this question.

D. Adoption of report

103. This report was adopted by the Sub-Committee at its 31st meeting on 14 September 1966. The representative of Denmark stated that his delegation could not support the recommendations contained in paragraph 102 (a) and (f).^b

I. OUTLINE OF ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT IN SOUTHERN RHODESIA

A. Land and people

1. Southern Rhodesia occupies 150,333 square miles between the Limpopo and Zambezi rivers (15° - 22° S. latitude and 26° - 34° E. longitude), and lies north of the Tropic of Capricorn. It is a part of the great plateau which is a major feature of the geography of southern Africa. Almost the whole of the country lies above 1,000 feet, and more than four fifths are above 2,000 feet, but less than a twentieth is above 5,000 feet. The landscape is undulating, broken only by a few major river valleys, and its outstanding feature is a broad ridge running across the whole country, from which emerges the High Veld, a belt of high plateau land about 400 miles long by 50 miles wide, and between 4,000 and 5,000 feet above sea level.

2. The lowland areas of Southern Rhodesia are the depressions drained eastwards by the Zambezi and Limpopo rivers, and the height of the land falls away from the central ridge towards these rivers, broken in places by steep escarpments overlooking the Middle Veld, a wide plateau surface between 3,000 and 4,000 feet above sea level. Deep river valleys have split the Middle Veld areas into great blocks of fine plateau country. The areas of Low Veld in the depressions of the great watersheds lie generally below 3,000 feet, are relatively unexplored, and are hot and inhospitable.

3. Nearly seven tenths of the surface area of Southern Rhodesia is made up of granite, schists and igneous rocks which are the basis of Southern Rhodesia's mineral wealth. This type of rock formation produces variations in the soils of Southern Rhodesia, and where it underlies the High Veld, usually weathers into sandy or loamy soils. The sandstones of the Low Veld seldom produce good soils as rainfall is irregular, and the sands in the extreme west are generally barren of agricultural or mineral value.

4. The central ridge of Southern Rhodesia forms the main watershed of the Territory, and rivers flow in roughly parallel courses down both sides of it towards the Zambezi, Limpopo and Sabi rivers onwards to the Indian Ocean. The river flow, reflecting the seasonal nature of the rainfall, is for the most part irregular and a drawback to navigation on the great waterways. Generally, the river flow is too irregular for major hydroelectric schemes except in the Eastern Mountains and on the Zambezi.

5. Although north of the Tropic of Capricorn, the altitude of the plateau has given Southern Rhodesia one of the finest climates in the world; temperate to hot, comparable to the Mediterranean or California. Along the central ridge, conditions are pleasant and healthy with an adequate rainfall for agriculture. Generally within Southern Rhodesia, temperature decreases and rainfall increases with altitude, ranging from the cool, wet Eastern Mountains to the hot dry river valleys of the Zambezi, Limpopo and Sabi. The High Veld is the main area of development. The lower areas of the Middle Veld are hot and dry and mostly settled by Africans, and the Low Veld is generally hot and unhealthy. Malaria and sleeping sickness are prevalent in the depressions.

6. Only along the central ridge is the rainfall heavy enough to permit a good growth of savannah and temperate-type grasses. The western and southern regions, insufficiently supported by a good rainfall are semi-arid with tufts of coarse grasses and stunted acacia thorn bush. In the Eastern Highlands, a good rainfall allows the growth of exotic tropical evergreen trees providing a valuable source of hardwoods; in the highest areas, the vegetation becomes montane, and along the banks of the permanent rivers there are forests of evergreens.^a

^a The above description is derived from the Handbook to the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland issued by the Federal Department of Information in 1960.

7. Brief reference has already been made to climatic conditions. Despite the fact that the Territory lies north of the Tropic of Capricorn, the general altitude of the plateau so ameliorates the climate that the conditions are actually sub-tropical. Frosts occur during the winter months on the plateau. Rainfall is largely confined to the summer period from November to March, is occasioned by incursions of moist air from the east or south-east, diminishes from east to west and is most plentiful in the higher areas. Some mountainous areas on the eastern border have average rainfalls of up to seventy inches a year, Salisbury in the north-east has thirty-three inches and Bulawayo in the South-west has only twenty-three inches, while Beitbridge in the Limpopo river valley has only twelve inches. The rainfall is somewhat variable and unreliable.

8. The total population of Southern Rhodesia was estimated to be, on 31 December 1964, 4,210,000 of whom 3,970,000 (94.3 per cent) were Africans, 7,900 (0.2 per cent) Asians, 217,000 (5.3 per cent) Europeans and 12,400 (0.3 per cent) coloured.

9. The African population is believed to contain a considerable number (estimated in 1960 at about 300,000) of migrant workers from Zambia, Malawi and other countries, but the number of such workers is now diminishing. The natural rate of increase of the African population is estimated at 3.5 per cent per annum.

10. Up to 1962, the European population was increasing rapidly, mainly by immigration. During 1963 and 1964 there was a loss by emigration of some 12,000 Europeans and a net fall in the European population of 7,000. During the first half of 1965, there was a reversal of the trend and a gain of 2,500 by immigration, mainly from South Africa. It is government policy to continue to encourage, on a selective basis, a high rate of inflow of persons with entrepreneurial ability, with supplies of capital or with skills of where there is a shortage. The European population has come to Southern Rhodesia mainly from South Africa or Britain.

11. On 31 December 1964, the population of the main towns including nearby suburbs was estimated at approximately 690,000, of whom 512,000 were Africans, 164,000 Europeans and 16,000 Asians and coloured.

B. Natural resources

12. From the point of view of agricultural potential, the Territory has been divided by governmental authorities into five regions.

(a) A humid forest region along the eastern border suitable for afforestation, tea and coffee and intensive livestock production (comprising 1.56 per cent of the Territory).

(b) A sub-humid woodland region mainly in the north-east part of the plateau suitable for intensive production of grains and cash crops (mainly tobacco), beef and dairy produce (18.68 per cent).

(c) A sub-arid savannah region mainly in the central and south-western part of the plateau suitable for semi-intensive mixed farming (17.43 per cent).

(d) An arid savannah region comprising mainly land of lesser elevation suitable for semi-intensive beef production with some drought-resistant crops (33.03 per cent).

(e) A sub-desert savannah comprising mainly the low veld areas and suitable in the absence of irrigation only for extensive livestock production (26.20 per cent). Finally 3.10 per cent of the land area of the Territory is regarded as unsuitable for any form of agricultural utilization.

13. Southern Rhodesia possesses only a few scattered relics of true indigenous forest, but has an extensive coverage of savannah woodland of definite, if restrictive, economic significance.

14. Although there has been much reduction in the animal life of Southern Rhodesia, there is still much of scientific, scenic and economic interest in the wild life of the Territory.

15. Because much of the Territory is too dry for agriculture, the possible use of water for irrigation is of importance. Studies have suggested that some 15,000 square miles are potentially irrigable, mainly low-lying ground in the basins of the Sabi and Limpopo rivers in the south-east of the Territory. Substantial irrigation schemes are already operating in that area and also in the valley of the Zambezi River.

16. The main hydroelectric resource, shared with Zambia, is the flow of the Zambezi, which dammed at Kariba, has a present generating capacity of 705 megawatts and a potential capacity of 1,600 megawatts. While there are no known oil resources in the Territory, there are substantial proved deposits of good quality coal at Wankie in the west of the Territory which have been mined since the earliest days of railway development, but in recent years at a reduced rate because of the increased use of imported oil fuels and the availability of cheaper hydroelectric power.

17. The European colonization of Southern Rhodesia took place in the belief that it was rich in minerals, particularly gold. While there has been a steady production of gold over many years, the Territory has never been a major gold producer nor is it anticipated that it will become so in the future. Nor does Southern Rhodesia have extensive and rich copper deposits as are to be found in Zambia and the Congo. However, there is an appreciable production of copper as well as of asbestos and chrome, for export. Moreover, Southern Rhodesia is said to possess ample reserves of iron ore, coal, lime, sulphur and other minerals necessary for the establishment of heavy industry. Already, inter alia, a small iron and steel industry has been established.

18. From the point of view of economic development, the Territory is handicapped by its distance from world markets and the need for exports to world markets to be transported through neighbouring territories before being shipped. The smallness of the population of Southern Rhodesia is another obstacle to the industrialization of the country. However, the natural features of the country offered few difficulties in providing railways links with suitable ports and with neighbouring territories. The larger market thus opened up has facilitated a substantial industrial development.

C. Outline history of economic development

19. In the second half of the nineteenth century, Southern Rhodesia was inhabited by two main groups of African inhabitants, both of the Bantu group of peoples. The longer established group, the Mashona, had been in Rhodesia for a number of centuries. Originally a pastoral people with a loosely developed political system, they also practised subsistence agriculture and had, to some extent, worked the mineral deposits of the area. The second group, the Matabele (Ndebele), were a tightly organized and militarily powerful offshoot of the Zulus who, in the third decade of the nineteenth century, invaded what is now Southern Rhodesia from the south, carried on a purely pastoral way of life in the south-west of the Territory and acquired a military and political hegemony over the Mashona in the north-east.

20. The missionary, Robert Moffat, visited the Matabele King in 1829 and a station of the London Missionary Society was established near his headquarters at Bulawayo in 1857. In addition to missionaries, hunters and prospectors visited the Territory during the succeeding decades and acquired a somewhat exaggerated view of its richness in gold. By 1887 a number of concession seekers were pestering Lobengula, the King of the Matabele, who was persuaded to conclude a treaty with an emissary of President Kruger of the Transvaal, which would have thrown his country open to Boer settlers. The British authorities at the insistence of Cecil Rhodes, then acquiring control of the diamond mining industry in South Africa, sent a representative to Lobengula, who repudiated the earlier treaty and signed a treaty with the British by which he undertook to have no dealings with any foreign power without the sanction of the British authorities. In the following year, C. D. Rudd, a representative of Rhodes, obtained a concession, in which in return for a payment of £1,300 and the delivery of 1,000 modern rifles and 100,000 rounds of ammunition and of an armed steamboat, Lobengula granted Rudd and his associates complete and exclusive charge over all minerals located within his entire dominion together with full power to do all things that they might deem necessary to win and procured the same. On the basis of the Rudd concession, and combining with other persons who had won concessions from Lobengula, Rhodes organized the British South African Company and obtained a royal charter to develop the region north of the Transvaal and Bechuanaland and lying west of the Portuguese Territories. The company was authorized under the Charter to exercise such powers of jurisdiction and government as it might from time to time acquire by any concession, agreement, grant or treaty.

21. Although the Rudd concession did not grant rights over lands and had in the meantime been repudiated by Lobengula, Rhodes hastened to organize a Pioneer Column of some 187 European settlers and 150 African servants, as well as a few hundred mercenaries given the name of "The British South Africa Police", which proceeded to Mashonaland and established a settlement at Salisbury in September 1890. The original settlers had been attracted by the promise of fifteen gold claims and some 3,000 acres of land for each man. A year later a German named Lippert, acting secretly on behalf of Rhodes, obtained from Lobengula the exclusive right for one hundred years to make land grants to Europeans both in Matabeleland and Mashonaland.

22. In July 1893 following raids by Matabele warriors into Mashonaland, Dr. Jameson, the Administrator of the company's possessions, led a small force against Lobengula and the Matabele. The force was composed mainly of volunteers from among the settlers, who were each promised by the Victoria Agreement over 6,000 acres of land, twenty gold claims and an equal share of half the "loot" and other advantages if they took part in the expedition. The Matabele were speedily crushed and Lobengula died from smallpox while trying to seek peace. After his death, the Company assumed by right of conquest the Matabele lands and confiscated a large part of their cattle. Inadequate land reserves were set aside for the African inhabitants, who continued, as in Mashonaland, to be allowed to remain as "squatters" on the land already alienated from them. However, a hut tax of ten shillings per annum provided an incentive for the adult males to work on the new farms and mining enterprises.

23. African resentment against this situation, which was aggravated by heavy cattle losses during a rinderpest epidemic, led to uprisings in 1896 firstly by the Matabele and then by the Mashona. At a time when the police force of the Company had recently been captured in the abortive Jameson raid into the Transvaal, the uprisings were suppressed with some difficulty and only after the personal intervention of Rhodes in the peace-making process. The Company was thus spared a prolonged period of guerrilla warfare, but even so its finances were in a difficult state. It had not only incurred heavy expenses for administration and military operations, but it was undertaking major development, in particular the construction of a railway through difficult terrain from Beira towards Salisbury and a second railway from the north of the Cape Colony through Bechuanaland towards Bulawayo. It was also establishing itself in what, at that time, was called North-Western Rhodesia and North-Eastern Rhodesia. The hopes for the speedy financial success of the company were based on the discovery of gold in rich deposits, but so far only a very small quantity of gold had been won (in all £20,700 worth by 1898) and studies by the company's geologist were not encouraging. The market for the produce of European farms was limited, because of lack of transport, to the requirements of the miniature gold-mining industry.

24. The Company, whose administrative responsibilities were placed under a somewhat closer surveillance of the British authorities, sold additional shares and pushed forward with its development activities in the hope of long-term results. The railways were completed to Bulawayo in 1897 and to Salisbury in 1899 and were linked three years later. Improved transportation made possible the importation of heavy mining machinery and the output of gold steadily increased. The European farming community benefited from the increased market and from technical assistance provided by the company which, in the decade before the outbreak of the First World War, introduced tobacco as a cash crop suitable for export. The number of Europeans in Southern Rhodesia had increased from an estimated 1,500 in 1891 to about 11,000 in 1901 and to 23,700 by 1911.

25. The administrative rights of the Company, which, according to its Charter were for an initial period of twenty-five years expiring in 1914, were extended for a further ten years. The Company soon, however, found itself in a dispute with the European settlers, who had had since 1907 a majority in the Legislative Council, and with the British Crown over the question of the ownership of the unalienated land, which meant in the peculiar context of Southern Rhodesia land neither reserved nor granted to the indigenous inhabitants nor granted to companies and settlers. The matter was referred by the British Government to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council which, in 1918, held that ownership of the land had devolved upon the Crown by right of conquest, though the Company, as the agent of the Crown in the work of conquest and subsequent administration, was entitled to sell the land as long as it remained the administering authority, using the proceeds to help cover administrative expenses.

26. Following the decision, the Company refused to make further capital expenditure in developing the Territory and was anxious to divest itself of its administrative responsibilities. At the same time the European settlers had prospered greatly from the expanded demand for exports created by the First World War. Mineral exports had increased only from £3,883,000 in 1914 to £4,451,000, but now included substantial amounts of coal, asbestos, chrome and copper, in addition to gold. Agricultural exports had increased fivefold over the same period to a total of £1,483,000 consisting mainly of beef cattle to South Africa, but also including maize, tobacco and citrus fruits. The settlers pressed strongly for responsible government. After an official inquiry followed by a referendum, in which 8,744 voted for responsible government and 5,989 voted to join the Union of South Africa, Southern Rhodesia was formally annexed as a British Colony on 12 September 1923 and on 16 October was granted a constitution under which the settlers obtained responsible government. The population at the time included about 900,000 Africans, 36,000 Europeans and 3,400 Asians and Coloureds. (Nominally the Legislative Assembly to which the Government was responsible was elected on a non-racial basis, but the income and property qualifications for voting excluded all but a very few Africans.) The political settlement was accompanied by a financial settlement with the British South Africa Company, which relinquished all financial claims against the Crown for its past administrative deficits in return for a cash payment of £3,750,000 by the British Treasury, of which £2,000,000 was contributed by the new Southern Rhodesian authorities. The company's mining rights were guaranteed and it also received specific safeguards with regard to its railway investments.

27. The new Government gave special attention to promoting the interests of the farming community and to encouraging immigration from Britain. In 1924 a Land Bank was established for the purpose of giving easier agricultural credit. At this stage tobacco was becoming an encouraging export crop, with production increasing from 3.9 million pounds in 1923 to 24.9 million pounds in 1928. The tobacco industry benefited from co-operative warehousing and marketing arrangements, from preference in the British market, and from the direct participation of British tobacco companies in the export trade. Mining development was much slower and in fact gold output temporarily declined, while there was some expansion in the production of coal and of other base minerals.

28. In the midst of the increasing agricultural activity, further consideration was given to the land question. In 1920, Native Reserves established at the turn of the century, remained fixed at some 21 million acres or 23 per cent of the land area of the Territory, European-owned land amounted to 31 million acres or 32 per cent and the remaining 42 million acres or 45 per cent was Crown land which could be sold to persons of either race. Despite the low purchasing power of the African population as a whole, and the tradition of communal rather than individual land ownership, Africans had purchased about 45,000 acres by 1925. At this stage opposition arose in the European community to the intermingling of European-owned and African-owned land. Following a report by a Royal Commission and with the approval of the British Government, the first Land Apportionment Act was passed in 1930 and effected a rigorous territorial segregation under which over 50 per cent of Southern Rhodesia was assigned to Europeans and Africans lost the right to purchase land except in a limited area (7.5 million acres). It may be noted that at the time when the Act was passed more than a third of the African population of the Territory was living on European farms or on the areas of Crown land now allocated for future European purchase. Africans living on farms were now required to move to the reserves unless they entered into contracts to provide labour in return for their right of occupation.

29. European interests in Southern Rhodesia suffered very severely during the great depression. The market for tobacco virtually disappeared, maize production dropped drastically as did that of most base minerals and the railway companies were in serious financial difficulties. Immigration virtually stopped. The Europeans farming community received, however, substantial Government support estimated at about £1 million over the period 1928-1933 by way of loans, debt liquidations, export bounties, etc. Control Boards were also established to keep up prices of agricultural products.

30. The interests of the European trade unionists were protected by the Industrial Conciliation Act of 1934, which gave legal force to the "colour bar". Agreements between employers and employees, a term which excluded "natives", could be made legally enforceable by the Minister of Labour. These agreements in effect blocked access to skilled positions by Africans or undercutting of the wages of European workers in general.

31. The Southern Rhodesian Government took advantage of the depressed position of the mining industry to purchase the mineral rights of the British South Africa Company for £2 million in 1933. This turned out to be good business, as not only did gold mining rapidly recover following the devaluation of the pound in 1931, but the mining industry as a whole recovered and continued to develop steadily, though not so spectacularly as that of Northern Rhodesia.

32. By the mid-thirties a general recovery of the economy was under way, though it was somewhat restrained. Tobacco sales, now occurring at well organized auctions in Salisbury, amounted to 25 million pounds in 1938, less than the 1928 figure, but realizing over £1 million to the 493 growers. A beginning was made with the export of chilled and frozen beef to the United Kingdom. Economic recovery led to increased immigration and the European population increased to some 61,000 in 1938.

33. The Second World War provided a guaranteed market for the Territory's export crops. At the same time, difficulties in importing led the Government to take the first steps in establishing an iron and steel industry and a cotton-spinning industry. Other infant industries developed rapidly so that gross industrial output increased from £5.1 million in 1938 to £31.3 million in 1949. The new industries were largely dependent on a growing urban African labour force. African workers organized trade unions which, however, continued to be denied legal recognition, though a Department of Native Labour and a Native Labour Advisory Board were established. On the other hand a 1945 revision of the Industrial Conciliation Act in effect maintained the colour bar against the entry of Africans into skilled employment. Indeed, with the rapid increase of the African population, the reserves were becoming seriously overcrowded.

34. For those Africans who remained in "Native" areas, the Government organized extension services which, though less elaborate than those provided for European farmers, led to the emergence of a small class of "master farmers", producing cash crops on individually owned land. Attempts under the Native Husbandry Act, 1951, to impose better production methods in the Native Reserves proper did not produce any substantial change from subsistence agriculture.

35. In the immediate post-war years, there was a flood of immigration, mostly from Britain and South Africa actively promoted by the Southern Rhodesian Government. The European population increased from 83,500 in 1946 to 125,000 in 1950 and to 158,000 in 1954. Many new business enterprises established themselves in the Territory as the prospect of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland appeared to promise a wider market and even more rapid economic development. The great mining company of Rhodesian Anglo-American and its associates, though their main operations were on the Northern Rhodesian Copperbelt, moved their headquarters from London to Salisbury in 1950 and the Rhodesian Selection Trust did the same in 1955. (They have recently moved their headquarters to Zambia). Salisbury thus became an important commercial and financial centre.

36. In 1947, the Government bought out Rhodesia Railways for some £30 million. This event marked the final nationalization of the development activities of the British South Africa Company in South Africa. The Company continued to hold investments in Southern Rhodesia in such fields as forestry, ranching, citrus fruit production, flour-milling and baking, and later iron and steel and ferrochrome. These formed, however, only a small proportion of its total assets. Its Rhodesian industrial and other investments (which presumably included substantial interests in other parts of the Federation) were valued by it on 30 September 1963 at £7.1 million compared with its total investments throughout the world of £66.4 million.^b

37. Though the Railways were acquired by the Southern Rhodesian Government, the system covers both Northern Rhodesia and Bechuanaland and the management was made responsible to a Higher Authority, which, during the Federation was the Federal Minister of Transport and consists now of ministerial representatives of the Governments of Zambia and Rhodesia. The bottleneck at the port of Beira, through which most of the foreign trade of both Northern and Southern Rhodesia and Nyasaland passed, was a serious obstacle to the development of the territories in the immediate post-war period. In 1949 construction was begun on a line to link the Rhodesia Railway system near Bulawayo with the port of Lourenço Marques. The new line, together with port improvements at both Beira and Lourenço Marques, and improved rolling stock, removed the congestion. Freight hauled by Rhodesia Railways increased from 2,920,000 tons in 1938/1939 to 5,097,000 tons in 1957/1958. Central African Airways was established as a joint enterprise of the three Governments in 1946.

38. The Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland entered into operation in the concluding months of 1953. In the economic field, it had the effect of transferring to the Federal authorities, with some minor exceptions, full control of the economic life of the combined territories. However, despite some provision for the representation of African interests, the income and property qualifications for the Federal franchise continued to exclude all except a few Africans. Political power therefore resided in the hands of the European voters and the Federal Government followed the same policies of promoting European immigration and of encouraging foreign investment in the Territory as had the Southern Rhodesian Government before federation. The operation of the Federation seems on balance to have been particularly favourable for the development of the European economy of Southern Rhodesia. By far the most valuable item of production and source of tax revenue in the Federation were the copper mines of Northern Rhodesia. The revenue was, however, spent for the development of the Federation as a whole but in a way which certainly did not short-change Southern Rhodesia. Moreover the broader base and wider market offered by the economy of the Federation as a whole undoubtedly attracted both persons ready to lend money to the public authorities and those ready to invest in private enterprises. Finally, those wishing to establish businesses in the Federation found Southern Rhodesia with its more diversified economy, its better financial services, its more skilled labour force and its larger internal market the natural place to do so.

39. The ten years of the Federation were therefore for Southern Rhodesia years of rapid growth, more remarkably so at the beginning than at the end. The most notable single achievement under the Federation was the Kariba Dam and related hydro-electric installations, the first stage of which, situated on the Southern Rhodesian side of the Zambezi, came into operation in 1960 and has a capacity of 705 megawatts. Transmission lines connect Kariba not only to the Zambian copperbelt, which remains slightly the larger user, but to the main areas of European population in Southern Rhodesia, providing 1,717 millions of the 2,050 million kilowatt-hours consumed in 1964, as compared with 869 million kilowatt hours in 1954. Finance for the project was obtained by loans from the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (£28.6 million), from the Colonial Development Corporation of the United Kingdom (£15 million), the Commonwealth Finance Development Company, grouping some of the larger mining interests (£3 million) and from general loans raised by the Federal Government (£34 million). The cheap power thus available has stimulated economic development and has specifically encouraged such projects as the ferro-chrome smelting works at Gwelo and the sugar plantation at Chirundu on the Zambezi, where water for irrigation is pumped by electricity. On the other hand, the decreased use of coal for generating electricity and the gradual dieselization of Rhodesian Railways has resulted in reduced production at the Wankie Coalfield.

D. Development in recent years

40. Since the beginning of the Federal period detailed national income statistics have been available both for the Federation as a whole and for Southern Rhodesia which enabled the development of the economy to be shown in tabular form. Earlier, less statistically detailed estimates of the national income gave figures of £28.9 million in 1939 and £73.6 million in 1949. The figures for the gross national product of Southern Rhodesia in terms of its industrial origin for 1954, 1959, 1963 and 1964 are as follows:

41. It will be noted that the rate of economic growth was much greater in the period up to 1959 than in the following period. In fact there has been very little economic growth in the national income at constant prices since 1961. Statistics for gross fixed capital formation (about half of which is in the private sector) rose from £46.8 million in 1954 to a maximum of £84.4 million in 1958 and diminished to £45.8 million in 1963 with a slight increase to £47.1 million in 1964. Some of the earlier investment appears to have been misdirected and political uncertainty has discouraged investment in recent years.

42. The national income in the years in question was distributed as follows:

44. The following table gives details about the net operating profits of companies in Rhodesia over the period 1954, 1959 and 1962.

^a Companies in banking and insurance appear to have losses, because interest payments to them are excluded to avoid duplication in national accounting. Actually, banking and insurance companies had gross profits of £19.5 million in 1962.

45. The slackening in the rate of economic growth over the last year of the Federation showed mainly in a decline in construction activity, a relative stagnation in mineral production and the continued extremely low level of production and income of Africans living in the Reserves. European agricultural production has been affected by the seasons and, particularly in 1965 as regards tobacco, by the prospective market price, but as shown by the following table the general trend for the principal crops has been one of remarkable growth:

VIRGINIA FLUE-CURED TOBACCO

46. The sugar industry is the most conspicuous feature of economic development in Southern Rhodesia over the last few years, being carried out by co-operation between large foreign investors who have established modern and efficient plantations and the Southern Rhodesian Government which is constructing large dams to irrigate an extensive area in south-eastern low veld. The Government has established the Sabi-Limpopo Authority to plan and co-ordinate such development.

47. The following table shows the external trade of Southern Rhodesia in 1953, the last pre-Federation year, in 1954, 1959, 1963 and 1964, the first post-Federation year:

invisible transactions, Southern Rhodesia had an adverse balance of payments on current account in 1964 of £5.3 million. It had adverse balances with virtually all parts of the world except Zambia and Malawi.

49. It is not possible to compare public finances during the years of the Federation and subsequent years because of division of tax revenues and functions. The following table shows the main heads of revenue and expenditure for the first six months of 1964, and for the financial year 1964/1965 and the estimates for 1965/1966:

50. The deficit in the revenue accounts at 1 July 1964 was covered almost in full by a British Government grant of £4 million.

51. During 1964/1965, the Southern Rhodesian Government raised externally £3.6 million, of which £2.5 million was a loan from the South African Government at 5½ per cent, the same favourable rate at which that Government lends to its provincial administrations. Internal loans amounted to £9.2 million. After the repayment of loans to the amount of £6.5 million in the same year, the public debt amounted to £215.7 million which can be subdivided as follows:

E. Present situation

53. The economy of Southern Rhodesia is remarkable for the coexistence of two economies—a relatively developed and diversified European market economy and a depressed rural African subsistence economy. The first has appropriated the better part of the natural resources of the Territory and is utilizing them scientifically and profitably. Despite the monopolistic circumstances in which the Territory was colonized and despite the continued importance of the interests of such financial giants as the British South Africa Company, recently renamed Charter Consolidated, and the Anglo-American Corporation which have now merged their interests in Southern Rhodesia, ownership of resources is quite widely diffused among the European population of the Territory and those who do not directly own such resources have access to employment and to social services on privileged terms.

54. The Africans in rural areas have not benefited from educational or agricultural extension services which would enable them to make a really purposeful use of their land resources. Moreover, with their continued rapid population growth, they are increasingly constricted and much of the land they hold is subject to soil erosion. In face of obvious population pressure, the amount of land available for African occupation has been increased from less than 30 per cent to over 45 per cent of the total land area of Southern Rhodesia, while the area reserved for non-Africans has been reduced from over 50 to 38 per cent. However, the pressure of population has continued. In particular, the land in the Native Purchase Area has been virtually used up and there are some 7,000 Africans who have been trained to farm on individually owned land, but cannot obtain plots. On the other hand, with only one million acres under crops in 1964, the European area is far from intensively used. Moreover, the Government continues to develop land for European settlement. Moves to secure the abolition of the Land Apportionment Act failed, the present Government being pledged to retain it.

55. Africans have perforce sought employment in larger numbers and the African urban population has swollen over the period from the Second World War. African workers have, it will be noted, received steadily increasing wages and have been employed in a wider range of activities, in part as a result of general development and in part because they were under the Industrial Conciliation Act of 1959 included in the framework of collective bargaining. The average wage of African workers is still, however, less than 10 per cent of that of European workers. Moreover, the slackening of the economy in recent years has resulted in an actual decline in the labour force. There has thus arisen a substantial degree of unemployment amongst urban Africans.

56. The present economic situation of Southern Rhodesia seems thus to reflect the malaise which exists in the political field.

II. LAND

A. LAND LEGISLATION

Main provisions

57. The Land Apportionment Act gives legal substance to a policy of segregation based on the general principle that only indigenous Africans can acquire, lease or occupy land in a Native area but not in any European area except as specially authorized.

58. The Land Apportionment Act, 1941, as amended, classified all land in Southern Rhodesia other than tribal trust land as:

(a) A European area, in which Africans are prohibited from owning or occupying land, subject to exceptions;

(b) A Native area, consisting of a Native purchase area in which only indigenous Africans may own or occupy farms, subject to exceptions, and an African townships area, in which Africans may own land and other property; the African townships area includes any African townships or urban locations established in the Native purchase area, the European area or in Tribal trust land, those established in the European area or in Tribal trust land reverting to those areas if the townships are abolished; in transfers involving the Native area and the European area, expropriations of land or other rights are authorized;

(c) National land, which is reserved for purposes of forestry and nature reserves, the conservation of wild life, and national parks; National land may not be alienated but may be leased for from ten to ninety-nine years;

(d) Unreserved land, which may be leased to non-Africans and to Africans provided the latter are citizens or regarded by law as permanent residents of Southern Rhodesia.

59. All categories of land other than the European area are defined by law; the European area consists of all land not so defined.

60. The Legislative Assembly is restricted by the Constitution (1961) from enlarging the European area, but is authorized to provide for further land to be added to the area subject to the limitation that its total acreage shall not exceed the total acreage of the area at the time of dissolution of the former Assembly.

61. In regard to African land, the Constitution authorizes the Legislature to provide for extensions to the Tribal trust land, without specifying a limitation, and to the Native purchase area, subject to the limitation that the total acreage of land in this area shall not exceed the aggregate of the acreage of the Native purchase area and the Tribal trust land at the time of dissolution of the former Assembly.

62. The Act empowers landowners in both the European area and the Native purchase area to apply to have their land transferred to the category of unreserved land; in that event European-owned land may be sold to an African and African-owned land may be sold to a European. The Act also authorizes the Governor, when he considers it in the public interest, to exchange Crown land in the European area or in the unreserved land for Crown land in the Native purchase area, provided such exchange will not materially affect the total acreage or in any other way be prejudicial to any of the three areas.

African areas

(a) Tribal trust land

63. The Constitution vests all Tribal trust land in a Board of Trustees "for the sole and exclusive use and occupation of indigenous Africans" subject to previously acquired rights and to the proviso that the "dominion in and the right of searching and mining for and disposing of all minerals, mineral oils and natural gases" vests in the Governor.

64. The Board of Trustees is composed of the Chief Justice of the High Court as Chairman, a Chief appointed by the Council of Chiefs, the Chairman of the Natural Resources Board, and three members appointed for five-year terms by the Governor who are required by the Constitution to be persons experienced in financial matters, African agriculture, and local government in tribal areas, respectively. The Board is not entitled to dispose of any Tribal trust land or any right or interest therein save in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Constitution, and is responsible for ensuring that such land is used and occupied solely by indigenous Africans.

65. Save in the exercise of previously acquired rights, persons other than indigenous Africans are prohibited by the Constitution from occupying any portion of Tribal trust land except in accordance with an agreement entered into with the Board of Trustees for any of the following purposes: the administrative purposes of the Government; religious or educational purposes in the interests of indigenous Africans; hospitals, clinics, or other establishments for the benefit of indigenous Africans; cemeteries or burial grounds; the exercise of rights granted in respect of forest produce or other natural resources of the Tribal trust land; the exercise of rights granted by the Government under the mining laws; hotels or other similar establishments for the convenience of travellers; and any other purpose which the Board considers to be either in the interests of indigenous Africans or in the public interest.

66. Indigenous Africans are themselves restricted in their use and occupation of Tribal trust land by the provisions of the Native Land Husbandry Act of 1951, and the African Affairs Act of 1927, as amended. The object of the Native Land Husbandry Act was to provide for the control of the utilization and allocation of land occupied by Africans and ensure its efficient use for agricultural purposes. It restricts the use of Tribal trust land by providing that "no Native shall cultivate any land contained in any prescribed farming land unless he is registered as the holder of a farming right in respect of such land". Such a right may not be given or taken as security or disposed of by will; it expires on the death of the holder and may also, in certain prescribed circumstances, be cancelled by a Native Commissioner or other authorized official.

67. Under the African Affairs Act of 1927, as amended, authority to assign land for huts, gardens and grazing grounds for each kraal in Tribal trust land, as well as to determine the minimum number of adult male Africans composing any kraal, is conferred on the local district commissioner whenever approval is required for an African to move to or from a kraal. The district commissioner may also prohibit the erection of new huts or the cultivation of new gardens.

68. The Act further prohibits an African from moving from one district to another without the consent of the district commissioner. Chiefs, who are appointed and may for just cause be removed with their families and properties from Tribal trust land by the Governor, are also prohibited by the Act from leaving the districts in which they reside without the authority of the district commissioner.

69. The 1961 Constitution introduces a system under clearly prescribed circumstances to provide for the first time for private ownership by indigenous Africans of land in tribal trust areas upon irrigation schemes and in any particular area of Tribal trust land. Freehold rights may be introduced if the Board, after making any inquiries necessary and after consultation with the Chief concerned, is satisfied that it is the general wish of the persons living in any substantial area of the Tribal trust land to have their rights converted into individual freehold ownership; and if the Board is satisfied that this would be in their general interests. The land in question would cease to be Tribal trust land and the individual freehold titles would be subject to such limitations regarding future alienation as might be prescribed by law.

70. The 1961 Constitution further authorizes the alienation of Tribal trust land by the Governor, subject to the consent of the Board of Trustees, if the land is required "for purpose of mineral development, for defence purposes or for the improvement of communications or for any other public purpose". Such land would become Crown land. The Constitution requires that any African dispossessed of his right to occupy the land be assigned alternative land "so far as is reasonable and practicable", or if alternative land is not available, that he be paid compensation for his removal and for any permanent improvement made on the land, and that additional compensation be paid to the Board of Trustees for the benefit of other Africans in the area concerned. If the land is assigned to an African as compensation, it must be situated in as convenient a position as possible, be sufficient and suitable for his agricultural and pastoral requirements, and be as suitable for his requirements as the land from which he was dispossessed.

71. The 1961 Constitution also authorized the alienation of Tribal trust land for the establishment of townships, villages or business centres for the use of indigenous Africans.

72. The only other form of alienation of Tribal trust land authorized by the 1961 Constitution is by the grant of freehold title to a person or company undertaking a scheme for the irrigation of Tribal trust land for the benefit of Africans; a condition of every such grant is that the occupation of the land shall be reserved exclusively for Africans.

(b) Native purchase area

73. The Native purchase area is set aside for indigenous Africans who are defined as "Africans who are descended through the male line from a member of one of the tribes ordinarily resident in Southern Rhodesia".

74. While a European owner of land in the European area may dispose of his land freely, except to an African, an African who owns land in the Native Purchase Area is not entitled to alienate, lease, mortgage or dispose of it unless the Rural Land Board approves both the terms and conditions and the person to whom or in whose favour the land is to be alienated, leased, or encumbered. Moreover, if an African fails to carry out the conditions of his title deed, or "is convicted of treason or sedition or of an incitement to commit such crimes", the Governor may declare his land to be forfeited.

75. Crown land in the Native purchase area may be alienated or leased to an indigenous African by the Governor, on the recommendation of the Rural Land Board, on such terms and conditions as he may prescribe. The conditions fixed include possession of a Master Farmer's certificate or similar document and capital assets of at least £300 in cash or kind. The purchase price of the land is fixed by the Board, in consultation with the Minister of Lands.

76. Africans otherwise require permission to occupy Crown land in the Native purchase area, any African occupying such land immediately before 1 November 1958 being exempt from that requirement. Occupation of Crown land is subject to such terms and conditions as prescribed by the Governor.

77. In special circumstances, the Governor may permit an alien African to acquire, lease or occupy land in the Native purchase area.

78. A European may be permitted under the Act to acquire land in the Native purchase area for educational, religious or such other purposes as he may consider to be for the benefit of Africans. Otherwise, the Governor may permit a European to occupy, or to lease for a maximum of ninety-nine years, land in the Native purchase area for such purposes, or for Government administrative purposes or for hotels and places of lodging for travellers or for trading or other like purposes.

European area

79. The Land Apportionment Act, 1941, as amended, provides that land in the European area may be disposed of to anyone other than an African. Subject to this restriction, a European landowner is free to dispose of his land as he wishes.

80. The Act states that it shall be lawful to lease, alienate or otherwise dispose of Crown land in the European area to a European defined in the Act as "a person who is not an African", although the land was being occupied at the time by Africans. Such Africans, called "squatters", were allowed to remain on the land until such time as they were evicted by the Governor in accordance with the provisions of the Act authorizing the removal of Africans from land in the European area. Africans had also been permitted to remain on Crown land in the European area, on such terms and conditions as were prescribed by the Governor, until a fixed date, which had been extended and eventually expired on 31 August 1962. Since that time occupation by Africans of Crown land in the European area has been illegal, with the few exceptions mentioned below. Since the coming into operation of the first Land Apportionment Act, hundreds of thousands of African "squatters" have been removed from the land they occupied in the European area.

81. The 1941 Act generally prohibits an African from acquiring, leasing or occupying land in the European area and any owner or occupier of land in that area or his agent from disposing or attempting to dispose of any such land to an African, or from leasing any such land to an African or from permitting or allowing any African to occupy any such land. These prohibitions are subject to exceptions, mainly to permit lawful occupation of land by African employees of a European landowner, to permit Africans to obtain medical attention in the European area, and for educational, religious or other authorized purposes.

82. The Rural Land Act of 1963 (which replaced the Land Settlement Act of 1944) regulates the acquisition and disposal of Crown Lands both in the European area and the Native purchase area. This Act authorizes the Minister to purchase from public funds such private land as he deems suitable for settlement or in need of reclamation prior to settlement. Proposals for the acquisition of such land for the Crown must be referred to the Rural Land Board, an advisory body. The Minister is also authorized to spend up to £5,000 to purchase specified land on behalf of a particular applicant provided the latter is willing to contribute one fifth of the purchase price in cash.

83. Applications for leases of Crown land must be referred to the Rural Land Board. In considering and recommending applicants, the Board is required to have regard to the applicant's age, character, legal competency to hold land, his willingness to make a declaration affirming his intention personally to occupy, work and develop the holding exclusively for the benefit of himself and family, and to consider whether or not he had the necessary qualifications and capital. An applicant company can only be recommended by the Board if it is incorporated under the laws of Southern Rhodesia relating to companies and if a majority of its directors are citizens of Southern Rhodesia. The Minister may nevertheless issue a Crown grant to a company if the majority of directors are not citizens.

84. Under the Rural Land Act, Crown land is assigned on leases for five years, allotted under an annual rental of 5 per cent of the purchase price. If the option to purchase is exercised, previous rent payments are deemed instalments of the purchase price.

85. The Act requires the beneficial occupation of the holding by the lessee, including personal residence thereon, observance of laws relating to the protection of natural resources, farming practice and land management; the proper care and maintenance of improvements; and the practice of sound methods of husbandry. Lessees must carry out farming activities on such a scale and of such a nature as might be approved by the Rural Land Board, and comply with any instructions issued by the Board.

86. A lessee is barred from ceding, assigning, hypothecating or otherwise alienating his lease or from entering into any partnership for the working of his holding, except with the written consent of the Minister given after consultation with the Board.

87. A lessee who exercises his option to purchase his holding is entitled to obtain a Crown grant, provided that he has paid the whole of the purchase price and other moneys due to the Government, that he has complied with the terms and conditions of his lease, and that he satisfies the nationality requirements.

Retention of the Land Apportionment Act

88. The 1961 Constitution authorizes the Legislative Assembly to withdraw from the operation of the Land Apportionment Act, 1941: any land which is set aside under any law for national parks, afforestation purposes, non-hunting areas, game reserves or similar purposes; any land other than Crown land, at the request of or with the consent of the owner; any land which under the Act is not reserved for or restricted to ownership or occupation by a specified class of persons. The Assembly may also prescribe the conditions subject to which the ownership or occupation of land shall cease to be restricted to persons belonging to any specified class of persons, and, finally, amend or repeal the Land Apportionment Act, 1941. However, it was specifically barred, by an entrenched provision of the Constitution, from imposing any racial limitation on the ownership or occupation of any land in Southern Rhodesia more restrictive than any limitation in the Land Apportionment Act which was already in force.

89. During the December 1962 general election the Rhodesian Front undertook to uphold the principles of the Land Apportionment Act, whereas the Opposition Rhodesia National Party was pledged to repeal the Act which had been consistently opposed by the African political parties. The Southern Rhodesia Constitutional Council expressed severe criticism of the Land Apportionment Act in a report issued in February 1964, describing it as "the embodiment of racial discrimination". In this report, which was unanimous, the Council was concerned only with the Native purchase area and the European area. It asked what value the Declaration of Rights had in protecting rights in the future so long as one of those rights (the right to freedom from discrimination in regard to the ownership and occupation of land) was specifically denied by the Act.

90. On 4 March 1964, Sir Edgar Whitehead introduced a motion in the Legislative Assembly agreeing with the report of the Constitutional Council that the Land Apportionment Act was a highly discriminatory measure and contrary to the spirit of the Southern Rhodesian Constitution and expressing the opinion that the Act should be repealed. The motion was defeated by 31 votes to 27. The Minister of Mines and Lands, who was charged with the administration of the Act in rural areas, stated in the Legislative Assembly on 30 July that it was not Government's intention to repeal the Act.^e

B. DISTRIBUTION OF LAND

91. A comparison of the distribution of land in 1930, and in 1963, is as follows:

	1930	1963
	(acres)

92. The following table^f illustrates the relative agricultural potential of land in the European and Native areas:

^e Southern Rhodesia, Debates of the Legislative Assembly (Unrevised) Second Session, Tenth Parliament, No. 3, vol. 57, col. 172.

^f Based on tables 34 and 48 of the Report of the Advisory Committee, 1962, on the Development of the Economic Resources of Southern Rhodesia with particular Reference to the Role of African Agriculture (C.S.R. 28-1962).

Farming region	Percentage of area		Percentage of Southern Rhodesia
	European	African
Specialized and diversified farming and intensive crop and livestock farming	27.59	10.58	20.24
Semi-intensive farming (drought-resistant grain and other cash crops; semi-intensive livestock production)	19.56	14.63	17.43
Semi-extensive and extensive livestock farming	50.98	70.07	59.23
Unsuitable for farming	1.87	4.72	3.10
	100.00	100.00	100.00

93. In 1960, there were 7,064 European-owned farms with an aggregate area of 34,484,176 acres, as follows:

EUROPEAN FARMS

Size of farms (acres)	Number of farms	Area (acres)
Under 1,001	2,100	742,462
1,001 - 2,500	1,841	3,202,878
2,501 - 5,000	1,723	5,951,217
5,001 - 7,500	566	3,488,379
7,501 - 10,000	219	1,895,962
10,001 - 15,000	258	3,144,637
15,001 - 20,000	113	1,968,026
20,001 and over	244	14,090,615
	7,064	34,484,176

Only 1,029,130 acres of these farms were under cultivation; in contrast some 360,000 authorized African farmers cultivated three million acres in the Native areas.

94. A number of the larger farms are company-owned. Lonrho Ltd. has land holdings amounting to 1,018,323 acres of which 932,754 are ranch lands; Hippo Valley Estates, Ltd., owns 150,000 acres; Sir J. L. Hulleys and Sons, of Natal, in 1956 acquired the Triangle estate of 91,520 acres lying between the Sabi, Lundi and Mtilikwe Rivers and in association with others control a further 116,510 acres; and the Rhodesian Corporation Ltd., holds 42,806 acres.

95. European-owned farms increased in the next two years to an aggregate of 36,909,000 acres and farm sales in 1963 and 1964 were reported to be as follows:

	Farms	Acres	Average price per acre
1963	398	960,000	£2. 16s.
1964	391	1,078,000	£2. 14s.

96. There was an upsurge in the demand for farms in 1965 with a corresponding hardening of values. Ranchland was reportedly selling at about £1 an acre, maizeland about £7 an acre, and developed irrigated land about £50 an acre. The best tobacco farms were valued at between £8 and £12 an acre.

97. In the Native purchase area, 2,637 farm holdings and plots totalling 573,167 acres had been alienated to Africans by 31 December 1960 and 2,410 further applicants had been recommended. Eleven years later the number of farms and plots alienated to African farm-owners had increased to 6,432 and only 500,000 acres remained to be allocated. It was estimated that these would provide 1,000 additional farms and there were at the time 2,721 approved applicants on the waiting list. In 1964, there were 14,000 African master farmers eligible for farms, 6,981 of whom owned or leased farm land in the Native purchase area with option to purchase. It was estimated that when the Native purchase area amounted to 8 million acres, the area would provide 17,000 to 18,000 farms and plots. The original purchase prices of the African-owned farms were as follows:

Number of farms	Original purchase price
6,852	Less than £250
31	Between £250 and £349
14	Between £350 and £449
1	Between £450 and £499
3	Between £500 and £999

98. European farmers and African master farmers who are unable to obtain land in the Native purchase area are eligible for farms in the Unreserved Land. Some European owners of land in the European area have also applied for authority to sell land to Africans by having it transferred to the category of Unreserved Land; the total area of land so offered amounted to 144,142 acres on 1 January 1963. No African landowners, however, had applied for authority to sell their land to Europeans under a comparable provision of the Land Apportionment Act.

III. AGRICULTURE

A. GENERAL DESCRIPTION

99. Only about one fifth of the country's land, mostly in the high veld and eastern mountain areas, is suitable for intensive crop cultivation. Moreover, much of this area consists of sandy soil of rather low fertility. Fifteen per cent of the land is suitable, unless irrigated, only for extensive cattle ranching, with as much as thirty acres of range land needed to sustain one large animal. The remaining two thirds is subject to uncertain weather conditions that govern its suitability for producing grain, fodder, drought resistant crops, and livestock. For much of this area at least ten to twenty acres of range land are required to maintain one large animal. More than 75 per cent of the country is then subject to conditions that make crop production a risky venture.

100. Nevertheless, on those areas which are suitable for cultivation high productivity can be maintained by good soil management and by heavy investment in chemical fertilizers. Needless to say, only the European farmers have the capital and the technical knowledge to maintain such high productivity. They also carry out cattle ranching on scientific principles and with proper regard for sales values. The European farming community, as has been noted, disposes of a disproportionately high percentage of the better types of land.

101. European farmers have benefited also from a very high degree of agricultural services and marketing arrangements. During the period of the Federation those services were a Federal responsibility but they have since been resumed by the Southern Rhodesian Government.

102. European agriculture is relatively large-scale. In 1963, there were 6,242 European production units. A little over half the farms were in the 1,000 to 5,000 acre range, but 242 farms or ranches exceeded 20,000 acres in size. There were over 600 ranches of more than 10,000 acres each. A number of large cattle ranches, forest estates and sugar estates are owned by companies, including subsidiaries of the British South Africa Company, Anglo-American and the Lonrho Grant. If these large estates are excluded, the average size of holdings in 1963 was close to 2,500 acres, of which 140 acres were cultivated. In the area of higher rainfall, productive units range from 2,000 to 3,000 acres. In the fertile Mazoe valley, for example, 248 farms occupy 787,000 acres, of which 15 per cent are cultivated.

103. European farmers produce primarily for the market. The official estimates of agricultural production in the European sector in 1964 indicate that the gross value of output was £66.1 million. They marketed all their tobacco output and 75 per cent of their maize output.

104. Although a large part of the European areas are farmed extensively, average output per acre is quite high. In 1958, for instance, the average gross value of output per European production unit was close to £6,000 and it was estimated that net return to management must have been at least £1,000. Between 1937 and 1960 the total value of output in the European areas rose by more than 1,000 per cent and the total volume of output increased by 259 per cent.

105. African farming remains to a very large extent of a purely subsistence type, though the production of cash crops in the reserves is increasing and African landholders in the Purchase Areas produce primarily for sale. Lack of capital and failure to provide a sufficient scale of community development and agricultural extension services have kept the productivity of the African farmer at a low and, in the reserves, at a stagnant level.

106. African farming is still based on the principle of shifting cultivation, and despite the limited acreage land is used extensively. Yields per acre are low, averaging between a quarter and a fifth of those of comparable crops grown in the European area. Fewer than 2 per cent of the producers use fertilizer or select seeds. In the African areas, the main principal crops are grown throughout the country, regardless of climatic conditions. There is very little dairy production in the African areas and official statistics indicate no milk produced for sale by Africans. The contrast between European and African agriculture shows further in the fact that while the farms in the European areas have been surveyed, and include both crop land and grazing land within their boundaries, African holdings are not clearly identified nor do they include grazing; grazing land is communal and at best the size of holdings "associated" with a family can only be estimated. There is no information on the average size of African holdings. By 1950, close to 350,000 African families lived in the African areas. In the Purchase Areas, holdings ranged in size from fifty acres to 1,000 acres in the driest regions. The size of African holdings varies over a wide range within the different African areas; one sample of 473 holdings in all rainfall areas indicated that 5 per cent were smaller than five acres, 53 per cent were between five and ten acres, 25 per cent more than forty acres in size.

107. The following table gives the value of sales of the principal agricultural products from all sources:

£ MILLION

Period	Tobacco	Grains	Sugar	Cattle slaughtering	Pig slaughtering	Dairy products	Total
1963	33.8	6.1	6.9	8.0	1.2	2.5	58.6
1964	35.0	6.3	6.0	7.9	1.2	2.4	58.9
1965 (first 8 months)	32.8	5.3	6.5	6.1	0.9	1.7	53.2
1964 (first 8 months)	(29.5)	(5.5)	(3.5)	(5.6)	(0.9)	(1.6)	(46.6)

The figure for gross sales African agriculture amounted in 1963 and 1964 to £4.1 million and £4.3 million respectively.

108. From the gross income derived from output of European and African agriculture, one gets the following table:

£ MILLION

	1954	1960	1961	1962	1963	1964
European agriculture	23.7	36.0	43.8	42.7	44.2	46.3
African agriculture	14.6	15.7	18.0	19.3	19.6	21.4
TOTAL	38.3	51.7	61.8	62.0	63.8	67.7

This makes agriculture the largest single head in the national income accounts. However, the greater part of the gross income from African agriculture consists of production for subsistence (£17.8 million in 1964). Because of the importance of tobacco and sugar, they are the subjects of separate sections.

B. TOBACCO

109. The following table shows the evolution of the Virginia flue-cured tobacco crop since 1938 at five-year intervals up to 1958 and annually thereafter:

Sale year	No. of growers	Acreage grown (thousand acres)	Total sales (million lb.)	Average yield per acre (lb.)	Net realizations by auction (£ million)	Average price per lb. (d.)
1938	493	45.7	25.0	548	1.1	10.72
1943	741	62.2	30.3	479	2.3	18.05
1948	1,460	112.6	74.7	663	10.1	32.56
1953	2,460	177.1	105.2	594	17.4	42.83
1958	2,821	210.1	152.7	753	23.2	36.45
1959	2,821	203.2	191.3	891	27.5	34.44
1960	2,821	197.1	217.9	1,038	31.0	34.16
1961	2,821	206.3	233.3	1,054	32.9	33.82
1962	2,821	204.3	230.8	1,050	33.6	34.96
1963	2,821	218.2	194.8	820	33.8	41.62
1964	2,821	256.0	323.8	1,152	35.0	25.94
1965	3,000 app.	256.0	245.8	1,082	33.8	33.00

These statistics include tobacco sold on the Salisbury market by European growers in Zambia, whose total production is, however, less than 3 per cent of the total.

110. Other types of tobacco are grown in Southern Rhodesia though on a very much smaller scale. The following table shows tobacco production by types, distinguishing between European and African production, for Burley and Turkish tobacco, giving for purposes of comparison the figures for Virginia flue-cured.

	Burley				Turkish				Virginia
	European		African		European		African		European
	Quan. (thousands of lb.)	Value (£ thousand)	Quan. (thousands of lb.)	Value (£ thousand)	Quan. (thousands of lb.)	Value (£ thousand)	Quan. (thousands of lb.)	Value (£ thousand)	Quan. (thousands of lb.)	Value (£ thousand)
1959	22	2	—	—	588	90	226	35	180,350	25,881
1960	—	—	—	—	1,260	N.A.	618	N.A.	207,000	29,463
1961	22	2	—	—	578	87	231	35	219,621	30,948
1962	91	14	—	—	237	36	54	9	215,602	31,410
1963	949	103	11	1	638	107	149	N.A.	180,346	31,276
1964	N.A.	N.A.	303	N.A.	1,140	N.A.	264	N.A.	323,836	35,002

111. Though the units of production are small-scale, the growing marketing and exporting of tobacco constitute a highly organized industry regulated by organizations established by the Government. First, all tobacco growers must register with the Department of Agriculture and take out a licence. By so doing, they join the Rhodesia Tobacco Association, a commodity association closely linked with the Rhodesian National Farmers Union. The Association is financed by a small levy of 1/3d per pound on tobacco sales. The Rhodesian Tobacco Association is represented on and contributes to the finances of the Rhodesia Tobacco Marketing Board, the Tobacco Research Board of Rhodesia and the Tobacco Export Promotion Council of Rhodesia. The Association also finances work studies to guide growers in the use of labour and has organized a Hail Insurance Scheme.

112. The Rhodesian Tobacco Marketing Board was established under the Tobacco Marketing Act of 1936 primarily to organize and run the tobacco auctions at Salisbury. It has since been charged with the registration of growers and the licensing of graders. The Board consists of a government official as chairman, two representatives of the Rhodesia Tobacco Association and two members of the Tobacco Trade Association of Rhodesia.

113. The Tobacco Export Promotion Council of Rhodesia is a subsidiary of the Tobacco Marketing Board set up to promote the sale of Rhodesian tobacco anywhere in the world. In consultation with the Government, it sends missions abroad and suggests the countries with which trade agreements might be concluded.

114. The Tobacco Research Board of Rhodesia, which is financed both by the Government and by the Rhodesia Tobacco Association and which contains representatives of the Government, of the growers and of the buyers, maintains experimental stations and carries out a programme of research on which £214,354 was spent in 1963/1964. The remarkable increase in yield is due in large measure to the improvements in seeds, use of fertilizers, curing and pest control resulting from the research programme.

115. Finally, mention must be made of the buyer's organization, the Tobacco Trade Association, which promotes the interests of all bona fide companies, partnerships or persons engaged in auctioning, buying, handling, packing and exporting tobacco. As noted above, the Association is represented on the Tobacco Marketing Board.

116. The following three companies each operate, directly or through a subsidiary, one of the three tobacco auction floors licensed by the Tobacco Marketing Board: The Rhodesia Tobacco Warehouse and Export Company (1946) Ltd., with assets of £325,656 and profits of £52,390 for the year ended 30 September 1964; Tobacco Auctions Ltd., with assets of £420,411 and profits of £152,547 for the nine months ended 31 October 1963; and Tobacco Sales Ltd., with the capital plus reserve of £320,890 and a net profit of £71,551 for 1964. The directors of all three companies appear to be Rhodesian.

117. As noted in the chapter on industry, foreign tobacco companies, in particular British cigarette manufacturers, have considerable investments in tobacco processing and exporting facilities in Southern Rhodesia and in some cases in factories for manufacturing cigarettes.

C. SUGAR

General

118. The growing of sugar in Southern Rhodesia, virtually non-existent until after the Second World War, has expanded immensely as a result of large-scale irrigation schemes in the Sabi Limpopo Territory. The following table shows the sugar production in Southern Rhodesia and imports and consumption for the area of the Federation at five-year intervals up to 1957 and annually from 1958 to 1962:

Year	Production	Consumption (including Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland)	Imports
1937	10	11,700	11,700
1942	400	29,000	28,600
1947	500	23,900	23,400
1952	2,000	48,200	46,200
1957	6,800	76,500	69,600
1958	6,300	74,500	68,200
1959	11,700	79,400	67,700
1960	31,000	87,800	56,800
1961	45,000	96,000	51,000
1962	90,900	90,900	—

It will be noted that production and consumption for the Federation as a whole were in balance for 1962.

119. The following table shows the actual and projected production, consumption in Southern Rhodesia and exports for the years 1963 to 1968:

Year	Production	Consumption in Southern Rhodesia	Exports to neighbouring countries	Overseas exports
1963 (actual)	137,600	62,900	25,700	49,000

120. Rhodesian Sugar Refineries, a company controlled by Tate and Lyle Limited, has two refineries in Southern Rhodesia which absorb about 70,000 tons of raw sugar and a further 50,000 tons are exported to neighbouring countries, though this amount will diminish as they expand their sugar production. There remains this year some 157,000 tons to be exported overseas. A rail link has been established from the main line to Lourenço Marques to Triangle and Chiredzi, where new towns are springing up, and bulk loading facilities are being constructed at Lourenço Marques itself.

121. Southern Rhodesia entered the export market for sugar in 1963 at a time when there was a temporary shortage and world prices were unusually high (£105 per ton in November 1963). Since then the world price has fallen sharply (to as low as £22 a ton in February 1965). In both 1963 and 1964, Southern Rhodesia was able to export 10,000 tons to the United States of America, but in 1965 its quota was reduced to 9,200 tons. On the other hand, after prolonged negotiations, the Territory was admitted to the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement on 1 January 1965. A British quota of 25,000 long tons a year was obtained at a price which is negotiated annually at a level well above the world price; for 1965 the price is £46.11.6 per long ton f.o.b. Lourenço Marques. In addition, 100,000 long tons may be sold to Britain and Canada annually at a preferential price which in Britain is £3.15.0 and in Canada is £4.10.0 above the world price. Within the scope of the Commonwealth Agreement, Tate and Lyle Ltd. have entered into an agreement to purchase at least 50,000 long tons per annum over the next five years, of which at least 20,000 long tons are for Canadian delivery. A group of Japanese importers has contracted to purchase Rhodesian raw sugar over a three-year period on similar terms to those applicable to other suppliers; for the year 1965/1966 50,000 long tons will be supplied. Southern Rhodesia is seeking a quota under any new International Sugar Agreement which may be negotiated.

122. External marketing of Southern Rhodesian sugar is carried out by Sugar Sales (Pvt.) Ltd., a company jointly owned by the three producing companies. Sugar is marketed internally by Sugar Marketing (Private) Ltd., a company controlled by Rhodesia Sugar Refineries Ltd., but with a participation by the major producers. Internal sales are subject to price regulation by the Government, which, however, has assured adequate profit margins to producers and refiners.

123. Sugar production has therefore become a major economic activity in Southern Rhodesia, in which the units of production are large-scale companies with important foreign shareholdings. By 1 January 1965, £18.5 million had been invested in the industry, which already employed 21,200 persons, of whom 20,700 were Africans. It is anticipated that by 1968, £34.5 million will have been invested in the industry and that 30,000 will be employed. The Government, for its part, will have contributed £7.56 million for water development, £1.36 million for railways, £1.1 million for roads and £.5 million for other development.

124. The following subsections give details about the principal producers:

Triangle Ltd.

125. Triangle Limited is a wholly owned subsidiary of Sir J. L. Hulleys and Sons (Rhodesia) Ltd., which in turn is wholly owned by Hulleys' Sugar Corporation Ltd., the largest sugar producing firm in South Africa. Three of the fifteen directors of the Corporation are British, including Lord Lyle of Westbourne of the British sugar firm of Tate and Lyle Ltd. Triangle Ltd., wholly owns the Triangle Estate proper of 91,520 acres. Two subsidiary companies formed in conjunction with Imperial Cold Storage Limited control 116,510 acres of the adjacent Nuanetsi Ranch, but the additional land has not yet been developed except for some pilot areas. Triangle Limited produced 115,000 tons of raw sugar during the 1964 milling season and is expected to produce 170,000 tons in 1965 and 200,000 tons in 1966.

126. Total costs in developing Triangle up to the end of 1965 are reported to be £12 million, of which £3 million was raised in 1960 by 6½ per cent debentures.

127. Separate financial accounts for Triangle Ltd. are not available. In 1963 the Huletts Group as a whole had net earnings after taxes of R5.54 million^a on a total sugar production of 584,000 tons and paid dividends of R.30 per share of par value of R1.00. For the financial year ending 30 April 1965 the dividend was unlikely to exceed R.30 per share.

Hippo Valley Estates Ltd.

128. Hippo Valley Estates Ltd. was established in 1956 by Sir Ray Stockil, a former member of the Rhodesian Legislative Assembly, and by six other farmers interested in developing the agricultural potential of the Rhodesian low veld. The initial area of 40,000 acres was increased to 150,000 acres in 1961. The original plan was to grow citrus fruits and by June 1965, 100,000 trees had been planted on the estate. Production in 1964 amounted to 103,000 cases of which 55,000 were exported under the "Outspan" trademark of the South African citrus industry.

129. In 1958 it was decided that sugar should be grown on the estate as soon as water became available from the Kyle-Bangala scheme. A syndicate of Mauritian growers subscribed for shares in the company and agreed to provide technical and managerial services. Sugar was first planted in 1959 and by 1964, 8,400 acres were under cane and a second-hand sugar mill had been installed.

130. A reassessment of the irrigation water available resulted in the company's allocation being increased from 150 to 230 cusecs in 1963. As a consequence, the company embarked on a £5 million expansion scheme in December, 1963, to increase the total sugar acreage to 23,000 acres, 15,800 acres to be planted by the company and 7,200 acres by private growers.

131. Then came nine months of remarkable development. Bush-clearing, land preparation and planting progressed at the rate of sixty acres a day and the construction of a 250-cusec canal to serve the new area was carried out at the rate of .600 feet a day; storage dams and hundreds of miles of small canals were constructed. This programme was completed by the company as planned, in September, 1964.

132. This considerable increase in the sugar acreage has necessitated the construction of a new mill, to be available for the 1965/66 crushing season. This mill, with a crushing capacity of 250 tons of cane an hour, was expected to be commissioned in September, 1965. It will cost £3.5 million.

133. On completion, in 1965, of present expansion plans, Hippo Valley's capital expenditure will amount to £7.75 million.

134. To provide funds for its development, Hippo Valley Estates has taken in as major shareholders, Rhodesian Anglo-American (a subsidiary of the Anglo-American Corporation of South Africa), Rhodesian Breweries (a subsidiary of South African Breweries Ltd., which together own shares with a par value of £261.111) and Tate and Lyle Ltd., which owns shares of par value of £275,000 out of the issued capital of £2,279,247. On 31 December 1964, reserves amounted to £1,442,498. The company made profits of £146,284 in the year ended 31 March 1963 and £393,605 in the following year it distributed its first dividend of £170,208 at the rate of 6d. per share of par value of 5/-. Sugar production on the estate was 37,000 tons during 1964 and was expected to increase to 100,000 in 1965 and to a maximum of 175,000 tons in 1967.

IV. MINING

A. GENERAL

Development of the mining industry

135. The occupation of Southern Rhodesia was directly due to evidence of its mineral wealth. Prospectors for minerals first entered Matabeleland and Mashonaland from the south after 1865 when gold was discovered by explorers and accounts spread of rich gold deposits in that area. As mentioned in section I, Cecil Rhodes obtained in 1889 a Royal Charter for the British South Africa Company to exploit the mineral wealth of areas north of the Limpopo River. Under the Charter, the Company could make grants of land or mineral rights either on a freehold or on a leasehold basis.

136. The Company proceeded in that first period of its rule (1890-1903) to grant licences to individual prospectors for minerals on a share basis. Expectations of vast goldfields similar to those of South Africa did not materialize, however, and gold output remained on a modest scale (£750,000 in 1901). Other minerals, although known to exist, were not sought after and were not fully developed until the First World War. The emphasis on gold continued with an increasing number of mining claims.

137. Base-metal extraction was slow to develop in comparison with gold production; although several discoveries of base minerals were made before the turn of the century, commercial production was delayed mainly owing to the lack of railways and marketing facilities. With the First World War, however, the attention of producers was turned to these minerals; there was a rapid development in the production of asbestos, chrome and coal; iron, copper, limestone, iron pyrites, magnesite, mica, tungsten, tin, vermiculite, barytes, antimony, arsenic, lead and tantalum were gradually produced in varying quantities and for varying periods of time.

138. It has been estimated that since the Second World War more than £10 million have been spent by companies in the search for mineral deposits. The Southern Rhodesian Ministry of Mines and Lands has to some extent provided plant and equipment and helped in the surveying and sampling of deposits. According to the President of the Rhodesian Chamber of Mines, however, mining has not been so profitable as to generate more than a small part of the capital needed for new ventures, and at least 75 per cent of mineral production has come from mining assets owned by investors outside Southern Rhodesia.

139. Mining is undertaken almost entirely by large, internationally known firms. Prospecting costs are relatively high and capital has mainly been provided by financing houses outside the country. Prior to 1964, much of the capital required for the exploitation of the Territory's mineral wealth originated from profits made on the copperbelt in Zambia. This source is not so readily available as it was. In 1963, the number of companies engaged in mining and quarrying was thirty-seven; their combined assets and liabilities were as follows (£ million):^b

141. The products of mining in Southern Rhodesia were valued at nearly £4 million a year in the early 1920s and at £7.7 million in 1938. Production of minerals rose steadily after the Second World War, notwithstanding fluctuations in prices and temporary setbacks. In ten years the value of output rose by 60 per cent and in 1961 reached a record £27.2 million; in 1962 and 1963, however, both volume and total value slightly declined. Some minerals experienced marketing difficulties, particularly chrome, asbestos and coal.

142. In 1964 favourable markets and expanding activity in the mining industry were reflected in higher outputs of all the principal metals and minerals, excepting copper which nevertheless rose to a new record value. The over-all volume index rose from 91.7 to 98.2 (1961=100). The increases in value ranged from 1.6 per cent for gold, to 12 per cent for chrome, to 14 per cent for asbestos, to 25 per cent for iron ore, to 28 per cent for copper and to 41 per cent for lithium minerals. The total value of mineral output increased by 12.7 per cent from £23.7 million to £26.7 million.

143. During the first six months of 1965 total mineral production amounted to £15.4 million, an increase of 20.4 per cent over the figures for the corresponding period of 1964.

144. Since the occupation of Southern Rhodesia, the value of mineral production has totalled over £530 million, of which gold accounts for £273 million. Gold mining remained the major industry in terms of production until after the Second World War when it was overtaken by base minerals, the production of which is now nearly three times that of gold. The largest measure of capital invested in mining has been for the purpose of export overseas, although mining for local manufacture is well established, particularly of iron ore for the Que Que steelworks, limestone for steel and cement manufacturing, asbestos in the manufacture of asbestos cement products, etc. Over-all production of raw minerals has therefore been closely affected by world prices and demand.

145. The total number of mines in production in 1964 was forty-five as follows:

Gold	11	Iron pyrites	1
Asbestos	8	Nickel	1
Coal	1	Phosphate	2
Copper	5	Tin	2
Chrome	10	Lithium	1

B. GOLD

General

147. Southern Rhodesia produced 1.41 per cent of the total world gold production (excluding that of the USSR) in 1964. Out of 40.6 million fine ounces, of which 29.1 million were produced in the Republic of South Africa, total Rhodesian output was 575,000 fine ounces (figures on gold production are given in the table in para. 146).

148. Considerable quantities of gold were extracted by "small-workers" over the years, although their activities declined and have now ceased almost completely. Of the 566,000 ounces of gold produced in 1963, small operators accounted for only 17,000 ounces. In 1964, eleven mines had an output of 10,000 ounces or more. In a few cases small mines were taken over by larger companies, but the vast majority of them were forced to close down. Mines controlled by the large companies now account for over 80 per cent of total gold production. The major gold producers are the same mines which were discovered early in the century and have not ceased production. A few of the closed mines have reopened in recent years, after further exploration at levels deeper than the few hundred feet at which they were abandoned.

149. Total net gold sales since 1954 are shown below:

1955	6,486
1956	6,483

1957	6,854
1958	6,772
1959	6,931
1960	6,961
1961	7,091
1962	6,845
1963	6,980
1964	7,086

150. Silver has been produced as a by-product of gold. Out put in 1924 was 166,472 fine ounces valued at £22,488; in 1950 it was 85,549 ounces valued at £22,601; in 1963 it stood at 83,742 ounces valued at £38,283. Nearly all production is exported in bullion.

151. There have been reports of recent gold discoveries in Southern Rhodesia. The strikes occurred in a geological formation known as the Limpopo Metamorphic Belt extending across Southern Rhodesia in the south and were unusual and unexpected from a geological point of view. One strike, described as the largest in many years, was made at the Up to Date Mine (owned by Inyati Mining Co.) near Bulawayo; another was at the Ranco Mine 50 miles south of Forth Victoria. In November 1964, a pocket of gold worth £10,000 was located at the Sunrise Mine in the Felixburg gold belt (south-east of Umvuma), one of the oldest fields of Southern Rhodesia. The strike was made by the Anglo-American Corp. which bought the claims from Felixburg Mines Ltd., and the latter still has an option to participate by 50 per cent in the property in 1969. The following list includes the gold mines which have been active in recent years:

152. Available information on leading companies engaged in gold mining and on their activities is outlined in the following sections.

Lonrho Group

153. The gold mining companies associated with the Lonrho Group (see annex also) are Mazoe Consolidated Mines Ltd., Kanyemba Gold Mines Ltd., Mashaba Gold Mines (Pvt.) Ltd. and Coronation Syndicate Ltd.

154. The Coronation Syndicate was incorporated in the Republic of South Africa in 1902 for the purpose of acquiring options and rights in an extensive area in the Transvaal which were subsequently abandoned. Its capital was £150,000 in shares of £100. In December 1945, it acquired from Hugh Trevis and Partners Ltd., of Southern Rhodesia, the entire issued capital of Homestake Gold Mining Ltd. It also acquired 21 claims in the Eldorado and Banket Group in the Sinoia District, as well as the following interests: (1) the Muriel Mine, in the Sinoia District, comprising 253 gold claims and 20,568 acres of farm lands; (2) M'karadzi Mine in the Darwin District, comprising 40 gold claims;¹ and the entire issued capital of Arcturus Mines Ltd., comprising 227 gold reef claims² and other capital assets.

155. The authorized capital of Coronation Syndicate in 1963 was £600,000 in 4.8 million shares of 2s.6d each; 3,220,000 shares were issued and fully paid, but of this capital, 1,045,280 shares were held by the Lonrho Group. The board of directors consisted of Mr. S. F. Dēnch (South Africa), Chairman, Mr. G. Abdinor (South Africa), Mr. A. H. Ball (United Kingdom), Mr. C. C. Bentley (South Africa), Mr. C. F. Brown (Southern Rhodesia), Mr. H. W. Jones (South Africa), Mr. A. J. B. Ogilvy (United Kingdom), and Mr. R. W. Rowland (Southern Rhodesia). The head office of the company is in Johannesburg, South Africa.

156. In July 1963, all mining interests of the Lonrho Group were transferred and grouped under the Syndicate. Payment received by Lonrho was in the form of 45 shares (of 25c each) of Coronation Syndicate for every two shares of Mashaba Gold Mines; 55 shares of Coronation Syndicate for every four shares of Mazoe Consolidated Mines and 2 shares of Coronation Syndicate for every five shares (of 50c each) of Kanyemba Gold Mines. The Company was expected to issue 2,780,000 shares of 25 cents each, credited as fully paid, in satisfaction of the purchases. After the increase of the authorized capital to 7 million shares, this would leave 1 million shares in reserve. On the basis of the new merger, Coronation Syndicate became a subsidiary of Lonrho which now controls approximately 61 per cent of its capital.

157. The following is a summary of Coronation Syndicate's accounts as at 30 June 1963:

Rio Tinto Group

171. Rio Tinto (Rhodesia) Ltd. was incorporated in 1956 in Southern Rhodesia and in 1957 purchased for £250,000 the mineral rights of the Empress Nickel claims west of Gatooma, where it carried out diamond drilling for a brief period. In 1959, it acquired Leslie Gold Mines Ltd., which owns the Patchway Gold Mine north of Gatooma; it also bought the nearby Big Ben Gold Mine and in association with Mr. R. W. Rowland, a Southern Rhodesian financier, acquired full ownership of Sandawana Mines (Pvt.) Ltd., with its emerald deposits and certain other mineral claims in the Belingwe District. Finally, in 1960, it acquired the complete stock of 4.5 million shares of Rio Tinto Rhodesian Mining Ltd., described below.

172. In 1963 the capital of Rio Tinto (Rhodesia) Ltd. was £4 million in 16 million shares of 5s. each, of which £3,613,519 were fully paid. Nearly 99 per cent of the stock was held by Rio Tinto Rhodesian Holding Co., Ltd., Rio Tinto Mining Co. of Canada and Rio Tinto Mining Co. of Australia Ltd. The Board of Directors consisted of Brig. M. A. W. Rowlandson (Southern Rhodesia), Mr. J. N. V. Duncan (Southern Rhodesia), Mr. E. H. T. Thompson (Southern Rhodesia), Mr. J. W. N. Sharpe (Southern Rhodesia), Mr. R. W. Rowland (Southern Rhodesia), Mr. R. W. Wright (United Kingdom), Mr. R. S. Walker (Southern Rhodesia), Mr. R. H. Winters (Canada) and Mr. G. L. Hatherley. No information is available on the accounts of the company.

173. The Rio Tinto Rhodesian Mining Ltd. was previously named the Cam and Motor Gold Mining Co. (registered in 1919). The Cam and Motor Mine is the largest gold mine in Southern Rhodesia, comprising 1,256 claims in the Hartley District. The Pickstone Mine, with 583 claims in the same district, the Bowcop Claims consisting of 90 base mineral claims in the vicinity of Pickstone, a further 140 gold claims and 59 base mineral claims south of the Umsweswe River in Gatooma, are all included in the company's property.

174. The authorized capital of the company is £750,000, in 6 million shares, of which 4.5 million are issued and fully paid.

Dawn Gold Mining Co. Ltd.

175. This company is wholly owned by the important international group, Consolidated Gold Fields Ltd. Its authorized capital is £50,000 in 100,000 shares of 10s. each. In 1963, the directors were Mr. H. D. Hubbard (South Africa), Chairman, Mr. D. J. White (South Africa) and Mr. J. W. A. Wright (South Africa). The company owned seventy-nine blocks comprising 755 gold mining claims in the district of Buli. Consolidated Gold Fields Ltd. has extensive gold mining interests in South Africa and Australia.

C. ASBESTOS

General

176. Asbestos in Southern Rhodesia is mainly of the high-grade variety, although lower grades are also produced. The fibre is of exceptional length and is considered among the best in the world. The Territory ranks as the third world producer of chrysolite asbestos and the first in better-grade long fibre. The largest deposits occur in the Shabani-Belingwe area and at Mashaba in the Victoria District. They vary in thickness from a few feet to more than 300 feet. Originally nearly all the mines were worked by open quarries, but since the Second World War underground mining has replaced quarrying in nearly all the mines. The more important mines are located in the districts of Bulawayo, Victoria, Salisbury, Gwelo and Gwanda.

177. In 1964 Southern Rhodesia produced 153,541 tons of asbestos fibre, a rise of 11,291 over the previous year (worth an additional £851,000). This constituted 4.15 per cent of the total world production. World figures were as follows:

World	3,690
USSR (estimate)	1,500
Canada	1,377
Southern Rhodesia	153.4

178. The estimated value of sales of Southern Rhodesian asbestos was £6.8 million in 1964 as against £6 million in 1963.

Almost the entire output of asbestos is exported while local use is limited to a few thousand tons per annum in the asbestos cement industry. Exports in 1964 rose to a record level (£10.1 million) mainly because of the sharply increased world demand, particularly by the cement piping and sheeting industry of western Europe. More than fifty countries buy Rhodesian asbestos, the largest importer being the United Kingdom (approximately 30 per cent). A Southern Rhodesian company, the Asbestos Refining Co. (Rhod.) (Pvt.) Ltd. operates a factory which blends fibres purchased from a number of mines and produces a product which has been exported to forty-two different countries. However, marketing difficulties increased in 1964 and a number of the small asbestos mines were forced to shut down.

179. The Pangani Mine at Filabusi, sixty miles south-east of Bulawayo, started production in 1963; it contains ore bodies which yield high quality asbestos and have not previously been exploited. The first two stages of a three-stage mining plan costing £2.7 million have been carried out and production is expected to earn more than £1 million annually.

180. The number of active mines was 22 in 1961, 17 in 1962 and 16 in 1963. The most important producers are controlled by the Turner and Newall group, which owns mines accounting for 63 per cent of the total production of Southern Rhodesia.

Turner and Newall Ltd.

181. This holding company was registered in the United Kingdom in 1920 as a private company, but was converted into a public company in October 1925. Through a number of subsidiaries it manufactures and sells asbestos, asbestos cement products, magnesia and allied products. The raw asbestos is obtained from the company's mines in South Africa, Southern Rhodesia, Swaziland and Canada. The subsidiaries of the company in Southern Rhodesia include the African Asbestos Mining Co. (Pvt.) Ltd., working the Nil Desperandum mine in the Shabanie district; the Rhodesian and General Asbestos Corp. (Pvt.) Ltd., owning mines at Shabanie, Mashaba and Filabusi; and Turners Asbestos Products (Pvt.) Ltd., manufacturing various asbestos-cement products at factories in Salisbury and Bulawayo. In 1958, Rhodesian and General Asbestos Corp. (Pvt.) Ltd., acquired for £1,640,000 the capital of Rhodesian Asbestos Ltd., which operates the Temeraire Mine, adjacent to the Mashaba mines.

182. In 1953, the company acquired a controlling interest in Porter's Cement Industries (Rhodesia) Ltd., and a minority interest in Porter's Cement Industries (Bulawayo) Ltd., ordinary shareholders of each company receiving one Turner and Newall ordinary share of £1 for every two ordinary shares held in the Rhodesia companies.

183. The authorized capital of the company was originally £3 million; several major capital increases were made until, by the Second World War, it had reached £7,250,000. At the present time, the authorized capital stands at £60 million, of which £49,292,135 are fully paid (7 per cent cumulative preference stock and the remainder ordinary stock). The board of directors in 1963 was as follows: Mr. R. G. Soothill, Chairman, Mr. R. M. Bateman, Deputy Chairman, Mr. G. S. Sutcliffe, Mr. N. A. Morling, Mr. Kenneth Neve, Mr. J. A. E. Clogg, Mr. R. H. Turner, Mr. A. Russell, Mr. W. Blakey, Mr. J. H. Thompson and Mr. J. Waddell. The head office of Turner and Newall Ltd. is at Manchester in the United Kingdom.

184. No information on the company's operations and accounts are available, except that the company realized a net profit of £12.7 million (before tax) for the fiscal year ended on 30 September 1963; dividends paid amounted to £3,578,741.

D. CHROME

General

186. The Territory has vast reserves of high-grade metallurgical chrome and almost unlimited reserves of refractory and chemical chromite. It has been estimated that in the main deposits alone some 544 million tons of chrome ore remain. The reserves assigned to all known deposits total 608 million tons, of which about 300 million tons are estimated to be of metallurgical grade. There is sufficient variety of grades to support large-scale production of high and low-carbon ferro-chrome for refractory purposes as well as for chemical uses.

187. While in the past five years the market for Rhodesian chrome ore has been depressed, sales and prices rose in 1964 and the first six months of 1965. In 1964 the Territory produced 493,371 tons of chromite valued at £2,218,789, against 412,390 tons the previous years. This constitutes nearly 10.16 per cent of total world production. Over half of the production is of metallurgical grade, about two sixths is chemical grade and one sixth refractory grade.

188. The quantity and value of chrome exports are given in the chapter on foreign trade. Almost 95 per cent of the ore produced is exported. After 1960 the demand for exports declined, thus affecting smaller operators. Exports are directed primarily towards the United States, to which country Southern Rhodesia is the largest supplier of high-grade lump metallurgical ore.

Rhodesia Chrome Mines Ltd. and African Chrome Mines Ltd.

189. Rhodesia Chrome Mines Ltd. was the first producer of chromite in Southern Rhodesia and it still ranks as the major producer of this mineral. The company's mining claims are situated in the Gwelo (Selukwe) and Victoria Districts. The company was registered in London in 1908. Its original capital was authorized at £60,000 but, by 1954, it had increased to £600,000 with the opening of a heavy media separation plant, and by 1961 to £1.2 million. The shares are of £1 each and are all fully paid.

190. African Chrome Mines Ltd. was formed in 1928 to amalgamate certain interests of Rhodesia Chrome Mines Ltd., and Rhodesian Chrome and Asbestos Ltd. The claims owned by the company are in the Salisbury Districts. The authorized capital, originally £300,000, was increased to £1 million in shares of £1, which are fully paid. The board of directors is the same as that of Rhodesia Chrome Mines Ltd. The accounts of the company are not published.

191. Both Rhodesia Chrome Mines and African Chrome Mines are associated with a London holding company, Chrome Company Ltd., whose capital in 1961 was £190,000, and whose directors were Messrs. Coward, Bantick, Coulson, Shankin and White. The interests represented by this company are British and American.

192. Rhodesia Chrome Mines Ltd., in 1962, had an output of 233,101 tons while African Chrome Mines produced 42,544 tons.

Rhodesian Vanadium Corporation

193. The Rhodesian Vanadium Corp. is a wholly owned subsidiary of the Vanadium Corp. of America; it operates the Vanad Mine and the Sutton Mine in Southern Rhodesia, whose production in 1964 was some 60,000 short tons of chrome ore, or some 30 per cent of the Territory's total chrome production. It also owns substantial manganese concessions in Zambia. The directors of Rhodesian Vanadium Corp. in 1964 were as follows: Mr. G. L. Weissenburger (United States), Mr. C. A. Bott (Southern Rhodesia), Mr. G. T. McGinnis (United States), Mr. D. A. Shriver (United States), and Mr. J. J. Spollen (United States).

194. The Vanadium Corp. of America was incorporated in the State of Delaware (United States) in 1919. Its capital is $6.5 million in 40,000 convertible preferred shares of $100 each and 2.5 million shares common stock (per value $1).

195. The corporation's accounts for 1959 showed a net profit of $2,494,445 after providing $2,380,000 for income taxes; dividends absorbed were $1,626,741; current assets were $37,974,007 and current liabilities were $10,404,049.

E. COAL

General

197. The first coalfield to be discovered in Southern Rhodesia, and the only one to be exploited so far is at Wankie, about 65 miles south-east of Victoria Falls. It has for many years been the main source of solid fuel for the Copperbelt of Zambia, the Rhodesian Railways, and manufacturing industries in neighbouring territories.^p Increase in production was hindered, however, by insufficient transport facilities. After 1951, coal for the copper mines was allocated each month in accordance with an agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States Governments. The agreement provided for a loan of £5 million by the Economic Co-operation Administration (ECA) for the development of the Rhodesia Railways. ECA was interested in the expansion of copper production and in the agreement Southern Rhodesia undertook to allocate to the copper mines between 21 per cent and 29 per cent of the coal produced at Wankie.

198. Coal deposits in the Territory are vast. Coalfields, fourteen of which are of importance, occupy large areas south of the Zambesi and the Shangani in the north-west, near Beitbridge at Tuli in the south, and across the Sabi River Valley in the south-east. Five of the coalfields have been partially explored and only the Wankie coalfield is being mined. The reserves at Wankie are estimated at 1,264.8 million tons of coking coal and 654.2 million tons of other coal; the other five partially explored coalfields contain approximately 45 million tons of good quality coal and 5,238 million tons of coal of poorer quality.

199. Domestic utilization of coal is for the railways (almost 25 per cent of total production), metallurgical needs (iron and steel ferro-alloys by the Rhodesian Iron and Steel Co.), power generation (in areas not served by the Kariba Dam) and industrial use. The total local consumption is about 360,000 tons a year, of which about 80,000 tons are taken by the tobacco industry. The coke ovens produce about 123,000 tons of coke a year. A by-product plant produces tar (800,000 gallons in 1963), ammonia, benzol (for use as a petrol additive), toluol and xylol (for the plastics and chemical industries), naphthalene and naphthas and anthracene oil.

200. In 1964 total coal production rose to 3,355,170 tons valued at £3,432,176, as compared to 3,020,890 tons valued at £3,077,596 in 1963. Total sales during the year ended 31 August 1964 amounted to 2,893,082 tons, an increase of 12,130 tons over the previous year: this was due to increased sales to general consumers in both Southern Rhodesia and Zambia. The capacity of the colliery is some 5 million tons a year.

^p Sales to the copper mines of Zambia, the Rhodesian Railways and the copper mines of Katanga amounted to nearly 900,000 tons in 1963.

Wankie Colliery Co. Ltd.

201. The company was registered in the United Kingdom on 26 October 1923, as the third reorganization of a company registered in 1899 as Wankie (Rhodesia) Coal, Railway and Exploration Co. Ltd. It was reincorporated in Southern Rhodesia in July 1954. The authorized capital originally was £900,000 and was increased several times until it reached £1.7 million after the Second World War. The issued capital is now £5,277,810, in 10,555,620 shares. The company's property includes approximately 42,000 acres of coal mining rights held under Special Grants dated 10 December 1901 and 29 October 1925, and approximately 29,000 acres of full surface rights in the Wankie District. The Colliery Company also holds about 26,000 acres of surface rights on a leasehold basis from the Southern Rhodesian Government.

202. The directors of Wankie Colliery in 1964 were Mr. H. H. Taylor (Southern Rhodesia) (Chairman), Mr. L. Wishart (Southern Rhodesia), Sir Keith Acutt (United Kingdom) Mr. P. H. A. Brownrigg (Zambia),^a Sir Frederick Crawford (Southern Rhodesia), Mr. N. M. Kenny (Zambia), Sir Albert Robinson (South Africa), Mr. J. W. Shilling (South Africa) and Mr. M. van Weyenbergh (Congo Republic).^b The controlling interest (some 23 per cent) is held by Rhodesian Anglo-American Ltd., a wholly owned subsidiary of the Anglo-American Corporation of South Africa, Ltd. The company holds a 30 per cent interest in Clay Products Ltd., substantial interests in Rhokana Corp. Ltd.,^c and Nchanga Consolidation Copper Mines Ltd., and controls Sandringham Investments Ltd.

203. The following table contains a summary of assets and liabilities and the financial results of the Colliery Company in 1964:

F. COPPERGeneral

204. Copper ores occur at Mangula the grade of ore containing 1.07 per cent copper and the recovery being 93.4 per cent. There is a copper belt stretching for some thirty-five miles and to the east of it lies the Alaska and Silverside Mines. Copper minerals are occasionally found in gold quartz reefs, such as at the Muriel Mine, but the amount of copper-gold concentrate therein is not large. The total reserves of copper ore are estimated at 31 million tons, with an estimated metal content of 424,000 tons; of these reserves, 17,092,000 tons are owned by M.T.D. (Mangula) Ltd.

205. The production of copper until recently was of very minor value. It now depends to a large extent on the world market and world prices. In 1964, production was approximately 18,000 short tons and was at £4,156,000 due to an improvement in world prices.

206. A new ore-leaching plant was expected to be completed at Mangula by July 1965 at a total cost of $400,000 and with a capacity of approximately 1,000 tons of ore per day; it should add 250 tons of copper per month when its full output had been achieved. A new copper smelter was installed in 1964 at the Muriel Gold Mine near Mtoroshanga at a cost of $5,000. In the past the copper extracted from the mine covered the costs of exporting 15-17 per cent copper-gold concentrates, including freight and smelting. The new smelter was expected to start operating by the middle of 1965 and to increase revenue by £3,000 a month.

M.T.D. (Mangula) Ltd.

207. The company was incorporated in 1947 as Rhodesia Copper Ventures, Ltd., to acquire certain mining claims in the area now held by it in the Lomagundi District. The claims now comprise 73 blocks in the vicinity of the Molly Shaft, 51 blocks covering the N'jiri, United Kingdom, Umboe, Muni, Chirom, Beduld, Greenfield and Dumbodzuko copper prospects, and 23 blocks to the east of Molly Shaft on which the Silverside Mine is situated. The company also owns the farm Whindale in extent of 2,964 acres, a lot of the farm Plateau 952 acres in extent, portion of farm Suiwerspruit, in extent 750 acres and 1.43 acres on farm Alfa. A further 252 acres are in Mangula Township. The claims and farms are about forty miles from Sinoia.

208. The authorized capital of the company is £5 million in 20 million shares of 5s. each. In 1964 the board of directors consisted of Commander H. F. P. Grenfell (United Kingdom) (Chairman), Mr. D. E. Cox (Southern Rhodesia), Mr. P. U. Rissik (South Africa), Mr. W. I. Spence (South Africa), Sir Charles W. Meredith (Southern Rhodesia), and Mr. C. M. Stuart (South Africa).

209. The company's assets and liabilities in 1964 were summarized as follows:

	£ thousand
Assets
Current	365.1
Stores	214.1
Fixed	6,669.1
Investments	295.3
Liabilities
Creditors	205.1
Loans from parent company	62.7
Provisions	23.9
Reserves	1,877.3
Dividends	375.0

210. The accounts of the company showed a net profit of £1,141,319 or approximately £430,000 more than the previous year; the reasons for this increase were the rise in the price of copper, an added output of 550 tons of concentrates and a lower cost per ton of recoverable copper produced.

211. The controlling interest (over 62 per cent) in M.T.D. (Mangula) Ltd., is held by the Messina (Transvaal) Development Co. Ltd., a South African registered mining company, through its wholly owned subsidiary in Southern Rhodesia, the Messina (Rhodesia) Development Co. Ltd. Its subsidiaries include M.T.D. Copper (Sales) Ltd., Arton Copper Co. Ltd., M.T.D. (Sanyati) Ltd.[†] and the Messina Rhodesia Smelting and Refining Co. Ltd. This last company was formed in 1959 with a capital of £750,000, of which 80 per cent was subscribed by the Messina (Transvaal) and the remainder by M.T.D. (Mangula); a smelting and refining plant was erected at Alaska Siding (west of Sinoia) and production commenced in December 1960. Messina (Transvaal) also owns the Umkondo Mine whose copper ore reserves were estimated at 77,770 tons in 1964. In addition, the company holds 850,000 shares in the Rhodesian Iron and Steel Co. (Pvt.) Ltd., representing 23 per cent of the ordinary share capital of this company.

212. The capital of Messina (Transvaal) Development Co., Ltd., is £2.5 million in 10 million shares. It was registered in 1950 to take over the assets of a United Kingdom company bearing the same name and registered in 1905 to operate a copper mine in the Northern Transvaal.

213. The Rhodesian copper ore production controlled by the company in 1964 was as follows:

	Tons	Copper content (per cent)
Umkondo Mine	74,210	2.68
Alaska Mine	224,120	2.04
Mangula Mine	1,085,120	1.17
TOTAL	1,383,450

The company produces over 85 per cent of the total copper concentrates in Southern Rhodesia.

G. IRONGeneral

214. Deposits of iron ore are widespread in the Territory. At Que Que, the reserves amount to 11 million tons of proved and 25 million tons of probable ore at a minimum of 55 per cent of iron content. The Beacon Tor Mine (south of Que Que) possesses reserves of some 5 million tons of ore at 60 per cent iron content. The Buchwa deposit in the Ingesi District are estimated to contain 134 million tons of ore at a minimum of 60 per cent iron content. The deposits at Nyuni east of Fort Victoria, contain 60 per cent of iron but have not yet been estimated in tonnage. The Yank and Black Mamba deposits, west of Hartley, are also maintained. Other vast deposits in the form of banded ironstone not quite as rich in iron ore content exist in several other areas. The Kwanesi deposits west of Featherstone contain 33 billion tons of ore at an indicated 40 per cent of iron, and 40 million tons of ore at a minimum of 55 per cent of iron (the latter being held by RISCO) (see section V below). Iron ore exists also near the Mkumvura River and near Mt. Darwin in the north-east, in the Sabi Valley and in the Zambesi Valley. Total reserves are estimated as follows:

	Million tons
High-grade (over 60 per cent iron content)	121
Medium-grade (50-60 per cent iron content)	73
Low-grade (40 per cent iron content)	33,000

215. Until 1961, iron ore production remained small, the ore being primarily needed for the smelting furnaces at Redcliffe. Beginning in 1961, the demand for iron ore increased rapidly, in part because of the needs of the expanded iron and steel industry and in part because of direct exports of ore to Japan. Thus production rose from 427,600 tons valued at £466,000 in 1961 to 908,200 tons valued at £582,000 in 1964 and 829,300 tons valued at £591,000 in the first six months of 1965.

[†]This company owns a small property containing copper, lead and zinc; its operations were discontinued in 1961.

216. In 1964 exports of iron ore amounted to 315,900 tons valued at £353,000. (In addition 240,700 tons of pig-iron valued at £2.6 million were exported, while there were appreciable exports of finished steel products.) Nearly 107,000 tons of the exported ore came from the Beacon Tor Mine which is owned by Iron and Minerals Dev. Co. (Pvt.) Ltd. According to 1964 reports, the Company intended to carry out further intensive investigations to prove additional ore reserves. At the request of the Rhodesian Government a mission from a major Japanese steel company, Kobe Steel Works, visited Buchwa and Wankie to study the feasibility of building new steel mills at Buchwa in the Ingesi District where deposits have a maximum iron content of 64 per cent. The possibility of building pelletizing plants at the Buchwa Mine was also studied. The Buchwa Iron Mining Co. has been carrying out a £200,000 development programme aiming at producing iron ore at the rate of 2 million tons per annum by the end of 1966. Rhodesia Railways announced in October 1964 that they had received requests to transport large tonnages of iron ore from the same area.

H. LITHIUM

General

217. Deposits of lepidolite and petalite exist at Bikita with 3.6 to 10 per cent of lithium oxide content, compared with 1 to 2 per cent in other fields; these deposits are considered to be among the largest in the world. Other deposits occur in the Salisbury, Umtali and Wankie areas, although their exploitation has remained very limited. Reserves are estimated at 5.9 million tons, averaging 2.8 per cent of lithium oxide.

218. The Territory is the largest producer of lithium ores in the world. A downward trend in production since 1957 was reversed in 1963 and 1964. Owing to rising demands and a steadily increasing market for lithium materials, full-scale operations were resumed at the Bikita Mine. Total output in 1964 was 67,100 tons (valued at £463,000) as against 49,600 tons (valued £328,000) in 1963, an increase of almost 50 per cent. Total world production is more than 112,000 tons, and Southern Rhodesian lithium makes up more than half of this total.

219. All production of lithium ores is exported. In 1964, exports increased by 35 per cent, and their value by 41 per cent. These increases are due to a steady rise in demand for lithium chemicals, in the United States, Europe and in Japan.

Bikita Minerals (Pvt.) Ltd.

220. Virtually the only producer of lithium is Bikita Minerals (Pvt.) Ltd., in the Fort Victoria mining district. In 1963, the board of directors of the company consisted of Mr. A. F. Holmes (South Africa) (Chairman), Mr. A. C. Beatty (United Kingdom), Mr. T. H. Bradford (United Kingdom), Mr. J. Bryn (South Africa) and Mr. D. Lawrie (South Africa).

221. In 1954 Bikita Mines Ltd., and American Potash and Chemicals Corp. jointly formed a company, American Lithium Chemicals Inc., for the manufacture of lithium chemicals from Bikita ore. The plant of this company is near San Antonio, Texas, in the United States.

222. The shareholders of Bikita Minerals include Selection Trust Ltd. (40 per cent owned directly), Treselca Ltd., American Metal Climax Inc., and American Potash and Chemical Corp.

I. TIN

223. The most important tin field is at Kamativi. Output of tin has increased in the last few years, mainly because of a build-up in world demand. While 558 tons of tin metal were marketed for £436,000 in 1963, a total output of 573 tons was sold for £624,000 in 1964. Over 90 per cent of the total production is exported. In November 1964 it was reported that more tin ore had been discovered in the area of Kamativi and that several prospectors had gone there to open up new claims.

Kamativi Tin Mines Ltd.

224. This company was incorporated in Bulawayo in 1951. Its property includes tinbearing areas near Dett, some forty miles east of Wankie. The company's authorized capital was increased from £700,000 to £3 million in 1956. In 1964, the board of directors was as follows: Mr. Ph. H. A. Zaalberg (Netherlands), Chairman, Mr. H. Ebbinge (Netherlands), Mr. H. P. Oakes, Mr. B. H. G. Sparrow, and Mr. J. W. M. Bellasis.

225. Kamativi Tin Mines Ltd. is the main producer of tin in the Territory. Output in 1963 was 510,000 tons of ore, of which 72 per cent came from open-cast operations. Concentrates are treated at the Company's smelter, where refined tin, solders and white metals are produced. The amounts of tin produced by the Company in 1962, including concentrates purchased from small mines, were as follows:

	In lb.
Concentrates smelted	2,148,003
Refined tin produced	1,520,989
Solder produced	218,500
White metal produced	20,000

226. The Kamativi plant is capable of treating 1,000 tons of ore a day, with a possibility of expansion to 5,000 tons. The aim of the company is to produce enough tin to satisfy the needs of the whole of southern Africa and market the surplus in overseas markets. To this end, the company has carried out active prospecting and has recently completed the second stage of a three-year expansion programme costing £500,000.

V. SECONDARY INDUSTRY

INTRODUCTION

227. The considerable increase in gross production^u of Southern Rhodesia's secondary industry from just prior to the Second World War, when there were a few food processing and other plants until the early 1960s when it began to level off, was achieved despite handicaps including an untrained labour force, the absence of a harbour, the high cost of transport and a small market.

228. A census of manufacturing has been held annually, except in 1964 and 1960, since 1938. The following table indicates the growth of the manufacturing sector of the economy for the period 1938 to 1962:

Year	Number of units	Gross output £ thousand	Net output £ thousand
1938	299	5,107	2,332
1948	473	25,858	10,906
1958	973	109,194	44,661
1962	1,043	148,704	59,630

229. The consumer prices index increased nearly two and a half times between 1939 and 1962.

230. Since the end of the Second World War, manufacturing activities have developed at a remarkable pace^v and are now substantial contributors to money incomes and employment. The most striking expansion has been in the production of the cheaper varieties of consumer goods, such as clothing, textiles, footwear and the processing of food products, as well as in heavier industries such as the metal, iron and steel industries.

231. The following table^w gives a detailed breakdown of production figures in the manufacturing sector in 1962:

A. PRINCIPAL INDUSTRIES AND SOME OF THE COMPANIES OPERATING WITHIN THEM

Tobacco manufactures

232. The fact that domestic consumption provides a market for only 4 per cent of the country's tobacco production emphasizes the vital necessity of export markets to the industry. There is hardly any British capital in the tobacco plantations, but Imperial Tobacco has a stake estimated at up to £4 million in processing and other facilities; Gallaher is reported to be putting £500,000 into a new threshing floor, British-American Tobacco has a cigarette factory in Salisbury, and Rothman's Tobacco has been listed as having holdings in the Territory.* There are also a number of smaller British tobacco merchants there. Gallaher Ltd. reported net profits for 1964 at £8,742,000 (£8,448,000), after paying more than £9.9 million in taxation (£9.2 million).† A final dividend of 14 per cent was to be paid on capital increased by a one-for-ten scrip issue, making 18.54 per cent (16 per cent) and taking just over £4 million. The carry-forward was nearly £2.6 million. The Company has also reported a profit before tax for the first six months of 1965 at £9.7 million* against £8.2 million for the corresponding period of 1964.

233. In June, Gallahers opened a new £500,000 tobacco-processing plant,^{aa} the largest in the Southern hemisphere in Salisbury. The plant is designed to separate the tobacco leaf from the stem, an operation previously done by hand.

234. B.A.T. Central Africa Ltd.,^{bb} formerly The Rhodesian and Nyasaland Tobacco Co. Ltd. authorized and issued £1.5 million in 6 million shares of 5/- each. The company was incorporated on 29 March 1920 as Tobacco Development Co. (Rhodesia) Ltd., and has changed its name from time to time. Originally its activities were confined to leaf tobacco until in 1944 the company purchased a factory for the manufacture of cigarettes and pipe tobacco in Salisbury. Production in a new factory started in 1953. The company, which is associated with British-American Tobacco Ltd., is now conducting its operations in Central Africa through wholly owned subsidiaries which have been established in Malawi, Zambia and Rhodesia. Carlton Cigarette Company became a fellow-subsiary in 1963. On 30 September 1964 the total shareholders' funds amounted to £3,486,239 while fixed assets and goodwill was £1,997,287. The Chairman was Mr. E. C. L. Cordy.

235. Rothman of Pall Mall (Rhodesia) Ltd. was registered on 20 September 1960 and commenced the manufacture of cigarettes in April 1961.^{cc} The company owns all the shares of Rhodesia Cigarette Distributors (Pvt.) Ltd., which commenced trading on 1 November 1961. It has an authorized capital of £1 million in 3.6 million shares and 400,000 deferred shares of 5/- each. It has issued £0.5 million in 1,600,000 ordinary shares and the 400,000 deferred shares. Its total shareholders' funds on 30 June 1964 amounted to £472,031, its current liabilities stood at £1,288,706 and its combined assets at £1,759,699. The Chairman of the directors is the Honourable Geoffrey Ellman-Brown.

Textile and clothing manufacturing

236. The spinning mills at Gatooma were first established by the Government around 1943 as an insurance for the local production of cotton. Of the bales of lint produced, some two thirds are absorbed by the local manufacturing industry, which also imports about 4,000,000 pounds of rayon staple fibre annually. The yarn produced from these materials supplies about twenty-five factories, manufacturing a variety of bleached and plain-dyed cloths in calico, drill, twill and denim; blankets, carpets, towels and towelling, twine, cordage and knitwear. Besides Gatooma, the industry is also located in Bulawayo, Salisbury and Gwelo.

237. In 1955, the textile industry had sixteen establishments with a gross output of £5.65 million and employed 5,739 people. In 1963 there were twenty-six establishments with a gross output of £9.57 million, and employed 6,412 persons. In 1964, the value of exports was £7.4 million, of which £5.5 million went to Zambia and Malawi. The British cotton textile concern, David Whitehead and Sons (Holdings) has announced an extension to its production in Rhodesia by November 1966.^{dd} New mills are being built now in Gatooma.

238. Rhodesia has about 150 separate garment factories with a total gross output reaching the £20 million mark annually. Rhodesia has recently concluded a trade agreement with the Republic of South Africa which is likely to absorb losses of trade with Zambia which are anticipated.^{ee} The immediate future was reported likely to see many South African garment manufacturers opening up satellite factories in Rhodesia, where there are the advantages of lower factory costs and particularly favourable conditions for the unrestricted import of fabrics. The nearby Democratic Republic of the Congo, Malawi and Zambia are among the most valuable buyers. Clothing exports in 1964 totalled £7 million.

239. Gatooma Textiles Limited^{ff} was registered in Rhodesia in August 1944. It has an authorized capital of £250,000 in shares of £1 each. It has issued £100,000 in shares of £1 each. In addition to the mill buildings, plant and machinery, office and trading stores, the company owns approximately a thousand acres of land. There are houses and sports facilities including a swimming pool and tennis court for the European staff, and 250 brick houses in the African compound as well as a school, recreation hall and sports field. Sales declined in 1962 and the company has been developing some new lines. As of 31 March 1964 the total shareholders' funds amounted to £264,894, current liabilities stood at £33,937 and total assets £298,831. The Chairman of the directors was Mr. John Francis Conway.

Cement manufacturing

240. The major producers of limestone and cement have been the Premier Portland Cement Company (Rhodesia) Ltd. (Associated with a South African company, Pretoria Portland Cement Co.) and Rhodesia Cement Ltd. In 1963 the two companies merged their cement business on a fifty-fifty basis into a new company, United Portland Cement Co. (Pvt.) Ltd. (UNICEM). Limestone deposits controlled by Premier Portland include the following: Gomla and Gorge in the Urumgwe Native Reserve; Mbubu in the Maremba Native Reserve; Albany and Hashu near Gwelo; Belingwe and Shabani; Paignton and Cleveland at Colleen Bawn in the Gwanda District. Rhodesia Cement was formed in 1946 to develop limestone deposits on the farm Copthall Block No. 2, Gwanda District and establish a cement factory.

241. The new company has an authorized capital of £2 million, divided into 2 million shares with a nominal value of £1 each. These shares were issued fully paid to Premier and Rhodesia Cement in equal proportions. In return for the issue of 1,000,000 fully paid £1 shares in UNICEM, Premier transferred to UNICEM its fixed assets employed in the company's cement and lime making operations plus ancillary equipment and its limestone deposits in Southern Rhodesia. Similarly, in return for the issue to Rhodesia Cement of one million fully paid £1 shares in UNICEM, Rhodesia Cement (a) transferred to UNICEM the company's fixed assets employed in its cement and lime manufacturing activities plus its limestone deposits and certain other rights in Southern Rhodesia; and (b) provided £222,000 in cash to UNICEM. UNICEM now owns the limestone deposits worked by both companies. The deposit worked by Rhodesia Cement is owned by The Gwelo Land and Minerals Co. (Pvt.) Ltd., and leased to Rhodesia Cement. Agreement was reached whereby UNICEM acquired from Gwelo Land, for £222,000, the land containing this deposit and the £222,000 cash provided by Rhodesia Cement were used for this purpose. The royalties paid to Gwelo Land by the Rhodesia Cement had, during the last ten years, averaged over £11,000 per annum.

242. The board of directors consists of ten members, five of whom are nominated by the Premier and five by Rhodesia Cement. In 1963, the first Chairman of the board was Mr. M. H. Barry (Southern Rhodesia), (former Chairman of Premier Cement) and the first Vice-Chairman was Mr. L. A. Levy (Southern Rhodesia) (former Chairman of Rhodesia Cement).

243. The following tables show the consolidated accounts of UNICEM after the merger in 1963:

LIABILITIES (£)

	Capital	Reserves	Shareholders' funds		Bank overdraft	Creditors	Total
			Total	Per share
1963	2,000,000	—	2,000,000	20/-	1,051,400	106,000	3,157,400

ASSETS (£)

	Fixed assets	Investments	Stocks and stores	Debtors	Cash	Total current assets
1963	2,484,826	36,907	635,667	—	—	635,667

244. The other producers of limestone and cement in 1963 were as follows:

(a) The Salisbury Portland Cement Co. Ltd.: it is connected with the group of the Associated Portland Cement Manufactures in the United Kingdom. Its cement plant is at Manreso near Salisbury;

(b) Early Worm Mining (Pvt.) Ltd.: it produces high grade metallurgical and agricultural limestone at Postal Bay 3, Concession;

(c) Essexvale Lime Works (Pvt.) Ltd. at Essexvale. Its output was 4,800 tons in 1960;

(d) G.B.N. (Limestone) (Pvt.) Ltd. at Wankie. Its output of metallurgical limestone was 1,900 tons in 1960;

(e) Lomagundi Water Boring and Mining (Pvt.) Ltd. at Sinoia. The company produced 12,000 tons of dolomite in 1961.

Iron and steel

The Rhodesian Iron and Steel Co. Ltd. (RISCO)

245. Only limited surveys of Rhodesia's iron ore reserves have been carried out,^{ss} but five known rich deposits exist and are described at length in section IV above. Rhodesia's demands for steel products have exceeded domestic production and significant quantities of steel have had to be imported from South Africa and the United Kingdom. A steel industry was established by Act of Parliament in 1942 (the Rhodesian Iron and Steel Commission (RISCOM)) and a plant was built at Bulawayo; at the beginning output was confined to production from scrap iron. The Commission next acquired the haematite deposits near Que Que in the Gwelo District, and in 1947 built at Redcliffe the first furnace to smelt iron ore in Southern Rhodesia; the plant came into operation in 1948.

246. The early ore extracted was primarily to meet the demands of the Que Que plant which was producing pig-iron and steel products, nearly all marketed in Southern and Northern Rhodesia. Output of the Que Que plant and of the old Bulawayo plant was 15,200 short tons of finished steel and 30,500 tons of pig-iron in 1949; it rose to 22,300 tons and 39,500 tons respectively in 1953. However, RISCOM's operations were incurring losses. The Southern Rhodesian Government intervened with grants. A commission of inquiry reported that the accumulated losses of £1 million should be written off. It was decided to subsidize the industry at the rate of £150,000 a year. In 1956 the Government negotiated with a consortium of financial houses in the United Kingdom to subscribe £6 million in order to reorganize the industry, and at the beginning of 1957, the Rhodesian Iron and Steel Co. Ltd., (RISCO) took over from the Southern Rhodesian Government the assets of RISCOM. There are many international shareholders in this company including the British companies of Lancashire Steel and Stewarts and Lloyds, and Anglo-American Corporation, Rhodesia Selection Trust, British South Africa Co., Messina (Transvaal) Development Co., and Tanganyika Concessions.^{hh}

247. The assets of the Government Iron and Steel Commission were valued at £4.3 million (excluding the Redcliffe European Township) for which the Government took up shares and stock in the Company. The present value of assets is at £13 million.

248. The initial issued ordinary share capital amounted to £3.1 million. In 1963, the authorized capital was £4.5 million in £1 shares. A total of £3.75 million was subscribed and fully paid. The Messina (Transvaal) Development Co. Ltd., held 850,000 ordinary shares of £1 each, £500,000 subscribed in cash and £350,000 allotted fully paid, partly for the purchase of the Bukwe iron ore deposits. The proved and probable iron ore reserves at Bukwe which have been disclosed to date amount to 134.5 million tons averaging over 60 per cent iron content. Messina also received £250,000 in cash, and for a period of ninety-nine years a royalty of 6d per ton on all iron ore mined from Bukwe is to be collected by it.

249. The directors consisted of Mr. E. S. Newson (Southern Rhodesia) (Chairman), Mr. D. R. Haysom (South Africa), Mr. P. H. A. Brownrigg (Zambia),ⁱⁱ Mr. T. P. M. Cooran (Southern Rhodesia), Commander H. F. P. Grenfell (United Kingdom), Mr. P. E. Holloway (Southern Rhodesia), Mr. W. N. Menzies-Wilson (South Africa), and Mr. L. Tucker (Southern Rhodesia).

250. In 1956 RISCO initiated a programme of expansion designed to increase production to 150,000 tons of ingot steel, at a capital cost of £8 million, which was later increased to £10 million by the addition of a sheet-rolling mill and other smaller items. The plants now comprise three blast furnaces producing an average output of 900 tons of hot metal daily, two open-hearth furnaces and an electric furnace (together capable of producing nearly 500 tons of ingot steel per day) a blooming mill, a twenty-one-inch heavy section mill and a twelve-ten-inch merchant mill. Also included are gas holders, a gas cleaning plant, a battery of fifty coke-ovens and a by-products plant producing tar and benzol.

251. Today, the RISCO steel works produces basic and foundry grades of pig-iron, steel billets for re-rolling and forging; round, square and flat bars; angles, channels and special sections; round and square reinforcing rods; casting of all types, and forgings to engineers' specifications.^{jj}

252. Production of pig-iron now is at the average rate of 1,000 tons a day. The output of finished steel products is around 120,000 tons per annum. Steel ingots produced in 1962 weighed 97,000 tons. About 65,000 tons of RISCO products were consumed each year in the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland before its dissolution. Exports of pig-iron were valued at £2,756,000 in 1963, and of iron and steel ingots at £6,000. The Rhodesian Steel Sales Company are the distributors for RISCO products.

253. Apparently, the most serious problem concerning the plant is its location. The steel works are situated on a narrow gap, surrounded by large hills on three sides and a river on the fourth. The plant lay-out has been such that it has placed the upper limit of its expansion at about 150,000 tons, so that any expansion beyond this level would probably have to take place on a new site.

254. Another basic problem is the relatively high cost of production, bearing in mind the low cost of the raw material and labour. Although the cost of the Rhodesian-made product is lower than that of imports, it is much higher than the potential costs under large-scale production. These costs would probably continue as long as output remained comparatively low. This is, of course, generally true in most branches of manufacturing in Rhodesia. It should be noted that thousands of tons of steel used at Kariba come from Redcliffe.

255. In July 1964, it was reported that the Rhodesia Iron and Steel Company was considering plans to increase the sale of pig-iron from the present rate of 225,000 tons a year to 665,000 and eventually to 1 million tons a year. At the annual meeting of RISCO held at Redcliffe on 22 June 1965, it was stated that the decision to go ahead with the expansion programme had been taken "after the necessary assurances of suitable long-term markets had been secured overseas". The programme would cost approximately £7 million and take place over a period of two and a half years.^{kk} It was felt that although 1966 might be a year of trade recession, by the time the expansion was completed, the recession would have been overcome.

256. The Southern Rhodesian Minister of Commerce and Industry was reported to have stated in June 1965 in this connexion that it would only be a forerunner of a really large iron and steel industry which had the prospect of supplying world markets with substantial quantities of steel because of its competitive position. Iron ore production would include an additional 800,000 tons. The second stage of the expansion programme would be completed by 1972 and the total expenditure would be £13 to £14 million.

257. At the same meeting, the chairman reported that the Company had made a net profit of £496,566 for the year ended 31 December 1964, compared with a loss of £242,125 the previous twelve-month period.¹¹ The Company's operations for 1964 reflected a profit on trading and manufacturing of £1,727,296, an increase of £829,618 over the previous year. The net profit, available for appropriation, was arrived at by deducting depreciation, interest and other expenses and adjustments in respect of non-recurring items. The material improvement, said the report, was attributable to the operation of the plant throughout the year at virtually 100 per cent capacity, to the closing down of the Sheet and Plate Mill and to improved operating techniques and procedures.

258. RISCO reported a net profit for the first half of 1965 of about £450,000, almost as much as for the entire year of 1964.^{mm}

259. At the request of the Rhodesian Government a mission from a major Japanese steel company, Kobe Steel Works, visited Buchwa and Wankie recently to study the feasibility of building new steel mills at Buchwa in the Ingesi District whose deposits have a maximum iron content of 64 per cent. The possibility of building pelletizing plants at the Buchwa Mine was also studied.

Ferro-chrome

Rhodesian Alloys (Private) Ltd.

260. Rhodesian Alloys was started with the purpose of producing low carbon ferro-chrome, a vital raw material for special alloy steels.ⁿⁿ The decision to erect a refinery at Gwelo, virtually in the centre of Southern Rhodesia, was taken late in 1949. It would be situated on the main railway connexion from the Wankie Collieries, close to the chrome deposits and on the main lines to the ports, then Beira and later Lourenço Marques. The scheme as a whole was sponsored by John Brown and Co. Ltd., the British South Africa Company and Rhodesian Anglo-American Corporation. Construction work started in 1951 with substantial completion in 1953.

261. The Rhodesian Minister of Commerce and Industry, Mr. G. W. Rudland, has stated^{oo} that the conversion of chrome ore into alloys had probably the greatest future of any industry in Rhodesia. He believes that in ten or fifteen years the industry's expansion will become equivalent to what the Copperbelt is to Zambia—and all because of fairly cheap power from Kariba.

262. Low carbon ferro-chrome is produced by electric smelting in large arc furnaces in which the electrodes are of the Soderberg type. Rhodesian Alloys employs the Perrin Process of the Société d'électro-Chimie, d'électro-métallurgie et des aciéries électriques d'Ugine.

263. Low carbon ferro-chrome smelting operation consumes large quantities of energy and although Rhodesian Alloys operated originally on electricity thermally generated from Wankie coal, it now relies on the Kariba Dam for its energy.

264. Recent production figures have shown a rise in its value to the country to £2.2 million annually.^{pp} Rhodesia Alloys produces 17,000 tons of ferro-alloys annually and exports the low carbon ferro-chrome to the United Kingdom, the Republic of South Africa, Canada, the United States and Australia.

world's lowest-cost producers was recently announced by Rhodesian Alloys. Three additional furnaces would be installed at the company's Gwelo plant. The whole scheme would take between twenty months and two years to complete.

266. John Brown and Co. Ltd., which owns 48 per cent of the capital of Rhodesian Alloys Ltd., and 50 per cent of the equity and 72 per cent of the preference of F. Issels and Son Ltd., Bulawayo, reported^{rr} group profits after tax for the year ending 31 March 1965 at £1,947,035 (£1,278,217). Ordinary dividends of 11 per cent less tax took £860,776. The amounts carried forward were nearly £1.5 million by the parent company and £4.9 million by the many subsidiaries. Issued capital is £15.5 million. Group fixed assets exceed £18.4 million, investments total £2.8 million, and current assets less current liabilities £16.5 million. Debentures £4 million. Lord Aberconway is the Chairman of the directors.

Motor car industry

267. The leading share in the market^{ss} is held by the Ford Motor Company of Rhodesia, which has a £1.5 million assembly plant at Salisbury. This plant^{tt} is a subsidiary of Ford of Canada. The Company aims at a production rate of 27 units a day which has not yet been achieved, although more than 10,000 cars have come off its assembly line. The needs of the local market have been met, but there has been no stockpiling of new cars. Local content in Rhodesian-assembled cars has been substantial and includes tires (inter alia, Dunlop Rubber Co.), glass made in Umtali, paint and batteries.

268. Two other car manufacturers are Rootes (Central Africa) Ltd., and the Rover Company. The latter leads the field in producing tough four-wheel drive "bush" vehicles.

269. Rootes were reported to be getting ready to assemble in their Salisbury factory commercial vehicles for the Chrysler group of the United States.^{uu} In the first year, it was expected that about ninety vehicles, representing a turnover of £100,00 would be handled.

270. Dunlop Rubber Co. Ltd., which has a factory in Rhodesia, reported net profits after tax for 1964 at £8,244,000 (£6,506,000).^{vv} The distribution was raised from 1s. ½d. to 1s. 7d. per 10s. share.

Pipeline and refinery

271. Significant progress was made in March 1965, when the Feruka Refinery, known as the Central African Petroleum Refineries (CAPREF) near Umtali, was opened.^{ww} Small by world standards, it is a highly complex unit with fourteen different processes. Costing about £8 million, it was sponsored by Shell, British Petroleum, Mobil, Caltex, Total, the American Independent Oil Co. (Aminoil) and the Kuwait National Petroleum Company. Principals of the five marketing companies in Rhodesia (the first five named) have put up 80 per cent of the capital and supply 80 per cent of the crude product on a percentage basis equal to the value of purchases by their local companies of the refined product. Aminoil and Kuwait NPC hold 20 per cent of the equity and supply 20 per cent of the crude. The main contractors of the pipeline were The Hume Pipe Co. (South Africa) Ltd.^{xx}

272. Work on the plant at Feruka, about twelve miles from the Rhodesian-Mozambique border, began in May 1963, about the same time as work began on the $4 million, 179-mile pipeline which feeds the refinery from Beira. When fully loaded, the pipeline has a capacity of approximately 3.5 million gallons. The pumping station delivers about 600,000 gallons a day, but by 1971 it was planned that two more would be built and 1.5 million gallons a day would be deliverable. Distribution is the responsibility of each of the five marketing companies and is made by rail from Feruka to individual company depots through Rhodesia and Zambia, Lonrho Ltd., a multifarious British concern, was responsible for laying the pipeline.

B. ASSOCIATION OF RHODESIAN INDUSTRIES (ARNI)

273. The membership of the Association of Rhodesian Industries is made up of manufacturing firms who are normally required to join their local Chambers of Industry. The ARNI constitution provides for individual firms to join as direct members. Various manufacturers' associations are affiliated members of ARNI. In addition, non-manufacturing firms having a vital interest in Rhodesia's industrial activity (banks, mining groups, industrial consultants), may be admitted as industrial members.

274. ARNI has its own secretariat. Much of its time is taken up with personal service to individual industrialists, which includes such matters as the submission of applications for tariff protection; rebates and suspension of duties; application for dumping duties and for import and export permits; information and advice on export markets and the location of suitable agents; investigation of trade licensing problems; interpretation of labour and other regulations; location of sources of raw materials; investigation of railway problems, etc. The secretariat is on constant call to government departments, local representatives of foreign governments, municipalities and other institutions.

C. ASSOCIATION OF CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE OF RHODESIA

(ACCOR)

275. The principal aims of ACCOR which is comprised of eleven individual chambers: Bindura, Bulawayo, Fort Victoria, Gatooma, Gwelo, Hartley, Kuroi, Que Que, Salisbury and Umtali, is "to maintain an atmosphere in which business people can operate at a profit and without unnecessary Governmental control—an atmosphere in which private enterprise can flourish and in which it is able to meet the needs of a growing population and provide jobs for a growing labour force," as well as "to keep the economy dynamic and expanding and to encourage self-reliance and individual initiative. ACCOR does not favour calling on Government for assistance or special treatment. Rather, it seeks to ensure that Government does not frustrate private enterprise in its endeavours to help itself".

D. TRANSPORT AND POWER

276. The three remaining heritages of the Federation, the railways, Central African Airways and Kariba Dam's power stations, are statutory bodies partly owned by the individual Governments and controlled by higher authorities on which the Governments are represented.

278. It will be noted that as regards imports, exports to Zambia and Malawi and re-exports, the figures for the years 1954 to 1963 inclusive are not available because trade figures were kept for the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland as a whole and no records were kept of movements between the component territories comprising the Federation.

279. During 1964, Southern Rhodesia had a favourable visible balance of trade of £34.9 million. For the first six months of 1965, the favourable visible trade balance was £13.9 million, an improvement of some 60 per cent over the figure of £8.1 million recorded for the same period in 1964

290. Zambia's dependence on its trade with Southern Rhodesia is illustrated by the fact that in 1964 39.41 per cent of total imports came from that Territory. Electric energy and coal are particularly vital elements in Zambia's economy, for both of which commodities it relies almost exclusively on Southern Rhodesia.

291. The pattern of trade between Southern Rhodesia and Zambia for 1965 shows an increase of imports during the early months of that year. Exports from Southern Rhodesia to Zambia from January-March in 1964 and 1965 were valued at £5,765,000 and £7,906,000, respectively. The imports from Zambia also increased from £886,000 in January-March 1964 to £1,035,000 in January-March 1965.

South Africa

292. The third most important single market for Southern Rhodesia is South Africa; Southern Rhodesia, however, has a considerable unfavourable visible balance of trade with that country. The following table gives details of trade:

Imports		£ million

293. The pattern of trade of Southern Rhodesia with South Africa for the first three months of 1965 shows an increase over the 1964 figures. In January-March 1965, Southern Rhodesia imported from South Africa goods to the value of £6,383,000, compared with £5,694,000 during the same period last year.

294. In January-March 1965, the exports amounted to £2,566,000 compared with £1,713,000 during the same period last year.

Malawi

295. Southern Rhodesia had a favourable trade balance with Malawi of £5.6 million in 1964 mainly on the basis of exports of manufactured goods. Malawi drew 39.1 per cent of its total imports from Rhodesia. Although exports from Malawi to Southern Rhodesia were only a very small proportion of Southern Rhodesia's imports, they represented 13.9 per cent of Malawi's total exports. The following table gives details of trade:

United States of America

296. In 1964 Southern Rhodesia had an adverse balance of trade with the United States of £3,404,000, with imports from the United States amounting to £7,426,000 or 6.77 per cent of the total value of imports and exports to the United States amounting to £4,022,000 or 2.78 per cent of the total value of exports, including re-exports.

297. The pattern of trade between Southern Rhodesia and the United States showed a small decrease in the first three months of 1965.

298. The imports from the United States in January-March 1964 amounted to £1,578,000 and £1,492,000 in January-March 1965. The exports of Southern Rhodesia to the United States in January-March 1964 amounted to £905,000 as compared with £654,000 for the same period in 1965.

Federal Republic of Germany

299. The following table shows details of trade with the Federal Republic of Germany, which took 40.8 per cent of Southern Rhodesia's exports to Western Europe and from which Southern Rhodesia obtained 29.1 per cent of its imports from that region:

Imports	£ million
Machinery and transport equipment	1.6
Chemicals (mainly fertilizer)	1.3
Other imports	1.4
TOTAL IMPORTS	4.3

Japan

300. Southern Rhodesia's trade with Japan shows a small favourable balance, which amounted in 1964 to £1,104,000. Exports to Japan in 1964 amounted to £5,583,000 or 3.86 per cent of the total value of exports, including re-exports, and imports amounted to £4,399,000 or 4.01 per cent of the total value of imports.

301. Southern Rhodesian trade with Japan consists mainly of importing Japanese consumer goods and exporting tobacco and minerals, chiefly iron ore. The high iron content and the competitive price of Southern Rhodesian ore have attracted Japanese buyers, especially since the Rhodesian export ore is a high-grade haematite with a low phosphorus content. In general, it has an iron content of 60 per cent and upwards.^{yy} The following table gives details of trade:

302. The pattern of trade for the first three months of 1965, compared with the first three months of 1964 shows an increase in imports from Japan and a decrease in exports to Japan. In January-March 1964 Southern Rhodesia imports from Japan amounted to £1,023,000 and in January-March 1965 to £1,353,000. In January-March 1964 Southern Rhodesia exported to Japan £1,165,000 worth of goods, as compared with £952,000 for the same period in 1965.

Mozambique

303. Trade between Southern Rhodesia and Mozambique is not substantial. Because of the importance of Mozambique to the communications of Southern Rhodesia and of the fact that the greater part of its foreign trade passes through Mozambique, some details of the trade between the two Territories are given below:

Imports

304. The importance of Mozambique as a channel of trade for Southern Rhodesia increased early in 1965 with the entry into operation of the oil pipeline from Beira to Umtali.

VII. LABOUR

A. LABOUR LEGISLATION

General

305. Industrial conditions are governed by a wide range of legislation. The most important statute of general application is the Industrial Conciliation Act (Cap. 246) of 1959, as amended, which establishes procedures for negotiation, conciliation and arbitration of all matters affecting employment in most industries, trades and occupations. Some of the legislation, such as the Masters and Servants Act (Cap. 247) of 1901, as amended, and the Africans (Urban Areas) Accommodation and Registration Act (Cap. 110) of 1951, is applicable to or affects only Africans.

Industrial conciliation(a) Procedures

306. The first Industrial Conciliation Act, which came into effect in 1934, recognized the principle of collective bargaining by providing for the creation of national and local industrial councils representing employers and employees. Trade unions and employers' organizations were entitled to be registered under the Act. Africans were not included within the scope of the Act; their wage rates were fixed, in certain circumstances, by proclamation of the Governor. These proclamations, which were made at the request of the industrial councils, protected the high level of non-African wages.

307. A second Industrial Conciliation Act, which came into effect in 1945, established procedures for conciliation, mediation and arbitration. Under specified conditions, the agreement reached by an industrial council, in which African labour was unrepresented, could be made applicable to Africans within certain municipalities. In general, the conditions of employment of Africans were governed by the Native Labour Boards Act of 1947, which established a National Labour Board and two Regional Labour Boards; the Boards were designed to prevent and settle disputes between employers and African employees. They made recommendations to the Government concerning the minimum conditions for African workers. In practice, the regulations made under the Act were applicable primarily to Africans employed in municipal and town-management areas. A new policy was inaugurated, with the passage of a new Industrial Conciliation Act in 1959, which repealed the Native Labour Boards Act; the Act made Africans and non-Africans subject to the same conciliation procedures.

308. The Industrial Conciliation Act (Cap. 246) of 1959, as amended, is applicable to all industries, trades and occupations with the following exceptions: farming (including forestry); domestic service in private households; and undertakings of the Rhodesia Railways.²² The Industrial Conciliation Act establishes industrial councils for organized industry and industrial boards for industries where an industrial council has not been established.

309. In principle, only registered trade unions and registered employers' organizations are permitted to form an industrial council. On the following conditions a trade union or an employers' organization is entitled to be registered: (i) that the constitution of the union or organization is in conformity with the provisions of the Act; (ii) that the union or organization has not been formed for the purpose of furthering the interests of its members on the basis of race, colour or religion; (iii) that the union or organization has a governing body situated in Southern Rhodesia; and (iv) that the union or organization does not allow its funds or facilities to be used for political purposes. Even if a trade union or employers' organization does not meet the requirements enabling it to be registered, it is not removed from the operation of the Act. Thus, an unregistered union or employers' organization must furnish financial information to the industrial registrar and must not use its funds and facilities to further the interests of political organizations.

310. Only registered trade unions, on the one hand, and registered employers' organizations or employers approved by industrial registrars, on the other, may form a registered industrial council. The industrial council system permits trade unions and employers' organizations to negotiate on all questions affecting conditions of employment; the purpose of the council is to settle or to prevent industrial disputes. An agreement made by a council may cover such matters as: the minimum rate of remuneration including the method of computation of such rate; the special conditions of employment governing women, juveniles or apprentices; contributions to the union, to employers' organization or to a council; the establishment of pensions and sick, unemployment or other insurance funds; and safety and health measures. The agreement reached by a council can be made legally binding by the Minister and can be extended to employers and employees who are not members of the trade union or employers' organization.

311. The act also takes account of those industries for which no industrial council has been registered. Industrial boards composed of employer and employee representatives, under a neutral chairman, are established after application by either employer or employee. They may also be established on the instruction of the Minister. On the basis of the recommendations made by industrial boards, enforceable regulations concerning the minimum wage and other conditions of employment are established by the Minister.

312. In case there is no industrial council or industrial board, the Minister is empowered to convene a conciliation board. In general, the procedures and powers of the conciliation board are similar to those of an industrial council.

313. The Act also sets up industrial courts to hear appeals from administrative decisions and, in certain circumstances, to act as an arbitration court.

314. An industrial council, conciliation board or the Minister may decide that voluntary arbitration is necessary to settle a dispute and in that case a mediator, or umpire, may be appointed. Compulsory arbitration can be ordered in the following cases: when a dispute arises concerning certain public utilities; when the industrial council fails to come to an agreement governing the conditions of employment; when there is no agreement by the parties to accept voluntary mediation; or when voluntary mediation has failed. An award of voluntary or compulsory arbitration is binding on the parties to the dispute.

315. Under the Act, strikes or lockouts are prohibited when a dispute arises in industries furnishing essential services, e.g. light, water, power, or sanitation; and the award of compulsory arbitration is final. Strikes and lockouts are permitted only after all of the conciliation procedures are exhausted; in that event, the employers or employees must notify the Minister, within a specified period, of their intention not to be bound by an award.

(b) Trade unions, employers' organizations, industrial councils and industrial boards

316. Information concerning the number of African trade unions and the extent of their membership, prior to the passage of Industrial Conciliation Act of 1959, is not available. The only African trade union which received statutory recognition was the Rhodesia Railways African Employees Association. Other African workers' organizations earned de facto recognition in dealing with employers, but these organizations had no legal rights concerning collective bargaining. In 1951, there were twenty-two non-African trade unions with a membership of approximately 14,000 persons, registered under the Industrial Conciliation Act of 1945. These non-African unions represented skilled occupations or crafts. Included were: building, engineering, motor, printing, mining artisans, railway workers, meat workers, barbers, shop assistants, bank officials, journalists and municipal workers. During the period of economic expansion, namely 1951-1956, non-African union membership did not increase to any considerable extent. By 1958, the total union membership of registered trade unions was reported at 15,592, among the twenty-seven registered non-African unions.

317. One of the immediate results of the Industrial Conciliation Act of 1959 was the increase in the membership of registered trade unions. By the end of 1960, the membership of such unions rose to 25,251, which represented an increase of approximately 8,000 over the preceding year. Most of the new unions, which were registered under the Act, were predominantly African in membership. According to the report of the Industrial Registrar for the year ended 1963, these unions cater to semi-skilled and unskilled labour, in which Africans are the vast majority. Some of the older European unions, such as those in the mining, printing, explosives and steel industries, have organized along non-racial lines. One union, namely the Southern Rhodesia Catering and Hotel Workers' Union, although originally organized by African employees, admitted about forty European employees immediately after registration in 1962. It would appear, however, that the majority of unions have remained predominantly or exclusively of one race.

318. In 1961, 31 unions, 24 employers' organizations and 18 industrial councils were registered under the Industrial Conciliation Act of 1959. During the same year, 54 separate industrial boards were established to fix the minimum working conditions of various unorganized industries.

319. During the years 1962 and 1963, the number of employers and employees using the procedures of the Industrial Conciliation Act increased. The number of trade unions rose from forty-five in 1962 to fifty-eight in 1963. The number of trade union members increased not only with the establishment of new unions but also because the older trade unions increased their membership by broadening their area of jurisdiction or by representing additional interests of various classes of employees. For instance, in 1962, approximately 45,000 African semi-skilled and unskilled employees in the mining industry were brought within the scope of the existing industrial council for that industry as a result of the extension of the registration of the Associated Mine Workers of Rhodesia. Similarly, the Industrial Councils for the Motor Industry in Matabeleland and Mashonaland extended their areas of jurisdiction to include Midlands and Manicaland.

320. The number of employers' organizations rose from twenty-eight to thirty between 1962 and 1963, while the number of industrial councils increased from twenty-two to twenty-six. It is not clear why the number of employees covered by industrial council agreements did not register a proportionate increase. According to figures released by the Department of Labour and Social Welfare, in the year 1962, 150,000 employees and 5,500 employers were under the jurisdiction of industrial councils. The same source states that at the end of 1963, 115,580 employees were covered by industrial agreements. A similar decline is recorded in the number of employees governed by the employment regulations made by industrial boards. The fifty-four industrial boards made regulations affecting 158,000 employees in 1962. The number of employees covered by such regulations fell to 107,307 in 1963, when the number of boards declined from fifty-four to fifty-three. It is expected that there will be a further decrease in the number of industrial boards as more industries are organized.

Legislation affecting the conditions of African employment

(a) The Masters and Servants Act

321. The Masters and Servants Act (Cap. 247) of 1901, as amended, regulates the employment of persons engaged in handicrafts, or "bodily labour" in domestic service, mining, agriculture, husbandry, trade and manufacture. While the Act covers all types of labourers, it specifically excludes skilled workmen. The Act governs employer and employee relations in sectors which are not generally covered by the Industrial Conciliation Act. In rural areas, it establishes the minimum conditions of employment for Africans on European farms and on small European enterprises. The Act also regulates the conditions of African domestic servants in both urban and rural areas.

322. Part I of the Act, which deals with the contract of service, establishes minimum working standards. If the contract is for a period of one year, it cannot provide for more than 313 working days; in case the contract is for another calendar period, a proportionate number of working days may be stipulated. The contract may not provide for more than ten hours of work per day. In the absence of an express stipulation, wages are payable on the completion of thirty working days. Although no special form of contract is required, every contract must specify the date of commencement of the contract, the period of service and the wages. In cases where the employee is to reside on the premises, unless otherwise stipulated, the employer must provide lodging and food. Unless the parties agree, the employee is not entitled to maintain his family on the premises, but the presence of the employee's wife and family on the employers' premises does not automatically give rise to a claim for their services. Penal sanctions are imposed on the employer and employee for contravention of the provisions of the Act. Thus, if an employee without cause absents himself from his place of work, is intoxicated, is neglectful or disobedient or abusive, he may be found guilty of an offence and liable to a fine. Imprisonment may be ordered in default of payment of the fine. An employer is subject to fine or imprisonment for failure to pay wages, or refusal to deliver the property of a servant. An employee who has served a term of imprisonment or is absent without permission may be required to remain in the service of the employer for the period of the imprisonment or the period of absence. Nothing in the Act, if inconsistent, is to be considered as repealing any existing laws or regulations relating to Africans.

(b) The African Labour Regulations (Identification) Act

323. The African Labour Regulations Act (Cap. 100) of 1911, as amended, was designed to govern "the recruiting and employment of Africans within Southern Rhodesia and for controlling the removal of Africans for employment beyond its borders, to check clandestine African emigration from Southern Rhodesia...". The Act sets up a system for the recruitment of African labour. In addition to recruitment, the Act also regulates conditions of employment on unskilled labour employed in mining, agriculture, African husbandry, trade or manufacture. Domestic servants and skilled workmen are excluded from the scope of the Act.

324. Only the holder of an employer's recruiting licence or someone working on his behalf may recruit African labourers. Assistants to a licensed agent or employer receive remuneration calculated at a "rate per head of Africans recruited". African chiefs and headmen are prohibited from acting, either directly or indirectly, as recruiting agents.

325. The contract of employment must be written and be attested; and proof of a medical examination of the recruited African labourer is also required. If the contract relates to employment outside of the Territory, it must be registered. Expenses for the transfer of Africans from their home to the place of employment are borne by the employer, or in some instances, by the labour agent; such expenses include food, drinking water, fuel, cooking utensils, clothing and blankets.

326. When an employer engages 300 or more African labourers, the Act specifies that he must have a "compound manager" in order to supervise the compound or other accommodation used by his employees. The Act also stipulates that the Minister may prescribe certain areas in which an African may enter; such area may not extend more than twenty-five miles from the border of Southern Rhodesia. Inspectors of African labourers are appointed by the Minister to inquire into and to determine minor contraventions of the regulations on the part of Africans. The inspector also is permitted to bring before a court Africans who violate the provision of the Act.

327. In order to carry out the purposes of the Act, the Governor is authorized to make regulations concerning: the issues, form and surrender of licences; the execution, attestation, registration, enforcement or cancellation of contracts; the return of African labourers who do not possess a valid contract of employment; the recruitment of Africans and their conveyance to labour centres or other destinations; the control of African labourers during their sojourn in native districts; the medical examination and vaccination of African labourers; the proper housing and feeding of labourers; the control of compounds; the quarters for married African labourers; and the establishing of recruiting areas and central bureaus to which all Africans are taken for registration and the practices applicable at such bureaus, before allocation to the prospective employer. The administration of the Act is not uniform throughout the Territory and it is specified that different regulations may be made in regard to different districts or areas.

(c) The Africans (Registration and Identification) Act

328. The Africans (Registration and Identification) Act (Cap. 109) of 1957, as amended, provides that all Africans must be registered and receive a certificate of registration or a registration book. Certain classes of Africans, who are deemed "fit and proper" are entitled to receive an identity card. The possessor of an identity card is relieved of the obligation of holding a certificate of registration, or a registration book. Moreover, he is relieved of complying with any by-law or regulation made by a local authority requiring an African to be in possession of a pass. An employer must demand from his African employee his certificate of registration, registration book or identity card. These documents are endorsed to indicate the employment status of the holder. The endorsement includes such information as the date of commencement of service and the wages paid. Thus, unless the document indicates that the employee has been discharged and is available for further employment, both the employer and employee may be subject to criminal penalties for hiring or being hired, when the African employee is under contract to another. Criminal sanctions are imposed on both Africans and employers and others who violate the provisions of the Act. For example, fines or imprisonment are imposed for failure on the part of an African to be in possession or to produce the proper documents. Similarly, an employer who, on the termination of the contract, refuses to grant a proper discharge at the request of an African is liable to penal sanctions.

(d) The Africans (Urban Areas) Accommodation and Registration Act

329. The Africans (Urban Areas) Accommodation and Registration Act (Cap. 110) of 1951, as amended, was enacted "to make provision for employers to provide free accommodation for their African servants and certain wives of such servants and for purposes connected herewith, and for regulation and control by local authorities of Africans seeking employment in or visiting local authority area". The Act is in force in six municipalities in the Territory.

330. Under part I of the Act, a local authority area may be declared a "designated area" by the Governor. In a designated area the employer must provide accommodation, at his own expense, to an African employee. The accommodation is either in "a licensed private premise" or in an "African residential area" (an African township or any location so designated under the Native Urban Locations Act). A licensed premise forms part of the premises occupied by the employer and must meet the standards specified in the Act. An African employee may also be accommodated in an "African village settlement" (an African township established under the Land Apportionment Act) and in that case, the employee pays a portion of the rent. When the employee is accommodated in an African residential area, the employer is required to pay rent to the local authority. The rent is the same whether the employee is married or single. If the employee's wages are higher than that which is prescribed by law, he is obliged to contribute a specified portion of his wages for his accommodation in an African residential area.

331. Under part II, a local authority area may be designated a "proclaimed area" if the Governor is satisfied that the authority has set aside an "African township" (an area so designated under the Land Apportionment Act). In an African residential area the local authority must purchase or erect and maintain a hostel for the accommodation of Africans seeking employment or visiting the local authority area.

332. In connexion with proclaimed areas, the local authority is required to keep a statutory account known as the African Reserve Account. Into this account must be paid all rents and other revenues derived from the management and administration of such area or areas. The account is chargeable with the costs of services rendered by the local authority to such area or any hostel maintained therein or other services for the welfare of the inhabitants.

333. Most of the above-cited legislation has been subject to criticism by the Government Departments administering them or by Government Commissions examining the effects of their implementation. For example, when the Africans (Registration and Identification) Bill was introduced, the Minister indicated that the Act did not make the necessary provisions regarding the easing of urban pass control, which the Division for Native Affairs had requested. The Report of the Urban African Affairs Commission of 1958 indicated that the registration system was not operating effectively in any large urban centres. The Commission concluded that the Act could not be implemented efficiently without adding staff costs and "without in effect creating an administrative and police mechanism which would be destructive to personal liberty". The Commission received evidence that the constant obligation to be in possession of identity documents is a cause of frustration and irritation to law-abiding Africans. On the other hand, some persons used documents to escape criminal detection. The Commission endorsed the view expressed by Dr. Sheila van der Horst in her article on "Equal Pay for Equal Work" in which she stated: "We are creating an administrative network and turning into law breakers and statutory criminals many of those who simply seek a livelihood". Similar views were expressed in 1961 by the Commission Appointed to Inquire into and Report on Administrative and Judicial Functions in the Native Affairs and District Courts Departments. The Commission noted that Africans who were arrear in taxes often destroyed their registration certificates or identity cards and received duplicate documents which did not state their tax delinquencies.

334. The African (Urban Areas) Accommodation and Registration Act has also been criticized as being ineffectual. The Secretary of Native Affairs and Chief Native Commissioner in his report to the Legislative Assembly in 1958 stated:

"However well intentioned the legislature was in passing this Act it has not fulfilled its purpose and in most towns there is a demand by Natives for housing. The extent of the unsatisfied backlog varies in seriousness from place to place."

The Secretary for Local Government and Housing, who is now charged with administering the Act, in his report to the Legislative Assembly in 1963 stated:

"There is a growing feeling in many quarters that in the light of present conditions extensive amendments to this Act are necessary—if not its repeal and substitution for new legislation. The question of the consolidation of rent allowances with wages is still under consideration by the Ministry of Labour."

B. WAGES

335. The Industrial Conciliation Act of 1959 is not applicable to agricultural workers and those in domestic service. In 1963, it was estimated that 356,590 persons were employed in these sectors. Of the estimated remaining 339,410 employees who were engaged in other sectors, 222,187 were covered by the wage-fixing apparatus of the Act. It is difficult to assess the effects of the Act on the wage structure of the Territory, because since its passage wages have increased in sectors which are included within the scope of the Act, as well as those excluded. However, as will be indicated below, in the field of private domestic services, and in the agricultural sector (in regard to Africans) the rate of increase in wages has been slower than in other sectors of the economy. There have been substantial wage increases in semi-skilled and unskilled trades and occupations; this has primarily benefited the African worker. There are instances where the rise in wages can be directly attributed to the effects of the Act. For example, in 1961, after the trade unions in the construction industry accepted Africans into their membership, these unions negotiated a new agreement which raised the minimum wage for artisans in African areas from 1s. per hour to 3s. per hour. The following table lists the average statutory wages in industries for the year 1963:

* To the above monthly wages should be added an accommodation allowance of up to 30s. per month, for employees earning less than £22 per month.

336. There is a great disparity in the wages of non-Africans as compared to Africans. This is in part due to the fact that the large majority of African employees are unskilled. Moreover, there is a large and relatively elastic supply of labour, in relation to the demand for unskilled labour. The fact that African labour did not participate in the general wage-fixing apparatus until the introduction of the Industrial Conciliation Act of 1959, also contributed to their lower wage levels. Several other factors have contributed to the depressed level of the wages of African workers. There is no pool of skilled labour in the Territory, and employees have been imported from the United Kingdom and South Africa for skilled and most of the semi-skilled work. There have been very few attempts on the part of Government or private employers to train Africans for skilled or semi-skilled trades and occupations. Africans and non-Africans have worked in different economic spheres and even when the same or similar type work was performed by both Africans and non-Africans, different wages were applicable. The Secretary of Labour, Social Welfare and Housing, in his report to the Minister for the year 1961, refers to the convention of "white" and "black" jobs. The report cites the construction industry as one where different rates of pay were applicable to the same work, solely because of race. It was noted that Europeans employed by the Federal Public Works Department worked in prescribed areas surrounding towns; African artisans employed by the Southern Rhodesian Engineering and Construction Department did the same work in African and rural areas at considerably lower rates of pay. In one undertaking, namely, the Rhodesian Railway, the distinction between "black" and "white" jobs has been eliminated. As a result of an agreement reached by the National Industrial Council for the Rhodesia Railways in 1960, every job on the Railways was opened to all persons irrespective of race. By the end of 1960, steps were taken to implement the agreement and recruits of all races were attending training schools. According to the Secretary for Labour, Social Welfare and Housing, this "was one of the most outstanding advances ever made in industrial relations in Southern Rhodesia".

337. Although some progress has been made in reducing the wage differential between African and non-African, the table given below indicates that much remains to be done. In the table, earnings include (i) cash wages, salaries, allowances, commissions and bonuses; (ii) employers' contributions to pension funds and medical aid societies; and (iii) the cash value of all income received in kind, e.g., food and housing.

338. The African wage level increased at a compound rate of 6.1 per cent between 1954 and 1962. The European rate of increase was estimated at 3.6 per cent during the same period. The extent of the increase in the earnings of Africans varied in the several sectors of the economy. Whereas the wages in the manufacturing sector and the electricity/water sector rose by more than 100 per cent in the years 1954 to 1960, the wages in the private domestic sector increased by only approximately 40 per cent during the same period. Agriculture recorded the lowest percentage of increase and it was the only sector where the rate of increase was slower among Africans as compared to non-Africans in the years 1954 to 1962.

339. Statistics of average incomes have less significance in a community where wide disparities prevail in living standards among different population groups. It was estimated in 1961 that some 81,500 Europeans in wage employment received £95.6 million, or an average of £1,173 per person. During the same year, 4,200 Asian and coloured employees received wages and salaries totaling £2.4 million or average annual earnings of £573; while 624,000 Africans were paid £59 million, or an average of £95 per person. Non-African employees were paid £98 million, or twice the total wage earnings of African workers. This disparity is striking when it is recalled that the ratio of African employees to non-Africans is more than seven to one.

340. The table given above does not include income of Africans in the rural subsistence economy, as they are classified as self-employed. Figures based on cash earnings only and excluding payments in kind indicate that in 1961 Africans in paid employment received an average of £55 in agriculture

ANNEX

FINANCE COMPANIES

1. Several large financial houses have had such multifarious dealings in the economy of Rhodesia and, indeed, in the economy of East, Central and Southern Africa, that it has been considered proper to annex a separate section dealing with these corporations. Because of its major and singular interest in the Territory, the British South Africa Company, now known as Charter Consolidated, Ltd., merits particular attention and is dealt with first.

BRITISH SOUTH AFRICA CO.

2. On 1 April 1965, the British South Africa Co. merged with two other major groups, Central Mining and Investment Corp. and the Consolidated Mines Selection Company to form the new Charter Consolidated, Ltd. It holds assets in excess of £142 million.^a

3. The British South Africa Co., or "Chartered" as it has been called, existed as a separate entity for seventy-five years, and played a unique and dominant role in the Territory from its formation in 1889 until 1923. On 29 October 1889, a royal charter^b was granted to Cecil Rhodes and six other associates to "Constitute, erect and incorporate into one body politic and corporate by the name of The British South Africa Company". The object of the new company was to exploit the mineral wealth of the Territory "north of British Bechuanaland, and to the north and west of the South African Republic, and to the west of the Portuguese Dominions", an area covering approximately 500,000 square miles, on the basis of the Rudd concession. Another agreement was added to enforce the control of the Company over the Territory, namely the concession which Edouard Lippert had purportedly obtained from Lobengula, the king of the Matabele "to grant lease or rent land" in Lobengula's name.

4. In 1890 an agreement was secured from the Chief of Barotseland (now part of Zambia), Lewanika. By this agreement, the Company became entitled to the royalties on the output of the Copperbelt.

5. The Company was originally incorporated with a capital of £1 million, but more funds had to be raised until in 1923 the paid up capital reached £9 million. However, dividends were paid to shareholders for nearly twenty years. The Company's capital expenditures remained high. The Company was responsible for the administration of the Territory; railways and other communications were built and various forms of development had to be undertaken in opening the new country.

^a The Cape Times, 27 January 1965.

^b Supplemental Charters were signed on 8 June 1900, 13 March 1915, 25 March 1924 and 16 August 1954.

For these reasons, the royalties which the Company collected on mineral rights did not offer great profits, particularly since mineral production was slow to develop. In 1893, the Matabele tribes rose against the settlers and a war was fought by the Company to subdue them; the whole of what now constitutes Southern Rhodesia was then occupied. It was not until the end of 1897 that the fighting completely ended.

6. The introduction in 1897 of the first railway (from Kimberley in South Africa to Bulawayo) marks an important date in the economic activities of the Company; in 1899 the railroad from Beira (Mozambique) to Salisbury (via Umtali) was inaugurated. In 1902 Salisbury and Bulawayo were connected by rail; in 1904 the line to Victoria Falls was completed. These developments made mining on a large scale profitable; machinery could be imported more cheaply, ores and agricultural produce could be exported and coal began to be delivered from the Wankie coalfields to the mines. Services of a social nature were also introduced by the Company.

7. The Company, with its extensive rights, sought to attract both miners and farmers into the country. It gradually developed a position as a financial trust, with shares in railways and other undertakings, and became the principal source of credit to smaller entrepreneurs.

8. When the Company realized that gold did not exist in the Territory in the same proportions and concentration as in the Transvaal, it encouraged prospection by small workers by changing the system of levying revenue. Between the Boer War and the First World War the financial position of the Company improved, owing mainly to the advance in gold production, but also the beginning of base metal mining. The Company began to promote land settlement and farming more vigorously; its revenues increased through the sale of land to settlers, and with more settlement, custom receipts and railway proceeds increased.

9. In 1922 a referendum was held in the Territory on the status issue. In 1923, thirty-four years after the grant of the Company's first charter, the Territory was formally annexed to the British Crown and "Responsible Government" was established. This was followed a year later by the assumption by the British Government of responsibility for Northern Rhodesia (Zambia). The British South Africa Company then became a purely commercial enterprise.

Settlement with the United Kingdom Government

10. The Company relinquished all financial claims against the United Kingdom Government arising from its past administrative deficits, in return for a cash payment of £3,750,000, of which £2 million was to be contributed by the settlers. Its mining rights were guaranteed, and, as far as the railways were concerned, specific safeguards were granted to it to protect its investments. The property of all unalienated lands passed to the new Southern Rhodesian Government. In Northern Rhodesia the Company retained extensive areas of freehold property as well as all mineral rights. It also retained a half interest for forty years in the net proceeds of the disposal of land in north-western Rhodesia: this was computed in 1956 for an annual payment of £50,000, until March 1965.

11. The shareholders of the Company had not received any dividends for thirty-four years. However, the Company's role in British capital investment in Southern Rhodesia had been crucial and dominating. In 1924, the Company paid an initial dividend of 6d. per share to its stockholders. Its financial position henceforth improved quickly.

12. From 1923 to 1933 the average annual income of the Company from mineral royalties in Southern Rhodesia was about £100,000. Permits were granted to large well-financed companies which were under an obligation to spend minimum sums each year on mineral prospection. The Company frequently obtained an interest in these companies, in addition to retaining the right to part of any metals produced. Its railway interests accounted for nearly 80 per cent of the total railways system, and the mineral expansion contributed to extra traffic on and added profits from those interests.

13. In 1937, a refinancing plan relieved the Company of its liability for, such as the debenture capital as it had guaranteed in the railways; while the guarantee existed, the Company held large quantities of government stock; with its disappearance a large measure of the government bond holdings was sold and the money was used to acquire, among other investments, a substantial stake in the Anglo-American Corporation of South Africa. This was the major event which led to the close association between the British South Africa Company and the Anglo-American Group; the recent merger of Chartered with Consolidated Mines Selection, which is the London-based financial company of the Anglo-American Group, is a consequence of that previous association.

14. In 1933, following elections in Southern Rhodesia in which the question of mineral rights was a major controversy, an agreement was concluded between the Company and the Southern Rhodesian Government under which the former relinquished to the Government all its mineral rights in the Territory in return for a payment of £2 million.

15. The railway interests of Chartered were sold to the Governments concerned in 1947 for £3.15 million.

16. Meanwhile, Chartered was expanding its activities in Northern Rhodesia and taking advantage of the rising world demand for copper. New prospecting companies concluded agreements with it to exploit this demand; of these, Rhodesia Concessions Ltd. was the first: it included combined British and American interests, the former represented by Sir Edmund Davis, the latter by Alfred Chester Beatty. Subsequently, the whole Copperbelt came to be developed by two giant and interconnected combines: the Rhodesian Anglo-American Corporation which primarily drew its capital from South Africa and also from the United Kingdom, and the Rhodesia Selection Trust in which American capital was preponderant.

17. The Company's receipts from Zambian copper increased substantially as copper prices and output rose; they became the major part of its income. As a large shareholder in the Rhodesian Anglo-American Corporation and as an associate of Rhodesia Broken Hill, the major zinc producer, its revenues expanded further.^c

18. In 1949, the Company signed an agreement with the Northern Rhodesian Government to relinquish its mineral rights in 1986, in return for the surrender of 20 per cent of the royalty income to the Government and a guarantee that there would be no discriminatory taxation on the balance. The Company invested large amounts in various industries and subsidiary companies in both Southern and Northern Rhodesia: those investments were intended to replace the lost income from mineral rights and to plan for the future when this income would cease completely. On 24 October 1964, the mineral royalties were transferred to the Government of Zambia for a capital sum of £4 million, half paid by the Zambia Government and half, ex gratia, by the United Kingdom Government.

^c In 1958, the Company's income from royalties on mineral rights amounted to £6 million out of a total revenue of £9 million.

Property and operations of the British South Africa Company

19. The authorized capital of B.S.A. originally was £1 million in £1 shares. On 1 May 1924, 5s. per share were returned to the holders, thus reducing the share value to 15/-. In 1955, the authorized capital was increased from £6,750,000 to £13,500,000 by capitalizing nearly £6.5 million of reserves and creating 9 million new shares. In 1959, the capital was increased to £14,250,000 by creating 1 million new shares; an agreement was further concluded with the Union Corporation Ltd. Group,^d whereby 455,000 fully paid shares were issued to a subsidiary of the latter and 700,000 fully paid shares of 2s. 6d. each in Union Corp. were issued to a subsidiary of the British S.A. Co.

20. In 1963, prior to its merger with the two other leading mining groups, and in addition to the substantial revenue derived from the mining royalties in Zambia, and from other mining stock, British S.A. derived profits from agricultural estates totalling 144,000 acres in Southern Rhodesia.^e The farming operations carried out by the Group were mostly in afforestation and timber processing and citrus products for world markets. In addition, the Company received annual payments at the rate of £50,000 from the Government of Northern Rhodesia under the agreement of 1956. The principal share register was kept in the United Kingdom; a Dominion register was kept in Salisbury and in Johannesburg.

Merger of the British South Africa Co. with the Central Mining and Investment Corp. Ltd. and the Consolidated Mines Selection Co. Ltd.

30. At the time of its merger with Consolidated Mines Selection and Central Mining and Investment in 1964, Chartered's total assets exceeded £80 million. As stated above, there had been a connexion between the British South Africa Co. and the Anglo-American Group[†] since 1937. Several companies of the Anglo-American Group later acquired holdings in the British South Africa Co.

31. Consolidated Mines Selection represented an important part of the non-African interests of Anglo-American, and was based in London. Furthermore, both Chartered and Consolidated owned shares in Central Mining which was also a London interest.

[†] Anglo-American is considered to be the largest mining financial interest in South Africa.

32. Under the new arrangement establishing Charter Consolidated, members of the Anglo-American Group are the largest single shareholders in Charter Consolidated (approximately 30 per cent of the capital). The interests of Charter Consolidated are spread as to 39 per cent in the Republic of South Africa, 16 per cent in the rest of Africa, 23 per cent in North America, and 22 per cent elsewhere.[‡]

33. The starting point for the division of the capital of Charter Consolidated between the shareholders of the three companies was that Chartered's holders should receive the same nominal amount of capital, but expressed as three 5s. shares instead of one 15s. share, the latter having been the nominal value since the repayment of 5s. of the original £1 of capital in 1924. Shareholders of Central Mining and Investment Corporation next in order of size, were allocated twenty-three shares in the new company for each £1 share held, while to holders of Consolidated Mines Selection went twenty-one shares of Charter Consolidated's for every ten 10s. share held. These terms were approved by the shareholders and gave Charter Consolidated an initial issued capital of 97,367,579 shares. These terms meant that holders of Chartered received 55.4 per cent of the equity of Charter Consolidated, and those in Central Mining 25.1 per cent, while Consolidated Mines Selection's holders were allocated 19.5 per cent. The authorized capital of the new company was set at 130 million shares. They became operative on 1 April 1965.

34. On a calculation made at the end of 1964, taking the market value of quoted securities and the agreed value for the purpose of the merger for those for which there was no market price, the new company had net assets of £142 million.

35. Following the formation of Charter Consolidated, an agreement has been reached with Zambia Anglo-American for the merging of their Rhodesian interests within the AMRHO Company.^b As a result of this merger AMRHO is enlarged with net assets of some £19.6 million. The Company is held as to 47.7 per cent by Zambia Anglo-American and 36.9 by Charter Consolidated.

36. The authorized capital of the new company is £30 million divided into 120 million shares of 5s. each, of which 93,367,579 shares are issued as follows: to the members of Chartered, 53,928,012 shares, to the members of Central Mining 24,437,500 shares, and to the members of Consolidated Mines Selection, 19,002,067 shares. The Chairman of the new company is Mr. P. V. Emrys-Evans, President of the British South Africa Co.; the Deputy Chairmen are Mr. S. D. H. Pollen and Mr. H. V. Smith; the managing director is Mr. W. D. Wilson; the other directors include Sir Keith Acutt, Mr. A. Chester Beatty (also director of Selection Trust and the British Overseas Mining Association), Mr. C. W. Engelhard, Mr. H. St. L. Grenfell, Mr. H. F. Oppenheimer, Mr. Evelyn de Rothschild and Mr. T. P. Stratten.

37. In January 1965, the boards of the three companies issued a statement expressing the hope that the merger would create a unit of great strength with a wide spread of interests, able to promote and undertake business on a major scale.

38. While there were many similarities in the nature of the businesses and investments of the three companies, they had individually a number of different associations and activities which together they would be able to develop to greater advantage on an international basis. It was intended that the new company, either alone or in association with other institutions, should actively seek new business in mining, commerce and industry throughout the world. The establishment of major new projects called for large technical and financial resources, and the new company would be able to play a more important role and obtain greater benefits than the three companies individually. Furthermore, the integration of the business activities and administration of the three companies should result, over a period of time, in considerable economies.

39. In April 1965, it was announced that the issued capital of the subsidiaries of the British South Africa Co. Group holding Southern Rhodesian interests would be acquired for £6.2 million by Anglo-American Corp. (Rhodesia) Ltd. (AMRHO). Companies in the Charter Consolidated Group would apply the purchase price in subscribing for AMRHO shares.

ANGLO-AMERICAN CORPORATION OF SOUTH AFRICA (LTD.)

40. In his statement to the forty-seventh annual general meeting, the Chairman of Anglo-American Corporation of South Africa (Ltd.), Mr. Harry F. Oppenheimer, said, inter alia, that the dissolution of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland had made necessary a reorganization of the Company's Rhodesian interests.¹ The removal from Salisbury to Lusaka of the head offices of the Northern Rhodesian mining companies of the Group, as well as Rhodesian Anglo-American Ltd., Mr. P. H. A. Brownrigg had moved to Lusaka and taken charge of the office there. A new subsidiary company, Anglo-American Corporation (Central Africa) Ltd., had been registered in Northern Rhodesia with its head office in Lusaka and had taken over the technical and administrative functions previously exercised by the Corporation itself in relation to the Northern Rhodesian companies of the Group.

41. After dealing with the "considerable unrest on the Copperbelt" in the period under review, the substantial rise on the London Metal Exchange of the cash price of copper wirebars and details concerning Northern Rhodesian Copper Mines, he continued that the Salisbury office was headed by Mr. H. H. Taylor who had been appointed chief agent in Southern Rhodesia. The political situation in that Territory had given cause for uncertainty and some anxiety. In spite of this, however, many sections of the economy had continued to make excellent progress. He cited the 1963-64 tobacco crop in this connexion, the sugar and beef industries and went into details concerning the Hippo Valley Sugar Estates and the Wankie Colliery Co. Ltd., in which the Anglo-American subsidiary Amrho Ltd. has a 23 per cent interest. He pointed out the Corporation's contribution in exploring and investigating gold, copper and chromium ores.

42. In his statement prepared for the forty-eighth annual general meeting of the Corporation, Mr. Oppenheimer stated that in 1964 there had been a marked economic recovery in Rhodesia and "a good deal of economic development had taken place".² In April 1965, following the formation of Charter Consolidated Ltd., an integration was arranged of the British South Africa Company's assets in Rhodesia with the Rhodesian assets of Zambia Anglo-American and other companies of the Group. The amalgamated company, Anglo-American Corporation Rhodesia Ltd., now held most of Anglo-American's investments in Rhodesia in the fields of mining, timber, citrus and finance.

43. "Although the economic position of Rhodesia has improved considerably", he said, "it cannot be regarded as satisfactory because the inflow of capital from outside, which is so necessary to a country at Rhodesia's stage of development, is not taking place and, as a result, investment is lagging. This may be attributed very largely to the political uncertainty. . . . Time, patience and economic development are needed and in the meantime there is nothing to be gained for either side by precipitating a crisis."

44. Concerning Charter Consolidated, he said that unlike Anglo-American Corporation, which was a South African company and had, and intended to keep, the great bulk of its business in South Africa, Charter would invest chiefly outside South Africa, and to a certain extent outside the African continent.

45. Rhodesian Anglo-American Ltd. is a wholly owned subsidiary company and registered in Salisbury.³ It was formed on 1 January 1964 to administer interests in that country. It was also registered at the same time in Lusaka.

LONRHO LTD.

46. Lonrho Ltd., registered in 1909, was formerly known as London and Rhodesia Mining and Land Co. Ltd.⁴ It changed its name in 1963. At the end of 1964, it had issued almost 5.75 million shares, 54 per cent of which were held by five groups: The British South Africa Co. (now Charter Consolidated); the Drayton Group; the Anglo-American Group; Lonrho subsidiaries, and "Standard Bank Nominees".

^b AMRHO, Anglo-American Corp. (Rhodesia) Ltd., was formerly known as Rhosouth, Ltd.; it is a wholly owned subsidiary of Zambia Anglo-American Ltd.

The identity of the last holding is unknown, although of major interest in view of Lonrho's ability to raise large cash sums for many of its purchases.

47. The Company has extensive dealings in South Africa, Malawi, Rhodesia, Tanzania, Mozambique and Zambia. It conducts its affairs with constant publicity which is not a tactic of most of its rivals, and has also made a point of buying into areas of "political risk" in which bargains are to be found.

48. The Company which once made all its profits from gold mining in Rhodesia, now covers many fields: plantations are the largest profit earner; motor trading, ranching, mining, "chibuku" breweries, newspapers, hotels, nail and dry ice factories, railroads (Malawi). The Company's land holdings in Southern Rhodesia exceed 1 million acres.

49. In 1961, the Company's direct mining interest in Southern Rhodesia comprised 164 gold mining claims, some base metal claims, land holdings covering 873,362 acres and eighteen town stands. Some of the mining properties, such as the Muriel Mine, were tributed to other companies on a royalty basis.

50. The Chairman of Lonrho Ltd. is Mr. A. H. Hall (U.K.). Other members of the board of directors include: Mr. R. W. Rowland (Southern Rhodesia), Mr. J. Whitehouse (U.K.), Mr. J. N. Kick (U.K.), Mr. J. A. Caldecott (U.K.), Mr. F. E. O. Davies (Southern Rhodesia), Mr. A. J. B. Ogilvy (U.K.), and Mr. C. D. Mackenzie (U.K.). The head office of the company is in London.

51. The registered capital of the Company amounted to £2,000,000 in 8 million shares of 5s. each; the issued capital was £1,430,069, increased in 1963 by 220,278 shares to acquire Hall Holdings Ltd. The Company has a large holding in Henderson's Transvaal Estates Ltd. of South Africa.

52. The fixed assets of Lonrho Ltd. are as follows:

	£ thousand
Farms, ranches and plantations	1,545
Towns, stands and buildings	1,104
Mining properties	1,029
Plant equipment, vehicles and aircraft	1,183
Pipeline development	2,268
Other development projects	13
TOTAL	7,142

53. Concerning the oil pipeline, the following agreements were signed between October and December, 1962:^m

(a) Between the Government of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland and the Company, whereby the Company undertook to construct, maintain and operate a crude oil pipeline from Beira to an oil refinery which, in terms of an agreement between the Federal Government and a consortium of oil companies, was to be constructed near Umtali;

(b) Between the Government of Southern Rhodesia and the Company, whereby the Company was granted a concession to construct and operate a pipeline from the frontier between Mozambique and Southern Rhodesia to the oil refinery at Feruka, west of Umtali;

(c) Between the Province of Moçambique and the Companhia do Pipeline Moçambique-Rodésia S.A.R.L. whereby the Company was granted a concession to construct and operate a pipeline from Beira to the frontier between Mozambique and Southern Rhodesia; and

(d) Between the Company and a consortium of seven oil companies, whereby the Company undertook to transport through the pipeline, at an initial charge of £3.5. 5d. per short ton, the oil requirements of the consortium's refinery at Feruka.

54. It was necessary to register a Portuguese company for the purpose of holding the Mozambique concession referred to above; this company was named Companhia do Pipeline Moçambique-Rodésia and was to be an indirect subsidiary.

55. The contract for the construction of the crude-oil pipeline from Beira to the oil refinery was awarded in March 1963. The total cost up to the start of pumping operations was estimated at a maximum sum of £3.5 million, of which the major portion was contractor-financed with repayments over the first six years of operations. Further cash commitments from the Company's own resources was not expected to exceed £600,000.

56. In 1964, motor trading accounted for 12 per cent of the group profit.ⁿ With a considerable business in the sales of spare parts for many makes and types of vehicles, through the Consolidated Holdings Group, Lonrho has to some extent a cushion whenever there might be a falling off in new car sales.

57. Since June 1958, the consolidated balance-sheet after deducting minority interests has grown from £1,650,236 to £3,657,007; revenues before depreciation, taxation and minority interests have increased from £128,000 to £1,308,011. The Lonrho group has very substantial minority interests but earnings on the parent company's capital have risen from 7 and one half per cent to 29 and one quarter per cent, and the dividend from 5 per cent to 18 and one third per cent.

58. The following is a summary of the consolidated balance-sheet of the Company at 30 September 1964:

	£ thousand
Fixed assets	7,142
Investment (at book value)	1,984
	9,126
Net current assets	1,167
	10,293
Less:
Long-term liabilities	1,943
Minority interests	4,693
	6,636
	3,657

59. A summary of the financial results for the years 1962-1964 is given below:

ⁿ East Africa and Rhodesia, 8 April 1965, p. 515.

60. In recent years, the Lonrho Group has increased the number of economic fields in which it operates, and has extended its activities to territories beyond Central and South Africa. It has also been organizing itself into a more compact unit. Lonrho Ltd. has a very large majority holding in Willoughby's Consolidated Co. Ltd., interested in ranching. It also holds over 50 per cent of the capital of Henderson's Transvaal Estates Ltd., which in turn has a majority of the capital of Tweefontein United Collieries Ltd., and this in turn holds 62 per cent of the capital of Coronation Syndicate

Ltd. Another major member of the group is the British Central Africa Co. Ltd. which operated in Malawi and controls Central Line Sisal Estates Ltd., East African Sisal Plantations Ltd., Tanga Line Sisal Ltd. and Nyasa Sisal Estates Ltd. It also controls Federal Ventures Ltd. which has mining interests in Tanzania.

61. The Lonrho gold-mining subsidiaries are outlined in the body of the chapter on mining.

SELECTION TRUST LIMITED

62. The Chairman, Mr. A. Chester Beatty, announced that the gross revenue for the year ending 31 March 1965 had exceeded £5 million for the first time, being nearly £1 million higher than in the previous year.^o After expenses, taxation and minority interests, the net profit was £2,490,739 against £1,988,355 a year earlier. The most important single shareholding is in American Metal Climax (AMAX) which originates from the early 1930s. Other interests include Bikita Minerals, Consolidated Selection Trust, Palabora Mining Company, Roan Selection Trust, Sierra Leone Selection Trust, Tsumeb Corporation, Vaal Reefs Exploration and Mining Company, Western Decalta and Western Holdings.

63. The interests of Selection Trust Ltd. in Southern and Central Africa cover a wide range of mining activities, including gold and copper in the Republic of South Africa, copper, lead and zinc in South West Africa, lithium in Rhodesia and copper in Zambia. Together these interests have been valued at £18.3 million equivalent to 22/- per Selection Trust share, and they contributed dividends of £1.7 million or 2/1 per share.

64. The following is a geographical analysis of assets and income:

	Assets per cent	Income per cent
United States of America }	50	23
Canada }
United Kingdom	6	6
Sierra Leone }	9	30
Ghana }
Zambia	3	4
South West Africa	12	17

65. Its subsidiary, Roan Selection Trust Ltd., which changed its name from Rhodesian Selection Trust Ltd. reported a profit after taxes to 30 June 1964 of £5,899,000 as against £5,929,000 for the previous year. The profit before tax, however, increased by more than £4 million, from £13,290,000 to £17,422,000. Sir Ronald Prain was the chairman.

66. Roan Selection Trust Ltd.^p has an authorized capital of £22 million in 22 million shares of £1 each. It has issued £21,572,004 of these including 1,130,978 shares issued as a capitalization issue, in the ratio of one share for every 5/- share held by shareholders registered at 29 January 1962 and 8,088,720 shares of £1 each issued to Roan Antelope Copper Mines Ltd., for the acquisition of the undertaking, property and assets of that company. During the year ending 30 June 1962, the 5/- shares were consolidated into £1 shares. The issue capital was increased by a million shares to American Metal Climax Inc., and by the issue of 37,409 shares to selected officers and key employees. After 30 June 1964, the company was granted an additional listing in respect of 719 ordinary shares of £1 each.

67. The company announced^q profits after tax for the year ending 30 June 1965 of £8,683,507, of which £1.3 million was retained by subsidiaries. Total dividends of 6/3 net per share (against 4/4.6) would take £6.7 million. After transferring to the general reserve the carry-forward would be £24,788.

A. GENERAL

1. At its 25th meeting held on 12 May 1966, the Chairman of Sub-Committee I, on the suggestion of the representative of the Soviet Union, requested the Secretariat to prepare a supplementary working paper on the ways in which the activities of foreign monopolies rendered the economic sanctions against the Smith régime ineffective. The present working paper has been prepared in response to this request and is supplementary to the paper made available to the Sub-Committee on 21 December 1965.

2. Information on the economic and financial sanctions and the oil embargo against Southern Rhodesia is contained in a previous working paper prepared by the Secretariat for the Special Committee (see chap. III, part I). Supplementary information on recent developments is set out below.

Further replies to the Secretary-General's notes verbales on General Assembly resolution 2022 (XX) and Security Council resolution 217 (1965)

3. It will be recalled that by 30 April 1966, sixty-six replies had been received from States in response to the notes verbales of the Secretary-General transmitting to States the text of General Assembly resolution 2022 (XX) and Security Council resolution 217 (1965) (see chap. III, para. 14). Since then four additional replies have been received and circulated:

Reservations by Portugal and the Republic of South Africa on Security Council resolution 221 (1966)

6. In a letter dated 27 April 1966^c addressed to the Secretary-General, the Government of Portugal set forth certain reservations regarding Security Council resolution 221 (1966) of 9 April 1966 on the subject of Southern Rhodesia. Reservations were also made by the Government of the Republic of South Africa in a note verbale dated 22 June 1966^d addressed to the Secretary-General.

7. The Secretary-General informed the Government of Portugal in a letter dated 21 June 1966^e that a detailed study prepared for his information did not in its conclusions support any of the reservations advanced by the Government of Portugal.

B. AGRICULTURE

8. The President of the Rhodesia's National Farmers' Union Congress, Mr. T. Michell, warned last June that the country's agriculture had never been in a worse condition with the possible exception of the depression years of the thirties and the war years. He added that this was not because of sanctions or the recent drought. The crucial issue was said to be the approaching tobacco planting time. Farmers would need to have official guidance on the size of their crops by August and there is very little time for the "Government of Ian Smith" to do so.

9. A statement made by the Salisbury Chamber of Commerce during June also warned that agricultural credit was a burning problem. The statement said that the farming community had traditionally relied upon commerce for much of its credit requirements from year to year. Furthermore, the Salisbury Chamber of Commerce had fully endorsed the early warning of the Associated Chambers of Commerce of Rhodesia to farmers that unless there was some change in the situation, commerce would be unable to provide any significant volume of credit this year.

Southern Rhodesian tobacco crop

10. As indicated in chapter III, part I, the tobacco crop for 1966 was estimated at 200 million to 240 million pounds in weight. The sale of tobacco this year was handled by the State Tobacco Corporation.

11. When the tobacco sales opened in Salisbury on 29 March 1966, the auction system was replaced with one of private bargains. This was reported to be a move to protect the identity of the foreign buyers (chap. III, paras. 637-650).

12. The secret tobacco sales in Salisbury were surrounded with strict security protection. The Rhodesian Government was reported to have committed itself to buy all unsold bales at a set minimum price.

13. According to newspaper reports about 20 per cent of the total usual tobacco traffic passed through the east African port of Beira in April and May.

14. According to the Mozambique figures, Beira handled just under 11,000 tons of outgoing tobacco in April and May, the first months which would reflect sales in the current tobacco selling season, compared with 54,000 tons in the same months of last year. Beira handles Malawi and Zambian tobacco as well as the Rhodesian product but the fall in the figure between the two years was attributed to a drop in Southern Rhodesia exports. There has thus been a substantial reduction in the flow of tobacco exports, through Beira, but not a complete cessation.

15. Beira is traditionally the tobacco outlet port. No figures are available of tobacco traffic through the other Mozambique port of Lourenço Marques or through the South African ports, although it has been reported that some tobacco is being sold to South Africa.

Southern Rhodesian sugar crop

16. The 1965 sugar crop before the illegal declaration of independence was estimated at 250,000 tons. It was expected to reach the 350,000 tons mark in 1966. The principal buyers of Southern Rhodesian sugar, namely the United States, Canada and the United Kingdom have already placed an embargo on sugar imports from Southern Rhodesia.

17. A spokesman for the South African Sugar Association stated recently that South Africa was not buying Rhodesian sugar and was making a point of not doing so. The spokesman reiterated the Association's viewpoint that South Africa could not afford to take the international risks involved in purchasing Southern Rhodesian sugar, particularly as this would jeopardize its quota arrangements with the United States, which had itself imposed a boycott on Southern Rhodesian sugar.

C. MINING INDUSTRY

18. According to the publication East Africa and Rhodesia, Southern Rhodesia sold 288,168 tons of coal and 19,025 tons of coke in April. The March figures were 328,982 and 20,681 respectively. The principal importer of coal is Zambia. However, the Government of Zambia announced its intention eventually to cut off all trade ties with Southern Rhodesia and that this would include coal once alternative supplies were available.

19. It was reported that a further £2.2 million a year was expected to be added to Rhodesia's foreign exchange income when the Trojan nickel mine, at Bindura, had been developed to full production. It was further reported that the Anglo-American Corporation had bought an 85 per cent interest in the mine and was to invest £4 million (including the purchase price) to expand mining to 600,000 tons of ore a year. Behind the plan to expand the Trojan mine was the growing world demand for nickel. Last year it rose by 30,000 tons to 365,000 tons and is expected to continue to expand at a steady 7½ per cent a year up to 1975.

20. As indicated in paragraph 669 of chapter III, the Anglo-American Corporation had sunk three new shafts at its mines on the Felixburg gold belt, near Umvuma. Another, at the Tchargwa mine, which was abandoned some years ago because of water difficulties, was being deepened and developed. It was presumed that Southern Rhodesia would have no difficulty in disposing of its gold production, which in 1964 amounted to £7.2 million.

21. Southern Africa of 23 May 1966 reported that an exploratory shaft to investigate the possibility of establishing a gold mine was to be sunk by Anglo-American Corporation at the Champion mine property in the Odzi area near Umtali, Rhodesia. This followed an extensive programme of geological exploration which included the drilling of 17,000 feet of core in twenty-six boreholes to prove the Champion Reef and its extensions. The mine property was formerly worked for arsenic and in the early days of Rhodesia was a gold producer. The drill holes sunk in the past six years indicated that gold and silver values were present in sufficient quantities in depth to warrant the sinking of an exploration shaft.

22. It was also reported that according to statistics compiled by the port of Beira authorities, the Southern Rhodesia export performance on minerals in the first five months of the year was uneven, but not discouraging. Exports of chrome ore through the port over the period totalled 94,000 tons, compared with 100,000 tons in the same period last year.

23. The export of "sundry ores" totalled 183,000 tons compared with 202,000 tons in the comparable period of last year.

24. The New York Times of 2 July 1966, referred to an official British report which, according to the Times, gave detailed evaluation of the effectiveness of the trade embargo and raised questions about shipments of Rhodesian chrome to the United States. The main leakages were stated to be in sales of copper and asbestos to Federal Republic of Germany, asbestos to Japan, meat to Switzerland and sugar and tobacco to Portugal.

D. COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY

25. Developments in Rhodesian commerce and industry are discussed in chapter III (paras. 670-680).

26. According to the Standard Bank Review of May 1966, reports from the retail sector as a whole indicated that most business houses were reasonably satisfied with their turnovers during March, with trade showing an improvement over that for January and February. Self-service supermarkets continued to attract considerable customers, although the incidence of petrol rationing had reportedly increased the level of business in suburban areas where shoppers were buying "closer to home".

27. Conditions in the wholesale sector were reported to be quiet, owing to the curtailment of trade with the country's northern neighbours and the effect of the current import controls.

28. Import quotas had, however, been granted for the current period for a wide range of merchandise with a view to maintaining stock at reasonable levels. The curtailment of supplies of consumer goods from traditional sources coupled to a minor extent with public sympathy was resulting in the Rhodesian market being receptive to new ranges of goods. Owing to his close proximity the South African manufacturer was particularly well placed to benefit.

29. As had been stated, Mr. Musset was quoted as saying (chap. III, para. 687) that varied reports had been received regarding the motor trade and that, while some dealers had been able to maintain their business at a reasonable level, there would appear to have been a general reduction in the number of sales of new and used cars. Motor assembly plants continued to operate at a reduced level.

30. In industry the engineering sector was reported to be well employed and the work coming forward would appear to some extent to reflect the drive to manufacture articles which were formerly imported. The spinning and weaving industries were reported to be fully occupied during March and there had been an improvement in the garment manufacturing sector. Furniture manufacturers reported increasing demand for their products and viewed the prospects as favourable. Producers of food-stuffs continued to be busy meeting local demand.

31. The Financial Times (London) of 13 May 1966, reported that organized industry in Rhodesia was carrying out a survey of the effect of sanctions on manufacturing industry. About 800 members of the Association of Rhodesia and Nyasaland Industries would have filled in questionnaires, but the details were not available. Commercial sources in Salisbury said that while there was considerable under-employment in the economy, especially in the hard-hit distributive motor sectors, the Government was keeping close control over unemployment proper mainly by taking temporaries into the Government service.

32. However, according to Salisbury radio broadcasts of 2 June 1966, the President of the Associated Chambers of Commerce of Rhodesia, Mr. C. J. Hughes, commented in a foreword to the Chamber of Commerce Annual Report, that while the ingenuity shown by Rhodesian businessmen in their efforts to overcome sanctions was outstanding, it would be unrealistic not to acknowledge that sanctions had had some effect. Mr. Hughes further stated that the distributive sector of the economy had been hardest hit, and that some of the weaker and less efficient organizations in this sector had succumbed.

33. The London Observer of 5 June 1966, indicated that according to recent estimates in the industrial centre of Bulawayo, 8,000 Africans were out of work because of a drop in Zambian and home demand. Commercial turnover generally had dropped. Some farmers had found themselves unable to pay their African labour, while others had had to dismiss white farm managers.

E. FINANCE AND TRADE

New Taxes

34. Mr. John Wrathall, the Southern Rhodesian "Finance Minister"—who had already warned the country to expect to pay higher taxes—announced in early June that he would present his budget on 21 July.

35. Meanwhile, the illegal régime of Southern Rhodesia increased the sales tax (purchase tax) from 4d. to 8d. in the pound on 23 June 1966.

36. An extraordinary gazette announcement on 23 June 1966 also increased duty on whisky, gin, rum and other spirits and liquors by 8s. per imperial proof gallon. A statement issued by Mr. Wrathall on the same day said that the new measures were presented "at this time" because of need for changes to become effective before the beginning of the new financial year on 1 July 1966. Mr. Wrathall had warned earlier this year that some changes in taxation could be expected in order to enable the Government to fill the gaps in revenue caused by international sanctions.

Increase in price of petrol

37. Following an announcement by Mr. Bernard Musset, "Minister of Commerce and Industry" of Southern Rhodesia, the price of petrol was increased by 1s. 3d. per gallon to 5s. 7d. for regular and 6s. for premium grades on 10 May 1966. Diesel oil advanced 7d., power paraffin 9d. and illuminating paraffin 5d. per gallon. The "Deputy Minister of Agriculture", Mr. Lance Smith, announced that the ration of diesel fuel to farmers which was fixed at 50 per cent of last year's consumption has been raised to 70 per cent for the months of June, July and August.

Freezing of import current allocations

38. The illegal régime of Southern Rhodesia decided to freeze all outstanding second period import currency allocations at the end of June. This was announced by the Secretary of the Associated Chambers of Commerce of Rhodesia, Mr. G. Taylor, on 15 June 1966. Mr. Taylor was quoted as stating that the Government's decision did not mean that importers would be deprived of their allocations. During the last month of the current quota period, ending on 31 July, the move would give the Government an opportunity to redistribute currency allocations from those firms who found themselves with a surplus to others who required an additional amount.

Rhodesian loans

39. During June, the illegal régime floated a £4.5 million loan. This followed an announcement on 9 May 1966 by the "Reserve Bank" that the twenty-five-year loan, at 6.5 per cent, was to be issued at par on 1 June. An earlier South Rhodesian £4.5 million loan was due for redemption on 15 July and stockholders who chose to convert the old stock into the new issue were offered a 6.5 per cent interest payable on the old stock, giving for the six-week period of overlap an interest rate of 10.25 per cent.

40. On 3 May 1966, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was asked in the United Kingdom Parliament whether he would make a statement about the guaranteed payment of interest due on loans from the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development to Southern Rhodesia. The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied that payments amounting to £535,000 were due on 2 May 1966, in respect of two loans made by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development—one to the Government of Southern Rhodesia and one to the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, of which half was the responsibility of Southern Rhodesia. The Chancellor informed Parliament that the International Bank had not received those payments, and as Her Majesty's Treasury was the Guarantor of the loans he had authorized the payment of the required amount to the International Bank from the Consolidated Fund. According to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it would be recovered from the Government of Southern Rhodesia when constitutional government was restored.

41. The British Government made further payments in June totalling £759,000 to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development in respect of interest and capital payments on which Southern Rhodesia had defaulted.

42. On 20 May 1966, the Bank of England announced that no funds having been received before the close of business on 19 May, to meet the half-yearly payment of interest due on that day on Government of Southern Rhodesia 6 per cent stock, 1976-1979, interest warrants for that payment had not been dispatched.

43. According to an announcement by a "Reserve Bank" spokesman the Rhodesian Government loan of £4.5 million was fully subscribed when lists opened and closed immediately in Salisbury on 1 June 1966. The proceeds from the long-term loan were intended to finance the Government's development programme and for maturing stock.

44. The "Reserve Bank" spokesman said the result was, as usual, "most satisfactory". He added that a large proportion of people had agreed to convert into an equivalent nominal value of the new stock their holdings in the long-term Southern Rhodesian loan due to mature in July.

45. On 31 May 1966, the United Kingdom Government warned British subjects and residents that the proposed £4.5 million loan the Southern Rhodesian régime hoped to raise was illegal.

46. The Government pointed out that the present illegal régime in Rhodesia was not capable of incurring legal obligations on behalf of the Government of Southern Rhodesia and that any person who lent money or otherwise gave credit to or for the account of the illegal régime did so entirely at his own risk.

Rhodesian reserves frozen

47. The Times of London of 21 June 1966 reported that Southern Rhodesia had lost control of its foreign reserves. The balance of the £23 million owned by the Rhodesian Reserve Bank last November and salted away in bank deposits in South Africa, Switzerland and elsewhere, were said to have been frozen. The London based board of the bank, headed by Sir Sydney Caine and appointed by Mr. Wilson last December, had made no attempt to use the money itself to pay off Southern Rhodesian debts to bondholders or to the International Bank.

48. The illegal régime in Southern Rhodesia, however, was equally unable to use the money to pay for imports. In the circumstances, it was expected that it would be increasingly difficult for Mr. Smith's régime to use the balance to raise credit. Sir Sydney's administration was reported by United Kingdom sources to have successfully traced almost all the funds as long ago as the end of January, so that it had been successfully denying funds to Mr. Smith since that time.

49. The funds in question were, in effect, being held in reserve for the Rhodesian people once the future course of administration had been settled. Thus Rhodesia had been able to spend only the sums of money earned by exports, most of which had been going to Zambia and South Africa.

Trade and economic relations between the Republic of South Africa and Southern Rhodesia

50. The Southern Rhodesian drive to accelerate economic relations with the Republic of South Africa has been described in paragraphs 690 to 695 of chapter III. The drive to step up trade between the two countries had continued since the above document was issued.

51. Six members of a powerful South African commercial organization were expected in Southern Rhodesia in June at the invitation of the Rhodesian trade promotion Council. The mission was believed to be for the purpose of examining Rhodesia's economic development and to meet leading personalities in the business and financial sectors in Salisbury, Bulawayo, Umtali, the Midlands and the Low veld.

52. According to a Johannesburg radio broadcast of 7 June 1966, a Southern Rhodesian confirming house (Rhodesian Industrial Confirming (Private) Limited) had established a branch in Johannesburg for the purpose of assisting South African exporters to Southern Rhodesia. The business of the company was to ensure payments in cash to South African exporters and to supply credit to Rhodesian importers. The company was expected also to assist South African exporters to find markets in Rhodesia. The company was a subsidiary of Industrial Corporation of Rhodesia and commenced operations in April. The Johannesburg manager, Col. R. Jones, said that his company was also interested in guaranteeing trade between Southern Rhodesia and other markets.

53. Mr. Van den Berg, Director of the Handel Institute, stated recently that the delegation of the Institute which visited Rhodesia had submitted a proposal to the effect that factories in Southern Rhodesia should be granted quotas to export goods to the Republic duty free, or under rebate. According to Mr. Van den Berg, one of the purposes of the proposal would be to help Southern Rhodesia to adjust to the loss of the Zambian export market.

54. It was also reported that the three-man commission of inquiry which is to investigate alternative rail routes to South Africa was sworn in on 13 June 1966 by the "Officer Administering the Government". The commission was expected to consider two proposals before it: an extension of the present line from Bulawayo, which ends at West Nicholson, and a line to the Republic of South Africa from Rutenga, a station on the railway line to Lourenço Marques.

Trade and economic relations between Portugal and Southern Rhodesia

55. Under the five-year trade agreement between Southern Rhodesia and Portugal, the signatories agreed to treat each other's products on a "most-favoured-nation" basis.

56. Last March, it was reported from Lisbon that Portugal had taken delivery of a total shipment of 133 tons of Southern Rhodesian beef on trial basis. No report is available regarding further purchases of Rhodesian meat by Portugal.

57. The Portuguese Foreign Minister, Mr. Franco Nogueira, told a press conference in May of this year that Portugal had never taken part in sanctions against Southern Rhodesia. He also stated that the Portuguese Government would not interfere with private transport to and from land-locked countries.

58. The New York Times of 3 July 1966 referred to an official report on economic sanctions against Southern Rhodesia, in which mention was made of tobacco and sugar sales to Portugal as one of the main leakages.

Trade and economic relations between the Federal Republic of Germany and Southern Rhodesia

59. The Minister for Economic Affairs of the Federal Republic of Germany was reported to have said that German exports to Southern Rhodesia last year amounted to DM54.1 million (£4,060,000). According to reports the figure for December 1965 after the embargo was imposed was DM1.9 million (£171,000). In January it rose to DM3.7 million (£330,000) and in February fell back to DM2.5 (£225,000). German imports from Southern Rhodesia last year were reported to amount to DM140.4 million (£12,636,000). Figures for December, January and February were DM12.4 million (£1,116,000), DM13 million (£1,170,000), and DM6.4 million (£576,000) respectively. Tobacco amounted to more than one third of West Germany's imports from Rhodesia last year.

60. It was reported during May that the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany had enforced a partial embargo on Southern Rhodesia goods such as tobacco. The Cabinet announced on 20 May 1966, that in the future all imports from Rhodesia would require permits and that it was not intended to grant any. But, in the special case of asbestos the actual handling would depend on the cost of alternative supplies from Canada.

Trade and economic relations between Japan and Southern Rhodesia

61. By letter dated 15 June 1966, the Permanent Representative of Japan to the United Nations informed the Secretary-General concerning Japan's policy on trade with Southern Rhodesia as follows:

62. "In compliance with the resolutions adopted by the Security Council the Government of Japan has been doing its utmost with a view to achieving a total ban on imports from Southern Rhodesia.

63. "In addition to the measures which have already been taken, the Government of Japan has now taken the necessary measures to ensure that there will be no further importation of asbestos from Southern Rhodesia into Japan, while expecting that import requirement of asbestos would be met by the supplies from other sources. Furthermore, with the co-operation of the business circles concerned, the importation of chrome from Southern Rhodesia into Japan was suspended a few months ago".

Trade and economic relations between Zambia and Southern Rhodesia

64. The Rhodesia Railways derives its earnings mainly from the transport of Southern Rhodesian coal to Zambia's copper mines and Zambian copper to the Mozambique port of Beira. The Railways' headquarters and main workshops are located in Southern Rhodesia. There are also workshops in the Zambian mining town of Broken Hill.

65. The executive body of the Rhodesian Railways is a Board on which Zambia and Southern Rhodesia have three members each. Mr. A. R. Kemp from Southern Rhodesia is the independent Chairman of the Board.

66. As one of the world's biggest copper exporting nations, Zambia ships by rail through Rhodesia practically the whole output of 700,000 tons a year, which is nearly 15 per cent of the total output of copper on the world market. The most profitable traffic carried by the railways is thus copper. In the last financial year the value of this traffic was just over £10 million almost all of it coming from Zambia and representing about 25 per cent of the railways' total revenue.

67. In May, Zambian Exchange Control took steps not to allow railway funds to be remitted to the illegal régime of Southern Rhodesia. Shortly thereafter, the Southern Rhodesian régime decided as a counter-measure to insist on payment in advance for carrying Zambian traffic through Rhodesia.

68. A statement issued in Lusaka on 14 May 1966, on behalf of the Chairman of Rhodesia Railways, Mr. A. R. Kemp, said that one of the major problems facing the joint system was the refusal by the Zambian exchange control to allow railway funds into Rhodesia. He was commenting on a statement by the Zambian Minister of Finance, Mr. Wina, who maintained that the railways had neither the funds nor the assets to continue smooth operations in Southern Rhodesia. Mr. Kemp said that the position in maintaining the operation of the railways had become difficult because of the action of the Zambian Exchange Control.

69. The Railway Board subsequently decided by a majority of four to three with the three Zambian members dissenting, to uphold the Southern Rhodesian demand for advance payment. Commenting on the Railway Board's decision, President Kaunda stated that it had been taken with the full knowledge of Southern Rhodesia's "Prime Minister", Mr. Ian Smith, by a group of unlawful gangsters who gave themselves authority to run the Reserve Bank of Rhodesia. Mr. Kaunda added that the group had acted illegally, since the Bank had been suspended by the British Government.

70. It was reported on 23 May that the British Government had sent a mission headed by Mrs. Judith Hart, Minister of State, Commonwealth Relations Office, to Lusaka for urgent talks with President Kaunda and his Ministers to meet the crisis which was now developing over Rhodesian-Zambian trade and rail traffic. A statement issued from the Commonwealth Relations Office simply said that by agreement between the British and Zambian Governments, Mrs. Judith Hart, Minister of State for Commonwealth Relations, was flying to Lusaka for discussions with the Zambian authorities.

71. President Kaunda indicated that Zambia officials would be authorized only to discuss alternative supply routes with Mrs. Hart and the members of the British Mission and that there would be no question of Zambia changing its mind on the rail charges issue.

72. It was reported that copper shares fell sharply on 18 May on publication of the news that the Rhodesia Railways was demanding payment in advance for Zambia's copper exports. It is further reported that on 27 May major Zambian producers had invoked the legal clause in their contracts, which permitted delayed deliveries. The reason invoked by them as being beyond their control was that the Rhodesia Railways had refused permission for Zambian copper to move through the country except on certain terms, such as advance payment. As a result copper prices rose sharply. The cash price of copper wire-bars rose £28.5s to close at £647 a ton, while the three months' forward price put on £25.5s. to reach £608 a ton.

73. A Rhodesia Railway train carrying copper and zinc exports from Zambia crossed the border into Southern Rhodesia on 31 May 1966, without hindrance. A Reuters dispatch from Livingstone, Zambia added that there had been doubts whether the train would be allowed through, following a Zambian High Court ruling of 29 May 1966 temporarily restraining the jointly owned railroad from imposing a new advance payment system for freight.

74. Referring to an order issued on 11 June 1966 by the Southern Rhodesian "Ministry of Transport" in respect of in-transit traffic to and from Zambia, the authorities of the Rhodesian Railways in Bulawayo stated on 14 June 1966: "...all traffic other than excess passenger baggage in any direction, and goods consigned to and from Zambia carriage forward and carriage paid, falls under the provisions of the Government direction. For other traffic the Railways are required to obtain payment in Rhodesia of rail charges earned or to be earned on its lines in Rhodesia and Bechuanaland in a manner acceptable to the Reserve Bank. Before goods are removed from Rhodesia the Railways must satisfy the Reserve Bank that arrangements have been made to pay railage and charges due to neighbouring railways for the transport of such goods on their systems".

75. Furthermore, on 18 June 1966, a Rhodesia Railways' spokesman said in Salisbury that Zambian copper and other goods in transit through Southern Rhodesia would not be moved until agreement on payment of freight charges between Zambia and Mozambique had been reached. The copper, at present being held in Southern Rhodesia because of the deadlock with Zambia, would not be moved until satisfactory pay arrangements had been made. The spokesman added that there were 342 trucks being held in Rhodesia pending a decision between Zambia and Mozambique. He confirmed, however, that Zambia had made available funds to meet the requirements of the Southern Rhodesia exchange control. It was reported that the freight bill, said to be in the region of £150,000 was paid in United States dollars.

76. Two days later, on 20 June 1966, the spokesman for the Railways stated that about 16,000 tons of copper export from Zambia were being held in Southern Rhodesia. The copper, estimated to be worth £10 million, was consigned to Mozambique ports, and was being held as there has been no advice from either Zambian or Portuguese authorities that cash in advance payments have been made for its transit through Mozambique. The spokesman confirmed that the charge for railage through Southern Rhodesia had been met in advance.

77. According to Lusaka radio broadcasts of 22 June 1966, President Kenneth Kaunda referred to the 16,000 tons of copper which had been held up by the régime in Southern Rhodesia and explained that giving the money required by the rebels to clear the copper did not mean that there was a change of policy. He said Zambia had been faced with two alternatives, either to let the copper remain in rebel Rhodesia or pay the amount they were demanding. Zambia according to him had chosen the latter.

78. Further to the announcement of the Zambian Government's intention to cut off all trade with Southern Rhodesia, President Kaunda stated during June that this would include trade in coal as soon as alternative supplies were available.

79. According to Mr. Ian Smith, last year's exports of manufactured goods from Southern Rhodesia to Zambia amounted to about £30 million, representing half of Southern Rhodesia's exports of manufactured goods. As previously indicated, the Southern Rhodesian authorities are studying the possibilities of increased sales to the Republic of South Africa in order to make up for the possible loss of the Zambian market.

F. OIL EMBARGO

Republic of South Africa and Southern Rhodesia: oil embargo

80. Chapter III (paras. 732-735) contains information on the Republic of South Africa and the oil embargo.

81. Reports concerning oil supply reaching Southern Rhodesia indicated that transport of oil from South Africa was continuing mainly by road and rail. It was believed that Southern Rhodesian imports of oil from the Republic of South Africa were in excess of its requirements under the rationing scheme enforced after the illegal declaration of independence. Nevertheless, Rhodesia recently increased the price of gasoline by 25 per cent.

Portugal and Southern Rhodesia: oil embargo

82. Information on Portugal and the oil embargo is contained in chapter III (paras. 724-731).

83. In early May, it was reported that Southern Rhodesia's main source of gasoline, was through Mozambique by rail from South Africa. In clarifying his Government's position, the Foreign Minister of Portugal, Mr. Franco Nogueira, told a press conference that Portugal had never taken part in sanctions against Rhodesia, but that she had undertaken not to play any active part in supplying oil. He is quoted to have stated that Portugal had also guaranteed not to pass on to Rhodesia "any oil arriving in Mozambique that was for us, or Zambia, or Malawi". The Foreign Minister added, however, that Portugal could not "interfere with private transport to and from landlocked countries".

84. Confirming an earlier news account that the United Kingdom has made an agreement with Companhia do Pipeline Moçambique-Rodésia to pay the latter £54,000 a month, presumably on the understanding that the pipeline stays closed to oil for Rhodesia, Mr. Bottomley announced in a written answer in the House of Commons on 17 May 1966 that the Government has agreed to help for the time being with the expenses of the Mozambique pipeline undertaking and in particular the expenses of maintaining and repairing the pipeline and installations since the pipeline was out of use.

Effects of international economic sanctions against Southern Rhodesia

85. During the months of April and May, Southern Rhodesian authorities viewing the Territory's position six months after the unilateral declaration of independence said that Britain's sanctions had had little effect and that the shops were still full of goods. They maintained that, in these circumstances, Southern Rhodesia had begun the London talks from an apparent position of strength.¹

86. At a meeting of the Gwelo Chamber of Commerce on 2 May, Mr. Musset, "Minister of Commerce and Industry", said that Southern Rhodesia had increased her trade with many countries outside Africa since last November's declaration of independence. As a result, he said, it was hoped that those countries which had imposed sanctions against Southern Rhodesia were fully aware of the change in conditions in a situation which could only develop towards their detriment. Since "independence", Mr. Musset said, Southern Rhodesia had received many visitors who were interested in making investments in the country and who were ready to reap the rich benefits presenting themselves.

87. On 15 June 1966, Mr. Bottomley, the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations, stated in the House of Commons that: "Recent evidence, including some significant admissions by the régime itself, amply justifies the claims I made in April about the effectiveness of our policy, which we are resolved to maintain until Rhodesia returns to constitutional government." Mr. Bottomley added: "We have succeeded in obtaining overwhelming international support for our economic sanctions against Rhodesia, and have now denied to the illegal régime access to nearly all Rhodesia's normal export markets outside South Africa."

88. In response to a remark by Mr. Edward Taylor (Glasgow, Cathcart, C.) that Southern Rhodesia tobacco was reported to be selling in the Dutch and German markets, Mr. Bottomley replied that, "The Hon. Member's information does not coincide with my own judgement". Mr. Bottomley also confirmed that there was no truth in the rumours that the Government was considering lifting the sanctions during the talks.

89. According to The New York Times of 3 July 1966, a recent British report states as follows: "Neither the business community nor the régime now believe that sanctions will be short-lived and that a brief period of belt-tightening will suffice to survive them. The realization of this was a major factor in directing Smith to ask for talks. With each week the economic situation gets more difficult. Time is therefore not on Smith's side."

90. Mr. Ian Smith, on the other hand, said at an annual farmers' congress held in Salisbury on 21 June 1966: "The last thing we are going to do is throw in the sponge." He stated that his "Government" intended to keep up its struggle, despite the pressure of international trade sanctions.

91. Mr. Clifford Dupont, the "Officer Administering the Government", stated at the opening of the "Rhodesian Parliament" on 22 June 1966, that the imposition of sanctions had led to the introduction of import controls. He added that the resultant inconveniences to the peoples of Rhodesia, and more particularly to the merchants, had been accepted in a most generous and co-operative manner. These controls had not been without positive advantages, which industrialists had been quick to exploit. While clear evidence was already to be seen of the accelerating development of industry, new products in substitution of imports were constantly coming on the market. Industrialists were continuing to expand and diversify, and were producing goods now which they would not have thought possible to make a few months ago. Planning for early implementation of major new developments in manufacturing industry was proceeding satisfactorily.

92. According to Mr. Dupont's statement, the régime would continue to provide to the maximum extent such foreign currency for capital goods and raw materials as was required for new investment projects. Efforts would continue to be made to expand trade and to establish closer economic relations with other countries on a bilateral basis.

CHAPTER IV*

SOUTH WEST AFRICA

A. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE AND BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY DURING 1965

1. On 17 June 1965, at its 372nd meeting held in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, the Special Committee adopted a resolution on South West Africa in which it reaffirmed the right of the people of the Territory to self-determination and independence and condemned the South African Government for its persistent refusal to apply the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Special Committee. It recognized as legitimate the struggle of the people of South West Africa for the effective exercise of the rights set forth in the United Nations Charter, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, and appealed to all States to give the African population of the Territory the necessary moral and material support to enable them to accede to national independence and to exercise fully their sovereignty over their country's natural resources. By the same resolution, the Special Committee, after having referred to the expressions of concern by the Governments of the African States adjacent to South West Africa regarding the military installations established in the Territory by the South African Government, including the installation of an important military base in the Eastern Caprivi Zipfel, requested the South African Government to withdraw all the bases and other military installations situated in the Territory and to refrain from using the Territory in any way whatever as a base for the concentration of arms or armed forces for internal or external purposes. It recommended to the General Assembly and the Security Council to take appropriate steps to safeguard the sovereignty of the people of South West Africa and the integrity of the Territory and to this end to take the necessary concrete and adequate measures in co-operation with the Organization of African Unity (OAU). It also drew the attention of the Security Council to the serious situation prevailing in the Territory. The Secretary-General was invited to request all States to inform him of the measures they had taken to carry out operative paragraph 7 of resolution 1899 (XVIII) of 13 November 1963; he was further invited to report to the General Assembly and the Special Committee on the application of that paragraph.

2. The text of the resolution was included in the Special Committee's report to the General Assembly at its twentieth session (A/6000/Rev.1,¹ chap. IV, para. 285). That report, as well as the reports submitted by the Special Committee to the General Assembly in 1964 on South West Africa (A/5800/Rev. 1,² chap. IV) and on the implications of the activities of the mining industry and of the other international companies having interests in South West Africa,³ were considered by the General Assembly at its twentieth session. On 17 December 1965, the General Assembly adopted three resolutions relating to South West Africa.

3. In preambular paragraphs of resolution 2074 (XX) of 17 December 1965, the General Assembly, after recalling its resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960 containing the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and other earlier resolutions of the General Assembly and the Special Committee with respect to South West Africa, noted with regret the policy of the Government of South Africa to circumvent the political and economic rights of the indigenous people of South West Africa through a large-scale settlement of foreign immigrants. In the ninth preambular paragraph, the General Assembly noted "with deep concern the serious threat to international peace and security in that part of Africa, which has been further aggravated by the racist rebellion in Southern Rhodesia". The operative paragraphs of the resolution read as follows:

"[The General Assembly]

"1. Approves the chapters of the reports of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples relating to South West Africa;

"2. Endorses the conclusions and recommendations of the Special Committee contained in its report on the implications of the activities of the mining industry and of the other international companies having interests in South West Africa;

"3. Reaffirms the inalienable right of the people of South West Africa to freedom and independence, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV);

"4. Condemns the policies of apartheid and racial discrimination practised by the Government of South Africa in South West Africa, which constitute a crime against humanity;

"5. Considers that any attempt to partition the Territory or to take any unilateral action, directly or indirectly, preparatory thereto constitutes a violation of the Mandate and of resolution 1514 (XV);

"6. Considers further that any attempt to annex a part or the whole of the Territory of South West Africa constitutes an act of aggression;

"7. Calls upon the Government of South Africa to remove immediately all bases and other military installations located in the Territory of South West Africa and to refrain from utilizing the Territory in any way whatsoever as a military base for internal or external purposes;

"8. Condemns the policies of financial interests operating in South West Africa, which mercilessly exploit human and material resources and impede the progress of the Territory and the right of the people to freedom and independence;

"9. Condemns the policy of the Government of South Africa to circumvent the political and economic rights of the indigenous people of the Territory through a large-scale settlement of foreign immigrants in the Territory;

"10. Condemns the Government of South Africa for its refusal to co-operate with the United Nations in implementing the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples;

"11. Requests all States to take immediate action to carry out paragraph 7 of General Assembly resolution 1899 (XVIII);

"12. Appeals to all States to give the indigenous people of South West Africa all necessary moral and material support in their legitimate struggle for freedom and independence;

"13. Requests the Security Council to keep watch over the critical situation prevailing in South West Africa in the light of the ninth preambular paragraph of the present resolution."

4. By resolution 2076 (XX) of 17 December 1965, concerning special educational and training programmes for South West Africa, the General Assembly expressed its appreciation to those Member States which had made scholarships and travel grants available for the use of South West Africans, and invited them and other States to consider including in their offers scholarships for secondary education and for vocational and technical training. It further invited Member States to give sympathetic consideration to requests by the Secretary-General for the placement in their secondary, vocational or technical schools of candidates awarded scholarships under the Special Training Programme for South West Africans. Once again, the General Assembly requested all Member States, and in particular South Africa, to facilitate the travel of South West Africans seeking to avail themselves of educational opportunities provided under the Programme.

³ Ibid., annex No. 15, document A/5840.

It also called upon South Africa to co-operate with the Secretary-General in implementing the resolution. The Secretary-General was asked to disseminate information concerning the scholarship programmes in South West Africa and elsewhere. He was further asked to consult with the Special Committee concerning the implementation of the Programme and to report thereon to the General Assembly.

5. The draft resolution recommended by the Special Committee with respect to petitions concerning South West Africa (A/6000/Rev. 1, chap. IV, para. 292) was adopted by the General Assembly as resolution 2075 (XX).

B. INFORMATION ON THE TERRITORY GENERAL

6. Information on the Territory is contained in previous reports of the Special Committee to the General Assembly.⁴ Supplementary information on recent developments is set out below.

INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE

7. The oral proceedings in the South West Africa cases initiated on 4 November 1960 by the Governments of Ethiopia and Liberia against South Africa closed on 15 November 1965. On 29 November, at its 100th public sitting on the cases, the International Court of Justice announced its decision on South Africa's request of 30 March 1965 that the Court make an inspection in loco of South West Africa and also visit South Africa, Ethiopia and Liberia and one or two other sub-Saharan countries. By 8 votes to 6, the Court decided not to accede to the request in respect of proposals concerning South West Africa and South Africa, and by 9 votes to 5, in respect of other areas.

8. In a communiqué dated 13 December 1965, the Court indicated that it had had a general exchange of views in relation to the various questions which arose in the cases and had then recessed to enable the individual members of the Court to study those questions. The communiqué stated that under the established practice of the Court, after the hearing is concluded, a period of time proportionate to the nature of the case is allowed to judges in order that they may study the oral arguments of the parties. It further stated that the extended and complicated nature of this case was such that this study would require a period of time somewhat longer than usual.

9. Members of the International Court resumed private deliberations at The Hague on 3 March 1966 to formulate the judgement of the Court on the South West Africa cases.

STATEMENTS CONCERNING THE FUTURE OF SOUTH WEST AFRICA

10. The strategic relationship between the Territory of South West Africa and South Africa, which had been one of the main considerations advanced by South Africa in 1946 in support of its plea for the incorporation of the Territory,⁵ was again stressed during 1965 by leading spokesmen for the South African Government.

11. The Prime Minister of South Africa, Mr. H. F. Verwoerd, is reported to have said, in an address to a National Party meeting in De Aar, South Africa, on 27 June 1965, that if South West Africa should fall into the hands of hostile nations it could be fatal to South Africa. At the United Nations, it was said that it would be a small matter for South Africa to submit a report on South West Africa or to allow a United Nations presence there, the Prime Minister observed. South Africa had known from the beginning, however, that once interference was allowed it would increase step by step. No one should have any illusions about that. It was because of the potential danger to South Africa, the Prime Minister explained, that Prime Minister Malan had said that South Africa would not allow foreign interference in the Territory, and that was why the Republic had recently been using all its diplomatic power and legal skill to try and prevent that danger from coming to its borders.

12. The South African Minister of Justice, Mr. Balthazar Vorster, addressing a National Party congress in Windhoek, South West Africa, on 31 August 1965, informed the gathering that what affected South West Africa affected the Republic, and vice versa. After referring to "the Langa and Sharpeville riots in 1960, not as isolated examples of something spontaneous" but as "part of a coming invasion", the Minister of Justice was quoted as saying:

"My department has a responsibility to keep law and order here, and that order was given the Union at the time of the Mandate. We intend obeying it; we will see that there is peace, law and order here. Do not be lulled into a sense of false security because we have repelled the past. Make sure it does not happen again. The assault on South Africa will come again; it will come from outside and it will be better organized than before. You as citizens not only have a duty—you have a holy right to defend what belongs to you. You must help the police—particularly in the beginning until reinforcements can be brought from elsewhere. I do not say this to frighten you, but because history has shown me that these things only succeed where citizens are weak. It will only happen once and not again. You do not get a second chance to react and defend."

13. In his annual New Year's Day message, the Prime Minister of South Africa, with reference to the cases before the Court, stated:

"Whatever the outcome, which we await with hope, South Africa will not fail in her duty to her principles, to those entrusted to her care, and to the preservation of the safety and integrity of the Republic."

14. Later, in a pre-election speech in Windhoek on 15 March 1966, the Prime Minister appealed to the electorate not to give itself over to wild reaction when the International Court gave its verdict later in the year, whether or not that verdict was in favour of South Africa. He stated:

"I ask you to leave the matter in the calm hands of the government you are about to elect. The government will do what is in our common interest. We shall follow the safe, right and sensible road, and we shall trust in the support of the public of South and South West Africa."

⁵ Official Records of the General Assembly, Second part of first session, Fourth Committee, Part I, annex 13 (A/123).

15. The Prime Minister explained that the issue before the voters was to decide which party could best ensure prosperity, the safety of the country and continued White rule. It was the Government's firm belief, he stated, that South and South West Africa were one country and this had saved the Territory from more interference.

SECURITY LEGISLATION

Criminal Procedure Amendment Act, 1965

16. In its previous report (A/6000/Rev. 1, chap. IV, para. 11), the Special Committee informed the General Assembly that legislation authorizing the detention of individuals for a maximum of ninety days had been suspended in both South West Africa and South Africa in January 1965.

17. Later that year, however, a more severe detention provision, commonly known as the "180-day clause", was brought into force in South West Africa and South Africa by the Criminal Procedure Amendment Act, No. 96 of 1965. This Act authorizes the detention in solitary confinement of State witnesses or potential State witnesses in certain types of criminal proceedings for a maximum of six months if the Attorney-General is of the opinion that they might be tampered with or intimidated, might abscond, or if he deems it to be in their interests or in the interests of the administration of justice. The Act requires that persons so detained be visited in private at least once a week by a magistrate; other visitors are prohibited except with the consent of the Attorney-General or of an officer delegated by him. The specified types of criminal proceedings relate, inter alia, to the contravention of various provisions of the Suppression of Communism Act, sedition, murder, arson, kidnapping, treason and robbery, and include any conspiracy, incitement or attempt to commit the specified offences.

18. The Act specifically provides that no court shall have jurisdiction to order the release from custody of any person so detained, to pronounce upon the validity of any regulations made by the Minister concerning such detentions, or jurisdiction over the refusal of consent to a visitor.

Official Secrets Amendment Act, 1965

19. The Special Committee had also referred in its previous report to a proposed amendment to the Official Secrets Act to prohibit the disclosure of any information concerning any military or police matter under penalty of a fine of up to R1,500, or seven years' imprisonment, or both. The disclosure of any information concerning military matters was already prohibited by the original Act. The Bill was passed by the South African Parliament after being amended to insert a definition of "police matter" to mean any matter relating to the preservation of the national security of the Union (including South West Africa) or the maintenance of law and order by the South African Police. It came into force in South West Africa and South Africa as Act No. 65 of 1965.

Police Amendment Act, 1965

20. By the Police Amendment Act, No. 74 of 1965, the South African Parliament has authorized any member of the police force to "search without warrant any person, premises, other place, vehicle, vessel or aircraft, or any receptacle of whatever nature" at any place in the Republic or South West Africa within a mile of the border of any foreign State or territory and to "seize anything found by him upon such person or upon or at or in such premises, other place, vehicle, vessel, aircraft or receptacle". As explained by the South African Minister of Justice, the Amendment Act is a further security measure, intended to give the police the power to combat as effectively as possible the infiltration of well trained saboteurs trained elsewhere in Africa.

21. The police force operating in South West Africa, including the Special Branch, forms part of the South African Police Force. Apart from the regular police and Special Branch functions, the South African budget also provides funds for "secret services" under the budget headings for police, information services, and Bantu administration, all of which are among the integrated services covering both South Africa and South West Africa.

Other proposed legislation

22. The Emergency Planning Bill referred to in the Special Committee's previous report was not passed by the South African Parliament during 1965, but was to be reintroduced after the election of a new Parliament in 1966. As previously stated, the Bill, which defined sabotage as one of the events which could lead to the declaration of a state of emergency, would give South Africa broad powers to muster men and materials in times of emergency. It would render able-bodied men and women from seventeen to sixty-five years of age who had not had military training and did not fall within specified categories of public service liable to compulsory training to cope with natural emergencies.

23. Another Bill scheduled for consideration during 1966, the Suppression of Communism Further Amendment Bill, would debar anyone listed or convicted under the principal Act from practising as an advocate, attorney, notary or conveyancer.

DEPORTATION OF SOUTH WEST AFRICAN POLITICAL LEADERS

24. The Windhoek Advertiser reported on 22 March 1966 that Mr. Sam Nujoma, the President of the South West Africa People's Organization (SWAPO) and another SWAPO official, who was not identified, had landed at the Windhoek international airport on 20 March. After being detained at the airport by the security police, the report stated, they were escorted back to their chartered aircraft the following day, on 21 March, and ordered to leave the Territory. They were reported to have landed in Livingstone and were expected to reach Lusaka on 22 March, en route to Dar es Salaam.

25. It should be noted that the deportation of South West Africans from the Mandated Territory has been regarded within South West Africa itself as beyond the legal authority of the State. In this connexion, attention is drawn to the following passage in the judgement of the High Court of South West Africa in the case of R. v. Skrywer:⁶

"According to the generally recognized principles of the law of nations a state is entitled to expel at any moment an alien who has been admitted into its territory . . . A corollary to this principle is that a state is by international law not entitled to expel its own nationals."

INCIDENT IN OVAMBOLAND

26. According to another report appearing in The Windhoek Advertiser on 17 March 1966, a telegram addressed to the Secretary-General of the United Nations,⁷ and reading as follows, had been sent from Windhoek on 16 March by an official of SWAPO:

"SWAPO leader Leo Shoopala shot dead by South African Government armed Chief Jacob Ashipala of Ovamboland stop Fedelis Ijabo seriously wounded stop Situation in Ovamboland very tense stop."

27. The Windhoek Advertiser quoted the following statement concerning the situation as having been issued by the State Information Department:

"The South African Police are investigating a shooting incident in Ovamboland.

"According to information available, a Bantu man died as a result of a shot fired by an Ovambo headman while another Bantu man was slightly injured.

"Situation by no means tense in the area."

28. No further information could be obtained through the Department, according to The Windhoek Advertiser.

GENERAL ELECTIONS

29. General elections were held in South West Africa on 30 March 1966 to select six members of the South African House of Assembly from the Territory and the eighteen members of the territorial Legislative Assembly. Suffrage is restricted in the Territory to Europeans aged eighteen years or older. On 15 September 1965, there were 37,264 registered voters in the Territory.

30. The Nationalist Party, which is affiliated with the governing party in South Africa, and the United National South West Party, which is not affiliated with the opposition party in South Africa, contested all seats. The Nationalist Party candidates won all seats in both houses. The leader of the United National South West Party, Adv. J. P. Niehaus, who had been the only Opposition member of the South West African Legislative Assembly, lost his seat.

31. Unofficial election results gave 21,380 votes for Nationalist Party candidates and 9,808 for United National South West Party candidates for the six seats in the House of Assembly. The results of the Legislative Assembly elections showed a total of 21,240 votes for Nationalist Party candidates against 10,187 for the Opposition Party candidates, compared with 19,360 votes for Nationalist Party candidates and 13,216 for their opponents in the 1961 general elections to the territorial Legislative Assembly.

32. The election and appointment of the four Senators from South West Africa for five-year terms in the South African Senate had taken place earlier. On 26 November 1965, the territorial Legislative Assembly, meeting with members of the House of Assembly from South West Africa, elected two Senators. With effect from 6 December 1965, the State President nominated two other Senators from South West Africa, one of whom is required to be nominated "mainly on the ground of his thorough acquaintance, by reason of his official experience or otherwise, with the reasonable wants and wishes of the Coloured races of the Territory".

LOCAL GOVERNING BODIES

33. In all of the main urban areas of the Territory, there are local governing bodies composed of Europeans; in Native locations, there are African advisory boards. In 1965, following the establishment of the first of a series of separate townships for Coloureds, the Administrator was authorized by the Legislative Assembly (Ordinance No. 34 of 1965) to establish in each Coloured township either consultative or management committees, composed of Coloured residents, elected, appointed, or partly elected and partly appointed. A consultative committee would serve in a consultative capacity to the European local governing body, whereas a management committee would be charged with some of the functions of the European local governing body with respect to the Coloured township. The Ordinance also contains provisions governing the eventual establishment of separate local governing bodies for the Coloured townships.

OTHER POLITICAL DEVELOPMENTS

34. During 1965, a series of anonymously issued pamphlets attacking SWAPO, the South West Africa National Union (SWANU) and the National Unity Democratic Organization (NUDO), and supporting the recommendations of the Odendaal Commission, were reportedly distributed clandestinely in Native locations and Native reserves in South West Africa.

35. In September 1965, following a visit earlier in the year by chiefs and headmen from South West Africa to various parts of South Africa, including the Transkei, the Prime Minister of South Africa approved of a further visit to the Republic by a party of about 145 teachers, ministers and nurses of the Ukuanyama tribe of Ovamboland.

36. It will be recalled that, by letter of 1 December 1965 to the Chairman of the Fourth Committee,⁸ the Reverend Markus Kooper, and Messrs. Mburumba Kerina and Nathanael Mbaeva announced the formation of a new organization, the South West Africa National United Front (SWANUF). In a petition dated 11 February 1966 (A/AC.109/PET.474), Mr. Kerina informed the Special Committee that NUDO, SWANU, the South West Africa United National Independence Organization (SWAUNIO) and the South West Africa Workers Union (SWAWU) had united to form SWANUF. According to a statement by the SWANU External Council contained in a petition dated 21 March 1966 (A/AC.109/PET.457/Add.1), SWANU was not and had never been a party to SWANUF.

DEFENCE AND POLICE FORCES

37. During the past several years, the Defence and Police Forces, combined for South Africa and South West Africa, have been reorganized for co-ordinated and complementary operations. Stress has been laid on mobility, to enable both personnel and equipment to reach any point in South or South West Africa at short notice, if necessary, ready for emergency action.

38. Within South West Africa, the first police helicopters and police dog units were brought into service during 1965 and early 1966. On two occasions during 1965, on 26 March and 9 and 10 September, coast artillery practice was held, firing seawards within six nautical miles off the coast of Walvis Bay; advance warnings of the military exercises were given in the territorial Gazette and in the Press. Cadet inspection parades were held during the year at various European schools. Whereas in October 1964, air cadets at the English Medium High School in Windhoek had been informed by the Captain of the South West Africa Command that the object of cadet training was not to train soldiers, but to develop qualities of leadership, self-discipline and esprit de corps, during 1965 school cadets were being informed by a Commandant at inspections that they formed the basis on which successful military gymnasiums of the future would be built, and that they were the men who would have to defend the country in the future.

CRIME STATISTICS

39. There has been a noticeable increase in crimes of violence and other serious crimes in the Territory during recent years. In the Windhoek District, which had a total population of 50,191 at the end of 1963 (24,450 Africans, 21,817 Europeans and 3,924 Coloureds), published statistics indicate that the number of serious cases, such as murder, rape, culpable homicide and serious thefts perpetrated by Europeans, Coloureds and Africans has risen from sixty-two in 1962 to ninety-two in 1963, 116 in 1964 and 142 in 1965 before the end of the year.

40. During 1963, a total of 5,225 persons appeared before the Windhoek Magistrate's Courts. Of these 4,423 were found guilty; these included 183 on charges of common assault, 119 on charges of assault with intent, 246 on charges of theft, 121 on charges of house-breaking, twenty-five on charges of stock theft, 125 on charges of trespassing, and six on charges of robbery. It is presumed that the great majority of other cases involved offences against the pass laws. During 1964, the Windhoek Magistrate's Courts heard a total of 8,519 cases, and during 1965, before the end of the year, a total of 11,335 cases.

41. In the one other district, for which recent statistics are available, the Okahandja District, which had a population of 10,000 non-Whites and 2,193 Whites according to information published on 9 February 1965, the number of criminal cases increased from 834 in 1964 to 1,047 during the full year 1965; serious crimes in the district rose from nine in 1964 to fifteen in 1965.

FRIENDS OF RHODESIA FUND

42. In February 1966, European business and professional men and farmers in South West Africa formed a branch of the "Friends of Rhodesia" organization to collect donations to be forwarded to the central organization in the Transvaal, where fuel was being purchased and sent to Rhodesia. Stop order form letters were published in the local Press whereby individuals could authorize their banks to make regular monthly payments from their accounts to the "Friends of Rhodesia Fund S.W.A." until further notice.

IMPLEMENTATION OF THE RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE ODENDAAL COMMISSION

43. During 1965 and the early part of 1966, the South African Government and the South West Africa

Administration have proceeded rapidly with the establishment of the infrastructure considered necessary for the establishment of "homelands" in South West Africa. It will be recalled that the Government deferred a decision on the actual constitution of the proposed "homelands" pending the conclusion of the case before the International Court and the acquisition of at least the greater portion of the European-owned farmlands to be included in these "homelands".

44. By 25 October 1965, over R18⁹ million had been spent for the purchase of more than 315 farms, and the Government planned to complete the farm-purchase programme within the next succeeding months. Many of the European farmers have elected to remain on their farms after selling them, paying rental to the Administration. The sales, which took place during a severe two-year drought which was only recently broken by heavy rains, are reported to have saved many farmers from ruin and to have contributed appreciably to the rising cost of living in South West Africa.

45. In the case of one European-owned farm in the Rehoboth Baster Gebiet, one of the proposed "non-White homelands" the owner asked R750,000; the Administration offered R508,000 and later withdrew its offer. The Administration issued a statement explaining that the owners of the farm had been notified that since the purchase of farms under the Odendaal Plan was still taking place on a voluntary basis, they were free to continue their farming activities until such time as the acquisition of the land might become necessary. The farm in question would fall under the Government's definition of a "White spot", meaning European-owned land within an area designated for another group.

46. The policy and practice of the South African Government in such a situation are reflected in the following extract from the official report of the Department of Bantu Administration and Development for the years 1960 through 1962, a report published in February 1965:

"The clearance of both 'black spots' and 'white spots' is one facet of the greater policy of the creation of Bantu homelands. To achieve this object the co-operation of all concerned is needed, since it is not always possible to acquire suitable land adjoining Bantu areas for ethnic grouping. Expropriation is resorted to only as a last and extreme measure."

47. If the Odendaal Plan for the creation of separate "homelands" for non-Whites and of a "White area" should be implemented in South West Africa, it may be expected that the following general policy of the Government, as described in the report of the Department of Bantu Administration and Development for the years 1960 through 1962, will be translated into law as has subsequently been done in respect of so-called "White areas" of South Africa:

"The general policy pursued in respect of the Bantu in the White areas (and vice versa) was explained by the then Minister of Native Affairs, Dr. H. F. Verwoerd—now Prime Minister—in a speech as follows:

"In these areas (that is, the Bantu areas or reserves) Whites have no claim to ownership and certain civil rights. There he is merely a temporary inhabitant assisting with the development of the areas, which, however, remain Bantu territories. There the rights of the Bantu are secured. There Whites have no permanent rights of any kind. But exactly the opposite applies in the White areas. There Whites have their rightful home and there the Bantu is the temporary inhabitant and guest, whatever the reason for his presence may be . . . the Bantu residential area near the city is only a place where Whites provide a temporary home in their part of the country for those who require it because they are employed by them and earn their living there'."

48. It may be recalled that the so-called "White area" of South West Africa would have a majority of "non-Whites". The Government's classification of a multiracial area as a "White area" reflects a distribution of legal rights rather than the actual composition of the population.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS AND DEVELOPMENT PROJECTS

49. Some 80 to 90 per cent of South West Africa production, consisting mainly of minerals, fish products, karakul and cattle, is for export.

50. Mineral exports rose to a new high of over R93 million in 1964, of which diamond sales accounted for R60.2 million and base minerals from the Tsumeb Corporation for almost R32 million. The Consolidated Diamond Mines (CDM), a subsidiary of De Beers Consolidated Mines, earned record profits of more than R33.3 million after taxes of over R17.9 million during 1964. CDM estimated that its profits for 1965 would rise to a new high of over R39.7 million, after taxes of R24.8 million. During the first eight months of the year, CDM produced an average of 115,000 carats per month. A new heavy media separation plant, opened in September 1965, was expected to increase production by 10,000 carats monthly. The new plant, operating on a day shift only, has a capacity double that of the old plant, which operated twenty-four hours per day. During 1965, De Beers Consolidated Mines, which had direct or indirect investments in the various offshore mining enterprises, acquired control of the Marine Diamond Corporation operating offshore along the southern coast of the Territory. The net profits of the Tsumeb Corporation, which bought its property for about R2 million after the Second World War, amounted to R7.6 million in 1964, after taxes of almost R3.5 million, compared with a net profit of R5.2 million after taxes of only R14,930 in 1963, when the Corporation was allowed to write off capital expenditure for a smelting plant.

51. Exports of karakul pelts, valued at over R15 million in 1963, reportedly rose to over R20 million during 1964. Fish production increased from R22.6 million in 1963 to R34.3 million in 1964. According to statistics published in January 1966, cattle exports had dropped to 252,000 in 1964 and to 246,000 in 1965, due in part to renovations of South African abattoirs; exports of carcasses fell from 3,822 to 192; and exports of small stock from 150,000 to 107,000 head. In the past, the export market for cattle and small stock has been restricted almost exclusively to South Africa. Toward the end of 1965, however, the South African Government granted a meat canning factory in Windhoek permission to export 250 tons of meat cuts monthly to overseas markets provided the meat was not required by South Africa. South Africa, to make up the loss in its own abattoir facilities, began buying frozen Rhodesian beef in December 1965.

52. There has as yet been no indication of sale of surplus livestock from the northern Native reserves. During the period of South African administration of the Territory, Africans in those reserves, who constitute a majority of the population of the Territory, and who own about two thirds of the cattle owned by Africans in South West Africa, have been prohibited from selling their livestock outside of their own areas, owing to stock diseases. Programmes to control various animal diseases in the northern reserves were being carried out during 1965. The South African Information Service reported in August 1965 that the Bantu Investment Corporation, which had already established a furniture factory in Ovamboland, "is already buying up the products of home industries, such as baskets and mats, for re-sale elsewhere". There is no indication of other exports from the area.

53. As indicated in the previous report of the Special Committee, the implementation of the five-year plan recommended by the Odendaal Commission and other territorial development projects was reflected in the estimates of expenditure beginning in the fiscal year 1964/1965. According to the audited accounts of actual revenue and expenditure for that year, territorial revenue amounted to R71 million, of which over R31 million was derived from income tax and diamond export duty and profits tax, and R17 million represented loans from the South African Government. In 1963/1964, territorial revenue amounted to R39.6 million of which R21.2 million was derived from income tax and the diamond duty and profits tax. Expenditure during 1964/1965 amounted to R63.2 million, including an appropriation of over R20.5 million to the Territorial Development and Reserve Fund, compared with a total expenditure of R33.6 million in 1963/1964, of which 9.3 million was appropriated to the Territorial Development and Reserve Fund.

54. Another record budget for the fiscal year 1965/1966 was approved by the territorial Legislative Assembly. The Legislative Assembly authorized the expenditure of R81,760,200 in 1965/1966, compared with an original appropriation of R71,389,600 in 1964/1965 and R37.2 million in 1963/1964. Of the 1965/1966 expenditure, over R55 million was to be financed from territorial revenue, R23 million from a South African development plan loan, and the balance from funds earlier appropriated from territorial revenue to the Territorial Development and Reserve Fund.

55. During 1964/1965, a R16.6 million administration building programme financed from the Territorial Development and Reserve Fund was being carried out in South West Africa, involving the construction of administration buildings, educational and health facilities and postal, telegraphic and telecommunication facilities.

56. Of a total authorized expenditure of over R8 million for administration buildings, on which expenditure was incurred during the fiscal year, projects in Native reserves accounted for R266,390, as follows: R49,892 for a new police station at Ondangua; R200,490 for a new police station at Runtu; and R16,008 for the construction of temporary buildings at Runtu.

57. Of a R4,769,412 school construction programme being carried out during 1964/1965, R3,315,966 was authorized to be spent for Whites, R799,534 for Africans and R673,912 for Bastards and other Coloureds. Educational facilities under construction for Africans involved an authorized expenditure of R185,225 for new schools in the Ovamboland and Okavango Native Reserves and an additional R19,083 for various buildings for educational purposes in Ovamboland; R149,000 for schools and hostels in other Native reserves; R45,000 for further additions to the Augustineum secondary and teacher-training school, which is to be abolished in the future; and R14,836 for prefabricated classrooms at Hoachanas, a Native reserve officially classified as "temporary", but which is in fact a part of the traditional homeland of the Rooinasie Namas.

58. School construction for Coloureds involved the expenditure of R406,925 in the Rehoboth Baster Gebiet, R190,625 for a high school and R216,300 for a hostel, and the expenditure of R266,987 for schools for Coloureds in three "White" urban areas, including Walvis Bay.

59. In an address given in September 1965 at the opening of a new prevocational school for European girls in Windhoek, a member of the Executive Committee of South West Africa stated that the Administration's aim was to provide for every child in the Territory—White, Coloured and African—"the opportunity to enjoy education as far as he is able". Referring to new school construction, he stated that in the foreseeable future R5.5 million was to be spent on school buildings for Whites, R2.25 million for Coloureds, and R250,000 for Africans. He said that "comparisons are odious" and that the amount of money spent on African education could not be compared with that earmarked for White education. "Such a comparison is not realistic", he explained. "It rests on another basis and on other principles."

60. In 1965, while temporary extensions were being made to the Augustineum, to enable 100 extra, or a total of 400, students to enter school in 1966, a new Augustineum was under construction near Windhoek, beginning in the fiscal year 1965/1966, at a cost of nearly R1.5 million. The new Augustineum Non-European Educational Centre was due to be completed by April 1967. The Centre was to provide hostel accommodation for 700 boys and girls aged fifteen years and over, and the facilities would include a high school curriculum leading to matriculation, a teachers' training course, a domestic department for girls, and technical training for artisans. However, it was reported that the site of the school was within the new Coloured township and, while the school would initially be open to all non-White groups, it would later be restricted to Coloured pupils. An announcement by the Administration in March 1966 indicated that the first teachers' training college for Whites was to be planned and erected within the Territory as soon as possible.

61. For hospital construction, the normal pattern of expenditure was reversed during 1964/1965, a major portion of the authorized expenditure being for non-Whites, and, for the first time in the history of the Mandate, for construction in Native reserves. Of a total expenditure of R3,661,976 authorized for hospital construction, R3,162,995 was for non-Whites: R2,041,508 for the 444-bed hospital and auxiliary equipment including a power station, laundry equipment, streets, etc., at Oshakati (formerly known as Okatana) in Ovamboland; R712,837 for a new hospital at Runtu, the administrative centre of the Okavango Native Reserve, and R408,650 for hospital construction for non-Whites in "White" urban areas.

62. Posts, telegraphs and telecommunications projects under construction during 1964/1965 involved a total authorized expenditure of R154,604, of which R27,280 was to be spent for a new post office at Runtu, and the balance in "White" urban areas.

63. Toward the end of 1965, the construction of two townships in Ovamboland, at Oshakati and Ondangua, was reported to be well under way, as part of the Odendaal Plan. At Oshakati, residences and other buildings were being built for the Commissioner-General, for the indigenous peoples of South West Africa and for other government officials, and an African township of 152 four-room houses was also under construction. Other townships were to be built at about a dozen other places in Ovamboland.

64. Water development and road construction continued throughout the Territory during 1965 and early 1966.

65. During 1965, South Africa began constructing a jet airfield in the Eastern Caprivi Zipfel, a Native reserve bordering Angola, Zambia, Southern Rhodesia and Bechuanaland. The Odendaal Commission had recommended that the existing airfield at Katima Mulilo, which it described as serviceable for lighter aircraft, should be developed into one of sixteen proposed principal airfields for the use of big aircraft on scheduled services and for commercial and freight flights. Katima Mulilo airfield was built by WENELA, a South African labour recruiting organization. It has a 6,000 foot cement runway, the longest in South West Africa before the completion of the 9,000 foot tarmac runway at the new international airport outside Windhoek. The Katima Mulilo airfield is situated two miles southeast of Katima Mulilo, administrative headquarters of the Eastern Caprivi Zipfel. Reports concerning the new airfield indicate that it is situated some fifteen miles from Katima Mulilo, at Mpacha.

66. The President of Zambia has claimed that the airfield being built at Mpacha is a military air base and warned that any Zambian firms supplying materials for the construction of the airstrip would be severely dealt with. In October and November 1965, the President of Zambia, as well as the SWAPO representative in Zambia (A/AC.109/PET.434), stated that there were fighter planes on the new airfield. South African Government spokesmen have denied that the new airstrip is a military base. The South African Minister of Transport has explained that an airstrip with hardened runways was being constructed at Katima Mulilo to serve as an emergency landing for the South African Airways on overseas flights and to enable civil air contacts between the Republic and the administrative headquarters there to be maintained in times when the roads in the Caprivi Strip were impassable.

67. The WENELA-built airfield has heretofore been used for the latter purpose. South African Airways jet services to Europe include a weekly service via Windhoek, Luanda and Las Palmas. More frequent service to Europe is provided by South African Airways flights from Johannesburg to Luanda (1,344 nautical miles), continuing non-stop to Las Palmas (3,238 nautical miles) and from there to Europe.

68. Other new airfields are under construction in various centres of the Police Zone, at Ruacana, the site of the proposed Kuene power development scheme, and in the Ovamboland and Okavango Native reserves on the northern border of South West Africa.

C. CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE¹⁰*Introduction*

69. The Special Committee considered the question of South West Africa at its 395th, 396th and 398th meetings held in New York on 11, 16 and 22 March 1966, and at its 417th, 418th, 420th, 433rd to 435th, 437th to 439th and 455th meetings held in Africa between 23 May and 22 June 1966.

70. At its 396th meeting, the Special Committee decided without objection to accept an invitation extended to it to send observers to an international conference concerning South West Africa to be held at Oxford, England, from 23 to 26 March 1966. At its 398th meeting, the Special Committee decided that the delegation of observers to the conference should consist of Mr. Gershon Collier (Sierra Leone), Chairman of the Special Committee, and Mr. Hans Tabor (Denmark).

71. During its subsequent consideration of the question of South West Africa, the Special Committee had before it the report of its delegation to the International Conference on South West Africa (A/AC.109/L.290).

72. The Special Committee also took into account communications from forty-nine States referred to in the report of the Secretary-General to the General Assembly (A/6332) concerning the implementation of operative paragraph 7 of General Assembly resolution 1899 (XVIII) and operative paragraph 12 of General Assembly resolution 2074 (XX).

74. The Special Committee heard the following petitioners concerning South West Africa:

Petitioner	Meeting
Mr. Sam Nujoma, President, Mr. Solomon Mifima, chief representative in Zambia, and Mr. Peter Nanyemba, chief representative in Tanzania, of the South West Africa People's Organization (SWAPO) (A/AC.109/PET.434/Add.3)	417th

Mr. Moses Smith, Pan-Africanist Congress of South Africa (PAC) (A/AC.109/PET.484)	438th

75. Mr. Nujoma, speaking on behalf of SWAPO, said that the South African régime had increased its brutal measures of repression against the indigenous population of Namibia, otherwise known as South West Africa. News had recently been received from there that on 11 March 1966 the regional organizing secretary of SWAPO at Ukuambi in the northern region had been shot dead by one Jacob Ashipala, a Government-appointed sub-headman in the area, and that Mr. F. Ijambo, another prominent member of SWAPO, had been shot and seriously injured by Lukas Utoni, also working for the Government. A third member of SWAPO, Mr. Kashumua Nembija, had been arrested on 31 March by the so-called Bantu Affairs Commissioner at Ondangua, accused of wearing the clothes that had been worn by a murderer in Angola. Although he had not been in Angola and knew nothing of the affair, he had been beaten by the police and taken into custody. He had again been beaten and on 3 April 1966 had been found dead of his injuries.

76. It had been discovered that those killings had been secretly organized by the South African police. At the time of the shooting at Ukuambi, a large contingent of armed police from Tsumeb and Otjiwarongo had been rushed to the scene of the disturbances to protect the Government puppets. The Bantu Affairs Commissioner had announced publicly that the Government would supply more arms and ammunition (for further suppression and massacre of people in the area).

77. In violation of the Mandate under which the racist régime of South Africa administered South West Africa, military bases had been established in the country, the largest of them at Walvis Bay, the country's main seaport. There was a military training camp at Windhoek, the capital, and a huge air base had recently been constructed at Singalamwe in the Eastern Caprivi Zipfel, only fifteen miles from the Zambia-Namibia border. Equipment valued at £25 million including guns and heavy artillery was said to have been brought to the Caprivi air base from South Africa via Southern Rhodesia. According to his information, large tanks, such as those that had been used during the Second World War, were massed there and Southern Rhodesian jet fighters were stationed at the air base. It was also reported that construction of the air base had been carried out by Lewis Construction, a Southern Rhodesian company. Police stations attached to the South African Army had been erected throughout Namibia, and White housewives were being trained in the use of automatic weapons.

78. South Africa had not only imposed upon Namibia its ruthless system of apartheid but had also persistently pursued a policy of colonialism, exploitation and suppression. The system of labour recruitment of African workers from the so-called Native reserves outside the Police Zone endangered the welfare and future growth of the nation. The South West African Native Labour Association (SWANLA)—a Government-sponsored agency authorized to recruit labourers under contract to work on mines, farms and other European undertakings—served to impose inhuman conditions on the African workers. Direct or indirect economic pressure was often imposed upon Africans in their reserves: they were compelled to pay a Government tax, and since there was no other way of obtaining money they had to take up employment through the SWANLA contract system, under which they were recruited for a period of eighteen months or two years and were not allowed to leave. Wages of Africans employed in the mines were about R5 a month, whereas the average White man would consider himself underpaid if he received about R150. At least R100 a month would be necessary for a man to live a decent life. The cost of living in the country was high, and the average wage of R5 a month paid to African workers was barely enough to buy food and left nothing for clothing. A pair of trousers, for example, cost about R10 and a pair of shoes about R8, which represented about two months' wages. On expiry of their contracts Africans were forced to return to their reserves and only allowed to leave in order to work again through the same contract system. Their families were not allowed to accompany them, and a man working for two years could, by the end of his contract, save no more than R30—the maximum allowed by the Government. There were no family allowances or sick pay under the contract system. On returning home, an African could spend only a few days there before proceeding to work again under the same system.

79. Far from being trained as skilled workers, Africans were not allowed to be re-employed in the same factory in order to prevent them from acquiring skills; they were sent some miles away for their subsequent work, where they continued to be exploited.

80. The contract system was a systematic exploitation of man by man which was tantamount to slavery. Large foreign companies exploiting the country's mineral wealth were engaged in that slave trade; some of them, such as the Consolidated Diamond Mines of South West Africa, the Tsumeb Corporation, the fishing industries and the Farmers Union, were even represented on the Board of Directors of SWANLA to make sure of obtaining the necessary cheap labour. The South African colonial administration had thus turned the Mandated Territory of Namibia into a White man's paradise based entirely on cheap African labour. The companies which exploited the workers shared the profits after paying taxes to the fascist régime. Africans had no share in them whatsoever. The economy was entirely in the hands of Whites. Investments by foreign companies—most of them having come originally from South Africa—were continuing. Such investments were responsible for promoting oppression by the racist régime in South Africa. Mr. Nujoma appealed to the countries involved to prevent their investors from continuing such activities.

81. Mr. Nujoma said that the South African racist régime was incapable of administering the country or of helping it to proceed towards self-determination.

82. Africans had no right to vote and were not represented in any way, the whole governmental machinery being entirely run by Whites. Africans could be employed in government departments only as messengers and cleaners. The South African Government, far from preparing the people of the country for self-rule, was reducing them to slave status. Education for Africans was badly neglected. African children were educated only to standard six, and the secondary schools and technical institutions were not open to Africans at all. There was a teachers' training college, but only about 250 Africans had been able to attend. In parts of the country, there were no schools whatsoever, and in most homelands there were no hospitals or health facilities. He would like the United Nations to appoint a sub-committee to go to the country and see conditions for itself. At a time when advanced countries were exploring outer space and preparing to send men to the moon, the people of his country were scarcely allowed to cross the street without a pass. The country was virtually cut off from the rest of the world. There were harsh restrictions on information media, and no United Nations publications were available.

83. Although the nations of the world had joined forces to oppose German fascism during the Second World War, practical, moral and material support, including armaments, were being supplied to the fascist régime of South Africa to help it to carry out its declared racial discrimination and apartheid policy, and to perpetuate White supremacy and exploitation of the Africans in a most inhuman manner.

84. The Nairobi Sunday Nation of 8 May 1966 reported Rhodesia's Hunter jet fighters and Canberra bombers had been using South Africa's Caprivi Strip airfield, that Rhodesian Air Force jets had been using Lourenço Marques as a refuelling point, and that Rhodesia had negotiated an air pact with Portugal and South Africa to give them the advantage in case of any direct armed intervention. According to the article, military liaison between Rhodesia, South Africa and Mozambique had been established along the 700-mile Zambian border shared by the three countries.

85. That report indicated the existence of a military pact between the régimes of Salazar, Verwoerd and Smith in order to maintain White supremacy and to continue the suppression and exploitation of the African masses in southern Africa. The military build-up and the stockpiling of war material in Namibia by those régimes was a threat to the peace and security not only of the people of Namibia and Africa, but of the whole world. The period pending the judgement of the International Court of Justice was being used to speed up that military build-up in exactly the same way as Hitler had done in the early 1930's. It was a deliberate manoeuvre aimed at the large-scale massacre of the African people in Namibia and at the implementation of the Odendaal Commission's recommendations, which had been completely rejected by the African majority.

86. That Commission had recommended the partition of the country into tribal groupings, the so-called Bantustans or homelands, reminiscent of the Nazi concentration camps, from which Africans would only be allowed out to work as cheap slave labour on farms and mines for the benefit of the White settlers. His organization strongly resisted the Bantustan policy. He recalled that on 10 and 11 December 1959, the South African police had opened fire and killed twelve Africans who had resisted an attempt to move them from the area where they were living. Such resistance had continued among the African population, the majority of whom were still living there. His people were determined to carry the struggle to the bitter end, and fight to the last man, with sticks and stones if need be, against its fully armed oppressors.

87. SWAPO strongly condemned the atrocities committed by the Verwoerd colonial administration. It also wished to place on record its strongest rejection of the unilateral action taken by the régimes of Portugal, Southern Rhodesia and South Africa to use Namibia as a dumping area for war material, and demanded that the United Nations or some other competent international body undertake an on-the-spot investigation to discover exactly what kind of armaments had been installed. He said that poison gases were being developed in South Africa; he had no information in that connexion regarding South West Africa, but his people feared that one day, when they rose up against the régime, poison gas would be used against them.

88. The sentence of life imprisonment imposed upon Mr. Bram Fisher, on 9 May 1966, had proved to the world that the policy of apartheid was similar to Hitler's fascist policy in Europe before the outbreak of the Second World War.

89. After the Sharpeville massacre in 1960, the South African economy had been in a state of panic. Its gold and foreign exchange holdings had fallen below the $280 million danger point defined by its bankers to the critically low figure of $216 million, and collapse had been averted only with the help of powerful financial interests in such countries as the United States of America and the United Kingdom.

90. The history of British colonialism clearly showed that the British Government had deliberately granted independence to the South African minority White settlers in 1910, knowing full well that the country belonged to the Africans; and it was the British Government that had transferred the Mandate for South West Africa to the racist régime of South Africa. It was again that Government that encouraged the rebel régime of Ian Smith in Zimbabwe (Southern Rhodesia) to further its colonial aims and continue to suppress and exploit the African people. The reluctance of the United Kingdom Labour Government to take positive action against the rebel régime in Southern Rhodesia had proved to the world that Prime Minister Wilson was still dreaming of the now-diminishing British Empire. That Government had undoubtedly proved to be Africa's enemy number one. While it pretended to support the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the United Nations Charter, the United Kingdom was in fact the largest investor in South Africa, with investments amounting to £1,000 million.

91. On 6 November 1962, the United Nations General Assembly had adopted its historic resolution 1761 (XVII) calling upon Member States to end diplomatic and economic relations with South Africa, stop the supply of arms to it and break communication links with it. The United Nations had passed the resolution with a view to solving the South African situation by peaceful means. Many Member States were still, however, supplying the minority White régime of South Africa with arms and ammunition.

92. On 7 April 1965, the newspaper Le Monde had reported that on his arrival in Johannesburg, Mr. Raymond Schmittlein, Vice-President of the French National Assembly and Chairman of the France/South Africa parliamentary group, had stated that France would continue to sell arms to South Africa and would improve its trade and cultural relations with that country. The Tanzania Standard of 14 May 1966 reported the purchase by South Africa of sixteen French Super Frelon helicopters for an estimated £10 million. It had further been reported by the South African pro-Government newspaper, Die Vaderland, that the French Government had promised to supply the apartheid Government of Dr. Verwoerd with submarines by 1970.

93. The New York Times of 25 March 1966 had reported:

"While the main thrust of Portugal's military activities lies in Africa in what Professor Salazar termed a successful campaign against terrorists, her European defence ties are now entirely on a bilateral basis with Germany, France and Spain. The forthcoming visit here by German Foreign Minister Gerhard Schroeder may lead to the expansion of the arrangements under which a German jet air base with accompanying facilities is being built at Beja in southern Portugal. In exchange for these facilities, Germany is to provide Portugal with jet combat aircraft for the African operations. France, which sells Portugal Alouette helicopters used in Africa and is building frigates for her, has been granted a missile tracking station on the Azores. This week, Portugal's Defence Minister and army Chief of Staff visited France."

94. The Tanzania Standard of 12 May 1966 had stated:

"The former West German Defence Minister, Mr. Franz Joseph Straus, said that there was no white-black confrontation. Apartheid certainly contained aspects which were open to severe criticism, but it was wrong to speak of oppression and exploitation of Africans. The achievements of the whites in making economic provision for the Africans were impressive ... Mr. Straus said."

95. It had meanwhile been reported that the former West German Defence Minister was visiting South Africa as a guest of the Government-sponsored South African Foundation, a body with offices in most European capitals whose main purpose was to make propaganda, foster the gospel of apartheid and invite European immigrants to South Africa and Namibia.

96. The influx of large numbers of White immigrants constituted a danger to the future of his country. Namibia had only a small African population, and it was the intention of the Verwoerd régime to speed up the flow of European immigrants so that, when the principle of one man one vote was applied, the White settlers would automatically take over power and permanently dominate the Africans. The South African Foundation was providing money towards the air fares of immigrants to South Africa, when they were transferred to South West Africa. Unless the United Nations took action to prevent it, the country was likely to become completely White.

97. While the slave trade was internationally prohibited, forced labour tantamount to slavery still existed in southern Africa, where Africans from Mozambique, Angola, Namibia, Bechuanaland and Southern Rhodesia were recruited to work in the gold mines under shocking conditions.

98. According to the United States Department of Commerce, American companies had invested $353 million in South African enterprises controlled by them at the end of 1962. That year, the Financial Year Book of Southern Africa had listed an American, Mr. Engelhard, as Director of the two organizations that recruited black labour for the South African gold mines: the Recruiting Corporation and the Witwatersrand Native Labour Association. Those recruiting companies brought hundreds of thousands of Africans from Mozambique, Angola, Bechuanaland, Namibia and Southern Rhodesia. Mr. Engelhard was also listed as Director of the Chamber of Mines, which set the wages and conditions of the Africans in the mining industry, and which met once a month to co-ordinate the major finance and gold-mining companies in their dealings with the labour recruiting companies and the Government. He was a director of the controlling company of Harry Oppenheimer's famous South African mineral and diamond empire, whose profit before taxes had been estimated at a third of a billion dollars. Engelhard—only one of many Americans who profited as much as the South African Whites from the cheap black labour made possible by apartheid—had announced a record profit by his company of almost $3 million in 1964, and had declared:

"This progress (in South Africa) in my opinion will be advanced if the rest of the world shows understanding to the problems which exist. Inaccurate reports, whether emanating from well-meaning sources or otherwise, only aggravate the difficulties and play into the hands of communist supporters."

99. In January 1965, the Norton Company of Worcester, Massachusetts, had opened a new abrasive factory near Johannesburg. The Chairman of the company, Mr. Milton P. Higgins, had declared: "I think South Africa is going to remain a strong country, led by White people. I think foreign countries should leave South Africa alone. If they leave you alone, you will get on and do a great job."

100. In February 1965, Mr. J. H. Fulford, President of the Jeffrey Company of Ohio, opening a new factory in Germiston, had said: "We have complete faith in the soundness of the South African economy, full confidence in the stability of your country, and know that the substantial investments that we have made in the past and the further investment we are presently making are all in good care."

101. On 20 March 1965, General Norstad, the retired NATO Supreme Commander, now Chairman of the Atlantic Council of the United States and President of the Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corporation, had flown into Johannesburg to negotiate new investments and had announced: "We have full confidence in South Africa, not only we as individuals, but the United States and the American people as well." Mr. Harold Boeschstein, Chairman of the Owens-Corning Fiberglas Company, who had accompanied General Norstad had added: "Any boycott moves do not reflect the general opinion of the United States or of its businessmen, but we have great appreciation of South Africa's importance as an ally and as an economic force in the free world."

102. An American, a prominent investor both in South Africa and Namibia, Mr. N. G. Banghard, Vice-President of the Newmont Mining Corporation which, in association with American Metal Climax, operated a copper mine at Tsumeb in Namibia, had said in 1962: "We know the people and the Government of South Africa and we back our conviction with our reputation and our dollars."

103. While SWAPO appreciated the action taken by the United States Government in banning the export of arms and ammunition to South Africa, it had noted that an appreciable number of American businessmen were providing massive economic aid to the Verwoerd régime to further the aims of exploitation and suppression of the African peoples in both South Africa and Namibia. It appeared in practice that the colonial régimes of Salazar, Verwoerd and Smith were watching over the interests of monopolies whose headquarters were in New York, Bonn, Paris, London and Washington.

104. His organization called upon the Governments of those countries to stop the supply of arms and ammunition to the South African racist régime, because it believed that suppression of a people by others constituted a constant threat to the peace and security of the world.

105. It had been proved that the apartheid régime of South Africa ruled Namibia with brute force and had totally failed to promote moral and material well-being and the progress of the indigenous population towards self-determination and national independence. His organization therefore called upon the United Nations to take positive action against the South African colonial administration. Mr. Nujoma said that the South African Government had reached a point of no return. It was resolved to continue its policy of suppression, and even contemplated the annexation of the country to its White minority. It was well known that the South African Government had refused to allow a United Nations presence in the Territory. His organization's demand was that the Mandate should be terminated and immediate independence granted. The United Nations had passed many resolutions, none of which had been implemented. It should, if necessary, send a police force to rid the country of the fascist régime.

106. In response to questions concerning his organization, Mr. Nujoma explained that SWAPO was supported by such sectors of the population as workers and teachers. It numbered some 100,000 members, most of whom lived in rural areas, and was the only political party effectively opposing South Africa. The aim of SWAPO was to convince the present corrupt régime that it had no future, and to create a new society in which every person would be equal before the law. White settlers would be welcome. His organization was Pan-African and supported the OAU, which it would join upon the country's accession to independence. Within South West Africa, his organization enjoyed no official recognition and individual members were constantly arrested. He himself had been arrested at the Windhoek airport on 20 March 1966 and kept in a cell throughout the night, whence he had been taken at gunpoint the next morning and deported to Zambia. The régime also subsidized armed bands of indigenous thugs to harass the opposition organizations, and, as he had already informed the Committee, members of SWAPO had even been killed.

107. As to relations between SWAPO and SWANU, Mr. Nujoma observed that his country believed in democracy and that a choice between the two organizations would rest with the people.

108. Mr. Booys, speaking on behalf of the South West Africa National Union (SWANU), said that in view of all that had previously been said by various petitioners regarding South Africa's violation of the Mandate in South West Africa, he would confine himself to a few brief remarks which would bear out those made by previous petitioners. The people of South West Africa did not intend to make a career of petitioning. However, while the energetic efforts of the Afro-Asian countries were appreciated, it was the duty of SWANU to express its misgivings at the failure of the United Nations to implement its resolutions on South West Africa.

109. SWANU had, of course, appealed repeatedly to the international community to intervene in the explosive situation prevailing in South West Africa, or at least to establish a United Nations presence there. It had done so because it held the international community—through the League of Nations, to which, by the decision of the International Court of Justice on South West Africa, the United Nations was the successor—fully responsible for the presence of the South African administration in its country. SWANU expected the United Nations to rectify the situation. The idea of the Mandate as a "sacred trust of civilization" had not been created by the people of South West Africa. If their demands were not justified, then they should be told so; and if the organized international community could not act against the notorious Verwoerd régime or honour its obligations, it should not hesitate to say so. If it failed, SWANU would not, and it was determined to liberate South West Africa by any means at its disposal.

110. While it realized that the United Nations was trying to find a peaceful solution to the question of South West Africa, SWANU wished to issue a very friendly warning that, so long as the Verwoerd régime exploited South West Africa morally, socially and economically, there could be no peace in that country.

111. The South African régime had been greatly assisted by certain major Powers which were themselves Members of the United Nations and of its Security Council and which had demanded legal clarification before taking action against the Verwoerd régime. Dr. Verwoerd had thoroughly exploited that state of affairs and had consolidated his own position by occupying South West Africa and dividing its people into racial, religious and tribal groups. Meanwhile, those same major Powers were looting that country at a rate which, if continued, would, according to United Nations estimates, exhaust South West Africa of all its wealth within the next twenty years.

112. The question of race also had to be taken into account, although he would welcome any evidence that it played no role in the violation of human rights. The Western Powers had intervened when they had considered that White lives were in danger in the Congo, but had done nothing after the massacres of African people in Windhoek and Sharpeville and were ignoring events in Zimbabwe. Instead, the great Powers were paying starvation wages to the people, from their investments in South West Africa, and were supplying arms to Verwoerd's minority régime.

113. He reiterated SWANU's stand on South West Africa. SWANU strongly believed in the right of self-determination for the people of South West Africa and advocated immediate independence. That was SWANU's message for the Special Committee.

114. In response to a question concerning relations between SWANU and the South West Africa People's Organization (SWAPO), and the size of his organization, Mr. Booys said that SWANU believed in uniting with all movements which were guided by principles similar to its own. Its present membership was 10,000.

115. Mr. Smith, speaking on behalf of the Pan-Africanist Congress of South Africa (PAC), said that he and his colleagues had been granted hearings by the Special Committee in Addis Ababa in 1962 and in Dar es Salaam in 1965. He would, however, be failing in his duty if he did not speak again on behalf of the South West African people who suffered from the monstrous practice of apartheid and who were committed to overthrowing White domination and oppression in their Territory.

116. The South West African issue could not be treated as an isolated case, since the evil policies practised against that Territory also affected the people of South Africa. Despite the fact that, for more than fifteen years, the case of South West Africa had been under consideration by the General Assembly and that numerous resolutions had been passed both by that body and by the Special Committee itself, there had been no change of heart on the part of the South African racists, who clung obstinately to their policy of apartheid in the hope that the South West African case would ultimately become a dead issue in the United Nations. However, he believed that, if the indigenous population of South West Africa pursued their struggle relentlessly, their effort would eventually be crowned with success. The South West African case constituted a challenge to the structure and the ideals of the United Nations. South Africa had violated the Mandate, which should have been transferred to the United Nations Trusteeship System. It was evident that only force would now make the South African racists change their minds.

117. The International Court of Justice had decided, at The Hague in 1950, that it was the duty of the United Nations, to which responsibility for South West Africa had been transferred from the League of Nations, to safeguard the sacred trust of civilization through the maintenance of effective international supervision of the administration of the Mandated Territory. The Special Committee should not be deluded into believing that the South African régime would accept any verdict against it—unless, of course, that verdict was implemented by force.

118. It was not his intention to refer again to the inhuman torture of the indigenous inhabitants of South West Africa, regarding which he had provided the Special Committee with detailed information in 1962. However, he wished to state that apartheid was practised even more intensively in South West Africa than in South Africa itself.

119. The South African Government was building an air base in the Caprivi Strip in South West Africa. If such military developments remained unchecked, the whole of southern Africa would one day be locked in a mortal struggle for which both the United Nations and those Powers which had supplied South Africa with the necessary equipment and technical information would be responsible. Despite the fact that, according to the terms of its Mandate, South Africa had undertaken not to build military or naval bases on South West African territory, it had nevertheless proceeded to do so. The United Nations should therefore take the necessary steps to deprive South Africa of its Mandate. Without wishing to find fault with the United Nations, he considered that it was hypocritical to adopt numerous resolutions without taking any concrete action. It was evident that further resolutions, however strongly worded, would never move the South African racists. If that fact were accepted, there was then no other alternative but to take up arms. The South African racists had long prepared for such an eventuality and, on the eve of his election campaign early in 1966, Verwoerd had exhorted the White electorate not to panic at the Court's verdict, since South Africa's interests in South West Africa would be safeguarded. There could be nothing more explicit than the statements of such people as John Naser who, as Chief Native Commissioner for South West Africa, had warned the indigenous population that, since the Afrikaners had won that Territory by bloodshed, the only way they would regain it was also by bloodshed. That was not a personal expression of opinion but the official Government view shared by all White racists in southern Africa.

120. Apartheid was no different from Hitler's national socialism and the only difference between the so-called Native reserves and Hitler's concentration camps was their geographical situation. The South African White racists, who had long oppressed the indigenous people of South West Africa, were now haunted by visions of revenge which had no foundation in reality. They should, however, endeavour to behave like human beings or they would one day perish in a bloody revolution.

121. The great nations of the world would have to realize that empires built on subjugation and maintained by force would one day collapse under their own weight. In the end, right would triumph over might.

General statements by Members

122. The representative of Denmark observed that the situation in South West Africa undeniably presented a dark picture. More than forty years had passed since the League of Nations had entrusted the Mandate to the Union of South Africa. That country had not been empowered to exercise sovereignty over the Territory, but was expected to promote to the utmost the material well-being and social progress of its inhabitants. It was a tragic fact that the Government of South Africa, far from fulfilling those obligations, had kept the African people in constant political and economic subjection and had ignored all the United Nations resolutions on the subject. Its policy was a flagrant violation of the Mandate, of the United Nations Charter, of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

123. In approaching the problem of how to secure rapid termination of the Mandate, however, care should be taken not to repulse those whose support was necessary. The General Assembly would of course be competent to cancel the Mandate if the claim that South Africa was violating it was validated. The question had, however, been brought before the International Court of Justice by Ethiopia and Liberia, and it would be contrary to the general principles of law for a political organ like the General Assembly to take a decision pending the Court's judgement, which was expected before the convening of the twenty-first session of the General Assembly.

124. The violation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights was perhaps even more important politically than the case before the International Court. By adopting the General Assembly resolution classifying South West Africa as a Non-Self-Governing Territory, Member States had undertaken a moral and legal obligation to act in accordance with resolution 1514 (XV) and secure the freedom of the people of that Territory.

125. Frequent reference had been made to paragraph 2 of Article 94 of the Charter in calling for the use of force against South Africa if the International Court should find that that country was violating the Mandate and Article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations, in which event the Security Council might take action. Such measures, however, would not go far enough: it was important also to secure revocation of the Mandate and self-determination for the South West African people.

126. Even in the absence of a clear-cut decision by the International Court, the United Nations could continue its efforts to secure the right of the people of South West Africa to independence. Although a decision on the practical approach should be deferred pending the International Court's decision, there was no doubt about the goals to be pursued. The Special Committee should at its present session confine itself to a general resolution stressing the inalienable right of the people to independence, condemning South Africa's rejection of that right, its denial to the African people of the most elementary political rights, its attempt to annex the Territory, its apartheid policies and its preparations to implement the Odendaal report, and deciding to consider appropriate recommendations to be made to the General Assembly immediately following the International Court's decision. By that course, the Committee would avoid making recommendations that might have to be changed even before they reached the General Assembly. Only by such a step-by-step approach could the Committee be certain of receiving all the support it needed from Member States.

127. The representative of Denmark stated that his Government and people were outraged by the arrogant position adopted by South Africa with regard to its obligations under the Charter and to the resolutions of the various organs of the United Nations, and wholeheartedly wished that deplorable situation to be brought to an end in the interests of human dignity and peace.

128. The representative of Iran said that the deteriorating situation there was further aggravated by conditions in Southern Rhodesia and in the Territories under Portuguese subjugation, and the situation in the whole of southern Africa was fraught with danger.

129. Developments were moving towards South Africa's total annexation of the Mandated Territory and its stricter application of the policy of apartheid, on the pretext that those measures were necessary for strategic reasons. The further tightening of oppressive laws by means of the Criminal Procedure Amendment Act, the Official Secrets Amendment Act, the Police Amendment Act and other proposed legislation was designed to repress any action by the African population to secure their fundamental rights. The rapid preparations being made to implement the odious Odendaal report completed that sombre picture.

130. Against such a background the Africans could not be expected to remain passive. Petitioners had warned of the danger of sudden racial conflict, and even Chief Albert Luthuli, the Nobel Peace Prize winner and advocate of non-violence, had said that in the face of uncompromising refusal to abandon a policy which denied oppressed Africans their rightful heritage, no one could blame them for seeking justice by violent methods.

131. South Africa's so-called Minister of Justice had alleged that the Langa and Sharpeville riots in 1960 had been planned by the communists, and that his department had a responsibility to keep law and order in South West Africa. He had then warned that the people should not be lulled into a sense of false security because they had repelled the past. He had finally concluded that the assault would come again; it would be better organized than before. The situation was thus depicted by both sides as set for impending racial conflict.

132. The time had therefore come for the Special Committee to undertake a systematic study of the means of overcoming South Africa's intransigence, and of thwarting the further consolidation of the alliance between Verwoerd, Smith and Salazar. The Iranian delegation was ready to support any action to restore to the African people their inalienable rights to freedom and justice, and to avert a catastrophe in southern Africa.

133. In accordance with the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, the United Nations should do its utmost to revoke the Mandate and thus secure the independence and freedom of the people of South West Africa.

134. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania observed that the Special Committee had heard petitioners on South West Africa and had found that the situation had not improved. The United Nations had passed many resolutions condemning the apartheid régime for its suppression and exploitation of the people of South West Africa, yet that régime continued to flout world opinion.

135. The Special Committee had been informed by Mr. Sam Nujoma, President of SWAPO, that South Africa had increased its measures of oppression against the indigenous population of Namibia, and that the regional organizing secretary of his organization had been shot dead, another member seriously wounded and yet another brutally murdered by the South African police. Those murders were crimes against humanity committed to suppress the struggle for emancipation by the people of South West Africa, and humanity must condemn South Africa for its policy of colonization and exploitation.

136. It was distressing that in spite of all the declarations that had been made, certain countries and influential individuals continued their activities in support of the apartheid régime in Pretoria, to the detriment of the indigenous population. The study on the implications of the activities of foreign monopolies having interests in South West Africa had shown that the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the United States of America, Belgium, the Federal Republic of Germany and many other countries had extensive interests in the Territory, and were making immense profits through dispossessing the African people of their natural resources and means of existence. He quoted an extract from the International Trade Magazine of the United States Department of Commerce, reproduced in the New York Herald Tribune of 24 February 1964, stating that United States exports to South Africa in 1963 had increased by $30 million over the preceding year.

137. Paragraph 7 of General Assembly resolution 1899 (XVIII) of 13 November 1963 urged all States to refrain from supplying arms, military equipment, petroleum or petroleum products to South Africa. The study of the activities of foreign monopolies had shown that, in giving extensive leases to the financial houses, South Africa derived certain advantages such as the supply to it of some of the items produced, or partial control of their utilization or distribution. One of the active interests was the Gulf Oil Corporation, which helped South Africa to obtain the very items that the General Assembly resolution had urged should be withheld.

138. A still more sinister aspect was the accumulation of military forces and arms by the oppressors. The petitioner, Mr. Nujoma, had, at the Special Committee's 417th meeting, quoted the newspaper Le Monde as having reported that the Vice-President of the French National Assembly and Chairman of the France/South Africa parliamentary group, Mr. Raymond Schmittlein, had stated that France would continue to sell arms to South Africa and improve its trade and cultural relations with it.

139. The representative of Tanzania also recalled reports that South Africa had bought sixteen French Super Frelon helicopters at a cost of some £10 million and that France was to supply submarines by 1970, in direct contravention of General Assembly resolution 1899 (XVIII).

140. The existence of the racist minority régime in Southern Rhodesia, and its collaboration with South Africa, further aggravated the serious threat to international peace and security.

141. The time for paying lip-service had passed. It was now time for action. The free African people had made repeated proposals to rid humanity of the scourge of apartheid and colonial suppression. The Tanzanian delegation had always sought the implementation of the various General Assembly resolutions in relation to South West Africa, notably resolutions 1514 (XV) and 1899 (XVIII), which would create the necessary conditions for the attainment of freedom by the African people. The representative of Tanzania expressed the hope that those whose actions were detrimental to liberty and progress would come to be guided by reason and justice instead of by their lust for immense profits.

142. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that the question of South West Africa had already been discussed on many occasions. The reason why it appeared so often on the Special Committee's agenda was that Verwoerd's fascist régime was imposing a reign of terror, practicing exploitation and systematically refusing to apply United Nations resolutions. Furthermore, that régime was constantly taking new measures to oppress the indigenous population, paying no heed to United Nations appeals and recommendations. Measures should therefore be taken to compel the Verwoerd régime to respect United Nations decisions. The situation had recently been aggravated even further by the odious Odendaal Plan for the creation of the ten Bantustans, which were nothing else but ghettos. Immediate decisions were needed.

143. The only reason why the South African Government had been able to violate the Charter and decisions of the United Nations with impunity for twenty years was that it received aid from abroad and even from certain Members of the United Nations. General Assembly resolution 1899 (XVIII) had stressed that the Government of South Africa was receiving support from certain Western Powers. The studies undertaken had proved that all sectors of South Africa's economy and industry were in the hands of foreigners and White settlers. International monopolies were rampant in South Africa, just as they were in Angola or Mozambique. Their head offices were in London or New York. Thus the president of one mining corporation operating in South West Africa and South Africa had recently told a New York Times correspondent that his company's annual profits amounted to 27 per cent of the invested capital. The other United Kingdom and United States companies established in South Africa were making profits of the same order. The Observer had stressed the fact that those monopolies would redeem their investments in four or five years. If that was so, it was because apartheid gave foreign companies certain advantages in their task of exploiting the country. Such exploitation, far from diminishing, was being intensified from month to month. In November 1964 The Times had reported that foreign monopolies had decided to invest $260 million in South Africa. That had been an open challenge to the United Nations, to the OAU and to world public opinion. General Norstad, the former Commander-in-Chief of NATO, had stated in March 1965, in the course of a visit to Johannesburg on behalf of the industrial company he headed, that he had full confidence in South Africa's future. That confidence, he had said, was not just the confidence of one individual but the confidence of the United States and the American people. Another United States industrialist had declared shortly afterward that the boycott of South Africa did not reflect the opinion of the American people as a whole. No one, therefore, should be surprised that those Members of the United Nations which had interests in South Africa and South West Africa were helping the racist Government and refusing to apply the resolutions of the United Nations.

144. Again, South Africa's Minister of Defence had recently boasted of having received 120 licences for the production of modern armaments. He said that he had obtained all the necessary technical data for assembling such weapons, as well as a licence from the Federal Republic of Germany for the manufacture of an ultra-modern type of bomb. He had added that South Africa no longer needed to buy arms abroad, and that the Western Governments had themselves established armaments factories in South Africa to equip its armed forces. Military co-operation with the Federal Republic of Germany had recently been strengthened still further, particularly in regard to the supply of nuclear warheads. A technical missiles institute had just been set up near Pretoria. In 1964 experts from the Federal Republic of Germany had built a missile guidance centre in South West Africa. The Aeronautical Institute was financed by the Armed Forces Ministry of the Federal Republic of Germany. Moreover, SWAPO had revealed that South Africa had built poison gas factories in its territory. Against whom was all that activity directed, he asked, if not against the African countries? A member of South Africa's Atomic Energy Board had declared that South Africa should produce nuclear bombs and use them against the African States.

145. In November 1965 the Pretoria military airfield had taken delivery of seven aircraft, making a total of sixteen aircraft purchased from the United Kingdom. On 21 October 1965, Flight International had reported that South Africa was to receive ultra-modern Italian jet aircraft, Macchi MB 326, which were capable of a speed of 800 kilometres per hour. At the time, that report had been open to doubt because the British engines for the aircraft should have come under the embargo, but any such doubt had been rapidly dispelled. Italy was going to deliver the aircraft, and their engines were to be assembled on the spot in South Africa. It should be noted that those aircraft could carry six 200 kilogramme bombs as well as rockets and machine-guns. It was thus clear that Verwoerd had aggressive intentions against the African countries.

146. While the United Nations listened to soothing speeches, a number of Western countries were continuing to aid the fascists in South Africa.

147. Resolutions 1899 (XVIII) and 1514 (XV) must, therefore, be applied with all speed. The Special Committee should launch an appeal to States Members of the United Nations and ask them to support the people of South West Africa in their struggle for the inalienable right of self-determination.

148. Some countries, including Denmark, had alluded to the decision which, it was said, the International Court of Justice was going to take; but the study of that case had already dragged on for a long time, and no one knew when a decision would finally be taken. Naturally, all that lost time only helped the Verwoerd régime. There was no justification for waiting any longer, for the situation had already lasted twenty years. Consequently his delegation supported the proposal made at the General Assembly's twentieth session that South Africa's Mandate in South West Africa should be terminated. A date must be fixed for the Territory's independence. The results of the studies concerning the aid which certain Western countries were giving South Africa should be submitted to the Security Council with all dispatch.

149. The Special Committee should recommend that the Security Council take the necessary decisions, under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, to compel all Member States to apply sanctions against the Smith, Verwoerd and Salazar régimes, and to force the three fascist régimes to fulfil their obligations.

150. His delegation would support all decisions that might be adopted to that effect.

151. The representative of Afghanistan said that after nearly twenty years of discussion on the South West African problem in the United Nations, no progress had been made. South Africa had not taken a single step to implement the resolutions of the General Assembly, and had refused to co-operate with the United Nations. The United Nations had a special responsibility in the matter and it was essential that it should find rapid means of ending the Mandate and of helping the people of the Territory to attain independence and freedom.

152. The Government of South Africa claimed that, with the end of the League of Nations, the Mandate had expired. How, therefore, could that Government explain its presence in South West Africa? It was clear that South Africa had no legal claim to the Territory and that its only desire was to make it into a colony for White settlers, thus perpetuating the most abject form of discrimination, using the people as a cheap source of labour and depriving them of their land, wealth and dignity. Such action was a crime against humanity.

153. In claiming that the Mandate had expired, the Government of South Africa was annexing the Territory as its own. Such a trend was extremely dangerous. The unilateral declaration of independence by Southern Rhodesia had clearly shown that racist minority régimes were capable of defying world opinion; in condoning the action of Southern Rhodesia, the United Nations might find itself facing another fait accompli.

154. In violation of the provisions of the Mandate, the South African Government had established military bases. The petitioners had mentioned that £25 million sterling of equipment, including guns and heavy artillery, were said to have been brought into the Eastern Caprivi Zipfel via Southern Rhodesia. The reasons for such military action were, it would seem, to repress the people's desire for independence and to resist any external attempt to liberate the country from foreign domination. The establishment of military bases and the collusion between South Africa, Southern Rhodesia and Portugal constituted a threat to international peace.

155. The South African Government was also seeking to prevent the indigenous peoples of the Territory from gaining their lawful political and economic rights by a large-scale settlement of foreign immigrants. The aim of that policy was twofold: to provide the White settlers with land and to ensure that if the "one man, one vote" principle were eventually adopted, the White settlers would outnumber the African population and thus gain legal control of the country.

156. It should also be remembered that the proposals of the Odendaal Commission were being implemented in South West Africa, thus intensifying discriminatory policies in that Territory.

157. The presence of South Africa in the Mandated Territory provided guarantees for mining and other companies. Big interests were at stake, which would obviously benefit from the continuation of South African domination.

158. His Government was anxiously awaiting the decision of the International Court of Justice on the question, but the legal aspect was one of secondary importance. The main issue was political: the termination of the Mandate and the accession of South West Africa to independence, in accordance with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

159. In resolution 1761 (XVII) of 6 November 1962, the General Assembly had called upon Member States to end diplomatic and economic relations with South Africa, and to cease to supply that country with arms. Although some countries had severed such relations, the resolution had had no effect on the situation. In order to find an equitable solution by peaceful means, the United Nations should take concrete measures against the minority régime in South Africa; otherwise an explosive situation, leading to terrible racial conflict, would result. The Security Council should again consider the question of South Africa, and examine the economic and commercial relations between that country and others. His own Government condemned the policy of racial discrimination practised by South Africa, had no political or economic relations with that country, and gave full support to the aspirations of the people of South West Africa.

160. The representative of Venezuela said that the United Nations had been trying for nearly twenty years to find the means of putting an end to the situation prevailing in South West Africa. Even before the inception of the United Nations, the League of Nations, which had granted South Africa a Mandate for South West Africa, had studied that problem.

161. His delegation had on many occasions stated the position of the Venezuelan Government. In the course of those twenty years, Venezuela had continually raised the question of South West Africa in the deliberations of various United Nations organs. The Venezuelan Government's position had remained unchanged in the Special Committee as it had in the General Assembly or in the Security Council, of which Venezuela had been a member. Indeed, the Venezuelan delegation had submitted a detailed account of the problem to the Fourth Committee at its 1460th meeting during the General Assembly's eighteenth session. That statement had been circulated as an official General Assembly document.¹² It contained a legal, political, humane and practical analysis of the problem; the members of the Special Committee might consult it in order to save time.

162. It was a matter of record that the situation in South West Africa had deteriorated further. His delegation was convinced that the United Nations should now take more vigorous measures. His delegation reiterated the position it had adopted at the General Assembly's twentieth session: the United Nations could not and should not rest content with adding more pious resolutions to the seventy or so which had already been adopted on the subject over a twenty-year period, and which always repeated the same things, without recommending any practical measures.

163. The United Nations must realize that the question fell within its competence. The General Assembly and its subsidiary organs should not have their hands tied on the pretext that the question was sub judice. On the contrary, it was the duty of the United Nations to act as the Mandatory, since the South African authorities had stated that they would not recognize the validity of decisions of the International Court of Justice that did not conform to their aspirations. As though to furnish immediate proof of that intention, the South African régime had put into effect the recommendations of the Odendaal Commission and decided to maintain the inhuman policy of apartheid.

164. Again, it had often been claimed that the problem was one of law. That was a pretext used by the administering Power to gain time and hold up such measures as the United Nations might take.

165. As the Venezuelan delegation had already stated at the General Assembly's twentieth session, it was the duty of the Special Committee to recommend to the General Assembly means and procedures calculated to put an end to the abnormal situation prevailing in the Territory and to give effect to General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

166. In his opinion it would be useful to set up a sub-committee whose functions would be:

(1) To study and propose to the Special Committee the most appropriate means of putting an end to South Africa's Mandate for South West Africa;

(2) To study and recommend the most appropriate means of administering the Territory until it attained independence, i.e., until resolution 1514 (XV) had been fully applied.

167. That sub-committee would report on its work to the Special Committee. The Committee in its turn would submit to the General Assembly at its twenty-first session, a report which could serve as a basis for the Assembly's discussions, without prejudice to the Court's decision.

168. He was prepared to make a formal proposal to that effect. Such a proposal would, moreover, be in keeping with General Assembly resolution 2074 (XX) of 17 December 1965, which indicated that the South African Government had failed in its international obligations with regard to the administration of South West Africa and that, by reason of its policy of apartheid, it had defied world opinion and lost all authority to administer that Territory. It was likewise in keeping with the conclusions of Commission I of the International Conference on South West Africa held at Oxford from 23 to 26 March 1966, especially those contained in paragraph 22 of annex I to document A/AC.109/L.290, and with the statements made by the petitioners.

169. The representative of Mali said that his delegation had subscribed unreservedly to the resolution which the Special Committee had adopted the previous year, recommending the General Assembly to hasten the liberation of South West Africa.

170. The essential problem in connexion with South West Africa was that of the use of arable land. The working paper prepared by the Secretariat (see paras. 1-68 above), and the testimony of the petitioners had proved that the South African régime had robbed the indigenous population for the benefit of White settlers from South Africa and Europe. The latter held over 47 per cent of the total land area. The Africans themselves only had poor land which did not produce enough. The members of the Special Committee had learned at first hand from petitioners the extent of the cynicism shown by those White settlers, sure as they were of the colonial and imperialist Powers' support. The Verwoerd Government, making its case even worse, was today contemplating the application of the disgraceful Odendaal Plan. As for the Bantustans, they constituted a flagrant negation of human rights.

171. At the General Assembly's twentieth session, the Malian delegation had called for the withdrawal of the Mandate from South Africa. It was the earnest hope of his delegation that the International Court of Justice would condemn the Verwoerd Government.

172. The problem of decolonization had been solved in principle by resolution 1514 (XV). It was now a question of finding practical solutions. The Special Committee should make recommendations to the Security Council and the General Assembly to safeguard the lives of the Africans. The Malian delegation, like that of Denmark, considered that the Mandate should be withdrawn from South Africa and that apartheid should be abolished. In addition the capitalist Powers should be asked not to invest any more capital in South Africa so long as that despicable régime lasted.

173. The petitioners had spoken of military bases established in South West Africa. His delegation declared itself firmly in favour of abolishing all such bases, which constituted a threat to international peace and security.

174. He thought that the General Assembly might hold a special session to consider what practical measures would be most appropriate for suppressing apartheid.

175. The Special Committee should give effect to resolution 2105 (XX) of 20 December 1965, which placed it under an obligation to seek the best means for the application of resolution 1514 (XV). In addition, a terminal date should be set for South Africa's presence in South West Africa.

176. His delegation would support any proposal to that effect.

177. The representative of India said that the United Nations had been dealing with the question of South West Africa since 1946, and a number of its organs had adopted resolutions expressing almost unanimous concern at the distressing situation in that Territory. It was a matter of profound regret and shame that in violation of every principle of the United Nations Charter, the pathologically racist Government of South Africa continued its policies, abusing the trust placed in it by the international community. By extending its policy of apartheid to South West Africa, the Government of South Africa was condemning its inhabitants to a life of misery and frustration. Its open support of the rebel régime in Southern Rhodesia was only the latest proof of South Africa's true belief which was racial superiority. That policy was cynically described as "Western civilization", "freedom", "anti-communism", and "uplifting the Native". It had continued for too long and should be ended at once if at all possible.

178. General Assembly resolution 1899 (XVIII) had urged all States to refrain from furnishing arms or military equipment to South Africa, to stop supplying petroleum or petroleum products to that country, and to desist from any action which might hamper the implementation of that resolution and of previous resolutions on South West Africa. His own delegation believed that prompt and faithful implementation of the resolution by all nations would make a peaceful solution probable. However, if certain Member States, in particular South Africa's major trading partners, continued to find specious reasons for refusing to co-operate with the United Nations, the people of South West Africa might well be obliged to use violent means to achieve their legitimate rights. It was madness to believe that superior military and economic progress would prevent such a development.

179. The situation had been aggravated by the report of the Odendaal Commission, the recommendations of which were already being put into force by the Government of South Africa, and which would have the effect of making South West Africa part of South Africa; segregation and ghetto structure were being extended in the Territory. The Commission's recommendations were based on the dangerous premise that non-White groups should live in separate areas. Such a policy was totally unacceptable to his delegation.

180. He recalled that in a private conversation as early as 1946, General Smuts had made it clear that South Africa would take no account of any United Nations resolutions on the subject of South West Africa. Although the United Nations had already declared that any attempt by South Africa to carry out the recommendations of the Odendaal Commission would constitute aggression, past experience had shown that that warning would carry no weight, since the racist régime in South Africa had with impunity flouted earlier resolutions of the General Assembly, and was engaged in an unholy alliance with Portugal and Southern Rhodesia to perpetuate White supremacy. The Special Committee would therefore have to exercise particular vigilance to defeat such designs.

181. Colonial oppression in South West Africa was only one side of the picture. The economic exploitation of the Territory was another. The study of the implications of the activities of the mining industry and other international companies having interests in South West Africa had shown the close relationship between colonial rule and economic exploitation, of which the petitioners had also given clear evidence. Not only South Africa, but several other countries were plundering the Territory, alleging their contribution to the well-being of the indigenous inhabitants. Such excuses were naive, for conditions in South West Africa were appalling. Political independence was essential if the country was to make progress economically.

182. Governments which had refused to implement the General Assembly's resolutions had often invoked the excuse that sanctions would have the most harmful effect on the people of South West Africa, in whose very cause they would be imposed. That was to sidetrack the issue. The people of South West Africa had many times declared that they would be willing to suffer any hardships to attain their goal.

183. Some members had considered that it was not proper for the Special Committee or for the United Nations to discuss the question of South West Africa because it was being considered by the International Court of Justice. Such an argument was intended to divert attention from the support given by the trading partners of South Africa. The International Court of Justice was dealing only with certain legal aspects of the problem, not with the social, political and economic aspects; it was not expected to rule on the Territory's political future. The United Nations was entitled, and indeed morally obliged, to examine the situation and to study ways of transferring power to the indigenous people. The Special Committee's own task was to ensure speedy implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, and his delegation hoped that it would not be deterred from its aim.

184. The Indian Government had been the first to bring up the issue of South African racist policies before the United Nations in 1945, and had taken effective measures to implement the United Nations resolutions on South West Africa. It deplored the illegal occupation of that Territory by the South African Government. At considerable sacrifice it had abandoned trade relations with South Africa long before the United Nations had appealed to its Members to do so. Diplomatic relations had also been severed. Similar action by others, and in particular the major trading partners of South Africa, would oblige that country to yield to world opinion. Only if the United Nations resolutions were implemented by as many countries as possible could the desired objective be attained by peaceful means; otherwise violence and bloodshed might become inevitable. He was not opposed to the speedy and orderly progress advocated by the representative of Denmark; but in the case of South West Africa such a policy had not been effective. Patience and restraint had been exercised for more than eighteen years by the United Nations, in the hope of a change. Time was running short, and if the South African racists refused to reconcile their policies with changing conditions in Africa, they would only have themselves to blame for the consequences.

185. The representative of Poland said that despite the fact that the South West African question had been under consideration by the United Nations for almost twenty years, the situation was deteriorating continuously. The Special Committee was already aware of the dire conditions in which the population of that Territory had lived for over forty years. But the most alarming feature was the intensification of military preparations, particularly the building up of a military base at the Caprivi Zipfel, the strategic location of which sufficed to indicate against whom they were directed.

186. It was clear from the Secretariat working paper (see paras. 1-68 above) that it was the explicit intention of the South African Government to annex South West Africa permanently and to consolidate its brutal policy of apartheid. South Africa continued to ignore the resolutions of the General Assembly and of other organs of the United Nations, calling for the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. In the view of his Government, therefore, South Africa had violated both the Mandate and the United Nations Charter, thereby failing to discharge its obligations as a Member of the Organization. It had been able to do so since it received the active support of certain influential Powers, primarily the United Kingdom and the United States, which had financial interests in South Africa and South West Africa. The activities of foreign Governments in South West Africa, where labour was cheap and profits high, constituted one of the main obstacles to its development.

187. Moreover, the United States, the United Kingdom and the Federal Republic of Germany were all helping South Africa to produce arms and military equipment. Emphasizing the importance of securing world-wide support for any action the Committee might take on South West Africa, he said that it was not by accident that its resolutions calling for material and moral support of the legitimate rights of the people to independence had been addressed to all States. The German Democratic Republic had accordingly made its views known on this question. He then read out the communication which had been received from that country:

"The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the German Democratic Republic welcomes the present session of the twenty-four-nation Special Committee of the United Nations in several African capitals, wishing the Committee meeting good progress. Referring to the discussion of the problem of South West Africa, I have the honour to state the following:

"In accordance with its principle attitude of condemning all forms of colonialism and neo-colonialism and of granting moral and material support to the anti-colonial liberation movements in their struggle for freedom and independence, the German Democratic Republic Government backs resolution 2074 (XX) of the United Nations General Assembly of 17 December 1965. It identifies itself with the rightful demand of the national liberation movement of South West Africa to grant full independence and national self-determination to the people of this Territory, and it considers the attempts of the apartheid regime in South Africa to annex this area an aggressive act which must be stopped with all available means. As early as 1963, the German Democratic Republic Government explained its stand on the apartheid policy of South Africa (document A/AC.115/L.26 of 2 August 1963), and it maintains neither diplomatic and consular nor economic relations with the Verwoerd regime. With particular indignation, the Government and people of the German Democratic Republic have learnt that with the help of the West German Federal Republic rocket bases and training grounds, which are used for military purposes, were established by South African authorities in South West Africa and that West German monopolies participate in exploiting the African population of South West Africa. Indicative of the relations between the West German Federal Government and South Africa, which are becoming ever closer, is not only the expansion of trade between the two States, but also the visit of Strauss, ex-War Minister and Chairman of one of the two ruling parties of West Germany, to South Africa, who, during this trip, expressed himself in favour of West German military aid to the apartheid State. The Government of the German Democratic Republic dissociates itself from this attitude of the West German Federal Republic and declares that it has always supported the struggle of the population of South West Africa for national self-determination and independence and that it will continue to do so in the future.

"Excellency, I request you to bring this position of the German Democratic Republic to the notice of the Committee members."

188. Germany had played a large part in the events that had led up to the present fate of the people in South West Africa, having colonized that Territory before the First World War. Between the two world wars, Nazi Germany had spread the ideology of White supremacy in South and South West Africa, and twenty years after the Second World War, the Federal Republic of Germany was abetting the régime that was following the Nazi policy of racial superiority and discrimination. His delegation was happy, however, that there existed another sovereign independent German State, the German Democratic Republic, that was giving its whole-hearted support to the struggle of the South West African people for their freedom and independence.

189. It was interesting to note that the same Governments which had opposed the imposition of sanctions against South Africa were also against the adoption of effective measures to crush the rebellion in Southern Rhodesia. His delegation had always maintained that the fate of Africans in South Africa, South West Africa, Zimbabwe and other Territories in that area was indivisible, since they were all faced with collusion between the forces of the international industrial combines.

190. The South African Government had so far managed to forestall concerted United Nations action and to destroy African opposition by its policy of fragmentation in South West Africa. The fact that the South West African case was still before the International Court of Justice had also been used as a pretext by the Mandatory Power to delay United Nations action.

191. The South West African question was a challenge to the conscience of mankind. In his delegation's opinion, there could be no exception regarding the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and the United Nations should not allow legal technicalities to prevent the people of South West Africa from attaining independence. The Special Committee should realize that South Africa and its allies were doing their utmost to consolidate their industrial and military empire in the southern part of Africa and to perpetuate the exploitation of Africans. His delegation therefore considered that the General Assembly and the Special Committee should agree upon concrete measures to divest South Africa of its Mandate and should demand the withdrawal of all military bases and personnel from South West Africa. It would support any resolution calling for the transfer of power to the people of South West Africa, in accordance with the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. He therefore suggested that the Special Committee should recommend that the General Assembly take the necessary measures to divest South Africa of its Mandate over South West Africa and call upon the Security Council to consider the steps to be taken in order to effect the transfer of power to a representative Government established as a result of general elections held under the supervision of the United Nations.

192. The representative of Tunisia emphasized that the question of South West Africa was a specifically colonial problem which came within the purview of the Special Committee and the General Assembly. The people of that Territory had to be freed from the grasp of a State which, although a Member of the United Nations, continued to oppress them politically, as well as economically and socially, despite all the recommendations of the United Nations. The situation prevailing in South West Africa was unworthy of modern times and all men had a duty to put an end to it. The legal arguments adduced by certain delegations, which had taken refuge behind the final decision to be taken by the International Court of Justice, should not stand in the way of the recommendations made by the majority of States Members of the United Nations that the Mandate for South West Africa should be withdrawn from South Africa.

193. In conclusion, he repeated that he would unreservedly support any specific steps which the Special Committee might take to meet the legitimate aspirations of the people of South West Africa.

194. The representative of Bulgaria said that the Special Committee had a great deal of evidence that South Africa was continuing to use South West Africa as a military base and was applying the régime of apartheid in it. The sanctions advocated by the United Nations against South Africa had not materialized, because of the co-operation and assistance which the Western countries and the members of NATO were continuing to furnish to that country. In resolution 2074 (XX), the General Assembly had unequivocally condemned the policies of financial interests operating in South West Africa and had denounced the pernicious activities of the imperialist monopolies. However, those very same financial interests were continuing to invest in South Africa and to support apartheid. The moment had therefore come for the United Nations to take steps to put an end to the activities of those large United States and other Western monopolies which were delaying the liberation of the people of South West Africa.

195. He considered that the judgement of the International Court of Justice related to only one aspect of the question and that it was now time to decide on the substance of the matter, namely, the question of releasing the people of South West Africa from colonial domination once and for all by ending South Africa's Mandate for that Territory.

196. Since General Assembly resolutions 1899 (XVIII) and 2074 (XX) had not achieved the expected results, the only course remaining was to request the Security Council to apply the sanctions envisaged in Chapter VII of the Charter to South Africa.

197. The representative of Chile observed that the question of South West Africa, with which the United Nations had concerned itself for so many years, had been the subject of countless studies, proposals and resolutions. It was time for effective steps to be taken to remedy the situation in that Territory, in which the people were still being oppressed. He therefore considered that the Special Committee should make an appeal to all countries to refrain from assisting South Africa in any way whatsoever. Moreover, he supported the Venezuelan representative's proposal that a sub-committee should be set up to study methods of ending the Mandate given to South Africa.

198. The representative of the Ivory Coast said that he wished to draw attention to certain events which had taken place since the adoption of the last General Assembly resolution on South West Africa. From year to year, the situation in South West Africa remained equally grim. Verwoerd and his henchmen had not given up the idea of implementing the odious plan set out in the Odendaal report. Verwoerd's objective was to annex South West Africa.

199. The indigenous population of the Territory lived under increasingly repressive legislation. Although the ninety-day detention law had been suspended, a new law, the Criminal Procedure Amendment Act, No. 96, which was even more stringent than the previous law, had come into force in 1965. Under the new Act, persons who were to serve or who might possibly serve as witnesses for the prosecution in certain criminal trials could be held incommunicado for six months if the State prosecutor so desired. The Official Secrets Act provided for a fine of R1,500 and imprisonment for seven years. The Police Amendment Act, No. 74 of 1965, authorized the police to search without warrant any person, premises or place, any vehicle, boat or aircraft, or any receptacle whatsoever. In addition to these strengthened repressive measures, he would also mention the massive deportations of Africans to reserves as well as the installation of military bases by the Government of South Africa against the wishes of the people of the Territory. South Africa had thus violated the commitment it had made as the administering Power of the Territory of South West Africa.

200. Despite the fact that one aspect of the question was being examined by the International Court of Justice, he considered that General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) should be applied to that Territory without delay. He agreed with the representatives of Denmark, Venezuela and Mali that the Mandate should be withdrawn from South Africa as soon as the International Court of Justice had handed down its judgement.

201. In conclusion, he said that his delegation would support any resolution calling for the application of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) to South West Africa, the withdrawal of South Africa's Mandate, and measures to restore the land to the indigenous population.

202. The representative of Syria stated that ample proof of the tyranny reigning in South West Africa could be found in the Special Committee's findings, in the legislation and statements of the Government of South Africa, and in the evidence of the discriminatory and inhuman treatment given the indigenous population in that Territory. Despite the condemnation of apartheid contained in General Assembly resolution 2074 (XX), South Africa's course had remained unchanged, and even continued to enjoy the approval of certain profit-seeking visitors.

203. The unilateral annexation of a Territory by a so-called "trustee" would lead to the proliferation of racial discrimination and other social and economic injustices, which would be not only a violation of General Assembly resolutions and of the principles laid down in the United Nations Charter, but also a denial of fundamental human rights.

204. In view of South Africa's persistent refusal to modify its policies, and in view of the time factor involved in awaiting the decision of the International Court of Justice, the Special Committee should immediately adopt a resolution reflecting the strongest possible opposition to South Africa's policies, and providing for the fixing of an early date for the liberation of South West Africa, action to prevent the Territory's annexation, and the application of appropriate sanctions.

205. The representative of Yugoslavia said that although the problem of South West Africa had been a matter of concern to the United Nations for twenty years, no change for the better had been perceived. Indeed, conditions had deteriorated. The Government of South Africa had refused to listen to the repeated demands of the United Nations not to extend its racist policies to South West Africa, and was pursuing an increasingly ruthless policy of integrating that Territory into South Africa and subjecting its inhabitants to racial discrimination. The indigenous population was denied basic human rights, and the recent introduction of the measures advocated by the Odendaal Commission was the culmination of an evil and dishonest policy. In the Fourth Committee, the representative of South Africa had denied that those recommendations were being implemented; but it was common knowledge that large sums had been spent to buy land preliminary to the establishment of so-called homelands for non-Whites and that the Government of South Africa was encouraging large-scale immigration into the Territory by White settlers. The aim of that policy was to ensure the continued supremacy of non-Africans. His delegation could only condemn it. The Special Committee, after studying the implications of the activities of the mining industry and of the other international companies having interests in South West Africa, had concluded that foreign economic activities constituted one of the major obstacles to independence. Large profits, cheap labour and favourable conditions for exploitation explained the desire of foreign investors to preserve the status quo in South West Africa.

206. Moreover the existence of military bases in South West Africa violated the Mandate and constituted a challenge to the demands of the United Nations and of world opinion. The action of the Government of South Africa was indeed contrary to the principles of the Charter and the Declaration of Human Rights, and it was only the active support of its allies which enabled it to continue that action.

207. Although time was running short, there was still a possibility of a peaceful solution provided that the measures recommended by the General Assembly were fully and promptly carried out by all Member States, and in particular by South Africa's principal trading partners. The use of force would have consequences which he thought no one, including South Africa's friends, would welcome.

208. It was the duty of the Special Committee and of the United Nations to take rapid action to put an immediate end to the shameful and dangerous situation in South West Africa.

209. The representative of Sierra Leone recalled that almost a year before, the Special Committee had adopted a resolution recommending that the General Assembly and the Security Council should take appropriate steps to safeguard the sovereignty of the people of South West Africa, in co-operation with the OAU. The General Assembly itself, in resolution 1899 (XVIII) had urged all States which had not yet done so to refrain from supplying arms, military equipment, or petroleum products to South Africa, and requested them to refrain from any action that might hamper the implementation of the resolution and of previous General Assembly resolutions on South West Africa.

210. However, as the petitioners had stated, arms and military equipment were still in fact being supplied to South Africa, and that country had so much petrol that it could afford to send Southern Rhodesia more than its daily requirements. Nothing had been done by the nations involved that could be construed as "not hampering" the implementation of the General Assembly resolution, and indeed some countries had even increased their trade with or investments in South Africa, thus helping to worsen conditions in South West Africa.

211. South Africa had been charged by the League of Nations to lead South West Africa to independence. Among other duties, it was supposed to promote the material and moral well-being and the social progress of the inhabitants. The International Court of Justice had on several occasions affirmed that South Africa's obligations had not lapsed with the end of the League of Nations and that it had no right unilaterally to change the status of South West Africa, which remained a Mandated Territory. South Africa had betrayed its sacred trust, for the lives of the indigenous inhabitants were daily being made more miserable; oppressive measures were constantly being introduced to reduce them to the state of animals; and the nations that could help to restore their dignity took no action but only made pious statements. The situation was deplorable.

212. South West Africa was potentially rich, but its economy was operated entirely for the benefit of the White settler minority and of foreign investors. Foreign capital took the highest net profit in the world from the Territory. The report of the delegation of the Special Committee to the Oxford Conference (A/AC.109/L.290) mentioned that in 1962 a White miner earned £1,200 a year, whereas his African counterpart earned only £100. The ratio of Africans to Whites was 7:1; yet White settlers owned twice as much land as Africans. Moreover, the land set aside for the Africans was poor and only afforded its inhabitants a bare subsistence. A deliberate policy of land shortage and enforced poverty obliged Africans to leave their homes and families for the White Police Zone, where they were ruthlessly exploited and lived in appalling conditions. Such a policy could only be described as slavery.

213. While every White child could go to secondary school and later to university, only about 0.3 per cent of Africans received secondary education; the education of most Africans, when they had any at all, ended at the lower level of the primary school. To aggravate matters, South Africa's declared policy was to allow the various communities to finance their education. Educational expansion was thus out of the question in the African reserve areas which were not even self-supporting.

214. It had been stated that South West Africa was not economically viable and could therefore not aspire to independence. However, its mineral and oil resources yielded a larger per capita income than that of many independent States; and it was one of the few countries with more exports than imports. All its resources were at present exploited by foreign settlers and monopolies; but if the indigenous people were allowed to govern themselves they would be starting off with a far higher potential than many newly independent States which were themselves making rapid progress. South Africa had used its legislative powers to further its own interests to the detriment of the indigenous population.

215. In contravention of the Mandate, South Africa had set up military bases in South West Africa. They served two purposes: to ensure that any point in the Territory could be reached in half an hour, thus terrorizing the population, and to constitute a threat to neighbouring African States. In that connexion he quoted from paragraphs 11 and 12 of annex III to document A/AC.109/L.290, which stated that the Security Council should be called upon to exercise its powers under Chapter VII of the Charter to restore freedom to the people of South West Africa, and that all States should be prepared to take action to achieve that end.

216. The Special Committee's task was clearly to take the initiative to end the dilatory methods of South Africa and of some Members of the United Nations itself. It should see that General Assembly resolution 1899 (XVIII) was implemented, devise a way of preventing the policy of apartheid from spreading and prevail on South Africa to remove its military bases from the Territory. It should also appeal to the friends of South Africa not to allow their nationals to settle in that country and, through it, in South West Africa. The current legal proceedings in the International Court of Justice should not obscure the Special Committee's political responsibilities. His delegation would support any resolution with those objectives.

217. The representative of Iraq recalled that the Special Committee had heard petitioners on the question of South West Africa whose evidence, together with the report of the Oxford Conference and the arguments advanced by the representative of Sierra Leone, showed that South African policies in that area were wreaking havoc on the lives of the indigenous population. Contrary to the Mandate, economic and social progress was being impeded, and in defiance of the United Nations, South Africa had also begun to establish military bases in the Territory. It was outrageous that South Africa should continue to receive military support from certain countries and that foreigners should derive revenues as high as 32 per cent of the gross national product from South West Africa.

218. His delegation deemed it the Special Committee's duty to do away with those evils and would support any resolution to that end. Such a resolution should contain a recommendation to the Security Council that implementation of General Assembly resolution 1899 (XVIII) be made mandatory for all Member States, and a further recommendation concerning the dismantling of military bases in South West Africa.

219. The representative of Madagascar said that for twenty years the international community had been desperately trying to find an equitable solution to the problem of South West Africa and had been unsuccessfully seeking to put an end to the racial policy in that country by means of negotiation and persuasion. South Africa was continuing to favour the White minority at the expense of the Africans; it was strengthening apartheid and was stripping the indigenous population of its property, with the support of those States which were refusing to implement United Nations resolutions.

220. For that reason, the Malagasy delegation wished to issue an appeal to all States to reconsider their attitude towards South Africa.

221. It had been stated that the International Court of Justice was about to reach its decision concerning South West Africa. While the question of the Mandate was, of course, an important aspect of the problem, the Committee should have no illusions about the effects of the Court's judgement. A decision by the Court that the terms of the Mandate had been violated would not be enough to free South West Africa. The population of that Territory must be given constitutional means to make its complaints known. That was why the United Nations and the Special Committee had the right and the duty to consider the question of South West Africa and to make appropriate recommendations in order to prevent a whittling down of human values and to ensure peace in the world. His delegation would vote for any constructive proposal which took account of the facts of the situation.

222. The representative of Italy stated that South West Africa was a particularly serious problem, with three distinct aspects: non-compliance by South Africa with the Mandate of 17 December 1920, by which the Territory was placed under its administration; the refusal by South Africa to recognize and apply to South West Africa the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples; and the extension of apartheid to the Territory.

223. It was particularly regrettable that South Africa should disregard its obligations under the Mandate, for its action weakened the whole structure of inter-State relationships. It was also regrettable that South Africa had not realized that the Declaration represented a decisive step towards the establishment of a new international society based on freedom, justice and co-operation. The main cause of the unsatisfactory situation in South West Africa was to be found in the racial discrimination applied in the legal system enforced by the Government of South Africa.

224. The Special Committee's task was to evolve suggestions for submission to the General Assembly as to the best way of dealing with the problem. The Italian delegation shared the view of a number of speakers that the pending judgement by the International Court of Justice covered only one of the three main aspects of the problem of South West Africa, i.e., the violation of the Mandate. The other two aspects fell within the purview of the Special Committee.

225. However, any measure taken by the General Assembly at its twenty-first session would be taken in the light of the judgement of the International Court, which was expected to be delivered before the opening of the session. For that reason, his delegation agreed with the representative of Denmark that nothing should be done that might prejudice action by the General Assembly after the judgement. It also endorsed the proposal of the representative of Venezuela that a sub-committee to deal with the matter should be set up.

226. Although experience had shown that the Mandate had been disastrous, hasty repeal of it might cut off the only link between the Territory and the United Nations, making South West Africa a sort of no-man's land and even justifying South African activity there. His delegation would submit proposals on that question at a later stage.

227. The Special Committee should present a common front on the problem of South West Africa, and when the time came for a decision his delegation would not be unduly influenced by mere drafting detail.

228. Referring to the accusations against the Western Powers and NATO, the representative of Italy stated that his delegation felt that such allegations might divert the Special Committee's attention from the real causes of the problem, which had nothing to do with so-called NATO assistance or the visit of a retired United States general to South Africa. Regarding the contention by the representative of the Soviet Union that Italy had supplied South Africa with military equipment, he stated that that accusation had no basis in fact. Two Italian firms had merely supplied half a dozen airplanes equipped for civil aviation, before adoption of the Security Council resolution on apartheid; after adoption of that resolution further supplies had been prohibited. The two firms were subsidiaries of FIAT, a firm of international repute and one that had concluded a contract to supply half a billion dollars' worth of equipment to the Soviet Union itself. Such allegations were baseless and could be traced to the South African Government, in whose interest it was to sow dissension among the countries of Western Europe.

He hoped the Special Committee would continue to be guided in its deliberations by its desire to establish the truth and not by other motives.

229. The representative of the United States of America said that she wished to comment on some specific points raised in the discussion, in particular concerning the pending decision of the International Court of Justice.

230. Before proceeding, however, she pointed out that the right of private United States citizens to express their own opinions was a United States tradition, and repeated references by the representative of the Soviet Union to remarks of former General Norstad and other Americans would not diminish dedication to that tradition.

231. Her country shared the general concern and frustration that so little progress had been made towards a solution of the problem of South West Africa. At the same time, it hoped for positive results from the long-awaited decision of the International Court of Justice. Article 94 of the Charter provided that every Member State should undertake to comply with the decisions of the Court in proceedings to which it was a party and all States Members of the United Nations were therefore obliged to respect the Court's judgments.

232. She did not believe that there had been any feeling against a thorough debate on the problem during the period of the Court's proceedings. There had been a belief that the General Assembly should refrain from taking action or making recommendations relating specifically to the questions before the Court until a judgement was given. United Nations action should rest upon a solid legal foundation. That did not mean that views could not be expressed or that the United Nations could not take constructive action. Her country had always insisted that South Africa must comply with the Mandate and condemned that country's policy of apartheid both in its own territory and elsewhere.

233. As the Special Committee was aware, her country had scrupulously enforced the embargo on the supply of military equipment. That fact could not be obscured by false accusations that NATO was supplying arms to a country that was not even a member of that organization. The United States Government had not supported General Assembly resolution 1899 (XVIII) on the embargo of petroleum products, since it considered that such action could only be taken by the Security Council. Figures on trade with South Africa were not necessarily relevant, but she believed that certain nations whose representatives had mentioned the question were in fact carrying on a flourishing trade with South Africa.

234. Her own country condemned the narrow policy of ruling at the expense of the majority. It had learned from its own experience the sufferings that resulted from such a policy, and it was engaged in a civil rights campaign to extend equality to all citizens of the United States; it therefore could not remain indifferent to the grave problem of South West Africa.

235. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics replied that it was well known that the members of NATO, in particular the United States, the United Kingdom and the Federal Republic of Germany, were assisting the South African régime. No matter how often the representatives of those countries denied that fact, everything pointed to it, including the statements of the petitioners heard by the Special Committee and even press reports. He reiterated that Flight International had stated that South Africa now had Italian-made jet fighter aircraft with a top speed of 800 kilometres per hour. Italy might claim that those aircraft were intended for civil aviation, but it was very easy to change them into military aircraft. Those were facts and not baseless allegations.

236. He considered it sheer hypocrisy for the United States representative, when referring to General Norstad's remarks, which he himself had quoted earlier, to invoke freedom of speech as a tradition of United States democracy. Moreover, in all sincerity, that representative could hardly argue that the United States Government could not prevent increased United States investment in South Africa or that, unless the Security Council decided otherwise, there was no valid reason to halt arms deliveries to South Africa. She seemed to have forgotten the General Assembly resolution on the matter.

237. The United Kingdom and the Federal Republic of Germany were also supplying arms to South Africa. In that connexion, he quoted a passage from the telegram addressed to the Special Committee by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the German Democratic Republic. The Minister of War of South Africa himself had admitted that the Federal Republic of Germany was furnishing military assistance to the régime in power in his country.

238. The policy of the NATO countries was part of a long-term scheme to impede the development of the African peoples and to maintain the bastions of colonialism in South Africa, Southern Rhodesia and the Portuguese colonies. As regards the Soviet Union, it was a proven fact that it was and would remain the true friend and ally of the oppressed.

239. The representative of the United States of America reiterated that the United States Government respected and observed the arms embargo, and she asked the representative of the Soviet Union to substantiate the general accusations he had made by citing a specific example of any military equipment supplied to South Africa by the United States in contravention of it.

240. The representative of Italy said that the unfounded allegations of the Soviet Union representative had been inspired by South African or Soviet propaganda and he relied on the judgement of his colleagues to dispose of such charges.

241. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania pointed out that South Africa was acting against the United Nations and against the wishes of millions of people who cared for the dignity of man and for the freedom of the people of South West Africa. It was able to continue its policy of oppression because it continued to receive economic and military aid from its allies; had the resolutions of the General Assembly been carried out, that country would have had cause to re-examine its policies.

242. Africans could not remain indifferent, when American respect for the right of the individual and the private businessman was allowed to impede Africa's progress towards independence. His delegation had hoped to be told that the facts it had given concerning the increased trade between the United States and South Africa were wrong. Instead, however, it had been told of relatively unimportant statements by President Johnson about United States support for General Assembly resolution 1899 (XVIII).

243. So long as South Africa continued to enjoy trade with the most influential countries in the world, it would have no cause to change its policies. Evidence had been given to the Special Committee that the people of South West Africa had in many instances been dispossessed of their land by the South African Government in favour of foreign companies and private citizens who wished to exploit the mineral resources; that the people were being systematically grouped into reserves on mainly barren land that could not support decent living standards, and being kept as a reservoir of cheap labour; that as shown in the report of the delegation of the Special Committee to the Oxford Conference (A/AC.109/L.290, annex I, paras. 7 and 8), they were being forced into slave labour and separated from their families; and that the South African Government gave some of the private companies power over the indigenous population in return for the high taxes paid by those companies.

244. The representative of Bulgaria said that there were few members of the Special Committee who had not protested against the activities of the Western monopolies which were assisting South Africa. The facts in question were proven facts and were even mentioned in such official United Nations documents as the report of the Special Committee on the activities of foreign monopolies.

245. The representative of Denmark referring to the allegation that members of NATO had supplied arms to South Africa, said that NATO was a defence organization whose function was to take measures for the common defence of its members. In the economic and political fields, they acted individually, and to say that any individual actions in those fields were the deliberate policy of NATO was to abuse the Committee's forum for propaganda purposes. His country, a member of NATO, had never supplied arms to South Africa. He entirely agreed with the Tanzanian representative that any countries supplying arms to South Africa should be prevented from so doing. He had taken note with satisfaction of the confirmation by the United States representative that her country was observing the embargo on the supply of such arms, and unless the Soviet Union representative could cite specific examples to the contrary, that assurance should be accepted.

246. The representative of Chile noted that according to certain delegations, South Africa owed its military strength to aid from regional military groupings and to bilateral agreements with different countries. The representatives of the States in question said that they were the victims of false accusations. In order to find out the truth, an objective and conscientious study should be made of the question.

247. Drawing the Special Committee's attention to the communications dated 16 June and 6 July 1965 which it had received from the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany (A/AC.109/125 and 142), he observed that the Federal Republic of Germany defended itself against the charge of having established a military base in South West Africa, saying that it was really a meteorological centre constructed under an agreement between the University of Leipzig and the Government of the Republic of South Africa and did not contain any military installations. The Special Committee had been invited to visit the centre in order to verify the statements made by the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany. On the other hand, a cable from the Government of the German Democratic Republic stated the contrary. There was only one way to resolve such contradictions, namely, to decide to hold an inquiry so that the Special Committee could collect evidence which would enable it to come to a well-founded conclusion and thus discharge its task.

248. The representative of Australia stated that his Government held strong views on the question of South West Africa and considered it proper that the Special Committee should address itself to the matter despite the fact that the International Court of Justice had certain aspects under consideration. Australia condemned South African policy in South West Africa and considered that the United Nations had an important role to play. His delegation did not endorse the South African argument that consideration of the question of South West Africa by the General Assembly infringed the sub judice principle. On the contrary, Australia thought that the General Assembly had a very important role to play immediately; but the United Nations must satisfy itself entirely of the strength of its legal position before taking action that might be based on purely political considerations. His country would be bound to take full account of the Court's ruling, which it would regard as a definitive legal opinion on the subject. It was true that the Court was concerned only with certain aspects of the problem of South West Africa; but no member of the Committee could predict the judgement or its effects and implications. The circumstances of the case constituted one of the most important developments in the direction of new norms of human behaviour and attitudes. Therefore the Committee should not prejudice or anticipate what could be a historic decision.

249. Australia condemned South Africa's refusal to recognize the processes leading to self-determination and assume its international obligations. His Government was also opposed to the hateful doctrine of apartheid and the repressive methods used to enforce it, and had informed the South African Government clearly and directly of that attitude.

250. To the best of his knowledge, his country had no commercial interests in South West Africa. Even if it had, they were certainly so utterly insignificant as to be of no importance whatsoever in the issues before the Special Committee; and in any case, his Government would never defend any commercial undertakings which might, in pursuit of profit, ride with roughshod inhumanity over the people. The whole industrial system of his country, with its carefully balanced system of Government and private activity, bore out that assertion.

251. Australia, as a former Mandatory Power under the League of Nations, had a special interest in the Mandated Territory of South West Africa. Just as his country had done much towards the formation of the United Nations itself, so also had it been most active in the development of the Trusteeship System, when it had been unhesitating in concluding with the United Nations trusteeship agreements for the transformation into Trust Territories of the Mandated Territories for which it was responsible. It had been, and still was, guided by a clear recognition of the inalienable right of any people to self-determination. Australia did not practise or advocate limitation of the forms of government from which peoples might choose, provided that they themselves chose in all freedom. Nor did the country view independence itself as being of any unchanging or simple form; for its form could be determined only by the people making the choice.

252. The approach, purposes and ideals of his delegation were those embodied in the United Nations Charter. In the Australian Trust Territory—and former Mandated Territory—of New Guinea, for instance, the people had elected their own parliament with a substantial indigenous majority from a common roll based on the principle of “one man, one vote”, without regard to race, colour or creed. In those advances, Australia had in no way differentiated between the Trust Territory of New Guinea and the Non-Self-Governing Territory of Papua.

D. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

253. At the 435th meeting on 7 June 1966, the representative of Ethiopia introduced a draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.300) on behalf of Afghanistan, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, the Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, the United Republic of Tanzania and Yugoslavia.

254. He explained that an attempt had been made to incorporate in the draft resolution the views expressed in the Special Committee. Many of the points mentioned in the text were a reaffirmation of the stand that the Special Committee had taken in the past, and should pose no difficulty. The most important new idea was that contained in operative paragraph 10, which envisaged the establishment of a sub-committee to make a thorough study of the situation with a view to recommending an early date for the independence of South West Africa. The establishment of such a sub-committee was particularly important in view of the impending judgement by the International Court of Justice on the case brought by his country and Liberia.

255. The members of the Afro-Asian group and Yugoslavia, in co-sponsoring the draft resolution, were strongly convinced that its adoption would go a long way towards alleviating the sufferings of the people of South West Africa, and were confident that it would receive maximum support. While the co-sponsors were prepared to accept any amendment that would improve the text, they would be unable to accept anything calculated to weaken it.

256. The representative of India observed that, apart from operative paragraph 10, which had been included to take account of suggestions by several delegations, the part most likely to give rise to debate was operative paragraph 6, whereby the Special Committee would recommend to the Security Council to make it obligatory for all States to implement the measures contained in General Assembly resolution 1899 (XVIII), and in particular those mentioned in paragraph 7 of that resolution calling for an embargo on arms and petroleum supplies to South Africa. He stated that South Africa had repeatedly been denounced for its refusal to take cognizance of United Nations resolutions, but if other States were permitted to continue their support of that country, condemnation of it would lose its logical force.

257. The representative of Venezuela said that he had studied the draft resolution very carefully. It merely reaffirmed a series of principles for which Venezuela had always voted and his delegation therefore had no objection to voting for them once again. Nevertheless, he thought it advisable to submit, on behalf of Chile and Venezuela, an amendment (A/AC.109/L.302) which was merely the logical sequel to their statements, and, indeed, to those made by many other delegations during the general debate. The amendment was to replace operative paragraph 10 of the draft resolution by the following;

“10. Decides to set up a sub-committee composed of five members appointed by the Chairman to study and recommend to the Special Committee:

“(a) Appropriate ways and means of terminating South Africa's Mandate in respect of South West Africa;

“(b) The most suitable ways and means of administering the Territory until it attains independence, i.e., until such time as the terms of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) have been fully implemented;

“11. Requests the Sub-Committee to submit its report before the Special Committee concludes its meetings for the current year.”

258. A study of the proposed new paragraphs would show that they contained positive elements which were consistent with the resolutions already adopted and with the wishes expressed by petitioners. They were also consistent with the decisions of the International Conference on South West Africa held at Oxford in March 1966. He referred in particular to paragraph 22 of annex 1 of the report of the Conference (A/AC.109/L.290). The amendment also reflected the viewpoint of most members of the Special Committee. It simply returned to the principal themes raised in the course of twenty years and had the merit of introducing a slight improvement in the original text of the draft resolution which would bring about some progress and help the General Assembly to thwart South Africa's policy. The ill-treatment to which the people of South West Africa were subjected could not be tolerated any longer and he considered that the time had come to recommend to the General Assembly that a study should be made of the question in order to put an end to the intolerable situation.

259. The representative of Venezuela was sure that all the sponsors of the original draft would support the joint amendment in order to enable the people of South West Africa, who had been so maltreated for forty years, to gain their independence at last.

260. The representative of Bulgaria said that he agreed in general with the main ideas contained in the draft resolution. He recalled that the representatives of the Soviet Union and Poland had made a number of suggestions which his delegation had supported. Those suggestions were reflected in paragraphs 6, 7 and 10 of the draft resolution. While accepting in principle the basic ideas of the draft resolution, he proposed four amendments jointly sponsored by Bulgaria, Poland and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (A/AC.109/L.305), which he thought would strengthen the draft resolution without altering its substance.

261. Firstly, the situation in South West Africa was very dangerous and constituted a serious threat to peace. That idea was not expressed in any of the preambular or operative paragraphs of the present draft resolution, although it was to be found in the last preambular paragraph of General Assembly resolution 2074 (XX). Consequently, the first amendment proposed was to add the following new paragraph at the end of the preamble:

"Noting with deep concern the serious threat to international peace and security in this part of Africa, which has been further aggravated by the racist rebellion in Southern Rhodesia".

262. The second amendment, to operative paragraph 1, would have the Special Committee reaffirm the inalienable right of the people of South West Africa "to freedom, independence and territorial integrity" instead of "to freedom and independence".

263. The third amendment would add the phrase "which constitutes a serious threat to international peace and security" at the end of operative paragraph 5, which provided that the attention of the Security Council be drawn "to the serious situation prevailing in South West Africa and its aggravation caused by the racist rebellion in Southern Rhodesia".

264. The fourth amendment would add the following at the end of operative paragraph 10: "and to request the Sub-Committee to submit its report to the Special Committee by the beginning of the twenty-first session of the General Assembly". After thanking the sponsors of the draft resolution for taking into account the ideas put forward earlier by the delegations of Bulgaria, Poland and the Soviet Union, the representative of Bulgaria expressed the hope that they would accept the joint amendments.

265. The representative of Chile said that the text of the draft resolution represented a middle-of-the-road position which the Special Committee could adopt. It recommended methods which had won the support of the United Nations in the past and contained new elements which would surely help to end the painful situation in which South West Africa had languished for so many years. He was very pleased to see that the views he had put forward had been reflected in the draft resolution.

266. He regarded it as most important that another appeal should be made to States Members of the United Nations and to non-member States to stop giving the Government of South Africa any assistance whatever. It was for the Security Council to transform the appeal into an obligation. It was obvious that any support for the Verwoerd régime would strengthen its sectarian tendencies and aggravate the oppression of the Africans who formed the majority of the population in South West Africa. His delegation wished to lay special stress on economic and military aid, which openly gave the régime the upper hand over the indigenous population, eternally oppressed by those with powerful weapons.

267. Operative paragraph 10 of the draft resolution before the Special Committee expressed the idea which the delegation of Venezuela had put forward at the previous session of the General Assembly and had repeated during the present session of the Special Committee. His delegation firmly supported the proposal. It considered that the Committee could not remain idle while waiting for the decision of the International Court of Justice, but should devote all its energy to finding some means by which the Mandate over South West Africa entrusted to South Africa by the League of Nations could be withdrawn. His delegation felt that the paragraph should be revised in such a way as to define more precisely the role and objectives of the proposed sub-committee and had therefore joined Venezuela in submitting an amendment which he hoped would be accepted.

268. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, commenting on the amendment submitted by Chile and Venezuela (A/AC.109/L.302) to paragraph 10 of the draft resolution, said that the idea of establishing a sub-committee of five members appointed by the Chairman seemed very sound, and he was confident that the Chairman, in consultation with the members of the Special Committee, would ensure that all trends of opinion were represented in the sub-committee. As regards sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) of the amendment, there was no reason why they should not be considered, provided that the principal elements in the original paragraph 10 were kept, i.e., "a thorough study of the situation" and "an early date for the independence of the Territory". He considered that paragraph 10 of the draft resolution should be kept in its original form, save for possible additions proposed by Chile and Venezuela.

269. At the 438th meeting of the Special Committee, on 8 June 1966, the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania introduced a revised text of the joint draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.300/Rev.1), in which the phrase "and its consequences for international peace and security" had been added at the end of operative paragraph 5, and the words "and, among other things, to recommend" had been added in operative paragraph 10. On the suggestion of the representative of Chile, the sponsors replaced the word "things" by "matters".

270. The representative of Tanzania explained that the sponsors of the draft resolution considered that the revised text of operative paragraph 5 would meet the wishes of the sponsors of the three-Power amendment (A/AC.109/L.305) calling for a separate reference to the "threat to international peace and territorial security". He observed that the insertion of the words "and territorial integrity" in operative paragraph 1 was not really necessary, since the main question was whether or not South Africa would accept its responsibility towards the United Nations. However, if that were insisted upon, the matter could be referred back to the sponsors of the draft resolution.

271. With respect to the amendments calling for the proposed sub-committee to report to the Special Committee before the twenty-first session of the General Assembly (A/AC.109/L.302 and 305), he considered that the normal procedure. However, the sponsors of the draft resolution felt that there could be no real objection to that amendment, if it were insisted upon.

272. He felt that the matter of finding ways and means of terminating the Mandate in South West Africa should be left out, since the question could be dealt with at a later stage. He had been asked by the sponsors of the draft resolution not to press the point.

273. He considered that operative paragraphs 1 and 10 of the revised draft resolution should meet the wishes of Chile and Venezuela and that operative paragraph 5 would satisfy Bulgaria, Poland and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. He regretted the impossibility of meeting all the requests for amendments, but observed that a resolution was inevitably a compromise, and hoped that the Special Committee would recognize that the draft resolution as revised represented the best course in the circumstances.

274. The representative of Bulgaria, on behalf of the Polish, Soviet Union and Bulgarian delegations, understood that the sponsors of the draft resolution had not been able to accept changes of substance, and thanked them for having tried, as far as possible, to take their amendments into consideration. In view of the revised text of operative paragraph 5 they would not insist that their first and third amendments be put to the vote. They regretted that the sponsors of the draft resolution had been unable to accept their second amendment to insert "and territorial integrity" in the first operative paragraph. In view of the observations by the Tanzanian representative, and the fact that the Chairman of the Special Committee, who would appoint the members of the Sub-Committee, would expressly request them to report to the Special Committee no later than the opening of the twenty-first session of the General Assembly, they would not insist that their second and fourth amendments be put to the vote.

275. The representative of Venezuela expressed regret that the sponsors of the draft resolution had not found it advisable to accept the amendments submitted by Chile and Venezuela (A/AC.109/L.302), which had been designed solely to defend the interests of the people of South West Africa. The ideas contained in those amendments were in conformity with the statements of petitioners and the opinions expressed in the Oxford conference.

276. He could not accept the administering Power's contention that the question of South West Africa could not be examined by the United Nations because it was under consideration by the International Court of Justice. While the sponsors of the draft resolution wished to consider the question as being exclusively juridical, the Venezuelan and Chilean delegations, for their part, thought that it was a colonial question. The main point was to decide whether the Special Committee could recommend to the General Assembly measures which would make it possible to apply the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples to the Territory of South West Africa. The draft resolution, as it stood, could not give satisfaction to the people of South West Africa and did not take fully into account the terms of reference given to the Special Committee by the General Assembly.

277. The important point was not that a date should be fixed for the independence of South West Africa or that the International Court of Justice should issue a decision concerning the Mandate. The problem arose primarily from the fact that the administering Power did not recognize the authority of the United Nations to intervene in the affairs of the Territory and that the adoption of another resolution simply repeating what had already been said many times would not change the situation at all.

278. Nevertheless, the Chilean and Venezuelan delegations, having heard the explanations of the Tanzanian representative, agreed in a spirit of co-operation to withdraw their amendments.

279. The representative of Chile confirmed what the Venezuelan representative had said. The sole purpose of their amendments had been to facilitate the Special Committee's task and to achieve a text representing the views of all the members of the Special Committee and not merely those of a geographical group.

280. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania, speaking on behalf of the sponsors of the draft resolution, thanked the sponsors of the amendments for their co-operation, and expressed agreement with what the Venezuelan representative had said about South Africa's Mandate in South West Africa. The main issue in South West Africa was that of independence, Mandate or no Mandate, and operative paragraph 1 of the draft resolution left no doubt in that respect. It was quite clear that the principal aim was to implement General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), and those concerned with implementing the resolution should not be slaves to the purely academic aspect of legal considerations.

281. The Venezuelan representative had said that too many resolutions had been adopted, and too little action taken. He was in full agreement. Africans were frustrated before the plethora of resolutions and absence of action. There were two ways of ending colonialism: either through United Nations resolutions and subsequent action by the Special Committee, the Security Council or other bodies; or through an armed struggle, in which case African blood would water the tree of freedom.

282. Africans had waited in the hope that the United Nations would take action. If they were let down by the United Nations, they would have to resort to arms.

283. Referring to the co-operation displayed between Latin America and the Afro-Asian countries, together with Yugoslavia, the representative of Tanzania observed that both groups of countries had been colonized at some time or another, and their common goal was to gain independence for their brothers everywhere. Co-operation was the corner-stone of the work and progress of the Special Committee.

284. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said, in reply to the Venezuelan representative's assertion that the Special Committee seemed to consider the question of South West Africa a strictly juridical question, that his delegation, for its part, considered it a political and colonial question.

285. The representative of India associated his delegation with all that had been said by the Venezuelan and Tanzanian representatives. They could appropriately have added the word "India" every time they had mentioned Africa.

286. The representative of Australia considered that the most important new element in the draft resolution was its operative paragraph 6. Australia had no vested interests in the matters of trade and supply to which that paragraph was directed for it did not supply arms or oil to South Africa. However, his delegation opposed the usurpation by the Special Committee of the functions of the Security Council. It was seriously concerned about paragraph 7 recommending that the Security Council take measures to ensure the withdrawal of military bases and installations from the Territory. His delegation could not support those two paragraphs or paragraph 3.

287. With regard to paragraph 3, he had no hesitation in condemning any financial interests deliberately and shamelessly exploiting the people and resources of the area and impeding progress there. However, he could not agree with the implication that all financial interests were doing that. He believed there were business concerns of repute and integrity, and the development of commercial enterprise was essential to the progress of the Territory.

288. He had reservations about paragraph 10, for Australia had always maintained that the fixing of a date for independence was a matter for the people concerned. Paragraph 10 contained no mention or suggestion of the will of the people and the necessary consultations. The role of the people should not be assumed by anyone else.

289. In conclusion, he wished to pay tribute to the obvious efforts of the co-sponsors to draft a resolution fairly reflecting a variety of views. In so doing they had produced much with which his delegation could agree. He regretted that no instructions had come from his Government to authorize his delegation to participate in the voting.

290. The representative of Denmark reiterated his Government's strong reaction to the continued oppression of the South African people and to the stubborn attitude of the Verwoerd régime towards the United Nations. It was in the light of this position the Danish Government had considered the draft resolution. Regrettably it was, however, not a general resolution, which his delegation thought most appropriate in the present situation. Furthermore, his delegation had a few reservations concerning specific paragraphs. The main objection of his delegation concerned paragraph 6, because it went beyond the competence of the General Assembly. He believed that every member of the Committee was as conscious as he of the limits of the competence of the various organs of the United Nations. For that reason Denmark would have to abstain when the draft was put to a vote. Technical difficulties had been as much to blame as differences of opinion for the Committee's failure to reach a satisfactory compromise. He hoped that in future the Special Committee could agree on the goals and on the most effective means of meeting them.

291. The representative of Italy agreed that a strong and united stand was needed on South West Africa. Having examined the draft resolution and having brought it to his Government's special attention, he found that although most of it was inadequate, he had reservations concerning several operative paragraphs.

292. The meaning and scope of the expression "a crime against humanity" were not clear. If taken as a general condemnation of apartheid, it would be acceptable to his delegation. If, however, the terms had legal implications, he could not support that paragraph.

293. He suggested that in paragraph 3, the expression "those financial interests" replace "the financial interests", but that if it was too late to make such an amendment, he would be satisfied with a separate vote on that paragraph.

294. Referring to the unconstitutionality of resolution 1899 (XVIII), he said that his delegation would have reservations on paragraph 6.

295. The recommendation to the Security Council contained in paragraph 7 was not entirely in accordance with the United Nations Charter. Moreover, as the Special Committee would be asking the Security Council to do something new, it should give the matter very careful consideration.

296. He asked for a separate vote on operative paragraphs 3, 6 and 7 and stated that if they were adopted as they stood, Italy would have to abstain from voting on the resolution.

297. The representative of the United States of America explained her delegation's reservations, which concerned difficulties mentioned in its previous statement as well as in that of the Italian delegation.

298. She specified that her support of the call for an embargo on the shipment of arms stemmed from a rejection of apartheid, and declared that the United States had scrupulously adhered to the arms embargo. If a distinction had been made in the resolution between an arms embargo and economic sanctions, her Government could have supported it. However, the United States would have to abstain if separate votes were taken on paragraphs 3 and 6. She could not support a blanket indictment of the financial interests, and would have preferred specific indictments of the labour conditions and policies associated with foreign companies in South West Africa.

299. She raised a question concerning the Special Committee's mandate, and felt that it should take no action such as that recommended in paragraph 7, prior to the International Court's decision.

300. Although in agreement with the resolution's condemnation of racial practices, with its appeal for support for the people of South West Africa in their effort to exercise self-determination, and with its implicit condemnation of South Africa for failing to live up to its obligations to the United Nations and to the peoples of South West Africa, the United States would have to abstain from voting on the resolution as a whole.

301. The representative of Venezuela explained that his delegation's position regarding the strict delimitation of the functions of United Nations bodies obliged it to abstain in the vote on operative paragraphs 6 and 7 of the draft resolution.

302. Although he would vote in favour of operative paragraph 3, he had some reservations regarding that provision. His delegation was not convinced, as it had previously pointed out, that the activities of the financial interests operating in the Territory constituted the principal, much less the only, obstacle to the freedom and independence of South West Africa. The essential problem was the subjection of the Territory to South Africa. It was out of the question for the Special Committee to condemn all financial interests; it could only consider condemning those which were exploiting the human and material resources of the Territory and impeding its progress.

303. Moreover, in connexion with operative paragraph 8 of the draft resolution which his delegation supported, he took it that the moral and material support requested of Member States was that provided for in the Charter. He added that by voting in favour of a draft resolution which did not satisfy it completely, the Venezuelan delegation wished to give evidence of its readiness to co-operate with its African friends.

304. The representative of Chile expressed his gratitude to the sponsors of the draft resolution for their spirit of understanding and co-operation. Although his delegation would vote for the draft, it nevertheless had certain reservations to make. Operative paragraph 3 was much too sweeping. All foreign interests were not necessarily harmful; the text should have spoken of the interests of States which adopted an imperialist attitude. He had earlier expressed his views regarding operative paragraphs 6 and 7 and indicated the limits which the Special Committee should observe in order to abide by the Charter. It was not for the Special Committee to tell the Security Council how it should proceed. Operative paragraph 8, on the other hand, was in full conformity with the Charter.

305. The revised draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.300/Rev.1), as orally revised was voted upon at the 439th meeting on 9 June 1966 as follows:

Operative paragraph 3 was adopted by a roll-call vote of 18 to none, with 3 abstentions. The voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Chile, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Republic of Tanzania, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Denmark, Italy, United States of America.

Operative paragraph 6 was adopted by a roll-call vote of 16 to 1, with 4 abstentions. The voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Republic of Tanzania, Yugoslavia.

Against: United States of America.

Abstaining: Chile, Denmark, Italy, Venezuela.

Operative paragraph 7 was adopted by a roll-call vote of 16 to none, with 5 abstentions. The voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Republic of Tanzania, Yugoslavia.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Chile, Denmark, Italy, United States of America, Venezuela.

The resolution as a whole, as revised, was adopted by a roll-call vote of 18 to none, with 3 abstentions. The voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Chile, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Republic of Tanzania, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Denmark, Italy, United States of America.

306. The resolution on the question of South West Africa (A/AC.109/177) adopted by the Special Committee at its 439th meeting on 9 June 1966, reads as follows:

"The Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

"Having heard the petitioners,

"Recalling General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960 containing the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

"Recalling further General Assembly resolution 2074 (XX) of 17 December 1965 and other resolutions of the General Assembly, and of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples with respect to South West Africa,

"Noting with concern the policy of the South African Government to suppress and circumvent the political and economic rights of the indigenous people of South West Africa through large-scale settlement of immigrants in the Territory,

"Noting further with deep concern the continued presence of military bases and other military installations in South West Africa, in violation of General Assembly resolutions 1805 (XVII) of 14 December 1962 and 2074 (XX) of 17 December 1965,

1. Reaffirms the inalienable right of the people of South West Africa to freedom and independence in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and recognizes the legitimacy of their struggle to achieve this right;

2. Condemns the policies of apartheid and racial discrimination practised by the Government of South Africa in South West Africa which constitute a crime against humanity;

3. Condemns the activities of the financial interests operating in South West Africa which exploit the human and material resources and impede the progress of the Territory and the right of the people to freedom and independence;

4. Condemns the policy of the Government of South Africa to suppress and circumvent the political and economic rights of the indigenous people of the Territory through a large-scale settlement of foreign immigrants in the Territory;

5. Draws the attention of the Security Council to the serious situation prevailing in South West Africa and its aggravation caused by the racist rebellion in Southern Rhodesia and its consequences for international peace and security;

6. Recommends to the Security Council to make it obligatory for all States to implement the measures contained in General Assembly resolution 1899 (XVIII) of 13 November 1963 and in particular those mentioned in paragraph 7 thereof;

7. Further recommends to the Security Council to take the necessary measures to ensure the withdrawal of all military bases and installations from the Territory;

8. Appeals to all States to give moral and material support to the African population of South West Africa in their struggle for freedom and independence;

9. Invites the Secretary-General to approach the specialized agencies and other international organizations concerned, with a view to extending assistance to the refugees from South West Africa;

10. Decides to establish a sub-committee to make a thorough study of the situation and, among other matters, to recommend an early date for the independence of the Territory;

11. Decides to transmit the present resolution to the President of the Security Council;

12. Decides further to maintain the item of South West Africa on its agenda and to keep it under constant review."

307. The text of the resolution was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 14 June 1966.¹³

308. At its 455th meeting, the Special Committee decided that the Sub-Committee, established by operative paragraph 10 of the resolution should comprise the following members: Denmark, Ethiopia, India, the Ivory Coast, Poland, Tunisia and Venezuela.

E. FURTHER CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Introduction

309. The Special Committee further considered the question of South West Africa at its 460th and 465th to 468th meetings on 5 August and 12, 14, 15 and 19 September 1966.

310. At its 460th meeting, the Chairman and some members of the Special Committee made statements concerning the judgement delivered on 18 July 1966 by the International Court of Justice on the South West Africa cases instituted by Ethiopia and Liberia against South Africa on 4 November 1960. By the President's casting vote, the votes being divided seven to seven, the Court had found that Ethiopia and Liberia could not be considered to have established any legal right or interest in the subject-matter of their claims and accordingly decided to reject them.

311. The Chairman of the Special Committee stated that several members had expressed the wish that, since that was the first substantive meeting of the Special Committee following the judgement of the International Court of Justice, he should make a statement on the recent developments concerning the question of South West Africa.

312. Since the last meeting of the Special Committee, the world had received with shock and dismay the judgement of the International Court of Justice on the South West Africa case. This was particularly so because by that judgement the International Court evaded every substantive legal issue placed before it for decision. It had failed to rule on apartheid, a system of administration which was so clearly a violation of the Mandate and of the Charter of the United Nations. It had failed to rule on the obligations of the Republic of South Africa to submit to the supervisory authority of the United Nations over its administration of the Mandate. Indeed, it had failed even to confirm its previous opinion regarding the very existence of the Mandate. The Court chose the expedient of evading all of the important issues before it on a procedural technicality by ruling that Ethiopia and Liberia had failed to establish any legal right or interest in the subject-matter.

313. One might well ask, as indeed Judge Jessup of the United States in his dissenting opinion asked, why the Court would "tolerate a situation in which the parties would be put to great trouble and expense to explore all the details of the merits, only to be told"—and that after six long years of litigation—"that the Court would pay no heed to all their arguments and evidence because the case was dismissed on a preliminary ground which precluded any investigation of the merits". Indeed, the Court had led public opinion to believe, by its 8 to 7 majority judgement of 1962, that the issue of the parties to the dispute had already been resolved and that it would investigate the merits of the dispute. By an accident of fate, what was the minority of the Court in 1962 became a majority in 1966 by virtue of the casting vote of Judge Spender of Australia, a circumstance allowing the 1962 minority to interpret and, in effect, to reverse the judgement reached by a majority of the Court in 1962.

314. For these reasons, it was not surprising that large sections of international opinion believed that the judgement had diminished the prestige of the Court as a means of settling international disputes, and raised serious doubt about its integrity and usefulness. Nor was it any wonder that demands were being made for more equitable representation in the membership of the Court and for a closer examination of its operation.

315. It was true that the International Court did not disavow either its judgement of 1962 or its advisory opinions of 1950, 1955 and 1956 which established that the Mandate continued in effect and that South Africa continued to be bound to accept United Nations supervision. However, the fact that South Africa had refused to accept the three previous opinions of the International Court on South West Africa raised serious doubts as to the advisability of further recourse to the International Court on the substantive issues.

316. The outcome of the proceedings of the International Court of Justice had been a bitter disappointment to the African States and other Members of the United Nations that had so long sought a solution to that difficult issue by peaceful means. There were indeed States the representatives of which cautioned against any positive action by the General Assembly or by the Special Committee on the ground that such action might prejudice the case before the International Court. For six years they had urged caution, pending the judgement of the International Court.

317. That long-awaited judgement had now been given. It was an exercise in futility, but not entirely futile, for it was now clear beyond any doubt that there was no further excuse for waiting. The time had come for concrete action by the United Nations.

318. There should now be no doubt that the problem of South West Africa was essentially political and so was its solution. There already existed an irrefutable political and moral basis for action by the United Nations, and while a favourable judgement would have represented additional ammunition, the basis for action was by no means undermined by the Court's judgement.

319. Members of the Special Committee were well aware that, while the International Court had been deliberating the South West Africa case, the South African Government had continued its preparations for the establishment of the so-called "homelands" in South West Africa recommended by its Odendaal Commission. If the scheme were fully carried out, it would result in the partitioning of the Territory and its annexation, in effect, by South Africa. The South African Government had deferred a decision on the actual establishment of the "homelands" and other related measures pending the judgement of the International Court and the completion of its advance preparations. The preparations were already either complete or nearing completion.

320. It might thus be timely to remind South Africa that the General Assembly, by resolution 2074 (XX) of 17 December 1965, had stated that it:

"Considers that any attempt to partition the Territory or to take any unilateral action, directly or indirectly, preparatory thereto constitutes a violation of the Mandate and of resolution 1514 (XV);

"Considers further that any attempt to annex a part or the whole of the Territory of South West Africa constitutes an act of aggression."

321. The Special Committee must therefore be especially vigilant and should seek to ensure that the United Nations took immediate action if South Africa should proceed with the proposed partition of South West Africa and attempt to annex the Territory.

322. The Special Committee was charged with ensuring the implementation in South West Africa of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. It would also be recalled that by resolution 1805 (XVIII) of 14 December 1962 the General Assembly assigned a number of other specific tasks to the Special Committee in relation to South West Africa. By that resolution the Special Committee was asked to achieve the objectives outlined in General Assembly resolution 1702 (XVI) of 19 December 1961—objectives which included: the repeal of all laws or regulations which establish and maintain the intolerable system of apartheid; preparations for general elections to the territorial Legislative Assembly based on universal adult suffrage, to be held as soon as possible under the supervision and control of the United Nations; advice and assistance to the resulting Government with a view to the early granting of full independence and the co-ordination of economic and social assistance to be provided by the specialized agencies.

323. In the light of the foregoing the Chairman was confident that the Sub-Committee on South West Africa would consider and recommend to the Special Committee in the near future the date which should be set for the establishment of those objectives.

324. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that his delegation fully endorsed the Chairman's statement.

325. The representative of Mali said that his delegation also wished to congratulate the Chairman on his statement. The International Court had shown by its judgement that the problem of decolonization could not be solved by the legal means chosen by the Africans. The African States, therefore, together with the peace-loving States of other continents, must now give serious attention to the problem and consider what was the best method of ensuring that South Africa would not be able to take over the Territory of South West Africa.

326. The Special Committee noted the communications received from the following Members of the United Nations concerning the judgement of the International Court: Bulgaria (A/6372 and Corr.1), India (A/6250), Ivory Coast (A/6371), Kenya (A/6387), Mongolia (A/6407), Nigeria (A/6346), Pakistan (A/6388), Poland (A/6402) and Turkey (A/6413).

327. At its 465th to 467th meetings, the Special Committee considered the report of the Sub-Committee on South West Africa (A/AC.109/L.325) established under operative paragraph 10 of the resolution adopted by the Committee at its 439th meeting on 9 June 1966. The report is annexed to this chapter.

Statements made by members on the report of the Sub-Committee on South West Africa

330. The representative of India, Rapporteur of the Sub-Committee on South West Africa, introduced the Sub-Committee's report (see appendix). He stated that the Sub-Committee, meeting soon after the verdict of the International Court of Justice of 18 July 1966, had expressed its deep regret at the International Court's decision to dismiss the case filed by Ethiopia and Liberia on technical grounds without adjudicating the substance of the matter. The Sub-Committee had unanimously condemned South Africa's barbaric administration of the Mandated Territory and its intransigent attitude in the face of many United Nations pleas. It was convinced that South Africa, by its unchanging behaviour had disqualified itself from administering the Mandate for South West Africa.

331. The Sub-Committee firmly believed that, if the steps outlined in paragraph 32 of its report were implemented fully and without delay, the prospects of restoring the legitimate rights of the people of South West Africa would be greatly expedited. It hoped that the Special Committee would promptly and unanimously adopt the report.

332. He observed that the reservations of the delegation of Denmark, referred to in paragraph 35 of the report, were purely provisional and related to only two points of the report; they were necessitated by the lack of instructions from the Government of Denmark on the issues involved. He hoped that the Danish representative would soon be in a position to withdraw those reservations.

333. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that his delegation fully endorsed the Sub-Committee's conclusions and recommendations. Despite the various United Nations resolutions calling for the progressive development of the Mandated Territory of South West Africa to independence, the South African apartheid régime had only increased its oppression of the African people and the Territory. It had established military installations for the sole purpose of suppressing the African people's legitimate aspiration for liberation. It had dispossessed the African people of their land and had given extensive leases to foreign financial interests originating in Western countries, which were ruthlessly exploiting the Territory's human and natural resources and automatically enforcing South Africa's policies of apartheid. It had instituted oppressive legislation aimed at maintaining slave-labour conditions. Above all, it had enacted legislation calculated to eliminate the African family by such methods as the establishment of the notorious bachelor quarters.

334. South West Africa today was not merely a colony but a concentration camp on the nazi pattern. It was high time for concrete action to eliminate once and for all the gross injustices perpetrated against the people of the Territory.

335. Since the question of South West Africa would be taken up as a matter of priority by the General Assembly, he joined the Rapporteur of the Sub-Committee in proposing that the Special Committee should unanimously endorse the Sub-Committee's report for immediate submission to the Assembly at that time.

336. The representative of Mali said that almost all the members of the Special Committee were becoming aware of the increasing danger inherent in the maintenance of the South African Government's reactionary and barbarous policies founded on the shameful system of apartheid. The White racists of Pretoria, after their vain attempts to annex South West Africa, were employing cruel and oppressive methods in exploiting the mineral and agricultural resources of the country. His delegation deeply regretted the fact that, by rejecting the complaint of Ethiopia and Liberia, the International Court of Justice had encouraged South Africa to pursue its evil policies.

337. Although the knell of colonialism had been sounded by the historic Declaration in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), it remained for the United Nations to compel the administering Powers to comply with its provisions and in particular, to compel the South African Government to heed the seventy-three resolutions adopted by the General Assembly over a period of almost twenty years. South Africa must allow the people of the Territory to achieve self-determination and independence. The imperialistic Powers of Western Europe and the United States were reluctant to take action against South Africa, simply because it offered profitable opportunities for private investment; their support was the only reason for the defiant attitude of the South African Government. His delegation would discuss that aspect of the question further during the coming debate on South West Africa in the General Assembly. Meanwhile, it urged the Special Committee to adopt unanimously the recommendations and conclusions of the Sub-Committee on South West Africa.

338. The representative of Ethiopia formally expressed his Government's full support for the report presented by the Sub-Committee on South West Africa and hoped that it would be unanimously adopted by the Special Committee.

339. The report did not deal with the question of how the General Assembly should establish its authority in the international Territory of South West Africa, leaving the matter to be decided by the Assembly itself. It was an objective report, emphasizing certain undeniable facts. Firstly, South West Africa was a United Nations responsibility, a fact repeatedly affirmed even by the International Court of Justice. Secondly, the General Assembly, and indeed the whole of civilized humanity, had appealed to South Africa in respect of that country's responsibilities under the Mandate; not only had South Africa ignored those appeals and the resolutions of the United Nations but it had taken a number of steps clearly contrary to the principle on which the Mandates System of the League of Nations had been based. Since no conciliatory response could be expected from South Africa, it was absolutely necessary for the General Assembly to act in order to ensure the rights of the people of South West Africa to freedom and independence. Unless the United Nations took appropriate action on the South West African problem, which was only part of the larger problem of racial confrontation in southern Africa, the prestige of the Organization itself would be endangered.

340. The representative of Madagascar said that during his recent travels he had found that both the people of his own country and the peoples of Asia and Africa were astonished at the judgement of the International Court of Justice concerning South West Africa, which seemed to deprive the people of that Territory of all hope.

341. His delegation supported the report of the Sub-Committee on South West Africa. He urged the Special Committee to approve the report unanimously and thereby demonstrate to the peoples of South West Africa that in their struggle for freedom, independence and racial equality they were not alone but were supported by all freedom-loving peoples throughout the world.

342. The representative of Iraq supported the report of the Sub-Committee on South West Africa.

343. The report pointed out that the question of South West Africa had been dealt with in many resolutions of the General Assembly and that if the present situation continued the prestige of the United Nations would be harmed. His delegation wondered whether, in view of the long record of fruitless debate and unheeded resolutions, there had not already been some reflection on the prestige or authority of at least some organs of the United Nations.

344. In his delegation's view the contents of paragraph 32 (c), sub-paragraphs (i) and (ii), were not true recommendations but merely statements of facts which were known to everyone. The really important passages were sub-paragraphs (iii) to (vii), which asked for the revocation of South Africa's Mandate, the establishment of an organization to administer South West Africa, the exercise of the Mandate by the General Assembly and a request to the Secretary-General to prepare for the exercise of the Mandate.

345. His delegation considered that the wording of parts of paragraph 32 (c) should be amended in order to express a greater sense of urgency. In sub-paragraph (iii), the words "during the twenty-first session of the General Assembly" should be inserted after the words "The United Nations should decide". Similarly, in sub-paragraph (v) some such expression as "not later than the forthcoming General Assembly", would better express the sense of urgency than the words "as early as possible".

346. Subject to those considerations, his delegation supported the report and would vote in favour of it.

347. The representative of Yugoslavia said that the South African Government had violated the provisions of the Charter and the Mandate for South West Africa by attempting to partition and annex the Territory and by pursuing a ruthless policy of apartheid. Despite the strong and consistent opposition of the United Nations, South Africa had continued its efforts to put into practice the recommendations of the Odendaal Commission, in flagrant violation of the United Nations Charter, the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and General Assembly resolution 2074 (XX). The indigenous population of South West Africa was being denied fundamental human rights, while its labour and natural resources were being ruthlessly exploited for the sole benefit of the South African régime and the White settlers.

348. Contrary to the United Nations resolutions on the Territory, military bases and installations had been established for the purpose of suppressing the national liberation movement and of prolonging the advantages which the racist régime of South Africa derived from the existing status of the Territory. Despite the seventy-three resolutions adopted by the General Assembly, South Africa had ignored its obligations under the Mandate, had refused to acknowledge the supervisory authority of the United Nations and had persisted in its policy of apartheid. The overwhelming majority of the Members of the United Nations had made valiant efforts to find a peaceful solution to the problem. One such effort had been the complaint submitted by the Governments of Ethiopia and Liberia to the International Court of Justice against the Republic of South Africa. Unfortunately, after a long period of waiting, the international community, which had expected a righteous judgement from the Court, had been disappointed. By ruling out the possibility of solving the problem by judicial means, the Court had placed upon the General Assembly the responsibility of achieving a solution through political action.

349. The Yugoslav delegation fully supported the conclusions and recommendations set forth in the Sub-Committee's valuable report. It was convinced that the implementation of those recommendations would enable the people of South West Africa to achieve complete independence in accordance with the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. It would continue to support any action undertaken by the African and Asian countries and by Members of the United Nations for the purpose of enabling the people of South West Africa to exercise their legitimate rights.

350. The representative of Syria said that his delegation whole-heartedly supported the Sub-Committee's report. The question of South Africa was a clear case of annexation and oppression by a conqueror which, despite the many United Nations resolutions condemning its abominable practice of apartheid, was now trying to spread that practice further, in defiance of the principles of the United Nations and of world opinion. He hoped that the report would be adopted unanimously.

351. The representative of Australia said that the Australian Government continued to hold the views which it had expressed both privately to the South African Government and publicly on several occasions. Australia regarded South West Africa as a Non-Self-Governing Territory in respect of which there existed specific international obligations. Consequently, Australia believed that the principles applicable to such Territories, in particular the duty to promote genuine self-government and the acceptance of the doctrine of self-determination and of the principle of advancement towards equality of status among all the inhabitants of the Territory, applied to South West Africa. Since, however, the legal and political issues involved had not so far been properly studied either by his delegation or by the Special Committee, his delegation wished to reserve its general position on the report and, in particular, was unable at present to support paragraph 32 (c) (iii) and (iv) or paragraph 33.

352. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that the Soviet Union Government had issued a statement of the judgement by the International Court of Justice, denouncing it as a shameful judgement handed down in the interests of the South African racists and their imperialist protectors and affirming its full support for the people of South West Africa and for the African and Asian States which opposed the Court's illegal action.

353. The Soviet Union, which considered the policy of racial discrimination and apartheid practised by the South African racist régime shameful, was prepared to support any measures which the African States might consider necessary to ensure the speedy liberation of the South African people from the colonialist yoke and their exercise of the right to decide their own destiny.

354. The Soviet Union delegation had always spoken in favour of the full and unconditional implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and its application to South West Africa. His delegation had voted in favour of all the United Nations decisions on the subject.

355. It gave its full support to a number of the recommendations in the report of the Sub-Committee, in particular those calling for termination of South Africa's rights and responsibilities as Mandatory Power in respect of South West Africa, the holding of elections based on universal adult suffrage in the Territory, and the adoption of measures by the Security Council in accordance with the Charter in the event that South Africa refused to comply with the Organization's decision on South West Africa.

356. The Soviet Union delegation felt, however, that the direct administration of the Territory of South West Africa by the United Nations would not be the best solution and would be fraught with danger for the national liberation movement of the people of the Territory. While the Soviet Union delegation would support the recommendations as a whole, it wished to reserve its position on those recommendations relating to the assumption of direct administration of the Territory by the United Nations, which in its view might create serious difficulties with regard to the granting of independence to the Territory. What was in effect being recommended was that South West Africa should be placed under trusteeship, even though the trusteeship would be administered by the United Nations as a whole rather than by an individual State or States. Past experience had shown that even when the United Nations adopted positive political decisions, the machinery of the Organization, which was still dominated by representatives of the Western Powers, often implemented those decisions in the interests of imperialist and colonialist forces rather than in the interests of the people concerned. A striking example was the United Nations operation in the Congo, which had not only failed to put an end to colonialist intervention in that country's internal affairs but had given rise to serious difficulties within the United Nations itself.

357. His delegation considered that the preparations for and conduct of elections in South West Africa should be under the supervision of the Organization of African Unity, which might ensure the transfer of power to the people of the Territory and thereby guarantee genuine independence. His delegation also considered that the recommendations should call for OAU participation in the implementation of the measures to be taken against South Africa by the Security Council in the event that that country refused to comply with the United Nations decisions on South West Africa.

358. The Soviet Union delegation hoped that the recommendations which the Special Committee would submit to the General Assembly would take due account of those observations.

359. The representative of Iran said that his delegation fully endorsed the Sub-Committee's recommendations. It agreed that the question of South Africa was a political question and that political action should therefore be taken to settle it. Political means, political procedures and political pressures would be the most effective means of putting an end to South Africa's twenty-year defiance of the recommendations of the General Assembly and its contempt for the United Nations Charter.

360. The representative of the United Kingdom said that his delegation would reserve its comments until the question of South West Africa was discussed in the General Assembly. He fully reserved its position on the report and on its conclusions and recommendations.

361. The representative of Afghanistan said that, after a careful study of the report, his delegation felt that the situation in the Territory of South West Africa was a serious challenge to the responsibility of the United Nations. After twenty years of discussion, there had been no progress in the problem of South West Africa and the South African Government had not taken a single step to put the General Assembly resolutions into effect. It was therefore essential that the United Nations should find a way of bringing South Africa's mandate to a speedy end and of helping the people of the Territory to obtain independence and freedom through the application of justice and the right of self-determination. The solution of the problem should be in accordance with fundamental human rights and the principles of the United Nations Charter. The Afghan delegation fully supported the conclusions and recommendations appearing in the report of the Sub-Committee.

362. The representative of Italy said that his delegation fully endorsed most of the conclusions arrived at by the Sub-Committee, and in particular those appearing in paragraphs 27 to 30 of the report. Moreover, paragraphs 11 to 15, which reproduced extracts from the most recent advisory opinions of the International Court of Justice and from its judgement of 21 December 1962, were of great value, from both a political and a legal point of view. Those advisory opinions, as also the 1962 judgement, had established the legal status of the question beyond any doubt. As the Court's judgement of 18 July 1966 had not in any way modified them, they were still perfectly valid.

363. The Italian delegation did not underestimate the gravity of the situation and it shared the concern of the members of the Sub-Committee, and indeed of all the members of the Special Committee. As, however, the problems of South West Africa would be fully debated at the forthcoming session of the General Assembly, the Italian delegation, while not opposing the adoption of the report, wished to reserve its position until then.

364. In a desire to help the General Assembly in its deliberations on the question, he suggested that the Office of Legal Affairs should be asked to make a summary of the judgement of 18 July 1966, together with the accompanying annexes and records, as far as they were relevant. There were undoubtedly a number of ideas and suggestions in the text of the judgement which could facilitate the deliberations of the General Assembly and which confirmed the fact that, far from invalidating the previous advisory opinions of the Court, the judgement strengthened them.

365. The representative of the United States of America said that if the report of the Sub-Committee was put to the vote, his delegation would abstain; if there was a move to adopt the report without a vote, his delegation would have to reserve its position.

366. The General Assembly would be called upon to take important decisions on further steps to be taken for the solution of that very difficult problem. Meanwhile the United States delegation would continue to study the legal and political aspects of the question and would for the moment reserve its position. The United States Government was publicly committed to stand by the opinions handed down by the International Court of Justice with regard to the status of the Territory and South Africa's obligations under the Mandate. The United States did not consider the practice of apartheid to be conducive to the social progress or material and moral well-being of the inhabitants of the Territory.

367. The representative of Chile said that the events of the past twenty years led his delegation to consider that the appropriate solution, from the political and moral point of view, would be to revoke the Mandate entrusted to South Africa by the League of Nations. The legal aspects of the question, however, were really complex and were still being studied by Chile's Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The Chilean delegation was consequently obliged to reserve its position and its opinion on the question for the time being, as also on the various consequences that the conclusions in the Sub-Committee's report would entail. It endorsed the report in general and during the debate in the General Assembly it would have an opportunity to make a positive contribution to the efforts made by the international community to solve that difficult problem.

368. The representative of Uruguay said that the report of the Sub-Committee clarified a number of essential points. His delegation was quite prepared to vote affirmatively on the substance of the question, as it had done consistently over the last twenty years.

369. Nevertheless, it shared the concern of other delegations, especially with regard to the recommendations in paragraph 32 (c) (iii) of the report that "the United Nations should decide to exercise the right of reversion of the Mandate to itself". On the basis of the moral and political aspects of the question, that would appear to be the only appropriate solution, but from the strictly legal point of view it raised certain fundamental problems which, unless great care was taken, might create an unfortunate precedent. The Uruguayan delegation also felt that the report should not present the General Assembly with such a categorical conclusion. It therefore provisionally reserved the right to state its final position in the General Assembly, when it was in possession of all the relevant information.

370. Furthermore, as a member of the Security Council, he wished to make a reservation with regard to paragraph 33, which referred to Chapter VII of the Charter, a matter which was within the competence of the Security Council. His delegation would therefore abstain if that paragraph was put to the vote, for the simple reason that it did not want to prejudice the position which it would subsequently adopt on the subject.

371. Subject to those reservations, the Uruguayan delegation fully supported the other conclusions set forth in the report.

372. The representative of Sierra Leone said that his delegation would support the report of the Sub-Committee in its entirety, for it felt that the report represented a detailed study of the question.

373. The representative of Ethiopia said that, as Chairman of the Sub-Committee on South West Africa, he would like to provide clarification on certain points which, judging from his discussions with other representatives both inside and outside of the Special Committee, seemed to him to have given rise to some misunderstanding. He was referring to paragraph 32 of the report and the recommendations appearing in it. First and foremost, contrary to the impression given by some representatives, the Sub Committee had not sought to reject or ignore the legal aspect of the problem or the very useful body of jurisprudence that had been built up on the question of South West Africa. It was obvious that any political decision would have to rest on legal grounds, which fortunately existed. The entire Afro-Asian group was absolutely confident that there were good legal grounds. When Ethiopia and Liberia had submitted the case of South West Africa to the International Court of Justice six years previously, on behalf of the African group, they had done so, not in order to establish legal grounds, but in order to have those legal grounds strengthened. The fact that they had not met with the success for which they had hoped did not in any way invalidate the legal arguments they had put forward in favour of the South West African case.

374. While they were convinced that the struggle had to be waged on political grounds the members of the African group respected legality. They would continue in the future, as they had done in the past, to adopt a line of conduct that best corresponded to the legal aspects of the question. Even the International Court of Justice, which seemed recently to have evaded its responsibilities, had handed down judgments and given advisory opinions which formed the legal basis upon which any political action would be founded. It would therefore be an injustice to think that in drawing up its report the Sub-Committee had disregarded the legal situation.

375. There also appeared to be a misunderstanding on the question of the revocation of the Mandate. Some delegations, as also some observers, seemed to have understood that the revocation of the Mandate would mean the cancellation of the Mandate. There was, however, no question of cancelling the international agreement governing the status of South West Africa: that Territory was and would remain an international Territory until such time as it attained independence. The report did not recommend any action which would lead to South West Africa becoming a sort of "no man's land" into which anyone might be tempted to move. That was not at all what the Sub-Committee had intended when it had declared that the responsibilities of South Africa under the Mandate should be terminated. If the report of the Sub-Committee was not sufficiently clear on that point, the Special Committee was perfectly free to criticize it and to improve the text.

376. The fact was that, faced with South Africa's stubborn refusal to respect its obligations, and since, after six years of waiting for a legal solution, the question was still not settled, the Sub-Committee thought that the time had come to call for action on the part of the General Assembly.

377. For six years the United Nations had refrained from intervening on behalf of the people of South West Africa for fear of prejudicing the case which was pending before the International Court of Justice. The Court had now declared that it could not pass judgement, on the pretext that the plaintiffs had not established the existence of a legal right or interest. Faced with that ridiculous situation, the Sub-Committee had no further recourse but to appeal to the General Assembly. One of the parties to the contract, namely South Africa, had not fulfilled its commitments; the other party, namely the United Nations, must now take a decision on the contract's validity. According to the latest news, it did not appear that the recent change of leadership in South Africa held out the slightest hope of an improvement in the situation. He wondered whether the United Nations was going to wait until South Africa fulfilled its intention of annexing the Territory, a move for which the latest judgement of the Court gave it every encouragement. He could not imagine how the United Nations could justify its existence and its responsibilities unless it took effective and immediate action in the international field.

378. The representative of Uruguay said that, while he did not question the quality of the Sub-Committee's work, he regretted that the conclusions of its report were not backed by a solid juridical argument. His delegation recalled that at the eighteenth session of the General Assembly it had supported the proposal made by Venezuela to carry out a legal study of the question. It was fully aware of the sufferings of an oppressed population but felt it would be difficult to justify the revocation of the Mandate for South West Africa before the General Assembly if such legal arguments were lacking. It had no doubt that the position set forth by the Ethiopian representative was justified from a legal point of view but he hoped that that position would be better substantiated. Meanwhile, the Uruguayan delegation would continue to study the question so as to be able to prepare its position for the debates which would take place in the General Assembly.

379. The representative of Denmark said that since his Government had not yet completed its examination of the legal and political issues involved, in the report, his delegation had to enter a provisional reservation regarding sub-paragraph (iii) of paragraph 32 (c) and paragraph 33; thus, its position remained as indicated in paragraph 35 of the report. Subject to that reservation, his delegation had no objection to the adoption of the report.

F. FURTHER ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

380. At its 467th meeting, on 15 September 1966, the Special Committee adopted the report of the Sub-Committee on South West Africa¹⁵ by consensus, it being understood that the reservations expressed by members would be reflected in the records.

G. EXAMINATION OF PETITIONS

381. The petitions concerning South West Africa which were received and circulated by the Special Committee are listed in paragraphs 73 and 328 above. These petitions relate, inter alia, to the establishment of military bases in the Territory, the situation of refugees from South West Africa, political organizations, the shooting, arrest and deportation of political leaders in the Territory, the ejection of Africans from urban areas, implementation of the recommendations of the Odendaal Commission, the situation in Ovamboland, labour conditions in the Territory, the judgment of 18 July of the International Court of Justice, and the future of South West Africa.

382. In operative paragraph 8 (a) of General Assembly resolution 1899 (XVIII), the Special Committee was requested to continue its efforts with a view to discharging the tasks assigned to it by resolution 1805 (XVII). In operative paragraph 3 of resolution 1805 (XVII), the General Assembly requested the Special Committee "to discharge, mutatis mutandis, the tasks assigned to the Special Committee for South West Africa by resolution 1702 (XVI), taking into consideration the special responsibilities of the United Nations with regard to the Territory of South West Africa...". One of the tasks accordingly assigned to the Special Committee is that of examining petitions relating to South West Africa.

383. During 1966, the Special Committee examined forty-four petitions concerning South West Africa, which it took into account during its consideration of the situation.

384. Bearing in mind the special responsibilities of the United Nations with regard to the Territory of South West Africa, the Special Committee, on the recommendation of the Sub-Committee on Petitions, decided, at its 468th meeting on 19 September 1966, to recommend to the General Assembly the adoption of the following draft resolution on petitions concerning South West Africa:

"Petitions concerning South West Africa

"The General Assembly,

"Bearing in mind the special responsibilities of the United Nations with regard to South West Africa,

"Noting that the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples has received and examined forty-four petitions concerning South West Africa, in accordance with paragraph 3 of General Assembly resolution 1805 (XVII) of 14 December 1962 and paragraph 8 (a) of General Assembly resolution 1899 (XVIII) of 13 November 1963,

"Noting further that these petitions relate, inter alia, to the establishment of military bases in the Territory, the situation of refugees from South West Africa, political organizations, the shooting, arrest and deportation of political leaders in the Territory, the ejection of Africans from urban areas, implementation of the recommendations of the Odendaal Commission, the situation in Ovamboland, labour conditions in the Territory, the judgement of the International Court of Justice of 18 July 1966, and the future of South West Africa,

"1. Notes that the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples has taken these petitions into account in its consideration of the question of South West Africa;

"2. Draws the attention of the petitioners concerned to the report of the Special Committee concerning South West Africa and to the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly at its twenty-first session on the question of South West Africa, as well as the reports of the Secretary-General relating to the Territory."

¹⁵ The conclusions and recommendations contained in this report appear in the appendix, paragraphs 27-34.

APPENDIX

[A/AC.109/L.325]

Report of the Sub-Committee on South West Africa

Rapporteur: Mr. C. R. GHAREKHAN (India)

INTRODUCTION

1. By operative paragraph 10 of the resolution adopted at its 439th meeting on 9 June 1966 on the question of South West Africa (A/AC.109/177), the Special Committee decided to establish "a sub-committee to make a thorough study of the situation and, among other matters, to recommend an early date for the independence of the Territory".

2. At its 455th meeting, on 22 June 1966, the Special Committee decided, on the proposal of its Chairman, that the Sub-Committee on South West Africa should be composed of Denmark, Ethiopia, India, the Ivory Coast, Poland, Tunisia and Venezuela.

3. At its first meeting, on 21 July 1966, the Sub-Committee unanimously elected Lij Endelkachew Makonnen (Ethiopia), Chairman, and Mr. C. R. Gharekhan (India) Rapporteur.

4. In his opening statement at that meeting, Mr. John W. S. Malecela, Acting Chairman of the Special Committee, stressed the determination of the African States to rid South West Africa of colonialism and apartheid. The failure of their efforts to solve the problem of South West Africa in a peaceful manner through recourse to the International Court of Justice confirmed not only that the problem was a political rather than a judicial one, but also that the composition of many organs of the United Nations needed reappraisal in the light of changed conditions. The problem of South West Africa, notwithstanding its complexities which were due in large measure to the support given to South Africa by colonial Powers having vested interests in the area was in essence a simple one: it was a question of decolonizing the Territory. The Acting Chairman expressed the hope that the Sub-Committee would analyse all the factors involved and would recommend the most positive and concrete steps to be taken to liberate the Territory of South West Africa and secure for its African population its right to freedom and independence.

5. The Sub-Committee held three further meetings, on 12 and 19 August and on 8 September 1966.

6. In its study of the situation, the Sub-Committee was guided by the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Special Committee on the question of South West Africa. The Sub-Committee also took into consideration the advisory opinions of 11 July 1950, 7 June 1955 and 1 June 1956 as well as the judgements of 21 December 1962 and 18 July 1966 of the International Court of Justice. Further, the Sub-Committee took account of communications from the following Member States concerning the Court's judgement of 18 July 1966: Bulgaria (A/6372 and Corr.1), India (A/6250), Ivory Coast (A/6371), Kenya (A/6387), Mongolia (A/6407), Nigeria (A/6346), Pakistan (A/6388) and Poland (A/6402).

7. The Sub-Committee noted that, by a letter dated 3 August 1966 addressed to the Secretary-General (A/6386), the representatives of thirty-five Member States requested that the question of South West Africa be considered as a matter of priority by the General Assembly at its twenty-first session.

CONSIDERATION BY THE SUB-COMMITTEE

8. Members of the Sub-Committee expressed the opinion that the Court's judgement of 18 July 1966, by ruling out the possibility of solving the problem of South West Africa by judicial means, had placed upon the General Assembly a serious responsibility to achieve a solution through political action.

9. Members of the Sub-Committee found it regrettable that the International Court of Justice had limited itself to deciding to reject the applications of Ethiopia and Liberia on the ground that they could not be considered to have established any legal right or interest in the subject-matter of their claims; as a consequence, the Court had not pronounced on any of the substantive issues before it.

10. At the same time, it was unanimously recognized that, as regards the existence of the Mandate and the obligations of South Africa thereunder, the earlier advisory opinions and the 1962 judgement of the Court remained valid.

11. Concerning the status of the Territory, the Court, in its advisory opinion of 11 July 1950, unanimously expressed the opinion:

"that South West Africa is a territory under the international Mandate assumed by the Union of South Africa on 17 December 1920";^a and

"that the Union of South Africa acting alone has not the competence to modify the international status of the Territory of South West Africa".^b

12. Concerning the obligations of South Africa under the Mandate, the Court in 1950 expressed its opinion as follows: "that the Union of South Africa continues to have the international obligations stated in Article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations and in the Mandate for South West Africa as well as the obligation to transmit petitions from the inhabitants of that Territory, the supervisory functions to be exercised by the United Nations, to which the annual reports and the petitions are to be submitted, and the reference to the Permanent Court of International Justice to be replaced by a reference to the International Court of Justice, in accordance with Article 7 of the Mandate and Article 37 of the Statute of the Court".^c

13. Members also noted that the advisory opinion of 11 July 1950 had been reaffirmed by the Court in its advisory opinions of 7 June 1955 and 1 June 1956 and by its judgement of 21 December 1962.

14. In its advisory opinion of 1 June 1956, the Court itself interpreted the general purport and meaning of its 1950 opinion as follows:

"The general purport and meaning of the Opinion of the Court of 11 July 1950 is that the paramount purpose underlying the taking over by the General Assembly of the United Nations of the supervisory functions in respect of the Mandate for South West Africa formerly exercised by the Council of the League of Nations was to safeguard the sacred trust of civilization through the maintenance of effective international supervision of the administration of the Mandated Territory."^d

15. Again, in its judgement of 21 December 1962, the International Court, after citing a passage from its 1950 opinion relating to South Africa's obligation to accept international supervision over its administration of the Territory, stated:

"The findings of the Court on the obligation of the Union Government to submit to international supervision are thus crystal clear. Indeed, to exclude the obligations connected with the Mandate would be to exclude the very essence of the Mandate."^e

16. In the view of members, it had been established beyond any doubt that South Africa had failed to discharge, and even to recognize, its obligations under the Mandate to accept the supervisory authority of the United Nations and to promote to the utmost the material and moral well-being and the social progress of the inhabitants of South West Africa. Ignoring the repeated condemnation of the apartheid system by the General Assembly, South Africa had continued to apply and to extend that system in South West Africa, in violation of its obligations under the Mandate and the Charter.

17. Members also observed that far from co-operating with the United Nations in the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, South Africa, in contravention of various General Assembly resolutions, had consistently attempted to annex South West Africa. As early as 1946, during the first session of the General Assembly, South Africa had declared its intention, which was, however, rejected, of annexing the Territory. Further, it had proposed in 1957 to partition the Territory so that a portion would be placed under Trusteeship and the other richer part, containing the Territory's diamond deposits and other major resources, annexed to the Union. This proposal also was rejected by the General Assembly.

18. Despite the strong and long standing opposition to annexation from the world community, South Africa is currently preparing to partition the Territory into separate racial and ethnic areas on the basis of the recommendations of the Odendaal Commission, the full implementation of which would destroy the territorial integrity of South West Africa, alter the status of the Territory and in effect result in its annexation by South Africa. This development would be a most flagrant violation of General Assembly resolution 2074 (XX) of 17 December 1965.

19. A total of seventy-three resolutions adopted by the General Assembly over a period of twenty years had not resulted in compliance by South Africa with its obligations in its administration of South West Africa. On the contrary, South Africa had continued its persistent defiance of the resolutions and maintained its refusal to co-operate with the United Nations in its efforts to enable the people of the Territory to exercise their right to self-determination.

20. In these circumstances, several members of the Sub-Committee considered it essential that immediate and effective action be taken by the General Assembly to find a solution to the question. They emphasized that if the situation were allowed to continue, it would reflect on the prestige and authority of the United Nations. It was also felt that any delay would result in a consolidation of South Africa's position in South West Africa.

21. Since the United Nations bore a heavy and special responsibility in relation to South West Africa, it was the duty of the Organization to bring the South African régime in South West Africa to a speedy end and to enable the people of the Territory without delay to enjoy their inalienable rights to freedom and independence in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

22. Members recalled that General Assembly resolution 1702 (XVI) of 19 December 1961 outlined certain objectives to be achieved for the speedy implementation of resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960. By General Assembly resolution 1805 (XVII) of 14 December 1962, the task of ensuring the attainment of these objectives was assigned to the Special Committee. In the opinion of members of the Sub-Committee, there was little expectation that these objectives could be achieved while the Government of South Africa exercised uncontrolled authority over the Territory.

23. Some members accordingly proposed the immediate termination of South Africa's Mandate by the General Assembly. In this connexion, it was suggested that the United Nations itself take over the administration of the Territory until the people of South West Africa were in a position to assume control. Another suggestion was that termination of the Mandate be accompanied by the provision of all possible assistance to the people of South West Africa and the imposition of an embargo on all trade with South Africa.

24. Some members also proposed that the Assembly should ensure that South West Africa was not annexed by South Africa and that it should declare null and void any act by South Africa which was inconsistent with United Nations resolutions.

25. A further suggestion was that measures be taken to ensure the removal of all military bases from the Territory and to end the militarization of the area; to stop the provision of military equipment and training to South Africa; and to revoke licences granted to South Africa for the manufacture of arms and military vehicles. It was pointed out in this regard that it was regrettable that some Western Powers had not taken action to implement the recommendations of the General Assembly calling upon States to refrain from supplying arms or military equipment to South Africa and to refrain from any action which might hamper the implementation of United Nations resolutions on South West Africa.

26. It was suggested that in addition steps should be taken to ensure the strict observance of the embargo on the supply of petroleum and petroleum products to South Africa and to impose an embargo on exports of other specific products to South Africa, notably rubber, certain metals and chemicals, lumber, cotton and other fibres, industrial equipment, and motors and spare parts.

CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

27. The Sub-Committee, expressing grave concern at the situation prevailing with regard to the Territory following the judgement of the International Court of Justice delivered on 18 July 1966, is convinced that urgent and effective steps must be taken so as to prevent a serious threat to or breach of peace in the area.

28. The Sub-Committee gave careful study to the above-mentioned judgement on the question of South West Africa and particularly to the operative part dismissing the case of the applicants, Ethiopia and Liberia, on the technical ground that they had failed to establish any legal right or interest in the matter. The Sub-Committee deeply regrets that the Court decided to dismiss the case without adjudicating upon the substance of the matter; fears were expressed that the judgement of the Court may have harmful consequences for the respect for and establishment of orderly international conduct in future.

29. At the same time, the Sub-Committee is of the opinion that this judgement does not invalidate the earlier substantive advisory opinions of the Court, which have left no room for any doubt regarding the obligations of South Africa and the supervisory powers of the United Nations.

30. The Sub-Committee is of the unanimous opinion that the problem of South West Africa is a political and colonial issue, the solution of which must be sought in terms of fundamental human rights and the principles of the Charter, particularly those contained in Article 73, and General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960. The fact that the provisions of this resolution are fully applicable to South West Africa, a Non-Self-Governing Territory, has already been recognized in numerous resolutions of the General Assembly. The Republic of South Africa has consistently refused to respect and implement the resolutions of the General Assembly. It has, on the contrary, extended its inhuman policies of racial discrimination to the Territory of South West Africa in clear violation of its obligations under the sacred trust which was entrusted to it in 1920.

31. The Sub-Committee firmly believes that immediate and effective steps should be taken by the United Nations in accordance with its basic responsibilities, with a view to protecting the fundamental rights of the people of South West Africa. The aim of such steps should be to enable the people of the Territory to exercise their right of self-determination in a free and unrestricted atmosphere.

32. In view of the foregoing, the Sub-Committee recommends the following course of action:

(a) That the provisions of the Declaration contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960 are fully applicable to South West Africa, a Non-Self-Governing Territory, as has been recognized by several General Assembly resolutions, should be reaffirmed.

(b) The inalienable right of the people of South West Africa to freedom and independence in accordance with resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960, which has been affirmed by General Assembly resolution 2074 (XX) of 17 December 1965 and other earlier resolutions should be reaffirmed in unequivocal terms.

(c) The people of the Territory should be given the opportunity to exercise their right to self-determination as early as possible, since only thus can their legitimate rights and interests be protected. For this purpose, the following steps are recommended:

- (i) The United Nations should recall that it has made all possible efforts to solve the problem by negotiations with South Africa;
- (ii) The United Nations should once again record the fact that South Africa has consistently refused to comply with the resolutions of the General Assembly in respect of South West Africa;
- (iii) The United Nations should decide to exercise the right of reversion of the Mandate to itself;
- (iv) The rights and responsibilities of South Africa as a Mandatory Power in respect of South West Africa should be terminated, along with the assumption of responsibility by the United Nations for the direct administration of the Territory as well as the creation of appropriate machinery for the purpose;
- (v) In order to enable the United Nations to make adequate arrangements for the administration of the Territory, the Secretary-General should be requested to undertake a thorough study of the administrative, financial, personnel and other prerequisites for such direct administration; the Secretary-General should be requested to submit his findings as early as possible;
- (vi) Following the assumption of direct responsibility by the United Nations, arrangements should be made to hold elections on the principle of universal adult suffrage so that the people can decide on the form of government they desire through their own freely expressed wishes;

- (vii) The Territory should become fully independent following the elections and the formation of a government as provided for in sub-paragraph (vi) above.

33. In the event of South Africa resisting the implementation of the above steps, the Sub-Committee is of the opinion that effective measures, including those provided under Chapter VII of the Charter, should be taken against South Africa.

34. The Sub-Committee is convinced that the implementation of the above recommendations will expedite the achievement by South West Africa of independence and of its rightful place in the community of nations. The Sub-Committee expresses the fervent hope that all the Members of the United Nations, conscious of their responsibilities under the Charter, will extend their whole-hearted co-operation in supporting and carrying out the above recommendations.

ADOPTION OF THE REPORT

35. This report was unanimously adopted by the Sub-Committee at its fourth meeting on 8 September 1966. The representative of Denmark stated that since the examination of the legal and political issues involved had not yet been completed by his Government, the Danish delegation had to enter a provisional reservation regarding sub-paragraph (iii) of paragraph 32 (c) and paragraph 33.

CHAPTER V

TERRITORIES UNDER PORTUGUESE ADMINISTRATION

PART I*

A. ACTION TAKEN IN 1965 BY THE SECURITY COUNCIL, THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AND THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

1. The Special Committee considered the Territories under Portuguese administration in May and June 1965 during its visit to Africa and again in October at Headquarters.

2. During the first part of its consideration the Special Committee heard a number of petitioners from Angola, Mozambique and Guinea under Portuguese administration. It also considered the situation of refugees from these Territories and measures taken to extend medical and other assistance to them by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and specialized agencies concerned in response to the Committee's resolution of 1964 (A/5800/Rev.1,¹ chap. V, para. 352).

3. The Special Committee on 10 June 1965 adopted a resolution (A/6000/Rev.1,² chap. V, para. 415) in which it reaffirmed the right of the population of the African Territories under Portuguese administration to self-determination and independence and recognized the legitimacy of their struggle to achieve the rights laid down in the United Nations Charter, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and appealed to all States to grant the African populations of these Territories the moral and material support necessary for the restoration of their inalienable rights. It also requested the High Commissioner for Refugees and the specialized agencies of the United Nations to increase their assistance to the refugees from those Territories. The Special Committee drew the urgent attention of the Security Council to the continued deterioration of the situation in the Territories under Portuguese administration as well as to the consequences of the threats made by Portugal against the independent African States that border upon its colonies.

4. The Secretary-General transmitted the text of the resolution, together with the records of the meetings held by the Committee on this question, to the President of the Security Council on 17 June 1965.³

5. Continuing its discussions on the Portuguese Territories in October, the Special Committee had before it a report submitted by Sub-Committee I. This report had been prepared in accordance with a resolution adopted by the Special Committee on 3 July 1964 (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. V, para. 352) by which the latter had, among other things, requested the Sub-Committee, with the assistance of the Secretary-General, to study foreign economic and other interests which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in the Territories under Portuguese administration. On 28 October the Special Committee adopted the report of Sub-Committee I and endorsed its observations and conclusions. The Special Committee dealt with this matter in its report to the General Assembly (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V) to which it appended the report of Sub-Committee I, together with the two background papers prepared by the Secretariat for Sub-Committee I, on mining activities and concession, occupation and land settlement in Territories under Portuguese administration.

6. By letter dated 11 July 1963, the representatives of thirty-two Member States requested the Security Council to take up the question concerning the situation in Territories under Portuguese administration.⁴ The Security Council discussed this question and on 23 November 1965 adopted resolution 218 (1965). Recalling General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960, the Council affirmed "that the situation resulting from the policies of Portugal both as regards the African population of its colonies and the neighbouring States seriously disturbs international peace and security". Once again, it deplored the failure of the Government of Portugal to comply with the previous resolutions of the Council and the General Assembly and to recognize the right of the peoples of the Territories to self-determination. It reiterated an urgent demand to Portugal to take steps towards granting independence to all the Territories under its administration in accordance with the aspirations of the peoples. The Council again requested all Member States to refrain from offering assistance to Portugal which would enable it to continue its repression of the peoples of the Territories, and to take measures to prevent not only the sale and supply of arms and military equipment to the Portuguese Government for that purpose, including the sale and shipment of equipment and materials for the manufacture and maintenance of arms and ammunition to be used in the Territories. It asked all Members to inform the Secretary-General on measures they have taken towards the implementation of this provision.

7. As in its 1963 resolution, the Council requested the Secretary-General "to ensure the implementation of the provisions of the present resolution, to provide such assistance as he may deem necessary" and to report to the Security Council not later than 30 June 1966.

8. The Fourth Committee of the General Assembly considered the question of the Territories under Portuguese administration on the basis of the Special Committee's report (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V) and two reports⁵ by the Secretary-General on the special training programme for those Territories.

9. On the recommendation of the Fourth Committee the General Assembly, on 21 December 1965, adopted resolution 2107 (XX) by which, in addition to reaffirming its previous resolutions and recommendations, it appealed to all States, "in co-operation with the Organization of African Unity, to render to the people of the Territories under Portuguese administration the moral and material support necessary for the restoration of their inalienable rights"; condemned the policy of the Government of Portugal which violates the economic and political rights of the indigenous population by the establishment on a large scale of foreign immigrants in the Territories and by the exporting of workers to South Africa; requested all States to prevent such activities on the part of their nationals in the foreign financial interests which are an impediment to the attainment by the peoples of their legitimate rights of freedom and independence. The General Assembly urged Member States separately or collectively to take the following actions:

(a) Break off diplomatic and consular relations with the Government of Portugal or refrain from establishing such relations;

(b) Close their ports to all vessels flying the Portuguese flag or in the service of Portugal;

(c) Prohibit their ships from entering any ports in Portugal and its colonial territories;

(d) Refuse landing and transit facilities to all aircraft belonging to or in the service of the Government of Portugal and to companies registered under the laws of Portugal;

(e) Boycott all trade with Portugal.

It also requested the Security Council to consider putting into effect against Portugal the appropriate measures laid down in the Charter for the purpose of carrying out its resolutions concerning the Territories under Portuguese administration.

B. INFORMATION ON THE TERRITORIES

1. The Territories in general

Constitutional and political developments

10. Since the repeal of the Native Statute in 1961 a series of legislative changes has been introduced to complete the institutional framework for the political and economic integration of the Overseas Territories with Portugal. With the publication in 1964 of the decree (No. 45,830, 25 July) increasing the membership of the Corporative Chamber, the envisaged constitutional transformation providing for "greater intervention of the Provinces in the direction of national policy" has been completed.

11. As will be seen below the Portuguese Government considers that Portugal and the Overseas Territories constitute one "pluri-continental and multi-racial nation" and that there can no longer be any discussion of a change in the relationship between them. In an interview on 4 August 1965, Prime Minister Salazar explained his Government's policy as follows:

"We could only agree to self-determination for the Overseas Territories, in the sense in which it is at present understood, if those Territories were to choose their destiny as a nation or their form as a State. The position is, however, that as a result of the integration which has been a principle of Portugal's overseas policy for centuries, those Territories as a whole already form a nation and a sovereign State. To admit at every time of political crisis that a part of a Territory has the right to self-determination in the above sense is to create a factor of instability and national discussion. While the problem may be relevant to dependent Territories or colonies desiring to achieve independence and define their relations with the State which exercised rights of sovereignty over them, it is not relevant in the case of Portugal.

"In the case of Portugal the only thing which matters is to determine whether the laws confer on the citizens of the Territories the same political rights, that is to say, those through which the individual influences the character of the organs of State. If those rights are the same in all the Territories, we do not have citizens and subjects, but only citizens, even though these only participate in certain functions according to their capabilities.

"This, however, is a matter of electoral law and not a political matter. The fomenters of the African revolution are attempting to evade the issue by making one man, one vote, the basic demand. No one with a sense of responsibility will accept a thesis which is defended only for the achievement of certain results and not for its truth or justice."

12. In 1965, the most important political events were the presidential elections in July and the elections to the National Assembly in November. As these were the first "national" elections since the Overseas Territories were given wider representation in the central organs of Government under the Overseas Organic Law of 1963, they are described in some detail below.

(a) Election of the Head of State

13. As reported previously (A/6000/Rev. 1, chap. V, para. 5) in 1965 for the first time the Head of State of Portugal was elected through an electoral college, established under Decree No. 43,548 of 21 March 1961. This electoral college, when fully constituted, consists of the acting members of the National Assembly and of the Corporative Chamber, representatives of half the number of the municipal councils in each district or each Territory not divided into districts, and a specified number of representatives nominated by the legislative council of each Territory from among its own members.

14. The electoral college comprises 616 members when fully constituted. These are the 130 deputies to the National Assembly, 205 members of the Corporative Chamber, 211 representatives of municipal councils and 70 members of the legislative councils of the Overseas Territories. The seven Overseas Territories are represented by 135 members. These comprise 26 deputies to the National Assembly, 9 members of the Corporative Chamber, 46 members representing municipal councils, and 60 members from the Territorial legislative councils. The total membership of each of the Territories in the electoral college was: Angola 51, Mozambique 51,⁶ Cape Verde 13, and Guinea under Portuguese administration, São Tomé and Príncipe, Timor and Macau each had five members.

15. Under the Constitution, candidates standing for election to the presidency have to be approved by the Supreme Tribunal of Justice, headed by the Prime Minister. In 1965 the only candidate was Rear Admiral Américo Thomaz, incumbent President, chosen by the National Union as "a candidate of continuity in a period of national emergency". No Opposition candidate was put forward in 1965, because as Mr. Mário de Azevedo Gomez, one of the leaders of the Acção Democrático-Social was reported as saying, his group did not consider the presidential election by the electoral college as "a national act" since the new system of indirect suffrage excluded any possible representation of the Opposition.

16. On 7 July when the electoral college met, 585 members were present. The voting was: 556 for Admiral Thomaz, and 13 against. Sixteen members of the electoral college did not answer the roll-call. Upon assuming office, President Thomaz, in exercise of his powers, appointed Mr. Oliveira Salazar to continue as Prime Minister. In his inauguration speech President Thomaz paid tribute to the armed forces for their intransigent defence of national Territory in Angola, Mozambique and Guinea under Portuguese administration where fighting continued on the borders with newly independent countries. He emphasized that "the fight must continue until our final victory, which a more realistic understanding of the West can hasten".

17. Although Angola, Mozambique and Guinea under Portuguese administration together had about 20 per cent of the seats in the electoral college, it does not appear that Africans had much voice in the presidential election.

18. Firstly, the deputies in the National Assembly representing the Territories had been elected in November 1961 on the basis of the electoral rolls compiled before the repeal of the Native Statute, and there was no indication that more Africans had been added to those rolls.⁷ Secondly, in each of the legislative councils of the three Territories, apart from the limited number of Africans who qualified to vote in the direct elections under the new Electoral Law of 6 December 1963 (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. V, paras. 54-64), the rest of the African population is represented by only three members out of a total membership of 36 in Angola, 29 in Mozambique and 14 in Guinea under Portuguese administration (ibid., paras. 35-36, and appendix, table I). Thirdly, municipal councils are established only in concelhos where there are more than 500 registered voters (Decree 43,730 of 12 June 1961). These councils comprise a president, who is generally the administrator, and four members representing public or private economic interests, moral (religious) or professional interests. Where such groups are absent, the members are chosen from among "individual taxpayers of Portuguese nationality whose direct tax liability is assessed at 1,000 escudos or more". Fourthly, the representatives of Angola and Mozambique in the Corporative Chamber are elected in each Territory by the Economic and Social Council, the members of which are representative of government administrative bodies and economic and professional interests (ibid., para. 23).

(b) Elections to the National Assembly

19. On 28 September, a few weeks after President Thomaz had assumed office for a second seven-year term, the Government announced that elections to the National Assembly would take place on 7 November. The names of candidates standing for election were to be submitted within a week (before 6 October) to the district governors concerned. A period of thirty days (6 October to 6 November) was set for the electoral campaign.

20. As political parties are not recognized in Portugal except for the government organization called the National Union, the only time when any organized Opposition opinion is given public recognition is during the thirty-day campaign period. Opposition groups do exist, however, and include some former government officials. Early in October one such group, under the name of Acção Democrático-Social decided to contest the National Union candidates in five (Lisbon, Oporto, Viseu, Leiria and Braga) of the thirty electoral districts in Portugal. No Opposition candidates were presented in the Overseas Territories.

21. On 14 October the group, referred to in the Press as the Opposition, issued a 5,000-word manifesto in which it protested government censorship of news and the lack of freedom of association and expression. Besides reaffirming the programme for the democratization of the country set out in an earlier manifesto issued by opponents of the régime in 1961, the Opposition placed on record its views on the Government's policy in the Overseas Territories (although according to a press report of 12 September, the Minister of Interior, Alfredo Santos, Jr., had warned that the Government would not tolerate disagreement over its policy of continued Portuguese rule in Africa).

22. The Opposition manifesto noted that although the war in Angola had officially ended in 1961, fighting was not only still going on there but had extended to Mozambique and Guinea under Portuguese administration and that there was no longer any expectation of an early end to the war. The manifesto opposed the solution of the problem of the Overseas Territories by military means, pointing out that "the country was exhausting itself by the loss of precious lives to obtain an unforeseeable goal and was risking an economic calamity...". "We maintain", the Opposition stated, "that what is required without delay is a political solution based on the principle of self-determination, exercised through democratic means. This solution is imposed on us by our conscience as free men who... consider decolonization an irreversible phenomenon...". The Government should carry out the process of self-determination in the Overseas Territories in such a way that the results would be accepted internationally so that the Territories would obtain the sympathy and possible aid of the United Nations which had so far been denied them because of the Government's policies.

23. The manifesto in protesting generally against government censorship, cited as a specific example, the Government's action on the background paper on Territories under Portuguese administration which the United Nations Secretariat had prepared for the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in 1965. The Opposition complained that whereas the Government had given wide publicity to the press release from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs which characterized the United Nations document as containing "tendentious quotations from official texts" and "errors of fact", the document in question had not been made available and therefore the Portuguese people could not even know the facts of the question.

24. When the Opposition manifesto was published in the Portuguese newspapers on 16 October, it was accompanied by numerous articles reporting protests from Angola and Mozambique and other Territories against the Opposition's support of the principle of self-determination for the Overseas Territories. On 17 October the Portuguese Press published a statement by the Minister for the Interior replying to various points raised by the Opposition manifesto and a statement by the National Union which dealt mainly with the question of the Overseas Territories.

25. The National Union took issue with the Opposition's proposals for a "political" solution. The Union observed that although the Opposition was against a military solution because it was exhausting the nation, it had not denied that a military solution was possible. Whatever the price, Portugal would never abandon its legitimate defence of its national Territory against outside aggression.

26. According to the National Union the main reason why a "military solution" was to be preferred was because the so-called "political" solution to the problem of the Overseas Territories would lead inevitably to their secession from Portugal. Carried out under the auspices of the United Nations which was dominated by the Afro-Asian countries, the process of self-determination of the Overseas Territories could only lead to disintegration of the Portuguese nation and therefore, in the opinion of the National Union, the proposal of the Opposition amounted to treason.

27. On 20 October, the Opposition withdrew its candidates from four of the electoral districts and subsequently also from Braga. According to press reports their withdrawal from the last district was because government censorship and other restrictions denied them freedom to conduct their campaign.

28. In the following two weeks protests from branches of the National Union as well as various government, civic and professional bodies in Portugal and in the Overseas Territories continued to be published daily in the Portuguese Press, expressing support for the Government's policy of political integration and affirming the Portuguese identity (portuguesismo) of the Territories and their inhabitants.

29. On 5 November, three other manifestos were published. The Monarchist League repudiated the Opposition's formula for the self-determination of the Overseas Territories and supported the Government's policy of decentralization consistent with the political administrative unity of the nation. The Independent Monarchist Movement protested that the wars in Africa were being continued by certain financial interests, in spite of the fact that a long war was not in the interest of the nation. A third manifesto was issued by over 100 Catholic laymen, not identified with any particular interests.

30. The Catholic manifesto, which had been sent previously to President Thomaz, protested against government censorship, measures taken against missionaries and priests in Angola including their imprisonment and exile,⁸ persecution of those who did not agree with the Government's policy, and "an electoral procedure without dignity or truth", since only one party was permitted. In particular, it protested against the Government's ban on public discussion of self-determination for the Overseas Territories. The Catholic group also criticized the Government for continuing the war, which it said "although supported from outside was not entirely the result of foreign efforts". The group took the position that the Government had failed to give the people of the Overseas Territories an opportunity for free and orderly expression of their views and had thereby pushed them into violence. It expressed support for a peaceful solution to the problem of the Overseas Territories and suggested that a free dialogue should take place between those Territories and Portugal. In this connexion, the Catholic group questioned why the Government did not consult the people as to their views on the Overseas Territories if it were confident, as it claimed to be, that its policy of integration was defended by the great majority of the people.

31. On the eve of the elections Mr. Salazar addressed the people over the radio and replied to the Opposition manifesto which he said merely contained sterile criticisms, as for instance the complaint against the Government's failure to translate the United Nations document, since the document was available in the official languages of the United Nations. As regards the Opposition's views on the Overseas Territories, he considered that the overwhelming manifestations constituted a real expression of the people, a plebiscite, showing that national unity was a fact; it was no longer any use to discuss it. He appealed to the people to vote as an affirmation of their Portuguese identity (portuguesismo) and a profession of their faith.

32. In the elections which took place on 7 November the National Union candidates were returned to all the 130 seats in the National Assembly. Although fairly detailed electoral results were published for the electoral districts in Portugal, little information is available on the actual number of voters in the Overseas Territories. The most detailed figures are for Mozambique where out of a population of 6.6 million, some 74,000 (about 1.1 per cent of the population) were registered on the electoral rolls and about 64,000 took part in the voting (see below). In São Tomé, out of a total population of about 60,000 some 5,000 (or 8 per cent) were registered on the electoral rolls, and some 3,800 voted. For the other Territories the only figures available are the percentages of the electorate which took part in the vote. From various accounts it appears that in Portugal and the adjacent islands with a total population of under 10 million, probably between 1.2 and 1.5 million people voted;⁹ in the Overseas Territories, with a total population of more than 13 million people not more than 2 per cent took part in the voting.

Military activities and expenditure in the Overseas Territories

33. At the inauguration of the newly elected National Assembly in December 1965, President Thomaz stated that the two main tasks facing Portugal were the defence of the integrity of national Territory and the economic development of the entire Portuguese realm (espaço português). Although Portugal found itself in a tragic dilemma, it had no choice but to continue along the path it had chosen for survival and it was not possible to foresee how long all the organs of government and the Portuguese people would be faced with the task of defending the Overseas Territories and their inhabitants. Side by side with this effort, economic development would be accelerated to increase the wealth of the Portuguese realm collectively so as to ensure its defence so long as the world situation made it necessary.

34. These two interrelated objectives are reflected in Portugal's budget for 1966 which provides for a total expenditure of 17,410.3 million escudos.¹⁰ Of this, 11,026.5 million escudos are for the ordinary budget and 6,383.8 million escudos for the extraordinary budget, comprising 4,011 million escudos for overseas national defence expenditure and 2,203.3 million escudos for "other investments". Defence expenditures thus account for 63 per cent of the extraordinary budget in 1966.

35. Overseas defence expenditures have steadily increased since 1961. The table below shows that in 1965 the allocations were 60 per cent higher than in 1961, and for the period 1961-1965 total allocations under this heading amounted to some 17,000 million escudos, or approximately $US 600 million.

OVERSEAS MILITARY EXPENDITURES, 1961-1965

(Million escudos)

	Initial allocation	Supplementary
1961 ...	950	1,500	2,450	...
1962 ...	1,500	1,796	3,296	4.1
1963 ...	1,750	1,666.2	3,416.2	3.9
1964 ...	1,750	1,851.4	3,601.4	3.8
1965 ...	2,000	2,043	4,043	4.1

36. In 1965, Mr. Salazar put the cost of defending the Overseas Territories at 3,500 million escudos a year. Commenting on this, an article in Portugal and Overseas Provinces, Economist Intelligence Unit, Quarterly Economic Review, April 1965, said: "This is certainly an underestimate and leaves out of account the deflationary effect on the metropolitan economy caused by loss of confidence (as in 1961/62), an increased tax burden and the fact that much of the finance for the war, raised in metropolitan Portugal, is spent in the provinces and abroad. Nevertheless, when compared with the advantages accruing to Portugal in the past from the Overseas Provinces, it can at present be justified, always assuming that a military victory can be secured and that the balance of power in Southern Africa does not alter. Indeed, in the three years 1961-1963 the amount accruing to the escudo area from the provinces' trade accounts and surplus on invisibles (chiefly transport and mining operation receipts) averaged 29.1 million escudos a year."

37. Although the introduction to the budget contains the statement that, in so far as possible, it is intended to finance defence expenditure from budgetary surpluses, almost 50 per cent of the 1966 extraordinary budget (which includes extraordinary defence expenditures) is financed by internal and external loans. In millions of escudos the separate items are: 1,901.1 (30 per cent of the total) from internal loans; 1,058.5 (16.5 per cent) from external loans; 232 from internal development bonds; 78.5 from money coining (amoedação); and as in 1965, 100 from the special overseas defence and development tax. There is no information on the source of the external loans envisaged in 1966.

38. As noted last year (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, para. 18), both direct and indirect taxes have been increased in recent years to finance the ordinary budget. Since 1961, ordinary revenue has increased by 50 per cent, from 8,238.4 to 12,818.7 million escudos in 1966. Between 1960-1964, direct taxes rose 27 per cent, indirect taxes 33 per cent and special industrial taxes (including consumption taxes on beer and tobacco) increased 66 per cent. In 1966, revenue from direct taxes is estimated at 4,320.4 million escudos, from indirect taxes 4,093.6 million escudos and from industries under a special régime 946.4 million escudos. The total estimated revenue from these three sources is 865.3 million escudos more than in 1965.

39. In 1965, a number of newspaper articles reported that some economists in Lisbon believed that the African war had proved a "blessing" to Portugal,

⁹ The Opposition charged in its manifesto that out of a total population of 23 million people in Portugal and its Overseas Territories, less than 900,000 people were eligible for the vote. In his reply the Minister for the Interior said that this was false, since in Portugal and the adjacent islands alone the electorate was several hundred thousands more than the figure cited by the Opposition.

¹⁰ One escudo = 3.5 cents; $US1 = 28.5 escudos.

as industries were growing in response to military orders, ranging from munitions to food and textiles, and remittances from troops overseas had injected new money into the economy. Nevertheless the budget shows that while ordinary expenditure increased by 32 per cent between 1961 and 1966 (health and welfare expenditures increased by 26 per cent, national education expenditures increased by 40 per cent), public debt service charges increased 122 per cent. In 1966 the public debt service amounted to nearly one fifth of the total ordinary budget compared with only one tenth in 1961. As reported previously the national debt on 30 September 1964 was already 29 per cent of the gross national product and moreover since the extraordinary defence expenditures are financed to a great extent by internal borrowing, the amount of funds available for development is limited. Part of the Transitional Development Plan is being financed by foreign investments in the Overseas Territories.

International relations of Portugal affecting the Territories under its administration

(a) Participation in international and regional organizations

40. Because of its overseas policy Portugal's right to membership and participation in the activities in various international and regional organizations continues to be challenged by other Member States.

41. In May 1965, the Executive Board of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization approved a resolution inviting "the Director General to carry out, with the authorization of the Portuguese Government, a study, in situ, with the aid of either qualified officials of the Secretariat or of appropriate eminent personalities, of the present situation of education in African Territories under Portuguese administration, from the point of view of the aims and general objectives of UNESCO as defined in its Constitution and in relevant resolutions of the General Conference". The resolution further requested the Director General "not to give effect, pending the results of this study and their examination by the Board, to any invitations to Portugal by virtue of decisions of the General Conference or of the Executive Board".

42. Portugal agreed to the education surveys on condition that its rights in UNESCO were restored and similar surveys were undertaken in other member countries. During 1965, however, Portugal was barred from the 28th International Conference on Public Education which was held in Geneva in July last year and the World Congress of Ministers of Education on the Eradication of Illiteracy in September at Teheran.

43. Portugal has since requested that the decisions of the Executive Board should be referred to the International Court of Justice for an advisory opinion. In October 1965 UNESCO's Executive Board decided to postpone discussions of Portugal's request until its meeting in 1966 and Portugal remains barred from UNESCO conferences.

44. The question of Portugal's membership was also raised at the International Telecommunication Union and at the United Nations International Sugar Conference, both of which were held in September 1965.

45. Portugal participates in a number of international and regional activities which are of concern to the African Territories which it claims are its overseas provinces. Thus Portugal is a party to the Long-Term International Coffee Agreement as a producer country though the producer is Angola. Similarly Portugal was a member of the Inter-African Coffee Organization from its establishment until November 1965 when it was expelled because it is not an African country. It was made clear, however, that Angola would be welcome as a member as soon as it could comply with the obligations of the organization.

46. During the fifteenth session of the WHO Regional Committee for Africa, held in Lusaka, Zambia in September 1965, Portugal's right to participate was raised because of its colonial policy and reference was made to the health problems created by refugees from the Portuguese colonies in Africa. The Regional Committee subsequently adopted a resolution which pledges Member States of the region to do whatever is possible to protect and promote the health rights of the populations of the Portuguese colonies in Africa engaged in their struggle for national liberation. It also invites the African States where they are represented in the organs of WHO to consider every means calculated to lead the Government of Portugal to renounce once and for all its colonial policy of oppression. The resolution was transmitted to the Director General with the request that he bring it to the attention of the Nineteenth World Health Assembly which will meet in May 1966.

(b) Trade relations with Southern Rhodesia

47. On 24 February 1965, a trade agreement was signed between Portugal and Southern Rhodesia. This agreement replaced a former agreement dealing with trade between Mozambique and the now defunct Central African Federation. The agreement covers both Angola and Mozambique and provides that the two parties shall accord most-favoured-nation treatment for goods imported from the other except in so far as concerns: (i) special provisions relating to goods produced and traded within the escudo zone; (ii) special provisions relating to trade between Portugal and Spain or Brazil; (iii) special concessions applied by Southern Rhodesia under the GATT. The agreement also exempts from import duties a list of goods produced in one or other of the three Territories.

48. It may be noted that whereas there is an important transit of Southern Rhodesia trade through Mozambique, it is not an important trading partner of either Mozambique or Angola, which together account for less than 2 per cent of its total trade by value.

49. In addition to the above, however, there are agreements relating to the supply of hydroelectric power and crude oil from Mozambique to Umtali. These are discussed in the section on Mozambique. It is reported that no oil has been pumped through the pipeline from Beira to Umtali since 31 December 1965.

(c) Other

50. In a move towards fostering closer trade relations between Angola and Mozambique with South Africa, the Bank of Lisbon and South Africa Ltd. with an initial capital of R2,000 million was established in Johannesburg in November 1965. The Portuguese interests are the Banco de Angola, the Banco Comercial de Angola and the Banco Nacional Ultramarino, which will each have a 25 per cent interest. The South African interest is the General Mining and Finance Corporation (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, annex I, para. 199). General Mining has a one-year option to increase its holding to 25 per cent. Press reports attach significance to the participation of the General Mining Corporation because South Africa is interested in oil exploration in Angola.

51. During the past year Portugal is reported to have strengthened its relations with Brazil, France, the Federal Republic of Germany and Spain. With Brazil it is in the course of negotiating a new treaty of friendship which would include the African Territories under Portuguese administration. Portugal is also interested in the establishment of a Luso-Brazilian community. France, which in April 1964 granted a long-term loan to Portugal for the construction of naval vessels and submarines (A/5800/Rev.1, chap V, para. 82) was reported in the Press in 1965 to be supplying Portugal with Alouette Helicopters which are said to be used in Africa. Several agreements have been signed between Portugal and the Federal Republic of Germany; the subjects include trade, cultural relations and social security. According to press reports there is also an agreement between the two countries under which the Federal Republic of Germany is building a jet aircraft base at Beja and is to supply Portugal with jet combat aircraft for her African operations.

Economic integration and development

(a) Economic integration

52. Up to 1965 most of the measures that had been put into effect for economic integration of the Overseas Territories with Portugal were mainly of a financial and trading nature. According to the schedule, import and export duties on goods produced and traded within the "Escudo zone" are progressively being removed and are to be entirely abolished by 1972. The reduction of tariffs and lifting of import quotas have already resulted in a marked increase in trade between Portugal and the Overseas Territories. The removal of tariffs in the escudo zone assures to Portugal large and growing markets in the Overseas Territories for her manufactured goods so that some observers consider that the loss of the Territories would be a powerful blow to the Portuguese economy.

53. On the other hand, the liberalization of current invisible operations and the movement of capital which is dependent on the general economic conditions in the Territories, has made less progress. Exchange controls have remained in effect and the local currency of the Territories is not yet freely convertible into Portuguese escudos.

54. With the completion of the institutional framework for political integration, various new measures were introduced during 1965 to speed up economic integration and development. Among these new measures were: (i) regulations on foreign investments in the Overseas Territories; (ii) provisions for the establishment of Portuguese and foreign credit institutions; (iii) liberalization of conditions for establishing new industries; and (iv) the establishment of a national employment service and the intensification of measures to promote overseas settlement. These measures are described separately below (sections (c) to (f)). When fully implemented they are intended to bring about fundamental changes in the traditional dual role of the Territories as suppliers of raw materials and as captive markets for Portugal's manufactured goods¹¹ by making the Territories more self-sufficient. In the immediate future, as indicated in the Transitional Development Plan for 1965-1967, the main objective is to encourage revenue earning projects.

(b) Financing of economic development in the Overseas Territories

55. As reported previously (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, para. 36), for the Overseas Territories as a whole the envisaged investments under the Transitional Development Plan 1965-1967 are to be financed almost in equal parts by the Government (including territorial funds), private investors, and loans from abroad. In the past financial assistance provided by Portugal from the public sector to the Overseas Territories has consisted mainly of Treasury loans and loans by the National Development Bank (Banco de Fomento Nacional)¹² and the Caixa Geral de Depósitos, Crédito e Previdência. The following table, which gives a breakdown of financial assistance from the public sector for the years 1962-1964, shows the recent growth of such assistance. It will be seen that Treasury loans increased from 898 million escudos in 1962 to 1,243 million escudos in 1964, and that loans from the National Development Bank and Caixa Geral from 234 to 502 million escudos. Grants increased from 89 to 214 million escudos and other financial assistance from 500 to 841 million escudos.

¹² The National Development Bank provides financing and guarantees for both the public and private sectors; in 1964 about 76 per cent of the financing approved was for the private sector. Of the total credits granted during 1964 to the Overseas Territories, 649 million escudos was for financing (including Angola 452 million and Mozambique 70 million) and 381 million escudos in guarantees. In 1965, the Bank was authorized to issue bonds for development up to 250 million escudos (Decree 46,663, 23 November 1965).

56. In 1965 the Government of Portugal introduced two measures to mobilize local funds in the Overseas Territories for the purpose of financing projects envisaged in the Transitional Development Plan, 1965-1967. One measure (Decree 46,380) authorized the Territorial Governments to raise loans from the local banks. This is to be done through the issue of special promissory notes (promissórias de fomento ultramarino) in the local currency of the Territory, of 1 to 10 million escudos each issue, at 2 per cent interest and redeemable in five years. The decree prescribes the amounts and the conditions under which the local bank of issue and other commercial banks must subscribe to these promissory notes. The other measure (Decrees 46,378 and 46,379, 11 June) was aimed at mobilizing local savings. Under these decrees the Governments of Angola and Mozambique were authorized to issue special Transitional Development Plan, 1965-1967 Treasury bonds (obrigações do tesouro)¹³ at 5 per cent interest, up to a maximum of 1,000 million escudos in the former and 500 million escudos in the latter Territory. These bonds are to be in the local currency of the Territory and are to be amortized at the rate of 6.7 million escudos per annum over fourteen years beginning the sixth year after issue. The local Governments may contract the placement (colocação) of these bonds by local credit institutions, or offer them for direct public subscription. In the Territory concerned, the bank of issue must guarantee loans when secured by these bonds. Within the escudo zone, the bonds may be used for settling both visible and invisible accounts and when used for this purpose, the payment of interest on the bonds and their amortization outside the Territory of issue will receive priority over other transfers to the same area. During the year, both Territories issued the first series of the new Treasury bonds; the issue in Angola was 200 million escudos and in Mozambique 100 million escudos.

57. Later in December 1965 the Minister of Finance was authorized each year to grant automatically to the Overseas Territories (excepting Macau) loans up to the amount fixed each year by the Council of Ministers for Economic Affairs for the implementation of the Transitional Development Plan. For Angola and Mozambique (Decree 46,750, 16 December) the loans are to be for twenty years at 4 per cent interest; for the smaller Territories (Decree 46,683, 3 December) the period is twenty-four years. For Guinea under Portuguese administration, Cape Verde, São Tomé and Príncipe, these loans will be the only source for the financing of the Transitional Development Plan. Cape Verde is exempt from paying interest so long as its financial situation remains unchanged. In January 1966, it was reported that total loans from the Central Government to the Overseas Territories to finance the Transitional Development Plan amounted to 1,021 million escudos for 1963: 101 million for Cape Verde, 35 million for Guinea under Portuguese administration, 36 million for São Tomé and Príncipe, 370 million for Angola, 423 million for Mozambique and 56 million for Timor.

(c) Regulations on foreign investments in Portugal and the Overseas Territories

58. In April 1965 (Decree 46,312, 28 April) new regulations were introduced easing conditions for for-
