Joint statement delivered at the high-level panel discussion on the question of death penalty on 5 March 2014, at the twenty-fifth session of the Human Rights Council

Mr President

I have the honour to deliver this statement on behalf of a group of 26 countries (as indicated at the end of the statement). As reflected by the vote on the Human Rights Council's Decision 22/117 to hold the high-level panel discussion on the Question of Death Penalty, the simplistic approach to characterise death penalty as a human rights issue in the context of the right to life of the convicted prisoner is deeply flawed and controversial. Death penalty is first and foremost an issue of the criminal justice system and an important deterring element vis-à-vis the most serious crimes. It must thus be viewed from a much broader perspective and weighed against the rights of the victims and the right of the community to live in peace and security. A constructive dialogue in the Council on this issue is possible only if the legitimate interests of all States are taken duly into account.

There is no international consensus for or against death penalty imposed according to the due process of the law. This has repeatedly been confirmed by the votes on past UNGA resolutions on the moratorium on the use of death penalty, most recently in the 67th session of the General Assembly.

The United Nations Charter clearly stipulates that nothing in the Charter shall authorise the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any State. Every State has the inalienable right to choose its legal and criminal justice systems, without interference in any form by another State. Accordingly, the question of whether to retain or abolish death penalty and the types of crimes for which the death penalty is applied should be determined by each State. Key international instruments that apply to countries with wide divergence in cultures and values do not proscribe the use of death penalty in their texts. The issue of death penalty is a question that every State has the sovereign right, under international law, to decide, taking into account its own circumstances.

Thank you, Mr President.
