Disability-inclusive development in national, regional and international processes

Background paper prepared by the Secretariat

Introduction

1.   Since its inception, the United Nations has been promoting an inclusive and equitable society built on diversity and equal opportunities for all. The international community has continuously been making efforts towards this goal through the adoption and implementation of a series of international instruments specifically on disability, including the World Programme of Action concerning Disabled Persons (1982), the Standard Rules on Equalization of Opportunities for Persons with Disabilities (1993) and, most recently, the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (General Assembly resolution 61/106, annex).

2.   The Convention guides the international normative framework for the advancement of persons with disabilities in society and development. In the preamble to the Convention, the States parties emphasize the importance of mainstreaming disability issues as an integral part of relevant strategies of sustainable development. Article 32, paragraph 1, specifically speaks to the need for international development programmes to be inclusive of, and accessible to, persons with disabilities, further setting out the responsibilities of States parties.

3.   However, gaps between policy and practice, as well as challenges in mainstreaming efforts, remain. Disability has been largely invisible in the major internationally agreed development frameworks such as the Millennium Development Goals and in follow-up efforts for their implementation and evaluation. Tangible progress on the inclusion of persons with disabilities remains limited. Persons with disabilities still face multiple barriers and numerous obstacles to their full and equal participation in development.

4.   As the deadline for the achievement of the Millennium Development Goals draws near, the international community is increasingly recognizing the urgency and importance of including disability in development. In recent years, the General Assembly has adopted a series of resolutions on realizing the Goals for persons with disabilities (see resolutions 62/127, 63/150, 64/131, 65/186, 66/124 and 67/140). In its resolution 63/150, the Assembly reaffirmed the need to include and integrate the rights, well-being and perspective of persons with disabilities in development efforts, without which the internationally agreed development goals, in particular the Millennium Development Goals, would not be genuinely achieved. More recently, in its resolution 66/124, the Assembly decided to convene a High-level Meeting, on 23 September 2013, with the overarching theme "The way forward: a disability-inclusive development agenda towards 2015 and beyond", in order to strengthen efforts to ensure accessibility for and inclusion of persons with disabilities in all aspects of development efforts.

5.   In his report entitled "Realization of the Millennium Development Goals and internationally agreed development goals for persons with disabilities: a disability-inclusive development agenda towards 2015 and beyond" (A/67/211), the Secretary-General referred to the following four priority areas for mainstreaming disability in development: (a) strengthening and applying the international normative framework on disability; (b) promoting accessibility for inclusive and sustainable development; (c) addressing gaps in capacity-building; and (d) assessing the situation of persons with disabilities: inclusive monitoring and evaluation frameworks. These priority areas are essential for sustainable, equitable and inclusive development for all.

6.   Ongoing preparatory processes towards the post-2015 development agenda could provide crucial entry points for ensuring that disability perspectives become an integral part of the development agenda, subsequently narrowing the gap between policy and practice and helping to realize the full and effective participation of persons with disabilities in all aspects of society and development.

Progress achieved and challenges encountered in furthering disability-inclusive development

7.   Mainstreaming disability in development at all levels is a strategy to promote inclusive, sustainable and equitable development for all. The United Nations has long taken a leading role in highlighting the urgent need to mainstream disability in policy implementation and programme development. In recent years, there has been some progress in this regard. However, there continues to be a major backlog in terms of including disability in international development frameworks, as well as in their implementation, monitoring and evaluation. The need to coordinate efforts to include disability in development action has been voiced and grown stronger. Multi-stakeholder partnerships have become more important for resource sharing and knowledge dissemination, as well as for building capacity for practical action on the inclusion of disability on the ground.

8.   At the global level, in 2010, during its second five-year review of the Millennium Development Goals, the General Assembly called for action to promote the inclusion of people with disabilities in productive employment and decent work and their equitable access to economic opportunities and social services. In the outcome document of the United Nations Conference on Sustainable Development it was highlighted that sustainable development requires the involvement of persons with disability (see General Assembly resolution 66/288, annex). In 2013, during its fifty-first session, the Commission for Social Development further underscored the need for persons with disabilities to be included in processes that affect their lives and to benefit from equal opportunities to live independent and productive lives.

9.   More recently, the General Assembly, in its resolution on the quadrennial comprehensive policy review of operational activities for development of the United Nations system (resolution 67/226, para. 23), provides a clear mandate for United Nations country teams to support activities that promote the inclusion of disability in programmatic work, including in the United Nations Development Assistance Framework, to achieve national development priorities.

10.   At the national level, Member States are increasingly adopting a wide array of approaches to including disability in development efforts, such as through the development of disability-inclusive and responsive national plans and strategies. International development cooperation initiatives too are increasingly becoming sensitive to disability issues, taking into account accessibility for all and the need to provide social services that are responsive to the situation of persons with disabilities.

11.   In this context, a twin-track approach may be considered for strategies that aim to promote the inclusion of disability with a view to empowering persons with disabilities through enhanced personal agency and making opportunities more equitable in various domains.[1] First, there should be equal access for persons with disabilities to mainstream systems and services. Interventions in this regard focus on improving accessibility, removing barriers and making reasonable accommodations to persons with disabilities in public transportation, built environments and communications, as well as in education and health care, to facilitate individual autonomy and participation in the community. Second, targeted interventions should be implemented to address the specific needs of persons with disabilities so that they are able to participate in society and development by providing training and rehabilitation services. For both aspects, accessibility and coordination among all stakeholders is crucial, as is the need to take into account the local and cultural contexts in which persons with disabilities live.

12.   Through multi-stakeholder partnerships involving Governments, international organizations, the private sector, civil society organizations, in particular organizations of persons with disabilities, and other stakeholders, progress is becoming possible. Challenges remain, however, when it comes to including disability in major development policy frameworks and development efforts at all levels and, therefore, when it comes to making a real change in the lives of persons with disabilities. Some major contributing factors are: the lack of inclusion of disability in development policies and programmes or in related processes and mechanisms; the lack of resources to implement and sustain disability-inclusive initiatives; negative attitudes towards persons with disabilities; inadequate and inaccessible social service provision and the compounding issue of service delivery limitations; and the dearth of reliable data and evidence on the situation of persons with disabilities.

13.   Specific enablers are required for disability-inclusive development to occur.[2] Change need not be only about laws and policies, but could also involve institutions and the monitoring and evaluation of development policies and programmes to understand, by using a "disability lens", how disability affects the whole of society. In order to ensure the participation of persons with disabilities in all aspects of society and development and to see improvements in terms of accessibility of physical environments and information and communication technologies, a change in cultural attitudes is also needed.

Ways forward: opportunities to further promote the inclusion of disability in development processes at all levels before 2015 and beyond

14.   In its resolution 65/1, the General Assembly addressed progress made in the implementation of the eight development goals emanating from the United Nations Millennium Declaration and associated commitments and requested that recommendations be made for further steps to advance the United Nations development agenda beyond 2015.

15.   Efforts to date on the post-2015 development agenda suggest that the advancement of persons with disabilities remains a peripheral concern. But the increasing recognition of disability as a cross-cutting development issue also represents opportunities for the fuller inclusion of disability.

16.   The year 2013 presents a historic opportunity for the inclusion of disability in development beyond 2015. The High-level Meeting of the General Assembly on Disability and Development, organized at the level of Heads of State and Government, will be held on 23 September 2013 with the overarching theme "The way forward: a disability-inclusive development agenda towards 2015 and beyond" (see resolution 66/124). The outcome of the High-level Meeting could advance the implementation of all the internationally agreed development goals, including the Millennium Development Goals, for persons with disabilities and ensure the inclusion of disability in the emerging post-2015 development agenda, framework and processes by identifying strategic entry points and collaborative partnerships for implementation.

17.   At the international level, there are ongoing intergovernmental processes and mechanisms, such as the open working group mandated by the General Assembly to prepare a proposal on sustainable development goals for consideration by the Assembly at its sixty-eighth session (see resolution 66/288, annex, para. 248). Other related processes for identifying priorities and helping to reach consensus on a post-2015 development agenda are presented in the annex. These processes should be open to and inclusive of persons with disabilities, address pressing challenges and recognize opportunities to take action for inclusive, equitable and sustainable development for all.

18.   In addition, national consultations in over 100 countries are being conducted to exchange ideas and create a shared vision of the international development agenda beyond 2015.[3]

19.   It is expected that current multi-stakeholder consultations could further promote the explicit inclusion of disability in emerging post-2015 development frameworks with specific results for action to create a genuinely inclusive society and development for all.

Questions for consideration

20.   The following questions are presented for consideration:

- Which options have proved effective in overcoming obstacles and barriers to mainstreaming disability in development?

- The current development processes provide opportunities to further include disability in development. Which specific entry points exist for incorporating disability in the post-2015 international development frameworks?

- How should the inclusion of disability in development be monitored and evaluated?

- The High-level Meeting of the General Assembly on Disability and Development will be held in September 2013. What concrete measures and actions should be taken by Member States, the United Nations, development agencies and civil society to implement the outcome of the High-level Meeting and follow up in furthering the inclusion of disability in development in all processes, at all levels?
