"As regards agricultural production, exports of the majority of the products grown in the Congo exceeded in volume Belgium's total consumption: how then, in those conditions, could it be maintained that the economy of the Congo had been developed to suit the convenience of Belgium's economy? The Congo had to export to pay for its imports; that was a law of classic economics. The Soviet Union representative was being ironical when he compared imports of alcohol with imports of machinery into certain territories. Was it his intention to suggest that alcohol should be distilled on the spot? That had been suggested in the Belgian Congo but in the interests of the population the Government had refused its consent."

Delete line 30 to page 12, line 8, and substitute:

"Mr. FLETCHER-COOKE (United Kingdom), referring to the import of wines and beers into Sierra Leone in 1946, admitted that £170,000 worth of wines and beers had been imported while only £94,000 worth of machinery had been imported. However, if the value of other "producer" goods such as commercial vehicles, electrical and telegraphic equipment, cement and motor spirit were added to the latter figure of £94,000, it considerably exceeded the value of wines and beers. A territory cannot import what it cannot get and machinery was difficult to obtain in 1946. In 1947, however, the value of imports of machinery plus other "producer" goods reached a figure of £396,000, while wines and beers were valued at £140,000."
